More recently, the Court, in Department of Commerce v. United States House of Representatives (1999), ruled that the census cannot be statistically adjusted for the purpose of congressional apportionment. The decision was premised exclusively on whether the Census Act, as a matter of STATUTORY INTERPRETATION, itself prevents using sampling in the congressional apportionment context. Because the Court did not reach any constitutional issues, the decision left unresolved whether the Constitution permits statistical sampling in other contexts, such as redistricting and allocation of federal funds to the states, as well as whether a statutory amendment to the Census Act to permit sampling for congressional apportionment would be constitutional.

SAMUEL ISSACHAROFF
(2000)

Bibliography

ISSACHAROFF, SAMUEL and LICHTMAN, ALLAN J. 1993 The Census Undercount and Minority Representation: The Constitutional Obligation of the States to Guarantee Equal Representation. Review of Litigation 13:1–29.

CENTRAL HUDSON GAS & ELECTRIC CORP. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION
447 U.S. 557 (1980)

Central Hudson is the leading decision establishing ground rules for the Supreme Court's modern protection of COMMERCIAL SPEECH under the FIRST AMENDMENT. New York's Public Service Commission (PSC), in the interest of conserving energy, forbade electrical utilities to engage in promotional advertising. The Supreme Court held, 8–1, that this prohibition was unconstitutional.

Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, for the Court, used an analytical approach to commercial speech that combined a TWO-LEVEL THEORY with a BALANCING TEST. First, he wrote, it must be determined whether the speech in question is protected by the First Amendment. The answer to that question is affirmative unless the speech is "misleading" or it is "related to illegal activity" (for example, by proposing an unlawful transaction). Second, if the speech falls within the zone of First Amendment protection, the speech can be regulated only if government satisfies all the elements of a three-part interest-balancing formula: the asserted governmental interest must be "substantial"; the regulation must "directly advance" that interest; and the regulation must not be "more extensive than is necessary to serve that interest."

This intermediate STANDARD OF REVIEW seems loosely patterned after the standard used under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause in cases involving SEX DISCRIMINATION. In those cases, the Court typically accepts that the governmental interest is important; when a statute is invalidated, the Court typically regards gender discrimination as an inappropriate means for achieving the governmental interest. The Central Hudson opinion followed this pattern: the promotional advertising was protected speech, and the state's interest in conservation was substantial and directly advanced by the PSC's regulation. However, prohibiting all promotional advertising, including statements that would not increase net energy use, was not the LEAST RESTRICTIVE MEANS for achieving conservation.

Concurring opinions by Justices HARRY A. BLACKMUN and JOHN PAUL STEVENS, both joined by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, adopted more speech-protective doctrinal positions. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, in lone dissent, argued that the PSC's regulation was only an ECONOMIC REGULATION of a state-regulated monopoly, raising no important First Amendment issue.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD CO. v. GALLATIN

See: Sinking Fund Cases

CERTIFICATION

Certification may refer to a broad range of acts of government officials high and low: a clerk may certify the accuracy of a copy of a document; the Federal Power Commission may issue a certificate that a natural gas pipeline will serve "public convenience and necessity." In federal courts, however, certification has a narrower meaning. A court may certify questions of law to another court for authoritative decision.

The UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS are authorized by Congress to certify "distinct and definite" questions of law for decision by the Supreme Court. The practice has been criticized for influencing the Supreme Court to decide issues in the abstract, without a complete factual record, and for weakening the Court's control over the questions it will decide. Partly for these reasons, this form of certification is rarely used.

More frequently, federal district courts certify doubtful questions of state law for decision by state courts. About half the states expressly authorize their courts to answer such certified questions, and the Supreme Court has applauded the technique. This form of certification is merely a variant form of abstention.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BATOR, PAUL M.; MISHKIN, PAUL J.; SHAPIRO, DAVID L.; and WECHSLER, HERBERT, eds. 1973 Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System, 2nd ed. Pages 1582–1586. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

CERTIORARI, WRIT OF

A writ of certiorari is an order from a higher court directing a lower court to transmit the record of a case for review in the higher court. The writ was in use in England and America before the Revolution. Unlike the WRIT OF ERROR, which was used routinely to review final judgments of lower courts, certiorari was a discretionary form of review that might be granted even before the lower court had given judgment.

When Congress established the circuit courts of appeals in 1891, it expressly authorized the Supreme Court to review certain of these courts' decisions, otherwise declared to be "final," by issuing the writ of certiorari, which remained discretionary. In 1925, Congress expanded the Court's certiorari JURISDICTION and reduced the availability of the writ of error (renamed APPEAL). Certiorari is today the chief mode of the Supreme Court's exercise of APPELLATE JURISDICTION. Proposals to abolish the Court's theoretically obligatory jurisdiction over appeals would leave appellate review entirely to certiorari, and thus to the Court's discretion.

By statute the Court is authorized to grant certiorari in any case that is "in" a federal court of appeals. Thus in an appropriate case the Court can bypass the court of appeals and directly review the action of the district court, as it did in the celebrated case of UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974).

The Supreme Court's rules have long stated some considerations governing the Court's discretionary grant or denial of certiorari. Three factors are emphasized: (1) conflicts among the highest courts of the states or the federal courts of appeals; (2) the resolution of important unsettled issues of federal law; and (3) the correction of error. These factors do not exhaust but only illustrate the considerations influencing the Court's certiorari policy.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

LINZER, PETER 1979 The Meaning of Certiorari Denials. Columbia Law Review 79:1227–1305.

CHAE CHAN PING v. UNITED STATES
(Chinese Exclusion Case)
130 U.S. 581 (1889)

The CHINESE EXCLUSION ACT of 1882 authorized the issuance of certificates to Chinese ALIENS, guaranteeing their right to reenter the United States after leaving. In 1888 Congress amended that act to prohibit reentry by voiding all outstanding certificates, destroying the right of Chinese to land. Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD, for a unanimous Supreme Court, admitted that this act "is in contravention of express stipulations of the Treaty of 1868 (and other agreements) . . . but it is not on that account invalid or to be restricted in its enforcement. The treaties were of no greater legal obligation than the Act of Congress." He asserted that the treaties were equivalent to federal statutes and they might thus be "repealed or modified at the pleasure of Congress." Because "no paramount authority is given to one over the other" the government could constitutionally exclude aliens from the United States as "an incident of SOVEREIGNTY."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

CHAFEE, ZECHARIAH, JR.
(1885–1957)

Modern scholarship in the area of free speech is indelibly stamped with the ideas of Zechariah Chafee, Jr., a distinguished professor of law and University Professor at Harvard, and a CIVIL LIBERTIES activist.

Chafee, scion of a comfortable business-oriented New England family, left the family's iron business to enter Harvard Law School, returning there in 1916 to teach. Inheriting ROSCOE POUND's third-year EQUITY course, in which Pound dealt with INJUNCTIONS against libel, Chafee, uncertain as to the meaning of FREEDOM OF SPEECH, read all pre-1916 cases on the subject. He concluded that the few existing decisions reached results unsatisfactory to one seeking precedents for free speech protection. This realization, coupled with stringent new wartime espionage and SEDITION laws, and their often arbitrary enforcement, persuaded him of the importance of developing a modern law of free speech. Starting with articles in the New Republic and the Harvard Law Review, and a 1920 book, Freedom of Speech, Chafee attempted workable delineations between liberty, which he felt must be safeguarded carefully, and the restraints that emergency situations might warrant. Unhappy with the insensitivity of OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES' initial CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER construct in SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919), Chafee, with the assistance of Judge LEARNED HAND, set out to persuade Holmes that the test for speech should consider not only the individual's interest in freedom but also the social desirability of injecting provocative thought into the marketplace. "Tolerance of adverse opinion is not a matter of generosity, but of political prudence," Chafee argued. Holmes embraced this position in his dissent in ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919), having been newly convinced that the FIRST AMENDMENT established a national policy favoring a search for truth, while balancing social interests and individual interests. Contemporary traditionalists reacted negatively with a move to oust Chafee from Harvard Law School. Such action was thwarted when Harvard President A. Lawrence Lowell rallied to Chafee's defense.

Chafee, as one of the nation's leading civil libertarians in the 1920s became involved with a number of vital issues. He served on commissions to probe owner autocracy and brutality in the mining regions of the East, and he spoke out publicly against excessive use of the labor injunction to curtail legitimate union activities. In 1929 he headed a subcommittee of the Wickersham Commission which looked into police use of the "third degree" and improper trial procedures. He played a prominent role in the American Bar Association's Commission on the BILL OF RIGHTS in the late 1930s, and in the 1940s served on the Commission on Freedom of the Press, afterward performing similar duties for the United Nations.

Chafee maintained a deep commitment to legal education. He personally regarded as his principal professional accomplishment the Federal Interpleader Act of 1936, a statute creating federal court JURISDICTION when persons in different states make conflicting claims to the same shares of stock or the same bank accounts. His chief influence can be seen, however, in the work of generations of attorneys and judges, nurtured on his free speech and civil liberties view, who have rewritten First Amendment doctrine along Chafee's lines.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1979 World War I and the Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States. New York: Norton.

CHAMBERS v. FLORIDA
309 U.S. 227 (1940)

Chambers was the first coerced confession case to come before the Court since the landmark decision in BROWN V. MISSISSIPPI (1936). In Brown, the physical torture being uncontested, the state had relied mainly on the point that the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION did not apply to state proceedings. In Chambers, before the state supreme court finally affirmed the convictions it had twice reversed so that juries could determine whether the confessions had been freely and voluntarily made, and the record showed no physical coercion. Moreover, the state contested the JURISDICTION of the Supreme Court to review the judgments, arguing that there was no question of federal law to be denied. However, the Supreme Court, in an eloquent opinion by Justice HUGO L. BLACK, unanimously asserted jurisdiction and reversed the state court.

Black rejected the state's jurisdictional argument, declaring that the Supreme Court could determine for itself whether the confessions had been obtained by means that violated the constitutional guarantee of DUE PROCESS OF LAW. Reviewing the facts Black found that the black prisoners, having been arrested on suspicion without warrant, had been imprisoned in a mob-dominated environment, held incommunicado, and interrogated over five days and through a night until they abandoned their disclaimers of guilt and "confessed." POLICE INTERROGATION had continued until the prosecutor got what he wanted. On the basis of these facts Black wrote a stirring explanation of the relation between due process and free government, concluding that courts in our constitutional system stand "as havens of refuge for those who might otherwise suffer because they are helpless, weak, outnumbered, or because they are non-conforming victims of prejudice. . . ." Applying the exclusionary rule of Brown, the Court held that psychological as well as physical torture violated due process.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

CHAMBERS v. MARONEY
399 U.S. 42 (1970)

In this important FOURTH AMENDMENT case involving the automobile exception to the SEARCH WARRANT clause, the police had seized a car without a warrant and had searched it later, without a warrant, after having driven it to the police station, where they impounded it. Justice BYRON R. WHITE for the Supreme Court acknowledged that the search could not be justified as having been conducted as a SEARCH INCIDENT TO ARREST; nor could he find EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES that justified the WARRANTLESS SEARCH.

White simply fudged the facts. He declared that there was "no difference between on the one hand seizing and holding a car before presenting the PROBABLE CAUSE issue to a magistrate and on the other hand carrying out an immediate search without a warrant." Either course was "reasonable under the Fourth Amendment," but the police had followed neither course in this case. Probable cause for the search had existed at the time of the search, and White declared without explanation that probable cause still existed later when the police made the search at the station, when the felons were in custody. However, the possibility that they might drive off in the car did not exist; that possibility had alone occasioned the automobile exception in the first place. Absent a risk that the culprits might use the vehicle to escape with the fruits of their crime, the constitutional distinction between houses and cars did not matter. White saw no difference in the practical consequences of choosing between an immediate search without a warrant, when probable cause existed, and "the car's immobilization until a warrant is obtained." That logic was irrefutable and irrelevant, because the failure of the police to obtain the warrant gave rise to the case. Only Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN dissented from this line of reasoning.

Until this case mere probable cause for a search, as judged only by a police officer, did not by itself justify a warrantless search; the case is significant, too, because of its implied rule that exigent circumstances need not justify the warrantless search of a car. Following Chambers, the Court almost routinely assumed that if a search might have been made at the time of arrest, any warrantless search conducted later, when the vehicle was impounded, was a valid one.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

CHAMPION v. AMES
188 U.S. 321 (1903)

As the twentieth century opened, the Supreme Court began to sustain use of the COMMERCE CLAUSE as an instrument to remedy various social and economic ills. (See NATIONAL POLICE POWER.) In 1895 Congress forbade interstate transportation of lottery tickets, seeking to safeguard public morals. Opponents challenged the act on three grounds: the tickets themselves were not SUBJECTS OF COMMERCE, Congress's power to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE did not extend to outright prohibition, and such a power would violate the TENTH AMENDMENT's reservation of certain powers to the states.

A 5–4 Court sustained the act, emphasizing Congress's plenary power over commerce. Because the tickets indicated a cash prize might be won, they were items liable to be bought or sold—thus, subjects of commerce and so subject to regulation. Citing the complete prohibition on FOREIGN COMMERCE in the EMBARGO ACT OF 1807, Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN asserted that the power of regulation necessarily included the power of prohibition. Although he rejected the contention that "Congress may arbitrarily exclude from commerce among the states any article . . . it may choose," Harlan justified the ban on transporting lottery tickets on the ground that Congress alone had power to suppress "an evil of such appalling character," thus propounding the NOXIOUS PRODUCTS DOCTRINE. Harlan dismissed the Tenth Amendment objection: that provision was no bar to a power that had been "expressly delegated to Congress."

Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER led Justices DAVID BREWER, Rufus Peckham, and GEORGE SHIRAS in dissent. Fuller noted that the motive underlying the legislation was to suppress gambling, not to regulate commerce. He feared the disruption of distinct spheres of authority and the "creation of a centralized government." He also challenged Harlan's assertion that the commerce power included the right of prohibition. The Court, citing Champion, however, would soon uphold the PURE FOOD AND DRUG ACT (in HIPOLITE EGG COMPANY V. UNITED STATES, 1911), the MANN ACT (in HOKE V. UNITED STATES, 1913), and others, relying on its expansive view of the commerce clause.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Darby Lumber Company, United States v.; Hammer v. Dagenhart.)

CHAMPION AND DICKASON v. CASEY
Cir. Ct., Rhode Island (1792)

Reported widely in newspapers in June 1792, this was the first case in which a federal court held a state act unconstitutional as a violation of the CONTRACT CLAUSE. Rhode Island had passed a stay law, postponing by three years the time for a debtor to pay his creditors.

The Circuit Court for the district, presided over by Chief Justice JOHN JAY, ruled that the stay law impaired the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS contrary to Article I, section 10.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

CHANDLER v. FLORIDA
449 U.S. 560 (1981)

The Supreme Court here distinguished away ESTES V. TEXAS (1965), in which it had held that the televising of a criminal trial violated DUE PROCESS OF LAW because of the inherently prejudicial impact on criminal defendants. In Chandler an 8–0 Court ruled that the prejudicial effect must be actually shown by the facts of the particular case; Florida's statute, at issue here, imposed adequate safeguards on the use of electronic media in court, thereby insuring due process of law. Presumably the decision promoted FREEDOM OF THE PRESS and the principle of a PUBLIC TRIAL.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Free Press/Fair Trial.)

CHANDLER v. MILLER
620 U.S. 305 (1997)

In Chandler v. Miller, the Supreme Court, in a MAJORITY OPINION by Justice RUTH BADER GINSBURG, struck down a Georgia statute requiring candidates for certain state offices (including judges, legislators, and executive officials) to certify that they had taken and passed a urinalysis test for illegal drugs within thirty days prior to qualifying for nomination or election. The Court characterized this requirement as an UNREASONABLE SEARCH under the FOURTH AMENDMENT. Following PRECEDENT, the Court indicated that a reasonable search must normally be based on "individualized suspicion of wrongdoing" unless a "particularized exception" applies. Such an exception can only be justified if, first, the court finds "special needs" for the search "beyond the normal need for law enforcement" or "crime detection"; and, second, if pursuant to a "context specific inquiry" that balances the "competing private and public interests," a court finds that the privacy interests are "minimal" and that substantial enough governmental interests would be "placed in jeopardy by a requirement of individualized suspicion." Unlike the evidence of drug use by railway employees in SKINNER V. RAILWAY LABOR EXECUTIVES' ASSOCIATION (1989) and by students in Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton (1995), the record did not contain evidence that the danger of drug use by candidates was "concrete" or "real," or that the public safety was at immediate risk. Unlike the record in NATIONAL TREASURY EMPLOYEES UNION V. VON RAAB (1989), the record in this case did not show that criminal investigation would be inadequate. Nor did it show that DRUG TESTING (the timing of which was in the candidate's control) would effectively deter drug use. Georgia's real interest, the Court concluded, was not "special" but "symbolic," namely, the "image the State seeks to project." Accordingly, the Court found that the risk to public safety was not "substantial" or "important" enough to override the candidate's privacy. The Court explicitly did not reach the Fourth Amendment questions involved in requiring candidates to undergo and disclose the results of a general medical exam or to make a financial disclosure.

The lone dissenter, Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, showed that the Court could easily have reached the opposite conclusion under the malleable special-needs DOCTRINE, which had been fashioned during his tenure as CHIEF JUSTICE and had moved Fourth Amendment debate away from PROBABLE CAUSE and warrants and toward whether suspicion is necessary at all.

In this case involving a search of judges, the Court appeared at last to be troubled by its ever-decreasing protection of privacy as it cast about for some ground on which to limit the potent special-needs doctrine to only a few exceptional cases (like airport searches) where privacy interests are minimal and there is substantial evidence that public safety is in jeopardy. But in striking down the statute, the Court devised no clear or effective limits on this doctrine and questioned no earlier opinion applying it. Alternatively, given the unique facts of this case, perhaps the Court was troubled not by a concern for privacy but for the potential constraints on public discourse and electoral campaigns that may result if, for purely symbolic purposes, a previously elected legislature can compel, through intrusive investigations, newly contending candidates for office to acquiesce in its policies and thereby obtain their implicit acceptance of policies that should instead be subject to debate.

ROBERT D. GOLDSTEIN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Drug Regulation; Search and Seizure.)

CHANDLER ACT

See: Bankruptcy Act

CHAPLINSKY v. NEW HAMPSHIRE
315 U.S. 568 (1941)

In Chaplinsky, Justice FRANK MURPHY, writing for a unanimous Supreme Court, introduced into FIRST AMENDMENT jurisprudence the TWO-LEVEL THEORY that "There are certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any constitutional problem. These include the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or "FIGHTING WORDS"—those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace." Chaplinsky itself arose under a "fighting words" statute, which the state court had interpreted to punish "words likely to cause an average addressee to fight." In this narrow context the decision can be seen as an application of the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test. COHEN V. CALIFORNIA (1971), emphasizing this rationale, offered protection to an OBSCENITY that created no danger of violence.

In its broader conception of categories of speech excluded from First Amendment protection, the case served as an important doctrinal source for many later obscenity and libel decisions.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

CHAPMAN v. CALIFORNIA

See: Harmless Error

CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE v. WARREN BRIDGE COMPANY
11 Peters 420 (1837)

The Charles River Bridge case reflected the tension within ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE's proposition that the American people desired a government that would allow them "to acquire the things they covet and which [would] . . . not debar them from the peaceful enjoyment of those possessions which they have already acquired." A metaphor for the legal strains that accompanied technological change, the case spoke more to the emerging questions of railroad development than to the immediate problem of competing bridges over the Charles River.

Following the Revolution, some investors petitioned the Massachusetts legislature for a charter to build a bridge over the Charles River, linking Boston and Charlestown. Commercial interests in both cities supported the proposal, and the state issued the grant in 1785. The charter authorized the proprietors to charge a variety of tolls for passage, pay an annual fee to Harvard College for the loss of its exclusive ferry service across the river, and then, after forty years, return the bridge to the state in "good repair."

Construction of the bridge began immediately, and in 1786, it was open to traffic, benefiting the proprietors, the communities, and the back country. The land route from Medford to Boston, for example, was cut from thirteen to five miles, and trade dramatically increased as the bridge linked the area-wide market. Success invited imitation, and other communities petitioned the legislature for bridge charters. When the state authorized the West Boston Bridge to Cambridge in 1792, the Charles River Bridge proprietors asked for compensation for the revenue losses they anticipated, and the state extended their charter from forty to seventy years. Ironically, that extension provided the basis for future political and legal assaults against the Charles River Bridge. Other bridges followed and no compensation was offered. The state specifically refuted any monopoly claims and the Charles River Bridge proprietors refrained from claiming any.

Increasing prosperity and population raised the collection of tolls to nearly $20,000 annually in 1805; the share values had increased over 300 percent in value. The toll rates having remained constant since 1786, profits multiplied. Swollen profits stimulated community criticism and animated a long-standing hostility toward monopolies. Opportunity was the watchword and special privilege its bane.

Beginning in 1823, Charlestown merchants launched a five-year effort to build a competing "free" bridge over the Charles. They argued that the existing facility was inadequate, overcrowded, and dangerous; but basically, they appealed for public support on the grounds that the tolls on the Charles River Bridge were "burdensome, vexatious, and odious." The proprietors, defending the bridge's utility, offered to expand and improve it. They consistently maintained that the legislature could not grant a new bridge franchise in the vicinity without compensating them for the loss of tolls. But the political climate persuaded legislators to support the new bridge, and in 1828, after rejecting various schemes for compensation, the legislature approved the Warren Bridge charter. The act established the bridge's termini at 915 feet from the existing bridge on the Boston side, and at 260 feet from it on the Charlestown side. The new bridge was given the same toll schedule as the Charles River Bridge, but the state provided that after the builders recovered their investment and five per cent interest, the bridge would revert to the commonwealth. In any event, the term for tolls could not exceed six years. Governor LEVI LINCOLN had previously vetoed similar legislation, but in 1828 he quietly acquiesced.

The new bridge, completed in six months, was an instant success—but at the expense of the Charles River Bridge. During the first six months of the Warren Bridge's operations, receipts for the old bridge rapidly declined. Net income for the Warren Bridge in the early 1830s consistently was twice that for the Charles River Bridge.

Counsel for the old bridge proprietors wasted little time in carrying their arguments to the courts. After DANIEL WEBSTER and LEMUEL SHAW failed to gain an INJUNCTION to prevent construction of the new bridge, they appeared in the state supreme court to argue the merits of the charter in 1829, nearly one year after the bridge's completion. Shaw and Webster contended that the Charles River Bridge proprietors were successors to the Harvard ferry's exclusive franchise. In addition, they argued that the tolls represented the substance of the 1785 charter. Although the charter for the new bridge did not take away the plaintiffs' franchise, the 1828 act effectively destroyed the tolls—the essence and only tangible property of the franchise. The lawyers thus contended that the new bridge charter violated the CONTRACT CLAUSE and the state constitutional prohibition against expropriation of private property without compensation. The Warren Bridge defendants denied the old bridge's monopoly claims and emphasized that the state had not deprived the Charles River Bridge proprietors' continued right to take tolls. They also maintained that the old bridge proprietors had waived exclusivity when they accepted an extension of their franchise in 1792 after the state had chartered the West Boston Bridge.

The state supreme court, dividing equally, dismissed the complaint to facilitate a WRIT OF ERROR to the United States Supreme Court. The Jacksonian Democrats on the state court supported the state and their Whig brethren opposed it. The former rejected monopoly claims and berated the Charles River Bridge proprietors for their failure to secure an explicit monopoly grant. Chief Justice Isaac Parker, acknowledging that the 1785 grant was not exclusive, agreed that the state could damage existing property interests for the community's benefit without compensation. But he insisted that "immutable principles of justice" demanded compensation when the forms of property were indistinguishable. He conceded that canals and railroads might legitimately destroy the value of a turnpike; but when the state chartered a similar franchise, then operators of the existing property could claim an indemnity.

The United States Supreme Court first heard arguments in the case in March 1831. Although absences and disagreements prevented any decision before JOHN MARSHALL's death in 1835, the Court's records offer good circumstantial evidence that he had supported the new bridge. Following several new appointments and ROGER B. TANEY's confirmation as Chief Justice, the Court heard reargument in January 1837. Webster again appeared for the plaintiffs; defendants engaged Simon Greenleaf of Harvard, a close associate of JOSEPH STORY and JAMES KENT. Both sides essentially continued the arguments advanced in the state court. Finally, in February 1837, after nearly nine years of litigation, the Court decisively ruled in behalf of the state's right to charter the new bridge.

Taney's opinion sought to balance property rights against community needs by strictly construing the old bridge charter. He rejected the proprietors' exclusivity claim, contending that nothing would pass by implication. "The charter . . . is a written instrument which must speak for itself," he wrote, "and be interpreted by its own terms." He confidently asserted that the "rule" of STRICT CONSTRUCTION was well settled and he particularly invoked Marshall's 1830 PROVIDENCE BANK V. BILLINGS opinion, rejecting a bank's claim to implied tax immunity. Like Marshall, Taney concluded that the implications of exclusivity constituted a derogation of community rights. He argued that the community's "interests" would be adversely affected if the state surrendered control of a line of travel for profit. Taney neatly combined old Federalist doctrines of governmental power with the leaven of Jacksonian rhetoric: "The continued existence of a government would be of no great value," he believed, "if by implications and presumptions, it was disarmed of the powers necessary to accomplish the ends of its creations; and the functions it was designed to perform, transferred to the hands of privileged CORPORATIONS."

But the touchstone of Taney's opinion was its practical response to the contemporary reality of public policy needs. Taking note of technological changes and improvements, such as the substitution of railroad traffic for that of turnpikes and canals, Taney argued that the law must be a spur, not an impediment, to change. If the Charles River Bridge proprietors could thwart such change, he feared that the courts would be inundated with suits seeking to protect established property forms. Turnpike companies, for example, "awakening from their sleep," would call upon courts to halt improvements which had taken their place. Railroad and canal properties would be jeopardized and venture capital would be discouraged. The Supreme Court, he concluded, would not "sanction principles" that would prevent states from enjoying the advances of science and technology. Taney thus cast the law with the new entrepreneurs and risk-takers as the preferred agents for material progress.

In his dissent Justice Story rejected Taney's reliance upon strict construction and advanced an imposing line of precedents demonstrating that private grants had been construed in favor of the grantees. "It would be a dishonour of the government," Story said, "that it should pocket a fair consideration, and then quibble as to the obscurities and implications of its own contract." But Story's dissent was not merely a defense of VESTED RIGHTS. Like Taney, he, too, was concerned with progress and public policy. But whereas Taney emphasized opportunity, Story maintained that security of title and the full enjoyment of existing property was a necessary inducement for private investment in public improvements. Story insisted that the proprietors were entitled to compensation. He thus discounted the potentially staggering social and economic costs implicit in a universal principle requiring JUST COMPENSATION when new improvement projects diminished the value of existing franchises.

Story's position reflected immediate reality. Several years earlier, the state's behavior in the bridge controversy had discouraged stock sales for the proposed Boston and Worcester Railroad. Lagging investment finally had forced the legislature to grant the railroad a thirty-year guarantee of exclusive privileges on the line of travel.

Given the materialism of the American people, Taney's arguments had the greater appeal and endurance. He allied the law with broadened entrepreneurial opportunities at the expense of past assets. Nothing threatened the economic aspirations of Americans more than the scarcity of capital; nothing, therefore, required greater legal encouragement than venture capital, subject only to the risks of the marketplace. These were the concerns that took a local dispute over a free bridge out of its provincial setting and thrust it into the larger debate about political economy. In a society that placed a premium on "progress" and on the release of creative human energy to propel that progress, the decision was inevitable. And throughout American economic development, the Charles River Bridge case has fostered the process that Joseph Schumpeter called "creative destruction," whereby new forms of property destroy old ones in the name of progress.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

KUTLER, STANLEY I. (1971) 1977 Privilege and Creative Destruction: The Charles River Bridge Case, rev. ed. New York: Norton.

CHARTERS, COLONIAL

See: Colonial Charters

CHASE, SALMON P. (1808–1873)

Born in New Hampshire, Salmon Portland Chase enjoyed an elite education as a private pupil of his uncle, Episcopal Bishop Philander Chase of Ohio, as a Dartmouth student (graduating 1826), and as an apprentice lawyer (1827–1830) to United States Attorney General WILLIAM WIRT. Subsequently, Chase rose quickly as a Cincinnati attorney, beginning also his numerous, seemingly opportunistic, successive changes in political party affiliations. Abandoning Whig, then Democratic ties, Chase became in turn a member of the Liberty party and of the Republican organizations, winning elections to the United States Senate (1848–1855, 1860–1861), and to Ohio's governorship (1856–1860). He was an unsuccessful candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 1860. ABRAHAM LINCOLN appointed Chase secretary of the treasury (1861–1864), and Chief Justice of the United States (1864–1873). Yet in 1864 Chase tried to thwart Lincoln's second term, in 1868 he maneuvered for the Democratic presidential nomination, and in 1872 he participated in the "Liberal Republican" schism against ULYSSES S. GRANT.

Such oscillations reflected more than Chase's large personal ambitions. Constitutional, legal, and moral concerns gave his public life coherence and purpose. These concerns derived from Chase's early conviction that men and society were easily corrupted, that SLAVERY was America's primary spoiling agent, and that political corruption was a close second. Although Chase, observing Wirt in the Antelope litigation (1825), found the doctrine in SOMERSET'S CASE (1772) an acceptable reconciliation of slavery and the Constitution as of that year, later events, especially those attending fugitive slave recaptures, unpunished assaults on abolitionists, and increases in slave areas due especially to the Mexican War and the treaties that closed it off, brought him to accept ABOLITIONIST CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY. Chase concluded that slavery's expansion beyond existing limits would demoralize white labor.

The first steps on this ultimately abolitionist road came from Chase's association with and brave defenses of Ohio antislavery activists, including JAMES BIRNEY, and of fugitive slaves; such defenses won Chase the nickname "attorney general for runaway negroes." A merely opportunistic Cincinnati lawyer would have had easier routes to success than this. Defending runaways and their abettors, Chase abjured HIGHER LAW pleadings popular among abolitionists; he focused instead on technical procedures and on a carefully developed restatement of state-centered FEDERALISM in which he insisted that nonslave jurisdictions also enjoyed STATES' RIGHTS. Slave states were able to export their recapture laws into free states via the federal FUGITIVE SLAVERY statutes. Chase argued that residents of free states also deserved to have the laws of their states concerning the status of citizens enjoy reciprocal effect and respect within slavery jurisdictions. Such a traffic of free state laws and customs across the federal system was impossible (and was to remain so until Appomattox). Chase insisted that residents of free states possessed at least the right to protect their co-residents of any race within those states from being reduced to servitude without DUE PROCESS.

Chase's evolving ideas culminated in a "freedom national" position, a general program for resolving the dilemma that slavery posed to a federal society based on assumptions of legal remedies, CIVIL RIGHTS, and CIVIL LIBERTIES. In his thinking, free labor was more than a marketplace phenomenon. It was a moral imperative, a complex of ethical relationships that the nation, under the Constitution, must nurture. Reformed, corruption-free two-party politics, with even blacks voting, was the way Chase discerned finally to nationalize freedom, a nationalization based upon acceptance of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE and the BILL OF RIGHTS as minimum definitions of the nation's interest in private rights adversely affected by state wrongs or private inequities.

The CIVIL WAR and the wartime and post-Appomattox RECONSTRUCTION of the southern states were the contexts in which Chase refined his thinking about individuals' rights and the nation's duty to protect them. Lincoln found a place in his cabinet for every one of the major competitors for the Republican presidential nomination in 1860, and Chase became secretary of the treasury. Once the war started, Chase had responsibility to provide an adequate circulating medium for the suddenly ballooning marketplace needs of the government, of the banking and commercial communities of the Union states, and of the millions of urban and rural entrepreneurs who rushed to expand production. Chase helped key congressmen to shape the historic wartime laws on national banking, income taxation, and legal tender (the legitimacy of the last of which Chase himself was to question as Chief Justice, in the LEGAL TENDER CASES).

The most outspoken abolitionist in Lincoln's cabinet, Chase also carved out a role for Treasury officials, who were responsible for administering rebels' confiscated property, in the Army's coastal experiments for abandoned, runaway, or otherwise freed blacks. He applauded the CONFISCATION ACTS, the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION, the major elements in Lincoln's MILITARY RECONSTRUCTION, the FREEDMEN'S BUREAU statute, and the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT. Upon ROGER B. TANEY's death in late 1864, Lincoln, well aware of Chase's antipathy to the decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) and his commitment to irreversible emancipation, both of which the President shared, named the Ohioan to be Chief Justice.

After Appomattox, Chase, for his first years as Chief Justice, found that the work of the Court was almost exclusively with white men's rights rather than with the momentous, race-centered public questions that faced the Congress and the new President, ANDREW JOHNSON. On circuit, however, Chase's In re Turner opinion sustained broadly, in favor of a black female claimant, the provisions of the 1866 CIVIL RIGHTS ACT for enforcing the Thirteenth Amendment. In his opinion, Chase insisted that federal rights against servitude were defendable in national courts as against both state or private action or inaction, and he emphasized that a state's standard of right could serve as an adequate federal standard so long as the state did not discriminate racially.

Some contemporaries applauded In re Turner as an articulation of the new, nationalized federal system of rights that the Thirteenth Amendment appeared to have won. Chase's other circuit opinions did not, therefore, disturb race egalitarians, and generally won favor in professional legal and commercial media. These opinions dealt with numerous litigations concerning private relationships such as marriage licenses, trusts and inheritances, business contracts, and insurance policies made under rebel state dispensation. Chase recognized the validity of these legal arrangements. His decisions helped greatly to stabilize commerce and family relationships in the South.

The course of post-Appomattox Reconstruction as controlled both by President Johnson and by Congress, troubled Chase deeply. He knew, from his work in Lincoln's cabinet, how narrowly the Union had escaped defeat and tended, therefore, to sustain wartime measures. Yet he revered both the CHECKS AND BALANCES of the national government and the state-centered qualities of the federal system reflected in the Constitution. Therefore, in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), Chase, still new on the Court, joined in the unanimous statement that Milligan, who had been tried by a military court, should preferably have been prosecuted in a civilian court for his offenses. But Chase, with three other Justices, dissented from the majority's sweeping condemnation of any federal military authority over civilians in a nonseceded state. The dissenters insisted instead that Congress possessed adequate WAR POWER to authorize military courts.

Chase again dissented from the 5–4 decision in the TEST OATH CASES (1867). Though privately detesting oath tests, Chase held to a public position that legislators, not judges, bore the responsibility to prescribe professional qualifications and licensing standards. By this time Congress had decided on Military Reconstruction. Mississippi officials, appointed earlier by Johnson, asked the Court for an INJUNCTION against the President's enforcing Congress's reconstruction law, and for a ruling that it was unconstitutional. For an unanimous Court, Chase refused to honor the petition (MISSISSIPPI V. JOHNSON, 1867), relying on the POLITICAL QUESTION doctrine. He agreed with his colleagues also in Georgia v. Stanton (1867) in refusing to allow the Court to intrude into political questions involving enforcement of the Reconstruction statutes. Mississippians again tried to enlist the Court against Congress. In early 1868 EX PARTE MCCARDLE raised Milligan-like issues of military trials of civilians, and of the Court's jurisdiction to hear such matters under the HABEAS CORPUS ACT OF 1867. Congress thereupon diminished the Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION under that statute. Chase, for the Court, acquiesced in the diminution, though pointing out that all other habeas jurisdiction remained in the Court.

He supported Congress's Military Reconstruction as a statutory base for both state restorations and black suffrage, but he was offended by the Third Reconstruction Act (July 1867), providing that military decisions would control civil judgments in the South. The IMPEACHMENT of Andrew Johnson, with Chase presiding over the Senate trial, seemed to threaten the destruction of tripartite checks and balances. Chase drifted back toward his old Democratic states' rights position, a drift signaled by his advocacy of universal amnesty for ex-rebels and universal suffrage. He had tried, unsuccessfully, to have the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT provide for both. His enhanced or renewed respect for states' rights was evident in United States v. DeWitt (1869), in which the Court declared a federal law forbidding the transit or sale of dangerous naphtha-adulterated kerosene, to be an excessive diminution of STATE POLICE POWERS.

This decision, the first in which the Court denied Congress a capacity to act for regulatory purposes under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, like the decisions on Reconstruction issues, suggests how far the CHASE COURT engaged in JUDICIAL ACTIVISM. Striking in this regard were the Legal Tender Cases. The first of these, Hepburn v. Griswold (1870), resulted in a 4–3 decision that the 1862 law authorizing greenbacks as legal tender was invalid as applied to contracts made before passage of the statute. Chase, for the thin majority, insisted that the statute violated the Fifth Amendment's due process clause, concluding that the spirit of the CONTRACT CLAUSE, though by its terms restraining only the states, applied also to the federal government. The trio of dissenters—all, like Chase, Republican appointees—saw the money and war powers as adequate authority for the statute.

Then, later in 1870, President ULYSSES S. GRANT named two new Justices to the Court: JOSEPH P. BRADLEY and WILLIAM STRONG. The new appointees created, in Knox v. Lee (1871), the second Legal Tender Case decision, a majority that overruled Hepburn. The new majority now upheld the nation's authority to make paper money legal tender for contracts entered into either before or after enactment of the statute, an authority not pinned necessarily to the war power.

Chase was in the minority in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) in which the majority found no violation of the Thirteenth or Fourteenth Amendments in a state's assignment of a skilled-trade monopoly to private parties. The doctrine of Slaughterhouse, that the privileges of United States citizenship did not protect basic civil rights, signaled a sharp retreat from Chase's own In Re Turner position, and was a fateful step by the Court toward what was to become a general retreat from Reconstruction.

Slaughterhouse, along with Chase's anti-Grant position in 1872, closed off Chase's long and tumultuous career; he died in 1873. His career was consistent in its anticorruption positions and in its infusions of moral and ethical ideas into constitutional, legal, and political issues. Party-jumping was incidental to Chase's ends of a moral democracy, federally arranged in a perpetual union of perpetual states; he gave this concept effective expression in TEXAS V. WHITE (1869).

To be sure, neither Chase nor "his" Court created novel legal doctrines. But he, and it, helped greatly to reclaim for the Court a significant role in determining the limits of certain vital public policies, both national and state. In the tumults of Reconstruction, while avoiding unwinnable clashes with Congress, Chase bravely insisted that effective governmental power and individual rights could co-exist. He and his fellow Justices advanced novel constitutional doctrines drawn from the prohibitions against ex post facto laws and BILLS OF ATTAINDER, and from the commerce and money powers. In retrospect, such experiments with doctrine take on the quality of interim defenses of judicial authority between prewar reliance on the contract clause, as example, and the post-Chase development of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

At the same time, Chase tried to focus the Court's attention on individuals' rights as redefined first by the Thirteenth and then by the Fourteenth Amendment, as against both private and public wrongs. As one who for years had observed at first hand the capacity of nation and states and private persons to wrong individuals, Chase, as Chief Justice, brought a particular sense of urgency to the goal fo protecting individual rights. He failed to convert a majority of his brethren to this task. Instead, America deferred its constitutional commitments. (See CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1865–1877.)

HAROLD M. HYMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1971 History of the Supreme Court of the United States: Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–1888. New York: Macmillan.

HUGHES, DAVID 1965 Salmon P. Chase: Chief Justice. Vanderbilt Law Review 18:569–614.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. and WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1982 Equal Justice under Law: Constitutional Development 1835–1875. Chaps. 11–13. New York: Harper & Row.

WALKER, PETER F. 1978 Moral Choices. Chaps. 13–14. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

CHASE, SAMUEL
(1741–1811)

Samuel Chase was one of the most significant and controversial members of America's revolutionary generation. Irascible and difficult, but also extremely capable, he played a central role in Maryland politics during the 1760s and 1770s, signed the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, and was a member of the Continental Congress from 1775 to 1778. In the latter year ALEXANDER HAMILTON denounced him for using confidential information to speculate in the flour market. During the 1780s Chase pursued various business interests, practiced law, rebuilt his political reputation, and became an important anti-Federalist leader. After the adoption of the Constitution, for reasons that remain unclear, he became an ardent Federalist.

In 1795 he was nominated for a position on the federal bench. President GEORGE WASHINGTON was at first wary of recommending him, but when he had trouble filling a vacancy on the United States Supreme Court, he offered the position to Chase, who accepted in 1796. As one of the better legal minds in the early republic, Chase delivered several of the Court's most important decisions in the pre-Marshall period. In WARE V. HYLTON (1796) he provided one of the strongest statements ever issued on the supremacy of national treaties over state laws. The decision invalidated a Virginia statute of 1777 that placed obstacles in the way of recovery of debts owed by Americans to British creditors, a law in clear violation of a specific provision of the treaty of peace with Great Britain (1783). In HYLTON V. UNITED STATES (1796) Chase and the Supreme Court for the first time passed upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress, upholding the carriage tax of 1794. Chase concluded that only CAPITATION TAXES were direct taxes subject to the constitutional requirement of apportionment among the states according to population. In CALDER V. BULL (1798), where the Supreme Court held that the prohibition against EX POST FACTO LAWS in the Constitution extended only to criminal, not civil, laws, Chase addressed the issue of constitutionality in natural law terms, presaging those late-nineteenth-century jurists who, in furthering the concept of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, were to argue that the Supreme Court could properly hold laws invalid for reasons lying outside the explicit prohibitions of the constitutional text. Riding circuit, he ruled in United States v. Worrall (1798) that the federal courts had no jurisdiction over crimes defined by COMMON LAW. This position, which Chase abandoned, was adopted by the Supreme Court in United States v. Hudson and Goodwin (1812). (See FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES.)

A fierce partisan, Chase refused to recognize the legitimacy of the Jeffersonian opposition in the party struggles of the late 1790s. He used his position on the bench to make speeches for the Federalists and he supported the passage of the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS in 1798. Riding circuit, he enforced the law with a vengeance when he presided over the trials of John Fries of Pennsylvania for TREASON and John Callendar of Virginia for SEDITION, sentencing the former to death (Fries was eventually pardoned by President JOHN ADAMS) and the latter to a stiff fine and a prison sentence. When THOMAS JEFFERSON and the Republicans came to power in 1801 and repealed the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801, Chase vigorously campaigned behind the scenes for the Supreme Court to declare the repeal law unconstitutional, but the other Justices did not go along with him. Chase, however, remained adamant in his opposition to the Jeffersonians, refusing to alter his partisan behavior. "Things," he argued, "must take their natural course, from bad to worse." In May 1803, in an intemperate charge to a GRAND JURY in Baltimore, he launched yet another attack on the Republican party and its principles.

Shortly thereafter, President Jefferson urged that Chase be removed from office. The House of Representatives voted for his IMPEACHMENT, and he came to trial before the United States Senate. The Constitution authorizes impeachment and conviction of federal government officers for "Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." Many of the more militant Republicans, unhappy with Federalist control of the judiciary, favored an expansive view of what should constitute an impeachable offense. As one put it: "Removal by impeachment was nothing more than a declaration by Congress to this effect: You held dangerous opinions and if you are suffered to carry them into effect, you will work the destruction of the Union. We want your offices for the purpose of giving them to men who will fill them better." Others, including a number of Republicans, favored a narrow definition: impeachment was permitted only for a clearly indictable offense.

Chase proved to be a formidable opponent. Aided by a prestigious group of Federalist trial lawyers, he put up a strong defense, denying that any of his actions were indictable offenses under either statute or common law. His attorneys raised various complicated and even moot legal questions such as the binding quality of local custom; the reciprocal rights and duties of the judge, jury, and defense counsel; the legality of bad manners in a court room; the rules of submitting EVIDENCE; and the problems involved in proving criminal intent. The prosecution was led by JOHN RANDOLPH, an extreme Republican and highly emotional man who badly botched the legal part of his argument. Chase was acquitted on all counts, even though most senators disliked him and believed his conduct on the bench had been improper. The final result was not so much a vote for Chase as it was against a broad definition of the impeachment clause—a definition that might be used to remove other judges, perhaps even to dismantle the federal judiciary altogether. Even Jefferson appears to have come around to this point of view; he made no attempt to enforce party unity when the Senate voted, and he was not unhappy with the outcome of the trial.

Although Chase served on the Supreme Court for the rest of his life, he no longer played an important role. JOHN MARSHALL had begun his ascendancy, and although Marshall was a staunch nationalist, he was less overtly partisan than Chase and less inclined to provoke confrontations with the Jeffersonians.

RICHARD E. ELLIS
(1986)

Bibliography

ELLIS, RICHARD E. 1981 The Impeachment of Samuel Chase. Pages 57–78 in Michal Belknap, ed., American Political Trials. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

HAW, JAMES et al. 1981 Stormy Patriot: The Life of Samuel Chase. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

CHASE COURT
(1864–1873)

The decade of SALMON P. CHASE's tenure as CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States was one of the more turbulent in the history of the Supreme Court. Laboring under the cloud of hostility engendered by DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), hurt by partisan attacks from without and divisions within, staggering under loads of new business, the Chase Court nevertheless managed to absorb and consolidate sweeping new jurisdictional grants to the federal courts and to render some momentous decisions.

The Chase Court displayed an unusual continuity of personnel, which was offset by political and ideological heterogeneity. Of the nine men Chase joined on his accession (the Court in 1864 was composed of ten members), seven served throughout all or nearly all his brief tenure. But this largely continuous body was divided within itself by party and ideological differences. JOHN CATRON, who died in 1865, JAMES M. WAYNE, who died in 1867, and ROBERT C. GRIER, who suffered a deterioration in his faculties that caused his brethren to force him to resign in 1870, were Democrats. NATHAN CLIFFORD, an appointee of President JAMES BUCHANAN, and STEPHEN J. FIELD were also Democrats, the latter a War Democrat. SAMUEL F. MILLER, DAVID DAVIS, and JOSEPH P. BRADLEY were Republicans. Chase himself was an ex-Democrat who had helped form the Republican party in 1854, but he drifted back to the Democratic party after the war and coveted its presidential nomination. WILLIAM STRONG, Grier's replacement, and NOAH SWAYNE were also Democrats who turned Republican before the war. Like the Chief Justice, Davis never successfully shook off political ambitions; he accepted and then rejected the Labor Reform party's nomination for the presidency in 1872. From 1870, Republicans dominated the Court, which had long been controlled by Democrats.

The work of the Supreme Court changed greatly during Chase's tenure. In 1862 and 1866, Congress realigned the federal circuits, so as to reduce the influence of the southern states, which under the Judiciary Act of 1837 had five of the nine circuits. Under the Judiciary Act of 1866, the southern circuits were reduced to two. By the same statute, Congress reduced the size of the Court from ten to seven members, mainly to enhance the efficiency of its work, not to punish the Court or deprive President ANDREW JOHNSON of appointments to it. In 1869, Congress again raised the size of the Court to nine, where it has remained ever since. More significantly, the business of the Court expanded. By 1871, the number of cases docketed had doubled in comparison to the war years. This increase resulted in some measure from an extraordinary string of statutes enacted between 1863 and 1867 expanding the JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS in such matters as REMOVAL OF CASES from state to federal courts, HABEAS CORPUS, claims against the United States, and BANKRUPTCY.

The Chase Court was not a mere passive, inert repository of augmented jurisdiction: it expanded its powers of JUDICIAL REVIEW to an extent unknown to earlier Courts. During Chase's brief tenure, the Court held eight federal statutes unconstitutional (as compared with only two in its entire prior history), and struck down state statutes in thirty-six cases (as compared with thirty-eight in its prior history). The attitude that produced this JUDICIAL ACTIVISM was expressed in private correspondence by Justice Davis, when he noted with satisfaction that the Court in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866) had not "toadied to the prevalent idea, that the legislative department of the government can override everything." This judicial activism not only presaged the Court's involvement in policy during the coming heyday of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS; it also plunged the Chase Court into some of the most hotly contested matters of its own time, especially those connected with RECONSTRUCTION. The Court also attracted the public eye because of the activities of two of its members: Chase's and Davis's availability as presidential candidates, and Chase's firm, impartial service in presiding over the United States SENATE as a court of IMPEACHMENT in the trial of Andrew Johnson.

The Chase Court is memorable for its decisions in four areas: Reconstruction, federal power (in matters not directly related to Reconstruction), state regulatory and tax power, and the impact of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Nearly all the cases in which the Supreme Court disposed of Reconstruction issues were decided during Chase's tenure. The first issue to come up was the role of military commissions. In EX PARTE VALLANDIGHAM, decided in February 1864 (ten months before Chase's nomination), the Court refused to review the proceedings of a military commission, because the commission is not a court. But that did not settle the issue of the constitutional authority of military commissions. The matter came up again, at an inopportune time, in Ex parte Milligan, decided in December 1866. Milligan had been arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged by a military commission in Indiana in 1864 for paramilitary activities on behalf of the Confederacy. The Court unanimously ruled that his conviction was illegal because Indiana was not in a theater of war, because the civil courts were functioning and competent to try Milligan for TREASON, and because he was held in violation of the provisions of the HABEAS CORPUS ACT OF 1863. But the Court split, 5–4, over an OBITER DICTUM in Justice Davis's MAJORITY OPINION stating that the Congress could never authorize military commissions in areas outside the theater of operations where the civil courts were functioning. The Chief Justice, writing for the minority, declared that Congress did have the power to authorize commissions, based on the several WAR POWERS clauses of Article I, section 8, but that it had not done so; hence Milligan's trial was unauthorized.

Milligan created a furor in Congress and deeply implicated the Court in the politics of Reconstruction. Assuming that military commissions were essential to the conduct of Reconstruction, Democrats taunted Republicans that Milligan implied that they were unconstitutional, and hence that proposed Republican measures providing for military trials in the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 and FREEDMEN'S BUREAU Act violated the Constitution. Taken together with subsequent decisions, Milligan caused Republicans some anxiety. But, as Justice Davis noted in private correspondence and as Illinois Republican LYMAN TRUMBULL stated on the floor of the Senate, the decision in reality had no application to the constitutional anomaly of Reconstruction in the South.

The Court next seemed to challenge congressional Reconstruction in the TEST OATH CASES, Ex parte Garland and Cummings v. Missouri, both 1867. The court, by 5–4 decisions, voided federal and state statutes requiring a candidate for public office or one of the professions to swear that he had never participated or assisted in the rebellion. The Court's holding, that they constituted BILLS OF ATTAINDER and EX POST FACTO LAWS, seemingly threatened programs of disfranchisement and oath qualification, another part of proposed Reconstruction measures. Then, in February 1868, the Court announced that it would hear arguments in EX PARTE MCCARDLE, another challenge to military commissions. William McCardle had been convicted by a military commission for publishing inflammatory articles. A federal circuit court denied his petition for a writ of habeas corpus under the HABEAS CORPUS ACT OF 1867, a measure that had broadened the scope of the writ, and he appealed the denial to the Supreme Court. Alarmed, congressional Republicans enacted a narrowly drawn statute known as the McCardle repealer, denying the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction in habeas petitions brought under the 1867 act. In 1869, the Court accepted the constitutionality of the repealer, because Article III, section 2, made the Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION subject to "such Exceptions . . . as the Congress shall make." But Chief Justice Chase pointedly reminded the bar that all the rest of the Court's habeas appellate authority was left intact. This broad hint bore fruit in Ex parte Yerger (1869), where the Court accepted jurisdiction of a habeas appeal under the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789. Chief Justice Chase chastised Congress for the McCardle repealer and reaffirmed the scope of the Great Writ.

In the meantime, the Court had turned to other Reconstruction issues. As soon as Congress enacted the MILITARY RECONSTRUCTION ACTS of 1867, southern attorneys sought to enjoin federal officials, including the President and the secretary of war, from enforcing them. In MISSISSIPPI V. JOHNSON (1867), the Court unanimously rejected this petition. Chief Justice Chase drew on a distinction, originally suggested by his predecessor Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), between ministerial and discretionary responsibilities of the President, stating that the latter were not subject to the Court's injunctive powers. In Georgia v. Stanton (1867), the Court similarly dismissed a petition directed at the secretary of war and General ULYSSES S. GRANT, holding that the petition presented POLITICAL QUESTIONS resolvable only by the political branches of the government. But the words of Justice Nelson's opinion seemed to suggest that if the petition had alleged a threat to private property (rather than the state's property), there might be a basis for providing relief. In May 1867, Mississippi's attorneys moved to amend their petition to specify such a threat. The Court, in a 4–4 order (Justice Grier being absent), rejected the motion. This minor, unnoticed proceeding was probably the truest index to the attitudes of individual Justices on the substantive policy questions of Reconstruction.

The Court's final involvement with Reconstruction came with TEXAS V. WHITE (1869) and White v. Hart (1872). In the former case, decided on the same day that the Supreme Court acknowledged the validity of the McCardle repealer, the postwar government of Texas sought to recover some bonds that the Confederate state government had sold to defray military costs. Because a state was a party, this was an action within the ORIGINAL JURISDICTION of the Supreme Court. But one of the defendants challenged the jurisdictional basis of the action, claiming that Texas was not a state in the constitutional sense at the time the action was brought (February 1867). This challenge directly raised important questions about the validity of SECESSION and Reconstruction. Chief Justice Chase, writing for the six-man majority (Grier, Swayne, Miller, dissenting) met the issue head on. He first held that secession had been a nullity. The Union was "indissoluble," "an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States" in Chase's resonant, memorable phrasing. But, he went on, though the relations of individual Texans to the United States could not be severed, secession had deranged the status of the state within the Union. In language suggestive of the "forfeited-rights" theory of Reconstruction propounded by Ohio congressman Samuel Shellabarger which had provided a conceptual basis for Republican Reconstruction, Chase stated that the rights of the state had been "suspended" by secession and war. Congress was responsible for restoring the proper relationship, in wartime because of its authority under the military and militia clauses of Article I, section 8, and in peacetime under the guarantee of a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT in Article IV, section 4. This was preponderantly a question to be resolved by Congress rather than the President, and hence the Lincoln and Johnson governments in power before enactment of the Military Reconstruction Acts were "provisional." Congress enjoyed wide latitude in working out details of Reconstruction policy. The sweeping language of Chase's opinion strongly implied the constitutionality of military Reconstruction. The majority opinion also offered a useful distinction between legitimate acts of the Confederate government of Texas, such as those designed to preserve the peace, and invalid ones in support of the rebellion.

In White v. Hart (1872) the Court reaffirmed its general position in Texas v. White and emphasized that the relationship of states in the union was a political question for the political branches to resolve. At the same time, the Court disposed of two lingering issues from the war in ways that reaffirmed the doctrine of Texas v. White. In Virginia v. West Virginia (1870) it accepted the creation of the daughter state, shutting its eyes to the obvious irregularities surrounding the Pierpont government's consent to the separation, and insisting that there had been a "valid agreement between the two States." And in Miller v. United States (1871), echoing the PRIZE CASES (1863), a six-man majority upheld the constitutionality of the confiscation provisions of the Second Confiscation Act of 1862 on the basis of the Union's status as a belligerent.

The Chase Court decisions dealing with secession, war, and Reconstruction have stood well the test of time. Milligan and the Test Oath Cases remain valuable defenses of individual liberty against arbitrary government. The McCardle decision was a realistic and valid recognition of an explicit congressional power, while its sequel, Yerger, reaffirmed the libertarian implications of Milligan. The Court's position in the cases seeking to enjoin executive officials from enforcing Reconstruction was inevitable: it would have been hopeless for the Court to attempt to thwart congressional Reconstruction, or to accede to the Johnson/Democratic demand for immediate readmission of the seceded states. Texas v. White and White v. Hart drew on a sound prewar precedent, LUTHER V. BORDEN (1849), to validate actions by the dominant political branch in what was clearly a pure political question. Taken together, the Reconstruction cases evince a high order of judicial statesmanship.

The Chase Court made only tentative beginnings in issues of federal and state regulatory power, but those beginnings were significant. The first federal regulatory question to come up involved the currency. In VEAZIE BANK V. FENNO (1869) the Court sustained the constitutionality of sections of the Internal Revenue Acts of 1865 and 1866 that imposed a ten percent tax on state bank notes for the purpose of driving them out of circulation. Chase first held that the tax was not a DIRECT TAX (which would have had to be apportioned among the states) and then upheld Congress's power to issue paper money and create a uniform national currency by eliminating state paper.

The LEGAL TENDER CASES were more controversial. As secretary of the treasury, Chase had reluctantly acquiesced in the issuance of federal paper money. But when the issue came before the Court in the First Legal Tender Case (Hepburn v. Griswold, 1870), Chase, speaking for a 4–3 majority, held the Legal Tender Act of 1862 unconstitutional because it made greenbacks legal tender for preexisting debts. The division on the court was partisan: all the majority Justices were Democrats (Chase by this time had reverted to his Democratic antecedents), all the dissenters Republicans. Chase's reasoning was precipitate and unsatisfactory. He asserted that the act violated the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS, but the CONTRACT CLAUSE limited only the states. To this Chase responded that the act was contrary to the "spirit of the Constitution." He also broadly implied that the statute violated the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of DUE PROCESS.

An enlarged Court in 1871 reversed Hepburn, upholding the constitutionality of the 1862 statute in the Second Legal Tender Cases, with the two new appointees, Bradley and Strong, joining the three dissenters of the first case. Justice Strong for the majority averred that "every contract for the payment of money, simply, is necessarily subject to the constitutional power of the government over the currency." The Court's turnabout suggested to contemporaries that President Grant had packed the Court to obtain a reversal of the first decision. Grant was opposed to the decision, and he knew that Bradley and Strong were also opposed; but he did not secure from them any commitments on the subject, and he did not base his appointments solely on the single issue of legal tender.

Other Chase Court decisions involving federal power were not so controversial. In United States v. Dewitt (1870) Chase for the Court invalidated an exercise of what would come to be called the NATIONAL POLICE POWER, in this case a provision in a revenue statute prohibiting the mixing of illuminating oil with naphtha (a highly flammable mixture). Chase held that the COMMERCE CLAUSE conferred no federal power over the internal affairs of the states, and that the subject matter was remote from the topic of raising revenue. He simply assumed that there was no inherent national police power. In COLLECTOR V. DAY (1871) Justice Nelson for a divided Court held that federal revenue acts taxing income could not reach the salary of a state judge. Justice Bradley's dissent, maintaining the necessity of federal power to reach sources of income that included some functions of state government, was vindicated in GRAVES V. NEW YORK EX REL. O'KEEFE (1939), which overruled Day. In contrast to the foregoing cases, The Daniel Ball (1871) upheld the power of Congress to regulate commerce on navigable waterways, even where these were wholly intrastate.

The Chase Court decisions passing on the regulatory and taxing authority of the states caused less controversy.

These cases are significant principally as evidence that the Court continued unabated its prewar responsibility of monitoring the functioning of the federal system, inhibiting incursions by the states on national authority and the national market, while at the same time preserving their scope of regulation and their sources of revenue intact. The first case of this sort, GELPCKE V. DUBUQUE (1864), involved a suit on bonds, issued by a city to encourage railroad building, which the city was trying to repudiate. The state courts had reversed their prior decisions and held that citizens could not be taxed to assist a private enterprise such as a railroad. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Swayne, reversed the result below, thus upholding the validity of the bonds. Swayne intemperately declared that "We shall never immolate truth, justice, and the law, because a state tribunal has erected the altar and decreed the sacrifice." The decision was welcomed in financial circles, particularly European ones, and presaged a Court attitude sympathetic to investors and hostile to repudiation, especially by a public agency.

The Court displayed less passion in other cases. In Crandall v. Nevada (1868), it struck down a state CAPITATION tax on passengers of public conveyances leaving the state as an unconstitutional interference with the right of persons to move about the country. The commerce clause aspects of the case were left to be decided later. Another case involving personal liberty, Tarble's Case (1872), vindicated the Court's earlier position in ABLEMAN V. BOOTH (1859) by holding that a state court in a habeas corpus proceeding could not release an individual held in federal custody (here, an allegedly deserting army volunteer).

But most cases testing the scope of state regulatory power dealt with commerce. In PAUL V. VIRGINIA (1869) the Court, through Chase, held that the negotiation of insurance contracts did not constitute commerce within the meaning of the commerce clause, and hence that a state was free to regulate the conduct of insurance companies as it pleased. This doctrine lasted until 1944. But one aspect of Justice Field's concurring opinion in Paul had momentous consequences. He asserted that, for purposes of the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of Article IV, CORPORATIONS could not be considered "citizens," and were thus not entitled to the privileges and immunities of natural PERSONS. This caused attorneys to look to other sources, such as the due process clause (with its term "person") as a source of protection for corporations. During the same term, in WOODRUFF V. PARHAM (1868), the Chase Court upheld a municipal sales tax applied to goods brought into the state in INTERSTATE COMMERCE even though they were still in their original package, thus limiting Marshall's ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE announced in BROWN V. MARYLAND (1827) to imports from other nations.

Three 1873 cases demonstrated the Court carefully adjusting the federal balance. In the State Freight Tax Case the Court struck down a state tax on freight carried out of the state. But in the Case of the State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts the Court upheld a state tax on a corporation's gross receipts, even when the taxpayer was a carrier and the tax fell on interstate business. And in the Case of the State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds the Court struck down a tax on interest on bonds as applied to the securities of out-of-state bondholders.

The last category of major Chase Court cases dealt with the scope of the Reconstruction Amendments, and the extent to which they would alter the prewar balances of the federal system. One of Chase's circuit court decisions, In re Turner (1867), suggested that this potential might be broad. Chase there held a Maryland BLACK CODE's apprenticeship provision unconstitutional on the ground that it imposed a condition of involuntary servitude in violation of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT. This decision might have been the prelude to extensive federal involvement in matters that before the war would have been considered exclusively within the STATE POLICE POWER. But this possibility was drastically narrowed in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873), the last major decision of the Chase Court and one of the enduring monuments of American constitutional law. Justice Miller for the majority held that "the one pervading purpose" of the Reconstruction Amendments was the liberation of black people, not an extension of the privileges and rights of whites. Miller construed the privileges and immunities, due process, and EQUAL PROCTECTION clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment in light of this assumption, holding that none of them had deranged the traditional balance of the federal system. The states still remained the source of most substantive privileges and immunities, and the states remained primarily responsible for securing them to individuals. This ruling effectively relegated the definition and protection of freedmen's rights to precisely those governments—Redeemer-dominated southern states—least likely to provide that protection. Because "we do not see in those [Reconstruction] amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system," Miller rejected a substantive interpretation of the new due process clause and restricted the equal protection clause to cases of "discrimination against the negroes as a class."

The future belonged to the Slaughterhouse dissenters, Justices Bradley and Field. Bradley articulated the doctrine of substantive due process, arguing that the right to pursue a lawful occupation is a property right which the state may not interfere with arbitrarily or selectively. Field, in a dissent in which Chase joined (Swayne dissented in a separate opinion) relied on the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, seeing in it a guarantee of "the fundamental rights" of free men, which cannot be destroyed by state legislation. His insistence on an "equality of right, with exemption from all disparaging and partial enactments, in the lawful pursuits of life" foreshadowed the doctrine of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

Yet Field's and Bradley's insistence on the right to follow a chosen occupation, free of arbitrary discrimination, did not avail Myra Bradwell in her effort to secure admission to the Illinois bar (BRADWELL V. ILLINOIS, 1873). Justice Miller for the majority (Chase being the lone dissenter) refused to overturn a decision of the Illinois Supreme Court denying her admission to the bar solely on the ground of her gender. "The paramount mission and destiny of woman are to fulfill the noble and benign offices of wife and mother. This is the law of the Creator," Bradley wrote in a concurrence. "And the rules of civil society . . . cannot be based upon exceptional cases." The emergent scope of the due process, equal protection, and privileges and immunities clauses were to have a differential application as a result of the Slaughterhouse dissents and Bradwell ruling, securing the rights of corporations and men in their economic roles, while proving ineffectual to protect others from discrimination based on race and gender. (See RACIAL DISCRIMINATION; SEX EQUALITY.)

During its brief span, the Chase Court made enduring contributions to American constitutional development. It handled the unprecedented issues of Reconstruction with balance and a due recognition of the anomalous nature of issues coming before it. Yet in those decisions, Chase and his colleagues managed to preserve protection for individual rights while at the same time permitting the victorious section, majority, and party to assure a constitutional resolution of the war consonant with its military results. In non-Reconstruction cases, the Chase court continued the traditional function of the Supreme Court in monitoring and adjusting the allocation of powers between nation and states. It was more activist than its predecessors in striking down federal legislation, while it displayed the same nicely balanced concern for state regulatory power and protection of the national market that was a characteristic of the TANEY COURT.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1939 Mr. Justice Miller and the Supreme Court, 1862–1890. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1971 Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–88, Part One (vol. VI of the Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court of the United States). New York: Macmillan.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. and WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1982 Equal Justice Under Law: Constitutional Development 1835–1875. New York: Harper & Row.

KUTLER, STANLEY I. 1968 Judicial Power and Reconstruction Politics. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SILVER, DAVID M. 1957 Lincoln's Supreme Court. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

SWISHER, CARL B. 1930 Stephen J. Field: Craftsman of the Law. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

WARREN, CHARLES 1937 The Supreme Court in United States History, rev. ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

CHATHAM, LORD

See: Pitt, William

CHECKS AND BALANCES

In its precise meaning, "checks and balances" is not synonymous with SEPARATION OF POWERS; it refers instead to a system of rules and practices designed to maintain the separation of powers. The executive VETO POWER is considered part of this system, along with the power of JUDICIAL REVIEW, the IMPEACHMENT power, and other powers available to any of the branches of government for combating the encroachments of the others.

JAMES MADISON formulated the American theory of checks and balances in response to the ANTI-FEDERALIST charge that the proposed Constitution would contain an overlap of governmental functions, violating the principle of separated powers. Expressing a pessimistic view of human nature, he argued in THE FEDERALIST #10 that the way to avoid majority tyranny lay in creating a large national community of diverse and numerous economic interests, not in statesmanship or in religious and moral constraints. In The Federalist #47–49 Madison went on to argue that neither sharply drawn institutional boundaries nor appeals to the electorate could be relied upon to maintain the separation of powers. Both methods presupposed the virtues of official lawfulness and electoral nonpartisanship, virtues whose unreliability was attested by experience. Because such "external checks" were ineffective, said Madison in The Federalist #51, maintaining the separation of powers would require "internal checks" that linked the officeholders' personal ambitions to their duties. Officials would defend their constitutional prerogatives if they felt that doing so were a means to furthering their personal ambitions. "[A]mbition checking ambition"—not virtue—was the key to constitutional maintenance. And effective checks required each branch to have a hand in the others' functions. For example, the veto is the President's hand in the legislative function.

Madison knew, however, that this partial blending of power did not go far enough. Power might still be concentrated if all these branches were united in one interest or animated by the same spirit. Thinkers from Aristotle to MONTESQUIEU had taught that constitutions could be maintained at least partly through a balance of social groups such as estates or economic classes. But theorists with democratic pretensions could not institutionalize such social divisions. The problem for the Framers was to prevent a single interest from predominating in a society that had few official distinctions of status and class. Their answer was to rely on the different institutional psychologies of governmental branches whose personnel would represent the different constituencies and perspectives of a large and diverse society. Thus, Madison argued in The Federalist #62–63 that because of differences in age, period of CITIZENSHIP, tenure of office, constituency, and, to a lesser degree, legislative function, members of the House of Representatives and Senate would pursue different policies with different consequences for the long term and varying impact on local, national, and international opinion. ALEXANDER HAMILTON wrote in The Federalist #70–71 that presidential types would be likely to seek the acclaim that attends success in difficult tasks, especially tasks requiring leaders to stand against and change public opinion. Such differences in institutional psychology, compounded by the federal features of the electoral system and the pluralism of an essentially democratic, secular, and commercial society, were expected to impede the formation of political parties disciplined enough to overcome the moderating influence of separated institutions.

The American system of checks and balances envisions strong executive and judicial branches. Experience had taught the Framers that popular legislatures were a greater threat to the separation of powers than were executives or courts. Accordingly, The Federalist #51 rationalized the bicameralism of Congress and the independence of the executive and judicial branches as means of weakening the naturally strongest branch and strengthening the weaker ones. This positive feature of the system complements its negative function of preventing concentrations of power. The Framers thus sought to achieve separation of governmental institutions without sacrificing the capacity for coordinated leadership when times demanded.

The system of checks and balances has worked well in some respects, but not in all. It has discouraged concentrations of power through centralized and disciplined political parties. Although government is fragmented in normal times, the system does permit central leadership in times of crisis, as the presidencies of THOMAS JEFFERSON, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT attest. It has also helped to create a remarkable degree of judicial independence without producing a judiciary seriously at odds with public opinion on any given issue for too long. The system has not worked so well in the case of Congress, which has undermined its own position by a practice of broad DELEGATION OF POWER to the executive and independent agencies. Many such delegations are necessitated by the problems and complexities that have brought the triumph of the administrative state. But far too many delegations are little more than acts of political buckpassing explained by the perception that the way to reelection does not lie in clear positions on controversial questions, but in constituency services and publicity that is politically safe. After the Great Depression and before the Supreme Court's decision in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), Congress compounded avoidable offense to the separation of powers when it tried to straddle the question of legislative responsibility, limiting many of its buckpassing delegations of power with various versions of the LEGISLATIVE VETO.

Congress's experience shows that there is a limit to the ability of the system to maintain a constitutional arrangement through reliance on personal ambition. Personal ambition sometimes dictates surrendering institutional prerogatives. The same can be said when Presidents compromise firmness in anticipation of elections and when judges propose "judicial self-restraint" in response to threats like court-packing and withdrawals of JURISDICTION. Despite the Framers' theory of checks and balances, officials must at some point respect constitutional duty as something other than mere means to personal ambition.

SOTIRIOS A. BARBER
(1986)

Bibliography

FISHER, LOUIS 1978 The Constitution Between Friends: Congress, the President, and the Law. New York: St. Martin's Press.

SHARP, MALCOLM 1938 The Classical American Doctrine of "the Separation of Powers." In Association of American Law Schools, Selected Essays on Constitutional Law. Vol. 4:168–194. Chicago: Foundation Press.

VILE, M. J. C. 1967 Constitutionalism and the Separation of Powers. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

CHEROKEE INDIAN CASES

Cherokee Nation v. Georgia
5 Peters 1 (1831)
Worcester v. Georgia
6 Peters 515 (1832)

The Cherokee Indian Cases prompted a constitutional crisis marked by successful state defiance of the Supreme Court, the Constitution, and federal treaties. The United States had made treaties with the Georgia Cherokee, as if they were a sovereign power, and pledged to secure their lands. Later, in 1802, the United States pledged to Georgia that in return for its relinquishment of the Yazoo lands (see FLETCHER V. PECK) the United States would extinguish the Cherokee land claims in Georgia. The Cherokee, however, refused to leave Georgia voluntarily in return for wild lands west of the Mississippi. In 1824 Georgia claimed LEGISLATIVE JURISDICTION over all the Indian lands within its boundaries. The Cherokee, who had a written language and a plantation economy, then adopted a CONSTITUTION and declared their sovereign independence. Georgia, which denied that the United States had authority to bind the state by an Indian treaty, retaliated against the Cherokee by a series of statutes that nullified all Indian laws and land claims and divided Cherokee lands into counties subject to state governance. President ANDREW JACKSON supported the state against the Indians, and Congress, too, recognizing that the Indians could not maintain a separate sovereignty within the state, urged them to settle on federally granted land in the west or, if remaining in Georgia, to submit to state laws.

The Cherokee turned next to the Supreme Court. Claiming to be a foreign state within the meaning of Article III, section 2, of the Constitution, the Indians invoked the Court's ORIGINAL JURISDICTION in a case to which a state was a party and sought an INJUNCTION that would restrain Georgia from enforcing any of its laws within Cherokee territory recognized by federal treaties. By scheduling a hearing the Court exposed itself to Georgia's wrath. Without the support of the political branches of the national government, the Court faced the prospect of being unable to enforce its own decree or defend the supremacy of federal treaties against state violation.

The case of Corn Tassel, which suddenly intervened, exposed the Court's vulnerability. He was a Cherokee whom Georgia tried and convicted for the murder of a fellow tribesman, though he objected that a federal treaty recognized the exclusive right of his own nation to try him. On Tassel's application Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL issued a WRIT OF ERROR to the state trial court and directed the governor of the state to send its counsel to appear before the Supreme Court. Georgia's governor and legislature contemptuously declared that they would resist execution of the Court's writ with all necessary force, denounced the Court's infringement of state SOVEREIGNTY, and hanged Corn Tassel. Justice JOSEPH STORY spoke of "practical NULLIFICATION." Newspapers and politicians throughout the nation took sides in the dispute between the Court and the state, and Congress in 1831 debated a bill to repeal section 25 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789. Although the House defeated the repeal bill, Whigs despondently predicted that the President would not support the Court if it decided the Cherokee Nation case contrary to his view of the matter.

The Court wisely decided, 4–2, to deny jurisdiction on the ground that the Cherokee were not a foreign state in the sense of Article III's use of that term. Although Marshall for the Court declared that the Cherokee were a "distinct political society" capable of self-government and endorsed their right to their lands, he candidly acknowledged that the Court could not restrain the government of Georgia "and its physical force." That, Marshall observed, "savors too much of the exercise of political power" and that was what the bill for an injunction asked of the Court.

A year later, however, the Court switched its strategy. At issue in Worcester was the constitutionality of a Georgia statute that prohibited white people from residing in Cherokee territory without a state license. Many missionaries, including Samuel Worcester, defied the act in order to bring a TEST CASE before the Supreme Court, in the hope that the Court would endorse Cherokee sovereignty and void the state's Cherokee legislation. Worcester and another, having been sentenced to four years' hard labor, were the only missionaries to decline a pardon; they applied to the Court for a writ of error, which Marshall issued. Georgia sent the records of the case but again refused to appear before a Court that engaged in a "usurpation" of state sovereignty. The state legislature resolved that a reversal of the state court would be deemed "unconstitutional" and empowered the governor to employ all force to resist the "invasion" of the state's administration of its laws. The case was sensationally debated in the nation's press, and nearly sixty members of Congress left their seats to hear the argument before the Supreme Court.

In an opinion by Marshall, with Justice HENRY BALDWIN dissenting, the Court reaffirmed its jurisdiction under section 25, upheld the exclusive power of the United States in Indian matters, endorsed the authority of the Cherokee Nation within boundaries recognized by federal treaties, declared that the laws of Georgia had no force within these boundaries, and held that the "acts of Georgia are repugnant to the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States." The Court also reversed the judgment of the Georgia court and commanded the release of Worcester.

Why did the Court deliberately decide on the broadest possible grounds and challenge Georgia? In a private letter, Justice Story, noting that the state was enraged and violent, expected defiance of the Court's writ and no support from the President. "The Court," he wrote, "has done its duty. Let the nation do theirs. If we have a government let its commands be obeyed; if we have not it is as well to know it. . . ." Georgia did resist and Jackson did nothing. He might have made the famous remark, "John Marshall has made his decision; now let him enforce it." But Jackson knew Marshall's reputation for political craftiness, knew that a majority of Congress resisted all efforts to curb the Court, and knew that public opinion favored the Court and revered its Chief as the nation's preeminent Unionist. Jackson did nothing because he did not yet have to act. The state must first refuse execution of the Court's writ before the Court could order a federal marshal to free Worcester, and it could not issue an order to the marshal without a record of the state court's refusal to obey the writ. Not until the next term of the Court could it decide whether it had a course of action that would force the President either to execute the law of the land or disobey his oath of office. Marshall believed that public opinion would compel Jackson to execute the law. In the fall of 1832, however, Marshall pessimistically wrote that "our Constitution cannot last. . . . The Union has been prolonged thus far by miracles. I fear they cannot continue."

A miracle did occur, making the Court's cause the President's before the Court's next term; the SOUTH CAROLINA ORDINANCE OF NULLIFICATION intervened, forcing Jackson to censure state nullification of federal law. Georgia supported Jackson against South Carolina, and he convinced Georgia's governor that the way to dissociate Georgia from nullification was to free Worcester. The governor pardoned him. Worcester, having won the Supreme Court's invalidation of the Georgia Cherokee legislation, accepted the pardon. The lawyers for the Cherokee persuaded them to desist from further litigation in order to preserve a Unionist coalition against nullificationists. In 1838, long after the crisis had passed, the Cherokees were forcibly removed from their lands. The Court could not save them. It never could. It had, however, saved its integrity ("The Court has done its duty") by defending the supreme law of the land at considerable risk.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BURKE, JOSEPH C. 1969 The Cherokee Cases: A Study of Law, Politics, and Morality. Stanford Law Review 21:500–531.

WARREN, CHARLES 1923 The Supreme Court in United States History, 3 vols. Vol. 2:189–229. Boston: Little, Brown.

CHEROKEE NATION v. GEORGIA

See: Cherokee Indian Cases

CHICAGO v. MORALES
527 U.S. 41 (1999)

During the 1980s and 1990s, cities experienced a marked increase in organized gang activity, often linked to the street sale of drugs. Cities and states, frustrated by the inability of ordinary criminal prohibitions to eliminate gangs, sought new ways to control the presence of gangs in urban areas.

Chicago, in an effort to crack down on—as described in its brief to the Supreme Court—"obviously brazen, insistent and lawless gang members and hangers-on on the public ways" who "intimidate residents" and "destabilize" neighborhoods, authorized its police to arrest anyone milling about "without any apparent purpose" in the company of a suspected gang member. Under the law, police could order any loiterers to disperse and, if they refused, arrest them, even absent any evidence of criminal wrongdoing.

In a 6–3 decision, the Supreme Court declared Chicago's ordinance unconstitutional because of its VAGUENESS. The majority, in an opinion authored by Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, explained that the law failed to give the ordinary citizen "adequate notice of what is forbidden and what is permitted" when using the public streets. Moreover, the majority held that "the freedom to loiter for innocent purposes is part of the 'liberty' " protected by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT guarantee of DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

In dissent, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, Justice CLARENCE THOMAS, and Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST accused the majority of improperly crafting a "constitutional right to loiter," despite a long history of anti-loitering laws in every state.

In fact, the MAJORITY OPINION comports with sixty years of PRECEDENT—dating back to Lanzetta v. United States (1939)—invalidating vague and standardless laws that target vagrants, suspected criminals, or their associates by criminalizing innocent activity in public. Morales serves notice on cities that they cannot sacrifice CIVIL LIBERTIES in their quest to eradicate street gangs.

ADAM WINKLER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Procedural Due Process of Law, Criminal; Vagrancy Laws.)

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY RAILROAD CO. v. CHICAGO
166 U.S. 226 (1897)

A 7–1 Supreme Court here sustained a $1 award as JUST COMPENSATION for a TAKING OF PROPERTY, holding that the SEVENTH AMENDMENT precluded it from reexamining facts, decided by a jury, which dictated that amount. Although due process required compensation, a nominal sum did not deprive the railroad of either due process or EQUAL PROTECTION. The Court required a "fair and full equivalent for the thing taken by the public" and stressed the necessity for understanding the spirit of due process. "In determining what is DUE PROCESS OF LAW, regard must be had to substance, not to form."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY RAILROAD CO. v. IOWA

See: Granger Cases

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILROAD CO. v. ACKLEY

See: Granger Cases

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY CO. v. MINNESOTA
134 U.S. 418 (1890)

This decision, making the courts arbiters of the reasonableness of railroad rates, presaged the Supreme Court's final acceptance of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS ten years later. The Minnesota legislature had established a commission to inspect rail rates and alter those it deemed unreasonable. A 6–3 Court struck down the statute as a violation of both substantive and PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS. Justice SAMUEL BLATCHFORD found that the statute neglected to provide procedural due process: railroads received no notice that the reasonableness of their rate was being considered, and the commission provided no hearing or other chance for the railroads to defend their rates. Moreover, Blatchford said that a rate's reasonableness "is eminently a question for judicial investigation, requiring due process of law for its determination." A company, denied the authority to charge reasonable rates and unable to turn to any judicial mechanism for review (procedural due process) would necessarily be deprived "of the lawful use of its property, and thus, in substance, and effect, of the property itself, without due process of law" (substantive due process). In dissent, Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY declared that the majority had effectively overruled MUNN V. ILLINOIS (1877). Bradley's opinion explicitly rejected the assertion that reasonableness was a question for judicial determination; it is, he said, "pre-eminently a legislative one, involving considerations of policy as well as of remuneration." If the legislature could fix rates (as precedent had shown), why could it make no such delegation of power to a commission? Indeed, the Court's next step, in REAGAN V. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST COMPANY (1894), would be the claim of power to void statutes by which the legislature itself directly set rates, and, in SMYTH V. AMES (1898), the Court would reach the zenith, actually striking down a state act for that reason.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

CHIEF JUSTICE, ROLE OF THE

The title "Chief Justice" appears only once in the Constitution. That mention occurs not in Article III, the judicial article, but in connection with the Chief Justice's role as presiding officer of the SENATE during an IMPEACHMENT trial of the President. With such a meager delineation of powers and duties in the Constitution, the importance of the office was hardly obvious during the early days of the Republic. Despite President GEORGE WASHINGTON's great expectations for the post, his first appointee, JOHN JAY, left disillusioned and convinced that neither the Supreme Court nor the chief justiceship would amount to anything. Yet, a little over a century later, President WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT stated that he would prefer the office to his own. During that intervening century, an office of considerable power and prestige had emerged from the constitutional vacuum. Since then, the Chief Justice's role has continued to evolve. Today, the office is the product of both the personalities and the priorities of its incumbents and of the institutional forces which have become stronger as the Supreme Court's role in our government has expanded and matured.

Like the other Justices of the Supreme Court, the Chief Justice of the United States is appointed by the President with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the Senate. He enjoys, along with all other full members of the federal judiciary, life tenure "during his GOOD BEHAVIOR." With respect to the judicial work of the Court, he has traditionally been referred to as primus inter pares—first among equals. He has the same vote as each Associate Justice of the Court. His judicial duties differ only in that he presides over the sessions of the Court and over the Court's private CONFERENCE at which the cases are discussed and eventually decided. When in the majority, he assigns the writing of the OPINION OF THE COURT. Like an Associate Justice, the Chief Justice also performs the duties of a circuit Justice. A circuit Justice must pass upon various applications for temporary relief and BAIL from his circuit and participate, at least in a liaison or advisory capacity, in the judicial administration of that circuit. By tradition, the Chief Justice is circuit Justice for the Fourth and District of Columbia Circuits.

In addition to his judicial duties, the Chief Justice has, by statute, responsibility for the general administration of the Supreme Court. While the senior officers of the Court are appointed by the entire Court, they perform their daily duties under his general supervision. Other employees of the Court must be approved by the Chief Justice.

The Chief Justice also serves as presiding officer of the JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES. The Conference, composed of the chief judge and a district judge from each circuit, has the statutory responsibility for making comprehensive surveys of the business of the federal courts and for undertaking a continuous study of the rules of practice and procedure. The Chief Justice, as presiding officer, must appoint the various committees of the Conference which undertake the studies necessary for the achievement of those statutory objectives. He must also submit to the Congress an annual report of the proceedings of the Conference and a report as to its legislative recommendations. Other areas of court administration also occupy the Chief Justice's attention regularly. He has the authority to assign, temporarily, judges of the lower federal courts to courts other than their own and for service on the Panel on Multidistrict Litigation. He is also the permanent Chairman of the Board of the Federal Judicial Center which develops and recommends improvements in the area of judicial administration to the Judicial Conference.

From time to time, Congress has also assigned by statute other duties to the Chief Justice. Some are related to the judiciary; others are not. For instance, he must appoint some of the members of the Commission on Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Salaries; the Advisory Corrections Council; the Federal Records Council; and the National Study Commission on Records and Documents of Federal Officials. He also serves as Chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution and as a member of the Board of Trustees of both the National Gallery of Art and the Joseph H. Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden.

In addition to these formal duties, the Chief Justice is considered the titular head of the legal profession in the United States. He traditionally addresses the American Bar Association on the state of the judiciary and delivers the opening address at the annual meeting of the American Law Institute. He is regularly invited to other ceremonial and substantive meetings of the bar. Finally, as head of the judicial branch, he regularly participates in national observances and state ceremonies honoring foreign dignitaries.

The foregoing catalog of duties, while describing a burdensome role, does not fully indicate the impact of the Chief Justice on the Supreme Court's work. For instance, with respect to his judicial duties, the Chief Justice, while nominally only "first among equals," may exercise a significant influence on the Court's decision-making process and, consequently, on its final judicial work product. His most obvious opportunity to influence that process is while presiding at the Court's conference. He presents each case initially and is the first to give his views. Thus, he has the opportunity to take the initiative by directing the Court's inquiry to those aspects of the case he believes are crucial. Moreover, although the Justices discuss cases in descending order of seniority, they vote in the opposite order. Therefore, while speaking first, the "Chief," as he is referred to by his colleagues, votes last and commits himself, even preliminarily, only after all of the associates have explained their positions and cast their votes. If he votes with the majority, he may retain the opinion for himself or assign it to a colleague whose views are most compatible with his own. In cases where there is significant indecision among the Justices, it falls to the "Chief" to take the initiative with respect to the Court's further consideration of the case. He may, for instance, suggest that further discussion be deferred until argument of other related cases or he may request that several Justices set forth their views in writing in the hope that such a memorandum might form the basis of a later opinion.

There are also more indirect but highly significant ways by which the "Chief" can influence the decision-making process. As presiding officer during open session, he sets a "tone" which can make ORAL ARGUMENT either a formal, stilted affair or a disciplined but relaxed, productive dialogue between the Court and counsel. Even the Chief Justice's "administrative" duties within the Court can have a subtle influence on the Court's decision-making processes. The efficient administration of the Court's support services as well as the employment of adequate staff personnel can nurture an ambiance conducive to harmonious decision making.

While occupancy of the Court's center chair no doubt gives the incumbent an enhanced capacity to influence jurisprudential developments, there are clear limitations on the exercise of that power. The Court is a collegial institution; disagreement on important issues is a natural phenomenon. In such a context, as Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST put it in a 1976 article: "The power to calm such naturally troubled waters is usually beyond the capacity of any mortal chief justice. He presides over a conference not of eight subordinates, whom he may direct or instruct, but of eight associates who, like him, have tenure during good behavior, and who are as independent as hogs on ice. He may at most persuade or cajole them." Political acumen is often as important as intellectual brilliance. Whatever the Chief's view of his power, he must remember that, in the eyes of the associates, "the Chief Justice is not entitled to a presumption that he knows more law than other members of the Court . . . ," as Justice Rehnquist said in chambers in Clements v. Logan (1981). Other institutional concerns further constrain the Chief's ability to guide the Court's decisions. All Chief Justices have recognized, although to varying degrees, a responsibility to see not only that the Court gets its business done but also that it does so in a manner which maintains the country's confidence. Sometimes, those objectives require that the Chief refrain from taking a strong ideological stance and act as a mediator in the formation of a majority. Similarly, while the assignment power can be a powerful tool, it must be exercised to ensure a majority opinion that advances, not retards, growth in the law. Even the prerogative of presiding over the conference has a price. The Chief Justice must spend significant additional time reviewing all the petitions filed with the Court. As the performance of Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES demonstrated, perceiving those areas of ambiguity and conflict that are most troublesome in the administration of justice is essential to leading effectively the discussion of the conference. For the same reason, the Chief must take the time to master the intricacies of the Court's procedure.

The extrajudicial responsibilities of the Chief Justice can also place him at a distinct disadvantage in influencing the Court's jurisprudential direction. The internal decision-making process of the Court is essentially competitive. There is nothing so humble as a draft opinion with four votes and nothing so arrogant as one with six. Such a process does not easily take into account that one participant must regularly divert his attention because of other official responsibilities. Moreover, there is a special intellectual and physical cost in shifting constantly between the abstract world of the appellate judge and the pragmatic one of the administrator. A Chief Justice who takes all his responsibilities seriously must experience the fatiguing tension that inevitably results from such bifurcation of responsibilities. Here, however, there may be compensating considerations. Whatever advantage the Chief may lose in the judicial bargaining because of administrative distractions may well be partially recovered by the prestige gained by his accomplishments beyond the Court. The Court has benefited from a strong Chief Justice's defense against specific political threats such as President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's Court-packing plan. It has also benefited when the Chief's efforts have resulted in legislation making its own workload more manageable. Chief Justice Taft's support of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1925, for instance, gave the Court more control over its own docket and, consequently, increased capacity to address, selectively, the most pressing issues. In modern times, the tremors of the litigation explosion that has engulfed the lower courts have been felt on the Supreme Court. The accomplishments of a Chief Justice in alleviating these problems cannot be overlooked by his associates.

Certainly, with respect to nonjudicial matters, a Chief Justice's special responsibility for institutional concerns has commanded respect from the associates. Even such greats as Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS regularly consulted the Chief on matters that might have an impact on the reputation of the Court as an institution. This same identification of the Chief Justice with the Supreme Court as an institution has made some Chief Justices the acknowledged spokesperson for both the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts before the other branches of government and, indeed, before the public.

With no specific constitutional mandate to fulfill, early Chief Justices, most especially JOHN MARSHALL, molded the office in which they served just as they molded the courts over which they presided. In those formative periods, the dominance of personal factors was understandable. Today, however, significant institutional forces also shape the office. In addition to the extrajudicial duties imposed by Congress, the Court, now a mature institution of American government, exerts through its traditions a powerful influence over every new incumbent of its bench—including the person in the center chair.

KENNETH F. RIPPLE
(1986)

Bibliography

FRANKFURTER, FELIX 1953 Chief Justices I Have Known. Virginia Law Review 39:883–905.

FREUND, PAUL A. 1967 Charles Evans Hughes as Chief Justice. Harvard Law Review 81:4–43.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H. 1976 Chief Justices I Never Knew. Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 3:637–655.

SWINDLER, WILLIAM F. 1971 The Chief Justice and Law Reform. The Supreme Court Review 1971:241–264.

CHILD BENEFIT THEORY

Protagonists of aid to religious schools have sought to justify the practice constitutionally through what has become known as the child benefit theory. The establishment clause, they urge, forbids aid to the schools but not to the children who attend them. Recognizing that the schools themselves benefit from the action, they argue that the benefit is secondary to that received by the pupils, and note that the courts have long upheld governmental assistance to children as an aspect of the POLICE POWER.

The recognition is at least implicit in Supreme Court decisions through BOARD OF EDUCATION V. ALLEN (1968). Thus, in Bradfield v. Roberts (1899), the Court upheld the validity under the establishment clause of a grant of federal funds to finance the erection of a hospital in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, to be maintained and operated by an order of nuns. The Court reasoned that the hospital corporation was a legal entity separate from its incorporators, and concluded that the aid was for a secular purpose.

Later court decisions ignored this fiction, consistently upholding grants to religious organizations, corporate or noncorporate, to finance hospitals that, though owned and operated by churches, nevertheless were nonsectarian in their admission policies, and generally benefited the patients.

In EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1947) the Court upheld use of tax-raised funds to finance transportation to religious schools, in part because the program had the secular purpose to enable children to avoid the risks of traffic or hitchhiking in going to school. In COCHRAN V. LOUISIANA STATE BOARD OF EDUCATION (1930) and Board of Education v. Allen (1968) the Court similarly sustained laws financing the purchase of secular textbooks for use in parochial schools. The beneficiaries of the laws, the Court asserted, were not the schools but the children who attended them.

More recent decisions, however, manifest a weakening of the theory. In Board of Education v. Nyquist (1973) the Court refused to uphold a law to finance costs of maintenance and repair in religious schools, notwithstanding a provision that the program's purpose was to insure the health, welfare, and safety of the school children.

Two years later, in Meek v. Pittenger, the Court refused to extend Allen to encompass the loan of instructional materials to church-related schools, even though the materials benefited nonpublic school children and were provided for public school children. Finally, in WOLMAN V. WALTER (1977) the Court, unwilling to overrule either Everson or Allen, nevertheless refused to extend them to encompass educational field trip transportation to governmental, industrial, cultural, and scientific centers.

In these later cases, the Court has rejected the argument that if public funds were not used for these support services, many parents economically unable to pay for them would have to transfer their children to the public schools in violation of their own and of their children's religious conscience.

LEO PFEFFER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Establishment of Religion; Separation of Church and State.)

Bibliography

DRINAN, ROBERT F., S. J. 1963 Religion, the Courts, and Public Policy. Chap. 5. New York: McGraw-Hill.

PFEFFER, LEO 1967 Church, State and Freedom, rev. ed. Chap. 14. Boston: Beacon Press.

CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT

Two years after BAILEY V. DREXEL FURNITURE CO. (1922) when for the second time the Supreme Court invalidated a federal child labor law, Congress approved a constitutional amendment empowering it to regulate on the subject. But from 1924 until 1938, the amendment languished in state legislatures, with only twenty-eight of the requisite thirty-six having ratified it by 1938.

Led by the National Association of Manufacturers, critics contended that the proposed amendment endangered traditional state powers and local control of PRODUCTION. The Granges also lobbied in agricultural states in the South and Midwest, arguing that such congressional power would threaten the use of children on family farms. Religious groups maintained that the amendment would lead to federal control of education and increase the costs of educating children. Newspapers overwhelmingly opposed the amendment on the grounds that they would be deprived of delivery boys.

The Court's decision in the WAGNER ACT CASES (1937) renewed interest in congressional legislation. The FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT in 1938 outlawed child labor, and in UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941), the Court sustained the legislation and overturned its own precedents. The new law and the Darby decision combined to make the amendment unnecessary.

The lengthy ratification process prompted Congress to impose time limits on many subsequent amendments. The child labor amendment also raised a knotty constitutional problem when one state reversed its position (in a disputed vote) and approved ratification. That action was challenged in COLEMAN V. MILLER (1939), but the Court sidestepped the issue as a POLITICAL QUESTION and left its resolution to Congress.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

WOOD, STEPHEN 1968 Constitutional Politics in the Progressive Era: Child Labor and the Law. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

CHILD LABOR CASE

See: Hammer v. Dagenhart

CHILD LABOR TAX ACT
40 Stat. 1138 (1918)

In HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918), a 5–4 Supreme Court voided the Child Labor Act of 1916, which had forbidden carriers from transporting the products of child labor in INTERSTATE COMMERCE, as a prohibition, not a regulation, of commerce. This distinction had been thought rejected as early as CHAMPION V. AMES (1903). Progressive reformers, intent on abolishing child labor, had shifted the basis of their efforts from the COMMERCE CLAUSE to the TAXING POWER, thus invoking a new set of powerful precedents, notably MCCRAY V. UNITED STATES (1904).

In late 1918 Congress passed a Revenue Act to which had been added an amendment known as the Child Labor Tax Act. A ten percent EXCISE TAX was imposed on the net profits from the sale of child labor-produced items. This tax extended to any factory, mine, or mill employing children under fourteen, or to the age of sixteen under certain circumstances. Congressmen from the major cotton textile manufacturing states, southern Democrats, cast nearly all the negative votes.

In BAILEY V. DREXEL FURNITURE CO. (1922) an 8–1 Court invalidated the act, McCray and UNITED STATES V. DOREMUS (1919) notwithstanding, as a violation of the powers reserved to the states by the TENTH AMENDMENT.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

WOOD, STEPHEN B. 1968 Constitutional Politics in the Progressive Era: Child Labor and the Law. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

CHILD LABOR TAX CASE

See: Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co.

CHILD PORNOGRAPHY

Every year, thousands of children are compelled to engage in pornographic acts for the production of films and photographs. Child pornography is one of the most insidious forms of child abuse because the victimization does not stop with the physical acts of abuse. In the words of Justice BYRON R. WHITE, "the pornography's continued existence causes the child victims continuing harm by haunting the children in years to come." Because child pornography is child abuse, the Supreme Court has held that it is not protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT. In NEW YORK V. FERBER (1982) the Court ruled that the production and distribution of child pornography can be prosecuted even if the material does not meet the legal test for OBSCENITY because, even if it is not legally obscene, it is still the product of child abuse and, hence, a proper object of state regulation.

In Osborne v. Ohio (1990) the Court extended the doctrine of Ferber to cover the private possession of child pornography. Ohio prosecuted Osborne for possessing child pornography in violation of a state statute. Osborne contended that the First Amendment prohibited the state from proscribing private possession, but the Supreme Court disagreed by a vote of 6–3. (Osborne's conviction was nevertheless overturned on procedural grounds.) The Court noted that much of the production and sale of child pornography has gone underground and is therefore difficult to prosecute. The only effective way to stop the child abuse by pornographers is by banning possession of the material outright.

Writing for the dissenters, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN argued that the Ohio statute suffered from OVERBREADTH because of its loose definition of what constituted child pornography. Even if the statute had not been overbroad, however, Brennan would have invalidated it. Recalling the words of STANLEY V. GEORGIA (1969), Brennan said that "if the First Amendment means anything, it means that the State has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what book he may read or what films he may watch."

Brennan's analysis was inapposite to the case at hand, however. No adult has the right to compel a child to appear in a pornographic film or photo; hence, it stretches the imagination to claim that someone else has the right to possess (and derive pleasure from) what the pornographer had no right to produce in the first place. Laws against the possession of child pornography not only help to stop the abuse of children through the production of the pornography; they also protect the child victims' right to privacy after the unlawful photographs or films have been produced.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

Bibliography

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S COMMISSION ON PORNOGRAPHY 1981 Attorney General's Commission on Pornography, Final Report, part II, chapter 7. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

CHILDREN AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Because many conceptions of the FIRST AMENDMENT's protection of speech and press are premised on a model of human rationality and human choice and because traditional views about children take them to be incapable of having the rationality and exercising the capacity of choice assumed for adults, issues about the free speech rights of children have always been problematic. Indeed, the need to protect children from harmful ideas they may be incapable of evaluating has been explicitly a part of the free speech tradition since JOHN STUART MILL's On Liberty.

Treating minors as different for free speech purposes has been a recurring feature of OBSCENITY law. Although the Supreme Court reaffirmed in Pinkus v. United States (1978) that it is impermissible to judge the obscenity of material directed primarily to adults on the basis of its possible effect on children, the Court has also held in Ginsberg v. New York (1968) that where sexually explicit material is directed at juvenile readers or viewers it is permissible to apply the test for obscenity in light of a juvenile rather than an adult audience. In addition, the Court in NEW YORK V. FERBER (1982) relied on the importance of protecting juvenile performers in allowing CHILD PORNOGRAPHY prosecution for the distribution of material not legally obscene, although it is clear that analogous justifications for restrictions on publications remain impermissible with respect to adult participants. Still, the Court has been sensitive to the likely overuse of children-protecting rationales for restricting speech, and although in FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION V. PACIFICA FOUNDATION (1978) it relied on a protection of children rationale in upholding restrictions on the times during which sexually explicit or offensive radio programs might be broadcast, in Sable Communications of California, Inc. v. FCC (1989) it unanimously struck down a federal law restricting "indecent" telephone communications because of an insufficient showing that a restriction of this magnitude was necessary to protect children. Sable thus continued a tradition going back at least to BUTLER V. MICHIGAN (1957), in which Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER made clear that a law reducing the adult population to reading only what was fit for children would be an impermissible encroachment on First Amendment freedoms.

More commonly, the issue has arisen in the context of restrictions on speech in the public schools. Although it is so obvious as never to have generated a Supreme Court case that children as speakers in the PUBLIC FORUM or other open environment have the same free speech rights as adults, the question is more complicated with reference to speech within the confines of the public schools. In upholding a student's right to wear a protest armband even in class, the Supreme Court in TINKER V. DES MOINES INDEPENDENT COMMUNITY SCHOOL DISTRICT (1969) observed that "[n]either students [n]or teachers shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate" and proceeded to hold content-based restrictions on student speech in the schools invalid unless supported by evidence of actual or potential "disturbance," "disruption," or "disorder."

Both the language in Tinker and its "disturbance" standard proved difficult to square, however, with the fact that much of the mission of the schools involves controls on communication, of which the most obvious is the hardly unconstitutional practice of rewarding certain answers and penalizing others. As a result, subsequent cases, themselves frequently criticized as too much of a departure from Tinker and too easy an acquiescence to teacher or administrator authority, have tempered the Tinker approach. In BETHEL SCHOOL DISTRICT V. FRASER (1986) the Court upheld disciplinary action against a high-school student who had made a sexually suggestive, but plainly not legally obscene, speech in a school assembly, and in HAZELWOOD SCHOOL DISTRICT V. KUHLMEIER (1988), the Court allowed the school to exercise content-based control over a school-sponsored student newspaper produced on school property with school resources, the writing and editing of which was part of a journalism course offered by the school. More significantly, Hazelwood explicitly substituted a seemingly more lenient "reasonableness" standard for the Tinker "disturbance" standard, although it remains too early to assess the actual import of the new approach. It does seem clear that the recent cases represent a willingness to defer to decisions of school authorities more than has been the case in the past and a consequent willingness to allow school authorities at the primary and secondary level to choose to have an "indoctrination" rather than a "market place of ideas" model as the major purpose of primary and secondary education. Thus, the recent trend will likely result in little judicial review of content-based restrictions on student speech within the primary and secondary schools. But the Court's unwillingness to overrule Tinker, combined with decisions like BOARD OF EDUCATION V. PICO (1982), dealing (unclearly) with political censorship of school libraries, indicates that judicial intervention remains appropriate where the content-based restrictions are excessively viewpoint based or where they stem not from the decisions of primary professionals such as teachers and principals, but rather from the selective involvement of more political and less professional elected officials.

FREDERICK SCHAUER
(1992)

Bibliography

GARVEY, JOHN 1979 Children and the First Amendment. Texas Law Review 57:321–366.

——— 1981 Freedom and Choice in Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 94:1756–1794.

YUDOF, MARK G. 1984 Library Book Selection and the Public Schools: The Quest for the Archimedean Point. Indiana Law Journal 59:527–564.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

The law of childhood is complex, but as a general legal proposition, a child is someone who has not yet reached the age of civil majority. Each state has the authority to determine the age of majority for its own residents, and in most states that age is now eighteen. Prior to 1971, the age of majority was typically twenty-one, but after the ratification of the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT, which gave eighteen-year-olds the right to vote in federal elections, most states lowered the age of majority, as well as the voting age for state elections.

In general, children have less liberty than adults and are less often held accountable for their actions. Parents have legal power to make a wide range of decisions for the child, although they are held responsible by the state for the child's care and support. Children have a special power to avoid contractual obligations but are not normally entitled to their own earnings and cannot manage their own property. Moreover, persons younger than certain statutory limits are not allowed to vote, hold public office, work in various occupations, drive a car, buy liquor, or be sold certain kinds of reading material, quite apart from what either they or their parents may wish.

Although a variety of civic and personal rights accrue at the age of majority, rights to engage in various "adult" activities may occur either before or after the age of eighteen. For example, many states restrict the legal access of nineteen- and twenty-year-olds to alcoholic beverages. On the other hand, most states permit sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds to secure licenses to drive automobiles. State child labor laws typically permit young people who are sixteen or seventeen to work, particularly outside of school hours, although federal law prohibits the employment of children under eighteen in hazardous occupations. A minor who is self-supporting and living away from home may, through emancipation, obtain a broad range of adult rights.

When advocates speak of children's rights, they may have in mind either of two quite contradictory notions. One notion focuses on children's basic needs, and the obligations to satisfy those needs. The other focuses on autonomy and choice.

At times, the word "right" is used to describe the duties of others—typically parents or state officials—to satisfy what are seen as a child's basic needs. Thus, claims are made that a child has or should have a legal right to education, adequate food and shelter, and even love, affection, discipline, and guidance. The federal Constitution has not been interpreted to give a child a substantive right to adequate education or care, although state law sometimes creates such duties. For example, every state provides for free public education, typically through high school, and many state constitutions require as much. Although the Supreme Court decided in SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973) that education is not a "fundamental" right, at least for purposes of requiring strict scrutiny under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause, the Court acknowledged in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) that education is "perhaps the most important function of state and local governments." There is no constitutional right to parental love, but opinions such as PIERCE V. SOCIETY OF SISTERS (1925) have suggested that children as well as parents have an interest of constitutional dimension in preserving the parent-child relationship. State child-neglect statutes do impose on parents an obligation to provide adequate custodial care. In all events, a child's "right" to such things as an education or minimally adequate care has little to do with the protection of choice on the part of a particular child. A judge usually does not ask a physically abused child whether she wants to remain with her parents when the responsible authorities believe they cannot protect her from further harm if she remains at home. Compulsory education laws and child labor laws do not give an unhappy eleven-year-old child the legal right to pursue an education by dropping out of school and taking a job.

A second, very different, notion of "children's rights" emphasizes autonomy, choice, and liberty. Claims asserting this sort of right have arisen in a variety of contexts: procedural claims in JUVENILE PROCEEDINGS and in schools (see GOSS V. LOPEZ); choices about abortion or BIRTH CONTROL; access to reading material (see GINSBERG V. NEW YORK); and involvement in political protests (see TINKER V. DES MOINES SCHOOL DISTRICT). Usually the challenge is to some form of state paternalism; but sometimes the minor's claim involves the assertion that he should have the "right" to act independently of his parents. Because the liberty of minors is much more restricted than that of adults, reformers have sometimes asserted that adolescents should have the right to adult status, at least in particular settings. A few have even suggested a children's liberation movement to end the double standard of morals and behavior for adults and children.

The definition of "children's rights" necessarily involves the allocation of power and responsibility among the child, the family, and the state. Taking contemporary constitutional doctrine at face value, three basic principles bear on this allocation. The first principle concerns the children themselves, and the notion that as individuals they have constitutional rights. The Supreme Court declared in IN RE GAULT (1967), the seminal children's rights case, "whatever may be their precise impact, neither the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT nor the BILL OF RIGHTS is for adults alone."

The second principle concerns parents and the notion that parents have primary authority over the child. Children are part of families, and our traditions emphasize the primacy of the parental role in child-rearing. The rights of children cannot be defined without reference to their parents. The Court has suggested that parental authority also has a constitutional dimension: the state may not intrude too deeply into the parent-child relationship. Drawing on this principle, the Court held in WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972) that Wisconsin could not compel children to attend public schools when their old-order Amish parents believed that public schooling interfered with their raising of their children as their religion dictates. Nor may a state require all children to attend public school when there are private schools that meet legitimate regulatory standards.

The third principle concerns the state. It suggests that the state, in the exercise of its parens patriae power, has a special responsibility to protect children, even from their parents. The state's interest in protecting children has frequently been characterized as "compelling" and has been drawn on to justify a variety of child protective measures that constrain the liberty of parents and children alike. "Parents may be free," declared the Supreme Court in PRINCE V. MASSACHUSETTS (1944), "to become martyrs themselves. But it does not follow that they are free, under free and identical circumstances, to make martyrs of their children before they reach the age of full and legal discretion when they can make that choice for themselves."

Any one of these three principles, if taken very far, cuts deeply into the others. For example, to the extent that children, as individuals, are given autonomy rights, limits are necessarily imposed on parental rights to control their behavior or socialization. Recognition of child autonomy also limits the state's right to constrain a child's conduct in circumstances where adult conduct could not be similarly constrained. Some rights of child autonomy would disable the state from having special protective legislation for children. Broad interpretation of the state's parens patriae power to intervene to protect children necessarily will diminish both the parental role in child-rearing and the child's role in decision making. Similarly, an expansive interpretation of parents' rights to control and govern their children necessarily limits the state's ability to protect children, or to ensure child autonomy.

The Supreme Court's decisions concerning children's rights evidence these tensions. For example, the Tinker decision, emphasizing child autonomy, declared that children have First Amendment rights to engage in peaceful political protest within the schools. On the other hand, the Ginsberg decision, emphasizing state protection of children, determined that the state could criminally punish the sale to minors of sexually explicit materials that an adult would have a constitutional right to receive. (See OBSCENITY.) In its decisions concerning juvenile delinquency proceedings, the Court has extended a broad range of procedural rights to minors, and yet also determined that a juvenile court need not provide an accused young person with TRIAL BY JURY. In PARHAM V. J. R. (1979) the Court held that due process does not require a hearing before the commitment of a minor by a parent to a state mental hospital. Similarly, although the Pierce and Yoder opinions emphasized the primacy of the parental role in child-rearing, Prince, in enforcing a child labor law, emphasized the state's parens patriae obligation to protect children.

The Supreme Court's decisions involving the abortion rights of minors suggest that a state may not give parents an absolute "veto" over a pregnant minor's decision to have an abortion (PLANNED PARENTHOOD OF CENTRAL MISSOURI V. DANFORTH, 1976), but may require parental notification, at least for younger pregnant teenagers still living at home (H. L. v. Matheson, 1981). And in Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft (1983) the Court upheld a state law requiring either parental or judicial consent to a minor's abortion; under the law the court must approve the abortion if the minor is sufficiently mature to make the abortion decision, or, alternatively, if the abortion is in the minor's best interests.

In sum, the Constitution has not been interpreted to prohibit the state from treating children differently from adults. Because children often lack adult capacity and maturity and need protection, and because of the special relationship of children to their families, giving children the same rights and obligations as adults would often do them a substantial disservice. To assume adult roles, children need to be socialized. The Constitution does not prohibit the use of state or parental coercion in this task of socialization. But, because ours is a society where adults are socialized for autonomous choice, there are necessarily some limits, even for children. In determining the contour of children's constitutional rights, then, the Supreme Court appears to be seeking to recognize the moral autonomy of children as individuals without abandoning children to their rights.

ROBERT H. MNOOKIN
(1986)

Bibliography

HAFEN, BRUCE C. 1976 Children's Liberation and the New Egalitarianism: Some Reservations about Abandoning Youth to Their "Rights." Brigham Young University Law Review 1976:605–658.

MNOOKIN, ROBERT H. 1978 Child, Family and State. Boston: Little, Brown.

———, ed. 1985 In the Interest of Children. New York: W. H. Freeman & Co.

TEITELBAUM, LEE E. 1980 Foreword: The Meaning of Rights of Children. New Mexico Law Review 10:235–253.

WALD, MICHAEL S. 1979 Children's Rights: A Framework for Analysis. University of California, Davis, Law Review 12: 255–282.

YOUTH LAW CENTER 1982 Legal Rights of Children in the United States of America. Columbia Human Rights Law Review 13:675–743.

CHILD SUPPORT RECOVERY ACT
106 Stat. 3403 (1992)

The Child Support Recovery Act (CSRA) provides that anyone who willfully fails to pay "past due support" for a child living in another state may be fined or imprisoned. "Past due support" means court-ordered obligations that either have been unpaid for more than a year or exceed $5,000. Congress enacted the CSRA to assist the efforts of states to collect unpaid child support. Congress estimated that the gap between the child support owed and that actually paid was approximately $5 billion annually. It also expressed concern that this deficit contributes to the increase in the cost of federal welfare assistance, much of which goes to single-parent families.

The constitutionality of the act has been questioned since its passage in 1992. Several federal district courts held that the CSRA exceeded the authority of Congress under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, relying heavily on the Supreme Court's decision in UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995). By mid-1998, however, every federal court of appeals that had reviewed the act had held it constitutional. Although the states have traditionally regulated domestic relationships, the courts have characterized the CSRA either as a regulation of debts owed in INTERSTATE COMMERCE or as regulation of an activity that substantially affects interstate commerce. Moreover, the CSRA only applies to child support obligations owed by a parent for a dependent child residing in a different state. The courts have also rejected arguments based on the TENTH AMENDMENT and NEW YORK V. UNITED STATES (1992) because the act does not direct state officials to do anything. The CSRA does not interfere with state child support determinations; rather, it is an attempt to enforce those state-determined obligations when the obligations take on an interstate character.

JAY S. BYBEE
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Federalism.)

Bibliography

BURDETTE, KATHLEEN A. 1996 Making Parents Pay: Interstate Child Support Enforcement After United States v. López. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 144:1469–1528.

CALHOUN, JANELLE T. 1995 Interstate Child Support Enforcement System: Juggernaut of Bureaucracy. Mercer Law Review 46:921–976.

SIFF, ANDREW M. 1997 United States v. López and the Child Support Recovery Act of 1992: Why a Nice Idea Must Be Declared A Casualty of the Struggle to Save Federalism. Cornell Journal of Law and Public Policy 6:753–813.

CHILD WITNESSES

See: Coy v. Iowa; Maryland v. Craig

CHILLING EFFECT

Law is carried forward on a stream of language. Metaphor not only reflects the growth of constitutional law but nourishes it as well. Since the 1960s, when the WARREN COURT widened the domain of the FIRST AMENDMENT, Justices have frequently remarked on laws' "chilling effects" on the FREEDOM OF SPEECH. A statute tainted by VAGUENESS or OVERBREADTH, for example, restricts the freedom of expression not only by directly subjecting people to the laws' sanctions but also by threatening others. Because the very existence of such a law may induce self-censorship when the reach of the law is uncertain, the law may be held INVALID ON ITS FACE. The assumed causal connection between vague legislation and self-censorship was made by the Supreme Court as early as HERNDON V. LOWRY (1937); half a century later, circulating the coinage of Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, lawyers and judges express similar assumptions in the language of chilling effects.

The assumption plainly makes more sense in some cases than it does in others. For a law's uncertainty actually to chill speech, the would-be speaker must be conscious of the uncertainty. Yet few of us go about our day-to-day business with the statute book in hand. A statute forbidding insulting language may be vague, but its uncertainty is unlikely to have any actual chilling effect on speech in face-to-face street encounters. Yet a court striking that law down—even in application to one whose insults fit the Supreme Court's narrow definition of FIGHTING WORDS—is apt to speak of the law's chilling effects.

For chilling effects that are real rather than assumed, we must look to institutional speakers—publishers, broadcasters, advertisers, political parties, groups promoting causes—who regularly inquire into the letter of the law and its interpretation by the courts. Magazine editors, for example, routinely seek legal counsel about defamation. Here the uncertainty of the law's reach does not lie in any statutory language, for the law of libel and slander is largely the product of COMMON LAW judges. It was a concern for chilling effects, however, that led three concurring Justices in NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964) to advocate an absolute rule protecting the press against damages for the libel of a public official. The majority's principle in the case, which would allow damages when a newspaper defames an official knowing that its statement is false, or in reckless disregard of its truth or falsity, may, indeed, chill the press. Even slight doubt about information may make an editor hesitate to publish it, for fear that it may turn out to be false—and that a jury years later will decide it was published recklessly. The concern is not to protect false information, but that doubtful editors will play it safe, suppressing information that is true.

Conversely, when the Justices are persuaded that the law's threat will not have the effect of chilling speech, they are disinclined to use the overbreadth doctrine. A prominent modern example is the treatment of COMMERCIAL SPEECH. Because advertising is profitable, and advertisers seem unlikely to be chilled by laws regulating advertising, such laws are not subject to challenge for overbreadth.

The worry, when a court discusses chilling effects, is that a law's uncertainty will cause potential speakers to censor themselves. Thus, an overly broad law is subject to constitutional challenge even by one whose own speech would be punishable under a law focused narrowly on speech lying outside First Amendment protection. The defendant in court stands as a surrogate for others whose speech would be constitutionally protected—but who have been afraid to speak, and thus have not been prosecuted, and cannot themselves challenge the law. Whether or not this technique amounts to a dilution of the jurisdictional requirements of STANDING or RIPENESS, it allows courts to defend against the chilling effects of unconstitutional statutes that would otherwise elude their scrutiny.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

AMSTERDAM, ANTHONY G. 1960 The Void-for-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 109:67–116.

NOTE 1970 The First Amendment Overbreadth Doctrine. Harvard Law Review 83:844–927.

SCHAUER, FREDERICK 1978 Fear, Risk and the First Amendment: Unraveling the "Chilling Effect." Boston University Law Review 5:685–732.

CHIMEL v. CALIFORNIA
395 U.S. 752 (1969)

In Chimel the Supreme Court considerably narrowed the prevailing scope of SEARCH INCIDENT TO ARREST, by limiting the search to the person of the arrestee and his immediate environs. The Court thus ended a divisive, decades-long debate on the subject.

The principle that officers executing a valid arrest may simultaneously search the arrestee for concealed weapons or EVIDENCE has never been challenged; it is rooted in COMMON LAW, and was recognized by the Court in WEEKS V. UNITED STATES (1914) as an emergency exception to the FOURTH AMENDMENT's warrant requirement. That the search may extend beyond the person to the premises in which the arrest is made was recognized in AGNELLO V. UNITED STATES (1925). The extension, too, has never been challenged; it seems sensible to permit officers to eliminate the possibility of a suspect's seizing a gun or destroying evidence within his reach though not on his person. The permissible scope of a warrantless search of the premises has, however, embroiled the Court in controversy.

Some Justices would have allowed a search of the entire place, arguing that after an arrest, even an extensive search is only a minor additional invasion of privacy. The opposing camp, led by Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, condemned such wholesale rummaging: to allow a search incident to arrest to extend beyond the need that justified it would swallow up the rule requiring a search warrant save in EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES. The latter view finally prevailed in Chimel, when the Court ruled that the search must be limited to the arrestee's person and "the area from which he might gain possession of a weapon or destructible evidence." It may not extend into any room other than the one in which the arrest is made, and even "desk drawers or other closed or concealed areas in that room itself" are off-limits to the officers if the suspect cannot gain access to them.

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

CHINESE EXCLUSION ACT
22 Stat. 58 (1882)

Although Chinese IMMIGRATION to California probably raised both wages and living standards of white laborers, economic, political, and cultural arguments were adduced against the foreigners. Assimilation was said to be impossible: the Chinese were gamblers, opium smokers, and generally inferior. Anti-Chinese feeling became the hub for many political issues, and agitation for legislation increased. Senator John Miller of California contended that failure to enact exclusion would "empty the teeming, seething slave pens of China upon the soil of California." Although most of the nation was indifferent, opposition to exclusion was weak and disorganized; Congress thus passed its first exclusion law in 1882. The act prohibited Chinese laborers from entering the United States for ten years, although resident ALIENS might return after a temporary absence. Nonlaboring Chinese would be admitted only upon presentation of a certificate from the Chinese government attesting their right to come. Other sections provided for deportation of illegal immigrants and prohibited state or federal courts from admitting Chinese to CITIZENSHIP. Further exclusion acts or amendments passed Congress—eleven by 1902. The most important of these were the Scott Act of 1888 prohibiting the return of any departing Chinese and the Geary Act of 1892 which extended the 1882 law. (See CHAE CHAN PING V. UNITED STATES.)

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

CHINESE EXCLUSION CASE

See: Chae Chan Ping v. United States

CHIPMAN, NATHANIEL
(1752–1843)

Federalist jurist and statesman Nathaniel Chipman was instrumental in securing Vermont's admission to the Union in 1791 as the first state with no history as a separate British colony. An ally and correspondent of ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Chipman was three times chief justice of Vermont and also the first federal judge in the Vermont district. He was professor of law at Middlebury College (1816–1843) and author of Principles of Government (1793; revised edition 1833).

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

CHISHOLM v. GEORGIA
2 Dallas 419 (1793)

The first constitutional law case decided by the Supreme Court, Chisholm provoked opposition so severe that the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT was adopted to supersede its ruling that a state could be sued without its consent by a citizen of another state. Article III of the Constitution extended the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES to all controversies "between a State and citizens of another State" and provided that the Supreme Court should have ORIGINAL JURISDICTION in all cases in which a state should be a party. During the ratification controversy, anti-Federalists, jealous of state prerogatives and suspicious about the consolidating effects of the proposed union, had warned that Article III would abolish state sovereignty. Ratificationists, including JOHN MARSHALL, JAMES MADISON, and ALEXANDER HAMILTON (e.g., THE FEDERALIST #81) had argued that the clause intended to cover only suits in which a state had given its sovereign consent to being sued or had instituted the suit. Here, however, with Justice JAMES IREDELL alone dissenting, the Justices in SERIATIM OPINIONS held that the states by ratifying the Constitution had agreed to be amenable to the judicial power of the United States and in that respect had abandoned their SOVEREIGNTY.

The case arose when Chisholm, a South Carolinian executor of the estate of a Tory whose lands Georgia had confiscated during the Revolution, sued Georgia for restitution. The state remonstrated against the Court's taking jurisdiction of the case and refused to argue on the merits. The Justices, confronted by a question of sovereignty, discoursed on the nature of the Union, giving the case historical importance. Iredell, stressing the sovereignty of the states respecting reserved powers, believed that no sovereign state could be sued without its consent unless Congress so authorized. Chief Justice JOHN JAY and Justice JAMES WILSON, delivering the most elaborate opinions against Georgia, announced for the first time from the bench the ultra-nationalistic doctrine that the people of the United States, rather than the states or people thereof, had formed the Union and were the ultimate sovereigns. From this view, the suability of the states was compatible with their reserved sovereignty, and the clause in Article III neither excluded suits by outside citizens nor required state consent.

The decision, which seemed to open the treasuries of the states to suits by Tories and other creditors, stirred widespread indignation that crossed sectional and party lines. A special session of the Massachusetts legislature recommended an amendment that would prevent the states from being answerable in the federal courts to suits by individuals. Virginia, taking the same action, condemned the Court for a decision dangerous to the sovereignty of the states. The Georgia Assembly would have defied the decision by a bill providing that any United States officer attempting to enforce it should "suffer death, without benefit of clergy, by being hanged." Though the state senate did not pass the bill, Georgia remained defiant. Congress too opposed the decision and finally agreed on a remedy for it that took the form of the Eleventh Amendment.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

MATHIS, DOYLE 1967 Chisholm v. Georgia: Background and Settlement. Journal of American History 54:19–29.

CHOATE, JOSEPH H.
(1832–1917)

A highly conservative lawyer and leader of the American bar, Joseph Hodges Choate often appeared before the Supreme Court in defense of property interests and removed from the concerns of a populace he inimitably referred to as the "Great Unwashed." In MUGLER V. KANSAS (1887), Choate sought in vain to convince the Court to embrace laissez-faire, but he succeeded in wresting, in OBITER DICTUM, future judicial examination of the reasonableness of exercises of STATE POLICE POWER. Choate unequivocally endorsed constitutional rights in private property, a position the Court would soon partly accept. Indeed, his most famous victory came in POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST COMPANY (1895), which he argued with WILLIAM GUTHRIE. Labeling the income tax "communistic" and heaping reactionary invective upon his opponent, JAMES COOLIDGE CARTER, Choate constructed a framework for the Court's decision; he attacked the tax as a DIRECT TAX on income from real property, history and judicial precedent to the contrary.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

HICKS, FREDERICK C. 1931 Joseph Hodges Choate. Dictionary of American Biography, Vol. 4. New York: Scribner's.

CHOICE OF LAW

In the system of American FEDERALISM, some transactions and phenomena are governed by supreme federal law and others by state law. In the latter situations, multistate transactions frequently raise the question which state's law is to be applied. "Choice of law" refers to the process of making this determination. Choice of law may usefully be viewed as an issue of distribution of legislative or lawmaking powers "horizontally" among the states in those areas not governed by overriding federal law.

A basic principle of choice of law theory under the Constitution is that determination of the allocation of lawmaking power among the states in such circumstances is, itself, an issue of state law. Each state has its own law on choice of law, which may differ from the choice of law doctrines of other states and which is applied in actions brought in that state both in state courts and in DIVERSITY JURISDICTION cases in federal courts. Thus the outcome of litigation involving a multistate transaction may in theory be determined by the choice of the forum in which the suit is brought. The basic principle might have been the contrary—that is, that conflicts of state laws within the federal system should be resolved by a comprehensive supreme federal law of choice of law, binding on the states. Such a body of national conflict of laws doctrine might have been derived from the FULL FAITH AND CREDIT clause, the COMMERCE CLAUSE, or the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Alternatively, supreme federal choice of law doctrine might have been developed as FEDERAL COMMON LAW pertaining to the mutual relationships among the states in the federal union. Or Congress, under various ENUMERATED POWERS, might have enacted federal choice of law principles. None of these courses has been followed; the law of choice of law in the federal system has not developed, judicially or legislatively, as supreme federal law. The states remain the primary determiners of the legal aspects of their mutual relationships within the federal union.

A state's law of choice of law, like all state law, is subject to constitutional limitations. Two such provisions have occasionally been applied so as to limit state choice of law principles, but in general these are not significant limitations.

In an occasional early case the Supreme Court held that the application of the forum's own law to a multistate transaction violated due process, even though the forum state did have a legitimate interest in having its law prevail. Under more recent doctrine there would be no due process violation in such circumstances. The modern principle, enunciated in Allstate Insurance Co. v. Hague (1981), is that "for a State's substantive law to be selected in a constitutionally permissible manner, that State must have a significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts, creating state interests, such that choice of its law is neither arbitrary nor fundamentally unfair." The due process clause can also limit a state's choice of law doctrine where there would be unfair surprise to a litigant in the choice of law otherwise proposed to be made.

The Court also has occasionally held that the full faith and credit clause requires a state to apply the law of another state even though the forum state does have a legitimate interest in applying its own law. (Thus in a case of claims for benefits against a fraternal benefit association, the Court held that a national interest in having a single uniform law determine the mutual rights and obligations of members required all states to apply the law of the place where the association was incorporated.) In general, however, the full faith and credit clause does not require that a forum state apply the law of another state unless it would violate due process for the forum to apply its own law.

Other provisions of the Constitution are potentially applicable as limitations on state choice of law doctrine. The commerce clause might be the basis for channeling state choice of law principles regarding multistate commercial transactions. The EQUAL PROTECTION clause and the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of Article IV might be held to limit distinctions made in state choice of law doctrine based upon the residence or domicile of parties to a transaction. These constitutional provisions have not been so developed.

HAROLD W. HOROWITZ
(1986)

Bibliography

SYMPOSIUM 1981 Choice-of-Law. UC Davis Law Review 14: 837–917.
——— 1981 Choice of Law Theory after Allstate Insurance Co. v. Hague. Hofstra Law Review 10:1–211.

CHOICE OF LAW AND CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

CHOICE OF LAW (also called conflict of laws or conflicts law) is a body of legal DOCTRINE that seeks to provide a basis for choosing a substantive rule (for example, in tort or contract law) over the conflicting rule of another place. Rules conflict when their applications would produce opposing results in the same case, and when the relation of each place to the controversy makes it plausible for the rule of either place to govern. Conflicts law is usually state COMMON LAW, applied either by state courts or by federal courts in exercise of the latter's DIVERSITY JURISDICTION.

Courts periodically engage in conflicts localism. That is, they choose local state substantive law when the forum state's relation to the controversy is clearly less important than that of the place providing conflicting law. These decisions unfairly damage nonforum litigants, exhibit disrespect to nonforum governments, and undermine principles of order and uniformity in the law. The FULL FAITH AND CREDIT clause, the DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION clauses of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, the COMMERCE CLAUSE, and the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of Article IV could in various ways be read to protect these interests. But the Supreme Court rarely intervenes under the Constitution.

The Court makes serious use of only the first two of the clauses listed above, merging them into a single test. According to Allstate Ins. Co. v. Hague (1981), "[F]or a State's substantive law to be selected in a constitutionally permissible manner, that State must have a significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts creating state interests, such that choice of its law is neither arbitrary nor fundamentally unfair."

Applying the Hague test in Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts (1985), the Court held unconstitutional the attempt of Kansas courts in a nation-wide CLASS ACTION to apply local law to some claims that had no connection with the state. Despite the result, the Court's analysis in Shutts reinforced its minimalist view of the Constitution in choice of law. The Court deemed Kansas to have failed the combined full faith and credit and due process test only after concluding that Kansas had no interest in regulating the claims and that application of Kansas law to the claims would disturb the reasonable expectations of the defendant. Not only do state and lower federal courts remain free to apply local substantive law when demonstrating state interest, however modest, in determining the merits of the controversy; they may be free to apply their law even when the state has no such interest, when there is no showing that such would disturb the reasonable expectations of a party.

Commentators have criticized the Court's reluctance to correct conflicts abuse, and they have offered a variety of constitutional theories for more extensive oversight of choice of law. Yet the Court's restraint may be defensible. Constitutional justifications for greater Supreme Court intervention share so fully the mainstream values of choice of law that, should the Court begin to give serious weight to the former, it might be unable to find a logical stopping point short of constitutionalizing the entire subject—an option the Court has disdained.

GENE R. SHREVE
(2000)

Bibliography

LAYCOCK, DOUGLAS 1992 Equal Citizens of Equal and Territorial States: The Constitutional Foundations of Choice of Law. Columbia Law Review 92:249–337.
REESE, WILLIS L. M. 1978 Legislative Jurisdiction. Columbia Law Review 78:1587–1608.
SHREVE, GENE R. 1996 Choice of Law and the Forgiving Constitution. Indiana Law Journal 71:271–296.
WEINBERG, LOUISE 1982 Choice of Law and Minimal Scrutiny. University of Chicago Law Review 49:440–488.

CHRISTIAN RIGHT

See: Religious Fundamentalism

CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS v. UNITED STATES
136 U.S. 1 (1890)

The Mormon Church was granted a charter of incorporation in February 1851 by the so-called State of Deseret; later an act of the territorial legislature of Utah confirmed the charter. In 1887 Congress, having plenary power over the TERRITORIES, repealed the charter and directed the seizure and disposal of church property.

Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY wrote for the Court. He held that the power of Congress over the territories was sufficient to repeal an act of incorporation. He also held that once the Mormon Church became a defunct CORPORATION, Congress had power to reassign its property to legitimate religious and charitable uses, as near as practicable to those intended by the original donors. The claim of RELIGIOUS FREEDOM could not immunize the Mormon Church against the congressional conclusion that, because of its sponsorship of polygamy, it was an undesirable legal entity.

Chief Justice MELVILLE WESTON FULLER dissented, joined by Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD and Justice L. Q. C. LAMAR. Fuller objected to according Congress such sweeping power over property.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

CHURCH OF THE LUKUMI BABALU AYE, INC. v. CITY OF HIALEAH
508 U.S. 520 (1993)

The Lukumi religion, of West African origin, migrated to Cuba in the nineteenth century with the slave population, and became known as Santería; in our own time Lukumi has migrated to Florida. Several important rituals require the sacrifice of food animals to orishas, the Lukumi pantheon of spiritual beings. This practice led the City of Hialeah to enact several ordinances prohibiting animal sacrifice. The Supreme Court unanimously held that these ordinances violated the free exercise clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT because they had "targeted" religious practices. Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY wrote for the Court.

The city argued that the ordinances were valid means to protect public health and prevent cruelty to animals. But, the Court said, the "targeting" of religion was demonstrated by the ordinances' references to "sacrifice" and to "certain religions," and more generally by their overinclusiveness (e.g., forbidding ritual slaughtering even in licensed slaughterhouses) and underinclusiveness (e.g., exempting Kosher slaughtering and leaving unregulated both hunting and slaughtering for food purposes). Kennedy also said "targeting" was evident in statements of city council members indicating a motivation to stamp out the Lukumi religion. Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, joined by Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, dissociated himself from this view, saying that subjective motive was irrelevant; "targeting" was to be found in the words of the ordinances.

Justices DAVID H. SOUTER and HARRY A. BLACKMUN (joined by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR), concurring, suggested reconsideration of the holding in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990) that the free exercise clause has no application to incidental effects on RELIGIOUS LIBERTY caused by laws of general application. If, as Lukumi suggests, "targeting" can be proved by showings of overinclusiveness and underinclusiveness, government officials will be well advised to offer legitimate (nontargeted) reasons for the actions that have restricted religious freedom. A judicial inquiry into "targeting" may, as in Lukumi, lead to an inquiry into the weight of asserted government interests. Such inquiries have the potential to undermine the "rule" of Smith, even if Smith escapes overruling.

KENNETH L. KARST
(2000)

Bibliography

KARST, KENNETH L. 1993 Religious Freedom and Equal Citizenship: Reflections on Lukumi. Tulane Law Review 69:335–372.

CIRCUIT COURTS

The JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 fashioned a decentralized circuit court system. The boundaries of the three circuits coincided with the boundaries of the states they encompassed, a practice that opened them to state and sectional political influences and legal practices. The act assigned two Supreme Court Justices to each circuit to hold court along with a district judge in the state where the circuit court met. (After 1794, a single Justice and a district judge were a quorum.) The circuit-riding provision brought federal authority and national political views to the new and distant states, but also compelled the Justices to imbibe local political sentiments and legal practices.

For a century questions about the administrative efficiency, constitutional roles, and political responsibilities of these courts provoked heated debate. In the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801, Federalists sought to replace the Justices with an independent six-person circuit court judiciary, but one year later the new Jeffersonian Republican majority in Congress eliminated the circuit judgeships and restored the Justices to circuit duties, although they left the number of circuits at six. (See JUDICIARY ACTS OF 1802.) Subsequent territorial expansion prompted the addition of new circuits and new Justices until both reached nine in the Judiciary Act of 1837. Slave state interests opposed further expansion because they feared the loss of their five-to-four majority on the high court. Congress in 1855 did create a special circuit court and judgeship for the Northern District of California to expedite land litigation.

Significant structural and jurisdictional changes accompanied the CIVIL WAR and RECONSTRUCTION. The Judiciary Act of 1869 established a separate circuit court judiciary and assigned one judge to each of the nine new circuits that stretched from coast to coast. Justices retained circuit-riding duties although the 1869 act and subsequent legislation required less frequent attendance.

Historically, these courts had exercised ORIGINAL and APPELLATE JURISDICTION in cases involving the criminal law of the United States, in other areas where particular statutes granted jurisdiction, and in cases resting on diversity of citizenship. The Judiciary Act of 1869 strengthened the appellate responsibilities of the circuit courts by denying litigants access to the Supreme Court unless the amount in controversy exceeded $5,000. The Jurisdiction and Removal Act of 1875 established a general FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION and made it possible for, among others, interstate CORPORATIONS to seek the friendly forum of the federal as opposed to the state courts. The 1875 measure also transferred some of the original jurisdiction of the circuit courts to the district courts. However, because the circuit courts were given increased appellate responsibilities, along with only modest adjustments in staffing, their dockets became congested. The resulting delay in appeals, combined with similar congestion in the Supreme Court, persuaded Congress in 1891 to establish the Circuit Courts of Appeals which became the nation's principal intermediate federal appellate courts. (See CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS ACT.) Although the old circuit courts became anachronisms, Congress delayed abolishing them until 1911.

Throughout the nineteenth century Supreme Court Justices held ambivalent attitudes toward circuit duty. The Justices complained about the rigors of circuit travel and the loss of time from responsibilities in the nation's capital, but most of them recognized that circuit judging offered a unique constitutional forum free from the immediate scrutiny of their brethren on the Court. "It is only as a Circuit Judge that the Chief Justice or any other Justice of the Supreme Court has, individually, any considerable power," Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE observed in 1868.

Circuit court judges contributed to the nationalization of American law and the economy. Justice JOSEPH STORY, in the First Circuit, for example, broadly defined the federal ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION. In perhaps the most important circuit court decision of the nineteenth century, Story held, in De Lovio v. Boit (1815), that this jurisdiction extended to all maritime contracts, including insurance policies, and to all torts and injuries committed on the high seas and in ports and harbors within the ebb and flow of the tide. This decision, coupled with Story's opinion eight years later in Chamberlain v. Chandler (1823), expanded federal control over admiralty and maritime-related economic activity and added certainty to contracts involving shipping and commerce.

The circuit courts extended national constitutional protection to property, contract, and corporate rights. Justice WILLIAM PATERSON'S 1795 decision on circuit in VAN HORNE'S LESSEE V. DORRANCE was the first significant statement in the federal courts on behalf of VESTED RIGHTS. But in 1830 Justice HENRY BALDWIN anticipated by seven years the PUBLIC USE doctrine later embraced by the Supreme Court. In Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co. he held that state legislatures could take private property only for public use, and that creation of a monopoly by a public charter voided its public nature. As new forms of corporate property emerged in the post-Civil War era, the circuit courts offered protection through the CONTRACT CLAUSE. In the early and frequently cited case of Gray v. Davis (1871) a circuit court held, and the Supreme Court subsequently affirmed, that a legislative act incorporating a railroad constituted a contract between the state and the company, and a state constitutional provision annulling that charter violated the contract clause.

The circuit courts' most dramatic nationalizing role involved commercial jurisprudence. Through their DIVERSITY JURISDICTION the circuit courts used SWIFT V. TYSON (1842) to build a FEDERAL COMMON LAW of commerce, thus encouraging business flexibility, facilitating investment security, and reducing costs to corporations. After the Civil War these courts eased limitations on the formation and operation of corporations in foreign states (In Re Spain, 1891), supported bondholders' rights, allowed forum shopping (Osgood v. The Chicago, Danville, and Vincennes R. R. Co., 1875), and favored employers in fellow-servant liability cases.

Ambivalence, contradiction, and frustration typified circuit court decisions involving civil and political rights. In 1823 Justice BUSHROD WASHINGTON, in CORFIELD V. CORYELL, held that the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause guaranteed equal treatment of out-of-state citizens as to those privileges and immunities that belonged of right to citizens of all free governments, and which had at all times been enjoyed by citizens of the several states. After 1866 some circuit judges attempted to expand this narrow interpretation. Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY held, in Live-Stock Dealers' & Butchers' Ass'n v. Crescent City Live-Stock Landing & Slaughter-House Co. (1870), that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT protected the privileges and immunities of whites and blacks as national citizens against STATE ACTION. In 1871 the Circuit Court for the Southern District of Alabama, in United States v. Hall, decided that under the Fourteenth Amendment Congress had the power to protect by appropriate legislation all rights in the first eight amendments. And in Ho Ah Kow v. Nunan (1879) Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD struck down as CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT, based on the Eighth Amendment and the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, a San Francisco ordinance that required Chinese prisoners to have their hair cut to a length of one inch from their scalps.

These attempts to nationalize civil rights had little immediate impact. The Supreme Court in 1873 rejected

Bradley's reading of the Fourteenth Amendment, and in 1871 the Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina in United States v. Crosby concluded that the right of a person to be secure in his or her home was not a right, privilege, or immunity granted by the Constitution. Neither the Supreme Court nor any other circuit court adopted the theory of congressional power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment set forth in Hall. Justice Field's Nunan opinion was most frequently cited in dissenting rather than majority opinions.

Political rights under the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT fared only slightly better. In United States v. Given (1873) the Circuit Court for the District of Delaware held that the Fifteenth Amendment did not limit congressional action to cases where states had denied or abridged the right to vote by legislation. In the same year, however, Justice WARD HUNT, in United States v. Anthony, concluded that the right or privilege of voting arose under state constitutions and that the states might restrict it to males.

Despite a regional structure and diverse personnel, these circuit courts placed national over state interests, reinforced the supremacy of federal power, promoted national economic development, and enhanced the position of interstate corporations. However, in matters of civil and political rights they not only disagreed about the scope of federal powers but also confronted a Supreme Court wedded to a traditional state-centered foundation for these rights.

KERMIT L. HALL
(1986)

Bibliography

FRANKFURTER, FELIX and LANDIS, JAMES M. 1927 The Business of the Supreme Court: A Study in the Federal Judicial System. Pages 3–86. New York: Macmillan.

HALL, KERMIT L. 1975 The Civil War Era as a Crucible for Nationalizing the Lower Federal Courts. Prologue: The Journal of the National Archives 7:177–186.

SWISHER, CARL B. 1974 The Taney Period, 1836–1864. Volume IV of The Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court of the United States. Pages 248–292. New York: Macmillan.

CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS ACT
26 Stat. 826 (1891)

The first substantial revision of the federal court system since its formation (except for the abortive JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801), this act established a badly needed level of courts just below the Supreme Court: the UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS. Senator WILLIAM EVARTS led the reform movement to relieve pressure on the Supreme Court docket by providing intermediate appellate review for most district and circuit court decisions. By keeping the CIRCUIT COURTS but abolishing their APPELLATE JURISDICTION, Congress maintained two courts with substantially similar JURISDICTION, causing confusion until the circuit courts were abolished in the JUDICIAL CODE of 1911. The act established direct Supreme Court review, bypassing the courts of appeals, in cases of "infamous" crimes (an ill-considered description that actually increased the Court's business and had to be deleted in 1897), and introduced the principle of discretionary Supreme Court review by WRIT OF CERTIORARI.

The basic structure of today's system of appellate review of federal court decisions remains as it was established in the 1891 Act.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

FRANKFURTER, FELIX and LANDIS, JAMES M. 1927 The Business of the Supreme Court. New York: Macmillan.

CITIES AND THE CONSTITUTION

Cities, unlike STATES, are not mentioned in the Constitution. Many other important collective institutions in our society, such as CORPORATIONS, are not mentioned in the Constitution either. In its effort to determine the constitutional status of cities, the Supreme Court has had to decide whether to treat cities like states or like corporations. In fact, the Court has been required to answer two separate questions concerning the constitutional status of cities. First, do cities, like private corporations, have rights that are protected from governmental power by the Constitution? Second, do cities, like states, exercise governmental power which is limited by the Constitution?

At the time the Constitution was written and adopted, there was no legal distinction between cities and other corporations. Neither WILLIAM BLACKSTONE's commentaries, published the decade before the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, nor the first treatise on corporations, published by Stuart Kyd in 1793, categorized corporations in a way that would distinguish the Corporation of the City of New York, for example, from manufacturing and commercial concerns or from universities. Each of these entities was considered a lay corporation, formed by its members and given legal status by a grant of power from the state. The ability of these corporations to pursue the purposes for which their charter was granted was a right that needed protection from governmental power. At the same time, however, all corporations wielded power delegated to them by the state and, therefore, posed a danger of abuse that required subjection to popular control.

The Supreme Court's first important attempt to settle the constitutional status of corporations created a distinction between cities and other corporations. In DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819) Justice JOSEPH STORY articulated a public/private distinction for American corporations, classifying cities with states and distinguishing them from private corporations. "Public corporations," he said, "are generally esteemed such as exist for public political purposes only, such as towns, cities, parishes, and counties; and in many respects they are so, although they involve some private interests; but strictly speaking, public corporations are such only as founded by the government for public purposes, where the whole interests belong also to the government."

When considering whether cities should have rights that protect them against state control, the Supreme Court has largely accepted Justice Story's proposition that the cities' whole interest belongs to the government; it has treated cities as if they were the state itself. At least insofar as they are considered "public" entities, cities, unlike private corporations, have virtually no constitutional protection against STATE ACTION. The Supreme Court dramatically summarized the nature of state power over cities in Hunter v. Pittsburg (1907):

> Municipal corporations are political subdivisions of the State created as convenient agencies for exercising such of the governmental powers of the State as may be entrusted to them. . . . The State, therefore, at its pleasure may modify or withdraw all such powers, may take without compensation such property, hold it itself, or vest it in other agencies, expand or contract the territorial area, unite the whole or part with another municipality, repeal the charter and destroy the corporation. . . . In all these respects the State is supreme, and its legislative body, conforming its actions to the state constitution, may do as it will, unrestrained by any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

The Court in Hunter indicated, however, that there might be a limit to state power over cities, one it articulated in terms of a public/private distinction within the concept of a city. To some extent, cities act like private corporations, and this private aspect of city government, the Court said, could receive the same constitutional protection as other private interests. Even Justice Story had recognized in Dartmouth College that cities are not purely public entities but "involve some private interests" as well. But the proposition that cities are entitled to protection from state power under the Constitution in their "proprietary" (as contrasted to their "governmental") capacities has not yielded them much constitutional protection. The Supreme Court has never struck down a state statute on the grounds that it invaded such a private sphere. Indeed, in Trenton v. New Jersey (1923) Justice PIERCE BUTLER, noting that such a sphere could not readily be defined, expressed doubt whether there was a private sphere that limited the states' power over their own municipalities.

Whatever limited protection the Court has given cities under the Constitution has involved their public and not their private capacities. In GOMILLION V. LIGHTFOOT (1960) the Court held that the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT restricted the state's ability to define the boundaries of its cities in a way that infringed on its citizens' VOTING RIGHTS; the Court narrowed the extravagant description of state power over cities in Hunter by construing the Court's language in that case to be applicable only to the particular constitutional provisions considered there. But the Court has not subsequently expanded on its distinction between the Fifteenth Amendment and other constitutional provisions, such as the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and the CONTRACT CLAUSE, as vehicles for limiting state power over cities. No subsequent case has given cities constitutional protection against state power.

From 1976 to 1985, during the short life of NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976), the Supreme Court articulated the most expansive constitutional protection ever given cities, again a protection for their public and not their private activities. By treating them as if they were states the Court limited the power of the federal government to regulate cities; it held that cities, like states, were immunized from federal control under the TENTH AMENDMENT insofar as federal interference "directly impaired their ability to structure integral operations in areas of traditional governmental functions." In GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985), however, National League of Cities was overruled. One reason for OVERRULING National League of Cities, the Court said, was that there was no practical way to make a public/private distinction between "traditional governmental functions" and other state and city functions. Hence, the Court reasoned, there was no principled basis for choosing some areas of state or city activity over others to be immune from federal control as a constitutional matter.

There is a second question concerning the constitutional status of cities: to what extent are cities like states, and, therefore, subject to those constitutional provisions that affect the power of states? The Supreme Court's answer to this question has been complex.

For some purposes, the Court has treated cities like states. City power is like state power, for example, in that it is equally limited by the DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment and by the dormant COMMERCE CLAUSE. On the other hand, the Court has held that cities are not like states for purposes of the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT (dealing with states' immunity from suits in federal court). In a number of nonconstitutional cases the Supreme Court has also sought to distinguish cities from states. "We are a nation not of city-states but of States," the Court said in Community Communications Co. v. City of Boulder (1982), holding cities, like private corporations but unlike states, liable to federal antitrust laws.

Indeed, sometimes the Court has treated cities in a way that distinguishes them from both states and corporations. In MONELL V. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1978) the Supreme Court interpreted SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE to allow damage suits against cities when they commit constitutional violations. City action is like state action in that cities are subject to constitutional limitations applicable to states. But states, unlike cities, have immunities under the Eleventh Amendment against suits in federal court to enforce these constitutional limitations. Thus, under Monell, cities are liable under section 1983 for constitutional violations in situations in which neither the states (because of the Eleventh Amendment) nor private corporations (because their power is not subject to constitutional limitations) would be liable.

Finally, at times cities are considered like states and private corporations simultaneously. Both cities and states can act in the marketplace just as private corporations do. Thus in White v. Massachusetts Council of Construction Employers (1983) the Supreme Court held that the commerce clause does not restrict a city's ability to require its contractors to hire city residents as long as it is acting as a market participant and not as a market regulator. The Court thus extended to cities the immunity from commerce clause restrictions that it had previously provided states when they act as market participants. The practical effect of the White case, however, is limited. In United Building & Construction Trades Council v. Camden (1984) the Court held that the privileges and immunities clause, unlike the commerce clause, limited a city's ability to require its contractors to hire city residents whether or not it acts as a market participant. In Camden the Court treated cities like states but distinguished them from corporations; the power of states and cities, unlike that of corporations, is restrained by the privileges and immunities clause of the Constitution.

The cities' historic link with corporations and their assimilation in the nineteenth century to the status of states have given them a divided status under the Constitution. Although the predominant linkage has been between cities and states, there remain occasions when the prior linkage with corporations is emphasized. The Court's ability to conceptualize cities as either states or corporations (indeed, to conceptualize them as both simultaneously or as distinguishable from both) opens up a multitude of possibilities for the Court as it defines the relationship between cities and the Constitution in the future.

GERALD E. FRUG
(1986)

Bibliography

CLARK, GORDON 1985 Judges and the Cities: Interpreting Local Autonomy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

FRUG, GERALD 1980 The City as a Legal Concept. Harvard Law Review 93:1059–1154.

HARTOG, HENDRIK 1983 Public Property and Private Power: The Corporation of the City of New York in American Law, 1730–1870. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

MICHELMAN, FRANK 1977–1978 Political Markets and Community Self-Determination: Competing Judicial Models of Local Government Legitimacy Indiana Law Journal 53:145–206.

CITIZENSHIP
(Historical Development)

The concept of citizenship articulated during the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and adjusted to the special circumstances of an ethnically diverse federal republic in the nineteenth century developed from English theories of allegiance and of the subject's status. Enunciated most authoritatively by Sir EDWARD COKE in CALVIN'S CASE (1608), English law held that natural subject status involved a perpetual, immutable relationship of allegiance and protection between subject and king analogous to the bond between parent and child. All persons born within the king's allegiance gained this status by birth. Conquest or NATURALIZATION by Parliament could extend the status to the foreign-born, but subjects adopted in such a manner were by legal fiction considered bound by the same perpetual allegiance as the native-born. The doctrine "once a subject, always a subject" reflected Coke's emphasis on the natural origins of the subject-king relationship and militated against the emergence of concepts of voluntary membership and EXPATRIATION.

The appearance of new SOCIAL COMPACT ideas modified but did not entirely supersede traditional concepts. By the mid-eighteenth century, Lockean theorists derived subject status from the individual's consent to leave the state of nature and join with others to form a society. To such theorists the individual subject was bound by the majority and owed allegiance to the government established by that majority. Barring the dissolution of society itself or the consent of the majority, expressed through Parliament, individual subjects were still held to a perpetual allegiance.

Colonial conditions eroded these ideas. Colonial naturalization policies especially contributed to a subtle transformation of inherited attitudes. Provincial governments welcomed foreign-born settlers in order to promote population growth vital to physical security and economic prosperity. Offering political and economic rights in exchange for the ALIEN's contribution to the general welfare of the community, the colonists underscored the contractual, consent-based aspects of membership that had been subordinated in English law to older notions of perpetual allegiance. Imperial administrators, concerned to protect England's monopoly of colonial trade, declared in 1700 that colonial naturalization could confer subject status only within the confines of the admitting colony; although a parliamentary statute of 1740 established administrative procedures whereby a colonial court could vest an alien with a subject status valid throughout the empire, such actions merely reinforced the conclusion that the origins, extent, and effects of subject status were determined not by nature but by political and legal compacts.

When Americans declared independence in 1776 they initially relied on the traditional linkage of allegiance and protection to define citizenship in the new republican states. Congress's resolution of June 24, 1776, declared that all persons then resident in the colonies and deriving protection from the laws were members of and owed allegiance to those colonies. Lockean theory was also useful, for if each colony were considered a separate society merely changing its form of government, then loyalist minorities could still be considered subject to the will of patriot majorities. Yet forced allegiance clashed with the idea that all legitimate government required the free consent of the governed. Wartime TREASON prosecutions contributed to a gradual reformulation of the theory of citizenship that stressed the volitional character of allegiance. Employing a doctrine stated most clearly in the Pennsylvania case of Respublica v. Chapman (1781), American courts came to hold that citizenship must originate in an act of individual consent.

Republican citizenship required the consent of the community as well as of the individual, and legislators concerned with establishing naturalization policies concentrated on defining the proper qualifications for membership. This preoccupation obscured the ill-defined nature of the status itself. The Revolution had created a sense of community that transcended state boundaries; the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION implied that state citizenship carried with it rights in other states as well (Article IV). Framers of the United States Constitution perpetuated this ambiguity: section 2 of Article IV provided that "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES of citizens in the several States." Questions concerning the nature and relationship of state and national citizenship would not be resolved until the CIVIL WAR.

The Revolutionary idea that citizenship began with the individual's consent extended logically to the idea of expatriation. Although some states acknowledged this principle, it raised delicate questions of federal relations after 1789. The problem appeared as early as 1795 in Talbot v. Janson, when the United States Supreme Court wrestled with the question whether a Virginia expatriation procedure could release a citizen from national as well as state allegiance. Unwilling to resolve that issue, the Court looked to Congress to provide a general policy of expatriation. Although the propriety of such a measure was discussed a number of times during the antebellum period, congressional action foundered on the same issue of federal relations. As long as the question of the primacy of state or United States citizenship remained open, the idea that citizenship rested on individual choice would be more valid for aliens seeking naturalization than for persons whose citizenship derived from birth.

The problematic character of dual state and national citizenship appeared in its most intractable form in disputes over the status of free blacks. Many northern states acknowledged free blacks as birthright citizens, though often at the cost of conceding that important political rights were not necessarily attached to that status. From the 1820s on, slave states increasingly resisted the contention that such citizenship carried constitutional guarantees of "privileges and immunities" in their own jurisdictions. ROGER B. TANEY's opinion in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) that national citizenship was restricted to white state citizens of 1789, persons naturalized by Congress, and their descendants alone marked the final effort, short of SECESSION, to restrict the scope of citizenship.

The FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT finally defined national citizenship as the product of naturalization or birth within the JURISDICTION of the United States, leaving state citizenship dependent upon residency. On July 27, 1868, Congress declared that the right of expatriation was a fundamental principle of American government, thus allowing persons born to citizenship the same right as aliens to choose their ultimate allegiance.

JAMES H. KETTNER
(1986)

Bibliography

KETTNER, JAMES H. 1978 The Development of American Citizenship, 1608–1870. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

ROCHE, JOHN P. 1949 The Early Development of United States Citizenship. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

CITIZENSHIP
(Theory)

Article I, section B, of the Constitution authorizes Congress "to establish a uniform Rule of NATURALIZATION." The power afforded Congress in this spare textual authorization has long been interpreted as plenary, effectively insulating from constitutional challenge congressional decisions about whom to admit to the national community. The theory of national community expressed through this constitutional interpretation was summarily sketched by the Supreme Court nearly a century ago in Nishimura Eiku v. United States (1891): "It is an accepted maxim of international law, that every sovereign nation has the power, inherent in SOVEREIGNTY, and essential to self-preservation, to forbid the entrance of foreigners within its domain, or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe."

This still regnant theory of sovereignty has become, for most people, entirely natural and unimposed. Its inchoate justification, articulated in abstract terms, does have a natural and necessary air: one can understand nations asserting an absolute right to decide whom to admit or to exclude as advancing the universal right to form communities and the right to keep them distinctive and stable. While nations have grown significantly more interconnected and while the world's creatures are one for some important purposes, the notion of protecting the right to form and maintain special communities within larger communities resonates with our understanding of how America became a nation. Still, even for one who believes in protecting the national community, a moral question remains: what constitutes membership in the political community to be protected?

In a strictly positive sense, the answer is that citizenship in this country has been conferred by birth (either in the United States or abroad to American parents) or by naturalization. Although only "a natural born Citizen" can be President, naturalized citizens are otherwise the formal equals of citizens by birth. Moreover, the Constitution extends many of its protections to "persons" or "people" so that ALIENS are protected in much the same way as citizens even before they are naturalized.

But the United States has been a national community not readily inclined to ask what constitutes membership in the political community—or perhaps more accurately, not genuinely curious about the answer or willing to give it constitutional significance. Congress has long presumed that those who currently share citizenship (citizens and, during most but not all historical periods, documented residents) constitute the community to be protected and maintained.

The judiciary, in turn, has long deferred to whatever Congress decides. This deference, while varying across the range of immigration law disputes, radically diverges from the political relationship between judiciary and legislature that informs most constitutional jurisprudence. Consider a range of congressional "membership" decisions and the corresponding judicial response: Exclusion decisions and procedures are treated as extraconstitutional; congressional power to classify aliens is effectively unconstrained by EQUAL PROTECTION values; DEPORTATION is treated as a civil and not a criminal proceeding, thereby denying certain constitutional protections expressly limited or interpreted to apply only to criminal proceedings; the power to detain remains unlimited by any coherent set of values, and is available effectively to imprison individuals and groups for long periods and under disreputable conditions; immigration judges remain intertwined with government agencies responsible for administering and enforcing immigration law. In so deferring to Congress, the judiciary either denies the constitutional relevance of the always amending character of the national community or indulges absolutely Congress's habitual response to what constitutes membership in the political community.

If together Congress and the courts "freed" us from being genuinely curious about ourselves, they were not without help in constructing this reality. It has been commonplace for many to deny that citizenship does or should play a central role in our political community. No less a figure in recent constitutional jurisprudence than ALEXANDER M. BICKEL insisted that citizenship "was a simple idea for a simple government"; others entirely ignored the question, as if a view on membership in the process of self-determination were not itself constitutive of the national community's very nature. But, of course, citizenship in the United States never has been a simple idea. Naturalization laws, implementing the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, were not extended to persons of African descent until 1870; citizens of Mexican descent were deported in 1930 raids; citizens of Japanese descent were interned during WORLD WAR II because of their ancestry; women citizens were not allowed to vote until 1920; Puerto Ricans and people of other conquered territories were afforded only second-class citizenship status. Yet the relationship of these and other events to our conception of United States citizenship has been far more often ignored than attended to, as if the denial of contradictory acts would somehow save the regnant theory of national community.

These efforts notwithstanding, the experience of community is beginning to challenge the prevailing constitutionalized attitude toward membership in the political community. The presence of millions of undocumented workers—sharing neighborhoods, burdens, and laws—has prompted intense and frequently conflicting responses to the general question of citizenship and its role in the political community. In PLYLER V. DOE (1982) the Supreme Court compelled the state of Texas to provide the children of undocumented workers with a free public education. At the same time, attention to the relationship of citizenship to the political community has led the Court to intensify its scrutiny of laws that deny documented residents access to certain occupations. State laws barring aliens from permanent civil service positions and from the practice of law and civil engineering have been struck down. But where the position is intimately related to the process of democratic self-government (the so-called political function exception), the Court has upheld laws requiring police, public teachers, and probation officers to be citizens.

What this communitarian challenge foreshadows defies facile forecasting; a theory so long dominant as ours toward community membership and sovereignty resists predictable or simple change. Still, in its unwillingness to be silenced, in its refusal to accept uncritically the regnant theory, today's challenge focuses attention on our history, and on the relationship of work to full political life. At least in this sense, there is the hope that we will no longer blithely disregard the values formally expressed in our vision of citizenship. After all, whom we acknowledge as full members of the political community tells us much about who we are and why we remain together as a nation.

GERALD P. LÓPEZ
(1986)

CITIZENSHIP
(Update 1)

American citizenship can be obtained in three ways. The most common way, citizenship by birth in the United States (jus soli), is secured by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT citizenship clause. Although customary exceptions to this principle exist (e.g., children born on foreign vessels or of diplomatic personnel), this birthright citizenship has been understood (wrongly, I have argued) to extend even to native-born children of ALIENS in the country illegally or on a temporary visa.

A second route to citizenship is through NATURALIZATION. To naturalize, one must be a resident alien who has resided in the United States continuously for five years (a longer period than in Canada and the Scandinavian countries); be of good moral character; and demonstrate an ability to speak, read, and write English and a basic knowledge of United States government and history. These requirements are relaxed for certain individuals, such as spouses of U.S. citizens.

The third route to citizenship is through parentage (jus sanguinis). Statutory law enumerates a number of parentage categories, sometimes augmented by RESIDENCY REQUIREMENTS, that confer eligibility for citizenship on the child. The Supreme Court held in Rogers v. Bellei (1971) that in regulating this form of citizenship, Congress is not limited by the citizenship clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In recent years Congress has liberalized eligibility.

Dual and triple citizenships, which arise as a result of the combination of the American jus soli rule with the jus sanguinis rules of other nations, are tolerated and legally protected. Still, the government discourages multiple citizenship; aliens who wish to naturalize must renounce any prior allegiance, which may or may not effectively terminate their foreign citizenships.

U.S. citizenship, once acquired, is almost impossible to lose without the citizen's expressed consent. The Supreme Court has severely restricted the government's power to denationalize a citizen for disloyalty, divided allegiance, or other reasons. Birthright citizens cannot be deprived of their citizenship unless the govenment proves that they specifically intended to renounce it. Naturalized citizens who procured their citizenship through fraud or misrepresentation are subject to DENATURALIZATION, but to prevail the government must satisfy demanding standards, most recently defined in Kungys v. United States (1988). This tiny risk of denaturalization is the only permissible difference between naturalized and other citizens.

As a result of a steady expansion of the equal protection and due process principles, legal resident aliens today enjoy almost all the significant rights and obligations that citizens enjoy, including access to most public benefits. Only five differences are worth noting. Three of them are political: citizens, but not aliens, may vote, serve on juries, and serve in certain high elective ofices and certain high (and not so high) appointive ones. Modern practice (many states in the nineteenth century permitted aliens to vote) and political inertia, more than sound policy, probably account for the durability of these differences. A fourth difference, which congress has considered eliminating, is that citizens can bring their noncitizen family members to the United States more easily than aliens can. Finally, aliens are subject to DEPORTATION, although the actual risk of deportation for a long-term resident alien who does not engage in serious criminal behavior is very low.

This progressive convergence of the citizen and resident-alien statuses suggests some devaluation of American citizenship. As public philosophy, this devaluation carries with it certain dangers for the polity. But it also represents an immense gain for the liberal values of inclusiveness and equal treatment. By maximizing individual opportunity and preventing the formation of a legally disabled underclass, the equality and due process principles have fostered the social mobility and optimism that seem essential to the success of American democracy. Moreover, the constitutional JURISPRUDENCE through which this has been achieved is probably irreversible, reflecting fundamental dynamics in domestic law and international relations that enjoy widespread support.

The conception of political membership has grown steadily more fluid, functional, and context-dependent. Before the rise of the modern nation-state, political membership was based upon kinship and ethnic ties. Today, membership is a far more complex, variegated, multipurpose idea. For purposes such as voting, citizenship is the crucial status, whereas mere territorial presence suffices for attributing most constitutional rights. For purposes of participation in an economic common market, membership is constituted by supranational groupings, exemplified by the recently established United States-Canada free-trade zone and the still-evolving European Community.

We live in an increasingly integrated world. Transnational economic relationships are ubiquitous, international travel has become inexpensive, migratory pressures are enormous, environmental problems are often global, scientific and cultural exchanges are highly valued, and political cooperation among nations is more essential than ever before. Even within America's borders, citizenship represents an increasingly hollow ideal. It neither confers a distinctively advantageous status nor demands much of the individuals who possess it.

National citizenship, however, is not anachronistic. It provides a focus of political allegiance and emotional energy on a scale capable of satisfying deep human longings for solidarity, symbolic identification, and community. This is especially important in a liberal polity whose cosmopolitan aspirations for universal principles of human rights must somehow be balanced against the more parochial social commitments to family, ethnicity, locality, region, and nation. Although these political and emotional aspects of citizenship remain significant, American society seems resolved that little else of consequence shall be allowed to turn on citizenship. But within that general understanding and social consensus, the precise role of citizenship and the special rights and obligations that should attach to it are open questions. Here, only one proposition seems certain: Today's conceptions of citizenship may not be adequate to meet tomorrow's needs.

PETER H. SCHUCK
(1992)

Bibliography

BRUBAKER, W. R., ed. 1989 Immigration and the Politics of Citizenship in Europe and North America. New York: University Press of America.

SCHUCK, PETER and SMITH, ROGERS 1986 Citizenship Without Consent: Illegal Aliens in the American Polity. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

CITIZENSHIP
(Update 2)

The Supreme Court has declared American citizenship "a most precious right," regarded by many as "the highest hope of civilized men." Recognition of the importance of U.S. citizenship led the Court to hold in AFROYIM V. RUSK (1967) that Congress may not deprive a person of U.S. citizenship (other than in the case of wrongful NATURALIZATION) unless the person has a specific intent to relinquish it. American citizens may not be deported, and have the right to enter or return to the United States. Most citizens take these rights for granted, but they mark a significant distinction between the statuses of citizen and ALIEN.

The fundamental norm of U.S. citizenship law is the principle of jus soli—that all persons born in the United States are citizens at birth. The language of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT—written to overcome Chief Justice ROGER BROOKE TANEY's opinion in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857)—affirmed the COMMON LAW rule of jus soli. In UNITED STATES V. WONG KIM ARK (1898), decided at the height of constitutionalized American racism, the Court held that the children of Chinese immigrants born in the United States were citizens at birth, despite federal law prohibiting the naturalization of their parents.

Citizenship may also be acquired by descent (jus sanguinis) and through naturalization. Since 1790, federal statutes have permitted aliens in the United States to naturalize, and have granted citizenship at birth to persons born to American parents outside the United States. These sources of citizenship are not secured by the Fourteenth Amendment, and traditionally the Court has recognized broad congressional authority to distribute citizenship by statute largely immune from judicial scrutiny. However, in Miller v. Albright (1998), the Court was sharply divided over the constitutionality of a federal statute permitting U.S. citizen mothers to pass citizenship to NONMARITAL CHILDREN born outside the United States on easier terms than U.S. citizen fathers. A majority of the Justices indicated that they would invalidate the statute in a properly presented case.

Citizenship is at the same time universalistic and exclusionary. The Constitution forbids Congress from granting TITLES OF NOBILITY; in this republic, the office of citizen defines the class of governors. The concept of citizenship therefore pushes toward universal suffrage. So too, by defining membership in a polity, citizenship suggests a core class of right holders. In a famous formulation, T. H. Marshall noted that "[c]itizenship is a status bestowed on those who are full members of a community. All who possess the status are equal with respect to the rights and duties with which the status is endowed."

But formal equality on paper has rarely guaranteed equal treatment in life. Throughout American history large classes of citizens have been citizens in name only. Most adult Americans were not eligible to vote at the time of the Constitution's adoption, and discrimination based on race, gender, wealth, and other grounds has created huge political and economic inequalities among nominally "equal" citizens.

So too, laws regulating access to citizenship have included racial exclusions for more of our history than not. The naturalization act of 1790 limited eligible classes to "white persons." Following the CIVIL WAR, the statute was amended to include persons of "African descent"—a formulation that continued to prohibit Asian immigrants from naturalizing. The racial bars on naturalization were not fully removed until 1952. For several decades early in this century, federal law provided that citizen women who married foreigners lost U.S. citizenship for so long as the MARRIAGE lasted.

Despite this history, the constitutional claim of equal citizenship is a powerful one, and distinctions that seem natural in one era become unconstitutional denials of equal citizenship in another. But it is here that the exclusionary aspect of citizenship arises. By drawing a circle and designating those within the circle sovereign and equal, the concept of citizenship perforce treats those outside the circle (aliens) as less than full members. Justice BYRON R. WHITE recognized this implication of citizenship in Cabell v. Chávez-Salido (1982): "Self-government . . . begins by defining the scope of the community of the governed and thus of the governors as well: Aliens are by definition those outside of this community."

Does the Constitution necessarily link rights and citizenship? The term "citizen" does not appear in the BILL OF RIGHTS; and it has long been bedrock constitutional law that aliens residing in the United States are protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS, under the rule of YICK WO V. HOPKINS (1886), and enjoy most of the rights secured by other provisions of the Constitution. Furthermore, the Court has applied STRICT SCRUTINY to state regulations based on alienage (with an exception for political rights and offices). At the same time the Court has adopted a virtually toothless STANDARD OF REVIEW for federal statutes that draw distinctions on the basis of alienage. The Court's deference to Congress extends both to explicit regulations of IMMIGRATION and to statutes distinguishing aliens from citizens in the granting of federal benefits. As the Court stated expressly in Mathews v. Díaz (1976), "Congress regularly makes rules that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens[;] [and the] fact that an Act of Congress treats aliens differently from citizens does not in itself imply that such disparate treatment is 'invidious.' " Perhaps it is not an oxymoron to suggest that constitutional norms supply a "second-class citizenship" for aliens in the United States.

As the nation-state comes under challenge both from below (with claims for autonomy for subnational groups) and from above (with the establishment of supranational legal orders), the concept of citizenship has come under renewed focus. Proposals have been made to make citizenship "mean more"; and landmark changes in U.S. welfare policy in 1996 did just that by disentitling most future immigrants from federally supported welfare programs. Other proposals, of dubious constitutionality, would deny BIRTHRIGHT CITIZENSHIP to children born in the United States to undocumented aliens. Policies that grant significant benefits to citizens denied to aliens apparently have provided a substantial incentive to naturalization. The interesting question for those who seek to pour more content into citizenship is whether naturalizations based on a desire to preserve access to social programs in fact serve that goal.

The increasing frequency of dual nationality poses new questions for the meaning of citizenship. At the beginning of the twentieth century, dual nationality was disfavored. Prevailing INTERNATIONAL LAW norms pursued the goal of ensuring that every person was a member of one and only one nation-state. But migration and state practice have made dual nationality a more common phenomenon, arising usually from birth in one state to parents who are citizens of another state. In a significant shift in state practice, a number of countries are now permitting citizens who naturalize elsewhere to retain their original citizenship. Because the United States continues to admit large numbers of immigrants, it will likely face increasing numbers of dual nationals. The Constitution says nothing explicit about dual nationality. The Fourteenth Amendment's principle of jus soli (coupled with the laws of foreign states) is an important cause of dual nationality. Congress's Article I, section 8 power to adopt naturalization laws permits the federal government to either embrace, ignore, or seek to deter dual nationality of persons who attain U.S. citizenship by naturalization.

In the end, we face a constitutional conundrum. As a democracy, the United States needs a demos both as a location of SOVEREIGNTY and from which to designate a class of governors. (Although in the nineteenth century a number of states permitted ALIEN SUFFRAGE, those laws had been repealed by the early twentieth century.) But the Constitution does not define rights in terms of citizenship; rights are generally guaranteed as human rights, irrespective of status. Indeed, the Constitution imposes no specific obligations on citizens; and other than JURY SERVICE, there are precious few obligations imposed by law on citizens qua citizens. Aliens, then, benefit from a kind of constitutional citizenship, even if the citzenry is deemed the source of the Constitution and the day-to-day governance of the republic is reserved to citizens.

T. ALEXANDER ALEINIKOFF
(2000)

Bibliography

BRUBAKER, ROGERS 1992 Citizenship as Social Closure. Pages 21–34 in Citizenship and Nationhood in France and Germany. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1977 The Supreme Court, 1976 Term—Foreword: Equal Citizenship under the Fourteenth Amendment. Harvard Law Review 91:1–68.

MARSHALL, T. H. 1964 Citizenship and Social Class. Pages 65–122 in Class, Citizenship, and Social Development: Essays by T. H. Marshall. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday & Company, Inc.

SMITH, ROGERS 1997 Civic Ideals: Conflicting Visions of Citizenship in U.S. History. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

WALZER, MICHAEL 1989 Citizenship. Pages 211–219 in Terence Ball, James Farr, and Russell L. Hanson, eds., Political Innovation and Conceptual Change. Cambridge, Mass.: Cambridge University Press.

CITY COUNCIL OF LOS ANGELES v. TAXPAYERS FOR VINCENT
466 U.S. 789 (1984)

A Los Angeles ordinance prohibited the posting of signs on public property. Supporters of a candidate for city council sued to enjoin city officials from continuing to remove their signs from utility poles; they were joined as plaintiffs by the company that made and posted the signs for them. Of the 1,207 signs removed during one week of the campaign, 48 supported the candidate; most were commercial signs. The Supreme Court, 6–3, rejected constitutional attacks on the ordinance on its face and as applied.

The case seemed to call for analysis according to the principles governing rights of access to the PUBLIC FORUM—rights particularly valuable to people of limited means. Instead, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, for the Court, applied the set of rules announced in UNITED STATES V. O'BRIEN (1968), suggesting the possibility that those rules might in the future be applied routinely to FIRST AMENDMENT cases involving regulations that are not aimed at message content. Here the government interest in aesthetic values was substantial; the city had no purpose to suppress a particular message; and the law curtailed no more speech than was necessary to its purpose. In a bow to public forum reasoning, Stevens noted that other means of communication remained open to the plaintiffs.

The dissenters, led by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, argued that the assertion of aesthetic purposes deserved careful scrutiny to assure even-handed regulation, narrowly tailored to aesthetic objectives that were both comprehensively carried out and precisely defined. The City had made no such showing here, they contended.

Critics of the decision have suggested that it is part of a larger inegalitarian trend in BURGER COURT decisions concerning the FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, a trend exemplified by BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976) and HUDGENS V. NLRB (1976).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

CITY OF . . .

See: entry under name of city

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

Civil disobedience is a public, nonviolent, political act contrary to law usually done with the aim of bringing about a change in the law or policies of the government. The idea of civil disobedience is deeply rooted in our civilization, with examples evident in the life of Socrates, the early Christian society, the writings of Thomas Aquinas and Henry David Thoreau, and the Indian nationalist movement led by Gandhi.

The many occurrences of civil disobedience throughout American history have had a profound impact on the legal system and society as a whole. The Constitution does not provide immunity for those who practice civil disobedience, but because the United States is a representative democracy with deep respect for constitutional values, the system is uniquely responsive to acts of civil disobedience. Examples of civil disobedience in American history include the Quakers' refusal to pay taxes to support the colonial Massachusetts Church, the labor movement's use of the tactic in the early twentieth century, and citizens' withholding of taxes in protest of military and nuclear expenditures.

The fundamental justification for civil disobedience is that some persons feel bound by philosophy, religion, morality, or some other principle to disobey a law that they feel is unjust. As MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., wrote in his Letter from Birmingham Jail, "I submit that an individual who breaks a law that his conscience tells him is unjust, and willingly accepts the penalty by staying in jail to arouse the conscience of the community over its injustice, is in reality expressing the very highest respect for law." Civil disobedience is most justifiable when prior lawful attempts to rectify the situation have failed; and when the acts of civil disobedience are done to force the society to recognize the problem; when performed openly and publicly; and when the actor will accept the punishment. Many proponents urge that civil disobedience be used only in the most extreme cases, arguing that the Constitution provides many opportunities to voice one's grievances without breaking the law.

Opponents of civil disobedience see it as a threat to democratic society and the forerunner of violence and anarchy. The premise of stable democracy, they contend, is that the minority will accept the will of the majority. Opponents argue that the lack of a coherent theory of civil disobedience can result in the abuse of the tactic.

Civil disobedience may be designed to change the Constitution itself. The responsiveness of the Constitution to the voice of dissent and civil disobedience is particularly evident in two movements in our history: the women's suffrage movement and the antislavery movement. These movements brought about great constitutional changes through a variety of political strategies, including civil disobedience.

The women's suffrage movement began in the first part of the nineteenth century. Increasing numbers of women were becoming active in political parties, humanitarian societies, educational societies, labor agitation groups, antislavery associations, and temperance associations. By 1848, the women had organized the National Women's Rights Convention at SENECA FALLS where ELIZABETH CADY STANTON and Lucretia Mott led the women in writing the Declaration of Sentiments. A main tenet of the declaration was that women should be granted the right to vote in order to preserve the government as one that has the consent of the governed. The women used a variety of tactics in their struggle to obtain the franchise, including conventional political tactics, lobbying at the national, state, and local levels, and petitions. An important tactic in the women's fight was the use of civil disobedience, which helped gain support and publicity for their cause. The methods of civil disobedience included voting in elections (which was illegal), refusing to pay taxes, and PICKETING the White House.

A visible act of civil disobedience used by the women's movement was to register and vote in elections. A prominent example occurred in 1872 when SUSAN B. ANTHONY and fourteen other women registered and voted in Rochester, New York. They were accused and charged with a crime "of voting without the lawful right to vote." The women argued that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT gave them the legal right to vote. This legal argument was dismissed by the Supreme Court in MINOR V. HAPPERSETT (1875), when the Court held that women were CITIZENS but were not entitled to vote. Once the Court refused to recognize the argument based on existing amendments, the suffragist organization concentrated their efforts on the fight for passage of a constitutional amendment that would ensure women the right to vote.

Another, more isolated instance of civil disobedience was performed by activist Abby Smith. Abby Smith refused to pay her property taxes until she was given the right to vote at the town meeting. This simple instance of a woman standing up for her rights served to publicize the women's cause to a certain extent.

A final tactic of the WOMAN SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT that amounted to both civil disobedience and lawful dissent was the practice of picketing the White House in order to gain presidential support for the proposed amendment. Although the women had a legal right to picket, the policemen at the time treated them with contempt, as if they were lawbreakers. The women were jailed for exercising constitutional rights, and it was not until later that they were vindicated by the courts.

During the antislavery movement in the mid-1850s, civil disobedience gained considerable acceptance in some parts of the country. Opposition to slavery reached new peaks after the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850. The act provided for a simplified procedure to return escaped slaves to their masters, with provisions excluding TRIAL BY JURY and writs of HABEAS CORPUS from fugitive slave cases, and providing a financial incentive for federal commissioners to decide cases in favor of southern claimants. Throughout the North, meetings were held where citizens denounced the new law and vowed their disobedience to the act. Many based their views on philosophical, legal, or religious grounds. Those publicly opposing the act included Lewis Hayden, William C. Nell, Theodore Parker, Daniel Foster, and Henry David Thoreau. Some commentators believe that a clear and direct line runs from the antislavery crusaders to the Fourteenth Amendment. The acts of civil disobedience to the Fugitive Slave Act represented the feelings of a substantial portion of the country at the time. This opinion was eventually transformed into the THIRTEENTH, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments, which abolished slavery, guaranteed the former slaves' citizenship, and protected their right to vote. Civil disobedience remains a potentially significant tool for effecting constitutional change.

The Constitution has been used to justify civil disobedience. Examples in our recent history include the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT and military resistance. Some of the best-known uses of civil disobedience occurred during the civil rights movements of the 1950s and 1960s. Martin Luther King, Jr., and his followers felt compelled to disobey laws that continued the practice of SEGREGATION; they opposed the laws on moral, ethical, and constitutional grounds. In fact, some of the laws they allegedly disobeyed were unconstitutional. Although the movement initially attempted to change the system through conventional legal and political channels, it eventually turned to the tactics of civil disobedience in order to bring national attention to its cause. By appealing to the Constitution as justification for their acts of civil disobedience, the civil rights leaders made important contributions to the development of constitutional law in the areas of EQUAL PROTECTION, DUE PROCESS, and FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

The civil rights movement's tactics included SIT-INS, designed to protest the laws and the practice of segregated lunch counters and restaurants. Black students entered restaurants and requested to be served in the white part of the establishment. When they refused to leave upon the owner's request, they were arrested on grounds of criminal TRESPASS.

Quite a few of these cases were heard by the Supreme Court, where the blacks argued that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment made these laws unconstitutional. In Peterson v. City of Greenville (1963) ten black students had been arrested after they refused to leave a segregated restaurant. The Supreme Court reversed their convictions, holding that the laws requiring segregation violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court reasoned that there was sufficient STATE ACTION because of the existence of the statute, which indicated the state policy in favor of segregation. Many factually similar cases were reversed on the authority of the Peterson decision. In addition to using the equal protection clause, the courts sometimes held that the laws as applied to black citizens were VOID FOR VAGUENESS or for lack of NOTICE.

The sit-ins, freedom rides, and continued demonstrations eventually swayed public opinion and contributed to the passage of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, which prohibited discrimination in many areas of life. Under the act, many acts that had previously amounted to civil disobedience became protected by law.

In addition to the successes achieved in RACIAL DISCRIMINATION law, the civil rights movement and its acts of civil disobedience have contributed to the FIRST AMENDMENT law regarding freedom of speech and FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY AND ASSOCIATION. For example, in COX V. LOUISIANA (1964) peaceful civil rights demonstrators were convicted of disturbing the peace. The Court struck down the BREACH OF THE PEACE statute for vagueness and OVERBREADTH, thus expanding constitutional rights to free speech and assembly.

Although the civil rights movement involved acts of civil disobedience on a massive scale, resistance to the country's military policy has traditionally involved more solitary acts. Still, the resisters have based many of their arguments on constitutional provisions. These arguments have not always been successful, but the protesters succeeded in calling attention to causes such as opposition to war and military policy.

Those opposed to the country's military policy have used both indirect and direct methods of civil disobedience. Examples of indirect methods include DRAFT CARD BURNING, supplying false information on tax forms, and trespassing on government grounds. Although the protesters gained publicity from these tactics, the disobedient's claims of freedom of speech and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY under the First Amendment usually have not been accepted by the courts. A well-known example of the use of indirect civil disobedience is the Catonsville Nine case in which protesters entered the office of the local Selective Service Board and destroyed government records. Their defense, based on philosophical and moral grounds, was held insufficient by the courts.

Direct forms of civil disobedience to war have included resistance to the draft and refusal to pay taxes. The disobedience surrounding the draft has taken many forms, but many legal challenges have focused on the SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT. In several cases, the men who refused induction argued that the CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION provision was unconstitutional as it applied to the individual. They argued that to construe the provision as requiring a belief in a supreme being was a violation of the free exercise clause of the First Amendment. The Court has avoided the constitutional questions in these cases by giving a broad construction to statutory exemptions of the conscientious objectors. Another direct form of civil disobedience used to protest the country's involvement in war has been to withhold the payment of taxes, arguing that to support a war that one does not believe in is in violation of the free exercise clause. The Supreme Court has never decided the constitutional issues in these cases. Although both direct and indirect forms of civil disobedience in resistance to military policy have been equally unsuccessful in presenting legal challenges to laws, they have been successful in publicizing the disobedients' grievances.

The debate concerning the morality or justification for the use of civil disobedience as a method of effecting change in society will never be fully resolved. However, civil disobedience remains a significant and often successful tactic used in many movements in American society. The use of civil disobedience, when incorporated with other conventional political strategies, can lead to profound changes in the Constitution itself or in the interpretation of the document. American society's positive response to certain acts of civil disobedience can be seen in the civil rights movement, the women's suffrage movement, and the antislavery movement. Although not all acts of civil disobedience yield substantial changes, our democratic system provides the opportunity for civil disobedience to contribute to significant changes in society.

ROBERT F. DRINAN, S.J.
(1986)

Bibliography

FORTAS, ABE 1968 Concerning Dissent and Civil Disobedience. New York: World Publishing Co.

GREENBERG, JACK 1968 "The Supreme Court, Civil Rights, and Civil Dissonance." Yale Law Journal 77:1520–1544.

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. 1965 The Negro and the First Amendment. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.

WEBER, DAVID R., ed. 1978 Civil Disobedience in America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

CIVIL FORFEITURE

Forfeiture refers to the government's uncompensated confiscation of PROPERTY that is implicated in crime. The property may be used to commit crime, be its product, or be obtained with its fruits. A home, for example, that is bought with money from a robbery or illegal drug sales is subject to forfeiture. The government may prosecute the culprit criminally and, on his conviction, confiscate his property as part of his punishment, or it may proceed against the property in a civil suit by means of a procedure that is at war with the Constitution.

Unlike EMINENT DOMAIN, forfeiture excludes any compensation for the confiscated property. In the case of civil forfeiture, unfairness and injustice always prevail. "Civil forfeiture," declared the president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Attorneys, "is essentially government thievery." If the civil forfeiture laws of the states and the federal government are a license to steal, the cops are the robbers. Police shake down suspects, confiscate their cash, and make no arrests. At airports, law enforcement officers routinely take cash from travelers who supposedly fit a drug-smuggler profile or otherwise look suspicious. The promise of forfeiture lures officers and prosecutors to seize what they can, because they are able to keep for law enforcement purposes most of what they seize, or they can use the assets for whatever they need—weapons, helicopters, cellular phones, salary increases, bulletproof vests, or new police cars with which to conduct the war against crime.

About 80 percent of all civil forfeiture cases are uncontested, quite likely because most of the suspects are in fact guilty. But many forfeiture victims are innocent. One Floridian, for example, bought a new sailboat for $24,000. Customs officers, who often suspect boat owners of smuggling drugs, seized his sailboat and conducted a seven-hour search, during which time they ripped out its woodwork, smashed its engine, ruptured its fuel tank, and drilled holes in its hull, many below the water line. The officers, who found no drugs, damaged the boat beyond repair, forcing the innocent owner to sell it for scrap. Law enforcement officers seize money, cars, houses, land, and businesses, yet the victims often cannot afford to contest a forfeiture because of the high cost of lawyers. Legal fees can easily run to considerably more than the value of most forfeitures. As one defense attorney declared, "Sue to get your car back? Forget it. If they take your car, it's gone. Unless I get pissed off and take a case for the sweet pleasure of revenge, I'm not going to handle anything less than $75,000 in assets, from which I'd get one-third." A Connecticut family, whose grandson kept controlled substances in his room, lost their home and denounced the government's greed as "Nazi justice." A man who ran an air charter service innocently carried a passenger whose luggage contained drug money. As a result of the search by drug enforcement agents, who caused damage of at least $50,000 for which the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) is not liable, the owner of the charter service had to declare BANKRUPTCY, lost his business, and became a truck driver.

Civil forfeitures have a peculiar character—the government sues the supposedly guilty property, not its owners. Thus, in United States v. One 6.5 mm. Mannlicher-Carcano Military Rifle (1966), the government sued the rifle that was used to assassinate President JOHN F. KENNEDY. As the Court observed, the law ascribes "to the property a certain personality, a power of complicity and guilt in the wrong." In another case the Court explained, "Traditionally, forfeiture actions have proceeded upon the fiction that the inanimate objects themselves can be guilty of wrongdoing. Simply put, the theory has been that if the object is 'guilty,' it should be held forfeit." The innocence of its owner is irrelevant as a matter of law. The guilt attaches to the thing by which a wrong has been done, and the government profits from the wrong. Forfeitures are an important source of government revenue, and because no person is found guilty in a civil forfeiture case, the forfeiture is held not to constitute punishment—a blatant misconception. A tiny trace of marijuana suffices to justify the forfeiture of a vessel, vehicle, or home.

Civil forfeiture is attractive to the nation's lawmakers because it is much more likely to be successful than a criminal forfeiture proceeding in which the defendant has the benefits of all the rights of the criminally accused guaranteed by the Constitution, plus the presumption that he is innocent until the government proves otherwise beyond a reasonable doubt. In a civil forfeiture case, the government does not have to establish the person's guilt; he is not a party to the case. The obligation of the government is simply to show that a probable causal connection exists between the property and the commission of a crime. Hearsay, circumstantial evidence, and anything more than a hunch can be used to establish PROBABLE CAUSE. That done, the burden shifts to the owner of the property or to its claimant to establish by a preponderance of evidence that the property is "innocent." Owners or claimants have no way to exercise their constitutional rights. In civil forfeitures, the property that is sued has no rights. Civil forfeiture is swift, cheap, and pretty much a sure thing from the government's standpoint.

The leading American case, decided in 1974, involved the Pearson Yacht Company, which had rented its vessel to someone who left the remains of one marijuana cigarette, which the state discovered on searching the ship. The company had no knowledge that its yacht had been used in violation of state law, yet the Court held against the company and in favor of the forfeiture. The Court, ruling that the innocence of the company mattered not at all, reasoned that the law proceeded not against the owner of the property but against the yacht itself, because the yacht was the guilty party. Intellectual flimflammery characterizes the law of civil forfeiture.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Double Jeopardy.)

Bibliography

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1996 A License to Steal: The Forfeiture of Property. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

CIVIL LIBERTIES

WILLIAM BLACKSTONE described civil liberty as "the great end of all human society and government . . . that state in which each individual has the power to pursue his own happiness according to his own views of his interest, and the dictates of his conscience, unrestrained, except by equal, just, and impartial laws." As a matter of law, civil liberties are usually claims of right that a citizen may assert against the state. In the United States the term "civil liberties" is often used in a narrower sense to refer to RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, personal privacy, and the right to DUE PROCESS OF LAW, or to other limitations on the power of the state to restrict individual freedom of action. In this sense, civil liberties may be distinguished from rights to equality (sometimes called "civil rights"), although the latter have increasingly been recognized as important elements of individual freedom because they permit participation in society without regard to race, religion, sex, or other characteristics unrelated to individual capacity.

The concept of civil liberties is a logical corollary to the ideas of LIMITED GOVERNMENT and RULE OF LAW. When government acts arbitrarily, it infringes civil liberty; the rule of law combats and confines these excesses of power. The concept "government of laws, not of men" reflects this idea as does the vision of justice as fairness.

Although civil liberties are usually associated in practice with democratic forms of government, liberty and democracy are distinct concepts. An authoritarian government structure may recognize certain limits on the capacity of the state to interfere with the autonomy of the individual. Correspondingly, calling a state democratic does not tell us about the extent to which it recognizes civil liberty. Thus, "civil liberties" does not refer to a particular form of political structure but to the relationship between the individual and the state, however the state may be organized. But civil liberties do presuppose order. As Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES said in COX V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1941), "Civil liberties imply the existence of an organized society maintaining public order without which liberty itself would be lost in the excesses of unrestrained abuses."

In the final analysis, civil liberties are based on the integrity and dignity of the individual. This idea was expressed by George C. Marshall, who was chief of staff to the American army in WORLD WAR II and later served as secretary of state: "We believe that human beings have . . . rights that may not be given or taken away. They include the right of every individual to develop his mind and his soul in the ways of his own choice, free of fear and coercion—provided only that he does not interfere with the rights of others."

There are two principal justifications for preferring individual liberties to the interests of the general community—justice and self-interest. At the very least, justice requires norms by which persons in authority treat those within their power fairly and evenly. Self-interest suggests that our own rights are secure only if the rights of others are protected.

Because these two justifications for civil liberties are abstractions to most people, they are often subordinated to more immediate concerns of the state or the majority. In America, even administrations relatively friendly to civil liberty have perpetrated some of the worst violations. The administration of FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT interned Japanese Americans during World War II. ABRAHAM LINCOLN suspended the right of HABEAS CORPUS. And as Leonard W. Levy has reminded us, THOMAS JEFFERSON was far more of a libertarian as a private citizen than when he was in power. Nevertheless, civil liberties have been more broadly defined and fully respected in the United States than in other nations.

The roots of American civil liberties can be traced to ancient times. The city-state of Athens made a lasting contribution to civil liberty. In the sixth century B.C., Solon, the magistrate of Athens, produced a constitution that, while flawed, gave the poor a voice in the election of magistrates and the right to call public officials to account. Solon is also credited with first expressing the idea of the rule of law. But Athens knew no limits on the right of the majority to adopt any law it chose, and there was no concept of individual rights against the state. Greek philosophers introduced the idea of "natural law" and the derivative concept of equality; all Athenians (except slaves) were equal citizens, for all possessed reason and owed a common duty to natural law.

The Romans also contributed to civil liberties, first through a rudimentary SEPARATION OF POWERS of government and later by the further development of natural law. Justinian's Institutes recites, "Justice is the fixed and constant purpose that gives every man his due." Nevertheless, the Roman emperors were autocratic in practice; there were no enforceable rights against the state, which practiced censorship, restricted travel, and coerced religion.

In the Middle Ages there was little manifestation of civil liberties. But the idea of a pure natural law was carried forward in Augustine's City of God. On the secular side, the contract between feudal lords and their vassals established reciprocal rights and responsibilities whose interpretation was, in some places, decided by a body of the vassal's peers.

Among English antecedents of civil liberties, the starting point is MAGNA CARTA (1215), the first written instrument that exacted from a monarch rules he was bound to obey. Although this document reflected the attempt of barons to secure feudal privileges, basic liberties developed from it—among them the security of private property, the security of the person, the right to judgment by one's peers, the right to seek redress of grievances from the sovereign, and the concept of due process of law. Above all, as Winston Churchill said, Magna Carta "justifies the respect in which men have held it" because it tells us "there is a law above the king."

Another great charter of English liberty was the 1628 PETITION OF RIGHT, a statute that asserted the freedom of the people from unconsented taxation and arbitrary imprisonment. The HABEAS CORPUS ACT OF 1679 was another major document of English liberty. The BILL OF RIGHTS of 1698 which also influenced American constitutional law, declared that parliamentary elections ought to be free and that Parliament's debates ought not to be questioned in any other place, and it condemned perversions of criminal justice by the last Stuart kings, including excessive BAIL and CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS.

The experience of the American colonies was important to the development of civil liberties in the United States. The COLONIAL CHARTERS set up local governments that built upon English institutions, and the colonists jealously opposed any infringements upon their rights. The VIRGINIA CHARTER OF 1606 reserved to the inhabitants "all liberties, Franchises and Immunities . . . as if they had been abiding and born, within this our Realm of England."

The MASSACHUSETTS BODY OF LIBERTIES of 1641 expressed in detail a range of fundamental rights later to be adopted in the American BILL OF RIGHTS. Rhode Island was the first colony to recognize religious liberty, largely through the efforts of its founder, ROGER WILLIAMS. The Puritans banished Williams from Massachusetts in 1635 for unorthodoxy, and he settled in Providence. There the plantation agreement of 1640 protected "liberty of Conscience," and this doctrine appeared in the Colony's charter in 1663. The Pennsylvania charter and those of other colonies were also influential in protecting individual rights. ZENGER'S CASE (1735), in which a jury acquitted a New York publisher on a charge of SEDITIOUS LIBEL, was a milestone in securing the freedom of the press.

By the time of the American Revolution, the colonists were familiar with the fundamental concepts of civil liberty that would be included in the Constitution and Bill of Rights. Unlike the contemporary French experience, where the promise of the Declaration of the Rights of Man went largely unfulfilled for want of institutional safeguards, the American Constitution of 1787 embodied a republican government elected by broad suffrage that was reinforced by judicial review and by CHECKS AND BALANCES among the three branches of government.

The original Constitution, a document devoted mainly to structure and the allocation of powers among the branches of the national government, contains some explicit safeguards for civil liberty. It provides that the "privilege" of habeas corpus, which requires a judge to release an imprisoned person unless he is being lawfully detained, may not be "suspended." The EX POST FACTO and BILL OF ATTAINDER clauses require the Congress to act prospectively and by general rule. Article III guarantees a jury trial in all federal criminal cases, defines TREASON narrowly, and imposes evidentiary requirements to assure that this most political of crimes will not be lightly charged.

Apart from the omission of a bill of rights, which was soon rectified, the Constitution's principal deficiency from a civil liberties standpoint was its countenance of slavery. Without mentioning the term, in several clauses it recognized the legality of that pernicious institution. DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) cemented the legally inferior status of blacks and contributed to CIVIL WAR by ruling that slaves or the descendants of slaves could not become citizens of the United States. The EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION (1863) and the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT (1865) freed the slaves, but the reaction that occurred after the end of RECON-STRUCTION in 1877 and decisions such as the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883) and PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) undercut their purposes. The movement toward civil equality did not gain new momentum until the middle of the twentieth century.

The civil liberties of Americans are embodied primarily in the BILL OF RIGHTS (1791), the first ten amendments to the Constitution. JAMES MADISON proposed the amendments after the debates on RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION revealed wide public demand for additional protection of individual rights. The FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees the freedoms of speech, press, assembly, petition, and religious exercise, as well as the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. The FOURTH AMENDMENT protects the privacy and security of home, person, and belongings and prohibits unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES. The Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Amendments extend constitutional protection to the criminal process, including the right to due process of law, TRIAL BY JURY, CONFRONTATION, of hostile witnesses, assistance of legal counsel, the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, and protection against DOUBLE JEOPARDY and cruel and unusual punishment. The TENTH AMENDMENT reserves to the states and to the people powers not delegated to the federal government. Although the Bill of Rights was originally applicable only to the federal government, most of its provisions now have been applied to the states through the due process clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.) The amendment also provides a generalized guarantee of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS as well as a virtually unenforced right to certain PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES. Finally, the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT and NINETEENTH AMENDMENT guarantee VOTING RIGHTS regardless of race or sex.

A practical understanding of civil liberties in the United States may be aided by illustrations of three main dimensions of the subject: freedom of speech, due process, and equal protection.

The First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." The almost universal primacy given free speech as a "civil liberty" rests on several important values: the importance of freedom of speech for self-government in a democracy, its utility in probing for truth, its role in helping to check arbitrary government power, and its capacity to permit personal fulfillment of those who would express and receive ideas and feelings, especially unpopular ones, without fear of reprisal.

Consistent with the First Amendment, even revolutionary speech that is not "directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action" is immunized from government control. (See INCITEMENT.) Similarly, highly offensive political speech and defamations of public officials and PUBLIC FIGURES that are not intentionally or recklessly false are protected. (See LIBEL AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT.) Because effective advocacy is enhanced by group membership, the First Amendment has also been interpreted to protect freedom of association from interference, absent a compelling state justification. The First Amendment provides particularly strong protection against PRIOR RESTRAINT—INJUNCTIONS or other means of preventing speech from ever being uttered or published.

Freedom of speech is not absolute. In addition to the limits just noted, OBSCENITY, child PORNOGRAPHY, and FIGHTING WORDS likely to provoke physical attacks are unprotected. All forms of speech, furthermore, are subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. The amendment has been interpreted to afford a lesser degree of protection to speech that is sexually explicit (although not obscene), to COMMERCIAL SPEECH, to SYMBOLIC SPEECH such as nonverbal displays intended to convey messages, and to DEMONSTRATIONS (for example, PICKETING) that combine speech and action.

The concept of fair procedure, embodied in the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, has been viewed as an element of civil liberties at least since Magna Carta, when the king was limited by "the LAW OF THE LAND." In principle, the guarantee of due process prevents government from imposing sanctions against individuals without sufficiently fair judicial or administrative procedures. Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS said: "In the development of our liberty insistence upon procedural regularity has been a large factor." Violations of this constitutional guarantee cover a wide range of official misconduct in the criminal process, from lynchings, to coerced confessions, to criminal convictions of uncounseled defendants, to interrogation of suspects without cautionary warnings. Beyond criminal cases, due process principles have been applied to protect juveniles accused of delinquency and individuals whose government jobs or benefits have been terminated. Whatever the context, civil liberty requires that individual interests of liberty and property not be sacrificed without a process that determines facts and liability at hearings that are fairly established and conducted. (See PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, CRIMINAL; PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, CIVIL).

The guarantee of equal protection is interpreted to forbid government, and in some cases private entities, to discriminate among persons on arbitrary grounds. The central purpose of the equal protection clause was to admit to civil equality the recently freed black slaves, and leading judicial decisions such as SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948) and BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) and legislative enactments such as the CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS of 1866 and 1964 were particularly addressed to the condition of racial minorities. The constitutional guarantee of equality has been extended to women and to DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITIES—ethnic and religious groups, ALIENS, and children of unwed parents—whom the Supreme Court has deemed unable to protect their interests through the political process. In recent years, the Court has rejected attempts to broaden this category of specially protected groups. It has denied special protection to homosexuals, older persons, and the mentally retarded. The Court has also expressed the antidiscrimination ideal in holding that it is unconstitutional for a legislative districting system to accord votes in some districts significantly greater weight than votes in others.

A vexing equality issue is whether benign classifications of racial minorities or women are consistent with civil liberty on the theory that they prefer groups that historically were, and often still are, discriminated against. Against the background of slavery and legally enforced SEGREGATION, the Supreme Court has upheld AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs for blacks that prefer them for employment and university admissions on the ground that a wholly "color blind" system would "render illusory the promise" of Brown v. Board of Education. It has also upheld some forms of preference for other minorities and for women. There is deep division over these programs. It is often charged that they are themselves an obnoxious use of racial or sexual classifications. Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN responded to these contentions in REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978) by stating that "[i]n order to get beyond racism, we must first take account of race. . . . We cannot—we dare not—let the Equal Protection Clause perpetuate racial supremacy."

Some liberties in the United States are traceable to a natural law tradition that long antedated the Constitution and are only indirectly reflected in its text. In the American experience, for example, the VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS aserted that "all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights . . . namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property." This sentiment was reflected in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, which spoke of "inalienable rights," and in the Constitution itself, which embodied these principles. In CALDER V. BULL (1798) Justice SAMUEL CHASE expressed his view that NATURAL RIGHTS "form the very nature of our free Republican governments." Over the years the Supreme Court has recognized a number of rights not explicitly grounded in the constitutional text, including, for a season, FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, and, in recent years, the RIGHT TO TRAVEL, and the FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION. The Court's most celebrated recent decisions of this kind have recognized a series of rights that reflect values of personal privacy and autonomy. These include the rights to marriage and to BIRTH CONTROL, to family relationships and to ABORTION. These liberties are fundamental conditions of the ability of a person to master his or her life. (See FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION.)

The Supreme Court's decisions enunciating some of these rights have been challenged as unrooted in the original intention of the Framers and therefore subjective and illegitimate. But the Constitution was not frozen in time. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL said in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) for a unanimous Court that it is an instrument "intended to endure for ages to come and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." In the twentieth century, Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO agreed: "The great generalities of the Constitution have a content and a significance that vary from age to age." Further, the NINTH AMENDMENT contemplated that the provisions of the Bill of Rights explicitly safeguarding liberty were not meant to be exhaustive: "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." Finally, the structure of the Constitution, and the premises of a free society, imply certain liberties, such as the freedom of association and the right to travel.

The uncertainty and even illogic of Supreme Court decisions protecting certain groups and rights—why illegitimate children and not homosexuals, why a right to travel and not a right to housing—should not be viewed as merely the product of politics or prejudice. There are inevitably disagreements and inconsistencies over the proper boundaries of civil liberties and the proper judicial role in their recognition. Filling in the "majestic generalities" of the Constitution has always been a long-range and uncertain task.

An example of the difficulty is CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—the question whether there is a constitutional right not to be executed even for a heinous crime. This liberty is widely accepted throughout the world, but the United States Supreme Court has not recognized it as a constitutional right, instead permitting states to impose sentences of death for murder, subject to due process limitations. Many consider capital punishment inherently a violation of civil liberties because of the randomness in its application, its finality in the face of inevitable trial errors, its disproportionate use against racial minorities, and its dehumanizing effect on both government and the people. The struggle over this and other claims of civil liberty continues in public opinion, legislatures, and the courts.

Another source of American civil liberties is the doctrine of separation of governmental powers, illuminated most notably in the eighteenth century by the philosophe MONTESQUIEU. Anticipating John Acton's dictum that absolute power corrupts absolutely, the Supreme Court recognized in LOAN ASSOCIATION V. TOPEKA (1875) that the "theory of our governments, State and National, is opposed to the deposit of unlimited power anywhere. The executive, the legislative, and the judicial branches of these governments are all of limited and defined powers." In the same vein, individual rights are enhanced by the existence of a diverse population. THE FEDERALIST #51 states: "In a free government the security for civil rights [consists] in the multiplicity of interests."

The Supreme Court has enforced the principle of separation of powers. In YOUNGSTOWN SHEET TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952) it denied that the President had constitutional power, even in time of national emergency, to seize private companies without legislative authorization. Two Justices rested on the separation of powers doctrine in NEW YORK TIMES CO. V. UNITED STATES (1971) by holding that under all but extraordinary circumstances the President lacks inherent power to enjoin news organizations from publishing classified information. And in UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974), while ruling that Presidents possess an EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE to maintain the secrecy of certain communications, the Court rebuffed President RICHARD M. NIXON's attempt to withhold White House tapes from the Watergate special prosecutor. In form, these decisions dealt with questions of allocation of governmental powers; in fact they were civil liberties decisions effectuating a structure designed, in Justice Brandeis's words, "to preclude the exercise of arbitrary power."

Neither the original Constitution nor the Bill of Rights guaranteed the right to vote, a cornerstone of democratic government as well as a civil liberty; slaves, women, and those without property were disfranchised. During the early nineteenth century states gradually rescinded property qualifications; the Fifteenth Amendment (1868) barred voting discrimination by race or color, and the Nineteenth Amendment (1920) outlawed voting discrimination on the ground of sex. Nevertheless, various devices were employed to prevent nonwhites from voting. These were curtailed by the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965, the TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT's invalidation of POLL TAXES as a qualification for voting, and the Supreme Court's decision in HARPER V. VIRGINIA BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966). The TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT (1971) extended the franchise to all citizens eighteen years of age and older.

A controversial question is presented by the relationship between the right to property and civil liberties. As the Supreme Court stated in GRIFFIN V. ILLINOIS (1956), "Providing equal justice for poor and rich, weak and powerful alike is an age-old problem." Although some would reject any such link between economics and liberty, others disagree. ALEXANDER HAMILTON stated that "a power over a man's subsistence is a power over his will." More recently, Paul Freund, recognizing that economic independence provides a margin of safety in risk or protest, commented that the effective exercise of liberty may require "a degree of command over material resources."

To a limited extent the Supreme Court has concurred. It has prohibited discrimination against the poor in cases involving voting rights and ACCESS TO THE COURTS. It has also afforded procedural protection against loss of government entitlements, including a government employee's interest in his job and a recipient's interest in welfare benefits. On the other hand, the Court has refused to recognize a generalized constitutional right to economic security. The Court has permitted reduction of welfare benefits below a standard of minimum need, has permitted courtroom filing fees to keep indigents from obtaining judicial discharge of debts, and has refused to recognize a constitutional right to equalized resources for spending on public education. The Court said in DANDRIDGE V. WILLIAMS (1970): "In the area of economics and social welfare, a State does not violate [equal protection] merely because the classifications made by its laws are imperfect." The idea that civil liberties imply a degree of economic security is not yet a principle of constitutional law.

Invasions of liberty are usually committed by government. But individuals may also be victimized by private power. The authority of medieval lords over their vassals was not merely economic. Today large institutions such as corporations, labor unions, and universities may seek to limit the speech or privacy of individuals subject to their authority. For this reason federal and state legislation bars RACIAL DISCRIMINATION and other forms of arbitrary discrimination in the hiring, promotion, and firing of employees, in the sale and rental of private housing, and in admission to academic institutions. The courts likewise have recognized that private power may defeat civil liberties by barring the enforcement of private RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS not to sell real estate to racial minorities and by barring private censorship and interference with freedom of association when those restrictions are supported by STATE ACTION.

Civil liberties can never be entirely secure. Government and large private institutions often seek to achieve their goals without scrupulous concern for constitutional rights. In the eighteenth century Edmund Burke wrote: "Of this I am certain, that in a democracy the majority of citizens is capable of exercising the most cruel oppression upon the minority." More recently, Charles Reich observed that civil liberties are an "unnatural state for man or for society because in a short-range way they are essentially contrary to the self-interest of the majority. They require the majority to restrain itself." The legal rights of minorities and the weak need special protection, particularly under conditions of stress.

The first such condition is economic stringency. Mass unemployment and high inflation exacerbate ethnic rivalries and discrimination, and at times are offered to justify the repression of dissent. Minorities pay the heaviest price. The victims include the dependent poor, whose government benefits are often among the first casualties during economic recession.

War also strains the Bill of Rights, for a nation threatened from without is rarely the best guardian of civil liberties within. As noted, President Abraham Lincoln suspended habeas corpus during the Civil War and President Franklin D. Roosevelt approved the internment of Japanese Americans during World War II. In addition, President WOODROW WILSON presided over massive invasions of free speech during WORLD WAR I; MCCARTHYISM, the virulent repression of dissent, was a product of the Cold War of the late 1940s and early 1950s; and President LYNDON B. JOHNSON authorized prosecution of protestors during the VIETNAM WAR. More recently, the deterioration of deatente in the 1980s has led to interference with peaceful demonstrations, widespread surveillance of Americans, politically motivated travel bans and visa denials, and censorship of former government officials.

A third perennial source of trouble for civil liberties in America has been religious zeal. Anti-Catholic and Anti-Semitic nativism paralleled slavery during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The Scopes trial (1925), in which a public school teacher was convicted for teaching evolution, was the result of fundamentalist excesses. On the other hand, religious sentiments have often buttressed civil liberties by, for example, supporting the extension of civil rights to racial and other minorities and endorsing the claims of conscientious objectors to conscription in the armed services, even during wartime. But zealous groups threaten to infringe civil liberties when they seek government support to impose their own religious views on nonadherents. This has taken many forms, including attempts to introduce organized prayer in public schools, to outlaw birth control and abortion, and to use public tax revenues to finance religious schools.

If civil liberties exist simply as abstractions, they have no more value than the barren promises entombed in many totalitarian constitutions. To be real, rights must be exercised and respected. The political branches of government—legislators and executive officials—can be instrumental in protecting fundamental rights, and especially in preventing their sacrifice to the supposed needs of the nation as a whole. Yet majoritarian pressures on elected representatives are great during times of crisis, and the stress on liberty is most acute.

The vulnerability of politically accountable officials teaches that freedom is most secure when protected by life-tenured judges insulated from electoral retribution. The doctrine of JUDICIAL REVIEW, which gives the courts final authority to define constitutional rights and to invalidate offending legislation or executive action, is the most important original contribution of the American political system to civil liberty.

Since Chief Justice John Marshall wrote for a unanimous Supreme Court in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) that the power of judicial review is grounded in the Constitution, tension has existed between this checking authority and the nation's commitment to majority rule. Challenges to the legitimacy of judicial review have been rejected with arguments based on the SUPREMACY CLAUSE in Article VI of the Constitution, on the pragmatic need for national uniformity, and on history. Thus, ROSCOE POUND, the longtime dean of Harvard Law School, concluded that the claim that judicial review is usurpation is refuted by the "clear understanding of American Lawyers before the Revolution, based on the seventeenth-century books in which they had been taught, the unanimous course of decision after independence and down to the adoption of the Constitution, not to speak of the writings of the two prime movers in the convention which drafted the instrument."

Judicial review reinforces the principle that even in a democracy the majority must be subject to limits that assure individual liberty. This principle is the essential premise of the Bill of Rights—the need to counteract the majoritarian pressures against liberty that existed in the eighteenth century and have persisted throughout American history. In the words of the Spanish writer Josea Ortega y Gassett, "[Freedom] is the right which the majority concedes to minorities and hence it is the noblest cry that has ever resounded in this planet." Further, the democratic political process requires civil liberties in order to function—the rights to vote, to speak, and to hear others. Elected legislatures and executive officials cannot be relied on to protect these rights fully and thus to assure the integrity of the democratic process; an insulated judiciary is essential to interpret the Constitution.

The role of the Supreme Court and other courts in exercising judicial review is valid even though their decisions may not reflect the view of the people at a given time. American democracy contemplates limitations on transient consensus and imposes long-term restrictions on the power of legislative majorities to act, subject to a constitutional amendment, because the democracy established by the Constitution is concerned not merely with effectuating the majority's will but with protecting minority rights. Further, as Burt Neuborne has pointed out, federal judges have a democratic imprimatur: "They are generally drawn from the political world; they are appointed by the President and must be confirmed by the Senate." It is for these reasons that James Madison viewed courts as the "natural guardian for the Bill of Rights."

The central role of independent courts in the enforcement of civil liberties has provoked efforts to weaken judicial review. The abolitionists, dissatisfied with federal judges who protected the rights of slaveholders, clamored for jury trials for alleged fugitive slaves; populists have long urged the popular election of judges; and Franklin D. Roosevelt sought to pack the Supreme Court to bend it to popular will. More recently, bills have been introduced in Congress to limit the JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS and to bar some legal remedies that are indispensable to the effectuation of certain constitutional rights. Whatever the perceived short-term advantages of such schemes to one group or another, the long-term effect would be erosion of judicial review and a consequent undermining of civil liberty.

The centrality of courts to the constitutional plan must not obscure the equally important role of legislatures. They can enhance or weaken civil liberty and, absent a declaration of unconstitutionality, their actions are final. During the period of the WARREN COURT, it was widely assumed that the judiciary alone would defend individual rights because legislatures were subject to immediate pressures from the electorate that prevented them from taking a long and sophisticated view of American liberties and protecting minorities and dissenters. But during the 1960s Congress prohibited discrimination in employment, housing, access to PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS, and voting; it passed the FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT; and it provided legal services for the poor. A few years later it enacted laws aimed at protecting the privacy of personal information. Congress can authorize expenditures, create and dismantle administrative agencies, and enact comprehensive legislation across broad subject areas—powers beyond the institutional capacity of courts.

Legislatures can also impair civil liberties in ways other than restricting judicial review. In recent years battles have raged in Congress over the Legal Services Corporation, the FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT, the VOTING RIGHTS ACT, school prayer, tuition tax credits to support private schools, the powers of the Central Intelligence Agency and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and many other issues. This congressional agenda reflects an intense national debate over the meaning and scope of civil liberties in the 1980s.

Whatever the forum, the security of civil liberty requires trained professionals to press the rights of people. Throughout American history the services of paid counsel have been supplemented by lawyers who volunteer out of ideological commitment or professional obligation. Publicly supported legal services organizations and legislative provision for awarding attorneys' fees to prevailing plaintiffs in CIVIL RIGHTS cases have encouraged the growth of a sophisticated bar that litigates constitutional issues. Vital support for the defense of civil liberties is also provided by private organizations such as the AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION (ACLU) and more specialized groups such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the National Organization for Women, and public interest law firms ranging across the political spectrum. These bodies engage in litigation, legislative lobbying, and public education in order to advance the rights of their constituencies or constitutional rights generally.

History shows that civil liberties are never secure, but must be defended again and again, in each generation. Examples of frequently repetitive violations of civil liberties involve police misconduct, school book censorship, and interference with free speech and assembly. For instance, the ACLU found it necessary to assert the right of peaceful demonstration when that right was threatened by Mayor Frank Hague's ban of labor organizers in New Jersey in the 1930s, by Sheriff Bull Connor's violence to civil rights demonstrators in Alabama in the 1960s, by the government's efforts to stop antiwar demonstrators in Washington in the 1970s, and by the 1977–1978 effort of the city of Skokie, Illinois, to prevent a march by American Nazis.

The continuing defense of civil liberties is indispensable if often thankless. Strong and determined opponents of human rights have always used the rhetoric of patriotism and practicality to subvert liberty and to dominate the weak, the unorthodox, and the despised. Government efficiency, international influence, domestic order, and economic needs are all important in a complex world, but none is more important than the principles of civil liberties. As embodied in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, these principles reflect a glorious tradition extending from the ancient world to modern times.

NORMAN DORSEN
(1986)

Bibliography

BRANT, IRVING 1965 The Bill of Rights. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

CHAFEE, ZECHARIAH, JR. 1941 Free Speech in the United States. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1956 The Blessings of Liberty. Philadelphia: Lippincott.

DEWEY, ROBERT E. and GOULD, JAMES A., eds. 1970 Freedom: Its History, Nature, and Varieties. London: Macmillan.

DORSEN, NORMAN 1970 The Rights of Americans: What They Are—What They Should Be. New York: Pantheon.

———, ed. 1984 Our Endangered Rights. New York: Pantheon.

EMERSON, THOMAS I. 1970 The System of Freedom of Expression. New York: Random House.

HAIMAN, FRANKLYN 1981 Speech and Law in a Free Society. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

HAND, LEARNED 1960 The Spirit of Liberty. New York: Knopf.

MARSHALL, BURKE, ed. 1982 The Supreme Court and Human Rights. Washington, D.C.: Forum Series, Voice of America.
MULLER, HERBERT J. 1963 Freedom in the Western World from the Dark Ages to the Rise of Democracy. New York: Harper & Row.
SCHWARTZ, BERNARD 1971 The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History. New York: Chelsea House/McGraw-Hill.
TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

CIVIL LIBERTIES
(Update 1)

The significant increase in the constitutional protection of CIVIL RIGHTS and civil liberties that has occurred since the late 1950s has brought dramatically renewed focus to the question of the appropriate scope of JUDICIAL POWER. Some argue that the federal judiciary, especially the Supreme Court, should play an active role in helping to shape public values—pushing a sometimes reluctant populace to make more meaningful the broad constitutional guarantees of liberty and equality. Others warn of the antidemocratic nature of JUDICIAL REVIEW. Constitutional decision making often invalidates the policy choices of popularly elected officials in favor of the rulings of life-tenured unelected judges. Schools are desegregated, prisons are ordered restructured, ABORTION regulations are voided, and SCHOOL PRAYERS are prohibited—regardless of how the majority of Americans feel about these decisions.

This countermajoritarian "difficulty" has led to consistent demands for a more passive judiciary. Only if violations of the Constitution are unambiguous, involving significant deprivations of clearly understood civil liberties, the argument goes, should the independent federal judiciary intervene. Otherwise, American democracy should be allowed a loose rein. The choices of the majority, even in most areas that implicate liberty and equality interests, should be considered determinative. And most fundamentally, they should be respected by courts.

How one comes out on this perennial debate, of course, has a major impact upon how one regards the performance of the judiciary in the post-WORLD WAR II era. The VINSON COURT (1946–1953) exercised its authority to invalidate governmental practices relatively rarely. As a result, for example, the criminal prosecution of communists under the Smith Act was upheld and the continued implementation of the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE by the states went largely undisturbed by the Court.

The WARREN COURT (1954–1969), however, took a much different tack. Following BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954, 1955), the Court launched a virtual constitutional revolution. In fairly rapid succession the Court handed down decisions not only combating RACIAL DISCRIMINATION on a number of fronts but also requiring the REAPPORTIONMENT of legislatures, the application of the bulk of the provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS against the states through the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE, giving more content to the FIRST AMENDMENT's speech and press guarantees, protecting VOTING RIGHTS, prohibiting orchestrated public school prayer, assuring the poor some measure of ACCESS TO THE COURTS, and bolstering the demands of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS. Other institutions of government, both state and federal, were forced to comply with the Justices' aggressive, and often inspiring, vision of the equal dignity of black and white, rich and poor, high and low.

The almost breathless pace of change wrought by the Warren Court led to significant calls for a judicial counterrevolution. President RICHARD M. NIXON named jurists to the Court whom he believed would strictly construe the Constitution. In his view, this meant that the Court would interfere far less frequently with the political branches of government. In many ways, however, the BURGER COURT (1970–1986) failed to fit the bill of STRICT CONSTRUCTION. Some Warren-era doctrines—CRIMINAL PROCEDURE guarantees and legal protections for the poor, for example—were pared back. But the Supreme Court, if anything, became even more accustomed to enforcing its vision of constitutional mandate against other government actors. Important women's rights, including a right to choose to have an abortion, were recognized for the first time. Protections for FREEDOM OF SPEECH were expanded. More surprisingly, perhaps, the Burger Court aggressively patrolled what it considered the appropriate division and SEPARATION OF POWERS among the branches of the federal government. By striking down the LEGISLATIVE VETO procedure in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), for example, the Court voided, in one stroke, more federal legislative enactments than it had previously in its entire history. The Burger Court may not have been an inspiring Court; it was, however, a powerful one.

The REHNQUIST COURT, of course, has yet to sketch fully its vision of judicial authority. WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST was confirmed as CHIEF JUSTICE in 1986. ANTONIN SCALIA joined the Court in the same year. ANTHONY M. KENNEDY replaced Justice LEWIS F. POWELL in early 1988. Although it is true that a few terms do not a Court make, significant signs are beginning to appear which suggest that the Rehnquist Court may reject much of the activism of its two immediate predecessors. It is possible that the Court will, in the coming decade, intentionally reduce its role in protecting civil liberties through the interpretation of what Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN has termed the "majestic generalities" of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. There is increasing reason to believe that after thirty years of political turmoil over the role of the judiciary in American government, a passive Court may be in the making.

Consider a few prominent examples. In 1986 the Supreme Court dramatically announced a halt to the growth of a favorite Burger Court product, the RIGHT OF PRIVACY. The decision in BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986) refused to afford constitutional protection to the private, consensual homosexual acts of an adult male. Michael Hardwick had been arrested—though the prosecution was subsequently dropped—for violating Georgia's sodomy statute by having sexual relations with another adult man in his own bedroom. Hardwick claimed that the Georgia law violated the right to privacy. Earlier decisions like GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), which protected the right to use contraceptives, and ROE V. WADE (1973), recognizing the right to terminate a pregnancy, had characterized the right to privacy as "fundamental" and "deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition."

The Court in Bowers declared that it was not "incline[d] to take a more expansive view of [its] authority to discover new fundamental rights. . . . The Court is most vulnerable and comes nearest to illegitimacy when it deals with judge-made constitutional law having little or no cognizable roots in the language or design of the Constitution." The majority of the Court claimed that if it were to give credence to claims such as that made by Hardwick, it would be "tak[ing] to itself further authority to govern the country without express constitutional authority." The adjective "further" assumes that the Supreme Court has already moved beyond any supportable role in the constitutional structure. It may also suggest that if Bowers is the reversal of a significant trend of decision making in the privacy arena, others will not be far behind.

In the same year, the Supreme Court upheld a municipal ZONING ordinance making it illegal to locate an "adult" theater within a thousand feet of a residential area, single-family dwelling, church, park, or school. The opinion in RENTON (CITY OF) V. PLAYTIME THEATRES, INC. (1986) carried many of the suggestions of the diminished JUDICIAL ROLE that appeared in Bowers. As a result, the decision allowed the regulation of constitutionally protected (nonobscene) speech in order to "maintain property values . . . and preserve the . . . quality of the city's neighborhoods."

Perhaps even more telling, though, was the crux of the Court's rationale. The fact that the statute "may" have been motivated, at least in part, by the city's desire to restrict "the exercise of First Amendment rights" was ruled beyond the scope of the Court's review; "[T]his Court will not strike down an otherwise constitutional statute on the basis of an alleged illicit legislative motive." Furthermore, the Court declared that it is beyond the judicial function to "appraise the wisdom of the city's decision. . . . The city must be allowed a reasonable opportunity to experiment with solutions to admittedly serious problems." This language is at least somewhat surprising in a case involving the regulation of speech that is, as even the Court admits, protected by the First Amendment. In an earlier time, one can almost imagine Justice HUGO L. BLACK reminding in dissent that legislatures retain a great deal of leeway for experimentation without violating the Bill of Rights.

In the context of public education, the Supreme Court has taken these declarations of deference to local decision makers considerably farther. In BETHEL SCHOOL DISTRICT V. FRASER (1986) the Court sustained a school's suspension of a student for making a sexually suggestive nominating speech at a voluntary assembly, concluding flatly that the "determination of what manner of speech in . . . school assembly is inappropriate properly rests with the school board." And in HAZELWOOD SCHOOL DISTRICT V. KUHLMEIER (1988), in which the Court upheld the censorship of a high school newspaper, it determined that judicial oversight must be reduced in order to give local school administrators the opportunity to "disassociate" themselves from the messages contained in school-sponsored student publications. Accordingly, principals may constitutionally exercise editorial control over high school newspapers "so long as their actions are reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns."

The Supreme Court's controversial abortion ruling in WEBSTER V. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES (1989) reflects a major change in emphasis as well. Although a majority refused to overrule Roe v. Wade, the Court recognized considerably greater authority in state governments to regulate the abortion process. Chief Justice Rehnquist's PLURALITY OPINION characterized the Court's prior abortion decisions as "unsound in principle, and unworkable in practice." Roe's privacy protections are, in his view, "not found in the text of the Constitution or in any place else one would expect to find a constitutional principle." Moreover, they result in the Justices of the Supreme Court acting as the country's "ex officio medical board," accepting or rejecting medical practices and standards throughout the United States. Surely, the Chief Justice wrote, the goal of constitutional adjudication is not "to remove inexorably politically divisive issues from the ambit of the legislative process."

Justice Scalia was even clearer in his declarations that the Supreme Court has no business deciding sensitive policy issues like abortion. He described Roe as asserting a "self-awarded sovereignty over a field where [the Court] has little proper business since the cruel questions posed are political . . . not juridical." As a result, he would overrule the 1973 abortion decision outright, returning the difficult human rights issue to the legislatures for determination.

Other examples—such as the Supreme Court's rulings that minors and mentally retarded defendants can be subjected to CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—could be mentioned. No doubt, though, these few instances constitute far less than a major cross-sampling of the Court's work. In the past several terms the Court has occasionally ventured into new arenas of judicial purview. These areas have primarily involved separation of powers claims rather than classic civil liberties issues. But the Justices have also bolstered the protection afforded to some economic rights and, even more surprising, tentatively entered the difficult thicket of the GERRYMANDER.

Still, the likelihood is strong that a significant trend is afoot. The present Supreme Court seems determined to reduce its role as a policymaker in American government. If new and difficult civil liberties claims are pressed, the judiciary may be less inclined to impose its will on the more democratically accountable branches of government. Even the Court's higher-profile constitutional decisions reflect something of this tendency. In the controversial and widely noted FLAG DESECRATION case, Texas v. Johnson (1989), a majority of the Court voted to reverse a state conviction based upon the burning of a flag. Justice Kennedy's influential concurring opinion, however, emphasized that the Court "cannot here ask another branch to share responsibility . . . for we are presented with a clear and simple statute to be judged against a pure command of the Constitution." This desire to defer to other government actors—if possible—may be the hallmark of the judiciary in the years to come. As a matter of democratic theory, that choice may be a wise one. For this constitutional democracy, however, the verdict may be significantly more complex.

GENE R. NICHOL
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Desegregation; Freedom of the Press; Prisoners' Rights; Religious Liberty; Separation of Church and State; Sexual Orientation; Sexual Preference and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

DWORKIN, RONALD 1986 Law's Empire. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1988 Constitutional Dialogues. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

GARVEY, J. and ALEINIKOFF, ALEXANDER 1989 Modern Constitutional Theory: A Reader. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Company.

GREENWALT, KENT 1988 Religious Convictions and Political Choice. New York: Oxford University Press.

LEVINSON, SANFORD 1988 Constitutional Faith. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

MACKINNON, CATHERINE 1987 Feminism Unmodified. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

NAGEL, ROBERT 1989 Constitutional Cultures. Berkeley: University of California Press.

PERRY, MICHAEL 1988 Morality, Politics and Law. New York: Oxford University Press.

SYMPOSIUM 1987 The Bork Nomination. Cardozo Law Review 9:1–530.

TRIBE, LAURENCE 1988 American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. New York: Foundation Press.

CIVIL LIBERTIES
(Update 2)

It is generally thought that one of the principal functions of courts in the American political system is to protect civil liberties. Yet "civil liberties" is an ill-defined concept. The prevalent modern conception of the term focuses on rights like FREEDOM OF SPEECH, VOTING RIGHTS, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE safeguards, and sexual autonomy. Yet the Framers of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT thought that ECONOMIC LIBERTIES were the most important civil liberties—the FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, to buy and sell PROPERTY, to pursue a lawful occupation, and to protect those FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS through the judicial process. For most of the period between the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868 and the NEW DEAL revolution of the 1930s, it was these economic rights that won the greatest solicitude in the Supreme Court. During the so-called Lochner era—named for LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905)—the Court invalidated maximum hour laws, minimum wage laws, union protective laws, and other economic LEGISLATION, on the ground of undue interference with liberty of contract.

The modern conception of civil liberties is generally traced to a famous footnote in UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938), though earlier hints of the shift appear in a handful of cases from the 1920s and 1930s. In the Carolene Products footnote, the Court identified a special role for itself in protecting rights constitutive of the democratic process, such as speech and voting, as well as groups habitually disadvantaged in that process, such as racial and religious minorities. Over the next thirty years, the Court refrained from protecting the old civil liberties of contract and property, while gradually expanding its commitment to the new civil liberties of speech, voting, criminal procedure, sexual autonomy, and racial equality. By the end of the 1960s, a revolution in constitutional DOCTRINE and in the Court's perception of its role in the American political system had taken place.

The CIVIL RIGHTS and civil liberties revolutions of the WARREN COURT raise three important questions for CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY. First, how much responsibility do court decisions bear for the fundamental changes that have taken place in American society and culture since WORLD WAR II—changes like the civil rights and gender revolutions? For example, would it be more accurate to say that BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) caused or reflected the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT? Second, is it possible convincingly to distinguish the civil liberties activism of the Warren Court from the now-repudiated economic activism of the Lochner era? Third and relatedly, how valid are the claims of modern conservative critics that activist JUDICIAL REVIEW contains an inherently liberal political bias?

As to the causal consequences of legal doctrine, it is noteworthy that the Court often has claimed for itself a vital role in the protection of minority groups from majoritarian oppression. Justice HUGO L. BLACK, in CHAMBERS V. FLORIDA (1940), stated that courts stand "as havens of refuge for those who might otherwise suffer because they are helpless, weak, outnumbered, or because they are nonconforming victims of prejudice and public excitement." Similarly, legal scholars frequently assert that Brown played a critical role in inspiring the civil rights movement of the 1960s. Critics have suggested, though, that the Justices possess an obvious incentive to inflate their contributions to social change and that American CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY refutes the romantic image of the Court as savior of oppressed minorities. On this view, the Court sanctioned rather than attacked SLAVERY in the antebellum period, legitimized SEGREGATION for most of the Jim Crow era, validated the Japanese American internment during World War II, failed to protect free speech during either the First or the Second Red Scares, and approved SEX DISCRIMINATION until after the emergence of the modern women's movement.

Even the most celebrated examples of the Court's supposed role as savior of oppressed minorities are less than compelling, on this view. The landmark decision in Brown was rendered possible by a broad array of political, social, economic, and ideological forces inaugurated or accelerated by World War II; by the time the Court interceded against school segregation, half the nation already was on its side. Similarly, ROE V. WADE (1973), extending constitutional protection to ABORTION, was decided at the crest of the women's movement and was supported by half the nation from the day it was handed down. Finally, the Court protected gay rights for the first time in ROMER V. EVANS (1996) only after a social and political gay-rights movement had made substantial inroads against traditional attitudes toward divergent SEXUAL ORIENTATIONS.

Whatever the practical consequences of the revolution in civil rights and civil liberties doctrine, the Court's decisions have been intensely controversial. Critics have assailed the Justices for undermining democracy by writing their own value preferences into the Constitution, ignoring traditional constitutional constraints such as text and ORIGINAL INTENT, and assuming for the Court the role of solving societal problems that were going unaddressed by the political branches. Defenders of the Court's expanded civil liberties role generally have replied in one of two ways. Some have argued that certain rights are too fundamental to be left to the political process, and regardless of whether they are textually enshrined in the Constitution, the legitimacy of the entire political system depends on their being validated in court.

Other defenders have advocated a more constrained role for the Court, which validates its protection of rights fundamental to the democratic process, such as speech or voting, while continuing to repudiate Lochner-style interventions in behalf of economic rights. This position, known as political process theory, derives from the famous footnote in Carolene Products and has received its fullest elaboration in John Hart Ely's landmark book, Democracy and Distrust (1980). According to this view, courts act legitimately when protecting rights and groups unlikely to receive a fair hearing in the political process. For example, the self-interest of legislators seeking reelection often biases the political process against affording due recognition to the right of the political opposition to speak freely and have its political strength fairly measured. According to political process theory, judicial intervention in this context is vital to maintaining the integrity of the democratic process. Critics, however, have questioned the capacity of political process theory to provide a principled distinction between the contested value choices implicated in defining a properly functioning political process and those involved, for example, in resolving substantive constitutional disputes over abortion, SCHOOL PRAYERS, and AFFIRMATIVE ACTION. For these critics, the only difference between the Warren Court's protection of democratic values such as speech and voting and the Lochner-era Court's protection of economic liberties lies in the competing political agenda of the Justices.

This criticism leads naturally to a third question that has dominated the popular debate over judicial review since the heyday of the Warren Court—does judicial review contain an inherently liberal political bias? Conservative critics largely have succeeded in winning this rhetorical battle; even liberal newspaper journalists generally seem to accept the view that JUDICIAL ACTIVISM is a practice engaged in only by liberal judges. A broader historical perspective tends to refute this view. For much of the Court's history, it was advocates of PROGRESSIVE CONSTITUTIONAL THOUGHT who challenged judicial review for blocking economic redistribution, whether in the form of a mildly progressive income tax, debtor relief laws, minimum wage and maximum hour legislation, or union protective measures.

Perhaps of greater present relevance, the performances of the BURGER COURT and the REHNQUIST COURT have corroborated the politically double-edged nature of judicial activism. Conservative activism has invalidated race-based affirmative action, minority voting districts, HATE SPEECH regulation, environmental land-use restrictions, and CAMPAIGN FINANCE reform. Liberal activism, on the other hand, has undermined school prayer, abortion regulation, restrictions on indecent speech, and discrimination against African Americans, women, and gays. Thus, judicial review has no intrinsic political bias.

Still, the conservative critics of the Court's expanded civil liberties role may have a point. To observe that judicial review is a politically double-edged sword is not to deny that the practice has any systematic bias, only to suggest that the bias operates along an axis other than partisan politics. Justices of the U.S. Supreme Court (indeed of any state or federal court) are overwhelmingly upper-middle-class or upper-class and extremely well-educated, usually at the nation's most elite universities. Moreover, unlike legislators who generally share a similar cultural background, federal judges enjoy a relative political insulation that significantly reduces any offsetting obligation to respond to the nonelite political preferences of their constituents. Throughout most of American history, this elite cultural bias yielded a constitutional jurisprudence that was somewhat more protective of PROPERTY RIGHTS than was majoritarian politics. Since the constitutional revolution of the 1930s, though, social and cultural issues largely have displaced economic ones from the forefront of the constitutional agenda. And on these issues, a culturally elite bias has roughly correlated with a politically liberal one. That is, on the culture-war issues of school prayer, abortion, PORNOGRAPHY, gay rights, and FLAG DESECRATION, liberal opinion tends to be strongly correlated with years of education and economic class.

This point about the culturally elite bias of judicial review is not inconsistent with the earlier one about the limited capacity and inclination of the Justices to deviate from majoritarian norms. Dominant social mores set the broad boundaries within which judicial review operates; the Court never strays far from them. Thus it is implausible to expect the Court to have invalidated racial segregation before the dramatic transformation in American racial attitudes spawned by World War II; forbidden sex discrimination before the rise of the women's movement; or banned prayer from the public schools before the gradual undermining of the nation's unofficial Protestant establishment. Yet within the parameters established by dominant public opinion, the Justices enjoy some room for maneuver. Plainly the Court's decisions invalidating school prayer or flag-burning prohibitions and protecting the procedural rights of alleged criminals have not commanded majority support. Within the limited playing field that dominant opinion establishes for judicial review, then, the culturally elite values of the Justices may bias outcomes on certain issues in a particular direction.

MICHAEL J. KLARMAN
(2000)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FRIEDMAN, BARRY 1993 Dialogue and Judicial Review. Michigan Law Review 91:577–682.

KLARMAN, MICHAEL J. 1994 Brown, Racial Change, and the Civil Rights Movement. Virginia Law Review 80:7–150.

——— 1996 Rethinking the Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Revolutions. Virginia Law Review 82:1–66.

MCCLOSKEY, ROBERT 1994 The American Supreme Court, 2nd ed. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

ROSENBERG, GERALD N. 1991 The Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring About Social Change? Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press.

CIVIL LIBERTIES AND THE ANTISLAVERY CONTROVERSY

Two civil liberties issues linked the freedom of communication enjoyed by whites with the cause of the slave: the mails controversy of 1835–1837 and the gag controversy of 1836–1844.

By 1835, southern political leaders, anxiety-ridden by threats to the security of slavery, were in no mood to tolerate a propaganda initiative of the American Anti-Slavery Society, which began weekly mailings of illustrated antislavery periodicals throughout the South. The first mailing was seized and burned by a Charleston, South Carolina, mob, an action condoned by Postmaster General Amos Kendall. President ANDREW JACKSON recommended legislation that would prohibit mailings of antislavery literature to the slave states. Senator JOHN C. CALHOUN denounced this as a threat to the SOVEREIGNTY of the states, while some northern political leaders objected to it on the grounds that it inhibited the FIRST AMENDMENT rights of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS of their constituents. In ensuing debates, the POSTAL POWER under Article I, section 8, and the First Amendment became the center of debates on Jackson's counterproposal, which would have mandated interstate cooperation in suppressing abolitionist mailings. Ironically, in 1836, Congress apparently inadvertently enacted legislation making it a misdemeanor to delay delivery of mail. But by 1837, abolitionists abandoned the campaign for more promising antislavery ventures.

The gag controversy proved to be longer-lived. Opponents of SLAVERY had been petitioning Congress ever since 1790 on various subjects relating to slavery, such as the international and interstate slave trade. Such petitions were routinely either tabled or shunted to the oblivion of committees. Southerners in Congress were extremely inhospitable to such petitions, especially when the Anti-Slavery Society discontinued its mails campaign in favor of a stepped-up petition and memorial drive in 1836 focusing on the abolition of slavery in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. To cope with the resulting flood of unwelcome petitions, Calhoun proposed that each house, acting under the rules of proceedings clause of Article I, section 5, refuse to receive petitions concerning slavery, rather than receiving and then tabling them. More moderate congressmen, however, adopted alternate resolutions providing for automatic tabling of such petitions. This only stimulated the antislavery societies to more successful petition drives. In response, each house annually adopted evermore stringent gag rules, the House of Representatives making its a standing rule in 1840.

Congressman JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, the former President who represented a Massachusetts district in the House, carried on an eight-year struggle to subvert the gags; he slyly introduced abolitionist petitions despite the standing rule. Enraged southern congressmen determined to stop his impertinence by offering a motion to censure him in 1842. The move backfired because it gave Adams a splendid forum to defend the First Amendment FREEDOM OF PETITION and to dramatize the threat to whites' CIVIL LIBERTIES posed by the attempted suppression of the antislavery movement. The Adams censure resolution failed. Proslavery congressmen then succeeded in censuring another antislavery Whig, Joshua Giddings of Ohio, for introducing antislavery resolutions in the House in 1842. He resigned his seat, immediately ran for reelection in what amounted to a referendum on his antislavery position, and was overwhelmingly reelected. Recognizing that the gags were not only tattered and ineffectual but now also counterproductive, stimulating the very debate they were meant to choke, Congress let them lapse in 1844.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1977 The Sources of Antislavery Constitutionalism in America, 1760–1848. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

CIVIL–MILITARY RELATIONS

The Constitution has a twofold impact on civil-military relations: first, through its specific provisions on this subject: and second, through the overall structure of government and division of powers it prescribes.

Several provisions of the Constitution deal directly with civil-military relations. The second clause of Article I, section 6, prohibits members of Congress from simultaneously holding other federal office. Article I, section 8, gives Congress the power to declare war, to grant LETTERS OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL, to make rules concerning captures, to raise and to support armies, to provide and to maintain a navy, to make rules for the regulation of the armed forces, to provide for calling the militia into federal service, and to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia. Article I, section 10, limits the military powers of the states. Article II, section 2, makes the President COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the armed forces and authorizes the appointment of officers. The SECOND AMENDMENT protects the right of the people to keep and bear arms, in order to constitute a "well-regulated militia." And the THIRD AMENDMENT severely restricts the quartering of troops in private homes.

These provisions constitute only a skeletal framework for the relations between civil government and military forces and between the military and society. Some of them (for example, those dealing with the quartering of troops, the two-year limit on appropriations for the army, the incompatibility of congressional and military office) have become obsolete, meaningless, or unobserved in practice. When written, however, these provisions reflected a broad consensus, expressed in the debates and actions of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION and the state ratifying conventions. Three key views underlay that consensus. The Framers believed that military power and military usurpation should be feared, that soldiering should be an aspect of CITIZENSHIP, and that control of military power should be divided between state and national governments and between President and Congress.

The "supremacy of the civil over the military," said Justice FRANK MURPHY in DUNCAN V. KAHANAMOKU (1945), "is one of our great heritages." At the time of the framing of the Constitution, everyone agreed on the need to insure civil authority over the military. One of the indictments of George III in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE was that he had "affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil Power." Several state constitutions, including the Virginia and Massachusetts Bills of Rights, contained declarations that the military should in all cases and at all times be subordinate to and governed by the civil power. CHARLES PINCKNEY vainly proposed inclusion of similar language in the federal Constitution, and the lack of such a provision was the target of much criticism in the state conventions. Objections were also raised because the Constitution had no provision guarding against the dangers of a peacetime standing army.

In practice civil supremacy prevailed for two reasons: the deeply ingrained antimilitary attitudes continuously prevalent in American political culture, and the equally deeply ingrained ideal of the apolitical, nonpartisan, impartial military professional that gained ascendancy in the officer corps after the CIVIL WAR. In the early nineteenth century, the line between professional officer and professional politician was unclear, and individual military officers were often involved in politics. After WORLD WAR II many military officers were appointed to high civil positions in government. Yet at no time, in peace or war, did serious challenges to civilian authority issue from the central military institutions. When, as in the Civil War and the KOREAN WAR, individual military leaders challenged or seemed to challenge the authority of the President, they were removed from command. The Supreme Court, in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), also limited military power by holding that martial law may operate only in situations where actual conflict forces civil courts to close. The Court has also narrowly defined the extent to which American civilians accompanying the armed forces overseas are subject to military justice, as in REID V. COVERT (1957).

In the 1780s there was general agreement that the militia should be the principal source of defense for a free society. Some members of the Constitutional Convention proposed prohibiting a standing army in peacetime or limiting the size of such an army. These proposals were rebutted both in the debates and in THE FEDERALIST by arguments that there was no way to prevent another nation with a standing army from threatening the United States, and that inability to maintain such a force would invite aggression. Everyone agreed, however, that in keeping with the tradition dating from the English BILL OF RIGHTS of 1689, the power to establish military forces rested with Congress. There was widespread belief that appropriations for the army should be limited to one year, and a two-year limit was approved only because it seemed likely that Congress might assemble only once every two years. The Constitution is silent on the means Congress may employ to recruit military manpower. CONSCRIPTION was, however, an accepted eighteenth-century practice, and the Supreme Court has held that the power to "raise and support" armies included, "beyond question," the power "to classify and conscript manpower for military service" in peace or in war.

The early consensus on the central role of the militia did not extend to the question of who should control it. Traditionally, the militias had been state forces, and it was widely accepted that they should remain under state control in time of peace. The national government, however, needed the power to call on the militia to deal with invasions or insurrections. Experience in the Revolution also had demonstrated the need to insure that the militia meet minimum national standards. JAMES MADISON remarked that control over the militia "did not seem in its nature to be divisible between two distinct authorities," but in the end that control was divided: the national government took responsibility for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and the state governments were responsible for the appointment of officers and training. In the debates that led to this shared control, the most repeated and persuasive argument of the nationalists was the need to have a well-organized and disciplined militia under national control so as to reduce reliance on a standing army. Support in the state conventions for what subsequently became the SECOND AMENDMENT was based on similar reasoning.

In the Militia Act of 1792, Congress did not effectively exercise its powers to organize, arm, and discipline the militia. In effect, the states retained sole control over the militia in peacetime. When required, the militia was called into federal service for the limited constitutional purposes of executing the laws, suppressing insurrections, and repelling invasions. Even in wartime, however, the assertion of federal control was controversial because the states guarded their power to appoint officers. In addition, militia units could not be used outside the United States. Thus in the nineteenth century the militia was under state control in peace and under dual control in war. Laws passed between 1903 and 1933 in effect put the militia, now called the National Guard, under dual control in peace and national control in war. Federal support was greatly expanded, federal standards were more effectively imposed, and provision was made to order the National Guard into federal service in war under the army clause of the Constitution, thus precluding any assertion of state power.

In Great Britain the king was the COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the army and navy and in some states the governors played similar roles. The Federal Convention gave the President command of the national military forces and of the militia when in federal service. War Presidents, most notably ABRAHAM LINCOLN, FRANKLIN ROOSEVELT, and LYNDON B. JOHNSON, actively directed military operations. The commander-in-chief clause is unique in the Constitution in assigning power in terms of an office rather than a function. It is, consequently, unclear to what extent it gives the President powers extending beyond military command. In The Federalist, ALEXANDER HAMILTON wrote that the clause grants "nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the military and naval forces"; yet he also wrote that the clause makes the executive responsible for the "direction of war" and gives him "the power of directing and employing the common strength." The latter definition might justify a President's seizing a steel plant to insure the continuation of war production; the former clearly would not. Beginning with Lincoln, Presidents have, however, used the clause to justify the exercise of a wide range of war powers.

The ineligibility clause of the Constitution expressly prohibits appointment of congressmen to civil positions created while they are in Congress. The Framers specifically exempted military positions, because, in case of a war, citizens capable of conducting it might be members of Congress. The incompatibility clause, on the other hand, applies to both civil and military offices. Enforced in the nineteenth century, this prohibition against simultaneously holding legislative position and military office has been frequently and systematically violated in the twentieth century by congressmen holding reserve commissions in the military services.

The more fundamental provisions in the Constitution regarding the distribution of power have had an equal effect on shaping civil-military relations, complicating, and at times frustrating, the achievement of civilian control over the military. FEDERALISM required that authority over the militia be divided between state and national governments. This division has enhanced the power of the militia by giving them two masters that might be played off against each other. The division of control over the national forces between Congress and President has worked in comparable fashion. Military officers testifying before congressional committees have some freedom to determine how far they should go in defending the policies of their commander-in-chief and how far they should go in expressing their own views. Military officers working in implicit cooperation with influential members of Congress may be able to undermine policies of the President. In addition, the commander-in-chief clause has at times been interpreted to encourage a direct relationship between the President and the uniformed heads of the armed services, bypassing the civilian secretaries of those departments. The Framers clearly intended to establish firm civilian control over the military, and many specific provisions are designed to secure that goal. Yet, by limiting the power of each branch of the government, the constitutional system effectively limits the power those branches can exercise over the military.

SAMUEL P. HUNTINGTON
(1986)

Bibliography

HUNTINGTON, SAMUEL P. 1957 The Soldier and the State: The Theory and Politics of Civil-Military Relations. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

RIKER, WILLIAM H. 1957 Soldiers of the States: The Role of the National Guard in American Democracy. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press.

SMITH, LOUIS 1951 American Democracy and Military Power. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

CIVIL RIGHTS

The core of the concept "civil rights" is freedom from RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. Although the term, not improperly, often refers to freedom from discrimination based on nationality, alienage, gender, age, sexual preference, or physical or mental handicap—or even RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, immunity from official brutality, FREEDOM OF SPEECH, the RIGHT OF PRIVACY, and additional rights found in the Constitution or elsewhere—other terms can characterize these rights. Sometimes they are referred to as CIVIL LIBERTIES or by particular names (for example, gender or handicap discrimination). Although the racial discrimination cases have influenced doctrinal development in many of these other areas, standards governing them often differ at the levels of both judicial scrutiny and appropriate remedies. Racial discrimination deserves separate treatment.

The constitutional law of civil rights begins in the THIRTEENTH, Fourteenth, and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS. These "CIVIL WAR amendments" were adopted during RECONSTRUCTION to effect a radical revision of the status of blacks and a sharp change in relations between national and state governments. Until the end of the Civil War, the situation of black people had been dominated by SLAVERY in the South and a regime under which, in the words of the Supreme Court in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), they had no rights that a white man was bound to respect. Their legal rights or disabilities derived from state law, subject to no meaningful control by the national government. The Civil War amendments changed that. The Thirteenth Amendment abolished slavery; the Fourteenth, among other things, prohibited states from denying to any person DUE PROCESS OF LAW or EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. (Other provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment had little practical effect). The Fifteenth Amendment protected VOTING RIGHTS against governmentally imposed racial discrimination.

Each amendment empowered Congress to adopt enforcing legislation. Such laws were enacted—most notably the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866—but they were not implemented, were interpreted restrictively, or fell into disuse following the COMPROMISE OF 1877 which assured the Presidential election of RUTHERFORD B. HAYES in exchange for his pledge to withdraw Union troops from the South and end Reconstruction. During the same period southern states, effectively free from national control, implemented BLACK CODES, and later Jim Crow laws, which returned black people to a status that was only nominally free. No significant national civil rights law was adopted again until the mid-1960s.

Between Reconstruction and the mid-twentieth century, the judiciary sporadically found significant content in the Civil War amendments; yet racial SEGREGATION and discrimination remained pervasive in the South and widespread elsewhere. During the same period, the Fourteenth Amendment was interpreted expansively to protect burgeoning business enterprise. Between BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) and the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, the main period of the modern civil rights revolution, the doctrinal potential of the amendments to advance the cause of black people became largely realized. Implementation became the main task, taking the form of comprehensive civil rights statutes, lawsuits brought by the United States and private parties, and administrative enforcement. As a result of this process, some whites have charged that remedies for blacks violate their constitutional rights: for example, that AFFIRMATIVE ACTION constitutes "reverse discrimination," or that SCHOOL BUSING for integration injures them. Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES' aphorism, "the life of the law has not been logic: it has been experience," is as least as true of civil rights law as of any other branch of law.

The concept of "equal protection of the laws" underwent its greatest evolution between 1896, when PLESSY V. FERGUSON upheld a state law requiring SEPARATE BUT EQUAL segregation of whites and blacks in intrastate rail travel, and 1954, when Brown v. Board of Education held that segregated public EDUCATION denied equal protection. Although Plessy dealt only with intrastate transportation and Brown only with education, each was quickly generalized to other aspects of life.

The very factors which the Supreme Court invoked to uphold segregation in 1896 were reassessed in Brown and used to justify a contrary result. The Plessy majority held that the framers of the Civil War amendments did not intend to eliminate segregation in rail travel which the Court characterized as a social, not a political activity. It thereby distinguished STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1880), in which the Supreme Court had held that excluding blacks from juries violated the Fourteenth Amendment because it stigmatized them. Plessy dismissed the argument that segregating blacks from whites could justify segregating Protestants from Catholics, because that would be unreasonable; racial segregation was reasonable, for state court decisions and statutes had authorized segregation in schools. Finally, the Court addressed what today is called social psychology, writing that although Plessy claimed segregation connoted black inferiority, whites would not consider themselves stigmatized if they were segregated by a legislature controlled by blacks. Any harmful psychological effects of segregation were self-inflicted.

Plessy became so deeply ingrained in jurisprudence that as late as 1927, in GONG LUM V. RICE, a Court in which Holmes, LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, and HARLAN F. STONE sat unanimously agreed that racial segregation in education "has been many times decided to be within the constitutional power of the state legislature to settle, without the intervention of the federal courts under the Federal Constitution."

Other Supreme Court decisions, however, offered hope that some day the Court might come to a contrary conclusion. In YICK WO V. HOPKINS (1886) the Court invalidated as a denial of equal protection a city ordinance which, under the guise of prohibiting laundries from operating in wooden buildings, where virtually all Chinese laundries were located, excluded Chinese from that business. In BUCHANAN V. WARLEY (1917) it invalidated racial zoning of urban land under the due process clause. Later it struck down state laws prohibiting blacks from participating in primary elections. By 1950, in SWEATT V. PAINTER and MCLAURIN V. OKLAHOMA STATE REGENTS, the Court invalidated segregation in law school and graduate education, without holding segregation unconstitutional per se and without abandoning the separate-but-equal formula. These and other decisions foreshadowed Brown and undermined precedents approving segregation.

Brown contradicted or distinguished Plessy on every score. It read the legislative history of the Civil War Amendments as inconclusive on the question of school segregation, pointing out that although after the Civil War public education had been undeveloped and almost nonexistent for blacks, it had become perhaps the most important function of state government. In effect the amendment was treated as embodying a general evolutionary principle of equality which developed as education became more important. The Court treated early precedents as not controlling school segregation and drew from the 1950 graduate school cases support for a contrary result.

In contrast to Plessy's dismissal of the psychological effects of segregation, Brown held that "to segregate them [black children] from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone." The Court cited social science literature in support of this response to Plessy. This portion of the opinion provoked much adverse commentary, some condemning the decision as based on social science, not law. But of course, Plessy had come to its sociological conclusions without any evidence at all.

In BOLLING V. SHARPE, a companion case to Brown, the Court decided that the Fifth Amendment's due process clause prohibited school segregation in the District of Columbia. Any other result, the Court said, would be "unthinkable."

The contending arguments in Plessy and Brown not only exemplify the possibilities of legal advocacy but also raise the question how "equal protection" could be interpreted so differently at different times. After all, the arguments remained the same, but first one side prevailed, then the other. The reason for the change lies in the development of American history. Indeed, Brown suggests as much in describing how much public education had changed between Reconstruction and 1954, how essential education had become for personal development, and how much blacks had achieved. By 1954 black citizens had fought for their country in two major World Wars, the more recent of which was won against Nazi racism; had moved from concentration in the South to a more even distribution throughout the country; and had achieved much socially, politically, economically, and educationally, even though their status remained below that of whites.

The courtroom struggle leading to Brown showed that blacks were ready to participate effectively in securing their full liberation. It culminated a planned litigation campaign, building precedent upon precedent, directed by a group of mostly black lawyers headed by THURGOOD MARSHALL, then head of the NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATIONAL FUND and later a Justice of the United States Supreme Court. This campaign had many ramifications, not the least of which was to become a model for development of public interest law, which grew rapidly in the 1970s.

The nation owed black people a debt which it acknowledged officially in several ways. In the late 1940s and in Brown itself the solicitor general of the United States joined counsel for black litigants in calling upon the Supreme Court to declare segregation unconstitutional. That the country was generally prepared to accept this argument was further evidenced in the 1947 Report of President HARRY S. TRUMAN's Committee on Civil Rights. The committee called for the end of racial segregation and discrimination in education, PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS, housing, employment, voting, and all other aspects of American life.

Despite the storm of controversy stirred by the 1954 decisions, they are firmly rooted in constitutional law and nowadays there is no longer significant criticism of their results. Brown was quickly followed by decisions applying its principles to all other forms of state imposed racial segregation. Courts soon ordered desegregation of parks, beaches, sporting events, hospitals, publically owned or managed accommodations, and other public facilities.

But Brown could not affect the rights of blacks against privately imposed discrimination, for the equal protection clause is a directive to the states. The admonition that "no state" shall deny equal protection was not addressed to private employers, property owners, or those who managed privately owned public accommodations. In the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883) the Supreme Court made clear not only that the equal protection clause did not apply to private action but that Congress in enforcing the Fourteenth Amendment might not prohibit private persons from discriminating. As a consequence, national civil rights laws could not apply to private restaurants, hotels, transportation, employment, and housing—places where people spend most of their lives.

In 1960 the SIT-INS, freedom rides, and DEMONSTRATIONS burst upon the national scene, aimed first at racial exclusion from privately owned public accommodations and then at other forms of discrimination. This phase of the civil rights struggle sought to move antidiscrimination precepts beyond the limitation of state power to prohibitions against private discrimination. The cases arising out of these efforts necessarily examined the distinction between what is private and what is STATE ACTION, an issue long debated in political theory and constitutional law. On the one hand, it has been argued that privately asserted rights derive from power conferred and enforced by the state and that at bottom there is no such thing as a "private" right. According to this reasoning, applying the TRESPASS laws to enforce an owner's privately held preference against black patronage of his lunch counter would be prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment: the owner's property interest is a function of state law; the law of trespass is a state creation; prosecution and its consequences are state conduct. Pursuing such reasoning, lawyers for sit-in demonstrators identified the governmental components of otherwise private action, arguing that the Fourteenth Amendment, therefore, protected blacks who were denied service on racial grounds and later prosecuted for refusing to leave the premises. They had some legal support for this argument. Even before 1954 the Supreme Court had held in MARSH V. ALABAMA (1946) that religious proselytizing on company town property was protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT against prosecution for trespass because the town was a governmental entity, notwithstanding private ownership. Similarly, the equal protection clause had been interpreted to forbid enforcement by state courts or racially RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS against purchase or occupancy of real estate by blacks or other minorities. These cases, and their rationales, followed to the end of their logic, would mean that governmental enforcement of private discrimination violates the equal protection clause.

But the courts were not prepared to follow the reasoning to its logical conclusion. In cases in which blacks were arrested and prosecuted for entering or remaining on privately owned public accommodations where they were not wanted because of race, the Supreme Court first avoided deciding whether there was state action by ruling for the defendants on various other grounds, for example, lack of evidence or VAGUENESS of the law. In other cases the Court found state action in special circumstances: a private owner segregated because required by law; an ordinance required segregated toilets, which tended to encourage exclusion of blacks; a private restaurant leased premises from a state agency; private security guards who enforced segregation were also deputy sheriffs. But the Court balked at finding state action in prosecution for trespass to enforce a proprietor's personal decision to discriminate. The resistance grew out of a fear that to extend the state action doctrine would make most private decisions subject to government control. Moreover, if one could not call upon the state to enforce private preferences, personal force might be employed.

Other legal theorists would have differentiated between conduct prohibited by the amendment and that which is not by factoring into the decision-making process the concept of privacy. They would find, for example, that impermissible state action existed in racial exclusion from a restaurant but not from a private home. The policy against racial discrimination would prevail in the restaurant case, where there was no countervailing interest of privacy, but in the private home case the privacy interest would outweigh strictures against racial discrimination.

In 1964 the Court held that the Civil Rights Act of that year invalidated convictions of sit-in demonstrators, even those convicted before its passage. The fundamental question of precisely what level of state involvement in private conduct constitutes state action was left undecided.

The uncertain scope of the state action doctrine was underscored by the constitutional basis advanced for congressional power to pass the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Congress relied on the COMMERCE CLAUSE in addition to the Fourteenth Amendment because the commerce clause does not require state action to justify congressional regulation. The initial Supreme Court decisions upholding the 1964 Civil Rights Act, HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL V. UNITED STATES (1964) and KATZENBACH V. MCCLUNG (1964), relied on the commerce clause, and upheld applications of the law in cases of minimal effect upon commerce.

The impulse to define fully the meaning of state action was further damped by developments in Thirteenth Amendment law. The Thirteenth Amendment has no state action limitation and, therefore, covers private as well as state action. But early efforts to apply it to discrimination as a BADGE OF SERVITUDE were rejected by the Court, which held that the amendment forbade only slavery itself. The Civil Rights Act of 1866 had made illegal private racially discriminatory refusals to contract or engage in real estate transactions. But not until 1968 did the Supreme Court interpret these laws to forbid private discrimination. By the mid-1960s, through the civil rights acts of that period and the new judicial interpretation of Reconstruction legislation, it was no longer necessary to discover state action in ostensibly private conduct in order to prevent discrimination. With the passing of this need, concerted efforts to expand the courts' views of the state action concept came to a halt.

The contrast between the promise of the Constitution and its performance was nowhere better highlighted than in Brown itself. The Supreme Court treated constitutional right and remedy in two separate opinions, Brown I and Brown II, decided in 1955. Brown I decided only that racial segregation was unconstitutional, postponing decisions on the means and the pace of school desegregation. Brown II proclaimed that school segregation need not end immediately; it had to be accomplished with ALL DELIBERATE SPEED. The Court required a "prompt and reasonable" start, and permitted delay only for the time necessary for administrative changes. Opposition to desegregation, the Court said, would not justify delay. Nevertheless, southern schools actually integrated at an extremely slow pace. Not until 1969, when the Court announced that the time for "deliberate speed" had passed, did school integration proceed rapidly.

While the "deliberate speed" decision contributed to a sense that desegregation was not urgent and procrastination was tolerable, it is difficult to believe that a different formula would have materially affected the pace of integration. Armed physical opposition in Little Rock and elsewhere in the South was aimed at integration at any time, with or without deliberate speed. One hundred members of Congress signed the SOUTHERN MANIFESTO denouncing the Supreme Court, and Congress came within a single vote of severely restricting the Court's JURISDICTION. Congressional legislation implementing Brown would not be adopted until after the civil rights movement of the 1960s.

The refusal of school districts to desegregate was not susceptible to remedy because there was almost no one who would bring integration suits. No southern white lawyers would bring school suits until the 1970s; in many a southern state, there was only a handful of black lawyers with minimal resources; civil rights organizations were few, small, and overburdened; the United States Justice Department and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare had no authority to bring suit. As a consequence, where school boards resisted or claimed to be in compliance with Brown, there was hardly any way to compel change. These conditions, not "deliberate speed," kept school segregation in place. Real opportunities for the judiciary to speed the pace of integration had to await political change. That change came in the 1960s, with the pro-civil rights policies of Presidents JOHN F. KENNEDY and LYNDON B. JOHNSON, culminating in the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Supreme Court opinions stating in OBITER DICTUM that integration must be achieved rapidly began to be issued at the end of the 1960s. In the 1970s courts began to hand down detailed orders requiring the end of segregation "root and branch." Because black and white families were segregated residentially, the only way to integrate schools in many communities was to combine in single attendance zones areas separated by some distance, thus employing SCHOOL BUSING. Numerical standards also were employed to measure whether acceptable levels of integration had been reached. These techniques—particularly busing and RACIAL QUOTAS—have stimulated controversy and political opposition.

The integration of the 1970s in most instances was carried out as quickly as possible when courts ordered it. Although the deliberate speed doctrine had by then been overruled, such rapid desegregation met its literal requirements. In a typical case, the revision of boundaries and regulations and the reassignment of students and teachers took a few months. Conditions in the nation, not "deliberate speed," caused the long delay.

Brown, of course, concerned states where segregation had been required or permitted by statute. By the 1970s the Supreme Court faced the issue of northern segregation which was not caused by state statute. It differentiated between "de facto" segregation (resulting from racially segregated housing patterns) and "de jure" segregation (resulting from deliberate official decisions). Some commentators argued that there is no such thing as de facto segregation, for children always are assigned to schools by governmental action. But only where some intent to discriminate was demonstrated did the courts require desegregation. However, where an intent to discriminate has been shown in part of a district, a presumption has been held to arise that single-race schools elsewhere in the district have been the product of such intent. Under this doctrine many northern districts have been desegregated.

Often a city school district is nearly all black and surrounded by white suburban districts. The Court held in MILLIKEN V. BRADLEY (1974) that integration across district lines may not be ordered without proof of an interdistrict violation. A number of lower courts have found such violations and have ordered integration across district lines.

All of these standards were implemented, particularly in the 1970s, by the Departments of Justice and Health, Education, and Welfare (later the Department of Education). The private bar brought a considerable number of cases facilitated by congressional legislation authorizing the award of counsel to prevailing parties in school segregation, to be paid by defendants. But the intimate relation between politics and implementation of constitutional civil rights became apparent once more in the 1980s when a new administration opposed to busing and numerical standards for gauging integration virtually ceased bringing school cases to court, undertook to modify or revoke INJUNCTIONS in already decided cases, and opposed private plaintiffs in others.

Following Brown and in response to the demonstrations of the 1960s, the Civil Rights Acts of 1964, 1965, and 1968 were enacted with the goal of implementing the ideals of the Civil War amendments. But results of these laws varied according to their political, social, and legal settings. Public accommodations, for example, integrated easily; housing has been intractable. Affirmative action policies have been devised to assure certain levels of minority participation, but they have stimulated opposition by whites who claim they are being disfavored and illegally so. Controversy has also developed over the question of whether antidiscrimination orders might be entered only upon a showing of official discriminatory intent, or whether such orders are also justified to remedy the racially discriminatory effects of official policies. Affirmative action and discriminatory intent, the twin central legal issues of civil rights in the 1980s, have in common a concern with distributive fairness. Both issues have been contested in political, statutory, and constitutional arenas.

In general, the courts have sustained the constitutionality of affirmative action as a congressional remedy for past discriminations and as an appropriate judicial remedy for past statutory or constitutional violations. In medical school admissions, for example, four Justices of the Supreme Court thought a fixed racial quota favoring minorities violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and a fifth Justice found an equal protection violation; a different majority, however, concluded that an admissions policy favoring racial and other diversity, which assured the admission of a substantial but not fixed number of minorities, would be valid as an aspect of a university's First Amendment exercise of academic freedom. The Court, with three dissents, has sustained a congressionally mandated quota assuring ten percent of certain government contracts to minority contractors. And in school integration numerical measures of integration have been commonplace. In employment and voting as well, affirmative action has been incorporated into efforts to undo discrimination and has been upheld by the courts. (See REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE; FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK.)

The courts usually have required a showing of discriminatory intent in order to establish an equal protection violation, but intent may be inferred from conduct. In any event, the intent requirement may be dispensed with where Congress has legislated to make discriminatory results adequate to trigger corrective action.

The public accommodations portions of the 1964 Act prohibited discrimination in specific types of establishments (typified by those providing food or amusement) that affect INTERSTATE COMMERCE. An exception for private clubs reflected uncertainty about the lack of power (perhaps arising out of countervailing constitutional rights of association) and the desirability of controlling discrimination in such places. But the meaning of "private" in this context has not been explicated. Clubs where a substantial amount of business is conducted may not be exempt and an amendment has been proposed to make this clear.

Immediately following passage of the law the Department of Justice and private plaintiffs brought successful suits against recalcitrant enterprises. Most public accommodations complied rapidly. Large national enterprises that segregated in the South integrated because they could not afford the obloquy of resistance, threat of boycott, and consequent loss of business in the North. Many small southern businesses opened to all without problems. Even proprietors who wished to continue discriminating soon bowed to the law's commands. Today one rarely hears of public accommodations discrimination.

Before adoption of the civil rights legislation of the 1960s, the only significant federal regulations of employment discrimination were the Fifth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment, which prohibited federal and state employment discrimination, and executive order prohibition of discrimination by certain government contractors. The Railway Labor Act and the NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT were construed to forbid discrimination by covered unions. But all such limitations were difficult to enforce. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the 1968 Equal Employment Opportunity (EEO) Act were the first effective prohibitions against discrimination in employment. Private suits (with counsel fees payable to prevailing plaintiffs), suits by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission against private defendants, and suits by the Justice Department against state and local government are the primary mechanisms of enforcement. As elsewhere in modern civil rights law, the two most important issues with constitutional overtones under this law have been whether a plaintiff must prove that discrimination was intentional and whether courts may award affirmative relief, including racial quotas. As to intent, the EEO statute has been interpreted to forbid hiring and promotion criteria that have an adverse impact on a protected group but bear no adequate relationship to ability to perform the job. Thus, an intelligence test for coal handlers, or a height requirement for prison guards, which screen out blacks or women and do not indicate ability to do the job, violate the statute even absent a showing of intent to discriminate. On the other hand, when the statute is not applicable, a plaintiff can secure relief under the Constitution only by showing intentional discrimination.

Affirmative action in the form of hiring and promotion goals and timetables have been prescribed by courts and all branches of the federal government with enforcement responsibility. Moreover, some private employers have adopted these techniques as a matter of social policy or to head off anticipated charges of discrimination. The legality of such programs has been upheld in the vast majority of cases. Affirmative action has substantially increased minority and female participation in jobs it covers but continues to be attacked by nonprotected groups as unconstitutional, illegal, or unwise. In 1984 the Supreme Court held that the EEO Act prohibits enjoining layoffs of black beneficiaries of a consent decree requiring certain levels of black employment where that would result in discharging whites with greater seniority.

Although the Fifteenth Amendment expressly protects the right to vote against racial discrimination and the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause also has been interpreted to do so, voting discrimination was widespread and blatant well into the 1960s, and to some extent it still persists. Apart from physical violence and intimidation, which lasted until the mid-1960s, a long line of discriminatory devices has been held to be in violation of the Constitution and statutes, only to be succeeded by new ones. Very early, southern states adopted GRANDFATHER CLAUSES, requiring voters to pass literacy tests but exempting those who were entitled to vote in 1866, along with their lineal descendants—which meant whites only. When the courts struck down the grandfather clause, it was succeeded by laws permitting registration only during a very brief period of time without passing a literacy test. Thereafter even those who could pass the test were not permitted to register. Very few blacks could take advantage of this narrow window, but the stratagem was not outlawed until 1939. Most southern states through the 1920s had laws prohibiting blacks from voting in party PRIMARY ELECTIONS. In the South, the Democratic party excluded blacks, and the winner of the Democratic primary always was elected. These laws were held unconstitutional in the 1940s and 1950s on the grounds that the party primary was an integral part of the state's electoral system, despite its nominal autonomy. As the white primary fell, laws and practices were widely adopted requiring registrants to read and understand texts like the Alabama State Constitution or to answer registrars' questions such as "how many bubbles are there in a bar of soap." These tests were held unconstitutional. Racial GERRYMANDERING, a not uncommon practice where blacks in fact voted, also was enjoined as unconstitutional. Other impediments to voting were not motivated solely by racial considerations but affected blacks disproportionately, such as the POLL TAX, later prohibited by constitutional amendment. LITERACY TESTS also lent themselves to discriminatory administration.

The VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 invalidated any and all racially discriminatory tests and devices. But, more important, states in which there was a history of voting discrimination (identified by low registration or voter turnout) could not adopt new voting standards unless those standards were certified as nondiscriminatory by the Department of Justice. This prohibition ended the tactic of substituting one discriminatory device for another. Where they were needed, federal officials could be sent to monitor registration and voting or, indeed, to register voters.

Although the 1965 law significantly reduced racial discrimination in the electoral process, abuses persisted in the forms of inconvenient registration procedures, gerrymandering, occasional intimidation, and creation of MULTIMEMBER DISTRICTS. This last device has its roots in post-Reconstruction efforts to dilute black voting strength. The use of single-member districts to elect a city council would result in the election of blacks from those districts where blacks constitute a majority. By declaring the entire city a multimember district, entitled to elect a number of at-large candidates, the majority white population can, if votes are racially polarized, elect an all-white council—a result that has occurred frequently. The Supreme Court required a showing of discriminatory intent if such a voting system were to be held unconstitutional. But the interplay between Court and Congress produced an amendment of the Voting Rights Act in 1982, permitting proof of a violation of the act by a showing of discriminatory effect.

Affirmative action has been an issue in voting as in other areas. The Supreme Court has held that, upon a showing of past voting discrimination, the attorney general may condition approval of legislative redistricting upon a race-conscious drawing of district lines to facilitate election of minority candidates.

Until 1968, the most important federal prohibition of housing discrimination was the equal protection clause, which was held in SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948) to prohibit judicial enforcement of restrictive covenants among property owners forbidding occupancy of property by members of racial minorities. The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit racial segregation in public housing, but the construction of public housing has virtually ceased.

The Fair Housing Act of 1968 marked the completion of the main statutory efforts to satisfy the prescriptions of President HARRY S. TRUMAN's 1947 Committee on Civil Rights. On the eve of the law's passage, the Supreme Court interpreted the Civil Rights Act of 1866 to forbid refusals to engage in real property transactions on racial grounds. Nonetheless, the 1866 and 1968 acts have been the least effective of the civil rights acts. Their failure owes to deep, persistent opposition to housing integration, to a lack of means of enforcement commensurate with the extent of the problem, and to a shortage in the housing market of houses in the price range which most minority buyers can afford. Because the housing market is atomized, a single court order cannot have widespread effect. (Housing is thus unlike education, where an entire district may be desegregated, or employment, where government agencies and other large employers can be required to take steps affecting thousands of employees.)

An effort to address the relationship between race and economics in housing foundered at the constitutional level when the Court held that large-lot zoning—which precluded construction of inexpensive housing, thereby excluding minorities—was not invalid under the Constitution absent a demonstration of racially discriminatory intent. The 1968 Fair Housing Act authorizes judicial relief when such laws produce discriminatory effects, without demonstration of intent. Nevertheless, economic factors and political opposition have prevented the statutory standard from having a significant practical impact. In several states where state law has invalidated such zoning, the actual change in racial housing patterns has been slight.

Some legislative efforts to desegregate housing have run into constitutional obstacles. A municipality's prohibition of "For Sale" signs to discourage panic selling by whites in integrated neighborhoods has been held to violate the First Amendment. A judge's award of damages for violation of the Fair Housing Act has been held to violate the Sixth Amendment right of TRIAL BY JURY (subsequently, contrary to civil rights lawyers' expectations, jury verdicts often have been favorable to plaintiffs). A large governmentally assisted housing development's racial quota, set up with the aim of preventing "tipping" (whites moving out when the percentage of blacks exceeds a certain point), was still being contested in the mid-1980s.

From constitutional adoption, through interpretation, and judicial and statutory implementation, the law of civil rights has interacted with the world that called it into being. No great departures from settled doctrine are to be anticipated in the near future. But similar assertions might have been made confidently at various points in the history of civil rights, only to be proved wrong in years to come.

JACK GREENBERG
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Civil Rights Movement.)

Bibliography

BLACK, CHARLES L., JR. 1967 Foreword: State Action, Equal Protection, and California's Proposition 14. Harvard Law Review 81:69–109.

EASTLAND, TERRY and BENNETT, WILLIAM J. 1979 Counting by Race. New York: Basic Books.

GREENBERG, JACK 1968 The Supreme Court, Civil Rights and Civil Dissonance. Yale Law Journal 77:1520–1544.

JOINT CENTER FOR POLITICAL STUDIES 1984 Minority Vote Dilution, Chandler Davidson, ed. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press.

KIRP, DAVID L. 1983 Just Schools: The Idea of Racial Equality in American Education. Berkeley: University of California Press.

KLUGER, RICHARD 1975 Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Knopf.

KONVITZ, MILTON R. 1961 Century of Civil Rights. New York: Columbia University Press.

KUSHNER, JAMES A. 1983 Fair Housing: Discrimination in Real Estate, Community Development, and Revitalization. New York: Shepard's/McGraw-Hill.

SCHLEI, BARBARA and GROSSMAN, PAUL 1983 Employment Discrimination Law, 2nd ed. Washington, D.C.: Bureau of National Affairs.

U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS 1981 Affirmative Action in the 1980's: Dismantling the Process of Discrimination. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

CIVIL RIGHTS
(Update 1)

In contemporary legal discourse, civil rights refer principally to legislative and judicial proscriptions against racial SEGREGATION and RACIAL DISCRIMINATION—although some branches of civil rights law concern SEX DISCRIMINATION and discrimination based on religion, ethnicity, national origin, physical or mental handicap, and SEXUAL ORIENTATION. The primary sources of civil rights are the CIVIL WAR amendments to the Constitution and congressional legislation enacted pursuant to these amendments. In common usage, however, the term civil rights includes antidiscrimination legislation enacted under Congress's other constitutional powers, federal regulations, executive orders, and state laws, as well as judicial decisions interpreting all of these sources.

There have been two major periods of civil rights activity. The first, commonly referred to as RECONSTRUCTION, began at the end of the CIVIL WAR and lasted little more than a decade. The beginning of the second period, sometimes called the Second Reconstruction, is often placed at 1954, with the Supreme Court's decision in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954).

Although all three branches of the national government have participated in establishing the scope of civil rights, in recent years the Supreme Court has been the focus of continuing interest and often heated debate. The Court has played a highly visible role in determining the applicability of formal civil rights guarantees to social activity, and since Brown, the Court has been widely seen as the institution primarily responsible for articulating the morality of racial equality. This perception is ironic, considering the Court's role in eviscerating civil rights legislation during the first RECONSTRUCTION—a history that seems especially vivid in light of some of the Court's recent decisions narrowing the substantive content of civil rights.

Civil rights jurisprudence generally involves two broad issues: defining the right that has allegedly been violated and determining the scope of the remedy once a violation has been found. In theory, the latter follows the former because the Supreme Court often says that the nature of the violation determines the scope of the remedy. However, in practice, the relation between the two is not so neatly defined. First, civil rights remedies do not ineluctably follow the finding of a violation. For example, although the Court in Brown v. Board of Education determined that segregation violated the constitutional rights of black school children, the aggrieved children were forced to await Brown II v. Board of Education (1955) before the Court issued a remedy. Even this remedy was partial; school boards were not required to eliminate the violation immediately, but "with all deliberate speed." It is also not clear that determining the scope of civil rights remedies actually follows the determination that a violation has occurred. The reverse may occasionally be true: commentators often speculate that the Court's decision to reject a claim of constitutional injury has been influenced by concerns over its ability to administer a manageable and effective remedy. Whatever the exact sequence may be, the narrowed conception of civil rights that evolved during the midstages of the Second Reconstruction has been accompanied by a correspondingly limited scope for remedial policies.

Recent conflicts over civil rights issues reflect the ongoing effort to derive specific resolutions from general principles set forth in the Constitution—an effort that historically has produced shifting and sometimes contradictory interpretations. The THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, for example, renders SLAVERY and its badges and incidents unconstitutional, whereas the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT guarantees equal CITIZENSHIP and equality before the law. The late-nineteenth-century Court determined that neither PRIVATE DISCRIMINATION nor state-mandated segregation implicated these civil guarantees. Yet these principles are currently interpreted to permit statutory regulation of private discrimination and to prohibit state-sponsored racial segregation.

Thus, although it seems clear that equality before the law is a basic civil right guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, this ideal has historically offered no clear basis for determining the scope of civil rights because equality is subject to multiple interpretations. In the modern civil rights era, equality has been interpreted to forbid racial discrimination, but even this formula offers no clear basis for determining the scope of civil rights. For example, it is not clear whether the proscription against racial discrimination applies only to explicit racial categories or whether it applies more broadly to policies, practices, and customs that appear, on their face, neutral, but exact similar exclusionary effects. It is also not clear whether race-conscious efforts to remedy the effects of racial discrimination are consistent with or a violation of the prohibition. It is also not clear which background circumstances and conditions are relevant and which are not in determining whether an act or policy is discriminatory. Anatole France's oft-quoted saw that "Law in its majestic equality forbids the rich and poor alike from sleeping under bridges" illustrates the transparency of purely formal conceptions of equality that do not acknowledge the importance of social and economic inequality.

Post-1986 developments manifest a ripening of conflict over the question of whether civil rights law contemplates only formal equality or whether it contemplates something more. Judges, scholars, legislators, and laymen have debated whether racial equality requires only the cessation of practices that explicitly discriminate on the basis of race or whether it also demands a full dismantling of practices, policies, and structures that continue to produce racial inequality. The opposing approaches to these questions derive from competing conceptualizations of civil rights: the antidiscrimination approach and the antidomination approach.

The antidiscrimination approach focuses on achieving formal equality through the eradication of racial classifications and purposeful discrimination. It emphasizes individual-centered harms and colorblind remedies. In contrast, the antidomination view tends to look beyond formally manifested or intentional discrimination to the circumstances and conditions of inequality. Ultimately, this wider perspective envisions the creation of legal remedies and social practices that will foster greater RACIAL BALANCE throughout society.

Many, if not most, civil rights decisions are consistent with either approach. However, rough distinctions between the two are apparent in current debates over the extent to which pervasive conditions of racial inequality implicate civil rights and bear on the scope of civil rights remedies. The doctrinal arenas in which this conflict is most apparent have involved discriminatory intent and AFFIRMATIVE ACTION.

Although the scope of the intent doctrine was largely determined in the 1970s, its full impact has become increasingly apparent in subsequent years. Discriminatory intent was first articulated as the sine qua non of an EQUAL PROTECTION claim in WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976). In this case, plaintiffs challenged the use of a reading and writing test to screen applicants for employment in Washington, D.C., as police officers. Not shown to measure skills necessary for effective performance as a police officer, the test served as an effective barrier to black recruitment. The Court nevertheless determined that an equal-protection claim could be sustained only if the test had been adopted with the intent to discriminate against minority applicants. This intent standard, as further clarified in later cases, could not be satisfied even where the employer adopting the challenged policy or practice did so with full knowledge of its disproportionate impact. In recent years, the discriminatory-intent doctrine has, in effect, provided a presumption of constitutionality to most racially unequal conditions because it is the unusual case in which some discriminatory intent is manifest in a governmental decision. Thus, racial inequalities that have historically burdened nonwhite communities and that continue to exist today in employment, education, housing, and criminal justice generally do not implicate civil rights. Although the Supreme Court has acknowledged that such disparities often result from societal discrimination, unless a particular discriminatory decision can be identified and isolated, such inequalities are not seen to raise any civil rights issues and thus require no remedy.

Many commentators and some members of the Court have criticized the Court's use of the discriminatory-intent test to distinguish inequalities that violate the Constitution from those that do not. They assert that the presence of explicit intent should not exhaust the definition of constitutional injury. Some point out that the model of discrimination contemplated by the intent requirement is simply anachronistic. In the aftermath of Brown's rejection of formal white supremacy, few decision makers currently adopt policies that explicitly discriminate against blacks.

Even on its own terms, the intent standard is inadequate, for racial animus may play a role in decision making, yet be difficult to prove. Indeed, racial motivation may remain hidden even to the actor. Yet another problem is that the intent standard tends to focus inquiry on a single allegedly discriminatory actor when there are often multiple actors, many of whom have acted without animus, but who, in the aggregate, perpetuate the discriminatory effects of past discrimination.

The principle of purposeful discrimination also fails to address inequality that is reproduced by social practices that have now become ingrained in American society. Critics have argued that the intent standard embodies a superficial conceptualization of formal equality in that its critical scope focuses only on the most external aspects of racial discrimination. This framework virtually excludes consideration of racial categories that are effectively created through apparently neutral practices. Sometimes referred to as "procedural discrimination," practices and policies that do not discriminate on their face, but predictably produce racial disparities throughout society are more common sources of inequity than are formal racial categories. Unvalidated standardized tests, subjective evaluation procedures, nepotism, word-of-mouth hiring practices, and even the high-school diploma requirements can unfairly limit the opportunities of minorities. Whether intentional or unthinking, these practices disadvantage and burden minorities in ways that are closely related to the formal discriminations of the past.

Such criticisms are informed by a view that the moral and political objective of the Fourteenth Amendment is to empower the national government to eliminate the effects of white supremacy. Eliminating intentional discrimination does not fully satisfy this mandate, as purposeful harm is simply one of many means of perpetuating white supremacy.

Despite the effective limits that the intent standard places on the scope of civil rights litigation, defenders marshal several arguments to justify its currency. One is that intentional discrimination prevailed during the period preceding Brown, and it is this form of discrimination that is now understood as incompatible with the nation's ideals. Institutionally, the intent standard is justified because intentional racial discrimination is precisely the kind of perversion of democracy that the Court is empowered to correct. Remedying these harms and eliminating these tendencies justify and exhaust the moral and ideological commitment of civil rights. Any other rule, it is argued, would involve judicial overreaching and undue interference with myriad governmental and private practices that sometimes produce racially disproportionate results. Moreover, it would stretch the Court's institutional and symbolic resources to fashion appropriate remedies if a broader standard were used. In sum, there is no ideological, political, or moral justification to move beyond intentional discrimination. Racially disparate results do not themselves speak to civil rights; it is racially unequal treatment that constitutes the crux of the injury. Under this view, the intent standard thus effectively mediates between legitimate and illegitimate conceptions of civil rights.

The intent standard, along with other doctrines in current vogue with the Supreme Court's majority, represents a refusal to extend constitutional protections to preclude institutional and systemic discrimination. Although aggregate views of racial disparities suggest that racial separation and stratification are still common in employment, housing, voting, and the criminal justice system, this view is rendered irrelevant by the Court's current framework that seeks one actor when there are often several and current and demonstrably direct causes when many are historical and cumulative.

Those who support an antidomination view of racial equality note that aggregate views of race paint a picture of society that resembles conditions prevailing during periods in which white supremacy was more openly advocated and racial discrimination more explicitly practiced. They regard these disparities as raising legitimate civil rights issues not only because of their probable connection to the more explicit policies of the not-too-distant past, but also because of the devastating effect on the life chances of minorities and the likelihood that such conditions will reproduce themselves for generations to come.

Earlier decisions suggested that the Court might be receptive to this view. For example, in GRIGGS V. DUKE POWER CO. (1971), the Court ruled that an employment practice that disproportionately harmed minorities constituted EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION under the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, whether or not the practice was adopted with the intent to discriminate. The fact that the practice disparately burdened minorities was enough to require the employer to produce evidence that the practice was a business necessity.

In subsequent years, however, the Court increasingly disfavored such systemic views of discrimination. An ominous indication of the full implications of this trend was suggested by MCCLESKEY V. KEMP (1987) and was reinforced in Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Antonio (1989).

In McCleskey v. Kemp, Justice LEWIS F. POWELL accepted the validity of a study indicating that African Americans in Georgia who killed whites were significantly more likely to receive the death penalty than were blacks who killed blacks or whites who killed either whites or blacks. Nonetheless, the Court determined that these statistics did not substantiate an equal-protection challenge to the Georgia death penalty. Aggregate statistics could not be used because they could not support an inference that intentional racial discrimination had influenced the disposition of the defendant's particular case. Moreover, other factors, such as the state's interests in imposing the death penalty, in maintaining prosecutorial discretion, and in protecting the integrity of jury deliberations, precluded the defendant from gaining access to information needed to prove that racial discrimination affected the disposition of his case.

Although McCleskey v. Kemp might have been reconciled as consistent with the distinction that the Court drew between constitutional claims (in which systemic claims were generally disfavored) and statutory claims (in which the Court had adopted a more flexible approach toward such claims), Wards Cove demonstrates that the Court's rejection of systemic claims is not limited to constitutional claims. In Wards Cove, the Court significantly narrowed Griggs to require, in part, that employees challenging employment practices that create racial disparities must specify and isolate each practice and its effects.

McCleskey and Wards Cove are two of several cases that illustrate how the Court in the 1980s has employed various analytical and normative preferences to reject the appeal for systemic relief. Its techniques include viewing causation as isolated rather than interrelated, demanding showings of contemporary rather than historical explanations for racial disparities, and embracing merely formal rather than substantive equality as the objective of civil rights law.

The predominance of the intent standard has significantly affected the development of affirmative action, another area in which the conflict between competing visions of civil rights has been most apparent over the past decade. Affirmative action, while largely referring to race-conscious remedial measures, also encompasses more general efforts to dismantle segregation and to cease the reproduction of racial inequality. GREEN V. COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF NEW KENT (1968) best represents this broader conceptualization of affirmative action. In this case, the Supreme Court determined that a "free choice" policy was insufficient to remedy the dual school system created by the defendant school board's previous de jure segregation. Equality required not only a cessation of discriminatory practices, but in addition, an affirmative effort to dismantle the racial segregation that had been created through express governmental policy and that would likely be maintained by the practices that were institutionally and societally ingrained.

The current controversy over affirmative action centers on the extent to which this task of dismantling a dual society should be undertaken by governmental and private entities in various contexts. Affirmative efforts have been made to integrate public and private industries, higher education, and professional trades. Affirmative-action plans have been developed as remedies following findings of discrimination; some were included in consent decrees and still others were developed voluntarily, sometimes under the threat of suit, but other times out of genuine commitments to increase the numbers of underrepresented groups in various walks of life.

Critics of affirmative action vigorously assailed the use of race-conscious strategies to benefit minority individuals who had not themselves been shown to be victims of discrimination. Their principal argument is that affirmative action is simply "disease as cure," in that it makes use of race classification to distribute opportunities on the basis of race rather than on individual merits. This is precisely the harm that was imposed on racial minorities and that cannot be justified on nondiscrimination grounds. They argue, moreover, that whites harmed by such efforts are in fact victims of racial discrimination and that the use of race-conscious efforts to correct racial imbalances violates the Fourteenth Amendment.

Affirmative action has been most often justified by supporters as necessary to remedy the effects of past discrimination. Most of the arguments boil down to a view that a full remedy for racial discrimination requires affirmative efforts to restructure racial hierarchy by redistributing educational, economic, and employment opportunities across racial groups. Affirmative action has also been characterized as essential to the nondiscrimination principle. In this view, it is a bottom-line effort to minimize the effects of racial bias that works its way into evaluation systems that have historically favored dominant values and interests. Some argue that affirmative action serves as reparation for past discrimination, whereas others justify affirmative action as essential to creating a future society that is not racially stratified. In the words of one Justice, "to get beyond race, we must first take race into account."

Despite the polarized nature of the ongoing affirmative-action debate, affirmative action is a doctrinal area in which the fluctuating majorities on the Court and its shifting sensibilities since 1986 are best illustrated. Indeed, the Court has only recently reached an apparent consensus on the constitutionality of affirmative action.

The much awaited decision in REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978) produced something of a stalemate: state universities were permitted to use race as one factor in admission decisions; but, absent some evidence of past discrimination on their part, they could not set aside seats for which only minorities could compete. After Bakke, the constitutional status of affirmative action remained murky. In subsequent cases, a shifting majority upheld affirmative-action plans adopted by the federal government in construction contracts (in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK, 1980) and in private industry (in UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA V. WEBER, 1979). However, growing concerns over the rights of whites disadvantaged by these efforts finally came to the fore in FIREFIGHTERS' LOCAL #1784 V. STOTTS (1984), in which the Court precluded federal courts from ordering a city employer subject to an affirmative-action CONSENT DECREE to protect the jobs of less-senior minorities by laying off more-senior whites.

Foes of affirmative action subsequently interpreted Stotts to ban all affirmative-action remedies that benefitted persons other than actual victims of discrimination. The U.S. Justice Department, after urging the Court to make such a ruling, used Stotts as a basis for challenging affirmative-action programs operated by hundreds of cities and states pursuant to consent decrees. Yet Stotts failed to produce a clear consensus regarding the constitutionality of affirmative action. Subsequent Court decisions upholding other affirmative-action plans benefitting "non-victims" indicated that Stotts was not read as encompassing a broad rejection of race-conscious remedies.

Despite these decisions, however, there remained on the Court a vocal opposition to such race-conscious measures. That slim majorities upheld these measures suggested that the constitutionality of affirmative action remained highly contested and subject to limitation. In 1989, a majority finally coalesced in CITY OF RICHMOND V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989) to hold that race-conscious affirmative-action programs were subject to STRICT SCRUTINY. The city of Richmond adopted a thirty percent set-aside program for minority contractors. Although Richmond was fifty percent black, only one sixty-seventh of one percent of all city contracts had gone to minority contractors. The Court held that the city could not undertake an affirmative-action program to correct such gross disparities without some evidence that black contractors had been discriminated against in the past and that this discrimination had caused the disparities. Particularly striking is the Court's refusal to recognize the relevance of Congress's previous findings of industry-wide discrimination, and its willingness to reduce centuries of white supremacy to the same plane as two decades of affirmative action. Such findings could not be "shared," but had to be proven anew in Richmond.

Croson demonstrates how the combination of the intent requirement and the application of strict scrutiny to affirmative action combine to create the tragic irony that institutional and systemic perpetuation of racial inequality escapes constitutional scrutiny, while efforts to break these patterns and practices are constitutionally prohibited.

Moreover, Croson represents a decisive victory of the more formal antidiscrimination approach over the more contextual antisubordination approach, at least where Congress has not adopted the latter approach. (See METRO BROADCASTING V. FCC.)

Critics argue that traditional protections for nonwhites are being eroded while the civil rights laws are being interpreted vigorously to preclude some of the more effective remedies. This claim is not implausible when one compares, for example, the language in Croson (explaining how the Court's deep commitment to eliminate all forms of racial discrimination mandates a rejection of even remedial race classifications) with the Court's willingness in PATTERSON V. MCLEAN CREDIT UNION (1989) to interpret the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 to leave a private employer's racial harassment unremedied under this statute. Although the contrasting protections in each of these cases might be reconciled by focusing on the distinctions between the separate doctrinal categories under which these cases arise, it is hard to ignore the apparent trend in which minorities are receiving less protection against traditional forms of race discrimination while the racially privileged are receiving more.

The Court's recent race jurisprudence also suggests that civil rights litigation no longer occupies the status of "high priority litigation." The Court seems to have rejected the view that civil rights plaintiffs play a special role as private attorneys general seeking to effectuate society's highest interest in eradicating discrimination, root and branch. In technical interpretations, the Court has narrowed the availability of remedies and simultaneously shifted advantages to employers and often to white males. Most troubling are rule 11 cases, in which courts have levied severe penalties against civil rights litigants for bringing suits that were judged to be "frivolous." Although rule 11 of the FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE lay dormant until it was raised in 1983, nearly half of all rule 11 sanctions have involved civil rights and public-interest cases. Other research also suggests civil rights cases are also disproportionately likely to be dismissed given the heightened pleading threshold placed on such claims. The overall effect of these "techinical" opinions has been to raise the risk and cost of litigating civil rights claims at precisely the same time that shifts in substantive rules make it unlikely that a plaintiff will prevail. The probable consequence of such decisions is the chilling of the civil rights bar. The long-term consequence may be that law may cease to serve as a meaningful deterrent to discriminatory behavior.

These recent developments have led many to conclude that the Second Reconstruction is largely a dead letter and that the period is now more aptly described as a post-civil rights era. Indeed, the parallels with the Second Reconstruction seem to confirm the cyclical nature of civil rights protection and, more troubling, the cyclical nature of its decline.

KIMBERLÉ CRENSHAW
(1992)

Bibliography

FREEMAN, ALAN 1990 Antidiscrimination Law: The View from 1989. Tulane Law Review 64:1407–1441.

LAWRENCE, CHARLES 1987 The Id, the Ego, and Equal Protection: Reckoning with Unconscious Racism. Stanford Law Review 39:317–387.

ORTIZ, DANIEL 1989 The Myth of Intent in Equal Protection. Stanford Law Review 41:1105–1150.

SCHNAPPER, ERIC 1983 Perpetuation of Past Discrimination. Harvard Law Review 96:828–864.

STRAUSS, DAVID A. 1986 The Myth of Colorblindness. Supreme Court Review 1986:99–134.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1988 American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. New York: Foundation Press.

WILLIAMS, PATRICIA 1989 The Obliging Shell: An Informal Essay on Formal Equal Opportunity. Michigan Law Review 87: 2128–2151.

CIVIL RIGHTS
(Update 2)

The field of civil rights generally refers to the various areas of American law concerned with a person's right to be free from discrimination based on his or her identity as a member of a particular social group. In the classical liberal political tradition, "civil rights" historically meant the universally held legal rights of all citizens to participate in civil society—for example, to make contracts, pursue occupations, own and convey property—and more recently has included the "political" right to vote in civic elections. The contemporary notion of civil rights as protection for minority groups is linked to the struggle, first by African Americans and then others, to expand the equal enjoyment of (supposedly) universally held rights to disempowered groups in American society. Today, civil rights law, in one form or another, encompasses discrimination based on race, gender, disability, primary language, ethnicity, national origin, family structure, religion, and SEXUAL ORIENTATION.

There are multiple sources of civil rights law. The Constitution contains provisions abolishing SLAVERY (the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT), prohibiting the denial of VOTING RIGHTS on the basis of race, sex, or failure to pay a POLL TAX (the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT, the NINETEENTH AMENDMENT, and the TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT), and guaranteeing the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS (the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and analogous state constitutional provisions). Federal legislative enactments prohibit discrimination on designated bases and in a variety of contexts, including most notably PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS, employment, education, lending, and housing. Civil rights law also includes the rules promulgated by federal ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES constituted under and charged with enforcement of various federal civil rights statutes. In addition to federal law, an often overlapping complex of state constitutional law and state and local enactments, ordinances, and administrative rules outlaw discrimination on a wide variety of bases and in diverse social contexts.

Federal constitutional law is relevant to civil rights law in several ways. First, and most importantly, the federal Constitution is a substantive source of civil rights protection. The equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that "no State shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The courts have used this open-ended language to craft a general body of civil rights law. While federal and state legislatures may provide greater protection, the constitutional standards set a legal minimum.

The courts early on interpreted equal protection narrowly, to prohibit only the most explicit forms of exclusion of blacks by the government. In PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896), the Supreme Court upheld a state law requiring SEGREGATION of whites and blacks in rail cars. Articulating what became known as the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE, the Court interpreted the equal protection clause to permit formal and explicit racial segregation. Under the Court's logic, no denial of equal protection of the laws was manifest in racial segregation so long as equal facilities were provided. Of course, the racial segregation to which African Americans were subjected hardly offered equal facilities. Nevertheless, Plessy became the constitutional authority for the legality of the systemic racial segregation that characterized the post-RECONSTRUCTION domination of African Americans in many sectors of American society.

The modern era of civil rights begins with the Court's repudiation of the separate-but-equal doctrine in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954). According to the Brown opinion, segregated schools were inherently unequal. Relying on SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH suggesting that segregation inflicted on black children a stigma of inferiority that impeded their education, the Justices ruled that state-mandated school segregation constituted unequal treatment in violation of the equal protection clause.

Brown marked the starting point for a massive increase in litigation challenging various social practices as violating constitutional equal protection guarantees. It also has symbolized, for generations of lawyers, the possibility of employing law for progressive social change. Widely viewed as the American legal system's ratification of the goals of the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT, Brown is associated with the historic dismantling of the formal system of racial segregation that marked not only education, but also public parks, carriers, employment, recreation, and housing in the United States. After decades of expansion and contraction, however, the potential for using constitutional doctrine as a mandate for overcoming continuing inequality has been largely tamed by the narrow interpretations that conservative Court majorities have accorded equal protection doctrine since the mid-1970s.

The potential substantive reach of the equal protection clause is limited at the outset by the Court's continued allegiance to the STATE ACTION doctrine mandating that the equal protection clause applies only to discrimination deemed to be governmental in nature. Therefore, any protection against discrimination by private actors depends on the existence of applicable LEGISLATION. Legislative bodies may, but are not constitutionally compelled to, prohibit various forms of discrimination by private parties. Under the Court's interpretation of the Constitution, however, private discrimination, no matter how pervasive or oppressive, is beyond the purview of the equal protection clause.

The WARREN COURT, which decided Brown, often found state action in contexts in which private actors played particularly powerful roles in the lives of individuals. The more conservative BURGER COURT and REHNQUIST COURT have since imposed strict barriers to litigation in the name of the state action doctrine, significantly limiting the potential reach of constitutional antidiscrimination norms. One consequence is that, even in the field of education at issue in Brown, continuing racial segregation and new resegregation is beyond constitutional reach because, as the Court ruled in MISSOURI V. JENKINS (1990), racial school segregation that cannot be traced to intentional governmental action must be deemed privately caused.

Another key restriction on the potential reach of the equal protection clause is the judicially imposed requirement that, unless the government has overtly based a decision on race or another constitutionally prescribed ground, the plaintiff must prove that he or she was a victim of "intentional" discrimination to make out a violation of the equal protection clause. Since the fall of the open and official racial apartheid that marked American life, particularly in the South, prior to the late 1960s, decisionmakers have rarely made race an explicit consideration. In WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976), the Court held that the disparate racial impact of a standardized written test for choosing police officers did not establish an equal protection violation, for there was no showing that the test had been chosen or its use continued for racially discriminatory purposes. Under this doctrine, a plaintiff must show that a governmental entity intentionally made a decision on the basis of a racial criterion in order to render equal protection norms against RACIAL DISCRIMINATION applicable. The Court chose the "intent" standard to govern constitutional equal protection analysis, even though various civil rights statutes permit "disparate impact" along with intent to make out a violation. Under the disparate impact approach of Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, for example, proof of discrimination can be based on the employer's use of a criterion for decisionmaking that results in the disproportionate exclusion of blacks or other protected groups and that cannot be proved necessary to the legitimate needs of the employer. Adoption of the intent standard has meant that constitutional antidiscrimination doctrine is, as a practical matter, virtually useless in litigating against contemporary forms of racial stratification.

The equal protection clause has also been interpreted since Brown to apply beyond the context of race and national origin. In CRAIG V. BOREN (1976), the Court held that gender classifications should also be subject to heightened constitutional scrutiny, although a lesser standard known as "intermediate" scrutiny. In a notably vigorous application of this standard, the Court held in UNITED STATES V. VIRGINIA (1996) that the male-only admission policy at the Virginia Military Institute was unconstitutional SEX DISCRIMINATION. In Clark v. Jeter (1988), the Court extended the intermediate scrutiny standard to classifications based on the marital status of the subject's parents (or ILLEGITIMACY; see NONMARITAL CHILDREN). The Court has thus far refused to recognize age, wealth, or sexual orientation as SUSPECT CLASSIFICATIONS, meaning that such criteria have no special constitutional significance.

In one of the most controversial civil rights decisions in recent times, the Court in BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986) exemplified its unwillingness to extend heightened constitutional protections to certain minorities. The Court refused to strike down a state sodomy statute's criminalization of sexual practices between consenting adults on the ground that it violated the constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY. The Bowers opinion not only refused to extend protection against discrimination to sexual minorities, but seemed to give constitutional legitimacy to the most anachronistic stereotypes and prejudices that underlie the marginalization of sexual minorities in American society. However, in ROMER V. EVANS (1996), the Court struck down a state constitutional amendment prohibiting municipalities from protecting sexual minorities from discrimination, holding that such a REFERENDUM reflected animosity toward a particular group and was unrelated to any legitimate state objective. Evans demonstrates that, despite the Bowers result, sexual minorities will receive at least some protection from explicit governmental action aimed at them.

In addition to providing substantive civil rights protection, equal protection has also been interpreted to limit legislative action to address historical discrimination. The conservative Court majorities of the last two decades have embraced what might be called a "colorblindness" interpretation of the equal protection clause, so named because it purports to require that the government be blind to race in its decisionmaking processes. According to the colorblindness approach, the equal protection clause protects individuals from personal evaluations based on a proscribed criterion (such as race or gender) rather than vindicates the interests of historically subordinated groups (such as African Americans or women). From this perspective, the equal protection clause protects whites, men, and other historically privileged groups in the same ways that it protects African Americans, women, and other disadvantaged groups.

In the AFFIRMATIVE ACTION cases, the colorblindness approach has meant that governmental attempts to remedy past discrimination through policies giving preference to minorities with respect to various governmental benefits are deemed constitutionally equivalent to race-conscious policies that harm racial minorities. As the Court ruled in RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989), STRICT SCRU-TINY applies to all racial classifications, whether malign or benign. Accordingly, the City of Richmond's affirmative action policy for hiring construction contractors was struck down on the ground that there was insufficient proof that the huge under-representation of racial minorities in the construction contracting business was the result of past racial discrimination— although there had been congressional findings of discrimination nationwide in the construction industry, and Richmond, the capital of the Confederacy, had long enforced racial apartheid in virtually all sectors of public life. ADARAND CONSTRUCTORS, INC. V. PEÑA (1995) extends the same strict scrutiny to analogous affirmative action of the federal government.

In addition to including a significant body of civil rights protections and setting limits on legislative remedial action, the Constitution is relevant to civil rights law because, like any other federal legislative or executive action, civil rights acts of Congress must be authorized by some provision of the Constitution. For example, in the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883), the Court struck down the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875, which prohibited racial discrimination in public accommodations. The Court held that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, SECTION 5—granting Congress power to enforce the equal protection clause and other substantive guarantees of the amendment—did not authorize Congress to remedy any discriminatory practice that did not independently constitute a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. As a substantive matter, the Fourteenth Amendment did not prohibit private discrimination by innkeepers, railroad carriers, and others. Consequently, when Congress came to enact the Civil Rights Act of 1964—prohibiting race and gender discrimination in public accommodations, employment, and education by public and private parties—it relied on the COMMERCE CLAUSE, granting Congress power to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE, and the SPENDING POWER, permitting Congress to attach conditions to the receipt of federal funds. The reach of federal civil rights law depends, indirectly, on the future interpretation of these constitutional grants of congressional power and the resolution of FEDERALISM concerns raised by their expansive reach.

Finally, constitutional law is relevant to the field of civil rights in a less formal and a more ideological way. As an abstract matter, the idea of "civil rights" in a democratic society embodies the public meanings of equality and democratic self-determination. The special status of constitutional law in American civic ideology gives special significance to the courts' determination in particular cases the civil rights necessary for justice under democratic principles. The content of "civil rights" is not self-evident, and in fact has been hotly contested throughout American history.

Writers in a new scholarly movement, CRITICAL RACE THEORY, began in the 1990s to challenge many of the core assumptions of the civil rights tradition. According to these writers, judicial interpretations of constitutional requirements for equality constitute and embody a particular way of interpreting the world, a special language for distinguishing the relevant from the irrelevant in the social landscape. The judicial interpretation of the significance and meaning of race, gender, sexual orientation, disability, and other features of a person's identity necessarily is part of the broader struggle over the exercise of social power generally in American society. The structure of antidiscrimination law—with its premise that racial power is manifest in isolated, individual, intentional, and irrational acts—forms a narrative partly of justice and liberation, but partly also of legitimation and apologia. It paints a false picture of a world in which, separate from any race-conscious acts of decisionmakers, things operate according to rational and culturally neutral norms, thereby mistaking the norms of dominant social groups for universal standards of merit.

GARY PELLER
(2000)

Bibliography

BELL, DERRICK A. 1992 Race, Racism, and American Law, 3rd ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

BRANCH, TAYLOR 1988 Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–63. New York: Simon & Schuster.

——— 1998 Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years, 1963–65. New York: Simon & Schuster.

CRENSHAW, KIMBERLÉ; GOTANDA, NEIL; PELLER, GARY; and THOMAS, KENDALL, eds. 1995 Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings that Formed the Movement. New York: The New Press.

DANIELSEN, DAN and ENGLE, KAREN, eds. 1995 After Identity: A Reader in Law and Culture. New York: Routledge.

MACKINNON, CATHARINE A. 1989 Toward a Feminist Theory of the State. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

MALCOLM X 1990 Malcolm X Speaks: Selected Speeches and Statements. New York: Grove Weidenfeld.

SPANN, GIRARDEAU A. 1993 Race Against the Court: The Supreme Court & Minorities in Contemporary America. New York: New York University Press.

WILLIAMS, PATRICIA J. 1991 The Alchemy of Race and Rights: The Diary of a Law Professor. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 (FRAMING)

14 Stat. 27

Responding to the BLACK CODES, Congress in 1866 passed its first CIVIL RIGHTS bill to enforce the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT. The bill's definition of national CITIZENSHIP superseded the decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), which had excluded blacks. A citizen was any person not an Indian or of foreign allegiance born in any state or territory, regardless of color. All citizens were to enjoy full and EQUAL PROTECTION of all laws and procedures for the protection of persons and property, and be subject to like punishments without regard to former slave status. In all jurisdictions citizens were to have equal rights to sue, contract, witness, purchase, lease, sell, inherit, or otherwise convey personal or real property. Anyone who, "under color of any law . . . or custom," prevented any person from enjoying those rights, or who subjected any person to discriminatory criminal punishments because of race or previous involuntary servitude, was subject to MISDEMEANOR prosecutions in federal courts. Congress further authorized the REMOVAL OF CASES from state to federal courts of persons denied civil rights and of federal officer defendants, prosecuted by states, protecting civil rights; that provision connected the civil rights bill to the FREEDMEN'S BUREAU and the HABEAS CORPUS statutes. All federal officials could initiate proceedings under the bill. Federal judges were to appoint special commissioners to enforce judgments under the bill (a use of fugitive slave law processes for opposite purposes). Alternatively, judges could employ the army or state militias, under the President's command, as posses. Last, Congress expanded the Supreme Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION to include questions of law arising from the statute.

President ANDREW JOHNSON's powerful veto of the Civil Rights Bill, though overridden by Congress, touched both honorable traditions of the states' monopoly of rights and ignoble concepts of race hierarchy. He insisted that the bill would create a centralized military despotism and invoked the recent EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866) decision. Congress, he argued, was creating black citizens of the same states it was excluding from representation.

Though trenchant, the veto never touched on the question of the remedies available to injured citizens or the nation, when states failed to carry out their duty to treat their own citizens equally. If no statutory remedies existed, then both nation and states were returned to the conditions of 1860. Anxious to make clear the fact of the nation's advance from that pitiable condition, the Congress pushed ahead with a FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT proposal and, in 1867, resorted to military reconstruction as a desperate stop-gap.

But the Fourteenth Amendment, unlike the Thirteenth (which the Civil Rights Act enforced) constrained only STATE ACTION, at least according to Supreme Court judgments commencing with the Slaughterhouse case (1873). In May 1870, the Congress "re-enacted" the 1866 Civil Rights law, this time under the Fourteenth and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS (though section 16 of the 1870 law still punished discriminatory felonious private acts). In 1874, a revision of the federal statutes appeared, breaking up the text of the 1866 statute into scattered sections.

HAROLD M. HYMAN
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Section 1983, Title 42, United States Code.)

Bibliography

HOWE, M. A. DEWOLFE 1965 Federalism and Civil Rights. [Massachusetts Historical Society] Proceedings 77:15–27.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. and WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1982 Equal Justice under Law: Constitutional Development 1835–1875. Chaps. 9–11. New York: Harper & Row.

KACZOROWSKI, ROBERT J. 1971 Nationalization of Civil Rights: Theory and Practice in a Racist Society, 1866–1883. Ph.D. diss., University of Minnesota.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866
(Judicial Interpretation)

Judicial interpretation has transformed the Civil Rights Act of 1866 from a simple effort to dismantle the BLACK CODES into one of the most important existing CIVIL RIGHTS laws. In assessing judicial treatment of the act, it is helpful to consider section one of the act separately from section three. Other sections have not led to noteworthy judicial development. Section one of the act, which granted all persons the same rights as white persons to make and enforce contracts, sue, be parties, give EVIDENCE, inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, was reenacted in modified form by the Civil Rights Act of 1870, was divided into two sections by the REVISED STATUTES of 1874, and survives as sections 1981 and 1982 of Title 42, United States Code. Section three of the act, which set forth the procedures for vindicating rights protected by section one, was scattered throughout the United States Code. Portions of it survive as CIVIL RIGHTS REMOVAL statutes and as part of section 1988 of Title 42. Judicial interpretation of the 1866 act is not unrelated to these statutory reshufflings. Cut adrift from their moorings in the entire 1866 act, the act's remnants are amenable to many more interpretations than the original provision.

Cases decided in the years immediately following the 1866 act's passage are particularly important in ascertaining its original meaning. The REVISED STATUTES of 1874 would strip the act's descendants of any close resemblance to the original measure. And once the courts became accustomed to applying the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, much of the 1866 act would become superfluous. In addition, ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment eliminated most doubts about the act's constitutionality.

Prior to ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, most courts were willing to sustain the act under Congress's THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT power to proscribe SLAVERY. But at least Kentucky's highest court in Bowlin v. Commonwealth (1867) declared the act unconstitutional. Other courts avoided such a declaration only by interpreting the act not to prohibit some forms of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION that the act's words arguably covered.

In the reported interpretations of the act, for example, courts divided over whether states could continue to outlaw marriages between whites and blacks. State courts in Tennessee (1871), Indiana (1871), and Alabama (1878) found marriage not to be a contract within the meaning of section 1, and therefore rejected attacks on antimiscegenation laws that relied on the 1866 act. State courts in Louisiana (1874) and Alabama (1872) relied at least in part on the 1866 act to find intermarriage legal, but the Alabama case was soon overruled. Not until LOVING V. VIRGINIA (1967) did the Supreme Court hold the Fourteenth Amendment to ban antimiscegenation laws.

State courts also divided over whether the 1866 act abrogated state laws prohibiting blacks from testifying against whites. The Kentucky court found Congress's effort to do so unconstitutional, but an 1869 Arkansas decision found the act to authorize such testimony. In 1869, the California Supreme Court relied on the 1866 act's evidentiary provision to dismiss an INDICTMENT against a mulatto, because Chinese witnesses had testified at his trial and state law prohibited them from testifying against white men. But a year later, despite the 1866 act, the California court sustained the state's evidentiary ban on testimony by Chinese against whites.

After the 1870s, section 1 diminished in importance. The state laws against which it most successfully operated, laws mandating racial discrimination in areas covered by section 1, could also be attacked directly under the Fourteenth Amendment. And with section 1 and the Fourteenth Amendment undermining the most egregious provisions of the Black Codes, there remained only one important area to which section 1 might be applied—private discrimination. When the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883), UNITED STATES V. HARRIS (1883), and UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876) limited Congress's Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendment power to legislate against private racial discrimination, there was doubt about whether section 1 constitutionally could be applied to private discrimination. One early lower federal court opinion, United States v. Morris (1903), suggested the 1866 act's applicability to private discrimination, but Supreme Court statements in Virginia v. Rives (1880) and CORRIGAN V. BUCKLEY (1926) suggested that the act did not apply to private conduct. (See STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA, 1880.),

Hurd v. Hodge (1948), a companion case to SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948), gave section 1 some new life. The court applied section 1 to prohibit courts in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA from enforcing a racially RESTRICTIVE COVENANT. The breakthrough came in JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968), where the Court held both that Congress meant the 1866 act to proscribe private discrimination and that Congress constitutionally could outlaw private discrimination under the Thirteenth Amendment. As the result of Jones, Johnson v. Railway Express Co. (1974), and RUNYON V. MCCRARY (1976), the remnants of the 1866 act were transformed from historical relics into federal laws broadly prohibiting private racial discrimination in the sale or lease of all housing, in schools, in employment and in virtually all other contracts. In many respects the 1866 act's newly discovered coverage exceeds that of comprehensive modern civil rights laws. General Building Constructors Association, Inc. v. Pennsylvania (1982) limited the 1866 act's reach by holding that liability may not be imposed under the act without proof of intentional discrimination.

Section 3 of the 1866 act traveled a less visible path through the courts. Its primary significance has been to determine when a violation of former section 1 authorizes an original or removal action in federal court. (See REMOVAL OF CASES.) In BLYEW V. UNITED STATES (1872), over the dissents of Justices JOSEPH P. BRADLEY and NOAH SWAYNE, the Court held that Kentucky's testimonial disqualification of black witnesses did not confer ORIGINAL JURISDICTION on a lower federal court to hear a state murder case at which the black witnesses were to testify. In a series of civil rights removal cases, the Court held that what had been section 3 authorized removal to federal court where state laws expressly mandated a racial distinction that prevented blacks from receiving equal justice, as when blacks were excluded from juries. But the Court found removal not to be authorized where the same result was achieved through other than formal state statutory command.

Under section 3's remnants, actions that arise under state law but are removed to federal court are tried in federal court by applying state law. In Robertson v. Wegmann (1978), however, the Court misconstrued the shred of the 1866 act commanding this result to require application of state law to cases arising under federal law. The same remnant, section 1988, also has been relied on in Sullivan v. Little Hunting Park, Inc. (1969) to authorize damages for violations of section 1 rights and in Tomanio v. Board of Regents (1980) to require the use of state statutes of limitations in federal civil rights cases.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

BARDOLPH, RICHARD 1970 The Civil Rights Record. Pages 84–87, 94–96, 200–201, 532–533. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell.

CARR, ROBERT K. 1947 Federal Protection of Civil Rights. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1981 Civil Rights Legislation. Charlottesville, Va.: Michie Co.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875
18 Stat. 335

On his deathbed Senator CHARLES SUMNER (Republican, Mass.) implored a congressional friend, "You must take care of the civil rights bill,—my bill, the civil rights bill, don't let it fail." Since 1870 Sumner had sought to persuade Congress to enact a law guaranteeing to all people, regardless of race or religion, the same accommodations and facilities in public schools, churches and cemeteries incorporated by public authority, places of public amusement, hotels licensed by law, and common carriers. Sumner had contended that racial SEGREGATION was discriminatory, that SEPARATE BUT EQUAL facilities were inherently unequal, and that compulsory equality would combat prejudice as much as compulsory segregation fostered it. Opponents claimed that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT protected the privileges of United States CITIZENSHIP only, not those of state citizenship to which the bulk of CIVIL RIGHTS attached. Opponents also claimed that Congress had no constitutional power to protect civil rights from violation by private persons or businesses.

School DESEGREGATION was unpopular among northern Republicans and hated by southern Democrats. After the election of 1874 resulted in a Democratic victory in the House, supporters of Sumner's bill settled for "half a loaf" by consenting to the deletion of the provisions on education, churches, and cemeteries. A black congressman from South Carolina agreed to the compromise because the school clause jeopardized the Republican party in the South and subordinated the educational needs of blacks to their right to be desegregated. Teaching the "three Rs" to the children of former slaves was more important than risking their educational opportunities by demanding their admission to "white" schools.

In February 1875 the lame-duck 43rd Congress, 2nd session, voting along party lines in both houses, passed the modified bill which President ULYSSES S. GRANT signed into law on March 1. The Civil Rights Act of 1875, the last Reconstruction measure and the last civil rights act until 1957, was the most important congressional enactment in the field of PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS until the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. The act of 1875 affirmed the equality of all persons in the enjoyment of transportation facilities, in hotels and inns, and in theaters and places of public amusement. Theoretically such businesses, though privately owned and operated, were like public utilities, exercising public functions for the benefit of the public and subject to public regulation. Anyone violating the statute was civilly liable for $500 damages and, on conviction in federal court, subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year. In 1883 the Supreme Court held the statute unconstitutional in the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

KONVITZ, MILTON R. 1961 A Century of Civil Rights. New York: Columbia University Press.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1957
71 Stat. 634

Although this law marked the end of an eighty-two-year period of congressional inactivity in the field of CIVIL RIGHTS, it accomplished little. The act created the CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION but granted it only investigative and reporting powers. The act also created a separate CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION within the Department of Justice to be headed by an additional assistant attorney general. More substantively, the act made it unlawful to harass those exercising their VOTING RIGHTS in federal elections and provided for federal initiation of proceedings against completed or potential violations. Offenders receiving more than slight penalties were entitled to TRIAL BY JURY, a watering-down provision inserted by Senate opponents.

The act is as significant for important deletions from the original bill as for what was ultimately enacted. Southern senators managed to eliminate a provision authorizing the ATTORNEY GENERAL to seek injunctive relief against all civil rights violators, a provision opponents feared would enhance the federal presence in school DESEGREGATION disputes and one they characterized as reimposing Reconstruction on the South. The emasculated act was viewed as a victory for southern segregationists. It was not even worth a filibuster.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

BRAUER, CARL M. 1977 John F. Kennedy and the Second Reconstruction. New York: Columbia University Press.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1960
74 Stat. 86

The insignificance and ineffectiveness of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1957 generated pressure in the next Congress to enact a more effective CIVIL RIGHTS law. And the CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION established by the 1957 act added to the pressure by issuing a report documenting the abridgment of black VOTING RIGHTS in the South.

As enacted, the 1960 act required state election officers to retain for twenty-two months records relating to voter registration and qualifications in elections of federal officials. Where courts found patterns or practices of abridgment of the right to vote on account of race, they were authorized to declare individuals qualified to vote and to appoint federal voting referees to take EVIDENCE and report to the court on the treatment of black voters.

In a provision originally aimed at interference with school DESEGREGATION decrees, the act imposed criminal penalties for obstruction of all court orders. It also created a federal criminal offense of interstate flight to avoid prosecution for destroying buildings or other property.

Like the 1957 act, the 1960 act is noteworthy for its failure to include a proposed provision authorizing the United States to initiate actions on behalf of persons deprived of civil rights.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

BRAUER, CARL M. 1977 John F. Kennedy and the Second Reconstruction. New York: Columbia University Press.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964
78 Stat. 241

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 signified many changes. For JOHN F. KENNEDY, prompted by southern resistance to DESEGREGATION orders and violent responses to peaceful CIVIL RIGHTS protests, proposing the measure symbolized an aggressive new attitude toward RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. For LYNDON JOHNSON, who supported the act after Kennedy's assassination, it marked a turn away from southern regionalism and toward national leadership on civil rights matters. For Congress, the act ended a century of nonexistent or ineffective civil rights laws and was the first civil rights measure with respect to which the Senate invoked CLOTURE. For blacks, the act was the first major legislative victory since Reconstruction and the most far-reaching civil rights measure in American history.

The act consists of eleven titles. Titles I and VIII reinforce voting rights provisions of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS OF 1957 and 1960 and limit the use of LITERACY TESTS to measure voter qualifications. (See also VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1970.) Titles III and IV, in provisions deleted from the bills that became the 1957 and 1960 acts, authorize court actions by the ATTORNEY GENERAL to challenge segregated public facilities and schools. Title V amends provisions governing the CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION. Title IX authorizes appeal from orders remanding to state courts civil rights cases that have been removed to federal court and authorizes the Attorney General to intervene in EQUAL PROTECTION cases. Title X establishes a Community Relations Service to assist communities in resoving discrimination disputes. Title XI deals with miscellaneous matters. The most important parts of the law are Title II, forbidding discrimination in PUBLIC ACCOMMODATION; Title VI, forbidding discrimination in federally assisted programs; and Title VII, forbidding EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION. In 1972, Congress extended Title VII's coverage to most government employees. It does not cover religious institutions.

Congress shaped the 1964 act with a keen awareness of previously declared constitutional limitations on ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION. Title II's ban on discrimination in public accommodations and Title VII's ban on employment discrimination are limited to those entities whose operations affect INTERSTATE COMMERCE. By limiting these provisions to establishments and employers affecting commerce, Congress sought to avoid the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES' (1883) determination that Congress lacks power under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to outlaw discrimination by private citizens, even in such a quasi-public area as that of public accommodations. Unlike its power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress's COMMERCE CLAUSE power is not limited to STATE ACTION. In HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL, INC. V. UNITED STATES, (1964) and KATZENBACH V. MCCLUNG (1964) the Court upheld Title II as a valid exercise of the commerce power and the power to regulate interstate travel. Under the Court's subsequent decision in JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968), much of Title II and Title VII would be valid as congressional enforcement of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT. Title VI's ban on discrimination in federally assisted programs was tied to another constitutional provision, Congress's TAXING AND SPENDING POWER.

Judicial interpretation seems to have avoided another potential constitutional problem attending Title VII. Under a 1972 amendment to Title VII, employers must accommodate an employee's religious practices if the employer is able to do so without undue hardship. In Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Hardison (1977), the Supreme Court held that the statute does not require an employer to bear more than a DE MINIMIS cost to accommodate an employee's religious preferences. If Title VII were interpreted to mandate substantial concessions to religiously based employee work preferences, it might raise serious problems under the FIRST AMENDMENT'S ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION clause.

With the 1964 act's constitutional vulnerability minimized shortly after enactment, the way was clear for its development. Title II, banning racial discrimination in public accommodations, was the act's symbolic heart, providing immediate and highly visible evidence that blacks, as equal citizens, were entitled to equal treatment in the public life of the community. But Title II generated little litigation, for compliance was swift throughout the South once the principle of equal access was established. Equalizing employment opportunity was a goal that would take longer to accomplish. Thus in operation, Title VII has dwarfed all other titles combined, frequently generating a huge backlog of cases in the agency charged with Title VII's administration, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), and leading to thousands of judicial decisions.

The proof necessary to establish a Title VII violation repeatedly occupies the Supreme Court. Two leading cases, McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green (1973) and GRIGGS V. DUKE POWER CO. (1971), approve alternative methods of proof in Title VII cases. Under McDonnell Douglas, a plaintiff alleging discrimination by an employer must, after exhausting the necessary remedies with the EEOC or a state antidiscrimination agency, show that the plaintiff applied and was rejected for a job for which the plaintiff was qualified, and that the employer continued to try to fill the position. An employer must then justify its actions. Under Griggs, in an extension of Title VII not necessarily contemplated by the 1964 Congress, proof that an employment selection criterion has a disproportionate adverse impact on minorities requires the employer to show that the selection standard is required by business necessity. After Griggs, statistically based Title VII cases, and threats to bring such cases, became a widespread method for pressuring employers to hire more minority and female workers. Few employers are both able to prove the business necessity of employment tests or other hiring criteria and willing to incur the expense of doing so.

The 1964 act, particularly Title VII, is not without its ironies. First, opponents of the act amended it to include sex discrimination in the hope that such an amendment would weaken the bill's chances for passage. But the bill passed with the additional ban that revolutionized at least the formal status of female workers. And in the case of sex discrimination, Title VII reaches beyond traditional refusals to hire or obvious pay disparities. When the Court held in General Electric Co. v. Gilbert (1976) that excluding pregnancy from a health plan does not constitute discrimination on the basis of sex, Congress amended Title VII to overturn the result. Los Angeles Department of Water and Power v. Manhart (1978) marks some sort of outer limit on Title VII's protection of female workers. The Court held Title VII to proscribe a requirement that females, who live longer than males and therefore can expect to receive greater total retirement benefits from a pension plan, contribute more to a pension than males contribute. In the case of sex, religion, or national origin discrimination, Title VII provides a defense if these factors constitute a bona fide occupational qualification, a defense sometimes difficult to separate from that of business necessity. The Supreme Court found in Dothard v. Rawlinson (1977) that a bona fide occupational qualification justifies requiring male prison guards for at least some classes of male prisoners.

Second, although the BURGER COURT generally has been viewed as conservative in the field of civil rights, Title VII owes much of its practical importance to Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER's opinion for the Court in Griggs v. Duke Power Co. Griggs removed the requirement that discriminatory intent be an element of Title VII cases. This holding, in addition to its significance for Title VII, has been incorporated in other areas, including discrimination in housing under the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1968. New York City Transit Authority v. Beazer (1979), in which the Court refused to invalidate an employment selection standard (exclusion of drug users) with disparate impact on minorities, may signify some retrenchment from the full force of the Griggs principle. And in International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States (1977), the Court refused to extend Griggs to invalidate seniority systems that predate Title VII. But the Court never has directly questioned Griggs. In UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA V. WEBER (1979), the Burger Court concluded that Title VII permitted at least some private AFFIRMATIVE ACTION employment programs.

Although Title VII deservedly receives most of the attention paid to the 1964 act, Title VI is also an important antidiscrimination law. In REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978) it provided the setting for the Court's first important pronouncement on affirmative action programs. Many subsequent antidiscrimination laws, such as Title IX of the EDUCATION AMENDMENT OF 1972, the AGE DISCRIMINATION ACT OF 1975, and the REHABILITATION ACT of 1973 are modeled after Title VI. Title VI is the principal antidiscrimination measure for programs receiving federal funds that are not affected by other antidiscrimination measures. In the case of public institutions, however, there is much overlap between Title VI's prohibitions and those contained in the Fourteenth Amendment. The Supreme Court has been ambiguous in describing the relationship between the two. In Bakke, a majority of Justices suggested that Title VI and the Constitution are coterminous, but it did not purport to overturn the Court's earlier holding in LAU V. NICHOLS (1974), widely read as extending Title VI to cases of discrimination not banned by the Constitution.

The contributions of the 1964 act to racial equality defy precise measurement, but surely they have been weighty. Beyond the tangible changes the act brought to the public life of southern communities and to the entire American workplace lie enormous changes in attitudes and everyday personal relations. Those who believe that "you can't legislate morality" would do well to ponder the lessons of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Firefighters Local Union No. 1784 v. Stotts. )

Bibliography

DORSEN, NORMAN; BENDER, PAUL; NEUBORNE, BURT; and LAW, SYLVIA 1979 Emerson, Haber and Dorsen's Political and Civil Rights in the United States, 4th ed. Vol. II:581–608, 902–1062, 1172–1220. Boston: Little, Brown.

LARSON, ARTHUR and LARSON, LEX K. 1981 Employment Discrimination. New York: Matthew Bender.

SCHLEI, BARBARA L. and GROSSMAN, PAUL 1976 Employment Discrimination Law. Washington, D.C.: Bureau of National Affairs.

SULLIVAN, CHARLES A.; ZIMMER, MICHAEL J.; and RICHARDS, RICHARD F. 1980 Federal Statutory Law of Employment Discrimination. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1968
82 Stat. 696

This act capped the modern legislative program against RACIAL DISCRIMINATION that included the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 and the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. Title VIII of the act, which constitutes the nation's first comprehensive OPEN HOUSING LAW, prohibits discrimination in the sale, rental, financing, and advertising of housing, and in membership in real estate brokerage organizations. Ironically, soon after Title VIII's enactment, the Supreme Court, in JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968), construed a remnant of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 to outlaw private racial discrimination in housing. In dissent in Jones, Justice JOHN M. HARLAN, joined by Justice BYRON R. WHITE, relied in part on Title VIII's passage to challenge the need for the Court's decision. The 1968 act also contained criminal penalties to protect civil rights activity and comprehensive measures to protect rights of AMERICAN INDIANS. Different portions of the act, including antiriot provisions, represented a backlash against antiwar demonstrations, CIVIL RIGHTS protest, and other forms of domestic unrest.

Like the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the 1968 act survived a southern filibuster in the Senate. Efforts by House opponents to delay consideration of the bill backfired. The delay led to the bill's consideration in the aftermath of Dr. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.'s assassination. Given that the bill passed the House by a small margin, the delay may have made all the difference.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

HARVEY, JAMES C. 1973 Black Civil Rights During the Johnson Administration. Jackson, Miss.: University and College Press of Mississippi.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1991
105 Stat. 1071 (1991)

In 1989, the Supreme Court handed down a half-dozen decisions making it more difficult to prevail on claims arising under several pieces of ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION. Congress responded by passing the Civil Rights Act of 1990, only to have President GEORGE H. W. BUSH veto it and an override effort fail. Civil rights legislation reintroduced in the spring of 1991 might have suffered a similar fate, but for the bruising confirmation hearing of Supreme Court Justice CLARENCE THOMAS. In the wake of the hearings, which cast the administration in a negative light with regard to CIVIL RIGHTS while simultaneously revealing fractures within the civil rights coalition, both sides sought compromise. The Civil Rights Act of 1991 was quickly passed and signed into law on November 21, 1991.

Broadly speaking, the act sought to achieve two goals: (1) restore civil rights law to its pre-1989 contours; and (2) end inconsistencies in the remedies available under different antidiscrimination statutes. The latter it achieved by providing that, as under 42 U.S.C. § 1981, parties prevailing upon a claim of intentional discrimination under either Title VII or the AMERICANS WITH DISABILITIES ACT could recover compensatory and PUNITIVE DAMAGES, albeit subject to certain caps. As to the former, the act's success was more limited.

The act responded to a number of Court decisions, and as a result, consists of many bits and pieces. Among these, two stand out. First, the act reworked the Court's restrictive reading of section 1981 announced in PATTERSON V. MCCLEAN CREDIT UNION (1989). In Patterson, the Court reaffirmed the holding in RUNYON V. MCCRARY (1976) that section 1981 prohibits RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in the making and enforcement of private contracts, but held that it offered no relief from workplace discrimination that occurred after the formation of a contract. In contrast, the 1991 act insists that section 1981 applies to "the enjoyment of all benefits, privileges, terms, and conditions of the contractual relationship." Second, the 1991 act responded to Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Atonio (1989). In

Wards Cove, the Court undermined the disparate impact approach developed in GRIGGS V. DUKE POWER COMPANY (1971) for showing systematic, as opposed to intentional, discrimination. It did so out of concern that a robust disparate impact DOCTRINE would encourage employers to adopt hiring quotas in order to avoid potential liability. The 1991 act went some distance toward undoing the changes wrought by Wards Cove, but stopped short of restoring the doctrine to its previous vigor. For example, the act accepted an increased burden imposed by the Court on those bringing claims by adopting the requirement that plaintiffs disaggregate sources of discrimination and establish "causation," while it potentially eased the burden on employers by failing to define what exactly they needed to show in order to establish a "business necessity" justification for otherwise discriminatory practices.

The Civil Rights Act of 1991 slowed the conservative assault on civil rights laws. Nevertheless, by virtue of its various compromises, the act achieved limited success in restoring antidiscrimination law to its pre-1989 state.

IAN F. HANEY LÓPEZ
(2000)

Bibliography

GUERON, NICOLE 1995 Note: An Idea Whose Time Has Come: A Comparative Procedural History of the Civil Rights Acts of 1960, 1964, and 1991, Yale Law Journal 104:1201–1234.

LEWIS, HAROLD, JR. 1997 Civil Rights and Employment Discrimination Law. St. Paul, Minn.: West.

CIVIL RIGHTS CASES
109 U.S. 3 (1883)

In an opinion by Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY, with only Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN dissenting, the Supreme Court ruled that Congress had no constitutional authority under either the THIRTEENTH or the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to pass the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875. Holding that act unconstitutional proved to be one of the most fateful decisions in American history. It had the effect of reinforcing racist attitudes and practices, while emasculating a heroic effort by Congress and the President to prevent the growth of a Jim Crow society. The Court also emasculated the Fourteenth Amendment's enforcement clause, section five. The tragedy is that the Court made the Constitution legitimize public immorality on the basis of specious reasoning.

The Civil Rights Cases comprised five cases decided together, in which the act of 1875 had been enforced against innkeepers, theater owners, and a railroad company. In each of the five, a black citizen was denied the same accommodations, guaranteed by the statute, as white citizens enjoyed. The Court saw only an invasion of local law by the national government, contrary to the powers reserved to the states under the TENTH AMENDMENT. Bradley began his analysis with the Fourteenth Amendment, observing that its first section, after declaring who shall be a citizen, was prohibitory: it restrained only STATE ACTION. "Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject-matter of the amendment." Its fifth section empowered Congress to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation. "To enforce what? To enforce the prohibition," Bradley answered. He ignored the fact that the enforcement section applied to the entire amendment, including the CITIZENSHIP clause, which made all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States and of the states in which they reside. As Harlan pointed out, citizenship necessarily imports "equality of civil rights among citizens of every race in the same state." Congress could guard and enforce rights, including the rights of citizenship, deriving from the Constitution itself. Harlan reminded the Court of its opinion in STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1880), where it had said that "a right or immunity created by the constitution or only guarantied by it, even without any express delegation of power, may be protected by congress."

But Bradley took the view that the legislative power conferred upon Congress by the Fourteenth Amendment does not authorize enactments on subjects "which are within the domain of state legislation. . . . It does not authorize congress to create a code of municipal law for regulation of private rights." Congress can merely provide relief against state action that violates the amendment's prohibitions on the states. Thus, only when the states acted adversely to the rights of citizenship could Congress pass remedial legislation. But its legislation could not cover the whole domain of CIVIL RIGHTS or regulate "all private rights between man and man in society." Otherwise, Congress would "supersede" the state legislatures. In effect the Court was saying that the Reconstruction amendments had not revolutionized the federal system. In effect the Court also warned the states not to discriminate racially, lest Congress intervene, as it had in the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866, which the Court called "corrective" legislation against state action. In the cases under consideration, however, the discrimination derived from purely private acts unsupported by state authority. "The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong" that Congress cannot reach. Congress can, of course, reach and regulate private conduct in the normal course of legislation, penalizing individuals; but, Bradley explained, in every such case Congress possesses under the Constitution a power to act on the subject.

Under the Thirteenth Amendment, however, Congress can enact any legislation necessary and proper to eradicate SLAVERY and "all badges and incidents of slavery," and its legislation may operate directly on individuals, whether their acts have the sanction of state authority or not. The question, then, was whether the Thirteenth Amendment vested in Congress the authority to require that all persons shall have equal accommodations in inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement. The Court conceded that the amendment established "universal civil and political freedom throughout the United States" by abolishing slavery, but it denied that distinctions based on race or color abridged that freedom. Where, Bradley asked, does slavery, servitude, or badges of either arise from race discrimination by private parties? "The thirteenth amendment," he declared, "has respect, not to distinctions of race, or class, or color, but to slavery." The act of the owner of an inn, or theater, or transportation facility in refusing accommodation might inflict an ordinary civil injury, recognizable by state law, but not slavery or an incident of it. "It would be running the slavery argument into the ground," Bradley insisted, "to make it apply to every act of discrimination which a person may see fit to make" as to his guests, or those he will take in his coach, or those he will admit to his concert. On the theory that mere discrimination on account of race or color did not impose badges of slavery, the Court held that the Thirteenth Amendment, like the Fourteenth, did not validate the Civil Rights Act of 1875.

The case involved questions of law, history, and public policy. Harlan, dissenting, had the weight of argument as to all three, but Bradley had the weight of numbers. It was an 8–1 decision, and the eight scarcely bothered to answer the dissenter. Ignoring him might have been more discreet than trying to rebut him. He met their contentions head-on, starting with a strenuous objection to their parsimonious interpretation of national powers under the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, both of which expressly made affirmative grants of power. By contrast, Harlan demonstrated, the Court had generously construed the Constitution to support congressional enactments on behalf of slaveholders. The fugitive slave acts, which operated on private individuals, were based on a clause in the Constitution, Article 4, section 2, paragraph 3, that did not empower Congress to legislate at all. The clause merely provided that a fugitive slave be delivered up upon the claim of his owner, yet the Court sustained the acts of 1793 (PRIGG V. PENNSYLVANIA, 1842) and of 1850 (ABLEMAN V. BOOTH, 1859), implying a national power to enforce a right constitutionally recognized. The Thirteenth Amendment, as the majority admitted, established a constitutional right: civil freedom for citizens throughout the nation. And, as the majority admitted, the abolition of slavery reached the BADGES OF SERVITUDE, so that the freedmen would have the same rights as white men. Similarly, the act of 1875 reached badges of servitude, because it, like the amendments to the Constitution, aimed at erasing the assumption that blacks were racially inferior. For Harlan, RACIAL DISCRIMINATION was a badge of servitude. Bradley had distinguished the act of 1866 from the act of 1875 on the ground that the earlier statute aimed at protecting rights that only the states might deny. Harlan replied that citizens regardless of race were entitled to the same civil rights.

Harlan also demonstrated that the rights allegedly violated by purely private parties were denied by individuals and CORPORATIONS that exercised public functions and wielded power and authority under the state. Relying on a broad concept of state action, he sought to prove that the parties whom the majority regarded as private were, in contemplation of law, public or quasi-public. A railroad corporation, an innkeeper, and a theater-manager had denied accommodations to black citizens. Railroads and streetcars were common carriers, that is, they were public highways, performing state functions; they were public conveyances which, though privately owned, had been established by state authority for a public use and were subject to control by the state for the public benefit. Free citizens of any race were entitled to use such facilities. Similarly, the COMMON LAW defined innkeepers as exercising a quasi-public employment that obligated them to take in all travelers, regardless of race. Theaters were places of public amusement, licensed by the public, of which the "colored race is a part," and theaters were clothed with a public interest, in accord with MUNN V. ILLINOIS (1877). Congress had not promiscuously sought to regulate the entire body of civil rights nor had it entered the domain of the states by generally controlling public conveyances, inns, or places of public amusement. Congress had simply declared that in a nation of universal freedom, private parties exercising public authority could not discriminate on ground of race; in effect the statute reached state instrumentalities whose action was tantamount to state action.

Under the Thirteenth Amendment, Congress could reach badges of servitude; under the Fourteenth, it could reach racial discrimination by state agencies. Contrary to the Court's assertion, Congress had not outlawed racial discrimination imposed by purely private action. It had aimed at such discrimination only in public places chartered or licensed by the state, in violation of the rights of citizenship which the Fourteenth Amendment affirmed. The amendment's fifth section empowered Congress to pass legislation enforcing its affirmative as well as its prohibitory clauses. Courts, in the normal exercise of JUDICIAL REVIEW, could hold unconstitutional state acts that violated the prohibitory clauses. Accordingly, section five was not restricted to merely corrective or remedial national legislation. Congress, not the Court, said Harlan, citing MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), might choose the means best adopted to implementing the ends of the two amendments. Harlan insisted that Congress > may, without transcending the limits of the constitution, do for human liberty and the fundamentals of American citizenship, what it did, with the sanction of this court, for the protection of slavery and the rights of the masters of fugitive slaves. If fugitive slave laws, providing modes and prescribing penalties whereby the master could seize and recover his fugitive slave, were legitimate exertions of an implied power to protect and enforce a right recognized by the constitution, why shall the hands of congress be tied, so that—under an express power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce a constitutional provision granting citizenship—it may not, by means of direct legislation, bring the whole power of this nation to bear upon states and their officers, and upon such individuals and corporations exercising public functions, assumed to abridge the supreme law of the land.

Some old abolitionists, deploring a ruling that returned the freedmen to a "reign of contempt, injury, and ignominy," denounced the "new DRED SCOTT decision," but most were resigned to defeat. Racial segregation was common throughout the country. Not surprisingly The Nation magazine, which approved of the decision, observed that the public's general unconcern about the decision indicated "how completely the extravagant expectations as well as the fierce passions of the war have died out." The Court served "a useful purpose in thus undoing the work of Congress," said the New York Times, and Harper's Weekly agreed. Public opinion supported the Court, but justice and judicial craftsmanship were on the side of Harlan, dissenting.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

KONVITZ, MILTON R. 1961 A Century of Civil Rights. New York: Columbia University Press.

WESTIN, ALAN F. 1962 The Case of the Prejudiced Doorkeeper. Pages 128–144 in Garraty, John A., Quarrels That Have Shaped the Constitution. New York: Harper & Row.

CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1957 created the Commission on Civil Rights to investigate alleged deprivations of VOTING RIGHTS, to study and collect information concerning denials of EQUAL PROTECTION, and to appraise federal laws and policies with respect to equal protection of the laws. Subsequent legislation restated and expanded the commission's concerns to include denials of rights on the basis of color, race, religion, national origin, sex, age, or handicap. Initially, the commission was to issue a series of reports and expire upon issuance of its final report, but Congress repeatedly has extended the commission's reporting duties and life. The commission lacks power to enforce any antidiscrimination or other CIVIL RIGHTS laws.

By the standards of later civil rights legislation, creation of the commission seems an innocuous event. But at the time even this mild gesture drew substantial southern opposition. The commission's "snoopers," one southern congressman argued, "would cause inestimable chaos, confusion, and unrest among [the South's] people and would greatly increase the tension and agitation between the races there."

Because of the commission's advisory nature, measuring its accomplishments is difficult. In the 1960s, the commission's early reports helped to inform Congress about the need for voting rights legislation. And it clearly has served the function, added to its mandate in 1964, of a national clearinghouse for information about denials of equal protection. But the commission also has played a somewhat larger political role. In most administrations the commission's views are more egalitarian than the President's. The commission thus serves as a gadfly that both makes official sounding pronouncements and commands media attention. Administrations hear the commission even if they do not always listen to it.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS 1961 Report. Pages xv–xviii. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION

Created by Order of the Attorney General No. 3204, February 3, 1939, the Civil Rights Section (originally named the Civil Rights Unit) of the Justice Department became the federal government's principal CIVIL RIGHTS litigation unit. The order creating the Section called for a study of federal law to assess its utility in enforcing civil rights. The study, which stated the legal basis and goals of the Section's early civil rights enforcement efforts, suggested the need for TEST CASES to resolve uncertainties about the scope and constitutionality of the only statutory weapons then available to the Section, the surviving Reconstruction-era civil rights legislation. The Section's test cases include UNITED STATES V. CLASSIC (1941), an important precedent establishing authority to prosecute offenses relating to PRIMARY ELECTIONS, and SCREWS V. UNITED STATES (1945), which allowed the application of the criminal provisions of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 to misconduct by state police officers.

The Civil Rights Section's growth reflects a general increase in national concern with civil rights matters. As of 1947, the Section is reported never to have had more than eight or ten lawyers and professional workers on its staff. In 1950, the section more than doubled in size. The CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1957 upgraded the Section to the status of Division by providing for an additional assistant attorney general. By 1965, the Division had eighty-six attorneys and ninety-nine clerical workers. By 1978, there were 178 attorneys and 203 support personnel.

The Division's principal activity consists of litigation. It enforces the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1957, 1960, 1964, and 1968, the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965, the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, the 1866 act's criminal provisions, laws prohibiting PEONAGE and involuntary servitude, and various other laws. It does so through direct actions or through AMICUS CURIAE appearances in private cases. An administration's civil rights priorities are reflected in the categories of cases emphasized by the Division. In the early 1960s the Division emphasized voting rights cases. From 1965 to 1967, DESEGREGATION of education was its priority issue. By 1967, employment litigation became a priority item. Creation of a Task Force on Sex Discrimination in 1977 reflected a growing concern with sex discrimination.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

CARR, ROBERT K. 1947 Federal Protection of Civil Rights: Quest for a Sword. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT

Because the basic rights of CITIZENSHIP were not equally available to all Americans at the nation's inception, civil rights movements involving groups excluded from full political participation have been a continuing feature of U.S. history. Males without property, African Americans, and women are among the groups that have engaged in sustained struggles to establish, protect, or expand their rights as American citizens. These struggles have resulted in fundamental departures from the limited conceptions of citizenship and the role of government that prevailed during the early national era.

The term "civil rights movement" more narrowly refers to the collective efforts of African Americans to advance in American society. These efforts are aspects of a broader, long-term black freedom struggle seeking goals beyond CIVIL RIGHTS, but they have had particularly important impact on dominant conceptions of the rights of American citizens and the role of government in protecting these rights. Although the Supreme Court in the DRED SCOTT decision of 1857 negated the citizenship status of African Americans, the subsequent extensions of egalitarian principles to African Americans resulted in generalized expansions of the scope of constitutionally protected rights. In particular, both the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution, despite retrogressive Court decisions such as PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896), ultimately served as foundations for major civil rights reforms benefiting black Americans and other groups. During the twentieth century, African Americans have participated in many racial advancement efforts that have enlarged the opportunities and protections available to individuals in other groups. More recently, as a result of sustained protest movements of the period after WORLD WAR II, the term "civil rights" has come to refer not only to governmental policies relating to the equal treatment of individuals but also to policies equalizing the allocation of resources among groups. In short, the modern civil rights movement in the United States has redefined as well as pursued rights.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), an interracial group founded in 1909, has been the most enduring institution directing the course of twentieth-century American civil rights movements. Although many organizations later challenged the NAACP's priorities and its reliance on the tactics of litigation and governmental lobbying, the group's large membership and its increasingly effective affiliate, the NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE & EDUCATIONAL FUND, made civil rights reforms into principal black political objectives. Among the outgrowths of NAACP-sponsored legal suits were the Supreme Court's SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1944) decision outlawing white primary elections and the BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954, 1955) decision against segregated public schools. These landmark cases helped to reverse earlier Court decisions—such as Plessy—that limited the scope of civil rights protections.

In the years after the Brown decision, other civil rights organizations departed from the NAACP's reform strategy and placed more emphasis on protest and mass mobilization. Starting with the Montgomery bus boycott of 1955–1956, southern blacks, aided by northern allies, successfully used boycotts, mass meetings, marches, rallies, sit-ins, and other insurgent tactics to speed the pace of civil rights reform. The Southern Christian Leadership Council (SCLC), founded in 1957 and led for many years by MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), founded in 1960, spearheaded a series of mass struggles against white racial domination in the South. The NAACP also supplied many of the participants and much of the legal support for these struggles, while the predominantly white Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) contributed activists and expertise in the use of Gandhian nonviolent tactics. Although DESEGREGATION was initially the main focus of southern mass movements, economic and political concerns were evident from their inception.

King and the SCLC played especially important roles in mobilizing mass protest campaigns in the Alabama cities of Birmingham and Selma in 1963 and 1965. SCLC leaders orchestrated clashes between nonviolent demonstrators and often brutal law enforcement personnel. Such highly publicized confrontations made northern whites more aware of southern racial inequities, particularly the pervasive and antiquated Jim Crow system of public SEGREGATION. As the southern struggle's best-known spokesperson, King sought to link black civil rights aspirations with widely accepted, long-established political principles. During 1961 he identified the democratic ideals of the Founding Fathers as an unrealized "noble dream." "On the one hand, we have proudly professed the principles of democracy, and on the other hand, we have sadly practiced the very antithesis of those principles," he told an audience at Lincoln University. Speaking at the 1963 March on Washington, he insisted that the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE and the Constitution were "a promissory note" guaranteeing all Americans "the unalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." By exposing the contradictions between American ideals and southern racial realities, the SCLC's southern campaigns strengthened northern white support for civil rights reforms.

Although the SNCC was an outgrowth of the student sit-in movement of 1960, its most significant activities were concentrated in the rural areas of Mississippi and Alabama. In these areas, SNCC staff members worked with indigenous black leaders seeking to overcome economic and political oppression. During the first half of the 1960s, SNCC concentrated its efforts on the achievement of voting rights for southern blacks and federal protection for civil rights workers. SNCC organizers also helped to create new institutions, such as the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party and the Lowndes County (Alabama) Freedom Organization, under local black leadership. By 1966, the "black power" slogan, popularized by SNCC's chair Stokely Carmichael, summarized the group's emerging ideas of a struggle seeking political, economic, and cultural objectives beyond narrowly defined civil rights reforms.

By the late 1960s, organizations such as the NAACP, SCLC, and SNCC faced increasingly strong challenges from "black nationalist" leaders and new militant organizations, such as the Black Panther party. Often influenced by Malcolm X and by Pan-African ideologies, proponents of "black liberation" saw civil rights reforms as insufficient because they did not address the problems of poor blacks. Black nationalists also pointed out that African American citizenship had resulted from the involuntary circumstances of enslavement. In addition, racial-liberation proponents often saw the African American freedom struggle in international terms, as a movement for "human rights" and national "self-determination" rather than for civil rights.

The most significant legislation to result from the mass struggles of the 1960s were the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 and the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. (Congress also passed notable civil rights bills in 1968, 1972, and 1990.) Taken together, these laws greatly enhanced the civic status of blacks, women, and other minority groups and placed greater responsibility on the federal government to protect such groups from discriminatory treatment. Although the 1964 and 1965 acts were in some respects simply restatements of protections specified in the constitutional amendments enacted during RECONSTRUCTION, the impact of the new legislation was greater because of the expanded scope of federal regulatory powers and the continued militancy by victims of discrimination.

Since the mid-1960s, national civil rights policies have evinced awareness that antidiscrimination legislation was not sufficient to achieve tangible improvements in the living conditions of many blacks or to bring about equalization of the distribution of resources and services among racial groups in the United States. In 1968 the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders (the Kerner Commission) concluded that despite civil right reforms, the nation was "moving toward two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal." By the time of this report, the liberal coalition that had supported passage of the major civil rights legislation was divided over the role, if any, government should play in eliminating these persistent racial inequities. A "white backlash" against black militancy and claims that black gains had resulted in "reverse discrimination" against whites undermined support for major new civil rights initiatives during the 1970s and 1980s.

Although militant protest activity declined after the 1960s, civil rights movements have remained a significant feature of American political life. The increased black participation in the American political system that resulted from previous struggles lessened black reliance on extralegal tactics, but civil rights issues continued to stimulate protest, particularly when previous gains appeared to be threatened. Furthermore, women, homosexuals, disabled people, and other groups suffering discriminatory treatment have mobilized civil rights movements and created organizations of their own, thereby contributing to the continuing national dialogue regarding the scope of civil rights and the role of government.

During the 1970s and 1980s, debate continued over the appropriateness of employment AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs and court-ordered compensatory remedies for historically rooted patterns of discrimination. Nevertheless, despite contention regarding these issues and notwithstanding the conservative political climate of the period, most national civil rights policies established during the 1960s have survived. Moreover, civil rights advocates have continued to press, with limited success, toward implementation of policies for group advancement rather than individual rights, tangible gains rather than civil status, and equality of social outcomes rather than equality of opportunity. The modern African American freedom and liberation struggles of the 1960s therefore produced a major but still controversial shift in prevailing norms regarding the nature of civil rights in the United States.

CLAYBORNE CARSON
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Race Consciousness; Racial Discrimination; Racial Preference.)

Bibliography

BRANCH, TAYLOR 1988 Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–63. New York: Simon and Schuster.

CARSON, CLAYBORNE 1981 In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

GRAHAM, HUGH DAVIS 1990 The Civil Rights Record. New York: Oxford University Press.

KLUGER, RICHARD 1975 Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Knopf.

LAWSON, STEVEN F. 1985 In Pursuit of Power: Southern Blacks and Electoral Politics. New York: Columbia University Press.

CIVIL RIGHTS PRACTICE

Civil rights practice, as discussed herein, refers to litigation brought pursuant to federal CIVIL RIGHTS legislation. Many civil rights statutes exist, some of modern origin and some dating from the RECONSTRUCTION era following the CIVIL WAR. The statutes protect individuals from deprivations of constitutional rights by government and from various kinds of discrimination by private individuals. SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, U.S. CODE, passed in 1871, is the primary vehicle for litigating deprivations of constitutional rights. ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION, passed in the 1960s and later, creates protection from private discrimination on certain grounds in particular contexts, such a PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS, EMPLOYMENT, and housing. Although the structure and scope of these statutes differ, they are all enforced primarily through private litigation for damages or injunctive relief. The different statutes may also authorize other enforcement mechanisms—criminal prosecutions, civil actions, or administrative enforcement by the government—and these can play an important role in effectuating the purposes of the legislation. But given constraints on government resources, private enforcement is essential.

There are many substantive hurdles to recovery under the various civil rights statutes, some imposed by Congress and many by the Supreme Court in its decisions. Limitations on constitutional rights such as the RIGHT OF PRIVACY or DUE PROCESS OF LAW, stringent proof requirements, and defenses such as absolute and qualified immunity, are but a few examples of the challenging issues a litigant may confront. Because of the complexities in civil rights practice, effective private enforcement usually requires that the plaintiff retain an attorney. In a small number of cases, the plaintiff can join with others in a CLASS ACTION lawsuit, but most likely, the plaintiff as an individual will seek REPRESENTATION.

In 1976, Congress realized that the prevailing American rule, in which each party bears its own attorneys' fees, was a significant impediment to private enforcement of civil rights legislation. In that year, Congress enacted the Attorneys' Fees Awards Act, which permitted "prevailing parties" in civil rights actions to recover their attorneys' fees from the losing parties. In practice, this fee-shifting favors plaintiffs much more than defendants, despite the neutrality of the language. The legislative history of the Attorneys' Fees Awards Act reveals that Congress was aware that civil rights cases often present issues with less monetary value than other types of litigation an attorney might undertake. Congress believed that in the absence of fee-shifting, civil rights plaintiffs with low damages or claims in which predominantly equitable remedies are sought would lack the means to vindicate their rights. The difficulty and the economics of their cases would make them unable to compete with litigants presenting other types of legal work.

Since passage of the Attorneys' Fees Awards Act, the Court has decided numerous cases interpreting the statute. Although a number of the Court's decisions have bolstered recovery of fees, some of the Court's decisions have undercut the incentives the Fees Act gives attorneys to represent civil rights plaintiffs. One example of such a decision is Evans v. Jeff D. (1986). There, the Court held that a waiver of fees as part of a settlement is consistent with the purposes of the Fees Act. The decision has affected the strategies of both civil rights plaintiffs' attorneys and defense attorneys. Plaintiffs' attorneys practicing in nonprofit settings are vulnerable to requests for fee waivers, because the rules by which they operate often prevent them from entering into agreements that give their clients a disincentive to waive their fees. In the private sector, plaintiffs' attorneys have protected themselves by fee agreements that provide for a contingent recovery or payment of an hourly fee in the event of a settlement that includes a waiver. Defendants commonly make lump sum offers, out of which fees will be paid. Often the result is a partial waiver of fees. Because most cases ultimately are settled, the result of Jeff D. is that civil rights lawyers who seek to make a living at the practice must take cases with damages high enough to compensate the attorney in the event of settlement. Cases with lower predictable damages—for example, those based on constitutional violations or adverse employment actions against blue-collar or temporary workers, or cases involving equitable relief—are not so likely to be accepted by attorneys.

City of Burlington v. Dague (1992) is another case that has sapped the vitality of certain types of civil rights practice. By this decision, the Court withdrew the discretion of judges to award fees in addition to the hourly rate. Unfortunately, some types of civil rights litigation are so expensive that compensation for the hours spent does not begin to pay for the litigation. In the VOTING RIGHTS area, for example, even assessing the viability of a case involves significant SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH. Studies can cost in the tens of thousands of dollars. Plaintiffs cannot afford these costs, and so the attorney must forward them. Without the possibility of extra compensation for the financial risks undertaken by the attorney, there is a significant disincentive to litigate those cases. Some voting rights litigation is handled by nonprofit or private organizations, whose own resources defray costs; also, the U.S. Department of Justice plays a significant role in voting rights litigation because of the department's preclearance responsibilities. However, if a plaintiff does not succeed in placing the case with a nonprofit firm or the Department of Justice for litigation, it is extremely difficult to obtain private counsel. The disincentives to private representation narrow the scope of voting rights issues that are addressed by litigation.

Because civil rights legislation encompasses so many different types of claims, the practice areas differ greatly. Just as some types of civil rights practice have been hard hit by the decisions discussed above, other practices have seemingly been unaffected and are thriving. The Court has not focused on the heterogeneity of civil rights cases as it has decided issues affecting fees and damages. Unless the Court takes account of the varying impacts of its decisions on certain types of practice, the incentives promised by the Fees Act will be greatly diluted.

JULIE DAVIES
(2000)

Bibliography

DAVIES, JULIE 1997 Federal Civil Rights Practice in the 1990's: The Dichotomy Between Reality and Theory. Hastings Law Journal 48:197–270.

LANDSBERG, BRIAN K. 1997 Enforcing Civil Rights, Race Discrimination and the Department of Justice. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.

SCHWAB, STEWART J. and EISENBERG, THEODORE 1987 The Reality of Constitutional Tort Litigation. Cornell Law Review 72:641–695.

——— 1988 Explaining Constitutional Tort Litigation: The Influence of the Attorneys Fees Statute and the Government as Defendant. Cornell Law Review 73:719–781.

SELMI, MICHAEL 1996 The Value of the EEOC: Reexamining the Agency's Role in Employment Discrimination Law. Ohio State Law Journal 57:1–64.

WASBY, STEPHEN L. 1995 Race Relations Litigation in an Age of Complexity. Charlottesville, Virginia: University Press of Virginia.

CIVIL RIGHTS REMOVAL

Since the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866, federal CIVIL RIGHTS laws have allowed REMOVAL OF CASES from state to federal courts. The 1866 and 1870 acts provided for removal to federal court of state criminal or civil cases affecting persons who were denied or could not enforce in state court rights guaranteed by the acts. In the REVISED STATUTES of 1874, Congress restated the removal power to encompass violations of "any law providing for . . . equal civil rights." Early removal cases, typified by STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1880), allowed removal when state courts denied rights by enforcing state statutes but refused removal when state courts denied rights by following uncodified practices. With the vanishing of the BLACK CODES, removal became an insignificant remedy.

In the 1960s, civil rights protesters often were arrested under state TRESPASS, traffic, and other minor laws and were subjected to unfair state court proceedings. After a pause of eighty years, the Court again considered civil rights removal. In Georgia v. Rachel (1966) civil rights SIT-IN demonstrators being prosecuted for trespass in state court sought removal. The Court held removal authorized only for violations of "any law providing for specific civil rights stated in terms of racial equality." But, bending the Strauder-Rives line, the Court did not require that a state statute be the basis for the alleged deprivation of federal rights. The Court allowed removal on the grounds that the state prosecution violated the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, which outlaws even attempts to punish persons exercising rights of equal access to PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS.

On the same day, however, the Court decided in City of Greenwood v. Peacock (1966) that workers engaged in a voter registration drive could not rely on various voting statutes that prohibit RACIAL DISCRIMINATION to remove their state prosecutions for obstructing the public streets. The mere likelihood of prejudice was not enough to justify removal under the statute. The majority evidently shrank from the prospect of wholesale removal of criminal prosecutions of black defendants from southern state courts to federal courts. Peacock effectively precludes widespread modern use of civil rights removal.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

AMSTERDAM, ANTHONY G. 1965 Criminal Prosecutions Affecting Federally Guaranteed Civil Rights: Federal Removal and Habeas Corpus Jurisdiction to Abort State Court Trial. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 113:793–912.

CIVIL RIGHTS REPEAL ACT
28 Stat. 36 (1894)

From the middle of the 1860s to 1875, Congress was favorably disposed toward ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION and even enacted some such measures over presidential veto. But many of the provisions enacted encountered restrictive interpretations to outright invalidation in the Supreme Court. The Repeal Act of 1894 symbolizes formal reconvergence of congressional and judicial attitudes towards CIVIL RIGHTS statutes.

In 1892 the Democratic party, for the first time after the CIVIL WAR, gained control of both houses of Congress and the presidency. In the Repeal Act of 1894, which repealed portions of the Enforcement Act of 1870 and the FORCE ACT OF 1871, Congress eliminated most civil rights measures that had not already been undermined by the Court. The repealed provisions had provided for federal control of federal elections through the appointment of federal election officials, a control method revived in the CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS of 1960 and 1964 and the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1981 Civil Rights Legislation. p. 741. Charlottesville, Va.: Michie Co.

CIVIL WAR

The Civil War was the greatest constitutional crisis in the nation's history. It tested the nation-state relationship and the powers of Congress, the President, and the courts. By ultimately destroying SLAVERY, the conflict removed the most destructive element in the constitutional system and produced promises of equality under law throughout the United States. The addition of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT dramatically changed the structure of the federal system in important respects. In the short run these amendments ended slavery and gave state and national CITIZENSHIP to over four million black men, women, and children. They also opened the door for black participation in politics. By the mid-twentieth century the amendments would place a great many individual rights under federal protection.

The was also finally settled the long-debated question of SOVEREIGNTY. When a state and the national government clashed over ultimate authority, the national government would prevail. This primacy did not mean, however, that the states were stripped of power or influence. Both state and national governments involved themselves energetically and successfully in war-making and hence increased both their influence and their stature before the people. State and federal taxation increased along with state and federal expenditures for public projects. The war thus produced an ironic dual legacy: freedom for black Americans and a vital federal system in which states would retain significant, though no longer unique, influence over the amount of freedom these freedmen would exercise.

Because Congress was in recess when the conflict began, the President had to cope with the crisis alone. ABRAHAM LINCOLN answered secessionist rhetoric with a powerful argument that sustained national authority by noting the danger of anarchy in SECESSION and by emphasizing the sovereignty of people, not states. "A majority, held in restraint by constitutional checks, and limitations, and always changing easily, with deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiments, is the only true sovereign of a free people," Lincoln said. To preserve the constitutional system that embodied this process, Lincoln was willing to lead the Union into war.

Lincoln marshaled northern resources to fight secession. He called for troops, paid $2 million from the treasury, pledged federal credit for $250 million more, and proclaimed a blockade of southern ports. These initiatives raised the constitutional problem of whether the conflict was legitimate at all, for Lincoln had acted without statutory authority and only Congress had power to declare war. In the March 1863 PRIZE CASES, the Supreme Court gave its answer on the disposition of several ships seized by the Union navy after Lincoln's 1861 blockade. The constitutional question was whether the President could blockade the South without a DECLARATION OF WAR by Congress. Emphasizing the distinction between an international war, which Congress had to declare, and a civil war thrust upon the President and demanding immediate response, the Court defined the war as an insurrection, thus recognizing the President's power to subdue the rebellion without recognizing the Confederacy as an independent nation. The Court also justified Lincoln's action on the basis of the Militia Act of 1795, which allowed the President to call up the federal militia to stop insurrections. Presidents JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, JAMES K. POLK, MILLARD FILLMORE, and FRANKLIN PIERCE had established precedents in exercising this power, and the 1827 case of MARTIN V. MOTT had sustained it.

Executive authority over CIVIL LIBERTIES, the rights of civilian justice, FREEDOM OF SPEECH, and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS provoked the most criticism. Fearing prorebel judges and juries in border states, Lincoln in 1861 suspended the privilege of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS in the area between New York and Washington. This action gave the military control over civil liberty. Union soldiers arrested men near Baltimore for recruiting rebels and burning bridges linking Washington to the North. Chief Justice ROGER BROOKE TANEY went to Baltimore especially to challenge Lincoln's suspension of the writ. Congress, not the President, retained constitutional suspension authority, Taney claimed. But over fifty pamphlets quickly surfaced to debate the issue, and authoritative voices supported Lincoln. Lincoln ignored Taney, and habeas corpus remained suspended. In fact, in 1862 suspension of the writ was expanded to cover the entire North.

The Union army arrested about 15,000 people; however, the vast majority were taken as rebel territory was occupied. The number of northern civilians subject to military law owing to the suspension of habeas corpus was limited, perhaps to a few hundred, and press, platform, and pulpit continued to sound with criticism of the "Lincoln dictatorship." On the other hand some newspapers, including the National Zeitung, the Philadelphia Evening Journal, the Chicago Times, and the New York World, were temporarily shut down, and the editors of others were arrested, held for short periods of time, and then released—a practice that often restrained their criticism. Furthermore, Lincoln defended the suspension policy with sweeping rhetoric that may have had its own chilling effect on criticism: "The man who stands by and says nothing when the peril of his government is discussed cannot be misunderstood. If not hindered he is sure to help the enemy."

In the most famous civil liberties case of the time, a leading Ohio Democratic congressman, Clement Vallandigham, was arrested in Ohio in 1863 for protesting General Burnside's prohibition of "declaring sympathy for the enemy." Tried and convicted by a military tribunal, Vallandigham was banished to the Confederacy after the Supreme Court denied itself jurisdiction of the case in Ex Parte Vallandigham (1864). Vallandigham and his arrest were popular causes, however, and the Democratic party sought votes with some success as the party of civil liberties throughout the conflict. Still, when northern voters had to choose between Lincoln's suspensions and Vallandigham's defiance, they usually sided with Lincoln and his explanation that preserving the constitutional system as a whole in wartime required limiting speech that threatened the war effort. The Confederate government also suspended the writ of habeas corpus, provoking protest from state-sovereignty radicals, but such protest did little to weaken the Confederacy.

The abiding health of the constitutional system in the North during the war was demonstrated by the ongoing electoral process, within which civil liberty restrictions could be discussed and debated and through which the voters might throw out of office the very government that was restricting civil liberties. In Dixie, too, elections continued for the Confederate Congress, although not for the presidency, which had a six-year term, beginning in 1861. One advantage the North had over the South was an established political system that generated alternatives, focused political discussion, used patronage to keep intraparty rivalries in line, and kept opposition to the administration within reasonable bounds. Confederate political quarrels, lacking party apparatus, became personal and hence more intense.

LEGISLATIVE POWER also expanded during the war, as Congress and executive cooperated to preserve and strengthen national authority. Legislators enacted a series of military drafts that brought national authority directly into the life of every American. Congress endorsed Lincoln's habeas corpus suspension in March 1863, although the tardiness of the Indemnity Act suggests the sensitivity of voters to the issue. Congress established the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War to investigate generals perceived as not vigorous enough or not in accord with REPUBLICAN PARTY policies. Lincoln used committee pressure to prod generals toward advanced measures. The one major division between executive and legislative branches, over RECONSTRUCTION, began with the antiLincoln diatribe of the Wade-Davis Manifesto, but soon found Lincoln and Congress working out their differences, agreeing on the need to protect freedmen and provide them with economic support through the Freedmen's Bureau Act. Wade and Davis both supported Lincoln for reelection in 1864, and just before his death Lincoln was apparently contemplating a change in his Reconstruction policies that would have moved him closer to Congress. The two branches still debated which southern governments should be restored to the Union—those following Lincoln's plan or Congress's alternative—but both agreed that once war ended Congress would effectively control the Reconstruction process.

There was no disagreement about the wartime economic program. The first federal income tax law, the creation of the first national currency in the Greenback Act of 1862, the development of a national banking system, the taxing out of existence of state-based currency, the huge subsidy to build railroads to the Pacific Ocean, the opening up of millions of acres to homesteading with the HOMESTEAD ACT, the establishment of the Department of Agriculture, and the MORRILL ACT, which helped found and sustain major universities throughout the nation, all received Lincoln's unequivocal approval.

None of this national government activity was accompanied by federal regulation. The first national regulative agency, the Interstate Commerce Commission of 1887, lay twenty-two years into the postwar era. But people now accepted Congress's constitutional authority to shape the economy. Despite the Jeffersonian rhetoric of the Democratic party, it was the old Hamiltonian program and Hamiltonian views of national power, now infusing Whig and Republican political economy, that shaped national government policymaking. State governments, too, became more active. Some states set up public health boards and railroad oversight commissions. In the South, Reconstruction state governments established the region's first public schools. Cities also expanded their activities, having seen what government energy might accomplish.

The death of slavery was the largest constitutional change of the war. The conflict helped to resolve a growing contradiction within the constitutional system itself. On the one hand, the Constitution of 1787 recognized and protected slavery in several of its provisions. FEDERALISM left states free to determine whether they would be free or slave. The Supreme Court had declared the territories open to slavery. Democratic presidents had endorsed proslavery demands. On the other hand, by 1860 slavery had become, in many northern eyes, a major threat to constitutional liberties and the operation of the political/constitutional system.

The prewar era saw proslavery attempts to stifle antislavery voices—in Congress through gag rules, in the free states through anti-abolitionist mobs, and in politics generally through the prohibition of antislavery arguments in the slave states and the territories. All these efforts helped generate sectional parties. In addition, the South used threats of secession to protect slavery, thus hardening northern hostility to the peculiar institution and to what it termed "the Slave Power Conspiracy." People did not have to be racial egalitarians to be enemies of slavery. The threat to individual rights and the political process made slavery a target of northern hostility. The Constitution thus was at war with itself—promising open elections, free debate, the right to petition, the whole process of government by consent, on the one hand, and protecting slavery, on the other. The war ended the conflict.

Freed from obstruction by southern congressmen, the wartime northern Congress not only enacted much nationalizing legislation but also attacked slavery whenever the Constitution put it within congressional reach. Congress ended slavery in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA and in the territories. Then, acting on the theory that slaves might be contraband of war, Congress turned on the South and passed laws first confiscating property used directly to attack the Union (First Confiscation Act, August 1861) and then taking all slaves of rebels (Second Confiscation Act, July 1862). But these two laws freed no slaves, for the judicial procedures to prove disloyalty were too cumbersome. The laws did, however, demonstrate growing support for executive action against slavery.

Lincoln had two arenas in which he might act. In civilian areas his emancipation goals were restrained by the Constitution, which let states choose freedom or slavery. He asked border slave states to free their slaves. When that effort failed, he turned his attention to places still in rebellion, places where his constitutional war powers could operate. The EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION of January 1, 1863, freed slaves wherever the Union advanced after that day, and it permitted freedmen to acquire claims on citizenship by serving as soldiers.

Emancipation ended the national government's protection for slavery, which had existed since 1787. With the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment in 1865, the national government promised to eradicate, not defend, slavery. The death of slavery ended the reason for secession and for obstructing open debate in Congress and in the polity at large. It also meant that the institution that had most conspicuously challenged the ideal of equal justice under law was gone. As the Civil War ended, a robust constitutional system of active states and a proven nation awaited new challenges to that ideal.

PHILLIP S. PALUDAN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Confederate Constitution; Confiscation Acts; Constitutional History, 1861–1865; Executive Power; Executive Prerogative; Jeffersonianism; War Powers; Whig Party.)

Bibliography

BELZ, HERMAN 1978 Emancipation and Equal Rights: Politics and Constitutionalism in the Civil War Era. New York: Norton.

——— 1984 Lincoln and the Constitution: The Dictatorship Question Reconsidered. Fort Wayne, Ind.: Louis Warren Lincoln Library.

FEHRENBACHER, DON E. 1979 Lincoln and the Constitution. In Cullom Davis, ed., The Public and Private Lincoln. Carbondale: University of Southern Illinois Press.

HYMAN, HAROLD 1973 A More Perfect Union: The Impact of the Civil War and Reconstruction on the Constitution. New York: Knopf.

———, and WIECEK, WILLIAM 1982 Equal Justice Under Law: Constitutional Development, 1835–1875. New York: Harper & Row.

MCKITRICK, ERIC 1967 Party Politics and the Union and Confederate War Efforts. In Walter Dean Burnham and William Chambers, eds., The American Party System. New York: Free Press.

NEELY, MARK E., JR. 1991 The Fate of Liberty: Abraham Lincoln and Civil Liberties, New York: Oxford.

PALUDAN, PHILLIP S. 1988 "A People's Contest": The Union and Civil War, 1861–1865. New York: Harper & Row.

RANDALL, JAMES G. (1926) 1951 Constitutional Problems Under Lincoln, rev. ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

CIVIL WAR AMENDMENTS

See: Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Thirteenth Amendment

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

Original 1986 Editorial Board

Henry J. Abraham

Charles L. Black, Jr.

Robert H. Bork

William J. Brennan, Jr.

Henry Steele Commager

Martha A. Field

Ruth Bader Ginsburg

Erwin N. Griswold

Gerald Gunther

Harold M. Hyman

Philip B. Kurland

Alpheus T. Mason

Paul L. Murphy

C. Herman Pritchett

Harry N. Scheiber

Martin Shapiro

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

SECOND EDITION

Edited by
Leonard W. Levy
and
Kenneth L. Karst

Adam Winkler, Associate Editor for the Second Edition

Dennis J. Mahoney, Assistant Editor for the First Edition
John G. West, Jr., Assistant Editor for Supplement I

MACMILLAN REFERENCE USA
An imprint of the Gale Group
New York

Macmillan Library Reference USA
1633 Broadway
New York, NY 10019

Printed in the United States of America

Printing Number
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Encyclopedia of the American Constitution / edited by Leonard W. Levy and Kenneth L. Karst.—2nd ed. / Adam Winkler, associate editor for the second edition.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 0-02-864880-3 (hard cover : alk. paper)
1. Constitutional law—United States—Encyclopedias. I. Levy, Leonard Williams, 1923– II. Karst, Kenneth L. III. Winkler, Adam.
KF4548 .E53 2000
342.73—dc21 00-029203

This paper meets the requirements of ANSI-NISO Z39.48-1992 (Permanence of Paper).

C

(Continued)

CLAIMS COURT

The Claims Court hears actions for money damages against the United States, except for tort claims. The court thus hears claims for contract damages, tax refunds, and JUST COMPENSATION for property taken. With the consent of all parties to an action against the government under the FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT, the court can substitute for a court of appeals and review the decision of a federal district court.

Under the doctrine of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY, the United States cannot be sued without its consent. At first, persons with claims against the government had to ask Congress for relief under private acts. This practice became burdensome, and in 1855 Congress established the Court of Claims to hear nontort money claims against the United States, and report its recommendations to Congress. Much of the congressional burden remained; thus, in 1863, Congress empowered the court to give judgments against the government. In 1866 the process became fully "judicial" when Congress repealed a provision delaying payment of such a judgment until the Treasury estimated an appropriation.

The Court of Claims retained the nonjudicial function of giving ADVISORY OPINIONS on questions referred to it by the houses of Congress and heads of executive departments. However, its judges from the beginning had life tenure during GOOD BEHAVIOR. In 1933 the question arose whether the Court of Claims was a CONSTITUTIONAL COURT. Congress, responding to the economic depression, reduced the salaries of federal employees, except for judges protected by Article III against salary reductions. In Williams v. United States (1933), the Supreme Court, taking the preposterous position that claims against the government fell outside the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES, held that the Court of Claims was a LEGISLATIVE COURT whose judges' salaries could constitutionally be reduced.

In 1953 Congress declared explicitly that the Court of Claims was established under Article III. In Glidden v. Zdanok (1962) the Supreme Court accepted this characterization on the basis of two separate (and incompatible) theories, pieced together to make a majority for the result. Two Justices relied on the 1953 Act; three others would have overruled Williams and held that the court had been a constitutional court since 1866 when Congress allowed its judgments to be paid without executive revision, and its business became almost completely "judicial." (The same decision confirmed that the COURT OF CUSTOMS AND PATENT APPEALS was a constitutional court.) The Court of Claims transferred new congressional reference cases to its chief commissioner, and Congress ratified this practice. The court's business became wholly "judicial."

In the FEDERAL COURTS IMPROVEMENT ACT (1982) Congress reorganized a number of specialized federal courts. The Court of Claims disappeared, and its functions were reallocated. The commissioners of that court became judges of a new legislative court, the United States Claims Court. They serve for fifteen-year terms. The Article III judges of the Court of Claims became judges of a new constitutional court, the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT. That court hears appeals from a number of specialized courts, including the Claims Court.

The availability of a suit for damages in the Claims Court serves to underpin the constitutionality of some governmental action that might otherwise raise serious constitutional problems. Some regulations, for example, are arguable TAKINGS OF PROPERTY; if the regulated party can recover compensation in the Claims Court, however, the constitutional issue dissolves (Blanchette v. Connecticut General Insurance Corps., 1974).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

SYMPOSIUM 1983 The Federal Courts Improvement Act. Cleveland State Law Review 32:1–116.

CLARK, CHARLES E.
(1889–1963)

Charles Edward Clark, the son of a Connecticut farmer and a graduate of Yale College, achieved distinction as a legal educator and a federal judge. In 1919 he began teaching at Yale Law School, where he had earned his law degree, and became its dean in 1929. Within the year he had modernized the curriculum, stressing interdisciplinary studies. Originally a Republican, Clark became a New Dealer and in 1937 was the only law school dean to testify in favor of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's court reorganization plan. In 1939 Roosevelt appointed him to the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS, Second Circuit. As a federal judge for twenty-five years he tended to be a liberal activist even though his opinions on the rights of the criminally accused strongly supported prosecutorial positions. But Clark's opinions favored trade unions, CIVIL RIGHTS, and government regulation of the economy. As a FIRST AMENDMENT absolutist, he eloquently and ardently championed views that Justices HUGO L. BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS of the Supreme Court later endorsed.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

SCHICK, MARVIN 1970 Learned Hand's Court. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

CLARK, TOM C.
(1899–1977)

Tom Campbell Clark, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court and ATTORNEY GENERAL of the United States, was born September 23, 1899, in Dallas, Texas. He was educated at the University of Texas at Austin, receiving his B.A. in 1921 and his LL.B. in 1922. Admitted to the Texas Bar in 1922, he joined his family's firm in Dallas.

Clark began his twelve-year career with the Department of Justice in 1937 as a special assistant to the attorney general. He held a number of posts in the department, capped by his 1945 appointment as attorney general by President HARRY S. TRUMAN. With this promotion, Clark became the first person to become attorney general by working himself up from the lower ranks of the department.

Four years later, President Truman appointed Clark Associate Justice of the Supreme Court; he took his oath of office on August 24, 1949. His tenure on the bench spanned eighteen years, and he served on both the VINSON COURT and WARREN COURT. He retired from the Court on June 12, 1967, to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interests when his son, Ramsey Clark, was appointed attorney general by President LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Clark, however, continued to sit as a judge in the various courts of appeal, and to be a vigorous and vocal advocate of judicial reform until his death on June 13, 1977.

On the Supreme Court, Clark built a reputation as a pragmatic jurist. Early on, he voted regularly with Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON and the other Truman appointees. In time, however, he began to assert his independence. In YOUNGSTOWN SHEET AND TUBE COMPANY V. SAWYER (1952), the steel seizure case, Clark voted against Vinson and Truman, concurring in the Court's decision holding unconstitutional Truman's order for governmental seizure of the nation's steel mills.

While Clark was generally viewed as politically conservative, he was relatively nonideological, and his views changed throughout his tenure, especially during the years of the Warren Court (1953–1969). He was a nationalist, a liberal on racial matters, and, in general, a conservative on issues of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE and CIVIL LIBERTIES.

Clark's most significant opinions in the area of FEDERALISM are his landmark opinion on STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE in DEAN MILK COMPANY V. MADISON (1951), and his dissent in Williams v. Georgia (1955), which provided the classic definition of "independent and ADEQUATE STATE GROUNDS" that insulate state court decisions from the Supreme Court. In the racial area, speaking for the Court in BURTON V. WILMINGTON PARKING AUTHORITY (1961), he rejected as unlawful STATE ACTION racial discrimination by private persons who had leased public property. In addition, he wrote for the Court in HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL, INC., V. UNITED STATES, (1964) where, in a case involving both national power and racial justice, a unanimous Court upheld the PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS provisions of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964.

In the areas of criminal procedure and civil liberties Clark was less consistent. Although he may be best known for his controversial opinion in MAPP V. OHIO (1961), declaring that illegally seized evidence must be excluded from a state criminal prosecution, this opinion was atypical. More often, especially in his later years on the bench, he disagreed with the liberalization of criminal procedure wrought by the Warren Court. For instance, he dissented strongly—indeed almost violently—in MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966).

Similarly, Clark's record on civil liberties, though generally conservative, was not completely consistent. Probably Clark was most consistent as to those issues arising out of anticommunist and LOYALTY-SECURITY PROGRAMS. As attorney general, he had been instrumental in setting up some of these programs, and as a Justice he continued to support government efforts to suppress what he regarded as the communist conspiracy. Thus, he dissented in WATKINS V. UNITED STATES (1957) and joined the majority in BARENBLATT V. UNITED STATES (1959). In addition, he was the sole dissenter in Greene v. McElroy (1959), a decision which badly damaged the loyalty-security program for employees of private companies.

On the other hand, Clark was generally less sympathetic to efforts by the states to cope with what he regarded as a national problem. Thus, he wrote for a unanimous Court in WIEMAN V. UPDEGRAFF (1952), which held unconstitutional an Oklahoma LOYALTY OATH statute requiring state employees to swear that they were not members of organizations designated by the attorney general as subversive or a "Communist front." Clark emphasized that under the Oklahoma law an individual could be guilty of perjury even though he did not know the character of the organization that he had innocently joined. And he joined the majority in PENNSYLVANIA V. NELSON (1956), which invalidated state SEDITION laws on the ground that Congress had preempted the field.

In other areas of civil liberties, Justice Clark tended more often to vote in favor of asserted constitution rights. Thus, in the area of church-state relations, he wrote the opinion in ABINGTON TOWNSHIP SCHOOL DISTRICT V. SCHEMPP (1963), which held unconstitutional a Pennsylvania statute that required that each school day start with the reading of at least ten verses from the Bible. Similarly, he voted with the majority in a series of cases that drastically narrowed court-martial jurisdiction over civilians, the most significant of which was Kinsella v. Singleton (1960).

JOHN KAPLAN
(1986)

Bibliography

KIRKENDALL, RICHARD 1969 Tom C. Clark. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court, 1789–1969. New York: Chelsea House.

CLARK DISTILLING CO. v. WESTERN MARYLAND RAILWAY CO.
242 U.S. 311 (1917)

With Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and WILLIS VAN DEVANTER dissenting without opinion, the Court upheld the WEBB-KENYON ACT. Chief Justice EDWARD D. WHITE, for the majority, rejected the assertion that the act constituted an unconstitutional legislative DELEGATION OF POWER to the states. No delegation occurred because Congress provided for uniform regulation throughout the states.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

CLARKE, JOHN H.
(1857–1945)

With the exception of OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, John H. Clarke was the most consistently progressive member of the Supreme Court during the final years of EDWARD D. WHITE's chief justiceship and the early tenure of WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT. A prosperous newspaper publisher and attorney who defended many midwestern railroads, Clarke belonged to the moderate wing of the Democratic Party in Ohio which defended the gold standard in 1896 and looked skeptically upon reform programs. WOODROW WILSON appointed Clarke to the federal district court in 1914 and two years later elevated him to the Supreme Court to fill the vacancy left by Wilson's presidential rival, CHARLES EVANS HUGHES.

Intellectually, Clarke could not fill Hughes's shoes, but he surprised many critics by his voting record in cases involving CORPORATIONS and labor. Despite his earlier representation of big business, Clarke became a strong judicial supporter of the antitrust laws. He dissented in the two leading cases of the period, United States v. United Shoe Machinery Company (1918) and United States v. United States Steel Corporation (1920), when the WHITE COURT spurned the government's efforts to convict these industrial giants for monopolistic behavior.

In 1920, however, Clarke won a majority to his side when the Justices ordered the dissolution of a major railroad monopoly in United States v. Lehigh Valley Railroad, and found the Reading Railroad guilty of restraint of trade in the anthracite coal industry. Over a powerful dissent by Holmes, Clarke also wrote for the Court that upheld indictments for open price agreements in the hardwood lumber industry.

Clarke rejected the dominant judicial ideology of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, which had been used to stifle legislative reforms to benefit labor. He endorsed Oregon's ten-hour law for all industrial workers in BUNTING V. OREGON (1917), approved of the federal ADAMSON ACT which mandated an eight-hour day for railroad workers in WILSON V. NEW (1917), and refused to endorse the INJUNCTION at issue in the YELLOW DOG CONTRACT case of HITCHMAN COAL & COKE CO. V. MITCHELL (1917). He voted as well to sustain the constitutionality of the KEATING-OWEN CHILD LABOR ACT in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918), refused to sanction the prosecution of labor unions under the antitrust laws in UNITED MINE WORKERS V. CORONADO COAL CO. (1922), and upheld a union's right to conduct a SECONDARY BOYCOTT in the notorious case of DUPLEX PRINTING CO. V. DEERING (1921).

Despite his progressive record with respect to ECONOMIC REGULATION and the rights of labor, Clarke will probably always be remembered as the Justice who wrote for the majority in the case of ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919), which sustained the conviction of pro-Bolshevik pamphleteers under the wartime ESPIONAGE ACT and SEDITION ACT. Clarke's opinion provoked Holmes's famous and biting dissent. Arguing that "men must be held to have intended and to be accountable for the effects which their acts were likely to produce," Clarke transformed Holmes's CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test into something approximating the BAD TENDENCY TEST that came to dominate the Court's FIRST AMENDMENT jurisprudence for several decades.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

Bibliography

WARNER, HOYT L. 1959 Life of Mr. Justice Clarke. Cleveland, Ohio: Western Reserve University Press.

CLASS ACTION

The class action is a procedural device aggregating the claims or defenses of similarly situated individuals so that they may be tried in a single lawsuit. In recent decades the class action has frequently served as the vehicle by which various groups have asserted constitutional claims. For example, all the minority-race school children in various districts have sued (through their parents) to rectify alleged RACIAL DISCRIMINATION on the part of school authorities; or, to illustrate a nonconstitutional claim, the buyers of home freezers have sued as a group claiming that the dealer had made fraudlent misrepresentations. In both examples the members of the class could have sued separately. The class action pulled these potential individual actions into a single lawsuit making litigation feasible for the members of the class (by permitting a single lawyer to try all their claims together). For the party opposing the class the suit has the advantage of providing a single adjudication of all similar claims and the disadvantage, especially marked in suits for money damages, that the entire potential liability to a large group turns on a single suit.

The class action depends on representation, and that concept draws the Constitution into the picture. In the class action most class members are represented by an active litigant whose success or failure binds the class members. Opinions interpreting the DUE PROCESS clauses of the Constitution (in the Fifth and FOURTEENTH ADMENDMENTS ) suggest that normally one may not be bound by the results of litigation to which one is not a party. Yet the class action purports to do just that—to bind the absentee class members to the results of a suit in which they played no active role.

The Supreme Court and the drafters of state and federal class action rules have supplied two solutions to this apparent tension. The Supreme Court's answer came in Hansberry v. Lee (1940), in which the justices indicated that class actions could bind absentee class members if the active litigants adequately represented the class. If not, the Court reasoned, binding the absentees would deprive them of due process of law.

Adequate representation has two aspects, competence and congruence of interests. All would agree that adequate representation implies some absolute level of competence and diligence on the part of the class representative and attorney. Though few cases have specifically discussed the question, it seems virtually a matter of definition that an adequate representative must pursue the cause with some minimum level of professional skill.

The second aspect of adequate representation presents a more difficult problem, forcing us to decide whether such representation requires the class members to have agreed that the action is in their interests, or whether it is possible to define such interests abstractly, without specific consent. Such an abstract definition relies on common intuitions about what would benefit persons in the class's circumstances. In Hansberry the Court did not need to decide between these definitions of interest because the attempted class representation failed on either count. Subsequent cases and procedural rules have not clearly resolved the question.

Contemporary procedural rules require that a judge presiding over a class action suit consider initially whether the action is in the class's interest, abstractly considered; that much seems constitutionally required. Beyond that, some rules also require that the absentee members receive individual notice permitting them to exclude themselves from the litigation.

Founded on the constitutional proposition that some form of representation will suffice to bind members of a class, the class suit has come to play an important role in twentieth-century American litigation.

STEPHEN C. YEAZELL
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Groups and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. and ROSENFIELD, MAURICE 1941 The Contemporary Function of the Class Suit. University of Chicago Law Review 8:684–721.

WRIGHT, CHARLES A. and MILLER, ARTHUR 1972 Federal Practice and Procedure, Vols. 7 & 7a. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

YEAZELL, STEPHEN C. 1980 From Group Litigation to Class Action; Part II: Interest, Class and Representation. UCLA Law Review 28:1067–1121.

CLASSIC, UNITED STATES v.
313 U.S. 299 (1941)

This became a TEST CASE used by the United States Attorney in Louisiana and the newly created CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION of the Department of Justice to ascertain the federal government's power to protect VOTING RIGHTS in PRIMARY ELECTIONS. Louisiana election commissioners charged with willfully altering and falsely counting congressional primary election ballots were indicted under what are now sections 241 and 242 of Title 18, United States Code. To analyze the INDICTMENT under section 241, the Supreme Court had to determine whether the right to have one's ballot counted in a state primary election was a right or a privilege secured by the Constitution. Relying in part on Article I, section 2, of the Constitution, the Court held, 4–3, that the right to choose a congressman was "established and guaranteed" by the Constitution and hence secured by it. The Court then reaffirmed earlier holdings that Congress could protect federally secured voting rights against individual as well as STATE ACTION and squarely held that those rights included participation in state primary elections for members of Congress, thus overruling Newberry v. United States (1921).

In articulating those rights "secured by the Constitution" within the meaning of section 241, Classic forms a link between early interpretations of the phrase, as in EX PARTE YARBROUGH (1884), and later consideration of it, as in UNITED STATES V. GUEST (1966) and GRIFFIN V. BRECKENRIDGE (1971), the latter case decided under the civil counterpart to section 241, section 1985(3) of Title 42, United States Code. Classic also constitutes an important link in the chain of precedents specifically pertaining to federal power over elections. Later cases from the 1940s include SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1944) and United States v. Saylor (1944).

Because the Classic indictment also charged a violation of section 242, which requires action "under COLOR OF LAW." the case provides an early modern holding on the question whether action in violation of state law can be action under color of law. With virtually no discussion of the issue, the Court held such action to be under color of law, a holding later used to support similar holdings in Screws v. United States (1945) and MONROE V. PAPE (1961). Dissenters in Screws and Monroe would object to reliance on Classic because of its abbreviated consideration of the issue.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

CLAY, HENRY
(1777–1852)

Henry Clay, distinguished politician and legislator, was a product of the Jeffersonian Republicanism that took possession of the Trans-Appalachian West, fought a second war against Great Britain, and was nationalized in the process. Born in Hanover County, Virginia, young Clay clerked for Chancellor GEORGE WYTHE and read law in Richmond before emigrating to Kentucky in his twentieth year. Settling in the rising metropolis of Lexington, Clay was promptly admitted to the bar, and by virtue of extraordinary natural talent, aided by the fortune of marriage into a prominent mercantile family, he soon became a leading member of the Bluegrass lawyer-aristocracy.

The chaos of land titles in Kentucky—a legacy of the state's Virginia origins—made it a paradise for lawyers. Clay mastered this abstruse branch of jurisprudence but earned his reputation as a trial lawyer in capital cases, in which he was said never to have lost a client. He rode the circuit of the county courts, acquiring a character for high spirits and camaraderie; he practiced before the court of appeals and also before the United States district court at Frankfort. When he first went to Congress in 1806, Clay was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court. Occasionally in years to come he argued important constitutional cases before the court. He was chief counsel for the defendant in OSBORN V. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES (1824), for instance, in which the Court struck down a prohibitive state tax on branches of the bank. At about the same time he conducted Kentucky's defense of its Occupying Claimants Law, enacted years earlier in order to settle thousands of disputed land titles. Here Clay was unsuccessful, as the Court, in GREEN V. BIDDLE (1823), found the Kentucky law in violation of the CONTRACT CLAUSE. Justice JOSEPH STORY remarked after hearing Clay in this case that, if he chose, Clay might achieve "great eminence" at the bar. This interesting judgment would never be tested, however, for Clay sought eminence in politics rather than law.

Clay entered politics in 1798 as a Jeffersonian Republican protesting the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS and seeking liberal reform of the state constitution. Elected to the legislature in 1803, he became chief spokesman and protector of the Lexington-centered "court party." He was also very popular, rising rapidly to the speakership of the lower house. In 1806 he was sent to the United States Senate to complete three months of an unexpired term; this experience was repeated, upon the resignation of another incumbent, in 1810. Clay distinguished himself as a bold patriot and orator, as an advocate of federal INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS and encouragement of domestic manufactures, both of great interest to Kentucky, and as the leading opponent of recharter of the national bank on strict Jeffersonian grounds. He then sought and won election to the Twelfth Congress. Upon its meeting in November 1811, he achieved recognition as chief of the "war hawks" who, though a small minority, took command of the House and elected Clay speaker. Whether or not the war hawks caused, in some significant degree, the War of 1812 is a matter in dispute among historians; but there is no doubt that they brought fresh westerly winds of nationalism into Congress and that Clay, as speaker, mobilized congressional action behind the JAMES MADISON administration's prosecution of the war. Clay transformed this constitutional office, the speakership, from that of an impartial moderator into one of political leadership. Five times he would be reelected speaker, always virtually without opposition; and when he finally retired from the House there was no one to fill his shoes.

After the Peace of Ghent, which he had helped negotiate as an American commissioner, Clay supported President Madison's national Republican platform with its broad constitutional principles. This support required an about-face on the constitutionality of a national bank. Clay candidly chalked up his error to experience, saying that the financial exigencies of the war had shown the necessity of a national bank; he now agreed with Madison on the need for a central institution to secure a stable and uniform currency. Henceforth, certainly, Clay's principal significance with respect to the Constitution lay in the affirmation of congressional powers.

The protective tariff was the core of the maturing national system of political economy that Clay named "the AMERICAN SYSTEM." The country ought not any longer, he argued, look abroad for wealth, but should turn inward to the development of its own resources. Manufactures would rise and flourish behind the tariff wall, consuming the growing surplus of American agriculture; and a balanced, sectionally based but mutually supportive, economy of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures would be the result. Because the system premised a positive role for the national government in economic development, it carried immense implications for the Constitution. When the protective tariff was first attacked on constitutional grounds in 1824, Clay rejected the narrow view that limited the TAXING POWER to raising revenue and continued the liberal interpretation of the COMMERCE CLAUSE that began with Jefferson's embargo. The infrastructure of the "home market" would be provided by a national system of INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS. Madison, in his surprising veto of the Bonus Bill in 1817, interposed the constitutional objection that neither the funding nor the building of roads and canals was among the enumerated powers. When Madison's successor, JAMES MONROE, persisted in this view, Clay mounted a campaign to overturn it. He appealed to the Jeffersonian precedent of the National (Cumberland) Road; he appealed to the WAR POWERS (transportation as an element of national defense), to the power of Congress to establish post roads, and, above all, to the commerce power. To the old fears of a runaway Constitution Clay opposed his trust in democratic elections and the balance of interests to keep order. Monroe finally conceded the unlimited power of Congress to appropriate money for internal improvements, though not to build or operate them. Clay protested that the concession was of greater scope than the principle he had advocated. But he took satisfaction in the result, most immediately in the General Survey Act of 1824.

Clay's coalition with JOHN QUINCY ADAMS in 1825, in which he secured the New Englander's election to the presidency and accepted appointment as his secretary of state, contributed to a growing sectional and partisan opposition to the American System and the constitutional doctrines that supported it. South Carolina's NULLIFICATION of the protective tariff in 1832 provoked a crisis that Clay, now in the Senate, helped to resolve with his Compromise Tariff Act. Under it protective duties would be gradually lifted until in 1842 they would be levied for revenue only. Without surrendering any constitutional principle, Clay nevertheless seemed to surrender the policy of protectionism. Some politicians said he courted southern votes in his quest for the presidency. As the National Republican candidate against President ANDREW JACKSON in the recent election, he had been badly defeated, winning nothing in the South, and he may have seen in this crisis an opportunity for a useful change of political direction. But Clay insisted he acted, first, to save the Union from the disaster of nullification, which was compounded by Jackson's threatened vengeance, and second, to save what he could of the American System. A high protective tariff could no longer be sustained in any event. The national debt was about to be paid off; the treasury faced an embarrassing surplus unless the revenue was drastically reduced. Clay sought to offset the impact of the surplus on the tariff by diverting the soaring revenue of public land sales to the states. Although Congress passed Clay's Distribution Bill in 1833, Jackson vetoed it.

This veto, with many others, above all JACKSON'S VETO OF THE BANK BILL, fueled Clay's assault on the alleged executive usurpations and monarchical designs of the President. The senator proposed to curtail the powers of the presidency. The abuse of the veto power should be corrected by a constitutional amendment allowing override by a majority of both houses. The despotic potential of the office, which Jackson was the first to disclose, should be curbed further by an amendment limiting the president to a single term, perhaps of six years. Clay also rejected the 1789 precedent on the REMOVAL POWER, arguing that the power of removal in the President effectively negated the Senate's agency in appointment. Removal, like appointment, should be a joint responsibility. The Whig Party, under Clay's leadership, consistently advocated these measures. None was ever enacted. Clay continued the campaign even after the Whigs came to power in 1841, assailing President John Tyler as he had earlier assailed Jackson.

Although Clay usually supported national authority in the debates of his time, he became increasingly cautious and protective of the Constitution under the threats posed, first, by reckless Jacksonian Democracy, and second, by the combination of abolitionism in the North and aggressive slavocracy in the South. He accepted the "federal consensus" on slavery: it was a matter entirely within the JURISDICTION of the states. Nevertheless, he raised no bar to the use of federal funds to advance gradual emancipation and colonization by the states, indeed advocated it in certain contexts. In the controversy over the right of petition for abolition of slavery in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, he held that a gag was not only indefensible in principle but impolitic in practice, because it would make libertarian martyrs of the abolitionists. Clay opposed the ANNEXATION OF TEXAS, believing that the expansion of slavery it entailed must seriously disrupt the Union. When he seemed to equivocate on the issue in the election of 1844—his third run for the presidency—he lost enough northern votes to ensure his defeat. Returning to the Senate in 1849, he proposed a comprehensive plan for settlement of critical issues between North and South. It eventually became the COMPROMISE OF 1850. Here, as in all of his constructive legislative endeavors, Clay evaded spurious questions of constitutional law and sought resolution on the level of policy in that "spirit of compromise" which, he said, lay at the foundation of the American republic. From his earlier part in effecting the MISSOURI COMPROMISE (1820–1821) and the Compromise of 1833, he had earned the title of The Great Pacificator. The Compromise of 1850 added a third jewel to the crown.

Henry Clay was the most popular American statesman of his generation and one of the most respected. He helped to shape the course of constitutional development during forty years, not as a lawyer, judge, or theorist, but as a practical politician and legislator in national affairs.

MERRILL D. PETERSON
(1986)

Bibliography

COLTON, CALVIN, ed. (1856) 1904 The Works of Henry Clay. 10 Vols. New York: G. P. Putnam's.

HOPKINS, JAMES F. and HARGREAVES, MARY W. M., eds. 1959–1981 The Papers of Henry Clay. Vols. 1–6. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.

SEAGER, ROBERT II; WINSLOW, RICHARD E., III; and HAY, MELBA PORTER, eds. 1982–1984 Papers of Henry Clay. Vols. 7–8. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.

VAN DEUSEN, GLYNDON G. 1937 The Life of Henry Clay. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin.

CLAYTON ACT
38 Stat. 730 (1914)

Mistakenly hailed by Samuel Gompers as labor's MAGNA CARTA, the Clayton Act represented a new generation's attempt to deal with trusts. Acclaimed for its specificity, the new act in reality contained crucial ambiguities as vague as the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT it was intended to supplement. WOODROW WILSON'S ANTITRUST policy included both the FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT and the Clayton Act; in his view the latter would leave the Sherman Act intact while specifying conduct henceforth prohibited. Framed by Representative Henry Clayton, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, the antitrust bill pleased no one: labor objected to the absence of an explicit guarantee of immunity for unions, many congressmen found the list of restraints of trade incomplete, and agrarian radicals believed that the bill betrayed Democratic pledges. In the face of this opposition, Wilson abandoned the Clayton bill in Congress. The HOUSE, unhappy over the vagueness of the Sherman Act and wishing to leave businessmen no loopholes, sought as specific a bill as possible. The SENATE objected, but a compromise was reached naming only a few, particularly pernicious, practices which were declared unlawful "where the effect may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create monopoly"—hardly a model of certainty. Four provisions of the Clayton Act contain this operative phrase. Section 7 prohibited the acquisition of stock by one corporation of another or mergers, but, by neglecting to forbid acquisitions of assets as well as stock, it provided a loophole not plugged until 1950. The act also placed strict limitations on interlocking directorates (section 8), and outlawed price discrimination (section 2) and exclusive dealing and tying contracts (section 3). The Federal Trade Commission would enforce these provisions by procedures paralleling those in the FTC Act. In addition, the act rendered individual officers personally liable for corporate violations, permitted private individuals to secure INJUNCTIONS and to file treble damage suits, and allowed final judgments in government suits to be considered prima facie EVIDENCE in private cases.

Of two labor provisions, section 6, which declared that labor was "not a commodity or article of commerce" and that antitrust laws could not be used to forbid legitimate organizing activities, conceded nothing new. Section 20 prohibited the issuance of injunctions in labor cases unless "necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property." Together with a further clause which declared that peaceful strikes and boycotts were not in violation of federal antitrust laws, this section represented the only victory labor gained in this act.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Labor and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

NEALE, A. D. and GOYDER, D. G. 1980 The Antitrust Laws of the United States of America, 3rd ed. Cambridge: At the University Press.

CLEAN AIR ACT

See: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution

CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER

The clear and present danger rule, announced in SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919), was the earliest FREEDOM OF SPEECH doctrine of the Supreme Court. Affirming Schenck's conviction, Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES concluded that a speaker might be punished only when "the words are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent." Holmes was drawing on his own earlier Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court opinion on the law of attempts. There he had insisted that the state might punish attempted arson only when the preparations had gone so far that no time was left for the prospective arsonist to change his mind, so that the crime would have been committed but for the intervention of the state. In the free speech context, Holmes and Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS assimilated this idea to the MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS rationale, arguing that the best corrective of dangerous speech was more speech rather than criminal punishment; government should intervene only when the speech would do an immediate harm before there was time for other speech to come into play.

In the context of Schenck, the danger rule made particular sense; the federal statute under which the defendant was prosecuted made the act of espionage a crime, not the speech itself. The danger rule in effect required that before speech might be punished under a statute that forbade action, a close nexus between the speech and the action be shown. The concentration of the rule on the intent of the speaker and the circumstances surrounding the speech also seem most relevant in those contexts in which speech is being punished as if it constituted an attempt at a criminal act. Opponents of the danger rule have often insisted that Holmes initially intended it not as a general FIRST AMENDMENT test but only for cases in which a statute proscribing action was applied to a speaker.

In Schenck, Holmes wrote for the Court. The most extended statement of the danger rule came some months later in ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919), but by then it was to be found in a Holmes dissent, joined by Brandeis. In GITLOW V. NEW YORK (1925) the Court used the BAD TENDENCY TEST which openly rejected the imminence or immediacy element of the danger rule—again over dissents by Holmes and Brandeis. Brandeis kept the danger rule alive in a concurrence in WHITNEY V. CALIFORNIA (1927) in which he added to the immediacy requirement that the threatened evil be serious. The danger of minor property damage, for example, would not justify suppression of speech.

In the 1930s and 1940s the Court was confronted with a series of cases involving parades and street corner speakers in which the justification offered for suppressing speech was not concern for the ultimate security of the state but the desire to maintain peaceful, quiet, and orderly streets and parks free of disturbance. Behind the proffered justifications usually lurked a desire to muzzle unpopular speakers while leaving other speakers free. In this context the clear and present danger rule was well designed to protect unpopular speakers from discrimination. It required the community to prove that the particular speaker whom it had punished or denied a license did in fact constitute an immediate threat to peace and good order. In such cases as HERNDON V. LOWRY (1937) (subversion), THORNHILL V. ALABAMA (1941) (labor PICKETING), BRIDGES V. CALIFORNIA (1941) (contempt of court), WEST VIRGINIA BOARD OF EDUCATION V. BARNETTE (1943) (compulsory flag salute), and Taylor v. Mississippi (1943) (state sedition law), the clear and present danger rule became the majority constitutional test governing a wide range of circumstances, not only for statutes punishing conduct but also those regulating speech itself.

Even while enjoying majority status the rule came under attack from two directions. The "absolutists" led by ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN criticized the rule for allowing too broad an exception to First Amendment protections. The rule made the protection of speech dependent on judicial findings whether clear and present danger existed; judges had notoriously broad discretion in making findings of fact, as FEINER V. NEW YORK (1951) and TERMINIELLO V. CHICAGO (1949) illustrated. When applied to radical or subversive speech, the danger test seemed to say that ineffectual speech would be tolerated but that speech might be stifled just when it showed promise of persuading substantial numbers of listeners. On the other hand, those favoring judicial self-restraint, led by Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, argued that the rule was too rigid in its protection of speech and ought to be replaced by a BALANCING TEST that weighed the interests in speech against various state interests and did so without rendering the immediacy of the threat to state interests decisive.

Later commentators have also argued that the distinction between speech and conduct on which the danger rule ultimately rests is not viable, pointing to picketing and such SYMBOLIC SPEECH as FLAG DESECRATION which intermingle speech and action. The danger rule also engenders logically unresolvable HOSTILE AUDIENCE problems. If Holmes's formula had demanded a showing of the specific intent of the speaker to bring about violence or of specific INCITEMENT to crime in the content of the speech, it might have afforded greater protection to some speakers. The independent weight the danger formula gives to surrounding circumstances may permit the stifling of speakers because of the real or imagined act or threats of others. Yet focusing exclusively upon intent or upon the presence of the language of incitement may lead to the punishment of speakers whose fervently revolutionary utterances in reality have little or no chance of bringing about any violent action at all.

In DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951) the clear and present danger test was converted overtly into a clear and probable danger test and covertly into a balancing test. As its origin in the law of attempts reminds us, the cutting edge of Holmes's test had been the imminence or immediacy requirement. Speech might be punished only if so closely brigaded in time and space with criminal action that no intervening factor might abort the substantive evil. The probable danger test held that if the anticipated evil were serious enough the imminence requirement might be greatly relaxed. In practice this evisceration of the danger test left the Court free to balance the interests to be protected against the degree of infringement on speech, as the proponents of judicial self-restraint argued the Court had always done anyway under the danger standard.

Since Dennis the Court has consistently avoided the precise language of the clear and present danger test and with few exceptions commentators announced its demise. In BRANDENBURG V. OHIO (1969), however, the Court announced that "constitutional guarantees of free speech . . . do not permit a State to forbid . . . advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action." The text and footnotes surrounding this pronouncement, its careful avoidance of the literal clear and present danger formula itself, plus the separate opinions of several of the Justices indicate that Brandenburg did not seek to revive Holmes's danger rule per se. Such earlier proponents of the rule as HUGO L. BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, feeling that it had been too corrupted by its Dennis conversion to retain any power to protect speech, had moved to the position of Meiklejohnian absolutism and its rejection of the danger standard. On the other hand, those Justices wishing to preserve low levels of protection for subversive speech and the high levels of judicial self-restraint toward legislative efforts to curb such speech that had been established in Dennis and YATES V. UNITED STATES (1957), shied away from the danger test because they knew that, in its Holmesian formulation, it was antithetical to the results that had been achieved in those cases. Apparently, then, Holmes's formula was avoided in Brandenburg because some of the participants in the PER CURIAM opinion thought the danger rule protected speech too little and others thought it protected speech too much.

Yet Brandenburg did revive the imminence requirement that was the cutting edge of the danger test, and it did so in the context of subversive speech and of OVERRULING Whitney v. California, in which the Brandeis and Holmes clear and present danger "concurrence" was in reality a dissent. Even when the danger test was exiled by the Supreme Court it continued to appear in state and lower federal court decisions and in popular discourse. Although the distinction between speech and action—like all distinctions the law seeks to impose—is neither entirely logical nor entirely uncontradicted by real life experience, clear and present danger reasoning survives because most decision makers do believe that the core of the First Amendment is that people may be punished for what they do, not for what they say. Yet even from this basic rule that speech alone must not be punished, we are compelled to make an exception when speech becomes part of the criminal act itself or a direct incitement to the act. Even the most absolute defenders of free speech would not shy from punishing the speaker who shouts at a mob, "I've got the rope and the dynamite. Let's go down to the jail, blow open the cell and lynch the bastard." However imperfectly, the Holmesian formula captures this insight about where the general rule of free speech ends and the exception of punishment begins. It is for this reason that the danger rule keeps reappearing in one form or another even after its reported demise.

The danger rule is most comforting when the speech at issue is an open, particular attack by an individual on some small segment of government or society, such as a street corner speech denouncing the mayor or urging an end to abortion clinics. In such instances the general government and legal system clearly retain the strength to intervene successfully should the danger of a substantive evil actually become clear and present. The emasculation of the danger test came in quite a different context, that of covert speech by an organized group constituting a general attack on the political and legal system as a whole. Unlike the situation in particularized attacks, where the reservoir of systemic power to contain the anticipated danger remains intact, should subversive speech actually create a clear and present danger of revolution the system as a whole might not have the capacity to contain the danger. It is one thing to wait until the arsonist has struck the match and quite another to wait until the revolution is ready to attack the police stations. For this reason the Court in Dennis reverted to the Gitlow-style reasoning that the government need not wait until the revolutionaries had perfected their campaign of conversion, recruitment, and organization. Dennis and Yates carve out a Communist party exception to the immediacy requirement of the clear and present danger rule. They say that where the speech is that of a subversive organization, the government need not prove a present danger of revolution but only that the organization intends to bring about the revolution as speedily as circumstances permit. Thus the government is permitted to intervene early enough so that its own strength is still intact and that of the revolutionaries still small. When in defense of the danger rule Holmes argued that time had overthrown many fighting faiths, he did so with a supreme confidence that it was the American, democratic, fighting faith that time favored and that subversive movements would eventually peter out in America's liberal climate. It was a failure of that faith in the face of the communist menace that led to the emasculation of the danger rule during the Cold War of the 1950s. With hindsight we can see that Holmes's confidence remained justified, and that communist subversion could not have created even a probable, let alone a present danger. Nonetheless American self-confidence has eroded sufficiently that the Supreme Court remains careful not to reestablish the full force of the danger rule lest it handicap the political and legal system in dealing with those who organize to destroy it.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Judicial Activism and Judicial Restraint.)

Bibliography

ANTIEAU, CHESTER JAMES 1950 "Clear and Present Danger"—Its Meaning and Significance. Notre Dame Lawyer 1950:3–45.

——— 1950 The Rule of Clear and Present Danger: Scope of Its Applicability. Michigan Law Review 48:811–840.

MENDELSON, WALLACE 1952 Clear and Present Danger—From Schenck to Dennis. Columbia Law Review 52:313–333.

——— 1953 The Degradation of the Clear and Present Danger Rule. Journal of Politics 15:349–355.

——— 1961 Clear and Present Danger—Another Decade. Texas Law Review 39:449–456.

STRONG, FRANK 1969 Fifty Years of "Clear and Present Danger": From Schenck to Brandenburg—And Beyond. Supreme Court Review 1969:427–480.

CLEBURNE (CITY OF) v. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER, INC.

473 U.S. 432 (1985)

Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc. (1985) is one of a handful of cases in which the Supreme Court invalidated a law while applying RATIONAL BASIS review, a traditionally deferential standard of judicial scrutiny that usually results in upholding the challenged law. In Cleburne, the Justices applied what commentators have called "rational basis with bite" to overturn a city ZONING ordinance that prevented the operation of a group home for the mentally disabled within the city.

Under the rational basis test, challengers must show that the law in question has no legitimate purpose or, assuming a legitimate purpose, that the means adopted by the law bear no reasonable relationship to the achievement of that end. The City of Cleburne argued that its zoning ordinance served the legitimate purpose of preserving property values and protecting the disabled from harassment by nearby school children. According to Justice BYRON R. WHITE, writing for a 6–3 majority, the city's justifications rested on nothing more than "negative attitudes" or "fear" of the mentally disabled. The indulgence of arbitrary prejudice, the Court held, was not a legitimate government purpose.

Some supporters of Cleburne hoped that the decision would mark the beginning of heightened judicial scrutiny of laws discriminating against the mentally disabled, much in the way the Court's use of rational basis with bite in SEX DISCRIMINATION cases in the early 1970s previewed the application of more stringent "intermediate scrutiny" to gender classifications. The REHNQUIST COURT dashed such hopes in Heller v. Doe (1993), where it returned to the more deferential version of the rational basis test in upholding an involuntary commitment law that discriminated between mentally retarded and mentally ill individuals.

The few other cases in which the Court has applied the rational basis test yet nevertheless invalidated the challenged law include United States Department of Agriculture v. Moreno (1973), PLYER V. DOE (1982), Zobel v. Williams (1982), Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Ward (1985), Allegheny Pittsburgh Coal Co. v. County Commis- sion (1989), and ROMER V. EVANS (1996). The growing number of rational basis with bite cases reveals that, despite the Court's insistence that there are but three STANDARDS OF REVIEW under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause—STRICT SCRUTINY, intermediate scrutiny, and rational basis—in practice the Justices apply a spectrum of different standards depending on the context of the particular controversy.

ADAM WINKLER
(2000)

CLERKS

Each Justice of the Supreme Court employs two or more law clerks. (In recent years, typically each Justice, other than the CHIEF JUSTICE, has employed four clerks.) Most of the clerks are not long-term career employees, but honor law school graduates who have previously served for a year as clerk to a lower federal judge. Typically, the term of service for these noncareer clerks is one year.

The practice of employing recent law school graduates as short-term clerks began with Justice HORACE GRAY. Gray employed a highly ranked Harvard Law School graduate each year at his own expense while serving on the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court. He continued to do so when appointed to the United States Supreme Court in 1882. Congress assumed the cost of Justices' law clerks in 1886, but only Gray and his sucessor, OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, continued the pattern of employing recent law school graduates. The widespread use of the Holmes-Gray practice began in 1919, when Congress authorized each Justice to employ both a "law clerk" and a "stenographic clerk." The use of young law school graduates as judges' law clerks for one- or two-year periods is now the prevailing pattern in most lower federal courts. A clerkship position with a Supreme Court Justice is prestigious, and former clerks have become prominent in the legal profession, government, the judiciary and academe. Three Justices had themselves served as law clerks to Supreme Court Justices (BYRON R. WHITE, WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, and JOHN PAUL STEVENS).

The employment of noncareer clerks has been defended as exposing the Justices to fresh ideas and the new theories current in their clerks' law schools. Concern that clerks have too large a role in decisions has been expressed, but this is exaggerated, given the clerks' brief tenure and what is known of the Court's decision process. A distinct concern is that with employment of more clerks, they increasingly play an inappropriately large part in the drafting of opinions. That concern is not so easily rebutted, since each Justice has used clerks' services in a distinct fashion, and there is insufficient reliable public information of the roles played by the Court's current clerks. Court opinions, however, have become longer, more elaborate in their arguments, and studded with citations. The opinions of several Justices appear to be written in a uniform law review style, suggesting that staff plays a large part in their drafting.

WILLIAM COHEN
(1986)

Bibliography

OAKLEY, JOHN B. and THOMPSON, ROBERT S. 1980 Law Clerks and the Judicial Process. Berkeley: University of California Press.

CLEVELAND, GROVER
(1837–1908)

The first Democratic President since JAMES BUCHANAN, Grover Cleveland supported civil service reform and tariff reduction. Cleveland devoted much of his two terms (1884–1888, 1892–1896) to eliminating corruption, inefficiency, and the exploitation of government for private benefit. Generally STATES' RIGHTS and probusiness in viewpoint, he insisted that the federal government function within constrained constitutional limits. As the first executive in decades willing to fight Congress, he frequently used the VETO POWER. A 6–3 Supreme Court sustained Cleveland's view of presidential removal power in McAllister v. United States (1891). (See APPOINTING AND REMOVAL POWER.)

Cleveland played almost no part in passage of the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT. He had no public reaction to the unpopular decision in POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST COMPANY (1895), voiding the income tax, for he believed criticism of the Court unseemly.

Cleveland was the second President with an opportunity to enforce the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT, but he expressed serious doubts about the act's effectiveness. Cleveland promised action "to the extent that [trusts] can be reached and restrained by Federal power," although he contended that state action provided the proper remedy. What antitrust successes his administration won (such as UNITED STATES V. TRANS-MISSOURI FREIGHT ASSOCIATION, 1897, and United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Corp., 1899) belong to his second attorney general, Judson Harmon. Cleveland's last annual message even contains an exculpatory announcement about the "thus far . . . ineffective" act.

Cleveland and his first attorney general, RICHARD OLNEY, helped secure a federal INJUNCTION against the Pullman strike in 1894. Over the Illinois governor's objections, Cleveland sent 2,000 troops to Chicago to protect the mails and insure the free flow of INTERSTATE COMMERCE, purposes specifically approved by the Court in IN RE DEBS (1895). The troops broke the strike, killing twelve workers; this incident gave rise to the epithet "government by injunction."

Cleveland appointed four men to the Court—L. Q. C. LAMAR, MELVILLE FULLER, EDWARD WHITE, and RUFUS PECKHAM—but he was also the first President to suffer the embarrassment of having two successive appointments rejected by the SENATE.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

MERRILL, HORACE 1957 Bourbon Leader: Grover Cleveland. Boston: Little, Brown.

CLEVELAND BOARD OF EDUCATION v. LAFLEUR
414 U.S. 632 (1974)

The Cleveland school board required a pregnant school teacher to take maternity leave, without pay, for five months before the expected birth of her child. A Virginia county school board imposed a similar four-month leave requirement. The Supreme Court, 7–2, held these rules unconstitutional. Justice POTTER STEWART, for the majority, invoked the IRREBUTTABLE PRESUMPTIONS doctrine. The school boards, by assuming the unfitness of pregnant teachers during the mandatory leave periods, had denied teachers individualized hearings on the question of their fitness, in violation of the guarantee of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS concurred in the result, without opinion. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL rejected the irrebuttable presumptions ground as an EQUAL PROTECTION argument in disguise, but concluded that the boards' rules lacked rationality and denied equal protection. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, for the dissenters, aptly characterized the irrebuttable presumptions doctrine as "in the last analysis nothing less than an attack upon the very notion of lawmaking itself."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

CLIFFORD, NATHAN
(1803–1881)

Nathan Clifford came to the Supreme Court in 1858 after an active political career. He served in the Maine legislature in the 1830s and in the House of Representatives in the early 1840s. He was JAMES K. POLK's attorney general, and during his term he represented (in a private capacity) the rebellious Dorr faction before the Supreme Court in LUTHER V. BORDEN (1849). Clifford's most significant political achievement came in 1848 when Polk dispatched him to persuade Mexico to accept the TREATY OF GUADALUPE HIDALGO as amended by Congress. A decade later, President JAMES BUCHANAN selected him to succeed Justice BENJAMIN R. CURTIS. At a time when the Court was perceived in many quarters as an instrument of southern and Democratic party interests, the choice of a Northerner with southern principles was viewed as blatant partisanship. After a lengthy confirmation battle, the SENATE narrowly approved him.

Clifford, a "doughface" in politics, regarded himself as a Jeffersonian "strict constructionist" in constitutional matters. He resolutely opposed the centralization of governmental power during the 1860s and early 1870s. But in ABLEMAN V. BOOTH (1859) he voted to affirm federal judicial supremacy. During the war, Clifford generally supported the government. He wrote opinions upholding the seizure of slave-trading ships; he joined his colleagues in declining to decide any constitutional questions involving the legal tender laws; and he supported the Court's refusal to consider the martial law issues in EX PARTE VALLANDIGHAM (1864). In the PRIZE CASES (1863), however, Clifford joined the dissenters who questioned the legality of President ABRAHAM LINCOLN's blockade of southern ports.

Following the war, Clifford consistently opposed Republican RECONSTRUCTION policy. He joined the majority opinion in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), which struck down trials by military commissions where the civil courts were functioning; he supported the majority in the TEST OATH CASES (1867); he agreed with the majority's narrow construction of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873); and in separate opinions in several VOTING RIGHTS cases, including UNITED STATES V. REESE (1876) and UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876), he went beyond the majority opinions to condemn federal interference with state elections. Finally, he joined the Court's majority that overturned the legal tender laws in Hepburn v. Griswold (1870), but when that decision was reversed a year later in Knox v. Lee (1871), he dissented in a strict construction of Congress's power to regulate currency. (See LEGAL TENDER CASES.)

In HALL V. DECUIR (1878) Clifford wrote for the Court, nullifying a Louisiana law prohibiting segregation of steamboat passengers. "Governed by the laws of Congress," he wrote, "it is clear that a steamer carrying passengers may have separate cabins and dining saloons for white persons and persons of color, for the plain reason that the laws of Congress contain nothing to prohibit such an arrangement." In short, the absence of federal policy negated state policy—a strange position for an old STATES' RIGHTS Democrat.

Clifford generally supported state regulatory policies.

His concurrence in Slaughterhouse signified his unwillingness to embrace a nationalizing interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment; likewise, it reflected Clifford's traditionalist views of the STATE POLICE POWER. In Munn v. Illinois (1877), for example, he joined the majority to sustain Illinois's regulation of grain elevators. (See GRANGER CASES.) Clifford's most articulate statements on state powers came in his dissent in LOAN ASSOCIATION V. TOPEKA (1875). Rejecting the majority's invalidation of a state bonding authorization, Clifford struck at the Court's invocation of natural law doctrine and notions of judicial superintendence. Contending that state legislative power was "practically absolute," subject only to specific state and federal constitutional prohibitions, Clifford protested against JUDICIAL REVIEW that went beyond such limitations in tones reminiscent of older Jeffersonian doctrine: such power, he said, "would be to make the courts sovereign over both the constitution and the people, and convert the government into a judicial despotism."

Clifford dissented ninety-one times during his tenure, an extraordinarily high figure for the time. To some extent, it reflected his isolation and his archaic views. Throughout his judicial career, he consistently was perceived as a partisan Democrat. He served as president of the Electoral Commission to resolve the disputed election of 1876, and most accounts generally credit him with fairness in his conduct of the meetings. Nevertheless, the political purpose of his appointment in 1858 shadowed his work. He did not disappoint his benefactors; yet it was a career best characterized as dull and mediocre.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

CLIFFORD, PHILIP Q. 1922 Nathan Clifford, Democrat. New York: Putnam's.

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1939 Mr. Justice Miller and the Supreme Court, 1862–1890. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

CLINTON, WILLIAM JEFFERSON
(1946– )

The forty-second President of the United States, William J. Clinton, was the first popularly elected President to be impeached by the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. While he will be best known for the events that precipitated his IMPEACHMENT (the purposeful misrepresentation of his affair with a White House intern), Clinton also played a critical role in redefining the Democratic Party. In particular, rather than seek to transform the nation through government initiatives, Clinton presided over a downsizing of the federal government, especially the reach and prestige of the presidency. By scaling down expectations of what the White House can accomplish and by blurring, if not obliterating, the line separating the personal from the public, Clinton will be long remembered. This legacy permeates the Clinton presidency, including the ways in which Clinton helped shape constitutional values.

Born on August 19, 1946, Clinton was raised in Hope and then Hot Springs, Arkansas. After graduating from high school in 1964, Clinton attended Georgetown University, Oxford University (as a Rhodes Scholar), and, starting in 1970, Yale Law School. Following law school, he returned to Arkansas. After a year teaching at the University of Arkansas, Clinton, in 1974, became the Democratic nominee for Arkansas's Third Congressional District. After losing a close election, Clinton turned his attention to state politics. In 1976, he was elected Attorney General of Arkansas. In 1978, at the age of 32, he was elected governor of Arkansas. Although failing to win reelection in 1980, Clinton was reelected in 1982 and served as governor from 1982 until his 1993 presidential inauguration.

In October 1991, Clinton announced his candidacy for President. During his campaign, Clinton was plagued by charges of marital infidelity and dishonesty. In response to questions about whether he had smoked marijuana, for example, Clinton at first claimed that he did not violate any law and—after admitting that he had smoked marijuana while in England—later argued that he did not inhale. Clinton likewise claimed that he did not act improperly when, after learning that he would not be drafted to serve in the VIETNAM WAR, he reneged on a commitment to join the National Guard. Nevertheless, Clinton persevered, earning his "comeback kid" reputation. Blaming presidential incumbent GEORGE H. W. BUSH for the high unemployment rate and other economic problems, Clinton successfully convinced voters that he would stimulate the economy, recommit the presidency to domestic issues, and reduce the size of government. Clinton's election, moreover, signaled that voters cared most about the ability to govern, not moral leadership.

Thanks to, among other things, a much-improved economy, Clinton secured the 1996 Democratic Party nomination without opposition. In the November 1996 elections, he defeated Republican Robert Dole and Reform Party candidate Ross Perot. In so doing, Clinton became the first Democratic President to be reelected since FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Political expediency, not visionary leadership, was the hallmark of the Clinton presidency. Rather than expend political capital on controversial Supreme Court nominees, for example, Clinton embraced easily confirmable pragmatic liberals RUTH BADER GINSBURG and STEPHEN G. BREYER. Likewise, rather than defend the unconventional views of his nominee to the U.S. Department of Justice

CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION, Lani Gunier, Clinton withdrew the nomination. In the end, although sometimes reminding the nation that he is especially concerned with constitutional matters because he "used to teach constitutional law," Clinton was quite willing to place other agenda items ahead of the advancement of some vision of what the Constitution means. One of these agenda items, the use of the APPOINTING POWER "to give you an administration that looks and feels like America," proved especially important in the nomination of judges and high-ranking officials at the Justice Department.

By downplaying the role of ideology in his constitutional policymaking, the Clinton administration often took a situational approach to constitutional matters. This brand of PRAGMATISM ruled the day on questions of CIVIL RIGHTS and CIVIL LIBERTIES. On gay rights, for example, Clinton promised gay and lesbian leaders that he would "stand with you in the struggle for equality for all Americans." But that promise was only partially fulfilled. While lifting most restrictions on federal civilian employment and supporting LEGISLATION to extend some EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION protections to SEXUAL ORIENTATION discrimination, the Clinton administration neither lifted the ban on gays in the military nor participated in the Supreme Court litigation, ROMER V. EVANS (1996), challenging Colorado's exclusion of sexual orientation discrimination from state and local ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION. Clinton, moreover, signed the Defense of Marriage Act, legislation condemning SAME-SEX MARRIAGE. For Clinton, the moral imperative of full equality for gays and lesbians gave way to the political costs of siding too often with gay rights interests.

On AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, political pragmatism likewise dominated administration policymaking. At first, the President sounded a cautionary note, launching a government-wide review of affirmative action by saying that "[w]e shouldn't be defending things that we cannot defend." Concern that Jesse Jackson would run for President in 1996, however, prompted a recalibration of administration policymaking. In an effort to shore up its minority base and neutralize Jackson, the Clinton administration embraced affirmative action. In particular, responding to a 1995 Supreme Court decision, ADARAND CONSTRUCTORS, INC. V. PEÑA, that called into doubt many federal affirmative action programs, Clinton reaffirmed the principle of affirmative action by declaring that the "job of ending discrimination is not done." More significant, by narrowly interpreting the Court's 1995 decision, the Clinton administration kept in place nearly all federal affirmative action programs.

Through his defense of affirmative action and his occasional support of gay rights, Clinton distanced himself from his Republican predecessors, Bush and RONALD REAGAN. Clinton's constitutional politics also varied from his predecessors' on ABORTION rights. Two days after his inauguration, Clinton dismantled the pro-life regulatory initiatives of the Reagan and Bush administrations. Clinton, moreover, vetoed legislation outlawing partial-birth abortions. Unlike his Republican predecessors, however, Clinton neither made hard-hitting bully pulpit speeches on abortion rights nor formulated a pro-choice legislative agenda. Apparently, with the Court's having reaffirmed a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy in PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992), Clinton saw little political gain in staking out a hard-line position on abortion.

Where the White House did stake out hard-line positions were on legal issues affecting PRESIDENTIAL POWERS, especially WAR POWERS, EXECUTIVE IMMUNITY, and EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE. On war powers, Clinton invoked military force on a number of occasions without seeking congressional support or approval. He sent cruise missiles into Afghanistan, ordered air strikes in Iraq, Bosnia, and Kosovo, conducted military operations in Somalia, and threatened to invade Haiti. In each case, he pointed to his inherent constitutional power to "command" the military. Indeed, by striking deals with both the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the UNITED NATIONS, Clinton relied more on the sanction of these multinational organizations than on the support of Congress.

On presidential immunity, the Clinton administration unsuccessfully argued before the Court that sitting Presidents were immune from civil lawsuits. In an earlier decision, the Court had concluded that a President was entitled to absolute immunity from civil lawsuits based on his officials duties. In defending a sexual harassment lawsuit filed against the President, CLINTON V. JONES (1997), the administration sought to extend this principle to lawsuits based on unofficial actions before he became President.

On executive privilege, the Clinton administration sought to expand the scope of presidential privileges in the face of both congressional and Office of Independent Counsel investigations of the President. Among other things, the administration claimed that the attorney–client privilege extends to government attorneys working in the White House Counsel's office, that U.S. Secret Service agents could refuse to appear as witnesses in a criminal proceeding concerning presidential activities, and that presidential claims of executive privilege extend to private matters, including communications with White House aides about civil lawsuits filed against the President and criminal investigations. These administration claims were rejected by lower federal courts. In a related case, however, the Supreme Court rejected Office of Independent Counsel efforts to subpoena the notes of meetings between a White House attorney (who had committed suicide) and his private counsel.

This melding of personal and public was also a prominent feature of impeachment proceedings against Clinton. Defenders of the President argued that the proceedings concerned personal sins (inappropriate sexual relations with a White House intern). Critics of the President claimed that the President turned these personal sins into public wrongs—lies and misrepresentations before a federal court judge and a federal GRAND JURY as well as the obstruction of justice. With most members of Congress voting along party lines, a majority of the House voted to impeach Clinton while the U.S. SENATE did not come close to the two-thirds vote necessary to remove him from office. Most senators, however, did condemn the President for his lies, obfuscation, and philandery.

NEAL DEVINS
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Articles of Impeachment of William J. Clinton.)

CLINTON v. JONES
520 U.S. 681 (1997)

Clinton v. Jones is one of the Supreme Court's most important decisions on PRESIDENTIAL IMMUNITY. The case involved the issue of whether a sitting President was immune to civil actions based on his conduct before he took office. Whereas the Court had held 5–4 in NIXON V. FITZGERALD (1982) that a President was entitled to absolute immunity from civil lawsuits arising from the discharge of his official duties, a unanimous Court held in Clinton v. Jones that a President is not entitled to immunity from lawsuits based on his unofficial actions.

The plaintiff in Clinton v. Jones, Paula Corbin Jones, alleged that President WILLIAM J. CLINTON sexually harassed her while he was governor of Arkansas in 1991. Although Clinton denied any wrongdoing, his lawyers argued the lawsuit should be delayed until Clinton left office because burdening a President with litigation would allow judges or legal proceedings to interfere unduly with the performance of his official duties. In an opinion for eight Justices, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS explained this kind of burden would never impair the "Executive's ability to perform its constitutionally mandated functions." The Court maintained that denying the President's immunity claim would not produce horrible consequences. It noted that all prior civil suits based on pre-presidential conduct—brought against THEODORE ROOSEVELT, HARRY S. TRUMAN, and JOHN F. KENNEDY—had been quickly dismissed or settled.

The Court explained that two principles supported its conclusion. The first, employed in YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952) and MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), was "that when the President takes official action, the Court has the authority to determine whether he has acted within the law." The second principle, applied in UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1973) and United States v. Burr (1807), was that "the President is subject to judicial process in appropriate circumstances." Indeed, sitting Presidents, including JAMES MONROE, RICHARD M. NIXON, and even Clinton himself, "have responded to court orders to provide testimony and other information with sufficient frequency that such interactions between the Judicial and Executive Branches" have become commonplace.

The Court remarked that a trial court could accommodate a President's scheduling needs, but refused to recognize a constitutional immunity that required such accommodations. In a separate concurrence, Justice STEPHEN G. BREYER recognized a constitutional principle "that forbids a federal Judge . . . to interfere with the President's discharge of his public duties." Breyer explained this principle would apply once a President had shown "a conflict between judicial proceedings and public duties."

After completing discovery in Clinton v. Jones, District Judge Susan Webber Wright dismissed the lawsuit for failing to state a legally cognizable cause of action. Her ruling did not, however, end the President's legal troubles. Before the lawsuit's dismissal, Kenneth Starr, the INDEPENDENT COUNSEL who had been investigating charges of possible misconduct by Clinton regarding a failed land-deal while he was governor of Arkansas, was tipped off that the President and a former White House intern, Monica Lewinsky, might each have lied under oath in Clinton v. Jones about the nature of their relationship. Lewinsky had filed an affidavit in the case denying that she had ever had a sexual relationship with the President, while Clinton testified in a deposition on January 17, 1998, that he had never had a sexual relationship with the intern nor ever been alone with her. Subsequent to the dismissal of Jones's lawsuit, the Independent Counsel granted Lewinsky limited immunity to testify about the President's efforts to obstruct the Jones lawyers' and Independent Counsel's lawful attempts to learn about the real nature of her relationship with the President. In an appearance before a federal GRAND JURY on August 18, 1998, Clinton acknowledged an "inappropriate relationship" with Lewinsky but defended the truthfulness of his prior testimony and actions to conceal his relationship with Lewinsky.

Shortly after the President's grand jury appearance, Starr referred to the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES materials that he claimed indicated that the President had committed eleven possible impeachable offenses in trying to conceal his relationship with Lewinsky from Jones's lawyers and Starr's office. The referral sparked an IMPEACHMENT inquiry against the President. In the midst of the House's proceedings, the President settled Paula Jones's lawsuit then pending on appeal before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. Nevertheless, the House impeached the President for perjury and obstruction of justice. On February 12, 1999, the U.S. SENATE acquitted the President on both charges.

Within a month of the President's acquittal, Wright cited him for CONTEMPT based on his untruthful testimony in his deposition. In the contempt citation, Wright concluded that "the President's deposition testimony regarding whether he had ever been alone with Ms. Lewinsky was intentionally false, and his statements regarding whether he had ever engaged in sexual relations with Ms. Lewinsky likewise were intentionally false." Consequently, Wright fined the President for the reasonable expenses incurred by the plaintiff's attorneys because of his testimony and by the judge in attending to the deposition. She also referred the matter "to the Arkansas Supreme Court's Committee on Professional Conduct for review and any disciplinary action it deems appropriate."

Clinton v. Jones and its fallout have engendered criticism of every institution with which the case has come into contact. For many scholars, the fact that the lawsuit and its fallout paralyzed the national government for over a year flatly contradicts the Supreme Court's assumption in Clinton v. Jones that a civil lawsuit based on a President's activities before taking office could proceed without substantially interfering with a President's ability to do his job. Many other scholars, prosecutors, and members of Congress have abandoned support for the Independent Counsel Act; they claim Starr's relentless investigation of the President for nearly six years, including Starr's controversial investigation of matters relating to Clinton v. Jones (a case many believe was politically motivated), demonstrates the dangerous and uncontrollable lengths to which a politically unaccountable prosecutor will go to vindicate his charge.

A vocal minority defends Clinton v. Jones by placing primary responsibility on the President for the case's fallout. They suggest he could have avoided impeachment and contempt by being more candid in his deposition and grand jury testimony. Moreover, the President's acquittal ironically tracks the logic of the Court's decision in Clinton v. Jones. After all, the Court indicated that it would not have allowed the lawsuit against Clinton to proceed had it involved anything that implicated his official duties. Many senators voted against—and much of the public consistently opposed—the President's removal because his misconduct lacked a sufficiently public dimension or nexus to his official duties.

Consequently, the questions remain in what other fora and when a sitting President may be held accountable for unimpeachable misconduct. The suggestion in Clinton v. Jones that one such forum is a civil proceeding generates more concerns than it allays, because it plainly allows, as the fallout from the case demonstrates, a plaintiff or judge to interfere, perhaps substantially, with a President's performance of his duties. Indeed, Clinton v. Jones exacerbates these concerns further, for it leaves unaddressed whether a President before being impeached may be criminally prosecuted or imprisoned. Regardless of the legitimacy of these concerns, Clinton v. Jones clarified that in the future a President's only options in the face of burdensome litigation will not be constitutional immunity but rather a congressional act creating immunity or a sympathetic exercise of a trial judge's scheduling discretion.

MICHAEL J. GERHARDT
(2000)

CLOSED SHOP

A workplace is a closed shop if, by virtue of a labor contract, only the members of a particular union may be hired. After passage of the TAFT-HARTLEY ACT (1947), the closed shop was replaced by the "union shop" wherein one must join the union after being hired.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

CLOTURE

Cloture terminates debate in a legislative body. The rules of the SENATE encourage extended debates and, by taking advantage of those rules, sectional or ideological cliques can prevent action on bills they oppose. Only after rules reforms in the early 1960s made cloture easier did Congress pass effective CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

CLYMER, GEORGE
(1739–1813)

George Clymer, who represented Pennsylvania at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, was a signer of both the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE and the Constitution. Clymer did not speak often, but he was a member of the committees on state debts and the slave trade.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

COCHRAN v. LOUISIANA
281 U.S. 370 (1930)

Louisiana provided books to all public and private school children. The private school support was challenged on FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT grounds as a use of public money for private purposes. Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES held that the state's purpose was public.

Cochran is sometimes cited as an accommodationist precedent, but it was not decided under the establishment clause, which was not considered to apply to the states at that time.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

CODISPOTI v. PENNSYLVANIA
418 U.S. 506 (1974)

A 5–4 Court here extended its decision in DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968) to persons receiving serious punishment for criminal contempt. Following their trial, two defendants were cited for contempt and given several consecutive sentences for contempt of court. Bloom v. Illinois (1968) served as the basis for Justice BYRON R. WHITE's opinion that the defendants were entitled to a TRIAL BY JURY. Even though no single sentence exceeded six months, the consecutive sentences could not be separated; they all stemmed from one trial conducted as a single proceeding by one judge.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

COEFFICIENT CLAUSE

See: Necessary and Proper Clause

COERCED CONFESSION

See: Police Interrogation and Confessions

COERCED SPEECH

See: Compelled Speech

COERCIVE ACTS

See: Constitutional History Before 1776; First Continental Congress, Declarations and Resolves of

COHEN, MORRIS R.
(1880–1947)

Morris Raphael Cohen came to the United States from Russia in 1892. After receiving his doctorate from Harvard in 1906, Cohen taught philosophy at the City College of New York from 1912 until 1938, when he retired to devote the rest of his life to writing.

A disciple of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, Cohen rejected the conventional belief that judges decide cases by mechanical application of independently existing legal rules; he argued that the process of judicial lawmaking should be guided by the scientific method, a thorough understanding of the social consequences of judicial decisions, and a hierarchical set of social values. Believing natural law to be the measure of justice and advocating the philosophical analysis of legal systems, Cohen attacked such proponents of LEGAL REALISM as JEROME FRANK and THURMAN ARNOLD for their refusal to recognize any external standard by which positive law could be criticized. Cohen's legal writings are collected in Law and the Social Order (1933) and Reason and Law (1950).

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

Bibliography

HOLLINGER, DAVID A. 1975 Morris R. Cohen and the Scientific Ideal. Cambridge, Mass.: M.I.T. Press.

COHEN v. CALIFORNIA
403 U.S. (1971)

Cohen was convicted of disturbing the peace. He wore a jacket bearing the words "Fuck the draft" while walking down a courthouse corridor. In overturning the conviction, a 5–4 Supreme Court held that the FIGHTING WORDS exception to FIRST AMENDMENT protection did not apply where "no individual . . . likely to be present could reasonably have regarded the words . . . as a direct personal insult," and there was no showing that anyone who saw Cohen was in fact violently aroused or that . . . [he] . . . intended such a result." Both majority and dissenters suggested that the failure to show that violence was imminent as the result of the words was fatal to the state's case. The Court thus made clear that words, in the abstract, cannot be read out of the First Amendment; the "fighting words" doctrine depends on the context in which words are uttered.

The state's assertion of other justifications for punishing Cohen were similarly rejected: the jacket's message was not OBSCENITY, because it was not erotic; the privacy interests of offended passers-by were insubstantial in this public place, and anyone offended might look away; there was no CAPTIVE AUDIENCE.

Cohen's chief doctrinal importance lies in its rejection of the notion that speech can constitutionally be prohibited by the state because it is offensive. Because offensiveness is an "inherently boundless" category, any such prohibition would suffer from the vice of VAGUENESS. And the First Amendment protects not only the cool expression of ideas but also "otherwise inexpressible emotions."

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

COHEN v. COWLES MEDIA CO.
501 U.S. 663 (1991)

Late in the 1983 Minnesota gubernatorial campaign, Dan Cohen, an active Republican, offered to provide politically sensitive documents to a Minneapolis Star and Tribune reporter. Cohen insisted his name not be mentioned, and the reporter promised confidentiality. Senior editors decided, however, to publish the documents and to cite Cohen as the source.

When the story appeared, Cohen was fired. He sued the newspaper for damages on the basis of the broken promise. A jury returned a verdict in Cohen's favor, but the Minnesota Supreme Court held that such an award would violate the FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the state court. A 5–4 majority, speaking through Justice BYRON R. WHITE, relied on a "line of decisions holding that generally applicable laws do not offend the First Amendment simply because their enforcement against the press has incidental effects on its ability to gather and report the news."

Four Justices dissented, in an opinion by Justice DAVID H. SOUTER, arguing that a state's interest in granting damages for a broken promise is "insufficient to outweigh the interest in unfettered publication of the information revealed in this case." Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN also wrote a separate DISSENTING OPINION, analogizing the case to HUSTLER MAGAZINE AND LARRY FLYNT V. JERRY FALWELL (1988).

ROBERT M. O'NEIL
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Journalistic Practices, Tort Liability, and the Freedom of the Press.)

COHENS v. VIRGINIA
6 Wheat. 265 (1821)

In the rancorous aftermath of MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), several states, led by Virginia and Ohio, denounced and defied the Supreme Court. State officers of Ohio entered the vaults of a branch of the Bank of the United States and forcibly collected over $100,000 in state taxes. (See OSBORN V. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.) Virginia's legislature resolved that the Constitution be amended to create "a tribunal for the decision of all questions, in which the powers and authorities of the general government and those of the States, where they are in conflict, shall be decided." Widespread and vitriolic attacks on the Court, its doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS, and section 25 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 showed that MARTIN V. HUNTER'S LESSEE (1816) and McCulloch were not enough to settle the matters involved, especially as to the JURISDICTION of the Court over state acts and decisions in conflict with the supreme law of the land as construed by the Court. Accordingly a case appears to have been contrived to create for Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL an opportunity to reply officially to his critics and to reassert both national supremacy and the supreme appellate powers of his Court.

Two brothers surnamed Cohen sold lottery tickets in Norfolk, Virginia, contrary to a state act prohibiting their sale for a lottery not authorized by Virginia. The Cohens sold tickets for a lottery authorized by an act of Congress to benefit the capital city. In Norfolk the borough court found the defendants guilty and fined them $100. By Virginia law, no appeal could be had to a higher state court. The Cohens, prosperous Baltimore merchants who could easily afford the paltry fine, claimed the protection of the act of Congress and removed the case on WRIT OF ERROR from the local court to the highest court of the land; moreover they employed the greatest lawyer in the nation, William Pinckney, whose usual fee was $2,000 a case, and another distinguished advocate, David B. Ogden, who commanded a fee of $1,000. More was at stake than appeared. "The very title of the case," said the Richmond Enquirer, "is enough to stir one's blood"—a reference to the galling fact that the sovereign state of Virginia was being hauled before the Supreme Court of the United States by private individuals in seeming violation of the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT. The state governor was so alarmed that he notified the legislature, and its committee, referring to the states as "sovereign and independent nations," declared that the state judiciaries were as independent of the federal courts as the state legislatures were of Congress, the twenty-fifth section of the 1789 notwithstanding. The legislature, having adopted solemn resolutions of protest and repudiating federal JUDICIAL REVIEW, instructed counsel representing Virginia to argue one point alone: that the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction in the case. Counsel, relying on the Eleventh Amendment to argue that a state cannot be sued without its consent, also contended that not a word in the Constitution "goes to set up the federal judiciary above the state judiciary."

Marshall, for a unanimous Court dominated by Republicans, conceded that the main "subject was fully discussed and exhausted in the case of Martin v. Hunter," but that did not stop him from writing a fifty-five-page treatise which concluded that under section 25 the Court had jurisdiction in the case. Marshall said little that was new, but he said it with a majestic eloquence and a forcefulness that surpassed JOSEPH STORY's, and the fact that the Chief Justice was the author of the Court's nationalist exposition, addressed to STATES RIGHTS' advocates throughout the country, added weight and provocation to his utterances. He was sublimely rhapsodic about the Constitution and the Union it created, sarcastic and disparaging in restating Virginia's position. Boldly he piled inference upon inference, overwhelming every particle of disagreement in the course of his triumphs of logic and excursions into the historical record of state infidelity. And he had a sense of the melodramatic that Story lacked, as when Marshall began his opinion by saying that the question of jurisdiction "may be truly said vitally to affect the Union." The defendant in error—Virginia—did not care whether the Constitution and laws of the United States had been violated by the judgment of guilt that the Cohens sought to have reviewed. Admitting such violation, Virginia contended that the United States had no corrective. Virginia, Marshall continued, maintained that the nation possessed no department capable of restraining, peaceably and by authority of law, attempts against the legitimate powers of the nation. "They maintain," he added, "that the constitution of the United States has provided no tribunal for the final construction of itself, or of the laws or treaties of the nation; but that this power may be exercised in the last resort by the courts of every state of the Union." Virginia even maintained that the supreme law of the land "may receive as many constructions as there are states. . . ." Marshall confronted and conquered every objection.

Quickly turning to Article III, Marshall observed that it authorizes Congress to confer federal jurisdiction in two classes of cases, the first depending on the character of the case and the second on the character of the parties. The first class includes "all" cases involving the Constitution and federal laws and treaties, "whoever may be the parties," and the second includes all cases to which states are parties. By ratifying the Constitution the states consented to judicial review in both classes of cases, thereby making possible the preservation of the Union. That Union is supreme in all cases where it is empowered to act, as Article VI, the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, insures by making the Constitution and federal law the supreme law of the land. The Court must decide every case coming within its constitutional jurisdiction to prevent the supreme law of the land from being prostrated "at the feet of every state in the Union" or being vetoed by any member of the Union. Collisions between the United States and the states will doubtless occur, but, said Marshall, "a constitution is framed for ages to come, and is designed to approach immortality as nearly as human institutions can approach it." To prevail, the government of the Union derived from the Constitution the means of self-preservation. The federal courts existed to secure the execution of the laws of the Union. History proved, Marshall declared, that the states and their tribunals could not be trusted with a power to defeat by law the legitimate measures of the Union. Thus the Supreme Court can take APPELLATE JURISDICTION even in a case between a state and one of its own citizens who relied on the Constitution or federal law. Otherwise Article III would be mere surplusage, as would Article VI. For the Court to decline the jurisdiction authorized by Article III and commanded by Congress would be "treason to the Constitution."

Although Marshall's rhetoric certainly addressed itself, grandiosely, to the question of jurisdiction, his critics regarded all that he had declared thus far as OBITER DICTA, for he had not yet faced the Eleventh Amendment, which Virginia thought concluded the case on its behalf. Upon finally reaching the Eleventh Amendment question, Marshall twisted a little history and chopped a little logic. The amendment, he said, was adopted not to preserve state dignity or sovereignty but to prevent creditors from initiating suits against states that would raid their treasuries. The amendment did not, therefore, apply to suits commenced by states and appealed by writ of error to the Supreme Court for the sole purpose of inquiring whether the judgment of a state tribunal violated the Constitution or federal law.

The argument that the state and federal judiciaries were entirely independent of each other considered the Supreme Court as "foreign" to state judiciaries. In a grand peroration, Marshall made his Court the apex of a single judicial system that comprehended the state judiciaries to the extent that they shared a concurrent jurisdiction over cases arising under the supreme law of the land. For most important purposes, Marshall declared, the United States was "a single nation," and for all those purposes, its government is supreme; state constitutions and laws to the contrary are "absolutely void." The states "are members of one great empire—for some purposes sovereign, for some purposes subordinate." The role of the federal judiciary, Marshall concluded, was to void state judgments that might contravene the supreme law; the alternative would be "a hydra in government."

Having sustained the jurisdiction of the Court, Marshall offered a sop to Virginia: whether the congressional lottery act intended to operate outside the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, he suggested, depended on the words of that act. The case was then reargued on its merits, and Marshall, again for a unanimous Court, quickly sustained the Cohens' conviction: Congress had not intended to permit the sale of lottery tickets in states where such a sale was illegal.

Virginia "won" its case, just as Madison had in Marbury

v. Madison (1803), but no one was fooled this time either. The governor of Virginia in a special message to his legislature spoke of the state's "humiliation" in having failed to vindicate its sovereign rights. A legislative committee proposed amendments to the Constitution that would cripple not only the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES but also (reacting to McCulloch) the powers of Congress in passing laws not "absolutely" necessary and proper for carrying out its ENUMERATED POWERS. In the United States Senate, enemies of the Court proposed constitutional amendments that would vest in the Senate appellate jurisdiction in cases where the laws of a state were impugned and in all cases involving the federal Constitution, laws, or treaties. Intermittently for several years senators introduced a variety of amendments to curb the Court or revoke section 25, but those who shared a common cause did not share a common remedy, though GREEN V. BIDDLE (1823) and OSBORN V. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES (1824) inflamed their cause.

In Virginia, where the newspapers published Marshall's long opinion to the accompaniment of scathing denunciations, SPENCER ROANE and JOHN TAYLOR returned to a long battle that had begun with the Martin case and expanded in the wake of McCulloch. Roane, as "Algernon Sydney," published five articles on the theme that Cohens "negatives the idea that the American states have a real existence, or are to be considered, in any sense, as sovereign and independent states." He excoriated federal judicial review, implied powers, and the subordination of the states, by judicial construction, to "one great consolidated government" that destroyed the equilibrium of the Constitution, leaving that compact of the states nonexistent except in name. Taylor's new book, Tyranny Unmasked (1822), continued the themes of his Construction Construed (1820), where he argued that the "federal is not a national government: it is a league of nations. By this league, a limited power only over persons and property was given to the representatives of the united nations." The "tyranny" unmasked by the second book turned out to be nationalist programs, such as the protective tariff, and nationalist powers, including the power of the Supreme Court over the states.

THOMAS JEFFERSON read Roane and Taylor, egged them on, and congratulated them for their orthodox repudiation of the Court's "heresies." To Justice WILLIAM JOHNSON, who had joined Marshall's opinion, Jefferson wrote that Roane's articles "appeared to me to pulverize every word which had been delivered by Judge Marshall, of the extrajudicial part of his opinion," and to Jefferson "all was extrajudicial"—and he was not wholly wrong—except the second Cohens opinion on the merits. Jefferson also wrote that the doctrine that courts are the final arbiters of all constitutional questions was "dangerous" and "would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy." Recommending the works of Roane and Taylor to a friend, Jefferson militantly declared that if Congress did not shield the states from the dangers originating with the Court, "the states must shield themselves, and meet the invader foot to foot." To Senator NATHANIEL MACON of Virginia, Jefferson wrote that the Supreme Court was "the germ of dissolution of our federal government" and "an irresponsible body," working, he said, "like gravity, by day and night, gaining a little today and a little tomorrow, and advancing its noiseless step, like a thief over the fields of jurisdiction, until all shall be usurped from the States, the government of all becoming a consolidated one."

JAMES MADISON deplored some of the Court's tactics, especially its mingling of judgments with "comments and reasoning of a scope beyond them," often at the expense of the states; but Madison told Roane flatly that the judicial power of the United States "over cases arising under the Constitution, must be admitted to be a vital part of the System." He thought Marshall wrong on the Eleventh Amendment and extreme on implied powers, but, he wrote to Roane, on the question "whether the federal or the State decisions ought to prevail, the sounder policy would yield to the claims of the former," or else "the Constitution of the U.S. might become different in every State."

The public reaction to Cohens depressed Marshall, because, as he wrote to Story, the opinion of the Court "has been assaulted with a degree of virulence transcending what has appeared on any former occasion." Roane's "Algernon Sydney" letters, Marshall feared, might be believed true by the public, and Roane would be hailed as "the champion of state rights, instead of being what he really is, the champion of dismemberment." Marshall saw "a deep design to convert our government into a mere league of States. . . . The attack upon the Judiciary is in fact an attack upon the Union." The whole attack originated, he believed, with Jefferson, "the grand Lama of the mountains." An effort would be made, predicted Marshall, accurately, "to repeal the 25th section of the Judiciary Act." Doubtless the personal attacks on him proved painful. A bit of anonymous doggerel, which circulated in Virginia after Cohens, illuminates public feeling.

> Old Johnny Marshall what's got in ye
> To side with Cohens against Virginny.
> To call in Court his "Old Dominion."
> To insult her with your foul opinion!
> I'll tell you that it will not do
> To call old Spencer in review.
> He knows the law as well as you.
> And once for all, it will not do.
> Alas! Alas! that you should be
> So much against State Sovereignty!

You've thrown the whole state in a terror,
By this infernal "Writ of Error."

The reaction to Cohens proves, in part, that the Court's prose was overbroad, but Marshall was reading the Constitution in the only way that would make the federal system operate effectively under one supreme law.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BEVERIDGE, ALBERT J. 1916–1919 The Life of John Marshall, 4 vols. Vol. IV: 340–375. Boston: Houghton-Mifflin.

HAINS, CHARLES GROVE 1944 The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government and Politics, 1789–1835. Pages 427–461. Berkeley: University of California Press.

KONEFSKY, SAMUEL J. 1964 John Marshall and Alexander Hamilton. Pages 93–111. New York: Macmillan.

COKE, EDWARD
(1552–1634)

Edward Coke (pronounced Cook) was an English lawyer, judge, and parliamentarian who influenced the development of English and American constitutional law by promoting the supremacy of the COMMON LAW in relation to parliamentary powers and the royal prerogative.

After studying at Trinity College, Cambridge, Coke entered the Inner Temple and was called to the Bar in 1578. His career was outstanding from the start. He was elected to Parliament in 1589 and in 1593 he became Speaker of the House of Commons. Appointed attorney-general in 1594, he prosecuted several notable TREASON cases, including that of Sir Walter Raleigh in 1603.

In 1600, Coke began publication of his Reports. Eleven volumes had been published by 1615; two additional volumes appeared after his death. These were not collections of appellate opinions; rather, they consisted of case notes made by Coke, legal history, and general criticism. Coke had mastered the precedents, and he brought symmetry to scattered authority. Thereafter, The Reports, as they were usually called, were the authoritative common law precedents in England and colonial America.

Coke was appointed Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in 1606, serving until 1613, when he was appointed Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench. His judicial career was terminated in 1616 when King James I removed him from office. During these years Coke began enunciating ideas concerning the supremacy of the common law, foreshadowing modern concepts of government under law.

Coke's judicial pronouncement most influential on the American doctrine of JUDICIAL REVIEW came in BONHAM'S CASE (1610). The College of Physicians had fined and imprisoned Dr. Bonham for practicing medicine without a license. The court held that because the College would share in the fine, the charter and parliamentary act conferring this authority were contrary to the common law principle that no man can be a judge in his own case. Coke stated: "And it appears in our books, that in many cases, the common law will control acts of parliament, and sometimes adjudge them to be utterly void: for when an act of parliament is against common right and reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will control it, and adjudge such act to be void. . . ." Coke believed that the common law contained a body of fundamental, although not unchangeable, principles to be ascertained and enunciated by judges through the "artificial reason" of the law. In Bonham's Case he seemed to be reasoning that parliamentary acts must be interpreted consistently with those principles. Whatever Coke's precise meaning, however, the statement foreshadowed the American DOCTRINE of judicial review; it was influential in the developing concept of the supremacy of law as interpreted and applied by the judiciary.

Another incident of Coke's judicial career that contributed to the modern idea of government under law came in 1608 during a confrontation with James I. The king had claimed authority to withdraw cases from the courts and decide them himself. In a dramatic Sunday morning meeting convened by the king and attended by all the judges and bishops, Coke maintained that there was no such royal authority. He asserted, quoting Bracton, that the king was not under man "but under God and law," one of the earliest and most quoted expressions of this concept.

Coke returned to Parliament in 1620 and in the final phase of his career made two major contributions to constitutional government and English and American law.

Drawing on the provision in MAGNA CARTA that "no free man shall be taken [or] imprisoned . . . except by the . . . law of the land," he launched the concept of "due process of law." Coke asserted that this provision referred to the established processes of the common law. He expressed this view in the parliamentary debates leading to the PETITION OF RIGHT in 1628, raising Magna Carta to new heights with statements such as "Magna Carta is such a fellow that he will have no sovereign." Coke's arguments presaged the later American concept of a written constitution superior to other law. He also linked Magna Carta with HABEAS CORPUS, although there was little historical support for the connection. He believed that there must be a remedy for imprisonment contrary to common law process and the remedy was to be had through the writ of habeas corpus.

Coke's other major contribution in his last years was the writing of his Institutes. This four-part work, published in 1641, became a basic text in the education of lawyers in England and America. In America, where law books were few, the Institutes were the standard work before the publication of WILLIAM BLACKSTONE's Commentaries in 1767. As noted by the Supreme Court in one of its several twentieth-century references to Coke (KLOPFER V. NORTH CAROLINA, 1967): "Coke's Institutes were read in the American Colonies by virtually every student of the law. Indeed, THOMAS JEFFERSON wrote that at the time he studied law (1762–1767), Coke Lyttleton was the universal elementary book of law students. And to JOHN RUTLEDGE of South Carolina, the Institutes seemed to be almost the foundation of our law." Because few lawyers in England and America had either the inclination or the resources to go behind Coke's Institutes and his Reports, these works, despite historical inaccuracies revealed by later scholarship, became the authoritative legal source on both sides of the Atlantic.

Coke represents a transition from medieval to modern law. He lived in the dawn of the modern constitutional era, when the British colonization of North America was beginning. As the colonists later sought authority to support their arguments that royal power was limited by law, they found it in Coke. Since the American Revolution, Coke has been regarded as an early authority for the proposition that all government is under law and that it is ultimately for the courts to interpret the law.

DANIEL J. MEADOR
(1986)

Bibliography

BOUDIN, LOUIS B. 1929 Lord Coke and the American Doctrine of Judicial Power. New York University Law Review 6:223–246.

BOWEN, CATHERINE D. 1957 The Lion and the Throne: The Life and Times of Sir Edward Coke. Boston: Little, Brown.

MULLETT, CHARLES F. 1932 Coke and the American Revolution. Economica 12:457–471.

COKER v. GEORGIA
433 U.S. 584 (1977)

Ehrlich Coker, an escaped felon, was convicted of rape with aggravating circumstances and sentenced to die. The Supreme Court, in a 7–2 decision, overturned the sentence. Justice BYRON R. WHITE, in a PLURALITY OPINION, argued that CAPITAL PUNISHMENT is "grossly disproportionate and excessive punishment for the crime of rape," and therefore unconstitutional under the Eighth Amendment, binding on the states through the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL's concurring opinion was applicable to the facts of this case only, while Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and THURGOOD MARSHALL would have held the death penalty unconstitutional in any case whatsoever. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER and Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST dissented, arguing that Coker's sentence was within the reserved power of the State.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

COLEGROVE v. GREEN
328 U.S. 549 (1946)

Colegrove v. Green and BAKER V. CARR (which all but overruled Colegrove in 1962) bracket the passage of the ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE movement from failure to success. Migration had drastically enlarged urban electoral districts and reduced rural ones in most states, but legislators and voters were slow to reapportion, and reapportionists turned to courts for relief. But courts were wary of tampering with legislators' seats.

The Supreme Court dismissed Colegrove's suit to enjoin Illinois congressional elections in "malapportioned" districts. The Justices gave two reasons: the case wanted EQUITY to make an INJUNCTION appropriate, and it presented a POLITICAL QUESTION reserved for decision of the elected branches both by constitutional mandate and by lack of judicially appropriate standards of judgment. "Courts," said Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, "ought not to enter this political thicket." Three Justices dissented, arguing that the case did not lack equity, that the question was not political, and that constitutional mandate and standards could be found in Article I, section 2, and the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT—a debatable assertion little argued in either Colegrove or Baker. Justice WILEY RUTLEDGE, the tiebreaker, thought the question nonpolitical but joined in the vote for dismissal for want of equity.

Though the Court dismissed all REAPPORTIONMENT cases for sixteen years, citing Colegrove, Rutledge's discretionary rationale left room for the debate between Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and Frankfurter in Baker, and for the intervention that led to the reapportionment revolution. The applicability of the equal protection clause to reapportionment was not seriously debated until REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964) and OREGON V. MITCHELL (1970). Justices HUGO L. BLACK and JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN debated the applicability of Article I, section 2, in WESBERRY V. SANDERS (1964), which finally overruled Colegrove.

WARD E. Y. ELLIOTT
(1986)

Bibliography

AUERBACH, CARL A. 1964 The Reapportionment Cases: One Person, One Vote—One Vote, One Value." Supreme Court Review 1964:1–87.

COLEMAN v. MILLER
307 U.S. 433 (1939)

The lieutenant governor of Kansas had broken a tie vote in the Kansas senate to endorse a CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT, which Kansas had previously rejected. The losing senators, opponents of the amendment, challenged the vote because the lieutenant governor was not a part of the state "legislature" within the meaning of Article V and because the previous rejection of the amendment, plus the lapse of thirteen years, had cost the amendment its "vitality."

Over objections from dissenting Justices PIERCE BUTLER and JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS that the lapse of time issue had not been briefed or argued, Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES declined to hear the challenge, citing the ratification of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and arguing that efficacy of ratification—both as to lapse of time and as to the prior rejection—was a POLITICAL QUESTION, requiring "appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social, and economic," not "within the appropriate range of EVIDENCE receivable in a court." Dominant considerations in political questions, he noted, are the "appropriateness of final action" by the elected branch and the "lack of satisfactory criteria for judicial determination."

Justice HUGO L. BLACK, writing for four concurring Justices, thought that Hughes had not sufficiently emphasized Congress's "exclusive power to control submission of constitutional amendments." An evenly divided Court expressed no opinion as to whether counting the lieutenant governor as part of the legislature was a political question.

WARD E. Y. ELLIOTT
(1986)

Bibliography

SCHARPF, FRITZ W. 1966 Judicial Review and the Political Question: A Functional Analysis. Yale Law Journal 75:517–597.

COLGATE v. HARVEY
296 U.S. 404 (1935)

This case is a historical curiosity. Vermont taxed the income from money loaned out of state but exempted from taxation any income from money loaned in the state at not more than five percent interest. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND, held the act unconstitutional as a violation of the EQUAL PROTECTION and PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clauses of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Justices HARLAN F. STONE, LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, and BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO, in dissent, found difficulty in perceiving a privilege of national CITIZENSHIP which the state had violated, especially because the Court had decided forty-four cases since 1868 in which state acts had been attacked as violating the privileges and immunities clause and until this case had held none of them unconstitutional. MADDEN V. KENTUCKY (1940) overruled Colgate.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

COLLATERAL ATTACK

As a general proposition a litigant gets one chance to present his case to a trial court; if he is dissatisfied with the result, he may APPEAL. What he cannot do, however, is to attack it "collaterally," starting the lawsuit all over again at the bottom, not so much asserting error in the first proceeding as ignoring it or trying to have the second trial court undo its results. This COMMON LAW doctrine forbidding collateral attack exists independently of the Constitution, which makes no direct mention of it. But the Constitution is frequently incomprehensible without some reference to its common law background. In this instance the document at three points implicates the doctrine of collateral attack. One section, the FULL FAITH AND CREDIT clause, seems to forbid collateral attack in civil cases (except where DUE PROCESS may require otherwise); the HABEAS CORPUS clause, by contrast, seems to require it in at least some criminal cases.

What constitutes collateral attack is itself often a difficult question; different JURISDICTIONS attach different significance to their judgments. As a general proposition, though, the full faith and credit clause requires that State A give the JUDGMENTS of State B the same effect State B would; to that extent the clause prohibits collateral attack in the interstate context. (A federal statute imposes the same requirements on federal courts.) The due process clause, however, limits the full faith and credit clause; if the courts of the state rendering the first judgment lacked jurisdiction over the defendant, the full faith and credit clause does not bar collateral attack. Due process requires that a defendant be able collaterally to attack a judgment rendered by a court that lacked authority over him. The due process clause, however, requires a court to permit collateral attack only when the party using it has not previously litigated the issue of jurisdiction; if he has, that question, like all others, is closed. Moreover, one who engages in litigation without raising the question of jurisdiction is generally treated as if he had done so and lost; the justification for such treatment is that the litigant had an opportunity to do so: due process does not require giving a second chance to one who has actually engaged in a lawsuit. The operation of this proposition leaves open to collateral attack only those judgments entered without any participation by the defendant—default judgments.

Collateral attack is thus available but is rather tightly circumscribed in civil cases; those held in detention on criminal charges have a somewhat wider scope of collateral attack available to them. The habeas clause requires federal courts (and arguably also those of the states) to entertain challenges to detention. Interpreting the federal statutes implementing the clause, federal courts have permitted those in custody to complain of various basic constitutional defects in the trials leading to their conviction; courts in some circumstances have permitted such collateral attack even though the asserted constitutional defect could have been raised in a direct appeal. To that extent present habeas practice, like the due process clause, requires courts to permit collateral attack. Unlike the due process clause, however, the habeas statute has been interpreted to permit litigants in some circumstances to raise again issues already litigated in the criminal trial.

At one level, then, the Constitution appears to issue contradictory commands: recognize judgments as conclusive—except when they are not. At another level the contradiction disappears, for both commands flow from the same impulse: under normal conditions only direct attack by appeal is permissible, but when the basic prerequisites of proper adjudication are absent (the basis of judicial authority or the incidents of a fair criminal trial), the normal rules must give way.

STEPHEN C. YEAZELL
(1986)

Bibliography

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE 1971 Restatement of the Law 2d, Conflicts of Laws. St. Paul, Minn.: American Law Institute Publishers.

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1981 Civil Rights Legislation. Charlottesville, Va.: Michie Co.

NOTE 1957 The Value of the Distinction between Direct and Collateral Attacks on Judgments. Yale Law Journal 66:526–544.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Collective bargaining is the process of negotiation between employers and LABOR unions to establish the wages, hours, and working conditions of employees. Collective bargaining has been regulated by the federal government since passage of the WAGNER (NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS) ACT (1935) and the TAFT-HARTLEY ACT (1947).

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

COLLECTOR v. DAY
11 Wallace 113 (1871)

In MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) the Supreme Court had held unconstitutional a state tax on an instrumentality of the national government, and in Dobbins v. Commissioners (1842) the Court had forbidden a state to tax the salary of a federal officer. The Court had reasoned that a sovereign government must be immune from the taxes of another government to preserve its independence. Here the Court applied that doctrine reciprocally, holding that the United States had no constitutional power to tax the salary of a state judge. In GRAVES V. NEW YORK EX REL. O'KEEFE (1939) the Court overruled both Dobbins and Collector, vitiating the DOCTRINE of reciprocal tax immunities.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Intergovernmental Immunity.)

COLLINS v. CITY OF HARKER HEIGHTS
503 U.S. 115 (1992)

Larry Collins, a city employee, died of asphyxia after entering a manhole to unstop a sewer line. His widow sued under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, alleging that municipalities must train and warn their employees about known workplace hazards. She claimed that the city's inadequate training, warning, and supplying of safety equipment violated the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT guarantee of DUE PROCESS OF LAW. The Supreme Court, in a unanimous opinion by Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, rejected the claim. The Court viewed the claim as being analogous "to a fairly typical state-law tort claim" based on a breach of duty of care. It distinguished cases involving due process claims by those deprived of their liberty, such as prisoners. The holding extended a line of cases, beginning with PAUL V. DAVIS (1976), in which the Court has refused to find constitutional violations for what it regards as merely tortious misbehavior.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(2000)

COLLUSIVE SUIT

Article III of the Constitution limits the federal courts to the decision of CASES OR CONTROVERSIES. One component of that limitation bars adjudication of the merits of a claim absent a real dispute between parties who have conflicting interests. If nominally opposing parties manufacture a lawsuit to secure a judicial ruling, if one party controls or finances both sides of a case, or if both parties in fact desire the same ruling, the suit will be dismissed as collusive. The issues in a case need not be contested, so long as the parties' ultimate interests in the litigation are opposed. Hence, a default judgment can be entered, or a guilty plea accepted. Nor are all TEST CASES forbidden as collusive—only those where the contestants seek the same outcome. Of course, other JUSTICIABILITY barriers may prevent adjudication.

Like the ban on ADVISORY OPINIONS, the rule banning collusive suits saves judicial resources for disputes that need resolution, helps assure that federal courts act only on the basis of the information needed for sound decision making, and, in constitutional cases, prevents premature judicial intervention in the political process. The rule also may block efforts by supposed adversaries (but actual allies) to procure a ruling detrimental to opponents who are not represented in the collusive action.

JONATHAN D. VARAT
(1986)

COLONIAL CHARTERS

Perhaps no other American constitutional topic has been subject to such changing and contrary interpretations as has that of colonial charters. For example, GEORGE BANCROFT, who in 1834 had written that the Massachusetts charter of 1629 "established a CORPORATION, like other corporations within the realm," wrote in 1883 that the charter "constituted a body politic by the name of the Governor and Company of the Massachusetts Bay." Bancroft's apparent inconsistency is less contradiction than part of a constitutional controversy. Even during the colonial period constitutional experts disagreed about the legal nature of charters.

A few North American colonies (Plymouth, New Haven) had no charters. Most did, however, and the earliest charters were of two types. The first (Virginia, Massachusetts Bay), modeled on trading company charters granted to merchants, stressed commerce and settlement. The second (Maryland, Maine, Carolina) was based on the palatinate bishopric of Durham County, England. Later, a third type of charter was issued: "royal" charters for colonies in which the governor and other designated officers were appointed by the Crown. Containing more provisions directing government functions, royal charters generally defined a colony's relations with the mother country, not its internal constitution. No matter the type, charters were statements of privileges, not organic acts of government; they conferred immunities from prosecution and did not define structures of governance. Colonial charters, therefore, did not contribute significantly to constitutional law or history except when Americans claimed immunity from parliamentary authority.

American legal theory held that charters were contracts by which the king promised to protect and defend his American subjects in exchange for the subjects' allegiance. A better theory was that charters were evidence of a contract between the English crown and the first settlers of America. By either theory charters were not CONSTITUTIONS but one of the sources of constitutional rights along with the ancient English constitution, the current British constitution, the original contract, the second original contract, COMMON LAW, custom, and, to a minor degree, natural law. The first charter of Virginia stated a principle, repeated in later Virginia charters and in the charters of several other colonies, that the colonists "shall have and enjoy all Liberties, Franchises, and Immunities . . . to all Intents and Purposes as if they had been abiding and born within this our Realm of England. . . ." Americans of the Revolutionary period read such provisions as supporting their constitutional arguments against Britain. The legal theory subscribed to on the imperial side of the controversy held that charters created corporations not unlike municipal and commercial corporations in the mother country. As JOSEPH GALLOWAY declared, the colonies were only "corporations, or subordinate bodies politic, vested with legislative powers, to regulate their own internal police, under certain regulations and restrictions, and no more." A more extreme imperial theory held that charters were irrelevant; that the powers and limitations of colonial government came not from charters but from the instructions that British ministers issued to colonial governors. This theory, which American legislatures repudiated, contributed to the coming of the Revolution.

The American theory that charters were inviolable contracts confirming inalienable rights was premised on Old Whig constitutional definitions of LIMITED GOVERNMENT which still enjoyed some support in Britain during the second half of the eighteenth century and found expression in arguments that Parliament lacked constitutional authority to revoke or amend charters. This argument had little support in Britain, where all charters were viewed as revocable. In fact, a majority of colonies had their charters revoked and regranted at various times by the British government. Indeed, no single action so provoked the AMERICAN REVOLUTION as the Massachusetts Government Act asserting the authority of Parliament to amend colonial charters by unilateral decision.

When the Revolution commenced there were only two proprietary charters (Pennsylvania, Maryland) and two corporate charters (Connecticut, Rhode Island). Remaining colonies had royal charters, except Quebec and Georgia, which were governed by instructions. When Americans began to draft organic acts, they came more and more to think of charters as constitutions. To resist the Massachusetts Government Act, which revoked the charter of 1691, colonial leaders gave consideration to "resuming" the original charter of 1629 granted by Charles I. Connecticut and Rhode Island retained their charters as state constitutions, Connecticut until 1818 and Rhode Island until 1843.

JOHN PHILLIP REID
(1986)

Bibliography

REID, JOHN PHILLIP 1976 In the First Line of Defense: The Colonial Charters, the Stamp Act Debate and the Coming of the American Revolution. New York University Law Review 51:177–215.

COLORADO v. CONNELLY
479 U.S. 157 (1986)

Narrowly seen, this case deals with true confessions by mentally deranged people, but it resulted in the major holding that the Fifth Amendment's right against compulsory self-incrimination operates only when the coercion is linked to government. A confession that is involuntary in the sense that it is not the product of a rational intellect or free will may, nevertheless, be introduced in EVIDENCE because no government agent misbehaved or was responsible for the involuntary character of the confession. In this case, the murderer confessed in obedience to God's voice. He received his MIRANDA rights, waived them, and insisted on confessing. The court, in a 7–2 decision, found no violation of DUE PROCESS OF LAW and no involuntary self-incrimination. The dissenters believed that the Court was wrong to think that the only involuntary confessions are those obtained by government misconduct. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, concurring with the decision, sensibly acknowledged that the confession in this case was involuntary but not of such a character that it had to be excluded from evidence.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Police Interrogation and Confessions; Right Against Self-Incrimination.)

COLOR OF LAW

Some CIVIL RIGHTS statutes proscribe only behavior "under color of" state law, and this requirement has played an important role in the development of FEDERAL PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS. Ironically, civil rights statutes have been interpreted in a manner that strips the color of law requirement of most of its contemporary significance. Judicial interpretation usually equates the color of law requirement with STATE ACTION. Because in most contexts in which the color of law requirement appears state action also is required, there is no obvious independent role for the color of law requirement.

The phrase "under color of . . . law" appears in the nation's first civil rights act, the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866. There it seemed to limit the act's coverage to actions taken pursuant to—under color of—the post-CIVIL WAR southern BLACK CODES. Subsequent revisions of the 1866 act and civil rights statutes modeled after it retained the concept as a way of limiting their coverage. It currently appears in section 242 of the federal criminal code, SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, and section 1343(3) of the judicial code, the jurisdictional counterpart to section 1983.

In deciding what constitutes action under color of law, two extreme readings have been rejected. One view, advocated in dissenting opinions by Justices OWEN ROBERTS, FELIX FRANKFURTER, and ROBERT H. JACKSON in SCREWS V. UNITED STATES (1945) and by Justice Frankfurter in MONROE V. PAPE (1961), deems behavior to be under color of state law only when it is authorized by state law. In this view, any action by state officials in violation of state law cannot be under color of law. Where, as in Screws, a law officer murders his prisoner, in clear violation of state law, the officer's act would not be regarded as being under color of law and, therefore, would not be subject to civil or criminal penalties under federal statutes containing the requirement. This view of the color of law requirement would limit the significance of modern civil rights statutes, for much official behavior that civil rights litigants allege to violate the Constitution or federal law also violates state law. This view, however, would make the color of law requirement meaningful in the context of the times during which the requirement first appeared. During the post-Civil War era, much of the most disturbing official behavior, particularly behavior aimed at recently freed blacks, was authorized by state law.

The expansive extreme view of color of law arises not in interpreting the phrase itself but in interpreting it in conjunction with a series of nouns that accompany it. Section 1983, for example, refers to action "under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage." In Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co. (1970), Justices WILLIAM J.

BRENNAN and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS interpreted "color of custom" to include virtually all segregative activity in the South, public or private, because the activity sprang from widespread custom. The majority in Adickes interpreted color of custom to include only action that constituted state action. Color of custom thus encompasses private behavior only to the extent that private persons act sufficiently in concert with public officials to render their action state action. This interpretation, combined with rejection in Screws and Monroe of the view limiting color of law to action authorized by law, leaves the color of law concept with little independent meaning. In general, action is under color of law if and only if the action satisfies the state action requirement.

There are, however, two areas in which it is useful to differentiate between state action and action under color of law. First, some constitutional rights, such as the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT right not to be enslaved, are protected against both governmental and private infringement. A private person who caused the deprivation of such a right would be liable under statutes containing the "color of law" requirement even though his action was not state action. In these rare cases, action that is under color of law but that is not state action would lead to federal civil rights liability. Second, where a constitutional right, such as the right to DUE PROCESS, can be violated only by the government, private behavior authorized by statute may be action under color of law but, for want of state action, it may not subject the actor to civil rights liability. For example, when, pursuant to state statutes, creditors repossessed property without judicial proceedings, the Court in FLAGG BROS., INC. V. BROOKS (1978) held that the action taken was under color of law but that it was not state action.

In the pre-Civil War era, Congress employed the color of law requirement in a fashion related to its later use in civil rights statutes. States upset with expanding federal power and the behavior of federal officials would go so far as to initiate in state court criminal or civil proceedings against federal officers. Fearful of a biased forum, Congress, in a series of provisions commencing in 1815, provided federal officials with a right to remove these proceedings to federal court. (See REMOVAL OF CASES.) But Congress limited the power of removal to instances when the state proceedings were attributable to action by the officers under color of their office or of federal law. In this sense, as the Court noted in Tennessee v. Davis (1880), the color of law requirement clearly meant only action authorized by law, a point emphasized by the dissenters in Screws.

Nevertheless, it may be consistent with the purposes of both the removal and civil rights provisions to interpret color of law as limited to action authorized by law only in the case of the removal statute. If one views Congress in each case as desiring to protect only lawful behavior, it makes sense to interpret color of law in the removal statute to require action authorized by law and to interpret color of law in civil rights statutes to encompass official action, whether or not authorized by law. Use of the broad civil rights interpretation of color of law would immunize from state process action by federal officers not authorized by federal law. And in the context of civil rights statutes, adhering to the interpretation given the removal provision would immunize from federal remedies action by state officers not authorized by state law. The different interpretations serve a common function, subjecting a wrongdoer to liability.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1982 Section 1983: Doctrinal Foundations and an Empirical Study. Cornell Law Review 67:507–510.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC. v. DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE
412 U.S. 94 (1973)

The Supreme Court here considered a FIRST AMENDMENT challenge to a broadcaster's refusal to accept editorial advertisements except during political campaigns. Some Justices maintained that the broadcaster's action did not amount to governmental action, but the Court did not reach the question. Even assuming STATE ACTION, it held that the First Amendment permitted broadcasters to discriminate between commercial and political advertisements. Broadcasters, the Court observed, were obligated by the FAIRNESS DOCTRINE to cover political issues, and their choice to cover such issues outside of commercials protected CAPTIVE AUDIENCES and avoided a threat that the wealthy would dominate broadcast decisions about political issues.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC. v. FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION
453 U.S. 367 (1981)

A 1971 amendment to the COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934 permits the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to revoke a broadcaster's license for failure to allow reasonable access to a candidate for federal office. The Supreme Court here interpreted this provision to create a right of access for an individual candidate. Further, reaffirming the much criticized precedent of RED LION BROADCASTING CO. V. FCC (1969), the Court sustained the law, as so interpreted, against a FIRST AMENDMENT challenge. The dissenters argued that the statute created no right of access.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

COLUMBUS BOARD OF EDUCATION v. PENICK
443 U.S. 449 (1979)

DAYTON BOARD OF EDUCATION v. BRINKMAN
433 U.S. 406 (1977); 443 U.S. 526 (1979)

These cases demonstrated the artificiality of the DE FACTO/DE JURE distinction in school DESEGREGATION litigation. Both cases arose in cities in Ohio, where racially segregated schools had not been prescribed by law since 1888. In both, however, blacks charged another form of de jure segregation: intentional acts by school boards aimed at promoting SEGREGATION.

When the Dayton case first reached the Supreme Court, a related doctrinal development was still a fresh memory. WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976) had held that RACIAL DISCRIMINATION was not to be inferred from the fact that governmental action had a racially disproportionate impact; rather the test was whether such an impact was intended by the legislative body or other officials whose conduct was challenged. (See LEGISLATION.) Dayton I in 1977 applied this reasoning to school segregation, emphasizing that a constitutional violation was to be found only in cases of established segregative intent. The Court remanded the case for more specific findings on the question of intent, and said that any remedy must be tailored to the scope of the segregation caused by any specific constitutional violations.

Many observers took Dayton I to portend the undermining of KEYES V. SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1 (1973). In Keyes the Court had held that, once a significant degree of de jure segregation was established, systemwide desegregation remedies (including SCHOOL BUSING) were appropriate unless the school board showed that any remaining racially separate schools were the product of something other than the board's segregative intent. When the case returned to the Supreme Court two years later, these predictions were confounded.

Dayton II came to the Court along with the Columbus case, and they were decided together. Columbus, decided by a 7–2 vote, provided the main opinions. Writing for a majority of five, Justice BYRON R. WHITE applied the Keyes presumptions approach so vigorously that the dissenters remarked that the de factode jure distinction had been drained of most of its meaning. None of the Justices disputed the finding that in 1954–1955, when BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION was decided, the Columbus school board had deliberately drawn boundary lines and selected school sites to maintain racial segregation in a number of schools. What divided the Court was the question of inferences to be drawn from these undisputed facts.

Justice White reasoned that this de jure segregation placed the school board under an affirmative duty to dismantle its dual system. Its actions since 1954, however, had aggravated rather than reduced segregation; the foreseeability of those results helped prove the board's segregative intent. A districtwide busing remedy was thus appropriate under Keyes. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, dissenting, pointed out the tension between this decision and Dayton I. Here there was no showing of a causal relationship between pre-1954 acts of intentional segregation and current racial imbalance in the schools. Thus present-day de facto segregation was enough to generate districtwide remedies, so long as some significant pre-1954 acts of deliberate segregation could be shown.

It will be a rare big-city school district in which such acts cannot be found—with a consequent presumption of current de jure segregation. A school board cannot overcome this presumption merely by relying on a neighborhood school policy and showing that the city's residences are racially separated. This analysis obviously blurs the de factode jure distinction.

Dayton II made clear that a school board's segregative purpose was secondary to its effectiveness in performing its affirmative duty to terminate a dual system—and that effectiveness was to be measured in the present-day facts of racial separation and integration. Justice White again wrote for the majority, but now there were four dissenters. Justice POTTER STEWART, the Court's one Ohioan, concurred in Columbus but dissented in Dayton II, deferring in each case to the district court's determination as to a continuing constitutional violation. In Dayton II, the district court had found pre-1954 acts of deliberate segregation, but had found no causal connection between those acts and present racial separation in the schools. That separation, the district judge concluded, resulted not from any segregative purpose on the part of the school board but from residential segregation. Justice Stewart would have accepted that judgment, but the majority, following the Columbus line of reasoning, held that the board had not fulfilled its affirmative duty to dismantle the dual system that had existed in 1954. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER joined Justice Stewart in both cases; Justice Rehnquist dissented in Dayton II chiefly on the basis of his Columbus dissent.

Justice LEWIS F. POWELL joined Justice Rehnquist's dissents, and also wrote an opinion dissenting in both cases. Justice Powell had argued in Keyes for abandoning the de factode jure distinction, and he did not defend that distinction here. Rather he repeated his skepticism that court orders could ever end racial imbalance in large urban school districts and his opposition to massive busing as a desegregation remedy. Justice Powell, a former school board president, argued that, twenty-five years after Brown, the federal courts should be limiting rather than expanding their control of public school operations.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

KITCH, EDMUND W. 1979 The Return of Color-Consciousness to the Constitution: Weber, Dayton, and Columbus. Supreme Court Review 1979:1–15.

COMITY, JUDICIAL

Comity is the deference paid by the institutions of one government to the acts of another government—not out of compulsion, but in the interest of cooperation, reciprocity, and the stability that grows out of the satisfaction of mutual expectations. When the courts of one nation give effect to foreign laws and the orders of foreign courts, that deference is called judicial comity. (See ACT OF STATE DOCTRINE.)

The states of the United States are, for many purposes, separate sovereignties. A state court, in deciding a case, starts from the assumption that it will apply its own state law. When it applies the law of another state, normally it does so as a matter of comity. (See CHOICE OF LAW.) Because comity is not so much a rule as an attitude of accommodation, state courts generally feel free to refuse to apply a law that violates their own state's public policy. In Nevada v. Hall (1979) California courts upheld a million-dollar verdict against the State of Nevada in an automobile injury case, rejecting Nevada's claim of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY; the Supreme Court affirmed, saying that the Constitution left to California's courts the degree of comity they should afford to Nevada law.

A state court's enforcement of the valid judgment of a court of another state is not merely a matter of comity but is required by the FULL FAITH AND CREDIT CLAUSE. Similarly, the SUPREMACY CLAUSE binds state courts to enforce valid federal laws and regulations, along with the valid judgments of federal courts.

Notions of comity have recently taken on increased significance in the federal courts themselves. A federal court may, under some circumstances, stay its proceedings because another action between the same parties is pending in a state court. The Supreme Court in Fair Assessment of Real Estate Association v. McNary (1981) discovered in the Tax Injunction Act (1937) a general principle of comity forbidding federal courts not only to enjoin the collection of state taxes but also to award DAMAGES in state tax cases. And comity has been a major consideration in the development of the "equitable restraint" doctrine of YOUNGER V. HARRIS (1971), which generally forbids a federal court to grant an INJUNCTION against the continuation of a pending state criminal prosecution.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Abstention Doctrine.)

COMITY CLAUSE

See: Full Faith and Credit

COMMAGER, HENRY STEELE (1902–1998)

Henry Steele Commager was one of America's most widely read and influential historians. His two dozen books and scores of articles reflect his keen interest in CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY as well as an elegant and vivid style. He earned his degrees from the University of Chicago and taught for over sixty years at New York University, Columbia, and Amherst. He also held endowed chairs at Oxford and Cambridge and was a visiting professor at universities on four continents. His first book, The Growth of the American Republic (1930) with Samuel E. Morison, has been a standard text for over six decades, and his Documents in American History, often updated since its original publication in 1934, dominates its field. Theodore Parker (1936) is a riveting study of a transcendentalist reformer. Majority Rule and Minority Rights (1943) is a critique of JUDICIAL REVIEW based on Commager's devotion to majoritarianism and respect for dissent. Civil Liberties Under Attack (1951) and Freedom, Loyalty, and Dissent (1954) blasts MCCARTHYISM and defends constitutional freedoms.

Commager co-edited the New American Nation series in over forty volumes and co-authored The Encyclopedia of American History (1953). His Search for a Usable Past (1967) is historiographical, and Freedom and Order (1966) is an incisive commentary of contemporary America. The American Mind (1960) is an interpretation of American thought and culture as influenced by constitutionalism, PRAGMATISM, evolution, and economics. Empire of Reason (1977) stresses the ways America fulfilled Enlightenment ideas by institutionalizing them, as in CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS, FEDERALISM, and BILLS OF RIGHTS. Commager concerned himself with describing the American national character as a product of history, which he regarded as a branch of belle lettres. His books reveal the influence of Emersonians as well as pragmatists such as William James, Lester Frank Ward, and John Dewey, whom he depicted as exponents of Americanism. His work also reflects his liberalism and acceptance of government as an agency of popular welfare.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(2000)

COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF

In every state, the command of the armed forces is the ultimate component of executive power. Article II of the Constitution, adapting British practice, designates the President commander-in-chief both of the nation's armed forces and of the state militia when it is called into national service. Article IV, guaranteeing each state a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT, somewhat qualifies that authority. It provides that the national force be used to suppress domestic violence only on application of the state legislature or of the governor when the state legislature cannot be convened.

With regard to domestic (and republican) tranquillity, it became apparent soon after 1789 that the deference of Article IV to STATES' RIGHTS did not permit the national government fully to protect the peace of the United States. Although state governments dealt with most episodes of domestic disorder—and still do—some of those episodes had a national dimension. As early as 1792, Congress declared that "it shall be lawful for the President" to use national troops or call forth the militia whenever he deems such action necessary to protect the functioning of the government or the enforcement of its laws. President GEORGE WASHINGTON leading more than 12,000 national guardsmen to suppress the WHISKEY REBELLION of 1793 is the classic symbol of an independent national power to enforce what the President, echoing Jean-Jacques Rousseau, called "the general will." This power has been invoked regularly, most notably during and after the CIVIL WAR, but also in major strikes affecting the national economy (IN RE DEBS, 1895) and in the enforcement of judicial decisions ordering racial DESEGREGATION during the 1950s and 1960s. President WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT used the national force to protect Asian ALIENS threatened by a local mob, relying on his duty as President to carry out the international responsibility of the United States for the safety of aliens.

The formula of the 1792 statute, like that used in later statutes, straddles an unresolved controversy between the President and Congress. Congress insists that its power to pass laws NECESSARY AND PROPER to implement the President's authority as commander-in-chief includes the right to restrict the President's capacity to act. All Presidents, on the other hand, while recognizing the necessity for legislation in many situations, claim that statutes cannot subtract from their constitutional duty and power to preserve the Constitution and enforce the laws. Although the pattern of usage is by no means uniform, Presidents generally conform to statutes that purport to reinforce and structure the President's use of the armed forces in domestic disorders, at least as a matter of courtesy, unless "sudden and unexpected civil disturbances, disasters, or calamities," in the language of Army regulations, leave no alternative. Some Presidents have even paid lip service to the POSSE COMITATUS ACT (1878), a dubious relic of the end of Reconstruction. That act prohibits the use of the Army in suppressing domestic turbulence unless "expressly" authorized. Presidents have evaded this restriction by employing marines for the purpose.

Modern statutes usually retain the ancient requirement of a public proclamation before force is used to restore order, although Presidents sometimes ignore the tradition. The use of force by the President (or by a governor) in dealing with civil disorder does not alone justify suspending the writ of HABEAS CORPUS. According to the DOCTRINE of EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1867) and other cases, the writ cannot be suspended so long as the courts remain capable of carrying out their duties normally.

The use of force as an instrument of diplomacy, or of war and other extended hostilities, does not involve issues of dual SOVEREIGNTY but has presented significant constitutional conflicts both between Congress and the President, and between individuals and the state. (See WAR, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, AND THE CONSTITUTION.) The President's power as commander-in-chief under such circumstances goes far beyond the conduct of military operations. As the Supreme Court declared in Little v. Barreme (1804), it is also the President's prerogative to deploy troops and weapons at home and abroad in times of peace and war, and to use them when no valid law forbids him to do so. The purposes for which the President may use the armed forces in carrying on the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations are infinite and unpredictable. They include diplomatic ceremony and demonstrations of power; the employment of force in self-defense in order to deter, anticipate, or defeat armed attack against the interests of the United States, or any other act in violation of international law that would justify the use of force in time of peace; and the prosecution of hostilities after a congressional DECLARATION OF WAR. In actual hostilities, it is the President's sole responsibility to negotiate truces, armistices, and cease-fires; to direct the negotiation of peace treaties or other international arrangements terminating a condition of war; and to govern foreign territory occupied in the course of hostilities until peace is restored.

These powers are extensive. The use, threat, or hint of force is a frequent element of diplomacy. Military occupations lasted for years during and after the Civil War, the Philippine campaign, a number of Caribbean episodes, WORLD WAR I, and WORLD WAR II. The Cold War has required the apparently permanent deployment abroad of American armed forces on a large scale; novel legal arrangements have developed to organize these activities. Although the broad political and prudential discretion of both the President and Congress is taken fully into account by the courts in reviewing such exercises of the commander-in-chief's authority, constitutional limits have nonetheless emerged.

In recent years Congress has effectively employed its appropriation power to qualify the President's discretion as commander-in-chief in conducting military or intelligence operations that are not "public and notorious" general wars under international law. While such contests between the power of the purse and the power of the sword are largely political, they raise the principle of the SEPARATION OF POWERS applied in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983). The judicial response to these contests can be expected further to clarify a particularly murky part of the boundary between the President and Congress.

EUGENE V. ROSTOW
(1986)

Bibliography

BISHOP, JOSEPH W., JR. 1974 Justice under Fire. New York: Charter House.

CORWIN, EDWARD S. (1940) 1957 The President: Office and Powers 1787–1957. New York: New York University Press.

WILCOX, FRANCIS 1971 Congress, the Executive, and Foreign Policy. New York: Harper & Row.

COMMENTATORS ON THE CONSTITUTION

The first important analysis of the Constitution appeared during the ratification contests of 1787 and 1788. ALEXANDER HAMILTON and JAMES MADISON, who had participated in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, collaborated with JOHN JAY on THE FEDERALIST (1788), a series of essays defending the proposed new plan of government. Appealing to the rationalistic temper of the eighteenth century, they justified the creation of a strong central government on logical and philosophical grounds, and developed a model of CONSTITUTIONALISM that relied upon structural CHECKS AND BALANCES to promote harmony within the system. Ultimate SOVEREIGNTY, they argued, inhered in the American people; the Constitution, as an instrument of the popular will, defined and limited the powers of both the national government and the states. The Federalist provided valuable insights into the thinking of the Founding Fathers and established the guidelines for further constitutional commentary down to the CIVIL WAR.

Between 1789 and 1860 two major groups of commentators emerged in response to recurring political crises and sectional tensions. Legally trained publicists from New England and the middle states espoused a national will theory of government to justify the expansion of federal power, while southern lawyers and statesmen formed a state compact school of constitutional interpretation that championed decentralization and state sovereignty. Each group approached constitutional issues in a formal and mechanistic way, and relied upon close textual analysis to support its position.

The nationalists argued that the American people, acting in a collective national capacity, had divided sovereign power between the nation and the states and established the Constitution as the supreme LAW OF THE LAND. Under the resulting federal system, the states retained control of their internal affairs but were subordinate to the general government in all important national concerns, including taxation, INTERSTATE COMMERCE, and FOREIGN AFFAIRS. The Constitution, moreover, created a permanent union, whose basic features could be changed only by resort to a prescribed AMENDING PROCESS. Although several nationalists conceded that the Constitution had originated in a compact of the people of the several states, they insisted that such a compact, once executed, was inviolate, and could not be modified thereafter by the parties. Such was the message of NATHANIEL CHIPMAN's Sketches of the Principles of Government (1793) and William Alexander Duer's Lectures on Constitutional Jurisprudence (1843).

Other advocates of national supremacy rejected contractual assumptions altogether, and moved toward an organic theory of the Union. Nathan Dane, in A General Abridgment and Digest of American Law (1829), contended that the states had never been truly sovereign, because they owed their independence from British rule to the actions of the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, a national body that represented the American people. The people, not the states, had ratified the Constitution through the exercise of majority will; therefore, any state efforts to nullify federal law or to withdraw from the Union amounted to illegal and revolutionary acts. JAMES KENT's Commentaries on American Law (1826–1830) and Timothy Walker's Introduction to American Law (1837) further noted that the Constitution provided for the peaceful resolution of federal-state disputes through the Supreme Court's power of JUDICIAL REVIEW.

In attacking the compact model of constitutionalism, these commentators stressed the noncontractual language of the PREAMBLE and the SUPREMACY CLAUSE. A similar preoccupation with formal textual analysis characterized JOSEPH STORY's Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (1833), the most influential and authoritative statement of the nationalist position. Story, an associate Justice of the Supreme Court, interpreted the Constitution on a line-by-line basis, in light of the nationalistic jurisprudence of JOHN MARSHALL. Like Marshall, he insisted that the powers of the federal government had to be construed broadly, as the Framers had intended. On both theoretical and pragmatic grounds, Story defended the power of the Supreme Court to strike down unconstitutional state laws. Yet he also emphasized the limits of national authority, noting that the states retained control over matters of internal police that affected the daily lives of their citizens. Although Congress alone could regulate interstate commerce, for example, state legislatures might pass health and safety measures that indirectly affected such commerce. By focusing upon questions of terminology and classification, Story sought to demonstrate the stability of the federal system and to place the Constitution above partisan politics.

Nationalist historians described the formation of the Union in similarly legalistic and reverential terms. GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS's History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States (1854–1858), the first work to deal exclusively with a constitutional topic, quoted at length from the journals of the Continental Congress and other public records, but largely ignored surrounding political and economic circumstances. For Curtis and other romantic nationalists, the Founding Fathers were disinterested and divinely inspired patriots, who enjoyed the full confidence and support of the American people. Only RICHARD HILDRETH'S History of the United States of America (1849–1852) presented a contrary view. Hildreth stressed the importance of conflicting economic groups in the new nation and pointed out that the Constitution had been ratified by conventions representing only a minority of American voters.

Although state compact theorists shared the prevailing belief in a fixed and beneficent Constitution, they deplored what they perceived as the aggrandizing tendencies of the national government. St. George Tucker's "View of the Constitution of the United States," appended to his edition of WILLIAM BLACKSTONE'S Commentaries (1803), established the basic premises of the southern constitutional argument. The states and their respective citizens, Tucker contended, had entered into a compact—the Constitution—and had delegated some of their sovereign powers to the resulting federal government for specific and limited purposes. Because the Union remained subordinate to its creators, the states, and depended upon their cooperation for its continued existence, all positive grants of national power had to be construed strictly. If the federal government overstepped its constitutional powers, Tucker suggested that individuals might look to the state or federal courts for redress, while violations of STATES' RIGHTS would be answered by appropriate action from the state legislatures.

Later commentators refined Tucker's ideas and fashioned new remedies for the protection of state rights. The Philadelphia lawyer WILLIAM RAWLE introduced the possibility of peaceable SECESSION through the action of state CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS in A View of the Constitution of the United States (1825). Rawle's reasoning was hypothetical: because the people of each state had agreed to form a permanent union of representative republics, they could withdraw from their compact only by adopting a new state constitution based upon nonrepublican principles. A more realistic assessment of the nature and consequences of secession appeared in HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER'S Lectures on Constitutional Law (1843). In Tucker's view, secession provided the only mode of resistance available to a state after a controversial federal law had been upheld by the judiciary. Secession was a revolutionary measure, however, because the Constitution had established the courts as the permanent umpires of federal-state relations.

Advocates of NULLIFICATION proposed a more extreme version of the state sovereignty argument, whose origins went back to JOHN TAYLOR of Caroline's Construction Construed; and Constitutions Vindicated (1820) and New Views of the Constitution of the United States (1823). Unlike the southern moderates, Taylor insisted that sovereignty was indivisible and inhered exclusively in the states. Each "state nation" thus retained the power to construe the terms of the federal compact for itself, and to interpose its authority at any time to protect its citizens against the consolidating tendencies of the federal government. Whenever a federal law violated the Constitution, asserted Abel Parker Upshur in A Brief Inquiry into the Nature and Character of Our Federal Government (1840), a state might summon its citizens to a special convention and declare the act null and void within its borders.

As the influence of the slaveholding South continued to decline in national politics, some commentators sought to preserve the Union by adding still more checks and balances to the constitutional structure. In A Disquisition on Government and A Discourse on the Constitution and Government of the United States (1851), JOHN C. CALHOUN called for amendments that would establish a dual executive and base REPRESENTATION upon broad interest groups, any one of which might block the enactment of undesirable congressional legislation. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS' A Constitutional View of the Late War Between the States (1868–1870) and JEFFERSON DAVIS's The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government (1881) confirmed the mechanistic cast of southern constitutional thought, as they summed up the case for secession in its final form. With the defeat of the Confederacy, the secessionist option ceased to exist, and later commentators treated the issue as a historical footnote. During the 1950s conservative Southerners tried unsuccessfully to circumvent federal CIVIL RIGHTS policy by reviving the idea of INTERPOSITION in such works as William Old's The Segregation Issue: Suggestions Regarding the Maintenance of State Autonomy (1955).

For Civil War Unionists the exercise of sweeping WAR POWERS by the President and Congress provoked vigorous constitutional debate. Conservative publicists, committed to a restrictive view of federal power, insisted that no departure from prewar constitutional norms was permissible, despite the wartime emergency. Former Supreme Court Justice BENJAMIN R. CURTIS charged in Executive Power (1862) that President ABRAHAM LINCOLN had acted illegally in authorizing the military to arrest and imprison suspected disloyal civilians in areas removed from a war zone. Joel Parker's The War Powers of Congress, and of the President (1863) denounced the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION and related CONFISCATION ACTS for impairing property rights and revolutionizing federal-state relations.

A rival group of Lincolnian pragmatists defended the actions of federal authorities by appealing to an organic theory of constitutional development. Evolving national values and practices had shaped the Constitution far more than abstract legal rules, asserted FRANCIS LIEBER in What Is Our Constitution—League, Pact, or Government? (1861). The Founding Fathers had not anticipated the problem of secession; therefore, the Lincoln administration might, in conformity with natural law principles, take whatever measures it deemed necessary to preserve the nation. Sidney George Fisher's The Trial of the Constitution (1862) discovered new sources of federal power in the doctrine of popular sovereignty and other unwritten democratic dogmas. Charging that adherence to the checks and balances of the formal Constitution had immobilized the government in practice, Fisher urged Congress to create a new constitutional tradition by transforming itself into an American parliament immediately responsive to the popular will. William Whiting, solicitor of the War Department, contended that existent constitutional provisions authorized the federal government to pursue almost any wartime policy it chose. In The War Powers of the President and the Legislative Powers of Congress in Relation to Rebellion, Treason, and Slavery (1862), Whiting looked to the GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE and other statements of broad national purpose to legitimize controversial Union measures.

The leading commentators of the late nineteenth century carried forward an organic view of the Constitution, but linked it to a laissez-faire ideology that sharply restrained the exercise of governmental power at all levels. Influenced by the conservative Darwinism of Herbert Spencer and William Graham Sumner, these economic libertarians feared legislative innovation and called upon the judiciary to preserve the fundamental economic rights of the individual against arbitrary state action. In A Treatise on the Constitutional Limitations Which Rest upon the Legislative Power of the States of the American Union (1868), THOMAS MCINTYRE COOLEY argued that a libertarian tradition stretching back to MAGNA CARTA protected private property from harmful regulation, even in the absence of specific constitutional guarantees. By appealing to these historic liberties, Cooley sought to broaden the scope of the DUE PROCESS clause, transforming it into a substantive restraint upon economic legislation. JOHN FORREST DILLON's A Treatise on Municipal Corporations (1872) discovered implied limits to the taxing power. Taxes could only be levied for a PUBLIC PURPOSE, Dillon maintained, and could not benefit one social class at the expense of another. CHRISTOPHER G. TIEDEMAN took an equally restrictive view of state and federal POLICE POWER in A Treatise on the Limitations of Police Power in the United States (1886), condemning usury laws and efforts to control wages and prices.

In the area of civil rights, commentators opposed "paternalistic" legislation and insisted that the Civil War had not destroyed the traditional division of power between the nation and the states. Amendments must conform to the general principles underlying the Constitution, asserted John Norton Pomeroy in An Introduction to the Constitutional Law of the United States (1868); and these principles included FEDERALISM, as defined by the Founding Fathers. Despite the broad language of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, therefore, Congress lacked power to remedy most civil rights violations, which remained subject to state control. JOHN RANDOLPH TUCKER's The Constitution of the United States (1899) warned that federal attacks on customary racial practices in the South would undermine local institutions and create a dangerous centralization of power in the national government. The racist assumptions shared by most libertarians surfaced clearly in John Ordronaux's Constitutional Legislation in the United States (1891). Noting that national progress depended upon "race instincts," Ordronaux suggested that blacks, Orientals, and other non-Aryans were unfit for the full responsibilities of democratic CITIZENSHIP.

Constitutional historians of the late nineteenth century used a Darwinian model of struggle and survival to explain the rise of the American nation. HERMANN VON HOLST, the first scholar to make systematic use of the records of congressional debates, combined antislavery moralism with a laissez-faire attitude toward northern business in his ponderous Constitutional and Political History of the United States (1876–1892). Equally moralistic and libertarian was JAMES SCHOULER's History of the United States under the Constitution (1880–1913). In the growth of republican institutions and the triumph of Union arms Schouler discerned the unfolding of a divine plan. From a Social Darwinist perspective, William A. Dunning's The Constitution of the United States in Civil War and Reconstruction, 1860–1867 (1885) and JOHN W. BURGESS' Reconstruction and the Constitution, 1866–1876 (1902) criticized federal policymakers for enfranchising blacks at the expense of their Anglo-Saxon superiors.

In its mature form libertarian theory created a twilight zone on the borders of the federal system, within which neither the national government not the states could act. While the TENTH AMENDMENT prevented Congress from regulating local economic activities, state legislatures found their police powers circumscribed by the restrictive principles defined by Cooley and his associates. These extraconstitutional restraints also limited the federal government when it sought to exercise its express powers over taxation and commerce. Twentieth-century economic and racial conservatives have continued to defend the libertarian viewpoint and to protest the expansion of federal regulatory power. In Neither Purse Nor Sword (1936), James M. Beck and Merle Thorpe condemned early New Deal legislation for violating property rights and invading the reserved powers of the states. Charles J. Bloch's States' Rights—The Law of the Land (1958), written in the aftermath of the Brown decision, charged that the VINSON COURT and WARREN COURT had subverted the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment in civil rights cases, and called upon Congress to revitalize the Tenth Amendment, "the cornerstone of the Republic."

As the excesses of a period of industrial growth threatened the welfare of workers and consumers, however, other commentators condemned the laissez-faire model of constitutionalism as archaic and unsuited to the needs of a modern democracy. Impressed by the empiricism of the emerging social sciences, these democratic instrumentalists approached constitutional questions from a pragmatic and reformist perspective. Although they did not deny the existence of fundamental principles, they argued that these principles needed to be adapted to changing environmental conditions. Through intelligent social planning, they maintained, federal and state lawmakers might control an expanding economy in accordance with the popular will.

Mechanistic eighteenth-century concepts, such as SEPARATION OF POWERS, impaired the efficiency of modern government, charged WOODROW WILSON in Congressional Government (1885) and Constitutional Government in the United States (1908). Constitutional grants of power to the national government established only "general lines of definition," he added, and should be broadly construed by the courts in response to developing societal needs. In a similar vein, WESTEL W. WILLOUGHBY's The Constitutional Law of the United States (1910) and FRANK J. GOODNOW's Social Reform and the Constitution (1911) criticized judges for obstructing progressive reforms through their continued adherence to laissez-faire idealism.

The advent of the welfare state in the 1930s magnified disagreements between libertarians and instrumentalists, and provoked a major confrontation between President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT and the Supreme Court. EDWARD S. CORWIN, the most influential constitutional commentator of the time, applauded the programs of the early NEW DEAL for establishing a new COOPERATIVE FEDERALISM. In The Twilight of the Supreme Court (1934), Corwin urged the Justices to uphold legislative policymaking in economic matters, and pointed to the nationalistic decisions of John Marshall as appropriate precedents. When judicial intransigence persisted, according to Attorney General ROBERT H. JACKSON in The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy (1941), the administration adopted a court-packing plan as the only apparent means of restoring the full constitutional powers of the national government. Although the plan failed, a majority of Justices began to redefine congressional power in more liberal terms. Corwin welcomed the Court's belated acceptance of sweeping federal regulation in Constitutional Revolution, Ltd. (1941), and correctly predicted that the Justices would thereafter focus their review power on protection of CIVIL LIBERTIES and the rights of minorities.

Instrumentalist historians tended to seek the causes of constitutional change in underlying social and economic developments. CHARLES A. BEARD's pathbreaking study, An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States (1913), encouraged Progressive reformers by demythologizing the work of the Philadelphia Convention. Using previously neglected Treasury and census records, Beard presented the Founding Fathers as a conspiratorial elite who had devised an undemocratic Constitution to protect their property from the attacks of popular legislative majorities. In American Constitutional Development

(1943) CARL BRENT SWISHER drew upon other nontraditional sources to explain, and justify, the emergence of the positive state. With comparable erudition WILLIAM W. CROSSKEY's Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States (1953) used linguistic analysis to demonstrate the legitimacy of New Deal regulatory measures. After an exhaustive inquiry into the eighteenth-century meaning of "commerce" and other key words, Crosskey concluded that the Framers had intended to create a unitary, centralized system in which "the American people could, through Congress, deal with any subject they wished, on a simple, straightforward, nation-wide basis."

Although the instrumentalists emphasized the need to adapt the Constitution to changing socioeconomic conditions, they remained committed to the RULE OF LAW and acknowledged the binding force of constitutional norms. This moderate position failed to satisfy a small group of radical empiricists, who argued that written codes were meaningless in themselves and merely served to rationalize the political decisions of legislators and judges. "The language of the Constitution is immaterial since it represents current myths and folklore rather than rules," asserted THURMAN W. ARNOLD in The Folklore of Capitalism (1937). "Out of it are spun the contradictory ideals of governmental morality." Howard L. McBain's The Living Constitution: A Consideration of the Realities and Legends of Our Fundamental Law (1927) similarly contended that law had no life of its own, but depended for its substance on the unpredictable actions of men. Because the American people believed the fiction of a government of law, they had grown politically apathetic, charged J. ALLEN SMITH in The Growth and Decadence of Constitutional Government (1930). Although constitutionalism had been designed to limit arbitrary power, he noted, it protected an irresponsible governing elite from popular scrutiny and control.

The empiricists were more successful in diagnosing ills than in prescribing remedies. Because they stressed the determining influence of ideology and personality upon decision making, they could find no satisfactory way to limit the discretionary power of public officials. The scope of administrative discretion must necessarily broaden as society grows more complex, contended William B. Munro in The Invisible Government (1928). He welcomed the trend, which promised to give government agencies greater flexibility in dealing with contemporary problems. Yet unrestrained power might also encourage irresponsible behavior, such as judges so often displayed in reviewing legislative measures. Both LOUIS B. BOUDIN'S Government by Judiciary (1932) and Fred Rodell's Nine Men: A Political History of the Supreme Court of the United States from 1790 to 1955 (1955) reduced jurisprudence to politics, and charged that judges wrote their conservative policy preferences into law under the guise of legal principles. The only remedy they could suggest, however, was the appointment to the bench of liberals who would promote the public welfare in a more enlightened, albeit equally subjective, fashion.

During the past quarter-century commentators, preeminently ALEXANDER M. BICKEL, have continued to debate the nature and scope of JUDICIAL REVIEW, in the context of the Supreme Court's enlarged role as guardian of individual and minority rights. The timely aspects of such recent studies attest to the constructive role that commentators have historically played in the shaping of American constitutional law. Responsive to changing trends in social and political thought, they have often helped to redefine and clarify the terms of constitutional discourse. As Corwin once quipped, "If judges make law, so do commentators."

MAXWELL BLOOMFIELD

(1986)

Bibliography

BAUER, ELIZABETH K. 1952 Commentaries on the Constitution, 1790–1860. New York: Columbia University Press.

BELZ, HERMAN 1971 The Realist Critique of Constitutionalism in the Era of Reform. American Journal of Legal History 15: 288–306.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. 1973 A More Perfect Union: The Impact of the Civil War and Reconstruction on the Constitution. New York: Knopf.

KONEFSKY, ALFRED S. 1981 Men of Great and Little Faith: Generations of Constitutional Scholars. Buffalo Law Review 30:365–384.

LARSEN, CHARLES E. 1959 Nationalism and States' Rights in Commentaries on the Constitution after the Civil War. American Journal of Legal History 3:360–369.

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1963 Time to Reclaim: The Current Challenge of American Constitutional History. American Historical Review 69:64–79.

NEWTON, ROBERT E. 1965 Edward S. Corwin and American Constitutional Law. Journal of Public Law 14:198–212.

COMMERCE CLAUSE

The commerce clause is the small part of the Constitution that provides that "The Congress shall have power . . . to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes."

The phrase relating to the Indians was derived from the provision in the 1781 ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION which gave the federal congress "the sole and exclusive right and power of . . . regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians." Despite the elimination of the sweeping second phrase, there never has been any question that the Indian part of the commerce clause (plus the TREATY and WAR POWERS) gave Congress power over all relations with the Indians, and no more need be said about it.

Nor has there been much question as to the scope of the federal power to regulate foreign commerce. Combined with the tax and WAR POWERS and the provisions prohibiting the states from entering treaties and agreements with foreign powers and from imposing duties on imports and exports, this power clearly gave the federal government complete authority over relations with foreign nations.

The short clause relating to "commerce among the several states," however, has become one of the most significant provisions in the Constitution. It has been in large part responsible for the development of the United States as a single integrated economic unit, with no impediments to the movement of goods or people at state lines.

The draftsmen of the commerce clause could not have envisaged the eventual magnitude of the national commercial structure or the breadth of the CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION which that structure would produce. Nevertheless the need for a national power over commerce led to the calling of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, and the seed for the growth of the power was planted in the early years.

In 1786 the Virginia General Assembly, and then a commission representing five states meeting at Annapolis, called for the appointment of commissioners to consider "the trade of the United States" and "how far a uniform system in their commercial regulation may be necessary to their common interest and their permanent harmony." The Congress created under the Articles of Confederation thereupon approved the calling of a convention to meet in Philadelphia in May 1787 for the purpose of revising the Articles and reporting its recommendations to the Congress and the States.

The Convention, after considerable debate, adopted a resolution generally describing the powers to be given the National Legislature, in the form proposed by the Virginia delegation led by GEORGE WASHINGTON, Governor EDMUND RANDOLPH, and JAMES MADISON. It was resolved that "the national legislature ought . . . to legislate in all cases for the general interests of the Union, and also in those to which the states are separately incompetent, or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation." This and other resolutions were sent to a drafting committee, which reported out the commerce clause and other powers to be conferred on Congress in substantially the form finally adopted.

Although the needs of commerce had been principally responsible for the calling of the Convention, the clause was accepted with hardly any debate. The same was true in the state ratifying conventions. All reflected the view that in general the new Constitution gave the federal government power over matters of national but not of local concern.

The same view was expressed in the first commerce clause case in 1824 (GIBBONS V. OGDEN), written for a unanimous Supreme Court by Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL, who had been a member of the Virginia ratifying convention. The Court declared that the commerce power did not extend to commerce that is completely internal, and "which does not extend to or affect other states." It "may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more states than one. . . . The genius and character of the whole government seems to be, that its action is to be applied to all the concerns of the nation, and to these internal concerns which affect the States generally."

Of course, neither in 1787 nor in 1824 did those who wrote or ratified or interpreted the Constitution contemplate the tremendous and close-knit economic structure that exists today and the accompanying inability of the states, or of any agency but the nation, to meet the governmental problems that structure presents. Indeed, in the 1820s and into the 1850s many persons regarded even the construction of the principal highways within each state as purely internal matters not subject to federal power, as appeared from President JAMES MONROE's veto on constitutional grounds of an appropriation to construct what is now Interstate 70 from Maryland to the Western states. Although the MARSHALL COURT would not have agreed, some of the more STATES' RIGHTS-minded Supreme Court Justices of the 1840s and 1850s did.

In general, during the century from 1787 to 1887, the only national commercial problems concerned foreign trade and navigation and the removal of state-imposed barriers to interstate trade. Affirmative federal regulation applied almost entirely to matters of navigation on the oceans, lakes, and rivers. An early statute required vessels engaged in coastal traffic to obtain federal licenses. Reasonably enough, none of these were challenged as falling outside the commerce power.

All of the commerce clause cases during the first 100 years, and a great many of them thereafter, were concerned with the negative effect of the clause upon state legislation—even though the clause did not mention the states. The Constitution merely said that Congress should have the power to regulate commerce. Other clauses imposed specific prohibitions upon the states, but the commerce clause did not. On the other hand, it was well known during the early period that the principal evil at which the commerce clause was directed was state restrictions upon the free flow of commerce.

The issue first came before the Supreme Court in Gibbons v. Ogden (1824). New York had granted Robert Fulton and ROBERT LIVINGSTON the exclusive right for thirty years to operate vessels propelled by steam in New York waters, thereby excluding steamboats coming from neighboring states. New Jersey, Connecticut, and Ohio had promptly passed retaliatory legislation forbidding the New York monopoly from operating in their waters. The case presented an example (though unforeseeable in 1787) of the type of interstate commercial rivalry which the commerce clause had been designed to prevent.

A unanimous Supreme Court held that Congress's commerce power extended to all commercial intercourse among the states, rejecting arguments that it did not apply to navigation and passenger traffic. The Court, speaking through Marshall, further concluded that Congress had exercised its power in the Coastal Licensing Act, that Gibbons's vessels were operating in compliance with that statute, and that New York's attempt to prohibit them from operating in New York waters was inconsistent with the federal statute and therefore unconstitutional under the SUPREMACY CLAUSE of the Constitution. The Court did not find it necessary to decide whether the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce was exclusive or whether the states had CONCURRENT POWER in the absence of a conflicting federal law, although Marshall seemed to favor the former view. But Marshall recognized that, although the states had no power to regulate interstate or FOREIGN COMMERCE as such, they could exercise their preexisting powers to enact laws on such subjects as health, quarantine, turnpikes and ferries, and other internal commerce, even though that might overlap the subjects that Congress could reach under the commerce clause. Thus, as a practical matter, the Court recognized that the states had concurrent powers over many aspects of commerce, or of internal matters that might affect external commerce.

After ROGER B. TANEY became Chief Justice in 1835, a number of the Justices, including Taney, took the flat position that only state laws inconsistent with acts of Congress were preempted, and that the commerce clause itself had no preemptive effect. But in none of the cases could a majority of the Court agree on any theory.

This unhappy and unhealthy state of the law was formally resolved in 1852, when, speaking through newly appointed Justice BENJAMIN R. CURTIS, the Court sustained a Pennsylvania law governing the use of pilots in the port of Philadelphia in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS OF PHILADELPHIA (1852). Six Justices agreed that whatever subjects of this power are in their nature national, or admit only of one uniform system, or plan of regulation, may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Where there was no need for regulation on a national scale, only state laws inconsistent with federal would fall.

The Court still cites the Cooley principle with approval, although the Cooley formula has been largely superseded by an interest-balancing approach to STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE. (See SELECTIVE EXCLUSIVENESS; STATE POLICE POWER; STATE TAXATION OF COMMERCE.) But in a number of cases during the years following Cooley, the Court adopted a more simplistic approach. If the subject of the state regulation was interstate commerce, only Congress could regulate it; if it was not, only the states could. In these cases the Court held—or at least said—that the United States could not tax or regulate manufacturing or PRODUCTION because they were beyond the scope of the federal commerce power, a pronouncement that later caused substantial difficulty but was not explicitly disavowed until Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Montana (1981).

During the twenty years after the CIVIL WAR, the Court held that states could not directly tax or regulate interstate commerce, but that they could, for example, fix railroad rates between points in the same state. (See GRANGER CASES.) When, however, Illinois attempted to apply its prohibition against charging more for a shorter rail haul than a longer one to freight between Illinois cities and New York, the Court, applying the Cooley formula, held in WABASH, ST. LOUIS & PACIFIC RAILWAY V. ILLINOIS (1886) that the state had no such power. The opinion made it clear that interstate rates, even for the part of a journey within a state, were not subject to state regulation. Such transportation was "of that national character" that can be "only appropriately" regulated by Congress rather than by the individual states.

Because leaving shippers subject to unregulated rail rates was unthinkable at that time, Congress reacted in 1887 by adopting the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT, the first affirmative federal regulation of land transportation.

Three years later, in response to a similar public reaction against uncontrolled monopolies, Congress enacted the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT, which prohibited combinations that restrained or monopolized interstate and foreign trade or commerce. The Court easily upheld the applicability of the statute to interstate railroads, but, amazingly, by a vote of 8–1, held the act inapplicable to the Sugar Trust which combined all the sugar refiners in the United States. UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. (1895) held that such a combination concerned only manufacture and production, and not "commerce," as the act (and, presumably, the Constitution) used the word. This ruling left the country remediless against national monopolies of manufacturers. Since interstate manufacturers are of course engaged in interstate trade—selling, buying, and shipping—as well as manufacture, this was a strange decision. It was soon devitalized, though not expressly OVERRULED, in SWIFT & COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1905), STANDARD OIL COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1911), and UNITED STATES V.

AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY (1911), which similarly involved combinations of manufacturers.

In a number of cases the Court upheld congressional regulation of interstate transportation for noncommercial reasons. Federal statutes forbidding the interstate sale of lottery tickets, the interstate transportation of women for immoral purposes, stolen motor vehicles, diseased cattle which might range across state lines, misbranded food and drugs, and firearms were all held valid, usually without much question. The effect was to establish that the commerce clause applied to things or persons moving across state lines, whether or not they had anything to do with trade or commerce in the usual sense. (See NATIONAL POLICE POWER.) This conclusion was consistent with Marshall's original definition of commerce as intercourse in Gibbons v. Ogden.

The Court's narrow approach to the commerce power in the early twentieth century was demonstrated by its invalidation in 1908 of a law creating a WORKER'S COMPENSATION system for all railroad employees, because it included those doing intrastate shop and clerical work, and a law prohibiting railroads from discharging employees because of membership in a labor organization. (See EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY CASES; ADAIR V. UNITED STATES.) In HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) the Court even held that Congress could not prohibit the interstate transportation of child-made goods because the prohibition's purpose was to prevent child labor in manufacturing plants within the states.

Decisions other than the monopoly cases during the same period recognized that the congressional commerce power could apply to intrastate transactions that had an effect upon or relation to interstate commerce. Although strikes blocking interstate shipments from manufacturing plants were found to affect interstate commerce only indirectly, the result was different when an intent to restrain interstate commerce was found, or when a SECONDARY BOYCOTT extended to other states. (See LOEWE V. LAWLOR.) Intrastate trains were held subject to federal safety regulations because of the danger to interstate trains on the same tracks. Intrastate freight rates were held subject to federal control when a competitive relationship to interstate rates or a general effect on all rail rates could be shown. (See SHREVEPORT DOCTRINE.) In 1930 the Court sustained the application of the Railway Labor Act to clerks performing intrastate work so as to protect the right to COLLECTIVE BARGAINING and thereby avert strikes disrupting interstate commerce, contrary to the Adair decision in 1908.

Perhaps of greatest significance were cases sustaining federal regulation of the stockyards and the Chicago Board of Trade which, even though located in a single city, were found to control interstate prices for agricultural products. (See STAFFORD V. WALLACE.) The Court was not disturbed by the fact that the sales of grain futures which had such an effect were often completely local, since most of them were not followed by any shipments of physical products.

Thus by 1930 there were lines of cases saying that the federal power did not extend to business activity occurring in a single state, and other cases holding the contrary where some kinds of relationship to interstate commerce were shown.

The Great Depression running from 1929 through the 1930s brought the nation its severest economic crisis. Inaction during HERBERT HOOVER's administration proved ineffective and left thirteen million persons unemployed, prices and wages dropping in a self-perpetuating spiral, and banks, railroads, and many other businesses insolvent. The amount of revenue freight carried by railroad, a fair measure of the quantity of interstate commerce, had fallen by fifty-one percent. The public expected FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, who took office in March 1933, to do something about the Depression. Although no one was sure what would work—and no one is yet quite sure what, if anything, did work—the President and Congress tried. Obviously the economy could not be restored by states acting separately. Only measures taken on a national scale could possibly be effective.

To stop the downward spiral in wages and prices, and to increase employment by limiting the number of hours a person could work, MAXIMUM HOURS AND MINIMUM WAGES were prescribed for industry generally, not merely for employees in interstate commerce. Collective bargaining was made mandatory, and protected against employer interference. The object was to increase national employment, national purchasing power, and the demand for and consumption of all products, which would benefit employers, employees, and the flow of commodities in interstate commerce. All this was originally sought to be accomplished by the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT (NIRA), which authorized every industry to prepare a code of competition designed to accomplish the above purposes; the code would become effective and enforceable when approved by the President.

The same statute and the AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1933 (AAA) attempted to cope with the overproduction of petroleum and agricultural products, which had forced prices down to absurd levels, such as five cents per barrel of crude oil and thirty-seven cents per bushel of wheat. The petroleum code under the NIRA and programs adopted under the AAA provided for the fixing of production quotas for oil producers and farmers.

The two lines of authorities summarized above supported opposing arguments as to the constitutionality of these measures under the commerce clause. For Congress to prescribe wages, hours, and production quotas for factories, farms, and oil wells undoubtedly would regulate intrastate activities, which prior opinions had frequently said were regulable only by the states.

On the other hand, the reasoning of opinions sustaining federal regulation of intrastate features of railroading and the intrastate marketing practices of stockyards and grain exchanges also supported the use of the commerce power to regulate intrastate acts that had an effect upon interstate commerce. The same was true of many of the antitrust cases referred to above. None of the relationships previously found insufficient to support federal regulation had involved general economic effects that halved the flow of interstate trade. But Congress had never sought to regulate the main body of manufacturing, mining, and agricultural production.

In the mid-1930s the Supreme Court included four Justices—WILLIS VAN DEVANTER, JAMES MCREYNOLDS, GEORGE SUTHERLAND, and PIERCE BUTLER—who looked askance at any enlargement of the scope of governmental power over business and who steadily voted against extension of the congressional commerce power, and also voted to invalidate both federal and state regulation under the due process clauses. Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES and Justice OWEN J. ROBERTS sometimes voted with these four, while Justices LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, HARLAN FISKE STONE, and BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO usually voted to sustain the legislative judgments as to how to deal with economic problems.

In a series of cases in 1935 and 1936, passing upon the validity of the NIRA, the AAA, and the Guffey Snyder (BITUMINOUS COAL CONSERVATION) ACT regulating the bituminous coal industry, Hughes and Roberts joined the conservative four to hold these acts unconstitutional.

The government had hoped and planned to test the constitutionality of the NIRA in a case involving the nationally integrated petroleum industry, PANAMA REFINING CO. V. RYAN (January 1935). But the Court found it unnecessary to decide the commerce issue in the Panama case. Instead, that question came before the Court in SCHECHTER POULTRY CORP. V. UNITED STATES (May 1935), in which the defendant had violated the provisions of the Live Poultry Code with respect to wages and hours and marketing practices of seemingly little consequence. The poultry slaughtered and sold by the defendant had come to New York City from other states, but there was nothing in the record to show that this interstate movement was greatly affected by the practices in question.

The only persuasive argument supporting the constitutionality of the Poultry Code was that the depressed state of the entire economy and of interstate commerce in general could be remedied only by increasing national purchasing power, and that prescribing minimum wages and maximum hours for all employees, whether or not in interstate industries, was a reasonable method of accomplishing that purpose. None of the Justices was willing to go that far. Indeed, the opinion of Chief Justice Hughes for the Court and the concurring opinion of Justice Cardozo emphasized as a principal defect in the argument that it would extend federal power to all business, interstate or intrastate. The fact that little would be left to exclusive state control, rather than the magnitude of the effect on interstate commerce from a national perspective, was treated as decisive. On the same day, in RAILROAD RETIREMENT BOARD V. ALTON, an act establishing a retirement program for railroad employees was held, by a vote of 5–4, not to be within the federal commerce power.

In theory, the Schechter decision left open the power of Congress to regulate production in major interstate industries such as petroleum or coal. But that opening, if it existed, seemed to be closed by two decisions in 1936. Because of the foreseeable risks from reliance on the commerce power, Congress had utilized the taxing power to "persuade" farmers to limit the production of crops in order to halt the collapse of farm prices. In UNITED STATES V. BUTLER (1936), over Justice Stone's vigorous dissent, six Justices, speaking through Justice Roberts and including Chief Justice Hughes, thought it unnecessary to determine whether this legislative scheme came within the ENUMERATED POWERS of Congress. The majority avoided this inquiry by concluding that the law intruded upon the area of production reserved to the states by the TENTH AMENDMENT, which reserves to the states or the people "the powers not delegated to the United States." The Court invoked the same theory a few months later in CARTER V. CARTER COAL COMPANY (1936) to invalidate the Guffey Act's regulation of wages, hours, and collective bargaining in the coal industry. Although the evidence submitted in a long trial proved indisputably the obvious fact that coal strikes could and did halt substantially all interstate commerce moving by rail, as most commerce then did, five Justices, speaking through Justice Sutherland, found decisive not the magnitude of an effect on interstate commerce but whether the effect was immediate, without an intervening causal factor. Even Chief Justice Hughes concurred to this extent, although not in other parts of the majority opinion. Only Justices Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo challenged the reasoning of the majority.

The Butler and Carter cases made it plain—or so it seemed—that the Constitution as construed by the Court completely barred the federal government from endeavoring to resolve the national economic problems which called for control of intrastate transactions at the production or manufacturing stage. As an economic matter, individual states were unable to set standards for their own industries that were in competition with producers in other states. The result was that in the United States no government could take action deemed necessary to deal with such matters no matter how crippling their effect upon the national economy might be.

In early 1937 the same type of collective bargaining regulation which the Carter case had stricken for the coal industry was on its way to the Supreme Court in the first cases under the WAGNER (NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS) ACT of 1935. That statute by its terms applied to unfair labor practices that burdened or obstructed interstate commerce or tended to lead to a labor dispute that had such an effect. The courts of appeals, following the Carter case, had held that the act could not constitutionally reach a steel manufacturing company, a trailer manufacturer, and a small clothing manufacturer.

Three days before the arguments in these cases in the Supreme Court were to commence, President Roosevelt, who had recently been reelected by a tremendous majority, announced a plan to add up to six new Justices to the Supreme Court, one for each Justice over seventy years of age, purportedly for the purpose of providing younger judges who could enable the Court to keep up with its workload. The Court and many others vigorously opposed the plan. Two months later, in the WAGNER ACT CASES (1937), Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts joined Justices Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo to sustain the applicability of the National Labor Relations Act to the three manufacturers. The evidence as to the effect of their labor disputes upon interstate commerce was obviously much weaker than that presented in the Carter case as to the entire bituminous coal industry. Within the next few months, Justices Van Devanter and Sutherland retired, to be succeeded by Senator HUGO L. BLACK and Solicitor General STANLEY F. REED, and the court-packing plan gradually withered away, even though for a long time President Roosevelt refused to abandon it. No one can be certain whether the plan influenced the Chief Justice and Justice Roberts, but many persons thought the facts spoke for themselves.

Chief Justice Hughes's opinion for the Court in National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. (1937) flatly declared that practices in productive industry could have a sufficient effect upon interstate commerce to justify federal regulation under the commerce clause. The test was to be "practical," based on "actual experience." The reasoning of the Carter and Butler cases was repudiated, although the majority opinion did not say so.

In 1938 a revised AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT and a new FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT were enacted. Under the former, the secretary of agriculture, after obtaining the necessary approval of two-thirds of the tobacco growers in a referendum, prescribed marketing quotas determining the maximum quantity of tobacco each grower could sell. Although the practical effect was to limit what would be produced, the object was to stabilize prices by keeping an excessive supply off the market. In Mulford v. Smith (1939), the Court, speaking through Justice Roberts, found that because interstate and intrastate sales of tobacco were commingled at the auction warehouses where tobacco was sold, Congress clearly had power to limit the amount marketed by each farmer. HAMMER V. DAGENHART, UNITED STATES V. BUTLER, and the Tenth Amendment were mentioned only in the dissenting opinion of Justice McReynolds and Butler.

The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 in substance reenacted the minimum wage and maximum hour provision of the NIRA for employees engaged in interstate commerce or the production of goods for such commerce, and also forbade the shipment in interstate commerce of goods produced under the proscribed labor conditions. The minimum wage then prescribed was twenty-five cents per hour. The prevailing wage in the lumber industry in the South ranged from ten cents to twenty-seven and a half cents per hour, which made it difficult for employers paying more than the lowest amount to compete. A case involving a Georgia sawmill (UNITED STATES V. DARBY LUMBER COMPANY) came to the Supreme Court late in 1940, and was decided in early 1941 after Justice Butler had died and Justice McReynolds had retired. By that time Justices FELIX FRANKFURTER and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS had replaced Cardozo and Brandeis, and Justice FRANK MURPHY had succeeded Butler.

The Supreme Court, speaking unanimously through Justice Stone, upheld the statute. The Court held that Congress had the power to exclude from interstate commerce goods that were not produced in accordance with prescribed standards, and to prescribe minimum wages and maximum hours for employees producing goods which would move in interstate commerce. Overruling HAMMER V. DAGENHART, the Court declared that the power of Congress to determine what restrictions should be imposed upon interstate commerce did not exclude regulations whose object was to control aspects of industrial production. The Court invoked the interpretation of the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819): the commerce power extended not merely to the regulation of interstate commerce but also "to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce or the exercise of the power of Congress over it as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the granted power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce." The emphasis was not on direct or indirect effects, a judge-made concept not tied to constitutional language, or even to the substantiality of an effect. The Court found it sufficient that the establishment of federal minimum labor standards was a reasonable means of suppressing interstate competition based on substandard labor conditions. In KIRSCHBAUM V. WALLING (1942) the Court broadly construed the commerce clause to make the Fair Labor Standards Act apply to service and maintenance employees who were not directly engaged in the production of goods for commerce but in the performance of services ancillary to such production.

A year and a half after Darby, in WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942), a unanimous Court, speaking through Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, upheld marketing quotas under the amended Agricultural Adjustment Act, even though they limited the amount of wheat allowed to be consumed on the farm as well as the amount sold. The object was to reduce the supply of wheat in order to increase the price—and the total supply of wheat, including the twenty percent of the crop consumed on the farm for feed or seed, not only was in at least potential competition with wheat in commerce but had a substantial influence on prices and market conditions for the wheat crop throughout the nation. Reviewing the prior law, and explicitly noting the cases that were being disapproved—E. C. Knight, Employers' Liability, Hammer v. Dagenhart, Railroad Retirement Board, Schechter, and Carter—Justice Jackson's opinion laid to rest the prior controlling effect attributed to nomenclature such as "production" and "indirect," as distinct from the actual economic effect of an activity upon interstate commerce. Even if an "activity be local" and not itself commerce, "it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce." The proper point of reference was "what was necessary and proper to the exercise by Congress of the granted power." The Court further declared, as it had in Darby, that the magnitude of the contribution of each individual to the EFFECT ON COMMERCE was not the criterion but the total contribution of persons similarly situated, which meant that the insignificant effect of the amount consumed on any particular farm was not decisive.

In 1944 and 1946, in cases holding that Congress could regulate the insurance industry and public utility holding companies (UNITED STATES V. SOUTH-EASTERN UNDERWRITERS ASSOCIATION, 1944; North American Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commisssion, 1946), the Court broadly summarized the teachings of its prior cases beginning with the words of Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden:

> Commerce is interstate . . . when it "concerns more States than one." . . . The power granted is the power to legislate concerning transactions which, reaching across State boundaries, affect the people of more states than one;—to govern affairs which the individual states, with their limited territorial jurisdictions, are not fully capable of governing. This federal power to determine the rules of intercourse across state lines was essential to weld a loose confederacy into a single, indivisible Nation; its continued existence is equally essential to the welfare of that Nation.

Since these decisions there has been no doubt that Congress possesses full power to regulate all aspects of the integrated national economy. The few commerce clause cases of importance since that time concerned the use of the commerce power for noncommercial purposes: to combat racial SEGREGATION, crime, and environmental problems.

In Katzenbach v. McClung (1964) the Court sustained the provisions of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 prohibiting RACIAL DISCRIMINATION by restaurants serving interstate travelers or obtaining a substantial portion of their food from outside the state, both because discrimination had a highly restrictive effect upon interstate travel by Negroes and because it reduced the amount of food moving in interstate commerce (which seems quite doubtful). (See also HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL V. UNITED STATES.)

PEREZ V. UNITED STATES (1971) upheld the application of the federal loanshark statute to purely intrastate extortion on the ground that Congress had rationally found that organized crime was interstate in character, obtaining a substantial part of its income from loansharking which to a substantial extent was carried on in interstate and foreign commerce or through instrumentalities of such commerce. Unmentioned rationales might have been the difficulty of proving that loansharking in a particular case had an interstate connection and the belief that it was necessary to prohibit all loansharking as an appropriate means of prohibiting those acts that did affect interstate commerce.

In Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining and Reclamation Association (1981) the Court unanimously upheld federal regulation of surface or strip coal mining operations, rejecting the contention that this was merely a regulation of land use not committed to the federal government. There had been legislative findings that surface coal mining causes water pollution and flooding of navigable streams and that it harms productive farm land and hardwood forests in many parts of the country. The Court found, following Darby, that this was a means of preventing destructive interstate competition favoring the producers with the lowest mining and reclamation standards, that Congress can regulate the conditions under which goods shipped in interstate commerce are produced when that in itself affects interstate commerce, and that the commerce power permits federal regulation of activities causing air or water pollution, or other environmental hazards that may have effects in more than one state.

The more recent decisions, which in some respects went far beyond the classical statements as to the modern scope of the commerce power in Darby and Wickard v. Filburn, were expected and accepted with little comment or concern. The country now appears to recognize that the national government should have and does have power under the commerce clause to deal with problems that do not limit themselves to individual states—as Chief Justice Marshall had declared in 1824, though doubtless with no idea of how far that principle would eventually be carried.

The enlargement of the commerce power since 1789 is attributable not to the predilections of judges but to such inventions as steamboats, railroads, motor vehicles, airplanes, the telegraph, telephone, radio, and television. When the nation was young, composed mainly of farms and small towns, there was little interstate trade, except by water or near state lines. Now persons and goods can cross the continent in less time than a traveler in 1789 would have taken to reach a town thirty miles away. Business and the economy have adjusted to these changes. Somewhat more slowly than the people and Congress, the Supreme Court has recognized that an integrated national economy is predominantly interstate or related to interstate commerce, and must be subject to governmental control on a national basis.

The expansion of the concept of interstate commerce and of the subjects which Congress can regulate under the commerce power was not accompanied by a contraction of the powers of the states. Only those state laws that discriminate against or unduly burden interstate commerce are forbidden.

ROBERT L. STERN
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Dormant Commerce Clause.)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1959 The Commerce Power versus States Rights. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

FRANKFURTER, FELIX 1937 The Commerce Clause under Marshall, Taney and Waite. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

GAVIT, BERNARD C. 1932 Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution. Bloomington, Ind.: Principia Press.

STERN, ROBERT L. 1934 That Commerce Which Concerns More States Than One. Harvard Law Review 47:1335–1366.

——— 1946 The Commerce Clause and the National Economy, 1933–1946. Harvard Law Review 59:645–693, 883–947.

——— 1951 The Problems of Yesteryear—Commerce and Due Process. Vanderbilt Law Review 4:446–468.

——— 1955 The 1955 Ross Prize Essay: The Scope of the Phrase "Interstate Commerce." American Bar Association Journal 41:823–826, 871–874.

——— 1973 The Commerce Clause Revisited—The Federalization of Interstate Crime. Arizona Law Review 15:271–285.

COMMERCE COURT

In 1910 Congress established the Commerce Court, with the JURISDICTION, formerly held by the district courts and courts of appeals, to review decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC). Although the ICC acquiesced in the establishment of the new court, acceptance soon turned to opposition. The Commerce Court reversed the ICC's decisions in a number of important cases, and congressional Democrats saw the court as a threat to the program of railroad regulation. Two 1912 bills to abolish the court were vetoed by President WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT. In 1913, a third abolition bill received President WOODROW WILSON's blessing.

The creation of specialized federal courts is often proposed but not often enacted. The short, unhappy life of the Commerce Court is regularly offered as a cautionary tale.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

DIX, GEORGE E. 1964 The Death of the Commerce Court: A Study in Institutional Weakness. American Journal of Legal History 8:238–260.

COMMERCIAL SPEECH

Until 1976 "commercial speech"—a vague category encompassing advertisements, invitations to deal, credit or financial reports, prospectuses, and the like—was subject to broad regulatory authority, with little or no protection from the FIRST AMENDMENT. The early decisions, epitomized by Valentine v. Chrestensen (1942), followed the then characteristic judicial approach of defining certain subject-matter categories of expression as wholly outside the scope of First Amendment protection. Under this TWO-LEVEL THEORY, a "definitional" mode of First Amendment adjudication, commercial speech was considered to be, along with OBSCENITY, and LIBEL, outside First Amendment protection.

When facing combinations of unprotected commercial speech and protected political speech in subsequent cases, the Court made First Amendment protection turn on the primary purpose of the advertisement. Thus, in MURDOCK V. PENNSYLVANIA (1943), the Court struck down an ordinance requiring solicitors of orders for goods to get a license and pay a fee as it applied to Jehovah's Witnesses who sold religious pamphlets while seeking religious converts. On the other hand, in Bread v. Alexandria (1951) the Court held that a door-to-door salesman of national magazine subscriptions was subject to a town ordinance barring such sales techniques, because his primary purpose was to sell magazines rather than to disseminate ideas.

The "primary purpose" test unraveled in NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964), more prominently known for another rejection of the definitional approaches in its holding that defamation is not beyond First Amendment protection. In Sullivan, the New York Times had printed an allegedly defamatory advertisement soliciting funds for civil rights workers. Although the advertisement's primary purpose was, arguably, to raise money, the Court held that it was protected by the First Amendment because it "communicated information, expressed opinion, recited grievances, protested claimed abuses, and sought financial support on behalf of a movement whose existence and objectives are matters of the highest public interest and concern."

Recent decisions have gone well beyond Sullivan and moved advertising and other commercial speech—political or not—within the protection of the First Amendment. In the leading case, VIRGINIA PHARMACY BOARD V. VIRGINIA CITIZENS CONSUMER COUNCIL (1976), the Court struck down a state ban on prescription drug price advertising. The Court rejected the state's "highly paternalistic approach," preferring a system in which "people will perceive their own best interests if only they are well enough informed, and that the best means to that end is to open the channels of communication rather than to close them." The Court cautioned, however, that because untruthful speech has never been protected for its own sake government may take effective action against false and misleading advertisements. And it indicated a greater scope for regulating false or misleading commercial speech than is permitted in relation to false political statements, such as defamations of public officials, because advertising is more easily verifiable and is less likely to be "chilled" by regulation because it is a commercial necessity.

Virginia Pharmacy Board fixed the principle that advertising may be controlled when it is false, misleading, or takes undue advantage of its audience; but the case left open the issue whether whole categories of commercial speech deemed inherently misleading or difficult to police can be suppressed. This issue divided the Supreme Court with respect to lawyers' advertising, when a narrow majority extended First Amendment protection to price advertising of routine legal services, rejecting the dissenters' claim that the complex and variegated nature of legal services gave lawyers' advertising a high potential for deception and impeded effective regulation of particular deceptions. However, the Court held that "ambulance chasing"—in-person solicitation of accident victims for pecuniary gain—could be barred entirely because of its potential for deception and overbearing.

Where regulation of commercial expression is not directed at potential deception but intended to advance other interests such as aesthetics or conservation, the Supreme Court has followed a relatively permissive approach to state regulatory interests, while becoming hopelessly fragmented about the First Amendment principles that ought to govern. Thus, in Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego (1981) a shifting majority coalition of Justices made clear that commercial billboards could be entirely banned in a city for aesthetic or traffic safety reasons. Recent decisions, following CENTRAL HUDSON GAS V. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (1980), have fashioned a four-part test to appraise the validity of restrictions on commercial speech. Protection will not be extended to commercial speech that is, on the whole, misleading or that encourages unlawful activity. Even protected commercial speech may be regulated if the state has a substantial interest, if the regulation directly advances that interest, and if the regulation is no broader than necessary to effectuate the state's interest. The elastic properties of this four-part test in actual application have generated considerable disarray within the Supreme Court.

The commercial speech decisions of the BURGER COURT have made clear that freedom of expression principles extend beyond political and religious expression, protecting not only the MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS but expression in the marketplace itself. Second, in affirming relatively broad regulatory power over commercial speech, even though it is deemed to be protected by the First Amendment, the Court has reinforced the notion that the First Amendment extends different levels of protection to different types of speech. The commercial speech decisions thus lend support to Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON'S OBITER DICTUM in KOVACS V. COOPER (1949) that under the First Amendment each type and medium of expression "is a law unto itself."

BENNO C. SCHMIDT, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

JACKSON, THOMAS H. and JEFFRIES, J. C., JR. 1979 Commercial Speech: Economic Due Process and the First Amendment. Virginia Law Review 65:1–41.

WEINBERG, JONATHON 1982 Constitutional Protection of Commercial Speech. Columbia Law Review 82:720–750.

COMMERCIAL SPEECH
(Update 1)

For most of this century commercial speech was regarded as outside the scope of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Indeed, the Supreme Court so held in 1942. But in 1976 the Supreme Court reversed course in the case of VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY V. VIRGINIA CITIZENS' CONSUMER COUNCIL. There the Court held that Virginia had violated the First Amendment by prohibiting pharmacists from advertising prices of prescription drugs. The Court was unpersuaded that the state's fear that product advertising would lower the "professional" character of the practice of pharmacy outweighed the First Amendment interest in open competition of information and ideas, even about products of commerce.

In 1980 in CENTRAL HUDSON GAS ELECTRIC CORPORATION V. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, the Court announced a four-part test for deciding when commercial speech is entitled to First Amendment protection. To determine whether commercial speech is protected, the Court held, it must be found that the speech concerns a lawful activity and is not misleading, that "the regulation directly advances the governmental interest asserted," and that the regulation "is not more extensive than is necessary to serve that interest." Applying that standard to the case before it, the Court invalidated a Public Service Commission regulation that prohibited electrical utilities from engaging in promotional advertising. While the Court acknowledged that the commission's purpose was legitimate (namely, to conserve energy), the commission's case failed in the Court's view because there was no showing that this legitimate purpose could not be achieved by regulation less intrusive on First Amendment interests.

In recent years the Supreme Court has seemed to retreat from the Central Hudson trend of extending broader First Amendment rights when it comes to protection of commercial speech. In a major decision in 1986 in POSADAS DE PUERTO RICO ASSOCIATES V. TOURISM COMPANY, the Court upheld a Puerto Rican government regulation that forbade casino advertising directed at Puerto Rican residents; advertising aimed at tourists, on the other hand, was permitted. Though casino gambling was legal in Puerto Rico, and though the advertising prohibited was neither misleading nor fraudulent, the Court held that the government's interest in avoiding the debilitating effects of gambling on the internal culture of Puerto Rico was "substantial," that the restriction "directly advanced" that goal, and that the legislature could reasonably conclude that residents would "be induced by widespread advertising to engage in such potentially harmful conduct." The Court refused to require Puerto Rico to use means other than an advertising prohibition to achieve its goal of discouraging gambling by residents. The Court reasoned that, because casino gambling could be prohibited entirely, that power "includes the lesser power to ban advertising of casino gambling."

The Posadas case seems a step backward from the direction taken in Virginia Pharmacy and Central Hudson for two reasons. First, it appears to signal that the Court will not demand that governments demonstrate the inadequacy of nonspeech restrictive measures in controlling supposedly harmful effects of commercial speech. While Central Hudson required the state to "demonstrat[e] that its interest in conservation cannot be protected adequately by more limited regulation," Posadas was satisfied by the assumption that the legislature "could" conclude, as it "apparently did," that alternative remedies were insufficient. The Court explicitly articulated this limitation in the Central Hudson formula in BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF STATE UNIVERSITY OF NEW YORK V. FOX (1989).

Second, the Court's reasoning in Posadas that the state's potential power to forbid gambling includes the power to regulate the speech itself even when gambling is not prohibited raises serious questions about the continuing strength of earlier decisions protective of commercial speech. In Virginia Pharmacy, for example, although prescription drugs presumably could have been banned by Virginia, that fact did not stop the Court from holding that a ban on advertising for such drugs was unconstitutional.

The most that can be said at the present time about the commercial speech doctrine is that it is not yet on a consistent track, although some level of First Amendment protection for commercial speech is now firmly established.

LEE C. BOLLINGER
(1992)

COMMERCIAL SPEECH
(Update 2)

Since 1976, the Supreme Court has reviewed FIRST AMENDMENT challenges to regulations affecting "commercial speech" under a standard of intermediate scrutiny. To meet that standard, established in CENTRAL HUDSON GAS AND ELECTRIC CORP. V. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (1980), a law dictating or restricting the manner, extent, or content of commercial matter must be a law for which a substantial showing can be furnished of actual (rather than merely speculative) need, and of adequate justification in light of the kind and extent of regulation or restriction it enacts.

Protecting consumers from false or misleading information in commercial representations is a typical interest of sufficiently substantial weight to count heavily in this area, as the opinions of the Court readily admit. Regulations requiring various disclosures such as a product's actual price, ingredients, and full effects (including its effects on the environment, insofar as these, too, may be regarded as important for the consumer to understand) generally tend to be sustained in the courts. The commercial speaker may be constrained to make far more elaborate disclosures in his representations than he might wish to do, or than others not subject to the Central Hudson test (for example, candidates for public office) can be compelled to declare. He may likewise be held far more strictly responsible for the accuracy of his affirmative representations in what he presents in his publicity for his product or services, consistent with Central Hudson. Subject to meeting the other requirements of the Central Hudson test, regulations competently drawn to serve these objectives tend not to be intrusively second-guessed in the courts. It is left quite substantially to the discretion of legislative bodies and to specialized regulatory agencies (such as the Food and Drug Administration and the Federal Trade Commission), moreover, to determine the particular boundary lines—of how much disclosure or in what detail, and of what kind of affirmative claims may or may not be asserted, and on the strength of what measure of empirical support—such as the regulatory agency may require.

In contrast, a restriction severely limiting the time, place, or manner of advertising a particular product or service, not to protect the public from anything identifiably either false or misleading in such commercial material, but rather to protect a competitor's market (whether of the same good or a rival product) is far less likely to be sustained in the courts under the Central Hudson test. It may fail at the first step. For insulating certain producers or products from losing market hegemony or market share to competing goods, of whatever importance it may be asserted to have in the minds of legislators, is generally not regarded by the Court as a suitable justification for biasing the manner and extent to which the public receives equally accurate information respecting those respective products, such as each may be.

To be sure, insofar as the legislature may decide to favor certain producers over others (such as dairy farmers producing butter over producers of equally nutritious, lower-cost nondairy substitutes), it may do so with little First Amendment hindrance, virtually as it may choose to do by other means, for example, by imposing a higher tax on the legislatively disfavored product or by providing some kind of price support for the favored product as it may see fit to do. Still, the Court has suggested, it may not by the same gesture attempt to manipulate consumer response by the different technique of biasing what the public may merely learn about each product by denying an equal freedom of (truthful, accurate) commercial communication. Proceeding in this information-biasing way, in the view of the Court, is generally foreclosed by the First Amendment itself. While some critics have wondered over the point, the distinction for the Court is quite clear. The legislature may "fix the fight" between product rivals to a very considerable extent, even by tying one boxer's legs or arms (as imposing a nearly prohibitive tax upon his product may do), but yet may not do so by putting a gag in one fighter's mouth, stopping his breath.

The First Amendment is quintessentially concerned with gags on speech. When gags are used, the burden of justification on government under Central Hudson tends at once to rise, even as it sharply does as in the more ordinary instance of political or social advocacy speech. A compelling justification must be provided, and insulating preferred producers of preferred products from having to contend with comparative claims, no less accurate or truthful than their own, is unlikely to suffice.

As an additional consideration pursuant to the Central Hudson test, even more conventional regulations (including those discussed earlier respecting what must be disclosed in commercial material in order to make the advertisement permissible), must in each instance have a reasonably close fit to the problem to which they are allegedly addressed. This general requirement of "close fit," in turn, has two matching elements or bookends. On the one side, the law enacted to meet an alleged need must meet it in substantial (not insubstantial) fashion, that is, in a fashion likely to make a real and significant difference rather than very little difference at all. On the other side, the restriction or regulation must not extend further than can be fairly defended in terms of the need it is alleged to be appropriate to meet.

In this latter respect, current commercial speech DOCTRINE has picked up protection from what has been elsewhere described as the First Amendment legislative vice of OVERBREADTH, albeit not yet with all of the consequences that that doctrine has meant in its aplication to laws affecting political, rather than commercial, speech. Specifically, a law on its face prohibiting a greater range of political utterance than the First Amendment will tolerate a legislature to prohibit may risk the fate of being held unconstitutional on its face, solely on that account. It may be impugned even at the behest of one with respect to whom there is no question that his conduct was not merely well within the coverage of the statute, but was conduct itself not protected by the First Amendment. Even so, he is nonetheless able to escape any sanction for his conduct by having the statute declared "void on its face," fatally tainted by its "overbreadth" per se.

Here, however, there is this significant difference. An equivalently "overly broad" restriction on commercial spech may not be as easily impugned—and probably cannot by a party whose conduct it clearly fits, and as to whom there is no First Amendment problem in its application to him. Rather, insofar as the commercial speech restriction may go too far, it may await a person with better STANDING to be heard on that complaint. So, in this respect, the extent to which commercial speech may claim First Amendment protection remains significantly short of that accorded political or social advocacy speech.

Even so, overall the now-revised Central Hudson test has somewhat more First Amendment "bite" than some of its earlier applications by the Court implied. Moreover, this is especially true as it bears on LEGISLATION or regulations that seek to suppress commercial information, rather than to assure its accuracy and completeness, or rather than merely to channel it in various ways. Thus, even as some of the preceding review has already suggested, recent decisions of the Court strongly suggest that where the regulation is one that reflects a desire more to keep the public "underinformed" of certain goods or services than merely to insure it is not deceived or misled, the burden on the state to sustain its commercial speech restrictions may be stepped up to a significant degree. Indeed, suppression of advertisements for products or services a legislature may not wish the public to have brought to their attention ranks hardly better with several members of the current Court than suppression of advertisements for candidates, ballot issues, or for particular books or films a legislature would as readily suppress and keep from public attention, were it free to do so (which it is not). Thus, while legislature authority to channel commercial speech is doubtless greater than its power to direct or channel political speech, yet it is very far from being absolute.

And, in this respect, the Court's suggestion in POSADAS DE PUERTO RICO ASSOCIATES V. TOURISM COMPANY (1986), that a legislature may totally forbid any advertising by any business it would otherwise have the power to forbid to exist or compete at all, is no longer valid. Not only has a majority of the Court now squarely held against that proposition (rather, any restriction must meet the Central Hudson test at a minimum), but Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, who first offered it as an alternative holding in Posadas, has also now laid it aside. (See 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 1996; Greater New Orleans Broadcasting Ass'n v. United States, 1999.) Commercial speech has thus achieved a strengthened intermediate level of First Amendment protection more robust than before its assimilation began, a mere quarter of a century ago, in Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Counsumer Council (1976).

WILLIAM W. VAN ALSTYNE
(2000)

COMMITTEE FOR PUBLIC EDUCATION AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY v. NYQUIST
413 U.S. 752 (1973)
SLOAN v. LEMON
413 U.S. 825 (1973)

These cases, said Justice LEWIS F. POWELL in his opinion for a 6–3 SUPREME COURT, "involve an intertwining of societal and constitutional issues of the greatest importance." After LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971), New York State sought to aid private sectarian schools and the parents of children in them by various financial plans purporting to maintain the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. Avowing concern for the health and safety of the children, the state provided direct financial grants to "qualifying" schools for maintenance costs. But as Justice Powell observed, "virtually all" were Roman Catholic schools, and the grants had the inevitable effect of subsidizing religious education, thus abridging the FIRST AMENDMENT's prohibition against an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. New York, as well as Pennsylvania, also provided for the reimbursement of tuition paid by parents who sent their children to nonpublic sectarian schools; New York also had an optional tax relief plan. The Court found that the reimbursement plans constituted grants whose effect was the same as grants made directly to the institutions, thereby advancing religion. The tax benefit plan had the same unconstitutional result, because the deduction, like the grant, involved an expense to the state for the purpose of religious education. The Court distinguished outright tax exemptions of church property for reasons given in WALZ V. TAX COMMISSION (1970). By distinguishing Nyquist in MUELLER V. ALLEN (1983), the Court sustained the constitutionality of a tax benefit plan that aided the parents of children in nonpublic sectarian schools.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

COMMITTEE FOR PUBLIC EDUCATION AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY v. REGAN
444 U.S. 646 (1980)

A New York statute directed the reimbursement to nonpublic schools of costs incurred by them in complying with certain state-mandated requirements, including the administration of standardized tests. The participation of church-related schools in this program was challenged as an unconstitutional ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, but the Supreme Court rejected the challenge.

Justice BYRON R. WHITE, writing for a narrowly divided Court, noted that a previous New York law authorizing reimbursement for test services performed by nonpublic schools had been found unconstitutional in Levitt v. Committee (1973). However, the new statute, unlike its predecessor, provided for state audit of school financial records to insure that public monies were used only for secular purposes.

Justice HARRY BLACKMUN, with whom Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and THURGOOD MARSHALL joined, dissented. Blackmun stressed that New York's program involved direct payments by the state to a school engaged in a religious enterprise. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS also filed a brief dissent.

Committee v. Regan is another illustration of the blurred nature of the line the Court has attempted to draw between permissible and impermissible state support to church-related schools.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

COMMON LAW
(Anglo-American)

The common law is a system of principles and rules grounded in universal custom or natural law and developed, articulated, and applied by courts in a process designed for the resolution of individual controversies. In this general sense, the common law is the historic basis of all Anglo-American legal systems. It is also an important element in the origin and plan of the United States Constitution.

Though sometimes characterized as "unwritten" in reference to their ultimate source, the principles and rules of the Anglo-American common law are in fact found in thousands of volumes of written judicial opinions reporting the grounds of decision in countless individual cases adjudicated over the course of centuries. The process that produced this body of law has three important aspects. First, common law principles and rules derive their legitimacy from the adversary process of litigation. They are valid only if they are HOLDINGS, that is, propositions necessary to the resolution of actual controversies. Second, the common law is applied through a characteristic reasoning process that compares the facts of the present case to the facts of earlier cases. The holdings of those earlier cases are PRECEDENTS, which must be followed unless their facts can be distinguished or unless they can be overruled because their grounds are deemed unsound in light of changing social conditions or policy. In the latter situation, or if no existing precedent is applicable, a new rule may be fashioned from the logic of related rules or underlying principle. Third, the common law is a process in the procedural sense. Litigation is governed by rules designed to shape issues of fact and law so that a case may be fairly and efficiently presented to and decided by the jury, the traditional mode of trial.

The principles and rules of the common law grow and change within this threefold process at the initiative of parties to litigation as they bring forward issues falling outside, or challenging, existing precedents. The common law may also be changed by legislative enactment, but in Anglo-American countries legislation is relied on chiefly to supplement or revise or codify the common law in specific situations.

The Anglo-American common law evolved from decisions of the three great English courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, which were firmly established by the end of the thirteenth century. These courts, though created under the royal prerogative, became effectively independent by virtue of their ancient origins and the prestige and life tenure of their judges.

By the time of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, two strands were apparent in the English common law. The private law, which developed in actions between subjects, included complex DOCTRINES of property, contract, and tort appropriate to a sophisticated landed and commercial society. The public law, product of actions in which the king was a litigant, consisted of rules defining and limiting his political and fiscal prerogatives, defining criminal conduct as a reflection of his role as peacekeeper, and establishing a series of procedural rights accorded to the criminally accused. In the largely unwritten English constitution, Parliament as supreme sovereign had power to alter or abolish even the most fundamental common law rules, but by convention basic governmental institutions and individual rights were ordinarily beyond legislative change.

The English common law had by 1776 been received in the American colonies. The full array of English law books was the source of common law principles and rules, and the courts followed the common law process. Though the colonists argued otherwise, the English view was that colonial reception of the common law was a matter of grace, not right. In legal theory, the colonies, as the king's dominions, were directly governed by the prerogative, free of common law constraints. Colonial governmental powers were expressly granted and defined by charter or statute. King and Parliament, when England's interests demanded, would set aside rights guaranteed by the common law. As the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE shows, the Revolution was in part fought to rectify violations of charter grants of legislative and judicial power and invasions of individual rights such as TRIAL BY JURY and freedom from unreasonable SEARCH AND SEIZURE.

In reaction to the prerevolutionary experience, the people of the United States asserted SOVEREIGNTY through the federal and state constitutions, under which the executive, legislative, and judiciary were separate branches subject to the written FUNDAMENTAL LAW. The constitutions, however, were adopted against a common law backdrop. The states had expressly received the common law, assuming that their courts would develop it through application of the common law process. The federal Constitution contained no express reception provision, but it did authorize Congress to establish federal courts with JURISDICTION over cases arising under federal law and between citizens of diverse citizenship. Once the federal courts were established, important and difficult questions arose concerning their power to develop a FEDERAL COMMON LAW.

The result of two centuries of learned disputation is that today there is little federal common law. The Supreme Court in ERIE RAILROAD V. TOMPKINS (1938) settled the most enduring controversy by holding that in diversity-of-citizenship cases federal courts must apply the common law as though they were courts of the states where they sit, overruling Justice JOSEPH STORY's famous contrary decision in SWIFT V. TYSON (1842). Earlier the Court had concluded, as DUE PROCESS might have required, that there was no FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES, even where federal interests were involved. In civil matters affecting federal interests the Court has held that there is no general federal common law, but the federal courts may articulate common law rules to supplement a comprehensive federal statutory scheme or implement an EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION. These results are consistent with the basic premise of FEDERALISM that the national government is one of limited powers and other powers are reserved to the states, or to the people.

While the federal Constitution did not adopt the common law as a general rule of decision, many of its specific provisions were of common law origin. In its delineation of the SEPARATION OF POWERS, the Constitution incorporated common law limitations upon the prerogative and Parliament which had been honored in England and disregarded in the colonies. The BILL OF RIGHTS, adopted in part because of doubts about the existence and efficacy of a federal common law, codified specific common law procedural rights accorded the criminally accused. It also incorporated common law protections of more fundamental interests, including that basic guarantee of reason and fairness in governmental action, the right to due process of law.

Most important, the common law process has enabled the federal judiciary to attain its intended position in the constitutional plan. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's opinion in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), asserting judicial power to review legislation and declare it unconstitutional, was founded on the common law obligation of courts to apply all the relevant law, including the Constitution, in deciding cases. A declaration of unconstitutionality in one case is effective in other similar situations because of the force of precedent. In refining Marbury's principle, the Supreme Court more recently has developed the doctrine of JUSTICIABILITY, designed to establish in constitutional cases the existence of a truly adversary CASE OR CONTROVERSY, to which decision of a constitutional issue is necessary. Together, these rules, by proclaiming that the federal courts are confined to the traditional common law judicial role, provide both legitimacy and effectiveness to court enforcement of the Constitution's limits upon the powers of the other branches and the states.

L. KINVIN WROTH
(1986)

Bibliography

GOEBEL, JULIUS, JR. 1971 Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801. Volume 1 of The Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Macmillan.

LLEWELLYN, KARL N. 1960 The Common Law Tradition: Deciding Appeals. Boston: Little, Brown.

PLUCKNETT, THEODORE F. T. (1929) 1956 A Concise History of the Common Law. Boston: Little, Brown.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

COMMON LAW, CONSTITUTIONAL

See: Constitutional Common Law

COMMON LAW, FEDERAL CIVIL

See: Federal Common Law, Civil

COMMON LAW, FEDERAL CRIMINAL

See: Federal Common Law of Crimes

COMMONWEALTH v. ALGER

See: State Police Power

COMMONWEALTH v. AVES
18 Pickering (Mass.) 193 (1836)

This became the nation's leading case on sojourner slaves. It posed an unprecedented question: can a slave brought temporarily into a free state be restrained of liberty and be removed from the state on the master's return? Chief Justice LEMUEL SHAW rejected the contention that COMITY between the states compelled recognition of the laws of the master's domicile. SLAVERY, Shaw replied, was so odious that only positive local law recognized it. (See SOMERSET'S CASE.) In Massachusetts slavery was unconstitutional. Any nonfugitive slave entering Massachusetts became free because no local law warranted restraint and local laws could prevent involuntary removal.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

COMMONWEALTH v. CATON
4 Call's (Va.) Reports (1782)

Decided by the highest court of Virginia in 1782, this case is a disputed precedent for the legitimacy of JUDICIAL REVIEW. The state constitution of 1776, which did not empower courts to void enactments in conflict with the constitution, authorized the governor to grant pardons except in impeachment cases. A statute on TREASON deprived the governor of his PARDONING POWER and vested it in the general assembly. Caton, having been sentenced to death for treason, claimed a pardon granted by the lower house, though the upper house refused to concur. The court had only to rule that the pardon was not valid.

Call's unreliable report of the case, a reconstruction made in 1827, indicates that the court considered the constitutionality of the statute on treason and that seven of the eight judges were of the opinion that the court had the power to declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional, though the court unanimously held the act constitutional. In fact, only one of the eight judges ruled the act unconstitutional, one held that it had no power to so rule, and another, GEORGE WYTHE, declared that the court had the power but need not exercise it in this case; he decided that the pardon had no force of law because it was not in conformity with the disputed act, which he found constitutional. A majority of the court, including Chief Justice EDMUND PENDLETON and Chancellor JOHN BLAIR, declined to decide the question whether they had the power to declare an act unconstitutional. Writing to JAMES MADISON a week later, Pendleton reported, "The great Constitutional question . . . was determined . . . by 6 Judges against two, that the Treason Act was not at variance with the Constitution but a proper exercise of the Power reserved to the Legislature by the latter. . . ." Both houses subsequently granted the pardon. The legitimacy of the case as a precedent for judicial review is doubtful.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

COMMONWEALTH v. JENNISON
(Massachusetts, 1783, Unreported)

In 1781 Quock Walker, a Massachusetts slave, left his master, Nathaniel Jennison, to work as a hired laborer for Seth and John Caldwell. Jennison went to the Caldwell farm, seized Walker, beat him severely, and brought him home where he was locked up.

Three legal cases resulted from this event. In Walker v. Jennison (1781) Walker sued his former master for assault and battery. A jury ruled Walker was a free man and awarded him fifty pounds in damages. Jennison then successfully sued the Caldwells for twenty-five pounds for enticing away his "slave property." This decision was overturned by a jury in Caldwell v. Jennison (1781). Here attorney LEVI LINCOLN paraphrased arguments from SOMERSET V. STEWART (1772) in a stirring speech against slavery. In 1783 Jennison was convicted under a criminal INDICTMENT for assault and battery against Walker (Commonwealth v. Jennison). Chief Justice WILLIAM CUSHING charged the jury that the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 abolished slavery by declaring "All men are born free and equal. . . ." Although some blacks were held as slaves after these cases, the litigation, known collectively as the "Quock Walker Cases," was instrumental in ending the peculiar institution in Massachusetts.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

FINKELMAN, PAUL 1981 An Imperfect Union: Slavery, Federalism, and Comity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

COMMONWEALTH v. SACCO AND VANZETTI
(Massachusetts, 1921)

On August 23, 1927, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts electrocuted two Italian immigrants, Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, for the crimes of armed robbery and murder. The executions stirred angry protest in the United States and throughout the world by millions of people who believed that the two men had been denied a fair trial because of their ethnic background and political opinions.

Sacco and Vanzetti, ALIENS and anarchists who had fled to Mexico to avoid the draft during WORLD WAR I, were arrested in 1920 and quickly brought to trial in Dedham, Massachusetts, for the murder of a paymaster and a guard during the robbery of a shoe factory. The trial took place at the end of the postwar Red Scare in a political atmosphere charged with hysteria against foreigners and radicals. Although the ballistics evidence was inconclusive and many witnesses, most of them Italian, placed the two men elsewhere at the time of the robbery, the jury returned guilty verdicts after listening to patriotic harangues from the chief prosecutor, Frederick Katzmann, and the trial judge, Webster Bradley Thayer.

During his cross-examination of the two defendants, Katzmann constantly emphasized their unorthodox political views and their flight to Mexico during the war. Thayer tolerated a broad range of political questions, mocked the two men's anarchism, and urged the members of the jury to act as "true soldiers . . . in the spirit of supreme American loyalty."

A diverse coalition of Bay State aristocrats, law professors such as FELIX FRANKFURTER, Italian radicals, and New York intellectuals attempted to secure a new trial for the condemned men during the next seven years. They marshaled an impressive amount of evidence pointing to Thayer's prejudice, the doubts of key prosecution witnesses, and the possibility that the crime had been committed by a gang of professional outlaws. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, however, relying on principles of trial court discretion that made it virtually impossible to challenge any of Thayer's rulings, spurned these appeals and refused to disturb either the verdict or the death sentences. A similar conclusion was reached by a special commission appointed by Governor Alvan T. Fuller and headed by Harvard University president A. Lawrence Lowell.

Last-minute efforts to secure a stay of execution from federal judges, including Supreme Court Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, also proved unavailing. Attorneys for Sacco and Vanzetti argued that because of Thayer's hostility their clients had been denied a FAIR TRIAL guaranteed by the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. But with the exception of MOORE V. DEMPSEY (1923), where a state murder trial had been intimidated by a mob, the Supreme Court had shown great reluctance to intervene in local criminal proceedings. "I cannot think that prejudice on the part of a presiding judge however strong would deprive the Court of jurisdiction," wrote Holmes, "and in my opinion nothing short of a want of legal power to decide the case authorizes me to interfere. . . ." Whether Sacco and Vanzetti received a fair trial is questionable; however, Francis Russell has shown how illusory is the old contention that they were wholly innocent.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

Bibliography

JOUGHN, G. LOUIS and MORGAN, EDMUND M. 1948 The Legacy of Sacco and Vanzetti. New York: Harcourt, Brace.

RUSSELL, FRANCIS 1962 Tragedy in Dedham: The Story of the Sacco-Vanzetti Case. New York: Harper & Row.

COMMONWEALTH STATUS

Commonwealths are TERRITORIES in free association with the United States, enjoying virtual autonomy in internal affairs but subject to the United States in foreign and defense matters. Citizens of commonwealths are citizens of the United States: they pay federal taxes and may move freely to, from, and within the United States. Public officials are elected by the people of the commonwealths and neither the officials nor their acts require approval by the President or Congress. Constitutional limitations on state legislation are applicable to commonwealth legislation; and APPEAL lies from the highest court of a commonwealth to the Supreme Court of the United States. When Congress established commonwealth status for the Philippines in 1934 it intended an interim state en route to independence, but commonwealth status has become a practically permanent condition for PUERTO RICO and the Northern Marianas.

The basis of the commonwealth relationship is a "covenant" between the American people and the people of the territory. Since Congress's authority to ratify the covenant derives from its plenary power over territories (Article IV, section 3, clause 2), most legal authorities maintain that Congress could repeal the covenant and impose direct rule. But any attempt to do so would constitute a grievous breach of faith and would excite overwhelming domestic and international political opposition.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

COMMUNICATIONS ACT
48 Stat. 1064 (1934)

The Communications Act of 1934, enacted under Congress's COMMERCE POWER, provides the statutory basis for federal regulation of BROADCASTING and electronic communication. The act describes the electromagnetic spectrum as a national resource and permits private parties to use portions of it only as trustees in the public interest. To administer its provisions the act established the seven-member Federal Communications Commission (FCC), authorizing it to make regulations with the force of law and to issue licenses to broadcasters that may be granted, renewed, or revoked in accordance with "public interest, convenience, and necessity." Under the authority of the act the FCC has promulgated the FAIRNESS DOCTRINE, requiring broadcasters to provide equal time for replies to controversial messages, as well as regulations to prohibit the broadcasting of OBSCENITY.

The act was based on both technological and ideological considerations. The assumption that broadcasting channels are extremely limited has been disproved by improvements in technology; however, the ideological bias in favor of public ownership and regulation has not yet been overcome. Because of the Supreme Court's deference to Congress's findings of LEGISLATIVE FACT regarding the scarcity of broadcasting channels, as embodied in the Communications Act, in the face of the manifest reality that such channels are far more numerous than, for example, presses capable of producing a major metropolitan newspaper or an encyclopedia, the protection afforded broadcasters' FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS is significantly reduced.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

COMMUNICATIONS AND COMMUNITY

The essence of community—indeed, its sine qua non—is communications. In terms of constitutionalism, the question arises as to the role of government intervention in the structure of BROADCASTING and other forms of communication to foster or reshape communities. The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) in the United States has, for example, encouraged minority ownership of broadcast channels or, more directly, minority-related programming, as a means (in part) of strengthening certain notions of community. In Europe, the Television Without Frontiers Directive imposed European quotas on national broadcasters to help frame a European information space. In some highly restricted societies that consider control of imagery essential to a notion of community—such as Iran and Iraq—government intervention to affect the pictures and words that swirl into the minds of its citizens is an important art form.

"Community" has informed much of American broadcast policy. It is reflected in the original allocation patterns of radio frequencies. In 1927, and then again in 1934, Congress determined that each local community should have a radio station—that allocations should be designed not to favor a regional or national market, but one that has local roots. This pattern of allocation of licenses based on cities and towns, rather than vast regions, was the chief characteristic of the 1954 Table of Allocations for television frequencies, and it is that pattern that is the imprint of broadcasting in the United States today. In a famous FCC publication, the 1947 Blue Book, the Commission stressed the importance of the broadcaster as a "mouthpiece" for the community, and local management and ownership were big advantages in contested applications for licenses.

One haunting question, always, was whether this emphasis on community was a sham—merely a way for congressional representatives to deliver wealth to individuals within their districts—with the inevitable rise of national impersonal networks and the transfer of licenses to impersonal chains or groups. Artifacts of community included, for example, a requirement that station management go through a formal ascertainment process, asking local leaders what issues were important to the community, with the assumption that this survey would yield coverage in news. But ascertainment was mechanical, and, often, there was no enforcement mechanism to ensure that community needs were met.

A combination of cynicism about the values and practice of localism, recognition of vast changes in ownership, and constitutional doubts about federal requirements (or even pressure) toward localism led in the 1980s to the abandonment of most of the regulatory architecture underlying the allocation of stations to communities. There is no more ascertainment requirement, no more integration of ownership and management, and even no requirement of local news and public affairs. In TURNER BROADCASTING SYSTEM V. FCC (1994), the Supreme Court implied that requiring local coverage (or, in this case, preferring over-the-air channels for mandatory coverage on cable), might not be "content neutral" and, therefore, might mean that legislation would have to surmount the very high STRICT SCRUTINY hurdle to be constitutional.

The Court's growing hostility to AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs imposed by government also led to the withering away of the minority preference program, with its implications for the use of broadcasting to enhance the place of African Americans, Hispanics, and others within the United States community. In METRO BROADCASTING, INC. V. FCC (1990), the Court narrowly affirmed a minority preference in contested license applications, but the reasoning was wan, and the constitutional support for intervention to assist in community-building of this sort was moving in the wrong direction. Metro Broadcasting was undermined in ADARAND CONSTRUCTION, INC. V. PEÑA (1995).

Cable television, too, saw a playing, at the edges, with the use of communications to build community. Tied to the idea that cities had control of the streets and the physical space for wires, cable television became franchised, almost universally, at the local level. As a result, applicants for valuable licenses boasted how adoption of their systems would mean more community-building in the franchise area. Operators guaranteed local studios, channel space for local government and local schools, and public access channels. These became known as PEG (Public Access, Educational and Governmental) commitments. Congress, in the 1984 Cable Act, while precluding much local control over program content, continued to permit franchises to contain these PEG requirements. The constitutionality of these requirements has never been fully tested.

These three outcroppings—the architecture of the original allocation of radio and television licenses, an extensive effort to expand minority broadcasting, and the existence of PEG channels—are examples of a fundamental understanding that the nature of community is a function of the organization of communications. But these three outcroppings also indicate the complexity of government ordering of broadcasting and the press to achieve what are deemed to be positive results.

MONROE E. PRICE
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Communications and Democracy; First Amendment; Freedom of Speech; Freedom of the Press; "Must Carry" Laws.)

COMMUNICATIONS AND DEMOCRACY

The infrastructure of communications is an indicator of the participatory quality of a democratic society. Ideally, the media in a democratic society help create a public sphere in which a critical nongovernmental voice is formed; they perform a checking function against government abuses; and they inform the public, helping to shape a citizenry capable of assuming the duties of making the intelligent decisions necessary for sound choices.

Underlying this idea of the role of communications in reinforcing democracy are a group of assumptions about law and the role of law. In the United States, the role of government is somewhat circumscribed in its capacity to energize or structure media so as to achieve these goals. Government can impose obligations on broadcasters to provide candidates better access to the airwaves or prohibit overcharging for political advertising. Yet, in terms of foreign policy, the United States has sought to shape media in transition societies, such as in the former Soviet Union, on the grounds that a better media structure will lead to a more stable democracy.

Part of this effort involves indicating to parliaments in other societies what elements of law are important to create an enabling environment for a democratic media. These elements almost always include constitutional provisions. A FIRST AMENDMENT model is usually preferred, but many societies opt for a version of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The United States's view is generally that there should not be an elaborate media law; but often in these transition societies a comprehensive press and BROADCASTING law, which includes a statement of positive contributions that should be obtained in terms of information and its relationship to democratic processes, is enacted.

But such an enabling environment also includes defamation and LIBEL laws, preferably with exemptions for a broad range of criticisms of public officials. Omnipresent are licensing provisions for electronic media, but the general pattern—reflected in American practice—is that the press should not be licensed. Many societies provide special rights, privileges, and responsibilities for accredited journalists, while others accord no special status to journalists. These differences, and how they are implemented, can have a substantial impact on the contribution of a media law to an appropriate enabling environment.

More complicated are rules concerning breaches of NATIONAL SECURITY, HATE SPEECH, or spreading propaganda. The United States internal constitutional position is that such laws are generally incompatible with an enabling environment for a media contribution to a democratic society. European models of media regulation often embed such restrictions in the very definition of constitutionally regulable speech. In some societies, including the United States, there is a concern that media too prone to indecent, violent, and pornographic imagery rob the civil space of democratic discussion. This has led to efforts—usually vague, vain, and clumsily enforced—to regulate elements of such speech. In the new technologies, filtering devices are increasingly urged as noninterventionist means to regulate access to speech that the user (or the society) may deem harmful.

The area of speech directly related to the political process remains an area of legislative concern worldwide in terms of adjusting the democratic impact of media organization. In Arkansas Educational Television Commission v. Forbes (1998), the Supreme Court concluded that public broadcasters, at least those licensed to state entities, have an obligation, if they hold public debates, to include all candidates, except those who are excluded not because of their viewpoint, but because of poor public performance or other reasonable but narrow bases.

The formal laws themselves are not sufficient to provide an enabling environment for the role of communications in a democratic society. There is also the question of the RULE OF LAW and the institutional infrastructure in which the law exists. The existence of a JUDICIAL SYSTEM or of REGULATORY AGENCIES that have traditions of fairness and independence are essential aspects of a rule of law that protects a free and democratic media sector.

A third strategic area involves the social and political setting in which the modules of law are introduced and the infrastructure is found. How communications function as an aspect of democratic values involves such background elements as the structure of political governance. In some transition societies in the late 1990s, such as Bosnia and Herzegovina, the existence of a monopoly political party controlling the media meant that law alone could not yield democratic values. Forms of media ownership also influence the democratic character of the media. Many societies, including the United States, have foreign investment restrictions on the electronic media to secure indigenous control over the mechanisms of self-governance. Ownership alone does not reveal whether a medium of communication contributes to the growth of democratic values. Patterns of access are also highly relevant to whether the media serve forums for wide-ranging public debates.

MONROE E. PRICE
(2000)

Bibliography

FISS, OWEN M. 1996 The Irony of Free Speech. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

SHIFFRIN, STEVEN H. 1990 The First Amendment, Democracy, and Romance. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1993 Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech. New York: Free Press.

COMMUNICATIONS DECENCY ACT
110 Stat. 56 (1996)

The INTERNET has revolutionized the world of communications in an unprecedented fashion. Growing at an exponential rate, the Internet has become a new and unique global marketplace of images, ideas, and information. But the Internet's ease of access and wealth of available material have also raised problems, most notably access to certain kinds of information—particularly words and images of a sexual nature—either by unsuspecting adults or by children. Because of that concern, Congress passed the Communications Decency Act of 1996. That law was part of the much larger Telecommunications Act of 1996, an unusually important legislative enactment designed to encourage the rapid deployment of new telecommunications technologies and to promote competition in the local telephone service market, the multichannel video market, and the market for over-the-air BROADCASTING. In contrast to the rest of the Telecommunications Act, the communications decency provisions were not given careful or extensive consideration by the Congress.

The Communications Decency Act contained two controversial features: the "indecent" communication provision and the "patently offensive" display provision.

The first part of the law prohibited the knowing transmission of "obscene or indecent" messages to any recipient under 18 years of age, by making it a crime when any person "by means of a telecommunications device knowingly . . . makes, creates, or solicits, and . . . initiates the transmission of, any comment, request, suggestion, proposal, image, or other communication which is obscene or indecent, knowing that the recipient of the communication is under 18 years of age. . . ." and regardless of who initiated the communication. The law also made it a crime to permit one's communication facility to be used for such activity.

The other provision of the law prohibited the knowing sending or displaying of "patently offensive" messages in a manner that is available to a person under 18 years of age. This portion of the law focused on the use of any "interactive computer service" (or "chatroom") to display any written or visual communication that, "in context, depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs. . . ." Any person who controlled such facilities was criminally liable as well. The act nowhere defined or explained the meaning of the key terms "indecent" or "patently offensive" display beyond the text just set forth.

Although the act also provided certain defenses against criminal responsibility for individuals or organizations who take "appropriate measures" to restrict access by minors, the nature of those measures was unclear (most would be extremely expensive), and violation of the act carried significant criminal penalties. The act effectively meant that all who published covered information to people under 18 years of age did so at their peril.

Because of the very real CHILLING EFFECT on FREEDOM OF SPEECH on the Internet, the act was challenged on FIRST AMENDMENT grounds the moment it went into effect. In a 1997 ruling, American Civil Liberties Union v. Reno, the Supreme Court declared the act to be unconstitutional. The Court concluded that the proper goal of protecting children could not be pursued through means that so broadly stifled the speech of adults on this vital new medium of communication.

JOEL M. GORA
(2000)

Bibliography

LARUE, JANET M. 1996 The Communications Decency Act of 1996: Sensible Not Censorship. St. John's Journal of Legal Commentary 11:721–726.

LESSIG, LAWRENCE J. 1996 Reading the Constitution in Cyberspace. Emory Law Journal 45:886–910.

COMMUNIST CONTROL ACT
68 Stat. 775 (1954)

This measure marked the culmination of the United States government's program to prevent subversion from within during the loyalty-security years. Conservative senators, eager to facilitate removal of communists from positions of union leadership, and Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, tired of hearing liberals smeared as "soft on communism," pushed the measure through Congress with large majorities in each chamber. Clearly tied to the 1954 elections, the act outlawed the Communist party as an instrumentality conspiring to overthrow the United States government. The bill as initially drafted made party membership a crime. Responding to criticism of the DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER administration that the membership clause would make the provisions of the 1950 INTERNAL SECURITY ACT unconstitutional, because compulsory registration would violate the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, the bill's sponsors removed its membership clause. However, Congress deprived the Communist party of all "rights, privileges, and immunities attendant upon legal bodies created under the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States or any political subdivision thereof." The act added a new category of groups required to register—"communist-infiltrated" organizations. These, like communist and "front" organizations, although outlawed, were expected to register with the SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD.

The measure, virtually inoperative from the beginning, raised grave constitutional questions under the FIRST AMENDMENT, the Fifth Amendment, and the ban against BILLS OF ATTAINDER. The Justice Department ignored it and pushed no general test of its provisions in the court. The act summarized well the official policy toward the Communist party at the time—to keep it legal enough for successful prosecution of its illegalities.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

AUERBACH, CARL 1956 The Communist Control Act of 1954. University of Chicago Law Review 23:173–220.

COMMUNIST PARTY

See: Subversive Activity

COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES v. SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD
367 U.S. 1 (1961)

The Supreme Court upheld application to the Communist party of provisions of the Subversive Activities Control Act requiring "any organization . . . substantially controlled by the foreign government . . . controlling the world Communist movement" to register with the Board, providing lists of officers and members. The Court postponed considering self-incrimination objections, held that where an individual might escape regulation merely by ceasing to engage in the regulated activity no BILL OF ATTAINDER existed, and deferred to the congressional balance between national security and the FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION arguing that any inhibition on communists' associational freedom caused by exposure was incidental to regulation of their activities on behalf of foreign governments.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Subversive Activities Control Board.)

COMMUNISTS

See: Extremist Speech

COMMUNITARIANISM

Communitarianism is a political philosophy that emphasizes the good society's need for strong bonds of community, civic virtue, solidarities of CITIZENSHIP, and public deliberation about moral issues. It generally offers its vision as an alternative to contemporary LIBERALISM, criticizing liberals for overly emphasizing doctrines of individual autonomy at the expense of nurturing the social allegiances that give depth and substance to an individual's identity. Communitarians hark back to the traditional republican political theory which crucially taught that democratic freedom is accomplished not so much by leaving persons alone as by fostering the virtue it takes to govern according to the common good rather than self-interest.

As a matter of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION, communitarians object to prevailing legal trends that insist government must be neutral as among the competing views and values of citizens. For instance, in FIRST AMENDMENT cases, the DOCTRINE of content neutrality means that government cannot regulate speech merely because it judges the subject matter of the speech to be unimportant, unworthy, or imminently dangerous. But communitarians argue that the lofty purposes of the First Amendment are trivialized when the public interest in FREEDOM OF SPEECH about commerce or sex is equated with the public interest in free speech about politics. For communitarians, freedom of speech is basic precisely because open, democratic government is impossible without it. The same heightened public importance is absent when courts analyze COMMERCIAL SPEECH or sexual speech and courts go too far, argue communitarians, when they read the First Amendment as if its purpose were to protect the individual's personal interest in self-expression. To interpret the First Amendment as if the Framers were neutral as between the importance in a democracy of free speech about politics and free speech about the price of commercial products is to trivialize free speech and to misread the Constitution as exalting protection of individual self-expression into a sovereign, absolute value.

Many communitarians also object to interpreting the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT DUE PROCESS clause as granting implicit constitutional status to a RIGHT OF PRIVACY, as the Supreme Court did in ROE V. WADE (1973) and subsequent cases protecting a woman's right to choose ABORTION. The same purported right of privacy is at stake in cases involving state regulation of SEXUAL ORIENTATION and assisted suicide (or the RIGHT TO DIE). The problem communitarians have with the privacy cases is not necessarily with the results reached but with the legal reasoning that insists constitutional analysis must bracket or put aside any substantive moral discussion of the public good at stake when individuals make private choices. In regard to abortion in particular, communitarians thus would prefer to reframe the issue along lines suggested by Justice RUTH BADER GINSBURG, who has argued that abortion regulations should be analyzed in reference to legal principles prohibiting SEX DISCRIMINATION as a violation of democracy's commitment to equal respect for all persons.

Communitarians also distinguish between two senses of citizenship implicit in the Constitution. One is the liberal view of citizens as individuals who enjoy the protection of legal rights against the state. The other is a stronger, republican vision of citizens who enjoy the legal status of participating in democratic self-governance and the rights and responsibilities of public service. This participatory notion of citizenship stands behind the constitutional status of TRIAL BY JURY of Article III and the Sixth Amendment's stipulation that criminal juries must be chosen from the district within a state where the crime occurred. The battle to amend the Constitution to protect the so-called jury of the "vicinage" or community affected by the crime, communitarians point out, was waged along civic republican lines and shows a continuing commitment among many in the Founding era to preserve opportunities for local communities, through the jury system, to participate in shaping governing principles of law. Likewise, the SECOND AMENDMENT embodies a philosophy of localism insofar as it protects state militias and the right to bear arms in them against the dangers of a single, standing national army. Historically, communitarians have also defended the constitutionality of the military draft (as in the SELECTIVE SERVICE ACTS) by stressing the Framers' commitment to the civic duty and public service obligations of democratic citizens.

When it comes to issues involving the state and religion, communitarians more readily accept the liberal view that RELIGIOUS LIBERTY should be the same everywhere in the United States, protected by federal courts against local, majoritarian preferences. For instance, communitarians' view of open and egalitarian communities premised on participatory opportunities for all leads them to accept the leading Supreme Court cases prohibiting public SCHOOL PRAYERS, which rest on the principle that public schools best educate children to be democratic citizens when they teach children both to respect RELIGIOUS DIVERSITY and to share civic ties despite those religious divisions.

Finally, communitarians balk at the increasing judicialization of politics, a process whereby resolution of core issues about justice and liberty is removed from the power of the people and entrusted to unelected federal judges. The result is dimunition of democracy and the disempowerment of citizens and their representatives. Communitarians concede that individual rights sometimes trump majority power in our constitutional government and that courts therefore need to enforce constitutional guarantees even against the contrary will of political majorities. But communitarians believe that a better balance can be struck between the rights-based liberalism that controls constitutional interpretation currently and the older, civic republican ideals of the Framers, ideals that stressed public duty as well as private rights and that praised participation in self-governing communities, rather than the protection of individual against community, as the key to political liberty.

JEFFREY ABRAMSON
(2000)

Bibliography

ABRAMSON, JEFFREY 1994 We, the Jury: The Jury System and the Ideal of Democracy. New York: Basic Books.

ETZIONI, AMITAI, ed. 1995 New Communitarian Thinking: Persons, Virtues, Institutions, and Communities. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia.

———, ed. 1998 The Essential Communitarian Reader. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefeld.

GLENDON, MARY ANN 1991 Rights Talk: The Impoverishment of Political Discourse. New York: Free Press.

SANDEL, MICHAEL J. 1996 Democracy's Discontent: America in Search of a Public Philosophy. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

SMITH, ROGERS M. 1997 Civic Ideals: Conflicting Visions of Citizenship in U.S. History. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1999 One Case at a Time: Judicial Minimalism and the Supreme Court. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

TAM, HENRY BENEDICT 1998 Communitarianism: A New Agenda for Politics and Citizenship. New York: New York University Press.

TUSHNET, MARK V. 1999 Taking the Constitution Away from the Courts. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

COMPACT THEORY

See: Social Compact Theory; Theories of the Union

COMPANION CASE

Cases decided by the Supreme Court on the same day are called companion cases when they involve the same issues or issues that are closely related. Sometimes a single OPINION is used to explain two or more companion cases, and sometimes separate opinions are written. Occasionally a Justice writing for the Court will select the strongest of a group of companion cases for explanation in a full opinion, leaving the weaker cases to be discussed only briefly, with heavy reliance on the conclusions in the full opinion.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

COMPARABLE WORTH

The term "comparable worth" refers to the claim that workers in predominantly female occupations should be compensated at rates similar to those paid to workers in predominantly male occupations, when the labor involved in both is comparable in value to the employer. The claim assumes (1) that significant sex segregation exists in American employment; (2) that, as a result, women are disadvantaged economically; and (3) that job classifications that are different can nonetheless be compared by analyzing their component skill, effort, responsibility, working conditions, and training requirements.

The first assumption is not controversial. More than half of the jobs that fall under the most commonly used occupational designations are over eighty percent male- or female-dominated. At least part of the second claim is likewise firmly established. On average, women earn only sixty percent of what men do, and the higher the percentage of women in a particular job category, the lower the average wage tends to be.

One of the controversies over comparable worth centers on how much of the male-female wage disparity can be explained by "nondiscriminatory" factors, such as length of time in continuous employment, trade-offs between work and family responsibility, and personal choice. Although these factors may themselves be products of prior SEX DISCRIMINATION, they can nevertheless be distinguished from the employer's own current intentional discrimination, reliance on sex stereotypes, or use of wage-setting devices that do not measure job requirements or performance. Proponents of comparable-worth claims argue that the latter factors produce a significant part of the general wage disparity, so that the disparity is properly challenged as discriminatory under laws guaranteeing equal employment opportunity. Opponents who agree that there is a relationship between employers' undervaluation of certain kinds of work and the fact that such work is predominantly done by women, nonetheless reject comparable-worth claims as a useful strategy for improving the economic condition of women. They prefer strategies that would move large numbers of women into fields in which men are currently overrepresented.

Controversy also surrounds the questions of which jobs are comparable and how to measure comparability. Courts generally accept statistical analysis in claims of EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION, but do not always agree on the validity, appropriateness, or evidentiary weight of particular statistical analyses. Neither do they agree on whether and how comparable-worth claims should fit within the framework of employment discrimination claims created by Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, the Equal Pay Act of 1964, or the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution. County of Washington v. Gunther (1981), the only Supreme Court opinion to mention comparable worth, expressly declined to address the issue, although it did hold that intentional sex discrimination in wages could be challenged under Title VII, despite differences in male and female job classifications.

Most comparable worth litigation is brought against public employers, who generally employ large numbers of people in a wide variety of job classifications. Although public employers are subject to both Title VII and constitutional prohibitions on discrimination, equal protection claims are generally not raised by plaintiffs seeking comparable-worth decrees. As PERSONNEL ADMINISTRATOR OF MASSACHUSETTS V. FEENEY (1979) illustrates, an employment practice does not violate the Constitution unless its discriminatory impact has been intentionally created. Employers are more likely to set wages on the basis of prevailing market rates for certain job classifications or even on unconscious stereotypes about the relative worth of female-dominated occupations than on an intentional desire to undercompensate women simply because they are women.

Even in the statutory arena, much uncertainty remains. For example, it is unclear whether the availability of statutory "disparate impact" claims against other types of alleged employment discrimination extends to sex-based wage discrimination. Some courts have asserted that wage-setting practices are too subjective, too multifaceted, or both, to be effectively tested by the disparate impact model of discrimination. Others have simply stated that an employer's reliance on the market in setting wages is not the kind of practice to which the model should apply. The Supreme Court has spoken only obliquely on these issues.

Given uncertainty whether equal pay for work of comparable worth is required by existing federal law, advocates of comparable worth have not confined their efforts to the courtroom. Pay equity, including comparable worth, has to date been more successfully achieved through collective bargaining, state legislation, and local ordinances than through litigation.

CHRISTINE A. LITTLETON
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Feminist Theory.)

Bibliography

BLUMROSEN, RUTH G. 1980 Wage Discrimination, Job Segregation and Women Workers. Women's Rights Law Reporter 6:19–57.

DOWD, NANCY E. 1986 The Metamorphosis of Comparable Worth. Suffolk University Law Review 20:833–865.

FELDSTEIN, HYDEE R. 1981 Sex-based Wage Discrimination Claims. Columbia Law Review 81:1333–1347.

NOTE [LITTLETON, CHRISTINE] 1981 Toward a Redefinition of Sexual Equality. Harvard Law Review 95:487–508.

COMPELLED SPEECH

The FIRST AMENDMENT mandate that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech" implies a stricture against compelling or coercing persons to engage in speech they do not wish to make—either because they disagree with the speech or because they wish to remain silent. Substantially the same considerations that drive the prohibition against abridgement of FREEDOM OF SPEECH—whether derived from the notion of the speaker's autonomy or from the listener's entitlement or the societal value of undistorted public discourse—drive the strictures against coercion of speech. The speech protected by the First Amendment may consist of utterances or other forms of expressive conduct by a person or the publication or transmission of expression of others, not all of which are equally protected as speech. Protected speech may also consist of the contribution of funds or furnishing of facilities to be used by the recipients, inter alia, for expressive conduct (i.e., the contribution may be assimilated to speech of the contributor).

Government mandates to utter or publish particular expressions or kinds of expression produce coerced speech, but the coercion's unconstitutionality appears to turn in large part on the content of the expression. High- value speech (such as a LOYALTY OATH or support for an expressive association) may not be coerced, but low-value or low-cost or content-neutral speech (such as disclosure of relevant facts in the sale of goods or securities) may be coerced. Government award, or threat of denial of benefits (like licensing, tax relief, subsidy, employment, or admission to the bar) conditioned on expression by the recipient may also unconstitutionally compel expression, apparently without regard to the magnitude of the benefits. The decisions of the Supreme Court appear to rest on the quality of the compelled expression's expected inhibiting effect on other high-value expression or association, and to vary with the content of the compelled expression.

Another framework for analyzing the problem of compelled speech entails connecting one person's compelled contribution of funds or facilities or opportunities to speak with another person's expression, so as to impute to the former the latter's expression. Justification for the assimilation is not self-evident, and the circumstances under which such contribution is, or should be, equated with speech of the contributor are difficult to state. The problem is most acute if an institution whose essential function is expression claims that it is being coerced to speak because the government directs it to admit unwanted expression or speakers to its own expressive voice (as in the case of the sponsor of a parade), or to give access to its facilities for expression (as the print or electronic media) to persons whose expressions it does not wish to be associated with or to enable. For some expressive organizations, like a parade's sponsor or a political or ideological group, the special value of aggregating funds or voices for the purpose of expression may be sacrificed if the effect of such required admission is to dilute or alter the expression they wish to utter. For others, like the print or broadcast media, the effect of the requirement may be less costly. This may explain why compelling the parade sponsors to include an unwanted participant's speech is held to be unconstitutional, but compelling inclusion in the media sometimes is unconstitutional (as when allowing others' expression may have an inhibiting effect on the medium's expression) and sometimes is constitutionally permitted; particularly in the case of a BROADCASTING medium that originates and exists more as a carrier than a voice, in a framework of expressly government- granted power. The question of compelling such speech in cyberspace remains to be examined.

The special value of purposefully aggregated voice is not sacrificed if the institution's essential function is not expression and the government should require it either to convey expression that it does not wish to convey, as in the case of SHOPPING CENTER owners who are forbidden by state law from excluding leafleters; or public utility CORPORATIONS that send out communications or bills and are required by the state to let other speakers insert related public messages in the unfilled envelope space; or organizations such as the Chamber of Commerce or Rotary Club who want to exclude from membership persons with potentially contrary voices but are forbidden to do so by state CIVIL RIGHTS laws. Those persons or institutions can vent their expression by other means without materially diminishing achievement of their essential nonexpressive functions. As the different outcomes in the shopping mall case, where the state's regulation was upheld, and the envelope case, where it was denied, suggest, the closeness with which the contribution mechanism publicly associates the forced contributor with the making or content of the expression may determine whether the speech is unconstitutionally coerced. The Chamber of Commerce, the Rotary Club, and the parade cases illustrate the difficulty in formulating criteria for separating "essentially" expressive from "essentially" nonexpressive institutions.

A variation of the problem derives from a nonexpressive institution requiring persons to pay dues and then using the dues to fund expression that those persons do not want to express or to be expressed. For the institution's expression to be considered unconstitutionally compelled speech by the contributor, the institutional power to require the contribution must be sufficiently attributable to special government (legislative) empowerment of the institution to acquire membership or funding for its nonexpressive function, as in the case of an integrated bar association that can exclude nonmembers from the practice of law, or a union empowered to enforce a union shop or agency shop agreement that can exclude from employment those who decline to join or contribute. In contrast, the contribution (i.e., speech) does not appear to be viewed by the courts as unconstitutionally compelled if it is required by the "private" power of a voluntary bar association or possibly a local medical society to acquire membership—even though each has the power to deny access to vital earning facilities or privileges to persons who decline to pay dues that will fund the association's speech. The Supreme Court offers few clues as to what separates government-driven private compulsion from "purely" private compulsion in a society in which any institution's coercive power derives from the entire structure of government support embodied in the allocation of rights and duties by law. Moreover, the Court has not explained why, or by what criteria, the group's speech should be imputed to the contributor at the cost of pro tanto abridging the speech of the group and its other members, as when state universities impose extracurricular activities fees, some of which go to student groups supporting policies that some contributors wish not to support. Nor has it squarely addressed the problem of the extent of government power to protect an individual member's freedom from compelled expression by abridging the expression of a "private" nonexpressive institution, like a business corporation, funded by contributions that are not freely given for expression.

In any event, not all institutional expression that can be imputed to a coerced contributor is protected, or equally protected, speech—as the distinctions between the kinds of speech permitted and prohibited by compelled funding in the union shop and integrated bar cases indicate. The point was made, perhaps more sharply, in Glickman v. Wileman Brothers and Elliott Inc. (1997), which involved expression by a trade association (generic advertising of the virtues of an industry's product) that was an integral component of a comprehensive government-sponsored economic program for the industry, under which industry members were required to make payment to the association. The Court ruled that the member's contributions to the association's advertising were not to be characterized as compelled speech by the member. But it is not entirely clear whether the opinion deemed the complainant's contribution to be insufficiently tied to the particular expression to impute it to the contributor; or, alternatively, deemed the tie to be close enough to make the expression coerced but deemed the expression not to be protected speech. Similarly, it is unclear from this opinion how a court should measure and balance either the sufficiency of the tie between contribution and expression or the extent to which the particular expression is entitled to be considered protected speech.

A pervasive problem, for which the Court's opinions give no clues, implicates the extent to which the constitutional limits on government coercion of speech are, or should be, less rigorous than the constitutional limits on government prohibition of speech—for example, to what extent, and by what criteria, government prohibition of political expenditures or of solicitation of favorable treatment from officeholders should be more critically scrutinized (and less tolerated) by courts than government compelling disclosure in such matters.

VICTOR BRUDNEY
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston; PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins.)

COMPELLING STATE INTEREST

When the Supreme Court concludes that STRICT SCRUTINY is the appropriate STANDARD OF REVIEW, it often expresses its searching examination of the justification of legislation in a formula: the law is invalid unless it is necessary to achieve a "compelling state interest." The inquiry thus touches not only legislative means but also legislative purposes.

Even the permissive RATIONAL BASIS standard of review demands that legislative ends be legitimate. To say that a governmental purpose must be one of compelling importance is plainly to demand more. How much more, however, is something the Court has been unable to say. What we do know is that, once "strict scrutiny" is invoked, only rarely does a law escape invalidation.

Any judicial examination of the importance of a governmental objective implies that a court is weighing interests, engaging in a kind of cost-benefit analysis as a prelude to deciding on the constitutionality of legislation. Yet one would be mistaken to assume that the inquiry follows such a neat, linear, two-stage progression. Given the close correlation between employing the "strict scrutiny" standard and invalidating laws, the very word "scrutiny" may be misleading. A court that has embarked on a search for compelling state interests very likely knows how it intends to decide.

In many a case a court does find a legislative purpose of compelling importance. That is not the end of the "strict scrutiny" inquiry; there remains the question whether the law is necessary to achieve that end. If, for example, there is another way the legislature might have accomplished its purpose, without imposing so great a burden on the constitutionally protected interest in liberty or equality, the availability of that LEAST RESTRICTIVE MEANS negates the necessity for the legislature's choice. The meaning of "strict scrutiny" is that even a compelling state interest must be pursued by means that give constitutional values their maximum protection.

The phrase "compelling state interest" originated in Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER's concurring opinion in Sweezy v. New Hampshire (1957), a case involving the privacy of political association: "For a citizen to be made to forego even a part of so basic a liberty as his political autonomy, the subordinating interest of the State must be compelling." The Supreme Court uses some variation on this formula not only in FIRST AMENDMENT cases but also in cases calling for "strict scrutiny" under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause or under the revived forms of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. The formula, in short, is much used and little explained. The Court is unable to define "compelling state interest" but knows when it does not see it.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Pages 1000–1002. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

COMPETITIVE FEDERALISM

This is a term often used in analysis of constitutional DOCTRINE or working governmental practice. Competitive federalism is closely related to DUAL FEDERALISM, and in contrast with COOPERATIVE FEDERALISM stresses the conflict between the national government and the states.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(1986)

COMPROMISE OF 1850

The Compromise of 1850 comprised a related series of statutes enacted by Congress in an attempt to settle sectional disputes related to SLAVERY that had flared since 1846, with the outbreak of the Mexican War and the introduction of the WILMOT PROVISO. After California's 1849 demand for admission as a free state and the concurrent appearance of southern disunionist sentiment, what had begun as a contest over the constitutional status of SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES absorbed other issues related to the security of slavery in the extant states and expanded into a crisis of the Union.

From proposals submitted by President Zachary Taylor and Senator HENRY CLAY, Senator STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS marshaled measures through Congress that admitted California as a free state; established the Texas-New Mexico boundary and compensated Texas and holders of Texas securities for territory claimed by Texas but awarded to New Mexico; abolished the slave trade in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (but Congress rejected a proposal to abolish slavery itself there); amended the Fugitive Slave Act of 1793 by the drastic new measure known as the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; and created Utah and New Mexico Territories. (See FUGITIVE SLAVERY.)

Both major parties hailed the Compromise as a final settlement of all problems relating to slavery. Southern disunion sentiment abated, while the Free Soil coalition, which had made a respectable beginning in the 1848 election, began to disintegrate. FRANKLIN PIERCE was elected President in 1852 on a platform extolling the finality of the Compromise and condemning any further agitation of the slavery issue.

But the territorial and fugitive-slave measures only extended and inflamed the slavery controversy. The New Mexico and Utah acts were couched in ambiguous language that left the status of slavery in those two immense territories unsettled, though Congress did decisively reject the Free Soil solution embodied in the Wilmot Proviso of 1846. The acts also contained sections providing for APPEAL of slavery controversies from the TERRITORIAL COURTS directly to the United States Supreme Court, an effort to resolve a politically insoluble problem by nonpolitical means.

The Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 was a harsh and provocative measure that virtually legitimated the kidnapping of free blacks. It thrust the federal presence into northern communities in obtrusive ways by potentially forcing any adult northern male to serve on slave-catching posses, by creating new pseudo-judicial officers encouraged by the fee structure to issue certificates of rendition, and by authorizing use of federal military force to enforce the act. It was therefore widely unpopular in the northern states. Subsequent recaptures, renditions, and rescues provided numerous real-life counterparts to the fictional drama of Uncle Tom's Cabin.

The finality supposedly achieved by the Compromise of 1850 was shattered by the controversy over the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT of 1854. But as ALEXANDER STEPHENS noted back in 1850, "the present adjustment may be made, but the great question of the permanence of slavery in the Southern states will be far from being settled thereby."

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

POTTER, DAVID M. 1976 The Impending Crisis, 1848–1861. New York: Harper & Row.

COMPROMISE OF 1877

Four of the sectional compromises in nineteenth-century America were efforts to settle quarrels by mutual concessions and forestall danger of violence. Three of the four efforts were temporarily successful, and only the fourth, that of 1861, broke down in failure. For the next sixteen years, during the CIVIL WAR and RECONSTRUCTION, differences were resolved by resort to force. The Compromise of 1877 differed from the earlier ones in several ways, one of them being that its main purpose was to foreclose rather than to forestall resort to armed force. Since the Republican party was committed to force when necessary to protect freedmen's rights under the constitutional amendments and CIVIL RIGHTS acts of the Reconstruction period, any repudiation of such commitments had to be negotiated discreetly.

Under President ANDREW JOHNSON and President ULYSSES S. GRANT, the government had been backing away from enforcement of freedmen's rights almost from the start. In part the result of white resistance in the South, this retreat from Reconstruction was also a consequence of the prevalence of white-supremacy sentiment in the North. In the elections of 1874, regarded by some as a referendum on Reconstruction, the Republican House majority of 110 was replaced by a Democratic majority of sixty. And in the ensuing presidential election of 1876 the Democratic candidate, Samuel J. Tilden, won a majority of the popular votes and was conceded 184 of the 185 electoral votes required for election. He also claimed all the nineteen contested votes of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, the only southern states remaining under Republican control. But so did his Republican opponent, Rutherford B. Hayes, who also claimed the election. The impasse was solved by an agreement between the two political parties (not the sections) to create a bipartisan electoral commission of fifteen to count the votes. An unanticipated last minute change of one member of the commission gave the Republicans a majority of one, and by that majority they counted all contested votes for Hayes. That eliminated Tilden, but to seat Hayes required formal action of the House. The Democratic majority, enraged over what they regarded as a "conspiracy" to rob them of their victory, talked wildly of resistance and started a filibuster.

Foreseeing the victory of Hayes, southern Democrats sought to salvage whatever they could out of defeat. Their prime objective was "home rule," which meant not only withdrawal of troops that sustained Republican rule in South Carolina and Louisiana but also a firm Republican commitment to abandon use of force in the future for defending rights of freedmen, carpetbaggers, and scalawags. This amounted to the virtual nullification of the FOURTEENTH and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS and the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT. In return southern conservatives promised to help confirm Hayes's election, and many Democrats of the old Whig persuasion promised to cooperate with the new administration, but not to defect to the Republican party unless it abandoned "radicalism."

With control of the army and the submission of enough northern Democrats, Republicans could have seated Hayes anyway. But the southerners exploited Republican fears of resistance and skillfully played what they later admitted was "a bluff game." An old Whig himself, Hayes fell in with the idea of reconstituting his party in the South under conservative white leaders in place of carpetbaggers. He not only pledged "home rule" but promised to appoint a conservative southern Democrat to his cabinet and sweetened his appeal to that constituency by publicly pledging generous support to bills for subsidizing " INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS of a national character" in the South. Hayes's election was confirmed only two days before he took office.

As in earlier sectional compromises, not all the terms of that of 1877 were fulfilled, but the main ones were.

Hayes appointed a southern Democrat his postmaster general, chief dispenser of patronage, and placed many other white conservatives in southern offices. Bills for federal subsidies to internal improvements met with more success than ever before. The troops sustaining Republican rule in the two states were removed and Democrats immediately took over. In the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883) the Supreme Court erected the STATE ACTION barrier, severely limiting the reach of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court's opinion was written by Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY, who had been a member of the 1877 electoral commission. More important than all this was the pledge against resort to force to protect black rights. That commitment held firm for eighty years, until the military intervention at Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1957. This set a record for durability among sectional compromises.

C. VANN WOODWARD
(1986)

Bibliography

GILLETTE, WILLIAM 1980 Retreat from Reconstruction, 1869–1879. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

POLAKOFF, KEITH J. 1973 The Politics of Inertia: The Election of 1876 and the End of Reconstruction. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

WOODWARD, C. VANN 1966 Reunion and Reaction: The Compromise of 1877 and the End of Reconstruction. Boston: Little, Brown.

COMPULSORY PROCESS, RIGHT TO

The first state to adopt a constitution following the Declaration of Independence (New Jersey, 1776) guaranteed all criminal defendants the same "privileges of witnesses" as their prosecutors. Fifteen years later, in enumerating the constitutional rights of accused persons, the framers of the federal BILL OF RIGHTS bifurcated what New Jersey called the "privileges of witnesses" into two distinct but related rights: the Sixth Amendment right of the accused "to be confronted with the witnesses against him," and his companion Sixth Amendment right to "compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." The distinction between witnesses "against" the accused and witnesses "in his favor" turns on which of the parties—the prosecution or the defense—offers the witness's statements in evidence as a formal part of its case. The CONFRONTATION clause establishes the government's obligations regarding the production and examination of witnesses whose statements the prosecution puts into evidence either in its case in chief or in rebuttal. The compulsory process clause establishes the government's obligations regarding the production and examination of witnesses whose statements the defendant seeks to put into evidence in his respective case.

The constitutional questions of compulsory process are twofold: What is "compulsory process?" Who are the "witnesses in his favor" for whom a defendant is entitled to compulsory process? The first is the easier of the two questions to answer. "Compulsory process" is a term of art used to denominate the state's coercive devices for locating, producing, and compelling evidence from witnesses. A common example is the SUBPOENA ad testificandum, a judicial order to a person to appear and testify as a witness, or suffer penalty of CONTEMPT for failing to do so. The right of compulsory process, in turn, is the right of a defendant to invoke such coercive devices at the state's disposal to obtain evidence in his defense. The right of compulsory process is therefore no guarantee that defendants will succeed in locating, producing, or compelling witnesses to testify in their favor; it does not entitle defendants to the testimony of witnesses who have died or otherwise become unavailable to testify through no fault of the state. Rather, it assures defendants that the state will make reasonable, good-faith efforts to produce such requested witnesses as are available to testify at trial. It gives a defendant access to the same range of official devices for producing available evidence on his behalf as the prosecution enjoys for producing available evidence on its behalf.

The more significant question for a defendant is: Who are the witnesses for whom a defendant is entitled to compulsory process? What law defines "witnesses in his favor"? Early commentators argued that a defendant might claim compulsory process only with respect to witnesses whose testimony had already been determined to be admissible, according to the governing rules of evidence in the respective jurisdiction. The Supreme Court in its seminal 1967 decision in Washington v. Texas rejected that narrow interpretation of "witnesses in his favor." The defendant had been tried in state court for a homicide that he asserted his accomplice alone had committed. The accomplice, who had already been convicted of committing the murder, had appeared at the defendant's trial and offered to testify that he, the accomplice, had acted alone in committing the homicide. The trial court, invoking a state rule of evidence disqualifying accomplices from testifying for one another in criminal cases, refused to allow the accomplice to testify in Washington's favor, and Washington was convicted. The Supreme Court held, first, that the compulsory process clause of the Sixth Amendment, like other clauses of the Sixth Amendment, had become applicable to the states through the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Second, and more significantly, the Court held that the meaning of "witnesses in [a defendant's] favor" was to be determined not by state or federal evidentiary standards of admissibility but by independent constitutional standards of admissibility. The compulsory process clause, it said, directly defines the "witnesses" the defendant is entitled to call to the witness stand. The state in Washington violated the defendant's right of compulsory process by "arbitrarily" preventing him from eliciting evidence from a person "who was physically and mentally capable of testifying to events that he had personally observed, and whose testimony would have been relevant and material to the defense."

Having determined that the compulsory process clause operates to render exculpatory evidence independently admissible on a defendant's behalf, the Court found Washington to be an easy case; the accomplice's proffered testimony was highly probative of the defendant's innocence, and the state's reasons for excluding it were highly attenuated. The Court has since invoked the authority of Washington to prohibit a trial judge from silencing a defense witness by threatening him with prosecution for perjury; to prohibit a state from invoking state HEARSAY RULES to exclude highly probative hearsay evidence in a defendant's favor; and to prohibit a trial judge from instructing a jury that defense witnesses are less worthy of belief than prosecution witnesses. Lower courts have invoked the compulsory process clause to compel the government to disclose the identity of informers; to compel defense witnesses to testify over claims of EVIDENTIARY PRIVILEGES; and to compel the prosecution to grant use IMMUNITY to defense witnesses asserting the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. Although the Supreme Court in Washington did not define the outer limits of the compulsory process clause, it subsequently emphasized in Chambers v. Mississippi (1973) that "few rights are more fundamental than the right of an accused to present witnesses in his defense."

The companion clause to compulsory process, the confrontation clause, is the more widely known and the more often litigated of the Sixth Amendment witness clauses. The issues of confrontation can be grouped into two questions: What does the right "to be confronted" with witnesses mean? Who are the "witnesses against him" whom a defendant is entitled to confront? The answer to the first question has become relatively clear in recent years. Some commentators, including JOHN HENRY WIGMORE, once argued that the right to be "confronted" with witnesses meant no more than the right of a defendant to be brought face to face with the state's witnesses and to cross-examine them in accord with the ordinary (nonconstitutional) rules of evidence. The Supreme Court in 1974 rejected that position in Davis v. Alaska. Davis was convicted in a state court on the basis of testimony for the prosecution by a juvenile delinquent. On cross-examination, the witness refused to answer impeaching questions relating to his current delinquency status, invoking a state-law privilege for the confidentiality of juvenile court records. The Supreme Court held that the right to be confronted with prosecution witnesses creates an independent right in defendants, overriding state rules of evidence to the contrary, to elicit probative evidence from the state's witnesses by cross-examining them for exculpatory evidence they may possess. The Court has yet to decide how far the right to examine prosecution witnesses extends in circumstances other than those presented in Davis. The parallel right of compulsory process suggests, however, that the confrontation clause entitles a defendant to elicit by cross-examination from prosecution witnesses the same range of probative evidence that the compulsory process clause entitles him to elicit by direct examination from defense witnesses. Both witness clauses serve the same purpose—to enable an accused to defend himself by examining witnesses for probative evidence in his defense.

The more difficult, and still uncertain, question of confrontation is the meaning of "witnesses against him." A defendant certainly has a right to face and cross-examine whichever witnesses the prosecution actually produces in court. The question is whether the confrontation clause also defines the "witnesses" whom the prosecution must call to the witness stand. Does the confrontation clause specify which witnesses the prosecution must produce in person? Or does it merely entitle a defendant to confront whichever witnesses the prosecution in its discretion chooses to produce? These questions arise most frequently in connection with hearsay, that is, evidence whose probative value rests on the perception, memory, narration, or sincerity of a "hearsay declarant," someone not present in court—and thus not subject to cross-examination. Most jurisdictions address the hearsay problem by treating hearsay as presumptively inadmissible, subject to numerous exceptions for particular kinds of hearsay that are admissible either because of their reliability or for other reasons. The Sixth Amendment potentially comes into play whenever the prosecution invokes such an exception to introduce hearsay evidence against the accused. The confrontation question is whether the hearsay declarant is a "witness against" the defendant, within the meaning of the Sixth Amendment, who must be produced for cross-examination under oath and in the presence of the jury.

The Supreme Court held in Bruton v. United States (1968) that a prosecutor must produce in person a declarant whose out-of-court statements are being offered against an accused, not to prove him guilty but to spare the state the administrative burden of conducting separate trials. The more difficult question is what other declarants are "witnesses" against an accused for constitutional purposes.

Some authorities have argued that hearsay declarants are always witnesses against the accused for Sixth Amendment purposes and, hence, must always be produced in person as a predicate for using their out-of-court statements against an accused, even if they are no longer available to appear or testify in person. Other authorities argue that hearsay declarants are never witnesses against the accused for Sixth Amendment purposes. The Supreme Court appears to have adopted a middle position. Ohio v. Roberts (1980) arguably held that although the state has a Sixth Amendment obligation to produce in person available hearsay declarants whom it can reasonably assume the defendant would wish to examine in person at the time their out-of-court statements are introduced into evidence, the state has no Sixth Amendment obligation to produce hearsay declarants who have become unavailable through no fault of the state. The state remains constitutionally free to use the hearsay statements of these declarants, provided that the statements possess sufficient "indicia of reliability" to afford the trier of fact "a satisfactory basis" for evaluating their truth—such as statements that fall within "firmly rooted hearsay exceptions." Significantly, the state's burden of production under the confrontation clause thus parallels its burdens under the compulsory process clause. Both clauses require the state to make reasonable, good-faith efforts to produce in person witnesses the defendant wishes to examine for evidence in his defense. Yet neither clause requires the state to produce witnesses whom a defendant is not reasonably expected to wish to examine for evidence in his defense, or witnesses who have died, disappeared, or otherwise become unavailable through no fault of the state.

Although the confrontation clause does not require the state to produce declarants who are unavailable to testify in person or whom a defendant is not reasonably expected to wish to examine in person, other constitutional provisions do regulate the state's use of their hearsay statements. Manson v. Brathwaite (1977) held that the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments require the state to ensure that every item of evidence it uses against an accused, presumably including hearsay evidence, possesses sufficient "features of reliability" to be rationally evaluated by the jury for its truth. The compulsory process clause, in turn, requires states to assist the defendant in producing every available witness, including available hearsay declarants, whose presence the defendant requests and who appears to possess probative evidence in his favor. It follows, therefore, that although the state has no obligation under the confrontation clause to produce hearsay declarants who are unavailable to testify in person, it has a residual due process obligation to ensure that their hearsay statements possess sufficient "indicia of reliability" to support a conviction of the accused. Although the state has no obligation under the confrontation clause to produce as prosecution witnesses available declarants whom it does not reasonably believe the defendant would wish to examine in person at the time their out-of-court statements are introduced into evidence, it has a residual obligation under the compulsory process clause to assist him in producing such declarants whenever the defendant indicates that he wishes to call and examine them as witnesses in his defense.

PETER WESTEN
(1986)

Bibliography

WELLBORN III, OLIN GUY 1982 The Definition of Hearsay in the Federal Rules of Evidence. Texas Law Review 61:49–93.

WESTEN, PETER 1974 The Compulsory Process Clause. Michigan Law Review 73:73–184.

——— 1978 Confrontation and Compulsory Process: A Unified Theory of Evidence for Criminal Cases. Harvard Law Review 91:567–628.

——— 1979 The Future of Confrontation. Michigan Law Review 77:1185–1217.

COMPUTERS

The rapid advance of computer technology has drastically expanded our ability to store, analyze, and disseminate information. This development has implications for three areas of constitutional doctrine: the RIGHT OF PRIVACY, PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, and the FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

Because the field is so new, the Supreme Court has not yet had many opportunities to confront these issues. An account of the Court's JURISPRUDENCE so far reveals that it is only slowly beginning to recognize in computer technology a danger different in kind from that presented by information technologies supplanted. Thus, in LAIRD V. TATUM (1972), the earliest of the Court's computer cases, the question presented was whether the Constitution limits the government's right to store publicly available information in computerized form. One of the complaints in Laird was that the storage of such information in army-intelligence data banks for undefined subsequent use had a CHILLING EFFECT on the expression of those targeted for observation. In finding that the effect was so speculative that the controversy was not ripe for adjudication, the Court in effect held that government storage of personal information in a computer does not in itself give rise to a constitutionally based complaint.

WHALEN V. ROE (1977) was the first opinion expressly addressing the right of privacy in a computer context. A New York law required centralized computer storage of the names and addresses of persons prescribed certain drugs. The Court acknowledged "the threat to privacy implicit in the accumulation of vast amounts of personal information in computerized data banks." In a CONCURRING OPINION, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN noted that the potential for abuse of computerized information might necessitate "some curb on such technology." Nonetheless, the Court analyzed the law under the same BALANCING TEST used in other cases involving government invasions of privacy, balancing the state's interest in collecting drug-use information against the interest in privacy, and upheld the statute. Although the Court emphasized the stringent security measures taken to prevent unnecessary or unauthorized access to New York's computer files, lower courts have given Whalen a narrow reading and placed few constitutional restrictions on government use of computerized data banks. These lower courts have given greater weight to the earlier decision in PAUL V. DAVIS (1976), where the Court had held that alleged LIBEL and public disclosure of arrest records by government officials did not amount to a deprivation of "liberty."

Although the Court seems headed toward a narrow conception of privacy of computerized records as protected by the Constitution, it has embraced a broader view in statutory contexts. In Department of Justice v. Reporters' Committee for Freedom of the Press (1989), for example, the Court upheld a privacy interest against a request by CBS News under the FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT for disclosure of "rap sheets." Here, the Court noted that "there is a vast difference between public records that might be found after a diligent search of courthouse files, county archives, and local police stations throughout the country and a computerized summary located in a single clearinghouse of information."

A second important set of privacy questions raised by governmental use of computers is the extent to which computers may be used as an aid or substitute for other decision-making processes. This is a question not merely of the use of stored information but also the use of sophisticated programs that make possible new modes of analysis. One example is computerized matching, now a widespread practice at both the federal and state levels. These powerful programs can, for instance, help determine the eligibility of recipients of governmental benefits by matching lists of the individuals receiving such benefits with other governmental records (such as tax returns, employment files, and automobile licenses), with publicly available information, or with privately supplied information. Although some statutes and regulations limit these computerized matching programs, most courts have failed to perceive the practices as raising constitutional concerns. Some, however, have suggested that computerized matching is the kind of search that should require a SEARCH WARRANT.

The more important issue posed by computerized matching is what action is to be taken on a "hit" (that is, a match between records). What, for example, happens when an individual on a list of recipients of unemployment benefits also turns up on a file of federal employees? This is a question of procedural due process, and once again, the analysis applied so far has not differed from situations in which computers are not used. Similar questions arise in the criminal context, where computerized records may be used to determine whether a person has outstanding arrest warrants or is driving a stolen vehicle.

A closely related question is whether sophisticated computerized analysis techniques may be utilized to develop profiles of certain kinds of individuals that are then used to identify specific people as the focus of governmental law enforcement and investigation. Thus, the government has, in part through computerized analysis of cases, developed certain statistically based profiles of typical drug smugglers. Those who meet the profile are targeted for intense examination, sometimes involving other computerized techniques. In United States v. Sokolow (1989) the Court analogized drug-courier profiles to the "hunches" on which police officers typically operate. It then required the same showing of reasonable suspicion required in other instances in which persons are stopped for questioning. Although the Court did not see in the "empirical documentation" of the profile any greater basis for suspecting persons meeting the profile, it also did not find in the profiling technique any cause for heightened constitutional scrutiny.

A final area in which computers figure directly in constitutional analysis is the freedom of speech and freedom of the press. In this area, the question is the extent to which computerized forms of communication are protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT. Is, for example, a computerized bulletin board protected against libel judgments to the same extent as a newspaper under the standard of NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964)? Can the government subject computers to greater restrictions than other forms of communication? In Marshfield Family Skateland, Inc. v. Town of Marshfield (1983), the Supreme Court dismissed a challenge to an ordinance banning video games on the ground it failed to present a substantial federal question, but has not otherwise addressed the issue. Lower court cases have thus far largely involved criminal prosecution, for example, for using computers in gambling. Although these decisions held that the computer programs were unprotected speech, the computers were so integral to the commission of the crime that these cases are not necessarily indicative of the extent to which courts will find that computers raise unique constitutional questions.

ROCHELLE C. DREYFUS
DAVID W. LEEBRON
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Science, Technology, and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

FREEDMAN, WARREN 1987 The Right of Privacy in the Computer Age. New York: Quorum Books.

PRIVACY PROTECTION STUDY COMMISSION 1977 Personal Privacy in an Information Society. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

SHATTUCK, JOHN 1984 In the Shadow of 1984: National Identification Systems, Computer Matching, and Privacy in the United States. Hastings Law Journal 35:991–1005.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION AND WELFARE 1973 Records, Computers and the Rights of Citizens (Report of the Secretary's Advisory Committee on Automated Personal Data Systems). Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

WESTIN, ALAN F. 1972 Databanks in a Free Society: Computers, Record-Keeping and Privacy. New York: Quadrangle Books.

CONCORD TOWN MEETING RESOLUTIONS
(October 21, 1776)

The people of Concord, Massachusetts, at a town meeting in 1776, were the first to recommend a CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION as the only proper body to frame a CONSTITUTION. Earlier that year the provisional legislature of Massachusetts had requested permission from the people of the state to draw up a constitution. The legislature had recommended that the free males of voting age assemble in all the towns to determine that issue and also to decide whether the constitution should be made public for the towns to consider before the legislature ratified it. Nine towns objected to the recommended procedure on the grounds that a legislature was not competent for the purpose. Among the nine, Concord best described the procedure that should be followed.

Concord's resolutions declared that the legislature was not competent for three reasons: a constitution is intended to secure the people in their rights against the government; the body that forms a constitution has the power to alter it; a constitution alterable by the legislature is "no security at all" against the government's encroachment on the rights of the people. Accordingly, Concord resolved, a convention representing the towns should be chosen by all the free male voters. The sole task of the convention should be to frame the constitution. Having completed its task, the convention should publish the proposed constitution "for the Inspection and Remarks" of the people. One week later the town of Attleboro, endorsing the Concord principle of a convention, recommended that the constitution be ratified by the people of the towns rather than by the legislature.

The legislature, ignoring the dissident towns, framed a constitution but submitted it for ratification. The people overwhelmingly rejected it. In 1780 the people ratified a state constitution that was framed by a constitutional convention, the first in the history of the world to be so framed. Concord had designed an institution of government that conformed with the SOCIAL COMPACT theory of forming a FUNDAMENTAL LAW.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

CONCURRENT JURISDICTION

The Constitution does not require Congress to create lower federal courts. The Framers assumed that state courts would be competent to hear the cases included in Article III's definition of the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES. When Congress does choose to confer some of the federal judicial power on lower federal courts, state courts normally retain their JURISDICTION as well. This simultaneous or concurrent jurisdiction of state and federal courts normally exists unless Congress enacts a law stating that the federal power shall be exclusive. Only in unusual circumstances, as when state jurisdiction would gravely disrupt a federal program, has the Supreme Court required an explicit grant of congressional authority for concurrent state jurisdiction to exist. Indeed, in the limited instance of DIVERSITY JURISDICTION, the Framers intended concurrent jurisdiction to be mandatory, so that Congress could not divest state courts of judicial power they possessed before adoption of the Constitution.

Concurrent jurisdiction allows plaintiffs initial choice of a forum more sympathetic to their claims. In many circumstances, however, a defendant may supplant that choice by exercising a right under federal law to remove the case from state to federal court. (See REMOVAL OF CASES.)

State courts need not always agree to exercise their concurrent jurisdiction. If a state court declines to hear a federal claim for nondiscriminatory reasons tied to the sound management of the state judicial system, the Supreme Court will respect that decision.

When concurrent jurisdiction exists, state and federal courts may be asked to adjudicate the same rights or claims between parties at the same time. Ordinarily neither the federal nor the state court is required to stay its proceeding in such situations. However, the federal courts do possess a limited statutory power to enjoin pending state proceedings, and a state or federal court that is the first to obtain custody of property that is the subject of the dispute may enjoin the other.

CAROLE E. GOLDBERG-AMBROSE
(1986)

Bibliography

CURRIE, DAVID 1981 Federal Jurisdiction in a Nutshell, 2nd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

CONCURRENT POWERS

In THE FEDERALIST, JAMES MADISON, wrote that in fashioning the federal relationship "the convention must have been compelled to sacrifice theoretical propriety to the force of extraneous circumstances." These sacrifices which produced a "compound republic, partaking both of the national and federal character" were "rendered indispensable" by what Madison termed "the peculiarity of our political situation." An important feature of the compound republic is the idea of concurrent powers.

Concurrent powers are those exercised independently in the same field of legislation by both federal and state governments, as in the case of the power to tax or to make BANKRUPTCY laws. As ALEXANDER HAMILTON explained in The Federalist #32, "the State governments would clearly retain all the rights of SOVEREIGNTY which they before had, and which were not, by that act, exclusively delegated to the United States." Hamilton goes on to explain that this "alienation" would exist in three cases only: where there is in express terms an exclusive delegation of authority to the federal government, as in the case of the seat of government; where authority is granted in one place to the federal government and prohibited to the states in another, as in the case of IMPOSTS; and where a power is granted to the federal government "to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant, as in the case of prescribing naturalization rules." This last, Hamilton notes, would not comprehend the exercise of concurrent powers which "might be productive of occasional interferences in the policy of any branch of administration, but would not imply any direct contradiction or repugnancy in point of constitutional authority." The only explicit mention of concurrent power in the Constitution occurred in the ill-fated EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT which provided that "the Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article."

The story of concurrent power in modern American constitutional history has largely been the story of federal PREEMPTION. The concurrent authority of the states is always subordinate to the superior authority of the federal government and generally can be exercised by the states only where the federal government has not occupied the field, or where Congress has given the states permission to exercise concurrent powers. Thus in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), Maryland's concurrent power of taxation had to give way when the state sought to tax a federal instrumentality, because such a tax was utterly repugnant to federal supremacy.

In the years since McCulloch the Supreme Court has devised an intricate system for determining when a federal exercise of power has implicitly or explicitly worked to diminish or extinguish the concurrent powers of the states. The federal government's steady expansion of power over the years has, of course, placed more restrictions on concurrent action by the states as, in more and more areas, the federal government has occupied the whole field of legislation.

The Court's decision in Pacific and Electric Company v. Energy Resources Commission (1983) provides a useful summary of the factors that determine whether federal preemption may be said to have taken place: whether Congress is acting within constitutional limits and explicitly states its intention to preempt state authority; whether the scheme of federal regulation is so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress intended for the state to be excluded from concurrent regulation; whether, even though the regulation of Congress is not pervasive, the operation of concurrent powers on the part of the state would actually conflict with federal law; and whether, in the absence of pervasive legislation, state law stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment of the full purposes and objectives of Congress. It is not difficult to see that most of the states' concurrent powers today exist at the forbearance of the federal legislature. This result was not entirely anticipated by the Framers of the Constitution; but it was the inevitable consequence of the centripetal forces embodied in the national features of the compound republic.

EDWARD J. ERLER
(1986)

Bibliography

DODD, WALTER F. 1963 Concurrent Powers. In Edwin R. Seligman, ed., Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, Vol. 4:173–174. New York: Macmillan.

STORY, JOSEPH 1833 Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Vol. 1:407–433. Boston: Hilliard, Gray & Co.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Concurrent resolutions adopted by the Congress, unlike JOINT RESOLUTIONS, do not require the president's signature and do not ordinarily have the force of law. Concurrent resolutions may be used to express the "sense of Congress" or to regulate the internal affairs of Congress (such as expenditure of funds for congressional housekeeping).

Since 1939, concurrent resolutions have been the normal means of expressing the LEGISLATIVE VETO when by law that limit on PRESIDENTIAL ORDINANCE-MAKING POWER requires action by both houses. Recent examples of this requirement are found in the WAR POWERS ACT (1973) and the CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET AND IMPOUNDMENT CONTROL ACT (1974).

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

CONCURRING OPINION

When a member of a multi-judge court agrees with the DECISION reached by the majority but disagrees with the reasoning of the OPINION OF THE COURT or wishes to add his own remarks, he will customarily file a concurring opinion. The concurring opinion usually proposes an alternative way of reaching the same result. Once relatively rare, separate concurrences have become, in the late twentieth century, a normal part of the workings of the Supreme Court of the United States.

A concurring opinion may diverge from the majority opinion only slightly or only on technical points, or it may propose an entirely different line of argument. One example of the latter sort is found in ROCHIN V. CALIFORNIA (1952) in which the concurring opinions staked out a much bolder course of constitutional interpretation than the majority was willing to follow. In a constitutional system in which great issues of public policy are decided in controversies between private litigants, the principles of law enunciated in the opinions are usually of far greater importance than the decision with respect to the parties to the case. Sometimes dissenting Justices are closer to the majority on principles than are concurring Justices.

In the most important cases, several Justices may write separate opinions, even though there is substantial agreement on the grounds for deciding the case. DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) and the CAPITAL PUNISHMENT CASES (1972) are examples of cases in which every Justice filed a separate concurring or DISSENTING OPINION.

Scholars generally agree that separate concurrences often diminish the authority of the court's decision and reduce the degree of certainty of the law. Some critics have suggested elimination of concurring opinions, especially when they are filed by Justices who also subscribe to the MAJORITY OPINION. But concurring opinions, no less than dissenting opinions, provide alternative courses for future constitutional development.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

CONDITIONAL SPENDING

The United States Constitution allocates legislative authority between a federal Congress and state governments. Congress may legislate or regulate only pursuant to specific powers expressly delegated in the Constitution; excepting IMPLIED POWERS, all powers not delegated to the national government are retained by the state governments. The power to spend money for the common defense or the GENERAL WELFARE, however, is a power separate from, and in addition to, all of Congress's other ENUMERATED POWERS. Thus, Congress may spend federal funds for any purpose that can be thought to contribute to the general welfare, even though none of Congress's enumerated powers encompasses the subject of the expenditure. Congress may not impose regulatory requirements, however, even though admittedly in the interest of the common defense and general welfare, unless the area regulated is one over which regulatory control is delegated to Congress.

The power to spend carries with it the power to attach certain conditions to the expenditure. Those conditions in effect specify how federal grants will be used. For example, if Congress grants the states funds to build highways, Congress has the concomitant power to specify where the highways should run or how they should be built. This power to impose conditions permits Congress to ensure that its money is actually spent as Congress intends.

The conditional spending problem is presented when Congress seeks to purchase, not the usual goods and services, but compliance with a legislative objective that normally would be pursued by a simple regulation backed by a regulatory penalty such as a fine. When Congress uses its spending power to offer a financial inducement—a reward—for conduct that it could not directly require or regulate under any of its other enumerated powers, the core constitutional conception of specifically delegated powers is threatened. The problem posed by conditional spending is the extent to which federally induced state reliance on federal moneys gives Congress effective regulatory authority over the states beyond the powers delegated to Congress in the Constitution.

The question is of central importance to the basic constitutional scheme of FEDERALISM. Over the course of the last several decades, the federal tax burden on individuals has increased substantially, making it increasingly difficult as a political matter for state legislatures to raise state taxes. At the same time that the federal tax burden has deterred states from raising their own revenue, national grant programs for general welfare purposes, such as highways, education, and health, have induced states to rely increasingly on national funds to finance state services. Substantial state reliance on the distribution of money raised by national taxation is now a fact of political life in the federal system. This financial dependence of the states on Congress's beneficence invites Congress to extract concessions from the states, to require the states to accept "conditions" in return for the revenues now under Congress's control. If there are no constitutional limitations on the conditions Congress can attach to federal grants, Congress may extract tax revenue from the citizens of the several states, pursuant to the taxing power, and then return that revenue to the states, under the spending power, on the condition that the states impose on themselves or their citizens some regulation that Congress constitutionally could not have imposed under its other enumerated powers.

There are two competing views on the constitutionality of conditions attached by Congress to federal grants. The first view holds that offering a government benefit as a reward for compliance with some congressional objective is in effect identical to regulatory coercion by imposition of a fine to obtain the same end. Under this view, if achievement of an end is beyond Congress's delegated regulatory powers, it also should be constitutionally invalid when pursued through a conditional spending scheme. The second view is that the use of the spending power to offer a reward for compliance with some congressional objective is distinguishable from regulatory coercion in the form of a fine for noncompliance because the latter removes the freedom of choice while the former does not. According to this view, a state or individual confronted with the offer of a conditional grant may refuse the reward and persist in noncompliance, while one confronting a regulatory fine has no freedom of choice. Moreover, a fine takes money but a spending scheme awards it; refusing takes no money. Under this view, then, direct congressional regulation is confined to the enumerated powers, but Congress's purchase of compliance through a scheme of conditional spending is not similarly restrained.

Early spending power cases asserted that there is no conceptual difference between withholding a benefit and imposing a fine to achieve a regulatory end, and applied this principle to protect STATES' RIGHTS. UNITED STATES V. BUTLER (1936) involved a challenge to the AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1933 (AAA). Under the act, processors of agricultural goods were taxed and the proceeds from the tax were used to pay farmers to allow their land to lie fallow. The purpose of the scheme was to stabilize farm prices by reducing the supply of farm goods in the market. Respondents challenged the scheme as beyond the scope of Congress's delegated powers, primarily the INTERSTATE COMMERCE power, because the act sought to regulate the purely local activity of agricultural production. The United States did not attempt to defend the scheme as a valid commerce regulation, but argued it could be sustained as a valid exercise of Congress's authority to spend "for the general welfare."

The Court disagreed in Butler, holding that the scheme was invalid precisely because Congress used its spending power to achieve a regulatory effect on agriculture, otherwise outside the scope of its delegated powers and subject only to state control. The Court expressly endorsed the Hamiltonian view that although Congress had limited powers, the spending power is not limited to the subjects of the enumerated powers; but the Court said the scheme was not a simple exercise of Congress's power to spend. It was "at best . . . a scheme for purchasing with federal funds submission to federal regulation of a subject reserved to the states." The Court distinguished between a conditional appropriation where the condition specifies how the money is to be spent, which is valid, and a conditional appropriation where the goal of the condition is regulation: "There is an obvious difference between a statute stating the conditioms upon which moneys shall be expended and one effective only upon assumption of a contractual obligation to submit to a regulation which otherwise could be enforced. . . . If in lieu of compulsory regulation of subjects within the states' reserved JURISDICTION, which is prohibited, the Congress could invoke the taxing and spending power as a means to accomplish the same end, clause 1 of Section 8 of article I would become the instrument for total subversion of the governmental powers reserved to the individual states."

By modern standards B*utle*r was decided wrongly. Butler's real error, however, was not in holding that spending legislation could not be used to accomplish regulatory ends outside Congress's delegated powers; rather, it was in adopting a narrow interpretation of Congress's power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE that disallowed price-support legislation. Such a result would not hold up today. But in Butler the Court's perception that the AAA was regulation, not spending, seems unassailable.

The conceptual foundation of Butler—that a reward for compliance is regulation, not spending—has been carried forward and expanded by the modern Court in some CIVIL LIBERTIES cases, FIRST AMENDMENT cases in particular. In those cases, the Court has recognized that offering a governmental benefit on the condition that the individual refrain from engaging in protected activities is the economic and constitutional equivalent of imposing a fine for the violation of a regulation prohibiting the activity. For example, the Court has held that if government offers a financial reward in return for the recipient's agreement to forgo a practice commanded by her religion, the conditional grant presents the same RELIGIOUS LIBERTY problem that would be presented by a fine for engaging in the religious practice. Either presents the same governmental interference with the individual's constitutionally protected liberty. In either case, the individual may choose to continue the protected activity and suffer the economic loss or forgo the protected activity and avoid the economic loss. In individual liberties cases this proposition is known as the doctrine of UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITIONS and is often identified with the Court's decision in SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963).

In its most recent encounter with conditional spending, the Supreme Court appears to have abandoned the conceptual foundation of Butler and ignored its currency in the individual liberties area. In South Dakota v. Dole (1987) the Court confronted a challenge to the national minimum drinking age (NMDA) amendment to the National Surface Transportation Act. The act authorizes federal grants to the states for the construction of national highways. The NMDA instructed the secretary of transportation to withhold up to ten percent of a state's federal highway funds if that state fails to enact a minimum drinking age of twenty-one within the next year. Thus, by attaching a condition to a grant, Congress sought to impose a uniform national minimum drinking age. In Dole the Court assumed for purposes of the case that Congress, after the TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT, could not have enacted a regulation requiring each state to adopt such a minimum drinking age for the state. Nor, the Court assumed arguendo, could Congress constitutionally have enacted a simple regulation directly prohibiting the purchase or consumption of alcohol by persons under twenty-one years of age. Thus, the only issue left for the Dole Court to resolve was whether the MNDA was constitutional as a condition accompanying a grant of federal funds to the states, even assuming that Congress could not regulate drinking ages directly under any of its delegated legislative powers.

The Dole Court observed that "Congress has acted indirectly under its spending power to encourage uniformity in the States' drinking ages." Thus, the legislation was held to be "within constitutional bounds even if Congress may not regulate drinking ages directly." In essence, the Court held that although Congress lacks regulatory authority to achieve a legislative end directly, Congress may "purchase" state compliance through the use of conditions attached to spending grants. The basis of the Court's holding is that there is a difference between coercing compliance (an exercise of regulatory power) and buying compliance (an exercise of the spending power). The Dole holding is in tension with other Supreme Court PRECEDENTS, notably Butler and the individual liberties cases, which recognize that conditional spending can be the conceptual and economic equivalent of direct regulation. In effect, the Court in Dole, voting 7–2, reverted to the notion that compliance with a condition attached to a benefit is "voluntary" as long as the potential recipient can choose to forgo the benefit in order to avoid compliance with the condition.

The Supreme Court's decision in Dole appears to invite the complete abrogation of all limits on delegated federal LEGISLATIVE POWER through the simple device of burdensome taxes accompanied by "financial incentives" to comply with any federal legislative objective that is outside the range of concerns constitutionally delegated to Congress. Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST's opinion in Dole, however, suggested some limitations on the breadth of the Court's holding.

First, said the Chief Justice, Congress may "induce" or "tempt" voluntary compliance, but may not "coerce" compliance. The difficulty with the coercioninducement test as a limit on congressional action is that it simply restates the distinction—discredited in some modern individual liberties cases—between achieving an end by regulation and achieving an end by withholding a benefit. The question of "how much benefit" simply is beside the point, for as Sherbert v. Verner concluded, any benefit withheld is tantamount to a fine in that amount. One who is subject to the threat of a regulatory fine may choose to violate the regulation and pay the fine because the amount of the fine is modest. But that "freedom" of choice does not eliminate constitutional objections to the substance of the regulation.

The facts of the Dole case suggest that Chief Justice Rehnquist was relying upon a distinction Congress would not even credit. Congress's very purpose in enacting the NMDA would have been undercut seriously if not every state had complied; it is clear that Congress had no intention of offering a choice, but threatened to withhold a benefit to obtain regulatory compliance.

Second, in a footnote Rehnquist suggested a constitutional requirement that any condition attached to a federal grant bear some relationship to that grant. In applying this suggestion to the facts of Dole, however, the Chief Justice simply noted that the condition related to the national problem of teenage drunk driving. Teenage drunk driving may well be a problem national in scope, but the condition did not in any way specify the characteristics of the highways that the conditioned funds were intended to purchase. Requiring only that the condition relate to a national problem rather than specify characteristics of the particular goods and services to be purchased by the grant seems tantamount to a statement that Congress can regulate perceived national problems through the spending power. Of course, Congress may with greater legitimacy reach many of the same subjects by the exercise of its wide-ranging commerce powers.

THOMAS R. MCCOY
BARRY FRIEDMAN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Federal Grants-in-Aid; Taxing and Spending Powers.)

Bibliography

MCCOY, THOMAS R. and FRIEDMAN, BARRY 1988 Conditional Spending: Federalism's Trojan Horse. Supreme Court Review 1988:85–127.

MIZERK, DONALD J. 1987 The Coercion Test and Conditional Federal Grants to the States. Vanderbilt Law Review 40: 1159–1195.

ROSENTHAL, ALBERT J. 1987 Conditional Federal Spending and the Constitution. Stanford Law Review 39:1103–1164.

SULLIVAN, KATHLEEN 1989 Unconstitutional Conditions. Harvard Law Review 102:1413–1506.

CONFEDERATE CONSTITUTION

The Constitution of the Confederate States of America, adopted in 1861, closely followed, and was in a sense a commentary upon, the Constitution of the United States. The most important points of divergence were: provision for the heads of executive departments to sit and speak in the Congress, a single six-year term for the President, a line-item VETO POWER over appropriations, explicit provision for presidential power to remove appointed officials, and the requirement of a two-thirds vote in each house to admit new states.

The Confederate Constitution prohibited laws impairing the right of property in slaves; but it also prohibited the foreign slave trade (except with the United States). Other innovations included a ban on federal expenditures for INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS and provision for state duties on sea-going vessels, to be used for improvement of harbors and navigable waters. The AMENDING PROCESS provided for a convention of the states to be summoned by Congress upon the demand of state conventions; Congress did not have the power to propose amendments itself.

The provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS of the United States Constitution were written into the body of the Confederate Constitution, as were those of the ELEVENTH and TWELFTH AMENDMENTS.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

COULTER, E. MERTON 1950 The Confederate States of America, 1861–1865. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

CONFERENCE

When the Justices of the Supreme Court refer to themselves in the aggregate as "the Conference"—as distinguished from "the Court"—they are alluding to their deliberative functions in reaching decisions. The Conference considers, discusses, even negotiates; the Court acts.

The name comes from the Justices' practice of meeting to discuss cases and vote on their disposition. Two kinds of questions are considered at these Conferences: whether the Court should review a case, and how to decide a case under review. Just before the beginning of each term, the Conference considers a great many applications for review. (See APPEAL; CERTIORARI, WRIT OF; APPELLATE JURISDICTION; ORIGINAL JURISDICTION.) During the term, in weeks when ORAL ARGUMENTS are scheduled, the Conference generally meets regularly to consider the cases argued within the preceding few days.

The Conference is limited to the nine Justices. Clerks and secretaries do not attend, and if messages are passed into the room, tradition calls for the junior Justice to be doorkeeper. By another tradition, each Justice shakes hands with all the other Justices before the Conference begins. The CHIEF JUSTICE presides.

The Chief Justice calls a case for discussion, and normally speaks first. The other Justices speak in turn, according to their seniority. (Interruptions are not unknown.) The custom has been for Justices to vote in inverse order of seniority, the Chief Justice voting last. Recent reports, however, suggest flexibility in this practice; when the Justices' positions are already obvious, a formal vote may be unnecessary. The vote at the Conference meeting is not final. Once draft opinions and memoranda "to the Conference" have begun to circulate, votes may change, and even the Court's decision may change.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Concurring Opinion; Dissenting Opinion; Opinion of the Court.)

Bibliography

HUGHES, CHARLES EVANS 1928 The Supreme Court of the United States: Its Foundation, Methods and Achievements: An Interpretation. New York: Columbia University Press.

WOODWARD, BOB and ARMSTRONG, SCOTT 1979 The Brethren: Inside the Supreme Court. New York: Simon & Schuster.

CONFESSIONS

See: Police Interrogation and Confessions

CONFIRMATIO CARTARUM
1297

Within two centuries after its adoption MAGNA CARTA was reconfirmed forty-four times. The reconfirmation of 1297 is significant because it was the first made after representatives of the commons were admitted to Parliament; because it embodied the inchoate principle that TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION is unlawful; and because it regarded Magna Carta as FUNDAMENTAL LAW. By one section the king agreed to exact certain taxes only "by the common assent of the realm. . . ." Another section declared that any act by the king's judges or ministers contrary to the great charter "shall be undone, and holden for nought." WILLIAM PENN ordered the charter and its reconfirmation of 1297 reprinted in the colonies for the first time in 1687. JOHN ADAMS, THOMAS JEFFERSON, and other lawyers of the era of the American Revolution were familiar with the principles of the statute of 1297, and in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) the Supreme Court declared that any act contrary to the fundamental law of the written constitution is void.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

PERRY, RICHARD L., ed. 1959 Sources of Our Liberties. Pages 23–31. New York: American Bar Foundation.

CONFIRMATION PROCESS

The Constitution vests in the President the power to appoint, with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the U.S. SENATE, "Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for." The Framers, however, were mindful that the lifetime appointment of judges to a coequal branch might demand different procedures and considerations from the appointment of officers serving limited terms in the executive branch and, as a result, throughout a good deal of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 the method of appointing judges was considered separately from the process of choosing executive officers. Particularly in the case of judicial appointments, achieving agreement among the delegates required a delicate balance to be struck between competing interests at the convention. Smaller states, for example, tended to favor greater senatorial control while representatives from the larger states sought enhanced executive authority through presidential appointment. Complicating the cleavage between small and large was the fundamental issue of where the center of power would be in the new national government; fearful of monarchy, some at the convention sought legislative dominance while others, extolling the virtue of efficiency, called for executive supremacy. Throughout the summer of 1787, the procedures for the appointment of judges and officers of the United States were the subject of spirited debate. The eventual compromise of presidential appointment joined with the advice and consent of the Senate only emerged from the Committee on Postponed Matters in the waning days of the convention. The product of a rather hasty trade-off among sharply held divergent views, the language and history of the APPOINTMENTS CLAUSE leave indefinite the precise nature of the role of the Senate in the appointment and confirmation process. The net result is that, although the phrase "advice and consent" has roots deep in British history, in the American context its interpretation has been shaped by the reality of contemporary politics rather than history or constitutional construction.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, for example, in THE FEDERALIST, advocated limiting the role of the Senate in the confirmation process to guarding against presidential appointment of "unfit characters." Whatever the constitutional merits of this position, Hamilton's preference quickly proved to be politically unworkable. By the early nineteenth century, the development of a full-fledged party system made the confirmation process, particularly in the case of federal judges, a contentious and often highly partisan affair. During this era senators were selected by state legislatures, and the typical senator was a state party leader sent to the Senate with the task of funneling federal PATRONAGE back to the local party organization. Federal judgeships quickly became part of the patronage package and the successful confirmation of these judges, regardless of individual merit, routinely hinged almost exclusively on the approval of home-state senators. The only indication of Senate deference to presidential prerogative was in the confirmation of cabinet-level appointments. Generally speaking, this was an era of congressional dominance and the Senate had the political autonomy to challenge a wide array of presidential appointments on a variety of partisan and ideological grounds.

During the initial decades of the twentieth century, a series of Progressive-era reforms—including the development of the direct primary, the introduction of nonpartisan local elections, and the passage of the SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT providing for the direct election of senators—produced weakened party control and organization in the Senate. By the time of the NEW DEAL, the center of influence and power at the national level had shifted from the legislative to the executive branch. The Senate began a period of relative quietude in which widely accepted norms of behavior worked to check the power and independence of individual senators and enhanced the authority and prestige of a few key Senate leaders. At mid-century, the Senate was a conservative, hierarchical, closed institution in which individual senators were content to concentrate on committee assignments and legislative work. Few senators sought media attention and there was little incentive for the average senator to challenge leadership decisions. In such an environment the confirmation process was a highly predictable, low-key, frequently invisible exercise in which a President, having secured the consent of a few key Senate leaders to any nomination, could be reasonably confident of success. Presidential APPOINTMENT OF SUPREME COURT JUSTICES provided a ready example; from the turn of the century to 1968 the Senate confirmed all but one nominee to the Court.

The modern era of the Senate confirmation process begins in the late 1960s with the protracted hearings in the SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE over the nomination of THURGOOD MARSHALL to the Supreme Court and the full Senate's failure to confirm ABE FORTAS as CHIEF JUSTICE in 1968. It is a process that is frequently nasty, brutish, and not particularly short. It is, in fact, a thoroughly democratic process, resembling at times a modern electoral campaign in which powerful interests employ sophisticated media techniques to mobilize public support or opposition. Senate proceedings, both in committee and on the floor, are often contentious and protracted, with the ultimate outcome being anything but predictable. One explanation for this development is the transformation of the modern Senate from an inner-directed, stable, hierarchical institution to a more fluid body populated by senators who are motivated to seek power and influence through national media exposure, unhampered by constraining norms. Contested, highly visible confirmation proceedings suit the public style of contemporary senators. With Senate leadership exercising few, if any, controls over the behavior of the members, the President is forced to negotiate with one hundred independent contractors in order to find the votes to secure confirmation. In the case of judicial appointments, this task is made even more formidable because the JUDICIAL ACTIVISM of the modern era has been marked by a willingness on the part of the federal courts to expand the range of litigants permitted access to the federal courts and to subject a wide sweep of public and private disputes to judicial intervention. This expansion of JUDICIAL POWER has made the question of who sits on the federal bench a matter of grave concern to diverse and powerful interests and makes a contentious confirmation process even more likely.

In the final analysis, a more contentious confirmation process simply reflects a general trend in modern American politics. Institutional combat through mechanisms such as congressional investigations, INDEPENDENT COUNSELS, criminal prosecutions, and media revelations increasingly have come to supplant elections as the means by which opposing political forces vie for influence, power, and control. Confirmation proceedings provide a ready opportunity for political groups to embarrass opposing interests, to impede policy implementation, and to weaken the executive branch by denying the President an expeditious route to filling important posts. As long as elections in the United States fail to define who will and who will not exercise political control, contentious confirmation proceedings for both executive and judicial appointments are ever more likely to be the rule rather than the exception.

MARK SILVERSTEIN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Bork Nomination; Clarence Thomas.)

Bibliography

ABRAHAM, HENRY J. 1992 Justices and Presidents: A Political History of Appointments to the Supreme Court, 3rd ed. New York: Oxford University Press.

GINSBERG, BENJAMIN and SHEFTER, MARTIN 1998 Politics by Other Means, 2nd ed. New York: W. W. Norton & Co.

SILVERSTEIN, MARK 1994 Judicious Choices: The New Politics of Supreme Court Confirmations. New York: W. W. Norton & Co.

TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND 1996 Obstacle Course: The Report of the Twentieth Century Fund Force on the Presidential Appointment Process. New York: Twentieth Century Fund.

CONFISCATION ACTS
12 Stat. 319 (1861)
12 Stat. 589 (1862)

Congress enacted the Confiscation Acts "to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion." Both statutes liberated the slaves of certain rebels and authorized the confiscation of other types of property by judicial procedures based on admiralty and revenue models. Both statutes were compromise measures, influenced by the progressive goal of emancipation of slaves and by a respect for the rights of private property.

The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the acts in the 6–3 decision of Miller v. United States (1871), finding congressional authority in the WAR POWERS clauses of Article I. The majority shrugged off Fifth and Sixth Amendment objections on the grounds that the statutes were not ordinary punitive legislation but rather were extraordinary war measures.

The acts were indifferently and arbitrarily enforced, producing a total of less than $130,000 net to the Treasury. Property of Confederates was also virtually confiscated in proceedings for nonpayment of the wartime direct tax, under the Captured and Abandoned Property Act of 1863, and through President ABRAHAM LINCOLN's contraband emancipation policies.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

RANDALL, JAMES G. 1951 Constitutional Problems under Lincoln. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

CONFRONTATION, RIGHT OF

The confrontation clause of the Sixth Amendment, which guarantees an accused person the right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him," is one of the two clauses in the BILL OF RIGHTS that explicitly address the right of criminal defendants to elicit evidence in their defense from witnesses at trial. The other clause is its Sixth Amendment companion, the COMPULSORY PROCESS clause, which guarantees the accused the right to "compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." Together these two clauses provide constitutional foundations for the right of accused persons to defend themselves through the production and examination of witnesses at trial.

PETER WESTEN
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Hearsay Rule.)

CONFRONTATION, RIGHT OF (Update)

The Supreme Court has explained that the accused's Sixth Amendment right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him" has the primary function of furthering the trial's truth-determining process. But recent cases reveal conflicts over the best way to ascertain truth and competing visions of a trial's shape. Cases involving children especially have posed the question whether a dramatic and adversarial trial, with the accusing witness and accused as protagonist and antagonist, tends to produce the most accurate results. They have also posed the question of the extent to which values other than truth-seeking—such as protecting a witness from the trauma of trial—can supervene the confrontation right.

Taking its cue from Shakespeare's Richard II—"Then call them to our presence; face to face and frowning brow to brow, ourselves will hear the accuser and the accused freely speak" (1.1.15–17)—the Court in COY V. IOWA (1988) held that the core of the right, manifest in the Sixth Amendment's text, involves physical face-to-face confrontation between witness and accused. Keeping the dramatis personae together on the trial's stage contributes not only to honest testimony but to maintaining our dramatic sense of what a trial is: "There is something deep in human nature that regards face-to-face confrontation between accused and accuser as "essential to a fair trial." Accordingly, Coy held unconstitutional a statute allowing in all such cases a screen to obstruct a sexually abused minor witness's view of the accused.

MARYLAND V. CRAIG (1990) answered affirmatively the question Coy reserved: whether a court may employ such a device if it first makes an individualized finding that an important state interest justifies its use in a particular case. But Craig did not clarify whether protecting a witness from serious distress or trauma can justify a device that does not also aid truth-seeking by enabling a child, whom distress would otherwise render substantially unavailable, to testify. The device, upheld in Craig, altered the nature of the trial by mixing the media of stage and television: in the courtroom, the defendant, judge, and jury watched, via closed-circuit television, real-time pictures of the child testifying in another room in the presence of the prosecutor and defense counsel. In contrast to Coy, the Craig decision described face-to-face confrontation only as a preference and emphasized that the confrontation clause's interest in reliability can be furthered sufficiently by a witness's testifying under oath and being cross-examined while observed by the trier of fact. In addition, Kentucky v. Stincer (1987) determined that the accused may be excluded from a routine witness-competency hearing of a sexually abused minor, because his right to confrontation regarding the witness's substantive testimony remains intact.

Other opinions focus entirely on cross-examination as the core of the confrontation right. While emphasizing that a judge has wide latitude to impose reasonable limits on cross-examination to avoid harassment, prejudice, confusion, trauma, repetition, and the like, recent cases, such as Delaware v. Van Arsdall (1986) and Olden v. Kentucky (1988), hold that, save for HARMLESS ERROR, a trial judge cannot exclude all inquiry into traditionally relevant subject areas, such as bias and other credibility matters. For example, Davis v. Alaska (1974) holds that a court cannot restrict cross-examination about a witness's juvenile court record, despite a statute protecting the record's confidentiality. With respect to the adversarial manner of cross-examination, lower courts do not readily restrict the cross-examination of children to a gentle inquiry using age-appropriate language and concepts, despite claims that traditional cross-examination on counsel's terms is not conducive to a child's truth-telling.

The Court is divided on whether the cross-examination right is exclusively a procedural trial right that guarantees only an opportunity to cross-examine or whether it is also a right that can enhance effective cross-examination by affording PRETRIAL DISCLOSURE, and DISCOVERY. The EYEWITNESS IDENTIFICATION rules established by UNITED STATES V. WADE (1967) exemplify this latter approach. The former is found in Pennsylvania v. Ritchie (1987), in which a trial court refused to give defense counsel access to a child welfare office's investigatory file of a sexual abuse case, pursuant to a statute establishing its confidentiality. Because defense counsel had the opportunity to examine the accusing daughter at trial, a plurality found no confrontation clause violation. The Court did require the trial judge to conduct a review of the file in camera to determine whether the accused's due process rights required disclosure. The view that the confrontation clause assures an opportunity to cross-examine but not effective cross-examination led the Court, in United States v. Owens (1988) and Delaware v. Fensterer (1985), to uphold the admission of a testifying witness's out-of-court statements, even though he had lost all memory concerning the statements other than the fact that he had previously made them.

Finally, the Supreme Court continues to address the admission of HEARSAY and of codefendant statements. Ohio v. Roberts (1980), involving the admission of the prior testimony of an unavailable witness, indicated that the confrontation clause imposes a strong preference for in-court statements, which requires the state to make a good-faith effort to produce the declarant in court, and a requirement that the admission of an out-of-court statement be based on indicia of reliability, established either by its coming "within a firmly rooted hearsay exception" or by a showing of "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness." But in Bourjaily v. United States (1987) and United States v. Inadi (1986), the Court interpreted the two Roberts requirements as applying primarily to the admission of prior testimony. Bourjaily limited the Roberts indicia of reliability requirement by admitting coconspirator statements under an agency theory without regard to their reliability. Inadi permitted the prosecutor to introduce out-of-court statements of a coconspirator without making much effort to produce him. It distinguished prior testimony in Roberts from these coconspirator statements, in that the latter, precisely because they were made during the conspiracy, may be more probative than a declarant's subsequent postconspiracy in-court statements. This view—that a trial can best achieve truth through the consideration of statements made in a natural setting rather than through the artifice of a dramatic and adversarial replaying at trial—finds support in some lower court decisions admitting children's out-of-court statements made near the time of their abuse or in the context of a trusted relationship. However, by reemphasizing the Roberts requirements, the Supreme Court, in Idaho v. Wright (1990), rejected the admission, under a residual hearsay exception, of a sexual abuse accusation made by an unavailable three-year-old in response to the allegedly suggestive questions of an examining pediatrician. With little consideration of the growing psychological evidence on the subject, the Court emphasized that to be admissible the out-of-court statement must have been made under circumstances evidencing such trustworthiness that, subsequently at trial, "adversarial testing would add little to its reliability."

With respect to codefendant confessions, in Cruz v. New York (1987), Richardson v. Marsh (1987), Lee v. Illinois (1986), and Tennessee v. Street (1985), the Court reaffirmed (if only narrowly) and refined Bruton v. United States (1968) by prohibiting the limited admission against a nontestifying codefendant of that portion of his confession that directly implicates the defendant but is not admissible against him.

In noncriminal cases, the DUE PROCESS clause can afford some sort of confrontation right to enhance the truth-determining process. IN RE GAULT (1967) held that a minor who risks loss of liberty in a state juvenile institution enjoys a right of confrontation, including sworn testimony subject to cross-examination. Lower courts have similarly guaranteed such a right in civil commitment proceedings for those suffering from MENTAL ILLNESS, even though these proceedings in practice are not particularly adversarial and rely heavily on out-of-court statements not strictly within traditional hearsay exceptions. The scope of confrontation rights in proceedings involving the custody of children, as in civil child abuse cases, is currently disputed in doctrine and in practice. The Supreme Court recognized the right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses in administrative hearings prior to the termination of WELFARE BENEFITS in GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970) and prior to a prisoner's transfer to a mental hospital in Vitek v. Jones (1980). But the Court has permitted decision making without confrontation, based on a written record or on hearing the affected individual's side of the story, in other cases, such as a prison disciplinary proceeding in Wolff v. McDonnell (1974) and a PUBLIC EMPLOYEE predischarge review that precedes a fuller post-deprivation hearing in Cleveland Board of Education v. Loudermill (1985).

ROBERT D. GOLDSTEIN
(1992)

Bibliography

GRAHAM, MICHAEL H. 1988 The Confrontation Clause, the Hearsay Rule, and Child Sexual Abuse Prosecutions: The State of the Relationship. Minnesota Law Review 72:523–601.

HADDAD, JAMES B. 1990 The Future of Confrontation Clause Developments: What Will Emerge When the Supreme Court Synthesizes the Diverse Lines of Confrontation Decisions. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 81:77–98.

JONAKAIT, RANDOLPH N. 1988 Restoring the Confrontation Clause to the Sixth Amendment. UCLA Law Review 35:557–622.

CONGRESS AND FOREIGN POLICY

Congress has three principal functions. As a forum for debate, it is a vital instrument for creating and crystallizing public opinion, the source of all legitimate governmental power and policy in a democratic society. Through the investigatory power of its committees, it is the grand inquest of the nation, watching society and government with an eye for new and emerging problems. And it has the sole power of legislation on certain subjects, qualified only by the President's veto. All three aspects of Congress's work are important to its activities in the field of FOREIGN AFFAIRS. This article, however, will concentrate on Congress's role in legislation and its attempt to become a major participant in administration, the only area of its foreign policy agenda currently generating serious constitutional problems.

The Constitution divides the task of making and carrying out foreign policy in accordance with the rule that except where the Constitution provides otherwise, Congress is vested with the legislative part of American foreign policy and the President with the executive portion. Articles I and II mention certain subjects that illustrate the distinction between "legislative" and "executive" functions, and Article I, section 6, paragraph 2, provides that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be member of either House during his continuance in office." In a sentence focused on safeguards against corruption of the governmental process by either Congress or the President, paragraph 2 reveals the clear expectation that the new American constitutional order was not to be a cabinet government, but that Congress and the executive were to be separated institutionally as well as by function. During the period of drafting the Constitution, the presidency was deliberately made unitary rather than plural. And much was said and written about an executive capable of "energy, secrecy, and dispatch," as contrasted with a deliberative legislature not directly involved in the execution of the laws.

Drawing a line between the legislative and executive spheres has been conspicuously difficult in the area of foreign policy, however. One reason why this should be so is that foreign policy includes much more than the passage of statutes and the negotiation of international agreements and their subsequent execution. Much foreign policy is necessarily made in the ordinary course of diplomacy. And from the beginnings under the Constitution of 1787, the President has been recognized as the sole agent of the nation in its dealings with other states. He alone receives ambassadors and, from time to time, declares them unacceptable and sends them away. The power to recognize nations and to withhold recognition was accepted early as entirely presidential. The President is the chief diplomat of the nation; he smiles and frowns, speaks or remains silent, warns, praises, protests, and negotiates.

Even when diplomacy results in treaties that require approval by the Senate before ratification or in EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS, which the President may or may not submit for a congressional vote, the process of making foreign policy is more heavily influenced by the President than is the passage of most statutes, which make policy in advance of action. The President can shape the circumstances in which issues of foreign policy come before Congress more often and more effectively than he can in dealing with issues of domestic policy. On the other hand, the negotiating process has its own constitutional pitfalls. If the Senate has to consent to the ratification of a major treaty or if Congress must pass enabling legislation in support of a treaty or executive agreement, members of Congress may be surly and uncooperative if they have not somehow participated in the negotiations themselves within or even beyond the limits of Article I, section 6, of the Constitution. Since the failure of the Versailles Treaty in 1919, every President has sought to anticipate the problem through briefings, consultations, or even membership or observer status for senators on negotiating delegations. If, on the other hand, members of Congress are suitably consulted about the instructions given to the negotiators and the ultimate bargain falls short of the goals specified in the instructions, pitfalls of another kind appear. The relation of Congress and the President in the making and ratification of treaties and executive agreements has therefore been a major political and constitutional irritant at least since 1795, when JAY'S TREATY was barely ratified.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON took the view that the executive, legislative, and judicial powers were to be distinguished by their "nature." The EXECUTIVE POWER, he said, is all governmental power that is neither judicial nor legislative in character. From this somewhat circular eighteenth-century axiom, Hamilton, THOMAS JEFFERSON, and JOHN MARSHALL drew a conclusion that has been of critical importance to CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION ever since. Where a power is executive in character, Hamilton wrote, it is deemed to be presidential unless that conclusion is excluded by the constitutional text. In such cases, presidential supremacy is the rule and congressional authority the exception, and exceptions are to be strictly construed. The same rule of construction applies when powers are characterized as legislative or judicial. Here, too, the granted power is to be construed broadly, and the exceptions narrowly.

This rule is not without its modern critics. A few recent writers have urged that Congress be considered the supreme institution of government in all realms, and not only in the legislative sphere. They forget that the Constitution of 1787 was composed and adopted by men who found congressional supremacy under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION an unsatisfactory mode of government. The only reason such critics offer for their conclusion is that the United States is "a republic which has become a democracy" and that the imperious rise of modern democracy makes presidential and perhaps even judicial independence an anachronism.

In making and carrying out foreign policy, Congress and the President are forced to work together: neither Congress nor the President can conduct foreign policy alone for long. Sooner or later, a President will need money, new statutes, or both. And, as presently constituted, Congress is incapable of conducting diplomacy or commanding the armed forces, save by sporadic intervention in highly charged episodes. The history of American foreign policy is therefore necessarily the history of a rivalrous and uneasy partnership between Congress and the President, with occasional intervals of harmony and a few of utter frustration, such as WOODROW WILSON's tragic final days.

The normal congressional impulse to nibble at the President's executive authority has gained momentum in recent years from four major sources. The first and perhaps the most important has been the growth in congressional staff, which goes back to the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946. Before that fateful reform was adopted, Congress and its committees relied largely on the administration of the day for assistance in research and drafting. The Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress provided some supplemental help, but until the recent past, that service was extremely small. Today, congressional staffs include 35,000 people, and the Congressional Research Service, several hundred more.

The influence of an able young congressional staff on the relations between Congress and the President has been reinforced by a second source of congressional ascendency: the modern habit of electing a Democratic Congress and a Republican President. The habit has been rather popular with the voters, but has decidedly negative features. For example, it encourages partisan irresponsibility on the part of Congress even on major national issues, especially in the field of foreign affairs.

These two tendencies together produce a third: the practice of writing long and elaborate statutes intended to control the President and the courts in detail as they apply statutes and treaties to new situations. As an astute observer recently noted, one of the most influential statutes ever enacted by Congress, the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT, consists of six brief paragraphs occupying less than half a page, whereas statutes now tend to be hundreds, if not thousands, of pages long.

Fourth and finally, congressional attacks on the President's prerogatives in the field of foreign affairs draw strength from widespread protest against the foreign policy the United States has pursued since 1945. That protest is based on a nostalgic yearning for the neutrality and comparative isolation of the United States during the century between 1815 and 1914.

These flows of change were suddenly accelerated in the late 1960s and early 1970s by the growing unpopularity of the VIETNAM WAR and the WATERGATE scandal. Protest movements against the war in Vietnam became ominous. In turn, this phenomenon led Congress to move decisively both to stop "Johnson's War" and to alter the traditional constitutional balance between Congress and the President so that such "presidential" wars could never happen again. Thomas M. Franck and Edward Weisbard call this vague and many-sided movement a congressional revolution that has radically redistributed the foreign affairs powers in favor of Congress at the expense of the presidency. Foreign policy, they proclaim, will now be made by "co-determination," without regard to the distinction between legislative and executive functions. The Bastille Day of the congressional revolution, they say, was June 29, 1973, the day when President RICHARD M. NIXON surrendered to a congressional effort to end the American military involvement in Indochina and promised to stop bombing in Cambodia. "With that sullen concession, power over foreign policy shifted: from the imperial President and his discreet and decorous professional relations managers to the undisciplined, rambunctious rabble of the House and Senate."

The power to end wars by armistice and cease-fire agreements had always been regarded as part of the President's authority as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF. In the case of the Vietnam War, however, the explosion of opinion against the war and the coincidence of the Watergate scandal and the revulsion it produced against President Nixon led to the success of Congress's attempt to end the war independently by using its power over appropriations and forcing a gravely wounded President to acquiesce in its action. This extraordinary conjuncture of political forces also permitted Congress to override President Nixon's veto of the WAR POWERS ACT.

Actually, the revolt of Congress against the Hamiltonian conception of the presidency began long before the explosion of opinion against the Vietnam War and President Nixon. A key weapon of Congress in that battle was, and remains, the LEGISLATIVE VETO in all its forms. The legislative veto was invented in 1932. It allows Congress to overrule presidential constructions and applications of existing law by CONCURRENT RESOLUTION, that is, to reverse purely executive actions without having to confront the President's VETO POWER. Since that time, the practice had spread throughout the statute books, but particularly in the realm of foreign policy. The Lend-Lease Act of 1941, for example, contained a legislative veto provision, stipulating that Congress could terminate the act by concurrent resolution. President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT thought the provision unconstitutional, but acquiesced in it silently because the act was of transcendent importance, and it was by no means clear that it would have passed without the legislative veto.

During the prolonged struggle between Congress and the President over foreign policy during the 1960s and 1970s, legislation of this kind became a flood. That legislation attempted to control presidential discretion in interpreting and applying statutes and treaties not only by concurrent resolutions passed by both houses but also by veto-free delegations of executive power to one house and even to particular committees of either house.

The Supreme Court held the legislative veto unconstitutional in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), but Congress has not yet seriously undertaken to comply with the decision by removing from the books more than 200 statutes directly affected by it. Indeed, Congress is still defying the Court by passing or seriously considering bills that would openly violate the rule of the decision.

How far can Congress go in using its power of the purse as a sword in its struggle to seize executive power? In the past, both political usage and Supreme Court opinions made clear that the appropriations power had constitutional limits. Several congressional conditions on the spending of appropriated funds have been ruled or declared to be unconstitutional in cases that include UNITED STATES V. LOVETT (1946), MYERS V. UNITED STATES (1926), United States v. Klein (1872), and FLAST V. COHEN (1968). Congress's recent experiments with expanded uses of its appropriations power have stimulated original and provocative law review articles suggesting that the President now has the power to use a line item veto and a limited power to spend in emergencies without prior appropriations and that Congress cannot use its appropriations power to prevent the President from carrying out his constitutional duties. Future constitutional development along some of these lines would be a normal response to perceptions of a congressional thrust for excessive power.

Twelve years after Franck proclaimed the success of what he regarded as Congress's wholesome and cleansing revolution, it is clear that while much has changed, his optimism was premature. Whether the congressional attempt to transform the constitutional relationship between Congress and the President in the field of foreign affairs will prevail in the end remains to be seen. Institutions 200 years old normally reflect the necessities of function. As Franck remarks, if Congress demonstrates that it cannot in fact use its new powers or if its key members are unwilling or unable to devote the necessary time and attention to their new foreign policy responsibilities, "power will run off Capitol Hill."

What is clear, however, is that the historical conflict between Congress and the President about the making and implementation of foreign policy has changed fundamentally. It is no longer the push and pull of a natural tug of war between the legislative and executive branches, operating within the framework of well-understood rules and habits. Congress has been pressing with new determination to take over executive functions in many areas of government, and particularly in foreign affairs. The constitutional balance between Congress and the President has shifted so radically that "the inevitable friction" about which Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS wrote in Myers v. United States has become war, marked both by episodes of bitter hostility and by a slow presidential retreat that is transforming the President into a prime minister or constitutional monarch, ceremoniously presiding over an increasingly strong Congress. Whether we describe this transformation as a glorious revolution or as a constitutional crisis is immaterial. What is at stake in the battle is far more than constitutional piety or even the effectiveness of government, important as it is. What is at stake is the future of liberty. The accumulation of the legislative and executive powers in the same hands, as Jefferson, JAMES MADISON, and others have said over the years, is "the very definition of tyranny."

The powers of the presidency have not been formally annulled. They are still latent in the bloodstream of the government. But they encounter more and more resistance each time a President tries to use them. As a result, the presidency is being stripped of some of its more important prerogatives.

If the present trends are not reversed by the courts, the President will soon be wrapped like Gulliver in a web of regulatory statutes and hopelessly weakened. Although the President has the sole constitutional authority to conduct foreign relations, congressional leaders sometimes negotiate independently with foreign governments, as they have done recently with Nicaragua, for example. Substantive riders on appropriations bills and other devices to evade the President's veto power are more popular than ever. Congress has already put the President under the control of a congressional cabinet in the exercise of his responsibilities for intelligence and is actively considering applying that model to the process of making "presidential" decisions about the use of force and foreign policy more generally. If that possibility should materialize, the presidency the nation has known since 1789, the presidency of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and Franklin D. Roosevelt, would be no more.

The Persian Gulf crisis of 1990–1991, however, demonstrated once again the functional necessity for the historic powers of the President. The abject failure of Congress to manage that episode should do much to restore the constitutional balance.

EUGENE V. ROSTOW
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Advice and Consent; Congressional War Powers; Foreign Affairs; Senate and Foreign Policy; Treaty Power.)

Bibliography

CRABB, CECIL V., JR. and HOLT, PAT 1989 Invitation to Struggle: Congress, the President, and Foreign Policy, 3rd ed. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1985 Constitutional Conflicts Between Congress and the President. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

_____1988 Constitutional Dialogues. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

FRANCK, THOMAS M. and WEISBAND, EDWARD 1979 Foreign Policy by Congress. New York: Oxford University Press.

ROSTOW, EUGENE V. 1989 President, Prime Minister, or Constitutional Monarch? Washington, D.C.: National Defense University Press.

WILSON, WOODROW (1885) 1967 Congressional Government. Cleveland, Ohio: Meridan Books.

CONGRESS AND THE SUPREME COURT

The delegates to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 confronted two fundamental problems in their quest to correct the political defects of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. First, they needed to bolster the powers of government at the national level so as to transform the "league of friendship" created by the Articles into a government with all the coercive powers requisite to government. Second, the Framers sought to create energetic but limited powers that would enable the new national government to govern, but in ways safe to the rights of the people. As JAMES MADISON put it in THE FEDERALIST #51, the task was to "enable the government to control the governed, but in the next place oblige it to control itself."

Their successful solution to this political problem was to separate the powers of government. Because the primary source of trouble in a popular form of government would be the legislative branch, the object was to bolster the coordinate executive and judicial branches, to offer "some more adequate defence. . . . for the more feeble, against the more powerful members of the government." The arrangement of checked and balanced institutions would at once avoid "a tyrannical concentration of all the powers of government in the same hands" while rendering the administration of the national government more efficient.

When the Framers examined the existing federal system under the Articles to determine precisely what it was that rendered it "altogether unfit for the administration of the affairs of the Union," the want of an independent judiciary "crown[ed] the defects of the confederation." As ALEXANDER HAMILTON put it in The Federalist #22, "Laws are a dead letter without courts to expound and define their true meaning and operation." Thus the improved science of politics offered by the friends of the Constitution prominently included provision for "the institution of courts composed of judges, holding their offices during good behavior."

But to some Anti-Federalist critics of the Federalist-backed Constitution, the judiciary was too independent and too powerful. To the New York ANTI-FEDERALIST "Brutus," the proposed judiciary possessed such independence as to allow the courts to "mould the government into almost any shape they please." The "Federal Farmer" was equally critical: his fellow citizens were "more in danger of sowing the seeds of arbitrary government in this department than in any other." With such unanticipated criticism, the Federalists were forced to defend the judicial power more elaborately than had been done in the early pages of The Federalist.

So compelling were the Anti-Federalist arguments that Hamilton saw fit to explain and defend the proposed judicial power in no fewer than six separate essays (#78–83) in The Federalist. His task was to show how an independent judiciary was not only not a threat to safe popular government but was absolutely essential to it. In making his now famous argument in The Federalist #78 that the judiciary would be that branch of the new government "least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution," Hamilton made the case that the courts were "designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority." By exercising neither force nor will but merely judgment, the courts would prove to be the "bulwarks of a limited constitution." Such an institution, Hamilton argued, politically independent yet constitutionally rooted, was essential to resist the overwhelming power of the majority of the community. Only with such a constitutional defense could the rights of individuals and of minor parties be protected against majority tyranny; only an independent judiciary could allow the powers of the national government to be sufficiently enhanced, while simultaneously checking the unhealthy impulses of majority rule that had characterized politics at the state level under the Articles.

To counter the Anti-Federalist complaint that the courts would be imperiously independent, Hamilton reminded them that the courts would not be simply free-wheeling sources of arbitrary judgments and decrees. The Constitution, in giving Congress the power to regulate the APPELLATE JURISDICTION of the Supreme Court "with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make," hedged against too expansive a conception of judicial power. "To avoid an arbitrary discretion in the courts," Hamilton noted, "it is indispensable that they should be bound down by strict rules and precedents, which serve to define and point out their duty in every particular case that comes before them." Thus the stage was set for a history of political confrontation between the Congress and the Court.

The tension between Congress and the Court has been a constant part of American politics at least since CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793) led to the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT. Each generation has seen dramatic Supreme Court rulings that have prompted political cries to curb the courts. JOHN MARSHALL's now celebrated opinions in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) and MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), for example, caused him a good bit of political grief when he wrote them; the decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) soon came to be viewed as a judicially "self-inflicted wound" that weakened the Court and exacerbated the conflict that descended into civil war; and more recently, protests against the rulings in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) and ROE V. WADE (1973) have caused not only political demands for retaliation against the Court but social conflict and even violence as well. But through it all the Court has weathered the hostility with its independence intact.

Only once were the critics successful in persuading Congress to act against the Court, and the Court validated that move. In EX PARTE MCCARDLE (1869) the Court confirmed Congress's power to withdraw a portion of the Court's appellate jurisdiction. Fearing that the Court would use William McCardle's petition for a writ of HABEAS CORPUS under the HABEAS CORPUS ACT OF 1867 as a vehicle for invalidating the Reconstruction Acts in toto, the Congress repealed that portion of the act under which McCardle had brought his action—and after the Court had heard arguments in the case. The Court upheld the constitutionality of Congress's action in repealing this particular part of the Court's JURISDICTION. The extent of Congress's power to withdraw the Court's appellate jurisdiction remains a matter of constitutional controversy.

The constitutional relationship between Congress and the Court is one thing; their political relationship is another matter. Although there are often loud cries for reaction against the Court, the critics usually lack sufficient force to achieve political retribution. The reason is most often explained as a matter of political prudence. The courts by their decisions frequently irritate a portion of the community—but usually only a portion. For most decisions will satisfy certain public constituencies that are as vociferous as the critics. Even the most errant exercises of judicial decision making are rarely sufficient to undermine the public respect for the idea of an independent judiciary.

The reason for this is simple enough: an independent judiciary makes good political sense. To make the judiciary too much dependent upon "popularity" as that popularity may be reflected in Congress would be to lower the constitutional barriers to congressional power, barriers generally agreeable to most people most of the time. The arguments of Hamilton in The Federalist still carry considerable weight.

Thus in the constitutional design of separating the powers of government through the device of "partial agency"—mingling the powers enough to give each branch some control over the others—is to be found the inevitable gulf between legitimate power and prudent restraint. For Congress to be persuaded to restrict judicial power, the case must first be made that such restrictions are both necessary and proper.

Despite the dangers of legislative power, it was still considered by the Framers to be the cardinal principle of POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY. Basic to this principle is the belief that it is legitimate for the people through the instrumentality of law to adjust, check, or enhance certain institutions of the government. This belief embraces the power of the legislature to exert some control over the structure and administration of the executive and judicial branches.

The qualified power of the legislature to tamper with the judiciary is not so grave a danger to the balance of the Constitution as some see it. For even when a judicial decision runs counter to particular—and perhaps pervasive—political interests, the institutional arrangements of the Constitution are such as to slow down the popular outrage and give the people time for "more cool and sedate reflection." And given the distance between the people and LEGISLATION afforded by such devices as REPRESENTATION (with its multiplicity of interests), BICAMERALISM, and the executive VETO POWER, an immediate legislative backlash to judicial behavior is unlikely. Experience demonstrates that any backlash at all is likely to be "weak and ineffectual." But if the negative response is not merely transient and is widely and deeply felt, then the Constitution wisely provides well-defined mechanisms for a deliberate political reaction to what the people hold to be intolerable judicial excesses.

But ultimately the history of court-curbing efforts in America, from the failed IMPEACHMENT of Justice SAMUEL CHASE to the Court-packing plan of FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, teaches one basic lesson: the American political system generally operates to the advantage of the judiciary. Presidential court-packing is ineffective as a means of exerting political influence, and impeachment is too difficult to use as an everyday check against unpopular decisions. Not since John Marshall saw fit pseudonymously to defend his opinion in McCulloch v. Maryland (1819) in the public press has any Justice or judge felt obliged to respond to public outrage over a decision.

Political responses to perceived excesses of judicial power tend to take one of two forms: either a policy response against a particular decision or an institutional response against the structure and powers of the courts. In either event, the response may be either partisan or principled. Usually a policy response will take the form of a proposed constitutional amendment or statute designed to overrule a decision. An institutional response will generally seek to make jurisdictional exceptions, to create special courts with specific jurisdiction, or to make adjustments regarding the personnel, administration, or procedures of the judicial branch. Whatever the response, court-curbing is difficult. Although a majority of one of the houses of Congress may object to particular cases of "judicial impertinence," as one congressman viewed Justice DAVID DAVIS's controversial opinion in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), a variety of objections will issue in different views of what should be done.

On the whole, there has consistently been a consensus that tampering with judicial independence is a serious matter and that rash reprisals against the Court as an institution may upset the constitutional balance. Underlying the occasional outbursts of angry public sentiment against the court is that "moral force" of the community of which ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE wrote. On the whole, the American people continue to view the judiciary as the "boast of the Constitution."

For any political attempt to adjust or limit the judicial power to be successful it is necessary that it be—and be perceived to be—a principled rather than a merely partisan response. Only then will the issue of JUDICIAL ACTIVISM be met on a ground high enough to transcend the more common—and generally fruitless—debates over judicial liberalism and conservatism. The deepest issue is not whether a particular decision or even a particular court is too liberal for some and too conservative for others; the point is whether the courts are exercising their powers capably and legitimately. Keeping the courts constitutionally legitimate and institutionally capable benefits both the liberal and the conservative elements in American politics.

The system the Framers devised is so structured that the branch the Framers thought "least dangerous" is not so malleable in the hands of Congress as to be powerless. Yet the threat of congressional restriction of the Court remains, a threat that probably helps to keep an otherwise largely unfettered institution within constitutional bounds.

GARY L. MCDOWELL
(1986)

Bibliography

BERGER, RAOUL 1969 Congress versus the Supreme Court. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

BRECKENRIDGE, A. C. 1971 Congress Against the Court. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.

MORGAN, DONALD L. 1967 Congress and the Constitution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

MURPHY, WALTER F. 1962 Congress and the Courts. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET AND IMPOUNDMENT CONTROL ACT

88 Stat. 297 (1974)

President RICHARD M. NIXON'S IMPOUNDMENT of billions of dollars appropriated by Congress for purposes which he did not approve amounted to the assertion of virtually uncontrollable power to block any federal program involving monetary expenditures. Nixon used impoundment as a weapon to alter legislative policy rather than to control the total level of government spending.

Congress, in the 1974 act, strengthened its own budgeting process, establishing new budget committees in each house and creating the Congressional Budget Office to give Congress assistance comparable to that given the President by the OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET. The act required the President to recommend to Congress, in a special message, any proposal to impound funds. Thereafter, either house might veto the impoundment proposal by resolution, thereby forcing release of the funds. If the President refused to comply, the Comptroller General was authorized to seek a court order requiring the President to spend the money. The constitutionality of the LEGISLA-TIVE VETO was thrown into doubt by the IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983).

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Budget Process; Constitutional History, 1961–1977.)

CONGRESSIONAL GOVERNMENT

In creating the Constitution, the Framers created a functional SEPARATION OF POWERS, with separate institutions exercising the legislative, executive, and judicial powers. The Constitution also creates a system of CHECKS AND BALANCES, however, with each of the three branches participating in the functions of the others to some degree. In creating this system, the Framers did not specify exactly how much power the various branches were to have relative to one another. As a consequence, the precise balance of power has been left to subsequent historical development.

The late nineteenth century was a period of legislative dominance of the federal government. In 1885, a young WOODROW WILSON described the workings of the constitutional system as "congressional government." The label has stuck as a description of the federal government from roughly 1867 to the turn of the century. This system did not arise by accident. It was a product of the political and constitutional struggles of the CIVIL WAR. The victorious REPUBLICAN PARTY was largely composed of former Whigs, who had originally organized in the 1830s in opposition to the strong presidency of ANDREW JACKSON, or "King Andy." Their preference for congressional leadership, however, was delayed by the exigencies of civil war, which required giving extraordinary powers to the Republican President ABRAHAM LINCOLN. Lincoln's death and disagreements with his successor, ANDREW JOHNSON, led Congress to take legislative control of RECONSTRUCTION. For the first time, Congress overrode a significant presidential veto. Soon, Congress routinely overrode Johnson's vetoes, before eventually attempting to remove him from office through an IMPEACHMENT in 1867 for his resistance to congressional policy.

After the Johnson impeachment (and despite his acquittal), Presidents were on the political defensive and Congress effectively dictated national policy. Executive appointments were a crucial source of political power in the nineteenth century, as well as an important policy decision. In sharp contrast to the modern deference to presidential nominations, the postbellum U.S. SENATE aggressively used its confirmation powers to force Presidents to select officials who were friendly to Congress. At the same time, civil service reforms removed a potential tool for rewarding party loyalists from congressional party leaders, but it also took away a political weapon that earlier Presidents had used to win control of the POLITICAL PARTIES and exert pressure on legislators. The presidential APPOINTING AND REMOVAL POWER was carefully curtailed during this period.

Congress also dominated policymaking. In this period, federal policy was overwhelming made through legislation, which in turn was effectively made by congressional committees. The limitations on presidential appointments prevented the President from developing a system of advisors with whom to develop independent policy recommendations. Even when Presidents urged policies, their proposals carried little weight in what was seen as an exclusively legislative prerogative. The British observer James Bryce found that presidential messages had less effect than "an article in a prominent party newspaper," and their suggestions were "neglected." Congress also restricted presidential discretion in carrying out federal policy. The "EXECUTIVE POWER" was to be narrowly understood, requiring the implementation of the legislative will without any independent policy choice on the part of the President. When the federal government began to take on new regulatory burdens late in the century, Congress chose to create independent commissions or deal directly with executive departments rather than delegate additional powers to the President. A bureaucratic "fourth branch" was seen as preferable to a strengthened presidency.

Congressional government affected the stature as well as the power of the president. Presidential candidates during the period were creatures of the congressionally based political parties. Nominees were not intended to be threatening to existing congressional interests, and as a consequence, the late-nineteenth-century presidency attracted "small men," who came to office with little national reputation and gained no additional stature while in office. Presidents were merely caretakers, and their public appearances were few and largely ceremonial.

Congressional government arose through a combination of the scheme of government created by the separation of powers and the political interpretation of those constitutional powers. Congress had important tools that it was willing to use, such as the power to confirm or reject presidential appointments. And the political actors of the time generally agreed on a theory of government that emphasized the "popular branch" to the exclusion of executive power. Presidents spent the late nineteenth century gradually attempting to regain the influence that they had lost after the war, but congressional government was not overturned until America's emergence as a world power at the turn of the century and the rise of aggressive Presidents willing to challenge inherited political practices and constitutional understandings.

KEITH E. WHITTINGTON
(2000)

Bibliography

BINKLEY, WILFRED E. 1962 President and Congress, 3rd rev. ed. New York: Vintage.

BRYCE, JAMES 1941 The American Commonwealth, 3rd rev. ed. New York: Macmillan.

WILSON, WOODROW 1885 Congressional Government: A Study in American Politics. Boston, Mass.: Houghton, Mifflin.

CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS

See: Legislative Investigation

CONGRESSIONAL MEMBERSHIP

Congress under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION was a unicameral body representing thirteen states. But delegates to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, influenced by the example of the British Parliament and almost all of the states, agreed rather early to the principle of a two-house legislature. Members of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES were to be popularly elected, with each state's members proportionate to population. But membership in the SENATE and selection of senators caused intense controversy.

The large states wanted the Senate also to represent population, but the smaller states were adamantly opposed. They forced a compromise under which every state would have two senators, elected by the state legislatures for six-year terms. This solution gave effect to the federal principle, the Senate representing the states and the House providing popular representation. However, legislative election of senators ultimately proved unacceptable. During the nineteenth century the elections were often marked by scandals and deadlocks, and a rising progressive temper in the country led to adoption of the SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT in 1913 providing for direct popular election of senators.

The size of the House was initially set by Article I at sixty-five, to be revised thereafter on the basis of decennial censuses. As the population grew and more states were admitted to the Union, Congress increased the number of seats until it reached 435 after the 1910 census. Congress then concluded that further enlargement would make the House unwieldy, and by statute in 1929 fixed 435 as the permanent size of the House.

After each census the 435 House seats are apportioned among the states according to a statutory formula. It is then the responsibility of each state legislature to draw the lines for congressional districts. There was initially no legal obligation to assure equality of population among districts. Particularly in the early twentieth century rural-dominated state legislatures refused to revise district lines to provide equitable representation for growing urban areas. Judicial relief failed when the Supreme Court in COLEGROVE V. GREEN (1946) ruled that drawing the boundary lines of congressional districts was a POLITICAL QUESTION for decision by the state legislatures and Congress, not the courts. This HOLDING was implicitly overruled by the Court in BAKER V. CARR (1962), and in WESBERRY V. SANDERS (1964) the Court made equality of population in congressional districts a constitutional requirement.

The drawing of congressional district lines typically generates bitter legislative controversy as the majority party endeavors to protect its dominance by gerrymandering and incumbents of both parties seek to safeguard their own districts. In numerous states since 1964 legislative deadlocks have required the courts to intervene and draw the district lines.

Members of the House have two-year terms. Proposals for extending the term to four years have been made because of the increased costs of campaigning, longer sessions of Congress, and more complex legislative problems. In the Senate, the fact that only one-third of the seats fall vacant every two years gives it the status of a "continuing body," in contrast to the House which must reconstitute itself and elect its officers every two years.

The presiding officer of the House is its Speaker, chosen by the majority party from among its members. The Speaker has a vote and may on rare occasions participate in debate. The Senate's presiding officer is the vice-president; when serving in this capacity his title is President of the Senate. He has no vote except in case of a tie. The Constitution authorizes the Senate to choose a president pro tempore to preside in the absence of the vice-president. The president pro tempore is typically the senior member of the majority party.

Article I requires that a senator be thirty years of age, nine years a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of the state from which elected. A representative need be only twenty-five years of age and a citizen for seven years. By custom a representative should reside in the district from which elected. Members of Congress are disqualified for appointment to executive office, a provision that prevents the development of anything approaching a parliamentary system. To accept an executive post, a member of Congress must resign.

Each house is authorized to "be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members" (Article I, section 5). The "qualifications," it has been established by POWELL V. MCCORMACK (1969), are only the age, residence, and CITIZENSHIP requirements stated in the Constitution. However, on several occasions both houses have in effect enforced additional qualifications by refusing to seat duly elected members who met the constitutional qualifications. In 1900 the House refused to seat a Utah polygamist; similar action was taken in 1919 against a Wisconsin socialist who had been convicted under the ESPIONAGE ACT for opposing American participation in WORLD WAR I. The most prominent black member of Congress, Adam Clayton Powell, was denied his seat in 1967. There was a judgment of criminal contempt outstanding against him, and his conduct as a committee chairman had been irregular. The Supreme Court ruled, however, that he possessed the constitutional qualifications and so could not be denied his seat. Members of Congress cannot be impeached, but they are subject to vote of censure by their chamber, and to expulsion by two-thirds vote. The Court indicated that the House might have expelled Powell for his alleged conduct. Vacancies in the Senate can be filled by the state governor, but in the House only by special election.

Members of Congress have immunity from arrest during legislative sessions except for cases of " FELONY, and breach of the peace" (Article I, section 6). They are guaranteed FREEDOM OF SPEECH by the provision that "for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place." (See SPEECH OR DEBATE CLAUSE.) The purpose is to prevent intimidation of legislators by the executive or threat of prosecution for libel or slander. They can be held accountable for statements or actions in their legislative capacity only by their own colleagues. This immunity covers not only speeches in Congress but also written reports, resolutions offered, the act of voting, and all other things generally done in a legislative session. However, immunity does not extend to press releases, newsletters, or telephone calls to executive agencies, the Supreme Court held in HUTCHINSON V. PROXMIRE (1979). Also, taking a bribe to influence legislation is not a "legislative act," according to BREWSTER V. UNITED STATES (1972).

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
(1986)

Bibliography

DAVIDSON, ROGER H. and OLESZEK, WALTER J. 1985 Congress and Its Members, 2nd ed. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly.

CONGRESSIONAL PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

The Constitution specifically protects members of Congress against interference with their deliberative function. The special privileges and immunities attendant on CONGRESSIONAL MEMBERSHIP are contained in the first clause of Article I, section 6, of the Constitution. The Framers of the Constitution, familiar with the devices used by the British king against members of Parliament and by royal governors against members of the provincial legislatures, sought to insulate the members of the federal legislature against pressures that might preclude independence of judgment.

The PRIVILEGE FROM ARREST, other than for FELONY, or BREACH OF THE PEACE, has been known in Anglo-American constitutional history since the advent of parliaments; WILLIAM BLACKSTONE cited an ancient Gothic law as evidence of the privilege's immemorial origins. The English Parliament claimed freedom of debate, that is, immunity from prosecution or civil lawsuit resulting from utterances in Parliament, at least from the thirteenth century; that immunity was finally established in the English BILL OF RIGHTS (1689). In America, privilege from arrest during legislative sessions was first granted in Virginia in 1623, and freedom of debate was first recognized in the FUNDAMENTAL ORDERS OF CONNECTICUT (1639).

The ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION extended both the privilege from arrest and the freedom of debate to members of Congress, in words transcribed almost verbatim from the English Bill of Rights: "Freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any court, or place out of Congress, and the members of Congress shall be protected in their persons from arrests and imprisonments, during the time of their going to and from, and attendance on Congress, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace." At the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, these congressional privileges and immunities first appeared in the report of the Committee of Detail; they were agreed to without debate and without dissent. The Committee of Style gave final form to the wording of the clause.

The privilege from arrest, limited as it is to arrest for debt, no longer has any practical application. The immunity from having to answer in court, or in any other place out of Congress, for congressional SPEECH OR DEBATE is now primarily a shield against civil actions by private parties rather than against an executive jealous of his prerogative. That shield has been expanded to protect the whole legislative process, but not, as one senator learned to his chagrin in HUTCHINSON V. PROXMIRE (1979), to every public utterance of a member of Congress concerning a public issue.

DENNNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

WORMSER, MICHAEL D., ed. 1982 Guide to Congress, 3rd ed. Pages 850–855. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly.

CONGRESSIONAL STANDING

Members of Congress occasionally sue in federal court to challenge the constitutionality of executive or legislative action. Although such interbranch litigation is commonplace in some European constitutional systems, the Supreme Court has ruled that members of Congress usually are not the proper people to prosecute these cases. They lack STANDING to sue.

The leading case in this area is Raines v. Byrd (1997). Members of Congress challenged the constitutionality of LEGISLATION giving the President a LINE-ITEM VETO. They claimed that the line-item veto injured them by diminishing the legal and practical effect of their votes on appropriations bills. The Court held that the plaintiffs lacked standing to sue because the legislation injured them only in their institutional, rather than personal, capacities. If the legislation had reduced their salaries or forced them from office, they would have had standing. The Court distinguished the line-item veto case from POWELL V. MCCORMACK (1969), where the Court upheld Adam Clayton Powell's standing to sue the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES for wrongful expulsion. Powell had been singled out for expulsion, which caused him personalized injury. The line-item veto injured all members of Congress indiscriminately, and only in an official sense.

The Court's approach to congressional standing is broadly consistent with its general policies governing the occasions on which federal courts may adjudicate constitutional challenges to legislation or other government action. Through the standing, MOOTNESS, and RIPENESS doctrines, the Court has usually barred plaintiffs from federal court unless they hold concrete personal stakes in the controversy. People who sue because government action threatens their personal liberty or PROPERTY are generally permitted to maintain actions in federal court. People who sue because they are ideologically opposed to the government action in question are usually turned away from federal court. Put another way, the Court grants federal court adjudication to selfishly interested plaintiffs but withholds it from altruistic ones. One of the Court's official explanations for this seeming paradox is that self-interested litigants will bring out the best arguments in favor of their positions. Self-appointed guardians of the public good might lack the litigating initiative so crucial to sharp adversarial presentation.

Another thread running through standing doctrine, especially congressional standing, is the notion that the federal courts must carefully husband their political capital. Members of the public may chafe when they see unelected federal judges undoing the handiwork of the majoritarian branches of government. By restricting constitutional challenges to "proper" plaintiffs, the Court sharply limits the occasions upon which federal courts can exercise JUDICIAL REVIEW. This idea has particular application in the context of congressional standing, where allowing members of Congress to challenge the constitutionality of legislation or executive action would appear to put the courts smack in the middle of the political battlefield. In these situations, the standing doctrine is thought to preserve the judiciary's credibility with the public.

EVAN TSEN LEE
(2000)

Bibliography

MCGOWAN, CARL 1981 Congressmen in Court: The New Plaintiffs. Georgia Law Review 15:241–267.

CONGRESSIONAL VETO

See: Legislative Veto

CONGRESSIONAL WAR POWERS

The Constitution assigns the power to declare war solely to the Congress, one of the wisest of the many CHECKS AND BALANCES built into the American political system. Throughout American history, however, Presidents have committed acts of war without congressional authorization. The question of where to assign the power to initiate and conduct war was thoroughly debated during the framing of the Constitution. The outcome of that debate was a document that clearly did not give the President unlimited WAR POWERS but in fact separated the power to conduct war from the power to initiate war.

The Constitution grants Congress the power to issue a DECLARATION OF WAR and to "grant letters of Marque and reprisal." There is no question that the ORIGINAL INTENT of the Framers of the Constitution was to vest in the Congress the complete power to decide on war or peace, with the sole exception that the President could respond to sudden attack on the United States without congressional authorization. During the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, the debates centered on an original draft of the war power providing that "the legislature of the United States shall have the power . . . to make war." One member of the convention, CHARLES PINCKNEY, opposed giving this power to Congress, claiming that its proceedings would be too slow; PIERCE BUTLER said that he was "voting for vesting the power in the President, who will have all the requisite qualities, and will not make war but when the Nation will support it." Butler's motion received no second, however.

JAMES MADISON and ELBRIDGE GERRY, meanwhile, were not satisfied with the original wording, that the legislature be given the power to make war. They moved to substitute "declare" for "make," "leaving to the Executive the power to repel sudden attacks." The meaning of this motion, which eventually was carried by a vote of seven states to two, was clear. The power to initiate war was left to Congress, with the reservation from Congress to the President to repel a sudden attack on the United States. As THOMAS JEFFERSON explained in 1789, "We have already given . . . one effectual check to the dog of war by transferring the power of letting him loose, from the executive to the legislative body, from those who are to spend to those who are to pay."

Acts of war, acts of reprisal, and acts of self-defense—all have been taken by past Presidents, but seldom without a rationalization of the legal implications of their actions that reflected recognition of the necessity of congressional authorization of all presidential acts of war except self-defense. At a time of national crisis, notably during the CIVIL WAR, the President has acted illegally and depended on Congress to ratify his action after the fact. In the latter half of the twentieth century, however, a major change in the concept of the war power began to be propounded. Beginning with the KOREAN WAR and the VIETNAM WAR, some presidents, congressmen, and publicists claimed for the executive the power to initiate war without the consent of Congress.

Covert war, as we have come to know it, grew out of the United States' experiences in WORLD WAR II . Two factors have combined to encourage covert action and covert war. First, nuclear weapons—forces of utter destruction—have deterred more overt and massive forms of violence. Second, the intensity of the ideological and geopolitical struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union nevertheless assured that violence, albeit covert, would continue. Shortly after World War II, in January 1946, President HARRY S. TRUMAN issued a directive establishing the Central Intelligence Group, the precursor of the Central Intelligence Agency. Previously, no nonmilitary covert operations group had existed in the United States during peacetime. Later intelligence groups would build on this meager institutional foundation, often without questioning either the appropriateness of its methods or the basic assumptions behind its organization.

The Constitution commits the entire power to decide for war or peace to Congress, not the President, with the exception noted above—in the event of sudden attack. No action of covert war is likely to fit within that narrow exception. The COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF clause gives that President no additional power to commit forces of the United Stater to war or acts of war when the nation is at peace. Only Congress is empowered to change this condition.

The Constitution's grant to Congress of the power to grant "letters of Marque and reprisal" covers most of what we think of as covert war. Originally a letter of marque merely authorized crossing into a foreign state to obtain redress for wrongs inflicted by a foreigner, and a letter of reprisal permitted the use of force to secure compensation for an unlawful taking of property or goods within the territorial jurisdiction of the sovereign. When combined, a letter of marque and reprisal permitted a particular person to seize property or even foreign citizens who refused to redress injuries they caused. By the eighteenth century, letters of marque had evolved into means of legitimating acts of war against other sovereign states by private parties. Likewise, reprisals developed into public acts of war against another state or citizens of another state in retaliation for an injury for which the state is held responsible. Under international law a reprisal is legal only if the acts are responsive and proportional to previous hostile acts of another state and the reprisal is first preceded by unsuccessful attempts at a peaceful resolution.

The war clause in its completeness, then, grants to Congress all power to decide on war, including both public and private or covert war, declared or undeclared. The Constitution grants no power to the President to wage private war against states with whom the nation is at peace by hiring modern mercenaries, pirates, or privateers without the express authorization of Congress. Nor does the President or the National Security Council have the authority to privatize the conduct of American foreign policy in the sale of arms or transfer of money. Absent a direct attack on the United States, a decision to go to war is constitutional only when it is publicly arrived at by congressional debate.

EDWIN B. FIRMAGE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Congress and Foreign Policy; Executive Power; Executive Prerogative; Foreign Affairs; Presidential War Powers; Senate and Foreign Policy; War, Foreign Affairs, and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

LOBEL, JULES 1986 Covert War and Congressional Authority: Hidden War and Forgotten Power. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 134:1035–1110.

PRADOS, JOHN 1986 Presidents' Secret Wars: Cia and Pentagon Covert Operations Since World War II. New York: William Morrow.

WORMUTH, FRANCIS D. and FIRMAGE, EDWIN B. 1989 To Chain the Dog of War: The Power of Congress in History and Law, 2nd ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

CONKLING, ROSCOE
(1829–1888)

A New York attorney, congressman (1859–1863, 1865–1867), and senator (1867–1881), Roscoe Conkling in 1861 initiated legislation creating the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War. In 1865, as a member of the JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION, Conkling supported CIVIL RIGHTS for blacks. In 1867 he sponsored military reconstruction legislation. Conkling and other supporters of the bill argued that the South was still in the "grasp of war" and only a military occupation and RECONSTRUCTION would insure protection of the freedmen. After Reconstruction Conkling continued to support civil rights and helped Frederick Douglass become the first black Recorder of Deeds in Washington, D.C. Douglass placed Conkling alongside ULYSSES S. GRANT, CHARLES SUMNER, and BENJAMIN F. BUTLER as a protector of freedmen. In 1880 Conkling led a movement to renominate Grant because of disagreements with President RUTHERFORD B. HAYES over Reconstruction and PATRONAGE. In 1881 Conkling resigned his Senate seat to protest JAMES A. GARFIELD's appointments in New York State. As the undisputed leader of the New York Republican party, Conkling thought he, and not the President, should dispense patronage in the Empire State. Earlier he had opposed Hayes's attempts to remove federal officeholders in New York and had defended CHESTER A. ARTHUR from corruption charges. In 1873 Conkling declined Grant's offer of the Chief Justiceship of the United States; in 1882 the Senate confirmed him for an Associate Justiceship, but he declined to serve.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

JORDON, DAVID M. 1971 Roscoe Conkling of New York: Voice in the Senate. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

CONNALLY, THOMAS T.
(1877–1963)

A conservative Texas Democrat and internationalist, Tom Connally, as he officially called himself, served twelve years in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES and twenty-four in the SENATE. When he retired from politics in 1953, he said he was most proud of his leadership against FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT'S COURT-PACKING plan of 1937 and in favor of the creation of the United Nations. Connally's main achievements were in the field of FOREIGN AFFAIRS, from managing the Lend Lease Act to confirmation of the NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY. He was cool toward much of the NEW DEAL, except when it benefited Texas cattle, oil, and cotton interests. The Supreme Court struck down the Connally "Hot Oil" Act in PANAMA REFINING CO. V. RYAN (1935), but he secured a revised measure that constitutionally prohibited the shipment in INTERSTATE COMMERCE of oil produced in excess of government quotas. He opposed every CIVIL RIGHTS measure that came before the SENATE and joined every southern FILIBUSTER, preventing the enactment of antilynching and anti-POLL TAX bills. Connally was one of the last of colorful, powerful, demagogic, and grandiloquent southern politicians who affected a drawl, string-tie, frock coat, and flowing hair.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

CONNALLY, TOM and STEINBERG, ALFRED 1954 My Name Is Tom Connally. New York: Crowell.

CONNECTICUT COMPROMISE

See: Great Compromise

CONQUERED PROVINCES THEORY

"Conquered provinces" was one of a half dozen constitutional theories concerning the relationship of the seceded states and the Union. Representative THADDEUS STEVENS (Republican, Pennsylvania), the principal exponent of conquered provinces, argued that SECESSION had been de jure as well as de facto effective, and destroyed the normal constitutional status of the seceded states. Union victory required that they be governed under the principles of international law, which would have authorized essentially unlimited congressional latitude in setting RECONSTRUCTION policy. Congressional legislation for the ex-states had to be based on the premise that "the foundation of their institutions, both political, municipal, and social, must be broken up and relaid." This was to be accomplished through extensive confiscation of Confederates' properties and the abolition of slavery. The state constitutions would have to be rewritten and submitted to Congress, which would then readmit each "province" as a new state.

Other principal theories of Reconstruction were: territorialization, popular among some Republicans since 1861, which would have treated the seceded states as territories; STATE SUICIDE, expounded by CHARLES SUMNER since 1862; state indestructibility, the basis of varying southern and presidential views, and being the central assumption of ABRAHAM LINCOLN's programs; Richard Henry Dana's "Grasp of War" theory of 1865, which would have sanctioned congressional policy under the WAR POWERS; and forfeited rights, a theory propounded by Rep. Samuel Shellabarger (Republican, Ohio), which ultimately came as close as any to being the constitutional basis of congressional Republican Reconstruction.

Stevens's conquered provinces theory was logically consistent with Republican objectives, and Lincoln's policies concerning the wartime Reconstruction of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee resembled parts of Stevens's program. But because the idea of conquered provinces was widely considered unconstitutional and draconian, it was never adopted as the basis of Republican policy.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

MCKITRICK, ERIC L. 1960 Andrew Johnson and Reconstruction. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION

A conscientious objector is a person who is opposed in conscience to engaging in socially required behavior. Since the genuine objector will not be easily forced into acts he abhors and since compelling people to violate their own moral scruples is usually undesirable in a liberal society, those who formulate legal rules face the question whether conscientious objectors should be excused from legal requirements imposed on others. The issue is most striking in relation to compulsory military service: should those whose consciences forbid killing be conscripted for combat? Historically, conscientious objection has been considered mainly in that context, and the clash has been understood as between secular obligation and the sense of religious duty felt by members of pacifist sects. The Constitution says nothing directly about conscientious objection, and for most of the country's existence Congress was thought to have a free hand in deciding whether to afford any exemption and how to define the class of persons who would benefit. By now, it is evident that the religion clauses of the FIRST AMENDMENT impose significant constraints on how Congress may draw lines between those who receive an exemption from military service and those who do not. The Supreme Court has never accepted the argument that Congress is constitutionally required to establish an exemption from military service, but it has indicated that the Constitution does entitle some individuals to exemption from certain other sorts of compulsory laws.

The principle that society should excuse conscientious objectors from military service was widely recognized in the colonies and states prior to adoption of the Constitution. JAMES MADISON's original proposal for the BILL OF RIGHTS included a clause that "no person religiously scrupulous of bearing arms shall be compelled to render military service in person," but that clause was dropped, partly because conscription was considered a state function. The 1864 Draft Act and the SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT of 1917 both contained exemptions limited to members of religious denominations whose creeds forbade participation in war. The 1917 act excused objectors only from combatant service, but the War Department permitted some of those also opposed to noncombatant military service to be released for civilian service.

The 1940 Selective Service Act set the basic terms of exemption from the system of compulsory military service that operated during WORLD WAR II, the KOREAN WAR, and the VIETNAM WAR, and during the intervening periods of uneasy peace. A person was eligible "who, by reason of religious training and belief, [was] conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form." Someone opposed even to noncombatant service could perform alternate civilian service. In response to a court of appeals decision interpreting "religious training and belief" very broadly, Congress in 1948 said that religious belief meant belief "in relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation. . . ." What Congress had attempted to do was relatively clear. It wanted to excuse only persons opposed to participation in all wars, not those opposed to particular wars, and it wanted to excuse only those whose opposition derived from religious belief in a rather traditional sense. The important Supreme Court cases have dealt with these lines of distinction.

By dint of strained interpretation of the statute, the Court has avoided a clear decision whether Congress could limit the exemption to traditional religious believers. First, in UNITED STATES V. SEEGER (1965), a large majority said that an applicant who spoke of a "religious faith in a purely ethical creed" was entitled to the exemption because his belief occupied a place in his life parallel to that of a belief in God for the more orthodox. Then, in Welsh v. United States (1970), four Justices held that someone who laid no claim to being religious at all qualified because his ethical beliefs occupied a place in his life parallel to that of religious beliefs for others. Four other Justices acknowledged that Congress had explicitly meant to exclude such applicants. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN urged that an attempt to distinguish religious objectors from equally sincere nonreligious ones constituted a forbidden ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION; the three other Justices thought that Congress could favor religious objectors in order to promote the free exercise of religion. Because the plurality's view of the statute was so implausible, most observers have supposed that its members probably agreed with Justice Harlan about the ultimate constitutional issue, but this particular tension between "no establishment" and "free exercise" concepts has not yet been decisively resolved.

In Gillette v. United States (1971), a decision covering both religious and nonreligious objectors to the Vietnam War, the Court upheld Congress's determination not to exempt those opposed to participation in particular wars. Against the claim that the distinction between "general" and "selective" objectors was impermissible, the Court responded that the distinction was supported by the public interest in a fairly administered system, given the difficulty officials would have dealing consistently with the variety of objections to particular wars. The Court also rejected the claim that the selective objector's entitlement to free exercise of his religion created a constitutionally grounded right to avoid military service.

In other limited areas, the Court has taken the step of acknowledging a free exercise right to be exempt from a generally imposed obligation. Those religiously opposed to jury duty cannot be compelled to serve, and adherents of traditional religious groups that provide an alternative way of life for members cannot be required to send children to school beyond the eighth grade. (See WISCONSIN V. YODER.) Nor can a person be deprived of unemployment benefits when an unwillingness to work on Saturday is religiously based, though receptivity to jobs including Saturday work is a usual condition of eligibility. (See SHERBERT V. VERNER.) What these cases suggest is that if no powerful secular reason can be advanced for demanding uniform compliance, the Constitution may require that persons with substantial religious objections be excused. To this degree the Constitution itself requires special treatment for conscientious objectors. Beyond that, its recognition of religious liberty and of governmental impartiality toward religions provides a source of values for legislative choice and constrains the classifications legislatures may make.

KENT GREENAWALT
(1986)

Bibliography

FINN, JAMES, ed. 1968 A Conflict of Loyalties. New York: Pegasus.

GREENAWALT, KENT 1972 All or Nothing At All. Supreme Court Review 1971: 31–94.

SIBLEY, MULFORD QUICKERT and JACOB, PHILIP E. 1952 Conscription of Conscience: The American State and the Conscientious Objector, 1940–1947. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

CONSCRIPTION

The power of the federal government to conscript may derive either from its power to raise armies or, more debatably, from its broadly interpreted power to regulate commerce. It is restricted by the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT's prohibition of involuntary servitude or, conceivably, by the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of liberty. The manner in which conscription is conducted must comport with a familiar range of constitutional protections, notably those that guarantee EQUAL PROTECTION and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Though the nation has employed systems of military conscription during the CIVIL WAR, WORLD WAR I, WORLD WAR II, and for all but twelve months between 1945 and 1972, the interplay of these different constitutional considerations has been remarkably underdeveloped. Two hundred years after the Constitution was written, at least two fundamental questions about conscription remain unresolved. What is the power of Congress (or the states) to conscript for civilian purposes? How, if at all, is a conscription system obliged to take account of CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION?

The ambiguity surrounding these questions derives in part from the fact that although the constitutionality of military conscription is well settled, the issue has not been settled well. In SELECTIVE DRAFT LAW CASES (1917) the Supreme Court reviewed the World War I military conscription statute and declared that it was "unable to conceive" how the performance of the "supreme and noble duty" of military service in time of war "can be said to be the imposition of involuntary servitude." Therefore, in its view, this contention was "precluded by its mere statement."

This terse comment establishes no conceptual basis for the analysis of later questions. Unfortunately, also, history is not a particularly helpful guide. The intention of the Framers is not clear. At the time of the Constitution, it was accepted that state militias could conscript soldiers, but the central government could not do so. At the same time, the Constitution gave the Congress the power to "raise armies" and it was widely recognized that it could not tenably rely on volunteers. On the basis of this evidence some scholars have argued that to conclude that conscription (as opposed to enlistment) was a power given to Congress is logical, and others have called this conclusion absurd.

Legislative history and judicial PRECEDENT in this first century of the Republic are similarly uninformative. When the Supreme Court decided the Selective Draft Law Cases it had only two precedents for a military draft: first, Secretary of War JAMES MONROE's proposal for conscription during the War of 1812, a proposal still under compromise deliberation by Congress when peace arrived; and, second, the Civil War Enrollment Act, the constitutionality of which had been ruled on only by a sharply divided and perplexed Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

The most significant judicial precedent, Butler v. Perry (1916), had been decided only a year before by the Supreme Court itself. Here the Court rejected a Thirteenth Amendment challenge to a Florida statute requiring adult men to work one week a year on public roads: "from colonial days to the present time, conscripted labor has been much relied on for the construction and maintenance of public roads," and the Thirteenth Amendment "certainly was not intended to interdict enforcement of those duties which individuals owe to the state."

No subsequent Supreme Court decision limits this sweeping view of the power to conscript. To the contrary, the Court held in United States v. Macintosh (1931) that the right of conscientious objection is only statutory and in ROSTKER V. GOLDBERG (1981) that the government can compel an all-male military registration in the face of equal protection contentions founded on a theory of SEX DISCRIMINATION.

Notwithstanding these decisions, it seems likely that a major constitutional issue would arise if the power to conscript were asserted more aggressively. Such an issue might arise if, for example, participation were coerced in a system of civilian national service or if the statutory right of conscientious objection were abolished. In that event, the question thus far begged—what "duties . . . individuals owe to the state"—would have to be, for the first time, seriously addressed.

RICHARD DANZIG
IRA NERKEN
(1986)

Bibliography

ANDERSON, MARTIN and BLOOM, VALERIE 1976 Conscription: A Select and Annotated Bibliography. Stanford, Calif.: Hoover Institution Press.

FRIEDMAN, LEON 1969 Conscription and the Constitution: The Original Understanding. Michigan Law Review 67:1493–1552.

MALBIN, MICHAEL J. 1972 Conscription, the Constitution, and the Framers: An Historial Analysis. Fordham Law Review 40: 805–826.

CONSCRIPTION ACT

See: Selective Service Acts

CONSENT DECREE

In a civil suit in EQUITY, such as a suit for an INJUNCTION or a DECLARATORY JUDGMENT, the court's order is called a decree. By negotiation, the plaintiff and the defendant may agree to ask the court to enter a decree that they have drafted. If the court approves, its order is called a consent decree. Federal courts frequently enter consent degrees in actions to enforce regulatory laws in fields such as ANTITRUST, EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION, and ENVIRONMENTAL REGULATION.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Plea Bargaining.)

CONSENT SEARCH

When an individual consents to a search, he effectively waives his rights under the FOURTH AMENDMENT and makes it unnecessary for the police to obtain a SEARCH WARRANT. In determining the validity of such a consent, the trial court must determine whether the consent was voluntary. The consent of a person illegally held is not considered voluntary. However, an explicit warning about one's constitutional rights, which MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) made mandatory for custodial interrogation, is not a condition for effective consent to a search, under the decision in SCHNECKLOTH V. BUSTAMONTE (1973).

Consent must obviously be obtained from a person entitled to grant it. Not ownership of the premises but the right to occupy and use them to the exclusion of others is the decisive criterion. Thus, the consent of a landlord to search premises let to others is worthless. The consenting party controls the terms of the consent: it may be as broad or as narrow as he wishes to make it, allowing a search of an entire dwelling or merely of one small item.

For a consent by another person to be valid as against a defendant, it must be shown that the consenting party possessed common authority in the place or things searched. Anyone with joint access or control of the premises may consent to a search.

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1978 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. Vol. 2:610–774. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

CONSERVATISM

Conservatives would agree with Robert Bork's understanding of the role of the Supreme Court under the Constitution and with its implicit understanding of the Constitution itself. Bork concluded a 1984 lecture at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington with the following words:

> In a constitutional democracy the moral content of the law must be given by the morality of the framer or the legislator, never by the morality of the judge. The sole task of the latter—and it is a task quite large enough for anyone's wisdom, skill, and virtue—is to translate the framer's or the legislator's morality into a rule to govern unforeseen circumstances. That abstinence from giving his own desires free play, that continuing and self-conscious renunciation of power, that is the morality of the jurist.

Bork's is not, of course, the popular view of the judge's role, a fact made manifest by the reaction to his nomination for a seat on the Supreme Court. Some 1,925 law professors—surely a good proportion of the total—publicly opposed his appointment and took the trouble of communicating their opposition to the SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE. Bork, they said in one way or another, was out of the "mainstream," as surely he was and is. Whereas Bork would appeal to the Framers' morality, mainstream lawyers, arguing that the Framers represented "a world that is dead and gone," tend to prefer their own; some of them go so far so to accuse the Framers of being morally indifferent, a view popularized by Ronald Dworkin, one of Bork's principal opponents. Dworkin sees the Constitution as in need of moral principles and would supply that need. What is required, he says, is a "fusion of constitutional law and moral theory, a connection that, incredibly, has yet to take place."

Conservatives would protest that a Constitution that secures the rights of man—the equal rights of man—to the end of "securing the blessings of liberty" is not lacking in moral principle. Still, had he chosen to do so, Dworkin could have found in the mill of the founding documents an abundance of the grist he wants to grind. There is, for example, JAMES MADISON's famous statement in THE FEDERALIST #10 to the effect that the first object of government is the protection of different and unequal faculties of acquiring property. Protecting the equal rights of unequally endowed men can only lead to what Madison said it would lead to, and has in fact led to, namely, different degrees and kinds of property. In short, liberty leads to inequality, not of Madisonian rights but of wealth, position, and rank.

Unlike mainstream (or liberal) lawyers, conservatives are willing to live with this dispensation, and not only because they object to the means used by the mainstream lawyers to change it. The history of Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 provides an example of those means. That piece of legislation was enacted by Congress to put an end to EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION against blacks and women. But the Supreme Court, over the objections of conservative Justices, including Chief Justice WILLIAM REHNQUIST and Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, has converted it into a statute permitting, and in effect compelling, discrimination favoring blacks and women. Concurring in a case dealing with gender discrimination, a somewhat shamefaced Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR indicated how this was accomplished: "As Justice Scalia illuminates with excruciating clarity, [Title VII] has been interpreted . . . to permit what its language read literally would prohibit." When necessary to further their political agendas, mainstream lawyers, on and off the bench, favor appeals to the "spirit," instead of the written text, of statutes and to what they contend is the "unwritten," instead of the written, Constitution.

No case better illustrates this practice than the 1965 BIRTH CONTROL case GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT, and none has given rise to so much criticism from conservatives (and even from a few liberals) as the most prominent of the cases it spawned, ROE V. WADE, the 1973 ABORTION decision. To strike down the Connecticut statute forbidding the use of contraceptives—a statute that for practical reasons could not be enforced and for political reasons could not be repealed—the Court found a right to privacy not in a specific constitutional provision but in "penumbras, formed by emanations" from the FIRST AMENDMENT, THIRD AMENDMENT, FOURTH AMENDMENT, FIFTH AMENDMENT, NINTH AMENDMENT, and ultimately the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. To strike down the abortion laws of all fifty states, the Court again invoked this right to privacy, now locating it in the "liberty" protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The principal proponent of this kind of constitutional construction, and the chief target of conservative criticism, was Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, and nothing better illustrates his understanding of JUDICIAL POWER than a draft opinion he wrote during the Court's consideration of FRONTIERO V. RICHARDSON (1973), a case decided when the so-called EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT was awaiting ratification by the states. Frontiero was a female air force officer who was denied certain dependents' benefits—benefits that would automatically have been granted with respect to the wife of a male officer—because she failed to prove that her husband was dependent on her for more than one half of his support. The issue on which the Court was divided was whether sex, like race, should be treated as a suspect, and therefore less readily justified, classification. Brennan, we are told, circulated an opinion declaring classification by sex virtually impermissible. "He knew that [this] would have the effect of enacting the equal rights amendment [but he] was accustomed to having the Court out front, leading any civil rights movement" (Bob Woodward and Scott Armstrong, The Brethren, p. 254). The authors of this account conclude by quoting Brennan as being of the opinion that there "was no reason to wait several years for the states to ratify the amendment"—no reason other than the fact, which Brennan knew to be a fact, that the Constitution as then written would not support the decision he wanted the Court to render.

Conservatives call this JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, or government by the judiciary. It is not for the judiciary—the least responsible and, conservatives could charge, frequently the most irresponsible branch of government—to make the laws or amend the Constitution (or "bring it up to date"). Those powers belong, in the one case, to the Congress and, in the other, to the people in their sovereign capacity. Judges, they say, quoting The Federalist #78, are supposed to be "faithful guardians of the Constitution," not evangels of new modes and orders: "Until the people have, by some solemn and authoritative act, annulled or changed the established form, it is binding upon themselves collectively, as well as individually." As conservatives see it, one issue dividing them from mainstream (or liberal) lawyers is that of legitimacy: The legitimacy of judge-made law and, ultimately, the legitimacy of the Constitution itself. If, as James Madison put it, the judges are not guided by the sense of the people who ratified the Constitution, "there can be no security for a consistent and stable, more than for a faithful exercise of its powers." The legitimacy of government depends on adherence to the written text, the text the people ratified.

The classic statement of these (conservative) propositions can be found in JOHN MARSHALL's opinion for the Court in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803): The "whole American fabric has been erected" on the principle that government derives from, and is dependent on, the will of the people. "The original and supreme will organizes the government, and assigns to different departments their respective powers."

Statements of this sort abound in the literature of the founding period. "In a government which is emphatically stiled [sic] a government of laws, the least possible range ought to be left for the discretion of the judges." "If the constitution is to be expounded, not by its written text, but by the opinions of the rulers for the time being, whose opinions are to prevail, the first or the last? [And if the last] what certainty can there be in those powers [which it assigns and limits]?" Both certainty and legitimacy would be put in jeopardy by rules of constitutional construction that, in effect, permit the judges to do as they will. "Would [the Constitution] not become, instead of a supreme law for ourselves and our posterity, a mere oracle of the powers of the rulers of the day, to which implicit homage is to be paid, and speaking at different times the most opposite commands, and in the most ambiguous voices?"

Connected to this issue of legitimacy is the cause of constitutional government itself. As conservatives see it, inequality of wealth, rank, and position is the price we pay for liberty, and it was to secure the blessings of liberty that the Constitution was ordained and established. In Madison's words in The Federalist #10, the Constitution serves to secure liberty by providing "a republican remedy for the diseases most incident to republican government," egalitarian diseases manifested in "a rage for paper money, for an abolition of debts, for an equal division of property, or for any other improper or wicked project." The remedy was to be found in the limits embodied "in the extent and proper structure of the Union"—in a word, in the Constitution. And as Marshall said in Marbury, The Constitution is written in order that "those limits not be mistaken or forgotten." THOMAS JEFFERSON made the same point when he said that "the possession of a written constitution [was America's] peculiar security."

What conservatives want to conserve is this liberal Constitution, which, as they see it, is endangered by persons styling themselves liberals today. First, there are academic lawyers who treat the Constitution not as law—in Marshall's words, "a superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means"—but as a mere "epiphenomenon," which is to say, as merely one of the factors (and, typically, not a controlling factor) entering into judicial decisions. As one of them puts it, rather than carry any precise meaning that judges are bound by oath to recognize and obey, the most important constitutional provisions "do not rule out any answer a majority of the Court is likely to want to give." The social, historical, and economic conditions take precedence over the Constitution's written text, and they may dictate any outcome. "There is nothing that is unsayable in the language of the Constitution," writes another.

Second, there is Justice Brennan, who writes that "the genius of the Constitution rests not in any static meaning it might have had in a world that is dead and gone, but in the adaptability of its great principles to cope with current problems and current needs."

Third are historians who, in the course of ridiculing the conservatives' appeal for a jurisprudence of ORIGINAL INTENT, insist that "our Constitution is no more important to the longevity and workability of our government than MAGNA CARTA is to the longevity and workability of the British government. Our Constitution is as unwritten as theirs."

Finally, there are journalists who say that "the mere idea of original intent is an absurdity . . . [that] those men in Philadelphia could not have possibly had an "original intent."

As these statements indicate, the conservative effort to preserve that liberal Constitution will gain little support in the liberal community. Unlike the Framers, today's liberals prefer equality to liberty, an equality of status to an equality of rights, a development foreseen by ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE. Democratic peoples have a natural taste for liberty, he wrote, but their passion for equality is "invincible" and "irresistible," and anyone who tries to stand up against it "will be overthrown and destroyed by it."

In addition, conservatives have to contend with developments in the realm of political thought that, it is said, deprive the Constitution of its philosophical foundations. The Constitution put constraints on the popular will, but, according to Professor Sanford Levinson, those constraints have been deprived of whatever moral authority they might once have had. Constitutional arguments have been rendered meaningless. Indeed, the very idea of CONSTITUTIONALISM is dead: "The death of "constitutionalism' may be the central event of our time," Levinson writes, "just as the death of God was that of the past century (and for much the same reason)." If, as he claims, this view of our situation is "shared by most major law schools," conservatives are engaged in an almost hopeless enterprise. Care of the Constitution was put in the hands of the judges, but the judges are trained in those "major law schools."

Admittedly, and quite apart from the influence of this legal and political thought, governing within the limit imposed by a STRICT CONSTRUCTION of the Constitution has never been an easy matter. FEDERALISM is one of its prominent features, and conservatives, today if not in the past, would preserve it in its integrity. They would do so for political, as well as for constitutional, reasons. Like Tocqueville, they appreciate the political importance of what he called "mores," those "habits of the heart" that characterize a people and, in our case, he argued, made free goverment possible. Conservatives would attribute the Constitution's "longevity and workability" not to its flexibility but, at least in part, to the laws of the states where these mores, or morals and manners, are fostered and protected. Directly or indirectly (by supporting the private institutions whose business it is to provide it), these laws are intended to promote the sort of civic or moral education required of citizens in a democracy. Many of them—such as laws dealing with FLAG DESECRATION, OBSCENITY, indecency, illegitimacy, school prayer, and religious instruction and institutions, the list of which is not endless but is long—have been declared unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment INCORPORATION DOCTRINE. These laws have been declared unconstitutional, conservatives insist, in the absence of any evidence that the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment intended it—originally intended it—to be used for that purpose.

There is, however, an abundance of evidence that the Fourteenth and other post-CIVIL WAR amendments were intended to affect the federal structure of the Constitution in material respects. The same freedom that allowed the states to be concerned about the moral character of their citizens also allowed them to decide who among their residents were to be citizens and, therefore, who among them were to enjoy the CIVIL RIGHTS and the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES of citizens. Thus, and without any question, those amendments were intended to deprive states of this power; they would do so by providing what Madison in 1787 criticized the original Constitution for its failure to provide, namely, "a constitutional negative on the laws of the States [in order to] secure individuals agst. encroachments on their rights."

The consequence—if only in our own time—has been a tremendous growth of national power at the expense of the states, and especially national judicial power. Conservatives cannot (and, in most cases, do not) complain when this power has been used to put an end to RACIAL DISCRIMINATION; as amended, the Constitution not only authorized this but required it. Given what proved to be almost a century of congressional inaction, they would also agree with the Supreme Court's decision in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954,1955), the public school desegregation case. Read literally (or construed strictly), the words of the equal protection clause do not lend themselves to the use to which they were put in that case, but—to paraphrase what was said by conservative Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES on an earlier occasion—while emergencies may not create power, they do furnish the occasions when it may properly be exercised. On such occasions, the conservative rule of "strict construction" must give way to necessity.

Conservatives concede, as they must, that necessity is the mother of invention; where they differ from mainstream liberals, to cite still another aphorism, is in their refusal to make a virtue of necessity. They cannot say, because it would be foolish to say, that the times must be kept in tune with the Constitution; but because our freedom and prosperity depend upon it, they do say, and say emphatically, that the times, to the extent possible, should be kept in tune with the Constitution.

WALTER BERNS
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Bork Nomination; Critical Legal Studies; Liberalism; Political Philosophy of the Constitution; Suspect Classification; Unwritten Constitution.)

Bibliography

BORK, ROBERT H. 1990 The Tempting of America: The Political Seduction of the Law. New York: Free Press.

GOLDWIN, ROBERT A. and ART KAUFMAN, eds. 1987 How Does the Constitution Protect Religious Freedom? Washington: American Enterprise Institute.

LERNER, RALPH 1987 The Thinking Revolutionary: Principle and Practice in the New Republic. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

McDOWELL, GARY L. 1988 Curbing the Courts: The Constitution and the Limits of Judicial Power. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

PANGLE, THOMAS L. 1988 The Spirit of Modern Republicanism: The Moral Vision of the American Founding and the Philosophy of Locke. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

RABKIN, JEREMY 1989 Judicial Compulsions: How Public Law Distorts Public Policy. New York: Basic Books.

CONSPIRACY

See: Criminal Conspiracy

CONSPIRACY LAW

The crime of conspiracy is charged regularly in state and federal courts throughout the United States. This crime consists in an agreement by two or more individuals to commit an additional crime. The conspiracy charge is widely used in a number of different areas, particularly with respect to white-collar crimes and narcotics offenses. The prosecution views the crime of conspiracy as advantageous because it allows, in a single trial, for the prosecution of all conspirators wherever they are located, and it allows the government to prosecute the case in any city in which any act in furtherance of the agreement took place. In addition, statements made by any conspirator are allowed to be used against all other conspirators, and each conspirator can be found criminally responsible for other conspirators' crimes found to be in furtherance of the agreement.

Three major constitutional questions have arisen in conspiracy trials in the United States. The first deals with the DOUBLE JEOPARDY clause of the Fifth Amendment, which provides in part, "nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." Most judges have concluded that the purpose of the double jeopardy clause was to ensure that a person could not be charged more than once for the same offense in the same jurisdiction. Individuals who are prosecuted for the conspiracy offense contend that if they are also charged with the crime that was the subject of the agreement (for example, bank robbery), their double jeopardy rights have been violated. The courts have consistently rejected this claim, however, holding that conspiracy (the agreement to commit bank robbery) and the crime (the actual bank robbery) are separate offenses. Hence, the defendant can receive separate punishment for each without the double jeopardy clause being violated.

Defendants also contend that being charged with conspiracies in two different courts violates their double jeopardy rights. For instance, conspiracy to rob a bank may be a violation of both state and federal law. It is a violation of state law because robbing any institution within the state is a crime. It is a violation of federal law because the bank may be a federally insured institution. Under the principle of "dual sovereignties" the Supreme Court has concluded that separate prosecutions and separate penalties for a federal conspiracy and a state conspiracy do not violate the double jeopardy clause, because such prosecutions are not multiple trials for the same offense by the same jurisdiction.

An additional constitutional issue is raised when defendants are charged with conspiring not to commit a crime but to commit acts that are "injurious to the public health or morals." These cases usually involve situations in which a particular form of behavior, such as charging usurious interest rates, is not itself criminal, but the defendant is charged with conspiring to commit that act. The Supreme Court in Musser v. Utah (1948) cast considerable doubt on the constitutionality of these prosecutions. The chief argument here is that such conspiracy prosecutions violate the DUE PROCESS clause of both the Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT because the phrase "acts injurious to the public health or morals" is so vague as to give insufficient guidance to citizens. As a consequence of the Musser decision, few prosecutions have been based upon this rather open-ended charge; instead, the government typically contends that the defendants have conspired to commit a particular crime and that crime is then set forth in some detail.

The third constitutional issue is perhaps the most famous and controversial, involving free speech implications under the FIRST AMENDMENT. The problem surfaces when the defendants are charged with agreeing to advocate activities challenging the government. In such situations, the question is whether the agreement can be viewed as purely criminal behavior or whether, under the First Amendment, the behavior is protected speech. The most important Supreme Court case in the area is YATES V. UNITED STATES (1956). There the defendants were mid-level officials of the Communist party charged with conspiring to advocate the overthrow of the government of the United States by force and violence. In construing the Smith Act, the Court concluded that the prosecution, to succeed, must show an agreement to engage in unlawful action and a specific intent by each conspirator to engage in that action. If, however, the charge against the defendants were based upon their agreement to advocate the abstract principle of forcible overthrow of the government, that agreement would not violate the statute, even if such advocacy promoted violent activity.

PAUL MARCUS
(1992)

Bibliography

COOK, JOSEPH and MARCUS, PAUL 1991 Criminal Procedure, 3rd ed. New York: Matthew Bender.

MARCUS, PAUL 1991 The Prosecution and Defense of Criminal Conspiracy Cases. New York: Matthew Bender.

CONSTITUTION

At the time of the Stamp Act controversy, a British lord told BENJAMIN FRANKLIN that Americans had wrong ideas about the British constitution. British and American ideas did differ radically. The American Revolution repudiated the British understanding of the constitution; in a sense, the triumph in America of a novel concept of "constitution" was the "revolution." The British, who were vague about their unwritten constitution, meant by it their system of government, the COMMON LAW, royal proclamations, major legislation such as MAGNA CARTA and the BILL OF RIGHTS, and various usages and customs of government animating the aggregation of laws, institutions, rights, and practices that had evolved over centuries. Statute, however, was the supreme part of the British constitution. After the Glorious Revolution of 1688–1689, Parliament dominated the constitutional system and by ordinary legislation could and did alter it. Sir WILLIAM BLACKSTONE summed up parliamentary supremacy when he declared in his Commentaries (1766), "What Parliament doth, no power on earth can undo."

The principle that Parliament had unlimited power was at the crux of the controversy leading to the American Revolution. The American assertion that government is limited undergirded the American concept of a constitution as a FUNDAMENTAL LAW that imposes regularized restraints upon power and reserves rights to the people. The American concept emerged slowly through the course of the colonial period, yet its nub was present almost from the beginning, especially in New England where covenant theology, SOCIAL COMPACT THEORY, and HIGHER LAW theory blended together. THOMAS HOOKER in 1638 preached that the foundation of authority lay in the people who might choose their governors and "set bounds and limitations on their powers." A century later Jared Elliot of Massachusetts preached that a "legal government" exists when the sovereign power "puts itself under restraints and lays itself under limitations. This is what we call a legal, limited, and well constituted government." Some liberal theologians viewed God himself as a constitutional monarch, limited in power because he had limited himself to the terms of his covenant with mankind. Moreover God ruled a constitutional universe based on immutable natural laws that also bound him. Jonathan Mayhew preached in Boston that no one has a right to exercise a wanton SOVEREIGNTY over the property, lives, and consciences of the people—"such a sovereignty as some inconsiderately ascribe to the supreme governor of the world." Mayhew explained that "God himself does not govern in an absolute, arbitrary, and despotic manner. The power of this almighty king is limited by law; not indeed, by acts of Parliament, but by the eternal laws of truth, wisdom, and equity. . . ."

Political theory and law as well as religion taught that government was limited; so did history. But the Americans took their views on such matters from a highly selective and romanticized image of seventeenth-century England, which they perpetuated in America even as England changed. Seventeenth-century England was the England of the great struggle for constitutional liberty by the common law courts and Puritan parliaments against despotic Stuart kings. Seventeenth-century England was the England of EDWARD COKE, JOHN LILBURNE, and JOHN LOCKE. It was an England in which religion, law, and politics converged with theory and experience to produce limited monarchy and, ironically, parliamentary supremacy. To Americans, however, Parliament had bound itself by reaffirming Magna Carta and passing the HABEAS CORPUS ACT, the Bill of Rights, and the TOLERATION ACT, among others. Locke had taught the social contract theory; advocated that taxation without representation or consent is tyranny; written that "government is not free to do as it pleases," and referred to the "bounds" which "the law of God and Nature have set to the legislative power of every commonwealth, in all forms of government."

Such ideas withered but did not die in eighteenth-century England. CATO'S LETTERS popularized Locke on both sides of the Atlantic; Henry St. John (Viscount Bolingbroke) believed that Parliament could not annul the constitution; Charles Viner's General Abridgment of Law and Equity endorsed Coke's views in Dr. BONHAM'S CASE (1610); and even as Parliament debated the Declaratory Act (1766), which asserted parliamentary power to legislate for America "in all cases whatsoever," CHARLES PRATT (Lord Camden) declared such a power "absolutely illegal, contrary to the fundamental laws of . . . this constitution. . . ." Richard Price and Granville Sharpe were two of the many English radicals who shared the American view of the British constitution.

TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION provoked Americans to clarify their views. JAMES OTIS, arguing against the tax on sugar, relied on Dr. Bonham's Case and contended that legislative authority did not extend to the "fundamentals of the constitution," which he believed to be fixed. THOMAS HUTCHINSON, a leading supporter of Parliament, summed up the American constitutional reaction to the stamp tax duties by writing, "The prevailing reason at this time is, that the Act of Parliament is against Magna Charta and the NATURAL RIGHTS of Englishmen, and therefore according to Lord Coke, null and void." The TOWNSHEND ACT duties led to American declarations that the supreme legislature in any free state derives its power from the constitution, which limits government. JOHN DICKINSON, in an essay reprinted throughout the colonies, wrote that a free people are not those subject to a reasonable exercise of government power but those "who live under a government so constitutionally checked and controlled, that proper provision is made against its being otherwise exercised." J. J. Zubly of Georgia was another of many who argued that no government, not even Parliament, could make laws against the constitution any more than it could alter the constitution. An anonymous pamphleteer rhapsodized in 1775 about the "glorious constitution worthy to be engraved in capitals of gold, on pillars of marble; to be perpetuated through all time, a barrier, to circumscribe and bound the restless ambition of aspiring monarchs, and the palladium of civil liberty. . . ." TOM PAINE actually argued that Great Britain had no constitution, because Parliament claimed to exercise any power it pleased. To Paine a constitution could not be an act of the government but of "people constituting government. . . . A constitution is a thing antecedent to a government; a government is only the creature of the constitution."

Thus, by "constitution," Americans meant a supreme law creating the government, limiting it, unalterable by it, and above it. When they said that an act of government was unconstitutional, they meant that the government had acted lawlessly because it lacked the authority to perform that act. Accordingly the act was not law; it was null and void, and it could be disobeyed. By contrast when the British spoke of a statute being unconstitutional, they meant only that it was impolitic, unwise, unjust, or inexpedient, but not that it was beyond the power of the government to enact. They did not mean that Parliament was limited in its powers and had exceeded them.

The American view of "constitution" was imperfectly understood even by many leaders of the revolutionary movement as late as 1776. The proof is that when the states framed their first constitutions, the task was left to legislatures, although some received explicit authorization from the voters. THOMAS JEFFERSON worried because Virginia had not differentiated fundamental from ordinary law. Not until Massachusetts framed its constitution of 1780 by devising a CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION did the American theory match practice. When the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 met in Philadelphia, the American meaning of a constitution was fixed and consistent.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAMS, RANDOLPH G. (1922) 1958 Political Ideas of the American Revolution. 3rd ed. New York: Barnes & Noble.

BAILYN, BERNARD 1967 Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

BALDWIN, ALICE M. (1928) 1958 The New England Clergy and the American Revolution. New York: Frederick Ungar.

MCLAUGHLIN, ANDREW C. 1932 The Foundations of American Constitutionalism. New York: New York University Press.

MULLETT, CHARLES F. 1933 Fundamental Law and the American Revolution. New York: Columbia University Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL ARGUMENT

See: History in Constitutional Argumentation

CONSTITUTIONAL COMMON LAW

"Constitutional common law" refers to a theory about the lawmaking competence of the federal courts. The theory postulates that much of what passes as constitutional adjudication is best understood as a judicially fashioned COMMON LAW authorized and inspired, but not compelled, by the constitutional text and structure. Unlike the "true" constitutional law exemplified by MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), constitutional common law is ultimately amenable to control and revision by Congress. The theory originated in an effort to explain how the Supreme Court could legitimately insist upon application of the EXCLUSIONARY RULE in state criminal proceedings, once the Court had recast the exclusionary rule as simply a judicially fashioned remedy designed to deter future unlawful police conduct rather than as part and parcel of a criminal defendant's underlying constitutional rights or a necessary remedy for the violation thereof. On this view of the exclusionary rule, why does the state court have a constitutional obligation to do more than provide an "adequate" remedy for the underlying constitutional violation, such as an action for DAMAGES? The source of the Supreme Court's authority to insist that the state courts follow any rule not required by the constitution or authorized by some federal statute is not evident. ERIE RAILROAD V. TOMPKINS (1938) makes plain that the federal courts have no power to create a general FEDERAL COMMON LAW. This limitation exists not simply because of Congress's express statutory command, applicable to civil cases in the federal district courts, but because of the perception that there is no general federal judicial power to displace state law. To the contrary, the courts must point to some authoritative source—a statute, a treaty, a constitutional provision—as explicitly or implicitly authorizing judicial creation of substantive federal law. That federal statutes can constitute such authority has long been clear, and the result has been in many areas judicial creation of a federal common law designed to implement federal statutory policies. There is no a priori reason to suppose that the Constitution itself should differ from statutes in providing a basis for the generation of an interstitial federal common law. Not surprisingly, therefore, a significant body of federal common law has been developed on the basis of constitutional provisions. For example, the Supreme Court has developed bodies of federal substantive law on the basis of the constitutional (and statutory) grants of jurisdiction to hear cases in ADMIRALTY, as well as cases involving disputes among the states or implicating FOREIGN AFFAIRS. Because the Court's decisions are ultimately reversible by Congress, its decisions holding statutes to be invalid burdens upon INTERSTATE COMMERCE are also best understood as federal common law created by the Court on the authority of the COMMERCE CLAUSE.

In the foregoing examples, constitutional common law has been created to govern situations where state interests are subordinated to interests of special concern to the national government, and thus come within the reach of the plenary national legislative power. They are FEDERALISM cases, in that the federal common law implements and fills out the authority that has been committed to the national government by the constitutional text and structure. Thus, the principle of these cases arguably is limited to the generation of federal constitutional common law in support of national legislative competence. These "federalism" cases do not by themselves establish that the Court may fashion a common law based solely upon constitutional provisions framed as limitations on governmental power in order to vindicate CIVIL LIBERTIES, such as those protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT and FOURTH AMENDMENT. Such a judicial rule-making authority—which seeks to create federal rules in areas of primary state concern—intersects with federalism concerns in ways that sets these cases apart from the federalism cases. Moreover, at the national level judicial creation of common law implicates SEPARATION OF POWERS considerations. Nonetheless, the Court's constitutionally based common law decisions in areas of plenary national legislative authority at least invite inquiry whether the specific constitutional guarantees of individual liberty might also authorize the creation of a substructure of judicially fashioned rules to carry out the purposes and policies of those guarantees. Several COMMENTATORS have, directly or indirectly, argued for acceptance of judicial power to fashion such a subconstitutional law of civil liberties. They argue that recognition of such a power is the most satisfactory way to rationalize a large and steadily growing body of judicial decision, not only in the criminal procedure area but also with many of the Court's administrative DUE PROCESS cases, while at the same time recognizing a coordinate and controlling authority in Congress. There has, however, been no significant judicial consideration of this theory apart from the decision in Turpin v. Mailet (2d Cir., en banc, 1978–1979).

Whatever its perceived advantages, a theory that posits a competence in the courts to fashion a constitutionally inspired constitutional common law of civil liberties must deal adequately with a series of objections: that development of such a body of law is inconsistent with the original intent of the Framers; that the line between true constitutional interpretation and constitutional common law is too indeterminate to be useful; and that the existence of such judicial power is inconsistent with the autonomy of the executive department in enforcing law as well as the rightful independence of the states in the federal system. The theory of constitutional common law bears a family resemblance to the views of those commentators who hold that the Court may legitimately engage in "noninterpretive" review—that is, the Court may properly impose values on the political branches not fairly inferrable from the constitutional text or the structure it creates—but who insist that Congress may control those decisions by regulating the JURISDICTION of the Supreme Court. Other differences aside, the constitutional common law view would permit Congress to overrule the noninterpretive decisions directly, bypassing the awkward theoretical and political problems associated with congressional attempts to manipulate jurisdiction for substantive ends.

HENRY P. MONAGHAN
(1986)

Bibliography

MONAGHAN, HENRY P. 1975 The Supreme Court, 1974 Term—Foreword: Constitutional Common Law. Harvard Law Review 89:1–45.

SCHROCK, THOMAS S. and WELSH, ROBERT C. 1978 Reconsidering the Constitutional Common Law. Harvard Law Review 91:1117–1176.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

Constitutional conventions, like the written constitutions that they produce, are among the American contributions to government. A constitutional convention became the means that a free people used to put into practice the SOCIAL COMPACT THEORY by devising their FUNDAMENTAL LAW. Such a convention is a representative body acting for the sovereign people to whom it is responsible. Its sole commission is to frame a CONSTITUTION; it does not pass laws, perform acts of administration, or govern in any way. It submits its work for popular ratification and adjourns. Such a convention first came into being during the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. The institutionalizing of constitutional principles during wartime was the constructive achievement of the Revolution. The Revolution's enduring heroics are to be found in constitution-making. As JAMES

MADISON exultantly declared, "Nothing has excited more admiration in the world than the manner in which free governments have been established in America; for it was the first instance, from the creation of the world . . . that free inhabitants have been seen deliberating on a form of government and selecting such of their citizens as possessed their confidence, to determine upon and give effect to it."

Within a century of 1776 nearly two hundred state constitutional conventions had been held in the United States. The institution is so familiar that we forget how novel it was even in 1787. At the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, which framed this nation's constitution, OLIVER ELLSWORTH declared that since the framing of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION (1781), "a new sett [sic] of ideas seemed to have crept in. . . . Conventions of the people, or with power derived expressly from the people, were not then thought of. The Legislatures were considered as competent."

Credit for understanding that legislatures were not competent for that task belongs to JOHN LILBURNE, the English Leveller leader, who probably originated the idea of a constitutional convention. In his Legall Fundamentall Liberties (1649), he proposed that specially elected representatives should frame an Agreement of the People, or constitution, "which Agreement ought to be above Law; and therefore [set] bounds, limits, and extent of the people's Legislative Deputies in Parliament." Similarly, Sir Henry Vane, once governor of Massachusetts, proposed, in his Healing Question (1656), that a "convention" be chosen by the free consent of the people, "not properly to exercise the legislative power" but only to agree on "fundamentall constitutions" expressing the will of the people "in their highest state of soveraignty. . . ." The idea, which never made headway in England, was reexpressed in a pamphlet by Obadiah Hulme in 1771, recommending that a constitution should "be formed by a convention of delegates of the people, appointed for the express purpose," and that the constitution should never be "altered in any respect by any power besides the power which first framed [it]." Hulme's work was reprinted in Philadelphia in 1776 immediately before the framing of the PENNSYLVANIA CONSTITUTION by a specially elected convention. That convention, however, in accordance with prevailing ideas, simultaneously exercised the powers of government and after promulgating its constitution remained in session as the state legislature. Until 1780 American legislatures wrote constitutions.

The theory underlying a constitutional convention, but not the actual idea of having one, was first proposed in America by the town meeting of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, on May 29, 1776. Massachusetts then had a provisional revolutionary extralegal government. Pittsfield asked, "What Compact has been formed as the foundation of Government in this province?" The collapse of British power over the colonies had thrown the people, "the foundation of power," into "a state of Nature." The first step to restore civil government on a permanent basis was "the formation of a fundamental Constitution as the Basis ground work of Legislation." The existing legislature, Pittsfield contended, although representative, could not make the constitution because, "They being but servants of the people cannot be greater than their Masters, must be responsible to them." A constitution is "above the whole Legislature," so that the "legislature cannot certainly make it. . . ." Pittsfield understood the difference between fundamental and ordinary law, yet inconsistently concluded that the legislature should frame the constitution on condition that it be submitted to the people for ratification.

Pittsfield was merely inconsistent, but the Continental Congress was bewildered. The provisional government of Massachusetts, requesting advice from Congress on how to institute government, said that it would accept a constitution proposed by Congress. That was in May 1775. Many years later, when his memory was not to be trusted, JOHN ADAMS recalled in his autobiography that congressmen went around asking each other, "How can the people institute government?" As late as May 1776, Congress, still lacking an answer, merely recommended that colonies without adequate governments should choose representatives to suppress royal authority and exercise power under popular authority. By then the temporary legislatures of New Hampshire and South Carolina, without popular authorization, had already framed and promulgated constitutions as if enacting statutory law, and continued to operate as legislatures. Adams, however, credited himself with knowing how to "realize [make real] the theories of the wisest writers," who had urged that sovereignty resides in the people and that government is made by contract. "This could be done," he explained, "only by conventions of representatives chosen by the people in the several colonies. . . ." How, congressmen asked him, can we know whether the people will submit to the new constitutions, and he recalled having replied, if there is doubt, "the convention may send out their project of a constitution, to the people in their several towns, counties, or districts, and the people may make the acceptance of it their own act." Congress did not follow his advice, he wrote, because of his "new, strange, and terrible doctrines."

Adams had described a procedure followed only in Massachusetts, and only after the legislature had asked the people of the towns for permission to frame a constitution and submit it for popular ratification. Several towns, led by Concord (see CONCORD TOWN MEETING RESOLUTIONS) protested that the legislature was not a competent body for the task, because a constitution had been overwhelmingly rejected in 1778. Concord had demanded a constitutional convention. In 1779 the legislature asked the towns to vote on the question whether a state constitution should be framed by a specially elected convention. The towns, voting by universal manhood suffrage, overwhelmingly approved. In late 1779 the delegates to the first constitutional convention in world history met in Cambridge and framed the MASSACHUSETTS CONSTITUTION of 1780, which the voters ratified after an intense public debate. With pride Thomas Dawes declared in an oration, "The people of Massachusetts have reduced to practice the wonderful theory. A numerous people have convened in a state of nature, and, like our ideas of the patriarchs, have authorized a few fathers of the land to draw up for them a glorious covenant." New Hampshire copied the procedure when revising its constitution in 1784, and it rapidly became standard procedure. Within a few years American constitutional theory had progressed from the belief that legislatures were competent to compose and announce constitutions, to the belief that a convention acting for the sovereign people is the only proper instrument for the task and that the sovereign must have the final word. A constitution, then, in American theory, is the supreme fundamental law that creates the legislature, authorizes its powers, and limits the exercise of its powers. The legislature is subordinate to the Constitution and cannot alter it.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAMS, WILLI PAUL 1980 The First American Constitutions: Republican Ideology and the Making of the State Constitutions in the Revolutionary Era. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

DODD, WALTER F. 1910 The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

JAMESON, JOHN ALEXANDER 1887 A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions. 4th ed. Chicago: Callahan & Co.

MCLAUGHLIN, ANDREW C. 1932 The Foundations of American Constitutionalism. New York: New York University Press.

WOOD, GORDON S. 1969 The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, RECORDS OF

The records of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 are not so full as scholars and jurists would like them to be. A verbatim account of the proceedings does not exist and, absent modern technology, could not have been produced. Stenographers in Philadelphia covered the state ratifying convention, which met in the fall of 1787; but the Federal Convention met in secrecy and, even if the local stenographers had been admitted, the rudimentary state of their craft and assorted personal shortcomings would have made a satisfactory result unlikely.

We must rely for information about the Convention on a journal kept by its secretary, William Jackson, and on notes kept by various delegates. Some of the notes, especially those made by JAMES MADISON, are extensive; others are fragmentary. Taken together, the existing records give us a satisfactory narrative of events at the Convention—although details of the drafting of many key provisions are sparse, leaving the ORIGINAL INTENT of the Framers enigmatic. It is also true that the documentation becomes poorer toward the end of the Convention. The delegates, tired and eager to go home, recorded less than they did earlier, and what they recorded was sketchier. This is unfortunate, because the last weeks of the Convention saw many important compromises and changes about which, in the absence of adequate records, we know far too little.

The story of how Madison created his notes is familiar: "I chose a seat in front of the presiding member, with the other members, on my right and left hand. In this favorable position for hearing all that passed I noted in terms legible and in abbreviations and marks intelligible to myself what was read from the Chair or spoken by the members; and losing not a moment unnecessarily between the adjournment and reassembling of the Convention I was enabled to write out my daily notes during the session or within a few finishing days after its close." Conscientiously completed at considerable physical cost—Madison later confessed that the task "almost killed" him—these notes are the principal source of information about the convention. That Madison kept his notes in his possession until his death caused one suspicious scholar, WILLIAM W. CROSSKEY, to charge that during his life he had tampered with them—"forged" them, in fact—to make them consistent with political actions he had taken after 1787, an accusation since proven to be without foundation. The one considerable problem with Madison's notes is that they contain only a small proportion of each day's debates. They should not be used with the assumption that they are comprehensive.

The source next in importance to Madison's notes is the Convention records kept by New York delegate ROBERT YATES. They were published in 1821 under the title Secret Proceedings and Debates of the Convention Assembled at Philadelphia in the Year 1787 by an anonymous editor, who turned out to be Citizen Edmond Genêt, the incendiary ambassador of revolutionary France to the United States in 1793. When Madison first saw the published version of Yates's notes, he warned against their "extreme in-correctness"—and with good reason, for it has been discovered that Genêt was guilty of the sin Crosskey laid at Madison's door: tampering with the manuscript version of Yates's notes, deleting some parts and changing others. The Secret Proceedings must therefore be used with extreme caution.

Several other delegates left notes, records, and scraps of paper that shed varying amounts of light on what occurred at Philadelphia, among which the notes of RUFUS KING and JOHN DICKINSON are the fullest. ALEXANDER HAMILTON, JAMES MCHENRY, WILLIAM PIERCE, PIERCE BUTLER, WILLIAM PATERSON, CHARLES PINCKNEY, and JAMES WILSON left more fragmentary materials. OLIVER ELLSWORTH and LUTHER MARTIN said a good deal about the workings of the Convention in polemics generated by the campaign for the RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION during 1787–1788. Their accounts should be consulted, but their partisanship obviously dictates that their statements be used with caution.

The remaining source of information about the Convention is the official journal published in 1819 at the direction of Congress and edited by then Secretary of State JOHN QUINCY ADAMS. Although Adams complained that the manuscript record left by Convention Secretary William Jackson was "very loosely and imperfectly kept," he was able to make perfect sense of it, with the result that the journal that issued from his editorship is a reliable, if barebones, narrative of the daily business of the Convention.

Scholars are aware that several delegates kept manuscript notes of Convention proccedings that have not been found. It is possible that in the future our understanding of Convention proceedings will be enriched, if not fundamentally changed, by the discovery of yet another set of Convention notes.

JAMES HUTSON
(1992)

Bibliography

FARRAND, MAX, ed. 1987 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, rev. ed., 4 vols. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

HUTSON, JAMES H. 1986 The Creation of the Constitution: The Integrity of the Documentary Record. Texas Law Review 65: 1–39.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787

Over the last two centuries, the work of the Constitutional Convention and the motives of the Founding Fathers have been analyzed under a number of different ideological auspices. To one generation of historians, the hand of God was moving in the assembly; under a later dispensation, the dialectic replaced the Deity: "relationships of production" moved into the niche previously reserved for Love of Country. Thus, in counterpoint to the Zeitgeist, the Framers have undergone miraculous metamorphoses: at one time acclaimed as liberals and bold social engineers, today they appear in the guise of sound Burkean conservatives.

The "Fathers" have thus been admitted to our best circles; the revolutionary generation that confiscated all Tory property in reach and populated New Brunswick with outlaws has been converted into devotees of "consensus" and "prescriptive rights." Indeed, there is one fundamental truth about the Founding Fathers that every generation of Zeitgeisters has done its best to obscure: they were first and foremost superb democratic politicians. They were political men—not metaphysicians, disembodied conservatives, or agents of history—and, as recent research into the nature of American politics in the 1780s confirms, they were required to work within a democratic framework. The Philadelphia Convention was not a council of Platonic guardians working within a manipulative, predemocratic framework; it was a nationalist reform caucus which had to operate with great delicacy and skill in a political cosmos full of enemies to achieve the one definitive goal—popular approbation.

Perhaps the time has come, to borrow WALTON HAMILTON's fine phrase, to promote the Framers from immortality to mortality, to give them credit for their magnificent demonstration of the art of democratic politics: they made history and they did it within the limits of consensus. What they did was hammer out a pragmatic compromise that would both bolster the "national interest" and be acceptable to the people. What inspiration they got came from collective experience as politicians in a democratic society. As JOHN DICKINSON put it to his fellow delegates on August 13, "Experience must be our guide. Reason may mislead us."

When the Constitutionalists went forth to subvert the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, they employed the mechanisms of political legitimacy. Although the roadblocks confronting them were formidable, they were also endowed with certain political talents. From 1786 to 1790 the Constitutionalists used those talents against bumbling, erratic behavior by the opponents of reform. Effectively, the Constitutionalists had to induce the states, by democratic techniques, to cripple themselves. To be specific, if New York should refuse to join the new Union, the project was doomed; yet before New York was safely in, the reluctant state legislature had to take the following steps: agree to send delegates to the Convention and maintain them there; set up the special ratifying convention; and accept that convention's decision that New York should ratify the Constitution. The same legal hurdles existed in every state.

The group that undertook this struggle was an interesting amalgam of a few dedicated nationalists and self-interested spokesmen of various parochial bailiwicks. Georgians, for example, wanted a strong central authority to provide military protection against the Creek Confederacy; Jerseymen and Connecticuters wanted to escape from economic bondage to New York; Virginians sought a system recognizing that great state's "rightful" place in the councils of the Republic. These states' dominant political figures therefore cooperated in the call for the Convention. In other states, the cause of national reform was taken up by the "outs" who added the "national interest" to their weapons systems; in Pennsylvania, for instance, JAMES WILSON's group fighting to revise the state Constitution of 1776 came out four-square behind the Constitutionalists.

To say this is not to suggest that the Constitution was founded on base motives but to recognize that in politics there are no immaculate conceptions. It is not surprising that a number of diversified private interests promoted the nationalist public interest. However motivated, these men did demonstrate a willingness to compromise in behalf of an ideal that took shape before their eyes and under their ministrations.

What distinguished the leaders of the Constitutionalist caucus from their enemies was a "continental" approach to political, economic, and military issues. Their institutional base of operations was the Continental Congress (thirty-nine of the fifty-five designated delegates to the Convention had served in Congress), hardly a locale that inspired respect for the state governments. One can surmise that membership in the Congress had helped establish a continental frame of reference, particularly with respect to external affairs. The average state legislator was probably about as concerned with foreign policy then as he is today, but congressmen were constantly forced to take the broad view of American prestige, and to listen to the reports of Secretary JOHN JAY and their envoys in Europe. A "continental" ideology thus developed, demanding invigoration of our domestic institutions to assure our rightful place in the international arena. Indeed, an argument with the force of GEORGE WASHINGTON as its incarnation urged that our very survival in the Hobbesian jungle of world politics depended upon a reordering and strengthening of our national SOVEREIGNTY.

MERRILL JENSEN seems quite sound in his view that to most Americans, engaged as they were in self-sustaining agriculture, the "Critical Period" was not particularly critical. The great achievement of the Constitutionalists was their ultimate success in convincing the elected representatives of a majority of the white male population that change was imperative. A small group of political leaders with a continental vision and essentially a consciousness of the United States' international impotence, was the core of the movement. To their standard rallied other leaders' parallel ambitions. Their great assets were active support from George Washington, whose prestige was enormous; the energy and talent of their leadership; a communications "network" far superior to the opposition's; the preemptive skill which made "their" issue The Issue and kept the locally oriented opposition on the defensive; and the new and compelling credo of American nationalism.

Despite great institutional handicaps, the Constitutionalists in the mid-1780s got the jump on the local oppositions with the demand for a Convention. Their opponents were caught in an old political trap: they were not being asked to approve any specific reform but only to endorse a meeting to discuss and recommend needed reforms. If they took a hard line, they were put in the position of denying the need for any changes. Moreover, because the states would have the final say on any proposals that might emerge from the Convention, the Constitutionalists could go to the people with a persuasive argument for "fair play."

Perhaps because of their poor intelligence system, perhaps because of overconfidence generated by the failure of all previous efforts to alter the Articles, the opposition awoke too late. Not only did the Constitutionalists manage to get every state but Rhode Island to appoint delegates to Philadelphia but they also dominated the delegations. The fact that the delegates to Philadelphia were appointed by state governments, not elected by the people, has been advanced as evidence of the "undemocratic" character of the gathering, but this argument is specious. The existing central government under the Articles was considered a creature of the states—not as a consequence of elitism or fear of the mob but as a logical extension of STATES' RIGHTS doctrine. The national government was not supposed to end-run the state legislatures and make direct contact with the people.

With delegations named, the focus shifted to Philadelphia. While waiting for a quorum to assemble, JAMES MADISON drafted the so-called VIRGINIA PLAN. This was a political masterstroke: once business got underway, this plan provided the framework of discussion. Instead of arguing interminably over the agenda, the delegates took the Virginia Plan as their point of departure, including its major premise: a new start on a Constitution rather than piecemeal amendment. This proposal was not necessarily revolutionary—a new Constitution might have been formulated as "amendments" to the Articles of Confederation—but the provision that amendments take effect after approval by nine states was thoroughly subversive. The Articles required unanimous state approval for any amendment.

Standard treatments of the Convention divide the delegates into "nationalists" and "states' righters" with various shadings, but these latter-day characterizations obfuscate more than they clarify. The Convention was remarkably homogeneous in ideology. ROBERT YATES and JOHN LANSING, Clinton's two chaperones for ALEXANDER HAMILTON, left in disgust on July 10. LUTHER MARTIN left in a huff on September 4; others went home for personal reasons. But the hard core of delegates accepted a grinding regimen throughout a Philadelphia summer precisely because they shared the Constitutionalist goal.

Basic differences of opinion emerged, of course, but these were not ideological; they were structural. If the so-called states' rights group had not accepted the fundamental purposes of the Convention, they could simply have pulled out and aborted the whole enterprise. Instead of bolting, they returned day after day to argue and to compromise. An index of this basic homogeneity was the initial agreement on secrecy: these professional politicians wanted to retain the freedom of maneuver that would be possible only if they were not forced to take public stands during preliminary negotiations. There was no legal means of binding the tongues of the delegates: at any stage a delegate with basic objections to the emerging project could have denounced the convention. Yet the delegates generally observed the injunction; Madison did not even inform THOMAS JEFFERSON in Paris of the course of the deliberations. Secrecy is uncharacteristic of any assembly marked by ideological polarization. During the Convention the New York Daily Advertiser called the secrecy "a happy omen, as it demonstrates that the spirit of party on any great and essential point cannot have arisen to any height."

Some key Framers must have been disappointed. Commentators on the Constitution who have read THE FEDERALIST but not Madison's record of the actual debates (secret until after his death in 1836), have credited the Fathers with a sublime invention called "Federalism." Yet the Constitution's final balance between the states and the nation must have dissatisfied Madison, whose Virginia Plan envisioned a unitary national government effectively freed from and dominant over the states. Hamilton's unitary views are too well known to need elucidation.

Under the Virginia Plan the general government was freed from state control in a truly radical fashion, and the scope of its authority was breathtaking. The national legislature was to be empowered to disallow the acts of state legislatures, and the central government would be vested, in addition to the powers of the nation under the Articles of Confederation, with plenary authority "wherever . . . the separate States are incompetent or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation." Finally, the national Congress was to be given the power to use military force on recalcitrant states.

The Convention was not scandalized by this militant program for a strong autonomous central government. Some delegates were startled, some leery of so comprehensive a reform, but nobody set off any fireworks and nobody walked out. Moreover, within two weeks the general principles of the Virginia Plan had received substantial endorsement. The temper of the gathering can be deduced from its unanimous approval, on May 31, of a resolution giving Congress authority to disallow state legislation "contravening in its opinion the Articles of Union."

Perhaps the Virginia Plan was the delegates' ideological Utopia, but as discussions became more specific many of them had second thoughts. They were practical politicians in a democratic society, and they would have to take home an acceptable package and defend it—and their own political futures—against predictable attack. June 14 saw the breaking point between dream and reality. Apparently realizing that under the Virginia Plan, Massachusetts, Virginia, and Pennsylvania could virtually dominate the national government, the delegates from the small states demanded time for a consideration of alternatives. John Dickinson reproached Madison: "You see the consequences of pushing things too far. Some of the members from the small States wish for two branches in the General Legislature and are friends to a good National Government; but we would sooner submit to a foreign power than . . . be deprived of an equality of suffrage in both branches of the Legislature, and thereby be thrown under the domination of the large States."

Now the process of accommodation was put into action smoothly—and wisely, given the character and strength of the doubters. Madison had the votes, but mechanical majoritarianism could easily have destroyed the objectives of the majority: the Constitutionalists sought a qualitative as well as a quantitative consensus, a political imperative to attain ratification.

According to the standard script, the "states' rights" group now united behind the NEW JERSEY PLAN, which has been characteristically portrayed as no more than a minor modification of the Articles of Confederation. The New Jersey Plan did put the states back into the institutional picture, but to do so was a recognition of political reality rather than an affirmation of states' rights.

Paterson, the leading spokesman for the project, said as much: "I came here not to speak my own sentiments, but the sentiments of those who sent me. Our object is not such a Government as may be best in itself, but such a one as our Constituents have authorized us to prepare, and as they will approve." This is Madison's version; in Yates's transcription, a crucial sentence follows: "I believe that a little practical virtue is to be preferred to the finest theoretical principles, which cannot be carried into effect."

The advocates of the New Jersey Plan concentrated their fire on what they held to be the political liabilities of the Virginia Plan—which were matters of institutional structure—rather than on the proposed scope of national authority. Indeed, the SUPREMACY CLAUSE of the Constitution first saw the light of day in Paterson's Sixth Resolution; for Paterson, under either the Virginia or the New Jersey system the general government would "act on individuals and not on states." From the states' rights viewpoint, this was heresy.

Paterson thus reopened the agenda of the Convention, but within a distinctly nationalist framework. Paterson favored a strong central government but opposed putting the big states in the saddle. As evidence for this there is an intriguing proposal among Paterson's preliminary drafts of the New Jersey Plan:

> Whereas it is necessary in Order to form the People of the U.S. of America in to a Nation, that the States should be consolidated, . . . it is therefore resolved, that all the Lands contained within the Limits of each state individually, and of the U.S. generally be considered as constituting one Body or Mass, and be divided into thirteen or more integral parts.
>
> Resolved, That such Divisions or integral Parts shall be styled Districts.

He may have gotten the idea from his New Jersey colleague Judge DAVID BREARLEY, who on June 9 had commented that the only remedy to the dilemma over representation was "that a map of the U.S. be spread out, that all the existing boundaries be erased, and that a new partition of the whole be made into 13 equal parts." According to Yates, Brearley added at this point, "then a government on the present [Virginia Plan] system will be just."

Thus, the delegates from the small states announced that they were unprepared to be offered up as sacrificial victims to a "national interest" that reflected Virginia's parochial ambition. Caustic CHARLES PINCKNEY was not far off when he remarked sardonically that "the whole conflict comes to this: Give New Jersey an equal vote, and she will dismiss her scruples, and concur in the National system." What he rather unfairly did not add was that the Jersey delegates were not free agents who could adhere to their private convictions; they had to stake their reputations and political careers on the reforms approved by the Convention—in New Jersey, not Virginia.

Paterson spoke on Saturday, and the weekend must have seen a good deal of consultation, argument, and caucusing. One delegate prepared a full-length address: on Monday Alexander Hamilton, previously mute, rose and delivered a six-hour oration. It was a remarkably apolitical speech; the gist of his position was that both the Virginia and New Jersey Plans were inadequately centralist, and he detailed a reform program reminiscent of the Protectorate under the Cromwellian Instrument of Government of 1653. He wanted, to take a striking phrase from a letter to George Washington, a "strong well mounted government."

From all accounts this was a compelling speech, but it had little practical effect; the Convention adjourned, admired Hamilton's rhetoric, and returned to business. Hamilton, never a patient man, stayed another ten days and then left in disgust for New York. Although he returned to Philadelphia sporadically and attended the last two weeks of the Convention, Hamilton played no part in the laborious task of hammering out the Constitution. His day came later when he led the New York Constitutionalists into the savage imbroglio over ratification—an arena in which his unmatched talent for political infighting surely won the day.

On June 19 James Madison led off with a long, carefully reasoned speech analyzing the New Jersey Plan; although intellectually vigorous in his criticisms, Madison was quite conciliatory in mood: "The great difficulty lies in the affair of REPRESENTATION; and if this could be adjusted, all others would be surmountable." When he finished, a vote was taken on whether to continue with the Virginia Plan as the nucleus for a new constitution: seven states voted yes; New York, New Jersey, and Delaware voted No; and Maryland was divided.

Paterson, it seems, lost decisively; yet in a fundamental sense he and his allies had achieved their purpose: from that day onward, it could never be forgotten that the state governments loomed ominously in the background. Moreover, nobody bolted the convention. Paterson and his colleagues set to work to modify the Virginia Plan, particularly with respect to representation in the national legislature. They won an immediate rhetorical bonus; when OLIVER ELLSWORTH of Connecticut moved that the word "national" be expunged from the Third Virginia Resolution ("Resolved that a national Government ought to be established consisting of a supreme Legislative, Executive and Judiciary"), Randolph agreed and the motion passed unanimously. The process of compromise had begun.

For two weeks the delegates circled around the problem of legislative representation. The Connecticut delegation appears to have evolved a possible compromise early in the debates, but the Virginians, particularly Madison, fought obdurately against providing for equal representation of states in the second chamber. There was enough acrimony for BENJAMIN FRANKLIN to propose institution of a daily prayer, but on July 2, the ice began to break when the majority against equality of representation was converted into a dead tie. The Convention was ripe for a solution and the South Carolinians proposed a committee. Madison and James Wilson wanted none of it, but with only Pennsylvania dissenting, a working party was established to cope with the problem of representation.

The members of this committee, one from each state, were elected by the delegates. Although the Virginia Plan had held majority support up to that date, neither Madison nor Randolph was selected. This was not to be a "fighting" committee; the members could be described as "second-level political entrepreneurs."

There is a common rumor that the Framers divided their time between philosophical discussions of government and reading the classics in political theory. In fact, concerns were highly practical; they spent little time canvassing abstractions. A number of them had some acquaintance with the history of political theory, and it was a poor rhetorician indeed who could not cite JOHN LOCKE, Montesquieu, or James Harrington in support of a desired goal. Yet up to this point no one had expounded a defense of states' rights or the SEPARATION OF POWERS on anything resembling a theoretical basis. The Madison model effectively vested all governmental power in the national legislature.

Because the critical fight was over representation of the states, once the GREAT COMPROMISE was adopted on July 17 the Convention was over the hump. Madison, James Wilson, and GOUVERNEUR MORRIS fought the compromise all the way in a last-ditch effort to get a unitary state with parliamentary supremacy. But their allies deserted them and after their defeat they demonstrated a willingness to swallow their objections and get on with the business. Moreover, once the compromise had carried (by five states to four, with one state divided), its advocates threw themselves into the job of strengthening the general government's substantive powers. Madison demonstrated his devotion to the art of politics when he later prepared essays for The Federalist in contradiction to the basic convictions he expressed in the Convention.

Two ticklish issues illustrate the later process of accommodation. The first was the institutional position of the executive. Madison argued for a chief magistrate chosen by the national legislature, and on May 29 this proposal had been adopted with a provision for a seven-year nonrenewable term. In late July this was reopened; groups now opposed election by the legislature. One felt that the states should have a hand in the process; another small but influential circle urged direct election by the people. There were a number of proposals: election by the people, by state governors, by electors chosen by state legislatures, by the national legislature. There was some resemblance to three-dimensional chess in the dispute because of the presence of two other variables: length of tenure and eligibility for reelection. Finally the thorny problem was consigned to a committee for resolution.

The Brearley Committee on Postponed Matters was a superb aggregation of talent and its compromise on the Executive was a masterpiece of creativity. Everybody present knew that under any system devised, George Washington would be the first President; thus they were dealing in the future tense. To a body of working politicians the merits of the Brearley proposal were obvious: everyone could argue to his constituents that he had really won the day. First, the state legislatures had the right to determine the mode of selection of the electors; second, the small states were guaranteed a minimum of three votes in the ELECTORAL COLLEGE while the big states got acceptance of the principle of proportional power; third, if the state legislatures agreed (as six did in the first presidential election), the people could be involved directly in the choice of electors; and finally, if no candidate received a majority in the College, the decision passed to the House of Representatives with each state having one vote.

This compromise was almost too good to be true, and the Framers snapped it up with little debate or controversy. Thus the Electoral College was neither an exercise in applied Platonism nor an experiment in indirect government based on elitist distrust of the masses. It was merely an improvisation which was subsequently, in The Federalist #68, endowed with high theoretical content.

The second issue on which some substantial bargaining took place was SLAVERY. The morality of slavery was, by design, not an issue; but in its other concrete aspects, slavery influenced the arguments over taxation, commerce, and representation. The THREE-FIFTHS RULE—that three-fifths of the slaves would be counted both for representation and for purposes of DIRECT TAXATION—had allayed some northern fears about southern overrepresentation, but doubts remained. Southerners, on the other hand, were afraid that congressional control over commerce would lead to the exclusion of slaves or to their prohibitive taxation as imports. Moreover, the Southerners were disturbed over "navigation acts" (tariffs), or special legislation providing, for example, that exports be carried only in American ships. They depended upon exports, and so urged inclusion of a proviso that navigation and commercial laws require a two-thirds vote in Congress.

These problems came to a head in late August and, as usual, were handed to a committee in the hope that, in Gouverneur Morris's words, "these things may form a bargain among the Northern and Southern states." The Committee reported its measures of reconciliation on August 25, and on August 29 the package was wrapped up and delivered. What occurred can best be described in George Mason's dour version. Mason anticipated JOHN C. CALHOUN in his conviction that permitting navigation acts to pass by majority vote would put the South in economic bondage to the North. Mainly on this ground, he refused to sign the Constitution. Mason said:

> The Constitution as agreed to till a fortnight before the Convention rose was such a one as he would have set his hand and heart to. . . . Until that time the 3 New England States were constantly with us in all questions . . . so that it was these three States with the 5 Southern ones against Pennsylvania, Jersey and Delaware. With respect to the importation of slaves, [decision making] was left to Congress. This disturbed the two Southernmost States who knew that Congress would immediately suppress the importation of slaves. Those two States therefore struck up a bargain with the three New England States. If they would join to admit slaves for some years, the two Southernmost States would join in changing the clause which required the 2/3 of the Legislature in any vote [on navigation acts]. It was done.

On the floor of the Convention there was a love-feast. When Charles Pinckney of South Carolina attempted to overturn the committee's decision, by insisting that the South needed protection from the imperialism of the northern states, General CHARLES COTEWORTH PINCKNEY arose to spread oil on the waters:

> It was in the true interest of the S[outhern] States to have no regulation of commerce; but considering the loss brought on the commerce of the Eastern States by the Revolution, their liberal conduct towards the views of South Carolina [on the regulation of the slave trade] and the interests the weak South. States had in being united with the strong Eastern states, he thought it proper that no fetters should be imposed on the power of making commercial regulations; and that his constituents, though prejudiced against Eastern States, would be reconciled to this liberality. He had himself prejudices against the Eastern States before he came here, but would acknowledge that he had found them as liberal and candid as any men whatever.

Drawing on their vast collective political experience, employing every weapon in the politician's arsenal, looking constantly over their shoulders at their constituents, the delegates put together a Constitution. It was a makeshift affair; some sticky issues they ducked entirely; others they mastered with that ancient instrument of political sagacity, studied ambiguity, and some they just overlooked. In this last category probably fell the matter of the power of the federal courts to determine the constitutionality of acts of Congress. When the judicial article was formulated, deliberations were still at the stage where the legislature was endowed with broad authority which by its own terms was scarcely amenable to JUDICIAL REVIEW. In essence, courts could hardly determine when "the separate States are incompetent or . . . the harmony of the United States may be interrupted"; the national legislature, as critics pointed out, was free to define its own jurisdiction. Later the definition of legislative authority was changed into the form we know, a series of stipulated powers, but the delegates never seriously reexamined the jurisdiction of the judiciary under this new limited formulation. All arguments on the intention of the Framers in this matter are thus deductive and a posteriori.

The Framers were busy and distinguished men, anxious to get back to their families, their positions, and their constituents, not members of the French Academy devoting a lifetime to a dictionary. They were trying to do an important job, and do it in such a fashion that their handiwork would be acceptable to diverse constituencies. No one was rhapsodic about the final document, but it was a beginning, a move in the right direction, and one they had reason to believe the people would endorse. In addition, because they had modified the impossible amendment provisions of the Articles of Confederation to one demanding approval by only three-quarters of the states, they seemed confident that gaps in the fabric which experience would reveal could be rewoven without undue difficulty.

So, with a neat phrase introduced by Benjamin Franklin that made their decision sound unanimous and an inspired benediction by the Old Doctor urging doubters to question their own infallibility, the delegates accepted the Constitution. Curiously, Edmund Randolph, who had played so vital a role throughout, refused to sign as did his fellow Virginian George Mason and ELBRIDGE GERRY of Massachusetts. Presumably, Randolph wanted to check the temper of the Virginia populace before he risked his reputation, and perhaps his job, in a fight with PATRICK HENRY. Events lend some justification to this speculation: after much temporizing and use of the conditional tense, Randolph endorsed ratification in Virginia and ended up getting the best of both worlds.

Madison, despite his reservations about the Constitution, was the campaign manager for ratification. His first task was to get the Congress in New York to light its own funeral pyre by approving the "amendments" to the Articles and sending them on to the state legislatures. Above all, momentum had to be maintained. The anti-Constitutionalists, now thoroughly alarmed and no novices in politics, realized that their best tactic was attrition rather than direct opposition. Thus they settled on a position expressing qualified approval but calling for a second Convention to remedy various defects (the one with the most dema-gogic appeal was the lack of a BILL OF RIGHTS). Madison knew that to accede to this demand would be equivalent to losing the battle, nor would he agree to conditional approval (despite wavering even by Hamilton). This was an all-or-nothing proposition: national salvation or national impotence, with no intermediate position possible. Unable to get congressional approval, he settled for second best: a unanimous resolution of Congress transmitting the Constitution to the states for whatever action they saw fit to take. The opponents then moved from New York and the Congress, where they had attempted to attach amendments and conditions, to the states for the final battle.

At first, the campaign for RATIFICATION went beautifully: within eight months after the delegates set their names to the document, eight states had ratified. Theoretically, a ratification by one more state convention would set the new government in motion, but in fact until Virginia and New York acceded to the new Union, the latter was a fiction. New Hampshire was the next to ratify; "Rogues' Island" was involved in its characteristic political convulsions; North Carolina's convention did not meet until July and then postponed a final decision. Finally in New York and Virginia, the Constitutionalists outmaneuvered their opponents, forced them into impossible political positions, and won both states narrowly.

Victory for the Constitution meant simultaneous victory for the Constitutionalists; the anti-Constitutionalists either capitulated or vanished into limbo—soon Patrick Henry would be offered a seat on the Supreme Court and Luther Martin would be known as the Federalist "bulldog." And, irony of ironies, Alexander Hamilton and James Madison would shortly accumulate a reputation as the formulators of what is often alleged to be our political theory, the concept of "federalism." Arguments would soon appear over what the Framers "really meant"; although these disputes have assumed the proportions of a big scholarly business in the last century, they began almost before the ink on the Constitution was dry. One of the best early ones featured Hamilton versus Madison on the scope of presidential power.

The Constitution, then, was not an apotheosis of "constitutionalism," a triumph of architectonic genius; it was a patchwork sewn together under the pressure of time and events by a group of extremely talented democratic politicians. They refused to attempt the establishment of a strong, centralized sovereign on the principle of legislative supremacy for the excellent reason that the people would not accept it. They risked their political fortunes by opposing the established doctrines of state sovereignty because they were convinced that the existing system was leading to national impotence and, probably, to foreign domination. For two years, they worked to get a convention established. For over three months, in what must have seemed to the faithful participants an endless process of give-and-take, they reasoned, cajoled, threatened, and bargained amongst themselves. The results were a Constitution which the voters, by democratic processes, did accept, and a new and far better national government.

JOHN P. ROCHE
(1986)

Bibliography

BROWN, ROBERT E. 1956 Charles Beard and the Constitution. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

DINKIN, ROBERT J. 1977 Voting in Provincial America. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

ELKINS, STANLEY and MCKITRICK, ERIC 1961 The Founding Fathers: Young Men of the Revolution. Political Science Quarterly 76:181–203.

FARRAND, MAX, ed. 1937 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

KENYON, CECILIA M. 1955 Men of Little Faith: The Anti-Federalists on the Nature of Representative Government. William and Mary Quarterly, 3rd series, 12: McDonald, Forrest T. 1958 We the People. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

ROCHE, JOHN P. 1961 The Founding Fathers: A Reform Caucus in Action. American Political Science Review 55:799–816.

ROSSITER, CLINTON 1966 1787: The Grand Convention. New York: Macmillan.

WARREN, CHARLES (1928) 1937 The Making of the Constitution. Boston: Little, Brown.

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

Article III vests the federal judicial power in the Supreme Court and in any lower courts that Congress may create. The judiciary so constituted was intended by the Framers to be an independent branch of the government. The judges of courts established under Article III were thus guaranteed life tenure "during GOOD BEHAVIOR" and protected against the reduction of their salaries while they held office. The federal courts so constituted are called "constitutional courts." They are to be distinguished from LEGISLATIVE COURTS, whose judges do not have comparable constitutional guarantees of independence.

Constitutional courts, sometimes called "Article III courts," are limited in the business they can be assigned. They may be given JURISDICTION only over CASES AND CONTROVERSIES falling within the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES. For example, Congress could not constitutionally confer jurisdiction on a constitutional court to give ADVISORY OPINIONS, or to decide a case that fell outside Article III's list of cases and controversies included within the judicial power. That list divides into two categories of cases: those in which jurisdiction depends on the issues at stake (for example, FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION) and those in which jurisdiction depends on the parties to the case (for example, DIVERSITY JURISDICTION.)

Congress can, of course, create bodies other than constitutional courts and assign them the function of deciding cases—even cases falling within the judicial power, within limits that remain unclear even after NORTHERN PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION CO. V. MARATHON PIPE LINE CO. (1982). Such a legislative court is not confined by Article III's specification of the limits of the federal judicial power, any more than an administrative agency would be so confined. However, a legislative court's decisions on matters outside the limits of Article III cannot constitutionally be reviewed by the Supreme Court or any other constitutional court.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

WRIGHT, CHARLES ALAN 1983 The Law of Federal Courts, 4th ed. Pages 39–52. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

CONSTITUTIONAL DUALISM

The phrases "dualist Constitution" and "dualist democracy" were coined by Yale Law School Professor Bruce Ackerman. "Dualism" lies at the heart of his influential We, The People, a three-volume reinterpretation of the history and meaning of American Constitutional democracy, and probably the single most important and controversial work in constitutional theory of the 1990s. "Dualism," on Ackerman's account, is the United States' distinctive contribution to democratic theory and practice. It refers to a "two-track" scheme of lawmaking and rests on a two-tiered conception of ordinary citizens' involvement in national politics.

The notion of "private citizenship" aims to combine private freedom and public liberty in a fashion that is normatively attractive and historically faithful. Thus, "private citizenship" strikes a realistic—and, Ackerman claims, distinctly American—balance between full-time devotion to the common good and relentless pursuit of self-interest. It describes a world in which citizens are free, for the most part and most of the time, to pursue their own interests, sacrificing private lives to a modest extent by voting and keeping abreast of important events. On rare occasions, however, issues arise that demand more active involvement. In such moments, Americans must assume the full mantle of a self-governing citizenry. By rising to these "constitutional moments," however, they succeed in governing themselves without losing themselves—in the fashion of more single-minded theories of participatory democracy or civic republicanism—to government.

Ackerman's "two-track" theory of lawmaking runs along the same dual lines. Our constitutional tradition contemplates two types of politics: normal politics and "higher lawmaking" or "constitutional politics." Normal politics is the business of politicians, as private citizens pursue their largely private lives. Then the rare occasion for constitutional politics emerges. Crises and conflicts put on the national agenda fundamental choices about national identity and the role of government. Spurred by prophetic political leaders, the people awake from their civic slumber, mobilize, and participate in extended popular deliberation, debate, and decisionmaking. Framed by the intricate clash of competing leaders, POLTICAL PARTIES, and institutions, including rival branches of the national government, this process of constitutional questions: who belongs to the national political community, what are the rights of CITIZENSHIP, and what are the powers and duties of government.

The higher lawmaking process produced the Constitution and the major changes in it—the RECONSTRUCTION amendments and the "amendment analogues" embodied in the great NEW DEAL cases, UNITED STATES V. DERBY LUMBER COMPANY (1941) and WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942). Thus, on Ackerman's account, there have been but three "constitutional moments"—the Founding, Reconstruction, and the New Deal—each ushering in a new constitutional regime. What legitimated change in each instance was not observance of the formal rules of the constitutional AMENDING PROCESS; in each case, those rules were flaunted. Rather, it was the participation of an engaged citizenry, for this ensured that the constitutional changes wrought by these moments represented the considered wishes of the people.

From this, Ackerman derives a dualist theory of JUDICIAL REVIEW. When the people return to their private pursuits, and normal politics resumes, the constitutional courts have a mandate to protect the result of the people's higher lawmaking from future ordinary politicians and normal politics—that is, a "preservationist function." Striking down the products of normal politics when these trench on the fruits of higher lawmaking cannot fairly be called countermajoritarian or anti-democratic.

In some key respects, there is nothing new about dualism. ALEXANDER HAMILTON, in FEDERALIST No. 78, famously justified judicial review in preservationist terms. The Constitution was an act of the sovereign people; the constitutional court voiding LEGISLATION as incompatible with the Constitution would be enforcing the people's will over and against errant representatives. What is new, then, is Ackerman's candid account of how major constitutional changes on the part of "We, the People" flouted the prescribed rules for amendment, combined with his claim to redeem the lawfulness of these great changes by dint of his discovery of an elaborate and evolving pattern of higher lawmaking norms, a common law of higher law-making, that has governed constitutional transformations outside Article V.

Critics have cast doubt on whether Ackerman's common law of higher lawmaking is a serviceable tool for courts to determine the bona fides of alleged non-Article V amendments and on what kind of guidance, if any, courts, lawmakers, or citizens, finding themselves in the thick of constitutional politics, can derive from Ackerman's ex post rules of recognition. However, many critics left unpersuaded by Ackerman's effort to derive a formal grammar of higher lawmaking have acknowledged that Ackerman has brought into brilliantly detailed focus a genuine tradition of constitutional politics. He has shown how the parties to New Deal and Reconstruction controversies clashed as much over constitutional process as substance. Politicians and reform movements not only addressed the electorate on constitutive questions of national identity and popular government in ways 1990s Americans have almost forgotten; they also fought over the rules of engagement and the processes of change and resistance to change in self-conscious and sophisticated constitutional terms. To this extent, Ackerman succeeds in vindicating the constitutional creativity of ordinary citizens continuing into the twentieth century.

Having reminded us that American politics sometimes has proceeded upon a "higher" and more citizenry-engaging track than the "ordinary," however, Ackerman has been met by another brand of critics who suggest that U.S. history has been punctuated by many more moments of constitutive change than three. The elections and presidencies of THOMAS JEFFERSON and ANDREW JACKSON, the defeat of POPULISM and emergence of Jim Crow in the 1890s, the rise of U.S. imperialism at the turn of the twentieth century, the PROGRESSIVE era, and the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT of the mid-twentieth century all have been put forward as candidates. Ackerman's own most recent writings note that movements for fundamental reform—attended by popular mobilization around constitutive issues of national identity, POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY, and the powers and duties of government—brought forth new parties, pivotal elections, major institutional changes, and doctrinal innovations in each generation of the nineteenth century. Thus, Ackerman himself now seems to agree that even if his original three moments involved more sweeping changes, the differences between them and these others are not so great as to warrant the simple division of American historical time into three long periods of "normal politics" and three bursts of "constitutional politics." Not all these other (perhaps partial) constitutional moments fit tidily into the Whiggish, progressive arc of Ackerman's scheme; some were moments of reactionary, not liberal, reforms. Not all of them followed Ackerman's legitimating rules; some were more or less democratic but others involved a great measure of force and fraud. Taken together, these criticisms do not undo the dualist scheme so much as complicate and enrich it, suggesting a more complex narrative of constitutional development—more constantly changing, more tenaciously remaining the same, more constrained by the institutional inheritances of conflicts whose resolutions merit little legitimacy even by Ackerman's forgiving lights, and arrayed into many overlapping periods of ordinary and constitutional politics and lawmaking.

By bringing politics and popular political action into focus in the realm of constitutional theory, Ackerman's dualism has forever changed the legal academy's reigning narrative of constitutional development. Whether it will affect how courts interpret the Constitution remains an open question.

WILLIAM E. FORBATH
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Amendment Process (Outside Aritcle V); Constitutional Theory.)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE A. 1991 We the People: Foundations. Cambridge, Mass:. Harvard University Press.

——— 1998 We the People: Transformations. Cambridge, Mass:. Harvard University Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL FICTIONS

The leading modern American discussion of legal fictions remains Lon Fuller's articles first published in 1930–1931. Fuller argued that legal fictions promote function, form, and sometimes fairness. It has become increasingly clear, however, that legal fictions no longer serve merely as an "awkward patch" on the fabric of law, as Fuller put it. Fuller considered legal fictions a necessary evil for systematic thinking about law. He viewed legal fictions as akin to working assumptions in physics: they provide a kind of scaffolding, but are not intended to give essential support nor to deceive. After their useful function ends, legal fictions should and could be readily removed.

Fuller defined a legal fiction as "either (1) a statement propounded with a complete or partial consciousness of its falsity, or (2) a false statement recognized as having utility." In today's postrealist world, however, there is a widespread sense that legal fictions are not some small awkward patch, but rather virtually all of law's seamless cloth. This transforms the problem of defining and explaining legal fictions. The very pervasiveness of legal fictions helps to camouflage them. We may generally ignore a phenomenon that permeates our LEGAL CULTURE.

Fuller's taxonomy of legal fictions illuminated Henry Maine's earlier assertion that legal fictions "satisfy the desire for improvement, which is not quite wanting, at the same time that they do not offend the superstitious disrelish for change which is always present." To Maine, legal fictions were "invaluable expedients for overcoming the rigidity of law," but they were also "the greatest of obstacles to symmetrical classification." Fuller advanced beyond Maine's complacent legal anthropology, but he still somewhat desperately sought symmetry. Today we tend to regard all law as a gyrating classification system full of overlaps, gaps, and incommensurate variations. In Grant Gilmore's words, "The process by which a society accommodates to change without abandoning its fundamental structure is what we mean by law."

Precisely because legal fictions are not static, they may grow to influence or even control how we think or refuse to think about basic matters. The fiction that a corporation is a person warranting certain constitutional protections, for example, obviously has spread like kudzu since the Supreme Court first propounded this notion in dicta in Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad (1886). We employ legal fictions to preserve a notion of continuity with the past, yet legal fictions help short-circuit attempts to comprehend the complexity behind the assumptions a legal fiction conveys. Like sunlight, legal fictions affect the directions of growth.

There is a basic irony in our commitment to perserving the RULE OF LAW alongside our reverence for pragmatic immediate solutions to pluralistic problems. Nevertheless, few Americans have ever gone as far in condemning legal fictions as did Jeremy Bentham. Bentham claimed that "n English law, fiction is a syphilis, which runs in every vein, and carries into every part of the system the principle of rotteness." If fictions are to justice "[e]xactly as swindling is to trade," as Bentham put it, Americans tend to exalt trade so much that we tolerate and even celebrate the trader, the flimflam man, and the innovative judge.

In constitutional law, legal fictions are at least as pervasive as in what is still nostalgically called private law. Obviously, a great judge in a constitutional case has to do more than look up the answer in the constitutional text. But what it is we want a good or great postrealist judge to do remains intensely controversial.

The paradoxical way in which Americans revere but fail to heed closely constitutional law suggests that it may be impossible to separate basic constitutional fictions from constitutional governance. Yet political history in the United States has been dominated by an ongoing, multifaceted debate about proper interpretation of the Constitution. Controversies about specific instances of JUDICIAL REVIEW and proposals for constitutional change ebb and flow, but debate about what is true to the Constitution never disappears.

Americans generally display remarkable respect for an old ambiguous text despite—perhaps because of—widespread uncertainty about what it contains. Yet the Constitution and its most important amendments surely were not ratified by a majority of Americans. Moreover, whoever "we the people" may have excluded or included, it is clear that the American people have not actually endorsed the centuries of judicial gloss on the Constitution that provides much basic constitutional law. Nevertheless, sacerdotalizing of the Constitution amounts to a civic religion. General acquiescence in the interpretations of the text by unelected judges thus provides a central constitutional fiction that ironically also has proved to be a notably sturdy foundation. It is important to distinguish this crucial, general trapeze act involving the assumption of societal consent from the more specific uses of fictions in constitutional law.

As early as the 1830s ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE declared: "The government of the Union rests almost entirely on legal fictions. The union is an ideal nation which exists, so to say, only in men's minds and whose extent and limits can only be discerned by understanding." Tocqueville made his point about the central role of legal fictions in American governance, ironically, just as constitutional debate about the abolition of SLAVERY began to spiral toward the CIVIL WAR. That example of the terrible cost of fundamental disagreements about the meaning of the Constitution helps explain why most Americans most of the time are willing to accept the central constitutional fiction that judicial interpretations of the Constitution somehow can settle even the most controversial questions.

An important initial question is whether the American model of judicial review, promulgated most famously by Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), may not itself be a fiction of elemental proportions. Marshall insisted that to deserve the "high appellation" of "a government of laws and not of men," the American system required the power of federal judges to declare legislative acts unconstitutional, but this was hardly necessary to decide the case before the Court and lacked explicit support in the constitutional text. Additional fictions that have played particularly important roles in our constitutional history range from markedly inconsistent judicial declarations enforcing FEDERALISM to decisions granting FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT protection to CORPORATIONS. Among the most important recent examples are decisions applying most but not all of the BILL OF RIGHTS to the states, on the theory that their protections were incorporated through the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and decisions making EQUAL PROTECTION doctrine applicable to the federal government through a theory of "reverse incorporation" premised on the Fifth Amendment.

Less obvious but equally important constitutional fictions limit or ignore the constitutional text. For example, the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) rendered the privileges or immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment essentially redundant. Also, there has been long-standing reluctance to give the NINTH AMENDMENT any content at all. Constitutional fictions thus may restrain as well as enlarge judicial authority.

Particularly flagrant constitutional fictions have produced a smattering of serious scholarly and political criticism, but most Americans apparently continue to revere the Supreme Court and to accept its interpretations even when not pleased by the results in specific cases. For example, there were withering attacks on the Court's aggressive use of what many saw as fictional limitations on progressive legislation in the 1920s and 1930s, but the failure of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT'S COURT-PACKING PLAN suggested that Americans, even when outraged at specific results and dubious about their bases, nevertheless were more willing to accept judicially created fictions than to tinker with the institution of judicial review.

As James Russell Lowell stated in 1888, "After our Constitution got fairly into working order it really seemed as if we had invented a machine that would go of itself, and this begot a faith in our luck which even the civil war itself but momentarily disturbed." But Lowell sardonically continued, "I admire the splendid complacency of my countrymen, and find something exhilarating and inspiring in it. . . . And this confidence in our luck with the absorption in material interests, generated by unparalleled opportunity, has in some respects made us neglectful of our political duties."

It might be thought that legal fictions ought to play a diminished role in constitutional law, in contrast to their prevalence in COMMON LAW. For instance, constitutional law does not lack a text, whereas the common law, in Frederick Pollock's words, "professes . . . to develop and apply principles that have never been committed to any authentic form of words." Despite the best efforts of interpretivists, originalists, and self-proclaimed strict constructionists, however, constitutional law as we know it—and as it has been from the start—demonstrates clearly that even our written "authentic form of words" requires additional criteria for everyday construction and interpretation. In fact, we seem to grow ever more doubtful about what sources we should consult, to say nothing of what might be thought authoritative.

We lack any rule of recognition to distinguish constitutional truth from constitutional fiction. Moreover, our constitutional history clearly reveals that some sections of the authentic text have been relegated to limbo through nonoriginalist hierarchical principles, whereas other sections have acquired so many levels of added meaning that it is now hard to discern any original shape beneath the layers of barnacles added over the years.

The constitutional text is manipulable, but that need not mean it is infinitely manipulable. Federal judges have declared themselves less bound by STARE DECISIS in the constitutional realm than they are in other domains, but they tend to remain concerned with the past and with their won places in history. Yet these same judges use legal fictions to purge the past of its blemishes and discontinuities.

There seems to be a kind of ideological frontier thesis in constitutional law. Justices who start anew and never actually look back are applauded. Because they usually can find PRECEDENTS readily and tend not to consider contexts, these judges reinforce a tendency to turn our backs on past unpleasantness. Fundamental assumptions in constitutional doctrine posit an America full of openings: we may all escape the sins of the past; we all enjoy a fair and equal start in the race of life.

Equality among citizens, for example, is virtually always assumed, whether actual or not. This formal ideal of equality generally provides a complete defense against those who seek remedies for past discrimination unless they can demonstrate that the defendants actually violated the plaintiffs' equality; thus, the victim must place the defendant at the scene of past crimes. This fiction was essential a century ago in the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883) and PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896); a similar fiction was crucial when the Court vigorously enforced its version of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT before the NEW DEAL; and its formal fictional counterpart seems prevalent in RACIAL DISCRIMINATION cases today.

In constitutional law we are devoted to the artificial doctrinal categories and analytic tests that judges create. This remains so even if we are subliminally aware, as Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES noted, that a particular doctrine may be "little more than a fiction intended to beautify what is disagreeable to the sufferers." Judicial reliance on binary tests to foster pseudocertainty is not new, of course, as anyone who recalls the twilight zone of DUAL FEDERALISM must acknowledge. In constitutional cases today, however, judges seem to rely even more frequently on multipart formulas to convey that "delusive exactness" Holmes decried—and sometimes practiced.

Legal fictions are quite different from literary fictions. As ROBERT COVER pointed out, potential violence lurks beneath the fictions created by judges, whereas the nexus between real force and even the most powerful literary fiction is attenuated. Additionally, the author of literary fiction enjoys more freedom than the creator of legal fiction. The poet, even the novelist, usually tries to operate on multiple levels and even dreams of reaching a broad and varied audience. Writers of literary fiction also tend to acknowledge and even to use the possibility of complicity between the teller of the tale and the recipient of it, so that shared understanding is a core concern. By contrast, legal fiction employs a specialized shorthand; many creators and users of legal fiction intend their work product to be confined to, or even ignored by, only a narrow audience of professionals.

Americans find it easy to read prepossessions into the Constitution. We resemble religious sects who are able to find diverse creeds in the same Bible. A century ago, CHRISTOPHER G. TIEDEMAN, a leading conservative treatise writer, admiringly noted that "when public opinion . . . requires the written words to be ignored the court justly obeys the will of the popular mandate, at the same time keeping up a show of obedience to the written word by a skillful use of legal fictions." Today heated political and social controversies often revolve around whether the Constitution resolves, or is even relevant to, the debate over ABORTION or AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, for example. Many people will consider whatever answers the Supreme Court hands down to be constitutional fictions at best. Yet, as the historian CHARLES BEARD put it in 1930, "Humanity and ideas, as well as things, are facts." Constitutional fictions tend to grow into fundamental facts of life in a culture that reveres law.

AVIAM SOIFER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Constitution as Civil Religion; Constitutional Interpretation; Incorporation Doctrine; Legal Realism.)

Bibliography

FULLER, LON 1967 Legal Fictions. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford.
KAMMEN, MICHAEL 1986 A Machine That Would Go of Itself. New York: Knopf.
SOIFER, AVIAM 1986 Reviewing Legal Fictions. Georgia Law Review 20:871.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY BEFORE 1776

The opening words of the United States Constitution, "We the People," startled some of the old revolutionaries of 1776. PATRICK HENRY, after expressing the highest veneration for the men who wrote the words, demanded "What right had they to say, We the People. . . . Who authorized them to speak the language of We, the People, instead of We, the States?" It was a good question and, as Henry knew, not really answerable. No one had authorized the members of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION to speak for the people of the United States. They had been chosen by the legislatures of thirteen sovereign states and were authorized only to act for the governments of those states in redefining the relationships among them. Instead, they had dared not only to act for "the people of the United States" but also to proclaim what they did as "the supreme law of the land," supreme apparently over the actions of the existing state governments and supreme also over the government that the Constitution itself would create for the United States. Because those governments similarly professed to speak and act for the people, how could the Constitution claim supremacy over them and claim it successfully from that day to this, however contested in politics, litigation, and civil war? The answer lies less in logic than in the centuries of political experience before 1787 in which Englishmen and Americans worked out a political faith that gave to "the people" a presumptive capacity to constitute governments.

The idea that government originates in a donation by the people is at least as old as classical Greece. Government requires some sort of justification, and a donation of power by the governed or by those about to be governed was an obvious way of providing it. But such a donation has seldom if ever been recorded as historical fact, because it is virtually impossible for any substantial collection of people to act as a body, either in conveying powers of government or in prescribing the mode of their exercise. The donation has to be assumed, presumed, supposed, imagined—and yet be plausible enough to be acceptable to the supposed donors.

In the Anglo-American world two institutions have lent credibility to the presumption. The first to emerge was the presence in government of representatives chosen by a substantial portion of the people. With the powers of government thus shared, it became plausible to think of the representatives and the government as acting for the people and deriving powers from them. But as these popular representatives assumed a dominant position in the government, it was all too easy for them to escape from the control of those who chose them and to claim unlimited power in the name of the almighty people. A second device was necessary to differentiate the inherent sovereign powers of the people from the limited powers assigned to their deputed agents or representatives. The device was found in written CONSTITUTIONS embodying the people's supposed donation of power in specific provisions to limit and define the government.

Such written constitutions were a comparatively late development; the United States Constitution was one of the first. They came into existence not simply out of the need to specify the terms of the putative donation of power by the people but also out of earlier attempts by representatives or spokesmen of the people to set limits to governments claiming almighty authority from a different source. Although the idea of a popular donation was an ancient way of justifying government, it was not the only way. Indeed, since the fall of Rome God had been the favored source of authority: earthly rulers, whether in church or state, claimed His commission, though the act in which He granted it remained as shadowy as any donation by the people. Up to the seventeenth century, the persons who spoke for the people spoke as subjects, but they spoke as subjects of God as well as of God's lieutenants. While showing a proper reverence for divinely ordained authority, they expected those commissioned by God to rule in a godlike manner, that is, to abide by the natural laws (discernible in God's government of the world) that were supposed to guide human conduct and give force to the specific "positive" laws of nations derived from them. Even without claiming powers of government, those who spoke for the people might thus set limits to the powers of government through "fundamental" laws that were thought to express the will of God more reliably than rulers who claimed His commission. The link is obvious between such FUNDAMENTAL LAWS and written constitutions that expressed the people's will more reliably than their elected representatives could. The one grew out of the other.

Written constitutions were a deliberate invention, designed to overcome the deficiencies of representative government, but representative government itself was the unintended outcome of efforts by kings to secure and extend their own power. The story begins with the creation of the English House of Commons in the thirteenth century, when the English government centered in a hereditary king who claimed God-given authority but had slender means for asserting it. The king, always in need of funds, summoned two representatives from each county and from selected boroughs (incorporated towns) to come to his court for the purpose of consenting to taxes. He required the counties and boroughs in choosing representatives, by some unspecified electoral process, to give them full powers of attorney, so that no one could later object to what they agreed to. Although only a small part of the adult population shared in the choice of representatives, the House of Commons came to be regarded as having power of attorney for the whole body of the king's subjects; every man, woman, and child in the country was held to be legally present within its walls.

The assembly of representatives, thus created and identified with the whole people, gradually acquired an institutional existence, along with the House of Lords, as one branch of the king's Parliament. As representatives, the members remained subjects of the king, empowered by other subjects to act for them. But from the beginning they were somewhat more than subjects: in addition to granting the property of other subjects in taxes, they could petition the king for laws that would direct the actions of government. From petitioning for laws they moved to making them: by the sixteenth century English laws were enacted "by authority" of Parliament. Theoretically that authority still came from God through the king, and Parliament continued to be an instrument by which English monarchs consolidated and extended their government, never more so than in the sixteenth century. But in sharing their authority with Parliament the kings shared it, by implication, with the people. By the time the first American colonies were founded in the early seventeenth century, the king's instrument had become a potential rival to his authority, and the people had become a potential alternative to God as the immediate source of authority.

The potential became actual in the 1640s when Parliament, discontented with Charles I's ecclesiastical, military, and fiscal policies, made war on the king and itself assumed all powers of government. The Parliamentarians justified their actions as agents of the people; and at this point the presumption of a popular origin of government made its appearance in England in full force. The idea, which had been overshadowed for so long by royal claims to a divine commission, had been growing for a century. The Protestant Reformation had produced a contest between Roman Catholics and Protestants for control of the various national governments of Europe. In that contest each side had placed on the people of a country the responsibility for its government's compliance with the will of God. The people, it was now asserted, were entrusted by God with creating proper governments and with setting limits on them to insure protection of true religion. When the limits were breached, the people must revoke the powers of rulers who had betrayed their trust. For Roman Catholics, Protestant rulers fitted the definition, and vice versa.

When Englishmen, mostly Protestant, challenged their king, who leaned toward Catholicism, these ideas were ready at hand for their justification, and the House of Commons had long been recognized as the representative of the people. The House, the members now claimed, to all intents and purposes was the people, and the powers of the people were supreme. Both the king and the House of Lords, lacking these powers, were superfluous. In 1649 the Commons killed the king, abolished the House of Lords, and made England a republic.

By assuming such sweeping powers the members of the House of Commons invited anyone who felt aggrieved by their conduct of government not only to question their claim to represent the people but also to draw a distinction between the powers of the people themselves and of the persons they might choose, by whatever means, to represent them.

The first critics of the Commons to draw such a distinction were, not surprisingly, the adherents of the king, who challenged the Commons in the public press as well as on the field of battle. The House of Commons, the royalists pointed out, had been elected by only a small fraction of the people, and even that fraction had empowered it only to consent to positive laws and taxes, not to alter the government. Parliament, the royalists insisted, must not be confused with the people themselves. Even if it were granted that the people might create a government and set limits on it in fundamental laws, the House of Commons was only one part of the government thus created and could not itself change the government by eliminating the king or the Lords.

More radical critics, especially the misnamed Levellers, called not only for a reform of Parliament to make it more truly representative but also for a written "Agreement of the People" in which the people, acting apart from Parliament, would reorganize the government, reserving certain powers to themselves and setting limits to Parliament just as Parliament had formerly set limits to the king. Although the Levellers were unsuccessful, other political leaders also recognized the need to elevate supposed acts of the people, in creating a government and establishing its fundamental laws, above acts of the government itself. They also recognized that even a government derived from popular choice needed a SEPARATION OF POWERS among legislative, executive, and judicial branches, not merely for convenience of administration but in order to prevent government from escaping popular control.

Although the English in these years generated the ideas that have guided modern republican government, they were unable to bring their own government into full conformity with those ideas. By the 1650s they found that they had replaced a monarch, whose powers were limited, first with a House of Commons that claimed unlimited powers and refused to hold new elections, and then with a protector, Oliver Cromwell, whose powers knew only the limits of his ability to command a conquering army. In 1660 most Englishmen were happy to see the old balance restored with the return of a hereditary king and an old-style but potent Parliament to keep him in line. In 1688 that Parliament again removed a king who seemed to be getting out of control. This time, instead of trying to eliminate monarchy, they replaced one king with another who promised to be more tractable than his predecessor. William III at the outset of his reign accepted a parliamentary declaration of rights, spelling out the fundamental laws that limited his authority.

JOHN LOCKE, in the classic defense of this "Glorious Revolution," refined the distinction made earlier by the Levellers between the people and their representatives. Locke posited a SOCIAL COMPACT in which a collection of hitherto unconnected individuals in a "state of nature" came together to form a society. Only after doing so did they enter into a second compact in which they created a government and submitted to it. This second compact or constitution could be broken—the government could be altered or replaced—without destroying the first compact and throwing the people back into a state of nature. Society, in other words, came before government; and the people, once bound into a society by a social compact, could act without government and apart from government in order to constitute or change a government.

Locke could point to no historical occurrence that quite fitted his pattern. Even the Glorious Revolution was not, strictly speaking, an example of popular constituent action; rather, one branch of an existing government had replaced another branch. And the Declaration of Rights, although binding on the king, was no more than an act of Parliament that another Parliament might repeal. Moreover, the authority of the king remained substantial, and he was capable of extending his influence over Parliament by appointing members to lucrative government offices.

Locke's description of the origin of government nevertheless furnished a theoretical basis for viewing the entire British government as the creation of the people it governed. That view was expressed most vociferously in the eighteenth century by the so-called commonwealthmen, who repeated the call for reforms to make Parliament more representative of the whole people and to reduce the king's influence on its members. But it was not only commonwealthmen who accepted Locke's formulation. By the middle of the eighteenth century the doctrine of the divine right of kings was virtually dead in England, replaced by the sovereignty of the people, who were now accepted as the immediate source of all authority whether in king, lords, or commons.

In England's American colonies the idea that government originates in the people had been familiar from the outset, nourished not only by developments in England but also by the special conditions inherent in colonization. Those conditions were politically and constitutionally complex. The colonies were founded by private individuals or corporations under charters granted by the king, in which Parliament had no part. In the typical colony the king initially conveyed powers of government to the founders, who generally remained in England and directed the enterprise through agents. As time went on, the king took the powers of government in most colonies to himself, acting through appointed governors. But whether the immediate source of governmental authority in a colony rested in the king or in royally authorized corporations or individual proprietors, it proved impossible to govern colonists at 3,000 miles' distance without current information about changing local conditions. That kind of information could best be obtained through a representative assembly of the settlers, empowered to levy taxes and make laws. As a result, in each of England's colonies, within a short time of the founding, the actual settlers gained a share in the choice of their governors comparable to that which Englishmen at home enjoyed through their Parliament.

England's first permanent colony in America, Virginia, was the first to exhibit the phenomenon. The Virginia Company of London, which founded the colony in 1607 and was authorized to govern it in 1609, did so for ten years without participation of the actual settlers. The results were disastrous, and in 1618 the company instructed its agents to call a representative assembly. The assembly met in 1619, the first in the present area of the United States. When the king dissolved the Virginia Company and resumed governmental authority over the colony in 1624, he declined to continue the assembly, but the governors he appointed found it necessary to do so on their own initiative until 1639, when the king recognized the need and made the Virginia House of Burgesses an official part of the government.

In most other colonies representatives were authorized from the beginning or came into existence spontaneously when colonists found themselves beyond the reach of existing governments. The Pilgrims who landed at Plymouth in 1620 provided for their own government by the MAYFLOWER COMPACT, with a representative assembly at its center. The initial governments of Rhode Island and Connecticut began in much the same way. In these Puritan colonies religious principle worked together with pragmatic necessity to emphasize the popular basis of government. Puritans believed that government, though ordained by God, must originate in a compact (or covenant) between rulers and people, in which rulers promised to abide by and enforce God's laws, while the people in return promised obedience. Even in Massachusetts, where from the beginning the government rested officially on a charter from the king, Governor John Winthrop took pains to explain that he regarded emigration to Massachusetts as a tacit consent to such a covenant on the part of everyone who came. The emigrants themselves seem to have agreed; and because the king's charter did not spell out the laws of God that must limit a proper government, the representative assembly of the colony in 1641 adopted the MASSACHUSETTS BODY OF LIBERTIES, which did so.

The model for the colonial representative assemblies was the House of Commons of England; but from the beginning the colonial assemblies were more representative than the House of Commons, in that a much larger proportion of the people shared in choosing them. In England REPRESENTATION was apportioned in a bizarre fashion among the towns and boroughs, with nearly empty villages sending members while many populous towns sent none. In the colonies, although the extension of representation did not everywhere keep up with the spread of population westward, the imbalance never approached that in England, where virtually no adjustments to shifts of population were made after the sixteenth century and none at all between 1675 and the nineteenth century. And while in England a variety of property qualifications and local regulations excluded the great majority of adult males from voting, in the colonies, because of the abundance of land and its widespread ownership, similar restrictions excluded only a minority of adult males.

In addition to its broader popular base, representation in the colonies retained more of its original popular function than did the English counterpart. Representatives in both England and the colonies were initially identified more with a particular group of subjects than with their rulers. As representatives assumed a larger and larger role in government, they necessarily came to consider themselves as acting more in an authoritative capacity over the whole people and less as the designated defenders of their immediate constituents. This conception grew more rapidly in England, as the power of the king declined and that of Parliament increased, than it did in the colonies, where representatives continued to champion the interests of their constituents against unpopular directives from England. The divergence in the American conception of representation was to play a key role both in the colonies' quarrel with England and in the problems faced by the independent Americans in creating their own governments.

By 1763, when France surrendered its North American possessions, Great Britain stood at the head of the world's greatest empire. But the place of the American colonists in that empire remained constitutionally uncertain. Officially their governments still derived authority not from popular donation but directly or indirectly from the king. In two colonies, Rhode Island and Connecticut, the king had conveyed power to the free male inhabitants to choose their own governor, governor's council, and legislative assembly. In two more the king had conveyed governmental power to a single family, the Penns in Pennsylvania and the Calverts in Maryland, who exercised their authority by appointing the governor and his council. In the rest of the colonies the king appointed the governor and (except in Massachusetts) his council, which in all colonies except Pennsylvania doubled as the upper house of the legislature. Thus in every colony except Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, a representative assembly made laws and levied taxes, but neither the governor nor the members of the upper house of the legislature owed their positions even indirectly to popular choice.

It might have been argued that the king himself owed his authority to some sort of popular consent, however tacitly expressed, but it would have been hard to say whether the people who gave that consent included those living in the colonies. It would have been harder still to say what relationship the colonists had to the king's Parliament. In England the king's subordination to Parliament had become increasingly clear. It was Parliament that recognized the restoration of Charles II in 1660; it was Parliament that, in effect, deposed James II in 1688; it was Parliament that placed George I on the throne in 1714 and established the succession of the House of Hanover. Insofar as England's kings ruled Great Britain after 1714 they ruled through Parliament. But they continued to rule the colonies through royal governors and councils, and Parliament still had no hand officially in the choice of royal governors and councils or in the formulation of instructions to them.

Because each colony had its own little parliament, its representative assembly, the people of each colony could have considered themselves as a separate kingdom and a separate people, separate not only from the people who chose the representative assemblies of the other colonies but separate also from the people of Great Britain who chose the British Parliament. If any colonist thought that way—and probably few did before the 1760s or 1770s—he would have had to consider a complicating fact: the British Parliament did on occasion legislate for the colonies and the colonies submitted to that legislation, most notably to the Navigation Acts of 1660 and 1663, which limited the trade of the colonies for the benefit of English merchants. Did this submission mean that the people of the colonies, who elected no representatives to Parliament, were subordinate to, as well as separate from, the people of Great Britain?

In one sense the answer had to be yes: if the king was subordinate to Parliament and the colonists were subordinate to the king, that would seem to make the colonists subordinate to Parliament and thus to the people who elected Parliament. But since Parliament had so seldom legislated for the colonies, it could be argued that the colonists' subordination to it was restricted to those areas where it had in fact legislated for them, that is, in matters that concerned their trade. In other areas, they would be subordinate to Parliament only through the king, and the subordination of the colonial representative assemblies to the king was by no means unlimited. Through the taxing power the colonial assemblies had achieved, over the years, a leverage in the operation of their respective governments comparable to that which had raised Parliament above the king in Great Britain. To be sure, they had not arrived at so clear a position of superiority over their royal governors as Parliament enjoyed over the king. For example, while Queen Anne was the last monarch to veto an act of Parliament, royal governors regularly vetoed acts of colonial assemblies; and even an act accepted by the king's governor could still be vetoed by the king himself. The assemblies nevertheless enjoyed considerable power; by refusing to authorize taxation or to appropriate funds, they could thwart royal directives that they considered injurious to the interests or rights of their constituents. And in some ways they enjoyed a greater independence of royal influence than did Parliament. Because there were few sinecures or places of profit in colonial governments within the appointment of the king or his governors, it was difficult for a governor to build a following in an assembly through patronage.

Despite its constitutional and political ambiguities the British imperial system worked. It continued to work until the power of Parliament collided with the power of the colonial assemblies, thus requiring a resolution of the uncertainties in their relationship. The collision occurred when Parliament, facing a doubled national debt after the Seven Years War, passed the Revenue Act of 1764 (usually called the Sugar Act), levying duties on colonial imports, and the Stamp Act of 1765, levying direct taxes on legal documents and other items used in the colonies. In these acts, probably without intending to, Parliament threatened to destroy the bargaining power through which the colonial assemblies had balanced the authority of the king and his governors. If Parliament could tax the colonists directly, it might free the king's governors from dependence on the assemblies for funds and ultimately render the assemblies powerless.

In pamphlets and newspaper articles the colonists denounced the new measures. The assemblies, both separately and in a STAMP ACT CONGRESS, to which nine colonies sent delegates, spelled out in resolutions and petitions what they considered to be fundamental constitutional rights that Parliament had violated. In doing so the assemblies were obliged to define their constitutional relationship to Parliament with a precision never before required.

Parliament, it must be remembered, had been regarded for centuries as the bulwark of English liberties. It was the representative body of the English people, and through it the English had tamed their king as no other Europeans had. To question its supremacy might well seem to be a reactionary retreat toward absolute monarchy by divine right. The colonists were therefore hesitant to deny all subordination to Parliament. Yet, if they were to enjoy the same rights that other British subjects enjoyed in Great Britain, they must reserve to their own assemblies at the very least the power to tax. They acknowledged, therefore, the authority of Parliament to legislate for the whole empire as it had hitherto done in regulating colonial trade, but they drew a distinction between the power to legislate and the power to tax.

The colonists associated legislation with the sovereign power of a state, and they wanted to consider themselves as remaining in some still undefined way under the sovereign power of the British government. But taxation had from the time of England's first Parliaments been a function of representatives, authorized by those who sent them to give a part of their property to the king in taxes. Taxation, the colonial assemblies affirmed, was not a part of the governing 1869 or legislative power, but an action taken in behalf of the king's subjects. This distinction could be seen, they pointed out, in the form given to Parliamentary acts of taxation: such acts originated in the House of Commons and were phrased as the gift of the commons to the king.

Now the difference between American and British conceptions of representation began to appear. The colonists did not think of the English House of Commons as representing them, for no county or town or borough in the colonies sent members. The British government had never suggested that they might, and the colonists themselves rejected the possibility as impracticable. Given their conception of the representative's subservient relation to his constituents, it would have been impossible, they felt, to maintain adequate control over representatives at 3,000 miles' distance. Thus the colonists had not authorized and could not authorize any representative in Parliament to give their property in taxes. When Parliament taxed them, therefore, it deprived them of a fundamental right of Englishmen, sacred since before the colonies were founded. For a Parliament in which the colonists were not represented to tax them was equivalent to the king's taxing Englishmen in England without the consent of the House of Commons. The colonists called in vain on English courts to nullify this violation of fundamental law.

In answering the colonial objections, British spokesmen did not claim that the colonists could be taxed without the consent of their representatives. Thomas Whately, speaking for the ministry that sponsored the taxes, went even further than the colonists by denying that any legislation affecting British subjects anywhere could be passed without consent of their representatives. But he went on to affirm what to the colonists was an absurdity, that the colonists were represented in the House of Commons. Although they did not choose members, they were virtually represented by every member chosen in Britain, each of whom was entrusted with the interests not merely of the few persons who chose him but of all British subjects. The colonists were represented in the same way as Englishmen in towns that sent no members, in the same way also as English women and children.

However plausible this reasoning may have been to Englishmen, to the colonists it was sheer sophistry. They made plain in resolutions of their assemblies, as for example in Pennsylvania, "That the only legal Representatives of the Inhabitants of this Province are the Persons they annually elect to serve as Members of Assembly." Pamphlets and newspapers were even more scathing in rejecting the pretensions of Parliament to represent Americans. In Massachusetts JAMES OTIS asked, "Will any man's calling himself my agent, representative, or trustee make him so in fact?" On that basis the House of Commons could equally pretend "that they were the true and proper representatives of all the common people upon the globe." (See TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION.)

In reaction to the objections of the colonists and of the English merchants who traded with them, Parliament in 1766 repealed the Stamp Act and revised the Sugar Act. But at the same time it passed a Declaratory Act, affirming its right to legislate for the colonies "in all cases whatsoever." The framers of the act deliberately omitted specific mention of the power to tax, but in the following year Parliament again exercised that presumed power in the TOWNSHEND ACTS, levying more customs duties on colonial imports. The colonists again mounted protests, but they were still reluctant to deny all Parliamentary authority over them and clung to their distinction between legislation and taxation, which the great William Pitt himself had supported (unsuccessfully) in Parliamentary debate. Parliament, they said, could regulate their trade, even by imposing customs duties, but must not use the pretext of trade regulation for the purpose of raising revenue.

Once again the colonial protests, backed by boycotts, secured repeal of most of the offending taxes, but once again Parliament reaffirmed the principle of its unlimited power, not in a declaration, but by retaining a token tax on tea. The colonists, relieved of any serious burden, were left to ponder the implications of their position. In one sense Parliament was treating them as part of a single people, over all of whom, whether in England or elsewhere, Parliament reigned supreme. In rejecting the notion that they were, or even could be, represented in Parliament, the colonists implied that they were a separate people or peoples.

A reluctance to face this implication had prompted their continued recognition of some sort of authority in Parliament. If Parliament in the past had secured the rights of Englishmen, was it not dangerous (as Whately had indeed said it was) to rely instead on the powers of their own little assemblies? If they were a separate people, or peoples, not subject to Parliament, would they not be foregoing the rights of Englishmen, the very rights they were so vigorously claiming? Could they expect their own assemblies to be as effective defenders of those rights as the mighty British Parliament?

As the quarrel over taxation progressed, with the Boston Tea Party of 1773 and Parliament's punitive Coercive Act of 1774 against Massachusetts, more and more Americans overcame the doubts raised by such questions. The Coercive Acts regulated trade with a vengeance by inter-dicting Boston's trade, and the acts also altered the government of Massachusetts as defined by its royal charter (ending the provincial election of the governor's council), thereby showing once and for all that guarantees given by the king could not stand before the supremacy claimed by Parliament. In the treatment of Massachusetts the other colonies read what was in store for them, and the various colonial assemblies sent delegates to the FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS in 1774 in order to concert their response.

As in the earlier Stamp Act Congress, the delegates had to determine what they considered to be the limits of Parliament's authority. This time, abandoning their distinction between legislation and taxation (which Parliament had never recognized), they denied that Parliament had or had ever had constitutional authority over them. As a last conciliatory gesture, they expressed a willingness voluntarily to submit to bona fide regulations of trade, but made clear that Parliament had no constitutional right to make such regulations. Following the lead given in tracts by JOHN ADAMS, JAMES WILSON, and THOMAS JEFFERSON, they elevated their separate representative assemblies to a constitutional position within their respective jurisdictions equal to that of Parliament in Great Britain. The only remaining link connecting them with the mother country was their allegiance to the same king, who must be seen as the king of Virginia, Massachusetts, and so on, as well as of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. (Ireland, it was noted, also had its separate Parliament.) Over his peoples beyond the seas the king exercised his powers through separate but equal governments, each with its own governor, council, and representative assembly.

The king did not, of course, rule by divine right. In the colonies as in England he derived his authority from the people themselves, that is, from the separate consent or constituent act of each of the peoples of his empire. John Adams of Massachusetts, perceiving the need to identify such an act, pointed to the Glorious Revolution of 1688 as an event in which each of the king's peoples participated separately. "It ought to be remembered," he said, "that there was a revolution here, as well as in England, and that we as well as the people of England, made an original, express contract with King William." That contract, as Adams and other colonists now saw it, limited royal power in the same way it was limited in England and guaranteed in each colony the exclusive legislative and taxing authority of the representative assembly.

Although the First Continental Congress gave a terminal clarity to the colonists' views of their constitutional position in the empire, it looked forward uncertainly toward a new relationship among the colonies themselves. The membership of the Congress reflected the uncertainty. Some of the members had been chosen by regularly constituted assemblies; others had been sent by extralegal conventions or committees; and a few were self-appointed. What authority, if any, the members had was not clear. Given the view of representation that had guided colonial reaction to Parliamentary taxation, no one was ready to claim for Congress the powers denied to Parliament. Though delegates from every colony except Georgia were present, they had not been chosen by direct popular elections and therefore were not, by their own definition, representatives. At best, as one of them put it, they were "representatives of representatives."

Yet they had not come together simply for discussion. Boston was under military occupation and Massachusetts was under military government. Regular royal government throughout the colonies was fast approaching dissolution. It was time for action, and the Congress took action. Without pausing to determine by what authority, it adopted an ASSOCIATION forbidding not only exports to and imports from Great Britain but also the consumption of British goods. And it called for the creation of committees in every county, city, and town to enforce these restrictions.

In the misnamed Association (membership in which was scarcely voluntary) the Congress took the first steps toward creating a national government separate from that of the (not yet independent) states. If the members believed, as presumably they did, that the authority of government derives from the people, they implied, perhaps without quite realizing what they were doing, that there existed a single American people, distinct not only from the people of Great Britain but also from the peoples of the several colonies and capable of conveying a political authority distinct from that either of Great Britain or of the several colonies.

The implication would not become explicit until the Constitution of 1787, but the Second Continental Congress, which assembled in May 1775, looked even more like the government of a single people than had the First. Fighting had already broken out in April between British troops and Massachusetts militiamen, and Congress at once took charge of the war and began the enlistment of a Continental Army. It sent envoys to France to seek foreign assistance. It opened American commerce to foreign nations. It advised the peoples of the several colonies to suppress all royal authority within their borders. And finally, after more than a year of warfare, it declared the independence of the United States.

Despite the boldness of these actions, the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE itself betrayed the ambiguities that Americans felt about their own identity. It unequivocally put an end to royal authority (parliamentary authority had already been rejected) and consequently to all remaining connection with the people of Great Britain. But it was not quite clear whether the independence thus affirmed was of one people, or of several, or of both one and several.

While the preamble spoke of "one people" separating from another, the final affirmation was in the plural, declaring that "these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be Free and Independent States." Yet in stating what constituted free and independent statehood, the Declaration specified only "power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce." These were all things, with the possible exception of the last, that had been done or would be done by the Congress.

But if the Congress sometimes acted like the government of a single free and independent state, the members still did not recognize the implication that they represented a single free and independent people. They did not consider their Declaration of Independence complete until it had been ratified by each of the separate states whose freedom and independence it declared. And when they tried to define their own authority, they found it difficult to reach agreement. ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, first drafted in 1776, were not ratified by the several states until 1781. The Articles entrusted Congress with the powers it was already exercising but declined to derive those powers from a single American people. The old local committees of the Association of 1774, tied directly to Congress, were now a thing of the past, and the enactments of Congress became mere recommendations, to be carried out by the various states as they saw fit.

Even before the Declaration of Independence, in response to the recommendation of the Congress, the states had begun to create governments resting solely on the purported will of the people within their existing borders. In every state a provisional government appeared, usually in the form of a provincial congress resembling the old colonial representative assembly. In most of the states, beginning with Virginia in June 1776, these provincial congresses drew up and adopted, without further reference to the people, constitutions defining the structure of their governments and stating limitations on governmental powers in bills of rights. In every case the constitution was thought or proclaimed to be in some way an act of the people who were to be governed under it, and therefore different from and superior to acts of representatives in a legislative assembly. But often the provincial congress that drafted a state constitution continued to act as the legislative body provided in it. Although a constitution might affirm its own superiority to ordinary legislation, the fact that it was created by legislative act rendered doubtful its immunity to alteration by the body that created it.

A similar doubt surrounded the principle, also enunciated in most of the constitutions, that (as in Virginia) "The legislative, executive, and judiciary departments shall be separate and distinct, so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to the other." The several provincial congresses that drafted the constitutions inherited the aggressiveness of the colonial assemblies against executive and, to a lesser degree, judicial powers, which had hitherto rested in an overseas authority beyond their reach. In spite of the assertion of the separation of powers, and in spite of the fact that executives and judges would now derive authority solely from the people they governed, the state constitutions generally gave the lion's share of power in government to the representative assemblies.

The result was to bring out the shortcomings of the view of representation that had directed the colonists in their resistance to British taxation. For a decade the colonists had insisted that a representative must act only for the particular group of persons who chose him. They occasionally recognized but minimized his responsibility, as part of the governing body, to act for the whole people who were to be governed by the laws he helped to pass. Now the representative assemblies were suddenly presented with virtually the entire powers of government, which they shared only with a weak executive and judiciary and with a Continental Congress whose powers remained uncertain, despite Articles of Confederation that gave it large responsibilities without the means to perform them. Undeterred by any larger view of their functions, too many of the state assemblymen made a virtue of partiality to their particular constituents and ignored the long-range needs not only of their own state but of the United States.

The solution lay ahead in 1787. By 1776 the inherited ingredients of the settlement then adopted were in place. A rudimentary distinction between the constituent actions of a putative people and the actions of their government had been recognized, though not effectively implemented, in the state governments. All government officers were now selected directly or indirectly by popular choice, with their powers limited, at least nominally, by a reservation to the people of powers not specifically conveyed. And a national center of authority, not quite a government but nevertheless acting like a government, was in operation in the Continental Congress.

What was needed—and with every passing year after 1776 the need became more apparent—was a way to relieve popular government from the grip of short-sighted representative assemblies. Two political inventions filled the need. The first was the constitutional convention, an assembly without legislative powers, entrusted solely with the drafting of a constitution for submission to popular ratification, a constitution that could plausibly be seen as the embodiment of the popular will superior to the ordinary acts of representative assemblies. Massachusetts provided this invention in 1779, in the convention that drafted the state's first constitution. (See MASSACHUSETTS CONSTITUTION. )

The first invention made way for the second, which was supplied by JAMES MADISON and his colleagues at Philadelphia in 1787. They invented the American people. It was, to be sure, an invention waiting to be made. It had been prefigured in the assumptions behind the Continental Association and the Declaration of Independence. But it reached fulfillment only in the making of the Constitution. By means of a national constitutional convention the men at Philadelphia built a national government that presumed and thus helped to create an American people, distinct from and superior to the peoples of the states.

The idea of popular SOVEREIGNTY was, as we have seen, an old one, but only occasionally had it dictated the formation of popular governments, governments in which all the officers owed their positions directly or indirectly to popular election. Though the idea surfaced powerfully in the England of the 1640s and 1650s, it eventuated there in a restored monarchy, and it won only partial recognition in England's Revolution of 1688. In the AMERICAN REVOLUTION it had seemingly found full expression in thirteen separate state governments, but by 1787 the actions of those governments threatened once again to discredit the whole idea. The signal achievement of the constitutional convention was expressed in the opening words of the document it produced: "We the People of the United States." The United States Constitution rescued popular sovereignty by extending it. It inaugurated both a new government and a new people.

EDMUND S. MORGAN
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAMS, WILLI PAUL 1980 The First American Constitutions. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

BAILYN, BERNARD 1967 The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1968 The Origins of American Politics. New York: Knopf.

FIGGIS, JOHN NEVILLE 1914 The Divine Right of Kings. Cambridge: At the University Press.

GREENE, JACK P. 1963 The Quest for Power. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

KANTOROWICZ, ERNST H. 1957 The King's Two Bodies. Princeton: N.J.: Princeton University Press.

LABAREE, LEONARD W. 1930 Royal Government in America. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

MCILWAIN, CHARLES H. 1923 The American Revolution. New York: Macmillan.

MORGAN, EDMUND S. and MORGAN, HELEN M. 1953 The Stamp Act Crisis. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

POCOCK, JOHN G. A. 1957 The Ancient Constitution and the Feudal Law. Cambridge: At the University Press.

RUSSELL, CONRAD 1979 Parliaments and English Politics 1621–1629. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

SCHUYLER, ROBERT L. 1929 Parliament and the British Empire. New York: Columbia University Press.

SKINNER, QUENTIN 1978 The Foundations of Modern Political Thought. Cambridge: At the University Press.

TUCKER, ROBERT W. and HENRICKSON, DAVID C. 1982 The Fall of the First British Empire. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1776–1789

On July 4, 1776, King George III wrote in his diary, "Nothing of importance this day." When the news of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE reached him, he still could not know how wrong he had been. The political philosophy of SOCIAL COMPACT, NATURAL RIGHTS, and LIMITED GOVERNMENT that generated the Declaration of Independence also spurred the most important, creative, and dynamic constitutional achievements in history; the Declaration itself was merely the beginning. Within a mere thirteen years Americans invented or first institutionalized a bill of rights against all branches of government, the written CONSTITUTION, the JUDICIAL REVIEW, and a solution to the colonial problem (admitting TERRITORIES to the Union as states fully equal to the original thirteen). RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, political parties, SEPARATION OF POWERS, an acceptance of the principle of equality, and the conscious creation of a new nation were also among American institutional "firsts," although not all these initially appeared between 1776 and 1789. In that brief span of time, Americans created what are today the oldest major republic, political democracy, state constitution, and national constitution. These unparalleled American achievements derived not from originality in speculative theory but from the constructive application of old ideas, which Americans took so seriously that they constitutionally based their institutions of government on them.

From thirteen separate colonies the Second Continental Congress "brought forth a new nation," as ABRAHAM LINCOLN said. In May 1776, Congress urged all the colonies to suppress royal authority and adopt permanent governments. On that advice and in the midst of a war the colonies began to frame the world's first written constitutions. When Congress triggered the drafting of those constitutions, Virginia instructed its delegates to Congress to propose that Congress should declare "the United Colonies free and independent states." Neither Virginia nor Congress advocated state sovereignty. Congress's advice implied the erection of state governments with sovereign powers over domestic matters or "internal police."

On June 7, 1776, Congressman RICHARD HENRY LEE of Virginia introduced the resolution as instructed, and Congress appointed two committees, one to frame the document that became the Declaration of Independence and the other to frame a plan of confederation—a constitution for a continental government. When Lincoln declared, "The Union is older than the States, and in fact created them as States," he meant that the Union (Congress) antedated the states. The Declaration of Independence, which stated that the colonies had become states, asserted the authority of the "United States of America, in General Congress, Assembled."

The "spirit of '76" tended to be strongly nationalistic. The members of Congress represented the states, of course, and acted on their instructions, but they acted for the new nation, and the form of government they thought proper in 1776 was a centralized one. As a matter of fact BENJAMIN FRANKLIN had proposed such a government on July 21, 1775, when he presented to Congress " ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION and perpetual Union." Franklin urged a congressional government with an executive committee that would manage "general continental Business and Interests," conduct diplomacy, and administer finances. His plan empowered Congress to determine war and peace, exchange ambassadors, make foreign alliances, settle all disputes between the colonies, plant new colonies, and, in a sweeping omnibus clause, make laws for "the General Welfare" concerning matters on which individual colonies "cannot be competent," such as "our general Commerce," "general Currency," the establishment of a post office, and governance of "our Common Forces." Costs were to be paid from a common treasury supplied by each colony in proportion to its male inhabitants, but each colony would raise its share by taxing its inhabitants. Franklin provided for an easy amendment process: Congress recommended amendments that would become part of the Articles when approved by a majority of colonial assemblies. Franklin's plan of union seemed much too radical in July 1775, when independence was a year away and reconciliation with Britain on American terms was the object of the war. Congress simply tabled the Franklin plan.

As the war continued into 1776, nationalist sentiment strengthened. THOMAS PAINE's Common Sense called for American independence and "a Continental form of Government." Nationalism and centralism were twin causes. JOHN LANGDON of New Hampshire favored independence and "an American Constitution" that provided for appeals from every colony to a national congress "in everything of moment relative to governmental matters." Proposals for a centralized union became common by the spring of 1776, and these proposals, as the following representative samples suggest, tended to show democratic impulses. Nationalism and mitigated democracy, not nationalism and conservatism, were related. A New York newspaper urged the popular election of a national congress with a "superintending power" over the individual colonies as to "all commercial and Continental affairs," leaving to each colony control over its "internal policy." A populistic plan in a Connecticut newspaper recommended that the congress be empowered to govern "all matters of general concernment" and "every other thing proper and necessary" for the benefit of the whole, allowing the individual colonies only that which fell "within the territorial jurisdiction of a particular assembly." The "Spartacus" essays, which newspapers in New York, Philadelphia, and Portsmouth printed, left the state "cantons" their own legislatures but united all in a national congress with powers similar to those enumerated by Franklin, including a paramount power to "interfere" with a colony's "provincial affairs" whenever required by "the good of the continent." "Essex" reminded his readers that "the strength and happiness of America must be Continental, not Provincial, and that whatever appears to be for the good of the whole, must be submitted to by every Part." He advocated dividing the colonies into many smaller equal parts that would have equal representation in a powerful national congress chosen directly by the people, including taxpaying widows. Carter Braxton, a conservative Virginian, favored aristocratic controls over a congress that could not "interfere with the internal police or domestic concerns of any Colony. . . ."

Given the prevalence of such views in the first half of 1776, a representative committee of the Continental Congress probably mirrored public opinion when it framed a nationalist plan for confederation. On July 12, one month after the appointment of a thirteen-member committee (one from each state) to write a draft, JOHN DICKINSON of Pennsylvania, the committee chairman, presented to Congress a plan that borrowed heavily from Franklin's. The Committee of the Whole of Congress debated the Dickinson draft and adopted it on August 20 with few changes. Only one was significant. Dickinson had proposed that Congress be empowered to fix the western boundaries of states claiming territory to the Pacific coast and to form new states in the west. The Committee of the Whole, bending to the wishes of eight states with extensive western claims, omitted that provision from its revision of the Dickinson draft. That omission became a stumbling block.

On August 20 the Committee of the Whole reported the revised plan of union to Congress. The plan was similar to Franklin's, except that Congress had no power over "general commerce." But Congress, acting for the United States, was clearly paramount to the individual states. They were not even referred to as "states." Collectively they were "the United States of America"; otherwise they were styled "colonies" or "colony," terms not compatible with sovereignty, to which no reference was made. Indeed, the draft merely reserved to each colony "sole and exclusive Regulation and Government of its internal police, in all matters that shall not interfere with the Articles of this Confederation." That crucial provision, Article III, making even "internal police" subordinate to congressional powers, highlighted the nationalist character of the proposed confederation.

The array of congressional powers included exclusive authority over war and peace, land and naval forces, treaties and alliances, prize cases, crimes on the high seas and navigable rivers, all disputes between states, coining money, borrowing on national credit, Indian affairs, post offices, weights and measures, and "the Defence and Welfare" of the United States. Congress also had power to appoint a Council of State and civil officers "necessary for managing the general Affairs of the United States." The Council of State, consisting of one member from each of the thirteen, was empowered to administer the United States government and execute its measures. Notwithstanding this embryonic executive branch, the government of the United States was congressional in character, consisting of a single house whose members were to be elected annually by the legislatures of the colonies. Each colony cast one vote, making each politically equal in Congress. On all important matters, the approval of nine colonies was required to pass legislation. Amendments to the Articles needed the unanimous approval of the legislatures of the various colonies, a provision that later proved to be crippling.

The Articles reported by the Committee of the Whole provoked dissension. States without western land claims opposed the omission of the provision in the Dickinson draft that gave Congress control over western lands. Large states opposed the principle of one vote for each state, preferring instead proportionate representation with each delegate voting. Sharp differences also emerged concerning the rule by which each state was to pay its quota to defray common expenses. Finally some congressmen feared the centralizing nature of the new government. Edward Rutledge of South Carolina did not like "the Idea of destroying all Provincial Distinctions and making every thing of the most minute kind bend to what they call the good of the whole. . . ." Rutledge resolved "to vest the Congress with no more Power than what is absolutely necessary." JAMES WILSON of Pennsylvania could declare that Congress represented "all the individuals of the states" rather than the states, but ROGER SHERMAN of Connecticut answered, "We are representatives of states, not individuals." That attitude would undo the nationalist "spirit of '76."

Because of disagreements and the urgency of prosecuting the war, Congress was unable to settle on a plan of union in 1776. By the spring of 1777 the nationalist momentum was spent. By then most of the states had adopted constitutions and had legitimate governments. Previously, provisional governments of local "congresses," "conventions," and committees had controlled the states and looked to the Continental Congress for leadership and approval. But the creation of legitimate state governments reinvigorated old provincial loyalties. Local politicians, whose careers were provincially oriented, feared a strong central government as a rival institution. Loyalists no longer participated in politics, local or national, depleting support for central control. By late April of 1777, when state sovereignty triumphed, only seventeen of the forty-eight congressmen who had been members of the Committee of the Whole that adopted the Dickinson draft remained in Congress. Most of the new congressmen opposed centralized government.

James Wilson, who was a congressman in 1776 and 1777, recalled what happened when he addressed the Constitutional Convention on June 8, 1787:

> Among the first sentiments expressed in the first Congs. one was that Virga. is no more. That Massts. is no more, that Pa. is no more c. We are now one nation of brethren. We must bury all local interests and distinctions. This language continued for some time. The tables at length began to turn. No sooner were the State Govts. formed than their jealousy & ambition began to display themselves. Each endeavored to cut a slice from the common loaf, to add to its own morsel, till at length the confederation became frittered down to the impotent condition in which it now stands. Review the progress of the articles of Confederation thro' Congress & compare the first and last draught of it [Farrand, ed., Records, I, 166–67].

The turning point occurred in late April 1777 when Thomas Burke of North Carolina turned his formidable localist opinions against the report of the Committee of the Whole. Its Article III, in his words, "expressed only a reservation [to the states] of the power of regulating the internal police, and consequently resigned every other power [to Congress]." Congress, he declared, sought even to interfere with the states' internal police and make its own powers "unlimited." Burke accordingly moved the following substitute for Article III, which became Article II of the Articles as finally adopted: "Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." Burke's motion carried by the votes of eleven states, vitiating the powers of the national government recommended by the Committee of the Whole.

In the autumn of 1777 a Congress dominated by state-sovereignty advocates completed the plan of confederation. Those who favored proportionate representation in Congress with every member entitled to vote lost badly to those who favored voting by states with each state having one vote. Thereafter the populous wealthy states had no stake in supporting a strong national government that could be controlled by the votes of lesser states. The power of Congress to negotiate commercial treaties effectively died when Congress agreed that under the Articles no treaty should violate the power of the states to impose tariff duties or prohibit imports and exports. The power of Congress to settle all disputes between states became merely a power to make recommendations. The permanent executive branch became a temporary committee with no powers except as delegated by the votes of nine states, the number required to adopt any major measure. Congress also agreed that it should not have power to fix the western boundaries of states claiming lands to the Pacific.

After the nationalist spurt of 1776 proved insufficient to produce the Articles, the states made the Confederation feckless. Even as colonies the states had been particularistic, jealous, and uncooperative. Centrifugal forces originating in diversity—of economics, geography, religion, class structure, and race—produced sectional, provincial, and local loyalties that could not be overcome during a war against the centralized powers claimed by Parliament. The controversy with Britain had produced passions and principles that made the Franklin and Dickinson drafts unviable. Not even these nationalist drafts empowered Congress to tax, although the principle of no TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION had become irrelevant as to Congress. Similarly, Congress as late as 1774 had "cheerfully" acknowledged Parliament's legitimate "regulation of our external commerce," but in 1776 Congress denied that Parliament had any authority over America, and by 1777 Americans were unwilling to grant their own central legislature powers they preferred their provincial assemblies to wield. Above all, most states refused to repose their trust in any central authority that a few large states might dominate, absent a constitutionally based principle of state equality.

Unanimous consent for amendments to the Articles proved to be too high a price to pay for acknowledging the "sovereignty" of each state, although that acknowledgment made Maryland capable of winning for the United States the creation of a national domain held in common for the benefit of all. Maryland also won the promise that new states would be admitted to the union on a principle of state equality. That prevented the development of a colonial problem from Atlantic to Pacific, and the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE OF 1787 was the Confederation's finest and most enduring achievement.

The Constitution of 1787 was unthinkable in 1776, impossible in 1781 or at any time before it was framed. The Articles were an indispensable transitional stage in the development of the Constitution. Not even the Constitution would have been ratified if its Framers had submitted it for approval to the state legislatures that kept Congress paralyzed in the 1780s. Congress, representing the United States, authorized the creation of the states and ended up, as it had begun, as their creature. It possessed expressly delegated powers with no means of enforcing them. That Congress lacked commerce and tax powers was a serious deficiency, but not nearly so crippling as its lack of sanctions and the failure of the states to abide by the Articles. Congress simply could not make anyone, except soldiers, do anything. It acted on the states, not on people. Only a national government that could execute its laws independently of the states could have survived.

The states flouted their constitutional obligations. The Articles obliged the states to "abide by the determinations of the United States, in Congress assembled," but there was no way to force the states to comply. The states were not sovereign, except as to their internal police and tax powers; rather, they behaved unconstitutionally. No foreign nation recognized the states as sovereign, because Congress possessed the external attributes of sovereignty especially as to FOREIGN AFFAIRS and WAR POWERS.

One of the extraordinary achievements of the Articles was the creation of a rudimentary federal system. It failed because its central government did not operate directly on individuals within its sphere of authority. The Confederation had no independent executive and judicial branches, because the need for them scarcely existed when Congress addressed its acts mainly to the states. The framers of the Articles distributed the powers of government with remarkable acumen, committing to Congress about all that belonged to a central government except, of course, taxation and commercial regulation, the two powers that Americans of the Revolutionary War believed to be part of state sovereignty. Even ALEXANDER HAMILTON, who in 1780 advocated that Congress should have "complete sovereignty," excepted "raising money by internal taxes."

Congress could requisition money from the states, but they did not pay their quotas. In 1781 Congress requisitioned $8,000,000 for the next year, but the states paid less than half a million. While the Articles lasted, the cumulative amount paid by all the states hardly exceeded what was required to pay the interest on the public debt for just one year.

Nationalists vainly sought to make the Articles more effective by both interpretation and amendment. Madison devised a theory of IMPLIED POWERS by which he squeezed out of the Articles congressional authority to use force if necessary against states that failed to fulfill their obligations. Congress refused to attempt coercion just as it refused to recommend an amendment authorizing its use. Congress did, however, charter a bank to control currency, but the opposition to the exercise of a power not expressly delegated remained so intense that the bank had to be rechartered by a state. Congress vainly sought unanimous state consent for various amendments that would empower it to raise money from customs duties and to regulate commerce, foreign and domestic. In 1781 every state but Rhode Island approved an amendment empowering Congress to impose a five percent duty on all foreign imports; never again did an amendment to the Articles come so close to adoption. Only four states ratified an amendment authorizing a congressional embargo against the vessels of any nation with whom the United States had no treaty of commerce. Congress simply had no power to negotiate commercial treaties with nations such as Britain that discriminated against American shipping. Nor had Congress the power to prevent states from violating treaties with foreign nations. In 1786 JOHN JAY, Congress's secretary of foreign affairs, declared that not a day had passed since ratification of the 1783 treaty of peace without its violation by at least one state. Some states also discriminated against the trade of others. Madison likened New Jersey, caught between the ports of Philadelphia and New York, "to a cask tapped at both ends." More important, Congress failed even to recommend needed amendments. As early as 1784 Congress was so divided it defeated an amendment that would enable it to regulate commerce, foreign and domestic, and to levy duties on imports and exports. Often Congress could not function for lack of a quorum. The requisite number of states was present for only three days between October 1785 and April 1786. In 1786 Congress was unable to agree on any amendments for submission to the states.

The political condition of the United States during the 1780s stagnated partly because of the constitutional impotence of Congress and the unconstitutional conduct of the states. The controversy with Britain had taught that liberty and localism were congruent. The 1780s taught that excessive localism was incompatible with nationhood. The Confederation was a necessary point of midpassage. It bequeathed to the United States the fundamentals of a federal system, a national domain, and a solution to the colonial problem. Moreover the Articles contained several provisions that were antecedents of their counterparts in the Constitution of 1787: a free speech clause for congressmen and LEGISLATIVE IMMUNITY, a PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause, a clause on the extradition of FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE, a FULL FAITH AND CREDIT clause, and a clause validating United States debts. The Confederation also started an effective government bureaucracy when the Congress in 1781 created secretaries for foreign affairs, war, marine, and finance—precursors of an executive branch. When the new departments of that branch began to function in 1789, a corps of experienced administrators, trained under the Articles, staffed them. The courts established by Congress to decide prize and admiralty cases as well as boundary disputes foreshadowed a national judiciary. Except for enactment of the great Northwest Ordinance, however, the Congress of the Confederation was moribund by 1787. It had successfully prosecuted the war, made foreign alliances, established the national credit, framed the first constitution of the United States, negotiated a favorable treaty of peace, and created a national domain. Congress's accomplishments were monumental, especially during wartime, yet in the end it failed.

By contrast, state government flourished. Excepting Rhode Island and Connecticut, all the states adopted written constitutions during the war, eight in 1776. Madison exultantly wrote, "Nothing has excited more admiration in the world than the manner in which free governments have been established in America, for it was the first instance, from the creation of the world that free inhabitants have been seen deliberating on a form of government, and selection of such of their citizens as possessed their confidence to determine upon and give effect to it."

The VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION OF 1776, the first permanent state constitution, began with a Declaration of Rights adopted three weeks before the Declaration of Independence. No previous bill of rights had restrained all branches of government. Virginia's reflected the widespread belief that Americans had been thrown back into a state of nature from which they emerged by framing a social compact for their governance, reserving to themselves certain inherent or natural rights, including life, liberty, the enjoyment of property, and the pursuit of happiness. Virginia's declaration explicitly declared that as all power derived from the people, for whose benefit government existed, the people could reform or abolish government when it failed them. On the basis of this philosophy Virginia framed a constitution providing for a bicameral legislature, a governor, and a judicial system. The legislature elected a governor, who held office for one year, had no veto power, and was encumbered by an executive council. The legislature chose many important officials, including judges.

Some states followed the more democratic model of the PENNSYLVANIA CONSTITUTION OF 1776, others the ultraconservative one of Maryland, but all state constitutions prior to the MASSACHUSETTS CONSTITUTION OF 1780 were framed by legislatures, which in some states called themselves "conventions" or assemblies. Massachusetts deserves credit for having originated a new institution of government, a specially elected constitutional convention whose sole function was to frame the constitution and submit it for popular ratification. That procedure became the standard. Massachusetts's constitution, which is still operative, became the model American state constitution. The democratic procedure for making it fit the emerging theory that the sovereign people should be the source of the constitution and authorize its framing by a constitutional convention, rather than the legislature to which the constitution is paramount. Massachusetts was also the first state to give more than lip service to the principle of separation of powers. Everywhere else, excepting perhaps New York, unbalanced government and legislative supremacy prevailed. Massachusetts established the precedent for a strong, popularly elected executive with a veto power; elsewhere the governor tended to be a ceremonial head who depended for his existence on the legislature.

The first state constitutions and related legislation introduced significant reforms. Most states expanded VOTING RIGHTS by reducing property qualifications, and a few, including Vermont (an independent state from 1777 to 1791), experimented with universal manhood suffrage. Many state constitutions provided for fairer apportionment of REPRESENTATION in the legislature. Every southern state either abolished its ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION or took major steps to achieve separation of church and state. Northern states either abolished SLAVERY or provided for its gradual ending. Criminal codes were made more humane. The confiscation of Loyalist estates and of crown lands, and the opening of a national domain westward to the Mississippi, led to a democratization of landholding, as did the abolition of feudal relics such as the law of primogeniture and entail. The pace of democratic change varied from state to state, and in some states it was nearly imperceptible, but the Revolution without doubt occasioned constitutional and political developments that had long been dammed up under the colonial system.

The theory that a constitution is supreme law encouraged the development of judicial review. Written constitutions with bills of rights and the emerging principle of separation of powers contributed to the same end. Before the Revolution appellate judges tended to be dependents of the executive branch; the Revolution promoted judicial independence. Most state constitutions provided for judicial tenure during good behavior rather than for a fixed term or the pleasure of the appointing power. Inevitably when Americans believed that a legislature had exceeded its authority they argued that it had acted unconstitutionally, and they turned to courts to enforce the supreme law as law. The dominant view, however, was that a court holding a statute unconstitutional insulted the sovereignty of the legislature, as the reactions to HOLMES V. WALTON (1780) and TREVETT V. WEEDEN (1786) showed. COMMONWEALTH V. CATON (1782) was probably the first case in which a state judge declared that a court had power to hold a statute unconstitutional, though the court in that case sustained the act before it. In RUTGERS V. WADDINGTON (1784) Alexander Hamilton as counsel argued that a state act violating a treaty was unconstitutional, but the court declared that the judicial power advocated by counsel was "subversive of all government." Counsel in Trevett also contended that the court should void a state act. Arguments of counsel do not create precedents but can reveal the emergence of a new idea. Any American would have agreed that an act against a constitution was void; although few would have agreed that courts have the final power to decide matters of constitutionality, that idea was spreading. The TEN POUND ACT CASES (1786) were the first in which an American court held a state enactment void, and that New Hampshire precedent was succeeded by a similar decision in the North Carolina case of BAYARD V. SINGLETON (1787). The principle of MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) thus originated at a state level before the framing of the federal Constitution.

The Constitution originated in the drive for a strong national government that preceded the framing of the Articles of Confederation. The "critical period" of 1781–1787 intensified that drive, but it began well before the defects of the Articles expanded the ranks of the nationalists. The weaknesses of the United States in international affairs, its inability to enforce the peace treaty, its financial crisis, its helplessness during SHAYS' REBELLION, and its general incapacity to govern resulted in many proposals—in Congress, in the press, and even in some states—for national powers to negotiate commercial treaties, regulate the nation's commerce, and check state policies that adversely affected creditor interests and impeded economic growth. Five states met at the Annapolis Convention in 1786, ostensibly to discuss a "uniform system" of regulating commerce, but those who masterminded the meeting had a much larger agenda in mind—as Madison put it, a "plenipotentiary Convention for amending the Confederation."

Hamilton had called for a "convention of all the states" as early as 1780, before the Articles were ratified, to form a government worthy of the nation. Even men who defended state sovereignty conceded the necessity of a convention by 1787. William Grayson admitted that "the present Confederation is utterly inefficient and that if it remains much longer in its present State of imbecility we shall be one of the most contemptible Nations on the face of the earth. . . ." LUTHER MARTIN admitted that Congress was "weak, contemptibly weak," and Richard Henry Lee believed that no government "short of force, will answer." "Do you not think," he asked GEORGE MASON, "that it ought to be declared . . . that any State act of legislation that shall contravene, or oppose, the authorized acts of Congress, or interfere with the expressed rights of that body, shall be ipso facto void, and of no force whatsoever?" Many leaders, like THOMAS JEFFERSON, advocated executive and judicial branches for the national government with "an appeal from state judicatures to a federal court in all cases where the act of Confederation controlled the question. . . ."

RUFUS KING, who also promoted a "vigorous Executive," thought that the needed power of Congress to regulate all commerce "can never be well exercised without a Federal Judicial." A consensus was developing.

The Annapolis Convention exploited and nurtured that consensus when it recommended to all the states and to Congress that a constitutional convention to "meet at Philadelphia on the second Monday in May next (1787), to take into consideration the situation of the United States, to devise such further provisions as shall appear to them necessary to render the constitution of the federal government adequate to the exigencies of the Union. . . ." Several states, including powerful Virginia and Pennsylvania, chose delegates for the Philadelphia convention, forcing Congress to save face on February 21, 1787, by adopting a motion in accord with the Annapolis recommendation, although Congress declared that the "sole and express purpose" of the convention was "revising the articles of confederation."

The CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, which formally organized itself on May 25, lasted almost four months, yet reached its most crucial decision almost at the outset. The first order of business was the nationalistic VIRGINIA PLAN (May 29), and the first vote of the Convention, acting as a Committee of the Whole, was the adoption of a resolution "that a national Government ought to be established consisting of a supreme legislative, Executive and Judiciary" (May 30). Thus the Convention immediately agreed on abandoning, rather than amending, the Articles; on writing a new Constitution; on creating a national government that would be supreme; and on having it consist of three branches.

The radical character of this early decision may be best understood by comparing it with the Articles. The Articles failed mainly because there was no way to force the states to fulfill their obligations or to obey the exercise of such powers as Congress did possess. "The great and radical vice in the construction of the existing Confederation," said Alexander Hamilton, "is the principle of legislation for states or governments, in their corporate capacities, and as contradistinguished from the individuals of which they consist." The Convention remedied that vital defect in the Articles, as George Mason pointed out (May 30), by agreeing on a government that "could directly operate on individuals." Thus the framers solved the critical problem of sanctions by establishing a national government that was independent of the states.

On the next day, May 31, the Committee of the Whole made other crucial decisions with little or no debate. One, reflecting the nationalist bias of the Convention, was the decision to establish a bicameral system whose larger house was to be elected directly by the people rather than by the state legislatures. Mason, no less, explained, "Under the existing confederacy, Congress represent the States not the people of the States; their acts operate on the States, not on the individuals. The case will be changed in the new plan of Government. The people will be represented; they ought therefore to choose the Representatives." Another decision of May 31 was to vest in the Congress the sweeping and undefined power, recommended by the Virginia Plan, "to legislate in all cases to which the separate States are incompetent; or in which the harmony of the U.S. may be interrupted by the exercise of individual [state] legislation; to negative all laws passed by the several States contravening in the opinion of the National Legislature the articles of Union, or any treaties subsisting under the authority of the Union." Not a state voted "nay" to this exceptionally nationalistic proposition. Nor did any state oppose the decision of the next day to create a national executive with similarly broad, undefined powers.

After deliberating for two weeks, the Committee of the Whole presented the Convention with its recommendations, essentially the adoption of the Virginia Plan. Not surprisingly, several of the delegates had second thoughts about the hasty decisions that had been made. ELBRIDGE GERRY reiterated "that it was necessary to consider what the people would approve." Scrapping the Articles contrary to instructions and failing to provide for state equality in the system of representation provoked a reconsideration along lines described by WILLIAM PATERSON of New Jersey as "federal" in contradistinction to "national." Yet injured state pride was a greater cause of dissension than were the powers proposed for the national government. Some delegates were alarmed, not because of an excessive centralization of powers in the national government but because of the excessive advantages given to the largest states at the expense of the others. Three states—Virginia, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania—had forty-five percent of the white population in the country. Under the proposed scheme of proportionate representation, the small states feared that the large ones would dominate the others by controlling the national government.

On June 15, therefore, Paterson submitted for the Convention's consideration a substitute plan. It was a small states plan rather than a STATES' RIGHTS one, for it too had a strong nationalist orientation. Contemplating a revision, rather than a scrapping, of the Articles, it retained the unicameral Congress with its equality of state representation, thus appeasing the small states. But the plan vested in Congress one of the two critical powers previously lacking: "to pass Acts for the regulation of trade and commerce," foreign and interstate. The other, the power of taxation, appeared only in a stunted form; Congress was to be authorized to levy duties on imports and to pass stamp tax acts. Except for its failure to grant full tax powers, the PATERSON PLAN proposed the same powers for the national legislature as the finished Constitution. The Plan also contained the germ of the national SUPREMACY CLAUSE of the Constitution, Article Six, by providing that acts of Congress and United States treaties "shall be the supreme law of the respective States . . . and that the Judiciary of the several States shall be bound thereby in their decisions, any thing in the respective laws of the Individual States to the contrary notwithstanding." The clause also provided for a federal judiciary with extensive jurisdiction and for an executive who could muster the military of the states to compel state obedience to the supreme law. Compulsion of states was unrealistic and unnecessary. Paterson himself declared that the creation of a distinct executive and judiciary meant that the government of the Union could "be exerted on individuals."

Despite its nationalist features, the Paterson Plan retained a unicameral legislature, in which the states remained equal, and the requisition system of rising a revenue, which had failed. "You see the consequence of pushing things too far," said John Dickinson of Delaware to Madison. "Some of the members from the small States wish for two branches in the General Legislature and are friends to a good National Government; but we would sooner submit to a foreign power than submit to be deprived of an equality of suffrage in both branches of the Legislature, and thereby be thrown under the domination of the large states." Only a very few dissidents were irreconcilably opposed to "a good National Government." Most of the dissidents were men like Dickinson and Paterson, "friends to a good National Government" if it preserved a wider scope for small state authority and influence.

When Paterson submitted his plan on June 15, the Convention agreed that to give it "a fair deliberation" it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole and that "in order to place the two plans in due comparison, the other should be recommitted." After debating the two plans, the Committee of the Whole voted in favor of reaffirming the original recommendations based on the Virginia Plan "as preferable to those of Mr. Paterson." Only three weeks after their deliberations, had begun the Framers decisively agreed, for the second time, on a strong, independent national government that would operate directly on individuals without the involvement of states.

But the objections of the small states had not yet been satisfied. On the next day, Connecticut, which had voted against the Paterson Plan, proposed the famous GREAT COMPROMISE: proportionate representation in one house, "provided each State had an equal voice in the other." On that latter point the Convention nearly broke up, so intense was the conflict and deep the division. The irreconcilables in this instance were the leaders of the large-state nationalist faction, otherwise the most constructive and influential members of the Convention: Madison and James Wilson. After several weeks of debate and deadlock, the Convention on July 16 narrowly voted for the compromise. With ten states present, five supported the compromise, four opposed (including Virginia and Pennsylvania), and Massachusetts was divided. The compromise saved small-state prestige and saved the Convention from failure.

Thereafter consensus on fundamentals was restored, with Connecticut, New Jersey, and Delaware becoming fervent supporters of Madison and Wilson. A week later, for example, there was a motion that each state should be represented by two senators who would "vote per capita," that is, as individuals. Luther Martin of Maryland protested that per capita voting conflicted with the very idea of "the States being represented," yet the motion carried, with no further debate, 9–1.

On many matters of structure, mechanics, and detail there were angry disagreements, but agreement prevailed on the essentials. The office of the presidency is a good illustration. That there should be a powerful chief executive provoked no great debate, but the Convention almost broke up, for the second time, on the method of electing him. Some matters of detail occasioned practically no disagreement and revealed the nationalist consensus. Mason, of all people, made the motion that one qualification of congressmen should be "citizenship of the United States," and no one disagreed. Under the Articles of Confederation, there was only state citizenship; that there should be a concept of national citizenship seemed natural to men framing a constitution for a nation. Even more a revelation of the nationalist consensus was the fact that three of the most crucial provisions of the Constitution—the taxing power, the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE, and the supremacy clause—were casually and unanimously accepted without debate.

Until midway during its sessions, the Convention did not take the trouble to define with care the distribution of power between the national government and the states, although the very nature of the "federal" system depended on that distribution. Consensus on fundamentals once again provides the explanation. There would be no difficulty in making that distribution; and, the framers had taken out insurance, because at the very outset, they had endorsed the provision of the Virginia Plan vesting broad, undefined powers in a national legislature that would act on individuals. Some byplay of July 17 is illuminating. ROGER SHERMAN of Connecticut thought that the line drawn between the powers of Congress and those left to the states was so vague that national legislation might "interfere . . . in any matters of internal police which respect the Government of such States only, and wherein the general welfare of the United States is not concerned." His motion to protect the "internal police" of the states brought no debaters to his side and was summarily defeated; only Maryland supported Connecticut. Immediately after, another small-state delegate, GUNNING BEDFORD of Delaware, shocked even EDMUND RANDOLPH of Virginia, who had presented the Virginia Plan, by a motion to extend the powers of Congress by vesting authority "to legislate in all cases for the general interest of the Union." Randolph observed, "This is a formidable idea indeed. It involves the power of violating all the laws and constitution of the States, of intermeddling with their police." Yet the motion passed.

On July 26 the Convention adjourned until August 6 to allow a Committee on Detail to frame a "constitution conformable to the Resolutions passed by the Convention." Generously construing its charge, the committee acted as a miniature convention and introduced a number of significant changes. One was the explicit enumeration of the powers of Congress to replace the vague, omnibus provisions adopted previously by the Convention. Although enumerated, these powers were liberally expressed and formidable in their array. The committee made specific the spirit and intent of the Convention. Significantly the first enumerated power was that of taxation and the second that of regulating commerce among the states and with foreign nations: the two principal powers that had been withheld from Congress by the Articles. When the Convention voted on the provision that Congress "shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises," the states were unanimous and only one delegate, Elbridge Gerry, was opposed. When the Convention next turned to the commerce power, there was no discussion and even Gerry voted affirmatively.

Notwithstanding its enumeration of the legislative powers, all of which the Convention accepted, the Committee on Detail added an omnibus clause that has served as an ever expanding source of national authority: "And to make all laws that shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." The Convention agreed to that clause without a single dissenting vote by any state or delegate. The history of the great supremacy clause, Article Six, shows a similar consensus. Without debate the Convention adopted the supremacy clause, and not a single state or delegate voted nay. Finally, Article One, section 10, imposing restrictions on the economic powers of the states with respect to paper money, ex post facto laws, bills of credit, and contracts also reflected a consensus in the Convention. In sum, consensus, rather than compromise, was the most significant feature of the Convention, outweighing in importance the various compromises that occupied most of the time of the delegates.

But why was there such a consensus? The obvious answer (apart from the fact that opponents either stayed away or walked out) is the best: experience had proved that the nationalist constitutional position was right. If the United States was to survive and flourish, a strong national government had to be established. The Framers of the Constitution were accountable to public opinion; the Convention was a representative body. That its members were prosperous, well-educated political leaders made them no less representative than Congress. The state legislatures, which elected the members of the Convention, were the most unlikely instruments for thwarting the popular will. The Framers, far from being able to do as they pleased, were not free to promulgate the Constitution. Although they adroitly arranged for its ratification by nine state ratifying conventions rather than by all state legislatures, they could not present a plan that the people of the states would not tolerate. They could not control the membership of those state ratifying conventions. They could not even be sure that the existing Congress would submit the Constitution to the states for ratification, let alone for ratification by state conventions that had to be specially elected. If the Framers got too far astray from public opinion, their work would have been wasted. The consensus in the Convention coincided with an emerging consensus in the country that recaptured the nationalist spirit of '76. That the Union had to be strengthened was an almost universal American belief.

For its time the Constitution was a remarkably democratic document framed by democratic methods. Some historians have contended that the Convention's scrapping of the Articles and the ratification process were revolutionary acts which if performed by a Napoleon would be pronounced a coup d'état. But the procedure of the Articles for constitutional amendment was not democratic, because it allowed Rhode Island, with one-sixtieth of the nation's population, to exercise a veto power. The Convention sent its Constitution to the lawfully existing government, the Congress of the Confederation, for submission to the states, and Congress, which could have censured the Convention for exceeding its authority, freely complied—and thereby exceeded its own authority under the Articles! A coup d'état ordinarily lacks the deliberation and consent that marked the making of the Constitution and is characterized by a military element that was wholly lacking in 1787. A Convention elected by the state legislatures and consisting of many of the foremost leaders of their time deliberated for almost four months. Its members included many opponents of the finished scheme. The nation knew the Convention was considering changes in the government. The proposed Constitution was made public, and voters in every state were asked to choose delegates to vote for or against it after open debate. The use of state ratifying conventions fit the theory that a new fundamental law was being adopted and, therefore, conventions were proper for the task.

The Constitution guaranteed to each state a republican or representative form of government and fixed no property or religious qualifications on the right to vote or hold office, at a time when such qualifications were common in the states. By leaving voting qualifications to the states the Constitution implicitly accepted such qualifications but imposed none. The Convention, like the Albany Congress of 1754, the Stamp Act Congress, the Continental Congresses, and the Congresses of the Confederation, had been chosen by state (or colonial) legislatures, but the Constitution created a Congress whose lower house was popularly elected. When only three states directly elected their chief executive officer, the Constitution provided for the indirect election of the President by an ELECTORAL COLLEGE that originated in the people and is still operative. The Constitution's system of separation of powers and elaborate CHECKS AND BALANCES was not intended to refine out popular influence on government but to protect liberty; the Framers divided, distributed, and limited powers to prevent one branch, faction, interest, or section from becoming too powerful. Checks and balances were not undemocratic, and the Federalists were hard pressed not to apologize for checks and balances but to convince the Anti-Federalists, who wanted far more checks and balances, that the Constitution had enough. Although the Framers were not democrats in a modern sense, their opponents were even less democratic. Those opponents sought to capitalize on the lack of a BILL OF RIGHTS, and RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION became possible only because leading Federalists committed themselves to amendments as soon as the new government went into operation. At that time, however, Anti-Federalists opposed a Bill of Rights because it would allay popular fears of the new government, ending the chance for state sovereignty amendments.

Although the Framers self-consciously refrained from referring to slavery in the Constitution, it recognized slavery, the most undemocratic of all institutions. That recognition was a grudging but necessary price of Union. The THREE-FIFTHS CLAUSE of Article I provided for counting three-fifths of the total number of slaves as part of the population of a state in the apportionment of REPRESENTATION and DIRECT TAXATION. Article IV, section 2, provided for rendition of fugitive slaves to the slaveholder upon his claim. On the other hand, Article I, section 9, permitted Congress to abolish the slave trade in twenty years. Most delegates, including many from slaveholding states, would have preferred a Constitution untainted by slavery; but Southern votes for ratification required recognition of slavery. By choosing a Union with slavery, the Convention deferred the day of reckoning.

The Constitution is basically a political document. Modern scholarship has completely discredited the once popular view, associated with CHARLES BEARD, that the Constitution was undemocratically made to advance the economic interests of personalty groups, chiefly creditors. The largest public creditor at the Convention was Elbridge Gerry, who refused to sign the Constitution and opposed its ratification, and the largest private creditor was George Mason who did likewise. Indeed, seven men who either quit the Convention in disgust or refused to sign the Constitution held public securities that were worth over twice the holdings of the thirty-nine men who signed the Constitution. The most influential Framers, among them Madison, Wilson, Paterson, Dickinson, and Gouverneur Morris, owned no securities. Others, like Washington, who acted out of patriotism, not profit, held trifling amounts. Eighteen members of the Convention were either debtors or held property that depreciated after the new government became operative. On crucial issues at the Convention, as in the state ratifying conventions, the dividing line between groups for and against the Constitution was not economic, not between realty and personalty, or debtors and creditors, or town and frontier. The restrictions of Article I, section 10, on the economic powers of the states were calculated to protect creditor interests and promote business stability, but those restrictions were not undemocratic; if impairing the obligations of contracts or emitting bills of credit and paper money were democratic hallmarks, the Constitution left Congress free to be democratic. The interest groups for and against the Constitution were substantially similar. Economic interests did influence the voting on ratification, but no simple explanation that ignores differences between states and even within states will suffice, and many noneconomic influences were also at work. In the end the Constitution was framed and ratified because most voters came to share the vision held by Franklin in 1775 and Dickinson in 1776; those two, although antagonists in Pennsylvania politics, understood for quite different reasons that a strong central government was indispensable for nationhood.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAMS, WILLI PAUL 1980 The First American Constitutions. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

BEARD, CHARLES 1935 An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States. New York: Macmillan.

BROWN, REOBERT E. 1956 Charles Beard and the Constitution: A Critical Analysis of "An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution." Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

BURNETT, EDMUND C. 1941 The Continental Congress. New York: Macmillan.

CROSSKEY, WILLIAM W. and JEFFREY, WILLIAM, JR. 1980 Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States. Volume III: "The Political Background of the Federal Convention." Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

FERRAND, MAX, ed. 1937 (1966) The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787. New Haven: Yale University Press.

JENSEN, MERRILL 1940 The Articles of Confederation. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

KENYON, CECILIA, ed. 1966 The Antifederalists. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

MCDONALD, FORREST 1958 We the People: The Economic Origins of the Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MCLAUGHLIN, ANDREW C. 1905 The Confederation and the Constitution, 1783–1789. New York: Harper & Brothers.

MURPHY, WILLIAM P. 1967 The Triumph of Nationalism: State Sovereignty, the Founding Fathers, and the Triumph of the Constitution. Chicago: Quadrangle Books.

RACOVE, JACK N. 1979 The Beginnings of National Politics: An Interpretation of the Continental Congress. New York: Knopf.

WARREN, CHARLES 1928 The Making of the Constitution. Boston: Little, Brown.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1789–1801

GEORGE WASHINGTON was inaugurated the first President of the United States on April 30, 1789, in New York City. The First Congress, having been elected in February, was already at work. Most of the members were supporters of the Constitution. Fifty-four of them had sat either in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION or in one of the state ratifying conventions; only seven were Anti-Federalists. A new government had been established. But in 1789 it was only a blueprint. The first business of the President and Congress was to breathe life into the Constitution. For a document of some 5,000 words, the Constitution was remarkably explicit and complete. Yet it left a great deal to the discretion and decision of the men entrusted with its care. They, too, were "founding fathers," for they transformed words engrossed on parchment into living institutions and defined the terms of debate on the Constitution.

JAMES MADISON was the Federalist leader in the House of Representatives, where most of the formative legislation of the new government originated. Among the first statutes were those establishing the three executive departments: state, treasury, and war. Madison wrote into his bill for the department of state a provision authorizing the President to remove the department head, thereby precipitating the first congressional debate over interpretation of the Constitution. The document was clear on the President's power to appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate, but silent on his power to remove executive officers. Removal being the reverse of appointment, some congressmen argued that it should follow the same course. But Madison contended, successfully, that the President's responsibility to see that the laws were faithfully executed necessarily included the removal power. The action of the House set an enduring precedent. Thus it was that in the first year of the new government an UNWRITTEN CONSTITUTION, unknown to the Framers, grew up alongside the written constitution. (See APPOINTING AND REMOVAL POWER.)

Article II, it was sometimes said, had been framed with General Washington in mind; and so great was the confidence in him that Congress showed little jealousy of the chief executive. The act creating the treasury department, however, made its head responsible to Congress as well as to the President. This was recognition that "the power of the purse" was fundamentally a legislative power, and therefore the secretary of the treasury must answer to Congress in financial matters.

The JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, which gave life to Article III, originated in the Senate. The act provided for an elaborate system of federal courts, created the office of ATTORNEY GENERAL, and in Section 25 authorized the Supreme Court to review on APPEAL decisions of state courts concerning questions of federal law involving the United States Constitution and the laws and treaties made under it. None of this had been settled in the Constitution itself, though Federalists said that Article III together with the SUPREMACY CLAUSE of Article VI implicitly sanctioned Section 25.

The Federalists, with Madison in the lead, kept the promise made during the ratification campaign to add a BILL OF RIGHTS to the Constitution. Even before North Carolina and Rhode Island entered the new union, Congress approved twelve amendments and sent them to the states. Ten were ratified and on December 15, 1791, became part of the Constitution. In the founding of the nation the Bill of Rights was important less because it secured fundamental rights and liberties against the national government, which was without DELEGATED POWER in this sphere, than because it strengthened public confidence in the government without impairing its powers as many Anti-Federalists had wished.

The principal executive offices were filled by THOMAS JEFFERSON at state, ALEXANDER HAMILTON in the treasury, Henry Knox in the war department, and EDMUND RANDOLPH as the part-time attorney general. The unity of the executive was one of the claims made for it in THE FEDERALIST. Washington worked closely with his subordinates, and depended on them for initiative and advice, but there was never any doubt that the executive power belonged exclusively to him. The Constitution made no provision for a "cabinet," nor was one contemplated at first. The President seemed to think, on the basis of the ADVICE AND CONSENT clause, that the Senate was meant to function as an advisory council. In August he appeared personally in the Senate to ask its advice on a proposed treaty with an Indian tribe. But the process proved awkward and cumbersome. It was not repeated. The President, instead, conducted his business with the Senate in writing, and met his need for collective consultation and advice, particularly in FOREIGN AFFAIRS, through the development of the cabinet. By 1793 it was an established institution. There were suggestions in the First Congress of a movement toward a generalized ministerial responsibility on the model of the treasury act; but this did not materialize. On the whole, the first presidency decisively enforced the theory of SEPARATION OF POWERS, associated with congressional government, rather than the ministerial responsibility characteristic of parliamentary government. In 1791 the President exercised the VETO POWER for the first time. The veto was potentially a means for controlling legislation, but Washington did not use it in that fashion (he vetoed only one other measure in eight years), and in the first forty years of the government Presidents used the veto sparingly.

The most important political and constitutional issues of Washington's first administration arose out of Hamilton's financial program. Exploiting his special relationship with Congress—conceiving of himself, indeed, as a kind of prime minister—Hamilton submitted a series of reports to Congress recommending measures to put the country's fiscal house in order, strengthen the government by appealing to the cupidity of the moneyed class, and stimulate the commercial and manufacturing sectors of the economy. His plan to fund the national debt at face value raised questions of equity between debtor and creditor interests but did not present a constitutional issue. The expectation of funding on the part of creditor groups had, of course, been a vital source of Federalist support for the Constitution. But Hamilton's plan also called for the assumption of the state debts. This proposal surprised many and aroused intense opposition in Congress, especially among Southerners sensitive to Anti-Federalist fears of undue concentration of power in the national government. Madison opposed Hamilton's plan, though on other grounds, and in doing so disclosed a division in the Federalist ranks on the direction of the new government. He was joined by his Virginia friend, Jefferson, who had just taken up his duties as secretary of state in the spring of 1790. Both were disposed to be conciliatory on this issue, however, and entered into a sectional bargain with Hamilton that would fix the permanent seat of government on the Potomac in exchange for the necessary southern votes to secure passage of the assumption bill. Still, the compromise failed to quiet Anti-Federalist fears. In December the Virginia legislature adopted a series of resolutions condemning the assumption of state debts as inimical to federal and republican institutions and pointedly questioning the constitutionality of the measure. Hamilton responded angrily. "This," he said, "is the first symptom of a spirit which must either be killed, or will kill the Constitution."

The constitutional question was brought to the fore a few months later on the bill to charter the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. A national bank, as conceived and proposed by Hamilton, would function as the financial arm of the government and multiply the active capital of the country by mounting a large paper circulation. Because three-fourths of the initial bank capital would come in the form of public securities—securities issued to fund the debt—the institution was obviously an integral part of the funding system and would directly benefit the same creditor class. Madison vigorously opposed the bill in the House, less on grounds of policy than on grounds of unconstitutionality. The power to incorporate a bank was not among the powers delegated to Congress, nor could it be considered NECESSARY AND PROPER to execute those powers. But Congress adopted the bill and sent it to the President. Uncertain whether to sign or return it, Washington first sought the attorney general's opinion, which was adverse, and then requested Jefferson's. The secretary of state agreed with Madison and offered an even more emphatically STRICT CONSTRUCTION of the Constitution. The government was one of strictly delegated powers, as declared in the TENTH AMENDMENT still in the course of ratification. "To take a single step beyond the boundaries thus specifically drawn around the powers of Congress," Jefferson warned, "is to take possession of a boundless field of power, no longer susceptible to definition." To these objections Hamilton replied in a powerful opinion founded on the doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS, "Every power vested in a government is in its nature sovereign, and included, by force of the term, a right to employ all means requisite and fairly applicable to the attainment of the ends of such power, and which are not precluded by restrictions and exceptions specified in the Constitution ..." (italics in original). The utility of a national bank in the execution of powers to tax, borrow money, and regulate commerce could not be denied. It was decisive in Hamilton's judgment. Washington concurred, and signed the Bank Bill into law.

In his Report on Manufactures, presented to the Second Congress, Hamilton extended his nationalist program by way of the GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE. Believing that extensive domestic manufactures were necessary to the wealth and welfare of the nation, Hamilton proposed a comprehensive system of aid and encouragement—tariffs, bounties, inspections, export controls, drawbacks—which he justified under the power to provide for the general welfare. No legislation resulted from the report, but it produced consternation in opposition ranks. "If not only the means, but the objects [of the government] are unlimited," Madison wrote, "The parchment had better be thrown into the fire at once" (italics in original). Virginia's two senators introduced constitutional amendments to limit the application of the clause to the ENUMERATED POWERS and deny the power of Congress to charter corporations.

Although the widening debate took its shape from the constitutional question, it involved much more. It involved the conflict of economic interests: debtors and creditors, landed property and fluid capital, the mass of people engaged in agriculture, and the enterprising class of merchants, bankers, and manufacturers. The fact that the former tended to be concentrated in the South, the latter in the Northeast, particularly in the coastal cities, gave the conflict a sectional character as well. The debate also involved competing strategies of economic development in the new nation, as well as contrasting ideas of the nature of freedom, the Union, and republican government. To an extent, certainly, the conflict was epitomized in the clash between the leading cabinet secretaries, Jefferson and Hamilton, who increasingly appeared as the protagonists of opposing doctrines and parties in the public eye. One despised, the other idolized governance. One located the strength of the republic in the diffuse energies of a free society, the other in the consolidation of the government's power. One believed that private interest corrupted public good, the other conscripted private interest for public benefit. One viewed the Constitution as a superintending rule of political action, the other, as a point of departure for heroic statesmanship. In the balance between authority and liberty, Hamilton was an apologist for the former, Jefferson for the latter. Hamilton feared most of the ignorance and turbulence of the people, while Jefferson preached "trust the people" and feared rulers independent of them.

The division on foreign policy deepened the division on domestic policy. Jefferson, Madison, and those who began to call themselves Republicans opposed British power and influence and openly championed the French Revolution. Hamilton and the Federalists, on the other hand, relied upon British trade, credit, and power to nurture American development; they feared the contagion of French ideas. The controversy over foreign policy assumed a constitutional dimension after Britain and France went to war in 1793. President Washington issued a proclamation pledging "a conduct friendly and impartial" toward the belligerents and warning citizens against hostile acts. Jefferson opposed this PROCLAMATION OF NEUTRALITY, as it came to be known, principally because it tended to defeat his foreign policy objectives to oppose Britain and support France. As an ally, France had a right to expect friendship from the United States; Britain, on the other hand, might have been made to pay a price for American neutrality, as in recognition of "free ships make free goods" and related guarantees of neutral rights. Viewing a declaration of neutrality as the negative side of a DECLARATION OF WAR, Jefferson also held that the proclamation invaded the authority of Congress. The popular reception of the new French minister to the United States, Edmond Genêt, fueled criticism of the proclamation. Genêt himself took advantage of this sentiment by arming privateers in American ports and issuing military commissions to American citizens. Hamilton, under the pseudonym "Pacificus," wrote a series of newspaper articles in defense of the presidential proclamation. Broadly construing Article II, Hamilton maintained that all executive power is vested in the President unless specifically qualified or withheld. The power to declare war belonged to Congress, of course, but did not preclude unilateral actions by the President bearing on the exercise of that power. To Republicans such a power looked suspiciously like the British royal prerogative in foreign affairs. Taking up his pen in reply, Madison, as "Helvidius," argued that all matters touching on the WAR POWER are necessarily legislative; the executive, therefore, cannot initiate a course of action that, in effect, confronts Congress with a fait accompli. Whatever the abstract merits of Madison's argument, it gave too little weight to realities in the conduct of foreign affairs, which inevitably favored the executive.

In the absence of statute, executive officers decided difficult questions of neutrality as they arose. Thus it was that the cabinet became a permanent institution. Jefferson and Hamilton were usually at odds, causing many split decisions. On July 18, 1793, the officers submitted to the Supreme Court a list of twenty-nine questions about international law. The Justices declined to rule, however, thereby setting a precedent against ADVISORY OPINIONS. The cabinet hammered out its own ADMINISTRATIVE LAW of neutrality, which prevailed until Congress convened and enacted the Neutrality Act of 1794.

Long before that the firebrand French minister had been recalled and Jefferson had retired from the government, ensuring Hamilton the same ascendancy in foreign affairs he had earlier enjoyed in domestic affairs. The upshot was JAY'S TREATY, negotiated in London in November 1794 and ratified by the Senate six months later. The treaty preserved peace with Britain but, in Republican opinion, at the cost of submission to British maritime power and risk of war with France. Like every great issue of Washington's presidency, the treaty caused significant constitutional debate. Because some provisions required appropriations to carry them into effect, the treaty came under the scrutiny of the House of Representatives. In this connection a Republican majority demanded that the President lay before the House a copy of the instructions given to JOHN JAY and other pertinent documents. The President emphatically rejected the call, holding that the House had no constitutional power with respect to treaties. The House, after reiterating its position and carefully differentiating the appropriation power from the TREATY POWER, which it disclaimed, proceeded to vote the money requested by the President.

The protracted battle over Jay's Treaty set the stage for the presidential election of 1796. Washington's decision to retire after two terms lifted the last restraint on partisanship, and two infant POLITICAL PARTIES, each with its own standard bearer, JOHN ADAMS for the Federalists, Jefferson for the Republicans, contested the election. The Constitution had been intended to work without parties. Parties, the Framers reasoned, fed the natural turbulence of the populace and served the ambitions of demagogues; they caused implacable rivalries in legislative councils, usurping the place of reason and moderation; they introduced whole networks of partisan allegiance at cross-purposes with the national welfare. Washington had attempted to govern independently of parties, but in an increasingly polarized political environment even he became a partisan. When the Republicans sought to channel popular enthusiasm for the French cause into "democratic societies," Washington publicly condemned the societies as illicit political engines, thereby betraying intolerance of political opposition from outside the constitutional channels of authority. WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS pointedly warned the people against the "baneful" effects of parties. The Republicans, however, were rapidly discovering in party organization outside the government the appropriate means for wresting power from the Federalists who, in their eyes, were the real bane of the country.

Adams was elected President by a slender ELECTORAL COLLEGE majority. Crisis with France, mounting since the British treaty, set the course of the administration. Angrily denouncing French decrees against American commerce, Adams sent a special commission to negotiate in Paris under threat of war. Intriguing agents of the French foreign ministry demanded money as the price of negotiations. The Americans indignantly refused. This affair—the XYZ Affair—then exploded in the United States, and the Federalists converted foreign crisis into domestic crisis. Under cover of whipped-up war hysteria, they assailed the patriotism of the Republicans, portraying them as Jacobin disorganizers in the country's bowels whose ultimate treachery only awaited the signal of an invading French army. Although the President refrained from asking for a declaration of war, he inflamed the war spirit. Congress abrogated the French treaties, expanded the army, established the Navy Department, and authorized an undeclared naval war against France. The Republicans fought this policy to no avail. Two years later the Supreme Court, in a prize case, Bas v. Tingey (1800), upheld the power of the government to make war without declaring it.

The war hysteria found domestic expression in the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS. The Republicans attacked the laws restrictive of ALIENS on grounds of policy and the Alien Act, in particular, for violating the Constitution by authorizing the President summarily to deport aliens deemed dangerous to the nation. The Sedition Act, the Republicans argued, was without congressional authority and directly violated the FIRST AMENDMENT. Despite the smokescreen of war, TREASON, and subversion, Republicans believed that the law aimed at suppressing their presses and crippling their party. Political freedom, as well as FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, was at stake. When the federal courts, manned by partisan Federalist judges, cooperated in enforcing the Sedition Act, closing off the judicial channel of redress, Jefferson and Madison turned to two Republican state legislatures to arouse opposition. The VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS interposed the authority of these states to declare the Alien and Sedition Acts unconstitutional and urged other states to join in forcing their repeal. The resolutions were especially significant as landmark statements of the THEORY OF THE UNION as a compact of sovereign states and of the right of a state, whether by INTERPOSITION or NULLIFICATION, to judge the constitutionality of acts of Congress. Northern state legislatures, in response, rejected the theory together with the appeal. Although the resolutions contributed to rising popular opposition against the administration, they did not force repeal of the hated laws. Whatever their later significance for the issue of STATES' RIGHTS and Union—the constitutional issue over which the Civil War would be fought—the resolutions originated in a struggle for political survival and addressed the fundamental issue of freedom and self-government descending from the American Revolution.

The foreign crisis passed in 1800. Adams seized the olive branch extended by France, broke with the Hamiltonian faction in his administration, and dispatched another commission to negotiate peace. The result was the Convention of 1800, which restored normal relations and formally terminated the Franco American alliance of 1778. From the standpoint of the "war system," Adams's decision to make peace drove a sword into the Federalist party. In the ensuing presidential election, Hamilton and his friends conspired to defeat Adams.

The election of 1800 was bitterly contested by two organized political parties. The Republicans achieved unprecedented unity behind their ticket of Jefferson and AARON BURR. By party organization and electioneering tactics they turned the election of the President into a test of public opinion. This, of course, made a mockery of the Constitution, under which a body of electors separated from the people was to choose the President and vice-president. Electoral tickets became party tickets, and every presidential elector became an agent of the popular majority that elected him.

Jefferson won a decisive victory over Adams. Although the Federalists swept New England, took two of the small middle states (New Jersey and Delaware), and picked up scattered votes in three others, the Republicans won everything else, south, west, and north. The electoral vote, 73–65, failed to reflect the wide Republican margin at the polls. But the victory was jeopardized by political developments that played havoc with the electoral system. Under the Constitution each elector cast two votes for different candidates; the one with the most votes became President, while the runner-up became vice-president. The rise of political parties made the system an anachronism, for electors chosen on a party ticket would cast both votes for the party candidates, thereby producing a tie between them. So it happened in 1800: Jefferson and Burr received an equal number of electoral votes. The choice was thus thrown into the House of Representatives. There the lame-duck Federalist majority plotted to annul the popular verdict either by creating an interregnum or by dealing Burr into the presidency. Finally, on the thirty-sixth ballot, the stalemate was broken and Jefferson was elected.

The new Republican majority moved rapidly to amend the Constitution to prevent a similar occurrence in the future. The TWELFTH AMENDMENT (1804) provided for separate ballots for President and vice-president. The elaborate machinery devised by the Framers for the election of the President was thus radically revised in response to changing political realities. Not only was this an effective use of the AMENDING PROCESS, but it seemed to suggest frequent change by amendment in the future. However, the next amendment of the Constitution came only after the passage of sixty-one years and the convulsions of civil war.

MERRILL D. PETERSON
(1986)

Bibliography

BUEL, RICHARD, JR. 1972 Securing the Revolution: Ideology and American Politics, 1789–1815. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

MALONE, DUMAS 1962 Jefferson and the Ordeal of Liberty. Boston: Little, Brown.

MILLER, JOHN C. 1960 The Federalist Era: 1789–1801. New York: Harper & Row.

STOURZH, GERALD 1970 Alexander Hamilton and the Idea of Republican Government. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press.

WHITE, LEONARD D. 1948 The Federalist: A Study in Administrative History, 1789–1801. New York: Free Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1801–1829

THOMAS JEFFERSON entered the presidency in 1801 with a rhetoric of return to constitutional first principles. Inaugurated in the new permanent capital on the Potomac, he offered a brilliant summation of these principles together with a lofty appeal for restoration of harmony and affection. "We are all republicans: we are all federalists," he declared. He hoped to achieve "a perfect consolidation" of political sentiments by emphasizing principles that ran deeper than party names or doctrines. He spoke of preserving "the whole constitutional vigor" of the general government yet called for "a wise and frugal government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, which shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned." Jefferson never doubted that "constitutional vigor" and individual liberty were perfectly compatible, indeed that the strength of republican government rested upon the freedom of the society. He named "absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority the vital principle of republics, from which there is no appeal but to force." This principle demanded freedom of opinion and debate, including the right of a minority to turn itself into a new majority, as the Republican party had done. "If there be any among us," Jefferson said, alluding to the delusions of 1798, "who would wish to dissolve this Union or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." He thus announced a commitment to ongoing change through the democratic process. Because of that commitment the Constitution became an instrument of democracy, change became possible without violence or destruction, and government went forward on the continuing consent of the governed.

The "revolution of 1800," as Jefferson later called it, introduced no fundamental changes in the structure or machinery of the general government but made that government a more effective instrument of popular leadership. Jefferson himself possessed great popular authority. Combining this with the constitutional authority of the office, he overcame Whiggish monarchical fears and gave the presidency a secure place in the republican system. Jefferson dominated his administration more surely and completely than even GEORGE WASHINGTON had done. The cabinet, which was composed of moderate Republicans, enjoyed unprecedented harmony, stability, and unity. It was the main agency of policy and decision making.

Jefferson also dominated Congress. For the first time, in 1801, the Republicans controlled both houses of Congress. The Federalists were a shrinking minority, though by no means powerless. In republican theory Congress should control the executive. Jefferson honored the theory in official discourse. Thus he declined to appear before Congress in person and sent his annual "State of the Union" message to be read by a clerk, setting a precedent that remained unbroken for 112 years. Practically, however, Jefferson recognized that the government demanded executive leadership if any majority, Federalist or Republican, was to carry out its program. How could he overcome the constraints of republican theory and the constitutional SEPARATION OF POWERS? The solution was found partly through the personal influence Jefferson commanded and partly through a network of party leadership outside constitutional channels. As the unchallenged head of the Republican party, Jefferson acted with an authority he did not possess, indeed utterly disclaimed, in his official capacity. Leaders of both houses of Congress were the President's political lieutenants. Despite the weak structural organization of the Republican party in Congress—the only formal machinery was the presidential nominating caucus which came into being every four years—the party was a pervasive functional reality. The President was chief legislator as well as chief magistrate. Nearly all the congressional legislation during eight years originated with the President and his cabinet. Lacking staff support, Congress depended on executive initiatives and usually followed them. Federalists complained of the "backstairs" influence of the President; eventually some Republicans, led by JOHN RANDOLPH, rebelled. But the system of presidential leadership worked with unerring precision during Jefferson's first term. It faltered during his second term when the Republicans, with virtually no opposition to contend with, began to quarrel among themselves; and it would not work at all under Jefferson's successor, JAMES MADISON, who lacked Jefferson's popular prestige and personal magnetism.

In matters of public policy, the Jefferson administration sought reform within the limits of moderation and conciliation. More doctrinaire Republicans, still infected with Anti-Federalism, were not satisfied with a mere change of leadership and demanded restrictive constitutional amendments to place the true principles of government beyond reversal or contradiction. While rejecting this course, Jefferson was never entirely happy with the consequences of his temporizing policies. Republican reform was bottomed on fiscal policy. The Hamiltonian system of public debt, internal taxes, and a national bank was considered an evil of the first magnitude. Secretary of the Treasury ALBERT GALLATIN developed a plan to extinguish the debt, which had increased under the Federalists, by large annual appropriations, yet, amazingly, reduce taxes at the same time. All internal taxes would be repealed and government would depend solely on revenue from the customs houses. The plan required deep retrenchment, especially in the army and navy departments. Of course, it was premised on peace. Congress embarked on it; and although the debt was dramatically reduced during the next seven years, the plan was initially upset by the exigencies of the Tripolitan War, then derailed by the Anglo-American crisis that led to the War of 1812. Jefferson agonized over ALEXANDER HAMILTON's fiscal system. "When the government was first established," he wrote in 1802, "it was possible to have kept it going on true principles, but the contracted, English, half-lettered ideas of Hamilton destroyed that hope in a bud. We can pay off his debt in 15 years, but we can never get rid of his financial system. It mortifies me to be strengthening principles which I deem radically vicious, but the vice is entailed on us by the first error. . . . What is practicable must often control pure theory." A case in point was the Bank of the United States. Jefferson thought it an institution of "the most deadly hostility" to the Constitution and republican government. Yet he tolerated the Bank, in part because its charter ran to 1811 (when Republicans would refuse to renew it) and also because Gallatin found the bank highly useful to the government's operations.

Jefferson's "war on the judiciary" featured three main battles and several skirmishes, ending in no very clear outcome. The first battle was fought over the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801. Republicans were enraged by this blatantly partisan measure passed in the waning hours of JOHN ADAMS's administration. It created a new tier of courts and judgeships, extended the power of the federal judiciary at the expense of state courts, and reduced the number of Supreme Court Justices beginning with the next vacancy, thereby denying the Republicans an early opportunity to reshape the Court. Jefferson promptly targeted the act for repeal. The Federalists had retreated to the judiciary as a stronghold, he said, from which "all the works of Republicanism are to be beaten down and erased." The Sedition Act had demonstrated the prostration of the judiciary to partisan purposes. After taking office Jefferson acted to pardon victims of the act, which he considered null and void, and to drop pending prosecutions. He often spoke of making judges more responsible to the people, perhaps by periodic review of their tenure; and although he recognized the power of JUDICIAL REVIEW, he did not think it binding on the executive or the legislature. According to his theory of "tripartite balance" each of the coordinate branches of government is supreme in its sphere and may decide questions of constitutionality for itself. The same theory was advanced by Republicans in Congress, as against the Federalist claim of exclusive power of the Supreme Court to declare legislation unconstitutional. Congress did not settle this issue; but after heated debate it repealed the offensive act and, with minor exceptions, returned the judiciary to its previous footing.

The second battle involved the case of MARBURY V. MADISON (1803). Although the Supreme Court's decision would later be seen as the cornerstone of judicial review, the case was understood at the time primarily as a political duel between the President and the Court, one in which Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL took a gratuitous stab at the executive but then deliberately backed away from a confrontation he knew the Court could not win.

The third battle featured the IMPEACHMENT of federal judges. In 1803 Congress impeached, tried, and convicted Judge JOHN PICKERING of the district court in New Hampshire. The case was a hard one because Pickering's bizarre conduct on the bench stemmed from intoxication and possible insanity; but in the absence of any constitutional authorization for the removal of an incompetent judge, the Republicans took the course of impeachment and convicted him of "high crimes and misdemeanors." The subsequent impeachment of Supreme Court Justice SAMUEL J. CHASE was clearly a political act. A high-toned Federalist, Chase had earned Republican enmity as the convicting judge in several SEDITION trials and by harangues to grand juries assailing democracy and all its works. Nevertheless, his trial in the Senate ended in a verdict of acquittal in 1805. Jefferson and the Republican leaders turned away from impeachment in disgust. Although it may have produced salutary restraint in the federal judiciary, and enhanced the President's role as a popular leader, neither impeachment nor any other Jeffersonian action disturbed the foundations of judicial power.

During his second term, Jefferson used the TREASON trial of AARON BURR to renew the attack on the judiciary but without success. The former vice-president was charged with treason for leading a military expedition to separate the western states from the Union. Determined to convict him, Jefferson again faced an old enemy, John Marshall, who presided in the trial at Richmond. At Burr's request, Marshall subpoenaed Jefferson to appear in court with papers bearing on the case. Jefferson refused, citing his responsibility as chief executive. "The Constitution enjoins his constant agency in the concerns of six millions of people. Is the law paramount to this, which calls on him on behalf of a single one?" he asked. The court backed off. Nothing required Jefferson's presence. He offered to testify by deposition, but this was not requested. When the trial ended in Burr's acquittal, Jefferson denounced its whole conduct as political. He laid the proceedings before Congress and urged that body to furnish some remedy for judicial arrogance and error. Several Republican state legislatures instructed their delegations to seek amendment making judges removable on the address of both houses of Congress. Both President and Congress were preoccupied with FOREIGN AFFAIRS in the fall of 1807, however, and nothing came of this effort.

The first foreign crisis of the Jefferson administration culminated in the LOUISIANA PURCHASE. It was an ironic triumph for a President, an administration, and a party that made a boast of constitutional purity. For the Constitution made no provision either to acquire foreign territory or, as the purchase treaty mandated, to incorporate that territory and its inhabitants into the Union. Jefferson, therefore, proposed to sanction the acquisition retroactively by amendment of the Constitution. Actually, such an authorization was the lesser part of the amendment he drafted; the larger part undertook to control the future of the Trans-Mississippi West by prohibiting settlement above the thirty-third parallel. But neither part interested congressional Republicans, and Jefferson, though he said failure of the amendment made the Constitution "a blank paper by construction," acquiesced. A revolution in the Union perforce became a revolution in the Constitution as well. The expansion of the treaty-making power was only the beginning of the revolution. A series of acts for the government of the new territory vested extraordinary power in the President; and the President proposed, with the sanction of a constitutional amendment, a national system of INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS to unite this far-flung "empire of liberty."

The foreign crisis of Jefferson's second administration continued under Madison and finally terminated in the War of 1812. With the formation of the Third Coalition against Napoleonic France in 1805, all Europe was engulfed in war. The United States became the last neutral nation of consequence—to the profit of its carrying trade. Unfortunately, each side, the British and the French, demanded the trade on its own terms, and submission to one side's demands entailed conflict with the other. Britain, the dominant sea power, was the greater problem. British ships attacked American carriers under interpretations of rules of blockade, contraband, and neutral commerce that were rejected by the United States. Britain claimed the right of impressment of seamen aboard American ships on the ground that they were actually British subjects who had deserted from His Majesty's Navy and shipped aboard American vessels with government connivance. There was some truth in this claim, but thousands of American citizens were, in fact, impressed by Britain. And every seizure was a stinging reminder of past colonial servitude. Diplomatic efforts to settle these issues proved abortive. Relations rapidly deteriorated after the Chesapeake-Leopard Affair in June 1807. The attack of HMS Leopard on an American naval vessel after its captain refused to permit boarding and search for deserters inflamed the entire country against Britain. Jefferson might have taken the country to war. Instead, in December, he proposed, and Congress swiftly passed, the EMBARGO ACT. Essentially a self-blockade of American commerce, the act was in some part a preparation for war and in some part an experiment to test the theory of "peaceable coercion." The idea that the United States might enforce reason and justice on European belligerents by withholding its commerce was a first principle of Jeffersonian statecraft. Under the trial now begun, that idea failed. While the policy had comparatively little effect abroad, it produced serious economic, political, and perhaps even constitutional damage at home.

The embargo raised a host of constitutional issues, all hotly debated by Federalists and Republicans, though the parties seemed to have changed places. First, and broadest, was the issue of the commerce power. Republicans said the power to regulate commerce included the power to prohibit it. Federalists, who were closely allied with eastern merchants and shipmasters, limited regulation to encouragement and protection. Yet it was a Federalist, John Davis, the United States District Judge for Massachusetts, who upheld the constitutionality of the embargo on a broad view of the commerce power backed up by the "inherent SOVEREIGNTY" of the United States. Second, wholesale violation of the embargo in the Lake Champlain region led the President to proclaim an insurrection and authorize military force to suppress it under the same law George Washington had earlier used to put down the WHISKEY REBELLION over Republican opposition. Third, enforcement of the embargo required ever tighter measures of control. The fourth in the series of five embargo acts empowered customs collectors to search without a SEARCH WARRANT and to detain vessels merely on suspicion of intent to violate the law. The FOURTH AMENDMENT, a part of the Bill of Rights, was thus jeopardized. Fourth, before Congress adjourned in April 1808 it authorized the President to suspend the embargo against either or both belligerents—an unprecedented DELEGATION OF POWER. Federalists, of course, denounced the embargo in terms that recalled the VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS.

A storm of protest in New England led Congress, at the end of Jefferson's presidency, to repeal the embargo. The Non-Intercourse Act, which replaced it, reopened trade with all the world except Britain and France. That course, too, failed; and for the next three years under the new president, Madison, the country drifted toward war. In the end, war was declared because both diplomacy and "peaceable coercion" had failed to resolve the conflict over neutral rights. But that conflict was a symbol of much more: the honor and independence of the nation, the freedom of its commerce, the integrity of American nationality, the survival of republican government. The war was thus morally justified as the second war for American independence. The nation was ill-prepared for war, however, and its conduct produced one disaster after another. One section of the Union, New England, vigorously opposed the war from the start.

This opposition gave rise to the principal constitutional controversy of the time. The governors of the New England states challenged congressional power to provide for organizing and calling forth the militia. The chief justice of Massachusetts's highest court advised the governor that the right to decide when the militia should be called belonged to him, not to Congress or the President; and later, in 1814, when the militia was activated it was in the state rather than the national service. Years later, in Luther v. Mott (1827), the Supreme Court fully sustained national authority over the militia. Interference with the prosecution of the war was accompanied by a steady stream of denunciation. Madison called this a "seditious opposition," but unlike his Federalist predecessors he made no move to restrain or suppress it. Ultra-Federalists had been hinting at disunion since the Louisiana Purchase threatened New England's power in the Union; some of them had plotted to establish a Northern Confederacy in 1804. Now, a decade later, Federalist delegates from all the New England states met secretly in the HARTFORD CONVENTION, not to plot disunion, for moderate forces were in control, but to organize resistance against "Mr. Madison's War." Resolutions adopted by the convention recommended a series of constitutional admendments, including elimination of the THREE-FIFTHS CLAUSE for the apportionment of representation and direct taxes, limitation of presidential tenure to one term, a two-thirds vote in Congress to admit new states and to declare war, and the disqualification of naturalized citizens from federal office.

The commissioners of the Hartford Convention arrived in Washington with their resolutions in the midst of jubilation over the Battle of New Orleans. They were ridiculed, of course; and from this nadir the Federalist party never recovered. News of the Peace of Ghent quickly followed. While it resolved none of the issues over which the war had begun, the treaty placed American independence on impregnable foundations and confirmed the strength of republican government. The American people erased the shame from a war so meager in victories, so marked by defeat, division, and disgrace, and put upon it the face of glory. In December 1815 Madison laid before Congress a nationalistic program that featured measures, such as a national bank, formerly associated with the defeated party. Yet the program was not a case of "out-Federalizing Federalism." The Republican nationalism that matured with the Peace of Ghent had nothing to do with Federalist nationalism, with its vitiating Anglophobia, its narrow class and sectional views, and its distrust of popular government. The American political experiment had vindicated itself, exorcising earlier fears for its survival and making possible the incorporation of principles of national improvement and consolidation into the Republican party.

A new era dawned in American politics in 1815. For a quarter-century the nation had directed its industry and commerce toward a Europe ravaged by war and revolution; now that era had ended, and with it the opportunity of rearing American prosperity on the misfortunes of the Old World. For almost as long, government had been carried on by party spirit; now one of the two parties, the Federalist, around which the rivalry of men, issues, and principles had turned, ceased to be a factor in national affairs, and it was by no means clear what political force would replace the force of party. A country that had hugged the Atlantic seaboard and sought its prosperity in foreign trade was about to explode in the Trans-Appalachian West. During the next six years five new western states would enter the Union. A wider Union and the rise of the West as a self-conscious section raised difficult problems of economic development, constitutional principle, and political power. Since its Revolutionary birth the nation had enjoyed astonishing continuity of leadership. Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, was a gray eminence at Monticello; James Madison, Father of the Constitution, was the President who had finally, irrevocably, secured that independence in a second war against Great Britain. But a new generation of political leaders had burst on the scene during the war, and the fate of the nation now lay in their hands.

Nearly all Republicans united on the program of national improvement and consolidation that Madison laid before the Fourteenth Congress in December. This "Madisonian Platform" proceeded from an enlarged view of the general government's responsibility for the nation's welfare. A national bank had previously been recommended to Congress as an agency for financing the war. Now, facing the chaos of runaway state banking, Madison recommended it as a permanent institution to secure the constitutional object of a stable and uniform national currency. Madison, of course, had opposed the original Bank of the United States as unconstitutional, and Republicans in Congress had defeated its recharter in 1811. But conditions and needs had changed, and Madison, with most of these same Republicans, considered that experience had settled the question of constitutionality in favor of a national bank. The Madisonian platform called for continuing in peacetime high tariff duties on imports in order to protect the infant industries that had grown up behind the sheltering wall of war and embargo. The President called for a comprehensive system of internal improvements—roads and canals to bind the nation together, secure its defenses, and facilitate internal commerce. Any deficiency of constitutional power should be overcome by amendment. In a final appeal to the liberality of American patriotism, Madison proposed the establishment of a national university, in Washington, which would be "a central resort of youth and genius from every part of their country, diffusing on their return examples of those national feelings, those liberal sentiments, and those congenial manners which contribute cement to our union and strength to [its] great political fabric."

Congress responded with legislation to charter a national bank, establish a system of tariff protection, and create a permanent fund for financing a vast network of roads, canals, and other improvements. The last measure, dubbed the Bonus Bill because the fund was founded on the bonus to be paid for the bank charter, was vetoed by Madison on constitutional grounds in the last act of his presidency. In this surprising retreat to the doctrine of strict construction, Madison delivered the first shock to the postwar nationalism he had himself championed. His successor, JAMES MONROE, took the same position on internal improvements, holding that a constitutional amendment was necessary to authorize them. Republican leaders in Congress disagreed. They found sufficient constitutional warrant to build as well as to fund internal improvements in the commerce, post road, and general welfare clauses, and they declined to seek an amendment lest by the failure to obtain it the Constitution be weakened. In the end, however, Monroe conceded the unlimited power of Congress to appropriate money for internal improvements, while continuing to deny the power to construct and operate them. This concession provided a constitutional justification for the General Survey Act of 1824. Although the same argument supported important projects in the ensuing administration, no national system of internal improvements was ever realized. In the absence of constructive national action, the several states embarked upon ambitious projects of their own (New York's Erie Canal, for instance, begun in 1817); and soon the government even relinquished its one great enterprise, the National Road, to the states.

The period of Monroe's presidency was signalized as "The Era of Good Feelings." This reflected the dissolution of old party ties and feelings. The Republican party had become the grand party of the nation. In 1820 Monroe ran unopposed for reelection and only one erratic electoral vote was cast against him. But his success had little to do with party or popularity, nor did it translate into effective power and leadership. Power and leadership had shifted to Congress, particularly to the House of Representatives where HENRY CLAY had converted the office of speaker from that of an impartial moderator to one of policymaking leadership. To an extent, certainly, executive power receded because foreign affairs had taken a distant second place to domestic affairs on the nation's agenda. Interestingly, Monroe is best remembered not for any initiative or achievement in domestic affairs but for a masterly stroke of foreign policy, the Monroe Doctrine. But Clay even challenged the President in foreign policy; and congressional ascendancy owed much to the boldness and address of young leaders like Clay who sought to command the popular feeling and power of the country. Partly for this reason the postwar Republicans consensus was soon shattered and "good feelings" vanished on the winds of change. Great issues, such as the Missouri Compromise, split the nationalizing Republican party along its sectional seams. The Panic of 1819, which led to the first major depression in the country's history, released powerful currents that shriveled the bright hopes of 1815.

Although the Panic of 1819 broke banks, bankrupted merchants, idled workers, and emptied factories everywhere, it was centered in American agriculture, especially in the freshly burgeoning lands of the South and West. Many purchasers of these lands had availed themselves of the credit allowed by the Harrison Land Act of 1800. Also important to frontier farmers and planters, of course, was bank credit. State banks had generally met this need, but now they were aided and abetted by the new Bank of the United States, which established most of its branches in the South and West. Agricultural prices collapsed worldwide in 1818. A severe contraction of bank credit followed. The Bank of the United States barely survived, and did so only at the expense of bankrupting many thousands of farmers, merchants, and local bankers. Several western states enacted legislation in the interest of debtors. The controversy over the constitutionality of debtor relief laws rocked Kentucky for a decade. All along the frontier, in wheat lands and in cotton lands, people tended to blame their troubles on the Bank. There were calls for repeal of its charter, and state legislatures acted to restrain "The Monster." Ohio levied a prohibitive tax on resident branches; when it was not paid the state auditor seized $100,000 of the Bank's funds, thereby giving birth to the case of OSBORN V. THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES (1824). Wherever the depression caused hostility to the Bank, it weakened the spring of support for economic nationalism generally. To nationalist leaders, on the other hand, the depression offered further confirmation of the colonial character of the American economy and pointed up the imperative need for higher protective tariffs and other government assistance to bring about a flourishing "home market" for the products of American industry. This AMERICAN SYSTEM, as Clay named it, had its fulfillment in the Tariff of 1824.

While the Panic was at its height, in March 1819, the Supreme Court handed down its unanimous decision in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND, upholding the constitutionality of the Bank and its freedom to operate without state interference. Chief Justice John Marshall drew upon the Hamiltonian doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS not only for the congressional authority to charter a bank but also for a sweeping vindication of national supremacy. In the same momentous term, which established the high-water mark of judicial nationalism, the court invoked the CONTRACT CLAUSE to strike down laws of two states. In DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD it extended the protection of that clause to corporate charters; and in STURGES V. CROWNINSHIELD it struck down a New York law for the relief of debtors whose contracts antedated the law. Quite aside from their implications for national versus state authority, all these decisions placed the court unreservedly on the side of propertied interests against popular majorities in state legislatures.

The Bank case, in particular, provoked attack on the Supreme Court and more broadly on the growth of national power. In Virginia opposition to the Supreme Court, which Jefferson called a "subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working under ground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric," sparked revival of the STATES' RIGHTS doctrines of the Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions and offered powerful reinforcement of the state's challenge to the court's appellate jurisdiction. The challenge had ridden on an old case involving the confiscation of Loyalist lands during the American Revolution. Taking the case on appeal from the Virginia Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court had overturned the state's confiscation law and found for the right of the English heir. To this Judge SPENCER ROANE, head of the Virginia court, responded by denying the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, declaring section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 unconstitutional, and refusing to execute the Supreme Court's decree. The court again took up the case, MARTIN V. HUNTER'S LESSEE (1816), and through Justice JOSEPH STORY reasserted the constitutionality of the appellate jurisdiction over state courts together with the judicial supremacy that went with it. But for the Bank case the controversy would have been quickly forgotten. As Marshall observed, however, that case "roused the Sleeping Giant of Virginia." Under the pseudonym "Hampden," in the columns of the Richmond Enquirer, Roane advanced a DUAL FEDERALISM philosophy of the Constitution. Under it there could be no ultimate appeal from the state courts to the Supreme Court. Marshall replied at length as "Friend of the Constitution" in the Alexandria Gazette. The veteran Old Republican JOHN TAYLOR of Caroline expounded the Virginia doctrines ad nauseum in Construction Construed and Constitutions Vindicated (1820). The doctrines still had a long course to run, but the controversy over appellate jurisdiction drew to a close in COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821). In this arranged case Virginia became the defendant when the Cohens appealed their conviction in state court to the Supreme Court under Section 25. The Virginia assembly adopted resolutions backing the state cause. Surprisingly, perhaps because the case resulted in a nominal victory for the state, Marshall's broad assertion of national judicial supremacy provoked no official reaction in Virginia, and opposition collapsed in 1822.

The Missouri Compromise was enacted in the midst of these events and communicated its own passions to them. The proposal to restrict slavery in Missouri as a condition of statehood raised difficult questions about the constitutional authority of Congress, the nature of the Union, the future of the West, the morality of slavery, and the sectional balance of power. Congress had previously restricted SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES. That power was not seriously in dispute. But the Missouri constitution would provide for slavery, and it was by no means clear that Congress could overrule it, especially as slavery had always been considered an institution under local jurisdiction. The compromise resolved the issue by allowing Missouri to enter the Union as a slave state. A new problem arose, however, when the proffered Missouri constitution contained a provision for excluding "free negroes and mulattoes" from the state. Opponents of the compromise charged that this violated the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the United States Constitution, because Negroes who were citizens of northern states would be denied citizenship in Missouri. Laboriously, a new compromise had to be constructed to save the original one. Under it Missouri would be admitted to the Union only after the legislature agreed, despite the constitutional provision, never to pass a law that might abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens. Missouri acquiesced and gained admission to the Union in August 1821. Not for many years would the harmony of the Union again be disturbed by slavery. The Missouri Compromise, therefore, contributed mightily to peace and union. Yet to Thomas Jefferson, contemplating the exclusion of slavery above the 36' 30" parallel, the compromise was "like a fire-ball in the night," sounding "the knell of the Union." "It is hushed, indeed, for the moment. But this is a reprieve only, not the final sentence. A geographical line, once conceived and held up to the angry passions of men, will never be obliterated; and every new irritation will mark it deeper and deeper."

The Republican consensus vanished during Monroe's second term. The Missouri question had raised fears of sectional parties and politics that were not dispelled by the compromise. The growth of the West, with a maturing sectional consciousness of its own, and the scramble of economic interests for the bounty and favor of the general government put the National Republican system under heavy strain. While nationalists continued to believe that the Union would survive and prosper only through measures of consolidation, growing numbers of Republicans, inspired by the Virginia "Old Republicans," believed consolidation must tear the Union apart. They called for return to Jeffersonian austerity and states' rights.

In this unstable political environment, the contest for the presidential succession was especially disturbing. Monroe's chief cabinet officers, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, William H. Crawford, and JOHN C. CALHOUN, were in the race from the start, and they were soon joined by Henry Clay and ANDREW JACKSON. In the absence of a single dominant leader or a clear line of succession, such as the Virginia dynasty had afforded, the Republican party split into personal followings and factions. The congressional caucus of the party, which had been the mechanism for nominating candidates for President and vice-president, could no longer be relied upon. The caucus itself had become an issue. In an increasingly democratic electorate it was assailed as a closed, elitist institution. Politicians grew wary of the caucus but saw no obvious substitute for it. "We are putting to the proof the most delicate part of our system, the election of the Executive," DANIEL WEBSTER remarked. What was most distressing about the present contest, among men nourished on traditional Whig fears of executive power, was that it made the presidency the center of gravity in the government. Great issues of public policy were submitted to the artifice and caprice of presidential politics; and senators and representatives, if elected on the basis of presidential preferences, must necessarily compromise their independence. This threatened subordination of the legislative to the executive power was an inversion of the proper constitutional order.

Given the multiplicity of candidates, each with his own following, and none able to command a majority of votes, the election of the President inevitably wound up in the House of Representatives. There Clay, the speaker, having been eliminated, threw his support to Adams, who was chosen over Jackson, the popular vote leader. Adams's subsequent appointment of Clay as secretary of state, the cabinet post which had furnished the President for the third successive time, brought cries of "corrupt bargain" from the Jacksonians, and from this canard the Adams administration never recovered. Boldly, in his first message to Congress, Adams proposed to rally the country behind a great program of national improvement, one which took conventional internal improvements—rivers and harbors, roads and canals—only as a starting point. "Liberty is power," Adams declared. A nation of liberty should be a nation of power, provided, of course, power is used beneficently. The Constitution presents no obstacle. Indeed, to refrain from exercising legitimate powers for good ends would be treachery to the people. "While foreign nations less blessed with that freedom which is power . . . are advancing with gigantic strides in the career of public improvement," Adams said, "were we to slumber in indolence or to fold up our arms and proclaim to the world that we are palsied by the will of our constituents, would it not be to cast away the bounties of Providence and doom ourselves to perpetual inferiority?"

In response to the message, all the old artillery of states' rights and STRICT CONSTRUCTION was hauled out and turned on the administration. Liberty is power? What dangerous nonsense. Liberty is the jealous restraint of power. Individuals, not governments, are the best judges of their own interests; and the national interest consists only in the aggregate of individual interests. These ideas had been employed in the attack on the American System. Now they entered deeply into the ideology of the emerging Jacksonian coalition. A new recruit to the coalition was Vice-President Calhoun, who began to shed the liberality and nationalism that had characterized his political career. In part, certainly, he was influenced by the rising states' rights frenzy in South Carolina. This movement was orchestrated by Calhoun's enemies in the Crawford faction. In 1825 they drove through the legislature resolutions declaring the protective tariff and federal internal improvements unconstitutional. This "Revolution of 1825," as it came to be known, showed how far out of step Calhoun was with the opinion of his state, and he hurried to catch up.

In Congress the anticonsolidation movement provided most of the rhetoric and some of the substance of opposition on every issue with the administration but was especially evident in debates on the judiciary and the tariff. Report of a bill in the House to reorganize the federal judiciary, mainly by the addition of three circuits—and three new judges—in the West, furnished a forum for advocates of reforming the judiciary. There was still no consensus on the role and authority of the Supreme Court. The Court had been a powerful ally of consolidation. Between 1816 and 1825 it had ruled in favor of national power seventeen times and of states' rights only six times, when they were at issue; and by 1825 it had invalidated in whole or in part the statutes of ten states. Various measures, most of them involving constitutional amendment, had been offered to curb judicial power: the withdrawal of opinions, or removal of Justices, on the address of both houses of Congress; the requirement of seriatim opinions; the use of the Senate as a tribunal of last resort on federal questions; and the repeal of section 25 of the Judiciary Act. All were aired in the 1826 debate. Nothing of substance emerged; the reorganization bill itself, after passing the House, failed in the Senate. Yet the debate, which was the "last hurrah" of reform, may have contributed to the increasing moderation of the Marshall Court after 1825.

The tariff had been a constitutional issue since the great debate on the American System in 1824. The power to tax, Virginia congressman PHILIP P. BARBOUR had then argued, was not a power to promote one industry over another, nor did any such power exist in the Constitution. Controversy was reignited three years later by demands for additional protection, particularly on behalf of the rising wool and woolens industry of the Northeast. Jacksonian politicians, who came into control of the new Congress, could not ignore the demand. Under the leadership of MARTIN VAN BUREN of New York they framed a tariff bill that was a political strategem rather than a serious piece of economic legislation. Moreover, they persuaded their southern friends to go along with the bill on the spurious plea that it would finally fail because of provisions designed to trigger overwhelming New England opposition, thereby enabling the Jacksonians to claim credit in the North for protectionist efforts without inflicting further injury on the South. But in the Senate, where it was named the Tariff of Abominations, the bill was amended to become less objectionable to New England, and its grat spokesman, Webster, heretofore a free-trader, dramatically declared his support. THE TARIFF ACT OF 1828 became law. The South felt betrayed. In South Carolina, which had grasped the flagging torch of states' rights from Virginia, there were demands to "calculate the value of the Union." The legislature, in December, enacted a series of resolutions declaring the tariff oppressive and unconstitutional. It also published the South Carolina Exposition and Protest, which Calhoun had authored secretly at the invitation of a legislative committee. The Exposition repeated, with some elaboration, the litany of antitariff arguments South Carolina radicals had been urging for several years and it offered the first authoritative statement of "the Carolina doctrine" of nullification.

A motley coalition—western agrarians, southern planters, northern democrats—swept Andrew Jackson into the presidency in 1828. His inaugural address gave no clear sign of the direction his administration would take; but the dominant pressure of the men, ideas, and interests gathered around the President was toward dissolution of the National Republican platform and toward the rebirth of party government on specious Jeffersonian principles.

MERRILL D. PETERSON
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAMS, HENRY 1891–1893 History of the United States during the Administrations of Jefferson and Madison. 9 Vols. New York: Scribner's.

BEVERIDGE, ALBERT J. 1919 The Life of John Marshall, vol. IV. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

CUNNINGHAM, NOBLE E., JR. 1978 The Process of Government under Jefferson. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

DANGERFIELD, GEORGE 1952 The Era of Good Feeling. New York: Harcourt, Brace.

GOODRICH, CARTER, ed. 1967 The Government and the Economy: 1783–1861. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

JOHNSTONE, ROBERT M., JR. 1978 Jefferson and the Presidency: Leadership in the Young Republic. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

KETCHAM, RALPH 1984 Presidents above Party: The First American Presidency, 1789–1829. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

SOFAER, ABRAHAM D. 1976 War, Foreign Affairs and Constitutional Power: The Origins. Cambridge, Mass.: Ballinger.

TURNER, FREDERICK JACKSON 1906 Rise of the New West, 1819–1829. New York: Macmillan.

WHITE, LEONARD D. 1951 The Jeffersonians: A Study in Administrative History, 1801–1829. New York: Macmillan.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1829–1848

Constitutional change in the Jacksonian era began with the Virginia CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION of 1829–1830, and climaxed in the election controversies of 1848. Between these dates, the American people tried to renovate their constitutional order, especially with respect to the great issues of FEDERALISM, democratization, and slavery.

Virginia's venerable Constitution of 1776, like other early constitutions, had come to enshrine the related evils of malapportionment and disfranchisement. THOMAS JEFFERSON denounced these and other defects in the document from the founding of the commonwealth to his death. His criticism produced the convention of 1829, where the badly underrepresented Western delegates demanded reform, including white manhood suffrage and a REAPPORTIONMENT that would fairly represent the growing population of their region. The convention was a showcase of Virginia's political leadership, including as delegates JAMES MADISON (who had also been a delegate at the 1776 convention), JOHN MARSHALL, JAMES MONROE, JOHN RANDOLPH, as well as emergent conservative leaders like JOHN TYLER, Benjamin Watkins Leigh, and Abel Parker Upshur. The conservatives from the tidewater region, representing the interests of slaveholders, held the reformers at bay, conceding only a limited modification of the old freehold suffrage to include householders and leaseholders, far less than the taxpayer-militia qualification representing a compromise conceded by the western delegates. Reapportionment similarly fell short of western demands, as the convention adopted a complex system of regional representation. The conservative triumph on these two issues was assured partly because many delegates heeded Leigh's warning that reform would produce "the annihilation of all state rights." Implicit in this response were fears for the security of slavery. Those fears were bloodily confirmed by Nat Turner's 1831 slave insurrection in Southampton County, and reawakened the next year as the Virginia General Assembly debated and ultimately voted down a proposal for the gradual abolition of slavery.

Slavery, only hinted at in the 1828 Virginia debates, soon surfaced as a constitutional topic throughout the South. In State v. Mann (1829) Chief Judge Thomas Ruffin of the North Carolina Supreme Court held that the absolute subjection characteristic of slavery was "essential to the value of slaves as property, to the security of the master, and [to] the public tranquility." The South Carolina Court of Appeals later held that "a slave can invoke neither MAGNA CHARTA nor COMMON LAW. . . . In the very nature of things, he is subject to despotism." The political counterpart of this new proslavery jurisprudence was the "positive good" thesis, first advanced by South Carolina Governor George McDuffie in 1835 and amplified thereafter by JOHN C. CALHOUN in the United States Senate.

Southern judicial and political leaders found themselves compelled to erect defenses for the internal security of slavery after 1830 in part because a new cadre of abolitionists appeared in the northern states, led at first by William Lloyd Garrison. Repudiating both gradualism and projects for the colonization of free blacks in Liberia, this new generation of antislavery workers demanded the immediate and uncompensated abolition of slavery. They tried their hand at constitutional challenges to slavery. Although they conceded that the federal government had no power to interfere with slavery in the states, they found many areas for legitimate federal action, such as exclusion of slavery from the territories, abolition of slavery in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, abolition of the interstate slave trade, and refusal to admit new slave states. At the state level, they sought, unsuccessfully, to have slavery declared unconstitutional in New Jersey, persuaded the Massachusetts and New York legislatures to enact PERSONAL LIBERTY LAWS, and provided invaluable support for fugitive slave rescues. In 1832, when they got their first taste of constitutional litigation in the Connecticut prosecution of Prudence Crandall, they attempted to define and secure the rights of free blacks under the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES CLAUSE of Article IV, section 2, of the Constitution.

By 1830 it was obvious that the South Carolinians were counting the costs of the Union, and weighing their alternatives. The fundamental concepts of state SOVEREIGNTY and the right of SECESSION were commonplace at the time. Thus in the Webster-Hayne debates of 1830, South Carolina Senator Robert Y. Hayne was closer to orthodoxy than DANIEL WEBSTER when he supported a cluster of theories derived or extrapolated from the VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS of 1798–1799: he condemned the consolidationist tendencies of the federal government, asserted state sovereignty, insisted on a STRICT CONSTRUCTION of the Constitution, reiterated the compact theory of the Union (by which the Constitution and the national Union were the creation of a compact of sovereign states), and defended the legitimacy of INTERPOSITION and NULLIFICATION. Webster's famous rhetorical reply is better known but less analytical than other rebuttals by Edward Livingston, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, and JOSEPH STORY between 1830 and 1833. These maintained that sovereignty had effectively been transferred to the national government by the Constitution, that the Union created thereby was perpetual, and that secession was extralegal. In his Commentaries on the Constitution (1833), Story flatly denied that the Constitution was a compact among sovereign states. James Madison joined his venerable voice to theirs, condemning all theories of nullification as perversions of the doctrines he and Thomas Jefferson had propounded in 1798 and 1799. All maintained that because the Union was perpetual, it was therefore indissoluble. But John Quincy Adams had the ominous last word when he wrote in 1831 that "it is the odious nature of [this] question that it can be settled only at the cannon's mouth." South Carolina's attempted nullification of the TARIFF ACT of 1828 and its 1832 revision forced a resolution of these conflicts that came close to the mode Adams had predicted.

Though ostensibly aimed at the tariff, and the larger but more nebulous problem of the "consolidation" of the federal government's powers, the nullification controversy at its heart concerned the security and perpetuity of slavery. The tariff controversy nonetheless provided a convenient vehicle for the Carolinians to reconfirm their traditional THEORIES OF THE UNION and state sovereignty. In November 1832 a specially elected convention adopted the SOUTH CAROLINA ORDINANCE OF NULLIFICATION, which prohibited collection of the tariff and appeals to the United States Supreme Court. President ANDREW JACKSON responded with his "Proclamation to the People of South Carolina," drafted by Secretary of State Livingston, which refuted nullification theories, asserted federal supremacy, insisted on obedience to federal laws, warned that "Disunion by armed force is treason," and, surprisingly in view of his Bank Veto Message five months earlier, maintained that the Supreme Court was the proper and final arbiter of disputes under the United States Constitution and laws. The FORCE ACT of 1833 gave teeth to the proclamation, while a compromise tariff assuaged Carolina's nominal grievance. The Carolinians suspended, then rescinded the ordinance of nullification, which had been universally condemned by other states. But the state convention consoled itself with the empty gesture of a second ordinance nullifying the Force Act. On this equivocal note, the nullification crisis dissolved. Both sides in reality suffered a long-term defeat. Nationalists led by Jackson had failed to quash ideas of state sovereignty and secession; Calhoun and the nullifiers had failed to forge a united front of slave states and had promoted the federal "consolidation" they feared and condemned.

The second party system, emergent at the time of the nullification crisis, produced its own constitutional controversies. HENRY CLAY had announced the basis of what he called the AMERICAN SYSTEM in 1824: a protective tariff, federal aid to INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, and support for the second Bank of the United States. In a decade this became the program of the Whig Party. Jacksonian Democrats denounced all three elements as being of dubious constitutionality. In 1830 President Andrew Jackson vetoed the MAYSVILLE ROAD BILL partly because he doubted that federal aid for internal improvements, at least those lying wholly within a state, was constitutional. Two years later, in his veto of the recharter bill for the second Bank of the United States, he similarly expressed reservations about the constitutional power of Congress to charter a bank. He brushed aside the binding force of Chief Justice John Marshall's decision on the subject in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) by asserting that "the authority of the Supreme Court must not, therefore, be permitted to control the Congress or the Executive when acting in their legislative capacities. . . ." In 1833 Jackson ordered his subordinates to remove all federal deposits from the bank, and to redistribute them in selected state-chartered banks.

The democratization of American politics was advanced by the Whigs' development of mass electioneering techniques in the 1840 presidential campaign. Whig success was short-lived, however, because of President William Henry Harrison's death in 1841. JOHN TYLER, a conservative Virginia Democrat, succeeded to the office, and in doing so established the important precedent that he was not merely the "acting President" but President in fact. One of the few positive accomplishments of the Whigs' brief accession to power was the enactment of the nation's second Bankruptcy Act in 1841. Its repeal in 1843 returned the matter of insolvency legislation to the states, where it was to remain until 1898. Direction of the nation's economy was to remain chiefly the responsibility of the states until the Civil War. (See BANKRUPTCY POWER.)

In the 1830s the states encouraged and subsidized economic development in numerous ways. Their role was almost entirely promotional; during the Jacksonian era, they essayed only the most diffident beginnings of ECONOMIC REGULATION. The state legislatures granted charters and franchises for banking, insurance, railroad, and manufacturing CORPORATIONS. Encouraged by the remarkable but unduplicated success of New York's Erie Canal in the 1820s, other states provided direct financial support for construction of turnpikes, canals, and railroads.

State jurists likewise supported economic development, sometimes by creating whole new domains of law (torts, nonmarine insurance), and sometimes by reworking traditional legal doctrines to provide instrumentalist approaches supportive of entrepreneurs. In 1831 Chancellor Reuben Walworth of New York upheld the power of the legislature to grant EMINENT DOMAIN powers to railroads, and Chief Justice LEMUEL SHAW of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court afterward approved the extension of that power to manufacturing corporations as well. Chief Judge JOHN BANNISTER GIBSON of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court helped refashion the law of contracts in favor of the doctrine of caveat emptor, an impersonal and seller-oriented approach presumably suited to a national market. The new orientation of the law of contracts and sales emphasized the autonomy of the individual and private will, dismissing earlier insistence on equitable dealing and community standards of fairness.

But the public law of the states in the 1830s was not exclusively concerned with succoring nascent industrial capitalism. In fact, the common law itself, as well as its judicial exemplars, came under reformist attack. In the Jacksonian period, the movement toward an elective judiciary decisively gained ground, as Mississippi led the way in 1832 by making its entire bench elective. Other states followed suit, so that by the twentieth century only the federal judiciary remained wholly appointive and life-tenured. An even stronger assault on judge-made law emerged from the movement to codify all laws. Even legal conservatives like Joseph Story conceded that some restatement of law in certain areas (EVIDENCE, criminal law, and commercial law) might be both feasible and useful. More thoroughgoing codifiers, such as Edward Livingston and Robert Rantoul, condemned the common law as antidemocratic, mysterious, and prolix.

Meanwhile, the controversy over slavery intensified. From 1835 to 1840, mobs in all sections of the country harassed abolitionists and free blacks. The beleaguered abolitionists, for their part, mounted a propaganda campaign against slaveholding by weekly mailings of abolitionist literature throughout the South. Democrats and southern political leaders reacted violently, with Postmaster General Amos Kendall condoning destruction of mail in Charleston. President Jackson recommended congressional prohibition of abolitionist mailing in the southern states, but Senator John C. Calhoun objected, partly because such federal legislation would invade rights reserved to the states. The controversy dissipated when abolitionists redirected their energies to a petition campaign, garnering signatures throughout the north on petitions to Congress demanding various antislavery measures, such as abolition in the District of Columbia, interdiction of the interstate slave trade, and refusal to annex the slaveholding republic of Texas or to admit new slave states.

Abolitionists were active in legal-constitutional efforts against slavery at the state level, too. In Massachusetts, they scored a striking victory against the ingress of sojourners' slaves in COMMONWEALTH V. AVES (1836), when Chief Justice Shaw expounded an American version of the doctrine of SOMERSET'S CASE (King's Bench, 1772). Shaw held that a sojourning slave could not be held in slavery against her will in Massachusetts because no state law supported slavery and because the "all men are free and equal" provision of the 1780 Massachusetts Declaration of Rights was "precisely adapted to the abolition of negro slavery." Abolitionists enjoyed less success the next year in Ohio and Pennsylvania, however. Chief Judge Gibson held in 1837 that, under the Pennsylvania constitution, blacks were not "freemen" and hence could not vote. A state constitutional convention meeting that year took no action to reverse this holding. In Ohio, the abolitionist lawyers SALMON P. CHASE and JAMES G. BIRNEY developed an impressive range of legal and constitutional arguments in Matilda's Case (1837) to demonstrate that the 1793 federal Fugitive Slave Act was unconstitutional under the FOURTH AMENDMENT, the Fifth Amendment's DUE PROCESS clause, and the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE 's guarantees of TRIAL BY JURY and HABEAS CORPUS. These arguments failed then, but they furnished an impressive stock of ideas to expanding ABOLITIONIST CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY.

At the national level, defenders of slavery launched a counterattack against this assault. The United States House of Representatives in 1836 adopted the first of the congressional "gag resolutions," declaring that all petitions coming into the House as a result of the antislavery petition campaign would be automatically tabled, without being referred or read. In subsequent years, the Senate adopted a similar rule, and the House made it a standing rule. But the gags proved insufficient bars to the determined evasions of a handful of antislavery congressmen, led by John Quincy Adams, who repeatedly introduced antislavery petitions. (See CIVIL LIBERTIES AND THE SLAVERY CONTROVERSY.)

Observing such assaults on slavery with alarm, Calhoun introduced into the Senate in 1837 a series of resolutions that in effect restated the nature of the Union and slavery's relation to it. These resolutions condemned antislavery agitation as "subversive"; declared that the federal government was the "common agent" of the states, bound to protect all their institutions, including slavery; that slavery was an "essential element" in the organization of the Union; that any congressional interference with slavery in the District of Columbia or the territories would be an "attack on the institutions" of the slave states; and that Congress could not discriminate against the interests of the slave states in the territories. Congress declined to adopt the last two, but its endorsement of the others threatened to give the slave states a constitutional predominance in the Union.

Abolitionists responded with innovative constitutional thinking of their own. In 1839 the hitherto unified movement began to split apart. The antislavery mainstream became involved in political action, forming the Liberty Party. They conceded exclusive state power over slavery in the states where it existed, but called for congressional action elsewhere, as, for example, by refusing to admit new slave states and by repealing the Fugitive Slave Act. Two splinter groups of the movement challenged this moderate position. Followers of William Lloyd Garrison, embracing the theological doctrine of perfectionism, by 1842 came to denounce the Constitution as a proslavery compact, and called for disunion. Radical abolitionists, led by the New York lawyer Alvan Stewart, discarded previous assumptions about slavery's legitimacy and contended that slavery was everywhere unconstitutional as a violation of various constitutional provisions, including the Fifth Amendment's due process clause (considered both in procedural and substantive senses), Article IV's guarantee of a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT, and the same article's privileges and immunities clause.

Abolitionists harked back to the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE and to the tenets of republican ideology of the Revolutionary era. So did contemporary suffrage reformers in Rhode Island, who faced the same problems of malapportionment and disenfranchisement as had Virginia two decades earlier. After concluding that the existing conservative regime would never concede reform, they called an extralegal constitutional convention to modernize the state's constitution, which until then had been the 1662 Charter. This "People's Constitution" was ratified by universal male suffrage. Its supporters then elected a new government for the state, with Thomas W. Dorr as governor. The existing regime refused to cede power, so for several months in 1842, Rhode Island had two governments, each claiming a different source of constitutional legitimacy: the Dorrites, a do-it-yourself, implicitly revolutionary popular sovereignty; and the extant regime, legality backed by force. With behind-the-scenes support of President Tyler, the regular government suppressed its opponents, then inaugurated the substance of what the reformers had demanded. The failure of the Dorr Rebellion demonstrated that the guarantees of self government and equality in the Declaration of Independence would not be taken literally or programmatically in the Jacksonian era.

Constitutional change came to other states less turbulently in the 1840s. In neighboring Massachusetts, Chief Justice Shaw placed the Supreme Judicial Court in the forefront of legal and constitutional innovation in a series of decisions from 1842 to 1850 that created new doctrines and revolutionized old ones. In Commonwealth v. Hunt (1842) Shaw legitimated labor union organization in the United States. The Philadelphia and New York Cordwainers Cases (1806, 1810), reaffirmed by New York decisions in the mid-1830s, had held labor organization and strikes to be CRIMINAL CONSPIRACIES at common law and illegal under state statutes prohibiting injury to commerce. But in Hunt, Shaw held that neither the objectives of the workers nor their means—unions and strikes—were inherently unlawful. Because it removed the taint of per se illegality from unions, the Hunt decision has been extravagantly called the "Magna Carta of organized labor."

Another Shaw decision of the same year, Farwell v. Boston and Worcester Railroad, proved as damaging to the cause of industrial workers as Hunt had been beneficial. In exempting an employer from liability for the injury to one of its employees caused by the negligence of another employee, Shaw enunciated the fellow-servant rule that stood as a bar to recovery in such situations.

Because Massachusetts was in the vanguard of industrialization, Shaw had an opportunity to influence the law of railroads and common carriers more than any other contemporary jurist, leading one scholar to conclude that he "practically established the railroad law for the country." In cases involving eminent domain and taxation, Shaw held railroads to be "a public work, established by public authority" whose property is held "in trust for the public." Shaw thereby hoped to secure legislative benefits granted railroads, while at the same time leaving open the possibility of some degree of public control through legislation. Yet he was solicitous to exempt railroads from forms of liability that would have drained investment capital.

The temperance movement proved to be as prolific a source of judicial lawmaking as innovations in transportation technology. Throughout the antebellum period, state appellate courts had kept alive the HIGHER LAW tradition enunciated by Justice SAMUEL CHASE in his opinion in CALDER V. BULL (1798). State judges, especially those of Federalist and Whig antecedents, readily struck down various state laws for the inconsistency with "the great principles of eternal justice" or "the character and genius of our government." In his Commentaries on the Constitution (3rd ed., 1858), Joseph Story summed up "the strong current of judicial opinion" that "the fundamental maxims of a free government seem to require, that the rights of personal liberty and private property should be held sacred." The Delaware Supreme Court used such nebulous concepts derived from the nature of republican government to void a local-option PROHIBITION statute in 1847. Higher law constitutional doctrine became all the more important after the United States Supreme Court's 5–4 decision in the LICENSE CASES (1847), upholding Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire statutes taxing and regulating liquor imported from outside the state. This trend culminated in the celebrated case of WYNEHAMER V. PEOPLE (1856), where the New York Court of Appeals struck down a state prohibition statute under the state constitution's LAW OF THE LAND and due process clauses.

Chief Justice Shaw was the author of a doctrine that provided a powerful offset to such higher law tendencies: the POLICE POWER. In COMMONWEALTH V. ALGER (1951) he stated that all property is held "under the implied liability that . . . use of it may be so regulated, that it shall not be injurious . . . to the rights of the community." He accorded the legislature sweeping power to subject property to "reasonable limitations." After the Civil War, the police power doctrine constituted the basis for an alternative to the dogmas of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS and FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

Courts were by no means the sole font of constitutional innovation in the 1840s. State legislatures and constitutional conventions also modified the constitutional order. Reflecting the movement of the age from status to contract, as noted by Sir Henry Maine, the state legislatures in the 1840s extended some measure of control to married women over their own property through the married women's property acts. State courts sometimes reacted with hostility to these measures, seeing them either as a deprivation of the husband's property rights protected by higher law or as deranging gender and marital relationships.

Four New England states experimented with embryonic railroad regulatory commissions (Rhode Island, 1839; New Hampshire, 1844; Connecticut, 1850; Massachusetts, various ad hoc special commissions), but none of these proved successful or permanent. New York in the 1840s had to confront the legal consequences of the emergent nativist controversy. Roman Catholics sought public funding for parochial schools and objected to use of the King James Bible for devotional sessions in public schools. Nativists, for their part, demanded that the predominantly Catholic immigrants of the period be disfranchised.

The most significant state constitutional event of the decade was the drafting and ratification of the New York Constitution of 1846. This document was a compendium of constitutional trends of the era and profoundly influenced subsequent constitutions, especially those of Michigan and Wisconsin. It capped the decade's long movement toward general incorporation acts by restricting the granting of special corporate charters, and, for good measure, made all legislation respecting corporations, both general and special, subject to repeal or amendment at any time. It put to rest the controversies of the rent wars of the previous decade by abolishing all feudal real property tenures and perpetual leases, converting all long-term leaseholds into freeholds. It made the entire New York bench elective, and required appointment of a three-member commission to draw up a reformed procedural code.

Despite the sweep of innovation in the 1846 New York Constitution and its daughters in the west, the needs of certain groups in American society remained unmet. Chief among these were women. Feminists convened in Seneca Falls, New York, in 1848 and issued a manifesto on women's rights modeled on the Declaration of Independence, demanding VOTING RIGHTS, the recognition by law of full legal capacity, revision of male-biased divorce laws, access to the professions and to educational opportunity, and abolition of all discriminatory legislation.

Blacks in the northern states were no better off. After 1842, their situation, especially in areas near the slave states, became more precarious because of Justice Story's opinion in PRIGG V. PENNSYLVANIA (1842), upholding the constitutionality of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1793 and striking down inconsistent state legislation. After Prigg, most state personal liberty laws, such as those assuring jury trial to alleged fugitives or extending the writ of habeas corpus to them, were suspect. Abolitionists seized on a Story dictum in Prigg, stating that the states did not have to assist in fugitive recaptures under the federal act. They induced several state legislatures to enact statutes prohibiting state facilities from being used for temporary detention of alleged fugitives.

The slavery question briefly returned to Congress in 1842, in the form of the "Creole Resolutions" offered by Representative Joshua Giddings (Whig, Ohio). Slaves aboard the Creole, an American-flag vessel, mutinied on the high seas and made their way to the Bahamas, where most of them were freed by British authorities. Secretary of State Daniel Webster protested and demanded compensation for the liberated slaves. Giddings, despite the gag rule, introduced resolutions setting forth the Somerset-based position that the slaves had merely resumed their natural status, freedom, and could not be reenslaved. The federal government lacked authority to protect or reimpose their slave status, which was derived solely from Virginia law and hence confined to this JURISDICTION. The House defeated the resolutions and censured Giddings. But he was reelected by a landslide, in effect forcing and winning a REFERENDUM on his antislavery positions. This, together with the earlier and ignominious failure of an effort to censure Representative John Quincy Adams for flouting the gag, led to the demise of the gag rules in both houses in 1844.

Such inconclusive sparring between slavery and abolition might have gone on indefinitely had it not been for the Mexican War. But proslavery ambitions to expand into the southwestern empire fundamentally altered the character of the American Union, destabilizing extant constitutional settlements and requiring new constitutional arrangements to replace the now obsolete MISSOURI COMPROMISE.

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS had been controversial ever since Texan independence in 1836. When the issue reestablished itself on the national agenda in 1844, opponents of annexation, including Daniel Webster, Joseph Story, and John Quincy Adams, argued that annexation was not constitutionally permissible under the territories clause of Article IV, section 3, because previous annexations had been of dependent territories of sovereign nations, whereas Texas was itself an independent nation. Proponents dismissed this as an insignificant technicality, under the broad reading of the FOREIGN AFFAIRS power by Chief Justice Marshall in AMERICAN INSURANCE CO. V. CANTER (1828). Political opposition blocked ratification of an annexation treaty until President Tyler hit on the expedient of annexation by JOINT RESOLUTION of both houses, which required only a majority vote in each, rather than the two-thirds required for treaties in the Senate. Texas was thereby annexed in 1845.

Annexation hastened the deterioration of relations with Mexico, but Tyler was cautious and circumspect in his deployment of American forces in the areas disputed between Mexico and the United States. But the new President, JAMES K. POLK, ordered American ground forces into the area. After Mexican forces captured American soldiers, and the United States declared war, the question of the extent of the President's power to order American troops into combat areas reappeared regularly in congressional debates over military appropriations. In 1847, Whig Representative ABRAHAM LINCOLN offered the SPOT RESOLUTIONS, demanding to know the spot on American soil where, according to Polk, Mexican troops had attacked Americans. This led to House passage of a resolution early in 1848 declaring that the Mexican War had been "unconstitutionally begun by the President." Military victories and the TREATY OF GUADALUPE HIDALGO (1848) obviated this partisan measure, without providing any resolution to the question originally debated by James Madison and ALEXANDER HAMILTON in the Helvidius-Pacificus exchange of 1793 over whether there is an inherent executive prerogative that would embrace the power to commit troops to belligerent situations without explicit authorization by Congress. (See WAR, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, AND THE CONSTITUTION.)

In 1846, northern public opinion coalesced with remarkable unity behind the WILMOT PROVISO, which would have prohibited the extension of slavery into any territories to be acquired as a result of the Mexican War. Alarmed by the extent and fervor of grassroots support for such exclusion in the free states, administration Democrats and southern political leaders offered three alternatives to it, plus an expedient designed to depoliticize the whole question. The earliest proposal was to extend the old Missouri Compromise line of 36 30 all the way to the Pacific coast with slavery excluded north of the line and permitted south of it. After a short-lived flurry of interest in 1847, this suggestion withered. The northern Democratic alternative to the Wilmot Proviso was widely known as POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY or, pejoratively, "squatter sovereignty." First proposed by Vice-President George M. Dallas and then associated with Michigan Senator Lewis Cass, popular sovereignty called on Congress to refrain from taking any action concerning SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES, leaving it to the settlers of the territories to determine the future of slavery there. The idea's principal appeal derived from its superficial and simplistic democratic appearance. But its vitality was due to an ambiguity that could not be indefinitely postponed, namely, when were the settlers to make that determination? By the southern interpretation, that decision could not be made until the eve of statehood, by which time, presumably, slaveholders could avail themselves of the opportunity of settling there with their slaves and thus give the territory a proslavery impetus it would never lose. (All prior American territorial settlements had either guaranteed property rights in extant slaves, such as the LOUISIANA PURCHASE TREATY, or, like the Northwest Ordinance, had left existing pockets of slavery undisturbed as a practical matter despite their theoretical prohibition of slavery.) The northern assumption concerning popular sovereignty was that the territorial settlers could make their choice concerning slavery at any time in the territorial period, a position unacceptable to the South, which correctly believed that such an interpretation would exclude slavery.

The third alternative was embodied in resolutions offered by Calhoun in 1847. He proposed that the territories were the common property of all the states, and that Congress therefore could not prohibit citizens of any state from taking their property (including slaves) with them when they migrated into a territory. He also asserted that Congress could not refuse to admit a new state because it permitted slavery. After Calhoun's death in 1850, others advocated that Congress would have to protect the rights of slaveholders in all territories.

This selection of alternatives naturally influenced the presidential election of 1848. Democrats nominated Cass, thus providing some oblique endorsement of popular sovereignty, with its yet unresolved ambiguity. Whigs nominated the apolitical General ZACHARY TAYLOR and refused to endorse any party position at all on the various alternatives. Disgrunted elements of both parties in the northern states joined hands with the moderate, political-action abolitionists of the Liberty party to form the Free Soil party, which adopted the Wilmot Proviso as its basic plank, supplemented by the old Liberty party program of "divorce" of the federal government from support of slavery. Free Soil was an implicitly racist program, calling for the exclusion of all blacks from the territories to keep them open to white settlement, but that made it no less abominable to southern political leaders. The Whig victory in 1848 on its nonplatform merely postponed the resolution of what was rapidly becoming an urgent constitutional confrontation.

The American Union was in a far different condition in 1848 from what it had been at the onset of the Jacksonian era. The nation had increased in geographical extent by half. Such an immense increase necessitated a new or wholly revised constitutional order that could accommodate, if possible, the conflicting sectional expectations for the future of the western empire. All major constitutional events that had occurred at the national level since 1831 had made John Quincy Adams's prediction of that year all the more pertinent: the questions came ever closer to being settled at the cannon's mouth.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

BLOOMFIELD, MAXWELL 1976 American Lawyers in a Changing Society, 1776–1876. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

DUMOND, DWIGHT L. 1961 Antislavery: The Crusade for Freedom in America. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

FRIEDMAN, LAWRENCE M. 1973 A History of American Law. New York: Simon & Schuster.

HAAR, CHARLES M., ed. 1965 The Golden Age of American Law. New York: Braziller.

HORWITZ, MORTON J. 1977 The Transformation of American Law, 1780–1860. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

HURST, JAMES WILLARD 1956 Law and the Conditions of Freedom in the Nineteenth-Century United States. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. and WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1982 Equal Justice under Law: Constitutional Development, 1835–1875. New York: Harper & Row.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1957 The Law of the Commonwealth and Chief Justice Shaw: The Evolution of American Law, 1830–1860. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1977 The Sources of Antislavery Constitutionalism in America, 1760–1848. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

ZAINALDIN, JAMIL 1983 Law in Antebellum Society: Legal Change and Economic Expansion. New York: Knopf.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1848–1861

In American constitutional history, the years 1848 to 1861 ordinarily appear as a prelude to revolution, a time of intense controversy without significant change. Yet in at least two respects this impression is mistaken. First, constitutional change, though minimal in the national government, was widespread and vigorous among the states during the antebellum period. Second, if the structure of party politics is included (as it should be) in one's purview of the American constitutional system, then the 1850s, like the 1860s, were a decade of revolution.

Powerful social forces exerted pressure upon the constitutional order at mid-century. Mass immigration reached its first crest, with more than two million persons arriving in the years 1849–1854. This great influx caused much concern about the effects of ethnic diversity upon the quality of national life and upon the American experiment in self-government. At the same time, the progress of industrialization and business enterprise was rapidly changing the economic face of the agricultural nation for which the Constitution had been written. The railroads alone, as they tripled their mileage in the 1850s and thus accelerated their transformation of domestic commerce, confronted government with a host of new issues and problems, ranging from the regulation of capital formation to the determination of corporate liability in tort law. Still another major force at work was the continuing westward expansion of American SOVEREIGNTY and American people. The United States in 1848 was a transcontinental nation that had acquired forty percent of all its territory in the preceding three years. Occupation and assimilation of this new Western empire, extending from the mouth of the Rio Grande to the waters of Puget Sound, would absorb much national energy throughout the rest of the century. The process in itself placed no heavy strains upon the constitutional system. For the most part, it required only the further use of already tested forms and practices, such as territorial organization. But in the antebellum period, westward expansion became irredeemably entangled with still another formidable social force—the increasingly ominous sectional conflict over slavery.

The federal government, while extending its rule to the Pacific Ocean in the antebellum period, underwent little structural change. The Constitution had not been amended since 1803. Far fewer amendments than usual were proposed from 1848 to 1860, and none of them passed either house of Congress. (Prominent among those introduced were proposals for the popular election of senators and postmasters.) During the secession winter of 1860–1861, however, Congress received nearly two hundred proposed amendments. Most of them were aimed at dampening the crisis by offering concessions or guarantees to the South on such subjects as SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES and the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, the domestic slave trade, FUGITIVE SLAVES, and the right to travel with slaves in free states. Only one of these efforts proved successful to the point of passing both houses, but RATIFICATION in the states had scarcely begun before it was interrupted and canceled by the outbreak of hostilities. This abortive "Thirteenth Amendment" would have forbidden any amendment authorizing Congress to interfere with slavery as it existed in the states, thereby presumably fixing a double lock on the constitutional security of the institution. (See CORWIN AMENDMENT.)

Besides formal amendment, constitutional change may be produced by other means, such as legislative enactment and judicial decision. Congress altered the structure of the executive branch in 1849, for instance, by establishing a Department of the Interior. To it were transferred a number of agencies previously housed in other departments, notably those administering PATENTS, public lands, military pensions, and Indian affairs. Congress in 1849 also created the new office of "assistant secretary" for the Treasury Department, adding a similar position to the Department of State four years later. The federal bureaucracy as a whole grew appreciably in the antebellum period, but largely because of the necessary expansion of the postal system. Of the 26,000 civilian employees in 1851 and 37,000 in 1861, eighty percent were in the postal service. Only six percent performed their duties in the capital. On the eve of the CIVIL WAR, the whole Washington bureaucracy numbered about 2,200. The Department of State got along throughout the 1850s with a staff of thirty persons or fewer. The presidency remained a very simple affair with practically no official staff. Not until 1857 did Congress provide funds even for a private secretary and a messenger.

The federal government accepted few new responsibilities during the antebellum period. Enlargement of its role was inhibited by the economic principle of laissez-faire, by the constitutional principles of STRICT CONSTRUCTION and FEDERALISM, and by the inertial influence of custom. Most of the governmental activity affecting the lives of ordinary citizens was carried on by the states and their subdivisions. Any effort to extend national authority usually met resistance from Southerners worried about the danger of outside interference with slavery. Congressional reluctance to expand federal power is well illustrated in the history of the first successful telegraph line, run between Washington and Baltimore in the mid-1840s. Built with federal money and put in commercial operation as a branch of the postal system, it was very soon turned over to private ownership. When Congress did occasionally become venturesome, presidential disapproval might intervene. JAMES K. POLK and Franklin Pierce, citing constitutional reasons, vetoed several INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS bills. JAMES BUCHANAN expressed similar scruples in vetoing homestead legislation and land grants for the support of colleges. Sometimes a new social problem or need did evoke federal intervention, such as laws providing for safety inspection of steamboats and for minimum health standards on ocean-going passenger ships. Perhaps most significant was the expanded use of federal subsidies, in the form of land grants or mail contracts, to support railroad construction, steamship lines, and overland stagecoach service to the Pacific.

Although the three branches of the federal government remained fairly stable in their relationships to one another during the antebellum period, there was some shift of power from the presidency to Congress. The change is commonly viewed as a decline in presidential leadership, but it must be attributed to other factors as well, including the intensity of the sectional conflict. Congress could quarrel violently over slavery, then arrange some kind of truce, and thus perform admirably its function as a deliberative assembly. The President, on the other hand, could take no vigorous action, make no substantial proposal in respect of slavery without infuriating one side or the other.

For various reasons, none of the Presidents between ANDREW JACKSON and ABRAHAM LINCOLN served more than a single term, and only one, MARTIN VAN BUREN, was even renominated. Polk's energetic foreign policy and successful prosecution of the war with Mexico strengthened the presidency for a time, but by 1848 sectional strains and party dissension had put his administration in disarray. Zachary Taylor and Millard Fillmore were committed as Whigs to the principle of limited executive power. They did not exercise the VETO POWER, for instance, and were the last Presidents in history to refrain from doing so. Taylor, to be sure, proved unexpectedly stubborn on the slavery issue and seemed headed for a collision with Congress until his sudden death in the summer of 1850 cleared the way for compromise. During the great sectional crisis of 1846–1850, the Senate reached its peak of oratorical splendor and national influence. JOHN C. CALHOUN, HENRY CLAY, and DANIEL WEBSTER were the most famous men in America, and the outstanding political figure of the decade that followed was not a President but a senator—STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS. Most of the leading cabinet members of the 1840s and 1850s (Webster, Calhoun, Buchanan, Robert J. Walker, John M. Clayton, JEFFERSON DAVIS, Lewis Cass) were recruited directly from the Senate. Lincoln, after his election in 1860, filled the three top cabinet positions with Republican senators. The appearance of presidential weakness in the 1850s was therefore partly a reflection of senatorial prestige.

If Pierce and Buchanan were among the most ineffectual of American Presidents, as they are commonly portrayed, it was not for lack of trying to be otherwise. Both men regarded themselves as Jacksonian executives. Together they exercised the veto as often as Jackson in his two terms (though Pierce's negatives were usually overridden). Both took stern attitudes toward groups whom they labeled rebellious—namely, the free-state forces in Kansas and the Mormons in Utah. Both conducted a vigorously expansionist foreign policy, having in mind especially the acquisition of Cuba. Both made energetic use of patronage to coerce votes from Congress on critical measures—the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT in 1854 and the admission of Kansas with a proslavery constitution in 1858. (See LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.) Their fatal mistake was in misjudging the moral and political strength of the antislavery crusade. Seeking to discredit and dissipate the movement rather than accommodate it, they pursued policies that disastrously aggravated the sectional conflict and thereby brought the Presidency into disrepute. Then, in the final crisis of 1860–1861, Buchanan's constitutional scruples and his reluctance to use presidential power without specific congressional authorization lent substance to the fainéant image that history has fixed upon him. Again, as in 1850, the fate of the country seemed to rest primarily with the Senate, and when compromise failed in that body, little hope remained for peaceable preservation of the Union.

Meanwhile, the Supreme Court had tried its hand at resolving the slavery question and in the process had reasserted its power to review congressional legislation. The famous decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) invalidated a law that had been repealed three years earlier—the 3630 restriction of the MISSOURI COMPROMISE. Consequently, it did not put the Court into confrontation with Congress. Like the policies of Pierce and Buchanan, however, the decision outraged antislavery opinion and aggravated the sectional conflict. Thus the Court, like the presidency, entered the Civil War with lowered prestige.

At the level of state rather than national government, antebellum Americans acted very much in accord with the Jeffersonian credo that every generation should write its own fundamental law. The period 1830 to 1860 has been called "the high water mark for the making of constitutions among the states." During those three decades, ten new states framed their first constitutions, and eighteen of the other twenty-four revised their constitutions by means of conventions. In addition, many states added amendments from time to time through legislative action. The voters of Massachusetts, for instance, rejected a new constitution drafted by a convention in 1853, but they approved of six amendments in 1855, three in 1857, one in 1859, and two in 1860.

State constitutions became longer in the antebellum period, not only describing in greater detail the structure and functions of government but also incorporating many specific instructions and prohibitions intended to set public policy and control the substance of governmental action. The machinery for constitutional change remained heterogeneous, generally cumbersome, and, in some states, poorly defined. There was a clear trend, however, toward popular participation at every stage. Typically, voters decided whether a convention should be called, elected its members, and passed judgment on its handiwork. Legislative amendment, which bypassed the convention process and often had to be approved by two successive legislatures, was always submitted to the voters for ratification.

Democratization of the state constitutional systems, begun earlier in the century, proceeded unremittingly during the antebellum period. Two major categories of change were further extension of the franchise and further lengthening of the list of elective offices. With but a few exceptions, the old religious and property-holding qualifications for suffrage disappeared, although some states continued to require that voters be taxpayers. Under nativist influence, Connecticut in 1855 and Massachusetts in 1857 sought to curtail immigrant participation in politics by installing an English literacy test. But a stronger contrary tendency, exemplified in the constitutions of Wisconsin (1848), Michigan (1850), Indiana (1851), and Kansas (1859), was to expand the immigrant vote by enfranchising foreigners as soon as they had declared their intention to become citizens. Women were everywhere excluded from the polls, except in a few local elections, and blacks could vote only in a half-dozen northeastern states, but white male suffrage had become almost universal. The shift from appointive to elective offices was most dramatic in the case of the judiciary. Until 1846, only a few states had elective judgeships of any kind, and only in Mississippi were all judges elected. In that year both New York and Iowa followed the Mississippi example, and then the rush began. By 1861, twenty-four of the thirty-four states had written the election of judges into their constitutions, though in five of them the change did not extend to their supreme courts.

The antebellum state constitutions, like those written earlier, were primarily constructive. They established or redesigned systems of government and endowed them with appropriate powers. But in many there was also a conspicuous strain of negativism, reflecting disillusionment with state government and a determination to curb extravagance, corruption, and favoritism. Notably, the framers often placed new restrictions on legislative authority, particularly with reference to public finance, banks, and corporations. These subjects were political issues, of course, but then every CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION became to some extent a party battle. As a rule, Democrats were more hostile than their opponents to corporate enterprise and government promotion of it. Attitudes varied according to local circumstances, however, and much depended upon which party in the state had the upper hand at the time. The states of the Old Northwest, where prodigal internal improvement policies in the 1830s had proved disastrous, were especially emphatic in their restraint of legislative power. Their new constitutions approved in the years 1848–1851 forbade state investment in private enterprise and put strict limits on public indebtedness. They also restricted banking in various ways, such as ordering double liability for stockholders, prohibiting the suspension of specie payments, and requiring that any general banking act must be submitted to a popular REFERENDUM.

State constitutional change occurred in many ways and resulted from the work of many hands, including those of voters, convention delegates, legislators, governors, and judges. Appellate courts particularly often shaped or reshaped the fundamental law in the course of performing their routine duties, although JUDICIAL REVIEW of state legislation by state courts was a fairly rare occurrence until after the Civil War. Despite all the constitutional activity, innovation was by no means the dominant mode in the antebellum period. States borrowed much from one another, and old forms were sometimes retained well beyond the limits of their appropriateness. Vermont in 1860 still had its quaint Council of Revision, elected every seven years to examine the condition of the constitution and propose amendments. North Carolina had not yet given its governor a veto power, and in South Carolina, the legislature continued to choose the state's presidential electors. Yet the new problems of the age did encourage some experimentation. For example, certain states had begun to develop the quasi-judicial regulatory commission as an extra branch of government, and framers of the Kansas constitution in 1859 introduced the item veto, a device that most states would eventually adopt.

Although federal and state constitutional development proceeded in more or less separate grooves, the fundamental constitutional problem of the age was the relation between the nation and its constituent parts. The problem had been present and intermittently urgent since the birth of the republic, but after 1846 it became associated much more than ever before with the interrelated issues of slavery and expansion and with the dynamics of party politics.

In the federal system established by the Constitution, the national government and the state governments were each supreme within their respective spheres. This principle of DUAL FEDERALISM, even though it accorded rather well with the actual structure and distribution of governmental power in antebellum America, was by no means universally accepted as a true design of the Republic. Nationalists like Webster and Lincoln asserted the primacy of the nation, the sovereignty of its people, and the perpetuity of the Union. Sectionalists like Calhoun and Davis lodged sovereignty with the states, insisted upon strict construction of federal authority, and viewed the Union as a compact that could be abrogated. Logical consistency was not a characteristic of the intersectional debate, however. Both proslavery and antislavery forces invoked federal power and appealed to states' rights whenever either strategy suited their purposes. With regard to the recovery of fugitive slaves, for instance, Southerners demanded expansion and vigorous use of national authority, while the resistance to that authority of some northern state officials amounted to a revival of nullification. (See UNION, THEORIES OF THE.)

Most Americans agreed that slavery was a state institution, but from that premise they drew conflicting inferences. In the radical antislavery view of SALMON P. CHASE, the institution had no standing beyond the bounds of slave-state JURISDICTION, and the federal government had no constitutional power to establish it, protect it, or even acknowledge its legal existence. In short, slavery was local and freedom national. (See ABOLITIONIST CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY. ) According to Calhoun, however, the federal government, as the mere agent of the states, was constitutionally obligated to give slavery as much protection as it gave any other kind of property recognized by state law. Only the sovereign power of a state could restrict or abolish the institution. In short, slavery was national and antislavery the local exception.

The practice of the United States government over the years ran closer to Calhoun's theory than to Chase's. All three branches recognized property rights in slaves and extended aid of some kind to their masters. Congress went beyond the requirements of the Constitution in making the recovery of fugitive slaves a federal business, and under congressional rule the national capital became a slave state in miniature, complete with a slave code, whipping posts, and a thriving slave trade. The image of the nation consistently presented in diplomatic relations was that of a slaveholding republic. With a persistence amounting to dedication, the Department of State sought compensation for owners of slaves escaping to foreign soil, and repeatedly it tried to secure Canadian cooperation in the return of fugitives. In the Dred Scott decision, Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY laid down the one-sided rule that the federal government had no power over slavery except "the power coupled with the duty of guarding and protecting the owner in his rights."

To be sure, national authority was also used for antislavery purposes. In outlawing the foreign slave trade, Congress plainly acted within the letter and intent of the Constitution. In prohibiting slavery throughout much of the Western territory, however, the lawmakers probably drew as much sanction from the example of the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE as from the somewhat ambiguous passage in Article IV, section 3, that seemed to be relevant—namely, "The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States." By 1840, such prohibition had been enacted in six territorial organic acts, as well as in the Missouri Compromise. Furthermore, Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY V. CANTER (1828) had given the territory clause a broad construction. In legislating for the TERRITORIES, he declared, "Congress exercises the combined powers of the general and of a State government." Since the authority of a state government to establish or abolish slavery was generally acknowledged, Marshall's words seemed to confirm Congress in possession of the same authority within the territories.

The constitutionality of legislation excluding slavery from federal territory did not become a major issue in American public life until after introduction of the WILMOT PROVISO in 1846. Although the question had arisen at times during the Missouri controversy of 1819–1820, the famous 36°30' restriction had been approved without extensive discussion and with the support of a majority of southern congressmen. The subject had arisen again during the 1830s, but only as a secondary and academic consideration in the debate over abolitionist attacks upon slavery in the District of Columbia. As a practical matter, the Missouri Compromise had presumably disposed of the problem by reviving and extending a policy of having two different policies, one on each side of a dividing line. North of that line (first the Ohio River and then 36°30'), slavery was prohibited; south of the line, slavery was permitted if desired by the white inhabitants.

In the summer of 1846, with Texas annexed and admitted to statehood, with title to Oregon secured by treaty, and with the war against Mexico under way, the United States found itself engaged in territorial expansion on a grand scale. Texas entered the Union as a slaveholding state, and Oregon was generally understood to be free soil, but what about New Mexico and California, if they should be acquired by conquest? To many Americans, including President Polk, the obvious answer seemed to be extending the Missouri Compromise line to the Pacific Ocean. But the issue arose at a time when sectional antagonism had been inflamed by a decade of quarreling over abolitionist petitions, the GAG RULE, and the Texas question. Furthermore, whereas the 36°30' line had meant partial abolition in a region previously open to slavery, extension of the line through New Mexico and California would have meant a partial rescinding of the abolition already achieved there by Mexican law. So David Wilmot's proposal to forbid slavery in any territory that might be acquired from Mexico won the overwhelming approval of northern congressmen when it was introduced in the House of Representatives on August 8, 1846. Southerners were even more united and emphatic in their opposition; for the Proviso would have completed the exclusion of slaveholders from all the newly acquired land in the Far West. Such injustice, they warned, could not fail to end in disunion.

The Proviso principle of "no more slave territory" quickly became the premier issue in American politics and remained so for almost fifteen years. Virtually the raison d'être of the Free Soil and Republican parties, the principle was rejected by Congress in 1850 and again in 1854, deprived of its legitimacy by the Supreme Court in 1857, and supported by less than forty percent of the electorate in the presidential contest of 1860. Yet forty percent proved sufficient to put a Republican in the White House and thereby precipitate SECESSION. During those years of intermittent sectional crisis from 1846 to 1861, the Southerners and northern conservatives who controlled government policy sought desperately and sometimes discordantly for a workable alternative to the Proviso. One thing that complicated their task was the growing tendency of all elements in the controversy to constitutionalize their arguments.

Southerners especially felt the need for constitutional sanction, partly because of their vulnerability as a minority section but also in order to offset the moral advantage of the antislavery forces. It was not enough to denounce the Proviso as unfair; they must also prove it to be unconstitutional despite the string of contrary precedents running back to the venerated Northwest Ordinance. One way of doing so was to invoke the Fifth Amendment, arguing that any congressional ban on slavery in the territories amounted to deprivation of property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW. But this argument, though used from time to time and incorporated rather vaguely in Taney's Dred Scott opinion, did not become a significant part of anti-Proviso strategy. For one thing, the Fifth Amendment had another cutting edge, antislavery in its effect. Free Soilers and Republicans could and did maintain that slavery was illegal in federal territory because it amounted to deprivation of liberty without due process of law.

More in keeping with the strict constructionism generally favored by Southerners was the principle of "nonintervention," that is, congressional nonaction with respect to slavery in the territories. Actually, nonintervention had been government policy in part of the West ever since 1790, always with the effect of establishing slavery. But in earlier years the policy had been given little theoretical underpinning. Then, after the introduction of the Wilmot Proviso, there were strenuous efforts to convert nonintervention into a constitutional imperative. The emerging argument ignored Marshall's opinion in American Insurance Company v. Canter and held that the territory clause of the Constitution referred only to disposal of public land. In providing government for a territory, Congress could do nothing more than what was absolutely necessary to prepare the territory for statehood. That did not include either the prohibition or the establishment of slavery. Thus nonintervention became a doctrine of federal incapacity. It left open, however, the question of what authority prevailed in the absence of congressional power. One answer, associated with Calhoun, was that property rights in slavery were silently legitimized in every territory by the direct force of the Constitution. Another answer, associated with Lewis Cass and Douglas, was that nonintervention meant leaving the question of slavery to be decided by the local territorial population. The latter theory, given the name POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY, had the advantage of seeming to be in tune with the spirit of Jacksonian democracy.

Thus, by 1848, when American acquisition of New Mexico and California was confirmed in the TREATY OF GUADALUPE HIDALGO, four distinct solutions to the problem of slavery in the territories had emerged. At one political extreme was the free soil doctrine requiring enactment of the Wilmot Proviso. At the other extreme was the Calhoun property rights doctrine legitimizing slavery in all federal territory by direct force of the Constitution. Between them were two formulas of compromise: extension of the 3630 line and the principle of popular sovereignty. Presumably the choice rested with Congress, but the constitutionalizing of the argument opened up another possibility—that of leaving the status of slavery in the territories to judicial determination. Legislation facilitating referral of the question to the Supreme Court was proposed in 1848 and incorporated in the historic set of compromise measures enacted two years later. The COMPROMISE OF 1850 admitted California as a free state, but for the rest of the Mexican Cession it adopted the principle of nonintervention. The effect was to reject the 3630 and Proviso solutions while leaving the field still open to popular sovereignty, the property rights doctrine, and judicial disposition.

Although neither of the major parties took a formal stand on the territorial question in the elections of 1848 and 1852, it was the Democrats who became closely associated with the principle of nonintervention. Cass, their presidential nominee in 1848, declared that Congress lacked the power to prohibit slavery in the territories and that the territorial inhabitants should be left free to regulate their internal concerns in their own way. This seemed to endorse popular sovereignty as the appropriate corollary to nonintervention, but for about a decade the Democratic party managed to invest both terms with enough ambiguity to accommodate both its northern and southern wings. More specifically, Southerners found that they could assimilate popular sovereignty to their own purposes by viewing it as the right of a territorial population to accept or reject slavery at the time of admission to statehood. That would presumably leave the Calhoun doctrine operative during the territorial period. At the same time, northern Democrats like Douglas went on believing that popular sovereignty meant the right of a territorial legislature to make all decisions regarding slavery, within the limits of the Constitution. The Whigs failed to achieve any such convenient doctrinal ambiguity, and that failure may have contributed to the disintegration of their party.

In 1854, a heavily Democratic Congress organized the territories of Kansas and Nebraska, repealing the antislavery restriction of the Missouri Compromise and substituting the principle of nonintervention. "The true intent and meaning of this act," the measure declared, "[is] not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." This passage, since it could be interpreted to mean either the northern or the southern brand of popular sovereignty, preserved the ambiguity so necessary for Democratic unity. But of course the Kansas-Nebraska Act, by removing a famous barrier to slavery, provoked a storm of anger throughout the free states and set off a political revolution.

The crisis of the late 1850s was in one respect a confrontation between the emerging Republican party and the increasingly united South—that is, between the Wilmot Proviso and the principles of Calhoun. Yet it was also a struggle within the Democratic party over the meaning of nonintervention and popular sovereignty. The Dred Scott decision in March 1857 cleared the air and intensified the crisis. In ruling that Congress had no power to prohibit slavery in the territories, the Supreme Court officially constitutionalized the principle of nonintervention and virtually rendered illegal the main purpose of the Republican party. But Chief Justice Taney went further and disqualified the northern Democratic version of popular sovereignty. If Congress had no such power over slavery, he declared, then neither did a territorial legislature. Douglas responded with his FREEPORT DOCTRINE, insisting that a territorial government, by unfriendly legislation, could effectively exclude slavery, no matter what the Court might decide to the contrary. Southern Democrats, in turn, demanded federal protection of slavery in the territories, and on that issue the party split at its national convention in 1860.

By 1860 it had become apparent that slavery was not taking root in Kansas or in any other western territory. Yet when secession began after Lincoln's election, the efforts at reconciliation concentrated on the familiar territorial problem. The centerpiece of the abortive Crittenden compromise was an amendment reviving and extending the 3630 line, so recently outlawed by the Supreme Court. This continued fascination with an essentially empty issue was not so foolish as it now may seem; for the territorial question had obviously taken on enormous symbolic meaning. Because of the almost universal agreement that slavery in the states was untouchable by the federal government, the territories had come to be the limited battleground of a fierce and fundamental struggle. Thus the sectional conflict of the 1850s, whatever its origins and whatever its substance, was decisively shaped by constitutional considerations.

DON E. FEHRENBACHER
(1986)

Bibliography

BESTOR, ARTHUR 1961 State Sovereignty and Slavery: A Reinterpretation of Proslavery Constitutional Doctrine, 1846–1860. Illinois State Historical Society Journal 54:117–80.

DEALEY, JAMES QUAYLE 1915 Growth of American State Constitutions. Boston: Ginn & Co.

FEHRENBACHER, DON E. 1978 The Dred Scott Case: Its Significance in American Law and Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

PARKINSON, GEORGE PHILLIP, JR. 1972 "Antebellum State Constitution-Making: Retention, Circumvention, Revision." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Wisconsin.

POTTER, DAVID M. 1976 The Impending Crisis, 1848–1861. Completed and edited by Don E. Fehrenbacher. New York: Harper & Row.

WHITE, LEONARD D. 1954 The Jacksonians: A Study in Administrative History, 1829–1861. New York: Macmillan.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1861–1865

If expediency and ideology ordinarily conflict with the constitutionalist desire for procedural regularity and limitations on government, in time of war they pose a fundamental challenge to CONSTITUTIONALISM and the RULE OF LAW. The first fact to be observed about the constitutional history of the CIVIL WAR, therefore, is that the federal Constitution, as in the prewar period, served as both a symbol and a source of governmental legitimacy and as a normative standard for the conduct of politics. Because the rule of the Constitution continued without interruption, it is easy to overlook the pressures that the war generated to institute a regime based exclusively on necessity and the public safety. To be sure, considerations of public safety entered into wartime constitutionalism, and there were those who believed passionately that the Union government in the years 1861 to 1865 did indeed cast aside the Constitution and resort to arbitrary rule. Yet, considered from either a comparative or a strictly American perspective, this judgment is untenable. The record abundantly demonstrates the persistence of constitutional controversy in Congress, in the executive branch, in the courts, and in the forum of public opinion—evidence that the nation's organic law was taken seriously in time of war, even if it was not applied in the same manner as in time of peace. Indeed, a constitutionalizing impulse may be said to have manifested itself in the business of warfare itself. General Order No. 100 for the government of Union armies in the field, promulgated by President ABRAHAM LINCOLN in 1863, was an attempt to limit the destructiveness of modern war that had resulted from developments in weaponry and from the emergence of other aspects of total war.

The most important constitutional question resolved by the events of the war concerned the nature of the Union. (See THEORIES OF THE UNION.) The Framers of the Constitution had created a mixed regime that in some respects resembled a confederation of autonomous states and in others a centralized unitary government. Its distinguishing feature—the chief characteristic of American FEDERALISM—was the division of SOVEREIGNTY between the federal government and the state governments. In constitutional law several decisions of the Supreme Court under Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL had confirmed this dual-sovereignty system; yet periodically it was questioned by political groups who insisted that the Union was simply a league of sovereign states, and that the federal government possessed no sovereignty whatsoever except as the agent of the states. From 1846 to 1860 defenders of slavery asserted this state-sovereignty theory of the Union; although they never secured a congressional majority for the theory, they did force northern Democrats to adopt positions that virtually abandoned any claim to federal sovereignty in matters concerning slavery. The SECESSION policy of President JAMES BUCHANAN, which regarded secession as illegal but nonetheless tolerated the existence of the newly forming Confederate States of America, signified the constitutional and political bankruptcy of Democratic DUAL FEDERALISM and the practical repudiation of federal sovereignty.

The constitutional results of the Civil War must be measured against the effective triumph of proslavery state sovereignty which permitted the disintegration of the Union in 1860–1861. Northern victory in the war established federal sovereignty in political fact and in public policy, and by the same token repudiated the state-sovereignty theory of the Union. From the standpoint of constitutional law, this result vindicated the divided-sovereignty concept of federalism asserted in the early national period. From the standpoint of federal-state relations in the field of public policy, the war produced a significant centralizing trend, evident principally in military recruitment and organization, internal security, the regulation of personal liberty and CIVIL RIGHTS, and the determination of national economic policy.

The changes in federalism produced by the war have usually been described—sometimes in almost apocalyptic terms—as the destruction of STATES' RIGHTS and the old federal Union and their replacement by a centralized sovereign nation. In fact, however, the changes in federal-state relations that occurred between 1861 and 1865 did not seriously erode or alter the decentralized constitutional system and political culture of the United States. The centralizing of policy was based on military need rather than the appeal of a new unitary constitutional model, and it was of limited scope and duration. In no comprehensive way did the federal government become supreme over the states, nor were states' rights obliterated either in law or in policy. The theoretical structure of American federalism, as explicated by John Marshall, persisted; the actual distribution of power between the states and the federal government, the result of policy struggles on questions raised by the war, was different.

Perhaps the best way to describe the change in federalism that occurred during the Civil War is to say that after a long period of disinclination to use the constitutional powers assigned to it, the federal government began to act like an authentic sovereign state. Foremost among its achievements was the raising of armies and the providing and maintaining of a navy for the defense of the nation.

At the start of the war the decision to resist secession was made by the federal government, but the task of raising a military force fell largely upon the states. The regular United States Army, at approximately 16,000 men, was inadequate for the government's military needs, and federal authorities were as yet unprepared to call for United States volunteers. To meet the emergency it was necessary to rely on the militia, a form of military organization that, while subject to national service, was chiefly a state institution. Accordingly President Lincoln on April 15, 1861, acting under the Militia Act of 1795, issued a call to the state governors to provide 75,000 militia for three months of national service. By August 1861, in pursuance of additional presidential requests, the War Department had enrolled almost 500,000 men for three years' duty. Yet, although carried out under federal authority, the actual recruiting of troops and to a considerable extent their preparation for combat were done by the state governors, acting as a kind of war ministry for the nation.

This arrangement did not last long. Within a year declining popular enthusiasm and the utility of centralized administrative management severely impeded state recruiting efforts and led to greater federal control. Eventually national CONSCRIPTION was adopted. Congress took a half-way step toward this policy in the Militia Act of July 1862, authorizing the President, in calling the militia into national service, to make all necessary rules and regulations for doing so where state laws were defective or inadequate. Under this statute a draft was planned by the War Department, to be enforced by provost marshals nominated by state governors and appointed by the department. Political resistance in the states prevented implementation of this plan. At length, in the Enrollment Act of March 1863, Congress instituted an exclusively national system of conscription. Directed at male citizens ages twenty to forty-five and foreigners who declared their intention to become citizens, the draft law omitted all reference to the state militia. Conscription was to be enforced by federal provost marshals under a Provost Marshal General, operating under an administrative structure organized according to congressional districts. The Civil War draft, which permitted substitutes and money commutation, aroused widespread and often violent opposition and was directly responsible for inducting only six percent of the total Union military force. Nevertheless, it proved to be a decisive constitutional precedent on which the federal government relied in meeting its manpower needs in the wars of the twentieth century. (See SELECTIVE SERVICE ACTS.)

Closely related to the raising of armies was the task of maintaining internal security on the home front against the treasonable and disloyal acts of persons interfering with the war effort. In this sphere too the Union government exercised previously unused powers, asserting an unwonted sovereignty in local affairs that challenged the states' exclusive power to regulate civil and political liberty.

The law against TREASON, the elements of which had been defined in the Constitution, was the most formidable instrument for protecting national security outside the theater of war. Yet in its various manifestations—the Treason Act of 1790 requiring the death penalty and the Seditious Conspiracies Act of 1861 and the treason provisions of the CONFISCATION ACT of 1862 imposing less severe penalties—it was inapplicable in the South as long as federal courts could not operate there. It was also unsuited to the task of containing the less than treasonable activities of Confederate sympathizers and opponents of the war in the North. Loyalty oaths were a second internal security measure. The third, and by far the most important, component of Union internal security policy was military detention of persons suspected of disloyal activities, suspension of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS, and the imposition of martial law.

In April 1861 and on several occasions thereafter, President Lincoln authorized military commanders in specific areas to arrest and deny the writ of habeas corpus to persons engaging in or suspected of disloyal practices, such as interfering with troop movements or discouraging enlistments. In September 1862 the President issued a general proclamation that such persons were liable to trial by military commission or court-martial. Initially the State Department supervised civilian arrests made by secret service agents, federal marshals, and military officers. In February 1862 the War Department assumed responsibility for this practice and created a commission to examine the causes of arrests and provide for the release of persons deemed to be political prisoners. Congress further shaped internal security policy in the HABEAS CORPUS ACT of March 1863, requiring the secretaries of war and state to provide lists of prisoners to federal courts for GRAND JURY consideration. If no indictment for violation of federal law should be forthcoming, a prisoner was to be released upon taking an oath of allegiance.

The Union government arrested approximately 18,000 civilians, almost all of whom were released after brief detention for precautionary rather than punitive purposes. The policy was extremely controversial, however, for what Unionists might consider a precaution to prevent interference with the war effort could easily be regarded by others as punishment for political dissent. Evaluation of internal security policy depended upon conflicting interpretations of CIVIL LIBERTIES guarantees under the Constitution, and differing perceptions of what critics and opponents of the government were in reality doing. As with conscription, however, there was no denying that internal security measures had a significant impact on federal-state relations.

In carrying out this policy the federal government for the first time intervened significantly in local regulation of civil and political liberty. Not only did the federal government make arbitrary or irregular arrests but it also temporarily suspended the publication of many newspapers. Not surprisingly, considering the traditional exclusivity of state power over civil liberty and the partisan context in which the internal security question was debated, the states resisted this extension of federal authority. In several states persons adversely affected by internal security measures, or by enforcement of federal laws and orders concerning conscription, trade restrictions, internal revenue, or emancipation, initiated litigation charging federal officers with violations of state law, such as false arrest, unlawful seizure, kidnaping, assault, and battery. Under prewar federalism no general recourse was available to national officials involved as defendants in state litigation of this sort. Congress remedied this defect, however, in the Habeas Corpus Act of 1863.

The 1863 act provided that orders issued by the President or under his authority should be a defense in all courts against any civil or criminal prosecution for any search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment undertaken in pursuance of such an order. The law further authorized the removal of litigation against national officers from state to federal courts, and it imposed a two-year limit on the initiation of such litigation. On only two previous occasions, in 1815 and 1833 in response to state interference with customs collection, had Congress given protection for federal officers acting under authority of a specific statute by permitting removal of litigation from state to federal courts. The Habeas Corpus Act of 1863, by contrast, protected actions taken under any federal law or EXECUTIVE ORDER. Critics argued that the law gave immunity rather than indemnity, denied citizens judicial remedies for wrongs done by the government, and usurped state power. The logic of even a circumscribed national sovereignty demanded some means of protection against state JURISDICTION, however, and during reconstruction Congress extended the removal remedy and the federal judiciary upheld its constitutionality. The wartime action marked an important extension of federal jurisdiction that made the national government, at least in time of national security crisis, more able to compete with the states in the regulation of civil liberty.

The most novel and in the long run probably the most important exercise of federal sovereignty during the Civil War led directly to the abolition of slavery and the protection of personal liberty and civil rights by the national government. No constitutional rule was more firmly established than that which prohibited federal interference with slavery in the states that recognized it. The outbreak of hostilities did not abrogate this rule, but it did create the possibility that, under the war power, the federal government might emancipate slaves for military purposes. After prohibiting slavery where it could under its peacetime constitutional authority (in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA and in the TERRITORIES), Congress struck at slavery in the Confederacy itself. In the Confiscation Act of 1862, it declared "forever free" slaves belonging to persons in rebellion, those who were captured, or who came within Union army lines. Executive interference with slavery went considerably farther. After trying unsuccessfully in 1862 to persuade loyal slaveholding states to accept a federally sponsored plan for gradual, compensated emancipation to be carried out by the states themselves, Lincoln undertook military emancipation. In the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION of January 1, 1863, he declared the freedom of all slaves in states still in rebellion and pledged executive-branch protection of freedmen's personal liberty.

Federal power over personal liberty was further made manifest in the work of local police regulation undertaken by Union armies as they advanced into southern territory. All persons in occupied areas were affected by the rule of federal military commanders, and none more so than freed or escaped slaves. From the first incursions of national force in May 1861, War and Treasury Department officials protected blacks' personal liberty, provided for their most pressing welfare needs in refugee camps, and assisted their assimilation into free society by organizing their labor on abandoned plantations and by recruiting them into the army. In March 1865 Congress placed emancipation-related federal police regulation on a more secure footing by creating the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands. Authorized to control all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen for a period of one year after the end of the war, the FREEDMEN'S BUREAU throughout 1865 established courts to protect freedmen's personal liberty and civil rights, in the process superseding the states in their most traditional and jealously guarded governmental function.

Federal emancipation measures, based on the war power, did not accomplish the permanent abolition of slavery as it was recognized in state laws and constitutions. To accomplish this momentous change, and the invasion of state power that it signified, amendment of the Constitution was necessary. Accordingly, Congress in January 1865 approved for submission to the states a constitutional amendment prohibiting slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, in the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction. Section 2 of the amendment gave Congress authority to enforce the prohibition by appropriate legislation.

Controversy surrounded this terse, seemingly straightforward, yet rather delphic pronouncement, which became part of the Constitution in December 1865. Though it appeared to be a legitimate exercise of the amending power under Article V, Democrats argued that the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT was a wrongful use of that power because it invaded state jurisdiction over local affairs, undermining the sovereign power to fix the status of all persons within a state's borders and thus destroying the unspoken premise on which the Constitution and the government had been erected in 1787. The Republican framers of the amendment for their part were uncertain about the scope and effect of the guarantee of personal liberty that they would write into the nation's organic law. At the least, the amendment prohibited chattel slavery, or property in people; many of its supporters believed it also secured the full range of civil rights appurtenant to personal liberty that distinguished a free republican society. No determination of this question was required in order to send the amendment to the states, however, and when a year later the precise scope of the guarantees provided and congressional enforcement power became issues in reconstruction, more detailed and specific measures, such as the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, were deemed necessary. Constitutionally speaking, the Thirteenth Amendment played a minor role in reconstruction.

The federal government further exercised sovereignty characteristic of a nation-state in the sphere of economic policy. This development raised few questions of constitutional propriety; the instruments for accomplishing it lay ready to hand in the ALEXANDER HAMILTON-John Marshall doctrines of BROAD CONSTRUCTION and IMPLIED POWERS. These doctrines had fallen into desuetude in the Jacksonian era, when mercantilist-minded state governments effectively determined economic policy. The exodus of Southerners from the national government in 1861 altered the political balance, however, and Republicans in control of the wartime Congress seized the opportunity to adopt centralizing economic legislation. They raised the tariff for protective purposes, authorized construction of a transcontinental railway, facilitated settlement on the public domain (HOMESTEAD ACT), provided federal aid to higher education (MORRILL ACT), established a uniform currency, asserted federal control over the nation's banking institutions, and taxed the American people in innovative ways (income tax, DIRECT TAX). These measures laid the foundation for increasing federal ECONOMIC REGULATION in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Yet they did not make the determination of economic policy an exclusively national function. In this field, as in civil rights, the federal government's acquisition of a distinct and substantial share of sovereignty diminished, but by no means obliterated, state power.

As the federal government gained power relative to the states during the war, so within the SEPARATION OF POWERS structure of the national government the executive expanded its authority relative to the other branches. Lincoln was the instrument of this constitutional change. Unlike his predecessor Buchanan, Lincoln was willing to acknowledge the necessity of an inflexible defense of the Union during the secession crisis, and after the bombardment of Fort Sumter he acted swiftly and unhesitatingly to commit the nation to arms.

To raise a fighting force Lincoln called the state militia into national service, ordered—without authority from Congress—a 40,000-man increase in the regular army and navy, requested 42,000 volunteers, and proclaimed a blockade of ports in the seceded states. He also instituted the main elements of the internal security program previously described, closed the postal service to treasonable correspondence, directed that $2,000,000 be paid out of the federal treasury, and pledged the credit of the United States for $250,000,000. Lincoln did all this without congressional authority, but not without regard for Congress. Ordering the militia into national service, he called Congress into session to meet in mid-summer. Directing the enlargement of the army and navy, he said he would submit these actions to Congress. He did so, and Congress voted approval of the President's military orders, "as if they had been done under the previous express authority and direction of the Congress." Thereafter Lincoln was ever mindful of the lawmaking branch, and in some respects deferential to it. Yet in war-related matters he continued to take unilateral actions. Thus he proclaimed martial law, suspended habeas corpus, suppressed newspaper publication, issued orders for the conduct of armies in the field, ordered slave emancipation, and directed the political reorganization of occupied southern states.

How could these extraordinary actions be rationalized under the nation's organic law? The question aroused bitter controversy at the time, giving rise to charges of dictatorship which continued to find echo in scholarly debate. No more penetrating analysis of the problem has ever been offered than that presented by Lincoln himself.

In his message to Congress of July 4, 1861, Lincoln said his actions were required by "public necessity" and "popular demand." Referring to suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, he stated that if he violated "some single law," his doing so was justified on the ground that it would save the government." "[A]re all the laws, but one, to go unexecuted, and the government itself go to pieces, lest that one be violated?" he asked. On another occasion Lincoln posed the question whether it was possible to lose the nation and yet preserve the Constitution. "By general law life and limb must be protected," he reasoned, "yet often a limb must be amputated to save a life; but a life is never wisely given to save a limb." This appears to mean that the Constitution might be set aside, as a limb is amputated, to save the life of the nation. The inference can be drawn that emergency action, while expedient, is unconstitutional.

What is required to understand the lawfulness of the emergency measures in question, however, is not legalistic analysis of the constitutional text but rather consideration of the fundamental relationship between the nation and the Constitution. Lincoln's principal argument was that the steps taken to defend the government were constitutional because the Constitution implicitly sanctioned its own preservation. The Constitution in this view was not a mere appendage of the living nation or a derivative expression or reflection of national life, as a legal code might be considered to be. Coeval and in an ultimate political sense coterminous with it, the Constitution was the nation. This conception is present in Lincoln's statement of April 1864 that "measures, otherwise unconstitutional, might become lawful, by becoming indispensable to the preservation of the constitution, through the preservation of the nation." "Is there," he asked in his message of July 1861, "in all republics, this inherent and fatal weakness? Must a government, of necessity, be too strong for the liberties of its own people, or too weak to maintain its own existence?" Not that Lincoln conceded to his critics at the level of positivistic, text-based constitutional argument. Concerning habeas corpus suspension, for example, he tenaciously insisted that as the Constitution did not specify who might exercise this power, he was justified in doing so when Congress was not in session. Congress, in fact, subsequently ratified Lincoln's suspension of habeas corpus. Although his argument conformed to the requirements of American constitutional politics, his principal justification of emergency actions was that they were necessary to preserve the substance of political liberty, which was the end both of the Constitution and the Union.

It is sometimes said that Lincoln established in American public law the principle of constitutional dictatorship. Yet at no time did Lincoln exercise unlimited power. The notion of constitutional dictatorship also obscures the fact that although Lincoln applied military power on a far wider scale than previous Presidents, in doing so he merely accelerated a tendency toward expansion of the executive's defensive war-making capability. In 1827 the Supreme Court, in MARTIN V. MOTT, had upheld the President's power under the Militia Act of 1795 to call out the militia (and by extension the army and navy) in the event of actual or imminent invasion. President JAMES K. POLK had used this defensive war-making power to commit the nation to war against Mexico, and Presidents Millard Fillmore and Franklin Pierce had employed military force in circumstances that could have led to wars with foreign states. In his exercise of executive power Lincoln merely widened a trail blazed by his predecessors.

Yet in minor matters unrelated to the war, emancipation, and reconstruction, Lincoln was a passive President. Although as party leader he made effective use of his patronage powers, he did little to influence congressional legislation aside from formal suggestions in annual messages. Moreover he exercised the veto sparingly, gave broad latitude to his department heads, and made little use of the cabinet for policymaking purposes. Lincoln's respect for legislative independence complemented and encouraged another important nineteenth-century constitutional trend—the strengthening of congressional power.

To an extent that is difficult to appreciate in the late twentieth century, nineteenth-century government was preeminently legislative in nature. Lawmakers shaped public policy, resolved constitutional controversies through debate and legislation, controlled the TAXING AND SPENDING process, and exercised significant influence over administration. The years between the presidencies of THOMAS JEFFERSON and ANDREW JACKSON had been a period of legislative assertiveness, and although the struggle over slavery had brought Congress to near-paralysis, still the political foundation existed for wartime exertions of power that anticipated the era of congressional government during and after reconstruction.

Although Congress approved Lincoln's emergency measures in 1861, its action by no means signified general deference to executive power. On the contrary, reciting constitutional provisions that gave Congress power to declare war and regulate the military establishment, members made vigorous claim to exercise the WAR POWER. Accordingly, they raised men and supplies for the war, attempted through the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War to influence military strategy, modified internal security policy, and enacted laws authorizing confiscation, emancipation, and reconstruction. The need for party unity notwithstanding, the Republican majority in Congress insisted on civilian control over the military, monitored executive department administration, and, in an unusual maneuver in December 1862, even tried to force a change in the cabinet. Tighter internal organization and operational procedures made Congress more powerful as well as more efficient during the war. The speaker of the House, for example, assumed greater control over committee memberships and the flow of legislative business; the party caucus became a more frequent determinant of legislative behavior; and standing committees and their chairmen enjoyed enhanced prestige and influence, gradually superseding select committees as the key agencies for accomplishing legislative tasks. Exercising power conferred by statute in 1857 to punish recalcitrant or uncooperative witnesses, Congress used its investigative authority to extend its governmental grasp.

In the 1930s and 1940s, Civil War historiography regarded conflict between a radical-dominated Congress and the soberly conservative Lincoln administration as the central political struggle of the war. Recent research has shown, however, that disagreement between the Democratic and Republican parties was more significant in shaping the course of political and constitutional events than was the radical versus moderate tension within the Republican party. Conflict occurred between the executive and legislative branches, as much as a result of institutional rivalry inherent in the structure of separated powers as of programmatic differences. Congressional-presidential relations were not notably more strained than they have been in other American wars. Although Lincoln demonstrated the potentially vast power inherent in the presidency, his wartime actions did not measurably extend the executive office beyond the sphere of crisis government. He evinced no tendency toward the so-called stewardship conception of the presidency advanced by THEODORE ROOSEVELT in the early twentieth century. The power of Congress waxed, its wartime achievements in policymaking and internal organization providing a solid basis for a subsequent era of congressional government.

A significant portion of American constitutional history from 1861 to 1865 occurred south of the Potomac, where were manifested many of the same problems and tendencies that appeared in the wartime experience of the United States government. The CONFEDERATE CONSTITUTION, modeled closely on that of the United States, revealed the most bitterly contested issues that had led to the war. It recognized and protected the right of slave property; proclaimed state sovereignty as the basis of the Confederacy; omitted the GENERAL WELFARE clause and the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER contained in the United States Constitution; stated that all federal power was expressly delegated; and prohibited a protective tariff and INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS appropriations. Yet the right of secession was not recognized, evidence that the Confederacy was intended to be a permanent government.

Confederate constitutional history was marked by war-induced centralization and conflicts between federal and state authority. The Confederate government conscripted soldiers; suspended the writ of habeas corpus and declared martial law; confiscated enemy property and seized for temporary use the property of its own citizens; taxed heavily and imposed tight controls on commerce and industry; and owned and operated munitions, mining, and clothing factories. These actions and policies aroused strong opposition as expressed in the rhetoric of states' rights and through the institutions of state government. Some governors refused to place their troops under the Confederacy's authority and challenged conscription and internal security measures. Many state judges granted writs of habeas corpus that interfered with military recruitment. Lack of effective leverage over the states seriously hampered the Confederate war effort.

The most significant difference between Union and Confederate constitutionalism centered on POLITICAL PARTIES. Driven by the desire to create national unity, Southerners eschewed political party organization as unnecessary and harmful. When political differences arose, they had to find resolution in the conflict-inducing methods of the system of states' rights. In the North, by contrast, political parties continued to compete, with beneficial results. Political disagreements between the government and its Democratic critics were kept within manageable bounds by the concept of a loyal opposition, while among members of the governing party differences were directed into policy alternatives. Moreover, party organization encouraged federal-state cooperation in the implementation of controversial measures like conscription, thus helping to minimize the centrifugal effects of federal organization. Indeed, the persistence of organized party competition, even in the critical year of 1864 when military success was uncertain and the Democratic party campaigned on a platform demanding a cessation of hostilities, was perhaps the most revealing fact in Civil War constitutional history. It showed that despite important changes in federal-state relations and reliance on techniques of emergency government, the American commitment to constitutionalism was firm, even amidst events that tested it most severely.

HERMAN BELZ
(1986)

Bibliography

BELZ, HERMAN 1978 Emancipation and Equal Rights: Politics and Constitutionalism in the Civil War Era. New York: Norton.

CURRY, LEONARD P. 1968 Blueprint for Modern America: Nonmilitary Legislation of the First Civil War Congress. Nashville, Tenn.: Vanderbilt University Press.

FEHRENBACHER, DON E. 1979 Lincoln and the Constitution. In Cullom Davis, ed., The Public and Private Lincoln: Contemporary Perspectives. Carbondale: University of Southern Illinois Press.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. 1973 A More Perfect Union: The Impact of the Civil War and Reconstruction on the Constitution. New York: Knopf.

MCKITRICK, ERIC 1967 Party Politics and the Union and Confederate War Efforts. In Walter Dean Burnham and William N. Chambers, eds., The American Party System: Stages of Political Development. New York: Free Press.

MCLAUGHLIN, ANDREW C. 1936 Lincoln, the Constitution, and Democracy. International Journal of Ethics 47:1–24.

RANDALL, JAMES G. (1926) 1951 Constitutional Problems under Lincoln, rev. ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

WEIGLEY, RUSSELL F. 1967 A History of the United States Army. New York: Macmillan.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1865–1877

The great political and constitutional issue of the period 1865–1877 was the RECONSTRUCTION of the Union after the CIVIL WAR. Reconstruction presented several closely related issues. There were issues involving the nature of the federal system. One of these arose even before the war ended: what was the constitutional relationship to the Union of the states that had attempted to secede? Another arose after the southern states were restored to normal relations: what powers did the national government retain to protect the rights of its citizens? There was the problem of defining the constitutional status of black Americans—a problem that finally forced Americans to define American CITIZENSHIP and the rights incident to it. Also, because the President and Congress disagreed on these issues, Reconstruction brought about a crisis in legislative-executive relations that culminated in the only impeachment of an American President. Finally, the Reconstruction controversy had a powerful effect upon Americans' conception of the proper role of government, laying the groundwork for the development of laissez-faire constitutionalism.

These issues would be adjusted in the context of the established party system. During the war, the Republican party worked diligently and fairly successfully to broaden its support. Renaming their organization the Union party, Republican leaders accepted as colleagues men who had been influential Democrats until the outbreak of war. In 1864 the party nominated Tennessee's Democratic former governor and senator, ANDREW JOHNSON, to the vice-presidency. Despite this, the Union party, which would revive the name Republican after the war, was the heir to the governmental activism of the old Federalist and Whig parties. Likewise Republicans inherited nationalist theories of the federal system. (See UNION, THEORIES OF THE.), The war confirmed and extended their distrust of STATES' RIGHTS doctrines; yet many Republicans would resist going too far in the direction of "consolidation" of the Union at the expense of traditional areas of state jurisdiction. On the other hand, the majority of Democrats had remained loyal to their party and its heritage of states' rights and small government. Naturally, the Reconstruction issue, which involved both questions, found the two parties ranged against one another.

Northerners faced a paradox when they considered the status of the Confederate states at war's end. They had denied that a state could leave the Union, but few wanted the same governments that had attempted secession to return as if nothing had happened. Only so-called Peace Democrats argued that the Union should be restored through negotiations between the Confederate state governments and the national government. Somehow, Republicans and War Democrats insisted, the national government must have power to secure some changes in the South and in the federal system before final restoration. As the war progressed, and especially in 1865 and 1866, when they were forced to grapple with the problem, Republicans propounded a variety of constitutional justi-fications for such power. Unlike Democrats, who insisted that state government had existed before the Union and independent of it, Republicans insisted that states could exist only in the Union and by virtue of their connection with it. Thus, by trying to secede, the southern states had committed STATE SUICIDE, in the graphic language of Senator CHARLES SUMNER; or, as other Republicans put it, they had "forfeited their rights." Given this view, there were several ways to justify national power over Southerners. Many Republicans argued that if Southerners now lacked state governments, Congress must restore them under the clause of the Constitution requiring the national government to guarantee a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT to each state. Moreover, in the 1849 case of LUTHER V. BORDEN the Supreme Court, citing this clause, had seemed to concede to the "political branches" of the government the power to recognize whether a state government was legitimate in case of doubt. The Court had held that the admission of state representatives to Congress was conclusive. With state governments defunct, Republicans argued, the Court's holding meant that the political branches of the national government would have final say about what government would be recognized as restored to the Union and when that recognition would take place. Implicit in this power was the authority to determine what sort of government would be acceptable.

But when some Republicans insisted that the GUARANTEE CLAUSE entitled the national government to require changes it believed necessary for states to be considered republican, most of their colleagues rebelled. Such an interpretation would give the national government power to modify "unrepublican" political and civil laws in states that had never left the Union.

Other Republicans found a safer source of power over states that had forfeited their rights: the national government had recovered control over the territory and citizens of the South through exercise of its WAR POWERS, which had overridded the peacetime provision of the Constitution that guaranteed citizens' and states' rights. The government could continue to hold Southerners in this "grasp of war" until they agreed to meet the government's conditions for the restoration of peace. On this theory, national power would be temporary, providing no precedent for intruding in states that had not been in rebellion.

Finally, other Republicans—those who wanted the most radical changes in southern society—argued that, having broken away from national authority de facto, the southern states were conquered provinces no different from any other newly acquired territory. Thus Southerners were subject to the direct control of the national government, which ought to provide ordinary territorial governments through which they could govern themselves under the revisory power of Congress. In this way the national government would retain authority to legislate directly for the South until new states were created there—establishing a public school system, for example, or confiscating the great landed estates and distributing them among the people as small farms. But this theory also seemed too radical for most Northerners, and most Republicans endorsed the more limited "grasp-of-war" doctrine.

Congress was adjourned in April and May 1865, as Lincoln was assassinated and the war ended. Lincoln's successor, the former Democrat Johnson, accepted the key elements of the WADE-DAVIS BILL developed during the war, but he followed Lincoln's policy of carrying it out under presidential authority, rather than calling Congress back into session to enact Reconstruction legislation. Johnson called for white, male voters in each southern state to elect a state constitutional convention as soon as fifty percent of them had taken a loyalty oath that would entitle them to AMNESTY. Thus blacks would have to depend on governments elected by whites for protection of life and property. The conventions were required to pronounce their states' SECESSION ordinances null and void, repudiate debts incurred by their Confederate state governments, and abolish slavery. Finally, the southern states would have to ratify the proposed THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, which abolished slavery throughout the land. Then the conventions could organize elections to ratify the new constitutions, elect state officials, and elect congressmen. By December 1865, as Congress reconvened, this process had been completed in most of the southern states and would soon be completed in the remainder.

At first Johnson was vague about his constitutional theory of Reconstruction, but as congressional opposition developed his supporters articulated a position that left little power to Congress. Secession had merely "suspended" the operation of legal governments in the South, they insisted. As COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the armed forces, the President had the duty under the government's war powers to reanimate state governments. War powers were inherently presidential, Johnson insisted. He had exercised them in such a way as to preserve the traditional federal system. Congress could do no more than exercise its constitutional power to "judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members" by deciding whether individual congressmen-elect were disqualified by their roles in the war; it could not deny REPRESENTATION to whole states. Gaining the support of northern Democrats for this states'-rights-oriented policy, Johnson set the stage for a bitter struggle over the relative powers of the branches of the national government.

A majority of congressmen might have acquiesced in the President's position had they been confident that loyalists would control the southern state governments or that the rights of the newly freed slaves would be respected there. However, it soon became apparent that the states were controlled by former rebels and that the rights of the freedmen would be severely circumscribed. Compounding the problem, the ex-Confederate-dominated South would increase its congressional representation now that slavery was abolished; the constitutional provision counting only three-fifths of the slave population would no longer apply. All this persuaded congressional Republicans to refuse immediate admission of southern state representatives to Congress and to seek a compromise with the President.

There were two thrusts to the congressional policy: protection of freedmen's rights and a new system of apportionment of representation in Congress. Most congressional leaders believed that the Thirteenth Amendment automatically conferred citizenship upon the freedmen when it abolished slavery. Moreover, the amendment's second section authorized Congress to pass legislation appropriate to enforce abolition. Republicans acted upon this understanding by passing a new FREEDMEN'S BUREAU bill, augmenting one passed during the war, and proposing the bill that became the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866. The first, a temporary measure justified under the war powers, authorized an Army bureau to supervise the transition from slave to free labor, protecting the rights and interests of the freedmen in the process. The second was designed to secure permanent protection for the freedmen in their basic rights. Few Republicans thought that Americans would accept so drastic a change in the federal system as to give Congress instead of the states the job of protecting people in their ordinary rights. Therefore they adopted the idea of leaving that job to the states but requiring them to treat all groups equally. At the same time, Republicans intended to require equality only in the protection of basic rights of citizenship. This goal forced them to define just what those rights were. So the Civil Rights Act declared all persons born in the United States, except Indians who did not pay taxes, to be citizens of the United States; it granted all citizens, regardless of race, the same basic rights as white citizens. What were these basic rights of citizenship? "To make and enforce contracts; to sue, be parties, and give evidence; to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property; and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property" and to "be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties." To secure these rights without centralizing power of ordinary legislation in Washington, the bill permitted citizens to remove legal cases from state to federal court jurisdiction in any state that did not end discrimination. (See CIVIL RIGHTS REMOVAL.) The idea was to force states to abolish RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in their own laws in order to preserve their jurisdictions. As its author explained, the act would "have no operation in any State where the laws are equal, where all persons have the same civil rights without regard to color or race."

At the same time Republicans prepared a fourteenth amendment to define citizenship and its rights; to change the way seats in Congress were apportioned, so as to reflect the number of voters rather than gross population; to disqualify leading Confederates from holding political office; and to guarantee payment of the United States debt while repudiating the Confederate debt. Congress was to have power to enforce this amendment, too, by "appropriate" legislation.

Republicans expected Johnson to endorse these measures, which after all did not attempt to replace the governments he had instituted in the South, and they expected Southerners to signify their acceptance of these "terms of peace" by ratifying the new amendment. However, Johnson insisted that the Republican program would revolutionize the federal system. He vetoed the legislation and urged Southerners to reject the proposed amendment. At the same time he attacked the Republicans bitterly. Republicans responded by passing the Civil Rights Act over Johnson's veto, enacting the new Freedman's Bureau Act, and sending the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to the states for RATIFICATION. To the voters, they stressed the moderation of their proposals, and Johnson's supporters were badly beaten in the congressional elections of 1866. Nonetheless, Southerners followed Johnson's advice and refused to ratify the amendment.

This refusal angered and frightened Republican congressmen. If the conflict drifted into stalemate, northern voters might tire of it and blame the Republicans for not completing restoration. Outraged at southern recalcitrance and Johnson's "betrayal," the Republicans passed new Reconstruction laws over his veto early in 1867. Designating Johnson's southern governments as temporary only, the Republicans instructed Southerners to begin the process anew. This time many leading Confederates would be disfranchised while the freedmen were permitted to vote. New state conventions would have to be elected to write new constitutions banning racial discrimination in civil and political rights. The voters would have to ratify these constitutions, and then newly elected state officials would have to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment. In 1869 the Republican Congress proposed to the states the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT, banning racial discrimination in voting; southern states that had not yet finished the process of being readmitted would be required to ratify this amendment, too. In some ways the new program was a relief to Republicans. They expected that once southern blacks could vote, their state governments would have to provide them with the protection of the laws, thus rendering unnecessary the exercise of national power and preserving the old balance of the federal system.

Until the southern states complied with the new Reconstruction laws, they were to be under the control of the Army, subject to martial law and, if necessary, military courts. Southerners insisted that this whole program was unconstitutional, and they tried to persuade the Supreme Court to declare it so. In 1867 and 1868 representatives of Johnson's state governments asked the Supreme Court to enjoin Johnson and his secretary of war, respectively, from enforcing the MILITARY RECONSTRUCTION ACTS. They hoped for success, because the majority of the Justices were suspected of opposing the Republican program. In earlier cases, including EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), a narrow majority had held that military courts could not operate upon civilians where civil courts were functioning, and in the TEST OATH CASES the Court had ruled unconstitutional laws requiring persons to swear oaths of past loyalty in order to follow certain professions. However, even Johnson would not sustain an effort to secure Court intervention in so plainly a political issue, and the Court dismissed both suits. (See MISSISSIPPI V. JOHNSON.)

Southerners tried again in EX PARTE MCCARDLE (1869), where a Southerner convicted of murder in a military court asked for a write of HABEAS CORPUS, citing the Supreme Court's Milligan decision. At least some Reconstruction laws might be jeopardized if the Court endorsed this argument, and Republicans responded by repealing the law under which McCardle had brought his suit. The Court grudgingly acquiesced in the repeal but virtually invited a new application for the writ under another law.

These developments produced ambivalent feelings about the courts among Republicans. Before the war the judiciary had tended to sustain laws protecting slavery and discrimination against black Americans. During the war Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY had seemed to obstruct the military effort, and the Court's course since the war had hardly been reassuring. Fearing judicial interference, several leading Republicans proposed narrowing the Court's jurisdiction and requiring a two-thirds majority of Justices to rule a congressional law unconstitutional, or denying that power altogether. On the other hand, the judiciary was the only national institution besides the military capable of enforcing the new laws protecting the rights of American citizens. Not only did Congress refrain from passing the court-limitation bills but it also expanded judicial authority by making the national judiciary the forum in which citizens and even businesses were to secure justice if their rights were denied in the states. Indeed, even as Republicans worried whether the Court would impair Reconstruction, in their roles as circuit court judges the Justices were upholding the power of the national government to protect rights under the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments. Altogether, the Reconstruction era witnessed a great expansion of the jurisdiction and activity of the federal courts.

While the southern attack on the Reconstruction laws failed in the Supreme Court, Johnson was able to use against the laws the fact that they employed the military in their enforcement. As COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the armed forces, Johnson sought to limit the authority of military commanders and to give command of occupying forces to officers sympathetic to his position. When Secretary of War EDWIN M. STANTON resisted these efforts, Johnson suspended him from office and appointed the popular General ULYSSES S. GRANT in his place. By late 1867 Johnson's obstruction was so successful that Reconstruction was grinding to a halt, with white Southerners ready to prevent ratification of their new, egalitarian constitutions.

Many Republicans denied that the President had the constitutional right to obstruct legislation in this way, and they urged the House of Representatives to impeach him. However, most Republicans were frightened of taking so radical a step, and many insisted that IMPEACHMENT lay only for indictable crimes. Despite his obstructionism, Johnson had not clearly broken any law, and they would not support impeachment until he did. Therefore in December 1867 the first impeachment resolution failed.

However, in February 1868 Johnson did finally seem to break a law. As noted, Johnson had earlier suspended Secretary of War Stanton. He had done this while the Senate was adjourned, conforming to the TENURE OF OFFICE ACT, passed in 1867, which made all removals of government officers temporary until the Senate confirmed a successor, or, in certain circumstances, voted to accept the President's reasons for removal. In Stanton's case, the Senate in 1867 refused to concur in the removal, and Stanton returned to office. Now Johnson defied the Senate and the law, ordering Stanton's permanent removal. The House impeached him immediately, and from March through May the Senate established rules of procedure, heard arguments and testimony, and deliberated.

Although many questions were raised during Johnson's trial in the Senate, the decision finally turned for most senators on whether they believed Stanton was in reality covered by the Tenure of Office Act. Despite Johnson's initial compliance with the act, his lawyers persuaded just enough Republican senators that the act did not cover Stanton, and Johnson was acquitted. But the price for acquittal was Johnson's promise to end his obstruction of the Reconstruction laws. With that interference ended, most southern states adopted new state constitutions, and in nearly all those states Republicans took control of the governments.

The new southern constitutions and Republican governments were among the most progressive in the nation.

Elected mainly by black voters, southern Republican leaders thought they could secure enough white support to guarantee continued victory by using government power to promote prosperity and provide services. Thus they emulated northern Republican policies, using state taxes and credit to subsidize railroads and canals, to develop natural resources, and to control flooding along the Mississippi River. They created the first centralized state public school systems and opened state hospitals and asylums. At the same time southern Republicans were committed to improving the conditions of former slaves, both on principle and to keep the support of their largest constituency. They passed laws to provide them with the same state services that whites received, put blacks in important positions, banned discrimination in many businesses, shaped labor laws to protect workers' interests, and appointed local judges who would be sympathetic to blacks in disputes with whites.

All these activities required the states to spend and borrow far more money than they had before the war. Because it was primarily whites who owned enough property to pay taxes, the Republican policies redistributed wealth, something not acceptable to nineteenth-century Americans. Bitterly, white Southerners charged that "ignorant," "brutal" voters were being duped by venal politicians with promises of "class legislation." Southern whites denied that such governments were really democratic. Unable to defeat Republicans at the polls in most states, they turned to violence and fraud. From 1868 through 1872, midnight riders, known by such names as the Ku Klux Klan, terrorized local Republican leaders. After 1872 the violence became more organized and more closely linked to anti-Republican political organizations.

A few southern Republican governors were at first able to suppress the violence. But by 1870 they were appealing to the national government for help, thus causing serious problems for national Republican leaders. Republicans had hoped that enfranchising the freedmen would protect them without a massive expansion of national power. Moreover, everyone believed that legislation must be based on the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, ignoring the earlier view that the Thirteenth Amendment gave power to protect citizens' basic rights. But the language of the two later amendments only protected rights against STATE ACTION, and Republicans had a difficult time justifying laws protecting blacks and white Republicans from attacks by private individuals. Nonetheless, in 1871 Republicans passed such laws and also authorized President Grant to take drastic action to crush violence, including suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. They insisted that the Fourteenth Amendment required states to protect their residents; failure to do so would amount to state denial of EQUAL PROTECTION.

At first this response seemed successful, and violence abated. However, it soon flared anew. In many southern states Republicans claimed that Democratic violence and intimidation should nullify apparent Democratic majorities in elections, and they refused to count Democratic votes from areas where violence was most intense. In return Democrats organized armed militia to press their claims. In state after state Republicans had to appeal for national troops to protect them against such opponents. Where it was difficult to afford protection, the Democratic militias—often called "White Leagues"—drove Republican officials from office.

It became ever more difficult for national Republicans to respond. More and more Northerners feared that continued national intervention in the South was undermining the federal system. At the same time the Supreme Court manifested its concern to preserve a balance between state and national authority. In Texas v. White (1869) the Justices emphasized the importance of states in the Union, and in Collector v. Day (1871) they seemed to endorse the doctrine of DUAL FEDERALISM, by denying the national government's power to tax the incomes of officers of the "sovereign" states. In the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) the Court, in an implicitly dual federalist opinion, ruled that national and state citizenships were distinct. The Fourteenth Amendment protected only a limited number of rights inherent in national citizenship; those rights usually identified as basic remained the sole province of the states. This decision severely curtailed national power to protect black Southerners and southern Republicans from violence. In UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876) the Court held invalid indictments against white conspirators who had massacred blacks, in part on the grounds that the Fourteenth Amendment was aimed only at state action and could not justify prosecution of private individuals.

At the same time a growing number of Northerners were coming to share Southerners' concern about "class legislation." To these Northerners, calls for a protective tariff, for artificial inflation of the currency, for repudiation of state-guaranteed railroad bonds, for regulation of railroad rates, and for government imposition of an eight-hour work day all indicated a growing clamor for "class legislation" in the North. City political organizations, which taxed urban property holders to provide services to the less wealthy, seemed to be engaging in the same kind of "plunder" that southern whites alleged against their Republican governments. Many Northerners began to argue that the state and national constitutions required judges to overturn class legislation. They had some initial successes. The Supreme Court ruled part of the Legal Tender Act unconstitutional, only to overrule itself a year later (see LEGAL TENDER CASES), and state courts ruled that business and railroad promotion laws exceeded legislative power. However, the courts generally declined the invitation to write the doctrine of "laissez faire" into the Constitution. The majority in the Slaughterhouse Cases rejected the argument, and the Court sustained broad state regulatory power over businesses AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST—railroads, grain warehouses, and others that were left undefined. (See GRANGER CASES.)

Nonetheless, the conviction was growing that the sort of wealth-redistributing policies followed by southern Republicans was fundamentally wrong and so was fear that such ideas might spread north. More and more Northerners agreed with southern whites that southern proponents of such policies were "carpetbaggers" and "scalawags." By 1875 President Grant was refusing to help his beleaguered political allies; all but three southern states had returned to Democratic control, often through force and intimidation; and white Southerners were planning similarly violent campaigns to "redeem" the last three in 1876. Their effort to do so led to one of the greatest political and constitutional crises in American history.

In the presidential election of 1876 the violence and fraud endemic in the South threatened to engulf the nation. In the three remaining Republican states in the South—South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida—Democrats engaged in campaigns of violence and intimidation. Republican officials threw out votes from districts they claimed Democrats had carried by force. Democrats once again charged fraud and armed to confront Republicans; southern Republicans once again appealed to the national government for protection. However, this time the outcome of the presidential election itself turned upon who had carried these three states. Without them, Democrat Samuel J. Tilden was one electoral vote short of victory. Republican RUTHERFORD B. HAYES needed the electoral votes of all three to win.

As the time drew near to count the electoral vote and declare a winner, two sets of electoral votes were sent to Congress from each of the contested states—the Republican votes certified by appropriate state agencies, and Democratic competitors. The Constitution requires electoral votes to be counted by the president of the Senate (normally the vice-president of the United States) in the presence of both houses of Congress. Republicans insisted that, absent a specific congressional resolution governing the subject, the Republican president pro tempore of the Senate would have the power to decide which set of votes were the correct ones to count (the vice-president having died in office). Controlling the Senate, Republicans prepared to block any contrary resolution that might come from the Democratic House. Democrats, on the other hand, insisted that if the two houses of Congress could not agree upon which set of votes was legitimate, neither could be counted. Then no candidate would have a majority, and according to the Constitution the House would name the winner.

With no clear precedent, and with the Supreme Court not yet accepted as the usual arbiter of such constitutional disputes, it seemed that the conflict might be resolved by force. Republican President Grant controlled the Army; if he recognized a President counted in by the Republicans, a competitor named by the House would have a hard time pressing his claim. To counter this Republican program, Democrats threatened forcible resistance.

As Americans demanded a peaceful end to the crisis, the two sides were forced to compromise. Congress passed a resolution turning all disputed electoral votes over to an Electoral Commission of ten congressmen and five Supreme Court Justices for decision. The commission decision would stand in each case unless both houses voted to disagree to it—an early example of a LEGISLATIVE VETO.

To the Democrats' dismay, the three Republican Supreme Court Justices joined the five Republican congressmen on the commission to decide every disputed vote in favor of the Republican candidate. In each case the majority accepted the votes certified by the agency authorized by state law. Republicans insisted the commission had no power "to go behind" these returns.

Furious, Democrats charged that this was a partisan decision. Many of them urged Democratic congressmen to prevent the completion of the count by filibustering, saying that the House could name the President if the count were not completed by the constitutional deadline of March 3. But most Democrats felt that Americans would not support such a radical course after Democrats had agreed to the compromise. To strengthen these moderates, Hayes promised not to help southern Republicans against rival claimants for state offices. As a result Hayes was declared President just within the deadline. When he honored his commitment to the Democrats, the last southern Republican governments collapsed, even though the Republicans had claimed state victories based on the same election returns that elected Hayes. (See COMPROMISE OF 1877. )

The collapse of Reconstruction was related directly to the development of constitutional commitments that would dominate the last quarter of the nineteenth century. It marked a renewal of a state-centered federalism that would characterize succeeding years. Furthermore, it was a direct result of the growing fear of "class legislation" that would lead to the acceptance of "laissez-faire constitutionalism" in the 1890s.

MICHAEL LES BENEDICT
(1986)

Bibliography

BENEDICT, MICHAEL LES 1975 A Compromise of Principle: Congressional Republicans and Reconstruction, 1863–1869. New York: W. W. Norton.

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1971 Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–

88—Part One, Volume 6 of The History of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Macmillan.

GILLETTE, WILLIAM 1979 Retreat from Reconstruction, 1869–1879. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. 1973 A More Perfect Union: The Impact of the Civil War and Reconstruction upon the Constitution. New York: Knopf.

MCKITRICK, ERIC L. 1960 Andrew Johnson and Reconstruction. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

STAMPP, KENNETH M. 1965 The Era of Reconstruction, 1865–1877. New York: Knopf.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1877–1901

American public life during the CIVIL WAR–RECONSTRUCTION years was dominated by clashes over constitutional issues of the most basic sort: race and CITIZENSHIP; FEDERALISM, STATES' RIGHTS, and the Union; the power of the President, Congress, and the courts; and the bounds of military and civil authority. This was a time when the interpretation of the Constitution held center stage in American public life. The resolution of fundamental issues was sought in Congress and the courts, in party politics and elections, ultimately through force of arms. Merely to list the milestones of the period—the great debate over SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES; Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857); SECESSION and CIVIL WAR; the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS; the CIVIL RIGHTS, Reconstruction, and Enforcement Acts; and the IMPEACHMENT OF ANDREW JOHNSON—is to make the point that during the years from 1850 to 1877 the Constitution provided the context in which Americans expressed, and fought over, their most fundamental social beliefs.

How different was the period that followed! The structure of government—the relationship of the states and territories to the Union; the powers of Congress, the courts, and the President; the role of the POLITICAL PARTIES—often was a matter of political but rarely of constitutional concern. Nor were the major economic and social issues of the time confronted primarily in constitutional terms. It is revealing that no amendment to the Constitution was adopted between 1870 and 1913.

This does not mean, though, that constitutional issues had no place in American public policy between 1877 and 1900. Rather, what happened was that a sea change was taking place in American life, and the issues generated by this change took time to assume a full-fledged constitutional guise. Just as the basic constitutional issues of states' rights and slavery did not fully emerge until the 1850s, so too the constitutional issues generated by the rise of an urban-industrial society did not come into their own until after 1900, in many respects not until the 1930s.

Where should we look, in the late nineteenth century, for the seeds of the great twentieth-century effort to adapt the Constitution to the realities of an urban-industrial society? The primary structural concern of the time was over the role of the judiciary, and here was a foreshadowing of the conflict between the administrative state and the representative state that would assume such great importance after 1900. Second, economic issues—in particular, those involving the regulation of large enterprises—were a fruitful area of contention in the late nineteenth century. And finally, questions of citizenship and race—partly a legacy of the Civil War-Reconstruction years but also a product of the social strains generated by an industrializing society—continued to engage the attention of the public and of policymakers.

Frank Goodnow in his Comparative Administrative Law (1893) observed that while constitutional issues set the terms of debate over the character of American government before the Civil War, administrative issues took center stage afterward. Certainly it seemed that, as much as anything could, the war had settled the question of the relationship of the states to the Union. Nor did the desuetude of the post-Reconstruction Presidency, the dominance of Congress, or the still-nascent administrative state generate much in the way of constitutional debate.

Late nineteenth-century Presidents were caught up in party politics and patronage and did relatively little to formulate and conduct public policy. But America's evolution into a powerful industrial nation began to leave its mark. RUTHERFORD B. HAYES and GROVER CLEVELAND used federal troops to restore order during the railroad strikes of 1877 and 1894. The federal bureaucracy, though small, was growing; and something like a professional civil service took form, in part under the aegis of the Civil Service Commission established by the PENDLETON ACT of 1883. Tariff and fiscal policy came to be more closely identified with presidential leadership. But in constitutional terms the chief executive at the end of the century was little changed from what he had been in 1877.

Congress, however, became a considerably more powerful and effective branch of government during this period. WOODROW WILSON in 1885 called "Congressional Government" the "predominant and controlling force, the centre and source of all motive and of all regulative power." This enhanced authority came from the fact that state and local party leaders served as senators and representatives; from congressional control over budgetary and fiscal policy; and from the increasing regularity and stability of congressional leadership and procedure.

Perhaps the most striking change in the balance of governmental powers during the late nineteenth century was the rise of JUDICIAL ACTIVISM. The Supreme Court found only two federal laws unconstitutional between 1790 and 1864, but it voided federal acts in seven cases between 1868 and 1877 and in eleven cases between 1878 and 1899. The Court voided state acts in thirty-eight cases before 1865, in thirty-five cases between 1865 and 1873, and in ninety-one cases between 1874 and 1899. A debate as old as the Constitution heated up once again in the 1890s: what were the proper limits of JUDICIAL REVIEW?

The belief was then widespread—and has been gospel since—that the late nineteenth-century courts declared open season on laws threatening corporate interests. The American Law Review observed in 1894 that "it has come to be the fashion . . . for courts to overturn acts of the State legislatures upon mere economical theories and upon mere casuistical grounds." Federal and state courts found in the DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment and in the doctrine of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT grounds for voiding laws that regulated working conditions or taxed CORPORATIONS. This judicial conservatism culminated in an unholy trinity of Supreme Court decisions in the mid-1890s: IN RE DEBS (1895), which sustained a federal INJUNCTION against striking railroad workers; UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT COMPANY (1895), which severely limited the scope of the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT; and POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN AND TRUST (1895), which struck down the 1894 federal income tax law. Arnold Paul has called these decisions "related aspects of a massive judicial entry into the socioeconomic scene, . . . a conservative oriented revolution."

But the extent of the courts' antilabor and antiregulatory decision making has been exaggerated; and its purpose has been distorted. A review in 1897 of 1,639 state labor laws enacted during the previous twenty years found that 114 of them—only seven percent—were held unconstitutional. The STATE POLICE POWER to regulate working conditions was widely accepted legal doctrine: in ninety-three percent of 243 Fourteenth Amendment challenges before 1901 the Supreme Court upheld the state laws. By the late 1890s the influential New York and Massachusetts courts looked favorably on laws affecting the conditions of labor, as did the Supreme Court in HOLDEN V. HARDY (1898).

Nor did judicial policy rest only on a tender concern for the rights of property. The desire to foster a national economy was evident in many federal court decisions. And many Justices shared the widespread public sense that American society was being wrenched beyond recognition by industrialism and its consequences. Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD and jurist THOMAS M. COOLEY were as ill at ease with large corporate power as they were with legislative activism. The influential judge and treatise writer JOHN F. DILLON, who called all attempts "to pillage and destroy" private property "as baneful as they are illegal," insisted "with equal earnestness upon the proposition that such property is under many important duties toward the State and society, which the owners generally fail to appreciate."

By far the most important applications of the Constitution to issues of public policy during the late nineteenth century involved large corporate enterprise, that increasingly conspicuous and troubling presence on the American scene. Railroads led the way both in the scale of their corporate organization and in the consequent public, regulatory, and judicial response.

The roads were great beneficiaries of private and state loans before the Civil War. In the years after 1865, they received substantial federal and state land grants, and loans and subsidies from counties and townships. There were 35,000 miles of track in 1865; 93,000 in 1880. But by the mid-1870s railroads were staggering beneath the weight of their expansion. Fierce competition in the East and Midwest forced down rates and earnings. The overcapitalized lines, with high fixed costs, suffered also from the price deflation of the time. Bankruptcies and reorganizations, rate discrimination, and price-fixing pools were among the consequences. All had the effect of feeding popular anti-railroad sentiment.

That great Civil War venture in mixed enterprise, the Union Pacific Railroad, was a prolific breeder of controversy. Political and constitutional difficulties sprang up around the federal government's role in the capitalization and direction of the road. Congressmen bitterly assailed the Union Pacific's inability (or disinclination) to meet its financial obligations to the government. But not until the SINKING FUND CASES (1879) did the Supreme Court sustain the right of Congress to require this and other transcontinental lines to repay their debts. The Credit Mobilier scandal of 1872, in which stock in the construction company that built the Union Pacific was distributed to a number of influential politicians, epitomized the difficulty of fitting a semipublic enterprise into the American system of government. The Pacific Railroad Commission finally concluded: "The sovereign should not be mated with the subject."

Railroad land grants were no less a source of contention. The House unanimously resolved in 1870 that "the policy of granting subsidies in public lands to railroads and other corporations ought to be discontinued." Once again, the very principle of such aid came under attack: "These grants . . . have been made on the theory that government is an organized benevolence, and not merely a compact for the negative function of repelling a public enemy or repressing disorders."

The consequences of state and local railroad aid also were distressing, and were equally productive of doubts as to whether such aid was part of the proper role of government. The Supreme Court heard more than 350 bonding cases between 1870 and 1896. While the courts felt constrained to enforce most of those obligations, they made clear their displeasure with government subsidization. John F. Dillon condemned subsidies as "a coercive contribution in favor of private railway corporations" which violated "the general spirit of the Constitution as to the sacredness of private property." Thomas M. Cooley objected to railroad subsidies on similar grounds, arguing that "a large portion of the most urgent needs of society are relegated exclusively to the law of demand and supply." In LOAN ASSOCIATION V. TOPEKA (1875) the Supreme Court used this argument to block direct government subsidization of private enterprise.

During the years from 1880 to 1900, public, political, and (inevitably) judicial attention shifted from subsidization to regulation of the economy. The prevailing economic thought of the time, the weakness of government supervision, and the power of private interests worked against an effective system of ECONOMIC REGULATION. But inevitably the strains and conflicts attending the rise of an industrial economy produced demands on the state to intervene.

Journalist E. L. Godkin observed in 1873: "The locomotive is coming in contact with the framework of our institution. In this country of simple government, the most powerful centralizing force which civilization has yet produced must, within the next score years, assume its relation to that political machinery which is to control and regulate it." Nor surprisingly the railroads, the biggest of America's national enterprises, were the first to come under federal regulation.

During the 1870s, state railroad policy had moved from subsidy to containment. The 1870 Illinois constitution required the legislature to "pass laws establishing maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight." That body in 1871 set maximum freight and grain elevator rates, forbade price discrimination, and created a railroad commission with supervisory and enforcement powers. Similar laws were adopted in Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Iowa. Because Grange members often were prominent advocates of rate regulation, these acts came to be known as the Granger laws.

The Supreme Court in Munn v. Illinois (1877), the first of the GRANGER CASES, upheld the regulatory power of the legislatures and opened up yet another path to regulation by resurrecting the old COMMON LAW doctrine that when private property was AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST it was subject to public accountability and control. But at the same time the Court conceded that "under some circumstances" legislation might be held to violate the Fourteenth Amendment: a portent of the conservative jurisprudence of later years.

Whatever constitutional authority might adhere to state regulation, its effectiveness was severely limited by compliant state railroad commissions, the political and legal influence of the roads, and above all the national character of the enterprise. From the mid-1880s on, federal courts increasingly struck down state railroad tax and rate laws that in their view interfered with the flow of INTERSTATE COMMERCE. The implicit policy decision was that ratemaking should be in the hands of the railroads—and be subject to the review of federal courts, not state courts and legislatures. One observer thought that "long tables of railway statistics, with the accompanying analyses, look strangely out of place in a volume of United States Reports": testimony to the fact that the courts of necessity were taking on a quasi-administrative role.

The scale and complexity of the interests affected by the railroads, the competitive problems of the lines themselves, the limited effectiveness of state regulation, and the growing intervention of the federal courts all fed a movement for national railroad regulation culminating in the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT of 1887. That act defined and laid down penalties for rate discrimination, and created an Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) with the power to investigate and prosecute violators. Its primary purpose was negative: to block pooling and other cartel practices, not to secure a stable railroad rate structure. What the ICC gained thereby in constitutionality it lost in administrative effectiveness. Its early performance showed how difficult it was—given the power of private interests, popular distrust of government, and constitutional limits on the exercise of public power—to establish a bureaucratic mode of regulation. Instead, the ICC adopted what was in fact the only functioning American mode of economic supervision, that of the judiciary. Cooley, the judge and treatise writer who became the ICC's first chairman, announced: "The Commissioners realize that they are a new court, . . . and that they are to lay the foundations of a new body of American law."

During the first ten years of its existence the ICC handed down rulings on more than 800 rate controversies. But the Commission's impact was limited by the size, complexity, and competitiveness of the railroad business and by its lack of supervisory power. Demands rose in the 1890s for government ownership and operation of the lines, or at least for more rigorous supervision by a national Department of Transportation. But, as Cooley observed, these proposals were beyond the range of the late nineteenth-century American polity: "The perpetuity of free institutions in this country requires that the political machine called the United States Government be kept from being overloaded beyond its strength. The more cumbrous it is the greater is the power of intrigue and corruption under it."

The regulation of large enterprise in general posed the same problems, and produced the same response, as did that of the railroads. Mid-nineteenth-century general incorporation acts, and the competition among states to attract corporation charters, guaranteed that the terms of incorporation would remain easy, the regulation of company affairs loose and permissive. In theory the internal affairs of corporations were the business of the states; in practice, the states exercised little control.

But as in the case of the railroads, the growth of business corporations into national enterprises created a demand for federal regulation. Once again, judicial interpretation fostered the growth of a national economy. State and federal courts strengthened the legal status of foreign (out-of-state) corporations, in effect reversing the severe constraints imposed on them by PAUL V. VIRGINIA (1869). In Barron v. Burnside (1887) the Supreme Court for the first time held that state regulation of foreign corporations could be of doubtful constitutionality. By the turn of the century the "liberal theory" of foreign corporations was the prevailing one.

Even more dramatic was the courts' use of the Fourteenth Amendment to protect corporate rights and privileges. During the 1870s, said Howard Jay Graham, "the rule that corporations were not to be regarded as constitutional " PERSONS' theoretically was the LAW OF THE LAND." But this rule was more theory than fact, and during the late nineteenth century the judiciary explicitly brought corporations under the protection afforded to persons by the due process and equal protection clauses of the Amendment.

The rise of large enterprise in the late nineteenth century took forms that roused public concern and ultimately evoked a legislative and judicial response. The urge to override the limitations of state chartering led to the invention of the corporate trust and then the holding company. Although only about ten trusts were created during the 1880s, the word in the generic sense of a "huge, irrepressible, indeterminate" corporation came to be the object of great public concern. By 1890 several states had ANTITRUST laws, and six state supreme courts had held that trust agreements were against public policy or were illegal as monopolies or conspiracies in RESTRAINT OF TRADE. And public pressure grew for a federal antitrust law, as it had for railroad regulation.

The SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT of 1890, passed overwhelmingly by Congress, relied on the legislature's power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE to outlaw "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce." The breadth of the law's formulation, and its dependence on the courts rather than on an administrative agency to define its provisions, testified to the still underdeveloped state of federal regulation. But in other ways the statute was sophisticated. By relying on the old common law concept of the illegality of conspiracies in restraint of trade, the drafters minimized the risk of having the law declared unconstitutional. And the Sherman Act was widely understood to be aimed at great combinations, not to fix an unrealistic standard of small-unit competition on the economy.

Even so, enforcement was full of difficulty. The Department of Justice in the 1890s lacked the manpower, the money, and the inclination to prosecute vigorously. The courts, too, severely limited the utility of the act. They held that a firm could come to dominate a sector of the economy without doing anything illegal, and they developed distinctions between reasonable and unreasonable restraint of trade, between legitimate business practices and "illegal commercial piracy." And in its Sugar Trust decision of 1895 (United States v. E. C. Knight Company) the Supreme Court dealt the law a heavy blow, holding that the Sherman Act applied only to "commerce" and not to manufacturing, and that the activities of the American Sugar Refining Company lay outside the act's coverage even though that firm controlled over ninety percent of the nation's sugar refining capacity.

The American Law Review called this decision "the most deplorable one that has been rendered in favor of incorporated power and greed . . . since the Dartmouth College case." In fact, the Court did take a narrow and mechanical view of interstate commerce. On that premise, its decision reflected a long-held distinction between state regulation of manufacturing and federal responsibility for interstate commerce. When private parties brought suit against trade and price cartels (particularly by those prime instances of enterprises in interstate commerce, the railroads), the Supreme Court was not reluctant to find that they violated the Sherman Act.

By the turn of the century it was apparent that the problem of corporate regulation was "rapidly assuming phases which seem beyond the scope of courts of justice." The rise of corporate capitalism, and the question of what to do about it, called as much for political-administrative a will and wisdom as for legal-constitutional power and propriety.

The primary legal and, ultimately, constitutional justification for late nineteenth-century state regulation was the police power: the obligation of the states to protect the health, morals, safety, and welfare of their citizens. Many thought that the potential of that power was great indeed. The president of the American Bar Association estimated in 1897 that more than ninety percent of state legislation rested on the police power. CHRISTOPHER TIEDEMAN's Limitations of the Police Power in the United States (1886) was an elaborate attempt to find constitutional grounds for containing what he took to be a widely applied principle of government intervention. OLIVER WENDELL

HOLMES caustically said of the police power: "We suppose the phrase was invented to cover certain acts of the legislature which are seen to be unconstitutional, but which are believed to be necessary."

The police power had its greatest appeal when public health and morals appeared to be at stake. A case in point was regulation of the liquor business. The Supreme Court upheld the right of the states to forbid the manufacture and sale of alcohol, and refused to accept the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as a defense against state liquor legislation. (See INALIENABLE POLICE POWER.) Still more dramatic was judicial acceptance of extensive regulation—indeed, the near-crippling—of the oleomargarine industry. By 1886, twenty-two states either heavily taxed that product or required unattractive packaging or labeling. An 1886 federal law—"protection run mad," said an outraged critic—required that the product be called "oleo" (rather than "butterine" or other enticing names), and subjected it to a high license and manufacturing tax. The Supreme Court in Powell v. Pennsylvania (1888) upheld a similar Pennsylvania statute on the basis of the state's police power to protect public health.

The insufficiency of the state police power as a basis of state economic regulation became more and more apparent as the century neared its end. Corporate interests effectively espoused a laissez-faire, SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS constitutionalism. More fundamentally, courts recognized the growing imbalance between state supervision and an economy that was becoming national in scope.

By 1899 the Supreme Court had held twenty-nine state laws unconstitutional because they conflicted with the commerce clause of the Constitution. In LEISY V. HARDIN (1890) the Court voided an Iowa law blocking the entry of liquor into the state, holding that the movement of an original package was protected by the national commerce power, so long as Congress had not authorized the state regulation. Responding to this invitation, Congress quickly passed the Wilson Act, which made liquor subject to state law regardless of where it was packaged. The Court validated the law on the grounds that "the common interest did not require entire freedom in the traffic in ardent spirits." But without similar congressional authorization, it continued to apply the original package doctrine against state laws restricting the entry of oleomargarine and cigarettes. And in CHAMPION V. AMES (1903) the Court upheld a statute forbidding the interstate transportation of lottery tickets, thus opening the prospect of NATIONAL POLICE POWER.

The constraints that limited the application of government authority to economic problems were at least as evident in the realm of social policy. During the period of the Civil War and Reconstruction, citizenship and race had been issues of prime importance not only in constitutional law but in politics and legislation as well. In the twentieth century these and other social concerns—education, crime, poverty, social mores, CIVIL LIBERTIES—would draw comparable attention from the public, Congress, and the courts. But such was not the case during the years between 1871 and 1900. With American society in transit from its small-unit agrarian past to its large-unit urban, industrial future, the political or constitutional standing of individual or social rights was largely ignored.

These years saw relatively little redefinition—in either constitutional law or legislative action—of the status of women, Orientals, blacks, or AMERICAN INDIANS. Legal barriers to female equality occasionally fell, but by legislation, not constitutional adjudication. Opposition to women's suffrage remained strong. Between 1870 and 1910 suffrage advocates conducted 480 campaigns in thirty-three states to get the issue on the ballot. Seventeen state REFERENDA (all but three west of the Mississippi) were held; only two were successful, in Colorado in 1893 and in Idaho in 1896.

The position of Orientals and blacks in society worsened. Organized labor agitated for the exclusion of Chinese immigrants, and anti-Chinese riots in the West testified to the intensity of public feeling. An 1882 federal law banned Chinese immigration for ten years. Supplementary acts in 1884 and 1888 tightened the exclusion law and imposed restrictions on Chinese already in the country. The Supreme Court in 1887 refused to apply the Civil Rights and Enforcement Acts of the Reconstruction period to Chinese, and in 1889 the Court upheld the restriction of Chinese immigration.

In 1892 Congress overwhelmingly renewed Chinese exclusion for another decade; it also required the registration of every resident Chinese laborer, with affidavits by one or more whites that the registrant had entered the country legally. The Supreme Court upheld this law in 1893. These policies had palpable consequences. About 100,000 lawful Chinese immigrants were in the United States in 1880; there were about 85,000 in 1900. In 1902 Chinese immigration was suspended indefinitely.

An even more pervasive white public opinion supported—or at least remained unconcerned about—discrimination against blacks. Late nineteenth-century northern courts generally upheld state laws that forbade discrimination in theaters, restaurants, and other public places, as a proper exercise of the police power. (The degree to which those laws were enforced is another matter.) But on similar grounds the courts accepted the growing number of SEGREGATION statutes. State laws separating the races in public transportation and accommodation, forbidding racial intermarriage, limiting access to the vote, and segregating schools met with no judicial obstacle.

In this sense the Supreme Court's acceptance of a

Louisiana railroad segregation law in PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) represented the approval of an already widely established public policy, not the promulgation of new constitutional doctrine. When in 1903 the Court refused to agree that the Fifteenth Amendment might be used against Alabama officials who kept blacks from voting, Holmes suggested that relief "from a great political wrong" must come from "the legislative and political department of the government of the United States." At the same time the Court's invention of the STATE ACTION limitation on congressional power encouraged Congress to refrain from remedying private RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. (See CIVIL RIGHTS CASES.)

On the face of things, Indian public policy in the late nineteenth century had a different goal: it sought not to foster but to reduce separatism. Indian Commissioner Thomas J. Morgan declared in 1891: "The end at which we aim is that the American Indians shall become as speedily as possible Indian Americans; that the savage shall become a citizen." But majority sentiment still regarded even nontribal Indians as inferior, and the Supreme Court went along. In Elk v. Wilkins (1884)—coterminous with the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES that invalidated the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875—the Court held that Indians were not citizens within the understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment.

At the end of the century the acquisition of noncontiguous territory with substantial populations (Hawaii, the Philippines, Puerto Rico) raised old problems of statehood and citizenship in new forms. The Supreme Court in the INSULAR CASES (1901) limited the degree to which the Constitution applied to these peoples, much as the Court had been inclined to do with regard to Orientals, blacks, and Indians.

In most of the areas of social policy—education, crime, FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms—that in the twentieth century became important battlegrounds of public policy and constitutional law, there was little or no late nineteenth-century constitutional controversy. Only two such issues—prohibition and religion—raised substantial questions of constitutionality. New Hampshire Senator Henry W. Blair first proposed a national prohibition amendment to the Constitution in 1876, and a proposal to this effect was before Congress continuously until its adoption in 1918. State and local restrictions on the distribution and sale of liquor increased, and in general the courts sustained them against Fourteenth Amendment attacks, as proper applications of the police power.

The place of RELIGION IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS led to much political and legal conflict. State courts frequently dealt with the thorny issue of school Bible reading. Most states allowed this practice without exegesis, and the courts approved so long as attendance or participation was voluntary. The Iowa Supreme Court upheld a law that forbade the exclusion of Bible reading from the schools. But the Wisconsin court denied the constitutionality of such reading: "The connection of church and state corrupts religion, and makes the state despotic."

Protestant-Roman Catholic hostility underlay much of the conflict over school Bible reading, as it did the issue of state aid to parochial schools. Maine Republican James G. Blaine sought a constitutional amendment forbidding aid in the 1870s (see BLAINE AMENDMENT), and by 1900 twenty-three states had banned public grants to parochial schools. But the interrelationship of religion and education did not come before the Supreme Court until well into the twentieth century.

FELIX FRANKFURTER once told of a distinguished professor of property law who was called on to teach a course in constitutional law. Dutifully he did so. But he soon abandoned the effort, on the ground that the subject was "not law at all but politics." At no time in American history did this pronouncement seem more justified than in the period from 1877 to 1901. Except for the regulation of large enterprise, Americans debated the problems of a developing industrial society more in political than in constitutional terms. After 1900 the fit—or lack of fit—between those problems and the American constitutional system would be faced more directly.

MORTON KELLER
(1986)

Bibliography

BETH, LOREN P. 1971 The Development of the American Constitution 1877–1917. New York: Harper & Row.

GRAHAM, HOWARD J. 1968 Everyman's Constitution: Historical Essays on the Fourteenth Amendment, The "Conspiracy Theory," and American Constitutionalism. Chaps. 10–13. Madison, Wisc.: State Historical Society.

KELLER, MORTON 1977 Affairs of State: Public Life in Late Nineteenth Century America. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

PAUL, ARNOLD M. 1960 Conservative Crisis and the Rule of Law. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

SKOWRONEK, STEPHEN 1982 Building a New American State: The Expansion of National Administrative Capacities 1877–1920. Cambridge: At the University Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1901–1921

American public life profoundly changed during the early twentieth century. The policy agenda during the Progressive era stands in dramatic contrast, both quantitatively and qualitatively, to its nineteenth-century predecessors. A substantial body of state and national legislation sought to subject large corporations and public utilities to far greater regulation than had been the case before. A comparable surge of enactments dealt with social issues ranging from the hours and working conditions of women and children to housing, the quality of food and drugs, the conservation of land, and the control of drinking and prostitution.

More than at any time since the CIVIL WAR and RECONSTRUCTION, Americans paid substantial attention to the structure of their government. The pace of lawmaking that dealt with politics and government quickened, stimulated by the dual motives (not always complementary) of expanding popular democracy and of bringing greater honesty and efficiency to the workings of the American state. A burst of innovation led to the creation of direct PRIMARY ELECTIONS, the INITIATIVE and REFERENDUM, and new registration and voting laws, as well as to the direct election of senators and to women's suffrage. A flood of discussion and a lesser flow of administrative, judicial, and legislative action sought to increase the effectiveness of the executive branch and the BUREAUCRACY, to improve the workings of Congress and the functioning of the courts, and to modernize the relationship between federal and state authorities and the governance of the nation's cities.

American involvement in WORLD WAR I was the capstone to the Progressive era. Federal involvement in the American economy and society reached new heights; and in both technique and spirit wartime governance drew heavily on the immediate prewar experience.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, and WOODROW WILSON were far more activist than their predecessors both in leadership styles and in domestic and foreign policy. But perhaps the most dramatic result of the quickened pace of government and the new policy agenda was the adoption between 1913 and 1920 of four constitutional amendments, providing for a federal income tax, the direct election of senators, PROHIBITION, and women's suffrage. Only at the beginning of the Republic and during the Reconstruction era had constitutional revision occurred on so large a scale.

Insofar as there was a common denominator to the public policy of the Progressive era, it lay in the belief that the time had come to deal with some of the more chaotic and unjust aspects of a mature industrial society; to bring public policy (and the nation's political and governing institutions) into closer accord with new social and economic realities. This impulse cannot be simply explained away by the once fashionable label of "reform," or the now fashionable label of "social control." A quest for social justice coexisted in complex ways with a search for order. Some Progressives wanted society (and the polity) to be more efficient: more honest and economical, less wasteful and corrupt. Others sought policies that would make society safer: more secure from the threats of big business and corrupt political machines, or from the vagaries of competition and the business cycle, or from radicals, immigrants, or blacks. Still others wanted society to be fairer: more humane and less inequitable.

This was not solely an American development. H. G. Wells observed in 1906 that "the essential question for America, as for Europe, is the rescue of her land, her public service, and the whole of her great economic process from the anarchic and irresponsible control of private owners . . . and the organization of her social life upon the broad, clear, humane conceptions of modern science."

Could it be said that a substantially changed constitutional order was one consequence of American Progressivism? Did the complex structure of ECONOMIC REGULATION embodied in the Interstate Commerce Commission, enforcement of the SHERMAN ACT, the Federal Trade Commission, railroad regulation, and a host of other economic measures fundamentally alter the relationship of the state to the economy? Did the interventionism embodied in the growing body of social legislation, accumulating restrictions on IMMIGRATION, the CIVIL LIBERTIES onslaught of the war years, and the passage of national prohibition fundamentally alter the relationship of government to American society and the individual rights of its citizens? Did the sequence of interventionist foreign policy actions, delimited at one end by the acquisition of overseas colonies after the Spanish American War of 1898, and at the other by American intervention in World War I, fundamentally alter the place of FOREIGN AFFAIRS in the American political order?

In sum, did the early twentieth-century outburst of legislation, executive leadership, new agencies, and new government functions lead to what has been called "a qualitatively different kind of state"? Did a corporate-bureaucratic system of government supplant the nineteenth-century American "state of courts and parties"? JOHN W. BURGESS held in 1923 that the past generation had seen the transformation of American constitutional law from a stress on the protection of individual liberty to the imposition of "autocratic" governmental power over property, persons, and thought.

The distinctive American style of government that took form during the first century of the nation's history rested on the balance and SEPARATION OF POWERS among the executive, legislative, and judicial branches; on a FEDERALISM that rendered (through the POLICE POWER) to the states the things that were social; and on a conception of individual rights that, for all its abuses and distortions (the sacrifice of southern blacks to the not-so-tender mercies of southern whites; the use of the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to spare CORPORATIONS the indignity of state regulation and taxation), arguably gave nineteenth-century Americans more individual freedom from the interposition of the state than any other people in the world. To what degree was that constitutional order changed between 1901 and 1921?

Of course there can be no definitive answer: the glass of change inevitably will remain partially filled for some, partially empty for others. But an obscure chapter in the constitutional history of the United States may come into clearer focus if we abandon the traditional historiographical emphasis on Progressive "reform" in favor of an examination of the major instrumentalities of government: Congress, the presidency, the bureaucracy, and the mechanisms governing federal-state relations.

Congress was the branch of government that underwent the most overt and formal alteration during the early twentieth century. Two major changes, the popular election of senators through the passage of the SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT, and the reduction of the powers of the speaker of the House of Representatives, came about in these years. These changes were products of the widespread view that Congress, like the parties, was under the control of corrupt, machine-bound politicos and sinister business interests.

Six times between 1893 and 1911 the House approved a direct election amendment. Finally, spurred by an arrangement whereby progressive Republicans agreed to drop the cause of black voting in the South in return for southern Democratic support, the Senate accepted the change. The Southerners assured that control of the time, place, and manner of holding senatorial elections would remain the province of each state.

A 1911 law sought also to assure that congressional districts would be compact, contiguous, and of roughly equal populations. But enforcement was so difficult, and the courts were so loath to intervene, that it had little effect. And although the direct election of senators gradually reversed the tendency (at least until recent times) for the Senate to become a "millionaires's club," it cannot be said that that body's role in the governmental process was substantially different in the 1920s from what it had been before 1900.

The controversy over the House speaker's authority was more intense. Joseph G. Cannon, the speaker from 1901 to 1911, appointed and was himself one of the five-member Committee on Rules, thus controlling assignments to the key committees of the House, which he populated with like-thinking conservatives. His power to expedite the work of an unwieldy legislature had been a late-nineteenth-century reform, designed to keep a boss-ridden legislature from working its will. Now it appeared to a majority of congressmen as an obstacle to the more programmatic demands of Progressive government. In 1910–1911 a coalition of Democrats and insurgent Republicans deprived Cannon of his power to serve on and appoint the Rules Committee, to choose standing committees, and to recognize members on the floor.

The seniority system came into general use as a more equitable means of choosing committee chairmen—a "reform" of the sort that Finley Peter Dunne's Mr. Dooley presumably had in mind when he commented on the Progressive predilection for structural change: "I wisht I was a German, and believed in machinery." But by the 1920s the House was as much under the control of the majority party leadership as it had ever been. During most of the decade, the Republican speaker, rules committee chairman, and floor leader ran the GOP Steering Committee and, hence, Congress. Surely Cannon would have nodded approval of floor leader John G. Tilson's estimate of his role in the 69th Congress (1929): "It will probably be said with truth that the most important work I have done during the session has been in the direction of preventing the passage of bad or unnecessary laws."

Much of the constitutional controversy of the early twentieth century focused on the character of the presidency—and of the Presidents. The Spanish American War and the governance of territories afterward gave WILLIAM MCKINLEY' s administration some of the attributes of the modern presidency, and led to concern over "The Growing Power of the President." But it was the chief executives of the Progressive years who gave a dramatically new shape to the office.

Theodore Roosevelt's executive vigor, his flamboyant efforts to turn the presidency into a "bully pulpit," his concern with issues such as the relations between capital and labor, the trusts, and conservation, and his assertiveness in foreign policy gave his presidency a cast of radicalism. Critics often spoke of him—more so than of any president since ABRAHAM LINCOLN—as having stretched the Constitution to its limits and beyond. Roosevelt himself thought that the power of the presidency enabled him "to do anything that the needs of the nation demanded. . . . Under this interpretation of executive power, I did and caused to be done many things not previously done. . . . I did not usurp power, but I did greatly broaden the use of executive power." But Roosevelt's innate conservatism, the traditionalist goals that informed most of his actions, and his political skill meant that few of his initiatives ran into constitutional difficulties. The most serious congressional objections on constitutional grounds came in the debate over the HEPBURN ACT expanding the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC); and Roosevelt adroitly compromised by leaving untouched the courts' power to review the ICC's decisions.

A contemporary said that the difference between Roosevelt and his successor, William Howard Taft, was that when a desirable course of action was proposed to Roosevelt he asked if the law forbade it; if not, then it should be done. Taft, on the other hand, tended to ask if the law allowed it; if not, then Congress must be asked. Taft brought a judicial temperament and experience (and almost no elective experience) to his office. He was thus a more self-conscious advocate of a limited presidency, and celebrator of the supremacy of law and of constitutional limitations, than any of his Republican predecessors.

Yet these views did not prevent his administration from adopting a more vigorous antitrust policy than that of Roosevelt. And Taft advocated innovations such as the establishment of a COMMERCE COURT to review ICC decisions and the institution of a federal BUDGET drawn up by the executive branch. The realities of early-twentieth-century American public life weighed more heavily than the niceties of constitutional theory.

Woodrow Wilson as a scholar of American government had long been critical of the traditional relationship between President and Congress. He often praised the British system of ministerial responsibility; his ideal President resembled the British Prime Minister. But as chief executive Wilson more closely followed Roosevelt's conception of the presidency as a bully pulpit (though perhaps with less bullying and more pulpit-pounding). And even more than Roosevelt he took the lead in formulating and seeing to the passage of legislation, a course symbolized by his breaking a tradition that dated from the time of THOMAS JEFFERSON by personally proposing legislation in a message to Congress.

The scope and coherence of Wilson's legislation was far greater than that of his predecessors. But it is worth noting that of the numerous major bills passed in his administration, including the Federal Reserve Act, the FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT, the CLAYTON ANTITRUST ACT, the WEBB-KENYON ACT, the ESPIONAGE ACT, and the SEDITION ACT, only the KEATING-OWEN CHILD LABOR ACT was struck down by the Supreme Court.

With the entry of the United States into World War I, Wilson assumed presidential leadership of a sort that had not been seen since the time of Lincoln and the Civil War. The mobilization of American agriculture, industry, military manpower, and public opinion led to federal intervention into private activity on a massive scale. The creation of agencies such as the War Industries Board, the Food, Fuel, and Railroad Administrations, the War Finance Corporation, the National War Labor Board, and the Committee on Public Information, and statutes such as the SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT, the ESPIONAGE ACT, the Webb-Pomerene Act (which allowed exporters to organize cartels), and the Overman Act (which greatly expanded the President's power over federal bureaus and agencies) amounted to an unprecedented increase of federal power and its concentration under the President.

Did these circumstances in fact add up to a basic change in the constitutional character of the presidency? Certainly the administrations of WARREN G. HARDING and CALVIN COOLIDGE did not suggest so: they would have been comfortable with the most ardent (and least efficacious) practitioners of the limited presidency of the nineteenth century. Nor did HERBERT HOOVER, whose ambitions resembled those of his Progressive predecessors, exercise effective executive leadership on a bold new scale. And when FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT came into office in the trough of the Depression in 1933, he found it necessary to rest his call for a "temporary departure from [the] normal balance" of "executive and legislative authority" on the need for a "broad executive power to wage a war against the emergency as great as the power that would be given me if we were in fact invaded by a foreign foe."

For all the pressures of early-twentieth-century social, economic, and cultural change, the executive branch's constitutional position altered little if at all. After 1921, as before 1900, the powers of the presidency depended not upon alterations in Article II of the Constitution, or upon what the Supreme Court made of that article, but on the political skills of the incumbent and on the course of events: war and peace, prosperity and depression, the growth and alteration of government itself.

The argument that the character of American government underwent major change during the early twentieth century rests on the rise of an administrative state. Certainly one distinguishing characteristic of this period was the proliferation of administrative courts, boards, and commissions, with an attendant expansion of the powers, rules, and regulations of the public administration sector of the American state.

The ideal of expert administrators functioning through (or above) restraints such as party politics, federalism, or the balance of powers had a strong appeal to the Progressive generation. Abbot Lawrence Lowell warned: "If democracy is to be conducted with the efficiency needed in a complex modern society it must overcome its prejudice against permanent expert officials as undemocratic."

The courts had performed a number of essentially administrative and regulatory duties during the nineteenth century. Now, as economic and social problems became more complex and technical, so grew routinized and prescribed administrative processes, in which rule replaced discretion in public law. State laws and constitutions became ever more detailed and codelike; state regulatory agencies multiplied and gained substantially in independence. Federal laws increasingly left to administrative officers the "power to make supplementary law through rules and regulations."

The American involvement in World War I led to an exponential growth of administrative agencies and their power. The War Industries Board and its allied commissions had control over the American economy of a sort only dreamed of in Theodore Roosevelt's New Nationalism. Under the wartime ESPIONAGE ACT, the Post Office Department, the Department of Justice, and the Committee on Public Information wielded powers of suppression and persuasion over American thought and opinion that had no analogue in the nation's past.

Just where administrative law and its accompanying instrumentalities stood in the constitutional system was a matter of continuing concern. Woodrow Wilson observed in his pioneering 1887 essay "The Study of Administration" that "the field of administration is a field of business. It is removed from the hurry and strife of politics; it at most points stands apart even from the debatable ground of constitutional study." But administration was political in its relationship to law, to policy, and to interest group pressures; and it had an intimate relationship to—indeed, was very much a part of—the constitutional system of American government. In many ways the history of American public administration between 1900 and 1921 was a painful instruction in those home truths.

Administrative law of a sort had been part of the American constitutional system since the nineteenth century. Pensions, customs, internal revenue, land grants, and patents were administered by governmental agencies subject to little or no JUDICIAL REVIEW. There was continuing resistance to the idea that public administration had a distinct place in the constitutional order. Bruce Wyman, in one of the earliest systematic discussions of administrative law, set the subject in the context of Anglo-American COMMON LAW rather than constitutional law, holding that the central issue was whether public administration was subject to the same rules of law as governed the relations of citizens with one another.

Adolph Berle took another tack, arguing that administrative law was in fact the application of the will of the state by all three branches, for modern conditions made the traditional differentiation of functions impossible. Administrative law's constitutionality, he implied, rested on the proposition that all of the branches of government were essentially instruments for the expression of the popular will. Thus administrative law was "not a supplement to constitutional law. It is a redivision of the various bodies of law which previously had been grouped under the head of constitutional law."

The courts created evasive categories—"quasi-legislative," "quasi-judicial"—which enabled them to accept administrative powers without addressing the question of whether or not these threatened the separation of powers. By 1914 it appeared that "the exercise of certain discretionary power by administrative officers formally considered legislative is now held unobjectionable."

The growth of the federal bureaucracy, its increasing adherence to its own norms and standards, the fact that it was more and more under the civil service rather than political patronage—all of this has been taken to herald the arrival on the American scene of an autonomous administrative state. But the continuing subservience of government and public policy to the dictates of party politics, the competing governmental units of Congress and the courts, and underlying it all the persisting individualism, hostility to the state, and diversity of American life and thought, meant that the administrative expansion of the early twentieth century did not go on unchecked.

During the war, and immediately after, a number of intellectuals put forward schemes of postwar domestic economic and social reconstruction; they thought that the wartime infrastructure of governmental control and direction might be turned to more basic postwar problems. It soon became apparent, however, that both ideology and politics were working in another direction. Wilson himself told Congress in December 1918: "Our people . . . do not want to be coached and led. . . . [f]rom no quarter have I seen any general scheme of "reconstruction' which . . . we could force our spirited businessmen and self conscious laborers to accept with due pliancy and obedience."

Similar forces worked to constrain the outward reach of postwar foreign policy embodied in the League of Nations. Both courts and legislatures after the mid-1920s began to turn from the radical-bashing of the Espionage Acts and the 1919–1920 Red Scare to begin the erection of the broad definition of FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms that would come to prevail in the modern American definition of civil liberties. A 1918 survey of American ADMINISTRATIVE LAW (probably by the young HAROLD LASKI, surely no enemy of the active state) warned that "with the great increase of state activity . . . there never was a time "when the value of the BILL OF RIGHTS" will have been so manifest."

As in so many other areas of American government, surface changes did not necessarily alter underlying continuities. Congressmen and party leaders may no longer have had the patronage power that once had been theirs. Yet Congress as an institution, and congressmen as party politicians, remained intensely sensitive to the political implications of administrative appointments, activities, and, perhaps most of all, budgets.

Attempts by the Presidents of the time to extend the control of the executive branch over the bureaucracy frequently ran afoul of congressional opposition. By 1921 it was an arguable point—as, indeed, it always had been—whether the bureaucracy was more subject to the direction of the President or to the will of Congress. One thing was certain: the autonomy of the bureaucracy—from Congress, from the parties, from politics—was not markedly greater than it had been a generation before.

True, administrative law as a field of theoretical concern and practical application would continue to develop. The New Deal did not spring fully armed from the brow of Franklin Roosevelt, but was built on a solid foundation of national and state precedents. From an international (and a later American) perspective, the New Deal's experiments did not seem especially bold and revolutionary. But the scale and passion of the charges of a broached constitutionalism raised by the New Deal's opponents in the 1930s suggests just how limited was the pre-1933 acceptance of an American administrative state.

One more aspect of the evolution (or non-evolution) of the American Constitution during the early twentieth century demands attention. That is the hoary principle of federalism: the distribution of functions between the state and federal governments.

In theory the Civil War and the postwar amendments had settled the nagging early-nineteenth-century question as to the degree to which the states were independent governmental entities. Relatively little attention was paid to the question of federalism during the late nineteenth century, in large part because the issues that most engaged the national government—tariff and currency policy, foreign relations, Indian affairs—were of marginal concern to the states. But as the full force of industrialism and urbanism began to change public policy in the early twentieth century, the relative roles of the federal and state governments once again became a matter of constitutional importance. The police power over health, safety, morals, and (from the late nineteenth century on) welfare, was the major legal basis for state social and economic legislation. For the most part the court accepted this; as ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, JR. observed in 1920, "The health, comfort, and general welfare of the citizens are in charge of the state governments, not of the United States."

But of the 194 Supreme Court decisions that invalidated state laws between 1899 and 1921, 102 were explained on the ground that the laws violated the distribution of powers embodied in the principle of federalism. By the 1920s and the early 1930s there was much talk of a judicial DUAL FEDERALISM that had created a "twilight zone" in which neither state nor federal power applied. And the attempt of the New Deal to create a new level of national intervention in the realms of economic regulation and social welfare led to one of the great constitutional controversies in American history. Once again, it would appear that the policy changes of the 1900–1921 period were not accompanied by a significant alteration of the constitutional order.

MORTON KELLER
(1986)

Bibliography

BERLE, A. A., JR. 1916–1917 The Expansion of American Administrative Law. Harvard Law Review 30:430–448.

BETH, LOREN 1971 The Development of the American Constitution 1877–1917. New York: Harper & Row.

BLUM, JOHN M. 1954 The Republican Roosevelt. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

BERGESS, JOHN W. 1923 Recent Changes in American Constitutional Theory. New York: Columbia University Press.

HASBROUCH, PAUL D. 1927 Party Government in the House of Representatives. New York.

LOWELL, A. LAWRENCE 1913 Expert Administrators in Popular Government. American Political Science Review 7:45–62.

NOTE 1915 Delegation of Legislative Power to Administrative Officials. Harvard Law Review 28:95–97.

——— 1918 The Growth of Administrative Law in America. Harvard Law Review 31:644–646.

SKOWRONEK, STEPHEN 1982 Building a New American State: The Expansion of National Administrative Capacities, 1877–1920. Cambridge: At the University Press.

WYMAN, BRUCE 1903 The Principles of Administrative Law Governing the Relations of Public Officers. St. Paul, Minn.: Keefe-Davidson Co.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1921–1933

If reverence for the federal Constitution had diminished in the Progressive era, it was revitalized in the 1920s, as the Constitution again became a symbol of national unity and patriotism. Organizations such as the American Bar Association and the National Security League launched national campaigns of patriotism, circulating leaflets and pamphlets by the hundreds of thousands, encouraging Constitution worship, promoting an annual Constitution Day, and working for state laws to require Constitution instruction in the public schools. Forty-three states passed laws mandating the study of the the Constitution; often such laws required loyalty oaths for teachers. Such laws were intended to affirm one hundred percent Americanism from every public school instructor.

The Constitution which was so apotheosized, however, was one geared primarily to the service of property interests. This meant, on the one hand, the protection of business from government regulation and from assault by radical and liberal critics; and, on the other, active intervention of courts and the executive branch to see that constitutional ways were found to insure that the free use of one's property be protected by positive government policies, both formal and informal. Thus, while constitutional changes did occur during the decade and new emphases were developed, these modulations were contained within the dominant ideological construct of free enterprise and individual property rights—rights, it was argued, that had been secured for all time by the sacred document and its amendments.

The most influential constitutionalist of the 1920s was

Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT. Taft set the tone for national political leadership. He was fully committed to the protection of a social order explained and justified by the tenets of JOHN LOCKE, Adam Smith, the Manchester Economists, WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, THOMAS COOLEY, and Herbert Spencer. Espousing a social ethic that stressed selfreliance, individual initiative and responsibility, and the survival of the fittest, Taft emphasized the virtually uninhibited privilege of private property and rationalized the growth of corporate collectivism in terms of individual liberty and private enterprise. For Taft it was time to move away from Progressive expansivism and restore the country to its traditional constitutional bases through a legal system that rested primarily upon judicial defense of a static Constitution and an immutable natural law.

In specific constitutional terms, these goals required restrictive, although selectively restrictive, interpretations of the federal government's taxing and commerce power; an emphasis upon the TENTH AMENDMENT as an instrument for precluding federal intrusion into the reserved powers of the states; and a limitation on the states themselves, through an interpretation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT that emphasized SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS and FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. These constitutional constructs would protect property against restrictive state laws but leave the states free through their police power to legislate against private activities that might threaten that property.

Operating from these assumptions, the Supreme Court majority in this period was activist in its hostility to legislative enactments that threatened or constrained the rights or privileges of the "haves" of society. Thus, between 1921 and 1933, that body ruled unconstitutional fourteen acts of Congress, 148 state laws placing governmental restraints on one or another form of business activity, and twelve city ordinances. Conversely, its majority had no trouble sustaining federal measures that aided business and sanctioning numerous state laws and city ordinances that abridged the CIVIL LIBERTIES of labor, radicals, too outspoken pacifists, and other critics of the capitalist system. In 1925, Taft took the further step of lobbying through Congress a new JUDICIARY ACT, granting the Supreme Court almost unlimited discretion to decide for itself what cases it would hear. (See CERTIORARI, WRIT OF. ) Henceforth the Court could choose to take no more cases than it could handle expediently and could restrict adjudication to matters of more general interest. The result was an upgrading of the importance of the cases that the body did agree to hear and a commensurate enhancement of the Court's own prestige and power. Such a looming judicial presence dampened the enthusiasm of activist legislators, state and national, for pushing social reform legislation and made progressive members of REGULATORY COMMISSIONS cautious about exercising their frequently limited authority. Hence bodies such as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission remained largely passive during the period, except when their business-oriented majorities sought to act solicitiously toward those being regulated.

The three presidential administrations of the period, while sharing a common constitutional philosophy, differed in concrete legislative and policy accomplishments. WARREN G. HARDING had begun his presidency with an ambitious legislative docket. His proposals included a National BUDGET AND ACCOUNTING ACT (previously vetoed by WOODROW WILSON), a new farm credit law, the creation of a system of national highways, the enactment of a Maternity Bill, the immediate development and effective regulation of aviation and radio, the passing of an antilynching law, and the creation of a Department of Public Welfare. A surprised Congress was confused over priorities and wound up passing little legislation. The PACKERS AND STOCKYARDS ACT of 1921 made it unlawful for packers to manipulate prices, create monopolies, and award favors to any person or locality. The regulation of stockyards provided for nondiscriminatory services, reasonable rates, open schedules, and fair charges. The measure, which was constitutionally based on a broad interpretation of the COMMERCE CLAUSE, gave the secretary of agriculture authority to entertain complaints, hold hearings, and issue CEASE AND DESIST ORDERS. The bill was a significant part of the agrarian legislation of the early 1920s, and its validation by the Supreme Court in STAFFORD V. WALLACE (1922) provided a constitutional basis for later New Deal legislation. The 1921 Congress also passed the Fess-Kenyon Act, appropriating money for disabled veteran rehabilitation, and the SHEPPARD-TOWNER MATERNITY ACT, subsidizing state infant and maternity welfare activities. Aside from the bill setting up a Budget Bureau in the Treasury Department with a director appointed by the President, little else was forthcoming. By the end of 1921 the New York Times observed: "It is evident, and it is clearly admitted in Washington, that the public is not counting any longer upon sound and constructive legislation from Congress." Indeed, Congress supported only occasional further legislation through the decade. One effect of such congressional inaction, along with the increasingly desultory Harding leadership and the even more quiescent CALVIN COOLIDGE presidency, was to direct the attention of reformers to the AMENDING PROCESS.

The immediate post-WORLD WAR I years had seen the ratification of the EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT (prohibition) and the NINETEENTH AMENDMENT (woman suffrage). In the 1920s certain fallout from both occurred. Prohibition was unpopular from the start. In fact, noncompliance became such a problem that by the late 1920s President HERBERT HOOVER appointed a special commission, headed by former Attorney General GEORGE WICKERSHAM to "investigate problems of the enforcement of prohibition under the 18th Amendment." As the report of the commission stated, "the public was irritated at a constitutional "don't' in a matter where the people saw no moral question." More specifically, the commission pointed to enforcement problems, emphasizing the lack of an American tradition of concerned action between independent government instrumentalities. This, it felt, was now being painfully demonstrated by the Eighteenth Amendment's policy of state enforcement of federal laws, with responsibility too often falling between the two stools and enforcement occurring not at all. Not surprisingly, during the twelve years that the Eighteenth Amendment was in force, more than 130 amendments affecting the Eighteenth in some manner were introduced. Most of these amendments provided for outright repeal; others weakened the amendment in varying degrees. When FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT opposed prohibition in 1932, he attracted wide support. The TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT repealing the Eighteenth was ratified in December 1933, although prohibition's legal residue took some years to settle. (This measure came only nine months after passage of the relatively uncontroversial TWENTIETH AMENDMENT, eliminating the "lame duck" session of Congress and changing the time for the inauguration of presidents from March to January).

The momentum that carried woman suffrage to a successful amendment continued to some degree into the early 1920s. Some feminist leaders continued to push for improved working conditions for women, for minimum wage laws, and for laws bettering the legal status of women in marriage and DIVORCE. In 1922, Congress passed the Cable Act, providing that a married woman would thereafter retain and determine her own citizenship and make her own application for naturalization after lawful admission for permanent residence, which the Act reduced to three years. Supporters of the political emancipation of women, especially the National Women's Party, got the EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT (ERA) introduced in Congress in 1923 and worked for its adoption by lobbying and exerting political pressure in the early years of the decade. At that time the ERA was opposed by most of the large women's organizations, by trade unions, and by the Women's Bureau primarily because it was seen as a threat to labor-protective legislation. Opponents contended that the ERA would deprive most working women and the poor of hard-won economic gains and would mainly benefit middle and upper class women. Thus the measure floundered at the time, not to be revived until toward the end of WORLD WAR II. The same period saw all native-born American Indians granted full citizenship through the Curtis Act of 1924. The measure, however, did not automatically entitle them to vote, and some states still disfranchised Indians as "persons under guardianship." In 1925 Congress passed the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, extending federal regulation of political corruption to the choice of presidential electors.

A CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT fared only slightly better. With the Supreme Court striking down federal child labor laws as unconstitutional under both the commerce and the taxing powers, advocates of children's rights turned to the amending process and Congress adopted a proposed Child Labor Amendment in June 1924. Opposed by manufacturers' associations and certain religious groups, the measure, by 1930, had secured ratification in only five states. More than three-fourths had rejected it, with the greatest hostility coming from the south and from agricultural regions, where child labor was seen as essential to family economic stability. The measure was eventually superseded by the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT of 1938. By that time the evils of child exploitation were no longer felt to be beyond the constitutional reach of federal legislative power.

Other amendments were proposed: providing minimum wages for women; establishing uniform national marriage and divorce laws; giving the president an item veto in appropriation bills; abolishing congressional immunity for speeches and debates in either house; providing representation for the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA; changing the amending process itself; providing for the election of judges; providing for the independence of the Philippine Islands; prohibiting sectarian legislation; defining the right of states to regulate employment of ALIENS; requiring teachers to take an oath of allegiance; preventing governmental competition with private enterprise; conferring upon the House of Representatives coordinate power for the ratification of treaties; limiting the wealth of individual citizens; providing for legislation by INITIATIVE; extending the civil service merit system; regulating industry; and prohibiting loans to any except allies. Varying support for all reflected, to a greater or lesser degree, public discontent with aspects of the political-constitutional system of the time. A segment of this discontent crystallized in the La Follette Progressive Party's 1924 platform, which even proposed the RECALL of judges, much to the alarm and ire of Chief Justice Taft. Such straws in the wind did not, however, portend a successful assault upon property-oriented constitutional interpretation. That assault would await the depths of the Depression.

The middle to later years of the decade saw continued congressional hostility to government interference in economic and personal activities, but no reluctance to use power when the result supported President Coolidge's aphorism that "the business of America is business." Antilynching legislation failed during the decade; northern conservatives joined white southerners in deploring it as an assault upon STATES' RIGHTS and individual freedom. In 1927, Congress enacted the McNary-Haugen Farm Bill, an elaborate measure calling for federal support for agricultural prices. The measure countered the prevailing temper of constitutional conservatism, for it extended national regulatory authority over agricultural PRODUCTION and thus not only invaded a sphere of authority traditionally reserved to the states but also interfered extensively with private property rights. President Coolidge vetoed the measure, denouncing it as "economically and constitutionally unsound." When Congress persisted, he vetoed a second McNary-Haugen Bill the following year on the same grounds.

Somewhat similar antistatist sentiments emerged when, in 1925, newly appointed Attorney General HARLAN FISKE STONE took the Bureau of Investigation out of politics and terminated its pursuit of radicals. "There is always the possibility," Stone stated in taking the action, "that a secret police may become a menace to free government and free institutions because it carries with it the possibility of abuses of power which are not always quickly apprehended or understood. The Bureau . . . is not concerned with political or other opinions of individuals. It is concerned with their conduct, and then only with such conduct as is forbidden by the laws of the United States." Store's action was popular with all but some patriotic and right-wing groups for whom radical, or even unorthodox, ideas were a threat which the government did have a responsibility actively to check.

On the other hand, Congress met little opposition when it enacted a broad, restrictive IMMIGRATION ACT in 1924 imposing stringent quotas on entry to the United States, heavily biased against southern and eastern European and Asiatic peoples. Such action was consonant with the strong tendency of the courts in the period to define the rights of aliens narrowly, with an eye to keeping such people in their proper place, particularly as easily exploitable members of the work force.

To the extent that an alternative constitutional tradition existed or was developed in the 1920s, its impact was not fully felt until Depression days. There were undertones of protest, however, coming from disparate sources. Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, in his dissent in Gilbert v. Minnesota (1920), a decision sustaining a sedition conviction for criticism of the government's wartime policies, had stated: "I cannot believe that liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment includes only liberty to acquire and to enjoy property." Others quickly picked up on the contradiction in this double standard, particularly when the same "liberty" was not then deemed applicable to FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, and FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY. The AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION (ACLU), a product of the war, itself an opponent of strong government intervention in people's personal lives, worked through the decade to strengthen the power of labor and working people. The ACLU operated on the assumption that BILL OF RIGHTS freedoms flowed from economic power and that artificial impediments to the achievement of that power had to be removed. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was active in the decade in behalf of the constitutional rights of minorities, although its successes in producing constitutional change were decidedly limited. Similarly, organized labor saw itself as a beleaguered "minority" throughout the decade, attributing its position partly to conservation constitutionalism. Samuel Gompers stated shortly before his death: "The Courts have abolished the Constitution as far as the rights and interest of the working people are concerned."

The impact of such criticism ultimately was not so great as that from popularly elected constitutional liberals and an influential segment of the legal community. Senators William E. Borah and GEORGE NORRIS openly opposed the appointment of CHARLES EVANS HUGHES to the Chief Justiceship, arguing that there was a need for judges who would stop treating the Fourteenth Amendment only as a protection of property and recognize it as a guarantee of individual liberty. Although this opposition failed, partly because of Hughes's constitutional record and the public image of him as more progressive than reactionary, the Senate did block the subsequent nomination of John J. Parker, a prominent North Carolina Republican, to the Supreme Court in 1930; opponents particularly emphasized his racist and antilabor record. Both actions constituted unignorable Depression calls for constitutional liberalization, echoed increasingly by liberal lawyers, particularly in the law schools, many of which has been influenced by the LEGAL REALISM movement of the times. Such criticism combined with growing disillusionment with the business establishment and cynicism about a Supreme Court that could be aggressively activist in the protection of property rights and a paragon of self-restraint when it came to protecting human rights. Pressure for altered uses of government power mounted fairly early in Depression days.

Herbert Hoover was undoubtedly the most competent of the 1920s Presidents. A successful mining engineer and government bureaucrat, he had served effectively as wartime food administrator under Woodrow Wilson and as secretary of commerce in the Harding and Coolidge administrations. Hoover was eager to overhaul the executive branch of the government and reorganize it in ways that would achieve greater efficiency and greater economies in government. Saddled quickly with the worst depression in American history, Hoover was pressed to launch a large-scale national attack on the depression through federal governmental action. Such action had to fit his constitutional views, which were decidedly Taftian. For Hoover, "unless the enterprise system operated free from popular controls, constitutional freedoms would die." "Under the Constitution it was impossible to attempt the solution of certain modern social problems by legislation." "Constitutional change must be brought about only by the straightforward methods provided by the Constitution itself." Such a commitment to laissez faire economics and constitutional conservatism precluded sweeping federal actions and permitted only such remedial legislation as the AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT of 1929, designed to assist in the more effective marketing of agricultural commodities. Congress created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in 1932 to rescue commercial, industrial, and financial institutions through direct government loans. Both measures so limited the scope of permissible federal activity that neither proved adequate to the challenge of providing successful depression relief.

A more specific example of Hoover's constitutionalism involved congressional enactment of the Muscle Shoals Bill of 1931. In 1918 President Wilson had authorized, as a war-time measure, the construction of government plants at Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee River for the manufacture of nitrates and of dams to generate electric power. After the war the disposition of these plants and dams produced bitter national controversy. Conservatives insisted that they be turned over to private enterprise. Congress twice enacted measures providing for government ownership and operation for the production and distribution of power and the manufacture of fertilizers. In vetoing the second of these bills (Coolidge had vetoed the first in 1928), Hoover reiterated his belief that government ownership and operation was an approach to socialism designed to break down the initiative and enterprise of the American people. He argued that such a measure was an unconstitutional federal entrance into the field of powers reserved to the states and as such deprived the people of local communities of their liberty.

A growing number of congressmen and senators, however, were convinced that such constitutional negativism was no longer useful. In 1932, Congress passed and sent to a reluctant President the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT, probably the most important measure of the period. Ever since the 1890s, labor had protested against business's turn to the courts for INJUNCTIONS to prohibit its legitimate activities. Congress's only response was a Railway Labor Act, in 1926, giving railway labor the right to bargain collectively through its own representatives. By the late 1920s, a national campaign against the labor INJUNCTION was launched with liberal congressional leaders joined by groups as disparate as the ACLU, the Federal Council of Churches, and the American Federation of Labor, all protesting the unfairness and unconstitutionality of enjoining labor's legitimate use of speech, press, and assembly. The Great Depression intensified this discontent. The Norris-LaGuardia Act made YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS unenforceable in federal courts; forbade the issuance of injunctions against a number of hitherto outlawed union practices; and guaranteed jury trials in criminal prosecutions based on violations of injunctions. The act thus removed the machinery for a variety of informal antilabor devices.

Hoover's response was to seek assurance from his attorney general, William Mitchell, that the more rigorous terms of the measure could be successfully bypassed. Having gained such assurance, he signed the bill, leaving Senator Norris to remark, bitterly, that the President dared not veto but did everything he could to weaken its effect. Yet the measure was generally popular, as was its symbolism, which presaged a more active role for the federal government in the achievement of social justice.

Such response was not lost on Franklin D. Roosevelt. During the presidential campaign of 1932, he called for a new, more liberal view of the Constitution and a BROAD CONSTRUCTION of congressional legislative power as a way of solving the nation's difficult problems. His overwhelming election victory seemed to assure that the minority liberal constitutional arguments of the 1920s would become majority ones when the NEW DEAL program was enacted.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

HICKS, JOHN D. 1960 Republican Ascendancy, 1921–1933. New York: Harper & Row.

LEUCHTENBURG, WILLIAM E. 1958 The Perils of Prosperity, 1914–1932. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1972 The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row.

——— 1972 The Meaning of Freedom of Speech: First Amendment Freedoms from Wilson to F.D.R. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1933–1945

With the exception of the CIVIL WAR–RECONSTRUCTION era and the turbulent decade of the 1960s, no period in our history generated more profound changes in the constitutional system than the years of the Great Depression and WORLD WAR II. Although the tenure of a Chief Justice of the United States often marks the boundary of a particular constitutional epoch, in this period it was a single President, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, whose personality and policies dominated the nation's political landscape, first as the leader of a domestic "war" against economic chaos, and, finally, as the architect of victory over the Axis powers. "Most of us in the Army have a hard time remembering any President but Franklin D. Roosevelt," remarked one soldier at the time of Roosevelt's death in April 1945. "He was the COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF, not only of the armed forces, but of our generation."

Roosevelt, described by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES as having a "second-rate intellect, but a first-rate temperament," was a charming, politically astute country squire from Hyde Park, New York. Crippled by polio at thirty-nine, elected President a decade later, he presided over five momentous revolutions in American life. The first, arising from his confrontation with the Supreme Court, has been aptly termed the "constitutional revolution" of 1937. The Court abandoned its long campaign, dating from the 1880s, to shape the content of the nation's economic policy by means of the judicial veto. The second revolution elevated the presidency, already revitalized by THEODORE ROOSEVELT and WOODROW WILSON in the Progressive era, to the pinnacle of leadership within the American political system. FDR did not invent the "imperial presidency," but his mastery of the radio, his legislative skills, and his twelve-year tenure went far toward institutionalizing it, despite several notable setbacks at the hands of Congress and the Court.

The third revolution, symbolized by the expansion of FEDERAL GRANT-IN-AID programs, the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT of 1935, and the efforts by the Department of Justice to protect CIVIL RIGHTS under the old Reconstruction-era statutes, significantly transformed American FEDERALISM by making the national government the chief custodian of economic security and social justice for all citizens. The fourth, marked by the revitalization of old independent REGULATORY COMMISSIONS such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, saw the final denouement of laissez-faire capitalism and the birth of state capitalism, managed by a bureaucratic elite drawn from the legal profession, the academic world, and private business. And the fifth revolution, characterized by the unionization of mass-production industries, the growing influence of urban-labor representatives in the Congress, and Roosevelt's successful effort to attract support from ethnic minorities, brought a major realignment in voting blocs and party strength that lasted three decades.

The triumph of Roosevelt and the Democratic party in the 1932 elections represented both the outcome of short-term political forces and the culmination of voting realignments that began much earlier. The inability of the HERBERT HOOVER administration to stop the slide into economic depression after the stock market crash of 1929 represented the most obvious and immediate source of Roosevelt's appeal. More significantly, his victory ended an era of Republican domination in national politics that began with WILLIAM MCKINLEY in 1896, and it ushered in a Democratic reign that lasted well into the 1980s. From McKinley to Hoover, the Republicans controlled the White House, except for Wilson's two terms (1913–1921), a Democratic interlude that rested mostly upon divisions in Republican ranks.

The Republicans also controlled both houses of Congress for twenty-eight of the thirty-six years between McKinley and Franklin Roosevelt, elected a majority of the nation's governors and state legislators outside the South, and even enjoyed great popularity in big cities among trade unionists, middle class professionals, and many ethnic-religious minorities. On a platform of high tariffs, sound money, low taxes, and rising prosperity, the GOP built a formidable national coalition.

The Republican coalition developed signs of collapse during the Warren G. Harding-Calvin Coolidge-Herbert Hoover years as economic distress increased among farmers and industrial workers despite the vaunted prosperity of the Republican New Era. In 1924, running as an independent on the Progressive party ticket, the aging Senator Robert LaFollette garnered a healthy share of votes from both urban workers and staple-crop farmers, who protested with their ballots against the economic conservatism of Coolidge and his Democratic rival, John W. Davis, a prosperous Wall Street lawyer. Hoover easily defeated New York governor Alfred E. Smith in 1928, but Smith—Irish, Roman Catholic, opposed to prohibition, and urban to the core—detached millions of ethnic, working class voters from the Republican party. Three years of economic distress which also alienated farmers, businessmen, and the once-affluent middle classes, completed the realignment process and assured Roosevelt victory in 1932.

From 1932 until his death, Roosevelt forged his own national coalition. Anchored in the lily-white South and the big cities where the Democratic party had been powerful since the days of ANDREW JACKSON and MARTIN VAN BUREN, Roosevelt welded together a collection of social, ethnic, regional, and religious minorities into a new political majority. In peace and war, the NEW DEAL gave power, status, and recognition to those who had been outsiders in American society before the Great Depression—Irishmen, Jews, Slavs, white Southerners, and blacks.

Within this broad, diverse "Roosevelt coalition," the power and influence of organized labor and the urban wing of the Democratic party grew impressively, especially after the elections of 1934 and 1936 and the passage of the WAGNER (NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS) ACT in 1935. Roosevelt's nomination in 1932 had been made possible by the support of key southern leaders. The success of the New Deal after 1934 and Roosevelt's electoral victories in 1940 and 1944, however, rested upon the political acumen and money provided by big labor through the political action committees of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Roosevelt built well. His coalition ran both houses of Congress in every year but eight during the next half century. It elected HARRY S. TRUMAN in 1948, JOHN F. KENNEDY in 1960, LYNDON B. JOHNSON in 1964, and JIMMY CARTER in 1976.

Neither of the two amendments to the Constitution ratified during this period owed their inspiration directly to Roosevelt or the New Deal, although the TWENTIETH AMENDMENT, eliminating the lame-duck session of Congress, had been pushed by leading progressives for over a decade, and the TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT, repealing national PROHIBITION of liquor, had been endorsed by the Democratic party in its 1932 platform. Both amendments were proposed in 1932, the first time since 1789 that a single Congress had sent to the states for RATIFICATION more than one amendment. Congress also specified an unusual ratification procedure for the Twenty-First Amendment, requiring the states to convene special ratifying conventions instead of submitting the measure to their legislatures. Proponents of prohibition repeal feared that the legislatures, most of them malapportioned in favor of rural constituencies, would not be sympathetic to ratification.

Supporters of the Twentieth Amendment, led by the venerable progressive senator from Nebraska, GEORGE NORRIS, argued that the existing short session of Congress which met from December until March was a barrier to effective majoritarian democracy. By an accident of history, Congresses elected in November of even-numbered years did not meet in regular session until December of the odd-numbered year. Norris's amendment, first passed by the Senate in 1923, proposed to correct this situation by moving forward to January 3 from December the date on which sessions of Congress began and shifting back to January 3 and 20 from March 4 the date on which the terms of office began for members of Congress, and the President and Vice-President, respectively. A newly elected Congress, reflecting the fresh mandate of the people, would meet two months after an election rather than thirteen months later.

The Senate passed the Norris plan five times after 1923, but it failed to advance in the Republican-dominated House of Representatives, where the Speaker, Nicholas Longworth, opposed it. Longworth wished to keep the lame-duck session as a check upon the turbulent masses and he also objected to a provision in the Norris amendment that allowed Congress to determine the date of its own adjournment each year. Such flexibility, he believed, would only encourage more lawmaking by Congress, a prospect that he and other conservatives viewed with great distaste. The 1930 elections returned Democratic majorities to both houses of Congress, who quickly passed the Twentieth Amendment and sent it on to the states where it was ratified three years later.

American temperance organizations struggled for more than a century to achieve their goal with the adoption of the EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT in 1919. It took the "wet" forces little more than a decade to bring the brewery, the distillery, and the saloon back to American life through ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment nine months after Roosevelt took office. Like the resurgence of the Democratic party, the repeal of national prohibition reflected a fundamental shift in political forces. The Congress that passed the Eighteenth Amendment during WORLD WAR I was overwhelmingly rural, with House seats apportioned on the basis of the 1910 census, the last to record a majority for the countryside rather than the cities. The 72nd Congress, on the other hand, reflected the reapportionment of the House in 1929, where twenty-one states (mostly from the rural South and West) lost representation and eleven states (mostly in Eastern metropolitan areas) increased their share of seats.

In addition to providing urban-ethnic voters with a measure of symbolic revenge for the inconvenience of a "dry" decade, the repeal of prohibition had wide appeal in a nation reeling from economic depression and plagued by criminal violence. Sponsors argued that repeal would boost employment, raise tax revenues, and permit law enforcement personnel to concentrate upon the apprehension of major criminals such as John Dillinger. With equal vehemence, defenders of the "dry" faith claimed that repeal had been hatched by millionaires and rich corporations, eager to shift their tax burdens onto poor consumers of alcohol, and that Satan would conquer America. Thirty-six states, more concerned for the nation's fiscal problems than for the wiles of Satan, ratified the repeal amendment by December 1933.

The legislative program of the New Deal had a more direct impact upon the fate of the old CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT, which had passed Congress in 1924 but had failed to secure ratification by three-fourths of the states. As late as 1937, only twenty-eight state legislatures had ratified the proposal which would have authorized Congress to regulate or prohibit the labor of persons under eighteen years of age. Fifteen states, mostly in the South and border regions, had rejected it; five had failed to act. The amendment became moot, however, when Congress in 1938 passed the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, which contained a similar restriction, and when the Supreme Court upheld its constitutionality in UNITED STATES V. DARBY LUMBER COMPANY (1941).

As usual, formal constitutional revision on the state level during these years was more extensive and diverse than for the federal government, although only three states (New York, Missouri, and Georgia) entirely rewrote their constitutions. At one extreme were states such as Tennessee and Illinois, where constitutional innovation remained minimal. The fundamental law of Tennessee had not been amended since 1870, while the Illinois Constitution of 1890 had been revised only twice since that date. On the other hand, voters in Louisiana were asked to adopt twenty-eight constitutional amendments in 1938, nineteen in 1940, ten in 1942, and nineteen in 1944, creating an organic law that filled nearly 300 pages with 200,000 words. California ran a distant second. By the end of World War II, its constitution of 1879 had been amended 250 times and totaled close to 50,000 words.

Unlike the United States Constitution with its broad, sweeping language, most state charters in this period included detailed declarations of public policies; the amendment process often served as a surrogate for statutory changes. In 1944, for instance, 100 proposed amendments were put before the voters in thirty different states. In California, Arizona, Oregon, and Washington the electorates defeated amendments to enact old-age pension schemes. Arkansas and Florida adopted right-to-work amendments that banned union shops, while California spurned a similar amendment. In the same year voters in other states were asked to pass upon amendments dealing with the location of airports, POLL TAXES, dog racing, and preferential civil service hiring for veterans.

Because of the era's economic crisis, which combined high unemployment, business failures, and falling tax revenues, all of the states confronted similar constitutional crises, because their organic laws usually limited state indebtedness. Escalating relief burdens placed a severe strain upon the states' fiscal resources, especially before the New Deal picked up a larger share of these costs after 1935. Legislatures and governors often found paths around these obstacles through constitutional experimentation: amendment, REFERENDUM, and judicial interpretation.

The age of Roosevelt, marked by class conflict and intense political controversy over both the economy and FOREIGN AFFAIRS, spawned many durable myths about the presidency, the growth of federal authority, and the relationship between government and the private sector. Roosevelt's critics, who hated the New Deal and distrusted his diplomacy, accused him of erecting a Presidential dictatorship. The New Deal and the mobilization of the war economy, it has been argued, also transformed the federal union as well as business-government relationships by subjecting local government and business corporations to the despotism of Washington bureaucrats. There is some truth in these generalizations but also considerable exaggeration.

Few political leaders in our history could match Roosevelt's oratorical gifts, his skill at dispensing patronage, and his deft manipulation of subordinates, the press, Congress, and opponents. But Roosevelt also experienced a number of profound setbacks between 1933 and 1939 that limited presidential power even during the unparalleled economic crisis of the Great Depression. It was World War II that shifted the balance decisively in his favor, but even during those turbulent years he usually functioned within boundaries set by Congress and public opinion.

Under the New Deal, the years of presidential preeminence in the shaping of domestic policy were remarkably fertile but brief. During the so-called Hundred Days, from Roosevelt's inauguration to early June 1933, Congress rubber-stamped dozens of White House proposals, including new banking laws, the first federal securities statute, a complete overhaul of the nation's monetary system, legislation creating the Tennessee Valley Authority, as well as laws setting up the controversial National Recovery Administration and the New Deal's basic farm program. Acting under the dubious authority of the World War I Trading with the Enemy Act, Roosevelt banned gold exports and all foreign exchange transactions until Congress approved of the administration's monetary plans that nullified gold clauses in private and public contracts and devalued the dollar by almost twenty-five percent. Equating the Depression with war, Roosevelt asked for and received from Congress the resources appropriate for a military commander battling a foreign invader.

The 1934 elections gave the President even larger majorities in Congress. This mandate encouraged a second burst of New Deal reforms in 1935. Again responding to presidential initiatives, Congress adopted a series of path-breaking laws, including the Social Security Act, the Wagner National Labor Relations Act, a $4.8 billion relief and public works measure, and a significant revision of the federal tax code that closed many loopholes and levied new surcharges on the very rich. Despite the judicial mutilation of key administration measures in 1935–1936, executive power probably stood at its peacetime zenith after Roosevelt's crushing reelection victory in 1936.

Even during these years of strong presidential leadership, Roosevelt's claims to authority did not go unchallenged. The federal courts remained a bastion of conservative Republicanism. Federal judges had issued hundreds of INJUNCTIONS against New Deal programs by early 1935, when the Supreme Court began to invalidate many of the laws of the Hundred Days, including the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT (NIRA) and the AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT. The most serious rebuff to the President came in the Schechter case, where the Justices invalidated the NIRA on the ground of improper DELEGATION OF POWER to the executive, and HUMPHREY'S EXEC-UTOR V. UNITED STATES (1935), where they curbed the President's power to remove members of independent regulatory commissions.

These judicial affronts to presidential authority became a war during FDR's second term, beginning with his ill-devised scheme to "pack" the Supreme Court with additional Justices. His proposed "Judicial Reform Act of 1937" inspired criticism both from conservatives and from many of the President's liberal friends in the Congress as well. This bitter legislative struggle divided the New Deal coalition, squandered much of the political capital that Roosevelt had accumulated during the previous four years, and gave rise to cries of "dictatorship," "tyranny," and "fascism." When the dust settled, the Court-packing plan had been defeated by Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES and opponents in the Congress, but the Supreme Court never again seriously challenged the New Deal.

The economic recession of 1937–1938 and Roosevelt's attempt to restructure the executive branch dealt new blows to presidential leadership and prestige. Having taken credit for the economic upturn in 1935–1936, the President had to absorb the blame for the "Roosevelt recession," which had been triggered in part by his own desire to cut federal expenditures and balance the budget. Congress also scuttled his plans to reorganize the executive branch which rested upon the recommendations of a blue-ribbon committee on administrative management. The original bill called for an enlargement of the White House staff, creation of the Executive Office of the President to include the Bureau of the Budget, and a consolidation of existing bureaus, agencies, and commissions into twelve superdepartments under the President's control. The independent regulatory commissions such as the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Securities Exchange Commission would have been regrouped under the authority of these executive departments.

Congressional opponents denounced the plan as another presidential power grab. Working in tandem with rebellious bureaucrats who hoped to protect their own fiefdoms from the White House, they easily defeated the most controversial features of the plan. Roosevelt got his Bureau of the Budget and a larger staff, but little more. His political fortunes hit rock bottom in the 1938 elections, when several conservative Democratic senators won reelection despite Roosevelt's effort to purge them during bitter primary campaigns. Confronted by an emerging conservative congressional coalition of southern Democrats and midwestern Republicans, Roosevelt had lost the initiative on domestic policy by the time German troops marched into Austria and Czechoslovakia.

The growth of presidential power, checked at the end of the 1930s, received new impetus after 1938 from the coming of World War II. Although the Supreme Court had reaffirmed in the broadest possible terms the President's constitutional authority over foreign policy in UNITED STATES V. CURTISS-WRIGHT EXPORT CORPORATION (1936), the actual limits of that authority remained to be tested. Sometimes alone and sometimes with congressional support, between 1939 and 1945 Roosevelt enlarged presidential power to an extent unknown even during World War I and the early New Deal.

Facing substantial isolationist sentiment both in Congress and among the public, Roosevelt initially attempted to counter Germany and Japan by means of EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS and EXECUTIVE ORDERS that rested exclusively upon his claims to inherent presidential authority to conduct foreign relations and command the armed forces. He applied economic sanctions against Japan, terminating a 1911 commercial treaty, banning sales of scrap iron and steel, and freezing all Japanese financial assets in the United States. He ordered naval patrols of the western Atlantic—virtually assuring hostilities with German U-boats—and he ordered the military occupation of Iceland, with attendant naval convoys to protect ships supplying the occupation troops. In brief, Roosevelt waged an economic war in Asia and shooting war in the Atlantic without the consent of Congress.

The most extraordinary assertion of presidential power before Pearl Harbor was the destroyer-bases executive agreement in September 1940, by which Roosevelt transferred fifty over-age American destroyers to the British government in return for leases on seven naval bases in the Caribbean. This transaction, through which the President gave away a substantial portion of the United States Navy, rested upon a generous interpretation of an old nineteenth-century statute which permitted the President to dispose of worn-out ships. Most observers have believed that this action subverted the intention of Congress and violated a 1917 law specifically prohibiting the President in any foreign war "to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war." Attorney General ROBERT H. JACKSON, who advised Roosevelt on the legality of the transfer, dismissed this statute on the grounds that it applied only to ships built with the specific intention of giving them to a nation at war.

After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor Congress rapidly augmented presidential control over both military policy and the domestic economy. By means of the renewal of Lend-Lease, the Second WAR POWERS ACT, the EMERGENCY PRICE CONTROL ACT, the War Labor Dispute Act, and other laws, Congress gave the President the discretion, among other things, to allocate $50 billion of war supplies to America's allies, to reorganize all executive departments and agencies at will, to fix rents and prices throughout the land, and to seize industrial plants closed by strikes. In 1935, invalidating the NIRA, the Supreme Court had scolded Congress for vesting unbridled authority in the President to regulate the economy. Ten years later, as World War II drew to a close, executive discretion over the nation's economic structure far transcended that of the NIRA years.

A substantial enlargement of presidential discretion was essential for effective prosecution of World War II, but the growth of executive power carried with it threats to CIVIL LIBERTIES and unfathomable dangers to the survival of the human race. The Congress that permitted the President to restructure the executive branch also approved of the administration's plans to remove Japanese Americans from the West Coast. (See JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES. ) The Congress that permitted the President to ration sugar and gasoline also gave the Commander-in-Chief a blank check for research, development, and potential use of nuclear weapons. This was truly, in Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO's memorable phrase, "delegation run riot."

The expansion of federal responsibility for economic management and social services paralleled the growth of presidential power between 1933 and 1945. In a series of cases beginning with the WAGNER ACT CASES (1937) and ending with WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942), the Supreme Court laid to rest the antiquated notions of DUAL FEDERALISM, which had postulated the existence of rigid constitutional boundaries separating appropriate federal activities from those reserved exclusively to the states. In the wake of these decisions and those upholding the Social Security Act, there seemed to be no constitutional limitation upon the authority of Congress to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE and to tax and spend on behalf of the GENERAL WELFARE, even where these federal efforts intruded deeply into areas of social and economic life traditionally left to local government. Practice often preceded formal doctrinal legitimation. In 1934, for instance, the Bureau of Biological Survey in the Department of Commerce eradicated over seven million disease-carrying rodents in three states with a $8.7 million grant from the Civil Works Administration. Although this project produced no constitutional objection, a more sweeping federal intrusion into the domain of local health authorities is hard to imagine.

The most far-reaching instrument of expanding federal policymaking became the myriad programs of FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID which provided federal money for specific activities to be administered by state officials under federal guidelines. As early as 1862, the MORRILL ACT had conveyed federal lands to the states on condition that they be used for the construction and support of colleges and universities. In the Weeks Act of 1911, Congress had extended this principle to include cash grants to the states for fighting forest fires in the watersheds of navigable streams. Similar grant-in-aid programs flourished during the Wilson administration for vocational education, highways, and agricultural extension work, but budget-conscious Republican administrations had put a cap on new programs during the 1920s.

In their efforts to fight the depression, both the Hoover and Roosevelt administrations increasingly used the grant-in-aid technique. The Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, approved reluctantly by Hoover, offered over $600 million in federal loans to the states for work-relief projects. The Roosevelt administration substituted grants for loans in the relief programs of the New Deal. By 1940, in addition to these vast relief activities and the continuation of old programs from the Progressive era, the New Deal had undertaken grant-in-aid programs for employment services and unemployment compensation, old age assistance, child welfare services, and maternity care. Social Security, the largest New Deal grant-in-aid program, assisted the blind, the disabled, and the unemployed through combined federal-state efforts.

The growth of federal grant-in-aid programs during the New Deal years rested upon the realization that many social and economic problems required national attention and that only the federal government commanded the fiscal resources to deal with them. Between 1932 and the end of World War II, the federal government's share of total taxes collected rose from twenty-four percent to nearly seventy-four percent. At the same time, grant-in-aid programs avoided the growth of an even larger federal bureaucracy and left many important administrative decisions in the hands of state and local officials.

In addition to grant-in-aid programs, state and local elites played a major role in the implementation of other New Deal efforts as well, a pattern of political decision making that refuted simplistic ideas about rampant centralization of power in federal bureaucrats. The heart of the New Deal's farm program, the domestic allotment system, vested important decisions in county committees composed of farmers and extension-service personnel chosen by local authorities. Under the Taylor Grazing Act, local livestock ranchers determined the extent of grazing rights on the vast public lands in the western states. And the most coercive federal program in this period, the SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT of 1940, left life-and-death decisions about the drafting of millions of American citizens in the hands of local draft boards appointed by state governors. Without the active participation of state and local officials, the wartime rationing programs for gasoline, sugar, coffee, and butter would have broken down for lack of enforcement.

When New Deal reformers ignored the interests and sensibilities of local elites, they provoked instant political protest and retaliation. Roosevelt quickly dismantled the innovative Civil Works Administration in 1934 because it drew intense criticism from governors, county supervisors, and mayors who objected to the complete nationalization of its extensive work-relief efforts. The subsequent Works Projects Administration program gave a larger share of decision making to local officials, who systematically used the machinery to punish political enemies and to discriminate against racial minorities, especially in the South. When idealistic young lawyers in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration attempted to protect sharecroppers and tenants from wholesale eviction under the farm program, they stirred up a revolt by commercial farmers, who forced their removal from the agency. Much of the opposition from southern Democrats to the New Deal after 1935 grew out of their anger at the Department of Justice for attempting to protect blacks from local violence under the old Reconstruction-era civil rights laws. The New Deal nourished a new brand of COOPERATIVE FEDERALISM in many areas of American life, but it was not a federalism without conflict and tensions, especially when national reformers challenged entrenched local customs and power relationships.

While encouraging the growth of big labor and ministering to the needs of the elderly and the poor, the New Deal also provided substantial benefits to American capitalists. Business opposition to Roosevelt was intense, but it was narrowly based in labor-intensive corporations in textiles, automobiles, and steel which had the most to lose from collective bargaining. The New Deal found many business allies among firms in the growing service industries of banking, insurance, and stock brokerage where government regulations promised to reduce cutthroat competition and to weed out marginal operators. Because of its aggressive policies to expand American exports and investment opportunities abroad, the New Deal also drew support from high-technology firms and from the large oil companies who were eager to penetrate the British monopoly in the Middle East.

Sophisticated businessmen discovered that they could live comfortably in a world of government regulation. The "socialistic" Tennessee Valley Authority lowered the profits of a few utility companies, but cheap electric power for the rural South translated into larger consumer markets for the manufacturers of generators, refrigerators, and other appliances. In addition to restoring public confidence in the stock exchanges and the securities industry, the Securities and Exchange Commission promoted self-regulation among over-the-counter dealers. Motor trucking firms received a helping hand from the Interstate Commerce Commission in reducing rate wars, and the major airlines looked to the Civil Aeronautics Board to protect them from the competitive rigors of the marketplace. When "Dr. Win-the-War" replaced "Dr. New Deal" after 1942, businessmen began to play key roles as well in the wartime agencies that regulated production, manpower, and the allocation of raw materials. The New Deal thus laid the foundations of both the welfare state and the permanent warfare state.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

Bibliography

CAREY, JANE PERRY 1865 The Rise of a New Federalism: Federal-State Cooperation in the United States. New York: Russell & Russell.

HAWLEY, ELLIS P. 1965 The New Deal and the Problem of Monopoly. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

LEUCHTENBURG, WILLIAM E. 1963 Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. New York: Harper & Row.

PATTERSON, JAMES T. 1969 The New Deal and the States: Federalism in Transition. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

POLENBERG, RICHARD 1972 War and Society: The United States 1941–1945. Philadelphia: Lippincott.

SCHLESINGER, ARTHUR M., JR. 1957, 1959, 1960 The Age of Roosevelt, 3 vols. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1945–1961

Reconversion to a peacetime society required reestablishing balance among the branches of the government and a careful reassessment of the role of each. The same process occasioned a reexamination of the relations between government and private power. These immediate problems of reconstruction were joined by the emergence of a "cold war" with the Communist bloc of nations. Americans defined that struggle as one against totalitarian rule—the antithesis of constitutional democracy.

The wartime period had seen massive government regulation of the economy and the personal lives of citizens. Congress had authorized governmental reorganization in 1941, reenacting a WORLD WAR I measure giving the President almost unlimited power to reorganize federal agencies directing the nation's resources in wartime. (See WAR POWERS ACT.) At the end of WORLD WAR II, Congress created a bipartisan Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the government headed by ex-President HERBERT HOOVER. It recommended reforms designed to reduce administrative disorder and bureaucracy. Congress in 1947 proposed the TWENTY-SECOND AMENDMENT (ratified in 1951) limiting presidential service to two terms.

Although many congressional conservatives hoped to roll back various New Deal programs, few were prepared to return the nation's economy to the unregulated control of private business leaders. Depression lessons had been painful. The FULL EMPLOYMENT ACT of 1946 declared that it was the government's task to take all steps necessary to maximize employment, production, and purchasing power. And while certain conservative congressmen were disturbed by the economic management this measure obviously necessitated, few opposed its goal of securing national economic stability. The Housing and Rent Act of 1947, continuing the wartime Price Control Act, raised an important question: does the WAR POWER continue after the shooting has ceased? The Supreme Court, in WOODS V. MILLER (1948), answered affirmatively as to legislation responding to wartime dislocations.

The issue of restraints on organized labor dissolved presidential-congressional harmony. President HARRY S. TRUMAN in 1946 vetoed the TAFT-HARTLEY ACT, an amendment to the 1935 WAGNER ACT, the nation's principal labor law. Taft-Hartley sought to eliminate an alleged prolabor bias by arming management with new rights and imposing limitations on long-established trade union practices. Truman called the act "completely contrary to the national policy of economic freedom," and "a threat to the successful working of our democratic society." But Congress passed it over his veto, and thirty states also enacted antilabor statutes, including RIGHT-TO-WORK LAWS and antipicketing measures. The LANDRUM-GRIFFIN ACT of 1959 sought to combat growing charges of union scandal, extortion, and deprivation of members' rights by imposing more direct federal authority over internal union procedures.

Executive-legislative cooperation resulted in passage of the Cellar-Kefauver Act of 1950, authorizing more rigid enforcement of the antitrust laws against corporate mergers. Two years later, following a Supreme Court ruling striking at "fair trade" laws, Congress passed the McGuire Act exempting state-approved fair trading from the federal antitrust laws. Seen as a consumer protection law, the measure was politically acceptable at the time.

In the FOREIGN AFFAIRS area, Congress and the President clashed. Truman had inherited a presidency whose prerogatives in foreign policy had been greatly expanded. Committed to the realization of Roosevelt's postwar programs, Truman backed American participation in the new United Nations. Such action entailed expanding presidential prerogatives at the expense of congressional power. American participation meant applying military sanctions against an aggressor state at the discretion of the United States delegate to the Security Council, who was under the control of the President. By the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 Congress recognized that the President could not commit the United States to participation in United Nations military sanctions without congressional consent, but it acknowledged implicitly that Congress's warmaking power was conditioned by the necessity of international security action. Similarly, when the United States joined the NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY Organization in 1950, it pledged automatic intervention if any member suffered armed attack. The question was raised whether such a commitment upset the traditional balance between the executive and legislative branches in questions of war and peace.

With the invasion of South Korea by Communist forces, presidential discretion rather than congressional action provided a dramatic answer. Truman, on June 25, 1950, without asking for a formal DECLARATION OF WAR or consulting Congress, ordered United States POLICE ACTION in the area. This order brought charges from Senator ROBERT A. TAFT that Truman had "usurped power and violated the Constitution and the laws of the United States." In the "great debate" that followed, Truman's actions and presidential war power generally were condoned, but not without a strong attempt, led by Senator John Bricker, to curb the treaty-making power of the President by constitutional amendment. One form of the unsuccessful BRICKER AMENDMENT would have declared: "A provision of a treaty or other international agreement which conflicts with this Constitution shall not be of any force or effect."

The Supreme Court ultimately eased the minds of Bricker's supporters. The circumstances were constitutionally significant. As new treaties of alliance grew in the late 1940s and early 1950s, American military and civilian personnel spanned the globe. Questions grew regarding the legal status of American citizens living abroad. Did the Constitution follow the flag? In REID V. COVERT (1957) the Court held that an EXECUTIVE AGREEMENT was subject to the limits of the Constitution, and thus could not confer on Congress power to authorize trial by COURT-MARTIAL of a civilian dependent of a serviceman stationed overseas. "We must not," wrote Justice HUGO L. BLACK, "break faith with this nation's tradition of keeping military power subservient to civilian authority."

Earlier, Congress had enacted a NATIONAL SECURITY ACT, creating the National Security Council and reorganizing the means by which war powers were exercised. The measure constricted the President's foreign policy prerogatives by requiring him to consult Congress before taking certain actions. In practice, however, it did not constrain willful Presidents. The ATOMIC ENERGY ACT of 1946 sought to insure civilian control over atomic energy production and precluded dissemination of technical information to other nations. By the 1950s, however, President Eisenhower sought and obtained an amendment, as the basis for an international cooperation program, to develop peaceful applications of nuclear energy. Nuclear power was apparently to become an important bargaining chip in the international arena.

One incident growing out of the KOREAN WAR revealed public feelings regarding the swelling authority of the executive and the proper nature of constitutional government. During the war, the President felt that constitutional history was on his side, given earlier validated presidential interventions in national emergency crises. He authorized his secretary of commerce to seize and operate struck steel mills, thereby insuring production of vital defense materials. His executive order was not based on statutory authority, but only on the ground that a threatened strike of the nation's steelworkers created a national emergency. When the steel companies sought an INJUNCTION against the government, federal spokesmen argued that the seizure was based upon Article II of the Constitution, and "whatever inherent, implied, or residual powers may flow therefrom." The President's actions drew sharp criticism, especially his refusal to use the Taft-Hartley Act provisions hated by his labor constituency. Before the Supreme Court, government counsel stressed expanded presidential prerogative during national emergencies, but the Supreme Court drew a line between public regulation and governmental operation of private business. In one of its most celebrated postwar constitutional decisions, the Court, speaking through Justice Black, rejected claims for presidential EMERGENCY POWERS and INHERENT POWERS in domestic affairs. Truman promptly announced compliance with the ruling, and the public reacted favorably to JUDICIAL ACTIVISM in curtailing excessive federal power. (See STEEL SEIZURE CONTROVERSY; YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE V. SAWYER.)

Constitutional development in the Truman years had been heavily influenced by considerations of national security at home and abroad, some serious, some specious, and all heavily political. Republican and conservative southern Democratic opponents of the New Deal had begun in 1938 to "red-bait" the Roosevelt administration by associating its personnel with un-Americanism or by representing the government's extension of powers as socialistic or communistic. Wartime investigations of federal employees and postwar revelations of inadequate security procedures intensified conservative demands for a housecleaning of the executive branch. Capitalizing on this issue during the 1946 congressional elections, the Republicans secured control of both houses of Congress, insuring that the subsequent Congress would investigate the loyalty of federal employees. During this period, the HOUSE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES (HCUA) was given permanent committee status, and between 1947 and 1948 Congress instituted thirty-five committee investigations of federal personnel and policies.

Lacking Roosevelt's political capital, and alarmed by leaks of classified information, Truman moved quickly to take control of the loyalty issue. In November 1946 he appointed a special presidential commission to investigate the problem, and in 1947 he formally instituted, by EXECUTIVE ORDER 983 . . . permanent federal employee LOYALTY-SECURITY PROGRAM. To disarm congressional opposition further, Truman appointed conservatives to the loyalty program's major administrative positions. Under this program, negative information from any source was the potential basis for a security dismissal or the denial of government service. An ATTORNEY GENERAL'S LIST of subversive organizations was drawn up, with membership a basis for dismissal. The only guideline the order provided was that a designated organization must be "totalitarian, Fascist, Communist, or subversive," or one adopting a policy "approving the commission of acts of force or violence to deny to others their constitutional rights."

Civil libertarians attacked the program on constitutional grounds, charging that it presumed employees to be subversive and subject to dismissal unless they could prove themselves innocent. Critics of the program also charged that it lacked procedural protections, a charge raised chronically against HCUA. However, the administration moved with regard for justice and fair play during its loyalty probes, and by early 1951 the Civil Service Commission had cleared more than three million federal employees; the Federal Bureau of Investigation had made 14,000 investigations of doubtful cases; over 2,000 employees had resigned, although in very few cases because of the investigation; and 212 persons had been dismissed because of reasonable doubts of their loyalty. In 1948 the executive branch also sought to demonstrate concern for national security by obtaining indictments of the eleven national leaders of the Communist party under the Smith Act. A long and bombastic trial followed, ending in convictions for conspiracy to advocate overthrow of the government by force and violence. (See DENNIS V. UNITED STATES.)

Conservative critics claimed that the Truman administration's loyalty efforts were window dressing to divert attention from more serious problems. The sensational Alger Hiss-Whittaker Chambers hearings and the resultant conviction of Hiss, a former New Deal official, for perjury in connection with disclosures of secret security information, catalyzed Congress into launching its own loyalty program. The MUNDT-NIXON BILL, seeking to force communists out into the open by requiring them to register with the Justice Department, was caught in 1948 election year politics and failed passage; but by 1950, following the reelection of Truman, the INTERNAL SECURITY ACT, a similar measure, was passed resoundingly over the President's veto. The act went beyond the Truman loyalty program for government employees. It attempted to extend loyalty probes into nongovernmental areas of American life and generally assumed a need to shift the authority for security matters to congressional leadership. Civil libertarians challenged the measure as violative particularly of FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees. But in the Korean War period, with burgeoning security apprehensions fed aggressively by Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY of Wisconsin, the possibility of launching a successful test case of even the act's most extreme provisions promised little success. Instead, Senator Patrick A. McCarran of Nevada, one of the measure's principal champions, persuaded Congress in 1952 to pass, over another Truman veto, a revised immigration law. The act contained provisions to prevent the admission of possible subversives, and it authorized DEPORTATION of immigrants with communist affiliations even after they had become citizens.

The expanded activities of congressional committees in LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATIONS of loyalty and security raised important constitutional questions about committee prerogatives and behavior. While practice varied, some of the more flamboyant committees, such as HCUA, Senator McCarthy's Committee on Governmental Operations, or McCarran's Senate Internal Security Committee with large, aggressive, and ruthless staffs, pried into federal activities and even investigated subversion in the movie and entertainment industries, various private organizations, the academic community, and the churches. Committee actions alarmed civil libertarians, because of growing disregard for the type of procedural guarantees and safeguards of individual liberty normally afforded any citizen in a court of law. The committees browbeat witnesses, denied a RIGHT TO COUNSEL, and afforded no opportunity to examine charges, which were often irresponsible and from dubious sources. Opportunity to cross-examine witnesses was denied. Individuals' past affiliations and activities were used as evidence of guilt, and they were expected to prove themselves innocent to an obviously biased congressional "jury." As a result many witnesses invoked the Fifth Amendment, refusing to testify on the grounds that any statement made might tend to incriminate them. This led to charges that such citizens were "Fifth Amendment Communists." Congress in 1954 passed a FEDERAL IMMUNITY ACT to force testimony in return for promises of immunity from prosecution. (See IMMUNITY GRANT.) Generally the courts, including the Supreme Court, were cautious about thwarting government measures, deciding cases on the narrowest of grounds and proscribing only the most overt abuses.

Postwar demands for greater constitutional protections for minorities within American society expanded CIVIL RIGHTS. Many Americans believed that the United States should extend first class CITIZENSHIP to all. The struggle with the Communist world for the minds of Third World people added urgency. Early in 1946, President Truman established a Committee on Civil Rights affirming that "the preservation of civil rights, guaranteed by the Constitution, is essential to domestic tranquillity, national security, the general welfare, and the continued existence of our free institutions." In 1947 the committee proposed extension of an approach initiated by Attorney General FRANK MURPHY in the late 1930s, stressing that the federal government should be a shield in protecting citizens against those who would endanger their rights, and a sword to cut away state laws violating those rights. The report called for strengthening the CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION of the Justice Department, using the Federal Bureau of Investigation in cases involving violations of civil rights, enacting antilynching and anti-POLL TAX laws, and establishing a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission. However, with Southerners dominating many key congressional committees, prospects were dim for any program extending full civil rights to black Americans.

Truman determined to make the effort. In early 1948 he sent Congress a message calling for prompt implementation of the commission's report. A southern revolt in the Congress culminated in the secession of members from the Democratic Party. These "Dixiecrats" ran their own presidential candidate, J. Strom Thurmond, on a STATES' RIGHTS platform calling for "segregation of the races" and denouncing national action in behalf of civil rights as a "totalitarian concept, which threatens the integrity of the states and the basic rights of their citizens." Although Truman won the election, in the civil rights area he had available only executive remedies. These he utilized, strengthening the Civil Rights Division and encouraging the Justice Department to assist private parties in civil rights cases. He also ordered that segregation be ended in federal employment and that the armed services be fully integrated. (See EXECUTIVE ORDERS 9980 AND 9981.) These developments encouraged civil rights activists to look to the courts for constitutional action in behalf of minority rights. Truman's Supreme Court appointees, however, were consistently conservative and espoused a narrow view of the judicial power. Only a few cautious rulings proscribed some forms of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. (See SHELLEY V. KRAEMER; SWEATT V. PAINTER.)

Although DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER shared many of Truman's views regarding the President's vital and dominant leadership role in foreign policy, he conceived the domestic presidency in a different light. No social crusader, Eisenhower also had no desire to undo major programs of the New and Fair Deals. Rather he saw the presidency as a mediating agency, harmonizing the functioning of the team, and ratifying decisions and policies carefully prepared by responsible subordinates or by congressional leadership. Thus during Eisenhower's eight years in office Congress reasserted considerable domestic initiative, and when the President acted he usually complemented congressional desires.

During the 1952 campaign, Republicans made much of the "Communists in government" issue. Eisenhower realized that loyalty-security actions had to be taken to satisfy a nervous public. In 1953, he established a new executive loyalty program that expanded the criteria of the earlier Truman program. Discharge from federal service was now based on a simple finding that the individual's employment "may not be clearly consistent with the interests of national security." Several thousand "security risks" were dismissed. HCUA, cheering from the sidelines, then attempted to subpoena former President Truman to explain his security inadequacies. Truman responded with a polite letter giving the committee a lecture on SEPARATION OF POWERS and the independence of the executive.

Critics of the program focused on the absence of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS, the prevalence of GUILT BY ASSOCIATION, and the use of "faceless informers" as sources of damaging accusations. As long as Senator McCarthy was riding high such allegations remained just that. Tired of being smeared as "soft on Communists," frustrated liberal Democrats pushed through Congress a COMMUNIST CONTROL ACT in 1954, outlawing the party and initially seeking to make party membership a crime. The act proved virtually unenforceable. With the Senate censure and eventual demise of Senator McCarthy and the growing lack of enthusiasm of the Eisenhower administration for fueling the loyalty hysteria, security issues drifted into the background. By the late 1950s respectable bodies such as the New York City Bar Association and the League of Women Voters called for more precise standards for the federal government's loyalty-security program. With the Supreme Court also questioning aspects of that program's constitutional insensitivity, the President in early 1960 established a new industrial security program with vastly improved procedural safeguards. It included FAIR HEARINGS, the right of CONFRONTATION, and the right to examine all charges under ordinary circumstances. The same spirit came to prevail in the operation of other security programs.

The Eisenhower administration showed concern for state prerogatives and the need for balancing them against the rights of the individual. The federal government's growth in size and power since the late 1930s had been paralleled in state governments. During this period the states collected more money, spent more, employed more people, and engaged in more activities than ever before. When the expenditure and employment were assisted by FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID, lack of state compliance with federal standards meant potential loss of federal revenues. But states acted enthusiastically on their own in areas ranging from education and social services to a struggle with the federal government over control of natural resources. In 1947 the Supreme Court ruled that the United States had dominion over the soil under the marginal sea adjoining California. That state had maintained it was entitled, by virtue of the "equal footing" clause in the act admitting it to the Union, to the rights enjoyed by the original states and that those states owned such offshore areas. The Court concluded that such ownership had not been established at the time of the Constitution, and the interests of SOVEREIGNTY favored national dominion. But following the victorious Eisenhower campaign of 1952, in which the Republicans had courted the West and the South with promises of offshore riches, Congress passed the Submerged Lands Act of 1953, vesting in the states the ownership of lands beneath the marginal sea adjacent to the respective states. The Supreme Court subsequently denied leave to file complaints challenging the statute's constitutionality.

At another level, states and municipalities became so concerned in the 1950s with employees' loyalty that they enacted restrictive security measures. These included prohibiting the employment of Communist party members, LOYALTY OATHS as a condition of employment for teachers, service personnel, and candidates for public office, and measures authorizing state prosecution for SEDITION against the United States. State bar associations in turn moved to exclude from admission candidates who were allegedly former Communist party members or who refused to answer questions regarding former suspect affiliations. When the Supreme Court struck at such state sedition laws (PENNSYLVANIA V. NELSON, 1956) and bar restraints (SCHWARE V. NEW MEXICO BOARD OF BAR EXAMINERS, 1958; KONIGSBERG V. CALIFORNIA STATE BAR, 1957) its actions were denounced by the Conference of Chief Justices of the States as "the high-water mark . . . in denying to a state the power to keep order in its own house." Bills were introduced in Congress to deny the Court APPELLATE JURISDICTION in cases of this kind.

In this atmosphere, national leaders were hesitant to push for early implementation of the Supreme Court's DESEGREGATION mandate, and preferred to interpret the command "with ALL DELIBERATE SPEED" by emphasizing deliberation. A pattern of "massive resistance" emerged in the southern states, constituting a crazy quilt of INTERPOSITION proclamations, pupil-assignment or placement laws, freedom-of-choice laws, TUITION GRANT plans, and state statutes prescribing discipline of teachers for violation of state policies on the school segregation question. Meanwhile, federal authorities sat on their hands until after the 1956 election. Then they took cautious steps to bring the federal government more directly into the civil rights area. Eisenhower's attorney general proposed a federal statute to authorize an investigation of rights violations, particularly VOTING RIGHTS. The CIVIL RIGHT ACT OF 1957 passed after Southerners had so amended it as to make it virtually toothless. When Eisenhower signed the act into law early in September, he could have used a much stronger bill. One week earlier Governor Orville Faubus of Arkansas, an acknowledged segregationist, had ordered state troops into Little Rock to prevent implementation of a federal court order approving the admission of a handful of black students into that city's Central High School. Confronted with military defiance of federal authority, Eisenhower had no choice but to respond. He reluctantly dispatched several companies of the United States Army to Little Rock, under a provision of the United States Code, which authorized the suppression of insurrection and unlawful combinations that hindered the execution of either state or federal law. (See POSSE COMITATUS ACT.) He also nationalized and thus neutralized the Arkansas National Guard. Black children attended school for a year under military protection and Arkansas's massive resistance was held at bay by bayonets.

After the Little Rock case was decided by the Supreme Court in COOPER V. AARON (1958), which sustained the school desegregation order, Congress also acted. The CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1960 made it a federal crime for a person to obstruct or interfere with a federal court order, or to attempt to do so by threats of force. Other provisions expanded federal remedies for enforcing voting rights. The measure, for which the Republicans claimed credit in their 1960 platform, put Congress and the executive branch on record as committed to push ahead with rights enforcement.

For minority groups without the political constituency of blacks, little positive action was forthcoming. Women's rights in this period was a subliminal theme at best. Women's work in World War II had gone a long way toward shattering the stereotype of the helpless, weaker sex in need of protective legislation. Some leaders in Congress moved toward proposal of the EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT as a vote of thanks to women for their magnificent wartime performance. Both parties endorsed the measure at war's end, and Harry Truman spoke publicly in its support. But Eleanor Roosevelt, with the support of organized labor, insisted that protective legislation was more valuable for working women than the establishment of an abstract principle of legal rights. Despite two attempts in the Senate to pass a bill proposing the amendment in the late 1940s, and a third in 1953 with a rider specifying that no protective legislation was to be affected, the measure was not seriously revived in this period.

The rights of American Indians suffered even more. In 1953, the Eisenhower administration set out on a policy of "termination," supporting a program designed to reduce the federal government's involvement in Indian affairs and to "free" Indians from federal supervision. Specifically, termination sought to end the existing supportive federal-tribal relationship and transfer almost all responsibilities and powers from the federal government to the states. The effects on "terminated" tribes was disastrous; many tribal members were soon on public assistance rolls. Indians detested the law embodying this policy, seeing it as an instrument for tribal extinction. They expended their energies to defeat it, and finally achieved victory in 1968. The Indian Civil Rights Act of that year encouraged Indian self-determination with continuing government assistance and services.

The judicial branch in the period from 1945 to 1961 changed from a cautious and accommodating agency, under Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON, to an active, aggressive, and controversial storm-center under Chief Justice EARL WARREN. Just as WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT had made the Supreme Court the principal instrument for the determination of constitutionality in the 1920s, Earl Warren, who assumed the chief justiceship 1953, came to play a similar role in the late 1950s. Often backlash resulted, but in Warren's case, from conservatives and not liberals. Statistically, the WARREN COURT's record was not so activist as that of the 1920s. Four acts of Congress, eighty-five state acts, and sixteen ordinances were ruled unconstitutional from 1945 through 1960, with the Justices overruling twenty-two prior decisions. But the activist image was strong because the Court entered explosive areas of sensitive public policy.

The Court's unanimous decision in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) had shocked southern states-righters into defensive and retaliatory actions. The Court's consistent pushing ahead in the civil rights area sustained and intensified this antipathy. But Warren, supported by a liberal majority, was not prepared to stop. In the loyalty-security area, the Court limited the more sweeping provisions of the Smith Act, the Internal Security Act of 1950, and state loyalty measures. The rights of individuals and their protection from the abuses of government seemed to come first to the Justices' minds. The Court struck at departures from fair procedure by congressional committees. In Jencks v. United States (1957) it ruled that a defendant in a criminal case should have access to prior recorded statements of witnesses against him. Congress promptly sought to limit that ruling by the passage of the JENCKS ACT. By the late 1950s, the Justices began the process of critically examining state anti-OBSCENITY and censorship laws. In Congress there was talk of the need to curtail the Court's authority through legislation limiting its appellate jurisdiction. National action by right-wing groups quickly emerged to bolster such a movement, contributing to a broad public dialogue on the Court's proper function.

Defenders and critics of the Warren Court's liberal activism debated the proper role of the Constitution in the American polity. Champions of liberal judicial activism defended the legitimacy of judicial activity to shape constitutional law in accordance with democratic values. Supporters of judicial restraint advocated deference to popularly elected legislatures with courts confined to a narrowly circumscribed role. To conservative constitutionalists, the rule of law meant more than the imposition by a liberal Court of its own ethical imperatives, with little concern for orthodox doctrinal consistency.

There were no winners in this debate. But it proved apropos to the developments of the 1950s and to the institutional interrelationships of those years.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1969 The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row.

MURPHY, WALTER F. 1962 Congress and the Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

PRITCHETT, C. HERMAN 1954 Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1961–1977

An examination of nonjudicial constitutional development from the administration of President JOHN F. KENNEDY to that of President GERALD R. FORD reveals at the outset an unusual amount of constitutional change through the process of constitutional amendment. Indeed, counting the adoption of the BILL OF RIGHTS in 1791 as only one episode of constitutional change via the AMENDMENT PROCESS, the period from 1961 to 1977 was characterized by an exceptionally high level of constitutional amending activity, with four amendments adopted during the period. In contrast, again counting the adoption of the Bill of Rights as one amendment episode, there were thirteen constitutional amendments adopted between 1789 and 1961.

Three of the constitutional amendments adopted during the 1961–1977 period were clear reflections of the expansion of egalitarianism that found expression in other fields in the policies of REAPPORTIONMENT, and the enlargement of the protection of CIVIL RIGHTS. The TWENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT, adopted on March 19, 1961, extended the right to vote in presidential elections to the residents of the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA although restricting the District to the number of electoral votes allotted to the least populous state. The TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT, ratified on January 23, 1964, outlawed the imposition of POLL TAXES in presidential and congressional elections and therefore removed a form of WEALTH DISCRIMINATION in federal elections. The addition of this amendment to the Constitution was subsequently rendered superfluous by the Supreme Court's holding in HARPER V. VIRGINIA BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966) that poll taxes were a form of INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION prohibited by the Constitution. Further extension of VOTING RIGHTS occurred with the adoption of the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT on June 30, 1971, which extended the right to vote in both federal and state elections to eighteen-year-old citizens. The Twenty-Sixth Amendment was necessitated by the Supreme Court's holding in OREGON V. MITCHELL (1974) that Congress lacked the constitutional power to legislate the eighteen-year-old vote in state and local elections.

In contrast with the Twenty-Third, Twenty-Fourth, and Twenty-Sixth Amendments, the Twenty-Fifth Amendment, relating to PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION and disability and adopted in 1967, was the result of years of debate with regard to the problems that might arise if an incumbent president were temporarily or permanently disabled. Serious consideration of such an amendment to the Constitution was prompted by the illnesses afflicting President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER during his term of office, and additional impetus for constitutional change in this area was created by the assassination of President Kennedy in 1963.

Under the provisions of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment, the President may declare his own disability to perform the duties of the office by informing the president pro tempore of the SENATE and the speaker of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES in writing of his own disability. Alternatively, the President's disability may be declared in writing to the same congressional officers by the vice-president and a majority of the Cabinet. In either instance, the vice-president assumes the duties of the presidency as acting President. A period of presidential disability may be ended either by the President's informing the congressional officers in writing of the termination of his disability, or if there is disagreement between the President and the vice-president and a majority of the Cabinet on the issue of the President's disability, the Congress may resolve the dispute. A two-thirds majority of both houses of Congress, however, is required to declare the President disabled; otherwise, the President resumes the duties of his office.

Although the disability provisions of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment have not been applied, Section 2 of the amendment had an important impact on the succession to the presidency during the administration of President RICHARD M. NIXON. Section 2 provides that whenever a vacancy in the office of vice-president occurs, the President shall appoint a new vice-president with the approval of a majority of both houses of Congress. These provisions of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment came into play when Vice-President Spiro T. Agnew resigned his office in 1973 under the threat of prosecution for income tax evasion. Pursuant to Section 2, President Nixon appointed Congressman Gerald R. Ford of Michigan as Agnew's successor, and the Congress confirmed Ford as vice-president. Subsequently, President Nixon resigned his office on August 9, 1974, when his IMPEACHMENT for his involvement in the WATERGATE affair and other abuses of office seemed imminent, and Vice-President Ford succeeded Nixon in the office of President. Under the provisions of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment, Ford thus became the first appointed vice-president as well as the first unelected vice-president to assume the office of the presidency.

The Watergate affair that led to President Nixon's resignation involved not only charges of bugging the Democratic National Committee headquarters, and the obstruction by the executive of the subsequent investigation of that incident, but also more generalized abuses of power by the executive. In addition to the issue of the scope of EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE, which was ultimately resolved by the Supreme Court adversely to the President's claims in UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974), the Watergate affair raised major constitutional issues concerning the nature of the impeachment process, as the impeachment of a President was seriously considered by the Congress for the first time since the impeachment of President ANDREW JOHNSON in 1868. Because the Constitution provides that governmental officers including the President may be removed from office on impeachment for TREASON, bribery, or other high crimes and MISDEMEANORS, the consideration of the impeachment of President Nixon by the Congress involved the determination of what constituted an impeachable offense, an issue that had also been at the heart of the debate over the Johnson impeachment.

In the deliberations of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives regarding ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT against President Nixon, the President's supporters argued that the President could be impeached only within the meaning of the Constitution for an indictable criminal offense. The President's opponents, on the other hand, contended that articles of impeachment could embrace political offenses, such as the abuse of power by the President, which were not indictable under the criminal law. The latter position ultimately prevailed among a majority of the Judiciary Committee when the committee adopted three articles of impeachment against President Nixon that contained charges that were essentially political, abuse of power offenses which were not indictable.

Article one of the articles of impeachment charged the President with obstruction of justice and with violating his oath of office requiring him to see to it that the laws were faithfully executed, but the second and third articles charged him with violating the constitutional rights of citizens, impairing the administration of justice, misusing executive agencies, and ignoring the SUBPOENAS of the Judiciary Committee through which it had sought EVIDENCE related to its impeachment inquiry. Although these charges included some indictable offenses, in adopting the articles the majority of the committee obviously construed the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" to include offenses that did not involve indictable crimes. In reaching this conclusion, the committee majority took a position that conformed with the view of the nature of the impeachment process that the House of Representatives had adopted in the Johnson impeachment proceedings in 1868.

Whether this broad view of the nature of impeachable offenses would have been sustained by a majority of the House of Representatives or the required two-thirds majority in the Senate remained an unanswered question because of President Nixon's resignation in August 1974. The Supreme Court rejected the President's claim of executive privilege and ordered the disclosure of the White House tape recordings relevant to the trial of those indicted in the Watergate affair. On the tapes thus released there appeared conversations clearly indicating President Nixon's participation in a conspiracy to obstruct justice, an indictable offense. In light of almost certain impeachment by the House of Representatives and likely conviction in the Senate, President Nixon resigned. With the impeachment process thus aborted, the answer to what properly could be considered an impeachable offense was left unresolved, as it had been in the proceedings against President Johnson over a hundred years earlier.

The Watergate affair and the abuses of presidential power associated with it, along with the involvement of the United States in the Vietnam War, had a profound impact upon the principal nonjudicial constitutional issue during the 1961–1977 period—the issue of the proper relation between the powers of the executive branch of the government and the powers of the Congress. Beginning at least as early as the administrations of FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT in the 1930s and 1940s, the presidency had increasingly become the dominant political institution at the national level, and Roosevelt's successors refined and added to the assertions of PRESIDENTIAL POWER that had characterized his administrations. By the late 1960s and early 1970s, therefore, the "Imperial Presidency" had become the focus of considerable attention and constitutional controversy, and a reassertion of congressional power against the aggrandizement of presidential power had clearly begun.

This reassertion of congressional power was to a great extent a reaction to the expansion of the powers of the presidency to new extremes during the administration of President Nixon. Although previous presidents had asserted the power to impound and to refuse to expend funds appropriated by Congress in limited areas, President Nixon asserted a much broadened IMPOUNDMENT power as a presidential prerogative. Instead of the relatively isolated instances of presidential refusals to spend congressionally appropriated monies that had occurred previously, during the 1970s the Nixon administration impounded billions of dollars in congressional appropriations and effectively asserted a presidential power to enforce only those congressionally authorized programs that received the president's approval.

The involvement of the United States in the war in VIETNAM and Southeast Asia contributed to further controversy regarding the scope of presidential power to commit the armed forces to foreign military conflicts in the absence of a DECLARATION OF WAR by the Congress. The involvement of the United States in Vietnam had begun under President Kennedy with the dispatch of military advisers to the South Vietnamese armed forces, but under Presidents LYNDON B. JOHNSON and Nixon the American military presence in Southeast Asia grew to hundreds of thousands of troops. The failure of the American military efforts in Southeast Asia and the high cost of those efforts in lives and resources bolstered the arguments of critics that the power of the President to commit the United States to foreign military conflicts must be reined in.

Because of the impoundment policy of the Nixon administration and the presidential war in Southeast Asia, a reassertion of congressional power occurred in the field of domestic as well as FOREIGN AFFAIRS. The congressional response to the impoundment controversy was the enactment of the CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET AND IMPOUNDMENT CONTROL ACT OF 1974. This legislation provided that if the President resolved to eliminate the expenditure of funds appropriated by Congress, he was required to inform both houses of Congress of: the amounts involved; the agencies and programs affected; and the fiscal, budgetary, and economic effects of, and the reasons for, the proposed impoundment of funds. Both houses of Congress, the act provided, must approve the impoundment within forty-five days. If the President proposed instead to defer the spending of congressionally authorized appropriations, the act provided that he must similarly inform Congress of his intention to defer expenditures, and within forty-five days either house of Congress could require the expenditure of the funds by passing a resolution disapproving the President's proposed action. If the President refused to abide by congressional disapproval of impoundments, the act further authorized the Comptroller General to initiate legal action in the federal courts to force compliance with the will of the Congress.

In addition to addressing the problem of presidential impoundments, the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act was directed at strengthening the powers of Congress over the budgetary process. To replace the practice of enacting appropriations without regard to the total amount that should be appropriated in a given fiscal year, the act provided that the Congress should agree upon a BUDGET resolution at the outset of the appropriations process, setting the total amount of money to be appropriated during the fiscal year. The amount so specified would then govern the actions of Congress in considering individual appropriations bills.

Finally, the act created a new agency, the Congressional Budget Office, and authorized that agency to advise Congress regarding revenue estimates, the likely amount of deficits or revenue surpluses and other economic data important to the budgetary process. Congress thus created a congressional agency, beyond the control of the executive, which would be an independent source of economic and budgetary information in competition with the executive branch's Treasury Department and Office of Management and Budget.

This reassertion of congressional power over domestic policy was matched in the field of foreign policy by the WAR POWERS RESOLUTION of November 7, 1973, passed over the veto of President Nixon. In the War Powers Resolution, Congress sought to deal with the problem of presidential wars such as the military involvement of the United States in Southeast Asia. Congress therefore not only imposed restrictions upon the power of the President to commit the country's armed forces in foreign conflicts but also sought to define the war-making powers of both the President and the Congress.

With regard to the war-making power of the President, the War Powers Resolution declared that the President could introduce United States armed forces into hostilities, or into a situation in which imminent involvement in hostilities was clearly indicated by the circumstances, only pursuant to a declaration of war, or under specific statutory authorization, or in response to a national emergency created by an attack upon the United States, its territories or possessions, or its armed forces. The language of the resolution thus clearly repudiated the argument, frequently asserted in the past, that the President was constitutionally authorized to take whatever action deemed necessary to protect the national interest. The impact of the resolution as an authoritative congressional interpretation of the President's constitutional war-making power was diluted, however, by the decision of Congress to include the interpretation of the President's war-making power in the "Purpose and Policy" section of the act, with the result that it did not purport to have legally binding effect.

The parts of the War Powers Resolution that did purport to be legally binding required the President to consult with Congress in every possible instance before committing the armed forces in hostilities or hostile situations. If the armed forces are introduced by the President into hostilities or hostile situations in the absence of a declared war, the resolution provided, the President must report the situation in writing to the presiding officers of the Congress within forty-eight hours and continue to report every six months thereafter. The resolution further required that in the absence of a declared war, the introduction of the armed forces must be terminated within sixty days, or ninety days if the military situation makes their safe withdrawal impossible within sixty days. Finally, in the absence of a declared war or congressional authorization, the President must withdraw the armed forces from hostilities occurring outside the territory of the United States if Congress directs him to do so by CONCURRENT RESOLUTION, which is not subject to the President's veto power.

Although the War Powers Resolution was plainly an attempt by Congress to reassert its authority over presidential war-making and over the conduct of foreign affairs generally, its impact upon presidential power did not appear to have been so great as its supporters hoped or it critics feared at the time of its passage. During the administration of President Ford, American armed forces were introduced into hostile situations during the evacuation of Vietnam as well as during the recapture of the American merchantman Mayaguez and its crew from Cambodia. President Ford nevertheless did not feel bound in these actions by the terms of the War Powers Resolution but rather made plain his conviction that he was acting under his constitutional powers as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF and as chief executive. The War Powers Resolution was thus subjected to early challenge as an authoritative construction of the President's war-making power. Given the ability of Presidents to marshal public support for their actions in foreign affairs, particularly in times of crisis, it was clear that the act could not be considered the last word regarding the relative power of Congress and the President in the field of foreign policy and war-making.

Just as the War Powers Resolution and the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act symbolized the reassertion of congressional power in relation to the executive, both also embodied the device which Congress increasingly used in reasserting power over executive policymaking—the LEGISLATIVE VETO. The legislative veto first emerged as a congressional device for controlling the executive during the 1930s when Congress reserved the right to veto presidential proposals to reorganize the executive branch, but by the 1970s the legislative veto in various forms had proliferated and had been embodied in almost two hundred statutes enacted by Congress. The increased use of the legislative veto reflected Congress's dissatisfaction with its relationship with the executive and a desire to reassert policymaking power that had been eroded during the previous decades of heightened executive power.

Congress employed the legislative veto to disapprove proposed presidential actions, to disapprove rules and regulations proposed by the executive branch or administrative agencies, and to order the termination of presidential actions. The device took several forms, with some statutes requiring a resolution of approval or disapproval by only one house of Congress, others requiring both houses to act through a concurrent resolution, and still others conferring upon congressional committees the power to exercise the legislative veto.

Despite its increased use by Congress, the legislative veto was frequently opposed by the executive branch since its introduction in the 1930s on the grounds that the practice violates the Constitution. The executive and other critics of the legislative veto argued that the practice violated the principle of SEPARATION OF POWERS, ignored the principle of bicameralism in the exercise of legislative power, and allowed Congress to avoid the President's veto power which is normally applicable to legislation passed by Congress.

The constitutional principle of separation of powers, critics of the legislative veto noted, permits Congress to shape national policy by passing statutes, but, properly construed, does not permit Congress to interfere in the enforcement or administration of policy—a power properly belonging to the executive branch. The legislative veto, it was argued, thus violated a fundamental constitutional principle, especially insofar as it was used to allow Congress to veto rules and regulations proposed by executive or administrative agencies under DELEGATIONS OF POWER from the Congress.

Opponents also argued that the Constitution contemplates that Congress's policy-making role ordinarily requires the passage of statutes by both houses of Congress with the presentation of the statutes to the President for his approval or disapproval. By allowing the approval or disapproval of national policy through single house resolutions, JOINT RESOLUTIONS, or decisions of congressional committees, it was argued, the legislative veto ignored the bicameral legislative process contemplated by the Constitution and in addition permitted congressional policymaking through mechanisms not subject to the President's veto power, as the Constitution also contemplated.

Congress, on the other hand, clearly viewed the legislative veto as a useful weapon in exercising oversight over the executive and the bureaucracy, both of which were recipients of massive delegations of legislative power since the 1930s. Striking at another source of the imperial presidency, Congress thus embodied the legislative veto in the National Emergencies Act of 1976, which terminated national emergencies declared by the President in 1933, 1950, 1970, and 1971, and required the President to inform the Congress of the existence of national emergencies and the powers the executive intends to use in managing the emergency. Such emergencies, the act provided, could be terminated at any time by Congress via a concurrent resolution. (See EMERGENCY POWERS.)

Despite the long-standing controversy regarding the constitutional legitimacy of the legislative veto, the Supreme Court did not pass upon the validity of the device until 1983. In IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), however, the Court declared the legislative veto invalid on the ground that it violated the constitutional principles requiring legislative enactments to be passed by both houses of Congress and to be subject to the veto powers of the President.

Just as the period from the administration of President Kennedy to that of President Ford witnessed significant readjustments of presidential-congressional relations, dramatic changes also occurred during the period in the nature of the political party system and the electoral process. Perhaps the most significant development was the decline in the power and influence of the major political parties. The decline in the percentage of the public who identified with the Republican and Democratic parties that began in the 1950s continued during the 1960s and 1970s. In 1952 twenty-two percent of the voters indicated a strong identification with the Democratic party, while thirteen percent indicated such an identification with the Republican party. By 1976, these percentages had declined to fifteen and nine percent, respectively, while the number of voters identifying themselves as independents had risen significantly.

This decline in voter identification with the two major political parties was accompanied by a decline in the importance of the national conventions of the two parties in the selection of presidential candidates. In 1960, only sixteen states selected their delegations to the national party conventions through presidential primaries, but by 1976 thirty states used the primary system for the selection of national party convention delegates, with the result that almost three-quarters of the Democratic national convention delegates and well over sixty percent of the Republican delegates were selected through the presidential primary process. Nominations of presidential candidates were consequently no longer the products of negotiations among party leaders at the national conventions; rather the national conventions merely ratified the selection of a presidential candidate as determined in the presidential primaries. And this decline in the significance of the national conventions was furthered, in the Democratic party, by the adoption of rules during the 1970s diminishing the power of party leaders and requiring proportional representation of women, minority groups, and other constituent groups within the party.

The decline of power of the political parties was furthered by the adoption of federal CAMPAIGN FINANCING laws in 1971, 1974, and 1976 which limited the amounts that could be contributed to election campaigns by individuals and groups and provided for federal financing of presidential elections. The result was a further diminution of the importance of traditional party organizations to presidential candidates, who increasingly relied upon personal campaign organizations both to win nomination and to conduct their national election campaigns. In a governmental system based upon the separation of powers, the decline of the party system, which traditionally had served to bridge the gap between the executive and legislative branches, could only have profound effects upon the capacity of Presidents to lead as well as upon the formation of national policy.

The period between 1961 and 1977 witnessed an acceleration of a long-term trend toward the centralization of power in the national government, although by the end of the period a significant reaction to this trend had become apparent. Two primary factors contributed to this centralizing trend: increased subsidization by the national government of programs at the state and local levels, and the assumption of responsibility by the national government over vast areas that had traditionally been left to state and local governments.

When John F. Kennedy was elected in 1960, for example, FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID to state and local governments stood at just over seven billion dollars and accounted for approximately fifteen percent of the total expenditures of state and local governments. By 1976, these federal grants-in-aid had mushroomed to almost sixty billion dollars and constituted almost twenty-five percent of total state and local expenditures.

Not only did state and local governments become increasingly dependent financially upon federal largess during this period but the character of federal grant-in-aid programs was also significantly altered. Before the 1960s, federal aid was primarily directed at subsidizing programs identified by state and local governments, but during the 1960s the identification of program needs increasingly shifted to the national government, with federal funds allocated according to national priorities. In addition, many federal grants, especially during President Johnson's War on Poverty program, were distributed at the local community level, by-passing state governors and officials who had traditionally had a voice in the administration of federal grants. As a result of the ensuing outcry from state and local officials, during the late 1960s and 1970s the federal government resorted to the device of block grants to state and local governments, grants involving fewer nationally imposed restrictions on their use and thus allowing the exercise of greater discretionary power by state and local officials. In 1972, Congress also adopted the State and Local Fiscal Assistance Act, which embraced the principle of federal revenue sharing with state and local governments. Despite the greater flexibility allowed state and local decision makers under REVENUE SHARING and block grants, the financial dependence of state and local governments on the national government in 1976 was eight times what it had been in 1960.

During the same period, the federal government's power was significantly expanded through congressional passage of a host of new statutes that expanded the regulatory role of the federal government in numerous new fields. Civil rights, the environment, occupational safety, consumer protection, and many other fields for the first time were subjected to extensive federal regulation. Since almost all of the new regulatory statutes involved extensive delegation of legislative power by Congress to the bureaucracy, the new expansion of federal regulatory authority involved a massive increase in administrative rules and regulations, as the bureaucracy exercised the legislative powers that had been delegated to it.

This increased intrusion of the federal government into the lives and affairs of the public ultimately produced a backlash of hostility toward the federal bureaucracy. John F. Kennedy had campaigned for the presidency in 1960 with the promise to get the country moving again, a promise suggesting an activist role for the national government. Because of the backlash against the expansion of the regulatory role of the federal government, however, presidential candidates in 1976 found that attacks on the federal bureaucracy and the national government as a whole hit a responsive chord with the public and proved to be popular campaign rhetoric.

This unpopularity of the bureaucracy, however, was only one symptom of the American public's shaken confidence in its major political institutions that had become manifest by the mid-1970s. Between 1961 and 1976, one President had been assassinated, one had resigned in disgrace, the long and costly war in Vietnam had concluded in disaster, and the Watergate affair had revealed the betrayal of the public trust at the highest levels of the government as well as abuses of power with sinister implications for the liberties of the American people. Such traumatic events not only undermined public confidence in political institutions but also profoundly affected the course of constitutional development. The office of the presidency, which since the 1930s had evolved into the dominant political institution at the national level, was consequently diminished considerably by 1976 in both power and prestige. Although a resurgence of congressional power had occurred in the 1970s, there was little evidence that Congress was institutionally capable of assuming the role of national leadership previously performed by the presidency, and effective national leadership had been made even more difficult by the decline of the political party system.

The most basic problem confronting the American polity by 1976 was nevertheless the problem of the loss of public confidence in governmental institutions. And the restoration of that confidence was the most profoundly difficult and fundamentally important task American public leadership faced as this period of constitutional development came to a close.

RICHARD C. CORTNER
(1986)

Bibliography

ALEXANDER, HERBERT 1976 Financing Politics: Money, Elections and Political Reform. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly.

DRY, MURRAY 1981 The Congressional Veto and the Constitutional Separation of Powers. In Bessette, Joseph M. and Tulis, Jeffry, The Presidency in the Constitutional Order. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

JACOB, HERBERT and VINES, KENNETH N., eds. 1976 Politics in the American States: A Comparative Analysis, 3rd ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

KEECH, WILLIAM R. and MATTHEWS, DONALD R. 1977 The Party's Choice. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

KURLAND, PHILIP B. 1977 Watergate and the Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SCHLESINGER, ARTHUR M., JR. 1973 The Imperial Presidency. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

SCIGLIANO, ROBERT 1981 The War Powers Resolution and the War Powers. In Bessette, Joseph M. and Tulis, Jeffry, The Presidency in the Constitutional Order. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

SUNDQUIST, LEONARD D. 1981 The Decline and Resurgence of Congress. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1977–1985

As America moved from commemorating the bicentennial of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE to commemorating the bicentennial of the Constitution, the political order was in apparent disarray. Constitutional history is, primarily, an account of changes in the distribution of power and authority within a regime. At least since 1933, political power in the American regime had shifted toward the federal government, and, within the federal government, toward the executive branch. Commentators referred to an "imperial presidency"; and yet no one since DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER had held the presidential office for two full terms. JOHN F. KENNEDY had been assassinated; LYNDON B. JOHNSON had abandoned the quest for reelection; RICHARD M. NIXON had been forced to resign; GERALD R. FORD, the appointed vice-president who succeeded Nixon, lost his bid for election in his own right. JIMMY CARTER, who defeated Ford, was to prove unable to carry the burden of the presidency, and so to be crushed in his bid for reelection by the landslide that elected RONALD REAGAN.

The national consensus about what the government should be and should do, at bottom a consensus about the meaning of the Constitution, was breaking down. No longer did national majorities automatically form behind the notions of positive government, of redistribution of wealth and incomes, or of solving anything identified as a "national problem" by creating a new administrative agency within the federal BUREAUCRACY. There were indications that a new consensus was forming, but it was not yet fully formed. Less clearly than in the past—say, in 1800, 1832, 1860, or 1932—was the new consensus readily identified with the program of a particular POLITICAL PARTY, although the revitalization of the Republican party gave it the better claim to such identification.

Constitutional history can be understood either broadly or narrowly. In the broad sense, the constitution is the arrangement of offices and the distribution of powers in a country, it is how the country governs itself. In a narrow sense, the Constitution is a document in which the framework for self-government is spelled out. The process of constitutional change in the United States most often involves redistribution of power without constitutional amendment.

Formal amendment of the Constitution is a rare event. Only thirty-two amendments have ever been proposed by Congress, and two of those were pending as 1977 began; by 1985 both had died for want of RATIFICATION. The EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT (ERA), ostensibly a guarantee that women and men would be treated equally under the law, but potentially a blank check for expansion of federal and judicial power, had been proposed in 1972. The DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REPRESENTATION AMENDMENT, which would have made the national capital the equivalent of a STATE for most purposes, had been proposed in 1978. Even as those proposals failed to obtain the necessary votes in state legislatures, there was popular demand for more amendments: to mandate a balanced federal BUDGET; to proscribe SCHOOL BUSING as a remedy for de facto school segregation; to permit prayer in public schools; and to overturn the Supreme Court's proclamation of a constitutional right to abortion.

Amendments to accomplish each of these objectives were introduced in Congress, and the ERA was reintroduced, but none was proposed to the states. Indeed, only one amendment received a two-thirds vote in either house of Congress: the balanced budget amendment passed the Senate, but died when the House of Representatives failed to act on it. In the case of the balanced budget amendment, there were petitions from thirty-three states (one less than constitutionally required) calling for a convention to frame the proposal. Although there was much speculation among politicians, academicians, and pundits about how such a convention might work and whether it could be restricted in its scope, the failure of a thirty-fourth state to act made the speculation at least temporarily moot.

For three decades, constitutional innovation had been centered on the judicial branch. Between 1977 and 1985, however, constitutional development centered on the contest between Congress and the executive branch for predominance. The most important constitutional decision of the Supreme Court during the period, IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), passed on a phase of that contest.

The only uniquely American constitutional doctrine is that of the SEPARATION OF POWERS attended by CHECKS AND BALANCES. The embodiment of that doctrine in the Constitution set up a constant rivalry for preeminence between the political branches and an intense jealousy of powers and prerogatives. Beginning in the FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT era, the President—or the institutionalized presidency—seemed to acquire ever more power within the political system, and appeared to have acquired a permanent position of dominance. But the VIETNAM WAR and the WATERGATE crisis led to a resurgence of Congress, represented especially in the War Powers Resolution of 1973 and the CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET AND IMPOUNDMENT CONTROL ACT of 1974.

The seizure of the American embassy in Iran by Islamic revolutionary guards in 1979 set the stage for reassessment of the constitutional status of the WAR POWERS. President Carter in April 1980 ordered the armed forces to attempt a rescue of the American citizens held hostage in Tehran. The secrecy necessarily surrounding such an attempt precluded the "consultations" mandated by the War Powers Resolution. When, through the coincidence of bad planning and bad weather, the operation proved a costly failure, congressional critics were quick to denounce Carter for his defiance of the law—some going so far as to call for his IMPEACHMENT. The hostages subsequently were released as the result of an EXECUTIVE AGREEMENT by which Carter canceled the claims of some Americans against the revolutionary government of Iran and caused other claims to be submitted to an international tribunal rather than to American courts. This settlement of the hostage crisis appeared to some observers to exceed the scope of presidential power, but it was upheld by the Supreme Court in DAMES & MOORE V. REGAN (1981).

The War Powers Resolution continued to bedevil presidential conduct of FOREIGN AFFAIRS during the Reagan administration; but the real character of that controversial resolution was revealed by the contrast between two incidents involving American military forces. In 1981 President Reagan, at the request of all of the governments of the region, and in conjunction with two foreign allies, detailed a battalion of marines to Beirut, Lebanon, as part of an international peacekeeping force. The operation was not of the sort explicitly covered by the War Powers Resolution, and Reagan, although he communicated with members of Congress, did not take steps to comply with the consultation or reporting requirements of the resolution. Congress, however, unilaterally acted to approve the President's course of action rather than precipitate a confrontation over either the applicability of the resolution or its constitutionality. Several months after a suicide bomber killed more than 200 marines, the President withdrew the rest of the marines from Lebanon, conceding a major foreign policy failure; but Congress, because it had acted affirmatively to approve the operation, was in no position to condemn the President for that failure.

Subsequently, in 1984, the President authorized a military operation to rescue American citizens trapped in the small Carribean nation of Grenada and to liberate that country from a Cuban-sponsored communist dictatorship. Such an operation was precisely within the terms of the War Powers Resolution, but it was planned and executed in secrecy and, again, the President complied with neither the consultation nor the reporting requirements of the resolution. However, because the operation was perceived as a success, most members of Congress refrained from complaining about the breach of the War Powers Resolution.

As the War Powers Resolution represented the resurgence of Congress in the foreign policy arena, the Congressional Budget Act was designed to reassert congressional control over government spending priorities. The federal budgetary process had been introduced in the 1920s to replace the chaotic amalgam of uncoordinated appropriations by which Congress had theretofore allocated federal revenues. But the executive budget, while coordinating expenditures and subjecting them to a common annual plan, remained detached from the appropriations process; hence disputes arose between the branches, especially when the aggregate of appropriations exceeded the executive's estimate of revenues. The deferral and cancellation of appropriated expenditures—called IMPOUNDMENT—became especially controversial when President Nixon was accused of using them for political, rather than economic, reasons.

The 1974 act purported to solve the problem by making budget planning a congressional function and by linking budgeting and appropriations in a single process. But, because the internal structure of Congress is not conducive to unified decision making and because the executive branch has not conceded that the detailed planning of expenditures is properly a legislative activity, the revised budget process has not been successful. The national government commonly operates for most of the year on the basis of resolutions authorizing continued spending at some percentage increase over the previous year's spending plus numerous special appropriations.

Between 1977 and 1985, as, to a lesser degree, between WORLD WAR II and 1977, one of the great tests of constitutional government in America was the fiscal crisis resulting from persistent excesses of governmental expenditures over governmental revenues. Under constant political pressure to maintain or increase expenditure levels, but facing the unpopularity of increases in taxation (combined with the economic difficulty that increased tax rates may, by diminishing the tax base, actually result in lower revenues), Congress has resorted to borrowing to finance chronic deficits. At the end of 1985, Congress enacted, and President Reagan signed, a law providing for automatic reductions of appropriations when projected deficits reached specified levels. However, the ink was hardly dry before that measure (the GRAMM-RUDMAN-HOLLINGS ACT) was challenged as unconstitutional, even by some members of Congress and some representatives of the administration.

State legislatures, commonly required by their state constitutions to balance their own annual budgets, have petitioned Congress for a convention to propose a balanced budget amendment to the federal constitution. How even a constitutional mandate could be enforced to make Congress do what it seems unable to do, that is, to make difficult choices about public affairs, remains unclear. Meanwhile, the Congressional Budget Act exists to frustrate any attempt of the executive branch to supply the decision making.

Yet another device by which Congress attempted to reassert itself in the contest for dominance under a constitution that separates powers was the LEGISLATIVE VETO. Long before 1977, the DELEGATION OF POWER to the executive branch and to various INDEPENDENT REGULATORY AGENCIES was so great that the published volumes of federal regulations exceeded in number by many times the volumes of federal statutes. In statutes delegating legislative power to administrative bodies, Congress began to include provisions allowing Congress, or one house of Congress, to deprive agency actions of effect by simple resolution. In June 1983 the Supreme Court, in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA, held that the legislative veto, in some or all of its forms, was unconstitutional. The effect of the Chadha decision on legislative veto provisions that differed significantly from that in the Immigration and Nationality Act remained unclear for some time after the decision, and Congress continued to enact new legislative veto provisions after the decision. The real winner in that struggle for power, however, was not the President, but the bureaucracy.

Congress also asserted itself in more traditional ways, especially by exploiting the constitutional requirement that certain presidential actions have the Senate's ADVICE AND CONSENT. One category of such action is treaty making. President Carter suffered embarrassment over the PANAMA CANAL TREATIES and defeat on the second Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty. The Panama Canal debate was the first extended debate on a major treaty since that on the Treaty of Versailles in 1919. The treaty was signed in September 1977 but the Senate did not consent to its ratification until the spring of 1978. The vote was 68–32 (only one affirmative vote more than required) and the Senate attached a "reservation" to the treaty, asserting that the United States could intervene militarily if the canal should ever be closed; the reservation nearly caused Panama to rescind its ratification of the treaty. President Carter signed the strategic arms treaty in July 1979 at a summit meeting with President Leonid Brezhnev of the Soviet Union. Although trumpeted as a major foreign policy achievement, the treaty was delayed in Senate hearings and finally shelved in 1980 after the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan.

President Carter vigorously asserted the presidential treaty power when, after recognizing the People's Republic of China in Beijing as the lawful government of all of China he unilaterally abrogated the long-standing mutual defense treaty between the United States and the Republic of China on Taiwan. An affronted Congress immediately provided for a United States Institute to represent American interests in the Republic of China while delaying for over a year Carter's request that trade preferences be granted to the mainland regime. Congress was unable to salvage the mutual defense treaty, however; and the Supreme Court held in GOLDWATER V. CARTER (1979) that members of Congress lacked STANDING to challenge the President's action in court.

The other category of action requiring Senate approval is appointments. The Senate, although nominally controlled by the President's own party, frequently used confirmation hearings and votes to express disapproval of certain Reagan administration policies, especially the administration's reluctance to impose and enforce AFFIRMATIVE ACTION requirements. The Senate delayed for over a year appointment of Edwin Meese to be ATTORNEY GENERAL, and rejected outright the promotion of William Bradford Reynolds to be associate attorney general. Although Reagan's nomination of SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR to the Supreme Court (the only nomination to the Court between 1977 and 1985) was approved rapidly and without serious controversy, several other judicial appointments were delayed or rejected.

Another signal characteristic of American constitutionalism is FEDERALISM. From the mid-1930s on, the balance of power between the national government and the states has been shifting steadily in favor of the national government. President Reagan came to office pledging a reversal of that trend. However, his proposal for a "new federalism," in which governmental functions assumed by the national government would be relinquished to the states, was coolly received not only by Congress but also by state politicians, who feared that their responsibilities would increase even as their revenues continued to decrease. Somewhat more successful was Reagan's proposal to replace the myriad of categorical FEDERAL GRANTS IN-AID, by which the national government partially funded certain mandated programs and set the standards by which the programs were to be run, with block grants.

Congress, however, has increasingly imposed conditions and restrictions on the use of block grant funds; so even the limited victory may prove hollow. Although conservatives like President Reagan frequently express a principled aversion to the use of conditional grants of money as a means to coerce the states into acceding to federal goals and programs, they have not been so averse in practice. Examples of new uses of the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER to accomplish legislative goals not strictly within Congress's ENUMERATED POWERS include: a requirement that hospitals receiving federal funds perform certain lifesaving measures on behalf of handicapped newborn children; a requirement that states, as a condition of receiving highway building funds, enact certain provisions to counter drunken driving; and a requirement that schools, as a condition of receiving federal aid, permit religious groups to meet in their facilities on the same basis as do other extracurricular organizations.

Whether the election of 1980 wrought an enduring change in the constitution of American government remains an open question. Although President Reagan decisively defeated former Vice-President Walter F. Mondale in 1984, the House of Representatives remained under the control of Carter's and Mondale's party. And the Senate, even with a Republican majority, did not prove to be so committed as the President to reduction of the role of the federal government in American society. Nevertheless, Reagan had considerable success in achieving the deregulation of some kinds of businesses and in returning to private enterprise some activities that had come under the ownership and management of the federal government. On the other hand, the heralded "new federalism" did not cause a resurgence in the relative importance of the state governments, and federal control continued to be maintained through the use of conditions attached to grants-in-aid. At the bicentennial of the Constitution, it is still too early to say whether Reagan effected, as he said he would, "another American revolution."

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

CARTER, JIMMY 1984 Keeping the Faith. New York: Bantam.

FISHER, LOUIS 1984 Congressional Conflicts between Congress and the President. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

GINSBERG, BENJAMIN 1987 Reconstituting American Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

HOWITT, ARNOLD M. 1984 Managing Federalism. Washington: Congressional Quarterly.

SCHRAMM, PETER W. and MAHONEY, DENNIS J., eds. 1986 The 1984 Election and the Future of American Politics. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1980–1989

The major constitutional development of the 1980s was the confirmation of divided government as a legitimate alternative to presidential party government as a model for constitutional administration. In the elections of 1980 and 1984 the people chose a Republican President while returning a Democratic majority to the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. In 1986 the Democratic party regained control of the Senate, which it retained in 1988 as the REPUBLICAN PARTY again won the presidency. This type of split-ticket voting was a relatively new phenomenon in modern American politics. From 1889 to 1953, no President on his inauguration faced a Congress one house of which was controlled by the opposition party. The contemporary period of divided government began in 1969 when the Republican RICHARD M. NIXON was elected President and the Democrats controlled Congress. After the resignation of Nixon in 1974, the Democrats briefly revived presidential party government with the election of JIMMY CARTER in 1976. Their inability to govern effectively despite having power over both political branches prepared the way for the Republican capture of the White House in 1980.

Throughout the 1980s, assessments of divided government tended to be uncertain because such government contradicted what had come to be accepted since the NEW DEAL as the constitutional norm, namely, presidential government under a dominant party after a critical or realigning election. In fact, there were indications in Nixon's two election victories of a disintegration of the New Deal liberal coalition and an expectation of a political realignment that would enable the presidential party system to continue. The problem with this analysis was that while twentieth-century presidential government was historically liberal, many students of politics believed it was also inherently or in its nature liberal. Many observers were therefore reluctant to conclude that divided government could represent the deliberate choice of the electorate or that it could be a satisfactory approach to running the Constitution, despite the fact that it brought the constitutional principle of the SEPARATION OF POWERS more directly to bear on the conduct of government.

Part of the difficulty observers had in recognizing the legitimacy of divided government was attributable to the political popularity of RONALD REAGAN. Despite having twice been elected governor of California, Reagan was an improbable candidate for President. This improbability owed less to his being a former Hollywood actor than to his advocacy of NATURAL RIGHTS individualism, LIMITED GOVERNMENT, and middle class social values that had come to be identified in the dominant political culture as the essence of right-wing reactionism. Labeled an "ideological" candidate by the national media, he ran on a platform that proposed to reverse the tide of centralized BUREAUCRACY, restore equal opportunity for individuals, stimulate economic growth through deregulation and market incentives, and rebuild national defense. Reagan's assertion of these policies made the election of 1980 the most significant since 1932. In effect, it was a REFERENDUM on the regulatory WELFARE STATE, broadly conceived in the light of the liberal reforms of the 1960s and 1970s. When President Reagan won reelection in 1984, and Vice-President GEORGE BUSH won election as President in 1988, in a significant sense the era of welfare state liberalism was over, a fact difficult to deny. Divided government was the constitutional expression of this political change.

In one sense, the source or cause of divided government was the Constitution. The FUNDAMENTAL LAW organizes government into three coordinate branches and, in the words of THE FEDERALIST #51, guards against a concentration of the several powers in the same department by "giving to those who administer each department the necessary constitutional means and personal motives to resist the encroachments of the others." Moreover, the Constitution permits voters to make a free political choice, including that of ticket splitting (which some critics of divided government have proposed to restrict by a constitutional amendment). Furthermore, the Constitution does not establish POLITICAL PARTIES in the structure of government, but allows them to exist as voluntary associations regulated by state and federal law. A contributing factor to divided government was the decline of partisan loyalty in the electorate, caused in part by antiparty reform measures, such as CAMPAIGN FINANCE laws. With the decline of party, political choice was based in part on the political values, principles, and governmental duties and functions associated with the executive and legislative branches or their leading officials. The separation of powers, one of the basic concepts of limited government, was thus the organizing principle of divided government.

A second apparent cause of divided government was uncertainty or ambivalence in the electorate about the basic direction of public policy. In electing Republican chief executives, the people approved of policies aimed at economic expansion, control of inflation, tax reform, limitations on government spending, and strengthened national defense. In voting Democratic control of Congress, the people expressed a desire to maintain the social welfare and regulatory programs that constituted the achievement of modern liberalism. These included ENTITLEMENT programs and legally conferred benefits for individuals and groups in every social class. Although politically contradictory, these policy alternatives might be seen as reflecting complementary dimensions of the public philosophy underlying American CONSTITUTIONALISM: individualism, based on natural rights principles that limit government power, and the public interest, based on community consensus that requires government regulation.

Nevertheless, in a relative historical sense, by contrast with the period of presidential party government which it succeeded, the public philosophy of divided government represented a partial attempt to restore an older conception of limited government. This was the idea that federal power was limited to specific ends or objects in accordance with the federal principle of divided SOVEREIGNTY. Reagan administration proposals for a new FEDERALISM that would return certain policy matters to the states expressed this outlook. Underlying these proposals was the more basic idea of restoring a sense of discipline and limitation in the conduct of government, seen in attempts to limit government spending, reduce the federal deficit, and revive the concept of a balanced BUDGET.

The political expression of this conservative idea was a state-based movement for a CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION to limit federal spending and achieve a balanced budget. By the mid-1980s this movement had begun to produce political effects in Washington. The Republican-controlled Senate and executive branch supported a BALANCED-BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT. The Democratic party switched from supporting deficit spending to arguing for deficit reduction as a reaction against Reagan administration defense spending in a year (1985) when the deficit reached $200 billion. With the executive and legislature each blaming the other for the deficits, the situation was ripe for a bipartisan solution. The result was the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985.

Known as the GRAMM-RUDMAN-HOLLINGS ACT, the law required the federal budget deficit to be reduced by stages until it was eliminated in 1991. It contained a triggering mechanism by which automatic across-the-board spending cuts were mandated if deficits exceeded specified levels at certain target dates. Finding it difficult to meet the reduction requirements, Congress put some spending items "off budget" so that they would not be counted in the reckoning of the deficit problem. In 1987 it revised the law to postpone the balanced budget date to 1993. Although the Washington political establishment generally disliked the law, it had the effect of reducing the deficit and slowing the rate of increase in government spending. Despite sharp differences over spending priorities, limitation of spending had become a bipartisan objective or requirement, replacing the presumption of indefinite government expansion based on taxing and spending that marked the 1960s and 1970s. In this sense, divided government signaled the kind of change in the policy agenda associated with a political realignment.

Although compromise could be said to be the logic of government under the separation of powers, as seen in the disposition of such major issues as the budget deficit, tax reform, and control of immigration, ideological conflict was the predominant political effect of divided government. The struggle between the executive and legislature for control of the administrative state, a continuing theme in twentieth-century CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, was exacerbated by the ideological polarization of the 1980s.

Powerful governing instruments were available for carrying on the struggle for policymaking and administrative control. Having forced President Nixon to resign through application of the IMPEACHMENT power, Congress curbed EXECUTIVE POWER by passing laws respecting presidential actions in regard to WAR POWERS, intelligence activities, and budgetary matters. In 1978, Congress took the major step of creating the office of special prosecutor outside the executive branch to investigate wrongdoing in high-level executive offices. By vigorous use of the LEGISLATIVE VETO and the appropriations and oversight powers, Congress in the 1980s challenged the president not only in domestic policy but also in FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Although the executive was weaker than in the era of presidential party government, this branch also experienced a restoration of authority under divided government. Despite legislative measures aimed at limiting the executive, the principal elements of presidential power from the pre-WATERGATE period remained intact. The White House staff of 600 and the Executive Office of the President staff of 5,000 employees were powerful institutions that functioned as a policymaking structure parallel to the regular executive departments. Perhaps the main element in the power of the chief executive was the fact that political responsibility for government continued to fall primarily upon the president. On the whole, despite severe second-term problems in the IRAN-CONTRA AFFAIR, President Reagan was reasonably successful in meeting that responsibility. Possessing aptitude suitable for a plebiscitary type of presidency, he used the media effectively to communicate directly with the electorate and shape public opinion in support of administration policies.

Although President Reagan's political appeal rested in part on his opposition to big government, he responded to the constitutional imperative of the modern administrative state by expanding executive authority to achieve the policy ends of his administration. In 1981 he issued Executive Order 12291, giving the OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET (OMB) authority to require executive agencies to submit cost-benefit analyses. Focused on budgetary impact, the order was intended as a check on the regulatory process, aimed at eliminating waste and inefficiency. In 1985, President Reagan issued a more far-reaching directive, Executive Order 12498, intended to coordinate and establish White House control over bureaucratic policymaking. This order required executive agencies to submit proposed regulations to OMB for substantive approval to ensure that they were consistent with overall White House policy.

The Reagan EXECUTIVE ORDERS resisted an inherent tendency in Congress toward micromanagement of the executive branch, a tendency encouraged by the politics of divided government. Reaction to the directives revealed the ambiguous constitutional status of ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES subject to the control of both the President and Congress. Functionally the executive departments and independent REGULATORY AGENCIES are in the executive branch, for they are concerned with enforcing and administering laws. The President can order administrative officers to carry out policies within their statutory discretion, and if they fail to follow his direction, he should be able to remove them, on the theory that the Constitution intends law enforcement to be managed by the chief executive. Adminstrative departments and agencies owe their existence, however, to Congress. By its lawmaking power, it creates the units of the administrative state, defining the purpose and powers of each department or agency and the terms and conditions of holding office. From this point of view, the executive departments and regulatory agencies are accountable to Congress and may exercise rulemaking discretion only within their statutory mandates.

Claiming discretionary rulemaking authority exercised by previous administrations, Reagan officials frequently acted to withdraw, revoke, or alter agency rules. When they did so, they were sometimes charged, by congressional committees and by private INTEREST GROUPS that opposed the changes, with violating their statutory authority. In the period of divided government, rulemaking under the delegation of LEGISLATIVE POWER to the executive, usually considered a basic feature of the modern administrative state, was thus subject to attack as lawless executive conduct.

Despite serious deregulatory efforts, the structure of the regulatory welfare state changed very little in the 1980s. Few agencies were eliminated, and given the balance of political forces and congressional defense of the status quo, it was difficult to effect major policy changes. On the government-expansion side, the Veterans Administration was elevated to cabinet rank. The main difference between this period and the 1970s was that the regulatory state functioned in a more accommodating and less antagonistic spirit in relation to regulated groups and associations. Corporations opposed the wholesale dismantling of regulatory structures that the "Reagan revolution" at first seemed to threaten, because it would reopen costly political and legal battles. What corporations wanted was greater flexibility in government—business relations and greater reliance on economic analysis in regulatory policy. After initially strong deregulatory efforts met stiff resistance in the subgovernments of the administrative constitution, the Reagan administration moderated its regulatory policy accordingly.

In seeking to preserve the regulatory welfare state, the Democratic congressional establishment evinced tendencies toward legislative supremacy inherent in the doctrine of the separation of powers and the theory of POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY. As in the past, the appropriations power, regarded as the quintessential legislative power, was the most effective instrument for asserting the congressional will.

The CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET AND IMPOUNDMENT CONTROL ACT of 1974 made Congress an equal participant in budget planning. The act created the Congressional Budget Office to compete with the OMB, and it solved the problem of presidential IMPOUNDMENT OF FUNDS by placing tight restrictions on presidential nonspending (called deferrals and rescissions). At the same time, the act succeeded in one of its implicit purposes, to facilitate congressional spending, which increased significantly in the 1970s and 1980s. Under divided government, the cooperation envisioned in the budget act between the executive and legislature was elusive, and by 1985 it was widely believed that the BUDGET PROCESS was not working satisfactorily, for reasons that implicated both branches. The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act did not improve the process.

Failing to reach agreement on the series of executive department appropriations bills required by the law, Congress from 1986 to 1988 enacted each year a single measure, the omnibus continuing resolution, to fund the entire federal government. The continuing resolution previously had been a technical expedient used to keep an agency in operation when action on an appropriations bill was not complete by the end of the congressional session. It now was transformed into a comprehensive budget act. Concealed within the continuing resolutions were many substantive policy decisions, unknown to anyone but their subcommittee sponsors, that were enacted into law without public scrutiny and debate. The continuing resolution for 1988, for example, appropriated $605 billion, was 1,057 pages long, and was accompanied by a 1,194-page conference report. President Reagan, with only one day to consider the bill, was virtually forced to sign it if he did not want to shut down the government for lack of funds. In effect, Congress deprived the President of his VETO POWER.

Another constitutional innovation of Congress was the creation of commissions outside the government to decide public policy matters. For example, Congress established the National Economic Commission; the Commission on Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Salaries; and the Commission on Sentencing Guidelines to deal with politically controversial subjects. These were but a few of 596 federal commissions created in 1988 by Congress, 117 of which were determined by the General Accounting Office to be concerned with substantive policy questions. A contemporary manifestation of the progressive belief that government could be purified by separating politics from administration, government by commission added a new wrinkle by proposing to separate politics from legislation. It was an acknowledgment that the legislative process itself, where interests are properly expressed, was so immobilized by faction and ideology that Congress was prepared to abdicate its constitutional responsibility for lawmaking.

If the policy environment was not conducive to legislation, Congress could influence administrative policymaking through the legislative veto. In the era of presidential party government the legislative veto was used mainly to effect executive reorganization plans and strengthen presidential policymaking. In the aftermath of Watergate, Congress used the veto extensively to supervise regulatory policymaking, including it in more than 200 statutes. The Supreme Court declared the legislative veto unconstitutional in the case of IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA. Nevertheless, Congress continued to employ devices that were the functional equivalent of the legislative veto. For example, it required agencies to get the approval of appropriations committees before taking an action and used committee reports and notification requirement to supervise bureaucratic policymaking.

The most significant congressional constitutional innovation in the period of divided government was the creation of a major executive office, the INDEPENDENT COUNSEL, outside the executive branch. The independent counsel is a SPECIAL PROSECUTOR whose duty is to investigate allegations of criminality by high-level officials in the executive branch. After the Watergate affair, bills were introduced into Congress to provide for the prosecution of executive branch wrongdoing by an officer not subject to the political influence or legal control of the President. The premise on which these proposals rested was that an inherent conflict of interest prevented the President and the Justice Department from conducting an unbiased investigation of malfeasance in the executive branch. Publicly the proponents of the special prosecutor defended it as an "auxiliary precaution" under the theory of separation of powers and CHECKS AND BALANCES for controlling the government, especially the executive power. The Carter administration supported this legislation, and the office of special prosecutor—renamed independent counsel in 1983—was included in the Ethics in Government Act of 1978.

The independent counsel act assumes that the executive branch is peculiarly prone to illegal activity and conflict of interest. Its provisions apply to the President, vice-president, cabinet officers, senior White House staff, and sundry directors of agencies constituting a class of about seventy officials. The law provides that upon receiving information about a possible criminal violation by a covered official, the ATTORNEY GENERAL shall conduct an inquiry to decide whether an investigation by an independent counsel is needed. Restrictions on the attorney general make further investigation almost necessary for dealing with allegations of wrongdoing. The judiciary committee of either house is also authorized to request the appointment of a special prosecutor. At the request of the attorney general, a panel of judges from the District of Columbia Circuit Court (called the Special Division) appoints an independent counsel, whose jurisdiction is defined by the Special Division and who can be removed by the attorney general only for cause.

Although the act purports to separate the independent counsel from the legislative branch, the effect of the law is to create a major executive office outside the executive branch. It provides a means by which Congress can do things that for political reasons it might not wish to do through the use of constitutional powers otherwise available to it, such as impeachment. Investigation and INDICTMENT through the independent counsel process can be seen as a substitute for impeachment. Despite the appointment of the counsel by the attorney general and the appearance of administrative independence, the independent counsel is in effect an agent of Congress, for congressional committee investigations are the primary source of information on which the appointment process is based. Furthermore, when an executive official is targeted for investigation, the independent counsel is under political pressure to find a violation. The counsel searches for a crime to pin on the executive official, rather than looking for the person to fit the crime, as traditional law enforcement does.

In Morrison v. Olson (1988) the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the independent counsel act. In earlier decisions, such as Chadha, NORTHERN PIPELINE CO. V. MARATHON PIPE LINE CO. (1981), and BOWSHER V. SYNAR (1986), the Court had struck down acts of Congress as violations of the separation of powers. Its acceptance of the independent counsel was therefore a major victory for Congress. The independent counsel's functions appeared to be a "purely executive power" that under the Court's previous separation of powers decisions required placing the officer under the full removal power of the President. The Court dropped this line of analysis, however, concluding simply that the removal provisions of the act and other limits on the President's ability to control the discretion of the independent counsel did not interfere with the President's exercise of his constitutional duty to execute the laws. Morrison v. Olson in effect invited Congress to create additional special prosecutors to enforce laws that are judged to be too important to leave to the discretionary litigation policy of politically appointed officers in the executive branch.

Although the office of independent counsel was created ostensibly to assure impartial investigation of executive branch improprieties, it encouraged lawmakers to pursue policy disagreements with the executive branch in a partisan manner, to the point of criminalizing them. The Iran-Contra affair illustrated this tendency. It also epitomized the conflicts of divided government carried into the sphere of foreign policy. In this pivotal event, the President relied on executive discretion in foreign affairs, congressional committees investigated executive officials in the accusatorial manner established in the McCarthy era, and independent counsel obtained indictments leading to criminal trials that obviated impeachment proceedings.

The Iran-Contra affair initially involved the secret sale of arms to Iran, with which the United States had been in a state of undeclared war since 1979. The sale was a foreign policy maneuver intended to secure the release of American hostages held by Arab terrorists. This covert action arguably violated the requirement of the NATIONAL SECURITY ACT that the President, in conducting such an operation, make a factual "finding" and notify Congress. The Reagan administration used the profits from the Iranian arms sale to aid the Contras in Nicaragua seeking to overthrow the left-wing Sandinista government. The foreign policy question here was whether the United States should support the rebels. Congress cast the dispute in legal terms, which was made easier by a series of riders it had attached to defense appropriations acts from 1982 to 1986. These riders, known as the BOLAND AMENDMENTS, prohibited any funds from being spent by any agency of the United States involved in "intelligence activities," for the purpose of supporting the military overthrow of the Nicaraguan government.

Fundamental constitutional issues concerning the powers of President and Congress in foreign policy were hung on the peg of narrow statutory questions concerning the meaning of the Boland amendments. Yet as products of legislative compromise and executive-legislative accommodation in the (unacknowledged) spirit of divided government, the riders were deliberately vague and ambiguous. A key question was whether the National Security Council (NSC) was an "intelligence activity" in the sense intended by the legislation. The riders did not expressly identify it as such, although they did so identify other agencies. A further question, assuming that NSC was covered, was whether its activities conformed to the permissible scope of intelligence activities assisting the Contras that the Boland amendments approved. Neither the Iran-Contra hearings nor subsequent judicial trials of NSC officials satisfactorily resolved these questions.

If basic constitutional questions could not be reached, answers to narrow legal questions were also elusive because of the basic ambiguity in congressional foreign policy. Sometimes Congress voted for military and humanitarian aid to the Contras; at other times it barred using military equipment to overthrow the Nicaraguan government. Congress desired to challenge the President's control of foreign policy, but was afraid of critical public reaction if it did so too clearly or extremely. Therefore, it resorted to imprecise statutory language that did not unequivocally block the executive branch from carrying out its pro-Contra policy. For his part, President Reagan did not veto the Boland amendments, either because he viewed them as a compromise that permitted the administration to pursue its policy or because he feared impeachment.

The latter was a reasonable fear, for when information about the Iranian arms sale was revealed in 1986 a Watergate-type impeachment mood gripped many lawmakers and critics of the executive branch. The office of independent counsel, however, in conjunction with the traditional legislative power of investigation, was available as a less politically risky alternative. In November 1986, President Reagan promptly agreed to a congressional request to seek the appointment of an independent counsel to investigate the Iran-Contra affair. NSC officers Lt. Col. Oliver North, Admiral John Poindexter, and Robert McFarlane were the most prominent targets of the investigation, which resulted in at least six criminal convictions.

The trial of Oliver North illustrated the process by which constitutional controversy over the conduct of foreign policy was reduced to minor criminal convictions. North was a principal figure in the administration's policy who was called to testify in 1987 before the House and Senate select committees investigating the Iran-Contra matter. He was given a grant of criminal-use IMMUNITY, which meant that his testimony—televised to the nation in dramatically staged hearings—could not be used against him in any criminal prosecution that might result from the independent counsel's investigation. North's testimony was subsequently used against him, however, in a supposedly nonevidentiary way that arguably violated North's Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION as interpreted by the Supreme Court in KASTIGAR V. UNITED STATES (1972). North was indicted on a dozen counts. He was not charged with violating the Boland amendments, and he was acquitted on the most serious charges, such as defrauding the government by diverting funds to the Contras. North was convicted on three charges: accepting an illegal gratuity, falsifying and destroying government documents, and obstructing Congress.

The precise purpose of Congress in the Iran-Contra affair was a matter of some dispute. In policy terms, the Democratic leadership opposed aiding the rebels, yet it pursued this policy ambiguously and inconsistently. More clear was the constitutional purpose of Congress—to assert the power of the legislative branch in foreign affairs. Historical practice and constitutional law recognized a broad sphere of executive power and discretion in this area. Congress therefore required cogent arguments against the administration's policy to overcome the presumption that tended to favor executive authority in the making of foreign policy, especially in the twentieth century. To bring foreign policy in a detailed operational sense under the RULE OF LAW, as the Boland amendments purported to do, asserted a congressional claim of authority to rival that of the President. Criminalizing the foreign policy disagreement through the use of independent counsel prosecutions was a suitable means of discrediting executive authority. An administration that conducted foreign policy by illegal or lawless means could not be considered constitutionally legitimate. This was the point that criminal convictions in the Iran-Contra affair were intended to make.

Criminal conviction was an effective policymaking tool because it could be justified by the traditional republican goal of imposing the rule of law on executive power, which is always the potential source of tyranny, according to the antiexecutive strain in American political thought. Although the Iran-Contra defendants were not tried for violating the Boland amendments, members of Congress did not hesitate to make accusations and to conclude that officials of the executive branch broke the laws enacted by Congress to prevent the United States from getting involved in a war in Latin America. Senators and representatives could make these accusations, confident that under the separation of powers doctrine their possession of the lawmaking power makes them superior to the executive branch and establishes a presumption that the will of Congress is tantamount to the rule of law.

Even if the Boland amendments are considered constitutional, it is questionable whether the lawmaking power can be effectively employed in making foreign policy. The reason is that in foreign affairs U.S. officials are required to deal with the representatives of other countries, who are not subject to the authority and rules of action that constitute U.S. law. The rule of law as propounded by legislative enactments under the separation of powers is further questionable because the purpose of foreign policy is to protect the public safety and national security. Prudence, wisdom, and discretion in the exercise of power are required to achieve this end, rather than the general and prospective rules of action that characterize the rule of law. The statesmanship on which the successful conduct of foreign policy depends has usually been thought more likely to result from the actions of the chief executive, who can be held politically accountable, than from the deliberations of hundreds of lawmakers in Congress.

In the 1980s, tendencies toward legislative assertiveness clashed with an executive authority that had significantly recovered from the power deflation and loss of respect suffered during the eras of the VIETNAM WAR and Watergate. President Reagan was in many respects a nonpolitical chief executive, uninterested in the details of partisan maneuvering and administrative management, who in spite of himself refurbished the presidential office. That he successfully served two terms and employed military force in foreign affairs without interference from Congress under the War Powers Resolution was evidence of executive branch revitalization.

Divided government contradicted the theory of presidential party government. Yet it was not, as some observers argued, a historical and procedural accident. On the contrary, divided government resulted from a reconsideration of the public philosophy of interest-group liberalism and the constitutional theory of the regulatory welfare state. It was a partial repudiation of the twentieth-century tendency toward governmental activism and centralized sovereignty. Divided government was a confirmation of the relevance and utility of the separation of powers principle, one of the basic concepts of limited government.

HERMAN BELZ
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Bork Nomination; Civil Liberties; Civil Rights; Congress and Foreign Policy; Congressional War Powers; Conservatism; Constitutional Reform; Criminal Justice System; Economy; Establishment Clause; First Amendment; Freedom of Speech; Freedom of the Press; Line-Item Veto; Procedural Due Process of Law, Civil; Procedural Due Process of Law, Criminal; Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act; Religious Fundamentalism; Religious Liberty.)

Bibliography

CARTER, STEPHEN L. 1988 The Independent Counsel Mess. Harvard Law Review 102:105–141.

EASTLAND, TERRY 1989 Ethics, Politics, and the Independent Counsel: Executive Power, Executive Vice, 1789–1989. Washington, D.C.: National Legal Center for Public Interest.

HARRIS, RICHARD A. and MILKIS, SIDNEY M., eds. 1989 Remaking American Politics. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

HELCO, HUGH 1986 General Welfare and Two American Political Traditions. Political Science Quarterly 101:179–196.

JONES, GORDON S. and MARINI, JOHN A., eds. 1988 The Imperial Congress: Congress in the Separation of Powers. New York: Pharos Books.

LOWI, THEODORE J. 1985 The Personal President: Power Invested, Promise Unfulfilled. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

MANSFIELD, HARVEY C., JR. 1985 Pride Versus Interest in American Conservatism Today. Government and Opposition 20: 194–205.

SHAPIRO, MARTIN 1985 The Constitution and the Bureaucracy. This Constitution 9:11–16.

SUNDQUIST, JAMES L. 1989 Needed: A Political Theory for the New Era of Coalition Government in the United States. Political Science Quarterly 103:613–636.

WILDAVSKY, AARON 1980 How to Limit Government Spending. Berkeley: University of California Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1989–1999

During the years from 1989 to 1999, the Supreme Court fashioned a number of novel DOCTRINES for AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, FEDERALISM, RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, the RIGHT OF PRIVACY, and PRESIDENTIAL POWERS. Pressured by public criticism and challenges from Congress, the Court modified and in some cases OVERRULED earlier holdings. Nominations by Presidents GEORGE H. W. BUSH and WILLIAM J. CLINTON helped push the Court toward the center.

Policies for affirmative action bounced around because none of the branches provided consistent principles. Although language in some of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS of Congress appeared to announce a race-neutral policy, other statutes endorsed preferential treatment. In FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980), the Court upheld a congressional statute that set aside a certain percentage of public works funds for "minority business enterprises." When the states and cities tried to adopt similar set-asides, the Court in RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989) struck them down. A year later, in METRO BROADCASTING, INC. V. FCC (1990), the Court again upheld affirmative action at the congressional level, this time a program that offered advantages to minorities in deciding licenses and ownership of radio and television BROADCAST stations.

The Court revisited these holdings in ADARAND CONSTRUCTORS, INC. V. PEÑA (1995), which required federal race-based policies to satisfy the same standard—STRICT SCRUTINY—applied to state and local programs. Such programs must serve a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST and be narrowly tailored to address identifiable past RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. Federal courts, Congress, and federal ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES must now reassess affirmative action programs in light of this heightened standard.

Following Adarand, Clinton summarized his administration's review of federal affirmative action programs. Acknowledging some problems, he concluded: "We should reaffirm the principle of affirmative action and fix the practices. We should have a simple slogan: Mend it, but don't end it." He directed agencies to eliminate affirmative action programs if they (1) create a quota, (2) create preferences for unqualified individuals, (3) create reverse discrimination, or (4) continue even after its equal opportunity purposes have been achieved. A moratorium was placed on some set-aside programs.

Affirmative action programs came under attack in a number of states, including California, Texas, and Michigan. Californians voted in support of a ballot INITIATIVE to end bilingual education—allowing immigrant students to receive one year of English immersion before moving into regular classes unless their parents obtain a waiver—and another initiative outlawing affirmative action in public hiring, contracting, and education.

The Court continues to struggle with federalism. Its attempt in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976) to distinguish between national and state powers proved so confusing and incapable of application that the Court rejected its handiwork nine years later, in GARCÍA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985). At that point, it appeared that the protection of federalism would depend largely on the political process operating within Congress.

However, several decisions in the 1990s seemed to revive state power. In GREGORY V. ASHCROFT (1991), the Court held that Missouri's constitution, which provided a mandatory retirement age of 70 for most state judges, did not violate the AGE DISCRIMINATION ACT (ADEA). Although the Court referred to the TENTH AMENDMENT and the GUARANTEE CLAUSE, the decision rested largely on STATUTORY INTERPRETATION, leaving the door open for Congress to rewrite the ADEA if it wanted to cover state judges.

A year later, the Court again cited the Tenth Amendment when it invalidated part of a 1985 congressional statute designed to force states to find disposal sites for low-level radioactive WASTE. The 6–3 decision in NEW YORK V. UNITED STATES (1992) ruled that the statutory provision, forcing states to take possession of the waste if they failed to discover other solutions, was an invalid effort by Congress to commandeer the states' legislative processes and thus inconsistent with the Tenth Amendment. The Court explained that states are not "mere political subdivisions" of the United States, nor are state governments regional offices or administrative agencies of the federal government. In terms of public policy, the decision had modest impact. Rather than try to draft new LEGISLATION to satisfy the Court, Congress decided to rely on the existing compacts that states had created to dispose of the waste.

On a similar ground, the Court in Printz v. United States (1997) struck down, by a 5–4 vote, a key portion of a 1993 GUN CONTROL law. That statute required state and local law enforcement officers to conduct background checks on prospective handgun purchasers. The Court said that Congress may not "command" state officers to administer a federal regulatory program. The decision is not expected to have a substantial effect on governmental policy. Most states already require background checks.

Great fanfare was given to UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995), the Court's decision striking down a congressional statute that banned guns within 1,000 feet of schools. Some commentators regarded the ruling as highly significant, but it may have been a case where Congress simply failed to present adequate findings to show an INTERSTATE COMMERCE link with guns on school playgrounds. Within two weeks of the decision, Clinton submitted legislation to Congress to amend the earlier statute by requiring the federal government to prove that the firearm has "moved in or the possession of such firearm otherwise affects interstate or foreign commerce." Congress enacted the legislation in 1996, finding that crime at the local level "is exacerbated by the interstate movement of drugs, guns, and criminal gangs," that the occurrence of violent crime in school zones has resulted in a decline in the quality of education, and that it has the power under the interstate COMMERCE CLAUSE to enact the legislation.

Also in 1995, federalism was at issue in the TERM LIMITS case decided by the Court, U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton. A number of states had adopted constitutional amendments or other measures to place term limits on legislators not only in state legislatures but in Congress as well. Arkansas, for example, amended its constitution to limit members of Congress to three terms in the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES and to two terms in the U.S. SENATE. The Court held that the Arkansas constitution violated the U.S. Constitution by adding to the qualifications established for members of Congress. The fifth vote in this 5–4 decision was supplied by Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, who invoked principles of federalism by charging that Arkansas had invaded "the sphere of federal sovereignty."

Federalism became entwined with religious freedom in a case that arose in Oregon. Two members of the Native American Church had been fired by a private organization because they ingested peyote, a hallucinogenic drug. They took the drug as part of a religious sacrament. Their application for unemployment compensation was denied by Oregon under a state law that disqualifies employees who are fired for work-related "misconduct." Remaining drug-free was a condition of their employment.

Divided 6 to 3, the Court in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990) held that the free exercise clause permits a state to prohibit sacramental peyote use and to deny unemployment benefits to persons fired for such use. State law may prohibit the possession and use of a drug even if it incidentally prohibits a religious practice. The Court distinguished this case from other unemployment-benefit cases by noting that the religious conduct in those cases was not prohibited by law. Oregon law made it a criminal offense to possess or use peyote.

Oregon remained free to make an exemption for the use of peyote by members of the Native American Church. Twenty-three states had statutory or judicially crafted exemptions for the religious use of peyote. One year after Smith, the Oregon legislature enacted a bill that protects the sacramental use of peyote by the Native American Church.

A number of religious groups urged Congress to pass legislation that would grant greater religious freedom than that recognized by the Court. The purpose was to reinstate the previous standard (compelling state interest) for testing federal, state, and local laws burdening religion. Proponents of the bill believed that the Court's ruling threatened a number of religious practices, including the use of ceremonial wine, the practice of kosher slaughter, and the Hmong (Laotian) religious objection to autopsy.

In 1993, Congress enacted the RELIGIOUS FREEDOM RESTORATION ACT (RFRA), which provided that government may substantially burden a person's religious exercise only if it demonstrates a compelling interest and uses the least restrictive means of furthering that interest. The statute therefore restored the compelling interest test that the Court had adopted in 1963 and 1972. In 1994, Congress passed legislation to legalize the use of peyote by Native Americans for ceremonial purposes.

In Boerne v. Flores (1997), the Court ruled that Congress, in passing the RFRA, had exceeded the scope of its enforcement power under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, SECTION 5. Parts of the Court's decision were superficial, unpersuasive, and internally inconsistent, inviting continued challenges and legislative activity. Although the Court strongly hinted that it has the last and final word in deciding the meaning of the Constitution, in fact it left the door wide open for future congressional action. In 1998, new legislation (called "Son of RFRA") was introduced to rely more on congressional SPENDING POWER and commerce power. Also in 1998, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit held that RFRA was constitutional as applied to the federal government.

In 1999, the Court handed down a series of rulings that once again protected the independence of the states. In Alden v. Maine; Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board v. College Savings Bank, U.S.; and College Savings Bank v. Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board, the Court declared that Congress cannot subject states to suits in their own courts for violating federal rights unless they first give their consent. The Court also invalidated efforts by Congress to abrogate state immunity from suit for violations of intellectual property rights.

Privacy issues led to a number of important Court rulings. ROE V. WADE (1973), establishing a woman's right to ABORTION, was under steady attack from both conservatives and liberals as a prime example of judicial overreaching. As medical knowledge advanced, the Court's attempt to rely on the viability of a fetus was undermined by technology. Appointments to the Court by Presidents RONALD REAGAN and Bush further helped to erode Roe. In WEBSTER V. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES (1989), the Court retreated somewhat from Roe and continued that process three years later, in PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992), jettisoning Roe's trimester framework while affirming the "core meaning" of Roe by preserving the right to abortion.

The Court's bitter experience with Roe may have convinced it to announce in two 1997 rulings that there was no RIGHT TO DIE with the assistance of a physician. Under heavy criticism from the public, the Court had learned that it had to carve out a more modest role for itself while recognizing a larger function for elected branches and the states.

On May 6, 1994, Paula Corbin Jones filed suit in federal court against President Clinton and Danny Ferguson, an Arkansas state trooper, for actions that occurred in 1991 at a hotel in Little Rock, Arkansas. She alleged that Clinton, as governor of Arkansas, violated her constitutional rights to EQUAL PROTECTION and DUE PROCESS by sexually harassing and assaulting her. Clinton, claiming immunity from civil suit, filed a motion to dismiss the complaint without prejudice to its refiling after his presidency.

The Constitution does not provide an express immunity for the President. Nevertheless, federal courts have developed a doctrine of IMMUNITY OF OFFICIALS for official acts. Paula Jones was raising a different issue: Is the President entitled to immunity from civil liability for unofficial acts committed in his personal capacity? A district court ruled that the President did not have absolute immunity from civil causes of action that arise prior to assuming office. However, the judge held that the trial could be delayed until after Clinton left the presidency, but allowed the discovery and deposition process to go forward, including deposing the President.

The Eighth Circuit upheld the decision that Clinton was not entitled to immunity from civil liability for his unofficial acts, but reversed the district court by holding that the trial could proceed while he was in office. A unanimous Supreme Court, in CLINTON V. JONES (1997), affirmed the appellate court. If properly managed by the trial court, "it appears to us highly unlikely to occupy any substantial amount of petitioner's [Clinton's] time."

Clinton was deposed and the case was dismissed in 1998. After Paula Jones appealed to the Eighth Circuit, Clinton agreed to settle the case by offering her $850,000. However, his responses to questions about his relationship with former White House aide Monica Lewinsky led to new charges that he had committed perjury, suborned the perjury of witnesses, and obstructed justice. INDEPENDENT COUNSEL Kenneth Starr investigated these charges and concluded, in a report to the House of Representatives, that Clinton may have committed impeachable offenses. The House impeached Clinton on two articles (perjury and obstruction of justice), but the Senate voted 45 to 55 on the first article and 50 to 50 on the second, both votes being well short of the two-thirds required for removal from office.

Starr's investigation led to several constitutional claims by the White House. Presidential aides insisted that they could not be compelled to testify at a GRAND JURY. First Lady Hillary Clinton believed that her discussions with a government attorney were privileged. The U.S. Secret Service argued that the agents responsible for protecting the President should not be forced to testify about matters of Clinton's conduct. On all those matters Starr won at every level, including appeals by the administration to the Supreme Court.

As part of the "Contract With America," Republicans supported an item veto—often referred to as a LINE-ITEM VETO—for the President. Enacted in 1996, the Line Item Veto Act supplemented the rescission authority given to the President by the Impoundment Control Act of 1974. Instead of requiring the President to obtain the support of both Houses of Congress within a specified number of days, as set forth in the 1974 legislation, the Line Item Veto Act put the burden on Congress—during a thirty-day review period—to disapprove presidential rescission proposals. Any bill or joint resolution of disapproval would be subject to a presidential veto, ultimately requiring a two-thirds majority in each chamber for an override.

The Line Item Veto Act provided for expedited JUDICIAL REVIEW to test the constitutionality of the statute. Senator Robert C. Byrd and several colleagues filed suit to challenge this transfer of authority to the President. The Court in Raines v. Byrd (1997) held that the legislators did not have sufficient personal stake in the dispute, and did not allege a sufficiently concrete injury, to establish STANDING to bring the case. The next year, however, the Court in Clinton v. New York (1998) held that the private parties challenging the statute had standing and that the statute was unconstitutional because it violated the procedure that requires that all bills be presented to the President for his signature or veto. Writing for the majority, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS argued that there was no constitutional authorization for the President to amend or repeal a statute.

LOUIS FISHER
(2000)

Bibliography

BAKER, LYNN A. 1995 Conditional Federal Spending After López. Columbia Law Review 95:1911–1989.

DEVINS, NEAL 1996 Shaping Constitutional Values: Elected Government, the Supreme Court, and the Abortion Debate. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1999 American Constitutional Law, 3rd ed. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press.

GARROW, DAVID J. 1994 Liberty and Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade. New York: Macmillan.

LESSIG, LAWRENCE 1995 Translating Federalism: United States v. López. Supreme Court Review 1995:125–215.

MCCONNELL, MICHAEL W. 1997 Institutions and Interpretation: A Critique of City of Boerne v. Flores. Harvard Law Review 111:153–195.

STRAUSS, DAVID A. 1993 Abortion, Toleration, and Moral Certainty. Supreme Court Review 1993:1–28.

CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

"Constitutional interpretation" comprehends the methods or strategies available to people attempting to resolve disputes about the meaning or application of the Constitution. The possible sources for interpretation include the text of the Constitution, its "original history," including the general social and political context in which it was adopted as well as the events immediately surrounding its adoption, the governmental structures created and recognized by the Constitution, the "ongoing history" of interpretations of the Constitution, and the social, political, and moral values of the interpreter's society or some subgroup of the society. The term "originalist" refers to interpretation concerned with the first three of these sources.

The extraordinary current interest in constitutional interpretation is partly the result of controversy over the SUPREME COURT's expansive readings of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT; it also parallels developments in literary theory and more generally the humanities. Received notions about the intrinsic meaning of words or texts, access to an author's intentions, and the very notion of "validity" in interpretation have been forcefully attacked and vehemently defended by philosophers, literary theorists, social scientists, and historians of knowledge. Legal writers have imported scholarship from these disciplines into their own, and some humanists have become interested in legal interpretation.

Issues of interpretive methodology have always been politically charged—certainly so in constitutional law. JOHN MARSHALL's foundational decisions asserting the power of the central government were met by claims that he had willfully misconstrued the document. In our own time, modernist interpretive theories tend to be invoked by proponents of JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, and more conventional views by its opponents. The controversy within the humanities and the social sciences is itself deeply political, for the modernist assertion that truth or validity is socially constructed and hence contingent is often perceived as destabilizing or delegitimating.

The Constitution is a political document; it serves political ends; its interpretations are political acts. Any theory of constitutional interpretation therefore presupposes a normative theory of the Constitution itself—a theory, for example, about the constraints that the words and intentions of the adopters should impose on those who apply or interpret the Constitution. As Ronald Dworkin observed, "Some parts of any constitutional theory must be independent of the intentions or beliefs or indeed the acts of the people the theory designates as Framers. Some part must stand on its own political or moral theory; otherwise the theory would be wholly circular."

The eclectic practices of interpreters and the continuing debate over the appropriate methods or strategies of constitutional interpretation suggest that we have no unitary, received theory of the Constitution. The American tradition of constitutional interpretation accords considerable authority to the language of the Constitution, its adopters' purposes, and the implications of the structures created and recognized by the Constitution. But our tradition also accords authority to precedents and the judicial exegesis of social values and practices, even when these diverge from plausible readings of the text and original understandings.

Any theory of constitutional interpretation must start from the fact that we have a written Constitution. Why is the written Constitution treated as binding? Because, as Chief Justice Marshall asserted in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), it is law—the supreme law of the land—and because since 1789 public institutions and the citizenry have treated it as an authoritative legal document. It is no exaggeration to say that the written Constitution lies at the core of the American "civil religion."

Doubtless, the most frequently invoked canon of textual interpretation is the "plain meaning rule." Marshall wrote in STURGES V. CROWNINSHIELD (1819):

> [A]lthough the spirit of an instrument, especially of a constitution, is to be respected not less than its letter, yet the spirit is to be collected chiefly from its words. . . . [I]f, in any case, the plain meaning of a provision, not contradicted by any other provision in the same instrument, is to be disregarded, because we believe the framers of that instrument could not intend what they say, it must be one in which the absurdity and injustice of applying the provision to the case, would be so monstrous that all mankind would, without hesitation, unite in rejecting the application.

Marshall did not equate "plain" meaning with "literal" meaning, but rather (as Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES later put it) the meaning that it would have for "a normal speaker of English" under the circumstances in which it was used. The distinction is nicely illustrated by Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), decided the same year as Sturges. Maryland had argued that the NECESSARY AND PROPER clause of Article I authorized Congress only to enact legislation "indispensable" to executing the ENUMERATED POWERS. Marshall responded with the observation that the word "necessary," as used "in the common affairs of the world, or in approved authors, . . . frequently imports no more than that one thing is convenient, or useful, or essential to another." He continued:

> Such is the character of human language, that no word conveys to the mind, in all situations, one single definite idea; and nothing is more common than to use words in a figurative sense. Almost all compositions contain words, which, taken in their rigorous sense, would convey a meaning different from that which is obviously intended. It is essential to just construction that many words which import something excessive, should be understood in a more mitigated sense—in that sense which common usage justifies. . . . This word, then, like others, is used in various senses; and in its construction, the subject, the context, the intention of the person using them, are all to be taken into view.

To read a provision without regard to its context and likely purposes will yield either unresolvable indeterminacies or plain nonsense. An interpreter could not, for example, decide whether the FIRST AMENDMENT'S " FREEDOM OF SPEECH" encompassed singing, flag-waving, and criminal solicitation; or whether the "writings" protected by the COPYRIGHT clause included photographs, sculptures, performances, television broadcasts, and computer programs. She would not know whether the provision in Article II that "No person except a natural born Citizen . . . shall be eligible to the Office of President" disqualified persons born abroad or those born by Caesarian section. We can identify interpretations as compelling, plausible, or beyond the pale only because we think we understand the concerns that underlie the provisions.

One's understanding of a provision, including the concerns that underlie it, depends partly on the ideological or political presuppositions one brings to the interpretive enterprise. Marshall could so readily label Maryland's construction of the word "necessary" as excessive because of his antecedent conception of a "constitution" as essentially different from a legal code—as a document "intended to endure for ages to come"—and because of his beliefs about the structure of FEDERALISM implicit in the United States Constitution. A judge starting from different premises might have found Maryland's construction more plausible.

A meaning thus is "plain" when it follows from the interpreter's presuppositions and when these presuppositions are shared within the society or at least within the relevant "community of interpretation"—for example, the legal profession. Kenneth Abraham has remarked, "The plain is plain because it is constantly recurring in similar contexts and there is general agreement about the meaning of language that may be applied to it. In short, meaning is a function of agreement. . . ."

When a provision is interpreted roughly contemporaneously with its adoption, an interpreter unconsciously places it in the social and linguistic context of her society. Over the course of several centuries, however, even a relatively stable nation will undergo changes—in social and economic relations, in technology, and ultimately in values—to an extent that a later interpreter cannot readily assume that she has direct access to the contexts in which a constitutional provision was adopted. This poses both a normative and a methodological question for the modern interpreter: should she attempt to read provisions in their original social and linguistic contexts, or in a modern context, or in some way that mediates between the two? And, to the extent that the original contexts are relevant, how can she ascertain them?

Original history includes "legislative history"—the debates and proceedings in the conventions and legislatures that proposed and adopted constitutional provisions—and the broader social, economic, and political contexts surrounding their adoption. Although it is widely acknowledged that original history should play a role in constitutional interpretation, there is little agreement over the aims and methods of historical inquiry. The controversy centers on the level of generality on which an interpreter should try to apprehend the adopters' intentions. On the highest or broadest level, an interpreter poses the questions: "What was the general problem to which this provision was responsive and how did the provision respond to it?" On the most specific level, she inquires: "How would the adopters have resolved the particular issue that we are now considering?"

The first or "general" question elicits answers such as: "The purpose of the COMMERCE CLAUSE was to permit Congress to regulate commerce that affects more than one state, or to regulate where the states are separately incompetent to regulate." Or: "The purpose of the EQUAL PROTECTION clause was to prohibit invidious discrimination." These characterizations do not purport to describe the scope of a provision precisely. On the contrary, they are avowedly vague or open-ended: the claim is not that the equal protection clause forbids every conceivable invidious discrimination (it may or may not) but that it is generally concerned with preventing invidious discriminations.

The general question is an indispensable component of any textual interpretation. The interpreter seeks a "purpose" that she can plausibly attribute to everyone who voted for the provision, and which, indeed, must have been understood as their purpose even by those who opposed its adoption. The question is often couched in objective-sounding terms: it seeks the "purpose of the provision" rather than the "intent of the framers." And its answer is typically sought in the text read in the social and linguistic context in which it was adopted. As Marshall wrote in McCulloch, "the spirit of an instrument . . . is to be collected chiefly from its words." If the status of the written Constitution as "law" demands textual interpretation, it also entails this general inquiry, without which textual interpretation cannot proceed.

The second inquiry, which can be called "intentionalist," seeks very specific answers, such as: "Did the adopters of the Fourteenth Amendment intend to prohibit school SEGREGATION?" or "Did they intend to prohibit 'reverse' discrimination?" One rationale for this focus was asserted by Justice GEORGE H. SUTHERLAND, dissenting in HOME BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION V. BLAISDELL (1934): "[T]he whole aim of construction, as applied to a provision of the Constitution, is . . . to ascertain and give effect to the intent of its framers and the people who adopted it." Another rationale is that recourse to the adopters' intentions constrains the interpreter's discretion and hence the imposition of her own values. Some methodological problems are presented by any interpretive strategy that seeks to specify the adopters' intentions.

The procedures by which the text of a proposed constitutional provision is adopted are usually straightforward and clear: a text becomes a law if it is adopted by the constitutionally prescribed procedures and receives the requisite number of votes. For example, an amendment proposed in Congress becomes a part of the Constitution when it is approved by two-thirds of the members of each House and ratified by the legislatures in three-fourths of the states, or by conventions in three-fourths of the states, as Congress may prescribe.

How does an intention acquire the status of law? Some interpreters assume, without discussion, that by ratifying the framers' language, the thousands of people whose votes are necessary to adopt a constitutional provision either manifest their intent to adopt, or are somehow bound by, the intentions of certain of the drafters or framers—even if those intentions are not evident from the text itself. This view is not supported by anything in the Constitution, however, or by eighteenth- or nineteenth-century legal theory or practice.

If one analogizes the adoption of "an intention" concerning the text of the Constitution to the adoption of a text, an intention would become binding only when it was held by the number and combination of adopters prescribed by Article V. This poses no particular difficulty for an interpreter who wishes to understand the general aims or purposes of a provision. Statements by framers, proponents, and opponents, together with the social and political background against which the provision was adopted, often indicate a shared understanding. But these sources cannot usually answer specific questions about the adopters' intentions. The intentionalist interpreter thus often engages in a degree of speculation that undermines the very rationale for the enterprise.

The adopters of a provision may intend that it prohibit or permit some activity, or that it not prohibit or permit the activity; or they may have no intentions at all regarding the matter. An intentionalist interpreter must often infer the adopters' intentions from opaque sources, and must try to describe their intentions with respect to situations that they probably never thought about.

The effort to determine the adopters' intentions is further complicated by the problem of identifying the intended specificity of a provision. This problem is nicely illustrated by an example of Ronald Dworkin's. Consider the possible intentions of those who adopted the CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT clause of the Eighth Amendment. They might have intended the language to serve only as a shorthand for the Stuart tortures which were their exemplary applications of the clause. Somewhat more broadly, they might have intended the clause to be understood to incorporate the principle of ejusdem generis—to include their exemplary applications and other punishments that they found, or would have found, equally repugnant.

More broadly yet, they might have intended to delegate to future decision makers the authority to apply the clause in light of the general principles underlying it. To use Dworkin's terms, they might have intended future interpreters to develop their own "conceptions" of cruel and unusual punishment within the framework of the adopters' general "concept" of the clause. If so, then the fact that they viewed a certain punishment as tolerable does not imply that they intended the clause "not to prohibit" such punishments. Like parents who instill values in their children both by articulating and applying a moral principle, the adopters may have accepted the eventuality that the principle would be applied in ways that diverged from their own particular views.

Whether or not such a motivation seems likely with respect to applications of the clause in the adopters' contemporary society, it may be more plausible with respect to applications by future interpreters, whose understandings of the clause would be affected by changing knowledge, values, and forms of society. On the other hand, the adopters may have thought of themselves as more virtuous or less corruptible than unknown future generations, and for that reason may have intended this and other clauses to be construed narrowly.

How can an interpreter determine the breadth of construction intended by the adopters of any particular provision? Primarily, if not exclusively, from the language of the provision itself. Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER wrote in National Mutual Insurance Company v. Tidewater Transfer Company (1949):

> The precision which characterizes [the jurisdictional provisions] . . . of Article III is in striking contrast to the imprecision of so many other provisions of the Constitution dealing with other very vital aspects of government. This was not due to chance or ineptitude on the part of the Framers. The differences in subject-matter account for the drastic difference in treatment. Great concepts like "Commerce among the several states," "due process of law," "liberty," "property," were purposely left to gather meaning from experience. For they relate to the whole domain of social and economic fact, and the statesmen who founded this nation knew too well that only a stagnant society remains unchanged. But when the Constitution in turn gives strict definition of power or specific limitations upon it we cannot extend the definition or remove the translation. Precisely because "it is a constitution we are expounding," M'Culloch v. Maryland, we ought not to take liberties with it.

Charles Curtis put the point more generally: "Words in legal documents are simply delegations to others of authority to give them meaning by applying them to particular things or occasions. . . . And the more imprecise the words are, the greater is the delegation, simply because then they can be applied or not to more particulars. This is the only important feature of words in legal draftsmanship or interpretation."

This observation seems correct. Yet it is worth noting that the relative precision of a word or clause itself depends both on context and on interpretive conventions, and is often uncertain and contestable. For example, in UNITED STATES V. LOVETT (1946) Justice Frankfurter characterized the BILL OF ATTAINDER clause as among the Constitution's very "specific provisions." Yet he construed that clause to apply to punishments besides death, ignoring the technical eighteenth-century distinction between a bill of attainder, which imposed the death penalty, and a bill of "pains and penalties," which imposed lesser penalties.

The effort to characterize clauses as relatively open or closed confronts a different sort of historical problem as well. The history of interpretation of written constitutions was not extensive in 1787. Marshall's assertion that it is the nature of a constitution "that only its great outlines should be marked" (McCulloch) drew more on theory than on practice. But Marshall and his successors practiced this theory. Whatever assumptions the adopters of the original Constitution might have made about the scope of their delegations of authority, the RECONSTRUCTION amendments were adopted in the context of decades of "latitudinarian" constitutional interpretation. What bearing should this context have on the interpretation of provisions adopted since the original Constitution?

The intentionalist interpreter's initial task is to situate the provision and documents bearing on it in their original linguistic and social contexts. She can draw on the accumulated knowledge of American social, political, and intellectual history. Ultimately, however, constitutional interpretation is subject to the same limitations that attend all historical inquiry. Quentin Skinner has described the most pervasive of these:

> [I]t will never in fact be possible simply to study what any given classic writer has sai. . . . without bringing to bear some of one's own expectations about what he must have been saying. . . . [T]hese models and preconceptions in terms of which we unavoidably organize and adjust our perceptions and thoughts will themselves tend to act as determinants of what we think or perceive. We must classify in order to understand, and we can only classify the unfamiliar in terms of the familiar. The perpetual danger, in our attempts to enlarge our historical understanding, is thus that our expectations about what someone must be saying or doing will themselves determine that we understand the agent to be doing something which he would not—or even could not—himself have accepted as an account of what he was doing.

Trying to understand how the adopters intended a provision to apply in their own time and place is, in essence, doing history. But the intentionalist interpreter must take the further step of translating the adopters' intentions into the present. She must decide how the commerce power applies to modes of transportation, communication, and economic relations not imagined—perhaps not imaginable—by the adopters; how the cruel and unusual punishment clause applies to the death penalty in a society that likely apprehends death differently from a society in which death was both more commonplace and more firmly integrated into a religious cosmology. The Court invoked difficulties of this sort when it concluded that the history surrounding the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment was "inconclusive" with respect to the constitutionality of school DESEGREGATION almost a century later. Noting the vastly different roles of public education in the mid-nineteenth and mid-twentieth centuries, Chief Justice EARL WARREN wrote in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954): "[W]e cannot turn back the clock to 1868 when the Amendment was adopted. . . . We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the Nation. Only in this way can it be determined if segregation in public schools deprives these plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws." In sum, even the historian who attempts to meet and understand the adopters on their own ground is engaging in a creative enterprise. To project the adopters into a world they could not have envisioned borders on fantasy.

In an important lecture given in 1968, entitled "Structure and Relationship in Constitutional Law," Professor Charles L. Black, Jr., described a mode of constitutional interpretation based on "inference from the structure and relationships created by the constitution in all its parts or in some principal part." Professor Black observed that in McCulloch v. Maryland, "Marshall does not place principal reliance on the [necessary and proper] clause as a ground of decision. . . . [Before] he reaches it he has already decided, on the basis of far more general implications, that Congress possesses the power, not expressly named, of establishing a bank and chartering corporations: . . . [h]e addresses himself to the necessary and proper clause only in response to counsel's arguing its restrictive force." Indeed, the second part of McCulloch, which held that the Constitution prohibited Maryland from levying a tax on the national bank, rested exclusively on inferences from the structure of the federal system and not at all on the text of the Constitution. Similarly, Crandall v. Nevada (1868) was not premised on the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of either Article IV or the Fourteenth Amendment. Rather, the Court inferred a right of personal mobility among the states from the structure of the federal system: "[The citizen] has the right to come to the seat of government to assert any claim he may have upon that government, or to transact any business he may have with it . . . and this right is in its nature independent of the will of any State over whose soil he must pass to exercise it."

Citing examples like these, Professor Black argued that interpreters too often have engaged in "Humpty-Dumpty textual manipulation" rather than relying "on the sort of political inference which not only underlies the textual manipulation but is, in a well constructed opinion, usually invoked to support the interpretation of the cryptic text."

Institutional relationships are abstractions from the text and the purposes of provisions—themselves read on a high level of abstraction. The implications of the structures of government are usually vague, often even ambiguous. Thus, while structural inference is an important method of interpretation, it shares the limitations intrinsic to other interpretive strategies. It seldom yields unequivocal answers to the specific questions that arise in the course of constitutional debates.

For the most part, the Supreme Court—the institution that most systematically and authoritatively interprets and articulates the meaning of the Constitution—has construed the language, original history, and structure of the Constitution on a high level of abstraction. It has treated most provisions in the spirit suggested by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland. This view of the Constitution is partly a political choice, based on the desire to accommodate a venerated and difficult-to-amend historical monument with changing circumstances, attitudes, and needs. But it is no less a consequence of the nature of language and history, which necessarily leave much of the meaning of the Constitution to be determined by its subsequent applications.

Constitutional disputes typically arise against the background of earlier decisions on similar subjects. A complete theory of constitutional interpretation therefore must deal with the role of precedent. Interpreting a judicial precedent is different from interpreting the constitutional provision itself. A precedent consists of a JUDGMENT based on a particular set of facts together with the court's various explanations for the judgment. The precedent must be read, not only in terms of its own social context, but against the background of the precedents it invokes or ignores. Lon Fuller wrote:

> In the common law it is not too much to say that the judges are always ready to look behind the words of a precedent to what the previous court was trying to say, or to what it would have said if it could have foreseen the nature of the cases that were later to arise, or if its perception of the relevant factors in the case before it had been more acute. There is, then, a real sense in which the written words of the reported decisions are merely the gateway to something lying behind them that may be called, without any excess of poetic license, "unwritten law."

The American doctrine of STARE DECISIS accords presumptive but not indefeasible authority to precedent. Courts sometimes have overruled earlier decisions to return to what is said to be the original understanding of a provision. They have also overruled precedents that seem inconsistent with contemporary norms. For example, in HARPER V. VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), the Supreme Court overruled a twenty-year-old precedent to invalidate, under the equal protection clause, a state law conditioning the right to vote in state election on payment of an annual POLL TAX of $1.50. After surveying intervening decisions protecting political participation and other interests, Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS concluded: "In determining what lines are unconstitutionally discriminatory, we have never been confined to historic notions of equality, any more than we have restricted due process to a fixed catalogue of what was at a given time deemed to be the limits of fundamental rights. . . . Notions of what constitutes equal treatment for purposes of the Equal Protection clause do change."

The process of constitutional adjudication thus has a dynamic of its own. It creates an independent force which, as a DOCTRINE evolves, may compete with the text and original history as well as with older precedents. Whether or not, as Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN argued in dissent, Harper was inconsistent with the original understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment, the decision would have been inconceivable without the intervening expansion of doctrine beyond applications contemplated by the adopters of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Disagreements about the propriety of this evolutionary process are rooted in differing theories of constitutional law. To a strict intentionalist like Raoul Berger, the process appears to be simply the accretion of errors, which should be corrected to the extent possible. Others hold that the process properly accommodates the Constitution to changing needs and values. As Justice Holmes wrote in MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920):

> [W]hen we are dealing with words that are also a constituent act, like the Constitution of the United States, we must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters. It was enough for them to realize or to hope that they had created an organism; it has taken a century and cost their successors much sweat and blood to prove that they created a nation. The case before us must be considered in the light of our entire experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago. . . . We must consider what this country has become in deciding what the Amendment has reserved.

Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES's opinion in Home Building & Loan stands as the Court's most explicit assertion of the independent force of precedents and of the changing values they reflect. The Court upheld a law, enacted during the Depression, which postponed a mortgagor's right to foreclose against a defaulting mortgagee. In dissent, Justice Sutherland argued that the CONTRACT CLAUSE, which had been adopted in response to state debtor-relief legislation enacted during the depression following the Revolutionary War, was intended to prohibit precisely this sort of law. Given his intentionalist premise this disposed of the case. Hughes did not dispute Sutherland's account of the original history. Rather, he reviewed the precedents interpreting the contract clause to conclude:

> It is manifest . . . that there has been a growing appreciation of public needs and of the necessity of finding ground for a rational compromise between individual rights and public welfare. The settlement and consequent contraction of the public domain, the pressure of a constantly increasing density of population, the interrelation of the activities of our people, and the complexity of our economic interests, have inevitably led to an increased use of the organization of society in order to protect the very bases of individual opportunity. . . . [T]he question is no longer merely that of one party to a contract as against another, but of the use of reasonable means to safeguard the economic structure upon which the good of all depends.

The views articulated by Holmes, Hughes, and Douglas reflect the Court's actual practice in adjudication under the BILL OF RIGHTS, the Fourteenth Amendment, and other provisions deemed relatively open-textured. The process bears more resemblance to COMMON LAW adjudication than to textual exegesis.

In an influential essay, Thomas Grey observed that the American constitutional tradition included practices of nonoriginalist adjudication purportedly based on principles of natural rights or FUNDAMENTAL LAW, or on widely shared and deeply held values not readily inferred from the text of the written Constitution. Several of the Supreme Court's contemporary decisions involving procreation and the family have invoked this tradition, and have given rise to a heated controversy over the legitimacy of adjudication based on "fundamental values."

Originalist and nonoriginalist adjudication are not nearly so distinct as many of the disputants assume. Constitutional provisions differ enormously in their closed- or open-texturedness. Indeed, a provision's texture is not merely a feature of its language or its original history, but of the particular situation in which it is applied. One's approach to a text is determined by tradition and by social outlooks that can change over time. Depending on one's political philosophy, one may bemoan this inevitability, or embrace it. For better or for worse, however, Terrance Sandalow described an important feature of our constitutional tradition when he remarked that "[t]he Constitution has . . . not only been read in light of contemporary circumstances and values; it has been read so that the circumstances and values of the present generation might be given expression in constitutional law."

Most disputes about constitutional interpretation and fundamental values concern interpretation in particular institutional contexts. Today's disputes center on the judicial power to review and strike down the acts of legislatures and agencies and are motivated by what ALEXANDER M. BICKEL dubbed the "counter-majoritarian difficulty" of JUDICIAL REVIEW. Urgings of "judicial restraint" or of a more expansive approach to constitutional adjudication tend to reflect differing opinions of the role of the judiciary in a democratic polity and, more crudely, differing views about the substantive outcomes that these strategies yield. The question, say, whether Congress, the Supreme Court, or the states themselves should take primary responsibility for elaborating the equal protection clause is essentially political and cannot be resolved by abstract principles of interpretation. But this observation also cautions against taking interpretive positions based on particular institutional concerns and generalizing them beyond the situations that motivated them.

Constitutional interpretation is as much a process of creation as one of discovery. If this view is commonplace among postrealist academics, it is not often articulated by judges and it probably conflicts with the view of many citizens that constitutional interpretation should reflect the will of the adopters of the Constitution rather than its interpreters.

So-called STRICT CONSTRUCTION is an unsatisfactory response to these concerns. First, the most frequently litigated provisions do not lend themselves to "strict" or unambiguous or literal interpretation. (What are the strict meanings of the privileges or immunities, due process, and equal protection clauses?) Second, attempts to confine provisions to their very narrowest meanings typically produce results so ludicrous that even self-styled strict constructionists unconsciously abandon them in favor of less literal readings of texts and broader conceptualizations of the adopters' intentions. (No interpreter would hold that the First Amendment does not protect posters or songs because they are not "speech," or that the commerce clause does not apply to telecommunications because the adopters could not have foreseen this mode of commerce.) An interpreter must inevitably choose among different levels of abstraction in reading a provision—a choice that cannot itself be guided by any rules. Third, the two modes of strict interpretation—literalism and strict intentionalism—far from being synergistic strategies of interpretation, are often antagonistic. (Although the adopters of the First Amendment surely did not intend to protect obscene speech, the language they adopted does not exclude it.) A strict originalist theory of interpretation must opt either for literalism or for intentionalism, or must have some extraconstitutional principle for mediating between the two.

To reject these strategies is not to shed constraints. The text and history surrounding the adoption of a provision originate a line of doctrine, set its course, and continue to impose limitations. Some interpretations are more plausible than others; some are beyond the pale. And the criteria of plausibility are not merely subjective. Rather, they are intersubjective, constituted by others who are engaged in the same enterprise. Beyond the problem of subjectivity, however, the demographic characteristics of the legal interpretive community gives rise to an equally serious concern: the judiciary and the bar more generally have tended to be white, male, Anglo-Saxon, and well-to-do, and one might well wonder whether their interpretations do not embody parochial views or class interests. The concerns cannot be met by the choice of interpretive strategies, however, but only by addressing the composition and structure of the institutions whose interpretations have the force of law.

PAUL BREST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Interpretivism; Noninterpretivism.)

Bibliography

ABRAHAM, KENNETH 1981 Three Fallacies of Interpretation: A Comment on Precedent and Judicial Decision. Arizona Law Review 23:771–783.

BERGER, RAOUL 1977 Government by Judiciary: The Transfor- mation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

BLACK, CHARLES L., JR. 1969 Structure and Relationship in Constitutional Law. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

CURTIS, CHARLES 1950 A Better Theory of Legal Interpretation. Vanderbilt Law Review 3:407–437.

DWORKIN, RONALD 1981 The Forum of Principle. New York Law Review 56:469–518.

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FULLER, LON 1968 Anatomy of Law. New York: Praeger.

GREY, THOMAS 1975 Do We Have an Unwritten Constitution? Stanford Law Review 27:703–718.

HOLMES, OLIVER W. 1899 The Theory of Interpretation. Harvard Law Review 12:417.

MONAGHAN, HENRY 1981 Our Perfect Constitution. New York University Law Review 56:353–376.

SANDALOW, TERRANCE 1981 Constitutional Interpretation. Michigan Law Review 79:1033–1072.

SKINNER, QUENTIN 1969 Meaning and Understanding in the History of Ideas. History & Theory 8:3–53.

SYMPOSIUM 1985 Constitutional Interpretation. University of Southern California Law Review 58:551–725.

SYMPOSIUM ON LAW AND LITERATURE 1982 Texas Law Review 60:373–586.

TEN BROEK, JACOBUS 1938–1939 Admissibility and Use by the Supreme Court of Extrinsic Aids in Constitutional Construction. California Law Review 26:287–308, 437–454, 664–681; 27:157–181, 399–421.

CONSTITUTIONALISM

Constitutionalism is a term not altogether congenial to American lawyers. It seems to share the characteristics of other "isms": it is neither clearly prescriptive nor clearly descriptive; its contours are difficult to discern; its historical roots are diverse and uncertain. Legal realist WALTON H. HAMILTON, who wrote on the subject for the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, began his article in an ironic vein: "Constitutionalism is the name given to the trust which men repose in the power of words engrossed on parchment to keep a government in order."

Historians, on the other hand, employ the concept with some confidence in its meaning. American historians tend to use it as a shorthand reference to the constitutional thought of the founding period. European historians have a somewhat harder time. Given a largely UNWRITTEN CONSTITUTION and the SOVEREIGNTY of Parliament, what does it mean to refer to British constitutionalism? What is the significance of Dicey's distinction between the "conventions of the constitution" and the "law of the constitution"? How meaningful is the distinction? As Dicey noted: "Whatever may be the advantages of a so-called unwritten constitution, its existence imposes special difficulties on teachers bound to expound its provisions." French authors view constitutionalism as an important element of the French Revolution, but run into difficulties as they contemplate the fact that, since the constitution of 1791, France has had fifteen of them—and by no means all democratic. German historians tend to restrict the use of the term Konstitutionalismus to the Central European constitutional monarchies of the nineteenth century, though German-language equivalents for constitutionalism (Verfassungsstaat, Verfassungsbegriff) are frequently encountered in the literature. The German constitutionalist trauma is, of course, the ease with which the Weimar constitution, in its time viewed as one of the most progressive in the world, could be brought to collapse at the hands of determined enemies who then managed to organize arbitrariness in the form of law.

Constitutionalism has both descriptive and prescriptive connotations. Used descriptively, it refers chiefly to the historical struggle for constitutional recognition of the people's right to "consent" and certain other rights, freedoms, and privileges. This struggle extends roughly from the seventeenth century to the present day. Its beginnings coincide with the "enlightenment" of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Used prescriptively, especially in the United States, its meaning incorporates those features of government seen as the essential elements of the American Constitution. Thus F. A. Hayek called constitutionalism the American contribution to the RULE OF LAW.

Constitutionalism obviously presupposes the concept of a CONSTITUTION. A Swiss authority of some influence in the American revolution, EMERICH DE VATTEL, in his famous 1758 treatise, The Law of Nations or the Principles of Natural Law, provided a definition: "The FUNDAMENTAL LAW which determines the manner in which the public authority is to be exercised is what forms the constitution of the State. In it can be seen the organization by means of which the Nation acts as a political body; how and by whom the people are to be governed; and what are the rights and duties of those who govern. This constitution is nothing else at bottom than the establishment of the system, according to which a Nation proposed to work in common to obtain the advantages for which a political society is formed."

This rather neutral definition has to be read against the background of Vattel's theory of natural law. Vattel recognized the right of the majority to reform its government and, most important, excluded fundamental laws from the reach of legislators, "unless they are expressly empowered by the nation to change them." Moreover, Vattel believed that the ends of civil society were "to procure for its citizens the necessities, the comforts, and the pleasures of life, and in general their happiness; to secure to each the peaceful enjoyment of his property and a sure means of obtaining justice; and finally to defend the whole body against all external violence."

Later in the eighteenth century strong prescriptive elements became part of the very definition of a constitution. Two examples are equally famous. On October 21, 1776, the town of Concord, Massachusetts, resolved "that a Constitution in its Proper Idea intends a System of Principles Established to Secure the Subject in the Possession and enjoyment of their Rights and Privileges, against any Encroachment of the Governing Part." (See CONCORD RESOLUTION.) Article 16 of the French Declaration of the Rights of Man of 1789 put it even more bluntly: "A society in which the guarantee of rights is not assured nor the SEPARATION OF POWERS provided for, has no constitution."

Although it would be impractical to make such substantive features a necessary part of one's definition of a written or unwritten constitution, a proper understanding of constitutionalism as a historical phenomenon depends on them. Constitutionalism does not refer simply to having a constitution but to having a particular kind of constitution, however difficult it may be to specify its content. This assertion holds true even in the case of the interplay of old forces (monarchies and estates) with new forces (the middle class in particular) which characterized the emergence of constitutional monarchies in Central Europe during the nineteenth century. Seen from a constitutionalist perspective, many of the German constitutional monarchies were influenced by concepts that had much in common with constitutionalist thought. The most important of these concepts was the Rechtsstaat: a state based on "reason" and a strict regulation of government by law.

The concepts of a constitution and of fundamental laws have not had a constant meaning over time. Since the eighteenth century (though not before), it has become customary to translate Aristotle's word politeia as "constitution": "A constitution is the arrangement of the offices in a polis, but especially of the highest office." This definition precedes Aristotle's differentiation among six forms of government—those for the common good (monarchy, aristocracy, and "polity") and their perversions, which serve individual interests (tyranny, oligarchy, and democracy). Aristotle thus introduced substantive, not merely formal, criteria into his teachings about constitutional arrangements.

Cicero is usually credited with first giving the Latin term constitutio something like its modern meaning. About a mixed form of government, he said in De Re Publica: "This constitution has a great measure of equability without which men can hardly remain free for any length of time." Indeed, Roman law was characterized by constitutional notions. The constitution of the Roman republic, putting other substantive arrangements aside, was marked by the power of the plebs to pass on laws which bound the entire Roman people. While this republican prerogative of the plebs was later replaced by Senate lawmaking and eventually by the emperor's legislative monopoly, its status is perhaps best illustrated by Augustus's repeated refusal, on "constitutional" grounds, to accept extraordinary powers to renew law and morals. Though this Augustan reticence may have been a triumph of form over substance, "triumphs" of this kind have frequently illustrated how constitutional notions have become deeply entrenched.

In subsequent Roman usage the term constitutio came to identify imperial legislation that preempted all other law. The understanding of constitutio as signifying important legislation was retained during the Middle Ages in the Holy Roman Empire, in the church, and throughout Europe. A well-known English example is the Constitution of Clarendon issued by Henry II in 1164.

In England, the modern use of constitution as referring to the nature, government, and fundamental laws of a state dates from the early seventeenth century. In the House of Commons, in 1610, James Whitelock argued that the imposition of taxes by James I was "against the natural frame and constitution of the policy of this kingdom, which is ius publicum regni, and so subverteth the fundamental law of the realm and induceth a new form of State and government."

In Europe, perception that some laws were more fundamental than others were well established before the eighteenth century. MAGNA CARTA (1215), the PETITION OF RIGHT (1628), and the HABEAS CORPUS ACT (1679) are the best known English illustrations of this point. In addition, by their coronation oaths English kings obliged themselves "to hold and keep the laws and righteous customs which the community of [the] realm shall have chosen." Even if the law could not reach the king, the king was viewed as under the law (and, of course, under God). The bounds of the king's discretion were defined by the ancient laws and customs of England or, put differently, the COMMON LAW. By the seventeenth century, EDWARD COKE was even prepared to claim that acts of Parliament were subject to review under the common law (and natural law).

Though the status of French kings was considerably more mysterious and legal constraints on them were far fewer than in England, they too were viewed as subject to fundamental laws. The French Protestant political theorists of the sixteenth century expressed far-reaching views on the matter. François Hotman subtitled the XXVth chapter of the third edition of his Francogallia (1586): "The king of France does not have unlimited domain in his kingdom but is circumscribed by settled and specific law."

Beginning in the seventeenth century, the struggle over the limits of power, the ends of government, and the limits of obedience was frequently expressed in terms of social contract theory. Johannes Althusius, Hugo Grotius, JOHN

LOCKE, and Jean-Jacques Rousseau all influenced the civil struggles of their age. Although the differences among these writers are profound, all of them stipulate a SOCIAL COMPACT as the foundation for the constitutional arrangements of the state. While such a contract is not necessarily based on an assumption of popular sovereignty, a social contract without the assumed or actual consent of "the people" or their representatives is unthinkable. Once this notion spread widely, it was difficult to maintain the divine right of kings, and it became almost irresistible to relocate sovereignty in the people—Thomas Hobbes notwithstanding.

One must not confuse the concept of a social contract with that of a constitution. For the "contractarians," constitutions follow from the social contract; they are not identical with it. Although the social contract is mostly a logical stipulation, at times the contract seems real enough, embodying or justifying specific constitutional arrangements. The Glorious Revolution in England, the American Revolution, the French Revolution—all appealed to the social contract.

The Glorious Revolution, like the English Civil War before it, was seen in contractarian terms. The Convention Parliament of 1689 resolved that James II "having endeavored to subvert the constitution of the kingdom by breaking the original contract between king and people . . . has abdicated the government and the throne is hereby vacant." The Declaration of Rights of 1689 was part of Parliament's contract with William and Mary and, later that year, was incorporated into the act of Parliament known as the BILL OF RIGHTS. After reciting Parliament's grievances against the absolutist tendencies of James II, the Bill of Rights prohibited the suspension of the laws by regal authority; provided for the election and privileges of Parliament (including a prohibition of prerogative taxation); and dealt with the right to petition, excessive bail, and the jury system.

Although this catalogue of constitutional concerns is modest by contemporary standards, the Bill of Rights, in conjunction with other British traditions and the "mixed government" confirmed by the Glorious Revolution, led MONTESQUIEU to celebrate England as the one nation in the world "that has for the direct end of its constitution political liberty." Montesquieu concluded his chapter on "The Constitution of England" in The Spirit of the Laws with the wry comment that it was not his task to examine whether the English actually enjoyed this liberty. "Sufficient it is for my purpose to observe, that it is established by their laws; and I inquire no further." When Montesquieu's book was published in 1748, some questions about constitutional liberty in England might indeed have been examined. For instance, the right to vote was extremely restricted and even that small electorate was not consulted when, by the Septennial Act of 1716, Parliament extended its own duration by another four years. For the American colonists who fought more against the British Parliament than against their monarch, this example of the "sovereignty of Parliament" marked the limit of British constitutionalism. As JAMES MADISON wrote in THE FEDERALIST #53, citing the Septennial Act: "Where no constitution paramount to the government, either existed or could be obtained, no constitutional security similar to that established in the United States, was to be attempted."

American constitutionalism during the colonial and revolutionary periods included the notions of a constitution as superior to legislation and the notion of a written constitution. As concerns the "writing" of constitutions, Gerald Stourzh has remarked, for the period after 1776, that Americans clearly differentiated "between the functions of constitution-making (with an additional differentiation between drafting and ratifying functions), of amending constitutions, and of legislating within the framework of the constitution."

One formal element in the American colonies was bound to have a profound impact on American constitutionalism, especially its choice of written constitutions as the means for anchoring the organization of their governments and the protection of their rights and privileges. COLONIAL CHARTERS, fundamental orders, and other written documents were used in the establishment of the colonies. These contracts between rulers and ruled provided for the government of the colonies, secured property rights, and even extended the guaranteed liberties and privileges of the English constitution. The 1629 CHARTER OF MASSACHUSETTS BAY is an important early example.

Pennsylvania, however, provides the most vivid illustration of the essential features and conundrums of American constitutionalism. In England, in 1682, a "frame of government of the province of Pensilvania" was agreed to by the Governor, WILLIAM PENN, and "divers freemen" of the province. It was a revision of an earlier plan drawn up by Penn which he had called "Fundamental Constitutions of Pennsylvania." The frame of government was replaced by a new frame as early as 1683. Its place was taken in 1701 by the Pennsylvania Charter of Privileges, granted by Penn during his second visit to the province and formally approved by the General Assembly. (See PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL CHARTERS.) Though the focus here is on the Charter of Privileges, William Penn's preface to the Frame of Government deserves quotation: "Any government is free to the people under it (whatever be the frame) where the laws rule, and the people are a party to those laws, and more than this is tyranny, oligarchy, or confusion." Having invoked the notions of government of laws and popular consent, Penn went on, however, to warn against excessive optimism about the RULE OF LAW: "Governments, like clocks, go from the motion men give them; and as governments are made and moved by men, so by them they are ruined too." It is difficult to imagine a better reflection on the challenges faced by the American constitution makers of the eighteenth century.

The Pennsylvania Charter of Privileges of 1701 was a remarkable constitutional document. First of all, the charter itself was adopted in a constitutional manner, according to the provisions for amending the Frame of Government. Second, it began, not with the organization of government, but with an issue of fundamental rights: it guaranteed the freedom of conscience and made all Christians eligible for public office. Third, the charter provided for a unicameral representative assembly to be elected annually by the freemen with the right to initiate LEGISLATION and with all parliamentary powers and privileges "according to the Rights of the free-born Subjects of England, and as is usual in any of the King's Plantations in America." Fourth, far ahead of its time, it gave to all "criminals" "the same Privileges of Witness and Council as their Prosecutors." Fifth, it guaranteed the "ordinary Course of Justice" in all disputes concerning property. Sixth, the proprietor committed himself and his heirs not to breach the liberties of the charter; anything done to the contrary should "be held of no Force or Effect." Seventh, the liberties, privileges, and benefits granted by the charter were to be enjoyed, "any Law made and passed by this General Assembly, to the Contrary hereof, notwithstanding." Eighth, the charter could be amended only by a vote of "Six Parts of Seven" of the Assembly and the consent of the governor. Ninth, the guarantee of liberty of conscience was placed even beyond the power of constitutional amendment "because the Happiness of Mankind depends so much upon the Enjoying of Liberty of their Consciences."

This colonial charter, granted by a feudal landowner, embodies the most significant elements of American constitutionalism as it emerged in the course of the century—the concept of consent and the concept of a written constitution sharply differentiated from ordinary legislation and with provisions for its amendment and a bill of rights, however rudimentary. Indeed, by placing the liberty of conscience beyond the amending power it posed the ultimate conundrum of constitutionalism—the possibility of unconstitutional constitutional amendments.

The concept of consent had direct consequences for questioning the powers of Parliament over America and for the American understanding of REPRESENTATION. In terms of constitutionalism, the most important part of the long list of grievances against George III with which the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE began (following the model of the Declaration of Rights of 1689) was the passage which stated that the king had "combined with others to subject us to a JURISDICTION foreign to our constitutions, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation." The nation began with an assertion of the right to consent.

In the decades of constitution-making following independence the main organizational task of American constitutionalism was to spell out in detail the implications of popular sovereignty for the structure of government. What, for instance, should follow from the famous formulation in the VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS, of June 12, 1776, "that all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; the magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable to them"? Four subjects were of overriding importance: the franchise; the separation of powers; the amending process; and the protection of individual rights.

Political status in the colonies had mostly depended on property ownership, and the Revolution had not done away with these requirements. The federal CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 could not agree on who should have the right to vote. Sovereignty of the people did not mean all the people. But who should have the right to vote was discussed frequently and with great seriousness. The voters of the Massachusetts town of Northampton, for instance, concluded in 1780 that restricting the franchise for the Massachusetts house to freeholders and other men of property was inconsistent with the concepts and principles of native equality and freedom, the social compact, personal equality, and no TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION. Their objections pertained only to elections to the house; indeed, they were based on the notion that in a bicameral legislature one chamber should represent property, the other persons. A few more decades had to elapse before property and taxpaying qualifications disappeared. The franchise was expanded in all Western societies in the course of the nineteenth century. The earliest and most inclusive expansion, however, came in the United States—although even here the vote was withheld from women, AMERICAN INDIANS, slaves, and, as a rule, free blacks.

The colonists widely believed that their governments were "mixed" in accord with the British model. A London compendium from 1755 said of the colonial governments: "By the governor, representing the King, the colonies are monarchical; by a Council they are aristocratical; by a house of representatives, or delegates from the people, they are democratical." While this was more an "ideal type" than an accurate description of the constitutional facts, the post-Revolution problem for those who had grown up within the tradition of mixed or balanced government was how to institute it under radically changed conditions. The question was not really whether to have balanced government, though some advocates of "simple" government existed.

The separation of powers doctrine, as put forward most influentially by Montesquieu, sought to limit power by separating factions and, to some extent, associating them with the executive and legislative functions of government. To Montesquieu the separation of powers was a necessary if not a sufficient condition of liberty. By 1776 the American constitutional problem had become not the separation of "powers" but the distribution of power flowing from a single source—the people.

Though the Americans continued to view the separation of powers as necessary to liberty and therefore indispensable to constitutionalism, they faced a formidable challenge in attempting to implement the concept. The towns of Essex County, Massachusetts, wrote "the Essex Result," a veritable dissertation on the subject in voicing their objections to the proposed Massachusetts constitution of 1778, which they considered insufficiently mindful of the separation of powers. They propounded the principle "that the legislative, judicial, and executive powers are to be lodged in different hands, that each branch is to be independent, and further, to be so balanced, and be able to exert such checks upon the others, as will preserve it from dependence on, or an union with them."

Practical problems were inevitable. The different powers of government do not imply clearly differentiated functions; they will necessarily be closely intertwined—especially if one adds the notion, urged in the Essex Result, of CHECKS AND BALANCES. In the major state constitutions enacted in 1776 and immediately after, the legislative branch usually dominated, but the constitutions distinguished conceptually between legislative, executive, and judicial functions. They made members of one branch ineligible to serve in the others, and they gave some measure of autonomy to the judiciary. However, with respect to such crucial features as the structure and election of the executive and the power of appointments, they differed radically one from the other.

As successful revolutionaries, the Americans faced a difficult political task. They needed to justify the power of the people to change their government and at the same time to assure the stability of the new order based on popular sovereignty. If, as a practical matter, consent meant consent by a majority, was that majority not also at liberty to change the states' new constitutions? If not, why not? Vattel had struggled valiantly to develop a satisfactory framework for thinking about constitutional change, though without much success. His argument in The Law of Nations that the legislative power could not amend the constitution is hardly a model of tight reasoning. Concluding his essay, Vattel observed: "However, in discussing changes in a constitution, we are here speaking only of the right; the expediency of such changes belongs to the field of politics. We content ourselves with the general remark that it is a delicate operation and one full of danger to make great changes in the State; and since frequent changes are hurtful in themselves, a Nation ought to be very circumspect in this matter and never be inclined to make innovations, except for the most urgent reasons or from necessity."

In America, THOMAS JEFFERSON was the foremost theorist of constitutional change. He believed that each generation has "a right to choose for itself the form of government it believes most promotive of its happiness. . . ." The same man who provided us with this theory of constitutional change wanted to be remembered in his epitaph for the VIRGINIA STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY (1786), which ended with a proviso that sought to secure the statute forever: we "do declare, that the rights hereby asserted are of the NATURAL RIGHTS of mankind, and that if any act shall be hereafter passed to repeal the present or to narrow its operation, such act will be an infringement of natural right."

In a way, the matter was simple. Jefferson and many of his fellow citizens were for change, stability, and inalienable rights all at the same time. These disparate aims were somewhat reconciled in practice by having the constitutions provide for their own amendment and for bills of rights. This course had important practical implications: it legitimized the concept of constitutional change and thus dramatically reduced the need for revolutions; and it advised the majority that it had no power to regulate at will the structure of government or basic rights of individuals. Enlightened America was anything but unanimous on the status of specific rights. Not every state constitution had a bill of rights; those that did almost always included the liberty of conscience, FREEDOM OF PRESS, trial by jury, and protection of property. Some of the rights, as Penn and Jefferson suggested, were considered so fundamental that their amendment would conflict with the very nature of constitutional government.

The CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 and the main features of the federal constitution, after a decade of state constitutions, further defined American constitutionalism. The Constitution precariously provided for a mode of RATIFICATION hardly in accord with the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. Among the ironies of history is the fact that the Constitutional Convention's preference for the convention method of ratification (rather than ratification by all state legislatures as required by the Articles) resulted in attaching to the Constitution, in 1791, a BILL OF RIGHTS, which the Framers of Philadelphia had considered unnecessary.

The most important aspect of the Constitution was its implementation of the goal "to form a more perfect Union." Carl J. Friedrich characterized the claim that FEDERALISM is an American invention a defensible overstatement. The Constitution's effort to delineate clearly the powers of the federal government as against those of the states is remarkable indeed. Its main accomplishment was not to get bogged down by the metaphysics of sovereignty and to enable the federal government to legislate and tax in a manner binding the people directly, without using the states as intermediaries. This structure of "dual sovereignty" assured the viability of the federal government and, at least well into the twentieth century, the viability of the states. It underwent one substantial modification. When the "perpetual" nature of the Union was challenged over the issue of SLAVERY, constitutional amendments were enacted at the end of the Civil War for the primary purpose of securing equal rights to recently emancipated black citizens. These amendments eventually legitimized a great expansion of federal influence on the law of the states in the interest of greater equality for blacks and other minorities.

The constitutional organization of the federal government is delineated by the organization of the constitutional text. The PREAMBLE speaks of the people of the United States as ordaining and establishing the Constitution. The first (and presumably most important) article deals with the election and LEGISLATIVE POWERS OF CONGRESS. Article II vests the executive power in a President. Article III concerns the JUDICIAL POWER and its jurisdiction. Although this organization seems to provide us with a rather pure example of the separation of powers, the Constitution combines elements of separate and independent powers (such as an independent judiciary or a President not dependent on Congress for his term of office) with a thorough mixing of powers, best summarized by the concept of checks and balances.

Superficially, the legislative and executive branches seem to be assigned separate functions: lawmaking and law executing. The judicial branch, through dispute-settling, performs one part of the executive function under special conditions and special procedures. In reality, however, both the executive and the judiciary engage in lawmaking through interpretation and rule-making. The executive intrudes into the legislative function by exercising the VETO POWER. Congress, on the other hand, performs executive functions through legislative oversight, appropriations decisions, and confirming appointments. One might better forgo the Framers' own characterization of the system as one of separation of powers. American constitutionalism indulged itself in heaping checks upon checks so that the love of power of officials occupying the various branches of government could be harnessed.

On one of the most important of these checks and the most distinctly American contribution to constitutionalist doctrine, the Constitution of 1787 was silent. Nowhere does the constitutional text grant the power of JUDICIAL REVIEW of legislation. On the basis of the debates in the Constitutional Convention one can make a strong case that some of the most influential Framers thought that judicial review was implied, but this is not the same as saying that the Constitution implies it. How then did the American judiciary end up as the guardian of the Constitution?

There had been instances of courts exercising the power of judicial review as well as public debate of the issue in the new states. The case for judicial review was based on a peculiarly American amalgam of various strands of constitutionalism. First, there was the notion of a constitution as fundamental law. If Lord Coke could claim the common law as a basis for reviewing acts of Parliament, how much more plausible the claim that judges were bound to obey a fundamental charter viewed as supreme law. Second, if the constitutions derived their authority from the sovereignty of the people, and if legislators and other government officials were simply the people's trustees and servants, it was no great leap to reason that judges had to obey the will of the whole people as expressed in the constitution. Third, the special procedures for constitutional amendment typically denied the legislatures the power to amend by ordinary legislation, which suggested that attempts of that kind should go unenforced. Fourth, those constitutions containing bills of rights reenforced the notion of a constitution as superior law with the aim of protecting the rights of individuals against tyrannical majorities. Fifth, in the case of the federal constitution there was the added need to assure its status as supreme law throughout the Union. The arguments for and practice of judicial review of state legislation served to consolidate the understanding of the American Constitution as the supreme law of the land to which all government actors were subject.

Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) to the contrary notwithstanding, the issue of judicial review was an intricate one. No simple constitutionalist syllogism could be constructed that invariably led one to conclude that judges had the power of judicial review. The amalgam, however, proved powerful under the conditions prevailing in the United States. When the Supreme Court went ahead and in effect appointed itself and the other judges guardians of the Constitution (in the case of the Supreme Court, eventually to become the preeminent guardian), the people, by and large, acquiesced.

The American institution of judicial review has influenced developments abroad. Various forms of constitutional review exist in Austria, Germany, India, Italy, Japan, and, now, even France—to name the most important. While their historical roots are many and their institutional characteristics diverse, the American model was highly visible when they came into being. One of the most instructive contemporary instances is that of the Court of Justice of the European Community. Starting with the need of assuring the uniformity of Community law throughout the member nations, the Court of Justice has transformed the treaties underlying the European Community (especially the Treaty of Rome) into the constitution of the community. These are radical developments. The constitutionalization of the Treaty of Rome has led to the introduction of judicial review, or what one might more appropriately call Community review, even into countries that have not previously recognized the power of their courts to pass on the constitutionality of legislation.

As constitutionalism does not refer to having a constitution but to structural and substantive limitations on government, it would be a gargantuan task to determine its incidence in a world full of written constitutions, of which many do not mean what they say, while others do not accomplish what they mean. The need to distinguish between form and substance would necessitate impossibly vast empirical assessments. The distinction between form and substance would also make desirable a detailed examination of the legal situation in countries, such as Great Britain, that meet most substantive requirements of constitutionalism without a written constitution, an entrenched bill of rights, or the power of judicial review.

Constitutionalism matured in the context of the liberal democracies with their emphasis on civil and political rights and their attempts clearly to define the public and the private sphere. The rights guaranteed, with the exception of certain rights to participate in the exercise of governmental power, were rights of the citizen against infringement by government of his own sphere, or "defensive" rights (German constitutional law has coined the term Abwehrrechte for this category). The eighteenth- and nineteenth-century constitutions do not contain social rights aimed at guaranteeing citizens a fair measure of well-being. A notable aspect of the Weimar constitution was its effort to formulate rights that would guarantee everyone a worthwhile existence. As the concept of CITIZENSHIP expanded from the formal equality of sharing legal capacities to the substantive equality of sharing goods, the contemporary welfare state became clearly committed to some undefined (and probably undefinable) minimum of such substantive equality. The predominant means for accomplishing such goals has been legislation rather than constitutionalization. Certain legislation of this kind has been viewed by some as in actual conflict with the constitutionalist scheme. This alleged conflict has, in turn, led to substantial efforts in the United States and other countries to reinterpret the liberal constitutions as not only permitting but demanding government intervention on behalf of the underprivileged.

In conjunction with these difficulties, but by no means restricted to them, American constitutional scholarship engages in periodic debates about methods of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. Much of the discussion reinvents the interpretive wheels of earlier generations. Its main focus is the degree of fidelity which may be owed the words of the Constitution and the intentions of its Framers. Some contemporary writing argues that the Constitution can incorporate contemporary value preferences of a highly subjective kind. The tension is between the need to expound an essentially unaltered eighteenth-century Constitution in a manner consistent with "the progress of the human mind," on the one hand, and the danger of dissolving the Constitution in the process. The dispute is further complicated by endless varieties of highly refined theories concerning the proper scope of judicial review.

Over its two hundred years the American Constitution has been assigned the role of a national ideology. It has performed this role for a people that has grown from a few million to almost 250 million citizens of very diverse background. While the historical disinclination to amend the Constitution by means other than judicial review may help account for its durability, it has also subjected the Constitution to considerable strain. As the secular equivalent of the Bible, as Walton Hamilton observed, "it became the great storehouse of verbal conflict, and rival truths were derived by the same inexorable logic from the same infallible source." More often than not, Americans invoke constitutional principles in order to understand and resolve conflicts. This fact attests to the extraordinary vitality of American constitutionalism. It may also endanger its viability. Too frequent crossings of the line between "constitution as ideology" and "ideology as constitution" will blur the line. The American concept of the legitimacy of government is closely tied to the Constitution. Its limitless manipulation may endanger the very legitimacy that has been the great accomplishment of American constitutionalism.

GERHARD CASPER
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAMS, WILLI PAUL 1980 The First American Constitutions. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

BAILYN, BERNARD 1967 The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press.

COOKE, JACOB E., ed. 1961 The Federalist. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press.

DICEY, A. V. (1885) 1959 Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution. London: Macmillan.

FRANKLIN, JULIAN H., ed. 1969 Constitutionalism and Resistance in the Sixteenth Century. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

FRIEDRICH, CARL J. 1941 Constitutional Government and Democracy. Boston: Little, Brown.

——— 1967 The Impact of American Constitutionalism Abroad. Boston: Boston University Press.

HAMILTON, WALTON H. 1931 Constitutionalism. Pages 255–258 in Edwin R. A. Seligman et al. (eds.), Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences. New York: Macmillan.

MAITLAND, F. W. 1926 The Constitutional History of England. Cambridge: At the University Press.

MCILWAIN, CHARLES HOWARD (1940) 1947 Constitutionalism: Ancient and Modern. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

PENNOCK, J. RONALD and CHAPMAN, JOHN W., eds. 1979 Constitutionalism. New York: New York University Press.

PERRY, RICHARD L., ed. 1972 Sources of Our Liberties. New York: New York University Press.

STOURZH, GERALD 1977 The American Revolution, Modern Constitutionalism, and the Protection of Human Rights. Pages 162–176 in Kenneth Thompson et al. (eds.), Truth and Tragedy: A Tribute to Hans J. Morgenthau. Washington, D.C.: New Republic Book Co.

WOOD, GORDON S. 1969 The Creation of the American Republic 1776–1787. New York: Norton.

WORMUTH, FRANCIS D. 1949 The Origins of Modern Constitutionalism. New York: Harper.

CONSTITUTIONALISM AND THE AMERICAN FOUNDING

Between 1776 and 1789 the American people constituted themselves a nation by creating republican governments in the thirteen former English colonies and then, in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, by transforming the Union of confederated states into a genuine law-giving government. The novelty of this achievement was epitomized in the seal of the new nation, which, by incorporating the phrase "Novus Ordo Seclorum," announced "a new order of the ages." Yet in founding political societies Americans pursued a goal that had occupied Western man since antiquity: the establishment of government power capable of maintaining the stability and order necessary to realize the purposes of community, yet so defined and structured as to prevent tyranny. This age-old quest for the forms, procedures, and institutional arrangements most suitable for limiting power and implementing a community's conception of political right and justice, we know as CONSTITUTIONALISM.

Constitutionalism takes as its purpose resolution of the conflict that characterizes political life and makes government necessary, through procedures and institutions that seek to limit government and create spheres of individual and community freedom. Based on the paradoxical idea that the power to make law and to rule can be at once sovereign and effective, yet also defined, reasonable, and responsible, constitutionalism contains an inherent tension that sets it against utopianism and anarchism, which deny the reality of power, and against absolutism and totalitarianism, which tolerate no limitations on power. Nevertheless, although constitutionalists can in retrospect be seen as sharing common assumptions, differences among them have sometimes led to irreconcilable conflict. One such division occurred in the eighteenth century when the American people separated from the English and adopted a new type of constitutional theory and practice for the conduct of their political life.

Perhaps the most obvious feature of American constitutionalism was its apparent dependence upon legally binding written instruments prescribing the organization of government and fixing primary principles and rules to guide its operation. Texts had of course long been used in law, government, and politics, and the English constitution comprised written elements. Americans' resort to documentary, positive law techniques of government was so much more systematic and complete than any previous undertaking, however, as to amount to constitutional innovation. Following the American example, peoples everywhere in the modern world have adopted the practice of forming governments by writing constitutions. But Americans in the founding era did more than invent a new approach to the old problem of limited government. Their constitution-making was informed with a new purpose—the liberal purpose of protecting the NATURAL RIGHTS of individuals. American charters of FUNDAMENTAL LAW were not simply ordinances of government; they were also constitutions of liberty. The meaning of liberty, especially the relation between the individual and the community that was central to any practical definition of it, was a deeply controversial issue that divided Americans in state and national constitution-making. The adoption of the federal Constitution in 1787, however, marked a decisive shift toward protection of individuals in the pursuit of their interests, and away from enforcement of community consensus aimed at making citizens virtuous and moral as the central purpose of constitutional government in America.

American constitutionalism is thus concerned with organizational and procedural matters, on the one hand, and with substantive questions of political purpose, on the other. Most constitutional politics in the United States deals with the former concern, as groups and individuals assert or deny the existence of proper governmental power or challenge methods used to employ it. Nevertheless, constitutionalism is ultimately normative and purposive. Every state may be said to have a constitution, in the sense of an institutional structure and established procedures for conducting political affairs. But not every state is a constitutional state. In the Western political tradition constitutional government exists where certain forms and procedures limit the exercise of power. American constitutionalism goes farther by pursuing not only the negative goal of preventing tyranny but also the positive end of promoting individual liberty, both in the passive sense of protection against government power and in the active sense of participation in the decisions of the political community. Viewed in this light, American constitutionalism raises basic questions of political purpose that connect it with the mainstream of Western political philosophy.

In the history of constitutionalism the great problem has not been to create power but to define and limit it. The Western constitutional tradition has employed two methods toward this end. The first is the theory and practice of arranging the internal structure of government so that power is distributed and balanced. A second method of constitutionalism has been to subject government to legal limitations, or the RULE OF LAW.

English constitutionalism in the period of American colonization comprised both strands of the constitutional tradition. The common law courts in the early seventeenth century insisted on the superiority of law to the royal prerogative. Sir EDWARD COKE gave famous expression to the idea of a higher law controlling government in asserting that "sovereign power' is no parliamentary word. . . . MAGNA CARTA is such a fellow, that he will have no sovereign." Coke also said that "when an act of Parliament is against common right and reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will control it and adjudge such act to be void." Parliament itself, however, subsequently claimed supremacy in lawmaking, and vindication of its authority in the Glorious Revolution of 1688 effectively precluded development of the rule of law into a politically relevant form of HIGHER LAW constitutionalism. An internally balanced institutional structure, expressed in the revised and revitalized theory of mixed government in the eighteenth century, became the principal model of constitutional government in England.

Essentially descriptive in its connotation, the English constitution was the structure of institutions, laws, conventions, and practices through which political issues were brought to resolution and carried out in acts of government. Yet the constitution was also prescriptive or normative, or at least it was supposed to be. More specifically, as Montesquieu, WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, and other eighteenth-century writers affirmed, the end of the English constitution was civil and political liberty. From the standpoint of modern constitutionalism the legislative supremacy that contemporaries regarded as the foundation of English liberty was incompatible with effective restraints on governments. Nevertheless, Parliament was believed to be under a moral obligation to protect the rights and liberties of Englishmen, and the sanctions of natural law were still seen as effective restraints. Moreover, political accountability to public opinion through elections operated as a limitation on government. Englishmen thus continued to see their constitution as fixed and fundamental, notwithstanding legislative SOVEREIGNTY.

American constitutionalism began in the seventeenth century when English settlers founded political societies and institutions of government in North America. Two things stand out in this early constitutional experience. First, the formation of government was to a considerable extent based on written instruments. In corporate and proprietary colonies the founding documents were COLONIAL CHARTERS granted by the crown conferring enumerated powers on a particular person or group within a designated geographical area for specific purposes. Under these charters the colonists adopted further agreements, organic acts, ordinances, combinations, and frames of government giving more precise form to political institutions. In religiously motivated colonies government was more clearly the result of mutual pledging and association under civil-religious covenants. American colonists thus used constitutionlike instruments to create political community, define fundamental values and interests, specify basic rights, and organize governmental institutions.

The second outstanding fact in early American constitutional history was substantial community control over local affairs. To be sure, the colonies employed the forms and practices of English government and generally emulated the metropolitan political culture. Their institutions at the provincial and local level were patterned after English models, and the theory of mixed government and the balanced constitution was accepted as valid. Yet discordant tendencies pointed to a distinctive course of constitutional development. The fact that in most colonies the power of the governor depended on royal authority while the power of the assembly rested on a popular base, as well as frequent conflict of interest between them, made separation and division of power a political reality discrepant with the theory of mixed government. Furthermore, popularly elected assemblies responsive to growing constituencies and enjoying de facto local sovereignty under written charters introduced a republican element into American politics.

As English subjects, Americans believed they lived under a free and fixed English constitution. Long before the Revolution they expressed this view in the course of conflicts with imperial officials. Numerous writers asserted that the constitution was a SOCIAL COMPACT between the people and their rulers; that the legislature could not alter the fundamental laws from which government derived its form, powers, and very existence; that government must exercise power within limits prescribed by a compact with the people. Moreover, the compact chosen to organize and direct government, as a colonial sermon of 1768 put it, must coincide with "the moral fitness of things, by which alone the natural rights of mankind can be secured." Disputing the descriptive English constitution that included parliamentary sovereignty, Americans were coming to think of a constitution as normative rules limiting the exercise of power for the purpose of protecting the people's liberty, property, and happiness.

In declaring their independence from England, Americans in a sense reenacted the founding experience of the seventeenth century. They took what their history and political circumstances determined to be the logical step of writing constitutions to organize their political communities. Before issuing the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Congress recommended that the colonies adopt governments that "in the opinion of representatives of the people, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular, and America in general." Although some argued that the people acting in convention should form the government, political exigencies and Whig political theory conferred legitimacy on legislatures which, in all but two instances, were responsible for writing or adopting the first state constitutions.

The most distinctive feature of the state constitutions, their documentary character, followed the decision to form new governments as a matter of course. Given the long tradition of founding documents in America, it seemed obvious that the purposes of political community and limitations on government could be better achieved by writing a constitution than by relying on an unstipulated, imprecise constitution like England's, which did not limit government and was not really a constitution after all. Although consisting in part of written documents, the English constitution was too subjective, ultimately existing in men's minds and premised on the idea that "thinking makes it so." Americans insisted that the principles and rules essential to organizing power and preserving liberty be separated from the government and objectively fixed in positive form. Old in the tendency it reflected, though new in its comprehensive application, American constitutionalism rested on the idea that "saying it makes it so," or at least the hope that putting something in writing so it can be authoritatively consulted makes it easier to achieve specified ends.

The state constitutions stood in a direct line of descent from colonial documents that created political communities and established institutions of government. One type of founding document (compact or covenant) signified mutual promise and consent by which individuals formed a political community and identified basic values, rights, and interests. A second type of document (ordinance or frame) specified governmental institutions. Half the state constitutions written between 1776 and 1789 were described as compacts and contained bills of rights that defined basic community values. In the other constitutions the design of government received principal attention. All the constitutions reflected tendencies of previous political development; none created institutions on a completely clean slate. This fact appeared more clearly in documents that were mainly concerned with establishing a framework of government. In these more modern documents, which anticipated the course of American constitutional development, community consensus yielded in importance to protection of individual rights as the main purpose of constitution-making.

Republicanism was the political philosophy of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Although lacking in precise meaning, the concept is most accurately defined as government resting on the consent of the people and directed by the public will expressed through representative institutions. In the perspective of Western political thought republican philosophy was formulated in the seventeenth century to defend liberty against absolutism. The state constitutions were republican insofar as they limited government by prescribing public decision-making procedures that prevented government officials from aggrandizing power for private benefit rather than for the public good. The constitutions were liberal also in confirming and extending the right of political participation that according to republican philosophy constituted true liberty for individuals. In many respects, however, state constitutionalism in the revolutionary era was a doctrine of community power and control that restricted individual rights in a way that would now be seen as illiberal.

Under the state constitutions the most important power in modern government—the power to make law and to compel obedience—was lodged in the legislature. Unimpeded by internal governmental checks under the extreme version of the SEPARATION OF POWERS that prevailed in the first phase of state making, and sustained by presumptive identity with POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY as the source of political authority after the rejection of monarchy, legislatures acted forcefully to promote public virtue and the common good. Requirements of public virtue frequently took the form of restrictions on individual liberty through sumptuary laws and statutes regulating the transfer and use of property. Bills of rights that were part of state constitutions had little effect on curbing legislative power because they were treated as hortatory rather than legally binding. In the name of popular sovereignty and patriotism, state legislatures fashioned a constitutionalism of unity and power in government.

The concentrated power of republican virtue acting through institutions of community control was a useful and perhaps necessary expedient in the wartime emergency. In the doctrines of state sovereignty and the POLICE POWER revolutionary republicanism entered into the American constitutional tradition, and has offered a compelling model of constitutional government throughout our history to reformers and radicals on both the left and the right. However, the actions of the state legislatures too plainly contradicted the constitutional meaning of the Revolution to become accepted as the principal or exclusive expression of American constitutionalism. That meaning was nowhere better stated than by the MASSACHUSETTS CIRCULAR LETTER of 1768, which declared: ". . . in all free States the Constitution is fixed; as the supreme Legislative derives its Power & Authority from the Constitution, it cannot overleap the Bounds of it, without destroying its own foundation." Yet this was precisely what was happening in the American republics.

The state constitutions may have been fundamental law in the sense of ordaining a framework of government, but they were not fundamental in the sense of controlling legislative power. In all but two states the constitution was written by the legislature and could be altered or abolished by that body. More than language of urging and admonition, contained in many of the constitutions, was needed to transform them into effective restraints on the actual exercise of power. Nor was the technique of internal institutional balance effectively employed to limit the state legislatures.

Attempts to restrict state legislative power in the 1780s broadened and reformed American constitutionalism. Writing and amending of constitutions by popularly elected conventions clarified the distinction between legislative law and fundamental law. Massachusetts in 1780 and New Hampshire in 1784 wrote their constitutions in conventions and required them to be ratified by the people in special elections. In theory this was the most effective way to make the constitution an antecedent higher law secure against legislative alteration. Further restriction of legislative power resulted from changes in the internal structure of government. Executive officers were given greater powers as CHECKS AND BALANCES—that is, a partial and limited sharing or mixing of functional powers among the departments—were introduced in some states as modification of the separation of powers. BICAMERALISM, a carry-over from colonial government, was recognized as a means of making legislative action more deliberate. And courts began to play a more prominent political role by treating constitutions as higher law in relation to legislative enactments.

So strong was the tradition of community self-government under legislative sovereignty, however, that it could not easily be dislodged as the main reliance of constitutionalism. Certainly little could be done to alter it by isolated efforts in the several states. Effective reform, if that was what was needed, could only come from an interstate collaboration working through the state system created by the colonies when they declared their independence. Heretofore peripheral to republican political development, the Union of the states in the Confederation became the focus of constitutional change.

The CONTINENTAL CONGRESS had been formed by the colonies in 1774 as a coordinating and advisory body to protect American interests and eventually to pursue the cause of national independence. Exigencies of war and common concerns among the states had given Congress political power, which it had exercised through informal rules and practices that were codified in the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. Considered from a constitutional perspective as a limiting grant of power, the Articles were inadequate because, although they gave Congress ostensible power to do many things, they did not confer the lawmaking authority that is essential to government. Congress could at best make resolutions and recommendations, which in practice amounted to requests that the states could ignore. The Articles were unconstitutionlike in consequence of having been written by Congress and ratified by the states, rather than based in any direct way on popular authority. They were also unconstitutionlike with respect to institutional structure. Whether considered analogous to a legislative or executive body, Congress was the sole governmentlike organ, and only an evolving departmental system saved it from complete incompetence.

As an alliance or league of friendship, the Articles were a successful founding instrument. Yet in the form given it in the Articles, the confederation was incapable of addressing in a constructive manner the defects in American government revealed in the actions of the states. The confederation provided a field of political action, however, on which the reform of republican constitutionalism could take place. The practical impossibility of amending the Articles so as to strengthen Congress having been demonstrated, and the insecurity of liberty and property in the states apparently increasing, proponents of constitutional reform made a desperate move—the calling of a convention of the states at Philadelphia in May 1787—into an enduring achievement of statesmanship and constitutional invention.

Perhaps most significant, the Framers gave institutional expression to the idea that a constitution, in order to function as a limiting grant of power, must be higher as well as fundamental law. In addition to originating or organizing power, it must be maintained separate from and paramount to government. In a formal sense the Constitution as a founding document was superficially similar to the state constitutions. A preamble explained the reasons for the document, proclaimed the existence of a people and political community, defined specific purposes, and ordained a framework of government. In reality, however, the Framers departed from the model of the state constitutions. It was unnecessary to return to the fundamentals of the social compact and the purposes of republican government, as state constitution writers to varying degrees were inclined to do. The authors of the Constitution observed that they were not addressing the natural rights of man not yet gathered in society but natural rights modified by society and interwoven with the rights of the states. They knew that the nation whose existence they were recognizing was loosely related in its constituent parts and united by few principles and interests. It was far from the kind of cohesive, integrated community that the states by contrast seemed to be, and most unlike the nation-states of Europe. Hence the Framers briefly addressed in the PREAMBLE those few basic unifying purposes and values—liberty, justice, domestic peace, military defense, the general welfare—and gave virtually the entire document to stipulating the institutions and procedures of government. As fundamental law the Constitution thus was less a social compact for a coherent, like-minded community and more a contractlike specification of the powers, duties, rights, and responsibilities among the diverse polities and peoples that constituted the American Union.

Far more effectively than writers of earlier founding instruments, the Framers made the Constitution a paramount, controlling law. In a practical sense this was merely a question of law enforcement. Creating a real government to operate directly on individuals throughout a vast jurisdiction raised a new and potentially difficult compliance issue, but this received little attention at the Convention. It was the old compliance problem of the states that stood in the way of making the Constitution binding and effective. At first the delegates considered a congressional veto on state legislation to deal with this issue, but this was rejected as impracticable and was replaced by the SUPREMACY CLAUSE. This clause expressed the paramountcy of the federal Constitution over the states, and by inference, over national legislative law as well. Not explicitly stated, but implied in the judicial article, was the idea that the superior force of the Constitution depended on its application and interpretation by the courts.

The higher law character of the Constitution was further affirmed and institutionalized in the method of its drafting and in provisions for its ratification and amendment. Although delegates to the Philadelphia Convention were appointed by the state legislatures rather than elected by the people, the Constitution was a more genuine expression of the will of the people than were the Articles of Confederation, which were written by Congress. The Framers' apprehension about unlimited popular rule does not gainsay their commitment to the republican idea that government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. Consistent with this commitment, institutions of direct popular consent that were still exceptional at the state level were incorporated into the national constitution. Ratification would be decided by conventions in the states, presumably popularly elected. Amendment of the Constitution could occur through popular approval, in state legislatures or special conventions, of proposals recommended by Congress or by a convention to be called by Congress on the application of two-thirds of the state legislatures. The superiority of the Constitution to legislative law was enhanced by this provision for amendment, as an utterly fixed and inflexible political law would become irrelevant to the task of governing an expanding society. If the Constitution required change, however, the people would have to amend it. Thus were popular sovereignty and the higher law tradition incorporated into American constitutionalism.

To make the Constitution paramount law in operational fact, however, it was not enough to assert its supremacy and assume that the people's innate law-abidingness would give it effect. This was to rely on "paper barriers," concerning the efficacy of which there was much skepticism among the Framers. It was necessary also to structure the organs of government so that power would be internally checked and limited. Although the Framers' objective was to create coercive authority where none existed, they rejected concentrated sovereign power as a constitutional principle. Delegated, divided, reciprocally limiting power formed the motif of their institutional design.

Unlike the state constitutions, which organized the inherent plenary power of the community, the Constitution delegated specific powers to the general government. The contrast was most significant in the plan of the legislative department, to which the state constitutions assigned the LEGISLATIVE POWER and which the federal constitutions defined by the ENUMERATED POWERS. Stable and energetic government seeming to require a strong executive and independent judiciary, the Constitution made grants of power of a more general nature to these branches, which under the separation of powers were counterweights to the lawmaking department. The separation principle by itself, however, as the state experience showed, was not a sufficient limitation on legislative power. Accordingly, checks and balances, by which each branch was given a partial and limited agency in the others' power (for example, executive participation in legislation through the VETO POWER or legislative judging in the IMPEACHMENT process) built further restraints into the Constitution.

The structure of the Union, of course, presented the most urgent question of institutional arrangements affecting the constitutional reality of a supreme political law. A division of power was already evident in the plan of the Articles of Confederation; what was needed was to transform the Union's political authority into a genuine power to impose lawful requirements on its constituent parts. This was achieved by reconstituting the Confederation as a compound republic, based on both the people and the states. Once this was accomplished, the pertinent fact for the paramountcy of the Constitution was the division of sovereignty. By giving the central government power over objects of general concern and allowing the states to retain almost all of their authority over local matters, the Framers divided sovereignty, thereby effectively eliminating it from the constitutional order. Arguments were certain to arise about the nature and extent of the powers of the several governments in the American state system, but the effect of such controversy would be to focus attention on the Constitution as the authoritative source of answers to questions about the rights of constituent members.

The Constitution was both fundamental and higher law because it expressed the will of the people, the ultimate source of authority in America. But it would truly limit power only if it was superior to the people themselves as a political entity, as well as to the legislative law. At the time some theorists of popular sovereignty argued that the people could alter their government at will, exercising the right of peaceful revolution and disregarding legalities of form and procedure, even as the Framers did in drafting and securing RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION against the express requirements of the Articles of Confederation. However we view their action, the authors of the Constitution rejected the notion of unlimited popular sovereignty. They provided restraints on the people in the form of a limited number of offices, long terms of office, indirect elections, large electoral districts, and separated and balanced departments of government. Although these provisions have often been viewed as antidemocratic and in conflict with republican theory, they are more accurately seen as modifying the popular form of government adopted during the Revolution. The Framers' intent, as JAMES MADISON wrote in THE FEDERALIST #10, was to supply "a republican remedy for the diseases most incident to republican government." And it should not be forgotten that despite careful distribution and balancing of authority, Congress remained potentially the most powerful branch of the government, most responsive to the people and possessed of the lawmaking power.

Making the Constitution effective as a permanent higher law involved matters of form, procedure, and institutional structure. Yet as procedural issues carry substantive implications, and means sometimes become ends in themselves, it is also necessary to ask what a constitution is for. To prevent tyranny, the constitutionalist goal, is to create a space in which differences among people become manifest, in which politics can appear and questions of purpose arise. If running a constitution always reflects political concerns, making a constitution is all the more a form of political action that derives from or partakes of political philosophy.

Americans were emphatic in declaring liberty to be the purpose of their constitutions. Moreover, if the purpose of politics is to protect men's natural rights, then American constitutions were liberal in purpose. Yet the concept of liberty, universally embraced as a political good, can be defined in different ways. And while recognition of natural rights gave modern politics a new purpose, it is equally true that virtue and moral excellence did not disappear from political discourse. These considerations give rise to two conceptions of political freedom in the constitutionalism of the founding period. The first is the liberty of self-governing political communities that were thought to have an obligation to make men virtuous and on which individuals depended for their happiness and well-being. The second rests on the primacy of natural rights and generally asserts individual liberty over community consensus as the purpose of government.

Although these conceptions of liberty stand in theoretical opposition to each other, they coexisted in the revolutionary era. After protesting imperial policies in the language of English constitutional rights, Americans justified national independence by appealing to universal natural rights. Wartime exigencies required decisive political action, however, which was based on the right of local communities to control individuals for the sake of the common good. States interfered with the liberty and property of individuals by controlling markets, restricting personal consumption, awarding monopoly privileges, and limiting imports and exports. They also regulated the speech and press freedoms of persons suspected of disloyalty to the patriot cause. In many ways revolutionary republicanism subordinated the rights of individual citizens to those of the community, defining true liberty as the pursuit of public happiness through political action.

Reacting against state encroachments on liberty and property, the constitution makers of 1787 emphasized protection of individual rights rather than promotion of virtue and community consensus as the purpose of government. Rather than an unattainable ideal of public virtue in ordinary citizens, they appealed to enlightened self-interest as the social reality on which the Constitution would rest. The Framers recognized factional conflict as a limiting condition for creating a constitution, yet also as an opportunity for broadening and redefining republican government. Alongside the communitarian ideal, which remained strong in many states, they created a new constitutional model in the complex and powerful government of the extended republic, based partly on the people yet so structured and limited that individual liberty, property, and pursuit of personal interests would be substantially protected against local legislative interference. This is not to say that mere private enrichment at the expense of the community good or general welfare was the end of the Constitution. The concepts of virtue and the public interest remained integral to political thought and discourse. But virtue assumed a new meaning as the prudent and rational pursuit of private commercial activity. Instead of telling people how to live in accordance with a particular conception of political right or religious truth, the Framers would promote ends believed beneficial to all of society—peace, economic growth, and intellectual advancement—by accommodating social competition and upholding citizens' natural rights against invasion by the organized power of the community, whether local, state, or national.

The Founding Fathers often appear antidemocratic because they created a strong central government, removed from direct popular and local community control, which they expected to be managed by an aristocratic elite. Notwithstanding its foundation in popular sovereignty and protection of individual liberty and rights, the Constitution contradicted rule by local communities guided by republican civic virtue as the real meaning of the Revolution. Although the Revolution stood for government by consent, there is no sound reason for regarding revolutionary state making as the single true expression of the republican principle. Essential parts of that principle were that government should operate through laws to which all were subordinate, both citizens and government officials, and that legislative law should be controlled by the higher law of the constitution. This was the meaning of the rule of law in the United States, and its more complete realization in the Constitution of 1787 signified climax and fulfillment of the Revolution.

The Framers' purpose must also be considered in relation to the threat of national disintegration, either from internal discord or foreign encroachment. The weakness of Congress in discharging its responsibilities was surely an impediment to protecting American interests, and an embarrassment to patriotic men. Yet the problem in 1787 was not the threat of total rupture of the Union attended by actual warfare among the states; the problem was the character of American politics and government, or the nature and tendency of republican government. Republicanism was the defining idea of the nation, and without it America would no longer have existed. The country was growing in the 1780s as population expanded, economic development occurred, and westward settlement continued. Yet the state system of 1776 was incapable of adequately accommodating and guiding this development. The states were too strong for the good of republican principles, the Union not strong enough. By restructuring the state system, by reconstituting the Union on the basis of a republican constitution that crystallized tendencies in congressional-state relations in the 1780s, the Framers sought to reform American government to the end of securing the republican ideals of the Revolution.

A constitution must recognize and conform to a people's principal characteristics and nature. Considered from this point of view the achievement of the Founding Fathers is undeniable. They created a complex government of delegated and dispersed, yet articulated and balanced, powers based on the principle of consent. Confirmation of that principle was in turn required by the Constitution in the cooperation and concurrence among the branches of government that were necessary for the conduct of public business. Made for an open, acquisitive, individualistic, competitive, and pluralistic society, the Constitution ordered the diverse constituent elements of American politics. More than merely a neutral procedural instrument for registering the play of social forces, it was a statement of ends and means for maintaining the principles that defined Americans as a national people. The Framers made a liberal constitution for a liberal society.

The Constitution was not only formally ratified but also quickly accorded full political legitimacy. The state constitutions, although not merely pretextual or façade documents, were not invoked and applied in the actual conduct of government as the United States Constitution was. And the new federal instrument was more than accepted: it rapidly became an object of veneration. The Constitution took a deep and abiding hold on the American political mind because it reflected a sober regard for the propensities of ordinary human nature and the realities of republican society; created powerful institutions capable of attracting men of talent, ambition, and enlarged civic outlook; and introduced changes in the conduct of public affairs that most people saw as improvements and that caused them to form an interest in the government it created.

The Constitution stipulated institutions, rules, and procedures embodying and symbolizing the principles of republican liberty, national unity, and balance and limitation of power. It was a fixed, objective document that could be consulted and applied, not a formless assemblage of principles, statutes, and decisions carried about in men's minds and dependent on social internalization for its effect. Yet the Constitution's principles and provisions were general and ambiguous enough to allow varying interpretations. Liberty, union, and reciprocally limiting power meant different things to different people, as did the rules and institutional arrangements expressing and embodying them. At a superficial level this circumstance produced conflict, but at a deeper level the effect was unifying. For groups and individuals were encouraged to pursue political goals within the framework of rules and requirements established by the Constitution. Thus the document became permanent and binding. Only the most extreme groups (radical abolitionists and slaveholders in the nineteenth century, totalitarian parties in the twentieth) have repudiated the Constitution as a framework for political action.

The Constitution possessed force and effect because it was useful and relevant to political life. Responsive to the social environment, it had instrumental value. At the same time, repeated reference to the document as the source and symbol of legitimate authority confirmed its intrinsic value, apart from the practical results of specific controversies. People believed, in other words, that it was important to follow the Constitution for its own sake or for the common good, rather than for a particular political reason. The intrinsic value of the Constitution lay not only in the wisdom and reasonableness of its principles in relation to the nature of American society but also in the form those principles were given in a written instrument. The effect of the Constitution as binding political law has much to do with its textual character.

The Framers addressed this issue in discussing "parchment barriers." The state constitutions were evidence that written stipulations were no guarantee of performance, especially when it came to limiting legislative power. Madison in particular said that it was not enough to erect parchment barriers in the form of constitutional provisions stating that the legislative department must confine itself to lawmaking. It was further necessary to arrange the interior structure of government so the constituent parts would limit each other. Personal motives of ambition and interest, Madison reasoned, when linked with constitutional offices would lead men to resist encroachments from other departments. These were the "auxiliary precautions" (supplementing accountability to the people) that would oblige government to control itself. Madison was saying that pluralistic differences in opinion and interest are necessary to make the prescriptions of the text function effectively.

Nevertheless, American constitutionalism insists that the text of the fundamental law be given its due. Madison's auxiliary precautions are in fact rules written into the document. Although the written text may not be sufficient, it is necessary to achieve the purposes of constitutionalism, or so it has seemed most of the time to most Americans. In the Constitutional Convention RUFUS KING said that he was aware that an express guarantee of STATES' RIGHTS, which he favored, would be regarded as "a mere paper security." But "if fundamental articles of compact are not sufficient defence against physical power," King declared, "neither will there be any safety against it if there be no compact."

Reference to the constitutional text has been a fixed feature of American politics. Its significance and effect have been variously estimated. A long tradition of criticism holds that the document has failed to limit government, especially the federal government in relation to the states. Others argue that constant invoking of the Constitution has trivialized politics by translating policy debate into legalistic squabbles that discourage dealing with issues on their merits. Reformers seeking a more programmatic politics have lamented that the Constitution by fragmenting power prevents responsible party government. And still others contend that the Constitution has worked precisely as intended: to eliminate genuine political action and make citizens passive subjects interested in private economic pursuits rather than public happiness and civic virtue.

These criticisms misunderstand the nature of constitutional politics and hence the binding and configurative effect of the Constitution. If politics is concerned with the end or purpose of political community, the proper role of government, the relationship between the individual and society, then it is difficult to see how the Constitution can be said to have brought an end to politics or prevented political action. As an expression of modern liberalism, however, the Constitution did signify a change in the nature of politics. To elevate natural rights into constitutionally protected CIVIL RIGHTS, as the Framers did, was to discourage an older politics based on the pursuit of glory, honor, conquest, and political or religious truth, as well as a newer ideological politics born of modern revolution. The Framers' constitutionalism was a way of organizing political life that paradoxically placed certain principles, rules, and procedures beyond politics, according them the status of fundamental and paramount law. Premised on the idea that citizens could pursue private interests while preserving community, it was intended to limit the scope and intensity of politics, preventing a total absorption of society that would impose tyranny in the name of ruler, party, people, or community.

Starting in the 1790s and continuing with remarkable continuity to the present day, public policy advocates have charted courses of action with reference to the Constitution. Using constitutional language firmly embedded in political rhetoric, such as DUE PROCESS OF LAW, EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAW, separation of powers, and so forth, they invoke its principles and values to justify their goals, argue over the meaning of its requirements, and align themselves with its manifest tenor as explicated in constitutional law and legislation. Political leaders do this not because they are unwaveringly committed to a specific constitutional principle; in different circumstances they might advocate a different principle. The decisive fact is the high public status accorded the Constitution: policymakers and political actors know that the people take the Constitution seriously, regard it as supreme law, believe that it is powerful because it embodies sound principles of government and society's basic values, and, indeed, venerate it. Aware of this popular prejudice in favor of the Constitution, and seeking the approval of public opinion, political groups and individuals are constrained to act in conformity with its provisions. Thus the Constitution as binding political law shapes the form and content of policies and events.

The constraining effect of the Constitution might nevertheless be questioned, for it will appear obvious that while some requirements are unequivocally clear (for example, the minimum age of the President), many provisions are ambiguous and imprecise in meaning. Confronted with this fact, many scholars have concluded that there is no single, true meaning of the Constitution, but rather that there are several possible readings of it, none of which possesses exclusive legitimacy. Some contend there is no real Constitution against which arguments about it can be evaluated, only different assertions as to what the Constitution is at any given time, or as to what we want it to be. Expressed in the oft-cited statement that the Constitution is what the Supreme Court says it is, this view, carried to its logical conclusion, would mean that the American Constitution is a developing, evolving, growing thing that is changed by the actions of judges, lawmakers, and executive officers. In that case the Constitution ceases to be a fixed, prescriptive, paramount law.

Politically and historically realistic as this analysis appears, it has never been accepted as legitimate in constitutional theory or in the conduct of constitutional politics. From the standpoint of the people and their representatives, the Constitution, in both its procedural requirements and its essential principles, has a true, fixed, ascertainable meaning. This popular understanding has existed from the beginning of constitutional politics in the debate over ratification, and it will probably continue until the popular belief, that the Constitution as a document says what it means and means what it says, is eroded or superseded by a more sophisticated view of the character of texts and political language. There is still a strong tendency in public opinion to think that written constitutions, in THOMAS JEFFERSON's words, "furnish a text to which those who are watchful may again rally and recall the people: they fix too for the people principles for their political creed."

The importance of the constitutional text in American government has been raised anew in recent years in the controversy over original intent jurisprudence. Many legal scholars have expressed doubt about the wisdom and legitimacy of consulting the original intent of the Constitution or of its authors in settling constitutional disputes. The words of the text, it is argued, apart from anything that its authors may have written or said about its meaning, must be considered as expressing the original intent. And the text must be read and understood according to the accepted meaning of words in the interpreter's own time, place, and historical situation. Some dispose of original intent more directly by asserting that constitutional interpretation need not be bound by the constitutional text, but may be based on fundamental social values and conceptions of justice and moral progress that judges are specially qualified to understand and apply. Either way, the Constitution is assured of its status as a "living document" adaptable to changing social conditions.

Although there may be sound reasons for disconnecting constitutional politics from original intent, from a historical standpoint it seems clear that neither the Framers nor the people over 200 years have taken so narrow a view of the meaning and relevance of original intent. The purpose of making a fixed, objective constitution was to decide the most important basic questions about politics and government once and for all—or until the people changed their mind and amended the document. The idea was to bind future generations in fundamental ways. This purpose would be defeated if those who later ran the Constitution were free to substitute their own definitions of its key terms. Yet the fact remains that constitutional principles and rules have been reinterpreted and redefined, in apparent contradiction of the Framers' intent, in decisions and statutes that have been accepted as politically legitimate. The Supreme Court has, in a sense, acted as a continuing constitutional convention.

Although the Founding Fathers intended the Constitution to be permanent and binding, the language of the document cannot realistically or reasonably, in a categorical sense, be frozen in its eighteenth-century meaning. It is the Constitution's essential purposes and its fundamental principles and procedures that were not intended to change. The question to be asked is whether fundamental principles and values—the values of individual liberty, national union, distributed and balanced power, the consent of the people—can be defined in an authoritative text and thereby realized in public law and policy to the satisfaction of the political community. American political history generally provides an affirmative answer to this question. But it is important to remember that an overriding imperative in American politics, law, and government has been to reconcile public policy with constitutional principles and rules as embodied in the text, and in accordance with the Framers' intentions. Moreover, original intent has not been viewed in a narrowly positivistic manner. The text was thought to have a definite and lasting meaning; and speeches, writings, and letters of the authors of the Constitution have always been thought pertinent to the task of elucidating its meaning. Whatever the practical effect of dismissal of the text and repudiation of original intent would be, such a step would alter the historic character of American constitutionalism.

Diverse in ethnic, religious, cultural, and social characteristics, Americans were united in 1776 by the political principles set forth in the Declaration of Independence. Inchoate though it was, the new nation was defined by these principles—liberty, equality, government by consent, the pursuit of happiness as an individual right—which in various ways were written into the state constitutions. By establishing a republican government for the nation, the Framers of the Constitution confirmed these principles, completing the Revolution and making it permanent. Since then American politics has derived from and been shaped by the Constitution, and has periodically been renewed by popular movements resulting in electoral realignments that have included a return to the first principles of the Founding as an essential element.

Understanding this attachment to the constitutional text has often been difficult for scholars and intellectuals, who tend to disparage it as "constitution worship." Perhaps reverence for the Constitution expresses not so much a naive literalism, however, as an awareness of the act of foundation as a source of authority. Considered in this perspective the constitutional text stands for the Founding, and the principles written into the document symbolically represent values evident in the actions of the Framers. The Founding required rational discussion, deliberation, compromise, and choice; consent, concurrence, and mutual pledging. These procedural values are embodied in constitutional provisions that require government under a fixed institutional structure and by deliberative processes that depend on compromise and concurrence, in accordance with substantive principles of natural rights, consent, and limited and balanced power.

HERMAN BELZ
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1955 The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutional Law. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

FRIEDRICH, CARL J. 1968 Constitutional Government and Democracy. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

GOUGH, J. W. 1955 Fundamental Law in English Constitutional History. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

LIENESCH, MICHAEL 1980 The Constitutional Tradition: History, Political Action, and Progress in American Political Thought. Journal of Politics 42:2–30.

LUTZ, DONALD 1980 From Covenant to Constitution in American Political History. Publius 10:101–133.

MCILWAIN, CHARLES H. (1940) 1947 Constitutionalism: Ancient and Modern. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

VILE, M. J. C. 1967 Constitutionalism and the Separation of Powers. New York: Oxford University Press.

WRIGHT, BENJAMIN F. 1958 Consensus and Continuity: 1776–1787. New York: Norton.

CONSTITUTIONAL REASON OF STATE

Reason of state is one of the illimitable silences of the Constitution. Derived directly from Niccolò Machiavelli and JOHN LOCKE (who called it the "prerogative"), it is "the doctrine that whatever is required to insure the survival of the state must be done by the individuals responsible for it, no matter how repugnant such an act may be to them in their private capacity as decent and moral men." Not labeled "reason of state" by the Supreme Court, the doctrine often travels under the banner of NATIONAL SECURITY or the "interests of society."

National survival is the ultimate value protected by the doctrine. But more is covered; it is used whenever an important interest of the state is jeopardized, as perceived by those who wield effective control over the state's apparatus (government). Wartime use is the most obvious, stated classically by ABRAHAM LINCOLN in 1861: "Is there in all republics this inherent and fatal weakness? Must a government of necessity be too strong for the liberties of its people, or too weak to maintain its own existence?" Other instances in which reason of state has been the validating principle include the treatment of American Indians, wars of conquest (such as the Mexican War), economic depressions, and the control of dissident groups. Justification for both the Korean and Vietnam "wars" rests on the doctrine. (See KOREAN WAR; VIETNAM WAR.)

The basic constitutional problem is to distinguish between the circumstances fit for republican (that is, democratic) rule and those suited for personal rule. With rare exceptions—the principal ones are the Steel Seizure Case (YOUNGSTOWN SHEET AND TUBE V. SAWYER, 1952) and UNITED STATES V. UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT (1972)—the Supreme Court has deferred to the political branches of government. The President normally is the moving force, with Congress usually acquiescing in executive actions designed to meet perceived emergencies. The PRIZE CASES (1863) were the leading early judicial statement approving the doctrine. (See also JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES.)

To the extent that the doctrine of reason of state finds acceptance, the theory of LIMITED GOVERNMENT recedes. Government in the United States has always been relative to circumstances, precisely as strong as conditions necessitated. The Constitution, accordingly, has been updated by successive generations of Americans, often at least tacitly employing reason of state principles.

No criteria exist by which to determine whether reason of state has been validly invoked. The Supreme Court has thus far failed to define such synonymous terms as "national security" and "society." By employing a BALANCING TEST, the Justices rule for society—for the state—whenever the vital interests of the state are considered to be in danger. In so doing, the Court never divulges how it determines what the interests of society are or the weights to be given to them. Reason of state, therefore, often amounts to government by fiat, but with the legitimizing imprimatur of the Supreme Court.

The BILL OF RIGHTS was an effort to limit the application of reason of state. However, Supreme Court interpretations have converted many of those seemingly absolute commands into mere hortatory admonitions to act reasonably in the circumstances. For example, the FIRST AMENDMENT's presciption that "no law" should abridge freedom of speech or press has been interpreted into relative standards. Reason of state thus has been resurrected by the Supreme Court after the constitutional Framers tried to hem it in.

Every nation employs a variation of reason of state, whether or not it has a written constitution. France, for example, expressly provides for EMERGENCY POWERS in Article 16 of the constitution of the Fifth Republic. The United States has accomplished the same result without an express constitutional provision or even a stated constitutional principle.

If, as many assert, the United States has entered a period of great danger, one in which its constitutional institutions will be sorely tested, reason of state will doubtless often be invoked—probably tacitly—as emergencies and crises arise. The doctrine can and will be employed to justify presidential use of violence without congressional authorization, as Presidents have almost routinely done in the past. It is the ultimate basis for expansion of presidential powers in many directions.

The Constitution was written at a propitious time in history, a time when a coalescence of factors—geography, natural resources, freedom from external pressures, a small population, capital and cheap labor from Europe—provided a favorable milieu for the FUNDAMENTAL LAW and its structure of government to flourish. Today, Americans face polar opposites—a shrinking planet, dwindling resources, total immersion in FOREIGN AFFAIRS, a burgeoning population, a slowing of productivity and of economic growth. Crisis government, accordingly, is becoming the norm. More and more, government will call upon emergency powers—upon reason of state—in efforts to cope. The large meaning is that a new fundamental law is emerging, one that can be called the "Constitution of Control." It exists as another layer on the palimpsest that is the Constitution of 1787.

ARTHUR S. MILLER
(1986)

Bibliography

FRIEDRICH, CARL J. 1957 Constitutional Reason of State. Providence, R.I.: Brown University.

MILLER, ARTHUR SELWYN 1981 Democratic Dictatorship: The Emergent Constitution of Control. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

ROSSITER, CLINTON 1948 Constitutional Dictatorship: Crisis Government in the Modern Democracies. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

Although any change in the Constitution can be labeled a reform, the broad term "constitutional reform" is usually reserved for proposed amendments that would alter in some fundamental way the structure of the government established by the nation's charter—that is, the organization of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches, the distribution of power among them, and their interrelationships.

Rarely have structural amendments to the Constitution been adopted. Of the twenty-six amendments ratified since 1787, only two have affected the form or character of the institutions as they were designed by the Framers. The SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT, ratified in 1913, required United States senators to be chosen by popular election rather than by state legislatures. The TWENTY-SECOND AMENDMENT, approved in 1951, limits presidential tenure to two full terms. The other twenty-four amendments either have added substantive provisions (guaranteeing FREEDOM OF SPEECH and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, abolishing SLAVERY, providing for WOMAN SUFFRAGE, and so on) or, while dealing with the governmental structure, have corrected flaws or made minor adaptations in the constitutional design without altering the nature or relationships of the institutions that compose the government.

The stability of the American constitutional structure contrasts sharply with the impermanence of governmental systems in many other countries, some of which have written, discarded, and rewritten entire constitutions during the period that the United States constitutional structure has remained virtually unchanged. The American experience undoubtedly reflects a general satisfaction with the governmental system, particularly with that system's original and distinctive feature—its SEPARATION OF POWERS and CHECKS AND BALANCES. It may also reflect the fact that the Constitution embodies probably the most difficult AMENDING PROCESS of any constitution in the world. In the normal process, an amendment must be approved by two-thirds of each house of Congress and then be ratified by the legislatures (or constitutional conventions) of three-fourths of the states. The requirement for such extraordinary majorities confers an effective VETO POWER on any sizable political bloc; an amendment must be favored by Republicans and Democrats alike, by both conservatives and liberals, by advocates of a strong presidency as well as defenders of Congress. Yet structural amendments redistribute power and hence create winners and losers among the political blocs. The potential losers can usually muster enough support, either in the Congress or in the state legislatures, to block action. (As an alternative to initiation by the Congress, amendments may be proposed by a CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION organized at the request of two-thirds of the state legislatures; but no such convention has ever been called. RATIFICATION by three-fourths of the states would still be required.)

During the 1980s, the objective of constitutional reform attracted authoritative and well-organized support, expressed through two organizations made up of persons with long experience in high office. One, which included former officials of every administration from DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to RONALD REAGAN, was created in 1982 to advocate a single six-year term for the President—a proposal with a history of support going back to ANDREW JACKSON. Ineligibility for reelection, the group argued, would enable the President to rise above politics and put the national interest ahead of personal reelection concerns. But the proposal encountered the objections, among others, that if the President is ineligible for reelection, he becomes a "lame duck" and hence loses authority, and that six years would be too long for a President who turned out to be ineffective. The proposal failed to win widespread support, and the movement faded.

The second organization, established in 1981, was the Committee on the Constitutional System, consisting of former members of Congress, former high executive officials, academics, and other political observers. Identifying the principal structural problem as one of conflict and deadlock between the executive and legislative branches, the committee undertook a broad consideration of remedies. Rejecting the six-year term for the President, the group recommended instead that the term of members of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES be extended from two years to four (a proposal advanced in 1966 by President LYNDON B. JOHNSON) and the term of senators from six years to eight. All House members and half the senators would be chosen in each presidential election, thus eliminating the present midterm congressional contests. Proponents contend that a four-year time horizon for the whole government would enable it to make difficult decisions that it does not now make because the next election is always imminent; opponents respond that the midterm election is a necessary check to enable the voters to register approval or disapproval of their government.

The committee also endorsed an amendment to permit members of Congress to serve in the presidential CABINET and other executive branch positions (a variation of proposals that won considerable support in earlier decades to give cabinet members nonvoting seats in the Congress and to require cabinet members, or even the President, to appear before Congress to answer questions). And it proposed to ease the process for approving treaties, by reducing the present requirement for a two-thirds vote of the SENATE to either 60 percent of the Senate or a constitutional majority of both houses.

Finally, the committee recommended consideration of two more radical reforms. One would reduce the likelihood of divided government (that is, one party controlling the executive branch and the opposing party ruling one or both houses of Congress), which the committee identified as conducive to deadlock and inaction, by requiring voters to choose between party slates for President, vice-president, Senate, and House. The second would provide a means for reconstituting a government that had proved incapable of governing—because of deadlock between the branches, presidential incapacity, corruption, or any other reason—by means of a special election in which the presidency, vice-presidency, and congressional seats would be at stake. Such a procedure would correspond to those by which legislatures in parliamentary democracies are dissolved and new elections held. These proposals, too, attracted little popular support, and constitutional reform remained a subject only for academic debate.

JAMES L. SUNDQUIST
(1992)

Bibliography

ROBINSON, DONALD L. 1989 A Government for the Third American Century. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

SUNDQUIST, JAMES L. 1986 Constitutional Reform and Effective Government. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

CONSTITUTIONAL REMEDIES

Constitutional remedies take different forms, including defenses to criminal prosecutions, postconviction HABEAS CORPUS actions, civil actions for DAMAGES, and declaratory and injunctive relief. Remedies for violations of constitutional rights, at first indistinguishable from more general legal remedies, became the focus of special congressional concern after the CIVIL WAR and are now a highly developed set of modern rules shaped by both Congress and the Supreme Court.

Until well into the twentieth century, misbehavior by state or federal officials was more likely to be viewed as tortious or otherwise merely unlawful rather than as unconstitutional. As in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) and DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), federal courts would refuse to enforce unconstitutional legislation, but the question of additional remedies for constitutional violations rarely arose. CRIMINAL PROCEDURE had not yet been federalized, and there were few constitutional rights that could give rise to distinctive remedies. Thus, early remedies against official misbehavior, such as the effort to vest jurisdiction in the Supreme Court to issue writs of MANDAMUS, invalidated in Marbury, were not thought of as distinct constitutional remedies. Even today, the liability for damages of the United States (but not United States officials) is governed largely by the FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT, which does not by its terms distinguish between constitutional violations and other tortious conduct. It authorizes an action against the United States only if the challenged behavior also happens to violate state law. The conflating of constitutional violations and other legal wrongs limited and obscured constitutional remedies.

The Civil War led to the creation of new constitutional rights, and RECONSTRUCTION era CIVIL RIGHTS statutes demonstrated a new congressional belief in the need to give such rights special protection. Section 4 of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866, "with a view to affording reasonable protection to all persons in their constitutional rights of equality before the law," increased the number of federal judicial officers authorized to enforce the statutory protections of the act. The HABEAS CORPUS ACT OF 1867 established federal habeas corpus relief as a remedy in all cases "where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the constitution," a provision that survives with little substantive change today. The Enforcement Act (the Civil Rights Act of 1870) imposed criminal penalties for the violation of constitutionally protected voting rights and for conspiracies to violate constitutional rights. The Ku Klux Klan Act (the Civil Rights Act of 1871)—part of which is now SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, U.S. CODE—created a civil action for every person deprived, under color of state law, of constitutional rights. Similar criminal prohibitions, largely ineffective, against violating constitutional rights continue in force in Sections 241 and 242, Title 18, U.S. Code.

These Reconstruction statutes, combined with increasing substantive constitutional protections, led to important judicially generated growth of constitutional remedies in both the criminal and civil areas. In the 1920s the Supreme Court began to treat the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT as a limitation on state criminal procedure. The resulting constitutionalization of criminal procedure led to expanded direct review by the Supreme Court of the constitutionality of state court convictions and to greater use of federal habeas corpus to vindicate constitutional rights. The EXCLUSIONARY RULE for FOURTH AMENDMENT violations has been a particularly controversial remedy in the criminal sphere.

In the civil arena, the term "constitutional remedies" usually refers to damages actions and injunctive relief, each of which has had a distinct historical development. Injunctive relief for constitutional violations developed first. EX PARTE YOUNG (1908) established the availability, despite the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT and the doctrine of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY, of injunctive relief against unconstitutional behavior by state officers. The remedial power to enjoin unconstitutional behavior figured prominently in the fight against SEGREGATION statutes.

As the use of the INJUNCTION to protect constitutional rights grew, different forms of injunctive relief emerged. Injunctions protecting constitutional rights may be subdivided into simple injunctions and structural, or institutional, injunctions. The simple injunction, ordering, for example, that the unconstitutional statute not be enforced, has remained relatively uncontroversial. The proper scope of broader injunctive relief has been debated since the 1960s, when federal courts found that recalcitrant state officials and legislatures did not comply with court orders to desegregate school systems and to improve conditions in prisons or mental institutions. Remedial orders in such INSTITUTIONAL LITIGATION involved courts in the details of running institutions. DESEGREGATION orders not promptly obeyed led to hard choices about obedience to the RULE OF LAW in the face of resistance to one particular remedy, court-ordered SCHOOL BUSING. Some observers raised questions about the legitimacy of judicial intervention in the operations of other public institutions and the capacity of courts as institutional managers. In a few cases, courts faced with years of noncompliance ordered local governments to finance constitutionally prescribed remedies, even going so far as to order increases in local taxes. In MISSOURI V. JENKINS (1990) the Court held that a federal district court may direct a local government to levy taxes to comply with desegregation requirements.

Damages were awarded against public officials in a few early twentieth-century decisions in cases brought under section 1983, and damages are one traditional remedy under the Fifth Amendment's TAKING OF PROPERTY clause. However, the modern right to recover damages against officials for constitutional violations is mainly traceable to MONROE V. PAPE (1961) and BIVENS V. SIX UNKNOWN NAMED AGENTS (1971). In Monroe the Court held that section 1983 authorized a damages action against police officers who violated the Fourth Amendment in an illegal arrest and search. Actions based on section 1983 have since grown to encompass most constitutional harms, and litigation under the section constitutes one of the largest segments of federal court civil dockets. The remedies available under section 1983 include compensatory damages, punitive damages (against individuals, but not governments), injunctive relief, and the award of attorneys' fees. The Eleventh Amendment severely limits monetary remedies for constitutional violations, but the Supreme Court made clear that a state may be required to pay the cost of prospective compliance with the Constitution, such as the cost of desegregating a school system.

Section 1983 authorizes actions only against state officials. In Bivens the Court allowed a damages action against federal officials for violating the Fourth Amendment. After Bivens the Court recognized IMPLIED CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF ACTION under the FIRST AMENDMENT, Fifth Amendment, and Eighth Amendment. In the 1980s, however, the Court began to rein in the Bivens remedy. In Chappell v. Wallace (1983) and United States v. Stanley (1987) the Court refused to recognize Bivens actions for enlisted military personnel who alleged that they had been injured by unconstitutional actions of their superiors and who had no cause of action against the United States. In Bush v. Lucas (1983) the Court refused to create a Bivens remedy for a violation of a civil service employee's First Amendment rights, because the violation arose "out of an employment relationship that is governed by comprehensive procedural and substantive provisions giving meaningful remedies against the United States." And in Schweiker v. Chilicky (1988) the Court held that the denial of SOCIAL SECURITY benefits in violation of due process did not give rise to a Bivens action against the wrongdoing officials.

Congress greatly influences constitutional remedies by expanding, contracting, and shaping them. The Fourteenth Amendment and other constitutional provisions authorize Congress to enact legislation, both remedial and substantive, to enforce constitutional rights. The Reconstruction statutes were enacted largely under this authority. Section 1983 and federal habeas corpus, both federal statutory remedies, are the two most frequently used constitutional remedies, aside from defenses to criminal prosecutions.

The limits of congressional power over constitutional remedies have not been fully tested. Congress has left in place the two most-used statutory protections and regularly rejects proposals to restrict federal court jurisdiction to hear particular classes of cases or to issue specific remedies. Congress did limit section 1983 by requiring, in the Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act, that certain prisoners first exhaust state administrative remedies before bringing section 1983 actions. And, in refusing to extend Bivens actions, the Supreme Court, in Bush v. Lucas and Schweiker v. Chilicky, emphasized that comprehensive alternative congressional remedial schemes were already in place for protecting the constitutional rights asserted. Congress's refusal to enact jurisdictional limitations, together with the implausibility of repealing section 1983 or federal habeas corpus, suggests a deep national commitment to the ideal of remedying constitutional wrongs.

The modern growth of constitutional remedies may have modified that commitment in one important way. The increased availability of injunctive and damages relief taught that fully remedying each constitutional wrong comes at a cost, either in challenging the authority of governing officials or in increasing confrontations between the judicial and political branches of government or between federal courts and state officials. A full panoply of remedies to fix each constitutional wrong may have increased the Supreme Court's reluctance to acknowledge new constitutional rights. In PAUL V. DAVIS (1976), Parratt v. Taylor (1981), and subsequent cases involving both the due process clause and section 1983, the Court may have curtailed substantive constitutional protections in order to avoid triggering extensive remedial relief.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1992)

Bibliography

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1982 Section 1983: Doctrinal Foundations and an Empirical Study. Cornell Law Review 67:482–556.

——— 1991 Civil Rights Legislation, 3rd ed. Charlottesville, Va.: Michie.

NAHMOD, SHELDON H. 1986 Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Litigation, 2nd ed. Colorado Springs, Colo.: Shepard's.

SCHWAB, STEWART J. and EISENBERG, THEODORE 1988 Explaining Constitutional Tort Litigation: The Influence of the Attorney Fees Statute and the Government as Defendant. Cornell Law Review 73:719–784.

CONSTITUTIONAL REMEDIES (Update)

The 1990s began with MISSOURI V. JENKINS's (1990) 5–4 affirmation of federal JUDICIAL POWER to remedy constitutional violations. The case sustained federal court power to promote local tax increases to fund DESEGREGATION orders. Proposed constitutional amendments and LEGISLATION abrogating the decision failed to gain adequate support. And in Crawford-El v. Britton (1998), the Supreme Court, in a 5–4 decision, refused to require CIVIL RIGHTS plaintiffs to adduce clear and convincing evidence of improper motive, a heightened level of proof, to avoid dismissal of constitutional claims that depend on the defendant's motive.

Most developments in the 1990s, however, curtailed vindication of constitutional rights, especially for prisoners. The Federal Courts Improvement Act of 1996 amended SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE to limit actions alleging constitutional violations by state judges. It prohibits injunctive relief against judicial officers unless a DECLARATORY JUDGMENT has been violated or declaratory relief is unavailable. It thus limits the Court's allowance in Pulliam v. Allen (1984) of injunctive relief against judges. The same Act also limits attorney fee awards against judges to cases in which the judge's actions are "clearly in excess" of the judge's JURISDICTION, a standard that precludes fee awards in most cases.

The ANTITERRORISM AND EFFECTIVE DEATH PENALTY ACT OF 1996 capped years of efforts by conservatives to curtail federal HABEAS CORPUS. It limits the ability of prisoners to file repeat habeas petitions; imposes firmer deadlines for the filing of habeas petitions; and limits prison institutional reform litigation. The Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1996 echoes the same themes and further curtails the rights of prisoners to assert constitutional violations. It limits the circumstances under which courts may enter injunctions against unconstitutional prison conditions, including overcrowding and inadequate medical care. It also addresses the alleged problem of frivolous prisoner litigation by curtailing the authority of impoverished prisoners to file lawsuits without paying filing fees.

Ironically, data from the federal courts suggest that the aggressive statutory antiprisoner program was based in part on myth. No long-term increase in prisoner litigiousness is perceptible from the mid-1970s to the 1990s. Increases in prisoner filings can be explained by increases in the prison population, not by more filings per prisoner.

Court decisions also restricted the opportunities of prisoners to assert constitutional violations. Wilson v. Seiter (1991) held that prisoners claiming that prison conditions violate the Eighth Amendment's ban on CRUEL OR UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT must establish that prison officials had a culpable state of mind. But in Farmer v. Brennan (1994), the Court acknowledged that the Eighth Amendment requires prison officials to maintain minimally humane prison conditions. In Heck v. Humphrey (1994), the Court restricted the power of prisoners to challenge the constitutionality of their convictions under section 1983. A state prisoner has no cause of action under section 1983 unless the conviction is first invalidated by the grant of a writ of habeas corpus.

Actions against prosecutors are one area in which federal decisions did not curtail constitutional remedies. Burns v. Reed (1991), Buckley v. Fitzsimmons (1993), and Kalina v. Fletcher (1997) all tend to limit the absolute immunity of prisoners to acts directly related to the prosecution of cases, and to deny immunity for investigative or other prosecutorial activities.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Immunity of Public Officials; Prisoners' Rights.)

Bibliography

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1996 Civil Rights Legislation, 4th ed. Charlottesville, Virginia: Michie.

TUSHNET, MARK and YACKLE, LARRY 1997 Symbolic Statutes and Real Laws: The Pathologies of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act and the Prison Litigation Reform Act. Duke Law Journal 47:1–86.

CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY

The term "constitutional theory" refers to two aspects of constitutional law. First, it refers to general theories of the Constitution, which deal with the overall structure of the government, the relations among the branches, and the relation between the national and state governments. Second, it refers to theories of JUDICIAL REVIEW, which provide justifications for the occasions on which the courts, ruling on constitutional issues, will and will not displace the judgments of elected officials.

General theories of the Constitution consider the structure of the government as defined in the Constitution and, more important, as the institutions of the government have developed historically. The primary subjects of this sort of constitutional theory are the SEPARATION OF POWERS of the three branches of the national government, and FEDERALISM, or the division of authority between the national government and state governments. Constitutional theories of this sort attempt to explain how the institutional arrangements of the United States government promote the public interest by allowing the adoption of socially beneficial legislation that does not threaten FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS.

Theories of the separation of powers fall into two basic groups. In one, the primary concern is the separateness of the branches of the national government. Within this version of constitutional theory, problems arise when one branch begins to assume duties historically performed by another branch. The LEGISLATIVE VETO, invalidated in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), offers an example. In the other version, the emphasis is on CHECKS AND BALANCES, and so the legislative veto is treated as a useful innovation to deal with problems of legislative control of executive actions in a government much larger than it was when created in 1789.

In general, checks and balances theories are more receptive to institutional innovations than separation of powers theories. Innovations tend to be seen as democratically chosen devices by which the executive and legislative branches respond to the demands for expansive substantive action generated by the political process; the public asks that the government expand its activity in the provision of social welfare or in international affairs, and the government responds first by acting to satisfy those demands and then, finding that either Congress or the President has grown too powerful, by developing new institutions like the legislative veto to check the branch that seems more threatening.

Yet, if checks and balances theories allow for institutional innovation and therefore for the adoption of policies that the public believes to be in its interest, they are less sensitive than separation of powers theories to the threats to fundamental freedoms that institutional innovations pose. If the original design of the Constitution carefully balanced the branches, as separation of powers theories suggest, then it is unlikely that current majorities will improve on that design.

Similar tensions pervade theories of federalism. At the outset, federalism appeared to be an important protection of democracy and social experimentation: state and local government, being closer to the people, could more readily be controlled by them than the more remote government in the national capital; and the variety of problems faced on the local level might elicit various responses, some of which would prove valuable enough to be adopted elsewhere while those that failed would do so only on a small scale. As the nation expanded, however, economic conditions appeared to require more coordinated responses than local governments could provide. As a result, federalism lost some of its value, to the point where on most issues the national government is free to act as national majorities wish, no matter how much some local governments and local majorities might object. The impairment of local democracy is apparent, yet alternative theories of federalism rely on notions of a sharp division of authority between state and nation that tend to seem quite artificial under modern circumstances.

These examples show how changes in both the scope of the national economy and the reach of the national government pose questions for general theories of the Constitution. Most dramatically, neither POLITICAL PARTIES nor ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES were contemplated by the designers of the Constitution, and yet any overall theory of the operation of the national government—a constitutional theory of the first sort—must somehow accommodate the importance of parties and BUREAUCRACIES.

General constitutional theory also deals with the role of the courts, though on a relatively high level of abstraction. Such theories agree that the courts exist to protect fundamental rights, but disagree primarily on the sources of those rights. One approach finds fundamental rights rooted in transcendental conceptions of rights, of the sort identified in classical theories of natural law. This approach often meets with skepticism about the existence of natural law. Another approach finds the fundamental rights enumerated in the text of the Constitution, but has difficulty dealing with what have been called the "open-ended" provisions of the Constitution, such as the NINTH AMENDMENT and the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clauses, which appear to refer to UNENUMERATED RIGHTS.

When general theories of the Constitution deal with the role of judicial review, they sometimes adopt varieties of the other basic type of constitutional theory, the concern of which is the justification of judicial review. Constitutional theories of this type must divide the universe of constitutional claims into those that the courts should uphold and those that they should reject. A powerful argument against a court's decision to exercise its power to invalidate legislation is that such a decision necessarily overturns the outcome of processes of majority rule that are themselves an important value in the American constitutional system. It should be noted, however, that the strength of the "countermajoritarian difficulty," as ALEXANDER M. BICKEL called it, can vary, depending on which government actor actually promulgated the rule in question—a city council, a state government, an administrative agency, Congress, or the President? Majoritarianism alone cannot answer the questions about judicial review. The constitutional system, though it values majority rule, does not take majority rule to be the sole value, as the Constitution's inclusion of limitations on the power of government demonstrates. If there is to be any judicial review, which seems required by the structure of the Constitution, on some occasions courts will displace the decisions of the majoritarian legislatures.

Most constitutional theories of the second type agree, however, that the courts should not simply substitute their determination of what is wise public policy for the legislature's. Not only do courts often lack the competence that legislatures have in developing information about social problems and possible methods of responding to those problems, but, more to the point, the countermajoritarian implications of such freewheeling exercises of the power of judicial review are, for most, unacceptable in the American constitutional system. Theories of this type therefore set themselves two tasks: they must specify when and why courts can invalidate legislation, and when and why they cannot.

Modern constitutional theories of this type fall into several basic groups, though many variants have been offered:

1. ORIGINALISM insists that the courts should invalidate legislation only when the legislation is inconsistent with provisions of the Constitution as those provisions were intended to be applied by their authors. This theory might significantly limit the power of courts if, as most of its proponents believe, the Framers of the Constitution did not intend to place substantial limits on government's powers. The theory is vulnerable on a number of grounds. For some provisions, the evidence is at least mixed, sometimes suggesting that the Framers did indeed intend to limit government power a great deal. Originalist theories, because they seem to be primarily concerned about imposing limits on judicial discretion, have difficulty dealing with the kinds of ambiguities about intentions that historical inquiry almost invariably generates. The framers of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, for example, were a coalition of Radical Republicans, who desired substantial changes in the overall operation of government with respect to individual rights, and more conservative Republicans, who wanted to preserve a substantial amount of state autonomy in that area. Whose intentions are to control in interpreting the amendment? In addition, technological change presents society with innovations that could not have been within the contemplation of the Framers, and social change sometimes means not only that contemporary values are different from those of the Framers of the Constitution but also that the meaning of practices with which they were familiar has changed so much that it is unclear why contemporary society ought to respond to those practices as the authors intended. WIRETAPPING, a practice that clearly has something to do with the values protected by the FOURTH AMENDMENT but which is significantly different from the practices the Framers actually contemplated, is an example of the first problem. The second problem is illustrated by the changed role of public schools between 1868, when the Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment foresaw little impact on SEGREGATION of public schools, and 1954, when the Supreme Court held that segregated public education is unconstitutional.

2. Natural law theories rely on substantive moral principles determined by philosophical reflection on the proper scope of government in relation to individual liberty, to specify the choices that are within the range of legislative discretion and those that violate individual rights. Contemporary versions of these theories are offered by conservative libertarians, who stress the importance of private property as a domain of liberty, and by liberal supporters of the WELFARE STATE, who stress the importance of nondiscrimination and the provision of the basic necessities of life for people to be able to lead morally acceptable lives. Natural law theories often face general skepticism about the existence of the kinds of rights on which they rely, and a more specific skepticism about the ability of judges as compared to legislators to identify whatever rights there might in fact be.

3. Precedent-oriented constitutional theories rely on past decisions by the courts to guide contemporary decisions. PRECEDENTS are taken to identify with sufficient clarity the kinds of choices that are to be left to legislatures. Using the ordinary techniques of legal reasoning, the courts can use precedents to determine constitutional questions that they have not faced before. Proponents of these theories argue that the techniques of legal reasoning are sufficiently constraining that courts will not be able to do whatever their policy inclinations would suggest, but are also sufficiently loose that courts will be able to respond appropriately to innovations and social change. Precedent-oriented theories face a number of problems. Many critics find it difficult to give normative value to the decisions of prior courts simply because those decisions happen to have been made; for them, just because the courts at one time "got off the track" is no reason to continue on an erroneous course. Other critics are skeptical about these theories' claims regarding the degree to which precedent actually constrains judges. Influenced by the American legal realists, they argue that the accepted techniques of legal reasoning are so flexible that judges can choose policies they prefer and disguise those choices as dictated by, or at least consistent with, prior decisions.

4. Process-oriented theories attempt to minimize the countermajoritarian difficulty by pressing judicial review into the service of majority rule. They do so by identifying obstacles that make the government less than truly majoritarian. For theories of this sort, the democratic process is bound to malfunction when some people are excluded from the franchise, so that majoritarian legislatures can freely disregard their views. Similar problems arise when rights of expression are limited, so that supporters of certain positions are punished for advocating their adoption; majoritarian legislatures would not learn what these people actually prefer, and the outcome of the political process would therefore be distorted. Process-oriented theories have also dealt with questions of discrimination, which they typically treat as arising from situations in which, though there is no formal disfranchisement, prejudice leads legislators systematically to undervalue the true wishes of their constituencies taken as a whole, that is, including the victims of prejudice.

Critics of process-oriented theories point to limitations that the Constitution places on government that, though perhaps explicable in terms of preserving a majoritarian process, somehow seem devalued when treated solely in process terms; the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT ban on SLAVERY is a notable example, as is the body of constitutional privacy law that the Supreme Court has developed. Other critics suggest that process-oriented theories, while purporting to serve majoritarian goals, actually subvert them, because the theories are loose enough to allow judges to identify so many obstacles in the processes of majority rule that they can use process-oriented theories to serve their own political goals. A libertarian process theory, for example, might rely on the economic theory of public choice to argue that the courts should be much more active in invalidating social and economic legislation because the beneficiaries of such laws tend to be concentrated INTEREST GROUPS that can readily organize and lobby for their interests, while the costs of the laws are borne by consumers and taxpayers who, because no individual has much at stake, are systematically underorganized in the political process. A social welfare process theory, in contrast, would argue that poor people are at a systematic disadvantage in the political process because they have insufficient income, compared to wealthier people, to devote to political activity; such a theory would suggest that the courts should invalidate restrictions on the provision of public assistance, and should uphold—and perhaps even require—limitations on contributions to political campaigns.

5. The final group of theories of judicial review focuses less on the limits that courts should face in deciding individual cases and more on the practical political limits the courts actually do face in exercising the power of judicial review. These theories stress that the courts are part of the general political process and can be constrained by the actions of the other branches. Some of these theories emphasize the formal limitations on judicial power built into the Constitution, such as Congress's ability to restrict the jurisdiction of the courts, its power to impeach judges, and the public's power to amend the Constitution. These formal limitations have rarely been invoked successfully where Congress or the public has simply disagreed with the results the judges have reached. Another mechanism built into the Constitution, the power to replace judges who resign or die in office with judges sympathetic to the political program of current political majorities, has been more effective in the long run. Replacement of judges in the ordinary way has often shifted the general tenor of the courts, though no one can guarantee that this mechanism will succeed in overturning any particular decision, such as the Supreme Court's ABORTION decision in 1973.

Other versions of this type of theory note that the courts have only infrequently succeeded in imposing their agenda on the public without having some substantial support in the political branches. In short, these theorists argue that the courts cannot get away with very much; the countermajoritarian difficulty, though real, has been exaggerated. Further, in this view, the courts have a limited amount of "political capital": they can invest their capital in decisions designed to enhance their reputation, either by invalidating unpopular laws that somehow have survived in the political process or by upholding popular laws, and thereby generate returns that they can use to preserve their public support when they invalidate genuinely popular statutes. These types of constitutional theory seem to pay attention to the realities of the operation of politics, but they are often too informal in their understanding of politics to be fully persuasive, and in any event, they fail to capture the important normative dimensions of most discussions of constitutional law.

MARK TUSHNET
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Conservatism; Constitutional Interpretation; Critical Legal Studies; Deconstructionism; Interpretivism; Jurisprudence and Constitutional Law; Law and Economics Theory; Legal Fictions; Liberal Constitutional Construction; Liberalism; Noninterpretivism; Political Philosophy of the Constitution.)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill.

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

TUSHNET, MARK 1988 Red, White, and Blue: A Critical Analysis of Constitutional Law. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY
(Update)

Richard Posner, a leading academic-judge of the era, chose "Against Constitutional Theory" as the title of his 1997 James Madison Lecture on Constitutional Law at the New York University School of Law. Defining "constitutional theory" as "the effort to develop a generally accepted theory to guide the interpretation of the Constitution," he contrasts it with "inquiries of a social scientific character into the nature, provenance, and consequences of constitutionalism" and "commentary on specific cases and doctrines." He notes that "[c]onstitutional theorists are normativists; their theories are meant to influence the way judges decide difficult constitutional cases." What, then, is Posner's objection to constitutional theory? It is "that constitutional theory has no power to command agreement from people not already predisposed to accept the theorist's policy prescriptions." Although "constitutional theory" may often be "rhetorically powerful," it nonetheless "lacks the agreement-coercing power of the best natural and social science." At bottom, it is just not very helpful to the person grappling to make decisions as a judge or other official sworn to uphold the Constitution.

An immediate question is how "constitutional theory" as defined by Posner differs from "CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION", which is surely relevant to, and indeed constitutes, constitutional performance. In the initial Encyclopedia of the American Constitution, Paul Brest, writing on "constitutional interpretation," sketched a taxonomy of the legal arguments that have guided judges in giving content to the Constitution. Similarly, Philip Bobbitt in two books, Constitutional Fate and Constitutional Interpretation, has extensively elaborated what he terms the "modalities" of constitutional argument—text, history, structure, doctrine, prudence, and appeals to our constitutional "ethos." These modalities constitute the parts of speech, as it were, of the particular grammar of "constitutional law-talk," a proposition that Posner could scarcely deny.

One difference between the basically taxonomic approaches of Brest and Bobbitt and "theory," as described by Posner, may be the overtly normative thrust of the latter. To be sure, both Brest and Bobbitt are normativists to the extent that they would presumably declare "out of bounds," and thus illegitimate, modes of argument that defy standard notions of legal grammar, such as emphasizing the norms of revealed religion or, indeed, offering as a reason for a particular decision the probability that it would enhance the judge's prospects for relection, in many states, or promotion within the federal judiciary. Such moves would be as inappropriate as saying "I are going" or "Threw the ball Jack to I." Just as the latter would reveal the speaker as inept in English grammar, offering the ostensible "arguments" described above would illustrate the same degree of failure to grasp the structure of legal grammar. That being said, an important part of the Brest-Bobbitt project, and of other writers influenced by them, is to suggest that there does not exist a single royal road to "correct" constitutional interpretation, anymore than there is only one way correctly to convey a given idea. To that extent, the "modalities" are not agreement-forcing.

Instead, constitutional adjudicators may well find themselves tugged in different directions by the various modalities, with text leading in one direction, attention to history leading in another, and decided case law in yet a third. This means, among other things, that such modal analysts are unlikely to fall victim to Posner's jibe that constitutional theorists "cannot resist telling their readers which cases they think were decided consistently with or contrary to their theory," since they do not assign to one given approach a dominance that will necessarily resolve conflicts. It may be possible, of course, to condemn some particular ineptness in applying one of the modalities, such as purportedly history-based decisions that simply ignore relevant historial materials (see, e.g., DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857)) or a doctrinally oriented opinion that offers unusually tendentious readings of the cases relied on (see, e.g., EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990)). This, however, is very different from saying, as does Robert Bork, that ORIGINAL INTENT provides the only legitimate basis for constitutional judgment; or, as does John Hart Ely, in his enormously influential Democracy and Distrust (1980), that courts, though usually required to defer to decisions made by politically accountable branches of government, can nonetheless interpret the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT as authorizing them to engage in "representation-reinforcement" of otherwise vulnerable minorities who are victimized by prejudice but not, say, to protect the right of women (who constitute a majority of the population) to reproductive autonomy.

Law professors adopting a taxonomic approach are primarily concerned that their students are introduced to the array of argumentative possibilities and can use all of them effectively, as any given case might require. A professorial "theorist" as described by Posner would, on the other hand, be far more likely to spend time praising some decisions and condemning others by reference to their fit with the professor's favorite approach.

One must acknowledge that legal academics have always been in the habit of grading judicial handiwork. Most of the pre-judicial writings of FELIX FRANKFURTER, whether in the law reviews or in The New Republic, attempted to separate acceptable judicial wheat from the all too common chaff emanating from the "Old Court." No one referred to this as "constitutional theory," however. "Constitutional theory," as a self-conscious development within the legal academy, is almost certainly the consequence of the reinvigoration, following the apparent triumph in 1937 of Frankfurter and his devotees and the judicial retreats linked with that episode, of a significantly "activist" judiciary linked with BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) and then many other cases identified with the WARREN COURT. Brown is central, though, because there Frankfurter joined Warren's opinion, and he and his devotees had to explain its propriety.

It is no coincidence, then, that the first major book clearly identified as a work in "constitutional theory," in Posner's sense, is ALEXANDER M. BICKEL The Least Dangerous Branch (1962). Bickel, a graduate of the Harvard Law School who clerked for Frankfurter (and who, as clerk, wrote a famous memorandum to Frankfurter, subsequently published in the Harvard Law Review, justifying the invalidation of school segregation), identified what he termed the "countermajoritarian difficulty"; that is, the purported anomaly of the politically nonaccountable Court invalidating legislation passed by majoritarian political institutions, and attempted to set out the (relatively uncommon) circumstances under which the Court would indeed be entitled to intervene. Many things might be said about Bickel's argument, including the fact that he did not talk about any of the other notable "countermajoritarian difficulties" in our political system, ranging from BICAMERALISM; the staggeringly antimajoritarian basis of political REPRESENTATION in the U.S. SENATE (reflected, to at least some extent, in the ELECTORAL COLLEGE); the presidential VETO POWER; and such accepted practices (far more pervasive, indeed, in our own time than even in the 1950s) as the use of the FILIBUSTER in the Senate to prevent a legislative majority from working its will. In any event, Bickel was willing to defend Brown (though not, later in the decade, such decisions as BAKER V. CARR (1962), where Frankfurter had dissented), and the combatants in the great theory wars— devoted to defending or attacking one or another normative view of the judiciary's role as presumptive "ultimate interpreter" of the Constitution (itself a highly tendentious term of the Court's creation)—were off and running.

Although important sallies continue to be delivered in these wars, the most important contemporary work in what might well be described as neotheory of the Constitution involves moving away from normative, methodologically driven inquiries of the type described above to broader, more historically grounded inquiries into the actual operation of the American constitutional order. Exemplary in this regard is Stephen M. Griffin's American Constitutionalism: From Theory to Practice (1996). Like Posner, Griffin rejects the obsessive emphasis on judicial review and concomitant attempts to construct a single master method that would at once resolve the "countermajoritarian difficulty." Instead he asks to what extent is it truly plausible to view the Constitution, especially as interpreted by courts, as playing a significant role in channeling the great socioeconomic changes over the 200 years since its adoption. Griffin answers: Not much. As a descriptive practice, constitutional interpretation has changed to accommodate felt necessities of the times, as, indeed, OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., suggested so memorably in The Common Law (1881). To the extent that the Constitution can be assigned a significant role, the reason lies in basic structural features of the American order, including bicameralism, equal state membership in the Senate, or the dates established for inauguration of Presidents or the convening of Congress, provisions that have almost never been the subject of litigation, and so have lacked interest to legal academics for whom the agenda is set by the litigation practices of the Court. This interest in the implications of basic constitutional design has generated another important branch of contemporary constitutional neotheory, much influenced by so-called social choice or "positive political theory" within political science. These theorists assume that politics is carried on by rational individuals, where "rationality" is defined as the maximization of individual goals and sensitivity to the incentives generated by given institutional designs.

Perhaps the most crucial clause of the Constitution for Griffin and other practitioners of "neotheory" is Article V, which sets out an exceedingly difficult process of formal constitutional change. (Indeed, in Levinson (1995), political scientist Donald Lutz compared the U.S. Constitution to the constitutions of every state and of more than thirty other countries and determined that the U.S. Constitution has the highest "index of difficulty" in regard to formal amendment.) The consequence is that many of the most significant changes over the past 200 years have taken place outside of Article V. That is, there may be far more constitutional "amendments"—in the sense of changes in constitutional practice that cannot plausibly be derived from the original text or the formal amendments added to it—than the twenty-six (or twenty-seven, depending on one's acceptance of the purported TWENTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT, proposed in 1789 and declared ratified only in 1992) set out as textual additions to the original 1787 Constitution. More to the point, to limit one's definition of "amendment" only to these textual additions is to adopt a basically atheoretical approach to the problem, explaining away, by stipulative definition, what is in fact the great mystery of American constitutionalism, which is how, adopting Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's language in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), the system has actually "adapted to the various crises of human affairs." These other "amendments" are unwritten, at least in the text of the Constitution itself (as against presidential statements, statutes, judicial opinions, and the like), but no analyst of American constitutionalism could possibly make sense of what has happened since 1789 without taking them into account.

Both Yale's Bruce Ackerman and Harvard's Laurence Tribe, among the most eminent of contemporary writers on the Constitution, agree, for example, that the TREATY clause of the 1787 Constitution is best read as covering such acts as the NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT (NAFTA) or the General Agreement on Trades and Tariffs (GATT). Yet these extraordinarily important developments in international trade were "ratified" not by two- thirds of the Senate, as required by the clause, but, rather, by a majority of each house of Congress. For Tribe, this is enough to render unconstitutional both NAFTA and GATT. Ackerman, however, though agreeing with Tribe as to the meaning of the 1787 Constitution, and agreeing as well that no formal Article V amendment has changed the treaty clause, argues that a non-Article V amendment was affected by the response of the United States to the exigencies of WORLD WAR II and the de-facto ratification of these new procedures by the American electorate. Indeed, Ackerman makes similar, even more important, arguments in regard to the so-called RECONSTRUCTION amendments following the CIVIL WAR and then the NEW DEAL. He denies, for example, that the Fourteenth Amendment can be legitimately viewed as a simple Article V change of the Constitution. And, agreeing with conservatives that the New Deal violated the original Constitution and that, of course, no formal amendment changed Congress's powers to shape the national economy, Ackerman nonetheless argues that the New Deal represented what he calls a "constitutional moment" that legitimately transformed the operative Constitution. Tribe denounces such ideas a "free-form" theory unbefitting a disciplined legal analyst.

However unconventional Ackerman's approach may be, it responds to the fundamental reality identified by Griffin and others, the brute fact that the meanings ascribed to the Constitution have radically changed over time though there have been so few formal amendments. Those who resist "free-form" theory often either end up simply ignoring the most significant single episode in post-1787 CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, the process by which the Fourteenth Amendment became part of the Constitution, or, as with the New Deal, are forced to argue that the Old Court unaccountably failed to understand the Constitution and that the New Deal court simply "restored" the Constitution to its original meaning (or, at least, the meaning given it by Marshall in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824)). Or, as with GATT and NAFTA, Tribe, the author of the most significant treatise in constitutional law in the twentieth century, is forced to take a position that, in context, not only is reminscent of a disgruntled JOHN W. DAVIS railing against the New Deal, but also is one that would almost certainly be rejected by any Court to which it was presented, not least because of the political earthquake that would follow a declaration that, indeed, one-third plus one of a grotesquely malapportioned Senate is constitutionally entitled to reject such fundamental aspects of the modern globalized economy. This does not, of course, mean that Tribe is "wrong"; his arguments are well within the rules of acceptable legal grammar, just as were the arguments against the New Deal or, for that matter, the propriety of Brown. Nonetheless, there is an unbridgeable chasm between Tribean constitutional theory, at least in this instance, and the actual practices of American political institutions, including courts that offer often strained "interpretations" designed in effect to ratify the de-facto amendatory changes.

One should note that Ackerman's account of historical change, though significantly descriptive, also has a significant normative dimension. He wants to offer an account by which we can recognize "authorized" non-Article V amendments—that is, the results of "constitutional moments" and the particular kind of mobilized polity linked to such moments—and, concomitantly, reject other changes as illegitimate because they do not represent an authoritative, albeit unconventional, declaration by the sovereign "We the People." Whether "constitutional theory," even in its "neo" variety, can escape normativism is an important question. (Whether it should, even assuming it can, is, of course, another question.)

Another important aspect of Ackerman's work, reflected as well in Griffin's call for a new approach to constitutional analysis and a different conception of constitutional theory, is the emphasis on the crucial role of nonjudicial actors within the political system. The innovative actions of Presidents and legislatures, and of state governments, create new political realities to which courts must respond (even if the response, as in important areas of FOREIGN AFFAIRS, is to declare that these are POLITICAL QUESTIONS left to the discretion of political decisionmakers). Moreover, at least one strand of argument among contemporary constitutional theorists concerns the claims made by the Court for its own supremacy as a constitutional interpreter. Constitutional "protestants," who emphasize the legitimacy of multiple interpreters of the Constitution, contend with "catholics" who view the Court as indeed its "ultimate interpreter." Yet other theorists have begun emphasizing (and sometimes questioning) the difference between the interpretive freedom accorded the Supreme Court and the extraordinarily diminished freedom allowed the judges who serve in what the Constitution terms "inferior" courts, who are often expected to be almost literally unthinking satraps of their institutional superiors. If Supreme Court Justices swear loyalty to the Constitution, it appears that they expect their hierarchical inferiors to swear loyalty to themselves. Indeed, Posner, the Chief Judge of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, wrote a famous article in The New Republic entitled "What am I, a Potted Plant?," taking issue with this notion.

The post-Brown fixation with "constitutional theory as the search for a definitive method of constitutional interpretation by judges on the Supreme Court" allowed its practitioners to avoid coming to terms with the actualities of the American polity, beginning with the fact that judges on the Court are only one, and not at all the most important, set of actors with responsibilities to think seriously about their constitutional duties. Even more to the point, knowledge of these actualities requires immersion in such disciplines as history, both American and comparative, and a number of the social sciences. Whether American legal academics are willing so to immerse themselves remains an open question.

SANFORD LEVINSON
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Amendment Process (Outside of Article V); Constitutional Dualism; Nonjudicial Interpretation of the Constitution; Originalism.)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE 1991 We the People: Foundations. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1998 We the People: Transformations. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

ACKERMAN, BRUCE and GOLOVE, DAVID 1995 Is NAFTA Constitutional? Harvard Law Review 108:799–929.

BOBBITT, PHILIP 1982 Constitutional Fate. New York: Oxford University Press.

——— 1991 Constitutional Interpretation. Cambridge, Mass.: Basil Blackwell.

ESKRIDGE, WILLIAM and LEVINSON, SANFORD 1998 Constitutional Stupidities, Constitutional Tragedies. New York: New York University Press.

FRIEDMAN, BARRY 1998 The History of the Countermajoritarian Difficulty, Part One: The Road to Judicial Supremacy. New York University Law Review 73:333–433.

GRIFFIN, STEPHEN M. 1996 American Constitutionalism: From Theory to Practice. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

LEVINSON, SANFORD, ed. 1995 Responding to Imperfection: The Theory and Practice of Constitutional Amendment. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

POSNER, RICHARD 1998 Against Constitutional Theory. New York University Law Review 73:1–22.

SYMPOSIUM 1997 Fidelity in Constitutional Theory. Fordham Law Review 65:1247–1818.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1995 Taking Text and Structure Seriously: Reflections on Free-Form Method in Constitutional Interpretation. Harvard Law Review 108:1221–1303.

CONSTITUTION AND CIVIC IDEALS

The renowned constitutional scholar ALEXANDER M. BICKEL believed that "the concept of citizenship plays only the most minimal role in the American constitutional scheme." The Constitution "bestowed rights on people and persons, not . . . some legal construct called citizen"—a state of affairs Bickel thought "idyllic."

Indeed, the unamended Constitution mentioned citizenship remarkably infrequently. Three times it made citizenship "of the United States" required for the elective federal offices (Article I, sections 1–2; Article II, section 1). It mentioned citizenship of a "State" four times in describing the JURISDICTION of the federal courts (Article III, section 2), and once in protecting citizens' PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES by a principle of interstate equality (Article IV, section 2). Article I, section 8, also gave Congress the power to establish "an uniform Rule of naturalization." That was all. The Constitution did not define United States or state citizenship, explain their relationship, or specify their "Privileges and Immunities." Strikingly, it did not demand citizenship of voters, Supreme Court Justices, or even traitors (Article III, section 3).

Yet, despite its silences on citizenship, the Constitution embodied not one but several civic ideals, all of which presented a conception of the nature and meaning of membership in the Union that its Framers aimed to perfect. With deference to Bickel, the Constitution's reticence about these ideals traces only partly to an exaltation of universal personal rights over all particular political identities. In important ways the different civic ideals visible in the Constitution were in sharp tension with each other. The Constitution's silences also reflected the Framers' decisions not to confront, much less resolve, those difficulties. Subsequently, these initially postponed conflicts over rival civic ideals have shaped the nation's evolution profoundly. Over time, Americans have modified their original civic conceptions, and in the twentieth century many have supported a new ideal of American civic identity.

In framing the Constitution, American leaders drew on the classical republican tradition espoused by James Harrington and analyzed by Baron de MONTESQUIEU and from colonial and revolutionary struggles men like LUTHER MARTIN derived their beliefs that legitimate governments must be popularly controlled and that popular governance must be conducted preeminently in small republics. Hence, they favored FEDERALISM, opposed lodging any extensive power in the national government, and continued to believe in the primacy of state citizenship over national citizenship. From the Enlightenment LIBERALISM of JOHN LOCKE and, in most American readings, WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, others such as JAMES WILSON and JAMES MADISON derived their esteem for sacred personal rights, including rights of property and conscience (expressed in the CONTRACT CLAUSE limits on the states and the Article IV ban on RELIGIOUS TESTS for national office). Such men tended to favor national power and the primacy of Americans' more extended membership in their nation.

But beyond their liberalism and REPUBLICANISM, American leaders from GOUVERNEUR MORRIS to CHARLES PINCKNEY also expected that to be a full member of the American community, one would share in a special ethnocultural heritage clustered around Protestant Christianity, the white race, European or (preferably) American birth, and male predominance in most spheres. This version of "Americanism" led them to require all Presidents after the revolutionary generation to be "natural born" citizens (Article II, section 1); to countenance black chattel SLAVERY implicitly but recurrently (e.g., Article I, sections 2 and 9; Article IV, section 2; Article V); to distinguish tribal Indians from both Americans and foreigners twice (Article I, sections 2 and 8); and to accept tacitly the subordinate status of women. Such an Americanism was often bound up with Protestant visions of the new Union as a "redeemer nation," providentially selected to serve divine purposes. Christianity also pervaded the other early American civic conceptions, intertwining with republican espousals of public virtue as well as liberal precepts of human dignity that transcended temporal politics and nationalities.

None of these civic conceptions could gain exclusive sway in the Constitution; none could be wholly ignored. In some respects, the Framers invented a novel kind of national liberal republic that was a significant contribution to the development of modern regimes. But some fundamental conflicts were compromised or evaded precisely by leaving citizenship and the touchy relation between state and national political membership undefined: by avoiding, explicitly accepting, or opposing the illiberal institution of black chattel slavery; by not specifying civic privileges and immunities; and by refusing to establish a national religion while permitting state establishments to continue. Even the relationship of state authority to Congress's new power to naturalize citizens was left for later resolution.

Almost immediately, state-oriented republican anxieties about the Constitution's expansions of national power compelled Congress to propose the BILL OF RIGHTS, explicitly reserving powers to the states and protecting local institutions like MILITIA and juries, although several amendments, the FIRST AMENDMENT especially, also specified liberal protections of basic personal freedoms. Clashes between Jeffersonianism and Jacksonian STATES' RIGHTS republicanism and the FEDERALISTS' and Whigs' nationalist economic liberalism continued through the antebellum years, accompanied by growing conflicts pitting liberal and Christian advocates of expanded rights for blacks and other ethnic and religious minorities against Americanist defenses of Protestant white male supremacy. Finally, of course, issues of the primacy of state versus national citizenship and the status of blacks fueled the Union's great crisis in the 1860s. The CIVIL WAR amendments appeared to decide those disputes in favor of liberal nationalistic civic conceptions, but in the late nineteenth century both traditional republican views of federalism and Americanist views of racial and gender hierarchies were in many respects successfully reasserted.

Most Progressive Era reformers remained narrow Protestant Americanists, but Progressive intellectuals on the left, including John Dewey, Randolph Bourne, and Horace Kallen, began formulating a broader conception of American civic identity. They drew on republicanism's calls for democratic participation, liberalism's emphasis on equal human dignity, and Americanism's stress on the importance of constitutive social identities. But, relying on pragmatist philosophic foundations, these thinkers reformulated those conceptions into one that may be termed "democratic cultural pluralism." It represented American nationality as a democratically organized confederation of disparate ethnic, religious, and cultural groups, all entitled to equal respect in public institutions and policies; these groups would serve as the primary loci of most persons' social identities. Democratic pluralists saw national membership essentially as a means to advance the welfare of all such groups on a fair, neutral basis. The democratic cultural pluralist conception of American civic identity increasingly came to prevail in judicial constitutional doctrines and in American citizenship statutes after the NEW DEAL and especially during the Great Society years. The federal government repudiated racial SEGREGATION, ended ethnically exclusionary IMMIGRATION and naturalization policies, reduced legal discriminations against women, and promoted broader opportunities via bilingual and AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs. In the 1970s and 1980s, criticisms of these measures mounted, with many contending that they promoted fragmentation and group selfishness instead of national unity. Thus, the great questions about American civic ideals that the Constitution did not answer still remain far from settled.

ROGERS M. SMITH
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Gender Rights; Jacksonianism; Jeffersonianism; Political Philosophy of the Constitution; Pragmatism; Progressive Constitutional Thought; Progressivism; Sex Discrimination; Whig Party.)

Bibliography

KARST, KENNETH L. 1989 Belonging to America: Equal Citizenship and the Constitution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

KETTNER, JAMES H. 1978 The Development of American Citizenship, 1608–1870. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

CONSTITUTION AS ASPIRATION

What is the point of constitutional law? What fundamental purpose does it serve? And in what sense is the Constitution law? There are at least two possible types of response to these foundational questions; one quite familiar and one less so. The cluster of familiar responses might be called the "Constitution of constraints." On this view, the purpose of the Constitution is to constrain congressional and executive lawmaking at both the state and federal level. The Constitution imposes constraints, or boundaries, on what lawmakers might otherwise be inclined to do. The Constitution is a source of law, because the point of the enterprise, thus understood, is to impose limits, enforced judicially, on what popularly elected representatives or executives might enact, on behalf of the majority they purportedly represent. And limits, interpreted and enforced judicially, is precisely what we mean by "law."

It is this view of the Constitution that has inspired the outpouring of scholarship and judicial opinions concerned with the countermajoritarian difficulty, and it is this view of the Constitution that has defined the boundaries of most contemporary constitutional argument, at least as it pertains to the BILL OF RIGHTS. For while most constitutional theorists agree that the point of constitutional law is to impose legal constraints on lawmakers from what they might otherwise be inclined to do, they disagree fundamentally over the content of those constraints, and over what the legislative or executive evil is toward which the Constitution is aimed. Thus, liberal constitutionalists view the Constitution's core purpose as the protection of individual rights and liberties against LEGISLATION that serves the interests of majorities but runs roughshod over core individualistic values. Conservative constitutionalists view the Constitution's core purpose as the protection of institutions and traditions that might be endangered by a popular legislature's reckless leveling or egalitarian instincts, and proceduralists or process theorists view the Constitution's core purpose as the protection of the openness and fairness of the political process itself. Although these differences are profound, their common grounding is equally significant: they all concur in their understanding of the Constitution as a "Constitution of constraints," and more particularly of legal constraints to be enforced by the judiciary on behalf of interests, traditions, values, or rights that might otherwise be trammeled by an unconstrained majoritarian process.

As familiar and widely shared as this understanding might be, one can discern in our CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY and even in our current debates an alternative conception of what the point of constitutionalism might be, and what sense we might make of its self-declared status as "law." On this alternative view, the point of the Constitution is to declare a set of moral and political aspirations for democratic self-governance, rather than a set of judicially enforced legal constraints upon it. These constitutional aspirations, one might argue, are intended to open up and then to guide, rather than constrain, political debate and legislative decisionmaking. They constitute a set of ideals for a DELIBERATIVE DEMOCRACY which the legislative and executive branches ought to aim for. They constitute law, but not in the adjudicative and judge- focused sense meant by the LEGAL REALISTS; rather, they constitute law in the sense often embraced by eighteenth-century natural lawyers: aspirations or ideals meant to guide the hand of the lawmaker. These ideals, or constitutional aspirations, are then realized not only or even primarily through judicial decisions that invalidate legislation, but rather through legislative or executive decisions that further them.

What those aspirations might be, of course, is open to question and a matter of controversy. But because constitutional aspirations, unlike constitutional constraints, are reflected in legislative or executive enactment rather than exclusively in judicial decisions, their content need not reflect the limiting practical and jurisprudential conventions of adjudicative enterprises. The meaning we ascribe to constitutional aspirations, or the content we find in them, or the interpretations on whose behalf we argue, need not, for example, be subject to the limiting practical need to be reasonably subjected to judicial enforceability. Nor need the content ascribed to constitutional aspirations be subject to the jurisprudential or moral imperatives that constrain courts in all adjudicative lawmaking: that the decisions which give them meaning reflect the peculiarly judicial legal goals of horizontal equity, legal justice, and respect for past practice and PRECEDENT. Rather, our constitutional aspirations, and thus the interpretations we suggest for those constitutional phrases that might express them, should serve the quite different practical and moral conventions of legislative enterprises: Constitutional aspirations, understood as ideals governing lawmakers in a deliberative democracy, should, for example, encourage open and informed political democracy among all sectors of society, guide the legislature toward an appreciation and concern for the common good, direct it against favoritism, factionalism, or self-interest, forbid the creation or tolerance of castes, and point law toward the well-being of all.

If we attend to the aspirational content of our Constitution, different potential meanings of some of its key phrases emerge. For example, the FIRST AMENDMENT might be understood, aspirationally, as aimed at the invigoration of political debate and the protection of dissent, rather than as a constraint on all forms of legislation that in any way inhibits private expression. If so, then legislation that inhibits some private expression toward the end of opening up political debate—such as regulations limiting the amount of money spent in political campaigns—might be understood as fulfilling a constitutional aspiration rather than violating a constitutional constraint. The guarantee that no state shall deny an individual's liberty without DUE PROCESS OF LAW, found in the Fifth Amendment and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, might also be understood as expressive of a constitutional aspiration: that each individual enjoy some measure of positive liberty—some measure of true self- governance—which no state may challenge and which Congress must aggressively protect, rather than a constraint on progressive legislation that interferes with private rights of contract or PROPERTY. In this perspective, a federal guarantee of minimal welfare or income sustenance might be understood as essential to this constitutional aspiration. The repeal of such a minimum might be viewed as violative of the aspiration.

To take a more extended example, the Fourteenth Amendment declares that no citizen shall be denied "EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAW," but it is silent on what that protection means. Over the last fifty years, the Supreme Court has produced a working and workable account: the equal protection clause, the Court now reasons, requires Congress to legislate in a way that is rational: legislative classifications must rationally track differences in the world that are relevant to some legitimate legislative end. Racial classifications, according to this standard understanding, are presumptively irrational: they do not reflect any legitimate and meaningful difference between citizens. Legislation that categorizes on the basis of race, therefore, violates the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. More generally, any legislation, or any STATE ACTION, which fails this test of rationality is vulnerable to judicial invalidation. Thus, the constitutional guarantee of equal protection imposes a constraint of rationality on legislating majorities, who may otherwise legislate in whatever way and toward whatever end they see fit. Race, and to a lesser extent gender, are presumptively irrational bases for legislative categorization.

This interpretation of both the scope and the meaning of the equal protection clause follows directly—indeed inexorably—from the more basic understanding of the Constitution as one of constraints. First, scope: The equal protection clause, on this view, imposes a constraint of rationality on Congress, on state legislatures, and more broadly on state action. Where the legislating branch fails the test, the legislation is invalidated. Second, on content: The ideal of rationality imposed on Congress and on state legislatures by the Fourteenth Amendment echoes the ideal of horizontal equity or legal justice required of courts in all areas of lawmaking that "likes must be treated alike." The "equal protection" that emerges from the Fourteenth Amendment, when viewed as a part of the constitution as constraint, is an echo of the jurisprudential ideal of lawmaking required of courts. Likes must be treated alike, and claims of difference, and hence different treatment, carefully defended.

Viewed in this light, the paradigm moment of constitutional lawmaking under the Fourteenth Amendment is clearly BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954). The state legislature had legislated on the basis of race, thus failing the test of rationality. Racial differences between citizens, in this case school children, are not rationally relevant to any legitimate state interest. The Court properly invalidated the law. The Constitution thus acted as a constraint on errant legislation, and on the irrational legislature that produced it.

If, however, we view the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause as expressive of a constitutional aspiration, quite different potential meanings emerge. Viewed as a moral and political guide to legislation, the clause might be read as urging upon the state and federal legislatures the task of providing equal protection, through proactive legislation, to groups that are, for whatever societal reason, in need of it. The constitutional mandate, then, is not a directive to courts to invalidate legislation based on impermissibly irrational categorical assumptions. Rather, the constitutional mandate is a directive to state legislatures to enact whatever law is necessary to equally protect citizens against whatever subordinating inequalities has rendered them in need of it—including, for example, the ravages of unchecked private violence, racism, or, arguably, societal neglect—and a grant of power to the federal Congress to take corrective action should the state legislatures fail. The role of the Court in this aspirational enterprise of equality is minimal, while the role of the state and federal legislatures is primary. The Fourteenth Amendment expresses an aspiration, and directs states and Congress to attempt to achieve it.

Both the scope and content of the equal protection clause, on this interpretation, are consistent with the fundamental commitments of the aspirational Constitution. First, on scope: The aim of the clause is to ensure that states and Congress respond to inequalities brought on by social privation or violence coupled with legislative or state neglect. The trigger for constitutionally inspired congressional action, in other words, is not a state's irrational legislation, but rather, private or societal inequality coupled with state inaction. Second, on content: The equal protection clause, on this view, requires of the states and Congress that they act so as to ensure that all people enjoy the equal protection of law. This echoes and instantiates quite general legislative aspirations: to legislate in a way that protects and furthers and enhances the general well-being of all, rather than in a way that furthers the particular interests of some.

Beyond the meaning of particular clauses, however, if we attend to our constitutional aspirations, rather than only heed constitutional constraints, a quite different history of that field of law and politics comes into focus. The history of the equal protection clause understood as a part of our "constitution of constraints" is a history of judicial decisions, reacting to and sometimes invalidating irrational legislative enactments. By contrast, the history of our constitutional aspiration to equal protection is a history of political struggles over the content of equality, periods of public quietude and unrest and eventual legislative enactments, sometimes followed and sometimes not by judicial response. It is a history of our politics, which are sometimes responsive to and sometimes inattentive to and even overtly hostile to constitutional guidance. The paradigm, ideal, climactic moments of this history are not Brown, or ROE V. WADE (1973), or ROMER V. EVANS (1996). Rather, the paradigm moments are the passage of the RECONSTRUCTION amendments themselves; the passage of the nineteenth- and twentieth- century CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS; the turn-of-the-century struggles over the constitutionality of progressive taxation and the LABOR MOVEMENT; the campaigns for WOMAN SUFFRAGE; and, in more recent times, the passage of the AMERICANS WITH DIS-ABILITIES ACT; the VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN ACT; and, possibly, the passage, sometime in the next few decades, of a federal law forbidding private-sector discrimination on the basis of SEXUAL ORIENTATION. At each of these moments, Congress acted constitutionally, but in at least two senses, not just one. At each such moment, it acted in compliance with a constraint of rationality. More consequentially for our politics, at each such moment it acted in accordance with a constitutional aspiration: an aspiration to protect all citizens, and equally, against the damage done by societal privation and state neglect, to correct this damage with federal law, and thus to assure equal protection of the law. And at each such moment, Congress acted in harmony with a higher or natural legal obligation to legislate on behalf of the general good, the general will, or the general well-being—to legislate, in short, in the interest of all of the governed.

ROBIN WEST
(2000)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE 1991 We the People: Foundations. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1998 We the People: Transformations. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

AMAR, AKHIL 1990 40 Acres and a Mule: A Republican Theory of Minimal Entitlements. Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 13:37–43.

FISS, OWEN 1976 Groups and the Equal Protection Clause. Philosophy and Public Affairs 5:107–177.

HEYMAN, STEVEN 1991 The First Duty of Government: Protection, Liberty, and the Fourteenth Amendment. Duke Law Journal 41:507–571.

MICHELMAN, FRANK 1969 Foreword: On Protecting the Poor Through the Fourteenth Amendment. Harvard Law Review 83:7–59.

SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1993 Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech. New York: Free Press.

——— 1993 The Partial Constitution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1985 Constitutional Choices. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

TEN BROEK, JACOBUS 1965 Equal Under Law. New York: Collier Books.

WEST, ROBIN 1994 Progressive Constitutionalism: Reconstructing the Fourteenth Amendment. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press.

WOOD, GORDON S. 1992 The Radicalism of the American Revolution. New York: Knopf.

CONSTITUTION AS CIVIL RELIGION

That there exist similarities between religious devotion and esteem for the Constitution of the United States is scarcely a new notion. JAMES MADISON wrote in 1792 that our fundamental charter should be the object of "more than common reverence for authority," treated indeed as "political scriptures" protected against "every attempt to add to or diminish them." Conversely, but in the same terms, Madison's great friend and colleague THOMAS JEFFERSON complained in 1816 about the propensity of Americans to "look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence and deem them like the ark of covenant, too sacred to be touched." By 1885 the young scholar WOODROW WILSON could write in his classic Congressional Government of the "almost blind worship" directed at the Constitution's principles.

Perhaps the most important scholarly formulation of the role played by the Constitution within what later scholars would come to call the American civil religion was Max Lerner's 1937 article "Constitution and Court as Symbols." Influenced by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR.'s famous assertion that "we live by symbols" and by the contemporary political-anthropological analysis of THURMAN ARNOLD, Lerner emphasized the "totem[ic]" aspect of the Constitution "as an instrument for controlling unknown forces in a hostile universe." It was no coincidence with Lerner that an American culture so influenced by Protestant Christianity would fix on the Constitution: "The very habits of mind begotten by an authoritarian Bible and a religion of submission to a higher power have been carried over to an authoritarian Constitution and a philosophy of submission to a higher law." The United States, whatever the prohibition of the FIRST AMENDMENT on an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, "ends by getting a state church after all, although in a secular form."

The very title of Lerner's article points to the dual aspect of this purported state church: there is not only an authoritative text but also an equally authoritative institution that can give privileged interpretations of that text. That institution, of course, is the Supreme Court. No less a skeptic than HENRY ADAMS confessed that "he still clung to the Supreme Court, much as a churchman clings to his bishops, because they are his only symbol of unity; his last rage of Right." Even the more scholarly Alpheus Mason suggested that the marble palace of the Supreme Court constituted our "Holy of Holies."

It is, then, easy enough to show that religious language and metaphors come readily to analysts of the Constitution. And it is also easy enough to agree with contemporary scholars like Robert Bellah that all societies, very much including our own, amass a variety of myths, symbols, narratives, and rituals that can be brought together under the rubric of "civil religion." But one may still wonder about such concepts, especially when applied quite specifically to suggest that an understanding of American CONSTITUTIONALISM is enhanced by placing it within the analogical context of religion. What, then, is genuinely learned by reference to Constitution "worship" or comparing the Supreme Court to the Vatican?

For almost all the persons mentioned and many others besides, the lesson has to do with the central role of the Constitution, as declared by the Court, in providing the basis of national unity. A striving for sources of unity is especially important in what Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL aptly described in Gillette v. United States (1971) as "a Nation of enormous heterogeneity in respect of political views, moral codes, and religious persuasions." The Constitution overcomes such heterogeneity by offering the individual membership in what one nineteenth-century analyst termed a "covenanting community." From this perspective, it is the Constitution that provides the political basis of the "unum" that overcomes the "pluribus" of American civil society.

One way of achieving this ostensible unity is by explicitly asking (or demanding) that the citizenry pledge commitment to it. The Constitution itself, in Article VI, even as it prohibits religious tests for public office, formally requires all public officials to take an oath recognizing the supremacy of the Constitution over alternate sources of political authority. Such oaths are scarcely meaningless. Thus, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, when asked if he had "ever had difficulty dealing with [his] own religious beliefs in terms of cases," responded by pointing to the oath he had taken upon appointment to the Court in 1956 as having "settled in my mind that I had an obligation under the Constitution which could not be influenced by any of my religious principles. . . . To the extent that [any duty of a Roman Catholic] conflicts with what I think the Constitution means or requires, then my religious beliefs have to give way."

Not only public officials must take oaths of allegiance to the Constitution: nationalized citizens since 1790 have been required to take an oath of allegiance not simply to the United States but to the Constitution. The United States has been rent by recurrent controversy over the propriety of loyalty oaths as a means both of achieving unity and of identifying those who, by their unwillingness to subscribe to such oaths, are insufficiently integrated into the civil faith.

Although analyzing the Constitution in terms of American civil religion is suggested here, the emphasis on the Constitution as the basis of unity has limits. No doubt there is some validity to this notion, but its adherents often overlook the extent to which shared belief in the abstract idea of the Constitution may often generate significant political conflict, including civil war. Just as the history of traditional religion is replete with actual, often extremely bitter, conflict even among persons purporting to share a common faith, so does the history of constitutional faith present a far more complex picture than the conventional focus on unity would suggest. The notion of the Constitution as the focus of attention in an American civil religion may have more ominous implications than are suggested by an analysis that sees only unity as the outcome of such attention.

Indeed, there are direct analogies between the cleavages observed within traditional religious communities and those seen within the American constitutional community. Two questions common to law and religion seem especially important. First, what constitutes the body of materials that counts as authoritative teachings for the community organized as a faith community? Within traditional religion, this question can take the form of debates about "canonical" texts, for example. But a recurrent struggle, seen vividly, in the history of Western Christianity, concerns the propriety of viewing as authoritative only the materials within a closed body of canonical texts. Counter to such a textual, or scriptural, understanding would be one emphasizing as well the authority of traditions derived from sources other than these canonical texts. From an early time the Catholic church invoked the propriety of its own teachings as a supplement to the teachings of the Bible. That propriety, of course, was specifically challenged by those Protestant reformers who took "Only the Scriptures" as their cry and rejected all nonscriptural teachings as totally without authority.

The second question common to law and religion centers on the need for an institutional structure that can authoritatively resolve disputes. Against the claims of the particular institutional authority of the Vatican, Protestants asserted a "priesthood of all believers" that could come to its own conclusions about the meaning of scripture. The more radical Protestant sects were often accused, not unfairly, of being anarchic in their implications. These are obviously oversimplified "ideal typical" evocations of Catholicism and Protestantism (which have their analogues within Judaism and Islam as well). Nonetheless, how might they help to illuminate the role played by the Constitution within the overall structure of American political culture?

What constitutes the Constitution? Is it composed only of the particular words of the canonical text associated with the outcome of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, as amended thereafter, or does it also include "unwritten" materials that are equally authoritative? Second, does there exist a particular institution whose interpretations of the Constitution (however defined) are treated as authoritative? Both of these questions allow divergent responses, each of them with their Protestant and Catholic analogues.

As to the first dimension, it is almost certainly true that an important strain of American constitutionalism is Protestant inasmuch as it emphasizes, like Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), a "reverence" for written constitutions, with the linked suggestion that the Constitution consists only of what is written down. Perhaps the most important twentieth-century judicial explicator of this strain was Justice HUGO L. BLACK, who began his book A Constitutional Faith (1968) by stating, "It is of paramount importance to me that our country has a written constitution." More recent adherents include former Attorney General Edwin Meese and ROBERT H. BORK, whose defeat for a seat on the Supreme Court can be explained in part by his antagonism to the legitimacy of any notion of an UNWRITTEN CONSTITUTION on which judges could draw equally with the written one.

The competing view, emphasizing a more Catholic, unwritten dimension to the Constitution, goes back at least as far as Marbury. Indeed, Justice SAMUEL CHASE made free reference to "certain vital principles in our free Republican government" that would "overrule an apparent and flagrant abuse of legislative power" even if not explicitly expressed. Many other Justices, including Chief Justice Marshall himself in FLETCHER V. PECK (1810), have expressed similar sentiments.

The most important modern Justice in this tradition is almost certainly JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, who joined in an epic debate with Justice Black in the 1965 decision GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT, in which the Court invalidated a Connecticut birth control law on the grounds that it violated the RIGHT OF PRIVACY. Justice Black dissented. He could "find in the Constitution no language which either specifically or implicitly grants to all individuals a constitutional "right to privacy." Though he "like[d] my privacy as well as the next person," he refused to find it protected against state interference. For Black, evocation of an unwritten aspect of the Constitution threatened a return to the discredited jurisprudence of LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) and its endorsement of a nontextual FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. Harlan, however, joined in striking down the Connecticut law and endorsed the necessity when interpreting DUE PROCESS OF LAW to look at "what history teaches are the traditions from [this country] developed as well as the traditions from which it broke. That tradition is a living thing." A central fault line of debate within the Supreme Court can thus be understood as pitting "Protestants," who emphasize a solely textual Constitution, against "Catholics," who look to unwritten tradition as well.

The second dimension of the Protestant-Catholic distinction—that concerning institutional authority—does not so much explain debate within the Supreme Court as it does the fundamental debate about the primacy of the Court as an expositor of the meaning of the Constitution. The Court has several times in the modern era, most notably in the 1958 Little Rock school case COOPER V. AARON, interpreted Marbury to stand for the proposition that it is the "ultimate interpreter" of the Constitution. Justice Black, however Protestant his theory of the Constitution, was thoroughly Catholic in his embrace of the ultimate authority of the Supreme Court as constitutional interpreter.

Not surprisingly, it has usually been nonjudges who have proclaimed the merits of a more Protestant understanding of judicial authority. A classic account was given by President ANDREW JACKSON in his 1832 message (written by ROGER BROOKE TANEY) vetoing on constitutional grounds the renewal of the charter of the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. He dismissed Marshall's opinion in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), which upheld the constitutionality of the bank, stating that the "authority" of the Supreme Court opinions was restricted only to "such influence as the force of their reasoning may deserve." ABRAHAM LINCOLN, when running against STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS for the Senate in 1858, took a similar stance in regard to the infamous DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD decision of the previous year. More recently, former Attorney General Meese provoked significant controversy when he criticized JUDICIAL SUPREMACY and called for recognizing the primacy of the Constitution as against the decisions of the Supreme Court. Meese was castigated by many who not only defended the role of the Court as "ultimate interpreter" but also pronounced Meese's views as having dangerously anarchic tendencies.

To the extent that one accepts a reading of traditional religion as providing a base for disruption and fragmentation as well as unity, one should be prepared to accept the suggestion that the Constitution-oriented civil religion will have similar aspects and tendencies. In particular, the debates about the sources underlying legitimate decision making and about institutional authority to give privileged interpretations are likely to last at least as long as the schism between the Roman Catholic church and Protestant sects, however much the proponents of any given view would like to bring the debate to an end through surrender by the other side.

Finally, one should note that some critics have condemned the notion of civil religion not so much on empirical grounds—they often concede the existence of the phenomenon analyzed by Bellah, Lerner, and others—but rather on normative grounds. Embrace of the tenets of constitutional faith has been described by some of these critics as the equivalent of idolatry. They argue instead that constitutional faith, however important, must always be judged by the distinctly different claims of more traditional faith communities.

SANFORD LEVINSON
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Constitution and Civic Ideals; Political Philosophy of the Constitution.)

Bibliography

BELLAH, ROBERT 1970 Civil Religion in America. Pages 168–189 in Bellah, ed., Beyond Belief. New York: Harper & Row.

GREY, THOMAS C. 1984 The Constitution as Scripture. Stanford Law Review 37:1–25.

KAMMER, MICHAEL 1986 A Machine That Would Go of Itself: The Constitution in American Culture. New York: Knopf.

LERNER, MAX 1937 Constitution and Court as Symbol. Yale Law Journal 42:1290–1319.

LEVINSON, SANFORD 1988 Constitutional Faith. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

CONSTITUTION AS LITERATURE

Although presumably no one would say that the Constitution offers its readers an experience that cannot be distinguished from reading a poem or a novel, there is nonetheless a sense in which it is a kind of highly imaginative literature in its own right (indeed its nature as law requires that this be so), the reading of which may be informed by our experience of other literary forms. But to say this may be controversial, and the first step toward understanding how such a claim can be made may be to ask what it is we think characterizes imaginative literature in the first place.

It is common in our culture to marginalize "high literature," even while admiring it, and this mainly by thinking of it as offering nothing more than a refined pleasure, merely aesthetic in kind, and by assuming that it can therefore have nothing to do with practical affairs, with money or power. Those who think of themselves as literary people sometimes reciprocate with a marginalization of their own, speaking as if the merely practical offered nothing of interest to one who is devoted to what Wallace Stevens once called "the finer things of life." But this mutual marginalization impoverishes both sides, and the rest of us too, for it rests on a false dichotomy, between the aesthetic and the practical, which is like—and related to—those between fact and fiction, form and content, science and art.

For there is an important sense in which all literature is constitutive, great literature greatly so, of the resources of culture, which are simultaneously employed and remade in the creation of the text, and of what might be called the textual community as well. (By this I mean the relations that each text establishes between its author and its reader, and between those two and the others that it talks about.)

Beginning with the second point, we can say that every text, whether self-consciously literary or not, establishes what Aristotle called an ethos (or character) for its speaker and its reader and for those it speaks about as well; in addition, it establishes, or tries to establish, a relation among these various actors. In this sense every text is socially and ethically constitutive, a species of ethical and political action, and can be understood and judged as such. In fact, we make judgments of this sort all the time—although perhaps crudely so—for example whenever we find a politician's speech patronizing or a commercial advertisement manipulative or when we welcome frank correction at the hand of a friend.

The first point, that the text reconstitutes its culture, is perhaps more familiar, for we have long seen works of art as remaking the culture out of which they are made. This observation establishes a significant connection between the Constitution (and other legal texts) on the one hand and literary texts on the other; for in both, the material of the past is reworked in the present, and part of the art of each of these kinds of literature is the transformation, or reconstitution, of its resources.

To say this is to leave open, of course, the question how, and by what standards, such judgments of art and ethics are to be made. To pursue this question would be the work of a volume at least; let it suffice here to say these are judgments that expression of all sorts permits and that expression of a self-conscious kind—in the law and in fiction, as well as poetry and history—invites. Perhaps we can say in addition that through the reading of texts that address this question in interesting and important ways we may hope to develop our own capacities of analysis and judgment. For present purposes, the point is simply to suggest that once literature is seen as socially and culturally constitutive, the connection with the Constitution, and with the judicial literature elaborating it, may seem less strange than it otherwise might.

This line of thought began by rethinking what we mean by literature. We might wish to start from the other side, by thinking again about our ways of imagining law. In our culture the law is all too often seen simply as a set of rules or directives issuing from a sovereign to be obeyed or disobeyed by those subject to it. This is the understanding—crudely positivistic—that for many years dominated much of our theoretical thinking and much of our teaching as well; it still holds sway deeper in our minds than we may like to admit. In fact, as the history of the Constitution itself demonstrates with exemplary clarity, the meaning of legal directives is not self-evident or self-established, but requires the participation of readers who offer a variety of interpretations, often in competition with each other. In this sense the readers, as well as the writers, of our central legal texts are makers of the law, and any view of the law and the Constitution should reflect this fact.

Law is perhaps best thought of, then, not as a structure of rules, but as a set of activities and practices through which people engage both with their language (and with the rest of their cultural inheritance) and with each other. One of its aims, deeply literary in character, is to give meaning to experience in language; this is the backward-looking role of law. When it looks forward, as it does above all in the Constitution (but also in contracts, statutes, loan agreements, and trust indentures), it seeks to establish through language a set of relations among various actors, each of whom is given by the legal text certain tasks, obligations, or opportunities that otherwise would not exist, but none of which can be perfectly defined in language. By its nature, then, the legal text gives rise to a set of rhetorical and literary activities through which alone it can work.

The point of such a line of thought is not to assert there is no difference between a judicial opinion, or a constitutional amendment, and a lyric poem—that would be silly—but that, by looking to the deeper structures of the activities in which we engage, we may see them as sharing certain concerns and do this in ways that improve our capacity to understand, to judge, and to perform them. We may perhaps free literature from the veil drawn over it by the claim that it is merely aesthetic and, at the same time, free law from its veil, made of the claims that it is purely practical, only about power, or simply a branch of one of the policy sciences.

The Constitution is constitutive in the two ways in which every text is: it recasts the material of its tradition into new forms, for good or ill; and it establishes a set of relations among the actors it addresses and defines. The first point is historical and quite familiar and usually takes the form of observing that the U.S. Constitution is not a wholly radical innovation, but built upon certain models—British and colonial—out of which it grew. To this fact indeed it owes much of its durability and, perhaps as well, much of its capacity to make what really was new (that is, dual sovereignty) both intelligible and real. The second point is really a suggested way of reading the Constitution: not as a document allocating something called "power" but as a rhetorical creation defining new places and occasions for talk, creating new speakers, and establishing conditions of guidance and restraint. All of these activities are imperfectly determinate and therefore call for the literary and rhetorical practices of reading and writing, intepretation and argument, that lie at the center of the law. Before the Constitution was adopted, none of its official actors existed; there was no President, no Senate, no Supreme Court. One of the effects of the text, as ratified, was to bring these actors into existence. But that is not the end of it; every act of these new actors depends for its validity upon a claim, implied or expressed, about the meaning of the Constitution itself, and every such claim is in principle open to argument. This is not to say that the Constitution is incoherent, but that as a work of language it has much uncertainty built into it. In fact, it has the only kind of coherence that is open for human institutions to have.

This brings us to the most obvious, and best rehearsed, connection between literature and the law, especially constitutional law, namely, both of these fields work by the reading of texts, or by what it is now the fashion to call "interpretation." That word, however, is not without its dangers, for it may be taken to imply that an interpreter of a text reproduces in her own prose, in her "interpretation," a statement of what the original text means that is in some sense complete and exhaustive, which can indeed serve as an adequate substitute for it. But in neither literature nor the law can this be done; any "interpretation" is of necessity partial, in the sense that it is both incomplete and motivated by a set of understandings and desires that belong to the present reader (formed though these are in part from the materials of the past). The "interpretation" of an earlier text does not so much restate its meaning as elaborate possibilities of meaning that it has left open; the new text is the product of a new time, as well as the old.

Not solely the product of the present and of its partialities, both law and literature are grounded on the premise that the past speaks to us in texts that illumine and constrain though always incompletely so. Accordingly, there are similar interpretive vices in both fields; for example, the attempt to collapse the text, with all its difficulties and uncertainties, into some simplified statement of its "plain meaning," all too often in denial of the uncertainties that both kinds of texts necessarily have and with them the responsibilities for judgment that they generate. Or we may seek simplicity in another direction, defining the meaning of the text by reference to something outside it (for example, the biography of the writer or the "original intention" of the framer or legislator), usually without recognizing that what we think of ourselves as simply referring to is also, in part at least, our own creation—a text which itself requires interpretation. The result of both of these methods is the hidden arrogation of power to the so-called interpreters, who pretend to yield to an external authority, but actually exercise the power in question themselves. Or the vice may be of an opposite kind: to see so much complexity and indeterminacy in a text as to make its responsible reading hopeless and to say, therefore, that nothing can be clear but our own desires (if those) and that no respect needs to be paid (because none can) to the putatively authoritative texts of others. At its extreme, the tendency of this method is to destroy both law and culture.

In both kinds of work the process of reading requires a toleration of ambiguity and uncertainty: a recognition of complexity, an acknowledgment that our own habits of mind condition both what we see in a text and what we feel about it, and a relinquishment of the hope of universal and absolute clarity. Yet it requires a recognition as well that the past can speak to the present, that culture can be transmitted and transformed, that it is possible, and worth doing, to look beyond ourselves to that which we have inherited from others. Here, in this uncertain struggle to discover and state meaning, to establish a connection with the texts of another, is the life of law and literature alike.

One feature of legal interpretation that is distinctive, or distinctively clear, and of special relevance to the Constitution is its idealizing character. The reading of legal texts inherently involves us in the expression of our ideals, and this in two ways. First, whenever we interpret the Constitution, or any other legal text, we necessarily imagine for it an author, with a certain imagined character and set of values, situated in a certain set of circumstances, and actuated by a certain set of motives or aims. For whatever our theory may pretend, the text cannot be read simply as an abstract order or as the decontextualized statement of an idea; it must be read as the work of a mind speaking to minds. Thus, in our every act of interpretation we define—indeed, we create—a mind behind the text. This is necessarily the expression of an ideal; although, of course, our sense of the past helps to shape it, and to call it an ideal is not to say that it is one that all people share. But we idealize the speakers of the law, or it is not law.

Second, the literature of the law is inherently idealizing in the way in which lawyers idealize their official audiences. We speak to a judge not as to the small-minded angry person we actually think him to be, but as his own version of the wisest and best judge in the world, as we imagine it. And the judge too speaks not to a world of greedy, selfish, and lazy people, as he may see us, but to an ideal audience, the best version of the public he can imagine. In both cases our acts of imagining are acts of idealization for which we are responsible; it is in this way the nature of law to make the ideal real.

JAMES BOYD WHITE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Constitutional Interpretation)

Bibliography

LEUBSDORF, JOHN 1987 Deconstructing the Constitution. Stanford Law Review 40:181–201.

VINING, JOSEPH 1986 The Authoritative and The Authoritarian. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

WHITE, JAMES BOYD 1984 When Words Lose Their Meaning: Constitutions and Reconstitutions of Language, Character, and Community. Chapter 9. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

CONTEMPT POWER, JUDICIAL

The Constitution nowhere mentions contempt of court. The courts' powers in this area flow instead from a COMMON LAW tradition of debated antiquity and legitimacy. Contempt power has, however, become entangled with the Constitution in two respects: first, courts have had to explain how they came to exercise a power that in some respects seems antithetical to constitutional values; second, the Constitution has been held to limit some aspects of the courts' exercise of contempt power.

Contempt is the disobedience of a court's order or interference with its processes. Most judicial decrees are not orders to do or refrain from doing some act. Contempt would not arise, for example, from the simple failure to pay a money judgment. Some judgments, however, directly order a party to perform or refrain from performing some act. A court might order a party to transfer land, to integrate a school system, to cease polluting a stream, to answer questions put by the other side, or to refrain from obstructive behavior in the courtroom.

Having disobeyed such an order, one might be charged with a crime (since many jurisdictions make such acts criminal) or with contempt. Either charge might result in a fine or jail sentence, but the accompanying process might differ. For some categories of contempt the contemnor may suffer punishment without many of the rights normally attaching to criminal trials: to be represented by counsel, to prepare for trial, to present testimony, to cross-examine witnesses, or to have a TRIAL BY JURY. The list is extreme and would not apply to all of the often confusing categories of contempt developed by the courts, but it illustrates the potentially drastic nature of the power.

Courts employ such "criminal" contempt sanctions to redress judicial dignity, but individual litigants may also use contempt sanctions to gain the benefit of court orders. A party seeking to compel obedience to an INJUNCTION entered at his request may ask a court for a "civil" contempt sanction. Such a sanction typically orders the contemnor to jail or to the payment of a progressively mounting fine until he "purges" himself of the contempt by obeying the injunction in question. Though an accused civil contemnor enjoys the rights of counsel, testimony, and cross-examination, his hearing has none of the protections accorded criminal defendants, for the courts have held that this is a "civil" rather than a "criminal" proceeding in spite of the risk of imprisonment. Nor is the duration of the imprisonment or the size of the fine subject to any limitation save the discretion of the judge and the contemnor's continuing ability to perform the act required of him.

Justifying the use of apparently criminal penalties without protections constitutionally accorded criminal defendants, the courts have relied on claims of history, necessity, and categorization. The claim of history has rested on the propositions that at the time the Constitution was framed courts had long exercised contempt powers and that the Framers did not intend to alter them. Those claims have been challenged but are still made. The claim of necessity still urges the need for orderly adjudicatory proceedings and enforceable orders. The argument rests on the hypothesis that, were the usual restrictions of the BILL OF RIGHTS to apply to contempt proceedings, the courts would be unable to function. The argument from categorization involves simply the assertion that because neither civil nor criminal contempts involve "crimes," the portions of the Bill of Rights applicable to crimes do not apply. In the case of imprisonment for civil contempt this argument is bolstered by the circumstance that the contemnor has the power at any time to obtain his release by complying with the order—a power not enjoyed by a convicted criminal.

Though the courts' exercise of contempt power has thus been remarkable for the absence of constitutional constraints, some limits do exist. First, state and federal legislatures have statutorily required greater protections that the Constitution mandates. Second, the Supreme Court has imposed some constitutional limits: in criminal contempts the judge must find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt; in "indirect" contempts (those not committed before a judge or involving judicial officers) the contemnor is, in addition, accorded the rights of counsel, testimony, and cross-examination. Even in cases of direct contempt the contemnor may have a trial by jury if the judge proposes to inflict a serious penalty. Yet even in enunciating these protections, the Court has steadfastly insisted that the judge has a wide power to impose sentence on the spot for contemptuous behavior in the courtroom.

Judicial use of contempt power involves a collision between two desiderata: that of having tribunals able to conduct their proceedings and enforce their orders; and that of having persons whose freedom stands in jeopardy enjoy the protections of the Bill of Rights. Thus far the courts have concluded that in many situations the first goal necessitates subordinating the second.

STEPHEN C. YEAZELL
(1986)

Bibliography

GOLDFARB, RONALD L. 1963 The Contempt Power. New York: Columbia University Press.

CONTEMPT POWER, JUDICIAL
(Update)

Contempt is an ancient process for punishing disrespect for, disruption of, or disobedience of a lawful order of the government. For centuries in England and the United States the process was essentially unregulated. Individual judges and legislative houses defined and punished contempt as they saw fit.

Arguably, little has changed. Federal contempt statutes are notoriously vague and do not limit the power to punish. Although contempt of Congress proceedings are not unheard of, most modern contempt proceedings (including contempt of Congress) involve the judiciary. Contempt is invoked to deal with conduct ranging from misbehavior in court, to refusals to supply information, to failures to make support payments, to disobedience of orders regulating protests at ABORTION clinics, and much else.

Contempt is nowhere mentioned in the Constitution, but repeated instances of serious abuse have led the Supreme Court to impose both substantive and procedural limits on the contempt power, relying on various provisions of the Constitution.

For example, judges long used contempt to punish those who criticized their decisions. The Court has in the last fifty years repeatedly held that such punishments abridge the FIRST AMENDMENT guarantee of FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

Another battle involved the right of accused contemnors to TRIAL BY JURY. Historically, there was no such right; however, the contempt power was frequently employed to deny jury trials for alleged conduct that constituted both crimes and violations of court orders. The Court, recognizing the judge's inherent conflict of interest in a proceeding to vindicate the dignity and authority of the court, OVERRULED centuries of PRECEDENT and held that the Sixth Amendment required a jury trial for serious contempt punishments.

Much in the law of contempt turns on the murky distinction between "civil" and "criminal" contempt. The distinction does not depend on whether the allegedly contumacious conduct constitutes a crime, but rather on the purpose of the contempt proceeding. If it is to punish a past act of contempt, the proceeding is said to be "criminal," and most of the constitutional protections afforded criminal defendants apply. If the purpose is to coerce compliance with an existing order—for example, by a cumulative fine or jail sentence until the contemnor obeys—or to compensate a party injured by the contumacious conduct, the proceeding is said to be "civil," and is governed by the more general standard of DUE PROCESS OF LAW. The civil/criminal distinction is difficult to apply, especially where on-going acts allegedly violate a judicial order, and thus all three purposes may be served by the same proceeding. This has led to much confusion over the procedural protections available to those accused of contempt.

Another distinction contributing to procedural confusion is between "direct" and "indirect" contempts. A "direct" contempt is an act of disrespect or disobedience personally observed by the judge. On the theory that no fact-finding process is necessary, "direct" contempts may be punished "summarily," that is, without a formal trial. "Indirect" contempts involve conduct outside the presence of the judge, requiring some form of trial to determine what occurred. Despite efforts by judges to expand the category of "direct" contempts, the Court has limited the summary contempt power as a matter of due process to acts committed in the judge's presence requiring immediate response to protect the court's ability to function.

The law of contempt thus presents many difficult issues. In addition to the procedurally confusing distinctions, there is still neither a generally accepted definition of contumacious behavior nor a framework for assessing the appropriate severity of sanctions. And there is the recurring problem posed by those who prove impervious to coercive contempt sanctions, some of whom endure years of incarceration rather than comply. The Court may tell us in the future how the Constitution applies to these and other questions.

EARL C. DUDLEY, JR.
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Clinton v. Jones.)

Bibliography

BRAUTIGAM, RICHARD C. 1972 Constitutional Challenges to the Contempt Power. Georgetown Law Journal 60:1513–1536.

DOBBS, DAN B. 1971 Contempt of Court: A Survey. Cornell Law Review 56:183–284.

DUDLEY, EARL C., JR. 1993 Getting Beyond the Civil/Criminal Distinction: A New Approach to the Regulation of Indirect Contempts. Virginia Law Review 79:1025–1098.

FOX, SIR JOHN C. 1927 The History of Contempt of Court. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press.

GOLDFARB, RONALD 1963 The Contempt Power. New York: Columbia University Press.

KUHNS, RICHARD B. 1978 The Summary Contempt Power: A Critique and New Perspective. Yale Law Journal 88:39–123.

OSWALD, JAMES F. 1892 Contempt of Court, Committal, and Attachment and Arrest Upon Civil Process in the Supreme Court of Judicature. London, England: W. Clowes.

RAVESON, LOUIS S. 1990 A New Perspective on the Judicial Contempt Power: Recommendations for Reform. Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 18:1–65.

CONTEMPT POWER, LEGISLATIVE

See: Legislative Contempt Power

CONTINENTAL CONGRESS

On September 5, 1774, delegates from the colonies convened in Philadelphia in a "Continental" Congress, so called to differentiate it from local or provincial congresses. The FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS adopted a Declaration and Resolves to protest British measures and promote American rights; it also adopted the ASSOCIATION. The Congress dissolved on October 24, 1774, having decided that the colonies should meet again if necessary on May 10, 1775. By that time, the colonies and Great Britain were at war. The Second Continental Congress adopted a Declaration of the Causes and Necessity of Taking Up Arms on July 6, 1775, and the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE a year later. The Congress appointed GEORGE WASHINGTON as commander-in-chief of its armies, directed the war, managed FOREIGN AFFAIRS, and adopted a plan of union designated as the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. After the thirteenth state ratified the Articles in 1781, the official governing body of the United States became known as "the Congress of the Confederation," but it was a continuation of the Continental Congress and was not reconstituted until 1789, when a Congress elected under the Constitution of the United States took office.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BERNETT, EDMUND C. 1941 The Continental Congress. New York: Macmillan.

CONTRACEPTION

See: Birth Control; Griswold v. Connecticut; Reproductive Autonomy

CONTRACT CLAUSE

In a flashing aperçu Sir Henry Maine observed that "the movement of progressive societies has hitherto been a movement from Status to Contract." In feudal systems a person acquired a fixed, social status by birth, one's legal rights and duties being determined thereby for life. The decline of feudalism was a fading away of the status system in favor of personal rights and duties based largely on contractual relationships. Obligations imposed by ancestry gave way to obligations voluntarily undertaken. Generally thereafter a person's place in society depended upon success or failure in covenants with respect, for example, to wages, raw materials, farm and industrial goods, or artistic talent. In such a setting it is crucial that agreements be dependable—not merely to promote the individual's security and mobility but for the good of a society that relies for its sustenance upon a vast network of voluntary, contractual relationships. Thus Article I, section 10, of the Constitution, reflecting in part unfortunate experience under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, forbids inter alia state laws "impairing the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS." In THE FEDERALIST #44, JAMES MADISON, observed that such laws "are contrary to the first principles of the SOCIAL COMPACT and to every principle of sound legislation." In his view "the sober people of America" were "weary of fluctuating" legislative policy, and wanted reform that would "inspire a general prudence and industry, and give a regular course to the business of society."

Indeed the sanctity of contracts was deemed so vital to personal security that in fifty-five years following the Supreme Court's first contract clause decision (FLETCHER V. PECK, 1810), twenty-two states put such provisions in their own constitutions. With one exception each of them was included in the state's bill of rights. Prior to 1810 four states had already done this. All of them protected contracts generally (per Fletcher), not merely private contracts as in the NORTHWEST ORDIANCE. Plainly in JOHN MARSHALL's day and long thereafter his Court's broad view of the contract clause was widely accepted—along with FREEDOM OF RELIGION, and FAIR TRIALS—as one of those restrictions on government "which serve to protect the most valuable rights of the citizen."

Obviously those who thus equated property rights and civil liberty were—like the Founding Fathers and the MARSHALL COURT—disciples of JOHN LOCKE. He had taught that property and liberty go hand in hand; that neither thrives without the other; that to protect them both as indispensable to life itself is the reason for government. Generations later, in a radically changed economic setting, some Americans came to believe that property hampers liberty. Inevitably then (having forgotten Locke) they would misunderstand both the founders and our early judges—Lockians all. Thus the Progressive movement convinced itself and its heirs that the Marshall Court had erred in holding the contract clause applicable to state, that is, public, covenants and that in so holding the judges had revealed a pro-property bias. Both of these views—derived largely from Fletcher and Dartmouth College v. Woodward (1819)—seem erroneous. The first rests on the strange idea that unambiguous language of the Constitution means not what it plainly says, but rather something else, because of the supposed intent of its authors. (Of course authors' intent may be a proper key to the meaning of ambiguous terminology, but that is a very different matter.)

Had the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 wanted the clause to cover only private agreements, that is, those between individuals, it need only have said so. The Continental Congress had done just that in the Northwest Ordinance: "... no law ought ever to be made, or to have force in the said territory, that shall in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts. . . ." Six weeks later, RUFUS KING moved to include its private contract approach in the Constitution. Following a brief discussion of possible ramifications of such a provision, it was dropped. A few days later, at the suggestion of the Committee of Style, the Constitutional Convention adopted the contract clause, which refers comprehensively to "contracts" without qualification. Nothing in our record of the proceedings explains the change of mind or the change of terminology. But this is certain: not a word there or in The Federalist even hints that the founders were concerned only with private covenants—that they thought a state should be free to violate its own agreements. ALEXANDER HAMILTON would later observe: "It is . . . impossible to reconcile the idea of a [state] promise which obliges, with a power to make a law which can vary the effect of it." Hamilton, of course, had been a member of the Constitutional Convention.

Long before John Marshall became a judge, Justice JAMES WILSON, in CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793), had asked rhetorically: "What good purpose could this constitutional provision secure if a state might pass a law impairing the obligation of its own contracts, and be amendable, for such a violation of right, to no controlling judiciary power?" This from one who had been perhaps the second most important leader of the Constitutional Convention. Justice WILLIAM PATERSON, too, had been influential at the Convention. Years before Fletcher in a similar case, VAN HORNE'S LESSEE V. DORRANCE (1795), he had held that a state could not impair its own contractual obligations. So did the highest court of Massachusetts in Derby v. Blake (1799) and in Wales v. Stetson (1806). Fletcher was not without significant judicial precedent.

The argument that the contract clause does not mean what it says rests essentially on the proposition that the crucial contract problem in late eighteenth-century America was erosion of private contract obligations by debtors' relief legislation. No doubt this was a vexing and well-known difficulty. Yet surely it is no ipso facto basis for excluding related problems plainly covered by explicit constitutional language. State negligence with respect to state obligations was after all a matter of experience. Even if it were known that the Framers intended the written words to embrace only private contracts, judges could not properly adopt that view. For those who ratified can hardly be said to have ratified something other than the words of the document. To hold otherwise is to undermine the basic premise of a written constitution. As the Marshall Court put it in orthodox manner in Dartmouth: "This case being within the words of the Contract Clause, must be within its operation likewise, unless there be something in the literal construction so obviously absurd or mischievous, or repugnant to the general spirit of the instrument, as to justify those who expound the constitution in making it an exception. . . ." No such basis for an exception having been discovered, the Supreme Court ever since has found the contract clause applicable as written to contracts generally, whether public or private.

A related problem in Fletcher concerned the scope of the term "contract." The Georgia legislature had sold and granted to speculators millions of acres of public land. A subsequent legislature had repealed the grant on the ground that it had been obtained by bribery. Meanwhile part of the land had been conveyed to innocent third-party purchasers. The issue in Fletcher was whether the initial grant entailed obligations protected against impairment by the contract clause. The Court responded affirmatively. Of course, in modern usage a grant is not a contract, but that does not solve the problem. For it is quite clear that in the late eighteenth century the term "contract" had far broader connotations than it does today. As Dean ROSCOE POUND has explained:

> Contract was then used, and was used as late as Parsons on Contracts in 1853 to mean [what] might be called "legal transaction." . . . Not merely contract as we now understand it, but trust, will, conveyance, and grant of a franchise are included. . . . The writers on natural law considered that there was a natural legal duty not to derogate from one's grant. . . . This is the explanation of Fletcher, . . . and no doubt is what the [contract clause] meant to those who wrote it into the Constitution. ["The Charles River Bridge Case," Massachusetts Law Quarterly 27:19–20.]

In sum, in the context of the times a grant included an executory, contractual obligation of the grantor not to violate the terms of his grant.

On this and the public contract aspect of Marshall's opinions one finds no criticism or disagreement in a random selection of twelve legal treatises published before 1870, including THOMAS M. COOLEY's famous Constitutional Limitations (1868). Twelve years later, however, Cooley's General Principles of Constitutional Law (1880) took a somewhat critical stand. The change apparently reflected attacks upon the Marshall Court by C. M. Hill, R. Hutchinson, and J. M. Shirley writing separately in the American Law Review and the Southern Law Review from 1874 to 1879. In due course the Progressives would pick up these charges that the Marshall Court had erred, and they would add that "the great Chief Justice" was in fact "a stalwart . . . reactionary," a servant of property interests. It seems no coincidence that the Hill-Hutchinson-Shirley attacks germinated in an era (1865–1873) when nearly sixty percent of laws challenged under the contract clause were held invalid—an all-time high. Many such cases of course "favored" business interests and thus tended to offend Progressives. The result was that John Marshall became for them a villain.

Fletcher, of course, upheld the property claims of innocent, third-party purchasers. The alternative would have been to sustain the property claims of the innocent people of Georgia. Either way the judges would be deciding in favor of some, and against other, property interests. Either way innocent people would suffer. One fails to see how Fletcher can be said to reveal a property bias. Was there, however, bias of another sort in deciding for the ultimate buyers rather than for the initial owners? Far from exceptional, the choice was informed by a long settled (and still prevailing) rule of Anglo-American EQUITY jurisprudence. Although a fraudulent purchaser takes a good title at law, it is subject to cancellation by a chancery decree. Thus in a clash between a cheating buyer and his innocent victim the latter prevails. But Fletcher involved a clash between the innocent victim and an equally innocent, subsequent purchaser for value. With the equities thus in balance and the social interest in security of transactions on the side of the purchaser in possession, the chancellor does not intervene (the victim's recourse being an action for damages against the fraudulent party). In short, Marshall and his Court read the contract clause in the light of a long familiar rule of equity.

In the Dartmouth case, a group of philanthropists had received a public charter to create a college in New Hampshire. Later the state tried to take over and govern the school contrary to the charter provisions. Marshall's Court, following Fletcher, held that the charter was a contract which the state was not free to violate. Viewed narrowly the case was won by the college trustees, but they had no beneficial interest in the college property. They won on behalf of the donor-philanthropists (presumably deceased) and generations of future students.

The Progressive response is that the Dartmouth decision was a crafty gambit purposefully designed for an ulterior purpose: protection of corporation charters from legislative interference. That it was highly successful is demonstrated, we are told, by the enormous growth of corporate enterprise thereafter. This is make-believe. Justice JOSEPH STORY in Dartmouth pointed out that no state need grant irrevocable or nonamendable charters—that the power to amend or revoke may be reserved. Damage resulting from failure to do so can hardly be held a fault of the judges. In fact reservation of power to alter corporate charters became widespread after Dartmouth and was not unknown before. (See RESERVED POLICE POWER.)

Fletcher and Dartmouth are not pro-property, but rather pro-transaction, cases. They mean that when judges find no clearly overriding public interest such as they found in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) they will not disturb the contractual arrangements, that is, the transactions, by which women and men conduct their affairs—be they philanthropists (Dartmouth) or land speculators and farmers (Fletcher). As Marshall put it, "the intercourse between man and man would be very seriously obstructed, if this principle be overturned." Incidentally, by killing New York's restrictive steamboat law Gibbons too promoted transactional freedom.

An inclination toward unfettered private activity was deep in the temper of the times. Americans were on the make. They had escaped the old-world fetters: king, feudal aristocracy, and established church. They were the "new men." A vast geographical frontier invited initiative and ingenuity. The standard of living was low, but natural resources were plentiful. These conditions put a high premium on private, developmental effort. Such was the setting in which contract clauses found their way into bills of rights along with other basic protections then deemed indispensable to personal freedom and social well-being.

If the Marshall Court found that the Constitution forbade reneging on state obligations, it also recognized that public agreements raised special problems justifying a special rule of strict construction. In PROVIDENCE BANK V. BILLINGS (1830) Rhode Island had chartered the Providence Bank "in the usual form" with no reference of stipulation concerning taxation. Later, when the state enacted a bank tax, Providence Bank argued that a power (taxation) which might be used to destroy its charter was foreclosed by implication. The Court demurred: "as the whole community is interested in retaining [the power to tax] undiminished, that community has a right to insist that its abandonment ought not to be presumed, in a case in which the deliberate purpose to abandon it does not appear." Obviously the mere grant of a corporate charter for an ordinary banking operation could not rationally be held to imply an immunity from routine, nondiscriminatory taxation.

Marshall's Jacksonian successors under Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY followed the established path with two modifications: a temporary enlargement of the rule of strict construction, and a decision that a state may not by covenant fetter its power of EMINENT DOMAIN. The former occurred in CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE CO. V. WARREN BRIDGE CO. (1837). Massachusetts had authorized private investors to build, operate, and maintain a public drawbridge in exchange for toll rights for a period of forty (later extended to seventy) years. Before that period expired the state authorized a competing, in effect toll-free, bridge only yards away from the original facility. Was the state free thus to jeopardize the revenue of the first bridge, or did the forty-year provision implicitly preclude such interference? It must have been clear at the outset to all concerned that investors would not provide, maintain, and operate for forty years a public facility, if the state were free at any time to disrupt their only source of compensation. Surely in these circumstances the Marshall rule of strict construction was satisfied; the state's "deliberate purpose" to permit unimpeded toll collection for the period in question seems obvious.

The Taney Court did not repudiate—indeed it purported to follow—the Providence Bank rule of strict construction. In fact, it simply ignored the "deliberate purpose" aspect of that rule, and substituted an incompatible principle derived from English precedents: "nothing passes by implication in public grants." (Thus did Harvard College lose part of its endowment.) Justices Story and SMITH THOMPSON dissented on implied agreement grounds. Justice JOHN MCLEAN agreed with them on the merits, but thought the Court lacked JURISDICTION. In substance Charles River was a 4–3 decision—although five of the Justices had been appointed by President ANDREW JACKSON, the other two by his Jeffersonian predecessors.

The majority position—exalting form over substance—would have permitted construction of an adjacent, toll-free bridge immediately after construction of the first one. Yet surely no court would so decide. If this be true, the Taney rule against implied agreements must be untenable. The Court seems rarely to have used it, having returned long ago to the Marshall approach. See, for example, NORTHWESTERN FERTILIZING CO. V. HYDE PARK (1878): "Nothing is to be taken as conceded but what is given in unmistakable terms, or by an implication equally clear" (emphasis added). The major upshot of the Taney Court's stricter rule of construction was that those who covenanted with a state took care to secure elaborately explicit commitments.

Charles River Bridge exudes liberalism, stressing as it does the social interest in progress. Property rights, the Court proclaimed, must not impede developing technology. Old turnpike charters, for example, should be construed "strictly" lest they block new railroads. But no such clash of old and new was at issue before the Court. The real problem was that after some forty years the Massachusetts legislature had come to believe the tolls were no longer justified—the bridge having long since paid for itself. A severely split Court decided not the real, but a hypothetical, case—demonstrating once again that the framing of the issue largely determines the outcome of a controversy.

The other innovation of the Taney era came in West River Bridge Co. v. Dix (1848). Vermont had granted exclusive bridge rights. This did not prevent it from confiscating the grantees' bridge during the life of the grant—subject of course to JUST COMPENSATION. The Court's rationale was that all contracts are subject to HIGHER LAW conditions. "Such a condition is the right of eminent domain." The indispensable power of taxation, however, is not such a "condition" and thus may be limited by state covenants, as the Court held in PIQUA BRANCH OF THE STATE BANK V. KNOOP (1854). Surely the distinction rests not on "higher law"—whatever that meant to the Court in the Piqua opinion—but upon the just compensation requirement in the one situation but not in the other, and the fact that there are many taxpayers and many ways to secure public revenue, but only one recourse when a specific piece of private property stands in the way of the public welfare.

The WAITE COURT followed a similar approach in generously defining the so-called STATE POLICE POWER. Thus a charter to operate a lottery does not bar enforcement of a later antilottery law. "All agree that the legislature can not bargain away the police power," the Court declared in STONE V. MISSISSIPPI (1880). Of course neither the state in question, nor any other, has ever undertaken to "bargain away" its POLICE POWER. The DOCTRINE as enunciated in Stone is at best a truism providing no standard for judgment. Had it been used in Dartmouth, the school would have lost its case and its independence. In fact, as Gerald Gunther has remarked, the Stone police power rule has been used mainly in cases "involving prohibitions of matters widely regarded as "evil": for example, lotteries and intoxicating beverages, in an era when "Court invalidations of state laws impairing corporate charter privileges reached its highest frequency." (See INALIENABLE POLICE POWER.)

The epidemic of railroad fever that began in the Midwest in the 1850s was a prolific source of contract clause litigation. Many towns, cities, counties, and states issued railroad-aid bonds at an overall face value exceeding half a billion dollars. The purpose was to induce railroad companies to build lines convenient to the various bond issuers. Some of the desired construction never materialized. Many, perhaps all, of the railroad companies were overcapitalized. Stock watering was common. Some public and company officials were less than honest. These developments produced widespread resentment which some communities may have used for selfish purposes. In any case, what Henry Adams called the "mortgaged generation" (1865–1895) tried in one form or another to evade or repudiate much of its bond obligation. These circumstances are reflected in the path-breaking case of GELPCKE V. DUBUQUE (1864). After several decisions upholding the authority of cities to issue railroad-aid bonds, the Iowa Supreme Court, reinterpreting state law, reversed itself. On review the nation's highest Court upheld the claims of the adversely affected bondholders. In doing so it intimated that the state court's shift of position, retroactively altering the position of investors, was incompatible with contract clause principles. Popularly elected state judges apparently were more responsive to public sentiment than were appointed members of the federal Supreme Court. Ten years later Pine Grove Township v. Talcott (1874) brought the most extreme application of Gelpcke doctrine: to situations in which the state judiciary held bond issues invalid without overruling any prior decisions. The Supreme Court's rationale was that similar bond issues had been upheld in many other states before issuance of the bonds in question.

The contract clause intimations in Gelpcke and Pine Grove became an explicit basis of decision in Douglass v. Pike (1880). Much later the Court said that state court decisions did not produce contract obligations, and that neither Gelpcke nor its numerous offspring had in fact held otherwise. (Tidal Oil Co. v. Flanagan, 1924.)

Along with these bond cases another numerically important group involved the old problem of tax exemption. Without foregetting Marshall's Providence Bank rule of strict construction, the Court blocked a series of state efforts to annul pledges of corporate tax immunity.

After 1890 the contract clause as applied to state covenants gradually declined in favor or a more comprehensive, new device called SUBSTANTIVE (economic) DUE PROCESS—a gross perversion of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Years later, after the demise of that perversion, two cases suggested a possible renaissance of the contract clause. In UNITED STATES TRUST CO. V. NEW JERSEY (1977), the Court expounded a new principle of "particular" (more careful) scrutiny for cases involving public covenants "because the State's self-interest is at stake." New Jersey had issued transportation-system bonds pledging it would not substantially divert to other transportation needs the reserves and revenues securing them. Later it repealed this pledge. State courts upheld the repeal as a police power measure designed to promote additional transportation facilities. The Supreme Court reversed. No longer willing to defer to state determination of such issues, it ruled that judges must decide whether the contract impairment is "reasonable and necessary to serve an important public purpose." In this case it found that the state's needs could be served by less drastic means. In a bitter dissent Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, BYRON R. WHITE, and THURGOOD MARSHALL insisted that for a century the "central principle" had been this: "unusual deference to [state and local] law-making authority." They could not accept a departure "from the virtually unbroken line of our cases" holding that "lawful" exercises of the police power are "paramount to private rights held under contract." The question remains, however, whether a particular exercise of power is lawful.

We turn now from public to private contract problems. No doubt the contract clause was inspired largely by debtor's relief laws, for example, measures authorizing postponed repayment of debts, installment payments, or payment in goods (often at a discount). In the Supreme Court's first encounter with this private contract problem it struck down a New York law discharging debts upon surrender of the debtor's property however inadequate to meet his obligations. Chief Justice Marshall's opinion for a unanimous Court in STURGES V. CROWNINSHIELD (1819) is noteworthy for two points: the "mere existence" of the national BANKRUPTCY POWER does not preclude state insolvency legislation; and, while a state may not impair contract obligations, it may alter the legal sanctions (remedies, such as imprisonment for debt) for enforcement of such obligations. Eight years later OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1827) construed Sturges to prohibit only retrospective application of insolvency measures. Prospective application was deemed a different matter. The Court's rationale was that a debtor relief act in existence at the time of a contract became part of the contract; later enforcement thus would not constitute an impairment. On this basis, however, a retroactive insolvency law could also be upheld. After all, a state's power to adopt future insolvency measures may equally be deemed part of every contract. In his only recorded constitutional dissent "the great Chief Justice" along with Justices GABRIEL DUVALL and Story objected: the 4–3 majority had reduced a safeguard for contract rights to no more than a prohibition on "retrospectivity." Later, we shall see, even this restriction faded away.

Marshall's dissenting view in Ogden finds support in two separate votes in the Constitutional Convention. The contract clause of the Northwest Ordinance applied only to "private contracts . . . previously formed." In "copying" it, the Founders (as we have seen) dropped the limiting word "private." They also dropped the limiting term "previously formed." Later, on September 15, the Convention reaffirmed this position by rejecting George Mason's motion to insert the word "previous" after the words "obligation of" in the contract clause. Thus on two occasions the convention rejected the limitation that Ogden v. Saunders read into the Constitution.

The Sturges distinction between impairment of obligations and alteration of remedies threatened in later years to undermine the contract clause. Thus BRONSON V. KINZIE (1843), a leading Taney Court decision, taught that the allowable scope of remedial changes depends on their "reasonableness," provided "no substantial right" is impaired. As Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO wrote with characteristic restraint in Worthen Co. v. Kavanaugh (1935), the dividing line "is at times obscure." The leading modern case, HOME BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION V. BLAISDELL (1934), upheld a Minnesota "mortgage moratorium" law that extended the time of payment of mortgage loans, thus saving many homeowners, farmers, and businesses from foreclosure. The Court used the remedy and police power gambits to escape the Sturges-Ogden rule against retroactivity. The significance of the case is this: it is the culmination early in the Great Depression of a long, step-by-step process that replaced the absolute approach of the Constitution with a judicial balancing or "reasonableness" approach in private contract cases. Yet all agree these are the cases that above all else produced the unqualified language of the contract clause. Such absolutism does not mean that the founders were hard-hearted, preferring creditors to debtors. It means merely that, giving debtor-relief authority to Congress via the bankruptcy power, they opted for uniform, national treatment of the ubiquitous debtorcreditor tension.

Notwithstanding Blaisdell the "old Court" thereafter struck down several insolvency measures. One of them was LOUISVILLE JOINT STOCK LAND BANK V. RADFORD (1935). In effect it read the contract clause into the Fifth Amendment to invalidate a federal mortgage moratorium law (a matter of reverse INCORPORATION). Then with the advent of the Roosevelt Court in 1937 (until United States Trust in 1977) the contract clause all but vanished as a safeguard for contractual obligations—public or private. The only exceptions are Indiana ex rel. Anderson v. Brand (1938), protecting teacher tenure claims, and Wood v. Lovett (1941), protecting a tax-sale purchaser against repeal of a law that cured possible defects in his title. Wood is particularly interesting because it rests on the Fletcher principle that a state land grant entails an implied contractual obligation not to repudiate the grant in question. Then came ALLIED STRUCTURAL STEEL CO. V. SPANNAUS (1978). There an employer had adopted an employee pension agreement. The state tried to alter it by enlarging the employer's obligations retroactively. Finding the alternation too "severe" to be upheld, the Court observed: "If the Contract Clause is to retain any meaning at all . . . it must be understood to impose some limits upon the power of a State to abridge existing contractual relationships, even in the exercise of its otherwise legitimate police power." As in United States Trust, Justices Brennan, White, and Marshall dissented bitterly. Stressing again their view of minimal (or no) protection of economic interests vis-à-vis the police power, they added this: the contract clause at most prevents diminution, not enlargement, of contractual obligations.

All of these cases from Fletcher to Spannaus entail a common theme: the precept of reasonable expectations. To what extent, if any, is government free to disturb those formal pledges on which men and women acting in good faith have planned their lives? A healthy legal system accommodates changing social needs. When ours was a rich and vigorous, yet underdeveloped, nation with a low overall standard of living, our law encouraged capital formation, transactional freedom, and respect for contract obligations. The "design"—not always and everywhere fully perceived—was to encourage production in the interest of a more comfortable life for everyone. Given the propensity of successful institutions to press beyond the limits of their logic, such encouragement may take grotesque forms, for example, the judicial abuses called DUAL FEDERALISM and substantive due process. If eventually a "backward" nation becomes highly developed, emphasis seemingly shifts from economic rights to "personal rights," from production to welfare, as in the United States beginning in the 1930s. If such a shift results in overreaction, threatening the source of the "golden eggs," emphasis may focus again on production along with protection for property and contractual rights, as in New Jersey Trust and Spannaus.

WALLACE MENDELSON
(1986)

Bibliography

HALE, ROBERT L. 1944 The Supreme Court and the Contract Clause. Harvard Law Review 57:512–557, 621–674, 852–892.

HURST, WILLARD 1956 Law and the Conditions of Freedom. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

SCHWARTZ, BERNARD 1980 Old Wine in Old Bottles? The Renaissance of the Contract Clause. Supreme Court Review 1979:95–121.

WRIGHT, BENJAMIN F. 1938 The Contract Clause of the Constitution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

CONTRACT THEORY

See: Social Compact Theory

CONTROLLED-SUBSTANCE ABUSE

Throughout the quarter-century from 1965 to 1990 the federal government waged a frustrating "war" against the growing problem of trafficking in, and abuse of, marijuana, heroin, cocaine, and other drugs. The government's war on drugs raises a number of issues of constitutional dimension: To what extent does the EQUAL PROTECTION clause permit differences in the regulation of various controlled substances? How specific must regulations be to conform to the requirements of the DUE PROCESS clause? To what extent is the use of controlled substances protected by a constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY or by RELIGIOUS LIBERTY? Does the FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibition of unreasonable SEARCH AND SEIZURE contain an exception for seizure of illicit drugs? Does the prohibition of CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT impose any limitations on the sanctions imposed on drug offenders?

The FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT guarantee of equal protection of the laws has been interpreted to require a RATIONAL BASIS for governmental classifications. A classification is "underinclusive" if it does not include all who are similarly situated and "overinclusive" if it includes those who do not rationally belong with the other members of a prohibited class. The earliest efforts to regulate the abuse of controlled substances raised substantial issues under the equal protection clause, because they failed to include many drugs and tended to apply the same punitive sanctions to all drugs, despite substantial differences in their dangerousness. In 1937, for example, the Marijuana Tax Act classified marijuana with narcotic drugs, imposing the same harsh penalties for possession of marijuana as for heroin or cocaine. For more than thirty years, the drug policy of the United States recognized no distinctions among drugs. The same strategy was used to control all drugs, and that strategy was simply to keep escalating the penalties. Only one exception was recognized, and that was alcohol. Alcohol was treated as though it were not a drug at all. Drug treatment programs racked it up as a success if they converted a drug addict into an alcoholic. Separate federal bureaucracies were created to deal with alcohol abuse and drug abuse so that no one would get the idea that America's ten million alcoholics were addicted to a drug.

In 1970 the federal Controlled Substances Act codified a comprehensive scheme for the classification of drugs on five different schedules, depending on their potential for abuse, risk of addiction, and legitimate medical use. Penalties for trafficking vary substantially, depending on the schedule on which a drug is placed. Since 1970, continuous legal challenges have been mounted against the classification of marijuana on Schedule I, along with heroin, LSD, and other drugs having no recognized medical use. Other drugs, such as PCP, have been moved from a lower schedule to a higher one as awareness of the potential for their abuse has increased.

The guarantee of due process of law contained in both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments has been interpreted to require adequate notice of a criminal prohibition, to ensure both that potential violators can comply with the law and that law enforcement officers are not given broad authority to discriminate in the enforcement of the laws. Laws not meeting this standard are struck down as unconstitutionally vague.

In two spheres drug laws have raised substantial problems of VAGUENESS. The first problem lies in the description of the prohibited drug itself. The development of "designer drugs" in clandestine laboratories has enabled new drugs to appear in the illicit market faster than laws can be amended to prohibit them. Congress responded in 1986 by prohibiting controlled-substances "analogues," which are defined as substances whose chemical structure is "substantially similar" to previously controlled substances. Legal challenges asserting that this language is unconstitutionally vague are currently pending.

Second, attempts to regulate the marketing of drug paraphernalia have run into vagueness challenges, because drug "paraphernalia" include common household objects, such as spoons and scales. In 1982 the Supreme Court upheld an ordinance regulating the sale of items "designed or marketed for use with illegal cannabis or drugs." The Court concluded that any problem of vagueness was cured by a requirement of proof of actual intent that the items be used for illegal purposes.

The constitutional guarantee of privacy has been interposed against many governmental efforts to regulate drug use, but the most significant battleground has been urine testing of employees to detect drug use. In 1989 the Supreme Court gave the green light to programs requiring DRUG TESTING of railway employees involved in train accidents and U.S. Customs Service employees applying for positions involving interdiction of drugs. The Court declared that the expectations of privacy are diminished for employees who participate in industries that are pervasively regulated or who are employed in drug enforcement efforts.

Whether drug use can ever be constitutionally protected as part of a religious exercise came before the Court in a 1990 case presenting a constitutional challenge to the discharge of Oregon employees who participated in a Native American Church ceremony that included the chewing of peyote buttons. In EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES V. SMITH, the Court declared that a general criminal prohibition of the use of peyote could be enforced even when peyote was used as part of a legitimate, bona fide religious ceremony. The dissenting Justices argued that preference was being shown to some religions over others, noting that the alcohol used for sacramental wine in Catholic services was exempted from the PROHIBITION laws enacted in the 1920s.

The prohibition of UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures in the Fourth Amendment has frequently been viewed as an obstacle by police charged with the enforcement of drug laws. The EXCLUSIONARY RULE, which requires the suppression of illegally seized evidence, may result in the dismissal of drug trafficking charges if the illicit drugs were seized without a valid SEARCH WARRANT. A study of New York City police revealed that immediately after the exclusionary rule was first announced in 1961, arrest reports in half of all cases related that the defendant "dropped the drugs on the ground upon seeing the police officer." Any inquiry into the grounds for a search was thus avoided. During the prior year only fourteen percent of the reports claimed the defendant dropped the drugs. Obviously, the new rule did not cause an outbreak of "dropsy" in New York; it caused an outbreak of police perjury. Police were willing to lie to avoid application of the exclusionary rule to their searches.

Congress has frequently responded to the complaints of narcotics officers that the exclusionary rules make their jobs too tough. As part of President RICHARD M. NIXON's war on drugs, Congress enacted a NO-KNOCK ENTRY provision for drug cases in 1970, providing that search warrants for drugs could dispense with the normal requirement that police knock and announce themselves before entering the premises to be searched. Police argued that the exemption was necessary for drug cases because drugs are quickly destroyed if violators are warned of the police presence. What was forgotten was that police occasionally make mistakes. A series of "wrong-door" raids led to shootouts that left four innocent people dead, including one police officer. In 1974, Congress repealed the no-knock provision, restoring the requirement of a knock on the door even in drug cases.

During the 1980s the argument that search and seizure requirements should be relaxed in drug cases gained a receptive ear in the Supreme Court. In case after case, the Court carved out exceptions to the requirements of PROBABLE CAUSE and search warrants, citing the need for more pervasive police surveillance to prevent the smuggling of illicit drugs.

A common legislative response to the frustration of escalating drug use is simply to escalate the penalties for illegal possession or trafficking of drugs. Does the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the Eighth Amendment impose any limitation? In 1962 the Supreme Court struck down a California law that made it a criminal offense "to be addicted to the use of narcotics." The Court characterized addiction as an illness over which the victim had no control, and concluded it would be "cruel and unusual punishment" to imprison someone for simply being sick. Subsequent cases, however, have held that addiction offers no defense to someone arrested for such activities as possession of drugs or being intoxicated in public. The imposition of life prison sentences has been challenged as disproportionate to the seriousness of drug offenses, but the Supreme Court currently gives states a wide berth in setting the level of punishment for drug offenses.

In the early 1970s, New York's Governor Nelson Rockefeller successfully sponsored a law imposing mandatory life imprisonment for drug pushers. The law was hailed as the ultimate solution, one that would make drug selling such a serious offense that no one would want to take the risk. The total failure of that policy quickly became an embarrassment. Motorists began complaining that they could not drive down some streets in Harlem in broad daylight without being accosted at every corner by drug hustlers. The hustlers, of course, were addicts on the lowest rung of the distribution ladder. The threat of a mandatory prison sentence had little impact on them.

Today legislators are stymied. Although they have imposed a mandatory sentence of ten years to life and a fine of $100,000 for engaging in a drug enterprise, these penalties have no perceptible impact on the number of drug enterprises flourishing in America. A serious suggestion has been made that CAPITAL PUNISHMENT is the answer.

A potent weapon against drug traffickers has been found in the enactment of forfeiture laws. Under the Comprehensive Forfeiture Act of 1984, federal authorities can seize any property derived from the proceeds of a drug transaction or any property used to facilitate a drug offense. Houses, businesses, automobiles, airplanes, and boats have been forfeited to the government. In 1990 the Supreme Court ruled that money paid to criminal defense lawyers for representation in drug prosecutions could also be seized, without violating the Sixth Amendment RIGHT TO COUNSEL. Courts have split on the question of whether the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment requires that a forefeiture be proportionate to the seriousness of the offense. In one case, forfeiture of a house worth $100,000 was upheld even though the property was used to grow less than $1,000 worth of marijuana plants.

As the war on drugs escalates, the tension between law enforcement techniques and traditional constitutional liberties will increase. In applying a BALANCING TEST, courts can be expected to give greater and greater weight to the need to suppress drug trafficking. One may hope that the casualties in the war on drugs will not include the Constitution itself.

GERALD F. UELMEN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Crack Cocaine and Equal Protection; Drug Regulation.)

Bibliography

KAPLAN, JOHN 1970 Marijuana: The New Prohibition. New York: Simon and Schuster.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON MARIJUANA AND DRUG ABUSE 1973 Drug Use in America: Problem in Perspective, Second Report (March).

TREBACH, ARNOLD 1982 The Heroin Solution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

UELMEN, GERALD F. and HADDOX, VICTOR G. 1990 Drug Abuse and the Law. New York: Clark Boardman.

WISOTSKY, STEVEN 1986 Breaking the Impasse in the War on Drugs. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

COOLEY, THOMAS M.
(1824–1898)

Thomas McIntyre Cooley was a distinguished law teacher, state judge, first chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and author of the influential 1868 Treatise on the Constitutional Limitations Which Rest upon the Legislative Power of the States of the American Union. Born in western New York to a family with a Jeffersonian "bias," Cooley absorbed an anticorporate equal-rights ideology, fearful of "class legislation" that aided the few at the expense of many.

In 1843 Cooley went west to Michigan and combined activities in law, journalism, politics, and poetry. He helped organize the Free Soil Party in the state and in 1856 became a Republican. Narrowing his concerns to the law, he rapidly attained professional recognition. Appointed Compiler of the state's laws in 1857 and Reporter to the Supreme Court in 1858, he was selected in 1859 as a professor at the newly opened University of Michigan Law Department. In 1864 he was elected to the Michigan Supreme Court.

Cooley tempered his preoccupation with the law with historical and political values and naturally turned to constitutional questions. To Francis Thorpe's 1889 query on books for a constitutional law library he replied that "constitutional law is so inseparably connected with constitutional history and that is so vital a part of general history that I should not know where to draw the line."

Historical, COMMON LAW, and Jacksonian sensibilities were the presuppositions of Cooley's 1868 treatise, although his aim was merely to write "a convenient guidebook of elementary constitutional principles." The book was that; it had gone through six editions by 1890 and had a broader circulation, a greater sale, and more frequent citations than any other law book published in the second half of the nineteenth century.

The treatise was useful because no one prior to Cooley had systematically analyzed the cases and principles dealing with constitutional limitations on state legislative power. Chapters on constitutional protection to personal liberty, to liberty of speech, and to RELIGIOUS LIBERTY were supplemented with chapters on municipal government, EMINENT DOMAIN, taxation, and the POLICE POWER. Chapter Eleven, "Of the Protection to Property by the Law of the Land" attracted the most attention, for here Cooley discussed DUE PROCESS OF LAW and gave it a significant substantive definition. Cooley said that legislative restraints on property should be tested by "those principles of civil liberty and constitutional defense which have become established in our system of law, and not by any rules that pertain to forms of procedure only." His test of due process was historical: the "established principles" and "settled usuages" of the common law protected property rights.

Cooley's definition of due process was used in the briefs of corporation lawyers who also distorted his comprehensive definition of the liberty protected by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT as embracing "all our liberties—personal, civil, and political" to a FREEDOM OF CONTRACT doctrine. Twentieth-century commentators have often accepted these briefs, misinterpreting Cooley as a zealous advocate of the judicial protection of property rights. To Cooley, however, due process did not necessarily mean judicial process nor did individual property rights mean corporate property rights. His views on judicial self-restraint were summarized in his treatise comment that judges "cannot run a race of opinions upon points of right, reason, or expediency with the law-making power." And Cooley repeated Justice LEMUEL SHAW's views on a strong police power.

When Cooley was writing his treatise he was lecturing students on "the struggle between corporations and the rights of the people," condemning the decision in DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819), issuing opinions criticizing special privileges for corporations, and using the principle of equal rights and the maxims of "no taxation except for a PUBLIC PURPOSE" and of "due process of law" to declare tax aid to railroad corporations unconstitutional.

Cooley anxiously observed the growth of corporate capitalism in post-CIVIL WAR America. Deploring the national sentiment "to become immediately rich and great," he worried over the conflict of labor and capital and felt "that class legislation has been making the rich richer and the poor poorer," adding that "property is never so much in danger of becoming master as when capital unjustly manipulates the legislation of the country." These remarks in an 1879 lecture at Johns Hopkins University have been overlooked, as has a similar warning in an 1884 article on "Labor and Capital Before the Law" that when constitutional protection to property especially benefits those who have possessions, "the Constitution itself may come to be regarded by considerable classes as an instrument whose office it is to protect the rich in the advantages they have secured over the poor, and one that should be hated for that reason."

In court decisions Cooley evidenced older Jeffersonian values, upholding free public education, the FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, the rights of local self-government, and the necessity for judicial self-restraint. But the changing America of the late nineteenth century diminished earlier Jeffersonian hopes. In a melancholic mood in 1883 he admitted that "the political philosophy of Burke never grows stale and is for all times and all people."

By the 1880s Cooley had a national reputation, earned by judicial duties and constant lecturing, editing, and writing, including editions of SIR WILLIAM BLACKSTONE and JOSEPH STORY and treatises on torts and taxation. Aspirations for a United States Supreme Court appointment were dashed in 1881 when railroad interests, Cooley thought, successfully lobbied for STANLEY MATTHEWS. But Cooley had given up on Republicans, and in 1886 wondered whether the Party "possesses any good reason for existence." He admired GROVER CLEVELAND and accepted his offer of the chairmanship of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Regulating the American railway system was a task beyond Cooley's declining powers, and the effort led to a breakdown that left him a semi-invalid after 1890.

An 1889 comment to the South Dakota Constitutional Convention reveals that Cooley had modified older beliefs in constitutional limitations to legislative power: "Even in the millennium people will be studying ways whereby—by means of corporate power—they can circumvent their neighbors. Don't do that to any such extent as to prevent the legislative power hereafter from meeting all the evils that may be within the reach of proper legislation."

ALAN R. JONES
(1986)

Bibliography

JONES, ALAN R. 1986 The Constitutional Conservatism of Thomas McIntyre Cooley: A Study in the History of Ideas. New York: Garland Publishing.

TWISS, BENJAMIN 1942 Lawyers and the Constitution: How Laissez-Faire Came to the Constitution. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

COOLEY v. BOARD OF WARDENS OF PORT OF PHILADELPHIA
12 Howard 299 (1851)

The chaos in judicial interpretation that characterized the TANEY COURT'S COMMERCE CLAUSE cases was ended in Cooley, the most important decision on the subject between GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) and UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. (1895). The Taney Court finally found a doctrinal formula that allowed a majority to coalesce around a single line of reasoning for the first time since the days of the MARSHALL COURT. That formula was the DOCTRINE of SELECTIVE EXCLUSIVENESS, announced for the majority by Justice BENJAMIN R. CURTIS. The doctrine was a compromise, combining aspects of the doctrines of CONCURRENT POWERS over commerce and EXCLUSIVE POWERS, but three Justices of the eight who participated rejected the compromise. Justices JOHN MCLEAN and JAMES M. WAYNE, whom Curtis privately called "high-toned Federalists," persisted in their nationalist view, expressed in dissent, that congressional powers over INTERSTATE and FOREIGN COMMERCE were always exclusive, while PETER V. DANIEL, an intransigent states-rightist, concurred in the majority's result on the ground that congressional power over commerce was never exclusive.

At issue in Cooley was the constitutionality of a Pennsylvania statute requiring ships of a certain size entering or leaving the port of Philadelphia to employ local pilots in local waters. Cooley, claiming that the state act unconstitutionally regulated foreign commerce, refused to pay the pilotage fee. The fact that the first Congress had provided that the states could enact pilotage laws did not alter Cooley's claim. Curtis for the Court acknowledged that if the grant of commerce powers to Congress had divested the states of a power to legislate, the act of Congress could not confer that power on the states. The problem was whether the power of Congress in this case was exclusive.

Commerce, Curtis declared, embraces a vast field of many different subjects. Some subjects imperatively demand a single uniform rule for the whole nation, while others, like pilotage, demand diverse local rules to cope with varying local situations. The power of Congress was therefore selectively exclusive. If the subject required a single uniform rule, the states could not regulate that subject even in the absence of congressional legislation. In such a case congressional powers would be exclusive. Such was the nationalist half of the doctrine. The other half, by which the Court sustained the state act, maintained that the states did possess concurrent powers over commerce if the subject required diversity of regulation. Thus Congress's power was exclusive or concurrent depending on the nature of the subject to be regulated. "It is the opinion of a majority of the court," Curtis declared, "that the mere grant to Congress of the power to regulate commerce, did not deprive the States of power to regulate pilots, and that although Congress has legislated on this subject, its legislation manifests an intention . . . to leave its regulation to the several States."

The Court's doctrine of selective exclusiveness gave it a point of departure for analyzing commerce clause issues. The doctrine, however, had to be interpreted. It did not even suggest how the Court could determine which subjects required national legislation, thus excluding state action, and which required diverse local regulations. The doctrine could be manipulated by Justices who employed nationalist doctrine to invalidate state enactments.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

SWISHER, CARL BRENT 1974 History of the Supreme Court. Vol. 5:404–407. New York: Macmillan.

COOLEY RULE

See: Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Port of Philadelphia; Selective Exclusiveness

COOLIDGE, CALVIN
(1872–1933)

John Calvin Coolidge, the thirtieth President of the United States, succeeded WARREN G. HARDING upon Harding's death in August 1923 and served until 1929. The heart of his legislative program was a series of tax reductions for individual taxpayers in all brackets, economy in government, and a balanced BUDGET.

The chief legislative controversy of the 1920s concerned the McNary-Haugen bills, which Coolidge vetoed in 1927 and 1928. These bills, proposed in response to a prolonged agricultural recession, would have authorized the federal government to buy and sell farm products in an effort to raise their prices. Coolidge opposed the bills as unworkable and as an unconstitutional expansion of the commerce power. The Congress, he argued, was limited to those powers granted to it or implied as incidental to the express powers. In language anticipating the opposition to the NEW DEAL, Coolidge cautioned against the dangers of bureaucracy. He also observed that the people of the United States could reallocate the constitutional powers of the federal government and the states by means of the AMENDING PROCESS. Coolidge supported national legislation to regulate child labor, but he believed that a constitutional amendment would be required first to grant such power to the federal government.

Coolidge's only appointment to the Supreme Court was of his Amherst College classmate, Attorney General HARLAN FISKE STONE.

THOMAS B. SILVER
(1986)

Bibliography

SILVER, THOMAS B. 1983 Coolidge and the Historians. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press.

COOLIDGE, UNITED STATES v.

See: Federal Common Law of Crimes

COOLIDGE v. NEW HAMPSHIRE
403 U.S. 443 (1971)

In Coolidge v. New Hampshire, police officers, acting pursuant to a SEARCH WARRANT issued by the state attorney general, seized and later searched an automobile parked in the driveway of a murder suspect's home. The Supreme Court ruled the warrant invalid because a prosecutor could not be regarded as a neutral and detached magistrate. The automobile seizure was too far removed in time and space from the suspect's arrest to be considered incident to that arrest, was not grounded in any EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES to qualify for an AUTOMOBILE SEARCH or PLAIN VIEW exception nor was the discovery of the automobile inadvertent. Later decisions have confined Coolidge to its facts, emphasizing the automobile's location on a private driveway and the fact that the automobile was not contraband, stolen, or itself dangerous.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

COOPER, THOMAS
(1759–1839)

Dr. Thomas Cooper, an English radical who settled in the United States in 1794, was an intellectual jack-of-all-trades, master of most, and the author of treatises on philosophy, law, religion, government, political economy, and various sciences. When he was a Jeffersonian editor, he was convicted of violating the SEDITION ACT OF 1798. His Political Essays and the report of his trial advocated a radically broad theory of FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. Later a Pennsylvania judge, he was removed from office and soured on liberalism, although his friend THOMAS JEFFERSON called him the "greatest man in America, in the powers of mind and in acquired information." When Cooper was president of what later became the University of South Carolina, he revised the state statutes and wrote On the Constitution (1826), which spoke for SLAVERY, state SOVEREIGNTY, and NULLIFICATION.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

COOPER v. AARON
358 U.S. 1 (1958)

For several years after its decision in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954–1955), the Supreme Court gave little guidance or support to the lower courts charged with supervising the DESEGREGATION of the public schools. In this case, however, the Court was confronted with direct defiance of Brown by a state's highest officials, and it met that challenge head-on.

Even before the Brown remedial opinion in 1955, the school board of Little Rock, Arkansas, had approved a plan for gradual desegregation of the local schools, and the federal district court had upheld the plan. Just before the opening of the fall 1957 term, the state governor, Orval Faubus, ordered the state's National Guard to keep black children out of Little Rock's Central High School. The attorney general of the United States obtained an injunction against the governor's action, and the children entered the school. A hostile crowd gathered, and the children were removed by the police. President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER was thus prodded into his first significant act supporting desegregation; he sent Army troops to Central High to protect the children, and eight black students attended the school for the full academic year.

In February 1958, the school board asked the district court, in Cooper v. Aaron, for a delay of two and one-half years in the implementation of its plan, and in June the court agreed, commenting on the "chaos, bedlam and turmoil" at Central High. In August the federal court of appeals reversed, calling for implementation of the plan on schedule. The Supreme Court, in an unusual move, accelerated the hearing to September 11, and the next day it issued a brief order affirming the decision of the court of appeals. Later the Court published its full opinion, signed by all nine Justices to emphasize their continued unamimous support of Brown.

The opinion dealt quickly with the uncomplicated merits of the case, saying that law and order were not to be achieved at the expense of the constitutional rights of black children. The Court then added a response to the assertion by the Arkansas governor and legislature that the state was not required to abide by Brown, because Brown itself was an unconstitutional assumption of judicial power.

The response scored two easy points first: the Constitution, under the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, is "the supreme Law of the Land," and MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) had held that it was the province of the judiciary to "say what the law is." The Court's next step, however, was not self-evident: Marbury meant that the federal courts are supreme in expounding the Constitution; thus Brown was the supreme law of the land, binding state officers. This view, which carried the assertion of judicial power further than Marbury had taken it, has been repeated by the Court several times since the Cooper decision.

Cooper's importance, however, was not so much doctrinal as political. It reaffirmed principle at a crucial time. The televised pictures of black children being escorted into school through a crowd of hostile whites galvanized northern opinion. The 1960 election brought to office a president committed to a strong civil rights program—although it took his death to enact that program into law.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Civil Rights Act of 1964.)

COOPERATIVE FEDERALISM

The theory of cooperative federalism postulates that the relationship between the national government and the states is one in which: governmental functions typically are undertaken jointly by federal and state (including local) agencies, rather than exclusively by one or the other; a sharing of power characterizes an integrated system instead of an exclusive SOVEREIGNTY at either level of government; and power tends not to concentrate at either level, or in any one agency, because the fragmented and shared nature of responsibilities gives citizens and interest groups "access" to many centers of influence.

Cooperative federalism is a modern phenomenon. Its main features—sharing of policy responsibilities and financial resources, interdependence of administration, overlapping of functions—are associated mainly with the FEDERAL GRANT-IN-AID programs. Collaboration, grants-in-aid from the national government to the states, bypassing of the states through establishment of grant programs aiding local or special-district governments directly, and development of auditing procedures and conditional grant requirements all have characterized cooperative federalism in the period after 1933.

Numerous analysts who celebrate these developments as signifying that old-style FEDERALISM is "dead," displaced by "intergovernmental relations," argue that the tension, pretensions at autonomy, and the notion of separateness of responsibilities that characterized governance in the pre-New Deal periods of constitutional development no longer form part of the reality of the federal system. Some scholars argue that relative power distribution is no longer a relevant issue. Forgotten is the elementary notion that "sharing" does not necessarily mean equality. Characteristically, in the modern grant-in-aid programs, the national government has not only raised and distributed the revenues, it has also designed the programs and established the goals, quite apart from overseeing administration.

Fascination with the alleged "non-centralization of power," which is seen to result from cooperative federalism, also can obscure the evidence of the vast additions of discretionary power in the national executive branch since 1933. Presidents from both parties have contributed to the growth of the "Imperial Presidency," and the process of centralization of power that has gone forward in this century has been profoundly influenced by this development.

The decision in MASSACHUSETTS V. MELLON (1923) established the juridical foundation of modern grant-in-aid constitutional theory. The Court there dismissed the complaint of Massachusetts that state prerogatives were improperly invaded by conditional grant programs (in that instance, the maternity-aid program of national grants). The interpretation of the TENTH AMENDMENT as "but a truism," in UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941), further advanced the constitutional basis for cooperative federalism in action. Subsequently the Court upheld the principle of making grants conditional, even in Oklahoma v. United States Civil Service Commission (1947), when the federal legislation required adherence to HATCH ACT restraints on political activity by state officials. A contrary note was sounded by the Court in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976), in which the Court asserted that "Congress may not exercise power in a fashion that impairs the states' integrity of their ability to function effectively in a federal system." Yet this assertion was made as the Court invalidated only a regulatory measure affecting hours and wages of local government employees, not a grant-in-aid or collaborative program. In GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985) the Court overruled Usery, the majority declaring that case-by-case development since 1976 had failed to produce any principled basis for identifying "fundamental' elements of state sovereignty." The Court specifically cited the history of federal grants-in-aid as evidence that cooperative federalism and the political process gave adequate protection to the interests of the states.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD 1941 Constitutional Revolution, Ltd. Claremont, Calif.: Claremont Colleges.

COPPAGE v. KANSAS
236 U.S. 1 (1915)

In Adair v. United States (1908), the Supreme Court had held that the section of the ERDMAN ACT that outlawed YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS was outside Congress's power to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Now, facing a question "not distinguishable in principle," a 6–3 Court struck down a Kansas statute banning yellow dog contracts. Justice MAHLON PITNEY for the majority, finding no reason to depart from Adair, reaffirmed the doctrine of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. That "fundamental and vital" freedom fused rights of liberty and property so that any "arbitrary interference with that freedom of contract would impair those rights." Only a "legitimate" exercise of STATE POLICE POWER could limit it, and the majority could see no relation between the avowed purpose of the statute and the state's responsibility to protect the safety, morals, and health of its citizens. Indeed, "an interference with the normal exercise of personal liberty and property rights is the primary object of the statute." Concluding that it deprived employers and employees of the right to contract freely on their own terms, the majority voided the statute as a violation of SUB-

STANTIVE DUE PROCESS guaranteed by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In a brief dissent, Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES reiterated the position he had stated in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). He saw nothing in the Constitution forbidding the Kansas statute, and he declined to substitute the courts' judgment for the legislature's on this policy question. In a lengthier dissent joined by Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, Justice WILLIAM R. DAY, who had voted with the majority in Adair, asserted that Kansas had enacted the statute to promote the general welfare, thereby validly limiting the freedom of contract.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

COPYRIGHT

The Framers of the Constitution delegated to the national government authority to enact copyright laws. The copyright power, together with the PATENT power, is found in Article I, section 8, clause 8, which empowers Congress "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." Because there is no record of any debate on this clause at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, and mention of it in THE FEDERALIST is perfunctory, the meaning of the clause must be found in case law.

The phrase "to promote the progress of science" states what the Supreme Court, in Mazer v. Stein (1954), described as "the economic philosophy behind the clause," which is "the conviction that encouragement of individual effort by personal gain is the best way to advance public welfare through the talents of authors. . . ." Most courts, however, would deny that the introductory phrase permits the denial of copyright to any particular work on the ground that it does not contribute to such "progress." In fact, a United States Court of Appeals held in 1979 that obscene content does not invalidate copyright.

The words "by securing" came into contention in Wheaton v. Peters (1834), the first important copyright case decided by the Supreme Court, and a case involving two of the Court's own reporters. The plaintiff there argued that the federal copyright statute merely added additional remedies to a right that already existed at COMMON LAW. To bolster this position, he argued that the word "secure" meant to protect, insure, save, and ascertain, not to create. The Court rejected this contention, holding that the federal statute had created a new right, but that the author had not complied with the act's conditions.

Because the clause contains the words, "for limited times," a federal copyright statute that purported to grant copyright protection in perpetuity would clearly be unconstitutional. So too would a term that is nominally "limited" but is in fact the equivalent of perpetual protection (for example, a one thousand year term). The term currently provided for newly created works, the life of the author plus fifty years, conforms with the "limited times" requirement.

Only "authors" may be granted copyright in the first instance, although, once granted, copyright is transferable by an author to others. The term "authors" in the Constitution gives rise to the "originality" requirement in the law of copyright, which excludes from copyright protection material copied from others. An author is no less an author because others have anticipated his work, as long as he did not copy from such others. This Judge Frank contrasted with an "inventor" under the patent power, who must by definition produce something "novel," that is, not anticipated in the prior art. By reason of the phrase "exclusive right," it is clear that Congress has the power to grant to authors the "exclusive right" to exploit their works. But Congress is under no compulsion to exercise its full powers under the Constitution. If it may withhold copyright protection altogether from a given category of works, it may also grant something less than exclusive rights. The phrase "to their respective writings" means that only "writings" may be the subject of copyright. But the concept of a "writing" for copyright purposes has been liberally construed. The Court has held that photographic portraits and sound recordings constitute a "writing." Indeed, in Goldstein v. California (1973), the Court defined "writings" as "any physical rendering of the fruits of creative intellectual or aesthetic labor." A work that has not been physically fixed is ineligible for copyright protection.

In Goldstein the Court held that the copyright power is not exclusive, so that, subject to the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, the states retain concurrent power to enact copyright laws. Until adoption of the current Copyright Act in 1978 this reserved state power was significant, because most unpublished works were protected by so-called common law (or state law) copyright. However, under the current Copyright Act this area of state law has been largely preempted, so that most works, published or unpublished, are protected, if at all, under the federal act.

In recent years the courts have begun to question whether, and to what extent, the copyright laws are subject to the FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS guarantees of the FIRST AMENDMENT. If the First Amendment were literally applied it would invalidate the Copyright Act, since the act clearly abridges the freedom of speech and press of those who would engage in copyright infringement by copying from others. Nothing in the First Amendment limits the freedom protected thereunder to speech that is original with the speaker. Nor does the fact that the Constitution also grants to Congress the power to enact copyright laws render the First Amendment inapplicable. The First Amendment and the remainder of the BILL OF RIGHTS limit only those powers that have otherwise been confided to the federal government. If it did not modify such powers, it would have no meaning at all. The conflict between these two socially useful, yet antithetical, interests is, of course, capable of resolution. The Ninth Circuit held in Krofft v. McDonald's Corp. (1977), and the Supreme Court implicitly agreed in Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co. (1977), that "ideas" lie in the domain of the First Amendment, so that copyright may not be claimed therein, but that the form of "expression" of ideas may be the subject of copyright, notwithstanding the First Amendment.

MELVILLE B. NIMMER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Intellectual Property Law and the First Amendment.)

Bibliography

NIMMER, MELVILLE B. 1978 Copyright. 4 Vols. Albany, N.Y.: Matthew Bender & Co.

COPYRIGHT AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

See: Intellectual Property Law and the First Amendment

CORFIELD v. CORYELL

4 Wash. C.C. 371 (1823)
6 Fed. Case 546 (No. 3,230)

The importance of Justice BUSHROD WASHINGTON's circuit opinion derives from the fact that it contains the only exposition of Article IV, section 2, prior to the adoption of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, that also uses the phrase PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES. The clause in Article IV declares: "The Citizens of each state shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several states." Corfield arose because the plaintiff's vessel had been condemned under a state law forbidding nonresidents to take shell fish from state waters; in his TRESPASS action, the plaintiff relied upon the privileges and immunities clause. Washington declared, however, that the clause protected only the "fundamental" rights of CITIZENSHIP, such as the protection of government, the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, the right to move about freely, the right to claim the benefit of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS, the right to sue, and the right to vote if qualified. This category did not include the right to exploit the state's oyster beds.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Slaughterhouse Cases.)

CORNELIUS v. NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATIONAL FUND, INC.

473 U.S. 788 (1985)

This decision demonstrated how cumbersome the Supreme Court's analysis of PUBLIC FORUM issues has become since its decision in PERRY EDUCATION ASSOCIATION V. PERRY LOCAL EDUCATORS' ASSOCIATION (1983).

A 1983 EXECUTIVE ORDER limited the Combined Federal Campaign (CFC), a charity drive among federal employees, to charities that provide direct health and welfare services, and expressly excluded legal defense and advocacy groups. Seven such groups sued in federal district court, challenging their exclusion as a violation of the FIRST AMENDMENT. That court agreed, and issued an INJUNCTION forbidding exclusion of the groups from CFC. The court of appeals affirmed, but the Supreme Court reversed, 4–3, in an opinion by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR.

The Court held that the government had not designated either the federal workplace or CFC in particular as a public forum, in the sense of the Perry opinion. Rather, each of these was a "nonpublic forum"—a government operation in which communications could be limited to those promoting the operation's mission. CFC's purpose was to provide a means for government employees to lessen the government's burden in meeting human health and welfare needs, by making their own contributions to those ends. It was not necessary, in excluding the plaintiffs from CFC, to show that their solicitations would be incompatible with the goals of CFC; the relevant standard was the reasonableness of the exclusion. The President could reasonably conclude that money raised for direct provision of food or shelter was more beneficial than money raised for litigation or advocacy on behalf of the needy. Furthermore, the government could properly avoid the appearance of political favoritism by excluding all such groups. Those organizations had alternative means for raising funds from government employees, including direct mail advertising and in-person solicitation outside the workplace.

The Court, recognizing that other groups not in the business of direct provision of health and welfare services had been allowed to participate in CFC, remanded the case for determination whether the government had excluded the plaintiff groups for the purpose of suppressing their particular viewpoints.

Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, joined by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, dissented, arguing that any governmental exclusion of a class of speakers from any forum must be justified by a showing that the would-be speakers' intended use of the forum was incompatible with the relevant governmental operation. Here no such incompatibility had been shown, he said. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, also dissenting, expressed skepticism about the value of a DOCTRINE founded on a series of categories of forum. In this case, he said, the government's own arguments supported "the inference of bias" against the excluded groups.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

CORONADO COAL COMPANY v. UNITED MINE WORKERS

See: United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Company

CORPORATE CITIZENSHIP

In American constitutional law, business CORPORATIONS are not endowed with rights of CITIZENSHIP. Corporations can neither vote nor claim protections afforded by the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clauses of Article IV, section 2, and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. However, the Supreme Court has consistently refused to say that citizenship is a precondition for the exercise of numerous other rights granted to "the people" or to "persons" in the BILL OF RIGHTS or the Fourteenth Amendment. Political rights normally thought to be essential attributes of citizenship in a democratic political community—rights of speech, association, assembly, press, and DUE PROCESS—extend to noncitizens and citizens alike. With the important exceptions of the rights to vote and to hold office, the constitutional status of citizenship does not bar a noncitizen from exercising political rights, or from otherwise participating in political activities. The fact that citizenship does not stand as a barrier to the enjoyment of many basic political rights has also afforded the Court the opportunity to extend rights of political participation to corporations. Indeed, in FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON V. BELLOTTI (1978), the Court conferred FIRST AMENDMENT rights of speech upon business corporations. With this jurisprudential innovation, an ideological construct known as the "corporate citizen" acquired new meaning.

In early nineteenth-century American law, incorporation was a privilege that could be granted only by a special legislative act (a corporate charter) wherein the terms of incorporation (e.g., purpose of the business, limitations on debt and capitalization) were stipulated. Anglo-American law endowed the legal entity of the corporation with a life of its own; as a fictitious individual distinct from the corporeal membership, the corporate entity could exist in perpetuity. Historically, the attribution of constitutional rights to the entity has contributed to the expansion of corporate autonomy. This has protected business corporations against dictation by the state while it has allowed for regulation of corporate power in the public interest. The metamorphosis of the corporate entity from a highly regulated creature of government to a constitutionally protected "individual" began in the early nineteenth century when American jurists vested the entity with rights and legal capacities that afforded protection against hostile state LEGISLATION. Legal reasoning also provided ideological support for the corporation in what can be termed the doctrine of "corporate individualism." Originally a defense of the corporation's constitutional rights of PROPERTY, as well as an imposition of responsibility and liability, corporate individualism gradually merged with the entrepreneurial ethos of competitive industrial capitalism to justify an expanding corporate autonomy.

The legal DOCTRINE of corporate individualism first acquired ideological significance outside the law in political argument that personified the corporation as an individual within the competitive marketplace. Beginning in the late 1830s, this mystification promoted the liberalization of state incorporation laws by undermining the widely held perception of the corporation as an instrument of special privilege and monopoly. By 1870, most states had passed statutes making incorporation a right available to all capitalists rather than a privilege granted only to a few. Moreover, the corporate individual achieved an enhanced legal status when the corporate entity became a "person" within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment in Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad in 1886, an event that would facilitate the ascendancy of corporate power in industry and finance. By 1900, the business corporation had realized a significant measure of autonomy consistent with the protection afforded by property rights embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment's SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS doctrine of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, corporate leaders resorted to various means of regulating prices or combining capital in an effort to supplant competitive with cooperative methods of business. Widespread public opposition in the 1880s to the combination movement inspired Congress to pass the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT in 1890 to regulate monopolistic practices and unreasonable restraints of trade. However, in the absence of significant ANTITRUST enforcement in the mid-to-late 1890s, the combination movement gained momentum. Between 1898 and 1904, the first great merger wave of corporate capitalism transformed the very structure of the American economy. Far-reaching changes in the law of corporations greatly aided this development. Following New Jersey's lead in 1896, numerous state legislatures eliminated a host of traditional regulatory controls over their corporate creations and legalized mergers. During this same period, American jurists began to formulate the modern legal conception of the corporate entity as "real" or "natural." The "real entity theory"—by which corporations were understood as the natural and inevitable result of individuals seeking to operate efficently in the marketplace—further absorbed the personified corporate individual as it gradually supplanted the venerable "artificial entity theory" that viewed the corporation as a creature of government. This personified entity, therefore, both reflected and justified an accelerating progression toward corporate autonomy.

To many Americans during the Progressive era (1890–1916), laissez-faire ideology and its legal corollary, the doctrine of liberty of contract, seemed out of phase with economic and social realities. Having evolved from a legal protection of VESTED RIGHTS and the exclusive franchise into an ideological justification of the competitive marketplace, corporate individualism would undergo yet another ideological transfiguration in the era of the large corporation. Contrary to the precepts of laissez-faire liberalism, legal reasoning in the law of antitrust recognized not only that corporate power posed dangers to individual liberty and equality of opportunity, but that it also produced social and technological benefits when regulated in the public interest. In adopting the "RULE OF REASON in STANDARD OIL COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1911), Justice EDWARD D. WHITE explained that freedom to contract is the rule, but restraints of trade in practicing this freedom must be reasonable, as judged in light of the standard of fair competition. Supreme Court decisions thereafter articulated a business ethic of fairness that imposed on the corporate individual a legal and moral obligation to obey the law. In this way, the idea of corporate social responsibility in antitrust law provided an enduring rationale that would influence the evolving concept of corporate citizenship in constitutional law.

During the twentieth century, Supreme Court decisions enhanced the legal standing of the corporate citizen as the business corporation acquired constitutional rights under the First, FOURTH, Fifth, Sixth, and SEVENTH AMENDMENTS. The debate over the political rights of the corporation was first joined on the Supreme Court in Bellotti in 1978. In AUSTIN V. MICHIGAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE (1990), the Bellotti dissenters found themselves in the majority. Austin reformulates the issue of corporate political power debated in the Progressive era. It advances beyond the view that the threat posed by corporate power to democracy is rooted in corporate bribery and corruption of elected officials and asserts instead that the greater danger to electoral politics is the potential for large corporations to use their "immense aggregated wealth" to "distort" the political process. Austin invokes an ethic of fairness to define the rights of the corporate citizen with regard to candidate elections and thereby establishes a new standard of corporate social responsibility for the political MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS that is very similar, in principle, to that established by the rule of reason for the economic marketplace. However, in regulating corporate speech, the Supreme Court has conferred legitimacy on the corporate citizen which, as a member of the political community, can exercise its First and Fourteenth Amendment rights of political speech, press, petition, and association with minimal restrictions. With respect to the corporation's expanding constitutional freedoms, it is significant to note that Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, writing for a plurality in Pacific Gas and Electric Company v. California Public Utilities Commission (1986), did not distinguish negative First Amendment rights of corporations from those of real persons. In holding that a public utility cannot be compelled either to associate with disagreeable speech or to respond to others' views, Powell reasoned in effect that a business corporation possesses a mind or conscience. Thus corporate individualism and its ideological offspring, the corporate citizen, continue to justify and facilitate the widening scope of corporate power over economic, social, and political realms.

SCOTT R. BOWMAN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Corporate Power, Free Speech, and Democracy; Dartmouth College v. Woodward; Progressive Constitutional Thought.)

Bibliography

ARNOLD, THURMAN W. 1937 The Folklore of Capitalism. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

BOWMAN, SCOTT R. 1996 The Modern Corporation and American Political Thought: Law, Power, and Ideology. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.

BRUER, PATRICK J. 1992 Citizenship. Pages 145–147 in Kermit L. Hall, ed., The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press.

DODD, EDWIN MERRICK 1954 American Business Corporations Until 1860. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

HANDLIN, OSCAR and HANDLIN, MARY F. 1945 Origins of the American Business Corporation. Journal of Economic History 5:1–23.

HARTZ, LOUIS 1948 Economic Policy and Democratic Thought: Pennsylvania, 1776–1860. Chicago: Quadrangle Books.

HORWITZ, MORTON J. 1985 Santa Clara Revisited: The Development of Corporate Theory. West Virginia Law Review 88: 173–224.

HURST, JAMES WILLARD 1956 Law and the Conditions of Freedom in the Nineteenth-Century United States. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

MAYER, CARL J. 1990 Personalizing the Impersonal: Corporations and the Bill of Rights. Hastings Law Journal 41:577–667.

SKLAR, MARTIN J. 1988 The Corporate Reconstruction of American Capitalism, 1890–1916: The Market, The Law, and Politics. Cambridge, Eng.: Cambridge University Press.

CORPORATE FEDERALISM
(Historical Development)

Perhaps the most conspicuous aspect of the American federal system of government, aside from the continuing robustness of state government itself, is that CORPORATIONS in America are chartered overwhelmingly by the states and almost never by the national government. Despite the modern displacement and augmentation of state power by federal power in realms as diverse as criminal law and the regulation of morals, the power of states to create the corporations and other entities that conduct America's business affairs has steadfastly resisted federal encroachment. The United States is essentially alone among the commercialized industrial powers of the world in not allocating that power to the central governmental authority.

This allocation of power has long been controversial. Overwhelmingly, until the last quarter of the twentieth century, this allocation of governmental power has been regarded with hostility by those concerned with the parochialism of American state governments, with suspicion by historians explicating American political and institutional development, and with concern by economists committed to a planned economy. In these perspectives, the state power to charter corporations and control the existence of other business entities looked to be a "race to the bottom" in which states seeking the revenue provided by corporate chartering fees were the witting and unwitting pawns of businesses and those who controlled them. The states became pawns because corporations may freely do business in all states even though chartered by only one, and because they are also free to change their state of incorporation at will. Thus, businesses both covertly and overtly evaded or overcame regulations framed in the interest of shareholders and the larger public by pitting one state against another. Recently, however, scholars in economics and scholars in law influenced by them have posited a radical new interpretation of the allocation of the power to charter businesses. Congruent with the competitive principles of neoclassical economics, these scholars have reinterpreted the regime of state chartering as beneficial, not detrimental, both economically and politically. These scholars view the allocation of the power to charter businesses and its evolution not so much as evidence of the corruption of local politics, but as wealth- producing competition. This competitive process, these scholars suggest, is not necessarily corrupt but rather one that requires state governments to be attentive to the actual needs of successful businesses in a fluid and dynamic economy, balancing the necessary shareholder protection from incompetent and self-interested managers with managerial desire to obtain capital (from shareholders) cheaply, thus helping to maximize a business's production of wealth.

Proponents of each theory have propounded an admixture of history, economics, and political theory to make their claims. The story of FEDERALISM and the corporation thus has two components, one of which concerns the legal and economic nature of business entities and the other of which concerns the nature of the legal regime, constitutional, statutory, and COMMON LAW, relevant to the existence and status of those entities.

