The Supreme Court may be the ultimate interpreter of the Constitution in a particular case, but once it releases an opinion, it is helpless to control the political forces and pressures that shape constitutional meaning. In 1918 and again in 1922, the Court struck down congressional efforts to regulate child labor. The first statute, according to the Court, exceeded Congress's power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE because manufacturing was not "interstate commerce." The second statute, the Court held, exceeded the taxing power because the tax was really a "regulation." Despite these precedents, the New Deal Congress passed legislation in 1938 to regulate wages and hours in manufacturing, relying again on the commerce clause, and a unanimous Court overrode the 1918 child labor decision and upheld the statute in UNITED STATES V. DARBY LUMBER COMPANY (1941).

For a period of several decades in the twentieth century, the Supreme Court invoked its power of JUDICIAL REVIEW to restrict the power of Congress to regulate the national economy. These decisions did little more than delay the momentum for national control. In time, the constitutional meaning of interstate commerce and federalism fell almost exclusively to Congress and the President. In PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE COMPANY V. BENJAMIN (1946) the Court conceded: "the history of judicial limitation of congressional power over commerce, when exercised affirmatively, has been more largely one of retreat than of ultimate victory." In GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985) the Court essentially delegated to Congress the responsibility for defining federalism.

Relying on the commerce clause and its powers to enforce the Civil War amendments, Congress has taken the initiative to establish the constitutional rights of black citizens in such areas as education, housing, VOTING RIGHTS, employment, and equal access to PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS. Virtually all these legislative actions in recent decades have been sustained by the courts.

Dissenting in GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974), Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN claimed that the courts are "the ultimate arbiters of all disputes concerning clashes of constitutional values." Two hundred years of history present quite a different picture. Clashes of constitutional values are fought out in every arena—national and state—and within all of the branches of government. No single branch can claim ultimate control. Constitutional judgments of the courts are frequently overturned by the political branches.

In ZURCHER V. STANFORD DAILY (1978) the Court balanced the right of a free press against the needs of law enforcement officials and sided with the latter. In 1980, Congress passed legislation giving much greater protection to FIRST AMENDMENT interests. In United States v. Miller (1976) the Court supported the right of law enforcement agents to subpoena banks for information in a depositor's account. Two years later, Congress passed legislation that placed limits on warrantless searches of bank and credit records.

Another example of a Court-Congress dialogue, with Congress again defending constitutional rights left unprotected by the judiciary, is GOLDMAN V. WEINBERGER (1986). The Court upheld an Air Force regulation that prohibited an Orthodox Jew from wearing his yarmulke indoors while on duty. The Court reasoned that the Air Force's values of obedience, discipline, and unity outweighed any interference with the religious beliefs of Captain Goldman. Congress disagreed, passing legislation the next year that told the Air Force to change its regulation to permit officers and airmen to wear religious apparel while in uniform.

On special occasion, an authoritative and binding decision by the Supreme Court may be helpful in resolving a political impasse. The unanimous decision in COOPER V. AARON (1958) defused the smoldering Little Rock crisis, but the CIVIL RIGHTS stalemate persisted until the two political branches confronted the issue squarely and passed the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. This statute provided more of a "last word" on the constitutional rights of black citizens than any court decision, including such landmark rulings as BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954). Similarly, the unanimous decision in UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974) signaled a dramatic turn in the WATERGATE affair, leading to the resignation of President RICHARD M. NIXON, but the decision added little clarity to the constitutional meaning of EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE and even introduced new areas of confusion and uncertainty.

Sometimes an effort by the Court to announce the last word on a divisive constitutional issue simply backfires, attempting to do through the judiciary what must be accomplished through the political process. A notable example is the inaugural address by one President who explained that a difficult constitutional issue was before the Supreme Court, where it belonged, and that it would be "speedily and finally settled." The address was by JAMES BUCHANAN, two days before the Court announced the Dred Scott case.

The belief that the judiciary is the ultimate arbiter of constitutional issues finds no support in our history. The Court itself often shows a keen awareness that CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION is an exceedingly delicate and complex task that must be shared with Congress, the President, the states, and society at large.

LOUIS FISHER
(1992)

Bibliography

ANDREWS, WILLIAM G., ed. 1969 Coordinate Magistrates: Constitutional Law by Congress and the President. New York: Van Nostrand Reinhold.

FISHER, LOUIS 1988 Constitutional Dialogues: Interpretation as Political Process. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

MURPHY, WALTER F. 1986 Who Shall Interpret? The Quest for Ultimate Constitutional Interpreter. Review of Politics 48: 401–423.

NONJUDICIAL INTERPRETATION OF THE CONSTITUTION
(Update)

The Constitution of the United States demands interpretation. Its textual language is often less than clear, as is its surrounding history. As a result, ordinary citizens as well as constitutional scholars frequently debate the meaning of the Constitution's terms. Moreover, so too do government officials, legislative and executive, high and petty, in the numerous contexts in which the Constitution potentially constrains the performance of their duties. And of course judges, state and federal, and at all levels of the judicial hierarchy, must routinely engage in CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION in applying the law to the cases before them. In all of these settings, it is uncontroversial that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and that all other laws must be compatible with it, but it is often controversial just what it is that the Constitution means.

In situations in which there are no Supreme Court interpretations of the Constitution, government officials, including those sitting as judges of state courts and lower federal courts, must interpret the Constitution for themselves. In these circumstances, no question arises regarding the propriety of such officials doing the best they can to interpret the Constitution that both informs and constrains their work.

When the Supreme Court has offered an interpretation of some constitutional provision, however, a new question arises, because it is controversial whether lower court judges and nonjudicial officials must obey what they believe to be erroneous interpretations of the Constitution just because those interpretations come from the Supreme Court. May such lower court judges and nonjudicial officials follow their own interpretations of the Constitution regardless of what the Supreme Court has said?

The responses to this question, both in judicial opinions and in the scholarly literature, fall into three broad categories. One response denies to Supreme Court interpretations any binding force except in the specific case in which the interpretation was offered. In support of this position, some commentators argue that Article III of the Constitution, which describes and creates the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES and thus the power of the Supreme Court, restricts the power of the federal courts to the decision of CASES AND CONTROVERSIES. Thus, although the Supreme Court may bind the parties and the lower courts to its interpretation in the particular case before it—a power that follows from the very idea of a supreme court—the Supreme Court has no power to bind officials or courts in other cases to its interpretation. Indeed, according to this position, the Court has no power even to bind itself, through the DOCTRINE of STARE DECISIS, to any constitutional interpretation that it subsequently deems to be erroneous.

This position, which denies to the Supreme Court the power to bind anyone other than the litigants and lower courts in particular cases, strikes many observers as anarchical, inevitably productive to an unworkable cacophony of conflicting constitutional interpretations. A second and less-extreme position, therefore, holds that Supreme Court interpretations of the Constitution should be accorded considerable but not absolute weight by courts other than the Supreme Court, and should be accorded moderate weight by the Supreme Court itself. Under this position, the fact of an existing Supreme Court interpretation is relevant (but not necessarily dispositive) in an authoritative and not merely persuasive way in cases other than the case in which the interpretation first arose. Especially with respect to interpretations by legislative and executive officials, the details of this position are often less than clear, since there is a great deal of room to maneuver around the question of what it is for a decision to have "considerable" but not "absolute" authoritative force. Thus, commentators who hold this second position have diverse views about when officials should act contrary to Supreme Court interpretations that those officials believe to be erroneous. All agree that some "dialogue" between the Court and other branches of government is a good thing and conducive to better constitutional interpretation, but there is disagreement about what is to happen when disagreement persists even after the most robust dialogue.

The third position, which is the one the authors endorse, accords Supreme Court interpretations of the Constitution the status of supreme law of the land, and thus the status that the Constitution declares itself to have. According to this position, a Supreme Court interpretation of the Constitution becomes part of the Constitution for all practical purposes, and to lower court judges and nonjudicial officials there should be no difference between what the Constitution says and what the Supreme Court says the Constitution says. (The most extreme version of this position would make Supreme Court interpretations authoritative for the Supreme Court itself in later cases; and at a minimum this position entails that such interpretations may not be overturned by the Court merely because the Court thinks them wrong.) Undergirding this position is a respect for the values of consistency and uniformity that support the reason for having a constitution in the first place. The virtue of a constitution is not in the fact that it takes a position on controversial issues of political morality, but that it settles controversial issues of political morality. Insofar as the meaning of the Constitution itself remains unsettled, this central function and virtue of constitutionalism remains unsatisfied. A Supreme Court interpretation of the Constitution, if given the authoritative status of the Constitution itself, can provide the settlement that the Constitution is meant to provide but often does not.

The Supreme Court itself has endorsed this third position in COOPER V. AARON (1958), and again more recently in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997). That the Supreme Court itself has endorsed the position, however, is neither surprising nor dispositive, for the question of what weight others should give to Supreme Court interpretations cannot be settled by the Supreme Court itself. Thus, the question is not what the Supreme Court has said about the authoritativeness of its own interpretations, but whether this position—JUDICIAL SUPREMACY (but not exclusivity) with respect to matters of constitutional interpretation—best serves the goals of a constitutional system. And although such a view might on occasion produce excess deference to erroneous Supreme Court interpretations, the opposing view might, on even more frequent occasions, produce an unwillingness in the executive and legislative branches to take seriously the idea that the Constitution constrains and thus invalidates even some outcomes that might be desirable, in the short run, on both policy and political grounds. The question is therefore not whether the Supreme Court is in some way a "better" interpreter than the other branches. Rather, it is whether, in light of the relevant systemic incentives and goals, a system of authoritative Supreme Court interpretation of the Constitution will produce better results, in the aggregate and in the long term, than a system in which each judge, each legislator, and each executive official may decide for himself or herself what the Constitution means.

LARRY ALEXANDER
FREDERICK SCHAUER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Religious Freedom Restoration Act.)

Bibliography

ALEXANDER, LARRY and SCHAUER, FREDERICK 1997 On Extrajudicial Constitutional Interpretation. Harvard Law Review 110:1359–1387.

DEVINS, NEAL and FISHER, LOUIS 1998 Judicial Exclusivity and Political Instability. Virginia Law Review 84:83–106.

NAGEL, ROBERT F. 1998 Judicial Supremacy and the Settlement Function. William and Mary Law Review 39:849–864.

PAULSEN, MICHAEL STOKES 1994 The Most Dangerous Branch: Executive Power to Say What the Law Is. Georgetown Law Journal 83:217–345.

SYMPOSIUM 1987 Perspectives on the Authoritativeness of Supreme Court Opinions. Tulane Law Review 61:977–1095.

NONMARITAL CHILDREN

Beginning with Mills v. Hableutzel (1982), the Supreme Court invalidated a series of laws that sharply limited the time during which a paternity suit might be brought to secure child support from the father of a child born outside marriage. In Mills, a Texas law imposed a limitation of one year from the birth of the child; the state imposed no limit on the time in which such a suit could be brought against the father of a child born within marriage. The Court was unanimous in striking down the law, and five Justices added their view that even a longer limitations period might be invalid. In Pickett v. Brown (1983) the Court was again unanimous; a two-year limitation imposed by Tennessee was held invalid. These two opinions did little to clear up the confusion in the Court's earlier discussions of the appropriate STANDARD OF REVIEW in cases involving nonmarital children.

In Clark v. Jeter (1988), however, the Court—again unanimously—held invalid Pennsylvania's six-year limitation period for such a lawsuit. Now Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR wrote for the Court, explicitly holding that discrimination based on "ILLEGITIMACY" must survive the intermediate scrutiny that the Court had been using in cases of SEX DISCRIMINATION. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of this series of decisions is that Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST (by 1988, Chief Justice) joined in the move to heighten judicial scrutiny, a step he had refused to take in earlier times. Some commentators have detected a move to the center of the Court on the part of the Chief Justice in these cases. His concurrence in the result of the sex discrimination case of UNITED STATES V. VIRGINIA (1996) similarly embraces the intermediate scrutiny standard he had resisted during its formative years.

KENNETH L. KARST
(2000)

NONTESTIMONIAL COMPULSION

See: Testimonial and Nontestimonial Compulsion

NORMAN v. BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY

See: Gold Clause Cases

NORRIS, GEORGE W.
(1861–1944)

George William Norris, a progressive Republican from Nebraska, served in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES from 1903 to 1913. He led the revolt against Speaker Joseph Cannon that, in 1910, broke the power of the speaker to control virtually all legislation in the house. As a United States senator (1913–1943) Norris was the author of the TWENTIETH AMENDMENT, which ended the "lame duck" sessions of Congress, and co-author of the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT (1932), which outlawed YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS and restricted use of federal court INJUNCTIONS against labor strikes, and of the TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT (1933). Norris supported most of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's "NEW DEAL" and criticized Supreme Court decisions that held such legislation unconstitutional. Although he favored a constitutional amendment to restrict national JUDICIAL REVIEW, he opposed Roosevelt's plan to pack the Court with pro-administration justices.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

LOWITT, RICHARD 1963–1978 George W. Norris. 3 Vols. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press; Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press.

NORRIS v. ALABAMA
294 U.S. 587 (1935)

Clarence Norris, one of the Scottsboro boys (see POWELL V. ALABAMA), on retrial moved to quash the INDICTMENT and trial venire (pool of potential jurors) on the ground that qualified black citizens were systematically excluded from jury service solely on the basis of race. On denial of his motion by the trial judge, Norris was retried and again found guilty. The state supreme court affirmed the JUDGMENT of the trial court that no JURY DISCRIMINATION existed. The Supreme Court, voting 8–0, reversed the judgment after reviewing the evidence for itself for the first time in such a case. The evidence showed that for a generation or more no black person had been called for jury service in the county and that a substantial number of black persons qualified under state law. In an opinion by Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, the Court ruled that the evidence of black exclusion made a prima facie case of denial of the EQUAL PROTECTION guaranteed by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Norris began a line of cases that led to the virtual extinction of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in the composition of juries.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT
47 Stat. 70 (1932)

Reeling from a string of adverse court decisions, labor saw the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932 as Congress's long overdue remedy for Supreme Court antipathy. A panel of experts, including Professor FELIX FRANKFURTER, helped to draft a bill to end the abuse of labor INJUNCTIONS, and, as eventually passed by large majorities in Congress, the act greatly diminished the use of federal injunctions in labor disputes. The act recognized the need for COLLECTIVE BARGAINING and encouraged union formation, ending years of misinterpretation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the CLAYTON ACT. One of the key provisions of the new act (section 4) outlawed the issuance of federal injunctions against those who "whether acting singly or in concert" might strike, aid, or publicize strikes, join unions, or assemble peacefully. YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS, sustained in HITCHMAN COAL COKE COMPANY V. MITCHELL (1917), were also rendered unenforceable (section 3). In DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS COMPANY V. DEERING (1921) the Court had unjustifiably declared that the Clayton Act provision covering labor disputes applied only to related parties, employer and employee, not to those engaged in a secondary boycott. Section 13 rewrote that practice by redefining "labor dispute" so that the parties need no longer be in "proximate relation" to each other. Although the act divested federal courts of injunctive power, it provided exceptions where illegal acts or injury were likely. Moreover, the employers had to make "every reasonable effort" to negotiate a settlement before seeking an injunction (section 8).

The act's explicitly stated purpose was to foster labor's right to organize and act without federal judicial interference. The act created no new substantive rights but enlarged the area in which labor could operate. The act's procedures would be upheld in Lauf v. E. G. Shinner

Company (1938) and its substance upheld in New Negro Alliance v. Sanitary Grocery Company (1938).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

32 I.L.M. 296 (Parts One Through Three) 32 I.L.M. 612 (Parts Four Through Eight) (1993)

The North American Free Trade Agreement between the Government of the United States of America, the Government of Canada, and the Government of the United Mexican States (NAFTA) was signed on December 17, 1992 by Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, Mexican President Carlos Salinas de Gortari, and U.S. President GEORGE H. W. BUSH. The U.S. government concluded NAFTA as a congressional–executive agreement, pursuant to a delegation of "fast track" negotiating authority set forth in section 1103 of the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988 and section 151 of the Trade Act of 1974. The North American Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act—the vehicle for congressional approval and implementation of the Agreement—passed the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES on November 17, 1993 by a 234–200 margin, and then passed the U.S. SENATE on November 20 by a 61–38 vote. President WILLIAM J. CLINTON signed the bill on December 8, enabling NAFTA to enter into force on January 1, 1994.

NAFTA consists of eight parts organized into twenty-two chapters (plus scores of annexes and schedules), which together liberalize North American trade in goods and services. Whether a good qualifies for the application of NAFTA's trade-liberalizing rules is determined by the Rules of Origin (chapter four). The principle of national treatment must be applied to all qualifying goods and services. Tariffs, quotas, and other trade restrictions on qualifying goods are eliminated over a ten-year period. By eliminating these barriers to "substantially all trade" between the constituent territories, NAFTA is a free trade agreement within the meaning of Article XXIV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. In addition, NAFTA liberalizes investment rules, requires protection of intellectual property, provides for temporary entry of business persons, and disciplines the parties' customs procedures, government procurement practices, administration of antidumping and countervailing duty laws, use of technical barriers to trade, and application of sanitary and phytosanitary measures. Several academic and government studies suggest that these NAFTA rules are causing a shift of some labor-intensive production to Mexico and some production requiring high-skilled labor to the United States and Canada.

While party governments may employ NAFTA's general dispute settlement procedures (chapter twenty), natural or legal PERSONS other than the party governments generally lack STANDING to participate in NAFTA dispute settlement. However, nationals of the parties may appeal party antidumping or countervailing duty determinations directly to a NAFTA dispute settlement panel (chapter nineteen), and certain disputes between a party and an investor of another party may be settled by binding arbitration (chapter eleven).

The Free Trade Commission, comprising cabinet-level representatives of the parties or their designees, carries out the agreement's implementation, elaboration, and supervision. Commission decisions must be taken by consensus. The commission is serviced by a secretariat that is often referred to as a "virtual secretariat," because each country houses in its capital its own "national Section" of the trinational secretariat.

Environmental and labor concerns associated with North American trade liberalization led to the conclusion of three supplementary international agreements: the North American Agreement on Environmental Cooperation, the Agreement Concerning the Establishment of a Border Environment Cooperation Commission and a North American Development Bank, and the North American Agreement on Labor Cooperation.

Of several challenges to NAFTA's constitutionality, three have generated significant debate. First, since congressional debate began on approval and implementation of NAFTA, Laurence Tribe and others have asserted that NAFTA should not have been concluded as a congressional–executive agreement, a device that is nowhere contemplated in the Constitution and that Tribe argues is unconstitutional. Instead, they assert that NAFTA should have been concluded as a TREATY pursuant to Article II, subject to approval by two-thirds of the Senate present—a proportion of Senate support that NAFTA did not garner. Despite this challenge, the prevailing view set forth in the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States is that the congressional–executive agreement can be used as an alternative to the treaty method in every instance. Legal scholars Louis Henkin, Myres McDougal, and Detlev Vagts have advanced this latter view at various times in the last fifty years. And in the context of this NAFTA debate, Bruce Ackerman and David Golove offered a political–historical explanation for the development and legitimacy of congressional–executive agreements as interchangeable with treaties.

Second, some have argued that NAFTA's chapter nineteen provision for appeal of a party's antidumping or countervailing duty decision to NAFTA dispute settlement contravenes Article III, which vests "[t]he judicial Power of the United States . . . in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may establish." However, the prevailing view appears to be that chapter nineteen dispute settlement panels are legitimate "courts" because the governmental interest in establishing and maintaining NAFTA outweighs individual traders' interests in review by constitutional courts. Therefore, chapter nineteen would survive the BALANCING TEST set forth in Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. Schor (1986).

Finally, some have argued that chapter nineteen of NAFTA contravenes the APPOINTMENTS CLAUSE because chapter nineteen dispute settlement panelists are required to interpret and apply U.S. antidumping and countervailing duty law. Hence, the panelists appear to be "exercising significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States," which would place them within the definition of "Officers of the United States" set forth in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976) and so require compliance with the appointments clause procedure. However, the prevailing view among commentators who advised Congress during the NAFTA debate is that the panels will in actuality be international bodies exercising their authority pursuant to an international agreement, thus rendering the clause inapplicable. Despite the view that chapter nineteen would survive constitutional scrutiny, the NAFTA implementing LEGISLATION did establish special procedures for constitutional challenges to the panel system.

RICHARD H. STEINBERG
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Executive Agreement.)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE and GOLOVE, DAVID 1995 Is NAFTA Constitutional? Harvard Law Review 108:799–929.

BELLO, JUDITH H.; HOLMER, ALAN F.; and NORTON, JOSEPH J., eds. 1994 The North American Free Trade Agreement: A New Frontier in International Trade and Investment in the Americas. Washington, D.C.: American Bar Association.

BOYER, ETHAN 1996 Article III, the Foreign Relations Power, and the Binational Panel System of NAFTA. International Tax and Business Lawyer 13:101–142.

DAVEY, WILLIAM J. 1992 The Appointments Clause and International Dispute Settlement Mechanisms: A False Conflict. Washington and Lee Law Review 49:1315–1328.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1995 Taking Text and Structure Seriously: Reflections on Free-Form Method In Constitutional Interpretation. Harvard Law Review 108:1221–1303.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY
63 Stat. 2241 (1949)

Following WORLD WAR II, the Soviet Union rapidly expanded its influence in Eastern and Central Europe. Fearing a further "Communist offensive," the West, led initially by Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, and the United States, negotiated the North Atlantic Treaty which, it was hoped, would deter Soviet expansionism. The treaty was signed by twelve countries on April 4, 1949, and presently lists a total of sixteen countries among its signatories. The primary objectives of the treaty are as stated in its preamble: "to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area" and "to unite . . . for collective defense and for the preservation of peace and security." The treaty stipulates that "an armed attack against one or more of the [State] Parties in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all" and that, in the event of such an attack, each State Party shall take "such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area." Some commentators have suggested that this language may effect an unconstitutional delegation of United States authority to declare war. The argument is of minimal concern, however, inasmuch as Article 11 of the treaty provides that all of the treaty's provisions shall be "carried out by the Parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes." The discretionary language of Article 5 ("such action as it deems necessary") reinforces this conclusion.

BURNS H. WESTON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Status of Forces Agreement; Treaty Power.)

Bibliography

FOX, WILLIAM T. and SCHILLING, WARNER R., eds. 1973 European Security and the Atlantic System. New York: Columbia University Press.

SAULLE, MARIA RITA 1979 NATO and Its Activities. Dobbs Ferry, N.Y.: Oceana Publications.

NORTHERN PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION COMPANY v. MARATHON PIPE LINE COMPANY
458 U.S. 50 (1982)

If Congress were to make a wholesale transfer of JURISDICTION over matters within the JUDICIAL POWER of the United States to ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES or LEGISLATIVE COURTS, the result would be a serious risk of undermining the independence of the judiciary. Then, under what circumstances can Congress make any such transfer? The question blurs constitutional doctrine with practical statecraft. In Marathon the Supreme Court had an opportunity to illuminate this subject, which has long seemed impervious to light.

In the BANKRUPTCY ACT (1978) Congress created a category of bankruptcy judges, who would hold office not during good behavior (as do judges of CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS) but for fourteen-year terms. The act authorized the bankruptcy judges to decide not only matters peculiar to bankruptcy, such as the marshaling and distribution of assets and the discharge of bankrupts from certain liabilities, but also "related" matters, including actions on behalf of bankrupts against other persons, based on state law. The Supreme Court, 6–3, held that the grant of jurisdiction over the "related" matters exceeded the limits of Article III.

Four Justices concluded that federal jurisdiction over matters not involving "public rights"—dealings between the national government and others, or subject to that government's regulation—must be vested in constitutional courts, with certain limited exceptions. Three Justices espoused balancing Article III's concerns for judicial independence against other practical needs of administering the governmental system. Neither view commanded a majority of the Court, and the doctrinal murk deepened.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Thomas v. Union Carbide Agricultural Products Co.)

NORTHERN SECURITIES CO. v. UNITED STATES
193 U.S. 197 (1904)

A bare majority of the Supreme Court, in a broad construction of congressional power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, upheld the constitutionality of the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT as applied to holding companies. The Court thus extended the scope of the Sherman Act to companies not directly engaged in such commerce which nevertheless controlled INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The formation in 1901 of the Northern Securities Company, a holding company comprising both the Hill-Morgan and the Harriman interests, united parallel competing lines. In March 1902, the government filed an EQUITY suit to dissolve the company. The question was clear: was a holding company, whose subsidiaries' operations were its only connection with interstate commerce, exempt from the Sherman Act? The Court split 5–4 but without a majority opinion.

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, for the plurality, followed UNITED STATES V. TRANS-MISSOURI FREIGHT ASSOCIATION (1897) and other cases, arguing that the Sherman Act established competition as a test for interstate commerce. Harlan declared that a combination need not be directly in commerce to restrain it: intent to restrain or potential for restraint was all that was needed, and here potential restraint could be found in the reduction of competition resulting from the holding company's formation. Harlan refused to interpret the statute using the RULE OF REASON. He also broadly construed the commerce clause, curtly dismissing defense allegations that the INJUNCTION violated state sovereignty and the TENTH AMENDMENT. Justice DAVID J. BREWER concurred only in Harlan's result. Abandoning his earlier opinions, Brewer now embraced the rule of reason but concluded that even under that rule the Northern Securities Company clearly constituted an unlawful restraint of trade.

Justices EDWARD D. WHITE and OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES each wrote dissents. The former followed the definition of interstate commerce in UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT COMPANY (1895), stressing that stock ownership did not place the defendants within the scope of the Sherman Act. Holmes's first written dissent on the Supreme Court emphasized a COMMON LAW reading of the statute. He believed that the holding company device was neither a combination nor a contract in restraint of trade. Holmes asserted that this case so nearly resembled Knight as to require no deviation from that opinion.

Counted by THEODORE ROOSEVELT "one of the greatest achievements of my administration because it emphasized the fact that the most powerful men in this country were held to accountability before the law," this decision's importance lay both in Harlan's insistence on the supremacy of federal law and in the reinvigoration of a law that business had hoped the Court rendered ineffectual in Knight.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

APPEL, R. W., JR. 1975 The Case of the Monopolistic Railroadman. In John A. Garraty, ed., Quarrels That Have Shaped the Constitution. New York: Harper & Row.

NORTHWESTERN FERTILIZER CO. v. HYDE PARK
97 U.S. 659 (1878)

In 1867 the Illinois legislature chartered the company for a term of fifty years to manufacture fertilizer, from dead animals, outside the city limits of Chicago. The nearby village of Hyde Park regarded the company's factory as an unendurable nuisance, injurious to the public health. Immediately before the legislature chartered the company it empowered the village to abate public nuisances excepting the company. The village passed an ordinance prohibiting the existence of any company engaged in any offensive or unwholesome business within a distance of one mile. The ordinance put the fertilizer company out of business. It invoked its chartered rights against the ordinance, which it claimed violated the CONTRACT CLAUSE.

On the basis of past decisions the Court should have accepted the company's argument, holding that the village had no authority to abate its factory. By a vote of 7–1, however, the Supreme Court ruled that the village had validly exercised its police power to protect the public health. Justice NOAH SWAYNE for the Court declared that the company's charter must be construed narrowly and held that it provided no exemption from liability or nuisances. Swayne quoted from the decision earlier that term in BOSTON BEER CO. V. MASSACHUSETTS in which the Court announced the DOCTRINE of INALIENABLE POLICE POWER. Both cases had the result of weakening the contract clause's traditional protection of chartered rights.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

NORTHWEST ORDINANCE
(1787)

This congressional enactment, which applied to the territory northwest of the Ohio River, was the most significant accomplishment of the United States under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. In effect the ordinance provided for self-government under constitutional law in the TERRITORIES, thus "solving" a colonial problem by avoiding it. The pattern for government, which subsequently was extended to other western territories, allowed for growth from a system of congressional government to statehood and admission to the Union "on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever. . . ." As soon as a district reached a population of 5,000 males of voting age, each one possessing a fifty-acre freehold was entitled to vote for representatives to a general assembly. The assembly had authority to elect a delegate to Congress with the right to debate but not to vote. When the population reached 60,000, the territory could apply for admission as a state, on condition that it had a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT and a state constitution. Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin were formed out of the Northwest Territory; this ordinance established a model for territorial governance and the admission of other states in the American West.

The ordinance was the first federal document to contain a bill of rights. To extend "the fundamental principles of civil and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY," Congress provided articles that were to have constitutional status, remaining "forever . . . unalterable" except by common consent. These articles guaranteed that the inhabitants of a territory should always be entitled to the writ of HABEAS CORPUS, TRIAL BY JURY, representative government, and judicial proceedings "according to the course of the COMMON LAW" (in effect, a provision for DUE PROCESS OF LAW.) As an extra safeguard the articles encapsulated a provision from MAGNA CARTA by insuring that no person should be deprived of liberty or property "but by the judgment of his peers, or the LAW OF THE LAND." In addition, the articles protected the right to BAIL except in capital cases, enjoined that all fines should be "moderate," and prohibited CRUEL OR UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT. Another article that provided a federal precedent for a similar provision in the BILL OF RIGHTS of the Constitution of the United States dealt with EMINENT DOMAIN: no person's property could be taken except in a public exigency, when he must be fully compensated for its value. The CONTRACT CLAUSE of the Constitution also originated in this ordinance: one article declared that no law should ever be made or have force that in any manner interfered with or affected existing private contracts made in good faith and without fraud. Other articles encouraged "schools and the means of education" and protected Indian lands and liberties. One provision of the ordinance had the effect of reducing sex discrimination in land ownership and preventing the introduction of the law of primogeniture; it ordained that the property of anyone dying intestate (without a will) should be distributed in equal parts to all children or next of kin. The ordinance also protected the religious sentiments and modes of worship of all orderly persons, without exception, and in a precedent-making clause declared, "There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude" in the Northwest Territory or states formed from it. The ordinance, which was probably drafted in the main by RUFUS KING and NATHAN DANE, remains one of the most constructive and influential legislative acts in American history.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

PHILBRICK, FRANCIS S. 1965 The Rise of the New West, 1754–1830. Pages 120–133. New York: Harper & Row.

NORTZ v. UNITED STATES

See: Gold Clause Cases

NOTICE

When unsure what is right, American society often falls back on a process in which people on all sides of a disputed question have their say before a decision is rendered. Moreover, even if one cannot participate in a governmental decision, our notions of the state require that one know in advance the standards by which officials will judge us. To have one's say or to conform one's behavior to a standard one must know of the proceeding or the standard. Because such knowledge is so essential to this scheme of things, the Constitution at numerous points requires that those affected by governmental actions receive notice.

Clauses as diverse and specific as the requirement that Congress publish a journal and the prohibitions against EX POST FACTO laws and BILLS OF ATTAINDER, as well as the more general requirements of the DUE PROCESS clauses require notice in various circumstances. Because of its generality the due process clause has generated most of the litigation about constitutionally required notice. In PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS cases courts have struggled to distinguish two situations: those in which persons need have only the opportunity of finding out about contemplated government actions, and situations in which they must receive more individualized attention. The maxim that ignorance of the law is no excuse expresses the proposition that the legislature need not tell each of us that it has passed some law. We rely instead on the hope that our legislators represent us and on the opportunity we have to adjust our behavior after the law takes effect. The Supreme Court has, however, required that laws defining criminal acts be sufficiently specific to enable persons who do look at them to tell what acts are prohibited.

As the focus of government attention narrows from all citizens (the subject of statutes) to more specific contexts, the Constitution requires more elaborate and specific forms of notice, notice that is often linked with a subsequent hearing. Thus the Court has not required the Colorado legislature to notify all the citizens of Denver before altering their property assessments, but it has required notice (and a hearing) for individual property owners on a block to be assessed on the basis of frontage feet. Similarly with administrative or judicial adjudication: persons whose property or liberty stands in jeopardy must receive notice of the threatened governmental action.

Even in such individual adjudication, however, due process requires only that parties who will be bound by official decisions receive the best notice practicable given the circumstances. For example, in a suit to approve the trustee's stewardship of a common trust fund with more than a hundred beneficiaries, the Court required individual notice only to those beneficiaries who could easily be located; members of the group thus notified shared an interest with the unnotified and would represent them, the Court said in Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank Trust (1950).

Once it has notified them with appropriate specificity, government requires much of its citizens; until such notice, however, it can require little.

STEPHEN C. YEAZELL
(1986)

Bibliography

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Chap. 10. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

NOXIOUS PRODUCTS DOCTRINE

The first step in development of a NATIONAL POLICE POWER was the "noxious products doctrine," which Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN propounded in CHAMPION V. AMES (1903). According to this doctrine, Congress has the power to prohibit INTERSTATE COMMERCE in any item that is so injurious to the public—in this case, lottery tickets—as to pollute the commerce of which it is a part. In HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918), the doctrine became a limitation on the commerce power: because the products of child labor were not inherently more harmful than those of adult labor, Congress lacked power to forbid their interstate transportation. The doctrine was abandoned after UNITED STATES V. DARBY LUMBER (1941).

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

NUDE DANCING

Is a sexually titillating dance performed in a bar or in a booth at an "adult" bookstore by a totally nude woman speech protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT? Or is it conduct that can be banned by state or local regulation? For decades the Supreme Court avoided deciding this question. For instance, in SCHAD V. VILLAGE OF MT. EPHRAIM (1981) the Court invoked the OVERBREADTH DOCTRINE to invalidate a citywide ban on all live entertainment, including nude dancing in a booth in an adult bookstore. Earlier and more dubiously, the Court in California v. La Rue (1972) invoked the state's power under the TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT to regulate alcohol as a basis for upholding a ban on nude dancing in places where liquor was served—a rationale subsequently disavowed in 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island (1996). It was not until 1991, in Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., that the Court finally reached the merits of the FREEDOM OF SPEECH issues raised by the prohibition of nude dancing. The Court held that although totally nude dancing was expressive conduct entitled to some First Amendment protection, it could nonetheless be banned. The Court in Barnes was sharply divided, both as to result and rationale. Five justices (Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, and Justices SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, ANTONIN SALIA, and DAVID H. SOUTER) held that Indiana could constitutionally apply its general ban on public nudity to forbid totally nude dancing in bars and adult bookstores. Four Justices (BYRON R. WHITE, THURGOOD MARSHALL, HARRY A. BLACKMUN, and JOHN PAUL STEVENS) found that applying the ban on public nudity to nude dancing violated the First Amendment.

Although four opinions were issued in Barnes, no opinion spoke for a majority. Writing for a plurality consisting of himself, Kennedy, and O'Connor, Rehnquist grudgingly acknowledged that nude dancing was expressive conduct "within the outer perimeters of the First Amendment [although] only marginally so." As such it was entitled to the protection provided by the four-part test of UNITED STATES V. O'BRIEN (1968). Under O'Brien, regulation of expressive conduct will be upheld if "it is within the constitutional power of government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest." Applying O'Brien, the PLURALITY OPINION found Indiana's ban on public nudity constitutional "despite its incidental limitations on some expressive activity." The prohibition reflected "moral disapproval of people appearing nude among strangers in public places." The plurality found that the ban on public nudity was thus "clearly within the constitutional power of the state" and that it "furthers a substantial government interest in protecting order and morality." The plurality also concluded that this interest was "unrelated to the suppression of free expression." Rehnquist's opinion rejected the argument that the reason Indiana applied its ban on public nudity to nude dancing was to prevent its erotic message, emphasizing that the state equally prevents public nudity with little, if any, erotic message, such as nude sunbathing on public beaches. "Public nudity is the evil the State seeks to prevent," explained the Chief Justice, "whether or not it is combined with expressive activity." Finally, the plurality concluded that "the incidental restriction on First Amendment freedom [was] no greater than is essential to the furtherance of the governmental interest." The prohibition on public nudity, the plurality explained, "is not a means to some greater end, but an end in itself." Additionally, the restriction was in the plurality's view "narrowly tailored," since Indiana required only that the dancers wear "pasties and G-strings," the "bare minimum" (so to speak) "necessary to achieve the State's purpose."

The most controversial part of the plurality's analysis is the holding that the state's interest in promoting morality qualifies as a "substantial or important" justification for banning expressive activity protected by the First Amendment. In support of this holding the plurality relies on two cases, Paris Adult Theater I v. Slaton (1973) and BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986). In both cases the Court held that the state may legitimately enact morals legislation. However, these cases found only that the state's interest in morality supplied a "legitimate" or a RATIONAL BASIS for legislation; neither suggested that this interest was sufficiently weighty to justify the prohibition of a constitutionally protected activity. Thus in Bowers it was only after finding that the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT did not confer a FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT to engage in homosexual sodomy that the Court held that the state's interest in morality provided a rational basis for banning such conduct. Similarly, Slaton held only that the state had a "legitimate" interest in promoting morality, and therefore might invoke this interest to ban OBSCENITY, material long held to be without First Amendment protection.

Concurring in the JUDGMENT in Barnes, Scalia took a very different approach. Because Indiana's ban on public nudity was a general law regulating conduct and not specifically directed at expression, Scalia would have found the regulation "not subject to First Amendment scrutiny at all." In his view, where there is no constitutional protection of the activity at issue, the state's interest in promoting morality provides a constitutionally sufficient justification for banning the activity. Scalia thus would abandon the "intermediate" level of First Amendment protection extended to expressive conduct by the four-part O'Brien test. Such a development would not, he insisted, mean that expressive conduct would be bereft of all First Amendment protection. "Where the government prohibits conduct precisely because of its communicative attributes," Scalia explained, the regulation is unconstitutional. If, on the other hand, the government can adduce some speech-neutral justification for the regulation, such as promoting morality in the case of nude dancing, "that is the end of the matter so far as First Amendment guarantees are concerned." In essence, Scalia would adopt the third part of the O'Brien test as the sole criterion for measuring the First Amendment validity of state regulation of expressive conduct. Such limited scrutiny of laws of general applicability despite their impact on fundamental rights would mirror the Court's controversial approach to the First Amendment right of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY under the free exercise clause developed in Scalia's opinion for the Court in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990).

Souter also concurred in the judgment upholding Indiana's ban on public nudity as applied to nude dancing in bars and adult bookstores. He agreed with the plurality that nude dancing is entitled to "a degree of First Amendment protection" and that the appropriate level of protection is provided by the four-part O'Brien analysis. Unlike the plurality and Scalia, however, Souter did not invoke the state's interest in morality. Rather, he relied exclusively on the state's interest in combating the pernicious "secondary effects" said to be caused by this type of nude dancing, including prostitution and sexual assaults. In RENTON (CITY OF) V. PLAYTIME THEATRES, INC. (1986), the Court found that a city's interest in avoiding similar "secondary effects" provided a legitimate, speech-neutral justification for imposing onerous ZONING requirements on movie theaters showing sexually oriented films. In concluding that this "secondary effects" rationale supported a total ban on activity protected by the First Amendment, however, Souter significantly increased the speech restrictive impact of this rationale.

The four dissenting Justices, in an opinion by White, agreed with the plurality and Souter that the nude dancing at issue was expressive conduct protected by the First Amendment. The DISSENTING OPINION, however, took issue with the plurality's basic premise, shared by Scalia, that Indiana's regulation was a general prohibition of conduct. White pointed out that the ban on nudity did not apply in the home. This observation seems wide of the mark. As Scalia notes, the rationale for the ban was not that nudity was immoral but that public nudity was immoral. The dissent offered a stronger argument that the nudity ban was not truly general, claiming that the ban did not apply to nudity in theatrical productions such as "Hair" or to nudity in ballets or operas such as "Salome." The dissent also disagreed with the conclusion that the purpose of the ban was unrelated to the expressive aspect of nude dancing. In the dissent's view it was the "emotions and feelings of eroticism and sensuality" generated by nude dancing that the state sought to regulate, "apparently on the assumption that creating or emphasizing such thoughts and ideas in the minds of spectators may lead to increased prostitution and degradation of women." Consequently, the dissent found Indiana's ban on nude dancing to be an unconstitutional content-based regulation of protected expression.

To the extent that Barnes allows the state to ban totally nude dancing in bars and adult book stores, it represents a relatively constrained view of the scope of free speech protection. There are, nonetheless, several speech-protective aspects to this decision. Eight members of the Court found that nude dancing was "expressive conduct" entitled to some degree of First Amendment protection. A clear majority of the Court appeared to reject the plurality's view that the state's interest in promoting morality was sufficient justification for even incidental bans on constitutionally protected expression. Finally, Barnes strongly suggests that the state may not constitutionally ban nudity in theatrical productions. Souter, whose vote was necessary to uphold the ban, noted that it would be difficult to see how nudity in productions such as "Hair" and "Equus" could possibly cause harmful "secondary effects." On the other hand, this result can also be read as unjustifiably discriminating between "high brow" entertainment that appeals to the Justices and the "low brow" entertainment of the masses.

JAMES WEINSTEIN
(2000)

Bibliography

BLASI, VINCENT 1992 Six Conservatives in Search of the First Amendment: The Revealing Case of Nude Dancing. William and Mary Law Review 33:611–663.

NULLIFICATION

THOMAS JEFFERSON first suggested the doctrine of nullification in the second Kentucky Resolutions (1799), where he asserted that the sovereign states are the only proper judges of whether the federal government has violated the Constitution and "that a nullification . . . [by] those sovereignties, of all unauthorized acts . . . is the rightful remedy." (See VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS.) In the 1820s, South Carolinians Robert J. Turnbull and Whitemarsh Seabrook laid the doctrinal foundations of an expanded nullification argument by denouncing the expansion of federal authority. In Consolidation (1824), THOMAS COOPER argued that the states remained independent sovereigns, having given only limited and express powers to Congress.

JOHN C. CALHOUN systematized and refined the Carolinians' constitutional arguments. He maintained that the people of the separate states never relinquished their SOVEREIGNTY, and that sovereignty was indivisible. In ratifying the Constitution, the states created a government of limited, specified, and delegated authority. Calhoun used the legal doctrine of agency to explain the federal relationship: "The States . . . formed the compact, acting as sovereign and independent communities. The General Government is but [their] creature . . . a government emanating from a compact between sovereigns . . . of the character of a joint commission . . . having, beyond its proper sphere, no more power than if it did not exist." ("Address on the Relation of the States and the Federal Government," 1831.) When the federal government (the agent) exceeded its authority, the states (the principals), in the exercise of their sovereign power, could "interpose" their authority by nullifying the federal statute or action, which would be void in the nullifying states. If three-fourths of the other states adopted a constitutional amendment empowering the federal government to perform the nullified act, the state then had the choice of acquiescing or of withdrawing from the compact (the federal Constitution) by SECESSION. But Calhoun emphasized that nullification was a peaceable alternative, not a preliminary step, to secession.

Calhoun's theory found application in a dispute, ostensibly over protective tariffs, that produced the Nullification Crisis of 1832. For a decade, Carolinians had declared that their objections to specific federal programs such as INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS or the national bank were merely specific parts of a larger objection to federal intrusion into the states' internal autonomy. The antitariff struggle was, in James Henry Hammond's metaphor, a "battle at the outposts" to prevent an assault on the real "citadel," slavery. When the Tariff of 1832 failed to meet Carolinian demands for an abrogation of the 1828 Tariff of Abominations, a South Carolina convention adopted an ordinance nullifying it and prohibiting its enforcement in the state.

President ANDREW JACKSON reacted forcefully. In his "Proclamation to the People of South Carolina" (1832), he denounced the theory of secession, insisting that the federal government was a true government to which the states had surrendered a part of their sovereignty. (See JACKSON'S PROCLAMATION.) "Disunion by armed force is treason," he warned. Congress enacted the FORCE ACT (1833), which provided for alternative means of collecting the tariff in South Carolina and enhanced the president's power to use militia and regular forces to suppress resistance to federal authority. Congress also began a downward revision of the tariff. With the crisis over the tariff assuaged, the South Carolina legislature denounced Jackson's "Proclamation" and a subsequent convention made the empty gesture of nullifying the Force Act.

In 1837, Calhoun offered six congressional resolutions that would have opened all federal TERRITORIES to slavery. Congress adopted four of these, including one declaring that the federal government was only a "common agent" of the states and possessed only "delegated" powers. But antislavery agitation in the North increased, and many Northerners endorsed the WILMOT PROVISO (1846), which would have excluded slavery from the territories acquired as a result of the Mexican War. To meet this threat, other southern radicals, including Robert Barnwell Rhett, Edmund Ruffin, and William Lowndes Yancey, turned to secession, which subsumed nullification.

Though the Union victory in the CIVIL WAR left the doctrines of state sovereignty, INTERPOSITION, nullification, and secession all defunct, southern political leaders briefly and ineffectually exhumed interposition theories during efforts in the late 1950s to thwart desegregation in southern universities and schools.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

CURRNET, RICHARD W. N. 1963 John C. Calhoun. New York: Washington Square Press.

FREEHLING, WILLIAM W. 1965 Prelude to Civil War: The Nullification Controversy in South Carolina, 1816–1836. New York: Harper & Row.

NULLIFICATION CONTROVERSY

See: Constitutional History, 1829–1848

O

OBITER DICTUM

(Latin: "Said in passing.") In an opinion, a judge may make observations or incidental remarks. Because these comments are unnecessary to the DECISION, they are not a part of the HOLDING and thus do not bind the court in later cases. Such statements are often referred to by the plural, dicta.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS

The CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, engaged as it was in producing a frame of national government, provided in the Constitution for only a very few restrictions on the LEGISLATIVE POWER of the STATES. Among these was the proscription of any state law impairing the obligation of contracts; that the delegates omitted to include a similar prohibition as to Congress is attributable entirely to the fact that they did not contemplate the existence of national contract law. The phrase "obligation of contracts" did not exist as a term of art, but originated in the Constitution; its meaning is not as obvious as it may seem.

The moral obligation of contracts derives from the voluntary agreement of parties who promise to perform certain duties in exchange for some valuable consideration. In the NATURAL RIGHTS political philosophy of the Framers of the Constitution, the obligation to obey the law itself derives from a SOCIAL COMPACT, in which the individual obliges himself to obey in exchange for the state's guarantee of security for his life, liberty, and property. The moral obligation of contracts, of course, cannot be impaired by state law.

But contracts are also legally binding under the COMMON LAW (as modified from time to time by statute). One of the things that induces men to enter into contracts is the knowledge that the state, by its courts and officers, stands ready to enforce the contractual duties undertaken by the parties. This knowledge is especially important when, as in contracts for lending money, one party will have already performed his side of the bargain while the promise of the other party remains "executory," that is, to be performed in the future. The CONTRACT CLAUSE of the Constitution was intended to prevent state law from undermining the enforceability at law of obligations voluntarily entered into.

The Framers of the Constitution well knew the temptation to repudiate obligations improvidently undertaken. SHAYS' REBELLION, which had just been suppressed in Massachusetts, had been directed against judicial enforcement of farm mortgage loans. The CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, sitting at the same time as the Convention, recognized the same danger and wrote into the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE a provision that "no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed."

The history of the constitutional guarantee against impairment of contracts has been the story of slow, but steady, erosion. Much of the erosion has been effected by limiting the extent of the legal obligation or by discovering remedies that purport to leave the obligation intact while depriving the obligee of the benefit of his bargain. In STURGES V. CROWNINSHIELD (1819) Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL defined the obligation of a contract as "the law which binds the parties to perform their agreement." Subsequently, in OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1827), over Marshall's vigorous dissent, the majority held that the "law" in Marshall's definition was the municipal law of contracts in force where and when the contract was entered into, which local law became part of the contract regardless of any contrary intent of the parties to it. The legislature (or courts) may alter the law of contracts so long as the alteration is prospective in effect. Even after Ogden v. Saunders, however, the Supreme Court continued to read the contract clause as proscribing retroactive state legislation affecting contracts.

In times of economic distress, when the number of debtors exceeds the number of creditors, the majority tends to use the political process to shield itself from the consequences of improvident engagements. When the economic hardship is prolonged, even constitutional barriers may be unable to withstand the pressure for relief. Under such pressure, courts have held debtors' relief legislation constitutional by distinguishing the obligation of the contract from the remedies available when the contract is breached. Thus, for example, in HOME BUILDING AND LOAN COMPANY V. BLAISDELL (1933) the HUGHES COURT held that a state law extending the contractual time for repayment of mortgage loans and precluding creditors from exercising their contractual right to sell the mortgaged property to satisfy the debt did not impair the obligation of the loan contract (because the debtor still owed the money) but merely altered the remedy. This sophistical holding permitted the form of the constitutional guarantee to endure even as its substance drained away.

In recent years the Court has partially repudiated the rationale of Blaisdell and has revived the contract clause as a check on state ECONOMIC REGULATION. In UNITED STATES TRUST CO. V. NEW JERSEY (1977) as regards public contracts, and in ALLIED STRUCTURAL STEEL CO. V. SPANNAUS (1978) as regards private contracts, the Court subjected statutes that apparently impaired the obligation of contracts to a higher STANDARD OF REVIEW than is commonly applied to economic legislation.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

FRIED, CHARLES 1981 Contract as Promise: A Theory of Contractual Obligation. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

O'BRIEN, UNITED STATES v.
391 U.S. 367 (1968)

The O'Brien opinion is today widely cited in briefs and judicial opinions defending governmental action against claims of violation of the FREEDOM OF SPEECH. In 1965 Congress amended the SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT to make it a crime to destroy or mutilate a draft registration card. The amendment's legislative history made clear that it was aimed at antiwar protest, but the Supreme Court nonetheless upheld, 8–1, the conviction of a protester for DRAFT CARD BURNING, rejecting his FIRST AMENDMENT claims.

Writing for the Court, Chief Justice EARL WARREN assumed that SYMBOLIC SPEECH of this kind was entitled to First Amendment protection. However, he announced a doctrinal formula now dear to the hearts of government attorneys, a formula that seemed to apply generally to all First Amendment cases: "[W]e think it clear that a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest."

This very case seemed appropriate for application of the formula to overturn the protesters' conviction, but it was not to be. Here, Warren said, the power of the federal government to "conscript manpower" was clear; further, he placed great importance on the government's interests in keeping draft cards intact. As for the purpose to suppress expression, the Chief Justice took away what he had just given to First Amendment challengers: the Court should not inquire, he said, into possible improper congressional motivations for an otherwise valid law. (See LEGISLATION.) Finally, he said, the government's interests could not be served by any less restrictive means.

It is hard to avoid the conclusion that the Justices, embattled on political fronts ranging from SEGREGATION to school prayers, thought it prudent not to add to the Court's difficulties a confrontation with Congress and the President over the VIETNAM WAR. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, however, dissented alone on the ground that the Court should consider the constitutionality of military CONSCRIPTION in the absence of a DECLARATION OF WAR by Congress.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

ELY, JOHN HART 1975 Flag Desecration: A Case Study in the Roles of Categorization and Balancing in First Amendment Analysis. Harvard Law Review 88:1482–1508.

NIMMER, MELVILLE B. 1973 The Meaning of Symbolic Speech under the First Amendment. UCLA Law Review 21: 29–62.

O'BRIEN v. BROWN
409 U.S. 1 (1972)

This decision involved challenges to the unseating of delegates to the Democratic National Convention. The Supreme Court refused to decide the case and stayed the lower court's decision, since the full convention had not met on the question and little time was available to decide delicate, "essentially political" issues. Three Justices dissented.

WARD E. Y. ELLIOTT
(1986)

O'BRIEN FORMULA

The Supreme Court has occasionally stated that the test set out in UNITED STATES V. O'BRIEN (1968) should be employed in cases involving the content-neutral regulation of speech. Under that test such a regulation is "sufficiently justified if it furthers an important or substantial government interest . . . and if the incidental restriction on alleged FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest."

Current doctrine is more complicated than such statements imply. First, the O'Brien test often is not employed in important cases involving content-neutral regulations. For example, when speakers seek access to government property, the Court turns to a body of tests and rules that fall under the heading of PUBLIC FORUM doctrine. The O'Brien test has been largely absent from the opinions in those cases.

Second, even when the O'Brien test is applied, the Court often deviates from the test's original language in ways that seem to make the test more speech-protective. For example, the O'Brien test implies that the furtherance of a substantial state interest by the appropriate means always outweighs the interest in FREEDOM OF SPEECH. But the Court will sometimes ask whether the government interest is sufficiently substantial to justify the effect of the ordinance on expression. In addition, the Court may consider factors not mentioned in the test—principally, the adequacy of alternative channels of communication.

Nonetheless, the Court's application of the test has been less rigorous than its wording might connote. Indeed, some commentators have been led to suggest that the O'Brien test really means that the government always wins. This is a plausible reading of the test's treatment in the Supreme Court, but not of its treatment in the lower courts. In fact, the O'Brien test is simply a mangled attempt to state that courts should consider competing interests and arrive at appropriate decisions.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1992)

Bibliography

SHIFFRIN, STEVEN H. 1990 The First Amendment, Democracy, and Romance. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

OBSCENITY

Obscenity laws embarrass ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE's claim that there is "hardly a political question in the United States which does not sooner or later turn into a judicial one." It is not merely that the obscenity question became a serious judicial issue rather much later than sooner. It is that the richness of the questions involved have been lost in their translation to the judicial forum.

Obscenity laws implicate great questions of political theory including the characteristics of human nature, the relationship between law and morals, and the appropriate role of the state in a democratic society. But these questions were barely addressed when the Court first seriously considered a constitutional challenge to obscenity laws in the 1957 cases of ROTH V. UNITED STATES and Alberts v. California.

The briefs presented the Court with profoundly different visions of FIRST AMENDMENT law. Roth argued that no speech including obscenity could be prohibited without meeting the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test, that a danger of lustful thoughts was not the type of evil with which a legislature could be legitimately concerned, and that no danger of antisocial conduct had been shown. On the other hand, the government urged the Court to adopt a balancing test that prominently featured a consideration of the value of the speech involved. The government tendered an illustrative hierarchy of nineteen speech categories with political, religious, economic, and scientific speech at the top; entertainment, music, and humor in the middle; and libel, obscenity, profanity, and commercial PORNOGRAPHY at the bottom. The government's position was that the strength of public interest needed to justify speech regulation diminished as one moved down the hierarchy and increased as one moved up.

In response to these opposing contentions, the Court took a middle course. Relying on cases like BEAUHARNAIS V. ILLINOIS (1952), the Court seemed to embrace what HARRY KALVEN, JR., later called the TWO-LEVEL THEORY of the First Amendment. Under this theory, some speech is beneath the protection of the First Amendment; only that speech within the amendment's protection is measured by the clear and present danger test. Thus some speech is at the bottom of a two-level hierarchy, and the Roth Court sought to explain why obscenity deserved basement-level nonprotection.

History, tradition, and consensus were the staple of the Court's argument. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN explained that all "ideas having even the slightest redeeming social importance" deserve full First Amendment protection. But, he said, "implicit in the history of the First Amendment is the rejection of obscenity as utterly without redeeming social importance." Then he pointed to the consensus of fifty nations, forty-eight states, and twenty obscenity laws passed by the Congress from 1842 to 1956. Finally, relying on an OBITER DICTUM from CHAPLINSKY V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1942), the Court explained that obscene utterances "are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality."

From the perspective of liberal, conservative, or feminist values, the Court's reliance on the Chaplinsky quotation amounts to a cryptic resolution of fundamental political questions. Liberals would advance several objections. Some would suggest that the Court underestimates the contribution to truth made by sexually oriented material. David Richards, for example, has suggested that > pornography can be seen as the unique medium of a vision of sexuality . . . a view of sensual delight in the erotic celebration of the body, a concept of easy freedom without consequences, a fantasy of timelessly repetitive indulgence. In opposition to the Victorian view that narrowly defines proper sexual function in a rigid way that is analogous to ideas of excremental regularity and moderation, pornography builds a model of plastic variety and joyful excess in sexuality. In opposition to the sorrowing Catholic dismissal of sexuality as an unfortunate and spiritually superficial concomitant of propagation, pornography affords the alternative idea of the independent status of sexuality as a profound and shattering ecstasy [1974, p. 81].

Even some liberals might find these characterizations overwrought as applied to Samuel Roth's publications, such as Wild Passion and Wanton by Night. Nonetheless, many of them would argue that even if such publications have no merit in the MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS, individuals should be able to decide for themselves what they want to read. Many would argue along with JOHN STUART MILL that "[T]he only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilized community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others." Such a principle is thought to advance the moral nature of humanity, for what distinguishes human beings from animals is the capacity to make autonomous moral judgments. From this perspective, the Roth opinion misunderstands the necessity for individual moral judgments and diminishes liberty in the name of order without a proper showing of harm.

Conservatives typically agree that humans are distinguished from animals by their capacity to make rational moral judgments. They believe, however, that liberals overestimate human rational capacity and underestimate the importance of the state in promoting a virtuous citizenry. Moreover, they insist that liberals do not sufficiently appreciate the morally corrosive effects of obscenity. From their perspective, obscenity emphasizes the base animality of our nature, reduces the spirituality of humanity to mere bodily functions, and debases civilization by transforming the private into the public. As Irving Kristol put it, "When sex is a public spectacle, a human relationship has been debased into a mere animal connection."

Feminists typically make no objection to erotic material and make no sharp separation between reason and passion. Their principal objection is to the kind of sexually oriented material that encourages male sexual excitement in the domination of women. From their perspective, a multibillion dollar industry promotes antifemale propaganda encouraging males to get, as Susan Brownmiller put it, a "sense of power from viewing females as anonymous, panting playthings, adult toys, dehumanized objects to be used, abused, broken and discarded." From the feminist perspective, the Roth opinion's reference to the interests in order and morality obscures the interest in equality for women. From the conservative perspective, the opinion is underdeveloped. From the liberal perspective, it is wrongheaded.

Liberals gained some post-Roth hope from the Court's treatment of the obscenity question in STANLEY V. GEORGIA (1969). In Stanley the Court held that the possession of obscenity in the home could not be made a criminal offense without violating the First Amendment. More interesting than the holding, which has since been confined to its facts, was the Court's rationale. The Court insisted that "our whole constitutional heritage rebels at the thought of giving government the power to control men's minds." It denied the state any power "to control the moral content of a person's thoughts." It suggested that the only interests justifying obscenity laws were that obscene material might fall into the hands of children or that it might "intrude upon the sensibilities or privacy of the general public."

Many commentators thought that Stanley would be extended to protect obscene material where precautions had been taken to avoid exposure to children or nonconsenting adults. Indeed such precautions were taken by many theaters, but the Supreme Court (the composition of which had changed significantly since Stanley) reaffirmed Roth and expanded on its rationale in Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973).

The Court professed to "hold that there are legislative interests at stake in stemming the tide of commercialized obscenity, even assuming it is feasible to enforce effective safeguards against exposure to the juvenile and the passerby. These include the interest of the public in the quality of life and the total community environment, the tone of commerce in the great city centers, and, possibly, the public safety itself." The Court did not suggest that the link between obscenity and sex crimes was anything other than arguable. It did insist that the "States have the power to make a morally neutral judgment that public exhibition of obscene material, or commerce in such material, has a tendency to injure the community as a whole . . . or to jeopardize, in Chief Justice Earl Warren's words, the State's "right . . . to maintain a decent society."

Several puzzles remain after the Court's explanation is dissected. First, "arguable" connections to crime do not ordinarily suffice to justify restrictions of First Amendment liberties. A merely arguable connection to crime supports restriction only if the speech involved is for some other reason outside FirstAmendment protection. Second, as the Court was later to recognize in YOUNG V. AMERICAN MINI THEATRES, INC. (1976), the reference to quality of life, the tone of commerce in the central cities, and the environment have force with respect to all sexually oriented bookstores and theaters whether or not they display obscene films or sell obscene books. The Court in MILLER V. CALIFORNIA (1973) limited the definition of obscenity to that material which the "average person, applying contemporary community standards" would find that "taken as a whole appeals to the prurient interest" and "depicts and describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law"; and which, "taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value." No one has suggested that these restrictions on the definition bear any relationship to the tone of commerce in the cities.

Moreover, if the intrusive character of public display were the issue, mail order sales of obscene material should pass muster under the First Amendment; yet there is no indication that the Court is prepared to protect such traffic. As interpreted in the Paris Adult Theatre opinion, Stanley v. Georgia appears to protect only those obscene books and films created and enjoyed in the home; the right to use in the home amounts to no more than that. There is no right to receive obscene material—even in plain brown wrappers.

Perhaps least convincing is the Court's attempt to harmonize its Paris Adult Theatre holding with liberal thought. It claims to have no quarrel with the court's insistence in Stanley that the state is without power "to control the moral content of a person's thoughts." Because obscene material by the Court's definition lacks any serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, control of it is said to be "distinct from a control of reason and the intellect." But this is doubletalk. The power to decide what has serious artistic value is the power to make moral decisions. To decide that material addressing "reason" or the "intellect" is all that is important to human beings is ultimately to make a moral decision about human beings. Implicit in the latter idea, of course, is the belief that the enjoyment of erotic material for its own sake is unworthy of protection. But the view is much more general. The Court supposes that human beings have a rational side and an emotional side, that the emotional side needs to be subordinated and controlled, and that such suppression or control is vital to the moral life. That is why the Court believes that the contribution of obscenity to truth is outweighed by the state's interest in morality. The Court's insistence on the right to maintain a decent society is in fact an insistence on the state's interest in the control of the "moral content of a person's thoughts."

Finally, it is simply dazzling for the Court to suggest that the states are engaged in a "morally neutral" judgment when they decide that obscene material jeopardizes the right to maintain a decent society. When states decide that "a sensitive key relationship of human existence, central to family life, community welfare, and the development of human personality can be debased and distorted by commercial exploitation of sex," they operate as moral guardians, not as moral neutrals. Nonetheless, the Courts' bows to liberal theory in Paris Adult Theatre are revealing, and so are the guarded compromises of the obscenity test adopted in Miller v. California. The bows and compromises reflect, as do the opinions of the four dissenting Justices in Paris Adult Theatre, that America is profoundly divided on the relationship of law to morality and on the meaning of free speech. Since Paris Adult Theatre and Miller, and despite those decisions, the quantity of erotic material has continued to grow. At the same time, feminist opposition to pornography has ripened into a powerful political movement. The Supreme Court's decisions have neither stemmed the tide of commercial pornography nor resolved the divisions of American society on the issue. These political questions will continue to be judicial questions.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

Bibliography

CLOR, HARRY M. 1969 Obscenity and Public Morality. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. 1960 The Metaphysics of the Law of Obscenity. Supreme Court Review 1960:1–45.

LEDERER, LAURA, ed. 1980 Take Back the Night: Women on Pornography. New York: Bantam Books.

RICHARDS, DAVID A. J. 1974 Free Speech and Obscenity Law: Toward a Moral Theory of the First Amendment. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 123:45–99.

OCEAN LAW AND THE CONSTITUTION

Constitutional adjudication in the field of admiralty law has always taken account of rules and principles accepted as "customary law" in the jurisprudence of INTERNATIONAL LAW. Outside the admiralty field, however, the Supreme Court has seldom been inclined to engage in any systematic engrafting of substantive doctrines from international law into the fabric of American law. Hence, it is remarkable to find that in cases requiring the Court to rule on the physical boundaries of individual states of the Union—that is to say, in performing one of its most basic functions, as "umpire" of the federal system—the Court has relied on evolving international law as the basis for such important decisions.

The cases in question include United States v. California (1965), the Texas and Louisiana Boundary Cases of 1969 (United States v. Louisiana et al.), and United States v. Alaska (1997). In each of them, the Court decided disputes between the federal government and state governments concerning the outermost seaward boundaries of those states' jurisdiction. At issue was the ownership of submerged land, beyond the physical limits of the coastline; the economic stakes were high, because of the value of offshore oil deposits in the beds of the offshore waters. In each instance, the state sought to validate a claim as proprietor of the submerged lands, hoping to gain the advantage of substantial potential oil revenues that would otherwise go to the federal government.

Specifically at issue in all four cases was interpretation of two 1953 statutes, the Submerged Lands Act and the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, by which Congress had ceded to the coastal states title to submerged lands (together with their oil deposits and other resources) out to a limit of three miles beyond the coastline. Congress's intent, in these statutes, was to "correct" the decision of the Court in United States v. California (1947), in which the Court had ruled that the national government had "paramount rights" in all offshore waters and their resources, out to whatever limit the President and Congress declared to be the outer seaward boundary of the nation's jurisdiction. What remained at issue, once Congress had thus granted to the states title to submerged land out to three miles, was the question of exactly how to define "coastline" for purposes of measuring to the mandated offshore boundary.

In each of the four cases, the Court relied on an international agreement, the 1958 Convention on the Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone, which had been ratified by the United States in 1964, as providing "the best and most workable definitions available." Over Justice HUGO L. BLACK's objections in dissent that Congress had intended to leave this delicate and (in his view) purely domestic question in the hands of a federal executive agency, the Court's majority in the 1969 cases declared that Congress had deliberately left to the judiciary final authority in the matter of defining offshore boundaries.

With regard to eroded shorelines, dredged channels into the sea, and elevations that emerged only during low tide, among other questions regarding physical features of the coast and offshore waters, the Court relied for its definitions not only on language in the 1958 convention itself but also—most extraordinarily—upon the "legislative history" behind that agreement; specifically, the 1958 report of the International Law Commission. This commission had been charged by the United Nations to develop a draft for the convention, together with scholarly commentary on customary law and general principles applicable to the definition of coastlines. Thus, the Court relied on technical discussion in the commission's report and its draft convention text as determinative evidence of the meaning of otherwise ambiguous or perplexing language in the convention as to the coastline boundary definition. Deciding in favor of the federal government in all four cases, the Court also relied on the convention and general principles of international ocean law to reassert the authority of the national government, as ultimate sovereign responsible for foreign policy, to exercise discretion in selecting from among the options available to it under the terms of the convention.

In 1994, the codification of ocean law as a distinctive branch of international law advanced dramatically with the entering into force of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS), first opened for signature in 1982. This convention specifies duties and responsibilities of signatory states across the entire spectrum of ocean uses (fisheries, navigation, naval power, scientific research, environmental protection), and also establishes the legitimacy of a 200-mile "exclusive economic zone" offshore of coastal and island states.

President RONALD REAGAN refused to sign the UNCLOS agreement, objecting to the convention's establishment of collective international management and revenue rights in high-seas ocean bed resources beyond the 200-mile limit; but he declared that the other terms of UNCLOS were already established as customary law and would be honored as such by the United States. Although President WILLIAM J. CLINTON did sign UNCLOS in 1994, the Republican majority in the U.S. SENATE declined to debate it, or even to hold committee hearings, because of the intransigent opposition of some key senators to the convention's terms as a potential threat to American SOVEREIGNTY in ocean affairs. Especially controversial was UNCLOS's establishment of a United Nations International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, with power to interpret the convention's terms and with jurisdiction in cases arising under the agreement. Hence, even after the convention was essentially amended by a new agreement in 1994, eliminating the collectivist terms that Reagan had found objectionable as to seabed resource exploitation, the United States remained in 1999 formally a nonparticipant standing outside the processes and framework of one of the most important and far-reaching innovations in international law in modern history.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(2000)

Bibliography

BRISCOE, JOHN 1995 The Division of America's Offshore Zones as Between Nation and States. In Implications of Entry into Force of the Law of the Sea Convention for U.S. Ocean Governance. Newark, Del.: Ocean Governance Study Group and the University of Delaware.

SCHEIBER, HARRY N. and CARR, CHRIS 1992 Constitutionalism and the Territorial Sea: An Historical Study. Territorial Sea Journal 2:67–90.

O'CONNOR, SANDRA DAY
(1930– )

Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman Justice to serve on the Supreme Court, was appointed by President RONALD REAGAN in 1981. She had served previously as the nation's first woman senate majority leader in her home state of Arizona and as a member of the Arizona Court of Appeals. In announcing her nomination the President extolled her as someone who would be a rigid adherent of constitutional principles, taking an exacting view of the SEPARATION OF POWERS as a limitation on JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, and respecting the role of FEDERALISM in the constitutional scheme. Although there is little doubt that one motivation in appointing O'Connor was to deprive the Democrats of the opportunity of appointing the first woman Justice, the President's expectations have, by and large, not been disappointed.

For O'Connor constitutional jurisprudence means, above all, an adherence to enduring constitutional principles, recognizing that, while the application of these principles may change, the principles themselves are rooted in the constitutional text and in the precepts that animate the Constitution. In her dissent in Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health (1983), O'Connor complained that the majority's decision rested "neither [on] sound constitutional theory nor [on] our need to decide cases based on the application of neutral principles." It is not entirely clear yet whether the Justice mistakenly identifies constitutional principles with "neutral principles." Her opinions generally indicate an awareness that the Constitution is not neutral with respect to its ends and purposes. She has refused to accept the prevailing view that the Constitution is merely a procedural instrument that is informed by no purposes or principles beyond the procedures themselves.

In CRIMINAL PROCEDURE cases O'Connor has adhered to the principle she enunciated in KOLENDER V. LAWSON (1983): "Our Constitution is designed to maximize individual freedoms within a framework of ORDERED LIBERTY. Statutory limitations on those freedoms are examined for substantive authority and content as well as for definiteness or certainty of expression." The Justice has used this rationale to resist unwarranted attempts to expand criminal DUE PROCESS rights beyond those clearly prescribed or fairly implied by the Constitution. For example, in OREGON V. ELSTAD (1985) O'Connor refused to extend the FRUIT OF THE POISONOUS TREE doctrine either to uncoerced inculpatory statements made after police violation of the MIRANDA RULES, or as in NEW YORK V. QUARLES (1984), to nontestimentary EVIDENCE produced as a result of a Miranda violation. In the latter case O'Connor concluded that Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST's majority opinion had created "a finespun new DOCTRINE on public safety exigencies incident to custodial interrogation, complete with the hair-splitting distinctions that currently plague our FOURTH AMENDMENT jurisprudence." Moreover, dissenting in Taylor v. Alabama (1982), O'Connor would not have allowed an illegal ARREST to taint a confession that followed appropriate Miranda warnings; nor in South Dakota v. Neville (1983) would she allow the claim that the refusal to take a blood-alcohol test is protected by the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION.

O'Connor has been no less resolute in her efforts to protect the constitutional role of the states in the federal system. In her dissent in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985) she remarked that the principle of "state autonomy . . . requires the Court to enforce affirmative limits on federal regulation of the states." The majority opinion, she continued, created the "real risk that Congress will gradually erase the diffusion of power between state and nation on which the Framers based their faith in the efficiency and vitality of our Republic." O'Connor has also staunchly supported the "exhaustion" doctrine of federal HABEAS CORPUS review as a means "to protect the state courts' role in the enforcement of federal law and prevent disruption of state judicial proceedings." The rule that all federal claims must first be exhausted in state court proceedings is, as she wrote in Engle v. Isaac (1982), a recognition that "the State possesses primary authority for defining and enforcing the criminal law." She continued that "[f]ederal intrusions into State criminal trials frustrate both the States' sovereign power to punish offenders and their good-faith attempts to honor constitutional rights." And in HAWAII HOUSING AUTHORITY V. MIDKIFF (1984) O'Connor made clear that the Court would accord the utmost deference to state legislatures in matters of "social legislation."

O'Connor was less deferential, however, in the instance where a state maintained a women-only nursing school. Writing for the majority in MISSISSIPPI UNIVERSITY FOR WOMEN V. HOGAN (1982), O'Connor stated that in "limited circumstances a gender-based classification favoring one sex can be justified if it intentionally and directly assists members of the sex that is disproportionately burdened." Here, the SEX DISCRIMINATION actually harmed the intended beneficiaries by perpetuating "stereotyped" and "archaic" notions about the role of women in society.

O'Connor has urged the Court to reexamine some important issues connected with the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Concurring in WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1985), O'Connor agreed that an Alabama law providing for a moment of silence was unconstitutional because it sought to sanction and promote prayer in public schools. She dissented, however, from the Court's decision in AGUILAR V. FELTON (1985) striking down the use of federal funds to provide remedial education by public school teachers for parochial school students. While agreeing in LYNCH V. DONNELLY (1983) that every governmental policy touching upon religion must have a secular purpose, O'Connor suggested that the entanglement test propounded in LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971) should be reexamined.

In the area of EQUAL PROTECTION rights, O'Connor has taken the firm stance that rights belong to individuals. In Ford Motor Company v. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (1982), and in her concurring opinion in FIREFIGHTERS LOCAL #1784 V. STOTTS (1984), O'Connor argued that remedies must be limited to those who can demonstrate actual injury and must be fashioned in a way that protects the settled expectations of innocent parties. She thus adheres to the original intention of the framers of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, reaffirming the principle that lies at the heart of constitutional jurisprudence—that rights belong to individuals and not to the racial or gender group of which they are members. Employing narrowly construed and analytical opinions, O'Connor has begun to build a solid base for the Court's return to a jurisprudence that looks to the articulation of the Constitution's enduring principles.

EDWARD J. ERLER
(1986)

Bibliography

CORDRAY, RICHARD A. and VRADLIS, JAMES T. 1985 The Emerging Jurisprudence of Justice O'Connor. University of Chicago Law Review 52:389–459.

O'CONNOR, SANDRA DAY 1981 Trends in the Relationships between the Federal and State Courts from the Perspective of a State Court Judge. William and Mary Law Review 22:801–815.

O'CONNOR, SANDRA DAY
(1930– )
(Update 1)

Sandra Day O'Connor was born in Arizona in 1930. After leaving high school at the age of sixteen, she completed both her undergraduate and law degrees at Stanford University in five years. She spent the next decade as a county attorney and in private practice in Arizona and elsewhere, and she became an Arizona assistant attorney general in 1965. She served in the Arizona state senate from 1969 until 1974, when she moved into the state judiciary—first as a trial judge and later on the state's intermediate court of appeals. President RONALD REAGAN nominated her as the first female Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1981.

O'Connor took the oath of office on September 25, 1981, as the first Supreme Court appointee of the most conservative President since CALVIN COOLIDGE. Not surprisingly, she immediately became part of the conservative wing of the Court, voting with Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST more than ninety percent of the time by 1984. She has continued to be a reliable conservative vote in CRIMINAL PROCEDURE and FEDERALISM cases. After 1984, however, she began striking out on her own in several areas. She became considerably less predictable in cases involving SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, discrimination, and complex jurisdictional or procedural questions.

By 1989 O'Connor had become a pivotal center vote on the Court. Although this change resulted in part from the appointment of two more conservative Justices, it was also the result of the changes in O'Connor's own views: by 1987 she was voting with Rehnquist only seventy-eight percent of the time. Moreover, during this period O'Connor often wrote separate concurrences and dissents, approaching cases from independent points of view; and by the end of the 1988 term, her originally solo viewpoints commanded majorities in several doctrinal areas. Three topics illustrate both her influence and her central position on the Court: the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE of the FIRST AMENDMENT, AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, and CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

At the time O'Connor joined the Court, establishment clause challenges were virtually always governed by the test of LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971): a statute violates the establishment clause if it has a primary purpose or a primary effect of advancing or inhibiting religion, or if it causes excessive government entanglement with religion. Beginning with LYNCH V. DONNELLY (1984), O'Connor proposed a "refinement" of the LEMON TEST emphasizing the questions "whether the government's purpose is to endorse religion and whether the statute actually conveys a message of endorsement." Unlike the standard view of the Lemon test, which centers on the practical effect of governmental action, O'Connor's test focuses on the communicative or symbolic aspects of that action. Thus, O'Connor would find a constitutional violation when "[e]ndorsement sends a message to non-adherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community, and an accompanying message to adherents that they are insiders, favored members of the political community."

Between 1984 and 1989, O'Connor's application of this principle made her the swing vote in many establishment-clause cases. She provided the fifth vote to uphold a public Christmas display including a crèche in Lynch v. Donnelly and to uphold federal funding of religious family-planning organizations in BOWEN V. KENDRICK (1988). She also provided the fifth vote to invalidate a state-mandated moment of silence for meditation or prayer at the beginning of the public school day in WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1985) and to invalidate a public Christmas display of a crèche alone in COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY V. ACLU (1989). In County of Allegheny, moreover, she appeared to have converted a majority of the Court to her test, at least where the display of religious symbols is at issue.

O'Connor also fashioned what has become the majority test for constitutional challenges to affirmative action programs. For over a decade, the Court was unable to produce a majority opinion in any constitutional case involving affirmative action. Badly fragmented, the Court could not agree on either the level of scrutiny to be applied to such challenges or the factual prerequisites that might make an affirmative action program valid. Beginning with WYGANT V. JACKSON BOARD OF EDUCATION (1986), O'Connor wrote several separate opinions answering both questions with great specificity: affirmative action programs should be tested by STRICT SCRUTINY, and such scrutiny typically requires that there be a remedial need for the program, shown by some evidence—not necessarily contemporaneous—of prior government discrimination (remedying past societal discrimination is an insufficient governmental interest). In 1989, in RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989), O'Connor obtained majority support for her position.

O'Connor has also had a significant influence in cases dealing with the death penalty for juveniles. Although she has not generally been the swing vote in ordinary capital cases, her vote has been crucial in deciding whether the state may execute persons who committed crimes when they were under the age of majority. In THOMPSON V. OKLAHOMA (1988), she voted with the four liberal Justices to overturn a death sentence imposed on a girl who had committed murder at the age of fifteen. O'Connor did not join Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS's plurality opinion, however, because it categorically denied the constitutionality of executing anyone who was under sixteen when the crime was committed. Instead, O'Connor concluded that the legislature, in failing to set any minimum age limit, did not give proper consideration to a question on which no national consensus existed and, thus, that the penalty was CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT.

This distinctive approach allowed her to vote the very next year in STANFORD V. KENTUCKY (1989) to uphold death sentences imposed on two juveniles who had committed crimes at the ages of sixteen and seventeen. Again she was the fifth vote, this time combining with the conservative wing of the Court, and again she wrote a separate concurrence basing her decision on a "sufficiently clear . . . national consensus." In a case decided the same day as Stanford, PENRY V. LYNAUGH (1989), O'Connor provided the pivotal vote (and wrote the majority opinion) for two separate majorities: one concluding that the Eighth Amendment generally permits the execution of mentally retarded adults and the other reversing the death sentence of the particularly mentally retarded defendant on the ground that the jury instructions deprived the jury of any meaningful opportunity to take the defendant's handicap into account as a mitigating factor.

Finally, O'Connor may prove to be the crucial vote on ABORTION. From 1981 to 1989, O'Connor consistently voted to uphold all antiabortion laws; and in Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health (1983), she even wrote that ROE V. WADE (1973) was "on a collision course with itself." In WEBSTER V. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES (1989), however, O'Connor declined to join with the four other Justices wishing to modify Roe. Instead, she wrote a separate concurrence upholding the challenged statute under Roe itself and explicitly refusing to reach the question of Roe's continued validity. Indeed, her earlier opinions had suggested that the Court abandon the trimester approach to abortion and instead ask whether a challenged statute "unduly burdens" a woman's right to an abortion. In Webster, Rehnquist's plurality opinion adopted this approach almost verbatim, but O'Connor nevertheless declined to join his opinion.

Two additional trends are evident in O'Connor's opinions. First, she frequently writes separately in order to "clarify" the majority's opinion. Her clarifying concurrences are often attempts to point out the limits of the Court's decision or to minimize the distance between the majority and dissent. In Wygant, for example, her concurrence stressed that there was little difference in application between a "compelling" governmental interest and an "important" one and that both majority and dissenting opinions agreed that remedying past discrimination constitutes such an interest. In other cases she has made a great effort to specify what issues the Court has not decided.

The second common thread during O'Connor's tenure on the Court to date is her tendency to demand fact-specific decision making in a wide variety of contexts. For example, in Lanier v. South Carolina (1985), she wrote a separate concurrence to a per curiam opinion on the voluntariness of a confession, stressing that on remand the Court should look at the particular circumstances of the confession. In two cases involving the appropriate state statute of limitations to be borrowed in SECTION 1983 actions, she dissented from nearly unanimous Court decisions imposing a single standard, preferring instead to examine the circumstances of each section 1983 suit (Wilson v. Garcia and Goodman v. Lukens Steel Co.). In a series of HABEAS CORPUS cases, she wrote majority opinions fashioning a test whereby defendants who could produce evidence of "actual innocence" might avoid the newly strengthened strictures of the "cause and prejudice" test (Smith v. Murray and Murray v. Carrier). In COY V. IOWA (1988), she concurred in a decision invalidating on CONFRONTATION clause grounds a state statute permitting courts to place a screen between the accused and the accuser in child sexual abuse cases, but refused to join the majortity's conclusion that such screens always violate the right to confrontation. In ALLEN V. WRIGHT (1984), she demanded greater specificity by parents seeking STANDING to challenge Internal Revenue Service regulations that they alleged were inadequate to prevent discriminatory private schools from obtaining and keeping charitable exemption status. Finally, her position on affirmative action, noted above, makes clear the need for some factual predicate for the adoption of any affirmative-action plan.

When O'Connor joined the Court in 1981, it was expected that her votes would reflect three influences: her CONSERVATISM would align her with the right wing of the Court, her state legislative background would give her a strong STATES' RIGHTS tilt, and her gender would make her more receptive to claims of SEX DISCRIMINATION. Only the last of these expectations has proved both accurate and significant. Although as already indicated, she has voted conservatively on some issues, in other cases she has followed an independent path. Her deference to state legislatures is reasonably consistent, but she has virtually always been outvoted, as in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITHY (1985) and South Dakota v. Dole (1987).

O'Connor has, however, been a consistent supporter of gender equality. During her tenure on the Court, she has joined the majority—and sometimes provided a crucial vote—in making partnership decisions subject to Title VII (Hishon v. King Spalding), declaring sexual harassment as actionable under the same statute (MERITOR SAVINGS BANK V. VINSON), rejecting a PREEMPTION challenge to a state law requiring employers to give pregnancy leave to employees who want one (California Federal Savings Loan v. Guerra), upholding discrimination claims based on sexual stereotyping (Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins), invalidating an all-female state nursing school (MISSISSIPPI UNIVERSITY FOR WOMEN V. HOGAN), and upholding an affirmative action program for women (JOHNSON V. TRANSPORTATION AGENCY). Only in the area of abortion has her support of women's rights been less consistent.

Thus, after eight years on the Court, O'Connor has proved herself an independent and sometimes unpredictable thinker. It is clear, however, that the first female Supreme Court Justice has already left her mark on the Court and will continue to do so.

SUZANNE SHERRY
(1992)

Bibliography

CORDRAY, RICHARD M. and VRADELIS, JAMES I. 1985 The Emerging Jurisprudence of Justice O'Connor. University of Chicago Law Review 52:389–459.

O'CONNOR, SANDRA DAY 1981 Trends in the Relationship Between the Federal and State Courts from the Perspective of a State Court Judge. William and Mary Law Review 22:801–815.

SHEA, BARBARA C. S. 1986 Sandra Day O'Connor—Woman, Lawyer, Justice: Her First Four Terms on the Supreme Court. University of Missouri, Kansas City Law Review 55:1–32.

SHERRY, SUZANNA 1986 Civic Virtue and the Feminine Voice in Constitutional Adjudication. Virginia Law Review 72:543–616.

O'CONNOR, SANDRA DAY
(1930– )
(Update 2)

Sandra Day O'Connor was appointed to the Supreme Court by President RONALD REAGAN in 1981. The first woman appointed to the Court, O'Connor brought to the Court a background in state law and politics. She had served on the Arizona state legislature, eventually ascending to senate majority leader, and had been a member of the Arizona Court of Appeals.

When O'Connor joined the Court in 1981, she and then-Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST were its most conservative members. As the Court's composition has shifted over the intervening years and liberal Justices such as WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., and THURGOOD MARSHALL have been replaced by those with other views, her jurisprudence increasingly has provided a middle ground around which other views can rally.

O'Connor is a strong and highly intelligent individual with a judicial inclination toward PRAGMATISM. She is committed to applying the Constitution's complex requirements faithfully. She eschews the notion that there is a "Grand Unified Theory" that will cover all cases falling under a particular constitutional clause. On her reading, the Constitution is a practical weapon against tyranny, not the locus of a grand metaphysics. It is also a bulwark against the sacrifice of higher ideals to contemporary pressures. In her words, the Constitution "protects us from our own best intentions. It divides power among sovereigns and among branches of government precisely so that we may resist the temptation to concentrate power in one location as an expedient solution to the crisis of the day."

In key constitutional areas—FEDERALISM, ABORTION regulation, AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, and SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE—the Court's DOCTRINE has evolved toward O'Connor's views.

The Court's federalism jurisprudence has developed in fits and starts over the last twenty years. Influenced in no small part by her experiences as a state legislator and judge, O'Connor is a strong advocate of STATES' RIGHTS and the Constitution's limits on federal powers. The Court's trend toward placing more meaningful limits on Congress's power to regulate the states reflects O'Connor's allegiance to state autonomy in the Constitution's scheme of DUAL FEDERALISM. In NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976), the Court, per Rehnquist, struck down the 1974 law that extended the Fair Labor Standards Act to cover employees of state and local governments, on the ground that it impaired the states' sovereign integrity. That decision was OVERRULED less than a decade later in GARCÍA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985), in which O'Connor joined the dissenters who predicted that such an assault on states' rights would not continue to command a majority of the Court. By 1992, O'Connor wrote the majority opinion in NEW YORK V. UNITED STATES (1992), which held that Congress does not have the power to compel states to provide for the disposal of radioactive WASTE within their borders. Her subsequent votes in the Court's leading federalism holdings—UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995), Printz v. United States (1997), Seminole Tribe v. Florida (1996), Florida v. College Savings Bank (1999), and College Savings Bank v. Florida (1999)—and her joinder in the reasoning of the majority in Boerne (City of) v. Flores (1997) confirm her allegiance to state autonomy.

From her earliest writings in the abortion cases, O'Connor has characterized the BALANCING TEST established in ROE V. WADE (1973), which weighed the states' legitimate interest in the life of a fetus against a pregnant woman's interest in autonomy, as a requirement that the state may regulate abortion but may not place "undue burdens" upon a woman's desire to obtain an abortion. Although various members of the Court have disagreed over whether Roe required STRICT SCRUTINY and whether Roe was legitimate, O'Connor has been persistent in her devotion to the undue burden standard as the proper constitutional guide for states attempting to regulate abortion. Consistent with her views on states' rights, the standard creates a great deal of latitude for states to regulate abortion, but does not give states carte blanche. She voted to invalidate a state law forcing minors to notify both parents before obtaining an abortion in HODGSON V. MINNESOTA (1990) and to invalidate a state law forcing married women to notify their husbands before obtaining an abortion in PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992). When the discord at the Court over the validity of Roe reached its peak, O'Connor's undue burden test garnered the support of Justices ANTHONY M. KENNEDY and DAVID H. SOUTER. O'Connor, Kennedy, and Souter formed a plurality that voted to reaffirm the "core meaning" of Roe (along with liberal Justices Marshall, Brennan, and HARRY A. BLACKMUN). The plurality adopted O'Connor's "undue burden" approach, asserting that the test adhered to Roe by retaining its "essential holding."

In an area previously fraught with discord, O'Connor has led the Court to a more consistent position on the constitutionality of race-based affirmative action programs. In RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989), she wrote the majority opinion holding that affirmative action plans must be subjected to the strictest of scrutiny and that a city could not constitutionally create preferences for minorities in government contracting in the absence of evidence of a history of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION and proof that the plan was narrowly tailored to remedy the particular history of discrimination. The same reasoning was extended to the federal government in ADARAND CONSTRUCTORS, INC. V. PEÑA (1995) and now governs all affirmative action programs in government employment and in government contracting. The Court's establishment of a more certain test in this arena has prompted a serious reexamination of such programs by the federal and state governments.

Since joining the Court, O'Connor has been the crucial swing vote in the Court's cases addressing the separation of church and state. Three years after joining the Court, she began to advocate a modification of the previously applied LEMON TEST. In LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971), the Court surveyed ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE precedent and concluded that a statute violates that clause if it has a primary purpose or effect of advancing or inhibiting religion, or if it causes excessive entanglement between church and state. O'Connor suggested reading this test with an emphasis on "whether the government's purpose is to endorse religion and whether the statute actually conveys a message of endorsement." Endorsement is a constitutional evil, as she explained in LYNCH V. DONNELLY (1984), because it "sends a message to non-adherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community, and an accompanying message to adherents that they are insiders, favored members of the political community."

The endorsement test has led O'Connor to draw fine distinctions in the Court's ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION cases. She voted to uphold a city's Christmas display that included a crèche in Lynch but to invalidate a public Christmas display of a crèche alone in COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY V. AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION (1989). The Court moved toward her endorsement test in LEE V. WEISMAN (1992), which held that a public school graduation prayer was unconstitutional, and followed her reasoning on state aid to church organizations in AGOSTINI V. FELTON (1997), which permitted public school teachers to teach secular subjects on parochial school grounds.

O'Connor also has had considerable influence in cases involving SEX DISCRIMINATION, ELECTORAL REDISTRICTING, HABEAS CORPUS, and CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

O'Connor's contributions to the United States are not limited to her role as Associate Justice. She is also an ardent advocate of democratization in Eastern Europe. She has spent a great deal of time visiting and advising many of the world's emerging democracies, with special emphasis on the importance of the RULE OF LAW. O'Connor will have made her mark not simply by being the first woman Justice but rather by dint of her strength, intelligence, and contributions to jurisprudence around the world.

MARCI A. HAMILTON
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Constitutional History, 1980–1989; Constitutional History, 1989–1999; Rehnquist Court; Religious Liberty; Sovereign Immunity; Voting Rights.)

Bibliography

COLLECTION 1996 Tribute to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Annual Survey of American Law 1996:i–1vii.

O'CONNOR, SANDRA DAY 1981 Trends in the Relationship Between the Federal and State Courts from the Perspective of a State Court Judge. William and Mary Law Review 55:1–32.

SYMPOSIUM 1991 The Jurisprudence of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Women's Rights Law Reporter 13:53–170.

O'CONNOR v. DONALDSON
422 U.S. 563 (1975)

Donaldson was initially billed as the case that would decide whether a mental patient held in custody had a constitutional "right to treatment." Ultimately the Court did not decide that issue, but it did make some important pronouncements on the relation between MENTAL ILLNESS AND THE CONSTITUTION.

Kenneth Donaldson was committed to a state hospital at the request of his father; the committing judge found that he suffered from "paranoid schizophrenia." Although the commitment order specified "care, maintenance, and treatment," for almost fifteen years Donaldson received nothing but "milieu therapy"—the hospital superintendent's imaginative name for involuntary confinement. Donaldson finally sued the superintendent and others for damages under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, claiming they had intentionally denied his constitutional rights. The federal district judge instructed the jury that Donaldson's rights had been denied if the defendants had confined him against his will, knowing that he was neither dangerous nor receiving treatment. The jury awarded damages, and the court of appeals affirmed, specifically endorsing the district court's theory of a mental patient's constitutional right to treatment.

The Supreme Court unanimously held that Donaldson had stated a valid claim, but remanded the case for reconsideration of the hospital superintendent's assertion of EXECUTIVE IMMUNITY. Justice POTTER STEWART, for the Court, said that a finding of mental illness alone could not justify a state's confining a person indefinitely "in simple custodial confinement." The Court did not reach the larger question of a "right to treatment"; it disclaimed any need to decide whether persons dangerous to themselves or others had a right to be treated during their involuntary confinement by the state, or whether a nondangerous person could be confined for purposes of treatment. But when the state lacked any of the usual grounds for confinement of the mentally ill—the safety of the person confined or others, or treatment for illness—involuntary confinement was a denial of liberty without DUE PROCESS OF LAW. Confinement was not justified, for example, in order to provide the mentally ill with superior living standards, or to shield the public from unpleasantness. To support the latter point, the Court cited FIRST AMENDMENT decisions including COHEN V. CALIFORNIA (1971). Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER concurred in the Court's opinion, but wrote separately to express his opposition to any constitutional "right to treatment."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

The rapid growth of the federal government in the twentieth century has created the need for an institution to coordinate both fiscal and substantive policy. In 1921, Congress empowered the President to prepare and submit a BUDGET for the government. Previously, the government had had no central budgeting function: the various agencies had made funding requests directly to the appropriations committees in Congress. The President exercises the budgeting function through the Office of Management and Budget (OMB). Although OMB controls the requests that Congress receives, Congress is free to appropriate any amount that it considers appropriate.

The budgeting function accords the President an important opportunity to set the agenda for congressional deliberations over appropriations. Notwithstanding the modern presence of a budget process within Congress itself, Congress finds itself responding initially to the President's views of the best resource allocation for the government. And, of course, Congress is aware that its departure from the President's recommended budget may result in the presidential veto of an appropriations bill. In consequence, through OMB the President exercises great influence on actual appropriations. Moreover, appropriations usually confer discretion concerning the amounts to be spent and the precise uses to be made of the funds. The President supervises the agencies' actual spending through OMB.

OMB also exercises limited control over the substantive policies that the agencies follow. The Supreme Court, in MYERS V. UNITED STATES (1926), recognized presidential power to "supervise and guide" the executive agencies in their exercise of power that Congress has delegated to them. This does not extend to the independent regulatory commissions because, in HUMPHREY'S EXECUTOR V. UNITED STATES (1935), the Supreme Court declared those commissions to be independent of the President except for the constitutional power to appoint their members, and except for powers over them that Congress explicitly grants the President, such as budget review.

Policy supervision therefore concentrates on the executive agencies. In part because of doubts about the extent of the President's power to dictate policy even when it is formed in the executive agencies, OMB has usually limited its supervision to requiring agencies to comply with procedural directives imposed by Presidential EXECUTIVE ORDERS. These directives are thought to be less intrusive than outright commands setting substantive policy. Several Presidents have directed the agencies to prepare analyses of the costs and benefits of their regulations, and to submit them to OMB for review and comment. In view of the size of the executive establishment and the complexity of the issues it considers, this kind of procedural supervision and occasional ad hoc consultation on major policy decisions is the most that the relatively small bureaucracy that serves the President in OMB can hope to accomplish.

HAROLD H. BRUFF
(1986)

"OFFICIAL ENGLISH" LAWS

Many Americans assume that English is already the official language of the United States. In fact, though, the Framers explicitly refrained from giving English any preferred constitutional status. In their view, the natural advantages of English would make it preeminent, while efforts to make it official would crystallize resistance among non-English-speakers and delay English acquisition. Despite the Framers' view, state and local officials have periodically decided to give English some kind of official endorsement. During the WORLD WAR I era, for example, some states tried to limit the use of languages other than English in private as well as public schools. Relying on the DUE PROCESS clause, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down these statutes as an unwarranted interference with both the right of parents to bring up children as they see fit and the right of foreign-language instructors to pursue their livelihood.

Since the 1980s, the status of English as an official language has garnered new attention. With rising levels of immigration, the proportion of non-English-speakers in the United States has grown steadily. In response, by 1996, a total of eighteen states had laws making English their official language, most of them passed in the last fifteen years. These laws vary widely. Some state legislatures have adopted purely symbolic measures, declaring English to be the state language in the same way that the robin might be declared the state bird or the bluebell the state flower. Other provisions have real teeth, allowing private citizens to sue for enforcement of English's official status. Stringent laws like these are often state constitutional amendments, many of which are enacted by popular INITIATIVE.

Despite a proliferation of state and local provisions, official English advocates have yet to enjoy much success in declaring English the official language at the federal level. As a result, federal protections for linguistic minorities have limited the impact of state and local measures. For example, federal law now requires schools to provide some special assistance to children with limited English skills, and federal statutes also mandate that some political jurisdictions offer bilingual ballots and election materials upon request. Under the Sixth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, non-English-speaking defendants in criminal cases are entitled to interpreters at their trials so that they can confront witnesses and consult with counsel.

In the area of social services, however, relatively few federal protections apply. To the extent that official English provisions threaten bilingual assistance provided by these agencies, constitutional challenges have resulted. In Arizona, voters used the popular initiative to amend the state constitution to make English the official language. The amendment provided that "the State and all political subdivisions of [the] State shall act in English and in no other language." A bilingual government worker, who assisted Spanish-speaking clients with medical malpractice claims against the state, sued to block enforcement of the provision. She contended that the policy violated her FIRST AMENDMENT right to FREEDOM OF SPEECH. Because she feared that she would be fired for speaking Spanish on the job, the official English provision had a CHILLING EFFECT on her ability to communicate. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals agreed, but the U.S. Supreme Court vacated the judgment on the ground of MOOTNESS in ARIZONANS FOR OFFICIAL ENGLISH V. ARIZONA (1997). Because the employee had already left her position, there was no live controversy for the federal courts to consider.

Subsequently, however, the Arizona courts passed on the constitutionality of the amendment. The state litigation involved claims by four elected officials, five state employees, and one public school teacher, all of whom were bilingual and who asserted that the official English provision denied them freedom of speech and EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS while they performed government business. The Arizona superior court rejected the First Amendment free speech claim because the official English requirement was content-neutral; that is, it did not attempt to regulate what public officials and employees talked about but only the manner in which they communicated. The superior court found no equal protection violation under the Fourteenth Amendment, either, because there was no proof that Arizona voters acted with discriminatory intent or animus when they approved the official English requirement. The Arizona court of appeals, relying on judicial comity, adopted the views of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, even though that court's opinion had been vacated by the U.S. Supreme Court.

On appeal, the Arizona Supreme Court ultimately concluded that the official English measure "violates the First Amendment by depriving elected officials and public employees of the ability to communicate with their constituents and with the public." In the court's view, the provision went "too far" by "effectively cut[ting] off governmental communication with thousands of limited-English-proficient and non-English-speaking persons in Arizona, even when the officials and employees have the ability and desire to communicate in a language understandable to them." In addition, the Arizona court found that the official English requirement infringed on the fundamental RIGHT TO PETITION the government for redress of grievances and correspondingly, to participate on an equal basis in the political process. As a result, the plaintiffs did not need to prove discriminatory intent; instead, discrimination was presumed, and the state's action therefore was subject to STRICT SCRUTINY under equal protection law. Assuming arguendo that the state had a compelling need to promote a uniform language, the Arizona court held that the official English requirement swept too broadly in prohibiting all non-English usage. Because such severe intrusions were not necessary to achieve Arizona's objective, the provision denied plaintiffs equal protection. The U.S. Supreme Court has yet to address the merits of the Arizona Supreme Court's conclusions.

Tensions surrounding the use of languages other than English are likely to persist. Formal measures to declare English the official language are not likely to solve the problem, so long as newcomers bring linguistic diversity with them. Recent immigrants will struggle to learn English to improve their social and economic opportunities, while English-speakers chafe at the sounds of foreign languages during the transition. The linguistic clashes associated with today's demographic changes are as unlikely to be legislated away as were the conflicts among colonial languages during the Framers' times. The role of English as the language of opportunity, rather than as the official language, will be decisive in resolving these differences.

RACHEL F. MORAN
(2000)

Bibliography

CRAWFORD, JAMES 1992 Hold Your Tongue: Bilingualism and the Politics of "English Only." Reading, Calif.: Addison-Wesley.

CRAWFORD, JAMES, ed. 1992 Language Loyalties: A Source Book on the Official English Controversy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

HEATH, SHIRLEY BRICE 1981 English in Our Language Heritage. Pages 6–20 in Charles A. Ferguson and Shirley Brice Heath, eds., Language in the USA. Cambridge, Eng.: Cambridge University Press.

PEREA, JUAN F. 1992 Demography and Distrust: An Essay on American Languages, Cultural Pluralism and Official English. Minnesota Law Review 77:269–373.

OFFICIAL IMMUNITY

See: Executive Immunity; Immunity of Public Officials; Judicial Immunity; Legislative Immunity; Municipal Immunity; Presidential Immunity; Sovereign Immunity

OGDEN v. SAUNDERS
12 Wheaton 213 (1827)

Ogden established the doctrine that a state bankruptcy act operating on contracts made after the passage of the act does not violate the OBLIGATION OF A CONTRACT. The majority reasoned that the obligation of a contract, deriving from positive law, is the creature of state laws applicable to contracts. A contract made after the enactment of a bankruptcy statute is, therefore, subject to its provisions; in effect the statute enters into and becomes part of all contracts subsequently made, limiting their obligation but not impairing it.

For a minority of three, Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL dissented, losing control of his Court in a constitutional case for the first and only time during his long tenure. He would have voided all state bankruptcy acts that affected the obligation of contracts even prospectively. Grounding his position in the immutable HIGHER LAW principles of morality and natural justice, he maintained that the right of contract is an inalienable right not subject to positive law. The parties to a contract, not society or government, create its obligation. Marshall believed that the majority's interpretation of the CONTRACT CLAUSE would render its constitutional prohibition on the states "inanimate, inoperative, and unmeaning." Had his opinion prevailed, contractual rights of property vested by contract would have been placed beyond government regulation, making the contract clause the instrument of protecting property that the Court later fashioned out of the DUE PROCESS clause substantively construed. Until then, despite Marshall's fears, the contract clause remained the principal bastion for the DOCTRINE of VESTED RIGHTS. This case, however, ended the Court's doctrinal expansion of that clause. Ogden prevented constitutional law from confronting the nation with a choice between unregulated capitalism and socialism.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

OHIO v. AKRON CENTER FOR REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH

See: Hodgson v. Minnesota

OHIO LIFE INSURANCE AND TRUST CO. v. DE BOLT

See: Piqua Branch of the State Bank of Ohio v. Knoop

OKANOGAN INDIANS v. UNITED STATES

See: Pocket Veto Case

OLIVER, IN RE
333 U.S. 257 (1948)

Since 1917 Michigan had maintained a unique GRAND JURY system, allowing a single judge to be a grand jury with all its inquisitorial powers as well as retain his judicial power to punish for contempt any witness whose testimony he believed to be false or evasive. In the course of a secret grand jury proceeding, a judge summarily sentenced Oliver for contempt. The Supreme Court held the Michigan procedure a violation of SIXTH AMENDMENT rights—denial of PUBLIC TRIAL and of an opportunity to defend himself—without DUE PROCESS OF LAW, contrary to the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Justice HUGO L. BLACK spoke for a 7–2 majority.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

OLIVER v. UNITED STATES
466 U.S. 170 (1984)

A 6–3 Supreme Court, speaking through Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, reinvigorated the sixty-year-old "OPEN FIELDS" DOCTRINE, according to which the FOURTH AMENDMENT, whose language protects "persons, houses, papers, and effects," does not extend to open fields. No one doubts that the police, or public, may view land from a plane. The question in Oliver was whether the police could ignore "No Trespassing" signs and make a warrantless investigation of fenced-in backlands used to grow marijuana, seize EVIDENCE, and introduce it in court despite a TRESPASS on private property. Powell declared that no one could reasonably have a constitutionally protected expectation of privacy in an open field, well away from the curtilage or land immediately surrounding a house (and therefore part of the area to which the Fourth Amendment's protection extends). The dissenters objected that the language of the amendment does not expressly include many areas which the Court has ruled to be within its protection, such as telephone booths, offices, curtilages, and other places which one may reasonably expect to be secure against warrantless police intrusion.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

OLMSTEAD v. UNITED STATES
277 U.S. 438 (1928)

Federal agents installed WIRETAPS in the basement of a building where Roy Olmstead, a suspected bootlegger, had his office and in streets near his home. None of Olmstead's property was trespassed upon. A sharply divided Supreme Court admitted the wiretap EVIDENCE in an opinion that virtually exempted ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING from constitutional controls for forty years. The dissents by Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS are classic statements of the government's obligation to obey the law.

Olmstead argued that because the prosecution's evidence came entirely from the wiretaps, it could not be used against him; wiretapping, he claimed, was a SEARCH AND SEIZURE under the FOURTH AMENDMENT, and because the amendment's warrant and other requirements had not been met, the wiretap evidence was illegally obtained. He also claimed that use of the wiretap evidence violated his RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION under the Fifth Amendment; further, that because the agents had violated a state statute prohibiting wiretapping, the evidence was inadmissible, apart from the Fourth and Fifth Amendments.

Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, writing for a five-Justice majority, rejected all Olmstead's contentions. The self-incrimination claim was dismissed first: the defendants had not been compelled to talk over the telephone but had done so voluntarily. This aspect of Olmstead has survived to be applied in cases such as HOFFA V. UNITED STATES (1966). As to the Fourth Amendment claims: first, the Court ruled that the amendment was violated only if officials trespassed onto the property of the person overheard, and no such trespass had taken place—the agents had tapped Olmstead's telephones without going onto his property. Second, the Court limited Fourth Amendment protection to "material things," not intangibles like conversations. Third, the Court seemed to deny any protection for the voice if projected outside the house. As to the claim that the agents' violation of the state statute required excluding the evidence, the Chief Justice found no authority for such exclusion.

Justice Holmes wrote a short dissent, condemning the agents' conduct as "dirty business." Justice Brandeis wrote the main dissent in which he disagreed with the majority's reading of the precedents, its very narrow view of the Fourth Amendment, and its willingness to countenance criminal activity by the government. For him, the Fourth Amendment was designed to protect individual privacy, and he warned that the "progress of science in furnishing the Government with means of espionage" called for a flexible reading of the amendment to "protect the right of personal security." He stressed that because a tap reaches all who use the telephone, including all those who either call the target or are called, "WRITS OF ASSISTANCE or GENERAL WARRANTS are but puny instruments of tyranny and oppression when compared with wiretapping." Responding to the argument that law enforcement justified both a narrow reading of the amendment and indifference to the agents' violation of state law, he wrote: "Experience should teach us to be most on our guard to protect liberty when the Government's purposes are beneficent. . . . The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning but without understanding. . . . Our Government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example."

Although the decision was harshly criticized, it endured. In Goldman v. United States (1942), Olmstead was read to allow police to place a microphone against the outside of a wall, because no trespass onto the property was involved. Wiretapping itself remained outside constitutional controls, though section 605 of the COMMUNICATIONS ACT of 1934 was construed by the Supreme Court in NARDONE V. UNITED STATES (1937) to bar unauthorized interception and divulgence of telephone messages.

In 1954, however, Olmstead began to be undermined. In IRVINE V. CALIFORNIA (1954), the Court indicated that intangible conversations were protected by the Fourth Amendment. The Court found a trespass when the physical penetration was only a few inches into a party wall as in SILVERMAN V. UNITED STATES (1961) or by a thumbtack as in Clinton v. Virginia (1964). Finally, in KATZ V. UNITED STATES (1967), the Supreme Court overruled Olmstead, holding that a trespass was unnecessary for a violation of the Fourth Amendment and that the amendment protects intangibles, including conversations.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

Bibliography

MURPHY, WALTER F. 1966 Wiretapping on Trial: A Case Study in the Judicial Process. New York: Random House.

OLNEY, RICHARD
(1835–1917)

In 1893 President GROVER CLEVELAND offered the post of ATTORNEY GENERAL to Richard Olney. A Massachusetts Democrat and highly successful railroad lawyer, Olney sought the advice of his major clients. All agreed he should accept the office and one even continued him on the payroll after he took the post, a conflict of interest that reflected the biases Olney allowed to influence his actions in office.

Olney was one of a few lawyers in the country who had litigated the recently passed SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT; he had successfully defended the Whiskey Trust, and he believed that section 2 of the act was "void because of vagueness, indefiniteness, and ambiguity." While Olney served as attorney general, the Department of Justice initiated no new antitrust suits against business combinations.

Olney is most often remembered for his weak presentation of the government case in UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT COMPANY (1895). Although the prosecution had been begun under President BENJAMIN HARRISON, Olney was responsible for choosing Knight to test the Sherman Act's constitutionality. Even as attorney general he specifically rejected the belief that "the aim and effect of this statute are to prohibit and prevent" trusts, and he contended that "literal interpretation" of the act was "out of the question" because of the act's overbroad terms. His ineffective prosecution contributed to a government loss, crippling enforcement of the Sherman Act for nearly a decade. Olney saw Knight as a vindication of his personal views and as an excuse to ignore the law; although he ought to have chosen a stronger case, the federal judges who so narrowly construed the act must share responsibility for the outcome.

Olney's antipathy to the Sherman Act ran deep. He was determined to break the Pullman strike in 1894, and although he had to rely on the Sherman Act to secure lower court INJUNCTIONS, he abandoned that successful tack in the Supreme Court. He convinced a unanimous Court in IN RE DEBS (1895) to rely instead upon the inherent power of the executive branch to protect the national interest in the flow of INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Olney also argued POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN TRUST COMPANY (1895) before the Supreme Court, although his actions resulted in insufficient time for government preparation and may have cost the government its case. The Court struck down the tax, a decision Olney considered "a great blow to the power of the Federal government . . . a national misfortune."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

EGGERT, GERALD 1974 Richard Olney: Evolution of a Statesman. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.

O'LONE v. ESTATE OF SHABAZZ
482 U.S. 342 (1987)

Regulations at a New Jersey prison forbade minimum-security inmates who worked outside the main prison building from reentering the building during the day, thus preventing certain Muslim PRISONERS from attending their weekly worship service held on Fridays. Required by the Koran to attend the service, the prisoners filed suit, claiming violation of their rights under the free exercise clause. Adopting what was essentially a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST test, the court of appeals held that the prison had to prove "that no reasonable method exists by which [the prisoners'] religious rights can be accommodated without creating bona fide security problems." In a 5–4 decision the Supreme Court reversed, ruling that the court of appeals paid insufficient deference to prison officials, who have authority to enact any prison regulations "reasonably related to legitimate penological interests."

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, writing for the dissenters, accused the majority of uncritically accepting the assertions of prison administrators. Brennan did not claim that the courts should never defer to the judgment of prison authorities; but when the prison completely deprives prisoners of a right and where the activity in question is not presumptively dangerous, Brennan maintained that prison officials should be required to show that the denial of the right is no greater than necessary to achieve the government's objective.

Shabazz foreshadowed the Court's eventual abolition of the compelling-state-interest test for all free-exercise cases in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990).

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

OLSEN v. NEBRASKA EX REL. REFERENCE & BOND ASSOCIATION
313 U.S. 236 (1941)

Sustaining a Nebraska statute regulating fees charged by private employment agencies, the Supreme Court specifically reversed RIBNIK V. MCBRIDE (1928). Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS reiterated earlier dissents of Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES (see TYSON BROTHER V. BANTON, 1927) and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS (see NEW STATE ICE COMPANY V. LIEBMANN, 1932), declaring that the need and appropriateness of legislation concerning the public interest ought to be left to state legislatures.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

OMNIBUS ACT
15 Stat. 73 (1868)

The Omnibus Act readmitted six of the Confederate states to full congressional representation and terminated military governance in them.

After the process of restoration mandated by the MILITARY RECONSTRUCTION ACTS was largely completed, Congress readmitted Arkansas in June 1868 and, three days later, by the Omnibus Act readmitted Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, and South Carolina. The Omnibus Act declared that each of the six states had complied with the conditions specified in the Military Reconstruction Acts, required each to ratify the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and imposed the "fundamental condition" that the state constitutional provisions for black suffrage be inviolate. All the congressmen and senators of these states were seated by late July 1868.

Georgia's full readmission was delayed for two years, however, because the state legislature excluded all black members and admitted several whites disfranchised by the Fourteenth Amendment or the Military Reconstruction Acts. Congress by special legislation forced a rescission of these actions, and Georgia once again underwent military supervision until its readmission. Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas were also readmitted in 1870, thus bringing the formal process of RECONSTRUCTION to a close.

WILLIAN M. WIECEK
(1986)

OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT
92 Stat. 3795 (1968)

The most extensive anticrime legislation in the nation's history, this measure reflected the public's fear of rising crime and its demand for federal protection. Congress enacted a massive and restrictive piece of legislation, called by its critics an invasion of basic CIVIL LIBERTIES. Particularly distasteful to President LYNDON B. JOHNSON, who signed it with reluctance, were titles permitting broad use of WIRETAPPING in federal and state cases, and a section seeking to overturn controversial Supreme Court rulings on the rights of defendants.

The act authorized law enforcement grants to aid local police departments in planning, training, and research and a block grant procedure whereby funds were given to the states to be allocated to their communities under a statewide plan. It channeled funds to improve techniques for combating organized crime and for preventing and controlling riots. The most controversial provision of the act purported to overturn Supreme Court decisions in Mallory v. United States (1957), MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), and UNITED STATES V. WADE (1967), authorizing greater freedom in POLICE INTERROGATION of suspects accused of crimes against the United States, and in the use of LINEUPS to identify criminals.

The measure specified permissive new conditions under which confessions could be introduced in federal courts. The trial judge was to determine the issue of voluntariness, out of the hearing of the jury, basing that determination on such criteria as time lapse between arrest and arraignment, whether the defendant knew the nature of the charged offense, when the defendant was advised of or knew of the right to remain silent and the RIGHT TO COUNSEL, and whether the defendant was without assistance of counsel when questioned and giving the confession.

The act's provisions on ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING permitted warrant-approved wiretapping and bugging in investigations of a wide variety of specified crimes, and authorized police to intercept communications for forty-eight hours without a warrant in an "emergency" where organized crime or NATIONAL SECURITY was involved. Further, it authorized any law officer or any other person obtaining information in conformity with such a process to disclose or use it as appropriate. The law forbade the interstate shipment to individuals of pistols and revolvers, and over-the-counter purchase of handguns by individuals who did not live in the dealer's state. But it specifically exempted rifles and shotguns from these controls.

Passed overwhelmingly a few hours after the assassination of ROBERT F. KENNEDY, the act still drew the opposition of liberals troubled by its criminal law sections and concerned that its permissive wiretap section did not contain proper constitutional safeguards. Constitutional issues aside, the act failed to achieve its objectives.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE CAUSES AND PREVENTION OF VIOLENCE 1970 Law and Order Reconsidered. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

O'NEIL v. VERMONT

See: Kemmler, In Re

ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE

The National Municipal League popularized the slogan "one man, one vote" from the 1920s to the 1960s to promote REAPPORTIONMENT to equalize political districts. Reapportionment had lagged far behind urban growth, leaving the largest urban districts by 1960 with only half the legislative representatives per capita of the smallest rural ones.

Urban spokesmen claimed that "malapportionment" produced stagnant "barnyard governments" indifferent to urban concerns and needs. They demanded one person, one vote to stop urban blight and revitalize state governments. These conjectural claims did not win reapportionment from legislators reluctant to tamper with their own districts, nor from voters, who repeatedly defeated reapportionment INITIATIVES. But they did persuade political and legal writers and study commissions, who called for courts or commissions to order reapportionment where legislators and voters would not.

The Supreme Court declined this invitation in COLE-

GROVE V. GREEN (1946) but accepted one person, one vote in REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964) as the "fundamental principle" of the Constitution. Political scientists, black rights groups, the New York Times, and the DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER and JOHN F. KENNEDY administrations had endorsed that principle.

Some critics thought that the Court had confused individual suffrage with group REPRESENTATION, misconstrued the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and ignored the "standards problem" of equalizing group representation, because gerrymandering could still deny equal weight to votes. Others saw little evidence of revitalization or greater equality in substance to match the greater equality in form, and they believed that by overriding legislative and popular majorities, the Court seemed to have devalued the very representative institutions to which it granted equal access in form.

The WARREN COURT's adoption of one person, one vote was a remarkable political success, affecting more people than school DESEGREGATION or criminal justice cases, with less help from Congress and less damaging backlash. But its practical contributions to equal representation and vital government remain a matter of dispute.

WARD E. Y. ELLIOTT
(1986)

Bibliography

ELLIOTT, WARD E. Y. 1975 The Rise of Guardian Democracy: The Supreme Court's Role in Voting Rights Disputes, 1845–1969. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

ON LEE v. UNITED STATES
343 U.S. 737 (1952)

The Supreme Court held, 5–4, that government informers who deceptively interrogated criminal suspects and simultaneously transmitted the conversations to other government agents via electrical transmitters had not violated the FOURTH AMENDMENT or the antiwiretap provisions of section 605 of the COMMUNICATIONS ACT; the agents who listened might testify to the overheard conversations. Because entry had been consented to—although the consent was obtained deceptively—it was not a TRESPASS, and under OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1927) the intrusion did not violate the Fourth Amendment. It was also not WIRETAPPING, nor did it become illegal because it might be immoral. The Court reaffirmed On Lee in UNITED STATES V. WHITE (1971).

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

OPEN FIELDS DOCTRINE

The FOURTH AMENDMENT protects "persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures." The amendment, held to embody a RIGHT OF PRIVACY, shelters certain enclaves from arbitrary government examination and interference. Within these enclaves, roughly defined as places where persons have a subjective expectation of privacy that society recognizes as reasonable—the paradigmatic case is the home—governmental SEARCHES AND SEIZURES are unreasonable unless authorized by a SEARCH WARRANT issued on PROBABLE CAUSE. There are some exceptions to this rule against WARRANTLESS SEARCHES, however, and the open fields doctrine presents one of them.

In applying the Fourth Amendment to detached dwellings the Supreme Court has held that persons have a REASONABLE EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY in the home and its "curtilage." Curtilage is the area immediately surrounding the home that harbors the intimate activities associated with domestic life and home privacies. Proximity to the home, containment within an enclosure surrounding the home, use for domestic and private purposes, and steps taken to protect the area from observation all help to define its ambit.

The open fields doctrine permits warrantless searches of private land outside the curtilage. The right of privacy that the Fourth Amendment protects is therefore not congruent with the right of property ownership, and exercise of the COMMON LAW right to exclude persons from land cannot make governmental searches of it unlawful. Further, under the doctrine open fields need be neither open nor fields, but only areas of land outside the curtilage. Fenced dense woods could therefore qualify as open fields. Consequently, neither the natural seclusion of property, which might be thought to make it private, nor efforts to keep trespassers out, such as posting with signs or surrounding with fences, secures it from governmental search.

GARY GOODPASTER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Plain View Doctrine.)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE 1987 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

OPEN HOUSING LAWS

Many believe housing, the last major area covered by Congress's 1960s CIVIL RIGHTS program, to be the key to at least short-term progress in INTEGRATION. Despite numerous ANTIDISCRIMINATION LAWS, segregated housing patterns threaten much of the civil rights agenda, including integrated public education. Yet until the 1960s the federal government promoted segregated housing. Federal housing agencies, such as the Federal Housing Administration, required racially RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS in federally assisted projects. In Executive Order 11063 (1962), President JOHN F. KENNEDY prohibited housing discrimination in federal public housing and in housing covered by mortgages directly guaranteed by the federal government. Title VI of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, which outlawed discrimination in programs receiving federal financial assistance, extended the ban to nearly all federally assisted housing.

Title VIII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1968 was the first comprehensive federal open housing law. Title VIII bans discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, or national origin in the sale, lease, and financing of housing, and in the furnishing of real estate brokerage services. A 1974 amendment extends the ban to discrimination on the basis of sex. Title VIII exempts single-family houses sold or rented by owners and small, owner-occupied boarding houses. Congress's consideration of Title VIII was affected by the assassination of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. House opponents of the measure had tried to delay its consideration in the hope that intervening national events would sway Congress against it. But during the delay, Dr. King was assassinated and passage of the act followed swiftly.

Courts have construed Title VIII to cover activities other than the direct purchase, sale, or lease of a dwelling. For example, Title VIII prohibits discriminatory refusals to rezone for low-income housing. Most courts find that practices with greater adverse impact on minorities, even if undertaken without discriminatory purposes, impose some burden of justification. This view links Title VIII litigation to a similar line of EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION cases decided under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

To enforce its provisions, Title VIII authorizes the secretary of housing and urban development to seek to conciliate disputes, but the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) initially must defer to state or local housing agencies where state law provides relief substantially equivalent to Title VIII. In Gladstone, Realtors v. Village of Bellwood (1979) the Supreme Court held that Title VIII also authorized direct civil actions in federal court without prior resort to HUD or to state authorities. An ATTORNEY GENERAL finding a pattern or practice of housing discrimination is authorized to seek relief in federal court.

Two months after Title VIII's enactment the Supreme Court found Section 1982, Title 42, United States Code, a remnant of section 1 of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866, to be another federal open housing law. Section 1982 grants all citizens the same right "as is enjoyed by white citizens" to purchase and lease real property. In JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968) the Court construed section 1982 to prohibit a racially motivated refusal to sell a home to a prospective black purchaser. In Sullivan v. Little Hunting Park, Inc. (1969) the Court found that violations of section 1982 may be remedied by damages awards or by injunctive relief. There are, therefore, two federal open housing laws, which, in the area of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, overlap. But section 1982 contains none of Title VIII's exemptions, provides for none of its administrative machinery, and contains no express list of remedies.

THEODORE EISNENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

BELL, DERRICK A., JR. 1980 Race, Racism and American Law, 2nd ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

DORSEN, NORMAN et al. 1976–1979 Political and Civil Rights in the United States, 4th ed. II:1063–1149. Boston: Little, Brown.

OPERATION RESCUE

See: Anti-Abortion Movement

OPINION OF THE COURT

An appellate court would give little guidance to inferior courts, the legal community, or the general public concerning the law if it merely rendered a DECISION and did not explain the RATIO DECIDENDI, or the grounds for its decision. It is the court's reading of the law and the application of legal principles to the facts that gives a reported case value as PRECEDENT and permits the judicial system to follow the doctrine of STARE DECISIS. By ancient custom, Anglo-American judges, at least at the appellate level, publish opinions along with their decisions.

The general practice of English courts at the time of the American Revolution, and the general practice today in most of the British Commonwealth, is for the members of multijudge courts to deliver their opinions SERIATIM, that is, severally and in sequence. This practice was followed by the United States SUPREME COURT during its early years. However, when JOHN MARSHALL became CHIEF JUSTICE in 1801 he instituted the practice of delivering a single "opinion of the court." The effect of this change was to put the weight of the whole Court behind a particular line of reasoning (usually Marshall's), and so to make that line of reasoning more authoritative. At the time, Marshall's innovation was criticized by many, including President THOMAS JEFFERSON, either because it permitted lazy Justices to evade the responsibility of thinking through the cases on their own or because it fortified the Federalist majority in its conflicts with Republican legislators and state governments.

The opinion of the court is not necessarily unanimous. A majority of the Justices customarily endorses a single opinion, however, and that majority opinion is issued as the opinion of the court, with the Chief Justice—or the senior Justice, if the Chief Justice is not in the majority—assigning responsibility for writing the opinion. A Justice who disagrees with the decision of the case may file a DISSENTING OPINION; a Justice who agrees with the result, but disagrees with the rationale, or desires to supplement the majority opinion, may file a CONCURRING OPINION. When there is no majority opinion, the opinion signed by the largest number of Justices in support of the decisions is called the PLURALITY OPINION, and no opinion of the court is issued. In some important cases in the past, and increasingly during the BURGER COURT years, the number of separate opinions has presented an appearance resembling a return to seriatim opinions.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

ORAL ARGUMENT

Lawyers argue points of law orally before courts at all levels. The Supreme Court regulates oral argument by court rule. Some cases are decided summarily, without full briefing and argument, on the papers filed by the parties seeking and opposing Supreme Court review. About 150 cases per TERM are decided with briefs and oral argument. The arguments begin in October, early in the term, and (absent extraordinary circumstances) end in the following April, so that all opinions can be finished by the end of the term.

In the Court's early years oral argument was a leisurely affair; argument in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) lasted nine days. Today, given the increase in the Court's business and increasing doubt that illumination is proportional to talk, argument is normally limited to one-half hour for each side. More time may be allocated to a case that is unusually complicated or important. Permission to argue is only rarely granted to an AMICUS CURIAE, except for the SOLICITOR GENERAL, who is often allowed to argue orally for the United States as amicus curiae.

The Justices have already read the briefs when they hear counsel. Accordingly, oral argument is no longer a place for oratory. Justices interrupt with their questions and even conduct debates with each other through rhetorical questions to counsel. Time limits on argument are strictly enforced; the red light flashes on the lectern, and counsel stops.

Normally within a few days after oral argument the Justices meet in CONFERENCE to discuss groups of cases and vote tentatively on their disposition. The Justices regularly say that oral argument, fresh in their minds, influences their thinking in "close" cases. Whether a case is close, however, is a characterization very likely formed before a Justice hears what counsel have to say.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

STERN, ROBERT L. and GRESSMAN, EUGENE 1978 Supreme Court Practice, 5th ed. Chap. 14. Washington, D.C.: Bureau of National Affairs.

ORDERED LIBERTY

A loosely used term, diversely applied in scholarly literature and judicial opinions, "ordered liberty" suggests that fundamental constitutional rights are not absolute but are determined by a balancing of the public (societal) welfare against individual (personal) rights. In this dialectical perspective, the thesis is "order," its antithesis "liberty"; the synthesis, "ordered liberty," describes a polity that has reconciled the conflicting demands of public order and personal freedom.

Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO's majority opinion for the Court in PALKO V. CONNECTICUT (1937) provided what was probably the first judicial recognition of "ordered liberty." Acknowledging the difficulty of achieving "proper order and coherence," Cardozo identified some constitutionally enumerated rights that were not of the essence of a scheme of "ordered liberty," and thus not incorporated in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and applied to the states: "to abolish [these rights] is not to violate a principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked fundamental." On the other hand, rights such as "freedom of thought and speech" were "of the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty" because they constituted "the matrix, the indispensable condition, of nearly every other form of freedom."

HENRY J. ABRAHAM
(1986)

Bibliography

ABRAHAM, HENRY J. 1987 Freedom and the Court: Civil Rights and Liberties in the United States, 5th ed. New York: Oxford University Press.

ORDINANCE OF 1784

One of the most important constitutional questions of the founding era was that of the status of the western TERRITORIES. In 1783, as a concession to secure ratification of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, states with claims to western lands ceded them to Congress. In April 1784 Congress adopted an ordinance of government for the ceded territory drafted by THOMAS JEFFERSON. That ordinance, although it never went into effect, embodied the principle that the territories were not to be mere colonies but would become states within the Union. The principle was fulfilled under the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE and the Constitution.

The Ordinance of 1784 created eight "states" in the West and prescribed for them three stages of evolution culminating in full equality with the original thirteen states. But, unlike the Northwest Ordinance, which provided for gradual advance toward self-government by the settlers, the Ordinance of 1784 conferred self-government immediately. Jefferson's proposal to ban SLAVERY from the territories was defeated in Congress by a vote of seven states to six.

Rather than allow squatters to benefit, Congress made the Ordinance effective only when the western lands were officially offered for sale, and that did not happen until after the Ordinance was superseded.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

OREGON v. BRADSHAW

See: Edwards v. Arizona

OREGON v. ELSTAD
470 U.S. 298 (1985)

The Supreme Court reaffirmed MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) yet made another exception to it. For a 6–3 majority, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR held that initial failure to comply with the MIRANDA RULES does not taint a second confession made after a suspect has received the required warnings and has waived his rights. In this case the suspect had not blurted out an incriminating statement before police questioned him. They arrested him, with a warrant, at his home and began an interrogation without advising him of his rights. He confessed. They took him to the station and gave him the warnings, but they did not inform him that his prior confession could not be used against him as proof of his guilt. O'Connor, commenting that a contrary decision might "disable the police," ruled that the second confession need not be suppressed because of the illegality of the first. She treated the illegal confession as if it had been voluntarily made. Her focus on the voluntariness of that initial confession suggested that if coercion had then been present, it would have tainted a second confession made after the Miranda warnings. The Court, therefore, reaffirmed Miranda. Nevertheless, the case taught that the police may ignore Miranda, secure a confession, and then give the warnings in the hope of getting an admissible confession once the suspect thinks "the cat is out of the bag." Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN savaged the Court's opinion in a dissent that O'Connor claimed had an "apocalyptic tone" and distorted much of what she had said. She denied Brennan's accusation that the majority's opinion had a "crippling" effect on Miranda.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

OREGON v. HASS

See: Police Interrogation and Confessions

OREGON v. MITCHELL
400 U.S. 112 (1970)

This decision suggested some short-lived constitutional limits on Congress's power to regulate voting. The 1970 amendments to the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 lowered from twenty-one to eighteen the minimum voting age for federal, state, and local elections, suspended LITERACY TESTS throughout the nation, prohibited states from imposing RESIDENCE REQUIREMENTS in presidential elections, and provided for uniform national rules for absentee registration and voting in presidential elections. (See VOTING RIGHTS AMENDMENTS.) The Supreme Court unanimously upheld the suspension of literacy tests and over Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN'S dissent, found the residency and absentee voting provisions valid. Four Justices found the age limit reduction constitutional for all elections and four Justices found it unconstitutional for all elections. Because Justice HUGO T. BLACK found the age limit reduction constitutional only for federal elections, the case's formal HOLDING, though reflecting only Justice Black's view, was to sustain the age reduction only in federal elections. The many separate opinions in Mitchell also reviewed the question, first addressed in KATZENBACH V. MORGAN (1966), of Congress's power to interpret and alter the scope of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. In 1971, in reponse to Mitchell, the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT lowered the voting age to eighteen in all elections.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

ORGANIZED CRIME CONTROL ACT
84 Stat. 922 (1970)

Heralded as the most comprehensive federal law ever enacted to combat organized crime, this act was not limited to that use alone. Its provisions applied to a wide range of offenses, on the theory that the involvement of organized crime in a particular criminal act is not always clear. The detection of such involvement was one purpose of the law.

The LEGISLATION contained thirteen titles, a number of which aroused sharp criticism on constitutional grounds. One controversial title reinforced and expanded the investigatory power of GRAND JURIES by authorizing special grand juries to return INDICTMENTS and to report to UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS concerning criminal misconduct by appointive public officials involving organized criminal activity or concerning organized crime conditions in their areas. An individual named in such a report was entitled to a grand jury hearing, with the right to call witnesses and to file a rebuttal to the report. Another title replaced all previous laws governing witness IMMUNITY GRANTS; the title authorized federal legislative, administrative, and judicial bodies to grant witnesses immunity from prosecution using their testimony. The new section thus substituted "use immunity" for the "transaction immunity" that had previously protected such witnesses from prosecution for any events mentioned in or related to their testimony regardless of independent evidence against them.

Other provisions authorized detention of recalcitrant witnesses for CONTEMPT until they complied with court orders to testify, but for no longer than eighteen months, authorized convictions for perjury based on obviously contradictory statements made under oath (no longer requiring proof of the crime by any particular number of witnesses or by any particular type of EVIDENCE), and the use of depositions in criminal cases subject to constitutional guarantees and certification by the ATTORNEY GENERAL that the case involved organized crime. Still other sections limited to five years the period in which government action to obtain evidence could be challenged as illegal and limited the disclosure of government records previously required by ALDERMAN V. UNITED STATES (1969). Finally, the act authorized increased sentences up to twenty-five years for persons convicted of felonies, provided they were found to be dangerous and to be "habitual" offenders, "professional" criminals, or "organized crime figures."

Although the whole measure was denounced by the New York City Bar Association as containing "the seeds of official repression," only the narrowed witness immunity provisions were challenged. In KASTIGAR V. UNITED STATES (1972) the Supreme Court ruled that they did not violate the Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY 1973 Congress and the Nation, vol. 3. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly.

ORIGINAL INTENT

"Original intent" is a shorthand term for both a familiar topic of CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY and a problematic theory of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. As a historical problem, the quest for original intent seeks to discover what particular provisions of the Constitution meant at the moment of their adoption, whether to the Framers in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 (or Congress, in the case of subsequent amendments), the ratifiers in the state conventions and legislatures, or the citizenry in general. As a mode of constitutional interpretation, however, original intent suggests that the true meaning of these provisions was in some sense fixed at the point of their adoption and that later interpreters of the Constitution should adhere to that original meaning.

The earliest version of original intent can be traced as far back as the 1790s, when JAMES MADISON sought to develop a mode of interpretation that could counter the loose canon of Hamiltonian construction. More recently, the call for a return to a "jurisprudence of original intent" held a central place in the campaign by the administration of RONALD REAGAN to challenge controversial decisions taken by the Supreme Court under Chief Justices EARL WARREN and WARREN E. BURGER. In many areas of constitutional law, conservatives argued, the Court had freely ignored the original meaning of particular provisions of the Constitution in order to impose its own values on society. In so doing, conservatives further alleged, the Court had also usurped powers the Constitution vested in the political branches of government, thereby violating its original meaning in a second and more fundamental sense.

Yet the appeal of the theory of original intent has never been confined to conservatives alone. On many issues, liberals can invoke the authority of the Framers and ratifiers of the Constitution just as easily. In recent controversies over the conduct of FOREIGN AFFAIRS, for example, liberals have effectively argued that the Framers and ratifiers of the Constitution did not expect the executive to have unilateral initiative in making foreign policy or the power to commit American forces to combat without the active approval of Congress. Judged pragmatically, the theory of original intent is neither inherently conservative nor inherently liberal. It is, instead, a style of constitutional argument that particular parties can invoke whenever the available historical evidence promises to support their immediate cause.

Modern proponents of a jurisprudence of original intent rest their case on democratic norms. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land not merely because Article VI says so but because its authority can be traced to extraordinary acts of POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY, whether in the state ratification conventions of 1787–1790 or through the congressional and state legislative supermajorities required to secure amendments. By contrast, the Supreme Court Justices who ultimately interpret the Constitution are the least politically accountable officers in the entire system of governance. When judges abuse the power of JUDICIAL REVIEW to impose values not securely rooted in the constitutional text, originalists argue, they effectively nullify the sovereign will of the people as that will is expressed in the great acts of constitution-making or in the ordinary legislative decisions the Court chooses to overturn. If fundamental constitutional change is called for, originalists suggest, it should be achieved through the amendment procedures of Article V, not by judicial fiat.

Critics of this modern version of ORIGINALISM challenge this position on several grounds. They argue, first, that the unwieldy requirements of Article V render the Constitution so difficult to amend that it is far better to rely on constitutional evolution through judicial interpretation and political innovation than to insist that its original meaning be preserved inviolate until the necessary supermajoritarian consensus can be mobilized. Nor is it clear why decisions made by judges who are appointed by politically accountable Presidents and senators should be regarded as more arbitrary or less democratic than those earlier decisions imposed by generations dead and gone. Finally, the criticism that judges act undemocratically by extending the definition and protection of constitutional rights misses the obvious point that it has always been the duty of the judiciary to protect individual and minority rights against majority abuse.

These objections are, in a sense, normative: they ask whether a jurisprudence of original intent is desirable, not whether it is practicable. But other reservations about the merits of this theory of interpretation rest on narrower grounds of practicality. Some of these reservations concern the adequacy of the historical evidence on which all appeals to the original meaning rest; others reflect doubts about the capacity of judges or other officials to use this evidence intelligently and objectively. The idea that adherence to original intent would always work to constrain judges is itself questionable. A historical record that is ambiguous or murky may actually broaden the interpretive latitude within which a willful judge might choose to roam.

Perhaps the single most telling problem of evidence involves the difficult task of recovering what the ratifiers of the Constitution understood they were adopting when they expressed the sovereign will of the people. Under the strict theory of original intent, the understandings of the ratifiers command the greatest weight in interpretive efforts, because it was their actions—as opposed to the proceedings in the Federal Convention or Congress—that alone gave legal force to the constitutional text. Unfortunately, the records of the debates in the state ratification conventions of 1787–1788 (or in the state legislatures for the BILL OF RIGHTS and later amendments) seem less than adequate. Whole days of debate—and in some states, entire conventions—went unreported; numerous provisions of the Constitution went unexamined; and in the end, the delegates who passed judgment on the Constitution voted only on whether or not they wanted to accept the document as a whole. Thus, although the ratification records are rich enough to allow scholars to survey the general grounds on which the Constitution was supported or opposed, they cannot conclusively illuminate what its various provisions meant to the obscure state politicians who ratified it, much less the anonymous—though sovereign—people they represented.

James Madison was aware of this problem when, in the mid-1790s, he first argued that the understanding of the ratifiers could legitimately constrain the reach of interpretation. Although Madison never explained exactly how one could determine what the Constitution meant in a positive sense, he did believe that it was possible to challenge interpretations that either had not been offered at the time of adoption or would have been rejected out of hand if they had been candidly stated.

Regardless of the legal arguments that favor the authority of the ratifiers, in practice few interpreters of the Constitution are inclined to ignore evidence about the intentions of its actual Framers. Much of the debate about the original allocation of the WAR POWERS, for example, centers on the Federal Convention's decision to substitute the verb "declare" for "make" in the clause giving Congress the authority to declare war. Scholars have similarly canvassed the congressional debates about the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT for clues about the original meaning of its frequently controverted clauses.

The great advantage that inquiries into the Framers' intentions enjoy over ratifiers' understandings is that the former may better help to explain how and why a particular provision acquired its precise textual form. Yet even then, there is no ready way to demonstrate how well any one comment or set of comments represented the range of intentions and expectations that typically inform any collective political decision. Many studies of legislative voting suggest that all exercises in collective decision making are inherently ambiguous.

Given all these difficulties, it is not surprising that most judicial forays into originalist interpretation receive low marks from knowledgeable scholars. Judges and their law clerks are not trained historians, and they repeatedly err in their treatment of the historical evidence on which they necessarily rely. On this basis alone it can be strongly argued that originalism can never offer much more than a rhetorical strategy to justify decisions taken on more complex grounds.

That argument does not imply, however, that originalism has no role to play in modern CONSTITUTIONALISM. Even if it is impossible to ascertain fixed original meanings for the Constitution's most disputed and "open-textured" clauses, a sound historical approach can still reconstruct the general contours of the debates from which they emerged. Moreover, the fact that Americans repeatedly invoke the authority of Framers and ratifiers—especially "the founders" of 1787–1788—in their constitutional disputes may reveal something important about American political culture. Originalism can never be a dispositive theory of interpretation, but neither can it be entirely deposed from the place it has repeatedly claimed in American constitutional discourse.

JACK N. RAKOVE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Conservatism; Deconstructionism; Incorporation Doctrine and Original Intent; Interpretivism; Liberalism; Noninterpretivism; Political Philosophy of the Constitution; Strict Construction.)

Bibliography

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1988 Original Intent and the Framers' Constitution. New York: Macmillan.

LOFGREN, CHARLES 1986 "Government from Reflection and Choice": Constitutional Essays on War, Foreign Relations, and Federalism. New York: Oxford University Press.

RAKOVE, JACK N., ed. 1990 Interpreting the Constitution: The Debate over Original Intent. Boston: Northeastern University Press.

ORIGINALISM

"Originalism" is a term used to describe the view that judicial decisions regarding the Constitution must be based on the ORIGINAL INTENT of those who participated in the framing and enactment of the original Constitution and later amendments. For example, originalists regard the issue of the constitutional validity of the death penalty as easily resolved by the explicit references in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the deliberate taking of life by government, indicating that the Constitution expressly contemplates the imposition of the death penalty. The Fifth Amendment states that "[n]o person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, . . . put in jeopardy of life or limb; . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property . . ." and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, likewise guarantees that "[n]o state shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property. . . ."

Originalists justify their view on the grounds that focusing on original intent both limits the intrusion of the subjective political values of judges in constitutional decisions and gives due respect to democratic processes. Originalists argue that the intent of the Framers will sometimes accord with the personal views of judges and sometimes not. Application of this intent, therefore, will limit the ability of judges to impose their personal views on various issues upon the nation. Originalists also point out that the Constitution contains democratic amendment procedures and that the use of criteria other than original intent would enable judges to subvert both the democratic processes that led to the enactment of particular constitutional provisions and the democratic processes that provide for amendments. Finally, originalists argue that originalism is the only theory that can legitimate the institution of judicial review, which is a method of ensuring that the Constitution, as a superior law adopted by the people, constrains all organs of government, including the courts. MARBURY V. MADISON, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 179–180 (1803).

Critics of originalism generally rely on two lines of attack. The first line is that the intent of the Framers is difficult and often impossible to determine. As Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN said: "It is arrogant to pretend that from our vantage we can gauge accurately the intent of the Framers on application of principle to specific, contemporary questions." Doubt as to our present ability to learn the intent of the Framers fuels the suspicion among observers more cynical than Justice Brennan that lip service to supposed evidence of original intent is actually a façade behind which judges weave their subjective political values into the fabric of constitutional law. Second, critics argue that our concepts of civilized rule constantly evolve and that originalism affords too niggardly a protection for profoundly important rights. Again, Justice Brennan put the matter succinctly in describing his position on the constitutionality of the death penalty: "Because we are the last word on the meaning of the Constitution, our views must be subject to revision over time, or the Constitution falls captive, again, to the anachronistic views of long-gone generations." He thus felt free to argue that the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT (applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment) prohibits the death penalty notwithstanding the specific references to the death penalty in the Fifth Amendment, which was part of the BILL OF RIGHTS package that included the Eighth, and the more general reference to the death penalty in the Fourteenth Amendment itself.

In response to the first criticism—that the intent of the Framers regarding contemporary constitutional litigation is not ascertainable—originalists divide into what might be called an "intentionalist" school of thought and an "interpretivist" school of thought.

Members of the intentionalist school search for the actual state of mind of the Framers at the pertinent time, based on the language of the constitutional text, preconstitutional precedents, sometimes involving British law, or explicit legislative history. In their view, a judicial decision that is not based on explicit constitutional language or direct evidence of an actual intent held by the Framers is an illegitimate decision. The intentionalist school is best illustrated by the work of Raoul Berger. Berger has thus concluded that BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA (1954) was an illegitimate decision because of the lack of an explicit reference to DESEGREGATION in the Fourteenth Amendment and because of evidence that some of the Framers stated during the framing and ratification period that public, segregated, educational institutions would pass constitutional muster under the Fourteenth Amendment. He has also denied the existence of an EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE because of the failure of the Constitution to mention such a privilege and the lack of precedent in colonial or preexisting law.

INTERPRETIVISM, on the other hand, insists only that constitutional decisions be, in Dean John Hart Ely's (not himself an originalist) words, "in accord with an inference whose starting point, whose underlying premise, is fairly discoverable in the Constitution. That the complete reference will not be found there—because the situation is not likely to have been foreseen—is generally common ground." For interpretivists, the name originalism is thus a bit of a misnomer, at least to the extent that it suggests that express language of the Constitution or evidence of the actual state of mind of the Framers are the sole legitimate criteria for constitutional adjudication.

Interpretivists take the view that CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION must apply the conventional legal criteria used by lawyers in interpreting other legal texts. As Judge Robert H. Bork, certainly the most noted originalist, has stated, the search for original intent is "the everyday procedure of lawyers and judges when they must apply a statute, a contract, a will, or the opinion of a court." These criteria, of course, are designed to determine the purposes of the text. Democratic processes demand that statutory interpretation be governed by LEGISLATIVE INTENT. Contract law stresses the purposes of the parties, estate law stresses the intent of the testator, and the doctrine of STARE DECISIS stresses the meaning of prior decisions. Drawing on an analogy between these fields of law and constitutional law, interpretivists believe that constitutional law must stress the meaning of the document, which for them, as Professor Henry Monaghan has stated, is not so much the state of mind of the Framers as the "public understanding" of what particular constitutional provisions were intended to achieve.

Constitutional adjudication is thus for interpretivists much more than a search for express language, colonial or English precedent, or direct evidence of intent (or lack thereof) that produces a mechanical result in each case. Language or other direct evidence of intent is of course important in their view and dispositive when, as in the case of the death penalty, explicit consideration was given to the particular issue. Certainly, they would argue, the fact that the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit imposition of the death penalty without DUE PROCESS OF LAW is inconsistent with a judicial decision holding that the death penalty violates the Constitution in any and all circumstances.

Beyond such cases in which direct evidence of intent, such as language in the Constitution or legislative history, is dispositive, the interpretive view of originalism provides considerable scope for the exercise of judgment and for disagreement. This is not surprising because the conventional legal criteria applied by lawyers in interpreting statutes, contracts, or other legal documents extend well beyond language or express intent. Legal documents frequently provide evidence of only a very general purposebb that courts must adapt to the circumstances of each case. Courts legitimately, therefore, read into statutes commands or exceptions to commands that have no basis in the express statutory language, but are believed necessary to effectuate the overall legislative purpose. For example, in Reves v. Ernst Young (1990), the Supreme Court held that the phrase "any note" in the definitional section of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 does not literally mean "any note," but must be understood in terms of what Congress sought to accomplish by enacting the statute; and in Haggar Co. v. Helvering (1940), the Court held in light of the statutory purpose that "[a] timely amended return is as much a "first return' . . . as is a single return filed by the taxpayer. . . ." Courts must do this because of the inability of drafters to anticipate the myriad circumstances in which the meaning of the statute must be divined, obvious drafting errors, or changes in the relevant industrial practice or technology. Similarly, courts may adapt contractual language to changed circumstances or impose duties, such as the duty to act in good faith where the contract accords considerable discretion to one party, notwithstanding the lack of express contractual language. Application of this mode of analysis to constitutional interpretation is essential because constitutional language is more general than most statutes and private contracts, and the interstices thus tend to be considerably wider.

Interpretivists believe that the Framers could not foresee all of the circumstances to which particular constitutional provisions might be applied and that judges must attempt to adapt what evidence of purpose there is to changed circumstances. Many interpretivists thus believe that contrary to Raoul Berger's conclusion Brown was fully legitimate. The interpretivists argue that the specific expectations of those Framers who stated that segregated education would survive the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment were not faced with direct evidence that segregated educational systems were palpably inconsistent with the amendment's core purpose of relieving blacks of obstacles imposed by law. The interpretivist school thus takes into account the very limited experience these Framers had with both segregated schools and public education itself and feels free to override their particularized expectations in order to satisfy the basic philosophy of the EQUAL PROTECTION clause.

Similarly, the interpretivist school is willing to adapt constitutional provisions to other changed circumstances. For example, in Ollman v. Evans (D.C. Circuit, 1984), Judge Bork wrote with regard to the interplay of the First Amendment and the law of LIBEL:

> We know very little of the precise intentions of the framers and ratifiers of the speech and press clauses of the first amendment. But we do know they gave into the judges' keeping the value of preserving free expression and, in particular, the preservation of political expression, which is commonly conceded to be the value at the core of these clauses. Perhaps the framers did not envision libel actions as a major threat to that freedom. . . . But if, over time, the libel action evolves so that it becomes a threat to the central meaning of the first amendment, why should not judges adapt their doctrines? . . . It is no different to refine and evolve doctrine here, so long as one is faithful to the basic meaning of the amendment, than it is to adapt the fourth amendment to take account of electronic means of surveillance, the commerce clause to adjust to interstate motor carriage, or the first amendment to encompass the electronic media. . . .

Moreover, interpretivists feel free to draw what Professor Charles L. Black has called inferences "from the structures and relationships created by the Constitution." Again, this interpretive method is commonly used by lawyers and judges to interpret legal texts. The Supreme Court's opinions regarding private actions under the securities laws brim with inferences as to the scope and content of one remedial provision drawn from the scope and content of other remedial provisions. Interpretation of contracts also often requires courts to infer obligations from the structure of the parties' relationship.

Because the Constitution established a nation to be governed by a designated governmental structure, this interpretive method is particularly suited to constitutional law. Black has thus argued that an inference from structure reconciles the Supreme Court's scrutiny of state regulation claimed to discriminate against INTERSTATE COMMERCE with the absence in the constitutional texts of any explicit prohibition of such state conduct; the freedom of commerce from local discrimination is implicit in the economic structure of nationhood and the fact that "we are one people, commercially as otherwise. . . ." One can similarly infer some form of executive, legislative, or judicial privilege from the Constitution's SEPARATION OF POWERS. Were one branch routinely to compel disclosure of the internal decisional consultations of another branch, the latter branch might find its decision making skewed and the exercise of its legitimate powers subject to substantial encroachment by the other branch. This result would be contrary to the Constitution's purpose of establishing separate and independent branches of government.

Drawing inferences from structure and relationships is thus a legitimate method of determining the intent of the Framers. This intent, of course, is not the Framers' conscious thoughts or expectations, but the adaptation of the general principle they sought to establish to particular factual situations. Indeed, unless a judge is willing to draw such inferences, the intent of the Framers may go unfulfilled. For example, as Black has argued, even if the First Amendment had not been adopted, a judge might legitimately conclude that the various provisions for free elections for federal office could not fulfill their purpose if either federal or state governments were free to prohibit speeches by candidates for federal office or their supporters. To effectuate the purposes of the electoral provisions—to effectuate original intent—some form of protection for political speech similar to First Amendment doctrine would have to be fashioned by courts.

Having concluded that neither the constitutional text, legislative history, nor inferences from structures and relationships address a claim of a right, originalists believe that courts should not recognize that right. Originalists thus typically argue that ROE V. WADE (1973) was incorrectly decided because there is no evidence that either the generalized RIGHT TO PRIVACY relied on in the decision's brief doctrinal discussion or the specific issue of ABORTION has even been addressed by any constitutional provision. This view is fortified in the minds of originalists by the seeming disarray among Wade's defenders as to the doctrinal basis for the decision, which ranges from an implied right of privacy protecting individual autonomy in sexual or procreative matters to the First Amendment's religion clause, to the equal protection clause, and to the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT's prohibition on involuntary servitude.

In some cases, evidence of purpose or inferences drawn from structures or relationships may yield no guidance for interpretation of a particular constitutional provision. In such a case, originalists believe that judges should accord no judicially enforceable meaning to that provision because the only available criteria for establishing that meaning are the judiciary's subjective views of what is good constitutional policy. Originalists thus typically view the NINTH AMENDMENT ("The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people") or the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the Fourteenth Amendment ("No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States") as such clauses. The language of these provisions does not make any cogent choice between alternative legal rules, and their history appears to lack any evidence of judicially enforceable purpose. This being the case, originalist theory holds that judges should not undertake to attribute meaning to these provisions. To the argument that the Framers may have intended that courts undertake the task of giving meaning to such clauses, originalists generally answer that there is nothing in the constitutional record to suggest that such substantial power was to be accorded to the judiciary.

On one issue—adherence to PRECEDENT—originalist theory is unclear. As the preceding discussion has indicated, the interpretive school of originalism calls simply for the application of conventional legal criteria to constitutional interpretation. In nonconstitutional areas, such criteria certainly include judicial precedent. Thus, one does not infrequently encounter statutes whose interpretation over time seems to have departed rather far from their language or legislative purpose. The doctrine of stare decisis, however, generally precludes courts from undoing settled interpretations. Similarly, contractual clauses are used by lawyers to achieve particular purposes, even though the purposes and the particular language seem at best distantly related. Lawyers continue to use them, however, because courts have previously attributed to these clauses the purposes in question.

One would therefore expect interpretivists at least to put a heavy weight on precedent and to overrule precedent only infrequently. However, this expectation clashes with the argument that a reluctance to overrule precedent gives an advantage to those who would base constitutional decisions on criteria deemed by originalists to be invalid. Unless originalists are willing to overrule precedent, it can be argued, the Constitution will, over time, spawn a body of law considerably at odds with original intent. Indeed, Professor Monaghan has pointed out that much of present constitutional law "is at variance with what we know of the original understanding."

With regard to the criticism that originalism affords inadequate protection for profoundly important rights, originalists rarely answer with a denial. Originalism does not claim to offer a comprehensive formula for civilized rule or an optimal set of individual rights. Rather, it purports to offer the correct role for the judiciary in a democratic society. It posits that lodging the ultimate decision-making power of the state in a nonelected branch of government must ultimately subordinate the elected branches and subvert democratic rule itself. It denies the existence of a natural law that can be discovered and applied by judges in a manner consistent with democratic principles. Originalists see in the various attempts by scholars to fashion nonoriginalist criteria for constitutional decision making faintly disguised political movements seeking to achieve in court what they have been unable to secure in elections.

At bottom, then, originalism is based on the view that judges must confine their role to the application and enforcement of principles that have become constitutional law through the adoption of the Constitution or the amendment of the Constitution itself. Originalism is neutral with regard to particular rights in the sense that a persuasive argument that a right is necessary to civilized rule will not carry the day in court without an anchoring of that argument in the Constitution; nevertheless, originalism is not a nihilistic philosophy. Rather, it prizes democratic rule and demands that restrictions on this rule be the result of the adoption and amendment procedures set out in the Constitution. Originalists thus view the orderly democratic procedures of the Constitution as superior to claims of substantive rights that have not been adopted through such procedures. For originalists, rule by judiciary is not the road to civilized rule or optimal individual rights.

The future of originalism is unclear. The Senate's failure to confirm Judge Bork was based in part on the criticisms of originalism previously described. Many originalists are puzzled at the recent controversy over their view because many of their critics seem not to quarrel with the application of conventional legal criteria to other legal texts such as statutes or contracts. Moreover, originalists view their methodology as politically neutral. Nevertheless, the Bork controversy illustrated the difficulty of defending originalism in a political context. Because originalists do not believe that the Constitution enshrines every right necessary to avoid every wrong—including serious wrongs—originalists can be mistakenly perceived as favoring those wrongs. Judge Bork was thus depicted by some as favoring POLL TAXES because he had written that such taxes did not violate the equal protection clause.

Originalists fear that the difficulty of defending their position politically will fundamentally alter the American system of government. In their view, judicial nominations and Senate confirmation proceedings may, in the worst-case scenario, become highly politicized in the sense that nominees may be required to make commitments about future decisions equivalent to political promises. These promises will be made to appease groups that seek to constitutionalize their claims and have sufficient political power to extract such promises. If so, originalists fear, constitutional law will become an incoherent body of rules having no connection with the document and resulting from random constellations of political forces and the idiosyncratic views of particular Supreme Court Justices.

RALPH K. WINTER
(1992)

Bibliography

BLACK, CHARLES L. 1969 Structure and Relationship in Constitutional Law. Baton Rouge, La.: Louisiana State University Press.

BORK, ROBERT H. 1990 The Tempting of America: The Political Seduction of the Law. New York: Free Press.

FEDERALIST SOCIETY 1986 Interpreting Our Written Constitution (Occasional Paper No. 2). Washington, D.C.: The Federalist Society.

MCDOWELL, GARY 1985 The Constitution and Contemporary Constitutional Theory. Cumberland, Va.: Center for Judicial Studies.

MONAGHAN, HENRY 1981 Our Perfect Constitution. New York University Law Review 56:353–376.

ORIGINAL JURISDICTION

The original jurisdiction of a court (as distinguished from APPELLATE JURISDICTION) is its power to hear and decide a case from the beginning. In the federal court system, the district courts originally hear the overwhelming majority of cases. Most discussion and litigation concerning the JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS centers on the district courts' original JURISDICTION. Yet the term "original jurisdiction" is heard most frequently in discussion and litigation concerning the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

The Constitution itself establishes the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction. After setting out the types of cases subject to the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES, Article III distributes the Supreme Court's jurisdiction over them: "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction. . . ."

From the beginning, Congress has given the district courts CONCURRENT JURISDICTION over some of the cases within the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction, offering plaintiffs the option of commencing suit in either court. The Supreme Court has given this practice its stamp of constitutional approval. Furthermore, because the Court is hard-pressed by a crowded docket, it has sought ways of shunting cases to other courts. Thus, even when a case does fall within the Court's original jurisdiction, the court has conferred on itself the discretion to deny the plaintiff leave to file an original action. Typically the Court decides only three or four original jurisdiction cases each year, conserving its institutional energies for its main task: guiding the development of federal law by exercising its appellate jurisdiction.

Congress, however, cannot constitutionally diminish the Court's original jurisdiction. Nor can Congress expand that jurisdiction; the dubious reading of Article III in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) remains firmly entrenched. However, the Supreme Court does entertain some actions that have an "original" look to them, even though Article III does not list them as original jurisdiction cases: HABEAS CORPUS is an example; so are the common law WRITS OF MANDAMUS and PROHIBITION. The Court hears such cases only when they can be characterized as "appellate," calling for Supreme Court supervision of actions by lower courts.

Of the two types of original jurisdiction cases specified in Article III, the state-as-party case has produced all but a tiny handful of the cases originally decided by the Supreme Court. Officers of foreign governments enjoy a broad diplomatic immunity from suit in our courts, and, for motives no doubt similarly diplomatic, they have not brought suits in the Supreme Court. (The "ambassadors" and others mentioned in Article III, of course, are those of foreign governments, not our own.)

The state-as-party cases present obvious problems of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY. The ELEVENTH AMENDMENT applies to original actions in the Supreme Court; indeed, the amendment was adopted in response to just such a case, CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793). Thus a state can no more be sued by the citizen of another state in the Supreme Court than in a district court. However, when one state sues another, or when the United States or a foreign government sues a state, there is no bar to the Court's jurisdiction.

The spectacle of nine Justices of the Supreme Court jointly presiding over a trial has a certain Hollywood allure, but the Court consistently avoids such proceedings. The SEVENTH AMENDMENT commands TRIAL BY JURY in any common law action, and at first the Supreme Court did hold a few jury trials. The last one, however, took place in the 1790s. Since that time the Court has always managed to identify some feature of an original case that makes it a suit in EQUITY; thus jury trial is inappropriate, and findings of fact can be turned over to a SPECIAL MASTER, whose report is reviewed by the Court only as to questions of law.

The source of the substantive law applied in original actions between states is FEDERAL COMMON LAW, an amalgam of the Anglo-American common law, policies derived from congressional statutes, and international law principles. Thus far no state has defied the Supreme Court sufficiently to test the Court's means of enforcing its decrees, but some states have dragged out their compliance for enough years to test the patience of the most saintly Justice.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

NOTE 1959 The Original Jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court. Stanford Law Review 11:665–719.

ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE

In BROWN V. MARYLAND (1827) the Supreme Court had before it a challenge to a state statute requiring all importers of goods from foreign countries to take out a $50 license. Instead of simply holding that such a license tax imposed only on importers from foreign countries violated the constitutional clause prohibiting states from laying "any IMPOSTS or duties on imports or exports," Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL used the occasion to decide just when goods imported from abroad ceased being imports exempted from taxation by the states. He concluded that no tax could be imposed on the goods or their importer so long as the goods had not been sold and were held in the original packages in which they were imported. He also said the principles laid down "apply equally to importations from a sister state."

The original package DOCTRINE had a long career as applied to goods imported from abroad. In Low v. Austin (1872) the Court held that a state could not collect its uniform property tax on cases of wine which the importer held in their original package on tax day. Much later, in Hooven Allison Co. v. Evatt (1945), the Court applied the doctrine to immunize bales of hemp from state property taxation, so long as the importer held them in their original package—the bales. Along the way, not surprisingly, the Court struggled in many cases with such problems as what constitutes the original package, and when it is broken.

Finally, in MICHELIN TIRE CORP. V. WAGES (1976) the Court upheld the imposition of a nondiscriminatory property tax upon tires imported from abroad and held in their original packages. It discussed at length the decision in Low v. Austin, overruled it, and appeared to be saying that only taxes discriminating against FOREIGN COMMERCE will be held invalid. Hence, it appears that the rules governing taxation of imports will now be similar to those applied to taxing such goods from other states, with the original package doctrine playing no part in the decisions.

Marshall's suggestion in Brown v. Maryland that the original package doctrine applied to state taxation of goods imported from other states was early rejected. In WOODRUFF V. PARHAM (1869) the Court upheld a state sales tax applied to an auctioneer who brought goods from other states and sold them in the taxing state in the original and unbroken packages. The IMPORT-EXPORT CLAUSE was determined to apply only to traffic with foreign nations, not to interstate traffic. The Court indicated its feeling that it would be grossly unfair if a resident of a state could escape from state taxes on all merchandise that he was able to import from another state and keep in its original package.

In 1890, however, the Court held that the original package doctrine applied to invalidate state regulations of goods imported from other states until the goods were sold or the package broken. The decision, LEISY V. HARDIN (1890), invalidated a state prohibition law as applied to sales within the state by the importer of kegs and cases of beer. Federal statutes were then enacted permitting states to exclude alcohol even in original packages. But the original package doctrine persisted with reference to other state regulations for nearly half a century. The Court found reasons in many cases to avoid applying the doctrine but did not effectively repudiate it until 1935. In Baldwin v. G. A. F. Seelig (1935) the Court, after reviewing the cases applying the original package doctrine said:

> "In brief, the test of the original package is not an ultimate principle. . . . It makes a convenient boundary and one sufficiently precise save in exceptional conditions. What is ultimate is the principle that one state in its dealing with another may not place itself in a position of economic isolation. Formulas and catchwords are subordinate to this overmastering requirement."

Today the original package doctrine is of interest only to historians.

EDWARD L. BARRETT, JR.
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: State Regulation of Commerce; State Taxation of Commerce.)

Bibliography

NOWAK, JOHN E.; ROTUNDA, RONALD D.; and YOUNG, NELSON J. 1979 Handbook on Constitutional Law. Pages 285–290. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

POWELL, THOMAS R. 1945 State Taxation of Imports: When Does an Import Cease to Be an Import? Harvard Law Review 58:858–876.

RIBBLE, F. D. G. 1937 State and National Power over Commerce. New York: Columbia University Press.

OROZCO v. TEXAS
394 U.S. 324 (1969)

In an opinion by Justice HUGO L. BLACK, the Supreme Court held that a conviction based on incriminating admissions obtained by police in the absence of notification of the MIRANDA RULES, even though the prisoner was at home, away from the coercive surroundings of a stationhouse, violated the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

OSBORN v. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES
9 Wheaton 738 (1824)

On its constitutional merits, Osborn was a replay of MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819). Ohio had sought to drive out the congressionally chartered bank by taxing its branches $50,000 each and by seizing money from its vaults. The bank sued the state auditor in a federal court for recovery of the money. The state argued that the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT barred the court from taking JURISDICTION, but, on APPEAL to the Supreme Court, Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL concluded that the amendment applied only when the state was named as a party defendant—a position abandoned by the Court in later decisions. (See EX PARTE YOUNG.) On the principles of McCulloch, the auditor was liable for his TRESPASS.

Osborn's lasting doctrinal contribution was its sweeping definition of congressional power under Article III to confer FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION on the federal courts. Marshall's view, which remains good law, was that cases "arising under" the Constitution, or federal laws, or treaties included—for purposes of defining congressional power to confer jurisdiction—any case in which federal law might potentially be dispositive. It made no difference that federal law was not implicated in the bank's complaint for trespass; the arguable invalidity of the bank's charter might possibly be raised as a defense to such an action. Although similar words ("arises under") are used in the statutes defining federal question jurisdiction, they have been interpreted more narrowly. Osborn thus defines congressional power, not its exercise.

The Osborn decision heightened the vehemence of state denunciations of the Court's judicial nationalism and even of its appellate jurisdiction. President ANDREW JACKSON's veto of the bank bill of 1832 probably reflected the prevailing belief—despite McCulloch and Osborn—that Congress had no constitutional authority to charter a corporation.

LEONARD W. LEVY
KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

OSBORNE v. OHIO

See: Child Pornography

O'SHEA v. LITTLETON
414 U.S. 488 (1974)

Protesters against RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in Cairo, Illinois, obtained a federal court INJUNCTION against a state judge and magistrate, forbidding continuation of various discriminatory BAIL, sentencing, and jury-fee practices in criminal cases. The Supreme Court reversed, 6–3, on RIPENESS grounds. Although some plaintiffs had previously suffered such discrimination, none were now threatened with prosecution. Thus there was no live CASE OR CONTROVERSY.

Once a prosecution was commenced, YOUNGER V. HARRIS (1971) would forbid a federal injunction. (See ABSTENTION DOCTRINE.) Thus potential plaintiffs in such cases must file their complaints within a narrow time period.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

OTIS, JAMES, JR.
(1725–1783)

Massachusetts lawyer, Harvard graduate (1743), and ideologue of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, James Otis, Jr., became constitutionally significant with PAXTON'S CASE (1761), which concerned the issuance of WRITS OF ASSISTANCE by the Superior Court of Massachusetts. Confronted with the reality that the writs, which empowered customs officers to search all suspected houses, typified many kinds of general SEARCH WARRANTS within British law, Otis resorted to the HIGHER LAW. Using sources from MAGNA CARTA to BONHAM'S CASE (1610), Otis argued not only that incompatibility with natural and COMMON LAW rendered general searches void but also that the court should proclaim that invalidity. Although he did not advocate outright JUDICIAL REVIEW of an act of Parliament by a colonial court, the interpretation of the writs that Otis urged on the court would have had that result.

Although Otis's present fame derives heavily from Paxton's Case, he gained little contemporary notice from his performance in it, for his brief was not published until 1773. Rather, the principal constitutional services of the case were that it resulted in Otis's election to the Massachusetts General Court (legislative), thereby giving him a forum for his views and enabling him to assemble and rehearse the constitutional arguments that he later applied to those issues that directly generated the American Revolution.

Limiting the power of Parliament was central to Otis's thought: "To say the Parliament is absolute and arbitrary is a contradiction. The parliament cannot make 2 and 2, 5; Omnipotency cannot do it; the supreme power in a state is JUS DICERE [to announce the law] only;—JUS DARE [to construct the law] strictly speaking belongs only to God. . . . Should an act of Parliament be against any of his natural laws, which are immutably true, their declaration would be contrary to eternal truth, equity and justice, and consequently void." Otis's constitutional significance, however, does not emanate from this belief, which most contemporaries shared, but from the corollaries he extracted from it. Otis first transformed the British constitution into a fixed rather than a flexible barrier to Parliament, which he redefined as a subordinate creature of the constitution rather than one of its components. Of even greater import, Otis characterized the courts as umpires of Parliament's power. "The judges of England," he wrote, "have declared in favor of these sentiments when they expressly declare; that acts of Parliament against natural equity are void. That acts against the fundamental principles of the British Constitution are void." To assert that all earthly power, even that of Parliament, had limits was a ubiquitous platitude; to imply that agencies outside Parliament could calibrate and enforce these limits challenged the axiom of parliamentary supremacy that, for most Englishmen, lay at the foundation of their constitution.

A disembodied and didactic use of sources, ranging from Magna Carta to Hugo Grotius, provided Otis's intellectual ammunition. In Bonham's Case, for example, the Reports of Sir EDWARD COKE mentioned courts' controlling acts of Parliament and adjudging them void. Coke's meaning, however, was constructive rather than constitutional and involved no judicial effort to subjugate Parliament. The case pitted not the legislature against the courts but two clashing private parties and raised questions of which conflicting laws applied. Coke reasoned that the common law courts, acting with, rather than against, another court in the form of Parliament, should give the laws a reasonable construction that was jointly desired. Otis bloated the case, however, into precedent for constitutional regulation of Parliament under judicial aegis.

Otis repeatedly denied the revolutionary implications of his ideology, stressing that Parliament was the British Empire's supreme but not absolute legislature and could alone rescind its statutes. Despite these denials, however, Otis's assumptions intrinsically approached the threshold of the right to revolution against unconstitutional parliamentary acts.

Having asserted limits to Parliament's authority, Otis enumerated the colonial rights that lay beyond them. As a delegate to the STAMP ACT CONGRESS (1765) and in his Rights of the British Colonies (1764), written against the Sugar Act, Otis condemned taxation of the colonists by a Parliament to which they had directly elected no representatives. (See TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION.) As moderator of the Boston town meetings, he also opposed juryless trials under the TOWNSHEND ACTS of 1767.

Widely regarded as the premier theorist of the radical cause in the 1760s, Otis had great influence on the constitutional ideology of the developing revolution. He edited many of the Farmer's Letters (1767) by JOHN DICKINSON, while JOHN ADAMS adapted much of Otis's reasoning in Paxton's Case against juryless ADMIRALTY trials in Sewall v. Hancock (1768–1769).

WILLIAM J. CUDDIHY
(1986)

Bibliography

WATERS, JOHN 1968 The Otis Family. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

OVERBREADTH

Judges frequently encounter the claim that a law, as drafted or interpreted, should be invalidated as overbroad because its regulatory scope addresses not only behavior that constitutionally may be punished but also constitutionally protected behavior. The normal judicial response is confined to ruling on the law's constitutionality as applied to the litigant's behavior, leaving the validity of its application to other people and situations to subsequent adjudication. Since THORNHILL V. ALABAMA (1940), however, the Supreme Court has made an exception, most frequently in FIRST AMENDMENT cases but applicable to other precious freedoms, when it is convinced that the very existence of an overbroad law may cause knowledgeable people to refrain from freely exercising constitutional liberties because they fear punishment and are unwilling to litigate their rights. In such cases, the aggregate inhibition of guaranteed freedom in the regulated community is thought to justify both holding the overbroad law INVALID ON ITS FACE and allowing one to whom a narrower law could be applied constitutionally to assert the overbreadth claim. Unlike the alternative of narrowing the unconstitutional portions of an overbroad statute case by case, facial invalidation prevents delay in curing the improper deterrence. Moreover, courts most effectively can address the inhibition of those who neither act nor sue by allowing those who do to raise the overbreadth challenge.

Like a VAGUENESS challenge, an overbreadth challenge implicates judicial governance in two controversial ways. First, if successful, the challenge completely prohibits the law's enforcement, even its constitutional applications, until it is narrowed through reenactment or authoritative interpretation. Second, the challenge requires a court to gauge the law's applications to unidentified people in circumstances that must be imagined, often ignoring the facts of the situation before them—a practice of hypothesizing that is at odds with the court's usual application of law to the facts of concrete CASES OR CONTROVERSIES.

Overbreadth differs from vagueness in that the constitutional defect is a law's excessive reach, not its lack of clarity; yet the defects are related. A law that punished "all speech that is not constitutionally protected" would, by definition, not be overbroad, but it would be unduly vague because people would have to speculate about what it outlawed. A law that prohibited "all speaking" would be unconstitutionally overbroad, but it also might be vague. Although clear enough if taken literally, it might be understood that the legislature did not intend the full reach of its broadly drafted law, and the public would have to speculate about what the contours of the intended lesser reach might be. A law that banned "all harmful speech" would be both overbroad and vague on its face. The key connection, however, is the improper inhibiting effect of the broad or vague law.

As with vagueness, the federal courts approach overbreadth challenges to state and federal laws differently. A federal court must interpret a federal law before judging its constitutionality. In doing so, the court may reduce the law's scope, if it can do so consistently with Congress's intent, a course that may minimize constitutional problems of overbreadth. Only state courts may authoritatively determine the reach of state laws, however. Consequently, when the Supreme Court reviews an overbreadth challenge to a state law on appeal from a state court—which review usually occurs because the challenger raised the claim in defense of state court proceedings against him—the Court must accept the state court's determination of the law's scope and apply its own constitutional judgment to the law as so construed. By contrast, if parties threatened with enforcement of a state statute sue in federal court to have the law declared unconstitutionally overbroad before they are prosecuted or sued in state court, the federal court faces the additional complication of determining the overbreadth question without the guidance of any state court interpretation of the law in this case. If past interpretations of the law's terms make its breadth clear, there is no more difficulty than in Supreme Court review of a state court case. But if there is some question whether a state court might have narrowed the state law, especially in light of constitutional doubts about it, the federal court faces the possibility of making its own incorrect interpretation and basing an overbreadth judgment on that unstable premise.

With other constitutional claims involving uncertain state laws, a federal court normally will abstain from deciding the constitutional question until clarification is sought in state court. However, because the prolongation of CHILLING EFFECTS on constitutionally protected conduct is the basis of the vagueness of overbreadth doctrines, the Supreme Court indicated in DOMBROWSKI V. PFISTER (1965) and Baggett v. Bullitt (1964) that abstention is generally inappropriate if the problem would take multiple instances of adjudication to cure. Babbitt v. United Farm Workers (1979) followed the implicit corollary, requiring abstention where a single state proceeding might have obviated the need to reach difficult constitutional issues. But BROCKETT V. SPOKANE ARCADES, INC. (1985) shunned abstention in a case where state court clarification was feasible in an expeditious single proceeding, but where the litigants objecting to overbreadth were not people to whom the law could be validly applied but people who desired to engage in constitutionally protected speech. In that circumstance, at least where the unconstitutional portion of the statute was readily identifiable and severable from the remainder, the Court chose to strike that portion rather than abstain to see if the state court would remove it by interpretation.

Brockett also expressed a preference for partial over facial invalidation whenever challengers assert that application of a statute to them would be unconstitutional. The Court's ultimate objective is to invalidate only a statute's overbroad features, not the parts that legitimately penalize undesirable behavior. It permits those who are properly subject to regulation to mount facial overbreadth attacks only to provide an opportunity for courts to eliminate the illegitimate deterrent impact on others. Partial invalidation would do such people no good, and those who are illegitimately deterred from speaking may never sue. In order to throw out the tainted bathwater, the baby temporarily must go too, until the statute is reenacted or reinterpreted with its flaws omitted. Where, as in Brockett, one asserts his own right to pursue protected activity, however, no special incentive to litigate is needed. The Court can limit a statute's improper reach through partial invalidation and still benefit the challenger. Brockett's assumption that the tainted part of the statute does not spoil the whole also undercuts Henry Monaghan's important argument that allowing the unprotected to argue overbreadth does not depart from normal STANDING rules because they always assert their own right not to be judged under an invalid statute. The part applied to them is valid, and they are granted standing to attack the whole only to protect others from the invalid part. Finally, the claim that a law is invalid in all applications because based on an illegitimate premise has elements of both partial and facial invalidation. As the invalid premise affects the challenger as well as everyone else, there is no need to provide a special incentive to litigate, but because the whole law is defective, total invalidation is appropriate.

The seriousness of striking the whole of a partially invalid law at the urging of one to whom it validly applies, together with doubts about standing and the reliability of constitutional adjudication in the context of imagined applications, renders overbreadth an exceptional and controversial DOCTRINE. The determination of what circumstances are sufficiently compelling to warrant the doctrine's use has varied from time to time and among judges. The WARREN COURT focused mainly on the scope of the laws' coverage, the chilling effect on protected expression, and the ability of the legislature to draw legitimate regulatory boundaries more narrowly. The Court seemed convinced that overbroad laws inhibited freedom substantially, and thus made that inhibition the basis of invalidation, especially when the laws were aimed at dissidents and the risk of deliberate deterrence was high, as in APTHEKER V. SECRETARY OF STATE (1964), United States v. Robel (1967), and Dombrowski v. Pfister (1965). The BURGER COURT has continued to employ the overbreadth doctrine when deterrence of valued expression seems likely, as in Lewis v. New Orleans (1974), which struck down a law penalizing abusive language directed at police, and in SCHAD V. MT. EPHRAIM (1981), which struck down an extremely broad law banning live entertainment.

Justice BYRON R. WHITE has led that Court, however, in curtailing overbreadth adjudication. As all laws occasionally may be applied unconstitutionally, there is always a quantitative dimension of overbreadth. White's majority opinion in BROADRICK V. OKLAHOMA (1973) held that the overbroad portion of a law must be "real and substantial" before it will be invalidated. That standard highlights the magnitude of deterrent impact, which depends as much on the motivations of those regulated as on the reach of the law. Broadrick also emphasized the need to compare and offset the ranges of a statute's valid and invalid applications, rather than simply assess the dimensions of the invalid range. This substituted a judgment balancing a statute's legitimate regulation against its illegitimate deterrence of protected conduct for a judgment focused predominantly on the improper inhibition.

Broadrick initially limited the "substantial overbreadth" approach to laws seemingly addressed to conduct, leaving laws explicitly regulating expression, especially those directed at particular viewpoints, to the more generous approach. In Ferber v. New York (1982) and Brockett, however, substantial overbreadth was extended to pure speech cases as well. That these cases involved laws regulating OBSCENITY might suggest that some Justices find the overbreadth doctrine an improper means to counter deterrence of marginally valued expression. More likely, however, the Court generally is abandoning its focus on the subject of a law's facial coverage in favor of a comparative judgment of the qualitative and quantitative dimensions of a law's legitimate and illegitimate scope, whatever speech or conduct be regulated.

Still, the reality of deterrence and the value of the liberty deterred probably remain major factors in overbreadth judgments, even if more must be considered. For example, the Court's pronouncement in Bates v. State Bar of Arizona (1977) that overbreadth analysis generally is inappropriate for profit-motivated advertising rested explicitly on a judgment that advertising is not easily inhibited and implicitly on the historic perception of COMMERCIAL SPEECH as less worthy of protection.

Overbreadth controversies nearly always reflect different sensitivities to the worth of lost expression and of lost regulation of unprotected behavior, or different perceptions of the legitimacy and reliability of judicial nullification of laws that are only partially unconstitutional, or different assessments of how much inhibition is really likely, how easy it would be to redraft a law to avoid overbreadth, and how important broad regulation is to the effective control of harmful behavior. Despite controversy and variations in zeal for application of the overbreadth doctrine, however, its utility in checking repression that too sweepingly inhibits guaranteed liberty should assure its preservation in some form.

JOHNATHAN D. VARAT
(1986)

Bibliography

ALEXANDER, LAWRENCE A. 1985 Is There an Overbreadth Doctrine? San Diego Law Review 22:541–554.

MONAGHAN, HENRY P. 1981 Overbreadth. Supreme Court Review 1981:1–39.

NOTE 1970 The First Amendment Overbreadth Doctrine. Harvard Law Review 83:844–927.

OVERRULING

The authority of the Supreme Court to reconsider and overrule its previous DECISIONS is a necessary and accepted part of the Court's power to decide cases. By one estimate, the Supreme Court overruled itself on constitutional issues 159 times through 1976 and in each case departed from the DOCTRINE of STARE DECISIS.

The basic tenet of stare decisis, as set forth by WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, is that PRECEDENTS must generally be followed unless they are "flatly absurd" or "unjust." The doctrine promotes certainty in the law, judicial efficiency (by obviating the constant reexamination of previously settled questions), and uniformity in the treatment of litigants. The roots of the doctrine, which is fundamental in Anglo-American jurisprudence, have been traced to Roman civil law and the Code of Justinian.

Justices and commentators have disagreed about the proper application of stare decisis to constitutional decision making. Justice (later Chief Justice) EDWARD D. WHITE, in his dissenting opinion in POLLOCK V. FARMERS LOAN TRUST CO. (1895), observed:

> The fundamental conception of a judicial body is that of one hedged about by precedents which are binding on the court without regard to the personality of its members. Break down this belief in judicial continuity, and let it be felt that on great constitutional questions this court is to depart from the settled conclusions of its precedessors, and to determine them all according to the mere opinion of those who temporarily fill its bench, and our Constitution will, in my judgment, be bereft of value and become a most dangerous instrument to the rights and liberties of people.

Under this view, stare decisis should be applied with full force to constitutional issues.

The more commonly accepted view is that stare decisis has a more limited application in CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION than it does in the interpretation of statutes or in ordinary common law decision making. Although Congress, by a simple majority, can override the Supreme Court's erroneous interpretation of a congressional statute, errors in the interpretation of the Constitution are not easily corrected. The AMENDING PROCESS is by design difficult. In many instances only the Court can correct an erroneous constitutional decision.

Moreover, the Court will on occasion make decisions that later appear to be erroneous. As Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL remarked in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), the Constitution requires deductions from its "great outlines" when a court decides specific cases. Because the modern Supreme Court generally accepts for review only cases in which principles of broad national importance are in competition, its decisions necessarily involve difficult questions of judgment. In view of the difficulties inherent in amending the Constitution, any errors made by the Court in the interpretation of constitutional principles must be subject to correction by the Court in later decisions.

The classic statement of this view was expressed by Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS in his dissenting opinion in Burnet v. Coronado Oil Gas Co. (1932): "[I]n cases involving the Federal Constitution, where correction through legislative action is practically impossible, this Court has often overruled its earlier decisions. The Court bows to the lessons of experience and the force of better reasoning, recognizing that the process of trial and error, so fruitful in the physical sciences, is appropriate also in the judicial function." The Court has relied on Brandeis's reasoning in later decisions, such as EDELMAN V. JORDAN (1974), overruling previous constitutional precedents.

An additional reason for applying stare decisis less rigidly to constitutional decisions is that the judge's primary obligation is to the Constitution itself. In the words of Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, concurring in Graves v. New York (1939), "the ultimate touchstone of constitutionality is the Constitution itself and not what we have said about it."

Some critics of stare decisis suggest that it has no place whatsoever in constitutional cases. For example, Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY reasoned in the PASSENGER CASES (1849) that a constitutional question "is always open to discussion" because the judicial authority of the Court should "depend altogether on the force of the reasoning by which it is supported." The more generally accepted view, however, was stated by the Court in Arizona v. Rumsey (1984): "Although adherence to precedent is not rigidly required in constitutional cases, any departure from the doctrine of stare decisis requires special justification." Consistent with this view, the Supreme Court generally seeks to provide objective justification for the overruling of past precedents, apart from the fact that the Court's personnel may have changed.

One of the most commonly expressed reasons for overruling a previous decision is that it cannot be reconciled with other rulings. This rationale is in a sense consistent with stare decisis in that the justification for the overruling decision rests on competing but previously established judicial principles. In GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963), for example, which overruled BETTS V. BRADY (1942), the Court asserted not only that the rationale of Betts was erroneous but also that Betts had abruptly departed from well-established prior decisions. Betts had held that the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT does not impose on the states, as the Sixth Amendment imposes on the federal government, the obligation to provide counsel in state criminal proceedings. Gideon expressly rejected this holding, thereby ruling that indigent defendants have the right to appointed counsel in such cases. Similarly, in WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH (1937) the Court concluded that it had no choice but to overrule its earlier decision in ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923), which had held a minimum wage statute for women unconstitutional under the due process clause. The Court reasoned that Adkins was irreconcilable with other decisions permitting the regulation of maximum hours and other working conditions for women.

The Court frequently argues, too, that the lessons of experience require the overruling of a previous decision. In ERIE RAILROAD CO. V. TOMPKINS (1938), for example, the Court reasoned that in nearly one hundred years the doctrine of SWIFT V. TYSON (1842) "had revealed its defects, political and social." And in MAPP V. OHIO (1961) the Court held the EXCLUSIONARY RULE applicable to the states, saying that the experience of various states had made clear that remedies other than the exclusionary rule could not effectively deter unreasonable searches and seizures. The Court therefore overruled WOLF V. COLORADO (1949), which only two decades earlier had ruled that states were free to devise their own remedies for enforcing SEARCH AND SEIZURE requirements applicable to the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Court also justifies overruling decisions on the basis of changed or unforeseen circumstances. In BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), for example, the Court referred to the change in status of the public schools in rejecting the application of the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE of PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896). And in PROPELLER GENESEE CHIEF V. FITZHUGH (1851), one of the earliest overruling decisions, the Court stressed that when it had erroneously held in The Thomas Jefferson (1825) that the ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION of the federal government was limited "to the ebb and flow of the tide," commerce on the rivers of the West and on the Great Lakes had been in its infancy and "the great national importance of the question . . . could not be foreseen."

Other considerations may also suggest a decision's susceptibility to being overruled. Thus a decision on an issue not fully briefed and argued may be entitled to less precedential weight than one in which the issue received full and deliberate consideration. Or, the fact that an issue was decided by a closely divided Court may suggest a higher probability of error and make later reconsideration more likely. By contrast, as the Court recognized in Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health (1983), a carefully considered decision, repeatedly and consistently followed, may be entitled to more respect than other constitutional holdings under principles of stare decisis.

As the Court develops constitutional doctrine, it may limit or distinguish a previous decision, gradually eroding its authority without expressly overruling it. Such a doctrinal evolution may both portend an overruling decision and establish the groundwork for it.

The Court's willingness to reconsider its prior constitutional decisions and in some instances to overrule itself is implicit in the general understanding of the Constitution as a document of broad outlines intended to endure the ages. Yet it has been suggested that the Court risks a loss of confidence as a disinterested interpreter of the Constitution whenever it overrules itself. Because of its antimajoritarian character, the Court must be sensitive to the need for restraint in exercising its power of JUDICIAL REVIEW. If it overrules itself too frequently and without adequate justification, its reputation may suffer. The Constitution's general language, however, leaves wide room for honest differences as to its interpretation and application. An objective and detached overruling opinion, which faithfully seeks to apply constitutional principles on the basis of the constitutional text and history, is on occasion to be expected and need not jeopardize public confidence in the Court.

JAMES R. ASPERGER
(1986)

Bibliography

BERNHARDT, CHARLOTTE C. 1948 Supreme Court Reversals on Constitutional Issues. Cornell Law Quarterly 34:55–70.

BLAUSTEIN, ALBERT P. and FIELD, ANDREW H. 1958 "Overruling" Opinions in the Supreme Court. Michigan Law Review 57:151–194.

ISRAEL, JEROLD H. 1963 Gideon v. Wainwright: The "Art" of Overruling. Supreme Court Review 1963:211–272.

NOLAND, JON D. 1969 Stare Decisis and the Overruling of Constitutional Decisions in the Warren Years. Valparaiso University Law Review 4:101–135.

REED, STANLEY 1938 Stare Decisis and Constitutional Law. Pennsylvania Bar Association Quarterly 1938:131–150.

OVERT ACTS TEST

The overt acts test originated in the seventeenth century in suggestive remarks by ROGER WILLIAMS, William Walwyn, and Baruch Spinoza, primarily to promote the cause of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. To the same end, PHILLIP FURNEAUX, in the next century, developed the test and THOMAS JEFFERSON adopted it. Such libertarians advocated the test as an alternative to the prevailing BAD TENDENCY TEST, according to which the expression of an opinion was punishable if it tended to stir animosity to the established religion of a state or to the government or its officers or measures. Thus, the preamble to Jefferson's VIRGINIA STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM declared that allowing the civil magistrate to restrain the profession of opinions "on the supposition of their ill tendency . . . at once destroys all religious liberty." The government's rightful purposes, Jefferson continued, were served if its officers did not interfere until "principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order." The overt acts test, therefore, sharply distinguished words from deeds, and, in Furneaux's words, was based on the proposition that the "penal laws should be directed against overt acts only."

When the Sedition Act of 1798 incorporated the principles of ZENGER'S CASE (1735), libertarians who had advocated those principles finally abandoned them as inadequate protections of the FREEDOM OF THE PRESS and embraced the overt acts test. Only a radical minority ever advocated the test in cases of political expression, yet it survived down to the twentieth century. Justices HUGO L. BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS found the test admirably suited to their ABSOLUTISM. Dissenting in YATES V. UNITED STATES (1957), Black said, "I believe that the FIRST AMEND-MENT forbids Congress to punish people for talking about public affairs, whether or not such discussion incites to action, legal or illegal."

The overt acts test would provide the utmost protection for words and make the principle of FREEDOM OF SPEECH immunize every kind of verbal crime. The test ignores the fact that in some instances words themselves can be crimes (contempt of court, perjury, OBSCENITY, the verbal agreement in a CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY) or can violate laws validly governing the time and place of assemblies, parades, PICKETING, and SOUNDTRUCKS AND AMPLIFIERS. Words can also cause severe injury, constitute INCITEMENT TO UNLAWFUL CONDUCT, or otherwise solicit crime. The overt acts test draws a bright but fake constitutional line between speech and action; an indistinct zone would be more appropriate. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court in BRANDENBURG V. OHIO (1969), a leading free speech case, almost flirted with the overt acts test when it held that a state may not constitutionally "forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action."

The Constitution contains a different overt acts test in the TREASON clause (Article 3, section 3), which specifies that unless a person accused of treason confesses in open court, two witnesses to the same overt act must prove his guilt. The clause also defines the required overt act as making war against the United States or "adhering to their Enemies, giving them aid and comfort." The treason clause, therefore, prevents the punishment of "constructive" treason, which consists of any words or acts construed by the government or a court to be tantamount to treason. Thus, the overt acts provision of the treason clause helps guarantee CIVIL LIBERTY by preventing the crime of treason from being used expansively to silence opponents of the government.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

GREENAWALT, KENT 1980 Speech and Crime. American Bar Foundation Research Journal 1980:647–785.

OWEN v. CITY OF INDEPENDENCE
445 U.S. 622 (1980)

In MONELL V. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1978) the Supreme Court held that municipalities may be liable under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, for deprivations of constitutional rights if the deprivation results from official policy. In Owen, the Court held that municipalities may not avail themselves of the good-faith defense or qualified immunity enjoyed by individual defendants in section 1983 cases. Thus, a municipality may be liable for unconstitutional acts even if its officials reasonably believe in good faith that their acts are constitutional.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

OYAMA v. CALIFORNIA
332 U.S. 633 (1948)

In Terrace v. Thompson (1923) the Supreme Court had upheld the power of a state to limit land ownership to U.S. citizens. Oyama, together with TAKAHASHI V. FISH AND GAME COMMISSION (1948), both undermined Terrace and signaled a changing judicial attitude toward RACIAL DISCRIMINATION.

California's Alien Land Law forbade land ownership by ALIENS ineligible for CITIZENSHIP; under existing federal law, that category was largely limited to persons of Asian ancestry. Invoking its law, California sought to take over title to land held in the name of a young U.S. citizen, on the ground that it was really owned by his father, an alien ineligible for citizenship. The father had paid for the land, and so under the law was presumed its owner. A similar presumption would not apply to ownership of land by citizens of other races. Without purporting to rule on the general validity of the Alien Land Law, the Supreme Court held, 7–2, that the presumption denied the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

P

PACE v. ALABAMA
106 U.S. 583 (1883)

To white supremacists, the MISCEGENATION issue was crucially important. The often unexpressed fear of interracial sex involving white women underlay all sorts of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. The states punished adultery and fornication much more severely when the parties were of different races than when both were of the same race. Pace challenged the constitutionality of Alabama's statute, but the Supreme Court unanimously held that the unequal punishment did not violate the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT because both the interracial fornicators were subject to the same punishment.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Loving v. Virginia.)

PACIFISTS

See: Conscientious Objection

PACKERS & STOCKYARDS ACT
42 Stat. 159 (1921)

After a Federal Trade Commission investigation damaging to the meat-packing industry in 1919–1920, popular sentiment demanded decisive action. Congress responded with this statute regulating both the packers and the stockyards. As one of its sponsors declared, the statute merely reenacted old principles in order to restore and maintain competition. Indeed, the clause banning "unfair" competition restated section 5 of the FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT. Other provisions forbade giving "undue or unreasonable advantage" (repeating section 3 of the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT) or apportioning items by geographic area (ICA, section 5; SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT, section 1). Violators might be brought before the secretary of agriculture, who could issue CEASE-AND-DESIST ORDERS; APPEALS lay to federal CIRCUIT COURTS. Stockyards subject to the act were required to register and provide "reasonable" services and charges. The secretary could determine new rates and order compliance, although the act provided no standards for his guidance. Perhaps because of a CONSENT DECREE negotiated with the industry in 1920, the Department of Justice was reluctant to prosecute the packers. Their disinclination, and the packers' efforts to avoid the consent decree, materially contributed to the act's passage. In enacting this statute, Congress emphasized public concern over and commitment to strict accountability to the nation's antitrust laws. (See STAFFORD V. WALLACE.)

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

GORDON, DAVID 1983 The Beef Trust: Antitrust Law and the Meat Packing Industry, 1902–1922. Ph.D. diss., Claremont Graduate School.

PAINE, THOMAS
(1737–1809)

Thomas Paine, the son of an English Quaker tradesman, became the great propagandist of the American and French revolutions. Before sailing to Philadelphia in 1774, with a letter of recommendation from BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, Paine had been a corsetmaker, a privateer, a tax assessor, a songwriter, and a tobacconist. In Philadelphia, he became editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine, crusading for abolition of slavery, proscription of dueling, greater rights for women, and easier availability of divorce.

Paine became the spokesman for the AMERICAN REVOLUTION when, in January 1776, he published a pamphlet called Common Sense. The pamphlet sharply attacked "the constitutional errors of the English form of government," including monarchy and CHECKS AND BALANCES. Paine declared that "the constitution of England is so complex, that the nation may suffer for years together without being able to discover in which part the fault lies." He argued for minimal government: "Society is in every state a blessing, but government even in its best state is but a necessary evil." Paine concluded Common Sense with a proposal for a "Continental Charter" of government based on large and equal REPRESENTATION and featuring a presidency rotated among the provincial delegations.

Between 1776 and 1783, Paine published a series of thirteen essays called The Crisis, chronicling "the times that try men's souls." Although in Common Sense he had denounced the English constitution, by the time he wrote The Crisis #7 in 1778, Paine had come to wonder "whether there is any such thing as the English constitution?" The Crisis #13, published in 1783, presented an argument for a strong and permanent national union, because "we have no other national SOVEREIGNTY than as the United States."

As the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 met, however, Paine was en route to Europe to promote a scheme for building iron bridges. The outbreak of the French Revolution in 1789 found him in Paris. He became a French citizen and a member of the revolutionary Convention; he was the principal author of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen. When Edmund Burke denounced the French Revolution, Paine responded with The Rights of Man, the nearest thing he ever wrote to a systematic treatise on politics. Not an originator of ideas but a popularizer, Paine grounded his case for the revolution in the concepts of NATURAL RIGHTS and SOCIAL COMPACT. "Every civil right," he wrote, "has for its foundation some natural right pre-existing in the individual, but to the enjoyment of which his individual power is not, in all cases, sufficiently competent."

In 1792 the French revolutionary government fell into the hands of a radical faction; Paine was imprisoned and only narrowly escaped the guillotine. During his year in prison he wrote The Age of Reason, an apology for deism and religious rationalism with an anti-Christian tenor.

Paine's release from prison was arranged by the American ambassador, JAMES MONROE. For nearly a decade Paine remained in France as a journalist and political commentator. In 1802 he returned to America where he wrote polemical articles for the newspapers in support of THOMAS JEFFERSON's Republican party until his death in 1809.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

CANAVAN, FRANCIS 1972 Thomas Paine. Pages 652–658 in Leo Strauss and Joseph Cropsey, eds., History of Political Philosophy. Chicago: Rand McNally.

HAWKE, DAVID FREEMAN 1974 Paine. New York: Harper & Row.

PALKO v. CONNECTICUT
302 U.S. 319 (1937)

Palko, decided in the sesquicentennial year of the Constitution, highlights the difference between the constitutional law of criminal justice then and now. The Palko Court, which was unanimous, included five of the greatest judges in our history—CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, HARLAN FISKE STONE, HUGO L. BLACK, and the Court's spokesman, BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO. In one respect Cardozo's opinion is a historical relic, like HURTADO V. CALIFORNIA (1884), MAXWELL V. DOW (1900), and TWINING V. NEW JERSEY (1908), which he cited as governing precedents. In another respect, Palko rationalized the Court's INCORPORATION DOCTRINE of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT by which it selected FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS to be safeguarded against state violation.

Palko was sentenced to life imprisonment after a jury found him guilty of murder in the second degree. The state sought and won a new trial on the ground that its case had been prejudiced by errors of the trial court. Palko objected that a new trial on the same INDICTMENT exposed him to DOUBLE JEOPARDY, but he was overruled. At the second trial the jury's verdict of murder in the first degree resulted in a sentence of death. Had the case been tried in a federal court, the double jeopardy claim would have been good. The question raised by Palko's case was whether a double standard prevailed—one for state courts and the other for federal—or whether the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against double jeopardy applied to the state through the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Cardozo declared that Palko's contention was even broader: "Whatever would be a violation of the original BILL OF RIGHTS (Amendments 1 to 8) if done by the federal government is now equally unlawful by force of the Fourteenth Amendment if done by a state." The Court answered, "There is no such general rule," thus rejecting the theory of total incorporation. Nevertheless, said Cardozo, by a "process of absorption"—now referred to as selective incorporation—the Court had extended the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to include FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms and the RIGHT TO COUNSEL in certain cases, yet it had rejected the rights of the criminally accused, excepting representation by counsel for ignorant INDIGENTS in capital prosecutions. The rationalizing principle that gave coherence to the absorption process, Cardozo alleged, depended on a distinction among the various rights. Some were "fundamental" or "of the very essence of a scheme of ORDERED LIBERTY," like FREEDOM OF SPEECH or religion. By contrast, TRIAL BY JURY, indictment by GRAND JURY, and the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION were not: justice might be done without them. The right against double jeopardy, the Court ruled summarily, did not rank as fundamental and therefore received no protection against the states from the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. BENTON V. MARYLAND (1969) overruled Palko, showing that even "fundamental" value judgments change with time. All that remains of Palko is the abstract principle of selective incorporation.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

ABRAHAM, HENRY J. 1977 Freedom and the Court, 3rd ed. Pages 64–70. New York: Oxford University Press.

PALMER, ALEXANDER M.
(1872–1936)

Appointed attorney general in 1919, Alexander Mitchell Palmer soon faced violence stirred up by the extreme left. After a series of bombings, Palmer campaigned against CIVIL LIBERTIES and unsuccessfully urged adoption of a new SEDITION law. His overreaction to alleged domestic radicals, particularly his "Red Raids" into private homes, mass arrests, and deportations of aliens, earned him widespread censure. Palmer also used the emergency WAR POWERS to attempt an end to the coal strike in 1919, exciting further criticism. These circumstances all contributed to his losing the 1920 Democratic presidential nomination for which he had been a leading contender. He nevertheless remained a party regular and helped write the 1932 party platform.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

COBEN, STANLEY (1963) 1972 A. Mitchell Palmer: Politician. New York: Da Capo Press.

PALMER v. THOMPSON
402 U.S. 217 (1971)

Under a federal court order to integrate its public recreational facilities, Jackson, Mississippi, closed four of its five public swimming pools and surrendered the city's lease on the fifth pool. In a 5–4 decision, the Supreme Court sustained the closings, stating that a legislative act does not "violate EQUAL PROTECTION solely because of the motivations of the men who voted for it." Palmer's statement that legislative motive is irrelevant was undermined in WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976) and ARLINGTON HEIGHTS V. METROPOLITAN HOUSING DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION (1977).

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

PALMER RAIDS
(1919–1920)

In the aftermath of WORLD WAR I and the Russian Revolution, waves of European IMMIGRATION aggravated domestic inflation and unemployment. LABOR strikes, often violent, were rampant, and the Communist party was organized.

Under pressure from the press and the public, WOODROW WILSON's attorney general, A. MITCHELL PALMER, conducted a series of raids between autumn 1919 and spring 1920 against the homes and offices of suspected ALIENS and radical leaders. The raids were conducted without ARREST WARRANTS or SEARCH WARRANTS, and those detained were denied the right to HABEAS CORPUS. Several thousand persons were detained, and over 500 alien radicals were deported.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PALMORE v. SIDOTI
466 U.S. 429 (1984)

When Linda Palmore was divorced from Anthony Sidoti, a Florida court awarded custody of their daughter to Palmore. Later, Sidoti sought custody on the ground that Palmore, a white woman, had been cohabiting with a black man, whom she shortly married. The state court changed the custody on the sole ground that the mother had "chosen for herself and her child, a life-style unacceptable to her father and to society." The child would, if she remained with her mother, be "more vulnerable to peer pressures" and would suffer from "social stigmatization." The Supreme Court unanimously reversed.

For the Court, Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER reaffirmed the need for STRICT SCRUTINY of governmental action based on race. Racial prejudice indeed existed, but the potential injury from such private biases was not a constitutionally acceptable basis for the custody change. The decision has symbolic importance, but seems unlikely to make much difference in actual awards of child custody, which can be rested on a variety of grounds in the name of the "best interests of the child" without any explicit consideration of race.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES
33 Stat. 2234 (1903)
TIAS 10030 (1977)

At the turn of the twentieth century the United States emerged as a major power in world politics. Central to that major-power status were America's merchant shipping and the navy that protected it. The disadvantage of being a continental power with shores on two oceans became obvious during the Spanish American War when redeployment of warships from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean, by way of Cape Horn, took two months to complete. The United States government determined to construct a canal across Central America through the Isthmus of Panama. The United States negotiated a treaty with Colombia, in which the isthmus was located, but that treaty was rejected by the Colombian Senate in August 1903.

In November 1903, with American encouragement, Panama declared its independence from Colombia; two weeks later Panama signed a treaty (sometimes called the Hay-Bunau Treaty) permitting the United States to build the Panama Canal. The United States Senate gave its ADVICE AND CONSENT to ratification of the treaty the following February.

In the treaty the United States undertook to defend both the canal and the Republic of Panama and to make nominal annual payments to Panama from the revenue of the canal. The treaty gave the United States permanent control "as if it were sovereign" over the Panama Canal Zone, a strip of land ten miles wide dividing the republic—which retained nominal sovereignty over the zone—in two. For nearly three-quarters of a century the Canal Zone was governed as an American TERRITORY. When President LYNDON B. JOHNSON made (mostly symbolic) concessions to Panama following civil unrest there in the 1960s, members of Congress accused him of usurping Congress's exclusive power over the territories.

Negotiations between four successive administrations and the Panamanian government, conducted over more than thirteen years, resulted in two pacts signed in 1977, the Panama Canal Treaty and the Panama Canal Neutrality Treaty. Together, these agreements abolished the Canal Zone, returned the zone and the canal to Panamanian SOVEREIGNTY, and provided for the future operation of the waterway under joint, and ultimately under Panamanian, control. The campaign to win the advice and consent of the Senate to the treaties proved to be a major test of the constitutional roles of the executive and the Senate in the exercise of the TREATY POWER. The original Panama Canal Treaty had been approved after an unprecedentedly short debate; the length of the debate over the new treaties was exceeded in the twentieth century only by that over the Treaty of Versailles.

Ratification of the treaties in 1978, with numerous amendments and "conditions," proved to be only the beginning of a new struggle. The treaties were not self-executing but required implementing legislation; that gave members of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, some of whom objected to the President and the SENATE giving away "American territory" without their participation, a chance to affect the terms of the transfer. Over the objections of both President JIMMY CARTER and the Panamanian government, Congress wrote into the implementing legislation provisions authorizing the President to intervene militarily to protect American interests in the former Canal Zone. The episode serves to illustrate the extent of congressional power, under the Constitution, to influence the conduct of FOREIGN AFFAIRS, over which the President is often assumed to have exclusive control.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

CRABB, CECIL V. and HOLT, PAT M. 1980 The Panama Canal Treaties. Invitation to Struggle: Congress, the President and Foreign Policy. Chap. 3. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly.

PANAMA REFINING CO. v. RYAN
293 U.S. 388 (1935)

In 1933 the price of wholesale gasoline had fallen to two and a half cents a gallon, that of crude oil to ten cents a barrel. The states, unable to cut production and push up prices, clamored for national controls. Congress responded with section 9(c) of the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT, authorizing the President to prohibit the shipment in INTERSTATE COMMERCE of petroleum produced in excess of quotas set by the states. By a vote of 8–1 the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, for the first time in history held an act of Congress unconstitutional because it improperly delegated legislative powers to the President without specifying adequate standards to guide his discretion. Moreover, the act did not require him to explain his orders. Vesting the President with "an uncontrolled legislative power," Hughes said, exceeded the limits of delegation; he did not explain how much delegation is valid and by what standards.

Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO disagreed. He found adequate standards in section 1 of the statute: the elimination of unfair competitive practices and conservation of natural resources. These objectives guided the President's discretion, Cardozo explained. The principle of SEPARATION OF POWERS, which the majority used to underpin its opinion, should not be applied with doctrinaire rigor. Moreover, the statute, Cardozo observed, "was framed in the shadow of a national disaster" which raised unforeseen contingencies that only the President could face from day to day. The standards for his discretion had to be broad, and he need never give reasons for EXECUTIVE ORDERS. Cardozo's opinion notwithstanding, the Court in effect removed the oil industry from effective controls, to its detriment and that of the national economy. This case marked the NEW DEAL's debut before the Court.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Delegation of Power.)

PAPACHRISTOU v. JACKSONVILLE

See: Vagrancy Laws

PARADISE, UNITED STATES v.
480 U.S. 149 (1987)

For several decades, the Alabama Department of Public Safety excluded blacks from employment as state troopers. Only after a federal district court imposed a hiring quota in the early 1970s did the department finally change its ways. Even then, however, the department failed to promote the black officers it hired. Thereafter, the district court again intervened, this time requiring the department to institute promotion procedures without an adverse impact on black officers. When the department failed to institute such procedures within a timely period, the court imposed a promotion quota until the department developed acceptable promotion procedures of its own. Under the court's scheme, one black officer had to be promoted for every white officer promoted. The United States challenged the court's order, claiming that it violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The Supreme Court disagreed and upheld the order 5–4.

Writing for a plurality, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN noted that members of the Court disagreed about what level of scrutiny to apply to discrimination remedy cases, but argued that this did not matter because the race-conscious remedy under review survived even the Court's highest standard of STRICT SCRUTINY because it was "narrowly tailored" to serve a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST.

Rejecting the strict scrutiny approach in discrimination-remedy cases, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS concurred in the judgment, but stressed that the federal judiciary has "broad and flexible authority" to fashion even race-conscious remedies once a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment has occurred.

Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR vigorously disagreed. Writing for three of the dissenters, O'Connor not only insisted that all remedies be subjected to strict scrutiny but she also took the plurality to task for adopting "a standardless view" of strict scrutiny's requirement that a remedy be narrowly tailored to accomplish its purpose. Maintaining that "there is simply no justification for the use of racial preferences if the purpose of the order could be achieved without their use," O'Connor argued there was no evidence that the district court considered any alternatives to the RACIAL QUOTA, even though several alternatives in fact existed, including an invocation of the court's CONTEMPT POWER.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

PARDEE, DON ALBERT
(1837–1919)

President JAMES A. GARFIELD on May 3, 1881, appointed Don Albert Pardee judge of the Fifth Circuit Court. From 1891 to his death Pardee presided as senior judge of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Pardee's most significant constitutional opinions involved the STATE POLICE POWER and VESTED RIGHTS. In New Orleans Water-Works Co. v. St. Tammany Water-Works Co. (1882) the judge held that the Louisiana legislature had exceeded its powers by incorporating a new company to compete with an enterprise that had enjoyed a monopoly over the distribution of the water supply to the city of

New Orleans. "Arguments in cases like the one under consideration," Pardee observed, "are generally based on the assumption that the sovereign . . . is absolutely unfettered with regard to . . . all the rights of property. I am not prepared to take this advanced ground." He enjoined the new company from further construction and held that the legislature could not invoke its police power "without compensation of the vested rights of the New Orleans Water-Works Company."

Pardee did accept broader legislative discretion under the police power when moral objectives were involved. In United States ex rel. Hoover v. Ronan, Sheriff (1887) he rejected an argument that a Georgia statute violated the DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION provisions of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT by requiring would-be saloonkeepers in unincorporated towns and cities to obtain signatures from residents in order to secure a retail license. In Ex Parte Kinnerbrew (1888), he found on moral benefit grounds that the Georgia local option liquor law was compatible with the federal COMMERCE CLAUSE.

Pardee insisted on the power of the federal judiciary to frame a constitutional jurisprudence that separated the state police power into public and private sector concerns. As a result, reverence for vested property rights and public morality gilded his judicial conservatism.

KERMIT L. HALL
(1986)

Bibliography

BRYAN, PAUL E. 1964 Don Albert Pardee. Dictionary of American Biography, Vol. 14:201–202. New York: Scribner's.

PARDONING POWER

The power of pardon—the power to relieve a person of the legal sanctions imposed for illegal conduct—was reluctantly put in the hands of the President by the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. The reluctance derived from the fact that it was too much akin to the royal prerogative to afford dispensation to favorites from obedience to the law, a prerogative supposedly eliminated by the English BILL OF RIGHTS in 1689. The Framers were concerned lest the power should be used to shelter the treasonous activities of a President and his henchmen. The most persuasive argument on behalf of a presidential pardoning power was its potential use to reconcile warring factions. Because it would, for this purpose, be an effective tool only if it were readily available to strike a deal at any time, and because Congress was not expected to be in session all, or even most, of the time, it properly devolved on the executive.

The power of pardoning for criminal activities is all but plenary. There is the constitutional limitation that pardon may not be used to relieve from impeachment or its sanctions. Otherwise, a pardon can be granted before conviction, indeed before indictment, and it can be conferred absolutely or conditionally, provided that the conditions themselves are not unconstitutional. However, whether a pardon can be conferred over the objection of the grantee is not clear, for acceptance of a pardon is generally thought to be an acknowledgment of commission of a crime.

On the whole, the pardon power has not been used for political ends as was anticipated. The partisan strife of the Old World did not, with rare exceptions, see its counterpart on the American scene. The political nature of the power can be seen in the pardons to the WHISKEY REBELS, to those convicted under the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS, and in the AMNESTY—granted by Congress—to the rebels of the CIVIL WAR. President GERALD R. FORD's pardon of ex-President RICHARD M. NIXON after the WATERGATE affair was, perhaps, the most blatant partisan use of the power.

The Supreme Court, in SCHICK V. REED (1974), has legitimated the almost unlimited power of executive pardon. Although the history of the origins as recounted in Schick is somewhat suspect, Schick remains the definitive statement, unless and until the Court revises it through later opinions.

PHILLIP B. KURLAND
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1957 The President: Office and Powers 1787–1957, 4th ed. New York: New York University Press.

PARHAM v. HUGHES

See: Illegitimacy

PARHAM v. J. R.
442 U.S. 584 (1979)

The notion of "voluntary" civil commitment of mental patients takes on a special meaning when the patients are children: under a typical state's law they can be committed by the joint decision of their parents and mental hospital authorities. This case, a CLASS ACTION on behalf of all children detained in Georgia mental hospitals, was brought in order to establish a child's PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS right to an adversary hearing before being so committed. Although the lower federal court agreed with the plaintiff's theory, the Supreme Court reversed in an opinion by Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER.

The Court was unanimous in rejecting the broadest due process claim in behalf of the children. There were constitutionally protected "liberty" interests at stake in a commitment, both the freedom from bodily restraint and the freedom from being falsely labeled as mentally ill. However, applying the interest-balancing calculus suggested in MATHEWS V. ELDRIDGE (1976), the Court concluded that a child's due process rights did not extend to an adversary precommitment hearing. The majority concluded that due process required no more than informal "medical" inquiries, once near the time of commitment and periodically thereafter, by a "neutral fact-finder" who would determine whether the standards for commitment were satisfied. There need be no adversary proceeding, but this neutral decision maker should interview the child.

The Court's opinion emphasized the importance of maintaining parents' traditional role in decision making for their children. (See CHILDREN'S RIGHTS.) Although some parents might abuse their authority, the law had historically "recognized that natural bonds of affection lead parents to act in the best interests of their children." On the surface, J. R. is a "family autonomy" decision. Yet, as Robert Burt has shown, the Court's solicitude for parental authority was expressed in the context of parental decisions validated by state officials. Other decisions suggest that the Court's primary deference runs not to parents but to "state-employed behavioral professionals."

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for three partially dissenting Justices, agreed that pre-confinement hearings were not constitutionally required in all cases where parents sought to have their children committed, but he argued that due process did require at least one postadmission hearing. The informal inquiries approved by the Court did not meet this standard.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Mental Illness and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

BURT, ROBERT A. 1979 The Constitution of the Family. Supreme Court Review 1979:329–395.

PARIS ADULT THEATRE I v. SLATON

See: Miller v. California

PARKER v. BROWN
317 U.S. 341 (1943)

A California statute compelled raisin growers to comply with the orders of a state-sponsored marketing monopoly. Farmers could sell thirty percent of their crop on the open market; the remainder went to the state commission, which controlled the interstate supply and price. This law survived challenge when a unanimous bench followed reasoning laid out earlier by Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE in DISANTO V. PENNSYLVANIA (1927). Here Stone dismissed statutory objections: the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT applied only to individual, not state, action; neither did the COMMERCE CLAUSE forbid this state regulation. Most important, Congress, in the AGRICULTURAL MARKETING AGREEMENT ACT, did not preempt this state legislation but reflected a congressional policy to encourage it.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: State Regulation of Commerce.)

PARKER v. DAVIS

See: Legal Tender Cases

PARKER v. LEVY
417 U.S. 733 (1974)

In a celebrated trial of the VIETNAM WAR era, Captain Howard Levy, an Army physician, was convicted by COURT MARTIAL for violating provisions of the UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE that penalized willful disobedience of the lawful command of a superior officer, "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," and conduct "to the prejudice of good order and discipline in the armed forces." The Third Circuit Court of Appeals had held that these provisions were unconstitutionally vague in violation of the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fifth Amendment and overbroad in violation of the FIRST AMENDMENT.

Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, for the Supreme Court, reversed and upheld Levy's conviction. Rehnquist's opinion rejected the contention that the provisions of the Uniform Code of Military Justice were too vague and overbroad. "The fundamental necessity for obedience, and the consequent necessity for imposition of discipline, may render permissible within the military that which would be constitutionally impermissible outside it," he wrote. Justices WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, THURGOOD MARSHALL, and POTTER STEWART dissented. The last wrote, "I cannot believe that such meaningless statutes as these can be used to send men to prison under a Constitution that guarantees due process of law."

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE

Parliamentary privilege, a term originating in England, refers to a bundle of rights that Parliament and every American legislature claimed and exercised. Article I of the Constitution safeguards several of these rights, including the right of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES to choose its speaker, the right of each house to judge the elections and qualifications of members, the right of the houses to determine their own rules of procedure, and the rights of members to be free from arrest while performing their duties and to enjoy FREEDOM OF SPEECH in carrying out their duties. (See SPEECH OR DEBATE CLAUSE.) In addition, parliamentary privilege included the right, which derived from the judicial authority of Parliament, to punish for contempt.

The power to punish for contempt in both England and America proved to be incompatible with freedom of speech for critics of government, especially of the legislature. In colonial America the most suppressive body was the popularly elected assembly, which in effect enforced the law of SEDITIOUS LIBEL by punishing contempts or breaches of parliamentary privilege. An assembly, needing no GRAND JURY to indict and no PETIT JURY to convict, could summon, interrogate, and fix criminal penalties against anyone who had written, spoken, or printed words tending to impeach the assembly's conduct, question its authority, derogate from its honor, affront its dignity, or defame its members.

The practice of punishing seditious scandals or contempts against the government began in America with the first assembly that met in Virginia and continued well after the adoption of the Constitution. In 1796, for example, the New York Assembly jailed a lawyer for his offensive publications, and in 1800 the United States SENATE found a Jeffersonian editor guilty of a "high breach of privileges" because of his seditious libels. As late as 1874 the Texas legislature, having expelled a hostile journalist, ordered his imprisonment for violating its order. The Supreme Court has held that the House of Representatives has the implied power to punish for contempt. Theoretically Congress still retains that power; in practice Congress refers its charges to a federal prosecutor who seeks a grand jury INDICTMENT. (See LEGISLATIVE CONTEMPT POWER.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

CLARKE, MARY PATTERSON (1943) 1971 Parliamentary Privilege in the American Colonies. New York: Da Capo Press.

WITTKE, CARL (1921) 1970 The History of English Parliamentary Privilege. New York: Da Capo Press.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS

See: Government Aid to Religious Institutions

PARTIES, POLITICAL

See: Political Parties; Political Parties, Elections, and Constitutional Law; Political Parties in Constitutional Law

PASSENGER CASES
7 Howard 283 (1849)

Two states imposed a tax on the masters of vessels for each ALIEN passenger they landed in the country. By a 5–4 vote, the Supreme Court held the state acts unconstitutional. Each of the Justices in the majority wrote an opinion, and none spoke for the Court. Three of the four dissenters wrote opinions. The report of the cases takes 290 pages and reflects chaos in judicial interpretation. The Justices squabbled about CONCURRENT POWERS, and the COMMERCE CLAUSE in relation to the POLICE POWER, but they settled nothing doctrinally.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PATENT

Article I grants to Congress the power to "promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries." This clause confers on the federal government authority to provide for both patents and COPYRIGHTS.

United States patent law derives from the English experience. During Tudor times, English monarchs granted various monopolies (such as ones over salt) to royal favorites. The populace arose against the high prices charged by such monopolies. In 1623, Parliament enacted the germinal Statute of Monopolies. The statute declared monopolies void but as an exception allowed letters patent for fourteen years to the "true and first inventors" of "new manufactures."

In America, some states prior to adoption of the Constitution granted patents to inventors. But in listing the limited and specific powers of the federal legislature, the drafters of the Constitution agreed that patents and copyrights should be among those powers. As JAMES MADISON argued in THE FEDERALIST #43, "the States cannot separately make effectual provision for either." The drafters perceived that the interests of both a unified national economy and a strong system of incentives for invention required that a patent power lie in the federal government.

The constitutional power specifies both the end of the patent system (progress of the useful arts) and the means for achieving it (secure for a limited time to inventors the exclusive right to their discoveries). The power is only an enablement and does not of its own force create any patent rights. Nevertheless, the first Congress in 1790 enacted a patent statute. An 1836 statute revised the patent laws and created the Patent Office. A 1952 statute restated the patent laws in their current form. An inventor of a new and useful product or process may obtain from the Patent Office a patent granting for a number of years (currently seventeen) the right to exclude others from making, selling, or using the invention defined by the claims in the patent.

Although most questions concerning patentability are defined by statute, the Constitution limits Congress's power to authorize patent monopolies. In Graham v. John Deere Co. of Kansas City (1966), the Supreme Court stressed that Congress may not authorize patents that "remove existent knowledge from the public domain." Rejecting a NATURAL RIGHTS theory of patents for inventions, the Court emphasized the utilitarian function of patents: they stimulate innovation and the disclosure of new knowledge. Patents may issue only for inventions that advance the state of technology. This constitutional standard of innovation finds expression in the patent law DOCTRINE of "nonobviousness," which bars a patent for any discovery that would have been obvious at the time of invention to a person with ordinary skill in the pertinent art who had knowledge of all the prior art.

A patent may issue for virtually any type of useful product or process. In Diamond v. Chakrabarty (1980), the Supreme Court upheld the potential patentability of a live, genetically altered strain of microorganism.

DONALD S. CHISUM
(1986)

Bibliography

CHISUM, DONALD S. 1978 Patents: A Treatise on the Law of Patentability, Validity and Infringement. New York: Matthew Bender.

MACHLUP, FRITZ 1958 An Economic Review of the Patent System. Study No. 15, Subcommittee on Patents, Trademarks & Copyrights, Judiciary Committee, 85th Congress, 2d Session.

PATENT
(Update)

A patent is a grant issued by the federal government that gives an inventor the right to exclude others from making, using, or selling his invention for a specific period of time. The historical purpose of granting these exclusive rights has not changed to this day: it is to encourage public disclosure of new scientific and technological developments that would have a favorable impact upon society and the ECONOMY.

The American patent system was largely based on early European concepts. As far back as 1440, English "letters patent" were issued for a method of processing salt. Often, however, such royal grants of monopolies were offered not to encourage invention or business development but to reward court favorites. They generated a great deal of controversy and ultimately led to passage of the Statute of Monopolies (1623), which, by making a patent an exceptional case in which exclusive rights could be granted, restricted the crown's power to confer a monopoly.

The Framers of the Constitution, realizing the importance of stimulating science and technology, authorized Congress to establish and control a patent system. In September 1787 the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION adopted Article I, section 8: "The Congress shall have Power . . . To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries."

Congress exercised this power by passing the Patent Act of 1790. The statute placed the burden of granting patents upon a committee made up of the secretary of state, the secretary of war, and the ATTORNEY GENERAL. Secretary of State THOMAS JEFFERSON, an early champion of the idea that "ingenuity should receive liberal encouragement," became the first patent examiner.

For several decades there was no requirement that an inventor demonstrate his invention's patentability (its novelty and usefulness) in order to obtain exclusive rights. As a result, a patent was issued almost immediately upon receipt of an application. The process was modified in 1836, when the commissioner of patents was charged with examining every proposal to determine that an invention was both new and useful in concept (though not necessarily that it worked well in practice). These criteria are still applied, together with a requirement that the invention must be "unobvious to one skilled in the art."

Patents are to be distinguished from trademarks and COPYRIGHTS; generally, the claiming of one does not preclude the claiming of any other, even though they may all apply to a single product. A copyright protects an author's original writing (the tangible expression of an idea). A trademark covers any words used to distinguish one product from another. For example, a computer's interior mechanism and software may be protected by a patent, its instruction manual by a copyright, and its market identification by a trademark. All three legal protections are now considered part of a larger jurisprudential framework called "intellectual property."

A patent may be obtained by anyone who invents or discovers a new, useful, and "unobvious" device or process. If a patent is granted, the inventor gains exclusive rights for a period of seventeen years (fourteen years for the developer of a new design). Any unauthorized manufacture, use, or sale of a patented device or design (or their equivalents) constitutes an infringement.

Patent cases begin at the district court level, may be appealed to the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT, and can be reviewed by the Supreme Court. In Graham v. John Deere Co. of Kansas City (1968) the Court defined the three statutory conditions of patentability: novelty, usefulness, and nonobviousness. The classic modern doctrine of "equivalents" was described in Graver Tank & Manufacturing Co. v. Linde Air Products Co. (1950). One of the largest recent infringement cases was Polaroid Corp. v. Eastman Kodak Co. (1989).

KENNETH LASSON
(1992)

Bibliography

CHISUM, DONALD S. 1978 Patents: A Treatise on the Law of Patentability, Validity and Infringement. New York: Matthew Bender.

DELLER, ANTHONY W. 1964 Walker on Patents. New York: Lawyers Co-operative.

LASSON, KENNETH 1986 Mousetraps and Muffling Cups: One Hundred Brilliant and Bizarre United States Patents. New York: Arbor House.

PATERSON, WILLIAM
(1745–1806)

William Paterson played a major role in the framing of the United States Constitution. His stubborn advocacy of state equality influenced the kind of government that was formed. He also was an active member of the United States Supreme Court who served as an important link between the Framers of the Constitution and the Supreme Court of JOHN MARSHALL.

Born in Ireland, Paterson moved to New Jersey at an early age, graduated from the College of New Jersey (Princeton), studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1768. Supporting the movement for independence, he soon became a prominent member of New Jersey's revolutionary generation and served in its provincial legislature. Paterson drafted the state's first constitution and became its first attorney general. During the 1780s he built up his legal practice by defending the interests of wealthy landowners and creditors. In the political battles of that decade he advocated the supremacy of the peace treaty of 1783 over state laws, opposed the emission of paper money, and supported the movement to create a strong central government.

In 1787 New Jersey selected Paterson as one of its delegates to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. Although he favored increasing the power of the national government, Paterson vigorously opposed the proposal of the VIRGINIA PLAN, as drafted by JAMES MADISON and presented by EDMUND RANDOLPH, that REPRESENTATION in both houses of the national legislature be apportioned according to population. Paterson feared this provision would give too much power to the larger states and place smaller states like New Jersey, Connecticut, and Delaware at a disadvantage. As an alternative he proposed the NEW JERSEY PLAN of government. Its principal feature was the continuance of the unicameral legislature of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION in which each state had only one vote. The plan also would have: provided the federal government with the power to levy imposts and regulate trade and collect funds from states that did not comply with federal requisitions; created a Supreme Court with broad powers; and made the laws and treaties of the United States the supreme law of the land, with the state judiciaries bound to obey them despite any contrary state laws. Should a state or individuals within a state refuse to obey the laws of Congress or its treaties, the federal government would have had the right to use force to compel obedience. In other words, the central issue separating the proponents of the New Jersey Plan from those who favored the Virginia Plan was representation, not nationalism. Although the convention rejected Paterson's proposal, the delegates from the small states remained strongly opposed to proportional representation in Congress. In fact, the convention almost foundered on this issue, but it finally resolved the matter by adopting the so-called GREAT COMPROMISE that provided for representation by population in the lower house of a bicameral Congress and equal representation of each state in the upper house. With this matter settled, Paterson threw his complete support behind the new Constitution.

In 1789 the New Jersey legislature elected Paterson to the first United States Senate where, along with OLIVER ELLSWORTH, he helped to write the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789. This law created a system of lower federal courts, broadly defined their JURISDICTION, created the office of attorney general, and gave the Supreme Court APPELLATE JURISDICTION over the final decisions of state courts in all matters relating to the Constitution and federal laws and treaties. As a senator, Paterson also enthusiastically supported ALEXANDER HAMILTON's proposals to fund the national debt at face value with full interest, and for the federal government to assume all state debts. In November 1790 Paterson resigned his seat in the Senate to become governor of New Jersey. In this capacity he undertook the task of codifying the state's laws, which were published in 1800. He also worked closely with Hamilton in 1791 to form the generally unsuccessful "Society for Establishing Useful Manufactures"; the society created a small industrial city on the banks of the Passaic River, which became known as Paterson.

Early in 1793 President GEORGE WASHINGTON appointed Paterson to the United States Supreme Court. For the next decade he had an active career on the bench participating in almost all the important decisions rendered by the high court. These decisions reveal Paterson to have been, above all else, a firm advocate of the supremacy of the federal over the state governments. In Penhallow v. Doane's Administrators (1795) he expounded an extremely nationalist interpretation of the origins and nature of the Union, arguing that even during the 1780s the Continental Congress represented the "supreme will" of the American people. In the important and controversial case of WARE V. HYLTON (1796) Paterson held that the treaty of peace with Great Britain (1783), which guaranteed that no legal obstacles would be placed in the way of the recovery of debts owed by Americans to British creditors, was part of the "supreme law of the land," rendering invalid a Virginia statute (1777) that allowed the sequestration of debts owed to British subjects before the Revolution.

Paterson also believed in a strong and independent judiciary. In 1795 while on circuit in Pennsylvania he delivered an opinion in VAN HORNE'S LESSEE V. DORRANCE that espoused the doctrine of VESTED RIGHTS and the right of the courts to void a statute repugnant to the Constitution. Although the case involved a state law that contradicted a state constitution, Paterson's argument had broader theoretical implications, and his remarks on the subject of JUDICIAL REVIEW are the fullest and most important statements by a Justice of the United States Supreme Court before John Marshall's opinion in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803). In HYLTON V. UNITED STATES (1796) Paterson agreed with the other Justices in upholding the constitutionality of a federal tax on carriages enacted in 1794. Because the key issue was whether the carriage tax was a DIRECT TAX or an excise tax, Paterson's opinion contained a long discussion of the intention of the Framers of the Constitution as to what kinds of taxes required apportionment among the states according to population. Paterson also expounded on the intention of the Framers in Calder v. Bull (1798) when he concurred with the rest of the Court in interpreting the provision of Article I, section 10, prohibiting state legislatures from enacting EX POST FACTO laws as extending only to criminal, not civil laws.

Like so many Federalists, Paterson refused to recognize the legitimacy of the Republican opposition during the 1790s. When Congress passed the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS, in 1798, he vigorously enforced them. While riding circuit in Vermont he urged a federal grand jury to indict Democratic-Republican Congressman Matthew Lyon for bringing the President and the federal government into disrepute with his various criticisms. "No government," Paterson observed, "can long subsist when offenders of this kind are suffered to spread their poison with impunity." In the trial that followed Paterson continued to pursue Lyon, emphasizing that the tendency of the Congressman's words be made the test of his intent. Paterson also made clear his belief that the Supreme Court alone had the final authority to determine the constitutionality of laws of Congress, a position the Republican defense had denied. After the jury convicted Lyon, Paterson imposed a harsh sentence of four months in jail and a $1,000 fine. In 1800 Paterson also presided over the trial of Anthony Haswell, a Bennington, Vermont, newspaperman who had rallied to Lyon's defense, and following Haswell's conviction sentenced him to two months in prison and fined him $200. Paterson's actions during the crisis of 1798, along with those of SAMUEL CHASE, are among the clearest examples of the partisan nature of the Federalist judiciary during the late 1790s. Many Jeffersonians were incensed by the proceedings, and had the attempt to remove Chase from the Supreme Court proven successful in 1805, they probably would have gone after Paterson next.

When Oliver Ellsworth resigned as Chief Justice in 1800, most Federalists in the Senate felt the post should go to Paterson. But by then President JOHN ADAMS had openly broken with the Hamiltonian wing of the party, and he appointed John Marshall instead. Paterson accepted this development graciously; in fact, he described the new Chief Justice as "a man of genius" whose "talents have at once the lustre and solidity of gold." When the Jeffersonians took political power in 1801, Paterson backed away from his earlier extremism and supported Marshall's strategy of avoiding direct political confrontations with the Republican majority in Congress. When the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801 was repealed, some of the more belligerent Federalists, including Justice Chase, wanted the Supreme Court to declare the repeal act unconstitutional. Riding circuit in Virginia, Marshall opposed this strategy, and declared the law constitutional in STUART V. LAIRD. The decision was immediately appealed to the Supreme Court where Marshall would not be allowed to participate in the case because he had already ruled on it in the lower court. In early 1803 Paterson delivered the Supreme Court's decision on the question. Not only did he side with Marshall, he delivered a warning to the more combative Federalists that "the question is at rest and ought not now to be disturbed." Among other things, the decision clearly indicated that the Federalist-dominated Supreme Court was willing to acquiesce in the "Revolution of 1800." It also went a long way toward reducing concerns, at least among moderates in THOMAS JEFFERSON's administration, about the high court's tendency to engage in partisan politics.

In the fall of 1803, Paterson was injured in a carriage accident. He missed the February 1804 term of the Supreme Court; and although he rode circuit the following year, he never fully recovered. He died in 1806.

RICHARD E. ELLIS
(1986)

Bibliography

GOEBEL, JULIUS, JR. 1971 History of the Supreme Court of the United States, Vol. I: Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801. New York: Macmillan.

O'CONNOR, JOHN E. 1979 William Paterson: Lawyer and Statesman, 1745–1806. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press.

PATERSON PLAN

See: New Jersey Plan

PATIENTS' RIGHTS

The constitutional status of patients' rights can be distilled into three general doctrinal propositions: First, there are constitutional constraints on state authority to force medical treatment on an unwilling person; second, when a person is in state custody (for whatever reason), the state is constitutionally obliged to provide at least minimally adequate health care; and third, the state is not otherwise constitutionally required to provide even a minimal level of health care to anyone. The Supreme Court has not been so solicitous, however, toward implementing the first and second propositions as it has been toward the third.

The Court long ago held, in JACOBSON V. MASSACHUSETTS (1905) regarding smallpox vaccination, that an individual may be constitutionally subjected to involuntary medical treatment to protect community health. Beginning in the 1970s, in cases involving MENTAL ILLNESS, the Court found that forced treatment implicated FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT "liberty" interests and, accordingly, required the state to demonstrate, by "clear and convincing evidence," both the existence of mental illness and some measure of harm either to the affected individual or others that would follow without treatment. The principal decisions in this area were O'CONNOR V. DONALDSON (1975) and Addington v. Texas (1979). The Court, however, has not been expansive in applying the "liberty" principle to require state respect for individuals' autonomous choice to refuse treatment even where the possibility of harm appears limited to themselves alone.

Two 1990 decisions exemplify this restrictive construction. In Washington v. Harper (1990) the Court ruled that a prisoner could be forced to take psychotropic medication without any judicial determination of his or her need for the medication or mental competency to refuse it. While the Court acknowledged the existence of a "significant liberty interest" and said that the state's purposes in forcibly administering the medication must be "therapeutic" rather than "punitive," the Court found that internal administrative determinations made by prison psychiatric professionals would be adequate to protect the PRISONER'S RIGHTS.

Cruzan v. Missouri Department of Health (1990) considered the rights of patients to refuse medical treatment in an apparently different context; and yet, the result, in the Court's restricted construction of the liberty interest at stake, seems strikingly similar. In Cruzan, the patient was in a state hospital, having been without cognitive function (in a "persistent vegetative state") since an automobile accident seven years earlier. Hospital staff refused to discontinue medical treatment without judicial authorization, notwithstanding the request of the patient's parents, and the state court found that there was no "clear and convincing evidence" that patient herself would have wanted termination of treatment. The Supreme Court ruled that a competent adult had a Fourteenth Amendment liberty interest against unconsented medical care, but that the state was free to erect stringent evidentiary standards in evaluating claims on behalf of incompetent patients.

There were special factors in these two cases that might have limited the Court's inclination to apply the liberty interest that it abstractly had endorsed. In Harper, the Court cited "legitimate needs of institutional confinement," including state "interests in prison safety and security," as a basis for withholding application of the prisoner's claimed right to refuse medication; there was, however, no specific factual finding that the prisoner's condition endangered prison safety or security. In Cruzan, the autonomy claim was advanced on behalf of an obviously incompetent patient; there was, however, evidence (which the state court refused to credit) that before her incapacitating accident, the patient had explicitly opposed such medical treatment. In accepting the restrictive evidentiary standard, the Supreme Court was apparently unconcerned with the practical likelihood that most people will not make clear prior indications of their wishes regarding medical treatment (notwithstanding the statutory recognition in many states of so-called "living wills"). The Court, moreover, referred favorably to the state's interest in prohibiting suicide, a reference that suggests that the state is free to impose stringent mental competency tests on individuals who, unlike Cruzan, have current capacity to articulate their resistance to treatment—tests so stringent as to undermine in practice the liberty interest to refuse medical treatment that the Court abstractly endorsed.

The Court may, however, be more hospitable to the practical implementation of patients' right to refuse treatment in future cases than it was in Harper or Cruzan. Indeed, there were strong dissents in both cases (three in Harper and four in Cruzan) urging respect for the refusal rights and although Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR concurred in the Court's opinion in Cruzan, she wrote separately to suggest that states may be constitutionally required to respect not only prior formal statements made by an individual, as in a "living will," but also the wishes of a surrogate decision maker who had been formally designated by the individual before incapacitating illness.

As in the current constitutional doctrine regarding a patient's right to refuse treatment, there is a disjunction in the Supreme Court's case law between the abstract formulation that the state must provide medical treatment to persons in its custody and the specific standards adopted to assure practical implementation of that right. The disjunction was visible on the face of the first opinion in which the Court announced that prisoners have a right to medical treatment: In Estelle v. Gamble (1976) the Court held that failure to provide necessary treatment could constitute CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT in violation of the Eighth Amendment, but only if such failure amounted to a "deliberate indifference to serious medical needs." Similarly, in Youngberg v. Romeo (1982), the Court found that a resident of a state mental retardation institution had a constitutional right to receive "minimally adequate or reasonable training" programs; at the same time, however, the Court held that in determining the minimal standards for adequacy of reasonableness, judges must defer to medical and behavioral professionals. (Indeed, in Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST's opinion for the Court in Cruzan, the force even of this minimally bestowed treatment right was subtly undermined with the observation that "the liberty interest" in Youngberg addressed only "safety and freedom from bodily restraint [and] did not deal with decisions to administer or withhold medical treatment.")

Whatever the uncertainties of its acknowledgment of the right to refuse medical treatment or the right to receive treatment while in state custody, the Court has been quite clear in rejecting the existence of any generally applicable constitutional right for the provision of medical services. The Court explicitly stated in Youngberg that there was no such right to "substantive services." In MAHER V. ROE (1977) and HARRIS V. MCRAE (1980), moreover, the Court had held that neither state nor federal governments are constitutionally required to provide ABORTIONS for women who are INDIGENT; although these cases were colored by the surrounding public controversy about whether abortion should be considered an ordinary medical procedure, the decisions are nonetheless consistent with the Court's long-standing resistance to finding any constitutional ENTITLEMENTS not only for medical care but for WELFARE BENEFITS generally.

In Cruzan none of the other Court members joined with Justice ANTONIN SCALIA in his separate statement that "the Constitution has nothing to say" about the right to refuse medical treatment. Notwithstanding the pervasive role of state and federal governments in the provision and regulation of health care, however, the Constitution—as currently construed by the Supreme Court—says very little about patients' rights generally.

ROBERT A. BURT
(1992)

Bibliography

ANNAS, GEORGE J.; LAW, SYLVIA; ROSENBLATTE, RAND; and WING, KENNETH 1990 American Health Law. Chapter VI, pages 561–666. Boston: Little, Brown.

KATZ, JAY 1984 The Silent World of Doctor and Patient. New York: Free Press.

PATRONAGE

Political patronage has had a long tradition in parts of the United States, particularly in cities dominated by so-called "machine politics." Patronage entails government officials' exchanging government jobs or other discretionary government benefits for political support. In the first Mayor Daley's Chicago, for example, city employees were expected to work for the election of Democratic Party candidates as well as to contribute 2 percent of their salary to the party if they wanted to keep their jobs.

Beginning with a PLURALITY OPINION in the 1976 case of Elrod v. Burns, the Supreme Court has made it increasingly difficult for government officials to take party affiliation into account in making employment or contracting decisions. In Elrod, the newly elected Democratic sheriff of Cook County, Illinois sought to fire Republican employees in the Sheriff's office. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., in a three-Justice plurality opinion, held that firing a government employee based solely on the employee's party affiliation violated the employee's FIRST AMENDMENT right of FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION. Two additional Justices concurred in the result that the sheriff's conduct violated the First Amendment.

The sheriff had argued that patronage practices could be justified on three grounds: (1) insuring effective government and the efficiency of public employees; (2) insuring employees' political loyalty so that employees would not block implementation of a new administration's policies; and (3) preserving the democratic process through a strong party system. Applying STRICT SCRUTINY, the Elrod plurality rejected the first and third of these interests outright. It stated that the sheriff's interest in effective and efficient government could be protected through the less restrictive means of discharging employees for cause. It also disbelieved that the elimination of patronage practices would bring about the demise of party politics.

The plurality agreed that the sheriff's second asserted ground of insuring employees' political loyalty was valid insofar as it applied to employees in "policymaking positions," but it did not serve to "validate patronage wholesale." In the 1980 case of Branti v. Finkel, a majority further explained that a government official could take party affiliation into account in firing employees only when such affiliation is "an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of the public office involved." The Branti Court held that party affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for an assistant public defender.

Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, JR., dissented in both Elrod and Branti, arguing in both cases that political patronage strengthened POLITICAL PARTIES, and that strong political parties are required for effective democratic government. He also argued in Branti that the policymaking test articulated by the majority was uncertain and ill-advised.

In Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois (1990), a 5–4 majority extended the Elrod rule to other employment decisions, including hiring, promotions, transfers, and recalls of employees after layoffs. Justice ANTONIN SCALIA wrote a scathing dissent, raising and elaborating on many of the points Powell had made in his earlier dissents. Besides arguing that the Elrod line should be overturned, Scalia contended that strict scrutiny should not be applied to cases in which the government acted as an employer.

Four of the five Justices in the Rutan majority left the Court before it decided its most recent pair of patronage cases in 1996, O'Hare Truck Service v. City of Northlake and Umbehr v. Heiser, leading commentators to predict that the Court would use these decisions to reverse the Elrod line. In the event, Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, and Justices ANTHONY M. KENNEDY and SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR switched sides from their dissenting position in Rutan. Kennedy, writing for a 7–2 majority in O'Hare, held that the Elrod rule applied to independent contractors.

In an important development, the Court in Umbehr and O'Hare distinguished the Elrod line of cases, in which government based its employment decisions solely on the employee's party affiliation, from the Pickering v. Board of Education (1968) line of cases, in which government based its employment decisions on its employee's speech, such as employee speech criticizing the government. Elrod places the burden on the hiring authority to show that a political affiliation requirement is appropriate for the effective performance of the employee's office. In contrast, Pickering requires a balancing of the employee's rights with the government's legitimate interest as an employer in the latter.

After holding in O'Hare and Umbehr that independent contractors of the government must receive the same constitutional protection as government employees, the O'Hare Court explained that the initial question in future patronage cases must be whether the government's decision was based purely on the employee's or contractor's party affiliation or whether it also (or solely) involved the employee's or contractor's speech. Cases in the first category are governed by Elrod, but mixed cases of affiliation and speech (as well as pure speech cases) are governed by Pickering. Scalia in dissent believed this standard is unworkable, asking for example whether the statement "I am a Republican" moves a case from Elrod strict scrutiny to Pickering balancing. Most probably, the Elrod line henceforth will be reserved primarily for cases involving wholesale, nonindividualized decisions by the government to condition employment or contracting on the party affiliation of the employees or contractors.

Though the debate over the constitutionality of patronage turns in part on the Justices' varied beliefs about how coercive or unfair a party affiliation requirement is to government employees or contractors, the most contentious issue appears to be whether patronage practices support a strong democratic government. The majority in the Elrod line of cases characterizes patronage as inefficient and corrupt, and especially prone to entrenchment of one-party rule. The dissenters have a more benign view of patronage, noting its abuses but contending that states should have the right to find an optimal mix of patronage and merit that can strengthen the major political parties. Though a majority of the Court now appears to believe that the state has a strong interest in promoting the two-party system, TIMMONS V. TWIN CITIES AREA NEW PARTY (1997), no current majority believes that patronage practices promote the two-party system.

In part, the debate over the virtues of patronage comes too late. The replacement of party-centered, labor-intensive political campaigns with candidate-centered, capital-intensive ones has lessened politicians' demand for patronage employment. Politicians want money for media campaigns, not precinct workers. This increased demand for campaign contributions puts pressure on politicians to exchange government favors, including contracts, for such contributions. O'Hare, however, limits these exchanges, making it the patronage case most likely to have a strong effect on our political system.

RICHARD L. HASEN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Employee Speech Rights (Public); Freedom of Speech.)

Bibliography

BOWMAN, CYNTHIA GRANT 1991 "We Don't Want Anybody Anybody Sent": The Death of Patronage Hiring in Chicago. Northwestern University Law Review 86:57–95.

——— 1996 The Law of Patronage at a Crossroads. Journal of Law and Politics 12:341–363.

HASEN, RICHARD L. 1993 An Enriched Economic Model of Political Patronage and Campaign Contributions: Reformulating Supreme Court Jurisprudence. Cardozo Law Review 14:1311–1341.

JOHNSON, RONALD N. and LIBECAP, GARY D. 1994 The Federal Civil Service System and the Problem of Bureaucracy: The Economics and Politics of Institutional Change. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

PATTERSON v. MCLEAN CREDIT UNION
491 U.S. 164 (1989)

This decision's constitutional significance lies in what the Supreme Court did not do. The CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 guarantees "all persons . . . the same right . . . to make and enforce contracts . . . as is enjoyed by white persons." In RUNYON V. MCCRARY (1976) the Court had held that this provision not only required a state to give blacks and whites the same legal rights in contracting but also forbade private racial discrimination in the making of contracts. Later decisions had applied the same section to employment contracts. Patterson raised the issue of whether this section gave a black employee a right to damages against her employer for acts of racial harassment. In 1988, after oral argument on this issue and without any prompting from the parties, a 5–4 majority of the Court set the case down for reargument and asked the parties to consider whether Runyon v. McCrary should be overruled.

Four Justices bitterly dissented from this order, and outside the Court a clamor of protest rose. The majority that supported the order consisted of the two Runyon dissenters and the three Justices appointed by President RONALD REAGAN, and the order appeared to be the opening salvo in an assault on some of the major gains of the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT. If Runyon were overruled, why should the Court not overrule JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968)? Jones was the landmark decision that (1) interpreted a parallel provision of the 1866 Act to forbid private racial discrimination in the disposition of property, and (2) upheld the law, as so interpreted, on the basis of Congress's power to enforce the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT. The latter possibility seems, in retrospect, to have been unlikely, but the depth of concern is understandable. Sixty-six United States senators and 118 representatives filed a brief urging the Court not to overrule Runyon, and so did the attorneys general of forty-seven states.

In the event, the Court unanimously reaffirmed the Runyon PRECEDENT. The majority opinion (the same majority that had agreed on the reargument order) simply applied the doctrine of STARE DECISIS. The Court went on to read the 1866 act extremely narrowly, rejecting the conclusion of most lower federal courts that the law allowed damages for a private employer's racial harassment of an employee.

Patterson's narrow interpretation of the 1866 act is vulnerable to criticism, as the opinion of the four dissenters and Congress's recent effort to overturn it both attest. But the Court's reaffirmation of Runyon stants as the doctrinal consolidation of a broad political consensus on CIVIL RIGHTS that had seemed threatened in the 1980s.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

Bibliography

KARST, KENNETH L. 1989 Private Discrimination and Public Responsibility: Patterson in Context. Supreme Court Review 1989:1–51.

PATTON v. UNITED STATES
281 U.S. 276 (1930)

In this case a unanimous Supreme Court, speaking through Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND, held that the constitutional right to a jury in a federal court included exactly twelve members who were to render a unanimous verdict. (See JURY SIZE; JURY UNANIMITY.) Sutherland also declared that a defendant might waive his right to a jury or consent to a jury of less than twelve. Forty years later, in WILLIAMS V. FLORIDA (1970), a case involving a state court, the Court held that fixing the number of required jurors at twelve was a "historical accident" and "cannot be regarded as an indispensable component of the Sixth Amendment."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Waiver of Constitutional Rights.)

PAUL v. DAVIS
424 U.S. 693 (1976)

Even before GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970) the Supreme Court assumed that the guarantee of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS attached to state impairments of "liberty" or "property" interests—concepts that bore their own constitutional meanings as well as their traditional COMMON LAW meanings. Goldberg and its successors added to those meanings a new category of protected "entitlements" established by statute or other state action. BISHOP V. WOOD (1976) and Paul v. Davis turned this development upside down, using the idea of "entitlements" under state law to confine the reach of due process.

In Paul, police officers circulated a flyer containing the names and photographs of persons described as "active shoplifters." Davis, one of those listed, had been arrested and charged with shoplifting, but the case had not been prosecuted and the charge had been dismissed. He sued a police officer in a federal district court, claiming damages for a violation of his federal constitutional rights. The Supreme Court held, 5–3, that the alleged harm to Davis's reputation did not, of itself, amount to impairment of a "liberty" interest protected by the due process guarantee. For the majority, Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST manhandled precedents that had established reputation as a "core" constitutionally protected interest, asserting that the Court had previously offered protection to reputation only when it was harmed along with some other interest established by state law, such as a right to employment. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for the dissenters, showed how disingenuous was this characterization of the precedents.

Probably the majority's main concern was to keep the federal CIVIL RIGHTS laws from becoming a generalized law of torts committed by state officers, with the federal courts as the primary forum. Yet the majority opinion cannot be taken at face value. Unquestionably the notion of "liberty" interests protected by due process still includes a great many interests not defined by state law, such as FIRST AMENDMENT liberties.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

PAUL v. VIRGINIA
8 Wallace 168 (1869)

In 1866, Virginia prohibited out-of-state insurance companies from doing business without a substantial deposit; domestic companies were not so required. Convicted of violating the 1866 act, Paul filed a WRIT OF ERROR and BENJAMIN R. CURTIS argued his case. Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD, for a unanimous Supreme Court, rejected Paul's Article IV PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES argument, declaring that CITIZENSHIP could apply only to natural persons. Field further asserted that insurance contracts were not articles of commerce and that the issuance of a policy was not a transaction in INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Paul was often cited as a limitation on congressional power on the incorrect assumption that congressional and state regulatory power were mutually exclusive. Paul remained law until virtually overturned in UNITED STATES V. SOUTH-EASTERN UNDERWRITERS ASSOCIATION (1944), involving congressional power, after which Congress authorized state regulation.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

PAXTON'S CASE
Gray, Mass. Repts., 51 469 (1761)

In Paxton's Case, the Massachusetts Superior Court considered whether to continue issuing WRITS OF ASSISTANCE, which, by a British statute of 1662, empowered customs officers to search all houses for contraband. Massachusetts opposed these writs; its legislation had repudiated the general SEARCH WARRANTS they resembled in favor of uniformly specific warrants. Other stimulants to the case were frequent searches under the writs, tense relations with local British customs officers, the belief that customs regulations had been enforced against local merchants with discriminatory rigor, and the thwarted ambitions of the powerful Otis family for appointment to the Superior Court.

The death of King George II terminated existing writs after six months, and local merchants asked the court not to replace them. In the initial hearing Josiah Gridley argued the positions of the customs establishment that the act of 1662 defined writs of assistance as general search warrants and that a local statute had empowered the court to issue them by giving it the same jurisdiction as the one that issued them in England. Oxenbridge Thacher and JAMES OTIS, JR., representing the merchants, inaccurately replied that the local court had not recently exercised the powers of the English tribunal, the Court of Exchequer.

Otis, son of the candidate for a seat on the Superior Court, cited a magazine article to prove that the writs did not currently operate as GENERAL WARRANTS in Britain and had not been so intended by the statute of 1662. Legions of British laws authorized general searches, however, and Otis relied primarily on the HIGHER LAW. Since general searches allegedly violated natural and COMMON LAW, Otis reasoned that writs of assistance were intrinsically void if worded as the statute prescribed and should be judicially construed as specific search warrants.

Otis's use of sources was heavily didactic. He cited Sir EDWARD COKE, whose Institutes exaggerated MAGNA CARTA into a prohibition of general search warrants, and he wrongly read into Coke a further requirement that all search warrants be specific. Otis also stretched BONHAM'S CASE (1610) to hold that common law courts could "control" unreasonable Parliamentary legislation and render it void. Only private interests had actually clashed in Bon- ham's Case, not levels of law or government as Otis implied. Although Otis had not advised the court explicitly to disallow a Parliamentary statute, he misused Bonham's Case to advocate a judicial construction of the act that would have had the effect of disallowance.

Persuaded by Otis's eloquence, the court delayed its decision, found that the writs used in England were general, and approved their local issuance over Otis's continued objections. The Massachusetts legislature responded by reducing the salaries of the judges and passing a bill, vetoed by the governor, to define the writs as specific warrants. THOMAS HUTCHINSON, whose appointment as Chief Justice had blocked the judicial aspirations of the Otises, later traced his political demise to his courtroom support of writs of assistance. Paxton's Case is one of the leading precedents for the FOURTH AMENDMENT and probably inspired the rejection by later Massachusetts courts (1763–1766) of customary search warrants against felons in Bassett v. Mayhew and other cases.

WILLIAM J. CUDDIHY
(1986)

Bibliography

SMITH, M. H. 1978 The Writs of Assistance Case. Berkeley: University of California Press.

PAYNE v. TENNESSEE
501 U.S. 808 (1991)

Writing for a 6–3 majority, Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST held that victim impact evidence in CAPITAL PUNISHMENT cases is not barred by the Eighth Amendment's CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT clause. Payne OVERRULED a contrary decision, BOOTH V. MARYLAND (1987), handed down only four years earlier by a Court divided 5–4.

The drug-crazed and sexually driven Payne stabbed to death a young mother and her two-year-old daughter, and attacked and seriously injured her three-year-old son. At Payne's trial, the grandmother was allowed to testify that the boy cried for his lost relatives. The prosecutor, in closing argument, poignantly portrayed a child in mourning, who would never be kissed good-night by his mother or be able to play with his little sister.

In upholding the admission of testimony relating to the effect of the murders on the boy, the majority rejected Booth's holding that victim impact evidence subverts the reasoned decisionmaking process required for the imposition of the death penalty. Rehnquist denied that victim impact evidence introduced factors irrelevant to proper sentencing goals (such as retribution and deterrence) or encouraged jurors to base sentences on the perceived moral or social worth of victims or their families (thereby creating an impermissible risk that the penalty would be determined arbitrarily). Rather, he opined, victim impact evidence is designed to show each victim's uniqueness as a human being and provides a needed counterweight to the virtually unlimited proof that the defendant is permitted to adduce concerning his circumstances, character, and record.

In dissent, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS echoed the arguments accepted in Booth, while Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL accused the majority of abandoning PRECEDENT solely because of a change in the personnel of the Court.

VIVIAN BERGER
(2000)

Bibliography

BERGER, VIVIAN 1992 Payne and Suffering—A Personal Reflection and a Victim-Centered Critique. Florida State Law Review 20:21–65.

COYNE, RANDALL 1992 Inflicting Payne on Oklahoma: The Use of Victim Impact Evidence During the Sentencing Phase of Capital Cases. Oklahoma Law Review 45:589–628.

PAYTON v. NEW YORK
445 U.S. 573 (1980)

The FOURTH AMENDMENT, which the FOURTEENTH makes applicable to the states, says that the "right of people to be secure in their . . . houses . . . shall not be violated." Payton was the first case in which the Supreme Court confronted the issue whether police may enter a private home, without an ARREST WARRANT or consent, to make a FELONY arrest. New York, sustained by its courts, authorized warrantless ARRESTS, by forcible entry if necessary, in any premises, if the police had PROBABLE CAUSE to believe a person had committed a felony. In Payton's case the police seized EVIDENCE in PLAIN VIEW at the time of arrest and used it to convict him.

A 6–3 Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, reversed and held the state statute unconstitutional. Absent EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES, "a man's house is his castle" and unlike a public place may not be invaded without a warrant. Stevens found slight guidance in history for his position on the special privacy of the home in the case of a felony arrest, but he insisted that the Fourth Amendment required a magistrate's warrant. Justice BYRON R. WHITE for the dissenters declared that the decision distorted history and severely hampered law enforcement; the amendment required only that a warrantless felony arrest be made on probable cause in daytime. (See STEAGALD V. UNITED STATES.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PECKHAM, RUFUS W.
(1838–1909)

Rufus Wheeler Peckham, the last of President GROVER CLEVELAND's four appointees to the Supreme Court, was commissioned in 1896 following eight years of service on the New York Court of Appeals. His name is linked most often with one of the half dozen most fulsomely denounced Supreme Court decisions in American history. Speaking for a majority of five in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), Peckham invoked the SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS doctrine of "liberty of contract," which he had established in an incipient form in ALLGEYER V. LOUISIANA (1897), and invalidated a statute regulating the hours worked by bakeshop employees. (See FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.) Peckham's opinion infuriated progressive reformers, evoked one of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES's most famous dissents, and ultimately contributed a new term to the lexicon of constitutional discourse in America. More than four generations later, "Lochnerism" is habitually used by commentators to describe the horrible consequences of interventionist JUDICIAL REVIEW in defense of doctrinally abstract constitutional rights.

Holmes once remarked that the "major premise" of Peckham's jurisprudence was "God damn it." It was an apt observation. Peckham was outraged by the increasing propensity of state legislatures and the Congress to transcend "the proper functions of government," and he not only conceptualized the judicial function in essentially negative terms but also regarded the Court as an appropriate forum for battling the ominous evils of centralization and socialism. For Peckham, the Court's role in constitutional adjudication was to police the boundaries separating the rights of the individual, the powers of the states, and the authority of the general government in such a way as to keep each within its proper sphere. Otherwise, he warned while still on the New York bench, "in addition to the ordinary competition that exists throughout all industries, a new competition will be introduced, that of competition for the possession of the government."

Peckham had boundless confidence in his capacity to draw objective lines between these mutually limiting spheres. He dissented in CHAMPION V. AMES (1903) on the ground that a federal statute prohibiting interstate distribution of lottery tickets was not a regulation of commerce at all but rather an attempt by Congress to usurp the reserved power of the states to regulate public morals. And in Lochner Peckham conceded that state governments might prevent individuals from making certain kinds of contracts, only to conclude that there was no "direct relation" between the hours worked by bakeshop employees and either the public health or the health, safety, and morals of the workers. Peckham, in short, knew a police regulation or an exercise of the commerce power when he saw one. Holmes may have been astonished when Peckham claimed that legitimate governmental interventions were readily distinguishable from those with only a "pretense" of legitimacy. But most Americans were accustomed to the claim. The spate of veto messages issued by President Cleveland were strikingly similar to Peckham's judicial opinions in both substance and style.

Peckham's voting record in cases involving race relations reflected another principal goal of the Cleveland Democracy—"home rule" for the South. The great spokesman for liberty of contract joined the majority in HODGES V. UNITED STATES (1906), which denied federal JURISDICTION over conspiracies to prevent blacks from making or carrying out labor contracts. He also concurred in BEREA COLLEGE V. KENTUCKY (1908), where the Court upheld a statute prohibiting even voluntary interracial education. If Peckham perceived a principled difference between the right of employers and employees to contract in Lochner and the right of individuals freely to associate in Berea College, he never described it. Yet it appears that Peckham rarely worried about such overarching conceptual problems. He not only managed to keep race relations and employment contract issues in separate analytical compartments but also voted to impose more stringent PUBLIC USE requirements on state governments when they regulated prices under the POLICE POWER than when they exercised the EMINENT DOMAIN power. Peckham stridently criticized the DOCTRINE of Munn v. Illinois (1877) throughout his career, arguing that storage rates charged by grain elevator firms were not subject to regulation because the owners had not devoted their property "to any public use, within the meaning of the law." (See GRANGER CASES.) In Clark v. Nash (1905), however, he sustained a law that permitted individuals to condemn rights-of-way across their neighbors' land for irrigation and mining purposes. "What is a public use," Peckham declared, "may frequently and largely depend upon the facts surrounding the subject, and . . . the people of a State . . . must in the nature of things be more familiar with such facts" than the federal judiciary.

Peckham wrote 448 opinions during his fourteen years on the Court, more than thirty percent of which were dissents. Very few of his majority opinions have stood the test of time. Modern commentators almost unanimously regard most of the results he reached to be insupportable and his mode of reasoning unfathomable. But it was Peckham himself who best summed up both the implications of his work for American public life and the internal contradictions that hastened its demise. "At times there seems to be a legal result which takes no account of the obviously practical result," he wrote in Sauer v. City of New York

(1907). "At times there seems to come an antithesis between legal science and common sense."

CHARLES W. MCCURDY
(1986)

Bibliography

SKOLNIK, RICHARD 1969 Rufus Peckham. Pages 1685–1703 in Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court, 1789–1967. New York: Chelsea House.

PEIK v. CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY CO.

See: Granger Cases

PELL v. PROCUNIER 417 U.S. 817 (1974)

In a case that helped delineate the boundaries between the traditional FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms and the expanding area of PRISONERS' RIGHTS, several prisoners and professional journalists challenged the constitutionality of a California prison regulation that forbade press interviews with particular inmates. The argument for the prisoners' rights was that this regulation abridged their FREEDOM OF SPEECH; the journalists claimed the rule inhibited their newsgathering capabilities, thus violating the FREEDOM OF PRESS. The Justices voted 6–3 against the inmates and 5–4 against the journalists. Because the prisoners had alternative means of communication (friends or family, for example) the California regulation did not violate their rights. The majority based its rejection of the journalists' position on the purpose of the regulation—to prevent particular individuals from gaining excessive influence through special attention—and the reporters' otherwise free access to prisoners. Furthermore, the regulation did not prohibit the press from publishing what it chose.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

PENDENT JURISDICTION

When a federal court has JURISDICTION over a case presenting a FEDERAL QUESTION, the court may also take jurisdiction over closely related claims based on state law. According to Gibbs v. United Mine Workers of America (1966), pendent jurisdiction over a state law claim is appropriate when the state and federal claims share "a common nucleus of operative fact." If the federal claim is itself insubstantial, or is dismissed before the case is tried, it will not serve as a basis for getting a state claim heard by the federal court; such a case should be dismissed. The federal court has discretion to decline pendent jurisdiction over a state claim when the state issues are apt to predominate in the case (making it more appropriate for hearing in a state court), or when the combination of federal and state claims is apt to produce jury confusion. (See ANCILLARY JURISDICTION.)

In PENNHURST STATE SCHOOL & HOSPITAL V. HALDERMAN (1984) the Supreme Court drastically curtailed use of pendent jurisdiction in CIVIL RIGHTS cases. The Court held that the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT bars a federal court from entertaining an action—whether for DAMAGES or for INJUNCTION—against a state officer, when the action is based on an alleged violation of state law.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

WRIGHT, CHARLES ALAN 1983 The Law of Federal Courts, 4th ed. Pages 103–109. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

PENDLETON, EDMUND (1721–1803)

Admitted to the bar in 1745, Edmund Pendleton became a justice of the peace in 1751 and a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses in 1752. He was a leader of the conservative patriot faction in Virginia and opposed PATRICK HENRY on many issues, including colonial reaction to the Stamp Act of 1765. Pendleton opposed the act and, as a justice of the peace, declared it unconstitutional, but he did not approve of Henry's famous resolutions against it. He became a member of the committee of correspondence in 1773 and a delegate to the FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS in 1774. Between 1774 and 1776 he was president of both the Virginia convention (the provisional legislature) and the Committee of Safety (the de facto executive). He presided over the Virginia convention of 1776 which passed the resolution Pendleton had drafted instructing Virginia's delegates to the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS to seek a DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, adopted the VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS AND CONSTITUTION, and appointed a committee, including Pendleton, GEORGE WYTHE, and THOMAS JEFFERSON, to revise the state's laws. He was elected speaker of the first House of Delegates under the new constitution (1776–1777) and then appointed first presiding judge of the court of chancery (1777–1779). In 1779 he became presiding judge of the court of appeals, the state's highest court, a position he held until his death. In COMMONWEALTH V. CATON (1782), he stated that laws repugnant to the state constitution were void, but he reserved the question of whether his court could so declare them.

Pendleton was unanimously chosen president of the Virginia convention of 1788 at which he argued and voted for the RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. He declined President GEORGE WASHINGTON's offer of a federal district judgeship in order to remain on the state court. As an indication of his virtues as a judge, it is said that only one of his judicial decisions was ever reversed, and in that case he reversed himself.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PENDLETON ACT
22 Stat. 403 (1883)

A fundamental change in the operation of American government began with the adoption of the Civil Service Act of 1883—known as the Pendleton Act, for its sponsor, Senator George H. Pendleton (Democrat of Ohio). The act created a merit system for selection of nonpolicymaking employees of the United States government to replace the "spoils" system which rewarded political supporters. Although the immediate stimulus for adoption of the act was the assassination of President JAMES GARFIELD by a disappointed office seeker, a politically independent civil service had been a major goal of reformers for many years.

The act based eligibility for affected federal employment on performance in competitive examinations, and it created a Civil Service Commission to supervise the examinations and handle personnel administration. Initially extending to less than ten percent of federal employees, the competitive civil service now includes over ninety percent. Much of this growth was a result of the Ramspeck Act (Civil Service Act of 1940) which authorized the President to place virtually all federal employment under the system by EXECUTIVE ORDER. The Civil Service Reform Act (1978) abolished the Civil Service Commission but retained the principle of political neutrality established by the Pendleton Act.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

ROSENBLOOM, DAVID H. 1971 Federal Service and the Constitution. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

PENN, WILLIAM
(1644–1718)

The scion of a wealthy English family, William Penn attended Oxford University, studied law, and managed the family's estates before becoming a Quaker in the mid-1660s. Throughout the rest of his life Penn engaged in Quaker preaching and propaganda. He was imprisoned on at least three occasions for publishing pamphlets about his religious beliefs. His acquittal in 1670 on a charge of unlawful preaching led to BUSHELL'S CASE, which ended the punishment of jurors who decided contrary to a judge's instructions. In the political campaigns of the late 1670s, Penn agitated for RELIGIOUS LIBERTY and frequent parliamentary elections.

Penn's involvement with America began in 1682, when he became a trustee of the colony of West Jersey, which he and eleven others had purchased for settlement by Quakers, and helped to frame its charter. King Charles II granted the proprietary colony of Pennsylvania to Penn in 1681 as settlement of a large debt that the king owed Penn's father; the following year Penn leased the area now known as Delaware and added it to the colony. Penn described his intentions for the colony as a "holy experiment" in religious and political liberty. In 1682, during a two-year sojourn in America, he wrote a Frame of Government (constitution) for the colony, granting the settlers freedom of religion, procedural guarantees in criminal cases, and limited self-government.

In 1697 Penn drafted, and submitted to the Board of Trade, the first proposal for a federal union of the English colonies in North America. His plan would have created a "congress," comprising two representatives from each colony, competent to legislate on any matter related to "the public tranquility and safety."

During a visit to Pennsylvania in 1701 Penn granted the residents a new charter, the Charter of Privileges, creating a unicameral legislature, greatly expanding the scope of colonial self-government, and providing for Delaware's establishment as a separate entity. Shortly thereafter, he returned to England, where he died.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Pennsylvania Colonial Charters.)

Bibliography

WILDES, HARRY E. 1974 William Penn. New York: Macmillan.

PENN CENTRAL TRANSPORTATION CO. v. NEW YORK CITY
438 U.S. 104 (1978)

Some governmental regulations of the use of property are severe enough to be called TAKINGS OF PROPERTY, for which JUST COMPENSATION must be made under the explicit terms of the Fifth Amendment (governing federal government action) or interpretations of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT'S

DUE PROCESS clause (governing state action). This decision illustrates how difficult it is to persuade the Supreme Court that a regulation constitutes a "taking."

A New York City ordinance required city approval before a designated landmark's exterior could be altered. The owner of Grand Central Terminal sought to build a tall office building on top of the terminal, and was refused permission on aesthetic grounds. The Supreme Court held, 6–3, that this regulation did not constitute a "taking."

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for the majority, conceded that the takingregulation distinction had defied clear formulation, producing a series of "ad hoc factual inquiries." This regulation, however, was analogous to ZONING under a comprehensive plan; over 400 landmarks had been designated. Further, the owner's loss was reduced by transferring its air-space development rights to other property in the city.

For the dissenters, Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST argued that the law's severely destructive impact on property values was not justified by either of the usual "exceptions": the banning of "noxious uses," or the imposition of widely shared burdens to secure "an average reciprocity of advantage" (as in the case of zoning). Penn Central had suffered a huge loss of value, not offset by benefits under the landmark law.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

PENNHURST STATE SCHOOL & HOSPITAL v. HALDERMAN
451 U.S. 1 (1981)
457 U.S. 1131 (1984)

Pennhurst worked major changes in the interpretation of the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT and in the PENDENT JURISDICTION of federal courts over claims based on state law. These changes remove one important weapon from the arsenal of CIVIL RIGHTS plaintiffs.

Terri Lee Halderman, a resident of Pennhurst, a state institution for the mentally retarded, commenced a CLASS ACTION in federal district court against Pennhurst and a number of state and local officials. She alleged that squalor, abuse of residents, and other conditions at Pennhurst violated the federal DEVELOPMENTALLY DISABLED ASSISTANCE AND BILL OF RIGHTS ACT of 1975, the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and Pennsylvania's statute governing mental retardation. After a long trial, the district court agreed with her on all counts, and held that mentally retarded people in the state's care had a due process right to live in "the least restrictive setting" that would serve their needs. The court's INJUNCTION ordered the defendants to close Pennhurst and place its residents in "suitable living arrangements." The court of appeals affirmed, but rested decision only on the federal statute. The Supreme Court reversed, instructing the lower courts to consider whether the district court's order was justified on the basis of the Constitution or state law. On REMAND, the court of appeals avoided the constitutional issue, holding that state law required reaffirmance of the "least restrictive setting" ruling. When the case returned to the Supreme Court, the Court held, 5–4, that the Eleventh Amendment barred the district court's injunction. (The case was then settled, with the state agreeing to close Pennhurst and to move its residents to their home communities, or to other institutions if they were aged or ill.)

Justice LEWIS F. POWELL'S OPINION OF THE COURT announced that the doctrine of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY is a constitutional principle, based on the Eleventh Amendment, which gives a state immunity from suit in a federal court by an individual plaintiff. In Powell's novel reading, EX PARTE YOUNG (1908) stands for a narrow exception to this immunity, allowing a suit in federal court for an injunction against a state officer only when the plaintiff's claim is based on a violation of the federal Constitution. (Perhaps violations of federal statutes will fit within this category, because of the operation of the SUPREMACY CLAUSE.) Suits in federal court against state officers—even suits for injunctive relief—are thus barred by the Eleventh Amendment when they are based on claimed violations of state law.

Prior to Pennhurst an action in federal court founded on FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION could include a claim for relief on state law grounds, when both the federal and state claims arose out of the same facts. However, Powell said, this doctrine of pendent jurisdiction rests only on concerns for efficiency and convenience, concerns that must give way to the force of the Eleventh Amendment.

For the dissenters, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS decried the Court's overruling of some two dozen precedents, and defended the long-established understanding of Ex parte Young: that when a state officer's conduct is illegal (under either federal or state law), the officer is "stripped" of the cloak of the sovereign's immunity. Here it was perverse to clothe Pennsylvania's officers with the state's Eleventh Amendment immunity when they were acting in violation of their sovereign's commands as embodied in state law. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, dissenting separately, argued that the amendment does not bar a suit by a citizen against the citizen's own state.

The Pennhurst majority opinion is vulnerable to criticism for its historical analysis of the Eleventh Amendment, for its casual dismissal of the importance of the federal courts' pendent jurisdiction, and for its choice to confer immunity on wrongdoing officials in the name of the sovereignty of the very state that had made the officials' conduct illegal. These criticisms seem minor, however, in the light of another one that is far more grave. The majority, in denying private citizens a vital judicial remedy against official lawlessness, weakened the rule of law.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

SHAPIRO, DAVID L. 1984 Wrong Turns: The Eleventh Amendment and the Pennhurst Case. Harvard Law Review 98:61–85.

PENNSYLVANIA v. NELSON
350 U.S. 497 (1956)

The Supreme Court banned outright state prosecutions for SEDITION against the United States by ruling, in Pennsylvania v. Nelson, that Congress had already preempted that field of SOVEREIGNTY. The decision had the effect of limiting the states to punishing sedition against state or local, but not federal, government.

Steve Nelson, an avowed communist, had been convicted for violating Pennsylvania's stringent sedition law by his words and actions concerning the federal government; he was sentenced to serve twenty years in prison and pay large fines. The state supreme court reversed, holding the state law had been superseded by the Smith Act. The Supreme Court upheld and extended this ruling. Chief Justice EARL WARREN used three criteria or a three-part criterion in ruling that there was no longer room for state action in this field. The scheme of federal regulation, he maintained, which included the Smith Act, the INTERNAL SECURITY ACT of 1950, and the COMMUNIST CONTROL ACT of 1954, was "so pervasive" as to leave no room for state regulation. Further, these federal statutes demonstrated a federal interest "so dominant" as to preclude state action on the same subject; and for the state to enforce its federal law presented a "serious danger of conflict" with the administration of the federal program. Three Justices dissented, arguing that Congress had not intended to preempt the internal security field.

Following the decision all pending proceedings under the state sedition laws were dismissed or abandoned. Congress considered a measure to set aside the decision but failed to enact it.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL CHARTERS
(April 25, 1682; October 28, 1701)

WILLIAM PENN, the proprietor of Pennsylvania, was a Quaker, a humanitarian, a champion of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, and a stalwart advocate of CIVIL LIBERTIES. His two charters for his colony gave it representative institutions of government and bills of rights far in advance of the times. The 1682 Frame of Government called itself a "charter of liberties" that had the character of FUNDAMENTAL LAW. Any act of government that "infringed" on the designated liberties, said the Frame, "shall be held of no force or effect." Inhabitants possessing one hundred acres of land "at one penny an acre" were declared "freemen" capable of electing or being elected representatives, including members of the upper house—an innovation. The Frame separated church and state and guaranteed religious liberty by its provision that all persons professing God should be free to worship as they pleased and not be compelled to frequent or maintain any worship or ministry. FAIR TRIAL, which Penn and the Quakers had been denied in England, was here protected. At a time when defendants could not testify on their own behalf, the Frame allowed all persons to plead their own cases. Trial by a twelve-member jury of the VICINAGE, whose judgment was to be "final" (see BUSHELL'S CASE, 1670) and INDICTMENT by GRAND JURY in capital cases were guaranteed. The RIGHT TO BAIL was recognized and excessive fines were banned.

The 1701 Charter of Privileges, which replaced the Frame and remained the basis of government in Pennsylvania until 1776, also had the character of a CONSTITUTION to which ordinary legislation must conform or be of no effect. Its provisions for the "Enjoyment of Civil Liberties" and for religious liberty, and its ban against an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION extended to all inhabitants "for ever." Among their innovations was a guarantee that "all criminals shall have the same Privileges of Witnesses and Council [sic] as their Prosecutors," the source of the comparable clauses in the SIXTH AMENDMENT. England did not allow counsel to all defendants until 1836. Pennsylvania's colonial charters had a marked influence on the development of the concept of a bill of rights in America.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

PERRY, RICHARD L., ed. 1959 Sources of Our Liberties. Pages 204–221, 251–260. New York: American Bar Foundation.

PENNSYLVANIA CONSTITUTION OF 1776
(August 16, 1776)

Pennsylvania's short-lived first CONSTITUTION, superseded in 1790, is notable because it was the most unorthodox and democratic of the constitutions of the original states. Although the extralegal "convention" that framed the document exercised full powers of government and remained in session as the legislature, the constitution was FUNDAMENTAL LAW. Its preamble, stressing NATURAL RIGHTS theory, declared that it was "for ever" unalterable; its declaration of rights was made part of the constitution and inviolable; and its frame of government created a legislature without the power "to add to, alter, abolish, or infringe" any part of the constitution.

The declaration of rights was superior to the more famous VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS, Pennsylvania's model. Pennsylvania omitted the right to BAIL and the ban against excessive fines and CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS but added FREEDOM OF SPEECH, assembly, and petition; separated church and state; recognized the right of CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION; protected the RIGHT TO COUNSEL in all criminal cases; and provided for the right to bear arms and the RIGHT TO TRAVEL or emigrate—all constitutional "firsts" in the United States. To create a political democracy controlled by the people, the frame of government established a powerful unicameral legislature, with no upper house to check the lower and no governor to veto its legislation. The legislature's proceedings had to be made public and its doors were to be open to the public. In effect all males of voting age could vote, because the constitution enfranchised all taxpayers (all men had to pay a POLL TAX) and their sons, and anyone who could vote was eligible to hold office. Proportional representation, based on the number of taxable inhabitants, governed the apportionment of the legislature.

In place of a governor the constitution established a council, elected by the people, representing each county, with a president or chairman. The council had weak executive powers but for the power to make appointments, including all judges. The constitution instituted few checks and did recognize SEPARATION OF POWERS. Its strangest institution was the council of censors, a popularly elected body that met for one year in every seven and was charged with the responsibility of seeing that the constitution was preserved inviolate; it could review the performance of all public officers, order IMPEACHMENTS, recommend repeal of legislation, and call a convention to revise the constitution. That council met only once and was so politically divided that it did nothing. But the VERMONT CONSTITUTION OF 1777, based on Pennsylvania's, copied the council of censors and kept it until 1869. The Pennsylvania Constitution of 1790 followed the MASSACHUSETTS CONSTITUTION OF 1780.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

SELSON, J. PAUL (1936) 1971 The Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776. New York: Da Capo Press.

PENRY v. LYNAUGH
492 U.S. 302 (1989)

In this case on the prohition against CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT imposed by the Eighth Amendment and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, the Court ruled that to inflict CAPITAL PUNISHMENT on a mentally retarded prisoner was not necessarily unconstitutional. The Court, speaking through Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, also held that the ban on cruel and unusual punishments would be violated in a capital case if the sentencing jury were not instructed to consider all circumstances mitigating against the imposition of the death penalty. In this case, the jury had not properly considered whether Penry's MENTAL RETARDATION and history of childhood abuse diminished his moral culpability and made capital punishment a disproportionate sentence. Because the Eighth Amendment mandates an individualized assessment of the appropriateness of the death penalty, no mitigating factor may be withheld from the jury. Punishment must be directly related to the personal culpability of the criminal. Accordingly, the Court vacated the death sentence and remanded the case for resentencing under proper jury instruction.

Nonetheless, Justice O'Connor, for the Court, rejected Penry's second claim, ruling that the Eighth Amendment does not categorically prohibit the execution of a criminal who is mentally retarded. One who is profoundly or severely retarded and wholly lacking in the capacity to understand the wrongfulness of his or her actions cannot, in the face of the amendment, be executed. But the degree of mental retardation must be considered. In Penry's case, that of an adult with the reasoning capacity of a child not more than seven years of age, there was some proof that his diminished abilities disabled him from controlling his impulses and learning from his mistakes; yet a jury could properly conclude that his disabilities did not substantially reduce his level of blameworthiness for a capital offense. The Court refused to accept mental age as a line-drawing principle in such cases.

Four dissenters argued that the execution of mentally retarded prisoners invariably violates the "cruel and unusual punishment" clause because such people lack the culpability that is prerequisite to the proportionate imposition of the death penalty.

The Penry decision also made law on the subject of HABEAS CORPUS relief in federal courts, extending the nonretroactivity principle of Teague v. Lane (1989) to capital cases.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

PENSACOLA TELEGRAPH CO. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.
96 U.S. 1 (1878)

This case is significant because the Supreme Court, following GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), declared that the congressional power to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE extends to newly invented instrumentalities of commerce, here the telegraph. In 1866 Congress had prohibited the states from granting telegraph monopolies. Florida, seeking to control telegraphic transmission within its JURISDICTION, conferred exclusive rights on the Pensacola company. A 7–2 Court, speaking through Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE, held the state act unconstitutional for conflict with the act of Congress. Accordingly, the company had no valid chartered right to exclude competitors.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PENUMBRA THEORY

Writing for the Supreme Court in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS commented that "specific guarantees in the BILL OF RIGHTS have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance." The occasion for this shadowy suggestion was the Court's decision holding unconstitutional the application to a BIRTH CONTROL clinic of a state law forbidding the use of contraceptive devices, even by the married couples whom the clinic had aided. Although nothing in the Constitution specifically forbade such a law, Justice Douglas rested decision on a RIGHT OF PRIVACY founded in this "penumbra" theory. A number of constitutional guarantees created "zones of privacy." One such zone included the "right of association contained in the FIRST AMENDMENT." Other protections of privacy were afforded by the THIRD AMENDMENT's limitations on the quartering of troops, the FOURTH AMENDMENT's protections against unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES, and the Fifth Amendment's RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. "The present case, then, concerns a relationship lying within the zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees."

This "penumbra" theory, which has had no generative power of its own, is best understood as a last-ditch effort by Justice Douglas to avoid a confrontation with Justice HUGO L. BLACK over a doctrinal issue dear to Black's heart. In his famous dissent in Adamson v. California (1947), Black had derided "the natural-law-due-process formula" that allowed judges, with no warrant in the constitutional text, "to trespass, all too freely, on the legislative domain of the States as well as the Federal Government." Douglas had joined Black's Adamson dissent, and perhaps hoped that his Griswold opinion, by maintaining a formal tie to the specifics of the Bill of Rights, might persuade Black to come along. Black, of course, would have none of it: "I get nowhere in this case by talk about a constitutional 'right of privacy' as an emanation from one or more constitutional provisions. I like my privacy as well as the next one, but I am nevertheless compelled to admit that government has a right to invade it unless prohibited by some specific constitutional provision."

The Court subsequently relocated its new right of privacy in the liberty protected by the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and no further "penumbras" have been seen in the land. Nonetheless, the Griswold decision has been an unusually influential precedent, not only for the Supreme Court's abortion decisions but also for the development of a generalized FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION. Not every penumbra darkens the road ahead.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

KAUPER, PAUL G. 1965 Penumbras, Peripheries, Emanations, Things Fundamental and Things Forgotten: The Griswold Case. Michigan Law Review 64:235–282.

PEONAGE

Peonage is a system of debt bondage, in which a laborer is bound to personal service in order to work off an obligation to pay money. The system originated in the newly independent countries of Spanish America early in the nineteenth century, and in Hawaii and the Philippines later, as a substitute for various institutions used in the colonial era to marshal a labor force. In some of these countries the system continues to exist. In its classic form, peonage involves a trivial advance of money to a worker, in exchange for a contractual obligation to work for a term, or until the debt is repaid. From then on, the laborer is bound by law to serve the employer, and efforts to quit are met with the force of the state: arrest, imprisonment, return to the employer's service.

Peonage was also part of a larger system of involuntary servitude that emerged in the American South after the CIVIL WAR. As such, though whites have sometimes been its victims, peonage has served as a substitute for black SLAVERY. After the slave states were forced by emancipation to shift from a labor regime based on status and force to one of free labor based on contract and choice, peonage emerged as a system that hid the wolf of involuntary servitude in the sheep's clothing of contract.

Peonage as a customary system for coerced black labor had its origin in the contract-enforcement sections of the BLACK CODES (1865–1875) and other labor-related statutes of the era. These provided both civil and criminal penalties for breach of labor contracts, punished VAGRANCY, prohibited enticement of laborers from their jobs, and hampered or penalized agents inducing the emigration of laborers. Southern states also permitted the leasing of convict labor and adopted a criminal-surety system, whereby a person convicted of a MISDEMEANOR would have his fine and costs paid by a prospective employer and then be obliged to work for the surety. Though the Black Codes were soon repealed, the FREEDMEN'S BUREAU at the same time emphasized labor contracts as the nexus of the employer-employee relationship for former slaves, and this later encouraged the use of contracts as a device for forcing black labor.

In 1867, when Congress enacted the Peonage Act to abolish peonage in New Mexico Territory, it also made it applicable to "any other Territory or State of the United States." The act made it a FELONY to hold a person in a condition of peonage, or to arrest a person for that purpose. It voided statutes and "usages" enforcing the "voluntary or involuntary service or labor of any persons as peons in liquidation of a debt or obligation, or otherwise."

United States District Judge Thomas G. Jones began the legal struggle against peonage in a vigorous GRAND JURY charge, reported as The Peonage Cases (1903), defining peonage broadly as "the exercise of dominion over their persons and liberties by the master, or employer, or creditors, to compel the discharge of the obligation, by service or labor, against the will of the person performing the service." In Clyatt v. United States (1905), the Supreme Court upheld the use of the Peonage Act for the prosecution of a peon-master. Brushing aside both STATE ACTION and DUAL SOVEREIGNTY arguments, Justice DAVID J. BREWER found authorization for direct federal power over peonage in the enforcement clause (section 2) of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT. But he also held that debt was the "basal fact" of peonage, thus limiting federal action to cases where an actual debt could be shown.

After publication of the "Report on Peonage" (1908) by the United States Department of Justice, prompted by discovery of occasional instances of white peonage (usually of immigrants), the Supreme Court, in BAILEY V. ALABAMA (1911), used the Peonage Act to strike down Alabama contract-enforcement statutes that permitted quitting to be prima facie evidence of an intent to defraud the employer. The Court held that the Peonage Act voids "all legislation which seeks to compel the service or labor by making it a crime to refuse or fail to perform it." In United States v. Reynolds (1914), the Court invalidated Alabama criminal-surety statutes, describing the plight of a black peon caught in them as being "chained to an everturning wheel of servitude." But peonage has proved to be a remarkably tenacious form of servitude for blacks in the rural South, highlighted by the 1921 massacre of eleven black peons by their Georgia master, and by the establishment of peonage under federal and state auspices in refugee camps after the 1927 Mississippi River flood.

While physical force or threat of prosecution plainly constitute peonage, other forms of compulsion present interpretive problems. Thus subterfuges as well as outright violations of the Peonage Act persist into the present, despite the invalidation or repeal of the state labor-contract statutes that provided the original basis of peonage. The threat of deportation has proved an effective means of keeping alien migrant workers in a condition of involuntary or underpaid labor, and lower federal courts have divided as to whether this constitutes peonage.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

COHEN, WILLIAM 1976 Negro Involuntary Servitude in the South, 1865–1940: A Preliminary Analysis. Journal of Southern History 42:31–60.

DANIEL, PETE 1972 The Shadow of Slavery: Peonage in the South, 1901–1969. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

NOVAK, DANIEL A. 1978 The Wheel of Servitude: Black Forced Labor After Slavery. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky.

PEOPLE v. CROSWELL
3 Johnson's Cases (N.Y.) 336 (1804)

The state of New York, run by Jeffersonians, indicted Harry Croswell, a Federalist editor, for the crime of SEDITIOUS LIBEL, because he wrote that President THOMAS JEFFERSON had paid a scurrilous journalist to defame GEORGE WASHINGTON. Croswell was convicted at a trial presided over by the Jeffersonian chief justice of the state, Morgan Lewis, who embraced the position of the prosecution in ZENGER'S CASE (1735). Lewis ruled that truth was not a defense against a charge of seditious libel and that the jury's sole task was to decide whether the defendant had published the statements charged, leaving the court to decide their criminality as a matter of law.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, representing Croswell on his appeal to the state's highest court, advocated the protections of the Sedition Act of 1798: truth as a defense and determination by the jury of the criminality of the publication. FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, declared Hamilton, was "the right to publish, with impunity, truth, with good motives for justifiable ends, though reflecting on government, the magistracy, or individuals." Spenser Ambrose, the Jeffersonian prosecutor, defended the remote BAD TENDENCY TEST. By the time the court decided the case, Ambrose had become a member of it. Had he been eligible to vote, the court would have supported the suppressive views of Lewis and Ambrose. As it was, the court split 2–2. Judge BROCKHOLST LIVINGSTON joined Lewis, while Judge SMITH THOMPSON joined the opinion of JAMES KENT, a Federalist who adopted Hamilton's argument.

In 1805 the state legislature enacted a bill allowing the jury to decide the criminality of a publication and permitted truth as a defense if published "with good motives for justifiable ends." On the whole that was the standard that prevailed in the United States until NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964).

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PER CURIAM

(Latin: "By the court.") A per curiam opinion represents the views of the court and summarily disposes of the issue before the court by applying settled law. (See RES JUDICATA). Generally the opinion is short and it is always unsigned, although dissents will occasionally be filed.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES

Peremptory challenges are challenges given to both parties to a litigation allowing them to dismiss prospective jurors during jury selection without having to give a reason. In recent years, the Supreme Court has recognized constitutional limits on peremptories; as a result, there are some circumstances in which a reason must be given for challenging a juror.

In both federal and states courts, prospective jurors are summoned from the community for JURY SERVICE. They are assigned to panels, known as venires, and from the venire a jury is selected. Before a prospective juror is seated on a jury, however, there is a process during which the judge and/or attorneys question the prospective juror; this questioning is known as VOIR DIRE. One purpose of voir dire, whether it is conducted by the judge or by the attorneys, is to ensure that the jurors selected to serve on the jury can be impartial; those who cannot be impartial will be removed.

There are two ways to remove a prospective juror from a jury. One way is for an attorney to raise a challenge "for cause." The attorney must give a reason for such a challenge. Among accepted reasons are that the prospective juror is related to one of the participants in the trial, or that the prospective juror has admitted that he or she cannot be impartial in the case. The decision whether to grant a for-cause challenge is up to the trial judge. Trial judges do not grant for-cause challenges readily, perhaps because there is another way for attorneys to remove a prospective juror from the jury.

The second way to remove a prospective juror is through the use of a peremptory challenge. In every trial, whether in state or federal court or whether the trial is for a civil or criminal matter, the parties are allotted a certain number of peremptory challenges. The number varies, depending on the type of case and whether it is in federal or state court. The number of peremptories is provided by statute and/or by court rules. For example, according to federal statute, in federal court in a civil trial each side is entitled to three peremptory challenges. According to a federal rule, in federal court in a criminal trial, the number of peremptories varies depending on the type of offense charged. For example, if the offense charged is punishable by imprisonment for more than one year, the prosecutor is entitled to six peremptories, whereas the defendant is entitled to ten.

The exercise of a peremptory challenge, unlike the exercise of a for-cause challenge, is ordinarily left to the attorney's discretion. Attorneys can use their allotted peremptories to remove prospective jurors with whom they feel uncomfortable or whom they believe might not be impartial. Usually the attorney does not have to give a reason to explain why he or she is using a peremptory challenge to dismiss a particular juror.

A recent line of Supreme Court cases, however, has identified a few circumstances in which attorneys must give reasons for their peremptories. In SWAIN V. ALABAMA (1965), the Court held that if an African American defendant could show that in case after case a prosecutor was exercising peremptory challenges to exclude prospective jurors who were of the defendant's race, then the defendant would have established that the prosecutor was violating the defendant's right to EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution. In Swain, the Court set an evidentiary burden for the defendant so high that only the rare defendant could meet it. As a result, individual prosecutors who were of a mind to discriminate could continue to use peremptories to exclude jurors based on race.

Twenty years later, the Court revisited the issue in BATSON V. KENTUCKY (1986). The Court in Batson OVERRULED the evidentiary burden established in Swain, and held that a defendant could establish that the prosecutor violated his right to equal protection based on the prosecutor's use of peremptories in his case alone. In Batson, the Court tried to strike a balance between preserving the peremptory and preventing it from perpetuating RACIAL DISCRIM-INATION. Batson requires a defendant to establish a prima facie case that the prosecutor used peremptories based on race. To establish this, the defendant must show that he or she is a member of a cognizable racial group; that the prosecutor had exercised peremptories to remove from the venire prospective jurors of the defendant's race; and that these and other circumstances raise an inference of discrimination. After defendant's prima facie showing, the burden shifts to the prosecution to offer a race-neutral reason for its challenges. The trial judge determines whether the prosecution's reason is race neutral; if it is, then the peremptory is permitted; if it is not, then the peremptory is prohibited.

This modification of the peremptory was clearly a compromise, and left critics on both sides dissatisfied. Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, writing a concurrence in Batson, urged that peremptories be eliminated so that they could no longer be used in a discriminatory manner, whereas Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, writing in dissent, claimed that no reason should ever have to be given for the exercise of a peremptory and to the extent that Batson required a reason, it signaled the demise of the peremptory challenge.

In recent cases, the Court has extended the reach of Batson. In Powers v. Ohio (1991), the Court held that a defendant did not have to be of the same race as the excluded juror to raise a Batson challenge. In Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co. (1991), the Court extended Batson to civil cases, and in Georgia v. McCollum (1992), the Court held that the defense, just like the prosecution, could not exercise peremptories based on race. Most recently, in J. E. B. v. Alabama (1994), the Court held that peremptories could not be exercised based on gender.

NANCY S. MARDER
(2000)

Bibliography

ABRAMSON, JEFFREY 1995 We, the Jury. New York: Basic Books.

ALSCHULER, ALBERT W. 1989 The Supreme Court and the Jury: Voir Dire, Peremptory Challenges, and the Review of Jury Verdicts. University of Chicago Law Review 56:153–233.

HOFFMAN, MORRIS B. 1997 Peremptory Challenges Should Be Abolished: A Trial Judge's Perspective. University of Chicago Law Review 64:809–871.

MARDER, NANCY S. 1995 Beyond Gender: Peremptory Challenges and the Roles of the Jury. Texas Law Review 73:1041–1138.

MONTOYA, JEAN 1996 The Future of the Post-Batson Peremptory Challenge: Voir Dire by Questionnaire and the "Blind" Peremptory. University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 29:981–1030.

PEREZ v. BROWNELL

See: Trop v. Dulles

PEREZ v. UNITED STATES
402 U.S. 146 (1971)

In sustaining a conviction for the federal crime of "loansharking," the Supreme Court upheld Title II of the Consumer Credit Protection Act as valid under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. For an 8–1 Court, Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS rehearsed a congressional committee's finding that extortionate credit practices were linked to organized, interstate crime and vitally affected INTERSTATE COMMERCE. He rejected petitioner's contention that the crime of loansharking was necessarily local in nature. Justice POTTER STEWART, in dissent, argued that there had been no showing of interstate movement or effect in Perez's case, and worried that Congress might preempt the whole field of criminal law.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PERRY v. UNITED STATES

See: Gold Clause Cases

PERRY EDUCATION ASSOCIATION v. PERRY LOCAL EDUCATORS' ASSOCIATION
460 U.S. 37 (1983)

Perry provided the leading modern opinion setting guidelines governing FIRST AMENDMENT claims of access to the PUBLIC FORUM. A school district's collective bargaining agreement with a union (PEA) provided that PEA, but no other union, would have access to the interschool mails and to teacher mailboxes. A rival union (PLEA) sued in federal district court, challenging the constitutionality of its exclusion from the school mails. The district court denied relief, but the court of appeals held that the exclusion violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause and the First Amendment. The Supreme Court reversed, 5–4, rejecting both claims.

Justice BYRON R. WHITE wrote for the Court, setting out a three-category analysis that set the pattern for later "public forum" cases such as CORNELIUS V. NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATIONAL FUND, INC. (1985). First, the streets and parks are "traditional" public forums, in which government cannot constitutionally forbid all communicative activity. Any exclusion of a speaker from such a traditional public forum based on the content of the speaker's message must be necessary to serve a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST. Content-neutral regulations of the "time, place, and manner" of expression in such places may be enforced when they are narrowly tailored to serve significant state interests and they leave open "ample alternative channels" of communication.

Second, the state may open up other kinds of public property for use by the public for expressive activity. The state may close such a "designated" public forum, but so long as it remains open it must be made available to all speakers, under the same constitutional guidelines that govern traditional public forums.

Third, communicative uses of public property that is neither a traditional nor a designated public forum may be restricted to those forms of communication that serve the governmental operation to which the property is devoted. The only constitutional limits on such restrictions on speech are that they be reasonable, and that they not be imposed in order to suppress a particular point of view. The Perry case, said Justice White, fit this third category: the school mail system was neither a traditional public forum nor designated for public communicative use; rather it could be limited to school-related communications, including those from PEA, the teachers' elected bargaining agent. Such a limitation did not exclude PLEA because of its point of view.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for the four dissenters, argued that the exclusion of PLEA was "viewpoint discrimination," and thus that the case did not turn on the characterization of the school mails as a public forum.

The Perry formula capped a process of doctrinal development focused on what HARRY KALVEN, JR., named "the concept of the public forum." In its origin, the concept expanded the First Amendment's protections of speech. Perry marks the success of a campaign, highlighted by Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST's opinion in United States Postal Service v. Greenburgh Civic Association (1981), to convert the public forum concept into a preliminary hurdle for would-be speakers to clear before they can establish their claims to the FREEDOM OF SPEECH on government property or in government-managed systems of communication.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

PERSON

The Constitution contains dozens of references to "persons" but nowhere defines the term. When the Framers of the original document identified persons who might hold federal office or be counted in determining a state's representation in Congress or the ELECTORAL COLLEGE, they used "persons" in its everyday sense—even when they provided that slaves should be counted as "three fifths of all other Persons." Focusing on the allocation of governmental powers, they had little occasion to ponder the philosopher's question: what does it mean to be a person? It was the addition to the Constitution of a body of constitutional rights against the government—first in the BILL OF RIGHTS and later in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT—that gave the philosopher's question constitutional significance.

In court, that question is never raised in wholesale terms but always in the context of particular issues. The Fourteenth Amendment's DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION clauses, for example, offer their protections to "any person." Should those protections extend to a corporation? To a fetus? A philosopher, asked to say whether a corporation or a fetus more closely resembles some ideal model of a person, might be forgiven for failing to predict the Supreme Court's conclusions in Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad (1886) and ROE V. WADE (1973) that corporations were included but fetuses were not. The Court, like many another human institution, defines its terms with substantive purposes in mind.

The notion that a corporation might be a "person" for some constitutional purposes had been suggested early in the nineteenth century. The point was not explicitly argued to the Supreme Court, however, until San Mateo County v. Southern Pacific Railroad (1882). In that case former Senator ROSCOE CONKLING, representing the railroad, made use of the journal of the joint congressional committee that had drafted the Fourteenth Amendment, a committee on which he had served. Conkling strongly intimated that the committee had used the word "person" for the specific purpose of including corporations. The case was dismissed for MOOTNESS, but in the Santa Clara case Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE interrupted ORAL ARGUMENT to say that the Court had concluded that the equal protection clause, in referring to a "person," extended its benefit to a corporation—a ruling that has since been followed consistently in both equal protection and due process decisions. Much of the later development of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS as a guarantee of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT and a protection against ECONOMIC REGULATION thus rested on a proposition of law whose basis was never articulated in an opinion of the Supreme Court.

To be a person, for constitutional purposes, is to be capable of holding constitutional rights. Our system of rights is premised on the idea that a right either "belongs" to someone—some person—or does not exist. The DOCTRINES of STANDING and mootness, as they govern our federal courts, reflect this assumption. We are accustomed to speak of "individual rights." Yet any claim to any right is an appeal to principle—and a principle is an abstraction that governs a great many "cases" not in court. Every claim of "individual" right, in other words, is a claim on behalf of a group composed of all those who fit the claim's underlying principle. Only a person can claim a constitutional right, but every such claim is made by a person as an occupant of a role: a homeowner whose house has been searched by the police, a would-be soapbox orator, a natural father disqualified from having custody of his child.

Although corporations—or even whole states—are capable of asserting constitutional claims, and although every "individual" constitutional right is capable of being generalized to extend to a group, nonetheless there remains an important sense in which we hold constitutional rights as persons. Today's constitutional law recognizes a body of substantive rights founded on the essentials of being a person. Here the philosopher's question must be asked; some model of what it means to be a person is implicit in such developments as the emergence of a RIGHT OF PRIVACY or a FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION.

These rights of "personhood" (to use the Supreme Court's expression in Roe v. Wade) attach to natural persons. They rest on the assumption, usually not articulated, that although each human being is unique, we all share certain elements of our common humanity. The assumption is that each of us is conscious of a continuing identity; has some conception of his or her own good; is capable of forming and changing purposes; has a sense of justice—is, in short a "moral person" and not just a biological organism. Of course, the biological person has received its own constitutional protections: the FOURTH AMENDMENT's guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures runs in part to our "persons"; a woman's right to have an abortion is based on her right to control the use of her body. It is the moral person, however, who is the focus of the newer rights of "personhood."

The principal doctrinal foundation for these rights has been a renascent SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. Yet similar values form the substantive core of the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of the equal protection of the laws. That guarantee originated as part of the nation's response to slavery and to efforts in the postabolition South to create a system of serfdom to substitute for slavery. In law, of course, a slave was not a person; an item of property could claim no rights. Yet the original Constitution's two provisions recognizing slavery referred not to "slaves" but to "persons"—as if the draftsmen, resigned to the necessity of their unholy bargain with the southern states, nonetheless could not bring themselves to deny their common humanity with the men and women held as slaves. Seventy years later, in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY expressed quite another view of the Framers' understanding. At the nation's founding, Taney said, blacks had been considered "an inferior class of beings," incapable of CITIZENSHIP. The modern revival of the Fourteenth Amendment's principle of equal citizenship serves, above all, to protect the claim of each of us to be treated by the society as a person—one who has rights as a respected, responsible, participating member of our community.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

GRAHAM, HOWARD JAY 1938 The "Conspiracy Theory" of the Fourteenth Amendment. Yale Law Journal 47:371–403; 48: 171–194.

HORWITZ, MORTON J. 1985–1986 Santa Clara Revisited: The Development of Corporate Theory. West Virginia Law Review 88:173–224.

NOONAN, JOHN T., JR. 1976 Persons and Masks of the Law: Cardozo, Holmes, Jefferson, and Wythe as Makers of the Masks. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Chap. 15. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

VINING, JOSEPH 1978 Legal Identity: The Coming of Age of Public Law. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

PERSONAL LIBERTY LAWS

Between 1826 and 1858, all the free states east of Illinois enacted "personal liberty laws" providing one or more procedural remedies to persons seized as fugitive slaves. These included the writs of HABEAS CORPUS and personal replevin. Some personal liberty laws also provided jury trial to alleged fugitives; prohibited kidnaping or enticement of black persons out of state; imposed more stringent state procedures for recaptions; or provided the services of state's attorneys to alleged fugitives. The Vermont Freedom Act of 1858 declared every slave who came into the state free.

In PRIGG V. PENNSYLVANIA (1842), Justice JOSEPH STORY held that state statutes interfering with recaptures under the 1793 Fugitive Slave Act were unconstitutional. But in an OBITER DICTUM unique to him, Story stated that state officials need not participate in a recapture under federal authority. This spurred enactment of statutes prohibiting state officials such as judges and sheriffs from participating in fugitive recaptures and prohibiting the use of state facilities such as jails to slave-catchers trying to hold runaways. Proslavery spokesmen tirelessly denounced the personal liberty laws. In his last annual message, President JAMES BUCHANAN blamed the crisis of 1860 on them. South Carolina cited the laws as justification for its SECESSION.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Fugitive Slavery.)

Bibliography

MORRIS, THOMAS D. 1974 Free Men All: The Personal Liberty Laws of the North, 1780–1861. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

PERSONNEL ADMINISTRATOR OF MASSACHUSETTS v. FEENEY
442 U.S. 256 (1979)

In selecting applicants for state civil service positions, Massachusetts preferred all qualifying veterans of the armed forces over any qualifying nonveterans. Because fewer than two percent of Massachusetts veterans were women, the preference severely restricted women's public employment opportunities. A nonveteran woman applicant challenged the preference as a denial of the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS; the Supreme Court, 7–2, upheld the preference's constitutionality.

The Court, speaking through Justice POTTER STEWART, followed WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976) and held that SEX DISCRIMINATION, like RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, is to be found only in purposeful official conduct. A discriminatory impact, of itself, is thus insufficient to establish the sex discrimination that demands the judicial scrutiny set out in CRAIG V. BOREN (1976). Here the veterans preference disadvantaged nonveteran men as well as women; there was no basis for assuming that the preference was "a pretext for preferring men over women." Rather it was aimed at rewarding the sacrifices of military service and easing the transition from military to civilian life.

Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL dissented, joined by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN: legislators act for a variety of reasons; the question is whether an improper purpose was one motivating factor in the governmental action. Here the discriminatory impact of the law was not merely foreseeable but inevitable. The result was to relegate female civil servants to jobs traditionally filled by women. Other less discriminatory means were available for rewarding veterans (bonuses, for example); the state's choice of this preference strongly suggested intentional gender discrimination. A similar "foreseeability" argument was persuasive to a majority of the Court four weeks later, in the context of school segregation. (See COLUMBUS BOARD OF EDUCATION V. PENICK.)

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

PETERS, RICHARD
(1744–1828)

President GEORGE WASHINGTON on April 11, 1792, commissioned Richard Peters judge of the United States District Court for Pennsylvania, a position he filled until his death. His duties included presiding with a Supreme Court Justice over the federal CIRCUIT COURT in the state.

Peters contributed significantly to the development of a distinctly American ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME LAW, including features borrowed from civil and COMMON LAW precedents. In cases like Warder v. LaBelle Creole (1792), he was among the first American judges to advance a risk-reward calculus intended to facilitate the expansion of commerce.

His constitutional opinions touched the civil and criminal JURISDICTIONS of the lower federal courts and the law of TREASON. Peters in 1792 joined his fellow circuit court judges in HAYBURN'S CASE in refusing to determine the qualifications of Revolutionary War pensioners under a congressional act. This task, the judges concluded, fell outside the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES. Peters, however, had a broad view of federal judicial power. In United States v. Worrall (1798) he urged recognition of a FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES, a position subsequently rejected by the Supreme Court.

Peters's nationalism also shaped his views of treason and the supremacy of the federal courts. In United States v. John Fries (1800) he charged the jury that "levying war against the United States" included armed opposition to the collection of taxes. (See FRIES' REBELLION.) During the famous Olmstead controversy in Pennsylvania, Peters ordered the governor and the General Assembly to pay a judgment outstanding against the state in the federal court. Peters withheld issuing compulsory process for fear of an armed clash, but Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in UNITED STATES V. JUDGE PETERS (1809) vindicated the judge's nationalism.

Peters's Federalist political principles flowed into his jurisprudence. He was a "Republican Schoolmaster," who exploited the lower federal bench to promote commercial development, federal judicial independence, and national authority.

KERMIT L. HALL
(1986)

Bibliography

PRESSER, STEPHEN B. 1978 A Tale of Two Judges: Richard Peters, Samuel Chase, and the Broken Promise of Federalist Jurisprudence. Northwestern University Law Review 73:26–111.

PETITION FOR REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES

See: Freedom of Petition

PETITION OF RIGHT
(June 7, 1628)

This statute is among the foremost documents in Anglo-American constitutional history. The Petition of Right protected the liberty of the subject and contributed to the development of the RULE OF LAW and the concept of FUNDAMENTAL LAW. The Framers of the Constitution regarded the act of 1628 as part of their COMMON LAW inheritance establishing rights against government. In its time, however, the statute limited only the royal prerogative or executive authority.

In 1626 Charles I, exercising his prerogative, had exacted a "forced loan" from his subjects. The poor paid it by having to quarter soldiers in their homes and having to serve in the army or face trial by a military tribunal. Five knights refused to make a contribution of money to the crown on the grounds that it was an unconstitutional tax; they were imprisoned by order of the king's council. When they sought a writ of HABEAS CORPUS, the Court of King's Bench, in Darnel's Case (1627), ruled that because the return to the writ showed the prisoners to be held on executive authority, no specific cause of imprisonment had to be stated.

The forced loan and the resolution of Darnel's Case caused a furor. After the House of Commons adopted resolutions against arbitrary taxation and arbitrary imprisonment, Sir EDWARD COKE introduced a bill to bind the king. The House of Lords sought to "save" the SOVEREIGNTY of the king by allowing a denial of habeas corpus for reasons of state. Coke, opposing such an amendment to the bill, argued that it would weaken MAGNA CARTA, and he warned: "Take heed what we yield unto: Magna Charta [sic] is such a fellow that he will have no "sovereign." The Lords finally agreed and the king assented.

The Petition of Right reconfirmed Magna Carta's provision that no freeman could be imprisoned but by lawful judgment of his peers or "by the LAW OF THE LAND." The Petition also reconfirmed a 1354 reenactment of the great charter which first used the phrase "by DUE PROCESS OF LAW" instead of "by the law of the land." By condemning the military trial of civilians, the Petition invigorated due process and limited martial law. One section of the Petition provided that no one should be compelled to make any loan to the crown or pay any tax "without common consent by act of parliament." Americans later relied on this provision in their argument against TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION. Other sections of the act of 1628 provided that no one should be imprisoned or be forced to incriminate himself by having to answer for refusing an exaction not authorized by Parliament. Condemnation of imprisonment without cause or merely on executive authority strengthened the writ of habeas corpus. (See HABEAS CORPUS ACT OF 1679; BILL OF RIGHTS (ENGLISH).) The THIRD AMENDMENT of the Constitution derives in part from the Petition of Right.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

RELF, FRANCIS H. 1917 The Petition of Right. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

PETIT JURY

The petit jury is the trial jury, as distinguished from the GRAND JURY. The petit jury decides questions of fact in cases at law, and renders the verdict, formally declaring its findings. Traditionally, in Anglo-American law, the jury decided by unanimous vote of twelve members, but this is not constitutionally required.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Jury Discrimination; Jury Size; Jury Unanimity; Trial by Jury.)

PEYOTE, RELIGIOUS USE OF

See: Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith

PHELPS, EDWARD J.
(1822–1900)

Edward John Phelps was a Vermont Democrat who, in frequent appearances before the Supreme Court, championed the rights of private property. An outstanding orator—he was frequently likened to DANIEL WEBSTER or WILLIAM EVARTS—Phelps served as president of the American Bar Association (1880–1881) and as Kent Professor of Law at Yale (1881–1900). He declared that America's problems stemmed from "a vicious and altogether unnecessary enlargement of the electorate"; this attitude explained his belief that the Constitution was too hallowed to be "hawked about the country, debated in the newspapers . . . [and] elucidated by pot-house politicians, and dung-hill editors."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

PHILADELPHIA v. NEW JERSEY
437 U.S. 617 (1978)

In a 7–2 decision, the Supreme Court invalidated a New Jersey environmental protection law that prohibited the importation of solid waste originating or collected out of state. Justice POTTER STEWART, writing for the majority, concluded that the law unduly burdened INTERSTATE COMMERCE. The worthlessness of the regulated commodity did not exclude it from the operation of the COMMERCE CLAUSE; nor was the law permissible because its goals were environmental rather than economic. New Jersey could not require other states to bear the whole burden of conservation of its landfill sites. (See ENVIRONMENTAL REGULATION AND THE CONSTITUTION.)

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PHILADELPHIA & READING RAILROAD CO. v. PENNSYLVANIA
(State Freight Tax Case)
Wallace 232 (1873)

Pennsylvania imposed a tonnage tax on all freight transported within the state, including freight shipped out of and into the state. The transportation of freight for exchange or sale, said Justice WILLIAM STRONG for a 7–2 Supreme Court, is commerce, and a clear tax on such commerce among states is an unconstitutional burden on INTERSTATE COMMERCE that might injure commercial intercourse in the country. Strong added that the transportation of persons or merchandise through a state or from one to another is a subject of national importance requiring, under the rule of COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1852), uniform and exclusive regulation by Congress. This still is an important case on STATE TAXATION OF COMMERCE.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PHILOSOPHY AND THE CONSTITUTION

The Constitution is one of the great achievements of political philosophy; and it may be the only political achievement of philosophy in our society. The Framers of the Constitution and the leading participants in the debates on RATIFICATION shared a culture more thoroughly than did any later American political elite. They shared a knowledge (often distorted, but shared nevertheless) of ancient philosophy and history, of English COMMON LAW, of recent English political theory, and of the European Enlightenment. They were the American branch of the Enlightenment, and salient among their membership credentials was their belief that reasoned thought about politics could guide them to ideal political institutions for a free people. They argued passionately about the nature of SOVEREIGNTY, of political REPRESENTATION, of republicanism, of CONSTITUTIONALISM; and major decisions in the ferment of institution-building that culminated in 1787 were influenced, if never wholly determined, by such arguments. The final form of the new federal Constitution embodied radically new views about the location of sovereignty—now located "in the people" in a stronger sense than any philosopher except Jean-Jacques Rousseau would have recognized—and about the function of the SEPARATION OF POWERS and BICAMERALISM.

Philosophy has never again played the role it played at the founding of the Republic, except perhaps in inspiring some ABOLITIONIST CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY. To be sure, "philosophy" in a loose sense has always influenced politicians and judges, who are part of society. The Supreme Court in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries expressed in its decisions a laissez-faire "philosophy" compounded of Darwinism, a version of NATURAL RIGHTS theory, and conservative economic beliefs. When the Court abandoned that "philosophy," they adopted another, more progressivist and pragmatic, and more attuned to, though at most only loosely connected with, the renascent empiricism among academic philosophers. Occasionally, the Court has adverted to specific philosophical doctrines, from JOHN MARSHALL in FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) to GEORGE H. SUTHERLAND in UNITED STATES V. CURTISS-WRIGHT EXPORT CORP. (1936) (on the necessary existence of sovereign power). Individual Justices like OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES may have been influenced by philosophical reading and by contact with professional philosophers. But, on the whole, while "philosophy" has had an influence, philosophy has had little—except to the extent that the "philosophy" of the present is always shaped in part by the philosophy of the past. (The decreased influence of philosophy has not lessened the relevance of philosophical issues.)

There are a number of reasons for the decreased influence of philosophy. In the open society the Framers helped to create, their style of argument, dependent on a relatively homogeneous and classically educated elite, could not maintain its political importance. Also, political philosophy itself became less unified. Widely divergent views were united under the umbrella of the Enlightenment by common opposition to entrenched privilege and hieratic religion. Once common enemies were vanquished, philosophical comrades parted company.

Another reason for the decreased influence of philosophy is that philosophy admits of no binding authorities, while law does, and does essentially. The Framers were creating a new political system. No one since then, except to some extent the RECONSTRUCTION Congresses, has had that luxury. Later contributors to our constitutional development have always had to interpret, and to attempt to maintain at least the appearance of continuity with, what has gone before.

Curiously, while recent philosophical thinking has had little discernible influence on constitutional law, the reverse is not true. The decisions of the WARREN COURT and the public discussion they generated certainly contributed, probably significantly, to the revival of interest among American philosophers in social and political questions, a revival that became apparent in the CIVIL RIGHTS era of the 1950s and 1960s and that is still in full flower.

Whatever the influence or lack of it of philosophy on constitutional law, philosophical discussion among academic constitutional lawyers may have reached greater intensity in the 1980s than at any time since the 1780s. Constitutional law, like law in general, raises deep and perplexing philosophical questions. The questions that arise most immediately are questions of political philosophy, and of these the one that has generated most discussion is what is known as the "antimajoritarian difficulty": how can it be appropriate for the enormously consequential power of JUDICIAL REVIEW to be vested ultimately in nine individuals who are not chosen by the people and who are not politically accountable to anyone at all? The problem is especially vexing when the Court, in the space of three decades, has outlawed SEGREGATION, forbidden religious activity in the public schools, required REAPPORTIONMENT of the state legislatures and local government, created a constitutional code of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, established a right to abortion, and found in the EQUAL PROTECTION clause a command that government shall not engage in SEX DISCRIMINATION.

There are three principal types of answer to the question how a democratic society can countenance such judicial power. The first answer, and the natural answer for any lawyer, is the claim that the Supreme Court has this power because the Constitution says it does. But the Constitution does not say that, at least not explicitly. The power of judicial review is nowhere explicitly granted. Now, in a sense, the lawyer's answer is still right. The Constitution as it has been interpreted from 1803 to the present does create the power of judicial review. The propriety of some form of judicial review is disputed by no one. Even so, it is noteworthy that at the very foundation of American constitutional law we encounter the problem of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION.

Given a document, and given agreement that its commands are to be put into practice by legal institutions, how do we decide what it commands? How do we decide what it means? Neither the words alone nor anything we know about the writers' intentions is likely to answer straightforwardly all the questions time will bring forth. For that matter, is it the document we are primarily concerned to interpret, or the political and doctrinal tradition proceeding from the document that we are concerned to interpret and to continue? And how are interpretation and continuation related?

It is important to distinguish between the document and the tradition and to ask how our commitments to each are interrelated. For example, we are firmly committed, by our allegiance to the tradition, to certain DOCTRINES, such as the effective application of the BILL OF RIGHTS to the states and of the equal protection clause to the federal government, which can be deduced from the document only by extremely generous canons of interpretation. Some argue that if we are committed to these doctrines, then we must accept and continue to apply those generous canons. But that conclusion does not follow at all. Law, like any tradition, can sanctify mistakes.

The problem of interpretation does not arise only at the stage of justifying judicial review. It arises also at every application of judicial review. What is the Court to do with this power? The lawyerly answer, and again clearly the right answer in some sense, is that the Court should enforce the Constitution. But once more, how do we decide what the Constitution means?

The lawyerly exponent of judicial review also invites, by appealing to the Constitution, the most fundamental question: why do we care about the document or the tradition at all? It may be that to ask this question is to go beyond the domain of the lawyer as lawyer; but lawyers and judges are people, and every person who bears allegiance to the document or the tradition must face this question. Note, however: even though all lawyers and judges must face this question of political philosophy in deciding whether to carry out their roles, it does not follow that they must also appeal to substantive political philosophy in the course of carrying out their roles. Whether they must do that, and whether they could avoid doing that if they tried, are further issues.

The difficulties with the lawyerly justification and exposition of judicial review have prompted two other main theories of judicial review. In one theory, judicial review is justified by the need to protect individual rights against infringement by majoritarian government. Exponents of this theory have drawn heavily on a neo-Kantian strain of contemporary American political philosophy in attempting to elucidate individual rights and the limits of the majority's legitimate power. In the other theory, judicial review does not purport to limit but merely to purify the democratic process. Judicial intervention is necessary to protect political speech and participation and to prevent distortion of the process by majority prejudice, but all in the name of more perfect majoritarianism.

Opposed as they are on the significance of individual rights, these two theories share an ambivalent relationship to the Constitution and the interpretive tradition. Whence comes the notion that individual autonomy should be protected, or that majoritarian democracy should be purified but not otherwise limited? Is it just that the Constitution says so? The Constitution says neither of these things explicitly; and it says both too much and too little to make either of these views a completely satisfactory reading of the document as a whole.

On the other hand, if someone claims to read the Constitution as protecting individuality (or purified majoritarianism) because of the independent moral weight of those values, why does the historical document come into it at all? Is not every appeal to the Constitution by a proponent of independently grounded values of autonomy or purified majoritarianism in some sense mere manipulation of other people's allegiance to the Constitution for itself?

We see that the questions raised by the lawyerly approach to judicial review are not so easily avoided. Still, the competing approaches we have noted alert us to dimensions of the problem not previously apparent. First, if the justification for judicial review is to promote general values such as autonomy or purified majoritarianism, that may help us decide how specific bits of the Constitution should be interpreted. Second, the tradition may refer to certain goals—justice, autonomy, democracy—which the tradition itself views as having a value and grounding outside and independent of the tradition. If the tradition commands allegiance both to its own specific content and to external values, it contains within itself the seeds of possible contradiction. What does faithfulness to the tradition then require?

As of the 1980s, the newest philosophical interest of academic constitutional lawyers is in hermeneutics. Whether there are answers here, and whether any such answers will influence the course of constitutional law, remains to be seen. Hermeneutics may bring new insight into the various meanings of the idea of operating in a tradition. Barring some remarkable feat of philosophical bootstrapping, hermeneutics will not answer the most fundamental philosophical question about constitutional law: why care about the tradition at all? And there is a final irony. Because the political community is made up of individuals who must confront this fundamental question, the community must confront it also, even though from another perspective it is by shared allegiance to the tradition that the community is defined.

DONALD H. REGAN
(1986)

Bibliography

DWORKIN, RONALD (1977) 1978 Taking Rights Seriously. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

ELY, JOHN H. 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LAYCOCK, DOUGLAS 1981 Taking Constitutions Seriously: A Theory of Judicial Review. Texas Law Review 59:343–394.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

WOOD, GORDON S. 1969 The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Va.

PHYSICIAN-ASSISTED SUICIDE

See: Right to Die

PICKERING, JOHN
(1738?-1805)

In March 1803 the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES impeached John Pickering, federal district judge for New Hampshire, of habitual drunkenness, uttering blasphemy and profanity from the bench, and making decisions contrary to law. During his SENATE trial Pickering introduced a defense of insanity; but the Senate, in a partisan vote, found him "guilty as charged" and removed him from office. The vote was a warning to other Federalist judges that Congress did not need to convict them of a specific crime in order to remove them. (See JUDICIAL IMPEACHMENT.)

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PICKETING

Picketing typically consists of one or more persons patrolling or stationed at a particular site, carrying or wearing large signs with a clearly visible message addressed to individuals or groups approaching the site. Some form of confrontation between the pickets and their intended addressees appears an essential ingredient of picketing. Congress and the National Labor Relations Board have distinguished between picketing and handbilling, however, and merely passing out leaflets without carrying a placard does not usually constitute picketing. What stamps picketing as different from more conventional forms of communication, for constitutional and other legal purposes, ordinarily seems to be the combination of a sign big enough to be seen easily and a confrontation between picketer and viewer.

Constitutional determinations concerning picketing have usually involved LABOR unions that are advertising a dispute with employers and appealing to the public or fellow employees for support. The assistance sought might be a refusal by customers to patronize the picketed business or a refusal by workers to perform services or make deliveries there. In addition, picketing has often been a weapon of CIVIL RIGHTS demonstrators, political and religious activists, environmentalists, and other interest groups.

The leading Supreme Court decision upholding picketing as an exercise of FREEDOM OF SPEECH protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT is THORNHILL V. ALABAMA (1940). In striking down a state antipicketing statute, Justice FRANK MURPHY declared that an abridgment of the right to publicize through picketing or similar activity "can be justified only where the clear danger of substantive evils arises under circumstances affording no opportunity to test the merits of ideas by competition for acceptance in the market of public opinion." Despite this sweeping language, the actual holding in Thornhill was narrow. The Alabama courts were prepared to apply a criminal statute to prohibit a single individual from patrolling peacefully in front of an employer's establishment carrying a sign stating truthfully that the employer did not employ union labor.

Following Thornhill two principal themes have dominated the Supreme Court's analysis of the constitutional status of picketing. One is the "unlawful objectives" test and the other is the concept of picketing as "speech plus." Under the first approach, as illustrated by GIBONEY V. EMPIRE STORAGE & ICE CO. (1949), even peaceful picketing may be proscribed if its "sole, unlawful immediate objective" is the violation of a valid public policy or statutory mandate. Picketing is treated like any other type of communication, oral or written, which may also be forbidden if it produces a CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER of, or a direct INCITEMENT to, substantive evils that government is entitled to prevent. A message delivered by pickets, however, might constitute a clearer and more present danger than the same message in a newspaper advertisement, for picketing physically confronts the addressee at the very moment of decision.

A conceptual weakness of the "unlawful objectives" test is that it can sustain almost any restriction on picketing by too loose a characterization of the pickets' purpose as illegal. In Teamsters Local 695 v. Vogt, Inc. (1957), a 5–3 Supreme Court upheld a state court INJUNCTION against peaceful organizational picketing on the ground that its purpose was to coerce the employer to force its employees to join the union. Even so, in Amalgamated Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza (1968) Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL could sum up the prior DOCTRINE by declaring that the cases in which picketing bans had been approved "involved picketing that was found either to have been directed at an illegal end . . . or to have been directed to coercing a decision by an employer which, although in itself legal, could validly be required by the State to be left to the employer's free choice."

Picketing as "speech plus" refers to two elements that arguably distinguish it from pure speech. First, it involves physical activity, usually the patrolling of a particular location. It is therefore subject to TRESPASS laws, and to other laws governing the time, place, and manner of expression, such as laws limiting sound levels, regulating parades, or forbidding the obstruction of public ways. Furthermore, picketing enmeshed with violence or threats of violence may be enjoined or prosecuted as assault and battery. Second, picketing may serve as a "signal" for action, especially by organized groups like labor unions, without regard to the ideas being disseminated. Some scholars have challenged the "pure speech/speech plus" dichotomy, contending that all speech, oral or written, has certain physical attributes, and can evoke stock responses from a preconditioned audience.

A further strand of Supreme Court free speech analysis is the notion that government may not engage in "content control." Thus, in POLICE DEPARTMENT OF CHICAGO V. MOSLEY (1972) the Court invalidated a city ordinance that forbade all picketing next to any school while it was in session, but exempted "peaceful picketing of any school involved in a labor dispute." That constituted "an impermissible distinction between labor and other peaceful picketing." The "no content control" doctrine obviously must be qualified by the "unlawful objectives" test.

In 1980 the Supreme Court extended the "unlawful objectives" test so far as to strip it of any practical limitations. A 6–3 majority held in NLRB v. Retail Employees Local 1001 (Safeco) that picketing asking customers not to buy a nonunion product being distributed by a second party was an unlawful BOYCOTT of the distributor. Six Justices considered the prohibition justified constitutionally by Congress's purpose of blocking the "coercing" or "embroiling" of neutrals in another party's labor dispute. In Safeco, for the first time ever, the Supreme Court clearly sustained a ban on peaceful and orderly picketing addressed to, and calling for seemingly lawful responses by, individual consumers acting on their own.

Safeco might be explained on the basis that labor picketing is only "economic speech," like commercial advertising, and thus subject to lesser constitutional safeguards than political or ideological speech. Although such a distinction would contradict both established precedent and the traditional recognition of picketing as the working person's standard means of communication, at least it would preserve full-fledged free speech protections for picketing to promote political and ideological causes.

THEODORE J. ST. ANTOINE
(1986)

Bibliography

COX, ARCHIBALD 1951 Strikes, Picketing and the Constitution. Vanderbilt Law Review 4:574–602.

GREGORY, CHARLES O. and KATZ, HAROLD A. (1946) 1979 Labor and the Law. New York: Norton.

JONES, EDGAR A., JR. 1956 Free Speech: Pickets on the Grass, Alas!—Amidst Confusion, a Consistent Principle. Southern California Law Review 29:137–181.

PIERCE, FRANKLIN
(1804–1869)

A New Hampshire attorney and politician, Pierce was nominated as a compromise presidential candidate by the Democrats in 1852. Pierce was a supporter of the COMPROMISE OF 1850 and a long-time opponent of abolitionists and antislavery Democrats. In 1854 he supported the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT, which led to a mini-civil war in "bleeding Kansas." Pierce's role in the passage of this act and his generally pro-southern positions undermined most of his other legislative proposals and his popularity in the North. During the CIVIL WAR Pierce's shrill attacks on ABRAHAM LINCOLN's administration made Pierce appear to be a full-fledged Copperhead.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

NICHOLS, ROY F. 1931 Franklin Pierce: Young Hickory of the Granite State. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

PIERCE, WILLIAM
(1740?–1789)

William Pierce, a veteran of the Revolutionary War and a member of Congress, was a delegate from Georgia to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. He spoke only infrequently, and he left the Convention on July 1, under pressure of private business difficulties. Pierce did not sign the Constitution but wrote to ST. GEORGE TUCKER: "I approve of its principles and would have signed it with all my heart, had I been present."

Pierce kept fairly detailed notes of the debates while he was present. The notes were published in 1828 and include brief character sketches of each of the delegates.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PIERCE v. SOCIETY OF SISTERS
268 U.S. 510 (1925)

Pierce provided a doctrinal link between the SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS of the era of LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) and that of our own time. The Supreme Court unanimously invalidated an Oregon law requiring children to attend public schools. A church school and a military school, threatened with closure, sued to enjoin the law's enforcement. Although the law threatened injury to the schools, their challenge to it was based not on their own constitutional rights but on the rights of their pupils and the children's parents. By allowing the schools to make this challenge, the Court made a major exception to the usual rule denying a litigant's STANDING to assert the constitutional rights of others. Here there was a close relationship between the schools and their patrons, and failure to allow the schools to assert the patrons' rights might cause injury to the schools that no one would contest in court. Parents, fearing prosecution and unwilling to bear the expense of suit, might simply send their children to public schools.

In an opinion by Justice JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS, the Court held that the law unconstitutionally invaded the parents' liberty, guaranteed by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT's due process clause, to direct their children's education and upbringing. The decision rested squarely on the notion that important personal liberties could be seriously restricted by the state only upon a showing of great public need. Although Pierce thus traced its lineage to earlier decisions protecting economic liberty, it provided support for a later generation of decisions protecting marriage and family relationships against state intrusion. (See FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION.)

Pierce is also cited regularly as a RELIGIOUS LIBERTY precedent, defending the right of parents to choose religious education for their children. (See WISCONSIN V. YODER.)

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

PIERSON v. RAY
386 U.S. 547 (1967)

Pierson is an important case involving individual immunities from suits under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE. Clergymen who violated an unlawful "whites only" waiting room policy in a Jackson, Mississippi, bus terminal were arrested and convicted. They brought an action under section 1983 against the arresting police officers and a state judge for depriving the clergymen of their constitutional rights. The Supreme Court both reaffirmed what it asserted to be the absolute immunity of judges from suit at COMMON LAW and refused to interpret section 1983 to abolish that traditional immunity. Although the police officer defendants were not granted absolute immunity, the Court did grant them a defense if the otherwise unconstitutional arrests were made in good faith and with PROBABLE CAUSE.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

PINCKNEY, CHARLES
(1757–1824)

Charles Pinckney, a wealthy and ambitious young lawyer from South Carolina, was one of the most active members of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. A supporter of strong national government, Pinckney had already proposed in Congress several amendments to strengthen the government under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. He had unsuccessfully urged Congress to call a convention to amend the Articles.

Selected as a delegate to the Federal Convention, Pinckney drafted a comprehensive plan for revising the articles which he introduced immediately after EDMUND RANDOLPH proposed the VIRGINIA PLAN. The PINCKNEY PLAN was never debated in the Convention or the Committee of the Whole, although the Committee of Detail may have drawn some ideas or phrases from it.

Pinckney was one of the most frequent speakers in the debates, but the Constitution, as written, reflected his influence only in minor points and details. In a speech before signing, Pinckney announced that he would support the Constitution despite "the contemptible weakness and dependence of the Executive."

In his later career, Pinckney was a delegate to the South Carolina ratifying convention and to the state CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION of 1790, three times governor, a member of the legislature and of both houses of Congress, and minister of the United States to Spain.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PINCKNEY, CHARLES COTESWORTH
(1746–1825)

A British-educated, slaveholding lawyer, General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney represented South Carolina at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 and signed the Constitution. In the convention he worked for a strong national government and for protection of the slaveholding interests. As a leading spokesman for RATIFICATION in South Carolina, he defended the compromises on SLAVERY and argued that a BILL OF RIGHTS was unnecessary.

In 1791, Pinckney declined President GEORGE WASHINGTON's offer of a seat on the Supreme Court. The chief leader of the southern FEDERALISTS, Pinckney was nominated for Vice-President in 1800, and for President in both 1804 and 1808.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

ZAHNISER, MARVIN R. 1967 Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Founding Father. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

PINCKNEY PLAN
(1787)

The brash young South Carolinian CHARLES PINCKNEY arrived at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 bearing his own comprehensive draft of a new CONSTITUTION based on proposals he had made to amend the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION during his three years in Congress. He presented it to the convention immediately after EDMUND RANDOLPH presented the VIRGINIA PLAN. The Pinckney Plan was never debated, but it was referred to the Committee on Detail which may have drawn some ideas or phrases from it.

There was no copy of the Pinckney Plan among the papers of the convention. Pinckney himself later published what he claimed was his plan, but this was actually a fabrication closely resembling the finished Constitution. On the basis of this (fraudulent) published version and Pinckney's own extravagant claims about his influence, many historians and popular writers have attributed more significance to the Pinckney Plan and its author than either actually had.

In the twentieth century, historians J. Franklin Jameson and ANDREW C. MCLAUGHLIN reconstructed the details of the original Pinckney Plan. The proposal was certainly quite nationalistic, with no state role in the election of either house of Congress, an unconditional congressional veto over state laws, and a very powerful national executive.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

MCLAUGHIN, ANDREW C. 1904 The Pinckney Plan. American Historical Review 9:135–147.

PINK, UNITED STATES v.
315 U.S. 203 (1942)

In Pink, the Supreme Court reaffirmed a DOCTRINE articulated five years earlier in UNITED STATES V. BELMONT

(1937): that the President has exclusive constitutional authority to recognize foreign governments and to take all steps necessary to effect such recognition. In Belmont, the Court recognized the federal government's STANDING to sue to enforce an EXECUTIVE AGREEMENT known as the "Litvinov Agreement." As part of the process of recognition of the Soviet Union by the United States in 1933, this agreement assigned to the United States nationalized Russian assets located within the United States.

In Pink, the Court was again confronted with the controversial Litvinov Assignment. In this case, while recognizing the federal government's rights under the Litvinov Assignment as required by Belmont, the New York courts rejected the government's claims of ownership of the assets in question, contending that to enforce the assignment would violate New York public policy against the confiscation of private property. The Supreme Court reversed, 5–2, emphasizing that an executive agreement, like a TREATY, is part of the "supreme law of the land" that no state may frustrate without interfering unconstitutionally with the federal government's exclusive competence in respect of FOREIGN AFFAIRS. In so doing, the Court reasserted the supremacy of an executive agreement over all inconsistent state law or policy.

BURNS H. WESTON
(1986)

Bibliography

CARDOZO, MICHAEL H. 1962 The Authority in Internal Law of International Treaties: The Pink Case. Syracuse Law Review 13:544–553.

FORKOSCH, MORRIS D. 1975 The Constitution and International Relations. California Western International Law Journal 5:219, 246–249.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1972 Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

LEARY, M. A. 1979 International Executive Agreements: A Guide to the Legal Issues and Research Sources. Law Library Journal 72:1–11.

PINKNEY, WILLIAM
(1764–1822)

William Pinkney studied law under SAMUEL CHASE and subsequently practiced in Baltimore. Although he opposed the RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION in the Maryland convention of 1788, he later became one of the nation's foremost constitutional lawyers. He held public office continuously from 1788 until his death, serving in the state legislature, in both houses of Congress, as a diplomat in important foreign capitals, and as ATTORNEY GENERAL of the United States under President JAMES MADISON. Although as a young man he favored gradual compensated emancipation in Maryland, Pinkney was a vigorous spokesman for the slave states in the Senate debates over the MISSOURI COMPROMISE (1820).

Between political and diplomatic assignments Pinkney conducted what was probably the most lucrative legal practice in the United States, arguing seventy-two cases before the Supreme Court. He was counsel for the New Hampshire state appointed board of trustees in DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819), unsuccessfully arguing that the college was a public CORPORATION whose charter could be altered by the state. In MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), however, he won the day, contending for the constitutionality of a congressionally chartered bank and against the power of the state to tax it. And in COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821) he successfully argued for the Supreme Court APPELLATE JURISDICTION over state criminal cases.

As an advocate, Pinkney won the praise of both judges and opposing counsel. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL called him "the greatest man I ever saw in a court of justice" and Marshall's successor, ROGER B. TANEY, said that in thirty years, "I have seen none to equal Pinkney." His enduring significance in American constitutional history derives from his incisive and original arguments in cases of first impression.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

PINKNEY, REV. WILLIAM 1853 The Life of William Pinkney. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

PIQUA BRANCH OF THE STATE BANK OF OHIO v. KNOOP
16 Howard 369 (1854)

In NEW JERSEY V. WILSON (1812) the Supreme Court had held that a state grant of a tax immunity was a contract within the protection of the CONTRACT CLAUSE. In this case Ohio chartered a bank with the proviso that six percent of its net profits would be taxed in lieu of other taxation. The states competed with each other to entice private business to settle within their borders on the supposition that the more banks, railroads, and factories a state had, the greater would be its prosperity. Special privileges to CORPORATIONS were common, and they often wrote their own charters. Ohio, gripped by an anticorporate movement, reneged by passing an act to tax banks at the same rate as other properties. The bank refused to pay the new tax on the ground that its charter was a contract the obligation of which had been impaired by the tax. (See OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.) By a vote of 6–3 the Supreme Court invalidated the tax. To the contention that the power to tax was an inalienable attribute of SOVEREIGNTY, which could not be contracted away, the Court replied that the making of a public contract is an exercise of sovereignty. To the argument that one legislature, by granting a charter of tax immunity, could not bind its successors, the Court replied that the contract clause made the charter binding. In effect the Court cautioned the states to govern wisely, because the Court would not shield them from their imprudence if it took the form of contracts. Corporations throughout the country profited enormously.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PITNEY, MAHLON
(1858–1924)

Mahlon Pitney was the last of President WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT's appointments to the Supreme Court. Organized labor and some progressives vigorously protested the nomination because of Pitney's antilabor opinions as a New Jersey state judge, but his views paralleled Taft's. During Pitney's decade on the bench (1912–1922), he made prophets of his critics, as his opinions reflected a consistent hostility to the claims of organized labor. Nevertheless, Taft, as Chief Justice, derided Pitney as a "weak" member of his Court.

In COPPAGE V. KANSAS (1915) Pitney concluded that a Kansas statute prohibiting YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS violated FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. The opinion largely followed doctrine laid down in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), and reinforced in ADAIR V. UNITED STATES (1908), when the Court nullified an 1898 congressional law prohibiting railroads from imposing yellow dog contracts. In Coppage, Pitney attacked the state law as a restraint on a worker's right to contract, a right he saw as essential to the laborer as to the capitalist, "for the vast majority of persons who have no other honest way to begin to acquire property, save by working for money." Rejecting the statute's avowed intent of enabling workers to organize and bargain collectively, Pitney held that its primary effect was to interfere with "the normal and essentially innocent exercise of personal liberty or of property rights."

Two years later, Pitney wrote the Supreme Court's opinion favoring labor INJUNCTION and again sustained the validity of yellow dog contracts. In HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE CO. V. MITCHELL (1917) he upheld an injunction forbidding the United Mine Workers from seeking to organize workers who had previously agreed not to join a union. Every miner who had affiliated with the union "was guilty of a breach of contract," he said; furthermore, Pitney found that the union knowingly had violated the employer's "legal and constitutional right to run its mine 'non-union.' " Pitney's implacable defense of yellow dog contracts and injunctions galvanized labor's growing antagonism to the federal judiciary and its demands for congressional relief. Eventually, in 1932, the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT forbade federal courts to enforce yellow dog contracts or issue labor injunctions, thus severely limiting the effects of Pitney's COPPAGE and HITCHMAN opinions.

In DUPLEX PRINTING CO. V. DEERING (1921) Pitney reinfoced the judicial ban on secondary BOYCOTTS, thus frustrating organized labor's understanding that the CLAYTON ACT (1914) had legalized such practices. Pitney followed an earlier decision against secondary boycotts (LOEWE V. LAWLOR, 1908) and argued that a sympathetic strike supporting a secondary boycott could not be deemed "peaceful and lawful persuasion as allowed in the Clayton Act." Although Pitney regularly invoked judicial doctrines that inhibited labor's right to organize, he occasionally defied prediction. In Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington (1917) Pitney led a 5–4 majority that sustained a state WORKERS' COMPENSATION law requiring all employers to contribute to a general state fund, regardless of wheter their employees had been injured. He found that the statute did not deprive employers of their property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW, and furthermore, it had a reasonable relationship to the GENERAL WELFARE. Four years later, in TRUAX V. CORRIGAN (1921), he joined OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, and JOHN H. CLARKE in dissent against Chief Justice Taft's opinion invalidating an Arizona law modeled on the labor provisions of the Clayton Act. In another rare deviation from his norm, Pitney joined the dissenters who favored the dissolution of the United States Steel Corporation.

Typically, judges such as Pitney would presume that regulatory laws such as Kansas's prohibition of yellow dog contracts and the labor provisions of the Clayton Act violated liberty of contract or property rights. Yet Pitney made no such assumption when an individual confronted the criminal process. In the notorious case of FRANK V. MANGUM (1915), for example, Pitney maintained that the state of Georgia had "fairly and justly" done its duty. Pitney also vigorously supported the national government's prosecution of dissenters and radicals following WORLD WAR I. In Pierce v. United States (1920) he sustained the conviction of socialists who "knowingly" and "recklessly" distributed "highly colored and sensational" and "grossly false" statements about the government's conduct of the war. The Pierce decision solidified the Court's shift from Holmes's CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER interpretation of the FIRST AMENDMENT to the less speech-protective BAD TENDENCY TEST.

Pitney approved the Court's invalidation of the child labor laws; he dissented from the majority's approval of widening the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and he dissented from Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES's expansive reading of the COMMERCE CLAUSE in the "Shreveport Case," Houston, East and West Texas Railway Company v. United States (1914). In short, Pitney's judicial career faithfully reflected the conservative reaction to much of the political and legal thrust of the Progressive movement.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

LEVITAN, DAVID M. 1954 Mahlon Pitney—Labor Judge. Virginia Law Review 40:733–770.

PITT, WILLIAM
(Lord Chatham)
(1708–1778)

William Pitt the elder was one of Britain's greatest statesmen and one of freedom's staunchest friends. He led Britain from near defeat in the Seven Years War to victory and worldwide empire.

In the WILKES CASES debates (1763–1770) Pitt denounced GENERAL WARRANTS as illegal and subversive of liberty and opposed any surrender of PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE. During the 1766 debate over repeal of the Stamp Act, Pitt insisted that "the distinction between legislation and taxation is essentially necessary to liberty," and that while Britain was "sovereign and supreme, in every circumstance of government and legislation whatsoever," Parliament had no right to tax those not represented therein. "There is," he declared, "a plain distinction between taxes levied for purposes of raising a revenue, and duties imposed for the regulation of trade." Later that year, as earl of Chatham, Pitt was again called to head the government. During his administration (but while he was incapacitated by illness) his chancellor of the exchequer procured passage of the TOWNSHEND ACTS.

In the 1770s Chatham urged conciliation with the American colonies, but he opposed any measure tending toward dissolution of the empire. His final speech, delivered in 1778, was against a motion to withdraw British troops and recognize American independence.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PLAIN FEEL DOCTRINE

The FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibits the government from conducting unreasonable seizures of effects. This protection, however, does not require the government to obtain a warrant in every instance. In Minnesota v. Dickerson (1993), the Supreme Court established the plain feel or plain touch DOCTRINE, based on the premise that tactile information can justify a warrantless seizure. The plain feel doctrine extends the principle of the PLAIN VIEW DOCTRINE, which rests on the sense of sight, to the sense of touch. The doctrine permits a law enforcement officer to seize an object if its nature is immediately apparent during a touching permitted by the Fourth Amendment. Thus Dickerson held that an officer authorized to touch clothing or a container may acquire PROBABLE CAUSE to believe the felt object is contraband or evidence and thereby justify a further Fourth Amendment intrusion.

The plain feel doctrine does not provide authority to touch. It merely permits the officer to act on tactile information concerning a felt object. Authority to feel the object in the first instance must be found elsewhere. In many cases, the officer derives authority from the STOP-AND-FRISK principles of TERRY V. OHIO (1968) which allow a pat down for weapons. In others, the officer has consent for the touching. Authority to touch may also rest on the need to move an object or on other permitted conduct involving contact with the object.

In every case, however, the officer's authority to engage in tactile exploration is limited. When the prosecution relies on the plain feel doctrine, the court should determine not only whether the object could be recognized by touch as contraband or evidence, but also whether its tactile characteristics are so pronounced that it could be recognized within the scope of the permitted search. An officer may not extend the scope of a search in an attempt to obtain probable cause. The Dickerson Court recognized authority to seize items felt during a pat down but emphasized that a Terry frisk for weapons is strictly circumscribed and does not permit an officer to probe an object that does not feel like a weapon. The officer's continued manipulation in Dickerson went beyond the authorized intrusion and also belied any claim that it was immediately apparent that the lump was crack cocaine.

The prosecution needs to rely on the plain feel doctrine only when an officer without probable cause to arrest a defendant seizes a nonweapon-like item recognizable by feel. Because few seizable items other than weapons can be identified by feel, one might expect plain feel to be a tool of limited utility. On the contrary, prosecutors often rely on plain feel to justify seizures. Plain feel cases fall into a predictable pattern. The prosecution most often invokes the doctrine to uphold a seizure of drugs, drug paraphernalia, or evidence of drug trafficking from the defendant's person. The touching typically occurs during a Terry frisk or a consensual pat down following an authorized stop.

Determining whether the nature of the seized item was immediately apparent to the officer is critical to justify a seizure based on plain feel. Although Dickerson used "immediately apparent" to describe the standard for seizure, it is clear from Arizona v. Hicks (1987) that plain feel, like plain view, requires probable cause.

The "immediately apparent" requirement for seizing items that do not feel weapon-like should be distinguished from the Terry basis for seizing items that feel like weapons. Terry allows the officer to frisk to detect and remove weapons. The Terry frisk is biased to protect the safety of the officer and public. Generally, any object of sufficient hardness and size can be explored, even though its shape does not advertise it as a gun or knife. If clothing obscures the contents from tactile detection, courts often approve investigation of the object.

By contrast, the plain feel doctrine is not biased to permit exploration of suspicious objects. The Dickerson Court emphasized that the tactile information obtained during the authorized touching must immediately raise probable cause to believe the object is seizable. Mere reasonable suspicion that an object is contraband does not support further intrusion.

ANNE BOWEN POULIN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Search and Seizure; Unreasonable Search.)

PLAIN VIEW DOCTRINE

The FOURTH AMENDMENT protects persons and their effects against unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES. However, articles exposed to the plain view of others are subject to a warrantless seizure on PROBABLE CAUSE, for no search is involved and hence no invasion of privacy results. (Plain view differs from abandonment. Exposure of an article to plain view may result from carelessness; abandonment signifies a deliberate relinquishment of the right of ownership. In either case, there is no constitutionally protected interest in the privacy of the article.)

Three conditions must be met for a plain view seizure to be constitutional, according to the decision in COOLIDGE V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1971). First, the officer who sees the article must have a legal right to be where he is. Second, discovery of the article by the police must be "inadvertent," not a result of prior information that would have enabled the police to obtain a warrant beforehand. (This requirement is relaxed in a SEARCH INCIDENT TO ARREST, where a seizure made within the limited scope of the authorized search is lawful even if the finding of the evidence was anticipated.) Finally, the incriminating nature of the evidence must be "immediately apparent," so that no additional intrusion on privacy is necessary in order to establish that fact. (The term "immediately apparent" was modified in Brown v. Texas (1983) to mean probable cause; certainty is not required.)

An emergency "hot pursuit" of a suspect into private premises, as in WARDEN V. HAYDEN (1967), provides the widest latitude for a plain view seizure; the search for the suspect and his weapons is permitted to extend throughout the entire place until he is apprehended. Barring emergencies, however, a plain view of the interior of a house, obtained through a window or open door, does not permit a warrantless entry of premises any more than does testimony of the senses (say, the odor of marijuana) that criminal activity is afoot. In searches of buildings, therefore, the plain view serves to authorize a seizure only when a lawful search is already in progress when the view is obtained. A different standard applies to automobiles: a plain view of evidence in an automobile on the road not only permits seizure of the evidence but also may provide probable cause for a WARRANTLESS SEARCH of the entire vehicle. Since Brown, even a closed container may be seized under the plain view doctrine if the contents can be reliably inferred from its outside appearance—for example, a tied balloon of a type commonly used to carry narcotics.

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1978 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. Vol. 2:589–595, 601–605. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

PLAIN VIEW DOCTRINE
(Update)

Under the plain view doctrine of COOLIDGE V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1971), certain items found in a lawful search may be seized without a SEARCH WARRANT though they were not among the items that were legitimate objectives of the search. Though this issue also arises in other contexts, it most frequently comes into play when police, executing a search warrant naming certain things to be seized, find and immediately seize other items unnamed in the warrant.

The Supreme Court in Coolidge declined to hold that in such circumstances the police must always seek another warrant, reasoning that such a procedure "would often be a needless inconvenience, and sometimes dangerous—to the evidence or to the police themselves." At the same time, the Court was not prepared to uphold warrantless seizures made either without PROBABLE CAUSE or as a consequence of an earlier circumvention of the warrant requirement, as where the police intended from the very beginning to seize the unnamed objects. Consequently, the Coolidge plurality concluded that a warrantless seizure was permissible only if three requirements were met: (1) there must have been a prior valid intrusion into the place where the seized evidence was found; (2) the discovery of the seized items must have been "inadvertent"; and (3) it must have been "immediately apparent" that the seized items were evidence of crime.

The Coolidge plurality did not explain what it meant by "inadvertent." It did not state explicitly what degree of expectation would make the subsequent discovery of an item other than inadvertent. Most lower courts took the inadvertent-discovery limitation to mean that a discovery is inadvertent, without regard to the hopes or expectations of the police, if there were not sufficient grounds to get a search warrant for that item. Moreover, for probable cause to nullify an inadvertent claim those grounds must have been in the hands of the police at a time when it would have been feasible to obtain a warrant, for otherwise the police cannot be faulted for failing to obtain a warrant also naming the seized item.

Even so interpreted, the inadvertent-discovery limitation is unsound. It is a limitation on seizure, not search, and thus protects possessory interests only, not privacy interests. Yet, one consequence of the inadvertence requirement is that lawfully discovered items seized on probable cause may be excluded merely because the officer, out of an abundance of caution, failed to seek a magistrate's approval for a more intrusive search through the premises for those items. If, as the Court declared in HOFFA V. UNITED STATES (1966), "the police are not required to guess at their peril the precise moment at which they have probable cause," this result is not a desirable one. Such a result will no longer obtain, for in Horton v. California (1990) the Court rejected the inadvertent-discovery limitation on the plain view doctrine.

The "immediately apparent" limitation does not require the police to be certain of the incriminating character of the seized object; probable cause will suffice. But when must this probable cause become apparent? Assume a case in which police executing a search warrant for stolen stereo equipment see in the searched premises a television set. They turn the television set around to expose its serial number, and then determine that the number matches that of a set recently reported stolen. Many courts interpreted Coolidge to mean that such movement of the television set, though not authorized by the warrant, was nonetheless a lawful search if undertaken upon reasonable suspicion that the set was stolen. The appealing rationale of these cases was that the slight movement of the object to examine its exterior was such a minimal intrusion upon FOURTH AMENDMENT interests as to not require full probable cause.

Though these decisions arguably found support in the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Place (1983), holding that personal effects in transit such as luggage could be briefly detained for investigation upon mere reasonable suspicion, the Court in Arizona v. Hicks (1987) held that Coolidge's "immediately apparent" requirement means full probable cause must exist before the television set is even moved. The Court in Hicks reasoned that such movement was part of "a dwelling-place search," for which full probable cause had always been required, and distinguished such cases as Place on the ground that the "special operational necessities" existing there were not present. Hicks made the plain view doctrine of the Coolidge plurality a doctrine endorsed by a majority of the Justices, and Hicks held that the doctrine may not be invoked when the police have less than probable cause to believe that an item should be seized as evidence of crime.

WAYNE R. LAFAVE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Search and Seizure; Unreasonable Search; Warrantless Searches.)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1987 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 2nd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

MOYLAN, CHARLES E. 1975 The Plain View Doctrine: Unexpected Child of the Great Search Incident Geography Battle. Mercer Law Review 26:1047–1101.

PLANNED PARENTHOOD v. ASHCROFT

See: Reproductive Autonomy

PLANNED PARENTHOOD v. CASEY
505 U.S. 833 (1992)

In Planned Parenthood v Casey, a slim majority of the Supreme Court, to the surprise of many, dramatically rejected the vigorous and caustic calls of four dissenting Justices to overrule ROE V. WADE (1973), decided nineteen years earlier. The majority instead reaffirmed Roe's "core" as it struck down a spousal notice provision in a Pennsylvania ABORTION statute. A different majority, however, OVERRULED portions of two of Roe's successor decisions, by upholding the statute's informed consent provisions for adult women, including a twenty-four–hour waiting period and a prescribed set of oral and written disclosures by the physician of "objective, non-judgmental . . . accurate scientific information" about fetal development, social services, and adoption. This latter majority also upheld a parental consent provision (with a judicial bypass) for minors seeking abortion and a clinic data collection and reporting requirement.

Among the notable features of this case was the gravitas of the PLURALITY OPINION by the three Justices in the conservative middle of the Court. Justices ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, and DAVID H. SOUTER jointly authored and signed the opinion, an exceptional step reminiscent of the COOPER V. AARON (1958) opinion signed by each of the nine WARREN COURT Justices to emphasize their commitment to BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1955). Drawing back from their expressions of hostility to Roe in prior opinions, Kennedy and O'Connor joined with Souter to reaffirm Roe's "core" holdings that a woman has a FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT to terminate her pregnancy prior to fetal viability; after viability a state can ban abortion except where the woman's life or health are endangered; and from the start of a pregnancy the state has a legitimate interest in protecting the health of the woman and a growing interest in protecting the life of the fetus.

In contrast to Justices JOHN PAUL STEVENS and HARRY A. BLACKMUN, who in separate opinions adhered more fully to the Court's opinion in Roe, the joint plurality opinion rejected Roe's "trimester structure" for evaluating state regulation of abortion in favor of an "undue burden" standard. By this, the plurality meant that a state cannot constitutionally impose a rule that leaves a woman with merely a formal right or that "has the purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle" to the effective exercise of the abortion right. Moreover, a burden that affects only a small fraction of women can nonetheless constitute an undue burden as to them. Thus, while the spousal notice provision may interfere with the choice of only some women, it was struck down as a substantial burden. By contrast, the plurality did not deem the impediments that a twenty-four–hour waiting period clearly impose to be a substantial obstacle, on the evidence offered in this facial challenge. It remains to be seen how courts will implement the "undue burden" standard in evaluating regulations that make abortion more difficult and more costly. Although the dissenters disparaged this standard as a newly minted DOCTRINE without content, some scholars have suggested that the undue burden standard accurately describes the Court's traditional approach, across a broad range of constitutional issues, to determining whether a right has been infringed.

In applying the undue burden standard, the Court notably did not apply the dicta in UNITED STATES V. SALERNO (1987) that, outside of FIRST AMENDMENT cases, a facial challenge can succeed only if there is "no set of circumstances" under which the statute is valid.

The joint opinion tied its application of the undue burden standard to the important question of the affirmative role of the state in creating a decisional framework for individuals to help secure to them conditions supporting the exercise of their autonomy; and this concern, in turn, implicitly implicates the related questions of GOVERNMENT SPEECH and the speech of professionals. The opinion indicated that the state may seek to further its interest in "potential life" prior to fetal viability only by means "calculated to inform the woman's free choice, not hinder it," and may require physicians to provide patients with certain information "to ensure that this choice is thoughtful and informed" and specifically informed of the philosophic and social arguments that favor a state's "preference" for childbirth.

In describing the woman's interest in reproductive autonomy, the joint opinion spoke more of liberty than the RIGHT OF PRIVACY; linked aspects of this liberty to the right of bodily integrity the Court has identified in, among other cases, Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (1990); and sympathetically emphasized that reproduction and abortion are unique in that they touch upon the very core of personhood and conscience (as individuals seek to apprehend "the mystery of human life") and involve for women a unique intimacy, burden, and pain. Moreover, the opinion recognized the essential role of reproductive autonomy in affording women opportunities "to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation. . . ." Despite the views of some commentators, it would appear that the opinion necessarily, although implicitly, treated the woman's interest as fundamental. In so doing, the joint opinion forthrightly reaffirmed that the "liberty" the DUE PROCESS clause protects includes fundamental rights that are identified by a judicial exercise of "reasoned judgment" and not only by a search for the Framers' ORIGINAL INTENT or for America's specific historical traditions. Among those identified liberties endorsed by the joint opinion is the fundamental right to use contraceptives, including postconception contraceptives.

Despite its sympathetic elaboration of the woman's interests, the joint opinion intimated that some of its authors might not have joined Roe when originally decided, and that for them STARE DECISIS was determinative of their judgment. Because Roe was workable, had induced serious reliance by a generation of women, and was not an anachronism undermined by subsequent changes in either doctrine or facts, the plurality found no warrant to overturn Roe under traditional principles of stare decisis in constitutional matters. The plurality nonetheless acknowledged that these factors would not preclude reexamination of even so repeatedly reaffirmed a case as Roe, given the depth of the constitutional and political controversy surrounding it. However, after reviewing more than a century of CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, the opinion concluded that Roe was one of those rare cases in which the Court "calls the contending sides of a national controversy to end their national division by accepting a common mandate rooted in" the Court's interpretation of the Constitution. Unless the circumstances facing the nation have fundamentally altered, the opinion asserts, later Justices must adhere to the judgment in such a case in order to maintain the Court's constitutional legitimacy and avoid appearing to "surrender to political pressure."

Perhaps the authors of the joint opinion understood that, had they joined in overruling Roe, they would have appeared to be doing exactly what the Republican Presidents RONALD REAGAN and GEORGE H. W. BUSH who nominated them wanted. For these Presidents had engaged in an unprecedented attempt to reshape the federal judiciary by ideologically screening judicial nominations, especially with respect to abortion, and by occasionally disregarding other traditional criteria of nomination, including professional and senatorial judgments. In declining to vote the party line, however, these Justices may have aided the REPUBLICAN PARTY electorally by continuing to place the abortion right beyond Republican political reach—at least until additional retirements from the Court lead some to try once again to place the issue of Roe before the electorate and the Court.

ROBERT D. GOLDSTEIN
(2000)

Bibliography

BROWNSTEIN, ALAN 1994 How Rights Are Infringed: The Role of Undue Burden Analysis in Constitutional Doctrine. Hastings Law Journal 45:867–959.

GOLDSTEIN, ROBERT D. 1988 Mother-Love and Abortion: A Legal Interpretation. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press.

——— 1996 Reading Casey: Structuring the Woman's Decisionmaking Process. William & Mary Bill of Rights Journal 4:787–880.

PLANNED PARENTHOOD OF CENTRAL MISSOURI v. DANFORTH
428 U.S. 52 (1976)

Following ROE V. WADE (1973), Missouri adopted a comprehensive law regulating ABORTION. Planned Parenthood, which operated an abortion clinic, and two eminent physicians sued in federal district court challenging the constitutionality of most of the law's provisions. On appeal, the Supreme Court unanimously upheld three of the state's requirements and by divided vote invalidated four others. Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN wrote for the Court.

The Court sustained the law's definition of "viability" of a fetus: "when the life of the unborn child may be continued indefinitely outside the womb by natural or artificial life-supportive systems." The state's failure to set a specific time period survived a challenge for VAGUENESS; the Court assumed that the physician retained the power to determine viability. The Court also upheld a requirement of written certification by a woman of her "informed" consent to an abortion, and certain record-keeping requirements.

The Court invalidated, 6–3, a requirement of consent to an abortion by the husband of the pregnant woman, and invalidated, 5–4, a parental consent requirement for unmarried women under age eighteen. Recognizing the husband's strong interest in the abortion decision, the Court concluded that when spouses disagreed, only one of them could prevail; that one must be the woman. As for parental consent, the opinion offered no broad charter of CHILDREN'S RIGHTS but concluded that a "mature" minor's right to have an abortion must prevail over a parent's contrary decision (H. L. v. Matheson, 1981). The state had little hope of restoring a family structure already "fractured" by such a conflict.

The Court invalidated, 6–3, a prohibition on saline amniocentesis as an abortion technique. The procedure was used in more than two-thirds of all abortions following the first trimester of pregnancy; its prohibition would undermine Roe. Finally, the state had required a physician performing an abortion to use professional skill and care to preserve the life and health of a fetus. The requirement was held invalid, 6–3, because it was not limited to the time following the stage of fetal viability.

The question of the doctor's role in determining viability and preserving fetal life returned to the Court in Colautti v. Franklin (1979). There the Court invalidated, 6–3, on vagueness grounds, a Pennsylvania law requiring a doctor to exercise care to protect a fetus when there was "sufficient reason to believe that the fetus may be viable." As in Roe and Danforth, the Court paid considerable deference to physicians, leaving undefined their control over their patients' constitutional rights.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Reproductive Autonomy.)

Bibliography

COHEN, LESLIE ANN 1980 Fetal Viability and Individual Autonomy: Resolving Medical and Legal Standards for Abortion. UCLA Law Review 27:1340–1364.

PLEA BARGAINING

The overwhelming majority of convictions in American criminal courts occur when the accused pleads guilty to a charge; few defendants receive a full judicial trial. "Plea bargaining" describes a variety of incentives and pressures that produce this result and that are commonly encountered in American criminal courts. Some plea bargaining is explicit: defendants are led by the prosecutor or the judge to plead guilty in return for the promise of some concession or in fear of harsh treatment meted out to those who insist on a trial. The reward for defendants may be release on bail before trial, the dropping or reduction of charges, or the lightening of punishment imposed after conviction. Some defendants may plead guilty out of a sense of contrition, but more probably acquiesce in conviction because they expect more lenient treatment if they do not insist on their right to trial.

Overt negotiation to induce a defendant to plead guilty is often not necessary. The incentive structure is built into the culture of the courthouse and into the substantive criminal code itself. Those accused of crime learn the culture from cellmates, friends, and lawyers. Under most modern American penal codes, the same criminal conduct typically permits the defendant to be charged with one or more of several distinct offenses, each carrying different levels of potential punishment. Some of the potential sentences are severe: not just CAPITAL PUNISHMENT but punishment for common offenses by prison terms that may exceed the length of a person's vigorous adulthood. It would be practically impossible and morally unthinkable to apply such severe sanctions in a substantial portion of the cases.

The system is thus dominated at every level by official discretion; police, prosecutors, judges, and correctional officials are expected to extend leniency to most offenders lest the system become brutal and the courthouses overloaded. The guilty plea thus provides incentives for the state as well as the defendant. The courts are prepared to try only about ten percent of the cases potentially before them, and prosecutors value convictions obtained without the effort and expense of trial.

The relationship of this system of official discretion, including plea bargaining, with constitutional norms is strained, to say the least. Enforcement of criminal laws in America is predominantly the responsibility of over 3,000 distinct and varying local systems for the administration of criminal justice. The system generally gives a central role to professional police and prosecutorial organizations rather than to the active supervising magistracy that the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments apparently contemplated for federal prosecutions.

The dominance of plea bargaining and the discretionary power to bring and dismiss charges tend to reduce the likelihood of direct confrontation between constitutional doctrine and everyday law enforcement practice. Officials are motivated to settle cases in which the lawfulness of their behavior appears likely to be challenged. Moreover, the dominance of discretion permits some rationalization of enforcement policies, better managerial control of scarce resources, and reduction of the uncertainties of trial for both officials and defendants. The system also permits the public at large to avoid facing the contradictions inherent in the penal policies embodied in the criminal codes of most states.

The guilty plea system potentially conflicts with constitutional norms in three principal ways. First, the system is in some tension with DUE PROCESS standards. In America the guilty plea wholly substitutes for a judicial trial. In Europe, the judge typically must conduct an independent investigation of guilt, whether or not the accused confesses. Even before the modern constitutional revolution in criminal justice, the Supreme Court recognized the dangers inherent in convictions based solely upon guilty pleas, insisting in such cases that convictions be based on knowing and voluntary WAIVER OF RIGHTS. In a series of decisions between 1960 and 1970 the Court spelled out this requirement in specific terms: an admission of guilt in open court by an accused who is adequately counseled and informed by a neutral judge of his rights and of the possible consequences of waiving them by pleading guilty. This formula requires only a rather formalistic colloquy between defendant and judge in open court to ascertain the accused's knowledge and VOLUNTARINESS of the plea. It also precludes active participation by the judge in the negotiations that induce the plea, through promises of leniency or threats of severity. It is also understood that bargains, once struck, must be observed by the government. Beyond these requirements due process is satisfied so long as the bargaining is fair according to the standards of commercial bargaining. Thus a defendant may be held to his plea despite his insistence that he is innocent. Troubling issues arise when an accused pleads guilty, despite his belief in his own innocence, because he recognizes the long odds against acquittal and the high risk of a more severe penalty after conviction at trial. Although the Court has held such pleas to be voluntary and to satisfy due process standards, doubts continue regarding the voluntariness of many such pleas.

A second cluster of constitutional concerns about the guilty plea system centers on the question of equal treatment for all similarly situated defendants. The guarantees of due process and EQUAL PROTECTION somewhat limit the arbitrary and disparate imposition of punishment. Yet the plea bargaining system grants to some defendants concessions that are unlikely to be extended to all. Indeed, if the concessions were equally available, they would lose much of their force in persuading defendants to plead guilty. Moreover, the process of negotiation operates outside the formal protections of the criminal process, within an area of official discretion that is seldom subjected to independent scrutiny. Opportunities abound for arbitrary discrimination.

The third and most pressing set of constitutional concerns about plea bargaining has received the least satisfactory treatment by the Supreme Court. When a defendant pleads guilty, he waives a host of constitutionally protected rights, including TRIAL BY JURY or by a judge, the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, the right to CONFRONTATION and cross-examination of witnesses, and the right to challenge evidence against him. Government officials encourage the waiver of these rights by promising reduced punishment, and by threatening greater punishment for those who insist on their constitutionally guaranteed rights. This process appears to be an UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITION on the exercise of rights.

Despite these constitutional concerns, and despite widespread public dissatisfaction, plea bargaining seems to be a permanent feature of the American system of criminal justice. If the Supreme Court has thus far acquiesced in the system's constitutionality, perhaps the Court is not yet persuaded that a satisfactory alternative has been demonstrated.

ARTHUR ROSSETT
(1986)

Bibliography

ROSSETT, ARTHUR I. and CRESSY, DONALD 1976 Justice by Consent: Plea Bargains in the American Courthouse. Philadelphia: Lippincott.

SCHULHOFER, STEPHEN J. 1984 Is Plea Bargaining Inevitable? Harvard Law Review 97:1037–1107.

PLESSY v. FERGUSON
163 U.S. 537 (1896)

Until BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), Plessy was the constitutional linchpin for the entire structure of Jim Crow in America. Borrowed from LEMUEL SHAW in ROBERTS V. BOSTON (1851), the Plessy Court established the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE: black persons were not denied the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS safeguarded by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT when they were provided with facilities substantially equal to those available to white persons.

Florida enacted the first Jim Crow transportation law in 1887, and by the end of the century the other states of the old Confederacy had followed suit. Louisiana's act, which was challenged in Plessy, required railroad companies carrying passengers in the state to have "equal but separate accommodations" for white and colored persons by designating coaches racially or partitioning them. Black citizens, who denounced the innovation of Jim Crow in Louisiana as "unconstitutional, unamerican, unjust, dangerous and against sound public policy," complained that prejudiced whites would have a "license" to maltreat and humiliate inoffensive blacks. Plessy was a TEST CASE. Homer A. Plessy, an octoroon (one-eighth black), boarded the East Louisiana Railroad in New Orleans bound for Covington in the same state and sat in the white car; he was arrested when he refused to move to the black car. Convicted by the state he appealed on constitutional grounds, invoking the THIRTEENTH and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS. The Court had already decided in Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Ry. v. Mississippi, (1890) that Jim Crow cars in INTRASTATE COMMERCE did not violate the COMMERCE CLAUSE.

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN was the only dissenter from the opinion by Justice HENRY B. BROWN. That the state act did not infringe the Thirteenth Amendment, declared Brown, "is too clear for argument." The act implied "merely a legal distinction" between the two races and therefore had "no tendency to destroy the legal equality of the two races, or reestablish a state of involuntary servitude." Harlan, believing that STATE ACTION could have no regard to the race of citizens when their CIVIL RIGHTS were involved, would have ruled that compulsory racial SEGREGATION violated the Thirteenth Amendment by imposing a BADGE OF SERVITUDE.

The chief issue was whether the state act abridged the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause. One reads Brown's opinion with an enormous sense of the feebleness of words as conveyors of thought, because he conceded that the object of the amendment "was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law," yet he continued the same sentence by adding, "but in the nature of things it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based on color. . . ." As a matter of historical fact the intention of the amendment was, generally, to abolish legal distinctions based on color. The Court pretended to rest on history without looking at the historical record; it did not claim the necessity of adapting the Constitution to changed conditions, making untenable the defense often heard in more recent years, that the decision fit the times. Plessy makes sense only if one understands that the Court believed that segregation was not discriminatory, indeed that it would violate the equal protection clause if it were discriminatory. Brown conceded that a statute implying a legal inferiority in civil society, lessening "the security of the right of the colored race," would be discriminatory, but he insisted that state-imposed segregation did not "necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other. . . ." There was abundant evidence to the contrary, none of it understandable to a Court that found fallacious the contention that "the enforced separation of the two races stamps the colored race with a badge of inferiority. If this be so, it is not by reason of anything found in the act, but solely because the colored race chooses to put that construction on it." That segregation stamped blacks with a badge of inferiority was not fallacious. The fallacy was that only they imputed inferiority to segregation. Jim Crow laws were central to white supremacist thought. That blacks were inherently inferior was a conviction being stridently trumpeted by white supremacists from the press, the pulpit, and the platform, as well as from the legislative halls, of the South. The label, "For Colored Only," was a public expression of disparagement amounting to officially sanctioned civil inequality. By the Court's own reasoning, state acts compelling racial segregation were unconstitutional if inferiority was implied or discrimination intended.

The separate but equal doctrine was fatally vulnerable for still other reasons given, ironically, by the Court in Plessy. It sustained the act as a valid exercise of the POLICE POWER yet stated that every exercise of that power "must be reasonable, and extend only to such laws as are enacted in good faith for the promotion of the public good, and not for the annoyance or oppression of a particular class." Jim Crow laws were not only annoying and oppressive to blacks; they were not reasonable or for the public good. The Court asserted that the question of reasonableness must be determined with reference "to the established usages, customs and traditions" of the people of the state. The proper standard of reasonableness ought to have been the equal protection clause of the Constitution, not new customs of the white supremacists of an ex-slave state. Even if the custom of segregation had been old, and it was not, the Court was making strange doctrine when implying that discrimination becomes vested with constitutionality if carried on long enough to become customary. Classifying people by race for the purpose of transportation was unreasonable because the classification was irrelevant to any legitimate purpose.

The only conceivable justification for the reasonableness of the racial classification was that it promoted the public good, which Brown alleged. The effects of segregation were inimical to the public good, because, as Harlan pointed out, it "permits the seeds of race hate to be planted under the sanction of law." It created and perpetuated interracial tensions. Oddly the Court made the public-good argument in the belief that the commingling of the races would threaten the public peace by triggering disorders. In line with that assumption Brown declared that legislation is powerless to eradicate prejudice based on hostile "racial instincts" and that equal rights cannot be gained by "enforced commingling." These contentions seem cynical when announced in an opinion sanctioning inequality by sustaining a statute compelling racial segregation. The argument that prejudice cannot be legislated away overlooked the extent to which prejudice had been legislated into existence and continued by Jim Crow statutes.

Harlan's imperishable dissent repeated the important Thirteenth Amendment argument that he had made in the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883) on badges of servitude. That amendment, he declared, "decreed universal civil freedom in the country." Harlan reminded the Court that in STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1880), it had construed the Fourteenth Amendment to mean that "the law in the States shall be the same for the black as for the white" and that the amendment contained "a necessary implication of a positive immunity, or right . . . the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation against them distinctively as colored—exemption from legal discriminations, implying inferiority in civil society, lessening the security of their enjoyment of rights which others enjoy. . . ." To Harlan, segregation was discriminatory per se. The state act was unreasonable because segregation was not germane to a legitimate legislative end. He meant that the Fourteenth Amendment rendered the state powerless to make legal distinctions based on color in respect to public transportation. A railroad, he reminded the Court, was a public highway exercising public functions available on the same basis to all citizens. "Our Constitution," said Harlan, "is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens." He thought the majority's decision would prove in time to be as pernicious as DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857). As for the separate but equal doctrine, he remarked that the "thin disguise" of equality would mislead no one "nor atone for the wrong this day done."

Plessy cleared the constitutional way for legislation that forced the separation of the races in all places of public accommodation. Most of that legislation came after Plessy. In the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES, the Court had prevented Congress from abolishing segregation, and in Plessy the Court supported the states in compelling it. Not history and not the Fourteenth Amendment dictated the decision; it reflected its time, and its time was racist. As Justice Brown pointed out, even Congress in governing the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA had required separate schools for the two races. The Court did not invent Jim Crow but adapted the Constitution to it.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

KLUGER, RICHARD 1973 Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. Pages 71–83. New York: Knopf.

OBERST, PAUL 1973 The Strange Career of Plessy v. Ferguson. Arizona Law Review 15:389–418.

OLSON, OTTO, ed. 1967 The Thin Disguise: Turning Point in Negro History: Plessy v. Ferguson. New York: Humanities Press.

WOODWARD, C. VANN 1971 The National Decision Against Equality. Pages 212–233 in Woodward, American Counterpoint: Slavery and Racism in the North-South Dialogue. Boston: Little, Brown.

PLURALITY OPINION

In some cases the majority of Justices of the Supreme Court, although agreeing on the DECISION, do not agree on the reasoning behind the decision. In such cases, there is no OPINION OF THE COURT; instead there are two or more opinions purporting to explain the decision. If one opinion is signed by more Justices than any other, it is called the "plurality opinion." A plurality opinion may be cited as precedent in later cases, but, unlike a majority opinion, it is not an authoritative statement of the Court's position on the legal or constitutional issues involved.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PLYLER v. DOE
457 U.S. 202 (1982)

Experimenting with ignorance, the Texas legislature authorized local school boards to exclude the children of undocumented ALIENS from the public schools, and cut off state funds to subsidize those children's schooling. The Supreme Court, 5–4, held that this scheme denied the alien children the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. The OPINION OF THE COURT, by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, contains the potential for important future influence on equal protection DOCTRINE.

The Court was unanimous on one point: the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of equal protection for all PERSONS extends not only to aliens lawfully admitted for residence but also to undocumented aliens. The question that divided the Court was what that guarantee demanded—an issue that the Court's recent opinions had typically discussed in language about the appropriate STANDARD OF REVIEW. In SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973) the Court had rejected the claim that EDUCATION was a FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST, and had subjected a state system for financing schools to a deferential RATIONAL BASIS standard. A significant OBITER DICTUM, however, had suggested that a total denial of education to a certain group of children would have to pass the test of STRICT SCRUTINY. (See GRIFFIN V. COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY.) Furthermore, although alienage was, for some purposes, a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION, the Court had not extended that characterization to laws discriminating against aliens who were not lawfully admitted to the country.

Justice Brennan's analysis blurred the already indistinct lines dividing levels of judicial scrutiny in equal protection cases. He suggested that some form of "intermediate scrutiny" was appropriate, and even hinted at a preference for strict scrutiny. Eventually, though, he came to rest on rhetorical ground that could hold together a five-Justice majority. Because the Texas law imposed a severe penalty on children for their parents' misconduct, it was irrational unless the state could show that it furthered "some substantial goal of the State," and no such showing had been made. In a concurring opinion, Justice LEWIS F. POWELL remarked that heightened scrutiny was proper, on analogy to the Court's decisions about classifications based on ILLEGITIMACY. Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, also concurring, repeated his argument for recognition of a "sliding scale" of standards of review, and accurately noted that this very decision illustrated that the Court was already employing such a system. No one should be surprised when the Court holds invalid a supremely stupid law that imposes great hardship on a group of innocent people.

Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, writing for the four dissenters, agreed that the Texas policy was "senseless." He argued nonetheless that the Court, by undertaking a "policymaking role," was "trespass[ing] on the assigned function of the political branches." In allocating scarce state resources, Texas could rationally choose to prefer citizens and lawfully admitted aliens over aliens who had entered the country without permission; for the dissenters, that was enough to validate the law.

The Plyler opinion was narrow, leaving open the question whether a similar burden of substantial justification would be imposed on a discrimination against undocumented aliens who were adults, or even against innocent children when the discrimination was something less than a total denial of education. Justice Brennan did suggest that judicial scrutiny might properly be heightened in cases of discrimination against aliens—even undocumented aliens—who had established "a permanent attachment to the nation." Although it is unlikely that this view could command a majority of the Court today, the remark may bear fruit in the future.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Immigration and Alienage.)

POCKET VETO

If Congress adjourns within ten days after passing a bill, the President can prevent the bill's enactment by merely withholding his signature (Article I, section 7, clause 3, of the Constitution). By means of this extension of the VETO POWER, the President can kill legislation without giving any reason and without the possibility of being overridden.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

POCKET VETO CASE
Okanogan Indians v. United States
279 U.S. 655 (1929)

A unanimous Supreme Court, speaking through Justice EDWARD SANFORD, held that a bill passed by Congress, but not signed by the President, had died when the 69th Congress adjourned between its first and second sessions. The POCKET VETO may therefore be used during the adjournment between sessions, and not merely at the final adjournment, of a particular Congress.

In Wright v. United States (1938) and Kennedy v. Sampson (1965) federal courts established that the pocket veto could not be used during intrasession adjournments.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

POELKER v. DOE

See: Maher v. Roe

POINTER v. TEXAS
380 U.S. 400 (1965)

A state court had allowed the introduction in EVIDENCE of the transcript of an absent witness's testimony given at a preliminary hearing when the defendant, unrepresented by counsel, could not effectively cross-examine. The Supreme Court, disallowing an exception to the HEARSAY RULE, held that "the SIXTH AMENDMENT's right of an accused to confront the witnesses against him is a fundamental right and is made obligatory on the State by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT." The Court also held that the RIGHT OF CONFRONTATION is governed by the same standards in state and federal courts.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

POLICE ACTION

The phrase "police action" is not a term of art, or one having any precise legal significance, but simply an expression or euphemism occasionally employed to describe the use of the armed forces of the United States and other nations to resist what is perceived as a violation of international law, a notable example being American use of the armed forces against the North Korean invasion of South Korea in 1950. (See KOREAN WAR.) President HARRY S. TRUMAN based his decision to use American forces to defend South Korea on the fact that the North Korean aggression constituted a violation of the UNITED NATIONS CHARTER, as declared in a resolution of the Security Council. (The Soviet Union, which of course treated the North Korean invasion as "self-defense," chose to absent itself from that meeting of the Council and thereby lost the opportunity to veto the resolution.) Subsequently, in 1957, Senator John Bricker and other conservative congressmen who were opposed to American intervention in Korea (not because they had any sympathy for communist imperialism but because they were isolationists) attempted to remove such justifications of presidential use of troops by unsuccessfully proposing that the Constitution be amended to require affirmative action by Congress before a treaty obligation could be implemented. (See STATE OF WAR; BRICKER AMENDMENT.)

The phrase has occasionally been employed, although not officially, in other situations in which the United States has used its armed forces without a DECLARATION OF WAR or other explicit sanction by Congress, such as President JOHN F. KENNEDY's 1962 blockade of Cuba. A pejorative variation of it was sometimes employed by opponents of American intervention in VIETNAM, who contended that the United States should not act as an "international policeman" or "international gendarme." Although it would have been appropriate, it seems to have been used by no one to describe President JIMMY CARTER's unsuccessful attempt, in April 1980, to mount a military raid to free American hostages in Iran.

The characterization has never been officially or generally applied to a declared war.

JOSEPH W. BISHOP, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

SEARS, KENNETH C. 1956 Bricker-Dirksen Amendment. Hastings Law Journal 8:1–17.

POLICE DEPARTMENT OF CHICAGO v. MOSLEY
408 U.S. 92 (1972)

Mosley is the leading modern decision linking EQUAL PROTECTION doctrine with the FIRST AMENDMENT. Chicago adopted an ordinance prohibiting PICKETING within 150 feet of a school during school hours, but excepting peaceful labor picketing. Earl Mosley had been picketing on the public sidewalk adjoining a high school, carrying a sign protesting "black discrimination," and after the ordinance was adopted he sought declaratory and injunctive relief, arguing that the ordinance was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court unanimously agreed with him.

Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, for the Court, concluded that the exemption of labor picketing violated the equal protection clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. This conclusion followed the lead of Justice HUGO L. BLACK, concurring in COX V. LOUISIANA (1965). Yet Justice Marshall's opinion speaks chiefly to First Amendment values and primarily cites First Amendment decisions. "[A]bove all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content." As Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER noted in a brief concurrence, so broad a statement is not literally true; the Court has upheld regulations of speech content in areas ranging from DEFAMATION to OBSCENITY. Yet Mosley properly stakes out a presumption in favor of "equality of status in the field of ideas"—a phrase borrowed from ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN.

The Mosley opinion makes two main points. First, regulations of message content are presumptively unconstitutional, requiring justification by reference to state interests of compelling importance. Second, "time, place, and manner" regulations that selectively exclude speakers from a PUBLIC FORUM must survive careful judicial scrutiny to ensure that the exclusion is the minimum necessary to further a significant government interest. Together, these statements declare a principle of major importance: the principle of equal liberty of expression.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

KARST, KENNETH L. 1976 Equality as a Central Principle of the First Amendment. University of Chicago Law Review 43:20–68.

POLICE INTERROGATION AND CONFESSIONS

In the police interrogation room, where, until the second third of the century, police practices were unscrutinized and virtually unregulated, constitutional ideals collide with the grim realities of law enforcement. It is not easy to talk about the defendant's right to silence and his RIGHT TO COUNSEL when the defendant has confessed to a heinous crime—for example, the rape and murder of a small child as in BREWER V. WILLIAMS (1977) or the kidnapping, robbery, and murder of a cab driver, by a shotgun blast to the back of the head, as in RHODE ISLAND V. INNIS (1980)—and the confession seems quite credible. Thus, for many years few matters have split the Supreme Court, troubled the legal profession, and agitated the public as much as the confession cases.

Not surprisingly, the most famous confession case of all, MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), is regarded as the high-water mark of the WARREN COURT's "DUE PROCESS revolution." Nor is it surprising that the decision became the prime target of those who attributed an increase of crime to the softness of judges. Miranda, which finally applied the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION to the informal proceedings in the interrogation room, emerged only after a long struggle, and increasing dissatisfaction, with the test for admitting confessions that preceded it—the "voluntariness" test based on the "totality of circumstances." Miranda can be understood only in light of the Court's prior efforts to deal with the intractable confession problem.

Until well into the eighteenth century, doctrines concerning confessions did not affect the admissibility of extrajudicial narrative statements of guilt offered as EVIDENCE, but dealt only with the conditions under which immediate conviction followed a confession as a plea of guilty. It was not until The King v. Warickshall (1783) that an English court clearly expressed the notion that confessions might be unworthy of credit because of the circumstances under which they were obtained. In that case the judges declared: "A free and voluntary confession is deserving of the highest credit, because it is presumed to flow from the strongest sense of guilt, and therefore it is admitted as proof of the crime to which it refers; but a confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope, or by the torture of fear, comes in so questionable a shape when it is to be considered as the evidence of guilt, that no credit ought to be given to it; and therefore it is rejected."

Because a separate rule against coerced confessions emerged in eighteenth-century English cases nearly a century after the right against self-incrimination had become established, JOHN H. WIGMORE, the great master of the law of evidence, concluded that the two rules had no connection. But Leonard W. Levy, the leading student of the origins of the right against self-incrimination, strongly disagrees. He maintains that "[t]he relationship between torture, compulsory self-incrimination, and coerced confessions was an historical fact as well as a physical and psychological one" and that "in the 16th and 17th centuries, the argument against the three, resulting in the rules that Wigmore said had no connection, overlapped" (Levy 1968, pp. 265, 288–289 n.102).

Levy points out that Baron Geoffrey Gilbert, in his Law

of Evidence, "written before 1726 though not published until thirty years later, stated that though the best evidence of guilt was a confession, 'this confession must be voluntary and without compulsion; for our Law in this differs from the Civil Law, that it will not force any Man to accuse himself; and in this we do certainly follow the Law of Nature, which commands every Man to endeavor his own Preservation . . .' " (Levy 1968, p. 327). Baron Gilbert's phrasing, "our Law . . . will not force any Man to accuse himself," Levy says, "expressed the traditional English formulation of the right against self-incrimination, or rather against compulsory self-incrimination. The element of compulsion or involuntariness was always an essential ingredient of the right and, before the right existed, of protests against incriminating interrogations" (ibid., pp. 327–328).

Although Levy insists that this was a historical blunder, both in the United States and in England the confession rules and the right against self-incrimination were divorced and, with the one notable exception of Bram v. United States (1897), went their separate ways—until the two rules were intertwined in MALLOY V. HOGAN (1964) and fused in the famous Miranda case (1966). Moreover, for most of its life the voluntariness test was essentially an alternative statement of the rule that a confession was entitled to credit so long as it was free of influence that made it untrustworthy or "probably untrue." Wigmore reflected the law prevailing at the time when in 1940 he pointed out that a confession was not inadmissible because of "any breach of confidence" or "any illegality in the method of obtaining it," or "because of any connection with the privilege against self-incrimination."

In Bram v. United States (1897) the Supreme Court did rely explicitly on the self-incrimination clause of the Fifth Amendment in holding a confession inadmissible. But the Court soon abandoned the Bram approach, perhaps stung by the criticism of Wigmore and others that it had misread history, and until the mid-1960s Bram amounted only to an early excursion from the prevailing due process-voluntariness test.

The right against self-incrimination was not deemed applicable to the states until 1964, and by that time the Supreme Court had decided more than thirty state confession cases. Moreover, even if the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination had been deemed applicable to the states much earlier, the law pertaining to "coerced" or "involuntary" confessions still would have developed without it. For until Miranda (1966), the prevailing view was that the suspect in the police interrogation room was not being compelled to be a witness against himself within the meaning of the privilege; he was threatened neither with perjury for testifying falsely nor contempt for refusing to testify at all. Because the police have no legal authority to compel statements, there is no legal obligation to answer, ran the argument, to which a privilege can apply.

So long as police interrogators were not required to advise suspects of their rights nor to permit them to consult with lawyers who would do so, there could be little doubt that many a suspect would assume that the police had a legal right to an answer. Still worse, there could be little doubt that many a suspect would assume, or be led to believe, that there were extralegal sanctions for refusing to cooperate. Small wonder that commentators decried the legal reasoning that excluded the privilege against self-incrimination from the stationhouse for so many years as "casuistic," "a quibble," and a triumph of logic over life.

Wigmore long condemned the statement of the confession rule in terms of voluntariness for the reason that "the fundamental question for confessions is whether there is any danger that they may be untrue . . . and that there is nothing in the mere circumstance of compulsion to speak in general . . . which creates any risk of untruth." But only two years after the Supreme Court handed down its first FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT due process cases, BROWN V. MISSISSIPPI (1936), Charles McCormick defended the voluntariness terminology on the ground that it might reflect a recognition that the confession rule not only protects against the danger of untrustworthiness but also protects an interest closely akin to that protected by the right against compulsory self-incrimination. Three decades later, the Miranda Court would agree. McCormick also suggested that the entire course of decisions in the confessions field could best be understood as "an application to confessions both of a privilege against evidence illegally obtained . . . and of an overlapping rule of incompetency which excludes the confessions when untrustworthy" (1954, p. 157). In the advanced stages of the voluntariness test, the Court would again make plain its agreement with McCormick.

Thus, in Spano v. New York (1959) the Court, speaking through Chief Justice EARL WARREN, pointed out that the ban against involuntary confessions turns not only on their unreliability but also on the notion that "the police must obey the law while enforcing the law; that in the end life and liberty can be as much endangered from illegal methods used to convict those thought to be criminals as from the actual criminals themselves." And the following year, in Blackburn v. Alabama (1960), the Court, again speaking through Chief Justice Warren, recognized that "a complex of values underlies the stricture against use by the state of confessions which, by way of convenient shorthand, this Court terms involuntary."

The "untrustworthiness" rationale, the view that the rules governing the admissibility of confessions were merely a system of safeguards against false confessions, could explain the exclusion of the confession in Brown v. Mississippi (1936), where the deputy sheriff who had presided over the beatings of the defendants conceded that one had been whipped, "but not too much for a Negro." And the untrustworthiness rationale was also adequate to explain the exclusion of confessions in the cases that immediately followed the Brown case such as CHAMBERS V. FLORIDA (1940), Canty v. Alabama (1940), White v. Texas (1940), and Ward v. Texas (1942), for they, too, involved actual or threatened physical violence.

As the crude practices of the early cases became outmoded and cases involving more subtle pressures began to appear, however, it became more difficult to assume that the resulting confessions were untrustworthy. In Ashcraft v. Tennessee (1944), for example, although the confession was obtained after some thirty-six hours of almost continuous interrogation, there was good reason to think that the defendant had indeed been involved in the murder. The man whom the defendant named as his wife's killer readily admitted his involvement and accused the defendant of hiring him to do the job. Moreover, after the interrogation had ceased and the defendant had been examined by his family physician, he made what the doctor described as an "entirely voluntary" confession, in the course of which he explained why he wanted his wife killed. Nevertheless, calling the extended questioning "inherently coercive," a 6–3 majority, speaking through Justice HUGO L. BLACK, held that Ashcraft's confession should not have been allowed into evidence. Under the circumstances, the Ashcraft case seemed to reflect less concern with the reliability of the confession than disapproval of police methods which appeared to the Court to be dangerous and subject to serious abuse.

Although he dissented in Ashcraft, Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER soon became the leading exponent of the "police misconduct" or "police methods" rationale for barring the use of confessions. According to this rationale, in order to condemn and deter abusive, offensive, or otherwise objectionable police interrogation methods, it was necessary to exclude confessions produced by such methods regardless of how relevant and credible they might be, a point underscored in ROGERS V. RICHMOND (1961). After more conventional methods had failed to produce any incriminating statements, a police chief pretended to order petitioner's ailing wife brought down to headquarters for questioning. Petitioner promptly confessed to the murder for which he was later convicted. The trial judge found that the police chief's pretense had "no tendency to produce a confession that was not in accord with the truth" and in his charge to the jury he indicated that the admissibility of the confession should turn on its probable reliability. But the Court, speaking through Justice Frankfurter, held that convictions based on involuntary confessions must fall > not because such confessions are unlikely to be true but because the methods used to extract them offend an underlying principle in the enforcement of our criminal law; that ours is an accusatorial and not an inquisitorial system. . . . Indeed, in many of the cases in which the command of the Due Process Clause has compelled us to reverse state convictions involving the use of confessions obtained by impermissible methods, independent corroborating evidence left little doubt of the truth of what the defendant had confessed. Despite such verification, confessions were found to be the product of constitutionally impermissible methods in their inducement. . . . The attention of the trial judge should have been focused, for purpose of the Federal Constitution, on the question whether the [police behavior] was such as to overbear petitioner's will to resist and bring about confessions not freely self-determined—a question to be answered with complete disregard of whether or not petitioner in fact spoke the truth.

The "voluntariness" test seemed to be at once too wide and too narrow. In the sense of wanting to confess, or doing so in a completely spontaneous manner, as one might confess to rid one's soul of guilt, no confession reviewed by the Court under the "voluntariness" test had been voluntary. On the other hand, in the sense that the situation always presented a choice between two alternatives, all confessions examined by the Court had been voluntary.

As the voluntariness test evolved, it became increasingly clear that terms such as "voluntariness" and "coercion" were not being used as tools of analysis, but as mere conclusions. When a court concluded that the police had resorted to unacceptable interrogation techniques, it called the resulting confession "involuntary" and talked of "overbearing the will." When, on the other hand, a court concluded that the methods the police had employed were permissible, it called the resulting confession "voluntary" and talked of "self-determination." Moreover, such terms as "voluntariness," "coercion," and "overbearing the will" focused directly on neither of the two underlying reasons that led the courts to bar the use of confessions—the offensiveness of police interrogation methods or the risk that these methods had produced an untrue confession.

Another problem with the due process "totality of the circumstances"—voluntariness test was that it was amorphous, elusive, and largely unmanageable. Almost everything was relevant—for example, whether the suspect was advised of his rights; whether he was held incommunicado; the suspect's age, intelligence, education, and prior criminal record; the conditions and duration of his detention—but almost nothing was decisive. Except for direct physical coercion no single factor or combination of them guaranteed exclusion of a confession as involuntary. Because there were so many variables in the voluntariness equation that one determination seldom served as a useful precedent for another, the test offered police interrogators and trial courts little guidance. Trial courts were encouraged to indulge their subjective preferences, and appellate courts were discouraged from active review.

In the thirty years between Brown (1936) and Miranda (1966) the Court had reviewed about one state confession case per year and two-thirds of these had been death penalty cases. Indeed, the Court's workload had been so great that it had even denied a hearing in most death penalty cases. Not surprisingly, Justice Black remarked in the course of the oral argument in Miranda: "If you are going to determine [the admissibility of the confession] each time on the circumstances, [if] this Court will take them one by one, [it] is more than we are capable of doing."

The Supreme Court's dissatisfaction with the elusive "voluntariness" test and its quest for a more concrete and manageable standard led to the decisions in MASSIAH V. UNITED STATES (1964) and ESCOBEDO V. ILLINOIS (1964) and culminated in the 1966 Miranda decision.

Massiah grew out of the following facts: After he had been indicted for various federal narcotics violations and retained a lawyer, and while he was out on bail, Massiah was invited by his codefendant, Colson, to discuss the pending case in Colson's car. Massiah assumed that he was talking to a partner in crime, but Colson had become a secret government agent. A radio transmitter had been concealed in Colson's car to enable a nearby federal agent to overhear the Massiah-Colson conversation. As expected, Massiah made incriminating statements.

Despite the fact that Massiah was neither in "custody" nor subjected to "police interrogation," as that term is normally used, the Supreme Court held that his damaging admissions should have been excluded from evidence. The decisive feature of the case was that after adversary criminal proceedings had been initiated against him—and Massiah's RIGHT TO COUNSEL had "attached"—government agents had deliberately elicited statements from him in the absence of counsel.

Massiah was soon overshadowed by Escobedo, decided a short five weeks later. When Danny Escobedo had been arrested for murder he had repeatedly but unsuccessfully asked to speak to his lawyer. Instead, the police induced Escobedo to implicate himself in the murder. Although Escobedo had incriminated himself before he had been indicted or adversary criminal proceedings had otherwise commenced against him, a 5–4 majority held that under the circumstances "it would exalt form over substance to make the right to counsel . . . depend on whether at the time of the interrogation, the authorities had secured a formal indictment." At the time the police had questioned him, Escobedo "had become the accused and the purpose of the investigation was to "get him' to confess his guilt despite his constitutional right not to do so."

Until Miranda moved the case off center-stage two years later, the meaning and scope of Escobedo was a matter of widespread disagreement. In large part this was due to the accordion-like quality of Justice ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG's majority opinion. At some places the opinion suggested that a suspect's right to counsel was triggered once the investigation ceased to be a general inquiry into an unsolved crime and began to "focus" on him, regardless of whether he was in "custody" or asked for a lawyer. Elsewhere, however, the opinion seemed to limit the holding to its special facts (Escobedo had specifically requested and been denied an opportunity to seek his lawyer's advice, the police had failed to warn him of his right to remain silent, and he was in police custody).

The Escobedo dissenters read the majority opinion broadly: "The right to counsel now not only entitles the accused the counsel's advice and aid in preparing for trial but stands as an impenetrable barrier to any interrogation once the accused has become suspect. From that very moment apparently his right to counsel attaches." The dissenters expressed a preference for a self-incrimination approach, rather than a right to counsel approach. The right against self-incrimination, after all, proscribed only compelled statements. "It is incongruous to assume," they argued, "that the provision for counsel in the Sixth Amendment was meant to amend or supersede the self-incrimination provision of the Fifth Amendment, which is now applicable to the States." Two years later, in Miranda, the Court would focus on the Fifth Amendment, but it would define "compulsion" within the meaning of the privilege in a way that displeased the four Escobedo dissenters (all of whom also dissented in Miranda).

Dissenting in Ashcraft in 1944, Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON agreed that custody and questioning of a suspect for thirty-six hours is "inherently coercive," but quickly added: "And so is custody and examination for one hour. Arrest itself is inherently coercive and so is detention. . . . But does the Constitution prohibit use of all confessions made after arrest because questioning, while one is deprived of freedom, is "inherently coercive'?" Both Jackson and Justice Black, who wrote the majority opinion in Ashcraft, knew that in 1944 the Court was not ready for an affirmative answer to Jackson's question. But by 1966 the Court had grown ready.

Ernesto Miranda had been arrested for rape and kidnapping, taken to a police station, and placed in an "interrogation room," where he was questioned about the crimes. Two hours later the police emerged from the room with a signed confession. In the 1940s or 1950s Miranda's confession unquestionably would have been admissible under the voluntariness test; his questioning had been mild compared to the objectionable police methods that had rendered a resulting confession involuntary in past cases.

The Supreme Court, however, had become increasingly dissatisfied with the voluntariness test. Miranda's interrogators admitted that neither before nor during the questioning had they advised him of his right to remain silent or his right to consult with an attorney before answering questions or his right to have an attorney present during the interrogation. These failures were to prove fatal for the prosecution.

In Miranda a 5–4 majority, speaking through Chief Justice Warren, concluded at last that "all the principles embodied in the privilege [against self-incrimination] apply to informal compulsion exerted by law-enforcement officers during in-custody questioning." Observed the Court:

> An individual swept from familiar surroundings into police custody, surrounded by antagonistic forces, and subjected to the persuasions [described in various interrogation manuals, from which the Court quoted at length] cannot be otherwise than under compulsion to speak. As a practical matter, the compulsion to speak in the isolated setting of the police station may well be greater than in courts or other official investigations, where there are often impartial observers to guard against intimidation or trickery. . . . Unless adequate protective devices are employed to dispel the compulsion inherent in custodial surroundings, no statement obtained from the defendant can truly be the product of his free choice.

The adequate protective devices necessary to neutralize the compulsion inherent in the interrogation environment are the now familiar "Miranda warnings." Although Miranda is grounded primarily in the right against self-incrimination, it also has a right to counsel component designed to protect and to reinforce the right to remain silent. Thus, prior to any questioning a person taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way must not only be warned that he has a right to remain silent and that "anything said can and will be used against [him]," but must also be told of his right to counsel, either retained or appointed. "[T]he need for counsel to protect the Fifth Amendment privilege," stated the Court, "comprehends not merely a right to consult with counsel prior to any questioning but also to have counsel present during any questioning if the defendant so desires."

A suspect, of course, may waive his rights, provided he does so voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently. But no valid WAIVER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS can be recognized unless specifically made after the warnings have been given. Moreover, "[t]he mere fact that [a person] may have answered some questions or volunteered some statements . . . does not deprive him of the right to refrain from answering any further inquiries until he had consulted with an attorney and thereafter consents to be questioned."

Although a great hue and cry greeted the case, Miranda may fairly be viewed as a compromise between the old voluntariness test (a standard so elusive and unmanageable that its safeguards were largely illusory) and extreme proposals (based on an expansive reading of Escobedo) that threatened to "kill" confessions.

Miranda allows the police to conduct general on-the-scene questioning even though the person arrested is both uninformed and unaware of his rights. It allows the police to question a person in his home or office, provided they do not restrict the person's freedom to terminate the meeting. (Indeed, the opinion seems to recommend that the police question a suspect in his home or place of business.) Moreover, "custody" alone does not call for the Miranda warnings. The Court might have held that the inherent pressures and anxieties produced by arrest and detention are substantial enough to require neutralizing warnings. But it did not. Thus, so long as the police do not question one who has been brought to the station house, Miranda leaves them free to hear and act upon volunteered statements, even though the volunteer neither knows nor is advised of his rights. (This point was recognized by dissenting Justice BYRON R. WHITE in Miranda.)

Surprisingly, Miranda does not strip police interrogation of its characteristic secrecy. To the extent that any lawyer worth his salt will tell a suspect to remain silent it is no less clear that any officer worth his salt will be sorely tempted to get the suspect to do just the opposite. But no stenographic transcript (let alone an electronic recording) of the waiver transaction, or the questioning that follows a waiver, need be made; no disinterested observer (let alone a judicial officer) need be present. There is language in Miranda suggesting that the police must make an objective record of the waiver transaction but this language has been largely overlooked or disregarded by the lower courts. And nowhere in the Miranda opinion does the court explicitly require the police to make either tape or verbatim stenographic recordings of the crucial events.

On the eve of Miranda, there were doubts that law enforcement could survive if the Court were to project defense counsel into the police station. But the Miranda Court did so only in a quite limited way. It never took the final step (and, as a practical matter, the most significant one) of requiring that the suspect first consult with a lawyer, or actually have a lawyer present, in order for his waiver of constitutional rights to be considered valid.

Whether suspects are continuing to confess because they do not fully grasp the meaning of the Miranda warnings or because the police are mumbling, hedging, or undermining the warnings, or whether the promptings of conscience and the desire "to get it over with" are indeed overriding the impact of the warnings, or whether admissions of guilt are quid pro quos for reduced charges or lighter sentences, it is plain that in-custody suspects are continuing to confess with great frequency. This result would hardly have ensued if Miranda had fully projected counsel into the interrogation process, requiring the advice or presence of counsel before a suspect could waive his rights.

Because Miranda was the centerpiece of the Warren Court's revolution in CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, and one of the leading issues of the 1968 presidential campaign, almost everyone expected the BURGER COURT to treat Miranda unkindly. And it did, but only for a decade.

The first blow was struck in HARRIS V. NEW YORK (1971), which held that statements preceded by defective Miranda warnings, and thus inadmissible to establish the prosecution's initial case, could nevertheless be used to impeach the defendant's credibility if he took the stand. The Court noted, but seemed untroubled, that some comments in the landmark opinion seemed to bar the use of statements obtained in violation of Miranda for any purpose.

A second impeachment case, Oregon v. Hass (1975), seemed to inflict a deeper wound. In Hass, the police advised the suspect of his rights and he asserted them. Nevertheless, the police refused to honor the suspect's request for a lawyer and continued to question him. That such a flagrant violation of Miranda should produce evidence that may be used for impeachment purposes is especially troublesome; under these circumstances, unlike those in Harris, it is fair to assume that no hope of obtaining evidence usable for the government's case-in-chief operates to induce the police to comply with Miranda. Hass, then, was a more harmful blow to Miranda that was Harris.

Even more disturbing than the impeachment cases is their recent extension to permit the use of a defendant's prior silence to impeach his credibility if he chooses to testify at his trial. In JENKINS V. ANDERSON (1980) the Court held that a murder defendant's testimony that he had acted in self-defense could be impeached by showing that he did not go to the authorities and report his involvement in the stabbing. In Fletcher v. Weir (1982) the Court held that even a defendant's post-arrest silence—so long as he was not given and need not have been given the Miranda warnings—could be used to impeach him if he decided to testify at trial.

Still other blows were struck by Michigan v. Mosley (1975) and Oregon v. Mathiason (1977). Although language in Miranda can be read as establishing a per se rule against any further questioning of one who had asserted his right to silence, Mosley held that under certain circumstances, which the case left unclear, if the police cease questioning on the spot, they may try again and succeed at a later interrogation session. Mathiason, a formalistic, crabbed reading of Miranda, demonstrates that even police station interrogation is not necessarily "custodial." (The suspect had agreed to meet a police officer in the state patrol office and had come to the office alone.)

For supporters of Miranda, the most ominous note of all was struck by Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, speaking for the Court in Michigan v. Tucker (1974). The Tucker Court viewed the Miranda warnings as "not themselves rights protected by the Constitution" but only "prophylactic standards" designed to "safeguard" or to "provide practical reinforcement" for the right against self-incrimination. And it seemed to equate "compulsion" within the meaning of that right with "coercion" or "involuntariness" under the pre-Miranda due process test. It seemed to miss the point that much greater pressures were necessary to render a confession "involuntary" under the old test than are needed to make a statement "compelled" under the new. That was one of the principal reasons the old test was abandoned in favor of Miranda.

A lumping together of self-incrimination "compulsion" and pre-Miranda "involuntariness," which appears to be what the Court did in Tucker, seemed to approach a rejection of the central premises of Miranda. Moreover, the Supreme Court has no supervisory power over state criminal justice. By stripping Miranda of its most apparent constitutional basis without explaining what other bases for it there might be, the Court in the Tucker opinion seemed to be preparing the way for the eventual overruling of Miranda.

A decade later, in NEW YORK V. QUARLES (1984) and in OREGON V. ELSTAD (1985), a majority of the Court, relying heavily on language in the Tucker opinion, again drew a distinction between statements that are actually "coerced" or "compelled" and those that are obtained merely in violation of Miranda's "procedural safeguards" or "prophylactic rules." Quarles admitted a statement a handcuffed rape suspect had made when questioned by police about the whereabouts of a gun he had earlier been reported to be carrying. The Court, speaking through Justice Rehnquist, "conclude[d] that the need for answers to questions in a situation posing a threat to the public safety outweighs the need for the prophylactic rule protecting [the] privilege against self-incrimination." Elstad held that the failure to give Miranda warnings to a suspect who made an incriminating statement when subjected to custodial interrogation in his own home did not bar the use of a subsequent station house confession by the suspect when the second confession was immediately preceded by Miranda warnings. The court, speaking through Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, rejected the argument that a Miranda violation "necessarily breeds the same consequences as police infringement of a constitutional right, so that evidence uncovered following an unwarned statement must be suppressed as "fruit of the poisonous tree." Although Quarles and Elstad can be read very narrowly, and Tucker, too, can be limited to its special facts, the Court's language in these cases—language that "deconstitutionalizes" Miranda—may prove to be far more significant than the cases' specific holdings.

In light of the Tucker majority's undermining of the basis for Miranda and against the background of such cases as Harris, Hass, and Mathiason, a 1980 confession case, Rhode Island v. Innis, posed grave dangers for Miranda. The defendant had been convicted of heinous crimes: kidnapping, robbery, and murder. He had made incriminating statements while being driven to a nearby police station, only a few minutes after being placed in the police vehicle. Any interrogation that might have occurred in the vehicle was brief and mild—much more so than the direct, persistent police station interrogation in Miranda and its companion cases. Two police officers conversing with one another in the front of the car, but in Innis's presence, had expressed concern that because the murder occurred in the vicinity of a school for handicapped children, one of the children might find the missing shotgun and injure himself. At this point, Innis had interrupted the officers and offered to lead them where the shotgun was hidden.

The Court might have taken an approach suggested by earlier dissents and limited Miranda to custodial station house interrogation or its equivalent (for example, a five-hour trip in a police vehicle). It did not do so. The Court might have taken a mechanical approach to interrogation and limited it, as some lower courts had, to situations where the police directly address a suspect. Again, it did not do so. It might have limited interrogation to situations where the record establishes (as it did not in Innis) that the police intended to elicit an incriminating response, an obviously difficult test to administer. It did not do this either.

Instead, the Court, speaking through Justice POTTER STEWART (one of the Miranda dissenters), held that "Miranda safeguards come into play whenever a person in custody is subjected to either express questioning or its functional equivalent." The term "interrogation" includes "any words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit as incriminating response from the suspect." Although the Innis case involved police "speech," the Court's definition embraces police tactics that do not. Thus, the Court seems to have repudiated the position taken by a number of lower courts that confronting a suspect with physical evidence or with an accomplice who has already confessed is not interrogation because it does entail verbal conduct on the part of the police.

One may quarrel, as the three dissenters did, with the Court's application of its definition of "interrogation" to the Innis facts (the Court concluded that the defendant had not been interrogated). But Innis ia a harder case than most because there was "a basis for concluding that the officer's remarks were for some purpose other than that of obtaining evidence from the suspect. An objective listener could plausibly conclude that the policeman's remarks . . . were made solely to express their genuine concern about the danger posed by the hidden shotgun" and thus not view their conversation "as a demand for information" (White 1980, pp. 1234–1235).

In any event, considering the various ways in which the Innis Court might have given Miranda a grudging interpretation, its generous definition of "interrogation" seems much more significant than its questionable application of the definition to the particular facts of the case. In Innis the process of qualifying, limiting, and shrinking Miranda came to a halt. Indeed, it seems fair to say that in Miranda's hour of peril the Innis Court rose to its defense.

If Innis encouraged Miranda's defenders, EDWARDS V. ARIZONA (1981) gladdened them even more. For Edwards was the first clear-cut victory for Miranda in the Burger Court. Sharply distinguishing the Mosley case, which had dealt with a suspect's assertion of his right to remain silent, the Edwards Court, speaking through Justice White (another of the Miranda dissenters), held that when a suspect invokes his right to counsel the police cannot try again. Under these circumstances, a valid waiver of the right to counsel cannot be established by showing "only that [the suspect] responded further to police-initiated custodial interrogation," even though he was again advised of his rights at a second interrogation session. He cannot be questioned anew "until counsel has been made available to him, unless [he] himself initiates further communication, exchanges or conversation with the police." Thus, Edwards reinvigorates Miranda in an important respect. (But a more recent case, Oregon v. Bradshaw (1983), interprets "initiation of further communication" so broadly that it seems to sap Edwards of much of its vitality.)

Although Miranda maintained the momentum generated by Escobedo, it represented a significantly different approach to the confession problem. Although the Miranda Court understandably tried to preserve some continuity with the loose, groping Escobedo opinion, it has become increasingly clear that, by shifting from a right to counsel base to a self-incrimination base, Miranda actually marked a fresh start in describing the circumstances under which Fifth and Sixth Amendment protections attach. Escobedo assigned primary significance to the amount of guilt available to the police at the time of questioning; the opinion therefore contains much talk about "focal point" and the "accusatory stage." But Miranda attaches primary significance to the conditions surrounding or inherent in the interrogation setting; thus the opinion contains much discussion of the "interrogation environment" or the "police-dominated" atmosphere that "carries its own badge of intimidation."

If the requisite inherent pressures exist, Miranda applies whether or not the individual being questioned is a "prime suspect" or has become "the accused." On the other hand, if these pressures are not operating, an individual is not entitled to the Miranda warnings—no matter how sharply the police have focused on him or how much they consider him the "prime suspect" or "the accused." In short, Miranda did not enlarge Escobedo so much as displace it.

The same, however, cannot be said for Massiah. Although Miranda has dominated the confessions scene ever since it was handed down, Massiah has emerged as the other major Warren Court confession doctrine. As strengthened by two Burger Court decisions, Brewer v. William (1977) (often called "the Christian burial speech" case) and United States v. Henry (1980), the Massiah doctrine holds that once "adversary" or "judicial" proceedings have commenced against an individual (by way of INFORMATION, or initial appearance before a magistrate), deliberate government efforts to elicit incriminating statements from him, whether done openly by uniformed police officers (as in Williams) or surreptitiously by secret government agents (as in Massiah and Henry) violate the individual's right to counsel.

Williams revivified Massiah. Indeed, one might even say that Williams disinterred it. For until the decision in Williams there was good reason to think that Massiah had only been a steppingstone to Escobedo and that both cases had been largely displaced by Miranda.

But Massiah is alive and well. And the policies underlying the Massiah doctrine are quite distinct from those underlying Miranda. The Massiah doctrine represents a pure right to counsel approach. It comes into play regardless of whether a person is in custody or is being subjected to interrogation in the Miranda sense. There need not be any compelling influences at work, inherent, informal, or otherwise.

The most recent Massiah case, United States v. Henry (1980), applied Massiah to a situation where the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) had instructed its secret agent, ostensibly a fellow prisoner, not to question the defendant about the crime and there was no showing that he had. Nevertheless, the defendant's incriminating statements were held inadmissible. It sufficed that the government had "intentionally create[d] a situation likely to induce [the defendant] to make incriminating statements without the assistance of counsel." The FBI created such a situation when it instructed its secret agent to be alert to any statements made by the defendant, who was housed in the same cellblock. Even if the agent's claim were accepted that he did not intend to take affirmative steps to obtain incriminating statements, the agent "must have known that such propinquity likely would lead to that result." Henry not only reaffirmed the Massiah doctrine but significantly expanded it. Thus, the Massiah doctrine has emerged as a much more potent force than it ever had been during the Warren Court era.

The Burger Court's generous reading of Miranda in Innis and Edwards and its even more generous reading of Massiah in the Henry case have reaffirmed the Court's commitment to control police efforts to obtain confessions by constitutional rules that transcend "untrustworthiness' and "voluntariness."

Regardless of its shortcomings and the hopes it never fulfilled (or the fears about the case that proved unfounded), Miranda was an understandable and long-overdue effort—and the Court's most ambitious effort ever—to solve the police interrogation-confession problem. At the very least it formally recognized an interrogated suspect's self-incrimination privilege, and a right to counsel for rich and poor alike designed to protect and effectuate that privilege; generated a much greater general awareness of procedural rights; and emphatically reminded the police that they neither create the rules of interrogation nor act free of JUDICIAL REVIEW.

Miranda was an attempt to do in the confessions area what the Warren Court had done elsewhere—take the nation's ideals down from the walls, where they had been kept framed to be pointed at with pride on ceremonial occasions, and live up to them. The degree to which Miranda actually succeeded is debatable, but the symbolic quality of the decision extends far beyond its actual impact upon police interrogation methods.

YALE KAMISAR
(1986)

Bibliography

BAKER, LIVA 1983 Miranda: Crime, Law and Politics. New York: Atheneum.

BERGER, MARK 1980 Taking the Fifth: The Supreme Court and the Privilege against Self-Incrimination. Lexington, Mass.: Lexington Books.

GRAHAM, FRED 1970 The Self-Inflicted Wound. New York: Macmillan.

KAMISAR, YALE 1980 Police Interrogation and Confessions: Essays in Law and Policy. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1968 Origins of the Fifth Amendment. New York: Oxford University Press.

McCormick, Charles T. 1954 Evidence. St. Paul, Minn. West Publishing Co.

Stephens, Otis 1973 The Supreme Court and Confessions of Guilt. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press.

White, Welsh S. 1981 Interrogation without Questions. Michigan Law Review 78:1209–1251.

Wigmore, John Henry 1940 Evidence, 3rd ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

POLICE INTERROGATION AND CONFESSIONS
(Update 1)

The government must comply with three constitutional requirements to use a confession against a defendant in a criminal case: a voluntariness requirement, a RIGHT TO COUNSEL requirement, and a warning requirement.

A court will refuse to admit into evidence a confession that was not voluntarily made by the defendant for two reasons. First, an involuntary confession may not be reliable. Second, the DUE PROCESS clauses of the Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and the Fifth Amendment's RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION prevent the government from using unconscionable methods to induce a person to confess to criminal activity.

A confession is not "involuntary" unless the police obtained the confession through means that were unfair and coercive. Thus, if the police use physical force, or the threat of physical force, against the defendant or against the defendant's family or friends in order to make a defendant confess to a crime, the defendant's confession is involuntary. The police may use a confession that they gained by lying to, or tricking, the defendant so long as the lies or tricks were not both unfair and coercive. A judicial finding of coercive police activity is a prerequisite to finding that a confession should be excluded from evidence under the voluntariness test. In Colorado v. Connelly (1986) the Supreme Court ruled that the government could use a confession from a man who, according to psychiatric testimony offered at trial, suffered from a psychosis that reduced his ability to invoke his right to remain silent when he was asked a question by police officers. The Supreme Court held that the defendant's statements were voluntary because the police had not used any unfair and coercive tactics to obtain his statement.

The Sixth Amendment guarantees each defendant a right to counsel. It does not restrict government questioning of a suspect prior to the time that criminal proceedings have been initiated against that suspect. However, the right to counsel is violated when the government actively elicits information from a defendant outside the presence of his attorney after the beginning of criminal proceedings.

The Sixth Amendment does not protect a defendant who voluntarily gives information to a government employee who did not actively elicit that information but only listened to the defendant's statement. Thus, after a defendant has been charged with a crime and placed in a jail cell, the police may place a government informant disguised as a prisoner in the cell with the defendant. If the informant asks the defendant questions, the defendant's answers cannot be used against the defendant at trial. If the informant does not actively elicit information from the defendant, and the defendant makes incriminating statements to the informant, the defendant's incriminating statements may be used against him at his trial.

In Patterson v. Illinois (1988) the Supreme Court ruled that a defendant who agreed to waive his Sixth Amendment right to counsel after he was given the Miranda warnings had made a knowing and intelligent waiver of his right to counsel and that his subsequent confession could be used against him. All questions whether a defendant waived his constitutional rights prior to confessing to a crime are to be determined by reference to the MIRANDA RULES, which comprise the third limitation on confessions.

In MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) the Supreme Court held that the police may not interrogate a person who is in police custody (or who has otherwise been deprived of his freedom by the police) unless the police clearly inform the person (1) that he has a right to remain silent; (2) that anything he says may be used against him in court; (3) that he has the right to an attorney and to have an attorney present during any questioning; and (4) that an attorney will be appointed for him if he is INDIGENT.

What happens after the suspect is given the Miranda warnings? If, following the Miranda warnings, the defendant "knowingly" and "intelligently" waives his right to remain silent and his right to an attorney, the police may interrogate him, and his subsequent confession may be used against him. If the person in custody indicates (either before or during the interrogation) that he does not want to talk to the police, the police must stop questioning the person. However, if the defendant has not requested an attorney, the police may at a later time give the defendant the Miranda warnings again and ask whether the defendant will waive his rights and talk with them. If the defendant says either before or during questioning that he wants to meet with an attorney, the police may not question the defendant at any later time, or ask the defendant at a later time to waive his rights, until the defendant has met with an attorney.

In the 1980s the Supreme Court ruled that a defendant's WAIVER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS after the Miranda warnings would be effective unless the police had used unfair coercive methods to secure his waiver. In Colorado v. Spring (1987) the Court held that a defendant who had waived his rights after receiving the Miranda warnings did not have a right to be informed as to the nature of the charges that might be brought against him or the nature of the crime that was being investigated. In Moran v. Burbine (1986) the Court held that a defendant made a "knowing and intelligent" waiver of his rights following Miranda warnings, so that his statements could be used against him at trial, even though the police who gave him the warnings failed to tell him that an attorney had attempted to contact him.

The police are not required to use any specific set of words to inform the defendant of his rights so long as the statements made by the police to the defendant encompass the substance of the Miranda warnings. For example, in Duckworth v. Eagan (1989) the police gave the defendant the Miranda warnings and then added, "We have no way of giving a lawyer, but one will be appointed for you, if you wish, if and when you go to court." The Supreme Court found that the statement did not undercut the substance of the Miranda warnings because it did not induce the defendant to waive his rights to forgo the presence of counsel at questioning. Therefore, the defendant's subsequent waiver of his rights was a valid waiver; his confession could be used against him.

In the 1980s confession cases, the Supreme Court was lenient in admitting into evidence incriminating statements made by defendants so long as the police did not engage in any coercive activity. However, the Court continues to protect the integrity of the adversary process by requiring police to honor a defendant's request for an attorney and to avoid any attempt at gaining information from a defendant outside of the presence of his counsel after judicial proceedings have been instituted against the defendant.

JOHN E. NOWAK
(1992)

Bibliography

KAMIZAR, YALE; LAFAVE, WAYNE R.; and ISRAEL, JEROLD H. 1990 Modern Criminal Procedure: Cases, Comments, and Questions, 7th ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. and ISRAEL, JEROLD H. 1985 Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

POLICE INTERROGATION AND CONFESSIONS (Update 2)

Three constitutional law DOCTRINES may make a confession of a crime inadmissible in court. First, it may violate DUE PROCESS OF LAW for the prosecution to use a defendant's involuntary confession against him. In determining whether a confession is involuntary, a court ordinarily considers the totality of the circumstances, including the environment and techniques of police interrogation and the interrogee's special characteristics of strength or weakness. A court may also consider the need for interrogation in the particular case. If the suspect refuses to speak or demands to see a lawyer, the police need not stop the interrogation. Police persistence will be a relevant point against admissibility, but not necessarily a determinative one. The inherent vagueness of the involuntariness doctrine has made it hard for courts to be consistent. The vagueness of the involuntariness rule has also made it possible for courts to hold confessions admissible even though obtained by significant police pressure.

Second, admission of an incriminating statement into evidence may also violate the Sixth Amendment RIGHT TO COUNSEL if the prosecution uses a statement that the police or their agents have deliberately elicited from a suspect, after the onset of adversary judicial proceedings, without first obtaining a valid waiver of the right to counsel. This doctrine affords suspects no protection in the vast majority of cases since police interrogation ordinarily occurs before any judicial proceeding has taken place.

The third relevant doctrine is found in the MIRANDA RULES, which were developed to protect the Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. These rules make inadmissible any incriminating statements obtained by police interrogation of a person in custody unless the police have first given a proper Miranda warning and obtained a valid waiver of both the right against self-incrimination and the right to counsel. If the suspect asserts the right against self-incrimination, the police must disengage from the interrogation. However, the police may later reengage the suspect for the purpose of soliciting a waiver. If the suspect asserts the right to counsel, the police must also disengage. However, the police may not later solicit a waiver unless the suspect has first initiated some case-related communication with the police. Miranda is thus more protective of the suspect than the involuntariness rule, which does not require the police to disengage or take no for an answer.

Must the police disengage if the suspect makes an ambiguous reference to counsel (e.g., "Maybe I should talk to a lawyer.")? In Davis v. United States (1994), the Supreme Court unanimously held that disengagement was not required. Five justices additionally held that the police were under no obligation to clarify the ambiguity and could immediately proceed with the interrogation. This holding continues the long-standing denigration of Miranda, weakens its protectiveness, and thus throws more cases into the uncertain coverage of the involuntariness rule.

LAWRENCE HERMAN
(2000)

Bibliography

HERMAN, LAWRENCE 1987 The Supreme Court, The Attorney General, and the Good Old Days of Police Interrogation. Ohio State Law Journal 48:733–755.

——— 1992 The Unexplored Relationship Between the Privilege Against Compulsory Self-Incrimination and the Involuntary Confession Rule (Parts I and II). Ohio State Law Journal 53:101–209, 497–553.

LEO, RICHARD A. and THOMAS, GEORGE C., III 1998 The Miranda Debate: Law, Justice, and Policing. Boston: Northeastern University Press.

POLICE POWER

The police power is the general power of a government to legislate for the comfort, safety, health, morals, or welfare of the citizenry or the prosperity and good order of the community.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Inalienable Police Power; National Police Power; Reserved Police Power; State Police Power.)

POLICE PURSUITS AND CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

In County of Sacramento v. Lewis (1998), the Supreme Court sent an unfortunate message to innocent citizens trapped in the midst of vehicular police pursuits: they lack the constitutional protections afforded those injured by the unrestricted use of firearms by the police.

Although no single government agency maintains an exhaustive accounting of all pursuits in a given year, from 1980 to 1996, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration reported 5,306 vehicular-pursuit deaths in the United States. Despite the staggering frequency of pursuits ending in tragedies, the Supreme Court declined to consider the police vehicle as a deadly weapon for which officers should train with the same attention as that afforded the use of firearms.

In Tennessee v. Garner (1985), the Supreme Court curtailed the unrestricted use of firearms against suspected criminals by stating: "The use of deadly force to prevent the escape of all felony suspects, whatever the circumstances, is constitutionally unreasonable. It is not better that all felony suspects die than that they escape."

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit relied upon Tennessee v. Garner and reversed a lower court's grant of summary judgment in favor of a police officer who engaged in a vehicular pursuit of two unarmed youths on a motorcycle who posed no threat of imminent harm to human life. The pursuit ended in the death of the minor passenger, Philip Lewis. In a lawsuit filed against the county and the pursuing officer, James Everet Smith, Lewis's parents asserted that the chase violated their son's FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS rights.

In reversing the Ninth Circuit, the Supreme Court ruled that rather than deliberate indifference to their son's constitutional rights, the Lewis's were required to establish that the pursuing officer's conduct was so egregious and outrageous that it "shocks the conscience." What is shocking is the Supreme Court's failure to recognize an officer's fundamental duty to weigh the risks of a vehicular pursuit against the need for immediate apprehension. If that analysis is constitutionally required when an officer reaches into his or her holster, then it must also extend when that officer decides to launch a two-ton vehicle through a community.

LYNNE A. DUNN
(2000)

Bibliography

ALPERT, GEOFFREY P. 1997 The Constitutional Implications of High Speed Police Pursuit Under A Substantive Due Process Analysis: Homeward Through The Haze. University of Memphis Law Review 27:599–662.

ALPERT, GEOFFREY P. and FRIDELL, LORIE A. 1992 Police Vehicles and Firearms: Instruments of Deadly Force. Prospect Heights, Ill.: Waverly Press.

FALCONE, DAVID 1992 Police Pursuit in Pursuit of Policy: The Pursuit Issue, Legal and Literature Review and An Empirical Study. Normal, Ill.: Illinois State University Press.

POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEES

For political action committees (PACs) and for all other contributors to campaigns for public office, the modern constitutional era began in 1976 with the Supreme Court's decision in BUCKLEY V. VALEO. In sorting out the constitutionality of the many parts of the FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT (FECA) of 1971 and 1974, the Court reaffirmed the protections of the FIRST AMENDMENT'S FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY AND ASSOCIATION for PACs, citing a long line of precedents that included NAACP V. ALABAMA (1958). The Court further held all campaign contributions and expenditures to be the expression of political views and thus protected by the First Amendment.

The protections of the First Amendment notwithstanding, the Court permitted much of the congressional regulation of PACs in the FECA to stand as a legitimate exercise of Congress's right to prevent "corruption or the appearance of corruption." All PAC contributions are limited to $5,000 per candidate per election. Moreover, in California Medical Association v. FEC (1981), Congress was within its constitutional powers in forbidding them to accept more than $5,000 per year from any group or individual. But because the Court in Buckley extended greater protections to campaign spending than to campaign contributions, PACs are free to pursue unregulated independent spending in campaigns—spending done, that is, without the cooperation or knowledge of the candidate being aided.

For a subset of PACs, those with sponsoring parent organizations, the burden of regulation is heavier. If a parent organization is a corporation or labor union, it is (and has long been) prohibited under federal law (and the laws of some states) from making direct political expenditures. The PAC, then, must be a "separate, segregated fund" that raises its own money for its political spending. The parent organization, however, is free under federal law to pay the overhead costs of the PAC and to direct its decisions. PACs with parent organizations are further restricted by law in their fund-raising: PACSs of membership organizations may solicit only their members; with a few rarely used exceptions, union PACs may solicit only their members; and corporate PACs may solicit only stockholders and nonunion employees. These limits were upheld in FEC v. National Right to Work Committee (1982).

Even though the major constitutional precedents in this area have arisen largely in cases under the FECA, they apply to state legislation as well—with one exception. In Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley (1981) the Court ruled that those states with initiative and referendum elections are less free to limit PAC contributions in those elections. Because no potential officeholders receive campaign funds during such elections, there is no possibility of the campaign contributions eventually corrupting public officials.

By 1988 there were 4,268 PACs registered under federal law as against 608 in 1974; their contributions to congressional candidates had jumped from $12.5 million in 1974 to $148.1 million in 1988. That growth has given rise to proposals for new restrictions, proposals that have raised new constitutional questions. President GEORGE BUSH in 1989 proposed that PACs with parent organizations be banned. No details were forthcoming, but certainly an outright ban would raise serious constitutional issues, more than, say, a change in the law to prohibit parent organizations from paying PAC overhead costs. Other common proposals would cut the limit on PAC contributions to candidates from $5,000 to $3,500 or even lower. One must determine, however, at what point restrictions on contributions become an invasion of First Amendment rights. Still other proposals would limit the total receipts a candidate might accept from PACs. As limits on receipts appear to stand logically between limits on contributions and limits on spending, these, too, would appear to be in a zone of constitutional uncertainty.

Clearly, the Supreme Court has not moved very far into the balancing of the legitimate regulatory interests of Congress and the First Amendment rights of PACs. It has in fact dealt only with one extended piece of legislation at one point in time; Congress has passed no major regulation of PACs since 1976, and the states began to do so only in the late 1980s. New issues will reach the courts (e.g., state limits on candidates' receipts from PACs), forcing new constitutional interpretations. Moreover, the changing status quo in campaign finance, and especially the growth of PACs, put old rules and precedents in a new legislative context.

FRANK J. SORAUF
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Campaign Finance.)

Bibliography

GOTTLIEB, STEPHEN E. 1985 Fleshing Out the Right of Association: The Problem of the Contribution Limits of the Federal Election Campaign Act. Albany Law Review 49:825–854.

SORAUF, FRANK J. 1986 Caught in a Political Thicket: The Supreme Court and Campaign Finance. Constitutional Commentary 3:97–121.

POLITICAL PARTIES

The United States Constitution is virtually silent on politics. It touches upon elections, but even here the subject is treated in a most gingerly fashion by delegating the power to set the "Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives" to the legislature of each state. Even the qualification for voting in national elections was left to the states, by the provision that whoever was qualified to vote for members of the "most numerous branch of the State Legislature" could also vote for members of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Founders saw peril in politics. The Constitution was an effort to provide a solution to politics. To JAMES MADISON in THE FEDERALIST #10, one of the greatest virtues of the Constitution was that it provided an antidote to the "mischiefs of faction." Because attempting to prevent the emergence of faction would be a cure worse than the disease, the only alternative was to provide a system of FEDERALISM on a continental scale so that no faction or conspiracy among factions could reach majority size, thereby becoming a party. Representative government centered in a legislature became the superior form of government because the "temporary or partial considerations" of factions would be regulated by "passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens, whose wisdom . . . will be more consonant to the public good than if pronounced by the people themselves. . . ." GEORGE WASHINGTON in his Farewell Address (the drafting of which was shared by Madison and ALEXANDER HAMILTON) warned of "the danger of parties in the State [founded on] geographical discriminations [and] against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally."

The Constitution was designed also to solve the political problems inherent in the presidency. In effect, Article II provided for a two-tiered presidential selection: nomination by the electors and election by the House of Representatives. Under the original Article II the process began with selection of electors in a manner provided by each state legislature. In the first election under the Constitution, in 1788–1789, the electors were chosen by legislature in seven states and by voters in six. Next, electors were to meet in their state capitals, never nationally. There is no ELECTORAL COLLEGE; that term is nowhere to be found in the Constitution or in The Federalist. At the prescribed meeting at the state capital each elector had the right and obligation to cast ballots for two persons—not two votes, but separate votes for two different people, one not from the same state as the elector. If a candidate received an absolute majority of all electoral votes, he was declared the President; the candidate with the second largest vote became vice-president. If no candidate received an absolute majority, the House of Representatives would choose from the top five names, with each state having one vote, regardless of the population of the state. If two candidates received an absolute majority in a tie vote (as happened between THOMAS JEFFERSON and AARON BURR in 1800), the House would choose between the top two.

This system was virtually designed to produce a parliamentary government—a strong executive elected by the lower house of the legislature. During the first two decades of the Republic, the primary functions of the national government were to implement the scheme of government contemplated by the Constitution, and that required one-time-only policies, such as the establishment of the major departments, the establishment of the judiciary, and the exercise of SOVEREIGNTY as a nation-state among nation-states, manifest in various kinds of treaties. Policies had to be adopted to assume all the debts previously incurred by the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS and the national government under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION; laws were also adopted to assume all the debts incurred during the war by the thirteen states. All these policies and many others emanated from the executive branch. Congress looked to President Washington for leadership and accepted Secretary of the Treasury Alexander Hamilton as Washington's representative. Although consensus around Washington was replaced with polarization, even before JOHN ADAMS became President, the Federalists carried the necessary majorities through legislative meetings (caucuses) led mainly by Hamilton. But at the same time, all the power to enact the policies—all the power "expressly delegated" to the national government by Article I, section 8—was lodged in Congress. Inevitably, politics came out as a modified parliamentarism, with a strong executive elected by the lower house.

These arrangements seem to have been intentional on the part of the Framers of the Constitution. Without a national meeting, and with each elector having to cast ballots for two separate persons, it was to be expected that several candidates for President would be identified. The concept of the "favorite son" actually goes back to George Washington himself, and the expectation that there would be a large number of favorite sons is strongly implied by the provision that in the event of no absolute majority the top five names would be submitted to the House. Surely this means that more than five meaningful candidates would normally be produced and that final election in the House would be the norm also. With this modified parliamentary system, the Constitution and politics became synonymous. The politics of the two to three decades of the founding period followed the lines prescribed by the Constitution—or, to put it another way, flowed fairly strictly within channels established by the Constitution.

This original system was transformed within a generation following the founding. At some point during the Jefferson administration, the regime of the founding was replaced by a regime of ordinary government. One-time-only policies were replaced by routine and repeatable policies, such as INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, land grants, personal claims, tariffs, PATENTS, surveys, and other services. This type of national government is precisely what was intended by Article I, section 8. The TENTH AMENDMENT (1791) merely made more explicit what was already unmistakably clear in Article I, that the important powers of governing were to be reserved to the states. What was not intended, however, was that the political solution prevailing during the first generation would come unstuck. Political parties had already emerged despite Washington's warnings, and the discipline of their members virtually destroyed the so-called Electoral College by requiring that each elector be pledged to a presidential candidate "nominated" prior to their selection as electors. Political parties captured the nominating phase of presidential selection. For twenty years thereafter the method of nomination was by legislative caucus—derisively called King Caucus. As the two major parties spread their influence to districts where they had voters but no members of Congress, the party leaders had to work out a method of nomination more representative than King Caucus. That solution, the presidential nominating convention, was adopted in 1832 and remained the institution of party government until 1952.

The national party system was by this time no longer working within prescribed constitutional channels but had created some new channels for itself. More significantly, the party system in the 1820s and 1830s created a realm of politics independent of the Constitution.

In another sense, however, the Constitution was having the last word. First, Congress had become the central power of the national government. There was no longer any development toward parliamentary government but clearly toward congressional government, as WOODROW WILSON put it in his important text later in the nineteenth century. Second, the nominating convention, in providing the President with a popular base independent of Congress, produced the SEPARATION OF POWERS that many feel the Constitution had intended—a system of coequal branches each with its own separate constituency.

Third, and most important, the functions of the national government had come more into proportion with the intent of Article I, section 8. That is to say, a politics independent of the Constitution came only at the expense of the kinds of functions the national government had been required to perform during the founding decades. In fact, the relationship ought to be put the other way around. The change of functions from the one-time-only policies of the founding to the ordinary policies of the rest of the nineteenth century had been responsible for the political changes, thus confirming a fundamental and well-nigh universal pattern: every regime tends to create a politics consonant with itself. Thus, when the regime (the Constitution and its government) of the founding shifted to a regime of policies arising literally under the provisions of Article I, section 8, politics changed accordingly. For more than a century after 1832 the national government was congressional government; the national politics during that epoch was a function of party government; and together, government and politics were consistent with, and reinforced, a strictly federal Constitution in which the national government had a highly limited and specialized role in the life of the country.

A third regime emerged out of the NEW DEAL, not from the increased size of the national government but from the addition to that government of significant new functions. The significant departure from tradition arose out of the enactment of a large number of policies that can be understood only as regulatory and redistributive policies. In effect, the national government acquired its own POLICE POWERS and added its own regulatory and redistributive policies to those of the states. These additions—which were validated by the Supreme Court—brought on a third regime.

Congress did more than enact the new policies that gave the national government its new functions and its directly coercive relationship to citizens. Congress also literally created a new form of government by delegating powers to the executive branch. Each of the new regulatory policies adopted by Congress identified broadly the contours of a problem and then delegated to the executive virtually all the discretion necessary to formulate the actual rules to be imposed on citizens. Technically, this is called the DELEGATION OF POWER, and the rationalization was that Congress had indeed passed the law and left to administrative agencies the power only to "fill in the details." But in fact the executive branch filled in more than details. Just as Woodrow Wilson called the national government of the nineteenth century congressional government, we can with no greater distortion entitle the regime following the New Deal as presidential government.

National politics began to change accordingly. Signs of the weakening of party democracy were already fairly clear during the New Deal. President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT had tried to rebuild the Democratic party into a programmatic kind of presidential party. The most dramatic moment in that effort was the "purge of 1938," an unprecedented effort by a President to defeat or demote the opposition within his own party in order to make it into a modern instrument of program development and enactment. History records that Roosevelt failed, but the meaning of that failure was not lost on the Democrats or Republicans: the President can no longer depend on locally organized opportunistic parties and must develop his own, independent base of popular support. If this support could no longer be found through political parties, the President would have to do it directly, through the media of mass communication. The President's constituency became the public en masse.

The presidential conventions of 1952 were the last of the traditional conventions, where parties still controlled the nominations through the control that state party leaders had over the delegates. And if ANDREW JACKSON can be considered the revolutionary who gave birth to the national conventions, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER was a revolutionary who turned them into vestigial organs. As the 1952 Republican Convention approached, the Eisenhower forces had to confront the fact that ROBERT A. TAFT was ahead. Their only available strategy was to question the credentials of several state delegations whose members, pledged to Taft, had been selected by the traditional method of virtual appointment by state leaders and were pledged to vote slavishly for the candidate designated by the state leadership. Failing to convince the credentials committee, the Eisenhower leaders took their objections to the convention floor in the form of a "fair play" motion. The debate took place over national television—despite Taft's objections—and the Eisenhower motion swayed enough neutral delegations to gain the majority vote and the momentum sufficient to win the nomination. More important than the immediate victory was the long-range result, which was to weaken the foundations of the traditional party system itself. Progressively from that time, delegates came to be treated as factors in their own right, as individuals to be courted rather than as pawns within a state delegation controlled by state party leaders.

Once the delegates became meaningful individuals, the process of selection had to be democratized. Just as the nominating convention once was a means of democratizing the legislative caucus, the primaries became the means of democratizing conventions. But the primaries are as much a reflection as a cause of the decline of party government, including the decline of party control of the presidential selection process. Party government was already seriously undermined before the spread of selection of pledged delegates by primary elections. The transformed convention was, then, a reflection of the broader process of the decline of state and national political parties. The presidential nomination was becoming an open process by which presidential candidates amassed individual delegates, who had little in common with each other or with the candidate to whom they were pledged. The popular base of the presidency became a mass base. It was no longer the outcome of a process by which state party leaders and their delegations formed coalitions around the candidate most likely to win the nomination and election for President.

Serious students of American political parties have been arguing for more than a decade over the political reforms of the 1960s and 1970s associated with the loosening of the national parties and the virtual displacement of the national conventions. Some argue that the decline of political parties and of the convention as the institution of party government was unintentionally caused by the reforms. Others argue that parties had already declined and that the decline of conventions as the real decision-making body was already happening; therefore, the reforms were more a reflection of the decline than a cause of it. Most significant, however, is the emergence of the new regime: a new form of politics consonant with the regime of regulation and redistribution, with its presidential government.

Many of the current disagreements continue because we are still in the midst of the transformation and the ultimate form has not yet fully emerged. Two distinct scenarios or models can be drawn from the prevailing political analyses. One is "dealignment," tending toward mass democracy—that is, a direct relationship between the President and the masses of people unmediated by any representative institution at all, whether party or legislature. The second scenario is an alignment or realignment model anticipating the restoration of the two major parties. Such a development could require the abolition of some reforms instituted in the 1960s and 1970s that radically unhinged certain features of the traditional party system, and adoption of new measures aimed at restoring the power of party bosses in the presidential nominating process.

The resolution is likely to be a fusion of the two models. The entire functioning of the national government has come to rest upon the President; the expectations of all Americans focus there, and the relationship between the President and the people will continue to be direct. This is the essence of mass politics. At the same time, however, there is strong evidence of a resurgence in the headquarters of the national political parties. Yet there is no place for these parties in the direct line of communication between the President and his mass base. Thus, if these parties are to survive and prosper at the national level they will have to find functions other than the traditional ones of intervening between the masses and the President by controlling the nominating process and political campaigns. The creation of such new functions would require the national leadership to organize from the bottom up, district by district, but in fact the national headquarters are organizing from the top down. They are developing their base in the electorate by collecting data for the computerized analysis of categories of voters. These techniques permit efficient mass mailings to solicit voters and, more important, sponsors who will make millions of donations in units of less than $50 apiece. These are not electoral parties in the traditional sense. Nor are they European-style "mass parties" or social democratic parties. They are what, for lack of an established word, can be called "taxation parties," whose main function is to defray the tremendous cost of the capital necessary to maintain the computers, collect the data, analyze the data, write the letters and stuff the envelopes, and design and communicate the spot announcements and other commercial messages on extremely expensive network television.

American national politics has been in a state of transition for a long time. Professional students of elections, polling, and political parties have all been expecting some kind of "realignment" at least since 1964. Major reforms of the parties and of elections have followed each presidential election since that time; their main result has been to prevent forever the outcome of the previous convention and election. Although the Democrats have been the major reformers, mainly because they have been the major losers in national elections, the Republicans have followed them in these reforms almost immediately. The national political process has not yet adjusted effectively to the regime of regulation and redistribution. In other words, although politics ultimately takes some form consonant with the regime, there is no guaranteeing that the adjustments will be successful and stable.

This fact points to the most important contrast between the present regime and the two previous ones: National politics is flowing through channels increasingly independent of the Constitution; that is, efforts to restore party government have been oblivious to the historic relationship between the Constitution and politics.

This is not to suggest that politics is operating unconstitutionally or outside the spirit of Supreme Court decisions. It means only that efforts to restore the parties, and to reform nominations and elections accordingly, have concentrated on the flow itself rather than on the constitutional structure that ultimately determines the flow. Having recognized the many problems with American politics since the New Deal, reformers have attempted to change the politics. They have persisted in this approach even while recognizing two grievous perils in it. First, because some interests inevitably gain or lose from any political reform, there is always a suspicion that these gains were known and sought in advance. The legitimacy of the system can be badly hurt by the more generalized suspicion that the established electoral process is being manipulated. Second, some reform efforts have come close to violating the FIRST AMENDMENT, and in fact the Supreme Court declared such a violation in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976), striking down a law attempting to set limits on the amounts individuals could spend in campaigns. That case is definitely not the end of litigation involving First Amendment rights involved in political reforms. (See POLITICAL PARTIES AND THE SUPREME COURT.)

Politics can be understood as the never-ending process of adjusting to a given structure of government, or regime, by seeking sufficient power and consensus to change the structure or influence its direction. If a change in the conduct of politics is sought, the appropriate route is the exercise of the historic right to change the Constitution and the structure of government. The forms of politics would change accordingly. We have constitutional rights to change our government. As Madison argued in The Federalist #10, the attempt to regulate politics is a cure worse than the disease. If there are problems with American national politics—and there appears to be wide agreement on this proposition throughout the political spectrum—then the time may have come to reexamine the structure of government, including the Constitution itself. An extensive revision of the Constitution is neither necessary nor appropriate. The last major constitutional change was triggered by the New Deal, without a single constitutional amendment. Once we recognize that politics is most stable and most respected when it is consonant with constitutional forms, reformers might be convinced to focus at least some of their energies away from political reform and toward constitutional reform.

THEODORE J. LOWI
(1986)

Bibliography

AGAR, HERBERT 1966 The Price of Union. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

BINCKLEY, WILFRED 1947 President and Congress. New York: Knopf.

BURNHAM, WALTER DEAN 1970 Critical Elections and the Mainsprings of American Politics. New York: Norton.

CHARLES, JOSEPH 1961 The Origins of the American Party System. New York: Harper & Row.

GINSBER, BENJAMIN 1982 The Consequences of Consent. Reading, Mass.: Addison-Wesley.

LOWI, THEODORE J. (1967) 1975 Party, Policy and Constitution in America. In William N. Chambers and Walter Dean Burnham, eds., The American Party System—Stages of Political Development. New York: Oxford University Press.

POLSBY, NELSON 1983 Consequences of Party Reform. New York: Oxford University Press.

SHEFTER, MARTIN 1978 Party Bureaucracy and Political Change. In Louis Maisel and Joseph Cooper, eds., Political Parties: Development and Decay. Beverly Hills, Calif.: Sage Publications.

POLITICAL PARTIES
(Update)

The judiciary has struggled to build a coherent jurisprudential approach to the constitutional handling of political parties. The difficulty of this task is due in large part to the absence of parties from the text of the Constitution itself. The Framers were indifferent, if not outright hostile, to political parties and made no provision for them in the constitutional scheme.

Indeed, the very structure of the Constitution makes it difficult for parties to flourish. The dispersal of power among branches and levels of government, the system of CHECKS AND BALANCES, the delegation of a large measure of the definition of party authority to state law, all combine to create a constitutional environment inhospitable to parties. Parties and the party system are always in some tension with the Constitution.

Yet FIRST AMENDMENT protections of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and the FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION have been extended to include political parties. The Supreme Court has considered the constitutional status of parties in a variety of contexts, from the propriety of party PATRONAGE practices to the parties' role in BALLOT ACCESS. In the process, the Court has been influential in determining how parties function. Yet, the parties' extraconstitutional nature has prevented the Court from treating them in a consistent or theoretically sound manner. The Court appears to lack a clear normative understanding of parties; it has often been indifferent to them as tools of representative democracy.

Constitutional disputes implicating political parties continue to find their way to the court. In Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. FEC (1996), the REHNQUIST COURT rendered a relatively party-friendly decision in the realm of CAMPAIGN FINANCE. Building on the leading decision of BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976), the Court determined that party spending independent of a specific candidate's campaign was constitutionally protected and not subject to statutory limits. The consequences of the decision demonstrate in dramatic fashion the practical impact of the Court on the electoral process. The national parties responded by spending unprecedented amounts of so-called soft money—that is, money contributed to the parties rather than to specific candidates—bolstering financial support for candidates on all levels. The decision may, in the end, yield more integrated and cohesive parties. At the same time, recent developments have intensified the demands for reform of an electoral system considered already too expensive. Interestingly, four of the nine Justices in the case were prepared to cast aside as unconstitutional any restrictions on parties' role in financing electoral campaigns. That question may well come before the Court in the not-so-distant future.

The uniquely American two-party system itself came under scrutiny in TIMMONS V. TWIN CITIES AREA NEW PARTY (1996). The two major parties perpetuate their control of state legislatures by imposing ballot access and public financing laws disadvantageous to minor parties. In Timmons, the Court rejected a constitutional attack on this legal entrenchment of the two-party system. The Court upheld a state ban on fusion, a practice used by minor parties to gain exposure by nominating as their candidate someone who has also been endorsed or nominated by one of the major parties. The Court found a state interest in promoting political stability through a healthy two-party system; states are thus constitutionally free to maintain the substantial barriers facing third parties in the American political arena. This judicially sanctioned party duopoly further insulates the major parties from minor party challenges; in the process, the Court may become an obstacle to party reform. By diminishing the associational rights of minor parties, the Court may be complicit in propping up a party system that fails the test of representativeness.

The Rehnquist Court's decisions, however, have not been uniformly party friendly. In Morse v. Republican Party of Virginia (1996), the Court impaired the autonomy and associational rights of parties to define for themselves how they conduct their PRIMARY ELECTIONS.

Despite the short-term advantages the Timmons and Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee cases might confer upon the major parties, their ultimate impact depends on the extent to which the parties can use them to sharpen their traditional democratic functions, and demonstrate clearly that they are worthy of constitutionally protected freedom.

DAVID K. RYDEN
(2000)

Bibliography

EPSTEIN, LEON 1986 Political Parties in the American Mold. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

ISSACHAROFF, SAMUEL; KARLAN, PAMELA S.; and PILDES, RICHARD H. 1998 The Law of Democracy: Legal Structures of the Political Process. New York: Foundation Press.

LOWENSTEIN, DANIEL H. 1995 Election Law: Cases and Materials. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press.

RYDEN, DAVID K. 1996 Representation in Crisis: The Constitution, Interest Groups, and Political Parties. New York: State University of New York Press.

——— 1999 'The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly': The Judicial Shaping of Party Activities. Pages 50–65 in John Green and Daniel Shea, eds., The State of the Parties, 3rd ed. Boulder, Colo.: Roman & Littlefield.

POLITICAL PARTIES, ELECTIONS, AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Since the mid-1980s the Supreme Court has decided three significant FIRST AMENDMENT cases affecting POLITICAL PARTIES and one that will hamper states' efforts to reform the INITIATIVE process.

In Tashjian v. Republican Party of Connecticut (1986), the REPUBLICAN PARTY sought to "open" its PRIMARY ELECTION for high-level offices by permitting independent voters to participate, but the Democratic legislature refused to modify statutes limiting participation to party registrants. The Supreme Court held that the First Amendment FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION guarantees a party the right to control its own nomination process; it therefore ruled that state law could not prohibit the Republicans from opening their primary.

Tashjian was a mixed blessing for adherents of the party-renewal movement, who were pleased by the extension of association rights to parties but who tend to favor a closed primary as more conducive to strong political parties with relatively sharp ideological focus. The party renewalists welcomed more uniformly the Court's unanimous decision in Eu v. San Francisco County Democratic Central Committee (1989), which relied on the parties' right of association to rule that state legislation can neither prevent party committees from endorsing candidates in primary elections nor require a particular governing structure for party organizations.

In Tashjian and Eu, the Court ignored a point that has been made by numerous commentators, that the extension of rights of association to parties is in tension with Smith v. Allwright (1944) and other cases, which treated parties, at least when they are conducting primary elections, as instrumentalities of the state for purposes of the doctrine of STATE ACTION. Within the logic of the state action doctrine, it may be anomalous for the same entity to be treated as part of the state and yet to enjoy constitutional rights against the state. Nevertheless, the conclusion that parties should be protected by the First Amendment and at the same time barred from denying EQUAL PROTECTION and other constitutional rights to citizens is not likely to offend many people.

A more serious deficiency in the Court's approach is its failure to recognize that party associational claims may reflect intraparty disputes rather than the typical CIVIL LIBERTIES claim by a private person against the state. This was not the case in Tashjian, where, as Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL noted in his majority opinion, a united Republican party was prevented from opening its primary by Democratic legislators. But in Eu the statutes governing each major party reflected the wishes of that party's delegation in the state legislature.

Eu establishes that over some range of decision making affecting parties, the wishes of state party committees or other extragovernmental party structures will prevail when they conflict with the wishes of the party's elected officials as reflected in state legislation. Mere invocation of the concept of freedom of association cannot establish that this result will strengthen parties in the long run or have other desirable consequences.

In RUTAN V. REPUBLICAN PARTY OF ILLINOIS (1990), the Court significantly extended the range of its antipatronage doctrine. In Elrod v. Burns (1976) and BRANTI V. FINKEL (1980), the Court had held that to fire nonpolicymaking PUBLIC EMPLOYEES because of nonaffiliation with the party in power violated the employees' First Amendment rights of speech and association. In Rutan this principle was extended to transfers, promotions, and even hiring of public employees based on party affiliation.

Whereas Tashjian and Eu have been welcomed by many as empowering parties, Rutan has been criticized as weakening them. As Justice LEWIS F. POWELL argued in dissent in Elrod, the prospect of reward often has been a stronger inducement to party activism than ideological conviction, and at many times and in many places, the main reward for party service has been public employment.

It may be doubted whether any of the recent party decisions actually will have the pro- or antiparty effects that have been ascribed to them. The actual points at issue in Tashjian and Eu—open or closed primaries, party endorsements in primary elections, details of party governance—are not likely to have more than marginal consequences for the American party system. For example, some have hoped that the availability of party endorsements in primaries would permit party organizations to impose party discipline on public officials. But in the first primary held in California after the Eu decision, the Republican party opted not to make endorsements and the two statewide candidates in competitive races who were endorsed by the Democratic party were losers in the primary.

If Tashjian and Eu were extended to the point that parties could not be required by state law to use primaries at all to select their candidates, the effect on the American system could be considerable. Though Justice ANTONIN SCALIA argued in dissent that just such a result was implied by Tashjian, there is no reason to expect the majority to press its reasoning that far. Even if it does, perhaps few, if any, party organizations would opt for nomination processes that could be perceived as less democratic than primaries.

The patronage cases, if enforced in a different era, might have had major effects. Even by the time of Elrod, patronage practices had declined sharply in most parts of the United States. Rutan may deliver a deathblow to patronage more surely than Elrod did, but even so, its effects on the political system should be limited to relatively few localities.

Meyer v. Grant (1988), though not affecting political parties, will be a significant restraint in those states whose STATE CONSITITUTIONS provide for the initiative process. Meyer struck down a Colorado statute that prohibited the use of paid circulators to qualify initiative measures for the ballot.

Meyer came just as the "initiative industry" was exploding in California and beginning to spread to other initiative states. This industry assures a ballot position for proponents with deep pockets while rendering volunteer petition drives virtually obsolete.

As popular resistance grows to increased numbers of initiative measures proposed by well-funded but sometimes narrowly based groups, state legislatures are likely to look for ways of evading Meyers v. Grant or, if no such ways can be found, to increase the signature requirements as a means of cutting the number of proposals that qualify for the ballot.

DANIEL H. LOWENSTEIN
(1992)

Bibliography

EPSTEIN, LEON D. 1986 Political Parties in the American Mold. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

LOWENSTEIN, DANIEL HAYS and STERN, ROBERT M. 1989 The

First Amendment and Paid Initiative Petition Circulators: A Dissenting View and a Proposal. Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 17:175–224.

POLITICAL PARTIES IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

"No America without democracy, no democracy without politics, no politics without parties. . . ." So begins Clinton Rossiter's commentary on American political parties. Nonetheless, the Supreme Court has said in Elrod v. Burns (1976) that "partisan politics bears the imprimatur only of tradition, not the Constitution." Despite the absence of constitutional reference to political parties, the Constitution has had substantial influence in shaping the two-party system and in defining the contested boundary between governmental authority and political party autonomy.

Frank Sorauf has observed that "[t]he major American political parties are in truth three-headed political giants, tripartite systems of interactions. . . . As a political structure they include a party organization, a party in office, and a party in the electorate. . . ." All three branches of political parties are defined, limited, and authorized, at least in part, by constitutional DOCTRINE. All three are shaped in part by specific constitutional arrangements.

Two-party politics, which has persisted throughout the nation's history, began in the struggle between FEDERALISTS and ANTI-FEDERALISTS over the RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. Provisions of the Constitution have reinforced the two-party system, especially Article II, section 1, empowering each state to select presidential electors, and the TWELFTH AMENDMENT, requiring an absolute majority of the ELECTORAL COLLEGE or, failing that, of state delegations in the House of Representatives for election of the President. The majority rule tends to compel the coalition of disparate factions into two parties, because only the establishment of broad coalitions offers any prospect of securing the majority necessary for election of the President.

Although no constitutional rule requires that members of the House of Representatives be elected by plurality vote or from single-member districts, these understandings soon took root after ratification of the Constitution. The popular election of the United States senators mandated by the SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT has the effect of creating single-member districts for the selection of members of that house. These constitutional practices strengthen the two-party system, requiring broad coalitions to secure a majority, the only guarantee of electoral victory under these rules.

The Constitution's provision for a federal structure of government also shapes the party system. Unlike the majority rule's incentive for factions to consolidate into two parties, the federal structure encourages wide dispersion of influence within the party ranks. Because offices and powers at the state and local levels are more accessible and often more important than those in the national government, party organizations in each state and locale grow independent of one another and are largely free from sanctions imposed by any national party organization. This dispersion of party organization is heightened by the mandate of Article I, section 1, and the Twelfth Amendment for state-by-state selection of the electors who choose the President.

States began to regulate political parties in the late eighteenth century, and these regulations became commonplace during the Progressive era. The STATE POLICE POWER was regarded as a sufficient basis for the imposition of governmental authority upon the parties. The state-prescribed Australian ballot, antifusion legislation, and state-operated primaries were introduced at the same time as laws regulating the structure and activities of political parties. All of these were intended to curb political "bosses" and "machines."

By the beginning of WORLD WAR II, the constitutions of seventeen states and the statutes in virtually all states referred to political parties—conferring rights on them, regulating their activities, or both. State regulatory schemes went beyond prescribing the methods by which parties would select nominees for office and the qualifications of parties for places on the ballot. Many states also regulated the selection and composition of district, county, and state political party committees, the authority and duties of those committees, and the rules for their operation.

Whether the national government has similar authority to regulate political parties has seldom been tested, for Congress has not chosen to enact legislation recognizing party associations or regulating their structure and activities. Any such federal power could, however, be thought to derive from several constitutional sources.

Article IV, section 1, of the Constitution grants Congress a broad power to regulate the time, place, and manner of electing senators and representatives. In UNITED STATES V. CLASSIC (1941) the Supreme Court construed this provision to allow Congress to regulate individual conduct and also to modify those state regulations of federal elections that the Constitution authorizes. The Court has also cited the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE as an additional source of congressional authority over federal elections, and in EX PARTE YARBROUGH (1884) it declared that Congress has the power, as an attribute of republican government, to pass laws governing federal elections, especially to protect them against fraud, violence, and other practices that undermine their integrity. And, although no constitutional provision explicitly extends the authority of Congress to regulate presidential elections, the Court affirmed this power in Burroughs v. United States (1934), OREGON V. MITCHELL (1970), and BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976).

Congressional power to regulate elections does not necessarily imply power to regulate political parties. But the Supreme Court has taken a major step in that direction by bringing federal PRIMARY ELECTIONS, which are principally a party process for selecting candidates, within the ambit of Article I. In United States v. Classic the Justices held that: "Where state law has made the primary an integral part of the procedure of choice, or where in fact the primary effectively controls the choice, the right of the elector to have his ballot counted at the primary is . . . included in the right [to vote in congressional elections] protected by Article I, sec. 2." This right to vote in congressional elections may be protected by Congress under Article I, section 4. Subsequently, the Court has treated Classic as recognizing a general congressional power to regulate primary elections for federal offices.

A wholly distinct doctrinal technique for imposing judicial limits upon party affairs, which may extend congressional legislative authority to party activities, grew out of the White Primary Cases. In NIXON V. HERNDON (1927) the Supreme Court held that because the sponsorship of a primary election by a state was STATE ACTION subject to the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, the exclusion of black voters from such a primary was unconstitutional. Even when the state authorized the party executive committee to determine party membership, NIXON V. CONDON (1932) held the ensuing primary to constitute state action. State authorization of a ballot position for candidates selected in party-sponsored primaries, without any state-prescribed primary rules or state operation of the primary, was held in SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1944) to be state action in violation of the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Many commentators and judges regard TERRY V. ADAMS (1953)—the last of the White Primary Cases—as extending constitutional limitation to party activities beyond primary elections. In Terry the Supreme Court held that the Fifteenth Amendment prohibited a local group, the Jaybird Democratic Association, from excluding blacks from a preprimary straw vote, paid for and operated exclusively by the association, to endorse candidates to run in the statutorily recognized Democratic party primary. The four-member plurality of the Terry Court concluded that the Jaybirds were part of the Democratic party. Only three Justices said that the Jaybird straw vote was limited by the Fifteenth Amendment because it was "an integral part, indeed the only effective part, of the electoral process."

Nonetheless, most judicial decisions now treat party organizations as state-affiliated agencies. State laws often closely prescribe the structure, organization, and duties of local, district, and state party units. Hence, the lower federal court cases have held that the EQUAL PROTECTION CLAUSE governs the selection and apportionment of members of local, district, and state party committees and conventions. Several decisions of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia have also applied the Fourteenth Amendment to national party conventions, because those conventions are integral parts of the process of selecting the President. But in at least one case that court suggested that the developing law of "state action," as defined by the Supreme Court, had excluded party conventions from the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In defining the scope of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, and thus the scope of congressional power to enforce those amendments, several appellate courts have distinguished between parties' candidate selection activities and their management of "internal affairs." Ronald Rotunda has suggested "a functional standard" in which "all integral steps in an election for public office are public functions and therefore state action subject to some judicial scrutiny." The functional distinction, though plausible and attractive, is difficult to apply in practice. Party activists often seek to influence the selection of party candidates, presumably to assure that party nominees reflect the policies of the party organization. Working through party organizations, they endorse candidates in the primary, expend money on their behalf, and mobilize primary voters for them. These activities could easily be construed as part of the selection of candidates; yet it seems unlikely that they fall within the reach of the prohibitions of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments—and thus the reach of Congress's power to enforce those amendments.

One further source of governmental authority to regulate political parties is the power to attach restrictions to special statuses or benefits accorded to candidates and parties under federal and state laws. Generally, the Supreme Court has rejected legislation that requires the surrender of constitutional rights as a condition for attaining a governmental benefit. (See UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITIONS.) Although it recognized in Buckley v. Valeo (1976) that political expenditures constitute protected speech under the FIRST AMENDMENT, the Supreme Court nonetheless upheld the PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN FUND ACT's limits on political party expenditures for nomination conventions and on candidate spending in presidential nomination and general election campaigns subsidized by federal money. This decision has broad implications for state regulatory authority in the thirteen states that provide public grants to candidates and political parties.

In virtually all states political parties receive automatic access to the ballot if they obtain a certain percentage of votes cast in a prior election. And in every state the ballot carries the party label to identify the candidates nominated by qualified political parties. These state benefits to political parties may justify state regulation of the structure, organization, and operation of political parties. Moreover, these benefits may strengthen claims that party activities constitute state action, thus bringing them within the ambit of both judicial and congressional authority under the Civil War amendments.

Although the Constitution has been interpreted to allow government to extend special recognition to political parties, especially major parties, governmental assistance to parties is circumscribed by constitutional limits. In Buckley v. Valeo the Supreme Court not only held that financial subventions were within congressional authority under the GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE; it also sustained definitions of eligibility that tended to reinforce the position of the major parties. Full public financing is available only to a party whose presidential candidate in the previous election received at least 25 percent of the popular vote. Some minor parties and candidates are eligible for lesser funding; others are not.

The party, seen as part of the electorate, is recognized by state eligibility requirements for voter participation in primary elections. Connecticut's closed party primary survived the challenge that it abridged independent voters' right to vote and freedom of association. A lower federal court held that the state law validly served "to protect party members from 'intrusion by those with adverse political principles,' and to preserve the integrity of the electoral process," and the Supreme Court affirmed in Nader v. Schaffer (1976). The courts have not decided whether political parties' freedom of association protects them from intrusion into the nominating process by persons who are not party members.

State authority to protect the integrity of party membership rolls is limited by the Fourteenth Amendment. A voter's freedom to associate with a party is apparently abridged if state-mandated enrollment rules unduly delay participation in a party primary. In Kusper v. Pontikes (1973) the Supreme Court invalidated a law requiring party enrollment twenty-three months in advance of a primary in which the voter wished to participate.

States also have power to protect the integrity of party nominating procedures by limiting independent or third-party candidacies by those who have been affiliated with another party. Hence, in Storer v. Brown (1974) the Supreme Court sustained a state law requiring an independent or new-party candidate to disaffiliate from his prior party at least a year in advance of his new party's primary. And in American Party of Texas v. White (1974) the Justices upheld a state law prohibiting persons who had voted in a party's most recent primary from signing petitions to qualify another party's candidate or an independent candidate for the ballot. The Court has also intimated that it would sustain "sore loser" statutes which prohibit a candidate who has participated in a party's nominating contest from subsequently qualifying as an independent candidate or opposition party aspirant in the same election. But in the same case, Anderson v. Celebrezze (1983), the Court held that states may not protect established parties by setting early filing deadlines that bar independent candidates arising from opposition to the platforms or candidates of major parties, when those become known.

The Constitution has been interpreted to allow preferred ballot access to established parties. Hence, in Jennes v. Fortson (1971) the Court sustained a statute giving automatic ballot access to parties that had obtained twenty percent or more of the vote in the prior election, while requiring others to gain ballot placement by obtaining petition signatures equivalent to five percent of those eligible to vote in the prior election. Nonetheless, in Williams v. Rhodes (1968) the Court rejected statutory schemes so complex or burdensome as to make it virtually impossible for any but the Democratic and Republican parties to obtain ballot access.

Promotion of political parties through minimal restrictions on the First Amendment right to associate and on the right to vote are justified by a wide array of governmental interests. The Supreme Court has said that states may protect political parties in order to assure "stability of the political system," to avoid confusion or deception, to "avoid frivolous or fraudulent candidacies prompted by short-range political goals, pique, or personal quarrel." Congress, in providing public financing of parties and candidates, can seek to avoid funding hopeless candidacies with large sums of public money or fostering proliferation of splinter parties. In the aggregate these justifications represent a constitutional hospitality toward political parties, at least when legislators grant them special statuses.

Several developments in constitutional doctrine suggest that long-established governmental regulation of political parties may now stand on treacherous ground. The 1950s saw the emergence of an independent First Amendment freedom of association, principally in cases involving dissident or oppressed groups, especially the Communist party. As early as 1952, in Ray v. Blair, the Supreme Court sustained a Democratic party requirement that candidates for presidential elector swear to vote for the presidential and vice-presidential candidates selected by the national Democratic party. Such an oath "protects a party from intrusion by those with adverse political principles." But until the 1970s there was little other judicial recognition that the freedom of association might secure rights of major political parties against governmental regulation.

In Cousins v. Wigoda (1975) and Democratic Party v. LaFollette (1981) the Supreme Court specifically announced that the First Amendment protected national party conventions in their establishment of rules for the selection of delegates, even in the face of contrary state laws or local party practices. In both cases, the Supreme Court announced that "the National Democratic party and its adherents enjoy a constitutionally protected right of political association." Both cases also applied the traditional standard in First Amendment cases; only a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST warranted abridgment of the "rights of association" of the national Democratic party.

In LaFollette the Court concluded that Article II, section 1, of the Constitution, which empowers each state to "appoint" presidential electors in the manner directed by the legislature, bears such a "remote and tenuous" connection to "the means by which political party members in a State associate to elect delegates to party nominating conventions . . . as to be wholly without constitutional significance." This conclusion sets aside one possible constitutional basis for state power to regulate party activities in selecting presidential nominees. Together, Cousins and LaFollette signal judicial reluctance to sweep every stage in the candidate selection process, especially those conducted by the parties themselves, within the scope of governmental regulation.

Indeed, in Cousins the Supreme Court specifically declined to "decide" or to "intimate" decisions on several critical issues of governmental authority to regulate parties, thus suggesting that large areas of the law remain open despite the assumption of past practices and of lower court decisions that party affairs are subject to extensive regulation. First, the Court did not decide "whether the decisions of a National Political Party in the area of selection constitute state or governmental action" limited by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, and thus subject to congressional regulation. Second, the Justices left open the question "whether national political parties are subject to the principles of the REAPPORTIONMENT decisions, or other constitutional restraints, in their methods of delegate selection or allocation." Third, the Court did not decide "whether or to what extent national political parties and their nominating conventions are regulable by, or only by, Congress."

Although the sweeping associational rights of political parties recognized in Cousins and LaFollette have sometimes been regarded as limited by the Supreme Court's reference to the special "national interest" in presidential nominating conventions, the Court has relied on those decisions to protect party autonomy below the national level. In Rivera-Rodriguez v. Popular Democratic Party (1982) the Court cited Cousins and LaFollette in holding that a territorial political party, empowered by law to select a replacement for a deceased territorial legislator originally elected on the party ticket, was "entitled to adopt its own procedures to select . . . [a] replacement" and "was not required to include nonmembers in what can be analogized to a party primary election."

These developments suggest that the emerging First Amendment rights of parties may give them broad autonomy to order their affairs. At a minimum, party organizations can make a strong claim to order the selection, structure, and operation of party committees and conventions free from state regulation, even if those committees and conventions participate actively in candidate selection primaries. The federal courts have held that a state law prohibiting party committees from endorsing candidates in primaries violated First Amendment speech and associational rights; they avoided deciding, however, whether party campaign activities such as contributing money were similarly protected in those primary contests. If party assemblies actually select candidates, they may claim autonomy under Cousins and LaFollette, which held that party rules overrode contrary state laws in prescribing the selection of delegates to national party nominating conventions.

At the farthest reaches, the First Amendment might be construed to allow parties a substantial role in prescribing party membership and qualifying candidates for participation in party primaries established by the states. A state has a legitimate interest in an orderly election process that encourages qualified persons to participate in elections free of fraud, intimidation, and corruption; but its interests do not warrant limitations on the First Amendment associational rights of political parties. Parties may therefore establish voter enrollment and candidate eligibility rules to prevent the intrusion into party primaries of candidates and voters who do not share the party's goals. These party rules would, of course, be subject to the limits that the Supreme Court has already imposed to protect the constitutional rights to vote and associate. Such a theory of party autonomy is consistent with the modern understanding of the First Amendment and with contemporary Supreme Court declarations of party associational rights. It is a theory awaiting full explication and recognition.

DAVID ADAMANY
(1986)

Bibliography

GEYH, CHARLES 1983 "It's My Party and I'll Cry If I Want To": State Intrusions upon the Associational Freedoms of Political Parties. Wisconsin Law Review 1983:211–240.

GOTTLIEB, STEPHEN E. 1982 Rebuilding the Right of Association: The Right to Hold a Convention as a Test Case. Hofstra Law Review 11:191–247.

KESTER, JOHN G. 1974 Constitutional Restrictions on Political Parties. Virginia Law Review 60:735–784.

NOTE 1978 Equal Representation of Party Members on Political Party Central Committees. Yale Law Journal 88:167–185.

ROSSITER, CLINTON L. 1960 Parties and Politics in America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

ROTUNDA, RONALD D. 1975 Constitutional and Statutory Restrictions on Political Parties in the Wake of Cousins v. Wigoda. Texas Law Review 53:935–963.

SORAUF, FRANK J. 1980 Party Politics in America. Boston: Little, Brown.

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY OF THE CONSTITUTION

It is a commonplace that the Constitution provides for a LIMITED GOVERNMENT, one that depends upon a system of CHECKS AND BALANCES. And this in turn is said to reflect a realistic opinion both about the nature of man and about the purposes and risks of government. The general government is limited in that much is left to the states to do, to the extent and in the ways the states choose to act. The very existence of the states and many of the things they do are taken for granted; they do not depend upon the Constitution. Even the states formed pursuant to the Constitution automatically assumed, upon admission to the Union, virtually all of the prerogatives (or STATES' RIGHTS) of the original thirteen, including the status of being largely independent of the other states and in many respects independent of the general government.

The states play vital parts in the periodic choices of United States senators, representatives, and presidential electors. Otherwise, the Constitution, once ratified, depends upon the states for relatively few things in order to permit the general government to function within its appointed sphere. Various restrictions are placed upon the states, primarily with a view to preventing interferences by them with the proper activities of the general government. In addition, the states are obliged by the Constitution to respect various legal determinations in other states. But, by and large, the states are left fairly autonomous, however republican they are required and helped to be under the Constitution. (Although the CIVIL WAR and its RECONSTRUCTION amendments had effects upon the original constitutional dispensation, these amendments are consistent with, if not the natural culmination of, the initial dedication of the Constitution to liberty and equality.)

The general government is limited in still another critical respect by the SEPARATION OF POWERS, which makes the Constitution seem far less simple than it really is. Virtually everything that may be done by any branch of that government must take account, if it does not require the immediate cooperation, of the other two branches. Thus, Congress can enact laws alone, but it is easier to do so in collaboration with the President; how the judges will understand and how the President will execute these laws must be anticipated. The President alone commands the armed forces, but what those forces consist of and how they are equipped depends on congressional provisions, as does the very declaration of the wars in which such forces may be used. The judges interpret and apply laws, but, apart from the Supreme Court, all courts of the general government depend for their JURISDICTION and for their very existence upon the Congress, and for the execution of their decrees upon the President. Many other such interdependencies are evident.

We can even see in the references to divinity in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE an oblique anticipation of the qualified separation of powers found in the Constitution itself. There are four references of this kind in the Declaration. The first reference to God, and perhaps the second as well, regarded God as legislator; it is He that orders things, ordaining what is to be. That is, He first comes to sight as lawgiver or lawmaker. Next, God is seen as judge. Finally, He is revealed as executive, as One Who extends protection, enforcing the laws that have been laid down (with a suggestion as well of the dispensing power of the executive). Thus, the authors of the Declaration portrayed even the government of the world in the light of their political principles.

The constitutional dispersal of powers (between state and general governments, among branches of the general government, and between congressional houses with quite different constituencies) testifies to the recognition that those who wield power have to be watched, and perhaps shackled or at least hobbled. This understanding may be seen also in the ways the people discipline themselves, agreeing to proceed in accordance with constitutional forms. Such precautions make sense, however, only if there is indeed a considerable power to be exercised.

Preeminent among the powers of the general government are those that must be exercised countrywide if they are to be used effectively. These include the plenary (but not necessarily exclusive) powers of the general government with respect to commerce "among the several States," taxes, "the common defense," and international relations, all of which are reinforced by the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE. And so there has been no need for a "living" Constitution to "grow," except perhaps to grow out of the artificial limitations imposed by those periodic misinterpretations of the Constitution that have failed to appreciate the full extent of the powers intended to be vested in the general government.

Here and there the Constitution restricts the exercise of the plenary powers conferred upon the general government—but those restraints tend to be "procedural." "Substantive" restraints upon such powers would be unreasonable should they have to be employed in unpredictable but grave circumstances. The Constitution assumes the prudence of those who wield power. Thus, for example, no matter how the tax power is hedged in, Congress can still so use its discretion here as to ruin the country.

The prudence relied upon is to be directed to the advancement of the goals enumerated in the Preamble. There are elsewhere in the Constitution further indications of what is taken for granted as legitimate ends of government, such as in references to "the Progress of Science and useful Arts," to "public safety," to the control of "disorderly Behaviour," to a "Republican Form of Government," and to "the Law of Nations." And, of course, the Declaration of Independence states in an authoritative manner the enduring ends of American government rooted in the inalienable rights of men.

That the Declaration of Independence is taken for granted is evident even in the way the Constitution is dated: "in the Year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and Eighty seven and of the Independence of the United States of America the Twelfth." It seems to be taken for granted as well that the prudence relied upon both in the Declaration and in the Constitution is generally to be promoted by free discussion of public issues, however salutary a temporary secrecy may be on occasion. Such discussion is presupposed by the relations of the various branches of government to one another and by what they say to each other. Thus, judges deliberate and set forth their conclusions in published opinions; the President, in exercising his VETO POWER, is to give "his Objections," which objections are to be considered by Congress; the members of Congress are protected in their exercise of freedom of speech as legislators. A continental FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS were presupposed as well, even before the ratification of the FIRST AMENDMENT, by the repeated indications in the Constitution of 1787 that it is an ultimately sovereign people who establish and continually assess the government.

The SOVEREIGNTY of the people is central to the constitutional system, moderated though the people's control may be by the use of representatives and by indirect selections of various officers of government. Each of the seven articles of the original Constitution, including the judiciary article, testifies to the understanding that the people are ultimately to have their way, however carefully they have disciplined themselves in restricting the manner in which they insist upon having their way. The people are sovereign, and for good reasons: it is a government designed for their happiness; they themselves have ordained it and are to support it. Besides, no one else is obviously better qualified to decide what is in the best interests of the country.

An essential equality among people is indicated in various ways, including in the equal status of the states and in the freedom of citizens to move among the states. Majority rule is taken for granted again and again. No male-female or rich-poor distinction is recognized. The Constitution does not even recognize an intrinsic difference among the races, however much grudging accommodation there may have had to be to existing slavery institutions. And, of course, no government in the United States may grant TITLES OF NOBILITY.

To defer to the genuine sovereignty of the people is to submit, in effect, to that rule of law contemplated by MAGNA CARTA. It is only through law that a people, in their political capacity, can truly speak or be spoken to. Dependence upon the RULE OF LAW points to LEGISLATIVE SUPREMACY, which is indicated again and again in the Constitution, not least in its IMPEACHMENT provisions. It is peculiar, then, that we rely as much as we now do on JUDICIAL REVIEW—that is, on the duty of courts to assess congressional enactments for their constitutionality. Of course, this duty, too, can be put in terms of respect for the rule of law. But it is difficult to find in the text of the Constitution any provision for judicial review or even any indication that it was ever anticipated by the Framers. In fact, the care with which the President's veto (the executive counterpart to judicial review) is established argues against the opinion that judges are intended by the Constitution to examine formally sufficient acts of Congress for their constitutionality, except perhaps whenever the prerogatives of the courts themselves are immediately threatened. What does seem to be anticipated by the Constitution is an even more considerable power for judges than judicial review seems to offer, but one which the appellate courts of the general government have largely surrendered. This is their indirect but nevertheless critical power of supervising the COMMON LAW (and hence the moral sensibilities) of the country, subject to whatever regulations legislatures may choose to provide. In any event, these courts are entitled, perhaps even obliged, to interpret acts of Congress in accordance with the Constitution, proceeding in each case before them on the reasonable assumption (until Congress clearly indicates otherwise) that nothing unconstitutional or unjust is intended.

In the American constitutional system, both the rule of law and an ultimate dependence upon the sovereignty of the people mean that property is to be respected. (And this respect probably implies, considering the evident commercial presuppositions of the Constitution, that economic interests are to be advanced.) Respect for property is the private counterpart to that political deference to the public seen in genuine republican government. The protections of property in the THIRD, FOURTH, FIFTH, SEVENTH, and EIGTH AMENDMENTS draw upon a principle that is already evident in the original Constitution.

Deference to the public, and to republicanism, also takes the form of a concern for "the Blessings of Liberty." That a considerable liberty is taken for granted by the Constitution may be seen in its assurances with respect to HABEAS CORPUS, to BILLS OF ATTAINDER, to the crime of TREASON, to RELIGIOUS TESTS, and to " Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law." It may be seen as well in the spirit of liberty which pervades the governmental system, making much of a people's freely choosing what they will have done for them, by whom, and upon what terms.

But however much liberty, property, and equality are to be respected, there is no question under the Constitution but that there should be effective governance, and governance with respect to the most important matters facing the country as a whole. However "limited" the exercise of power may be, primarily because of the different parts played by the three branches of the general government and by the states, great powers do exist for the general government to exercise. In any extended contest, the Constitution assumes that a determined Congress can have its way both with the President and with the courts. The Constitution was itself fashioned by a deliberative body which resembles much more the Congress than it does either the presidency or the judiciary. In the very nature of things, lawmaking (whether entrusted to one hand or to many) is at the heart of sovereignty, providing the necessary mandates for those who either interpret or execute the laws.

Lawmaking may be seen as well in what the people at large in their sovereign capacity have done in "ordain[ing] and establish[ing] this Constitution." Thus, the preeminence of lawmaking may be seen not only in what the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION did in drafting the Constitution but even more in what the people did in the RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. The provision of a workable AMENDING PROCESS also presupposes that the people retain their ultimate authority—and that standards exist by which they may examine and modify constitutional arrangements from time to time.

The Framers of the Constitution applied those standards, set forth in the Declaration of Independence, to the needs and opportunities of their day. Such standards were understood to be rooted in nature. The American people considered themselves sanctified by Providence, or at least peculiarly fitted because of their experiences and circumstances, to discern and to follow the guidance of nature. Americans looked to political philosophers and other students of law and government for help in their recourse to nature—and they invoked with confidence writers from Plato and Aristotle to John Locke and Adam Smith. But none of these writers was authoritative; all of them could be exploited, along with the considerable historical record (sacred and profane, ancient and modern) repeatedly drawn upon in debate. The diversity of the many sources casually, if not cavalierly, put to use by the Framers suggests that the astute political thought of eighteenth-century Americans was, in certain respects, distinctive to them. They were eminently practical and yet high-minded constitutionalists who seemed willing to leave many private concerns, and vital personal virtues, to the ministrations of local government and of common-law judges (as well as to church and family), while they entrusted the government of the United States both with the GENERAL WELFARE (including the economy of the country) and with external affairs (including the common defense).

However extensive and even awesome those governmental powers may be, the powers retained by the people to revise whatever is done by government in their name remain even greater. The ultimate sovereignty of the people may be seen not only in the constitutional provision for amendments but also in that natural RIGHT OF REVOLUTION vigorously relied upon in the Declaration of Independence.

Intrinsic to the political philosophy of the Constitution is the recognition that a bad law may still be constitutional, and hence that the political must be distinguished from the legal (or judicial). This understanding means that in order for the constitutional government empowered by the people (as well as for the all-powerful people themselves) to contribute to the common good in a regular and enduring manner, there must be constant and informed recourse by Americans (citizens and public servants alike) to the instructive dictates of prudence.

GEORGE ANASTAPLO
(1986)

Bibliography

ALVAREZ, LEO PAUL DE, ed. 1976 Abraham Lincoln, the Gettysburg Address and American Constitutionalism. Irving, Texas: University of Dallas Press.

ANASTAPLO, GEORGE 1965 The Declaration of Independence. St. Louis University Law Journal 9:390–415.

——— 1971 The Constitutionalist: Notes on the First Amendment. Dallas, Texas: Southern Methodist University Press.

——— 1984 Mr. Crosskey, the American Constitution, and the Natures of Things. Loyola University of Chicago Law Journal 15:181–260.

——— 1987 The Constitution of 1787: A Commentary. Athens, Ohio: Swallow Press/Ohio University Press. (Reprinted from Loyola University of Chicago Law Journal [1986] 18:1.)

CROSSKEY, WILLIAM W. 1953 Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

EIDELBERG, PAUL 1968 The Philosophy of the American Constitution: A Reinterpretation of the Intentions of the Founding Fathers. New York: Free Press.

SHARP, MALCOLM P. 1973 Crosskey, Anastaplo and Meiklejohn on the United States Constitution. University of Chicago Law School Record 20:3–18.

STORY, JOSEPH 1833 Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States. Boston: Hilliard, Gray & Co.

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY OF THE CONSTITUTION (Update)

To speak of the political philosophy of the Constitution is to invite immediate controversy. Many allege that the Constitution has no coherent political philosophy; and those who maintain otherwise often regard its political philosophy as far from commendable.

Those who contend that the Constitution is theoretically incoherent point to its various inconsistences and the many provisions that were the products of compromise. The more charitable of such analysts try to make a virtue of the Constitution's supposed lack of an overarching political theory, arguing that this demonstrates the Framers' laudable ability to ignore their own prejudices. In the words of law professor Donald Horowitz: "What we ought to revere is the spirit of compromise the Framers brought to Philadelphia—compromise that accommodated large states and small, north and south, numbers and wealth, legislative supremacists and proponents of a strong executive."

Probably the most significant obstacle to this view is presented by THE FEDERALIST, the contemporaneous exposition of the Constitution by ALEXANDER HAMILTON, JAMES MADISON, and JOHN JAY. Written during the turmoil of the battle for RATIFICATION, The Federalist presents a remarkably comprehensive and coherent exposition of the constitutional system, fleshing out its fundamental principles of NATURAL RIGHTS, CHECKS AND BALANCES, BICAMERALISM, SEPARATION OF POWERS, and FEDERALISM. The Federalist, which was utilized extensively by ratification proponents, goes a long way toward explaining the shared principles that underlay the compromises of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787.

Perhaps a more challenging attack on the coherence of the Constitution comes from those who juxtapose its REPUBLICANISM with its sanction of SLAVERY. Article IV, section 2, effectively compelled northern states to return fugitive slaves to their southern masters; and Article I, section 9, protected the importation of slaves until 1808. Many of those who criticize the Constitution on this account accuse the Founders of having a contradictory understanding of inalienable rights, claiming that the Founders did not think such rights applied to black Americans. These critics often cite as evidence for this proposition Justice ROGER BROOKE TANEY'S assertion in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) that the Founders regarded black Americans "as beings . . . so inferior, that they had no rights the white man was bound to respect."

Yet Taney's claim in Dred Scott was a palpable fiction, one that Taney himself had rejected as defense counsel for an abolitionist preacher earlier in his career. In reality, the Founders were not inconsistent in understanding the principle of inalienable rights; but they were inconsistent in applying it, as they themselves recognized. Slaveholders such as GEORGE WASHINGTON and THOMAS JEFFERSON knew that slavery abrogated the natural rights on which the Constitution was premised and therefore had to be abolished. The question was how to abolish slavery. Although it is easy to condemn the Framers for their compromise on this issue, one may legitimately wonder how much longer the horrible oppression of slavery would have lasted if the bargain had not been struck and the South had stayed out of the Union.

Incoherency, however, is not the only charge leveled against the political philosophy of the Constitution. Other critics chide the Founders for creating a constitutional system that cannot sustain itself because it is based almost entirely on self-interest. They claim that the philosophy of the Constitution is best summarized by the statement in The Federalist #51 that one must supply "by opposite and rival interests, the defect of better motives." According to these observers, the two pillars of the constitutional system are the extended republic, which fosters such a multiplicity of factions that it will be difficult for any one of them to dominate the rest, and the separation of powers, which similarly aims at preventing any single faction from controlling the government by dividing and arranging "the several offices in such a manner as that each may be a check on the other—that the private interest of every individual may be a sentinel over the public rights."

According to this view, the Founders thought that if the Constitution was properly structured to rely on self-interest, good character on the part of citizens would become expendable. This thesis has been maintained, more or less vigorously, by a variety of scholars from across the political spectrum, including Richard Hofstadter, Benjamin Barber, and Martin Diamond. Yet there are grave difficulties with this interpretation, not the least of which is its negative formulation of the Constitution's principles. According to these critics, devices such as bicameralism, checks and balances, and separation of powers use self-interest to prevent a tyrannical concentration of authority. But this is only part of the story. The Framers also believed that these devices would promote good government by attracting virtuous leaders to federal office and by supplying those leaders with the tools needed to perform their governmental duties properly.

Nowhere can this be seen more clearly than in the separation of powers. The Framers believed that powers should be separated not only to prevent tyranny, but also because the executive, legislative, and judicial powers require by their very natures different talents in order to be exercised well. The executive power requires the capacity for energy, secrecy, and quick and decisive action; the legislative power demands deliberation, or the free and full consideration of diverging points of view; and the judicial power calls for a cool and dispassionate application of the laws. The Framers of the Constitution subsequently structured each of the three branches of government in such a way as to encourage these characteristics. The Framers provided for a unitary executive, believing that this would facilitate quick and decisive action. They created a bicameral legislature to promote the best kind of deliberation. Finally, they provided that federal judges would hold their posts during GOOD BEHAVIOR, thus insulating them from the partisan battles of the moment and promoting the impartial and dispassionate application of the laws.

In sum, the Framers sought to supply each branch of government with the tools necessary to carry out its assigned tasks in the best manner possible. Of course, this was not the same as assuring each branch would carry out its duties in the best manner possible. A despot elected President, for example, might use the power to pardon to shield the criminal activities of his or her subordinates; unscrupulous senators might hold presidential appointments hostage to extract special favors from the executive branch; and corrupt judges might use their lifetime tenure as a shield for their corruption. Thus, the structure of the various offices ensures that good people, if elected, can more easily fulfill the functions of their offices; but it does not guarantee that good and virtuous people will actually fill those offices.

The Framers of the Constitution were well aware of this, however, and they carefully crafted the selection procedures for the various offices to encourage the choice of persons eminent in both ability and virtue. For example, the Framers believed that the election process for the presidency would tend to elect outstanding individuals because it required a candidate to achieve a national consensus in order to win in the ELECTORAL COLLEGE; no candidate who pandered to narrow or local interests would be likely to obtain such a national majority. Similarly, the selection of senators by their state legislatures would likely encourage the selection of distinguished statesmen because the legislatures would want to choose representatives that might bring luster and distinction to their respective states. More generally, higher age requirements for the offices of senator and President made it more probable that candidates for these offices would have the wisdom and stature that comes from experience.

The Constitution also fosters virtuous leadership in yet another manner: it encourages persons of eminent ability to seek federal office by assuring them that they will have enough time to prosecute their projects for the public good. This is why the Constitution contains no provision for the rotation of offices; the Framers thought that renewability of terms would help attract the best people to federal office. In the case of the presidency, wrote Alexander Hamilton, a great man will be more likely to consider running for President if he knows that he will have the time to complete as well as to undertake "extensive and arduous enterprises for the public benefit. . . ."

In many different ways, then, the very structure of the Constitution aspires to cultivate virtue in government. One may readily question, of course, whether the Constitution's structural mechanisms are sufficient to bring about good government. To point to only one example: the Founders were certainly correct that the national consensus needed for the election of the President ensures that a candidate of merely local interests will likely fail in his or her bid for office, but this does not necessarily mean that the person chosen will be someone preeminent in ability and virtue. If the citizenry were consumed by self-interest, they might instead elect the most pliable candidate—the one they think can be bullied into supporting their interests by their representatives in Congress. In other words, even the electoral college cannot produce a good President in and of itself. The presidential electors—and ultimately, those who select those electors—must still be good enough to care about justice and virtue.

In the end then, the Constitution can only do so much. It is not a cure-all. But contrary to the claims of some critics, the Founders themselves recognized this. They did not believe that the Constitution was a machine that would run itself. They knew that its perpetuation ultimately depended on the character of the nation's citizens. Hence, even in The Federalist, "a dependence on the people" is acknowledged as the primary safeguard for republicanism, whereas the Constitution's various checks and balances are described as "auxilliary precautions."

Some may object that if the Founders truly considered the character of the citizenry important, they would have mentioned civic virtue in the Constitution explicitly. After all, certain early STATE CONSTITUTIONS contained appeals to both God and virtue. The PREAMBLE to the U.S. Constitution, in contrast, seems but a pale reflection of these earlier documents. It does speak of establishing justice, but instead of going on and listing the requisite civic virtues, it merely stresses the importance of "the blessings of Liberty." Some have interpreted the Founders' emphasis on liberty rather than virtue as proof that they envisioned a republic where self-interest, rather than self-sacrifice, was to be the guiding light. Yet those who interpret "liberty" in this manner are interpolating their own modern conceptions back into the founding.

It is not difficult to understand the reason for the confusion. Today, liberty is equated with the absence of all restraint. Indeed, people who call themselves "libertarians" argue against all government regulation of business and object to criminalizing PORNOGRAPHY, hallucinogenic drugs, and prostitution. Yet the Founders' conception of liberty was entirely different. Echoing the Aristotelian understanding of virtue, the Founding generation saw liberty as the golden mean between two extremes: it was the contrary of both slavery and anarchy. Liberty was freedom, but freedom within the confines of the laws of nature and of nature's God. It was the freedom to organize one's own affairs, live where one wanted, participate in politics, and buy and sell property, as long as a person did not violate the immutable moral law. In short, early Americans thoroughly agreed with JOHN MILTON's aphorism that "none can love freedom heartily, but good men; the rest love not freedom but license."

That this was the Founder's true conception of liberty should become self-evident to even the most cynical observers when they examine the public actions of the Founding Fathers. The same George Washington who presided over the Constitutional Convention of 1787 declared in his Farewell Address: "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, Religion and Morality are indispensable supports." The same Congress that recommended the Constitution to the states enacted an ordinance for the Northwest Territories that announced: "Religion, morality and knowledge being necessary to good government . . . schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged."

But perhaps it was Supreme Court Justice JAMES WILSON, arguably the most systematic political thinker during the founding, who best expressed the necessity of schooling Americans in their civil rights and civic responsibilities. In his inaugural law lecture at the College of Philadelphia, attended by such luminaries as Washington and Jefferson, Wilson declared:

> On the public mind, one great truth can never be too deeply impressed—that the weight of the government of the United States, and of each state composing the union, rests on the shoulders of the people.
>
> I express not this sentiment now, . . . with a view to flatter: I express it now, as I have always expressed it heretofore, with a far other and higher aim—with an aim to excite the people to acquire, by vigorous and manly exercise, a degree of strength sufficient to support the weighty burthen, which is laid upon them—with an aim to convince them, that their duties rise in strict proportion to their rights; and that few are able to trace or to estimate the great danger, in a free government, when the rights of the people are unexercised, and the still greater danger, when the rights of the people are ill exercised.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Conservatism; Constitution and Civic Ideals; Constitutional History Before 1776; Constitutional History, 1776–1789; Liberalism.)

Bibliography

BARLOW, J. JACKSON; LEVY, LEONARD W.; and MASUGI, KEN, eds. 1988 The American Founding: Essays on the Formation of the Constitution. New York: Greenwood Press.

HORWITZ, ROBERT H., ed. 1986 The Moral Foundations of the Republic, 3rd ed. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia.

JAFFA, HARRY V. 1987 What Were the 'Original Intentions' of the Framers of the Constitution of the United States? University of Puget Sound Law Review 10:343–423.

KESLER, CHARLES R., ed. 1987 Saving the Revolution: The Federalist Papers and the American Founding. New York: Free Press.

POLITICAL QUESTION DOCTRINE

As early as MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) the Supreme Court recognized that decisions on some governmental questions lie entirely within the discretion of the "political" branches of the national government—the President and Congress—and thus outside the proper scope of JUDICIAL REVIEW. Today such questions are called "political questions."

Among the clauses of the federal Constitution held to involve political questions, the one most frequently cited has been Article IV, section 4, under which the federal government "shall guarantee to every State in this Union a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT." Federal courts, and particularly the Supreme Court, have argued that as the definition of "republican" is at the heart of the American political system, only the "political branches," which are accountable to the sovereign people, can make that definition. The electorate can ratify or reject the definition by reelecting or defeating their representatives at the next election. The choice of definition, Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER said, dissenting in BAKER V. CARR (1962), entails choosing "among competing theories of political philosophy," which is not a proper judicial function.

Thus the Supreme Court has refused to review political decisions in cases involving two governments, each claiming to be the legitimate one of a state (LUTHER V. BORDEN, 1849); the question whether the post-CIVIL WAR RECON-STRUCTION governments in southern states were republican (Georgia v. Stanton and MISSISSIPPI V. JOHNSON, 1867); the "republican" nature of the INITIATIVE and REFERENDUM (Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Oregon, 1912; Hawke v. Smith, 1920); lack of REAPPORTIONMENT by state legislatures (COLEGROVE V. GREEN, 1946); contested elections (Taylor & Marshall v. Beckham, 1900); certain presidential actions (Mississippi v. Johnson, 1867); certain cases arising in Indian territory (CHEROKEE INDIAN CASES, 1831–1832); and FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Foster v. Neilson, 1829; Charlton v. Kelly, 1913).

The Supreme Court has never successfully differentiated those questions proper for judicial interpretation from those that are reserved to the "political" branches. A plurality of the Justices having held in Colegrove v. Green (1946) that a state legislature's failure to reapportion itself after the decennial federal census was a political question, for example, the Court in Baker v. Carr decided that such inaction raised a question under the equal protection clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT rather than the guarantee clause, and therefore raised an issue proper for judicial decision. After having handed down a line of cases holding that contested elections were matters in which the final decision could come only from the relevant legislative body, the Court overturned the refusal by the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES (POWELL V. MCCORMACK, 1969) to seat a member who, in the Court's view, had been excluded unconstitutionally.

The Court has been relatively consistent in holding various foreign relations issues to constitute political questions, because of the necessity for the country to speak with one voice, the inability of courts to develop a body of principles to govern such issues, and what Justice Frankfurter described in Perez v. Brownell (1958) as the "constitutional allocation of governmental function" concerning foreign affairs to the President and Congress. Matters such as the existence of a state of war, the relevance of a treaty, the boundaries of the nation, and the credentials of foreign diplomats have been left to congressional and presidential diplomats. But the Court stated in REID V. COVERT (1957) that even the provisions of a treaty or EXECUTIVE AGREEMENT are reviewable if citizens assert violations of their rights. And, in the face of government claims that the travel of Americans abroad raises diplomatic issues fit only for executive discretion, the Court has enunciated the RIGHT TO TRAVEL abroad and has made substantive rulings for and against claims of that right (KENT V. DULLES, 1958; APTHEKER V. SECRETARY OF STATE, 1964; ZEMEL V. RUSK, 1965).

The Supreme Court's variable commitment to the political question doctrine may be explained by reasons that are nondoctrinal. The Court appears to resort to the doctrine when only two substantive judgments are possible, the first being unacceptable to the Court because it would likely go unenforced and the second being equally unacceptable because it would violate a major tenet of American political ideology. In Colegrove v. Green, for example, the plurality suggested that the Illinois legislation might ignore a HOLDING that the legislature's refusal to redesign badly malapportioned congressional districts was unconstitutional—and the House of Representatives might take no action. Yet upholding such a malapportionment, which gave some citizens a vote of far greater weight than that of others, would have run contrary to the American belief that all citizens are equal in the electoral process. Similarly, the Court in Mississippi v. Johnson had the choice of deciding that the Reconstruction state governments were illegitimate, a ruling that the President and Congress surely would have ignored; or that the governments, which had been imposed by the federal government on citizens denied the right to participate in the election process, were legitimate—which would have offended the basic American idea of SOVEREIGNTY of the people. In both cases the Court invoked the political question doctrine and left decision in the hands of the "political branches."

The very notion of "political branches," however, is untenable. Article III of the Constitution makes the federal judiciary indirectly accountable insofar as it may enable the people's representatives in Congress to strip the courts of JURISDICTION over matters the people believe the courts to have mishandled. Federal judges, too, are liable to IMPEACHMENT—although this resource has never been taken for purely political purposes since the earliest days of the nineteenth century.

Court decisions necessarily affect power. The decision in PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) legitimizing SEPARATE BUT EQUAL railroad cars for black and white passengers encouraged southern states to establish racially segregated schools; the holding of BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) that "separate but equal" schools violated the equal protection clause stripped the states of that power, transferring the power to define SEGREGATION and integration to the federal courts, the Congress, and, in some cases, to the President. The Court's upholding of ECONOMIC REGULATION affecting wages, hours, unionization, social security, job safety, and competition shifted power from employers to state and federal legislatures, executives, and REGULATORY AGENCIES, as well as to unions, and enabled the United States to consolidate a system of welfare capitalism under which privately owned property is systematically regulated by governmental bodies.

The Court nonetheless insists that the judicial branch is apolitical, because its own institutional power depends on the electorate's belief that the Court is above politics.

As JAMES MADISON pointed out in THE FEDERALIST #51, the Court possesses neither the power of the purse nor that of the sword. It is entirely dependent for the enforcement of its decisions on the willingness of the population and public officials to carry them out. Were the Court's decisions to be ignored, the Court's prestige would suffer; in a circular fashion, the loss of prestige would increase the possibility that subsequent decisions would go unheeded.

The Court's decisions find ready compliance when the decisions reflect a societal consensus. The difference between the Court's 1946 Colegrove decision that malapportionment was a political question and its contrary 1962 Baker decision can be linked to the large-scale movement of population to urban areas underrepresented in the legislatures. By 1962 a majority of the nation's population could be expected to concur in a decision that enhanced its political power. Promise of additional support from the President was implicit in the appearance of Attorney General ROBERT F. KENNEDY before the Court to argue as AMICUS CURIAE for reapportionment, for Kennedy was, of course, the brother of President JOHN F. KENNEDY, who owed his office to urban votes.

The political question device derives its legitimacy from the necessity to preserve an independent judiciary in the American political system. The device is justifiable because it enables the judiciary to maintain its independence by withdrawing from no-win situations. In addition, it prevents the courts from usurping the role of the ballot box. The Supreme Court, declaring the presence of a political question, tacitly admits that it cannot find and therefore cannot ratify a social consensus that does not violate basic American beliefs. The Court has no moral right to impose rules upon a country not yet ready for them. The political question doctrine, which permits the Court to restrain itself from precipitating impossible situations that might tear the social fabric, gives the electorate and its representatives time to work out their own rules, which can ultimately be translated into constitutional doctrine through judicial decision. The doctrine of political questions is more than a self-saving mechanism for the Court; it is also an affirmation of a governmental system based on popular sovereignty.

PHILIPPA STRUM
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

SCHARPF, FRITZ W. 1966 Judicial Review and the Political Question: A Functional Analysis. Yale Law Journal 75:517–546.

STRUM, PHILIPPA 1974 The Supreme Court and "Political Questions." University: University of Alabama Press.

POLITICAL QUESTION DOCTRINE
(Update 1)

Is the constitutionality of clandestine American involvement in Nicaragua an issue that the federal judiciary may decide? If the legislatures of two-thirds of the states apply to Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments and Congress ignores their application, should a federal court entertain an action by the states against Congress? Should the decision of the Republican National Committee not to seat a group of delegates at the party's national convention be subjected to federal court challenges?

All of these questions, in one way or another, implicate the political question DOCTRINE. This doctrine counsels the judiciary to refrain from deciding constitutional questions involving subject matters or issues appropriate for resolution only by the national political branches—Congress and the executive. In effect, the doctrine aims to divide "politics" from the "law," which is the proper sphere of judicial interpretation.

The Supreme Court has long considered the identification of political questions necessary to national SEPARATION OF POWERS. As early as MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), the Court recognized that although federal courts are obliged to enforce the mandatory requirements of the Constitution, a life-tenured, unelected, and politically unaccountable judiciary must reserve discretionary policymaking for the elected representatives of the American people.

Not until BAKER V. CARR (1962), however, did the Court articulate doctrinal standards for distinguishing a political question. Several of the Baker criteria call directly for judicial interpretation of the meaning and force of the Constitution's language; for example, does the text commit an issue to determination by the national political branches, and does the text lend itself to judicially manageable standards for resolving the issue? Other criteria require judges to assess realistically and pragmatically the political effects of a decision, such as asking if there is a significant potential for embarrassing or showing disrespect for Congress or the executive or whether the finality of a prior political decision is more important than its legality. Applying these standards, the Baker Court held that the Tennessee state legislature's failure to reapportion electoral districts after substantial migration of rural populations to urban centers raised a question of unconstitutional vote dilution and that the federal judiciary was competent to develop manageable standards for the vote dilution issue; it further held that the text of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT did not commit an EQUAL PROTECTION claim to the Congress or executive for decision and that the federal political branches had taken no action that required finality and respect.

Judges and scholars have launched serious attacks on the Baker approach to the definition of political questions. As the Constitution does not even provide expressly for the federal judiciary's review powers, it is difficult to argue that the text discriminates between those provisions enforceable by the judiciary and those consigned to Congress or the executive for construction. In addition, the individual-rights doctrines most fully developed by the judiciary are based on language in the BILL OF RIGHTS and the Fourteenth Amendment that is cryptic and open-ended, embodying no apparent and manageable judicial standards. Moreover, the Court may undermine the legitimacy of its own constitutional decisions by relying on pragmatic claims of institutional incompetence to supervise the policy decision making of administrative experts.

Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has shown no inclination to rethink the political question doctrine. In the most controversial political question ruling over the past five years, a solid majority of the Court expressly declined an invitation to modify or abandon the Baker standards. When several Indiana Democrats sued to invalidate a state legislative REAPPORTIONMENT plan for gerrymandering election district lines so as to disadvantage Democratic candidates, the Court applied the Baker criteria point by point and concluded that a political group's claim to fair representation does not present a political question. The opinion of Justice BYRON R. WHITE in Davis v. Bandemer (1986) declared that the Constitution does not generally dedicate vote dilution issues to the Congress or President for resolution and that the courts are institutionally competent to formulate workable rules for deciding such claims, even though they had not yet devised a precise method for identifying an unconstitutional political GERRYMANDER.

Several reasons may explain the Court's reluctance to reexamine the functionality of the political question doctrine. First, the judiciary has relied increasingly on other devices to limit its intervention in federal administrative policymaking, including the Supreme Court's rulings on STANDING, STATE ACTION, SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY, and constraints on equitable remedies. These alternatives have certain tactical and ideological advantages over the traditional political question doctrine: they apply to constitutional challenges against state and municipal, as well as federal, government violations, and without overruling the political question standards established during the WARREN COURT's expansive enforcement of CIVIL RIGHTS, the BURGER COURT and REHNQUIST COURT have exploited these relatively fluid devices to impose more severe restrictions on judicial regulation of government operations.

A second reason the Court may be unwilling to reexamine the doctrine is that scholarly criticism has challenged the integrity of a conceptual division of politics and law. Surely there can be no definitive and principled distinction between a political decision and a legal one in terms of their real-world consequences. A legal decision will have political effects, just as any political decision might. For example, deciding whether federal minimum-wage standards for state employees unduly interfere with the sovereign authority of state government or whether federal restrictions on political campaign contributions violate a contributor's FREEDOM OF SPEECH rights requires the judiciary either to approve the current balance of powers and rights struck by Congress or to disapprove it and redistribute the balance by imposing constitutional restraints on Congress. In another and less obvious sense, many constitutional decisions will turn on questions that are not essentially legal. Thus, some questions—for example, whether the state's interest in the preservation of fetal life during a woman's pregnancy is any less compelling before the point of viability than after it and whether a political party has been disadvantaged enough by a political gerrymander to claim unconstitutional vote dilution—may be legal because they are framed in intellectual ways familiar to lawyers and the federal judiciary assumes power to decide them. But the same questions are political in the sense that they cannot be answered except by reference to some theory of value which is inherently political (in the examples, a theory underlying a right of reproductive choice or a right to an undiluted vote). The stronger the system of judicial supervision of governmental policymaking, the more likely it is that a legal question will implicate political considerations and consequences.

Reasonably, the Court may be loath to recognize a collapse of the formal distinction between politics and law, for the merger of political and legal questions muddles the role of the federal judiciary in the tripartite national governmental system. If the questions underlying most constitutional claims involve obvious political considerations, what justifies the federal judiciary in second-guessing the policy decisions of the political branches? Ultimately, the analytical flaws of the political question doctrine threaten to unseat the Court as the primary interpreter of the Constitution.

DAVID M. SKOVER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Campaign Finance; Constitutional Interpretation; Equity; Judicial Policymaking.)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill.

KOMESAR, NEIL 1984 Taking Institutions Seriously: Introduction to a Strategy for Constitutional Analysis. University of Chicago Law Review 56:366–446.

NAGEL, ROBERT 1989 Political Law, Legalistic Politics: A Recent History of the Political Question Doctrine. University of Chicago Law Review 56:643–669.

REDISH, MARTIN 1985 Judicial Review and the "Political Question." Northwestern University Law Review 79:1031–1061.

SCHARPF, FRITZ 1966 Judicial Review and the Political Question: A Functional Analysis. Yale Law Journal 75:517–597.

POLITICAL QUESTION DOCTRINE
(Update 2)

Since its modern-era recognition of the political question DOCTRINE in BAKER V. CARR (1962), the Supreme Court has never signaled a weakening of its nominal commitment to the principle that some issues do not lend themselves to adjudication in a court of law. In an increasingly large majority of cases in which a party has argued that the doctrine bars adjudication, however, the Court has found it to be an insufficient justification for departure from the normal presumption of JUDICIAL REVIEW.

The scope of the political question doctrine has been shaped as much by cases in which the Court found it not to apply as by cases in which the Court applied the doctrine. Indeed, the Court has repeatedly refused to dismiss even cases falling within categories that many commentators had thought were defined as "political" in nature. These include cases involving FOREIGN AFFAIRS and TREATIES; political GERRYMANDERING; legislative apportionment; structural requirements on the internal workings of the legislative branch; and specific grants of power to Congress such as the power to control IMMIGRATION; and the authority over AMERICAN INDIAN affairs. From these decisions, it is clear that the Court does not avoid adjudication merely because of the topic involved in the litigation. Indeed, some commentators believe that to do so would be an abdication of the Court's responsibility to decide CASES AND CONTROVERSIES.

The key to the Court's recognition of a nonjusticiable issue is the nature of the legal wrong. If the plaintiff can allege a concrete injury caused by the defendant's violation of a legal provision, the Court will ordinarily consider that claim on the merits, unless the provision at stake does not specify enforceable limits on the defendant's behavior. Even if the law involves politically sensitive areas or matters over which the other branches may have wide latitude for discretion, the Court has been willing to adjudicate as long as it can identify those legal limits against which the defendant's conduct can be evaluated. In the rare case in which no limits are specified, such as in the clause guaranteeing a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT, the Court will dismiss.

NIXON V. UNITED STATES (1993) is the first post-Baker case in which a majority of the Court dismissed a claim on political question grounds. The Court found that the alleged violation—the failure of the U.S. SENATE properly to "try" the IMPEACHMENT of a federal judge—rested on an unusual provision of the Constitution that by its terms excluded the Court by granting to the Senate the "sole power to try impeachments." Because no constitutional provision other than the impeachment clauses grants "sole" power, there is little to suggest that this holding will have an impact outside the impeachment context. Thus, developments in the political question doctrine appear to confirm the view of those who have argued that the doctrine does not provide license for the Court to avoid decisions on the merits.

REBECCA L. BROWN
(2000)

Bibliography

BROWN, REBECCA L. 1993 When Political Questions Affect Individual Rights: The Other Nixon v. United States. Supreme Court Review 1993:125–155.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1976 Is There a "Political Question" Doctrine? Yale Law Journal 85:597–625.

MULHERN, J. PETER 1998 In Defense of The Political Question Doctrine. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 137:97–176.

POLITICAL SPEECH

See: Anonymous Political Speech; Campaign Finance; Electoral Process and the First Amendment; First Amendment; Freedom of Speech

POLITICAL TRIALS

Among Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's better-known observations is his declaration in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) that the United States has "a government of laws and not of men." The assertion calls forth visions of a politically neutral legal system, dispensing evenhanded justice without regard to partisan concerns or to the identities of the parties. Yet, much in American legal history belies Marshall's aphorism. This country's past is replete with political trials, and they have done more than a little to shape its constitutional law.

In a sense, of course, all trials are political. Courts, judges, and the other institutions and individuals involved in the administration of justice are part of a system of government; even when they do no more than punish an ordinary crime or resolve a private dispute, they help to demonstrate the utility of that system and to maintain its authority. To most people, though, the term "political trial" connotes something more; it designates a type of legal proceeding having peculiar properties that distinguish it from ordinary civil and criminal litigation. There is much disagreement about what those defining attributes are, but a political trial is probably best defined as any civil or criminal trial or IMPEACHMENT proceeding that immediately affects, or is intended to affect, the structure, personnel, or policies of government; that is the product of political controversy; or that results when those in control of the machinery of government seek to use the courts to disadvantage their rivals or preserve their own economic or social position. Some commentators would dispute the inclusion of civil proceedings within this definition, but from the earliest days of the Republic, suits seeking damages, injunctions, and various special writs have been used to mobilize judicial machinery in support of political causes and to suppress critics of the government.

Most political trials are criminal, however. In some, the defendants are charged with offenses that are political in nature, involving direct challenges to governmental authority. TREASON is the most serious crime of this type. Others include SEDITIOUS LIBEL, subversion, sabotage, and espionage. Prosecutions for bribery, corruption, abuse of official power, and vote fraud also belong in this category.

A trial can be political even if the defendant is not charged with one of these political offenses, for sometimes political issues pervade trials for ordinary crimes. As Otto Kirchheimer has pointed out, "political coloring [can] be imported to such a garden-variety criminal trial by the motives or objectives of the prosecution or by the political background, affiliation, or standing of the defendant." The 1886 Haymarket case, in which defendants were prosecuted and convicted on charges of CONSPIRACY to commit murder and being accessories after the fact in a fatal bombing only because they were anarchists, is an example of the kind of proceeding to which he refers.

Like many political trials, the Haymarket case was a product of political persecution. Sometimes, though, the defendant imports the political coloring to a criminal case. A courtroom provides the accused with a public forum and an audience for his political message. Thus, during the 1920s, General Billy Mitchell deliberately provoked his superiors into court-martialing him for conduct prejudicial to the discipline and good order of the army so that he could gain a hearing for his views on air power and publicize what he regarded as the military's misuse of aviation.

Not all political trials involve such deliberate exploitation of judicial machinery for political purposes. Some earn this designation simply because political considerations determined their outcome. An example is the WORLD WAR I trial of Joe Hill. Hill's affiliation with a radical labor organization, the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), was unknown when he was arrested for a murder, but it was the reason for his ultimate unfair conviction on that charge.

A trial should also be considered political if the ordinary crime of which the defendant was accused was a product of political controversy or committed for political reasons. The WATERGATE burglary and coverup conspiracy trials exemplify this type of proceeding. The offenses with which the government charged the defendants were not inherently political, but the fact that the defendants were alleged to have committed them to advance RICHARD M. NIXON's reelection campaign and to protect the reputation of his administration gave their trials a clearly political character.

Legal proceedings can sometimes take on that coloration simply because they happen to affect substantially the politics of their time. During the VIETNAM WAR, Lieutenant William Calley was court-martialed for his role in the massacre of more than one hundred civilians at My Lai. Because it symbolized for hawks and doves alike all that they believed was wrong with the American military effort in Southeast Asia, the Calley case became one of the major political issues of the early 1970s.

Many of America's best-known political trials have arisen against the backdrop of military conflict. Both the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and the CIVIL WAR generated prosecutions for treason and other explicitly political offenses. During and just after World War I the federal government and numerous states launched legal assaults on radicals and dissenters. WORLD WAR II produced a circuslike sedition trial of some of the most vitriolic right-wing critics of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, as well as postwar prosecutions of U.S. citizens alleged to have collaborated with the enemy and of leaders of the defeated Axis powers. Scores of American communists found themselves on trial during the KOREAN WAR. The Vietnam War also unleashed a torrent of political trials, produced by the efforts of the administrations of LYNDON B. JOHNSON and Richard Nixon to repress dissent and the determination of antiwar activists to obtain a judicial declaration of the war's illegality. International tensions falling short of shooting wars have also given rise to numerous political trials, such as those of Jeffersonian politicians and editors during the Quasi-War between the United States and France in the 1790s and, more recently, the trials of domestic communists during the early days of the Cold War.

Second only to military confrontations as a cause of political trials are conflicts between labor and capital. Indeed, during the period 1870–1930 they were more important. During that era big business exercised a growing influence over all levels and branches of government, and it could generally count on the assistance of prosecutors and judges in putting down challenges to its economic power. Prominent union leaders, such as EUGENE V. DEBS of the American Railway Union and "Big Bill" Haywood of the IWW, found themselves cast as defendants in highly politicized legal proceedings, as did numerous other labor activists. During World War I federal criminal prosecutions devastated the IWW.

After the rise of organized labor to political power during the 1930s, labor-management conflict ceased to generate a significant number of political trials. Racial problems continued to do so, as they had since antebellum days when white southerners sometimes tried rebellious slaves, and numerous northern abolitionists suffered prosecution for interfering with enforcement of the FUGITIVE SLAVE Law of 1850. The most spectacular political trial of the antebellum era was the 1859 state treason prosecution of abolitionist firebrand John Brown for his raid on Harpers Ferry, Virginia (now West Virginia). Although the Civil War destroyed SLAVERY, it did not put an end to political trials whose root cause was race. From West Point Cadet Johnson Whitaker in the 1880s to members of the Black Panther party in the late 1960s and early 1970s, African Americans who challenged white supremacy, whether violently or peacefully, found themselves defendants in political trials. The peak period for such prosecutions was the decade around 1970, which produced the highly publicized LeRoi Jones, Angela Davis, Bobby Seale, and Panther Twenty-one cases.

All of these black militants had positioned themselves well outside the political mainstream. Like the defendants in most American political trials, they were essentially scapegoats who lacked real power and posed threats to the system that were more symbolic than real. Seldom have those in authority hauled serious rivals into court. Early American history does offer some examples of legal attacks on potent challengers to incumbent regimes, such as the SEDITION ACT prosecutions of the Republican opposition in the late 1790s. But most such trials occurred before the concept of a legitimate political opposition had fully established itself, and most triggered a popular reaction against those who had initiated them. There have been few prosecutions of mainstream opposition groups since the Civil War.

Nor has the United States produced many examples of that staple of political justice elsewhere, the "successor regime trial," a criminal prosecution brought by those who have recently captured control of the government to discredit their predecessors in power. The principal reason for this is no doubt the constitutional stability that has kept America under the same system of government for over two hundred years. But even after the North forcefully displaced the state and national governments of the South during the Civil War, it tried few leaders of the defeated Confederate regime. In the United States, political trials have usually occurred, not after wrenching transfers of power, but at times when the status quo was under challenge because of social and political ferment unleashed by war, economic conflict, or racial discord.

Although not associated with cataclysmic constitutional change, such legal proceedings have helped to shape the Constitution. In some doctrinal areas the precedents that supplement the language of the document itself are entirely the products of political trials. This is most obviously true of the procedures worked out by the House and Senate to supplement the purely political process of impeachment. The law of treason is also a product of political trials.

So are some FREEDOM OF SPEECH doctrines. Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS worked out their CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test in response to appeals by radicals prosecuted during World War I and the postwar Red Scare. That test gained the endorsement of a majority of the Supreme Court in HERNDON V. LOWRY (1937), only to be restrictively reinterpreted in DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951). Both cases arose out of political trials of communists. In BRANDENBURG V. OHIO (1969) the Court, in the process of overturning a conviction of a Ku Klux Klansman for the political offense of CRIMINAL SYNDICALISM, articulated a new principle even more protective of expression than the original clear and present danger test had been.

Political trials have affected other facets of constitutional law as well. For example, UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1973), which recognized but limited the doctrine of EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE, arose out of the efforts of SPECIAL PROSECUTOR Leon Jaworski to obtain White House tapes for use in the Watergate conspiracy trial. The ringing declaration in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866) that the Constitution "covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances" and cannot be "suspended during any of the great exigencies of government" represents a doctrinal response to the ABRAHAM LINCOLN administration's efforts to use military commissions to punish civilian dissidents. Even Marbury v. Madison, the case in which the Supreme Court first applied the doctrine of JUDICIAL REVIEW, was a product of efforts to use judicial machinery to achieve political objectives.

The Court has, to be sure, exhibited some reluctance to decide issues thrust before it in this way. The POLITICAL QUESTION doctrine is evidence of that attitude, as is the Court's refusal during the Vietnam conflict to hear appeals pressed upon it by litigants hoping to get the war declared unconstitutional. Nevertheless, political trials have led to rulings that have created precedents and shaped doctrine in important areas of the law. As ALEXIS DE TOQUEVILLE wrote in Democracy in America, "Scarcely any political question arises in the United States that is not resolved, sooner or later, into a judicial question." Often that resolution has begun in the context of a political trial. Although often condemned, such proceedings are an integral part of the American constitutional tradition.

MICHAEL R. BELKNAP
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Iran-Contra Affair; Military Justice; Politics; Special Prosecutor.)

Bibliography

BECKER, THEODORE L., ed. 1971 Political Trials. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill.

BELKNAP, MICHAEL R., ed. 1981 American Political Trials. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

HACKMAN, NATHAN 1972 Political Trials in the Legal Order: A Political Scientist's Perspective. Journal of Public Law 21:73–126.

KIRCHHEIMER, OTTO 1961 Political Justice: The Use of Legal Procedure for Political Ends. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

POLITICS

Constitutions are fundamentally linked to the character of politics. At the most obvious level constitutions structure the political process. The United States Constitution defines who may serve in various elected offices, the terms of office (the frequency of election), the number of representatives, and the manner of their election. But, as important if not as obvious, constitutions in general and the United States Constitution in particular are also shaped by basic concerns about the character of politics and its malfunctions or evils. These concerns are reflected in the structures of politics established in the Constitution, the debates about the Constitution, and the evolution of constitutional law over the last two hundred years.

Two basic visions of political malfunction—one that stresses fear of the many (majoritarian bias) and one that stresses fear of the few (minoritarian bias)—coexist in traditional American views of government and constitutional history. Minoritarian bias supposes an inordinate power in the few at the expense of the many. Political power and influence, whether gained by graft, propaganda, or campaign support, often require organization and resources. Here a majority, each of whose members suffers only small loss from a government action, can be at a significant disadvantage to a minority with large per capita gains. The total loss to the majority may far outweigh the gains to the minority, but if the per capita loss is small enough, members of the majority may not even recognize that loss. Even if a member of the majority knows of the proposed legislation and recognizes its dangers, each individual has small incentive to spend time or money in organizing others. These efforts are further frustrated by the likelihood that other members of the majority will be inclined to "free ride" (i.e., refuse to participate or assume that others will carry the load).

Majoritarian bias is a completely opposite response to the same skewed distribution of impacts that characterizes minoritarian bias. Here the numerical majority, with its small per capita interests, imposes disproportionate losses on an intense, concentrated minority. The difference between majoritarian and minoritarian bias lies in suppositions about the political process. If we suppose that everyone understands and votes his interests and if we assume a political process that counts votes for or against but does not consider the severity of impact or the intensity of feeling about the issue, a low-impact majority can prevail over a high-impact minority, even though the majority gains little and the minority is harmed greatly. The power of the many lies simply in numbers, and malfunctions arise because the few are disproportionately harmed.

Concerns about both majoritarian and minoritarian bias have been with Americans throughout their constitutional history, from the framing of the original Constitution to the modern era. The period of the framing and RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION shows clear concern about these forms of bias. Indeed, the two opposing constitutional positions of the time FEDERALISM and ANTI-FEDERALISM—can be defined by differences in their concern about majoritarian and minoritarian bias.

The authors of THE FEDERALIST recognized the existence of both forms of bias, expressed concern about both, but seemed to worry more about majorities. JAMES MADISON, in particular, placed great emphasis on the dangers of the majority in Federalist #10:

> If a faction consists of less than a majority, relief is applied by the republican principle, which enables the majority to defeat its sinister views by regular vote: It may clog the administration, it may convulse the society; but it will be unable to execute or mask its violence under the forms of the Constitution. When a majority is included in a faction, the form of popular government on the other hand enables it to sacrifice to its ruling passion or interest, both the public good and the rights of other citizens. . . .
>
> The majority . . . must be rendered, by their number and local situation, unable to concert and carry into effect schemes of oppression. . . .
>
> A pure Democracy, by which I mean, a Society, consisting of a small number of citizens, who assemble and administer the Government in person, can admit of no cure for the mischiefs of faction.

Madison's comments reveal the major Federalist response to the perceived danger: the removal or insulation of federal government decision makers from local populations. They sought this insulation in several ways. First, the decision makers were physically distanced. The national capital was generally much farther from most citizens than was the seat of state or LOCAL GOVERNMENT; physical distance was no small factor at a time when travel was so difficult. Second, each of the decision makers was to represent a large number of constituents, thereby making organization of a majority more difficult. Third, they served for relatively long terms, ranging from two to six years, so that their constituents had infrequent access through the ballot box and a complex record to decipher and judge. Fourth, the Senate and President were indirectly elected—the Senate by state legislatures and the President by the ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

The opponents of the Federalists, the more heterogeneous Antifederalists, appeared far more concerned about minoritarian bias. The Antifederalists feared that indirectly elected senators serving long terms would devolve into an aristocracy and combine with the indirectly elected President to allow an easy conduit for "the advantage of the few over the many." In response, they sought rotation in office, shorter terms, the possibility of recall, and easier IMPEACHMENT. They also feared that the House of Representatives was insufficiently numerous to enable it "to resemble the people" and therefore would be subject to influence and corruption. They feared "the superior opportunities for organized voting which they felt to be inherent in the more thickly populated areas." They feared that a Supreme Court not subject to popular control would favor the rich. These fears were all signs of concern about minoritarian bias.

The tension between the Federalist and Antifederalist positions centered significantly on the controversy over the relative roles of large and small jurisdictions—in particular, the role of the states in relation to the national government. The Federalists, who feared the power of the majority more than that of the minority, believed in a strong national government and the indirect election of government officials. The Antifederalists believed in small jurisdictions and feared that as government grew larger and more remote, the concentrated few would subvert the process.

The Federalist and Antifederalist positions both possess inadequacies and inconsistencies. Antifederalists can be seen as heirs to the tradition of classical republicanism. They envisioned a republic small in size, with a small and homogeneous population. The great problem for the Antifederalists was the extrapolation of republican ideals to a large, dispersed, and heterogeneous population. They did not have an alternative for a national government.

For the Federalists, whose vision of government was more directly embodied in the Constitution, the problems were both more subtle and more important. Madison and the Federalists stressed government on a relatively large scale, with political decision makers (legislators and executives) removed from the mass of the populace both by distance and by mode of selection. The analysis of political malfunction employed here suggests that to the extent that the Federalist structure achieved the insulation of officials from the general populace, it traded one bias for another.

Greater distance, more complex modes of selection, and larger, more diverse constituencies provide protection from the masses but not complete isolation. Other paths of influence—and therefore sources of bias—remain and in fact flourish. The more complex setting enhances the power of organization and the accumulation of funds and helps cover underhanded dealings. Isolation provides respite from the masses but far easier access to concentrated minorities. In other words, greater insulation of public officials may purchase protection from majoritarian bias by increasing the potential for minoritarian bias.

Madison and the Federalists were not necessarily wrong to emphasize majoritarian over minoritarian bias. The correct choice depends on a number of factors (such as size of the jurisdiction or complexity of the issues) that may make one or the other bias more likely. It is intriguing to wonder whether the correct choice might be different if one were writing a constitution on a clean slate for the larger, more complex United States of the late twentieth century than it was for the United States of Madison and the Federalists.

The tradeoffs and tensions between majoritarian and minoritarian bias have surfaced elsewhere in American constitutional history. The famous footnote four from UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938), where the Supreme Court set out the general outlines of modern constitutional law, is a microcosm of these tradeoffs and tensions. Footnote four reads:

> There may be narrower scope for operation of the presumption of constitutionality when legislation appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as those of the first ten amendments, which are deemed equally specific when held to be embraced within the Fourteenth.
>
> It is unnecessary to consider now whether legislation which restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, is to be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT than are most other types of legislation. On restrictions upon the right to vote; on restraints upon the dissemination of information . . . ; on interferences with political organizations . . . ; as to prohibition of peaceable assembly. . . .
>
> Nor need we enquire whether similar considerations enter into the review of statutes directed at particular re> ligious, or national, or racial minorities; or whether prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities, and which may call for a correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry.

Examined from the perspective of the tension between majoritarian and minoritarian bias, the various components of Carolene Products—the holding of the case and the principle concerns expressed in the footnote—are very much interrelated.

In Carolene Products the Court applied minimal scrutiny to uphold the economic regulation before it. The legislation at issue in Carolene Products banned the interstate sale of "filled milk," skim milk supplemented with nonmilk fats such as coconut oil. It does not take much scrutiny to see the dairy lobby at work behind the passage and enforcement of the Filled Milk Act. Indeed, the dairy industry's efforts to employ legislation to keep "adulterated" products from grocery shelves and vending booths have a long history. It is perhaps not too uncharitable to suggest that concern for the dairies' pocketbooks rather than for the consumer's health best explains the dairy lobby's efforts: the dairy industry benefited from reduced competition and the resultant higher prices paid by consumers.

The holding of the case abandons serious judicial review of ECONOMIC REGULATION, thereby leaving dispersed majorities like consumers without direct judicial protection from the minoritarian bias that can characterize governmental decisions about economic regulation like that in Carolene Products itself. Seemingly in response to these concerns, paragraph two of the Carolene Products footnote promises indirect aid to dispersed majorities by strengthening their access to and participation in the political process. By protecting access to information, organization, and the vote, the Court focused on activities that would decrease the relative advantage of concentrated interests that trade upon their superiority in gathering information, organizing, and gaining access to power through nonvoting channels.

Yet, although these protections reduce minoritarian bias, they may do little for, and in fact aggravate, majoritarian bias. Government officials whose manipulations of programs reflect the will of a majority have little to fear from public exposure or an expanded franchise. Majoritarian bias is generated when simple democracy works too well. The majority knows its interest and votes it. Because that interest is unweighted, however, a minority suffers substantial losses for disproportionately small gains to the majority. From this vantage, judicial responses like the basic rule of American VOTING RIGHTS—ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE—are well suited to the dissipation of minoritarian bias, but can reinforce majoritarian bias. In the extreme, if it were possible to fully perfect the process by making every citizen totally aware of his or her own interest and able immediately to translate that interest into an effective vote, minoritarian bias would disappear, but majoritarian bias would be worse.

Paragraph three of the Carolene Products footnote responds to the need to protect against this danger of majoritarian bias by promising special judicial examination of those actions most likely infected by majoritarian bias. Subsequent equal protection law decisions made these concerns a central feature of modern constitutional law.

These important historical episodes indicate that the character of constitutions and the character of politics are tightly interwoven. Constitutions determine, and are determined by, the character of politics.

NEIL K. KOMESAR
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Conservatism; Federalists; Jacksonianism; Jeffersonianism; Liberalism; Populism; Pragmatism; Progressivism; Republican Party.)

Bibliography

KOMESAR, NEIL K. 1984 Taking Institutions Seriously. University of Chicago Law Review 51:366–446.

——— 1987 Back to the Future—An Institutional View of Making and Interpreting Constitutions. Northwestern Law Review 81:191–219.

——— 1987 Paths of Influence—Beard Revisited. George Washington Law Review 56:124–135.

——— 1988 A Job for the Judges: The Judiciary and the Constitution in a Massive and Complex Society. Michigan Law Review 86:657–721.

POLK, JAMES KNOX
(1795–1849)

The eleventh President's constitutional beliefs blended STRICT CONSTRUCTION, expediency, and continental vision. He returned to a central theme of Jacksonian constitutionalism to harmonize these divergent interests: the President was the tribune of the people, the only nationally elected federal official.

Polk stressed the SEPARATION OF POWERS in order to legitimate the popularly based presidential power he exercised. He recognized that congressional committees had legitimate claims to information held by the executive branch, but he spurned congressional requests that intruded upon areas of constitutional responsibility he believed assigned to the President, most notably FOREIGN AFFAIRS. He rebuffed, in 1848, SENATE advice to negotiate a treaty of extradition with Prussia and to secure the purchase rights of the Hudson's Bay Company on the Columbia River. Yet Polk acknowledged that Congress commanded a broad sphere of constitutional responsibility; he vetoed only three legislative acts.

Polk contributed significantly to the constitutional development of the COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF clause. Unlike ABRAHAM LINCOLN, he believed that the clause granted only military leadership to the President. Yet Polk made use of this power to implement his policy of continentalism. He ordered General ZACHARY TAYLOR into disputed territory between the United States and Mexico knowing that such actions were likely to precipitate hostilities. When the Mexicans responded with force, Congress was left to ratify a war rather than to fulfill its constitutional mandate to declare it. Throughout the ensuing conflict Polk established the precedent that a vigorous conception of the commander-in-chief clause meant control over military affairs.

Tough and efficient, Polk was a transitional figure in the constitutional evolution toward the modern presidency. Unlike his twentieth-century counterparts, Polk, with his strict constructionist beliefs, did not think that the right of self-defense or the inherent authority of the commander-in-chief bestowed on him the power to wage war against another country without congressional authorization.

KERMIT L. HALL
(1986)

Bibliography

MCCOY, CHARLES A. 1960 Polk and the Presidency. Austin: University of Texas Press.

POLLAK, WALTER H.
(1887–1940)

Walter H. Pollak, an active supporter of CIVIL LIBERTIES, argued a number of important cases before the Supreme Court. He represented the defendant in GITLOW V. NEW YORK (1925) and, although he lost that case, succeeded in convincing the Court that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT incorporates the FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees of FREEDOM OF THE PRESS and FREEDOM OF SPEECH against the states. With ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, Pollak served on the Wickersham Committee and investigated "lawlessness in law enforcement." He also took part in WHITNEY V. CALIFORNIA (1927) and successfully defended the "Scottsboro boys" in POWELL V. ALABAMA (1932) and NORRIS V. ALABAMA (1935).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

POLLOCK v. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO.
157 U.S. 429 and 158 U.S. 601 (1895)

CHARLES EVANS HUGHES called these decisions a "self-inflicted wound" comparable to the decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857). Here the Supreme Court held unconstitutional an 1894 act of Congress that fixed a flat tax of two percent on all annual incomes over $4,000. Pollock filed a STOCKHOLDER'S SUIT against the trust company to prevent it from complying with the statute which, he claimed, imposed a DIRECT TAX without apportioning it among the states on the basis of population. The trust company, the party of record on the side of the tax, avoided the appearance of collusion by hiring the president of the American Bar Association, James Coolidge Carter; Richard Olney, attorney general of the United States, was on the same side as AMICUS CURIAE. Theirs was the easy task because history and all the precedents proved that the clause of Article 1, section 9, referring to direct taxes, meant only taxes on people or on land. The Court had so declared in HYLTON V. UNITED STATES (1796) and in several other cases, especially SPRINGER V. UNITED STATES (1881), a direct precedent; the Court there had unanimously sustained an earlier income tax as imposing an indirect tax and therefore not subject to the requirement of apportionment.

Counsel for Pollock, led by JOSEPH H. CHOATE, buttressed a weak case with an impassioned argument intended to provoke judicial fear and reflecting the panic felt by many conservatives. Choate warned that the Court had to choose between "the beginning of socialism and communism" and the preservation of private property, civilization, and the Constitution. He appealed to the Court to substitute its discretion for that of Congress.

Justice HOWELL E. JACKSON not having participated, an eight-member Court decided the case. All agreed that the federal tax on municipal bonds was unconstitutional, because government instrumentalities were exempt from taxation (see INTERGOVERNMENTAL IMMUNITIES). On the question of the validity of the tax on income from personal property, the Court divided evenly. But on the question of the validity of the tax on income from real estate, the Court voted 6–2 that it was a direct tax unconstitutionally assessed. Nothing favorable can be said about Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER's opinion for the majority. He took for granted the very proposition he should have proved, asserting that a tax on the income from land was indistinguishable from a tax on the land itself. Clearly, however, the income that may derive from rents, timber, oil, minerals, or agriculture is distinguishable from a tax on acreage or on the assessed value of the land itself.

Fuller distinguished away the precedents: Hylton had decided only that a tax on carriages was not a direct tax, and Springer had decided only the narrow point that a tax on a lawyer's fees was not a direct one. Neither case, Fuller declared, dealt with a tax on the income from land, and he made much of the point that such a tax is unique because of the undisputed fact that a tax on the land itself is undoubtedly a direct tax. Justices EDWARD D. WHITE and JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, dissenting, concluded that history and STARE DECISIS demanded a different ruling, and they warned that when the Court virtually annulled its previous decisions on the basis of the policy preferences of a majority that happened to dominate the bench, the Constitution was in jeopardy.

The tie vote of the Court on all other issues meant that the decision of the CIRCUIT COURT prevailed, leaving in force the taxes on corporate income, wages and salaries, and returns from investments. Accordingly, Choate moved for a rehearing, which was granted, and Justice Jackson attended. The trust company, which was supposed to defend the income tax act, did not retain Carter or replace him, thus leaving Olney to defend it. He took half the time permitted by the Court for his presentation.

The arguments the second time focused on the validity of the tax on the income from personal property, mainly interest and dividends. Fuller, speaking for a bare majority, again read the Court's opinion. Six weeks earlier he had based his position on the uniqueness of a tax on the income from land; now he took the opposite view, reasoning that if a tax on the income from land is a direct tax, so is a tax on the income from personal property. Having found the statute void in significant respects, he reasoned next that the invalidity of some sections contaminated the rest: since the sections were inseparable, all were void because some were.

When Fuller finished his opinion, Harlan began to read his dissent; it sizzled in its language and delivery. He ended a systematic refutation by pounding his desk, shaking his finger in the face of the Chief Justice, and shouting, "On my conscience I regard this decision as a disaster!" (The Nation magazine described Harlan as an "agitator" who expounded "the Marx gospel from the bench.") He accused the majority of an unprecedented use of judicial power on behalf of private wealth by striking down a statute whose policy they disliked and by doing it against all law and history. He also pointed out, as did the other dissenters, Justices White, Jackson, and HENRY B. BROWN, that the parts of the statute that were not unconstitutional per se, and might be reenacted if Congress chose, taxed the income of people who earned their money from wages and salaries but who derived no income from land or invested personal property. The decision, said Brown, is "nothing less than a surrender of the taxing power to the moneyed class" making for "a sordid despotism of wealth." It "takes invested wealth," said White, and "reads it into the Constitution as a favored and protected class of property. . . ." It was, said Jackson, "the most disastrous blow ever struck at the constitutional power of congress" and made the tax burden fall "most heavily and oppressively upon those having the least ability" to pay.

Public opinion was opposed to the Court, though it had vigorous supporters especially among the Republican newspapers in the East. The New York Sun exclaimed in delight, "Five to Four, the Court Stands Like a Rock." The New York Herald Tribune hailed the Court for halting a "communist revolution." The Democratic party, however, recommended an amendment to the Constitution vesting Congress with the power denied by the Court. The SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT was not ratified, though, until 1913, by which time the nation's maldistribution of wealth had intensified. For eighteen years, as EDWARD S. CORWIN wrote, "the veto of the Court held the sun and moon at pause," while the great fortunes went untaxed. The government during that time raised almost all of its revenues from EXCISE TAXES and tariffs, whose burden fell mainly on consumers. In 1913 the average annual income in the United States was $375 per capita.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1932 Court over Constitution. Pages 177–209. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

KING, WILLARD L. 1950 Melville Weston Fuller. Pages 193–221. New York: Macmillan.

PAUL, ARNOLD M. 1960 Conservative Crisis and the Rule of Law: Attitudes of Bar and Bench, 1887–1895. Pages 159–220. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

SHIRAS, GEORGE, 3RD, and SHIRAS, WINFIELD 1953 Justice George Shiras Jr. of Pittsburgh. Pages 160–183. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press.

POLLOCK v. WILLIAMS
322 U.S. 4 (1944)

A Florida statute made the failure to perform services according to an agreement (for which an advance had been made) prima facie evidence of an intent to defraud. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, voided the statute, 7–2, as a violation of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT and of the Anti-Peonage Act of 1867. At issue before the Court was a HABEAS CORPUS petition for "an illiterate Negro laborer in the toils of law for the want of $5." His failure to perform agreed-upon labor for that advance resulted in a $100 fine, in default of which he was sentenced to sixty days' imprisonment. Jackson held that the Thirteenth Amendment and the Anti-Peonage Act "raised both a shield and a sword against forced labor because of debt."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

POLL TAX

A poll tax (CAPITATION TAX, head tax) is typically levied on every adult (or adult male) within the taxing JURISDICTION. An old technique for raising revenue, the tax in its compulsory form raises no important constitutional questions. (Under Article I, section 9, Congress can levy a poll tax only by apportionment to the national census. Congress has not in fact raised revenue this way.)

Serious constitutional issues have been raised in this century by poll taxes whose payment is "voluntary," enforced only by conditioning voter registration on their payment. Early in the nation's history, payment of such taxes came to replace property ownership as a qualification for voting. By the CIVIL WAR, however, widespread acceptance of universal suffrage had virtually eliminated the poll tax as a condition on voting.

In a number of southern states, the poll tax returned in the 1890s along with SEGREGATION as a means of maintaining white supremacy. In theory and in early practice, poor whites as well as blacks were kept from voting by this means. Later, however, some registrars learned to use the device mainly for purposes of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, requiring only black would-be voters to produce their receipts for poll tax payments—in some states for payments going back to the voter's twenty-first year. The poll tax gradually fell from favor as a means of keeping blacks from voting; "good character" requirements and LITERACY TESTS, for example, were more readily adapted to this purpose. By 1940 only seven states retained the poll tax as a voting condition.

In BREEDLOVE V. SUTTLES (1937), a case involving a white applicant for registration, the Supreme Court upheld Georgia's use of the poll tax as a condition on voting. The poll tax remained a CIVIL RIGHTS issue, kept alive in Congress by the regular introduction of bills to abolish its use. Southern committee chairmanships and senatorial filibusters succeeded in sidetracking this legislation. When the TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT was finally submitted to the states in 1962, it forbade the use of poll taxes as a condition on voting only in federal, not state, elections. The Amendment was ratified in 1964.

Two years later, the Supreme Court held, in HARPER V. VIRGINIA BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), that conditioning voting in state elections on poll tax payments denied the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. Only four states still retained the device, but its elimination eloquently symbolized the relation between VOTING RIGHTS and the equal CITIZENSHIP of all Americans.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

MYRDAL, GUNNAR 1944 An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy. Chaps. 22–23. New York: Harper & Brothers.

POLLUTION

See: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution; Federalism and Environmental Law; Waste, Pollution, and the Constitution

POLYGAMY

Because polygamy was one of the early tenets of the Mormon Church, the movement to eradicate plural MARRIAGE became bound up with religious persecution. The Supreme Court has consistently held that the FIRST AMENDMENT's protections of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY do not protect the practice of plural marriage. Thus REYNOLDS V. UNITED STATES (1879) upheld a criminal conviction for polygamy in the Territory of Utah, and DAVIS V. BEASON (1880) upheld a conviction for voting in the Territory of Idaho in violation of an oath required of all registrants forswearing belief in polygamy. The corporate charter of the Mormon Church in the Territory of Utah was revoked, and its property forfeited to the government, in CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS V. UNITED STATES (1890). The church's First Amendment claim was waved away with the statement that belief in polygamy was not a religious tenet but a "pretense" that was "contrary to the spirit of Christianity."

It would be comforting if this judicial record were confined to the nineteenth century, but it was not. In Cleveland v. United States (1946), the Court upheld a conviction of Mormons under the MANN ACT for transporting women across state lines for the purpose of "debauchery" that took the form of living with them in polygamous marriage. The Court's opinion, citing the nineteenth-century cases and even quoting the "spirit of Christianity" language with approval, was written by none other than Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS.

More recently, the Court has recognized a constitutional right to marry, and in a number of contexts has afforded protection for a FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION. With or without the ingredient of religious freedom, SUB-STANTIVE DUE PROCESS doctrine seems amply to justify an extension of these rights to plural marriage among competent consenting adults. Yet the force of conventional morality in constitutional adjudication should not be underestimated; the Supreme Court is not just the architect of principle but an institution of government. Polygamy is not on the verge of becoming a constitutional right.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

LARSON, GUSTAVE O. 1971 The "Americanization" of Utah for Statehood. San Marino, Calif.: Huntington Library.

POMEROY, JOHN NORTON

See: Commentators on the Constitution

POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY

"Popular sovereignty" was a solution proposed by some northern Democrats to the problem of slavery's access to the TERRITORIES. As an alternative to the WILMOT PROVISO, Michigan Senator Lewis Cass proposed in 1847 that slavery be left "to the people inhabiting [the territories] to regulate their internal concerns their own way." He later concluded that congressional prohibition of SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES was unconstitutional. Popular sovereignty was a radical innovation: never before had residents of the territories been thought to be invested with SOVEREIGNTY, let alone a territorial sovereignty implying that the federal government lacked substantive regulatory power over the territories.

Illinois Senator STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS took up popular sovereignty in 1854, recommending that the MISSOURI COMPROMISE be jettisoned in order to get the slavery question out of Congress and leave it to the settlers of the territories. Though adopted in the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT, popular sovereignty soon fell into disfavor in both the North and the South. Douglas and other northern Democrats rejected the travesty made of it by President JAMES BUCHANAN in his attempt to force slavery into Kansas, while southern leaders abandoned it in favor of a constitutional program that would have forced slavery into all the territories.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

JOHANNSEN, ROBERT W. 1973 Stephen A. Douglas. New York: Oxford University Press.

POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY IN DEMOCRATIC POLITICAL THEORY

The Constitution's first words bespeak its derivation from popular authority: "We the people of the United States . . . do ordain and establish this Constitution." The DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE expresses the principle of this act: "to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." The specific doctrine of popular sovereignty behind these familiar phrases still needs to be clarified and distinguished from related but distinct doctrines.

This doctrine of popular SOVEREIGNTY relates primarily not to the Constitution's operation but to its source of authority and supremacy, ratification, amendment, and possible abolition. When JAMES MADISON wrote in THE FEDERALIST #49 that "the people are the only legitimate fountain of power," he referred to what he had called in The Federalist #40 (paraphrasing the Declaration) "the transcendent and precious right of the people to "abolish or alter their governments." Legitimate power derives primarily from the people's original consent to their form of government, not from their continuing role in it. Because popular consent is the "pure, original fountain of all legitimate authority," ALEXANDER HAMILTON, in The Federalist #22, presents the RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION by conventions specially elected by the people, a mode recently pioneered by the states, as crucial to its legitimacy. The Federalist both opens and closes remarking that for a whole people so to choose their constitution by voluntary consent, far from being typical, is an unprecedented prodigy.

This American mode of popular consent to the institution of government formalized the notion in JOHN LOCKE's Second Treatise of "the Constitution of the Legislative being the original and supreme act of the Society, antecedent to all positive Laws in it, and depending wholly on the People." It provides a peaceful, certain, and solemn alternative to violent and irregular acts but remains ultimately an expression of the right to revolution; Madison almost admits in The Federalist #40 that adoption of the Constitution was authorized not under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION but only by popular consent as an exercise of revolutionary right. Such popular sovereignty could always be exercised again not only by regular amendment but by revolution.

For the Founders, legitimate government not only had to derive its powers originally from the consent of the people but also had to gain the consent of their regularly elected representatives to legislate for them and tax them. The revolutionary controversy was fundamentally waged, first, over the American invocation of Locke's position that government "must not raise Taxes on the Property of the People, without the Consent of the People, given by themselves, or their Deputies," and then over its extension to no legislation without REPRESENTATION.

Such popular sovereignty still is not identical with popular government. The Founders generally regarded the British constitution, for example, with its hereditary king and lords, as a legitimate and even free government because the British (unlike the American) people were represented (albeit imperfectly) in the House of Commons. Republican government, although the form of government best exhibiting the capacity of mankind for self-government, was not the only form compatible with popular consent as the basis of legitimate power. Because Madison correctly believed that the character of the American people makes them unlikely to exercise their sovereign right to replace their republican government with one of another form, this point is relevant less to our domestic than to our foreign policy, which in principle should recognize the right of other sovereign peoples to consent to other forms of government.

Republican government itself differs for the Founders from the populism some later doctrines equate with popular sovereignty. The Federalist treats republican government as a species of popular government in that it is administered by officials appointed directly or indirectly by the people and holding office for limited periods or during GOOD BEHAVIOR. It differs from the other species, which they called "democracy" and by which they meant direct democracy, by its reliance on representation. The Federalist regards this difference not as an evil necessitated by size (as some Anti-Federalists did) but as a superiority making possible both size, with all its advantages, and government by "men who possess most wisdom to discern, and most virtue to pursue, the common good of the society." (THOMAS JEFFERSON in a letter to JOHN ADAMS called such republican officials "the natural aristocracy.") Republican representatives should refine and enlarge the public views because the reason, not the passion, the cool and deliberate sense, not the temporary errors and delusions, of the public should prevail. The Founders regarded the American republic as embodying the sovereignty of the public reason because it was so constructed as to encourage representatives, especially the Senate, President, and courts, to withstand popular error and passion until popular good sense could respond to argument and events. Their opinion that such an outcome would generally emerge in the few years allowed by the Constitution reveals confidence in both representatives and constituents as well as distrust.

The supremacy of the Constitution and JUDICIAL REVIEW, distinctive features of American CONSTITUTIONALISM, are paradoxical results of this doctrine of popular sovereignty. Hamilton in The Federalist #78, like JOHN MARSHALL in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), based them on the Constitution's being the special act of the sovereign people: "the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents." The equation of popular sovereignty with the supremacy of the Constitution, let alone with judicial review, may become problematic once the people who ordained and established the Constitution are long dead. Jefferson suggested in a letter to an unpersuaded Madison that all constitutions naturally expire every generation. Madison in reply adduced the danger of faction and the need of even the most rational government for the prejudice that results from stability, but Jefferson continued to believe in the right of each generation to choose its own form of government. The jural argument for constitutional supremacy was stated by Hamilton in Phocion #2 (and echoed in The Federalist #78): "The constitution is the compact made between the society at large and each individual. The society therefore, cannot without breach of faith and injustice, refuse to any individual, a single advantage which he derives under that compact . . . until the compact is dissolved with the same solemnity and certainty with which it was made." Ultimately the identity of popular sovereignty with constitutional supremacy depends on an enlightened public opinion animated by the spirit of the Constitution.

That the Founders tended not to call the doctrine expounded here "popular sovereignty" reflects their being republicans and constitutionalists rather than populists. Not the people simply but their reason especially as solemnly embodied in their Constitution is sovereign. More fundamentally, since governments are instituted by consent "to secure these rights," their legitimacy depends not only on consent but on the security of individual rights. Debates such as that over "popular sovereignty" between ABRAHAM LINCOLN and STEPHEN DOUGLAS reveal the potential tension between popular consent and equal rights.

NATHAN TARCOV
(1986)

Bibliography

EPSTEIN, DAVID F. 1984 The Political Theory of the Federalist. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

JAFFA, HARRY V. (1959) 1982 Crisis of the House Divided: An Interpretation of the Issues in the Lincoln-Douglas Debates. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

TARCOV, NATHAN 1985 American Constitutionalism and Individual Rights. Pages 101–125 in Robert Goldwin and William Schambra, eds., How Does the Constitution Secure Rights? Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute.

POPULISM

The industrialization of the United States in the late nineteenth century caused enormous social, economic, and political upheavals in nearly every sector of the nation. Perhaps no group suffered greater dislocations than the farmers, whose livelihood and prosperity were now subject to forces over which they had no direct control. In a series of movements, farmers joined together seeking remedies to their ills. Agrarian protest reached its peak in the Populist movement in the early 1890s, when farmers took to politics in an effort to implement specific economic and political programs.

One will find little evidence of a direct impact of populism on American constitutional development. Rather, the Populists, as part of their larger reform agenda, did make particular proposals that eventually found fruition in the Progressive era. The clearest statement of these demands can be found in the People's party platform of 1896.

The platform is notable for several reasons. First, it summed up two decades of resentment by the farmers against a system they believed ignored their needs and exploited them mercilessly. Several of the complaints directly addressed the structure and operation of government. To begin with, the Populists denounced the recent Supreme Court decision in POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN TRUST CO. (1895) that had invalidated the 1894 income tax rider to the tariff. To the Populists, this decision represented another example of the government's siding with the rich, and the platform demanded "a graduated income tax, to the end that aggregated wealth shall bear its proportion of taxation." In Pollock, they argued, the Supreme Court had misinterpreted the Constitution and invaded "the rightful powers of Congress" over taxation.

The Populists were not the first to denounce the Pollock decision, but they did add a strong voice to the chorus demanding an income tax. The proposal for a constitutional amendment gradually gained support throughout the country, culminating in ratification of the SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT in 1913.

The platform also called for the election of the President, Vice-President, and the Senate by "a direct vote of the people." Under the Constitution, an ELECTORAL COLLEGE selected the two executive officers, with each state's electors equal to the sum of its senators and representatives. Originally each state could chose its electors as it saw fit, but within a relatively short period of time all states adopted a system in which the popular vote determined which candidate received each state's electoral college ballots—typically in a winner-take-all system. This arrangement emphasized the importance of the larger states and created the possibility that a candidate with a majority of the popular vote could lose in the electoral college. The system has been criticized for decades, and constitutional amendments to abolish the electoral college are periodically introduced in Congress. So far, however, there has been no popular groundswell to carry through a change.

Initially, state legislatures also chose United States senators. In the Gilded Age, bribery and influence peddling often led to the selection of rich industrialists, so that by the 1890s the Senate had come to be known as a "millionaires' club." A few states had preferential primary elections to allow voters to indicate their choice for senator, but the Populists wanted direct election to eliminate what they saw as the corrupting influence of great wealth.

Any change in the election method would require a constitutional amendment, and the House of Representatives passed such an amendment in 1894, 1898, 1900, and 1902; in each session the Senate turned it down. By 1912, thirty states had preferential primaries, and the Senate finally bowed to the inevitable. It passed the SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT, authorizing the direct election of senators, and the states ratified it the following year.

The 1896 Populist platform also called for other political reforms, some of which could be achieved without constitutional amendment. This list included the adoption of a secret ballot, limiting the use of the injunction in labor disputes, and public ownership of the railroad and telegraph. The Populists also proposed "a system of direct legislation through the initiative and referendum, under proper Constitutional safeguards."

The Populists saw many of their platform items enacted within a relative short period of time. They did not cause the adoption of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Amendments, but certainly by adding their voices to the demand they helped to achieve these reforms. Except in wartime, we have never had government ownership or control of railroads and telegraph, but the regulatory powers finally given to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the first decade of the twentieth century provided an equivalent to the Populist demands—that public welfare take precedence over private interests.

The states did adopt secret ballots, and many of them also enacted initiative and referendum measures. Although the secret ballot proved effective in buttressing democratic elections, the other two proposals never proved as effective or easy to use as the Populists had anticipated. The elimination of the injunction as a judicial weapon against labor unions, however, had to wait until the New Deal era.

In sum, the Populist demand for political change itself had relatively little effect on American constitutional development. By adding their voices to the demand for change, however, they reinforced reform currents already underway.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY
(1992)

Bibliography

POLLACK, NORMAN 1987 The Just Polity: Populism, Law, and Human Welfare. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

POPULIST CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

See: Nonjudicial Interpretation of the Constitution; Radical Populist Constitutional Interpretation

PORNOGRAPHY

The Supreme Court's OBSCENITY decisions define the forms of pornography that are protected from censorship by the FIRST AMENDMENT. As a practical matter, this protection is quite broad. Most pornography is also a unique kind of speech: about women, for men. In an era when sexual equality is a social ideal, the constitutional protection of pornography is a vexing political issue. Should pornographic imagery of male dominance and female subordination be repudiated through censorship, or will censorship inevitably destroy our commitment to free speech?

In ROTH V. UNITED STATES (1957) the Court found obscene speech to be unworthy of First Amendment protection because it forms "no essential part of any exposition of ideas." Yet precisely because of pornography's ideational content, some of it was deemed harmful and made criminal. The Court could avoid examining the specific nature of this harm, once it had located obscenity conveniently outside the constitutional pale. But it could not avoid defining obscenity, and thereby identifying the justification for its censorship.

The essential characteristic of "obscene" pornography is its appeal to one's "prurient interest," which is a genteel reference to its capacity to stimulate physical arousal and carnal desire. But such pornography must also be "offensive," and so, to be censored, sex-stimulant speech must be both arousing and disgusting. The meaning of offensiveness depends upon the subjective judgment of the observer, and is best captured by Justice POTTER STEWART's famous aphorism in JACOBELLIS V. OHIO (1964): "I know it when I see it."

Given the limitations of the criminal process, obscenity laws did not make offensive pornography unavailable in the marketplace. As HARRY KALVEN, JR., pointed out, few judges took the evils of obscenity very seriously, although constitutional rhetoric made the law appear to be "solemnly concerned with the sexual fantasies of the adult population." The Court's chief goal was the protection of admired works of art and literature, not the elimination of pornographic magazines at the corner drug store. Sporadic obscenity prosecutions may occur in jurisdictions where the "contemporary community standard" of offensiveness allows convictions under MILLER V. CALIFORNIA (1973). But the constitutional validity of a legal taboo on "hard-core" pornography became largely irrelevant to its suppliers and consumers, even as that material became sexually explicit and more violent in its imagery during the 1970s.

That same decade saw a legal revolution in equality between the sexes, embodied in judicial decisions based on the guarantees of EQUAL PROTECTION and DUE PROCESS. Women won legal rights to control and define their own sexuality, through litigation establishing rights to contraception and abortion, and through legislative reforms easing restrictions on prosecutions for sexual assault. Pornography also became a women's issue, as feminists such as Catharine MacKinnon attacked it as "a form of forced sex, a practice of sexual politics, an institution of gender inequality." Women marched and demonstrated against films and magazines portraying them as beaten, chained, or mutilated objects of sexual pleasure for men. In 1984, their protests took a legal form when MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin drafted an ordinance adopted by the Indianapolis City Council, outlawing some types of pornography as acts of SEX DISCRIMINATION.

By using the concept of equal protection as a basis to attack pornographic speech, the council set up a dramatic assault upon First Amendment doctrine, making embarrassed enemies out of old constitutional friends. As a strategic matter, however, the council needed a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST to justify censorship of speech that did not fall into the obscenity category. The ordinance defined offensive pornography more broadly than Miller's standards allow, because it went beyond a ban on displays of specific human body parts or sexual acts. Instead, it prohibited the "graphic sexually explicit subordination of women" through their portrayals as, for example, "sexual objects who enjoy pain or humiliation," or "sexual objects for domination, conquest, violation, exploitation, possession or use."

As a philosophical matter, sex discrimination is a good constitutional metaphor for the harms attributed to pornography, namely, the loss of equal CITIZENSHIP status for women through the "bigotry and contempt" promoted by the imagery of subordination. But as a matter of DOCTRINE, the causal link between the social presence of pornography and the harms of discrimination is fatally remote. Free speech gospel dictates that "offensive speech" may be censored only upon proof of imminent, tangible harm to individuals, such as violent insurrection (BRANDENBURG V. OHIO, 1969), a physical assault (COHEN V. CALIFORNIA, 1971), or reckless tortious injury to reputation (NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN, 1964). The closest historical analogue to the creation of a cause of action for classwide harm from speech is the criminal GROUP LIBEL statute upheld by a 5–4 Supreme Court in BEAUHARNAIS V. ILLINOIS (1952). But this remedy has been implicitly discredited by New York Times and Brandenburg, given its CHILLING EFFECT upon uninhibited criticism of political policies and officials.

It came as no surprise when early court decisions struck down Indianapolis-type ordinances as void for vagueness, as an unlawful PRIOR RESTRAINT on speech, and as an unjustified restriction of protected speech as defined by the earlier obscenity decisions. The courts could accept neither the equal protection rationale nor the breadth of the ordinances' scope, as both would permit too great an encroachment upon the freedoms of expression and consumption of art, literature, and political messages. Ironically, it is the potentially endemic quality of the imagery of women's subordination that defeats any attempt to place a broad taboo upon it.

Eva Feder Kittay has posed the question, "How is it that within our society, men can derive a sexual charge out of seeing a woman brutalized?" Her answer to that loaded question is that our conceptions of sexuality are permeated with conceptions of domination, because we have eroticized the relations of power: men eroticize sexual conquering, and women eroticize being possessed. Pornography becomes more than a harmless outlet for erotic fantasies when it makes violence appear to be intrinsically erotic, rather than something that is eroticized. The social harm of such pornography is that it brutalizes our moral imagination, "the source of that imaginative possibility by which we can identify with others and hence form maxims having a universal validity."

The constitutional source for an analysis of brutalizing pornography lies in the richly generative symbols of First Amendment law itself. That law already contains the tolerance for insistence "on observance of the civic culture's norms of social equality," in the words of Kenneth L. Karst. Any acceptable future taboo would be likely to take the form of a ban on public display of a narrowly defined class of pictorial imagery, simply because that would be a traditional, readily enforceable compromise between free speech and equality. Any taboo would be mostly symbolic, but it would matter. Only by limiting the taboo can we avoid descending into the Orwellian hell where censorship is billed as freedom.

CATHERINE HANCOCK
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Child Pornography; Dial-a-Porn.)

Bibliography

BRYDEN, DAVID 1985 Between Two Constitutions: Feminism and Pornography. Constitutional Commentary 2:147–189.

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. 1960 The Metaphysics of Obscenity. Supreme Court Review 1960:1–45.

KITTAY, EVA FEDER 1983 Pornography and the Erotics of Domination. Pages 145–174 in Carol C. Gould, ed., Beyond Domination: New Perspectives on Women and Philosophy. Totowa, N.J.: Rowman & Allanheld.

MACKINNON, CATHARINE A. 1984 Not a Moral Issue. Yale Law & Policy Review 2:321–345.

NOTE 1984 Anti-Pornography Laws and First Amendment Values. Harvard Law Review 98:460–481.

PORNOGRAPHY AND CHILDREN

See: Child Pornography; New York v. Ferber

PORNOGRAPHY AND FEMINISM

In 1984 Indianapolis passed an "antipornography civil rights ordinance." PORNOGRAPHY was defined thus:

> the graphic sexually explicit subordination of women, whether in pictures or in words, that also includes one or more of the following: (1) Women who are presented as sexual objects who enjoy pain or humiliation; or (2) Women [who] are presented as sexual objects who experience sexual pleasure in being raped; or (3) Women [who] are presented as sexual objects tied up or cut up or mutilated or bruised or physically hurt, or as dismembered or truncated or fragmented or severed into body parts; or (4) Women [who] are presented as being penetrated by objects or animals; or (5) Women [who] are presented in scenarios of degradation, injury, abasement, torture, shown as filthy or inferior, bleeding, bruised, or hurt in a context that makes these conditions sexual; or (6) Women [who] are presented as sexual objects for domination, conquest, violation, exploitation, possession, or use, or through postures or positions of servility or submission or display.

The ordinance afforded civil, but not criminal, remedies for trafficking in pornography (i.e., sales, exhibitions, or distribution with exceptions for libraries), forcing pornography on a person, coercing a person into pornography, attacking a person because of pornography, or causing such attacks. To some extent, the functional definition of pornography depends on the particular offense under the ordinance. For example, isolated parts of a book would not support a trafficking claim, but they could support a claim against an individual for forcing pornography on someone. Although the ordinance was crafted to protect women against SEX DISCRIMINATION, it is provided that if men, children, or transsexuals were treated in the same manner, they, too, could be afforded protection.

Although there is substantial overlap, Indianapolis's "pornography" is not the Supreme Court's "obscenity." MILLER V. CALIFORNIA (1973) defined OBSCENITY to include material that the "average person, applying contemporary community standards," would find when "taken as a whole appeals to the prurient interest" and "depicts and describes in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law," and that "taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value."

Some of the material falling under the sixth category of the Indianapolis ordinance (e.g., women presented as sexual objects through postures or display) might not be ruled offensive under contemporary community standards, though probably most graphic, sexually explicit material that subordinates women and that also falls within the six specified categories would meet the Miller standard for obscenity. Such material would in the general run of cases be thought to appeal to prurient interests and to be patently offensive under contemporary community standards. The only substantial question would be whether particular material had the serious value specified in the Miller test, and it is doubtful that much of it would.

The ordinance's proponents argue, however, that obscenity law is theoretically and functionally bankrupt. As Catharine MacKinnon writes, they doubt "whether the average person, gender neutral exists; [they have] more questions about the content and process of definition of community standards than deviations from them; [they wonder] why prurience counts but powerlessness does not; why sensibilities are better protected than are women from exploitation." They ask, "If a woman is subjected, why should it matter that the work has other value? Perhaps what redeems a work's value among men enhances its injury to women." They contend that the ordinance focuses on the real problem (harm to women rather than offense to the community), provides for more effective enforcement (by allowing women to bring civil actions), and is more precise in its definition of the material to be sanctioned than obscenity law has ever been.

Ironically, despite its efforts at precision, the ordinance has frequently been misread. For example, one respected commentator states that the "sweep of the Indianapolis ordinance is breathtaking. It would subject to governmental ban virtually all depictions of rape, verbal or pictorial. . . . The ban would extend from Greek mythology and Shakespeare to . . . much of the world's art, from ancient carvings to Picasso . . . and a large amount of commercial advertising."

It is not the case that virtually all depictions of rape are sexually explicit—let alone Shakespeare or commercial advertising in any large amount. Some ancient carvings and works of Picasso involve nudity, but how many of them are graphic? Do they involve the subordination of women? Where do they fall under the six categories? Do any of them fall under the first five categories? Could any breathtaking possibilities be cured by editing the sixth category? Is one person's breathtaking possibility another person's exercise of male domination? One suspects in any event that if an ordinance of this character were upheld, its opponents would find creative possibilities for limiting its scope and its proponents would be stressing the breadth of its reach.

Were the ordinance construed narrowly, what would be the case for its constitutionality? Many categories of speech are deemed beneath the protection of the FIRST AMENDMENT, including FIGHTING WORDS, some forms of advocacy of illegal action, some forms of defamation, and obscenity. The argument for the ordinance is not that it fits within such categories. Rather, proponents argue that a new category of nonprotection is justified. If defamation causes harm to specific individuals, the proponents argue, pornography causes even more:

> The harm of pornography includes dehumanization, sexual exploitation, forced sex, forced prostitution, physical injury, and social and sexual terrorism, and inferiority presented as entertainment. The bigotry and contempt pornography promotes, with the acts of aggression it fosters, diminish opportunity for equality of rights in employment, education, property, public accommodations and public services; create public and private harassment . . . ; promote injury and degradation such as rape, battery, child abuse, and prostitution and inhibit just enforcement of laws against these acts; contribute significantly to restricting women in particular from full exercise of citizenship and participation in public life, including in neighborhoods; damage relationships between the sexes; and undermine women's equal exercise of rights to speech.

Without questioning these harms, the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS for the Seventh Circuit declared the Indianapolis ordinance unconstitutional on its face in American Booksellers Association v. Hudnut (1985), and the Supreme Court affirmed without opinion. Hudnut is now the principal case in the pornography area.

Speaking for the Seventh Circuit, Judge Frank Easterbrook accepted the premise that "pornography is central in creating and maintaining sex as a basis of discrimination." Nonetheless, he maintained, the entire ordinance was premised on an unacceptable form of content discrimination: "The ordinance discriminates on the ground of the content of the speech. Speech treating women in the approved way . . . is lawful no matter how sexually explicit. Speech treating women in the disapproved way . . . is unlawful no matter how significant the literary, artistic, or political qualities of the work taken as a whole. The state may not ordain preferred viewpoints in this way. The Constitution forbids the state to declare one perspective right and silence opponents." Proceeding from this reading of the First Amendment, the court stated, "We do not try to balance the arguments for and against an ordinance such as this." The case was over.

From the court's perspective, the amount of harm to women caused by pornography was quite beside the First Amendment point and not to be weighed in the balance. But this reading of current doctrine is idiosyncratic. The categorical exceptions to First Amendment protection already involve discrimination on the basis of point of view.

The treatment of legislation involving advocacy of the overthrow of the government by force and violence is one obvious example. Obscenity is another. For example, appeals to prurient interests are defined as appeals to a "shameful or morbid interest in sex." The Court ruled in BROCKETT V. SPOKANE ARCADES (1985) that appeals to prurient interests cannot be taken to include appeals to "normal" interests in sex, that is, appeals to an interest in "good, old fashioned, healthy" sex are constitutionally protected, even if they are patently offensive to contemporary standards and lack serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. Appeals to an "abnormal" interest in sex are treated differently. For them, when the other requirements are satisfied, it is permissible to bring down the full weight of the law. In short, appeal to one perspective is declared right and appeal to another is declared wrong.

The Hudnut court's unwillingness to balance the arguments was thus supported only by misreading the treatment of content discrimination in First Amendment law. Content discrimination in general and point-of-view discrimination are disfavored in First Amendment law, but they are not absolutely disfavored. The Hudnut court had no difficulty showing that pornography did not fall within any of the existing categorical exceptions to First Amendment protection. But the issue presented by pornography legislation is whether pornography's harm justifies the creation of a new categorical exception to First Amendment protection. That was the issue sidestepped by the court's decision of content discrimination.

One approach to the question is by analogy. The Hudnut court did consider that possibility. Obscenity, it observed, has been deemed by the Supreme Court to be LOW-VALUE SPEECH, and "pornography is not low value speech within the meaning of these cases" because pornography "is thought to influence social relations and politics on a grand scale, that it controls attitudes at home and in the legislature. This precludes a characterization of the speech as low value."

If analogy were the mode of argument, the issue would not be whether pornography falls into a category denominated as low value. The Supreme Court did not use the term "low value" in creating the obscenity exception. The Court maintained in ROTH V. UNITED STATES (1957) that obscenity made such a slight contribution to truth that its possible benefits were categorically outweighed by the interests in order and morality. The proponents of pornography prohibitions insist that the same or something even stronger can be said of pornography. In addition, nothing in Roth speaks to the magnitude of the scale upon which obscenity was thought to influence order and morality (let alone in the home or the legislature). Certainly nothing in Roth or any subsequent decision supposes that if obscenity were demonstrated to have profound effects on order or morality, it would then emerge as protected speech.

The real animus of the Hudnut analysis is a deep hostility to the obscenity exception, a hostility that is tempered only by the view that obscenity does not matter much anyway. Thus, when Indianapolis says "pornography matters," the Hudnut court says, "all the more reason to protect it." But this response begs the question. First Amendment values are important; so are those of gender equality. As MacKinnon has observed, a victory for FREEDOM OF SPEECH anywhere may be a victory for freedom of speech everywhere, but a victory for sexism anywhere may be a victory for sexism everywhere.

The case for or against pornography legislation cannot be decided in the abstract. Attention must be paid to the character and amount of the harm caused (e.g., whether pornography is cathartic, stimulates aggressive and discriminatory behavior, or both, and to what extent; the extent to which the ordinance would combat that harm (e.g., whether black markets would arise, to what extent the ordinance and its application would legitimize nonpornographic but equally harmful speech, and whether the absence of pornography would cause aggressive behavior); the possibility of less restrictive alternatives (e.g., what the impact of adding a serious-value test would be) and the impact on free speech (e.g., how serious the chilling effect on speech that ought to matter would be and whether the addition of a new category based on content discrimination and the raising of questions about the particular value of speech would require quite heavy justification).

Serious arguments can be made for and against the constitutionality of legislation like the Indianapolis antipornography ordinance. The scandal is that those arguments have yet to receive serious judicial consideration and expression.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Child Pornography; Dial-a-Porn; Feminist Theory; Meese Commission.)

Bibliography

EMERSON, THOMAS I. 1985 Pornography and the First Amendment: A Reply to Professor MacKinnon. Yale Law and Policy Review 3:130–143.

MACKINNON, CATHARINE 1987 Feminism Unmodified. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

STONE, GEOFFREY R. 1986 Anti-Pornography Legislation as Viewpoint Discrimination. Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 9:461–480.

SUSTEIN, CASS R. 1986 Pornography and the First Amendment. Duke Law Journal 1986:589–627.

PORNOGRAPHY AND THE MEESE COMMISSION

See: Meese Commission

PORNOGRAPHY OVER THE TELEPHONE

See: Dial-a-Porn

POSADAS DE PUERTO RICO ASSOCIATES v. TOURISM COMPANY OF PUERTO RICO

478 U.S. 328 (1986)

In Posadas the Supreme Court upheld, 5–4, a Puerto Rico statute that authorized casino gambling but forbade advertising of casino gambling when the advertising was aimed at Puerto Rican residents. The majority, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, followed the doctrinal formula in CENTRAL HUDSON GAS AND ELECTRIC CORP. V. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (1980) for testing the constitutionality of regulations of COMMERCIAL SPEECH. The advertising concerned a lawful activity and was not misleading or fraudulent. Thus, the Court proceeded to the interest-balancing part of the formula. The governmental interest was the reduction of demand for casino gambling; Puerto Rico's concerns for its residents' health, safety, and welfare was obvious, considering that a majority of the states prohibit such gambling altogether. The restrictions on advertising, said the Court, directly advanced that interest. Furthermore, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico was not required to resort to advertising of its own as a LEAST RESTRICTIVE MEANS for discouraging casino gambling. In support of the latter point Justice Rehnquist cited lower court decisions approving restrictions on advertising of cigarettes and alcohol. Puerto Rico could have banned casino gambling altogether; this greater power included the lesser power to regulate advertising.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, writing for three Justices, dissented, arguing the the Commonwealth had not met its burden of substantial justification for regulating commercial speech. In particular, the Commonwealth had not shown that less restrictive means would suffice. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS focused his dissent on the law's discrimination based on the advertising's intended audience.

There is little doubt that Congress or a state legislature could constitutionally ban the sale or use of cigarettes. Commentators have suggested that Posadas implies that, even if such a prohibition law were not adopted, a ban on cigarette advertising would be constitutional.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

POSSE COMITATUS ACT

20 Stat. 145 (1878)

Representative James P. Knott (Democrat of Kentucky) introduced this act as an amendment to the Army Appropriation Act of 1878. It provides that "it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States, as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws" except as specifically authorized by Congress. The act has applied to the Air Force since 1947; it has been extended to the Navy and Marine Corps by administrative regulations. Originally enacted as a step in the dismantling of RECONSTRUCTION, this provision banned the practice implicitly authorized by the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, and used before the CIVIL WAR to enforce the Fugitive Slave Act, of including military forces in the federal marshal's posse. The act remains on the books (section 1835, Title 18, United States Code) as an expression of the fundamental division between the military and civilian realms: the armed forces are not a LAW ENFORCEMENT agency.

Congress has authorized the use of the armed forces to suppress insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy that obstructs the execution of federal law or impedes the course of justice, or that deprives any class of people of constitutional rights that the state authorities cannot or will not protect. That provision of the Force Act of 1871 (now section 333, Title 10, United States Code) was invoked by President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER in 1958 when he used Army units to disperse the mob in Little Rock, Arkansas, that resisted a federal court's school DESEGREGATION order (see COOPER V. AARON), and by President RICHARD M. NIXON, in 1970, when he ordered federal troops to assist in quelling a riot in Detroit, Michigan.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

POSTAL POWER

Seven words of Article I, section 8, of the Constitution grant the postal power to Congress. Under the power "To Establish Post Offices and Post Roads" liberally construed, Congress has built offices and constructed roads for handling the mails and maintained an extensive nationwide delivery service. Congress has vested in the Postal Service, now in corporate form, monopoly powers over the delivery of letters and extensive, though often untested, POLICE POWERS over the mails.

The postal system in the United States traces its roots to a 1692 crown patent to Thomas Neale by William and Mary, granting a monopoly of the colonial posts, including all profits therefrom. The Post Office was established on July 26, 1775, by the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS to assure effective communications and to eliminate what was viewed as a tax by the British Post Office. The ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION granted exclusive postal power to Congress, and the Constitution carried forward the congressional power over the mails.

At the time of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION the activities of the Post Office were widely accepted, and there was little sentiment for change or elaboration. Indeed, the postal power was virtually undebated, and only one reference to it is to be found in THE FEDERALIST. The breadth of the congressional interpretation of the postal power, therefore, finds neither support nor contradiction in the Constitution or the debates concerning its adoption.

The postal monopoly, contained in the so-called private express statutes, generally makes it unlawful for private carriers to carry letters and packets, unless postage has been paid thereon and canceled. This provision is, in effect, a 100 percent tax on the carrying of letters outside the Postal Service. The monopoly dates from colonial days, and it was and is justified on the economic grounds that it is necessary to retain monopoly power over profitable routes and services so that the Postal Service can provide uniform and inexpensive service nationwide, even along uneconomic and remote routes. The Articles of Confederation specifically granted the monopoly, giving the Congress "sole and exclusive power." The absence of these words in Article I, section 8, leaves the constitutionality of the monopoly unclear, but the few courts that have considered the question have held in its favor. Historically, monopoly had been an integral feature of the British and colonial postal systems, as well as those of many other Western nations.

The extent of the postal power has been the subject of debate in the Congress and of occasional litigation. The earliest questions concerned post roads: did Congress have authority to construct new roads, or only to designate existing state roads as postal routes? The issue had not been discussed by the Framers or, with one exception (New York), at the state conventions. Congress determined that it had power to appropriate funds to construct post roads, but not to construct them directly. The Supreme Court had never decided the question, although Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in OBITER DICTUM in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) suggested that the power included construction. In the construction of the first of these roads, the Cumberland Road, Congress and the President adopted a working compromise by seeking the consent of the affected states prior to approval of the bill. Many other post roads were constructed following similar procedures. The Supreme Court ultimately put the question of construction authority to rest in Kohl v. United States (1876) by holding that the federal government may condemn land, by analogy to EMINENT DOMAIN, for a post office site.

Postal statutes and regulations grant police powers to the Postal Service, imposing rules designed to protect the public welfare and limiting mailability. Safety regulations (for example, mailability of poisons and explosives) and mechanical rules (size and packaging standard), have not been the subject of serious challenge. The statute imposing fines and imprisonment for mail fraud was held constitutional in Public Clearing House v. Coyne (1904) and several later cases. Other statutory determinations of nonmailability have similarly been upheld. Ex parte Jackson (1878) upheld a criminal conviction under a federal statute prohibiting mailing of newspapers containing advertisements for lotteries. In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, relying on Jackson and other holdings, Congress greatly expanded the exclusionary power to cover libelous matter, OBSCENITY, and the like, and these provisions remain a part of present law. The Supreme Court has repeatedly upheld the constitutionality of the congressional power to exclude obscene materials from the mails.

From 1872 until 1970, the Post Office was an executive department and the postmaster general had CABINET status. Prompted by heavy economic losses from Post Office operations, problems with postal deliveries, and charges of political inefficiency, Congress in 1970 created the United States Postal Service to take over the functions of the Post Office Department. Removing the operations of the Post Office (including appointment of the postmaster general) from direct political influence and granting to the Post Office a substantial degree of fiscal autonomy were among the major objects of the reorganization. The new Postal System is organized as a public CORPORATION, owned entirely by the federal government, under the management of a board of governors. The board appoints the postmaster general, who is the chief executive officer of the Postal Service, but is no longer a cabinet member. The board and the officers have wide discretion with respect to management, services, and expenditures, subject to congressional oversight. Postal rates, formerly established directly by Congress, are now determined by a presidentially appointed Postal Rate Commission on the basis of recommendations made by the board of governors.

STANLEY SIEGEL
(1986)

Bibliography

JOHNSTON, JOSEPH F., JR. 1968 The United States Postal Monopoly. Business Lawyer 23:379–405.

PAUL, JAMES C. and SCHWARTZ, MURRAY L. 1961 Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the Mail. New York: Free Press.

PROJECT: POST OFFICE 1968 Southern California Law Review 41:643–727.

ROGERS, LINDSAY 1916 The Postal Power of Congress. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

POSTMODERNISM AND CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

It has been said that postmodernism is a victim of its own diagnosis. Postmodern thought defies systematic accounts in part because it announces an intellectual and cultural condition in which such systematic accounts have become unbelievable. Postmodern thought announces the dissolution of the grand metanarratives of the Enlightenment. It presents a view of language and thought as incapable of stabilizing meaning. It holds the possibility of establishing first premises, origins, and foundations to be a kind of illusion. It reacquaints linear thought, conceptual hierarchies, and rationalism with their status as narratives. In such cultural and intellectual circumstances, the very identity of postmodernism becomes itself mysterious, mutable, and contestable. Anyone seeking to conceptualize postmodernism must thus confront the possibility that postmodernism itself announces the impossibility of such conceptualization. One practical effect is that the meaning of postmodernism is very much in the eye of the beholder.

The possible relations of postmodernism to CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION are themselves multiple and contestable. From the perspective of the American constitutional tradition, however, it is possible to distinguish two very different kinds of postmodernism with very different implications.

Consider that the American constitutional tradition boasts a generous variety of interpretive techniques and approaches. Jurists, academics, politicians, and citizens have offered and invoked a multitude of interpretive techniques. Some believe that constitutional interpretation must focus exclusively or primarily on the words of the text. Others argue that the ORIGINAL INTENT of the Framers must be consulted. Still others believe that what matters is the linguistic usage at the time the Constitution or its amendments were adopted. Some have argued that the problem of constitutional interpretation must be understood in light of the conundrums of JUDICIAL REVIEW. More modestly, others have viewed the problem of interpretation in terms of the authority and competencies of the various constitutional actors—the various federal branches, the states, groups, and individuals. Then too, there are those who hold that constitutional interpretation must follow popular consensus. Another view holds that the Constitution must be interpreted in light of fundamental political values such as justice or equality. Yet another approach lies in recognizing that all or some of these approaches are appropriate.

For most of the second half of the twentieth century, this eclectic mix of interpretive approaches has been viewed in terms of a characteristically modernist anxiety: The primary question for jurists, academics, politicians, and citizens alike has been which is the correct mode of interpretation? This question has featured prominently in the courts, in scholarship, in judicial confirmation hearings before the U.S. SENATE, and in the editorial pages.

One postmodern perspective—call this "weak postmodernism"—displaces this question to affirm that constitutional interpretation encompasses all of these modes. On this view, to do constitutional interpretation is nothing more than to engage in one or more of these modes of interpretation. The question, "which is the right mode of interpretation?" becomes itself another interpretive approach—no more privileged, no less legitimate than the others. It becomes one more "move" among others.

This weak postmodernism would view the eclectic mix of interpretive approaches as a function of different perspectives. The different approaches differ because the Constitution is seen in terms of different interests, concerns, hopes, and fears. This kind of postmodern thought is congenial to the practice of constitutional interpretation. It does not threaten the authority of the Constitution nor the possibility of arriving at coherent and shared meanings. To the contrary, the American tradition of constitutional interpretation is arguably already postmodern and has been so for a long time—long before "postmodernism" became a fashionable term.

There is, however, a "strong postmodernism" much more disturbing to the enterprise of constitutional interpretation and constitutional law. This strong postmodernism puts in question the identity of what it is that is being interpreted. Just about any jurist, academic, politician, or citizen would answer that it is "the Constitution" that is being interpreted. But a strong postmodernism would ask, What is the identity of this "Constitution"? Is it a text, a political instrument, an institutional organization, a site of political contestation, an expression of cultural mythology—all or some of these things and perhaps many more?

This strong postmodernism effectively transposes the entire question of how to interpret (a question of methodology) into a question about what is being interpreted (a question of identity). This strong postmodernism leads to the view that the Constitution is not a thing that is there independently of or prior to the action of interpretation. Rather, this strong postmodernism reveals "the Constitution" as a kind of cultural–intellectual artifact that is itself a construct, a creation, of the various interpretive approaches. On this view, the Constitution is not so much interpreted, as it is continuously created and re-created by those who claim to be interpreting it.

This kind of postmodernism is much more difficult, perhaps even impossible, to reconcile with American notions of constitutionalism and the rule of law. This strong postmodernism denies that the Constitution is a source of authority and meaning that exists independently of present acts of interpretation. Instead, this strong postmodernism affirms that present acts of interpretation are effectively a kind of cultural and intellectual authorship.

In terms of this strong postmodernism, the very idea of a postmodern constitutional interpretation is an oxymoron—akin to an atheistic religion. To the extent that this is right, the attempt to integrate postmodernism and constitutional interpretations would lead to a serious deformation of one or the other, and perhaps both.

PIERRE SCHLAG
(2000)

Bibliography

BALKIN, J. M. 1992 What Is a Postmodern Constitutionalism? Michigan Law Review 90:1966–1990.

BOBBITT, PHILIP 1991 Conscience and the Constitution: Constitutional Interpretation. Cambridge, Mass.: Basil Blackwell, Inc.

KAHN, PAUL 1992 Legitimacy and History: Self-Government in American Constitutional Theory. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

PATTERSON, DENNIS 1996 Law and Truth. New York: Oxford University Press.

SCHLAG, PIERRE 1996 Hiding the Ball. New York University Law Review 71:1681–1718.

WINTER, STEVEN L. 1990 Indeterminacy and Incommensurability in Constitutional Law. California Law Review 78:1441–1541.

POUND, ROSCOE
(1870–1964)

Roscoe Pound was a prominent legal educator, a distinguished philosopher of law, and a prolific writer. His major contribution to American law was his formative role in the development of SOCIOLOGICAL JURISPRUDENCE. He elaborated this instrumentalist approach during the Progressive era, the spirit of which pervaded his writings. His thought had a conservative side to it, however, which became more influential in the latter stages of his life. He expressed this conservatism not only in his eulogies of the COMMON LAW but also in his criticism of the NEW DEAL and the "service state," his indictment of administrative tribunals, and his fulminations against LEGAL REALISM.

Although Pound did not specialize in constitutional law, he promoted better understanding of the realities of the judicial process in this field through his critique of MECHANICAL JURISPRUDENCE, his explanation of the broad scope of judicial discretion and JUDICIAL POLICYMAKING, and his contrast between the "law in the books and the law in action." He was also a trenchant critic of the extreme individualism underlying numerous decisions of the Supreme Court well into the twentieth century.

The quality of Pound's voluminous writings, which spanned almost the entire corpus juris, varied substantially. His best scholarship consisted, in the main, of his influential articles on legal thought and reform published from 1905 to 1916. These works included "Liberty of Contract" (1909), which was one of his few publications to focus on constitutional questions. The Spirit of the Common Law (1921), The Formative Era of American Law (1938), and The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty (1957) are today his most useful books for students of constitutional law and history. His Jurisprudence (1959) was the most comprehensive statement of his legal philosophy.

WILFRID E. RUMBLE
(1986)

Bibliography

WIGDOR, DAVID 1974 Roscoe Pound. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

POVERTY

See: Indigent; Wealth Discrimination

POVERTY LAW

In a nineteenth-century COMMERCE CLAUSE case, the Supreme Court characterized "paupers" and "vagabonds" as a "moral pestilence" against which the state could protect itself in the exercise of its POLICE POWERS. Although we can still hear echoes of these sentiments in laws and practices segregating the poor and the institutions that serve them, the Supreme Court has now made clear that bare hostility to, or suspicion of, the poor is not a constitutionally permissible basis for STATE ACTION.

The decisive break came in the 1941 decision in EDWARDS V. CALIFORNIA, where the Court struck down as a violation of the DORMANT COMMERCE CLAUSE a state law making it a crime knowingly to aid an indigent in coming into the state. The Court said in Edwards that "it will not now be seriously contended that because a person is without employment and without funds he constitutes a 'moral pestilence.' Poverty and immorality are not synonymous." In a much cited concurrence, Justice ROBERT JACKSON went further, insisting that "indigence' in itself is neither a source of rights nor a basis for denying them. The mere state of being without funds is a neutral fact—constitutionally an irrelevance, like race, creed, or color."

Since Edwards, indigence as such cannot be the basis for the imposition of governmental burdens. For indigence, as for race, however, the ideal of constitutional irrelevance has proved elusive. In dealing with issues of poverty since Edwards, the Court has found itself repeatedly confronting questions of what it might mean for the state to treat something as irrelevant that matters terribly in the society of which the state is a part. It is now settled that both state and federal legislatures can take action to alleviate poverty and its effects. The difficult problems that remain revolve around whether, and when, the Constitution may require relief for the poor from some of the burdens of indigence.

Constitutional solicitude for the poor emerged first in the context of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, with the Supreme Court holding that indigent criminal defendants were entitled to state-appointed counsel, to trial transcripts on appeal, and, more recently, to limited forms of other important assistance in resisting prosecution. The first RIGHT TO COUNSEL holding came in 1932, and the Court gradually developed a constitutional law of procedural rights for indigent criminal defendants in federal and then in state courts. These rights for the indigent accused developed without any overt prod from external influences. Expansion of the rights of the poor beyond the criminal procedure context had to await the development of larger social movements.

By the mid-1960s, problems of poverty were commanding political attention. Congress responded to President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's call for a "war on poverty" with a variety of new programs designed to deal with the symptoms and the causes of poverty in America. One of the early poverty programs was federal subsidization of civil legal aid for the poor. Charitable legal aid programs had a long history in the United States, but the new federal subsidy helped channel the reformist zeal of large numbers of new lawyers acting on behalf of poor people. Their activities left a mark on many areas of the law, including much of constitutional law beyond the criminal procedure beginnings.

For a time it even appeared that litigation on behalf of welfare recipients might yield a constitutional right to subsistence support. In 1969 the Supreme Court held in SHAPIRO V. THOMPSON that states could not impose durational RESIDENCE REQUIREMENTS for the receipt of public assistance. The decision was based on the EQUAL PROTECTION clause; the residence requirements impinged on the RIGHT TO TRAVEL interstate, a right the Court characterized as "fundamental" and hence enjoying heightened constitutional protection. But the Court also suggested that the fact that WELFARE BENEFITS were at issue was important to its decision. In the Court's words, the case involved "the very means to subsist—food, shelter, and other necessities of life." And the next year, the Court held in GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970) that a welfare recipient had a right to an administrative hearing before her welfare benefits could be withdrawn. Again the Court emphasized the nature of the benefits at stake—"the means to obtain essential food, clothing, housing, and medical care." This and other language helped stimulate a secondary literature advocating a constitutional right to what Frank Michelman called "minimum protection" of each individual's "just wants."

No such right ever gained much of a foothold in the courts, however, for reasons that came into focus early. In DANDRIDGE V. WILLIAMS (1970), decided just one year after Shapiro, the Court rejected a claim that a family maximum on the size of the welfare grant deprived members of large welfare families of equal protection. The claim was plausible enough after Shapiro, but the prospect of continued expansion of the eligible population by virtue of equal protection decisions gave the Court pause, for it suggested that the legislative reaction might simply be to divide the same total public assistance resources among a larger eligible population. The Court's response to this tradeoff of equity and adequacy in welfare programs was to back off, saying in Dandridge that "conflicting claims of morality and intelligence are raised by opponents and proponents of almost every measure, certainly including the one before us. But the intractable economic, social and even philosophical problems presented by public welfare programs are not the business of this Court. . . . The Constitution does not empower this Court to second-guess state officials charged with the difficult responsibility of allocating limited public welfare funds among the myriad of potential recipients." The Court did not abandon equal protection review of discrimination within welfare programs after Dandridge, but that review became much more subdued than the rhetoric of Shapiro had suggested.

The problem to which the Court referred in Dandridge is real enough in the equal protection context, where the claimant typically seeks to have a group to which he belongs made eligible for assistance according to standards of need the state has already defined. Indeed, each time the Court extends eligibility, it causes a realignment of political forces that might force legislative tradeoffs with nonwelfare programs such as defense, foreign aid, and the fight against pollution. In such a case, however, the legislature does retain the option to eliminate or scale back the amount of the welfare benefits. A claim for minimum subsistence, on the other hand, would require of the Court decisions not only about those entitled to the assistance but also about the appropriate level of assistance—what, in Michelman's terms, are "just wants" and how much is "minimum protection." The Court would be requiring the expenditure of funds absolutely rather than conditionally, thus necessitating, rather than just giving a nudge to, legislative tradeoffs between welfare programs and others competing for public support. The prospect would be daunting, and the Court never did more than flirt lightly with it.

The welfare cases did somewhat alleviate recurrent confusion in constitutional law with regard to the RIGHT/PRIVILEGE DISTINCTION. Prior to those cases, when an interest characterized as a right was jeopardized by some legislative or executive action, constitutional protections were applicable; when privileges were at issue, it was sometimes said that no constitutional protections attached. This doctrine was never well developed, but it kept reappearing and posed a serious obstacle to constitutional succor for recipients under a growing array of government benefit programs, for those programs surely would fall on the privilege side of any such line. In both Shapiro and Goldberg, however, the Court rejected the distinction as constitutionally irrelevant. In subsequent cases, the notion behind the distinction has occasionally resurfaced (without the language of rights and privileges), but only as a consideration in defining the strength of constitutional protection, and not as a reason for denying protection altogether. Thus, the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that state and local governments need not subsidize ABORTION, even though a pregnant woman has a constitutionally protected interest in seeking out an abortion if she chooses. These decisions suggest that the state retains a higher degree of discretion over the dispensation of benefits than over the imposition of burdens, but they do not resurrect the sort of absolute discretion with which the rightprivilege distinction was associated.

Lawyers for the indigent did have important constitutional triumphs, but usually by joining problems of the poor to some other theme with which the Court could feel more comfortable. Expansion of the franchise and perfection of the electoral system, for instance, have been important contemporary themes in constitutional law, and the Court has been responsive to the handicaps placed on the poor in participating in democratic institutions. In 1966 the Court struck down a state POLL TAX as a condition on voting, and in subsequent cases, the Court limited property qualifications for voting in some specialized contexts. It has also restricted the filing fees that can be charged indigent candidates for public office.

The emphasis on fair process for indigents in the criminal cases and in Goldberg has been extended to certain civil proceedings. The movement, however, has been cautious as the Court undoubtedly keeps a wary eye on the costs involved. Thus, the state cannot require an indigent to pay court costs or filing fees as a condition to filing a divorce action. The state must pay for blood testing in a state-initiated paternity proceeding. And in compelling circumstances the state must provide counsel in an action to terminate parental rights. On the other hand, the state is not required to waive filing fees for a bankruptcy proceeding for an indigent or for an appeal of an adverse decision in a welfare hearing.

Some of the early opinions extending procedural protection to indigents in criminal cases used the language of equal protection, but the equal protection clause is not apt as a basis for procedural protections, because there is no obvious reference group with which the indigent defendent is to be compared. The more recent opinions have thus recurred to PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS notions of fundamental fairness as the standard against which arguments for subsidy are to be judged.

This attraction to themes that do not explicitly draw on the fact of poverty means that many of the advances in constitutional poverty law have resulted from litigation on behalf of groups whose members are mostly poor but not necessarily so. The Court has, for instance, established substantial constitutional protections for ALIENS within the jurisdiction of the United States, for illegitimate children, for the mentally retarded, and for youngsters subjected to JUVENILE PROCEEDINGS. The opinions in these cases often draw on the impecuniousness of the protected group, but seldom in a way that makes the doctrines announced depend on that fact.

One important extension of constitutional rights of the poor has been snatched by state courts and state constitutional law out of the mouth of federal defeat. Primary and secondary education in the United States has been financed in large part through local property taxes, with the result that property-rich districts have been able to sustain much higher per-pupil expenditures for education than have property-poor districts. Drawing on the FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS branch of equal protection doctrine developed in Shapiro and other cases, students in property-poor districts challenged these financing schemes. The Supreme Court rejected the claim in its 1973 decision SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ, holding that there was no fundamental right to a particular level of education and that the students in property-poor districts, who need not necessarily be poor, were entitled to no heightened constitutional protection. Rodriguez, like the welfare cases, suggests judicial disinclination to become involved in financing decisions for major public programs.

Faced with a reluctant federal court system, however, poverty lawyers and their clients increasingly have turned to state courts and state constitutional claims. In the case of educational financing, they could draw on equal protection provisions in state constitutions or on provisions assuming state responsibility for public education. The result has been court-ordered reform of educational financing in a substantial number of states.

Twenty-five years after the war on poverty began, there is no constitutional law of the poor in the way that there is a constitutional law of race relations or INTERSTATE COMMERCE. But constitutional law has changed over that time in ways that have been important for the legal status of many people who are poor. It has changed mostly in small ways and in many different contexts, but those small and diverse changes add up to an altered landscape in which constitutional law is one tool among many in addressing the myriad legal problems that beset the poor.

ROBERT W. BENNETT
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Illegitimacy; Mental Retardation and the Constitution; Rights of the Criminally Accused; State Constitutions.)

Bibliography

BENNETT, ROBERT W. 1983 The Burger Court and the Poor. Pages 46–61 in Vincent Blasi, ed., The Burger Court. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

LAFRANCE, ARTHUR B. et al. 1973 Law of the Poor. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

MICHELMAN, FRANK I. 1969 Foreword: On Protecting the Poor Through the Fourteenth Amendment. Harvard Law Review 83:7–59.

WINTER, RALPH K. 1972 Poverty, Economic Equality, and the Equal Protection Clause. Supreme Court Review 1972:41–102.

POWELL, LEWIS F., JR.
(1907– )

Lewis Franklin Powell, Jr., has always eluded conventional portraiture. In broad brush, Powell appears the archetypal conservative: a successful corporate lawyer, a director of eleven major companies, a pillar of Richmond, Virginia's civic and social life. The roll call of legal honors—president of the American Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and the American Bar Foundation—does little to dispel the impression.

The portrait, however, needs serious refinement. During Virginia's "massive resistance," when the Byrd organization chose to close public schools rather than accept racial integration, Powell, as chairman of the Richmond Public School Board, fought successfully to keep Richmond's open. As vice-president of the National Legal Aid and Defender Society, he helped persuade the organized bar to support publicly financed legal services for the poor. Jean Camper Cahn, a black leader with whom he worked in that endeavor, found Powell "so curiously shy, so deeply sensitive to the hurt or embarrassment of another, so self-effacing that it is difficult to reconcile the public and private man—the honors and the acclaim with the gentle, courteous, sensitive spirit that one senses in every conversation, no matter how casual. . . ."

The portrait of the private practitioner parallels that of the Supreme Court Justice. The broad picture is again one of orthodox adherence to the canons of restraint. Powell labored diligently to limit the powers of the federal courts. He sought to narrow the STANDING of litigants invoking federal JURISDICTION to instances of actual injury in WARTH V. SELDIN (1975). He dissented when the Court in Cannon v. University of Chicago (1979) inferred from federal statutes a private cause of action. He greatly restricted the power of federal judges to review claims of unlawful SEARCH AND SEIZURE raised by state defendants in STONE V. POWELL (1976). And he urged the sharp curtailment of federal equitable remedies such as student BUSING for racial balance, in cases like KEYES V. DENVER SCHOOL DISTRICT #1 (1973).

While working to limit federal judicial power, Powell championed the power of others to operate free of constitutional strictures. Thus prosecutors should enjoy discretion in initiating prosecution, police and GRAND JURIES in pursuing EVIDENCE, trial judges in questioning jurors, welfare workers in terminating assistance, and military officers in conducting training. The "hands-off" view applied especially to public education. Powell, a former member of the Virginia Board of Education, wrote the Court opinion preserving the rights of states to devise their own systems of public school finance in SAN ANTONIO SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973). And the former chairman of the Richmond School Board spoke for the broad discretion of school authorities to administer student suspensions and corporal punishment, dissenting in GOSS V. LOPEZ (1975) and writing for the Court in INGRAHAM V. WRIGHT (1977).

Even so, a corner of the jurist's nature has been reserved for personal circumstances of particular poignancy. An early opinion afforded a black construction worker in Mississippi, father of nine, the opportunity to confront his accusers and establish his innocence in Chambers v. Mississippi (1973). Another Powell opinion, in MOORE V. EAST CLEVELAND (1977), voided a municipal housing ordinance that prevented an elderly woman from living with her adult sons and grandchildren. Another, SOLEM V. HELM (1983), held unconstitutional a life sentence without parole imposed by state courts on the perpetrator of seven nonviolent felonies. Even in the sacrosanct area of education, the Justice concurred in PLYLER V. DOE (1982) rather than leave children of illegal aliens "on the streets uneducated."

The cases of compassion are remarkable in one respect. Vindication of the individual claims meant overriding the most cherished of Powell's conservative tenets: the protection of state criminal judgments from meddlesome review on petition for federal writs of HABEAS CORPUS, and the recognition of only those rights tied closely to the constitutional text. Powell, plainly nervous about damaging these principles, narrowed the rulings almost to their actual facts. The cases thus testify both to a strength and a weakness in the jurist, the strength being that of an open mind and heart, the weakness being that of cautious case-by-case adjudication that leaves law bereft of general guidance and sure content.

The dichotomy between the cases of compassion and the towering doctrinal efforts of the school finance case (Rodriguez) and the search and seizure case (Stone) illustrates the different dimensions of the man himself. Powell, for example, privately deplored the arrogance of the national communications media and the maleficence of the criminal element. But he was, by nature, reserved, considerate, as eager to listen as to talk. Thus, even on subjects of strong feeling, the tempered judgment often triumphed. This quality marked his opinions dealing with the press. In a concurrence more libertarian than the Court opinion he joined in BRANZBURG V. HAYES (1972), Powell urged that "a proper balance" be struck on a "case-by-case basis" between the claims of newsmen to protect the confidentiality of sources and the need of grand juries for information relevant to criminal conduct. In GERTZ V. ROBERT WELSH INC. (1974), perhaps his most important opinion on the FIRST AMENDMENT, Powell balanced a plaintiff's interest in his good reputation against press freedoms, permitting private citizens to recover in libel on a standard less than "knowing or reckless falsehood" but greater than liability without fault. Balancing of individual and societal claims characterized Powell's opinions involving the rights of radical campus organizations, the unconventional use of national symbols, and even many criminal cases, where fact-specific rulings on the admissibility of suspect LINEUPS, for example, began to replace the per se EXCLUSIONARY RULES of the WARREN COURT.

Balancing does not permit confident forecasting of appellate outcomes. Case-by-case weighing of facts and circumstances can constitute a dangerous delegation of the Supreme Court's own authority on constitutional matters to trial judges, police and prosecutors, and potential litigants, all of whom capitalize on the uncertainty of law to work their own wills. But balancing suited Powell's preference for a devolution of authority and, in cases like Gertz, achieved a thoughtful accommodation of competing interests.

In his most famous opinion, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA REGENTS V. BAKKE (1978), Powell, the balancer, struck a middle course on the flammable question of benign preferences based on race. The immediate question in Bakke was whether the medical school of the University of California at Davis could set aside sixteen of one hundred places in its entering class for preferred minorities. Eight Justices took polar positions. Four argued that Title VI of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 prohibited any preference based on race. Four others contended that both the act and the constitution permitted the Davis program. Powell, the ninth and deciding Justice, alone sought to accommodate both the American belief in the primacy of the individual and the need to heal a history of oppression based on race.

It has become common to note that the Supreme Court under WARREN E. BURGER did not, as some feared, dismantle the activist legacy of the Warren Court. Many of the influential Justices, Powell, POTTER STEWART, and BYRON R. WHITE among them, were more pragmatic than ideological. Thus the Court trimmed here, expanded there, and approached complex questions cautiously. Powell's opinions exhibit, as much as those of any Justice, this Court's composite frame of mind. Like him, the Court he served has eluded conventional description.

J. HARVIE WILKINSON III
(1986)

Bibliography

GUNTHER, GERALD 1972 In Search of Judicial Quality in a Changing Court: The Case of Justice Powell. Stanford Law Review 24:1001–1035.

HOWARD, A. E. DICK 1972 Mr. Justice Powell and the Emerging Nixon Majority. Michigan Law Review 70:445–468.

SYMPOSIUM 1977 [Justice Lewis F. Powell] University of Richmond Law Review 11:259–445.

——— 1982 [Justice Lewis F. Powell] Virginia Law Review 68:161–458.

POWELL, LEWIS F., JR.
(1907–1998)
(Update)

From his appointment in 1971 until his resignation in 1987, Lewis F. Powell, Jr. was widely known as the "swing Justice" on a closely divided Supreme Court. As the term "swing Justice" implies, Powell's position on the Court was one of both loneliness and influence. The loneliness resulted because Powell lacked a stable set of allies on many of the most contentious issues that came before the Court. The influence stemmed largely from his capacity to make 5–4 majorities. In cases involving AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, ABORTION, CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, and the FIRST AMENDMENT, Powell's finely nuanced positions caused him to move back and forth between coalitions of Justices whose decisions depended less on the peculiar facts of individual controversies.

After a Justice has retired from the Court, his influence, if any, must depend on the power of his written opinions and his judicial philosophy to command respect. The question of Powell's long-term influence remains unsettled. With regard to the resolution of specific cases, Powell's successor, ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, has contributed to a perceptible conservative drift by the REHNQUIST COURT, including erosion of some of the doctrines to which Powell was committed. In addition, Powell's characteristic "balancing" philosophy, which emerged as perhaps the Court's predominant methodology during his tenure, has recently attracted sharp criticism.

Lewis F. Powell joined the Supreme Court at the age of sixty-four after thirty-five years of successful private practice in the state of Virginia. The son of well-to-do parents, Powell graduated from Washington and Lee College in 1929 and, just two years later, finished first in his class at Washington and Lee Law School. After a year of graduate study at Harvard Law School, Powell returned to Richmond and joined the prestigious firm of Hunton, Williams, Gay, Powell, and Gibson, where, with time out for military service during World War II, he remained until 1971.

Powell achieved unusual eminence as a private lawyer. Besides winning the trust and respect of clients and serving on the boards of directors of eleven major corporations, Powell became active in a variety of lawyers' groups, including the American Bar Association, which he served as president in 1964–1965. Powell also took a leading role in a number of civic and cultural organizations. He was chairman of the Richmond school board from 1952 to 1961.

The Lewis Powell who took his seat on the Supreme Court in 1971 very much reflected his background and his experiences. In addition to possessing an acute analytical intelligence, he had a business lawyer's disposition to resolve disputes pragmatically, preferably in a way that would accommodate the reasonable interests of all parties. He also had a conservative respect for established institutions. Yet Powell was more than the archetype of the successful conservative lawyer. As chairman of the Richmond school board, he had resisted efforts by the Virginia political establishment to close public schools rather than accept racial DESEGREGATION. And as vice-president of the National Legal Aid and Defender Society, he had worked to support publicly financed legal services for the poor.

Not surprisingly in light of his background, a respect for institutions of local government and especially for local school administration represented a consistent theme in Powell's Supreme Court opinions. Although cautious and nonideological in some areas, he consistently and even aggressively sought to protect state sovereignty interests under both the TENTH AMENDMENT and the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT. As a matter of "equitable restraint," he held that federal courts should virtually never interfere with proceedings before state courts and administrative agencies. And he favored the recognition of protective "immunities" for government officials whose official conduct entangled them in suits for money damages. Without such immunity, Powell reasoned in Harlow v. Fitzgerald (1982), able men and women would hesitate to accept positions of public responsibility. Powell also wrote germinal opinions in the field of STANDING that had as their effect, if not their explicit purpose, the preclusion of lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of programs and policies—including those of LOCAL GOVERNMENTS—whose effects were widely dispersed across large numbers of citizens. "Generalized grievances," he argued in an influential CONCURRING OPINION in Schlesinger v. Reservists (1974) and later for a majority of the Court in Warth v. Seldin (1975), should generally be resolved in the legislature and at the ballot box, rather than by the nondemocratic federal courts.

The theme of deference to local political decision makers sounded particularly loudly in one of the earliest of Powell's major opinions, SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973). At issue in Rodriguez was the constitutionality of Texas's system of school funding, which relied heavily on local property taxes to finance public EDUCATION and, as administered, created a large disparity between the per-pupil expenditures in rich and poor school districts. The plaintiffs claimed that the disparate allocations offended the EQUAL PROTECTION clause. Justice Powell, who wrote for a five-member majority, disagreed. Education was not a FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT in the constitutional sense, he ruled, nor did a law disadvantaging students in impecunious school districts constitute a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION that would trigger close judicial scrutiny. Especially because the plaintiffs' argument called into question the educational financing system of "virtually every State," Powell found judicial restraint to be appropriate. "It would be difficult to imagine a case having a greater impact on our federal system than the one now before us," he wrote. "The ultimate solutions must come from the lawmakers and from the democratic pressures of those who elect them." Powell took a similarly deferential stand in cases challenging the infliction of various kinds of punishment in the public schools and the removal of books from a school library.

While Powell was a fairly traditional conservative on questions of federal jurisdiction and of federalism, his accommodationist impulses and penchant for balancing often asserted themselves in cases under the FIRST AMENDMENT, the EIGHTH AMENDMENT, and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. It was in these areas that he acquired his reputation as a swing Justice.

Powell's most famous opinion, in REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), epitomizes both Powell's judicial style and his role on an ideologically fractured Supreme Court. The case arose when Alan Bakke, a white male who was denied admission to the medical school of the University of California at Davis, challenged the school's practice of setting aside sixteen of one hundred places in its entering class for members of disadvantaged minorities. Four Justices of the Court would have upheld affirmative action programs under considerably looser constitutional standards than applied to INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION. Four other Justices found all acts of RACIAL PREFERENCE, even those that favor discrete and insular minorities, to be absolutely prohibited by an applicable federal statute. That left Justice Powell, alone in the middle, to formulate the constitutional principles that would define the law of the case.

Upholding the ideal that race is irrelevant to moral worth, Powell argued that even discrimination in favor of minority persons must be subject to STRICT SCRUTINY by the courts. But, carefully parsing the state's reasons for pursuing affirmative action, he also identified an interest in student diversity that was sufficiently "compelling" to justify attaching affirmative weight to prospective students' minority backgrounds as one of many factors relevant to admissions decisions. The end result was that RACIAL QUOTAS were forbidden, but individualized "pluses" permitted. Steps could thus be taken to make amends for the legacy of past invidious racialism, but a narrow tailoring of program to rationale was required.

Although no other Justice joined Powell's opinion in Bakke, Powell generally succeeded in establishing both the framework and the tone for the Supreme Court's affirmative action JURISPRUDENCE over the next ten years. The legal framework, subject to possible exception only in cases of congressional action, required compelling justifications, even for noninvidious or compensatory racial preferences. The tone reflected Powell's sense that the underlying issues were too hard, both morally and legally, to be settled other than on a case-by-case basis that would permit some accommodation, however crude, of the competing values at stake. In a series of cases involving employment and promotions, Powell's vote made the majority for the proposition that racial preferences would be allowed under the Constitution when reasonably necessary to correct for past discrimination by the institution implementing an affirmative action program or subject to a remedial judicial order. But he also insisted that racial classifications should be disfavored and, writing for a plurality of the Court in WYGANT V. JACKSON BOARD OF EDUCATION (1986), held that dispreferred whites may not be required to carry too heavy a burden in order to compensate for wrongs of which they personally are likely innocent. The resulting balance was not always neat, but it reflected Powell's sense that some sort of accommodation was needed.

Careful balancing and accommodation of competing interests also marked Powell's approach to the First Amendment. Perhaps his most important opinion on this subject came in GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974), which raised an issue about the scope of constitutional protection enjoyed by the press in suits for LIBEL. The common law generally had presumed liability for all defamatory speech, with the burden resting on the defendant to prove truth as a defense. In the landmark case of NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964), however, the Supreme Court had recognized a constitutional privilege in cases involving speech about public officials in the performance of their official duties. Because of the public interest in promoting free and robust debate about governmental affairs, defamations of public officials were held to be constitutionally protected unless published "with actual malice," which the Court defined to mean with knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard for whether they were true or false. But the Court, following New York Times, had not reached a consensus on the scope of constitutional protection that should be accorded to other defamatory speech.

Carefully balancing the competing interests in FREEDOM OF SPEECH, FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, and the protection of individual reputation, Powell's Gertz opinion sought a middle ground. In order to avoid unwarranted "chilling" of the press as a result of threats of liability, Powell held that the states may not impose liability for libel in the absence of some showing of "fault." But neither, he concluded, did the First Amendment require that the state's interest in protecting its citizens' good names and reputations be sacrificed entirely. Where "private figures" are defamed, Gertz permits liability based on a showing that the press was negligent in publishing a false report. In actions brought by "public figures," whose stature or notoriety allows them greater opportunity to counter false allegations in the MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS, the balance shifts, and liability requires a demonstration of actual malice.

In addition to its balancing methodology, Powell's First Amendment jurisprudence was notable for its sensitivity to the role of a free press in making democracy work. In GANNETT CO., INC. V. DEPASQUALE (1979) Powell argued in a concurring opinion that the First Amendment required at least a presumptive right of the press to attend and report on criminal trials. His views about rights of access to judicial proceedings were substantially adopted by the Court a year later in RICHMOND NEWSPAPERS V. VIRGINIA (1980). But Powell would have gone further. In provocative dissenting opinions in Saxbe v. Washington Post Co. (1974) and Houchins v. KQED (1978), he argued that the press, as a representative of the public, should have limited right of access to report on conditions inside prisons and presumably on the management of other governmental operations. From one perspective, Powell's views in these cases seem in tension with his generally respectful and deferential stance toward local government and political authority. From another, his position reflects a powerful inner logic. Local government deserves deference only insofar as it represents the informed judgments of its citizens. When government conducts its affairs in unnecessary secrecy, Powell believed, the moral foundations of democracy erode.

The need to strike a balance between deference to democratically accountable decision makers and the protection of competing constitutional values was also a main theme in Powell's opinions involving PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS. In this area, too, he emerged as one of the Court's intellectual leaders. Writing in MATHEWS V. ELDRIDGE. (1976), Powell developed a three-part BALANCING TEST that has since become ubiquitous in the Supreme Court's procedural due process cases. To determine whether the government has provided adequate procedural safeguards against the erroneous deprivation of a citizen's liberty or PROPERTY RIGHTS, Powell held, the Court must weigh and balance the magnitude of the individual interests at stake; the government's interests, including those in cheap and efficient administration; and the reduction in the risk of error that more-extensive procedures might yield.

Powell was also an important figure in cases involving SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS issues. He joined the initial 7–2 majority recognizing constitutional abortion rights in ROE V. WADE (1973) and remained committed to Roe's analytical framework throughout his tenure on the Court. As the Court later grew more polarized on abortion issues, Powell's centrist line-drawing often proved decisive in making 5–4 majorities. Powell also cast the swing vote in BOWERS V. HARDWICK. (1986), holding that the Constitution's protection of the right of PRIVACY and the right of procreation does not extend to homosexual sodomy. In a characteristically accommodationist gesture, however, he suggested that a severe criminal penalty might offend the constitutional prohibition against CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT.

Early in his career on the Supreme Court, Justice Powell won high praisse from influential commentators for his skillful and judicious use of a balancing approach to constitutional questions. Although never defined with great precision, balancing—as practiced in Matthew v. Eldridge, for example—calls for the identification of all relevant and competing interests, and the striking of a balance for the case at hand; slight changes in the catalogue of affected interests, or the degree of their implication, could alter the result in the next case. Partly because of the looseness with which definitions of balancing are formulated, it is difficult to say how sharply balancing differs from other approaches to CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. Much depends on how the specification of relevant interests fit into, or competes with, judicial reliance on such factors as the constitutional text, constitutional history, precedent, constitutional structure, and traditional or consensus values.

Nevertheless, the view seems to be gaining currency that balancing is the currently predominant approach to constitutional interpretation and that Justice Powell was a leading figure in popularizing this methodology. Some commentators have offered the further argument that balancing is a deficient or even a bankrupt method of constitutional analysis. And at least one, Professor Paul Kahn, has argued that its deficiencies are damningly exhibited in Justice Powell's opinions. Powell's balancing, according to this criticism, was ad hoc, unpredictable, and subjective. Moreover, his approach to judging misconceived the JUDICIAL FUNCTION, which is to identify and hierarchically array constitutional principles of sufficient clarity and generality to offer clear guidance both to lower courts and to political decision makers.

These criticisms are at best overstated. Powell's case-by-case balancing approach located him in a time-honored tradition of practical thinking in which principles—whether legal or moral—represent the distilled wisdom of carefully individualized judgments. Adherents of this approach, which has found its way into the traditions of common law adjudication and of constitutional interpretation as well, argue forcefully that it is a practical and intellectual mistake to rest on rules that are too broad for their correctness to be rationally vindicated in advance. And Powell, when he thought rational vindication possible, did not hesitate to paint with a broad brush. He did so, for example, in establishing First Amendment lines and categories in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.

It is a seperate charge that Powell's mode of balancing—in the affirmative action cases, for example—represented JUDICIAL POLICYMAKING that was insufficiently rooted in traditional sources of legal authority to qualify as anything more than judicial second-guessing of a political judgment. Powell, his critics argue, located himself too much "inside" the political community and wrongly tried to bring the community's values to bear on constitutional questions; instead, a Justice should locate himself outside the community in the lofty and frequently astringent principles of the Constitution. The fallacy in this criticism is that there is ultimately no helpful interpretive position "outside" the constitutional community. A Supreme Court Justice, like anyone, must read the Constitution from inside the society to which its lofty generalities must be applied. And it would be folly to think that a constitutional interpreter should try to ignore the society's needs and values. For Powell, traditional sources of legal authority retained their force. But Powell looked at them, and appropriately so, from a point of view that sought to reach sound, practical solutions to constitutional problems.

It is a somewhat more telling argument against the characteristic jurisprudence of Justice Powell that, in the search for a pragmatic balance—in the effort to keep competitive values in a position approaching equipoise or to achieve what he thought was a sensible result in a particular case—he sometimes drew lines that were too fine or too ad hoc to withstand critical scrutiny. Certainly Powell's humanitarian instincts sometimes caused him to distinguish relevant "conservative" precedents, including those that he had authored, by force of little more than ipse dixit. His concurring opinion in PLYLER V. DOE (1982), distinguishing SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ and holding that Texas could not withhold free public education from illegal-alien children, falls into this category. Some have argued that the Bakke line between forbidden racial quotas and permissible individual preferences is intellectually untenable.

Finally, Powell's sense of what was prudent or practically necessary sometimes overrode both the force of contending arguments and considerations of fairness. In MCCLESKY V. KEMP (1987), for example, the petitioner introduced statistical evidence establishing that blacks are more likely to be sentenced to death than are whites and that the killers of whites are more than four times more likely to be executed than are killers of blacks. This evidence, McClesky argued, required reversal of his death sentence under both the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment and the equal protection clause. Justice Powell disagreed. In an opinion of unusual candor, he argued that the Court must reject the plaintiff's argument partly because of the far-reaching implications of its underlying premise. "McClesky's claim, taken to its logical conclusion, throws into serious question the principles that underlie our entire CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM," Powell wrote. If statistical demonstrations of systemic disparities could establish individual unfairness, the Court "could soon be faced with similar claims [against] other types of penalty" from members of other disadvantaged groups. Powell plainly regarded this prospect as practically intolerable.

Although happily atypical in some respects, McClesky was, in fact, a characteristic Powell decision. Exemplifying the role of Justice as statesman, Powell repeatedly experienced conflicts of competing values about how a Supreme Court Justice, with his mission conceived to include a component of prudent statesmanship, ought to act. In cases in which competing values conflict, it is always easy to criticize any particular decision as striking the wrong balance. The harder and more interesting question is whether Powell, in embracing the obligations of prudent statesmanship, conceived his judicial role correctly. Although retirement encomiums are perhaps not the strongest evidence, Powell, upon stepping down from the Supreme Court, was widely hailed as a model Supreme Court Justice of the modern age.

RICHARD FALLON
(1992)

Bibliography

ALEINIKOFF, T. ALEXANDER 1987 Constitutional Law in the Age of Balancing. Yale Law Journal 96:943–1005.

FREEMAN, GEORGE CLEMON 1988 Justice Powell's Constitutional Opinions. Washington and Lee Law Review 45:411–465.

GUNTHER, GERALD 1972 In Search of Judicial Quality on a Changing Court: The Case of Justice Powell. Stanford Law Review 24:1001–1035.

KAHN, PAUL W. 1987 The Court, the Community and the Judicial Balance: The Jurisprudence of Justice Powell. Yale Law Journal 97:1–60.

MALTZ, EARL M. 1979 Portrait of a Man in the Middle—Mr. Justice Powell, Equal Protection, and the Pure Classification Problem. Ohio State Law Journal 40:941–964.

SYNPOSIUM 1982 In Honor of Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr. Virginia Law Review 68:161–458.

TRIBUTE 1987 Tribute to Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr. Harvard Law Review 101:395–420.

UROFSKY, MELVIN I. 1984 Mr. Justice Powell and Education: The Balancing of Competing Values. Journal of Law and Education 13:581–627.

POWELL, THOMAS REED
(1880–1955)

Constitutional lawyer and political scientist Thomas Reed Powell taught for twenty-five years at Harvard Law School. He was a prolific writer of articles on constitutional law and especially on the issues of STATE TAXATION OF COMMERCE and INTERGOVERNMENTAL IMMUNITIES from taxation. His published analyses of constitutional DOCTRINES and Supreme Court decisions frequently influenced the future course of constitutional law, as, for example, in reducing the protection from taxation afforded by the ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE. He was also a commentator on the activities of the Supreme Court: he was critical of its anti-NEW DEAL decisions in the 1930s, of the proliferation of separate opinions in the 1940s, and of the prevalence of rhetorical excess over rigorous logic at all times. His last public lectures were published in 1956 as Vagaries and Varieties in Constitutional Law.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

POWELL v. ALABAMA
287 U.S. 45 (1932)

Powell was the famous "Scottsboro boys" case in which "young, ignorant, illiterate blacks were convicted and sentenced to death without the effective appointment of counsel to aid them. The trials were in a hostile community, far from the defendants' homes; the accusation was rape of two white women, a crime "regarded with especial horror in the community."

In an early major use of the DUE PROCESS clause to regulate the administration of criminal justice by the states, the Supreme Court held that the trials were fundamentally unfair. The facts of the case made this portentous holding an easy one: the defendants were tried in one day, the defense was entirely pro forma, and the death sentence was immediately imposed on all seven defendants without regard to individual culpability or circumstance. Powell was not a Sixth Amendment RIGHT TO COUNSEL case; three decades would pass before that guarantee was imported into due process in GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963). But the language of the Court in expounding the importance of counsel to a fair trial was repeatedly quoted as the Sixth Amendment right developed: "[the layman] lacks both the skill and knowledge adequately to prepare his defense, even though he has a perfect one. He requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him. Without it, though he be not guilty, he faces the danger of conviction because he does not know how to establish his innocence."

Although Powell is usually cited as a case in which defendants had no counsel at all, there was actually a lawyer at their side, but he came late into the case and was unfamiliar with Alabama law. In discussing the failure of due process, the Court referred to the lack of investigation and consultation by this last-minute volunteer. Thus, Powell has implications for the developing doctrine of ineffective assistance of counsel.

BARBARA ALLEN BABCOCK
(1986)

POWELL v. MCCORMACK
395 U.S. 486 (1969)

Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., a flamboyant clergyman of indifferent ethics, for many years represented a New York City district in Congress. In 1967, after Powell won reelection despite a conviction for criminal contempt of court and a record of misappropriation of public funds, the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES denied him a seat. In a special election, he received eighty-six percent of the votes and again appeared to take his seat. The House then passed a resolution "excluding" Powell.

Powell and thirteen of his constituents then sued Speaker John McCormack and several other officers of the House of Representatives. Powell lost in both the District Court and the Court of Appeals, and his case was not heard by the Supreme Court until after the Ninetieth Congress had adjourned. Powell had, in the meanwhile, been reelected, and was seated as a member of the Ninety-First Congress.

The Supreme Court, in an 8–1 decision, declined to hold the case moot, finding that Powell's claim for back pay was sufficient for a justiciable controversy. In an opinion by Chief Justice EARL WARREN, the Court proceeded to overturn some long-standing assumptions about the constitutional status of CONGRESSIONAL MEMBERSHIP.

The Court held that the houses of Congress, although they are the judges of the qualifications provided in the Constitution itself (Article I, section 5) may not add to the qualifications provided in the Constitution (Article I, section 2). If a person elected to the House is qualified by age, CITIZENSHIP, and residence, he may not be excluded. Of course, once a member has been seated, he may be expelled by a two-thirds vote for any offense the House believes is "inconsistent with the trust and duty of a member" (In re Chapman, 1897). But, in Powell's case the Court held that exclusion was not equivalent to expulsion. (See POLITICAL QUESTIONS.)

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

POWELL v. PENNSYLVANIA

See: Waite Court

PRAGMATISM

Pragmatism, generally considered to be our only indigenous school of philosophic thought, has profoundly influenced the development of American jurisprudence in the twentieth century. This influence is evident in a variety of legal settings, including the field of constitutional law, where debates over the proper interpretive role of the courts continue to focus upon issues first raised in a systematic way by the early philosophers of pragmatism, notably John Dewey.

The school of philosophical pragmatism emerged only in the late nineteenth century, but it is more deeply rooted in the American past than that date implies. Thus, we see in ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE's description of the American philosophical method a preview of what later became, in the works of Charles Peirce, William James, Dewey, and others, a schematically developed general theory: "To evade the bondage of system and habit, of family-maxims, class opinions, and, in some degree, of national prejudices; to accept tradition only as a means of information, and existing facts only as a lesson to be used in doing otherwise and doing better; to seek the reason of things for oneself, and in oneself alone; to tend to results without being bound to means, and to strike through the form to the substance—such are the principal characteristics of what I shall call the philosophical method of the Americans." In this account of philosophical temperament are the core elements of the reconstruction in philosophy that came to dominate constitutional discourse in the twentieth century: an instrumental approach to knowledge based upon a rigorous empiricism, a demystification of the past as a predicate for facilitating change, and an ethical orientation that finds in the application of a norm or concept the criterion of its value.

The emergence of the pragmatic movement in philosophy occurred at a critical juncture in American constitutional history. At a time when constitutional orthodoxy was embodied in the person of Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD, the appeal of pragmatic ideas to critics of the dominant view lay in the promise it held for achieving a congruence between law and the needs of a society undergoing rapid flux and transition. In place of a formalistic approach characterized by the derivation of absolute principles that are grounded in nature and from which constitutional conclusions can be deduced with certainty in support of social inequality, the pragmatists offered the prospect of deriving relative principles that are grounded in experience and from which constitutional conclusions of a tentative nature can be inductively assembled in support of a more egalitarian society. The application of pragmatism to constitutional reasoning supported the claim that law should not be an impediment to progress, that the Constitution was not a document embodying immutable principles but one whose meaning depended upon the circumstances of time and place.

In developing their legal theory, the pragmatists both drew on and rejected existing jurisprudential schools of thought. They were critical of the syllogistic process of legal reasoning that they found common to both the philosophical and analytical schools. In the application of ethical considerations by the NATURAL RIGHTS theorists and in the abandonment of such considerations by the analytical positivists, they also found a similar detachment from the realities of the social situation. In the first case ethics was not grounded in experience, and in the second, reality was disorted by the failure to understand the ethical imperitives implied in experience. The object of the pragmatists was thus to establish an empirical jurisprudence that included a consciousness of the moral basis of law. The attraction of pragmatic philosophy was its potential for steering a middle course between the positivistic seperation of law and morality, on the one hand, and, on the other, the natural-rights fusion law and morality according to the standards derived outside of experience. Both extremes led to judicial potection of the status quo, the first by accepting the legitimacy of any existing legal arrangments and the second by freezing the law into a mold formed by metaphysical abstractions. Justice, for the pragmatists, was not to be defined a priori; nor was it identifiable with the will of the sovereign. Rather, it was to be defined "transactionally," emerging out of social experience as an end to be juridically achieved. Acceptance of this view by jurists would make it unnecessary to appeal to noncontextual sources, such as an absolute standard of right conduct embodied in the text of the Constitution.

The principal theorists of legal pragmatism, BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO and ROSCOE POUND, wrote most often about private law, but both maintained that their prescriptions applied equally well to constitutional law. Cardozo's "method of sociology" and Pound's "theory of social interests" were intended in part to translate the precepts of Dewey and James into jurisprudential terms of potentially transformative significance for the Constitution. In the case of Dewey, who had addressed himself to legal questions, the translation was fairly straightforward. In his account of the law, legal rules and principles were viewed pragmatically as "working hypotheses" whose validity was to be ascertained by their application in concrete situations. Dewey also held the work of the Founding Fathers to be much less the object of reverence than had traditionally been the case: "The belief in political fixity, of the sanctity of some form of state consecrated by the efforts of our fathers and hallowed by tradition, is one of the stumbling-blocks in the way of orderly and directed change; it is an invitation to revolt and revolution." Just as the antifoundationalist emphasis in contemporary philosophy—the denial that knowledge must be based upon certain objective truths—owes much to the work of the early pragmatists, so too does the currently popular disparagement of the doctrine of ORIGINAL INTENT in CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. Therefore, the contention that the Constitution embodies foundational principles of justice that reflect the original intentions of its Framers, is doubly problematic, and it carries minimal weight in the pragmatic account of constitutional interpretation.

The judge most often associated with philosophical pragmatism is OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. JR. Although he occasionally criticized some of the formulations of pragmatists, his work as a Supreme Court Justice (as well as his extrajudicial writings) often manifested a pragmatic approach to the Constitution. More important, his opinions inspired many others whose interest in pragmatism had less to do with the philosophical skepticism that appealed to Holmes than with the social reform possibilities implicit in its method. For example, Holmes's opinion in MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920) suggested that the needs of the twentieth century need not be held hostage to the assumptions of the eighteenth or nineteenth centuries: "The case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago." His famous dissenting opinion in ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919) expressed in one short sentence the essence of the pragmatic conception of the Constitution. The theory of the Constitution, Holmes said, was that truth would emerge in the marketplace of ideas; the document "is an experiment, as all life is an experiment." This view often led Holmes to advocate judicial self-restraint; but in time it came to express a sentiment that provided jurisprudential support for a more activist, socially engaged judiciary. The work of the WARREN COURT exemplified an important legacy of the pragmatists (especially Dewey): the increasing reliance by the judiciary upon social science evidence. Holmes's role in this development is suggested in an observation of his that Dewey, in the elaboration of his pragmatic philosophy, saw fit to quote: "I have had in mind an ultimate dependence of law [upon science] because it is ultimately for science to determine, as far as it can, the relative worth of our different social ends."

The pragmatic conception of the Constitution has generated considerable controversy. Criticism centers on two distinct but related problems. The first is that the importation of pragmatic ideas into the arena of constitutional interpretation inevitably leads to the abandonment of any meaningful distinction between judicial and legislative modes of decision making. This has the effect, it is claimed, of undermining the legitimacy of the Supreme Court, an unfortunate outcome rendered no less unfortunate by assertions about the enhanced quality of the Court's output. The second is that a pragmatic jurisprudence provides inadequate protection for constitutional rights. By effectively reducing self-evident and immutable truths to the level of tentative rules, pragmatic judges risk sacrificing FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS on the altar of social expedience. If the Constitution is a document lacking fixed points of reference and thus deprived of meanings that are not simply contextual (that is, situated in the experience of changing historical moments), can it serve as guarantor of rights that are in their ultimate sense expressive of an unchanging human nature?

GARY J. JACOBSOHN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Conservatism; Judicial Activism and Judicial Restraint; Liberalism; Political Philosophy of the Constitution.)

Bibliography

GREY, THOMAS C. 1989 Holmes and Legal Pragmatism. Stanford Law Review 41:787–870.

JACOBSOHN, GARY J. 1977 Pragmatism, Statesmanship, and the Supreme Court. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

SUMMERS, ROBERT SAMUEL 1982 Instrumentalism and American Legal Theory. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

PRAGMATISM
(Update)

In recent years the school of philosophy known as pragmatism has enjoyed a renaissance in legal thought. This renewal of interest can be traced to several factors, including the CRITICAL LEGAL STUDIES movement's radical critique of the notion that legal rules are neutral and apolitical; the work of feminists and postmodernists who stress the importance of situated experience in influencing our perceptions of reality; and interdisciplinary approaches to law such as LAW AND ECONOMICS THEORY, which contest the traditional view of law as an autonomous discipline. Though they differ in many particulars, these various movements within contemporary JURISPRUDENCE lead to an important question: If law does not consist of a set of immutable principles waiting to be discovered, and if our notions of truth are (to some degree) socially constructed, then how should judges and other decisionmakers choose among various competing alternatives? In the view of some scholars, pragmatism provides a coherent response to this question, as well as a method for charting a middle course between the traditional model of law as a neutral, self-contained enterprise and the nihilistic view of law as nothing more than politics by other means.

Although contemporary legal pragmatists comprise a diverse group of scholars, falling along all segments of the political spectrum, most share a few core beliefs. First, most pragmatists agree that human knowledge is contextual, meaning that each of us views the world in light of the constraints imposed upon us by such factors as prior experience, culture, and language. The premise that knowledge is contextual in turn suggests, as Richard Warner writes in his description of legal pragmatism, that there is no external standard for evaluating our norms, but rather that "our norms of justification neither have nor need a ground outside themselves." Pragmatists therefore reject the concept known as "foundationalism," what Thomas Grey refers to as "the age-old philosopher's dream that knowledge might be grounded in a set of fundamental and indubitable beliefs." Viewing knowledge as antifoundational suggests, as Richard Rorty notes in discussing the thought of John Dewey, that law and other human institutions are best viewed not as "attempts to embody or formulate truth or goodness or beauty, but rather as instruments for solving problems." Thoughtful pragmatists, however, are careful to avoid equating pragmatic instrumentalism with utilitarianism. As Grey observes, pragmatists in the tradition of Dewey reject a sharp distinction between ends and means, claiming instead that the means we choose to implement our goals are never completely instrumental, but rather must be judged "by their intrinsic satisfactions or frustrations as well as by their consequences."

Adherence to these principles compels most legal pragmatists to reject attempts to ground the law in comprehensive "grand theories" and to reject the formalist ideal that correct outcomes can always be logically deduced from some overarching set of principles. Many pragmatists instead advocate the use of "practical reason," which Richard Bernstein describes as a way of mediating "between general principles and a concrete particular situation" through choice and deliberation. The term "practical reason" is not easily defined but, according to various formulations, denotes methods for reaching decisions based on, inter alia, an appreciation of consequences; a commitment to dialogue among competing views; and a grudging respect for "common sense" coupled with skepticism over what Joseph William Singer refers to as "unreflective reliance on commonsense intuitions."

The specific policy recommendations of legal pragmatists vary depending on their perception of the outcomes suggested by practical reason. More conservative pragmatists tend to stress the instrumental value of adherence to such socially constructed norms as fidelity to text, history, and judicial deference to other branches of government. Others take a more radical approach, arguing that a commitment to human flourishing (itself a norm that we are free to accept or reject) counsels in favor of paying closer attention to the voices of the marginalized and oppressed, whose perspectives often go unnoticed by more traditional approaches. Some pragmatists argue in favor of a greater reliance on the insights provided by the sciences, including the SOCIAL SCIENCES, while others remain skeptical.

Critiques of legal pragmatism come from many quarters. Those who find natural law or rights-based approaches to jurisprudence compelling take issue with the pragmatists' view of rights as a contingent (albeit useful) human construct. Stanley Fish argues that once pragmatists claim that specific policies "[follow] from the pragmatist account" they betray their "own first principle (which is to have none)." Still others argue that, at a general level, pragmatism consists of nothing but platitudes; and that, at the particular level, the wide divergence of opinion among pragmatist scholars suggests that pragmatism ultimately has nothing distinctive to say about law. From the pragmatic perspective, the response to these critiques is that the proof is in the pudding. If, as William James observed, the truth of a proposition resides in its consequences, then the "truth" of the pragmatic approach to law depends on its effects. Put another way, pragmatists ask that their methodology be judged by this simple standard: Does it work?

THOMAS F. COTTER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Feminist Theory; Postmodernism and Constitutional Theory.)

Bibliography

BERNSTEIN, RICHARD 1983 Beyond Objectivism and Relativism. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

COTTER, THOMAS F. 1996 Legal Pragmatism and the Law and Economics Movement. Georgetown Law Journal 84:2071–2141.

FARBER, DANIEL 1988 Legal Pragmatism and the Constitution. Minnesota Law Review 72:1331–1378.

FISH, STANLEY 1991 Almost Pragmatism. In Michael Brint and William Weaver, eds., Pragmatism in Law & Society. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

GREY, THOMAS C. 1989 Holmes and Legal Pragmatism. Stanford Law Review 41:787–870.

POSNER, RICHARD A. 1988 The Problems of Jurisprudence. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

RORTY, RICHARD 1982 Consequences of Pragmatism. Minneapolis, Minn.: University of Minnesota Press.

SINGER, JOSEPH WILLIAM 1990 Property and Coercion in Federal Indian Law: The Conflict Between Critical and Complacent Pragmatism. Southern California Law Review 63:1821–1837.

SMITH, STEVEN D. 1990 The Pursuit of Pragmatism. Yale Law Journal 100:409–449.

WARNER, RICHARD 1993 Why Pragmatism? The Puzzling Place of Pragmatism in Critical Theory. University of Illinois Law Review 1993:535–563.

PRATT, CHARLES
(Lord Camden)
(1714–1794)

The leading WHIG constitutionalist of eighteenth-century England, Charles Pratt was appointed a judge after a career as a barrister and parliamentarian and service as attorney general. Arguing SEDITIOUS LIBEL cases, he had maintained that the jury was competent to decide the questions both of law and of fact. He was Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas from 1762 until 1766. In the WILKES CASES he declared GENERAL WARRANTS contrary to the principles of the constitution and held their issuance by secretaries of state illegal. He also discouraged prosecution of Roman Catholic recusants. As Baron (later Earl) Camden, he made his first speech in the House of Lords in 1765 supporting the American position on the Stamp Act. In the debates on the Declaratory Act he called TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION "sheer robbery" and denounced the fiction of virtual representation. He became Lord Chancellor in 1766 but resigned in 1770 after disagreeing with the cabinet about several matters, including policy toward America. He continued to support the American position in the House of Lords and, with Lord Chatham, favored reconciliation with the colonies. He returned to the cabinet in 1782 and was Lord President of the Council from 1784 until his death.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PRAYERS IN SCHOOL

See: Religion in Public Schools; School Prayers

PREAMBLE

The part of the Constitution that we read first is the part of the original Constitution that was written last. The Preamble, which sets forth the noble purposes for which the Constitution is "ordained and established," was composed by the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION's Committee of Style. The committee sat between September 8 and September 11, 1787, after the Convention had debated and voted on all of the substantive provisions of the Constitution; its mandate was to arrange and harmonize the wording of the resolutions adopted by the delegates during the preceding four months. The task of actually drafting the document fell to GOUVERNEUR MORRIS of New York, and so the authorship of the Preamble must be ascribed to him.

Morris made two major changes in the Preamble as it was reported by the Committee of Detail and referred to the Committee of Style. The earlier version had begun, "We, the people of the states of . . ." and then had listed the thirteen states in order, from north to south; Morris changed this to the now familiar "We, the people of the United States. . . ." And the earlier version had merely stated that the people ordained and established the Constitution; Morris added the list of purposes for which they did so. Each of these changes has been the occasion of some controversy.

The reference to the "people of the United States" was a source of irritation to the Anti-Federalists. PATRICK HENRY, for example, in the Virginia ratifying convention, denounced the use of the phrase as a harbinger of a national despotism. The Convention, he said, should have written instead, "We, the States. . . ." In ANTI-FEDERALIST CONSTITUTIONAL THOUGHT, only the states, as the existing political units, to which the people had already delegated all the powers of government, could constitute a federal union and redelegate some of their powers to the national government. Reference to the constituent authority of "the people of the United States" seemed to imply consolidation, not confederation.

It is unlikely that Morris, the Committee of Style, or the Convention had any such implication in mind. The Convention had approved a preamble that referred to the people of all thirteen states. The committee had to "harmonize" that with the provision that the Constitution would become effective when it was ratified by any nine states. There would likely be a time, therefore, when there would be nine states in the Union and four outside of it; but no one could predict which would be the nine and which the four. So long as the Constitution would become effective with less than thirteen states in the Union, listing the thirteen states in the Preamble would be misleading and inaccurate. Whichever states did ratify the Constitution would be the "United States," and it would be the people of those "United States" that had ordained the Constitution. Moreover, the Constitution provided for the future admission of additional states, and the people of those states, too, would ordain and establish the Constitution.

But Henry's objection was ill-founded for another reason. The DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE had pronounced the Americans "one people" and had given to their political Union the name of the "United States of America." The states and the Union had been born together on July 4, 1776, when a new nation was brought forth upon this continent. The one people certainly possessed the right to alter or abolish their former government and to establish a new government more conducive to their future safety and happiness. "We, the people of the United States," are identical to the "one people" that in the Declaration of Independence dissolved the political bonds that formerly connected us to Great Britain.

The list of purposes for ordaining and establishing the Constitution is perhaps more perplexing. The Convention had never debated or voted on such a list; and yet each delegate must have had some such purposes in mind throughout the deliberations. How else could he have gauged or judged the propriety of the measures upon which he did debate and vote? Morris and the Committee of Style must have thought it fitting to provide this terse apologia for their summer's deliberations; and the delegates apparently agreed, for there is no record of any objection to the Preamble as it was reported by the committee.

The Preamble lists the purposes for which the Constitution was created: to form a more perfect Union, to establish justice, to insure domestic tranquillity, to provide for the common defense, to promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty, not only for the founding generation but also for "posterity." It, in effect, declares to a candid world the causes for which the people have chosen to replace the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION with a new Constitution. The purposes listed in the Preamble are consistent with what the Declaration of Independence asserts to be the end of all governments instituted among men, namely to secure the equal and inalienable natural rights of all to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The Preamble does not purport to create any offices or to confer any powers; as JOSEPH STORY later wrote, "Its true office is to expound the nature and extent and application of the powers actually conferred by the Constitution, and not substantially to create them." Although COMMENTATORS ON THE CONSTITUTION have, over the years, purported to find in the Preamble justification for the exercise of INHERENT POWERS of government, no court has ever held that the Preamble independently grants power to the government or to any of its officers or agencies. In fact, in Jacobson v. Massachusetts (1905), the Supreme Court specifically rejected that interpretation.

The Preamble concludes by proclaiming that the people "do ordain and establish this Constitution." EDWARD S. CORWIN correctly pointed to the active voice and present tense of this phrase. The act of constituting a government occurs at a particular moment in time; but the authority of the Constitution depends on the continuous consent of the governed. The people, as Corwin wrote, " 'do ordain and establish,' not did ordain and establish." Thus does the Preamble play its role in the preservation of constitutional government. An afterthought of the Constitutional Convention, a rhetorical flourish by the Committee of Style, the Preamble has been memorized by schoolchildren and declaimed by orators and statesmen on public occasions for two centuries. And every time it is recited it calls to mind the purposes of our federal Union and unites the people more firmly to the cause of republican liberty.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1920 The Constitution and What It Means Today. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

EIDELBERG, PAUL 1968 The Political Philosophy of the Constitution. New York: Free Press.

ROSSITER, CLINTON 1966 1787: The Grand Convention. New York: Macmillan.

PRECEDENT

In MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL rested the legitimacy of JUDICIAL REVIEW of the constitutionality of legislation on the necessity for courts to "state what the law is" in particular cases. The implicit assumption is that the Constitution is law, and that the content of constitutional law is determinate—that it can be known and applied by judges. From the time of the nation's founding, lawyers and judges trained in the processes of the COMMON LAW have assumed that the law of the Constitution is to be found not only in the text of the document and the expectations of the Framers but also in judicial precedent: the opinions of judges on "what the law is," written in the course of deciding earlier cases. (See STARE DECISIS.)

Inevitably, issues that burned brightly for the Framers of the Constitution and of its various amendments have receded from politics into history. The broad language of much of the Constitution's text leaves open a wide range of choices concerning interpretation. As the body of judicial precedent has grown, it has taken on a life of its own; the very term "constitutional law," for most lawyers today, primarily calls to mind the interpretations of the Constitution contained in the Supreme Court's opinions. For a lawyer writing a brief, or a judge writing an opinion, the natural style of argumentation is the common law style, with appeals to one or another "authority" among the competing analogies offered by a large and still growing body of precedent.

The same considerations that support reliance on precedent in common law decisions apply in constitutional adjudications: the need for stability in the law and for evenhanded treatment of litigants. Yet adherence to precedent has also been called the control of the living by the dead. Earlier interpretations of the Constitution, when they seem to have little relevance to the conditions of society and government here and now, do give way. As Chief Justice EARL WARREN wrote in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), "In approaching [the problem of school SEGREGATION, we cannot turn the clock back to 1868 when the [FOURTEENTH] AMENDMENT was adopted, or even to 1896 when PLESSY [V. FERGUSON] was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life. . . ." Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES put the matter more pungently: "It is revolting to have no better reason for a rule of law than that so it was laid down in the time of Henry IV."

Although the Supreme Court decides only those issues that come to it in the ordinary course of litigation, the Court has a large measure of control over its own doctrinal agenda. The selection of about 150 cases for review each year (out of more than 4,000 cases brought to the Court) is influenced most of all by the Justices' views of the importance of the issues presented. (See CERTIORARI, WRIT OF.) And when the Court does break new doctrinal ground, it invites further litigation to explore the area thus opened. For example, scores of lawsuits were filed all over the country once the Court had established the precedent, in BAKER V. CARR (1962), that the problem of legislative REAPPORTIONMENT was one that the courts could properly address. The Justices see themselves, and are seen by the Court's commentators, as being in the business of developing constitutional DOCTRINE through the system of precedent. The decision of particular litigants' cases today appears to be important mainly as an instrument to those lawmaking ends. The theory of Marbury v. Madison, in other words, has been turned upside down.

Lower court judges pay meticulous attention to Supreme Court opinions as their main source of guidance for decision in constitutional cases. Supreme Court Justices themselves, however, give precedent a force that is weaker in constitutional cases than in other areas of the law. In a famous expression of this view, Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, dissenting in Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co. (1932), said, "in cases involving the Federal Constitution, where correction through legislative action is practically impossible, this court has often overruled its earlier decisions. The court bows to the lessons of experience and the force of better reasoning, recognizing that the process of trial and error, so fruitful in the physical sciences, is appropriate also in the judicial function."

Although this sentiment is widely shared, Justices often are prepared to defer to their reading of precedent even when they disagree with the conclusions that produced the earlier decisions. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, for example, regularly accepted the authoritative force of WARREN COURT opinions from which he had dissented vigorously. The Court as an institution occasionally takes the same course, making clear that it is following the specific dictates of an earlier decision because of the interest in stability of the law, even though that decision may be out of line with more recent doctrinal developments.

The Supreme Court is regularly criticized, both from within the Court and from the outside, for failing to follow precedent. But a thoroughgoing consistency of decision cannot be expected, given the combination of three characteristics of the Court's decisional process. First, the Court is a collegiate body, with the nine Justices exercising individual judgment on each case. Second, the body of precedent is now enormous, with the result that in most cases decided by the Court there are arguable precedents for several alternative doctrinal approaches, and even for reaching opposing results. Indeed, the system for selecting cases for review guarantees that the court will regularly face hard cases—cases that are difficult because they can plausibly be decided in more than one way. Finally, deference to precedent itself may mean that issues will be decided differently, depending on the order in which they come before the Court. The Court's decision in In re Griffiths (1973), that a state cannot constitutionally limit the practice of law to United States citizens, is still a good precedent; yet, if the case had come up in 1983, almost certainly it would have been decided differently. (See ALIENS.)

The result of this process is an increasingly fragmented Supreme Court, with more PLURALITY OPINIONS and more statements by individual Justices of their own separate views in CONCURRING OPINIONS and dissents—thus presenting an even greater range of materials on which Justices can draw in deciding the next case. In these circumstances, it is not surprising that some plurality opinions, such as that in MOORE V. CITY OF EAST CLEVELAND (1977), are regularly cited as if they had a precedent value equal to that of OPINIONS OF THE COURT.

The range of decisional choice offered to a Supreme Court Justice by this process is so wide as to call into the question the idea of principled decision on which the legitimacy of judicial review is commonly assumed to rest. Yet the hard cases that fill the Supreme Court's docket—the very cases that make constitutional law and thus fill the casebooks that law students study—do not typify the functioning of constitutional law. A great many controversies of constitutional dimension never get to court, because the law seems clear, on the basis of precedent; similarly, many cases that do get to court are easily decided in the lower courts. Although we celebrate the memory of our creative Justices—Justices who are remembered for setting precedent, not following it—the body of constitutional law remains remarkably stable. In a stable society it could not be otherwise. As Holmes himself said in another context, "historic continuity with the past is not a duty, it is only a necessity."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

EASTERBROOK, FRANK H. 1982 Ways of Criticizing the Court. Harvard Law Review 95:802–832.

LEVI, EDWARD H. 1949 An Introduction to Legal Reasoning. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

LLEWELLYN, KARL N. 1960 The Common Law Tradition. Boston: Little, Brown.

MONAGHAN, HENRY P. 1979 Taking Supreme Court Opinions Seriously. Maryland Law Review 39:1–26.

PREEMPTION

The SUPREMACY CLAUSE of the Constitution (Article VI, clause 2) requires that inconsistent state laws yield to valid federal laws. Preemption is the term applied to describe invalidation of state laws by superior federal law.

Strictly speaking, the issue of preemption is not one of constitutional law. The issue is not what Congress has the power to do, but what Congress has done. Where Congress has made an articulate decision whether particular state laws should survive a new scheme of federal regulation, the issue is settled. For example, in enacting minimum federal standards for automobile pollution control equipment in 1967, Congress prohibited states from enforcing more restrictive standards but made an exception for the State of California. There has been no need for litigation to mark the contours of preemption in that context. Insofar as there is a "doctrine" of preemption, it concerns the treatment of preemption by federal laws where Congress has ignored the issue.

Since preemption cases theoretically turn on construction of federal statutes to determine whether Congress intended to preempt state laws, there are limits to generalizations that can be drawn from the decisions. Each case construes a federal statute with a distinct regulatory structure and legislative history. It is particularly difficult to classify the simplest form of preemption cases—those where the claim is made that the terms of federal and state law are flatly inconsistent. Federal law may, for example, give express permission to engage in conduct prohibited by state law. An early famous case of this type was GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824).

The most complex issues of preemption arise where it is concededly possible to comply with mandates of both state and federal law. The question then arises whether Congress intended to "occupy the field," or whether the challenged state law's enforcement would interfere inordinately with the policies of the federal law. State law may provide additional sanctions for conduct prohibited by federal law. (In California v. Zook, 1949, the Court sustained a state law that punished interstate motor transport operating without a federal permit.) State law may impose more stringent regulations than federal law. (In Napier v. Atlantic Coast Line R.R., 1926, the Court held that a state law requiring railroad safety equipment was preempted by a federal law that required less equipment.) Finally, it may be argued that state law is, in some general way, inconsistent with the purposes of federal law. (In New York Telephone Co. v. New York State Department of Labor, 1979, the Court sustained state payment of unemployment compensation benefits to strikers as not inconsistent with the policy of free COLLECTIVE BARGAINING under federal labor law.)

The Court has announced general tests for determining whether Congress has "occupied the field." An often-quoted summary of the standards for finding congressional intent to preempt state law is contained in Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp. (1947). "The scheme of federal regulation may be so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it. . . . Or the Act of Congress may touch a field in which the federal interest is so dominant that the federal system will be assumed to preclude enforcement of state laws on the same subject. . . . Or the state policy may produce a result inconsistent with the objective of the federal statute." These standards are peculiarly devoid of content, as the Court admitted in the sentence following those just quoted: "It is often a perplexing question whether Congress has precluded state action or by the choice of selective regulatory measures has left the POLICE POWER of the States undisturbed except as the state and federal regulations collide."

The lack of any pattern to the preemption cases can be explained in that each case seeks to ascertain congressional intent in a unique context. Since, however, contentious preemption questions arise precisely because Congress has ignored the existence of related state laws, the "intent of Congress" is a fiction that fails to describe the Court's decision process. The controlling factors in judicial decision are similar to those that would have confronted the intelligent legislator who had grappled with them. The judges' social values, views as to the legislative wisdom of the federal and state laws, and general views of the federal system may be as decisive as technical consideration of how well the federal and state schemes would mesh.

In many cases, there are potential issues of constitutional validity of the challenged state law in addition to the preemption question. Some preemption decisions can be explained as a part of the Court's general practice of avoiding unnecessary constitutional questions. Often, the preemption question is decided, articulately or sub silentio, by the same criteria that would have governed the avoided constitutional question. The preemption doctrine may be preferred by the Court because the judicial decision striking down a state law is tentative, and congressional attention is invited to the issue. If Congress does nothing, the issue is avoided. If Congress makes an articulate choice to withdraw the preemption barrier, the inescapable constitutional question benefits from the additional data supplied by congressional decision. A final attraction of the preemption rationale, beyond the tentativeness of a preemption decision, may be that each decision can be truly ad hoc, resting on a fictional finding of congressional intent to preempt that governs only the particular federal statutory scheme before the Court.

WILLIAM COHEN
(1986)

Bibliography

COHEN, WILLIAM 1982 Congressional Power to Define State Power to Regulate Commerce: Consent and Pre-emption. Pages 523–547 in Terrance Sandalow and Eric Stein, eds., Courts and Free Markets: Perspectives from the United States and Europe. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

CRAMTOM, ROGER 1956 Pennsylvania v. Nelson: A Case Study in Federal Preemption. University of Chicago Law Review 26:85–108.

PREEMPTION
(Update)

Preemption means that, as a result of the exercise of federal authority in a given regulatory area, preexisting concurrent state authority to regulate that same area comes to an end. Although earlier in this century, the Supreme Court viewed preemption as an automatic consequence of federal entry into a regulatory field, the modern view understands preemption as a discretionary constitutional power of Congress (and, by delegation, of federal ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES), the exercise of which requires manifestation of an intent to preempt the states. This change is reflected in the modern presumption against preemption, a presumption that concurrent state authority survives the exercise of federal regulatory power.

Congress has the power to rebut this presumption and preempt state authority regardless of the content of any state law—even if, for example, existing state law is substantively identical to the federal scheme of regulation or there is no state law at all in the relevant area. By exercising its power of preemption, the federal authority elects to monopolize a regulatory field, in whole or in part.

The fact that conflict between the contents of state and federal law is not necessary for preemption to occur distinguishes preemption from the related but separate principle of the supremacy of federal law enshrined in the SUPREMACY CLAUSE of the Constitution. This principle means that a valid federal law trumps an otherwise valid state law if (and only if) the two conflict with each other. Unlike preemption, the operation of the supremacy clause does not end general state authority in an area, but results in the trumping of a particular state law by a particular federal law where the two conflict. So, for example, a new state law passed to avoid the conflict would not be prevented from taking full legal effect. Moreover, once Congress has exercised its power of preemption, no state authority survives in the preempted field so that there can no longer be a valid state law in conflict with the federal one to trigger operation of the supremacy clause. The latter operates only where concurrent state authority exists and has not already been preempted.

Preemption thus not only differs from the principle of supremacy but also constitutes a broader inroad on state authority than the latter. One important implication of this point is that the (greater) federal power to preempt state authority cannot derive from the (lesser) principle of supremacy contained in the supremacy clause—as is widely assumed—but must have some other source in the Constitution.

The Court's "preemption doctrine" holds that Congress can exercise its preemption power either expressly—by clearly stating in the legislative text whether, and to what extent, state authority survives its new regulatory scheme—or impliedly. Notwithstanding the absence of any explicit statement on the issue, Congress's intent to preempt may be implicitly contained in a statute's structure and purpose.

The Court has recognized two types of such implied preemption. The first, termed "field preemption," is, according to Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp. (1947), where the scheme of federal regulation is "so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it." The second, known as "conflict preemption," is, according to Hines v. Davidowitz (1941), where compliance with both federal and state regulation is a physical impossibility or where state law "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress."

There is obviously significant tension between the general notion of implied preemption and the modern presumption against preemption. Because the presumption means the states are not preempted unless that is "the clear and manifest purpose of Congress," it might well be thought that such purpose can, or at least should, only be expressly manifested. Even assuming the general legitimacy of inferring preemptive intent, however, there are specific problems with both types of implied preemption. First, the doctrine of field preemption is arguably too blunt an interpretive instrument and ignores alternative readings of congressional intent that might be reached by an unmediated interpretation of the relevant statute. The proposition that in itself the pervasiveness or comprehensiveness of a scheme of federal regulation makes reasonable an inference of preemptive intent may be both overinclusive and underinclusive with respect to any particular scheme. Overinclusive because, notwithstanding its comprehensiveness, Congress may (1) intend that the states be permitted to supplement it, (2) not have considered the issue, or (3) have considered it but not reached agreement. Underinclusive because Congress may intend to preempt state law while leaving the field relatively, or even entirely, unregulated by any level of government.

Second, the DOCTRINE of conflict preemption is either a contradiction in terms or it similarly imputes to Congress an intent that may be highly questionable in practice. On its face, the proposition that state law is preempted if it conflicts with federal law appears to express the most basic confusion between the distinct principles of preemption and supremacy. The trumping of an otherwise valid state law by supreme federal law is not an instance of preemption at all but a straightforward operation of the principle of supremacy. It neither ends concurrent state authority nor turns on congressional purpose. If, however, the claim is the more subtle one that such a conflict provides the necessary evidence for implying congressional intent to preempt, this generally appears to be an unlikely piece of STATUTORY INTERPRETATION. Where preexisting state regulation is followed by a conflicting federal statute that neither "occupies the field" nor contains an express preemption provision, it seems more reasonable to infer that Congress only intended to trump the relevant state statutes without divesting the states of their concurrent legislative authority in that field.

STEPHEN GARDBAUM
(2000)

Bibliography

ENGDAHL, DAVID 1987 Constitutional Federalism in a Nutshell, 2nd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West.

GARDBAUM, STEPHEN 1994 The Nature of Preemption. Cornell Law Review 79:767–815.

PREFERRED FREEDOMS

Because FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms rank at the top of the hierarchy of constitutional values, any legislation that explicitly limits those freedoms must be denied the usual presumption of constitutionality and be subjected to STRICT SCRUTINY by the judiciary. So went the earliest version of the preferred freedoms doctrine, sometimes called the preferred position or preferred status doctrine. It probably originated in the opinions of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, at least implicitly. He believed that a presumption of constitutionality attached to ECONOMIC REGULATION, which needed to meet merely a RATIONAL BASIS test, as he explained dissenting in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). By contrast, in ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919) he adopted the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test as a constitutional yardstick for legislation such as the ESPIONAGE ACT OF 1917 or state CRIMINAL SYNDICALISM statutes, which limited FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO first suggested a more general hierarchy of constitutional rights in PALKO V. CONNECTICUT (1937), in a major opinion on the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE. He ranked at the top those "fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions." He tried to distinguish rights that might be lost without risking the essentials of liberty and justice from rights which he called "the matrix, the indispensable condition, of nearly every other form of freedom." These FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS came to be regarded as the preferred freedoms. A year later Justice HARLAN F. STONE, in footnote four of his opinion in UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS (1938), observed that "legislation which restricts the political processes" might "be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny" than other legislation. He suggested, too, that the judiciary might accord particularly searching examination of statutes reflecting "prejudice against DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITIES."

The First Amendment freedoms initially enjoyed a primacy above all others. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS for the Court in MURDOCK V. PENNSYLVANIA (1943) expressly stated: "FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, freedom of speech, FREEDOM OF RELIGION are in a preferred position." In the 1940s, despite bitter divisions on the Court over the question whether constitutional rights should be ranked, as well as the question whether the Court should ever deny the presumption of constitutionality, a majority of Justices continued to endorse the doctrine. Justice WILEY B. RUTLEDGE for the Court gave it its fullest exposition in Thomas v. Collins (1945). Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, who led the opposition to the doctrine, called it "mischievous" in KOVACS V. COOPER (1949); he especially disliked the implication that "any law touching communication" might be "infected with presumptive invalidity." Yet even Frankfurter, in his Kovacs opinion, acknowledged that "those liberties . . . which history has established as the indispensable conditions of an open as against a closed society come to the Court with a momentum for respect lacking when appeal is made to liberties which derive merely from shifting economic arrangements."

The deaths of Murphy and Rutledge in 1949 and their replacement by TOM C. CLARK and SHERMAN MINTON shifted the balance of judicial power to the Frankfurter viewpoint. Thereafter little was heard about the doctrine. The WARREN COURT vigorously defended not only CIVIL LIBERTIES but CIVIL RIGHTS and the rights of the criminally accused. The expansion of the incorporation doctrine and of the concept of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS in the 1960s produced a new spectrum of FUNDAMENTAL INTERESTS demanding special judicial protection. Free speech, press, and religion continued, nevertheless, to be ranked, at least implicitly, as very special in character and possessing a symbolic "firstness," to use EDMOND CAHN's apt term. Although the Court rarely speaks of a preferred freedoms doctrine today, the substance of the doctrine has been absorbed in the concepts of strict scrutiny, fundamental rights, and selective incorporation.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

MCKAY, ROBERT B. 1959 The Preference for Freedom. New York University Law Review 34:1184–1227.

PRESENTMENT

A presentment is a written accusation of criminal offense prepared, signed, and presented to the prosecutor by the members of a GRAND JURY, acting on their own initiative rather than in response to a bill of INDICTMENT brought before them by the government. By returning a presentment, the grand jury forces the prosecutor to indict. The presentment procedure permits the grand jury to circumvent prosecutorial inertia or recalcitrance to initiate criminal proceedings. The grand jury's presentment power originated long before there were government prosecutors. The presentment is a descendant of the grand jury's original function: to initiate criminal proceedings by accusing those whom the grand jurors knew to have reputedly committed offenses.

CHARLES H. WHITEBREAD
(1986)

Bibliography

TESLIK, W. RANDOLPH 1975 Prosecutorial Discretion: The Decision to Charge. Washington, D.C.: National Criminal Justice Reference Service.

PRESIDENT AND THE TREATY POWER

Article II of the Constitution authorizes the President to "make" treaties with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the SENATE, provided two-thirds of the senators concur. An "Article II" treaty may be a bilateral or multilateral international agreement and is brought into force as an international obligation of the United States by the formal act of ratification or accession. This formal act (hereinafter called "ratification") is separate from the act of signing the treaty and is accomplished pursuant to an instrument executed by the President. Accordingly, the TREATY POWER is a presidential power that requires Senate participation before its exercise.

The decision to open a treaty negotiation, like the process of negotiation itself, is an exclusive EXECUTIVE PREROGATIVE. The Senate or individual senators may influence the course of a negotiation, but the Senate has no constitutionally recognized role before the submission of a treaty for advice and consent to ratification. The original understanding of the treaty power envisioned Senate participation before the negotiation and conclusion of treaties. However, this understanding was quickly reinterpreted in an informal manner. In 1789, in connection with an upcoming negotiation, President GEORGE WASHINGTON personally appeared before the Senate and asked its advice on a series of specific negotiating questions. The Senate postponed consideration of all but one such question to a second session. This procedure was unsatisfactory to both the President and the Senate and was abandoned. Even the practice initiated by Washington of seeking written advice on particular negotiating questions was abandoned by him before the end of his first administration. A congressional study reported that "[b]y 1816 the practice had become established that the Senate's formal participation in treaty-making was to approve, approve with conditions, or disapprove treaties after they had been negotiated by the President or his representative." An attempt in 1973 to affirm the "historic" role of the Senate in treaty making by constituting it as a council of advice for that purpose came to naught in the face of executive branch, constitutional objections. The Senate and individual senators may nevertheless informally influence the course of negotiations through expressions of views at hearings, participation as advisors to the U.S. delegation to a negotiation, and other informal methods.

If a negotiation produces an international agreement, the president must choose the most appropriate basis in domestic constitutional law for bringing the agreement into force. There are four distinct sources of authority for presidential conclusion of an international agreement on behalf of the United States. The President may submit the agreement as an Article II treaty to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratificaiton. Alternatively, the President may seek congressional authorization of an international agreement by JOINT RESOLUTION or act of Congress or may use existing legislation as a basis for ratification of the agreement. These agreements are called congressional-executive agreements. This alternative procedure has become accepted as constitutionally equivalent to the Article II procedure. Any international agreement so authorized is binding on the United States as a matter of international law, and both congressional-executive agreements and "self-executing" Article II treaties supercede earlier inconsistent federal statutes as a matter of domestic law. In general, a self executing treaty is one that is intended by the United States to take effect as domestic law upon ratification.

Third, an international agreement may be contemplated by an earlier Article II treaty and may derive its authority from the earlier treaty. Such an agreement has the same legal force internationally and domestically as an Article II treaty. Fourth, an international agreement may be concluded on the basis of the President's power in FOREIGN AFFAIRS. An international agreement concluded pursuant to the President's foreign-affairs power has the same effect internationally as an Article II treaty, but the President does not normally use a presidential EXECUTIVE AGREEMENT if it would be inconsistent with domestic law (for an exception see DAMES & MOORE V. REGAN, 1981). Any international agreement, including an Article II treaty, supersedes inconsistent state law.

The President's choice as to whether to submit an international agreement to the Senate as an Article II treaty is guided by the State Department's Circular 175 Procedure. This State Department regulation reqnuires that due consideration be given to such factors as the formality, importance and duration of the agreement, the preference of Congress, the need for implementing LEGISLATION by Congress, the effect on state law, and past U.S. and international practice. Under Circular 175, officials of the executive branch may consult with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as to the choice of constitutional procedure. Although the "Circular 175" factors are rather general and may sometimes suggest alternative inconsistent choices and although the choice of constitutional procedure is in part a political choice, historical factors are often decisive. Thus, international agreements dealing with boundaries, arms control, military alliances, extradition, and investment are normally submitted to the Senate as Article II treaties. In contrast, international agreements dealing with trade, finance, energy, fisheries, and aviation are normally concluded as congressional-executive agreements. Sometimes an agreement may be concluded as an Article II treaty that is non-self-executing and is therefore subject to the enactment of implementing legislation by Congress before its ratification. This procedure may be preferable if the treaty requires regular appropriation of funds.

If the President chooses to submit an international agreement to the Senate as an Article II treaty, the Senate may consent to its ratification subject to conditions that bind the President if the President chooses to ratify the treaty. These conditions may require the President to attach a reservation to United Sates adherence to the treaty or to amend the treaty by agreement with the other treaty party or parties. Senate-imposed conditions may also require the President to make a specified declaration to the other treaty party or parties in connection with ratification, or a Senate-imposed condition may state an understanding that the Senate seeks to impose on the President or the U.S. Courts—for example, an understanding regarding a particular interpretation or the treaty's domestic effect. The President normally included Senate-imposed conditions requiring agreement by, or communication to, the other treaty party or parties in an instrument exchanged with the treaty partner or deposited specifically in connection with ratification. However, the President has claimed the constitutional power to comply with Senate-imposed conditions outside the formal ratification proces. A Senate-imposed condition must relate to the subject matter of the treaty and may not infringe on other provisions of the Constitution, such as the BILL OF RIGHTS or the President's foreign-affairs power. In MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920), the Supreme Court upheld the validity of a treaty-related act of Congress that, absent the treaty, arguably contravened the TENTH AMENDMENT. This decision caused considerable concern that a treaty might supersede other constitutional provisions, including the Bill of Rights. However, in REID V. COVERT (1957), a plurality of justices opined that a treaty may not contravene individual liberty specifically protected by the Bill of Rights. Of course, the content of such a right may be altered by the existence of a treaty and the foreign location of the governmental activity.

Following the Senate's advice and consent, the President makes an independent decision as to whether to ratify the treaty, thereby bringing it into force as an international obligation of the United States subject to the conditions imposed by the Senate. Until 1950, ratified treaties were published in the Statutes at Large. Now they are published separately by the Department of State as part of the series entitled United States Treaties and Other International Agreements. The President has also exercised the power to accept or reject proposed reservations by other parties to a treaty without the participation of the Senate.

Once a treaty has been ratified, the President has the power to interpret it, unilaterally or in agreement with treaty partners, pursuant to the President's foreign-affairs power. However, the President normally does not commit the interpretation of treaties to third-party dispute resolution, such as arbitration or adjudication by the International Court of Justice, without Senate or congressional acquiescence or approval. Moreover, if the President changes an earlier, commonly held interpretation, Congress may use its legislative and appropriations powers to force the President to reconsider. The reinterpretation controversy involving the 1972 U.S.-U.S.S.R. Treaty on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems (hereinafter called the "ABM Treaty") is a good example of this phenomenon. When the President sent the ABM Treaty to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification, executive branch officials told the Senate that the treaty prohibited the development and testing of space-based ABM systems based on "other physical principles" than those existing in 1972, such as lasers. Thirteen years later the administration of RONALD REAGAN "reinterpreted" the treaty to permit the development and testing of those space-based ABM systems. However, several senators, former officials who negotiated the treaty, and academic commentators vigorously disputed the administration's case. Congress used its legislative and appropriations powers to force the executive branch to limit development and testing of ABM systems to activities permitted under the original interpretation.

In addition to the controversy over the substantive question of how the ABM Treaty should be interpreted, the reinterpretation attempt of the ABM Treaty sparked a dispute over the constitutional limits on presidential interpretation power. In 1987, the Senate considered, but declined to adopt, Senate Resolution 167, a general resolution stating that the meaning of a treaty cannot be unilaterally changed by the President from "what the Senate understands the treaty to mean when it gives its advice and consent to ratification." After another round of debate of the constitutional issue, the Senate attached a similar condition in its consent to ratification of the 1987 U.S.-U.S.S.R. Treaty on the Elimination of Intermediate-range and Shorter-range Missiles (hereinafter called the "INF Treaty") applicable only to that treaty. The President questioned the constitutionality of that condition, but only after he had ratified the INF Treaty.

After all the controversy, little is settled. Most commentators probably would agree that the President may not reinterpret fundamental treaty provisions in major respects, even with the agreement of a treaty partner, without seeking Senate or congressional approval. Such a change would probably be classified as a "major amendment" to the treaty and, as such, would require that consent. It would also seem that other reinterpretations could be made by the President with Senate or congressional acquiescence. If Congress disagrees with a presidential interpretation, it may reflect its nonacquiescence through its legislative or appropriations power. Finally, conditions formally adopted, like that to the INF Treaty, should bind the President if the President chooses to ratify the treaty.

Another area of recent controversy concerns the termination of treaties. President JIMMY CARTER terminated an Article II defense treaty in accordance with its terms, despite a "sense of the Congress" expression that he should consult with Congress before any such change in policy. In GOLDWATER V. CARTER (1979) the Supreme Court dismissed a complaint filed by some members of Congress to enjoin the presidential action. The PLURALITY OPINION invoked the POLITICAL QUESTION doctrine. Since that time, the President has claimed the right to terminate Article II treaties in accordance with their terms. Congress has acquiesced. The President has also successfully asserted the right to declare a treaty partner to be in "material breach" of its terms so the United States may withdraw from the treaty. Finally, the President has successfully asserted the right to violate the terms of a treaty or other norms of international law in the course of conducting the nation's foreign relations, at least in the absence of congressional action prohibiting such a violation. Those rights are based on the President's foreign-affairs power.

Because the judiciary rarely adjudicates SEPARATION OF POWERS issues on the merits in foreign-affairs cases, the best guide to constitutional law defining presidential power in this area is recent historical practice; it constitutes a common law reflecting the pattern of accommodations reached by the President, the Senate, and the Congress in allocating responsibilities under the treaty power.

PHILLIP R. TRIMBLE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Congress and Foreign Policy; Congressional War Powers; Presidential War Powers; Senate and Foreign Policy.)

Bibliography

BESTOR, ARTHUR 1989 "Advice" from the Very Beginning, "Consent" When the End Is Achieved. American Journal of International Law 83:718–727.

CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE 1984 Treaties and Other International Agreements: The Role of the United States Senate. S-Print 98–205, 98th Congress, Second Session.

GLENNON, MICHAEL J. 1990 Constitutional Diplomacy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.
HENKIN, LOUIS 1972 Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.
KOH, HAROLD HONGJU 1990 The National Security Constitution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.
SYMPOSIUM 1989 Arms Control Treaty Interpretation. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 137:1351–1557.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN FUND ACT

See: Federal Election Campaign Acts

PRESIDENTIAL IMMUNITY

The Constitution has no provision regarding presidential immunity akin to the SPEECH OR DEBATE CLAUSE that protects members of Congress in performing their official duties. Nevertheless, most Presidents have claimed the constitutional structure implicitly protects their ability to execute their constitutional obligations.

The Supreme Court first recognized presidential immunity formally in UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1973). The Court concluded the privilege was not absolute but presumptive and ordered President RICHARD M. NIXON to comply with a SUBPOENA requesting some tapes of his conversations with his aides. The Court determined that Nixon's "generalized" need for "confidential communications" with staff was outweighed by the need for the materials sought in a pending criminal prosecution against members of his staff.

In NIXON V. FITZGERALD (1982), the Court held 5–4 the President—but not his staff—was absolutely immune from civil actions based on his official actions. The Court explained the "President occupies a unique position in the constitutional scheme. [Because] of the singular importance of the President's duties, diversion of his energies by concern with private lawsuits would raise unique risks to the effective functioning of government."

In CLINTON V. JONES (1997), a unanimous Court acknowledged the President's "unique" constitutional status but held he was not immune from civil actions based on his unofficial conduct. The Court left unaddressed whether a President may be criminally prosecuted or imprisoned before IMPEACHMENT and removal from office, though it suggested for official actions a President "may be disciplined principally by impeachment, not by private lawsuits for damages." Although Justice JOSEPH STORY maintained a President was immune from criminal prosecution and imprisonment while discharging his duties, it is arguable that Clinton v. Jones sanctions any lawsuits, even criminal ones, based on a President's unofficial conduct. Moreover, no other federal officials, not even Vice Presidents, are immune while in office from criminal prosecution or imprisonment.

MICHAEL J. GERHARDT
(2000)

PRESIDENTIAL ORDINANCE-MAKING POWER

As a means of carrying out constitutional and statutory duties, Presidents issue regulations, proclamations, and EXECUTIVE ORDERS. Although this exercise of legislative power by the President appears to contradict the doctrine of SEPARATION OF POWERS, the scope of administrative legislation has remained broad. Rules and regulations, as the Supreme Court noted in United States v. Eliason (1842), "must be received as the acts of the executive, and as such, be binding upon all within the sphere of his legal and constitutional authority."

It is established DOCTRINE that "the authority to prescribe rules and regulations is not the power to make laws, for no such power can be delegated by the Congress," as a federal court of appeals declared in Lincoln Electric Co. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue (1951). Nevertheless, vague grants of delegated authority by Congress give administrators substantial discretion to make federal policy. Over a twelve-month period from 1933 to 1934 the National Recovery Administration issued 2,998 orders. This flood of rule-making activity was not collected and published in one place, leaving even executive officials in doubt about applicable regulations.

Legislation in 1935 provided for the custody of federal documents and their publication in a "Federal Register." The Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 established uniform standards for rule-making, including notice to the parties concerned and an opportunity for public participation. Recent Presidents, especially GERALD FORD, JIMMY CARTER, and RONALD REAGAN, have attempted to monitor and control the impact of agency regulations on the private sector.

Proclamations are a second instrument of administrative legislation. Sometimes they are hortatory in character, without legislative effect, such as proclamations for Law Day. Other proclamations have substantive effects, especially when used to regulate international trade on the basis of broad grants of statutory authority. Still other proclamations have been issued solely on the President's constitutional authority, as with pardons and AMNESTIES and ABRAHAM LINCOLN's proclamations in April 1861. When a statute prescribes a specific procedure in an area reserved to Congress and the President follows a different course, proclamations are illegal and void.

From ancient times a proclamation was literally a public notice, whether by trumpet, voice, print, or posting. Yet in 1873 the Supreme Court in Lapeyre v. United States declared that a proclamation by the President became a valid instrument of federal law from the moment it was signed and deposited in the office of the secretary of state, even though not published. These early proclamations eventually found their way into the Statutes at Large, but not until the Federal Register Act of 1935 did Congress require the prompt publication of all proclamations and executive orders that have general applicability and legal effect.

Executive orders are a third source of ordinance-making power. They draw upon the constitutional power of the President or powers expressly delegated by Congress. Especially bold were the orders of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT from 1941 to 1943; without any statutory authority he seized plants, mines, and companies. Actions that exceed legal bounds have been struck down by the courts, a major example being the Steel Seizure Case (YOUNGSTOWN SHEET AND TUBE CO. V. SAWYER, 1952). Executive orders cannot supersede a statute or override contradictory congressional expressions.

Congress has used its power of the purse to circumscribe executive orders. After President RICHARD M. NIXON issued executive order 11605 in 1971, rejuvenating the SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD, Congress reduced the agency's budget and expressly prohibited it from using any of the funds to implement the President's order. Congress has also prevented the President from using appropriated funds to finance agencies created solely by executive order.

LOIS FISHER
(1986)

Bibliography

FLEISHMAN, JOEL L. and AUFSES, ARTHUR H. 1976 Law and Orders: The Problem of Presidential Legislation. Law and Contemporary Problems 40:1–45.

HART, JAMES 1925 The Ordinance Making Powers of the President of the United States. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. [Reprinted in 1970 by Da Capo Press.]

PRESIDENTIAL POWERS

The powers of the American presidency are amorphous and enormous. Perhaps they can be defined only by saying that they are made adequate to the problems to which the power is addressed. Although these powers purportedly derive from the specifications of the Constitution itself, in fact their definition is to be found in the behavior of the American Presidents since 1789. During this time the executive branch, largely with the acquiescence of Congress and the encouragement of the Supreme Court, has come to resemble the monolithic authority to be found in governments that have succeeded to the authority of czars and emperors. LIMITED GOVERNMENT is now constitutionally limited only by the first eight Amendments and Article I, section 9, and even then only at the discretion of the Supreme Court.

The reason for the accumulation of power in the presidency is not hard to find. Power goes to the official who can use it. It is easy for the President to be that official because, as Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON wrote in YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952):

> Executive power has the advantage of concentration in a single head in whose choice the whole Nation has a part, making him the focus of public hopes and expectations. In drama, magnitude and finality his decisions so far overshadow any others that almost alone he fills the public eye and ear. No other personality in public life can begin to compete with him in access to the public mind through modern methods of communications. By his prestige as head of state and his influence upon public opinion he exerts a leverage upon those who are supposed to check and balance his power which often cancels their effectiveness.

The doctrine of SEPARATION OF POWERS, not to be found in terms in the Constitution, has receded to the vanishing point so far as the presidency is concerned. And the principle of CHECKS AND BALANCES, intrinsic in the Constitution as a whole, has also been diminished when it comes to putting restraints on the President.

Essentially there are two conflicting theses on the powers of American Presidents, depending in large part on whether it is believed that the opening words of the Second Article: "The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States," is itself a grant of power or, as was the case with Articles I and III, is simply a designation of the office with the powers of that official to be found in the provisions that followed. In sum, the question is whether everything that comes after the first sentence in Article II is a redundancy so far as presidential powers are concerned. A reading of the origins of the article would clearly deflate the concept of a presidency replete with the royal prerogatives that the nation had so roundly condemned in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE itself.

Even the view taken by THEODORE ROOSEVELT, however, is not so broad as to leave no need for separation of powers. Roosevelt asserted "that the executive power was limited only by specific restrictions and prohibitions appearing in the Constitution or imposed by Congress under its Constitutional powers." Roosevelt's immediate successor in office, WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, had espoused a different reading: "The true view of the executive function is . . . that the President can exercise no power which cannot be fairly and reasonably traced to some specific grant of power or justly implied and included within such grant as proper and necessary." Taft's was the better reading of the origins of the constitutional provisions, although even he later turned to the Roosevelt reading when he was on the Supreme Court. But Roosevelt's was the better reading of the history of the presidency and a better prediction of what the presidency was to become.

The last important Supreme Court opinion on presidential powers, perhaps because it was one of the few outside the area of CIVIL LIBERTIES that rejected a presidential reach for power beyond his grasp, came in 1952 in the Steel Seizure Case. There the Court was thoroughly divided. The dissenters, led by Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON, read the INHERENT POWERS of the presidency as all but limitless, in keeping with the construction given by most political scientists. Justice HUGO L. BLACK went to the other extreme in his opinion for the Court. For him the chief magistrate had only those powers specifically provided by the terms of the Constitution and those powers properly conferred upon him by Congress. But of all the opinions in Youngstown, the one most often looked to by constitutional lawyers, including those sitting on the Court, has been that of Justice Robert H. Jackson, for whom there was no plain rule but rather a sliding scale:

> 1. When the President acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at its maximum, for it includes all that he possesses in his own right plus all that Congress can delegate. . . .
>
> 2. When the President acts in absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority, he can only rely upon his own independent powers, but there is a zone of twilight in which he and Congress may have concurrent authority, or in which its distribution is uncertain. Therefore, congressional inertia, indifference or quiescence may sometimes, at least as a practical matter, enable, if not invite, measures of independent presidential responsibility. In this area, any test of power is likely to depend on the imperative of events and contemporary imponderables rather than on abstract theories of law.
>
> 3. When the President takes measures incompatible with the express or implied will of Congress, his power is at its lowest ebb, for then he can rely only upon its constitutional powers minus any constitutional powers of Congress over the matter. . . . Presidential claim to a power at once so conclusive and preclusive must be scrutinized with caution, for what is at stake is the equilibrium established by our constitutional system.

Jackson concluded his opinion, saying: "With all its defects, delays and inconveniences, men have discovered no technique for long preserving free government except that the Executive be under the law, and that the law be made by parliamentary deliberations. Such institutions may be destined to pass away. But it is the duty of the Court to be the last, not first, to give them up."

The concept of the RULE OF LAW continues to diminish as the nation embraces first the description in CLINTON ROSSITER's Constitutional Dictatorship, and then that of Arthur Schlesinger in his Imperial Presidency. We continue, however, to parse the sentences of the Constitution in order to justify or oppose presidential authority. But there is less reality in this exercise as each day succeeds the next.

The catalogue of presidential powers specifically stated in the Constitution is neither long nor extensive. He is given a conditional power of veto of all legislation, subject to being overridden by a two-thirds vote of each house. The remainder of his powers are specified in Article II, section 7: he is to be COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the armed forces, including the militia when in the service of the United States; he may require opinions from his principal cabinet officers; he may grant pardons and reprieves for offenders against the national laws; he may enter into TREATIES with foreign nations with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of two-thirds of the Senate; he is to nominate ambassadors, ministers, and consuls, members of the Supreme Court, and such other officers as are not otherwise provided for by the Constitution, plus such other officers as Congress shall provide; he may fill vacancies while the Senate is not in session; he shall address Congress on the state of the union and recommend the passage of measures he deems necessary and expedient; he may convene Congress and adjourn it when the two houses do not agree on adjournment; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers from foreign countries; "he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed"; and he shall commission all officers of the United States. In fact, however, these bare bones of presidential authority have had much meat placed on them by presidential practices, by legislative delegation, and by judicial approval. It can hardly be gainsaid that the authors of the constitutional language would be much surprised were they to return to the scene to see what it is said that they have wrought.

The slivers of presidential power specifically authorized by the Constitution have been bundled like fasces to create huge authority in the President under the banners of FOREIGN AFFAIRS powers; WAR POWERS; fiscal powers; legislative powers and administrative powers. None of these rests exclusively on any specific authority granted by the Constitution but rather on combinations and permutations of them combined with "intrinsic" or "necessary and proper" powers, although the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE itself was a grant only to the legislative branch.

Probably the most extensive, and perhaps the most important, of the modern President's powers is to be found in his hegemony over the nation's foreign relations. As Archibald Cox has written: "The United States' assumption of a leading role in world affairs built up the presidency by focussing world attention upon the president. The constitution, combined with necessity, gives the president greater personal authority in foreign affairs than domestic matters. A succession of presidents pushed these powers to, and sometimes beyond, their limits. The personal manner in which they conducted international relations doubtless influenced their style in dealing with domestic matters." But it has been "necessity," not the Constitution, that vested this great personal power in the President. There are only two plausible grounds in the Constitution for great presidential authority in the area of foreign relations. It is he who names and receives ambassadors, which was early construed to mean that he was the sole spokesman of the nation with regard to foreign nations. It is he who is charged with the negotiation of treaties. But both in the appointment of ambassadors and in the making of treaties, the Founders required the collaboration of the Senate: a majority vote of acquiescence in the case of ambassadors and a two-thirds vote of the Senate to validate a treaty.

What the Constitution did not give the President by way of powers in this area, he has been given by Congress or he has taken for himself, and what he has taken for himself has generally been legitimated by Supreme Court decision. Much of relations with foreign nations that was committed to Congress—for example, the power over FOREIGN COMMERCE, the war-making authority—has become irrelevant to the modern Constitution. For the Supreme Court has declared that the powers over foreign affairs that are the President's do not derive from the Constitution but rather are a direct inheritance from the Crown of England. In UNITED STATES V. CURTISS-WRIGHT EXPORT CORP. (1936) the Court said: "As a result of the separation from Great Britain by the colonies acting as a unit, the powers of external SOVEREIGNTY passed from the Crown not to the colonies severally, but to the colonies in their collective and corporate capacity as the United States. . . . Sovereignty is never held in suspense. When, therefore, the external sovereignty of Great Britain in respect to the colonies ceased, it immediately passed to the Union." Not only did this power inhere in the Union; it belonged directly to the President, although where it was before there was a President is not made clear. But, said the Court, it did not come through the Constitution or the Congress. It is a "very delicate, plenary and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the federal government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress." It is somewhat strange, if the foreign relations power never belonged to the states, that the Founders thought it necessary to take it from them in the specific words of Article I, section 10: "No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant LETTERS OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL, . . . No state shall, without the consent of Congress . . . keep troops, or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded. . . ." It is strange, too, that Congress can consent to the exercise of foreign affairs powers by the states, if that power properly belongs exclusively to the President.

The coalescence of this power over foreign relations solely in the President has also had the effect of eliminating specific checks on him by the Senate. The Constitution clearly gives the power to negotiate treaties to the President, but it requires the consent of two-thirds of the Senate to validate a treaty. The requirement of Senate approval has often proved a stumbling block, as it was when the Senate refused to consent to the United States' entry into the League of Nations and when the Senate imposed qualifications on the treaty ceding the Panama Canal Zone back to Panama. But the President and the Supreme Court have found a way out of some of these restraints. An agreement with a foreign nation may be called an EXECUTIVE AGREEMENT rather than a "treaty," and an "executive agreement" does not require Senate approval, according to the decisions in UNITED STATES V. BELMONT (1937) and UNITED STATES V. PINK (1942). There is no guide, however, to say what the province of a treaty may be to distinguish it from that of an executive agreement. The justification for evading presidential responsibility to the Senate is, however, often founded on the ground that effectuation of such agreements usually requires congressional legislation, and a majority of both houses is said to be as good as or better than two-thirds of the Senate in ratifying the presidential action and easier to secure.

It has been argued, but not very cogently, that the foreign affairs powers of the President somehow derive from the Commander-in-Chief Clause of Article II. ALEXANDER HAMILTON's explanation of that provision in THE FEDERALIST #69 as to the limited authority of the commander-in-chief still seems to be the better understanding of it: "It would amount to nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the military and naval forces, as first General and Admiral of the Confederacy."

The foreign affairs powers of the President are as broad as they have become not because of constitutional delegation but because of the exigencies that have caused the Presidents to seize the power to meet the problems. Neither the public nor the Congress has shown much aversion to this presidential usurpation.

PRESIDENTIAL WAR POWERS, like presidential foreign affairs powers, rest on practice and precedent rather than on constitutional authorization. Thus, despite the provision of Article 1, section 8, giving Congress the power to declare war, wars have tended to be a consequence of executive action, sometimes confirmed by a congressional DECLARATION OF WAR and sometimes carried on without one. Five times in American history, Congress has declared war: the War of 1812, the Mexican War of 1848, the Spanish American War of 1898, WORLD WAR I (1917), and WORLD WAR II (1941). Each time American military and naval forces had been committed to action before the actual declaration took place. In most instances when military forces have been engaged against foreign powers there has been no declaration of war even when the conflict reached such vast scales as the country's commitments to the KOREAN WAR and VIETNAM WAR. It has been argued that there were de facto declarations in such instances as Korea and Vietnam by congressional silence or appropriations for the military, but that was not what the Founders had in mind. For them war was thought too serious a matter to be left to generals and Presidents.

Congress has come up with a statute attempting to resolve the problem of presidential usurpation of the war power. The WAR POWERS RESOLUTION OF1973 provides that a President can order military action without a declaration of war by Congress, but he must inform Congress within forty-eight hours of doing so. Troops cannot be committed for more than sixty days except when Congress so authorizes, and Congress is empowered to order an immediate withdrawal of American forces by CONCURRENT RESOLUTION not subject to presidential veto. The statute is of dubious constitutional validity, giving presidential powers to Congress and congressional powers to the President. It is not likely to be the subject of a successful court test, for courts cannot act expeditiously enough nor can they effectuate a decree against the will of either of the other branches.

The essential fact is that the Constitution gives to Congress the power to declare war, to raise and support the armed forces, to make rules for the governance of the armed forces, to call up the militia, and to regulate it. It gives to the President the powers of commander-in-chief, which is only an authority to act in command of the military services so that no mere military officer shall be without civilian oversight.

The greater problem with presidential war powers is whether they enhance his authority over domestic civilian affairs. The Court has tended to sustain extraordinarily broad powers for the executive during the course of a war, as in the JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES (1943–1944), allowing relocation of native and foreign-born Japanese from the West Coast into concentration camps. When war has ended, the Court tends to look more dubiously on executive war powers, holding in DUNCAN V. KAHANOMOKU (1946), for example, that it was an abuse of authority to declare martial law in Hawaii on the day after the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor. So far as civilian activities are concerned, it is said that war does not give the executive any new powers but simply justifies the use of granted powers reserved for emergencies. The fact is that, in contemporary times, Congress has provided the President with more EMERGENCY POWERS than he ever has occasion to use, generally leaving to him the discretion to determine whether an emergency warrants calling such powers into play. The concept of emergency powers, itself nowhere to be found in the Constitution, has long since expanded beyond the realms of war powers to justify presidential action in the economic and social realm as well as in the areas of military combat and foreign affairs. The confiscation of Iranian assets in the United States to ransom American captives from the Iranians in 1980 affords an example of the extension of presidential authority far beyond what the Constitution provided; but in DAMES & MOORE V. REGAN (1981) the flimsiest statutory delegation was held sufficient to justify the President's actions.

The Constitution gave the President no powers over the national fisc. It was very clear at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 that the authority over national finance—what went into the national purse and what came out of it—belonged to Congress and Congress alone, subject, of course, to the presidential power of veto. Article 1, section 7, commands that the House of Representatives alone shall originate revenue measures. Article 1, section 8, gives to the Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes," "to pay the debts," "to borrow money," "to coin money," and to punish counterfeiting. And Article 1, section 9, clause 7, provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." If any principle of responsible government can be said to have been derived from the Glorious Revolution of 1688 in England and the American Revolution, it is that a popularly elected legislature is the only safe place in which to place the power of the purse.

This is not to deny that at all times in our history the executive branch has played a more or less important role in the creation and effectuation of fiscal policy, from the roles of Secretaries of the Treasury Hamilton and ALBERT GALLATIN and ANDREW JACKSON's war on the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES to contemporary times when it would appear that the executive is dominant and Congress subordinate with regard to all the fiscal powers that the Constitution gave to the Congress. But the role of the executive branch has essentially been defined by the Congress. If the executive power is now so great in fiscal matters, the reason is not that the Constitution has conferred the power on the President but that Congress has done so. Thus, one frustrating restraint on presidential fiscal policy derives from the autonomy over the money supply granted by Congress to the Federal Reserve Board, an agency independent of the President.

The nation has evolved from one in which the national government's principal role was that of the protector of the lives and property of the citizenry against encroachment by foreign governments and other citizens to one in which the government manages the economy, for better or worse, in a state where the government has assumed responsibility for the social welfare as well as the physical protection of the citizenry. And as the progression has gone on, so too has Congress relinquished more and more authority to the President. But the President can be said to have these powers only at the will of Congress and to exercise them only in order to enforce the laws faithfully. Indeed, the DELEGATION OF POWER has gone so far as for Congress to have provided by law that the President may refuse to enforce its legislation by IMPOUNDMENT of appropriated funds, provided notice is given to Congress and Congress acquiesces.

Although Congress now has its own budget-making procedures, the dominant BUDGET, derived from the President's Office of Management and Budget, is submitted to Congress more by way of command than suggestion. The concept of an executive budget derives from the 1920s when Congress first enacted a demand that the President supply one. Since then, however, the Office of Management and Budget has grown from a simple accounting agency into a fiscal ombudsman for the entire government. It is a force second only to that of the President himself within the executive branch and it has not been bashful about exercising its powers. But if the beast is a presidential pet, it is nonetheless a creature of a Congress dedicated to transferring to the President the powers that the Constitution gave to Congress.

In constitutional terms, the President's role in the legislative process was originally to be very small. Most important, of course, was the power to veto the acts passed by Congress. And even here, unlike the power of the Crown to forestall parliamentary will as expressed in legislation, the President was given only a conditional veto, subject to being overridden by two-thirds of each house of Congress. The VETO POWER is, however, fully effective only for a President who prefers a limited role for government. Obviously, his veto cannot create legislation but only prevent it. A forceful President seeking to impose his will by way of persuading Congress to action rather than inaction can, however, use the veto as a bargaining tool, a threat to cancel what Congress wants unless it gives the President what he wants. Stalemate is a frequent consequence of a profligate use of the veto power.

The President also has the power by constitutional provision to adjourn Congress, when the two houses are unable to agree on adjournment, and to convene Congress. The power to prorogue Parliament was a sore point with the colonists and they had no intention of conferring such authority on any executive of their own.

There was an imitation of the royal prerogative that was to come into existence even though it was not planned by the Founders. The Constitution provides that the President "shall from time to time give the Congress information of the state of the union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." Like the Queen's message to the opening of Parliament, this device has been used by the executive administration to offer a legislative program to Congress. Indeed, most legislation of importance that comes to enactment in Congress tends to be that which the President has recommended to it or which the President supports by lobbying in Congress. Legislation that does not bear the imprimatur of the President seldom makes its way to enactment, although presidential recommendations are frequently amended in the process of legislative consideration and sometimes are unrecognizable by the time they emerge from both houses. But the influence of the President, utilizing the Office of Management and Budget for details, on the making of the laws is extraordinarily strong. And while there is no provision for presidential budget making in the Constitution, the fact is that the budget that he submits is the foundation on which the congressional budget-making process depends.

In fact, the President indulges in a great deal of lawmaking himself. With the demise of the ban on the delegation of legislative power, which occurred when the Supreme Court was reconstituted by FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, most of the rules governing American society are made by the executive branch. Legislation has tended to take the form of generalized programs whose details are to be filled by agencies of the executive branch. Indeed, some legislation is created by the President even in the absence of authorization for it by the Congress. This takes the form of so-called EXECUTIVE ORDERS theoretically directed to the enforcement of the laws by persons in the executive branch, but usually with the same effect as rules directed to the governed rather than the governors. Very rare indeed is the instance, like the steel seizure case, when the Court has throttled an executive order. Thus, most of the rules governing the lives of Americans are to be sought not in the statutes-at-large but rather in the Federal Register where are to be found the results of the exercise of delegated legislative authority as well as executive orders that do not rest on any actual delegation.

It would seem that the originators of the departments of government thought of them as semiautonomous, with their functions defined by Congress and their secretaries responsible to either the President or the Congress, or both, as prescribed by the legislation creating those offices. The provision for a power in the President to call on the principal officers of government for their opinions would have been redundant if in fact it had been anticipated that all executive officials were directly subordinate to the President. It was probably GEORGE WASHINGTON's organization of his department chiefs into a cabinet rather than the words of the Constitution that made for the hierarchical system headed by the President that has been taken for granted since early in the nineteenth century. The cabinet is not a constitutional body and has no constitutional powers. The powers of the department heads are dependent on legislative rather than constitutional provision, except for their duties to give opinions to the President on demand. Thus by custom and by legislation, and perhaps through the charge of the Constitution to the President faithfully to execute the laws, it has come to be accepted that the executive branch, for all its multitude of offices, is an entity for which the President is responsible both to Congress through the legislature's oversight function, and to the voting public. Surely this notion of the unitary nature of the executive branch and the exceptions thereto—independent administrative agencies—underlies the judgment of the Supreme Court in MYERS V. UNITED STATES (1926) establishing the right of the President to remove officials at his will. This accepted principle is not contradicted by the obligation of the President or other executive officials to abide by their own regulations, which are created by him or them and which are subject to change by him or them. (See APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL POWER.)

The whole of the executive branch acts subordinately to the command of the President in the administration of federal laws, so long as they act within the terms of those laws. Their offices confer no right to violate the laws, whether they take the form of constitution, statute, or treaty.

The United States does have in the presidency a "constitutional dictatorship" or a "plebiscitary President." The "benevolent monarch" of contemporary times, however, is still subject to the force of public opinion, sometimes expressed through representatives, sometimes expressed through the print and electronic media, sometimes expressed in the streets, and every four years expressed through the ballot boxes. One-term Presidents may become the rule. Despite all the centralization of authority, however, the greatest power of the presidency in this democracy is not the power of command. It is the power to lead a nation by moral suasion. It takes a great President to do that well, and that is why history records so few great Presidents.

PHILIP B. KURLAND
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1957 The President: Office and Powers 1787–1957. 4th rev. ed. New York: New York University Press.

COX, ARCHIBALD 1976 Watergate and the Constitution of the United States. University of Toronto Law Journal 26:125–139.

KOENIG, LOIS W. 1975 The Chief Executive. 3d ed. New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich.

KURLAND, PHILIP B. 1978 Watergate and the Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

NEUSTADT, RICHARD E. 1960 Presidential Power. New York: John Wiley & Sons.

PIOUS, RICHARD M. 1979 The American Presidency. New York: Basic Books.

ROSSITER, CLINTON 1948 Constitutional Dictatorship. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

SCHLESINGER, ARTHUR M., JR. 1973 The Imperial Presidency. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

PRESIDENTIAL SPENDING POWER

The Constitution assigns to Congress the exclusive power to authorize spending. Article I, section 9, prohibits money being drawn from the Treasury "but in Consequence of Appropriations made by law." Nevertheless, the power of the purse is shared with the President because Congress has found it necessary to delegate substantial discretion over the expenditure and allocation of funds.

In his first message to Congress, President THOMAS JEFFERSON recommended that Congress appropriate "specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition." He quickly recognized the impracticability of this principle, later admitting that "too minute a specification has its evil as well as a too general one." Lump-sum appropriations are routinely passed by Congress, especially during emergency periods. The magnitude of these lump sums, frequently in the billions of dollars, overstates the amount of flexibility available to administrators. Their scope of discretion is narrowed by general statutory controls, nonstatutory controls embedded in committee reports and other parts of the legislative history, and agreements and understandings entered into by Congress and the agencies.

The conflicting needs of administrative flexibility and congressional control are often reconciled by "reprogramming" agreements. An agency is given some latitude to shift funds within an appropriation account, moving them from one program to another. Legislative controls have gradually tightened. Initially the appropriation committees required regular reporting by the agencies, but reprogrammings over a designated dollar threshold must now be approved by appropriations subcommittees and, in some cases, by authorizing committees that have JURISDICTION over the program. Although these reprogramming procedures are largely nonstatutory and therefore fall short of legally binding requirements, they have become highly formalized and structured. They are incorporated not only in congressional documents but also in agency directives, instructions, and financial management manuals.

Another form of executive spending discretion results from transfer authority. A transfer involves the shifting of funds from one appropriation account to another (in contrast to reprogramming, where funds remain within an account). Moreover, the authority to transfer funds must be explicitly granted by statute. Transfer authority is usually accompanied by limitations, such as allowing a five percent leeway, that help preserve the general budgetary priorities of Congress. When agencies use transfer or reprogramming authority to spend funds on programs that had been previously rejected by Congress, or to enter into long-term financial commitments, Congress responds by adopting additional statutory and nonstatutory restrictions.

Agencies have access to billions of dollars that are hidden from public and congressional view. Confidential and secret funding collides with the requirement of Article I, section 9, of the Constitution: "A regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time." Confidential funds appeared as early as 1790, when Congress appropriated $40,000 to the President to pay for special diplomatic agents. Congress let the President decide the degree to which these expenditures would be made public. Since that time confidential (unvouchered) funds have been made available to many agencies that have domestic as well as foreign responsibilities.

Confidential funding is overt at least in the sense that the amounts are identified in appropriation or authorization bills. Secret funding is covert at every stage, from appropriation straight through to expenditure and auditing. Appropriations, ostensibly for the Defense Department or other agencies, are later siphoned off and allocated to the Central Intelligence Agency and other parts of the intelligence community. Absent congressional authorization, a federal taxpayer lacks STANDING to challenge the constitutionality of confidential or secret funding. The establishment of intelligence committees in the 1970s restored some semblance of congressional control. Legislation for the White House and the General Accounting Office has also tightened legislative control over unvouchered funds. With each increase in the scope of executive spending discretion, Congress participates ever more closely in administrative matters.

LOUIS FISHER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Impoundment of Funds.)

Bibliography

FISHER, LOUIS 1975 Presidential Spending Power. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

WILMERDING, LUCIUS, JR. 1943 The Spending Power: A History of the Efforts of Congress to Control Expenditures. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION

The framework for electing a President and Vice-President every four years is spelled out in the Constitution. As originally adopted, the Constitution was not clear about certain aspects of succession to the Presidency in the event something happened to the elected President. The Framers were content to establish the office of Vice-President and to add the general provisions of Article II, section 1, clause 6: "In Case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected."

The Framers left unanswered questions concerning the status of a Vice-President in cases of removal, death, resignation, and inability, the meaning of the term "inability," and the means by which the beginning and ending of an inability should be determined. Because no event occurred to trigger the succession provision, these ambiguities were of no consequence during the first half century of our nation's existence. Although three Vice-Presidents died in office and another resigned, the presidency and VICE-PRESIDENCY never became vacant at the same time. If that eventuality had come to pass, the president pro tempore of the SENATE would have served as President under the provisions of a 1792 statute on presidential succession.

The ambiguities inherent in the succession provision surfaced in 1841 when President William Henry Harrison died in office. Despite protests that he had become only the "acting president," Vice-President JOHN TYLER assumed the office and title of President for the balance of Harrison's term. Tyler's claiming of the presidency, said JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, was "a construction in direct violation both of the grammar and context of the Constitution. . . ."

The precedent established by Tyler was followed twice within the next twenty-five years when Vice-Presidents MILLARD FILLMORE and ANDREW JOHNSON became President upon the deaths in office of Presidents ZACHARY TAYLOR and ABRAHAM LINCOLN. In 1881 the precedent became an obstacle to Vice-President CHESTER A. ARTHUR's acting as President during the eighty days that President JAMES A. GARFIELD hovered between life and death after being shot by an assassin. The view was strongly expressed at the time that if Arthur were to succeed to the presidency, then according to the Tyler precedent he would be President for the remainder of the presidential term regardless of whether Garfield recovered. Arthur made clear that he would not assume presidential responsibility lest he be labeled a usurper.

In the twentieth century the Tyler precedent was followed on the four occasions when Presidents died in office (WILLIAM MCKINLEY, WARREN G. HARDING, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, and JOHN F. KENNEDY.) Once again, however, it became an obstacle to a Vice-President's acting as President during the lengthy period WOODROW WILSON lay ill, unable to discharge the powers and duties of office. For the most part, presidential responsibility was assumed by the President's wife, doctor, and secretary.

Between 1955 and 1957 the lack of clarity in the succession provision was highlighted when President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER sustained a heart attack, an attack of ileitis, and a stroke. Efforts to have Congress address the question were unsuccessful, but important groundwork for reform was established. President Kennedy's assassination in 1963 became the catalyst for implementing that reform. Congress proposed and the states ratified the TWENTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution to resolve the major issues surrounding the subject of presidential succession. The amendment confirmed that the Vice-President becomes President for the remainder of the term in the case of death, removal, or resignation. In the case of an inability, the amendment provided that the Vice-President serves as acting President only for the duration of the inability. The amendment provided for two methods of establishing the existence of an inability. The President was authorized to declare his own inability and, in such event, its termination. For the case where the President does not or cannot declare his own inability, it empowered the Vice-President and a majority of the Cabinet to make the decision. If the President should dispute their determination, Congress decides the issue.

The amendment also established a mechanism for filling a vice-presidential vacancy: presidential nomination and confirmation by a majority of both houses of Congress. The Twenty-Fifth Amendment is supplemented by a statute on presidential succession adopted in 1947 which provided for the Speaker of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES to serve as President in the event of a double vacancy in the offices of President and Vice-President.

The Twenty-Fifth Amendment served the nation well in the 1970s when both a President and Vice-President resigned from office during the same presidential term. Twice Vice-Presidents were nominated by the President and confirmed by Congress. The first of those Vice-Presidents, GERALD R. FORD, became President of the United States upon the resignation of RICHARD M. NIXON on August 9, 1974. Ford's succession, as did the eight preceding successions of Vice-Presidents, took place in a manner that demonstrated the stability and continuity of government in the United States.

JOHN D. FEERICK
(1986)

Bibliography

BAYH, BIRCH 1968 One Heartbeat Away. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

FEERICK, JOHN D. 1965 From Failing Hands. New York: Fordham University Press.

——— 1976 The Twenty-Fifth Amendment. New York: Fordham University Press.

SILVA, RUTH 1951 Presidential Succession. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

PRESIDENTIAL WAR POWERS

The power of the President to initiate unilaterally military operations widened substantially under Presidents GEORGE H. W. BUSH and WILLIAM J. CLINTON. In December 1989, with Congress out of session, Bush ordered 11,000 troops into Panama to join up with 13,000 American troops already in the Canal Zone. He cited a number of justifications: protecting Americans in Panama who were in "imminent danger," bringing Panamanian General Manuel Noriega to justice in the United States, defending democracy, combating drug trafficking, and protecting the integrity of the Panama Canal treaty. Scholars of INTERNATIONAL LAW generally dismissed those arguments, but Bush on his own had used military force to invade another country without ever seeking authorization from Congress.

After Iraq, under the leadership of Saddam Hussein, invaded Kuwait on August 2, 1990, Bush began deploying U.S. forces to Saudi Arabia and elsewhere in the Middle East. At that point the operation was purely defensive—to deter further Iraqi aggression—but the doubling of U.S. forces by November gave Bush the capacity to wage offensive war. He made no effort to seek authority from Congress. Instead, he sought support from other nations and encouraged the UNITED NATIONS Security Council to authorize the use of force, which it did on November 29. Only at the eleventh hour, in January 1991, did Bush seek support (but not authority) from Congress. A legal crisis was avoided on January 12 when Congress authorized offensive action against Iraq.

In his first six years in office, Clinton repeatedly used military force without ever coming to Congress for authority. On June 26, 1993, he ordered air strikes against Iraq as a response to the attempted assassination of former President Bush during a visit to Kuwait. Sixteen suspects, including two Iraqi nationals, had been arrested but the trial had not been completed. Clinton justified the attack as one of self-defense, but constitutional lawyers found that quite a stretch.

In September 1996, Clinton ordered the launching of cruise missiles against Iraq in response to an attack by Iraqi forces against the Kurdish-controlled city of Irbil in northern Iraq. Cruise missiles also struck air defense capabilities in southern Iraq. There was no claim here of self-defense or the need to protect the lives of Americans. Toward the end of January 1998, Clinton threatened once again to bomb Iraq, this time because Hussein had refused to give UN inspectors full access to examine Iraqi sites. The attack was postponed when UN Secretary General Kofi Annan visited Baghdad in February and negotiated a settlement with Iraq. In that same month, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright was asked how Clinton could order military action against Iraq after opposing American policy in Vietnam. Her response: "We are talking about using military force, but we are not talking about a war. That is an important distinction." How many people in the country, or in the administration, understood such distinctions? Did the President's need to obtain prior congressional authority arise only in "time of war" but not with military force? In December 1998, Clinton ordered four days of heavy bombing in Iraq and continued in 1999 with repeated air strikes.

Further military action occurred in Somalia, where an initial humanitarian effort turned bloody in June 1993 when twenty-three Pakistani peacekeepers were killed. U.S. warplanes launched a retaliatory attack. In August, four U.S. soldiers were killed when a land mine blasted apart their Humvee vehicle. As the situation deteriorated, Congress passed LEGISLATION to remove U.S. ARMED FORCES from Somalia by March 31, 1994.

On September 15, 1994, Clinton told the American public that he was prepared to invade Haiti to reinstate Jean-Bertrand Aristide as President. The UN Security Council had passed a resolution "inviting" the use of force to remove the military leaders from that island. An invasion became unnecessary when former President JIMMY CARTER negotiated an agreement in which the military leaders agreed to step down to permit Aristide's return.

Clinton ordered air strikes in Bosnia beginning in 1994. At the end of 1995 he dispatched 20,000 U.S. troops to that region for peace-keeping purposes. For authority, he cited a number of North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) decisions and UN resolutions. Beginning on March 24, 1999, and operating solely through NATO, Clinton began bombing in Serbia and Kosovo. He also considered sending in U.S. armed forces as part of a multinational effort to protect refugees returning to Kosovo. At no time did Congress authorize his actions, although Clinton sent American troops into Kosovo as part of a NATO peace-keeping force upon cessation of the bombing compaign.

In August 1998, Clinton sent cruise missiles into Afghanistan to attack paramilitary camps and into Sudan to destroy a pharmaceutical factory. He justified the use of military force as a retaliation for bombings earlier in the month against U.S. embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam. The administration claimed Osama bin Laden was behind the embassy attacks, that he used the training complex in Afghanistan, and that he was somehow related to the pharmaceutical plant. Questions were raised as to whether the plant was producing a precursor chemical for a nerve gas, as the administration alleged, or an agricultural pesticide. A Saudi businessman who owned the plant went to court to force the administration to release millions of dollars in assets frozen by U.S. officials on the ground that he was linked to bin Laden. The administration released $24 million of his assets but refused to clear his name.

The pattern during the Bush and Clinton years was clear: Presidents would seek authority to use military force not from Congress but from international and regional institutions. Members of Congress voted repeatedly on amendments to restrict the President's capacity to make war. With the exception of the funding restriction on Somalia, these amendments were never enacted into law.

LOUIS FISHER
(2000)

Bibliography

ADLER, DAVID GRAY and GEORGE, LARRY N. 1996 The Constitution and the Conduct of American Foreign Policy. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.

ELY, JOHN HART 1993 War and Responsibility: Constitutional Lessons of Vietnam and Its Aftermath. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1995 Presidential War Power. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.

STERN, GARY M. and HALPERIN, MORTON H. 1994 The U.S. Constitution and the Power to Go to War: Historical and Current Perspectives. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

PRESUMPTION OF CONSTITUTIONALITY

See: Rational Basis; Standard of Review

PRETRIAL DISCLOSURE

The rules and practices governing pretrial disclosure to the opposing party differ dramatically in criminal and civil litigation. In civil disputes, each side has access to virtually all relevant information possessed by the other. In criminal cases, however, there has been a continuing debate which has focused on how much disclosure the prosecutor, with his superior investigative resources, should be required to make. The argument against wide-ranging disclosure is that it will result in witness intimidation and perjury. The arguments for disclosure are that a criminal trial should not be a "sporting event" in which one side tries to surprise the other, and that disclosure of the prosecution's EVIDENCE would aid the effective assistance of counsel to the accused guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment. (See RIGHT TO COUNSEL.)

Proponents of greater disclosure in criminal cases have made some gains in recent years through the expansion of DISCOVERY statutes. Rule 16 of the FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE is typical. The rule currently provides that, absent special circumstances, the government must disclose upon request: the defendant's own statements; his record of prior convictions; and documents, tangible evidence, or reports of examinations of the defendant or scientific tests the government intends to introduce at trial. The most striking difference between this rule and civil practice is that the criminal rule does not give the defense the power either to discover the identity of government witnesses or to compel them to testify under oath prior to trial. Several states provide for disclosure of prosecution witness lists, but Congress in 1974 rejected such a provision in the federal rules on the usual argument that disclosure of the identity of witnesses would possibly subject them to intimidation.

In addition to the slow but steady statutory expansion of pretrial disclosure by the government to the defense, there has been a reciprocal movement to entitle the prosecution to learn more about the defense case before trial. The argument that the policies underlying the Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION shield the defense from any disclosure has largely been unsuccessful. Under the federal and many state rules, the defense can be requested to disclose any tangible evidence or results of physical or mental examinations it intends to introduce at trial, and to give notice of an alibi or insanity defense. The Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of compelling defense disclosure, provided that discovery is a two-way street; if the defendant is required to disclose alibi witnesses, for example, the government must also disclose any evidence that refutes the alibi.

Against the background of limited formal discovery rules, prosecutors frequently open files to the defense in an attempt to induce guilty pleas. Sometimes, also, judges exert informal pressure toward open discovery in order to avoid trial delays that might be caused by surprise evidence.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that a defendant has no general constitutional right to discovery, but it has required that the prosecution sometimes reveal "favorable" evidence. In Brady v. Maryland (1963) the government failed to disclose to a murder defendant that his companion had once admitted to a government agent that he had done the actual killing. The Court held that such a failure to disclose violates DUE PROCESS where the evidence is "material to guilt or punishment," irrespective of the good faith of the prosecution.

The lower courts generally gave an expansive reading to the Brady decision, but the Supreme Court curbed this development in United States v. Agurs (1976). The Agurs Court held that if the defense has not requested favorable evidence, or has made only a general request, a failure to disclose gives the defendant no constitutional right to a new trial unless there is a strong probability that the result of the first trial would not have been different had the favorable evidence been disclosed. Moreover, an appellate court should not grant a new trial so long as the trial judge remains reasonably convinced of the defendant's guilt. The Agurs Court also said that the failure to disclose evidence that reveals that the prosecution's case includes perjured testimony or the failure to disclose favorable evidence after it has been specifically requested by the defense, is "rarely excusable." In these two situations, the Constitution requires that the defendant be given a new trial if there is any reasonable possibility that the verdict would have been different had the undisclosed evidence been admitted.

Thus, Agurs provided some ammunition to both sides of the debate over criminal discovery: it limited the general due process right but also created a category for all but automatic reversal when the prosecution fails to respond to a defense request for specific information or when the prosecution case includes the knowing use of perjury.

BARBARA ALLEN BABCOCK
(1986)

Bibliography

BABCOCK, BARBARA 1982 Fair Play: Evidence Favorable to an Accused and Effective Assistance of Counsel. Stanford Law Review 34:1133–1182.

PREVENTIVE DETENTION

Preventive detention is the jailing of an accused not to prevent bail-skipping but to protect public safety pending trial. Although pretrial incarceration of criminal defendants has long been condoned when necessary to assure their appearance in court, the constitutional status of preventive detention is far less certain. The Supreme Court has never directly addressed the issue, in part because until quite recently it was rendered largely academic by a federal statutory right to BAIL in noncapital cases and by similar rights granted in most state constitutions. Since 1970, however, District of Columbia courts have been authorized to deny pretrial release in certain cases to suspects charged with "dangerous" crimes, and several states have recently amended their constitutions to allow detention under similar circumstances. Following this activity, Congress in 1984 passed a nationwide program of preventive detention, substantially curtailing the federal statutory right to bail for the first time since the right was enacted in 1789.

The constitutionality of these programs is not altogether free from doubt. To begin with, the Eighth Amendment bars the federal government from requiring "excessive bail." Commentators have waged a spirited debate over whether that prohibition implies that some bail must be set. Many constitutional scholars have argued that the Framers intended to provide an affirmative right to bail to all defendants who do not pose an unacceptable risk of flight, and that without such a right the "excessive bail" clause would be a senseless bar against the government's doing indirectly what it remained free to do directly. Others have contended that the clause is aimed at the courts, not at Congress, and that a restriction on judicial discretion in setting bail is fully consistent with legislative authority to determine the circumstances under which bail should be granted at all.

The Supreme Court's decisions and opinions on the issue have been inconclusive. In Stack v. Boyle (1951) the Court held that bail was "excessive" when set higher than necessary to assure the accused's presence at trial. Strictly speaking, the ruling concerned only the level at which bail may be set if it is set, but the Court also hinted that the right to bail in the first place, long accorded by federal statute, might have a constitutional dimension: "Unless this right to bail before trial is preserved, the presumption of innocence, secured only after centuries of struggle, would lose its meaning."

The rule of Stack v. Boyle regarding bail amounts has remained undisturbed, despite general recognition that in practice bail is frequently set with a covert eye to whether the defendant seems likely to commit crimes before trial. The Supreme Court quickly backed away, however, from its strong if cryptic endorsement of the "right to bail." In Carlson v. Landon (1952) the Court approved the denial of bail, for reasons of public safety, to alien communists held pending deportation hearings. The Eighth Amendment, the Court explained, does not grant "a right to bail in all cases," but only provides "that bail shall not be excessive in those cases where it is proper to grant bail." The Court noted in particular that the amendment "has not prevented Congress from determining the classes of cases in which bail should be allowed."

Despite these seemingly categorical remarks, the effect of Carlson on the legacy of Stack v. Boyle remains unclear. The Carlson decision seems to have been based primarily on the differences between a criminal prosecution against a citizen and a deportation proceeding against an alien; the Court concluded only that "the Eighth Amendment does not require that bail be allowed under the circumstances of these cases."

Whether or not the Eighth Amendment provides a right to bail, preventive detention may raise questions of constitutionality under the DUE PROCESS clauses of the Fifth and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS. In Bell v. Wolfish (1979) the Supreme Court rejected a related argument, suggested in part by its own opinion in Stack v. Boyle, that the "presumption of innocence" limits what the government may do to a criminal defendant before conviction. The Court explained in Wolfish that the presumption of innocence is nothing but an evidentiary rule to be applied at trial; "it has no application to a determination of the rights of a pretrial detainee." The due process clauses, however, do apply before the commencement of trial, and Wolfish and later decisions have made clear that those clauses, in addition to constraining the permissible forms of detention and setting minimum procedural safeguards, also bar absolutely the "punishment" of an accused before conviction.

In testing for punishment in this context, the Supreme Court has considered, among other things, the government's reasons for imposing a given measure. The highest local court in the District of Columbia concluded in 1981 that incarceration for preventive purposes is nonpunitive and hence may be imposed before trial. The Supreme Court reasoned differently in BROWN V. UNITED STATES (1965), concluding that a preventive rationale should not stop confinement from being punishment for purposes of the BILL OF ATTAINDER clauses, but it has made no similar determination under the due process clauses.

The question whether the Constitution permits pretrial detention for purposes other than assuring a defendant's appearance in court thus remains open. A small part of the question was answered in SCHALL V. MARTIN (1984), where the Court upheld a state program of preventive detention for accused juvenile delinquents, but Schall relied heavily on the special prerogatives which the Constitution allows the state with respect to juveniles. Whether unconvicted adults may be jailed to keep them from committing future crimes remains a question to be decided.

The difficulty of the question reflects the strain placed on constitutional norms by the exigencies of the pretrial period. Preventive detention is difficult to reconcile with the ideal of due process, but many people are understandably made uneasy by the thought of defendants "walking the streets" while awaiting trial for serious crimes. A partial solution to the dilemma may be found in the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of a speedy trial: greater fidelity to that provision would alleviate to some extent both the risks associated with pretrial release and the inherent tension between due process and any restraint on the liberty of unconvicted defendants.

ABNER J. MIKVA
(1986)

Bibliography

VERRILLI, DONALD B., JR. 1982 The Eighth Amendment and the Right to Bail: Historical Perspectives. Columbia Law Review 82:328–362.

PRICE, UNITED STATES v.
383 U.S. 787 (1966)

Eighteen defendants implicated in the murder of three CIVIL RIGHTS workers in Mississippi challenged the INDICTMENTS against them under the federal CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 and that of 1870. One act applied only to persons conspiring to violate any federally protected right, the other only to persons acting "under COLOR OF LAW" who willfully violated such rights. Previous decisions of the Supreme Court had limited the two statutes. "Under color of law" covered only officers and in effect meant STATE ACTION, thus excluding private persons from prosecution. The language of the conspiracy statute notwithstanding, the Court had previously applied it to protect only the narrow class of rights that Congress could, apart from the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, protect against private individuals' interference, thus excluding the bulk of civil rights. Justice ABE FORTAS for a unanimous Court ruled that when private persons act in concert with state officials they all act under color of law, because they willfully participate in the prohibited activity (deprivation of life without DUE PROCESS OF LAW) with the state or its agents. Fortas also ruled that the 1870 act meant what it said: it safeguarded all federally protected rights secured by the supreme law of the land. By remanding the cases for trial, the Court made possible the first conviction in a federal prosecution for a civil rights murder in the South since RECONSTRUCTION.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PRICE-FIXING

See: Antitrust Law; Economic Regulation

PRIGG v. PENNSYLVANIA
16 Peters 539 (1842)

In 1839 Edward Prigg was convicted of kidnapping for removing an alleged fugitive slave from Pennsylvania without obtaining a warrant from a state judge as required by a Pennsylvania act of 1826. Prigg eventually appealed to the United States Supreme Court. Justice JOSEPH STORY, speaking for the Court, overturned his conviction. Story determined: (1) The federal Fugitive Slave Law of 1793 was constitutional. This was the first Supreme Court decision on that issue. (2) All state laws interfering with the rendition of fugitive slaves were unconstitutional. (3) The Fugitive Slave clause of the United States Constitution (Article IV, section 2, clause 3) was in part self-executing, and a slaveowner or his agent could capture and return a runaway slave under a right of self-help, without relying on any statute or judicial procedure, as long as the capture did not breach the peace. (4) State jurists and officials ought to help enforce the federal act of 1793, but Congress could not compel them to do so. Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY concurred in Story's decision, but not his reasoning. Taney distorted Story's opinion by erroneously asserting that Story had declared it was illegal for state officials to aid in the rendition of fugitive slaves. In fact, Story encouraged the states to aid in the rendition process, but he believed Congress could not compel state assistance. After the decision many free states enacted PERSONAL LIBERTY LAWS which removed state support for the federal act of 1793. With few federal officials to help masters, the law went unenforced in much of the North. This situation helped lead to the passage of a new and harsher fugitive slave law in 1850.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

FINKELMAN, PAUL 1979 Prigg v. Pennsylvania and Northern State Courts: Antislavery Use of a Proslavery Decision. Civil War History 25:5–35.

PRIMARY ELECTION

The primary election for selecting candidates is a uniquely American innovation. First adopted in Wisconsin in 1905, it has since spread to every other state. Generally it is the required method for selecting major POLITICAL PARTIES' nominees, whose names are automatically placed on the general election ballot, and for narrowing the field in nonpartisan elections.

The Supreme Court has not heard a modern constitutional challenge to state authority to compel political parties to select their candidates at primaries or to define party membership for these purposes. In Cousins v. Wigoda (1975), however, the Supreme Court held that Illinois could not require the Democratic National Convention to seat delegates selected in the state's primary; and in Democratic Party v. LaFollette (1981) the Court held that Wisconsin's delegates could not be bound by state law to follow candidate preferences expressed by voters in the state's presidential primary. In both cases, the Justices declared that the "party and its adherents enjoy a constitutionally protected right of political association." And in Democratic Party the Court said that "the freedom to associate . . . necessarily presupposes the freedom to identify the people who constitute the association, and to limit association to those people only." The Justices recognized state interests in the conduct of primary elections, however, and their decisions specifically addressed attempts to regulate the conduct of national party conventions and delegates. States might be able to limit the privilege of automatic access to the ballot to those parties conforming with state primary laws.

The Supreme Court has upheld state primary laws that protect the interests of political parties. In 1976 it affirmed a lower court judgment upholding a state's closed primary against a challenge that it abridged the right to vote and violated the RIGHT OF PRIVACY in political affiliation and belief. Similarly, the Court upheld, in Rosario v. Rockefeller (1973), an extended waiting period for voters wishing to change party registration, thus protecting party primaries from invasion by opposition party adherents and from casual participation by independent voters. But in Kusper v. Pontikes (1973), the Court acknowledged a competing interest in voter participation by rejecting a waiting period so long that the voter wishing to change party affiliation was excluded entirely from at least one primary election.

The Supreme Court has concluded that Congress has authority to regulate primary elections to nominate candidates for federal office, including prohibition of fraud, bribery, and other practices that deprive voters of rights, in UNITED STATES V. CLASSIC (1941) and Burroughs v. United States (1934), and regulation of political finance practices, in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976). Additional authority to regulate primaries is encompassed within the enforcement clauses of the FOURTEENTH and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

The principal clauses of these amendments also have independent application to primary elections, apart from any regulatory legislation Congress may enact. Once a state has established the primary for nominating candidates, the ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE principle of the apportionment cases applies. RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in primaries has been held unconstitutional, whether these barriers are established by the state, as in NIXON V. HERNDON (1927), or by political parties pursuant to state authorization to define party membership, as in NIXON V. CONDON (1932) and SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1944). Racial discrimination has also been held unconstitutional in a primary operated exclusively by a political party following the state's repeal of its primary election system. The most far-reaching application of the Fifteenth Amendment, in TERRY V. ADAMS (1953), prohibited racial discrimination in a "pre-primary" straw vote conducted by an all-white political club, when such "pre-primaries" had regularly proved determinative of elections.

In Cousins v. Wigoda the Supreme Court held that state primary laws do not supersede the authority of national party conventions over the selection and seating of delegates, but it did not choose to make a broad decision between competing claims of FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION of political parties and governmental authority to regulate nomination activities. On one side of this continuing constitutional controversy lie assertions of FIRST AMENDMENT rights of parties to define their own membership, to control the composition and operation of party bodies, and to nominate candidates. On the other side lie assertions of state and congressional authority to regulate elections, of congressional power specifically granted in the enforcement clauses of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, and of the independent operation of the principal clauses of those amendments. Notwithstanding the Supreme Court's reluctance to decide this question broadly, the Court's decisions have increasingly recognized the freedom of association of political parties.

DAVID ADAMANY
(1986)

PRIMARY ELECTION
(Update)

As constitutional custodians of the electoral process, states have the power to regulate both voters' access to the polls and the conduct of the POLITICAL PARTIES. Constitutional questions pertaining to primary elections mainly stem from the tension between the state's interest in open, participatory politics and the party's interest in controlling the nominating process and voters' participation in primaries. The FIRST AMENDMENT guarantee of FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION suggests that parties ought to be free to control participation in their primaries as they please. In contrast, the inexorable push toward broad participatory rights of individuals in all stages of the electoral process necessitates limits on the power of parties to include or exclude persons from voting in primaries. Greater individual participatory rights come at the expense of the parties' ability to select and elect candidates who embrace the party label and its programs.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly addressed the propriety of state restrictions on access to the voting booth in primary elections. These decisions have required the Court to rank the competing constitutional VOTING RIGHTS of individuals and associational rights of parties.

The Court's efforts to alleviate these tensions grew out of the discriminatory practices of the Democratic Party in the Deep South. The Court firmly established the quasi-public nature of party primary activity in the White Primary cases—notably, SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1944) and TERRY V. ADAMS (1953)—when it overturned the discriminatory rules of southern Democratic state parties that sought to limit participation in their primaries to white voters only. Regarding primaries, the Court viewed parties as functionally equivalent to the state, and therefore ruled that such discriminatory practices violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. In Kusper v. Pontikes (1973), the Court again sided with individual voting rights over party associational rights, rejecting an Illinois state statute that limited primary participation based on prior party affiliation.

More recent cases have presented conflicts between party rules and state laws regulating who can participate in party primaries, conventions, or other party activities. The Court has generally deferred to party rules on these questions. Several key decisions rendered the party determinative in controlling access to the nomination process, either through open primaries or through the establishment of convention delegate selection procedures. The crux of the constitutional right of association, as the Court explained in Tashjian v. Republican Party of Connecticut (1986) was the party's "determination of the boundaries of its own association and the structure which best allows it to pursue its political goals." In Eu v. San Francisco Democratic Committee (1989), the Court unanimously invalidated a California statute that, among other things, stripped parties of the ability to endorse candidates in primary elections. These decisions gave solid constitutional protection to the parties' right of self-determination, even if the decisions watered down formal party affiliation. They ensure that parties retain control of access to primary and candidate selection processes. Some commentators have heralded these decisions as marking the reassertion of political parties over the nominating process.

This optimism received a setback in Morse v. Republican Party of Virginia (1996), which involved a conflict between a state party rule and a federal statute. The Court in Morse narrowed parties' associational right by subordinating it to the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965, striking down a party's attempt to impose a fee on those attending its state convention. By restricting participation at the convention, the fee unconstitutionally undercut individual voting rights. Morse suggests that federal statutes and constitutional voting rights trump the associational rights of state parties to define themselves in an exclusionary fashion. In the name of nondiscriminatory political participation, the Court subordinated the association of the party faithful to the right of peripheral "members" to take part in integral party decisionmaking. The party's freedom to identify its members yielded to the dominant impulse for more-inclusive rules and individual participation. By equating parties with the state and treating party action as STATE ACTION, Morse may lead to broader state intrusion into future party activity.

DAVID K. RYDEN
(2000)

Bibliography

EPSTEIN, LEON 1986 Political Parties in the American Mold. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

LOWENSTEIN, DANIEL H. 1995 Election Law: Cases and Materials. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press.

MAVEETY, NANCY 1991 Representation Rights and the Burger Years. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

RYDEN, DAVID K. 1996 Representation in Crisis: The Constitution, Interest Groups, and Political Parties. New York: State University of New York Press.

——— 1999 'The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly': The Judicial Shaping of Party Activities. Pages 50–65 in John Green and Daniel Shea, eds., The State of the Parties, 3rd ed. Boulder, Colo.: Roman & Littlefield.

PRINCE v. MASSACHUSETTS
321 U.S. 158 (1944)

Massachusetts law provided that no boy under twelve or girl under eighteen could engage in street sale of any merchandise. Prince was the guardian of a nine-year-old girl. Both were Jehovah's Witnesses and sold Witness literature. The question was whether the statute impermissibly infringed on the free exercise of religion.

Writing for the Court, Justice WILEY B. RUTLEDGE balanced the broad powers of the state to protect the health and welfare of minors against the FIRST AMENDMENT claims and held that the state's power prevailed. Justices FRANK MURPHY and ROBERT H. JACKSON dissented.

Prince follows the "secular regulation" approach to RELIGIOUS LIBERTY introduced by UNITED STATES V. REYNOLDS (1879).

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

PRINTZ v. UNITED STATES

See: Federalism; New York v. United States; State Immunity from Federal Law

PRIOR RESTRAINT AND CENSORSHIP

History has rooted in our constitutional tradition of freedom of expression the strongest aversion to official censorship. We have learned from the English rejection of press licensing and from our own experiences that the psychology of censors tends to drive them to excess, that censors have a stake in finding things to suppress, and that—in systems of wholesale review before publication—doubt tends to produce suppression. American law tolerated motion picture censorship for a time, but only because movies were not thought to be "the press" in FIRST AMENDMENT terms. Censorship of the movies is now virtually dead, smothered by stringent procedural requirements imposed by unsympathetic courts, by the voluntary rating system, and, most of all, by public distaste for the absurdities of censorship in operation.

American law has tolerated requirements of prior official approval of expression in several important areas, however. No one may broadcast without a license, and the government issues licenses without charge to those it believes will serve the "public interest." Licensing is also grudgingly tolerated—because of the desirability of giving notice and of avoiding conflicts or other disruptions of the normal functions of public places—in the regulation of parades, demonstrations, leafleting, and other expressive activities in public places. But the courts have taken pains to eliminate administrative discretion that would allow officials to censor PUBLIC FORUM expression because they do not approve its message.

Notwithstanding these areas where censorship has been permitted, the clearest principle of First Amendment law is that the least tolerable form of official regulation of expression is a requirement of prior official approval for publication. It is easy to see the suffocating tendency of prior restraints where all expression—whether or not ultimately deemed protected by the First Amendment for publication—must be submitted for clearance before it may be disseminated. The harder question of First Amendment theory has been whether advance prohibitions on expression in specific cases should be discredited by our historical aversion to censorship. The question has arisen most frequently in the context of judicial INJUNCTIONS against publication. Even though injunctions do not involve many of the worst vices of wholesale licensing and censorship, the Supreme court has tarred them with the brush of "prior restraint."

The seminal case was NEAR V. MINNESOTA (1931), handed down by a closely divided Court but never questioned since. A state statute provided for injunctions against any "malicious, scandalous, and defamatory newspaper," and a state judge had enjoined a scandal sheet from publishing anything scandalous in the future. The Minnesota scheme did not require advance approval of all publications, but came into play only after a publication had been found scandalous, and then only to prevent further similar publications. Nevertheless, the majority of the Justices concluded that to enjoin future editions under such vague standards in effect put the newspaper under judicial censorship. Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES's historic opinion made clear, however, that the First Amendment's bar against prior restraint was not absolute. Various exceptional instances would justify prior restraints, including this pregnant one: "No one would question but that a government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops."

It was forty years before the scope of the troop ship exception was tested. The Pentagon Papers decision of 1971, NEW YORK TIMES CO. V. UNITED STATES, reaffirmed that judicial injunctions are considered prior restraints and are tolerated only in the most compelling circumstances. This principle barred an injunction against publication of a classified history of the government's decisions in the Vietnam war, although—unlike Near—the government had sought to enjoin only readily identifiable material, not unidentified similar publications in the future. Ten different opinions discussed the problem of injunctions in national security cases, and the only proposition commanding a majority was the unexplained conclusion that the government had not justified injunctive relief.

The central theme sounded in the opinions of the six majority Justices was reluctance to act in such difficult circumstances without guidance from Congress. Accepting the premise that there was no statutory authority for an injunction, several considerations support the Court's refusal to forge new rules concerning the disclosure of national secrets. First, the Court's tools are inadequate for the task; ad hoc evaluations of executive claims of risk are not easily balanced against the First Amendment's language and judicial interpretation. Second, dissemination of secret information often arises in the context of heated disagreements about the proper direction of national policy. One's assessment of the disclosure's impact on security will depend on one's reaction to the policy. Third, it would be particularly unsatisfactory to build a judge-made system of rules in an area where much litigation must be done in camera. Thus, general rules about specific categories of defense-related information cannot be fashioned by courts. The best hope in a nuclear age for accommodating the needs of secrecy and the public's RIGHT TO KNOW lies in the legislative process where, removed from pressures of adjudicting particular cases, general rules can be fashioned. The courts' proper role in this area is to review legislation, not try to devise rules of secrecy case by case.

Chilling this victory for freedom of the press were admonitions, loosely endorsed by four Justices, that the espionage statutes might support criminal sanctions against the New York Times and its reporters. No journalists were indicted, but the prosecutions of Daniel Ellsberg and Anthony Russo rested on a view of several statutes that would reach the press by punishing news-gathering activities necessarily incident to publication. Since the dismissal of these cases for reasons irrelevant to these issues, the extent of possible criminal liability for publishing national security secrets remains unclear.

The Pentagon Papers case underlines how little the United States has relied on law to control press coverage of national defense and foreign policy matters. For most of our history the press has rarely tested the limits of its rights to publish. Secrets were kept because people in and out of government with access to military and diplomatic secrets shared basic assumptions about national aims. The Vietnam war changed all that. The Pentagon Papers dispute marked the passing of an era in which journalists could be counted on to work within understood limits of discretion in handling secret information.

The third major decision striking down a judicial order not to publish involved neither national security nor scandal but the right of a criminal defendant to a fair trial. A state court enjoined publication of an accused's confession and some other incriminating material on the ground that if prospective jurors learned about it they might be incapable of impartiality. In NEBRASKA PRESS ASSOCIATION V. STUART (1976) the Supreme Court decided that the potential prejudice was speculative, and it rejected enjoining publication on speculation. The majority opinion examined the evidence to determine the nature and extent of pretrial publicity, the effectiveness of other measures in mitigating prejudice, and the effectiveness of a prior restraint in reducing the dangers. This opinion determined that the impact of pretrial publicity was necessarily speculative, that alternative measures short of prior restraint had not been considered by the lower courts, and that prior restraint would not significantly reduce the dangers presented.

On one issue of considerable importance, the Court seemed to be in full agreement. The opinions endorsed controls on parties, lawyers, witnesses, and law enforcement personnel as sources of information for journalists. These GAG ORDERS have been controversial among many journalists and publishers who think the First Amendment should guarantee the right to gather news. Although freeing the press from direct control by limiting prior restraint, the Court approved an indirect method of reaching the same result, guaranteeing that the press print no prejudicial publicity, by approving direct controls on sources of prejudicial information. The Court has subsequently held that pretrial motions may be closed to the public and the press with the consent of the prosecutor and the accused but over the objection of the press, in GANNETT CO. V. DEPASQUALE (1979). This case involved access to judicial proceedings, not prior restraints on the press, and was decided largely on Sixth Amendment grounds. The Court reached the opposite result with respect to trials in RICHMOND NEWSPAPERS V. VIRGINIA (1980), but acknowledged that the right of access to trials is not absolute.

These decisions and others have firmly established that the First Amendment tolerates virtually no prior restraints. This DOCTRINE is one of the central principles of our law of FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. On the surface, the doctrine concerns only the form of controls on expression. It bars controls prior to publication, even if imposition of criminal or civil liability following publication would be constitutional. But, as with most limitations of form, the prior restraint doctrine has important substantive consequences. Perhaps the most important of these consequences is that the doctrine is presumably an absolute bar to any wholesale system of administrative licensing or censorship of the press, which is the most repellent form of government suppression of expression. Second, the prior restraint doctrine removes most of the opportunities for official control of those types of expression for which general rules of control are difficult to formulate. The message of the prior restraint doctrine is that if you cannot control expression pursuant to general legislative standards, you cannot control it at all—or nearly at all, as the Pentagon Papers decision suggests, by suggesting an exception allowing an injunction in a truly compelling case of national security. A third effect of the doctrine is that by transferring questions of control over expression from the judiciary to the legislatures, it provides an enormously beneficial protection for the politically powerful mass media, if not for other elements of society with strong First Amendment interests but weaker influence in the legislative process.

Although the Supreme Court has exceeded its historical warrant in subjecting judicial injunctions to the full burden of our law's traditional aversion to prior restraints, there are sound reasons for viewing all prior controls—not only wholesale licensing and censorship—as dangerous to free expression. Generally it is administratively easier to prevent expression in advance than to punish it after the fact. The inertia of public officials in responding to a fait accompli, the chance to look at whether expression has actually caused harm rather than speculate about the matter, public support for the speaker, and the interposition of juries and other procedural safeguards of the usual criminal or civil process all tend to reinforce tolerance when expression can only be dealt with by subsequent punishment. Moreover, all prior restraint systems, including injunctions, tend to divert attention from the central question of whether expression is protected to the subsidiary problem of promoting the effectiveness of the prior restraint system. Once a prior restraint is issued, the authority and prestige of the restraining agent are at stake. If it is disobeyed, the legality of the expression takes a back seat to the enforcement of obedience to the prior restraint process. Moreover, the time it takes a prior restraint process to decide produces a systematic delay of expression. On the other hand, where law must wait to move against expression after it has been published, time is on the side of freedom. All in all, even such prior restraints as judicial injunctions—which are more discriminating than wholesale censorship—tend toward irresponsible administration and an exaggerated assessment of the dangers of free expression.

BENNO C. SCHMIDT, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

BLASI, VINCENT 1981 Toward a Theory of Prior Restraint: The Central Linkage. Minnesota Law Review 66:11.

EMERSON, THOMAS 1955 The Doctrine of Prior Restraint Law and Contemporary Problems 20:648.

SCHMIDT, BENNO C., JR. 1977 Nebraska Press Association: An Expansion of Freedom and Contraction of Theory. Stanford Law Review 29:431.

PRIOR TESTIMONY

See: Confrontation, Right of

PRISONERS' RIGHTS

Some might think that the very term "prisoners' rights" is an oxymoron, because the essence of being imprisoned is the reduction or elimination of rights. Prisoners have traditionally been deprived of VOTING RIGHTS and, obviously, of the right to travel outside the prison confines, often of the right to communicate freely with the outside world and of the right of conjugal relationships, and, at times, of the right of ACCESS TO COURTS to complain about even those rights that they retain.

There is a tension in constitutional doctrine between the need to enforce discipline in the difficult circumstances of the prison and the necessity of recognizing that in a society of law, even prisoners ought to have remedies for violation of whatever constitutional rights they possess and also to have the right to be immune from arbitrary and capricious actions of the prison hierarchy. This tension has expressed itself in judicial opinions in two major ways: first, the enunciation of a "hands-off doctrine" that precludes JURISDICTION to review complaints of inmates; and second, the determination, either broadly or narrowly, of the nature of the rights that a prisoner might have. In times when the cluster of rights is extremely narrow, the distinction between the first mode of analysis and the second is not great.

As late as 1963 a commentator could write that there is a "conviction held with virtual unanimity by the courts that it is beyond their power to review the internal management of the prison system." Much of this changed, however, when the Supreme Court held in Wolff v. McDonnell (1974), as part of its expansion of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS to the decision making of many institutions, that "a prisoner is not wholly stripped of constitutional protections when he is imprisoned for crime. There is no iron curtain drawn between the Constitution and the prisons of this country."

Still, the definition of rights for prisoners is almost always husbanded with conditions and recognition of concerns for the difficulties the warden faces. Where the FIRST AMENDMENT is concerned, RELIGIOUS LIBERTY is guaranteed but only to the extent that the opportunities to exercise that freedom must be "reasonable." Similarly, when the right to speak and communicate is concerned, the Court limited it in PELL V. PROCUNIER (1974) to the kind of expression that is "not inconsistent with [their] status as . . . prisoner[s] or with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system." In Lee v. Washington (1968) the Court implied that even racial SEGREGATION may be tolerated when it is essential to "prison security and discipline." And the Court held in Hudson v. Palmer (1984), a departure from previous expansion of privacy rights, that "the FOURTH AMENDMENT had no applicability to a prison cell."

With the wonderful perversity that makes legal development fascinating, the Supreme Court, in the late 1970s, expanded prisoners' rights of access to courts, while almost simultaneously narrowing the grounds for constitutional challenge.

Litigation concerning prisoners' rights is an indicator of concern about individual rights generally. As the Court changes its views of the breadth and definition of such rights, the treatment of alleged institutional wrongs in a correctional setting is like the canary a miner takes along down the shaft. Constitutional litigation during the 1960s and 1970s created massive exposure of the internal workings of correctional institutions and pressure for change. In many instances, wholesale reforms were imposed upon these institutions as a consequence of the litigation. But the canary is weakening. (See INSTITUTIONAL LITIGATION.)

MONROE E. PRICE
(1986)

Bibliography

NOTE 1963 Beyond the Ken of the Courts: A Critique of Judicial Refusal to Review the Complaints of Convicts. Yale Law Journal 72:506.

PRISONERS' RIGHTS
(Update 1)

Upon conviction and imprisonment, a profound change occurs in a person's legal status. Duly convicted prisoners lose entirely many freedoms enjoyed by free persons; however, they do not relinquish all rights. As the Supreme Court noted in Wolff v. McDonnell (1974), "though his rights may be diminished by the needs and exigencies of the institutional environment, a prisoner is not wholly stripped of constitutional protections when he is imprisoned for crime. There is no iron curtain drawn between the Constitution and the prisons of this country."

Prisoners always retain the right to the minimal conditions necessary for human survival (i.e., the right to food, clothing, shelter, and medical care). The right of the prisoners to a non-life-threatening environment goes beyond the provision of life's necessities; it includes their right to be protected from each other and from themselves. On this last point, lower courts have been more responsive to prisoners' claim than Supreme Court and have found that prison crowding is unconstitutional. As a federal district court in Florida asserted in Costello v. Wainwright (1975), prison crowding "endangers the very lives of the inmates" and therefore violates the Eighth Amendment's guarantee against CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT. The Supreme Court's reluctance to follow the lower courts is understandable, for emperical studies flatly contradict the assertion that crowding is life-threatening. Not only are the overall death rates, accidental death rates, and homicide and suicide rates of inmates two or three times lower than for comparable groups of parolees (controlling for age, race, and sex), but no statistically significant correlations exist between measures of crowding (density and occupancy) and inmate death rates.

Beyond agreement that inmates have the minimal right to a non-life-threatening environment, legal debate rages. Some courts and legal scholars have taken their cues from the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in Coffin v. Reichard (1944) and have declared that prisoners retain all the rights of ordinary citizens except those expressly or by necessary implication taken by law. The Supreme Court's decision in PROCUNIER V. MARTINEZ (1974) followed this line of reasoning when it held that it would employ a STRICT SCRUTINY standard of review to evaluate claims that the rights of prisoners were being denied. It declared that it would sustain limitations of prisoners' rights only if they furthered an important or substantial governmental interest and if they were no greater than necessary to protect that interest.

Fundamentally opposed to Coffin and Procunier is the view, now dominant on the Supreme Court, that inmates are without rights except for those conferred by law or necessarily implied and that, as a consequence, courts should employ the reasonableness test to assess the legitimacy of restrictions on what prisoners assert to be their rights. In Turner v. Safley (1987) the Supreme Court articulated this position and rejected the use of strict scrutiny in prisoners' rights cases. Writing for a five-member majority, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR declared that "when a prison regulation impinges on inmates' constitutional rights, the regulation is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests." O'Connor announced a four-prong test for measuring reasonableness: (1) Is there "a "valid, rational connection' between the prison regulation and the legitimate government interest put forward to justify it?" (2) "Are alternative means of exercising the right . . . open to prison inmates?" (3) What is "the impact [that] accommodation of the asserted constitutional right will have on guards and other inmates, and on the allocation of prison resources generally"? (4) Is "the absence of ready alternatives . . . evidence of reasonableness of the prison regulation"? Employing this four-prong test, Justice O'Connor rejected a FIRST AMENDMENT challenge to a Missouri ban on inmate-to-inmate correspondence because the prohibition on correspondence was "logically connected" to legitimate security concerns. In O'LONE V. ESTATE OF SHABAZZ (1987), the Court applied the same reasonableness test to sustain New Jersey prison policies that resulted in Muslim inmates' inability to attend weekly congregational services.

Security concerns generally trump the claims of prisoners' rights; the Court is hesitant to recognize inmate claims that have the potential of putting at risk the prison itself, the guards, other inmates, or the petitioner. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, in Jones v. North Carolina Prisoners' Union (1977), summarized well the Court's deferential approach to these issues: "It is enough to say that they [prison officials] have not been conclusively shown to be wrong in this view. The interest in preserving order and authority in prisons is self-evident."

Applying this reasoning, the Court has denied inmates' claims to a First Amendment right to organize as a prisoners' labor union, rejected the contention that an inmate's RIGHT OF PRIVACY protects against routine strip and body-cavity searches, and refused to recognize any inmate legal rights in the ordinary classification process or interprison transfer. As the Court said in Moody v. Daggett (1976), no DUE PROCESS issues are implicated by "the discretionary transfer of state prisoners to a substantially less agreeable prison, even where the transfer visit[s] a 'grievous loss' upon the inmate. The same is true of prisoner classification and eligibility for rehabilitative programs."

Beyond assuring life's necessities for inmates, the Court has consistently recognized inmates' claims in only two areas: their due process right of ACCESS TO THE COURTS and PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS protection of their liberty interest in retaining "good time" and avoiding solitary confinement. Concerning the former, the Court has repeatedly insisted that inmates have the right to access to legal redress and that this right of access to the courts requires either an adequate law library or assistance from persons trained in law (although not necessarily lawyers). Concerning the latter, the Court held in Wolff v. McDonnell that inmates have a liberty interest in the good-time credit they have acquired and that they may not be stripped of these credits without a hearing before an impartial tribunal. The Court has not considered either of these rights to jeopardize prison security. Access to the courts poses no problems at all, and, as the Court made explicit in Hewitt v. Helms (1978) and Superintendent v. Hill (1985), prison disciplinary proceedings can follow (and need not precede) solitary confinement and can impose sanctions based on the lax evidentiary standard of "some evidence."

RALPH A. ROSSUM
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Body Search.)

Bibliography

COHEN, FRED 1988 The Law of Prisoner's Rights: An Overview. Criminal Law Bulletin 24:321–349.

ROSSUM, RALPH A. 1984 The Problem of Prison Crowding: On the Limits of Prison Capacity and Judicial Capacity. Benchmark 1, no. 6:22–30.

PRISONERS' RIGHTS
(Update 2)

During the 1990s, the Supreme Court, with a few exceptions, continued to narrowly construe the scope of prisoners' constitutional rights. In 1974, the Court had held that a disciplinary hearing that may result in the revocation of good-time credits must be accompanied by certain procedural safeguards, such as notice of the disciplinary charge before the hearing. But in Sandin v. Conner (1995), the Court concluded that DUE PROCESS OF LAW affords no procedural protection to a prisoner sentenced to a disciplinary-segregation unit for thirty days for a disciplinary infraction.

In Lewis v. Casey (1996), the Court held that prisoners' right of access to the courts does not include the right to litigate a claim effectively. Prison officials may have to make some limited assistance available to inmates to ensure that they have a "reasonably adequate opportunity" to file nonfrivolous claims challenging their convictions, sentences, or conditions of confinement. But once their claims have been filed in court, prisoners are, as a constitutional matter, on their own.

Some of the most significant restrictions on prisoners' rights have emanated not from the Supreme Court but from Congress. Under the Prison Litigation Reform Act, for example, prisoners who have obtained injunctive relief can be required to reestablish periodically that they are entitled to the court-ordered relief. These and other restrictions to which prisoners, but not nonprisoners, are subject under the statute have provoked controversy, litigation, and debate.

LYNN S. BRANHAM
(2000)

Bibliography

BOSTON, JOHN and MANVILLE, DANIEL E. 1995 Prisoners' Self-Help Litigation Manual, 3rd ed. New York: Oceana Publications.

BRANHAM, LYNN S. 1998 The Law of Sentencing, Corrections, and Prisoners' Rights in a Nutshell. St. Paul, Minn.: West Group.

PRIVACY

See: Right of Privacy

PRIVACY ACT
88 Stat. 1896 (1974)

The Privacy Act was passed in response to public concern about "data banks" maintained by United States government agencies. Often, a person did not know what agencies held files on him or what such files contained. In addition, information provided to one government agency—often under a promise of confidentiality—was passed on to a second agency to be used for a different purpose, and that without the knowledge or consent of the individual concerned.

The act was passed by Congress and signed by President GERALD R. FORD in December 1974. According to its provisions: an individual is to have access to any files concerning him maintained by a government agency (except law-enforcement and national security files); an individual who believes that information about him in a government file is inaccurate or incomplete may seek injunctive relief to correct the file; no agency is to use information provided by an individual for other than the original purpose, or to provide the information to another agency, without the individual's consent; no agency may deny benefits to individuals who refuse to disclose their social security numbers; and no agency may maintain records describing the exercise of rights protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

O'BRIEN, DAVID M. 1979 Privacy, Law, and Public Policy. New York: Praeger.

PRIVACY AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

William L. Prosser has listed four categories of invasion of privacy: intrusion upon the plaintiff's seclusion or solitude, or into his private affairs; public disclosure of embarrassing private facts about the plaintiff; publicity which places the plaintiff in a false light in the public eye; and appropriation, for the defendant's advantage, of the plaintiff's name or likeness. Absent the communication of information disclosed by the intrusion, the first category of invasion raises no FIRST AMENDMENT issue.

The second category, the public disclosure of embarrassing private facts, clearly does raise a First Amendment issue. When does the FREEDOM OF THE PRESS to report "news" outbalance the individual's RIGHT TO PRIVACY, even if the disclosure is of embarrassing private facts? Thus far, the Supreme Court has only partially answered that question. In COX BROADCASTING CORPORATION V. COHN (1975) the Court held that the state could not impose liability for invasion of privacy by reason of the defendant's television news disclosure of the name of a rape victim. The Court held that the First Amendment immunized the press from such liability where the information disclosed was truthful and had already been publicly disclosed in court records. Subsequent decisions have indicated that such a First Amendment privilege applies as well to the publication of material in at least some official records designated confidential—for example, information about a criminal proceeding involving a juvenile, even though it was obtained from sources other than the public record. But what of intimate private fact disclosures that do not involve criminal proceedings, or other official action? Or suppose the disclosure of private facts is embarrassing to the subject, but does not injure reputation. Which prevails, the plaintiff's right of privacy or the defendant's FREEDOM OF SPEECH? The Supreme Court thus far has been silent on these issues, and the lower courts have offered no satisfactory answers.

The third category, known as "false light" privacy, was the subject of the Supreme Court's decision in Time, Inc. v. Hill (1967). Defendant's report in Life magazine of plaintiffs' encounter with gangsters was in part false, though not reputation injuring. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was entitled to a First Amendment defense in a false-light privacy action unless the defendant knew the matter reported was false or published with reckless disregard of the truth. The Court acknowledged that this standard was borrowed from the First Amendment defense to DEFAMATION which it had fashioned in NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964). Where Sullivan had involved statements about a public official, Hill seemingly extended the First Amendment privilege to statements about "a matter of public interest." The First Amendment defamation defense was later expanded in GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974) to apply to reports involving "public figures" as well as "public officials," and to require at least a negligence standard of liability as regards defamation of nonpublic figures. The Supreme Court has not had occasion to reconsider the impact of the First Amendment upon "false light" privacy cases since its decision in Gertz.

The fourth category is more generally referred to as the "right of publicity." It differs fundamentally from the other categories in that the injury does not consist of embarrassment and humiliation. It is based rather upon the wrongful appropriation of a person's (usually a celebrity's) name or likeness for commercial purposes. The measure of recovery is based upon the value of the use, not the injury suffered from mental distress. The only Supreme Court decision to consider the impact of the First Amendment upon the right of publicity has been Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co. (1977). The plaintiff performed a "human cannonball" act at a county fair. The defendant photographed his entire act and broadcast it in a local television news program. Plaintiff sued for infringement of his right of publicity. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was not entitled to a First Amendment defense. The Court regarded this as "the strongest case" for the right of publicity because it involved "the appropriation of the very activity by which the entertainer acquired his reputation in the first place." Even in the usual case, where a celebrity's name or likeness is used in order to sell a product, the lower courts have not found the First Amendment to constitute a defense, and it seems unlikely that the Supreme Court would take a contrary view. On the other hand, where the name or likeness is used as a part of an informational work, such as a biography or a biographical motion picture, in most cases the First Amendment would appear to constitute a valid defense.

MELVILLE B. NIMMER
(1986)

Bibliography

NIMMER, MELVILLE B. 1968 The Right to Speak from Times to Time: First Amendment Theory Applied to Libel and Misapplied to Privacy. California Law Review 56:935–967.

PROSSER, WILLIAM L. 1971 Torts, 4th ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

PRIVATE DISCRIMINATION

The Constitution is a document filled with restraints upon the actions of government, but for the most part it has not been interpreted to extend its reach into the private sector. The FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution, for example, guarantees the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS, a command against discrimination that the Supreme Court has long read as applying only to the actions of states. The Supreme Court in BOLLING V. SHARPE (1954) applied the antidiscrimination principle to the federal government, holding that the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fifth Amendment contains within it an equal protection component. No provision of the Constitution, however, has ever been interpreted to apply rules of equal protection directly to private entities, prohibiting a private citizen or corporation from discriminating against others on the basis of race, sex, or religion.

Acts of private discrimination, nevertheless, do raise a number of significant constitutional issues. First, to what extent does the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT's abolition of SLAVERY serve as a constitutional restraint on private acts of discrimination less severe than actual slavery? Second, when are the actions of private entities sufficiently intertwined with government to be brought within the coverage of the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause under the rubric of the STATE ACTION doctrine? Third, when the United States Congress forbids private discrimination, as in CIVIL RIGHTS laws prohibiting racial bias in employment or housing, from where in the Constitution does Congress derive its affirmative authority to pass such legislation? Finally, when laws are passed at the federal, state, or local level banning discrimination by private individuals, businesses, or organizations, do such laws violate the FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY AND ASSOCIATION embodied in the FIRST AMENDMENT?

The Thirteenth Amendment is one of the few constitutional provisions that directly implicates private conduct. That amendment, the first of the three "CIVIL WAR amendments," flatly bans slavery and involuntary servitude. It acts directly upon private entities; slaves were owned by private businesses and individuals. The Thirteenth Amendment, however, has not been interpreted to provide a significant source of constitutional proscription against acts of private discrimination. While the Amendment has been construed by the Supreme Court to protect individuals from the "badges and incidents" of slavery as well as actual slavery itself, the Supreme Court held in the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES in 1883 that the Amendment does not restrict "mere discriminations on account of race or color." The Thirteenth is thus too narrow a prohibition to be of practical use as a restraint against the types of private discrimination prevalent in modern society. In 1968, however, the Supreme Court did hold that the Thirteenth Amendment serves as an important source of congressional power to pass legislation banning private acts of discrimination.

While the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits only governmental discrimination, under the so-called state action requirement many Supreme Court decisions have recognized that ostensibly private discrimination should be treated as state action because of some connection between the private actor and the government. When the private actor is performing a "public function," for example, its activities are treated as state action, and subject to the equal protection clause. The Supreme Court has thus held that segregated primary elections conducted by political parties in Texas involved public functions and violated the Fourteenth Amendment. In MARSH V. ALABAMA (1946) the Court held that a "company town," a privately owned area encompassing both residential and business districts that looked exactly like any other town and in which the private company had assumed all the normal functions of running a city, was subject to the limitations of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The Court has also held that apparently private activity will be treated as state action when the state and private entities have a "symbiotic relationship," as where a private restaurant leases space in a public parking garage, or when the state has commanded or encouraged acts of private discrimination.

When neither the Thirteenth Amendment nor the "state action" doctrine under the Fourteenth Amendment can be stretched to embrace a particular type of private discrimination, then the Constitution of its own force does not render the private discrimination illegal. Federal, state, and local governments may then choose to pass legislation filling this vacuum, banning discrimination through statutes and ordinances. Modern American law is pervaded with restrictions directed against private entities forbidding discrimination of all kinds, including discrimination on the basis of race, ethnic origin, sex, sexual orientation, religion, age, and physical or mental disabilities. Many of these laws are acts of Congress. When Congress attempts to outlaw private discrimination, the first constitutional question to be addressed is whether Congress has affirmative constitutional power to enact the law.

Two principal constitutional sources have been advanced to support congressional legislation banning private discrimination: the COMMERCE CLAUSE, and Congress's powers under the enforcement clauses of the Thirteenth Amendment, Fourteenth Amendment, and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. In the debates leading to the passage of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, one of the most important modern acts of legislation dealing with private discrimination, members of Congress debated whether the act should be grounded in Congress's power to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE or in its power under section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to enforce the Amendment by "appropriate legislation." Similar enforcement clauses exist under the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished slavery; under the Fifteenth Amendment, which granted emancipated blacks the right to vote; and under several later amendments, including the NINETEENTH AMENDMENT (WOMAN SUFFRAGE), the TWENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT (voting in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA), the TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT (abolition of POLL TAXES), and the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT, (establishing eighteen as voting age).

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 banned most significant acts of discrimination in the private sector, including such areas as employment transportation, restaurants, and hotel accommodations. Some members of Congress argued that the act should be rooted in the enforcement clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, because it was in reality an exercise in social legislation aimed at attacking racial bias. Other members, doubtful that the Fourteenth Amendment could be used to reach private discrimination, argued for buttressing the act under the well-established powers of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. In two significant 1964 decisions shortly following passage of the act, HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL V. UNITED STATES and Katzenbach v. McClung, the Supreme Court upheld the Civil Rights Act on the basis of the commerce clause, and thus did not reach the question of congressional power under the Fourteenth Amendment.

As a practical matter, virtually any enactment of Congress aimed at private discrimination would be sustained under modern commerce clause analysis. Even localized acts of discrimination may, when considered cumulatively with other such acts around the nation, have a substantial impact on interstate commerce when aggregated. Under contemporary commerce clause theory, that potential aggregate impact would be enough to uphold the legislation. Because Congress's power under the commerce clause is so sweeping, there has been little cause for the Court to determine precisely how far congressional enforcement powers under the post-Civil War amendments may be extended to reach private-sector discrimination.

The few decisions that have dealt with congressional enforcement power under the Civil War amendments, however, indicate that Congress's power does include an ability to proscribe private activity that would not be directly prohibited by the substantive reach of the amendment itself. In an important decision involving the Thirteenth Amendment, JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968), the Court upheld an application of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 to forbid private discrimination in property dealings. The Court held that Congress's power to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment included the power to identify "badges or incidents of slavery" and to pass laws NECESSARY AND PROPER to combat them.

In sum, there are ample sources of support in the Constitution for acts of Congress banning private discrimination. Congress has passed a considerable body of laws attacking such discrimination, often including in the legislation enforcement mechanisms or procedural advantages that actually make it easier to prove and obtain legal relief from acts of private discrimination than for claims based directly on the Constitution for discrimination by the government. Modern civil rights litigation frequently involves interpretation of such legislation, in which the courts are asked to determine just how far Congress has gone in a particular statute to ban discrimination in the private sector.

The final area of modern constitutional debate concerning discrimination in the private sector involves attempts by organizations engaged in discrimination to resist the application of laws banning such discrimination on the grounds that the laws infringe on the constitutional right of free association. The Civil Rights Act of 1964, and the many state and local civil rights laws passed in the 1960s and early 1970s modeled after that act, tended to reach only commercial private activity, such as employers, or stores, restaurants, and places of lodging generally "open for business to the public." A second generation of civil rights acts began to be passed by cities and states around the country, however, seeking to forbid discrimination by "private" clubs and organizations. Several of these groups claimed that these regulations violated their constitutional rights of free association.

These claims have, thus far, proved unsuccessful. In Roberts v. United States Jaycees (1984), the Supreme Court faced a Minnesota law that prohibited SEX DISCRIMINATION in groups such as the Jaycees. The Supreme Court established two types of FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION: FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION and "freedom of expressive association." Groups with strong claims to freedom of intimate association tend to be relatively small, exercise a high degree of selectivity, and maintain seclusion from others as critical aspects of the relationship. The Jaycees, the Court held, were basically unselective, and lacked the attributes that would qualify for recognition of intimate associational claims. The second freedom of expressive association is an incident of the FREEDOM OF SPEECH and assembly. The Court in Roberts held that application of state sex discrimination laws to the Jaycees would not impermissibly interfere with their freedom of expressive association, and it upheld the Minnesota law.

The Court next visited the freedom of association problem in Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte (1987). In characterizing the Rotary Club, the Court noted that although Rotary Clubs take no positions on "public questions," they do "engage in a variety of commendable service activities" protected by the First Amendment. These sorts of activities, however, posed no serious implications for infringement of the members' rights of expressive association. The lessons of these cases appear to be that attempts by private groups to resist imposition of antidiscrimination laws on free association grounds will probably fail, unless the groups possess genuinely impressive credentials as truly private organizations, with characteristics of exclusion or intimacy bordering on those of family or religious groups.

A related problem involves private religious schools that discriminate on the basis of race. The Supreme Court in Norwood v. Harrison (1973) held that a state could not lend textbooks to schools that practice racial SEGREGATION, even though such aid to a religious school would not be illegal under the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE. Notwithstanding the lack of any violation of the principle of SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, the Court held that there is no constitutional protection for state aid to RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. In BOB JONES UNIVERSITY V. UNITED STATES (1983), the Court held that the Internal Revenue Service had been authorized by Congress to deny tax-exempt status to private schools that discriminate on a racial basis, and that this denial did not prohibit the free exercise of religion.

Modern constitutional law, in conclusion, generally does not impose restraints on private discrimination through direct application of the Constitution itself. On the other hand, by refusing to recognize any significant constitutional barriers to antidiscrimination legislation, modern constitutional law facilitates efforts on the part of federal, state, and local governments to eradicate such discrimination.

RODNEY A. SMOLLA
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Affirmative Action; Badges of Servitude; Employment Discrimination; Fourteenth Amendment and Section 5 (Framing); Fourteenth Amendment and Section 5 (Judicial Construction); Racial Quotas; Racial Preference.)

PRIVATIZATION AND THE CONSTITUTION

Budget pressures and concerns for efficient administration have led governments increasingly to consider privatizing functions that have traditionally been conducted by public agencies. Many correctional facilities are now operated by private CORPORATIONS, for example, and private police often supplement and sometimes replace public police. Privatization raises interesting constitutional issues, only a few of which the Supreme Court has addressed.

The government's power to privatize even the most traditional public functions is probably unlimited by the federal Constitution. (Privatization may be limited by state constitutions, but those limitations are not considered here.) One might think that public security was an essentially government function, but there is a long tradition of private policing and private provision of fire protection services, sometimes in places where there were no public police or fire services. Similarly, there seems little reason to think that the federal Constitution bars a state government from eliminating its public school system. The Court has sometimes referred to "core government functions" of the states when discussing Congress's power to regulate state governments, but those references probably have no implications for governments' decisions to eliminate even core functions.

The Constitution may not limit the government's power to privatize, but it might limit the actions of the entities conducting the activities that previously were done by the government. The STATE ACTION doctrine holds that only government action is subject to the limitations expressed in the Constitution. Privatization places pressure on the state action doctrine: If a state contracts with a private operator of correctional facilities, may the prison guards beat prisoners without violating the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT because the guards are employed by a private company, not the state? The Court has not yet comprehensively confronted the question of privatization.

Privatization of public functions occurs in two forms: through quasi-public corporations and through contracting-out. The government may set up a corporation to conduct some activity that previously had been done by the government itself. The United States Postal Service and Amtrak are good examples. These quasi-public corporations typically have boards of directors appointed by public authorities, but they operate without substantial direct public supervision. Their operations are financed not by appropriations in the government budget but by fees they charge the public and funds they borrow in the general market. Further, no legislative committee regularly conducts oversight hearings on their operations.

The Court initially addressed the legal status of quasi-public corporations in a series of cases involving the use of such corporations to build warships, but those cases did not raise questions about whether such corporations had to comply with the Constitution's individual rights provisions. In 1995 the Court in LEBRON V. NATIONAL RAILROAD PASSENGER CORP. held that Amtrak had to comply with constitutional requirements. The case involved a decision to exclude a political advertisement criticizing the Coors beer company for its alleged support of conservative causes. Amtrak took the position that, like any owner of private property, it could exclude the advertisement without considering any possible constitutional concerns. The Court said that Amtrak was "not a private entity but the Government itself," in large part because the President appointed a majority of Amtrak's board of directors. The decision's scope is unclear because the degree of public control over Amtrak remained unusually substantial. The result might differ if the quasi-public corporation's board of directors had only minority representation from public appointees. (The President has the power to appoint a minority of the board of directors of Comsat, the corporation that operates communications satellites.) Yet political constraints may limit extensive privatization without public control. Legislators may be unwilling to privatize unless they are assured that public appointees will have a substantial role in the quasi-public corporation's decisions. When they do have such a role, Lebron suggests that constitutional restraints will apply.

The Court has discussed contracting-out extensively in two cases. Rendell-Baker v. Kohn (1982), the more important, involved a privately owned and operated school that contracted with the state to instruct "problem" students. The school received over 90 percent of its budget from public funds, and nearly all its students were referred to it by public institutions. Rendell-Baker, a teacher, was fired by the school for disagreeing with school policies. The Court held that the school was not a "state actor," and that the FIRST AMENDMENT therefore did not restrict the school's ability to discharge its employers, as it would in the public school system. According to the Court, the school's decision to fire Rendell-Baker was not "compelled or even influenced by any state regulation."

West v. Atkins (1988) involved a private doctor who contracted to provide medical services to prisoners. The Court held that the state was subject to liability based on the doctor's failure to provide medical care that satisfied constitutional requirements. Contracting out the state's constitutional obligation to provide adequate medical care to those whose lives it controlled in its prisons did not relieve the state of responsibility. The difference from Rendell-Baker was apparently that the state had no federal constitutional duty to provide an education to problem students.

Rendell-Baker's approach, emphasizing whether the state directed the action in question, suggests the importance of political constraints on privatization. Those conducting activities formerly performed by the government are limited by the provisions of their contracts with the government, and by whatever other regulations the government chooses to enact. The Constitution comes into play only when the action in question is not prohibited either by the contract or by other regulations. In many circumstances, however, public officials have political reasons to include restrictive provisions in their contracts. For example, state teachers' unions may insist that schools receiving vouchers provide protections to their employees roughly equivalent to the protections public school teachers receive from the Constitution. In other circumstances, however, these political restraints may be less important. For example, legislators may face few political pressures when they contract out correctional services.

Privatization of public functions seems likely to increase, and the Court will be asked to clarify its constitutional implications. At this point, however, one can say only that privatization has constitutional implications, but not what those implications are.

MARK TUSHNET
(2000)

Bibliography

FROOMKIN, A. MICHAEL 1995 Reinventing the Government Corporation. University of Illinois Law Review 1995:543–634.

PRIVILEGE, EVIDENTIARY

See: Evidentiary Privileges

PRIVILEGE AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION

See: Right Against Self-Incrimination

PRIVILEGED COMMENT

See: Libel and the First Amendment

PRIVILEGE FROM ARREST

That legislators should be free from the threat of arrest except for notorious crimes while attending legislative sessions or en route to or from them has been recognized in English law for at least 1300 years. After the AMERICAN REVOLUTION that privilege was inserted into several state constitutions and the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION.

Because the privilege does not extend to "FELONY, or BREACH OF THE PEACE," it amounts in practice to immunity from arrest in civil matters, such as nonpayment of debts. The privilege is less a guarantee of legislative independence from executive abuse than a protection of public business from interference growing out of private disputes.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

The Constitution's two privileges and immunities clauses were born of different historical circumstances and inspired by different purposes. Yet they are bound together by more than their textual similarity. Both clauses look to the formation of "a more perfect Union," both sound the theme of equality, and both have raised questions about the role of the federal judiciary in protecting NATURAL RIGHTS.

The original Constitution's Article IV set out several principles to govern relations among the states. The FULL FAITH AND CREDIT CLAUSE established one such principle, and so did the clauses providing for interstate rendition of fugitive felons and fugitive slaves. (See SLAVERY AND THE CONSTITUTION; FUGITIVE SLAVERY; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.) Along with these "interstate comity" provisions was included this guarantee: "The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." Called "the basis of the Union" by ALEXANDER HAMILTON in THE FEDERALIST #80, the first privileges and immunities clause aimed at preventing a state from subjecting another state's citizens to discriminatory treatment of the kind customarily given to ALIENS. The framers saw the clause as embodying the principles of a much longer provision in the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, which had begun with this statement of objective: "The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different states in this union. . . ."

From the beginning everyone understood that Article IV's privileges and immunities clause could not mean exactly what it said. A Virginian who came to Boston surely had a right to engage in trade, but just as surely could not expect to be a candidate for governor of Massachusetts. What principle distinguished these two activities? Early in the nineteenth century, Justice BUSHROD WASHINGTON, sitting on circuit in CORFIELD V. CORYELL (1823), read the clause to guarantee equality for out-of-state citizens only as to "those privileges and immunities which are, in their nature, fundamental; which belong, of right, to the citizens of all free governments; and which have, at all times, been enjoyed by the citizens of the several states which comprise this Union. . . ." Washington went on to list "some" of those "fundamental" privileges, in language broadly inclusive of nearly every sort of right imaginable. Not only did a citizen of one state have a right "to pass through, or to reside in any other state for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise"; he also had the right, said Washington, to "enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject nevertheless to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole." Other rights were listed, such as a right of access to a state's courts and a right to nondiscriminatory taxation. Portentously, the passage ended by mentioning "the elective franchise" as a fundamental right.

No one, not even Washington, thought a state had a constitutional duty to let out-of-staters vote in state elections. The inference arises that in offering his list of "fundamental" privileges and immunities Washington had in mind something beyond a catalogue of rights of interstate equality. That broader objective may have been to make Article IV's privileges and immunities clause into a generalized federal constitutional guarantee of liberty, available to local citizens and out-of-staters alike—with identification and enforcement of "fundamental" liberties in the hands of the federal judiciary.

This "natural rights" vision of the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV has never found favor in the Supreme Court. The Court has not interpreted the clause as a source of substantive rights, apart from the right to some measure of equality in a state's treatment of citizens of other states. The term "citizens" has been consistently limited, in this context, to natural persons who are citizens of the United States, thus excluding both corporations and aliens from the clause's protection. The substantive reach of the clause, too, was narrow in the Court's early interpretations: the right to pursue a common calling, the right to own and deal with property, the right of access to state courts.

Even in this restrictive interpretation, the interstate equality demanded by the clause overlaps with the antidiscrimination principle that restricts STATE REGULATIONS OF COMMERCE. The same law, in other words, might violate both the implied limitations of the COMMERCE CLAUSE and the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV. Yet the commerce clause has been a more significant guarantee against interstate discrimination. The commerce clause presumptively forbids a state to discriminate against INTERSTATE (or FOREIGN) COMMERCE, even when the persons engaging in that commerce are the state's own citizens. And the commerce clause, unlike the privileges and immunities clause, protects both corporations and aliens from discrimination against their activities in commerce.

A major shift in judicial attitude toward the privileges and immunities clause was signaled by TOOMER V. WITSELL (1948). South Carolina licensed shrimp boats in coastal waters, demanding license fees of $25 per boat from residents and $2,500 from nonresidents. (Since the adoption of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, state residence and state citizenship have been treated as virtually equivalent.) The Supreme Court held this discrimination a violation of both the commerce clause and the privileges and immunities clause, and in its opinion reformulated the latter clause's governing doctrine. Henceforth any state discrimination against citizens of other states would be held invalid unless the state demonstrated a "substantial reason for the discrimination" apart from their out-of-state citizenship. In Doe v. Bolton (1973), a companion case to ROE V. WADE (1973), the Court applied the Toomer formula to strike down a Georgia law allowing only state residents to obtain abortions in Georgia.

Toomer seemed to have dispatched the "fundamental" privileges limitation in favor of a straightforward requirement of substantial justification for discrimination against out-of-staters. But here as elsewhere in constitutional law the idea of FUNDAMENTAL INTERESTS has had remarkable recuperative power. BALDWIN V. FISH & GAME COMMISSION (1978) revived the doctrine to uphold a Montana law that charged a state resident $9 for an elk hunting license and a nonresident $225. (The nonresident might also use the license to kill one bear and one deer, to shoot game birds, and to fish. The same package of sanguinary privileges would cost a resident $30.) Elk hunting, said the Court, was a sport, not a means to livelihood; equal access for out-of-staters to Montana elk was "not basic to the maintenance of well-being of the Union," and thus not a "fundamental" privilege protected by Article IV against interstate discrimination. Only four weeks later, in HICKLIN V. ORBECK (1978), the Court returned to the Toomer approach to invalidate an Alaska law giving preference to state residents in employment in jobs related to construction of the Alaska pipeline. The state had not offered substantial justification for the discrimination, the Court said, and therefore it was invalid. Baldwin was not cited.

The cleanest way to resolve the tension between these two decisions would have been to abandon Baldwin as a doctrinal sport. Instead, the Supreme Court combined both lines of decision in a new formula. In United Building & Construction Trades Council v. Mayor and Council of Camden (1984) and SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE V. PIPER (1985) the Court established a two-part test for determining the validity of a state law challenged under Article IV's privileges and immunities clause. The first inquiry follows Baldwin: the law is limited by the clause only when its discrimination against out-of-staters touches a privilege that is "fundamental" to interstate harmony. The Court made clear in Piper that access to a means of livelihood is such a privilege. The second inquiry follows Toomer and Hicklin: if the privilege in question is "fundamental," the discrimination is invalid unless there is a "substantial" reason for treating out-of-staters differently, and the law's discrimination bears a "substantial relationship" to that objective. The second requirement states an intermediate STANDARD OF REVIEW for judicial scrutiny of both the state's purposes and its discriminatory means.

Special problems have plagued the Supreme Court's efforts to apply the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV to cases in which the discriminating states have acted as purchasers of goods and services, or owners of property, or proprietors of enterprises. In the Camden case, the Court refused to recognize a general exemption of such activities from the strictures of the clause; if the activities affected a "fundamental" interest, the clause would be implicated. In the same breath, however, the Court suggested that the state's interests as a market participant might be relevant to the second part of the new two-part inquiry: the question of justification for discriminating against out-of-staters. Justification for some state preferences for local citizens may be found in the citizens' obligations to support local government. Toomer's teaching is that the justification must be substantial.

Thus far the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV has been applied only to state laws discriminating against out-of-staters. Concurring in Zobel v. Williams (1982), Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR argued for a broader application of the clause that would place constitutional limits on any state law—even a law discriminating between different groups of the state's own citizens—when the law disadvantages persons who have only recently arrived in the state. Justice O'Connor would have found a violation of the clause in Alaska's law distributing the state's oil revenues to Alaska citizens in proportion to the length of their residence; she argued that the law imposed "disabilities of alienage"—a result the clause was designed to forbid. The majority, holding the law invalid on equal protection grounds, rejected this novel interpretation in favor of the conventional view: the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV is inapplicable to such a case, for the clause speaks only to discrimination against citizens of other states.

A second privileges and immunities clause was added to the Constitution in 1868 as part of the Fourteenth Amendment: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, concurring in EDWARDS V. CALIFORNIA (1941), said expansively that "[t]his clause was adopted to make United States citizenship the dominant and paramount allegiance among us." The fact is that the amendment's framers did not sharply differentiate the functions of the various clauses of the amendment's first section and did not speak with one voice concerning the purposes of the privileges and immunities clause. Undoubtedly, however, the clause was meant to have some effect as a limitation on the states. The amendment's opening sentence "overruled" DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) by conferring United States citizenship and state citizenship on "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof." The privileges and immunities clause, following immediately in the amendment's text, surely was intended to give some substantive content to the rights of citizenship, and particularly to the equal citizenship of blacks. (See EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.) Yet the Supreme Court, in its first encounter with the clause, read it, as Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD aptly said in dissent, to be "a vain and idle enactment, which accomplished nothing." In the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) a 5–4 majority, distinguishing the privileges and immunities of national citizenship from those of state citizenship, confined the former to rights established elsewhere in the Constitution and federal laws and to rights that were already fairly inferable from the relation of a citizen to the national government. (Examples of the latter would be the right to United States protection in other countries, the right to enter public lands, or the right to inform federal authorities of violations of federal law.) The majority described Corfield's list of "fundamental" rights as privileges of state citizenship, subject to Article IV's guarantee of interstate equality but untouched by the new privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Court feared that a contrary reading of the privileges and immunities clause, coupled with the power of Congress to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment, would not only "constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the states" but also "bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the states." Such a result, the Court accurately said, would radically restructure the federal union, centralizing power in the national government. No doubt some congressional proponents of the Fourteenth Amendment had hoped for precisely that result. The Slaughterhouse Cases dissenters viewed the prospect with equanimity and even sought to revive the natural rights philosophy of Corfield in the name of the Fourteenth Amendment. In doctrinal terms, however, they lost the battle decisively. The Court has never given the Fourteenth Amendment's privileges and immunities clause any significant content that is distinctively its own.

Occasional flurries of activity have suggested impending revitalization of the clause. Justice HUGO L. BLACK made the clause a centerpiece in his effort to persuade the Court to recognize the total incorporation of the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment. (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.) And for a season the clause came to life as a limitation on state taxing power, until MADDEN V. KENTUCKY (1940) overruled COLGATE V. HARVEY (1935). Individual Justices have promoted the clause in concurring opinions, such as that of Justice Jackson in Edwards v. California (1941) (right to move freely from state to state) and that of Justice OWEN ROBERTS in HAGUE V. COMMITTEE FOR INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATION (1939) (right to assemble to discuss national legislation), but these ventures have been largely superseded by the development of other constitutional limitations on the states.

In the modern era, Justice Jackson's Edwards argument has borne fruit in the development of a constitutional RIGHT TO TRAVEL. The right is now well established as a limitation on state power, but the right's source in the Constitution remains unspecified. The commerce clause is one obvious candidate, and not just one but both privileges and immunities clauses have also been nominated. (Congressional interferences with the freedom of foreign travel have been tested against the Fifth Amendment's DUE PROCESS clause.) Plainly, the Supreme Court has no need to rely on either privileges and immunities clause as an independent source for the right to travel.

Although the natural rights approach to constitutional adjudication failed to make headway in the name of either of the privileges and immunities clauses, in the field of ECONOMIC REGULATION the views of the Slaughterhouse Cases dissenters came to prevail for almost half a century under the banner of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. (See FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.)That experiment in JUDICIAL ACTIVISM was closed in the 1930s, but a similar philosophy has informed the revival of substantive due process as a protection of personal freedoms. Some commentators have suggested that the Fourteenth Amendment's privileges and immunities clause may be an apt vessel for these newer constitutional liberties, or even for yet-to-be-discovered affirmative constitutional obligations of government. After a century and more on the constitutional shelf, all the vessel needs is a little polishing.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Pages 22–30. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1971 Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–-

88, Part One. Chap. 20. (Volume VI, History of the Supreme Court of the United States.) New York: Macmillan.

KURLAND, PHILIP B. 1972 The Privileges and Immunities Clause: "Its Hour Come Round at Last?" Washington University Law Quarterly 1972:405–420.

SIMSON, GARY J. 1979 Discrimination against Nonresidents and the Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 128:379–401.

VARAT, JONATHAN D. 1981 State "Citizenship" and Interstate Equality. University of Chicago Law Review 48:487–572.

PRIVY COUNCIL

The Privy Council together with the monarch constitutes "the Crown," which is, in theory, the executive branch of the British government. Association of the council in the exercise of executive power was a check against the abuse of that power. The council is appointed for life and comprises members of the royal family, ministers and former ministers of state, judges, and distinguished subjects. In practice, the cabinet has become, through an evolutionary process, the executive committee of the Privy Council.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Privy Council exercised the royal prerogative of disallowing acts of the colonial legislatures. At the same time the council was the highest court of appeal from the colonial courts (a function now exercised by the judicial committee of the Privy Council). The role of the Privy Council in the political order of the British Empire was thus suggestive of both the VETO POWER and JUDICIAL REVIEW.

Some of the early state constitutions provided for a council to share the executive power or to review acts of the legislature. At the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 various unsuccessful proposals for a plural executive reflected the British notion of the Privy Council as a check against royal tyranny.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PRIZE CASES
2 Black (67 U.S.) 635 (1863)

In the Prize Cases, a 5–4 majority of the Supreme Court sustained the validity of President ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S blockade proclamations of April 1861, refusing to declare unconstitutional his unilateral actions in meeting the Confederacy's military initiatives.

Lincoln proclaimed a blockade of southern ports on April 19 and 27, 1861. Congress authorized him to declare a state of insurrection by the Act of July 13, 1861, thereby, at least in the view of the dissenters, giving formal legislative recognition to the existence of civil war. By the Act of August 6, 1861, Congress retroactively ratified all Lincoln's military actions. The Prize Cases involved seizures of vessels bound for Confederate ports prior to July 13, 1861.

For the majority, Justice ROBERT C. GRIER held that a state of CIVIL WAR existed DE FACTO after the firing on Fort Sumter (April 12, 1861) and that the Supreme Court would take judicial notice of its existence. Though neither Congress nor President can declare war against a state of the Union, Grier conceded, when states waged war against the United States government, the President was "bound to meet it in the shape it presented itself, without waiting for Congress to baptize it with a name." Whether the insurgents were to be accorded belligerent status, and hence be subject to blockade, was a POLITICAL QUESTION to be decided by the President, whose decision was conclusive on the courts. Grier reproved the dissenters by reminding them that the court should not "cripple the arm of the government and paralyze its power by subtle definitions and ingenious sophisms."

Justice SAMUEL NELSON for the dissenters (Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY, and Justices JOHN CATRON and NATHAN CLIFFORD) argued that only Congress can declare a war and that consequently the President can neither declare nor recognize it. A civil war's "existence in a material sense . . . has no relevancy or weight when the question is what constitutes war in a legal sense." Lincoln's acts before 13 July 1861 constituted merely his "personal war against those in rebellion." Therefore seizures under the blockade proclamations were illegal.

The Prize Cases permitted the federal government the convenient ambiguity of treating the Confederacy as an organized insurgency and as a conventional belligerent. The opinions also had an implicit relevance to other disputed exercises of presidential authority. Defenders of a broad executive power could argue that the majority opinion's reasoning supported the constitutionality of Lincoln's call for volunteers, of his suspension of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS, and perhaps also of the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

PROBABLE CAUSE

The FOURTH AMENDMENT guarantees in part that "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause. . . ." The determination of probable cause necessarily turns on specific facts and often requires the courts and the police to make most difficult decisions. The need for probable cause in American CRIMINAL PROCEDURE arises in three instances: probable cause to ARREST or detain, probable cause to search, and probable cause to prosecute. The first two derive constitutional status directly from the Fourth Amendment and govern the conduct of the police. An inquiry by a judge or GRAND JURY into probable cause for prosecution is not constitutionally required in state cases; however, this check on the exercise of prosecutorial discretion is prescribed by statute or state constitutional mandate in most states and is constitutionally required by the Fifth Amendment in federal cases.

As to arrest and search, the language of the Fourth Amendment does not distinguish between SEARCHES AND SEIZURES of objects, and arrests—"seizures" of the person. While one might assume that the term would have equivalent meanings in both the search and arrest contexts, the differences between arrests of suspects and searches for evidence or contraband require the probable cause standard to be applied to different types of data for the two procedures. Probable cause for a search does not automatically support an arrest, nor does a valid ARREST WARRANT necessarily support a search.

Probable cause in the arrest context was defined by the United States Supreme Court in Beck v. Ohio (1964) as turning on "whether at that moment [of arrest] the facts and circumstances within [the officers'] knowledge and of which they [have] reasonably trustworthy information [are] sufficient to warrant a prudent man in believing that the [suspect] had committed or was committing an offense. There are two potential sources of information—personal knowledge and "trustworthy" secondary data. The Supreme Court has clearly established that secondary data—information not within the officer's personal knowledge—can supply sufficient grounds for an arrest. Thus, the police may rely on reports from other cities or states to support valid arrests, as in Whitely v. Warden (1971). Credible information supplied by an informant may also be used.

The officer's specific knowledge derived from direct contact with the arrestee is usually the primary support for a finding of probable cause. It is clear such information must be specific. Mere knowledge that, for example, a suspect has been convicted in the past coupled with an unidentified INFORMANT'S TIP alleging current criminal activity has been held to be insufficient.

Even specific EVIDENCE linking an individual to a crime will not justify an arrest if the evidence has been discovered unconstitutionally. An arrest cannot be justified by evidence seized pursuant to the arrest; as the Court said in Sibron v. New York (1968): "An incident search may not precede an arrest and serve as part of its justification."

Evidence discovered in an on-street investigative encounter that has not yet reached the level of an arrest may be properly used to create probable cause. For example, if as a result of a STOP-AND-FRISK encounter on the street, authorized by TERRY V. OHIO (1968), an officer feels a weapon, he has probable cause to arrest for carrying a concealed weapon. Similarly, if in the course of a temporary detention the suspect fails adequately to account for his suspicious actions or if he affirmatively discloses incriminating evidence, probable cause to arrest may be established. The same is true if the suspect runs away. While flight alone does not create probable cause to arrest, it is a significant factor to be considered in the overall assessment.

By contrast, however, as the Court held in Brown v. Texas (1979), the mere failure of a suspect to identify himself, without more, does not supply probable cause. Nor may a valid arrest rely on an individual's failure to protect his innocence when found with suspects for whom probable cause exists, as in United States v. Di Re (1948).

Di Re also stands for the proposition that mere presence of an individual in the company of others who are properly suspected of criminal activity does not constitute probable cause. Subsequent cases, however, have made clear that there are limits to this principle. The difficulties here have largely come with possessory offenses. On the one hand, the Court in Johnson v. United States (1947) held that a tip that opium was being smoked coupled with the smell of opium outside a hotel room did not give rise to probable cause to arrest everyone in the room. Although there was probable cause to believe a crime was being committed, there was insufficient information to determine who was committing it. Yet in KER V. CALIFORNIA (1963) the Court upheld the arrest of a married couple found in their kitchen with a brick of marijuana, even though the tip leading them there had linked only the husband to the contraband. The Court reasoned that the combination of the wife's presence in a small kitchen with obvious contraband, coupled with information that the husband had been using the apartment as a base for his drug activities, gave sufficient grounds for a reasonable belief that they were both in possession of marijuana.

This requirement of linking probable cause specifically to the arrestee was again mentioned by the Court in YBARRA V. ILLINOIS (1979). There the police procured a valid warrant to search a tavern believed to be the center of drug activity. In executing the warrant, the police searched about a dozen of the tavern's patrons, including Ybarra. While the case thus actually dealt with the legitimacy of the search rather than an arrest, the Court stated: "[W]here the standard is probable cause, a search or seizure of a person must be supported by probable cause particularized with respect to that person. This requirement cannot be undercut or avoided by simply pointing to the fact that coincidentally there exists probable cause to search or seize another or to search the premises where the person may happen to be." (Emphasis added.) Ybarra thus reinforces the requirement that probable cause be particularized to the person arrested; mere presence at a place connected with criminal activity, or in the company of suspected criminals, without more, is inadequate.

Finally, the Court held in Gerstein v. Pugh (1975) that whenever a suspect has been arrested without a warrant and with no prior INDICTMENT, he is entitled to a quick judicial check on the police conclusion that there is probable cause to detain him if he will undergo a "significant pretrial restraint on liberty"—more than the mere condition that he return for trial. This hearing, while constitutionally required if these conditions are met, need not be adversary and does not give rise to a RIGHT TO COUNSEL. As with the hearing to obtain an arrest warrant, this proceeding does not even require the accused's presence. The standard of proof is simply whether there is probable cause to believe the suspect has committed a crime.

The search context is the second major area in which the issue of probable cause arises. Most courts hold that probable cause for a search exists when the facts and circumstances in a given situation are sufficient to warrant a man of reasonable caution to believe that seizable objects are located at the place to be searched. (See BRINEGAR V. UNITED STATES; CARROLL V. UNITED STATES.)

The probable cause determination is generally based on the information supplied to the magistrate in the application for a search warrant. An application must be sworn to and must allege the place to be searched, the property to be seized, the person having the property if it is to be taken from his control, and the underlying crime. There is no requirement that everything must be set out in the application itself; affidavits may be attached or sworn statements taken before the magistrate. Because applications are usually submitted by police officers who do not have legal training, the language of the application is to be construed in a nontechnical way. Nevertheless, if the application is all that is submitted, and it is expressed in "conclusory" terms only, it will be insufficient to establish probable cause. Sufficient data must be contained in either the application itself or the supporting affidavits to justify the magistrate in issuing the warrant.

Although no blanket assertion can explain all cases involving probable cause for the issuance of search warrants, one useful rule of thumb is that if the affidavit and supporting documents allege facts that can explain to the magistrate the basis for the probable cause determination, a warrant based on such an affidavit is likely to be good. On the other hand, when an affidavit asserts a mere conclusion such as "we have it on good information and do believe there are drugs at the suspect's home," there is no independent basis for the magistrate's determination. A warrant based on such a showing is likely to be invalid.

The hardest issue arises when the affiant police officer is not the source of the information but is relying on an informant. Most of the Supreme Court's decisions concerning the required credibility of informants have arisen in cases involving SEARCH WARRANTS rather than arrest warrants, but the standards for use of informants in both contexts are the same.

The Supreme Court first enunciated the requirements for a valid informant-based warrant in AGUILAR V. TEXAS (1964). According to this test, the affidavit must: (a) set forth sufficient underlying circumstances to demonstrate to a neutral and detached magistrate how the informant reached hisher conclusion; and (b) establish the reliability or credibility of the informant. In the subsequent case, SPINELLI V. UNITED STATES (1969), the Supreme Court explained that the absence of a statement detailing the manner in which the informant's data were gathered renders it especially important that "the tip describe the accused's criminal activity in sufficient detail that the magistrate may know that he is relying on something more substantial than a casual rumor . . . or an accusation based merely on an individual's general reputation."

The Aguilar/Spinelli test has, however, been rejected by ILLINOIS V. GATES (1983). The Court in Gates introduced a totality-of-the-circumstances test, stating that it was not necessary to establish the credibility of the informant as a separate element to a valid search warrant. Instead, reliability and credibility of the informer and his basis of knowledge are considered as intertwining considerations that may illuminate the probable cause issue. In Gates the police received an anonymous informant's letter containing details of the defendants' involvement in drug trafficking which were corroborated by police investigations. The Court held that this provided a sufficient basis for a finding of probable cause.

Finally, according to Henry v. United States (1959), if the police had probable cause to arrest or search, the fact that the information on which they relied turns out to be false does not invalidate the arrest or search. Sufficient probability is the touchstone of Fourth Amendment reasonableness. (See PRELIMINARY HEARING.)

CHARLES H. WHITEBREAD
(1986)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1978 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, CIVIL

The Fifth Amendment forbids the United States to "deprive" any person of "life, liberty, or property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW." The FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT imposes an identical prohibition on the states.

Due process is the ancient core of CONSTITUTIONALISM. It is a traditional legal expression of concern for the fate of persons in the presence of organized social power. The question of according due process arises when governments assert themselves adversely to the interests of individuals.

In modern usage "due process" connotes a certain normative ideal for decisions about the exercise of power. Very broadly, it has come to mean decisions that are not arbitrary, but are aligned with publicly accepted aims and values; are not dictatorial, but allow affected persons a suitable part in their making; and are not oppressive, but treat those affected with the respect owed political associates and fellow human beings. It is from the liberal individualist tradition that these abstract due process standards—of reason, voice, and dignity—have drawn their more concrete content. That content includes the definition of proper aims for state activity, the canons of legitimating participation and consent, and the conceptions of human personality that set the threshold of respectful treatment.

The law distinguishes between "substantive" and "procedural" due process. An arbitrary or groundless decision may violate substantive due process regardless of how it came to be made. O'CONNOR V. DONALDSON (1975), for example, held that no antecedent procedure will justify incarceration of a harmless eccentric. Conversely, a peremptory decision may violate procedural due process regardless of purposive justification. Guilt in fact will not justify sudden, final dismissal of a faithless government employee without a hearing, as the Supreme Court stated in ARNETT V. KENNEDY (1974). The due process claim is "procedural" rather than "substantive" when it questions not the state's authority to impose the harm in question by an adequate decision process, but rather the adequacy of the process actually used.

Of course, procedural demands gain much of their power from their perceived contribution to substantive accuracy and enlightenment. Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER stated in JOINT ANTI-FASCIST COMMITTEE V. MCGRATH (1951): "No better instrument has been devised for arriving at truth than to give a person in jeopardy of serious loss notice of the case against him and an opportunity to meet it. Nor has a better way been found for generating the feeling, so important to a popular government, that justice has been done."

The focal concern of procedural due process is the set of procedures, epitomized by the judicial trial, whereby governing rules and standards are brought to bear on individuals in specific cases. The doctrine also has some further extension to the formation of the governing rules and standards. Due process can support a claim for direct voice in the formation process, for example, by industry members regarding regulatory standards under consideration by an administrative agency. It can also be the ground of an objection to the nonrepresentative character of the political process in which a standard originates, for example, a restriction on professional entry adopted by a board composed of self-interested professionals. There may also be a due process failure in the way a legal standard is formulated. The standard may be too vague and ill-defined to ensure even-handed application or allow for effective submission of proofs and arguments by someone contesting its application; or, conversely, it may be so narrowly drawn as to represent an arbitrary or vindictive discrimination against a disfavored few. Lawmaking defects of these various kinds are chiefly the concern of doctrines of SEPARATION OF POWERS, unconstitutional delegation, VAGUENESS, and prohibition of BILLS OF ATTAINDER, but they cannot in practice be held entirely separate from procedural due process claims.

In Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath Justice Frankfurter invoked a history in which the adversary judicial trial has dominated our law's vision of procedural due process, as the model of a procedure designed to assure reason, voice, and dignity to individuals threatened with harm by the state. Criminal due process shows the fullest development of the adversarial model, just as criminal proceedings tend to maximize the conditions bespeaking the need for adversarial safeguards: charges specifically directed against the accused individual, by highly visible officers acting in the state's name, threatening not only tangible deprivation of liberty or wealth but also public degradation. Some state-initiated proceedings against individuals, such as those brought to establish paternity or terminate parental status, while nominally civil in character, resemble criminal prosecutions in their accusatory and stigmatic implications or in the gravity of their threatened sanctions, leaving little doubt about the need to grant respondents something approaching the full set of due process safeguards. Such safeguards were required by the Court in LASSITER V. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1981). As cases of impending state-imposed harm depart further from the criminal prosecution paradigm, however, they reveal that puzzling issues of political and legal principle are latent in the general ideal of due process. Such cases pose two distinct questions for due process doctrine. First, does the occasion demand any kind of proceeding at all? Assuming an affirmative answer, the second question is, what process is due?

Events that from certain perspectives are describable as deprivations of life, liberty, or property in which the state is implicated—for example, a creditor acting under a legal privilege to repossess consumer goods from an assertedly defaulting debtor—may occur with no provision in the law for any process at all. The most theoretically telling of recent judicial encounters with due process doctrine has been concerned with defining the occasions when some trial-type process is constitutionally required.

Due process further stands for a constitutionally mandated procedural code for the fair conduct of whatever trial-type proceedings are to occur. In this second aspect, due process doctrine is a compendium of answers to such varied questions as: May the hearing be postponed until after the onset of the deprivation (such as a summary suspension of a student from school) or must there be a predeprivation hearing? May the state depart from COMMON LAW rules regarding HEARSAY evidence, allow its judges to interrogate witnesses, use publication rather than personal contact as a means of notifying concerned parties of pending proceedings, or deny parties the assistance of counsel in small claims tribunals?

The answers found in due process doctrine to such questions will bind a government just insofar as it chooses, or is required by the first aspect of the doctrine, to use judicial-type forums or trial-type proceedings to carry out their pursuits. The chief problems posed by such questions are the recurrent ones of JUDICIAL REVIEW and CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION: from what sources, by what modes of reasoning, shall the answers be drawn, given the breadth and imprecision of constitutional text? Historically, the main methodological alternatives and debates have arisen in the context of criminal prosecutions and been thence carried over to the civil side.

Constitutional claims to trial-type proceedings are most obviously compelling when individuals stand to be harmed by actions of officials performing state functions or wielding state powers. Yet even in such cases the individual interests at stake may be found insufficient to call due process rights into play. On a textual level, the question plainly is whether the affected interest is identifiable as "life, liberty, or property." History, however, discloses contrasting approaches to that question. It was once commonly supposed that any serious imposition on an individual—any "grievous loss"—could qualify as a constitutionally significant deprivation. A chief feature of contemporary due process doctrine is that the potency of a harm as a due process trigger turns not on such an ordinary assessment of its weight or practical severity but rather on a technical, categorical judgment about its legal "nature." In adjudicating what categories of interests legally qualify as "life," "liberty," or "property" for due process analysis, the Court has drawn eclectically on sources both naturalistic and positivistic—on both a HIGHER LAW tradition and on currently enacted law.

This eclecticism, and indeed the entire complex practice of categorically excluding some concededly weighty interests from due process protection, has apparently evolved out of the Court's encounters with modern welfare state activism. Consider the case of a government worker unceremoniously fired, or of a disability pensioner whose monthly payments are cut off. In such cases the underlying due process values of reason, voice, and dignity may seem to call as strongly for a chance to be heard as in cases of revocation of a professional license or dispossession of land or goods. Yet neither a government job nor a disability benefit is "property" in the common speech of our own culture or that of the constitutional Framers; and although their loss might be called a loss of liberty, to speak so broadly would bring within the sweep of procedural due process many cases that evidently do not belong there, for example, denial of admission to a state university.

The Court's response, in cases like GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970) and BISHOP V. WOOD (1976), has been to say that "property" may, indeed, include all manner of beneficial relations with the state or others, but only insofar as those relations are legal entitlements in the sense that explicit (or positive) law protects against their impairment. Thus a probationary employee lacking contractual term or statutory tenure may be peremptorily dismissed and the mere applicant peremptorily rejected; but the tenured employee has a right to be heard on the question of cause for dismissal, and the disability claimant under a statute containing definite eligibility rules may not be delisted—or even denied initial admission to benefits—without some opportunity to be heard on the issue of eligibility.

The method of equating due process protected "property" with positive legal entitlement—that is, by reference to clearly ordained, subconstitutional law—has several attractive features. It flows easily from the observation in BOARD OF REGENTS V. ROTH (1972) that a chief purpose of "the ancient institution of property" has been to "protect . . . expectations upon which people must rely in their daily lives" against being "arbitrarily undermined." Moreover, the positive-entitlement conception makes a neat fit with the idea that a fair hearing is the nub of due process. Entitlement makes directly clear what the hearing shall be about, for any law framing an entitlement must specify issues available for contest by anyone complaining of deprivation. Finally, entitlement analysis may seem to keep the judiciary clear of imposing on popularly accountable branches of government any political values or ends not accepted by those branches themselves. A judge enforcing due process rights appears to do little more than take seriously the decision of the lawmakers to create the entitlement in the first place.

The Court on some occasions has gone so far as to say that no interest qualifies as due process protected property except insofar as a legal rule safeguards its continued enjoyment. It seems clear that such statements cannot be taken literally. For example, the Court consistently refuses to approve procedures involving state officers in the repossession of goods bought on credit, without affording a prompt hearing to the buyer, no matter how clearly the applicable state law states that the buyer's entitlement to continued possession is to lapse upon the creditor's filing of notice of default (as distinguished from a judicial finding of default). Here it must be the brute reality of the buyer's established possession of the goods that comprises the constitutionally protected property, regardless of the explicit legal rules concerning its protection or duration.

The possession cases illustrate the naturalistic or higher law side of the Court's eclectic method of interest characterization. Protection of established possession against disorderly or unjustified incursion is an ancient fixture in both the rhetoric and the practice of Anglo-American common law and liberty. There are other common liberties similarly, if not all quite so anciently, esteemed: personal mobility and bodily security; liberties of conscience, intellect, and expression; domestic sanctuary, marital intimacy, and family solidarity; occupational freedom and professional autonomy. Although some of these interests find mention in the Bill of Rights, they mostly lack specific constitutional recognition.

The Court has used the "liberty" branch of the due process guarantee as a warrant for procedural protection for such interests, quite apart from their status as entitlements under positive law—and without overprecious worry about their status at ancestral common law. Regardless of whether the state's law purports, or ever did purport, to make into legal rights a schoolchild's security against corporal punishment (INGRAHAM V. WRIGHT, 1977), a parent's retention of child custody (Santosky v. Kramer, 1982), or a parolee's preference for remaining at liberty (Morrissey v. Brewer, 1972), those interests have been held protected, by the due process clause itself, against peremptory impairment by STATE ACTION. They are treated as constitutional entitlements regardless of whether they are statutory ones. It is easy to imagine why naturalist as well as positivist elements thus enter into the Court's characterizations. Welfare state activism positively invites forms of reliance and dependence which, however historically novel, evoke the essential purposes of due process; but the activist state is also prone to tread insensitively on old but still vital concerns that courts recognize as traditional freedoms.

The conclusion that an interest jeopardized by government action does qualify as someone's "life, liberty, or property" does not end the due process inquiry, for the question then remains of how much "process" is "due." It has been said that due process entails, at a minimum, "some kind of hearing" for the exposed individual. Precisely what kind depends on a judicial assessment: one which, according to the formulation in MATHEWS V. ELDRIDGE (1976), is supposed to take account of the gravity of the individual interest at stake, the utility of the requested procedures in avoiding factually misinformed or legally erroneous decisions, and the cost of those procedures to the pursuit of legitimate state objectives. The results of such a calculus can range from the heavy procedural armor available to criminal defendants in capital cases to the simple "opportunity to present his side of the story" that, under GOSS V. LOPEZ (1975), is due a student facing a short disciplinary suspension from school.

An important and oft-contested feature of the constitutionally guaranteed process is its timing relative to the deprivation. The Court long stood by the general proposition that (apart from "emergency" situations, such as seizure of contraband) due process meant predeprivation process. The Court continues to insist on some opportunity for in-person hearing prior to "core" deprivations such as dispossession of tangible property. In several cases, such as Arnett v. Kennedy and Mathews v. Eldridge, involving government jobs and other "benefits," the Court has accepted postponement of a live hearing until after the fall of the axe, when there has been predeprivation notice and opportunity for written protest, as long as there is adequate assurance for reparation in case the deprivation is eventually found unjustified.

Under pressure of the "mass justice" conditions imposed by modern governmental benefit programs involving very large numbers of eligibility decisions, there has been indication in recent cases and commentaries of tolerance for an alternative due process model, one less concerned than the traditional trial-type model with participation values. In this alternative managerial model, the measure of due process is not the quality of the opportunity given affected individuals for a say in the resolution of their own cases but quality control in the production of decisions. The aim is not voice for the individual but accuracy in the aggregate of the resolutions reached over a period of program administration. As advocates of this alternative model recognize, two factors are required to justify the model's use in any given setting: first, the relative dominance of individuals' interests in receiving their entitlements over their dignitary interests in participation; and, second, the value of such a systems management approach in maximizing the receipt of entitlements.

When judges find constitutional protection, under the broad cover of "liberty," for selected interests not specified as rights by constitutional text or other clearly uttered law, and when they determine just what form and quantum of process is "due" in respect of particular kinds of deprivations, they have obviously entered on the work of ranking substantive ends and values. Yet courts doing this kind of due process adjudication have not evinced great worry about usurpation of the lawmaking function. One reason may be that by merely requiring the state to provide some kind of hearing when it acts adversely to some individual's interests, a court does not consider itself ultimately to be preventing lawmakers from reaching whatever substantive results they choose.

However, the judicial act of fashioning procedural requirements, and attaching these to a select set of liberties, is not without substantive force. Procedural requirements can place serious practical obstacles in the way of legislative pursuits. They may be expensive. They may cause a formalization or distancing of some relations that lawmakers could reasonably prefer to leave more informal, close, or open, such as the relations among teachers and students in a school. They may deter valued candor—as from evaluators of candidates for jobs, promotions, university admissions, professional licenses—insofar as due process entitles the subjects of adverse reports to disclosure or CONFRONTATION. Procedural requirements may thus force lawmakers to weigh some programmatic objectives against others that would be jeopardized by pursuing the former within the procedural rules laid down by courts.

Due process protection for interests that are not entitlements established by positive law may have a subtler substantive import. If the jeopardized interest enjoys no specific protection under any law aside from the due process clause itself, there is no obvious focus for the required process. A hearing on the issue of whether the contested deprivation is "without due process" may seem pointless, lacking some legal restriction on the conditions in which the deprivation is authorized. This problem has arisen in a number of cases involving dispossession of public housing tenants, when neither the laws governing the housing programs not the leases issued to tenants purported to restrict in any way the power of administrators to evict tenants at any time, for any reason or no reason.

Courts in this situation may supply the missing substantive entitlement on their own, by finding in the due process guarantee a protection against deprivations not rationally related to the purposes of the governmental activity in question. Thus a court may bar a public housing administrator from evicting a tenant who has been cohabiting with a nonspouse, if the court concludes that excluding the cohabitation is not rationally related to the court's understanding of the purposes of public housing. In such a case, the crossover from procedural to substantive concerns is glaringly evident.

A similar crossover is less evident, but still detectible, when a court responds to the lack of a positive law entitlement by requiring the state itself to enunciate some restrictions of purpose or circumstance on lawful impairment of the protected interest, which can provide a basis for due process hearings when official deprivations impend. For the court must then stand ready to decide whether the state's restrictions measure up to constitutional standards of protectiveness. A statute solemnly declaring that tenants may not be evicted "except as the Administrator shall decide is required for the general good" could not satisfy a court determined to afford procedural due process protection to the tenant's possessory interest viewed as an entitlement.

The alternative possibility, of requiring procedural protection even in the absence of legal restrictions on official discretion, rarely seems to have caught the Supreme Court's attention. Responsible officials, even when legally free to act at will, can always try to explain their decisions to persons adversely affected, and give the latter a chance to respond. Such an interchange will sometimes make a practical difference, by changing the officials' perceptions of the relevant facts or values. But even when it does not it may well serve any or all of the elemental purposes of due process: ensuring a voice in decisions for affected individuals, securing their recognition as persons deserving respect, and promoting consistency of official actions with goals and values that responsible officials are prepared to state and defend publicly.

Why has such a view of procedural due process, as serving process values apart from the aim of ensuring that persons receive the treatment legally due them, failed to gain judicial support? Most obviously, such an approach would cast very widely the due process net. If we see due process as broadly concerned with the quality of interaction between official and citizen, rather than more narrowly with vindication of the citizen's legal rights, then any state-inflicted "grievous loss" will seem to bring into play the constitutional standards of decisional procedure—a perhaps daunting result in light of the ubiquity of the welfare state.

The Court's limited extension of procedural protection beyond positive legal entitlements to possessory interests and a select set of liberties seems to represent its aversion to three unpalatable alternatives: first, deformation of the constitutional due process mandate by restricting its reach to entitlements specifically found in subconstitutional positive law; second, intrusive overextension of the mandate to all cases of palpably harmful state action; and third, free-form judicial choice among substantive values and policy goals. The Court apparently cannot avoid all three dangers fully and simultaneously. It has needed supplementary techniques to make good the avoidance of both trivialization and globalization of the range of the due process mandate, and these techniques have put heavy pressure on both doctrinal shapeliness and judicial self-discipline.

For example, the danger of trivialization constantly lurks in a crucial indeterminacy in the concept of legally defined entitlement as the equivalent of due process protected property. The problem is that of distributing components of a positive legal regime between the categories of substance and procedure. Suppose, as in Bishop v. Wood, that police officers are dismissable whenever, but only when, a designated superior has given the employee a written notice of dismissal for malfeasance in the performance of duty. Straightforwardly read, the law means to make the legal condition of dismissability not actual malfeasance but delivered written notice of dismissal. An entitlement-based due process doctrine then would logically require a hearing but only on the bootless issue of delivery of the notice. A judge can logically avoid that result by reading the law to condition dismissability on actual malfeasance, although that reading will make the law unconstitutional if the law includes no adequate provision for hearing on the malfeasance question. Whether such a reading seems unacceptably self-destructive will depend on the primacy of due process values in the reader's constitutional understanding.

Similar puzzles affect questions about whose entitlement is established by a plain statutory restriction on official discretion. A striking example is O'Bannon v. Town Court Nursing Center (1980), where a statute provided for financial assistance to needy elderly persons in meeting their costs of residence in officially approved nursing homes, and also set conditions of approval for the homes. Thus it was apparently unlawful for officials either to deny certification to homes meeting the conditions or to deny benefits to eligible residents of certified homes. When officials proposed to decertify a certain home, its residents claimed a due process right to be heard on the issued of the home's certifiability. The Supreme Court concluded that the residents had no constitutional right to such a hearing because their entitlement was just to benefits while residing in a certified home; the entitlement to certification belonged strictly to the nursing home operators.

Given the close practical resemblance of the residents' interests to the strongly protected interests of tenants in uninterrupted possession, a court could reasonably have concluded that they, too, were entitled to certification of their home if in fact it met the legal standards, and therefore they had due process rights to be heard on that issue. The Court's contrary conclusion was obviously influenced by concerns about overextended application of the constitutional due process mandate.

Claims to due process are not confined to situations in which the claimant's legal posture is defensive or the adversaries are government officials. They may arise also where individuals are exposed to the state's judicial power by their involvement in private legal controversies; and even where (the due process claim aside) there impends no legal proceeding at all but just some harm at a fellow citizen's hands.

The defendant in a private civil lawsuit faces possible deprivation, by officers wielding state powers, of wealth through a money judgment or of personal liberty through an injunctive decree. The occasion is obviously one to activate due process concerns, and civil defendants are held entitled to such procedural due process essentials as a fair and orderly hearing before an unbiased judge.

For reasons not quite so obvious, so are civil plaintiffs. A tempting explanation is that having allowed its courts to take charge of a private dispute, the state is obliged to have them do so in a way that satisfies the due process demand for reason, voice, and dignity. Yet this explanation seems incomplete. Some assistance is better than none. The state does not injure or oppress claimants to whom it offers procedurally flawed assistance against violators of the kinds of interests typically at stake in civil cases, unless the state is affirmatively obligated to secure those interests against violations by private as well as governmental agents. Suppose, for example (as the Supreme Court apparently did in TRUAX V. CORRIGAN, 1921) that the state is constitutionally obligated to protect landowners against disturbance by PICKETING. On such a view, a disturbed landowner can cite a refusal of protection as a deprivation of property and demand a hearing on the question of the state's justification for refusal. In other words, the landowner can demand a hearing on whether the picketing is for some special reason legally privileged. The state can meet this demand by letting the landowner sue the picketers for injunctive relief, but only if the procedural conditions of the suit satisfy due process standards of fairness from the plaintiff's point of view.

Thus denial of fair procedure to a civil plaintiff comes within the traditional due process concern about injurious treatment of individuals by the state, just insofar as we see the state's failure to protect the plaintiff's interests against the defendant's encroachments as itself a form of injury. Such is the SOCIAL COMPACT view according to which persons entering political association surrender to the state the use of force, for the safer protection of their several "lives, liberties, and estates." The state's regime of law and order then overrides the natural liberty of self-help, but only by replacing it with the state's obligation to protect.

Some such account seems necessary to complete the explanation of the conceded due process rights of civil plaintiffs. Yet other current law ostensibly rejects this account. United States v. Kras (1973) and Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co. (1982) together indicate that the state may usually condition a would-be civil plaintiff's ACCESS TO THE COURTS on payment of filing fees, thus effectively excluding whoever cannot pay. Such a doctrine is hard to square with the idea of a state's affirmative duty to protect the litigable interests of its citizens, arising out of the latter's relinquishment of self-help by private force.

When a government sues a citizen in an otherwise ordinary civil dispute, involving property or contract rights or tort claims, the citizen sued will of course have the due process rights normally enjoyed by privately sued civil defendants. The reverse case, of a civil dispute in which the citizen is the one seeking relief for a TRESPASS, breach of contract, or other civil wrong by a governmental defendant, is complicated by the doctrine of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY. In general, that doctrine means that the governments of the states and the Union may not be sued without the consent of their respective legislatures. If the courts find that such consent has not been given, the citizen alleging deprivation by governmental action will lack recourse in the ordinary courts, a situation presenting an obvious and a serious due process concern. In many such cases, the constitutionally guaranteed right of due process must prevail over sovereign immunity and entitle the victimized citizen to relief in constitutional litigation. That would surely be the result, for example, if government officials sought to imprison someone, or seize privately held land or goods, without ever giving the victim a fair chance to contest the legal and factual basis for such action. The citizen would be able to gain preventive relief or compensation in a CIVIL RIGHTS action based on the due process clause of the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendment.

The question of due process rights is most puzzling when seizures of possessions, or other violations of core interests generally given legal protection, are carried out by private agents with no apparent state complicity—a finance company sending its own forces to repossess an automobile securing an overdue debt, or a repair shop collecting an unpaid bill by retaining and eventually selling the repaired article. People do not usually take such "self-help" actions, or think them prudent, unless the actions are in some sense authorized, if not positively enabled, by state law. Thus lawmakers may authorize and enable a creditor's private repossession of chattel security by exempting such activity from liability for crime (theft) or civil wrong (conversion of goods). Indeed, the law usually goes farther, making it wrongful for the debtor to resist the seizure by force. The law doubtless otherwise contributes to the ability of creditors to make their seizures effective, as by securing the wealth used to pay for the requisite services. The utility of the repair shop's liquidation-by-sale depends on law allowing extinction of the debtor's legal claim to the goods in favor of the person who buys them from the repair shop. In short, self-help creditor remedies are evidently deliberate creations of state law, particular components of the state's total scheme of legally recognized and sanctioned rights and liabilities. In that sense, at least, the self-helping creditor inflicts significant deprivations under cover of the state's power, while affording no opportunity for the deprivee to be heard on the matter.

Even so, the Supreme Court concluded in FLAGG BROTHERS V. BROOKS (1978) that laws authorizing creditor self-help do not in general violate due process. In defense of this result, it might have been urged that the due process requirement is satisfied by the debtor's opportunity to sue later for restorative or compensatory relief in case the creditor's seizure was in fact unjustified. Such a rationale would accord with the holding in Ingraham v. Wright that paddling a student without a hearing comports with due process so long as compensatory relief for an unjustified paddling can be obtained later in a lawsuit. Yet courts have not usually explained in this way their tolerance for unilateral, peremptory creditor self-help, apparently seeing the difficulty of reconciling such an account with prevailing due process doctrine for cases of seizure by state officers, which strictly requires the state to provide some kind of judicial supervision, and a hearing for the deprivee as promptly as the case permits.

Courts instead have seen the issue presented by private self-help activities as one of state action, and, as in the Flagg Brothers case, have concluded that the due process guarantee has no application to such activities however much they may practically depend on the support of law. The reason for this judicial diffidence, as important as it is simple, is the difficulty of distinguishing in principle between the due process claim raised by the case of the self-helping creditor and that raised by many, if not all, other cases of intentional or foreseeable infliction, by private agents, of civilly actionable harm, that is, of torts, breaches of contract, breaches of trust, and so forth. Often, if not always, it will be possible to show compellingly how the law has contributed directly to the occasion or motive for committing the injurious act or to the injurer's practical power to inflict it, or to the practical defenselessness of the victim. But the idea of a constitutional right to a predeprivation hearing, or even an accelerated postdeprivation hearing, in all cases of ordinary private legal wrongs stretches due process too far. Every ordinary contract dispute cannot be a constitutional case.

Thus courts have been led to conclude that the deprivations of property wrought by private creditor self-help are not violations of due process for the reason that they are not attributable to the state. The position is that due process generally is not concerned with exercises of power by persons not identified with the state or perceived as acting on its behalf, in forms not conventionally understood as distinctive to the state. This position is unfortunately at odds with the premise which apparently underlies recognition of the due process rights of civil plaintiffs—the premise, that is, of an affirmative state duty to protect the persons and possessions of inhabitants against gross violation by private as well as public agents.

The difficulty is of a kind that logically must appear somewhere within any body of constitutional doctrine in which a first aim is that of securing spheres of individual liberty against social coercion, and a first institutional device is that of legal rights, themselves an obvious form of collective force. In the constitutionalist vision there is indissoluble tension between law's aim, personal liberty, and its instrument, state power. In this field of contradictory forces are situated all legal rights, including due process rights. Thus it happens that the same due process claims which from one viewpoint represent the state's liberating engagement to protect each person against incursion by others or by the social aggregate, from another perspective represent the state's oppressive oversight of affairs perhaps better and more properly left to the concerned individuals.

In no setting is the dilemma more evident than in that of the family, which in our culture has most strongly represented the value of social solidarity as opposed to that of individuals severally free to treat at arm's length in civil society. PARHAM V. J. R. (1979), a case in which due process claims were asserted on behalf of a minor child being committed by parents to a mental institution, illustrates the difficulty. The Court there assumed "that a [minor] child has a protectable interest . . . in not being . . . erroneously" committed; said that parents must be generally supposed to act in their children's best interests; said that "the risk of error inherent in the parental decision . . . [is] sufficiently great" that parental discretion cannot be "absolute and unreviewable"; and concluded, not resoundingly, that "some kind of inquiry should be made by a 'neutral fact finder' to determine whether . . . [the child] satisf[ies] the medical standards for admission."

Of the largest questions of current meaning and future role for due process in our civic culture, the Supreme Court's irresolute posture in the Parham case is emblematic. If due process is an epitome of libertarian law, it is also—by the same token, Max Weber would advise—an epitome of bureaucratic law. Due process as we know it is a hallmark of a formally rational law designed to liberate as it organizes and orders: to liberate energy and will by the promise of regularity, calculability, and impartiality, and by insistent strong demarcation of the private from the public sphere.

But our due process is a hallmark, too, of hierarchical formal ordering; that is, of ordering by preordained rules emanating from specialized governing authorities (representative or accountable as those authorities may be, of or to the governed). There are always spheres of life in which due process is problematic because those spheres want ordering that is more contextual and less abstract, more responsive and less prefigured, more empathic and less impersonal, more interactive and less distanced, more participatory and less authoritative, than what "due process" has traditionally signified. Conversely, "due process" invokes sensibilities resistant to a general movement toward a more thoroughly democratized polity, in which the personal and the political aspects of life would be much less sharply separated than we have tended to keep them. In any such movement due process would necessarily be transformed—transformed but not discarded, since we are unlikely to forsake the ideals of reason, voice, and dignity, or the conviction that individuals are not just parts of social wholes.

FRANK I. MICHELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

BREST, PAUL 1982 State Action and Liberal Theory: A Casenote on Flagg Brothers v. Brooks. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 130:1296–1330.

FRIENDLY, HENRY J. 1975 Some Kind of Hearing. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 123:1267–1317.

KADISH, STANFORD 1957 Methodology and Criteria in Due Process Adjudication—A Survey and Criticism. Yale Law Journal 66:319–363.

MASHAW, JERRY L. 1983 Bureaucratic Justice: Managing Social Security Disability Claims. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

MICHELMAN, FRANK 1977 Formal and Associational Aims in Procedural Due Process. Pages 126–171 in J. Roland Pennock and John Chapman, eds., Nomos XVIII: Due Process New York: New York University Press.

MINOW, MARTHA 1985 Beyond State Intervention in the Family: For Baby Jane Doe. Michigan Journal of Law Reform 18: 933–1014.

MONOGHAN, HENRY 1977 Of "Liberty" and "Property." Cornell Law Review 62:405–444.

REICH, CHARLES 1964 The New Property. Yale Law Journal 73:733–787.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM 1977 Cracks in "The New Property": Adjudicative Due Process in the Administrative State. Cornell Law Review 62:445–493.

PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, CIVIL
(Update 1)

A claim for procedural due process is a claim that the government cannot undertake a particular act vis-à-vis an individual or set of individuals without according them an opportunity to be heard. Depending upon the situation, a consitutionally adequate opportunity to be heard may be involve a "hearing" that is written or oral and may occur before or after the alleged "deprivation" has occurred. The contexts in which the issue of procedural due process arises vary; included among the litigants who have raised procedural due process challenges heard by the United States Supreme Court since the mid-1980s are PRISONERS, ALIENS, food stamp recipients, veterans, and college athletes.

A procedural due process claim is not a challenge that the government is absolutely forbidden to act in a particular way. Rather, a procedural due process challenge is that as a predicate to action, the government must accord the person(s) subject to the action with a set of procedural safeguards, designed to make the government's decision more accurate and to recognize the dignitary and participatory interests in process that both the person(s) and society have.

Making the distinction in practice between SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS and procedural due process, however, is not always easy. For example, many due process opinions discuss whether or not a court in one jurisdiction can hale an outsider (a citizen of another state or country) before it and what jurisdiction's law may constitutionally be applied to that lawsuit. For more than a century, the Supreme Court has talked about these cases as raising due process problems, but has not always identified which kind of due process was at issue. Only relatively recently have commentators discussed such issues as substantive due process questions—despite the fact that the issue arises in the context of where and how to conduct a lawsuit. Another illustration is a group of due process cases that address access to EVIDENCE. In Arizona v. Youngblood (1988) the Supreme Court held that upon specific request of defendants, prosecutors have some obligation to disclose exculpatory information in their possession, but, absent bad faith on the part of police, "failure to preserve potentially useful evidence does not constitute denial of due process of law." Once again, although the rights involved related to litigation, the Court did not specify the kind of due process at issue but relied on a substantive due process analysis.

Supreme Court doctrine requires that for one to bring a procedural due process claim, two prefatory elements be established—STATE ACTION and intent. Knowing when the state is acting is not always easy. For example, the Supreme Court concluded in National Collegiate Athletic Association v. Tarkanian (1987) that the National Collegiate Athletic Association was not engaged in state action, despite the fact that its 960 members include "virtually all public and private universities and four-year colleges conducting major athletic programs in the United States." Second, the governmental action must be intentional. In Daniels v. Williams (1986) the Supreme Court held that "the Due Process Clause is simply not implicated by a negligent act of an official causing unintended loss of or injury to life, liberty or property."

Once a claim has cleared the hurdles of intentional deprivations by government action, two more questions remain: (1) Does the governmental action threaten to deprive one of "life," "liberty," or "property"? (2) If so, how much process is due? The answers from the Supreme Court have limited both the instances when the clause applies and the quantum of process due.

"Property" continues to include both traditionally understood material possessions and state-created benefits, such as SOCIAL SECURITY, licenses, and other statutorily defined restrictions on governmental action. However, statutory ENTITLEMENTS (whether characterized as "property" or "liberty") are now read more restrictively. To show such entitlement, the legislative or regulatory statement has to be positivistic (i.e., X "shall" occur) and the limits on official discretion must be express (i.e., X shall occur unless the official finds A, B, or C).

The question of what process is due might have many answers. For example, one might transfer the CRIMINAL PROCEDURE requirements elaborated in the United States Constitution to the context of civil proceedings. (The line between "civil" and "criminal" is itself a complex one to draw; for example, the state may be a party, and seek penalties, in many civil contexts.) The Constitution is itself relatively silent about what procedures are to be provided in civil lawsuits. Article III sets forth the requirements for the federal judiciary, but its provisions are largely structural. The SEVENTH AMENDMENT "preserves" the right to a TRIAL BY JURY in federal court and places some limits on appellate review of jury verdicts. The FIRST AMENDMENT speaks of the right to petition for redress, and the Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, include "due process" clauses but do not specify what process is due.

The doctrinal answer to the question of the amount of process due—supplied by Supreme Court interpretations of the due process clauses—continues to rely upon the adversarial, judicial model as its touchstone, but increasingly the Court has accepted departures from that model as constitutionally sufficient. The Court's formula in MATHEWS V. ELDRIDGE (1976) remains a vital part of the analysis of how much process is due. A court asks about the private interest at stake, the government interest at stake (often assumed to be the conservation of resources by having inexpensive process), and the risk of error in the current procedure as compared to the risk of error if additional procedural safeguards were in place. Commentators have observed that this utilitarian approach assumes that accuracy is the only goal of the process accorded.

Moreover, none of the three prongs of the test can be measured; the Court's utilitarian cost-benefit analysis may mask the subjectivity of the measurements of the costs and benefits. To the extent courts attempt to ascertain both, it is difficult, if not impossible, to measure the harms of false positives (giving benefits when the state should withhold them) and false negatives (withholding benefits when the state should grant them).

As a result of this approach, the Court frequently approves of minimal procedural safeguards. One example comes from the context of prison litigation, in which the Court, in Superintendent, Massachusetts Correctional Institution v. Hill (1985), permitted a relatively low standard of evidentiary proof ("some evidence") when prisoners' good-time credits are revoked and they must remain incarcerated. Another illustration comes from Brock v. Roadway Express, Inc. (1987), in which a trucking company challenged the secretary of transportation's order to reinstate a trucker who allegedly had been a whistleblower and complained about the company's safety regulations. The Court concluded that although the company had the right to be informed of relevant evidence supporting the grievant, the company had no right to a "live" evidentiary hearing prior to being required to reinstate the trucker temporarily. Further, the Court, in Walters v. National Association of Radiation Survivors (1985), refused to hold that civil litigants have a procedural due process RIGHT TO COUNSEL whenever they contest government decisions.

One aspect of the entitlement- or process-due approach of the Supreme Court reveals the analytic limits of current doctrine. In ARNETT V. KENNEDY (1974) the Supreme Court faced a statute that both created (in the Court's terms) an entitlement to a job and also provided a specific and limited set of procedures to determine whether termination of employment was appropriate. A plurality of the Court upheld the package as having provided all the process due; Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST remarked that the employee had to accept the "bitter with the sweet." When the Supreme Court faced the issue again in Cleveland Board of Education v. Loudermill (1985), a majority held that while the question of whether an entitlement (a "property" interest) existed was to be decided by reference to statutory statements, the question of what process is due was one reserved for the Court. The current state of the law as expressed in Loudermill has a conceptual flaw: why conclude that the question of interpreting "property" in the due process clauses is to be decided by deferring to the legislature but that the "process due" is to be determined solely by the Court?

Another aspect of the CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION problem remains unclear: How great a role should the legislature play in defining "liberty"? Some opinions suggest that deference to the legislature is appropriate to decide whether liberty rights or PROPERTY RIGHTS are at stake, while other opinions suggest that liberty is not, and can never be, dependent upon positive legislative enactment. The issue arose in Kentucky Department of Corrections v. Thompson (1989), in which a majority of the Court concluded that prisoners' interests in "unfettered visitation" by nonprisoners is not "guaranteed directly by the Due Process Clause," while Justices THURGOOD MARSHALL, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, and JOHN PAUL STEVENS concluded that "the exercise of such unbridled governmental power over the basic human need to see family members and friends strikes at the heart of the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause." In contrast, the Supreme Court, in Lassiter v. Department of Social Services (1981), assumed without discussion the existence of a liberty interest in being provided a lawyer when a parent faced state termination of her right to parent.

Writing in this encyclopedia in 1986, Frank Michelman noted that the critique of the due process model frequently arose from challenges to decision making by agencies, in the "pressure of the "mass justice' conditions imposed by modern governmental benefit programs involving very large numbers of eligibility decisions." Since then, the same issue—pressures of "mass justice"—have moved from the context of agencies to the context of courts. Contemporary commentary focuses on the question of what process is due when considering the adequacy of procedure in the federal and state courts. Of late, judicial decision making has been much criticized as too slow, too expensive, too cumbersome, and too unresponsive to litigants' needs. Suggested alternatives, often labeled "alternative dispute resolution" (ADR), range from simplified trials and court-annexed arbitration to judicially conducted settlement programs and diversion to noncourt-based decision making assistance. Some of these programs are then challenged on various grounds, such as that they fail to accord procedural due process, they unduly burden state or federally based rights to a jury trial, and they exceed the powers authorized to courts or to judges.

The creation and growing popularity of ADR mechanisms and the criticism of court-based adjudicatory mechanisms lend further strength to the weakening of the procedural due process model, at least as exemplified by GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970), in which the Court required an evidentiary hearing prior to the termination of WELFARE BENEFITS. Proponents of ADR argue that the formal, trial-like model embodied in Goldberg has proven inadequate and that other modes are to be preferred. These modes are generally less formal, lawyer-free, and conducted in private; they may use arbitrators or mediators in lieu of judges. The claims (debated in the literature and by empirical studies) are that such modes are speedier and more economic and that they produce better outcomes than does trial.

The increased reliance on procedural requirements, the "due process model," has been criticized not only by those who seek to conserve the expenditure of private and government resources but also by those who challenge government action but question the utility of the means. Some argue that procedural requirements wrongly place the risk of error on the state; others, who are proponents of state aid, argue the procedural due process model implicit in Goldberg wrongly equates procedural regularity and adversarial modes with good outcomes. Commentators have wondered about the utility of providing procedural opportunities to individuals with few, if any, resources to exercise them. For example, of what value is the right of cross-examination if no provision is made for a state-paid attorney? Given the resource disparities between government and individuals, procedural due process may create a façade of legitimacy for decisions that are intrinsically unfair. At a more fundamental level, this critique questions the assumptions of procedural due process opinions that a conflict between the state and the individual is inevitable. The hope is that communitarian approaches may well hold more promise for giving indigent individuals access to the riches of society. Those who endorse the Goldberg paradigm have been criticized for their limited vision—premised upon a classic liberal assumption of autonomous individuals confronting the state and relying on legalistic solutions.

In response, proponents of the Goldberg paradigm, while sympathetic to communitarian goals, note that the state "as friend" almost never materializes. Further, the formality of the Goldberg procedures embodies hopes of empowering actors otherwise less powerful. Although not a comprehensive solution, the requirement of formal procedure may be better than its absence. Moreover, many within the legal services community who participated in the Goldberg litigation did not, at the time, see its goal as procedural reform. Claims around procedural rights were used as organizing tools; the hopes were that procedural reform, along with changes in other court-based rules, such as greater use of CLASS ACTIONS, the provision of free attorneys, and easier ACCESS TO THE COURTS, would all result in diminished social inequities. Yet another possibility is that the classic due process conception of the state versus an individual can be reenvisioned as an interaction of the state, an individual, and the community in which both litigants are situated. The debate about the utility of the procedural due process model is still alive in this decade, as conferences and law-review articles address the problems of what kinds of dispute resolution governments should be offering, funding, and encouraging.

One's view of procedure, of the aspirations of Goldberg, of the limits imposed under the Mathews approach, and of the critique from both the Right and the Left depends in large measure upon one's understanding of the proper role of the state and of the relationship between government and individuals. Procedure (procedural due process included) is a vehicle for the expression of political and social values—a vision of a state in need of restraint or not, a vision of human dignity as enhanced or not enhanced by formalized interaction between decision maker and individual.

JUDITH RESNIK
(1992)

Bibliography

COVER, ROBERT M. et al. 1988 Procedure. New York: Foundation Press.

DELGADO, RICHARD et al. 1985 Fairness and Formality: Minimizing the Risk of Prejudice in Alternative Dispute Resolution. Wisconsin Law Review 1985:1359–1404.

HANDLER, JOEL 1986 The Conditions of Discretion: Autonomy, Community, Bureaucracy. New York: Russell Sage Foundation.

LIND, E. ALLEN et al. 1989 The Perception of Justice: Tort Litigants' Views of the Civil Justice System. Santa Monica, Calif.: Rand Corporation, Institute for Civil Justice.

RESNIK, JUDITH 1986 Failing Faith: Adjudicatory Procedure in Decline. University of Chicago Law Review 53:494–560.

SPARER, EDWARD 1984 Fundamental Human Rights, Legal Entitlements, and the Social Struggle: A Friendly Critique of the Critical Legal Studies Movement. Stanford Law Review 36:509–574.

PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, CIVIL
(Update 2)

Procedural DUE PROCESS presupposes that the state may take a "liberty or property interest" when it has a good reason, and addresses the procedures required when it does so. The constitutionally required procedures ensure that state decisions depriving individuals of protected interests are fairly made and reasonably correct, insofar as our decisional methods allow. The determinative test balances private against governmental interests and considers the risk of error inherent in particular procedures. In general, the more important the private interest, the more fair and accurate the procedures must be. As the government's interest becomes more significant, and as procedural costs increase, the state may seek to adopt more summary procedures, less protective of private interests.

The more important the interest the government seeks to take, the more the required procedures will approximate the adversary trial paradigm. When the state seeks to take any truly important interest, and where facts are in issue, procedural due process requires notice, an oral hearing, presentation of evidence before an impartial decisionmaker, an opportunity to confront and cross-examine witnesses, counsel, and a decision on the basis of the record. Where someone will suffer serious injury pending a hearing, such as a terminated employee with no possibility of reinstatement or back pay, there should be some predeprivation hearing. Where the private interest is less important, procedural requirements are less substantial, and other exceptions turn on the taking's redressability, seriousness, and the state's need for quick and economic action. A summary predeprivation hearing, with notice, opportunity to respond, and a decision whether there are grounds to act will often serve. If necessary, a more substantial postdeprivation hearing may then follow. In emergencies, such as the need to destroy diseased animals, or where the taking harm is negligible or readily redressable, a postdeprivation hearing satisfies.

An important line of procedural due process cases deals with the question of what process the state must give when private parties seek state aid in taking another's PROPERTY, as in cases involving ex parte prejudgment attachments or garnishments. Here the balancing is between competing private interests, but as there is state involvement, procedural due process requirements apply. The Court has consistently held, as in the most recent case, Connecticut v. Doehr (1991), that, extraordinary circumstances aside, there must be a preattachment hearing.

The state may also act ex parte, for example when seizing property through CIVIL FORFEITURE proceedings. Where the property is movable, an extraordinary circumstance, the government may seize it ex parte without notice and hearing. Where real property is involved, as in United States v. James Daniel Good Real Property (1993), notice and a hearing are required, even though the seizure is justified under the FOURTH AMENDMENT. Procedural due process is an independent constitutional requirement, and forfeiture proceedings seek to take property, not merely use it as evidence.

Because procedural due process is a federal constitutional guarantee, its violation creates a federal CIVIL RIGHTS action against state officials. It may also constitute a state cause of action, such as a conversion tort when a prison guard unlawfully takes a prisoner's property. This raises a FEDERALISM concern about constitutionalizing tort litigation involving state officials. Note also that if the state provides an action for the aggrieved party, it may thereby supply all the procedural due process required, at least where a postdeprivation hearing is adequate. The Supreme Court, therefore, held in Daniels v. Williams (1986) that procedural due process protects only against deliberate, not negligent, state deprivations of protected interests. Even a deliberate state deprivation, as where a state official, "unauthorized" to do so, intentionally violates rights, may not require special procedures where there is nothing the state could have done to prevent random and unpredictable deprivations. Where, however, as in Zinermon v. Burch (1990), the state can institute predeprivation procedural safeguards to address a risk of deprivation—in other words, when the risk is reasonably predictable—it must do so.

GARY GOODPASTER
(2000)

Bibliography

MASHAW, JERRY L. 1985 Due Process in the Administrative State. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, CRIMINAL

The Barons at Runnymede did better than they knew. When they induced King John in 1215 to announce in MAGNA CARTA that no man should be imprisoned or dispossessed "except by the lawful judgment of his peers and by the LAW OF THE LAND," they laid the basis for a text that was to have greater significance in the development of American constitutional law than any other. In time "judgment of his peers" and "law of the land" came to be rendered alternatively as DUE PROCESS OF LAW and in that form were adopted in the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution as a restriction upon the federal government: "No person shall . . . be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law." In 1868, substantially the same language was employed in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT as a restriction upon the states. Thus was embedded in the Constitution a phrase whose exegesis was to generate hundreds of decisions, libraries of commentary, and unending controversy, to this day. The Supreme Court has, over the years, used the due process clause to develop a variety of substantive restraints upon the power of government. This article, however, will deal only with the sense of due process closest to its original conception, namely, as the source of restrictions on the procedures through which governmental authority may be exercised over the individual in criminal cases.

In determining the procedures the Constitution requires of the federal government in criminal cases, the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment has been of limited significance. The BILL OF RIGHTS contains a variety of provisions explicitly directed to CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, and these rather than the due process clause have served as the principal vehicles for the development of a constitutional law of criminal procedure. So, for example, the Supreme Court has developed the constitutional law of permissible SEARCH AND SEIZURE through interpretations of the FOURTH AMENDMENT; the constitutional law with respect to DOUBLE JEOPARDY and the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION through interpretations of the Fifth Amendment; the constitutional law with respect to SPEEDY and PUBLIC TRIAL, TRIAL BY JURY, NOTICE, CONFRONTATION, of opposing witnesses, and the RIGHT TO COUNSEL through interpretations of the Sixth Amendment; and the constitutional law barring excessive BAIL, fines, and CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT through interpretations of the Eighth Amendment. On the other hand, in determining the procedures the Constitution requires of state governments the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment has played the significant and decisive role.

What due process of law required and by what principles its meaning was to be ascertained were questions that were to preoccupy the Court for generations. They were raised early in MURRAY'S LESSEE V. HOBOKEN LAND IMPROVEMENT CO. (1856), a civil case involving the meaning of the Fifth Amendment's due process clause: "The Constitution contains no description of those procedures which it was intended to allow or forbid. It does not even declare what principles are to be applied to ascertain whether it be due process. It is manifest that it was not left to the legislative power to enact any process that might be devised. The article is a restraint on the legislative as well as on the executive and judicial powers of government, and cannot be so construed as to leave Congress free to make any process 'due process of law' by its mere will." Nor, as the Court might have added, could the article be so construed as to leave the Court free to determine what is and what is not due process by its mere will. The effort of the Court to come to terms with this challenge is the central feature of the constitutional history of due process.

An early effort to state a principle for interpreting due process was the test of whether a procedure was in accord with settled practices in England before the Revolution and not rejected here after settlement. A practice that met this test accorded due process; a practice that did not failed to accord due process. The test served its purpose in some cases, but it soon proved insufficient, for whatever value it had as a fixed determinant of meaning was overbalanced by its inability to reflect changing times and needs and evolving perceptions of what fairness requires. For example, the settled English practice of initiating a prosecution, customarily continued in this country, was INDICTMENT by a GRAND JURY. Did this mean that due process fastened that procedure upon the states? This was the question at issue in HURTADO V. CALIFORNIA (1884), where the Court faced a California innovation permitting a prosecutor to initiate a prosecution by filing an INFORMATION on his own, after a preliminary hearing before a magistrate on whether there was sufficient cause. The Court upheld the procedure despite its deviance from settled practice because it could find in the new procedure no significant prejudice to the rights of the accused. More decisive than the state of English practice was whether the challenged procedure comported with "those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions." To regard established usage as "essential to due process of law would be to deny every quality of the law but its age, and to render it incapable of progress or improvement." Thus, the Court limited the traditional test: a practice sanctioned by immemorial usage necessarily accorded due process, but one not so sanctioned was not necessarily inconsistent with due process. In time, however, the Court rejected the remaining limb of the test as well. It had been well settled in England that a FELONY defendant had no right to be represented by counsel, and although that had been rejected in the United States Constitution and in the states, the change had not gone so far as to require appointment of counsel for INDIGENT defendants. In POWELL V. ALABAMA (1932) the Court held nevertheless that the failure to appoint counsel for uneducated and indigent defendants in a capital case in circumstances in which they had no real opportunity to present a defense denied due process of law. Of more significance to the Court was its judgment of the "fundamental nature" of the right to be represented by counsel, which in these circumstances was essential to the right to be heard at all.

The test, then, that came to prevail in judging the constitutionality of procedures in state criminal prosecutions was that of fundamental fairness in the circumstances of the particular case. Over the years a variety of formulations were used in an effort to give greater content to the test. Concerning each procedural safeguard that was being asserted, the Court would ask whether it was "of the very essence of a scheme of ORDERED LIBERTY," or whether a "fair and enlightened system of justice would be impossible without it," or whether "liberty and justice" would exist if it were sacrificed, or whether it was among those "immutable principles of justice, acknowledged . . . wherever the good life is a subject of concern." Concerning the procedure applied in the contested prosecution, the Court asked whether it violated a "principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental," or whether its use subjected a person to "a hardship so acute and shocking that our polity would not endure it," or whether it offended "those canons of decency and fairness which express the notions of justice of English-speaking peoples even toward those charged with the most heinous offenses," for due process "embodies a system of rights based on moral principles so deeply imbedded in the traditions and feelings of our people as to be deemed fundamental to a civilized society as conceived by our whole history."

Whether any or all of these phrases succeeded in accomplishing anything more than to remit the issue to the intuitive sense of fairness of each Justice; whether, as Justice HUGO L. BLACK asked in ROCHIN V. CALIFORNIA (1952), there could possibly be "avenues of investigation . . . open to discover 'canons' of conduct so universally favored that this Court should write them into the Constitution" were issues that troubled the Justices and commentators alike. These doubts led to the development of an alternative test to determine the meaning of due process; namely, that due process should be taken to mean no more and no less than the specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights. In short, the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment "incorporated" as restrictions upon the states the provisions of the first eight amendments originally written as restrictions upon the federal government. The first Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN was the first to advance the argument in several of his dissenting opinions, including Hurtado and O'Neil v. Vermont (1892). The issue was revived in modern times when Justice Black took up the cudgels in Adamson v. California (1947).

The Adamson case involved the constitutionality of California law allowing adverse comment to the jury on a defendant's failure to explain or deny evidence against him. In a federal prosecution this practice would have violated the Fifth Amendment's right against self-incrimination. But, of course, under the settled doctrine this was not determinative. The Court had to find that this particular aspect of the self-incrimination privilege—that which disallowed comment on its exercise—was essential to fundamental fairness to the defendant, and this the majority declined to do. The majority could find nothing in the California practice that denied the defendant a FAIR TRIAL. He was not compelled to testify. True, if he did testify he would open the record to evidence of his prior convictions, but, "When evidence is before a jury that threatens conviction, it does not seem unfair to require him to choose between leaving the adverse evidence unexplained and subjecting himself to impeachment through disclosure of former crimes." Justice Black dissented, arguing that a violation of the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination was necessarily a denial of due process under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Justice Black's arguments in favor of the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE, as first announced in Adamson and developed in later opinions, notably in his concurrence in DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968), were grounded in a study of the history of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, which convinced him that it was the intent of the amendment's framers that it should incorporate the Bill of Rights as a restraint upon the states. For Black, the Constitution did not endow the Court with power to expand and contract the meaning of due process to accord with the Court's assessment of what fundamental fairness required at any particular time. The fundamental fairness test was a resort to "natural law," depending "entirely on the particular judge's idea of ethics and morals instead of requiring him to depend on the boundaries fixed by the written words of the Constitution." Such a test was inconsistent with "the great design of a written Constitution." The specific language of the Bill of Rights would confine the power of the Court to read its own predilections into the Constitution.

Moreover, Black believed that the Bill of Rights, more reliably than the fundamental fairness test, would guide the Court to outcomes consistent with the values of a democratic society. In Black's view the judgment of the Framers of the Constitution would serve better than each Justice's personal judgment in determining what fairness required in criminal prosecutions. Indeed, the record of the Court's administration of its fundamental fairness test was for Black the clearest demonstration of his argument. He was speaking hyperbolically when he said in Rochin that the traditional test had been used "to nullify the Bill of Rights," but the fact was that in most instances the Court, as in Adamson, had used the fairness standard to uphold state convictions that would have been reversible had the specific provisions of the Bill of Rights been applicable.

Black's primary antagonist on this use, as on many others, was Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, in later years joined by the second Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN. They rejected Black's interpretation of the history of the Fourteenth Amendment's adoption, finding no plausible evidence that it was intended to incorporate the Bill of Rights as a restraint upon the states. But, beyond that, they advanced a very different approach to CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. According to Frankfurter and Harlan, the provisions of the first eight amendments were not equally fundamental. Some, like the guarantees of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and religion, stated enduring values and were, therefore, binding on the states through the "independent potency" of the Fourteenth Amendment. Others, such as those protecting the right against self-incrimination and jury trials, "express the restricted views of Eighteenth-Century England regarding the best methods for the ascertainment of facts." Not every procedure that was historically protected by these provisions was necessary for fundamental fairness, though some might be of this character. Still others, such as the requirement of a grand jury indictment and the right to a jury in civil cases where the amount in controversy exceeded twenty dollars, were largely historical relics. The terms of the Bill of Rights, all of them and only them, were, therefore, an unsuitable text for carrying out the commands of fundamental justice embodied in the requirement of due process of law. Changing circumstances would create new and unforeseen problems, casting new light on the question whether a given procedural guarantee was "fundamental." Only an evolving and flexible due process could assure preservation of the procedural requirements of a free society without binding the criminal process unnecessarily to the forms of the past.

Justices Frankfurter and Harlan conceded that the Court had sustained state procedures whose use would have been forbidden under the Bill of Rights. What mattered, however, was that it had done so only after satisfying itself in each case that the defendant had not been denied fundamental fairness. For example, the Fifth Amendment might forbid a federal prosecutor to APPEAL a conviction of a lesser offense than that charged and to prosecute under the original indictment if the appeal succeeds, but, as the Court held in Palko v. Connecticut (1937), the requirements of civilized justice would not be compromised by permitting a state to continue a similar prosecution until it achieved a trial free of substantial error. A jury of twelve persons might be required of federal prosecutions by the Sixth Amendment, but, as the Court held in Maxwell v. Dow (1900), it did not follow that a person could not receive a fundamentally fair trial in a state court before a jury of fewer members. Where, on the other hand, state practices fatally infected the justice of the convictions—as in Powell v. Alabama (1932) where the accused was deprived of a fair opportunity to present a defense, or in BROWN V. MISSISSIPPI (1936), where torture was used to extract a confession, or in MOORE V. DEMPSEY (1923) where the trial itself was a sham and a pretense—the Court did not hesitate to employ the fundamental fairness standard of due process to strike down the convictions.

In addition, Justices Frankfurter and Harlan emphasized the importance of the Court's avoiding excessive intrusions into the autonomy of the states. The Framers had deliberately chosen to create a federal rather than a wholly centralized system, partly to assure the limitation of power through its dispersal but also to obtain the benefits of autonomy and diversity in state government. Total incorporation of the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment would impose a constitutional straitjacket on the states, stifling experimentation by the states in the administration of justice in the name of an unneeded uniformity.

As for the peril of judges' confusing their purely personal preferences with the requirements of the Constitution, Frankfurter and Harlan argued that this risk was inherent in JUDICIAL REVIEW—no less under the incorporation doctrine than under the fundamental fairness test. Giving meaning to particular provisions of the Bill of Rights, whose major provisions were written in open and general terms, would require judicial inquiry equally broad and open. The peril of judgment on the basis of personal preferences, they argued, must be met by judicial deference to the judgment of state governments and by a rigorous search for the fundamentals of fairness required by the nature and commitments of our society.

Though Justice Black lost the debate in Adamson, he continued to advance the cause of total incorporation to his final days on the Court. He never succeeded in persuading a majority, but although he lost some battles he won the war. When the dust cleared two decades after Adamson, the fundamental fairness standard (though significantly modified) still reigned as the accepted test of due process, but every provision of the Bill of Rights bearing on criminal procedure, with the single exception of the requirement of grand jury indictments, had been held applicable to the states.

This development occurred through the increased use of the strategy of SELECTIVE INCORPORATION, under which selected clauses of the Bill of Rights were held to be binding on the states as such in the view that they were required by fundamental fairness. Consistency with prior decisions was grounded in the view that what the Court had repeatedly rejected was the theory of total incorporation, not the view that some provisions of the Bill of Rights could be binding on the states through the due process clause. As Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO, an early opponent of the total incorporation doctrine, had observed in PALKO V. CONNECTICUT (1937): "In [certain] situations immunities that are valid as against the federal government by force of the specific pledges of particular amendments have been found to be implicit in the concept of ordered liberty and thus, through the Fourteenth Amendment, become valid as against the states." Yet it is important to note that this justification for the new doctrine blurred an important distinction in the traditional view, which was that some rights protected by the provisions of the Bill of Rights might prove so central to ordered liberty that they were also binding on the states through the due process clause. This was not to say, however, that certain provisions of the Bill of Rights, in their entirety with all their interpretations, were incorporated by the due process clause.

In the decade following Adamson the Court was apparently not yet ready to take this leap from the traditional view to the new doctrine of selective incorporation. Instead, the Court developed a number of significant expansions in its conception of what fundamental fairness required that prepared the ground for the flowering of the selective incorporation theory a decade later. An early important instance was WOLF V. COLORADO (1949), in which the Court held, in an opinion by Justice Frankfurter, that "the security of one's privacy against arbitrary intrusion by the police—which is at the core of the Fourth Amendment—. . . is implicit in "the concept of ordered liberty" and hence enforceable against the states through the due process clause. Still, the opinion was careful not to say that the Fourth Amendment as such was applicable to the states, and the Court declined to apply the remedy it had developed for enforcing the Fourth Amendment in federal prosecutions—excluding the unlawfully seized evidence. Other cases carried the movement forward. The Court in Rochin found that pumping an accused's stomach to obtain incriminating evidence was so "shocking to the conscience" that due process required the conviction to be reversed. Increasingly the Court found the failure to appoint counsel for indigent defendants to violate due process under the "totality of circumstances" rule of BETTS V. BRADY (1942), which required specific prejudice to be identified in the record. The circumstances in which the Court held confessions involuntary and, therefore, barred by due process were extended in Spano v. New York (1959) beyond physical coercion to include situations in which the defendant's will had been overborne by more subtle means of influence, such as persistent interrogation and trickery.

In the 1960s, however, the traditional test of fundamental fairness yielded to selective incorporation as the Court's dominant approach in reviewing the constitutionality of state prosecutions. A change of mood had taken place. For a variety of reasons—change in the composition of the Court, the CIVIL RIGHTS movement, the "War against Poverty"—the consensus on the Supreme Court moved toward greater intervention on behalf of criminal defendants, the great majority of whom were poor and members of minority groups. The continued enlargement case by case of the requirements of "fundamental fairness" was one possible alternative. But if, as the Justices apparently increasingly believed, excesses in the states' administration of criminal justice required extensive judicial correction, then something more was needed than the power to intervene in occasional cases of gross injustice. As a consequence the 1960s saw one of the remarkable accomplishments of the Warren Court—the federalization of state criminal procedure through the selective incorporation of the Bill of Rights.

Mapp v. Ohio (1961) marked the beginning. Effective control of state law enforcement required a constitutional remedy for law enforcement excesses. The EXCLUSIONARY RULE, which barred admission of unconstitutionally obtained evidence, had been developed decades earlier as a remedy in federal prosecutions. In Wolf v. Colorado the Court had declined to apply the exclusionary rule to the states, saying that a conviction based on reliable physical evidence was not fundamentally unfair just because the police had obtained the evidence by unconstitutional means. In Mapp the Court overruled that holding. The Court had, after all, already held in Wolf that the Fourth Amendment's RIGHT OF PRIVACY was enforceable against the states. It seemed natural to take the further step of holding that the remedy used to enforce Fourth Amendment privacy rights against federal violations was no less required to enforce "due process" privacy rights against state violations. If Fourth Amendment rights were basic to liberty, so must be the only practical means for their enforcement.

The next major case, GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963), also had features that made it a relatively easy case for extending selective incorporation. The Court had earlier held in Betts that appointment of counsel for indigents, though required by the Sixth Amendment for federal prosecutions, was not necessarily a fundamental right protected by due process. In the special circumstances of some particular prosecution, failure to appoint counsel might constitute a lack of fundamental fairness, but absence of counsel would not necessarily create this level of prejudice in every case. However, the "special circumstances" doctrine was gradually undermined in successive cases as the Court increasingly was able to find those circumstances in cases that were typical. As Justice Harlan observed, "The Court had come to realize . . . that the mere existence of a serious criminal charge constituted in itself special circumstances requiring the services of counsel at trial." Against this background there was little resistance to overruling Betts and, in the process, holding that the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of counsel was one of those clauses which fundamental fairness required to be imposed upon the states by the Fourteenth Amendment.

From then on scarcely a TERM of Court in the 1960s went by without the Court's OVERRULING some prior case to hold that an additional provision of the Bill of Rights was necessary to fundamental fairness and was, therefore, incorporated in due process. In 1965, in Griffin v. California, the Court overruled Adamson and held that the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination was protected by due process. The Sixth Amendment right to confrontation of witnesses was held to be incorporated in Pointer v. Texas (1965), and the rights to a speedy and public trial and to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses were also held to be incorporated in KLOPFER V. NORTH CAROLINA and Washington v. Texas (1967). In DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968), the Court overruled earlier decisions and held that the Sixth Amendment's right to a jury trial was incorporated in due process. In BENTON V. MARYLAND (1969), Palko was overruled and the double jeopardy provision was held applicable to the states. The job was done. To all intents and purposes, the contours of due process of law required of the states by the Fourteenth Amendment had come to be defined by the specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights limiting the federal government.

One may fairly ask of this constitutional tour de force how well it was defended in doctrinal analysis. The position favoring total incorporation had a forceful logic: once the initial premise was accepted, it followed that every provision of the Bill of Rights and every interpretation of those provisions developed for federal prosecutions should apply equally to state prosecutions. But how was the theory of selective incorporation to be justified? Did the Court seriously mean that all the rights the Court had previously found in selected provisions of the Bill of Rights—such as the jury trial provision of the Sixth Amendment, the Fifth Amendment's protection against self-incrimination, the Fourth Amendment restraints upon search and seizure (including the right to have even reliable evidence excluded if it were unlawfully obtained)—all were so fundamental that "a fair and enlightened system of justice would be impossible" without them? This conclusion could scarcely stand scrutiny. As the Court had noted in earlier cases holding these guarantees unprotected by due process, a large portion of the democratic world, with claims to a civilized and enlightened system of justice no less strong than ours, offers no such guarantees.

Very little effort was made to address this challenge until Justice BYRON R. WHITE (in a footnote, ironically) did so in his opinion for the Court in Duncan v. Louisiana (1968), holding the jury trial guarantee of the Sixth Amendment incorporated by the due process clause. He ascribed the rejection of the earlier holdings to a new interpretation of what fundamental fairness meant. The Court had previously understood it to require those guarantees that a system of justice anywhere at any time would have to accord to be called civilized. In the newer cases, however, the Court proceeded on the view that fairness required those guarantees that are necessary to an "Anglo-American regime of ordered liberty." It is not required, White noted, that a procedural guarantee be "necessarily fundamental to fairness in every criminal system that might be imagined," but that it be fundamental "in the context of the criminal processes maintained by the American states."

Whether this revision of the fundamental fairness test suffices as a basis for selecting particular provisions of the Bill of Rights for incorporation is problematic. If the new test refers to practices that have so long been accorded in American systems of justice that they have come to be regarded as among the distinguishing characteristics of American justice, then "fundamental" becomes equivalent to "traditional," all the provisions of the Bill of Rights are fundamental, and the accepted test of selective incorporation becomes in fact the rejected test of total incorporation. It would appear, however, that something more was meant. Criminal justice systems, like other social institutions, are complex and comprise a variety of elements that function in a delicate ecological relationship. Given the particular functioning of some procedural protection in the American system, it may be that the protection is fundamental to fairness in that system, although it would not be in a system with a different assortment of procedural elements with differing functional relationships. So, in the Duncan case, Justice White noted that although it was easy to imagine a fair system that used no juries, in which alternative guarantees and protections would serve the purposes the jury serves in English and American systems, no American jurisdiction had undertaken to construct such a system.

If this latter interpretation of fundamental fairness were taken seriously, the Court would be obliged to undertake in each case a factual examination of the complex functioning of the state's criminal justice system, with particular attention to how the functioning of the system as a whole colors the significance of the practice at issue. But no such inquiry was made in the Duncan case. The opinion drew attention to the long-standing concern about overzealous prosecutors and biased judges. But it made no effort to examine such questions as whether the routine availability of appellate review in the state courts and COLLATERAL ATTACK in the federal courts rendered a jury trial less indispensable as a protection against such abuses; or why, if the use of a jury for this purpose made it a requirement of fundamental fairness in the American system, it was not required in all civilized systems; or whether a jury of randomly chosen citizens in fact served as a check against bias rather than as a source of bias. The Court also pointed generally to the traditional acceptance in America of a jury power of nullification in the application of the law. But the Court failed to consider why this power is significant, and why, in other systems, a comparable power of nullification is not seen to be required by fundamental fairness.

The point is not that the Court could not have made a case for the conclusion that fundamental fairness required the jury in the American system of justice, but that it did not try. Nor did the Court do better in the other cases applying the doctrine of selective incorporation. In the end, therefore, there is force in the conclusion that the Court's attempt to shore up the doctrinal case for selective incorporation was an illusory post hoc rationalization.

An additional consideration, strongly pressed by Justice Harlan in his dissenting opinions, lends further support to that conclusion. Even if it be granted that a guarantee to be found in a provision of the Bill of Rights is required by fundamental fairness in an American system of justice, it does not follow that each and every interpretation of that provision developed in federal prosecutions is equally required for fundamental fairness. For example, the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination has been held in federal prosecutions to preclude judicial or prosecutorial comment on the failure of the defendant to respond to the evidence against him. The Fifth Amendment's protection against double jeopardy has been interpreted to attach at the time the jury is first sworn. The Sixth Amendment's guarantee of a jury trial in criminal cases had once been held to require a unanimous verdict of the jury. But even if the core concept of the privilege against self-incrimination, the double jeopardy protection, and the jury trial guarantee were found to be necessary for fundamental fairness, it would scarcely follow that each and every one of these interpretations of the federal guarantees is also necessary. Yet, in sharp contrast to the requirements of the avowed theory of selective incorporation, this is what the Court had held in every instance: a conclusion that a clause of the Bill of Rights is applicable to the states necessarily entails that each and every interpretation of that clause developed in federal prosecutions, regardless of its rationale or significance, becomes fully applicable as well, as Harlan said, "jot-for-jot and case-for-case" and "freighted with [its] entire accompanying body of federal doctrine" (Duncan v. Louisiana, 1968; Malloy v. Hogan, 1964). This conclusion constitutes further evidence that the Court was not taking seriously the only theory it had advanced to support its doctrine of selective incorporation.

Putting aside the doctrinal warrant of the approach to procedural due process that has come to prevail, what has been its impact on the administration of criminal justice in the states and what is its likely bearing on the future of due process? It is clear that the values of federalism have been heavily overrun. Given the expansive, pervasive, and often highly detailed regulations the Court has imposed on the processes of criminal justice under warrant of the Bill of Rights, one has to conclude that the autonomy of state government has been drastically curtailed.

At the same time, it is almost certainly true that the procedural rights accorded the accused in state courts have been greatly expanded over what they would have been had this federalization not taken place. The expansion of constraints upon the administration of justice during the era of the Warren Court in the 1960s has been one of the notable characteristics of that Court. Few state courts and no state legislatures could have been expected on their own to have achieved anything like a comparable expansion. People will differ over whether the balance between effective law enforcement and the rights of the accused thereby achieved resulted in a preferable system of criminal justice than would have been obtained under the earlier doctrine. Most would agree, however, that the coalescing of the minimum constitutional rights of the accused in both state and federal prosecutions has tended to produce a constitutional jurisprudence more understandable to the citizen who does not typically distinguish between state and federal government in considering the rights of the accused.

On the other hand, the presumed advantage in using the Bill of Rights to measure what due process requires of the states—that it eliminates the uncertainty and the need for personal, subjective decision-making by judges imposed by the traditional view—has hardly been evident. In deciding what searches are "reasonable" within the Fourth Amendment, how far that Amendment protects a right of privacy against new forms of ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING, when noncoercive POLICE INTERROGATION becomes violative of the Fifth Amendment's right against self-incrimination, what punishment, including CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, is "cruel and unusual" within the Eighth Amendment (which the Court in TROP V. DULLES (1958) conceded had to be determined by "the dignity of man" and "evolving standards of decency"), it was readily apparent that the text of the Bill of Rights scarcely spoke for itself and in fact invited no less an assessment and choice among competing values on the basis of the Justice's sense of what justice and fairness required. Fixed meanings have not triumphed over flexible ones, and judicial subjectivity has not been contained. More seriously, insofar as the Court has proceeded on the false assumption that the need for judicial value choosing has been overcome, it has handicapped itself in the task of developing a well-considered method of decision-making that would discipline and make more rational the inevitable process of choosing among competing values.

This concern is particularly pressing because the Court has recognized that due process is still open-ended, that although due process includes the incorporated clauses of the Bill of Rights, those clauses do not exhaust the content of due process. The 1952 decision in Rochin, that a state denied due process by using evidence pumped from the accused's stomach against his will, was reaffirmed in SCHMERBER V. CALIFORNIA (1966) under the principle that due process precludes action against an accused that "shocks the conscience" and violates one's "sense of justice," notwithstanding the inapplicability of any other provision of the Bill of Rights. Similar evidence of the vitality of the older tests of due process where the Bill of Rights does not reach are the Court's decisions in IN RE WINSHIP (1970), holding that an essential requirement of due process in criminal cases is proof of guilt beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT, and in the CAPITAL PUNISHMENT CASES OF 1976, finding in due process a requirement of articulated criteria to guide the judge or jury in determining whether to impose capital punishment.

One may conclude that despite the victory of selective incorporation the task of developing a defensible method and set of criteria to govern the determination of those criminal procedures that are constitutionally permissible is very much before the Court. How it could best be met is uncertain. One proposed approach would entail a consideration of a number of issues. In this view the Court would begin by drawing out the implications of the basic values animating constitutional restraints on the criminal process: fairness to the accused, protection of personal dignity, and the reliability of the processes for determining guilt. Next, the Court would determine how gravely the controverted procedure impugned those values and how seriously certain restraints would prejudice the due administration of criminal justice. Finally, the Court would seek ways of rooting the inevitable final choices in ground more secure than the personal judgment of the majority of the Justices on the optimum operation of the system of criminal justice. Another approach, less oriented to consequentialist considerations, would have the Court determine the fundamental legal rights of persons, including the constitutional rights of the accused, in terms of the requirements of a general political theory that best account for the moral principles embedded in the Constitution, laws, and culture of our society. Whatever the answer, the task is a formidable one. Indeed, the effort may ultimately be futile, as those believe who view the Court as indistinguishable from any other political body in the exercise of its power. But to the extent that the Court accepts the claim that its exercise of political power is based on reason and disinterestedness—that is, on law—it can scarcely abandon the goal of writing opinions that give credence to the claim. However one may approve its results, the doctrine of selective incorporation, with its oversimplifications and misperceptions, and its dubious doctrinal underpinnings, has not served that goal well.

SANFORD H. KADISH
(1986)

Bibliography

ALLEN, FRANCIS A. 1953 Due Process and State Criminal Procedures: Another Look. Northwestern University Law Review 48:16–35.

DWORKIN, RONALD M. 1975 Hard Cases. Harvard Law Review 88:1057–1109.

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1949 Does the Fourth Amendment Incorporate the Bill of Rights? The Original Understanding. Stanford Law Review 2:5–173.

FRIENDLY, HENRY 1965 The Bill of Rights as a Code of Criminal Procedure. California Law Review 53:929–956.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1963 "Selective Incorporation" in the Fourteenth Amendment. Yale Law Journal 73:74–88.

KADISH, SANFORD H. 1957 Methodology and Criteria in Due Process Adjudication—A Survey and Criticism. Yale Law Journal 66:319–363.

NOTE 1949 The Adamson Case: A Study in Constitutional Technique. Yale Law Journal 58:268–287.

NOWAK, JOHN E. 1979 Foreword: Due Process Methodology in a Post-Incorporation World. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 70:397–423.

PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, CRIMINAL
(Update)

Integral to the law's aspirations is the set of variables differentiating law and politics: reason and passion, rationality and bias, free inquiry and ideology, fairness and self-interest. The law's ardent hope is that these variables permit distinctions between what will endure and what will pass, for it is the relative mix of the enduring and the ephemeral that determines whether a nation is one of disinterested laws or of self-interested individuals. Thus it is that the Supreme Court strives to justify its decisions through well-reasoned opinions. The task of the Court is to resist the allure of politics and rest judgment on principle.

But is this task possible? The difficulties are legion. Disagreements abound concerning the correct interpretative methodology, the data relevant to the various interpretive approaches, and the proper role of the judiciary in a democratic scheme. These disagreements are compounded because the Supreme Court often does not speak with one voice but instead is spoken for by each of the Justices in a setting that seriously complicates a consistent ordering of preferences in enduring legal doctine. Super-imposed over all these difficulties is the fact that the Supreme Court is essentially a reactive institution, responding to problems generated for it by social factors beyond its control. No matter how fervently the Justices may wish to promulgate a consistent and principled JURISPRUDENCE, the diversity and unpredictability of the grist for the Court's mill make the task formidable.

The more open-ended the interpretive problem, the more formidable the task, and among the most open-ended of the Supreme Court's tasks is the interpretation of the twin DUE PROCESS OF LAW clauses in the Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The language of these clauses is not confining, their historical purposes are unclear, and to the extent there is agreement concerning those purposes, their implications for contemporary issues are not obvious. The due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, for example, was adopted as part of a set of guarantees that the newly created central government would respect its proper sphere, and the similar clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted to recognize and reflect the changes wrought in the country by the CIVIL WAR. Neither was adopted with the contemporary set of issues in mind to which these clauses have been asserted to be relevant by litigants and judges.

For all these reasons, the Supreme Court's interpretation of the due process clauses is consistently as much a reflection of the times as the product of timeless interpretive methodologies. The nation's first century was a time of territorial expansion and of the creation and consolidation of governmental institutions in which criminal due process adjudication played virtually no role, and there were virtually no criminal due process cases. The second century brought an increasing emphasis on the role of individual rights, which culminated in the remarkable creativity of the Supreme Court's procedural revolution in the mid-1960s. The question now is what the third century will bring.

Certain trends are already apparent. The procedural revolution is over and the resulting legal landscape is stable. Whatever its theoretical attraction, the theory of total INCORPORATION has substantially won, even though a majority of the Court has never adopted the theory. Most of the criminal provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS have been found to be binding on the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Furthermore, notwithstanding the dramatic reorientation of the Supreme Court owing to recent appointments, the Court has not overruled a single majority CRIMINAL PROCEDURE decision holding a Bill of Rights provision incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment. The incorporationist controversy is so definitively over that the opinions of the Court addressing questions of state criminal procedure discuss directly the applicable Bill of Rights provision with at most a cursory reference to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The casualness with which the distinction is drawn between Fourteenth Amendment due process and the specific provisions of the Bill of Rights is exemplified by the opinion for a unanimous court in Crane v. Kentucky (1986). In holding that due process was violated by the exclusion of testimony concerning the circumstances of a defendant's confession, the Court said that "whether rooted directly in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or in the compulsory process or confrontation clauses of the Sixth Amendment, the Constitution guarantees criminal defendants "a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense."

Justices also appear to have little interest in giving either due process clause much independent significance. In those few instances in recent years in which the Court has discussed either clause directly rather than as a surrogate for some other constitutional provision, it typically has done so to deny that due process has any meaning independent of the specific provisions of the Bill of Rights. In Moran v. Burbine (1986) the Court held that there was no violation of due process when the police failed to inform a criminal suspect subjected to custodial interrogation of the efforts of an attorney to reach him. Due process also does not require appointed counsel for collateral review of a conviction (Pennsylvania v. Finley, 1987), not even for collateral review of capital convictions (Murray v. Giarratano, 1989). Similarly, in Strickland v. Washington (1984) the Court commented that although "the Constitution guarantees a fair trial through the Due Process Clauses, it defines the basic elements of a fair trial largely through the several provisions of the Sixth Amendment." The Court applied this approach in Caplin & Drysdale, Chartered v. United States (1989) to find that the Fifth Amendment due process clause adds little or nothing to the Sixth Amendment RIGHT TO COUNSEL clause and in UNITED STATES V. SALERNO (1987) to reach a similar conclusion concerning the relationship between Fifth Amendment due process and the requirement of BAIL in the Eighth Amendment.

The failure of the Court to overrule prior criminal decisions and to give independent force to the due process clauses does not mean that the creative energies of the Court are quiescent. Rather, they are finding outlets in different directions. Through the mid-1960s the Court's agenda was to tame the unruly manner in which the criminal justice process operated, particularly in the states. Employing the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as its primary weapon, the Court succeeded in subjecting the state criminal justice process to the formal limits on governmental power in the Bill of Rights and in breaking down resistance to its innovations in the lower state and federal courts. One measure of this success is the increasingly common phenomenon of state supreme courts using state law to impose greater constraints on state officials than the federal constitution requires.

Because its previous messages have been largely absorbed by the lower courts and perhaps in response to increasingly conservative politics in the country, the Court has refocused the target of criminal procedural due process analysis from the specific provisions of the Bill of Rights to the question of the appropriate remedy. There are three interrelated variables driving the refocusing: first, a concern that exclusion of evidence premised upon the policy of deterring undesirable state action has a reasonable chance of advancing that goal; second, an increasingly intense belief that finality is an important value in adjudication; and third, an emphasis on accuracy in outcome.

The primary remedies that the Court has employed to effect its revisions of criminal procedure were the exclusionary rule and the threat of reversing convictions. Cases such as GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963), MAPP V. OHIO (1961), and MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) fit a general pattern of announcements of new rules to be enforced by the threat of excluding EVIDENCE seized in violation of those rules or the reversals of convictions if the rules are not followed. The theory was that law enforcement officials would not jeopardize convictions by ignoring the new rules and that the threats of exclusion and reversal would thus deter unwanted behavior.

The present Court perceives two difficulties with this theory. First, as the new rules became accepted, and thus became the norm, the power of exclusion or the threat of reversal to affect law enforcement behavior diminished. It is one thing to exclude evidence or reverse a conviction because the police broke into a person's house, in the process apparently lying about whether they possessed a SEARCH WARRANT, as occurred in Mapp, but it is another to exclude evidence where the police made every effort to comply with the Court's pronouncements, as the Court refused to do in United States v. Leon (1984). Second, the nature of Supreme Court innovation is that it begins with the core problem an area poses and then expands into peripheral areas. As the cases press the logic of the original innovations further, the relationship between the cases and the policies underlying the original innovations becomes increasingly attenuated. It is one thing to sanction state officials for extensively interrogating an individual without warning him of his rights or allowing him to consult counsel, as occurred in Miranda, but it is another to do so because the state official gave a set of Miranda warnings differing somewhat from the language specifically approved in Miranda, as the Court refused to do in California v. Prysock (1981).

The Supreme Court has fashioned a number of principles to limit the EXCLUSIONARY RULE to situations in which there are reasonable prospects that deterrence will operate. Chief among these limiting principles is the GOOD FAITH EXCEPTION to the exclusionary rule fashioned in Leon. Exclusion of evidence is not likely to deter behavior if the law enforcement personnel had a good-faith belief in the correctness of their conduct. Similarly, the Court has refused to extend the exclusionary rule into peripheral areas where deterrence is unlikely to result, such as the GRAND JURY setting (UNITED STATES V. CALANDRA, 1974) and civil matters such as forfeiture proceedings (United States v. Janis, 1976) and DEPORTATION proceedings (Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza, 1984).

The Court has also limited those who may litigate the legality of state action to restrict exclusion of evidence to cases where a deterrent effect is likely. Because law enforcement officials will not typically know in advance who the culprit is or who will be permitted to litigate the legality of their behavior, they will not jeopardize an investigation through illegal action so long as someone affected by their behavior may be in a position to complain. Thus, in Rakas v. Illinois (1987), the Court held that the passengers of a car could not contest the legality of a search of the car that included a search of the glove compartment, which had been used with the owner's apparent knowledge. In Rawlings v. Kentucky (1980) the Court held that the defendant could not contest the validity of the search of an acquaintance's purse where, again, the defendant had placed items with the knowledge of the purse's owner.

Intimately related to the Court's concern about the deterrent efficacy of its remedies is its growing emphasis on finality of decision. As the time increases between alleged state misbehavior and judicial intervention, the likelihood that reversals will affect behavior decreases. In addition, permitting federal relitigation of issues is an intelligent tactic if the work product of the state courts is not trusted, as was the case three decades ago; but as greater confidence in that work product is achieved, departures from finality are less desirable. A system that allows multiple attacks on the legitimacy of its work product undermines itself in various ways. Allowing repetitive relitigation of issues increases the probability of aberrational results simply because a litigant will eventually come before a court that for whatever reason—randomness, bias, or simple lack of attention—will act aberrationally. Reversals in such cases are not likely to advance deterrence of undesirable behavior or any other significant value. Allowing relitigation may also detract from the primary values of the penal system by encouraging individuals to deny responsibility for their acts. Regardless of whether confession is good for the soul, it is less likely to occur while avenues of appeal remain open.

Finality has been advanced in various ways. In particular, the scope of HABEAS CORPUS has been reduced. In STONE V. POWELL (1976) the Court held that FOURTH AMENDMENT issues could not be relitigated on habeas corpus if the defendant had been provided an adequate opportunity to litigate the issue at trial. In Teague v. Lane (1989) the Court held that the retroactivity of new constitutional rulings is limited to cases still pending on direct appeal at the time the new decision is handed down. In a series of cases, the Court has also developed a strict "waiver" rule to the effect that failure to raise an issue in a timely manner in state court precludes litigating it in federal habeas corpus unless failure to raise it amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel or unless a miscarriage of justice would result.

The third variable informing the Court's recent due process jurispurdence is a heightened focus on accuracy in adjudication. As the Court has become convinced that little remains of the disrespect for individual rights that it believed previously characterized the criminal justice process, it has become increasingly concerned with encouraging accurate outcomes. On the one hand, this has resulted in a further tightening of the avenues on appeal for a convicted defendant. In a series of cases beginning with Chapman v. California (1967), the Court has held that HARMLESS ERROR—error that does not cast doubt on the outcome of the trial—does not justify reversing a conviction. In NIX V. WILLIAMS (1984) the Court held that a conviction would not be reversed as a result of the admission of evidence illegally seized that would have been inevitably discovered by legitimate means. On the other hand, the Court has extended rights integral to the accuracy of convictions. For example, the Court has continued in its broad reading of the right to counsel, holding in EVITTS V. LUCEY (1985) that a defendant convicted of a crime is guaranteed effective assistance of counsel on a first appeal as a matter of right, even though a state is not required to provide for an appeal, and in AKE V. OKLAHOMA (1985) that a state must guarantee a criminal defendant access to a competent psychiatrist to assist in evaluation, preparation, and presentation of the defense.

The present state of due process adjudication is accurately captured by the holding in James v. Illinois (1990). In James the Court held that the principle that illegally obtained evidence can be used to impeach defendants' testimony so that exclusionary rules do not encourage perjury—first fashioned in Walder v. United States (1954)—did not extend to defense witnesses other than the defendant. Allowing the state to impeach witnesses other than the defendant would increase significantly the value of illegally obtained evidence, thus substantially impairing the efficacy of the exclusionary rule. Increasing the incentive of law enforcement officials to obtain evidence illegally would in turn put core constitutional values at risk. As significant as finality and accuracy are, they remain less significant than the core values of the various provisions of the Bill of Rights.

The implication of decisions like James is that criminal due process has evolved from a club to beat recalcitrant officials into line with the Court's innovations into a more subtle tool for adjusting the margins of the various doctrines. This use of procedural due process will surely continue for the foreseeable future. The next stage in the development of due process is presently unknowable, but its origins are predictable. The nation is in the midst of a subtle devolution of political authority from the central government to the states. Due process jurisprudence has mirrored this trend, as the Court has shown an increasing reluctance to intervene in the criminal justice process. As state officials become aware of their increasing autonomy, they will take advantage of it to rework state criminal processes. As innovations are implemented over the next decades, they will be subjected to constitutional challenges, and out of that process will come the next stage in the continuing evolution of the meaning of the due process clauses for criminal procedure.

RONALD J. ALLEN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Automobile Search; Criminal Justice System.)

Bibliography

AMSTERDAM, ANTHONY G. 1970 The Supreme Court and the Rights of Suspects in Criminal Cases. New York University Law Review 45:785–815.

BLASI, VINCENT A., ed. 1983 The Burger Court: The Counter-Revolution That Wasn't. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

NOWAK, JOHN E. 1979 Due Process Methodology in the Postincorporation World. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 70:397–493.

WILKES, DONALD E., JR. 1985 The New Federalism in Criminal Procedure: Death of the Phoenix? Pages 166–200 in Bradley D. McGraw, ed., Developments in State Constitutional Law. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

PROCHOICE MOVEMENT

See: Abortion and the Constitution; Reproductive Autonomy

PROCLAMATION OF NEUTRALITY (1793)

The Proclamation of Neutrality (April 22, 1793) was issued by President GEORGE WASHINGTON upon notification that France and Britain were at war. It pledged the United States to "pursue a course friendly and impartial" toward the belligerents and enjoined observance on all citizens upon pain of prosecution. Neutrality was bound to be difficult because of intense partisan feelings about the war, the privileges and obligations of the French alliance, and British rejection of American claims of neutral rights on the seas.

The importance of the proclamation for the Constitution was twofold. First, as a unilateral declaration by the President it seemed to preempt the power of Congress to decide questions of war and peace. Secretary of State THOMAS JEFFERSON, although he acquiesced in the proclamation, had made this objection in the cabinet, and it was taken up by the Republicans. In a notable series of articles under the signature Pacificus, Secretary of the Treasury ALEXANDER HAMILTON defended the proclamation. His claim of independent executive authority in FOREIGN AFFAIRS was opposed by JAMES MADISON as Helvidius, who compared it to the royal prerogative of the English constitution. (Hamilton's argument prevailed in history, though Madison's antipathy to overriding executive power has not lacked supporters.) Second, as the conduct of neutrality was executive altogether, it afforded the first instance of government by administrative lawmaking. Decisions were made in the cabinet, without statutory authority, with the guidance only of the customary law of nations. Divided and uncomfortable in this work, the cabinet officers submitted twenty-nine questions to the ruling of the Supreme Court. The court declined to rule, however, and thus established the precedent against ADVISORY OPINIONS. Meanwhile, the government's attempt to prosecute violators of the proclamation was defeated by unsympathetic juries. Not until June 1794 did Congress enact a neutrality law, which codified the rules developed in the cabinet during the preceding year.

MERRILL D. PETERSON
(1986)

Bibliography

THOMAS, CHARLES M. 1931 American Neutrality in 1793: A Study in Cabinet Government. New York: Columbia University Press.

PROCUNIER v. MARTINEZ
416 U.S. 396 (1974)

Speaking through Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, the Supreme Court invalidated California prison regulations censoring inmates' correspondence and prohibiting attorney-client interviews conducted by law students and legal paraprofessionals. The censorship provisions had permitted prison officials to ban correspondence in which inmates "unduly complain," "magnify grievances," or expressed "inflammatory political, racial, religious or other views or beliefs." These vague standards, the Court held, violated the FIRST AMENDMENT rights of prisoners and those with whom they corresponded. The prohibition on the use of law students and paralegals was held to be an unjustified restriction on prisoners' ACCESS TO THE COURTS.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

PRODUCTION

Until the transformation of the constitutional law of ECONOMIC REGULATION, beginning in 1937, "production" described economic activities that the Supreme Court regarded as local or intrastate in character and therefore beyond Congress's power to regulate under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. In 1895 the Court ruled in UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. that every form of production and matters related to it were stages of economic activity that preceded the buying, selling, and transportation of goods among the states. Manufacturing, mining, agriculture, domestic fisheries, stock raising, and labor had only an "indirect" effect upon commerce, by judicial definition. Because commerce came after production the United States had no constitutional authority to extend the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT to monopolies in production, nor could it control the trade practices of poultry dealers, or regulate agricultural production, or fix the MAXIMUM HOURS AND MINIMUM WAGES of miners. In UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941) the Court sustained the constitutionality of the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, which applied to workers engaged in production of goods for sale in INTERSTATE COMMERCE, in the next year the Court in WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942) ended any remaining vestiges of the doctrine that Congress could not regulate production. The Court ruled that, although certain economic activities are local or intrastate, the commerce clause extends Congress's power to them if they affect commerce, making their regulation an appropriate way of governing commerce among the states.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PROFFITT v. FLORIDA

See: Capital Punishment Cases of 1976

PROGRESSIVE CONSTITUTIONAL THOUGHT

During the Progressive era, roughly from 1900 to 1920, the Constitution and the SUPREME COURT came in for considerable criticism on the part of historians, political theorists, statesmen, intellectuals, and journalists. The criticisms involved five issues: the origins of the Constitution's authority; claims that the Constitution, and the system of government it supported, were antiquated and needed to be modified in light of developments in modern science; protests that the Supreme Court functioned as an instrument of business interests; demands that the Constitution be reinterpreted to allow for federal regulation of industry; and similar demands that it become the agency of social reform.

Prior to the Progressive era the Constitution's authority rested on the assumption that it was a neutral document capable of rendering objective judgments based on either transcendent religious principles or secular doctrines like natural law. The first challenge to that assumption came from J. ALLEN SMITH'S The Spirit of American Government (1907), in which the Constitution was alleged to be a "reactionary" document designed to thwart the democratic principles of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE by means of CHECKS AND BALANCES and JUDICIAL REVIEW of legislative actions of popular majorities. But the most thorough critique of the Constitution's presumed disinterested authority fell like a blockbuster with the publication of CHARLES A. BEARD's An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution (1913). Here readers discovered that the movement toward RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION in 1787–1789 was led by merchants, manufacturers, creditors, and land speculators whose primary concern was to protect their own interests from what JAMES MADISON called "overbearing factions." THE FEDERALIST's authors, Beard was aware, hardly concealed the fact that they regarded protection of property as the essence of liberty. But Beard's exposure of the economic motives of the Framers did much to demystify the moral character of the Constitution by disclosing the "interests" behind it.

While the historian Beard tried to unmask the sacred image of the Constitution, political theorists tried to reestablish it on a more scientific foundation. In The Process of Government (1908) Arthur Bentley suggested that the scholar must penetrate beyond the formal structure of the Constitution to appreciate the forces and pressures that act upon it through interest group demands. But the dynamic of amoral interest politics was precisely what troubled WOODROW WILSON and other Progressive idealists. First in Congressional Government (1884), then in Constitutional Government in the United States (1908), and finally in a series of campaign speeches published as The New Freedom (1912), Wilson indicted the Constitution for weakening the executive branch of government, allowing interests and power to prevail in the legislature's standing committees, accepting as inevitable factional antagonisms detrimental to the public good, and upholding the letter of the law rather than the life of the state. Criticizing The Federalist for bequeathing a static, mechanist concept of government, Wilson wanted a Constitution "accountable to Darwin, not to Newton," a Constitution as "a living organism" capable of growth and adaption, one that would coordinate the branches of government so that liberty could be preserved not on the basis of diversity—Madison's premise—but of unity forged by presidential leadership.

Critical of the Constitution, Progressives also became disillusioned with a Supreme Court as an obstacle in the path of social reform. THEODORE ROOSEVELT exploded in anger when the Court invalidated state LEGISLATION involving child labor, tenement house reform, and other goals of PROGRESSIVISM. Yet, curiously, Progressives disagreed whether the Court had a right to do so. In The Supreme Court and the Constitution (1912), Beard argued that the right of judicial review was the clear intent of The Federalist. In Our Judicial Oligarchy (1912) Gilbert E. Roe expounded the opposing case, arguing that the courts had usurped authority in reviewing legislative acts. While both authors scorned judges disposed to preserving property rights at the cost of social justice, they continued to differ as to whether the Supreme Court could hold unconstitutional laws void or whether it should defer to the legislative process and exercise what the followers of OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES called "judicial restraint."

Progressives were far more unified in advocating regulation. All the writers associated with the liberal New Republic—HERBERT CROLY, Walter Weyl, Walter Lippmann, John Dewey, and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS—wanted to see corporate enterprise subordinated to the public good by means of industrial commissions, surveillance of trusts and monopolies, banking and railroad legislation, and the like. All also agreed that standing in the way of federal regulatory policies was a debilitating Jeffersonian heritage that made private rights anterior to public responsibilities, a destructive individualism that frustrated the ideals of political authority and civic duty. "Only by violating the spirit of the Constitution," Lippmann boldly declared, "have we been able to preserve the letter of it." Many of the Progressives were Hamiltonian nationalists convinced that both the Constitution and the Republic could be preserved from the corruptions of business interests only by augmenting the authority of an efficient and enlightened state. Many were also pragmatists who believed that the Constitution should be interpreted not from within but from without, not in terms of its inherent logic or precedent but in light of its consequences as society experiences the Court's rulings.

Progressives succeeded in realizing a number of reforms through the AMENDING PROCESS, specifically the income tax, women's suffrage, and the DIRECT ELECTION of senators. As with the RECALL, and REFERENDUM in state governments, and direct PRIMARY ELECTIONS in national politics, the constitutional amendments aimed to allow people to participate more directly in the decisions affecting their lives. Whereas The Federalist's authors believed that liberty could best be preserved by distancing the people from the immediate operations of government, the Progressives saw no conflict between republican liberty and participatory democracy.

JOHN PATRICK DIGGINS
(1986)

Bibliography

COMMAGER, HENRY STEELE 1950 The American Mind: An Interpretation of American Thought and Character Since the 1890s. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

ROSTOW, EUGENE V. 1970 The Realist Tradition in Law. Pages

203–218 in Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and Morton White, eds., Paths of American Thought. Boston: Beacon Press.

PROGRESSIVISM

In the decades after the CIVIL WAR, American law was forced to accommodate to the increasing pace of economic change as the United States was transformed from an agrarian, rural nation of small operatives into an urban, industrial nation characterized by huge transportation, manufacturing, extractive, and financial corporations that served national rather than local or regional markets. The Standard Oil trust, formed in 1882, consisted of thirty-nine different companies that pumped oil in eight states, refined it in six, and sold it everywhere. Railroad mileage increased from 36,801 miles in 1866 to 193,346 in 1900, and the gross national product increased by a factor of twelve. By 1900, the United States was producing more steel than Great Britain and Germany combined. Nevertheless, the devastating depression of 1893–1897 underscored the pain, human suffering, and dislocation caused by industrialization—ranging from child labor to burgeoning farm tenancy, strikes, and massive unemployment (which ran as high as twenty percent during the darkest months of the depression). It also underscored the lack of rationality and order in the marketplace. The century ended with a flurry of mergers as 2,274 firms disappeared during the years 1898–1910.

Historians have questioned whether there was a "Progressive movement," disagreed about who were its leaders and followers, and argued about its dates. Around the beginning of the twentieth century, institutional reform occurred at many levels of government, but Progressives were not unified by party, class, or objectives. For example, those who favored economic efficiency, such as the conservationists, seldom showed much sympathy for those who championed social issues. Not surprisingly, the Progressives never decided how the business corporation could be made more accountable to public opinion or what role it should play in American society. Since the colonial period, American law has attempted to blend promotional and regulatory elements, though the former prevailed for most of the nineteenth century. It has proved far easier to promote economic growth—through such legal mechanisms as EMINENT DOMAIN, the power of incorporation, tax policy, and limits on liability for personal injury—than to regulate it.

For constitutional and legal scholars, it is appropriate to define the Progressive era as the years from about 1886 to 1917. Some recent historians look more charitably on the Supreme Court during this era than did scholars who wrote before the 1970s. They argue that many Justices were by training and inclination classical liberals who saw the Constitution as the embodiment of natural law. These judges wanted to preserve higher law rights and individual liberty, limit monopoly and government "paternalism," and protect the central government from expanding STATE POLICE POWER. They rejected "special privilege" in all forms. Earlier historians had charged that most members of the Court regarded the Constitution as primarily designed to protect property, that they knew little about American history and institutions, that they stubbornly clung to an organic, almost feudal view of society, and that they contributed to the growth of vast economic oligarchies. The critics insisted that state courts—particularly in their reliance on liberty of contract and in their use of injunctions to break strikes—were no less activistic, regressive, or anachronistic than the High Court.

It is not clear that the Supreme Court was out of step with public opinion or that its members held substantially more "conservative" values than did the mass of Americans. (Even in the midst of the depression, the Republicans won in a landslide in 1894 and WILLIAM MCKINLEY beat William Jennings Bryan easily in 1896.) Nevertheless, no charge was more popular during the Progressive era than that the courts had systematically violated the basic structural principle of the Constitution—the independence of the three branches of government. In 1895 the High Court rendered two decisions that struck at the heart of national LEGISLATIVE POWER. In UNITED STATES V. KNIGHT CO. the Court, which traditionally had defined the COMMERCE CLAUSE very broadly, emasculated the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT (1890) by ruling that the American Sugar Company, which refined more than 90 percent of the nation's supply, monopolized manufacturing but only indirectly commerce. (The Court drew the same kind of fine distinction when it refused to accept use of the commerce clause as a limit on child labor because only the products of labor, not the labor itself, was involved in INTERSTATE COMMERCE.) In the same year, the second POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN AND TRUST CO. decision ignored well-settled precedent by invalidating the national income tax of 1894. And in 1896 INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION V. CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS, TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY denied that Congress had granted the Interstate Commerce Commission power to set rates.

Simultaneously, the Court, led by Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD, reinterpreted the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, making it a substantive protection of property against "arbitrary" and "confiscatory" state and federal regulations, not just the constitutional guarantee of a fair trial. Munn v. Illinois (1877) had clearly upheld the power of individual states to regulate the use of private property in the public interest; it had rejected SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS as the Court had done earlier in the SLAUGH-

TERHOUSE CASES (1873). But substantive due process—which won its first great victory in STONE V. FARMERS' LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY (1886)—added new power to JUDICIAL REVIEW. A similar spirit permeated the Court's statutory interpretations, as in the RULE OF REASON articulated in STANDARD OIL COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1911), which suggested that monopoly in and of itself was not illegal and that only the courts could define what charges, rates, or business practices were "reasonable." In LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) it relied on the liberty and contract doctrine, which was based on substantive due process of law, to argue that the state could not use its police powers to regulate maximum work hours, except in dangerous jobs or jobs that immediately affected the public health; the Court held that bakers, unlike miners, did not do dangerous work. The right of workers to sell their labor at the highest price and of employers to buy it at the cheapest price took precedence. And in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) the Court went against well-established precedent in declaring that the first federal child labor law went beyond Congress' commerce power, threatening the police power of the states and the balance between federal and state authority.

Many jurists and politicians fought against the conservative drift of the courts during the Progressive era, proposing reforms that included the recall of judges, the standardization of state incorporation laws, and the use of SOCIOLOGICAL JURISPRUDENCE to expand the vision and accountability of courts. But these proposals had little impact on the new industrial order. Far more important was the RULE OF LAW itself, for Progressivism was shaped by American values and faith in the American legal process. Most Americans preferred reform through law, a process of constitutional change, rather than revolution. The Progressives' faith in the rationality of man, progress, and the curative powers of law prompted such reforms as the initiative, referendum, recall, and direct elections of United States senators. They did not attack such underlying problems as poverty, racism, discrimination, and the insecurity of labor. Nor was there any major revamping of the legal system itself. Many Progressives argued that judicial review threatened the doctrine of SEPARATION OF POWERS, that it was inherently undemocratic, that it might as logically have been exercised by Congress or the President as by the Supreme Court, that most rulings of unconstitutionality had little to do with the language of the Constitution, that the frequency of 5–4 decisions violated the principle that only laws clearly unconstitutional should be invalidated, that split decisions threatened to undermine public faith in the entire justice system, and that judges had little understanding of American society. Yet Congress was unable to adopt major reforms, and most Americans remained wary of tampering with the judicial system.

Although by the 1920s the Interstate Commerce Commission, Federal Trade Commission, and the Federal Reserve Board were the only important national REGULATORY AGENCIES, by that time the commission had won out over other options (including antitrust prosecutions, which met with little enthusiasm after the Progressive era, save for a few years at the end of the 1930s). The commissions served many purposes, including fact-gathering, education, disclosure of illegal practices, encouragement of innovation, the cartelization of industries, and restrictions on monopoly and oligopoly. They combined legislative and judicial functions, or adjudication and planning, and, even more important, they maintained respect for property by following elaborate administrative hearings and procedures similar to regular courts. They built on the assumption that by removing issues from the courts and legislatures, public servants could decide the proper shape and conduct of American business. In short, the commissions fitted comfortably with American views of the legal process.

The regulation of business was one thing; basic reform of the economic system, however, was uncongenial to most Americans. The Progressives agreed that the new industrial order had to be made more predictable, accountable, and responsible; that much was obvious. They also recognized the limits of judicial regulation of business, the judges' lack of knowledge of the economic system, the inability of courts to act unless a complaint was brought to them, and the courts' inability to engage in long-range policy-making. However, while many Progressives feared bigness per se, others looked forward to a new society built on organization, cooperation, and specialization; the competition that had been so valued in the nineteenth century appeared to them as anachronistic and dangerous. The Progressives no less than those who supported the NEW DEAL could not agree on what the structure of business should be, nor could they agree on the form or forms regulation should take. Therefore, many regulatory tools—such as selective corporate taxes (as on companies that used child labor or had interlocking directorates), national incorporation, and an expansion of the NATIONAL POLICE POWER—did not receive the attention they deserved. American values were ambivalent. Most Progressives regarded laissez-faire with disdain, yet they also believed in the sanctity of private property, economic individualism, and a society driven by the harmony of self-interest rather than by the clash of classes.

DONALD J. PISANI
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Child Labor Amendment; Child Labor Tax Act; Conservatism; Federal Trade Commission Act; Liberalism; Progressive Constitutional Thought.)

Bibliography

BETH, LOREN P. 1971 The Development of the American Constitution, 1877–1917. New York: Harper & Row.

SKLAR, MARTIN J. 1988 The Corporate Reconstruction of American Capitalism, 1890–1916: The Market, The Law, and Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

SWINDLER, WILLIAM F. 1969 Court and Constitution in the Twentieth Century: The Old Legality, 1889–1932. Indianapolis and New York: Bobbs-Merrill Co.

PROHIBITION

A recurring theme in American constitutional history is the attempt of a majority to impose its moral standards on society by legislation. The nineteenth-century temperance movement, along with its close ally, the ABOLITIONIST movement, constituted such a moral majority. That movement sought the legal prohibition of alcoholic beverages.

State and local prohibition statutes were accepted by the Supreme Court in MUGLER V. KANSAS (1887) as valid applications of the STATE POLICE POWER. That such laws deprived citizens of their liberty and property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW had been asserted, before the CIVIL WAR, only in the state court case of WYNEHAMER V. NEW YORK (1856).

In the early twentieth century the prohibition movement acquired a new ally in the Progressive movement, and, after nineteen states adopted prohibition laws, agitation shifted to the national level. In 1917 Congress enacted prohibition as a wartime austerity measure. The same year Congress proposed the EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT, which, when ratified in 1919, raised prohibition to constitutional status. Repeal came fourteen years later with adoption of the TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT.

The failure of the "noble experiment" of national prohibition is frequently cited by opponents of other types of majoritarian legislation on moral issues, such as laws against SEGREGATION, handguns, ABORTION, and drugs.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

PROHIBITION, WRIT OF

To lawyers as well as others, the term PROHIBITION calls to mind a law forbidding the making, distribution, or possession of intoxicating liquors. In law, however, the term has an ancient COMMON LAW meaning that retains vitality today. The writ of prohibition is an order from a higher court commanding a lower court to stop hearing a matter outside the lower court's JURISDICTION. From the beginning prohibition has been considered an extraordinary writ, one that the higher court may or may not grant, in its discretion. It is not normally to be used as a substitute for an APPEAL or a petition for a WRIT OF CERTIORARI.

A statute dating from the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 is interpreted to empower the UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS and the Supreme Court to issue writs of prohibition to lower federal courts. Under this law, the Supreme Court can also issue writs of prohibition to state courts.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

PROHIBITION OF SLAVE TRADE ACT
2 Stat. 426 (1807)

Colonial legislatures had often tried to restrict the importation of slaves for economic reasons, and THOMAS JEFFERSON's famous deleted passage in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE denounced the royal disallowance of these bills. After Independence, all the states (except Georgia until 1798) prohibited the importation of slaves from abroad. The CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 permitted Congress to legislate against the international trade but at the insistence of the South Carolina delegates prohibited it from exercising that power for twenty years (Article I, section 9). After 1790, the Pennsylvania Abolition Society and the American Convention of Abolition Societies demanded interim legislation against the trade. Their lobbying produced the Act of March 22, 1794, prohibiting Americans from fitting out in American ports for the international trade. But South Carolina shocked the nation's conscience by reopening the trade in 1803.

President Jefferson urged Congress to ban the international trade at the earliest possible moment, and Congress responded with the Act of March 2, 1807, which prohibited the importation of slaves from foreign nations and dependencies, penalized persons engaging in the trade and purchasers from them, and provided for forfeiture of slaving vessels. The Act of May 15, 1820, declared slaving to be piracy, punishable by death. But enforcement of the ban was deliberately half-hearted, and the illegal trade brought in approximately a thousand blacks a year from Africa and the Caribbean. Though some southern spokesman in the late 1850s demanded a reopening of the trade, the CONFEDERATE CONSTITUTION also prohibited it.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Slavery and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1977 The Sources of Antislavery Constitutionalism in America, 1760–1848. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

PROLIFE MOVEMENT

See: Abortion and the Constitution; Anti-Abortion Movement

PROPELLER GENESEE CHIEF v. FITZHUGH

12 Howard 443 (1851)

An act of Congress extended the ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION of the United States Courts in matters of contract and tort arising upon the Great Lakes and connecting navigable rivers. In the case of The Thomas Jefferson (1825), the Court had confined federal admiralty and maritime jurisdiction to tide waters. Here, the Supreme Court, by a vote of 8–1, sustained the constitutionality of the act of Congress by ruling that JURISDICTION should not depend on the ebb and flow of the tide as in England but on the fact that the United States has "thousands of miles" of public navigable waters in which there is no tide. The TANEY COURT thus considerably expanded federal jurisdiction.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PROPERTY

The Constitution explicitly protects the ownership of private property, not only by the Fifth and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS but also through the FOURTH AMENDMENT and SEVENTH AMENDMENT as well as by the CONTRACT CLAUSE and other provisions of Article I, section 10. The Supreme Court has always regarded property as a material possession having a cash value, but the founding generation possessed a far broader view. Even JOHN LOCKE in his second treatise on government believed that the ownership of property included a right to pursue happiness; he did not restrict his understanding of property to the possession of physical assets with a cash value. A writer in the Boston Gazette in 1768 voiced the prevailing American opinion when he said, "Liberty and Property are not only joined in common discourse, but are in their own natures so nearly ally'd that we cannot be said to possess the one without the other." The VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS OF 1776, framed by GEORGE MASON, guaranteed, in part, "the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property," a provision accepted by THOMAS JEFFERSON and many of the Framers, who believed that liberty and property were indissolubly linked. Many states copied this language in their constitutions.

In 1789 in the first amendment that JAMES MADISON proposed for a national BILL OF RIGHTS, he appropriated Mason's language and the Lockean meaning of property. He regarded property as a basic human right essential to one's existence, to one's independence, and to one's dignity as a person. Without property, real and personal, one could not enjoy life or liberty, or be free and independent. Only the property holder could make independent decisions and choices because he was not beholden to anyone; he had no need to be subservient. Americans cared about property not just because they were materialistic but because they cared about political freedom and personal independence. They cherished the ownership of property as a prerequisite for the pursuit of happiness, and property opened up a world of intangible values—human dignity, self-regard, and personal fulfillment.

In 1792, Madison wrote an essay entitled "Property," in which he described its "larger and juster meaning." It "embraces," he declared, "every thing to which a man may attach a value and have a right." In a narrow sense it meant one's land, merchandise, or money, but in a broader sense, "a man has property in his opinions and the free communication of them," including his religious opinions, and he has "an equal property" in the full use of his faculties or "a property in his rights" as well as a right to his property. In 1795, however, the Supreme Court endorsed the narrower meaning of property as the ownership of physical assets having financial value, and the Court added that property once vested is inviolable. "The Constitution encircles and renders it an holy thing. . . . It is sacred," said Justice WILLIAM PATERSON, who had been a member of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. His view of the matter prevailed, and the Court showed itself as marvelously imaginative in the invention of judicial DOCTRINES of property that served to promote and protect corporate interests.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(2000)

PROPERTY RIGHTS

In the discourse of American CONSTITUTIONALISM, the idea of PROPERTY has been both primal and protean.

First, there is the text. The DUE PROCESS OF LAW clauses of both the Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, rank property by name with life and liberty as a chief human interest to be secured against arbitrary and excessive interference from government. The Fifth Amendment's EMINENT DOMAIN, or "taking," clause even adds a special restriction against uncompensated TAKING OF PROPERTY for public benefit. Constitutional law perceives various high aims in these general protections for property. Courts dealing with claims of taking without compensation find in property an antiredistributive principle, opposed to imposition on a select few of the costs and burdens of government operations. When the claim is one of deprivation without PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS, modern doctrine treats property as primarily a legalistic (or bureaucratic) principle, opposed to subversion of legally warranted expectations by faithless or irregular administration of standing law. Of course, expectations build on constancy in the law itself, as well as on reliable administration. The doctrine of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS arose, in part, out of concern for protecting legally VESTED RIGHTS against retrospective disturbance by changes in law. In a more dramatic form of substantive due process, property has figured as a libertarian principle of independence from state regulation: the right of an owner, as Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS recently wrote in MOORE V. CITY OF EAST CLEVELAND (1977), "to use her own property as she sees fit."

Second, proprietary norms and notions have inspired and organized constitutional-legal doctrine apparently far removed from the immediate scope of the property-specific clauses. Both the THIRD AMENDMENT and FOURTH AMENDMENT obviously tap special values of domestic sanctuary—refuge and privacy—from one prototypical image of property, the home or house. In GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) the Supreme Court marshaled these provisions with others in the BILL OF RIGHTS to construct a constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY in the conduct of marital intimacies at home. By the time of ROE V. WADE (1973), the Court had reconceived this as a right to choose for oneself "whether to bear or beget a child." In BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976) the Court treated deployments of private wealth in electoral politics as exercises of the FREEDOM OF SPEECH and the FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY AND ASSOCIATION protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT. In PERRY EDUCATION ASSOCATION V. PERRY LOCAL EDUCATORS ASSOCATION (1983), the Court confirmed an old idea that a government acting as a proprietor (rather than as a lawmaker) is unusually free to restrict freedom of speech. In a series of cases including Reeves, Inc. v. Stake (1980), the Court similarly relieved states acting as owners from normal duties under the COMMERCE CLAUSE to refrain from commercial discrimination against out-of-state competitors. In contrast, courts adjudicating under the rubric of substantive due process currently treat ECONOMIC LIBERTIES (aspects of self-direction concerned with acquisition, exchanges, and deployment of property) as categorically less resistant to state regulation than more "fundamental" or "personal" aspects, such as control over family formations.

Third, on a broadly ideological level, legal depictions of property have figured strongly in imaginative conceptions of the American constitutional system. Property held a glorified place in the common lawyer's Whig history imbibed by early Americans from WILLIAM BLACKSTONE. With its naturalistic imagery of clearly demarcated "closes," property offered a paradigm of legally sanctioned authority that was supreme within its limits yet firmly delimited by law. Such an image of legal property apparently helped later generations of Americans to represent and confirm to themselves the workings of check-and-balance institutional schemes—FEDERALISM and SEPARATION OF POWERS—that depend on jurisdictional boundaries judicially patrolled. More fundamentally, the image has from the beginning helped inspire and sustain a core idea of constitutionalism: a legally LIMITED GOVERNMENT based on a secure bounding of the state's domain from those of the market and private life.

Finally, at the level of practical debate over institutions, the question of property's relation to POLITICS has always been foundational for American constitutionalism. In the strongly influential NATURAL RIGHTS philosophy traced to JOHN LOCKE, the relation is oppositional. Property—here meaning acquisition of goods by effort and exchange and retention against force and fraud—is considered a native attribute of humankind, not an artificial contingency of state power and political choice. Accordingly, the state's business is to secure natural property against breakdowns of mutual forbearance that only a supreme civil authority can prevent. For Lockeans, then, the relation of property to politics is that of an a priori external limit and a test of legitimacy.

Yet in an older tradition of civic REPUBLICANISM, to which the Founders were also heir, questions of property entitlement and distribution are inseparable from constitutional design and political ministration. By the traditional republican understanding, property, or wealth, is power in politics. Undue concentration of wealth portends either oligarchy or revolution, and warding off those contingencies is very much the business of republican government. Morevoer, in civic republican thought, "corruption" of political motives by preoccupation with private need or advantage (as opposed to public honor and common good) is a chief internal threat to the stability and success of popular governments. Elements of this traditional view, modernized and coupled with Lockean liberal ideas, plainly appear throughout THE FEDERALIST (saliently in JAMES MADISON's famous essay on "faction") and in THOMAS JEFFERSON's political writings. They appear in the Constitution, as well, and in early American constitutional practice. By such devices as indirect election and large constituencies, the Framers avowedly designed the Constitution to ensure that only men of means and repute would attain national legislative or executive office.

Moreover, it was normal in the early United States for states, which under the Constitution set electoral qualifications even for congressional and presidential elections, to restrict VOTING RIGHTS to persons of independent social status (free adult males) who also held a substantial property endowment or income of a kind not too dependent on governmental machination. In the more egalitarian democratic ethos tracing to the Jacksonian period, RECONSTRUCTION, and the CIVIL WAR amendments, WEALTH DISCRIMINATION in the field of voting rights has become constitutionally intolerable. Rather, debate has inevitably arisen over the converse claim that a democratic-republican constitution requires assurance to all, at public expense if necessary, of the material prerequisites of political independence and competence.

In summary, the American constitutional rhetoric of property and property rights is a congested manifold of cross-cutting and contested doctrinal and normative evocations. As might be expected of such an overloaded vocabulary, ambiguity and conflict affect not just normative emanations and doctrinal derivations, but the direct reference of the central terms themselves. In constitutional disputation, "property" and "property right" variously signify holdings, entitlements, and institutions. At one moment, "property" (or "property right") may refer to specific holdings of social wealth that various persons currently claim or practically enjoy; at another, to a set of legal or moral rules and principles supposed to define and condition entitlements to possession and enjoyment of parcels of social wealth; and at still another, to institutional regimes of privatization (the "free market").

This variability of reference would little surprise the generations of Anglo-American theorists—the line runs from David Hume and Jeremy Bentham to Wesley N. Hohfeld, MORRIS R. COHEN, Felix S. Cohen, Robert L. Hale, and beyond—who have attempted conceptual analyses and critiques of legal "property." Vagaries in constitutional-legal usage of "property" echo the academic discussions, which have themselves obviously been sensitive to partisan political and constitutional debates. In some respects, however, constitutional-legal usage strays from established jurisprudential positions.

It is common ground, at least, that legal "property" is a relation, not a substance. Property does not consist in parcels of wealth or "stuff." Academic sophisticates have long agreed that it also does not consist in any relation between a person and "his" stuff; neither possessory acts, proprietary intentions, nor both together constitute property. Rather, property is a matter of relations among persons: the social relations and practices that accord to bare, empirical, person-to-parcel connections a measure of public recognition, normative legitimacy, and practical reliability. But that is not all property is, either. Also indispensable to property, say the theorists, is the element of entitlement or legal sanction: there is no true "property" in a casual neighborhood practice of allowing me to farm a field and reap the fruit when we all also know that others may stop me at any time without running afoul any law. The question then becomes whether the law that constitutes property entitlements consists strictly of the "positive" human inventions of legislatures and of courts filling gaps in the common law or, rather, is found in some method of reason or traditional understanding that composes a prelegislative "higher" or "Natural" Law. On this question, JURISPRUDENCE remains deeply divided.

It is easy to find constitutional-legal doctrine officially accepting each step of the jurisprudential consensus so far as it goes. Yet constitutional law seems also often driven to resist the abstract logic of the consensus. According to the theorists, a legal regime that secures the exclusive possession of landowners against unauthorized entry certainly constitutes a property entitlement, but so, by the same reasoning, does a legal regime that permits (and protects against interference) a particular mode of using a parcel—for example, an owner's strip mining of land. Constitutional law, by contrast, differentiates sharply between legal restrictions on use that leave possession undisturbed and laws subjecting owners to "permanent physical occupations" of land. As the Supreme Court recently confirmed in Keystone Bituminous Coal Association v. DeBenedictis (1987) and Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987), new use restrictions, however severe, rarely amount to constitutionally challengeable takings or deprivations of property, but state-sponsored dispossession, however trivial, almost always does. Or consider a law plainly stating that a sheriff may seize goods from a person who bought them on credit whenever the creditor tells the sheriff that the loan is in default. In the sophisticated view, such a law simply defines the extent of the installment buyer's property right and so cannot itself be a constitutionally questionable deprivation of property. Constitutional law on procedural due process officially adopted that view in BOARD OF REGENTS V. ROTH (1972), a case of peremptory unexplained dismissal from a government job expressly held at the supervisor's discretion. Yet at about the same time, in Fuentes v. Shevin (1972), the Court found an unconstitutional deprivation of property without procedural due process in the law authorizing unceremonious seizure of goods from an installment buyer's possession. Unlike academic jurisprudence, constitutional law has to mediate practically among demands for proprietary security, sound policy, and popular acceptance, along with the demand for consistent theory. Operating within this field of forces, courts evidently find that governmentally engineered trespasses on extant private possessions are uniquely and unacceptably insulting to property's ideological function as a paradigm of limited government, that is, as private domains secured against governmental intrusion.

A like irresolution appears in constitutional law's response to the theorists' requirement of legal entitlement as essential to property. The Court both expressly avows this requirement and rejects its full implications. Faced in United States v. Willow River Power Co. (1945) with a hydroelectric company's claim that the government took its property by damming a river and thereby flooding the tail end of its generating plant, Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON memorably declared that judicial delineation of property rights turns not on any intelligible essence of "property," but on discovery and construal of prior and contemporaneous law: "We cannot start the process of decision by calling [every existing economic interest or advantage] a 'property right' . . . Such economic uses are property rights only when they are legally protected interests." In short, discoverable legal entitlement is required to qualify an "economic interest" as the "property" mentioned by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. The Court has further perceived that those constitutional mentionings cannot themselves be read (without apparent circularity) to confer the legal status of property on any disputed "interest or advantage." Rather, according to Regents v. Roth, the entitlement must be grounded in "an independent source such as state law." The Court has even hitched such a "positivist" approach to the theory of federalism, declaring in PRUNEYARD SHOPPING CENTER V. ROBINS (1980) that "the United States, as opposed to the several states [is not] possessed of . . . authority . . . to define 'property' in the first instance."

Repeatedly, however, the Court has defied this logic and found that the Constitution's property clauses directly demand protection for interests plainly not treated as property by standing subconstitutional law. DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) is the earliest instance. The MISSOURI COMPROMISE of 1820 established the northern portion of the Louisiana Territory as "free soil." According to the law of many jurisdictions, a slave taken by a master onto free soil was thereby emancipated. Given that as the standing legal rule, a master's legally grounded entitlement in a slave simply would not extend to retention of title after the master had taken the slave into free territory. At a time when this plainly appeared to be the applicable, governing rule, Scott's "owner" took him from Missouri to north Louisiana Territory. The Supreme Court held that to grant Scott his freedom on that basis would be to deprive Sandford of constitutionally protected property without due process of law.

Although a deservedly infamous decision, Dred Scott is not aberrational in its refusal to allow subconstitutional congressional and state lawmaking to dictate the limits of constitutionally protected property. In Pennsylvania Coal Company v. Mahon (1922) the Court granted arguendo the public safety justifications for a law forbidding coalmine owners to remove coal in such a way as to cause the collapse of surface structures, but still found that the law unconstitutionally took the property of mining firms on which it had confiscatory retrospective impact. Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR. wrote that, despite the long-established rule subordinating all property to public-safety regulation, "if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking." The rule's "implied limitation" of property rights "must have its limits, or the contract and due process clauses are gone." In Kaiser Aetna v. United States (1979) the Court dealt similarly with the standing rule subordinating all shoreline property holdings to public rights of access to navigable waters. It refused to apply the rule strictly when doing so would have subjected the complaining owners not only to unwelcome "physical invasions," but to loss of their "distinct investment backed expectations" of privacy. Most recently, the Court's opinion in Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987) strongly implied that a state legal regime expressly subjecting all shoreline land titles to public rights of pedestrian passage would violate a baseline normative standard for property institutions contained in the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Court has thus refused to read the Constitution's property clauses as completely delegating to legislative politics the definition of legal regimes of property rights. It has refused to reduce the judiciary to the ancillary role of protecting persons against retroactive alteration and capricious administration of these subconstitutional legislative regimes. It has done so when the alternative struck it as betrayal of substantive constitutional values linked to property, notably, private sanctuary and limited government. Such cases lie along that contested boundary of JUDICIAL ACTIVISM AND JUDICIAL RESTRAINT where the demand for constitutional vindication confronts the demand for contemporary democratic accountability.

In such cases, the Court is not, however, necessarily rejecting jurisprudential insistence on legal entitlement as a prerequisite to property. It may rather be denying that property-constitutive law can be found only in the "positive" lawmaking acts of legislatures and common-law adjudicators. Not surprisingly (considering the conflicting normative pressures for both a rule of law and government of the people by the people), this choice between an exclusively "positive" and a "natural" provenance for property-constitutive law is just where the jurisprudential consensus on legal property falls apart. We can see the Court in these cases as allying the Framers with those theorists who appeal to "natural" criteria of reason or tradition for a higher-law conception of property entitlement. The Court, in effect, conceives the Framers to have been referring to such criteria when they prescribed constitutional protection for "property."

Thereby, the Court also, and to a like extent, apparently aligns itself (or the Framers) with the Lockean liberal (as opposed to civic republican) antecedents of American constitutionalism. Rather than treat the design and adjustment of property regimes as a central legitimate concern of republican government, the Court to this extent treats property rights as prior and external to state and politics. But the civic heritage may not yet be entirely expunged from American constitutional doctrine or disputation. This heritage may help explain the Court's unshakable tolerance for legislative schemes of property-use regulation that plainly and grossly exceed the bounds of any plausibly Lockean notion of POLICE POWER. More pointedly, it may help explain the settled acceptance of statutory income transfer schemes that appear to "take property from A and give it to B" in defiance of an oft-cited first principle of Lockean higher law. Commentators have argued vigorously, and vainly, that such schemes are both constitutionally obligatory and constitutionally forbidden. The modern Court's refusal of commitment to either view may be its mediation between the civic and the libertarian underpinnings of American constitutionalism.

FRANK I. MICHELMAN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Economic Due Process; Economic Equal Protection; Economy; Property Rights and the Human Body.)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE A. 1975 Private Property and the Constitution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

COHEN, FELIX S. 1954 Dialogue on Private Property. Rutgers Law Review 9:357–387.

EPSTEIN, DAVID F. 1984 The Political Theory of the Federalist. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

EPSTEIN, RICHARD 1985 Takings: Private Property and the Law of Eminent Domain. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

KENNEDY, DUNCAN 1980 Toward a Historical Understanding of Classical Legal Consciousness: The Case of Classical Legal Thought in America, 1850–1940. Research in Law & Society 3:3–24.

MICHELMAN, FRANK I. 1987 Possession vs. Distribution in the Constitutional Idea of Property. Iowa Law Review 72:1319–1350.

NEDELSKY, JENNIFER 1989 Private Property and the Limits of American Constitutionalism: A View from the Formation. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SINGER, JOSEPH WILLIAM 1982 The Legal Rights Debate in Analytical Jurisprudence from Bentham to Hohfeld. Wisconsin Law Review 1982:975–1059.

SYMPOSIUM 1988 The Jurisprudence of Takings. Columbia Law Review 88:1581–1794.

TREANOR, WILLIAM 1985 The Origins and Original Significance of the Just Compensation Clause of the Fifth Amendment. Yale Law Journal 94:694–716.

PROPERTY RIGHTS
(Update)

The REHNQUIST COURT has shown an interest in property rights not seen since the 1930s, and has mounted a number of rhetorical challenges to the sixty-year-long tradition of affording economic liberties less protection than "personal" rights, most notably the statement of Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST in DOLAN V. CITY OF TIGARD (1994) that "the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment is as much a part of the Bill of Rights as the First Amendment of Fourth Amendment, [and] should [not] be relegated to the status of a poor relation." Yet the Supreme Court has fallen short of renewing the constitutional protections enjoyed by PROPERTY in the heyday of ECONOMIC DUE PROCESS, and some of its recent expansions highlight unorthodox connections between property and defendants' rights.

The Court's most prominent demonstration of its renewed interest in property has been its increased willingness to hear cases concerning alleged violations of the EMINENT DOMAIN, or TAKING OF PROPERTY clause, and to hold that government action not involving direct physical appropriation triggers the obligation to pay JUST COMPENSATION under that clause. In LUCAS V. SOUTH CAROLINA COASTAL COUNCIL (1992), for example, the Court held that a land use restriction that left property without "economically beneficial use" was a per se taking, regardless of how weighty a PUBLIC PURPOSE it served. Perhaps more than any other single recent case, Lucas has led property owners to pursue REGULATORY TAKINGS claims, often trying to convince courts to treat separately a particular part of their property or a particular strand in their bundle of property rights to determine that the part was deprived of all economically beneficial use. In two other widely publicized cases, Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987) and Dolan, the Court decided that a government could condition a land use permit on donation of an interest in land to the public only if the donation mitigated some impact of the permitted use, and only if the donation were "roughly proportional" to that impact.

The DUE PROCESS OF LAW clauses of both the Fifth Amendment and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT have also continued to be a textual basis for Rehnquist Court decisions protective of property rights. In BMW of North America v. Gore (1996), the Court held that "grossly excessive" awards of PUNITIVE DAMAGES violated the doctrine of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. In Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel (1998), the decisive CONCURRING OPINION of Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY also relied on substantive due process in striking down a statute that required companies to contribute to a health benefits fund because they had employed beneficiaries as coal miners over thirty years before the statute's passage. Some of the Court's most ardent defenders of property rights, however, did not join in these invocations of due process, no doubt in part due to antipathy toward the doctrine's use to support a right to ABORTION in ROE V. WADE (1973), and, with regard to BMW of North America, in part due to the view that limiting punitive damages protects "defendants rights" rather than "property rights," while curtailing the states' traditional power to punish reprehensible behavior.

The view that forfeiture cases concern "defendants' rights" rather than "property rights" may help to explain the voting lineups in a number of other closely decided recent cases that nonetheless define and protect property rights. In United States v. James Daniel Good Real Property (1993), for example, a bare majority of the Court held that the seizure of real property subject to CIVIL FORFEITURE without prior notice and opportunity to be heard was a violation of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS. In Bennis v. Michigan (1996), a bare majority rejected the claim that forfeiture of a woman's interest in a car in which her husband had, unbeknownst to her, engaged in illegal sexual activity with a prostitute violated the due process of law and takings clauses. And in United States v. Bajakajian (1998), a bare majority held for the first time that a punitive forfeiture grossly disproportional to the defendant's offense violated the excessive fines clause. The four Justices most sympathetic to takings clause claims—William H. Rehnquist, SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, ANTONIN SCALIA, and CLARENCE THOMAS— rejected the constitutional claims in the first two of these cases, and only Thomas, in a pivotal vote that may begin to define him as the Court's most consistent libertarian, recognized the constitutional claim in Bajakajian.

On the issue whether the "property" protected by the federal Constitution is defined by positive subconstitutional law or by some independent method of reasoning or traditional understanding, the Court's position remains ambivalent—an ambivalence that can be found within the writings of individual Justices. Scalia, for example, seemed to draw on a nonpositivist definition when he wrote in Nollan that "the right to build on one's own property—even though its exercise can be subject to legitimate permitting requirements—cannot remotely be described as a 'governmental benefit.' " Yet he appealed explicitly to a positivist definition in Lucas where he wrote that "the Takings Clause does not require compensation when an owner is barred from putting land to a use that is proscribed by 'existing rules or understandings' " about property.

Ultimately, the Court is unlikely to strike down, on a nonpositivist theory of the substantive protection of property, a legal rule of long standing in a particular jurisdiction. That unlikeliness may be seen as a result either of an inability to construct a sufficiently strong nonpositivist theory, or of a faith that long-standing Anglo-American legal rules in fact substantially embody the correct theory. This latter resolution may be suggested by Scalia's comment in Lucas that state COMMON LAW principles "rarely support prohibition of the 'essential use' of land"—as presumably they should not under the correct nonpositivist theory.

When the constitutional challenge is to a recent change in law, the positivist approach reveals itself as incomplete. For if the Court is unlikely to strike down rules of long standing, it is equally unlikely to strike down all recent changes in law. Yet the positivist approach, while reframing the question of property protection in terms of legal change, does not identify which changes concern "property" in the constitutional sense, nor which of that set of property-related changes are constitutional or unconstitutional. The issue of defining which changes in law concerned "property" within the meaning of the takings and due process clauses recently split the Court in Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel (1998). Five members of the Court concluded that the "property" protected by the takings clause is restricted to specific, identified property interests, and does not extend to general liabilities to pay money. Those same five, however, concluded that the creation of a general liability could deprive a person of property without due process within the meaning of the due process clause (an issue pointedly avoided by the four Justices who relied on the takings clause). They then split on the issue whether the challenged law actually did violate substantive due process, reflecting continuing disagreement over the process of winnowing constitutional from unconstitutional changes in law. This disagreement surely will persist as the Court faces the next wave of constitutional property litigation over so-called deregulatory takings.

ROBERT BRAUNEIS
(2000)

Bibliography

BRAUNEIS, ROBERT 1996 "The Foundation of Our 'Regulatory Takings' Jurisprudence": The Myth and Meaning of Justice Holmes's Opinion in Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon. Yale Law Journal 106:613–702.

ELY, JAMES W., JR. 1992 The Guardian of Every Other Right: A Constitutional History of Property Rights. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press.

FISCHEL, WILLIAM A. 1995 Regulatory Takings: Law, Economics, and Politics. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1996 A License to Steal: The Forfeiture of Property. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

PAUL, ELLEN FRANKEL and DICKMAN, HOWARD, eds. 1990 Liberty, Property and the Future of Constitutional Development. Albany: State University of New York Press.

RADIN, MARGARET JANE 1993 Reinterpreting Property. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

ROSE, CAROL 1994 Property and Persuasion: Essays on the History, Theory, and Rhetoric of Ownership. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

SIDAK, J. GREGORY and SPULBER, DANIEL F. 1997 Deregulatory Takings: The Competitive Transformation of Network Industries in the United States. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press.

PROPERTY RIGHTS AND THE HUMAN BODY

PROPERTY has been described as a "bundle of rights" consisting of the right to possess, to use, to exclude, to enjoy profits, and to dispose. When it comes to property in the human body, one sees various collections of some component rights in this bundle, though never the whole bundle. Moreover, the precise contours of these component rights are often unclear, and depend on the perspective from which one approaches the body.

The perspectives available are two: from inside the body and from outside the body. That is, one can ask: what property rights do I have in my own body, or what property rights do I have in the body of another? With respect to one's own body, the COMMON LAW, which has been the primary source of property rights, has provided a set of protections that have the effect of granting certain property rights in one's own body, though the law never speaks of these rights as property. Tort law protects us from nonconsensual physical contact and physical invasions. If A punches B in the nose, A is liable for battery. A doctor who fails to get the informed consent of a patient before performing surgery commits a battery. This doctrine implies that the law gives us the right to possess our own bodies and to exclude others from using our bodies. Tort law also prohibits others from unreasonably confining us, through the tort of false imprisonment; giving us the right to direct our own bodies as we see fit. However, the common law has not articulated a clear general position on our rights to profit from our bodies or to dispose of our bodies.

With respect to the bodies of others, our property rights are considerably narrower. The common law gives to the next of kin a "quasi-property" right in the body of the decedent, which consists of the right to possess the body for purposes of burial, to recover damages for the mutilation of the body, and the right to prescribe the manner and place of burial—but not the right to sell the whole or parts of the decedent's body. This is the extent of our common law property rights in the bodies of others, at least as far as these rights have been articulated by American courts. From an early time, English courts apparently have gone further in limiting these rights; WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, in his Commentaries on the Laws of England, asserts that English common law gave no legal validity whatsoever to the master–slave relationship, and thus refused to recognize the claim of an absolute property right in the body of another.

Somewhere between the question of rights in one's own body and that of rights in another falls the issue of ABORTION. The early common law applied the "quickening" rule, which held the killing of an unborn infant unlawful from the moment it is able to stir in its mother's womb.

The Constitution has played a role in defining the limitations on property rights in the body. Most importantly, the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT prohibits SLAVERY and involuntary servitude, and thus nullifies an individual's claim to have an absolute property right in the body of another or to have given such a right in his own body. The Supreme Court's ROE V. WADE (1973) decision held that state laws prohibiting abortion may violate the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and articulated a rule governing the constitutionality of abortion restrictions that is analogous to the common law quickening rule in that it gives states the greatest freedom to regulate abortion in the final trimester of pregnancy. In Washington v. Glucksberg (1997), the Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment does not imply a protected RIGHT TO DIE with the assistance of a physician.

Today, new constitutional issues are being generated by statutes that limit the scope of property rights in the body, usually with the aim of facilitating the procurement and transplantation of human organs. Several states have enacted laws permitting coroners to remove body parts (typically corneas) from a cadaver without the consent of either the deceased or the next of kin. Pursuant to these statutes, several coroners have removed body parts without seeking consent. These removal statutes, and concomitant policies, are inconsistent with common-law quasi-property rights. Several courts have held that these policies violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and Erik Jaffe has suggested that the Fifth Amendment's TAKINGS clause should also apply.

Other statutes limiting property rights in the body are those prohibiting the purchase or sale of organs. The National Organ Transplant Act, a federal law, prohibits the purchase and sale of organs for transplantation. Several states have enacted similar statutes, some of them banning purchase and sale for any purpose. Although these laws were enacted on the basis of noble motives (perhaps reflecting the quality-deterioration concerns initially raised, in the context of the blood market, by Richard Titmuss), their ultimate impact is probably harmful. As transplant technology proceeds apace, and the number of suitable organ recipients increases accordingly, the shortage of human organs available for transplantation worsens every year. Allowing certain limited purchase and sale agreements, such as the postmortem transfers proposed by Lloyd Cohen, could alleviate the shortage of transplantable organs without generating the negative consequences envisioned by proponents of the sale bans.

Can or should the Constitution play a role in resolving this growing problem? If the courts were to take a broad view of our property rights in our own bodies, they might hold that statutes banning all contracts for the purchase and sale of body parts constitute takings of private property, just as a statute prohibiting individuals from selling their homes would be a taking. Or a court might find that a sweeping ban cannot survive RATIONAL BASIS review under the due process clause. The question has been unimportant until very recently, because our body parts had little value to others before the advent of transplantation. But we are approaching the day when nearly every one of our organs will have a substantial market value. As this value increases, the deprivations imposed by the sale bans may reach a level comparable to those that have been deemed unconstitutional in earlier cases.

KEITH N. HYLTON
(2000)

Bibliography

COHEN, LLOYD R. 1990 Increasing the Supply of Transplantable Organs: The Virtues of a Futures Market. George Washington Law Review 58:1–51.

HYLTON, KEITH N. 1990 The Law and Economics of Organ Procurement. Law & Policy 12:197–224.

——— 1996 The Law and Ethics of Organ Sales. Annual Review of Law and Ethics 4:115–136.

JAFFE, ERIK S. 1990 "She's Got Bette Davis['s] Eyes": Assessing the Nonconsensual Removal of Cadaver Organs under the Takings and Due Process Clauses. Columbia Law Review 90: 528–574.

MUNZER, STEPHEN R. 1994 An Uneasy Case Against Property Rights in Body Parts. Pages 259–286 in Ellen Frankel Paul, Fred D. Miller Jr., and Jeffrey Paul, eds., Property Rights. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press.

SCOTT, RUSSELL 1981 The Body as Property. New York: Viking Press.

TITMUSS, RICHARD 1971 The Gift Relationship: From Human Blood to Social Policy. New York: Pantheon Books.

PROSECUTORIAL DISCRETION AND ITS CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITS

In 1992, several black men charged with federal crack-cocaine offenses alleged in defense that they were selected for prosecution because of their race. They offered affidavits stating that, of twenty-four cases closed by a federal public defender's office in 1991, all of those charged with similar crack offenses had been black; that there are an equal number of white and nonminority crack users and dealers; and that whites are more likely to be prosecuted in more lenient state courts. The Supreme Court, in United States v. Armstrong (1996), held that these defendants were not entitled to access to the government's records to perfect their challenge to the prosecutor's discretion because they had not made a sufficient threshold showing that the prosecution acted on the basis of race.

The Court's decision in Armstrong illustrates the judiciary's general deference to the prosecutor's discretion. The prosecutor may choose which crimes and which persons to prosecute. She is entitled to prosecute whenever she has PROBABLE CAUSE to believe a certain person committed a certain crime. She need not be certain that she can prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In the twentieth century, there have always been many more legitimately prosecutable people than resources allow for prosecution, in addition to laws that the public has not wanted prosecutors to rigorously enforce.

In the United States, the exercise of these kinds of discretion is part of EXECUTIVE POWER, rather than LEGISLATIVE POWER or JUDICIAL POWER. Article II of the Constitution mandates the executive branch and its agents to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed. . . ." Prosecutorial discretion encompasses all aspects of a case; the prosecutor may decide whether to investigate, grant immunity, or allow a plea. Since the Constitution leaves these decisions in the hands of the executive, the policy of SEPARATION OF POWERS weighs against too much judicial oversight of the prosecutor's discretion.

It would be difficult for judges to correct prosecutors even if there were no doctrine of separation of powers. To know whether a prosecutor has appropriately levied a charge, a judge would have to know about the prosecutor's entire docket of similar kinds of cases. This would consume more time than most courts have. Besides, there is no good reason to believe a judge would be more competent than the prosecutor to decide whether the seriousness of the crime and the weight of the evidence justifies going forward with the case. If the judge errs, she will not be subject to the judgment of the voters. If the judiciary must pause to consider the wisdom of a prosecution, even valued prosecutions that should go forth will be delayed. Under the Anglo-American system, the judge can only control the prosecutor by dismissing a case but cannot require her to go forward. Finally, a prosecutor whose discretion will be second-guessed may refuse to exercise discretion at all by routinely filing charges on everything she sees and letting the judges go to the effort of sorting it out. For these reasons courts leave the prosecutorial decision in the hands of the prosecutors and presume that discretion has been properly exercised.

Despite this broad rule, the Constitution does not confer unfettered discretion. Under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause, courts may review a prosecutor's decision for unconstitutional motive such as race or religion. To succeed in a defense of selective prosecution, the accused must prove that prosecutorial policy had both a discriminatory effect and purpose. The Court first recognized this defense in YICK WO V. HOPKINS (1886), where a Chinese laundryman in San Francisco had been prosecuted for violating a city laundry ordinance because of his race. The Court held that "though the law be fair on its face and impartial in appearance" when "applied with an evil eye and an unequal hand" it violated the defendant's constitutional right to equal protection.

Historically, the defense of selective prosecution has rarely succeeded. To prove it is expensive. The accused must examine walls of court files to show a pattern of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. One way to transfer some (but not all) of these costs would be to require the prosecutor to gather her own files of all the relevant cases and turn them over to the defendant for examination. In Armstrong, the Court held that before the defendants could look at the government's files, they must provide "clear evidence" that the government failed to prosecute other similarly situated white defendants.

Critics of Armstrong argue that it renders selective prosecution largely impotent as a defense; they argue that Armstrong's increased hostility toward statistical evidence and the defense's increased evidentiary burden immunize prosecutors from constitutional scrutiny. Although this criticism may be true, it does not mean that Armstrong is improvident. The judiciary accepts as a maxim that one should not prosecute red-haired people because they are red-haired. Yet, absent a rigorous standard of proof, selective prosecution is easy for a defendant to assert and hard for a prosecutor to disprove. Even a good faith but wrongful assertion imposes costs on the government and the defendant and delays decision on the truth of the charge. Moreover, the accused says only that the prosecutor was wrong because she chose to prosecute based on an unconstitutional motive like race or creed. To claim selective prosecution is not to claim innocence: the red-haired thief hasn't claimed he didn't steal, and the Zoroastrian murderer hasn't claimed that he didn't murder.

There are two more subtle yet important reasons why Armstrong's heightened burden in proving selective prosection may make sense. First, when a court rules on a selective prosecution claim it must judge the validity of the prosecutor's defense: Had the defendants in Armstrong proffered clear evidence that white individuals were not similarly prosecuted, the Court would have had to evaluate whether Jamaican, Haitian, and black street gangs really did predominate crack distribution as the U.S. Attorney's office claimed. Today's judiciary is generally reluctant to involve itself in these complex and politically charged judgments and leaves it to the legislative branch to deal with them. Second, successful use of a selective prosecution defense was extremely rare even before Armstrong raised the bar. Most judges do not see a prosecutor's abuse of her discretion as a real problem, and little evidence supports a contrary conclusion. After all, in Armstrong it was Congress, not prosecutors, that imposed stiff mandatory sentencing guidelines on crack-cocaine dealers creating the disparity between powdered cocaine and crack-cocaine offenses.

JAMES B. ZAGEL
(2000)

Bibliography

HELLER, ROBERT 1998 Selective Prosecution and Federalization of Criminal Law: The Need for Meaningful Judicial Review of Prosecutorial Discretion. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 145:1309–1358.

JAMPOL, MELISSA L. 1997 Goodbye to the Defense of Selective Prosecution. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 87: 932–966.

LOVE, MARCI A. 1997 United States v. Armstrong: The Supreme Court Formulates a Discovery Standard for Selective Prosecution. Temple Political Civil Rights Law Review 7:191–219.

PROVIDENCE BANK v. BILLINGS
4 Peters 514 (1830)

This case anticipated the DOCTRINE of the CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE CO. V. WARREN BRIDGE CO. (1837) case and limited the doctrine of tax immunity established by NEW JERSEY V. WILSON (1812). The Court here, through Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL, established the principle that a corporate charter should not be construed to vest more rights than are found in its express provisions. A state taxed a bank for the first time long after chartering it. The bank contended that its charter implied a tax immunity, because a state power to tax the bank could destroy it, contrary to its charter. The Court sustained the tax against the CONTRACT CLAUSE argument, reasoning that the state had made no express contract to relinquish its power to tax and that the relinquishment of that power "is never to be assumed." Chartered privileges "must be expressed . . . or they do not exist."

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE COMPANY v. BENJAMIN
328 U.S. 408 (1946)

The dissenters in UNITED STATES V. SOUTH-EASTERN UNDERWRITERS (1944) feared that declaring insurance to be INTERSTATE COMMERCE, subject to congressional regulation, would create chaos by rendering state regulation of that industry void. An act of Congress, however, left most such regulation standing and Justice WILEY RUTLEDGE headed a unanimous Court sustaining a state tax that discriminated against interstate commerce. Assuming that such a tax would be invalid in the absence of congressional action, here Congress had decided that uniformity of regulation and taxation was necessary and had authorized even discriminatory state regulation and taxation of the insurance business.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: State Regulation of Commerce.)

PRUNEYARD SHOPPING CENTER v. ROBBINS
447 U.S. 74 (1980)

HUDGENS V. NLRB (1976) had held that the FIRST AMENDMENT did not compel private owners of SHOPPING CENTERS to permit their property to be used for expressive activity. In PruneYard, California's supreme court held that the state constitution required a shopping center owner to permit the collection of signatures on a petition. The Supreme Court unanimously affirmed. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, for the Court, concluded that the state law did not work an uncompensated TAKING OF PROPERTY. Nor did it violate the owner's First Amendment rights by compelling it to convey a message. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, concurring, argued that under other circumstances an owner might have such a First Amendment right.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

PSYCHIATRY AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

New impositions of legal control in the last generation have transformed traditional relationships between providers and consumers of mental health services, cabining the power physicians historically exercised over the insane. Paradoxically, the new legal limits on psychiatrists developed in a period when novel psychotropic medication—veritable wonder drugs—at last provided bases for medical paternalistic authority. Psychiatrists complained that patients would miss out on needed treatment and "rot with their rights on."

The legal developments involve processes for civilly protecting or subduing the mentally impaired, processing them through the CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM, recognizing their rights as psychiatric inpatients, and establishing for them programs of patient advocacy. Patient claims include rights to treatment; to refuse treatment; to the least intrusive alternative form of treatment; and to privacy, autonomy, liberty, information, communication, and protection while undergoing treatment. Mental health lawyers have elevated these claims to new constitutional doctrine, conveniently overlooking that many decisions recognizing them came from lower courts.

The constitutional values underlying these decisions have also found expression in other legal forms: legislative law reform, judicial interpretation of unresisting common law and statutes, and unfolding of state constitutional doctrine. Although not necessarily flying the U.S. constitutional flag, these legal developments are nevertheless based on constitutional values, such as liberty, privacy, due process, equality, and free speech. The principles invoked are not specific to mental health, but common to the modern judicial approach to protecting the vulnerable.

The Supreme Court has been slow to join these trends. In contrast to its behavior in the field of criminal justice, here the Supreme Court has followed reluctantly rather than lead. As with the rights of the criminally accused, the Court has recently retreated, leading to a development of state constitutional law.

A legislative revolution in civil commitment procedures received constitutional underpinnings in Addington v. Texas (1979), which mandated a standard of "clear and convincing" evidence for the fact-finding on which commitment is based. Commitment through the criminal process was limited constitutionally by the holding that incompetency to stand trial can justify incarceration only for a reasonable period during which restoration of trial capacity is foreseeable.

The Constitution seems to impose little constraint on changes in the best-known rule in the field of psychiatry and law: the insanity defense to criminal prosecution. The state may redefine the defense and even require the defendant, rather than the prosecution, to bear the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The "least restrictive alternative" criterion for involuntary treatment, proclaimed by many lower courts, has not been adopted by the Supreme Court.

The Court has also been hesitant about a right to refuse treatment, although recognizing in theory a liberty interest in avoiding unwanted administration of antipsychotic drugs. In WASHINGTON V. HARPER (1990), it refused to hold that a prisoner had the right to refuse such treatment, taking into account that he was confined and determined to be dangerous to himself or others and that the treatment was in his medical interest. Nor was a prior judicial hearing required because the Court believed his interests would be better served by allowing medication decisions to be made by doctors rather than judges. A number of state courts have nevertheless recognized a right to refuse treatment based on common law protection of bodily integrity or state constitutional guarantees of privacy.

The right to treatment and inpatient rights have fared no better in the Supreme Court than has the right to refuse treatment. Ruling on an involuntarily committed, developmentally disabled person, Youngberg v. Romeo (1982) held his constitutionally protected liberty interests included minimally adequate training, as well as reasonable safety and freedom from undue bodily restraints. Presumably, the involuntarily committed mentally ill possess similar rights. But the Court eviscerated such rights by declaring that the Constitution requires only that "professional judgment" be exercised, with the courts to show deference to that judgment. "Deliberate indifference" to an inpatient's serious psychiatric needs might perhaps violate the Eighth Amendment by analogy to a holding on prisoners' medical needs.

The new legal limitations on psychiatric power seem confining only by contrast to the vast authority traditionally exercised. The mentally ill are still subject to governmental power not exercised over the healthy, on rationales of paternalism as well as protection of others. The patients' rights movement points out the hypocrisy of claims that governmental power is exercised for the patient's own good if adequate treatment is not guaranteed and if "acquittal" on the ground of insanity can result in loss of liberty for a longer period than conviction. And psychiatrists still are permitted to testify as experts, giving opinions on matters beyond their actual scientific competence, such as predicting dangerousness on the basis of clinical interviews.

The psychiatrist-patient relationship, a central focus for therapists, has been largely overlooked in constitutional case law. When the doctor is double agent for both patient and prosecutor, a Miranda-like warning is required before a psychiatrist examines a convicted defendant for a death penalty hearing. Psychiatric assistance itself can be a constitutional right: an indigent defendant must have access to a psychiatrist on a showing of need to prepare his or her insanity defense.

Psychiatric condition is generally not central to an individual's constitutional status. Neither psychiatric patients as a group nor MENTAL ILLNESS as a trait has yet been held to invoke specially solicitous judicial protection from elected legislatures, which is labeled heightened scrutiny under the equal protection clause. In CLEBURNE V. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER, INC. (1985) the Supreme Court explicitly said it would not extend heightened scrutiny to the developmentally disabled. The Court nevertheless did just what it said it was not doing, on reasoning equally valid for the mentally ill. (Indeed, five Justices repudiated the whole theory of three "tiers" of equal protection scrutiny.) Psychiatric condition nevertheless has some irreducible effect on legal status: the Eighth Amendment prohibits the execution of the mentally incompetent. A finding of initial mental illness is insufficient to justify indefinite confinement; O'CONNOR V. DONALDSON (1975) requires findings of both current mental illness and dangerousness.

Constitutional law has been little affected by psychodynamic perspectives, even though twentieth-century American culture has been heavily influenced by psychoanalysis, whose models of the mind differ significantly from the law's traditions. Some cases contrast "the law's" model of the mind, involving free will and choice, with psychiatry's model, supposedly deterministic; these courts conclude that judges must disregard such psychiatric ideas. A handful of judges openly ask whether a model of the mind must be assumed for constitutional purposes. One of the law's most-cited "unreported" cases, Kaimowitz v. Dept. of Mental Health (1973), said that the FIRST AMENDMENT, must protect the individual's right to generate ideas if it is going to protect the right to communicate those ideas. But in Mills v. Rogers, although the Supreme Court cited Michael Shapiro's germinal work on the topic, it declined to rule on this point. Freedom of thought (and implicitly of emotion) was recognized in STANLEY V. GEORGIA (1969), which declared a First Amendment right to personal possession of obscene materials in the home. Washington v. Harper (1990) recognized that it is a substantial interference with a person's liberty interest to alter his brain's chemical balance to affect his cognitive process. And Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS's famous dissent in OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928) had spoken of protecting throughts and emotions as well as beliefs.

In criminal law, the Court early had relied implicitly on a free-will model of the mind to hold a confession involuntary, based on the defendant's insanity at the time he or she confessed rather than on police coercion. This focus on the suspect's state of mind suggested that free will is a constitutional prerequisite for voluntariness. But the Court subsequently retreated from that approach.

A central lesson of psychoanalysis is that much of our mental functioning is largely inaccessible to consciousness, while nevertheless affecting our conscious thoughts, feelings, and behavior. Psychiatrists are therefore used to looking for unconscious intents and unconscious, often symbolic, meanings. The Supreme Court has recognized that actions and institutions can have not only intended but unintended psychological effects with constitutional significance, as in the famous footnote 11 of BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954). But the Court has not yet recognized the argument by scholars that government officials can violate the Constitution by unconscious discrimination, reflecting not overt hatred or contempt but unconscious conflict and ambivalence, aimed not only at ethnic groups and women but also at the poor and the elderly.

Lawyers' theories for interpreting the constitutional text and the motives of constitutional actors are perhaps starting to be more influenced by the experience of that other profession of interpreters, the psychotherapists. The psychoanalytic perspective assumes that multilayered contradictory intentions and symbolic meanings abound; we live lives of poetry, not prose. Speakers do not generally fully comprehend their own purposes, and the intellectual baggage we carry with us distorts our perceptions of current realities. Emotions permeate all that we do, and our rational goals are regularly compromised with dictates of conscience and defense against anxieties. Context, slips, and redundancy are important clues to meaning; useful interpretation requires an ongoing dialogue. By calling our attention to such concepts, psychiatry's chief contribution to constitutional law can be not in dealing with the abnormal but in helping us to understand one another and ourselves.

MARTIN LYON LEVINE
(1992)

Bibliography

KATZ, JAY et al. 1967 Psychoanalysis, Psychiatry, and Law. New York: Free Press.

LEVINE, MARTIN LYON 1988 Age Discrimination and the Mandatory Retirement Controversy. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

SHAPIRO, MICHAEL H. and SPECE, ROY G., JR. 1981, 1991 Bioethics and Law: Cases, Materials and Problems. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

The refusal of hotels, restaurants, theaters, and other public accommodations to serve blacks was not exclusively a southern phenomenon. In the South, however, the practice was an essential part of a system of racial dominance and dependency, long after the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT abolished slavery and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT recognized the CITIZENSHIP of the freed slaves. Aware of the role played by this form of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in the system of white supremacy, Congress adopted the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875, the last major CIVIL RIGHTS act of the Reconstruction era. The law prohibited public accommodations, including railroads along with the types already mentioned, from denying access to any person on account of race. The Supreme Court held this law unconstitutional, saying that when Congress enforced the Fourteenth Amendment it had no power to reach private action. (See CIVIL RIGHTS CASES; STATE ACTION.)

Later came the Jim Crow laws—state laws requiring racial SEGREGATION in all manner of public places, including public accommodations. This practice received the Court's blessing in PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896), a case involving the segregation of seating in railroad cars. (See SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE.) By the end of the nineteenth century, the denial of access for blacks to public accommodations in the South was firmly rooted in both law and custom.

Soon after the Supreme Court decided BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), the modern civil rights movement turned to the problem of access to public accommodations. The reason for direct action such as freedom rides and SIT-INS was not that seats in the front of the bus arrive at a destination before back seats do, or that black college students yearn to perch on lunch counter stools. Public accommodations became a target for civil rights demonstrators for exactly the same reason that they had been made the vehicles for racial discrimination in the first place: segregation and the refusal of service to blacks were powerful symbols of racial inferiority, highly visible denials of the entitlement of blacks to be treated as persons and citizens. Employment discrimination and housing discrimination might touch material interests of great importance, but no interest is more important than self-respect. The primary target of the civil rights movement was the stigma of caste.

Within a few years after the Brown decision, the Supreme Court had held unconstitutional nearly the whole range of Jim Crow laws. Racial segregation practiced by state institutions, or commanded or authorized by state laws, failed the test of the Fourteenth Amendment even before Congress reentered the public accommodations field. In most of the states of the North and West, civil rights laws commanded equal access not only to public accommodations—such laws merely reinforced the common law duties of innkeepers and common carriers—but also to other businesses. In the South, however, private discrimination continued in most hotels, restaurants, and barber shops. The Supreme Court was repeatedly invited to decide whether the Fourteenth Amendment established a right of access to such places, free of racial bias, but the Court repeatedly declined the invitation. (See BELL V. MARYLAND.)

As part of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, Congress adopted a comprehensive public accommodations law, forbidding discrimination in the same types of places that had been covered by the 1875 act. (Railroads were forbidden to discriminate by modern interpretations of the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887.) Before the year was out, the Supreme Court had upheld the public accommodations portion of the 1964 act, on the basis of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. (See HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL V. UNITED STATES.)

The 1964 act is limited in its coverage, reaching an establishment only if it "affects commerce" or if its discrimination is "supported by STATE ACTION." The act exempts both private clubs and small rooming houses lived in by their proprietors. Now that the Supreme Court has interpreted the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 as a broad guarantee against private racial discrimination in the sale of property and other contracting, and validated the law as a congressional enforcement of the Thirteenth Amendment, at least some of the limitations of the 1964 act have been made irrelevant. For example, a barber shop is covered by the 1964 act if it is located in a covered hotel, but not if it is independent. Under recent interpretations of the 1866 act, any barber shop would violate the law by refusing service on the basis of the customer's race. (See JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO.; RUNYON V. MCCRARY.)

The substantive core of the Fourteenth Amendment is a principle of equal citizenship. (See EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.) Even in the absence of civil rights legislation, that principle demands that the organized community treat each of us, irrespective of race, as a respected, participating member. Racially based denial of access or segregation in places of public accommodations—even those privately owned—is a deliberate denial of the status of equal citizenship, as the sit-in demonstrators knew and helped the rest of us to understand.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

LEWIS, THOMAS P. 1963 The Sit-in Cases: Great Expectations. Supreme Court Review 1963:101–151.

POLLITT, DANIEL H. 1960 Dime Store Demonstrations: Events and Legal Problems of the First Sixty Days. Duke Law Journal 1960:315–365.

WOODWARD, C. VANN 1966 The Strange Career of Jim Crow, 2d (rev.) ed. New York: Oxford University Press.

PUBLIC CHOICE THEORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL JURISPRUDENCE

Inasmuch as the public is often adversely affected by special interest LEGISLATION, it has a strong incentive to devise institutional mechanisms—like constitutions— that make passage of such legislation more difficult. Before one can gauge whether a constitution is designed to promote the general welfare of the public by impeding the efficacy of INTEREST GROUPS or to advance the interests of particular groups within society, it is necessary to establish guidelines by which the "public-regardingness" of a constitution can be evaluated.

The most objective means of evaluating a constitution is to examine the actual effects of the document on interest group behavior. If the constitution establishes mechanisms that facilitate rent-seeking, it is reasonable to infer that the Framers intended to encourage this result. If, on the other hand, the constitution establishes mechanisms that retard such activity by making it more costly, one can also infer that these costs were intended.

JAMES MADISON's formal, publicly articulated pronouncements indicate that controlling the ability of interest groups to achieve antimajoritarian outcomes in the legislature was a primary goal of the U.S. Constitution. As we see from examining "hidden-implicit" legislation, however, it is often impossible to draw conclusions about the intentions of those who make law simply by evaluating their public pronouncements. Thus while the Framers stated publicly that reducing the political power of factions was a central feature of their constitutional design, an even more convincing indication that the Constitution was intended to promote the public interest is found by examining the results of the Framers' work.

One who observes the impressive success of interest groups in obtaining favorable legislation might conclude either that the Constitution has failed in its attempt to impede interest groups or that it was not designed to impede their activities in the first place. Such a conclusion would be erroneous.

The formation of a representative democracy establishes what economists refer to as an "agency relationship." An agency relationship calls for one person or group of people (the principal) to hire another person or group of people (the agent) to perform services and make decisions on the principal's behalf. The contract is successful for the contracting parties if it accurately anticipates postcontractual problems and deals with these problems in cost-effective ways.

In a representative democracy, the contract that initiates this agency relationship is its constitution. The principals are the citizens, and the agents are the officials they elect. Elected officials, like all agents, are inevitably more concerned with maximizing their own utility than with maximizing the utility of their principals. This divergence of interests (called "agency costs") is an inevitable feature inherent in any principal-agent relationship—including, perhaps especially, the one that exists between voters and their elected representatives. The agency costs inherent in representative democracy manifest themselves in side bargains between interest groups and legislators.

Because of the high cost of monitoring the behavior of elected officials, the expected costs to the officials of such behavior is low, and the benefits are high. The goal of a public-regarding constitution, then, is to establish mechanisms (such as the SEPARATION OF POWERS) and institutions (such as the independent judiciary) that make rent-seeking by interest groups more costly by reducing the benefits that legislators can realize. However, there are inevitable costs associated with establishing the very mechanisms and institutions that retard rent-seeking.

Because rent-seeking cannot be eliminated without cost, one cannot conclude that a constitution seeks to facilitate rent-seeking merely because it fails to eliminate it entirely. In fact, rational principals will expend resources to control the behavior of their agents only up to the point at which the marginal costs of such expenditures equals the marginal benefit in terms of reduced rent-seeking. The test of whether the Framers intended to eliminate rent-seeking, then, should not be whether the Constitution eliminates all rent-seeking, but how effectively it provides mechanisms that align the interest of elected representatives with those of the public generally. Under this test, the mechanisms and institutions established in the Constitution indicate a purpose to minimize special interest bargains.

Public choice theorists have suggested economic reasons why constitutions are likely to be more public-regarding than other forms of law. One is that special interest groups are unlikely to agree to constitutional rules that make life easier for other special interest groups. Rules that facilitate rent-seeking generally are likely to cost each separate special interest group more in the way of wealth transfers to other groups than the group itself can expect to receive from the transfers it obtains. Thus, even special interest groups that might benefit from some specific, discrete legislative wealth transfers are likely to object to general constitutional provisions that facilitate rent-seeking.

Finally, since the life of a constitutional rule is much longer than the effective life of a statute, the present value of the cost to the public of a constitutional rule that is not public-regarding will be much greater than the cost of an identical statutory rule. This greater cost will tend to mitigate the free-rider problem that plagues the public in the normal legislative arena.

Support for the hypothesis that the American Constitution is a public-regarding document, structured to favor the general polity over special interest groups can be derived from Article I, which sets forth the size and composition of the legislature. Building on the theoretical work of James Buchanan and Gordon Tullock, Robert McCormick and Robert Tollison have demonstrated empirically that for a fixed number of total legislators, interest groups fare better in the market for legislation where the legislators are distributed equally between the two houses of a bicameral legislature. Therefore, if the Constitution was designed to make interest group bargains less costly, we would expect Article I to require the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES and U.S. SENATE to be of equal size. Yet, consistent with a public-regarding view of the Constitution, Article I plainly envisions a wide disparity in membership size between the House and the Senate.

In addition, where the members of each house of a bicameral legislature represent different constituencies, and where the two houses must concur to pass a law, it is more difficult for discrete factions to ensure the passage of legislation that furthers their interests. Thus the Constitution has imposed what is, in effect, a SUPERMAJORITY RULE of voting, which raises decision costs and makes favorable treatment less likely for special interest groups. The same analysis applies to the executive VETO POWER, which enables the executive branch to act as a third house of the legislature, thus further raising the costs to interest groups.

The FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, the COMMERCE CLAUSE, the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause, the EQUAL PROTECTION clause, the DUE PROCESS clause, the CONTRACT CLAUSE, and the EMINENT DOMAIN clause also support the hypothesis that the Constitution was designed to impede rather than advance rent-seeking. The fact that the Constitution establishes a multitude of mechanisms to deter the efficacy of interest groups is strong evidence that the Framers intended this deterrence. Even the direct democratic process by which the Constitution was enacted ensured that it would be a public-regarding document. Thus, it is likely that the influence of interest groups on the content of the Constitution was less than the influence of such groups on the content of ordinary, day-to-day legislation.

JONATHAN R. MACEY
(2000)

PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

The government may regulate public employees more extensively than citizens at large because legitimate employer interests in controlling job-related behavior supplement the government's general constitutional power to control the behavior of private citizens. Government employers constitutionally are less free than private employers to control their employees, however, for the simple reason that the Constitution primarily limits government, not private, power. Eligibility criteria, work rules, and myriad personnel decisions take on constitutional dimensions in public sector employment that are absent from the private sector.

The competing analogies of government as citizen-regulator and government as private employer raise related questions. How much more power may the government exercise over its employees than over citizens at large? What constitutional limits bind public employers that do not bind private employers? The two questions tend to converge because, inevitably, the government affects its employees as regulator and employer simultaneously.

The constitutional issues comprise both substance and process. What substantive freedoms may the government require its employees to forgo as a condition of employment and what are the permissible and impermissible bases for disadvantaging public employees? Procedurally, when, how, and with what opportunity to respond, must government employers inform their employees of the reasons for adverse personnel actions?

The constitutional values at stake clash and mesh in complex ways. Government workers have individual rights to exercise substantive freedoms without improper penalty and to be treated fairly by the government. These often vie with government interests in effective, honest, efficient, and democratic management of the public's business. The government also has interests in employee loyalty and in the confidential execution of public policy. These may war with the value of freedom for dissident employees to bring important information to public attention and to check abuse of government power by other officials. Inevitably, public employees have greater opportunities than ordinary citizens both to impede legitimate government action and to prevent government abuse.

Public employees' own rights and the implication of their activities for public governance make the constitutional balance important and intricate, especially given this century's extensive increase in public employment. The existence of 3 million federal employees and 13 million more state and local government workers makes sacrifices of their constitutional freedoms of considerable consequence, both personal and societal. Yet their numbers create a potent political force able to secure statutory job protection and to fend off arbitrary treatment as a group, diminishing the need for constitutional protection. In addition, the size of the public work force increases legitimate government claims to constitutional flexibility in employee management.

Speaking in broad historical terms, Supreme Court decisions on the constitutional status of public employees reflect varying sensitivity to one or a combination of these competing considerations at different periods. Three major themes are discernible, however. The earliest, simplest, and perhaps most powerful is broad deference to government employment prerogatives. This deference rests on the common understanding that the Constitution creates no constitutional right to government employment. The frequently invoked corollary is that those who want the privilege of government work may be compelled to forgo exercising constitutional rights that the government cannot deny private citizens. Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, then still a state court judge, succinctly expressed this RIGHT-PRIVILEGE DISTINCTION theme in McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford (1892). Holmes rejected a policeman's claim that his discharge for political activity violated his right of free expression, commenting that the officer "may have a constitutional right to talk politics, but he has no constitutional right to be a policeman."

The Supreme Court invoked this theme before and after McAuliffe. At very different stages of constitutional development over the past century, the Court has consistently upheld government power to foster a nonpartisan civil service by requiring vast numbers of public employees to refrain from active participation in politics, a cherished right of the citizenry at large. The Court has also upheld government requirements that public employees vow to uphold and defend the federal and state constitutions and not attempt their unlawful overthrow, that they live in the employing JURISDICTION, and that national security employees not publish writings about their work until the intended publication is screened to cull out classified information. In the early 1950s, moreover, the Court tolerated government efforts to disqualify from public jobs people who had advocated the forceful overthrow of the government, or who belonged to groups that did, or who refused to reveal their association with such groups, even in circumstances in which private citizens could not be punished for saying or doing the same things.

The right-privilege distinction remains a powerful influence, but Cold War hysteria and McCarthy-era purges of government employees suspected of subversive beliefs provoked the realization that adverse personnel decisions may involve more than legitimate government interests in employee relations, worker loyalty, bureaucratic neutrality, and government efficiency. The Court began to impose constitutional limits narrowly designed to protect public employees from invidiously selective maltreatment. This second theme protects against improper government motivation, but not against broad impact. Restrictions on the political freedom of numerous public employees are tolerated for the legitimate advantages of having a nonpartisan bureaucracy, but government may not penalize even a few for constitutionally unacceptable reasons, such as dislike of their beliefs. In UNITED STATES V. LOVETT (1946), for example, the Court struck down as a BILL OF ATTAINDER a provision of an appropriations law prohibiting payment of the salaries of three named government employees declared guilty of SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITY not by a court but by a House of Representatives subcommittee. Similarly, WIEMANN V. UPDEGRAFF (1952) took a stand against GUILT BY ASSOCIATION and held that government employment could not be denied for membership in a group advocating unlawful overthrow of the government if the member lacked knowledge of the group's unlawful aim.

With the advent of the WARREN COURT, constitutional protection for public employees expanded with the gradual adoption of a third, more complex approach that perceived several values at risk in government treatment of public employees. Increased solicitude for the employees' personal freedom, heightened awareness that jobs often carry some sense of entitlement, and growing appreciation of the part that government workers play in citizen self-government, intensified objections to blatant instances of ideologically discriminatory treatment. Reports of the death of the right-privilege distinction may have been exaggerated, but its hold weakened considerably. Various methods used to weed out allegedly subversive public employees, especially LOYALTY OATHS and compelled disclosure of an individual's associations, were invalidated on VAGUENESS and OVERBREADTH grounds, because the Court thought those methods of employment disqualification would excessively inhibit freedom of expression and association. Those developments paralleled the Warren Court's general expansion of citizen immunity from regulation affecting individual liberty and culminated in a series of decisions between 1966 and 1968, including ELFBRANDT V. RUSSELL (1966) and KEYISHIAN V. BOARD OF REGENTS (1967), that forbade public employers from requiring their employees as a condition of employment to relinquish the expanded constitutional freedoms they enjoyed as citizens. Pickering v. Board of Education (1968) appeared to complete the rejection of Holmes's view in McAuliffe by holding that a teacher could not be dismissed for speaking on issues of public concern involving her employer.

After the Warren Court era ended, the broadest implications of the demise of the right-privilege distinction were curtailed when the Court reaffirmed the constitutionality of government efforts to keep the civil service broadly—and neutrally—apolitical. The opposition to narrower but selective disadvantaging based on ideological viewpoint remained, however. The Court has disallowed the firing of public employees for belonging to the wrong political party, except where party affiliation is a legitimate qualification for the particular job. The political patronage practice may distort the political beliefs of public employees, but because it represents discrimination against ideologically disfavored viewpoints, it also elicits the narrower concern for preventing selective arbitrariness. In 1983 the Court drew an uncertain line between a worker grievance and a citizen complaint, allowing dismissal of public employees without constitutional restraint for employee speech on matters of personal interest, but retaining Pickering's FIRST AMENDMENT protection against dismissal for speech as a citizen on matters of public concern. It endorsed neither government's right to impose any conditions on public employment it chooses, nor the employees' personal rights of self-expression. Rather, the Court stressed the government's need for flexibility in employee discipline and the public, not personal, value of employee freedoms.

Protection against employment sanctions imposed for constitutionally unacceptable reasons also underlies the Court's public employees PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS decisions. Significantly, these protections developed after, not before, the Court established substantive limits on the reasons the government legitimately could invoke to disadvantage its employees. The possibility of intentional government arbitrariness, rather than government indifference to valuable employment opportunities, seems to have prompted the development of procedural protections surrounding the loss of government employment benefits.

The development was part of the procedural due process revolution of the Warren Court. Government benefits that did not have to be granted at all, including employment, could not be taken away once awarded without providing certain constitutionally imposed minimum procedures. Rejecting both extremes, the Court never recognized a right to government work but also denied the government the unrestricted freedom to withhold it. Nor has the Court required that reasons and a fair process always be provided before an individual loses an employment opportunity. Instead, the Court has let the government decide whether to hold out a job as offering some job protection or security of employment. If the government bestows no entitlement by statute or practice, several rules apply. No reason is needed to discharge or refuse to hire. If defamatory reasons nonetheless are given for an adverse personnel action, the employee must have an opportunity to defend against the charge. In any event, constitutionally illegitimate reasons may not form the public basis of the adverse action. If the government does hold out a job as offering employment security of any sort, moreover, the Court disallows deprivation of the secured position until constitutionally adequate notice, reasons, and other procedures are followed. The government worker may not be deprived of employment prospects either for illegitimate reasons or for legitimate reasons that do not apply to his circumstances.

The constitutional law of public employee regulation inevitably affects the efficiency of government operations, the personal freedoms of the workers, and the public interest in checking government abuse and being apprised of how public policy is being enforced. Accommodating these interests is, and will remain, an important and complex constitutional problem.

JONATHAN D. VARAT
(1986)

Bibliography

NOTE 1984 Developments in the Law—Public Employment. Harvard Law Review 97:1611, 1738–1800.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM W. 1969 The Constitutional Rights of Public Employees. UCLA Law Review 16:751–772.

PUBLIC FIGURE

The concept of a public figure features prominently in modern FIRST AMENDMENT law involving libel suits. NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964) prevented public officials (officeholders and candidates for office) from recovering damages for defamation without proof of actual malice, that is, proof that the statement was made with the knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard whether it was or not. In Curtis Publishing Company v. Butts (1967) the Supreme Court extended the actual malice rule to public figures, described by the Court as private persons in positions of considerable influence or able to attract attention because they had thrust themselves into public controversies. A public figure commands public interest and therefore has sufficient access to the mass media to be able, like an officeholder, to publicize his response to falsehoods about him. He invites comment and his remarks make news. The Justices unanimously agreed that for the sake of a robust FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, the actual malice rule applies to public figures, but they disagreed in specific cases on the question whether a particular person, such as the former wife of the scion of a famous family is a public figure, the question before the court in Time Incorporated v. Firestone (1976). The Court has tended to deny the press's claim that the party suing for damages is a public figure.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

PUBLIC FORUM

Laws that regulate the time, place, and manner of speech are not considered inherently problematic under the FIRST AMENDMENT, in contrast to laws that regulate the content of speech. As a general matter, would-be speakers can be denied the use of a particular public space for their expressive activities if other proper uses of that space would be unduly disturbed and if different speakers with different messages also would be denied use of the space.

The "public forum" DOCTRINE represents an important gloss on the general doctrine that accords government fairly wide authority to regulate speech in public places. For spaces that are designated public forums—streets, parks, and sidewalks, for example—the regulatory authority of government is subject to careful scrutiny under the First Amendment. Public forums, unlike other public spaces, cannot be devoted entirely to nonexpressive uses; some accommodation of the claims of would-be speakers must be made. In addition, when the content of the speech is taken into account in governing the use of a public forum, as when political criticism or commercial advertising but not expression of a labor grievance is disallowed on a public sidewalk, an especially strong presumption of invalidity stalks the regulation. Even content-neutral regulations regarding the time and manner of speech in a public forum pass muster under the First Amendment only if they are "narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest, and leave open ample alternative channels of communication."

The historical derivation of the public forum doctrine can be traced to an oft-quoted OBITER DICTUM by Justice OWEN J. ROBERTS in HAGUE V. CIO (1939):

> Wherever the title of streets and parks may rest, they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and, time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions. The privilege of a citizen of the United States to use the streets and parks for communication of views on national questions may be regulated in the interest of all; it is not absolute, but relative, and must be exercised in subordination to the general comfort and convenience, and in consonance with peace and good order; but it must not, in the guise of regulation, be abridged or denied.

The dictum repudiated the doctrine, endorsed by the Supreme Court forty years earlier, that government's ownership of the land on which streets and parks are situated gave officials the nearly plenary authority of a private landlord to regulate access to those spaces. The phrase "public forum" was first employed as a legal term of art by HARRY KALVEN, JR., in an influential article on the topic of speech in public places. The Supreme Court's most comprehensive discussion of the public forum doctrine is in PERRY EDUCATION ASSOCIATION V. PERRY LOCAL EDUCATORS' ASSOCIATION (1983).

Public streets, parks, state capitol grounds, and sidewalks have been held by the Court to be "quintessential" public forums. Public auditoriums and meeting rooms, state fair grounds, and public school classrooms have also been held to be public forums, although the tenor of judicial opinions suggests that officials may have somewhat more regulatory authority to preserve the special character of such places than may be exercised over open spaces such as streets and parks. The Court has denied public forum status to a jailyard, a military base portions of which were open to the public, residential mailboxes, and an internal communications system used for delivering messages and posting notices within a school district. The most important criterion for deciding whether a space constitutes a public forum is the traditional use of that type of space, not necessarily in the particular locale but rather as a general practice nationwide. Some Justices have contended that the dominant consideration should be whether the use of the space for expressive purposes is basically incompatible with other legitimate uses, but that position has not won acceptance by a majority of the Court.

The public forum doctrine has been criticized, primarily on two counts. First, it is claimed that the analytical device of categorizing public places on the basis of their general characteristics fails to give sufficient weight to considerations peculiar to each particular dispute over the use of public property for expressive purposes. Case-by-case variations in the degree to which expressive and regulatory values are implicated tend, so this criticism goes, to be overshadowed by the characterization of a place in gross as either a public forum or not. Particularly as applied to places that do not qualify as public forums, the categorization approach of the public forum doctrine permits government to regulate speech that may be highly appropriate in the particular circumstances and that may not impose serious burdens on other uses of the public space.

Second, and somewhat in tension with the first criticism, it is sometimes maintained that the public forum doctrine is misleading in that the designation of a place as a public forum or not has little resolving power in actual cases. Thus, the regulation of speech based on its content is highly disfavored, even as applied to places that are not public forums. It is not clear what the public forum doctrine adds to the presumption against regulation based on content. In addition, because a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST can justify the regulation of speech in a public forum and because places that are not public forums typically are devoted to activities that conflict somewhat with the use of such places for expressive purposes, it is not obvious that the public forum designation alters dramatically the balancing of conflicting uses that must take place in all disputes over access to public land.

Probably the most important aspect of the public forum doctrine is the principle that public forums cannot be closed off entirely to marches, DEMONSTRATIONS, rallies, and individual acts of expression. In contrast, uniformly enforced blanket prohibitions on expressive activities in places that are not public forums are permissible as a general matter under the First Amendment. Apart from this issue of blanket prohibitions, the significance of the public forum doctrine lies mainly in the tendency of courts to weigh competing particularistic considerations more favorably to speakers when the situs in dispute is a public forum.

VINCENT BLASI
(1986)

Bibliography

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. 1965 The Concept of the Public Forum. Supreme Court Review 1965:1–32.

STONE, GEOFFREY 1974 Fora Americana: Speech in Public Places. The Supreme Court Review 1974:233–280.

PUBLIC FORUM
(Update 1)

In recent years the Supreme Court has elevated the distinction between public and nonpublic forums into "a fundamental principle of First Amendment doctrine." Apart from rules of time, place, and manner, government regulation of speech within a public forum is usually subject to the STRICT SCRUTINY ordinarily required by First Amendment jurisprudence. Government regulation of speech within a nonpublic forum, however, is accorded wide latitude and presumptive constitutionality. The Court has increasingly relied upon public forum doctrine to insulate from JUDICIAL REVIEW restrictions on speech in such settings as schools, prisons, military establishments, and state bureaucracies.

Given the dramatic constitutional difference in the government's power to regulate speech within public and nonpublic forums, the distinction between the two is a matter of some importance. The Court has offered two criteria for this distinction. The first distinguishes public from nonpublic forums on the basis of whether the government property at issue has "traditionally served as a place for free public assembly and communication of thoughts by private citizens." The second turns on whether government has deliberately opened the property at issue for indiscriminate use by the general public. The Court has never explained, however, why the exercise of ordinary First Amendment rights on government property should depend either upon tradition or upon the permission of the government. As a consequence, modern public forum doctrine has justly received nearly universal scholarly condemnation.

The explosive growth of the doctrine is nevertheless undeniable. The underlying cause of this growth appears to be that the Court is using public forum doctrine to distinguish two different kinds of government authority: management and governance. The government exercises managerial authority when it acts through institutions to achieve explicit and fixed ends. The purpose of schools is to educate the young; the goal of prisons is to punish and reform convicted criminals; the objective of the military is to safeguard the nation; and so forth. In each of these settings, the Court has used public forum doctrine to enable government to regulate speech to achieve these institutional ends. Thus, for example, the Court has classified schools as nonpublic forums to permit them to censor student speech inconsistent with the achievement of their educational mission.

Outside these narrow institutional settings, however, governmental objectives in a democracy are not fixed and given, but rather are determined by a process of public deliberation. For this reason, public speech cannot be instrumentally regulated in a managerial fashion. In public forums, therefore, the First Amendment requires that the state exercise the authority of governance, in which the regulation of speech is presumptively unconstitutional unless justified according to strict constitutional tests. These tests are designed to ensure that governmental goals and policies be perpetually subject to the evaluation of democratic deliberation.

Although the Court's doctrine has not explicitly recognized this distinction between management and governance, the pattern of its decisions has served to define the boundary between these two different forms of authority. Public forum doctrine has thus achieved important prominence in this age of the activist state, in which the rapid proliferation of government institutions has both created a legitimate need for expansive new forms of regulating speech and yet has simultaneously threatened to strangle public deliberation.

The most controversial aspect of contemporary public forum doctrine has been the Court's tendency to defer to institutional authorities on the question of whether the regulation of speech is truly necessary to achieve institutional objectives. In the 1988 decision HAZELWOOD SCHOOL DISTRICT V. KUHLMEIER, for example, the Court concluded that determinations of the educational propriety of speech should properly rest "with the school board . . . rather than with the federal courts" and that therefore judges should defer to the decisions of school officials. But such deference in effect cedes to the states enormous discretion to regulate speech and sharply raises the question of the circumstances under which courts ought to relinquish careful supervision of governmental curtailments of speech.

ROBERT C. POST
(1992)

Bibliography

FARBER, DANIEL A. and NOWAK, JOHN E. 1984 The Misleading Nature of Public Forum Analysis: Content and Context in First Amendment Adjudication. Virginia Law Review 70: 1219–1266.

POST, ROBERT C. 1987 Between Governance and Management: The History and Theory of the Public Forum. Ucla Law Review 34:1713–1835.

PUBLIC FORUM
(Update 2)

Public forum DOCTRINE initially arose out of the question whether individuals have a FIRST AMENDMENT FREEDOM OF SPEECH in such government-owned properties as streets, parks, and sidewalks. Finding that such properties have been dedicated "time out of mind" to expressive purposes, the Supreme Court has generally held that speech can be regulated, but not prohibited, in such "traditional" public forums. Thus, although government can adopt reasonable time, place, and manner regulations that channel speech in such forums, it must permit a significant opportunity for individuals to speak in public parks, march on public streets, and distribute leaflets on public sidewalks.

The question then arose, however, whether individuals have a similar right to speak in other forms of government-owned property, such as military bases, the grounds surrounding a jail, and airports. Because such properties have not been dedicated "time out of mind" to speech purposes, the Court has generally held that speech can be prohibited in such places, so long as the government acts in a content-neutral manner and there is at least a reasonable basis for the restriction. Thus, as the Court held in Greer v. Spock (1976), although the government must allow individuals to make speeches in public parks, it need not permit speeches on the grounds of a military base, even though the base is generally open to the public. The Court explained that "it is the business of a military installation . . . to train soldiers, not to provide a public forum."

Governmental allowance of some, but not all, speech in a nonpublic forum raised more difficult issues. In LAMB'S CHAPEL V. CENTER MORICHES UNION FREE SCHOOL DISTRICT (1993), for example, a public school district permitted student groups to meet after-hours in the school's classrooms, but prohibited use of the classrooms for religious purposes. Because the classrooms were a nonpublic forum, the school district presumably could have prohibited all after-hours use of its own buildings. But once it chose to permit some student organizations to use the classrooms after-hours, could it constitutionally exclude religiously oriented organizations from using them as well?

In POLICE DEPARTMENT OF CHICAGO V. MOSLEY (1972), the Court had held that such "selective exclusions" from traditional public forums are presumptively unconstitutional and will be upheld only if they are necessary to serve a "compelling" governmental interest. The Court has applied a different approach, however, to "selective exclusions" from nonpublic forums. In this context, the Court has held that the government can constitutionally restrict access based on the "subject matter" of the speech so long as the exclusion is "reasonable and viewpoint-neutral." Applying this standard in Lamb's Chapel, the Court held that the restriction was unconstitutional because even though the classrooms were only a "limited" public forum, the denial of access to speakers who wanted to address issues from a religious perspective violated the requirement of "viewpoint-neutrality."

The most recent extension of this doctrine involves the problem of government subsidies. In ROSENBERGER V. RECTOR AND VISITORS OF UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA (1995), for example, the Court, following Lamb's Chapel, invalidated a University of Virginia policy authorizing payment from the Student Activities Fund for the printing costs of a variety of student publications, but prohibiting payment for any student publication that "primarily promotes or manifests a particular belief in or about a deity or an ultimate reality." In extending public forum analysis to cases like Rosenberger, which involves government PROPERTY in the form of benefits rather than a physical locale, the Court has run into particular difficulty with the concept of "viewpoint-neutrality."

In RUST V. SULLIVAN (1991), for example, the Court, in a 5–4 decision, upheld the constitutionality of federal regulations providing that federal funds appropriated to support family planning services might not be used to provide referrals for ABORTION as a method of family planning. The dissenters, in an opinion by Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, argued that, "until today, the Court has never upheld viewpoint-based suppression of speech simply because that suppression was a condition upon the acceptance of public funds." The Court, however, in an opinion by Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, responded that "we have here not the case of a general law singling out a disfavored group on the basis of speech content, but a case of the government refusing to fund activities, including speech, which are specifically excluded from the scope of the project funded." This line of reasoning has proved highly controversial. Critics have asked why, for example, the same argument wouldn't also hold true in cases like Lamb's Chapel and Rosenberger.

More recently, in National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley (1998), the Court upheld a federal statute that directs the NEA, in establishing procedures to judge the artistic merit of grant applications, to "tak[e] into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public." For several reasons, the Court rejected the argument that "the provision is a paradigmatic example of viewpoint discrimination." First, the Court argued that the provision merely "adds 'considerations' to the grant-making process; it does not preclude awards to projects that might be deemed 'indecent' or 'disrespectful.' " Second, the Court observed that terms like "indecency" and "respect for diverse beliefs and values" are "susceptible to multiple interpretations" and do not necessarily "introduce considerations that, in practice, would effectively preclude or punish the expression of particular views."

The Court distinguished Rosenberger on the ground that, in "the context of arts funding, in contrast to many other subsidies, the government does not indiscriminately 'encourage a diversity of views from private speakers.' The NEA's mandate is to make aesthetic judgments, and the inherently content-based 'excellence' threshold for NEA support sets it apart from the subsidy issue in Rosenberger—which was available to all student organizations that were 'related to the educational purpose of the University.' " Finally, the Court emphasized that "we have no occasion here to address an as-applied challenge in a situation where the denial of a grant may be shown to be the product of invidious viewpoint discrimination. If the NEA were to leverage its power to award subsidies on the basis of subjective criteria into a penalty on disfavored viewpoints, then we would confront a different case." Although cases like Rust and Finley may seem a far cry from the earlier era's disputes about leafleting on public sidewalks, the common theme of access to government "property," which underlies the public forum problem, unites these decisions.

GEOFFREY R. STONE
(2000)

Bibliography

KAGAN, ELENA 1996 Private Speech, Public Purpose: The Role of Governmental Motive in First Amendment Doctrine. The University of Chicago Law Review 63:415–463.

POST, ROBERT 1996 Subsidized Speech. Yale Law Journal 106: 151–174.

REDISH, MARTIN 1996 Government Subsidies and Free Expression. University of Minnesota Law Review 80:543–577.

PUBLIC INTEREST LAW

Public interest law is the work done by lawyers on behalf of poor individuals, unrepresented interests, and the general good. Public interest law services are usually provided at no cost to the beneficiaries, who are either too poor to pay or are not organized in ways that would allow them to retain lawyers. Public interest lawyers work in the courts, agencies, legislatures, and also through the media and community organizations. Although only a small number of American lawyers participate in these activities, public interest law reflects the American legal profession's commitment to values not fully served by the normal fee-for-service system of legal practice.

There is an intimate relationship between public interest law and the Constitution. First, the governmental structure created by the Constitution makes public interest law both necessary and possible. Second, without public interest law, many constitutional protections might be ineffective. Finally, the broader American tradition of CONSTITUTIONALISM depends on institutions like public interest law.

The governmental structure created by the Constitution makes legal advocacy important for the pursuit of many individual and collective interests. United States government is one by representation, not by direct participation. Although, in theory, citizens are supposed to be knowledgeable about public issues and elected representatives are supposed to take account of the interests of all constituents, in fact, most decisions are made in remote arenas and officials often are not aware of all affected interests. As a result, direct advocacy by professionals will make a difference in outcomes. If all such advocacy must be purchased in the marketplace, the system will be skewed toward the interests of the "haves." The presence of public interest advocates, at least to some degree, offsets marketplace bias.

The special role our written Constitution plays in American political life makes subsidized advocacy all the more important. Americans resolve many fundamental issues—from SLAVERY to reproductive freedom—through consitutional litigation. If free legal services are not sometimes available in these struggles, the results can be seriously skewed.

Although the constitutional structure thus makes public interest law necessary, it also helps make it possible. Of course, there is a constitutional RIGHT TO COUNSEL in criminal cases. In addition, several constitutional protections have been given to public interest lawyers. In NAACP V. BUTTON (1963) the Supreme Court ruled that litigation on behalf of a disadvantaged group was constitutionally protected speech and overturned Virginia's efforts to penalize NAACP lawyers. This ruling was extended by In re Primus (1978), where the Court made clear that nonprofit groups representing protected interests were exempt from normal bans on solicitation by lawyers.

The rights granted by the Constitution usually are not self-enforcing. Without legal representation, many would remain a dead letter. Protections for criminal defendants remain mere paper promises unless the accused are represented by competent lawyers. Because of the serious consequences of a deprivation of these rights, the Constitution itself guarantees counsel. But there are many other areas in which public interest law, although not constitutionally guaranteed, is equally essential. Many efforts to curb free speech, for example, would have gone unchallenged if public interest groups like the AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION were not available to defend this interest. The guarantee of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAW might still sound completely hollow to African Americans if the subsidized services of NAACP lawyers and other public interest advocates were not available.

Public interest law spans the political spectrum. Some of the more notable liberal public interest law groups include the ACLU, the NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATIONAL FUND, and the Commission on Law and Social Action of the AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS. Public interest law groups of a conservative persuasion include the Pacific Legal Foundation, which brings suits against governmental regulation; the Rutherford Institute, which litigates cases involving EQUAL ACCESS for religious groups and defends nonviolent protestors in the ANTIABORTION MOVEMENT; and the Washington Legal Foundation, which pursues a grab bag of causes, including JUDICIAL REVIEW of redistricting and lawsuits by crime victims.

A major aspect of American political culture is our "constitutionalism": the belief in higher values protected by the Constitution. Often, marginal and subordinated groups have looked to higher law and constitutional values as guides and inspiration for their struggle for inclusion in the American commonwealth. Women, blacks, and other groups have looked beyond existing law and institutions to a penumbra of constitutional values that, they believed, entitled them to fuller participation in economic, social, and political life. Public interest law, as idea and institution, is a reflection of this faith in the redemptive power of law and legal institutions. To be sure, law does not always fulfill the promises Americans put in it. Public interest law is often weak and ineffective; legal solutions may not lead to real gains. But public interest lawyers have won real victories and made some difference for subordinated groups. As long as America's basic political institutions remain unchanged, public interest law will be essential: it ensures that forces of the market and status quo do not overshadow democracy and constitutional values and helps preserve constitutionalism as a real force in our political life.

LOUISE G. TRUBEK
(1992)

Bibliography

ARON, NAN 1988 Liberty and Justice for All: Public Interest Law in the 1980s and Beyond. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

CHAVKIN, DAVID F. 1987 Public Interest Advocacy. In R. Janoskik, ed., Encyclopedia of the American Judicial System: Studies of the Principle Institutions and Processes of Law, Vol. 2. New York: Scribners.

PUBLIC LAW LITIGATION

The WARREN COURT initiated wholesale changes in American constitutional law. Legal apartheid was dismantled. The bulk of the BILL OF RIGHTS was decreed enforceable against the states. Orchestrated public SCHOOL PRAYER was ended. Legislatures were forced to undergo REAPPORTIONMENT. Prison conditions were scrutinized. FREEDOM OF SPEECH was bolstered and made meaningful. ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCY action was rendered more easily reviewable. Access to the judicial process was expanded. And constitutionalism gained an enhanced role in the political life of the nation.

At the same time, although relatively few people noticed it, the nature of the federal litigation process began to change. Private rights were no longer the sole currency of the JUDICIAL SYSTEM. The cascade of newly recognized constitutional interests and the expanded review of administrative decisionmaking allowed by the courts opened the door to much litigation based on widely shared public values and interests. No doubt, most lawsuits continued to turn exclusively upon the competing claims of private interests. But the dramatic new acceptance of what scholars came to characterize as "public law litigation" worked to alter substantially the operation of American courts. That change will very likely remain with us, even as the Supreme Court turns in different ideological directions to reformulate substantive constitutional principles and to match its decisionmaking with the demands of the day.

Consider the contrasts. The COMMON LAW system of litigation is dominantly tied to the protection of private rights and interests. Disputes typically arise between private parties and are circumscribed by their competing claims. The litigants initiate and control its boundaries. The contested terrain concerns the rights and duties that these parties may be said to owe to each other. Courts function principally to resolve the proffered dispute, and judges act as neutral arbiters in weighing the claims. Litigation is accurately described as "bipolar"—with the parties engaged in a confrontational, winner-take-all contest. The process is, generally speaking, retrospective, designed to determine the legal significance of a fairly discrete set of past events. The remedy is intricately linked to the measurement and the determination of the legal right that provides the basis for the claim. The lawsuit is largely self-contained, its impact intended to be limited to the parties before the tribunal. Most often, judicial involvement ends with the issuance of the decree.

Public law litigation takes a decidedly different cast. The subject matter of the litigation typically concerns a dispute about the conduct of government policy—policy that likely affects not only the plaintiffs, but many others as well. The party structure is apt to be broader, and possibly more amorphous. The basis for the claim, of course, remains the assertion of deprivation of a legal right. But the focus of the attention, and of the remedy, is more likely prospective than compensatory. Litigants attempt to force the government to change its behavior, and the claims are designed to have impact well beyond the parties to the litigation. The demand for prospective, curative relief also typically entails continuing involvement or monitoring by the court. The role of the judge is altered accordingly. Public law litigation requires an active, initiating trial judge, organizing the litigation and supervising the effectiveness of the relief ordered.

Not surprisingly, perhaps, public law litigation has presented its own challenges.

First, since public claims are based on interests that are typically not the exclusive province of any one person, determining who will be allowed to bring such suits is, at the least, complex. Common law disputes typically explore whether the plaintiff is entitled to compensatory relief from a particular defendant. Lawsuits involving the validity of government policies, however, have more often involved diffuse and intangible interests: Should a legislature be apportioned more fairly? Should an environmental practice be changed to afford greater protection to natural resources? The license to bring such actions triggers an exercise of judicial authority that may well work to refashion government policy. Determining, therefore, who has STANDING to employ the judicial process has proved to be a thorny problem.

Similarly, public law litigation implicates substantial questions concerning the ability of the plaintiff appropriately to represent the interests inevitably affected by the litigation. A relatively small stake in a larger dispute may be enough to call into play an overarching use of the judicial power. As a result, traditional notions of client control and the demand that a class of litigants be tied to the fortunes of a particular member seem less relevant in a multifaceted public policy dispute in which the actual named plaintiff may have relatively little role in the proceedings. Here, to many, the courts' responses have proven unsatisfactory.

Even more starkly, public law litigation has pushed traditional notions of the federal courts' remedial powers. Declaring that the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE had no place in public education proved to be only a first step in the process of DESEGREGATION. Innovative and hugely controversial remedies became necessary, however, if the asserted rights were to be meaningful protected. Reapportionment and prison cases similarly broke with traditional remedial patterns. Federal judges became managers, supervisors, magistrates, special masters, and overburdened administrators—frequently against their apparent preferences. The common law notion of the judge as passive referee seemed to become a quaint and distant memory.

Surely, the greatest question presented by the growth of public law litigation has been the most basic one—is it consistent with the limited role for the judiciary in a system marked by SEPARATION OF POWERS? To the extent that such cases are seen to vindicate the public interest rather than settle circumscribed private claims, they pose tensions not only with tradition but with perceived bases of judicial authority and legitimacy as well. Because judges are neither elected nor directly accountable to the people, extensive judicial policymaking powers present tough questions of CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY. Nor is it clear that courts are well equipped to deal with such complex and value-laden controversies. There seems little doubt, however, that judges, especially federal judges, will continue to be seen as essential partners with the other branches of government in enforcing our public values. As ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE observed, "There is hardly a political question in the United States which does not sooner or later turn into a judicial one."

GENE R. NICHOL
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Constitutional History, 1950–1959; Constitutional History, 1960–1969; Courts and Social Change; Institutional Litigation.)

Bibliography

CHAYES, ABRAM 1976 The Role of the Judge in Public Law Litigation. Harvard Law Review 89:1281–1316.

——— 1982 The Supreme Court, 1981 Term—Foreword: Public Law Litigation and the Burger Court. Harvard Law Review 96:4–60.

EISENBERG, THEODORE and YEAZELL, STEPHEN C. 1980 The Ordinary and the Extraordinary in Institutional Litigation. Harvard Law Review 93:465–517.

NICHOL, GENE R., JR. 1984 Rethinking Standing. California Law Review 72:68–102.

——— 1986 Injury and the Disintegration of Article III. California Law Review 74:1915–1950.

SCALIA, ANTONIN 1983 The Doctrine of Standing as an Essential Part of Separation of Powers. Suffolk University Law Review 17:881–899.

SCOTT, KENNETH E. 1975 Two Models of the Civil Process. Stanford Law Review 27:937–950.

PUBLIC PURPOSE DOCTRINE

The DOCTRINE of public purpose has been used, in the course of American constitutional history, as a standard by which courts have determined the legitimacy of state EMINENT DOMAIN and taxation legislation. In different periods the doctrine has been mobilized to advance divergent ideological causes and varying constitutional interpretations.

The first distinct phase in the doctrine's history ran from the early nineteenth century to the 1870s, when it was prominent as a justification for new and often far-reaching uses of eminent domain and taxation. During that period the doctrine was a bulwark of positive government. From the 1870s to the WORLD WAR I period, the doctrine became something quite different in the hands of conservatives who sought to enshrine laissez-faire policy as constitutional law. Arguments treating the public purpose doctrine as a limitation on government action were often prominent, in the new constitutional view of VESTED RIGHTS, as arguments based on FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. A third phase began in the 1930s, when state and federal courts were confronted with challenges to urban slum clearances and redevelopment projects that involved new uses of both eminent domain and taxation powers. Again the doctrine of public purpose found a prominent place in constitutional law, with legal opinion and judicial rulings seriously divided for a time as to what view of public purpose ought to prevail.

Formulation of a "public purpose" standard as a canon for testing the legitimacy of governmental action first became prominent in American decisions when states began to expand the reach of their transportation policies in the early nineteenth century. Projects such as the great Erie Canal enterprise in New York, and similar public works in other states, required powers of eminent domain for the agencies responsible for construction. When legislatures devolved the eminent domain power upon private chartered corporations that built bridges, roads, canals, and railroads, there was widespread agreement that some constitutional limitation should be formulated to prevent indiscriminate delegation of such high sovereign powers. Legal commentators and judges often invoked the Fifth Amendment's reference to PUBLIC USE as a limitation upon eminent domain TAKINGS OF PROPERTY by state authority; many state constitutions used the same phrase in their takings clauses, and even when no express constitutional limitation referred to public use the state courts read it into their law as a fundamental principle of justice. Was a privately owned turnpike corporation engaged in a "public" activity, however? How was the distinction between "public" activities and those merely "private" to be drawn?

Gradually the phrase "public purpose" assumed nearly the same standing, as a measure of legitimacy, as "public use." One of the early decisions on turnpikes, for example, acknowledged the uniquely "public" character of such roads. They were, a New York judge declared in 1823, "the most public roads or highways that are known to exist, and in point of law, they are made entirely for public use, and the community has a deep interest in their construction and preservation." A few years later, New York's chancery court upheld the exercise of eminent domain powers by a privately owned railroad corporation. It was legitimate for the state to devolve the power to expropriate, on payment of compensation, the court declared, "not only where the safety but also where the interest or even the expediency of the state is concerned." In WEST RIVER BRIDGE V. DIX (1848), the earliest Supreme Court case during the first sixty years of the Republic's history where the eminent domain power was ruled upon directly, it was a direct taking by a state—not devolution of the power on a corporation—that was challenged; but the opinions in the case left no doubt that states enjoyed wide discretion in deciding what activities should qualify as "public" in use or purpose, hence were eligible to exercise the eminent domain power if vested in them by the legislatures.

A parallel development in legal doctrine reinforced the impact of the foregoing line of decisions. This other development was in riparian law and its relationship, which changed over time, to public law in the states. As the state legislatures enacted a growing body of law regulating interests in streams—fisheries, navigation, shoreline development, damming of waters for millpower—the courts were called upon to rule on the legitimate reach of the regulatory power. The courts derived from English COMMON LAW distinctions between streams owned by the sovereign; streams "private in ownership but public in use" and so subject to broad regulatory control; and streams strictly private in ownership and in use, whose private character immunized owners against loss from regulation or taking without compensation. Repeatedly, lawyers and judges drew the analogy between waterways in public use and the chartered railroad, canal, bridge, and road companies that were private in ownership, yet "public" in purpose and use. The analogy lent additional legitimacy to "public purpose" as a doctrine which supported state action that forced private rights to yield to communal needs. Private companies were given special privileges in promotion of drainage, wharf facilities, supply of water to urban centers, and transportation facilities, as the Ohio Supreme Court declared in 1836, "because the public has an interest in them." Hence it was consistent to force private owners to yield to takings, for purposes of such enterprises, under eminent domain.

Although the doctrine had been used initially to support a large view of eminent domain power, it was soon employed also in support of tax-financed subsidies to private business firms. As enthusiasm for railroad construction swept the country in the middle decades of the nineteenth century, voters in hundreds of local communities and many state legislatures proved willing to extend cash subsidies—money raised through taxation—to private railroads, to guarantee railroad bonds, or to purchase stock in such railroads. Again, "public purpose" proved to be the vehicle for legitimation of such use of public funds. The Michigan high court, for example, in 1852 turned back a challenge to the constitutionality of such tax-supported aid on the ground that railroad corporations were "created for public benefit" and so were distinguishable from "strictly private corporations . . . [in which] private advantage is the ultimate as well as the immediate object of their creation." The landmark state case, widely followed, was Sharpless v. Philadelphia, decided by the Pennsylvania court in 1853. Termed in the court's decision "beyond all comparison, the most important cause that has ever been in this Court," the case was decided in favor of the constitutionality of state subsidies. Taxation must be for a public purpose, the court emphasized, and despite private ownership the railroad companies receiving aid represented such a purpose.

The spreading practice of extending public aid to corporations alarmed many jurists, however; and by the late 1860s, opposition to such a broad reading of "public purpose" and "public use" concepts had grown strong. Emblematic of the issue was the policy of Wisconsin, where the legislature by 1874 had authorized public, tax-supported aid to telegraph, steamship, hotel, waterworks, gas, construction, bridge, canal, river improvement, and dry-dock corporations. The constitutions of the newly admitted western states commonly designated as "public purpose" enterprises firms engaged in logging, road building, irrigation and reclamation, railroads, river improvement, and drainage for mining or agriculture. Such enterprises were routinely granted eminent domain power, and many of them received subsidies. In the East and Midwest, several states allowed manufacturing corporations of all kinds to condemn and flood lands for power sites. Such laws were defended as aid to companies with an important public purpose, comparable to the grants of similar eminent domain powers to gristmills in colonial Massachusetts. In a few states—among them Georgia, New York, Alabama, and Vermont—the courts invalidated such grants of power. In most state tribunals, however, the broad view of "public purpose" continued to prevail.

Indicative of the emerging conservative jurisprudence on the issue were decisions of Judge THOMAS M. COOLEY's Michigan court in 1870 against public aid to railroads and in 1877 against a milldam flooding act. In Cooley's view, set forth more systematically in his treatise, Constitutional Limitations (1868), "Everything that may be done under the name of taxation is not necessarily a tax; and it may happen that an oppressive burden imposed by the government, when it comes to be carefully scrutinized, will prove, instead of a tax, to be an unlawful confiscation of property, unwarranted by any principle of constitutional government." Further distinguished authority for the same view came from the Iowa Supreme Court. Chief Justice JOHN F. DILLON—like Cooley, a treatise writer who pressed his concern for vested rights on the legal profession and the courts in the late nineteenth century—wrote an opinion for the Iowa court in 1862 that struck down railroad bond aid as a confiscation of citizens' property without compensation and a violation of DUE PROCESS.

The conservative assault led by Dillon and Cooley soon enlisted the aid of the Supreme Court. In LOAN ASSOCIATION V. TOPEKA (1874) the Court declared unconstitutional a Kansas municipal bond issue in aid of a bridge-manufacturing company. Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER'S opinion for the majority denounced the use of tax funds for a "private interest instead of a public use"; and he termed it robbery to exercise the taxing power in this way. It was a sudden and surprising use of the public purpose doctrine to limit state legislative power—in contrast with its earlier use to enlarge state power and legitimate new activities.

The conservative version of public purpose did not carry the day altogether, even as the jurisprudence of vested rights was gaining ascendancy. Thus the Supreme Court repeatedly turned back assaults on state aid to railroads, with a solid majority maintaining that transportation had always been considered a "public purpose" activity and so eligible for eminent domain power and aid with tax funds. Olcott v. The Supervisors (1873) upheld the validity of local bonds issued to aid railroads in a Wisconsin municipality, in the face of efforts to repudiate them. In language squarely in the line of doctrine that had come down from JAMES KENT's views on turnpikes half a century earlier, the Court asserted that railroads had a "public highway character. . . . Though the ownership is private, the use is public." Use of tax funds to subsidize manufacturing companies suffered a different fate, however, in light of the Loan Association decision. Thus Clyde Jacobs calculated that from 1870 to 1910 some forty public purpose cases challenging tax aid to businesses came before the federal courts and state high courts. In thirty-nine of the forty, public aid was found invalid on the ground that it was not for a public purpose. Moreover, numerous state courts interpreted the "public purpose" provisions in state constitutions to forbid subsidies or relief payments to the blind, for example, or to farmers who had suffered from weather or crop failure.

In the Supreme Court, however, a manifest softening of the commitment to public purpose as a limiting doctrine became evident in decisions on the constitutionality of grants of taxing and eminent domain power to special-purpose irrigation districts. The Court ruled in Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley (1896) that local geographical and climatic conditions required a considerable legislative discretion as to what constituted public purpose. In other cases that tested the constitutionality of using tax revenues to finance state enterprises such as public utilities and even grain warehouses, the Court moved still further toward allowing legislatures to do so. By the early 1920s public purpose as a national constitutional doctrine was no longer a major support for vested property rights or limitation upon governmental power, even though the Court, beginning with Fallbrook, explicitly treated public purpose as a FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT issue.

The Supreme Court also abandoned in 1916 a residual doctrine that had enjoyed considerable judicial respect in many jurisdictions since the 1850s, the doctrine that "public use" (justifying takings by the state) should be interpreted as "use by the public" and not in broad "public purpose" terms. In Mt. Vernon-Woodberry Company v. Alabama Power Company (1916), Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, writing for the Court, declared flatly that "the inadequacy of the use by the general public as a universal test is established."

The deep economic crisis in the 1930s and the social dislocations it generated led to the third distinct phase of the public purpose doctrine's history. The application, throughout the nation, of federal aid to urban slum clearance and housing development produced challenges in both federal and state courts to the constitutionality of using eminent domain and taxation powers for such purposes. Especially where private real-estate and financial interests were given a key role in housing, the public purpose of takings and public expenditures for such programs was questioned. By 1940 such objections had been rejected, and the public programs upheld, in the courts of twenty-eight states. Many of these opinions concluded that where "public welfare" was served the public purpose test was met—a broad concept of legitimacy for eminent domain (and taxation) that found expression also in United States ex rel. Tennessee Valley Authority v. Welch (1946), a leading Supreme Court decision validating takings by a federal agency for purposes of regional development. It was for Congress to decide what was a public use, the Court declared; no "departure . . . [from] judicial restraint," with deference to the legislative branch, was warranted.

The language of the Welch decision was imported into state and federal courts' review of another wave of urban slum clearance programs in the 1940s and 1950s, following WORLD WAR II. In this later period, more than mere slum clearance was at issue; the urban programs often embraced comprehensive "urban redevelopment" objectives, typically employed private financial and entrepreneurial interests in the projects, and often involved sweeping condemnation programs that took land and buildings that did not fit the "slum" classification. Rejecting a public purpose challenge to comprehensive redevelopment, in which some of the property taken ended up in the hands of private developers, not government itself, a federal district court in a landmark 1953 ruling, Schneider v. District of Columbia, declared: "the term 'public use' has progressed as economic facts have progressed, and so projects such as railroads, public power plants, the operation of mines under some conditions, and, more recently, low-cost housing have been held to be public uses for which private property may be seized. Moreover, . . . the variation in the term from '[public] use' to '[public] purpose' indicates a progression in thought." So long as the taking is necessary to the public purpose that the legislature has determined and defined, the court concluded, eminent domain powers necessary to accomplishment of that purpose must be deemed legitimate.

The valedictory came in Berman v. Parker (1954), when the Supreme Court affirmed that public purpose was a concept coterminous with "public welfare," hence embraced objectives across a broad spectrum that included "public safety, public health, morality, peace and quiet, law and order," to list only "some of the more conspicuous examples." Once pursuit of public purpose in these terms was accepted, then eminent domain, taxation, or the STATE POLICE POWER might be used to accomplish the goals set forth. Judicial review under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments was not out of the question, at least in some jurists' views. Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, for example, in a concurring opinion in Welch, wrote: "But the fact that the nature of the subject matter gives the legislative determination nearly immunity from judicial review does not mean that the power to review is wanting." In the subsequent history of taking, however, it was the eminent domainpolice power distinction, and not the public purpose doctrine, on which constitutional challenges to regulation would turn. The purposes for which eminent domain or taxation could be used did seem "nearly immune," in light of modern constitutional interpretation of the GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(1986)

Bibliography

JACOBS, CLYDE E. 1954 Law Writers and the Courts: The Influence of Thomas M. Cooley, Christopher G. Tiedman, and John F. Dillon upon American Constitutional Law. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

NICHOLS, PHILIP, JR. 1940 The Meaning of Public Use in the Law of Eminent Domain. Boston University Law Review 20: 615–624.

SCHEIBER, HARRY N. 1971 The Road to Munn: Eminent Domain and the Concept of the Public Purpose in the State Courts. Perspectives in American History 5:327–402.

WOODBURY, COLEMAN, ed. 1953 Urban Redevelopment: Problems and Practices. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

PUBLIC TRIAL

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial. . . ." The language of the Sixth Amendment appears to assure that criminal courtrooms in the United States will be open—that there will be no secret trials. But the issue of openness in the process of criminal justice has only recently reached a point of consensus in the Supreme Court after nearly forty years of experimentation with successive constitutional tests.

Conflicting values underlay the debate. One was that of the open society, with the public free to observe and criticize the activities of government, including the courts. The other was fairness to someone accused of a crime: his or her right to a trial uninfluenced by public passion or prejudice. The two values do not usually conflict, but it hardly needs to be said that they may clash in a country that has known mob-dominated courtrooms and lynchings.

The constitutional conflict first surfaced in a series of cases starting with BRIDGES V. CALIFORNIA (1941). The issue was whether American, like British, judges could punish as a contempt of court any comment on a pending criminal case that had a tendency to interfere with the administration of justice. In Bridges two persons had been held in contempt: a labor leader for a telegram criticizing a judicial decision against his union, and a newspaper editor for an editorial admonishing a judge not to grant probation to two convicted union members. By a 5–4 vote the Supreme Court reversed both contempt convictions. The Court's opinion, by Justice HUGO L. BLACK, said the FIRST AMENDMENT barred punishment for such comments unless they presented a CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER—the test framed by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES in the early sedition cases such as ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919)—of causing "disorderly and unfair administration of justice." Later decisions made plain that it would be extremely difficult for authorities to meet that test. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS said in Craig v. Harney (1947): "A trial is a public event. What transpires in the courtroom is public property. . . . There is no special perquisite of the judiciary which enables it, as distinguished from other institutions of democratic government, to suppress, edit, or censor events which transpire in proceedings before it."

Nevertheless, concern remained about the possible effect of outside comment on the criminal justice process, especially on the impartiality of jurors. Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER felt so strongly about the matter that he wrote an impassioned opinion in Maryland v. Baltimore Radio Show (1950), when the Supreme Court refused to review a state appellate court decision reversing on First Amendment grounds the contempt conviction of a radio broadcaster who had broadcast, before a murder trial, the record of the defendant and alleged evidence of his guilt.

The Supreme Court dealt with the problem of prejudicial press comment on criminal cases another way: by reversing convictions when there was reason to think the jury might have been improperly influenced by the outside comment. The Court first found that prejudicial comment had violated a defendant's constitutional right to fair trial in IRVIN V. DOWD (1961). Justice Frankfurter, still preferring to proceed against the press itself, wrote bitterly in a concurring opinion: "The Court has not yet decided that, while convictions must be reversed and miscarriages of justice result because the minds of jurors or potential jurors were poisoned, the poisoner is constitutionally protected in plying his trade." But the device of contempt to prevent prejudicial comment never found favor with a majority. In Sheppard v. Maxwell (1966) the Court outlined other measures to prevent the prejudicing of juries in notorious cases: delaying or moving the trial, for example, or sequestering the jury once it had been selected.

Then a new prophylactic device was taken up by some trial courts around the country: INJUNCTIONS against press institutions and representatives forbidding reports, before trial, of evidence and other material that might prejudice potential jurors. These gag orders, as the press angrily called them, followed the approach adopted by Britain in the Criminal Justice Act of 1967. That act allowed the press to attend pretrial committal proceedings, thereby assuring scrutiny of the process, but forebade reporting on them until after the trial itself was completed—unless the defendant waived the restriction. But in 1976 the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment stood in the way of this approach, too. In NEBRASKA PRESS ASSOCIATION V. STUART the press had been enjoined from reporting, before trial, the alleged confession and other especially prejudicial matters about the defendant in a gruesome multiple murder case in a small Nebraska town. The Court's opinion, by Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, declined to adopt an absolute rule against such restraints. But the decision against them, on the extreme facts of that case, made it most unlikely that gag orders would ever be permissible; and trial courts stopped issuing them.

A last round of the constitutional debate about fair trial and free speech tested still another prophylactic device: closing the courtroom to the public and the press during sensitive phases of pretrial or trial proceedings. In GANNETT V. DEPASQUALE (1979) counsel for the defendants moved to close a pretrial hearing on motions to suppress confessions and other EVIDENCE, arguing that reports of the hearing would prejudice future jurors if the evidence were in fact suppressed. The prosecutor did not object, and the trial judge closed the courtroom. A newspaper then challenged the order. The Supreme Court decided that the "public trial" clause of the Sixth Amendment was for the benefit of the defendant alone, who could waive it, and that outsiders had no STANDING to insist on an open courtroom. The majority put aside First Amendment considerations.

A year later the Court did consider the First Amendment and decided that it limited the closing of courtrooms. In RICHMOND NEWSPAPERS V. VIRGINIA a 7–1 majority found unconstitutional the exclusion of the public (and with it the press) from a criminal trial. There was no opinion of the Court, but various Justices shared the view expressed by Chief Justice Burger that the First Amendment assures the public a "right of access" to criminal trials that can be denied only for strong and articulated reasons. Indications are that the right extends also to civil cases, and to pretrial proceedings as well as trials.

The decision was an extraordinary doctrinal conclusion to the long cycle of constitutional litigation. For the Supreme Court had for the first time said that the First Amendment was not only a shield protecting the right to speak or publish but also a sword helping the public to gain access to information about government institutions. How far that new doctrine would be taken was uncertain. But in American courtrooms, at least, a constitutional presumption favors openness.

ANTHONY LEWIS
(1986)

Bibliography

LEWIS, ANTHONY 1980 A Public Right to Know about Public Institutions: The First Amendment as Sword. The Supreme Court Review 1980:1–25.

SCHMIDT, BENNO C. 1977 Nebraska Press Association: An Expansion of Freedom and Contraction of Theory. Stanford Law Review 29:431–476.

PUBLIC UNDERSTANDING OF SUPREME COURT OPINIONS

When interpreting the Constitution, Justices of the Supreme Court—whether writing a majority, CONCURRING, or DISSENTING OPINION—should seek to reach the American people as their primary audience. They should explain with candor, in accessible and comprehensible language, what they decided, and why they decided it in that way.

That the Constitution be intelligible to the American people is essential to a government based on informed consent and open to informed dissent. The PREAMBLE to the Constitution proclaims that "We the People [not only "We Constitutional Lawyers and Teachers of Constitutional Law"], in Order to . . . establish Justice, . . . and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

In 1819, Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL wrote for and to a unanimous Supreme Court in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) that, individually and collectively, "we must never forget that it is a Constitution that we are expounding"; that the Constitution derives its whole authority from the people of the nation; and that, in form and language, it is an instrument designed to be accessible and comprehensible to the public. The Constitution ought not to be converted by Court interpretations into, or be treated like, an intricate legal code detailing all of its great powers and all of the means by which they may be carried out. A Constitution, so converted, could "scarcely be embraced by the human mind" and, Marshall added, "probably would never be understood by the public."

Marshall stressed that "[s]uch is the character of human language that no word conveys to the mind, in all situations, one single definite idea." The burden of an opinion is to remove obstacles to understanding when a controversy arises between or among the governors and the governed about the Constitution's meaning. To say that is not meant to obscure the fact that the language of opinions may be no more free from ambiguity than the language of the constitutional provision being interpreted. Nevertheless, the Court's task is to clarify—to make something about the Constitution more fully understood than it was before the opinion was rendered—by explaining and giving reasons for its judgment in a concrete case.

Yet conscious ambiguity, confusion, and alteration of apparently critical facts have characterized opinions in many of the Court's most important decisions, such as those in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), COOPER V. AARON (1958), REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), and WEBSTER V. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES (1989). Some Justices have been candid about the intentional muddling or misstatement of opinions.

Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON once observed that "[t]he technique of the dissenter often is to exaggerate the holding of the Court beyond the meaning of the majority and then to blast away at the excess," leaving a reader in doubt about "whether the majority opinion meant what it seemed to say or what the minority said it meant."

Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES is reported to have admitted that "he tried to write his opinions clearly and logically, but if he needed the fifth vote of a colleague who insisted on putting in a paragraph that did not 'belong,' in it went, and let the law reviews figure out what it meant."

An opposing view, explained by Professor Burke Marshall, is that the Court has left to the legal profession and to legal scholars the task of "explain[ing] the obscure, . . . [of] construct[ing] for our students and for the people generally what it is that the Court surely meant, when the Court itself does not say what it meant." Those who hold this belief tend not to address whether this reality should be the goal of opinion writing, or whether it is simply the inevitable, albeit regrettable, product of the Court's work.

According to Professor Marshall, "Familiarity with the Court's work overwhelmingly demonstrates at a minimum that the members of the Court view their work as directed at the elite, and not to the people." But this should not lead anyone to conclude that the Justices should leave to the "experts" the task of instructing "We the People," effectively drawing a line—whether consciously or unconsciously—between the elite, those who are "in," and the rest of the people, those who are "out." Even the professional interpreters to whom the people must turn for understanding may not be able to unravel what the Court has to say, often in heavily footnoted, multiple opinions. The "experts" and even the Justices themselves, for example, may not be able to identify the constitutional principles underlying the decision in Webster. Its confusing, seventy-four-page set of opinions, which left unresolved the meaning of the trimester framework fashioned in ROE V. WADE (1973) for determining the constitutionality of laws permitting ABORTION, is introduced by this mind-boggling headnote:

> REHNQUIST, C.J., announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion for a unanimous Court with respect to Part II-C, the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II-A, and II-B, in which WHITE, O'CONNOR, SCALIA and KENNEDY, J.J., joined, and an opinion with respect to Parts II-D and III, in which WHITE and KENNEDY, J.J., joined. O'CONNOR, J., . . . and SCALIA, J., . . . filed opinions concurring in part and concurring in the judgment. BLACKMUN, J., filed an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part.

JOSEPH GOLDSTEIN
(2000)

Bibliography

GOLDSTEIN, JOSEPH 1992 The Intelligible Constitution: The Supreme Court's Obligation to Maintain the Constitution as Something We The People Can Understand. New York: Oxford University Press.

JACKSON, ROBERT H. 1955 The Supreme Court in the American System of Government. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H. 1987 The Supreme Court: How It Was, How It Is. New York: Morrow.

VINING, JOSEPH 1986 The Authoritative and the Authoritarian. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

WHITE, JAMES BOYD 1984 When Words Lose Their Meaning: Constitutions and Reconstitutions of Language, Character, and Community. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

PUBLIC USE

The "taking" clause of the Fifth Amendment limits the power of EMINENT DOMAIN by demanding that governmental taking of private property be for a public use. The Supreme Court held in Burlington Quincy Railroad Co. v. Chicago, (1897) that the same requirement applies to the states through the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Although some early decisions defined the public use standard to include a right of "use by the public," that approach was repudiated by the Court. As early as 1905 in Clark v. Nash, the Court held that a state could authorize a private person to condemn an easement for irrigation across a neighbor's land. "What is a public use," said the Court, "may frequently and largely depend upon the facts surrounding the subject." In the arid environment of Utah, the taking of a private irrigation easement could properly be deemed a public use, because it was "absolutely necessary" to agricultural development. On similar grounds, the Court's decision in Strickley v. Highland Boy Gold Mining Co. (1906) sustained the statutory authority of a mining company to condemn a private easement for transporting ore to a railroad loading site. These decisions were followed by many others intimating that any use conducive to the public benefit was a public use for which eminent domain could be invoked, including reclamation of swamp lands, establishment of water and electrical power systems, development of transportation facilities, and creation of public parks.

The broad public benefit test has, in recent years, been assimilated with the RATIONAL BASIS approach invoked by the Supreme Court in reviewing regulations of economic interests under the DUE PROCESS clause. In the leading case, Berman v. Parker (1954), the court sustained the use of eminent domain to acquire various separate parcels of private property in blighted areas in furtherance of a community redevelopment project. The fact that the property to be condemned would be resold or leased to private persons for redevelopment purposes did not transgress the public use limitation, for "when the legislature has spoken, the public interest has been declared in terms well-nigh conclusive. In such cases the legislature, not the judiciary, is the main guardian of the public needs to be served. . . . The concept of the public welfare is broad and inclusive."

Under this expansive and deferential approach, eminent domain may be exercised as a means for achieving practically any use or objective within the power of the legislative body.

ARVO VAN ALSTYNE
(1986)

Bibliography

NICHOLS, PERRY 1983 The Law of Eminent Domain, Vol. 2a. New York: Matthew Bender & Co.

PUBLIC UTILITIES REGULATION

See: Economic Regulation

PUBLIC UTILITY HOLDING COMPANY ACT
49 Stat. 803 (1935)

This measure was an important part of the legislative program of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT. Two leading supporters of the bill were Senators GEORGE NORRIS and HUGO L. BLACK. The act's objective was to disperse ownership and control of the nation's gas and electric utilities, then highly concentrated in pyramids of corporations with holding companies at the top. The act required holding companies to register with the Securities and Exchange Commission and authorized the SEC to limit a company's operations to a single region. A "death sentence" provision authorized dissolution of a company that did not show, within five years, that it was serving an efficient local function.

The great holding companies sought to challenge the constitutionality of the entire act in an early TEST CASE, but government lawyers managed to persuade the Supreme Court to defer the omnibus attack and consider the act's registration requirement separately. The Court upheld that requirement in Electric Bond & Share Co. v. SEC (1938). The other provisions of the law came before the Court after Roosevelt had appointed seven Justices. Those provisions were sustained, with broad readings of Congress's power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, in North American Co. v. SEC (1946) and American Power & Light Co.

v. SEC (1946). By 1952, more than 750 holding companies had been dissolved.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

FREUND, PAUL A. 1951 On Understanding the Supreme Court. Pages 99–110. Boston: Little, Brown.

PUERTO RICO

Puerto Rico is the largest of the United States insular areas, both as to land area and population. It is also one of the oldest in terms of being part of the United States, having been acquired along with Guam in 1899 as a result of the Spanish American War.

The Foraker Act of 1900 established a civil government for Puerto Rico. Therefore, Puerto Rico has been an "organized" TERRITORY almost from the beginning of its affiliation with the United States. However, in Downes v. Bidwell (1901) the Supreme Court held that Puerto Rico had not been incorporated into the United States. Thus, Puerto Rico was deemed to be an "unincorporated" territory. Consequently, not all portions of the U.S. Constitution were applicable there. The Jones Act of 1917 granted even more autonomy to Puerto Rico and, importantly, granted all persons born there United States CITIZENSHIP. Nonetheless, in the 1922 case of Balzac v. Porto Rico (1922), the Court held that Puerto Rico was still an unincorporated territory. (For unknown reasons, Puerto Rico was spelled "Porto Rico" in the English language version of the Treaty of Paris of 1899, the treaty that ended the Spanish American War. "Porto Rico" remained the official spelling until 1932.)

In 1950, Congress passed Public Law 600, the effect of which was to repeal portions of the Jones Act, and to rename the remainder the "Federal Relations Act." Public Law 600 authorized the people of Puerto Rico to adopt a constitution and, significantly, contained language stating that the law was "adopted in the nature of a compact." Thereafter, Puerto Rico was deemed to be in a unique relationship with the United States, known in English as a "commonwealth."

An early case, Mora v. Mejias (1953), held that the compact is inalterable without the consent of the people of Puerto Rico and that the U.S. Constitution does not apply to Puerto Rico because Puerto Rico is sovereign. Subsequently, the Court held on more than one occasion— including Harris v. Rosario (1980) and Califano v. Gautier Torres (1978)—that Congress has plenary power to legislate for Puerto Rico under the territorial clause and that at least portions of the U.S. Constitution are binding on Puerto Rico.

Unlike other insular areas that have Article IV courts, Puerto Rico since 1966 has had an Article III District Court, with judges who have life tenure. Puerto Rico has only a nonvoting delegate in the U.S. Congress, and it would probably take either statehood or a constitutional amendment to give them voting REPRESENTATION. Recent REFERENDA have indicated that the people of Puerto Rico are almost evenly split over whether to seek statehood or remain a commonwealth, although an overwhelming majority favor remaining a part of the United States.

STANLEY K. LAUGHLIN, JR.
(2000)

Bibliography

LAUGHLIN, STANLEY K. 1995 The Law of United States Territories and Affiliated Jurisdictions (with 1997 supplement). New York: Lawyers Cooperative-West Group.

TORRUELLA, JUAN R. 1985 The Supreme Court and Puerto Rico: The Doctrine of Separate and Unequal. Rio Piedras, Puerto Rico: University of Puerto Rico Press.

PUERTO RICO, CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF

No clear definition exists of how and to what extent the Commonwealth of PUERTO RICO fits within the federal constitutional system. Undoubtedly, the Puerto Rican Federal Relations Act, enacted by Congress in 1950 "in the nature of a compact" between Congress and the people of Puerto Rico, and the adoption by Puerto Ricans of their own constitution in 1952 were intended to work a significant change in the previous colonial relationship between the island and the United States. The nature and scope of this change, however, have not been conclusively ascertained by federal courts ruling on the matter.

Puerto Rico, which had become a self-governing overseas province of the Kingdom of Spain under the Royal Decree of 1897, was ceded to the United States in 1898 under the Treaty of Paris which ended the Spanish American War. It became an unincorporated TERRITORY of the United States, subject to the plenary command of Congress. Under various Supreme Court decisions it is clear that, until 1952, Puerto Rico was a domestic possession of the United States, neither a foreign country nor an integral part of the nation, merely belonging to it. Congressional authority over the island and its people encompassed the entire domain of SOVEREIGNTY, both national and local, and was completely unconstrained by the federal Constitution, except as regards those basic prohibitions which go "to the very root of the power of Congress to act at all" and "which the Constitution has established in favor of human liberty and are applicable to every condition or status." (See IN-SULAR CASES.) Wielding its plenary powers, the United States established a military government in Puerto Rico from 1898 to 1900, when a civil regime was installed under the Foraker Act, providing a meager participation of Puerto Ricans in the island's government. In 1917 Congress enacted a second Organic Act (Jones Act) providing a measure of self-government and granting United States CITIZENSHIP collectively to the people of Puerto Rico, while retaining all major elements of sovereignty.

In 1950 a bill to provide for the organization of a constitutional government by the people of Puerto Rico was introduced in Congress. Its provisions were not to be effective until accepted in a REFERENDUM by Puerto Rican voters. After a favorable vote on the new federal act by the island electorate, a CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION was held in Puerto Rico and the fundamental law drafted there was adopted by the majority of the islanders in 1952. In transmitting the newly adopted Puerto Rican Constitution to Congress, President HARRY S. TRUMAN recognized that with such approval "full authority and responsibility for local self-government [would] be vested in the people of Puerto Rico." In 1953 the United Nations recognized that Puerto Ricans, exercising the right of self-determination, had achieved a new constitutional status, and had "been invested with attributes of political sovereignty which clearly identify the status of self-government attained by the Puerto Rican people as that of an autonomous political entity."

It is generally accepted by federal courts that after 1952 "Puerto Rico's status changed from that of a mere territory to the unique status of COMMONWEALTH." The Supreme Court itself stated in Examining Board v. Flores (1976) that "the purpose of Congress in its 1950 and 1952 legislation was to accord to Puerto Rico the degree of autonomy and independence normally associated with a State of the Union." However, the precise extent of the referred "autonomy" and the constitutional basis for statelike status are very much in doubt. Thus, while the Supreme Court has now accepted that "Puerto Rico is to be deemed sovereign over matters not ruled by the federal Constitution" and that Puerto Rican legislation and court decisions deserve the same regard in federal courts as those of a state, it has also ruled in Harris v. Rosario (1980) that Congress under the territorial clause may still "treat Puerto Rico differently from States so long as there is a rational basis for its actions." Likewise, the Court, after acknowledging that Puerto Rico is subject to federal constitutional requirements regarding FREEDOM OF SPEECH, DUE PROCESS, EQUAL PROTECTION, and reasonable SEARCH AND SEIZURE, has indicated that such guarantees are binding either directly under the Bill of Rights or indirectly by operation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, expressly refusing to fix one or the other as the source or basis of their applicability. The Court has yet to write on a clean slate in dealing with the new constitutional status of Puerto Rico.

JAIME B. FUSTER
(1986)

Bibliography

FUSTER, JAIME B. 1974 Origin of the Doctrine of Territorial Incorporation and Its Implications for the Power of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. University of Puerto Rico Law Review 43:259–294.

PUNISHMENT

See: Sentencing

PUNITIVE DAMAGES

The plaintiff who prevails in a tort case is entitled to compensatory DAMAGES, including damages for pain and suffering. In a limited number of cases involving aggravated wrongdoing, the plaintiff can recover punitive damages as well. Sometimes the understanding is that these damages are indeed punitive: that their intent is to punish defendants for their wrongdoing. At other times, punitive damages seem designed to provide a higher level of deterrence than would be occasioned by the mere threat of compensatory damages; at this juncture, the language of "exemplary damages" becomes apt.

Although scholars have long expressed uneasiness with punitive damages, until recently their constitutionality has been taken for granted. In recent years, however, the number of punitive-damage awards has increased, and the size of the average punitive-damage verdict has soared. These changes have encouraged the posing of new questions as to their constitutionality. In Browning-Ferris Industries, Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc. (1989), the defendant committed a business tort against the plaintiff that resulted in $51,146 in actual damages. A jury awarded the plaintiff these damages—and six million dollars in punitive damages as well. An argument advanced by the defendant was that this award constituted an "excessive fine," forbidden by the Eighth Amendment. Amazingly, Browning-Ferris was the first case involving the excessive-fines clause that the Supreme Court had ever considered. The Court, divided 7–2, finally decided that punitive damages awarded in private civil actions are not "fines" and are hence unregulated by the clause. The majority opinion, authored by Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, left open the question as to whether the clause pertains only to proceedings that are officially criminal: rather, the rationale adopted by Blackmun was that the clause has no application to a legal proceeding in which the government is no way a party. The dissent, authored by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, would have found the clause applicable to punitive-damage awards and, hence, would have subjected such awards to a "proportionality" analysis that O'Connor drew from the case law under the Eighth Amendment's CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT clause.

Although denying the relevance of the Eighth Amendment, the Browning-Ferris majority acknowledged that large punitive-damage awards might raise a problem of DUE PROCESS. A concurring opinion signed by Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and THURGOOD MARSHALL emphasized the likely relevance of due process. Indeed, the majority and concurring opinions together suggest two different kinds of due process issues. One is an issue of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS: that due process might be violated by punitive-damage awards that are substantively excessive. The other issue relates to PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS; here the concern is for the lack of clarity in the standards that the jury relies on in calculating the amount of punitive damages.

If the vagueness in the standards for calculating punitive damages raise a due process problem, a related problem concerns the amorphousness in the standards relied on in determining whether or not to award punitive damages. Moreover, there are further constitutional issues that punitive-damage practices might be thought to entail. If punitive damages are regarded as sufficiently penal to render at least somewhat relevant the BILL OF RIGHTS, then the "preponderance of the evidence" standard of proof that states have traditionally relied on in punitive-damage cases might be inadequate. (Indeed, as part of the tort-reform movement of the late 1980s, several states have raised the punitive-damage standard of proof to clear and convincing evidence.) In so-called "mass-tort" situations involving such products as asbestos and the Dalkon Shield, a large number of punitive-damage verdicts can be entered against a particular defendant on account of a single (although continuing) course of harm-causing conduct. At some point, the cumulation of these awards might suggest an issue of due process or DOUBLE JEOPARDY. Indeed, in early 1989, one federal district court judge did find a constitutional violation, although a lack of adequate precedent later persuaded him to withdraw most of his holding.

The Supreme Court further considered the procedural due process issues in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip (1991). This case involved an $840,000 punitive damage verdict against an insurance company for the bad faith of its agent. The majority's opinion strongly suggested that a punitive damage award resulting from "unlimited jury discretion" would offend due process. The Haslip jury, however, had been given at least minimal standards; and its award had then been reviewed by both the trial judge and the Alabama Supreme Court, under rather elaborate procedures. This combination of protections enabled the Haslip majority to conclude that the "punitive damages award in this case" did not violate due process. The majority's case-specific reasoning effectively leaves open the due process status of a large intermediate range of punitive damage practices. Although the Court affirmed Alabama's "preponderance" standard of proof, even this affirmance was tied to Alabama's special set of procedures. And since evidence of defendant's wealth is inadmissible in Alabama punitive damage actions, the Court was in a position to conclude that Alabama procedures are not biased against "a defendant with a deep pocket."

Justices Anthony Kennedy and Antonin Scalia each wrote separate opinions in Haslip, concurring only in the majority's result. In their view, the long-standing historical acceptance of punitive damage practices all but eliminates the due process question. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor dissented, arguing that the limited standards applied by the Alabama jury were void for vagueness and also that the Alabama trial procedures entailed a due process violation. In her view, Alabama could satisfy constitutional requirements by allowing the jury to consider the seven substantive factors that the Alabama Supreme Court itself takes into account in the course of appellate review.

GARY T. SCHWARTZ
(1992)

Bibliography

SYMPOSIUM: PUNITIVE DAMAGES 1982 USC Law Review 56:1–203.

——— 1989 Alabama Law Review 40:687–1261.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES
(Update)

After flirting with the possibility for several years, the Supreme Court has finally identified particular punitive DAMAGE awards that violate the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. In Honda Motor Company v. Oberg (1994), an alleged defect in an all-terrain vehicle injured the plaintiff. At trial, the plaintiff secured a verdict of about $920,000 in compensatory damages and $5,000,000 in punitive damages. Oregon law prohibited any review, by either the trial judge or an appellate court, of the amount of civil-action verdicts (including punitive damage verdicts), except when the record contained "no evidence" to support the verdict. The Court— emphasizing the way in which the COMMON LAW tradition has consistently recognized the need for judicial review of the level of punitive damage awards—found that the Oregon law violated due process. While the Court's opinion highlighted PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS, the opinion also reasoned that procedure is related to substance: better procedure—such as judicial review—helps assure that punitive damage awards are not substantively excessive. The breadth of the Oberg holding is uncertain: It is unclear, for example, whether the Court's opinion means that the Oregon system is unconstitutional insofar as it bars judicial review of jury verdicts for compensatory damages. In any event, the Oberg holding may well be of limited import, for Oregon is apparently unique among American states in denying judicial review of the amount of damage awards.

Two years after Oberg, the Court, in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore (1996), invalidated a punitive damage judgment of $2,000,000 imposed on a car manufacturer that failed to disclose that a particular car had been damaged in transit and repainted (at a cost of $600) prior to its original sale. The purchaser of the car, eventually learning of the damage and the repainting, persuaded a jury that these events reduced the resale value of his car by $4,000. Accordingly, the jury granted him $4,000 in compensatory damages. In addition, the jury awarded $4 million in punitive damages. On appeal, the Alabama Supreme Court reduced this award to $2 million. The U.S. Supreme Court, by a 5–4 vote, then concluded that even this lower award was constitutionally excessive.

The MAJORITY OPINION focused primarily on SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. In determining whether a punitive damage award is excessive, the Court reasoned, three guidelines should be taken primarily into account: how reprehensible is the defendant's conduct, what is the ratio between compensatory damages and punitive damages, and what civil damages are provided by public law for comparable offenses. With respect to each of the three criteria, the Court concluded that the $2 million award was troublesome. As for reprehensibility, BMW's conduct posed no threat to health or safety, the relevant harm being solely economic; and while the company's nondisclosure was in a sense deliberate, its decision not to disclose its limited repainting effort was, in fact, quite legal under the regulatory schemes in effect in many other states. As for ratio, 500-to-1 raises a "suspicious judicial eyebrow." As for sanctions for comparable misconduct, in no state were they more than $10,000. Taking everything into the balance, the Court reached the conclusion that the punitive damage award was constitutionally excessive.

Given the Court's guidelines, the Court's conclusion—even if somewhat ad hoc—follows rather easily. The important question concerns the justifiability of the guidelines themselves. In explaining those guidelines, the Court reasoned that they bear on the ultimate question of whether BMW had been given "fair notice" of the likely award. This "fair notice" criterion introduces a significant element of procedural due process into the case. Moreover, it interestingly suggests that had there been prior verdicts in Alabama for comparable amounts for comparable misconduct, the award in Gore—however offensive in its magnitude—might well have been sustained.

A CONCURRING OPINION by Justice STEPHEN G. BREYER, speaking for three Justices, focused primarily on procedural due process. Breyer's concern was less with the excessiveness of the award and more with its possible arbitrariness. He focused on the question whether there were legal standards that adequately controlled the jury's discretion. Here Breyer noted that prior Alabama opinions had identified seven factors to take into account in considering the appropriate size of a punitive damage award. In the abstract, Breyer suggested, these standards appear sufficient. Still, insofar as they had been applied by the Alabama Supreme Court in the immediate case so as to justify an award of $2 million, that application revealed to Breyer that the standards do an inadequate job in constraining the jury's discretion.

One feature in Breyer's concurrence can be considered here—in combination with a conspicuous omission in the majority's analysis. In punitive damage cases, courts commonly say that juries can, and should, take the wealth of the defendant into account in determining the amount of a punitive damage award. Indeed, the wealth of the defendant was one of the seven factors that had been specifically endorsed in Alabama. But Breyer found this standard objectionable (at least in part) because of the way in which it "provides an open-ended basis for inflating awards when the defendant is wealthy." Furthermore, defendant wealth is conspicuously absent among the guidelines endorsed by the Court's majority. Accordingly, the constitutional status of defendant wealth as a factor that can justify large punitive damage awards is now subject to some doubt.

GARY T. SCHWARTZ
(2000)

PURE FOOD AND DRUG ACT
34 Stat. 768 (1906)

Typical of the progressive legislation passed after the turn of the century, this act extended the NATIONAL POLICE POWER to regulate the quality of food and drugs in INTERSTATE COMMERCE. A personal crusade by the chief chemist of the Department of Agriculture together with the muckrakers' stomach-churning exposés fanned public opinion. President THEODORE ROOSEVELT's backstage maneuvering also helped secure passage of this federal inspection act on June 30, 1906.

The act outlawed the manufacture of "adulterated or misbranded" food or drugs and prohibited their introduction into interstate or FOREIGN COMMERCE. Congress gave the secretaries of agriculture, treasury, and commerce and labor authority to issue regulations enforcing the act and specifically provided PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS for violators. The act forbade: misbranding of food; the use of imitations, substitutes, harmful additives, rotten ingredients; and concealment of "damage or inferiority." Drugs were required to meet federal standards of quality, purity, and strength or clearly label their departures from the standards.

The Supreme Court sustained this act in HIPOLITE EGG COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1911) as a legitimate exercise of congressional power over commerce. Congress substantially tightened and extended it in the FOOD, DRUG, AND COSMETIC ACT of 1938.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

Original 1986 Editorial Board

Henry J. Abraham

Charles L. Black, Jr.

Robert H. Bork

William J. Brennan, Jr.

Henry Steele Commager

Martha A. Field

Ruth Bader Ginsburg

Erwin N. Griswold

Gerald Gunther

Harold M. Hyman

Philip B. Kurland

Alpheus T. Mason

Paul L. Murphy

C. Herman Pritchett

Harry N. Scheiber

Martin Shapiro

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

SECOND EDITION

Edited by
Leonard W. Levy
and
Kenneth L. Karst

Adam Winkler, Associate Editor for the Second Edition

Dennis J. Mahoney, Assistant Editor for the First Edition
John G. West, Jr., Assistant Editor for Supplement I

MACMILLAN REFERENCE USA
An imprint of the Gale Group
New York

Macmillan Library Reference USA
1633 Broadway
New York, NY 10019

Printed in the United States of America

Printing Number
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Encyclopedia of the American Constitution / edited by Leonard W. Levy and Kenneth L. Karst.—2nd ed. / Adam Winkler, associate editor for the second edition.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 0-02-864880-3 (hard cover : alk. paper)
1. Constitutional law—United States—Encyclopedias. I. Levy, Leonard Williams, 1923– II. Karst, Kenneth L. III. Winkler, Adam.
KF4548 .E53 2000
342.73—dc21 00-029203

This paper meets the requirements of ANSI-NISO Z39.48-1992 (Permanence of Paper).

Q

QUERN v. JORDAN
440 U.S. 332 (1979)

This case held that SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, does not abrogate the states' ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity from suit in federal court. The amendment therefore precludes retroactive damage awards against states. States, however, may be forced to bear the costs of future compliance with the Constitution and state officials may be enjoined to comply with the Constitution.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

QUIRIN, EX PARTE
317 U.S. 1 (1942)

In 1942 President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT issued a proclamation subjecting enemies entering the United States through the coastal defense zones to trial by military tribunal and denying them access to the civil courts. Seven German saboteurs, who had been set ashore in the United States from submarines and who had subsequently been captured, were tried under the terms of the proclamation. The saboteurs petitioned for a writ of HABEAS CORPUS, arguing that, so long as the regular courts were open and operating, they were entitled to TRIAL BY JURY, and citing as PRECEDENT the CIVIL WAR case EX PARTE MILLIGAN.

The Supreme Court, then in summer recess, met in extraordinary session to hear the petition. An 8–0 Court, speaking through Chief Justice HARLAN F. STONE, upheld the constitutionality of military trial for offenses against the law of war. But the Court also insisted upon the right of the civil courts to review the constitutionality or applicability of Roosevelt's proclamation in individual cases.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Cramer v. United States; Haupt v. United States.)

Bibliography

BELKNAP, MICHAL R. 1980 The Supreme Court Goes to War: The Meaning and Implications of the Nazi Saboteur Case. Military Law Review 89:59–95.

QUOCK WALKER CASES

See: Commonwealth v. Jennison

QUOTAS, RACIAL

See: Racial Quotas

R

RABINOWITZ, UNITED STATES v.

See: Search Incident to Arrest

RACE AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Racial minorities have long sought equal application of the rights the Constitution provides to people accused of crimes. They have needed the protection of these rights because the CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM has at times seemed vehemently biased against them. The result of this quest for justice is that the Supreme Court has often addressed whether particular law enforcement practices are unconstitutional because of racial concerns. The Court has interpreted the Constitution as prohibiting the most obvious and blatant forms of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, such as excluding racial minorities from juries. There are, however, some practices such as racially skewed application of the CAPITAL PUNISHMENT and race-based assessments of suspicion, where thus far the Court has declined to order constitutional relief.

Historically, the Constitution has had a limited role in regulating the criminal justice system. Most criminal law originates with, and is enforced by, the states. The principle of FEDERALISM has limited the ability of the federal government to intervene, even in cases in which states have applied, or not applied, the criminal law in egregiously unfair ways. The FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT promises the "EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS" to all persons, but infamous cases like HODGES V. UNITED STATES (1906) and SCREWS V. UNITED STATES (1945) demonstrated the tenuous nature of this protection. In Hodges, whites were prosecuted by the federal government for vicious physical attacks against African Americans. The Court overturned the convictions, on the ground that the federal government exceeded its authority by making a federal case out of what should have been, in the Court's view, state charges. Thus, in the same manner that federalism provided constitutional justification for Southern states to establish de jure SEGREGATION, the Court allowed the principle to foster separate and unequal application of the criminal law to minority and white accused persons. Hodges, in which the Court held that the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT gave Congress the power to reach only acts that closely resembled enslavement, was later OVERRULED by JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968).

In other cases, however, the Court has been less reticent about insuring a strong role for the federal government in protecting the criminal justice rights of people of color. In fact, many of the best known decisions of constitutional CRIMINAL PROCEDURE involved African American or Hispanic litigants. These cases include POWELL V. ALABAMA (1932), which established the RIGHT TO COUNSEL in capital cases; BROWN V. MISSISSIPPI (1936), which held that coerced confessions violate DUE PROCESS; and MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), which established the right of defendants to be informed about their Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. In its opinions, the Court referred to race tangentially, if at all, but the facts of the cases often arose in a context in which it was clear that racial bias infected the state's criminal justice process, and would not be remedied by the state itself. In these cases, accused persons of color vindicated rights that are now enjoyed by all Americans.

The Court has also confronted the issue of explicit bias against racial minorities in the criminal justice system. It has been most protective of minority rights in cases in which the law has permitted discrimination on the basis of race. These cases have often arisen in the context of the right to trial by an impartial jury. Even after the Fourteenth Amendment affirmed their CITIZENSHIP, African Americans were often routinely excluded from juries. In STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1879), the Supreme Court reversed the conviction of a black man who had been found guilty of murder by a jury from which blacks were legally excluded. The Court ruled that the Fourteenth Amendment provides "a positive immunity, or right, most valuable to the colored race—the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation [and] exemption from legal discriminations." Strauder represents the first time that the Fourteenth Amendment was interpreted to apply to government racism.

Even though Strauder guaranteed African Americans the legal right to serve on juries, they still often were excluded through the practice of PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES. In a criminal trial each side may exclude a limited number of jurors even if there is no reason to think that jurors are biased. In SWAIN V. ALABAMA (1965), the prosecution peremptorily challenged all the African Americans in the jury pool. After the defendent was convicted he charged that the government's race-based exclusion of potential jurors violated the equal protection clause. The Court disagreed, upholding the conviction. The Court emphasized the historic importance of peremptory challenges, and ruled that race-based selection of jurors, absent a pattern of discrimination, was permissible in a particular case if it was part of the government's strategy to win the case. Twenty-one years later this aspect of Swain was overruled by the Court in BATSON V. KENTUCKY (1986), where the Court ruled that the equal protection clause prohibits the government from using race as a consideration in jury composition, even in a single case. In GEORGIA V. MCCOLLUM (1992), the Court prohibited defendants from using race-based challenges as well.

The Court has been more reticent in finding equal protection violations when the discrimination is not admitted by the government. In MCCLESKEY V. KEMP (1987), the Court considered statistical evidence that the Georgia death penalty was applied in a race-conscious manner (a sophisticated study found that race of the victim was a significant factor in jurors' determination whether convicted killers should be sentenced to death). The Court declined to invalidate the death penalty under the Fourteenth Amendment because it believed that the statistics did not demonstrate purposeful discrimination in the particular case. Under equal protection jurisprudence an intent to discriminate must be proven. In McCleskey, the Court emphasized the importance of discretion in the criminal justice system and stated that "exceptionally clear proof" was required before it would find an abuse of discretion. The Court also noted that "because of the risk that the factor of race may enter the criminal justice process, [it has] engaged in 'unceasing efforts' to eradicate racial prejudice from our criminal justice system." Since it found that because the statistical evidence showed at most "a discrepancy that appears to correlate with race," the requisite showing had not been advanced.

The requirement of purposeful discrimination has also confounded constitutional challenges to racially selective prosecution and punishment for noncapital offenses. In Ah Sin v. Wittman (1905), the defendant complained that the government's prosecution of gambling offenses was limited to Chinese people. The Court refused to reverse the conviction, establishing a standard of "certainty to every intent" before it would invalidate a conviction on grounds of selective prosecution. Likewise, in United States v. Armstrong (1996), the Court declined even to allow discovery in a case in which there was a claim of selective prosecution of African Americans for offenses involving crack cocaine. The Court required the defendant to show that similarly situated individuals of a different race were not prosecuted, but did not explain how this showing could be made in the absence of court-ordered discovery of prosecutors' files.

Despite constitutional challenges, the Court continues to permit law enforcement officers to consider race when determining suspicion of criminal activity. In United States v. Martínez-Fuerte (1976), the Court found no constitutional violation in Border Patrol officers' using Mexican ancestry as part of their determination of whom to stop for investigation of violation of IMMIGRATION laws. The Court's analysis was that the FOURTH AMENDMENT requires government SEARCHES AND SEIZURES to be reasonable, and that it was reasonable to think that people of Mexican ancestry were more likely to have violated the immigration laws. Some commentators have argued that race-based assessments of suspicion violate the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause, but the Court has not so ruled. The use of racial profiles remains one of the most controversial practices by police departments, and one of the few instances in which the Court has approved official race-consciousness by government actors.

PAUL BUTLER
(2000)

Bibliography

ARMOUR, JODY DAVID 1997 Negrophobia and Reasonable Racism: The Hidden Costs of Being Black in America. New York: New York University Press.

BRIGHT, STEPHEN B. 1995 Discrimination, Death, and Denial:

The Tolerance of Racial Discrimination in the Infliction of the Death Penalty. Santa Clara Law Review 35:433, 453–454.

BUTLER, PAUL 1995 Racially Based Jury Nullification: Black Power in the Criminal Justice System. Yale Law Journal 105: 677–725.

COLE, DAVID 1999 No Equal Justice: Race and Class in the American Criminal Justice System. New York: New Press.

DAVIS, ANGELA J. 1996 Benign Neglect of Racism in the Criminal Justice System. Michigan Law Review 94:1660–1686.

DEVELOPMENTS IN THE LAW 1988 Race and the Criminal Process. Harvard Law Review 101:1472–1641.

JOHNSON, SHERRI LYNN 1983 Race and the Decision to Detain a Suspect. Yale Law Journal 93:214–258.

——— 1985 Black Innocence and the White Jury. Michigan Law Review 83:1611–1708.

KENNEDY, RANDALL 1997 Race, Crime, and the Law. New York: Pantheon Books.

MILLER, JEROME G. 1996 Search and Destroy: African-American Males in the Criminal Justice System. New York: Cambridge University Press.

SKLANSKY, DAVID A. 1995 Cocaine, Race, and Equal Protection. Stanford Law Review 47:1283–1322.

TONRY, MICHAEL H. 1995 Malign Neglect: Race, Crime, and Punishment in America. New York: Oxford University Press.

RACE AND SEX IN ANTIDISCRIMINATION LAW

Over the past few decades, federal courts have developed fairly well-defined legal frameworks for the adjudication of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION claims and SEX DISCRIMINATION claims. But what if a plaintiff asserts that her employer discriminated against her based on both her race and her sex? What constitutional framework applies: a race discrimination framework, a sex discrimination framework, or something else? Are discrimination claims combining race and sex even constitutionally cognizable? Consider the following hypothetical case.

Mary Lo, a single mother, is an Asian American female employee of the California Department of Water Resources (CDWR), an entity of the state of California. Mary has a master's degree in civil engineering, and she has been employed as a CDWR engineer for eight years. Within the past three years, Mary has applied for promotions to supervisory positions three times. Each time Mary responded to a notice listing the opening after determining that she met the stated qualifications for the job.

After interviewing for the position, Mary was denied the promotion on each occasion. The first time, an Asian American man was promoted. The two subsequent openings were filled by white women. All three had either less work experience or fewer certifications than Mary. In addition to not receiving these promotions, Mary has been disciplined on several occasions for arriving at work late and for taking unauthorized sick days when her children were ill. The only other employee to suffer such reproach is another Asian American female. However, there is no evidence of explicit animus against Mary or other Asian American females.

According to Mary, CDWR's denial of her promotion was discriminatorily motivated. More specifically, Mary's contention is that CDWR did not promote her because she is an Asian American woman. As a general matter, the law requires a plaintiff like Mary to think about her discrimination as arising from her (perceived) national origin, her status as a woman, or her race as an Asian American. However, Mary wants to argue that CDWR does not view her as either a female or as an Asian American or as a foreigner. She is convinced that all three of these aspects of her identity (her race, her gender, and her perceived national origin) shape CDWR's interaction with her.

Broadly speaking, there are two legal routes Mary can take to challenge her employer's decision to deny her promotion—one statutory, the other constitutional. First, she can claim EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION under Title VII, a federal statute prohibiting private and public employment discrimination. Second, Mary can claim that the state has denied her EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS in violation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. This second option is available to Mary because her employer is a governmental entity. Let us first examine Mary's claim under Title VII; Title VII jurisprudence includes a small body of opinions that directly address the question of whether a plaintiff like Mary may bring a combined race-and-sex employment discrimination claim.

Courts initially viewed claims alleging race-and-sex discrimination brought under Title VII as distinct and independent claims. For example, in Degraffenreid v. General Motors Assembly Division (1976), the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri held that plaintiffs may argue race discrimination and sex discrimination separately or in the alternative, but they may not argue race-and-sex discrimination as one claim. In Degraffenreid, a group of black female employees invoked Title VII to advance a disparate impact theory of discrimination. They alleged that General Motors's seniority system disproportionately affected black women. Prior to 1964, General Motors did not hire any black women at all. Those who were hired after 1964 all lost their jobs as part of a workforce reduction by General Motors. Because black women were the last to be hired, they were the first to be fired.

The Degraffenreid court granted summary judgment for the defendants. It explained that although the black female plaintiffs could argue that General Motors discriminated against them based on their race (i.e., the fact that they are black) or based on their sex (i.e., the fact that they are women), they were not permitted to argue that General Motors discriminated against them based on their race and sex (i.e., the fact that they are black women). The court reasoned that

> The legislative history surrounding Title VII does not indicate that the goal of the statute was to create a new classification of "black women" who would have greater standing than, for example, a black male. The prospect of the creation of new classes of protected minorities, governed only by mathematical principles of permutation and combination, clearly raises the prospect of opening the hackneyed Pandora's box.

There are at least two ways to understand the court's analysis here. The court might be suggesting that Congress did not contemplate that black women could be discriminated against as black women. Alternatively, the court could be saying that even to the extent that black women experience discrimination that neither black men nor nonblack women experience, Congress did not intend to protect them. Either way, the court's conclusion is that plaintiffs may not aggregate their race and sex discrimination claims. Having reframed the plaintiffs' case as alleging separate claims of race discrimination and sex discrimination, the court found evidence of neither. Black men were not discriminated against, which undermined the notion that there was race discrimination, and white women were not discriminated against, which undermined the notion that there was sex discrimination.

Unlike the plaintiffs in Degraffenreid, Mary, our hypothetical plaintiff, would be asserting a disparate treatment, as opposed to a disparate impact, theory of discrimination. Her argument is not that CDWR employs neutral employment criteria that disproportionately burden Asian American women. Rather, her contention is that she is being treated differently (hence the term "disparate treatment") because she is an Asian American female. Under the Degraffenreid standard, Mary's claim would not survive the defendant's motion for summary judgment. To establish a prima facie case of discrimination under a disparate treatment theory, Mary would have to establish that (1) she belongs to a group protected by Title VII, (2) she applied and was qualified for a job for which the employer was seeking applicants, (3) despite her qualifications, she was rejected, and (4) after her rejection the position remained open and the employer continued to seek applicants among persons having the plaintiff's qualifications. Should Mary succeed in establishing a prima facie case, the burden would shift to her employer to set forth a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for not promoting her. If CDWR makes this showing, the burden shifts back to Mary to prove that CDWR's articulated reason was a pretext for discrimination.

Mary would likely succeed in establishing a prima facie case of discrimination. Both race and gender are protected categories under Title VII, and Mary was more than qualified for the position she applied for. However, it is generally not very difficult for employers to articulate a "legitimate" reason for not promoting particular employees. In Mary's case, CDWR might point to Mary's tardiness and her unauthorized sick days. Mary will have a hard time proving that these justifications are a pretext for discrimination. Why? Because CDWR promoted white women and an Asian American man.

One of the problems with Degraffenreid's antidiscrimination framework is that it fails to address what might be referred to as compound discrimination. All of us have "compounded identities" comprised of our race, our gender, our SEXUAL ORIENTATION, and so on. How we experience discrimination is shaped by the way in which our identities are compounded. Black men and black women do not experience race discrimination in the same way, because of their gender difference. White women and black women do not experience sex discrimination in the same way, because of their racial difference. Yet, under Degraffenreid, black women are entitled to Title VII protection only to the extent that their discriminatory experiences comport with the discriminatory experiences of either white women or black men. The court's failure in Degraffenreid to acknowledge that black women experience compound discrimination based on their race and sex together results in an antidiscrimination framework that privileges the experiences of white women and black men.

In some sense, the employment of the concept "compound discrimination" is problematic. It suggests that our identities and the discrimination we experience are additive. This is not exactly true. Think again of our hypothetical plaintiff, Mary Lo. She is subject to discrimination based on stereotypes that attach to Asian American women. These stereotypes are different from those that attach to Asian men and different from those that attach to white women. Nor are the stereotypes that Asian American women face the sum of Asian American male and white female stereotypes. The "compound discrimination" metaphor is employed here to convey the idea that the discriminatory experiences of women of color— including Asian American women—are shaped by the interaction (not addition) of racism and sexism and that the Degraffenreid antidiscrimination framework fails to take this into account.

The Degraffenreid approach to antidiscrimination has not gone unchallenged, however. One of the first decisions to the contrary was Jefferies v. Harris County Community Action Association (1980). In Jefferies, a black woman made claims of race-and-sex discrimination arising out of the defendant's failure to promote her and its decision to terminate her. The positions for which she applied were filled by black men and nonblack women. When the trial court dismissed her claims, she appealed, arguing that the court had erred in refusing to consider her claim of compound discrimination based on race and sex. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit agreed. In accepting Jefferies's compound discrimination claim, the Fifth Circuit adopted the "sex-plus" analysis established by the Supreme Court in Phillips v. Martin Marietta Corporation (1971). In Phillips, the Court held that the disparate treatment of a subclass of one sex can violate Title VII. The term "sex-plus" refers to situations in which employers discriminate by coupling a nonprotected factor (in the Phillips case, having preschool-age children) with a protected one (sex). The Court held that this type of discrimination was actionable under Title VII even if women in general and men with preschool-age children were not discriminated against.

The Jefferies court analyzed the plaintiff's "sex-plus-race" claim by characterizing her as a woman who, because of a secondary consideration, race, was treated differently. The court recognized that "discrimination against black females can exist even in the absence of discrimination against black men or white women." Title VII provides a remedy for such discrimination, the Jefferies court reasoned, because of the wording of the statute and its legislative history. Title VII forbids discrimination on the basis of an employee's "race, color, religion, sex, or national origin." Because Congress used the word "or," the court reasoned that it intended to include discrimination based on any or all of the listed characteristics. Moreover, Congress explicitly rejected a revision to the statute which would have added the word "solely" before the word "sex." The court viewed this rejection as signifying an intention to allow plaintiffs to aggregate their claims.

Although the sex-plus framework improves on the Degraffenreid race or sex framework, it nevertheless presents several important problems. First, it requires plaintiffs to argue that their race is a subordinate reason for discrimination based on gender. The sex-plus analysis treats discrimination as being drawn purely on gender lines but operating to discriminate against a certain subset of women.

Second, the sex-plus analysis equates race discrimination with other "pluses" such as marital or familial status. Equating race with other pluses ignores the fact that race itself, unlike marital or familial status, is a classification explicitly protected under Title VII.

Third, the sex-plus framework limits the number of characteristics a plaintiff can allege as contributing to her employer's discrimination. Specifically, plaintiffs are permitted to add only one "plus" to their sex discrimination claim. Thus, in Mary's case, if she alleges discrimination based on her race as a "plus" to discrimination based on her sex, she cannot add factors such as (perceived) national origin, single motherhood, or both.

A recent decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit takes a small step toward eliminating some of these difficulties. In Lam v. University of Hawai'i (1994), the plaintiff, an Asian American woman, invoked Title VII to allege race, sex, and national origin discrimination after she was turned down twice for a job as a law professor at the University of Hawaii. The Ninth Circuit explicitly rejected the district court's separate treatment of race and sex, arguing that an antidiscrimination framework that examines racism "alone" or sexism "alone" is impoverished. Significantly, the Ninth Circuit's compound discrimination approach is not based on Jefferies's sex-plus analysis. Lam's move away from (or noninvocation of) the sex-plus framework creates a jurisprudential window for plaintiffs to base their discrimination claims on the aggregation of several aspects of their identity. Still, it remains to be seen what impact Lam will have on future Title VII litigation.

Having looked at how Mary's sex-and-race compound discrimination claim would be adjudicated under Title VII, let us now turn to the Constitution. Mary would base her constitutional claim on the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Unlike plaintiffs claiming discrimination under Title VII, plaintiffs asserting an equal protection violation have only one path available to them; they must prove that the government is engaged in intentional discrimination. Intentional sex-based discrimination by the government is unconstitutional unless it passes what is referred to as "intermediate scrutiny." Sex-based discrimination survives intermediate scrutiny if it is substantially related to an important governmental objective. The government is not absolutely barred from discriminating against individuals based on sex, then, but it must justify that discrimination by reference to an important objective.

The Constitution regulates racial discrimination in a similar, though stricter, way. Intentional race-based governmental discrimination is unconstitutional unless it passes what is referred to as STRICT SCRUTINY. Race-based discrimination passes strict scrutiny if it serves a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST and is narrowly tailored to meet that interest.

This is the constitutional framework Mary would face should she decide to bring an equal protection discrimination claim against CDWR. This framework invites us to think about at least the following three questions: (1) Would Mary succeed in establishing a case of intentional discrimination based either on race or sex? (2) Would Mary's race-and-sex compound discrimination be constitutionally cognizable? (3) If Mary were permitted to assert a race-and-sex compound discrimination claim and she ultimately established the claim, what level of judicial scrutiny would apply: intermediate scrutiny (which applies to sex discrimination), strict scrutiny (which applies to race discrimination), or something else?

With respect to the first question, it is unlikely that Mary has enough evidence to prove intentional discrimination based either on sex or race alone. The CDWR was not overtly racist or sexist in denying Mary the promotion. Nor does CDWR have an express policy of sex or race discrimination. In the absence of such "smoking gun" evidence, it would be very difficult for Mary to convince a court that CDWR intentionally discriminated against her. The case would come down to circumstantial evidence. At this point, the court is likely to look at the people who were promoted. And if Asian American men fared well and white women fared well, the court may decide that there is no triable issue of fact—that is to say, grant summary judgment for the defendant.

But what if Mary asserted a race-and-sex compound discrimination claim? First, would such a claim be constitutionally cognizable? And second, would she be able to prove it? The answer to the first question is unclear. The issue has arisen—at least implicitly—in context of section 1983 litigation. SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, U.S. CODE is a federal statute that provides civil and criminal remedies for violations of constitutional and certain federal statutory rights. Plaintiffs bringing a section 1983 claim must demonstrate that (1) a person acting under the COLOR OF LAW (2) committed an act that deprived her of some right, privilege, or immunity protected by the Constitution or federal law. Since Mary is arguing that her constitutional rights were violated, she may invoke section 1983. Significantly, Mary still has the burden of establishing the underlying constitutional deprivation; namely, that CDWR violated her right to equal protection.

There are few judicial opinions adjudicating compound discrimination claims under section 1983. One reason is that redress under section 1983 for equal protection violations is limited to plaintiffs whose employers are state agencies (or, can show STATE ACTION) and those who can meet the burden of proving intentional discrimination.

Despite the dearth of published opinions analyzing compound discrimination claims under section 1983, two district court opinions offer plaintiffs some hope. In Anthony v. County of Sacramento (1995), a federal trial court, relying on Lam, implicitly suggested that plaintiffs advancing an equal protection argument under section 1983 may combine their race and sex discrimination claims. And in Tennie v. City of New York Department of Social Services of the New York City Human Resources Administration (1987), a federal trial court refused to certify a class that included whites, blacks, and hispanics of both sexes. The court reasoned that female minority women—when compared to white women and men of color—had different discrimination claims under both Title VII and the equal protection clause because of their vulnerability to racism and sexism.

Tennie and Anthony notwithstanding, the ability of plaintiffs to bring constitutional race-and-sex compound discrimination claims under the equal protection clause remains unclear. The Supreme Court has not spoken definitively on this issue. Moreover, at least one federal appeals court opinion, Lowe v. City of Monrovia (1985), decided before Tennie and Anthony, suggested that in order to prevail under a section 1983 claim alleging race and sex discrimination, the plaintiff "must first prove that the defendants purposefully discriminated against her either because of her race or her sex."

Assuming that compound race-and-sex discrimination claims are constitutionally cognizable, does Mary have a viable claim? Probably not. She would not be able to point to sufficient evidence to demonstrate that CDWR intentionally discriminated against her because she is an Asian American woman. Is there any evidence that CDWR might have discriminated against Mary? Recall that Mary was reprimanded for taking sick days and for tardiness, and that the only other employee to suffer such reproach is another Asian American female. These facts are certainly probative of discriminatory intent, but, without more, they do not demonstrate that CDWR denied Mary the promotion because she is an Asian American woman.

A final equal protection issue raised by compound race-and-sex discrimination claims is the applicable level of scrutiny. Some commentators have suggested that the Supreme Court's decision in UNITED STATES V. VIRGINIA (1996) has effectively nudged the STANDARD OF REVIEW for sex discrimination toward strict scrutiny. Irrespective of this consideration, however, a strong argument can be made that at least strict scrutiny should apply. In other words, should the government engage in compound race-and-sex discrimination against, for example, black women, such discrimination would be deemed unconstitutional unless it served a compelling state interest and was narrowly tailored to meet that interest. At least two theories could be advanced to support this argument: (1) a "double bind" theory of discrimination—that black women, because they occupy at least two subordinate identities (women and blacks), experience a double-discrimination (sexism and racism), and (2) a "DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITY" theory—that black women have historically been discriminated against, subject to pervasive stereotypes, and denied meaningful access to the political process.

Of course, neither of these theories renders uncontroversial the notion that black women should be treated as a distinct class in equal protection analysis. There are

"slippery slope" concerns: If black women are deemed a cognizable class for equal protection purposes and are entitled to strict scrutiny protection, there may be no stopping point. As it turns out, however, the slope is not nearly so slippery as it might appear to be. There is a limiting principle: a group seeking strict scrutiny protection based on a compound theory of discrimination could be required to demonstrate historical discrimination, discreteness and insularity, and political powerlessness. This limiting principle is already a part of our equal protection jurisprudence. To the extent that other compound identities, for example, Mexican American women, are able to satisfy this test, there is no good reason to deny them strict scrutiny protection.

DEVON W. CARBADO
(2000)

Bibliography

CARBADO, DEVON W. 1999 Introduction. Black Men on Race, Gender, & Sexuality: A Critical Reader. New York: New York University Press.

CRENSHAW, KIMBERLÉ 1989 Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Antidiscrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory and Antiracist Politics. University of Chicago Legal Forum 1989:139–142.

TRENT, JUDY SCALES 1989 Black Women and the Constitution: Finding Our Place, Asserting Our Rights (Voices of Experience: New Responses to Gender Discourse). Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review 9:23–27.

RACE AND VOTING

Controversies over race and voting stem from the fact that citizens belong to racial and ethnic groups with different and often conflicting interests, and as group members they tend to vote for candidates representing those interests. What should be done when their group's preferred candidates are consistently prevented from winning election?

The question became urgent after passage of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. In the South, most newly enfranchised blacks were unable to elect black candidates. Racially polarized voting was the main culprit: In electoral venues where whites outnumbered blacks—and in the 1960s this was almost always the case—white votes overwhelmed black ones.

The paucity of majority-black venues resulted primarily from racial GERRYMANDERING; white legislators refused to draw majority-black districts in single-member-district systems or adopted majority-white multimember-district ("at-large") systems. Suits by black and other minority voters—particularly Hispanics—attacked racial gerrymandering as illegal efforts to dilute minority voting strength. On this theory, the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT guarantees racial minorities the opportunity to participate equally in the political process by electing candidates of their choice, and the guarantee is abridged by ELECTORAL DISTRICTING that denies minorities this opportunity. The Supreme Court adopted the theory in White v. Regester (1973), and Congress in 1982 then added vote-dilution protection to groups covered by the Voting Rights Act. Thornburg v. Gingles (1986) simplified the criteria for proving dilution, and the U.S. Department of Justice, charged with administering the Voting Rights Act, required states redistricting after the 1990 Census to draw majority-minority districts whenever feasible. Consequently, from the middle 1970s to the early 1990s the number of black and Hispanic officials in the South and Southwest, respectively, increased sharply.

This trend was reversed in the mid-1990s. In SHAW V. RENO (1993), white plaintiffs in North Carolina, a state that is 22 percent black, challenged aspects of the 1990s REAPPORTIONMENT, which had resulted in the election of the first two African American members of Congress from that state since RECONSTRUCTION. The plaintiffs claimed that the shape of one of the safe black districts was "so extremely irregular on its face that it rationally can be viewed only as an effort to segregate the races for purposes of voting, without regard for traditional districting principles and without sufficiently compelling justification." The Court majority agreed that such a claim was justiciable. In MILLER V. JOHNSON (1995) the Court emphasized that the harm to voters was not determined by the shape of the district, but by whether the district had been created predominantly for racial purposes. This new cause of action is said to derive from a theory of "expressive harms," as distinct from either vote denial or vote dilution.

Shaw caused various safe black and Hispanic congressional districts to be replaced with majority-white ones. Vote-dilution challenges by minority plaintiffs diminished, and suits were filed challenging safe minority districts below the congressional level.

Critics of vote-dilution litigation welcomed these developments. Among their reasons, all arguable, are that racial gerrymanders as remedies for vote dilution violate the principle of "the colorblind Constitution"; that creating safe minority districts both cuts the Democratic margins among elected officials and diminishes the substantive REPRESENTATION of minority voters; and that the probable decline in the number of minority elected officials resulting from Shaw encourages consideration of proportional representation schemes that are allegedly superior to winner-take-all, single-member-district plans.

In response, those who favor the theory of minority vote dilution argue that, whatever the trade-offs between electing minority officeholders and furthering the substantive representation of minorities, minority voters lose an important kind of access to the polity when white bloc voting constrains (and in some locales prohibits altogether) minority officeholding. This argument, in turn, raises the issue of how intense racially polarized voting is today, particularly in the South and Southwest. Systematic research suggests that it is still quite intense there, although the degree of intensity is disputed among political scientists.

In the nation's polity as on the Court, three views on race and voting presently vie for supremacy: race neutrality in districting, which rejects the theory of minority vote dilution altogether; racial pluralism, which advocates protecting the right of minority groups to elect their candidates of preference using race-based districting; and proportional representation, through the replacement of district systems with such plans as limited or cumulative voting. None of these views has yet gained ascendancy.

CHANDLER DAVIDSON
(2000)

Bibliography

DAVIDSON, CHANDLER and GROFMAN, BERNARD, eds. 1994 Quiet Revolution in the South: The Impact of the Voting Rights Act 1965–1990. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

GUINIER, LANI 1994 The Tyranny of the Majority: Fundamental Fairness in Representative Democracy. New York: Free Press.

ISSACHAROFF, SAMUEL; KARLAN, PAMELA S.; and PILDES, RICHARD H. 1998 The Law of Democracy: Legal Structure of the Political Process. Westbury, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

KOUSSER, J. MORGAN 1999 Colorblind Injustice: Minority Voting Rights and the Undoing of the Second Reconstruction. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

LUBLIN, DAVID 1997 The Paradox of Representation: Racial Gerrymandering and Minority Interests in Congress. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

SWAIN, CAROL M. 1993 Black Faces, Black Interests: The Representation of African Americans in Congress. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

THERNSTROM, ABIGAIL 1987 Whose Votes Count? Affirmative Action and Minority Voting Rights. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Univesity Press.

RACE-CONSCIOUSNESS

It was once widely believed that BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954, 1955) had removed the last vestiges of race-consciousness from the Constitution. Many observers saw the Brown decision as a vindication of Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN's lone dissent in PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896). Harlan's critique of the majority's SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE was summarized in these famous words: "Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens. In respect of civil rights, all citizens are equal before the law." In the years between Plessy and Brown, the ideal of a "color-blind" Constitution served as one of the central tenets of liberal CONSTITUTIONALISM.

Today, however, some leading liberal constitutionalists argue that adherence to the ideal of a color-blind Constitution was a mistake. It has been only recently discovered that "color-blindness" was all along a "myth" or, at best, a "misleading metaphor." The principal reason for the volte-face on the part of liberal activists is summarized by Laurence H. Tribe, who writes that "judicial rejection of the "separate but equal' talisman seems to have been accompanied by a potentially troublesome lack of sympathy for racial separateness as a possible expression of group solidarity." Indeed, it seems to be true that the expression of racial or ethnic group solidarity does require something like the old—and once justly decried—"separate but equal doctrine." Tribe's tergiversations indicate, however, that it is not yet entirely fashionable to speak openly about the desirability of returning to separate but equal. Attacks on the idea of a color-blind Constitution, on the other hand, are legion.

A curious feature of the Brown decision is that it did not make a comprehensive condemnation of racial classifications or entirely overrule the Plessy decision. Only racial classifications that were said to produce "feelings of inferiority" were deemed to violate EQUAL PROTECTION, and from the psychological evidence adduced by the Court, this was "proven" to be the case only in the context of grammar school education. Presumably, racial SEGREGATION that did not stigmatize one race or ethnic group as inferior would survive the test adumbrated in Brown. Thus, Brown did not overrule all racial classifications—or treat them as SUSPECT CLASSIFICATIONS—but left open the possibility that under certain circumstances racial classifications could be "benign" if the classification were designed to produce racial class remedies rather than racial class injuries. Resort to the doctrine of STRICT SCRUTINY in the Brown case would probably have effectively foreclosed the future use of race as a legitimate classification.

Perhaps the best expression of the new understanding of "separate but equal" was made by Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN in his separate opinion in REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1977): "I suspect that it would be impossible to arrange an affirmative-action program in a racially neutral way and have it successful. . . . In order to get beyond racism, we must first take account of race. There is no other way. And in order to treat some persons equally, we must treat them differently." Justice Blackmun could have used the word "separately" in lieu of "differently" without changing his meaning in the slightest. Indeed, it has been the advent of affirmative action that has generated the greatest controversy about race-consciousness and the Constitution. At its inception, the proponents of affirmative action assured a skeptical world that it was only a temporary measure to be employed in the service of equality of opportunity. But now, some twenty-odd years after its appearance, affirmative action is looked upon unabashedly by its supporters as a means of securing racial class entitlements.

Inevitably, the test of racial class entitlements—and RACIAL DISCRIMINATION—is the concept of racial proportionality. This idea assumes that, absent discrimination, the races will freely arrange themselves in the various aspects of political and private life in exact racial proportionality and that when they do not, there is a prima facie evidence of discrimination (or underrepresentation) that eventually must be rectified by any number of coercive remedies. This situtaion, of course, presents the alarming spectacle of a nation one day looking upon all civil rights as nothing more than racial class entitlements. But any nation with the slightest concern for the lessons of history would never self-consciously allow itself to regard the rights of individuals as nothing more that the by-product of racial class interests. Even though we may be assured that the ultimate ends of such programs as affirmative action are "to get beyond racism," those who advocate such policies simply have not thought out the likely consequences, believing, no doubt, that a means can never become the end itself.

The constitutional doctrine that most contributes to race-consciousness is that of DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITY. The underlying premise of this doctrine is that there are certain racial and ethnic minorities that are permanently isolated from the majoritarian political process and therefore cannot vindicate their racial class interests by merely exercising the vote. The concept of the discrete and insular minority assumes that American politics has always been dominated by a monolithic majority that seeks only to aggrandize its own racial class interests at the expense of the various discrete and insular minorities. Thus, the moral authority of the majority—indeed, of majoritarian politics itself—must be questioned, if not undermined. In fact, some legal scholars argue that the only way that the rights of discrete and insular minorities can be absolutely guaranteed is in those instances where legislation disadvantages or injures the majority. Thus, one could argue that the Constitution not only permits affirmative action but requires it. It is only where the majority suffers a positive disadvantage that one can be certain that discrete and insular minorities are not harmed by the operation of the majoritarian political process. Fortunately, the Supreme Court has never accepted this negative version of the categorical imperative.

A bare acquaintance with history shows the impossibility of such a simplistic view of American politics. Could such a monolithic majority bent on the exclusive aggrandizement of its own racial class interests approve the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution? Ratify the Bill of Rights? Fight the Civil War to overturn the DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) decision? Ratify the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT? Pass the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 and the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965? These great events (and a host of others) in American constitutional history make it incredible that learned people—including the Justices of the Supreme Court—could believe that the concept of discrete and insular minorities was in any way an accurate reflection of American political life. American life is too subtle and complex to be understood exclusively in terms of racial class interests.

The Framers of the Constitution knew that class politics, in whatever guise it appeared, was incompatible with constitutional democracy. The whole thrust of JAMES MADISON's belief in the "capacity of mankind for self-government" was his conviction that under a properly constructed constitution, majorities could be rendered capable of ruling in the interest of the whole of society rather than in the interest of the part (i.e., in the interest of the majority). The structure of society itself, with its multiplicity of interests and accompanied by a constitutional structure informed by the SEPARATION OF POWERS, held the prospect that majorities could act in a manner consistent "with the rules of justice and the rights of the minor party." Madison called these majorities constitutional majorities as distinguished from numerical majorities. Many legal scholars today, however, simply proclaim that every majority is ipso facto a special-interest group and that majorities cannot therefore be trusted to rule in the interest of the whole. Some even conclude that courts should be cast in the role of virtual representatives of discrete and insular minorities, because judges are isolated from the majoritarian political process and can therefore "rule" in the interest of the whole of society. Others, however, have not forgotten such infamous decisions as Dred Scott, Plessy v. Ferguson, LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), and Korematsu v. United States (1944) and are quick to recognize this scheme as a form of judicial oligarchy. Virtual representation is an idea that is incompatible with republican government.

It has become something of an orthodoxy among legal scholars to ridicule the moral imperative of racial neutrality as the driving force of the Constitution. They retort that race has always been a factor in American political life and it is simply unrealistic to think that it will not be so for the foreseeable future. Because race-consciousness will inevitably be part and parcel of constitutional calculations, it is more honest to advocate them openly than to seek a deceptive refuge in the ideal of a color-blind Constitution. It is true that America's constitutional past is all too replete with race-consciousness. After all, the Constitution itself gave support to SLAVERY. The toleration of slavery in the Constitution was a product of political necessity. The Constitution itself—and thereby any prospects of ending slavery—would never have been accepted without compromise on the issue of slavery. But most of the Framers of the Constitution looked upon that compromise as a necessary (but temporary) departure from the principles of the regime that had been enunciated in the Declaration of Independence. The best they could do under the circumstances was to fix those principles in the Constitution so that the Constitution could one day provide the basis for emancipation. The American founding was incomplete, but the Constitution looked forward to its completion by putting, in ABRAHAM LINCOLN's words, "slavery on the ultimate road to extinction." Lincoln always interpreted the Constitution in light of the principles of the Declaration. In doing this, he was following the lead of the Framers themselves.

In 1857, Lincoln gave an account of the aspirations of the American polity and the role the Declaration played in fixing constitutional aspirations. He noted that the authors of the Declaration "did not mean to assert the obvious untruth, that all were then actually enjoying equality, nor yet, that they were about to confer it immediately upon them." In fact, Lincoln noted, they had no power to "confer such a boon," had they been inclined to do so. Rather, "they meant simply to declare the right, so that the enforcement of it might follow as fast as circumstances should permit. They meant to set up a standard maxim for free society, which should be familiar to all, and revered by all, constantly looked to, constantly labored for, and even though never perfectly attained, constantly approximated, and thereby constantly spreading and deepening its influence, and augmenting the happiness and value of life to all people of all colors everywhere." With the Constitution viewed as the means of implementing the "standard maxims" of the Declaration, the nation has made tremendous progress since the Civil War and Reconstruction.

Yet, at almost the eleventh hour, liberal constitutionalists want to abandon those principles that have been the source of progress. Surely the progress came too slowly and advanced by fits and starts, according to the political circumstances of the day. But no one can deny that progress occurred and that it resulted directly from our "ancient faith" that the Constitution should be race-neutral. Now we are told that progress in race relations has not gone far enough or fast enough and it is time to return to a race-conscious Constitution to implement a newer, more certain view of racial progress. The return to race-consciousness also means that sooner or later we will have to pronounce the principle of equality "an empty idea." The reason is simple: equality is a principle that is incompatible with group rights and preferential treatment. One prominent author has argued that because it cannot comprehend the "rights of race," "equality is an idea that should be banished from moral and legal discourse." Indeed, group claims—including racial group claims—are not claims of equality, but claims of inequality, and they necessarily rest upon some notion of "separate but equal." Class claims deny the principle of equality because they ascribe to individuals class characteristics that are different—and necessarily unequal—from those of individuals occupying other classes. If there were no inequalities implicit in class distinctions, such distinctions would be superfluous and there would be no need to substitute group rights for individual rights.

Almost the whole of American constitutional history has been a history of the nation's attempt to confine the genie of race by powerful constitutional bonds; yet the most sophisticated constitutional scholars today advocate the release of the racial genie once again, this time to act as a benign, rather than destructive, force. This is dangerous advice because this time the genie will not be restrained by the moral principle that "all men are created equal."

EDWARD J. ERLER
(1992)

Bibliography

ERLER, EDWARD J. 1989 Equal Protection and Regime Principles, Pages 243–283 in Robert L. Utley, Jr., ed., The Promise of American Politics. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America.

STRAUSS, DAVID A. 1986 The Myth of Colorblindness. Supreme Court Review 1986:99–134.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1988 American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. Pages 1474–1480. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

WESTEN, PETER 1982 The Empty Idea of Equality. Harvard Law Review 95:537–596.

RACE, REPRODUCTION, AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Race has always influenced the meaning of reproductive freedom in America. Scientific racism explained the domination of whites over blacks as the natural social order: blacks were biologically destined to be slaves and whites to be their masters. For three centuries, courts and legislatures carefully defined race according to amount of black ancestry and enforced the rule of white racial purity. One of America's earliest laws was a 1662 Virginia SLAVERY statute that gave the children born to slave mothers and fathered by white men the status of slaves. Laws against MISCEGENATION, designed to keep the races from intermingling, were not declared unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court until 1967. Even today, Americans' continued understanding of race as an inherited trait profoundly connects reproductive policy to racial politics.

Regulating black women's reproductive decisions has been a central aspect of racial oppression in America. Slavemasters had a financial incentive to exploit slave women's reproductive capacity to replenish the enslaved labor force. During the Depression, the alliance between the emerging BIRTH CONTROL movement and eugenicists paved the way for public birth control clinics aimed at reducing the birthrates of poor blacks in the South. It was discovered in the 1970s that thousands of black women had been coercively sterilized annually under government welfare programs. Federally funded programs had similarly sterilized more than one-third of women of childbearing age in PUERTO RICO and one-fourth of Native American women.

Although contemporary reproductive health policies are not so blatantly racist, many coercive policies have a disparate effect on minority women and are arguably designed to curb the birthrates of minority mothers on welfare in particular. Many states have enacted child exclusion policies, or "family caps," that deny additional benefits for children born to women already receiving public assistance. Politicians have proposed even more coercive measures, such as mandating that mothers on welfare be implanted with the long-acting contraceptive Norplant. In the 1980s prosecutors across the country initiated a punitive response to the problem of drug use during pregnancy. Although the problem cuts across racial and economic lines, the vast majority of more than two hundred women prosecuted for prenatal crimes were poor black mothers who smoked crack cocaine. Recently the Supreme Court of South Carolina upheld the conviction of a black woman whose fetus was exposed to crack, ruling that a fetus is a child for purposes of the state's child abuse statute.

There are two types of constitutional challenges to reproductive health policies that threaten RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. First, the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT prohibits any law regulating reproduction that explicitly classifies citizens on the basis of race or that disproportionately affects a racial or ethnic minority where invidious purpose can be shown. Such claims are rarely successful, for government officials today are unlikely either to make explicit racial distinctions or to express racial motivation in enacting reproductive policies. The U.S. Supreme Court has upheld reproductive health laws that disproportionately burden minority women. Federal and state laws denying Medicaid reimbursement for ABORTIONS and other regulations that make it difficult for poor women to obtain abortion services, for example, disproportionately affect minority women, but were held constitutional in cases such as HARRIS V. MCCRAE (1980) and PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992).

A second constitutional challenge combines the equal protection mandate with the protection of reproductive decisionmaking under the DUE PROCESS clause. These two provisions support a constitutional prohibition of invidious government standards for childbearing that reinforce white supremacy. SKINNER V. OKLAHOMA (1942) acknowledged the threat to racial equality posed by government interference in the right to procreate. Skinner invalidated the Oklahoma Habitual Criminal Sterilization Act authorizing the sterilization of persons convicted two or more times for "felonies involving moral turpitude." The Court found that the statute treated unequally criminals who had committed similarly culpable offenses: chicken thieves like Mr. Skinner were sterilized while embezzlers were not. Applying STRICT SCRUTINY under the equal protection clause, the Court concluded that the government failed to demonstrate that the statute's classification was justified by eugenics or the inheritability of criminal traits.

The Skinner Court's reason for choosing strict scrutiny is especially pertinent to the constitutionality of racial discrimination in reproductive health laws. Declaring the right to bear children to be "one of the basic civil rights of man," the Court recognized the significant risk of racial discrimination inherent in state intervention in reproduction. "In evil or reckless hands," Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS wrote, "[the government's power to sterilize] can cause races or types that are inimical to the dominant group to wither and disappear." The state's discriminatory imposition of sterilization against certain types of criminals was as invidious "as if it had selected a particular race or nationality for oppressive treatment." Thus, the Court acknowledged the potential for racist governmental regulation of procreation even in the absence of explicit racial classifications.

LOVING V. VIRGINIA (1967) also deployed the constitutional guarantee to strike down a discriminatory law involving reproduction. Loving invalidated a Virginia statute that banned interracial marriage, resting the decision on both the equal protection and the due process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Virginia federal judge who convicted Mr. and Mrs. Loving explicitly endorsed scientific racism as an explanation for antimiscegenation laws, reasoning that "[t]he fact that [Almighty God] separated the races shows that he did not intend for the races to mix." The Court held that, "as measures designed to maintain White Supremacy," the laws had no legitimate purpose independent of invidious racial discrimination. Citing Skinner, the Court further concluded that the antimiscegenation statute unjustifiably deprived the Lovings of their freedom to marry guaranteed by the due process clause.

Would the current Supreme Court invalidate, as "measures designed to maintain White Supremacy," reproductive regulations that disproportionately penalize minority women's childbearing, or whose popularity hinges on a widespread perception that they have such an effect? Probably not. Present equal protection doctrine requires a stronger showing of discriminatory purpose. Nonetheless, Skinner's warning about the dangers of racist restrictions on procreation and Loving's condemnation of laws that protect racial purity emphasize the constitutional importance of equality in reproductive decisionmaking. Laws that effectively single out black mothers to deter or punish their decision to have children impose a racist government standard for procreation. They function to preserve a racial hierarchy that essentially disregards black humanity. They evoke the specter of racial eugenics, especially in light of the history of sterilization abuse of women of color. Government policies that perpetuate racial subordination through the denial of reproductive rights, thereby threatening both racial equality and SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS should be subject to the most exacting judicial scrutiny.

DOROTHY ROBERTS
(2000)

Bibliography

DAVIS, ANGELA Y. 1983 Women, Race, and Class. New York: Vintage.

DAVIS, PEGGY COOPER 1997 Neglected Stories: The Constitution and Family Values. New York: Hill and Wang.

FRIED, MARLENE GERBER, ed. 1990 From Abortion to Reproductive Freedom: Transforming a Movement. Boston: South End Press.

GORDON, LINDA 1976 Woman's Body, Woman's Right: A Social History of Birth Control in America. New York: Grossman.

ROBERTS, DOROTHY 1997 Killing the Black Body: Race, Reproduction, and the Meaning of Liberty. New York: Pantheon.

RACIAL BALANCE

The idea of racial balance is a product of the DESEGREGATION of public schools in the years since BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954–1955). The term refers to the racial distribution of students in particular schools in relation to the racial distribution of school children in an entire district. If a district's children are seventy percent white and thirty percent black, then a hypothetically perfect balance would produce these same percentages in each school. By extension, the notion of racial balance may be used in discussing other institutions: a housing project, a factory's work force, a state university's medical school. (See AFFIRMATIVE ACTION; RACIAL QUOTAS.)

In the school cases, the Supreme Court has held that racial balance is an appropriate "starting point" for a lower court to use in fashioning a remedy for de jure SEGREGATION. (See DE FACTO/DE JURE; SWANN V. CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BOARD OF EDUCATION.) However, even where segregation has been deliberately caused by school board actions, there is no constitutional requirement of racial balance throughout the district's schools. Although one-race schools are presumptively to be eliminated, the school board will be allowed to prove that the racial distribution in those schools results from something other than the board's deliberate policy. SCHOOL BUSING over very long distances, for example, would not be required under this approach; distance alone would be a racially neutral explanation for the board's failure to remedy racial imbalance.

In the absence of previous legislation commanding or authorizing school segregation, or school board actions with segregative intent, the fact of racial imbalance in a district's schools, standing alone, does not amount to a constitutional violation. However, intentional acts of segregation by the board in the remote past, coupled with current racial imbalance, will place on the board an almost impossible burden of proving that it has dismantled its "dual" (segregated) system. (See COLUMBUS BOARD OF EDUCATION V. PENICK.)

The term racial balance is sometimes used in a different sense. Some discussions of school segregation use the term to describe a school that includes a "critical mass" of students from each race. Social scientists disagree over the educational value to minority students of having a significant number of white students in the classroom. The suggestion that minority students learn better in the company of whites has roots in the Supreme Court's pre-Brown decisions on graduate education. (See SWEATT V. PAINTER.) And where segregation is imposed by official action, Brown itself takes the view that the resulting stigma impairs minority students' ability to learn. But the abstract proposition that minority students cannot learn effectively outside the presence of whites is more than a little patronizing. And the notion of racial balance in this sense is immensely complicated in a multiethnic community: is a school integrated if it contains significant numbers of both white and minority students, or should the category of minority students be broken down into its black, Hispanic, and other components? Merely to ask this question is to understand why the Supreme Court has avoided speaking of racial balance in this latter sense and has used the idea in its mechanical racial-percentages sense only as a "starting point."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

FISS, OWEN M. 1975 The Jurisprudence of Busing. Law and Contemporary Problems 1975:194–216.

RACIAL CLASSIFICATION

See: Benign Racial Classification; Invidious Discrimination; Racial Discrimination; Suspect Classification

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

The nation was founded with the enslavement of blacks as an established and ongoing institution, and though we were not particularly proud of the institution, we were prepared to live with it. The Constitution did not mention the word "slave," and contemplated the eventual closing of the slave trade (referred to simply as the "importation of persons"), but, through similar circumlocutions, also created obligations to return fugitive slaves, and included a proportion of the slaves within the population base to be used for the apportionment of representatives and taxes. In DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) the Supreme Court viewed slaves as property and declared that the right of slaveholders to take their slaves to the territories was protected by the DUE PROCESS CLAUSE of the Fifth Amendment.

The CIVIL WAR brought SLAVERY to an end and reversed the basic commitment of the Constitution toward blacks. The law sought equality rather than enslavement, and it was through the elaboration of this egalitarian commitment that the concept of racial discrimination emerged. Prohibiting racial discrimination became the principal strategy of the American legal system for achieving equality for blacks. The laws against racial discrimination typically protect all racial minorities, not just blacks, and yet, for purely historical reasons, the development of those laws would be unimaginable apart from the struggle of blacks for equality in America. That struggle has been the source both of the achievements of antidiscrimination law and of its recurrent dilemmas.

The three amendments adopted following the CIVIL WAR constitute the groundwork of this branch of the law, although only one—the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT—actually speaks of racial discrimination. It provides that "the right. . . to vote shall not be denied or abridged . . . on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The other Civil War amendments are not cast in terms of racial discrimination. The THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT prohibits slavery and involuntary servitude, and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, in relevant aspect, prohibits states from denying "the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS." But the Supreme Court has interpreted both these amendments to prohibit racial discrimination. With respect to the Thirteenth Amendment, the Court reasoned in JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968) that racial discrimination is a badge or incident of slavery. (See BADGES OF SERVITUDE.) Similarly, in interpreting the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court, as early as STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1880), declared racial discrimination to be the kind of unequal treatment that constitutes a denial of equal protection of the laws. Indeed, over the years, racial discrimination came to be seen as the paradigmatic denial of equal protection, and supplied the standard against which all other equal protection claims came to be measured, even when pressed by nonracial groups such as the poor or women. They too had to show that they were discriminated against on the basis of some impermissible criterion such as their wealth or sex. The promise of equal protection was thus transformed into a promise not to discriminate.

It was, moreover, through the enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment that the prohibition against racial discrimination achieved its greatest prominence. Antidiscrimination was the instrument that finally put to an end the system of white supremacy that emerged in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries and that worked by separating whites and blacks—Jim Crow. The discrimination appeared on the very face of Jim Crow laws and a principle that condemned racial discrimination easily brought those laws within the sweep of the Fourteenth Amendment. All that was needed was an understanding of how the separatism of Jim Crow worked to the disadvantage of blacks; that was the burden of BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) and the cases that followed. As the principle controlling the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment, antidiscrimination was a limitation only upon the actions of states, but once the step entailed in Brown was taken, the federal government was, in BOLLING V. SHARPE (1954), made subject to an identical prohibition by a construction of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. Racial discrimination was deemed as inconsistent with the constitutional guarantee of liberty as it was with equal protection.

Statutes, too, have been concerned with racial equality. In the years immediately following the Civil War, Congress passed a comprehensive program to protect the newly freed slaves, and defined the conduct it sought to prohibit in a variety of ways. In the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 Congress promised that blacks would enjoy the same rights as whites; in the FORCE ACTS (1870, 1871) it guaranteed all citizens the rights and privileges arising from the Constitution or laws of the United States. In the decades following Brown v. Board of Education, however, when the antidiscrimination principle of the Fourteenth Amendment received its most strenuous affirmation and the nation embarked on its Second Reconstruction, Congress cast the substantive standard in terms of a single idiom—do not discriminate. (See CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964; CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1968; VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965.)

During this period, Congress introduced new mechanisms to enforce the equal protection clause; for example, it authorized the attorney general to bring injunctive school desegregation suits, required federal administrative agencies to terminate financial assistance to segregated school systems, and provided for criminal prosecutions against those who forcibly interfered with desegregation. Congress also broadened the reach of federal antidiscrimination law beyond the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment by regulating, in the name of racial equality, activities of private agencies (for example, restaurants, employers, or landlords), which otherwise would not have been covered by that amendment because of its "state action" requirement. In each of these measures, Congress used the language of antidiscrimination. So did the President in promulgating EXECUTIVE ORDER 11246 (1965), which regulates government contractors. Many state legislatures also intervened on behalf of racial equality during the Second Reconstruction, and these enactments were also couched in terms of prohibiting discrimination.

Sometimes Congress and the state legislatures exempted certain discriminatory practices from the laws they enacted. One instance is the federal open housing law, which exempts discrimination by small residences ("Mrs. Murphy's roominghouse"); another is the federal fair employment statute, which exempts from its coverage small businesses (at first businesses with fewer than twenty-five employees, later reduced to fifteen). Apparently Congress viewed the interest in associational liberty present in these settings as sufficiently strong to justify limited exemptions to the ban on racial discrimination. Yet, putting these exemptions and a handful of others to one side, it is fair to say that today, primarily as a result of the Second Reconstruction, the prohibition against racial discrimination is all-encompassing. It has both constitutional and statutory bases and is the subject of an executive order. It is a pervasive feature of both federal and state law and calls forth a broad array of civil and criminal remedies. It almost has the status of a moral imperative, like the norm against theft or killing. The issue that divides Americans today is thus not whether the law should prohibit racial discrimination but what, precisely, doing so entails.

The antidiscrimination norm, as already noted, was largely fashioned at a time when the nation was swept by the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE of Jim Crow and when blacks were disadvantaged in a rather open and crude manner. In such a context, the principle of antidiscrimination invites a color blindness: When allocating a scarce opportunity, such as a job or a place in a professional school, the decision maker should not prefer a white candidate over a black one on the basis of the individual's color or race. Here antidiscrimination requires that individuals be judged independently of race. This much is settled. Interpretive problems arise, however, when the social context changes—when we have moved beyond Jim Crow and blacks have come to be disadvantaged primarily in ways that are hidden and systematically entrenched. Then we confront two issues. One arises from the exclusion of blacks on the basis of a seemingly innocent criterion such as performance on a standardized test; the other from the preference given to blacks to correct for longstanding unequal distributional patterns.

To clarify the first issue, it should be understood that the appearance of innocence might be misleading. Although a black scores higher than a white on a test, the employer might manipulate or falsify the scores so that the white is given the job. In this case, the apparent use of an innocent criterion is simply a mask for racial discrimination. The decision is still directly based on race and would be deemed unlawful. The most straightforward remedy would be to set aside the decision and allow an honest application of the test.

There are, moreover, situations when a test is honestly administered and yet the very decision to use the test in the first place is based on an illegitimate concern, namely, a desire to exclude blacks. A highly sophisticated verbal aptitude test might be used, for example, to select employees for manual work because the employer, wanting to maintain a predominantly white work force, assumes that fewer whites than blacks will be screened out by the test. Here again, the "real" criterion of selection is race; a court would disallow the use of the irrelevant test, and require the employer to choose a criterion that serves a legitimate end. In both of these cases—the dishonest application of legitimate criteria and the honest application of illegitimate criteria—the appearance of color blindness is a sham and a court could use the simple, colorblind form of the antidiscrimination norm to void the results.

The more troublesome variant of the first issue arises when (1) the facially innocent criterion is adopted in order to serve a legitimate interest; (2) the criterion in fact furthers that interest; and (3) the application of the criterion disadvantages the racial minority in much the same way as would the use of race as the criterion of selection. The job may in fact require sophisticated verbal skills and the test that measures these skills may screen out more blacks than whites. The test is job-related but has a disparate adverse impact on blacks. The question then is whether an employment decision based on the test violates the antidiscrimination prohibition. This is a question of considerable difficulty because while the law, strictly speaking, prohibits distinctions based on race, this particular decision is based on a criterion other than race.

One school of thought answers this question in the negative. This view stresses process, and interprets antidiscrimination in terms of the integrity of the selection process: A selection process based on race is corrupt and cannot be allowed. A selection process free of racial influence might redound to the benefit of the racial minority, since it would allow them to compete on equal footing with other groups and thus give them a chance to alter the distributional inequalities that occurred under a regime such as Jim Crow, where they were penalized because of their race. Any actual effect on their material status as a group, however, would represent just an agreeable by-product, or a background assumption, not the purpose of antidiscrimination law. According to this school, the aims of antidiscrimination law are fulfilled when the process of selection is purified of all racial criteria or motivations.

Another viewpoint stresses results or effects, not process; it would find the use of the innocent criterion unlawful even if it serves legitimate ends. What is decisive, according to this school of thought, is the actual disadvantaging of blacks, not the way the disadvantage comes about. If the application of a criterion has a disproportionately adverse impact on the racial minority, in the sense that it excludes substantially more blacks than whites, the criterion should be treated as the functional equivalent of race.

At the heart of this interpretation of antidiscrimination is a concern for the social status of blacks. It is motivated by a desire to end all practices that would tend to perpetuate or aggravate their subordinate position. Admittedly, the costs of this program are real, for it is stipulated that the contested criterion serves some legitimate end; the test is job-related. But these costs are seen as a necessary price of justice. Only when the costs become extraordinarily large or achieve a special level of urgency, as when the criterion serves some "compelling" (and not just a "legitimate") interest, will the use of the criterion be allowed.

The theorist who so emphasizes effects rests his argument principally on the Fourteenth Amendment and ascribes to it the grandest and noblest of purposes—the elimination of caste structure. He insists that antidiscrimination, as the principle that controls the application of that amendment, be construed with this broad purpose in mind and if need be, that a new principle—the group-disadvantaging principle—be articulated in order to make this purpose even more explicit. He also insists that the various statutes that prohibit discrimination—the principal argumentative props of the process school—should be construed derivatively. These statutes, unlike the Fourteenth Amendment, may contain in so many words a specific ban on "discrimination based on race," but, so the effects theorist argues, these statutes should be seen as a legislative adoption of the prevailing constitutional principle. When that principle is interpreted to forbid the use of criteria that effectively disadvantage blacks, the statutes should be interpreted in a similar fashion.

The process school emphasizes not only the precise language in which the statutory norm is cast but also the traditional rule that conditions judicial intervention on a finding that the defendant is at fault. This fault exists when a white is given a job over a black even though the black scored higher on a test; the employer is said to be acting wrongfully because race is unrelated to any legitimate purpose and is a factor over which individuals have no control. But the requisite fault is said to be lacking when the selection is made on the basis of the individual's performance under some nonracial standard, such as a job-related test. On the other hand, those who subscribe to an effects test emphasize the prospective nature of the remedy typically sought in these cases (an injunction to forbid the use of the criterion in the future) and deny the need for a finding of fault. Such a finding may be necessary to justify damages or the criminal sanction, because these remedies require the defendant to pay for what he did in the past, and presumably such a burden can be placed only on someone who acted wrongfully. But an injunction simply directs that the defendant do what is just and does not presuppose that the defendant has acted wrongfully. Alternatively, the effects theorist might contend that if fault is necessary, it can be found in the defendant's willingness to persist in the use of the contested criterion with full knowledge of its consequences for the racial minority. Such persistence connotes a certain moral indifference.

The disadvantaging that the effects test seeks to avoid is usually defined in terms of the status of a group (for example, the criterion has a greater adverse impact on blacks than on whites and thus tends to perpetuate their subordinate position). Some see this group orientation as alien to our jurisprudence, and thus find a further reason for turning away from an effects test. Borrowing the Court's language in SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948), they insist that "[t]he rights created by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment are, by its terms, guaranteed to the individual" and that "[t]he rights established are personal rights." But those who subscribe to the effects test see the well-being of individuals and of groups as inextricably linked: They believe that the status of an individual is determined in large part by the status of the group with which he is identified. Slavery itself was a group phenomenon, and any corrective strategy must be structured in group terms. Effects theorists also point to practices outside the racial context that display a concern for the welfare of groups such as religious minorities, women, the handicapped, labor, and consumers, and for that reason insist that a group orientation is thoroughly compatible with American legal principles.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, the Supreme Court responded to these arguments and moved toward adopting an effects test in cases such as Gaston County v. United States (1969), GRIGGS V. DUKE POWER CO. (1971), and SWANN V. CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BOARD OF EDUCATION (1971). There was, however, an element of ambiguity or hesitation in the Court's response. The Court prohibited the use of seemingly innocent criteria that disadvantaged blacks, even when their use served some legitimate interests, but the Court did not justify its decisions solely in terms of the adverse effects of the criteria. In addition, the Court characterized the adverse effect as a vestige of an earlier use of race. For example, a literacy test was disallowed as a qualification for voting not simply because it disqualified more blacks than whites but also because it perpetuated the disadvantages previously imposed on blacks in segregated schools. This insistence on analyzing the disadvantage as a vestige of past discrimination may have reflected a commitment to the process test insofar as the Court treated the earlier procedural imperfection (the assignment to schools on the basis of race) as the legally cognizable wrong and the present practice (the literacy test) as merely a device that perpetuates that wrong. But at the same time, the concern with past discrimination surely reflected some commitment to the effects test, for it resulted in the invalidation of facially innocent criteria that in fact served legitimate ends. Disallowing today's literacy test would avoid perpetuating yesterday's discrimination in the educational system, but only by compromising an interest the Court had previously deemed legitimate, namely, that of having a literate electorate. In fact, an interpretation of antidiscrimination law to forbid practices that perpetuate past discrimination could become functionally coextensive with an interpretation that makes effects decisive if some global practice such as slavery is taken as the relevant past discrimination, if the victims of past discrimination are identified in group terms, and if the remedial burden is placed on parties who had no direct role in the earlier discrimination. All disparate effects can be seen as a vestige of the special and unfortunate history of blacks in America.

By the mid-1970s, however, it became clear that the Court was not inclined to broaden its concern with past discrimination so as to make it the functional equivalent of the effects test. In fact, the Court turned in the opposite direction—away from effects and toward process. As Justice POTTER STEWART announced, "Reconstruction is over." The Court did not flatly repudiate its earlier decisions, but instead tried to limit them by confining the effects test to those antidiscrimination norms that were embodied in statutes. For constitutional claims of discrimination, the Court in cases such as WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976) and MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980) required a showing that the process was flawed, or more precisely, that the defendant "intended to discriminate." The plaintiff had to show that the defendant's decision was based on race, or that he chose the seemingly innocent criterion not to further legitimate ends but to exclude or disadvantage blacks. The Court continued to honor claims of past discrimination, but by and large insisted that those claims be advanced by individually identifiable victims of the earlier discrimination, that past acts of discrimination be defined with a great deal of specificity, and that the causal links of those acts to the present racially disparate effects be manifest. No global claims of past discrimination have been allowed.

There is a certain irony in this distinction between statutory and constitutional claims, and in the Supreme Court's decision to confine the effects test to the statutory domain, for the statutes are couched in terms less congenial to such a test. The statutes speak specifically in terms of decisions based on race, while the Fourteenth Amendment speaks of equal protection. (Antidiscrimination is but the judicially constructed principle that is to guide the application of that provision.) Arguably, the distinction between statute and Constitution might reflect the Court's desire to find some way of limiting the practical impact of the effects test, for under the Fourteenth Amendment an effects test would have the widest scope and present the greatest possibilities of judicial intervention. The Fourteenth Amendment extends to all state practices and, because of its universality (it protects every "person"), could be used to protect even those groups that are not defined in racial terms. Indeed, in Washington v. Davis the Court expressed the fear that under the effects test the Fourteenth Amendment might even invalidate a sales tax because of its disproportionately adverse impact on the poor (never for a moment pausing to consider whether suitable limiting principles could be developed for avoiding such a result). The Court's distinction between statutory and constitutional claims might also stem from a desire to devise a means for sharing with other political institutions responsibility for the sacrifice of legitimate interests entailed in the application of an effects test. When attached to the statute, the effects test and its disruptive impact become the responsibility of both Court and Congress, since Congress remains free to repeal the statute or otherwise disavow the test.

In the mid-1970s, at the very moment the Court was struggling to identify the circumstances in which the use of a seemingly innocent criterion could be deemed a form of racial discrimination and was moving away from an effects test, it also had to confront the other major interpretive issue posed by antidiscrimination law, the issue of AFFIRMATIVE ACTION. The Court had to decide whether the norm against racial discrimination prohibits giving preference to blacks.

For much of our history, it was assumed that race-based action would be hostile to blacks and that therefore colorblindness would work to the advantage of blacks or at least shield them from hostile action. During the Second Reconstruction, however, as the drive for racial equality grew stronger, an assertedly "benign" use of race became more common. Many believed that even the honest application of legitimate criteria would not significantly alter the unequal distributional patterns that were produced among the races first under slavery and then under Jim Crow, and that it would be necessary, at least for the immediate or foreseeable future, to give blacks a preference in order to improve their status relative to other groups.

These affirmative action programs typically included other minorities, such as Hispanics, as beneficiaries, but were primarily seen as addressed to blacks and did not extend to all disadvantaged groups, such as the poor or white ethnic minorities. They had a distinctive racial cast and were sometimes described as a form of "reverse discrimination." These programs were also typically structured so as to require the decision maker to achieve a certain number of blacks or other minorities within the institution, say, as employees or students. Often that number equaled the percentage of blacks or other minorities in the general population, and was variously described as a goal or quota, depending on which side of the issue one was on. A "goal" was said to establish the minimum rather than the maximum and to be more flexible than a "quota." But more significantly, the term "goal" did not have the odious connotations of the term "quota," which had been used in the past to describe numerical limits on the admission of minorities, limits that were designed to preserve rather than eradicate the caste structure.

For the most part, these affirmative action programs were not treated as a constitutional or statutory requirement. Some of those who subscribed to an effects test argued that the failure to institute preferential programs would constitute a practice that perpetuated the subordinate position of blacks and thus would be itself a form of racial discrimination. But this argument equated inaction with action, and either for that reason or because the effects test was having difficulties of its own, this argument never established a toehold in the law. Equally unsuccessful were the arguments that emphasized those antidiscrimination laws, such as the federal fair employment statute or the executive order governing government contractors, that not only prohibited discrimination but also commanded in so many terms "affirmative action"; the inclusion of these two words were deemed insufficient to alter or add to the basic obligations of the law. The issue posed by affirmative action programs was therefore one of permissibility, rather than obligation: Were these programs consistent with the prohibition against racial discrimination?

Sometimes the purported beneficiaries of the programs (or people speaking on their behalf ) objected to them on the theory that the use of race was not wholly benign. Affirmative action was premised on the view that the racial minorities would not fare well under a colorblind policy, thus implying that these minorities are not as well equipped as whites to compete under traditional meritocratic criteria. They are being told, as they were under Jim Crow, that they are inferior—nothing "reverse" about this distinction. This complaint forced those who ran affirmative action programs to be secretive or discreet about what they were doing, but it did not bring those programs to an end or even present an especially formidable obstacle. The proponents of affirmative action explained that the race-based preference was premised on an assessment of the group's history in America, on the wrongs it suffered, not on a belief about innate ability, and as such could not justifiably be seen as giving rise to a slight. The use of race is benign, they insisted, because it improves the status of blacks and other racial minorities by giving them positions, jobs, or other concrete material advantages that they otherwise would not enjoy, at least not in the foreseeable future.

Affirmative action programs have also been attacked by whites, especially when there are discernible differences in the applicants under standard nonracial criteria and when scarce goods, such as highly desired jobs or places in professional schools, are being allocated. In such circumstances favoring a black because of his race necessarily means disfavoring a white because of his race; a job given to one is necessarily denied another. The rejected white applicant cannot truly claim that he is stigmatized even in these circumstances; no one is suggesting he is inferior. His exclusion comes as the by-product or consequence of a program founded on other principles—not to hurt him or the members of his group, but to help the disadvantaged. On the other hand, the rejected white applicant does not rest his complaint solely on the fortuity of the general, racially unspecific language of the antidiscrimination norm, the fact that discrimination based on any race is prohibited. The white applicant can also claim that he is being treated unfairly, since he is being judged on the basis of a criterion over which he has no control and which is unrelated to any conception of merit. The rejected white applicant might not be stigmatized, but he can insist that he is being treated unfairly.

This claim of individual unfairness finds support in the process theory of antidiscrimination: If the purpose of antidiscrimination law is to preserve the integrity of a process, to insure that individuals are treated fairly and to prevent them from being judged on the basis of irrelevant criteria, then it would not seem to matter whether the color used in the process were white or black. In either instance, the selection process would be unfair. The program may be well-intentioned, but the intention is of little solace to the rejected white applicants who, as Justice LEWIS F. POWELL put it, are being forced "to bear the burdens of redressing grievances not of their making."

Some of the proponents of affirmative action deny that there is any unfairness to the rejected white applicant. They argue that the claim of unfairness presupposes a special moral status for certain nonracial or meritocratic standards of evaluation, such as grades or performance on a standardized test, and that the requisite moral status is in fact lacking. The white has no "right" to be judged on the meritocratic standard. The more widely shared view among the proponents of affirmative action, however, acknowledges the unfairness caused to individual whites by the preference for blacks but treats it as a necessary, yet regrettable cost of eliminating caste structure. As Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN put it, "In order to get beyond race, we must first take account of race. There is no other way." Those who take this position, like those who support an effects test, argue that the purpose of antidiscrimination law is to guard against those practices that would perpetuate or aggravate the subordinate position of blacks and other racial minorities and that it would be a perversion of history now to use that law to stop programs designed to improve the status of these groups.

The Supreme Court confronted the issue of affirmative action and weighed these arguments in two different settings. In one, affirmative action was undertaken at the behest of a court order. The theory underlying such orders is not that affirmative action is directly required by an antidiscrimination statute or by the Constitution but rather that it is needed to remedy a pattern or practice of discrimination. Affirmative action is part of the court's corrective plan. A court might, for example, require a company to grant a preference in the seniority system to blacks who were previously excluded from the company and thus unable to earn seniority rights equal to those of whites. The Supreme Court has accepted such remedial uses of race, although it has insisted that this kind of preference be limited to identifiable victims of past discrimination and that some regard be given to the interests of the innocent whites who might be adversely affected by the preferences. For example, blacks might be preferred for vacancies, but will not necessarily be allowed to force the layoff of whites.

The second setting consists of the so-called voluntary affirmative action programs, which are adopted not under orders from a court but out of a sense of moral duty or a belief that the eradication of caste structure is a desirable social policy. These voluntary affirmative action programs have proved more troublesome than the remedial ones, in part because they are not limited to individually identifiable victims of past discriminations (they are truly group oriented), but also because they are not preceded by a judicial finding that the institution has previously discriminated and they are not carried out under the close supervision of a court. The Supreme Court approved these affirmative action programs, but its approval has not been a blanket one. By the mid-1980s, it was established that under certain circumstances color consciousness is permissible, but the Court has been divided in its effort to define or limit these circumstances.

These divisions have been especially pronounced when the voluntary programs were used in higher education. In the first case, DEFUNIS V. ODEGAARD (1974), involving admissions to a state law school, the Court heard arguments and then dismissed the case on grounds of MOOTNESS because the rejected white applicant had graduated by the time the Court came to decide the case—a disposition that underscored the difficulty of the issue and the internal divisions on the Court. A few years later, the Court took up the issue again, in REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), this time at the insistence of a rejected white applicant to a state medical school. In this case the Court reached the merits, but the divisions were even more apparent. No single opinion commanded a majority.

Four Justices thought the preferential program in Bakke unlawful. They stressed an antidiscrimination statute, which prohibited, in so many terms, discrimination based on race. These Justices reasoned that a preference for blacks is as much a discrimination based on race as one for whites. No discrimination means no discrimination. Another Justice thought preferential programs could be justified as a means of diversifying the student body, but he objected to the manner in which the particular program before the Court had been implemented. He would allow race to be considered in the admissions process, but would not permit separate tracks for applicants according to race. The remaining four Justices joined in an opinion that would sustain the program as it was in fact implemented, but two of these Justices also wrote separate opinions.

These deep-seated divisions did not resolve themselves substantially in the years following Bakke. One voluntary program received a slightly more resolute acceptance by the Court, however, in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980). This program was established by Congress and required a preference for minority-owned businesses in awarding contracts for federally funded public works projects. Although, once again, no single opinion commanded a majority of the Court, the vote of the Justices shifted from 1–4–4 to 6–3, and Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, who had objected (without qualification) to the preferential program in Bakke, voted to uphold this one. He also wrote one of three opinions that supported the constitutionality of the program. The Chief Justice studiously avoided choosing among "the formulas of analysis" articulated in Bakke; that is, he refused to say whether the affirmative action program had to meet the "compelling" interest standard or whether it was sufficient if the corrective ends of the program were deemed "important" or just "legitimate" and the means substantially related to those ends. He simply said, whatever the standard, this program meets it. He did, however, specifically and repeatedly mention one factor that might be the key to the change in his position and the Court's attitude in general: "Here we pass, not on a choice made by a single judge or a school board, but on a considered decision of the Congress and the President."

With this emphasis on the role played by the coordinate branches of government in the affirmative action program, the Chief Justice returned to an idea that emerged in the analysis of the Court's treatment of facially innocent criteria, and that might well explain the Court's determination to confine the effects test to statutes: The Court is more prepared to accept the costs and dislocations that are entailed in the eradication of caste structure when it can share the responsibility for this project with the other branches of government. The Court does not want to go it alone. This suggests that the fate of equality will depend not only on the substantive commitments of the Justices, on their determination to bring the subordination of blacks and other racial minorities to an end, but also on their views about the role of the Court. The content of antidiscrimination law will in good measure depend on the willingness of the Justices to use their power to lead the nation, or if that impulse is lacking, on the willingness of the other branches of government to participate aggressively in the reconstruction of a society disfigured by one century of slavery and another of Jim Crow.

OWEN M. FISS
(1986)

Bibliography

BELL, DERRICK 1980 Race, Racism and American Law. Boston: Little, Brown.

BREST, PAUL 1976 In Defense of the Antidiscrimination Principle. Harvard Law Review 90:1–54.

COHEN, MARSHALL; NAGEL, THOMAS; and SCANLON, THOMAS 1977 Equality and Preferential Treatment. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1981 Civil Rights Legislation. Charlottesville, Va.: Michie Co.

FISHKIN, JAMES 1983 Justice, Equal Opportunity and the Family. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

FISS, OWEN 1971 A Theory of Fair Employment Laws. University of Chicago Law Review 38:235–314.

——— 1976 Groups and the Equal Protection Clause. Philosophy and Public Affairs 5:107–177.

FREEMAN, ALAN 1978 Legitimizing Racial Discrimination through Antidiscrimination Law: A Critical Review of Supreme Court Doctrine. Minnesota Law Review 62:1049–1119.

GARET, RONALD 1983 Communality and Existence: The Rights of Groups. Southern California Law Review 56:1001–1075.

GUNTHER, GERALD 1972 In Search of Evolving Doctrine on a Changing Court: A Model for Newer Equal Protection. Harvard Law Review 86:1–48.

KARST, KENNETH and HOROWITZ, HAROLD 1974 Affirmative Action and Equal Protection. Virginia Law Review 60:955–974.

RAE, DOUGLAS 1981 Equalities. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

TUSSMAN, JOSEPH and TEN BROEK, JACOBUS 1949 The Equal Protection of the Laws. California Law Review 37:341–381.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
(Update 1)

In the mid-1980s, most observers would have said that the Supreme Court's view of racial discrimination was in equipoise. Some of the Justices seemed sympathetic to the aggressive purposeful use of racial criteria to end the legacy of racial subordination; others were skeptical of "benign discrimination" and looked instead to a constitutional principle of colorblindness as the cornerstone of a society free of discrimination. The last several terms have made plain the ascendancy of the latter view. It is now evident that a majority of the Justices are prepared to view with suspicion and hold to the highest standard of constitutional scrutiny governmental efforts to use racial classifications even to assist members of racial minorities. At the same time, governmental actions that disadvantage racial minorities will be sustained absent clear and unambiguous evidence of impermissible racial animus.

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION advocates are particularly concerned about the Court's recent willingness to view benign racial classifications with the same suspicion with which it has traditionally treated classifications intended to oppress. Where this leaves racially conscious programs is unclear, except that as before the stronger the showing that a RACIAL PREFERENCE is related to a bona fide remedial goal, the greater the likelihood the Court will sustain it.

Thus in WYGANT V. JACKSON BOARD OF EDUCATION (1986), the Justices overturned a plan under which a school board extended to minority teachers what a plurality of the Court called "preferential protection against layoffs." The plan was part of the collective-bargaining agreement between the board and the union representing school teachers and was defended before the Court as an effort to alleviate "social discrimination" by providing a diverse set of role models in public schoolrooms. A three-Justice plurality declared that the proper test was STRICT SCRUTINY and held the plan invalid because more specific findings of prior discrimination were necessary before the layoff protection could be said to serve a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST.

In contrast, in UNITED STATES V. PARADISE (1987), the Justices voted 5–4 to sustain a federal district court's imposition of a "one-for-one" hiring plan, pursuant to which the Alabama Department of Public Safety was obliged to remedy its past failure to hire black troopers by hiring one black trooper for each white trooper hired. The SOLICITOR GENERAL argued that even when a racially conscious remedial program was ordered by a court, strict scrutiny was the proper test, and the program could survive only on a showing of a compelling state interest. Four Justices, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, refused to decide this question, ruling that the program could meet any level of scrutiny because it was "justified by a compelling interest in remedying the discrimination that permeated entry-level practices and the promotional process alike." The plurality further noted that the district court had imposed the one-for-one plan only after the department had repeatedly failed to comply with earlier decrees.

Probably the most controversial benign discrimination decision—and the one with the most far-reaching implications—was RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989), in which the Justices struck down a program under which the City of Richmond required its prime contractors to subcontract thirty percent of the dollar amount of each contract to minority-owned firms. In Croson, a majority of the Justices ruled explicitly that strict scrutiny was the proper level of review for benign discrimination cases. Although there was no majority opinion on the point, six Justices repudiated as insufficiently narrow the city council's defense that the program was needed to eliminate the effects of societal discrimination.

Although it is true that the Justices have always taken the position that even benign classifications are subject to the highest level of constitutional scrutiny, they have not previously applied the rule with quite the strictness used in Croson. Indeed, FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980), which sustained a federally mandated set-aside program for certain construction projects, is in one sense indistinguishable: in Fullilove and in Croson, the relevant body (in the first case the Congress, in the other the city council) had before it no record of past discrimination. This aspect of Fullilove can be preserved by reference to the special fact-finding competence of the Congress, although this reed is a thin one because the Congress found no facts; in any case, the Justices are noticeably less hospitable to Fullilove-style set-asides by state or local governments than they were to Congress's set-asides a decade ago. But at least six Justices seem prepared to pay strong deference to the power of Congress to adopt programs of affirmative action in enforcing the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

At the same time, the Court has arguably shown increasing sensitivity to certain claims of racial discrimination in the CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM. Thus in Hunter v. Underwood (1985), a unanimous Court struck down a neutrally applied disenfranchisement of persons convicted of misdemeanors involving "moral turpitude" on the ground that it was originally enacted decades earlier for the purpose of discriminating against black citizens. The following term, in BATSON V. KENTUCKY (1986), the Justices eased the burden of a defendant seeking to prove that the prosecution had used its peremptory challenges to exclude jurors on the basis of race. On the same day, the Justices decided in Turner v. Murray that a defendant in a capital case has the right to examine prospective jurors about racial bias.

But the trend has gone only so far. In the following term, the Justices made plain their resistance to inferring impermissible discriminatory motivation from circumstantial evidence, especially statistical evidence. In MCCLESKEY V. KEMP (1987), a black convicted of murder argued that Georgia's decision to sentence him to death violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments because statistics demonstrated that black defendants, especially black defendants whose victims were white, were far more likely than white defendants to receive CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. The statistics (generally referred to as the Baldus study, after the principal author of the underlying work) were stark indeed; they indicated, among other disparities, that capital juries in Georgia handed down death sentences to black defendants whose victims were white twenty-two times more frequently than they did to black defendants whose victims were black.

The McCleskey majority, however, was unimpressed, responding tersely, "We refuse to assume that what is unexplained is invidious." This answer in a sense eluded McCleskey's point, which was that the disparity was great enough to place the burden of explanation on the state. The Court replied that other explanations were plausible, adding that juror discretion should not be condemned or disturbed simply because of an "inherent lack of predictability." As long as forbidden racial animus was not the only possible explanation, the Court would not assume that animus was at work.

As the dissenters pointed out, the result in McCleskey seemed to stand as a departure from the BURGER COURT decision in Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp. (1977). In Arlington Heights, the Justices suggested that racial animus might be inferred from "a clear pattern" of official behavior, "unexplainable on grounds other than race." The McCleskey majority was correct that other explanations for the Baldus data are conceivable, and some critics have offered them. But in McCleskey, the Justices declined even to speculate.

Nevertheless, in important respects, McCleskey differed from other racial-discrimination cases. First, as several observers have noted, the Baldus study most strongly supports an argument that the murderers of black people are systematically treated with greater leniency than the murderers of white people. If one believes that the death penalty deters the crime of murder, then the implication is that the state is doing less to protect the lives of black people than to protect the lives of white people. Warren McCleskey, convicted of killing a police officer while committing another felony, was not a particularly attractive candidate to raise this issue. The better case (unfortunately for the Supreme Court's paradoxical ruling in Linda R.S. v. Richard D., which denied standing to raise a claim that the law is inadequately enforced) would be one brought by law-abiding black citizens seeking to protect their lives and property.

A second distinction between McCleskey and other cases is that, had it gone the other way, McCleskey might have opened up a Pandora's box of claims that blacks in the criminal process—from arrests to sentencing—are treated more harshly than whites, claims that are supported by considerable empirical literature. Even if the literature is accurate (again, there are critics), it is difficult to imagine what practical relief might be fashioned in such cases. For those who are convicted, mandatory resentencing is one possibility, although the continued judicial monitoring of sentencing disparities could produce a procedural nightmare. The fear that this slippery slope lay ahead might well have been a part of the majority's calculus.

The Justices have also worked important changes in the interpretation of one of the keystones of the "Second Reconstruction," Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. In Ward's Cove v. Antonio (1989), the Justices reexamined the burden of proof of a plaintiff relying on the Court's decision in GRIGGS V. DUKE POWER CO. (1971). Griggs had read Title VII to prohibit an employment practice with racially identifiable disparate impacts unless the employer was able to show a business necessity for the test. In Ward's Cove, the Court ruled 5–4 that the plaintiff must carry the burden of demonstrating the causal link to the composition of the market of people qualified to do the job in question. Critics of Ward's Cove argued that the decision had shifted the burden from the employer to the employees and would make employment-discrimination cases more difficult to prove; defenders responded that Title VII plaintiffs should be required to prove all elements of their claims.

Depending on one's point of view, then, the recent work of the Supreme Court in the area of racial-discrimination law has represented either a tragic abandonment of the judiciary's traditional role as protector of the racially oppressed or a return to the shining principles of color-blindness as the fundamental rule for government action. But not all significant changes in the area of racial discrimination require judicial action. In fact, one of the most important developments of recent years involved an attempted legislative correction of a judicial wrong. The WORLD WAR II decisions sustaining the internment of Japanese Americans are widely regarded as among the most horrific judicial decisions of the twentieth century (although it must be said that the programs could never have been approved had the President and Congress not imposed them in the first place). In the mid-1980s, federal courts vacated the convictions of Gordon Hirabayashi, Minoru Yasui, and Fred Korematsu for evading registration for internment. A DAMAGES claim by former detainees was rejected by the Federal Circuit in 1988 on statute of limitations grounds, but in August of that year, the Congress adopted legislation apologizing for the internment program and granting to each surviving internee compensation of roughly $20,000—not perhaps the same as justice, but at least an acknowledgment that justice was due.

STEPHEN L. CARTER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Constitutional Remedies; Capital Punishment and Race; Japanese American Cases; Race-Consciousness; Sentencing.)

Bibliography

AREEN, JUDITH et al. 1989 Constitutional Scholars' Statement on Affirmative Action After City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co. Yale Law Journal 98:1711–1716.

FRIED, CHARLES 1989 Affirmative Action After City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co.: A Response to the Scholars' Statement. Yale Law Journal 99:155–161.

KENNEDY, RANDALL L. 1988 McCleskey v. Kemp: Race, Capital Punishment, and the Supreme Court. Harvard Law Review 101:1388–1443.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
(Update 2)

Supreme Court decisions at the end of the 1980s heralded the ascendancy of colorblind constitutionalism. Decisions in the 1990s confirmed the preeminence of that vision.

In SHAW V. RENO (1993), the Court ruled in favor of a FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT challenge to North Carolina's enactment of a majority-black ELECTORAL DISTRICT, created pursuant to an agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice under the terms of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980) requires that one show both an intent to discriminate and discriminatory effect to prevail on an EQUAL PROTECTION challenge to electoral districting. The challengers of the North Carolina plan, which resulted in the election of the first African American member of Congress from that state since RECONSTRUCTION, alleged neither, claiming instead a violation of their right to "participate in a 'color-blind' electoral process." Despite the novelty of this claim, the Court held that they had stated an adequate claim for relief. Focusing on the "extreme irregularity" in the shape of the district, Shaw suggested that the districting legislation "was unexplainable on grounds other than race," and so, prohibited under the Fourteenth Amendment absent a showing of a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST. Shaw worked a substantial revision of equal protection doctrine in this area, although it did so on the highly context-specific basis of district shape.

Shaw says less about the majority's general concern for quashing racial discrimination than about its concern that government not consider race in efforts to remedy past discrimination. Consider ADARAND CONSTRUCTORS, INC. V. PEÑA (1995). At issue was the STANDARD OF REVIEW to apply when the federal government relies on a racial classification in an AFFIRMATIVE ACTION program: the STRICT SCRUTINY necessary where the government harms a racial group; or, in recognition of the benign purpose of the classification, a less onerous intermediate standard. Because strict scrutiny is nearly always fatal to the law under review, the answer to this question goes directly to the viability of government-sponsored affirmative action programs. A plurality in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980) upheld a federal program similar to the one at issue in Adarand along lines approximating an intermediate standard of review. The Court in RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989), however, ruled that where a municipality attempted a similar program, it would have to meet the higher level of justification. Croson distinguished the reach of the federal government in the area of race relations, stressing the power to remedy racism vested in Congress by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, SECTION 5. Only the federal government would be allowed leeway in designing race-based remedies; other governmental actors would be held to a stricter standard regardless of whether they sought to harm or help minorities. Relying on Fullilove and Croson, the Court in METRO BROADCASTING, INC. V. FCC (1990) used an intermediate standard to uphold a federal affirmative action program. Nevertheless, Adarand sidestepped Fullilove and OVERRULED Metro Broadcasting, imposing a heightened level of justification on the federal government. Congress, like the states, now faces strict scrutiny in relying on racial classifications, irrespective of whether for harmful or remedial purposes. (Note, though, that Adarand held off on whether strict scrutiny means the same thing for Congress as for others, leaving open the future possibility of relatively more though still limited deference to the former.)

The MAJORITY OPINIONS in Croson, Shaw, and Adarand, all by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, stop just short of announcing that government may never rely on race in the effort to remedy social inequality. Meanwhile, Justices ANTONIN SCALIA and CLARENCE THOMAS strongly urge the Court to move to full colorblindness. In his concurrence in Adarand, Scalia suggests that "government can never have a 'compelling interest' in discriminating on the basis of race in order to 'make up' for past racial discrimination in the opposite direction." Thomas expounds "a 'moral and constitutional equivalence' between laws designed to subjugate a race and those that distribute benefits on the basis of race in order to foster some current notion of equality." Whether the Court will complete or retreat from its attack on affirmative action remains to be seen. For now, however, the Court seems far more concerned with limiting race discrimination of the remedial than of the invidious sort. In this context, one cannot help but recall Charles L. Black, Jr.'s injunction, in responding to criticism of BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), that we laugh when confronted with the argument that SEGREGATION amounted to "equal treatment." Such laughter might be appropriate here, too, in response to the suggestion that affirmative action and Jim Crow be morally and legally equated, were it not for the fact that it is a majority of Supreme Court Justices who insist on the equation.

IAN F. HANEY LÓPEZ
(2000)

Bibliography

FREEMAN, ALAN 1978 Legitimizing Racial Discrimination Through Antidiscrimination Law: A Critical Review of Supreme Court Doctrine. Minnestota Law Review 62:1049–1119.

GOTANDA, NEIL 1991 A Critique of "Our Constitution is Colorblind." Stanford Law Review 44:1–68.

SYMPOSIUM 1996 Race-Based Remedy. California Law Review 84:875–1232.

RACIAL PREFERENCE

Debate about racial-preference policies stirs particularly strong passions because it evokes one of the central animating concerns of liberal constitutionalism—its opposition to any system of hereditary castes. But there is little agreement today about what the constitutional principle of equality actually requires.

Some version of racial equality has always been insisted on, at least since the ratification of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Even in the 1890s, when the Supreme Court acquiesced to racial SEGREGATION in the South, it insisted that the separation of the races should not be understood to "imply the inferiority of either race" or be taken as a sign of governmental preference for one race over another. At the same time, however, the Court observed in PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) that "in the nature of things," the Fourteenth Amendment "could not have been intended to . . . enforce social as distinguished from political equality. . . ." The Court treated racial bias and inequality among private citizens as equivalent to class antagonisms between rich and poor or to sectarian tensions between rival religious faiths—facts of life that a constitutional government could not expect to suppress.

For a brief period following the modern Supreme Court's ruling against school separation in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), there seemed to be an emerging consensus that equality would, after all, be best served by dismantling all racial distinctions in public law. Thus, the historic CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 prohibited, in general terms, "discrimination on the basis of race," rather than discrimination against blacks or other racial minorities in particular. But, among other things, the 1964 legislation sought for the first time to prohibit EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION throughout the American economy. Was this done to enforce a new ideal of social indifference to race or to improve the economic condition of depressed minorities?

Legislative history might be cited to support either view, but the latter view largely prevailed in federal enforcement policy. By the early 1970s, federal officials had come to define RACIAL DISCRIMINATION as any employment standard that disproportionately excluded minority applicants, regardless of the employer's intent; in this and other ways, government policy, with approval from the courts, pressed employers to redefine their hiring and promotion policies to secure "appropriate" percentages of employees from specified minority groups, even if this required passing over better-qualified whites. (See, for example, GRIGGS V. DUKE POWER (1971) and UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA V. WEBER (1979).) With federal encouragement, state programs also offered preferences to minority students in admissions to professional schools (REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE, 1978); other programs began to offer preferences to minority businessmen, as, for example, to minority-owned firms bidding for federal construction grants (FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK, 1980).

Court decisions upholding such practices generally invoked the need to "remedy" past discrimination, implying that localized preferences were acceptable only as temporary correctives to offset the effects of particular past abuses. In 1990, however, a five-Justice majority of the Supreme Court upheld a minority-preference policy in the award of broadcast licenses by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). Noting the small number of minority-owned stations, the Court, in METRO BROADCASTING, INC. V. FCC (1990), endorsed an explicit preference policy as a permissible device for ensuring broadcasting "diversity," disclaiming any need to consider whether there had actually been a history of past discrimination in this particular field.

Critics of such preference policies—including dissenting Justices—have protested that they violate the spirit of constitutional guarantees and the letter of the CIVIL RIGHTS laws by prescribing different standards for whites and minorities. Worse, the critics argue, such policies treat minority individuals, not as actual individuals with their own personal merits, but as mere representatives of their racial groups. Defenders of preferential policies insist that civil-rights legislation and constitutional guarantees have been established to help minorities overcome the effects of discrimination and that such help should not be denied for the sake of an entirely abstract and unrealistic doctrine of equal treatment. They argue that guarantees of equality or nondiscrimination should be seen as bulwarks against policies that "stigmatize" or "subjugate" people because of their race, and no AFFIRMATIVE ACTION program, they say, can seriously be regarded as "stigmatizing" or "subjugating" whites as a whole. The critics of preference policies respond that, insofar as preference policies assume that whites would still exclude others without such mandatory preferences, the policies do stigmatize whites—as racist; insofar as preference policies assume that blacks and other minorities could not compete in American society without such governmental preferences, they stigmatize minorities as incapable.

Not surprisingly, critics of preference policies, emphasizing the potential for manipulation and abuse in governmental controls, would place more reliance on the working of private-market decision making; those who defend preference policies tend to take a much more sanguine view of governmental intervention and to regard racially unequal outcomes in the market as inherently suspect. But the debate about racial preference is not simply a special case of a larger argument about the proper scope of government. Neither liberals nor conservatives on the Supreme Court would be likely, for example, to tolerate a policy that sought to enhance broadcasting "diversity" by providing preference to non-Jewish or non-Protestant firms in the award of broadcasting licenses by the FCC.

In fact, the Court has repeatedly struck down governmental financial aid to religious schools, even though such programs might well be seen as efforts to equalize educational opportunity for religious minorities. Such programs, the Court insisted in LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1973), carry too much potential for political divisiveness, setting religious school constituencies against public school constituencies. Yet many of the same Justices and commentators who have most insistently opposed such aid to religious minorities have been quite sympathetic to government preference policies based on race. The difference is not plausibly explained on the grounds that religion is more divisive than race in contemporary American society. If anything, it seems to be the severity of racial divisions in American society that makes proponents of racial-preference policies regard them as necessary.

Recent studies suggest that despite two decades of racial preference policies the gap between whites and blacks in earnings and in educational attainments is scarcely diminished since the 1960s and in some areas is greater than it was. Some critics of racial preference see this as an additional reason for abandoning such programs. Many supporters of these programs regard this fact instead as an additional reason for redoubling the scale and intensity of preference. This may prove an area of constitutional dispute that is too large to be solved by mere judicial pronouncements.

JEREMY RABKIN
(1992)

Bibliography

ABRAM, MORRIS B. 1986 Affirmative Action: Fair Shakers and Social Engineers. Harvard Law Review 99:1312–1326.

STRAUSS, DAVID A. 1986 The Myth of Colorblindness. Supreme Court Review 1986:99–134.

RACIAL QUOTAS

Programs of AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, aimed at increasing opportunities for women and members of racial and ethnic minorities in employment and higher education, have sometimes taken the form of numerical quotas. In REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978) sixteen places in a state university medical school's entering class were reserved for minority applicants; in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980) ten percent of funds in a federal public works program were reserved for minority-owned businesses. Such quotas have been challenged as denials of the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS, with mixed doctrinal results.

Opponents of racial quotas maintain that it is offensive to penalize or reward people on the basis of race—in short, that the Constitution is, or ought to be, colorblind. Opponents discern in quotas a subtle but pervasive racism, in the patronizing assumption that persons of particular colors or ethnic backgrounds cannot be expected to meet the standards that apply to others. This assumption, the opponents argue, is, in its own way, a BADGE OF SERVITUDE, stigmatizing the quotas' supposed beneficiaries. Some opponents see quotas as part of a general trend toward dehumanization, robbing individuals of both personal identity and human dignity, lumping them together in a collectivity based on other people's assumptions about racially defined traits.

Unfortunately for today's America, race has never been a neutral fact in this country. Those who defend affirmative action generally admit to some uneasiness about the potential abuse of racial distinctions. They argue, however, that there is no real neutrality in a system that first imposes on a racial group harsh disadvantages, readily transmitted through the generations, and then tells today's inheritors of disadvantages that from now on the rules prohibit playing favorites. If either compensation for past RACIAL DISCRIMINATION or the integration of American institutions is a legitimate social objective, the proponents argue, a government in pursuit of those objectives can hardly avoid taking race into account.

The recent attack on racial quotas draws fuel from an emotional reservoir filled two generations ago by universities that limited admission of racial and religious minorities—most notably Jews—to specified small quotas. This ugly form of discrimination was part of a systematic stigmatization and subordination of minority groups by the dominant majority. The recent quotas are designed to remedy the effects of past discrimination, and—when they serve the objective of compensation or integration—are not stigmatizing. They do, however, use race or ethnic status as a means of classifying persons, and thus come under fire for emphasizing group membership rather than "individual merit."

The right to equal protection is, indeed, an individual right. Yet the term "individual merit" misleads in two ways. The word "individual" misleads by obscuring the fact that every claim to equality is a claim made on behalf of the group of persons identified by some set of characteristics: race, for example, or high college grades and test scores. To argue against a racial preference is not to support individual merit as against a group claim, but to argue that some other group, defined by other attributes, is entitled to preference.

"Merit" misleads by conveying the idea of something wholly intrinsic to an individual, apart from some definition of community needs or purposes. When we reward achievement, we are not merely rewarding effort, but are also giving out prizes for native talents and environmental advantages. Mainly, we reward achievement because society wants the goods produced by the combination of talents, environment, and effort. But it is also reasonable to look to past harms and potential contributions to society in defining the characteristics that deserve reward. We admit college achievers to law schools not to reward winners but to serve society with good lawyers. If it be legitimate to seek to end a system of racial caste by integrating American society, nothing in the idea of individual merit stands in the way of treating race as one aspect of "merit."

Race-conscious remedies for past governmental discrimination were approved in decisions as early as SWANN V. CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BOARD OF EDUCATION (1971). Affirmative action quotas pose another question: can government itself employ race-conscious remedies for the effects of past societal discrimination? In Fullilove, six Justices agreed on an affirmative answer to that question, at least when Congress prescribes the remedy. Bakke was complicated by a statutory claim; its result—and its practical effect in professional school admissions—was a distinction between racial or ethnic quotas, which are unlawful, and the use of racial or ethnic status as "one factor" in admission, which is lawful.

The distinction was a political success; it drew the fangs from a controversy that had turned venomous. But the distinction between a quota and a racial factor is more symbol than substance. If race is a factor, it will decide some cases. How many cases? The weight assigned to race surely will be determined by reference to the approximate number of minority admittees necessary to achieve the admitting university's goals of educational "diversity." The difference between saying "sixteen out of a hundred" and "around sixteen percent" is an exercise in constitutional cosmetics—but it seems to have saved affirmative action during a critical season.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

KARST, KENNETH L. and HOROWITZ, HAROLD W. 1974 Affirmative Action and Equal Protection. Virginia Law Review 60:955–974.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM W. 1979 Rites of Passage: Race, the Supreme Court, and the Constitution. University of Chicago Law Review 46:775–810.

RACKETEER INFLUENCED AND CORRUPT ORGANIZATIONS ACT

The Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) was enacted by Congress in 1970 to provide federal prosecutors with a powerful tool against organized crime. RICO has been used against the ruling commission of the Mafia in New York City, against corrupt politicians running local government agencies, against Croatian terrorists, against political demonstrators, against the Sicilian Mafia for importing billions of dollars of heroin into the United States in the pizza connection case (the longest criminal trial in federal history), in the largest criminal tax-fraud prosecution in history, and against massive insider-trading securities fraud.

RICO is a complex statute that creates both criminal sanctions and civil remedies, enforceable by the government or by injured private parties. The heart of the statute defines four crimes. First, it is illegal to establish, operate, or acquire an interest in any enterprise affecting either INTERSTATE COMMERCE or FOREIGN COMMERCE with income from a pattern of racketeering activity or collection of an unlawful debt. Second, the act prohibits acquiring or maintaining an interest in any such enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity or collection of an unlawful debt. Third, it is a crime for any employee or associate of any such enterprise to participate in the enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity or collection of an unlawful debt. And fourth, it is illegal to conspire to violate any of the first three provisions. A "pattern" of racketeering requires the commission of two or more "predicate offenses" within a ten-year period. These offenses include nine categories of state crimes and twenty-six federal crimes, including murder; drug trafficking; bribery; and mail, wire, and securities fraud. As discussed in United States v. Turkette (1981), an "enterprise" includes any individual, partnership, corporation, association, union, or group of individuals associated in fact, whether legitimate or illegitimate. Conviction under RICO carries severe criminal penalties and forfeiture of ill-gotten gains. A person may be liable for triple damages, costs, and attorneys' fees in a private civil RICO action. RICO is unique in its complexity among criminal statutes because of the sheer number of potential predicate offenses and because of the indefinite terms used in defining a violation.

In H.J. Inc. v. Northwestern Bell Telephone Co. (1989) the Supreme Court interpreted a "pattern of racketeering activity" to require both "continuity" and "relationship": two or more predicate offenses that are somehow related and that pose a threat of continued criminal activity must be committed within a ten-year period. Four of the more conservative Justices, although concurring in the JUDGMENT, suggested that the pattern requirement may be unconstitutionally void for vagueness in both criminal and civil cases. Because it is not clear what RICO requires beyond two predicate offenses, a potential defendant may not know whether his or her conduct is covered by RICO.

Lower courts, however, have uniformly held that the pattern requirement is not unconstitutionally vague because the underlying predicate offenses are clearly defined crimes. People of common intelligence, therefore, do not have to guess at what is forbidden, and the discretion of police, prosecutors, juries, and courts in enforcing RICO is constrained. Gerard Lynch has argued that unexpectedly draconian penalties nevertheless may be imposed based on a prosecutor's unrestricted discretion to transform ordinary offenses into a RICO prosecution. This may implicate the principle of legality (penal legislation must describe with precision the conduct it prohibits and the potential punishment) and the related constitutional prohibitions against VAGUENESS and EX POST FACTO LAWS.

Among the most powerful applications of RICO has been its use to seek pretrial restraint and forfeiture of illegal proceeds, including assets that a defendant would otherwise use to hire a defense attorney at the very criminal trial where guilt and thus forfeitability will be determined. In Caplin Drysdale, Chartered v. United States (1989) and United States v. Monsanto (1989) (construing parallel forfeiture provisions under the continuing criminal-enterprise statute), the Court held, 5–4, that such restraint and forfeiture do not violate the Sixth Amendment RIGHT TO COUNSEL or the Fifth Amendment DUE PROCESS right to a FAIR TRIAL. A defendant who is thus left INDIGENT, the majority said, can obtain appointed counsel. The Court left open whether due process requires a fair hearing before a pretrial restraint may be imposed. The Court also construed the forfeiture provisions broadly in Russello v. United States (1983) to serve the congressional purpose of creating a potent weapon to attack the economic roots of organized crime. Lower courts have held that forfeiture may be cruel and unusual, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, if the interest forfeited is grossly disproportionate to the offense committed.

Although the Supreme Court has not yet addressed most constitutional attacks on RICO, in Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co. (1985), the Court rejected the circuit court's suggestion that a private civil RICO action in the absence of a prior criminal conviction impermissibly imposes punishment while avoiding the protections of constitutional CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Lower courts have held that various applications of RICO do not violate the DOUBLE JEOPARDY clause. Dual prosecutions—by the state for the predicate offenses and by the federal government for racketeering based on those offenses—are permitted because different sovereigns and separate offenses are involved. Double jeopardy does not bar federal prosecutions for both the underlying federal predicate offenses and RICO offenses based on those predicates, prosecutions for both a RICO conspiracy and substantive RICO offenses, separate sentences for predicate and RICO offenses, or separate sentences for RICO conspiracy and RICO substantive offenses. In Grady v. Corbin (1990) the Court held that double jeopardy bars a subsequent prosecution if, to establish an essential element of an offense, the government will prove conduct that constitutes an offense for which the defendant has already been prosecuted. The impact of Grady remains to be seen.

Even though a predicate act committed before the statute went into effect may be used to establish a pattern of racketeering, RICO requires that at least one act be committed after its effective date. A person who has committed a prior act is therefore on notice that a subsequent act will subject him or her to liability. Thus, RICO is not unconstitutional as an ex post facto law or BILL OF ATTAINDER.

Private civil plaintiffs have expanded civil RICO in dramatic ways against traditional businesses with no ties to organized crime. RICO civil suits have also been employed by both private and government entities in efforts to suppress unpopular political groups, including antinuclear demonstrators in Georgia, an antipornography group in Florida, and anti-abortion protestors across the country. In West Hartford, Connecticut, the city government even sued a local newspaper for covering anti-abortion protests. Such suits raise significant free-speech problems. Many of these expansive uses of RICO were not anticipated by Congress, but nevertheless fall within the plain language of the statute. Claims of abuse have produced repeated efforts with little success to reform RICO through judicial interpretations, legislation, or Justice Department guidelines. It is unlikely that the Courts will reform RICO by applying the BILL OF RIGHTS. The concurring opinion in H. J. Inc. notwithstanding, the Supreme Court has not been inclined to find new constitutional protections for the accused. However, at least some federal courts may be unwilling to hear certain kinds of RICO suits. In Town of West Hartford v. Operation Rescue (2nd circuit, 1990), the federal appeals court dismissed a civil RICO suit against anti-abortion protestors engaged in CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE. The court labeled the suit's RICO allegations "blatantly implausible" and indicated that the court had no willingness "to countenance fanciful invocations of the draconian RICO weapon in civil litigation."

ROBERT DIDEROT GARCIA
(1992)

Bibliography

LYNCH, GERARD E. 1987 RICO: The Crime of Being a Criminal (parts I-IV). Columbia Law Review 87:661–764, 920–984.

NOTE 1990 RICO's "Pattern" Requirement: Void for Vagueness? Columbia Law Review 90:489–527.

RADICAL POPULIST CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

Although the Supreme Court claims to have the final word in CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION, populist groups have often claimed to have rival interpretive authority. Sometimes these groups have offered interpretations in sharp disagreement with the Court's views. In contrast to the Court's fairly middle-of-the-road approach, many of these groups interpret the Constitution to reach radical conclusions.

Perhaps the clearest example of this phenomenon is the disjunction between judicial and radical populist interpretations of the SECOND AMENDMENT. On the one hand, the Court has given the amendment little attention. In Presser v. Illinois (1886), the Court held that the Second Amendment limits only the federal government, as the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT does not incorporate it against the states. In the twentieth century, the Court has squarely addressed the meaning of the amendment only once, in the profoundly ambiguous Miller v. United States (1939). Some believe that Miller interprets the Second Amendment as a protection for individuals to own private arms. Others believe that it interprets the amendment as a protection only for state militias to own arms. In the years since Miller, federal appeals courts have generally interpreted the amendment in a narrow way, holding that the Fourteenth Amendment does not incorporate it against the states or that it protects arms-holding only within a state militia.

In sharp contrast, radical populist groups have generally interpreted the Second Amendment as a protection for the right of all individuals to own guns, for the purposes of hunting, self-defense, and, especially, resistance to government. These groups include some gun-rights groups, anti-environmentalist groups, income tax resisters, anti-abortion protesters, neo-Nazi and other hate groups, and most of the MODERN MILITIA movement. Some of these groups believe that much current government activity is unconstitutional, such as the income tax, land use regulation, and federal police activity. The Second Amendment, however, seems to be a common thread uniting otherwise different groups, for good reason. At the heart of American radical populism is distrust of government, and the Second Amendment, construed as a protection for the right of resistance to government, is the central constitutional provision supporting the idea that government may never be trusted with a monopoly of violence. For the same reason, the interpretation of the Second Amendment cannot belong exclusively to the Court: If the point in the amendment is to ensure the possibility of resistance to government, then it would be folly to entrust its interpretation to a government body.

In some ways, the methods of radical populist constitutional interpretation are similar to judicial constitutional interpretation, but in other ways they are quite different. Like many judges, radical populist groups rely heavily on the text of the Constitution and the writings of the Framers; indeed, radical populist constitutionalists may well be much more familiar with the works of the Framers than most Americans. Like some judges but unlike others, they maintain that the text and the Framers' ORIGINAL INTENT is clear and unambiguous; in particular, they hold that the Second Amendment will bear only one meaning, a protection for an individual right to bear arms. Unlike almost all judges, radical populist constitutionalists form a very closed community of interpretation. Counterarguments from outside their community—from scholars, politicians, or judges—rarely or never appear in their writings. In other words, radical populist constitutionalists typically talk only or overwhelmingly to one another. They are engaged, not in an interpretive dialogue, but in a process more akin to responsive chanting or preaching to the converted. This dimension of their method of interpretation emphatically distinguishes it from judicial and scholarly methods; radical populist constitutionalists exhibit nothing comparable to the adversary method, the writing of DISSENTING OPINIONS, the process of appellate review, or the vigorous disagreement in the law journals.

As these groups are sectarian in their interpretive method, many also give a sectarian substantive meaning to the Second Amendment. Many radical populist constitutionalists view the amendment as a path of empowerment for their particular identity group(s). They find in the amendment an alternative to, even a transcendence of, politics, with all of its messy give-and-take. When the government (meaning the political process) becomes too perfidious (meaning unsupportive of their identity group), then radical populists believe that they have the RIGHT OF REVOLUTION, including the right to take up arms to end oppression. In the process, some radical populists actually claim the right to oppress other groups; they argue that the right to bear arms is held only by the American people, which includes (in the radicals' view) only whites, or Christians, or those who agree with the radical populists. As a result, when the revolution comes, radical populists will enjoy supremacy, and other groups—who currently enjoy political power—will be forced into subordination. Other groups make an unoppressive but still sectarian claim:

Jews for the Preservation of Firearms Ownership and the Women and Guns movement, for example, maintain that the Second Amendment should be read to protect an individual right to bear arms, because Jews and women will then be able to protect themselves against violent anti-Semitism and misogyny.

In other words, these constitutional interpreters are radical in two ways: first, they distrust politics as a means of resolving difference; and second, they are deeply sectarian advocates for their particular identity groups, not proponents of society as a whole. Those two features, however, are shared—to a reduced degree—by much of the American population. If these groups are radical, then, it is only because they are different in degree, not kind, from the rest of America. As a result, they squarely raise the question whether the American citizenry could plausibly develop a populist constitutional interpretation that is not radical; that is, that affirms political compromise and seeks the good of the whole. If such a thing is not possible, the Court may have good reason to claim to be the final arbiter of the meaning of the Constitution.

DAVID C. WILLIAMS
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Gun Control; Incorporation Doctrine; Nonjudicial Interpretation of the Constitution.)

Bibliography

AHO, JAMES A. 1990 The Politics of Righteousness: Idaho Christian Patriotism. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

BROWN, RICHARD MAXWELL 1975 Strain of Violence: Historical Studies of American Violence and Vigilantism. New York: Oxford University Press.

EHRMAN, KEITH A. and HENNIGAN, DENNIS A. 1989 The Second Amendment in the Twentieth Century: Have You Seen Your Militia Lately? University of Dayton Law Review 15:5–58.

KATES, DON B. 1983 Handgun Prohibition and the Original Meaning of the Second Amendment. Michigan Law Review 82:204–273.

QUIGLEY, PAXTON 1989 Armed & Female. New York: E. P. Dutton.

SIMKIN, JAY; ZELMAN, AARON; and RICE, ALAN M. 1994 Lethal Laws. Milwaukee, Wisc.: Jews for the Preservation of Firearms Ownership.

STOCK, CATHERINE MCNICOL 1996 Rural Radicals: Righteous Rage in the American Grain. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

WILLIAMS, DAVID C. 1996 The Militia Movement and Second Amendment Revolution: Conjuring with the People. Cornell Law Review 81:879–952.

RADIO

See: Broadcasting

RAILROAD COMMISSION OF TEXAS v. PULLMAN COMPANY

See: Abstention Doctrine

RAILROAD CONTROL ACT
40 Stat. 451 (1918)

Railroad service virtually ceased during the severe winter of 1917–1918. The extraordinary wartime volume of traffic and the railroads' fiscal and physical inability to meet its demands prompted President WOODROW WILSON to take control of all railway transport in the country on December 26, 1917. Congress ratified his proclamation in March 1918, by "emergency legislation enacted to meet conditions growing out of war."

The substance of the act concerned reimbursement of the owners for the use of their property while under government management. Congress set JUST COMPENSATION for this TAKING OF PROPERTY at the average operating income for the prior three years and also insured "adequate and appropriate [monies] for the maintenance, repair, renewals and depreciation of property." This legislation temporarily superseded much of the regulatory power of the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC). It authorized the President to initiate "reasonable and just" rates which became effective without the ordinarily required wait and without ICC approval. That body could review the reasonableness of the rates but must give "due consideration" to the "unified and coordinated national control" and the stipulation that the roads "are not in competition." The constitutionality of the act as a whole was never challenged but separate sections were sustained under the WAR POWERS in a series of cases.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

RAILROAD REGULATION

See: Economic Regulation

RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT
48 Stat. 1283 (1934)

This act established a retirement and pension plan for railroad employees engaged in INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Congress specified "promoting efficiency and safety in interstate transportation" among the purposes of the act. Each employee, whose participation was mandatory, would be required to retire after thirty years service or at sixty-five, receiving thereafter an annuity based upon his length of service. Contributions from both employee and the carrier would finance these payments. A Railroad Retirement Board would adjust the contributions, initially set at two percent of a worker's salary and doubled by the carrier, and would administer the act. Congress further authorized the board to make actuarial surveys and keep pertinent records and data. The act vested district courts with JURISDICTION to enforce board orders and to review administrative questions.

A 5–4 Supreme Court voided the law in RAILROAD RETIREMENT BOARD V. ALTON (1935) as a violation of DUE PROCESS OF LAW and outside the commerce power, a decision effectively nullified in STEWARD MACHINE CO. V. DAVIS (1937).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

RAILROAD RETIREMENT BOARD v. ALTON RAILWAY COMPANY
295 U.S. 330 (1935)

In the spring of 1935, as the FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT administration made plans for a general SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, the Supreme Court held unconstitutional the RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT of 1934, which established a program of compulsory retirement and old age pensions for railroad workers engaged in INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Justice OWEN ROBERTS, for a five-member majority, found the act violative of DUE PROCESS OF LAW and unauthorized by the COMMERCE CLAUSE. By exacting a percentage of payrolls for a pension fund, the act, Roberts said, was a "naked appropriation of private property" for the benefit of workers. The act was also "bad" because no reasonable connection existed between the welfare of railroad workers and the efficiency or safety of interstate transportation.

Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, joined by Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO, and HARLAN FISKE STONE, dissented. The MAJORITY OPINION shocked Hughes because it went beyond the invalidation of this particular pension plan; the majority's "unwarranted limitation" on the commerce clause denied wholly and forever the power of Congress to enact any social welfare scheme. Relying on GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) for the scope of the commerce power, Hughes observed that its exercise had the widest range in dealing with interstate railroads. He accepted Congress's judgment that the plan enhanced efficiency and safety. Moreover, the precedents supported the constitutionality of the act, he argued; the act did not differ in principle from workmen's compensation acts for railroad employees, which the Court had sustained. It had also upheld a congressional enactment that empowered the Interstate Commerce Commission to take excess profits from some railroads for the benefit of others. (See DAYTON GOOSE CREEK RAILROAD CO. V. UNITED STATES.) The Court's opinion helped provoke the constitutional crisis of 1937.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

RAILWAY EXPRESS AGENCY v. NEW YORK
336 U.S. 106 (1949)

Railway Express is a leading modern example of the Supreme Court's deference to legislative judgments in the field of ECONOMIC REGULATION. The Court unanimously upheld a New York City "traffic safety" ordinance forbidding advertisements on vehicles but exempting delivery vehicles advertising their owners' businesses. No one mentioned the FIRST AMENDMENT. (See COMMERCIAL SPEECH.) Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, for the Court, first waved away a DUE PROCESS attack on the ordinance. Turning to the companion EQUAL PROTECTION attack, Douglas said that the city "may well have concluded" that advertising vehicles presented a greater traffic hazard than did trucks carrying their owners' messages. "We cannot say that that judgment is not an allowable one." The opinion typifies the Court's use of the most deferential RATIONAL BASIS review of economic regulation.

Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON expressed some doubt as to the Court's reasoning but concurred, referring to the law's historic distinctions between "doing in self-interest and doing for hire." Along the way he uttered the decision's most memorable words: "there is no more effective practical guarantee against arbitrary and unreasonable government than to require that the principles of law which officials would impose on a minority must be imposed generally."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

RAINES v. BYRD

See: Congressional Standing

RANDOLPH, EDMUND
(1753–1813)

In 1776 Edmund Jenings Randolph, lawyer, mayor of Williamsburg, and aide to General GEORGE WASHINGTON, was the youngest delegate to the convention that adopted the VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS AND CONSTITUTION. He became the state's first attorney general under the new constitution and was later a delegate to Congress, where he favored amending the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION to give Congress the power to levy import duties. He was a member of the Annapolis Convention of 1786 and later the same year defeated RICHARD HENRY LEE to become governor of Virginia.

Randolph led Virginia's delegation to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, where he introduced the VIRGINIA PLAN. He did not, however, sign the finished Constitution, which, he believed, gave too much power to the President and so tended toward monarchy. Nevertheless, in 1788 he argued and voted in the state convention for RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. He argued that there was no alternative except disunion and that a second convention could be called to perfect the document.

President Washington appointed Randolph the first attorney general of the United States, making him a colleague of and mediator between THOMAS JEFFERSON and ALEXANDER HAMILTON. When Jefferson resigned in 1794, Randolph succeeded him as secretary of state, but he was himself forced to resign the next year when British publication of captured French dispatches led to charges of TREASON and bribery against Randolph. This disgrace ended his political career, but he remained an eminent lawyer. In 1807 he was chief defense counsel when AARON BURR was tried for and acquitted of treason.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

RANDOLPH, JOHN
(1773–1833)

John Randolph of Roanoke, Virginia, congressman and sometime senator, advocated the constitutional doctrines of STATES' RIGHTS and STRICT CONSTRUCTION that became identified with southern opposition to the federal government and that eventuated in SECESSION. Excepting his support for the LOUISIANA PURCHASE, Randolph consistently preferred the claim of state to federal SOVEREIGNTY. A bitter critic of the Federalist federal judiciary, he managed or mismanaged the IMPEACHMENT of Justice SAMUEL CHASE in 1804.

Breaking with THOMAS JEFFERSON in 1806, Randolph commenced a career of opposition to almost every sitting President and to most national policies. His principles were straightforward. He believed that the Constitution was a compact among sovereign states. Sovereignty did not inhere in the federal government, and the admission of new states was a device to weaken the original, compacting states. He espoused the southern view that regarded every attempt to expand federal power as an attack on SLAVERY, and he regarded democracy and nationalism as leveling and centralizing invasions of ancient state privileges and mores. He viewed with especial bitterness the rulings of the MARSHALL COURT.

ROBERT DAWIDOFF
(1986)

Bibliography

DAWIDOFF, ROBERT 1979 The Education of John Randolph. New York: Norton.

RASMUSSEN v. UNITED STATES

See: Insular Cases

RATE REGULATION

See: Economic Regulation

RATIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

The delegates to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION of 1789 decided upon the outlines of the AMENDING PROCESS after only a few hours of debate. The requirement that any proposed amendment be ratified by three-fourths of the states was adopted unanimously, but was, like so much of the Constitution, the result of a compromise. Initially the convention seems to have assumed that amendments to the federal charter would require ratification by all the states; but five state delegations were willing to set the requirement as low as two-thirds of the states. No form of ratification other than by the states as entities was proposed or discussed in the convention.

JAMES MADISON, writing in THE FEDERALIST #39, described the method of ratifying amendments to the new Constitution as "partly federal, partly national." The method is [con]federal in that ratification is accomplished by the states as states, and not by a referendum of the people or a national majority. At the same time, the method is national in that it does not require the assent of all the constituent states to alter the terms of the federal union. A pure theory of FEDERALISM, as it was understood by the founding generation, would not have sanctioned imposition of an amended compact upon unconsenting parties.

Our first constitution, the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, had required the unanimous consent of the states to any amendment. For that reason, during the "critical period" between 1781 and 1789 no amendments were adopted, even when decisive weaknesses in the confederal system were apparent. The requirement for unanimous ratification of amendments made the Constitutional Convention and the new Constitution necessary.

Article V in fact provides for state ratification of constitutional amendments in one or the other of two distinct modes, leaving the choice of mode to Congress. The first mode is ratification by state legislatures, the second is ratification by conventions. In two centuries of government under the Constitution Congress has proposed thirty-three constitutional amendments and in thirty-two cases has prescribed state legislatures as the agents of ratification. The single exception was ratification of the TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT, repealing PROHIBITION.

The constitutional provision relating to ratification is little more than an outline. The details have been filled in as the need has arisen. Although the state legislatures derive their authority to ratify amendments from the federal Constitution, the size of the majority required to effect ratification is determined by the constitution, statutes, or legislative rules of each state. Many, perhaps most, prescribe an extraordinary majority for that purpose.

An amendment automatically becomes part of the Constitution when it is ratified by the requisite number of states, but someone must be designated to receive the certificates of ratification, to count them, and to announce publicly that ratification is complete. Originally Congress delegated this task to the secretary of state, but it is now performed by a relatively minor official, the director of general services. Congress itself proclaimed the ratification of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Article V sets no time limit within which the states must act on proposed amendments. The Framers supposed that the ratification process would occur at roughly the same time throughout the country. RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION itself took nine months; the BILL OF RIGHTS was ratified in just over two years. The convention provided no definite time period after which a proposal for amendment would lapse. Therefore, a recurring question has been how long the states have to ratify proposed amendments.

The principles of democracy and CONSTITUTIONALISM would be ill-served if ratification of constitutional amendments by the several states did not have to be accomplished roughly contemporaneously. This goal has been met in the case of every successful amendment. Although seven years has become the standard period for the states to consider ratification, no amendment has, in fact, required as long as four years for ratification. The TWENTY-SECOND AMENDMENT required the longest time, forty-seven and one-half months; the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT required the shortest period, four months. The average time for ratification of a constitutional amendment has been eighteen months.

As a legal matter, ratification must be accomplished within a "reasonable" time, but no statute or court decision has defined just how long a period that is. The CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT, proposed in 1924, was ratified by three state legislatures as late as 1937, and the Supreme Court declined to hold that those ratifications were ineffective. The Supreme Court, in Dillon v. Gloss (1920), upheld the power of Congress to set a seven-year limit on the ratification period; but in Coleman v. Miller (1939) the Court refused to set such a limit on its own account where Congress failed to exercise the power.

The EIGHTEENTH, TWENTIETH, Twenty-First, and Twenty-Second AMENDMENTS comprise the ratification time limit within their texts. In several other cases, Congress has prescribed the time limit (invariably seven years) in the JOINT RESOLUTION proposing the amendment. Only once did Congress attempt to extend the prescribed time limit: when the seven years allotted for ratification of the so-called EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT (ERA) expired in 1979, Congress—by less than the two-thirds majority required for the original proposal—voted to extend the ratification period for an extra three and one-half years. The failure of the proposed amendment's supporters to garner sufficient ratifications even in the extended time period averted a constitutional crisis over the issue of time limits.

A matter frequently debated but never definitively resolved is whether the states, during the period for consideration of a proposed amendment, may alter a decision once one is taken. The question arose with regard to the Fourteenth Amendment and was revived during the controversy over the ERA. Indeed, there seems to be no doubt that a state, having declined to ratify a proposed amendment, may, within the allotted time, alter that decision and ratify the amendment. It is less certain whether a state that has voted to ratify a proposed amendment may subsequently rescind such a ratification. In 1868 Congress and Secretary of State WILLIAM H. SEWARD declared the Fourteenth Amendment ratified, apparently counting the ratifications of two states (New Jersey and Ohio) that had voted to rescind their ratifications. On the date of the declaration a sufficient number of states had ratified to render the disputed votes irrelevant. Expiration in 1983 of the extended time limit for ratification of the ERA made the question of rescinded ratifications of that proposal moot.

The requirement of state ratification presupposes that the state legislatures are free to choose whether or not to ratify a proposed amendment. But this is not always true. Ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment was secured, in part, because Congress made such ratification a condition for readmission of the states of the former Confederacy. Clearly Congress, amidst the crisis of Civil War and Reconstruction, stretched the limits of its authority by imposing that condition.

Controversies concerning the ratification of constitutional amendments are almost prototypically POLITICAL QUESTIONS. Only rarely has the Supreme Court decided such controversies. In Hawke v. Smith (1920) and Leser v. Garnett (1922) the Court rejected attempts to submit the question of ratification to a popular vote or to condition ratification on approval in a REFERENDUM. In United States v. Sprague (1931) the Court refused to impose any limit on Congress's freedom to choose between the two constitutional modes of ratification. The effect of the few cases the Court has decided has been, as in Dillon and Coleman, to reserve the power of final determination to Congress.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

FREEDMAN, SAMUEL S. and NAUGHTON, PAMELA J. 1978 ERA: May a State Change Its Vote? Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press.

ORFIELD, LESTER 1942 The Amending of the Federal Constitution. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION

Plans for a convention to revise the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION were in fact a subterfuge, because the delegates in Philadelphia convened in May 1787 with no serious thought whatever of an attempt to keep that instrument in force. But a legal problem had to be resolved, for the Articles were a fact and their revision was to be made only by unanimous agreement of the Continental Congress which "the legislatures of every state" would later confirm. Delegates to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, including several lawyers who later became Supreme Court Justices, wasted little time in disposing of such restrictions, but they were wary of the manner in which the Constitution could be made acceptable to the people. The solution hit upon by JAMES MADISON in his VIRGINIA PLAN was to circumvent the state legislatures and ask Congress to send whatever plan they adopted in Philadelphia to "assemblies of Representatives . . . expressly chosen by the people, to consider decide thereon." Frankly fearful of local officeholders who would see the new Constitution as a threat to "the importance they now hold," the Virginia delegates were united on this point. "Nine States had been required in all great cases under the Confederation that number was on that account preferable," GEORGE MASON suggested, and his logic prevailed.

After some maneuvering, the expiring Continental Congress by unanimous resolution forwarded the Constitution to the states for their approbation, thus placing an implicit seal of congressional approval on Article VII. The principle of a two-thirds majority rather than unanimity was crucial. Ominously, Rhode Island had sent no delegate to the convention. To avoid embarrassing obstructions, prudence dictated a fair trial for the Constitution, provided key state conventions ratified the document. Rarely in American history has such a sweeping change moved so rapidly through the cumbersome machinery of disparate state governments, and the phenomenon can be explained only in the adroit handling of GEORGE WASHINGTON's implied endorsement along with the urgency which supporters of the Constitution preached in pamphlets and newspapers or wherever influential citizens congregated.

Much of the credit for the Federalists' strategy must go to James Madison. As a central figure at the convention and in the Continental Congress he carefully brought forward the accompanying documents which gave an impression of unanimity by the framers and the forwarders. Using his franking privilege (as a congressman), Madison maintained a correspondence with colleagues in the principal state capitals and coordinated plans to hold conventions at the proper tactical time. Ratification by the conventions in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Virginia was essential, for these three states contained most of the nation's people and much of its wealth. In New York a surly band controlled the state government and was in no hurry to surrender its profitable customs collecting to a national government, but these men could not withstand pressure from the commercial community if all the other large states ratified. Rhode Island was doubtful, and New Jersey and Georgia were unnecessary, owing to the smallness of their populations and their geographic positions.

The Federalists had powerful allies in the newspapers, some ninety-eight in number, most of which printed the Constitution in toto shortly after September 17. In Philadelphia, Boston, and New York the leading journals soon printed essays favoring the Constitution and denouncing the opposition Anti-Federalists as obstinate "placemen" (state officeholders) fearful of losing their jobs or "wrongheaded" on other grounds. Pennsylvania Federalists moved swiftly but could not outrace their friends in Delaware, who hurriedly called a three-county convention and became the first ratifying state on December 7 (30–0). In Philadelphia, the first stirrings of Anti-Federalist activity included publication of attacks on the Constitution's lack of a BILL OF RIGHTS, but as that argument was picked up elsewhere the high-handed legislature called a convention that was heavily weighted with delegates from eastern counties favorable to the Federalist cause. Before farming communities in western counties could organize, the Pennsylvania convention ratified on December 12 (46–23). New Jersey fell in line on December 18 (38–0). Then word came that Georgia had also unanimously ratified on January 2, 1788 (26–0). After perfunctory debate, Connecticut ratified on January 9 (128–40).

Before they could enjoy these triumphs, the Federalists learned that the failure to include a bill of rights, the fears of an overbearing (and tax-hungry) "consolidated" government, and a variety of local circumstances would slow ratification and might jeopardize the whole process. Massachusetts became the focal point of Federalist efforts, for rumblings from town meetings indicated that opposition was greater than anticipated. A phalanx of Harvard-trained lawyers, supported by commercial and shipping interests, accepted a set of recommendatory amendments to weaken the major Anti-Federalist positions, and on February 6 the Federalists won, 187–168.

New York Anti-Federalists began to counterattack. They urged friends in New Hampshire to reject the Constitution, and there is some murky evidence that a quick vote would have gone against ratification. Both sides finally settled on a postponement until June. Madison helped ALEXANDER HAMILTON write the essays of "Publius" (these became a classic treatise titled THE FEDERALIST) for the New York newspapers and continued to send his morale-building, organizing letters to friends in the South. An unexpected stumbling block to ratification came from Baptist ministers and congregations, who voiced concern that freedom of conscience was not safeguarded by the Constitution.

Meanwhile, Maryland Federalists lost patience with their long-winded opponents in the Annapolis convention and ratified on April 28 (63–11). The recommended amendments from Massachusetts Anti-Federalists were used as a talking point, but when the argument came to whether amendments could be part of a conditional ratification, the Federalists lost their tempers. Madison hurried back to Virginia, aware that PATRICK HENRY and Mason would form the most powerful Anti-Federal combination possible. New York seemed safely Anti-Federalist, for Governor George Clinton and his friends talked and printed venomous attacks on the Constitution and its Federalist drafters. Hamilton counted heads and asked Madison if a conditional ratification would suffice. No, Madison replied, a ratification with any strings attached would leave New York out of the Union. After slight Anti-Federal resistance, South Carolina ratified on May 23 (149–73). In Rhode Island, the people rejected ratification directly, 237 yeas to 2,708 nays.

Ratification by Virginia on June 25 was uncertain until a crucial ballot was won by Federalists, who captured the eight doubtful votes from western areas. Madison, JOHN MARSHALL, and EDMUND RANDOLPH led the charge against Henry and Mason, but they agreed to recommend amendments adding a bill of rights to preserve some good will on the final roll call (89–79). The ninth state, New Hampshire, had already ratified on June 21, 1788 (57–46). The news from Virginia, however, sent a thrill through the North. Diarist JOHN QUINCY ADAMS noted that jubilant Federalists fired muskets far into the night when the tidings from Richmond reached Boston. With ten states now committed, the Constitution was sure of a trial. Even so, a powerful, entrenched Anti-Federal faction prevented action by the North Carolina convention, which adjourned to await future developments and a possible second convention that diehard Anti-Federalists thought might patch up another version of the Constitution (with a bill of rights among the additions). A test vote on ratification lost, 184–84, but New York fooled everybody by ratifying on July 26 (30–27).

Within four months, all the states except North Carolina and Rhode Island had set in motion machinery to elect the new federal Congress and a President. The knowledge that Washington supported the Constitution and would be the first President tipped the balance in crucial situations. Washington's stature, the concession by Madison and others that amendments adding a bill of rights would be proposed forthwith, and the overwhelming support of the press were the chief reasons that ratification proceeded with relative speed. The new government was operating, and Madison had introduced a bill of rights by the time North Carolina ratified on November 21, 1789 (197–99). Rhode Island narrowly ratified on May 29, 1790 (34–32), to become a fully participating member of the Union. Few scars remained. The hastily drawn lines of the ratification battle soon faded, and the divergent political philosophies that emerged in the next decade had little to do with the intense struggle of 1787–1788.

ROBERT A. RUTLAND
(1986)

Bibliography

FARRAND, MAX, ed. (1911) 1966 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, 4 vols. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

MAIN, JACKSON TURNER 1961 The Antifederalists: Critics of the Constitution, 1781–1788. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

RUTLAND, ROBERT A. 1966 The Ordeal of the Constitution: The Antifederalists and the Ratification Struggle of 1787–1788. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

WOOD, GORDON S. 1969 The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787. Pages 306–344. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

RATIFIER INTENT

Ratifier intent is a form of ORIGINAL INTENT or ORIGINALISM that emphasizes the meanings and understandings of the Constitution possessed by those who ratified it. The ratifiers were the members of the state CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS that ratified the Constitution. The importance of ratifier intent derives from the widely held opinion that the consent of the governed, who alone were sovereign, legitimated the Constitution. The CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 had exceeded its instructions: to recommend revisions of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. Although the Confederation Congress transmitted the Constitution to the states for RATIFICATION, thereby implicitly agreeing to the scrapping of the Articles of Confederation, the fact remains that the Convention had violated its commission. Consequently, leading Framers of the Constitution insisted, as JAMES MADISON said, that "the legitimate meaning" of the Constitution should be sought "not in the opinions or intentions of the body which planned and proposed the Constitution, but in the sense attached to it by the people in their respective State Conventions, where it received all the authority which it possessed." Thus, as its ratification rather than its framing imbued the Constitution with its legitimacy, so ratifier intent rather than original intent (the understandings of the Framers) defined the text. This is the CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY of the matter as transmitted by the Framers.

One should not have to choose between the intent of the Framers and that of the ratifiers. All contemporary expositions should be considered if they illumine a constitutional issue. Moreover, from the broadest perspective, ratifier intent and original intent almost coincided: government by consent of the governed; majority rule under constitutional restraints that limit majorities; guarantees of rights that prevail against the legislative as well as executive branch; a federal system; three branches of government, including a single executive, a BICAMERAL legislature, and an independent judiciary; an elaborate system of CHECKS AND BALANCES; and representative government and elections at fixed intervals. The founding generation also believed in measuring the powers of government, rather than the rights of the people, and they assumed a NATURAL RIGHTS philosophy. They concurred on a great many fundamental matters. Without doubt, the Constitution reflects a coherent and principled POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY. All of this consensus bespeaks an enormously important and ascertainable set of original understandings shared by Framers and ratifiers, even by Federalists and ANTI-FEDERALISTS. But none of this history enables judges to reach decisions favoring one side of a constitutional issue rather than another in real cases that come before courts.

More perplexing still is the fact that ratifier intent with respect to the meanings of particular clauses of the Constitution is more often than not unascertainable. The main reason for this is that the historical record is too skimpy to sustain a constitutional JURISPRUDENCE of ratifier intent. In a 1954 report, the National Historical Publications Commission declared that the reporters of the ratification period took notes on the debates "and rephrased those notes for publication. The shorthand in use at that time was too slow to permit verbatim transcription of all speeches, with the result that a reporter, in preparing his copy for the press, frequently relied upon his memory as well as his notes and gave what seemed to him the substance, but not necessarily the actual phraseology, of speeches. Different reportings of the same speech exhibited at times only a general similarity, and details often recorded by one reporter were frequently omitted by another." Reporters used their notes to spur their memories, and their reports were no better than their understandings.

When Jonathan Elliot began publication of his Debates in 1827, he collected the previously published records of the state ratifying conventions. He misleadingly called his collection The Debates in the Several State Conventions, on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution. In fact, Elliot unreliably reported the proceedings of only five states plus some fragments of others. He acknowledged that the debates may have been "inaccurately taken down" and "too faintly sketched." ELBRIDGE GERRY, a member of the Constitutional Convention who became an Anti-Federalist leader, complained that the "debates of the State Conventions, as published by the short-hand writers, were generally partial and mutilated."

For Pennsylvania, Elliot published only the speeches of two advocates of ratification. The editor of the debates for Massachusetts apologized for his inaccuracies and omissions deriving from his inexperience. He also doctored some speeches and provided a few spurious ones. The reporter for New York made similar remarks and recorded only the debates for the first half of convention's proceedings, reverting to a skeletal journal of motions for the remainder. In Virginia, where the debates were most fully reported and by a reporter sympathetic to ratification, James Madison and JOHN MARSHALL expressed dissatisfaction with the results. Madison informed Elliot that he found passages that were "defective," "obscure," "unintelligible," and "more or less erroneous." Marshall complained that if he had not seen his name prefixed to his speeches he would not have recognized them as his own. He further declared that the speeches of PATRICK HENRY, the leader of the opposition, were reported worst of all. Similar criticisms apply to the proceedings of North Carolina, whose first convention rejected the Constitution and whose second was wholly unreported.

These are the five states (Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, and North Carolina) whose records provide a basis, however inadequate, for determining ratifier intent. We have only scraps of material for the other states, with the exception of Rhode Island, which ratified so late as to count for nearly nothing. Although the people acting through state ratifying conventions gave the Constitution its authority, the ratifiers' intent should not be confused or conflated with legitimacy. Ratification legitimated the text that the Constitutional Convention recommended; the Convention did not recommend its intention, only the text, and the ratifying conventions only ratified the text, without providing a basis for a constitutional jurisprudence based on ratifier intent or understanding.

Justice JOSEPH STORY made the definitive rejection of ratifier intent in his Commentaries on the Constitution: "In different states and in different conventions, different and very opposite objections are known to have prevailed. Opposite interpretations, and different explanations of different provisions, may well be presumed to have been presented in different bodies, to remove local objections, or to win local favor. And there can be no certainty, either that the different state conventions in ratifying the constitution, gave the same uniform interpretation to its language, or that even in a single state convention, the same reasoning prevailed with a majority" (1st ed. 1833, I, pp. 388–389).

Story continued by noting that the terms of the Constitution impressed different people differently. Some drew conclusions that others repudiated; some understood its provisions strictly, others broadly. Ratifiers in different conventions revealed a diversity of interpretations. To THOMAS JEFFERSON's demand that ratifier intent be honored as much as possible, Story retorted that it was not possible; he ridiculed "the utter looseness, and incoherence of this canon." No way existed to determine "what was thought of particular clauses" of the Constitution when it was ratified. "In many cases no printed debates give any account of any construction; and where any is given, different persons held different doctrines. Whose is to prevail?" Story concluded that determining ratifier intent is hopeless because "of all the state conventions, the debates of five only are preserved, and these very imperfectly. What is to be done, as to other eight states?" Ratifier intent, despite its present support by some constitutional scholars, including Robert Bork and Charles Lofgren, is as lacking in historical basis or practical application as it may be theoretically attractive.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Bork Nomination; Constitutional Interpretation.)

Bibliography

BORK, ROBERT H. 1989 The Tempting of America: the Political Seduction of the Law. New York: Free Press.

HUTSON, JAMES H. 1986 The Creation of the Constitution: The Integrity of the Documentary Record. Texas Law Review 65: 1–39.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1988 Original Intent and the Framers' Constitution. New York: Macmillan.

LOFGREN, CHARLES A. 1988 The Original Understanding of Original Intent. Constitutional Commentary 5:77–113.

RATIO DECIDENDI

(Latin: "Reason for being decided.") A statement made in an OPINION OF THE COURT is either ratio decidendi or OBITER DICTUM. Ratio decidendi refers to a statement that is a necessary part of the chain of reasoning leading to the DECISION of the case, while obiter dictum ("said by the way") refers to any other statement in the opinion. The distinction is clear in theory but, in practice, may be difficult to apply to any given case.

No federal court may properly pass on a legal or constitutional question that is not brought before it in a CASE OR CONTROVERSY, and a court properly resolves only those questions necessary to decide a case before it. The resolution of a particular question is the court's HOLDING on that question, and the reasoning necessary to the resolution of a question properly before the court is ratio decidendi. The ratio decidendi is thereafter binding as a rule of law when the case is cited as precedent. Although a judge may have a clear idea of what arguments were necessary to reach the decision in a case and may attempt to convey that idea in his opinion, it is the courts that apply the case as precedent in future decisions that finally establish which statements were obiter dicta and which ratio decidendi.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

RATIONAL BASIS

The "rational basis" STANDARD OF REVIEW emerged in the late 1930s, as the Supreme Court retreated from its earlier activism in the defense of economic liberties. We owe the phrase to Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE, who used it in two 1938 opinions to signal a new judicial deference to legislative judgments. In UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938), Stone said that an ECONOMIC REGULATION, challenged as a violation of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS or of EQUAL PROTECTION, would be upheld unless demonstrated facts should "preclude the assumption that it rests upon some rational basis within the knowledge and experience of the legislators." In South Carolina State Highway Department v. Barnwell Brothers, Inc. (1938), Stone proposed "rational basis" as the standard for reviewing STATE REGULATIONS OF COMMERCE. (Later, Stone would accept the necessity for more exacting judicial scrutiny of such laws.) To complete the process, the Court adopted the same deferential posture toward congressional judgments that local activities substantially affected INTERSTATE COMMERCE and thus might be regulated by Congress under the COMMERCE POWER. In all its uses, "rational basis" represents a strong presumption of the constitutionality of legislation.

Yet even so minimal a standard of JUDICIAL REVIEW does, in theory, call for some judicial scrutiny of the rationality of the relationship between legislative means and ends. And that scrutiny of means makes sense only if we assume that the ends themselves are constitutionally required to serve general, public aims; otherwise, every law would be self-justifying, as precisely apt for achieving the advantages and disadvantages it achieves. Although the Court has sometimes suggested in economic regulation cases that even a search for legislative rationality lies beyond the scope of the judicial function, some such judicial scrutiny is required if our courts are to give effect to generalized constitutional guarantees of liberty and equality. Today's assumption, therefore, is that a law depriving a person of liberty or of equal treatment is invalid unless, at a minimum, it is a rational means for achieving a legitimate legislative purpose.

Even so relaxed a standard of review appears to call for a judicial inquiry always beset by uncertainties and often dominated by fictitious assumptions. Hans Linde has demonstrated the unreality attendant on judicial efforts to identify the "purposes" served by a law adopted by legislators with diverse objectives, or objectives only tenuously connected to the public good. Lacking sure guidance as to those "purposes"—which may have changed in the years since the law was adopted—a court must rely on counsel's assertions and its own assumptions. But in its inception the rational basis standard was not so much a mode of inquiry as a formula for validating legislation. Thus, in MCGOWAN V. MARYLAND (1961), the Supreme Court said, "A statutory discrimination will not be set aside if any state of facts reasonably may be conceived to justify it." Part of the reason why the rational basis standard survives in federal constitutional law is that it is normally taken seriously only in its permissive feature (United States Railroad Retirement Board v. Fritz, 1980). A number of state courts, interpreting STATE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, do take the rational basis standard to require a serious judicial examination of the reasonableness of legislation. And the Supreme Court itself, in its late-1960s forays into the reaches of equal protection doctrine lying beyond racial equality, sometimes labeled legislative classifications as "irrational" even as it insisted that state-imposed inequalities be justified against more exacting standards of review. (See HARPER V. VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF ELECTIONS; LEVY V. LOUISIANA; SHAPIRO V. THOMPSON.) Since that time, the explicit recognition of different levels of judicial scrutiny of legislation has allowed the Court to reserve the rhetoric of rational basis for occasions thought appropriate for judicial modesty, in particular its review of "economic and social regulation." Some substantive interests call for heightened judicial scrutiny of legislative incursions into them; absent such considerations, the starting point for constitutional analysis remains the rational basis standard.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

LINDE, HANS A. 1976 Due Process of Lawmaking. Nebraska Law Review 55:197–255.

RATIONAL BASIS
(Update)

For decades, the rational basis test seemed so deferential that no law could flunk it. In the 1980s, however, the Supreme Court began to give teeth to the standard. For example, in CLEBURNE V. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER, INC. (1985), the Court used the rational basis test to strike down a Texas municipality's ZONING law that had been used to impede the creation of a group home for persons suffering from MENTAL ILLNESS.

By the 1990s, the rational basis test was no longer meek. It was explicitly used to invalidate state laws in two of the Court's most important CIVIL RIGHTS cases, HODGSON V. MINNESOTA (1990) and ROMER V. EVANS (1996). Hodgson was the first case in which Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR voted to hold an ABORTION law unconstitutional. It dealt with a Minnesota law regulating the circumstances under which minors could obtain abortions; Minnesota required minors to get consent from both parents, rather than only from one. O'Connor joined an opinion by Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS in which he concluded that Minnesota's two-parent consent was "not reasonably related to any legitimate state interest." Stevens reasoned that the two-parent consent requirement was likely to be important only in those cases where the two parents were not communicating with one another, and that requiring the minor to inform both parents under such circumstances was likely to do more harm than good.

Later, in PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992), O'Connor co-authored an opinion that reaffirmed the existence of a constitutional right to get an abortion, but formulated that right in terms of the "undue burden" standard. That standard is a kind of "reasonableness" test. It is arguably more akin to a strong rational basis standard than to STRICT SCRUTINY.

In Romer, the Court reviewed an amendment to the Colorado state constitution that prohibited the state or its local jurisdictions from protecting gay rights. Writing for himself and five others, Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY announced that Colorado's law failed to survive scrutiny under the rational basis test. Kennedy explained that "the amendment seems inexplicable by anything but animus toward the class that it affects" and hence "lacks a rational relationship to legitimate state interests."

This revival of the rational basis test may reflect profound changes in attitudes toward JUDICIAL REVIEW. The deferential version of rational basis scrutiny emerged in the wake of the NEW DEAL, when the Court had damaged its reputation by obstructing economic reform. Justices and scholars felt compelled to defend the legitimacy of judicial review; Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, in particular, was an eloquent advocate for judicial restraint. Over the last three decades, however, the Court has become more secure about its power. It seems fair to say, as Professor Louis Michael Seidman did in his comment on Romer, that "[t]oday, no sitting Justice is a consistent advocate of judicial restraint." Under these changed circumstances, it is perhaps unsurprising that several of the Justices once again feel comfortable making naked judgments about the reasonableness of LEGISLATION.

CHRISTOPHER L. EISGRUBER
(2000)

Bibliography

SEIDMAN, LOUIS MICHAEL 1996 Romer's Radicalism: The Unexpected Revival of Warren Court Activism. Supreme Court Review 1996:67–122.

R. A. V. v. CITY OF ST. PAUL
505 U.S. 377 (1992)

In R. A. V. v. City of St. Paul, the Supreme Court struck down a St. Paul, Minnesota ordinance that proscribed cross-burning and other actions "which one knows or has reasonable grounds to know" will cause "anger, alarm or resentment in others on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender." The Court was unanimous that the law was unconstitutional, but agreed about little else. Four members of the Court—Justices BYRON R. WHITE, HARRY A. BLACKMUN, JOHN PAUL STEVENS, and SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR—concurred in the judgment, but solely on the ground that the ordinance was overly broad, sweeping within its proscription expression that should be protected. It is safe to assume that these Justices would have upheld a narrowly drawn statute that prohibited HATE CRIME. The other five members of the Court, in the MAJORITY OPINION of Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, reached further, characterizing the St. Paul ordinance—and presumably any content-discriminatory hate crime law—as an unconstitutional content-based regulation of speech in violation of the FIRST AMENDMENT.

In R. A. V., the defendant Robert Viktora, then a minor, was accused of burning a cross on the lawn of Russell and Laura Jones and their children, an African American family that had recently moved into the neighborhood. In moving to dismiss the indictment, Viktora asserted both that the ordinance was overbroad and that it was an unconstitutional, content-based restriction on his FREEDOM OF SPEECH. The Minnesota Supreme Court rejected the OVERBREADTH challenge because that court construed the ordinance narrowly to apply only to FIGHTING WORDS, and therefore not to apply to any expression protected by the First Amendment. Although a minority of the U.S. Supreme Court concluded that this limiting construction by the Minnesota court did not save the ordinance from overbreadth, Scalia was prepared to accept that all of the expression reached by the ordinance was proscribable. He thus had to reach the content-based challenge.

Scalia's OPINION FOR THE COURT used a limited categorical approach to the First Amendment. Acknowledging that fighting words, along with other categories of expression such as OBSCENITY and defamation, are not entitled to full First Amendment protection, Scalia asserted that these forms of expression nevertheless enjoy some limited protection and are not "entirely invisible to the Constitution." Within any of these categories, expression may be proscribed only on the basis of its categorical nature and not on the basis of its content.

Scalia's approach to the content-neutrality DOCTRINE did not purport to require the state to proscribe either all forms of proscribable speech or none at all. Rather, he identified two exceptions to the general unacceptability of content-based restrictions on expression. First, choices may be made as to which forms of speech to proscribe so long as these choices do not address the content of the expression. For example, regulations restricting obscene communications when the medium of communication is the telephone, according to Scalia, permissibly regulate the medium but not the message. Second, Scalia would also exempt from the content-neutrality rule regulations that address content for the "very reason the entire class of speech at issue is proscribable" in the first place. For example, a regulation prohibiting only obscenity "which is the most patently offensive in its prurience" would be permissible.

Scalia concluded that the St. Paul ordinance fell within neither exception. Instead, when he applied his approach to the St. Paul ordinance, he concluded that the city had established a regulation aimed directly at racist speech and biased beliefs rather than at fighting words generally or at a subgroup of fighting words selected for reasons other than the content of those words. He thus held that the ordinance impermissibly chose sides in the debate over racial prejudice. In perhaps the most famous sentence in the Court's R. A. V. opinion, Scalia wrote: "St. Paul has no such authority to license one side of a debate to fight freestyle, while requiring the other to follow Marquis of Queensbury Rules."

The ultimate reach of R. A. V. was substantially limited by the Court's decision one year later in WISCONSIN V. MITCHELL (1993), which upheld a Wisconsin hate crime law providing enhanced penalties for crimes motivated by racial bias.

FREDERICK M. LAWRENCE
(2000)

Bibliography

LAWRENCE, FREDERICK M. 1993 Resolving the Hate Crimes/Hate Speech Paradox: Punishing Bias Crimes and Protecting Racist Speech. Notre Dame Law Review 68:673–721.

SYMPOSIUM 1991 Free Speech and Religious, Racial and Sexual Harassment. William and Mary Law Review 32:207–351.

RAWLE, WILLIAM
(1759–1836)

A Philadelphia lawyer and Federalist, Rawle declined GEORGE WASHINGTON's offer to become the first attorney general of the United States. As United States attorney for Pennsylvania, he was the government prosecutor in the cases arising from the WHISKEY REBELLION (1794) and FRIES' REBELLION (1798). Rawle also advocated the existence of a FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES. He is best remembered as one of the earliest COMMENTATORS ON THE CONSTITUTION. His New View of the Constitution (1825) was widely used as a textbook. Although he was a nationalist, he was the first to advocate the right of state SECESSION.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

RAYMOND MOTOR TRANSPORTATION COMPANY v. RICE
434 U.S. 429 (1978)

Continuing a line of decisions begun in SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY V. ARIZONA (1945), an 8–0 Supreme Court struck down a state highway regulation as an unconstitutional burden on INTERSTATE COMMERCE. A Wisconsin statute barred trucks over fifty-five feet in length from state highways as a safety measure. Two trucking companies challenged the law under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. A strong demonstration that the law made, at best, a negligible contribution to highway safety combined with the state's failure to provide an adequate defense of the measure led the Court to override the strong presumption usually given such laws.

In Kassel v. Consolidated Freightways Corp. of Delaware (1981), Iowa made a "more serious effort to support the safety rationale of its [fifty-five foot limit] than did Wisconsin in Raymond," but a 6–3 Court, relying on Raymond, struck down the Iowa statute on the same grounds.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

READ, GEORGE
(1733–1798)

George Read of Delaware was a signer of both the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE and the Constitution. A frequent speaker at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, he favored a consolidated national government and proposed abolition of state boundaries. He was a leader of the ratification movement in Delaware, and later he served as state chief justice and as a United States senator.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

REAGAN, RONALD
(1911– )

Born in Tampico, Illinois, brought up in Dixon, Illinois, a graduate of Eureka College, Illinois, Ronald Reagan came from the American Midwest, while his adult life was largely spent in California, leading to a classic California combination of midwestern seriousness of purpose and California casualness of style. Coming to maturity in 1932, he was first a convinced follower of FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, changing his political beliefs in response to his perceptions of communist infiltration in the late 1940s, and formally becoming a Republican only in 1962. A radio announcer as a young man, then an actor (playing in more than fifty motion pictures), then for three years an Army captain, then for five years president of the Screen Actors Guild, he became a spokesman for the General Electric Company, traveling nationally to speak to company employees and civic groups on domestic and patriotic themes. In 1966 he defeated five other candidates to win the Republican nomination for governor of California and was then elected over the incumbent Edmund Brown by a historic margin of nearly one million votes. He was easily reelected in 1970. His two terms as governor of the most populous state in the Union were marked by a dramatic reduction in the number of welfare recipients, a small increase in the number of state employees, and a large increase in the funding of higher education.

In 1976 he fell sixty votes short of defeating President GERALD R. FORD for the Republican nomination for the presidency. In 1980 he defeated five other candidates to capture the nomination, and he won the presidential election by a landslide of 489 electoral votes. In 1984 he was reelected, this time taking the votes of forty-nine of the fifty states and emerging in a position to put his stamp on the judiciary of the nation.

Three themes characterize President Reagan's approach to the Constitution. They are the necessity of moral virtue if American democracy is to work; the importance of FEDERALISM; and the guiding force of American practices approved by the Founding Fathers. These themes run through Reagan's public pronouncements on a variety of specific topics bearing on constitutional law. For example, he has seen the solution to the problem of curbing crime in America as first restoring a sense of moral seriousness to the criminal trial, so that it is not seen as a bureaucratized bargaining process. At the same time, he has criticized courts for taking on tasks for which they are unfitted and so slighting their essential role of determining guilt or innocence; and he has proposed legislation limiting the use of HABEAS CORPUS review of state courts by federal judges.

Traditional functions for the courts, less federal supervision, an infusion of moral purpose—these are remedies that Reagan sees as congruent with the Constitution even as interpreted by the Supreme Court. For another example, he has opposed the imposition of RACIAL QUOTAS in EDUCATION, hiring, or housing, even when the quotas are disguised as AFFIRMATIVE ACTION. Belief in equality under the law does not in his view require reverse discrimination. Nothing in a Constitution he sees as colorblind supports a contrary conclusion. In other areas his views require constitutional amendment.

Religion is the foundation of morality, and morality is inseparable from government—this note in American politics is as old as WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS, which Reagan has frequently invoked. In Reagan's own words, "We poison our society when we remove its theological underpinnings," and again, "Without God there is no virtue because there is no prompting of conscience."

From this perspective, the Court-compelled exclusion of religious exercises from the public schools is disastrous and is unwarranted by the Constitution, which, Reagan has repeatedly remarked, says nothing about public education or prayer. In Reagan's words, the FIRST AMENDMENT "was not meant to exclude religion from our schools." Reagan has affirmed his belief in a "wall of separation" between church and state. In an American tradition as old as ROGER WILLIAMS, he sees the primary function of that wall as protecting religion from governmental intrusion. The Supreme Court, in his view, has been guilty of such intrusion.

Federalism influences this approach. The Supreme Court, interpreting the Constitution, often conceives of itself as though it were a superior, benign, and neutral agency that is not part of the national government. Reagan has cut through this position and identified the Court as the champion of a particular ideology, imposing uniform requirements in disregard of local custom. Justified where there was a national mandate to eliminate RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, the Court has acted in this way even, he believes, where it has discovered no national mandate. Reagan's criticism of the Court on RELIGION IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS not only affirms earlier American traditions; it also reflects attachment to the local autonomy that federalism fosters.

The religion Reagan refers to is biblical religion, described by him as "our Judaeo-Christian heritage." He quotes both Old and New Testaments in his public addresses. The Ten Commandments, he has observed, have not been improved upon by the millions of laws enacted since their promulgation. He issued a proclamation of National Bible Week and rejoiced that twenty-five states followed suit. He sees no constitutional barrier to a believer, as President, acknowledging the God of the Bible, speaking of the moral values he derives from his belief in God, and taking seriously such slogans as "one nation under God" and "in God we trust."

Public testimony to moral values based on religion has been conjoined with insistent rejection of religious intolerance. Reagan has consistently denounced bigotry, but he contends that those who have excluded biblical religion from the schools are themselves "intolerant of religion." They have denied a freedom to exercise religion as old as the practice of prayers in legislatures, the employment of chaplains by the military, and the invocation of God before opening any court. Such American traditions are his guide to the meaning of the Constitution in an area crucial for him in the formation of morality.

Critical of the Supreme Court's individual decisions in a manner sanctioned by the example of THOMAS JEFFERSON, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, Reagan has not denied the Court's authority. He has favored correction of the prayer decision by the adoption of a constitutional amendment permitting voluntary group prayer in the schools. The government in his view should tolerate and accommodate the religious beliefs, speech, and conduct of the people; it should not direct their religious beliefs, speech, or conduct. For that reason, Reagan's school prayer amendment expressly prohibits any governmental role in composing the words of prayers to be said in the public schools.

The constitutional right to abortion, announced by the Supreme Court in ROE V. WADE (1973), has been the object of repeated criticism by Reagan. He has taken the extraordinary step, for a sitting President, of publishing a book, Abortion and the Conscience of a Nation (1984), in which he declares that "there is no cause more important than affirming the transcendent right to life of all human beings, the right without which no other rights have any meaning." On January 22, 1985, the twelfth anniversary of Roe v. Wade, he addressed the prolife march in Washington as the marchers prepared once again to ask the Supreme Court to change its position, and told them that he was "proud to stand with you in the long march to protect life." No other constitutional decision of the Supreme Court has been so vigorously, persistently, and personally condemned by an American President.

Reagan has consciously used the presidency as "a bully pulpit" to proclaim that there is no proof that the child in the womb is not human; that the child in midterm and later abortion feels pain; and that over 4,000 such children are killed every day in America, 15,000,000 in the first decade since ROE V. WADE. Such facts alone, he believes, will make most people reconsider and seek reversal of Roe.

How the reversal is accomplished has not been a matter of great concern to Reagan. He endorsed reversal by amendment of the Constitution. He attempted to persuade the Senate to end a FILIBUSTER that killed the Helms Bill that would have used Congress's power under section 5 of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to define life as including the unborn. Passage of the bill (itself without sanctions) would undoubtedly have led to state legislation on abortion that would have given the Supreme Court the opportunity of looking at abortion in the light of the congressional definition. It has been speculated that Reagan believes the most practical way of effecting the result he desires is by his appointments to the Supreme Court.

In the cases of abortion and of prayer, Reagan has sought amendments reversing Supreme Court decisions that upset traditional balances. In the case of the balanced BUDGET, he has asked for something new, a constitutional restraint that would prevent federal expenditures exceeding federal revenues. The desirability of such an amendment had, however, been voiced as early as 1798 by Thomas Jefferson. In Reagan's view, a balanced budget amendment could be a powerful tool for reducing the federal establishment and restoring economic power to the states. Federalism would be enhanced by its enactment. The traditional role of the states would very likely be increased. Reagan also perceives a moral element: habitual deficit spending by the federal government is an easy evasion of responsibility. In his second Inaugural Address, on January 21, 1985, Reagan called for passage of the Balanced Budget Amendment.

Citizens and Presidents must interpret the Constitution as well as lawyers and judges. President Reagan's approach to the Constitution is not dependent on the reasoning advanced by recent Justices of the Supreme Court to justify or rationalize their decisions. He has employed older and broader criteria. For him the Constitution does not mean the gloss put upon it by opinions of the Court but the original document illumined by tangible traditions and by reflection on its foundation in moral realities. He has evidenced a strong commitment to the essentials that the Constitution presupposes and at the same time preserves.

JOHN T. NOONAN, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

REAGAN, RONALD 1984 Abortion and the Conscience of a Nation. New York: Thomas Nelson.

REAGAN, RONALD 1981–1985 Presidential Papers. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

SMITH, HEDRICK et al. 1980 Reagan the Man, the President. New York: Macmillan.

WHITE, F. CLIFTON 1980 Why Reagan Won: A Narrative History of the Conservative Movement. Chicago: Regnery Gateway.

REAGAN, RONALD
(1911– )
(Update)

No President since FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT devoted as much of his administration's attention to the courts and the Constitution as did Ronald Reagan. After a career as an actor and spokesman for General Electric, Reagan was catapulted into politics by a famous televised speech on behalf of Barry Goldwater's presidential campaign. Twice elected governor of California, Reagan was hailed as the conservative standard-bearer in his unsuccessful race for the Republican presidential nomination in 1976. He came to office in 1980 pledging to reinvigorate the idea of LIMITED GOVERNMENT—to restore what he saw as the constitutional foundations of American politics. In part, this restoration would involve restricting the federal government's encroachments on individual freedom and on the prerogatives of state governments. But more important, it would require that the doctrines stimulating the federal government's inordinate growth be publicly discredited and supplanted.

Reagan won the 1980 presidential election by a large margin and set to work to lower federal tax rates and shore up America's defenses. These tasks absorbed most of his and his administration's attention even after his still more massive electoral victory in 1984; but Reagan wished always to make the "Reagan Revolution" something broader and deeper—what he called in his 1985 State of the Union Address "a Second American Revolution." The changes in economic and defense policy won in the great legislative battles of his first term had therefore to be parlayed into a general rethinking of the purposes of American politics and, especially, of the functions served by the courts.

Large changes in American electoral politics, particularly in the wake of so-called critical or realigning elections, do eventually register on the judiciary (as in 1937, with the "switch in time" that "saves nine") and sometimes on the Constitution itself (for example, the Civil War amendments). Indeed, in Reagan's view, the LIBERALISM that he attacked had always put a high premium on control of the judiciary, from FDR's COURT-PACKING PLAN to the activism of Chief Justice EARL WARREN to President JIMMY CARTER's efforts to apply strict AFFIRMATIVE ACTION standards to judicial appointments. But Reagan faced the novel circumstance of trying to undo a series of divisive liberal measures that the Supreme Court itself had directed—the legalization of ABORTION, the expulsion of prayer from the public schools, the promulgation of the EXCLUSIONARY RULE, and so forth.

These issues were particularly important to the social conservatives who had joined with traditional Republicans and anticommunists in the 1960s and 1970s to form the coalition that would eventually sweep Reagan into office. Although Reagan campaigned both in 1980 and 1984 for the overruling of such Supreme Court decisions, he himself did little to dislodge them, except to call for constitutional amendments to protect the life of the unborn and to allow voluntary SCHOOL PRAYER in public classrooms. To confront the Court more directly would have risked alienating the more libertarian members of his coalition, which was united more by its common enemies than by common principles. Instead, he concentrated his administration's energies on the selection of judges pledged to exercise "judicial restraint" and, therefore, more likely over time to modify or overturn their predecessors' activist decisions.

It is probably in this way that the Reagan administration will have its great effect on CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. In the course of his presidency, Reagan appointed more than 400 federal judges, nearly half the federal bench, as well as three Supreme Court Justices; and he elevated WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST to CHIEF JUSTICE of the Supreme Court in 1986. All these appointments were vetted and approved by an elaborate machinery centered in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy and overseen by a newly created White House Judicial Selection Committee. Critics objected to the screening procedure, claiming that it politicized the judicial selection process by subjecting candidates to a "litmus test" on such issues as abortion and CRIMINAL PROCEDURE. But the Reagan administration denied the charge, arguing that the reviews focused not on specific issues, but on the candidates' general approach to legal and constitutional interpretation, which the President was entitled to consider, and that in any event the liberal critics were applying a double standard.

The issue was raised desultorily in some of Reagan's nominations to the Supreme Court—SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR in 1981, the first woman ever nominated (pursuant to a 1980 campaign promise by Reagan); ANTONIN SCALIA in 1986, who replaced Rehnquist when the latter was elevated to Chief Justice; and ANTHONY M. KENNEDY in 1988—but it was raised acutely in the confirmation hearings of Rehnquist and above all of Robert H. Bork. The latter was denied confirmation by the Senate after a long, bitter, and very public struggle over the meaning of "judicial restraint" and of what Attorney General Edwin Meese had called "a jurisprudence of original intention." After Bork's defeat, Reagan nominated Douglas H. Ginsburg, who was forced to withdraw on account of disclosures about his personal life and controversy over his conduct as Justice Department attorney. Shortly thereafter, Reagan nominated Kennedy, who finally assumed the seat vacated by Justice LEWIS F. POWELL half a year earlier.

The significant question concerned the meaning of "judicial restraint." Did it mean, as its liberal critics claimed, that judges would respect only those laws and PRECEDENTS approved by conservatives and restrain all the others? Or did it entail genuine respect for the language of the Constitution and a principled deference to the rights of legislative majorities, as its defenders maintained? The controversy over "restraint" therefore pointed to the larger question of the meaning of the Constitution itself. Did the Constitution embody an ORIGINAL INTENT that judges must regard as authoritative? Liberals such as Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN argued, somewhat contradictorily, that judges could not know what the Framers' intentions 200 years ago were; that even if they could, times have changed and interpretation of the Constitution could not be bound by the views of "a world that is dead and gone"; and that what the Framers actually intended was to leave the Constitution open-ended and alive, so that it might be adjusted to changing times and values. To this, conservatives such as Bork and Rehnquist replied that the Framers' intentions were either clearly spelled out in the Constitution or not, and if not, then it was up to Congress or the states to make law as they saw fit.

But this answer begged the question of whether in ascertaining the Framers' intentions a distinction did not have to be made between the spirit and the letter of the Constitution; or, to put it differently, whether precisely in order to understand the Constitution as the Framers understood it, one did not have to distinguish between its principles and the application (or compromise) of those principles, for example, in the so-called three-fifths compromise. The alternative to seeking such principles as a ground of the Constitution's authority was to accept the letter of the law as itself the highest authority, or more exactly, to accept as just and lawful whatever the sovereign majority decreed in the Constitution or in statute law, no matter how irrational or unjust. That is to say, the alternative was a form of legal POSITIVISM or formalism. That Bork's position came close to this became painfully clear in the debate over the RIGHT OF PRIVACY during his confirmation hearings. In short, although his JURISPRUDENCE emphatically rejected judicial tyranny, it did not seem to afford a principled defense against majority tyranny. To that extent, it fell short of the NATURAL LAW principles that justified limited government and that had informed the "original intention" of the Constitution's Framers.

As President, Reagan relied on his Justice Department and SOLICITOR GENERAL to encourage the narrowing of the liberal precedents left over from the Warren and Burger courts. The administration succeeded in persuading the Supreme Court to enlarge existing exceptions to the exclusionary rule, to create new ones, and to narrow the acceptable occasions for court-ordered affirmative-action remedies. But Reagan refused to issue an EXECUTIVE ORDER forbidding set-asides and other forms of reverse discrimination in executive-branch contracts and was saddled with an amended Voting Rights Act (1982) that went far toward establishing proportional representation (i.e., quotas) for selected minorities as the paramount goal of legislative redistricting. The Reagan administration's reluctance to face a public debate on CIVIL RIGHTS and affirmative action left it vulnerable to attack by the advocates of racial and ethnic entitlements who insisted that anyone who was against the "empowerment" of favored minorities through RACIAL QUOTAS (although the dread word was seldom used) was against civil rights.

Although his administration did much to remind the American people that a strong, purposeful President could initiate profound political change, Reagan was often frustrated by Congress. In a remarkable victory that, along with Reagan's landslide electoral win, seemed to promise a fundamental shift in American politics, the Republicans gained control of the SENATE in 1980—only to lose it six years later; they never came close to taking control of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. The result was divided government and a long running battle over foreign and domestic policy in which the administration had the upper hand only in its first two years. From these struggles arose at least two interesting lines of constitutional controversy.

The first concerned FOREIGN AFFAIRS, specifically, the scope of the President's discretion under statute law and the Constitution to order covert activities abroad. Stung by congressional opposition to its initial program of "covert" aid to the forces seeking to overthrow the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua, the administration turned to a more overt strategy of aid, appealing directly to the Congress and the people for support. Although sometimes endorsing Reagan's commitment to arm resistance fighters in communist-controlled countries (e.g., in Afghanistan), the Congress vacillated on aid to the Contras fighting in Nicaragua. During Reagan's presidency, at least two versions of the BOLAND AMENDMENT were passed, along with two or three later modifications of the amendment, each restricting Contra aid in different and conflicting ways.

Against the background of Reagan's desire to support the Nicaraguan resistance, and his need to exploit the ambiguities of the Boland Amendment in order to do so, arose the IRAN-CONTRA AFFAIR—a tangled enterprise run out of the National Security Council (NSC) and aimed at a deal involving the release of hostages held by pro-Iranian terrorists, arms sales to Iran, and the diversion of profits to the Contras in Nicaragua. Fearing another WATERGATE scandal, the administration discharged the accused parties, launched its own inside and outside investigations, called for an INDEPENDENT COUNSEL, and cooperated with two congressional committees appointed to investigate the affair. The larger legal questions turned on whether or not the NSC was covered by the Boland Amendment's ban on aiding the Contras; the constitutional question as to whether or not the President's authority as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF (or his oath of office) enabled him to act, for the sake of salus populi, on the margins of or even against a congressional statute. In the event, the constitutional issue was quickly eclipsed by the debate over the statutory question and by the dramatic testimony and trial of Oliver North, a hitherto obscure NSC staffer.

In other foreign-policy matters, Reagan enjoyed a wide latitude. He committed U.S. forces to Lebanon, to the raid on Libya, to the liberation of Grenada, and to protection of Kuwaiti oil tankers in the Persian Gulf without invoking the War Powers Resolution and indeed with minimal congressional consultation.

The second interesting line of skirmishes between the Reagan administration and Congress concerned the executive's independence on the domestic front. Here, many administration officials were keen to reign in the authority of the SPECIAL PROSECUTORS created by the Ethics in Government Act for the specific purpose of investigating members of the executive branch, and to curtail the proliferating means of congressional influence over the executive agencies. On the former topic, the Reagan administration argued that the law establishing special prosecutors violated the SEPARATION OF POWERS by impinging on the executive's right to initiate, conduct, and terminate criminal prosecutions and led, in many cases, to the criminalizing of policy differences. But the Supreme Court upheld the law by a 7–1 vote in Morrison v. Olson (1988).

On the latter question—the extension of congressional power over the executive and independent agencies—Reagan faced even greater opposition. Although the administration convinced the Supreme Court of the unconstitutionality of the LEGISLATIVE VETO in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), Congress continued to pass (and Reagan continued to sign) laws containing such provisions, as well as the even more dubious "committee veto," whereby executive branch decisions may be disallowed by the vote of a single congressional committee.

But the legislative veto was only one of a multitude of ways by which the Congress and its swarm of subcommittees harassed the Reagan administration. In particular, Reagan's appointees complained of the "micromanagement" of the executive agencies by subcommittee chairs and individual members of Congress cajoling and threatening on behalf of their constituents and other friendly interest groups. By this tactic, members of Congress could pass broad, vaguely worded laws serving popular causes and then take credit for saving their constituents from the onerous consequences of the very same laws. The use of omnibus continuing resolutions in place of budget bills was yet another tactic to restrict the executive branch's freedom to veto specific budget bills and its right to decide how to execute the programs funded in the bills.

Reagan himself did not take a leading role in protesting what he regarded as these legislative encroachments on the executive, leaving his subordinates to do most of the disputing. He did vehemently object to being presented with the choice of either signing or vetoing at one stroke the entire BUDGET of the federal government, but nevertheless signed the mammoth Continuing Resolution and Fiscal Year 1988 Budget Reconciliation Act. Rather than precipitate a fiscal, political, and constitutional crisis, he chose to reemphasize his call for two constitutional amendments—one creating a LINE-ITEM VETO for the President and the other mandating a BALANCED BUDGET—to strengthen the hand of future Presidents.

For a conservative President, Reagan appealed for an unusual number of constitutional amendments. In part, this was a backhanded admission of his reluctance to engage in direct costly political combat over the budget, school prayer, abortion, and other controversial subjects. This reluctance was not so much temperamental as it was a reflection of a strategic political decision he had made before entering office in 1980, a decision to try to control the national political agenda by concentrating on two critical issues: reducing taxes and strengthening America's defenses. Of course, Reagan's decision was also shaped by the internal weaknesses of his own coalition, which he was never sufficiently able to overcome to bring about a thoroughgoing political realignment like the NEW DEAL.

Perhaps his greatest constitutional achievement did not have to do with the institutions of government at all. Reagan strove mightily to restore Americans' confidence in themselves as a fundamental force for good in the world, and in his speeches he seldom failed to remind his fellow citizens of a connection with the heroes and statesmen of the American past. In this way, he helped revive their faith in the goodness of the Constitution itself, a faith that had been sorely tried in the dark decades of the 1960s and 1970s.

CHARLES R. KESLER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Bork Nomination; Budget Process; Congress and Foreign Policy; Congressional War Powers; Conservatism; Presidential War Powers; Race-Consciousness; Racial Discrimination; Racial Preference; Rehnquist Court; Senate and Foreign Policy; War Powers.)

Bibliography

JONES, CHARLES O., ed. 1988 The Reagan Legacy: Promise and Performance. Chatham, N.J.: Chatham House.

JONES, GORDON S. and MARINI, JOHN, eds. 1988 The Imperial Congress: Crisis in the Separation of Powers. New York: Pharos Books.

MAHONEY, DENNIS J. and SCHRAMM, PETER W., eds. 1987 The 1984 Election and the Future of American Politics. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press.

REAGAN, RONALD 1980–1989 Presidential Papers. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

REAGAN v. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO.
154 U.S. 362 (1894)

In a grotesque opinion the Supreme Court unanimously held unconstitutional a rate schedule fixed by a state railroad commission. Justice DAVID BREWER for the Court had no doubt that the economic validity of rates was subject to JUDICIAL REVIEW, and he found that these rates were "unjust and unreasonable," meaning too low in the estimate of the Court. They resulted, he said with exaggeration, in "a practical destruction to rights of property." Four years later, in SMYTH V. AMES (1898), the Court finally adopted SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS as the basis for such a ruling, but in this case the Court seemed unready to embrace such an extravagant position, despite previous flirtations with it. Here the Court cast about for something more familiar and found it in the concepts of EQUAL PROTECTION and JUST COMPENSATION, which it united. The difficulty was that the just compensation clause of the Fifth Amendment bound only the national government, not the states, and it applied only in cases of EMINENT DOMAIN, when private property was taken for a PUBLIC PURPOSE. Nothing of that sort had happened here. Brewer, however, declared that the commission's rates denied "equal protection which is the constitutional right of all owners of other property," and then he ruled that the equal protection clause "forbids legislation . . . by which the property of one individual is, without compensation, wrested from him for the benefit of another, or of the public." Thus the Court incorporated the substance of the just compensation clause of the Fifth Amendment into the Fourteenth for the benefit of railroads, though the Court refused in other cases of this period to incorporate into the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT the rights that protected accused persons or victims of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.) Moreover, this was not a case of eminent domain and the property of the railroad was not "wrested" without compensation. More rationally, Brewer sought to devise an economic test for determining the reasonableness of a rate schedule: whether the rate was equivalent to the market value of the use of the property. That economists found such a test to be unsound was not so significant as the Court's arrogating to itself the power to determine reasonableness by economic criteria that thrust it into judgments better suited to legislative and administrative agencies. (See ECONOMIC REGULATION AND THE CONSTITUTION.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

REAL EVIDENCE

Real evidence is supplied by a thing that is inspected by the jury, or other trier of fact. (Statements by witnesses are called testimonial evidence.) The acquisition and use of real evidence in the criminal process intersects with constitutional doctrine in various ways. For example, the EXCLUSIONARY RULE may forbid the offering of evidence—such as a gun or a bag containing marijuana—that has been obtained in an unconstitutional SEARCH AND SEIZURE. Correspondingly, the probability that such real evidence will be found in a particular place may, under the doctrine of PROBABLE CAUSE, justify the issuance of a SEARCH WARRANT.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

REAPPORTIONMENT

Direct democracy is not possible in a nation as populous as the United States is now, or even as it was in 1787 when the Constitution of the United States was drafted. Accordingly, the objective was then, and is now, to devise and implement as fair and effective a plan of democratic REPRESENTATION as possible.

The idea of fair and effective representation at each level of government was not new in 1787. The search for such a formula lies at the center of Anglo-American political thought. In 1690 JOHN LOCKE sought to abolish England's rotten boroughs by urging that, "it being the interest as well as the intention of the people, to have a fair and equal representation, whoever brings it nearest to that is an undoubted friend to and establisher of the government, and cannot miss the consent and approbation of the community."

Although Britain did not put an end to its rotten boroughs until near the middle of the twentieth century, the issue of how best to structure a truly representative government was very much alive at the time the various proposals for the American Constitution were being debated. At last a compromise was struck in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, giving equal representation to each state in the Senate and representation based on population in the House of Representatives. Article I, section 2, of the Constitution provides that "Representatives . . . shall be apportioned among the several states . . . according to their respective numbers . . . ," with recomputation of the apportionment every ten years, and each state to have at least one representative regardless of population. But the task of fixing the formula for the apportioning process was left to Congress, and no directions at all were established to guide the states in the parallel function of allocating seats in the state legislature or in local governmental bodies. We are not, however, left entirely in doubt about what Congress thought appropriate for apportionment in the states. The NORTHWEST ORDINANCE of 1787 provided that representation in the territorial legislatures to be created in that area should be based on population. In general, the states accepted the principle of reasonably equal population among legislative districts, but the principle was often modified by assurances of at least one representative from each county or township or municipality. Departures from population equality may not have been egregious in this time of mostly rural dispersal; but by the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries what had once been minor deviations became major divergences.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS observed in 1839 that the division of sovereign powers between the states and the nation, as set out in the Constitution, gave us "the most complicated government on the face of the globe." The twentieth century has proved how right he was. The interaction between increasingly potent national and state governments, frequently aggravated by friction arising out of competition for power, has produced a delicately balanced division of power and a complexity of relationships probably unsurpassed in the history of governmental institutions.

Yet it is the proud boast of FEDERALISM in the United States that the governments of the fifty states and that of the nation can work together in common purpose rather than in a relationship of competition and mistrust. Moreover, it is a basic premise of representative democracy in the United States that the people are entitled to representation somewhat in proportion to their numbers, at every level of government. The tradition of majority rule cannot otherwise be attained. Neither the division of sovereign powers prescribed in the federal system nor the fairness of legislative representation formulas can long be left unattended. Vigilant superintendence by an informed electorate is essential.

Even the wisest political scientists have difficulty in defining the precise meaning of representative democracy. There is, however, general agreement that representative democracy in the United States includes something of liberty, equality, and majority rule. Even though these qualities are scarcely less abstract, it can surely be said that representative democracy relates to the processes by which citizens exert control over their leaders. From the time of the Constitutional Convention debate has centered on the extent to which, and the ways in which, majority control over leaders should be exercised. Congress has wrestled with the issue, with inconclusive results. In 1842, for example, Congress required each state to establish compact, contiguous, single-member congressional districts as nearly equal in population as possible. These criteria, however, lapsed in 1911. In any event, no enforcement method had been established, and the courts considered the issue none of their business.

Not until more than a hundred years after the RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION in 1789 did such states as California, Illinois, Michigan, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, responding to new pressures, abandon the equal-population principle in one or both houses. So widespread had been the original acceptance of the equality concept that no fewer than thirty-six of the original state constitutions provided that representation in both houses of the state legislature would be based completely, or predominantly, on population. Between 1790 and 1889 no state was admitted to the Union in which its original constitution did not provide for representation principally based on population in both houses of the state legislature.

To speak of the equal-population principle as the basis for apportionment of those nineteenth-century legislatures is not to say that there was mathematically precise equality among the districts at that time. The western states, for example, commonly relied on county lines in drawing their apportionment formulas. The distortions that resulted from assuring each county at least one representative, for example, or from grouping whole counties to form election districts, were much less pronounced in agricultural and rural America than in present-day industrial and urban America. The population of the United States, outside the few great commercial centers in the East, was spread thinly across the face of the country.

The drift from relative equality to substantial inequality would have moved at about the same pace as the shift in population from rural to urban America; and that would have been bad enough. But some states accelerated the trend away from the equality principle by other devices as well. As state legislatures were enlarged, additional seats were granted to the areas of new growth without diminishing representation of the declining population areas. As the population of rural areas declined, state legislatures abandoned even the formal acceptance of equal population as a controlling principle, typically guaranteeing each county (or township) one representative. Some states, unable or unwilling to change the constitutional requirement for equality among districts, simply ignored the mandate for decennial change. (Tennessee is a good example; the state constitutional requirement of reapportionment every ten years was ignored between 1901 and 1961, giving rise in 1962 to BAKER V. CARR.)

The consequence of these factors, singly or in combination, was by the middle of the twentieth century a remarkable skewing of voter impact, ordinarily giving the less populated areas of a state a disproportionate influence in legislative representation. The impact was most marked at the state and local legislative levels, but not without considerable influence on congressional districting as well.

By the middle of the twentieth century the disparities in legislative representation were marked. Thus, in the then ninety-nine state legislative chambers (forty-nine bicameral legislatures plus the Nebraska unicameral legislature), thirty-two relied in large part on population; eight used population, but with weighted ratios; forty-five combined population and area considerations; eight granted representation to each unit; five had fixed constitutional apportionments; and one (the New Hampshire Senate) was based on state tax payments. These conclusions somewhat understate the actual disregard of population as the basis of representation because this summary is drawn exclusively from the state constitutional requirements, without adjustment for violation of those provisions.

The time has come to ask: what is (re)apportionment and what is (re)districting? The question is well put, for the terms are sometimes (confusingly) used interchangeably. But there is a difference. Apportionment is ordinarily described as the allocation of legislative seats by a legislative body to a subordinate unit of government, and districting as the process of drawing the final lines by which each legislative district is bounded. Thus, Congress apportions the number of congressional districts to which each state is entitled, based on population figures disclosed at each decennial census. Each state legislature then draws lines that divide the state into as many congressional districts as have been allocated to it by Congress.

State legislatures, on the other hand, both apportion the distribution of state legislative seats and draw the district lines that determine which voters will make each selection. Therein lies the problem, clearly rooted in the political ambition of each political group to overcome its opposition, before the voting begins, on the basis of the dispersion of voters eligible to vote for one candidate rather than another.

By the early 1960s the act and the impact of malapportionment were everywhere apparent, typically to the apparent disadvantage of individual voters in heavily populated districts and to the apparent advantage of voters in sparsely populated districts. Despite the fact that many state constitutions required reapportionment every ten years and included formulas requiring approximate population equality, no legislative chamber came closer to that goal than two to one, and the disparity between most populous to least populous district was in many states more than ten to one and in several more than one hundred to one. To put the matter another way, in twelve states fewer than twenty percent of the voters lived in districts that elected a majority of the state senators, and in seven states fewer than thirty percent of the voters lived in districts that elected a majority of the members of the lower house.

State courts occasionally acted to deal with the most egregious abuses, but the federal courts, until 1962, adamantly refused to intervene. Although the Supreme Court had long recognized the right of citizens to vote free of arbitrary impairment by STATE ACTION when such impairment resulted from dilution by false tally or by stuffing of the ballot box, the Court had declined to deal with apportionment and districting abuses on the grounds that the issue was not justiciable, that is, not appropriate for federal judicial intervention. As Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER said in COLEGROVE V. GREEN (1946), "Courts ought not to enter this political thicket."

Finally, the case of interference with the exercise of the franchise was made so clearly that a majority of the Court was persuaded that only federal judicial intervention could put an end to this denial of equality. The case that triggered this change in attitude provided a dramatic illustration of flagrant abuse of voter rights by a state legislature that had openly flouted its own state constitution for more than half a century.

The Tennessee Constitution had required, since 1870, that the number of senators and representatives in the general assembly "be apportioned among the several counties or districts, according to the number of qualified electors in each. . . ." Moreover, the state constitution required reapportionment in accordance with the equal-population standard every ten years. Between 1901 and 1961, however, the legislature had not acted on the matter. As a result, thirty-seven percent of the Tennessee voters lived in districts that elected twenty of the thirty-three senators, and forty percent of the voters lived in districts that elected sixty-three of the ninety-nine members of the lower house. The federal court challenge was brought by voters in urban areas of the state, who invoked the Constitution of the United States and claimed that they had been denied the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS, "by virtue of the debasement of their votes."

The resulting Supreme Court decision, Baker v. Carr, did not rule on the substance of the equality claim, but did hold that the issue was properly within the JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS and was justiciable. Only Justices Frankfurter and JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN dissented.

Within two years the Supreme Court signaled how it would decide the equality issue. GRAY V. SANDERS (1963), while not strictly an apportionment case, involved the closely related issue of voter discrimination. The election practice there challenged was the Georgia "county-unit" system, as it applied to statewide primaries: a candidate for nomination who received the highest number of popular votes in a county was considered to have carried the county and to be entitled to two votes for each representative to which the county was entitled in the lower house of the general assembly. The majority of the county unit vote was required to nominate a candidate for United States senator or state governor, while a plurality was sufficient for nomination of candidates for other offices. Because the most populous county (Fulton, with a 1960 population of 556,326) had only six unit votes, while the least populous county (Echols, with a 1960 population of 1,876) had two unit votes, "one resident in Echols County had an influence in the nomination of candidates equivalent to 99 residents of Fulton County."

Georgia argued that, because the ELECTORAL COLLEGE permitted substantial inequalities in voter representation in a "winner-take-all" system, parallel systems should be permitted to the states. Moreover, the state argued that because United States senators represent widely divergent numbers of voters, the same should be permitted in one house of a state legislature. But the Supreme Court rejected all such analogies as inapposite: "The inclusion of the electoral college in the Constitution, as the result of specific historical concerns, validated the collegiate principle despite its inherent numerical inequality, but implied nothing about the use of an analogous system by a State in a statewide election. No such specific accommodation of the latter was ever undertaken, and therefore no validation of its numerical equality ensued."

While conceding that states "can within limits specify the qualifications of voters both in state and federal elections," the Court denied that a state is entitled to weight the votes "once the geographical unit for which a representative is to be chosen is designated. . . ." Accordingly, the Court concluded: "The conception of political equality from the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, to Lincoln's Gettysburg Address to the FIFTEENTH, SEVENTEENTH, and NINETEENTH AMENDMENTS can mean only one thing—ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE." The fatal defect in the Georgia plan was that the votes were weighted on the basis of geography as an expression of legislative preference for rural over urban voters.

The next franchise case decided by the Supreme Court with full opinion, WESBERRY V. SANDERS (1964), was also not a state legislative apportionment case; it was a congressional districting case not very dissimilar from Colegrove v. Green—except in result. Plaintiffs were qualified voters of Fulton County, Georgia, entitled to vote in the state's fifth congressional district, which had a 1960 population of 823,680, as compared with the 272,154 residents of the ninth district.

After the decision in Baker v. Carr, the Court had little difficulty deciding that such issues were justiciable in federal courts. The substantive ruling, however, came as something of a surprise. Plaintiffs had argued principally that the gross population disparities violated the equal protection clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The Supreme Court, however, adopted what had been a subordinate contention, that the Georgia arrangement violated Article I, section 2, of the Constitution, which prescribed that representatives be chosen "by the People of the several States." Justice HUGO L. BLACK, writing for the majority of six, stated that this provision, when construed in its historical context, means "that as nearly as practicable one man's vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as another's. . . . To say that a vote is worth more in one district than in another would not only run counter to our fundamental ideas of democratic government, it would cast aside the principle of a House of Representatives elected "by the People,' a principle tenaciously fought for and established at the Constitutional Convention." That result, at first surprising in view of the nonspecific constitutional text, was well supported in the Court's review of the relevant history. For example, at the Constitutional Convention JAMES WILSON of Pennsylvania had said that "equal numbers of people ought to have an equal number of representatives," and representatives "of different districts ought clearly to hold the same proportion to each other, as their respective constituents hold to each other."

Reliance on section 2 of Article I rather than on the equal protection clause has had significant consequences. From that date forward the Court has been less tolerant of population variations among congressional districts than of those in state legislative districts, as to which the population-equality principle has, since REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964), been based on the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Reynolds v. Sims and its five companion cases completed the original round of apportionment and districting cases and constituted the foundation on which all subsequent litigation has built. On June 15, 1964, the Court invalidated the state legislative apportionment and districting structure in Alabama (the Reynolds case), Colorado, Delaware, Maryland, New York, and Virginia. One week later the Court struck down the formulas in nine additional states, foretelling a complete reapportionment revolution.

Reynolds v. Sims was illustrative. The complaint in that case alleged that the last legislative reapportionment in the state had been based on the 1900 federal census despite a state constitutional requirement for decennial reapportionment. Accordingly, because the population growth had been uneven, urban counties were severely disadvantaged by the state legislature's failure to reapportion every ten years and by the state constitution's provision requiring each of the sixty-seven counties to have at least one representative in the lower house with a membership of 106. The Supreme Court of the United States ruled unequivocally in favor of the equal-population principle: "We hold that, as a basic constitutional standard, the Equal Protection Clause requires that the seats in both houses of a bicameral state legislature must be apportioned on a population basis. Simply stated, an individual's right to vote for state legislators is unconstitutionally impaired when its weight is in a substantial fashion diluted when compared with votes of citizens living in other parts of the state."

The decisions in Wesberry and Reynolds required adjustment of congressional districting practices in all states (except the few states with only one representative each) and of all state legislative districting practices. Despite considerable adverse reaction in the beginning and substantial litigation to determine the full significance of the decisions, by and large compliance was secured; and further adjustments were made after the results of the 1970 and 1980 censuses were determined.

Two principal types of questions remained to be worked out after the first decisions were announced: how equal is "equal" in congressional districting and in state legislative apportionment and districting? and to what extent does the equal-population principle apply to the thousands of local governmental units and the even larger number of special districts that serve multitudinous quasi-governmental purposes?

Despite criticism of the Reynolds decision based on an assumption that the Court had demanded mathematical exactness among election districts, the Court explicitly acknowledged the permissibility of some variation: "We realize that it is a practical impossibility to arrange legislative districts so that each one has an identical number of residents, or citizens, or voters. Mathematical exactness or precision is hardly a workable constitutional requirement." The important obligation is for each state to "make an honest and good faith effort to construct districts, in both houses of its legislature, as nearly of equal population as is practicable."

From the beginning the Reynolds Court acknowledged that states could continue to place some reliance on political subdivision lines, at least in drawing the lines for state legislative bodies. "Since almost invariably there is a significantly larger number of seats in state legislative bodies to be distributed within a state than congressional seats, it may be feasible to use political subdivision lines to a greater extent in establishing state legislative districts than in congressional districting while still affording adequate representation to all parts of the State." A further reason for at least limited adherence to local political subdivision lines is the highly pragmatic proposition that, to do otherwise, "[i]ndiscriminate districting, without any regard for political subdivisions, may be little more than an invitation to partisan gerrymandering."

Acknowledging the principle that population deviations are permissible in state districting implementation of rational state policy, the Supreme Court has recognized that de minimis numerical deviations are unavoidable. Maximum deviations in Connecticut of 7.83 percent among house districts and 1.81 percent among senate districts were upheld in Gaffney v. Cummings (1973). Texas deviations of 9.9 and 1.82 percent respectively among house and senate districts were similarly approved in White v. Regester (1973). In MAHAN V. HOWELL (1973) the Court upheld a Virginia plan despite a maximum deviation of 16.4 percent, on the grounds that the plan could "reasonably be said to advance the rational state policy of respecting the boundaries of political subdivisions," but cautioned that "this percentage may well approach tolerable limits."

The requirement of population equality is far more exacting in the drawing of congressional district lines. In Kirkpatrick v. Preisler (1969) the Court struck down Missouri's 1967 Redistricting Act despite the fact that the most populous district was 3.13 percent larger and the least populous 2.84 percent smaller than the average district. In explanation the Court stated, "Since 'equal representation for equal numbers of people [is] the fundamental goal for the House of Representatives,' the 'as nearly as practicable' standard requires that the State make a good faith effort to achieve precise mathematical equality. Unless population variances among congressional districts are shown to have resulted despite such effort, the State must justify each variance, no matter how small." In Karcher v. Daggett (1983) the Supreme Court invalidated a deviation of less than one percent among New Jersey congressional districts because the state had failed to make "a good-faith effort to achieve precise mathematical equality" in population among its congressional districts. In sum, because local units of government are less important as factors in the representation of relatively large numbers of persons in the Congress than for smaller numbers of persons in the state legislature, population deviations among congressional districts are strictly scrutinized, while a more tolerant review is accorded state districting. But even in state districting the excesses of the past are no longer tolerable; above the de minimis level deviations must be held within narrow limits and must be justified in terms of preservation of political subdivisions, compactness and contiguity of districts, and respect for natural or historical boundaries.

No matter how close the judicial superintendence of population equality, one problem remains. In congressional and state legislative districting alike, even the most exact adherence to the equal-population principle does not assure protection against legislative line-drawers who seek partisan advantage out of the process. "GERRYMANDER" is the term used to describe such efforts to preserve partisan power or to extend such power through manipulative use of the process. The term originated in 1812 in Massachusetts, where political maneuvering had produced a salamander-shaped district which was named after ELBRIDGE GERRY, then governor. From that time forward the gerrymander has been an altogether too-common fact of American political life. Nevertheless, despite repeated attempts to persuade the Supreme Court to enter this new "political thicket," the Court has denied that there is any constitutional ground for superintending the apportionment and districting process other than the equal-population principle. Accordingly, the states remain free, so far as the United States Constitution is concerned, to construct congressional and state legislative districts that resemble salamanders or other equally peculiar creatures. And many state legislatures have done just that, particularly where one party is in secure control of the state legislative process. Where party control of the two houses of a bicameral legislature is divided, or where the governor is of a different party, the drawing of congressional and state legislative district lines is likely to be worked out by political compromise or, that failing, by the courts.

More seemly alternatives are possible, but they are not often adopted in the absence of JUDICIAL REVIEW over the process except as to population equality among districts. Congress has the authority to set standards of compactness and contiguity that would avoid the worst abuses and could be enforced in the courts. State legislatures could adopt similar standards to control the process within their own states, but few political leaders are willing to relinquish the prospect of present or future partisan advantage to be secured out of the districting process.

Like state legislative districting, the districting of counties, municipalities, or other local governmental units is constitutionally permitted to deviate to some extent from full equality if it can be demonstrated that the governmental unit has made "an honest and good faith effort" to construct districts "as nearly of equal population as practicable." Local governments may use MULTIMEMBER DISTRICTS if there is a history of such representation and if such plans are not part of a deliberate attempt to dilute or cancel the voting strength of racial or political elements in the governmental unit. Despite that limitation, local governments, like states, may use ethnic or minority population data in constructing districts designed to elect representatives of that minority or ethnic group. (See UNITED JEWISH ORGANIZATION V. CAREY.)

Supreme Court intervention in the apportionment and districting process has unquestionably restructured congressional and state legislative representation. Gross population disparities among election districts have been evened out so that the democratic promise of fair representation has been made possible of realization. But no court, even so powerful a body as the Supreme Court of the United States, can assure democratic representation. The ultimate test of the democratic process will depend upon the level of concern of the voters and their willingness to insist that their legislative representatives take whatever action is necessary to prevent excesses.

There are two principal types of gerrymandering, both of which should be controlled. The bipartisan or "incumbent survival" plan is designed to assure as far as possible the reelection of incumbents, sometimes regardless of party affiliation; the technique is to distribute party registration or proven party supporters to the legislators who will benefit most. The partisan plan is designed to maintain or increase the number of seats held by the majority party; the technique is to "waste" votes of the opposition party either by concentrating the voters loyal to that party in as few districts as possible, or by dispersing the opposition voting strength among a number of districts in which it cannot command majorities. Control of these abuses is not likely to come from party leadership. Voters concerned with the integrity of the process must demand an end to such practices, calling for state constitutional amendments or statutes requiring that districts be compact and contiguous.

Redistricting should be a matter of special concern for ethnic and racial minorities, many of whom are concentrated in urban centers. Typically, minority spokesmen claim that fair representation requires districts that will elect members of their own groups. When legislatures act to meet such demands, other groups are likely to feel disadvantaged. That issue was litigated to the Supreme Court in United Jewish Organization v. Carey. In that case a New York redistricting plan had been modified to bring it into compliance with the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. In the process the act divided a community of Hasidic Jews in order to establish several substantially nonwhite districts. The Court upheld the plan, ruling that such a use of racial criteria was justified in fulfillment of congressional legislative policy in the Voting Rights Act.

Somewhat related to the issue just discussed is the question whether municipalities and other local legislative bodies should be permitted to require at-large elections for all the seats in the legislative unit. Such a practice may make it impossible for a minority group in the community to secure representation, even though one or more members of that minority might be elected if single-member districts were used. The Supreme Court held, in MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980), that multimember district elections would be tolerated, even where the impact on minority groups was demonstrated, unless it could be shown that the plan was adopted with racially discriminatory intent. However, the Voting Rights Act of 1982 overturned that ruling; under the act, invidious intent need not be shown if impact disadvantageous to identifiable minorities can be established.

In the era before the application of computer technology to politics, it was common for politicians and their staffs to spread out maps on office floors, using adding machines for their arithmetic, slowly building new districts from census tracts and precinct figures. Because most redistricting decisions must be made sequentially—one boundary change requires another, which requires yet another—the computer is perfectly designed to speed the process and allow for more sophisticated analysis. The computer not only makes available numerical population counts, voter history, and party registration, but also permits a graphic display of the areas represented.

These technical advances have resulted in what may be styled the second reapportionment revolution. They place in the hands of those responsible for redistricting a vast array of information for use in drawing district lines. It follows, for better or for worse, that the computer's twin features of speed and accuracy can advance the goal of "fair and effective representation" as well as engineer the nearly perfect gerrymander.

At the time of the reapportionment decisions of the early 1960s, commentators speculated about the decisions' likely impact on the representational process. The most common prediction was that the urban areas would dominate state legislatures, with a general tendency toward liberal legislative policies. It is by no means clear that this prediction has come true. Enlarged influence of the suburbs, often with a conservative representation and not infrequently allied with rural representatives, has been the more typical reality. The one thing that can be said with confidence is that adoption of the equal-population principle has ended the worst abuses and assured basic fairness in the most important features of the democratic process.

ROBERT B. MCKAY
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAMS, BRUCE 1977 A Model State Reapportionment Process: The Continuing Quest for "Fair and Effective Representation." Harvard Journal on Legislation 14:825–904.

COMMON CAUSE 1977 Reapportionment: A Better Way. Washington, D.C.: Common Cause.

DIXON, ROBERT G. 1968 Democratic Representation: Reapportionment in Law and Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

GROFMAN, BERNARD et al., eds. 1981 Representation and Redistricting Issues. Lexington, Mass.: D. C. Heath.

MCKAY, ROBERT B. 1965 Reapportionment: The Law and Politics of Equal Representation. New York: Twentieth Century Fund.

POLSBY, NELSON, ed. 1971 Reapportionment in the 1970s. Berkeley: University of California Press.

REAPPORTIONMENT
(Update)

In 1991, reapportionment and redistricting were the most open, democratic, and racially egalitarian in American history. A series of Supreme Court decisions beginning with SHAW V. RENO in 1993, however, insured that the 2001 redistricting would be completely different.

The 1982 amendments to the VOTING RIGHTS ACT and the Court's interpretation of them guaranteed minority groups unprecedented influence over redistricting in the 1990s. When Congress in 1981–1982 considered requiring proof of only a racially discriminatory effect, rather than a racially discriminatory intent, to void state or local election laws, critics warned that this amendment would lead inexorably to racial GERRYMANDERING and drives for proportional representation for minority groups. Congress adopted it anyway, and in an authoritative 1982 U.S. SENATE report, it directed the U.S. Department of Justice not to allow states and localities in the Deep South and scattered areas throughout the country to put into force laws that had racially discriminatory effects. The Justice Department therefore became an active ally of minority voters during the 1990s redistricting.

In the most important VOTING RIGHTS decision of the 1980s, Thornburg v. Gingles (1986), Supreme Court Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., writing for the Court, sustained the new effect standard. Drawing on the 1982 Senate report and testimony from hearings on the Voting Rights Act, Brennan ruled that if a minority group was sufficiently large and geographically compact to dominate an electoral district, and if voting in the area was racially polarized, then states and localities had to draw districts that would enable minority voters to elect candidates of their choice. In 1991, however, redistricting planners largely disregarded the compactness requirement because "compactness" was notoriously difficult to define—Brennan had not even tried to define it, and Congress in 1989 had rejected a compactness standard for congressional districts.

To facilitate the 1991 redistricting, the U.S. Census Bureau rapidly made population and ethnic data, already keyed to voting precincts, widely available in machine-readable form. Ethnic and interest groups, as well as factions of the POLITICAL PARTIES, individual politicians, and members of the general public were given access to computers and software that made drawing districts for local, state, and congressional seats quick and easy. Many of them drafted competing redistricting plans and took vigorous parts in hearings and debates. Organizations representing African American and Latino voters, such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund, and the AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, were especially active.

Both Republicans and Democrats initially supported drawing more minority opportunity districts in 1991. Republicans sought to pack largely Democratic African Americans and Latinos into as few districts as possible, sacrificing those seats in order to maximize Republican seats. Democrats, who had to draw minority opportunity districts to satisfy their core constituents, aimed to minimize their party's losses of seats by extracting minorities from predominantly Republican districts, often producing jagged district boundaries. The result was the largest gain in minority representation since the 1870s, modest losses in overall Democratic representation in Congress, and, in reaction to both of these, a radical shift in Supreme Court DOCTRINE by a five-person conservative Republican majority on the Court.

The Court had ruled in a series of cases in the 1970s and 1980s that, in order to have STANDING to sue under the FOURTEENTH and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS, plaintiffs had to prove injury—namely, vote dilution. In any event, a state's intent to comply with the Voting Rights Act, the Court decided in UNITED JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS V. CAREY (1977), justified race-conscious redistricting. Therefore, when five white North Carolinians challenged two 57-percent black congressional districts that had elected the state's first African American members of Congress in the twentieth century on the grounds that planners had taken race into account in drawing the districts, the majority of a three-judge federal DISTRICT COURT panel dismissed the case. In a bitterly contested 5–4 decision, the Supreme Court overturned the lower court in Shaw, granting the white plaintiffs standing on the grounds that the sprawling districts conveyed a symbolic message of racial difference to voters and public officials. It did not matter that whites were not discriminated against—their votes were not diluted—nor did it matter whether the message that whites and blacks differed politically was true. The Fourteenth Amendment, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR said, prohibited any intentional governmental distinctions between people on racial grounds.

After the Shaw decision, losing congressional candidates, along with advocates of what they called "color-blind" policies, joined by southern state Republican parties that began to treat redistricting as an AFFIRMATIVE ACTION issue, challenged all but one black- or Latino-majority congressional district in the South that had initially been drawn in the 1990s, and several majority–minority districts outside the South, as well. When a district court invalidated two majority-black Georgia districts that were much more compact than those in North Carolina, the Shaw majority of the Supreme Court affirmed, condemning every district drawn for "predominantly racial" reasons or in which race had been used "as a proxy" for Democratic voting. After this decision, MILLER V. JOHNSON, no longer was a Shaw-type claim restricted to majority–minority districts or those whose shape annoyed some Justices. Miller and two 1996 decisions dismissed compliance with the Voting Rights Act and attempts to overcome past discrimination or current racial-bloc voting as justifications for race-conscious districting. Attempts to make it possible for "DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITIES" to elect candidates of their choice, the majority ruled, were much less important than adherence to what it termed "traditional districting principles." These newly discovered "traditional" principles included not only compactness and protecting incumbents, but also, for instance, the much-broken habit of drawing separate districts in Georgia's four corners and, according to one district judge, preserving the power of various white ethnic "communities of interest." By contrast, Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY dismissed as "offensive and demeaning" the notion that African Americans might form a community of interest. And strikingly unlike its treatment of pro-Democratic race-conscious districting plans, the Supreme Court in Voinovich v. Quilter (1993 and 1996) sustained the deliberate, openly admitted packing of African Americans into state legislative districts by Ohio Republicans. Why Miller's "predominant reason" or "race as a proxy" tests did not apply to Republicans, the Court did not explain.

In a biting dissent in Bush v. Vera (1996), Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS accused the majority of using race as an indirect means of attacking political gerrymanders. After seeming to open the door to challenges to partisan gerrymanders by ruling them JUSTICIABLE in Davis v. Bandemer (1986), the Court had set the standard of proof so high as practically to foreclose such cases, and later it rejected without comment legal assaults on bipartisan gerrymanders and on the whole notion that legislators should influence the shape of their districts. It also allowed the Bush Administration to block efforts to use statistical sampling to insure that minority group members and other predominantly poor people were not undercounted by the CENSUS, a decision that skewed the allocation of congressional seats toward the predominantly white, Republican suburbs.

Thus, as always before in American history, party politics suffused the redistricting of the 1990s, but this time disguised behind the mask of race. Racial dividing lines, long the most deep and consistent in the country's politics, increasingly split Republicans from Democrats. Since any indication that race has been considered in the drawing of district lines can be used in the inevitable legal challenges to every major redistricting in 2001, there will be a strong incentive to conduct such discussions in secret or in coded language. Ironically, then, the REHNQUIST COURT has twisted the Fourteenth Amendment into a barrier to the equal participation of minorities in allocating political power, one which operates differentially against the political party to which they overwhelmingly adhere, and it has so judicialized the redistricting process as to hamper popular participation and open, frank deliberations concerning the key cleavage in American politics. This is an outcome that the WARREN COURT hardly could have foreseen when it strode self-confidently into the political thicket in BAKER V. CARR (1962).

J. MORGAN KOUSSER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Electoral Districting.)

Bibliography

CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY 1993 Congressional Districts in the 1990s. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly, Inc.

GROFMAN, BERNARD; HANDLEY, LISA; and NIEMI, RICHARD G. 1992 Minority Representation and the Quest for Voting Equality. New York: Cambridge University Press.

KOUSSER, J. MORGAN 1999 Colorblind Injustice: Minority Voting Rights and the Undoing of the Second Reconstruction. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press.

LUBLIN, DAVID 1997 The Paradox of Representation: Racial Gerrymandering and Minority Interests in Congress. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

THERNSTROM, ABIGAIL M. and THERNSTROM, STEPHAN T. 1997 America in Black and White: One Nation Indivisible. New York: Simon & Schuster.

REASONABLE DOUBT

Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is the highest level of proof demanded in American courts. It is the usual standard for criminal cases, and in criminal litigation it has constitutional grounding in decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Although the reasonable doubt standard is not often used in noncriminal settings, there are exceptional situations, usually where liberty is placed in jeopardy, when a JURISDICTION will borrow the criminal standard of proof for a civil case.

Any standard of proof chosen by an American court recognizes that in all litigation there is the chance of a mistake. If opposing litigants agree on the various matters that constitute their case, usually the case is settled. There is little for a judge or a jury to do. Once a dispute arises, however, adversaries offer conflicting EVIDENCE and conflicting interpretations of evidence to decision makers. Rarely, if ever, is there a dispute in which every witness and every aspect of physical and scientific evidence presented by opposing parties point with perfect certainty to one specific conclusion. Witnesses may suffer from ordinary human frailties—they have memory problems; they sometimes confuse facts; they see events differently from each other; they have biases and prejudices that call into question their judgment; and they may be frightened and have trouble communicating on the witness stand. Physical evidence might be damaged or destroyed and thus of minimal or no use at trial. Or, it might be difficult to connect physical evidence with the parties before the court. Even scientific tests often provide little more than probabilities concerning the relationship of evidence to the issues in a case.

Were judges and juries required to decide cases on the basis of absolute certainty about what occurred, it is doubtful that they ever would find the standard satisfied. Whoever was required to prove the case would always lose. Recognizing that absolute certainty is not reasonably possible, American courts have chosen to demand less. How much less determines the extent to which they are willing to accept the risk of error in the course of litigation.

In criminal cases the typical requirement is that the government must prove the essential elements of any offense it chooses to charge beyond a reasonable doubt. This means that, although the decision maker need not be certain that a defendant is guilty before convicting, any reasonable doubt requires that it find the defendant not guilty. Such a standard allocates most of the risk of error in criminal cases to the state. It cannot assure that no innocent person will ever be convicted, but the standard is demanding enough to make it most unlikely that someone who is actually innocent will be found guilty. It is more likely that truly guilty persons may go free, but that is the price American criminal justice pays to avoid mistakes that harm the innocent.

It is uncertain when this standard of proof was first used in criminal cases. In early England, whether or not a person would be convicted depended on his ability to produce compurgators or to avoid misfortune in an ordeal. Subsequently, success turned on whether or not a suspect could succeed in trial by combat. As trial by jury replaced other forms of proof, the jurors originally decided cases on the basis of their own knowledge, and even if they relied on informants, the jurors themselves were responsible for the accuracy of the facts. Not until the notion of an independent fact finder, typically a jury, developed was a standard of proof very meaningful. With the development of the independent and neutral fact finder, the "beyond a reasonable doubt" concept took on importance.

Although there is no mention of the proof beyond a reasonable doubt concept in the United States Constitution, trial by jury is in all but petty cases guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment, and with the Supreme Court's decision in DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968), this right is now binding on the states. By the time the Sixth Amendment was adopted, proof beyond a reasonable doubt was closely associated with the right to an impartial jury guaranteed by the Constitution in criminal cases.

Thus, it is not surprising that the Supreme Court has found the proof beyond a reasonable doubt standard to be constitutionally required in criminal cases with respect to all essential elements of offenses charged, whether the criminal case is litigated in state or federal court (IN RE WINSHIP, 1970). The Court associated the high proof standard with the strong presumption of innocence in criminal cases and observed that before a defendant may be stigmatized by criminal conviction and punished for criminal wrongdoing, DUE PROCESS requires the state to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. (See Jackson v. Virginia, 1979.)

There is little agreement on exactly what a reasonable doubt is. No single definition of reasonable doubt has ever gained acceptance in American courts. There does seem to be some consensus that a decision maker should understand that a reasonable doubt is one based in reason as applied to the proof offered in a case. This elaboration of the standard is consistent with the oath that judges administer to jurors who are called upon to decide a case. Beyond this, it is difficult to define the term. Any language that is used is likely to be challenged as being either too demanding or not demanding enough.

Judges and juries have come to know that the proof beyond a reasonable doubt standard represents American regard for liberty and the dignity of the individual who stands against the state and who seeks to preserve his freedom and independence. A reasonable doubt will protect him.

STEPHEN A. SALTZBURG
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Burden of Proof.)

Bibliography

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. and ZEISEL, HANS 1966 The American Jury. Boston: Little, Brown.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1971 Trial by Mathematics: Precision and Ritual in the Legal Process. Harvard Law Review 84:1329–1393.

REASONABLE EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY

An issue of extraordinary importance in determining the scope of the protection of the FOURTH AMENDMENT is the interpretation of the word "searches" in that amendment's proscription of "unreasonable searches and seizures." If certain conduct of state or federal officials is deemed not to constitute either a search or seizure, then Fourth Amendment requirements need not be met. On the other hand, if that activity is a search or seizure, then it is unconstitutional unless those requirements—that the conduct be undertaken only upon a certain quantum of evidence (PROBABLE CAUSE), and in many instances that it be undertaken only upon prior judicial approval—have been met. How this issue comes out is a matter of considerable practical significance in criminal prosecutions, for the Fourth Amendment's EXCLUSIONARY RULE usually dictates suppression of evidence if the amendment's limitations were exceeded in acquiring it.

The Supreme Court has had difficulty in developing a workable definition of the word "searches." At an earlier time, as in Hale v. Henkel (1906), the Court was inclined to say that "a search ordinarily implies a quest by an officer of the law," yet it soon became clear that not every instance of seeking evidence was a search. In OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928), for example, the Court held that the placing of a tap on telephone wires and thereby eavesdropping on the defendant's conversations was no search. As the Court later explained in SILVERMAN V. UNITED STATES (1961), there was no Fourth Amendment search unless the police had physically intruded into "a constitutionally protected area." These areas were enumerated in the Fourth Amendment itself: "persons," including the bodies and clothing of individuals; "houses," including apartments, hotel rooms, garages, business offices, stores, and warehouses; "papers," such as letters; and "effects," such as automobiles. But then came the landmark decision of KATZ V. UNITED STATES (1967), which overruled the Silverman standard and gave birth to the "reasonable expectation of privacy" test.

Katz was convicted in federal court on a charge of transmitting wagering information by telephone in violation of federal law. At trial the government was permitted to introduce, over defendant's objection, evidence of his end of telephone conversations, overheard by FBI agents who had attached an electronic listening and recording device to the exterior of a public telephone booth from which Katz habitually placed long-distance calls. The court of appeals affirmed Katz's conviction, reasoning that the ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING did not amount to a Fourth Amendment search because the microphone had not penetrated the wall of the telephone booth. Before the Supreme Court, the parties disputed whether the booth was a "constitutionally protected area," but the Court declined to address that issue, noting that "the Fourth Amendment protects people, not places. What a person knowingly exposes to the public, even in his home or office, is not a subject of Fourth Amendment protection. . . . But what he seeks to preserve as private, even in an area accessible to the public, may be constitutionally protected." The Court then held, "The Government's activities in electronically listening to and recording the petitioner's words violated the privacy upon which he justifiably relied while using the telephone booth and thus constituted a "search and seizure' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment."

In his concurring opinion in Katz, Justice JOHN M. HARLAN joined the opinion of the Court, but then explained what he took this opinion to mean. Lower courts and ultimately the Supreme Court itself came to rely upon the Harlan elaboration of the Katz test: "My understanding of the rule that has emerged from prior decisions is that there is a twofold requirement, first that a person have exhibited an actual (subjective) expectation of privacy and, second, that the expectation be one that society is prepared to recognize as "reasonable." Courts and commentators thereafter attempted to ascertain the meaning of each of these two requirements.

The first part of the Harlan formulation arguably finds support in that part of the Katz majority opinion which declared that the government conduct directed at Katz "violated the privacy upon which he justifiably relied." However, an actual, subjective expectation of privacy deserves no place in a statement of what the Fourth Amendment protects. By use of a subjective test, it would be possible for the government by edict or known systematic practice to condition the expectations of the populace in such a way that no one would have any real hope of privacy. Harlan later appreciated this point, observing in his dissent in UNITED STATES V. WHITE (1971) that analysis under Katz must "transcend the search for subjective expectations," for "our expectations, and the risks we assume, are in large part reflections of laws that translate into rules, the customs and values of the past and present."

Although a majority of the Court acknowledged in Smith v. Maryland (1979) that in some situations the subjective expectation of privacy test "would provide an inadequate index of Fourth Amendment protection," the Court sometimes appears to rely on it nevertheless. Illustrative is California v. Ciraolo (1986), holding that the Fourth Amendment was not violated by warrantless aerial observation of marijuana plants inside a fenced backyard of a home. Though the state conceded the defendant had a subjective privacy expectation, the Court offered the gratuitous observation that because "a 10-foot fence might not shield these plants from the eyes of a citizen or a policeman perched on the top of a truck or a 2-level bus," it was "not entirely clear" whether the defendant "therefore maintained a subjective expectation of privacy from all observations of his backyard, or whether instead he manifested merely a hope that no one would observe his unlawful gardening pursuits." The unfortunate implication of this comment is that a defendant cannot even get by the first Katz hurdle unless he has taken steps to ensure against all conceivable efforts at scrutiny.

The second branch of the Harlan elaboration in Katz, apparently an attempt to give content to the word "justifiably" in the majority's formation, prompted the Court on later occasions, as in TERRY V. OHIO (1968), to refer to the Katz rule as the "reasonable 'expectation of privacy' test." This language is perhaps unfortunate, for it might be read to mean that police activity constitutes a search whenever it uncovers incriminating actions or objects which the law's hypothetical reasonable man would expect to be private—that is, which as a matter of statistical probability were not likely to be discovered. Though the Court has wisely rejected such an interpretation, as in OLIVER V. UNITED STATES (1984), it still leaves the question of precisely what makes a reliance on privacy "justified" in the Katz sense.

In his White dissent, Harlan asserted that this question must "be answered by assessing the nature of a particular practice and the likely extent of its impact on the individual's sense of security balanced against the utility of a conduct as a technique of law enforcement." Thus, he added, "those more extensive intrusions that significantly jeopardize the sense of security which is the paramount concern of Fourth Amendment liberties" are searches. Anthony Amsterdam has similarly asserted that the "ultimate question" posed by Katz "is whether, if the particular form of surveillance practiced by the police is permitted to go unregulated by constitutional restraints, the amount of privacy and freedom remaining to citizens would be diminished to a compass inconsistent with the aims of a free and open society."

But this is unfortunately not how the Court has subsequently interpreted Katz, as is apparent from a sampling of more recent cases. In United States v. Miller (1976) the Court held that a person has no justified expectation of privacy in the records of his banking transactions kept at financial institutions with which he has done business, because the documents "contain only information voluntarily conveyed to the banks and exposed to their employees in the ordinary course of business." This conclusion overlooks the fact that bank employees examine checks briefly and one at a time, and thus do not construct conclusions about the customer's lifestyle, while police who study the totality of one's banking records can acquire a virtual current biography. The Court's error in Miller was compounded in Smith v. Maryland, holding that one has no legitimate expectation of privacy in the numbers he dials on his telephone because those numbers are conveyed to the telephone company's switching equipment and, in the case of long-distance calls, end up on the customer's bill. Thus, the defendant in Smith could not object to police use of a pen register to determine all numbers he dialed, though once again the more focused police examination of the information revealed much more than the limited and episodic scrutiny that the phone company employees might give the same numbers.

In United States v. Knotts (1983) the Court similarly held that it was no search for police to keep track of a person's travels by using a "beeper" because "anyone who wanted to look" could have learned, without such assistance, of the defendant's 100-mile journey from Minneapolis into rural northern Wisconsin. But to learn what the beeper revealed—that the beeper-laden container of chemicals purchased in Minneapolis was now in a particular secluded cabin 100 miles away—would have taken an army of bystanders in ready and willing communication with one another. And then there is Ciraolo, holding that it is no search for police to look down from an airplane into one's solid-fenced backyard because "any member of the public flying over this airspace who glanced down could have seen everything that these officers observed." This ignores the fact, as the four dissenters put it, that "the actual risk to privacy from commercial or pleasure aircraft is virtually nonexistent."

In each of these cases, a majority of the Court failed to appreciate that "privacy is not a discrete commodity, possessed absolutely or not at all" (as Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL put it in his Smith dissent) and that there is a dramatic difference, in privacy terms, between the sporadic disclosure of bits and pieces of information to a small and often select group for a limited purpose and a focused police examination of the totality of that information regarding a particular individual. Such decisions leave the promise of Katz unrealized and ignore the teachings of the Supreme Court's germinal search and seizure decision, BOYD V. UNITED STATES (1886). There, Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY wrote that "constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed" in order to forestall even "the obnoxious thing in its mildest and least repulsive form," as "illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing in that way, namely, by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure."

Some hope—modest, given the outcome of the case—is to be found in Florida v. Riley (1989), holding that an officer's naked-eye observation into the defendant's residential greenhouse from a helicopter 400 feet off the ground was no search. Significant for present purposes is the observation of Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, dissenting, that a "majority of the Court" (the four dissenters and one concurring Justice) believe that the reasonableness of the defendant's expectations "depends, in large measure, on the frequency of nonpolice helicopter flights at an altitude of 400 feet." This means, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN concluded in his dissent, that a majority of the Court does not accept "the plurality's exceedingly grudging Fourth Amendment theory, [whereunder] the expectation of privacy is defeated if a single member of the public could conceivably position herself to see into the area in question without doing anything illegal." Riley thus may signal a rejection of the all-or-nothing approach to privacy, thereby giving the Katz reasonable expectation of privacy test new meaning.

WAYNE R. LAFAVE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Open Fields Doctrine; Plain View Doctrine; Right of Privacy; Search and Seizure; Unreasonable Search; Warrantless Searches; Wiretapping.)

Bibliography

AMSTERDAM, ANTHONY G. 1974 Perspectives on the Fourth Amendment. Minnesota Law Review 58:349–477.

GUTTERMAN, MELVIN 1988 A Formulation of the Value and Means Models of the Fourth Amendment in the Age of Technologically Enhanced Surveillance. Syracuse Law Review 39: 647–735.

JUNKER, JOHN M. 1989 The Structure of the Fourth Amendment: The Scope of the Protection. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 79:1105–1184.

REASONABLE SEARCH

See: Unreasonable Search

RECALL

Among the reforms introduced during the Progressive era was the recall, a device by which the people, at an election, can remove an official from office before his term expires. Unlike IMPEACHMENT, recall does not involve an accusation of criminality or misconduct, and it is commonly used when the official decides or acts contrary to the opinion of a significant segment of his constituency.

Although recall is widely used at the state and local levels, there is no provision for recall of national officials. Moreover, because senators and representatives hold office under the United States Constitution, they are not subject to recall under state law.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

RECIPROCAL TAX IMMUNITIES

See: Intergovernmental Immunity

RECONSTRUCTION

The Framers of the Constitution did not anticipate a civil war or contemplate the constitutional problems in rebuilding the Union after such a conflict. From ABRAHAM LINCOLN's first proposal for restoring the Union in 1863 to the withdrawal of the last federal troops from the South in 1877, Reconstruction was at heart a series of constitutional questions involving the power of the federal government vis-à-vis the states and the relations among the various branches of the national government.

The key issue from the very beginning centered on the nature of the Union. The South claimed that as a compact of states, the Union could be dissolved by the single expedient of the sovereign states choosing to withdraw. The North saw the Union as indissoluble. As Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE later wrote in TEXAS V. WHITE (1869), "The Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States." The northern view had prevailed by force of arms, and the Union had been preserved. But if the states had never left the Union, as Lincoln had claimed throughout the CIVIL WAR, then why would a reconstruction be necessary to put them back in a status they had never left?

Lincoln approached this question in the same commonsense manner he had approached the war. The Constitution did not specifically authorize the federal government to deal with a civil war, but it was inconceivable that the Framers had not intended for the government to have all the adequate powers to preserve and defend itself. Throughout the war, Lincoln relied on the "adequacy of the Constitution" theory to justify actions that could not be grounded on a specific constitutional clause.

Common sense told him that if theoretically the states could not leave the Union, in initiating the war they had at least left their proper role in that Union, and some actions would have to be taken to make theory and reality whole again. The Ten-Percent Plan, whereby one-tenth of a state's 1860 voters would swear support of the Constitution and "reestablish" state government in return for presidential recognition, must be seen not as Lincoln's final word on the subject but as a wartime measure designed to draw the southern states back with the promise of leniency. Moreover, Lincoln wanted to retain his flexibility; if the Ten-Percent Plan worked, well and good, but if not, then he would try something else. The President vetoed the WADE-DAVIS BILL not because he disagreed with its provisions but because it left him too little room for maneuver. The three state governments set up under Lincoln's plan proved failures, and there is evidence that the President and Congress were moving toward agreement on a new plan at the time of his assassination.

Where Lincoln had shown flexibility and open-mindedness in approaching the problem, his successor took a rigid and uncompromising position: the States had never left the Union, and therefore the federal government had no business telling them what they had to do in order to return to the Union. In ANDREW JOHNSON's mind, Reconstruction amounted to little more than a brief period of readjustment, with oversight over this readjustment completely a presidential function. Just as Lincoln, as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF, had the constitutional authority for directing the war, so now he, as commander-in-chief, would have similar power in tidying up the last few problems of that war. In taking this view, Johnson completely misunderstood how Lincoln had worked closely with congressional leaders to have Congress support his policies.

Over the summer of 1865 the southern states, at Johnson's direction, held conventions to revise their constitutions (primarily to abolish SLAVERY) and to elect representatives to Congress. In the President's mind, when these representatives joined the Thirty-ninth Congress in December 1865, the Union would be whole and the readjustment process at an end. He did not believe then or later that Congress had any power to force the southern states to do anything they did not freely choose to do themselves. The former Tennessee senator, unlike many of his southern colleagues, had been a strong defender of the Union, but like them he shared a strong commitment to STATES' RIGHTS.

Congress obviously did not share Johnson's view and recognized that if it seated the southern representatives, Reconstruction would be at an end before the legislators could examine the situation or frame their own plan. Moreover, they believed that the people of the North wanted assurances that the fruits of their victory—the preservation of the Union and the abolition of slavery—would be protected in the peace to follow. With congressional refusal to seat the southerners, two conflicts began, one between the national government and the former Confederate states and the other between Congress and the President, both revolving around the question of what powers the national government had over the states.

Congress passed several bills in early 1866 to assist the newly freed blacks and to create legal protections for their rights. Supporters of these measures relied on what they considered the broad mandate of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, ratified in December 1865, which included the first enforcement clause in any amendment. Some scholars have suggested that it is the Thirteenth, and not the Fourteenth, Amendment that recast relations between the states and the national government by giving Congress power over what had hitherto been an internal state matter.

When Congress discussed Reconstruction in early

1866, many Republicans believed that the Thirteenth Amendment by itself gave Congress sufficient power to carry out the broad aims of giving the former slaves full rights as citizens of the United States. Freedom, as they saw it, involved not just the formal abolition of slavery but also the eradication of any signs of inferior status. According to this view, Congress had all necessary power to enact whatever LEGISLATION it thought necessary and proper to secure these goals.

Andrew Johnson, however, claimed that the amendment did little more than formally abolish slavery, and although the evidence is strong that its framers meant more than that, the Republican leadership in Congress worried that the Supreme Court might adopt his view. One can therefore see the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT as an effort to clarify the ORIGINAL INTENT of the Thirteenth and as Congress's Reconstruction plan. By making its goals explicit through a constitutional amendment, Congress intended to quiet all concerns about the legitimacy of its plan.

One should also note that aside from invalidation of the Confederate debt and restrictions on some leaders of the rebellion, the Fourteenth Amendment was not punitive. Congress, as well as Johnson, wanted to see the southern states back in their proper role as quickly as possible. This is clear in the June 1866 report of the JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION, which, while documenting southern intransigence and oppression of the freedom, is moderate in tone. Ratify the Fourteenth Amendment, the report implies, and welcome back. In fact, Tennessee, which had always had a large Unionist faction, promptly ratified and Congress admitted it back into the Union in 1866.

The committee report is also noteworthy for its discussion of the constitutional issues involved in Reconstruction. Aside from repudiating Johnson's view of Reconstruction as solely a presidential function, it examined the constitutional status of the former Confederate states. In talking about "forfeited rights," it struck a position halfway between those who claimed that the states had never left the Union and therefore had retained all their rights and the radical view of "state suicide," in which the states had ceased to exist as legal entities. Rather, the states had as a result of their rebellion forfeited basic political rights as members of the Union and, until restored fully to the Union, could enjoy only those rights granted to them by the Congress. The report relied on the fact that the Constitution assigned the power for creating new states to Congress, not the President; by implication the task of refixing the states in the Union also belonged to Congress.

The report is a commonsensical effort to deal with practical problems, but its theoretical basis is inconsistent. The states had forfeited all rights and existed as states only at the sufferance of Congress, yet they were being asked to exercise one of the most important political powers under the Constitution—changing the organic framework of government through amendment.

At Johnson's urging, the other southern states refused to follow Tennessee's example, and this refusal raised the question of whether ratification of the amendment required three-fourths of those states still in the Union or three-fourths of all the states—including the southern states now in a constitutional limbo. Here again one can only contrast Johnson's rigid adherence to a theoretical premise that flew in the face of the reality and Congress's efforts to reach a workable solution of a problem fraught with constitutional bombshells.

The election of 1866 ought to have made clear to Johnson that the North overwhelmingly favored the congressional Republican position, but he continued his efforts to thwart Congress. The events of 1867, with continuing tensions between President and legislature, led to a political impasse unforeseen by the Framers—a chief executive who, repudiated at the polls, refused to accept that judgment and who did his best, not to execute duly passed laws of Congress, but to thwart their implementation. There is an ongoing debate over what the Framers intended as grounds for IMPEACHMENT, but a number of scholars believe that the device serves as an instrument of last resort for resolving a political deadlock that would otherwise paralyze the government. Although the Senate failed to convict by a single vote, the impeachment proceeding had the desired effect: while Johnson still refused to cooperate with Congress, he no longer attempted to obstruct its will. By then, however, the damage had been done; the intransigence of the southern states, encouraged by Johnson, led to a prolonged Reconstruction and a legacy of bitterness.

Hovering in back of much of the congressional debate in 1866 and 1867 was a concern over what the Supreme Court would say in regard to the Reconstruction statutes. By then, no one questioned the power of the Court to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional, and if the Justices should adhere to the traditional view of limiting federal interference in state affairs, then the entire congressional program might be voided. The Court's decision in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866) and in two cases striking down LOYALTY OATHS alarmed Congress, which quickly passed a law narrowing the Court's jurisdiction in certain areas. But in the only case in which the Court directly addressed the constitutional question of Reconstruction, Texas v. White (1869), the Court confirmed the congressional view that whatever the theoretical relationship of the states to the Union, the war had at least temporarily suspended that relationship and its associated rights.

While Reconstruction was no doubt a political disaster for all concerned, constitutionally it has confirmed the approach taken initially by Lincoln and later by the Congress that in extreme situations one has to interpret the document not in a narrow theoretical light but in a commonsense reponse to real problems. The intransigence of Johnson and the South required Congress to go beyond the Thirteenth Amendment, but one can argue that at least in terms of the freedmen, a liberal reading of the Thirteenth Amendment would have been sufficient to achieve the goals of full equality before the law. The Fourteenth Amendment and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT, passed in response to unnecessary objections, had their greatest constitutional impact not during Reconstruction but in later years.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY
(1992)

Bibliography

HYMAN, HAROLD M. and WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1982 Equal Justice Under Law: Constitutional Development, 1835–1875. New York: Harper & Row.

KUTLER, STANLEY I. 1968 Judicial Power and Reconstruction Politics. Chicago: University of Chicago.

NELSON, WILLIAM E. 1988 The Fourteenth Amendment: From Political Principle to Judicial Doctrine. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

RECONSTRUCTION AMENDMENTS

See: Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Thirteenth Amendment

RED LION BROADCASTING CO. v. FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION
395 U.S. 367 (1969)

The Federal Communications Commission promulgated fairness rules requiring balanced BROADCASTING on public issues. The Court answered FIRST AMENDMENT challenges by arguing that different media required different constitutional standards, and that the scarcity of frequencies both necessitated government allocation and justified requirements that allocatees insure balanced programming. Comparing Red Lion to MIAMI HERALD PUBLISHING CO. V. TORNILLO (1974) indicates that electronic media enjoy less editorial freedom than do the print media. As technological developments undercut the scarcity rationale, the Court shifted toward an intrusiveness-into-the-home rationale for greater regulation of broadcasters.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Fairness Doctrine.)

REED, STANLEY F.
(1884–1980)

Stanley Forman Reed, a descendant of Kentucky gentry, was educated at Kentucky Wesleyan College, Yale, Columbia, the University of Virginia, and the Sorbonne. He then returned to Maysville, Kentucky, where he entered private law practice and Democratic party politics. After serving two terms in the Kentucky General Assembly, he was called to Washington as counsel to the Federal Farm Board during HERBERT C. HOOVER's administration. His competence as a legal technician led to his promotion to general counsel to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (RFC) and his retention at that post when FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT came to power. During the early years of the NEW DEAL, Reed played an important role in the attempts at economic revival through the RFC and in the framing of new legislation by the Brain Trust. He defended New Deal measures before an unreconstructed Supreme Court, first as special counsel arguing the GOLD CLAUSE CASES and then as solicitor general from 1935 to 1938. Reed was Roosevelt's second appointee to the Supreme Court, taking office January 15, 1938, and replacing Justice GEORGE H. SUTHERLAND.

Reed was a moderate man in both personal style and constitutional views. He occupied a position of influence between the Court's liberal and conservative wings, between activists and advocates of judicial self-restraint. He was most comfortable with the majority and was willing to modify his views as the Court majority shifted. In a Court marked by strong personalities, Reed was able to maintain cordial relations with colleagues of different ideological persuasions.

Reed's opinions are not noted for ringing phrases or rigid insistence on principled positions. The discussion places great weight on the specifics of factual circumstances and often takes on a dialectic quality, a paragraph-by-paragraph dialogue between the Justice and a holder of divergent views whom Reed is trying to accommodate and coopt. The other voice may be internal; perhaps, if it is not that of the Justice himself it may belong to a defeated law clerk, echoing the heated in-chambers arguments Reed relished.

A central theme that runs through Reed's views on many constitutional issues is his willingness to uphold the exercise of governmental power by both the federal government and the states. He had faith in the good intentions of government officials, and was rarely willing to infer impermissible motives behind their actions. These attitudes are consistent with Reed's experience as the architect and legal manager of New Deal programs and as the advocate who defended these laws before a hostile

Supreme Court. Justice Reed was a key part of the new majority of the Court that upheld federal regulation in the face of challenges under the DUE PROCESS clause. In dissent with Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON he was a staunch defender of presidential power in YOUNGSTOWN SHEET TUBE COMPANY V. SAWYER (1952). Similarly, he was notably willing to defer to administrative fact-finding and interpretation of statutes.

These same attitudes can be seen in Reed's approach to CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, particularly in cases presenting claims of abusive police behavior. His deference to what he saw as another administrative agency was reinforced by the attitudes of a Mason County, Kentucky, landowner, whose experience led him to think of the police as a benevolent small-town constabulary. Beginning with his lone dissent in United States v. McNabb (1943), Reed deferred to the police and to state procedural rules in ways that led him to accept behavior that a majority of his colleagues found unacceptable. "I am opposed to broadening the possibilities of defendants escaping punishment by these more rigorous technical requirements on the administration of justice," he wrote in McNabb.

Reed occupied a pivotal position on the Court in CIVIL RIGHTS cases. He joined with and frequently wrote for the majority in vindication of the rights of blacks, including MORGAN V. VIRGINIA (1945), SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1943), and BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954). However, like a majority of his colleagues, he saw the treatment of Japanese Americans during World War II in a different light. (See JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES.)

Reed was slow to join the emerging majority during the 1940s that protected Jehovah's Witnesses in the exercise of their religion; his view on RELEASED TIME for religious instruction of public school pupils, expressed originally in his sole dissent in MCCOLLUM V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1948), became substantially the majority position in ZORACH V. CLAUSEN (1952). He was relatively permissive of local time, place, and manner regulations of SOUNDTRUCKS in KOVACS V. COOPER (1948), but often voted with the absolutist position of Justices HUGO L. BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS regarding other public speech issues, as he did in BEAUHARNAIS V. ILLINOIS (1952) and TERMINIELLO V. CHICAGO (1947). Nonetheless, Reed sided with the finding of necessity of police action against a public speaker in FEINER V. NEW YORK (1951).

A more consistent theme in Reed's positions was his opposition to what he saw as political radicalism. He upheld federal and state statutes as well as legislative and grand jury investigative powers and deportation aimed at the removal of "security risks." Writing for the Court majority, he also upheld the power of the federal government to limit the political activities of its employees in United Public Workers v. Mitchell (1947).

Justice Reed retired from active service on the Supreme Court in 1957, but continued to sit on the Court of Claims and Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, as special master for the Supreme Court in original jurisdiction cases, and briefly as chairman of the CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION. He died in 1980 at the age of ninety-five, having lived longer than any other Justice in history.

ARTHUR ROSETT
(1986)

Bibliography

PRITCHETT, C. HERMAN 1969 Stanley Reed. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court: 1789–1969, Vol. 3:2373–2389. New York: Chelsea House.

REESE v. UNITED STATES
92 U.S. 214 (1876)

Reese was the first VOTING RIGHTS case under the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT and, among the early decisions, the most consequential. The Supreme Court crippled the attempt of the federal government to protect the right to vote and made constitutionally possible the circumvention of the Fifteenth Amendment by formally nonracial state qualifications on the right to vote. Congress had made election officials subject to federal prosecution for refusing to qualify eligible voters or not allowing them to vote. Part of the statute specified denial on account of race, part did not. One section, for example, provided for the punishment of any person who prevented any citizen from voting or qualifying to vote. A black citizen offered to pay his POLL TAX to vote in a municipal election, but the election officials refused to receive his tax or to let him vote. The United States prosecuted the officials.

The Court, by an 8–1 vote, in an opinion by Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE, held the act of Congress unconstitutional because it swept too broadly: two sections did not "confine their operation to unlawful discriminations on account of race, etc." The Fifteenth Amendment provided that the right to vote should not be denied because of race, but Congress had overreached its powers by seeking to punish the denial on any ground. The Court voided the whole act because its sections were inseparable, yet refused to construe the broadly stated sections in terms of those sections that did refer to race. By its pinched interpretation of the amendment, the Court made it constitutionally possible for the states to deny the right to vote on any ground except race, thus allowing the use of poll taxes, LITERACY TESTS, good character tests, understanding clauses, and other devices to achieve black disfranchisement.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

REFERENDUM

Among the political reforms introduced during the Progressive era was the referendum, by which acts of the legislature are referred to the people for their approval or rejection at an election. Referenda may be initiated by the legislature itself or by petition of the people. The referendum is a check on such abuses as corrupt legislation or blatantly partisan gerrymandering of legislative districts (see GERRYMANDER) but it also provides a way for politicians to avoid responsibility for controversial measures.

Reformers have frequently advocated a national referendum procedure. However, legislation authorizing a national referendum would probably be unconstitutional, and an amendment authorizing it would almost certainly fail to receive congressional approval.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

REGAN v. WALD
468 U.S. 222 (1984)

A 1982 Treasury Department regulation prohibited travel-related business transactions with Cuba. Persons who wished to travel to Cuba, but were inhibited from doing so by the regulation, sued to enjoin its enforcement. The Supreme Court, 5–4, followed ZEMEL V. RUSK (1965) and HAIG V. AGEE (1981) in rejecting claims based on the RIGHT TO TRAVEL protected by the Fifth Amendment's DUE PROCESS clause. The dissenters argued that Congress had not authorized the regulation.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA v. BAKKE
438 U.S. 265 (1978)

Perhaps the Supreme Court's majority in DEFUNIS V. ODEGAARD (1974) thought a delay in deciding on the constitutionality of racial preferences in state university admissions would give time for development of a political consensus on the issue. The result was just the opposite; by the time Bakke was decided, the question of RACIAL QUOTAS and preferences had become bitterly divisive. Bakke, a nonminority applicant, had been denied admission to the university's medical school at Davis. His state court suit had challenged the school's program setting aside for minority applicants sixteen places in an entering class of 100. Bakke's test scores and grades exceeded those of most minority admittees. The California Supreme Court held that the racial preference denied Bakke the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS guaranteed by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

A fragmented United States Supreme Court agreed, 5–4, that Bakke was entitled to admission, but concluded, in a different 5–4 alignment, that race could be taken into account in a state university's admissions. Four Justices thought the Davis quota violated Title VI of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, which forbids the exclusion of anyone on account of race from any program aided by federal funds. This position was rejected, 5–4. Four other Justices argued that the Davis quota was constitutionally valid as a reasonable, nonstigmatizing remedy for past societal discrimination against racial and ethnic minorities. This view was rejected by Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, who concluded that the Davis quota was a denial of equal protection. His vote, along with the votes of the four Justices who found a Title VI violation, placed Bakke in Davis's 1978 entering class.

Justice Powell's opinion on the constitutional question began by rejecting the notion of a "BENIGN" RACIAL CLASSIFICATION. He concluded that the burden of remedying past societal discrimination could not constitutionally be placed on individuals who had no part in that discrimination—absent the sort of constitutional violation that had been found in school DESEGREGATION cases such as SWANN V. CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BOARD OF EDUCATION (1971), where color-conscious remedies had been approved. While rejecting quotas, Justice Powell approved the use of race as one factor in a state university's admissions policy for the purpose of promoting diversity in its student body.

Race is relevant to "diversity," of course, mainly because past societal discrimination has made race relevant to a student's attitudes and experiences. And if one's membership in a racial group may be a factor in the admissions process, it may be the decisive factor in a particular case. The Powell opinion thus anticipates a preference for minority applicants; how much of a preference will depend, as he says, on "some attention to numbers"—that is, the number of minority students already admitted. The difference between such a system and a racial quota is mostly symbolic.

The press hailed Justice Powell's opinion as a judgment of Solomon. As a contribution to principled argument about equal protection doctrine, it failed. As a political solution, however, it was a triumph. The borders of preference became blurred, so that no future applicant could blame her rejection on the preference. At the same time, a university following a "diversity" approach to admissions was made safe from constitutional attack. AFFIRMATIVE ACTION was thus saved, even as Bakke was ushered into medical school and racial quotas ringingly denounced. Almost miraculously, the issue of racial preferences in higher education virtually disappeared from the political scene, and legislative proposals to abolish affirmative action were shelved. Solomon, it will be recalled, succeeded in saving the baby.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BLASI, VINCENT 1979 Bakke as Precedent: Does Mr. Justice Powell Have a Theory? California Law Review 67:21–68.

KARST, KENNETH L. and HOROWITZ, HAROLD W. 1979 The Bakke Opinions and Equal Protection Doctrine. Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 14:7–29.

WILKINSON, J. HARVIE, III 1979 From Brown to Bakke. New York: Oxford University Press.

REGULATORY AGENCIES

Regulatory agencies are governmental bodies created by legislatures to carry out specified state or national policies. Such an agency is typically responsible for regulating one particular area of social or economic life; it is staffed by specialists who develop the knowledge and experience necessary to enforce complex regulatory laws. Regulatory agencies normally combine the powers to make rules, to adjudicate controversies, and to provide ordinary administrative services, functions corresponding to the legislative, judicial, and executive powers of the separate branches of government. They fill in the gaps of general policy by bringing order, method, and uniformity to the process of modern government.

Although administrative agencies are as old as the federal government, the national regulatory process as we know it today began with the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887. Granted extensive authority over the booming railroad industry, the commission received broad rule-making and adjudicatory powers, broader than those of any previous agency. It set the trend, and the goal, for future agencies by being the first governmental unit "whose single concern was the well-being," as James Landis said, "in a broad public sense, of a vital and national industry."

Since the NEW DEAL, regulatory agencies have become the most visible tool for the achievement of national policy. They provide a form of centralized supervision which in earlier periods of American history was deemed neither necessary nor desirable. Their proliferation paralleled the development of national industries and the emergence of Congress as a policymaking body unable to supervise the details of administration. At the same time, a growing welfare state has recognized new interests such as welfare entitlements and equal employment opportunity. New regulatory agencies have been created to provide sympathetic administration of the new national policy goals, and to resolve conflicts by procedures less formalized and adversarial—and far less costly—than those prevailing in courts of law.

The character and origin of a regulatory agency depend on the nature of its tasks. Generally, such agencies fall into three main categories: independent regulatory commissions; executive agencies; and government corporations. The independent commissions, so called because of their relative freedom from executive control, are the most important, and include such agencies as the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC), Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), Federal Trade Commission (FTC), National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), and Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC). Each independent commission is headed by a multimember board appointed by the President with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the Senate. Congress has sought to guarantee the commissions' independence by establishing their governing boards on a bipartisan basis, providing fixed terms of office for board members, and authorizing the President to remove them only for reasons specified by statute.

The executive agency, an example of which is the Environmental Protection Agency, is one whose administrator and top assistants are appointed by the President, to whom they report directly and who may remove them freely. The executive agency lies squarely within the executive branch; its position within the constitutional framework of SEPARATION OF POWERS is thus more clearly defined than that of the independent regulatory agencies. The government corporation, an example of which is the Tennessee Valley Authority, is created by statute for a stated purpose and is wholly owned by the government. This model has been used when a project, because of its duration or its required investment, cannot easily be achieved through private development.

Regulatory agencies differ significantly in the range of their powers and their modes of operation. For example, the work of the NLRB is almost exclusively judicial in character. Although it has broad authority under the WAGNER ACT and TAFT-HARTLEY ACT, the NLRB has chosen to exercise only adjudicatory powers. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, on the other hand, has no formal power to adjudicate claims or impose administrative sanctions. The sensitive and highly controversial character of its mission—to carry out the antidiscrimination provisions of Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964—prompted Congress to limit EEOC's authority to "informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion." If these methods fail the alleged victim of discrimination may sue in federal court. Even though EEOC itself may not issue final orders, its guidelines for dealing with patterns of discrimination in employment, together with its field investigations in particular cases, often induce compliance. The result is a significant regulatory effect.

An immense body of administrative law, found in the voluminous Code of Federal Regulations and in a multitude of specialized publications, has been created by these and other administrative agencies.

The development and structure of regulatory agencies have strained the constitutional theory of separation of powers, for the agencies typically blend functions of all three branches of government. Yet the Supreme Court has sought to accommodate the constitutional theory with the needs of effective government, and thus to preserve the constitutional balance underscored by the principle of separation of powers. The constitutional basis for Congress's power to create regulatory agencies is derived from Article I. Section 1 grants "[a]ll legislative powers" to Congress; section 8 enumerates these powers and vests Congress with the additional power to make laws NECESSARY AND PROPER for carrying them into effect. Regulatory agencies have always been regarded as necessary and proper means of achieving the ends of national policy.

Implicit in the theory of separation of powers is the doctrine that delegated authority cannot be redelegated. Under this principle Congress cannot constitutionally invest the executive (or, for that matter, the judiciary) with the power of legislation. How then is it possible to justify the rule-making power conferred on agencies? The Supreme Court's answer is that such authority is permissible if the authorizing statute embodies a policy and provides guidelines to channel administrative action. Of course, within these guidelines agencies exercise considerable discretion. In theory, however, they are not legislating in a constitutional sense when exercising their discretion; they are simply carrying out legislative policies established by Congress.

Reality, however, had not easily converged with theory. Despite its reiteration of the doctrine forbidding delegation, the Supreme Court has consistently allowed "directionless" delegations of legislative authority. Not until the 1930s did the Court actually invalidate congressional statutes for excessive delegation of legislative power. But these precedents soon fell from favor as the Court proceeded to uphold subsequent legislative mandates as vague as those previously nullified. Some delegations have been disturbingly broad. For example, the Federal Communications Commission is to use its licensing power in the "public convenience, interest, or necessity." The Court upheld this "supple instrument" of delegation as being "as concrete as the complicated factors for judgement in such a field" permit. Nevertheless, the doctrine forbidding delegation still lives in theory. As recently as 1974, in National Cable Television v. United States, the Supreme Court construed a federal statute narrowly so as to avoid the implication from a literal reading of the statute that taxing power—clearly a legislative function—had been conferred on the Federal Communications Commission.

The doctrine forbidding legislative delegation has had its corollary in challenges to the constitutionality of regulatory agencies' exercise of judicial functions. The contention is that these functions are inconsistent with Article III's grant of the JUDICIAL POWER to courts. Yet the Supreme Court has upheld the delegation of adjudicatory functions to regulatory agencies, so long as the courts retain power to determine whether the agencies have acted within their legislative mandates.

The obverse of the delegation issue concerns strategies by which Congress may take back authority it has granted. Despite congressional efforts to ensure their independence, regulatory agencies came under criticism of liberals who complained that, instead of regulating in the public interest, the agencies had become the clients of the special interest they were supposed to regulate. More recently, conservatives have attacked regulatory agencies for pervasive bureaucratization, for growing unaccountability, and for disregard of their legislative mandates. The congressional response to these criticisms has taken a number of forms, including attempts to deregulate certain industries and the effort to reserve a power of LEGISLATIVE VETO of agency actions.

The legislative veto, adopted by Congress with increasing frequency in the 1970s, when public criticism of regulatory agencies was at its zenith, poses serious constitutional issues. Congress required various executive agencies to report to it in advance of specified kinds of proposed action. Then, if Congress (or, in some cases, one house of Congress) should adopt a resolution of disapproval within a certain time, the proposed action was effectively "vetoed." The Supreme Court held this mechanism unconstitutional in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), as applied to the one-house veto of a deportation order. First, the Court held, the congressional veto was a legislative act requiring passage by both houses of Congress. Second, and more serious, the congressional veto offended Article II, which requires any legislative act to be presented to the President for his approval before it takes effect.

The President as chief executive is commanded by Article II of the Constitution to "take care that the Laws be faithfully executed." From an early time, Presidents claimed an inherent constitutional power to remove any executive official whom they or their predecessors had appointed. This claim was vindicated in MYERS V. UNITED STATES (1926). But in HUMPHREY'S EXECUTOR V. UNITED STATES (1935) the Supreme Court refused to apply this theory of inherent power to the removal of a member of an independent agency exercising quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial powers. Distinguishing between a "purely executive" officer and an officer of an independent agency, the Court sustained Congress's authority, when creating regulatory agencies, to fix the terms of commissioners and specify the exclusive grounds for their removal. In Weiner v. United States (1958) this principle was applied to the removal of a member of the War Claims Commission, whose organizing statute specified no grounds for removal. The Court noted the adjudicatory nature of the agency's work, and thus concluded that Congress had not made it part of the executive establishment under the political control of the President. The Supreme Court has recognized that independent agencies cannot exercise their statutory duties fairly or impartially, as Congress intended, unless they are free from executive control.

The combination of investigatory, prosecutorial, and adjudicatory functions within the same regulatory agency has also been the subject of constitutional litigation. In Winthrop v. Larkin (1975), however, the Supreme Court reaffirmed its long-standing view that the mixture of these functions within a single agency or person does not violate DUE PROCESS unless the presumption of honesty and integrity of officers exercising these functions is overcome by evidence of actual bias or prejudgment in a particular case. Even though the separation of these functions within the regulatory context is not constitutionally commanded, legislators have often concluded that the best mix of efficiency and impartiality is maintained when prosecutorial and judicial functions are performed by different officers within an agency.

All regulatory agencies are subject to the constitutional requirement of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS. The right to a hearing must be granted when an agency takes action directly affecting rights and obligations: those affected must be given NOTICE and an opportunity to present their case in a FAIR HEARING. The process due in any particular case depends on the nature of the liberty or property interest involved. If these interests are constitutionally recognized then notice and even a prior hearing may be required before agency action can be taken. Whether the RIGHT TO COUNSEL, cross-examination, and other trial-type procedures will be required depends on the importance of the private interest at stake when balanced against the government's interest and the risk of erroneous deprivation under an agency's normal operating procedures.

The extent to which agency determinations are subject to judicial review is governed by the Administrative Procedure Act. Generally, administrative action is unreviewable if committed by statute to agency discretion. Courts may, however, set aside even discretionary action when it is "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." Under the act, the courts are to sustain agency findings of fact if they are supported by substantial evidence. Although the definition of "substantial" may differ from court to court, the Supreme Court retains the final say on whether the rule has been properly applied in a given case.

DONALD P. KOMMERS
(1986)

Bibliography

DAVIS, KENNETH C. 1969 Discretionary Justice. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

FREEDMAN, JAMES O. 1978 Crisis and Legitimacy. Cambridge: At the University Press.

KOHLMEIER, LOUIS M. 1969 The Regulators. New York: Harper & Row.

LANDIS, JAMES 1938 The Administrative Process. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

REDORD, EMMETT S. 1969 The Regulatory Process. Austin: University of Texas Press.

REGULATORY TAKINGS

The central disputes of modern takings law revolve around the legal rules governing the dispossession and regulation of private PROPERTY under the takings clause of the Fifth Amendment, which states: "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." The point of departure for this analysis is the Supreme Court's critical decision in LUCAS V. SOUTH CAROLINA COASTAL COUNCIL (1992).

The expression "regulatory taking" is a relatively recent addition to the Court's lexicon, having been formally introduced in the dissent of Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., in San Diego Gas & Electric Co. v. City of San Diego (1981). Even before the terminology took hold, however, the Court had struggled over the classification of various government actions that in some fashion denied or restricted the use that a private owner could make of his own land. The "easy" cases have long involved the physical TAKING OF PROPERTY; that is, cases in which the government has forced a private party to part with permanent possession of all or part (even a very small part) of private property, which is then occupied or used by the government itself or by some private individual under government authorization. In these cases, the Court has gravitated toward a rule of virtual per se compensability on the ground that the exclusive right to possession is the cardinal element of a system of private property. Denial of that FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT to JUST COMPENSATION is not justified or excused by any gain that the state realizes from the occupation or use of the property in question. The public benefit may justify the government taking, but it does not excuse government from its obligation to pay for damages. It is hard to see how the rule could be otherwise without gutting the just compensation requirement of the takings clause.

The hard question asks what, if anything, should be done with those government regulations that allow a landowner to retain exclusive possession of his land, but restrict the way in which he may use it. The types of restrictions in question include the traditional setbacks for building, or density requirements for planned-unit development. More recently, these restrictions have expanded to embrace total or partial moratoria on private development imposed for environmental objectives: lands are designated as wetlands, sensitive dunes, coastal lands, or habitat for an endangered species. The restrictions on use could be total or partial, and they could have a large or small impact on the value of the regulated land. The burning question is which, if any, of these restrictions require the state to compensate the owner of the property, and how much.

These questions have provoked a heated judicial debate, but the outlines of the current position have been clarified to some degree by Justice ANTONIN SCALIA's 1992 opinion in Lucas. That opinion uses two tests to determine whether the state owed compensation when it imposed land use restrictions. The first asks whether the property continues to have any viable economic use after the restrictions are imposed. The second asks whether, if no viable economic use survives, the state can advance some legitimate interest to justify the restriction in question. If, however, the land use restriction does not wholly destroy the land's entire economic value, then the state prevails without having to show the justifications demanded in cases of total economic loss. As applied to the Lucas case itself, the Court tests required the South Carolina Coastal Council to pay Lucas full value for two plots of land on which it prevented him from building any houses. The promotion of tourism within the region and the possible prevention of the further deterioration of public beachfront property did not fall within the nuisance-prevention rationales needed to justify the regulation.

The first question posed by Lucas asks why total and partial land use restrictions are treated differently. One explanation is that the test was designed to reaffirm the soundness of earlier cases that had held that government restrictions on new uses of currently productive property withstand taking challenges. For example, in PENN CENTRAL TRANSPORTATION CO. V. NEW YORK CITY (1978), the owner of the profitable Penn Central terminal did not receive compensation, solely because it was prohibited from building a new addition in the upper airspace. The test does not, however, answer the question of whether an owner is deprived of all economic use when the prohibition against further development is applied to buildings that cannot turn a profit under current use. Under current law, the owner is likely to face an uphill battle to gain further rights of development, except in the so-called exaction cases in which the state seeks to condition the grant of a building permit on the surrender of some possessory interest in land, such as a public easement across the property. In these cases the strict compensation requirement of the physical cases is applied, notwithstanding the owner's consent to the bundled transaction that contains both the permit approval and the surrender of the possessory interest.

The economic viability test poses greater problems in evaluating land use restrictions on vacant property slated for private development. Lucas was the easy case for compensation because the state's total prohibition rendered the property worthless. But state and local governments have learned that partial restrictions on land use can slow down and perhaps block development without running afoul of the takings clause. Determined local governments frequently shower individual landowners with boundless DUE PROCESS, which allows (and requires) repeated submissions of new development plans for detailed public examination. The chance that development will be approved allows the state to take advantage of the well-established Court rule that bars a landowner from court until a final adverse judgment has been made on its permit applications. But this tactic raises delicate factual disputes over whether the restrictions imposed are so severe that all economic value has been drained out of the project even if formal permission to build has been or may be granted. The upshot is that expert witnesses must often speculate as to whether any rational builder could turn a profit within established conditions.

Unfortunately, the Court has left it unclear how the cutoff line for viability should be determined. Suppose land costs $100 to acquire and new construction for the best project allowed by the government costs $200. If that project is worth only $150 on completion, then the landowner makes a compelling case that he has lost all economic viability of the land. The owner loses in both respects: the cost of the improvement exceeds its benefit, and nothing is recouped for the cost of the land. Next suppose that the best possible project is worth $250 on completion. Now economic viability is highly contested, because the allowable project permits the landowner to recover his variable costs but requires him to lose some portion of the initial investment in the land. Here it is better to classify the project as nonviable because its total costs exceed total benefits once the regulation is put into place. No one would purchase land unless the initial costs were protected against subsequent state regulation. But the sharp reduction in the capital value of land is a common feature of ZONING restrictions, and so it is still unclear as to how a landowner with undeveloped property would fare with this type of claim. It may well be that he has greater chances of success in attacking a denial of a specific permit than a general zoning ordinance, because the individualized determination in the permit case opens up greater avenues of abuse. But the outcome is unclear today.

Nonetheless, it appears that the project is economically viable if an especially advantageous new project—total cost $300—could generate $500 before regulation but only $400 after regulation. In this case, the losses from regulation reduce anticipated profits but do not impose out-of-pocket costs. In effect, the superior opportunities of the astute owner are put at risk under regulation. The same result appears to hold if raw land originally costs $100 but appreciates to $500 before regulation reduces its value back to $100. Now state regulation that reduces its value to its original cost will probably survive constitutional challenge. In effect, the takings clause is read to protect only the original cost, but not the value of property. That result introduces a troublesome asymmetry by allowing the state to capture land appreciation while saddling the owner with its depreciation. Thus if the land had been sold to a new owner for $500 before the regulation was imposed, then value has been converted into cost, increasing the likelihood that compensation must be paid. But why encourage individuals to make useless sales of property in order to insulate themselves from the adverse effects of regulation? In principle, the strongest line is to insist that any reduction in value attributable to land use restrictions be compensable unless it has been justified in light of some legitimate PUBLIC PURPOSE.

What purposes will justify the state's total destruction of the value in land? Scalia's answer turned to the state law of nuisance (as represented by the Restatement of Torts), which generally allows either the state or private owners to enjoin various forms of discharges (such as pollution) that enter either public lands and waters, or the land or water of other private individuals. This antinuisance limitation is held to be "inherent in the fee simple title," which means in effect that the state has done little more than enforce long-standing limitations on land use that private landowners could enforce in disputes with each other. The great advantage of this test is that it prevents neighbors from resorting to the political process to take interests in land that they (collectively) would have to purchase if acting in their individual capacities. So understood, the legitimate public purpose test failed in Lucas because no one could claim that the construction of a single-family home in keeping with neighboring lots could rise to the level of a COMMON LAW nuisance.

A broad gap exists, however, between the ordinary single-family home and garden-variety nuisances. It is unclear in individual cases whether state restrictions could be justified on the belief that the public is entitled to a viewing easement over private land; or whether the federal and state governments may refuse to grant dredging and filling permits; or whether habitat preservation of endangered species falls under the Endangered Species Act. Classically, these cases involved government restrictions that provide unquestioned public benefits, many of which extend not only to local landowners, but (as with the preservation of endangered species) to the public at large. At present, some lower courts have shown an erratic willingness to hew to the narrower common law definition of nuisance in these regulatory takings cases. Substantial monetary judgments for individualized burdens have become more common in recent years.

Most recently, the Supreme Court affirmed, in City of Monterey v. Del Monte Dunes (1999), an award of substantial damages to a landowner who had received an endless run-around from local land use regulators about the possible development of its thirty-eight-acre beachfront property site. The case upheld the right of landowners to have jury trials on both key issues in a modern regulatory takings case—did the regulation deprive the landowner of all viable economic use, and was there a state justification for the restrictions it imposed. Monterey also held that the "substantial proportionality" test of DOLAN V. CITY OF TIGARD (1994) did not apply to ordinary land use cases. But overall it gave little guidance as to what principles governed or why. The full issue will doubtless return to the Supreme Court for further clarification.

The issue of takings has transmuted itself into the familiar question of what level of scrutiny should be applied to evaluate the state interest in imposing its land use restrictions. The traditional view since the court's decision in EUCLID V. AMBLER REALTY (1926) has used general deference to justify the low RATIONAL BASIS standard of review. The large battle in takings is whether the Court's renewed interest in the area will lead to movement away from deference and toward higher scrutiny of land use decisions.

RICHARD A. EPSTEIN
(2000)

Bibliography

COYLE, DENNIS 1993 Property Rights and the Constitution: Shaping Society Through Land Use Regulation. Albany: State of New York Press.

EPSTEIN, RICHARD A. 1993 Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council: A Tangled Web of Expectations. Stanford Law Review 45:1369–1392.

——— 1997 Babbitt v. Sweet Home Chapters of Oregon: The Law and Economics of Habitat Preservation. Supreme Court Economic Review 5:1–57.

FARBER, DANIEL A. 1992 Economic Analysis and Just Compensation: An Anti-Discrimination Theory of Takings. International Review of Law and Economics 12:125–138.

FISCHEL, WILLIAM A. 1995 Regulatory Takings: Law, Economics, and Politics. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

TREANOR, WILLIAM MICHAEL 1995 The Original Understanding of the Takings Clause and the Political Process. Columbia Law Review 95:782–887.

REHABILITATION ACT
87 Stat. 355 (1973)

In addition to providing funding and research incentives for various programs to aid the handicapped, Congress incorporated antidiscrimination provisions into the Rehabilitation Act. In federally assisted programs, the act prohibits discrimination solely by reason of handicap against an "otherwise qualified handicapped individual." In addition, the act requires federal executive agencies to take AFFIRMATIVE ACTION to employ handicapped individuals. In Southeastern Community College v. Davis (1979) the Supreme Court held that the Rehabilitation Act does not forbid a nursing school from imposing relevant physical qualifications upon participants in its training programs.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Disabilities, Rights of Persons With; Disability Discrimination.)

Bibliography

BURGDORF, ROBERT L., JR. 1980 The Legal Rights of Handicapped Persons. Baltimore: Paul H. Brookes Publishing Co.

REHEARING

A party who is dissatisfied with the court's decision or opinion in a case may request the court to reconsider. The term "rehearing" refers to such a reconsideration, usually by an appellate court.

By statute, the Supreme Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION over cases coming from the state courts is limited to questions of federal law that have been properly drawn in question in the lower courts. This requirement normally is not satisfied by a litigant who raises a federal question for the first time in a petition for rehearing after a state supreme court has decided the case. However, if the state court entertains the petition and actually considers the federal question, the question can be brought to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court itself receives between 100 and 200 petitions for rehearing each year, seeking reconsideration of its own decisions or opinions. Fewer than one percent of these petitions are granted. By rule, the Court has provided that a petition for rehearing will be granted only by the vote of a majority of the Justices, including at least one Justice who concurred in the decision. By custom, a Justice who did not participate in that decision does not vote on the petition for rehearing.

One occasion for granting a petition for rehearing is the case in which the Supreme Court has affirmed the lower court's decision by a 4–4 vote. If the missing Justice was ill and has recovered, or if a ninth Justice has been appointed to fill a vacancy, it may seem likely that a majority will be mustered once the Court returns to full strength. Absent such a circumstance, the typical petition for rehearing achieves little but delay and the chance for a parting shot.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

STERN, ROBERT L. and GRESSMAN, EUGENE 1978 Supreme Court Practice, 5th ed. Chap. 15. Washington, D.C.: Bureau of National Affairs.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H.
(1924– )

William Rehnquist joined the Supreme Court in 1971 at age forty-seven. He had been a clerk to Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON and a practitioner in Arizona. At the time of his appointment, he was the assistant attorney general for legal counsel—as President RICHARD M. NIXON described the post on appointing him, "the President's lawyer's lawyer."

Brilliant, charming, and deeply conservative, he has become the intellectual leader of the court—a fact that is not obvious from the statistics. Many terms he has dissented more than any other Justice, often alone. Rehnquist's influence lies in setting the terms of the debate. His dissents mark the path for future developments. His MAJORITY OPINIONS have been unusually influential, in part because Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER regularly assigns him the most difficult and interesting cases, and in part because the opinions articulate approaches that have substantial general importance.

Rehnquist follows a structural approach in which the original understanding and the text of the Constitution assume great importance. The states play a substantial role in this structure, and a vision of an allocation of functions between state and federal governments lies at the center of Rehnquist's thought. He takes seriously the proposition that the federal government has limited powers and that the states hold sway over substantial fields. The Justice also has a view of the allocation of powers within the federal government in which judges play only a limited role. Judges may enforce some explicit guarantees, such as the right to FREEDOM OF SPEECH, but Rehnquist sees their more important function as enforcing the decisions of the political branches rather than questioning them. Judges must patrol the allocation of powers among other contending claimants, but once a political branch acts within its capacity, the decision, no matter how unwise, binds the courts.

This highly deferential approach follows from a belief that the Framers of the Constitution settled little but governmental structure, leaving the rest to future generations. Judges have no authority to restrict the powers of the political branches. They cannot invoke a decision by the Framers or political branches allocating power to the courts, and they cannot point to any other source of authority. Rehnquist is a moral skeptic and so rejects arguments that the Constitution authorizes judges to insist that other branches keep up with evolving notions of decent conduct; he believes that only the political process can define decency.

Justice Rehnquist outlined his approach in a solitary dissent to TRIMBLE V. GORDON (1977). The majority held that a statute discriminating against illegitimate children violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Calling that clause a "classic paradox" that "makes sense only in the context of a recently fought Civil War," Rehnquist continued:

> In the case of equality and equal protection, the constitutional principle—the thing to be protected to a greater or lesser degree—is not even identifiable from within the four corners of the Constitution. For equal protection does not mean that all persons must be treated alike. Rather, its general principle is that persons similarly situated should be treated similarly. But that statement of the rule does little to determine whether or not a question of equality is even involved in a given case. For the crux of the problem is whether persons are similarly situated for purposes of the STATE ACTION in issue.

Rehnquist therefore finds the constitutional guarantee of equality empty and thus vulnerable to being made a mere vessel for the beliefs of modern judges about what things should count as the pertinent similarities and differences. In his view, however, the Constitution does not resolve that question, which is at root political, to be resolved by political processes. The equal protection clause is limited to the CIVIL WAR concern, race. Within that field the prohibition is absolute, and race is a forbidden classification. Rehnquist has opposed governmental racial distinctions of all sorts, preferential "set-asides" for construction work, which the majority approved in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980), and preferences for private employment, which were sustained in UNITED STEELWORKERS V. WEBER (1979), as well as those stigmatizing blacks.

He applies the same approach to almost every other aspect of the Constitution. The FIRST AMENDMENT disables government from stopping speech—the subject debated by the Framers—but does not require government to facilitate speech, for example, by creating rights of access to information. Judicial expansion of the amendment's core meaning is unauthorized. A judge may not properly pursue the principles or values that underlie the document, because every principle has its limit, and the Constitution left adjustments to the political branches. As Rehnquist wrote in an article published in 1976: "Even in the face of a conceded social evil, a reasonably competent and reasonably representative legislature may decide to do nothing. It may decide that the evil is not of sufficient magnitude to warrant any governmental intervention. It may decide that the financial cost of eliminating the evil is not worth the benefit which would result from its elimination. It may decide that the evils which might ensue from the proposed solution are worse than the evils which the solution would eliminate." The judge must accept the political answers to these problems.

This limitation does not imply judicial passivity. The judge must rigorously enforce any actual constitutional decisions to remove issues from the political process. The BILL OF RIGHTS contains some of these decisions, but the most important are those concerning the structure of government. Rehnquist is perhaps best known for his enforcement of principles of FEDERALISM that cannot be found in the constitutional text. Writing for a bare majority in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976), he concluded that the structure of the Constitution withheld from Congress any power to regulate the operation of "states as states." As a result, the Court held, Congress could not require state and local governments to pay the minimum wages applicable to private parties. The Justice also has read into many statutes limits founded on a perceived need to maintain the role of states as coordinate centers of power.

But decisions based on the structure of the Constitution do not always favor the states. Often Rehnquist has joined holdings under the COMMERCE CLAUSE restricting the powers of states to levy discriminatory taxes or otherwise hinder INTERSTATE COMMERCE, even though neither legislation not any clear textual command prohibits this discrimination. He wrote the court's opinion in FITZPATRICK V. BITZER (1976), holding that in the exercise of its power under the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress may authorize suits against the states, even though the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT appears to deprive federal courts of JURISDICTION to entertain such suits.

The allocation of powers within the federal government also has been a theme of Rehnquist's work. He has attempted to revive the "antidelegation" doctrine, arguing that Congress may not grant uncertain decision-making powers to the executive branch. He joined the Court's opinion in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976), invalidating Congress's effort to appoint officers to administer the election laws, characterizing that effort as an intrusion on the executive power. And he supplied the theory and vote necessary to strike down in NORTHERN PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION CORP. V. MARATHON PIPE LINE CO. (1982) a grant of judicial power to BANKRUPTCY judges who lacked life tenure of office.

Part of Rehnquist's influence among the Justices comes from his distinctive style. Most judicial opinions come in shades of gray, following a dull formula notable only for turgid prose and abundant footnotes. Justice Rehnquist's opinions come closer to lavender than gray. They are relatively short and lively. One began with a limerick. Rehnquist often uses colorful (if strained) metaphors. The opinions are less copiously documented than those of his colleagues, but not because he does not know the references—they appear in the appropriate quantities in his articles. The Justice has simply chosen to write in an entertaining style. His opinions are read, and being read is the first step in being influential.

Some critics, including David L. Shapiro, have accused Rehnquist of intellectual dishonesty, because he is willing to distinguish a case on a marginally relevant basis, or to purport to honor PRECEDENT while disavowing the earlier case's rationale. Timid or weak Justices routinely treat precedents so, but Rehnquist is neither timid nor weak. That is why his nimble treatment of precedent is troubling. No one can attribute his conduct to inadvertence or to the work of a law clerk.

Justice Rehnquist is not always cavalier in distinguishing or narrowing unpleasant precedents. He will attack earlier cases openly in separate or DISSENTING OPINIONS, only to distinguish them in opinions for the Court. His opinion in National League of Cities purported to preserve some cases he had attacked, in solitary dissent, a year before, in Fry v. United States (1975). Part of his approach to precedent arises from his understanding that the author of a majority opinion speaks not for himself but for the Court as institution. He therefore tries to preserve precedents with which he does not agree, by flimsy distinctions if necessary. The result may seem contrived, but it is often essential to the functioning of the Court.

The ultimate test of honesty is whether a Justice faithfully distinguishes his constitutional views from his personal ones. Most Justices see little difference, leading to the conclusion that the Constitution follows the personal view rather than the reverse. Yet Rehnquist, who generally opposes governmental control of economic affairs, believes that the Constitution allows the political branches to establish and maintain a welfare state with extensive ECONOMIC REGULATION. He follows his jurisprudence to its logical conclusions. Though he supports property rights, he wrote an opinion in PRUNEYARD SHOPPING CENTER V. ROBINS (1980) sustaining the authority of a state to restrict those rights in the interest of fostering political speech with which the property owner disagreed.

In 1986 President RONALD REAGAN nominated Rehnquist to succeed Warren Burger as Chief Justice of the United States. One may expect Chief Justice Rehnquist to retain the same coherent picture of a government in which judges police structure rather than substance.

FRANK H. EASTERBROOK
(1986)

Bibliography

POWELL, JEFF 1982 The Compleat Jeffersonian: Justice Rehnquist and Federalism. Yale Law Journal 91:1317–1370.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H. 1976 The Notion of a Living Constitution. Texas Law Review 54:693–706.

SHAPIRO, DAVID L. 1976 Mr. Justice Rehnquist: A Preliminary View. Harvard Law Review 90:293–357.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H.
(1924– )
(Update 1)

William H. Rehnquist grew up in Milwaukee and was educated at Stanford, Harvard, and Stanford Law School. He served as a law clerk to Supreme Court Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON and then entered into private practice in Phoenix. In 1969, through his association with Deputy Attorney General Richard Kleindienst and work as a Republican party official in Phoenix, he went to Washington as Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel. On January 7, 1972, he, along with LEWIS F. POWELL, was sworn in as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. On September 26, 1986, he was sworn in as CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States, only the third sitting Justice to be so elevated. Despite widespread disagreement with Rehnquist's views among legal academics, there is little dispute that he is among the ablest Justices who have ever served on the Court.

Justice Rehnquist's vision of the nation's constitutional structure, emphasizing the words and history of that document, is expressed in three doctrines: STRICT CONSTRUCTION (of both the Constitution and of statutes), judicial restraint, and FEDERALISM. He summarized this vision in a 1976 speech at the University of Texas:

> It is almost impossible . . . to conclude that the [Founding Fathers] intended the Constitution itself to suggest answers to the manifold problems that they knew would confront succeeding generations. The Constitution that they drafted was intended to endure indefinitely, but the reason for this well-founded hope was the general language by which national authority was granted to Congress and the Presidency. These two branches were to furnish the motive power within the federal system, which was in turn to coexist with the state governments; the elements of government having a popular constituency were looked to for the solution of the numerous and varied problems that the future would bring.

In other words, as he stated, dissenting, in TRIMBLE V. GORDON (1977), neither the original Constitution nor the CIVIL WAR amendments made "this Court (or the federal courts generally) into a council of revision, and they did not confer on this Court any authority to nullify state laws which were merely felt to be inimical to the Court's notion of the public interest."

During his early years on the Court, despite the presence of three other Republican appointees, Justice Rehnquist was often in lone dissent, espousing a view of STATES' RIGHTS and limited federal judicial power that many regarded as anachronistic. For example, in Weber v. Aetna Casualty and Surety Company (1972), SUGARMAN V. DOUGALL (1973), and FRONTIERO V. RICHARDSON (1973), he resisted the view of the other eight members of the Court that the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT applied to, and required heightened scrutiny of, state-sponsored discrimination against illegitimate children, resident aliens, and women, respectively. Indeed, he insisted that the equal protection clause had only marginal application beyond cases of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. In the area of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE Rehnquist urged that the Court overrule MAPP V. OHIO (1961), which applied the EXCLUSIONARY RULE to the states. Rehnquist also seemed hostile to MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), though he never directly argued that it should be reversed. Still, even in his early years on the Court, Justice Rehnquist was less likely to be in dissent than the liberal Justices WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, and THURGOOD MARSHALL; and the ideas expressed in some of Rehnquist's early dissents, such as in CLEVELAND BOARD OF EDUCATION V. LAFLEUR (1974) and Fry v. United States (1975) were influential in majority opinions in the years to come.

The 1975 term saw Justice Rehnquist come into his own as the leader of the (ever-shifting) conservative wing of the Court. In that term he wrote for the Court in PAUL V. DAVIS (1976), holding that reputation, standing alone, was not a constitutionally protected "liberty" interest subject to vindication under the guarantee of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW; in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976), holding that the TENTH AMENDMENT limited Congress's power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE to regulate the states; and in RIZZO V. GOODE (1976), holding that "principles of federalism" forbade federal courts from ordering a restructuring of a city police force in response to constitutional violations. In National League of Cities, Rehnquist used an expansive reading of the Tenth Amendment to strike down a federal statute that regulated the wages and hours of state government employees, although such regulation was otherwise concededly within Congress's commerce power. The opinion showed that when faced with a choice between judicial restraintstrict constructionism and states' rights, Justice Rehnquist was prepared to defend the latter aggressively. However, the potential significance of the first decision limiting Congress's use of the commerce power since 1936 was eroded by subsequent Court majorities, first refusing to follow, and then overruling, National League of Cities in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985). Despite Justice Rehnquist's prediction in dissent that this issue would return to haunt the Court, it seems unlikely that the Court will really disable Congress from establishing national control of virtually any area in which Congress chooses to assert itself. Whatever the political leanings of the other Justices, a majority generally seems to believe that the strong national-weak state governmental system is the proper direction for the country.

When dissenting, Rehnquist makes his most telling points in opposing the majority's efforts to enact "desirable" social policy with little support from the constitutional or statutory provisions that they purport to be interpreting. An example is UNITED STEEL WORKERS OF AMERICA V. WEBER (1979). In that case, Kaiser Aluminum Company and the United Steelworkers had devised a "voluntary" affirmative action plan under which half of available positions in an on-the-job training plan would be reserved for blacks. Weber, excluded solely because he was white, filed suit based on Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. The statute provides that "it shall be unlawful for an employer . . . to fail or refuse to hire . . . any individual . . . because of such individual's race." The statute goes on to say that its provisions are not to be interpreted "to require any employer . . . to grant preferential treatment to any individual or group." Moreover, as a unanimous Court had recognized only three years before in McDonald v. Santa Fe Trail Transportation Co. (1976), the "uncontradicted legislative history" showed that Title VII "prohibited racial discrimination against the white petitioners . . . upon the same standards as would be applicable were they Negroes." Nevertheless, in Weber, a 5–2 majority, reversing the lower courts, found that discrimination against whites was not within the "spirit" of Title VII and consequently not prohibited. In a bitter dissent, Justice Rehnquist accused the majority of Orwellian "newspeak" and concluded that "close examination of what the Court proffers as the spirit of the Act reveals it as the spirit of the present majority, not the 88th Congress." Similarly in ROE V. WADE (1973), where the majority based a woman's right to an ABORTION on a constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY that arose not from the terms but from the "penumbras" of the BILL OF RIGHTS, Rehnquist wrote, "To reach its result, the Court necessarily has had to find within the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment a right that was apparently completely unknown to the drafters of the Amendment." Whatever the wisdom of the policies announced in these cases, it is difficult to disagree that Rehnquist's reading of the textual material in question was the more accurate one.

It is ironic that Rehnquist, often condemned as a right-wing ideologue was, in Weber and Roe, as in many other cases, advocating a view of the Court's role that had previously been vigorously advanced by the progressive members of the Court. In MOREHEAD V. NEW YORK EX REL. TIPALDO (1936), for example, the dissenting opinion of Justice HARLAN F. STONE, joined by Justices LOUIS BRANDEIS and BENJAMIN CARDOZO, declared: "It is not for the Court to resolve doubts whether the remedy by regulation is as efficacious as many believe, or better than some other, or is better even than blind operation of uncontrolled economic forces. The legislature must be free to choose unless government is rendered impotent. The Fourteenth Amendment has no more imbedded in the Constitution our preference for some particular set of economic beliefs, than it has adopted in the name of liberty the system of theology which we happen to approve."

In criminal procedure, Rehnquist's views are driven by the same narrow view of the role of courts in a tripartite federal system, and he frankly admits that his goal when he came on the Court was to "call a halt to a number of sweeping rulings of the Warren Court in this area." In this objective he generally was joined by the other appointees of RICHARD M. NIXON and by Justice BYRON WHITE. Consequently, the 1970s and 1980s saw a series of decisions aimed at making it easier for the police to investigate crimes and harder for defendants to upset their convictions because of police investigatory errors. For example, in Rakas v. Illinois (1978) the Court, per Rehnquist, made it more difficult for a defendant to establish STANDING to litigate SEARCH AND SEIZURE violations; in UNITED STATES V. ROBINSON (1973) the scope of police SEARCHES INCIDENT TO ARREST was expanded; and in United States v. Leon (1984) the Court, per Justice White, established a GOOD FAITH EXCEPTION to the exclusionary rule in search warrant cases. However, neither Rehnquist nor any of his fellow conservatives sought to undercut the FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS to counsel, appeal, and TRIAL BY JURY that had been applied to the states by the Warren Court. In a 1985 interview, despite the feeling of most Court watchers that the BURGER COURT had not dismantled the major criminal procedure protections of the Warren Court, including the MIRANDA RULES and the exclusionary rule, Justice Rehnquist pronounced himself satisfied that the law was "more even-handed now than when I came on the Court."

If Rehnquist has not been successful in exempting states from congressional control, he has frequently prevailed in his efforts to exempt state courts from federal court interference. To do this, he has taken the 1971 decision in YOUNGER V. HARRIS, which counseled restraint by federal courts in enjoining ongoing state criminal proceedings, and extended it greatly. In Rizzo and in Real Estate Association v. McNary (1981) he held that "principles of federalism" limited a federal court's ability to enjoin not just the judicial branch but the executive branch of state governments as well and that this comity limitation was not confined to criminal proceedings. Nor, as he held in Doran v. Salem Inn, Inc. (1975), was it necessary that a state criminal proceeding predate a federal action for the federal action to be barred by principles of comity.

Similarly, in the area of federal HABEAS CORPUS for state prisoners, Rehnquist and his conservative colleagues have advanced the dual goals of limiting federal court interference with state court adjudications and enhancing the finality of criminal convictions. The most significant holding in this line of cases is the decision in WAINWRIGHT V. SYKES (1977). In this case, Rehnquist, writing for a six-Justice majority, held that a defendant's failure to raise an issue at the appropriate stage of a state criminal proceeding barred the federal courts from considering that issue later under habeas corpus, absent a showing by the defendant of good cause for the failure and prejudice to his case. Sykes thus largely overruled FAY V. NOIA (1963), which had allowed new issues to be raised on federal habeas corpus unless they had been deliberately bypassed by the defendant in state proceedings. Sykes represented a significant diminution of the power of federal courts to interfere with state convictions. The trend continued in 1989 in the significant case of Teague v. Lane, authored by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, where the Court held that "new" rules of criminal procedure generally should not apply retroactively on habeas corpus to defendants whose state convictions had become final before the new law was established. In Butler v. McKellar (1990), Justice Rehnquist defined "new" broadly so as to make it very difficult for state prisoners to obtain federal habeas relief.

Consistent with his stance on federalism and judicial restraint, Rehnquist is the Court's leading advocate of a restrictive interpretation of the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE of the FIRST AMENDMENT. He set forth his view in detail in a DISSENTING OPINION in WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1985), where the majority struck down Alabama's statutorily required moment of silence for "meditation or voluntary prayer" in public schools. Rehnquist rejected the "wall of separation between church and state" principle of EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1947), arguing that history did not support this rigid interpretation of the First Amendment. According to Rehnquist, JAMES MADISON viewed the purpose of the establishment clause as simply "to prohibit the establishment of a national religion, and perhaps to prevent discrimination among sects. He did not see it as requiring neutrality on the part of the government between religion and irreligion." Consequently, Rehnquist would have found no defect in a state statute that openly endorsed prayer, much less a "moment of silence."

In a similar vein, in FIRST NATIONAL BANK V. BELLOTTI (1978), Rehnquist, in a sole dissent, refused to recognize a First Amendment COMMERCIAL SPEECH right for corporations, and in VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY V. VIRGINIA CONSUMER COUNCIL (1976) he refused to recognize a First Amendment right of consumers to receive commercial information. In short, in the First Amendment area, as in all others, he would generally give the legislative branch, whether state or federal, greater freedom to plot its own course than his colleagues would.

When, in June of 1986, WARREN BURGER announced his resignation as Chief Justice and President RONALD REAGAN nominated Rehnquist as his replacement, there was a firestorm of protest among liberals. Senator Edward Kennedy denounced Justice Rehnquist as having an "appalling record on race" and liberal columnists branded him a right-wing extremist. A concerted effort was undertaken to find something in his past that might provide a basis for defeating the nomination. Assorted allegations were raised concerning contacts with black voters when he was a Republican party official in Phoenix, the handling of a family trust, a memo he had written to Justice Jackson as a law clerk urging that the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE not be overruled in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA (1954,1955), and a racially restrictive covenant in the deed to his Phoenix house. The Senate perceived that these allegations were either unproven or, if true, were "ancient history" and irrelevant to his fitness for the post of Chief Justice. Significantly, no serious charge of misconduct was shown as to Rehnquist's fourteen and a half years as an Associate Justice on the Supreme Court. In the end, after much sound and fury, he was confirmed by a vote of 65–13.

If the 1975 term saw Rehnquist "arrive" as a major force on the Court, it was the 1987 term, his second year in the post, that saw him mature as Chief Justice. In a speech given in 1976 he had discussed the role of Chief Justice, citing CHARLES EVANS HUGHES as his model: "Hughes believed that unanimity of decision contributed to public confidence in the Court. . . . Except in cases involving matters of high principle he willingly acquiesced in silence rather than expose his dissenting views. . . . Hughes was also willing to modify his own opinions to hold or increase his majority and if that meant he had to put in disconnected thoughts or sentences, in they went."

Following his own advice, in the 1987 term he achieved a high level of agreement with his fellow Justices (ranging from 57.6 percent with Justice Thurgood Marshall to 83.1 percent with Justice ANTHONY KENNEDY). His administrative abilities in the 1987 term won the praise of Justice HARRY BLACKMUN, who deemed him a "splendid administrator in conference." For the first time in years, the Court concluded its work prior to July 1. During that term, Rehnquist showed that he could be flexible, joining with the more liberal Justices to subject the dismissal of a homosexual CIA agent to judicial review and to support the First Amendment claims of Hustler magazine to direct off-color ridicule at a public figure. Most significantly, in Morrison v. Olson (1988) Rehnquist wrote for a 7–1 majority upholding the office of INDEPENDENT COUNSEL against a challenge by the Reagan administration. In a decision termed an "exercise in folly" by the lone dissenter, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, Rehnquist held that the appointments clause was not violated by Congress's vesting the power to appoint a SPECIAL PROSECUTOR in a "Special Division" of three United States Court of Appeals judges. Nor did the act violate SEPARATION OF POWERS principles by impermissibly interfering with the functions of the executive branch. While the act can be shown to have theoretical flaws, Rehnquist could not be faulted if he perceived that a truly independent prosecutor was a necessary check on the many abuses of executive power, including criminal violations, that were occurring during the latter years of the Reagan administration and in upholding a check on those abuses in an opinion that gained the concurrence of a substantial majority of his colleagues. Rehnquist's performance during the 1988 term led the New York Times, which had vigorously opposed his elevation to Chief Justice, to praise him with faint damnation. "While he is certainly no liberal, or even a moderate, his positions are not always responsive to the tides of fashionable opinion among his fellow political conservatives."

Indeed, while Rehnquist's judicial philosophy is undoubtedly born of a staunch political conservatism, the principles of federalism and strict construction will frequently prevail even when they lead to a "liberal" result. For example, in PRUNEYARD SHOPPING CENTER V. ROBINS (1980) he wrote the opinion upholding state constitutional provisions that allowed political demonstrators to solicit signatures for a petition in a shopping center. He recognized "the authority of the state to exercise its POLICE POWER or its sovereign right to adopt in its own Constitution individual liberties more expansive than those conferred by the Federal Constitution." Similarly, in Hughes v. Oklahoma (1979) he dissented when the Court invalidated a state's attempt to preserve its wildlife. And, in Pennell v. City of San Jose (1988), he upheld the city's rent control ordinance in the face of a due process challenge by landlords. In numerous criminal cases, such as United States v. Maze (1974) and Ball v. United States (1985), he has voted to reverse criminal convictions on the ground that the government had failed to prove that the defendant's conduct had violated the terms of the (strictly construed) statute.

But if the 1987 term showed that Rehnquist could be flexible as Chief Justice, that term and the 1988 term also had him, in most cases, leading the Court in a conservative direction. In a series of close cases decided in the 1987 term, ranging across the landscape of the BILL OF RIGHTS, the Court denied an equal protection challenge to user fees for bus transportation to school, denied a claim by Indians that a Forest Service logging road through a national forest would interfere with their free exercise of religion, denied food stamps to striking workers, allowed censorship of a school newspaper, upheld federal tort immunity for defense contractors, and allowed illegally discovered evidence to be used against a criminal defendant under the "independent source" exception to the exclusionary rule.

The 1988 term demonstrated that Rehnquist was still prepared to be flexible. For example, in City of Canton v. Harris he joined an opinion by Justice White that held that a city could be liable for damages under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, U.S. CODE for poor training of police officers and that a new trial was not barred; Justices O'Connor, Kennedy, and Scalia, on the other hand, wanted to dismiss the plaintiff's case because the plaintiff could not have met the "deliberate indifference" standard of proof. Such flexibility was rarely called for during the 1988 term, however, and the conservatives stayed together most of the time. The leading case of the term was WEBSTER V. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES (1988). Here Chief Justice Rehnquist and four others upheld a Missouri statute that forbade public funding and the use of public hospitals for abortions. The decision was consistent with Rehnquist's views of state's rights and strict construction of the federal Bill of Rights. Rehnquist observed that "our cases have recognized that the due process clauses generally confer no affirmative right to government aid, even where such aid may be necessary to some life, liberty or property interests of which the government itself may not deprive the individual." Because a state is under no constitutional obligation to provide public hospitals at all, it is free to condition their use however it wishes. This notion, that beneficiaries of public largess must accept the "bitter [restrictions] with the sweet" has been a hallmark of Rehnquist's jurisprudence since he first expressed it in ARNETT V. KENNEDY in 1974. However, Rehnquist (at least temporarily) was unable to convince Justice O'Connor that it was time to abandon the "rigid" framework of Roe v. Wade that gave a woman an absolute right to an abortion during the first trimester of pregnancy. This failure resulted even though he had drafted a compromise that continued to recognize a limited constitutional right to abortion.

Despite the current national debate on abortion, it seems unlikely that the country in the foreseeable future will be confronted with a constitutional problem of the magnitude of the legal discrimination against blacks (and the closely related problem of police abuse of the rights of criminal suspects) that faced the Warren Court. Consequently, it is also unlikely that the judicial activism displayed by the Warren Court to deal with these problems will seem as morally necessary or politically desirable in the future. Thus, while Justice Rehnquist's vision of a vigorous Tenth Amendment checking Congress's power vis-à-vis the states seems unlikely to prevail in the long term, his view of a more limited role for the federal Constitution, and hence for the federal courts, probably will be the wave of the future. Having reached its highest point in the 1960s, the "Rights Revolution"—already dying during the Burger Court years—terminated with the appointment of William Rehnquist as Chief Justice of the United States; it probably will not recur after he steps down.

CRAIG M. BRADLEY
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Conservatism; Rehnquist Court.)

Bibliography

BRADLEY, CRAIG M. 1987 Criminal Procedure in the Rehnquist Court: Has the Rehnquisition Begun? Indiana Law Journal 62:273–294.

DAVIS, SUE 1989 Justice Rehnquist and the Constitution. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

POWELL, H. JEFFERSON 1982 The Compleat Jeffersonian: Justice Rehnquist and Federalism. Yale Law Journal 91: 1317–1370.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H. 1976 Chief Justices I Never Knew. Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 3:637.

——— 1976 The Notion of a Living Constitution. Texas Law Review 54:693–706.

——— 1987 The Supreme Court: How It Was, How It Is. New York: Morrow.

SHAPIRO, DAVID L. 1976 Mr. Justice Rehnquist: A Preliminary View. Harvard Law Review 90:293–357.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H.
(1924– )
(Update 2)

William Hobbes Rehnquist served as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court and later ascended to the position of CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States. Rehnquist was born in 1924 outside of Milwaukee, Wisconsin. After initially attending Kenyon College and serving in the U.S. Army for three years during WORLD WAR II, he received his undergraduate degree from Stanford University in 1948. Prior to attending law school, Rehnquist then received an M.A. in political science from Stanford in 1949, followed by an M.A. in government from Harvard in 1950. In December, 1951, he was graduated first in his class from Stanford Law School. Rehnquist then served as a law clerk to Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, thereafter entering private practice in Phoenix, Arizona. During his years in Phoenix, Rehnquist was an outspoken, politically active conservative, criticizing the WARREN COURT for "extreme solicitude for the claims of Communists and other criminal defendants" and at one point opposing OPEN HOUSING LAWS as an unjustifiable infringement on private PROPERTY RIGHTS. When RICHARD M. NIXON was elected President, he chose Rehnquist to head the Office of Legal Counsel in the U.S. Department of Justice. In that position, Rehnquist often served as the administration's spokesman on controversial legal issues.

After the resignation of the second JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN and HUGO L. BLACK in 1971, Nixon nominated Rehnquist and LEWIS F. POWELL to serve as Associate Justices. Rehnquist's nomination was by far the more controversial of the two; indeed, it set off a bitter struggle over confirmation in the U.S. SENATE. No one questioned Rehnquist's intellectual capacity; however, Senate liberals were disturbed by his record on CIVIL RIGHTS. In particular, they focused on two points. The first was a memorandum that Rehnquist had written for Justice Jackson in connection with BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) which argued that PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) "was right and should be reaffirmed." The second was Rehnquist's participation in a Republican poll-watching project that challenged voting credentials in predominantly African American and Hispanic neighborhoods in Phoenix. Rehnquist responded that Jackson himself had requested a defense of Plessy, and that he had engaged in no wrongdoing during the poll-watching project. Ultimately, Rehnquist was confirmed on a 68–26 vote.

In personal terms, Rehnquist soon became known on the Court for his friendliness, informality, and irreverent sense of humor. From a jurisprudential perspective, it quickly became clear that he would vindicate the fears of his liberal detractors and the hopes of his conservative supporters. During the BURGER COURT era, Rehnquist was the most conservative Justice on the Court, and also the most able of the four Nixon appointees. His opinions reflect a technical mastery of the law, and are marked by a forceful writing style that at times employs colorful, emotionally charged imagery to underscore distaste for the positions of his more liberal colleagues.

Because of these qualities, Rehnquist was chosen by President RONALD REAGAN to succeed WARREN E. BURGER as Chief Justice in 1986. The CONFIRMATION PROCESS reprised the political struggle that had taken place in 1971. Once again, liberal senators opposed the nomination, harshly criticizing Rehnquist's record on civil rights; once again, their effort to derail the nomination was unsuccessful. Rehnquist was confirmed by a vote of 65– 32, and assumed the office of Chief Justice on September 26, 1986.

Ironically, Rehnquist's elevation to the Chief Justiceship coincided with the appointment of Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, who displaced Rehnquist as the intellectual leader of the conservative wing of the Court. During his tenure as Chief Justice, Rehnquist has been as likely to vote with SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR and ANTHONY M. KENNEDY as with Scalia and CLARENCE THOMAS, both of whom were more firmly committed to conservative ideology. Bush v. Vera (1996) exemplifies this point. There, rather than joining Scalia and Thomas in arguing that all consideration of race in ELECTORAL DISTRICTING was unconstitutional, Rehnquist agreed with O'Connor and Kennedy in concluding that the Constitution requires only that "legitimate districting principles [not be] 'subordinated' to race."

The significance of cases such as Vera should not be overstated in evaluating Rehnquist's judicial philosophy. He remains a staunch conservative, fiercely opposed to the basic principles of liberal constitutionalism. For example, in PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992), Rehnquist voted to overturn ROE V. WADE (1973) and deconstitutionalize the law of ABORTION, rather than simply to modify Roe and its progeny as successfully advocated by O'Connor and Kennedy.

Rehnquist's opposition to Roe reflects his basic approach to CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION, which in turn embodies the standard conservative political ideology of the late 1960s and early 1970s. Stung by the liberal activism of the Warren Court, conservatives had generally become vociferous advocates of the concept of judicial restraint generally, and a commitment to a jurisprudence based on the ORIGINAL INTENT of the Framers of the Constitution in particular. Not surprisingly, Rehnquist became the foremost defender of ORIGINALISM on the Court. He expressed this philosophy in "The Notion of a Living Constitution":

> [T]o the extent that it makes possible an individual's persuading one or more appointed federal judges to impose on other individuals a rule of conduct that the popularly elected branches of government would not have enacted and the voters have not and would not have embodied in the Constitution, . . . [nonoriginalist review] is genuinely corrosive of the fundamental values of our democratic society.

Among the best-known examples of the application of these principles are Rehnquist's DISSENTING OPINIONS in cases such as SUGARMAN V. DOUGALL (1973) and TRIMBLE V. GORDON (1977), where he argued that enhanced scrutiny under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause should be limited to cases involving race-based classifications. The same jurisprudential philosophy has served Rehnquist well in cases where liberals have sought to deploy the Constitution in support of their values on issues ranging from school DESEGREGATION to CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, and gay rights. In dealing with these cases, he was the most consistent and effective advocate of judicial restraint on the Burger Court. Rehnquist has been equally effective in articulating conservative positions on issues of STATUTORY INTERPRETATION involving matters such as HABEAS CORPUS, civil rights, and business regulation generally. As Chief Justice, he has continued to be a strong advocate for these positions.

By contrast, in cases where litigants have attempted to deploy the Constitution against liberal government programs, Rehnquist's voting pattern clearly reflects the tensions inherent in much of the conservative political–judicial theory of the late-twentieth century. Rehnquist was the Burger Court Justice who was most likely to uphold constitutional challenges raised by conservatives against liberal political programs, including cases involving FEDERALISM, property rights, and AFFIRMATIVE ACTION. He has continued to support conservative activism on a variety of issues during his Chief Justiceship. Moreover, in some of these cases, Rehnquist's positions are hard to explain in terms other than pure politics; for example, his categorical rejection of race-based affirmative action plans in cases such as FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980) is inexplicable in any other terms. In other cases, however, Rehnquist has emphasized the principle of judicial restraint in rejecting constitutional challenges raised by conservatives. For example, following his general theory that CORPORATIONS are creatures of the state and thus constitutionally subject to whatever restraints the state government wishes to impose, Rehnquist voted to uphold restraints on corporate political activities in cases such as FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON V. BELLOTTI (1978)—hardly a policy that most conservative politicians would embrace. In short, despite his obvious gifts, Rehnquist has never fully resolved the potential conflicts between "judicial conservatism" and the political conservatism with which it has become associated. Nonetheless, he remains one of the most important and influential justices of the post-Warren era.

EARL M. MALTZ
(2000)

Bibliography

BOLES, DONALD E. 1987 William Rehnquist: Judicial Activist. Ames, Iowa: Iowa State University Press.

DAVIS, SUE 1988 Justice Rehnquist and the Constitution. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

POWELL, JEFF 1982 The Compleat Jeffersonian: Justice Rehnquist and Federalism. Yale Law Journal 91:1317–1370.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H. 1976 The Notion of a Living Constitution. Texas Law Review 54:693–706.

SHAPIRO, DAVID L. 1976 Mr. Justice Rehnquist: A Preliminary View. Harvard Law Review 90:293–357.

REHNQUIST COURT

The Rehnquist Court began its reign in September of 1986 when President RONALD REAGAN appointed WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST Chief Justice to replace retiring Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER. This article reviews the first four years of the Rehnquist Court. Before his appointment as Chief Justice, however, Rehnquist had served as an Associate Justice on the BURGER COURT for almost fifteen years. Like Burger, he was originally appointed by President RICHARD M. NIXON to redeem a specific campaign promise to promote law and order through Court appointments that would stem the tide of WARREN COURT decisions protecting the rights of the criminally accused and to pursue his more general philosophical commitment to appoint "strict constructionists . . . to interpret the law, not to make law."

The Burger Court itself made a fairly quick start in redeeming Mr. Nixon's law-and-order pledge, although the Rehnquist Court has continued and in some ways even accelerated this redemption. It seems highly likely that the elevation of Rehnquist, in conjunction with two subsequent appointments by President Reagan and one by President GEORGE BUSH, will complete the more general transformation of the Court contemplated by President Nixon's commitment to STRICT CONSTRUCTION.

This broader transformation has been steady but slow. It has been steady because Republican Presidents holding the conservative values associated with "strict construction" have controlled the White House continuously since Nixon's election, except for the four-year interlude of President JIMMY CARTER, who did not have the opportunity to appoint a single Justice. It has been slow partly because some of the appointees did not turn out as conservative as expected and partly because some of the conservatives replaced other conservatives rather than liberals. Of President Nixon's four appointments, only one, Chief Justice Burger, remained consistently faithful to the conservative cause, whereas Justice LEWIS F. POWELL proved to be a moderate and Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN became increasingly liberal. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, appointed by President GERALD FORD, has also proved to be a moderate; one of President Reagan's first two appointments replaced a moderate, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR replacing Justice POTTER J. STEWART, and the other, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, replaced conservative Justice Burger.

The key appointment giving the conservatives on the Rehnquist Court a clear majority on most if not all issues did not come until President Reagan's 1988 appointment of Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY to replace retiring Justice Powell. Ironically, this appointment was made only after the Senate, following a historic controversy, had rejected Mr. Reagan's first candidate to replace Powell, Judge Robert Bork, on the ground that he was too conservative. Kennedy, during his first two terms in office, has proved to be as conservative as many expected Bork might have been, and the principal effect of the Senate's rejection of Bork appears to have been that President Bush in nominating his first Court appointee, DAVID H. SOUTER, to replace liberal stalwart WILLIAM J. BRENNAN searched for a conservative who, unlike Bork, had published nothing indicating his views on any important constitutional questions.

"Strict construction" is sometimes equated with a strategy of interpreting the Constitution according to the "plain meaning" of the text or the intention of its Framers. In fact, however, this interpretive strategy had not proved so far to be of great importance, except with regard to the methodology used by the Court to decide whether rights not expressly mentioned in the text are impliedly protected, where a variation of it has gained prominence. The form of strict construction, or CONSERVATISM, that has gradually come to dominate the Court, however, has been based more on institutional and political than on historical or textual commitments.

Institutionally, most of the Republican appointees have been inclined to resolve any doubts about how the Constitution should be interpreted by upholding actions of other agencies of government. This inclination probably rests mainly on three interconnected institutional commitments: a vision of democracy that pictures majoritarian-responsive institutions as its centerpiece and the life-tenured Court as antidemocratic; a vision of the management of society as a complex matter best delegated to various experts and professionals, like school boards and other ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES; and a vision of FEDERALISM that views with suspicion the intrusion of federal power including the JUDICIAL POWER, into areas of decision making traditionally left to state and local government.

Politically, most of the Republican appointees have been guided or at least disciplined by the values associated with the constituency of the Republican party in late twentieth-century America. The Burger Court sat and the Rehnquist Court is sitting in an era when the historically dispossessed are actively seeking possession: blacks and other racial minorities; the poor and the homeless; women; gays; and other groups, like the handicapped, who have in different ways been marginalized in our society.

The Republican party has sought in a variety of ways to accommodate the interests of these groups, but it has been the party of mainstream America, not the party of the dispossessed. While Republicans and Democrats have vied for the "law and order" vote, the Republican party has been the more consistently and vocally anticriminal. The party has sought a moderate, compromising posture on the matters touching the protection of minority groups, women, and the handicapped. It has generally aligned itself at least rhetorically with traditional and to some extent religiously inspired moral views on controversial social questions such as ABORTION and homosexuality. While it has often conformed to the realities of interest-group politics, it has tended to resist governmental redistributive programs that would tax or otherwise interfere with property interests, preferring to rely instead on a relatively unregulated market to provide full employment and thus help the poor.

The behavior of the Rehnquist Court has been quite consistent with these political commitments, although at the same time, it is worthy of emphasis that a consistent and cohesive "Rehnquist Court" does not yet exist in one important sense. Even the conservative Justices sometimes disagree over outcomes and often, in important ways, over the rationale for decisions. As a result, the Court is often at least doctrinally splintered.

The Supreme Court, like the Republican party, has often sought what might be characterized as compromises; but on the whole, it is the Court of mainstream America, not the dispossessed. In a high percentage of important constitutional cases, its institutional and political commitments have pointed in the same direction. When these commitments have conflicted, it has to this point usually refrained from imposing its values, instead deferring to the governmental agencies whose decisions are challenged. There are some important exceptions, most notably in its resistance to AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs, but these have been few and on the whole restrained. For example, although it has sometimes protected PROPERTY RIGHTS against governmental regulation, its rulings to this point do not remotely promise a return to pre-NEW DEAL ideology. Occasionally, chiefly in FREEDOM OF SPEECH cases, it has acted in ways that might be interpreted as neither institutionally nor politically conservative, as in upholding against regulation the speech rights of flag burners, but such cases are also rare. The Rehnquist Court has been, largely but not completely, a passively rather than an actively conservative court.

In one view the Court's overall performance shows only that the system is working as it is supposed to work: the presidential appointment power is the main effective check on these nine Justices who are accountable to no electorate, and twenty years of Republican Presidents has had an effect on the Supreme Court.

The Rehnquist Court has continued the Burger Court's contraction of the RIGHTS OF THE CRIMINALLY ACCUSED and convicted, in general subordinating these rights to law-and-order concerns, except in a subclass of cases in which the prosecution behaved outrageously in a way that might have tainted the guilt determination. Both courts have restricted the application of the FOURTH AMENDMENT's prohibition of unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES and the Fifth Amendment's prohibition of compulsory self-incrimination, limited the scope of the EXCLUSIONARY RULE, interpreted the Eighth Amendment so as to allow the states great discretion in reinstituting and administering CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, and virtually eliminated the possibility of HABEAS CORPUS and other postconviction challenges to final judgments of criminal conviction.

UNITED STATES V. SALERNO (1987), in which the Court upheld against Eighth Amendment attack the pretrial detention of dangerous defendants, exemplifies the Court's law-and-order commitment. Maryland v. Buie (1990) is an example of the priority the Court gives to law enforcement goals over Fourth Amendment rights claims. In this case, the Court sanctioned the use of evidence turned up after an arrest in a "protective sweep" of a house, on less than PROBABLE CAUSE, that someone dangerous might have been in the areas searched. The Court seems prepared in many contexts to abandon not only the probable cause requirement but any concept of individualized suspicion as a condition to search, as in Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, (1990) where it upheld highway-checkpoint sobriety testing. Teague v. Lane (1989) made it much more difficult for constitutional claims by prisoners to be heard in the federal courts, holding that federal habeas corpus is unavailable for the assertion of a right not clearly established by precedent unless the right would apply retroactively. For all practical purposes, this ruling requires a prisoner to show that fundamentally unfair governmental practices might have led to the conviction of someone innocent.

The seeds of the Rehnquist Court's more general conservative agenda, also sown during the Burger Court era, include both broad propositions of law that serve to eliminate whole categories of potential constitutional rights and smaller but continuous doctrinal innovations that cumulatively have made ever more difficult the establishment of a violation of rights. The most important developments of the former have been the following: (1) the Court's unwillingness to interpret the Constitution to protect "implied" rights not explicitly mentioned in the text; (2) its limitation of the concept of constitutional rights to negative private rights against governmental interference, rejecting claims of rights to affirmative governmental assistance or subsidy; and (3) its understanding that the government's fundamental constitutional obligation is to refrain from targeting racial, gender, or religious groups for relatively disadvantageous treatment. It rejects any obligation of government to make accommodations in order to protect or benefit any such groups, and to some extent restricts government from making such accommodations for racial (although not for religious) groups.

Illustrative of the Rehnquist Court's narrow approach to defining the rights protected by the Constitution are Michael H. v. Gerald D. (1989) and Burnham v. Superior Court of California (1990). The former case raised the question as to how the term "liberty" in the due process clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT should be interpreted; and the latter raised the question as to how the term "DUE PROCESS OF LAW" should be interpreted.

In Michael H., state law conclusively presumed that a child born to a married woman living with her husband was a child of the marriage. A genetic father argued that this law infringed on his "liberty" interest in establishing his paternity. In many prior cases, the Court had held that "liberty," in the due process clause, included implied FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS not expressly mentioned in the Constitution when they were "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty" or "deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition." These formulations do not answer the questions of how and at what level of abstractness traditional values should be identified. The Michael H. plurality, following the Burger Court's lead in BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986), chose to conceptualize this question very narrowly, asking not even whether our traditions recognize the rights of natural fathers, but rather whether they recognize those of adulterous natural fathers; on this basis the Court rejected the claim.

This historically concrete way of identifying constitutional rights does not necessarily eliminate implied constitutional rights, first, because the Court might (or might not) let stand previously announced implied rights, and second, because it is always possible that some small number of states might in the future restrict rights that have been traditionally and widely respected by all the other states. But it does very substantially limit the potential category of implied rights. Moreover, it does so in an odd way, given the traditional assumption that the main point of constitutional rights is to protect minorities: after Bowers and Michael H., the stronger, more widespread, and more historically entrenched a rights-restrictive majoritarian imposition, the less likely the Court will find a constitutional violation.

The Bowers approach was applied by four Justices in Burnham, with the concurrence of enough others to constitute a majority, to reject a claim that subjecting an individual to a state's JURISDICTION on the basis of his fleeting presence within the state amounted to a denial of liberty "without due process of law." The opinion of the four by Justice Scalia found that fleeting physical presence, which would have been thought a sufficient predicate for jurisdiction when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, had been assumed to be sufficient since then in many state decisions. This "continuing tradition" was sufficient to validate the practice of founding jurisdiction on a fleeting presence, whether or not it might otherwise be thought unfair.

Cruzan v. Director of Missouri Department of Health (1990) suggests that the Court is not prepared to scuttle the implied-rights doctrine completely, but is also not disposed to use it aggressively. The Court found a sufficiently concrete tradition recognizing the right of individuals to refuse medical treatment to imply that this choice was a protected liberty that included the RIGHT TO DIE under at least some circumstances. Nonetheless, it held that the state's interest in insisting that the choice be shown by clear and convincing evidence was sufficiently strong in the case at hand to justify disallowing a patient's parents from making the decision, even though the patient herself could not make it because she was in a vegetative state.

The best known and most practically important of the pre-Rehnquist Court's decisions protecting implied constitutional rights is ROE V. WADE (1973), where the Court ruled that the Constitution impliedly protects a woman's right to have an abortion. The Rehnquist Court's general unreceptiveness to implied-rights claims does not bode well for the future of this right, and some of the sitting Justices have already announced their willingness to overrule Roe. Whether or not the right to abort will survive may depend on the vote of newly appointed Justice Souter, but even if the right survives, smaller but incrementally important shifts in doctrine by the Rehnquist Court have already weakened it significantly.

These shifts had their genesis in Burger Court decisions protecting the implied "privacy" right of individuals to decide their own family living arrangements, but only if the challenged regulation "substantially interfered" with the right. This substantial-interference concept has so far been important mainly in privacy right cases, although it is theoretically transplantable to other areas of constitutional law. Its patent importance at this point is in the abortion rights controversy where, in one or another formulation, it has appeared from time to time in majority and concurring opinions, including those of the Rehnquist Court, and it might prove important if five Justices are not able to agree that Roe v. Wade should be overruled. Use of the substantial-interference requirement, which has been endorsed most consistently by Justice O'Connor, would enable the majority even if it is unable to overrule Roe, to allow much greater state regulation of abortion than prior decisions have allowed.

For example, although it is not entirely clear what the criteria are for deciding when a regulation substantially interferes with the right to abort, some opinions suggest that only a regulation making abortions illegal qualifies. If so, waiting periods, mandatory antiabortion counseling, spousal and parental consent requirements, and other forms of regulation previously held unconstitutional would become permissible in the future. Even if the requirement were construed to have a lesser meaning, such as "making abortions very much more difficult to obtain," greater regulatory discretion would be available in the future than it has been in the past.

The ancestry of the Court's refusal to recognize positive constitutional rights to governmental assistance are decisions of the Burger Court that effectively terminated enlargement of the "fundamental interest" branch of EQUAL PROTECTION jurisprudence bequeathed to it by the Warren Court, along with decisions that rejected the claim that liberties protected against governmental interference are also entitled to affirmative governmental protection.

The Warren Court has held that individuals had an equality-based right to the subsidized provision of "fundamental" services or rights they were too poor to afford, such as counsel and other important defense services in criminal cases. Warren Court decisions had suggested that which rights were "fundamental" for these purposes would depend on the degree to which they were of practical importance to people. The Burger Court did not overturn the particular rulings of the Warren Court, but early in its tenure, did effectively undercut the equal-protection basis of the doctrine and consequently its future growth, ruling that henceforth rights would be regarded as fundamental only if they were constitutional rights, irrespective of their practical importance. These opinions, however, left open the possibility that such "real" constitutional rights might sometimes include subsidy rights.

Burger Court decisions eventually repudiated this suggestion in holding that the right to abort, although a constitutional right, did not include the right to governmental Medicaid payments for abortions for those too poor to afford them. According to these decisions, constitutional rights are negative entitlements available to individuals only to stop governmental interference with the use of private resources.

The Rehnquist Court has perpetuated this jurisprudence of negative rights, holding in the abortion context, for example, that the closing of state hospitals to abortions did not violate the right to abort because the state's action left women who wanted abortions exactly where they would have been had the state never operated public hospitals—that is, dependent on their private resources.

DESHANEY V. WINNEBAGO COUNTY DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1989) suggests, moreover, that the Rehnquist Court's commitment to the jurisprudence of negative rights is pervasive and extends beyond the abortion issue. In this case, the Court held that governmental social-service officials did not violate the rights of a boy by failing to remove him from a father whom they knew was continuously beating him and whose beatings eventually resulted in severe brain damage to the boy. The Court found no violation of the boy's right not to be deprived of liberty without due process. It ruled that due process protects individuals only against the government's interfering with their liberty and imposes no "affirmative obligation" on government to take action to protect that liberty. Just as the "culprit" in abortion-subsidy cases is not the government, but rather the pregnant woman's poverty, so (in this view) the boy's father, not the state, was the source of his problem.

The Rehnquist Court's pursuit of a "neutrality" concept of the government's basic constitutional obligation arguably has fairly deep roots in constitutional history, but is grounded most immediately in the Burger Court's WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976) decision, which held that unless the plaintiff is challenging a law that expressly classifies people on the basis of race, he or she can successfully challenge a governmental action as racially discriminatory only by proving that it was undertaken for a discriminatory purpose. The vision of racial justice that Washington has retrospectively been understood to endorse in subsequent Burger and Rehnquist Court decisions interpreting it is one of neutrality in a double sense: first because the Constitution requires governmental racial neutrality, any use by government of race as a classifying trait in law is suspect and likely to be struck down. And second, because the Constitution requires nothing more of government than racial neutrality, its actions are immune from attack so long as it does not act for a racially bad purpose.

This vision has substantially constrained attempts on behalf of minority groups to use law and legal institutions to better their lots in two distinct fashions, one by way of constitutional legitimation and the other by way of constitutional restriction. First, a governmental action that produces effects that disadvantage minority groups to a greater extent than other groups is constitutionally legitimate unless a plaintiff can meet the difficult burden of proving that this relative racial disadvantage was a purpose of the action. Second, voluntary attempts by government specifically and expressly to benefit racial minority groups—commonly called benign or reverse discrimination or affirmative action—are seriously vulnerable to constitutional invalidation.

The Rehnquist Court has vigorously confirmed and extended both the legitimation and restriction branches of the neutrality principle bequeathed to it. In MCCLESKEY V. KEMP (1987), for example, it rejected, on the ground of a failure of proof of discriminatory purpose, a claim by a black criminal defendant sentenced to death that the state's death penalty was administered in a racially discriminatory fashion. McCleskey's discrimination claim was based on a statistical study that, controlling for extraneous variables, found that a black defendant charged with killing a white in Georgia was four times more likely to be sentenced to death than someone charged with killing a black. The Court conceded, arguendo, the statistical reliability of the evidence, but found that even this statistical pattern would not prove that McCleskey himself was sentenced to death because of racial considerations. The case evidently shows the depth of the Rehnquist Court's commitment to its neutrality principle. Even conceding the correctness of the Court's criticism of the proof as to this individual defendant, the statistical evidence showed systematic RACIAL DISCRIMINATION and therefore proved that some (even if nonidentifiable) individual black murderers of whites were being sentenced to death for racial reasons. Even proof of a pattern of purposeful racial discrimination that might well have infected McCleskey's sentence was not sufficient to establish constitutional illegitimacy without evidence linking this nonneutrality to McCleskey himself.

The depth of the Rehnquist Court's commitment to its neutrality principle is also illustrated by its interpretation of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, which prohibits among other things racial discrimination by employers. Burger Court decisions had held that proof that an employment practice disadvantaged minority group members to a greater extent than others, although insufficient to establish a presumptive constitutional violation by government, was sufficient to establish a presumptive violation of the statute by either governmental or private employers. On such a showing, the burden shifted to the employer to establish the business necessity of the challenged practice, failing which the practice would be found illegal.

In Wards Cove Packing Co., Inc. v. Antonio (1989), the Rehnquist Court changed this evidentiary framework in a way that requires the plaintiff to prove almost as much as he or she would need to establish intentional discrimination. After Wards Cove, the employer, in response to a showing that the challenged practice disproportionately disadvantages minority group members, need only come forward with some evidence of a business justification, after which the plaintiff must prove that the practice does not serve "in a significant way, the legitimate employment goals of the employer." A plaintiff who can meet this difficult burden will have come very close to proving that the discrimination was intentional because he or she would have shown that the putatively innocent purpose for the racial injury was a bogus explanation.

The restrictive branch of the neutrality principle arises in cases involving benign or reverse discrimination, a practice whose constitutionality was left extremely uncertain by a series of Burger Court decisions. The Rehnquist Court's decision in RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989) communicates at a minimum that a majority of the Justices (1) see governmental actions that allocate benefits to minority races on the express basis of race as equally or almost as constitutionally troublesome as actions that expressly disadvantage them on the basis of race; (2) believe that few goals are adequate to justify such actions; and (3) will insist that these goals be pursued through race-neutral means whenever possible.

The "degree of troublesomeness" issue is important because it directly affects the "level of scrutiny" or burden of justification that reverse discrimination cases trigger. Under basic principles of constitutional law that have largely been settled for some time, most laws are constitutional so long as they rationally promote legitimate goals of government. One major historical exception to this rule is laws that expressly classify people for burdens or benefits on the basis of race, which are unconstitutional unless the government establishes that they are necessary to serve goals of compelling importance, a justification burden that is very difficult to satisfy.

The special rule for race cases, however, developed in a line of cases involving governments' acting out of racial hostility or prejudice to the detriment of minority groups. Some have argued and some Justices have agreed that reverse discrimination, which does not share this characteristic, is not so constitutionally troublesome and therefore should be judged under a less demanding justification standard. Croson is the first reverse-discrimination case in which a majority of Justices were able to agree on the burden of justification applicable in reverse-discrimination cases. They found such cases sufficiently troublesome to invoke the demanding justification standard historically applied in hostile-discrimination cases, effectively adopting a broad rule requiring governmental neutrality with regard to race.

The remaining important question in Croson was under what conditions, if any, this demanding justification standard might be met. A variety of claims have been historically made in an attempt to justify governmental programs that expressly allocate benefits like admission to state medical or law schools or governmental contracts to minority racial groups. Some, for example, see such programs as justified by the goal of preventing the perpetuation of racial underclasses or castes, promoting racial integration in the professions or work force, or creating role models for minority youth. Although Croson is not the first and will not be the last Supreme Court decision to consider this question, a majority of the Court indicates that such goals will be treated skeptically. The majority apparently endorsed the view that only one goal was of sufficiently "compelling" importance to justify reverse discrimination, namely, remedying the effects of past discrimination. Although the decision is less than clear on this point, it seems to imply that state and local government must meet a quite demanding standard in proving that the minority beneficiaries of reverse discrimination are in fact suffering present disadvantages by reason of former discrimination either against the particular individual beneficiaries themselves or other members of their race.

A year after Croson, the Rehnquist Court upheld reverse discrimination authorized by Congress with respect to broadcast-media licensing in METRO BROADCASTING, INC. V. FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION (1990), applying a less demanding standard of review. Five Justices apparently believed that the Court owes greater deference to Congress in such cases than to state and local legislative bodies, for Congress is a coequal branch of government with a variety of constitutional powers that confer on it some degree of discretion in matters of national racial-commercial policy. One of the five, Justice Brennan, has since been replaced by Justice Souter, and it is therefore difficult to predict whether the Metro distinction between state-local and federal reverse discrimination or a uniform application of Croson will ultimately prevail.

The neutrality principle that has played such an important role in the development of race law has been equally important in SEX DISCRIMINATION cases, where the same basic rule applies: laws that expressly discriminate on gender grounds are suspect (although subject to a less demanding justification than racial classifications), and in the absence of express gender classification, a plaintiff must prove that a challenged action was taken for a gender-discriminatory purpose. The Rehnquist Court has decided no equal protection cases involving gender discrimination, but has given no reason to suspect that it will depart from its neutrality principle. In fact, its recent assimilation of the free exercise of religion clause to the neutrality principle indicates that its commitment to that principle is quite robust.

This assimilation occurred in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990), which presented the question as to whether Oregon's penalization of the religious use of peyote violated Smith's right to the free exercise of his religion. Before Smith, a law that had the effect of burdening a person's ability to follow a religion was unconstitutional unless shown necessary to the accomplishment of a goal of compelling importance. Smith holds that with certain very limited exceptions a "neutral law of general applicability" cannot be challenged as an interference with the free exercise of religion. The upshot is that, in the future, adjudication under the free exercise clause will parallel racial and gender equal protection adjudication. Laws that expressly require or prohibit religious practices are not religion neutral and will therefore trigger a heavy burden of justification. But laws that are of general applicability, like those prohibiting drug use, are religion neutral and are not subject to successful constitutional attack unless they were adopted or enforced for the purpose of discriminating against a religion, notwithstanding that their effect burdens certain religious practices. Thus, for example, a law prohibiting the serving of alcohol to minors could be enforced against the Catholic use of wine in communion, although the major religions probably have enough political influence to secure accommodating legislation, and the brunt of Smith will likely be borne, as in Smith itself, by minority religions.

To say that a principle of "neutrality" pervades the Rehnquist Court's jurisprudence of race, gender, and religion is not of course the same as saying that the Court is employing the only tenable, or the right, or even an internally consistent concept of neutrality, for neutrality is no more self-defining than "equality." With regard to race, for example, critics might argue that for the government to act in a truly neutral way its actions should not disproportionately disadvantage members of some racial groups relative to others, irrespective of its purpose, at least when the subject of the disadvantageous treatment is important. They might also say that even if purpose rather than effect is a proper measure of neutrality, the evidence system through which the Court determines purpose is nonneutral, for it rests implicitly on the assumption that government does not usually engage in racial discrimination, rather than the opposite assumption. Finally, these critics might say that the neutrality of current governmental actions cannot be fairly judged without regard to its past actions and, consequently, that what might appear to be a nonneutral conferral of governmental advantages to racial groups previously purposefully disadvantaged by government is better characterized as the pursuit of racial neutrality over time. The Rehnquist Court's neutrality concept might be seen as an attempt to compromise competing political interests, but the underlying questions of principle and policy certainly cannot be resolved by reference to the unadorned concept of neutrality.

No question in contemporary constitutional law better illustrates this proposition than what constitutes an unconstitutional ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. The Rehnquist Court has addressed this question several times, but has not yet supplied a clear answer. All of the Justices who disagree with its answer appear to believe they are being religiously neutral, yet their answers differ significantly. Three answers have figured prominently: (1) the government may not take actions that in fact benefit religion (a major part of the pre-Rehnquist Court test and one favored by some current Justices); (2) it may not take actions that amount to active proselytizing for a religion (the test favored by four Justices); and (3) it may not take actions that create the appearance that it is endorsing religion (the test favored by two "swing" Justices and therefore likely in the short run to prove determinative of the outcome of many cases).

These competing visions of neutrality were all at work in COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY V. AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION (1989), where the Court was called on to decide whether either of two Christmas displays by the city of Pittsburgh violated the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE. One was a crèche in the county courthouse, and the other a side-by-side display of a Christmas tree and a menorah in front of a public building. A majority of the Court, apparently pursuing what appeared to five Justices a neutral principle that would simultaneously assure that government does not help or hurt religion too much, applied the "no appearance of endorsement" test, and held the crèche unconstitutional and the other display constitutional. The Court found that the factual context of the first display created the appearance of an endorsement of religion, whereas that of the second created the appearance of a celebration of a winter holiday season. Those Justices who applied the "no benefit in fact" test would have held both displays unconstitutional for their nonneutral favoring of the Christian and Jewish religions. Those who applied the "no proselytizing" test criticized the other opinions for their nonneutral hostility toward religion and would have upheld both because neither coerced anyone to support or participate in a religion.

The establishment clause cases illustrate not only the elusiveness of the "neutrality" concept but also, when read together with the free exercise cases, an asymmetry in Rehnquist Court jurisprudence between racial and religious neutrality apparently reflective of the Court's "mainstream America" predisposition.

With regard to its legitimation function, the neutrality concept operates similarly in race and religion cases: regulations are legitimate even if they produce nonneutral effects, so long as they are facially and purposively neutral. With regard to its restrictive function, however, Rehnquist Court neutrality presumptively prohibits regulations that specially benefit minority races, but permits those that specially benefit religious groups, so long as they do not appear to endorse a religion (or, perhaps, so long as they do not actually proselytize).

The Rehnquist Court has also pursued its conservative agenda through numerous smaller but cumulatively important doctrinal avenues. One example is the privacy rights doctrine that interferences must be "substantial" before they will be regarded as constitutionally troublesome. Many other examples might be given, but one will suffice: the Court's use in free-speech cases of the threshold PUBLIC FORUM concept effectively to foreclose speech rights on most kinds of public property and its related apparent willingness to accept without serious scrutiny governmentally proffered justifications for regulating speech activities in the few public places where individuals do have the right to engage in expressive activities.

In free speech cases, the Rehnquist Court has been reasonable if sporadically protective of traditional constitutional rights. It has struck down many regulations restricting speech, not only in well-publicized cases, such as those involving FLAG DESECRATION, but in more mundane settings, such as newsrack placements and handbilling. One area in which it has been less protective, however, concerns the right to engage in expressive activities in public places, a right that has historically been particularly important to the dispossessed who lack the resources to project their views through other media.

The Court's tolerance toward restrictions of speech in public places derives from the Burger Court's legacy, but again, it seems fairly clear that the Rehnquist Court enthusiastically subscribes to the intuitions that informed that legacy. The questions as to whether and to what extent the free speech clause entitles individuals to engage in expressive activity on public property has been implicit in constitutional law for along time, but for a variety of reasons went largely unaddressed in early cases. The Court was not forced to confront it directly until the mid-1960s, when civil rights demonstrators began to use unconventional sites such as libraries and jails as demonstration locations. The early decisions often rested on unclear reasoning, although for at least a time, the dominant trend was to protect the demonstrators' rights unless the government could prove that the demonstration actually interfered with the normal use of the property.

The Burger Court eventually decided on a tripartite classification of public places and hence speech rights. Streets and parks were labeled "public forums," and speech regulation in these places was "sharply circumscribed." In particular, even so-called content-neutral or "time, place, and manner" restrictions were unconstitutional unless, among other things, they were "narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest." A second type of public forum consisted of places the government had voluntarily opened for speech purposes, and regulations here were subject to the same constitutional limits. All other kinds of public property were not public forums, and speech activity in such places could be prohibited unless, in substance, the government was simply trying to suppress views it opposed.

Because relatively few places were true public forums and therefore available for speech activities as a matter of right, one important question that remained concerned the circumstances in which the Court would find that property had been voluntarily opened for speech. Additionally, because content-neutral regulation of true public forums is far more common than content-based regulation, the practical effect of these rules on access even to streets and parks depended largely on the circumstances in which the Court would find that "time, place, and manner" regulations were adequately "narrowly tailored."

The current answers to these questions come largely from Rehnquist Court decisions and are not very speech protective. With regard to voluntarily opened forums, the main case is HAZELWOOD SCHOOL DISTRICT V. KUHLMEIER (1988), where the Court upheld the authority of public school officials to censor from a student newspaper articles about student pregnancy and the effect of divorce on students. Although the Court might have decided the case as it did on alternative grounds, its decision suggests that the category of voluntarily opened forums is a very small if not an empty one. It held that the newspaper was not such a forum because school officials had retained curricularly based editorial rights; therefore, even though the paper had always been open to the student body at large to submit opinions and articles, it had not been opened for general student speech purposes. The same theory would seem available for a wide variety of public property. Managers of public auditoriums, for example, might make their facilities broadly available, but retain the right to exclude certain subject matters (although perhaps not viewpoints). After Hazelwood, the Court, in this same vein, held in United States v. Kokinda (1990) that handbilling and fund solicitation on the sidewalk leading from a parking lot to a post office could be banned because the sidewalk was neither a true nor opened public forum, having been built for post office business purposes.

The most important case on the related question of when a content-neutral regulation is sufficiently "narrowly tailored" to survive constitutional attack is Ward v. Rock Against Racism (1989), where the Court appeared to hold that this requirement is met so long as the government can accomplish its goal better with the regulation at issue than without it. The Court did say that a regulation may not burden speech more than is necessary to accomplish the government's legitimate goal, but it simultaneously rejected the view that the government must use the means that would accomplish its goal with the least restriction of speech; it is unclear how these two propositions can coexist. For example, a ban on all picketing on a certain sidewalk would be more effective in accomplishing the goal of pedestrian free movement than no ban would. Thus, it would seem to be constitutional under Ward, unless it burdens speech more than is necessary; if it does so, it would seem that this is because pedestrian free movement could have been assured by means that are less restrictive of speech. How Ward will ultimately be interpreted is uncertain, but if one takes seriously the idea that any contribution toward a goal validates a content-neutral regulation—and related decisions of the Rehnquist Court suggest that it does take this idea seriously—the Court will have given speech rights so little weight in the balance that virtually all non-content-based restrictions on access, even to true public forums, will survive constitutional attack.

LARRY G. SIMON
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Capital Punishment and Race; Race-Consciousness; Religious Liberty; Right Against Self-Incrimination.)

Bibliography

ABRAMS, J. MARC and GOODMAN, S. MARK 1988 End of an Era? The Decline of Student Press Rights in the Wake of Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier. Duke Law Journal 1988: 706–732

Constitutional Scholars' Statement on Affirmative Action After City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co. 1988 Yale Law Journal 98:1711–1716.

ESTRICH, SUSAN R. and SULLIVAN, KATHLEEN M. 1989 Abortion Politics: Writing for an Audience of One. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 138:119–155.

FRIED, CHARLES 1989 Affirmative Action After City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co.: A Response to the Scholars' Statement. Yale Law Journal 99:155–161.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1989 Private Discrimation and Public Responsibility: Patterson in Context. Supreme Court Review 1989:1–51.

SOIFER, AVIAM 1989 Moral Ambition, Formalism, and the "Free World' of DeShaney. George Washington Law Review 57:1513–1532.

TUSHNET, MARK 1988 The Emerging Principle of Accommodation of Religion (Dubitante). Georgetown Law Journal 76: 1691–1714.

WERHAN, KEITH 1987 The O'Briening of Free Speech Methodology. Arizona State Law Review 19:635–679.

REHNQUIST COURT
(Update)

The Supreme Court moved in sharply conservative directions after WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST was elevated from associate to CHIEF JUSTICE, replacing retiring Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, and an even more conservative Justice, ANTONIN SCALIA, filled Rehnquist's seat in 1986. But its evolving DOCTRINES came in fits and spurts as the Court's center further shifted with subsequent changes in the composition of the high bench.

The balance on the Court changed dramatically in 1988 with President RONALD REAGAN's last appointee, Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, replacing Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, JR. Powell had been the pivotal vote on major controversies over ABORTION, AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, and the rights of lesbian and gay citizens. The balance, then, again shifted in 1990 and 1991 with the arrival of President GEORGE H. W. BUSH's two appointees, Justices DAVID H. SOUTER and CLARENCE THOMAS. They replaced the two most liberal justices, respectively, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., and THURGOOD MARSHALL. After his initial two terms, however, Souter broke ranks, and on the most divisive issues he now generally votes with Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS and President WILLIAM J. CLINTON's two appointees, RUTH BADER GINSBURG and STEPHEN G. BREYER. As a result, in the 1990s the Rehnquist Court often split 5–4 on its most controversial rulings. Kennedy and Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR cast the controlling votes, forcing more conservative Justices to accommodate their views of the Court's role and of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION.

The changing course of the Rehnquist Court is registered in its treatment of liberal PRECEDENTs laid down by the BURGER COURT and the WARREN COURT. Initially, a majority agreed with the Chief Justice's long-standing view of precedent; namely, that prior rulings dealing with CIVIL RIGHTS and CIVIL LIBERTIES decided by bare majorities always should be open for reconsideration and reversal. In the first four TERMS of the Rehnquist Court eleven precedents were OVERRULED along with twelve more in the 1990 and 1991 terms. Yet, overturning so many precedents in such a short period of time created a controversy that came to a head when the Justices considered whether to overrule the watershed abortion decision, ROE V. WADE (1973), in PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992). In a bitterly divided 5–4 decision in Casey, the Court's plurality and joint opinion issued by Kennedy, O'Connor, and Souter upheld "the essence of Roe" partly on the institutional ground that its reversal would hurt the Court's prestige and legitimacy. The battle over that decision apparently curbed the Court's appetite for reaching out to overturn liberal precedents. Since the 1993 term only one or two precedents have been annually overruled, which is in line with the historical average.

Rehnquist, nonetheless, commands a majority for many of the positions he staked out as a dissenting Justice during the years of the Burger Court. Notably, the Court has moved in more conservative directions on issues involving the RIGHTS OF THE CRIMINALLY ACCUSED, CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, FEDERALISM, and affirmative action. Kennedy, O'Connor, Scalia, and Thomas also share the Chief Justice's reluctance to approve lower federal court orders to achieve school DESEGREGATION, to expand SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, or to recognize unenumerated FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS.

The trend toward contracting the rights of the criminally accused that emerged during the Burger Court not merely continued but became more far-reaching, as the Rehnquist Court reversed decisions of the Burger Court deemed too cumbersome and unworkable for law enforcement. In California v. Acevedo (1991), for example, two precedents were overruled in holding that police may search any container in any part of an automobile stopped on PROBABLE CAUSE. In general, the scope of the FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibition of unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES has been sharply restricted. The doctrine that the Fourth Amendment protects "reasonable expectations of privacy," proclaimed in KATZ V. UNITED STATES (1967), became in the hands of the Rehnquist Court the touchstone for limiting the Fourth Amendment's application to WARRANTLESS SEARCHES and seizures, as well as for upholding random DRUG TESTING of students and employees. While the Warren Court's controversial ruling in MAPP V. OHIO (1961) extending the EXCLUSIONARY RULE to the states was not overruled, the "good faith" exception to it created by the Burger Court was extended to include police reliance on mistaken computer records of outstanding arrest warrants in Arizona v. Evans (1995). Likewise, the landmark ruling in MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) on the Fifth Amendment prohibition of compulsory self-incrimination has not been overruled, but the Court has approved numerous exceptions to the application of Miranda. In addition, the Rehnquist Court made it easier both to impose capital punishment and to expedite the execution of those on death row.

For the first time since the 1937 constitutional crisis over the invalidation of NEW DEAL LEGISLATION, a bare majority of the Rehnquist Court limited Congress's power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. In a series of rulings, including NEW YORK V. UNITED STATES (1992), UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995), Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida (1996), Printz v. United States (1997), and Mack v. United States (1997), Congress was held to have exceeded its inherent powers under the commerce clause and to infringe on principles of federalism. Nevertheless, the TENTH AMENDMENT has not been resurrected as the strong barrier to congressional legislation that it once was. The Court declined invitations to overrule GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985), which reversed an opinion written by Rehnquist for a bare majority in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976) asserting the Tenth Amendment was a limitation on Congress. However, in Printz and New York, the Court held that Congress violated the Tenth Amendment when it sought to "commandeer" state legislatures or administrative offices to carry out federal programs. In other respects, too, the Rehnquist Court's lack of deference to Congress is striking. In City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), the Court struck down the RELIGIOUS FREEDOM RESTORATION ACT as exceeding Congress's enforcement power under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, SECTION 5. Congress had sought to reestablish the standard set forth in SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963), effectively creating exceptions for religious minorities from otherwise generally applicable laws, that was jettisoned by the Rehnquist Court in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990). In City of Boerne, the Justices also stressed that the Court alone defines the scope of constitutional rights. Furthermore, in Alden v. Maine (1999), the Court held that the Constitution's federal "structure and history" not only shields states from being sued in federal courts but also makes them immune from lawsuits filed in state courts that seek to enforce federal rights against them.

Somewhat ironically, since a majority of the Rehnquist Court was appointed by Republican Presidents who embraced a strong view of PRESIDENTIAL POWERS, the Court has not been deferential to claims of presidential authority, except with respect to the executive's ability to reinterpret statutory authorizations as in RUST V. SULLIVAN (1991). Morrison v. Olson (1988) upheld the appointment of INDEPENDENT COUNSELS to investigate the President and his subordinates. CLINTON V. JONES (1997) unanimously held that Presidents may be subject to civil lawsuits while in office. Clinton v. City of New York (1998) struck down Congress's grant of the LINE-ITEM VETO to the President.

As indicated by its reversal of precedents and rejection of assertions of congressional and presidential power, the Rehnquist Court is conservative but not restrained. The Court's JUDICIAL ACTIVISM is evident as well in its rulings invalidating state, local, and federal affirmative action programs, from RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989) to ADARAND CONSTRUCTORS, INC. V. PEÑA (1995), which overturned METRO BROADCASTING, INC. V. FCC (1990). So too, in a line of 5–4 rulings following SHAW V. RENO (1993), the Court struck down the creation of majority-minority ELECTORAL DISTRICTS under the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. In these and other areas, the Rehnquist Court thwarted the democratic process and the authority of elected representatives at the national, state, and local levels.

Another major jurisprudential theme of the Rehnquist Court is its embrace of the liberal principle of governmental neutrality toward race, gender, and political expression. That principle of governmental nondiscrimination and freedom of expression is interwoven in rulings on the FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, on the one hand, and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT guarantee of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS, on the other.

The Rehnquist Court's commitment to the principle of equal treatment and nondiscrimination in enforcing the First Amendment is underlined by its invalidation of numerous laws aimed at punishing particular forms of speech, ranging from those outlawing FLAG DESECRATION and HATE SPEECH, to bans on "patently offensive" sex-related communications on cable television and on the INTERNET. At the same time, greater protection for COMMERCIAL SPEECH was given in 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island (1996).

In invalidating affirmative action programs, a bare majority of the Court emphasized the idea that "the Constitution is colorblind" and applied the strict scrutiny test to judge race-conscious government action. The Court, over Rehnquist's objections, not only repeatedly rejected the use of racially based PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES in jury selection but also extended the ruling of BATSON V. KENTUCKY (1986) to sex-based peremptory challenges in J. E. B. v. Alabama (1994). In addition, a majority of the Court appears to agree that STRICT SCRUTINY should be reserved solely for RACIAL DISCRIMINATION cases. The majority has no interest in expanding the categories of suspect and "quasi-suspect" nonracial classifications, or of fundamental rights and interests, to which the Burger Court suggested that the strict scrutiny test or an intermediate test of heightened scrutiny might apply. When finding impermissible SEX DISCRIMINATION in UNITED STATES V. VIRGINIA (1996), for example, a majority could not be mustered for explicitly declaring gender, like race, to be a suspect category subject to the strict scrutiny test. Besides reserving strict scrutiny for cases of racial discrimination, the Rehnquist Court invalidated some forms of nonracial discrimination simply on the basis of the RATIONAL BASIS test. Thus, the Court found no rational basis for laws discriminating against people with MENTAL ILLNESS in Heller v. Doe (1993) or against gays and lesbians in ROMER V. EVANS (1996).

In all these areas, the Rehnquist Court has been activist, not passive, in asserting its power. In two respects, however, the Court has exercised self-restraint. First, as noted, the Court is decidedly reluctant to recognize unenumerated fundamental rights, as with claims to a RIGHT TO DIE with the assistance of a physician. Second, the Court has become increasingly restrained in exercising its traditional supervisory role over lower federal and state courts, even when they render conflicting rulings. Fewer and fewer cases have been annually granted review and, consequently, the plenary docket has declined sharply. In the 1998 term, for instance, only about 80 cases were granted review out of more than 8,000 petitions for CERTIORARI on the docket. In historical perspective, the Court had not handed down so few cases in a term since 1953. By comparison, the Burger Court faced dockets of around 5,000 cases and annually decided between 170 and 180 cases, or about three percent, whereas the Rehnquist Court hears less than one percent of its much larger docket. In sum, the Rehnquist Court is conservative and activist, but also less concerned about correcting errors in the lower courts and about ensuring the certain and stable application of the law.

DAVID M. O'BRIEN
(2000)

Bibliography

O'BRIEN, DAVID M. 1996 Charting the Rehnquist Court's Course: The Center Folds, Holds, and Shifts. New York Law Review 60:981–998.

——— 1997 The Rehnquist Court's Shrinking Plenary Docket. Judicature 81:58–65.

SAVAGE, DAVID G. 1992 Turning Right: The Making of the Rehnquist Supreme Court. New York: John Wiley & Sons.

SCHWARTZ, BERNARD 1996 The Unpublished Opinions of the Rehnquist Court. New York: Oxford University Press.

SIMON, JAMES F. 1995 The Center Holds: The Power Struggle Inside the Rehnquist Court. New York: Simon & Schuster.

REID v. COVERT
KINSELLA v. KRUEGER
354 U.S. 1 (1957)

In a 6–2 decision, the Supreme Court invalidated a provision making the Uniform Code of Military Justice applicable to civilians accompanying the armed forces abroad, and reversed the COURT-MARTIAL convictions of two women who had murdered their servicemen husbands on military bases overseas.

Justice HUGO L. BLACK, for a plurality, held that neither the power to make rules for governing the armed forces nor any international agreement could free the government from the procedural requirements of Article III, section 2, and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

REITMAN v. MULKEY
387 U.S. 369 (1967)

By an overwhelming majority, California's voters adopted an INITIATIVE measure ("Proposition 14") adding to the state constitution a provision repealing existing OPEN HOUSING LAWS and forbidding the enactment of new ones. Following the lead of the state supreme court, the Supreme Court held, 5–4, that the circumstances of Proposition 14's adoption demonstrated state encouragement of private RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in the sale and rental of housing. Justice BYRON R. WHITE, for the majority, said this encouragement amounted to STATE ACTION in violation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, for the dissenters, argued that Proposition 14 merely withdrew the state from regulation of private conduct; the state court determinations of "encouragement" were not fact findings, but mistaken readings of the Supreme Court's own precedents.

Taken seriously, the Reitman decision implies an affirmative state obligation to protect against private racial discrimination in housing. The Supreme Court, far from reading the decision in this manner, has consistently rejected litigants' efforts even to invoke the "encouragement" doctrine there announced. Reitman thus lies in isolation, awaiting resurrection. But the trumpet call announcing the end of the world of state action doctrine, seemingly so close in the final years of the WARREN COURT, now seems far away.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

RELEASED TIME

Twice, in MCCOLLUM V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1948) and again in ZORACH V. CLAUSEN (1952), the Supreme Court considered FIRST AMENDMENT challenges to the practice of releasing public school pupils from their regular studies so that they might participate in programs for religious instruction.

The first such program, in Gary, Indiana, in 1914, provided that, with parental consent and cooperation of church authorities, children could be released for one or more periods each week to go to churches of their own faith and there participate in religious instruction, returning to the public school at the end of the period, or if the period was the last of the day, going home.

The idea spread to other communities, but, for a variety of reasons, quite slowly. In rural and small urban communities, such as Champaign, Illinois, it was found more effective to have the religious instruction take place within the public schools rather than in the church schools.

In Champaign in 1940, an interfaith council with Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Jewish representatives was formed to offer religious instruction within the public schools during regular school hours. Instructors of religion were to be hired and paid by or through the interfaith council, subject to the approval and supervision of the public school superintendent. Each term the public school teachers distributed to the children cards on which parents could indicate their consent to the enrollment of their children in the religion classes. Children who obtained such consent were released by the school authorities from the secular work for a period of thirty minutes weekly in the elementary schools and forty-five minutes in the junior high school. Only Protestant instruction was conducted within the regular classroom; children released for Roman Catholic or Jewish instruction left their classroom for other parts of the building. Nonparticipants were also relocated, sometimes accompanied by their regular teachers and sometimes not. At the end of each session, children who had participated in any religious instruction returned to the regular classroom, and regular class work was resumed.

McCollum v. Board of Education (1948) was a suit, brought in a state court by the mother of a fifth grader, challenging the constitutionality of Champaign's program. In the Supreme Court, counsel for the school authorities argued that the establishment clause did not apply to the states, and that the contrary HOLDING in EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1947) should be overruled. This the Court refused to do, reasserting Everson's conclusion about the scope of the establishment clause.

No more successful was the argument that historically the establishment clause had been intended to forbid only preferential treatment of one faith over others, whereas the Champaign program was open equally to Protestants, Roman Catholics, and Jews. Here, too, the Court found no reason to reconsider its statement in Everson that the clause barred aid not only to one religion but equally to all religions.

Where, the Court said, pupils compelled by law to go to school for secular education are released in part from their legal duty if they attend religious classes, the tax-supported public school system's use to aid religious groups to spread their faiths falls squarely under the ban of the First Amendment. Not only are the public school buildings used for the dissemination of religious doctrines, but the state also affords sectarian groups an invaluable aid, helping to provide pupils for their religious classes through the use of the state's compulsory public school machinery. This, the Court concluded, was not SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

Although the Court's language appeared to encompass in its determination of unconstitutionality released time plans providing for off-school religious instruction (and Justice HUGO L. BLACK who wrote the opinion so interpreted it), the majority reached a contrary conclusion in Zorach v. Clausen (1952).

Zorach involved New York City's program, which restricted public school participation to releasing children whose parents had signed consent cards and specifically forbade comment by any principal or teacher on the attendance or nonattendance of any pupil upon religious instruction. This situation, said the Court speaking through Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, differed from that presented in the McCollum case. There, the classrooms had been used for religious instruction and the influence of the public school used to promote that instruction. Here, the public schools did no more than accommodate their schedules to allow children, who so wished, to go elsewhere for religious instruction completely independent of public school operations. The situation, Douglas said, was not different from that presented when a Roman Catholic student asks his teacher to be excused to attend a mass on a Holy Day of Obligation or a Jewish student to attend synagogue on Yom Kippur.

Government, Justice Douglas said further, may not finance religious groups nor undertake religious instruction nor blend secular and sectarian education nor use secular institutions to force one or some religion on any person. Government, however, must be neutral in respect to religion, not hostile. "We are," he said, "a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being. When the state encourages religious instruction or cooperates with religious authorities, it follows the best of our traditions. For it then respects the religious nature of our people and accommodates the public service to their spiritual needs."

On the basis of McCollum and Zorach, the present law is that released time programs are constitutional so long as the religious instruction is given off the public school premises and the public school teachers and authorities are involved in it only by releasing uncoerced children who choose to participate in it.

LEO PFEFFER
(1986)

Bibliography

PFEFFER, LEO (1953) 1967 Church, State and Freedom. Boston: Beacon Press.

Released Time for Religious Education in New York City Schools. 1949 Public Education Association.

STOKES, A. P. and PFEFFER, LEO 1964 Church and State in the United States. New York: Harper & Row.

RELIGION AND FRAUD

Few responsibilities are more sensitive and difficult to meet than drawing a line between punishable obtaining of property under false pretenses and constitutionally protected free exercise of religion. In the one major case to reach the Supreme Court, United States v. Ballard (1944), the Court split three ways in its decision.

Ballard involved the conviction of organizers of the "I Am" movement, indicted for using the mails to defraud because they falsely represented that they had supernatural powers to heal the incurably ill, and that as "Divine messengers" they had cured hundreds of afflicted persons through communication with Saint Germain, Jesus, and others. The trial court had instructed the jury that they should not decide whether these statements were literally true, but only whether the defendants honestly believed them to be true.

On appeal the majority of the Supreme Court agreed with the trial judge. Under the principles of SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, it held, neither a jury nor any other organ of government had the competence to pass on whether certain religious experiences actually occurred. A jury could no more constitutionally decide that defendants had not shaken hands with Jesus, as they claimed, than they could determine that Jesus had not walked on the sea, as the Bible related. The limit of the jury's power was a determination whether defendants actually believed that what they recounted was true.

Chief Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE dissented on the ground that the prosecution should be allowed to prove that none of the alleged cures had been effected. On the other extreme Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON urged that the prosecution should not have been instituted in the first place, for few juries would find that the defendants honestly believed in something that was unbelievable. Nevertheless the majority decision remains the law, and is not likely to be OVERRULED after a half-century of acceptance.

LEO PFEFFER
(1986)

Bibliography

PFEFFER, LEO (1953) 1967 Church, State and Freedom. Boston: Beacon Press.

RELIGION AND FREE SPEECH

Religious speech was at the heart of the historical development of FREEDOM OF SPEECH principles—as any student of JOHN MILTON or the Jehovah's Witnesses can attest. But in recent decades, concerns arising under the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE caused religious speech to receive significantly less protection than secular speech, whenever the speech occurred in a PUBLIC FORUM or involved public benefits. This disparity is now diminishing.

Under the separationist interpretation of the establishment clause that flourished roughly between WORLD WAR II and the 1980s, the FIRST AMENDMENT was thought to bar government "aid" to the propagation of religious ideas. At the same time, with the rejection of the right–privilege distinction, the free speech clause came to be understood as barring the government from discriminating on the basis of viewpoint, and sometimes content, in the distribution of government benefits. These two principles were obviously in conflict. The free speech clause was thought to require viewpoint neutrality; the establishment clause was thought to require viewpoint exclusion from government benefit programs in many circumstances.

The conflict first came to the fore in WIDMAR V. VINCENT (1981). A public university extended the benefit of free access to meeting rooms to all student organizations, but out of concern for the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, denied this benefit to groups who were engaged in religious speech or activity. Although the appellate court ruled against the religious students, the Supreme Court reversed, and established the principle that when the government has created a forum for free speech, religious speakers are entitled to take equal advantage of it.

In two cases in 1995, these principles were extended to more difficult and controversial contexts. In CAPITOL SQUARE REVIEW & ADVISORY BOARD V. PINETTE (1995), the Court faced the issue of whether a group (which happened to be the Ku Klux Klan, although it was treated as an ordinary religious speaker) could display a large cross in a municipal square, in a space that had been opened for display of symbols by private speakers. Four Justices, led by ANTONIN SCALIA, advocated a categorical principle that the establishment clause does not bar private religious expression on government PROPERTY, if a forum has been opened to the public for speech and permission to speak, if any, was granted on the same terms as other private groups. Three Justices, led by SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, maintained that each case should be evaluated on its facts to determine whether a reasonable observer would perceive governmental endorsement.

In ROSENBERGER V. RECTOR & VISITORS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA (1995), the equal access principle was extended to the "metaphorical" forum of student activities funding. The Court held that a student publication that was otherwise eligible for funding could not be excluded on the basis of its religious orientation.

In these cases, therefore, the Court resolved the apparent conflict between free speech and establishment clause principles by extending the principle of viewpoint neutrality (originally a free speech DOCTRINE) to the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, in place of the prior emphasis on no-aid separationism.

MICHAEL W. MCCONNELL
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Accommodation of Religion; Government Aid to Religious Institutions; Religious Symbols in Public Places.)

RELIGION AND SECULARISM IN CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION AND DEMOCRATIC DEBATE

Although the FIRST AMENDMENT forbids any law "respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," the term "religion" is not defined. In its first efforts to define the term, the Supreme Court adopted a theistic approach: In DAVIS V. BEASON (1890), the Court described religion as "[having] reference to one's views of his relations to his Creator, and to the obligations they impose or reverence for his being and character, and of obedience to his will." Similarly, in 1931, Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES wrote that "the essence of religion is belief in a relation to God involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation."

Theistic definitions of religion most likely reflect the majority view of those who drafted and adopted the Constitution. The nineteenth and twentieth centuries, however, brought increasing numbers of nontheistic and pantheistic religious adherents to the United States. Responding to both the rise of religious pluralism and modern developments in systematic theology, in the 1960s and 1970s the Court experimented with broader definitions of religious belief. In UNITED STATES V. SEEGER (1965), the Court considered the conscientious-objector provisions of the Military Training and Service Act. After canvassing the works of modern theologians including Paul Tillich, the Court interpreted the act's accommodation for "beliefs in relation to a Supreme Being" to include objections based on what Tillich called one's "ultimate concern." Under this definition, any strongly held belief would qualify as religious. Expanding on this theme, in Welsh v. United States (1970), the Court held that "religious beliefs" protected by the act included any belief analogous or "parallel" to those of a religious person. Applying this definition, the Welsh Court rejected the defendant's own assertion that his beliefs were not religious. According to the Court, "very few registrants are fully aware of the broad scope of the word 'religious' as used in [the Act]."

Although the Court was interpreting a statute in the SELECTIVE SERVICE cases, its broad definition of religion was motivated by a concern that any narrower approach would violate the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE. Such a broad definition of religious belief, however, creates a host of conundrums: If any belief is at least potentially religious, how is the term "religion" meaningful as a class of beliefs and activities receiving unique protection under the free exercise clause? Moreover, expansive definitions of religion presumably apply equally to the free exercise and establishment clauses. Thus, if it is true, as some Justices have suggested, that ethical systems like "secular humanism" are religions protected under the Constitution, then public school administrators arguably have "established religion" any time they attempt to inculcate secular values in their students.

In the decades following the selective service cases, in cases such as WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972) and THOMAS V. INDIANA REVIEW BOARD (1981), the Court occasionally suggested in dicta that the Constitution protects only religious belief, not secular philosophy. Nevertheless, the Court has never specifically defined the term "religion" under the Constitution, and has expressly stated that "religious beliefs need not be acceptable, logical, consistent, or comprehensible to others in order to merit First Amendment protection." In practice, it is extremely rare for a court to dispose a RELIGIOUS LIBERTY claim on the ground that the belief at issue is "secular" and not "religious." Most free exercise opinions focus not on the religious nature of the individual's beliefs, but on whether the government was justified in its refusal to accommodate those beliefs.

Despite these difficulties in defining what is religious and what is secular, two recurrent themes of constitutional commentary raise the issue of religion and secularism in democratic debate. First, to what extent does the Constitution protect or permit religious arguments in the public square? Second, to what extent is it morally appropriate to use or rely on religious arguments in favor of particular laws?

Under current interpretations of the speech and establishment clauses, not only is it permissible for a private individual to deploy either religious or secular arguments in democratic debate, CANTWELL V. CONNECTICUT (1940) makes clear that it is unconstitutional to prohibit such expression. Similarly, private individuals may rely on religious arguments in deciding whether or not to vote in favor of a particular public policy. Indeed, such reliance probably could not be prevented.

A more difficult question is posed when legislators use or rely on religious rationales in their decisions to vote on proposed laws. Under the LEMON TEST for establishment clause violations, all laws must have a secular purpose. This rule does not invalidate laws that coincide with religious principles; that would require invalidating much of the civil and criminal code, including laws against murder. The Court requires only that laws have some secular purpose, even if the law simultaneously advances some religious principle or belief. In theory, this leaves both legislators and private citizens free to use or rely on religious rationales, as long as some secular rationale suffices to justify the law.

In practice, however, the Court has not always deferred to the secular rationales offered in support of laws that were vigorously promoted by religious groups. For example, in Edwards v. Aguillard (1987), the Court invalidated a "balanced treatment" statute that required the teaching of both evolution and creation science, or neither, in the public schools for lack of a secular purpose. WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1985) invalidated a state "moment of silence in public schools" law in part on the basis of legislative statements supporting prayer in public schools. To the extent that religious adherents or organizations publicly advance religious grounds for the adoption of particular laws, they increase the risk that courts will discount secular justifications for regulation and hold that the law was solely motivated by a religious rationale.

During the 1970s and 1980s, there was an additional link between private religious advocacy and the constitutionality of particular government programs. At that time, the Court interpreted the "entanglement" prong of the three-pronged Lemon test as discouraging religious-based political discourse or, as some Justices put it, "political division along religious lines." These Justices believed that religiously motivated political discourse was such a danger to democratic debate that it justified—and most often required—exclusion of religious organizations from general government funding programs. No outcome in any case turned expressly on the "political entanglement" analysis, and, since the 1980s, the Court has downplayed the idea that religious political discourse is disfavored under the Constitution.

Even if religious arguments in the public square are constitutionally protected, there remains the question of whether such arguments are morally justifiable. Political theorists like John Rawls and Bruce Ackerman argue that participants in a liberal democracy should argue in terms that are accessible to all citizens, regardless of religious belief. Because religious-based arguments are inaccessible to nonbelievers, these arguments either should be voluntarily removed from public political debate or only presented in tandem with accessible secular arguments.

If people believe that both religious and secular arguments support their position, arguably they have a moral obligation to present the secular as well as the religious argument in public debate. Morally (and strategically) it seems better to use reasons that unite rather than divide. The more difficult issue, however, involves the obligations of religious believers who are not convinced that any secular rationale supports their preferred policy. In this situation, the believers face a difficult choice: They must present solely the religious argument (which is inaccessible to nonbelievers), advance secular rationales that they themselves find unconvincing, or say nothing at all. Under theories advanced by Rawls and Ackerman, the first option is off-limits; therefore, the religious believer must either dissemble or remain silent.

Such constraints are unacceptable to scholars like Michael Perry and David Smolin, both of whom argue that religious arguments are valuable additions to public debate. Perry argues that, since it is inevitable that some people will rely on religious rationales, it is better to welcome religious arguments to the public square where they can be debated and tested. Smolin rejects the idea that religious arguments are necessarily inaccessible to nonbelievers: Major religions like Judaism, Islam, and Christianity are premised on the belief in a very public and accessible revelation of God. Moreover, instead of being inherently divisive, religious arguments often may constitute a kind of common ground between individuals with otherwise polarized cultural or political perspectives.

Voluntary restraint theories, whatever their form, are efforts to combat what many view as the tendency of religious belief to polarize public debate. Ironically, however, some of the most important advances in CIVIL RIGHTS have been accompanied by impassioned—and polarizing—religious rhetoric. The most obvious examples are the historic speeches of the religious ABOLITIONISTS and activists in the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT of the 1960s. In the end, whatever might be gained by secularizing public debate might come at the cost of religiously inspired moral urgency.

KURT T. LASH
(2000)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE A. 1980 Social Justice in the Liberal State. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

LASH, KURT T. 1997 Civilizing Religion. George Washington Law Review 65:1100–1119.

PERRY, MICHAEL J. 1997 Religion in Politics: Constitutional and Moral Perspectives. New York: Oxford University Press.

RAWLS, JOHN 1993 Political Liberalism. New York: Columbia University Press.

SMOLIN, DAVID M. 1996 Cracks in the Mirrored Prison: An Evangelical Critique of Secularist Academic and Judicial Myths Regarding the Relationship of Religion and American Politics. Loyola of Los Angeles Law Review 29:1487–1512.

RELIGION CLAUSES IN INTERACTION

There has been a long-term tension between the FIRST AMENDMENT's two religion clauses, one forbidding government to promote or "establish" religion, the other forbidding government to abridge the "free exercise" of religion. On the one hand, under the much-criticized (but still formally governing) LEMON TEST, any government action whose purpose or primary effect is to aid religion violates the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE. On the other hand, under the Sherbert–Yoder test (the rule for a quarter century prior to 1990), the free exercise clause periodically required the state to accommodate religion.

Unfortunately, the Supreme Court's few direct confrontations with the problem before the mid-1980s had been unsatisfying. It was not until Corporation of the Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos (1987) that the Court addressed the issue at any length. In upholding Congress's exemption of religious groups from a general statutory ban on religious discrimination in employment, the Court simply announced that "under the Lemon analysis, it is a permissible legislative purpose to alleviate significant governmental interference with the ability of religious organizations to define and carry out their religious missions." This conclusory analysis prompted Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, who concurred separately, to accurately observe:

> On the one hand, a rigid application of the Lemon test would invalidate legislation exempting religious observers from generally applicable government obligations. By definition, such legislation has a religious purpose and effect in promoting the free exercise of religion. On the other hand, judicial deference to all legislation that purports to facilitate the free exercise of religion would completely vitiate the Establishment Clause. Any statute pertaining to religion can be viewed as an "accommodation" of free exercise rights.

Several major developments during the past decade have produced some thoughtful approaches to resolving the conflict between the clauses. First, the highly controversial ruling in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990) held that the free exercise clause affords no right to a religious exemption from a neutral law (i.e., one of general applicability) even though it imposes a substantial burden on religious practice. Abandoning the Sherbert–Yoder test— which had required exemptions from generally applicable regulations that substantially burdened religious exercise, unless there was a "compelling interest" for not doing so and the law was the "least restrictive means" for accomplishing that interest—the free exercise clause was reduced to prohibiting only those government actions that single out one or all religions for adverse treatment. By no longer demanding special treatment for religion, the free exercise clause's incompatibility with the establishment clause's "no aid" edict was largely eliminated. Still, the question remains: If government voluntarily exempts religion from generally burdensome regulations does this violate the establishment clause?

The other important efforts have involved the Court's implicit renunciation of the Lemon test under the establishment clause in favor of competing approaches, all of which speak to the interaction between the religion clauses. Some Justices have emphasized neutrality (which prevailed for the free exercise clause in Smith), urging that general policies that happen to benefit religion should not violate the establishment clause. But a majority of the Court has not unqualifiedly accepted that result for all state programs, and even the neutrality advocates have been unwilling to completely adhere to this view, seemingly approving (in Smith) gratuitous state exceptions for religion from burdensome laws.

The test that appears to have the widest support (although not yet formally adopted as a replacement for Lemon) finds that establishment clause violations should depend on whether a "reasonable" (or "objective") observer would perceive the challenged government action as an endorsement of religion. This seeks to ensure equal standing within the political community for adherents of all (or no) religious faiths. Specifically on the question of the conflict between the religion clauses, O'Connor, the endorsement test's creator, has explained that in determining whether special government immunities for religion convey a message of endorsement, "courts should assume that the 'objective observer' is acquainted with the Free Exercise Clause and the values it promotes. Thus individual perceptions, or resentment that a religious observer is exempted from a particular government requirement, would be entitled to little weight if the Free Exercise Clause strongly supported the exemption."

All church–state problems should be resolved by recourse to a broad principle that accounts for the major function of both religion clauses: protection of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. The standard to replace the Lemon test that was most promising in achieving this goal was Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY's "coercion" test. Threats to religious freedom may arise in a number of ways—by coercing religious beliefs either directly or indirectly, or by strongly influencing religious choice—and an important illustration of coercion is government compelled financial support, that is, use of tax-raised funds for religious activities.

JESSE H. CHOPER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Establishment of Religion; Sherbert v. Verner; Wisconsin v. Yoder.)

Bibliography

CHOPER, JESSE H. 1995 Securing Religious Liberty: Principles for Judicial Interpretation of the Religion Clauses. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

LUPU, IRA C. 1991 Reconstructing the Establishment Clause: The Case Against Discretionary Accommodation of Religion. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 140:555–612.

MCCONNELL, MICHAEL W. 1992 Accommodation of Religion: An Update and a Response to the Critics. George Washington Law Review 60:685–742.

RELIGION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

For centuries in the Western world, organized education was church education; colonial schools established on the American shores therefore naturally reflected a religious orientation. Prior to the early nineteenth-century migration of Irish to this country, the orientation of these schools was Protestant—a fact that contributed to the establishment and growth of the Roman Catholic parochial school system. Nevertheless, when the RELEASED TIME plan for religious instruction was initiated in 1914, the majority of Roman Catholic children still attended public schools. The plan thus provided for separate religious instruction classes for Protestants, Roman Catholics, and Jews. Roman Catholic Church spokesmen condemned the Supreme Court's decision in MCCOLLUM V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1948) invalidating the program. Previously, however, Roman Catholics had protested against public school religious instruction with a Protestant orientation, and had instituted lawsuits challenging such programs' constitutionality. Public school authorities in New York chose to formulate their own "non-sectarian" prayer, which was submitted to and received the approval of prominent religious spokesmen of the three major faiths. The twenty-two-word prayer read: "Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers and our country."

The denominational neutrality of the prayer, the Supreme Court held in ENGEL V. VITALE (1962), was immaterial. Nor was it relevant that observance on the part of students was voluntary (nonparticipating students were not even required to be in the classroom or assembly hall while the prayer was recited). Under the establishment clause, the Court said, aid to all religions was as impermissible as aid to one religion, even if the aid was noncoercive. The constitutional prohibition against laws respecting an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION means at least that it is "no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as part of a religious program carried on by government."

One year after Engel, the Court, in ABINGTON SCHOOL DISTRICT V. SCHEMPP, was called upon to rule on the constitutionality of two practices in the public schools common throughout the nation, prayer recitation and devotional Bible reading. In respect to the former it ruled immaterial the fact that, unlike Engel, the recited prayer had not been formulated by public school authorities, but was the Lord's Prayer taken from the Bible. The fatal flaw in the Engel regulation lay not in the authorship of the prayer but in the fact that its purpose and primary effect were the advancement of religion. This fact mandated in-validation of both Lord's Prayer recitation and devotional Bible reading. The Court rejected the claim that the purposes of the challenged program were the secular ones of promoting moral values, contradicting the materialistic trends of our time, perpetuating our institutions, and teaching literature. None of these factors, the Court said, justified use of the Bible as an instrument of religion or resort to a ceremony of pervasive religious character. Nothing in its decision, it concluded, was intended to cast doubt on the study of comparative religion or the study of the Bible for its literary and historic qualities, so long as these were presented as part of a secular program of education.

McCollum, Engel, and Schempp involved efforts to introduce religious teachings or practices into the public schools. EPPERSON V. ARKANSAS (1968) presented the converse, that is, religiously motivated exclusion of secular instruction from the public school curriculum. A statute forbade teaching "the theory or doctrine that mankind ascended or descended from a lower order of animals." The Court held that the statute violated the establishment clause, because its purpose was to protect religious orthodoxy from inconsistent secular teaching of evolution.

In Stone v. Graham (1980) the Court struck down a Kentucky statute requiring the posting of copies of the Ten Commandments (purchased with private contributions) on the walls of all the public school classrooms in the state. The statute, it held, had no secular purpose; unlike the second part of the Commandments, the first (worshiping God, avoiding idolatry, not taking the Lord's name in vain, and observing the Sabbath) concerned religious rather than secular duties.

WIDMAR V. VINCENT (1981) manifests a more tolerant approach in respect to colleges than to elementary and secondary schools. With but one dissent, the Court held that where state university facilities were open to groups and speakers of all kinds, they must also be open for use by an organization of evangelical Christian students for prayer, hymns, Bible commentary, and discussion of religious views and experience. As construed by the Court, the establishment clause did not mandate such exclusion; on the contrary, the state's interest in enforcing its own constitution's church-state separation clause was not sufficiently "compelling" to justify content-barred discrimination forbidden by the FREEDOM OF SPEECH clause.

However, in Jaffree v. Board of School Commissioners (1984) the Court affirmed without opinion a Court of Appeals decision ruling unconstitutional an Alabama law authorizing voluntary participation in a prayer formulated by the legislators; and a year later, in WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1985) it invalidated another section of the statute that required a one-minute period of silence for "meditation or voluntary prayer." The provision, the Court said, did not have a valid secular purpose, but rather one that sought to return prayer to the public schools.

LEO PFEFFER
(1986)

Bibliography

PFEFFER, LEO (1953) 1967 Church, State and Freedom. Boston: Beacon Press.

STOKES, A. P. and PFEFFER, LEO 1964 Church and State in the United States. New York: Harper & Row.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1984 American Constitutional Law. Chap. 14. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

RELIGION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS (Update 1)

Despite several Supreme Court decisions on religion in public schools, conflict in this area has proliferated in recent years. One example is the discord that persists over the teaching of evolution. In EPPERSON V. ARKANSAS (1968) the Court struck down a statute prohibiting the teaching of evolution. In Edwards v. Aguillard (1987) the Court invalidated a Louisiana statute requiring that "creation science" be given equal exposure in public schools where evolution is taught. (Among other things, creation science teaches that plants and animals were created substantially as they now exist.) The majority reasoned that the statute was intended to promote the biblical version of creation or to hamper the teaching of evolution for religious reasons. However, the Court did not hold that teaching CREATIONISM is unconstitutional.

In several cases, religious parents have tried to turn the Court's expansive interpretation of the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE to their advantage by alleging that public schools were unconstitutionally establishing a religion of secular humanism. Although the Supreme Court has not tackled this issue, the lower federal courts have uniformly rejected these claims. These results seem appropriate. The Supreme Court has stated that nontheistic faiths, including secular humanism, can qualify as FIRST AMENDMENT religions. However, if secular humanism is defined narrowly enough to be a specific religion, the public schools are not establishing it, for they promote no particular dogma or rituals. In contrast, if secular humanism is defined broadly enough to include the education given in public schools, it ceases to be a religion for First Amendment purposes. A contrary conclusion would impel the untenable result that virtually any secular enthusiasm, such as music, art, or sports, would be considered a religion and thus barred from the public schools.

This conclusion does not end all controversy, however; parents often charge that teaching in public schools is inimical to their religious beliefs and therefore violates their right to free exercise of religion. The Supreme Court has not yet dealt with this issue, and its pronouncements elsewhere offer little guidance. The Court has often stated that a substantial burden of free exercise can be justified only by a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST pursued by the least restrictive means. Public schools have denied that their teaching burdens free exercise at all because their teaching is secular, not religious; children need not accept what is taught, and children are not compelled to attend public schools, but are free to attend private schools. Dissatisfied parents reply that free exercise is burdened if children are taught that their religion is wrong, although the children do not have to profess acceptance of the schools' teaching, and although others consider the issues in question secular. These parents stress that young impressionable children may not understand that they are free to reject the school's teaching or may be too intimidated to express their disagreement. They also argue that the option of attending private schools is too expensive to remove the burden on free exercise.

Even if the curriculum does burden free exercise, public schools claim a compelling state interest in giving all children this education. Most observers concede that states have an interest in teaching basic skills such as reading and writing. However, it is debatable how important the state's interest is in other areas, including moral values and sex education. If a public school does burden free exercise without compelling justification, some accommodation of the religious students may be necessary as a remedy. Many school systems excuse students from certain programs to which they have religious objections, and some schools provide students with alternative instruction. The latter approach can be expensive and administratively burdensome; the former may prevent the child from obtaining essential skills. Suggestions that children be given VOUCHERS to attend private schools, meanwhile, have been attacked as both violative of the establishment clause and destructive of the objectives of public education.

The legal need for accommodation may no longer be as pressing as it once was, however. The Supreme Court recently indicated in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990) that it has abandoned the "compelling state interest" standard. If the Court adheres to this position, public schools would not be constitutionally required to show a compelling reason for subjecting children to teaching that is hostile to their religion.

In addition to controversies over school curriculum, disputes have also multiplied over the use of public school facilities by student religious groups. In WIDMAR V. VINCENT (1981), the Supreme Court insisted that public university facilities generally available to student groups and speakers also be open to student religious groups. In 1984, Congress tried to extend this principle to secondary schools by adopting the Equal Access Act, which forbids public secondary schools from discriminating on the basis of the content of speech when affording student groups access to school facilities outside school hours. However, the school may not sponsor, and school employees may not participate in, student religious groups.

Some critics believed that the act was unconstitutional because of the possibility that school employees would become involved and that students would perceive the provision of facilities to student religious groups as endorsing religion. The Court disagreed in BOARD OF EDUCATION OF WESTSIDE COMMUNITY SCHOOLS V. MERGENS (1990), holding that the act did not violate the establishment clause.

Although the Court has repeatedly struck down daily school prayers, many schools have included prayers or benedictions in special school events. The Supreme Court has upheld the opening of legislative sessions with prayers in MARSH V. CHAMBERS (1983), but the differences in the public school context have persuaded some lower courts that the practice cannot be permitted there.

The Supreme Court has said that public schools may study the Bible as literature and history, but not for devotional purposes. This has required lower courts to decide case by case whether particular programs meet this standard or improperly include religious indoctrination.

Public school teachers occasionally endorse or criticize religious beliefs in the classroom. Courts generally have tried to distinguish between teachers' statements of their own beliefs, which are permissible and protected by the rights of free speech and free exercise, and propagandizing, which infringes on both the students' right of free exercise and the establishment clause. Lower courts have also upheld regulations against teachers' regularly wearing distinctively religious garb.

GEORGE W. DENT
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Equal Access; Religious Fundamentalism; Religious Liberty; Separation of Church and State.)

Bibliography

DENT, GEORGE W. 1988 Religious Children, Secular Schools. Southern California Law Review 61:863–941.

STROSSEN, NADINE 1986 "Secular Humanism" and "Scientific Creationism": Proposed Standards for Reviving Curricular Decisions Affecting Students' Religious Freedom. Ohio State Law Journal 47:333–407.

RELIGION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS
(Update 2)

The place of religion in public schools has been the subject of significant controversy in America for well over a century. A number of different issues related to this general subject have come to the fore in recent years. First, the question of publicly sponsored worship exercises in public schools has remained prominent. In 1998, the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES defeated a proposed constitutional amendment that, if enacted, would have legalized state-sponsored worship in public facilities, including schools. In LEE V. WEISMAN (1992), the Supreme Court ruled that the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE prohibited officially sponsored prayer at public middle school commencement ceremonies. Although the ruling in Lee clearly extended to all public schools through and including high school, many state universities have continued to have prayer at commencements. For those who believe that the primary focus of the establishment clause is to forbid state coercion on matters of religion, the age and maturity difference between university graduates and younger students may be sufficient reason to permit state universities to do what lower schools may not. A broader view of nonestablishment, focusing on the dangers of government sponsorship of religious exercise, would suggest that state university commencement prayers are no less unconstitutional than their counterparts at high school or below.

Another issue that followed in the wake of Lee is whether schools may arrange to have students decide whether to have student-led prayers at commencement. Although lower courts have divided on this question, most have held that school officials are responsible for the content of graduation ceremonies, and that official initiation of student-led prayers at commencement is also unconstitutional. Whether student speakers acting entirely on their own at commencement may engage in worship is a more difficult question, although words of personal spiritual commitment would be a constitutionally safer course than a student-led prayer involving the entire class or audience.

The issue of student-initiated prayers is connected to a larger question about student religious expression at school. Although student worship as an official part of the program at school-sponsored public events (athletic events and assemblies as well as commencements) is constitutionally questionable, much student religious expression in public schools is private rather than government speech and is therefore perfectly permissible. So long as religious speech by students is not school-sponsored, and does not constitute harassment of others, there are no grounds to suppress the speech simply because it occurs on school property. Of course, what constitutes school sponsorship, and what amounts to harassment, are frequently open to debate and controversy. School sponsorship implies active support, rather than a passive refusal by school officials to censor the speech. Harassment, too, requires more than trivial annoyance or an atmosphere of discomfort for some caused by the religious practices of others; for student religious speech to constitute harassment, ordinarily it must be personally hostile toward a particular individual or group.

Constitutional tolerance for private religious speech on school property extends beyond students in the years of compulsory education. In LAMB'S CHAPEL V. CENTER MORICHES UNION FREE SCHOOL DISTRICT (1993), a unanimous Supreme Court held that school officials could not exclude a community-based religious group from access to school property for evening meeting space permitted to other community groups. In a more controversial decision, a closely divided Court in ROSENBERGER V. RECTOR & VISITORS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA (1995) held that the university could not exclude a student-written journal of religious opinion from a program, financed by student fees, designed to subsidize the printing costs of student journals generally. Justice DAVID H. SOUTER'S DISSENTING OPINION in Rosenberger argued strenuously that the subsidy involved taxation to finance the publication of proselytizing religious messages, which he deemed forbidden by the establishment clause. Both Lamb's Chapel and Rosenberger represent the Court's continued rejection of government reliance on the establishment clause as a reason for permitting discrimination against private religious expression on government property, including schools.

In a different twist on religion in the public schools, the Court's decision in BOARD OF EDUCATION OF KIRYAS JOEL VILLAGE SCHOOL DISTRICT V. GRUMET (1994) invalidated the New York legislature's attempt to create a public school district in a community populated entirely by a group of Satmar Hasidic Jews, who live according to traditional European Orthodox Jewish folkways. The legislature had created the district so as to permit public financing of a school for learning-disabled children in the village; all other children in the village attended private Hebrew academies. Despite the attractiveness of this objective, the Court treated the law that set up the district as a form of sectarian religious favoritism, which the Constitution forbids. The need for the special district evaporated with the Court's decision in AGOSTINI V. FELTON (1997), which OVERRULED a prior decision that had forbidden publicly financed remedial teaching of religious school students on religious school premises. As a result of Agostini, the village of Kiryas Joel no longer needs a public school district within its borders; it may now obtain state support for teaching learning disabled children at the sites of the religious academies in the village.

IRA C. LUPU
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Accommodation of Religion; Establishment of Religion; Government Aid to Religious Institutions; Religion and Free Speech; Religious Diversity and the Constitution; Religious Liberty; School Prayers.)

Bibliography

LUPU, IRA C. 1996 Uncovering the Village of Kiryas Joel. Columbia Law Review 96:104–120.

PAULSEN, MICHAEL S. 1993 Lemon Is Dead. Case Western Reserve Law Review 43:795–863.

SHERRY, SUZANNA 1992 Lee v. Weisman: Paradox Redux. Supreme Court Review 1992:123–153.

RELIGIOUS DIVERSITY AND THE CONSTITUTION

In their 1993 book One Nation Under God: Religion in Contemporary American Society, sociologists Barry A. Kosmin and Seymour P. Lachman analyze the most extensive survey of American religion ever conducted. More than 113,000 Americans answered questions about their religious identity; nearly 90 percent identified themselves as religious, the overwhelming number (86 percent) as Christian. The remaining 3.3 percent, representing about six million Americans, included not only Jews, Muslims, Buddhists, and Hindus, but also approximately 23,000 Taoists, 18,000 Rastafarians, and 6,000 Shintoists, not to mention 8,000 Wiccans. One ought not, of course, believe that "Christians" represent any kind of monolithic community: 46,000,000 Catholics (26.2 percent of the American population) and 34,000,000 Baptists (19.4 percent), the two largest denominations, are joined in the category "Christian" by no fewer than 40 other groups, none of them containing more than 8 percent of the population. These range from such well-known groups as the Methodists (8 percent) and Presbyterians (2.8 percent) to Mormons (1.4 percent), Jehovah's Witnesses (0.8 percent), Christian Scientists (about 0.15 percent), and even smaller groups such as the Quakers and component groups within the broad category of Christian evangelical or pentacostalist churches. And, of course, one could easily point to dramatic differences within the approximately 2 percent of Americans who are Jews, as one places members of the Reform and Conservative wings of Judaism next not only to the Modern Orthodox, but also to the various Hassidic sects.

There are at least two inferences that one can draw from this list: First, it assumes that we know exactly what we are talking about when we identify persons as "religious" rather than, presumably, "irreligious." But what is it, precisely, that joins together the Evangelical Protestant, Reformed Jew, Buddhist, Scientologist, and Wiccan? It surely is not, for example, belief in a supernatural divinity who commands various behaviors at threat of divine punishment. Perhaps all that unites them is that they ask their adherents to think deeply about the purpose of life.

Why do we care what, if anything, all of these groups have in common? One answer is simple: The FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees in its text only the "free exercise of religion," as against, say, a general right to follow one's own moral precepts derived from Kantian moral theory or Benthamite utilitarianism. Several classic Supreme Court cases, particularly from the Vietnam era dealing with conscientious objection, attempted, with notable lack of success, to wrestle with the problem of defining religion. Many other first-rate minds have subsequently confronted the issue, though the various definitions presented have proved satisfying primarily to their authors and, alas, to few other scholars or judges.

Second, even if we are confident we can tell the difference between religious and nonreligious groups, we must confront the fact that the various groups that we call religious differ in far more than belief. There would be relatively little interest in "religious diversity and the Constitution" if all that differentiated religions were theology. The free speech provisions of the First Amendment, at least as interpreted by the modern Court, would be enough to protect the most outrageous theological (or antireligious) opinions. However, what triggers constitutional litigation under the free exercise clause is, not surprisingly, "exercise"; that is, action. The actions in question are, to be sure, predicated on beliefs—slaughtering animals or drinking wine or smoking peyote is a way of showing devotion to one's gods; one is commanded to refrain from participating in immoral wars or simply to refuse to engage in any kind of work on sabbatical days; and so on. But the nub of the matter is the activity believed to follow from such beliefs.

It is a settled tenet of constitutional analysis that belief and action are separable. Or so the Court has consistently claimed at least since the seminal case of REYNOLDS V. UNITED STATES (1879), where the Court had no compunctions about jailing a Mormon leader for the behavior of bigamous marriage, whatever its linkage to then-central Mormon doctrine. During the 1960s and 1970s, however, the Court seemed to modify the belief-action distinction when, for example, it required state unemployment compensation to be given to Seventh Day Adventists who refused, in violation of state law, to be available for jobs that required working on Saturday, SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963), or exempted the Old Order Amish in Wisconsin from having to comply with compulsory education laws that would have required Amish children to attend schools through age sixteen, WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972).

The belief-action distinction returned with a vengeance in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990), where the Court overturned the Oregon Supreme Court's holding that the free exercise clause required an exemption from Oregon's law prohibiting the use of peyote for Native Americans who ingested the drug as part of religious ceremonies. Implausibly distinguishing the cases mentioned above, the Court held that otherwise neutral laws could be applied to bar religious practices, whatever their importance to the group in question. Whatever the free exercise clause meant, it was not, apparently, the right to engage in any behavior that offended general legal precepts.

The clause did prohibit the state from passing laws that were (or seemed) intended to limit only idiosyncratic religious practices. In CHURCH OF THE LUKUMI BABALU AYE, INC. V. HIALEAH (1993) the Court struck down an ordinance passed by Hialeah, Florida, that was clearly an effort to prohibit members of the Santería religion, a syncretic blend of traditional African and Roman Catholic views and practices, from slaughtering animals. Hialeah made no attempt to protect animals from being shot by hunters or slaughtered by butchers. A truly general protection of animal rights would have been a different case.

In Smith, the Court seemed to suggest that legislatures could in fact allow religious exemptions; such accommodations, however, were not constitutionally required. Congress accepted this apparent invitation in 1993, passing, almost unanimously, the RELIGIOUS FREEDOM RESTORATION ACT (RFRA), which would have put all governments, national, state, and local, to the test of demonstrating that a "compelling interest" justified "burden[ing]" one's religiously motivated behavior. (Congress claimed that this was the standard established in Sherbert and Yoder.) The Court, however, invalidated RFRA in 1997, holding that the law was beyond congressional power, at least when applied to state and local governments; it was deemed an unacceptable challenge to the Court's institutional monopoly over CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. A number of states are passing their own quasi-RFRAs, however, and the general issues posed by the statute will certainly continue to be with us (and RFRA probably remains active as a limitation on the national government).

Even if there were only relatively few religious denominations, it might still be difficult to know in advance what sorts of accommodations a law like RFRA (or expansive reading of the free exercise clause, as in Sherbert and Yoder) might require. Can ZONING laws be applied to churches; do prisons have a duty to honor the dietary requirements of all (or any) religions; do Fundamentalist parents have a constitutional right to have their children excused, during the school day, from classes that are teaching "satanic" material; can bankruptcy law be applied to recapture religious tithes made within four months of the declaration of bankruptcy? All of these, and more, were the subject of live lawsuits following the passage of RFRA, and they serve to test any theory of the practical impact of religious diversity on constitutional interpretation.

SANFORD LEVINSON
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Nonjudicial Interpretation of the Constitution; Religious Liberty.)

Bibliography

CHOPER, JESSE H. 1995 Securing Religious Liberty: Principles for Judicial Interpretation of the Religion Clauses. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

EISGRUBER, CHRISTOPHER L. and SAGER, LAWRENCE G. 1994 The Vulnerability of Conscience: The Constitutional Basis for Protecting Religious Conduct. University of Chicago Law Review 61:1245–1315.

MCCONNELL, MICHAEL W. 1990 The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion. Harvard Law Review 103:1409–1517.

NOTE 1978 Toward a Constitutional Definition of Religion. Harvard Law Review 91:1056–1089.

SYMPOSIUM 1996 Religion and the Constitution. Journal of Contemporary Legal Issues 7:271–1516.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

See: Religious Liberty

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM RESTORATION ACT
107 Stat. 1488 (1993)

The FIRST AMENDMENT free exercise clause provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . prohibiting the free exercise" of religion, a limitation that today extends to all branches and levels of government, including states and localities. Until the 1960s, the clause had been narrowly interpreted: although religious belief was protected absolutely, religious conduct was protected only in limited circumstances, such as from intentionally discriminatory laws. Beginning with SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963), however, the Supreme Court broadened its interpretation, holding that the clause barred at least some unintentional, INCIDENTAL BURDENS resulting from the application of otherwise valid laws or policies. In WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972), for example, the Court held that the Old Order Amish could not be required by state law to send their children to school beyond the eighth grade, even though the law applied uniformly to all Wisconsin citizens and did not intentionally discriminate against or burden religion.

In 1990, the Court again narrowed the scope of the clause. In EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990) the Court confined the Sherbert–Yoder standard to cases involving similar factual or legal claims and held that the clause normally does not prohibit laws that incidentally burden religious practices, as long as they are "neutral" (i.e., not aimed at religion) and "generally applicable" (i.e., applicable to a broad range of persons or activities).

Smith ignited a firestorm of criticism, eventually prompting Congress to enact the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) of 1993. Initially cosponsored by Senators Orrin Hatch and Edward Kennedy, and supported by a diverse coalition of religious and other organizations, RFRA overwhelmingly passed the U.S. SENATE and the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, and was signed into law by President WILLIAM J. CLINTON on November 16, 1993.

RFRA's principal purpose was "to restore the compelling interest test as set forth in [Sherbert and Yoder] and to guarantee its application in all cases where free exercise of religion is substantially burdened. . . ." Specifically, RFRA provided that the "Government shall not substantially burden a person's exercise of religion even if the burden results from a rule of general applicability" unless "it demonstrates that application of the burden to the person—(1) is in furtherance of a compelling governmental interest; and (2) is the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest." RFRA applied to all laws—federal, state, and local—"whether statutory or otherwise, and whether adopted before or after [its enactment]."

By requiring a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST and the LEAST RESTRICTIVE MEANS—the so-called STRICT SCRUTINY of Sherbert and Yoder—RFRA displaced Smith in cases where religion was substantially burdened, but the law was neutral and generally applicable. This stricter scrutiny proved beneficial for some, though certainly not all, RFRA claimants. The government often had little difficulty identifying a "compelling interest," such as public health or prison security, but periodically failed to demonstrate that it employed the "least restrictive means" (i.e., that the compelling interest could not have been achieved without burdening religious practice to a lesser degree). Accordingly, it was this latter requirement on which successful RFRA claimants tended to prevail.

RFRA's application, particularly to prisoners, grew somewhat controversial with time, and the broad consensus favoring the abstract concept of religious freedom dissipated in the actuality of genuine legal disputes. RFRA's most serious problem, however, had little to do with RELIGIOUS LIBERTY as such; rather, critics asserted that Congress altogether lacked the power to enact the statute. In City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), the Court agreed with the critics and invalidated the statute, at least as it applies to state and local law.

RFRA had been defended under Congress's FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT enforcement power. Section 1 of that amendment imposes several limitations on the states—among them the guarantee of DUE PROCESS, which the Court had previously held to include the free exercise of religion—and it empowers Congress, in section 5, "to enforce, by appropriate legislation," these limitations. In the Court's view, however, RFRA was not a valid attempt by Congress to "enforce" the Fourteenth Amendment because it prohibited many laws that were constitutional under Smith, and because Congress had not made factual findings demonstrating "a congruence and proportionality" between such prohibitions and the prevention or remediation of actual constitutional violations.

Buttressing its holding that Congress exceeded its section 5 power, the Court noted concerns regarding both the SEPARATION OF POWERS and FEDERALISM. First, by displacing the Court's 1990 interpretation of the free exercise clause in Smith, RFRA appeared to be a congressional usurpation of the JUDICIAL POWER to render authoritative CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATIONS. Second, RFRA's application to all state and local laws appeared to be a congressional intrusion into certain legal domains reserved to the states. Although noting RFRA's incongruence with both DOCTRINES, the Court gave no clear indication of the independent significance of either doctrine.

The Court left open the question of RFRA's validity as applied to federal law, and the lower courts are presently divided on that issue. Although no Fourteenth Amendment or federalism problems exist, the separation of powers issue remains. Additionally, RFRA may violate the First Amendment prohibition on the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION because it protects only religious conduct and thus appears to favor religion over nonreligion. This was the position of Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS concurring in City of Boerne and remains an issue even if RFRA is otherwise valid as applied to federal law.

SCOTT C. IDLEMAN
(2000)

Bibliography

BERG, THOMAS C. 1994 What Hath Congress Wrought? An Interpretive Guide to the Religious Freedom Restoration Act. Villanova Law Review 39:1–70.

CONKLE, DANIEL O. 1995 The Religious Freedom Restoration Act: The Constitutional Significance of an Unconstitutional Statute. Montana Law Review 56:39–93.

GRESSMAN, EUGENE and CARMELLA, ANGELA C. 1996 The RFRA Revision of the Free Exercise Clause. Ohio State Law Journal 57:65–143.

HAMILTON, MARCI A. 1994 The Religious Freedom Restoration Act: Letting the Fox into the Henhouse Under Cover of Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Cardozo Law Review 16:357–398.

LAYCOCK, DOUGLAS and THOMAS, OLIVER S. 1994 Interpreting the Religious Freedom Restoration Act. Texas Law Review 73:209–245.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM W. 1996 The Failure of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act Under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Duke Law Journal 46:291–325.

RELIGIOUS FUNDAMENTALISM

Nathaniel Hawthorne perhaps best captured the paradox of religious fundamentalism in America in his stories about the Puritans. Repelled by the Puritans' intolerance, Hawthorne admired their realism and their unswerving devotion to principle. The latter trait he vividly depicted in his short story "The Gray Champion" (1835), where a first-generation Puritan mysteriously returns to Boston in 1689 to thwart the subjugation of the colonies by King James II. Like a fiery Old Testament prophet, the old Puritan—the "Gray Champion" of the story's title—denounces the usurpations of Royal Governor Sir Edmund Andros and urges the people to resistance.

The character of the Gray Champion symbolizes the Puritans' rigid idealism, an idealism that typifies religious fundamentalism in general. In Hawthorne's view, this idealism constituted both a threat and a promise to republican government. It constituted a threat because it fostered religious intolerance, which if enforced by the state, could destroy civil liberty. It represented a promise because it produced a firm commitment to moral principle, which if properly exercised, could help sustain republicanism. Hence the ultimate paradox of fundamentalism: Its intolerance may destroy republican government, but its rigorous attachment to moral principle may be needed to defend it.

One of the greatest achievements of American CONSITUTIONALISM was the manner in which it resolved this paradox by harnessing the moral idealism of fundamentalism while restraining its potential for bigotry. The Founders harnessed fundamentalism's moral idealism by stressing the importance of morality in civic life and by acknowledging the crucial role churches played in fostering this morality. At the same time, the Founders sought to temper fundamentalism's intolerance by ensuring that goverment power would never be used to resolve theological differences.

The Founders' arrangement produced an institutional separation between church and state even while forging a practical tie between religion and politics on the basis of morality. Religious fundamentalists were discouraged by the nature of the regime from using the government to promote their theological beliefs; but the door was left open for them to enter the political arena as citizens in order to promote government policies in accord with both the principles of the Constitution and the "laws of nature and nature's God" on which those principles are premised.

The political activities of religious fundamentalists in the new nation (primarily evangelical Christians) reflected the Founders' understanding of the role of religion in society. Many evangelicals opposed state funding of churches because they thought it corrupted religion, and gradually even the congregationalists who supported ESTABLISHMENTS OF RELIGION changed their minds. Hence, when evangelicals became involved in politics in the early nation, they generally sought to do so on the basis of principles of civic morality that were held in common by both reason and revelation. in the years before the CIVIL WAR, they entered the political arena by the thousands to spearhead crusades against dueling, lotteries, war, poverty, prostitution, alcoholism, and SLAVERY. These political activities on behalf of secular concerns proved that religious fundamentalism could fulfill a vital political function by serving as the political conscience of the nation.

Nowhere can this be seen more clearly than in the controversy over Cherokee removal from Georgia. Federal treaties had guaranteed the Cherokees their lands on the condition that they become both peaceful and "civilized." In 1828 and 1829, the Georgia legislature tried to legislate the Cherokee Nation out of existence, extending its laws over Cherokee lands and demanding that the federal government remove the Indians. The evangelical missionaries who had been working among the Cherokees rose to the Indians' defense. They based their arguments against removal not simply on biblical morality but on the natural right of property, the inviolability of contracts, and the God-given equality of all men proclaimed in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, which they argued applied to Indians as well as white men.

Unfortunately, both Congress and the President rebuffed the evangelicals' efforts on behalf of the Cherokees, and the government eventually relocated the Indians further west by force. The controversy nevertheless demonstrated that religious fundamentalists could fulfill the role that the Founders had created for them: they could put their idealism to constructive use by intervening in politics on the basis of principles of natural justice rather than doctrines of sectarian theology.

None of this is to suggest that religious fundamentalists completely forswore introducing sectarian theology into politics in the early nation. Before the Civil War, numerous evangelicals claimed that America had been founded as a "Christian nation," and many sought to introduce sectarian religion into public education. After the Civil War, some even wanted to amend the Constitution to recognize the authority of Jesus Christ and Christianity. In the twentieth century, widespread support persisted among evangelicals for state-sponsored prayer and Bible reading in the public schools. Nevertheless, these efforts were more the exception than the rule, and sometimes actions that seemed directed at obtaining state support for religion were actually much more complicated. For instance, evangelicals were vigorously criticized for trying to mix church and state in the early nineteenth century when they sought repeal of a law requiring many post offices to be open on Sunday. Yet one reason evangelicals found this law so offensive was that it compelled church members employed by the post office to break the sabbath in violation of their religious beliefs. Thus, evangelicals sought repeal of the law (at least in part) to protect a person's natural right to RELIGIOUS LIBERTY protected by the free exercise clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT.

The political significance of religious fundamentalism eventually diminished as the number of fundamentalists declined and as most remaining fundamentalists abandoned politics after the repeal of the EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT. Yet the very forces of secularization that some had thought decimated religious fundamentalism may have spurred its resurgence in the late 1970s and 1980s. As social ills proliferated and many persons became disenchanted with both the political liberalism and the moral permissiveness of mainline Christian denominations, evangelicalism prospered and political action by evangelicals reemerged with a vengeance. Social issues such as ABORTION, PORNOGRAPHY, and EUTHANASIA attracted the new evangelicals' attention, much as dueling, slavery, and intemperance had sparked the actions of their forebears in the nineteenth century.

In one key respect, however, many of the new evangelical activists were different from those who came before. In the past, most conservative Christians had continued to lobby for at least a limited state power to sponsor religious exercises, such as devotional Bible reading and organized prayers in public schools. Although support for these activities did not disappear in the 1980s, it did become much less noticeable, as evangelicals focused more on eliminating the government's power to restrict individual religious expression than on promoting a state power to promote religion.

This new emphasis on individual religious freedom can be ascribed at least in part to the changing nature of church-state conflicts in the 1970s and 1980s. Whereas previous church-state battles had focused on how much the government could do to promote religion while staying within the confines of the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE, new controversies concerned how far the state could go in restricting individual religious expression. Public high school students were forbidden by school authorities from meeting on their own during lunch or before school for prayer and Bible study. Churches were prevented from utilizing public facilities readily available for use by other community groups, and zoning laws were invoked to curtail religious activities in private homes. In addition, many parents faced the choice of either removing their children from public schools or allowing their children to be taught the permissibility of behaviors they found morally unacceptable. Some religious parents who tried to teach their children at home were jailed. These new conflicts caused many evangelicals to see government as the problem rather than the solution, and they accordingly sought ways to curb what they regarded as state-sponsored persecution of their religious beliefs and practices.

One result was an attempt to apply the free exercise clause to curriculum objections in the public schools. In 1986, a group of fundamentalist parents in Tennessee petitioned to have their children exempted from a school reading program because they believed the content of the readers disparaged their religious beliefs. The Tennessee parents did not want to change school curriculum; they simply wanted to teach their children reading at home, while allowing the children to participate in the rest of the school's academic program. The district court granted this request, but a three-judge panel on the court of appeals unanimously reversed. However, the judges could not agree on the reasons for reversal. One judge argued that the reading program did not burden the children's free exercise rights because it did not tell them what to believe. A second judge maintained precisely the opposite, arguing that a broader purpose of the reading was to inculcate certain "values"; according to this judge, this purpose gave the school district a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST in not allowing exemptions to the program. The third judge, meanwhile, claimed that the reading program did burden free exercise, but he did not want to issue a new precedent in this area without express guidance from the Supreme Court. This the Supreme court declined to give, although it later made clear in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990) that it had no intention of broadening free exercise rights. Smith suggests that further litigation using the free exercise approach is likely to fail.

In a related area, there have been efforts by evangelicals to have CREATIONISM taught in public schools. Unlike fundamentalists from an earlier era, the new creationists do not argue that evolution should not be taught; they only contend that whenever evolution is taught, "scientific creationism" must also be taught in order to protect the students' right to study different points of view. Hence, they argue their case in terms of ACADEMIC FREEDOM. In Edwards v. Aguillard (1987), however, the Supreme Court struck down a Louisiana law that adopted this approach as violative of the establishment clause.

One new rationale that has not been invalidated by the Court is EQUAL ACCESS, which calls for religious expression to be protected as speech under the First Amendment. The primary idea behind equal access is that religious individuals and groups should be accorded the same access to public facilities as nonreligious individuals and groups. For example, if a public library rents rooms to community groups for meetings, it should not be able to forbid religious groups from renting the rooms for religious meetings because this would be discriminating against certain groups on the basis of the content of their speech. Similarly, if high school students have the right to pass out political leaflets to their classmates on school grounds, then they must also have the right to pass out religious leaflets. The equal access rationale has been applied by evangelicals with particular success in the public high school setting, where many schools previously had denied religious student groups the same right to meet on school grounds routinely afforded to other student groups. The Supreme Court sustained federal legislation providing a limited statutory right to equal access in public secondary schools in BOARD OF EDUCATION OF WESTSIDE COMMUNITY SCHOOLS V. MERGENS (1990).

The development of equal access is yet another indication of how successful the Founders were in setting up a system where the political demands of religious fundamentalism would be framed in terms of generally applicable moral principles rather than petitions based on divine right. In America, religious fundamentalists have increasingly recognized that the same laws that protect other citizens also protect them and that they do not need special privileges conferred by the government to prosper.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Bender v. Williamsport; Cherokee Indian Cases; Government Aid to Religious Institutions; Religion in Public Schools; Separation of Church and State; School Prayers; Sunday Closing Laws.)

Bibliography

HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL 1970 "The Gray Champion," "The Man of Adamant," and "The Maypole of Merrymount." In Hawthorne: Selected Tales and Sketches. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston.

JAFFA, HARRY V. 1990 The American Founding as the Best Regime: The Bonding of Civil and Religious Liberty. Mont clair, Calif.: Claremont Institute for the Study of Political Philosophy and Statesmanship.

STOKES, ANSON PHELPS 1950 Church and State in the United States, 3 vols. New York: Harper and Brothers.

WEST, JOHN G., JR. 1991 The Changing Battle over Religion in the Public Schools. Wake Forest Law Review 26:361–401.

RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS AND GOVERNMENT AID

See: Government Aid to Religious Institutions

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Although the FIRST AMENDMENT's mandate that "Congress shall make no law respecting an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof" is expressed in unconditional language, religious liberty, insofar as it extends beyond belief, is not an absolute right. The First Amendment, the Supreme Court said in CANTWELL V. CONNECTICUT (1940), "embraces two concepts—freedom to believe and freedom to act. The first is absolute but, in the nature of things, the second cannot be. Conduct remains subject to regulation of society."

Although the Court has repeated this dualism many times, it does not explain what the free exercise clause means. There is no need for a constitutional guarantee protecting freedom to believe, for, as the COMMON LAW had it, "the devil himself knows not the thoughts of man." Even if freedom to believe encompasses freedom to express what one believes, the clause adds nothing, since FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS are specifically guaranteed in the amendment. Indeed, before Cantwell was decided, the Court applied the free speech rather than free exercise guarantee to challenges against state laws allegedly impinging upon religious liberty. Moreover, the word "exercise" connotes action or conduct, thus indicating that the framers had in mind something beyond the mere expression of a belief even if uttered in missionary activities.

In America the roots of religious liberty can be traced to ROGER WILLIAMS, whose pamphlet, "The Bloudy Tenent of Persecution for cause of Conscience, discussed in a Conference between Truth and Peace," asserted that it was God's command that "a permission of the most Paganish, Jewish, Turkish, or Antichristian consciences and worships, be granted to all men in all Nations and Countries." Another source was THOMAS JEFFERSON'S VIRGINIA STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, adopted in 1786, which declared that no person should be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship nor suffer on account of religious opinions and beliefs.

By the time the First Amendment became part of the Constitution in 1791, practically every state in the Union, to a greater or lesser degree, had enacted constitutional or statutory provisions securing the free exercise of religion. Indeed, it was the absence of a BILL OF RIGHTS whose proponents invariably called for a guarantee of religious freedom, that was the most frequently asserted objection to the Constitution presented to the states for approval. The necessary approval was obtained only because the Constitution's advocates promised that such a bill would be added by amendment after the Constitution was adopted.

Although the First Amendment was framed as a limitation of congressional powers, Supreme Court decisions have made it clear that executive and judicial action were likewise restricted by the amendment. Thus in Anderson v. Laird (1971) the Supreme Court refused to review a decision that the secretary of defense violated the First Amendment in requiring cadets in governmental military academies to attend chapel. As to the judiciary, unquestionably a federal court could not constitutionally disqualify a person from testifying as a witness because he was an atheist. (See TORCASO V. WATKINS.)

Since the Court's decision in Cantwell the states are subject to the restrictions of the free exercise clause no less than the federal government. Because our federal system leaves to the states what is generally called the POLICE POWER, there were few occasions, prior to Cantwell, when the Supreme Court was called upon to define the meaning of the clause. The few that did arise involved actions in the TERRITORIES, which were subject to federal laws and thus to the First Amendment. Most significant of these was REYNOLDS V. UNITED STATES (1879), wherein the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of an act of Congress criminalizing POLYGAMY in any American territory. In rejecting the defense that polygamy was mandated by doctrines of the Holy Church of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons) and thus was protected by the free exercise clause, the Court stated what was later echoed in Cantwell, that although laws "cannot interfere with mere religious belief, they may with practice." It could hardly be contended, the Court continued, that the free exercise clause barred prosecution of persons who engaged in human sacrifice as a necessary part of their religious worship.

Since Reynolds was charged with practicing polygamy, the Court's decision did not pass upon the question whether teaching it as a God-mandated duty was "mere religious belief" and therefore beyond governmental interference. In DAVIS V. BEASON (1890) the Court decided that such teaching was "practice," and therefore constitutionally subject to governmental restrictions.

Teaching or preaching, even if deemed action, is however not beyond all First Amendment protection, which encompasses freedom of speech as well as religion. In GITLOW V. NEW YORK (1925) the Supreme Court declared for the first time that the free speech guarantee of the First Amendment was incorporated into the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT by virtue of the DUE PROCESS clause in the latter and thus was applicable to the states. Accordingly, the Jehovah's Witnesses cases that first came to the Court in the 1930s were initially decided under the speech rather than the religion clause (LOVELL V. GRIFFIN, 1938; Schneider v. Irvington, 1939). It was, therefore, natural for the Court to decide the cases under the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test that had first been announced in SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919), a case involving prosecution for speaking against United States involvement in World War I.

In another sense, this too was quite natural since, like Schenck, the Witnesses were pacifists, at least in respect to wars in this world. (In Sicurella v. United States, the Court in 1955 ruled that a member of the sect was not disqualified from conscientious objector exemption because the sect's doctrines encompassed participation by believers in serving as soldiers in the Army of Christ Jesus at Armageddon.) Nevertheless, unlike Schenck and other opponents to American entry in World War I, the Witnesses (like the Friends) did not vocally oppose American entry into the war but limited themselves to claiming CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION status.

The Court did not apply the clear and present danger test in a case involving a member of the Jehovah's Witnesses whose child was expelled from public school for refusing to participate in the patriotic program of flag salute. In that case, Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940), the Court, in an opinion by Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, rejected the assertion as a defense of religious freedom. (See FLAG SALUTE CASES.) The antipolygamy law, he stated, was upheld in Reynolds not because it concerned action rather than belief, but because it was a valid general law, regulating the secular practice of marriage.

The majority of the Court, however, soon concluded that Gobitis had been incorrectly decided, and three years later the Court overruled it in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette (1943). There the Court treated the Witnesses' refusal to salute the flag as a form of speech and therefore subject to the clear and present danger test. In later decisions, the Court returned to Cantwell and treated religious freedom cases under the free exercise rather than free speech clause, although it continued to apply the clear and present danger test.

Unsatisfied with that test, Justice Frankfurter prevailed upon his colleagues to accept a differently worded rule, that of BALANCING competing interests, also taken from Court decisions relating to other freedoms secured in the Bill of Rights. When a person complains that his constitutional rights have been infringed by some law or action of the state, it is the responsibility of the courts to weigh the importance of the particular right in issue as against the state's interest upon which its law or action is based. For example, the right of an objector not to violate his religious conscience by engaging in war must be weighed against the nation's interest in defending itself against foreign enemies, and, in such weighing, the latter interest may be adjudged the weightier.

The majority of the Court accepted this rule, but in recent years it has added an element that has almost turned it around. Justice Frankfurter believed that a citizen who challenged the constitutionality of state action had the burden of convincing the court that his interest was more important than the state's and should therefore be adjudged paramount. Establishing an individual's right superior to the state's interest was a particularly heavy burden to carry, but it was made even heavier by Justice Frankfurter's insistence that any doubt as to relative weights must be resolved in favor of the state, which would prevail unless its action were patently unreasonable. Recently, however, the Court has taken a more libertarian approach, requiring the state to persuade the courts that the values it seeks to protect are weightier. In the language of the decisions, the state must establish that there is a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST that justifies infringement of the citizen's right to the free exercise of his religion. If it fails to do so, its law or action will be adjudged unconstitutional. (See THOMAS V. REVIEW BOARD OF INDIANA; UNITED STATES V. LEE.)

In accord with this rule, the Court, in the 1972 case of WISCONSIN V. YODER, expressly rejected the belief-action test, holding that Amish parents could not be prosecuted for refusing to send their children to school after they had reached the age of fourteen. "Only those interests of the highest order," the Court said, "and those not otherwise served can overbalance the legitimate claim to the free exercise of religion."

Religious liberty is protected not only by the free exercise clause but also by the clause against ESTABLISHMENTS OF RELIGION. In EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1947) and later cases, the Court has stated that under the establishment clause, government cannot force a person to go to church or profess a belief in any religion. In later decisions, the Court has applied a three-pronged purpose-effect-entanglement test as a standard of constitutionality under the establishment clause. The Court has held, in Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist (1973), for example, that a challenged statute must have a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion, and must avoid government entanglement with religion. (See SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.)

The Supreme Court's decisions in the arena of conflict between governmental concerns and individuals' claims to religious liberty can be considered in relation to the four categories suggested by the Preamble to the Constitution: national defense, domestic tranquillity, the establishment of justice, and GENERAL WELFARE. In resolving the issues before it in these decisions the Court has spoken in terms of clear and present danger, balancing of competing interests, or determination of compelling governmental interests, depending upon the date of the decision rendered.

Probably no interest of the government is deemed more important than defense against a foreign enemy. Individual liberties secured by the Constitution must yield when the nation's safety is in peril. As the Court ruled in the SELECTIVE DRAFT LAW CASES (1918), the prohibition by the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT of involuntary servitude was not intended to override the nation's power to conscript an army of—if necessary—unwilling soldiers, without which even the most just and defensive war cannot be waged.

By the same token, exemption of Quakers and others whose religious conscience forbids them to engage in military service cannot be deemed a constitutional right but only a privilege accorded by Congress and thus subject to revocation at any time Congress deems that to be necessary for national defense. However, even in such a case, Congress must exercise its power within the limitations prescribed by the First Amendment's mandate of neutrality among religions and by the EQUAL PROTECTION component of the Fifth Amendment's due process clause. Hence, in exercising its discretion, Congress could not constitutionally prefer some long-standing pacifist religions over others more recently established.

Exemption of specific classes—the newly betrothed, the newly married, the fainthearted, and others—goes back as far as Mosaic times (Deuteronomy 20:1–8). Since all biblical wars were theocratic, there was no such thing as religious exemption. In England, Oliver Cromwell believed that those whose religious doctrine forbade participation in armed conflict should constitute an exempt class. So too did the legislatures in some of the American colonies, the Continental Congress, and a number of the members of the Congress established under the Constitution. Madison's original draft of what became the SECOND AMENDMENT included a provision exempting religious objectors from compulsory militia duty; but that provision was deleted before Congress proposed the amendment to the states. The first national measure exempting conscientious objectors was adopted by Congress during the Civil War; like its colonial and state precedents, it was limited to members of well-recognized religious denominations whose articles of faith forbade the bearing of arms.

The SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT of 1917 exempted members of recognized denominations or sects, such as the Friends, Mennonites, and Seventh-Day Adventists, whose doctrine and discipline declared military service sinful. The 1940 act liberalized the requirements for exemption to encompass anyone who by "reason of religious training and belief" possessed conscientious scruples against "participation in war in any form." In 1948, however, the 1940 act was further amended, first, to exclude those whose objection to war was based on "essentially political, sociological or philosophical views or a mere personal code," and second, to define religion as a belief in a "Supreme Being."

In view of the Court's holding in Torcaso v. Watkins (1961) that the Constitution did not sanction preferential treatment of theistic religions over other faiths, limitation of exemption to persons who believe in a "Supreme Being" raised establishment clause issues. In UNITED STATES V. SEEGER (1965) the Court avoided these issues by interpreting the statute to encompass a person who possessed a sincere belief occupying a place in the life of its possessor parallel to that filled by the orthodox belief in God of one who clearly qualified for the exemption. Applying this definition to the three cases before it, the Court held that Selective Service boards had erroneously denied exemption: to one who expressed a "belief in and devotion to goodness and virtues for their own sakes, and a religious faith in a purely ethical creed"; to another who rejected a relationship "vertically towards Godness directly," but was committed to relationship "horizontally towards Godness through Mankind and the World"; and to a third who defined religion as "the supreme expression of human nature," encompassing "man thinking his highest, feeling his deepest, and living his best."

Because exemption of conscientious exemption is of legislative rather than constitutional origin, Congress may condition exemption on possession of belief forbidding participation in all wars, excluding those whose objection is selective and forbids participation only in what they personally deem unjust wars, such as that in Vietnam. The Court sustained such an act of Congress in Gillette v. United States (1971). However, independent of any statutory exemption, the Court held in Thomas that, at least in peacetime, disqualification of a person from unemployment insurance benefits for conscientious refusal to accept an offered job in a plant that manufactured arms violated the free exercise clause.

Closely related to military service as an aspect of national defense is national unity, cultural as well as political. The relevant constitutional issues reached the Supreme Court in 1923 in three cases involving Lutheran and Reformed schools, and, two years later, in two cases involving a Roman Catholic parochial and a nonsectarian private school. The former cases, reflecting post-World War I hostility to German-speaking Americans, were decided by the Court in MEYER V. NEBRASKA (1923) and two companion cases. These involved the conviction of teachers of German who violated statutes forbidding the teaching of a foreign language to pupils before they had completed eight grades of elementary schooling. The Court, in reversing the convictions, relied not only on the constitutional right of German teachers to pursue a gainful occupation not inherently evil or dangerous to the welfare of the community, but also the right of parents to have their children taught "Martin Luther's language" so that they might better understand "Martin Luther's dogma." The cases were decided long before the Court held that the free exercise clause was incorporated in the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause and therefore were technically based upon the teachers' due process right to earn a livelihood and the parents' due process right to govern the upbringing of their children.

In PIERCE V. SOCIETY OF SISTERS and its companion case, Pierce v. Hill Military Academy (1925), the Court invalidated a compulsory education act that required all children, with limited exceptions, to attend only public schools. A single opinion, governing both cases, relied upon Meyer v. Nebraska and based the decision invalidating the law on the due process clause as it related to the school owners' contractual rights and the parents' right to control their children's education, rather than to the free exercise rights of teachers, parents, or pupils. Nevertheless, since the Court's ruling in Cantwell that the free exercise clause was applicable to the states, Pierce has often been cited by lawyers, scholars, and courts as a free exercise case, and particularly one establishing the constitutional rights of churches to operate parochial schools. Had Pierce been decided after Cantwell it is probable that free exercise would have been invoked as an additional ground in respect to the Society of Sisters' claim; the opinion as written did note that the child was not the mere creature of the state and that those who nurtured him and directed his destiny had the right, coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare him for additional obligations.

Reference has already been made to the Supreme Court's decision in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette upholding the First Amendment right of Jehovah's Witnesses public school pupils to refrain from participating in flag salute exercises, although there the Court predicated its decision on the free speech rather than the free exercise mandate of the Amendment.

Jehovah's Witnesses' creed and conduct affected not only national defense through pacifism and alleged failure to pay respect to the flag but also governmental concern with domestic tranquillity. What aggravated hostility to the sect beyond its supposed lack of patriotism were its militant proselytizing methods, encompassing verbal attacks on organized religion in general and Roman Catholicism in particular. In their 1931 convention the Witnesses declared their mission to be "to inform the rulers and the people of and concerning Satan's cruel and oppressive organization, and particularly with reference to Christiandom, which is the most visible part of that visible organization." God's purpose was to destroy Satan's organization and bring quickly "to the obedient peoples of the earth peace and prosperity, liberty and health, happiness and life."

This is hardly new or surprising. Practically every new religion, from Judaism through Christianity and Islam to the present, has been predicated upon attacks against existing faiths; indeed, this is implied in the very term "Protestant." Clearly, those who wrote the First Amendment intended it to encompass attacks upon existing religions. (In BURSTYN V. WILSON, 1952, the Court invalidated a statute banning "sacrilegious" films.) Attacks on existing religions are almost invariably met with counterattacks, physical as well as verbal, by defenders of the accepted faiths.

The assaults upon the Jehovah's Witnesses were particularly widespread and intense for a number of reasons. Their conduct enraged many who felt that their refusal to salute the flag was unpatriotic, if not treasonous. Their attacks upon the Christian religion infuriated many others. The evidence in Taylor v. Mississippi (1943), for example, included a pamphlet suggesting that the Roman Catholic Church was responsible for flag saluting. The book Religion, by the Witnesses' first leader, Charles T. Russell, described their operations: "God's faithful servants go from house to house to bring the message of the kingdom to those who reside there, omitting none, not even the houses of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and there they give witness to the kingdom because they are commanded by the Most High to do so. . . . They do not loot nor break into the houses, but they set up their phonographs before the doors and windows and send the message of the kingdom right into the ears of those who might wish to hear; and while those desiring to hear are hearing, some of the "sourpusses' are compelled to hear."

The predictably resulting resort to violence and to law for the suppression of the Witnesses' activities gave rise to a host of Supreme Court decisions defining for the first time both the breadth and the limitations of the free exercise clause (and also, to some extent, the free speech clause). Most of the Jehovah's Witnesses cases were argued before the Supreme Court by Hayden Covington; his perseverance, as well as that of his client, was manifested by the fact that before Minersville School District v. Gobitis was decided, the Court had rejected his appeals in flag salute cases four times. The Court had accepted JURISDICTION in Gobitis, as well as its successor, Barnette, because, notwithstanding these previous rejections, the lower courts had decided both cases in the Witnesses' favor.

The Witnesses were not the only persons whose aggressive missionary endeavors and verbal attacks upon other faiths led to governmental actions that were challenged as a violation of the free exercise clause and were defended as necessary to secure domestic tranquillity. In KUNZ V. NEW YORK (1951), the Court held that a Baptist preacher could not be denied renewal of a permit for evangelical street meetings because his preachings, scurrilously attacking Roman Catholicism and Judaism, had led to disorder in the streets. The Court said that appropriate public remedies existed to protect the peace and order of the communities if the sermons should result in violence, but it held that these remedies did not include prior restraint under an ordinance that provided no standards for the licensing official.

Jehovah's Witnesses were the major claimants to religious liberty in the two decades between 1935 and 1955. During that period they brought to the Supreme Court a large number of cases challenging the application to them of a variety of laws forbidding disturbing the peace, peddling, the use of SOUNDTRUCKS, as well as traffic regulations, child labor laws, and revenue laws.

In Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940) the Court held that the First Amendment guaranteed the right to teach and preach religion in the public streets and parks and to solicit contributions or purchases of religious materials. Although a prior municipal permit might be required, its grant or denial might not be based upon the substance of what is taught, preached, or distributed but only upon the need to regulate, in the interests of traffic control, the time, place, and manner of public meetings. In COX V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1940) the Court ruled that religious liberty encompassed the right to engage in religious processions, although a fee might be imposed to cover the expenses of administration and maintenance of public order. The Constitution, however, does not immunize from prosecution persons who in their missionary efforts use expressions that are lewd, obscene, libelous, insulting, or that contain "fighting" words which by their very utterance, the Court declared in CHAPLINSKY V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1942), inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace. The Constitution also secures the right to distribute religious handbills in streets and at publicly owned railroad or bus terminals, according to the decision in Jamison v. Texas (1943), and, according to Martin v. City of Struthers (1943), to ring doorbells in order to offer house occupants religious literature although, of course, not to force oneself into the house for that purpose.

Related to the domestic tranquillity aspects of Jehovah's Witnesses claims to use public streets and parks are the claims of other feared or unpopular minority religious groups (often referred to as "sects" or, more recently, "CULTS") to free exercise in publicly owned areas. In HEF-

FROM V. INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (ISKCON) (1981) the Court held that a state rule limiting to specific booths the sale or distribution of merchandise, including printed material, on public fair grounds did not violate the free exercise clause when applied to members of ISKCON whose ritual required its members to go into all public places to distribute or sell its religious literature and to solicit donations.

Discriminatory treatment, however, is not constitutionally permissible. Thus, in Cruz v. Beto (1972) the Supreme Court upheld the claim of a Buddhist prisoner in Texas that his constitutional rights were violated by denying him use of the prison chapel, punishing him for sharing his Buddhist religious materials with other prisoners, and denying him other privileges, such as receiving points for attendance at religious services, which enhanced a prisoner's eligibility for early parole consideration. While a prisoner obviously cannot enjoy the free exercise of religion to the same extent as nonprisoners, the Court said, he is protected by the free exercise clause subject only to the necessities of prison security and discipline, and he may not be discriminated against simply because his religious belief is unorthodox. This does not mean that every sect within a prison, no matter how few in number, must have identical facilities or personnel; but reasonable opportunities must be afforded to all persons to exercise their religion without penalty.

One of the most difficult problems facing a court arises when it is called upon to decide between free exercise and the state's interest in preventing fraud. The leading case on the subject is United States v. Ballard (1944), which involved a prosecution for mail fraud. The INDICTMENT charged that the defendants, organizers of the "I Am" cult, had mulcted money from elderly and ill people by falsely representing that they had supernatural powers to heal and that they themselves had communicated personally with Heaven and with Jesus Christ.

The Court held that the free exercise clause would be violated if the state were allowed to seek to prove to a jury that the defendants' representations were false. Neither a jury nor any other organ of government had power to decide whether asserted religious experiences actually occurred. Courts, however, could constitutionally determine whether the defendant himself believed that what he recounted was true, and if a jury determined that he did not, they could convict him of obtaining money under false pretenses. The difficulty with this test, as Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON noted in his dissenting opinion, is that prosecutions in cases such as Ballard could easily degenerate into religious persecution; juries would find it difficult to accept as believed that which, by reason of their own religious upbringing, they deemed unbelievable.

In providing for "affirmation" as an alternative to "oath" in Article II, section 1, and Article VI, section 3, the framers of the Constitution, recognizing that religious convictions might forbid some persons (specifically Quakers) to take oaths, manifested their intention that no person in the judicial system—judge, lawyer, court official, or juryman—should be disqualified from governmental service on the ground of religion. In Torcaso v. Watkins (1961) the Court reached the same conclusion under the First Amendment as to state officials (for example, notaries public), and in In re Jenison (1963), the Court refused to uphold a conviction for contempt of court of a woman who would not serve on a jury because of the biblical command "Judge not that ye not be judged."

Resort to secular courts for resolution of intrachurch disputes (generally involving ownership and control of church assets) raises free exercise as well as establishment problems. As early as 1872 the Court held in Watson v. Jones that judicial intervention in such controversies was narrowly limited: a court could do no more than determine and enforce the decision of that body within the church that was the highest judicatory body according to appropriate church law. If a religious group (such as Baptist and Jewish) were congregational in structure, that body would be the majority of the congregation; if it were hierarchical (such as Roman Catholic or Russian Orthodox), the authority would generally be the diocesan bishop.

That principle was applied by the Supreme Court consistently until Jones v. Wolf (1979). There the court held that "neutral principles of law developed for use in all property disputes" could constitutionally be applied in church schism litigation. This means that unless the corporate charter or deeds of title provide that the faction loyal to the hierarchical church will retain ownership of the property, such a controversy must be adjudicated in accordance with the laws applicable to corporations generally, so that if recorded title is in the name of the local church, the majority of that body is entitled to control its use and disposition. The Court rejected the assertion in the dissenting opinion that a rule of compulsory deference to the highest ecclesiastical tribunal is necessary in order to protect the free exercise of those who formed the association and submitted themselves to its authority.

Where a conflict exists between the health of the community and the religious conscience of an individual or group, there is little doubt that the free exercise clause does not mandate risk to the community. Thus, as the Court held in JACOBSON V. MASSACHUSETTS (1905), compulsory VACCINATION against communicable diseases is enforceable notwithstanding religious objections to the procedure. So, too, fluoridation of municipal water supplies to prevent tooth cavities cannot be enjoined because of objection by some that drinking fluoridated water is sinful.

Where the life, health, or safety of individuals, rather than communities at large, is involved the constitutional principles are also fairly clear. When the individuals are children, a court may authorize blood transfusions to save their lives notwithstanding objection by parents (such as Jehovah's Witnesses) who believe that the procedure violates the biblical command against the drinking of blood. The underlying principle was stated by the Court in PRINCE V. MASSACHUSETTS (1944) upholding the conviction of a Jehovah's Witness for violating the state's child labor law in allowing her nine-year-old niece to accompany and help her while she sold the sect's religious literature on the city's streets. "Parents," the Court said, "may be free to become martyrs themselves. But it does not follow that they are free, in identical circumstances, to make martyrs of their children before they have reached the age of full and legal discretion when they can make that choice for themselves." It follows from this that unless mental incompetence is proved, a court may not authorize a blood transfusion upon an unconsenting adult.

The Court also balances competing interests in determining the constitutionality of enforcing compulsory Sunday laws against those whom religious conscience forbids labor or trade on the seventh rather than the first day of the week. In MCGOWAN V. MARYLAND and Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown v. McGinley (1961) the Court upheld the general validity of such laws against an establishment clause attack. Although their origin may have been religious, the Court said, the laws' present purpose was secular: to assure a weekly day for rest, relaxation, and family companionship.

Two other cases, Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market (1961) and Braunfeld v. Brown (1961), decided at the same time, involved Orthodox Jews who observed Saturday as their day of rest and refrained from business on that day. In these cases the Court rejected the argument that requiring a Sabbatarian either to abstain from engaging in his trade or business two days weekly or to sacrifice his religious conscience, while requiring his Sunday-observing competitors to abstain only one day, imposed upon the Sabbatarian a competitive disadvantage, thereby penalizing him for his religious beliefs in violation of the free exercise clause. Exempting Sabbatarians, the Court held, might be administratively difficult, might benefit non-Sabbatarians motivated only by a desire for a competitive advantage over merchants closing on Sundays, and might frustrate the legitimate legislative goal of assuring a uniform day of rest. Although state legislatures could constitutionally elect to grant an exemption to Sabbatarians, the free exercise clause does not require them to do so.

In SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963), however, the Court reached a conclusion difficult to reconcile with that in Gallagher and Braunfeld. Denial of unemployment insurance benefits to a Seventh-Day Adventist who refused to accept tendered employment that required working on Saturday, the Court held, imposed an impermissible burden on the free exercise of religion. The First Amendment, it said, forbids forcing an applicant to choose between following religious precepts and forfeiting government benefits on the one hand, or, on the other, abandoning the precepts by accepting Sabbath work. Governmental imposition of such a choice, the Court said, puts the same kind of burden upon the free exercise of religion as would a fine imposed for Saturday worship.

The Court upheld statutory tax exemptions for church-owned real estate used exclusively for religious purposes in WALZ V. TAX COMMISSION (1970), rejecting an establishment clause attack. In Murdock v. Pennsylvania (1943) and Follett v. Town of McCormack (1944), however, the Court ruled that under the free exercise clause a revenue-raising tax on the privilege of canvassing or soliciting orders for articles could not be applied to Jehovah's Witnesses who sold their religious literature from door to door; in the same cases, the Court stated that an income tax statute could constitutionally be applied to clergymen's salaries for performing their clerical duties.

In United States v. Lee (1982) the Court upheld the exaction of social security and unemployment insurance contributions from Amish employers. The employers argued that their free exercise rights had been violated, citing 1 Timothy 5:8: "But if any provide not . . . for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." Compulsory contribution, the Court said, was nonetheless justified; it was essential to accomplish the overriding governmental interest in the effective operation of the social security system.

To sum up, the Supreme Court's decisions in the arena of religious liberty manifest a number of approaches toward defining its meaning, specifically clear and present danger, the balancing of competing interests, and the establishment of a compelling state interest justifying intrusion on free exercise. On the whole, the Court has been loyal to the original intent of the generation that wrote the First Amendment to accord the greatest degree of liberty feasible in our society.

LEO PFEFFER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Widmar v. Vincent.)

Bibliography

GIANELLA, DONALD 1968 Religious Liberty: Non-Establishment and Doctrinal Development: Part I, The Religious Liberty Guarantee. Harvard Law Review 80:1381–1431.

HOWE, MARK DEWOLFE 1965 The Garden and the Wilderness:

Religion and Government in American Constitutional History. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

KAUPER, PAUL G. 1964 Religion and the Constitution. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

MANWARING, DAVID R. 1962 Render unto Caesar: The Flag Salute Controversy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

PFEFFER, LEO (1953) 1967 Church, State and Freedom. Boston: Beacon Press.

STOKES, AANSON P. 1950 Church and State in the United States. New York: Harper & Brothers.

——— and PFEFFER, LEO 1965 Church and State in the United States. New York: Harper & Row.

TRIBE, LAWRENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY
(Update 1)

Religious liberty finds its protection in three provisions of the Constitution: the prohibition of RELIGIOUS TESTS for office in Article IV and the FREE EXERCISE and ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSES of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Because the first is self-executing and the last is involved mostly with issues of government aid, endorsement, or sponsorship of religious activities, the bulk of constitutional litigation over religious liberty has taken place under the free-exercise clause.

In recent history, there have been two general conceptions of the protections afforded by the free-exercise clause. The broad conception, which prevailed in the Supreme Court from 1963 (and arguably earlier) until 1990, holds that no law or government practice can be allowed to burden the exercise of religion unless it is the least restrictive means of achieving a government purpose of the highest order—a "compelling" governmental purpose. The narrow conception, adopted by a 5–4 vote in 1990, holds that the free-exercise clause prohibits only those laws that are specifically directed to religious practice.

The classic statement of the broad conception is found in SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963). In this case, the Court required the state of South Carolina to pay unemployment compensation benefits to a Seventh-Day Adventist notwithstanding her refusal to accept available jobs that would have required her to work on Saturday, her Sabbath. According to the Court, denial of benefits was tantamount to a fine for following the tenets of her religion. Since Sherbert, the Court has required states to pay unemployment compensation to others whose religious tenets conflicted with the requirements of available employment: to a Jehovah's Witness who would not work on armaments, in THOMAS V. INDIANA REVIEW BOARD (1981); to a convert to the Seventh-Day Adventist Church, in Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Commission (1987); and to a Christian who would not work on Sunday, in FRAZEE V. ILLINOIS DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT SECURITY (1989). In Frazee, the Court unanimously held that the claimant was entitled to benefits, even though his belief was not mandated by the particular religious denomination of which he was a member. The decision thus confirmed that the right of religious liberty extends to all sincerely held religious convictions and not just to those of established denominations.

In years immediately following Sherbert, the Court extended free-exercise protection to other conflicts between religious conscience and civil law, including compulsory education above the eighth grade, in WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972), and jury duty, in In re Jennison (1963). After 1972, however, the Court turned aside every claim for a free-exercise exemption from a facially neutral law, outside the narrow context of unemployment compensation. Particularly noteworthy examples included GOLDMAN V. WEINBERGER (1986), in which the Court upheld an Air Force uniform requirement that prevented an Orthodox Jew from wearing his skullcap (yarmulke) while on duty indoors; Tony Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor (1985), in which the Court upheld imposition of minimum-wage laws on a religious community in which the members worked for no pay; and LYNG V. NORTHWEST INDIAN CEMETERY PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION (1988), in which the court allowed construction of a logging road through National Forest lands sacred to certain northern Californian Indian tribes, even though the road would "virtually destroy the Indians' ability to practice their religion."

In each of these cases, the Court either held that the "compelling interest" test of Sherbert had been satisfied or that there were special circumstances making that test inappropriate to the particular case. Thus, during this period, the formal legal doctrine sounded highly protective of the rights of religious conscience, but in practice, the government almost always prevailed.

In 1990, the Court abandoned the compelling-interest test in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990), holding that "the right of free exercise does not relieve an individual of the obligation to comply with a "valid and neutral law of general applicability on the ground that the law proscribes (or prescribes) conduct that his religion prescribes (or proscribes)." The Smith case involved the sacramental use of peyote by members of the Native American Church. Although twenty-three states and the federal government specifically exempt Native American Church ceremonies from the drug laws, Oregon does not. The Supreme Court held that the free-exercise clause does not require an exemption.

After Smith, the only laws or governmental practices that can be challenged under the free-exercise clause are those in which this clause applies "in conjunction with other constitutional protections," such as cases involving free speech or childrearing, or those in which the law is "specifically directed at their religious practice." Thus, laws discriminating against religion as such would be subject to constitutional challenge. Such cases are unusual in the United States. The only example in recent decades was McDaniel v. Paty (1978), which involved a Tennessee law barring members of the clergy from service in the state legislature or a state CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. Because Tennessee had singled out a religious class for a special civil disability, its statute was struck down. Another case of discrimination against religion was WIDMAR V. VINCENT (1981), in which a public university attempted to bar student religious groups from campus facilities. Widmar, however, was decided under the free-speech clause, not the free-exercise clause. Except for McDaniel and Widmar, almost every free-exercise case to come before the Supreme Court involved an ostensibly neutral law of general applicability, now resolved under Smith without inquiry into the strength of the governmental purpose.

The debate between the broad and narrow readings of the free-exercise clause goes back even before the proposal and ratification of the First Amendment from 1789 to 1791. JOHN LOCKE and THOMAS JEFFERSON both apparently opposed exemptions; JAMES MADISON favored them, at least in some circumstances. The same issue arose under several of the STATE CONSTITUTIONS, yielding conflicting results. The majority of the state constitutions adopted before the First Amendment contained language that suggests the broad reading. Georgia, for example, guaranteed that "[a]ll persons whatever shall have the free exercise of their religion; provided it be not repugnant to the peace and safety of the State" (Georgia Constitution of 1777, Article LVI). Although it is perilous to draw firm conclusions from abstract legal language, the "peace and safety" proviso would appear to be unnecessary unless the free-exercise guarantee were understood to entail some exceptions from otherwise valid laws. Moreover, in actual practice, conflicts between minority religious tenets and general law in colonial and preconstitutional America were not infrequently resolved by crafting exemptions. Examples included exemptions from oath requirements and from military conscription. The evidence, however, is thin because eighteenth-century America gave rise to few conflicts between religious and civil dictates.

If the narrow reading of the free-exercise clause announced in Smith remains in force, it will cause major changes in the constitutional rights both of religious individuals and of institutions. It is not uncommon for minority religious practices to conflict with "generally applicable" rules or regulations, and henceforth, any relief from such conflicts must come from the legislatures. Some religious groups—those more numerous or politically powerful—will be able to protect their interests in the political process; some will not. The Supreme Court commented in Smith, "It may fairly be said that leaving accommodation to the political process will place at a relative disadvantage those religious practices that are not widely engaged in; but that unavoidable consequence of democratic government must be preferred to a system in which each conscience is a law unto itself."

For many years, some Justices maintained that laws or government policies that exempted religious organizations or religiously motivated individuals from laws applied to others were themselves suspect under the establishment clause. For example, Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, in the CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION cases during the VIETNAM WAR, concluded, in Welsh v. United States (1970), that it would be unconstitutional to recognize religious objections to military service without also recognizing nonreligious conscientious objection. More recently, the Court, in WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1985), struck down state efforts to accommodate the religious need of some school children for voluntary prayer through an officially declared moment of silence, and in THORNTON V. CALDOR, INC. (1985), the Court invalidated a statute that required private employers to honor the needs of Sabbath observers in determining days off.

In Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos (1987), however, the Court unanimously upheld a federal statute exempting religious organizations from the prohibition on discrimination on the basis of religion in employment. The Court reasoned that it is permissible for the government to remove government-imposed obstacles to the free exercise of religion, even if, in some sense, this gives preferential treatment to religious organizations. And in TEXAS MONTHLY, INC. V. BULLOCK (1989), when a fragmented Court struck down a Texas law exempting religious magazines from sales tax, the plurality was careful to note that benefits conferred exclusively on religious organizations are constitutionally permissible if they "would not impose substantial burdens on nonbeneficiaries" or if they "were designed to alleviate government intrusions that might significantly deter adherents of a particular faith from conduct protected by the Free Exercise Clause."

Thus, although individuals or religious bodies can no longer challenge generally applicable government action under the free-exercise clause, the courts have also become more likely to uphold legislation designed to accommodate religious exercise.

MICHAEL W. MCCONNELL
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Board of Education of Westside Community Schools v. Mergens; Equal Access; Lemon Test; Religion in Public Schools; Religious Fundamentalism; Separation of Church and State.)

Bibliography

LAYCOCK, DOUGLAS 1986 A Survey of Religious Liberty in the United States. Ohio State Law Journal 47:409–451.

LUPU, IRA C. 1989 Where Rights Begin: The Problem of Burdens on the Free Exercise of Religion. Harvard Law Review 102:933–990.

MCCONNELL, MICHAEL W. 1990 The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion. Harvard Law Review 103:1409–1517.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY
(Update 2)

Religious liberty in a broad sense—the liberty of persons to make decisions about religious matters—is central to both concepts in the FIRST AMENDMENT's religion provision, free exercise and nonestablishment. The ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE secures a person's liberty to reject or refrain from religious activity. But religious liberty in a stricter, positive sense—the liberty to follow religion and engage in religious activity—is the particular concern of the free exercise clause and, where the religious activity involves expression, the FREEDOM OF SPEECH guarantee as well.

The Supreme Court has upheld strong free speech protection for citizens' religious expression. Several recent decisions forbid the government to exclude the speech of private individuals or groups from a public institution or PUBLIC FORUM solely because the speech is religious in content, including LAMB'S CHAPEL V. CENTER MORICHES SCHOOL DISTRICT (1993), CAPITOL SQUARE REVIEW AND ADVISORY BOARD V. PINETTE (1995), and ROSENBERGER V. RECTOR & VISITORS OF UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA (1995).

Sharp controversy continues, however, over the constitutional protection of religious activity that is primarily conduct rather than speech. One narrower view holds that government has power to punish or restrict religiously motivated conduct as long as it does not single it out; that is, the free exercise clause gives religious believers no protection from laws that apply generally to certain conduct. The Court adopted this view—with some potentially significant limits and exceptions—in EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990), holding that a state could apply its "generally applicable" criminal law against peyote use to Native American religious believers who used the drug in their worship services.

A broader view holds that the free exercise of religion requires government to have a strong reason for substantially restricting religious conduct, even when the restriction comes through a law that applies generally. This view, which held sway in the Court from 1963 into the late 1980s, would require the government to accommodate, or exempt, sincere religious practice unless the reason for restricting the practice was important or even "compelling" (the language of SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963) and WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972)).

According to the pro-accommodation view, the free exercise clause recognizes that religious believers claim a duty to a power outside (or above) the state—a belief prevalent at the time of the founding and enunciated, for example, in JAMES MADISON'S Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments (1785)—and such a competing allegiance is infringed as much by a general law as by one aimed at religion. Moreover, with today's increase in both government regulation and RELIGIOUS DIVERSITY, most instances of government suppression of religious exercise will result from general laws rather than deliberate discrimination.

Opponents answer that ACCOMMODATION OF RELIGION in the form of exemptions from general laws wrongly favors religious motives over other motives for acting. They add that religious practice cannot be entirely unregulated (consider, for example, ritual human sacrifice), and say that there is no principled line for distinguishing laws that are sufficiently important to override religious freedom from laws that are not. Some opponents go so far as to claim that religious exemptions are constitutionally prohibited; others simply say they are not constitutionally required. Smith took the latter view, suggesting that legislatures could exempt religion but did not have to do so.

Since Smith, religious liberty issues have fallen into two categories. The first is how much protection for religious conduct remains under the free exercise clause as interpreted narrowly in Smith. The Court's standard left open the question of when a law is "generally applicable" and thus immune from challenge. Nearly every law contains some exception (for example, small-business exemptions from commercial regulations, or medicinal-use exceptions to drug laws). Exempting religious conduct whenever any secular exception exists would vindicate religious exercise as a PREFERRED FREEDOM, but it would also mean that Smith had little effect in expanding government's discretion. In CHURCH OF LUKUMI BABALU AYE, INC. V. CITY OF HIALEAH (1993), the Court applied Smith to invalidate laws that prohibited almost nothing but religiously motivated conduct—in that case, laws against animal killing that exempted numerous forms of killing (hunting, fishing, even kosher slaughter) but covered the ritual sacrifices of the Santería sect. But when a law contains some exceptions but still applies widely, the result under Smith is uncertain.

A related source of protection might be found in Smith's suggestion that when a highly discretionary standard, leading to differing results in particular cases, is applied to restrict religion, there must be a compelling reason for the result. Finally, Smith indicated that when religious conduct implicates another constitutionally recognized interest (such as free speech or parents' control over their children's upbringing), the "hybrid" of the two rights should trigger strict JUDICIAL REVIEW. The scope of this argument is uncertain; but at the least, courts should give careful attention when religious persons or groups assert other constitutional rights such as speech or the FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION (as is common, for example, in cases involving the selection and discipline of clergy).

The second major religious liberty question after Smith has been the authority of other actors, especially legislatures, to protect religious conduct from generally applicable laws where the federal courts under Smith would not. Many such accommodations appear in particular federal and state statutes, such as exemptions of religious entities from some ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION and exemptions of faith-healing practices from some child-endangerment laws. Such exemptions have been challenged as establishments because they give religious conduct special protection. It is one thing to say (as Smith does) that legislatures are not required to accommodate religion; it is quite another, and far more restrictive of religious liberty, to say that legislatures are not even permitted to accommodate.

The Court has upheld statutory accommodations in principle, but has disapproved them in some instances. Smith, with its emphasis on legislative discretion, expressly invited statutory exemptions; and decisions such as Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos (1987) state that leaving religion unregulated does not necessarily advance religion to an unconstitutional degree. But other decisions have struck down religious exemptions as excessive favoritism for religion, especially where the measure shifted significant burdens to nonbelievers—for example, a tax exemption in Texas Monthly v. Bullock (1989) and a blanket exemption from Sabbath work in Estate of Thornton v. Caldor (1985). No explicit majority standard has emerged for this question. The most recent decision, BOARD OF EDUCATION OF KIRYAS JOEL SCHOOL DISTRICT V. GRUMET (1994), invalidated a New York school district created to accommodate the religious needs of children in one insular Hasidic Jewish sect, but it suggested again that accommodations that did not explicitly single out one faith would (at least sometimes) be permissible.

Meanwhile, Congress and state legislatures pursued another response to Smith: LEGISLATION not to protect religion from a particular law, but to restore the pre-Smith, religion-protective general standard for all claims. Under the RELIGIOUS FREEDOM RESTORATION ACT (RFRA), passed by Congress in 1993, all federal and state laws that "substantially burden" religious exercise once again had to be justified by a "compelling governmental interest." Some states have also passed their own statutes ("mini-RFRAs") protecting religious conduct against all but compelling interests.

Both the congressional RFRA and the state statutes will probably be challenged as excessively favoring and thus establishing religion—although more likely in particular applications than on their face. But RFRA also faced questions whether it fell within Congress's ENUMERATED POWERS. The Court in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997) held that insofar as RFRA overrode state and local laws, it exceeded the power of Congress to enforce the provisions of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT against states. Congress, the Court said, was limited to enforcing free exercise as the Court had interpreted it (the Smith rule), not the more religion-protective standard of RFRA.

After Boerne, RFRA's more religion-protective standard still may apply to federal laws, where the statute can be seen as simply an exercise of the power of Congress to amend each law it has enacted. Opponents claim in response that even as to federal laws, RFRA unconstitutionally invades the province of the judicial branch to declare general standards for religious liberty. The tension between Court and Congress over the proper general scope of religious liberty may continue for some time. Meanwhile, some state constitutions and mini-RFRA statutes reflect the more protective standard of religious liberty.

THOMAS C. BERG
(2000)

Bibliography

BERG, THOMAS C. 1995 Slouching Toward Secularism: A Comment on Kiryas Joel School District v. Grumet. Emory Law Journal 44:433–499.

EISGRUBER, CHRISTOPHER L. and SAGER, LAWRENCE G. 1997 Congressional Power and Religious Liberty After City of Boerne v. Flores. Supreme Court Review 1997:79–139.

HAMBURGER, PHILIP A. 1992 A Constitutional Right of Religious Exemption: An Historical Perspective. George Washington Law Review 60:915–948.

LAYCOCK, DOUGLAS 1990 The Remnants of Free Exercise. Supreme Court Review 1990:1–68.

LUPU, IRA C. 1992 The Trouble With Accommodation. George Washington Law Review 60:743–781.

MCCONNELL, MICHAEL W. 1990 The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion. Harvard Law Review 103:1409–1517.

RELIGIOUS SCHOOLS

See: Government Aid to Religious Institutions

RELIGIOUS SYMBOLS IN PUBLIC PLACES

In 1984 the Supreme Court, in LYNCH V. DONNELLY, rejected a constitutional challenge to the display of a publicly financed nativity scene—a crèche—in a private park in Pawtucket, Rhode Island. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER's decision for a 5–4 majority evoked deep resentment in many quarters, particularly among non-Christians who opposed the use of public funds to depict an event—the birth of Jesus to the Virgin Mary—that is a central tenet of Christianity. Moreover, the decision appeared to be a sharp departure from the Court's establishment clause precedents, particularly LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971), in which the Court set forth the three "tests" that the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE imposes on government actions involving religion: "The statute must have a secular legislative purpose . . . its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion . . . [and] the statute must not foster "an excessive government entanglement with religion."

Conceding that the crèche was a religious symbol, the majority opinion nevertheless perceived the Pawtucket display as essentially a secular recognition of the historical origins of the Christmas season and therefore a permissible accommodation to religion. The Chief Justice's opinion observed that the display contained a Santa Claus, sleigh, candy-striped poles, and some reindeer. Critics chided the Court for creating a "two-reindeer" rule and, more seriously, for demonstrating extreme insensitivity to non-Christians.

As lower courts and local governments addressed the questions that Lynch v. Donnelly left unanswered, they were guided in large part by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR's concurring opinion in which she reformulated the three-part LEMON TEST by emphasizing that the "purpose" and "effect" prongs of the test are designed to prevent government practices that endorse or disapprove of religion. "Endorsement," she wrote, "sends a message to adherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community." Based on this interpretation of Lemon, Justice O'Connor concluded that the purpose of the crèche was not to endorse Christianity but to celebrate a public holiday of secular significance, notwithstanding its religious aspect. As for the effect of the crèche, its "overall holiday setting . . . negates any message of endorsement" of the religious aspect of the display. Justice O'Connor's "endorsement" test provided a more focused approach than the open-ended emphasis on "accommodation" in Chief Justice Burger's opinion and has been widely followed in subsequent cases even by Justices who disagreed with her conclusion that the Pawtucket crèche was constitutional.

After five years of extensive litigation and public controversy, the Supreme Court revisited the religious-display issue in 1989 when, in COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY V. AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, it ruled that (1) a privately financed crèche, without holiday trappings and embellished with a banner proclaiming "Gloria in Excelsis Deo," was unconstitutional as displayed in the main staircase of a county courthouse; and (2) an eighteen-foot menorah situated outside a county office building was constitutional as part of a display that featured the menorah alongside a forty-five-foot Christmas tree and a "Salute to Liberty" sign reminding viewers that "We are the keepers of the flame of liberty and our legacy of freedom." In light of the retirement of Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN in July of 1990, the division on the Court in the Allegheny case was significant. Four Justices (WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, BYRON R. WHITE, ANTONIN SCALIA, and ANTHONY M. KENNEDY) would have upheld both displays because there was no governmental effort to coerce or proselytize, and three Justices (Brennan, THURGOOD MARSHALL, and JOHN PAUL STEVENS) found both displays unconstitutional. Thus, the votes of Justices HARRY A. BLACKMUN and O'Connor produced majorities upholding one display (the menorah) and invalidating the other (the crèche).

The Pawtucket crèche posed a risk of government endorsement because it was publicly financed. The Allegheny County displays, although privately financed, posed a similar danger because they were located in or near government buildings. By eschewing a clear test that would bar all government-financed displays with religious messages, or privately financed displays adjacent to government buildings, certain Justices on the Court were compelled in both cases to emphasize the design of the display as the key element of constitutionality. It was predictable, therefore, that governments would almost certainly invite litigation if they paid for holiday displays containing religious symbols or placed them in front of or in government buildings. Such displays require a fact-specific evaluation to determine whether the religious message has been sufficiently mixed with the secular holiday observance to avoid the overall impression of governmental endorsement of religion. A subject as intensely personal as religion is likely to evoke strong reactions if religious displays are constructed with public funds or if they are placed in locations that give them some type of official status.

