The user of these terms ("judicial activism" and "judicial restraint") presumes to locate the relative assertiveness of particular courts or individual judges between two theoretical extremes. The extreme model of judicial activism is of a court so intrusive and ubiquitous that it virtually dominates the institutions of government. The antithesis of such a model is a court that decides virtually nothing at all: it strains to find reasons why it lacks JURISDICTION; it avows deference to the superiority of other departments or agencies in construing the law; it finds endless reasons why the constitutionality of laws cannot be examined. It is a model of government virtually without useful recourse to courts as enforcers of constitutional limits.

The uses of "judicial activism" and "judicial restraint," however, are not entirely uniform. Often the terms are employed noncommittally, that is, merely as descriptive shorthand to identify some court or judge as more activist or more restrained than some other, or more than the same court formerly appeared to be. In this sense, the usage is neither commendatory nor condemnatory. Especially with reference to the Supreme Court, however, the terms are also used polemically. The user has a personal or professional view of the "right" role of the Court and, accordingly, commends or condemns the Court for conforming to or straying from that right role. Indeed, an enduring issue of American constitutional law has centered on this lively controversy of right role; procedurally and substantively, how activist or how restrained ought the Supreme Court to be in its use of the power of constitutional JUDICIAL REVIEW?

Ought that Court to confront the constitutionality of the laws as speedily as opportunity affords, the better to furnish authoritative guidance and settle political controversy in keeping with its unique competence and function as the chief constitutional court of the nation? Or ought it, rather, to eschew any unnecessary voluntarism, recognizing that all participants in government are as bound as the Court to observe the Constitution and that the very insularity of the Supreme Court from representative government is a powerful reason to avoid the appearance of constitutional arrogance or constitutional monopoly? In brief, what degree of strict necessity should the Supreme Court require as a condition of examining the substantive constitutionality of government acts or government practices?

Substantively, the issues of "proper" activism or proper restraint are similar. When the constitutionality of governmental action is considered, what predisposition, if any, ought the Supreme Court to bring to bear? Should it take a fairly strict view of the Constitution and, accordingly, hold against the constitutionality of each duly contested governmental act unless the consistency of that act with the Constitution can be demonstrated virtually to anyone's satisfaction? Or, to the contrary, recognizing its own fallibility and the shared obligation of Congress (and the President and every member of every state legislature) fully to respect the Constitution as much as judges are bound to respect it, should the Court hold against the constitutionality of what other departments of government have enacted only when virtually no reasonable person could conclude that the act in question is consistent with the Constitution?

Disputes respecting the Supreme Court's procedural judicial activism (or restraint) and substantive judicial activism (or restraint) are thus of recurring political interest. Most emphatically is this the case with regard to judicial review of the constitutionality of legislation, as distinct from nonconstitutional judicial review. For here, unlike activism on nonconstitutional issues (such as the interpretation of statutes), the consequences of an adverse holding on the merits are typically difficult to change. An act of Congress, held inapplicable to a given transaction, need only be approved in modified form to "reverse" the Supreme Court's impression. On the other hand, a holding that the statute did cover the transaction but in presuming to do so was unconstitutional is a much more nearly permanent boundary. It may be overcome only by extraordinary processes of amending the Constitution itself (a recourse successfully taken during two centuries only four times), or by a reconsideration and overruling by the Supreme Court itself (an eventuality that has occurred about 130 times). Thus, the special force of adjudication of constitutionality, being of the greatest consequence and least reversibility, has made the proper constitutional activism (or proper restraint) of the Supreme Court itself a central question.

An appraisal of the Supreme Court in these terms involves two problems: the activism (or restraint) with which the Court rations the judicial process in developing or in avoiding occasions to decide constitutional claims; and the activism (or restraint) of its STANDARDS OF REVIEW when it does decide such claims.

The Supreme Court's own description of its proper role in interpreting the Constitution is one of strict necessity and of last resort. In brief, the Court has repeatedly held that the Constitution itself precludes the Court from considering constitutional issues unless they are incidental to an actual CASE OR CONTROVERSY that meets very stringent demands imposed by Article III. In addition, the Court holds that prudence requires the complete avoidance of constitutional issues in any case in which the rights of the litigants can be resolved without reference to such an issue.

In 1982, in VALLEY FORGE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS V. AMERICANS UNITED, Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST recapitulated the Court's conventional wisdom. Forswearing any judicial power generally to furnish advice on the Constitution, and denying that the Supreme Court may extend its jurisdiction more freely merely because constitutional issues are at stake, he declared: "The constitutional power of federal courts cannot be defined, and indeed has no substance, without reference to the necessity to "adjudge the legal rights of litigants in actual controversies." Even when the stringent prerequisites of jurisdiction have been fully satisfied, moreover, "[t]he power to declare the rights of individuals and to measure the authority of governments, this Court said 90 years ago, "is legitimate only in the last resort, and as a necessity in the determination of real, earnest, and vital controversy." For emphasis, he added, "The federal courts were simply not constituted as ombudsmen of the general welfare. [Such a philosophy] has no place in our constitutional scheme."

In so declaring, Justice Rehnquist was relying substantially upon a similar position adopted by Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803). Explaining that the Court's determination of constitutional questions was but an incident of its duty to pass upon legal questions raised in the due course of litigation, in no respect different from its duty when some statutory issue or COMMON LAW question might likewise be presented in a case, Marshall had insisted: "The province of the Court is, solely, to decide on the rights of individuals," and not to presume any larger role.

Accordingly, though a constitutional issue may be present, if the dispute in which it arises does not otherwise meet conventionally strict standards of STANDING, RIPENESS, genuine adverseness of parties, or sufficient factual concreteness to meet the demands of a justiciable case or controversy as required by Article III, the felt urgency or gravity of the constitutional question can make no difference. In steering a wide course around the impropriety of deciding constitutional questions except as incidental to a genuine adversary proceeding, moreover, the Court has also declared that it will not entertain COLLUSIVE SUITS. As Marshall declared in Marbury, "it never was the thought that, by means of a friendly suit, a party beaten in the legislature could transfer to the courts an inquiry as to the constitutionality of a legislative act." Similarly, if during the course of genuine litigation the grievance has become moot in light of subsequent events, it must then be dismissed insofar as there remains no necessity to address the original issue.

When, moreover, all requisites of conventional, genuine litigation remain such that adjudication of the parties' rights is an unavoidable judicial duty, the Court has still insisted that it should determine whether the case can be disposed of without addressing any issue requiring it to render an interpretation of the Constitution itself. Accordingly (within the conventional wisdom), even with respect to disputes properly before it, well within its jurisdiction and prominently featuring a major, well-framed, well-contested constitutional question, the Supreme Court may still refuse to address that question. In his famous concurring opinion in ASHWANDER V. TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY (1936), Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS insisted that constitutional questions were to be decided only as a last resort: "When the validity of an act of Congress is drawn in question, and even if a serious doubt of constitutionality is raised, it is a cardinal principle that this Court will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided." Indeed, Brandeis continued, the Court will not "pass upon a constitutional question although properly presented by the record, if there is also present some other ground upon which the case may be disposed of." Moreover, though there may be no other ground, if the constitutional question arises at the instance of a public official, "the challenge by a public official interested only in the performance of his official duty will not be entertained." Even when the issue is raised by a private litigant, his challenge to the constitutionality of a statute will not be heard "at the instance of one who has availed himself of its benefits."

Self-portrayals of the Court as a wholly reluctant constitutional tribunal that is not an oracle of constitutional proclamation but a court of law that will face constitutional questions only when a failure to do so would involve it as a tribunal in an unconstitutional oppression of a litigant go even further. A litigant may have much at stake, and nothing except his reliance upon some clause in the Constitution may remain to save him from jeopardy. Still, if the clause in the Constitution is deemed not to yield objective criteria adequate to guide its application by the Court, the Court may decline to attempt to fix any meaning for the clause on the basis that it is nonjusticiable. (See POLITICAL QUESTIONS.) Similarly, if the relief requested should require the Court to consider an order against the Congress itself, an order the Court cannot be confident would be obeyed and which it is without resources otherwise to enforce, it may refuse to consider the case. Identically, if an adjudication of the constitutional question, though otherwise imperative to the litigant's case, might involve conflict with the President respecting decisions already made, communicated to, and relied upon by other governments, the case may also be regarded as nonjusticiable.

In rough outline, then, these are the principal elements of the orthodoxy of extreme judicial restraint. Consistent with them, even when the Court does adjudicate a constitutional question, its decision is supposed to be "no broader than is required by the precise facts." Anything remotely resembling an advisory opinion or a gratuitous judicial utterance respecting the meaning of the Constitution is to be altogether avoided.

Although this combination of Article III requirements and policies has characterized a large part of the Court's history (most substantially when the constitutional questions involved acts of Congress or executive action), the Court's practice has not, in fact, been at all uniform. Collusive suits have sometimes been entertained, and the constitutional issues at once examined. Public officials sometimes have been deemed to have sufficient standing to press constitutional questions, though they have had no more than an official interest in the matter. Holdings on the Constitution occasionally have been rendered in far broader terms than essential to decide the case, often for the advisory guidance of other judges or for the benefit of state or local officials. When the constitutional issue seemed clear enough and strongly meritorious, parties placed in positions of advantage solely by force of the very condition of which they later complained on constitutional grounds have not always been estopped from securing a decision. On occasion when third parties would be unlikely or unable to raise a constitutional claim on their own behalf, moreover, other litigants deemed suitable to represent their claim have been allowed to proceed on the merits of the constitutional issues. And some utterly moot cases have been decided on the merits of their constitutional questions on the paradoxical explanation that unless the moot cases were treated as still lively, then conceivably the merits of the constitutional issues would forever elude judicial review. Indeed, the nation's most famous case, Marbury v. Madison, was in many respects an example of extreme procedural activism despite its disclaimer of strict necessity.

At issue in Marbury's case was the question of the Supreme Court's power to hear the case in the first instance, within its ORIGINAL JURISDICTION, rather than merely on appeal. The statute William Marbury relied upon to demonstrate his right to commence his action in the Supreme Court was altogether unclear as to whether it authorized his suit to begin in the Supreme Court. Avoidance of the necessity of examining the constitutionality of the statute was readily available merely by construing the statute as not providing for original jurisdiction: an interpretation thus making clear that Marbury had sued in the wrong court, resulting in his case's being dismissed for lack of (statutory) jurisdiction and obviating any need to say anything at all about the constitutionality of an act of Congress.

Rather than pursue that course, however, Chief Justice Marshall "actively" interpreted the act of Congress, that is, he interpreted it to draw into issue its very constitutionality and then promptly resolved that issue by holding the act unconstitutional. Beyond that, rather than be content to dismiss the case for lack of either statutory or constitutional jurisdiction, the Chief Justice also (and quite gratuitously) addressed every other question raised by the complaint, including Marbury's right to the public office he sought, the appropriateness of the remedy he asked for, the illegality of the secretary of state's refusal to give it to him, and the lack of immunity from such suits by the secretary of state. Each of these other issues was of substantial controversy. Several of them raised substantial constitutional questions. Marshall resolved all in an opinion most of which was purely advisory, that is, of no necessity in light of the ultimate holding, which was that the Court was (constitutionally) without power (jurisdiction) to address the merits of the case at all. Marshall addressed all these questions on the basis of a factual record supplied principally on affidavit of his own brother. Still, Marshall, far from recusing himself on that account or on account of his own participation as the secretary of state who failed to deliver Marbury's commission, fully participated in the case, voted, and wrote the opinion for the Court. In these many respects, the case of Marbury v. Madison was an extraordinary example of extreme procedural activism. Its resemblance to what the Court has otherwise said (as in the Brandeis Ashwander guidelines or the Valley Forge case) is purely ironic. Indeed, the unstable actual practices of the Court which has so often described its institutional role in constitutional adjudication as one of the utmost procedural restraint, while not uniformly adhering to that description, have contributed to the Court's great controversiality in American government.

As we have seen, procedural activism (and restraint) has consisted principally of two parts. The first part is the rigor or lack of rigor with which the Court has interpreted the limitation in Article III of the Constitution, according to which the use of the judicial power can operate solely on "cases and controversies." The second part is the extent to which the Court has also adopted a number of purely self-denying ordinances according to which it will decline to adjudicate the merits of a constitutional claim in any case in which a decision can be reached on some other ground.

In contrast, substantive activism (and restraint) has consisted principally of three parts, each reflecting the extent to which the Court has interpreted the Constitution either aggressively to invalidate actions taken by other departments of government, or diffidently to acquiesce in these actions. The first part pertains to the Court's substantive interpretations of the ENUMERATED and IMPLIED POWERS of the other departments of the national government, that is, the powers vested by Article I in Congress and the powers vested by Article II in the President. The second part pertains to the Court's interpretation of the Constitution as implicitly withdrawing from state governments a variety of powers not explicitly forbidden to them by the Constitution. And the third part pertains to the Court's interpretations of those clauses in the Constitution that impose positive restrictions on the national and the state governments, principally the provisions in Article I, sections 9 and 10, in the BILL OF RIGHTS, and in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Although there may be no a priori reason to separate the substantive activism and restraint of the Supreme Court into these three particular categories, it is nonetheless practically useful to do so: overall, the Court has responded to them quite distinctly. Indeed, in practice, despite very great differences among particular Justices, the general tendency has been to develop a constitutional jurisprudence of selective activism and selective restraint.

In respect to constitutional challenges to acts of Congress for consistency with Article I's enumeration of affirmative powers, the Court's standard of review has generally been one of extraordinary restraint. With the exception of the first three and a half decades of the twentieth century, the Court has largely deferred to Congress's own suppositions respecting the scope of its powers. During the first seventy-five years of the Constitution, for instance, only two acts of Congress were held not to square with the Constitution. During the most recent forty years (a period of intense and extremely far-reaching national legislation), again but two acts have been held to fail for want of enumerated or implied constitutional authorization. Indeed, even when the comparison is enlarged to include cases challenging acts of Congress not merely for want of enacting authority but rather because they were alleged to transgress specific prohibitions (for example, the FIRST AMENDMENT restriction that Congress shall make no law abridging the FREEDOM OF SPEECH), still the record overall is one of general diffidence and restraint. Over the entirety of the Court's history, scarcely more than 120 acts of Congress have been held invalid.

An influential rationale for such restraint toward acts of Congress was set forth in 1893, in an essay by JAMES BRADLEY THAYER that Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER subsequently identified as uniquely influential on his own thinking as a judicial conservative. Thayer admonished the judiciary to bear in mind that the executive and legislative departments of the national government were constitutionally equal to the judiciary, that they were equivalently bound by oath of office to respect the Constitution, and that each was a good deal more representative of the people than the life-tenured members of the Supreme Court. Accordingly, Thayer urged, the Court should test the acts of coordinate national departments solely according to a rule of "clear error." In brief, such acts were to be examined not to determine whether their constitutionality necessarily conformed to the particular interpretation which the judges themselves might independently have concluded was the most clearly correct interpretation of the Constitution. Rather, such acts should be sustained unless they depended on an interpretation of constitutional power that was itself manifestly unreasonable, that is, an interpretation clearly erroneous.

Thayer's rule provided a strong political rationale for extreme judicial deference in respect to enumerated and implied national powers. Of necessity, however, it also tended practically to the enlistment of the judiciary less as an independent guardian of the Constitution (at least in respect to the scope of enumerated and implied powers) than as an institution tending to validate claims of national authority against state perspectives on the proper boundaries of FEDERALISM. It is a thesis that has periodically attracted criticism on that account, but it does not stand as the sole explanation for the general restraint reflected in the Supreme Court's permissive construction of national legislative and executive powers. Rather, without necessarily assuming that Congress and the President possess a suitably reliable detachment to be the presumptive best judges of their respective powers, decades before the appearance of Thayer's essay the Supreme Court had already expressed a separate rationale: a judicial rule of BROAD CONSTRUCTION respecting enumerated national powers.

The most durable expression of that rule is reported in a famous OBITER DICTUM by Chief Justice John Marshall. In MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), Marshall emphasized to his own colleagues, the federal judges: "We must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding." In full context, Marshall plainly meant that it was a Constitution for the future as well as for the present, for a nation then quite small and new but expected to become much more considerable. To meet these uncertain responsibilities, Congress would require flexibility and legislative latitude. Thus, powers granted to it by the Constitution should be read generously.

The point was expanded upon more than a century later by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, in MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920), defending the judiciary's predisposition to interpret the TREATY POWER very deferentially: "When we are dealing with words that also are a constituent act, like the Constitution of the United States, we must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters. . . . [I]t has taken a century and has cost their successors much sweat and blood to prove that they created a nation." This rule of generous construction, like Thayer's rule of "clear error," tends to support a judicial policy of substantive interpretative restraint. And while not free of criticism on its own account (as federalism critics will tend to fault it as unfaithful to their view of the extent to which substantive legislative authority was meant to be reserved to the states), it is not contingent upon doubtful assumptions respecting the capacity of the President or of the Congress fairly to assess the scope of powers they are given by the Constitution. Arguably, it is as well that this policy of judicial restraint not be made to rest on such assumptions. Although reference to the early constitutional history of the United States tends to support Thayer's thesis (early members of Congress included many persons who had participated in the shaping of the Constitution and who frequently debated proposed legislation in terms of its consistency with that Constitution), two centuries of political change have weakened its suppositions considerably. Persons serving in Congress are far removed from the original debates over enumerated powers; the business of Congress is vastly greater than it once was; the electorate is itself vastly enlarged beyond the limited numbers of persons originally eligible to vote; and such attention as may be given within Congress to issues of constitutionality is understandably likely to be principally political in its preoccupations rather than cautious and detached. Thus, the Marshall rule of generous construction in respect to national powers, rather than the Thayer proposal (of yielding to not-unreasonable interpretations by Congress), tends more strongly to anchor the general policy of judicial restraint in this area. (When the issue had been one of conflict between Congress and the President, on the other hand, the Court has tended to defer to the position of Congress as first among equals.)

In contrast, there is less evidence of a consistent policy of substantive judicial restraint in the Supreme Court's examination of state laws and state acts. Here, to the contrary, the role of the Court has emphatically been significantly more activist, procedurally as well as substantively. The Court will more readily regard the review of governmental action as within the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES in the litigation of state laws. A principal example is the ease with which state TAXPAYER SUITS impugning state laws on federal constitutional grounds will be deemed reviewable in the Supreme Court, when in most instances an equivalently situated federal taxpayer is deemed to have inadequate standing in respect to an act of Congress. In addition, the Court has interpreted the Constitution to create a judicial duty to determine the constitutionality of certain kinds of state laws, though the clauses relied upon do not themselves expressly confer such a judicial duty (or power) and speak, rather, solely of some preemptive power in Congress to determine the same matter. For instance, the COMMERCE CLAUSE provides merely that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several states. But in the absence of congressional regulation, the Court has actively construed the clause as directing the federal courts themselves to determine, by their own criteria, whether state statutes so unreasonably or discriminatorily burden INTERSTATE COMMERCE that they should be deemed invalid by the courts as an unconstitutional trespass upon a field of regulation reserved to Congress.

Here also the rationales have differed, and indeed not every Supreme Court Justice has embraced either rationale. (Justice HUGO L. BLACK, for instance, preferring a constitutional jurisprudence of "literal" interpretation, generally declined to find any basis in the commerce clause for judicial intervention against state statutes.) In part, the substantive activism of the Court has been explained by a "political marketplace" calculus that is the obverse of Thayer's rule for deference to Congress. According to this view, as the state legislatures are not equal departments to the Supreme Court (in the sense that Congress is an equal department), and as national interests are not necessarily as well represented in state assemblies as state interests are said to be represented in Congress (insofar as members of Congress are all chosen from state-based constituencies), there are fewer built-in political safeguards in state legislatures than in Congress. To the extent of these differences, it is said that there is correspondingly less reason for courts to assume that state legislatures will have acted with appropriate sensitivity to federal constitutional questions and, accordingly, that there is more need for closer judicial attention to their acts. The sheer nonuniformity of state legislation may be of such felt distress to overriding needs for greater uniformity in a nation with an increasingly integrated economy that a larger measure of judicial activism in adjudicating the constitutional consistency of state legislation may be warranted in light of that fact. Something of this thought may lie behind Justice Holmes's view respecting the relative importance of constitutional review itself: "I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an Act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that declaration as to the laws of the several states." Finally, more activist substantive review of state laws has been defended on the view that, assuming Congress itself may presume to substitute a uniform rule or otherwise forbid states to legislate in respect to certain matters, the frequency with which state statutes may be adopted and the resulting interference they may impose upon matters of national importance prior to any possibility of corrective congressional action require that the federal courts exercise an interim and activist responsibility of their own. In any event, this much is clear. In respect to substantive standards of constitutional review and challenges to state laws on grounds that they usurp national authority, the overall position of the Supreme Court has been that of an activist judiciary in umpiring the boundaries of federalism.

Finally, and most prominently within the last half-century, selective judicial activism has made its strongest appearance in the judicial review of either federal or state laws that, in the Court's view, bear adversely on one or more of the following three subjects: participation in the political process, specific personal rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights, and laws adversely affecting "DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITIES." The scope of these respective activist exceptions (to the general rule of procedural and substantive restraint) is still not entirely settled. Indeed, each is itself somewhat unstable. Nonetheless, the indication of more aggressive, judicially assertive constitutional intervention in all three areas was strongly suggested in a footnote to UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938). There, the Court suggested that the conventional "presumption of constitutionality" would not obtain, and that "searching judicial inquiry" would be applied to the review of laws that, on their face, appeared "to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution," or to "restrict those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about the repeal of undesirable legislation," or to bear heavily on "discrete and insular minorities" suffering from prejudice likely to lead to their neglect in the legislative process.

In respect to the first of these categories, however, it is doubtful whether the standards applied by the Supreme Court should be defined as unconventionally activist at all. To the extent that a constitutional provision explicitly forbids a given kind of statute, its mere application by the Court scarcely seems exceptional. To the contrary, it would require an extreme version of "restraint" to do otherwise.

The second category (principally concerned with limitations on voting eligibility or with varieties of unfairness in REPRESENTATION) is differently reasoned. The Court has assumed generally that deference is ordinarily due the constitutional interpretations of legislative bodies because they are themselves representatives of the people (who have the greatest stake in the Constitution). But if the law in question itself abridges the representative character of the legislatures, it tends by that fact to undermine the entire foundation of judicial restraint in respect to all other legislative acts. As it tends thereby also to reduce the efficacy of the legislative process to repeal improvident legislation, such representation-reducing statutes ought to be severely questioned.

The third category (such legislation as bears adversely on insular and discrete minorities) has emerged as by far the most controversial and unstable example of modern judicial activism. Its theory of justification is one of rationing the activism of constitutional review inversely, again in keeping with the perceived "market failure" of representative government. And, up to a point, it is quite straightforward in keeping with that theory. Thus, when the numbers of a particular class are few and their financial resources insignificant, and when the class upon whom a law falls with great force is not well-connected but, to the contrary, seems left out of account in legislative processes (by prejudices entrenched within legislatures), the resulting market place failure of political power or ordinary empathy is felt to leave a gap to be filled by exceptional judicial solicitude.

The paradigm case for such activism is that of legislation adversely affecting blacks, when challenged on grounds of inconsistency with the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. On its face, the equal protection clause provides no special standards of justification that race-related legislation must satisfy that other kinds of adverse legislative classifications need not meet. Nonetheless, on quite sound historical grounds, race-related legislation was singled out for exceptional judicial activism by the WARREN COURT. Although many of the Warren Court decisions remain of enduring controversy, it is generally conceded that the Court's STRICT SCRUTINY of such race-based laws was itself consistent with the special preoccupation of the Fourteenth Amendment with that subject. Thus, as early as 1873, in the SLAUGHTER-HOUSE CASES, the Court had observed: In the light of the history of [the THIRTEENTH, Fourteenth, and FIFTEENTH] AMENDMENTS, and the pervading purpose of them, [it] is not difficult to give a meaning to [the equal protection clause]. The existence of laws in the states where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden."

As this historical CIVIL WAR basis for that one exception was left behind, the Supreme Court plied an increasingly complicated sociology of political marketplace failure to explain an equivalent interventionism on a much broader front. Thus, gender-based laws, laws restricting ALIENS vis-à-vis citizens, and laws restricting minors vis-à-vis adults came also to be examined much more stringently under the equal protection clause than laws adversely affecting particular businesses, particular classes of property owners, certain groups of taxpayers, or others. The determination of "adequate representation" (whether direct or vicarious), the conjecture as to whether such legislative classifications were based on "stereotypes" rather than real differences, and ultimately the tentative extension of equal protection activism even to require a variety of state support for poor persons, produced unstable and largely unsustainable pluralities within the Supreme Court.

Indeed, the difficulties of selective activism in this area have been the principal object of contemporary criticism in American constitutional law. The most serious questions have been addressed to the apparent tendency of the Court to adjust its own interpretations of the Constitution not according simply to its own best understanding of that document, but rather according to its perceptions respecting the adequacy of representative government. Given the fact that far more cases compete for the opportunity to be determined by the Supreme Court than its own resources can permit it to hear, the Court might be expected to pursue a course of selective procedural activism according to which it would more readily entertain cases and more readily reach the merits of constitutional claims it should consider not to have been adequately considered elsewhere because of built-in weaknesses of representative government. On the other hand, it remains much more problematic why the Court should utilize its impressions respecting the adequacies of representative government twice over: once to determine which cases to review, and again to determine whether the Constitution has in fact been violated.

Descriptions of judicial activism and judicial restraint in constitutional adjudication are, of course, but partial truths. In two centuries of judicial review, superintended by more than one hundred Justices who have served on the Supreme Court and who have interpreted a Constitution highly ambiguous in much of its text, consistency has not been institutional but personal. Individual judges have maintained strongly diverse notions of the "proper" judicial role, and the political process of APPOINTMENT OF SUPREME COURT JUSTICES has itself had a great deal to do with the dominant perspectives of that role from time to time. Here, only the most prominent features of judicial activism and judicial restraint have been canvassed.

It is roughly accurate to summarize that in respect to interpreting the Constitution, procedurally the Supreme Court has usually exercised great restraint. Subject to some notable exceptions, it has eschewed addressing the constitutional consistency of acts of government to a dramatically greater degree of self-denial than it has exercised in confronting other kinds of legal issues seeking judicial resolution. Substantively, the Court has been predisposed to the national government in respect to the powers of that government: except for the early twentieth century, Thayer's law, requiring a showing of "clear error," has been the dominant motif. In respect to the states, on the other hand, the Court has been actively more interventionist, construing the Constitution to enforce its own notions of national interest in the absence of decisions by Congress. And, most controversially in recent decades, it has been unstably activist in deciding whether it will interpret the Constitution more as an egalitarian set of imperatives than as a document principally concerned with commerce, federalism, the SEPARATION OF POWERS, and the protection of explicitly protected liberties.

WILLIAM W. VAN ALSTYNE
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

ELY, JOHN H. 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

JACKSON, ROBERT H. 1941 The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy. New York: Knopf.

THAYER, JAMES B. 1893 "The Origin and Scope of the American Doctrine of Constitutional Law." Harvard Law Review 7:129.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1959 "Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law." Harvard Law Review 73:1.

JUDICIAL ACTIVISM AND JUDICIAL RESTRAINT
(Update)

In contemporary constitutional rhetoric, "judicial activism" is almost always a term of opprobrium. Prospective Supreme Court nominees regularly disclaim activist inclinations, and political and academic critics of the Court regularly decry activist overreaching. Yet despite the term's salience, there is considerable confusion as to its precise meaning.

In a loose sense, the attack on judicial activism, and the defense of its cognate virtue, judicial restraint, rest on a distrust of judicial discretion and an insistence on RULE OF LAW values. On this view, judicial decisions are entitled to respect because they are legal, objective, impersonal, and apolitical. An "activist" judge risks bringing constitutional law into disrepute by using it as an excuse to implement merely personal or political values.

To be sure, most sophisticated contemporary students of constitutional law reject this dichotomy between the "personal" and "objective," at least in its simplest form. Although Justice OWEN J. ROBERTS once insisted that the task of Supreme Court Justices was simply to "lay the article of the Constitution which is invoked beside the statute which is challenged and to decide whether the latter squares with the former," there are few modern adherents to mechanical jurisprudence among observers of constitutional law. Yet, despite persistent and trenchant efforts to discredit the mechanical view, it retains a powerful hold on popular perceptions of the appropriate judicial function and, at least in diluted form, plays some role in most standard justifications for JUDICIAL REVIEW.

Moreover, perhaps paradoxically, the modern attack on the mechanical theory, as well as the theory itself, tends to buttress arguments for judicial restraint. For if it is indeed true that judges must inevitably insert their personal values into the task of constitutional review, as critics of the mechanical theory insist, then there is all the more reason to constrict sharply the occasions for this review. Restraint is especially important, these critics maintain, because policy decisions by judges, implemented under the guise of constitutional review, often have unintended and unfortunate consequences. It is claimed, for example, that the Court's invalidation of ABORTION laws in ROE V. WADE (1973) served only to obstruct an emerging, sensible compromise to the abortion dispute, and that the Court's condemnation of school SEGREGATION in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) did little or nothing to advance the cause of racial equality. Often these criticisms are linked to the claim that constitutional review is elitist and divisive. On this view, constitutional decisions unjustifiably reduce the space for democratic deliberation and needlessly bring to the fore contested and unresolvable issues of fundamental principle.

There are, then, a complex of powerful arguments that support judicial restraint. To some degree, however, these arguments conceal important fissures within the critique of activism. For example, it is not always clear whether critics of activism are referring to its procedural or substantive manifestations. Procedural restraint requires judges to limit the occasions for, and scope of, constitutional decisions. Among the tools that accomplish these objectives are DOCTRINES concerning STANDING, RIPENESS, MOOTNESS, POLITICAL QUESTIONS, and AVOIDANCE of unnecessary constitutional exposition. In contrast, substantive restraint requires judges to interpret the substantive provisions of the Constitution narrowly. Familiar manifestations of this position include the insistence on no more than "mere rationality" for statutes challenged under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause, the rejection of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, and the limitation of FREEDOM OF SPEECH protections to the kinds of political speech protected at the time of the Constitution's framing.

On some occasions, the procedural and substantive versions of restraint are in tension with each other. Sometimes, procedural restraint will prevent a Court from reaching the merits in circumstances where doing so might lead to greater substantive restraint. For example, in a 1986 decision, Diamond v. Charles, the Court rejected an appeal on standing grounds in circumstances where the appellant asked the Court to loosen substantive constitutional constraints on anti-abortion statutes.

Matters are made still more complicated by tensions internal to each version of restraint. Procedural devices like standing and political question can be used to avoid constitutional decisions, but they also increase the degree of judicial discretion. Many commentators have argued that these doctrines are not "principled" or firmly rooted in determinate constitutional doctrine and therefore allow courts great freedom to indulge personal, nonlegal preferences.

There are similar tensions internal to the substantive version of restraint. On one view, the argument against judicial activism pushes one toward some form of TEXTUALISM or ORIGINALISM. Only by tying constitutional doctrine closely to the text, or the ORIGINAL INTENT of the Framers, can judicial discretion be controlled. A second view holds that judges should be respectful of PRECEDENT, which makes their decisions more general and rule-like. Still a third view holds that judges ought to interpret the Constitution so as to maximize the space for political decisionmaking.

It should be apparent that these three views will often lead to different outcomes. For example, in a prior generation, both Justices HUGO L. BLACK and FELIX FRANKFURTER claimed to practice judicial restraint—Black, when he read the FIRST AMENDMENT free speech clause literally, resulting in the invalidation of many statutes; and Frankfurter, when he read it more loosely, so as to uphold many statutes. More recently, Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., and THURGOOD MARSHALL often accused their colleagues of "judicial activism" when they failed to follow prior precedent that the majority overruled or distinguished precisely because the precedent authorized more judicial intervention than the majority thought appropriate.

The upshot of this confusion is that almost everyone in contemporary constitutional debate can claim the mantle of judicial restraint, while almost no one need actually exercise much of it. The plain truth is that, despite all the rhetoric to the contrary, the modern Supreme Court lacks a single consistent proponent of judicial restraint. For example, the modern Court has embarked on an ambitious program of revitalizing FEDERALISM and SEPARATION OF POWERS limitations on the political branches; overseeing ELECTORAL DISTRICTING; protecting PROPERTY RIGHTS and the right to COMMERCIAL SPEECH; and invalidating AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs. Critics of the Court complain that these decisions are "activist," but many of these critics would, themselves, like to make the Court more activist in the protection of reproductive and sexual freedom, racial minorities, and political dissidents.

All of this suggests that the real fault line in contemporary constitutional argument is not between activism and restraint, but between styles of activism. While conservative activists would make the Court active so as to keep the rest of government passive, thereby leaving more space for free markets and individual decisionmaking, liberal activists would make the Court active so as to require more aggressive programs of government regulation and redistribution. To a significant extent, rhetorical attacks on judicial activism have served only to distract attention from this central disagreement.

LOUIS MICHAEL SEIDMAN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Constitutional Theory; Courts and Social Change.)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill.

BLASI, VINCENT 1983 The Rootless Activism of the Burger Court. Pages 198–217 in Vincent Blasi, ed., The Burger Court: The Counter-Revolution That Wasn't. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

BORK, ROBERT H. 1990 The Tempting of America: The Political Seduction of the Law. New York: Free Press.

DWORKIN, RONALD H. 1996 Freedom's Law: The Moral Reading of the American Constitution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

GUNTHER, GERALD 1964 The Subtle Vices of the "Passive Virtues": A Comment on Principle and Expediency in Judicial Review. Columbia Law Review 64:1–25.

ROSENBERG, GERALD 1991 The Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring about Social Change? Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SUNSTEIN, CASS 1996 Foreword: Leaving Things Undecided. Harvard Law Review 110:4–101.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS

See: Confirmation Process; Senate and Judicial Appointments

JUDICIAL CODE

The Judicial Code of the United States is an official collection and codification of laws governing the federal judiciary and federal court procedures. Codified as Title 28 of the United States Code, the Judicial Code is an exercise of the Article I power of Congress to make such laws as it deems NECESSARY AND PROPER for carrying into execution the broad and ill-defined powers vested in the judiciary by Article III of the Constitution.

The present code, enacted in 1948, is the lineal descendant of the original JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, the judiciary portions of the REVISED STATUTES of 1877, and the Judicial Code of 1911. It is an effort by judicial, legislative, and legal experts to rearrange, update, and improve the many laws dealing with the federal judicial system. Additions and improvements are periodically made by Congress, and integrated into the structural scheme of the code. The code itself is divided into six main parts, with numerous subdivisions, each relating to a particular subject matter. Among the more important subjects covered by the code are: the organization, personnel, and administration of the federal courts, including the SUPREME COURT; the JURISDICTION conferred by Congress on these various courts, including the Supreme Court; provisions for determining the proper VENUE for instituting a case in a UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, and provisions governing the REMOVAL to a federal court of a case instituted in a state court; and the procedures to be followed in various kinds of federal court proceedings.

The 1948 revision and recodification have been both highly praised and highly criticized. Criticism has often been focused on the provisions dealing with the jurisdiction of the federal district courts, for it is the exercise of that jurisdiction that most directly affects the delicate and controversial federal-state court relationships. Concern for these relationships led the American Law Institute to undertake a major study of the Judicial Code, culminating in a 1968 proposal to revise substantial portions of the code. Specifically, the institute suggested major modifications and limitations respecting district courts' DIVERSITY-OF-CITIZENSHIP JURISDICTION, as well as clarifications of FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION and ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION, and changes as to venue and removal of actions from state courts. Some of the institute's proposals bore legislative fruit and influenced judicial thinking. But the major proposals have lain fallow, and in some respects they have been outmoded by the passage of time and the birth of new tensions in the JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

Controversy about some of the Judicial Code's provisions is endless, especially those that concern the scope and exercise of the diversity jurisdiction of the federal courts. Such controversy reflects the historic and perhaps unresolvable concern that, as Chief Justice EARL WARREN once said, "we achieve a proper jurisdictional balance between the Federal and State court systems, assigning to each system those cases most appropriate in the light of the basic principles of FEDERALISM."

EUGENE GRESSMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

CURRIE, DAVID P. 1968–1969 The Federal Courts and the American Law Institute. University of Chicago Law Review 36:1–49, 268–337.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1948 Federal Jurisdiction and the Revision of the Judicial Code. Law and Contemporary Problems 13:216–243.

JUDICIAL COLLEGIALITY

"Collegiality" is defined by Webster's Third New International Dictionary (1993) as "the relationship of colleagues." "Colleagues" are "associate[s] or co-worker[s] typically in a profession or a civil or ecclesiastical office and often of similar rank or state." The derivation, common with "college," is the Latin collegium, although a purist might refer to the verb legare, meaning to send or choose a deputy.

For a court, collegiality consists in the relationship among equals in rank, and usually carries positive connotations of cooperativeness and joint efforts toward achieving appropriate aims, operations, and functioning of the court as an institution.

Thus, there may be collegiality among, say, trial judges, even though it does not necessarily extend to decision-making on particular cases. Trial judges have basically monarchial power over their own courtrooms, even though they may work with their colleagues, for example, in accomplishing trial court aims or fashioning trial court rules. At the same time, they may consult with their trial court colleagues on matters that do affect particular cases; for example, sentences, jury instructions, admissibility of particular evidence, or the like. But it is a collegiality of a different kind from that of appellate judges.

Appellate judges need collegiality in order to decide particular cases. Sitting generally in groups or panels of three or more—usually an odd number—a joint, one hopes cooperative, effort is needed to decide cases; to decide whether to hear arguments or to write opinions or summary orders, as well as how to write them; to fashion relief to the parties; to give guidance to the trial courts or to the bar or to the public; and, in a difficult or complex case, simply to reach a workable result. Three judges can sometimes approach a case with different viewpoints, resulting in different outcomes, yet needing resolution. Something has to give in such a situation, and "collegiality" is what helps bring about resolution.

It may be best to define "collegiality" in terms of what tends to promote it and what tends to discourage it. Means of promotion include friendship, civility, intellectual respect, consideration, dialogue and communication, good humor, and shared meals and events. Thus, personal elements, communications, socialization, and court ceremonies all tend to further collegiality. As former Chief Judge Jon O. Newman of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit put it recently, the term "collegiality" does not begin to capture "the subtle elements of respect, trust, cooperation, and accommodation that characterize members of a group court at work."

Discouraging collegiality follows from the contrary—geographic or social remoteness of the judges; the size of the court; or ill-feeling. One could add as examples of discouraging practices criticizing another's writing style; delegating opinion critiques to law clerks who are given free rein; or personalized attacks in opinions or memoranda on the motives or aims of other judges. But these examples are not inclusive.

Collegiality is an elusive concept. To borrow the description of obscenity of Justice POTTER J. STEWART in his CONCURRING OPINION in JACOBELLUS V. OHIO (1964), we know it when we see it, but to define it is almost impossible. We do know that, without collegiality, courts tend to become politicized, angry, or lacking in civility. Indeed, without it the independence of judges that we try to maintain may be undermined, as public and political criticism of the courts is promoted.

JAMES L. OAKES
(2000)

JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES

The Judicial Conference of the United States is a legacy of WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT's chief justiceship. Its establishment in 1922 constituted a part of the former President's broad campaign against progressives' demands for changes in the substance of then-prevailing federal law. Taft responded with a structural reform proposal: unprecedented administrative integration of a geographically dispersed court system manned by virtually autonomous judges. Thus, the third branch as a whole would achieve enhanced independence coincident with, and protective of, the uniqueness of the essential judicial function.

The Judicial Conference remains the linchpin of national judicial administration. From its beginnings as an annual meeting of the presiding judges of the UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS chaired by the CHIEF JUSTICE, the organization's membership has grown to include a representative from one of the UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS in each of the eleven numbered circuits and the District of Columbia and the chief judges of those circuits, the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT, and the COURT OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE. Biennial meetings at Washington, held in executive session, are largely repositories for reports from an extensive committee system involving the participation of approximately two hundred federal judges. This system provides status differentiation among the more than 700-member federal judiciary, but more significantly responds to a work load spawned both by the brevity of conference sessions and by a voluminous and complex agenda associated with the growth of judicial business and personnel.

Further structural changes in the conference-related administrative organization originated in causes both within and without the third branch. Congress in 1939 established the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and provided for regional administrative units: circuit judicial councils and circuit judicial conferences. Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES promoted the Administrative Office Act as a response to FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's 1937 "COURT-PACKING" bill, perceived by conference members as threatening executive-branch domination of the judiciary.

The new act vastly increased the functions performed by the Judicial Conference and its committees. Although the director and deputy director are appointed by the Supreme Court, the Office acts under "the supervision and direction" of the conference. Consequently, housekeeping, personnel, and budgetary duties once performed by the ATTORNEY GENERAL AND DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE now fall within the oversight of the conference. These and subsequent congressionally mandated duties, some of which affected the district judges, ignited trial judge demands for conference representation, achieved in 1957, and led to establishment in 1967 of the Federal Judicial Center. This research, development, education, and training arm of the courts is directed by a governing board whose members are appointed by the conference.

The Judicial Conference has from its inception promoted administrative centralization, a functional tendency enhanced by the information-gathering and supportive services available from the Administrative Office. Consonant with the 1922 act's charge "to promote uniformity of management procedures and expeditious conduct of court business," the conference formulates policies for allocating budgetary, personnel, and space resources. It similarly addresses administrative questions raised in areas such as legal defenders, bankruptcy, probation, magistrates, and rules of practice and procedure.

The Judicial Conference promulgates standards of judicial ethics. Its role in disciplining wayward judges received explicit congressional authorization in 1980. The Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct Act empowered the circuit judicial councils to certify intractable misbehavior problems to the conference for "appropriate action." Remedies include referral of such cases to the House Judiciary Committee upon finding "that consideration of IMPEACHMENT may be warranted," a procedure followed in three instances from 1986 through 1988.

The SEPARATION OF POWERS makes the federal judiciary dependent on Congress for support. Since Taft's chairmanship and later with congressional authorization, the Judicial Conference has developed and promoted legislative programs. Additional judgeships, appropriations, judicial salaries, court organization, jurisdiction, procedural rules, and impeachment recommendations have been among the proposals brought to Capitol Hill, usually by conference committee chairmen. Thus, judges do and must lobby Congress to obtain necessary resources. Yet, legislative liaison may embroil the judiciary in visible political conflict, as occurred when Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER lobbied against portions of the 1978 BANKRUPTCY ACT.

The strategic position of the Judicial Conference, its policymaking functions, and its implementation responsibilities pose dilemmas. A quest by the conference for efficiency, uniformity, and equity has induced intrabranch policies favorable to development of "managerial" judges and has produced unavoidable tensions between centralized policymaking and individual court administration. Conference recommendations to Congress permit submission of proposals freighted with substantive public policy implications packaged in the wrappings of judicial administration, a characteristic that marked the struggle to divide the Fifth Circuit.

PETER GRAHAM FISH
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Progressive Constitutional Thought; Progressivism.)

Bibliography

BARROW, DEBORAH J. and WALKER, G. THOMAS 1988 A Court Divided: The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals and the Politics of Judicial Reform. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

FISH, PETER GRAHAM 1973 The Politics of Federal Judicial Administration. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

JUDICIAL IMMUNITY

In Randall v. Brigham (1869) the Supreme Court endorsed the principle of judicial immunity. Under doctrine "as old as the law," Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD wrote for the Court, judges of courts of general jurisdiction are immune from suit for judicial acts "unless perhaps where the acts, in excess of JURISDICTION, are done maliciously or corruptly." In Bradley v. Fisher (1872) Justice Field, again writing for the Court, extended Randall's standard for protecting judges to preclude liability for all judicial acts except "acts where no jurisdiction whatever" existed and illustrated the difference between acts "in excess of jurisdiction" and acts clearly without jurisdiction. A probate judge acts clearly without jurisdiction when he tries a criminal case. A judge who improperly holds an act to be a crime or sentences a defendant to more than the statutory maximum merely acts in excess of jurisdiction. Bradley also disavowed the suggestion in Randall that a malicious or corrupt motive might affect a judge's immunity.

The Civil War Amendments, ratified at about the time Randall and Bradley were decided, led many years later to a vast growth in individual constitutional protections. This development caused both a reexamination and an eventual reaffirmation of judicial immunity. Because actions against state officials for constitutional violations are brought under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, the scope of judicial immunity from suit for constitutional violations has been defined mainly in answer to the question whether judges may be sued under section 1983.

The unequivocal language of section 1983 led some lower courts to find judges subject to suit. In TENNEY V. BRANDHOVE (1951), however, the Supreme Court held that Congress did not intend section 1983 to overturn the traditional immunity of legislators from suit. Although judicial immunity was less firmly established at COMMON LAW than was legislative immunity, Tenney led courts to conclude that judges, like legislators, are immune from suit under section 1983. In PIERSON V. RAY (1967), with limited discussion of the issue, the Supreme Court adopted this view in holding a judge immune from suit for convicting defendants under a statute later found to be unconstitutional.

In STUMP V. SPARKMAN (1978) the Court reaffirmed the immunity in a case that presented extreme facts. Without a hearing and without NOTICE to the victim, the defendant judge had granted a mother's petition to have her daughter sterilized. Because granting the petition was found to be a judicial act and because no state law or decision expressly denied the judge authority to grant the petition, the judge was immune.

There are, however, some limits to judicial immunity.

In Pulliam v. Allen (1984) the Supreme Court held that state judges are not immune from section 1983 actions seeking injunctive relief or from awards of attorney's fees. In both O'SHEA V. LITTLETON (1974) and IMBLER V. PACHTMAN (1976) the Court suggested that judges are not immune from criminal prosecutions for violating constitutional rights.

A SEPARATION OF POWERS question lurks in the background of the judicial immunity DOCTRINE. Courts might well invalidate a federal statute that imposed liability on federal judges in what the courts believed to be inappropriate circumstances. Because the Court has been relatively generous in protecting its judicial colleagues from liability, and because most activity concerning judicial immunity involves actions against state judges under section 1983, the potential separation of powers issue goes largely unnoticed.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

NOTE 1969 Liability of Judicial Officers under Section 1983. Yale Law Journal 79:322–337.

JUDICIAL IMPEACHMENT

The Constitution is remarkably Delphic on the subject of judicial removal. Article III provides that judges shall hold office during "good Behavior," but leaves that term undefined and fails to indicate who is authorized to define it. Article II provides that the President, Vice-President, and "all civil officers of the United States" shall be subject to IMPEACHMENT and removal, but is silent on whether judges, for this purpose, are to be considered "civil officers." Nonetheless, it has been consistent practice to treat federal judges as removable by impeachment, and to equate "good Behavior," for all practical purposes, with such behavior as has not yet led to such removal.

With regard to federal judges, there have been fifty-eight documented impeachment investigations by the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, eleven impeachment trials conducted by the U.S. SENATE, and seven impeachment convictions—three during the 1980s—two of which prompted not only removal, but also disqualification from holding further federal office. A Senate conviction in a case of impeachment is final; in NIXON V. UNITED STATES (1993), the Court held that the POLITICAL QUESTION doctrine precludes JUDICIAL REVIEW. The constitutional ambiguities concerning judicial removal have prompted three recurring legal debates: May Congress or the executive discipline judges through any unilateral mechanism other than impeachment? Are sitting federal judges subject to criminal prosecution? And, may the federal judiciary itself discipline its members?

Both constitutional history and SEPARATION OF POWERS theory support a negative answer to the first question. The susceptibility of judges to executive removal was decried in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, and the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION debated and rejected the other political removal mechanism short of impeachment known to the former colonists—removal upon "legislative address" to the executive. Both ALEXANDER HAMILTON and Brutus described impeachment as the Constitution's sole judicial removal mechanism, although one applauded and one deplored the resulting degree of JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE. Given that the Supreme Court, in Bowsher v. Synar (1986), held that Congress may participate in executive removals only through impeachment, it seems implausible that Congress has greater authority over judges.

Whether sitting judges may legitimately be prosecuted is less certain. Although no such prosecution had been brought prior to 1980, the U.S. Department of Justice launched five in the ensuing decade, all successful but none reaching the Supreme Court. Perhaps the strongest argument against such authority is that the vulnerability of sitting judges to criminal prosecution threatens judicial independence, and especially judicial evenhandedness in cases involving the government as party. Those lower courts that have thus far addressed the issue, however, have concluded that the importance of judicial integrity outweighs the potential harm.

In 1980, the Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act authorized a discipline process within the federal judiciary that may result in a variety of sanctions short of removal, including private or public reprimand or censure, the temporary nonassignment of cases, or a request for voluntary retirement. Congress avoided the most obvious separation of powers objections by stopping short of authorizing removals and by excluding Supreme Court Justices from the system's purview. In 1993, a commission charged by Congress to investigate the discipline and removal of judges concluded that the act did not represent an unconstitutional intrusion into judicial independence—an issue the Supreme Court has yet to address.

PETER M. SHANE
(2000)

Bibliography

GERHARDT, MICHAEL J. 1996 The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historical Analysis. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL DISCIPLINE AND REMOVAL 1993 Research Papers of the National Commission on Ju- dicial Discipline and Removal, 2 vols. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

SIMON, MARIA 1994 Note: Bribery And Other Not So "Good Behavior": Criminal Prosecution as a Supplement to Impeachment of Federal Judges. Columbia Law Review 94:1617–1673.

SYMPOSIUM 1993 Disciplining the Federal Judiciary. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 142:1–430.

JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE

Long recognized as one of the hallmarks of American constitutionalism, judicial independence takes several different forms, each of which is essential to good judging, but none of which is absolute.

One form—"party detachment"—concerns the relationship between the judge and the parties before the court and is rooted in the aspiration for impartiality. It requires that the judge not be related to these parties nor be in any way under their control or influence. Such a requirement guards against gross threats to impartiality, such as bribery and close kinship ties between judges and litigants, but many less blatant violations, such as cultural ties and ideological sympathy, cannot realistically be prevented. Judicial independence with respect to litigating parties is therefore an ideal that can be achieved only imperfectly.

A second form of judicial independence—"individual autonomy"—concerns the relationship between individual judges and other members of the judiciary. It demands that the judge be unconstrained by collegial and institutional pressures when deciding questions of fact and law. According to this rule, judicial decisions are matters of individual conscience and responsibility.

This aspect of judicial independence has its roots in broad cultural norms, largely of an individualist character, and is reinforced by the American practice of recruiting judges after they have had successful careers in practice or in politics. It is also reinforced by, and reflected in, the practice of having judges sign their own rulings and opinions. This practice requires judges to assume individual responsibility for legal decisions and thus fosters judicial accountability.

Like party detachment, individual autonomy is an ideal that is only partially realized. All judges are expected to adhere to the prior decisions of other judges through the doctrine of STARE DECISIS. Lower court judges are even more constrained: They are subject to appellate review and, more recently, bureaucratic control. For example, the Judicial Councils Reform Act of 1980 allows groups of federal circuit judges to bypass ordinary appellate procedures and form committees to investigate and impose sanctions on individual district court judges.

A third form of judicial independence—"political insularity"—is perhaps the most complex. It requires the judiciary to be independent from popularly controlled governmental institutions, in particular the executive and legislative branches. This form of independence overlaps with party detachment whenever one of the political branches is itself a party before the court, but it is a distinct requirement that encompasses a variety of other circumstances as well. Even when the parties before the court are purely private, the judge is expected to remain free from the influence or control of the political branches of government.

Political insularity is essential for the pursuit of justice, which requires courts to do what is right, not what is popular. This form of independence is also in keeping with SEPARATION OF POWERS doctrine, for it enables the judiciary to act as a countervailing force within the government, checking abuses of power by the legislature and the executive.

One important source of political insularity is Article III. It provides federal judges with life tenure and protection against diminution of pay. Another arises from the limits on the power of the legislature to overrule the courts. Because the federal judiciary is the authoritative interpreter of the Constitution, only an amendment can override a CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION, and the AMENDMENT PROCESS is a cumbersome one, requiring special majorities in each house of Congress and approval by three-fourths of the states.

Despite its importance, political insularity poses a certain dilemma for democratic theory: The more insulated the judiciary is from the popularly controlled governmental institutions, the more it is able to interfere with their policies and thereby frustrate the popular will. Accordingly, the demand for political insularity, perhaps even more so than party detachment and individual autonomy, is a qualified one. Indeed, the federal judiciary, long taken as one of the most independent of all judicial systems in the world, is best understood not as a fully insulated branch of government, but as one unit of an interdependent political system.

One of the primary constraints on the judiciary's political independence is the appointment process. In some countries, the judiciary is given authority to select its own members as a way of enhancing its political insularity. In the United States, the power to appoint federal judges is vested in the President, and this arrangement necessarily introduces an element of political control over the judiciary's composition. Presidents naturally will try to select judges whose concept of justice approximates their own and who are likely to further the policies of their administrations. The President is constrained by public expectations as to the qualifications of nominees, but even the most insistent demand for excellence still allows the President wide latitude. The need to obtain SENATE approval also qualifies the prerogatives of the President, yet this hardly depoliticizes the appointment process, as the Senate is a political institution driven by its own agenda.

Even after a judge takes the oath of office, the President's control over the promotion process may serve as a continuing source of influence. Those who desire a higher position in the judicial hierarchy, or perhaps another government post altogether, may avoid decisions that would put them in disfavor with the President or pose an obstacle to their CONFIRMATION. In addition, every judge is likely to feel a special debt toward the President responsible for his or her appointment. This sense of gratitude may produce a judicial bias in favor of the administration, though this risk is likely to wane over time as the judge comes to confront the policies of a President with whom he or she has no prior relationship. On a number of notable occasions, one involving Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS and President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, sitting Justices have acted as informal advisors to Presidents, compromising their insularity most egregiously.

Another important source of political influence over the judiciary is the IMPEACHMENT process. Article II provides for the impeachment of all civil officers for "Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." However, Article III uses more general language, stating that judges "shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour." Indeed, in the nineteenth century, Congress invoked its impeachment power simply because it disapproved of certain judicial decisions, the most notable example being the impeachment of Justice SAMUEL J. CHASE. In fact, none of these particular proceedings resulted in the removal of the judge, and a general understanding has evolved that a judge may be impeached only for violation of the most elemental duties of office, say chronic drunkenness, corruption, or conviction of a crime. Still, the threat of impeachment, often voiced by ideologues who have no hope of ultimate success, may have an inhibiting influence.

Aside from the political elements introduced by the appointment and impeachment processes, and by the judge's own desire for higher office, economic imperatives may also compromise the judiciary's independence. Although the Constitution provides a guarantee against pay diminution, it is now settled law in the United States that Congress is not obliged to raise federal judicial salaries to keep pace with inflation. Judges seeking to protect the real value of their compensation might therefore tailor their actions so as not to offend the political branches. A judge's attachment to certain incidental benefits of office, such as secretaries, law clerks, and chauffeurs, can produce a similar effect, for these too are within the control of Congress and the President. In these matters, the political branches cannot target individual judges but must establish rules applicable to all federal judges, or at least to specific categories (e.g., the Supreme Court, the lower courts). This limitation blunts the usefulness of this method of control as a sanction, unless, of course, the situation has so deteriorated as to warrant a blanket assault.

A more precise form of control may come in through the exercise of Congress's lawmaking power. Although a judicial decision interpreting the Constitution may be overridden only by recourse to the constitutional amending process, Congress may reverse a STATUTORY INTERPRETATION with a simple legislative enactment. This power has been exercised countless times, though it is subject to a rule that denies Congress the power to prescribe or alter the rule of decision in a case that is already pending.

Congress may also intervene by limiting the JURISDICTION of the federal courts and thereby remitting the claimants to state courts or to other federal agencies (for example, ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES, bankruptcy judges, or magistrates, none of whom are as insulated from the political branches as Article III judges). The most notable so-called jurisdiction-stripping measure is the 1932 NORRIS–LAGUARDIA ACT, which denied federal courts jurisdiction over "labor disputes." As with efforts to prescribe the rule of decision, congressional power to withdraw jurisdiction is limited by a rule that denies it this power in pending cases. Although the Supreme Court, in EX PARTE MCCARDLE (1869), upheld a statute that withdrew its jurisdiction over a pending case that challenged various RECONSTRUCTION statutes, the continuing validity of that PRECEDENT is in doubt. Jurisdiction-stripping measures have also been resisted on the theory that a federal right necessarily implies a federal remedy.

In more recent years, Congress has occasionally sought to exercise control over the adjudication of constitutional claims by placing limitations on judicial remedies as opposed to stripping the federal courts of jurisdiction over those claims. With educational SEGREGATION, for example, Congress has limited the conditions under which SCHOOL BUSING may be ordered. Congress recently employed a similar strategy to affect federal court litigation aimed at reforming prison conditions, though the validity of this act is now being tested in the courts.

The political branches can also influence the course of decision through their control over the number of judgeships. Although the Constitution establishes the Supreme Court, it does not prescribe the number of Justices, nor does it set down any rule as to the number of lower court judges. Because the power of appointment lies with the President, subject of course to confirmation by the Senate, Congress may endow a President whose policies or stance toward the judiciary it supports with new judgeships to fill. Conversely, Congress may try to freeze or shrink the number available to a President with whom it disagrees.

In the nineteenth century, Congress occasionally manipulated the number of Justices on the Court as a way of influencing the course of judicial decisions. However, ever since President Franklin Roosevelt's unsuccessful attempt to pack the Court in the 1930s—a scheme that envisioned adding a new Justice for every one who had turned seventy as a way of undermining decisions striking down NEW DEAL programs—an informal norm has emerged in the United disfavors such manipulation. Yet there are many reasons, including population growth and caseload volume, for altering the size of the judiciary, and Congress may appeal to any or all of them to mask manipulative motivations. Furthermore, because maintaining the status quo is less likely to be perceived as a manipulative act, Congress may exert pressure on federal judges by failing to increase their number in response to increases in the number of cases. These exercises in legislative control are all the more feasible when it comes to the lower federal courts, because no general norms have evolved as to the number of lower court judges (whereas the popular imagination seems to have fixed on the number nine for the Supreme Court), and the lower courts are rarely a subject of widespread public attention.

Finally, the judiciary is dependent on the other branches to enforce its decrees. President ANDREW JACKSON once responded to a Supreme Court decision upholding the Cherokee Nation's claim to federal protection against the state of Georgia in rather sharp terms: "JOHN MARSHALL has made his decision, now let him enforce it." In the modern period, the President has been more cooperative and in fact called out the troops during the CIVIL RIGHTS era to enforce decrees requiring the DESEGREGATION of the Little Rock schools and the University of Mississippi. Such measures were welcomed by the judiciary, but they also underscored the judiciary's dependency and its inability to enforce policies strongly and persistently opposed by the other branches. Judges are possessed with CONTEMPT POWER, but contempt orders are not self-enforcing and may themselves require the assistance of the other branches.

Thus, the much-celebrated independence of the federal judiciary is in many ways limited. Federal judges enjoy a substantial amount of independence with respect to litigating parties and other members of the judiciary, but this independence is far from absolute. It is also true that federal judges are insulated from the political branches of government because they have life tenure, are assured that their pay cannot be diminished by legislative fiat, and, thanks to an evolving public understanding, cannot be removed simply because of disagreement with their decisions. Yet they are by no means fully independent of the political branches. Because the Constitution grants the executive and the legislature the power to make appointments, to decide whether salaries should be adjusted for inflation, and to define the judiciary's jurisdiction and structure, and because the courts often need the political branches to implement their decisions, these branches are able to exercise significant influence over the courts. Judges are independent, but not too independent, as is indeed appropriate in a democracy.

OWEN M. FISS
(2000)

Bibliography

BASS, JACK 1981 Unlikely Heroes. New York: Simon & Schuster.

BURT, ROBERT A. 1993 Judicial Independence and Constitutional Democracy. Pages 287–298 in Irwin P. Stotzky, ed., Transition to Democracy in Latin America. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

FRIEDMAN, RICHARD D. 1986 Tribal Myths: Ideology and the Confirmation of Supreme Court Nominations. Yale Law Journal 95:1283–1320.

GUNTHER, GERALD 1984 Congressional Power to Curtail Federal Jurisdiction. Stanford Law Review 36:895–922.

LEUCHTENBURG, WILLIAM E. 1995 The Supreme Court Reborn: The Constitutional Revolution in the Age of Roosevelt. New York: Oxford University Press.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H. 1992 Grand Inquests: The Historic Impeachments of Justice Samuel Chase and President Andrew Johnson. New York: Morrow.

SAGER, LAWRENCE GENE 1981 Constitutional Limitations of Congress's Authority to Regulate the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts. Harvard Law Review 95:17–89.

JUDICIAL LEGISLATION

The term "judicial legislation" appears to be something of an oxymoron, as the Constitution clearly assigns the principal task of LEGISLATION to the Congress. The Constitution does, of course, give the President a role in the legislative process through the VETO POWER and through his power to recommend legislation to Congress that "he shall judge necessary and expedient." The Framers explicitly rejected, however, a similar role for the judiciary. Several attempts to create a council of revision, composed of the executive and members of the Supreme Court, to review the constitutionality of proposed legislation, were defeated in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. The most effective arguments against including the Court in a council of revision were derived from considerations of the SEPARATION OF POWERS. Elbridge Gerry, for example, remarked that including members of the Supreme Court in a revisory council "was quite foreign from the nature of the office," because it would not only "make them judges of the policy of public measures" but would also involve them in judging measures they had a direct hand in creating. Assigning ultimate legislative responsibility to the Congress apparently reflected the Framers' belief that, in popular forms of government, primary lawmaking responsibility should be lodged with the most representative branches of the government. In JAMES MADISON' s words, "the people are the only legitimate fountain of power."

Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER expressed the same view in his concurring opinion in American Federation of Labor v. American Sash and Door Co. (1949). "Even where the social undesirability of a law may be convincingly urged," he said, "invalidation of the law by a court debilitates popular democratic government. . . . Such an assertion of JUDICIAL POWER deflects responsibility from those on whom in a democratic society it ultimately rests—the people." Frankfurter continued his brief for judicial restraint by arguing that because the powers exercised by the Supreme Court are "inherently oligarchic" they should "be exercised with rigorous self-restraint." The Court, Frankfurter laconically concluded, "is not saved from being oligarchic because it professes to act in the service of humane ends."

The modern Supreme Court is not so easily deterred as Frankfurter was by charges of oligarchy. Since the landmark BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION decision in 1954, the Court has actively and overtly engaged in the kind of lawmaking and policymaking that in previous years was regarded as exclusively the province of the more political branches of government. William Swindler explained the Court's transition from judicial deference to judicial activisim in these terms: "If the freedom of government to act was the basic principle evolving from the Hughes-Stone decade, from 1937–1946, the next logical question—to be disposed of by the WARREN COURT—was the obligation created by the Constitution itself, to compel action in the face of inaction. This led in turn to the epochal decisions in Brown v. Board of Education, BAKER V. CARR, and GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT."

Some scholars have argued that it was the identification of EQUAL PROTECTION rights as class rights and the attendant necessity of fashioning classwide remedies for class injuries that gave the real impetus to the Court's JUDICIAL ACTIVISM in the years immediately following Brown. The Court, in other words, effectively legislated under its newmolded EQUITY powers. (See INSTITUTIONAL LITIGATION.)

The Court's legislative role is usually justified in terms of its power of JUDICIAL REVIEW. But judicial review—even if it be regarded as a necessary inference from the fact of a written constitution—is not a part of the powers explicitly assigned to the Court by the Constitution. The Court made its boldest claim for the legitimacy of judicial legislation in COOPER V. AARON (1958). Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, writing an opinion signed by all the members of the Court, outlined the basic constitutional argument for JUDICIAL SUPREMACY. Brennan recited "some basic constitutional propositions which are settled doctrine," and which were derived from Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's argument in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803). First is the proposition, contained in Article VI of the Constitution, that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land (see SUPREMACY CLAUSE); second is Marshall's statement that the Constitution is "the fundamental and paramount law of the nation"; third is Marshall's declaration that "[i]t is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." Justice Brennan concluded that Marbury therefore "declared the basic principle that the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution, and that principle has ever since been respected by this Court and the Country as a permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system. It follows that the interpretation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT enunciated by this Court in the Brown Case is the supreme law of the land. . . ." The defect of Brennan's argument, of course, is that it confounds the Constitution with constitutional law.

Marshall did indeed say that the Constitution was "the fundamental and paramount law of the nation," and that any "ordinary legislative acts" "repugnant to the constitution" were necessarily void. But when Marshall wrote the famous line relied upon by Brennan that "it is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is," he was referring not to the Constitution but to "ordinary legislative acts." In order to determine the law's conformity with the Constitution it is first necessary to know what the law is. And once the law is ascertained it is also necessary to determine whether the law is in conformity with the "paramount law" of the Constitution. This latter, of course, means that "in some cases" the Constitution itself "must be looked into by the judges" in order to determine the particular disposition of a case. But Marshall was clear that the ability of the Court to interpret the Constitution was incident to the necessity of deciding a law's conformity to the Constitution, and not a general warrant for CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION or judicial legislation. Marshall was emphatic in his pronouncement that "the province of the court is, solely, to decide on the rights of individuals."

"It is apparent," Marshall concluded, "that the framers of the constitution contemplated that instrument as a rule for the government of courts, as well as of the legislature." As he laconically noted in the peroration of his argument, "it is also not entirely unworthy of observation, that in declaring what shall be the supreme law of the land, the constitution itself is first mentioned; and not the laws of the United States generally, but those only which shall be made in pursuance of the constitution, have that rank." For Marshall, Brennan's assertion that the Court's decision in Brown was "the supreme law of the land" would indeed make "written constitutions absurd" because it would usurp the "original right" of the people to establish their government on "such principles" that must be "deemed fundamental" and "permanent." If the Supreme Court were indeed to sit as a "continuing constitutional convention," any written Constitution would certainly be superfluous since, under the circumstances there would be no "rule for the government of courts." After all, by parity of reasoning, if one were to accept Brennan's argument, it would also be necessary to hold that the Court's decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) was the supreme law of the land. But Dred Scott gave way because forces other than the Supreme Court decided that it was a decision not "pursuant" to the "fundamental and paramount law" of the nation. As John Agresto has cogently remarked; "If Congress can mistake the meaning of the text [of the Constitution], which is what the doctrine of judicial review asserts, so, of course, can the Court. And if it be said that it is more dangerous to have interpretive supremacy in the same body that directs the nation's public policy—that is, Congress—then (especially in this age of pervasive judicial direction of political and social life) an independent judicial interpretive power is equally fearsome for exactly the same reasons."

In SWANN V. CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BOARD OF EDUCATION (1971) the Court was confronted with the question of the federal judiciary's equity powers under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. At issue was whether the Court could uphold SCHOOL BUSING as a "remedy for state-imposed segregation in violation of Brown I." As part of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 the Congress had included in Title IV a provision that "nothing herein shall empower any official or court . . . to issue any order seeking to achieve a racial balance in any school by requiring the transportation of pupils or students from one school to another . . . or otherwise enlarge the existing power of the court to insure compliance with constitutional standards." Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, writing for a unanimous Court, remarked that on its face this section of Title IV is only "designed to foreclose any interpretation of the Act as expanding the existing powers of federal courts to enforce the Equal Protection Clause. There is no suggestion of an intention to restrict those powers or withdraw from courts their historic equitable remedial powers." According to Burger these equity powers flow directly from the Fourteenth Amendment—despite the fact that section 5 of the Amendment gives Congress explicit enforcement authority, an authority that was mistakenly restricted by the Court in the SLAUGHTER-HOUSE CASES (1873) and the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883).

A serious question arises, however, concerning Burger's claim that forced busing is one of the "historic" equity powers of the Court. It was never asserted as such by the Court prior to 1964, and as late as two years after the Swann decision it was still being described by Justice LEWIS F. POWELL as "a novel application of equitable power—not to mention a dubious extension of constitutional doctrine." Congress's response to Swann, the Equal Educational Opportunity and Transportation of Students Act of 1972, contained restrictions similar to those included in Title IV. These provisions suffered the same fate as the Title IV provisions, only now the Court was able to use Swann as authority for its ruling.

The Swann rationale derives equity powers directly from the Constitution. But the way in which the Court exercises its equity powers is indistinguishable from legislation. Thus, in effect, the Court now derives what is tantamount to legislative power from the Constitution. Because this power rests upon an interpretation of the Constitution, no act of Congress can overturn or modify the interpretation. Many scholars argue that if the Congress were to attempt to curtail the Court's power to order forced busing under the exceptions clause, the Court would be obligated, under the Swann reasoning, to declare such an attempt unconstitutional, because the Court's obligation to require busing as a remedy for equal protection violations is derived directly from the Constitution.

Judicial legislation incident to statutory interpretation is less controversial, for the Congress can overturn any constructions of the Court by repassing the legislation in a way that clarifies congressional intent. The interpretation of statutes necessarily involves the judiciary in legislation. In many instances the courts must engage in judicial legislation in order to say what the law is. In years past the Court's sense of judicial deference confined such judicial legislation to what Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES called the "interstices" of the law. It was generally believed that the plain language of the statute should be the controlling factor in statutory construction and that extrinsic aids to construction such as legislative history should be used only where they were necessary to avoid a contradictory or absurd result.

The courts are not always the aggressive agents in the process of judicial legislation. In recent years courts have acted to fill the void created by Congress's abdication of legislative responsibility. Many statutes passed by Congress are deliberately vague and imprecise; indeed, the Congress in numerous instances charges administrative agencies and courts to supply the necessary details. This delegation of authority to administrative agencies with provisions for judicial oversight of the administrative process has contributed to the judiciary's increased participation in judicial legislation. This tendency was intensified by the Court's decision in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), holding the LEGISLATIVE VETO unconstitutional. Congress had for years used the single-house legislative veto as a device for overseeing the activities of administrative agencies. But, as Judge Carl McGowan has noted, "the question inevitably recurs as to whether judicial review is an adequate protection against the abdication by Congress of substantive policy making in favor of broad delegation of what may essentially be the power to make laws and not merely to administer them."

The volume of litigation calling for "legislation" on the part of the courts also increases in proportion with the liberalization of the rules of STANDING. In previous years the Court's stricter requirements for standing were merely a recognition that the province of the judiciary, in the words of John Marshall quoted earlier, "was solely to decide on the rights of individuals, not to inquire how the executive, or executive officers, perform duties in which they have a discretion." Liberalized rules of standing tend to produce what Court of Appeals Judge ATONIN SCALIA has called "an overjudicialization of the process of self-governance." Judge Scalia reminds us of the question posed by Justice Frankfurter—whether it is wise for a self-governing people to give itself over to the rule of an oligarchic judiciary. James Bradley Thayer wrote more than eighty-five years ago that "the exercise of [judicial review], even when unavoidable, is always attended with a serious evil, namely, that the correction of legislative mistakes comes from the outside, and the people thus lose the political experience, and the moral education and stimulus that comes from fighting the question out in the ordinary way, and correcting their own errors. The tendency of a common and easy resort to this great function, now lamentably too common, is to dwarf the political capacity of the people, and to deaden its sense of moral responsibility."

If, on the other hand, the processes of democracy are unsuited for protecting democratic ends—if, that is, in the words of Jesse Choper, it is necessary for the Supreme Court generally to act "contrary to the popular will" to promote "the precepts of democracy"—then the question whether the American people can be a self-governing people is indeed a serious one. It was once thought that constitutional majorities could rule safely in the interest of the whole of society—that constitutional government could avoid the formation of majority faction. Today many scholars—and often the Supreme Court itself—simply assume that the majority will always be a factious majority seeking to promote its own interest at the expense of the interest of the minority. This requires that the judiciary intervene not only in the processes of democracy but also as the virtual representatives of the interest of those who are said to be permanently isolated from the majoritarian political process. If American politics is indeed incapable of forming nonfactious majorities—and America has never had such a monolithic majority—then the American people should give itself over honestly and openly to "government by judiciary," for if constitutional government is impossible, then so too is the possibility of self-governance.

EDWARD J. ERLER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Judicial Policymaking; Judicial Review and Democracy.)

Bibliography

AGRESTO, JOHN 1984 The Supreme Court and Constitutional Democracy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

ERLER, EDWARD J. 1985 Sowing the Wind: Judicial Oligarchy and the Legacy of Brown v. Board of Education. Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 8:399–426.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1967 Judicial Review, History, and Democracy. Pages 1–42 in Leonard W. Levy, ed., Judicial Review and the Supreme Court. New York: Harper & Row.

SWINDLER, WILLIAM 1969 Court and Constitution in the 20th Century. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

JUDICIAL POLICYMAKING

Judicial policymaking and related terms—JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, judicial creativity, and JUDICIAL LEGISLATION—emphasize that judges are not mere legal automatons who simply "discover" or "find" definite, preexisting principles and rules, as the declaratory or oracular conception of the judicial function insisted, but are often their makers. As Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES remarked, they often exercise "the sovereign prerogative of choice," and they "can and do legislate." Indeed, that is why the Supreme Court has often been viewed as "a continuing constitutional convention."

Policymaking is deciding what is to be done by choosing among possible actions, methods, or principles for determining and guiding present and future actions or decisions. Courts, especially high appellate courts such as the SUPREME COURT, often make such choices, establishing new rules and principles, and thus are properly called policymakers. That was emphasized by CHARLES EVANS HUGHES's famous rhetorical exaggeration, "The Constitution is what the judges say it is," and by his remark that a federal statute finally means what the Court, as ultimate interpreter of congressional LEGISLATION, says it means.

The persistent "declaratory" conception of the judicial role, a view critics derided as MECHANICAL JURISPRUDENCE, and simplistic notions of the SEPARATION OF POWERS principle long obscured the reality of judicial policymaking. Today it is widely recognized that, as C. Herman Pritchett has explained, "judges are inevitably participants in the process of public policy formulation; that they do in fact "make law'; that in making law they are necessarily guided in part by their personal conceptions of justice and public policy; that written law requires interpretation which involves the making of choices; that the rule of STARE DECISIS is vulnerable because precedents are typically available to support both sides in a controversy."

As a system of social control, law must function largely through general propositions rather than through specific directives to particular persons. And that is especially true of the Constitution. The Framers did not minutely specify the national government's powers or the means for executing them: as Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL said, the Constitution "is one of enumeration, rather than of definition." Many of its most important provisions are indeterminate and open-textured. They are not self-interpreting, and thus judges must read specific meanings into them and determine their applicability to particular situations, many of which their authors could not have anticipated.

Among the Constitution's many ambiguous, undefined, pregnant provisions are those concerning CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT; DOUBLE JEOPARDY; DUE PROCESS OF LAW; EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS; ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION; excessive BAIL and fines; EX POST FACTO LAWS; FREEDOM OF SPEECH, press, assembly, and religion; life, liberty, and property; the power to regulate commerce among the several states; and unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES. Also undefined by the Constitution are such fundamental conceptions as JUDICIAL REVIEW, the RULE OF LAW, and the separation of powers. Small wonder, then, that Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON plaintively remarked that the Court must deal with materials nearly as enigmatic as the dreams of Pharaoh which Joseph had to interpret; or that Chief Justice EARL WARREN emphasized that the Constitution's words often have "an iceberg quality, containing beneath their surface simplicity submerged complexities which go to the very heart of our constitutional form of government."

Because the Constitution embodies in its ambiguous provisions both common and conflicting community ideals, the Supreme Court serves, as Edward H. Levi has said, as "a forum for the discussion of policy in the gap of ambiguity," which allows the infusion into constitutional law of new meanings and new ideas as situations and people's ideas change. That is the process which Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER described as "the evolution of social policy by way of judicial application of the Delphic provisions of the Constitution." Brief accounts of some notable Supreme Court decisions reveal their policymaking features.

Although the Constitution nowhere explicitly grants Congress the power to incorporate a national bank, the Supreme Court in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) held that power to be implied by the Constitution's NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE. That clause empowers Congress, in executing its various enumerated powers, to make all laws for that purpose which are "necessary and proper." But those ambiguous words are not further defined by the Constitution.

In making its McCulloch decision, the Court chose between two historic, diametrically opposed interpretations. The narrow, STATES' RIGHTS, STRICT CONSTRUCTION, Jeffersonian interpretation of the clause was restrictive and limited Congress to legislation that was "absolutely necessary," that is, literally indispensable. The opposing interpretation, which the Court adopted, was the broad, nationalist, loose constructionist, Hamiltonian view that "necessary and proper" were equivalent to "convenient and useful" and thus were facilitative, not restrictive. The bank, declared the Court, was a convenient and useful means to legitimate ends and thus was constitutional.

Viewed broadly as the great implied powers case and the "fountainhead of national powers," McCulloch laid down the Hamiltonian doctrine as the authoritative rule of construction to be followed in interpreting Congress's various undefined powers. Subsequently, on that foundation, Congress erected vast superstructures of regulatory and social service legislation. The profound policy considerations underlying the Court's choices are highlighted by the contrast between Jefferson's warning that the dangerous Hamiltonian doctrine would give Congress a boundless field of undefined powers, and Chief Justice Marshall's emphasis upon the "pernicious, baneful," narrow construction which would make the national government's operations "difficult, hazardous, and expensive" and would reduce the Constitution to "a splendid bauble."

The RIGHT TO PRIVACY was recognized by the Supreme Court in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965). There, and in other cases, the Court variously discerned the "roots" of that right, which is not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution, in the FIRST, FOURTH, Fifth, NINTH, and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS and in "the penumbras of the BILL OF RIGHTS." Later, in ROE V. WADE (1973), the Court included a woman's right to an abortion in the right of privacy, and, in the detailed manner characteristic of legislation, divided the pregnancy term into three periods and prescribed specific rules governing each. Balancing a woman's interests against a state's interests during these three periods, the Court held that any decision regarding abortion during the first was solely at the discretion of the woman and her physician. But it further ruled that a state's interests in protecting maternal health, maintaining medical standards, and safeguarding potential human life—interests growing in substantiality as the pregnancy term extended—justified greater state regulation later. Thus, state regulations relating to maternal health and medical standards would be permissible in the second period, and more stringent state regulations, even extending to prohibition of abortion, would be permissible in the third period in the interest of safeguarding potential life.

The protests by dissenting Justices in the Griswold and Roe cases emphasized the judicial policymaking which those decisions revealed. The Griswold dissenters objected that no right of privacy could be found "in the Bill of Rights, in any other part of the Constitution, or in any case ever before decided by this Court." And dissenters in Roe complained that the Court's decision was "an improvident and extravagant exercise of the power of JUDICIAL REVIEW"; that the Court had fashioned "a new constitutional right for pregnant mothers"; and that the Court's "conscious weighing of competing factors" and its division of the pregnancy term into distinct periods were "far more appropriate to a legislative judgement than to a judicial one."

The Supreme Court's "REAPPORTIONMENT revolution" remedied long-standing discriminations against urban and metropolitan areas in favor of rural areas, by requiring states to reapportion their legislatures in conformity with the rule that legislative districts must be as nearly of equal population as is practicable.

That rule is not found in any constitutional provision specifically addressed to legislative apportionment, for none exists. It is a Court-created rule which clearly demonstrates the leeway for policymaking that open-ended constitutional provisions give the Court. Equal population, the Court said in WESBERRY V. SANDERS (1964), is required for congressional districts by "the command" of Article I, section 2, of the Constitution, that representatives "be chosen by the People" of the states; and is required for state legislative districts, the Court held in REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964), by "the clear and strong command" of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT's equal protection clause, forbidding states to deny to any persons "the equal protection of the laws."

Courtesy may ascribe the Court's rule to CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION; but candor ascribes it to judicial policymaking. The dissenting Justices' objections in these cases made that clear. They included complaints that the Court had frozen one political theory of REPRESENTATION into the Constitution; had failed to exercise judicial self-restraint; had decided questions appropriate only for legislative judgment; had violated the separation of powers doctrine; and had excluded numerous important considerations other than population.

Supreme Court overruling decisions, in which it rejects its earlier positions for those later thought more fitting, often strikingly exemplify judicial policymaking. In MAPP V. OHIO (1961) the Court imposed upon state courts its judicially created EXCLUSIONARY RULE making illegally obtained evidence inadmissible in court. It overruled WOLF V. COLORADO (1949) which, in deference to state policies, had held an exclusionary rule not essential for due process of law.

Some overruling decisions illustrate "the victory of dissent," when earlier dissenting Justices' views in time became the law. Thus in GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963) the Court applied its rule that indigent defendants in all state felony trials must have court-appointed counsel. Overruling BETTS V. BRADY (1942), the Court adopted Justice Black's dissenting position from it, thus repudiating its Betts pronouncement that such appointment was "not a fundamental right, essential to a fair trial."

According to the Court in BARRON V. BALTIMORE (1833), the Bill of Rights—the first ten amendments—limits the national government but not the states. But the Court, by its INCORPORATION DOCTRINE, has read nearly all the specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment which provides simply that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The incorporation has been called selective because the Court, proceeding case by case, has incorporated those guarantees which it considers "fundamental" and "of the very essence of a scheme of ORDERED LIBERTY."

Selective incorporation has involved two kinds of Supreme Court policymaking: adopting the FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS standard for guiding incorporation, and making the separate decisions incorporating particular Bill of Rights guarantees. Thus the Court, applying its open-textured rule, has given specific meaning to "the vague contours" of the due process clause. And it has become "a perpetual censor" over state actions, invalidating those that violate fundamental rights and liberties.

Clearly the Supreme Court is more than just a legal body: the Justices are also "rulers," sharing in the quintessentially political function of authoritatively allocating values for the American polity. Representing a coordinate branch of the national government, they address their mandates variously to lawyers, litigants, federal and state legislative, executive, and judicial officials, and to broader concerned "publics." Concerning their role, no sharp line can be drawn between law and politics in the broad sense. They do not expound a prolix or rigid legal code, but rather a living Constitution "intended to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs," as Chief Justice Marshall said in the McCulloch case. And the Justices employ essentially COMMON LAW judicial techniques: they are inher-itors indeed, but developers too—"weavers of the fabric of constitutional law"—as Chief Justice Hughes observed. The nature of the judicial process and the growth of the law are intertwined. The Constitution, itself the product of great policy choices, is both the abiding Great Charter of the American polity and the continual focus of clashing philosophies of law and politics among which the Supreme Court must choose: "We are very quiet there," said Justice Holmes plaintively, "but it is the quiet of a storm center, as we all know."

HOWARD E. DEAN
(1986)

Bibliography

CARDOZO, BENJAMIN N. 1921 The Nature of the Judicial Process. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

LEVI, EDWARD H. 1948 An Introduction to Legal Reasoning. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MILLER, ARTHUR SELWYN 1978 The Supreme Court: Myth and Reality. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

MURPHY, WALTER F. 1964 Elements of Judicial Strategy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

PRITCHETT, C. HERMAN 1969 The Development of Judicial Research. Pages 27–42 in Joel B. Grossman and Joseph Tanenhaus, eds., Frontiers of Judicial Research. New York: Wiley.

JUDICIAL POWER

"[T]he legislative, executive, and judicial powers, of every well constructed government," said JOHN MARSHALL in OSBORN V. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES (1824), "are coextensive with each other; . . . [t]he executive department may constitutionally execute every law which the Legislature may constitutionally make, and the judicial department may receive from the legislature the power of construing every such law." The ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION fell far short of this model. Not only was there no federal executive with authority to enforce congressional measures against individuals, but, apart from a cumbersome procedure for resolving interstate disputes, Congress was authorized to establish courts only for the trial of crimes committed at sea and for the determination of "appeals in all cases of captures." The remedy for these shortcomings was one of the major accomplishments of the Constitution adopted in 1789. As Article II gave the country a President with the obligation to "take care that the Laws be faithfully executed," Article III provided for a system of federal courts that more than satisfied Marshall's conditions for a "well constructed government."

Article III consists of three brief sections. The first describes the tribunals that are to exercise federal judicial power and prescribes the tenure and compensation of their judges. The second lists the types of disputes that may be entrusted to federal courts, specifies which of these matters are to be determined by the SUPREME COURT in the first instance, and guarantees TRIAL BY JURY in criminal cases. The third defines and limits the crime of TREASON.

"The judicial Power of the United States," Article III declares, "shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The text itself indicates that the Supreme Court was the only tribunal the Constitution required to be established, and the debates of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION demonstrate that the latter words embodied a deliberate compromise.

In fact, however, Congress created additional courts at the very beginning, in the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789. Since 1911 the basic system has consisted of the UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS—at least one in every state—in which most cases are first tried; a number of regional appellate courts now called the UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS; and the Supreme Court itself, which functions largely as a court of last resort. From time to time, moreover, Congress has created specialized courts with JURISDICTION to determine controversies involving relatively limited subjects. All this lies well within Congress's broad discretion under Article III to determine what lower courts to create and how to allocate judicial business among them. Specialization at the highest level, however, seems precluded; Congress can no more divide the powers of "one Supreme Court" among two or more bodies than abolish it altogether.

"The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts," section 1 continues, "shall hold their Offices during GOOD BEHAVIOUR and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office." Under the second section of Article II the judges have always been appointed by the President subject to Senate confirmation; under the fourth section of that article they may be removed from office on IMPEACHMENT and conviction of "Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." The central purpose of the tenure and salary provisions, as ALEXANDER HAMILTON explained in THE FEDERALIST #78, was to assure judicial independence.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly enforced the tenure and salary provisions. In EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1867), for example, the Court held even the Civil War no excuse for submitting civilians to military trials in states where the civil courts were open, and in O'Donoghue v. United States (1933), it held that the Great Depression did not justify reducing judicial salaries.

On a number of occasions, however, the Court has permitted matters within the judicial power to be determined by LEGISLATIVE COURTS whose judges do not possess tenure and salary guarantees. State courts may decide Article III cases, as the Framers of the Constitution clearly contemplated; the tenure and salary provisions do not apply to the TERRITORIES or to the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, where there is no SEPARATION OF POWERS requirement; Article III did not abolish the traditional COURT-MARTIAL for military offenses; federal magistrates may make initial decisions in Article III cases provided they are subject to unlimited reexamination by tenured judges.

Early in the twentieth century the Supreme Court appeared to give judicial blessing to the numerous quasi-judicial bodies that have grown up since the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887, although scholars have debated heatedly whether there is any satisfactory way to distinguish them from the nontenured trial courts plainly forbidden by Article III. That these developments did not mean the effective end of the tenure and salary requirements, however, was made clear in 1982, when the Court in NORTHERN PIPE LINE CONSTRUCTION CO. V. MARATHON PIPE LINE CO. invalidated a statute empowering judges with temporary commissions to exercise virtually the entire jurisdiction of the district courts in BANKRUPTCY cases. Where to draw this line promises to be a continuing problem.

The power to be vested in federal courts is the "judicial power," and the various categories of matters that fall within this power are all described as CASES OR CONTROVERSIES—"Cases," for example, "arising under this Constitution," and "Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party." From the beginning the Supreme Court has taken this language as a limitation: federal courts may not resolve anything but "cases" and "controversies," and those terms embrace only judicial functions.

Thus, for example, when President GEORGE WASHINGTON asked the Justices for legal advice respecting the United States' neutrality during hostilities between England and France, they declined to act "extra-judicially"; and when Congress directed them to advise the war secretary concerning veterans' pensions, five Justices sitting on circuit refused, saying the authority conferred was "not of a judicial nature" (HAYBURN'S CASE, 1792). Washington's request for advice did not begin to resemble the ordinary lawsuit, but later decisions have invoked the "case" or "controversy" limitation to exclude federal court consideration of matters far less remote from the normal judicial function. The essential requirement, the Court has emphasized, is a live and actual dispute between adversary parties with a real stake in the outcome.

One dimension of this principle is the doctrine of RIPENESS or prematurity: the courts are not to give advice on the mere possibility that it might be of use in the future. Occasionally the Court has appeared to require a person to violate a law in order to test its constitutionality—causing one commentator to remark that "the only way to determine whether the subject is a mushroom or a toadstool, is to eat it." The DECLARATORY JUDGMENT ACT, passed to mitigate this hardship, has generally been applied to allow preenforcement challenges when the intentions of the parties are sufficiently firm, and it has been held consistent with the "Case" or "Controversy" requirement.

At the opposite end of the spectrum is the MOOTNESS doctrine, which ordinarily forbids litigation after death or other changed circumstances deprive the issue of any further impact on the parties. A series of debatable decisions essentially dating from Moore v. Ogilvie (1969), however, has relaxed the mootness doctrine especially in CLASS ACTIONS, so as to permit persons with no remaining interest to continue litigating issues deemed "capable of repetition, yet evading review."

The "case or controversy" requirement has also been held to forbid the decision of COLLUSIVE SUITS, and to preclude the courts from exercising the discretion of an administrator, as by reviewing de novo the decision to grant a broadcasting license. The most important remaining element of that requirement, however, is the constitutional dimension of the doctrine of STANDING to sue.

While standing has been aptly characterized as one of the most confused areas of federal law, its constitutional component was simply stated in Warth v. Seldin (1975): "[t]he Article III power exists only to redress or otherwise to protect against injury to the complaining party." Injury in this context is hardly self-defining, but it plainly requires something more than intellectual or emotional "interest in a problem." This principle puts under a serious cloud the periodic congressional attempts to authorize "any person" to obtain judicial relief against violations of environmental or other laws. On the other hand, other aspects of the standing doctrine are not of constitutional dimension and thus do not preclude Congress from conferring standing on anyone injured by governmental action.

One of the principal points of contention of the law of standing has been the right of federal taxpayers to challenge the constitutionality of federal spending programs. When a taxpayer attacked expenditures for maternal health on the ground that they exceeded the powers granted Congress by Article I, the Court in FROTHINGHAM V. MELLON (1923) found no standing: "the taxpayer's interest in the moneys of the treasury . . . is shared with millions of others, is comparatively minute and indeterminable, and the effect upon future taxation, of any payment out of the funds, so remote, fluctuating, and uncertain, that no basis is afforded for an appeal to the preventive powers of a court of EQUITY."

Although the apparent reference to equitable discretion made it uncertain that the Court was saying taxpayer suits were not "cases or controversies" within Article III, the remainder of the passage suggests that the taxpayer could not show the constitutionally required injury because it was uncertain that a victory would mean reduced taxes. Nevertheless, in FLAST V. COHEN (1968) the Court allowed a federal taxpayer to challenge expenditures for church-related education as an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION in violation of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Unlike the taxpayer in Frothingham, who "was attempting to assert the States' interest in their legislative prerogatives," the plaintiff in Flast asserted "a federal taxpayer's interest in being free of taxing and spending in contravention of specific constitutional limitations," for one purpose of the establishment clause was to prevent taxation for religious ends. Whether the distinction was of constitutional scope the Court did not say; interestingly, the taxpayer opinions have tended to avoid entirely the traditional constitutional inquiry into the existence of an injury that will be redressed if the plaintiff's claim prevails.

Underlying the constitutional "case or controversy" limitation are a variety of policy concerns. The first group relates to reducing the risk of erroneous decisions. Concrete facts enable judges to understand the practical impact of their holdings; adverse parties help to assure that arguments on both sides will be considered; as argued by FELIX FRANKFURTER, "the ADVISORY OPINION deprives CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION of the judgment of the legislature upon facts." A second group of reasons focuses upon strengthening the Court's institutional position. Lawmaking by appointed judges is least difficult to reconcile with democratic principles when it is the inevitable by-product of the stock business of judging; the courts should not squander their power of moral suasion or multiply conflicts with other branches by deciding unnecessary legal questions. Third, and of considerable importance, is a concern for the separation of powers. The courts are not to exercise a general superintendence over the activities of the other branches.

The costs of the "case or controversy" limitation include the delay, uncertainty, and disruption incident to determining the constitutionality of legislation only in the course of subsequent litigation, and the danger that some legislative and executive actions may escape JUDICIAL REVIEW entirely. Whether the latter is cause for concern has much to do with one's perception of the function and importance of judicial review itself; it seems reasonable to expect that perception to influence the definition of a "case" or "controversy."

In addition to restricting federal courts to the decision of "cases" and "controversies" of a judicial nature, section 2 of Article III enumerates those categories of "cases" and "controversies" to which the "judicial Power shall extend." As the former limitation serves the interests of separating federal powers, the latter serves those of FEDERALISM. In accord with the spirit of the TENTH AMENDMENT the Supreme Court has held that Congress may not give the federal courts jurisdiction over disputes of types not listed in Article III. John Marshall set the tone in cutting down to constitutional size a statute providing for jurisdiction over cases involving ALIENS in HODGSON V. BOWERBANK in 1809: "Turn to the article of the constitution of the United States, for the statutes cannot extend the jurisdiction beyond the limits of the constitution."

Article III's provision that federal judicial power "shall extend to" certain classes of cases and controversies has generally been taken to mean that it shall embrace nothing else. From the text alone one might think it even more plain that federal courts must be given jurisdiction over all the matters listed, for section 1 commands that the federal judicial power "shall be vested" in federal courts. Indeed, Justice JOSEPH STORY suggested just such an interpretation in MARTIN V. HUNTER'S LESSEE in 1816. This conclusion, however, was unnecessary to the decision, contrary to the understanding of the First Congress, and inconsistent with both earlier and later decisions of the Supreme Court.

Article III, in other words, has been read to mean only that Congress may confer jurisdiction over the enumerated cases, not that it must do so. This arguably unnatural construction has been defended by reference to the limited list of controversies over which the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction, the explicit congressional power to make exceptions to the Supreme Court's appellate authority, and the compromise at the Constitutional Convention permitting Congress not to establish inferior courts at all.

This is not to say, however, that Congress has unfettered authority to deny the courts jurisdiction, for all powers of Congress are subject to limitations found elsewhere in the Constitution. A statute depriving the courts of authority to determine cases filed by members of a particular racial group, for instance, would be of highly doubtful vitality under the modern interpretation of the Fifth Amendment DUE PROCESS clause, and one part of Marshall's reasoning in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) supports an argument that closing all federal and state courts to free-speech claims would defeat the substantive right itself. Proposals to remove entire categories of constitutional litigation from the ken of one or more federal courts often follow controversial judicial decisions. Out of respect for the tradition of CHECKS AND BALANCES, however, such bills are seldom enacted; we have so far been spared the constitutional trauma of determining the extent to which they may validly be adopted.

The cases and controversies within federal judicial power fall into two categories: those in which jurisdiction is based upon the nature of the dispute and those in which it is based upon the identity of the parties. In the first category are three kinds of disputes: those "arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority"; those "of ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME Jurisdiction"; and those involving competing land claims "under Grants of different States." The provision last quoted is of minor importance; the second formed the staple business of the district courts throughout their early history; the first fulfills Marshall's condition for a "well constructed government" and is by any measure the most critical ingredient of federal jurisdiction today.

The provision for jurisdiction in cases arising under the Constitution and other federal laws has two essential purposes: to promote uniformity in the interpretation of federal law, and to assure the vindication of federal rights. The First Congress sought to accomplish the second of these goals by providing, in section 25 of the 1789 Judiciary Act, for Supreme Court review of state-court decisions denying federal rights; the additional uniformity attendant upon review of state decisions upholding federal claims was not provided until 1914. In sustaining section 25, the opinion in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee demonstrated the difficulty of achieving Article III's purpose without Supreme Court review of state courts: while plaintiffs might be authorized to file federal claims directly in federal courts and defendants to remove state court actions to federal courts on the basis of federal defenses, it was not easy to see how a state court opposing removal "could . . . be compelled to relinquish the jurisdiction" without some federal court reviewing the state court decision.

Conversely, although Congress failed to give federal trial courts general jurisdiction of federal question cases until 1875, Marshall made clear as early as 1824, in Osborn v. Bank of the United States, that it had power to do so. Supreme Court review alone was no more an adequate protection for federal rights, Marshall argued, than was exclusive reliance on litigation beginning in federal trial courts. As the latter would leave claimants without remedy against a recalcitrant state court, the former would give a state tribunal the critical power to shape the factual record beyond assurance of federal appellate correction.

The Osborn opinion also settled that jurisdiction of a federal trial court over a case arising under federal law was not defeated by the presence of additional issues dependent upon state law. In a companion case, indeed, the Court upheld jurisdiction over a suit by the national bank on notes whose validity and interpretation were understood to depend in substantial part upon nonfederal law: it was enough that the plaintiff derived its existence and its right to contract from the act of Congress incorporating it. The courts have not followed this broad approach, however, in determining whether FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION lies under general statutory provisions; when the federal ingredient of a claim is remote from the actual controversy, as in a dispute over ownership of land whose title is remotely derived from a federal land grant, the district courts lack statutory jurisdiction.

In the contract dispute discussed in Osborn, federal and state law were bound together in the resolution of a single claim; in such a case, as HENRY HART and Herbert Wechsler said, "a federal trial court would . . . be unable to function as a court at all" if its jurisdiction did not extend to state as well as federal matters. In the interest of "judicial economy," however, as the Supreme Court put it in United Mine Workers v. Gibbs (1966), jurisdiction over a case arising under federal law embraces not only a plaintiff's federal claim but also any claims under state law based on the same facts. This so-called PENDENT JURISDICTION doctrine, however, is inapplicable when the Supreme Court reviews a state court decision. With one exception, in such a case the Court may review only federal and not state questions, as the Court held in Murdock v. Memphis (1875); for to reverse a state court in the interpretation of its own law would be a major incursion into state prerogatives not required by the purposes for which Supreme Court review was provided.

A corollary of the Murdock principle is that a state court decision respecting state law often precludes the Supreme Court from reviewing even federal questions in the same case. If a state court concludes, for example, that a state law offends both federal and state constitutions, the Supreme Court cannot reverse the state law holding; thus, however it may decide the federal issue, it cannot alter the outcome of the case. This independent and ADEQUATE STATE GROUND for the state court decision means there is no longer a live case or controversy between the parties over the federal question. In light of this relation between state and federal issues, Martin itself announced the sole exception to the Murdock rule: when the state court has interpreted state law in such a way as to frustrate the federal right itself—as by holding that a contract allegedly impaired in violation of the CONTRACT CLAUSE never existed—a complete absence of power to review the state question would mean the Court's authority to protect federal rights "may be evaded at pleasure."

"The most bigoted idolizers of state authority," wrote Alexander Hamilton in THE FEDERALIST #80, "have not thus far shown a disposition to deny the National Judiciary the cognizance of maritime causes"; for such cases "so generally depend upon the law of nations, and so commonly affect the rights of foreigners, that they fall within the considerations which are relative to the public peace." Jurisdiction over what Article III refers to as "Cases of admiralty, and maritime Jurisdiction" has been vested by statute in the district courts since 1789. Today federal admiralty jurisdiction extends, as the Court stated in another context in The Daniel Ball (1871), to all waters forming part of "a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other states or foreign countries."

Not everything occurring on navigable waters, however, is a proper subject of admiralty jurisdiction; in denying jurisdiction of claims arising out of an airplane crash in Lake Erie, the Supreme Court made clear that the case must "bear a significant relationship to traditional maritime activity . . . involving navigation and commerce on navigable waters." Conversely, the relation of an activity to maritime concerns may bring it within admiralty cognizance even if it occurs on land. Marine insurance contracts, for example, are within the jurisdiction although both made and to be performed on land. Similarly, the Court has acquiesced in Congress's provision for jurisdiction over land damage caused by vessels on navigable waters.

Because an additional purpose of federal judicial power over maritime cases is understood to have been to provide a uniform law to govern the shipping industry, the Supreme Court also held in Southern Pacific Company v. Jensen (1917) that Article III empowers the federal courts to develop a "general maritime law" binding even on state courts, and that Congress may supplement this law with statutes under its authority to adopt laws "necessary and proper" to the powers of the courts. Indeed the Court has held that this aspect of the judicial power, like the legislative authority conferred by the commerce clause of Article I, has an implicit limiting effect upon state law. Not only does state law that contradicts federal law yield under the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, but, as the Court said in rejecting the application of a state workers' compensation law to longshoremen in the case last cited, no state law is valid if it "interferes with the proper harmony and uniformity" of the general maritime law "in its international and interstate relations."

The remaining authorization of federal court jurisdiction protects parties whose fortunes the Framers were for various reasons unwilling to leave wholly at the mercy of state courts. Many of these categories involve government litigation: "Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party; . . . between two or more States; between a State and Citizens of another State, . . . and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects." A federal forum for the national government itself protects against possible state hostility; federal jurisdiction over interstate conflicts provides not only a neutral forum but also a safeguard against what Hamilton in THE FEDERALIST #80 called "dissentions and private wars"; that "the union will undoubtedly be answerable to foreign powers, for the conduct of its members," was an additional reason for jurisdiction over disputes involving foreign countries as well as the related jurisdiction over "Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls."

The most interesting issue concerning these provisions has been that of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY. In CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793), ignoring the assurances of prominent Framers like James Madison and Alexander Hamilton as well as the common law tradition that the king could not be sued without his consent, the Supreme Court relied largely on the text of Article III to hold that the power over "Controversies . . . between a State and Citizens of another State" included those in which the state was an unwilling defendant. Obviously, as the Justices pointed out, this was true of the parallel authority over "Controversies . . . between two or more States," and Justice JAMES WILSON added his understanding that the English tradition was a mere formality, since consent to sue was given as a matter of course.

Whether this decision was right or wrong as an original matter, within five years it was repudiated by adoption of the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT, which provides that "[t]he Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State." Notably, the amendment does not mention admiralty cases, suits by foreign countries, suits against a state by its own citizens under federal law, or suits against the United States. Nevertheless the Supreme Court, taking the amendment as casting doubt on the reasoning underlying Chisholm, has denied jurisdiction in all of these instances. The best explanation has been that, although not excepted by the amendment, they are outside the power conferred by Article III itself. One state may still sue another, however, and the United States may sue a state. The Court has found such jurisdiction "essential to the peace of the Union" and "inherent in the constitutional plan." Why this is not equally true of a suit by a state against the United States has never been satisfactorily explained.

At least since the 1824 decision in Osborn v. Bank of the United States, however, both the Eleventh Amendment and its related immunities have been construed to allow certain actions against state or federal officers even though the effect of the litigation is the same as if the government itself had been named defendant. The theoretical explanation that the officer cannot be acting for the state when he does what the Constitution forbids is inconsistent with the substantive conclusion, often reached in the same cases, that his action is attributable to the state for purposes of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. A more principled explanation is that suits against officers are necessary if the Constitution is to be enforced at all; the response is that those who wrote the amendment could not have intended to allow it to be reduced to a hollow shell.

In any event, the Osborn exception has not been held to embrace all suits against government officers. At one time it was said generally that an officer could be prevented from acting but could not be ordered to take affirmative action such as paying off a government obligation, for if he was not acting for the state he had no authority to reach into its treasury. The simplicity of this distinction was shattered, however, by opinions acknowledging the availability of a WRIT OF MANDAMUS to compel an officer to perform a nondiscretionary duty. The more recent formulation in EDELMAN V. JORDAN (1974), which essentially distinguishes between prospective and retrospective relief, seems difficult to reconcile with the language of the Constitution, with its apparent purposes, or with the fiction created to support the Osborn rule.

Even when the government is itself a party, it may consent to be sued, and the books are filled with a confusing and incomplete array of statutes allowing suits against the United States. Some judges and scholars have argued that suits against consenting states are inconsistent with the language of the amendment, which declares them outside the judicial power; the Court's persuasive explanation has been that, like venue and personal jurisdiction, immunity is a privilege waivable by the party it protects (Clark v. Barnard, 1883). More debatable was the Court's decision in Parden v. Terminal Railway (1964) that a state had "waived" its immunity by operating a railroad after passage of a federal statute making "every" interstate railway liable for injuries to its employees; in Edelman v. Jordan, retreating from this conclusion, the Court emphasized that "[c]onstructive consent is not a doctrine commonly associated with the surrender of constitutional rights." Still later, however, in FITZPATRICK V. BITZER (1976) the Court held that Congress had power to override a state's immunity in legislating to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment, although it has never suggested that that amendment allowed Congress to ignore other constitutional limitations, such as the BILL OF RIGHTS.

The two remaining categories of disputes within federal judicial power are "controversies . . . between Citizens of different States" and between state citizens and "Citizens or Subjects" of "foreign States." Once again the reasons for federal jurisdiction are generally said to be the avoidance of state-court bias and of interstate or international friction. In contrast not only to the admiralty cases but also to those between states, federal jurisdiction based solely on the diverse citizenship of the parties does not carry with it authority to make substantive law. Absent a federal statute, the Court held in ERIE RAILROAD V. TOMPKINS (1938), "the law to be applied . . . is the law of the State." Later cases such as Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills (1957) have qualified the effect though not the principle of this decision by finding in silent statutes implicit authorization to the federal courts to make law. An occasional decision has upheld FEDERAL COMMON LAW, without the pretense of statutory authority, on matters mysteriously found to be "intrinsically federal"; an example was the Court's refusal in Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino (1964) to look behind official acts of foreign governments. (See ACT OF STATE DOCTRINE.)

In early decisions the Supreme Court took a narrow view of what constituted a controversy between citizens of different states for purposes of the statute implementing this provision of Article III. More recently, however, the Court has generously interpreted the power of Congress to confer DIVERSITY JURISDICTION on the federal courts. And as early as the mid-nineteenth century, recognizing that corporations can be the beneficiaries or victims of state court prejudice without regard to the citizenship of those who compose them, the Court effectively began to treat corporations as citizens by employing the transparent fiction of conclusively presuming that the individuals whose citizenship was determinative were citizens of the state of incorporation.

The best known decision involving the diversity jurisdiction was DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), in which three Justices took the position that a black American descended from slaves could never be a state citizen for diversity purposes because he could not be a citizen of the United States. Questionable enough at the time, this conclusion was repudiated by the Fourteenth Amendment's provision that all persons born in this country are citizens of the United States "and of the state wherein they reside." Nevertheless the courts have held that only American citizens are "Citizens of . . . States" within Article III, and conversely that only foreign nationals are "Citizens or Subjects" of "foreign States."

"In all Cases involving Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a state shall be Party," Article III, section 2 provides, "the supreme Court shall have ORIGINAL JURISDICTION. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have APPELLATE JURISDICTION, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."

Original jurisdiction is the power to determine a dispute in the first instance; appellate jurisdiction, the power to review a decision already made. Marbury v. Madison (1803) held that Congress had no power to give the Supreme Court original jurisdiction of a case to which neither a diplomat nor a state was a party; a contrary result, Chief Justice Marshall argued, would make the constitutional distribution between original and appellate jurisdiction "mere surplusage." This reasoning is not especially convincing, and the converse is not true; in COHENS V. VIRGINIA in 1821 Marshall himself conceded that Congress could give the Court appellate jurisdiction over cases for which Article III provided original jurisdiction. Cohens also held that the Supreme Court had original authority not over all Article III cases in which a state happened to be a party but only over those "in which jurisdiction is given, because a state is a party," and thus not over a federal question case between a state and one of its own citizens. Inconsistently, however, the Court allowed the United States to sue a State in the Supreme Court in United States v. Texas (1892).

Marbury's implicit conclusion that the exceptions clause quoted above does not allow Congress to tamper with the original jurisdiction strongly suggests that the enumeration of original cases is a minimum as well as a maximum, and the Court has described as "extremely doubtful" the proposition that Congress may deprive it of original power over state or diplomat cases; yet the Court has concluded that it has discretion not to entertain cases within its original jurisdiction.

Unlike the original jurisdiction provision, that giving the Court appellate authority in "all the other" Article III cases contains an explicit escape valve: "with such Exceptions . . . as the Congress shall make." In THE FEDERALIST #81, Hamilton explained that this clause permitted Congress to limit review of facts decided by juries, but he did not say this was its sole objective. From the beginning Congress has denied the Court jurisdiction over entire classes of controversies within the constitutional reach of appellate power—such as federal criminal cases, most of which were excluded from appellate cognizance for many years even if constitutional issues were presented. The Court itself accepted this particular limitation as early as United States v. More (1805), without questioning its constitutionality. Moreover, when Congress repealed a statute under which a pending case attacking the Reconstruction Act had been filed, the Court in EX PARTE MCCARDLE (1869) meekly dismissed the case, observing that "the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this court is given by express words."

As the McCardle opinion noted, however, other avenues remained available for taking similar cases to the Supreme Court, and three years later the Court made clear in United States v. Klein (1872) that Congress could not under the guise of limiting jurisdiction effectively dictate the result of a case by directing dismissal if the Court should find for the plaintiff. Respected commentators have contended that the Supreme Court must retain appellate authority over certain constitutional questions, arguing that the exceptions clause cannot have been intended, in Henry Hart's words, to "destroy the essential role of the Supreme Court in the constitutional plan." The persuasiveness of this position depends on one's perceptions of the function of judicial review. (See JUDICIAL SYSTEM.)

In order for the Court in Marbury v. Madison to dismiss an action that it found Congress had authorized, it had first to conclude that it had the right to refuse to obey an unconstitutional act of Congress. Marshall's argument that this power was "essentially attached to a written constitution" is contradicted by much European experience; and his assertion that choosing between the Constitution and a statute was an inescapable aspect of deciding cases begged the question, for the Constitution might have required the courts to accept Congress's determination that a statute was valid. For the same reason one may object to his reliance on Article VI's requirement that judges swear to support the Constitution: one does not offend that oath by enforcing an unconstitutional statute if that is what the Constitution requires.

The SUPREMACY CLAUSE of Article VI is no better support; the contrasting reference to "Treaties made, or which shall be made" in the same clause strongly suggests that the phrase "laws . . . which shall be made in Pursuance of" the Constitution, also invoked by Marshall, was meant to deny supremacy to acts adopted under the Articles of Confederation, not to those that were invalid. Most promising of the provisions brought forward in Marbury was Article III's extension of judicial power to "Cases . . . arising under this Constitution"; as Marshall said, it could scarcely have been "the intention of those who gave this power, to say that in using it the constitution should not be looked into." Yet even here the case is not airtight. For while Article III provides for jurisdiction in constitutional cases, it is Article VI that prescribes the force to be given the Constitution; and while the latter article plainly gives the Constitution precedence over conflicting state laws, it appears to place federal statutes on a par with the Constitution itself.

Nevertheless the Marbury decision should be regarded as neither a surprise nor a usurpation. Though Marshall did not say so, judicial review had a substantial history before Marbury, and despite occasional scholarly denials it seems clear that most of the Framers expected that the courts would refuse to enforce unconstitutional acts of Congress. Moreover, there is force to Marshall's argument that a denial of this power would effectively undermine the express written limitations on congressional power; the natural reluctance to assume that the Framers meant to leave the fox in charge of the chickens lends credence to the conclusion that judicial review is implicit in the power to decide constitutional cases or in the substantive constitutional limitations themselves.

In fact the Marbury opinion espouses two distinct theories of judicial review that have opposite implications for a number of related issues, some of which have been discussed above. If, as Marshall at one point seemed to suggest, judicial review is only an incidental by-product of the need to resolve pending cases, it is no cause for constitutional concern if Congress eliminates the Supreme Court's jurisdiction over First Amendment cases, or if no one has standing to attack a federal spending program. If, on the other hand, as argued elsewhere in Marbury, judicial review is essential to a plan of constitutional checks and balances, one may take a more restrictive view of Congress's power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction, and perhaps a broader view of what constitutes a case or controversy as well.

Dissenting from the assertion of judicial authority over legislative reapportionment cases in BAKER V. CARR (1962), Justice Felix Frankfurter argued for a broad exception to judicial review of both federal and state actions: even unconstitutional acts could not be set aside if they presented POLITICAL QUESTIONS. Some have attempted to trace this notion to Marbury itself, where the Court did say that "[q]uestions in their nature political" were beyond judicial ken. The context suggests, however, that Marshall meant only that the Court would respect actions taken by other branches of government within their legitimate authority, and Louis Henkin has shown that most later decisions using "political question" language can be so explained.

The Court itself, however, spoke in Baker of a general "political question" doctrine preventing decision of the merits when, among other things, there was "a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving" a "political" issue. A number of lower courts relied on such a doctrine in refusing to decide the legality of the VIETNAM WAR. While the doctrine as so conceived appears at cross-purposes with the checks-and-balances aspect of Marbury, nothing in that decision bars a finding that a particular constitutional provision either gives absolute discretion to a nonjudicial branch (such as the power to recognize foreign governments) or makes an exception to Article III's grant of the judicial power itself (as, arguably, in the case of impeachment).

In most respects, then, Article III amply satisfies Marshall's conditions for a "well constructed government." Though the governmental immunities associated with the Eleventh Amendment may seem anachronistic today, unsympathetic judicial interpretation has blunted their interference with the enforcement of federal law. Decisions since the 1950s have generally rejected Justice Frankfurter's broad conception of the political question. Thus with rare exceptions the federal judiciary, as Marshall insisted, may be given authority to construe every federal law; and the extension of judicial power to controversies between citizens of different states means that the federal courts may often be given power to apply state law as well. Though increased mobility has led to serious efforts to repeal the statutory basis for the diversity jurisdiction, it served an important function in the past and conceivably may become more important in the future. Moreover, the Framers were farsighted enough to assure federal judges the independence necessary to do their appointed job. The weakest point in the system is the arguable authority of Congress to take away all or a substantial part of the Supreme Court's appellate power in constitutional cases; for such an authority undermines other elements of the system of checks and balances that the Framers so carefully constructed.

DAVID P. CURRIE
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch. Pages 111–199. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

BORCHARD, EDWIN 1928 Hearings on H.R. 5623 before the Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. 70th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 75–76.

FARRAND, MAX, ed. 1911 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787. Vol. 1, pp. 119–129. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

HART, HENRY and WECHSLER, HERBERT 1973 The Federal Courts and the Federal System. Pages 309–418, 833–1103. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1976 Is There a "Political Question" Doctrine? Yale Law Journal 85:597–625.

JUDICIAL POWER AND LEGISLATIVE REMEDIES

Article III of the Constitution states that "[t]he judicial power of the United States, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The Article itself fails to detail the nature and extent of the phrase "judicial Power." However, the Constitution, taken as a whole, is not so silent as to its meaning.

The Framers, borrowing from MONTESQUIEU the idea of SEPARATION OF POWERS, believed that each of the branches had to have a discrete role if the overall government was to avoid tyranny. Each branch was to have specific functions and tasks that would prevent the acquisition of too much power by any one branch. Montesquieu, writing in The Spirit of the Laws, stated that "there is no liberty, if the judiciary power be not separated from the legislative and executive. Were it joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control; for the judge would be then the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with violence and oppression."

The Constitution is more explicit in its explanation of legislative and executive powers. Article I, section 8, lists many of the specific powers to be exercised by Congress in carrying out its constitutional duties. Section 8 contains, among many duties, the power "to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises . . . [t]o coin Money . . . [t]o establish Post Offices . . . [t]o raise and support Armies." Likewise, the executive powers described in Article II include the power to fill vacancies and to act as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the ARMED FORCES.

Nevertheless, when one reviews the Constitution as a complete document and notes the placement of powers under specific articles, the power of the judiciary becomes something clear and distinct as well. That power is by nature a limited one. Publius wrote in THE FEDERALIST #78, "Whoever attentively considers the different departments of power must perceive, that in a government in which they are separated from each other, the judiciary, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous . . . [It] has no influence over either the sword or the purse, no direction either of the strength or of the wealth of society, and can take no active resolution whatever. It may truly be said to have neither Force nor Will, but merely judgment."

The debate concerning judicial power should not focus on JUDICIAL REVIEW. In fact, the question as to whether the Court should exercise judicial review is a moot one, at best. The writings of both The Federalist and the ANTI-FEDERALISTS assumed that the Court would rule on matters of law to determine whether statutory law complied with the standards of constitutionality.

The nature of judicial power, however, remains a subject of debate in the political arena because the Supreme Court continues to expand its role by directly implementing specific public-policy choices. In doing so, it has employed such constitutional provisions as EQUAL PROTECTION and DUE PROCESS in order to secure remedies in cases such as BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), which effectively overturned the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE of PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896). More recently, courts have begun to propose remedies that encroach on the powers specifically delegated to the legislative branch. In some cases, courts have formulated the exact legislative programs by which wrongs will be righted. Two cases from the 1989 term illustrate the difference between legitimate exercise of judicial power and encroachment on legislative prerogatives.

In Spallone v. United States (1990) the Supreme Court reversed, by a 5–4 vote, the civil CONTEMPT charges and fines imposed by a UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT on the city council members of Yonkers, New York. The city had been found in violation of Title VIII of the CIVIL RIGHT ACT OF 1968 and the equal protection clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT by "intentionally engag[ing] in a pattern and practice of housing discrimination." Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, writing the majority opinion, framed the question narrowly, asking "whether it was a proper exercise of judicial power for the District Court to hold petitioners, four Yonkers city councilmembers, in contempt for refusing to vote in favor of legislation implementing a consent decree earlier approved by the city."

The Supreme Court, concluding that the district court lacked authority to impose the contempt fines against the individual members of the city council, upheld the contempt fines levied against the city. With the question framed so narrowly, the five-Justice majority explained that "[t]he imposition of sanctions on individual legislators is designed to cause them to vote, not with a view to the interest of their constituents or of the city, but with a view solely to their own personal interest." In so doing, the district court jeopardizes the legitimate exercise of deliberation by representative institutions accountable to a legitimate constituency and removes the legislative immunity that is essential to enable elected representatives to consider the common good of the community.

Although the mounting fines against the city (nearly one million dollars a day) had forced the council to vote in favor of the housing plan, the members of the council still could have decided that it was in the best interest of the city to go bankrupt, thereby defying the court. However, when the individual members of the council were forced to vote under threat of personal financial catastrophe, they were no longer able to represent the interest of the community. This point is of great consequence. A legislative body must have a will of its own while working collectively (and even if at time in conflict) with the courts toward the implementation of the Constitution and laws passed pursuant to it.

The second recent Supreme Court case concerning the limits of judicial power is MISSOURI V. JENKINS (1990). In this case, a unanimous Court agreed that a federal district court had exceeded its authority when, in fashioning a remedy for school desegregation, it ordered an increase in a school district's property tax levy, even though the increase exceeded the limits imposed by state law. The majority opinion by Justice BYRON R. WHITE, however, raises a serious question as to the limits of judicial authority. Justice White "agree[d] with the State that the tax increase contravened the principles of comity." But he went on to suggest that the district court, under the SUPREMACY CLAUSE of the Constitution, could order the school district to levy taxes at the rate needed to pay for the desegregation remedy.

In a CONCURRING OPINION by Justice ANTHONY M. KEN-

NEDY, a four-Justice minority argued that the majority opinion's OBITER DICTUM had endorsed "an expansion of power in the federal judiciary beyond all precedent." The minority argued that "while courts have undoubted power to order that schools operate in compliance with the Constitution, the manner and methods of school financing are beyond federal judicial authority." It was apparent from the majority's decision that there was a "fear that failure to endorse judicial taxation power might in some extreme circumstance leave a court unable to remedy a constitutional violation." But, as the minority noted, "this possibility is nothing more or less than the necessary consequence of any limit on judicial power."

Spallone and Jenkins are merely the most recent examples in a long history of judicial attempts to impose remedies on legislative bodies. With the growing reluctance of representatives to raise taxes and to fashion rules and laws to meet the costs of constitutional obligations determined by the courts, the conflict between the branches is sure to continue.

Thus, the basic question concerning the nature and extent of judicial power returns to the focus. Judicial power obviously is not the same as the power of the legislative or executive branches. The courts have the power to order officials to comply with the Constitution's demands; however, the extent of this judicial power is limited in scope. An extraordinary situation may arise in which a court is unable to enforce a judicial remedy—in effect lowering the status of the court, but granting courts unlimited remedial power derogates from the principle of representative government.

JEFFREY D. SCHULTZ
(1992)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1978 The Supreme Court and the Idea of Progress. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

CAREY, GEORGE W. 1989 The Federalist: Design for a Constitutional Republic. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

COX, ARCHIBALD 1987 The Court and the Constitution. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

WOLFE, CHRISTOPHER 1985 Three Contemporary Theories of Judicial Review. The Political Science Reviewer 15:215–260.

JUDICIAL RESTRAINT

See: Judicial Activism and Judicial Restraint

JUDICIAL REVIEW

Judicial review, in its most widely accepted meaning, is the power of courts to consider the constitutionality of acts of other organs of government when the issue of constitutionality is germane to the disposition of lawsuits properly pending before the courts. This power to consider constitutionality in appropriate cases includes the courts' authority to refuse to enforce, and in effect invalidate, governmental acts they find to be unconstitutional.

Judicial review is America's most distinctive contribution to CONSTITUTIONALISM. Although courts have exercised judicial review almost from the beginning of American constitutional government, the question of the legitimacy of that JUDICIAL POWER has often provoked controversy as well as recurrent charges that American judges usurped the authority. Nearly two centuries of exercises of and popular acquiescence in the power have quieted the storms over its basic justifiability in recent decades, but vehement controversy continues regarding the proper scope and authority of judicial rulings on constitutionality. Moreover, particular exercises of judicial review continue to stir passionate political debates, as they have from the beginning.

The classic justification for judicial review was set forth by Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803). Marshall relied on general principles and constitutional text. His arguments from principle are not compelling. For example, his unchallengeable assertion that the Constitution was designed to establish a limited government does not demonstrate that courts should enforce those limitations. Constitutions prescribing limits on government had been adopted before 1803, as many have been since; but relatively few look to the judiciary for enforcement. Similarly, the fact that judges take an oath to support the Constitution does not imply judicial review, for the Constitution requires the oath of all federal and state officers. Far more persuasive are Marshall's references to two passages of the constitutional text. First, Article III lists cases "arising under the Constitution" as one of the subjects included within the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES, suggesting that constitutional questions can give rise to judicial rulings. Second, the SUPREMACY CLAUSE of Article VI lists the Constitution first as among the legal sources that "shall be the supreme Law of the Land."

Although the inferences derivable from the constitutional text are not unchallengeable, they provide the strongest available support for Marshall's justification for judicial review. True, Article VI is specifically addressed only to state judges, for the "supreme Law of the Land" clause is followed by the statement that "Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding." Still, the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION debates and federal LEGISLATION, ever since Section 25 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, have contemplated Supreme Court review of state court rulings on constitutional questions, and it is surely plausible to argue that the Supreme Court's authority on review would be no less than that of state judges obeying the command of the supremacy clause.

Federal court review of state court judgments is an especially plausible aspect of judicial review, for it is a typical policing technique to maintain the delineations of governing authority in federal systems. That strand of judicial review is common in other federal schemes as well, as in Switzerland and Australia. Yet even federal systems are conceivable without judicial review. Thus, nationalists at the Constitutional Convention initially urged reliance on the congressional veto and on military force to curb excesses by the states. The supremacy clause, and its reliance on routine judicial power to enforce federalistic restraints, stemmed from suggestions by states' rights forces at the convention.

Judicial review in the interest of FEDERALISM has played an important role in the United States; some observers, indeed, view it as the most essential function of judicial review. As Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES once put it: "I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an Act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that declaration as to the laws of the several States." The supremacy clause goes a long way toward assuring this protection of the Union; but it provides less compelling justification for judicial review of congressional acts.

The constitutional text cited by John Marshall supports judicial review in all its aspects in a more basic sense. Article III and Article VI both reflect the premise central to judicial review—the premise that the Constitution is to be considered a species of law and accordingly cognizable in courts of law. Judicial review is essentially the judicial enforceability of constitutional norms, and viewing the Constitution as law rather than mere policy or precatory adjuration is the keystone of the more persuasive argument that the American constitutional scheme was designed to rely on judges, not merely troops or political restraints, to enforce constitutional limits.

This view of the Constitution as law—the view central to the argument for giving courts a major role in constitutional enforcement—made it relevant for Marshall to state that it was "emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is," and to describe judicial review as an outgrowth of the normal task of judges: to adjudicate the cases before them on the basis of all relevant rules of law, rules that include those stemming from the Constitution. And that in turn made it plausible for him to say that, where a statute and the Constitution conflict, the courts must enforce the superior Constitution and "disregard" the statute. That, to Marshall, was "of the very essence of judicial duty."

Even if Marshall's views of the Constitution as law and of the "judicial duty" were unanswerable, charges of usurpation would not be stilled. Whatever the strength of the inferences from Articles III and VI, it is undeniable that the power of judicial review is not explicitly granted by the Constitution—in contrast to the constitutions of the nations that, in modern times, have embraced systems similar to the American scheme of judicial review, such as West Germany, Italy, India, and Japan. Defenders of judicial review have accordingly sought to find added support for Marshall's conclusion in historical understandings and practices. None of the sources relied on, however, conveys overwhelming force.

For example, it is true that Marshall's argument was to a considerable extent anticipated by ALEXANDER HAMILTON in THE FEDERALIST #78; but Hamilton's essay was after all only a propagandistic defense of the Constitution during the ratification debates. Similarly, the arguments from historical practice are inconclusive at best. The much invoked statement by EDWARD COKE in BONHAM'S CASE (1610)—that "the COMMON LAW will controul Acts of Parliament, [and] adjudge them to be utterly void" when they are "against common right and reason"—was inconsistent with British practice at the time and thus is not even respectable OBITER DICTUM. More relevant was the APPELLATE JURISDICTION of the PRIVY COUNCIL over colonial courts; but invalidation of legislation through that route was rare and unpopular. And the much debated alleged PRECEDENTS in the practice of state courts during the years immediately following independence hardly establish a well-entrenched practice of judicial review in the era of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. The preconstitutional examples that withstand scrutiny are few and controversial, and in any event it is not clear that many delegates at the Constitutional Convention knew about the scattered actual or alleged instances of invalidation of state laws by state judges.

Nor do the statements in the Constitutional Convention and the state ratification debates provide ironclad proof that judicial review was intended by the Framers. While it is true that most of the statements addressing the issue supported such a judicial power, it is equally true that only a minority of speakers at the Constitution framing and ratifying conventions expressed their views. The most important statements at the Constitutional Convention came during the discussion of the council of revision proposal—a proposal that the Justices join with the President in exercising the VETO POWER. That proposal was rejected, partly on grounds supporting the legitimacy of judicial review. Thus, LUTHER MARTIN, in criticizing "the association of the Judges with the Executive" as a "dangerous innovation," argued that, "as to the Constitutionality of laws, that point will come before the Judges in their proper official character. In this character they have a negative on the laws. Join them with the Executive in the Revision and they will have a double negative."

Some scholars have argued, questionably, that judicial review was so normal a judicial function that it was taken for granted by the Framers. HENRY M. HART and Herbert Wechsler claimed to find clear support in the Convention debates: "The grant of judicial power was to include the power, where necessary in the decision of cases, to disregard state or federal statutes found to be unconstitutional. Despite the curiously persisting myth of usurpation, the Convention's understanding on this point emerges from its records with singular clarity." But with regard to original intent, EDWARD S. CORWIN's Senate testimony on the 1937 Court-packing plan still represents a fair summary of the state of the record. Corwin stated that the "people who say the framers intended [judicial review] are talking nonsense," but he added that "people who say they did not intend it are talking nonsense." As Leonard W. Levy commented after noting Corwin's assessment that there is "great uncertainty" on the issue: "A close textual and contextual examination of the evidence will not result in an improvement on these propositions."

Most important in the search for preconstitutional bases for judicial review authority is probably the late-eighteenth-century prevalence of general ideas conducive to the acceptance of the power asserted in Marbury v. Madison. The belief in written CONSTITUTIONS to assure LIMITED GOVERNMENT was hardly an American invention, but Americans had an unusually extensive experience with basic, HIGHER LAW documents of government, from royal charters to state constitutions and the Articles of Confederation. Yet it is possible to have constitutions without judicial review: to say that a government cannot exceed constitutional limits does not demonstrate who is to decide. It bears reiterating, then, that viewing a constitution as a species of "law" was the vital link between constitutionalism and judicial competence to decide constitutional issues. Moreover, the view that the Constitution was an act of the people rather than of the state governments helped provide an ideology congenial to Marshall's insistence that the courts could, in the name of the people, refuse to enforce the acts of the people's representatives.

Accepting the persuasiveness of Marshall's core argument is not tantamount to endorsing all of the alleged implications of judicial review that are pervasive in the late twentieth century. Marshall's stated view of the role of courts in constitutional cases was a relatively modest one; after nearly two centuries of exercise of judicial review by courts, and especially the Supreme Court, the scope and binding effect of judicial rulings are far broader. Most of Marshall's argument was largely defensive, designed to undergird judicial competence and authority to adjudicate issues of constitutionality. He insisted that the Constitution is "a rule for the government of courts as well as the legislature" and concluded that "courts, as well as other departments, are bound by that instrument." Modern perceptions, by contrast, often view the courts as playing a superior or supreme role in CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. Claims of JUDICIAL SUPREMACY and sometimes even exclusiveness are widespread in scholarly statements and popular understandings. The extent to which such impressions are justifiable continues to give rise to sharp controversy.

Marshall's claims about judicial competence and authority were closely tied to a tripartite theory of government reflecting the SEPARATION OF POWERS. He did not deny that other branches, including the President in the exercise of the veto power and Congress in enacting legislation, could and—under the oath to support the Constitution emphasized in Marbury itself—presumably must consider issues of constitutionality. Marshall's argument that courts also have competence to take the Constitution into account in their work was essentially a "me too" position. Modern variants on justifications for judicial review—and a number of statements from the modern Supreme Court itself—lend stronger support than anything in Marshall's reasoning to a "me superior" or even a "me only" view.

Nearly from the beginning, Presidents have taken issue with Supreme Court rulings. THOMAS JEFFERSON insisted that "nothing in the Constitution has given [the judges] a right to decide for the Executive, more than to the Executive to decide for them." And he argued that considering "the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions" was "a very dangerous doctrine indeed, and one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy." Similarly, ANDREW JACKSON insisted, in vetoing the bill to recharter the Bank of the United States in 1832, that MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) did not preclude his action: "Mere precedent is a dangerous source of authority, and should not be regarded as deciding questions of constitutional power except where the acquiescence of the people and the States can be considered as well settled." Similar statements are found in the utterances of later Presidents, from Abraham Lincoln to FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT and beyond.

John Marshall was no doubt unhappy with the political statements of Jeffersonians and Jacksonians. Clearly, he would have preferred ready acceptance of his Court's glosses on the Constitution by all governmental officials and the entire nation. But nothing in the stances of the leaders of his day or since was in sharp conflict with anything in Marbury v. Madison. Jefferson, Jackson, and their successors did not deny the binding effect of the judges' constitutional rulings in the cases before them. But the Presidents insisted on their right to disagree with the principles underlying the Court decision. As Lincoln said in the course of his debates with STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, he did not propose that after Dred Scott had been held to be a slave by the Court—in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857)—"we, as a mob, will decide him to be free." But, he added, "we nevertheless do oppose that decision as a political rule which shall be binding on the voter, to vote for nobody who thinks it wrong, which shall be binding on the members of Congress or the President to favor no measure that does not actually concur with the principles of that decision. [We] propose so resisting it as to have it reversed if we can, and a new judicial rule established upon this subject."

Does it follow that, if such presidential statements are consistent with Marbury v. Madison, the scheme sketched by Marshall in 1803 contemplated never-ending chaos—a state of chaos in which the political branches of the national government, and the states as well, might forever disagree with the principles of Supreme Court decisions, in which the only way to implement the Court's principles would be to bring the resisting parties to court in multiple lawsuits, in which no constitutional question would ever be settled? Not necessarily, and certainly not in American experience. Judicial review has not meant that the Supreme Court's reasoning ends all constitutional debate, but neither has it meant endless litigation and dispute over every constitutional issue. Yet the reasons for the growing role of the Supreme Court in settling constitutional issues rest less on any legal principle underlying judicial review than on considerations stemming from institutional arrangements and from prudence. The only arguable basis in Marbury itself for viewing the courts as the ultimate arbiters of constitutional issues is Marshall's ambiguous statement that it is "emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." That statement establishes judicial competence, as noted; but its ambiguity also may provide the basis for arguments for a special judicial expertise in constitutional matters and for a de facto judicial supremacy. Marshall's statement is not so strong, however, as a similar one from Hamilton, in The Federalist #78: "The interpretation of laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts."

The widely observable phenomenon that a Court interpretation of the Constitution has significance beyond the parties to a particular lawsuit rests on other, stronger bases. A central one is that, to the extent a disputed constitutional issue arises in a lawsuit, and to the extent that the Supreme Court is the highest court in the judicial hierarchy, a Supreme Court interpretation is final. Technically, it is final only with respect to the parties in the case, to be sure; but the Court gives general reasons in resolving specific controversies, and the Justices normally operate under a system of PRECEDENT and STARE DECISIS. Similarly situated parties not before the Court in the particular case ordinarily recognize that, other things being equal, the Court will adhere to precedent, will apply the same rule to them if litigation ensues, and accordingly choose not to engage in needless litigation.

Basically, then, the reason that the courts generally and the Supreme Court in particular wield such vast influence in Americans' understanding of their Constitution is that most constitutional issues can and do arise in lawsuits; and once they do, the courts, with the Supreme Court at the apex, do have the final say. As a result, most potential opponents of Court rulings follow the course implied in Lincoln's First Inaugural Address. Lincoln did not deny that Supreme Court decisions "must be binding in any case upon the parties to a suit as to the object of that suit" and "are also entitled to very high respect and consideration in all parallel cases by all other departments of the Government." He added: "And while it is obviously possible that such decision may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it, being limited to that particular case, with a chance that it may be overruled or never become a precedent for other cases, can better be borne than could the evil of a different practice." From that position, Herbert Wechsler's rhetorical question plausibly follows: When the chance that a judicial ruling "may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases . . . has been exploited and has run its course, with reaffirmation rather than REVERSAL of decision, has not the time arrived when its acceptance is demanded, without insisting on repeated litigation? The answer here, it seems to me, must be affirmative, both as to a necessary implication of our constitutional tradition and to avoid the greater evils that will otherwise ensue." Wechsler's admonition, it should be noted, is one of prudence, not of any necessary legal mandate stemming from the Marbury rationale.

Beginning in the late twentieth century, however, the Supreme Court has repeatedly claimed a greater import for its exercises of judicial review than anything clearly set forth in Marbury. A major example came in one of the cases stemming from the school DESEGREGATION controversy, COOPER V. AARON (1958). The opinion in that case, signed by each of the Justices, provides the strongest judicial support for a view widely held by the public—that the Court is the ultimate, the supreme interpreter of the Constitution. Rejecting the premise of the actions of the legislature and of the governor of Arkansas in that case—that they were not bound by the ruling in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954)—the Court purported to "recall some basic constitutional propositions which are settled doctrine." The Justices quoted Article VI and Marshall's "province and duty of the judicial department" passage in

Marbury and added: "This decision declared the basic principle that the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution. [It] follows that the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment enunciated by this Court in the Brown case is the supreme law of the land, and Article VI of the Constitution makes it of binding effect on the States. [Every] state legislator and executive and judicial officer is solemnly committed by oath taken pursuant to Article VI, 3, "to support this Constitution."

Similar statements have surfaced in other controversial cases in recent years, especially in BAKER V. CARR (1962) (referring to the "responsibility of this Court as ultimate interpreter of the Constitution") and POWELL V. MCCORMACK (1969) ("[It] is the responsibility of this Court to act as the ultimate interpreter of the Constitution. Marbury v. Madison."). The Court in these cases was no doubt marshaling all possible rhetorical force in efforts to ward off actual or potential resistance from the states or from other branches of the federal government; but these broad modern assertions no doubt also reflect widespread popular understandings of the "ultimate" role of the Court, understandings bolstered by the nation's general acceptance of that role, despite frequent and continuing disagreements with particular decisions.

From the relatively modest assertions of the judicial review power in Marbury v. Madison, nearly two centuries of history have brought the Court increasingly close to the self-announced dominant role in constitutional interpretation it set forth in Cooper v. Aaron. That does not mean that Supreme Court interpretations are entitled to immunity from criticism, popular or academic. Nor does it signify the end of all political restraints on the Court, restraints stemming from the same Constitution that Marshall relied on in defending judicial review. Judges may be subjected to congressional IMPEACHMENT and Congress may arguably curtail the federal courts' JURISDICTION in constitutional cases. (See JUDICIAL SYSTEM.) But both weapons, though frequently brandished, have rarely been used. Moreover, the constitutional AMENDING PROCESS, albeit difficult to invoke, is available to overturn unpopular Court rulings. More significant, the composition of the Court as well as its size rest with the political branches, and the President's nominating role, together with the Senate's in confirmation, have been major safeguards against judges deviating too far from the national consensus. Despite these potential and actual checks, however, the Supreme Court's role in American government has outgrown both the view that it is the weakest branch and Marshall's own delineation of the judicial review power. What ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE recognized over a century and a half ago has become ever more true since he wrote: "Scarcely any question arises in the United States which does not become, sooner or later, a subject of judicial debate."

Even though historical exercises of judicial review and popular acquiescence have largely stilled the outcries that the federal courts usurped the power to consider the constitutionality of legislation, the core arguments on behalf of the legitimacy of judicial review, summarized by Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, continue to generate controversial implications. Two especially important and recurrent modern debates involve arguments reaching back all the way to Marbury. The first issue is whether courts should strain to avoid decisions on controversial constitutional issues by invoking such devices as the POLITICAL QUESTION doctrine. The second issue concerns the proper sources of constitutional adjudication: Must courts limit themselves to "interpretation" of the Constitution, or are "noninterpretive" decisions also legitimate?

Courts confident about the legitimacy of judicial review may tend to exercise that power assertively; judges in doubt about the underpinnings of that authority may shrink from exercising the power to invalidate legislative acts and may indeed seek to escape altogether from rulings on the merits in constitutional cases. The connection between views of legitimacy and modern exercises (or nonexercises) of judicial review is illustrated by an exchange between LEARNED HAND and Herbert Wechsler. Hand insisted that there was "nothing in the United States Constitution that gave courts any authority to review the decisions of Congress" and that the text "gave no ground for inferring that the decisions of the Supreme Court [were] to be authoritative upon the Executive and the Legislature." He found the sole justification for judicial review in the practical need "to prevent the defeat of the venture at hand"—to keep constitutional government from foundering. Wechsler retorted: "I believe the power of the courts is grounded in the language of the Constitution and is not a mere interpolation."

These contending positions have contrasting implications. Thus, Hand concluded that "since this power is not a logical deduction from the structure of the Constitution but only a practical condition upon its successful operation, it need not be exercised whenever a court sees, or thinks it sees, an invasion of the Constitution. It is always a preliminary question how importunately the occasion demands an answer." Wechsler countered that there was no such broad discretion to decline constitutional adjudication in a case properly before a court: "For me, as for anyone who finds the judicial power anchored in the Constitution, there is no such escape from the judicial obligation; the duty cannot be attenuated in this way." (That "duty," he cautioned, was "not that of policing or advising legislatures or executives," but rather simply "to decide the litigated case [in] accordance with the law.")

It is true that courts do often abstain from deciding constitutional questions pressed upon them. There is no question about the legitimacy of that phenomenon to the extent that courts rely on nonconstitutional, narrower grounds of decision in disposing of a case. Nor is there any doubt that courts need not—and under the Marbury rationale may not—decide constitutional issues if they are not properly presented in a case because, for example, the litigation does not square with the CASE AND CONTROVERSY requirement of Article III. But twentieth-century courts have occasionally gone beyond such justifiable ABSTENTIONS to claim a more general and more questionable authority to resort to considerations of prudence in refusing to issue rulings on the merits even though a case falls within the contours of Article III and even though congressional statutes appear to confer obligatory jurisdiction on the courts.

Some commentators have defended judicial resort to the "passive virtues"; others have attacked such refusals to adjudicate as often unprincipled and illegitimate. The controversy about the political question doctrine is illustrative. To the extent that the doctrine rests on constitutional interpretation, as it does under its strand regarding what the Court in Baker v. Carr (1962) called "a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department," it is undoubtedly legitimate. But the courts have often gone beyond that concern to refuse adjudication on the ground of a lack of judicially "manageable standards" and on the basis of even broader, wholly prudential considerations as well. Wechsler argued that, in political question cases, "the only proper judgment that may lead to an abstention from decision is that the Constitution has committed the determination of the issues to another agency of government than the courts. [What] is involved is in itself an act of constitutional interpretation, to be made and judged by standards that should govern the interpretive process generally. That, I submit, is toto caelo [by all heaven] different from a broad discretion to abstain or intervene." ALEXANDER M. BICKEL strongly disagreed, insisting that "only by means of a play on words can the broad discretion that the courts have in fact exercised be turned into an act of constitutional interpretation." He saw the political question doctrine as something different from the interpretive process—"something greatly more flexible, something of prudence, not construction and not principle."

To the extent that the Supreme Court rests largely on discretionary, prudential concerns in refusing to adjudicate—as, for example, it appears to have done in holding federalistic restraints on congressional power largely nonjusticiable in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985)—it raises questions of legitimacy under Marbury v. Madison. Courts deriving their authority from a premise that the Constitution is law, as the Marbury argument does, are not authorized to resort to discretionary abstention devices not justified by law. As Marshall himself pointed out in COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821): "We have no more right to decline the exercise of jurisdiction which is given, than to usurp that which is not given." But discretionary devices of self-limitation have become commonplace in judicial behavior, as a result of glosses articulated by modern judges rather than because of anything in the Constitution itself or in Marshall's reasoning. (See COMITY.)

There is a second modern issue, especially pervasive and controversial, in which the rationale of Marbury v. Madison affects debates about judicial review: Are the courts bound to limit themselves to "interpretations" of the Constitution in exercising judicial review? Marshall's reasoning in Marbury suggests that "noninterpretive" rulings are illegitimate. A justification that derives judicial review from the existence of a written constitution and from the premise that the Constitution is a species of law implies that the courts are confined by the Constitution in delineating constitutional norms. And courts indeed almost invariably purport to rest their constitutional rulings on "interpretations" of the basic document.

But modern academic commentary is sharply divided on this issue. Most scholars who insist on "interpretation" as the sole legitimate ingredient of constitutional rulings do not argue for a narrow, strict interpretation based solely on a literal reading of the constitutional text or a specific basis in the Framers' intent. But their "broad interpretivist" position does insist that constitutional rulings must rest on a clear nexus to—and plausible inference from—the Constitution's text, history, or structure. The "noninterpretivist" critics of that position emphasize the many opaque and open-ended phrases in the Constitution and the changing interpretations of these phrases over the years. They claim that the Court's behavior cannot be squared with even a broad interpretivist position and argue that the Court has always relied on extraconstitutional norms. These critics insist that "noninterpretivist" decision making is justified not only by the history of the Court's elaborations of such vague yet pervasive concepts as SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS but also by the appropriate role of courts in American constitutional democracy. The noninterpretivist literature accordingly abounds with suggestions of sources courts might rely on in the search for fundamental, judicially enforceable values—sources that range from moral philosophy to contemporary political consensus and analogies to literary and scriptural analyses.

The interpretivist arguments that draw in part on Marshall's justification for judicial review have difficulty explaining the Court's performance in "reinterpreting" the Constitution in light of changing societal contexts. The noninterpretivist position has difficulty squaring its arguments with the Marbury view of the Constitution as a species of law. That position has difficulty as well in articulating limits on the legitimate ingredients of constitutional decision making that safeguard adequately against excessive judicial subjectivism—against the specter reflected in Learned Hand's fear of being "ruled by a bevy of Platonic Guardians." Whether constitutional decision making by judges can continue to contribute to the flexibility and durability of the Constitution without deteriorating into merely politicized and personalized rulings that risk subverting the legitimacy of constitutional government is the central and unresolved challenge confronting modern judicial review.

GERALD GUNTHER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Interpretivism; Noninterpretivism.)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

ELY, JOHN H. 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

GREY, THOMAS 1975 Do We Have an Unwritten Constitution? Stanford Law Review 27:703–718.

GUNTHER, GERALD 1964 The Subtle Vices of the "Passive Virtues": A Comment on Principle and Expediency in Judicial Review. Columbia Law Review 64:1–25.

HAND, LEARNED 1958 The Bill of Rights. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

HART, HENRY M., JR. and WECHSLER, HERBERT 1973 Pages 1–241 in Paul Bator, Paul Mishkin, David Shapiro, and Herbert Wechsler, eds., The Federal Courts and the Federal System, 2nd ed. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1967 Judicial Review, History, and Democracy: An Introduction. Pages 1–42 in Leonard W. Levy, ed., Judicial Review and the Supreme Court: Selected Essays. New York: Harper & Row.

MCCLOSKEY, ROBERT G. 1960 The American Supreme Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MCLAUGHLIN, ANDREW C. 1935 A Constitutional History of the United States. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts.

PERRY, MICHAEL J. 1982 The Constitution, the Courts, and Human Rights: An Inquiry into the Legitimacy of Constitutional Policymaking by the Judiciary. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1961 Principles, Politics, and Fundamental Law. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1965 The Courts and the Constitution. Columbia Law Review 65:1001–1014.

JUDICIAL REVIEW AND DEMOCRACY

The American ideal of democracy lives in constant tension with the American ideal of JUDICIAL REVIEW in the service of individual liberties. It is a tension that sometimes erupts in crisis. THOMAS JEFFERSON planned a campaign of IMPEACHMENTS to rid the bench, and particularly the Supreme Court, of Federalist judges. The campaign collapsed when the impeachment of Associate Justice SAMUEL CHASE failed in the Senate. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, frustrated by a Court majority that repeatedly struck down New Deal economic measures, tried to "pack" the Court with additional Justices. That effort was defeated in Congress, though the attempt may have persuaded some Justices to alter their behavior. In recent years there have been movements in Congress to deprive federal courts of JURISDICTION over cases involving such matters as abortion, SCHOOL BUSING, and school prayer (see RELIGION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS)—topics on which the Court's decisions have angered strong and articulate constituencies.

The problem is the resolution of what Robert Dahl called the Madisonian dilemma. The United States was founded as a Madisonian system, one that allows majorities to govern wide and important areas of life simply because they are majorities, but that also holds that individuals have some freedoms that must be exempt from majority control. The dilemma is that neither the majority nor the minority can be trusted to define the proper spheres of democratic authority and individual liberty.

It is not at all clear that the Founders envisaged a leading role for the judiciary in the resolution of this dilemma, for they thought of the third branch as relatively insignificant. Over time, however, Americans have come to assume that the definition of majority power and minority freedom is primarily the function of the judiciary, most particularly the function of the Supreme Court. This assumption places a great responsibility upon constitutional theory. America's basic method of policymaking is majoritarian. Thus, to justify exercise of a power to set at naught the considered decisions of elected representatives, judges must achieve, in ALEXANDER BICKEL's phrase, "a rigorous general accord between JUDICIAL SUPREMACY and democratic theory, so that the boundaries of the one could be described with some precision in terms of the other." At one time, an accord was based on the understanding that judges followed the intentions of the Framers and ratifiers of the Constitution, a legal document enacted by majorities, though subject to alteration only by supermajorities. A conflict between democracy and judicial review did not arise because the respective areas of each were specified and intended to be inviolate. Though this obedience to original intent was occasionally more pretense than reality, the accord was achieved in theory, and that theory stated an ideal to which courts were expected to conform. That is no longer so. Many judges and scholars now believe that the courts' obligations to intent are so highly generalized and remote that judges are in fact free to create the Constitution they think appropriate to today's society. The result is that the accord no longer stands even theoretically. The increasing perception that this is so raises the question of what elected officials can do to reclaim authority they regard as wrongfully taken by the judiciary.

There appear to be two possible responses to a judiciary that has overstepped the limits of its legitimate authority. One is political, the other intellectual. It seems tolerably clear that political responses are of limited usefulness, at least in the short run. Impeachment and COURT-PACKING, having failed in the past, are unlikely to be resorted to again. Amending the Constitution to correct judicial overreaching is such a difficult and laborious process (requiring either two-thirds of both houses of Congress or an application for a convention by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, followed, in either case, by ratification by three-fourths of the states) that it is of little practical assistance. It is sometimes proposed that Congress deal with the problem by removing federal court jurisdiction, using the exceptions clause of Article III of the Constitution in the case of the Supreme Court. The constitutionality of this approach has been much debated, but, in any case, it will often prove not feasible. Removal of all federal court jurisdiction would not return final power either to Congress or to state legislatures but to fifty state court systems. Thus, as a practical matter, this device could not be used as to any subject where national uniformity of constitutional law is necessary or highly desirable. Moreover, jurisdiction removal does not vindicate democratic governance, for it merely shifts ultimate power to different groups of judges. Democratic responses to judicial excesses probably must come through the replacement of judges who die or retire with new judges of different views. But this is a slow and uncertain process, the accidents of mortality being what they are and prediction of what new judges will do being so perilous.

The fact is that there exist few, if any, usable and effective techniques by which federal courts can be kept within constitutional bounds. A Constitution that provides numerous CHECKS AND BALANCES between President and Congress provides little to curb a judiciary that expands its powers beyond the allowable meaning of the Constitution. Perhaps one reason is that the Framers, though many of them foresaw that the Supreme Court would review laws for constitutionality, had little experience with such a function. They did not remotely foresee what the power of judicial review was capable of becoming. Nor is it clear that an institutional check—such as Senator ROBERT LA FOLLETTE's proposal to amend the Constitution so that Congress could override a Supreme Court decision by a two-thirds majority—would be desirable. Congress is less likely than the Court to be versed in the Constitution. La Follette's proposal could conceivably wreak as much or more damage to the Court's legitimate powers as it might accomplish in restraining its excesses. That must be reckoned at least a possibility with any of the institutional checks just discussed and is probably one of the reasons that they have rarely been used. In this sense, the Court's vulnerability is one of its most important protections.

If a political check on federal courts is unlikely to succeed, the only rein left is intellectual, the widespread acceptance of a theory of judicial review. After almost two centuries of constitutional adjudication, we appear to be further than ever from the possession of an adequate theory.

In the beginning, there was no controversy over theory. JOSEPH STORY, who was both an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court and the Dane Professor of Law at Harvard, could write in his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, published in 1833, that "I have not the ambition to be the author of any new plan of interpreting the theory of the Constitution, or of enlarging or narrowing its powers by ingenious subtleties and learned doubts." He thought that the job of constitutional judges was to interpret: "The first and fundamental rule in the interpretation of all instruments is, to construe them according to the sense of the terms and the intention of the parties."

The performance of the courts has not always conformed to this interpretivist ideal. In the last decade or so of the nineteenth century and the first third of the twentieth the Supreme Court assiduously protected economic liberties from federal and state regulation, often in ways that could not be reconciled with the Constitution. The case that stands as the symbol of that era of judicial adventurism is LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), which struck down the state's law regulating maximum hours for bakers. That era ended when Franklin D. Roosevelt's appointments remade the Court, and Lochner is now generally regarded as discredited.

But, if the Court stopped defending economic liberties without constitutional justification in the mid-1930s, it began in the mid-1950s to make other decisions for which it offered little or no constitutional argument. It had been generally assumed that constitutional questions were to be answered on grounds of historical intent, but the Court began to make decisions that could hardly be, and were not, justified on that basis. Existing constitutional protections were expanded and new ones created. Sizable minorities on the Court indicated a willingness to go still further. The widespread perception that the judiciary was recreating the Constitution brought the tension between democracy and judicial review once more to a state of intellectual and political crisis.

Much of the new judicial power claimed cannot be derived from the text, structure, or history of the Constitution. Perhaps because of the increasing obviousness of this fact, legal scholars began to erect new theories of the judicial role. These constructs, which appear to be accepted by a majority of those who write about constitutional theory, go by the general name of noninterpretivism. They hold that mere interpretation of the Constitution may be impossible and is certainly inadequate. Judges are assigned not the task of defining the meanings and contours of values found in the historical Constitution but rather the function of creating new values and hence new rights for individuals against majorities. These new values are variously described as arising from "the evolving morality of our tradition," our "conventional morality" as discerned by "the method of philosophy," a "fusion of constitutional law and moral theory," or a HIGHER LAW of "unwritten NATURAL RIGHTS." One author has argued that, since "no defensible criteria" exist "to assess theories of judicial review," the judge should enforce his conception of the good. In all cases, these theories purport to empower judges to override majority will for extraconstitutional reasons.

Judges have articulated theories of their role no less removed from interpretation than those of the noninterpretivist academics. Writing for the Court in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS created a constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY that invalidated the state's law against the use of contraceptives. He observed that many provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS could be viewed as protections of aspects of personal privacy. These provisions were said to add up to a zone of constitutionally secured privacy that did not fall within any particular provision. The scope of this new right was not defined, but the Court has used the concept in a series of cases since, the most controversial being ROE V. WADE (1973). (See JUDICIAL ACTIVISM AND SELF RESTRAINT.)

A similar strategy for the creation of new rights was outlined by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN in a 1985 address. He characterized the Constitution as being pervasively concerned with human dignity. From this, Justice Brennan drew a more general judicial function of enhancing human dignity, one not confined by the clauses in question and, indeed, capable of nullifying what those clauses reveal of the Framers' intentions. Thus, the address states that continued judicial tolerance of CAPITAL PUNISHMENT causes us to "fall short of the constitutional vision of human dignity." For that reason, Justice Brennan continues to vote that capital punishment violates the Constitution. The potency of this method of generalizing from particular clauses, and then applying the generalization instead of the clauses, may be seen in the fact that it leads to a declaration of the unconstitutionality of a punishment explicitly assumed to be available three times in the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution and once again, some seventy-seven years later, in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. By conventional methods of interpretation, it would be impossible to use the Constitution to prohibits that which the Constitution explicitly assumes to be lawful.

Because noninterpretive philosophies have little hard intellectual structure, it is impossible to control them or to predict from any inner logic or principle what they may require. Though it is regularly denied that a return to the judicial function as exemplified in Lochner v. New York is underway or, which comes to the same thing, that decisions are rooted only in the judges' moral predilections, it is difficult to see what else can be involved once the function of searching for the Framers' intent is abandoned. When constitutional adjudication proceeds in a noninterpretive manner, the Court necessarily imposes new values upon the society. They are new in the sense that they cannot be derived by interpretation of the historical Constitution. Moreover, they must rest upon the moral predilections of the judge because the values come out of the moral view that most of us, by definition (since we voted democratically for a different result), do not accept.

This mode of adjudication makes impossible any general accord between judicial supremacy and democratic theory. Instead, it brings the two into head-on conflict. The Constitution specifies certain liberties and allocates all else to democratic processes. Noninterpretivism gives the judge power to invade the province of democracy whenever majority morality conflicts with his own. That is impossible to square either with democratic theory or the concept of law. Attempts have, nonetheless, been made to reconcile, or at least to mitigate, the contradiction. One line of argument is that any society requires a mixture of principle and expediency, that courts are better than legislatures at discerning and formulating principle, and hence may intervene when principle has been inadequately served by the legislative process. Even if one assumes that courts have superior institutional capacities in this respect, which is by no means clear, the conclusion does not follow. By placing certain subjects in the legislative arena, the Constitution holds that the tradeoff between principle and expediency we are entitled to is what the legislature provides. Courts have no mandate to impose a different result merely because they would arrive at a tradeoff that weighed principle more heavily or that took an altogether different value into account.

A different reconciliation of democracy and noninterpretive judicial review begins with the proposition that the Supreme Court is not really final because popular sentiment can in the long run cause it to be overturned. As we know from history, however, it may take decades to overturn a decision, so that it will be final for many people. Even then an overruling probably cannot be forced if a substantial minority ardently supports the result.

To the degree, then, that the Constitution is not treated as law to be interpreted in conventional fashion, the clash between democracy and judicial review is real. It is also serious. When the judiciary imposes upon democracy limits not to be found in the Constitution, it deprives Americans of a right that is found there, the right to make the laws to govern themselves. Moreover, as courts intervene more frequently to set aside majoritarian outcomes, they teach the lesson that democratic processes are suspect, essentially unprincipled and untrustworthy.

The main charge against a strictly interpretive approach to the Constitution is that the Framers' intentions cannot be known because they could not foresee the changed circumstances of our time. The argument proves too much. If it were true, the judge would be left without any law to apply, and there would be no basis for judicial review.

But that is not what is involved. From the text, the structure, and the history of the Constitution we can usually learn at least the core values the Framers intended to protect. Interpreting the Constitution means discerning the principle the Framers wanted to enact and applying it to today's circumstances. As John Hart Ely put it, interpretivism holds that "the work of the political branches is to be invalidated only in accord with an inference whose starting point, whose underlying premise, is fairly discoverable in the Constitution. That the complete inference will not be found there—because the situation is not likely to have been foreseen—is generally common ground."

This, of course, requires that constitutional DOCTRINE evolve over time. Most doctrine is merely the judge-made superstructure that implements basic constitutional principles, and, because circumstances change, the evolution of doctrine is inevitable. The FOURTH AMENDMENT was framed by men who did not foresee electronic surveillance, but judges may properly apply the central value of that amendment to electronic invasions of personal privacy. The difference between this method and that endorsed by Justices Douglas and Brennan lies in the level of generality employed. Adapting the Fourth Amendment requires the judge merely to recognize a new method of governmental search of one's property. The Justices, on the other hand, create a right so general that it effectively becomes a new clause of the Constitution, one that gives courts no guidance in its application. Modifying doctrine to preserve a value already embedded in the Constitution is an enterprise wholly different in nature from creating new values.

The debate over the legitimate role of the judiciary is likely to continue for some years. Noninterpretivists have not as yet presented an adequate theoretical justification for a judiciary that creates rather than interprets the Constitution. The task of interpretation is often complex and difficult, but it remains the only model of the judicial role that achieves an accord between democracy and judicial review.

ROBERT H. BORK
(1986)

Bibliography

AGRESTO, JOHN 1984 The Supreme Court and Constitutional Democracy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

BORK, ROBERT H. 1985 Styles in Constitutional Theory. South Texas Law Journal 26:383–395.

CHOPER, JESSE 1980 Judicial Review and the National Political Process. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W., ed. 1967 Judicial Review and the Supreme Court. New York: Harper & Row.

JUDICIAL REVIEW OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACTS

To conform to basic SEPARATION OF POWERS precepts, JUDICIAL REVIEW of administrative actions must be limited yet effective. It must be limited to avoid entangling courts in policy decisions that belong to other branches; it must be effective to bind ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES to the RULE OF LAW. Many ADMINISTRATIVE LAW doctrines attempt to accommodate these two purposes. Often they do so by adapting COMMON LAW remedies against government to the American scheme of separated powers. This process began with MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), which announced that a court having jurisdiction could issue common law MANDAMUS against a cabinet officer. The Supreme Court emphasized the need to avoid judicial intrusion in the political discretion of executive officers, while conforming their decisions to the dictates of law.

Modern administrative agencies perform functions that are characteristic of all three constitutional branches: adjudication, rule-making, and execution. The legitimacy of these activities depends on the relationships between the agencies and the branches that the courts have defined. For example, Crowell v. Benson (1932) allowed agencies to exercise adjudicative authority only because judicial review could assure that agency decisions had adequate factual and legal support.

The delegation doctrine states that when Congress grants LEGISLATIVE POWER to agencies it must provide intelligible standards to guide and confine agency discretion. Yet this dictrine is aspirational today: no congressional delegation to an agency has been invalidated for over fifty years. The delegation doctrine has been supplanted by a series of inquires into the legality of particular agency actions.

First, courts review the substantive conformity of agency actions with constitutional requisites, such as those in the BILL OF RIGHTS. Substantive constitutional criteria apply to statutes.

Second, courts review the fairness of agency procedures under DUE PROCESS and statutory guarantees. PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS involves a two-stage inquiry that identifies the presence of an interest that constitutes "liberty" or "property," and then considers the individual and government interests at stake and the value of a more elaborate process. Statutory guarantees often flow from the generally applicable Administrative Procedure Act (1946), which defines the basic procedures of federal agencies for adjudication and rulemaking, and further defines the scope of judicial review of administrative acts. Such statutory procedures often are more elaborate than the minimal constitutional requisites.

Third, courts review the statutory interpretations that underlie administrative acts. Courts usually defer to agency interpretations of law that are consistent with ascertainable LEGISLATIVE INTENT and that are otherwise reasonable. The purpose of this doctrine is to give maximum scope to agency discretion within statutory bounds.

Fourth, courts review the factual basis for agency actions. Here they compare administrative explanations for decisions with materials in the administrative record and accept conclusions of fact and policy that are reasonable. The courts try to ensure that agencies have carefully considered the policy options before them and have inquired fully into the facts. Thus, ordinary rationality review is much more demanding in administrative law than it is under constitutional EQUAL PROTECTION or SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS guarantees.

Any of several threshold considerations can prevent courts from reviewing the merits of administrative actions. STANDING to seek review is partly a constitutional doctrine. To present a "case" or "controversy" within the federal JUDICIAL POWER, parties must show that they are injured in fact by the government and that judicial relief will remedy the injury. In administrative cases, courts also require the parties challenging agency actions to be within the zone of interests affected by the governing statute. There are constitutional overtones in this latter test, because it denies review to persons so tangentially interested in a statute's administration that they are unlikely to present a concrete, sharply adversarial claim.

Parties must ordinarily exhaust their administrative remedies before seeking judicial review. Separation of powers considerations partly explain this doctrine, which enforces delegations of decision-making power to agencies. The courts make exceptions to this exhaustion requirement when the issues are ready for judicial review, delay would cause hardship to private parties, or agency autonomy would be unduly threatened by immediate judicial review.

Finally, not all administrative acts are reviewable. Statutes sometimes entirely preclude judicial review, subject to uncertain due process limitations. As in Johnson v. Robinson (1974), courts usually interpret statutes that preclude review to allow at least inquiries into the constitutionality of agency actions. In this way, the courts avoid deciding whether Congress can forbid all review of an administrative act for which review is otherwise appropriate. Courts do hold that certain agency functions are intrinsically unsuited for review, such as agency decisions not to undertake enforcement action. Here as elsewhere, courts attempt to control agencies only to an extent that is consistent with traditional notions of the limits of the JUDICIAL ROLE.

HAROLD H. BRUFF
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Cases and Controversies; Procedural Due Process, Civil.)

Bibliography

DAVIS, KENNETH CULP 1978–1984 Administrative Law Treatise, 2nd ed., vols. 1–5. San Diego, Calif.: K. C. Davis.

PIERCE, RICHARD J., JR., et al. 1985 Administrative Law and Process. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

JUDICIAL ROLE

Theories about the proper role of the Supreme Court have proliferated in recent decades. These theories have been too political in one sense and not political enough in another. They are too political in that they tend to be thinly veiled rationalizations of political preferences, valued less for their own sakes than for the results they entail in specific controversies. Today, knowing someone's attitude about the role of the Court, one can usually deduce his or her political positions, not so much on ECONOMIC REGULATION as on some divisive social questions.

To arrive at a consensus about JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, we need a political situation in which most groups feel that they have at least as much to gain as to lose by subscribing to an agreed conception of the Court's role. No such consensus exists. Today the country is divided over several major social issues: crime, PORNOGRAPHY, race, women's roles, homosexuality, and religion. Ever since the 1950s, social liberals have believed that on most of those issues they have everything to gain and little to lose by judicial intervention; conversely, social conservatives have usually had a stake in confining the Court's role. Each camp has fashioned jurisprudential theories that reflect its perceived stake in judicial activism or restraint. In this sense, the debate about the Court's role is basically political.

Yet the debate is usually couched in legal terms, and in this sense, it is excessively legalistic. Commentators usually do not directly discuss the appropriate role of the Court; instead, they argue about how to interpret the Constitution. Thus, proponents of judicial activism espouse loose-constructionist theories of interpretation, and advocates of judicial restraint usually defend a more literal adherence to the text and its original meaning.

This familiar argument has long since become repetitive and unenlightening. Worse still, it treats fundamental political questions as if they were analogous to disputes over the meanings of contracts. To analyze judicial governance solely in legal terms implies that objections to a broad judicial role can be fully met by a cogent legal response, such as an interpretation of a PRECEDENT, the NINTH AMENDMENT, or the EQUAL PROTECTION clause. Admittedly, such analyses are essential, and they may indeed solve the purely legal aspect of a constitutional problem. But fidelity to law is not the only constitutional virtue, for the Constitution is a political charter as well as a legal text. If judicial lawlessness were the sole issue, we could solve every problem with a constitutional amendment saying, "It shall be unconstitutional to treat any social problem unwisely; the Supreme Court may enforce this provision on its own motion." That would eliminate every legal ground for objecting to a large judicial role, and yet the political objections obviously would remain.

Legalism is popularly identified with a restrictive view of the Court's role, but as this hypothetical amendment illustrates, that assumption is only a half-truth. After the Justices sweep past the Maginot Line of ORIGINAL INTENT, legalism is as likely to justify judicial activism as restraint, offering no solid resistance to continual enlargement of JUDICIAL POWER. Legal training breeds indifference to trends; in most fields of law, lawyers ordinarily evaluate decisions as correct or incorrect, not as contributing to a tendency that should be evaluated as such. The law is expected to evolve and grow toward the limits of its logic; indeed, the very word "trend" connotes gradualism, a legal virtue. In COMMON LAW fields, that attitude is generally harmless. The doctrine of promissory estoppel, idling in a backwater of the law of contracts, does not affect our system of government, and even if it did, the legislature could change it. In constitutional law, by contrast, the Court's role has enormous political implications; as in all politics, constitutional trends may be ominous well before the day of reckoning arrives.

In an effort to supplement narrow legal standards, some scholars have offered political objections to judicial activism. The most common of these objections may be called "the argument from democracy": America is a democracy, but the Court is not electorally accountable; therefore, excessive judicial activism is illegitimate, undermines public respect for the institution, and thus impairs its ability to perform its proper functions.

The argument from democracy, and the usual responses to it, are not narrowly legalistic, and their emphasis on democratic theory is explicitly political. Still, the search for criteria of democratic legitimacy has important similarities to conventional legal analysis: it focuses on individual decisions and doctrines, it asks whether each of them is correct (legitimate) or incorrect, and it seeks to answer that question by applying broad, consistent principles.

Without denying the value of such neolegalistic inquiries, it is important to emphasize that there is another way of looking at the Court's role, focusing less on individual decisions and more on trends and aggregates and recognizing that a decision may be justifiable from one point of view yet harmful from another. Conventional discussions of constitutional JURISPRUDENCE, with their legalistic tendency to label decisions as correct or incorrect, tend to obscure the fact that judicial governance, even when it is lawful and legitimate, exacts a price—not always an excessive or even a high price, but a price. For constitutional rights tend to diminish the role of self-government. This is not simply a question of lawfulness or legitimacy. When the Court enforces a constitutional right—even one fairly discoverable in text, traditions, and precedents—it reduces, however slightly, the responsibilities of politicians and reformers. Within the scope of legal expectations aroused by a specific right, they have less incentive to participate in politics. Within the scope of hopes aroused by the Court's general willingness to create rights, they may choose to forgo the onerous burden of self-government, waiting instead for an edict from Washington. Even if reformers lose in the Court, three or four dissents may nourish the hope that new Justices will solve the problem. To that extent, rights tend to relieve reformers of the tasks of CITIZENSHIP: studying public policy, creating reform commissions, drafting statutes, talking to bureaucrats and politicians, bargaining with opponents, persuading the uncommitted, and compromising. Likewise, judicially created rights sometimes enable politicians to avoid accountability to sharply divided constituencies.

Even as a legal issue, one open to creative solutions, a constitutional right is a problem that has been removed from the fifty states, with all their judges, to one Supreme Court. All other judges, though still free to interpret and suggest, cease to be ultimately responsible.

Admittedly, these hidden prices are nebulous and incalculable. No doubt the price of judicial governance is often low in individual cases, and even when it seems to be high, it may be worth paying. It may be offset by the beneficial effects of judicial intervention, for example, in opening up opportunities for an oppressed class (as in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954)), in protecting FREEDOM OF SPEECH, or in purifying the electoral process. The essential point is that the citizenry should try to appraise the enlarged judicial role cumulatively—as it appraises the federal budget—and as a problem in government, not merely in law. In constitutional jurisprudence one should consider the destination, not just the next step of the journey. Do we want the Supreme Court to decide, case-by-case over the decades, just when and how the government may regulate sex, marriage, and privacy? To establish national standards for criminal punishment, fashioned case-by-case in litigation? To oversee regulation of the economy? Or provision of housing, under the aegis of a "constitutional right to shelter?" We generally discuss such questions as if they were discrete and legal. Yet they are more than that. They are political choices, most of which can be resolved either way in the long run by the accumulation of precedent, without violating the conventions of legal reasoning and the RULE OF LAW. It may sometimes take a more or less lawless decision to get the process started, but every kingdom begins as a usurpation. Given the leading role of precedent in legal analysis, judicial activism is ultimately self-legitimating.

Powell v. Texas (1967) exemplifies the difference between legal and political grounds for judicial restraint. In Powell the issue was whether it was CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT for Texas to punish a chronic alcoholic for public drunkenness. The trial judge had found that chronic alcoholism is a disease whose symptoms include loss of will power and "a compulsion" to appear drunk in public. This being so, argued Powell's attorney, it would be unconstitutional to treat Powell as a criminal. By a 5–4 vote, the Court rejected this argument and upheld the conviction.

A proponent of STRICT CONSTRUCTION would presumably applaud this decision on the ground that it conformed to the original meaning of "cruel and unusual." But as precedents accumulate, such arguments often lose much or all of whatever cogency they originally possessed. The leading precedent in Powell was Robinson v. California (1962), in which the Court had reversed a conviction for the crime of being "addicted to the use of narcotics." The opinion in Robinson distinguished between punishing someone for an act and punishing him for a "status," the latter being unconstitutional. Some of the language of the opinion implied that the basic defect of a status crime is that a status (insanity or a disease, for example) is, or may be, involuntary. Arguably, therefore, the rationale of Robinson extended beyond status crimes to involuntary acts, including drunken behavior by an alcoholic. To so hold might have been scientifically unsound or unwise, and it might not have been the most persuasive interpretation of Robinson, but given Robinson it could hardly have been described as a blatantly lawless decision. It would have been the sort of expansive but plausible interpretation of a precedent that courts have been handing down for centuries.

A decision in Powell's favor would also have been consistent with some of the neolegalistic criteria fashioned by jurisprudents to identify fields in which the Supreme Court's activism is legitimate. Criminal law is an area in which the courts have traditionally played a major role, and properly so because of their expertise and the tendency of popular majorities to be insensitive to the need for fairness toward criminals. Criminal defendants can be thought of as the functional equivalent of racial and religious minorities. In displacing a state court's rules of criminal responsibility, the Supreme Court is not overriding democracy but merely correcting other judges.

Although not violative of the rule of law, a broad reading of Robinson would have vastly expanded the Court's role, for it would have made a potential constitutional case out of every issue of free will—for example, defenses based on drunkenness and insanity. Legalistic arguments for judicial restraint do not adequately describe the implications of this sort of decision. On one side of the scale are the virtues, real or imagined, of uniformity and rationality. On the other side is the impact not only on the Court's caseload but on the values of FEDERALISM: freedom, diversity, and relatively widespread citizen participation in government. Federalism's values are embedded in our constitutional order, but in a case like Powell they are not "the law" in the usual sense of an authoritative rule of decision on whose binding force well-trained lawyers would agree; they are, rather, the political virtues without which constitutional jurisprudence becomes sophistry.

DAVID P. BRYDEN
(1992)

Bibliography

BRYDEN, DAVID P. 1986 Politics, the Constitution, and the New Formalism. Constitutional Commentary 3:415–437.

HARLAN, JOHN M. 1964 The Bill of Rights and the Constitution. American Bar Association Journal 50:918.

NAGEL, ROBERT F. 1989 Constitutional Cultures: The Mentality and Consequences of Judicial Review. Berkeley: University of California Press.

THAYER, JAMES BRADLEY 1893 The Origin and Scope of the American Doctrine of Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 7:129–156.

JUDICIAL STRATEGY

That judges shape much public policy is a fact of political life. The significant questions are how, how often, how effectively, and how wisely they influence policy. Each of these inquiries poses normative as well as empirical problems. Here we shall be concerned only with legitimate strategies that a Justice of the United States Supreme Court can employ to maximize his or her influence. We shall focus mainly on marshalling the Court.

A Justice, like any strategist, must coordinate limited resources to achieve goals. He or she must make choices—about goals and priorities among goals and also about means to achieve those goals. Intelligent choices among means depend in part on accurate assessments of the resources the Justice controls and of the limitations that others may impose on use of those resources.

The Justices can order litigants, including government officials, to act or not act in specified ways. Less tangibly, judges also have the prestige of their office, supported by a general cultural ethos of respect for the RULE OF LAW. In particular, a Justice has a powerful weapon, an opinion—a document that will be widely distributed by the Government Printing Office and several private firms. That opinion will justify—well or poorly—a particular decision and, explicitly or implicitly, the public policy it supports.

A Justice's power is limited by the nature of judicial institutions. Judges lack self-starters. Someone has to bring a case to them. Furthermore, while they can hold acts of other public officials constitutional or unconstitutional and so allow or forbid particular policies, it is much more difficult for judges to compel government to act. The Supreme Court can rule that blacks are entitled to vote, but it cannot force Congress to pass a CIVIL RIGHTS law to make that right effective. Moreover, the Court can hear only a limited number of cases. It depends on thousands of state and federal judges to carry out its jurisprudence. And no Justice plays an official role in selecting, retaining, or promoting judges.

Second, a Supreme Court Justice needs the agreement of at least four colleagues. And each Justice can write a separate opinion, dissenting or concurring, in any case.

Third, and more broadly, the Court is dependent on Congress and the President for appropriations and enforcement of decisions. Each of these branches has other important checks: The House can impeach and the Senate can then remove a Justice. Congress can increase the size of the Court, remove at least part of its APPELLATE JURISDICTION, propose constitutional amendments to erase the effects of decisions or strike at judicial power itself, and use its access to mass media to challenge the Court's prestige. The President can even more effectively attack the Court's prestige, and he can persuade Congress to use any of its weapons against the Justices. He can also choose new judges who, he hopes, will change the course of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION.

Fourth, state officials can influence public opinion to pressure Congress and the President. State officers can also drag their heels in carrying out judicial decisions and select judges who are hostile to the Court's jurisprudence.

Fifth, leaders of interest groups can pressure elected officials at all levels of government. And when judicial decisions threaten or support their values, these people seldom hesitate to apply whatever political leverage is in their self-interest.

Commentators—journalists and social scientists as well as law professors—constitute a sixth check. If judges make law, EDWARD S. CORWIN said, so do commentators. Justices who want their jurisprudence to endure must look not only to immediate reactions but also to the future. What commentators write may influence later generations of voters, lawyers, and public officials.

A Justice confronts these limitations simultaneously, and each of these groups will include a range of opinion. Any ruling will elate some and infuriate others, and the political power of various factions is likely to vary widely. In short, problems of synchronizing activities are always present and are typically complex.

The first audience a Justice must convince is composed of other Justices. The most obvious way of having one's views accepted by one's colleagues is to have colleagues who agree with one's views. Thus ability to influence the recruiting process is a difficult but fruitful means of maximizing influence. (See APPOINTMENT OF SUPREME COURT JUSTICES.) Justices who cannot choose their colleagues must consider how to persuade them.

Although treating others with courtesy may never change a vote or modify an opinion, it does make it more likely that others will listen. When others listen, intellectual capacity becomes critical. The Justice who knows "the law," speaks succintly, writes clearly, and analyzes wisely gains distinct advantages.

Practical experience can be a valuable adjunct. Logic is concerned with relations among propositions, not with their desirability or social utility. According to WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, several Justices were converted to Chief Justice EARL WARREN's position in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) because of his vast political experience. Strength of character is also crucial. Although neither learned nor gifted as a writer, Warren led the Court and the country through a constitutional revolution. It was his "passion for justice," his massive integrity, Douglas also recalled, that made Warren such a forceful leader. "Is it right?" was his typical question, not "Do earlier decisions allow it?"

In another sense, intellect alone is unlikely to suffice. Justices are all apt to be intelligent, strong-willed people with divergent views about earlier rulings as well as public policy. They are also apt to differ about the Court's proper roles in the political system—in sum, about fundamentals of jurisprudence. At that level of dispute, it is improbable that one Justice, no matter how astute and eloquent, will convert another.

Facing disagreements that cannot be intellectually reconciled, a Justice may opt for several courses. Basically, he can negotiate with his colleagues or go it alone. Most often, it will be prudent to negotiate. Like policymaking, negotiation, even bargaining, is a fact of judicial life. Writing the opinion of the Court requires "an orchestral, not a solo performance." All Justices can utilize their votes and freedom to write separate opinions. The value of each depends upon the circumstances. If the Court divides 4–4, the ninth Justice, in effect, decides the case. On the other hand, when the Court votes 8–0, the ninth Justice's ability to negotiate will depend almost totally on his capacity to write a separate opinion that, the others fear, would undermine their position.

To be effective, negotiations must be restrained and sensitive. Justices are likely to sit together for many years. Driving a hard bargain today may damage future relations. The mores of the Court forbid trading of votes. The Justices take their oaths of office seriously; and, while reality pushes them toward accommodation, they are not hagglers in a market, peddling their views.

The most common channels of negotiating are circulation of draft opinions, comments on those drafts, and private conversations. A Justice can nudge others, especially the judge assigned the task of producing the OPINION OF THE COURT, by suggesting additions, deletions, and rephrasings. In turn, to retain a majority, the opinion writer must be willing to accede to many suggestions, even painful ones, as he tries to persuade the Court to accept the core of his reasoning. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES once complained that "the boys generally cut one of the genitals" out of his drafts, and he made no claim to have restored their manhood.

Drafts and discussions of opinions can and do change votes, even outcomes. Sometimes those changes are not in the intended direction. After reading FELIX FRANKFURTER' s dissent in BAKER V. CARR (1961), TOM C. CLARK, changed his vote, remarking that if those were the reasons for dissenting he would join the majority.

Although the art of negotiation is essential, a Justice should not wish to appear so malleable as to encourage efforts to dilute his jurisprudence. He would much prefer a reputation of being reasonable but tough-minded. He thus might sometimes find it wise to stand alone rather than even attempt compromise. It is usually prudent for a Justice, when with the majority, to inject as many of his views as possible into the Court's opinion, and when with the minority to squeeze as many hostile ideas as possible out of the Court's opinion. There are, however, times when both conscience and prudence counsel standing alone, appealing to officials in other governmental processes or to future judges to vindicate his jurisprudence.

Although Justices have very limited authority to make the other branches of government act, they are not powerless. Judges can often find more in a statute than legislators believe they put there. OBITER DICTA in an opinion can also prod other officials to follow the "proper" path. The Court might even pursue a dangerous course that might push a reluctant President to carry out its decisions lest he seem either indifferent to the rule of law or unprotective of federal power against state challenges.

Lobbying with either branch is also possible. Indeed, judicial lobbying has a venerable history running back to JOHN JAY. Advice delivered through third parties may have been even more common. Over time, however, expectations of judicial conduct have risen so that even a hint of such activity triggers an outcry. Thus a judge must heavily discount the benefits of direct or indirect contacts by the probability of their being discovered.

The most obvious weapon that a Justice has against unwelcome political action is the ability to persuade his colleagues to declare that action unconstitutional or, if it comes in the shape of a federal statute or EXECUTIVE ORDER, to disarm it by interpretation. These are the Court's ultimate weapons, and their overuse or use at the wrong time might provoke massive retaliation.

A Justice must therefore consider more indirect means. Delay is the tactic that procedural rules most readily permit. The Justices can deny a WRIT OF CERTIORARI, dismiss an REMAND, the case for clarification, order reargument, or use a dozen other tactics to delay deciding volatile disputes until the political climate changes.

Under other circumstances, it might be more prudent for a Justice to move the Court step by step. Gradual erosion of old rules and accretion of new ones may win more adherents than sudden statements of novel DOCTRINES. The Court's treatment of segregation provides an excellent illustration. If MISSOURI EX REL. GAINES V. CANADA (1938) had struck down SEPARATE BUT EQUAL, the Court could never have made the decision stick. Indeed, years later, when it excommunicated Jim Crow, enforcement created a generation of litigation that still continues.

Strategy is concerned with efficient utilization of scarce resources to achieve important objectives. Its domain is that of patience and prudence, not of wisdom in choosing among goals nor of courage in fighting for the right. The messages that a study of judicial strategy yields are: A web of checks restrains a judge's power; and If he or she wishes to maximize his or her ability to do good, a judge must learn to cope with those restrictions, to work within and around them, and to conserve available resources for the times when he or she must, as a matter of conscience, directly challenge what he or she sees as a threat to the basic values of constitutional democracy.

WALTER F. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1957 The Unpublished Opinions of Mr. Justice Brandeis. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1961 The Passive Virtues. Harvard Law Review 75: 40–79.

DOUGLAS, WILLIAM O. 1980 The Court Years, 1939–1975. New York: Random House.

KLUGER, RICHARD 1976 Simple Justice. New York: Knopf.

MURPHY, BRUCE 1982 The Brandeis/Frankfurter Connection. New York: Oxford University Press.

MURPHY, WALTER F. 1964 Elements of Judicial Strategy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

O'BRIEN, DAVID M. 1986 Storm Center: The Supreme Court in American Politics. New York: Norton.

JUDICIAL SUPREMACY

Stripped of the partisan rhetoric that usually surrounds important decisions of the Supreme Court, debate about judicial supremacy raises a fundamental question: Who is the final, authoritative interpreter of the Constitution? The response of judicial supremacy is that courts perform that function and other officials are bound not only to respect judges' decisions in particular cases but also, in formulating future public policy, to follow the general principles judges have laid down.

JUDICIAL REVIEW does not necessarily entail or logically imply judicial supremacy. One can, as THOMAS JEFFERSON did, concede the legitimacy of courts' refusing on constitutional grounds to enforce statutes and EXECUTIVE ORDERS and still deny either that officials of a coordinate branch must obey a decision or follow its rationale in the future. This view, called "departmentalism," sees the three branches of the national government as equal in CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. Each department has authority to interpret the Constitution for itself, but its interpretations do not bind the other two.

There are other possible answers to the basic question: Congress, the President, the states, or the people. A claim for the states presupposes the Constitution to be a compact among sovereign entities who reserved to themselves authority to construe their obligations. Such was Jefferson's assertion in the KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS (1798), and it echoed down decades of dreary debates on NULLIFICATION and SECESSION. The CIVIL WAR settled the matter, though some southern states briefly tried to resurrect nullification to oppose BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954).

A claim for the President as the ultimate, authoritative interpreter smacks too much of royalty for the idea to have been seriously maintained. On the other hand, Presidents have frequently and effectively defended their independent authority to interpret the Constitution for the executive department.

A case for the people as the final, authoritative interpreter permeates the debate. American government rests on popular consent. The people can elect officials to amend the Constitution or create a new constitution and so shape basic political arrangements as well as concrete public policies. Jefferson advocated constitutional conventions as a means of popular judging between conflicting departmental interpretations.

Although even JAMES MADISON rejected Jefferson's solution, indirect appeals to the people as the ultimate interpreters are reflected in claims to the supremacy of a popularly elected legislature. On the other hand, in THE FEDERALIST #78, ALEXANDER HAMILTON, rested his argument for judicial review on the authority of the people who have declared their will in the Constitution. Judicial review, he argued, does not imply that judges are superior to legislators but that "the power of the people is superior to both."

Although JOHN MARSHALL partially incorporated this line of reasoning in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), neither he nor Hamilton ever explicitly asserted that the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Constitution was binding on other branches of the federal government. One might, however, infer that conclusion from Marshall's opinions in Marbury and in McCulloch v. Maryland (1819), where he expressly claimed supremacy as far as state governments were concerned.

We know little of the Framers' attitudes toward judicial supremacy. In The Federalist #51, Madison took a clear departmentalist stand, as he did in the First Congress. In 1788 Madison wrote a friend that the new Constitution made no provision for settling differences among departments' interpretations: "[A]nd as ye Courts are generally the last in making the decision, it results to them by refusing or not refusing to execute a law, to stamp it with its final character. This makes the Judiciary Dept paramount in fact to the Legislature, which was never intended and can never be proper."

In the Senate in 1802, however, GOUVERNEUR MORRIS argued that the judges derived their power to decide on the constitutionality of laws "from authority higher than this Constitution. They derive it from the constitution of man, from the nature of things, from the necessary progress of human affairs. The decision of the Supreme Court is and, of necessity, must be final."

What turns a brief for judicial review into one for judicial supremacy is, of course, the claim of finality. Partially, that claim rests on the notion that interpretation of law is a uniquely judicial function (and, by its own terms, the Constitution is "the supreme law"); partially, on the ambiguity of the Constitution about the interpretive authority of other branches; and partially on the need for a supreme arbiter to assure the supremacy and uniform interpretations of the Constitution. The claim also rests on the belief that judges, because they are protected from popular pressures, are more apt to act fairly and coherently than elected officials. "It is only from the Supreme Court," CHARLES EVANS HUGHES once asserted, "that we can obtain a sane, well-ordered interpretation of the Constitution." The Court itself has seldom explicitly claimed judicial supremacy and has never articulated a full argument for it vis-à-vis Congress or the President. Indeed, through such DOCTRINES as the presumption of constitutionality and POLITICAL QUESTIONS, the Court often defers to interpretations by other departments.

The first modern, categorical claim by the Court to supremacy came in COOPER V. AARON (1958), where the Justices said that "the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution," and thus that Brown v. Board of Education was "the supreme law of the land." But Cooper involved state officials as did BAKER V. CARR (1962), where the Court first referred to itself as the "ultimate interpreter of the Constitution." Still, it was not until POWELL V. MCCORMACK (1969) that the Court so designated itself in a dispute involving Congress, an assertion the Justices repeated about the President in UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974) and about both in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983). Powell, however, addressed only the authority of the House to exclude a duly elected member and it did not require that he be readmitted or be given back pay. Nixon upheld a SUBPOENA to a President whose political situation was already desperate. What would have happened to the Court's claim as "ultimate interpreter" had it faced a politically secure chief executive in Nixon or tried to force Congress to take action in Powell might well have produced examples of departmentalism, as did Jefferson's refusal to obey Marshall's subpoena in United States v. Burr (1807). And early congressional reactions to Chadha's declaring the LEGISLATIVE VETO unconstitutional have been mixed. Formally as well as informally, Congress has continued the practice, though in a more guarded fashion and on a smaller scale.

Although the constitutional text does not require judicial supremacy, Congress and the President have usually gone along with the Court's constitutional interpretations. Yet the exceptions have been sufficiently frequent and important that it is difficult to demonstrate a firm tradition requiring coordinate federal branches to accept the Court's doctrines. In matters strictly judicial—whether or not courts will enforce particular statutes—judges have been supreme, though subject to checks regarding JURISDICTION and appointment of new personnel. The other branches, however, have frequently denied that they have an obligation, when setting policy, to follow the Court's constitutional interpretations.

There is a stronger argument for a duty of enforcing a judicial decision in a particular case. Certainly where the government has brought the case to the courts, an obligation to obey is obvious, as even Jefferson admitted. Where, however, the government is the defendant, the matter is much more complicated, especially when a court commands an official to perform a positive action. Jefferson and ANDREW JACKSON said they had no duty to obey such orders; ABRAHAM LINCOLN acted as if he did not; and FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT was prepared to ignore the GOLD CLAUSE CASES (1934) had they been decided against the government.

Typically, Congress and the President acquiesce in judicial interpretations of the Constitution because they agree with the results of judicial decisions, or fear public opinion, or recognize the difficulty of securing a congressional response. Often, too, the Justices reinforce Congress's tendency toward inertia by not pressing a claim to supremacy. Always hovering in the background of any department's assertion of supremacy is the possibility of an appeal to "the people" through the AMENDING PROCESS. Yet even such an appeal, when directed against the Court's jurisprudence, implies an admission of the tactical if not theoretical superiority of the Court as constitutional interpreter.

WALTER F. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWIN S. 1914 Marbury v. Madison and the Doctrine of Judicial Review. Michigan Law Review 12:538–572.

FISHER, LOUIS 1985 Constitutional Interpretation by Members of Congress. North Carolina Law Review 63:701–741.

MIKVA, ABNER J. 1983 How Well Does Congress Support and Defend the Constitution? North Carolina Law Review 61: 587–611.

MURPHY, WALTER F.; FLEMING, JAMES E.; and HARRIS, WILLIAM F., II 1986 American Constitutional Interpretation. Chaps. 6–7. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM, FEDERAL

The charter of the federal judicial system is Article III of the Constitution, authorizing the creation of federal tribunals vested with the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES of the United States, that is, the authority to adjudicate a specifically enumerated set of CASES AND CONTROVERSIES. Article III also specifies the method of appointment of federal judges and lays down rules designed to guard their independence.

The Framers, mindful of the problems that the absence of a national judiciary had caused under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, easily agreed that there must be a national Supreme Court with power to assure the uniformity and supremacy of federal law. But the Framers were divided over the question whether further provision should be made for national courts. Some favored the creation of a complete system of federal courts. Some thought that this would unnecessarily narrow the preexisting general JURISDICTION of the state courts; they argued that national interests could be sufficiently protected by providing for Supreme Court review of state court decisions involving questions of federal law. This division was settled by a compromise: Article III itself mandates that there shall be "one Supreme Court"; but beyond this the federal judicial power is simply vested in "such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

Article III specifies that the Supreme Court (and whatever inferior federal courts Congress may establish) are to be courts of a strictly limited jurisdiction: they may adjudicate only nine enumerated categories of cases. Some of these were included because they touch on issues of national interest: most important, cases "arising under" the Constitution and laws of the United States (the FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION); cases of ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION; and cases to which the United States is a party. Federal courts were also empowered to decide certain controversies implicating the nation's FOREIGN AFFAIRS (for example, disputes affecting ambassadors and other alien parties; cases arising under treaties). The remaining categories authorize the federal courts to engage in interstate umpiring in cases where it was feared that parochial interests would prevail in the state courts. Examples are controversies between states, between a state and a citizen of another state, and between citizens of different states.

Article III's specification that the judicial power consists of adjudicating "cases" or "controversies" itself embodies a fundamental political decision: the national courts were to exercise only a judicial power. Thus the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 repeatedly and explicitly rejected a variety of proposals to allow federal courts or judges to participate as advisers or revisers in the legislative process or to render ADVISORY OPINIONS; their authority was to be limited to "cases of a judiciary nature." On the other hand, the historical evidence establishes the Framers' understanding that the grant of the judicial power was to include the authority, where necessary to the lawful decision of a case properly within a court's jurisdiction, to disregard federal or state statutes found to be unconstitutional. This power of JUDICIAL REVIEW, occasionally challenged as a usurpation because it is not explicitly mentioned in Article III, has been settled since MARBURY V. MADISON (1803).

Besides defining the outer bounds of the federal judicial power, Article III protects federal judges from political pressures by guaranteeing tenure during GOOD BEHAVIOR without reduction in compensation.

Article III is not self-executing; it needs LEGISLATION to bring it to life, most particularly because Congress must determine whether there should be "inferior" federal courts and what should be the scope of their jurisdiction. It is to this task that the First Congress turned in its twentieth enactment: the seminal JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789. Obeying the Constitution's command, the act constituted a Supreme Court, consisting of a CHIEF JUSTICE and five associates. Next, the act, establishing a tradition persisting without interruption to this day, took up the constitutional option to create a system of federal courts of ORIGINAL JURISDICTION. The structure created was curious, but survived for a century. The country was divided into districts (at least one for each state), with a district court manned by a district judge. In addition, the country was divided into circuits (originally three), each with another trial court—a CIRCUIT COURT—manned not by its own judges but by two Supreme Court Justices (sitting "on circuit") and a district judge.

Only a fraction of the constitutional potential for original federal court jurisdiction was exploited by the first Judiciary Act, attesting to the clear contemporaneous understanding of the Constitution that it is for Congress to determine which (if any) of the cases and controversies encompassed by the federal judicial power should be adjudicated in the first instance in a lower federal (rather than a state) court. (The modest original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, limited to controversies where a state is a party and certain cases involving foreign diplomats, is thought to flow "directly" from the Constitution and thus represents a special case.) The district courts were given the jurisdiction most clearly felt to be a national one: authority to adjudicate admiralty cases. In a controversial decision, the First Congress set a precedent by opening the circuit courts to some cases involving controversies between citizens of different states and involving ALIENS. The federal trial courts were also granted jurisdiction over most civil suits brought by the United States and over the then negligible federal criminal caseload. Notably, the act did not give the federal trial courts jurisdiction over cases "arising under" federal law, leaving these to be adjudicated in the state courts.

The appellate structure of the new court system was rudimentary. Federal criminal cases were left without direct review (and remained so for a century). The circuit courts were given a limited APPELLATE JURISDICTION over the district courts, and the Supreme Court was authorized to review civil cases decided by the circuit courts involving more than $2,000.

Finally, in its famous section 25, the act—consistent with the Framers' intention to assure the supremacy of federal law—gave the Supreme Court power to review final state court judgments rejecting claims of right or immunity under federal law. (State court judgments upholding claims of right under federal law were not made reviewable until 1914.) Supreme Court review of state judgments involving questions of federal law has been a feature of our judicial FEDERALISM ever since 1789, and has served as a profoundly significant instrument for consolidating and protecting national power.

The institutional structure created by the first Judiciary Act proved to be remarkably stable; major structural change did not come until 1891. The Supreme Court has had a continuous existence since 1789, with changes only in the number of Justices. So also have the district courts (though their number has of course undergone major change). Even the circuit courts—architecturally the weakest feature of the system—survived for more than a century.

As to the jurisdiction of the federal courts, changes were incremental in the pre-CIVIL WAR period, with the state courts acting as the primary enforcers of the still rudimentary corpus of national law. But the Civil War brought a sea change: Congress was no longer prepared to depend on the state judiciaries to enforce rights guaranteed by the new FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and by the Reconstruction legislation. By the HABEAS CORPUS ACT of 1867 and the various CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS, Congress extended the lower federal courts' jurisdiction to include claims against state officials for invasion of federal constitutional and statutory rights. These extensions were in turn overtaken by the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1875, giving the federal courts a general jurisdiction to adjudicate civil cases arising under federal law, subject only to a minimum amount-in-controversy. These expansions, supplemented by subsequent numerous specific extensions of federal trial jurisdiction over various sorts of actions involving national law, signaled the transformation of the federal courts from narrow forums designed to resolve maritime and certain interstate disputes into catholic tribunals playing a principal role in enforcing the growing body of national rights, privileges, and immunities.

The growth of the federal judicial business in the post-Civil War era placed an ever-growing pressure on the federal judicial system. The Supreme Court was especially burdened by the duties of circuit riding and by an increasing caseload. By 1890 the Court had a backload of 1800 cases; in the same year, 54,194 cases were pending in the lower federal courts. Congress responded to the crisis in the CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS ACT (Evarts Act) of 1891, which fixed the outline of the contemporary federal judicial system. The act established a system of intermediate appellate courts called Circuit Courts of Appeals (not to be confused with the old circuit courts, which were finally abolished in 1911), one for each of (the then) nine circuits and staffed with its own judges. Although a narrow category of district court decisions continued (and continue) to be reviewed directly by the Supreme Court, the Evarts Act created the standard modern practice: appeals went normally from the district courts to the new courts of appeals; the judgments of the latter were in turn reviewable by the Supreme Court.

The second major and seminal innovation of the Evarts Act related to appellate review in the Supreme Court: the act introduced the principle of review at the Court's own discretion (by writ of CERTIORARI) of judgments in the lower courts. This principle was in turn greatly expanded in the so-called Judges' Bill of 1925, which sharply reduced the availability of Supreme Court review as of right of decisions of state and federal courts and substituted for it discretionary review on certiorari—the method of review that, to this day, dominates the Court's docket.

Changes in the structure of the federal judicial system have been few and minor since 1925, although both the statutory jurisdiction and the business of the courts have undergone major transformations. In essence the system remains a three-tier system, with the district courts serving as the trial courts, the courts of appeals as the appellate tribunals of first instance, and the Supreme Court as the court of final review (having also the power to review state court decisions involving issues of federal law). The picture is completed by the existence of special federal tribunals empowered to decide particular categories of cases, and by numerous federal administrative tribunals; the decisions of all of these are typically subject to review in the regular federal courts.

The most important component of the contemporary statutory jurisdiction of the UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS encompasses diversity cases involving more than $10,000, criminal prosecutions and civil actions brought by the United States, a large range of actions against the United States and its agencies and officials, federal HABEAS CORPUS, and—most significant—all civil cases in which a plaintiff sues on a claim arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. The latter, all-encompassing rubric includes not only cases brought pursuant to the hundreds of federal statutes specifying a right to sue but also the numerous cases where that right is a judge-created ("implied") right to enforce a federal statutory or—(of profound significance)—constitutional provision not itself explicitly containing a right of action. In addition, the statutes allow certain diversity and federal question cases brought in the state courts to be removed for trial to a federal district court. Finally, the district courts exercise a significant jurisdiction to review the work of many federal administrative agencies and to review and supervise the work of the system of bankruptcy courts. The jurisdiction of the district courts is occasionally specified as exclusive of the state courts (for example, admiralty, COPYRIGHT, and PATENT); most of their civil jurisdiction is, however, concurrent with that of the state courts.

The country is, in the mid-1980s, divided into ninety-seven districts (including the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA and PUERTO RICO). Each state has at least one district; districts have never encompassed more than one state. The district courts are staffed by 576 active district judges—almost three times the 1950 figure (182 new district judgeships were created between 1978 and 1984 alone). The growth in number of judges has, nevertheless, failed to keep pace with the explosive increase in the caseload that has occurred since the 1960s. In 1940 about 70,000 criminal and civil (nonbankruptcy) cases were filed in the federal courts; in 1960, about 80,000; by 1980, the figure was almost 200,000, and in 1984 it exceeded 275,000. (The compound annual rate of increase in the federal district court case load was under one percent between 1934 and 1960; it has been five percent since 1960.) The increase is due primarily and naturally to the vast growth in the total corpus of federal (constitutional, statutory, common, and administrative) law applied in turn to a growing country with an expansive and mobile economy. It has also been fed, however, in the past twenty-five years by congressional and court-initiated changes in substantive and remedial rules that have made the federal courts into powerful litigation-attracting engines for the creation and expansion of rights and the redistribution of entitlements and powers in our society. Thus open-ended constitutional and statutory formulas have been used to fuel aggressive judicial review of the validity of federal and state legislative and administrative action and to create an expansive system of remedies against federal and state government (including affirmative claims on the resources of these governments). JUSTICIABILITY requirements (such as STANDING) that previously narrowed the scope of jurisdiction over public law actions have been significantly eroded. And federal court litigation has become increasingly attractive to plaintiffs as a result of provisions for attorneys' fees, the elimination (or inflation-caused erosion) of amount-in-controversy requirements, and the increasing use of CLASS ACTIONS.

These developments are reflected in the changing content of the federal district courts' workload. There were 6,000 suits against the United States in 1960, and almost 30,000 in 1983. There were only 300 CIVIL RIGHTS cases in 1960, almost 20,000 in 1983; 2,100 prisoner postconviction cases in 1960, more than 30,000 in 1983; 500 social security law cases in 1960, more than 20,000 in 1983. In general, about thirty-five to forty percent of the mid-1980s district court civil caseload involve the United States or its officials as a plaintiff or defendant; sixty to sixty-five percent of the civil caseload is "private" (including, however, litigation against state and local governments and officials). Diversity cases have contributed about twenty percent of the caseload since the 1970s. The number of criminal prosecutions has, historically, fluctuated widely in response to special federal programs (peaking during PROHIBITION); since the mid-1970s the criminal caseload has been quite stable and in the mid-1980s contributed about fifteen to twenty percent of the total.

In response to the explosive caseload Congress has acted to allow the district courts to rely substantially on the work of so-called federal magistrates—officials appointed by district judges with wide powers (subject to review by the district judge) to issue warrants, conduct preliminary hearings, try minor criminal offenses, supervise civil discovery, rule on preliminary motions and prisoner petitions, and (with the consent of the parties) even to hear and enter judgment generally in civil cases. The conferring of additional powers on magistrates has evoked controversy as well as some (so far unsuccessful) constitutional attacks.

The UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS (as they are now called) have jurisdiction to review all final (and some interlocutory) decisions of the district courts. Pursuant to special statutory provisions they also review some cases coming directly from federal administrative agencies (this being an especially significant component of the business of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit). About fifteen percent of their cases are criminal cases, and another fifteen percent are federal and state prisoner postconviction and civil rights cases; only fourteen percent of their docket consists of diversity cases.

The caseload of the courts of appeals has increased dramatically in the last twenty-five years and is, in the mid-1980s, commonly described as constituting a crisis. In the forty years before 1960 that caseload hovered between 1,500 and the peak of 3,700 reached in 1960. In 1970 the figure was almost 11,500, and in 1980 it was over 21,000. From 1980 to 1983 the caseload jumped again to 29,580. From 1960 to 1983 there was an increase of almost 800 percent in the number of appeals from the district courts; the compound annual rate of increase for all cases from 1960 to 1983 was 9.4 percent (compared to 0.5 percent in the preceding twenty-five years).

To manage this workload there exist (in the mid-1980s) twelve courts of appeals assigned to geographical circuits (eleven in the states and one for the District of Columbia) and an additional one (described below) for certain special categories of subject matter. The number of judges in each circuit ranges from six (First) to twenty-eight (Ninth). There are 156 authorized circuit judgeships; in 1960 there were sixty-eight (and as recently as 1978 only ninety-seven). Cases are typically heard by panels of three judges; a few cases of special importance are in turn reheard by the court sitting EN BANC. The increase in number of judges has by no means kept pace with the expansion of the caseload since 1960. As a result, there have been substantial changes in the procedures of these courts: opportunities for oral argument (and even for briefing) have been sharply curtailed and an increasing proportion of cases is disposed of summarily, without opinion. Central staff attorneys (as well as a growing army of conventional law clerks) assist the judges.

From the beginning of our national history Congress has perceived a need to create special tribunals for the adjudication of cases falling outside the traditional areas of federal court jurisdiction. Military tribunals have, from the outset, administered a special body of law through special procedures. The administration of justice in the TERRITORIES in transition toward statehood was perceived as requiring special temporary federal tribunals that would become state courts upon statehood; the District of Columbia and the territories and dependencies of the United States also require a full panoply of special federal courts to administer local law. Beginning in 1855, with the establishment of a rudimentary Court of Claims, Congress has created a series of special tribunals to adjudicate money claims against the United States. And, particularly with the advent in this century of the modern administrative state, Congress has created numerous administrative agencies and tribunals whose business includes adjudication.

Unlike the ordinary federal courts, the institutional hallmark of most of these tribunals has been specialization. Further, the transitory nature of some of these tribunals, the perceived need to allow some of them to function inexpensively with expeditious or informal procedures, and (in the case of the administrative agencies) the equally strongly perceived need to endow them with a range of policymaking functions in addition to adjudicative functions, has typically led Congress to create them not as tribunals constituted under Article III (with lifetime judges performing an exclusively judicial function) but as special LEGISLATIVE COURTS or administrative tribunals. Their judges typically serve temporary terms and are removable for misfeasance without IMPEACHMENT. The constitutional authority for such tribunals has been much discussed and litigated; Congress's authority to constitute them has virtually always been upheld.

The most important specialized tribunals in the current federal judicial system are: the local courts of the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the territories and dependencies; the system of military courts; the system of bankruptcy courts; the TAX COURT and the CLAIMS COURT, adjudicating certain tax refund claims and certain damage actions against the federal government; the Court of International Trade, adjudicating certain customs disputes; and a large and variegated array of administrative tribunals and agencies. The work of all of these tribunals is typically subject to review, through various forms of proceedings, in the regular federal courts.

In addition, in 1982 Congress created a thirteenth court of appeals, the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT. This is a regular Article III court, whose jurisdiction is not territorial but is defined in terms of subject matter, including appeals from the Claims Court and the Court of International Trade and many patent and trademark cases.

Continuously since 1789 the Supreme Court has been the single institution with nationwide authority to supervise the inferior federal courts and to give voice to a uniform national law. The Court's size has varied from five to ten Justices; since 1869 it has consisted of a Chief Justice and eight associate Justices. The Supreme Court acts en banc, not in panels, though individual Justices have the conventional authority to issue stays and take emergency action. The Court acts by majority, but in this century the practice has been to grant a certiorari petition (setting the case for plenary review) if four Justices are in favor.

The caseload explosion in the lower federal courts has imposed major burdens on the Court. The Court disposed of over 4,000 cases in its 1983 term (compared to about 3,300 in 1970, 1,900 in 1960, and 1,200 in 1950). The task is possible because only a small number of cases (usually about 150) are decided on the merits by full opinion after plenary briefing and oral argument. Another 100 to 150 cases are decided on the merits by MEMORANDUM ORDER. The remaining dispositions consist of summary denials of petitions for certiorari (or other writs); there were almost 3,900 of these in 1983–1984. In 1960 there were just under 2,000 new cases docketed in the Court; in 1970, about 3,400; in 1983, about 4,200. The increase in cases docketed means more and more resources devoted to "screening" cases for decision and less to the hearing and disposition of cases on the merits. Thus the time devoted to oral argument has shrunk steadily in this century and now almost never exceeds one hour per case. The length of briefs is limited; and an ever-growing battery of law CLERKS assists in legal research and in the drafting of opinions.

The content of the Court's work reflects the scope and content of the national law. In the 1983 term the Court's decisions by full opinion included three cases within the original jurisdiction; ninety-six civil cases coming from the lower federal courts (of which forty-six involved the federal government, twenty-eight involved state and local governments, and twenty-two were private cases); sixteen federal habeas corpus cases; and thirty-two cases from the state courts (eighteen civil and fourteen criminal). Diversity cases are rarely reviewed. The Court is, increasingly, a constitutional court; about half of its cases tend to involve a constitutional question as the (or a) principal issue. The United States (as party or AMICUS CURIAE) participates in over half of the cases that the Court decides on the merits.

Although the federal judicial system has grown substantially in its 200 years, the federal courts continue to constitute only a small—though disproportionately powerful—component of the American judicial system. (Fewer than three percent of the country's judges are federal Article III judges; the biggest states have judicial systems larger than the federal system.)

The relations between state and federal courts are multifarious and exceedingly complex. Except where Congress has specified that federal court jurisdiction is exclusive, state courts of general jurisdiction exercise a normal competence to adjudicate cases involving issues of federal law (particularly in that many such issues arise by way of defense in civil and criminal cases arising under state law). Their decisions of these cases are subject to Supreme Court review, usually on certiorari; but that Court's jurisdiction in such a case is limited to the federal question in the case and may not be exercised at all if the judgment rests on a valid and dispositive state-law ground. State court judgments on issues of federal law (unless reversed by the Supreme Court) have normal RES JUDICATA effect.

The federal district courts, in turn, adjudicate many questions of state law, not only in diversity cases but also in cases arising under federal law where state law governs one or more issues. No provision for review by the state courts of the correctness of federal court decisions on issues of state law has ever existed; but in a narrow class of cases federal courts will abstain from exercising an otherwise proper federal jurisdiction in order to allow a state law issue to be determined in the state courts. (See ABSTENTION DOCTRINE.) Under the decision in ERIE RAILROAD V. TOMPKINS (1938), on issues of state law (including issues of state common law) state court precedents are accepted as authoritative by the federal courts.

Special problems are presented by the politically sensitive role of the federal courts in controlling the legality of the actions of state and local governments and their officials. Although the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT bars the federal courts from asserting jurisdiction over actions against a state as such, a wide range of remedies against state and local governments and their officials exist in the federal courts. Federal courts routinely review the constitutional validity of state criminal convictions through the writ of habeas corpus. Since the adoption of the Civil Rights Act of 1871, they have exercised jurisdiction to grant INJUNCTIONS and DAMAGES against state and local officials (and, more recently, against local governmental entities as such) for conduct under color of state law—including conduct by officials asserting official power even where the conduct is prohibited by state law—that infringes on the ever-growing corpus of federal constitutional and statutory rules governing STATE ACTION. Federal courts may enjoin state officials from enforcing unconstitutional state statutes and administrative schemes; moreover, the courts' injunctive remedial powers are frequently exercised to assume broad managerial supervision over state agencies and bureaucracies (for example, schools, mental hospitals, prisons). And the ever-burgeoning array of federal conditions and restrictions that accompany federal economic and social programs available to the states are, as a matter of routine, enforceable in the federal courts.

The political sensitivities aroused by the federal courts' jurisdiction to control the validity of state and local government action has led to some statutory and judge-made restrictions on the exercise of this jurisdiction. For over half a century federal court actions to enjoin the enforcement of state statutes on constitutional grounds had to be litigated before THREE-JUDGE COURTS and were subject to direct review by APPEAL to the Supreme Court. (The institution of the three-judge district court was virtually abolished in 1976.) During the NEW DEAL, statutory restrictions were placed on the jurisdiction of the federal courts to interfere with state tax statutes and public utility rate orders. Statutory and judge-made rules restrict the power of the federal courts to enjoin or interfere with pending state court proceedings; and state prisoners who fail to exhaust state court remedies or fail to comply with state procedural rules do not have access to federal habeas corpus.

The federal judicial system appears to operate on one-hundred-year cycles. The structure created in 1789 became increasingly unwieldy after the Civil War and was—after some twenty years of pressure for reform—finally transformed by the Evarts Act of 1891. That act created a stable system which has, in turn, come under increasing pressure from the caseload explosion that began in the 1960s. Relief could come in the form of diminutions in the district courts' original jurisdiction (such as a long-discussed abolition of or reduction in the diversity jurisdiction); but the need for architectural revision has also become increasingly clear in the 1970s and 1980s.

Structural problems center on the appellate tiers. Further substantial increases in the number of circuit judges is an uncertain remedy. Some circuits are already unwieldy and are finding it increasingly difficult to maintain stability and uniformity in the intracircuit law. Increasing the number of circuits would increase intercircuit instability and disuniformity and place further pressure on the finite appellate capacity of our "one Supreme Court"—the latter constituting the obvious structural bottleneck in the system.

More generally, a judicial system administering an enormous and dynamic corpus of national law and adjudicating a rising caseload (approaching 300,000 cases a year) cannot operate forever on an appellate capacity that is limited to some 150–200 judicial opinions with nationwide authority. There is rising concern, too, about the quality of federal justice as the growing caseload leads to an increasing bureaucratization of the federal judicial process, with the judges reduced to an oversight capacity in managing a growing array of magistrates, central staff, and law clerks.

Since the 1970s, two methods of increasing the system's capacity to provide authoritative and uniform judicial pronouncements on issues of national law have been discussed. One consists of greater subject-matter specialization at the appellate level, with special courts of appeals having nationwide authority to deal with specified subjects of federal litigation (for instance, tax cases, administrative appeals); such courts would remove pressure from the regional courts of appeals and the Supreme Court. The alternative (or additional) possibility is to create an additional appellate "tier": a national court of appeals with power to render decisions of nationwide authority, receiving its business by assignment from the Supreme Court or by transfer from the regional courts of appeals. In addition, if the number of certiorari petitions continues to mount, the Supreme Court will eventually have to make some adjustments in its screening procedures (perhaps dealing with these petitions in panels).

Behind these structural problems lie more fundamental questions about the enormous power that the federal courts have come to exercise over the political, economic, and social policies of the nation. Throughout our history intense controversy has surrounded the question whether (and to what extent) a small corps of appointed life-tenured officials should exercise wide-ranging powers to supervise and invalidate the actions of the political branches of federal, state, and local governments. From time to time these debates have threatened to affect the independence of the federal judicial system. Thus, in the 1930s, facing wholesale invalidations of the New Deal program by a "conservative" Supreme Court, President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT proposed to "pack" the Court with additional judges; his plan was widely perceived to be contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and was defeated in Congress. (Shortly thereafter a Court with a new membership and a new judicial philosophy in effect accomplished Roosevelt's purposes.)

In the second half of the twentieth century retaliatory proposals have mostly consisted of attempts to strip a "liberal" Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction in certain categories of constitutional litigation (for example, REAPPORTIONMENT or abortion), leaving the state courts to be the final arbiters of federal law in these areas. Intense controversy surrounds the question whether Congress has constitutional power to divest the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction over specific categories of constitutional litigation. (The one explicit Supreme Court pronouncement on the question, the celebrated EX PARTE MCCARDLE [1869], in sweeping language upheld this power pursuant to the explicit provision of Article III providing that the Court's appellate jurisdiction is subject to "such Exceptions" and "such Regulations" as "the Congress shall make.") Even if Congress has jurisdiction-stripping power, however, its exercise—much like the exercise of the power to "pack" the Court—would be widely perceived as anticonstitutional in spirit. In fact, no such legislation has come near to achieving acceptance, attesting to the vast reservoir of ideological and political strength that the ideal of an independent federal judiciary continues to possess.

The more important and authentic debate that continues to rage as the federal court system enters its third century relates to the proper role of an independent federal judiciary in a nation that is democratic but also committed to the ideal of fidelity to law. The federal courts have come to exercise a power over the political, economic, and social life of this nation that no other independent judicial system in the history of mankind has possessed. Whether that power is wholly benign—or whether it should and can be reduced—is one of the great questions to which the twenty-first century will have to attend.

PAUL M. BATOR
(1986)

Bibliography

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE 1969 Study of the Division of Jurisdiction Between State and Federal Courts. Washington D.C.: American Law Institute.

BATOR, PAUL M. et al. 1973 The Federal Courts and the Federal System, 2nd ed., with 1981 Supplement. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

CARRINGTON, PAUL D.; MEADOR, DANIEL J.; and ROSENBERG, MAURICE 1976 Justice on Appeal. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

DIRECTOR OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS [annually] Annual Reports. Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office.

FRANKFURTER, FELIX and LANDIS, JAMES M. 1928 The Business of the Supreme Court: A Study in the Federal Judicial System. New York: Macmillan.

FRIENDLY, HENRY J. 1973 Federal Jurisdiction: A General View. New York: Columbia University Press.

POSNER, RICHARD A. 1985 The Federal Courts: Crisis and Reform. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

WRIGHT, CHARLES ALAN 1983 The Law of Federal Courts. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789

1 Stat. 73 (1789)

Article III of the Constitution constitutes an authorizing charter for a system of national courts to exercise the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES, but is not self-executing, needing legislation to bring it to life. Accordingly, the First Congress, in its twentieth enactment, turned to the creation of a JUDICIAL SYSTEM for the new nation. Its work—the First Judiciary Act, approved September 24, 1789—has ever since been celebrated as "a great law." The statute, obeying a constitutional command, constituted a SUPREME COURT. It created the office of Attorney General of the United States. It devised a judicial organization that was destined to survive for a century. And, by providing for Supreme Court review of state court judgments involving issues of federal law, it created a profoundly significant instrument for consolidating and protecting national power.

But it is the decision of the First Congress to take up the constitutional option to establish a system of federal courts "inferior" to the Supreme Court that has been characterized as the act's "transcendent achievement." The Constitution does not require the creation of inferior courts. Nevertheless, the decision to do so came swiftly, actuated by the unanimously shared view that an effective maritime commerce—trading lifeblood for the thirteen states—needed a dependable nationwide body of maritime law, and by a consensus that the most reliable method to assure its development would be to entrust it to a distinctive body of national courts. (Far more controversy surrounded the view, also finding expression in the act, that national courts were needed to assure out-of-state litigants protection against parochial prejudices.)

The act thus created a system of federal courts of original (trial) jurisdiction, establishing a tradition that has survived without interruption to this day. On the other hand, the act gave these courts the authority to adjudicate only a small fraction of the CASES AND CONTROVERSIES encompassed by the federal judicial power, attesting to the clear contemporaneous understanding of the Constitution that it is for Congress to determine which, if any, of the cases, within the federal judicial power should be adjudicated in the first instance in a federal tribunal.

The first section of the act provided for a Supreme Court, consisting of a Chief Justice and five associates. Below this, the act created a curious bifurcated system. The country was divided into districts generally coterminous with state boundaries (Massachusetts and Virginia each had two districts), each with a district court manned by a district judge. In addition, the act divided the country into three circuits, in each of which another trial court, called a CIRCUIT COURT—manned not by its own judges but by two Supreme Court Justices and a district judge—was to sit twice a year in each district within the circuit. These circuit courts, in addition, received a limited APPELLATE JURISDICTION to review district court decisions. The system of circuit courts set up in 1789, with its requirement that Supreme Court Justices sit on circuit as trial judges, persisted for more than a century; it proved to be the weakest architectural feature of the first Judiciary Act.

The act exploited only a fraction of the constitutional potential for original federal court jurisdiction. Significantly, the constitutional grant of federal judicial power over cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States (FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION) was largely unused and remained so until 1875. (A notable exception was section 14, the All Writs Act, which, among other matters, authorized Supreme Court Justices and district judges to "grant writs of HABEAS CORPUS" to inquire into the legality of federal detentions.) The act made important use, however, of the power to locate litigation affecting out-of-staters in the new national courts. Thus, the circuit courts were given CONCURRENT JURISDICTION with the state courts over civil cases involving more than $500 "between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another State," as well as over civil cases involving more than $500 in which an ALIEN was a party.

The most important grant of jurisdiction to the new district courts gave them "exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION," subject to a savings clause preserving COMMON LAW remedies.

The litigation interests of the national government were given narrow recognition in the First Judiciary Act. The circuit courts were given power to adjudicate civil cases involving more than $500 in which the United States were "plaintiffs or petitioners" (suits against the United States were not contemplated); the district courts had power to adjudicate suits at common law involving $100 brought by the United States. The act gave the district courts exclusive original cognizance over certain seizures, penalties, and forfeitures. And, finally, Congress provided for the then tiny criminal business of the national government by giving the circuit courts "exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States," subject to a concurrent jurisdiction in the district courts to try certain minor criminal offenses.

The circuit courts were given the authority to review final decisions of the district courts in civil and admiralty cases involving more than $50 or $300, respectively. In addition, the first Judiciary Act originated the device, in continuous use ever since, of providing for pretrial removal of certain cases from state to federal court (for example, removal in civil cases to a circuit court by alien defendants and by out-of-staters sued in the plaintiff's home-state court).

The framers of the first Judiciary Act, notwithstanding the later established DOCTRINE that the ORIGINAL JURISDICTION of the Supreme Court does not depend on legislative grant, specified in section 13 what this original jurisdiction was to be; the listing nearly (but not completely) exhausted the constitutional grant, encompassing controversies between states, between a state and a citizen of another state, and suits involving foreign diplomats. Setting another lasting precedent, the act designated only a portion of the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as exclusive jurisdiction. In his opinion for the Court in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL read section B to give the Supreme Court original jurisdiction over certain cases that Article III had not expressly placed within the Court's original jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Court held this narrow provision of the 1789 act unconstitutional.

Not all lower federal court decisions were made reviewable. For instance, no provision at all was made for review of federal criminal cases (which remained, in the large, unreviewable for a century). The act authorized the Supreme Court to review final judgments in civil cases decided by the circuit courts if the matter in dispute exceeded $2,000.

In its celebrated section 25, Congress asserted the constitutional authority—sustained in MARTIN V. HUNTER'S LESSEE (1816) and COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821)—to give the Supreme Court authority to review certain final judgments or decisions in the "highest" state court in which a decision "could be had" (language that survives to this day). Significantly, this authority did not encompass all cases involving issues of federal law: review was limited to cases where a state court had rejected a claim of right or immunity under federal law. (This limitation eventually proved to create an unacceptable institutional gap and was eliminated by the Judiciary Act of 1914.) A seminal feature of section 25 was its specification that Supreme Court review is limited to the question of federal law in the case.

The first Judiciary Act originated a fundamental structural feature of our legal topography in its section 34, called the Rules of Decision Act, providing (in language that still survives) that, except where federal law otherwise requires, the laws of the several states shall be regarded as "rules of decision" in trials at common law in the federal courts "in cases where they apply." Interpretations of this delphic provision—including the reversal from SWIFT V. TYSON (1842) to ERIE RAILROAD V. TOMPKINS (1938)—have had a significant impact on our judicial FEDERALISM. In addition, the act contained elaborate boilerplate with respect to many matters no longer of current interest, (for example, the exact days for court sessions, quorums, clerks, forms of oaths, bail).

The first Judiciary Act, passed by a Congress many of whose members had participated in the framing of the Constitution, has had a lasting effect, not only on the shape of the federal judicial system but on our thought about the constitutional and structural premises on which that system is based. Created by great statesmen, it set on foot an enterprise that 200 years later still bears its imprint.

PAUL M. BATOR
(1986)

Bibliography

FRANKFURTER, FELIX and LANDIS, JAMES M. 1928 The Business of the Supreme Court: A Study of the Federal Judicial System. New York: Macmillan.

GOEBEL, JULIUS 1971 History of the Supreme Court of the United States: Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801. Pages 457–508. New York: Macmillan.

WARREN, CHARLES 1923 New Light on the History of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789. Harvard Law Review 37:49–132.

JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801
2 Stat. 89 (1801)

This maligned congressional enactment was the final achievement of the Federalists and one of their most constructive, but the Federalists so enmeshed it in partisanship that the first important action of THOMAS JEFFERSON'S administration was the repeal of the act. It created resident circuit judgeships and enormously expanded federal JURISDICTION. The JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 had created circuit courts consisting of district court judges and Supreme Court Justices. From the outset the Justices complained about the arduous duty of riding circuit and the necessity of deciding in their appellate capacity the same cases they had decided on circuit. Congress had done nothing to separate the Justices from the circuit courts, despite presidential recommendations. The Republican victories in 1800 spurred judicial reform that was "worth an election to the [Federalist] party," said a Federalist leader. A lame-duck Congress belatedly passed a much needed bill that created six circuit courts staffed by sixteen circuit judges. More important, the bill extended the JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS to include virtually the entire JUDICIAL POWER of the United States authorized by Article III, including a general grant of FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION—something which Congress did not grant again until 1875. But the bill also reduced the size of the Supreme Court to five when the next vacancy occurred, to prevent Jefferson from making an appointment. Also, President JOHN ADAMS at the last hour appointed sixteen Federalists to the new circuit judgeships. Enraged Republicans determined to pass the JUDICIARY ACTS OF 1802.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

TURNER, KATHRYN 1965 Federalist Policy and the Judiciary Act of 1801. William and Mary Quarterly 22:3–32.

JUDICIARY ACT OF 1837

See: Circuit Courts

JUDICIARY ACT OF 1869

See: Circuit Courts

JUDICIARY ACT OF 1875
18 Stat. 470 (1875)

For three-quarters of a century after the abortive JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801, federal courts lacked any general FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION, that is, JURISDICTION over cases arising under federal law. The 1875 act, adopted on the same day as the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875, was one of Congress's last pieces of nationalizing legislation during the era of RECONSTRUCTION; its primary purpose was to provide a federal judicial forum for the assertion of newly created federal rights. Using the language of Article III of the Constitution, Congress gave the CIRCUIT COURTS jurisdiction over cases "arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States" or under national treaties, provided that the matter in dispute exceeded $500. The act also authorized the REMOVAL OF CASES from state to federal courts by either plaintiffs or defendants, when those cases could have been brought originally in the federal courts.

In part, the 1875 Judiciary Act's sponsors justified this widening of federal jurisdiction as a response to a commerce that had become national in scope. In particular, they sought to relieve railroads from the need to contend with unfriendly state courts in cases involving foreclosure, receivership, taxation, and even injuries to person and property—an objective which Populists came to criticize. In the Pacific Railroad Removal Cases (1885) the Supreme Court read the new jurisdictional grant so expansively that in 1887 Congress increased the jurisdictional amount, eliminated removal by plaintiffs, and insulated from APPEAL federal court orders remanding removed cases to the state courts.

The chief long-term significance of the 1875 act was its establishment of a generalized federal question jurisdiction—the jurisdiction that is seen today as the federal courts' indispensable function. In FELIX FRANKFURTER's words, in 1875 the lower federal courts "ceased to be restricted tribunals of fair dealing between citizens of different states and became the primary and powerful reliances for vindicating every right given by the Constitution, the laws, and treaties of the United States."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

CHADBOURN, JAMES H. and LEVIN, LEO 1942 Original Jurisdiction of Federal Questions. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 90:639–674.

FRANKFURTER, FELIX and LANDIS, JAMES M. 1928 The Business of the Supreme Court. Pages 64–69. New York: Macmillan.

JUDICIARY ACT OF 1891

See: Circuit Courts of Appeals Act

JUDICIARY ACT OF 1911

See: Judicial Code

JUDICIARY ACT OF 1925
43 Stat. 936 (1925)

The Supreme Court's desire to reduce the burden of postwar litigation reaching its docket, combined with Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT's aggressive program of reform, resulted in the Judiciary Act of 1925. As litigation increased, efforts to expand the Court's discretionary control over its JURISDICTION—begun in the CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS ACT of 1891—gained favor. Taft took the administrative functions of the Chief Justiceship seriously and sponsored a three-man committee of justices charged with formulating a detailed plan to regulate the Court's workload. The eventual proposal, framed mainly by Justice WILLIS VAN DEVANTER, entailed what Professor FELIX FRANKFURTER would later describe as a "drastic transfer of existing Supreme Court business to the circuit courts of appeal." This draft bill was submitted to Congress in 1922. The patchwork appearance of existing national legislation regulating the federal judiciary had prompted confusion and delay, and Taft, testifying in favor of the bill, applauded its "revision and restatement—a bringing together in a harmonious whole" of the earlier "wilderness of statutes." After three years of inaction, Congress finally passed the "Judges' Bill" in early 1925.

The new act reorganized the Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION, allowing it to center its energies on constitutionally or nationally significant issues. Henceforth, cases would reach the Court from three avenues. Some district court decisions would go directly to the Supreme Court, but most would be shunted to the circuit courts of appeals. Among those exceptional cases that could be directly appealed because of their national importance were those arising under INTERSTATE COMMERCE or antitrust statutes, suits to enjoin enforcement of either ICC orders or state laws, and appeals by the federal government in criminal cases. Review of circuit courts of appeals' decisions was made largely discretionary; unless the Court chose to examine such a case by means of a WRIT OF CERTIORARI, most circuit decisions would be final. This provision thus superseded some of the reforms enacted in the 1891 legislation. Only two kinds of cases might be appealed directly from state courts: where a state law had been sustained against federal constitutional attack or where the state court had voided a federal law or treaty. Although the act left some problems unsolved, it successfully abated the flood of cases inundating the Court.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

FRANKFURTER, FELIX and LANDIS, JAMES M. 1927 The Business of the Supreme Court. New York: Macmillan.

JUDICIARY ACTS OF 1802
2 Stat. 132, 2 Stat. 156 (1802)

Gloating Federalists declared that the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801 was as valuable for their party as an election victory. The appointment of only Federalists to the new circuit judgeships, the attempt by a new circuit court to get a Jeffersonian editor indicted for SEDITIOUS LIBEL, and the issuance in 1801 of the show cause order in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) convinced President THOMAS JEFFERSON's administration that the Federalists meant to continue party warfare against them from the bench. Republicans also opposed the expanded JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS; they wanted litigants to remain primarily dependent on state courts and the United States as dependent as possible on the states for the execution of its laws. The upshot was the repeal of even the constructive reforms of 1801.

Federalists in Congress argued that repeal would subvert the independence of the judiciary and was unconstitutional because the circuit judges had tenure during good behavior. The Republicans answered that the Constitution empowered Congress to establish and therefore to abolish inferior federal courts. The debate on the repealer triggered a prolonged congressional discussion on national JUDICIAL REVIEW. Federalists supported the power of the Supreme Court to hold acts of Congress unconstitutional, while Republicans assaulted judicial review as an undemocratic judicial usurpation, a violation of SEPARATION OF POWERS, and a subversion of LIMITED GOVERNMENT. The only proper check on the popularity elected and politically responsible branches of the national government, Republicans argued, was the outcome of elections. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's opinion in Marbury was the Federalist reply from the bench.

Apprehensive about the possibility that the Supreme Court might declare the repealer unconstitutional, Congress passed another judiciary act which abolished the August term of the Court. By fixing one term a year, to be held in February, Congress managed to postpone the next meeting of the Court for fourteen months, allowing a cooling-off period, during which time the Justices could resume their circuit duties. They did, and in STUART V. LAIRD (1803) they sustained the power of Congress to assign them to circuit work. The Judiciary Act of 1802 also increased the number of circuits from three to six. Until the Reconstruction period, the federal judicial system remained basically unchanged after 1802.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

ELLIS, RICHARD E. 1971 The Jeffersonian Crisis: Courts and Politics in the Young Republic. Pages 4–60. New York: Oxford University Press.

JUDICIARY REFORM ACT
50 Stat. 751 (1937)

This act, a remnant of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's court-packing proposal, provided that "whenever the constitutionality of any Act of Congress affecting the public interest is drawn in question in any court of the United States . . . the court shall permit the United States to intervene and become a party." The act further provided for direct APPEAL to the Supreme Court when a lower court held a congressional act unconstitutional in a case to which the United States or a federal officer was a party. Moreover, such appeals were to be expedited on the Court's calendar.

The act also forbade the issuance by any district court of an INJUNCTION suspending enforcement of an act of Congress upon constitutional grounds, unless approved by a specifically convened THREE-JUDGE COURT. (A single judge might grant temporary injunctive relief to prevent "irreparable loss" to a petitioner.) The three-judge court's grant or denial of an injunction was directly appealable to the Supreme Court. The remainder of the act amended the JUDICIAL CODE to provide a replacement when a district court judge was unable to perform his work. The constitutionality of the act was never challenged; although the three-judge court requirement was largely repealed in 1976, other sections are still good law.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

JULIAN, GEORGE
(1817–1899)

An Indiana abolitionist, lawyer, and congressman (1849–1851; 1861–1871), George Washington Julian was an early advocate of emancipation under the government's WAR POWERS. In 1862 he guided the HOMESTEAD ACT through Congress. Julian advocated confiscation of rebel lands and black suffrage. In 1867 he was a member of the committee of seven which drew up ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT against President ANDREW JOHNSON. In 1868 he introduced a constitutional amendment that would have granted women's suffrage. After 1871 Julian became a liberal Republican and then a radical Democrat. He published much, including his political memoirs (1884) and a biography of his father-in-law, Congressman Joshua R. Giddings (1892).

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

JULIAN, GEORGE W. 1884 Political Reflections, 1840–1872. Chicago: Jansen, McClurg & Co.

JULLIARD v. GREENMAN

See: Legal Tender Cases

JUREK v. TEXAS

See: Capital Punishment Cases of 1976

JURISDICTION

Jurisdiction is a magical and protean term. In American law it refers to the power of legislatures, the competence of courts to deal with certain types of cases, the allocation of cases between state and federal courts, the power of both state and federal courts over defendants who have only peripheral attachments to the locale of the court, and the territory in which a unit of government exercises its power. Not surprisingly the word shifts its meanings as it moves among these quite different tasks.

The term's confusing spread of meanings has its roots in the English medieval experience. What modern observers would think of as political power accompanied the grant of property; the landlord was lord of more than land; he exercised powers of justice over the people who tilled that soil. Yet that jurisdiction also had limits: above it stood the powers of the monarch, who at least in theory had the power and responsibility to see that the lords rendered justice. Thus the word emerged from the Middle Ages carrying several meanings: the power to make law, the power to adjudicate cases, and, loosely, the territory within which that power was exercised.

We use all three senses today. We speak, for example, of legislative jurisdiction, meaning legislative power, generally allocated by state and federal constitutions. Thus the earliest opinion of the Supreme Court applying the limits of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS to state economic regulation, in Allegeyer v. Louisiana (1897), said that the state had exceeded its territorial jurisdiction. Territorial considerations aside, any decision holding a law unconstitutional can be described as a holding that the legislative body has transgressed the limits of its jurisdiction—its lawful authority. The courts have employed this rhetoric especially in defining a state's jurisdiction to tax.

We use the extended, territorial sense of the term when we write of a fugitive's having fled a jurisdiction, or when lawyers ask about which jurisdiction's law applies. Article IV, section 3, of the Constitution uses the term in this sense when it prohibits creation of a new state within the jurisdiction of an existing state without the latter's consent.

The most distinctively legal, though not exclusively constitutional, sense of the term refers to the authority of a court to decide a matter or to issue an order—its subject matter jurisdiction. Some state courts are courts of so-called general jurisdiction, competent to decide all cases within the ordinary bounds of the law. Other state courts are courts of limited jurisdiction, empowered only to decide specified types of cases or to grant only specified forms of relief. A municipal court, for example, may have jurisdiction to award damages only up to a limited dollar amount and may have no jurisdiction at all to grant an INJUNCTION.

In constitutional law jurisdiction has two special meanings, both involving civil cases. One flows from the limitation of the subject matter jurisdiction of the federal constitutional courts in Article III of the Constitution; the other grows from the due process clauses of the Fifth and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

Fundamental to the constitutional scheme is the proposition that each branch of the federal government must share powers and observe limits not only in regard to the other two branches of government but also in regard to the states. Article III and many statutes thus limit the subject matter jurisdiction of the federal courts to certain types of cases; that article, for example, ordinarily would prohibit a federal court from deciding a case between two citizens of the same state in which no question of federal or maritime law was involved. Because the limitations of Article III describe a fundamental division of authority between state and federal governments, the federal courts have been scrupulous, some would say zealous, not to overstep those subject matter boundaries. Thus even though no party to a lawsuit evinces the least concern about it, a federal court has an independent duty to investigate the basis for its subject matter jurisdiction and to dismiss the suit if jurisdiction is lacking. Such dismissals, like the jurisdictional rules that require them, protect the interests of the state court systems, to which the litigation must go if the federal courts cannot hear it.

The Constitution also limits the powers of the federal government and the states over individual citizens. State courts, for example, must observe a limitation that flows from the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Since Pennoyer v. Neff (1878) the Supreme Court has insisted that, regardless of the kind of case involved, the defendant have some connection with the state in which the suit occurs. Over the past century the Court has remolded the basis and expanded the range of personal jurisdiction—changes that, some have suggested, have come in response to an increasingly mobile population and an economy increasingly national in scope. The Court has sometimes based the requirement of personal jurisdiction on the state's lack of power over persons not within its borders—thus harking back to the territorial sense of the term; more recently it has tended to speak less of territorial power and more of unfair inconvenience to a defendant forced to litigate in a distant forum. Whether it has grounded the requirements in FEDERALISM or in fairness to the defendant, however, the Court has insisted that such connections exist in order for a judgment of a court to be entitled to FULL FAITH AND CREDIT.

Whether similar constitutional restrictions on personal jurisdiction apply to federal courts is a more obscure matter. Because the federal government is sovereign throughout the United States, notions of geographical territoriality play no role, and only the inconvenience to the defendant would be at issue in such a case. In a number of instances involving the national economy, such as federal securities law cases, Congress has provided for nationwide personal jurisdiction in the federal courts, and such grants of power have been upheld, presumably because any harm to the defendant is outweighed by the need for a nationally available system of courts supervising the national economy. The outer limits of congressional power have not been tested, for in most cases either venue statutes (controlling the districts in which civil suits may be brought) or the FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE limit federal courts to essentially the same reach of personal jurisdiction that a state court would have.

Unlike subject matter jurisdiction, personal jurisdiction can be waived by those entitled to its protection: the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that either by prior agreement or by the simple failure to raise the issue at an early stage of litigation defendants may lose their opportunity to challenge the court's power to decide the case. COLLATERAL ATTACK on a judgment on the ground that the court lacked personal jurisdiction is available only to a defendant who did not appear in the original suit.

Article III's limits on the subject matter jurisdiction of federal courts allocate cases as between state and federal courts; the due process limitations in personal jurisdiction allocate cases between a court, either state or federal, in a particular place and courts in other places more convenient to the defendant. Though both doctrines in their more technical aspects are quintessential lawyer's law, their roots lie in the Constitution's allocations of governmental power and in a tradition of individualism. The same origins underlie the idea of jurisdiction as the limitations on the power of various branches of government. Ultimately all the uses of "jurisdiction" derive from the medieval Western tradition that distinguished between power and justice, making the ability to dispense the latter a function of allocations of the former.

STEPHEN C. YEAZELL
(1986)

Bibliography

BATOR, PAUL M. et al. 1973 Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System. Mineoloa, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

HAZARD, GEOFFREY C. 1965 A General Theory of State-Court Jurisdiction. Supreme Court Review 1965:241–289.

MECHREN, ARTHUR T. VON, and TRAUTMAN, DONALD 1966 Jurisdiction to Adjudicate: A Suggested Analysis. Harvard Law Review 79:1121–1179.

JURISDICTION, FEDERAL

As ALEXANDER HAMILTON stressed in THE FEDERALIST #78, the power and obligation of federal judges to measure the conduct of public officials and bodies against the precepts of the Constitution mean that federal courts must sometimes act to thwart these officials and bodies. On occasion this is, at least in some quarters, a very unpopular enterprise. From time to time, Congress has entertained the possibility of responding to controversial decisions by the Supreme Court or the lower federal courts by strategically removing the JURISDICTION of part or all of the federal judiciary over the controverted matters.

Proposals of this sort raise the important and sensitive question of whether the lower federal courts and, possibly, even the Supreme Court, ultimately act at the sufferance of Congress or whether the Constitution secures the existence of an independent federal judicial voice. Article III of the Constitution, which provides for the establishment of the federal judiciary, invites rather than stills speculation on this fundamental question of institutional structure. The first sentence of Article III provides: "The judicial power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Following this is the provision without which Hamilton felt the Constitution would have been "inexcusably defective": "The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during GOOD BEHAVIOR, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office."

Section 2 of Article III begins with a menu of matters over which the judicial power "shall extend." Nine categories are delineated. The first three are styled as classes of "cases," the most important being cases "arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and treaties." The remaining six are styled as classes o "controversies," the most prominent being controversies "between Citizens of different States." Section 2 then specifies two narrow classes of cases over which the Supreme Court has ORIGINAL JURISDICTION and concludes with the following stipulation: "In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have APPELLATE JURISDICTION, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."

Remarkably, there is no well-settled understanding of the scope of Congress's authority under these provisions to restrict federal jurisdiction. Cooler and more responsible heads have usually prevailed in Congress when "court-stripping" proposals have been floated, and the Supreme Court has been carefully diplomatic in sounding deference to Congress when it can afford to do so; as a result, there is little authority on the question. Most of the Court's pertinent statements have been by way of broad OBITER DICTUM and have been Janus-faced. Broad statements welcoming Congress's plenary license to sculpt federal jurisdiction have been balanced by the Court's insistence that the very fabric of national union depends on the existence of final federal judicial authority over legal affairs.

The two most prominent cases in this area both grew out of the CIVIL WAR. In EX PARTE MCCARDLE (1869) the Court faced jurisdiction-limiting legislation plainly intended to protect Reconstruction LEGISLATION from constitutional invalidation. Although the legislation gestured at pushing the Court aside, it only touched one statutory basis of the Court's appellate jurisdiction, leaving—as the Court itself pointedly observed—another statutory route to the same end. With an angry and somewhat dangerous Congress in the wings and with little at stake for the moment, the Court gave broad deference to Congress's power to reduce its appellate jurisdiction. Three years later, in an attempt to prevent the presidential pardon of supporters of the Confederacy from entitling them to compensation for property lost during the hostilities, Congress denied the federal courts jurisdiction over property claims that depended on presidential pardon. In United States v. Klein (1872) the Court promptly struck down this law as a means to the unconstitutional end of interfering with the President's authority to grant pardons and as an unconstitutional attempt to dictate how federal courts otherwise seized with jurisdiction should decide cases. Most commentators are skeptical about the applicability of either the generous tone of McCardle or the special circumstances of Klein to modern court-stripping issues.

A few propositions are reasonably clear. In one sense, the lower federal courts do indeed exist at the sufferance of Congress. Although there is some scholarly dissent, most commentators agree that Congress was not obliged to create the lower federal courts at all and could disband them today. Most also agree that when Congress does establish lower courts it need not give them all or any particular part of the jurisdiction enumerated in Article III. Events at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 support the conclusion that the Framers intended to resolve their sharp division over what form, if any, the lower federal judiciary should assume by leaving the matter for congressional resolution, and the first sentence of Article III plainly executes this compromise. Although it is logically possible to hold that Congress must give all of the federal judicial power to any lower federal court it creates, such an inflexible view seems arbitrary and at odds with the idea of remanding the shape of the lower federal courts to the judgment of Congress in the first place. Congress has never given all of Article III jurisdiction to the lower federal courts, and the Supreme Court, from Sheldon v. Sill (1850) forward, has firmly assumed that Congress can order à la carte from the Article III menu.

Sheldon v. Sill can be read to say that Congress can choose any package of lower-court jurisdiction it likes, as long as the bounds of Article III jurisdiction are not exceeded. But this is surely not the case. Were Congress to parse access to civil plaintiffs on the ground of their religion or political affiliation, for example, the FIRST AMENDMENT would surely be violated. A diversity case with no pertinent wrinkles, Sheldon reliably stands only as a negation of the binary view of congressional authority over the lower federal courts.

With respect to the Supreme Court, once it is observed that the first sentence of Article III clearly contemplates the existence of a Supreme Court with some modicum of jurisdiction, the textual focus shifts to the last sentence of Article III: "In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make." Most commentators agree that Congress's authority under this provision includes the power to remove some Article III CASES or CONTROVERSIES from the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Congress has always kept some classes of cases from the Supreme Court, and the Court consistently has endorsed this reading of the exceptions language. Substantial housekeeping concerns support this institutional consensus. Some Article III matters have seemed unnecessary or even inappropriate candidates for the Court's appellate jurisdiction, such as controversies between citizens of different states that have been fully adjudicated in the courts of one of the states.

But beyond the propositions that the Supreme Court must have some jurisdiction and that Congress can take some cases out of the Court's appellate jurisdiction, little is clear, and much remains open to scholarly reflection. The orthodox view among legal scholars has been very generous to Congress. As long as Congress leaves the jurisdiction of state courts intact, avoids patent constitutional problems such as selecting plaintiffs on the basis of their religious beliefs, and avoids untoward interference with the federal courts that do have jurisdiction, the orthodox view licenses Congress to tailor federal jurisdiction, including that of the Supreme Court, as it pleases. On this view, for example, Congress could respond to decisions by the Supreme Court that extended the protections of the First Amendment to the burning of the American flag by depriving the entire federal judiciary of jurisdiction over FLAG DESECRATION cases. Most, if not all, of the scholars who hold this view—their ranks have included Paul Bator, Charles Black, Gerald Gunther, Michael Perry, and Herbert Wechsler—would deplore such an event, and they would urge Congress not to trifle with the federal judiciary in this fashion. But the orthodox view rests on the unshakable conviction that the first section of Article III gives Congress unlimited plenary authority over the Supreme Court. For some, this reading of the Constitution has been a cause for regret; but others have seen an important institutional virtue in the federal judiciary's vulnerability to such treatment. Charles Black and Michael Perry, for example, have urged that Congress's power to silence the federal, when not exercised, supports the claim that Congress has acquiesced in the general run of the courts' decisions and, hence, lends democratic legitimacy to these nonmajoritarion tribunals.

A revisionist strand of Article III scholarship has developed, arguing for substantial constitutional restraints on Congress's power to shape federal jurisdiction. The claims for such restraints group around two propositions: first, that the Constitution secures a core function for the federal judiciary against congressional interference; and second, that Congress cannot act to reduce federal jurisdiction selectively out of manifest hostility to federal judicial doctrine.

Henry Hart, in a famous written dialogue on Congress's jurisdiction-limiting authority, first argued that there was an essential role of the Supreme Court that Congress could not constitutionally impair. Leonard Ratner has given more concrete content and support to what is called the "essential functions" thesis, arguing that the demands of supremacy and uniformity require that the Supreme Court be available to review all matters of federal legal substance. Although lacking in explicit textual support in its Hart-Ratner form, the essential-functions thesis can draw support from the commitment of the Constitutional Convention and its product, the Constitution, to subordinate the states to federal authority and to do so through the federal judicial process. In some of its variations, the thesis can also draw support from congressional precedent: in the course of two centuries of meandering Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction, the Court has always been permitted jurisdiction to review unrequited claims of constitutional right against state and local conduct.

A structurally distinct form of the essential-functions thesis has also emerged, attached not to the Supreme Court alone but to the Article III federal judiciary as a whole. The claim is that there are certain matters for which some Article III court must be provided. Only in default of Congress's having provided a lower federal court with jurisdiction over these matters does the Constitution require that the Supreme Court be available to them. Although given modern voice in the past decade, this appears to have been Alexander Hamilton's view, as reflected in The Federalist #82, and is familially related to Justice JOSEPH STORY's views in MARTIN V. HUNTER'S LESSEE (1816). The scholars who have been attracted to this version of the essential-functions thesis have regarded it as better supported by legally relevant materials. This author, in the first modern statement of this form of the essential-functions thesis, has argued that Article III's textually explicit commitment to an independent judiciary can be honored only if politically sensitive cases—those involving claims of constitutional right being the strongest possible candidates—are assured review in an Article III forum. Robert Clinton has argued from a close analysis of events at the Constitutional Convention that the Framers intended to oblige Congress to distribute all Article III jurisdiction among the federal courts and used the "exceptions and regulations" language only to permit Congress to distribute Article III matters among Article III courts. Akhil Amar, observing, in effect, that every instance of the word "cases" in Article III is modified by a preceding "all," has argued that the first three items on the Article III menu—those styled as categories of "cases"—are textually required to be assigned to some Article III court.

The alternative revisionist claim, that Congress cannot act to reduce federal jurisdiction selectively out of manifest hostility to federal judicial doctrine, has been advanced on a number of connected grounds. Laurence Tribe has borrowed equal-protection analysis from the HUNTER V. ERICKSON (1969) tradition to argue that it is unconstitutional for Congress to burden the exercise of particular constitutional rights by depriving those who claim such rights the benefits of a federal forum. John Hart Ely has argued that the motive of Congress in such cases—hostility to federal judicial doctrine—is impermissible and can serve to invalidate selective removals of jurisdiction. This author has argued that some selective deprivations of jurisdiction carry the appearance of congressional hostility to controversial constitutional claims, invite the disregard of those claims, and are for that reason unconstitutional.

Although the best possible protection against untoward congressional manipulation of federal jurisdiction is the sound judgment of Congress, there is a growing, but still much disputed, view among academic commentators that the Constitution protects against a lapse of congressional responsibility here as elsewhere.

LAWRENCE G. SAGER
(1992)

Bibliography

AMAR, AKHIL 1985 A Neo-Federalist View of Article III: Separating the Two Tiers of Federal Jurisdiction. Boston University Law Review 65:205–272.

BATOR, PAUL M. 1982 Congressional Power over the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts. Villanova Law Review 27:1030–1041.

CLINTON, ROBERT L. 1984 A Mandatory View of Federal Court Jurisdiction: A Guided Quest for the Original Understanding. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 132:741–866.

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1974 Congressional Authority to Restrict Lower Federal Court Jurisdiction. Yale Law Journal 83: 498–533.

GUNTHER, GERALD 1984 Congressional Power to Curtail Federal Court Jurisdiction: An Opinionated Guide to the Ongoing Debate. Stanford Law Review 36:895–922.

HART, HENRY M., JR. 1953 The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic. Harvard Law Review 66:1362–1402.

REDISH, MARTIN H. and WOODS, CURTIS E. 1975 Congressional Power to Control the Jurisdiction of Lower Federal Courts: A Critical Review and a New Synthesis. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 124:45–109.

SAGER, LAWRENCE GENE 1981 Foreword: Constitutional Limitations on Congress' Authority to Regulate the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts. Harvard Law Review 16:129–156.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1981 Jurisdictional Gerrymandering: Zoning Disfavored Rights Out of the Federal Courts. Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 16:129–156.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1965 The Courts and the Constitution. Columbia Law Review 65:1001–1014.

JURISDICTION, FEDERAL
(Update)

In the 1990s, there have been two notable statutes, and one bill not yet enacted, regulating the jurisdiction of the federal courts to accomplish particular policy goals.

The ANTITERRORISM AND EFFECTIVE DEATH PENALTY ACT OF 1996 cuts back federal HABEAS CORPUS for state prisoners and limits JUDICIAL REVIEW in deportation proceedings against ALIENS. In habeas cases, the act limits the APPELLATE JURISDICTION of the Supreme Court. A prisoner whose first habeas petition has been denied may file a second petition only if authorized to do so by the court of appeals, and a denial of authorization may not be appealed to the Supreme Court. In Felker v. Turpin (1996), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of this provision, finding that the act had not entirely eliminated review because the prisoner still had a right to file an original habeas petition in the Supreme Court. This construction of the act allowed the Supreme Court to avoid the constitutional question that would have been presented if Supreme Court review had been entirely foreclosed. In deportation proceedings, the act eliminates all appellate review of deportation orders against aliens who have committed certain crimes. The CIRCUIT COURTS have sustained the constitutionality of this provision, but only on the understanding that habeas corpus remains available as a means to challenge the deportations. The Supreme Court has not yet addressed the issue.

The Prison Litigation and Reform Act of 1995 makes litigation more difficult for prisoners seeking better prison conditions. The act limits the "remedial jurisdiction" of courts by imposing stringent new criteria on future injunctions reforming prison conditions and by terminating previously entered CONSENT DECREES that do not comply with the criteria. As of the summer of 1999, six courts of appeals had sustained the constitutionality of the act, and one court of appeals had struck down the termination provision as a violation of constitutional SEPARATION OF POWERS. The Supreme Court had not yet addressed the issue.

The proposed Judicial Reform Act of 1998 would, if enacted, require a three-judge district court for any constitutional challenge to a state voter INITIATIVE. Such a challenge is now heard by a single district judge. The bill would represent a partial return to a jurisdictional structure that existed between 1910 and 1976. The 1910 statute was enacted in response to EX PARTE YOUNG (1908), which allowed a single district judge to enjoin the enforcement of state laws found by that judge to be unconstitutional. The current bill was introduced in the wake of a decision by a district judge (later reversed by the court of appeals) enjoining the enforcement of California's anti-AFFIRMATIVE ACTION initiative.

In all three instances, Congress has sought to achieve relatively narrow policy goals by changes in the jurisdictional structure of the federal courts. The Supreme Court has given little indication that it will find either of the two acts unconstitutional, and there is no doubt that if enacted, a modern three-judge court statute would survive constitutional scrutiny.

WILLIAM A. FLETCHER
(2000)

Bibliography

NOTE 1997 The Constitutional Requirement of Judicial Review for Administrative Deportation Decisions. Harvard Law Review 110:1850–1867.

TUSHNET, MARK 1996 "The King of France with Forty Thousand Men": Felker v. Turpin and the Supreme Court's Deliberative Processes. Supreme Court Review 1996:163–190.

TUSHNET, MARK and YACKLE, LARRY 1997 Symbolic Statutes and Real Laws: The Pathologies of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act and the Prison Litigation Reform Act. Duke Law Journal 1997:1–86.

JURISDICTION AND REMOVAL ACT

See: Judiciary Act of 1875

JURISDICTION TO TAX

Prior to the adoption of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, the Supreme Court derived from principles "inhering in the very nature of constitutional government" the rule that states do not have jurisdiction to impose taxes upon persons, things, or activities outside their borders. In modern times, such limits on the legislative jurisdiction of states are derived from the DUE PROCESS clause.

The jurisdictional limitations have been applied in a variety of settings. A state may not impose a property tax on real or tangible personal property physically located in another state, even though the owner of the property is domiciled and present in the taxing state. However, where movable instrumentalities of commerce—railroad rolling stock, ships, trucks, airplanes—are involved, a state is not limited to taxing those instrumentalities actually in the state on tax day. Instead, the state may use a formula to compute the average presence of such instrumentalities within the state. Such apportionment formulas have been upheld so long as they fairly allocate values to the taxing state.

Property taxes imposed on intangibles—such as stocks and bonds—are not subject to similar limitations. The Court initially permitted the state of domicile of the owner to tax the total value of such intangibles, reasoning that intangible property is often held secretly and might otherwise escape taxation entirely. During the 1920s and 1930s the Court attempted to derive rules that would prevent the multiple taxation of intangibles, but eventually it came to hold that any state within which some interest in an intangible exists can tax. For example, if stocks are held in a trust, the state of domicile of the trustee, the state of domicile of the beneficiary, and the state where the certificates are located may each impose a tax on the total value.

Domicile of the taxpayer is an adequate jurisdictional basis for taxing net income from property and activities outside the state. The only constitutional limitation is the COMMERCE CLAUSE. Nondomiciliary states may also tax the income arising from property and activities within their borders subject to two limitations. A 1959 federal statute (section 381, Title 18, United States Code) provides that a state may not impose a net INCOME TAX if the taxpayer does no more within the state than solicit orders to be delivered from without the state by common carrier. Formulas used to apportion income must not have the effect of reaching out and taxing values beyond the state.

The long-standing rule that states may not levy sales taxes when the seller is in another state and does no more than solicit orders in the taxing state is justified in jurisdictional terms. The buyer's state cannot impose the tax because to do so would be to project its powers beyond its boundaries. A use tax, resting on the purchaser within the state, however, is within the jurisdiction of the buyer's state. But in order to collect use taxes effectively, the buyer's state must be able to compel the seller to collect and remit the tax. The Supreme Court holds that such a duty of collection can be imposed only when there is some definite link, some minimum connection (such as ownership of property or the presence of solicitors or other employees) between the seller and the state.

Often jurisdictional and commerce problems overlap. For example, if a state seeks to tax income of an interstate business attributable to activities outside the state, the tax can be invalidated either as an assertion of jurisdiction over out-of-state activities or as disadvantaging INTERSTATE COMMERCE because more than one state taxes the same income.

EDWARD L. BARRET, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

HELLERSTEIN, JEROME R. 1968 Recent Developments in State Tax Apportionment and the Circumscription of Unitary Business. National Tax Journal 21:487–503.

NOTE 1975 Developments in the Law: Federal Limitations on State Taxation of Interstate Business. Harvard Law Review 75:953–1036.

JURISPRUDENCE AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Constitutional jurisprudence is the most abstract and philosophical part of CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY. We may divide the subject into general areas or departments, although these areas will be densely interconnected. The most general division is between "foundational" and "interpretive" constitutional jurisprudence.

Foundational constitutional jurisprudence considers abstract normative questions about ideal constitutional structure. Is a written political CONSTITUTION better than a conventional or informal one? Does the best constitutional structure vest EXECUTIVE POWER in a president independent of the legislature, as the American Constitution does? Would it have been better to adopt the British practice that vests executive power in the head of the party that controls the legislature? Should a constitution protect the interests of individual citizens against the wishes or interests of the majority? If so, which interests should it protect? Should it protect economic interests, for example? Should it deny either the national or state government power to raise taxes for purposes of redistributing the wealth? Should the constitution guarantee moral liberty or independence? Should it ensure homosexuals their own SEXUAL ORIENTATION? Should it ensure women freedom of ABORTION?

Most of these questions raise issues of philosophical depth. What reasons could justify granting individuals legal rights of immunity from a decision a majority of citizens want, for example? Two answers are common among philosophers, and these answers lead to different conclusions about which individual rights a constitution should protect. The first is instrumental: It holds that constitutional rights are legitimate if, but only if, recognizing and enforcing the right produces an aggregate benefit for the community as a whole. Some philosophers have argued in favor of a constitutionally protected right to FREEDOM OF SPEECH on this instrumental ground, for example. They argue that protecting free speech for individuals benefits the community as a whole by providing it with valuable information, challenge, and debate.

The second answer insists that constitutional rights are justified not because they produce aggregate benefits, but because they protect rights that individuals have on intrinsic moral grounds. Under this latter view, people have rights as "trumps" over collective-interests goals. Obviously, these different views about the ground of constitutional rights produce different views about their scope. An instrumental approach to free speech, for example, will not support extending this right to speech that has little or no chance of producing collective benefit, even indirectly or in the long term—to racist or obscene speech, for example, or to speech that calls for revolutionary or illiberal change. But someone who thinks that people have an inherent right to express their opinions, even in circumstances in which it is against the interests of their community for them to do so, would not use this test for limiting freedom of speech.

Another independent distinction is of great importance in foundational jurisprudence: the distinction between procedural issues of fairness and substantive issues of justice. The question as to whether an ideal constitution would grant individuals a right of choice in sexual orientation, for example, raises both sorts of issues. Some might deny that individuals should have a right even in principle; they might believe that every society should force its members to follow the traditional moral code with which most citizens identify because this is the best way to preserve the proper sense of communal integrity and unity. But even if they do not believe this—even if they think that a society of this sort would be deeply unjust—they still might resist a constitutional right to sexual independence on grounds of procedural fairness. They might say that democracy is the only acceptable form of government, and that it is undemocratic to use a constitution to prevent the majority from having the law it thinks best, even when the majority is profoundly wrong. This last claim—that individual constitutional rights are undemocratic—is one of the two most widely discussed issues of foundational constitutional jurisprudence in America and will be discussed further.

The second, interpretive part of constitutional jurisprudence considers issues closer to those of traditional jurisprudence and also closer to constitutional legal practice. It asks not what constitution would be ideal but what constitution we actually have, both in general and in detail. The central question of interpretive jurisprudence is a methodological one. It is only indirectly concerned with the right answer to the substantive questions the Supreme Court must eventually decide, like the question as to how far the Constitution as it stands, properly interpreted, now grants individuals constitutional rights to free speech, abortion, or economic protection. Interpretive jurisprudence is concerned, rather, with the strategies of investigation and argument that should be used to answer these questions.

The clauses of the Constitution that grant individual rights are drafted in very abstract language. The FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, for example, says that no state may deny DUE PROCESS OF LAW or EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAW. How should lawyers and judges decide whether the legal effect of that language is to create a constitutional right for blacks to attend integrated rather than segregated schools, for whites to resist AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, or for a woman to have an abortion when she and her doctor believe it necessary or desirable? One answer, which is particularly popular among conservative politicians, insists that CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION can only be a matter of discovering and respecting the wishes of those who made the Constitution, who are often called, compendiously, the "Framers." Did the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment intend blacks (or whites or women) to have such a constitutional right? If so, then the correct interpretation of the amendment's legal force includes that right; but if not, then it does not.

The question as to whether this ORIGINAL INTENT method of constitutional interpretation is appropriate is the second of the two most debated issues of constitutional jurisprudence and will be further discussed. Two other answers to the methological question as to how the abstract language of the Constitution should be interpreted each have support among constitutional lawyers and teachers. "Passivism" holds that when the language of the Constitution is abstract or its legal effect is for another reason unclear or debatable, then it should be interpreted to interfere least with the power of state or national legislators or other political officials to do what they think best for the community. Passivism presupposes the foundational thesis that individual constitutional rights are in principle antidemocratic. It therefore acts to shrink the scope of such rights whenever possible.

The method of "integrity" presupposes a very different interpretive attitude: the Constitution is not just a set of discrete political decisions allocating power in different ways but a system of principle. It therefore insists that each of the abstract clauses and provisions should be interpreted and applied in a way that makes it coherent in principle with accepted interpretations of other parts of the Constitution and with principles of political morality that provide the best available foundational justification for the constitutional structure as a whole.

This brief and schematic discussion illustrates the inevitable interconnections between foundational and interpretive issues. Although the original-understanding method denies that foundational morality should figure prominently in constitutional interpretation, it cannot be applied without relying on controversial foundational positions, as will be discussed. The passivist method presupposes a contoversial foundational position about the conflict between CONSTITUTIONALISM and democracy, and the method of integrity insists that foundational morality must play an overt, although limited, role in detailed constitutional interpretation.

The Constitution contains both structural and disabling provisions. The structural provisions describe the various branches of the national government, provide methods for electing or selecting their members, and define the powers of these institutions and officials vis-à-vis the institutions and officials of the various states. These structural provisions constitute the American form of democracy; they create government by the people. In contrast, the disabling provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS and the Civil War amendments, like the FIRST AMENDMENT and the due process clause and the equal protection clause, set limits to the overall authority of elected officials. Many lawyers and politicans believe these provisions impede government by the people and are undemocratic for that reason.

Some who take this view regard this friction as a cardinal defect of our constitutional system. They argue that the antidemocratic provisions should be narrowly interpreted to give individuals as few trumps over majority decision as possible. Other lawyers who agree that the disabling provisions are antidemocratic do not agree this is a cause for regret; they believe that a limited democracy is superior to a pure one simply because the former respects individual rights. Is the assumption both these views share—that the Constitution impedes as well as creates democracy—correct? This depends on what we take democracy to be.

Democracy is collective government by the people. But which sense of collective is meant? There are two kinds of collective actions—statistical and communal—and our conception of democracy will turn on which kind we take democratic government to require. Collective action is statistical when what the group does is only a matter of some function—rough or specific—of what the individual members of the group do on their own, that is, with no sense of doing something as a group. In contrast, collective action is communal, when it cannot be reduced to some statistical function of individual action because it is collective in the deeper sense that requires individuals to assume the existence of the group as a separate entity or phenomenon. An orchestra can play a symphony, although a single musician cannot. This is a case of communal rather than statistical action because it is essential to an orchestral performance, not just that a specified function of musicians each plays some appropriate score, but that the musicians play as an orchestra, each intending to make a contribution to the performance of the group and not just as isolated individual recitations.

On the statistical understanding, democracy is government according to the wishes of a majority or at least a plurality of the eligible voters. Under communal understanding, democracy is government by distinct entity—the people as such—rather than any set of individuals one by one. These two conceptions of democracy take different views of the distinction previously drawn between the structural and disabling provisions of the Constitution. By the statistical reading, structural provisions are mainly limited to those that are procedurally structural—those that define how members of Congress are elected, what proportion of them it takes to enact legislation, and so forth. By the communal conception, the structural provisions include not only those that are procedurally structural in these ways but also provisions needed to create a genuine political community that can be understood to be acting as a collective unit of political responsibility. A genuine community is one in which government is not only of and for the majority, but of and for all the people, and a genuine community will therefore need to insure not only that each citizen have an opportunity to participate in political decisions through a vote, but that each decision allows each citizen equal concern and respect.

Several of the apparently disabling constitutional provisions can be understood as necessary to guarantee equal respect and concern and, therefore, to be functionally structural rather than disabling of democracy understood by the communal conception. The First Amendment guarantee of free speech, for example, might be thought necessary not only to full and equal participation, but to equal respect as well, and the equal protection clause can be interpreted as requiring equality of concern for all citizens in the deliberations that produce political decisions. Thus, the foundational question of constitutional jurisprudence—whether and how far the Constitution is undemocratic—is actually a deep question that draws on the most fundamental parts of moral and POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY.

But how should lawyers and judges decide whether some state or statute violates the requirement that states follow "due" process, deny no one the "equal" protection of the laws, or avoid punishments that are cruel and unusual? The original-understanding thesis insists that abstract constitutional provisions should be interpreted to have only the force that the Framers intended or expected them to have. Although this thesis has generally been rejected in Supreme Court practice, lawyers and politicians have offered various arguments in its support. Some say, for example, that because the Framers were the people whose decision made the Constitution our FUNDAMENTAL LAW, their convictions about its correct application should be respected.

We must recognize three points about this kind of argument, however. First, any such argument for the original-understanding thesis necessarily draws on normative assumptions about the proper allocation of authority in a democracy among remote constitutional architects, contemporary legislators, and past and contemporary judges. Second, these normative assumptions cannot be justified, without the most blatant and absurd circularity, by appealing to the intentions, wishes, or decisions of the people whose authority they propose to describe. It would absurd to argue that judges should respect the expectations of the Framers because the Framers expected that they would or believed or decided that they should.

The third point is particularly important: Such arguments, even if supported by independent normative assumptions, are radically incomplete if they purport to establish only the general proposition that lawyers and judges should respect the Framers' wishes or intentions. In most pertinent cases, the question at issue is not whether judges should respect the convictions of the Framers but which of their convictions judges should respect, and how. Suppose the following historical information is discovered: All the framers of the equal-protection clause believed, as a matter of political conviction, that people should all be equal in the eye of the law and the state. They were convinced that certain forms of official RACIAL DISCRIMINATION against blacks were morally wrong for that reason, and they adopted the amendment mainly to prevent states from discrimination against blacks in those ways. They agreed, for example, that it would be morally wrong for a state to create certain special remedies for breach of contract and make these remedies available to white plaintiffs, but not black ones. The framers assumed that the clause they were adopting would prohibit that form of discrimination.

They also shared certain opnions about which forms of official discrimination were not wrong and would not be prohibited by the clause. They shared the views, for example, that racial SEGREGATION of public schools did not violate the clause. (Many of them, in fact, voted to segregate schools.) None of them even considered the possibility that state institutions would one day adopt affirmative-action RACIAL QUOTAS designed to repair the damages of past segregation; therefore, none of them had any opinion about whether such quotas would violate the clause. Some of them thought that laws that discriminate in favor of men treat women unjustly. Most framers of the equal protection clause did not outlaw the gender-based distinctions then common. Most of them thought that homosexual acts were grossly immoral and would have been mystified by the suggestion that laws prohibiting such acts constituted an unjustified form of discrimination.

Many contemporary lawyers and judges think that some or all these concrete convictions are inconsistent with the framers' more abstract intention to establish a society of equal citizenship. Almost everyone now agrees, for example, that racially segregated schools are inconsistent with this ideal. Many people think that affirmative action is inconsistent with the ideal as well, and many people, although not necessarily the same people, think that laws that subordinate women or homosexuals violate the ideal. If a contemporary judge believes that the framers' concrete convictions were inconsistent with their abstract ones on one or more of these matters because the framers of the clause did not reach the correct conclusions about the moral consequences of their own principles, then that judge has a choice to make. It is unhelpful to tell him or her to follow the framers' intentions. The judge needs to know which intentions—at how general a level of abstraction—he or she should follow and why.

In other words, a judge can compose sharply different versions of the original understanding of the equal protection clause, each of which has support in the collection of framers' convictions and expectations. The judge might adopt a reductive version that emphasizes the framers' concrete opinions and hold that the clause condemns only the cases of discrimination that the framers of the clause collectively expected it to condemn. So understood, the clause forbids discrimination against blacks in legal remedy for breach of contract, but it does not forbid racially segregated schools, affirmative-action quotas that disadvantage whites, or discrimination against women or homosexuals. Or, the judge might adopt an abstract version of the original understanding that emphasizes the framers' general conviction to provide equal citizenship, properly understood, for all Americans. Under this version, if we assume that equality is in fact denied by school segregation, quota systems, or laws that subordinate people on the basis of gender or sexual orientation, the clause condemns these discriminations, despite what the framers themselves thought or would have approved.

The important choice judges and other interpreters of the Constitution must make, therefore, is not between the original understanding and some other method of interpretation but between reductive and abstract versions of the original understanding. Many proponents of the original-understanding method have not made this choice coherently; they believe the equal protection clause outlaws racial segregation and affirmative action quotas, but does not outlaw laws discriminating against women or homosexuals, for example. Lawyers and judges must not only choose between the reductive and abstract versions coherently but also on principle, that is, with adequate support in foundational jurisprudence. The passivist interpretive method, which supports the choice of reductive understanding of the framers' intention, is based on the statistical conception of democracy and, accordingly, fails if this conception is rejected. The method of integrity, which presupposes an abstract understanding, is based on a communal conception in which individual rights are not subversive, but constitutive of genuine democracy. Even at the practical level of adjudication, constitutional law is deeply embedded in political philosophy.

RONALD DWORKIN
(1992)

Bibliography

DWORKIN, RONALD 1985 A Matter of Principle. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1986 Law's Empire. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.

PERRY, MICHAEL J. 1988 Morality, Politics, and Law. New York: Oxford University Press.

JURORS AND THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH

See: Witnesses, Jurors, and the Freedom of Speech

JURY

See: Blue Ribbon Jury; Grand Jury; Petit Jury; Trial by Jury

JURY CHALLENGES

See: Peremptory Challenges

JURY DISCRIMINATION

Jury discrimination was first recognized as a constitutional problem shortly after the CIVIL WAR, when certain southern and border states excluded blacks from jury service. The Supreme Court had little difficulty in holding such blatant RACIAL DISCRIMINATION invalid as a denial of the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS guaranteed by the recently adopted FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. But, beyond such obvious improprieties, what should the principle of nondiscrimination forbid? Some kinds of "discrimination" in the selection of the jury are not bad but good: for example, those incompetent to serve ought to be excused from service, whether their incompetence arises from mental or physical defect, from demonstrably bad character, or from bias. No one has seriously argued that American jury service ought to be determined wholly by lot, as it was among the citizens of Athens. In addition, it has been the uniform policy of American jurisdictions to excuse from service some who are competent, but whose service would work a hardship on them or others: doctors, ministers, and parents who care for small children have been exempted from service on such grounds.

The history of the constitutional law regulating jury composition has been a story of expanding and compulsory democratization. In our early national history property and voting qualifications were common, and women were systematically excluded or exempted from jury service. At COMMON LAW, indeed, special juries were sometimes employed: a jury of merchants to decide certain kinds of mercantile questions, for example, or in the trial of an ALIEN, a jury half of which spoke his language. Even in the early and middle decades of this century, the Supreme Court upheld against constitutional attack a BLUE RIBBON JURY system, by which jurors were selected supposedly for intelligence and character in a way that resulted in the vast overrepresentation of professional and business classes, in Fay v. New York (1947); a highly discretionary and easily abused "key man" system for selecting potential jurors by consultation with community leaders, in SWAIN V. ALABAMA (1965); and the voluntary exemption of women from jury service, in Hoyt v. Florida (1961). At present, however, a federal statute requires that the federal jury be drawn from a pool that represents a "fair cross section of the community," and a similar constitutional standard has been imposed by the Supreme Court on the states as well, in TAYLOR V. LOUISIANA (1975).

There are normally three stages in the selection of an American jury at which improper discrimination may occur: the establishment of the master list of all persons eligible for jury service within the JURISDICTION of a particular court (this is called the jury roll); the selection of the panel of potential jurors (called the venire) who will be asked to appear at the courthouse; and the selection from that panel of those who will actually serve on a jury in a particular case or set of cases. The question of discrimination can arise in both civil and criminal cases, but the courts have paid far more attention to the criminal jury. Two distinct provisions of the Constitution of the United States bear upon jury selection: the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and the SIXTH AMENDMENT.

In STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1879) and NEAL V. DELAWARE (1880) the Court held that the equal protection clause forbade a state to try a black defendant by a jury from which members of his race had been affirmatively excluded, either by statute or by administrative practice. A federal statute passed shortly after the Civil War made such discrimination a crime.

In Hernandez v. Texas (1954), dealing with the exclusion of Mexican Americans, the Supreme Court extended the Strauder ruling to other ethnic groups. On the other hand, the Court has repeatedly said that the Constitution does not entitle a defendant to a jury that consists in whole or in part of members of his race, or of any other particular composition. The idea of the jury affirmed in these cases is not that it is a microcosm of society at large, but that it is an institution of justice for which participants may properly be required to be qualified. The equal protection clause does not guarantee a particular mix but protects only against improper exclusions.

What exclusions, beyond racial ones, are improper? In Hernandez the Court said that where any group in a community is systematically discriminated against it will need the protection of the Constitution, and added: "Whether such a group exists within a community is a question of fact. When the existence of a distinct class is demonstrated, and it is further shown that the laws, as written or as applied, single out that class for different treatment not based upon some reasonable classification, the guarantees of the Constitution have been violated." But what is a reasonable classification? This question is complicated by the fact that the law has traditionally imposed qualifications for jury service which may, or may not, have differential impact on racial or other protected groups. The Court has accordingly upheld, against equal protection attack, qualifications for jury service that are extremely vague and easily susceptible to abuse—"generally reputed to be honest and intelligent . . . esteemed in the community for their integrity, good character, and good judgment." The burden is on the defendant to show that such qualifications have in fact been abused. Generally speaking, racially disproportionate impact alone is not enough to invalidate a classification under the equal protection clause: actual intent to discriminate must be proved, by direct or circumstantial evidence, as the Court held in WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976). But in jury discrimination, proof of a substantial disproportionality in racial (or sexual) balance between the jury pool and the community at large constitutes a prima facie case of intentional discrimination which the government must rebut. (The Sixth Amendment is more protective than the equal protection clause, in those cases to which it applies, for it has no intent requirement, and the Court held in Duren v. Missouri (1979) that it not only prohibits discrimination but affirmatively requires that the pool from which the jury is drawn contain a "fair cross section" of the relevant community.)

Who may object to an improper exclusion? In Peters v. Kiff (1972), the Supreme Court held that any defendant is entitled to object to improper exclusions from the panel from which his jury is selected, whether or not he is a member of the excluded race. In addition, the Court held in Carter v. Jury Commission of Greene County (1976) that members of the excluded race who wish to serve on juries are entitled to bring independent proceedings to attack their exclusion, for they are deprived of equal protection with respect to an important right of CITIZENSHIP.

A separate source of constitutional restrictions on jury discrimination is the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of an "impartial jury" in criminal cases. DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968) held that this provision, which originally applied only to the federal government, was "incorporated" within the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause, and thus was applicable to the states as well. (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.) In Taylor v. Louisiana the Court held that the concept of the jury as a "fair cross section of the community" was at the core of the Sixth Amendment and thus applicable to the states. Thus exclusions will be tested not merely under the equal protection clause, which focuses on improper exclusions, but by the affirmative "cross section" principle. The latter principle conceives of the jury not as a group of citizens who are qualified for a task and chosen in a manner free from INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION, but as a body fairly chosen from a group that represents the community of which it is a part.

But what does "fairly chosen" mean? The federal statute requires that the jury roll reflect a fair cross section of the community, and that the venire be drawn at random from the roll; this scheme meets any standard of fairness. The courts might impose similar standards on the states. But there remains the crucial stage at which the particular jury panel is selected from the venire, and none of the rulings cited above speak to this matter. This selection is made just before trial in a process in which lawyers and the judge cooperate. Certain jurors are excused "for cause," that is, because there are good reasons why they should not sit in the particular case: admitted bias, acquaintance with one of the parties, and so on. In addition, the parties are allowed a limited number of discretioniary, or "peremptory," challenges to other potential jurors. What happens if the prosecution should exercise its peremptory challenges to keep blacks or women off the jury? If that can be done with impunity, the insistence upon fairness at the other stages of jury selection becomes an empty ritual; but how can a discriminatory exercise of peremptory challenges be established? To require the prosecutor to accept any juror of a particular race or class would be unfair to the state, and upset the balance of the selection process. The Supreme Court held in Swain v. Alabama that the use of peremptory challenges against potential minority jurors is not always unconstitutional, but that systematic racial discrimination is impermissible under the equal protection clause. In Batson v. Kentucky (1986) the Court partially overruled Swain, holding that a prosecutor cannot constitutionally use peremptory challenges to exclude potential jurors solely on account of their race. If the circumstances raise an inference of such a use of peremptory challenges, the burden shifts to the state to provide "a neutral explanation" for the exclusions.

The effect of the antidiscrimination holdings has also been undercut by the Supreme Court's decision in APODACA V. OREGON (1972) that the states are not required to insist upon unanimous verdicts. (See JURY UNANIMITY.) Even if some members of a discriminated-against class make it to the jury, Apodaca means that their views can be disregarded by the majority. On the other hand, the proposition that jurors of the defendant's race or sex will be especially likely to vote for him is an assumption more easily made than proved, and arguably demeaning both to the jurors and to the class to which they belong. And even minority jurors who are outvoted will have a chance to have their views considered. The true basis of the fair cross-section requirement is assurance of the kind of diversity of view and experience that will most advance the kind of collective decision making that, as Harry Kalven and Hans Zeisel show, represents the jury at its best.

As for the distinct institution known as the GRAND JURY, which sits before trial to decide whether the evidence of a particular defendant's guilt is sufficient to justify his INDICTMENT, racial discrimination in its selection is also a violation of the equal protection clause. The indicted individual is entitled to the dismissal of his indictment, as the Court held in Carter v. Texas (1900), even though in some sense the defect may be thought to be cured by a properly composed trial jury. The Court has not applied the affirmative "fair cross section" requirements to the state grand jury, nor indeed, as the Court held in HURTADO

V. CALIFORNIA (1884), are the states required to employ the institution of the grand jury at all. Discrimination in the selection of state grand juries remains regulated by the equal protection clause, which forbids only intentional discrimination. The federal statute does apply the "fair cross section" requirement to federal grand juries as well as trial juries.

The continued existence of both the grand jury and the trial jury appears to rest on two assumptions. First, judicial decisions, especially in criminal cases, are assumed to be more just when they are not left to professionals but are also influenced by the views of ordinary people. Second, jury service—again, especially in the criminal process—is seen as popular participation in government. Our constitutional protections against discriminatory selection of jurors are aimed at promoting the ends of justice and the ideal of citizenship.

JAMES BOYD WHITE
(1986)

Bibliography

JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES 1961 The Jury System in the Federal Courts. Federal Rules Decisions 26: 411–504.

KALVEN, HARRY and ZEISEL, HANS 1966 The American Jury. Boston: Little, Brown.

LARUE, L. H. 1976 A Jury of One's Peers. Washington & Lee Law Review 33:841–876.

JURY DISCRIMINATION
(Update)

The problem of improper discrimination in the jury selection process was considered repeatedly by the Supreme Court throughout the 1990s. Since its decision in BATSON V. KENTUCKY (1986) involving race-based jury selection in criminal cases, the Court has decided a dozen or so cases involving claims that impermissible selection criteria have been used to constitute GRAND JURIES and, more commonly, PETIT JURIES. Most of the cases have focused on the PEREMPTORY CHALLENGE device, and the way in which it may be used by lawyers to remove members of disfavored groups from serving on petit juries. Certainly, most observers would agree that trail courts often find it difficult, if not impossible, to police lawyers' use of peremptories to ensure that an impermissible criterion such as race is not motivating challenges. For this reason, many have argued that the peremptory challenge device itself— which has historical but not constitutional foundation— should be abandoned as a prophylactic matter, to make good Batson's promise of racial equality in criminal jury decisionmaking. This prophylactic argument seems even more forceful now that the Court, in J. E. B. v. Alabama (1994), has extended the reasoning of Batson to invalidate gender-based peremptories as well. As the Court is faced with challenges to more and more arguably impermissible criteria in the selection and constitution of juries, such as age, class, and SEXUAL ORIENTATION, the Court may have an increasingly harder time reconciling the peremptory challenge device with the inclusionary impulse that has characterized most of the Court's jurisprudence in the last half-century concerning access to political participation. The more the Court thinks and writes about JURY SERVICE AS A POLITICAL RIGHT, the more the Court will be constrained to hold various selection criteria to be impermissible, and the more vulnerable the practice of peremptories will become.

Two underdiscussed aspects of the modern jury exclusion cases are their STATE ACTION and STANDING analyses. As to state action, in Batson the race-based peremptories were exercised by a state prosecutor, so that government action was apparent. But what about peremptories exercised by private criminal defense counsel, or by plaintiffs' counsel and defense counsel in civil cases? The Court has found state action in all these circumstances, emphasizing that the trial judge—undoubtedly a state actor—is the person who formally implements the peremptory challenge, regardless of the private character of the lawyer who may initiate it. Perhaps more crucial is a recognition that picking jurors, like picking voters, is quintessentially a public function, so that the state cannot avoid constitutional constraints by delegating the selection process to private lawyers.

As to standing, the Court has held that litigants, regardless of their race, have third-party standing to assert the rights of excluded black would-be jurors. Behind these standing holdings is the idea that courts cannot presume that black jurors would be sympathetic to the interests of black litigants alone. On the one hand, this notion is in perfect keeping with the Court's emerging colorblind constitutional vision most forcefully articulated in the racial restricting cases such as SHAW V. RENO (1993) AND ITS PROGENY. In these cases, the Court has explicitly stated that government may not constitutionally presume that persons of one race will, because of their race, have any distinct viewpoint and exercise voting and other political power to support particular persons or political causes. On the other hand, a number of earlier lines of Court authority had suggested that racial minorities could be assumed to hold distinct political points of view, at least in the main. These earlier cases involved topics such as minority vote dilution, restructuring of political decisionmaking processes, and exclusion of women and blacks from juries. The modern Court's insistence that government not think nor act based on assumptions about racial minority group political attitudes is also in tension with the history of the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT itself. The drafters and ratifiers of the Fifteenth Amendment assumed, expected, and indeed counted on the idea that, when it comes to political activity, voters, because of their race, would—to use the Court's words in Shaw—"think alike, share the same political interests, and prefer the same candidates at the polls." Whether the insistence of the REHNQUIST COURT on colorblindness is justifiable or not, the Court certainly has not adequately explained how its modern reasoning fits in with this constitutional tradition and history. When this tradition is taken into account, arguments could be made that not each and every instance of governmental RACE-CONSCIOUSNESS in the political-rights realm is equally constitutionally problematic.

VIKRAM D. AMAR
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Hunter v. Erickson; Voting Rights.)

Bibliography

ABRAMSON, JEFFREY 1994 We the Jury: The Jury System and the Ideal of Democracy. New York: Basic Books.

AMAR, VIKRAM DAVID 1995 Jury Service as Political Participation Akin to Voting. Cornell Law Review 80:203–259.

JURY NULLIFICATION

Jury nullification occurs when the prosecutor convinces a jury beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT that the defendant committed the crime charged, but the jury nevertheless decides to acquit. Also called an "acquittal against the evidence," nullification represents a conclusion by the jurors that the literal application of the penal law would be inappropriate on the facts presented, and they thus effectively "nullify" the criminal law by refusing to convict.

There are many reasons a jury might nullify, but cases where the power is exercised generally fall into one of two groups. The first is when the jury decides that the law itself is unfair or unpopular, regardless of what the defendant has done. Juries have acquitted against the evidence when defendants were charged with minor vice crimes like gambling, liquor law violations, or other offenses that are sufficiently common or underenforced that a conviction of one offender seems unfair. Crimes that carry an especially harsh sentence are also candidates for nullification. The Supreme Court has recognized, for example, that when crimes carried a mandatory death penalty, some juries preferred to acquit a factually guilty defendant rather than impose CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. More recent examples include a refusal to convict a defendant accused of simple possession of drugs, where the prescribed punishment is severe and mandatory.

The second, and more common, group of cases is when the law itself is uncontroversial, but there is something about the defendant that makes an acquittal seem appropriately merciful. Cases where the defendant's motives seemed good, or where the defendant has already suffered great harm can result in nullification—a mercy killing, or a parent's negligent killing of his or her own child, for example. Other instances include cases in which the police officers or prosecutors seem to be overreaching in trying to convict a particular defendant, or in which the victim brought much of the harm on himself, as when an unarmed thief is shot by the defendant while fleeing the scene of a crime. In each of these cases, the jury is using its power to acquit to make a statement about the prosecutor's judgment in bringing this defendant to trial.

Jury nullification has a long but murky history. The practice has its roots in English COMMON LAW, where the rule gradually emerged that juries had a power to acquit that was beyond the judge's power to overrule. One English case often identified with the nullification power is the 1670 trial of WILLIAM PENN and William Mead, who were charged with disturbing the peace and unlawful assembly for holding a public meeting in defiance of the Anglican Church. Although the evidence of guilt was clear, the jury refused to convict. When the jurors refused the court's request to reconsider, the judge fined and jailed them for CONTEMPT. The foreman of the jury, named Bushell, filed a HABEAS CORPUS petition, and the court eventually ordered that the jurors be released. Although BUSHELL'S CASE (1670) is sometimes erroneously said to have approved the right to acquit against the evidence—the English court never made such a determination—it did help establish the important principle that jurors cannot be coerced into reaching a particular verdict.

The jury's power to nullify found a welcome home in the American colonies, where the power was sometimes used as a form of political protest. The best known colonial example was ZENGER'S CASE, in which the jury acquitted John Peter Zenger, accused of SEDITIOUS LIBEL for publishing articles critical of the Royal Governor. His acquittal in the face of strong evidence of guilt helped solidify the view that juries generally, and the power to nullify in particular, were a critical protection against government tyranny.

Despite its deep historical roots, there is little evidence that the jury's power to nullify was critical to those who drafted or ratified the Constitution and the BILL OF RIGHTS. Perhaps this is because the power was assumed to exist—jurors were frequently instructed by the trial judge that they had the duty to "find the law" as well as the facts, an instruction that allowed juries to decide whether the criminal law should be applied to the case before them. But as judges became better trained and as the criminal law became more complex, courts increasingly came to instruct juries on the precise law that they were obligated to apply to the facts before them.

As the relationship between judges and juries changed, so did the nature of the nullification debate. There was never any doubt that juries had the raw power to acquit against the evidence, and so the controversial question became whether juries must be told of the power. When the Supreme Court finally addressed the issue in Sparf & Hansen v. United States (1895), it implicitly rejected the idea that the constitutional right to a TRIAL BY JURY included the right to a jury instructed that it might acquit against the evidence. Although the Court's opinion did not use the phrase "jury nullification," it left little doubt that the ability to nullify was merely a power incident to the jury system, not a right that could be enforced by a defendant.

Sparf & Hansen resolved the issue, at least in the federal courts. Although the question of instructing the jury was revived during the mid-twentieth century, often in criminal cases filed against those involved in political protests over CIVIL RIGHTS and the VIETNAM WAR, federal courts again rejected the view of nullification proponents. State courts are in accord: although a few state constitutions still provide that juries have the power to find the law, it does not appear that any state routinely permits argument to the jury on the nullification power.

Still, jury nullification continues to occur, although it is hard to say how often. There are enough examples of it in high-profile cases to create the impression that juries frequently acquit against the evidence, and in some jurisdictions for some crimes (usually nonviolent ones) there is evidence to support this view. Most observers believe, however, that juries in general rarely exercise the power, and when they do, they limit its use to cases that are close on the evidence. As a leading jury study put it, "the jury does not often consciously and explicitly yield to sentiment in the teeth of the law. Rather it yields to sentiment in the apparent process of resolving doubts as to the evidence."

Nevertheless, the mere possibility that a jury might nullify has a significant impact on the criminal law. One example is the legal system's tolerance of inconsistent verdicts. Sometimes two defendants are tried together, and the evidence against them is identical, yet the jury convicts one and acquits the other. Logic suggests that if the jury had a reasonable doubt against one defendant, it must have had a reasonable doubt about the other. In federal courts, however, the conviction may stand despite the inconsistency; the Supreme Court has said that because the jury might have decided to nullify when it acquitted the second defendant, the first defendant's conviction will not be disturbed if there was enough evidence to sustain that conviction. This inconsistency will be tolerated even if there is no evidence that the jury intended to nullify with respect to the defendant it set free.

A second example of the influence of jury nullification is the legal system's distrust of the "special" verdict—a verdict that requires the jury to answer specific questions that explain its decision. Although there are many reasons why special verdicts are disfavored, one reason is that forcing a jury to be too specific in its decision might interfere with its power to nullify. As one court put it, in United States v. Desmond (1982), "Underlying this aversion [to special verdicts] is the feeling that denial of a general verdict might deprive the defendant of the right to a jury's finding based more on external circumstances than the strict letter of the law."

The exercise of jury nullification evokes strong reactions, both for and against. Advocates of nullification argue that without this power, the jury would not be able to fulfill its role as the conscience of the community, dispensing individual justice in appropriate cases. Proponents note that laws prohibiting drug use, for example, may be fair in almost every case, but the legislature may not have anticipated the exceptional one, such as the use of marijuana for medical purposes. If the prosecutor decides to charge a patient with a crime for using marijuana, the jury is free to step in and prevent an injustice from occurring. If such nullifications are repeated, juries can also perform an important function by signaling the legislature that certain laws should be reassessed because they are no longer in line with community values.

Some proponents have argued that juries should take an even more aggressive role in monitoring and shaping the laws. Advocacy groups lobby for "fully informed jury" laws, under which jurors would be told by the judges that they are the ultimate decisionmakers in all criminal cases about both the law and the facts. Some scholars have echoed similar themes, arguing that jury nullification should be encouraged both in and outside the courtroom to help bring about desired social change.

There are also those who criticize the exercise of jury nullification. They note, for example, that when a jury nullifies, it often does so on the basis of incomplete, even misleading information. Jurors who believe that a young defendant should not have his future ruined by one drunk driving conviction, for example, would surely want to know before nullifying that the defendant had been in trouble with the law before; yet, that evidence often will not be admissible at trial. Because the jury has the power, but not a right, to acquit against the evidence, relevant information that the jury would like to hear on this issue will never be presented.

One remedy for the problem of imperfect information would be to change current practice and allow lawyers to argue to the jury for nullification. Critics object to such a candid course of action, however, arguing that if juries were told of the power to nullify, they would nullify much more often, thereby undermining the RULE OF LAW. Critical federal judges have agreed that explicit allowance of nullification would give "every individual the option of disregarding with impunity any law which by his personal standard was judged morally untenable."

A related concern of critics is that although the power to nullify can be used for wise and merciful ends, it can also reflect a jury's improper motives. When juries refused to convict white defendants who had violated the civil rights of minority citizens trying to register to vote, this was an exercise in jury nullification. Likewise when defendants in sexual assault cases are treated leniently because the victim was allegedly "asking for it," jurors may well be expressing the sentiments of the community, but most would not defend these actions as just or merciful.

Finally, those who oppose instructing the jury on the power to nullify note that many controversial political questions are played out in the courtroom, and that the resolution of those issues should not be left to randomly selected juries. Questions about ABORTION are raised in cases where defendants are charged with trespassing at family planning clinics, just as questions about the legitimacy of GUN CONTROL may be raised in a case charging illegal possession of assault rifles by hunters. Critics contend that social issues like these should be resolved in the legislature, and that once they are, a proper respect for the rule of law means that juries should be required to apply the law as written.

The strength of the jury's power to nullify is also its weakness. Juries have the discretion to acquit any defendant for any reason, a power that can be used for both proper and improper purposes. Jurors are quite properly charged with making an important, perhaps life-and-death, decision about whether a defendant is guilty of the crime charged. Whether the jury should be more specifically charged with their power to consider larger issues that go beyond the law and the facts presented—a procedure that is today rejected by almost all courts—is at the heart of the jury nullification debate.

ANDREW D. LEIPOLD
(2000)

Bibliography

ABRAMSON, JEFFREY 1994 We the Jury. New York: Basic Books.

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. and ZEISEL, HANS 1966 The American Jury. Boston, Mass.: Little, Brown.

KING, NANCY 1998 Silencing Nullification Advocacy Inside the Jury Room and Outside the Courtroom. University of Chicago Law Review 65:433–500.

LEIPOLD, ANDREW 1996 Rethinking Jury Nullification. Virginia Law Review 82:253–324.

WEINSTEIN, JACK B. 1993 Considering Jury "Nullification": When May and Should a Jury Reject the Law to do Justice? American Criminal Law Review 30:239–254.

JURY SERVICE AS A POLITICAL RIGHT

In his article in this encyclopedia on JURY DISCRIMINATION, James Boyd White identified a, if not the, central question as being "[w]hat exclusions, beyond racial ones, are improper?" The dozen or so cases the Supreme Court decided during the 1990s have served to heighten the need for a CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY to identify the groups whose exclusion from or underrepresentation on juries ought to be troubling. In the 1970s the Court invoked the Sixth Amendment, which guarantees to criminal defendants the right to a TRIAL BY JURY. This amendment, however, offers an explanation that is incomplete in at least two respects. First, few would doubt that jury discrimination raises constitutional problems outside the criminal setting. Second, and more basic, the Sixth Amendment tells us only about some circumstances in which a jury must be provided, not about how juries must be constituted. That is, there is nothing in the text or history of the Sixth Amendment that tells when exclusion of certain groups or individuals renders a body less than a "jury."

An approach that would focus on the DUE PROCESS OF LAW rights of litigants to a fairly selected jury would also be plagued with problems. If a jury that, because of intentional official action is all white, was held to deprive a black litigant of her due process rights, then why shouldn't the same be said for a jury that turns out to be all white not because of official design but rather because of random chance? Moreover, a due process approach that stressed the possibility that jurors of different races will treat litigants differently would not provide a basis for attacking exclusion of black jurors when the litigants are white. This due process approach can create unfortunate dilemmas when black jurors are excluded in a case where the defendant is white but the victim is black.

For these reasons, the Court in recent jury exclusion cases beginning with BATSON V. KENTUCKY (1986) and continuing with cases such as Powers v. Ohio (1991), Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co. (1991), and J. E. B. v. Alabama (1994) has focused less on the rights of the litigants, and more on the rights of excluded jurors—in particular, their rights to EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The newfound focus on the rights of the would-be jurors is welcome, but the equal protection analysis employed by the Court thus far is at best incomplete and at worst incorrect. Traditional equal protection analysis may be too narrow; the use of wealth and age criteria ordinarily does not trigger any heightened scrutiny under equal protection, and yet the use of these criteria to exclude jurors ought to be troubling. Indeed, the Court has already (and quite properly) suggested that wealth ought play no part in jury selection, Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co. (1946).

More generally, a problem with the traditional equal protection approach is that the equal protection clause—like everything else in the Fourteenth Amendment—was originally intended to be limited to what nineteenth-century lawyers called "CIVIL RIGHTS" such as PROPERTY RIGHTS, FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, and inheritance rights. Political rights, which included voting and jury service, were excluded from the coverage of the Fourteenth Amendment and were addressed more specifically in the VOTING RIGHTS amendments, beginning with the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT and running through the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT. And the groups protected by these voting amendments are not necessarily the same as those protected under a traditional equal protection approach.

The modern Court is beginning to understand the close linkage between jury service and other political rights, such as office holding and especially voting. In both Powers and Edmonson, Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY writing for the Court likened jury service to voting, both to support its finding of STATE ACTION, and to draw strength from PRECEDENT removing race from voter selection. This "juror as voter" theme in Kennedy's writings has surface plausibility. After all, jurors vote to decide winners and losers in cases. Thus, the plain meaning of various constitutional provisions concerning the "right to vote" might be interpreted literally to apply to jurors. Beyond this plain meaning, jury service eligibility historically has been limited as a general matter to those who are registered voters.

The connection, however, runs deeper still. The link between jury service and other rights of political participation such as voting is an important part of our overall constitutional structure, spanning three centuries and eight amendments: the Fifth Amendment, Sixth Amendment, SEVENTH AMENDMENT, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, NINETEENTH AMENDMENT, TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT, and the Twenty-Sixth. The voting–jury service linkage was recognized by the Framers, who saw juries as a lower branch of the judicial department, just as the House was the lower branch of the legislature. Indeed, THOMAS JEFFERSON thought that as between electing legislators and doing direct law administration through juries, the people's voice in the latter was more important than in the former in order to preserve liberty and democracy. This connection noted at the founding between voting and jury service was recognized by the Framers and ratifiers of the RECONSTRUCTION amendments—who used the phrase "right to vote" in the Fifteenth Amendment as a shorthand for political participation more generally, including serving on juries—and by the authors of twentieth-century amendments patterned after the Fifteenth.

Thus, when deciding which criteria cannot be used to select jurors, we should self-consciously ask ourselves whether the criteria under consideration would be permissible as a basis for excluding voters. Given the modern Court's characterization of voting as a FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT whose burdening usually triggers STRICT SCRUTINY, many grounds for excluding jurors are constitutionally dubious. Indeed, the fact that we would never think of permitting peremptory challenges to voters should cause us to consider whether peremptories in juries are consistent with our modern commitment to inclusion and REPRESENTATION in political participation. Some believe that the Court's characterization of voting as a fundamental right under the Fourteenth Amendment itself raises problems. This position has some support in ORIGINAL INTENT; as suggested above, political rights were excluded from the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment. At the very least, however, the criteria the Constitution prohibits as bases for selecting votes are impermissible bases for selecting jurors as well. These include race (Fifteenth Amendment); sex (Nineteenth Amendment); class, at least in federal forums (Twenty-Fourth Amendment); and age (Twenty-Sixth Amendment).

VIKRAM D. AMAR
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Procedural Due Process of Law, Criminal.)

Bibliography

AMAR, AKHIL REED 1995 Reinventing Juries: Ten Suggested Reforms. UC Davis Law Review 28:1169–1194.

AMAR, VIKRAM DAVID 1995 Jury Service as Political Participation Akin to Voting. Cornell Law Review 80: 203–259.

JURY SIZE

Traditionally, in the United States, a criminal trial jury—the PETIT JURY—has been composed of twelve persons. Early Supreme Court opinions assumed that in federal criminal cases juries of that size were required by the Constitution. In PATTON V. UNITED STATES (1930) the Court ruled that during the course of a federal trial a criminal defendant could, with the consent of the prosecutor and judge, waive the participation of one or two jurors and agree to have the verdict rendered by less than twelve.

In DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968) the Supreme Court held that under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT a person accused of a serious crime in a state court is guaranteed the right to TRIAL BY JURY according to the same standards applied under the Sixth Amendment in the federal courts. Later, in BALDWIN V. NEW YORK (1970), the Court held that a serious, nonpetty crime for purposes of the jury trial guarantee is one where imprisonment for more than six months is authorized. In the wake of Duncan, the Court in WILLIAMS V. FLORIDA (1970) decided that trial of a serious crime by a jury of six persons did not violate the constitutional right to trial by jury. Eight years later, the Court in BALLEW V. GEORGIA (1978) ruled that six was the constitutional minimum—that a jury of five persons did not meet the constitutional standard. In Colgrove v. Battin (1973) the Court had also ruled that a six-person jury in a civil case in the federal courts did not violate the SEVENTH AMENDMENT right to jury trial.

In early England, the number of jurors on a petit jury came to be firmly fixed at twelve some time in the fourteenth century. The reasons for choosing the number twelve for the jury at common law are shrouded in obscurity; the same number was also in wide use in other countries of Europe from early times. Some writers ascribe this number to mystical and religious considerations, for example, the twelve tribes and the twelve apostles. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution and the BILL OF RIGHTS, the idea of the twelve-person jury was entrenched in the English COMMON LAW system and practice of the colonial society.

In Williams, the Court rejected the idea that the history of the drafting of the Sixth Amendment jury trial provision enshrined the twelve-person jury in the Constitution. Instead, the Court adopted a functional approach, relating jury size to the purposes of jury trial. The goals of the jury system were seen as interposing the common-sense judgment of laypersons, permitting community participation in the decision-making process, and making the group large enough to promote group deliberation and obtain a fair cross-section of the community. With respect to these various goals, the court majority found "little reason to think" that there is a significant difference between six and twelve, citing in support "the few experiments" and asserting that neither currently available evidence nor theory suggested contrary conclusions.

The interval between Williams and Ballew saw the publication of a significant body of SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH examining the effects of changes in jury size. In Ballew, although the Court was unanimous on the jury size issue, only two Justices relied on these social science studies in concluding that five-person juries did not adequately fulfill the functions of jury trial outlined in Williams. Three Justices had "reservations as to the wisdom—as well as the necessity—of . . . heavy reliance on numerology derived from statistical studies." The same three Justices suggested that the Constitution does not require every feature of the jury to be the same in both federal and state courts, implying that a different, presumably higher, minimum size standard might be applied in the federal courts.

The studies done since Williams, through experiment, use of statistical analysis, and theorizing, have inquired whether the size of the jury affects: the likelihood of representation on a jury of ethnic and racial minorities and minority viewpoints that might influence results or the incidence of hung juries; the propensity of juries to reach compromise verdicts; the consistency of verdicts; the likelihood that verdicts reflect community sentiment; and the overall quality of group decision making. A few researchers have also studied the cost savings that might be achieved by reductions in jury size.

In the main, the social scientists have criticized the Court's conclusion in Williams, and have argued that decreasing jury size has undesirable effects. Some of these studies have been subjected to methodological criticism, such as the objections to their reliance on small group research. Definitive research on the subject remains to be done. On the issue of the jury's representative character, however, social science has already contributed fairly definitive conclusions. Although it is not possible for a single jury to be representative of the community, six-person juries are less likely than twelve-person juries to contain individuals from minority groups or those who have minority viewpoints. Richard Lempert has suggested that "there may be a positive value in minimizing the number of situations in which minority group members are judged by groups lacking minority representation. . . ."

In other constitutional contexts, judges often rely on intuition and common sense to reach judgments on functional issues, or they take into account constitutional values that transcend a functional approach. The jury size issue, however, involves specific numbers, and intuition and other constitutional values do not provide an adequate basis for drawing the required fine distinctions. One who is not persuaded by the social science studies is therefore relegated to the type of statement made by Justice Powell in Ballew, defending the line between five and six: "[A] line has to be drawn somewhere." Under such an approach, the constitutional line could as easily have been drawn between twelve and eleven, and with more historical justification.

Because of the Court's reluctance to overrule recent precedents and because of uncertainty whether social science research can ever demonstrate a sufficient basis for drawing a different line, it seems probable that, for a long time to come, six will remain the constitutional minimum for a criminal jury in the state courts under the Fourteenth Amendment. (Whether the Court will some day adopt Justice Powell's view and apply a different minimum size standard for juries in federal criminal trials is problematic.) Perhaps in some future century when legal historians try to deduce the reasons for choosing six as the constitutionally significant number, they, like their predecessors, may speculate about the possible mystical value of the number. In the end, they are likely to conclude that its origins, like those of the number twelve, are shrouded in obscurity.

NORMAN ABRAMS
(1986)

Bibliography

LEMPERT, RICHARD 1975 Uncovering "Nondiscernible Differences: Empirical Research and the Jury Size Cases. Michigan Law Review 73:644–708.

JURY TRIAL

See: Trial by Jury

JURY UNANIMITY

The requirement that a jury in a criminal case reach a unanimous decision became generally established in England during the fourteenth century—about the same time that juries came to be composed of twelve persons. Unanimity began to be generally required for jury verdicts in the American colonies in the eighteenth century. The unanimity requirement as commonly applied means that all the members of the jury must agree upon the verdict—whether for conviction or acquittal. If any of the jurors fail to agree, the jury is "hung"—that is, unable to reach a verdict. Under well-established DOCTRINE, after a hung jury the defendant may be retried.

In a series of cases dating back to the end of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court has assumed that under the Sixth Amendment the verdict of a criminal jury in the federal courts must be unanimous. This assumption has not been tested, however, for there is no provision for less than unanimous criminal verdicts in the federal courts. The decision in DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968) opened the way for the Court to consider the constitutionality of efforts made by many states to change elements in the COMMON LAW jury system. Duncan ruled that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT protected the right to TRIAL BY JURY in state courts according to the same standards applied under the Sixth Amendment.

To understand the Court's subsequent decisions regarding jury unanimity, it is necessary also to consider its related decisions on JURY SIZE. The Court in WILLIAMS V. FLORIDA (1970) upheld the use of six-person juries for serious criminal cases. The question whether state criminal juries must reach unanimous verdicts was presented for the first time in 1972 in two companion cases, APODACA V. OREGON and JOHNSON V. LOUISIANA. In Apodaca, the constitutionality of 10–2 verdicts was sustained under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments. In Johnson, 9–3 verdicts were upheld under the Fourteenth Amendment alone. In Apodaca, a state case, five Justices (one concurring Justice and four dissenters) also expressed the view that the Sixth Amendment required unanimity in federal criminal trials.

In BALLEW V. GEORGIA (1978) the Court rendered its second size-of-jury decision, holding five-person juries to be unconstitutional. Thus, by the time the Court considered the issue in BURCH V. LOUISIANA (1979), it had upheld six-person juries, sustained the constitutionality of 10–2 and 9–3 majority verdicts, and held five-person juries to be unconstitutional. In Burch, the Court held that conviction by a 5–1 vote of a six-person jury violated the constitutional right to trial by jury.

The Court has not in modern times decided whether the SEVENTH AMENDMENT requires unanimity in federal civil trials. It can be argued that it so held in two early cases, American Publishing Company v. Fisher (1897) and Springville v. Thomas (1897), but the Court's nonunanimous verdict decisions in state criminal cases and its decision in Colgrove v. Battin (1973) that six-person juries are constitutional in federal civil trials, arguably have undermined those early decisions.

In addressing the unanimity issue in Apodaca and Johnson, the Court relied heavily on the analysis used in the first size-of-jury case, Williams v. Florida, and applied the same functional approach relating the size of the jury to the purposes of a jury trial. From a functional perspective, the unanimity issue has much in common with but is not identical to the jury size question. For example, both involve concerns that juries represent a cross-section of the community and that minority viewpoints be represented. In connection with jury size, the concern is that if the jury is too small, it will not reflect minority views. Where unanimity is departed from, the concern is that minority viewpoints represented on the jury will simply be disregarded and outvoted. A majority of the Court in Apodaca rejected this latter claim on the grounds that there was no reason to believe that majority jurors will fail to weigh the evidence and consider rational arguments offered by the minority. The dissenters argued that jury reliability was diminished in a nonunanimous system because there is less pressure to debate and deliberate. Professor Hans Zeisel has made a similar point: "[T]he abandonment of the unanimity rule is but another way of reducing the size of the jury. But it is reduction with a vengeance, for a majority verdict requirement is far more effective in nullifying the potency of minority viewpoints than is the outright reduction of a jury to a size equivalent to the majority that is allowed to agree on a verdict. Minority viewpoints fare better on a jury of ten that must be unanimous than on a jury of twelve where ten members must agree on a verdict" (1971, p. 722).

The less than unanimous verdict also poses a question not raised in the jury size cases. A majority of the Court in Johnson held that nonunanimous verdicts are not inconsistent with proof beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT and therefore do not violate DUE PROCESS. The fact that some members of the jury are not convinced of guilt does not itself establish reasonable doubt, a concept that apparently applies only to the standard of proof that each individual juror subjectively must apply, not a concept applicable to the jury as a group.

Are criminal defendants as well protected from conviction under a nonunanimous verdict system as under a unanimity requirement? The majority in Apodaca and Johnson conceded that juries would be hung somewhat less frequently under a nonunanimous system but also relied on SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH for the proposition that "the probability that an acquittal minority will hang the jury is about as great as that a guilty minority will hang it." Data in the same study, however, persuaded some of the dissenters that the prosecution would gain "a substantially more favorable conviction ratio" under a nonunanimous system.

By the time Burch was decided in 1979, the Court, following the pattern suggested in the 1978 jury size case of Ballew, appears to have abandoned any attempt to rely on social science to support its conclusions regarding required jury attributes. In holding 5–1 verdicts unconstitutional, the Court concluded that "having already departed from the strict historical requirements of jury trial, it is inevitable that lines must be drawn somewhere" and relied upon "much the same reasons that led [us] in Ballew to decide that use of a five-member jury threatened the fairness of the proceeding. . . ."

The constitutionality of other numerical combinations—for example, 8–4 or 7–5 verdicts or the various possible majorities on juries of seven to eleven members—remains in doubt. In Burch, the Court expressly reserved opinion on the constitutionality of nonunanimous verdicts by juries of more than six. Only Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, concurring in Apodaca, commented that a 7–5 verdict standard would afford him "great difficulty."

The Court's decisions in the nonunanimous verdict cases have been designed to leave room for the states to experiment with different majority verdict systems. But the uncertainty produced by these decisions may discourage experimentation. If the states do introduce additional variations, the notions that "lines must be drawn somewhere" and that at some point "the fairness of the proceeding" is threatened hardly provide an adequate basis for selecting among the numerous lines that may be presented. If the Court is unwilling to rely upon social science research to back up its functional approach, it may find itself without a calculus for resolving constitutional issues in which specific numbers count.

NORMAN ABRAMS
(1986)

Bibliography

ZEISEL, HANS 1971 And Then There Were None: The Diminution of the Federal Jury. University of Chicago Law Review 38:710–724.

JURY UNANIMITY
(Update)

The issue of jury unanimity is tied to, among other things, JURY SIZE. The Supreme Court has allowed states to deviate from the historical norm of twelve-person juries, and has upheld criminal convictions by juries composed of as few as six persons. In criminal cases, where juries were intended to protect defendants against oppression and governmental overreaching, allowing a jury composed of less than twelve persons to convict by less than unanimous agreement may present a dangerous slippery slope. But there may be stopping points along this slope. Unlike the number six, majority rule and SUPERMAJORITY RULE have unique and stable mathematical properties. Surely, everyone would agree that there is a difference between majority and minority rules, and no one would permit conviction of a defendant by less than a majority. Majority and supermajority rules also govern political institutions other than juries, such as legislatures and appellate judicial panels, to which juries were analogized by the Framers. If jury service is similar in essence to voting and other forms of majoritarian political participation, then the historical tradition of unanimity may not be sacrosanct. Moreover, unanimity traditions at the time of the framing of the Constitution were easier to justify given the homogeneity of jurors at that time. It bears recalling that initially only white men could serve as jurors. As juries have become more racially and sexually diverse, a rule that gives each individual an absolute veto seems less necessary, and perhaps unwise. The challenge for those who advocate a departure from unanimity, of course, is to find a way to ensure that majorities on juries listen to and in good faith consider the views of minorities whose votes can be overridden. Minority vetoes may be problematic; however, minority voices need to be heard.

VIKRAM D. AMAR
(2000)

JUS DARE

(Latin: "To give the law.") This is the traditional function of the legislature in a constitutional government with SEPARATION OF POWERS and is contrasted with JUS DICERE, the function of courts. A court may be said to have invaded the realm of jus dare when it engages in JUDICIAL POLICY-MAKING.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

JUS DICERE

(Latin: "To say [what] the law [is].") This is the traditional function of courts, and it is usually understood as a limitation upon their power (jus dicere, et non jus dare). "It is emphatically the province of the judicial department to say what the law is"—Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803).

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

JUST COMPENSATION

The just compensation clause of the Fifth Amendment demands that a private PROPERTY owner be made whole financially when property is taken by the federal government for PUBLIC USE. The same requirement is made applicable to the states by the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The requisite compensation is the monetary equivalent of the property taken, putting the owner in as good a position pecuniarily as before the taking, as the Supreme Court held in Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States (1893). Compensation for losses peculiar to the owner, such as loss of investment or business profits, litigation expenses, and relocation costs, is not constitutionally required, but often is made payable by statute.

In recognition of the somewhat elusive nature of the "monetary equivalent" standard, a variety of working rules have been developed to aid the courts. The most important of these rules is the concept of fair market value. Under this concept, the owner is entitled to receive, as just compensation, the price for the property interest taken that would be agreed upon, as of the time of the taking, by a willing and informed seller and a willing and informed buyer, considering the highest and best use for which the property was available and suitable.

The market value test, however, is not an inflexible one, and other methods of estimating value have been held appropriate when reference to actual market data is impossible because there is no actual market for the property, or when the market value test would result in manifest injustice by diverging to an impermissible degree from the full indemnity principle of the Fifth Amendment.

If the property taken is only a part of a single parcel, just compensation includes payment to the owner for any diminution in value of the remainder resulting from the planned use of the part taken, but the value of benefits to the remainder may be offset against the value of the "take." These results, which ordinarily can be measured by the difference in value of the property before and after the taking, can theoretically, although seldom in fact, result in a zero award. Many states, deeming it unfair to deduct enhancements to the remainder, reject the "before and after" test and award the full value of the part taken plus any net consequential damages realized by the remainder after offsetting any special benefits thereto. That either approach is constitutionally permissible was affirmed in Bauman v. Ross (1897).

ARVO VAN ALSTYNE
(1986)

Bibliography

ORGEL, LESTER 1953 Valuation under the Law of Eminent Domain, Vol. 1. Charlottesville, Va.: Michie Co.

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT

See: Attorney General and Department of Justice

JUSTICIABILITY

Federal judges do not establish legal norms at will or on demand, but only when deciding cases that are justiciable, that is, appropriate for federal court decision. What makes a case justiciable is thus itself an important threshold question, because it determines whether a federal court will exercise its power to formulate and apply substantive law, rather than leaving the issues in the case to be resolved by political or other means. Hence, when the Supreme Court fashions the criteria of justiciability for itself and the lower federal courts, it effectively defines the nature and scope of the JUDICIAL POWER of the United States—the power to make decisions in accordance with law.

Most justiciability issues arise when litigants who are primarily motivated to vindicate public rights seek to contest the validity of government behavior, especially on constitutional grounds. Such public interest suits are usually designed not so much to redress traditional personal grievances as to vindicate fundamental principles. Commonly the plaintiffs seek DECLARATORY JUDGMENTS or INJUNCTIONS to prevent government officials from carrying on objectionable practices that affect a wide segment of the population. These actions often test and illustrate the degree to which federal judges, particularly Supreme Court Justices, view their power of constitutional oversight as warranted only by the necessity to resolve traditional legal disputes or, instead, by a broader judicial mission to ensure government observance of the Constitution.

In demarcating the federal judicial function, the law of justiciability comprises a complex of subtle doctrines, including MOOTNESS, ADVISORY OPINIONS, and POLITICAL QUESTIONS, among others. The Supreme Court has derived that law from two sources: Article III, which limits federal judicial power to the decision of CASES AND CONTROVERSIES, and nonconstitutional "prudential" rules of the Court's own creation. Both Article III and the rules of prudence incorporate notions of the attributes or qualities of litigation that make the legal issues presented appropriate for judicial determination. The difference between the two is that if Congress wants to have the federal courts entertain public actions, it may override the Court's prudential barriers, but not the constitutional limits of "case" and "controversy."

Three primary, and often mutually reinforcing, conceptions of appropriateness shape the many manifestations of justiciability. One concerns judicial capability. It centers on making federal court adjudication competent, informed, necessary, and efficacious. In this conception, a judicial decision is proper only when adversely affected parties litigate live issues of current personal consequence in a lawsuit whose format assures adversary argument and judicial capacity to devise meaningful remedies. The second conception of appropriateness concerns fairness. It promotes judicial solicitude for parties and interests not represented in the lawsuit, whose rights might be compromised unfairly by a substantive decision rendered without their participation. The third conception concerns the proper institutional and political role in our democracy of the appointed, electorally unaccountable federal judiciary. It cautions federal courts to be sure of the need for imposing restraints, especially constitutional restraints, on other, particularly more representative, government officials.

Whether the policies underlying justiciability doctrine are (or should be) applied in a principled, consistent fashion, depending on the form and characteristics of litigation alone, as the Supreme Court professes, or whether the Court does (or should) manipulate them for pragmatic reasons, is a subject of major controversy among the Court's commentators. Inevitably, the Court has discretion to adjust the degree to which these imprecise and flexible policies must be satisfied in particular cases, given individual variations in the configuration of lawsuits and the inherently relative nature of judgments about judicial capability, litigant need, and the propriety of JUDICIAL ACTIVISM AND RESTRAINT. Assessments of the information and circumstances needed for intelligent, effective adjudication will vary with the levels of generality at which issues are posed and with judicial willingness to act under conditions of uncertainty. Appraisals frequently diverge concerning hardship to, and representation of, present and absent parties who will be affected by rendering or withholding decision. Perhaps most dramatically, Justices differ in their evaluations of the relative importance of judicial control of government behavior and the freedom of politically accountable officials to formulate policy without judicial interference.

In view of the latitude and variation in the Court's self-conscious definition of federal judicial power, it is not surprising that justiciability is a sophisticated, controversial, and difficult field, or that many decisions provoke the skepticism that justiciability DOCTRINE has been manipulated to avoid decision of some issues and advance the decision of others. The Court certainly considers (and is willing to articulate) the degree of concrete focus and clarity with which issues are presented, and how pressing is the need for judicial protection of the litigants. The Court may also consider (but almost certainly will not articulate) a number of the following factors: how substantial, difficult, and controversial the issues are; whether a decision would likely legitimate government action or hold it unconstitutional; how important the Court believes the principle it would announce is and whether the principle could be expected to command public and government acceptance; the possibility of nonjudicial resolution; whether a decision would contribute to or cut off public debate; the expected general public reaction to a decision; the Justices' own constitutional priorities; and a host of other practical considerations that may implicate the Court's capacity to establish and enforce important constitutional principles.

Such judgments appear to have influenced a number of notable justiciability rulings in diverse ways. For example, in Poe v. Ullman (1961) the Court held a declaratory judgment challenge to Connecticut's contraception ban nonjusticiable because the statute was not being enforced, but later held the ban unconstitutional in the context of a criminal prosecution. By contrast, in a declaratory judgment challenge to an unenforced prohibition on teaching evolution, the Court, in EPPERSON V. ARKANSAS (1968), held the case justiciable and the prohibition unconstitutional without awaiting a prosecution. Similarly, the Court twice dismissed a seemingly justiciable appeal challenging Virginia's ban on MISCEGENATION, as applied to an annulment proceeding, within a few years of declaring public school segregation unconstitutional in 1954, but in 1967, following the CIVIL RIGHTS advances of the early 1960s, held the law unconstitutional on appeal of a criminal conviction. Moreover, although the Court has deferred decision in some cases where it ultimately held state statutes unconstitutional, it also occasionally appears to have lowered justiciability barriers and rushed to uphold the constitutionality of important federal legislation (the Tennessee Valley Authority and nuclear liability limitation statutes) or to invalidate it when Congress wanted constitutional assistance with ongoing legislative reform (the FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT.)

Perhaps the Court is inclined to insist on a greater showing of justiciability where it expects to hold governmental action unconstitutional than where it expects to uphold the action, in part because of a substantive presumption of the constitutionality of government conduct. Yet any generalization about the relations between justiciability and the Court's substantive views is hazardous, given the many factors and subtle judgments that may be weighed in any given case. What seems certain is that decisions on questions of justiciability will always be influenced by visions of the judicial role and will be difficult to comprehend without understanding those visions.

JOHNATHON D. VARAT
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Chap. 4. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

GUNTHER, GERALD 1964 The Subtle Vices of the "Passive Virtues": A Comment on Principle and Expediency in Judicial Review. Columbia Law Review 64:1–25.

VARAT, JOHNATHON D. 1980 Variable Justiciability and the Duke Power Case. Texas Law Review 58:273–327.

WRIGHT, CHARLES A.; MILLER, ARTHUR R.; and COOPER, EDWARD H. 1984 Federal Practice and Procedure. Vol. 13:278–293. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

JUVENILE CURFEW LAWS

Curfew laws generally run counter to American constitutional principles of freedom and liberty. Consequently, the state's power to restrict the movements of its citizenry has been limited to times of civil unrest, crisis, or emergency and is justified by legitimate governmental concerns for the health, safety, and welfare of the community. Juvenile curfew laws, however, differ: usually there is no emergency; only a discrete segment of the population is affected; and the curfew may remain in effect for years. Public concern about juvenile delinquency and victimization has renewed support for curfew ordinances and has encouraged government officials, primarily at the local level, to enact curfews for youths.

Although curfew laws aimed at youths have proliferated, only a few juvenile curfew ordinances have been challenged in the courts. The Supreme Court has never ruled on the constitutionality of any juvenile curfew ordinance, but some state courts and a few lower federal courts have considered the issue. Most of these challenges are based on alleged violations of the FIRST AMENDMENT rights of children and their parents to FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION, movement, and expression; the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT rights of children to EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS, SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, and PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS; and the Fourteenth Amendment rights of parents to parental autonomy and familial privacy. Unfortunately, the opinions do not clearly define the parameters of state authority to enact curfew ordinances, in part because the laws themselves vary significantly from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, thus making it difficult to draw comparisons across cases.

Curfew opponents have had mixed success when challenging curfew ordinances on constitutional grounds. Most courts reject the equal protection claim that the state cannot treat minors differently because of their age or because a FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT is infringed; but even when a fundamental right is affected, some courts have upheld such regulations on the ground that the state has compelling interests in the protection of children and the reduction of juvenile crime. Of course, if no fundamental right is implicated then a substantive due process claim also will fail; some courts thus have rejected such a challenge on the ground that the curfew ordinance does not violate a fundamental right. If a fundamental right has been implicated, some courts have found the state's interest sufficiently compelling to warrant the intrusion while others have found the curfew unconstitutional. Similarly, First Amendment claims that the ordinances infringe on expressive or associative rights have been rejected because of the state's greater authority to regulate minors or the importance of the governmental interest, while others have been upheld.

Fourteenth Amendment challenges to curfew ordinances, however, have been upheld on the grounds that the laws are too vague and fail to apprise children and their parents of the prohibited conduct. VAGUENESS challenges also have been sustained when the ordinances delegate too much legislative authority or discretion to those charged with enforcement of the laws. The Fourteenth Amendment claims of parents that juvenile curfew ordinances invade familial privacy and infringe on parental autonomy also have had some limited success, although the courts appear willing to permit some degree of governmental intrusion. The boundaries of state and parental power, however, remain uncertain as do the nature and extent of children's constitutional rights.

KATHERINE HUNT FEDERLE
(2000)

Bibliography

FEDERLE, KATHERINE H. 1995 Children, Curfews, and the Constitution. Washington University Law Quarterly 73:1315–1368.

JORDAN, MICHAEL 1993 From the Constitutionality of Juvenile Curfew Ordinances to a Children's Agenda for the 1990's: Is It Really A Simple Matter of Supporting Family Values and Recognizing Fundamental Rights? St. Thomas Law Review 5:389–431.

VEILLEUX, DANNY R. 1993 Annotation: Validity, Construction, and Effect of Juvenile Curfew Regulations. American Law Reports, 4th ed. 83:1056–1123.

JUVENILE PROCEEDINGS

In a juvenile proceeding, a state court is asked to decide whether and how to intervene in the life of a child who may need supervision or protection. These proceedings often take place in a juvenile or family court and usually have two distinct phases: a "jurisdictional" stage, at which the judge must decide whether there are grounds for intervention; and a "dispositional" phase, in which the judge decides how to intervene. Juvenile court statutes typically provide for JURISDICTION in three types of cases: the delinquency case, where a young person is found to have violated a criminal law; the case where the child's conduct is not criminal, but the child is found to be beyond parental control, or in need of supervision because of improper or protocriminal conduct, such as truancy, or running away; and the dependency case, where by reason of parental neglect or abuse the child is in need of protection. Once jurisdiction is established, the court typically has broad discretionary authority in the "dispositional phase" of juvenile proceedings to intervene into the child's life through supervision, or out-of-home placement in foster care or a residential institution.

At COMMON LAW, there were neither special courts nor separate proceedings for minors accused of violating the law. "Infancy" provided a defense, somewhat akin to insanity, in a case where because of immaturity a child lacked the capacity to form the requisite criminal intent. Presumptions made it impossible to find the requisite intent in children under seven, and difficult to find it in those between seven and fourteen. Youths over fourteen were presumed capable. Except for this possible defense, a child could be arrested, indicted, tried, and convicted just like an adult. Minors were regularly charged with crimes, tried like adults, and jailed and imprisoned with adult offenders.

In the nineteenth century, reformers began questioning the appropriateness of treating youthful and adult offenders alike. A revolution began in 1899, when Illinois established the first juvenile court. Hailed as a more humane and effective way of helping children in trouble get back on the track to good citizenship, the Illinois court became a model; by 1925 nearly every state had adopted LEGISLATION providing for some sort of juvenile proceedings. For these new juvenile proceedings, the implicit model of authority was not the traditional criminal trial with adversarial procedures but the family itself, with the state as parens patriae.

The philosophy of the early juvenile court emphasized four tenets. The first was rehabilitation, rather than deterrence or punishment. The state's goal was to save the wayward child through appropriate treatment. The second was individualization: justice for children was to be personalized. The court's primary goal was to determine whether a child needed help, and then to prescribe on an individualized basis the appropriate treatment. The third was separation: children were to be kept away from adult criminals who might physically brutalize minors or teach them criminal habits. Finally, juvenile procedure emphasized procedural informality. Although the adversarial determination of facts might be appropriate for a criminal trial where the purpose was punishment, legalistic formalities were thought to be counterproductive in a juvenile proceeding where the purpose was rehabilitation.

Before 1967, because of the philosophy of the juvenile court and its traditions of procedural informality, juvenile proceedings typically offered none of the safeguards afforded adults in criminal trials. Juvenile court practices were virtually unaffected by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court interpreting DUE PROCESS to impose increasingly high procedural standards imposed on state criminal proceedings. Except in a few states, a young person accused of delinquency would not be assigned counsel, had no broad RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, was judged by a preponderance of the evidence standard (not proof beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT), had no right to TRIAL BY JURY, and often faced HEARSAY evidence.

The Supreme Court had hinted that due process might demand more. Haley v. Ohio (1948) held that a confession given by a fifteen-year-old boy and used in a criminal trial was involuntary. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS wrote that "[n]either man nor child can be allowed to stand condemned by methods that flout constitutional requirements of due process of law." More pointed doubts about the procedural informality of juvenile proceedings were expressed in Kent v. United States (1966). The Court's holding could be read narrowly: the District of Columbia must use fair procedures to transfer minors from juvenile to adult courts. But in Justice ABE FORTAS's opinion the landmark ruling that was to come the next year was foreshadowed in two respects: first, in the suggestion that the parens patriae doctrine of the juvenile court is not "an invitation to procedural arbitrariness"; and second, in the expression of the fear that notwithstanding the paternalistic philosophy of juvenile proceedings, the child may in fact receive "the worst of both worlds: that he gets neither the protections accorded to adults, nor the solicitous care and regenerative treatment postulated for children."

The constitutional watershed came in IN RE GAULT (1967), which held that due process required the states to apply various procedural safeguards to the guilt (or jurisdictional) phase of delinquency proceedings. The Court found that fifteen-year-old Gerald Gault, who had been committed for up to six years at an Arizona Industrial School for making an obscene telephone call, had been deprived of his constitutional rights to adequate written NOTICE of the charges, notice of his RIGHT TO COUNSEL, including assigned counsel, and of his right to confront and cross-examine witnesses; and advice of his privilege against self-incrimination. In a broad opinion rejecting the claim that parens patriae and the rehabilitative ideal justified procedural informality, Fortas declared that "unbridled discretion, however benevolently motivated, is frequently a poor substitute for principle and procedure." Although the holdings of Gault were expressly limited to the guilt phase of delinquency proceedings, Gault broadly declared a principle that children have constitutional rights of their own: "Whatever may be their precise impact, neither the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT nor the BILL OF RIGHTS is for adults alone."

During the years following Gault, the Supreme Court decided several cases that expanded the constitutional rights of children in delinquency proceedings. IN RE WINSHIP (1970) held that the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of proof was constitutionally mandated in the adjudicatory stage of delinquency proceedings. Breed v. Jones (1975) held that the protections of the DOUBLE JEOPARDY clause were applicable to minors. The juvenile in Breed had been put in jeopardy by the original adjudicatory hearing where jurisdiction was established, and the Court found that the juvenile's subsequent criminal trial for the same offense constituted double jeopardy. But in Swisher v. Brady (1978) the Court held that the double jeopardy clause did not prohibit Maryland officials from taking exceptions to a SPECIAL MASTER's nondelinquency findings.

Despite the decisions in Gault, Breed, and Winship, the Court's decision in MCKEIVER V. PENNSYLVANIA (1971) reflects the Court's continued commitment to a separate system of justice for children and adults. In McKeiver the Court held that jury trials are not constitutionally required in delinquency proceedings. The Court reasoned that because a jury is not "a necessary component of accurate factfinding," denying a juvenile a jury trial would not violate the FUNDAMENTAL FAIRNESS component of the due process clause. In addition, the Court pointed out that "the jury trial, if required as a matter of constitutional precept, will remake the juvenile proceeding into a fully adversary process and will put an effective end to what has been the idealistic prospect of an intimate, informal protective proceeding."

Since Gault, juvenile proceedings involving noncriminal misbehavior, or juveniles thought to be beyond parental control, have been questioned on both procedural and substantive grounds. What does Gault imply about appropriate procedural safeguards? To what extent may a state restrain the liberty of a minor on the basis of acts that if committed by adults would not be criminal? The Supreme Court has not yet ruled on the due process requirements applicable to these proceedings, and most states do not provide the procedural safeguards now applicable in delinquency proceedings. In addition to voicing procedural concerns, critics have also criticized as vague and overly broad the language defining these "status offenses": running away from home, sexual promiscuity, truancy, and the like. With few exceptions, however, appellate courts have upheld the constitutional validity of these statutes against such attacks. The Supreme Court, which has written no opinion dealing with such proceedings, has sent mixed signals in summary opinions.

Today every state has juvenile proceedings that allow a court, typically a juvenile or family court, to assume jurisdiction over a neglected or abused child and remove the child from the parents' care. Although not protected by explicit language in the Constitution, the interest of parents in their children's upbringing plainly carries great constitutional weight. Beginning with MEYER V. NEBRASKA (1923), the Supreme Court has recognized the constitutional right of parents to direct the rearing of their children. The parents' claim to authority, however, is not absolute. Since the early nineteenth century, the parens patriae power has been held sufficient to empower courts of equity to remove a child requiring protection from parental custody and to appoint a suitable person as guardian.

Statutes authorizing state intervention have been criticized on substantive and procedural grounds. Vague substantive standards of abuse and neglect often leave judges to base their determinations on their own subjective values. As the Supreme Court noted in Santosky v. Kramer (1982), the Court has not precisely determined what forms of parental conduct justify state intrusion.

The Court has, however, decided several cases with respect to the procedural requirements where parental rights are terminated on grounds of abuse or neglect. In Stanley v. Illinois (1972) the Court relied on the doctrine of IRREBUTTABLE PRESUMPTIONS to hold that it is a denial of DUE PROCESS for unwed fathers to be disqualified from custody of their children without individualized hearings on their fitness. In Santosky the Court decided that the "fair preponderance of the evidence" standard, applied in New York parental rights termination proceedings, violated due process: "Before a State may sever completely and irrevocably the rights of parents in their natural child, due process requires that the State support its allegations by at least clear and convincing evidence." In LASSITER V. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1981), however, the Court held that due process does not require assignment of counsel in every case involving the termination of parental rights. Although most jurisdictions do provide counsel for parents in such cases, few provide separate counsel for the children.

Gault has forced revolutionary changes in delinquency proceedings, but the requirements imposed in other sorts of juvenile proceedings have been modest. In the twenty years since that landmark, Supreme Court decisions have extended to young people accused of crime those procedural safeguards essential to an accurate determination of their guilt. To that extent, the Constitution no longer permits the procedural informality that characterized juvenile proceedings for over half a century. Gault and its progeny have substantially narrowed but not obliterated the differences between the adult criminal justice process and the juvenile justice process for delinquents. McKeiver underlines the conclusion that the Constitution does not require identical procedures for delinquents and adults. The Court has never held that equal protection requires the legal system to treat all those accused of crime the same, whether adults or minors.

Outside the guilt phase of delinquency proceedings, the Court has shown substantial caution, notwithstanding the potentially expansive announcement in Gault that children have rights, and that juvenile proceedings will be judged by their performance, not their promise. A number of factors probably underlie this caution. For one thing, the protective and rehabilitative aspirations of the juvenile court have never been rejected by the Court. As McKeiver suggests, the traditions of the juvenile court and the values of informality, flexibility, and protection still may carry some weight in constitutional adjudication. More fundamentally, decisions affecting children are special in two important respects that must affect constitutional analysis. First, defining constitutional rights in juvenile proceedings implicates defining parental rights, particularly in cases involving noncriminal misbehavior where the state may be reinforcing parental prerogatives, and in abuse and neglect proceedings, where the state directly challenges parental adequacy. Second, by reason of immaturity, young people may be more susceptible to coercion, and less able to make informed and responsible decisions. Whether considering the VOLUNTARINESS of a confession, the "knowing" WAIVER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS, or the need for supervision and control, it would be foolish for the courts to conclude that age is irrelevant.

ROBERT H. MNOOKIN
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Children's Rights; Schall v. Martin.)

Bibliography

FLICKER, BARBARA 1982 Standards for Juvenile Justice: A Summary and Analysis. Juvenile Justice Standards Project. Cambridge, Mass.: Ballinger Publications.

FOX, SANFORD J. 1970 Juvenile Justice Reform: An Historical Perspective. Stanford Law Review 22:1187–1239.

MACK, JULIAN W. 1925 The Chancery Procedure in the Juvenile Court. Pages 310–319 in Jane Addams, ed., The Child, the Clinic, and the Court. New York: New Republic, Inc., and the Wieboldt Foundation.

PLATT, ANTHONY M. 1977 The Child Savers: The Invention of Delinquency. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION ON LAW ENFORCEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE 1967 Task Force Report: Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Crime. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

STAPLETON, W. VAUGHAN and TEITELBAUM, LEE E. 1972 In Defense of Youth: A Study of the Role of Counsel in American Juvenile Courts. New York: Russell Sage Foundation.

J. W. HAMPTON, JR. & CO. v. UNITED STATES

See: Hampton & Co. v. United States

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

Original 1986 Editorial Board

Henry J. Abraham

Charles L. Black, Jr.

Robert H. Bork

William J. Brennan, Jr.

Henry Steele Commager

Martha A. Field

Ruth Bader Ginsburg

Erwin N. Griswold

Gerald Gunther

Harold M. Hyman

Philip B. Kurland

Alpheus T. Mason

Paul L. Murphy

C. Herman Pritchett

Harry N. Scheiber

Martin Shapiro

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

SECOND EDITION

Edited by
Leonard W. Levy
and
Kenneth L. Karst

Adam Winkler, Associate Editor for the Second Edition

Dennis J. Mahoney, Assistant Editor for the First Edition
John G. West, Jr., Assistant Editor for Supplement I

MACMILLAN REFERENCE USA
An imprint of the Gale Group
New York

Macmillan Library Reference USA
1633 Broadway
New York, NY 10019

Printed in the United States of America

Printing Number
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Encyclopedia of the American Constitution / edited by Leonard W. Levy and Kenneth L. Karst.—2nd ed. / Adam Winkler, associate editor for the second edition.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 0-02-864880-3 (hard cover : alk. paper)
1. Constitutional law—United States—Encyclopedias. I. Levy, Leonard Williams, 1923– II. Karst, Kenneth L. III. Winkler, Adam.
KF4548 .E53 2000
342.73—dc21 00-029203

This paper meets the requirements of ANSI-NISO Z39.48-1992 (Permanence of Paper).

K

KAHRIGER, UNITED STATES v.

See: Marchetti v. United States

KALVEN, HARRY, JR.
(1914–1974)

Commencing the lectures that became his book, The Negro and the First Amendment (1965), Harry Kalven remarked that constitutional law was his hobby. He considered himself a torts teacher who had become interested in some constitutional subjects, and certainly his writings on the constitutional law of DEFAMATION and invasions of PRIVACY show deep understanding of the underlying private law. But Kalven was no constitutional amateur; his work on the jury system and on the FIRST AMENDMENT placed him in the first rank of scholars in both fields.

A long collaboration with Hans Zeisel culminated in the publication of The American Jury (1966), a work still hailed for its pathbreaking combination of traditional legal analysis and imaginative empirical study. His essays on defamation and OBSCENITY set patterns of thought that can be seen in scores of later scholarly works, and his article on "the PUBLIC FORUM" probably influenced the course of Supreme Court decisions more than any other single work of its era. (See also: TWO-LEVEL THEORY.)

An effervescent man, Kalven was much beloved by a generation of his students at the University of Chicago Law School, some of whom are numbered today among our leading constitutional scholars. His legacy to them, and to all of us through his scholarship, was a passion for applying careful, particularized analysis—in short, the lawyer's craft—to the ends of justice.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

In Memoriam: Harry Kalven, Jr. 1975 The University of Chicago Law Review 43:1–149. (Includes a complete bibliography of Kalven's writings.)

KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT
10 Stat 277 (1854)

The Kansas-Nebraska Act declared the MISSOURI COMPROMISE of 1820 void and in its place enacted the policy of "POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY," thereby potentially opening all American territories to SLAVERY.

Democrats had extolled the finality of the COMPROMISE OF 1850 as a permanent resolution of the slavery controversy. Its constitutional elements included the stringent Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; the organization of New Mexico and Utah Territories without a prohibition of slavery; abolition of the slave trade in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA; and the "Clayton Compromise," which made all questions arising in the TERRITORIAL COURTS involving blacks' personal freedom or title to slaves directly appealable to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Illinois Democrat STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, chairman of the Senate Committee on the Territories, disrupted this settlement in 1854, however, by introducing a bill to organize the remainder of the LOUISANA PURCHASE territory in order to facilitate construction of a transcontinental railroad that would have Chicago as its midcontinent terminus.

Douglas's original bill contained minor concessions to slavery, including reenactment of the Clayton Compromise provisions for Kansas Territory. But dissatisfied proslavery senators wrested further concessions. These included the declaration that the Missori Compromise of 1820 (which prohibited slavery in the Louisiana Purchase territory north of latitude 36° 30′, except in Missouri) had been superseded by the Compromise of 1850 and was void. The Kansas-Nebraska Bill enacted the principle of popular sovereignty, declaring that "all questions pertaining to SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES . . . are to be left to the decision of the people residing therein." It included a vague suggestion that the federal Constitution might in some unspecified way inhibit the power of a territorial legislature to exclude slaves. The bill explicitly endorsed "nonintervention," a code word for an indefinite congeries of proslavery constitutional principles that hinted at an absence of power in any government to inhibit the intrusion of slavery into the territories prior to statehood.

The Kansas-Nebraska Act, together with the Compromise of 1850, surrounded the free states and the free territory of Minnesota with a cordon of territories open to slavery, thus threatening to make the Great Plains a vast proslavery chasm between the free states of the northeast and the free states and territories of the Pacific coast. The Whig party distintegrated, and its place in the North was taken by the new Republican party, which combined Whig economic objectives (free homesteads, federal aid to INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS) with elements of the Free Soil platform of 1848. These Free Soil principles included the idea that Congress could not establish or permit slavery in a territory and that it could not constitutionally support slavery anywhere outside the extant slave states. Thus the proslavery concessions of 1854 paradoxically resulted in no immediate practical gain for slavery but rather in a widespread dissemination of antislavery constitutional beliefs.

Kansas Territory, organized by the Act, became a theater of struggle for sectional advantage between proslavery Missourians and free-state settlers. The ensuing violence disrupted the Democratic party, especially after President JAMES BUCHANAN tried to force the proslavery LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION on the free-soil majority of Kansas settlers. The Kansas-Nebraska Act thus contributed substantially to the disruption of the Union.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

RUSSEL, ROBERT R. 1963 The Issues in the Congressional Struggle over the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, 1854. Journal of Southern History 29:187–210.

KASSEL v. CONSOLIDATED FREIGHTWAYS CORPORATION

See: Raymond Motor Transportation Company v. Rice

KASTIGAR v. UNITED STATES
406 U.S. 441 (1972)

Until this case the rule was that the Fifth Amendment requires a grant of transactional immunity to displace a claim of the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. Title II of the ORGANIZED CRIME CONTROL ACT of 1970 fixed a single comprehensive standard applicable to grants of immunity in all federal judicial, GRAND JURY, administrative, and legislative proceedings. The new law provided that when a witness is required to testify over his claim of the Fifth Amendment right, "no testimony or other information compelled under the order (or any information directly or indirectly derived from such testimony or other information) may be used against the witness in any criminal cases," except in a prosecution for perjury or failure to comply. The statute thus provided for use immunity, permitting a prosecution based on EVIDENCE not derived from the testimony forced by a grant of immunity. (See IMMUNITY GRANT.)

Kastigar was cited for contempt after he persisted in his refusal to testify concerning unnecessary dental services affecting the draft status of persons seeking to evade the draft. His refusal to testify raised the question whether the grant of use immunity was sufficient to displace the Fifth Amendment right.

A seven-member Supreme Court, voting 5–2, sustained the constitutionality of use immunity. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL declared: "We hold that such immunity from use and derivative use is coextensive with the scope of the privilege against self-incrimination, and therefore is sufficient to compel testimony over a claim of the privilege. . . . Transactional immunity, which accords full immunity from prosecution for the offense to which the compelled testimony relates, affords the witness considerably broader protection than does the Fifth Amendment privilege. The privilege has never been construed to mean that one who invokes it cannot subsequently be prosecuted." Powell dismissed COUNSELMAN V. HITCHCOCK (1892) and its progeny, which established the transactional immunity standard, as OBITER DICTA and therefore not binding. Powell reasoned that a witness who had use immunity against his compelled testimony is in substantially the same position as if he had invoked the Fifth Amendment in the absence of a grant of immunity.

But one who relies on his constitutional right to silence gives the state no possible way to use his testimony, however indirectly, against him, and he has not remotely, from the standpoint of the law, criminally implicated himself. Use immunity permits compulsion without removing the implication of criminality. On the other hand, the values of the Fifth Amendment are not infringed if the state prosecutes on evidence not related to the compelled testimony, and the state has the burden of proving that the prosecution relies on evidence from sources independent of the compelled testimony. The trouble is, as Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL pointed out in dissent, that only the prosecuting authorities know, if even they can know, the chains of information by which evidence was gathered. In any case, use immunity compels a person to be a witness against himself criminally.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1974 Against the Law: The Nixon Court and Criminal Justice. Pages 173–187. New York: Harper & Row.

KATZ v. UNITED STATES
389 U.S. 347 (1967)

Katz ended one era of constitutional protection for FOURTH AMENDMENT rights and began another. In OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928) the Supreme Court had virtually exempted from the Fourth Amendment's ban on UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures any search that did not involve a physical intrusion on property and a seizure of tangible things. Although eroded by subsequent decisions, and superseded by a federal statute where wiretapping was required, Olmstead's physical intrusion requirement inhibited constitutional control of aural and visual surveillance for forty years, until Katz was decided.

Federal agents, believing that Katz was using a pay telephone to transmit gambling information, attached a listening and recording device to the outside of the phone booth without trying to meet Fourth Amendment requirements. With the information obtained from the device, the police were able to convict Katz, but the Supreme Court overturned the conviction. The Court ruled that Katz was entitled to Fourth Amendment protection for his conversations and that a physical intrusion into an area occupied by Katz was not necessary to bring the amendment into play. "The Fourth Amendment protects people, not places," wrote Justice POTTER STEWART for a virtually unanimous Court (only Justice HUGO L. BLACK dissented). Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, concurring, developed a test for determining what interests are protected, which has come to be the accepted standard: "first that a person have exhibited an actual (subjective) expectation of privacy and second, that the expectation be one that society is prepared to recognize as "reasonable."

The Court also set out some of the requirements for lawful ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING, supplementing those in BERGER V. NEW YORK (1967), many of which were incorporated in Title III of the OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT of 1968.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

KATZENBACH v. MCCLUNG

See: Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States

KATZENBACH v. MORGAN
384 U.S. 641 (1966)

This decision upheld the constitutionality of section 4(e) of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. Section 4(e) provided that no person who had successfully completed sixth grade in a school in which the language of instruction was other than English should be denied the right to vote in any election because of his inability to read or write English. In Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections (1959) a unanimous Supreme Court had rejected a black citizen's attack on North Carolina's LITERACY TEST for voting. In Morgan the Court, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and over the dissents of Justices JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN and POTTER STEWART, rejected New York State's argument that in enforcing section 5 of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT Congress may prohibit enforcement of state law only if courts determine that the state law violates the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. In light of Lassiter, it seemed unlikely that New York's literacy requirement would be judicially found to violate the Constitution. Instead, the Court found Section 4(e) appropriate legislation to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment by assuring the franchise to those who migrated to New York from PUERTO RICO after completing sixth grade, whether or not that right to vote had been unconstitutionally infringed. The Morgan view that the Fourteenth Amendment confers diescretion upon Congress to act both remedially and prophylactically to protect Fourteenth Amendment rights makes the case a centerpeice for analysis of how far Congress may go to protect or restrict Fourteenth Amendment rights.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

KEATING-OWEN CHILD LABOR ACT
39 Stat. 675 (1916)

This law marked the federal government's first attempt to regulate the use of child labor, culminating a decade-long effort by organized labor, social reformers and workers, publicists, and progressive politicians. The act prohibited the shipment in interstate or foreign commerce of any commodity produced in a mine or factory that employed children under the ages of sixteen and fourteen respectively.

Congressional debates over child labor legislation centered on the scope of national power. Opponents of the measure insisted that it involved a regulation of PRODUCTION, not commerce, and hence violated the TENTH AMENDMENT and the controlling precedent of UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT (1895). Although that decision had been distinguished in other cases involving NATIONAL POLICE POWER uses of the COMMERCE CLAUSE, such as the regulation of adulterated foods, STATES RIGHTS' oriented southern congressmen insisted that the national government could only prohibit harmful items from INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Goods made by children, they insisted, were not harmful in and of themselves. Supporters of a child labor law countered that congressional power over interstate commerce was plenary except for Fifth Amendment limitations. They also maintained that congressional action was imperative because state regulations had proven ineffective.

Supporters of the bill mobilized a broad array of interested groups, coordinated by the highly effective National Child Labor Committee. In addition, some traditionally conservative northern manufacturers lobbied for national action to counter the competitive advantage of new southern industries that operated under ineffectual state laws against child labor. A House committee report reflected this concern, noting that only national power could maintain a national marketplace and prevent unfair competition among the states. Finally, in the summer of 1916, independent progressives convinced a hitherto reluctant President WOODROW WILSON that his support was necessary to insure progressive backing in the forthcoming presidential election. Wilson decisively intervened with southern senators who had prevented passage for nearly six months, and the bill became law on September 1, 1916.

The Keating-Owen Act proved short-lived, for in less than two years the Supreme Court invalidated it in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918). A 5–4 majority held that the act regulated production, not interstate commerce, and violated the Tenth Amendment. The Knight precedent was reconfirmed, and the Court distinguished its approval of police power regulations of the flow of lottery tickets, adulterated foods, prostitutes, and liquor on the grounds that child labor products were not injurious.

Congress followed the Court's action with a new law based on the taxing power, but it, too, was voided. An effort to secure a child labor amendment to the Constitution languished in the 1920s and 1930s, but finally, in 1938, the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT revived the essential elements of Keating-Owen. The Court sustained the new law in UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941), expressly overruling Hammer v. Dagenhart.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

WOOD, STEPHEN 1968 Constitutional Politics in the Progressive Era: Child Labor and the Law. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

KELLY, ALFRED H.
(1907–1976)

Alfred Hinsey Kelly taught constitutional history for many years at Wayne State University. With his colleague Winfred A. Harbison he wrote The American Constitution: Its Origins and Development (1948; 6th ed., with Herman Belz, 1982), now widely regarded as the best single-volume constitutional history ever written. In 1953 Kelly researched the background of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT for the NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE FUND's brief in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), concentrating on establishing the views of the framers of the amendment. He and Fund attorneys THURGOOD MARSHALL and William R. Ming prepared the final version of the historical sections of the brief submitted to the Court; in this brief and in later articles on the Amendment, Kelly distinguished "between the narrow scope of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 and the much broader purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment itself" and emphasized the "broad equalitarian objectives" advocated by Representatives JOHN A. BINGHAM, THADDEUS STEVENS, and other members of Congress in the debates on the amendment. Kelly also provided inside accounts of the Brown litigation in his essay in Quarrels That Shaped the Constitution (John Garraty, ed., 1962) and in interviews with Richard Kluger for the latter's Simple Justice (1976).

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

KEMMLER, IN RE
136 U.S. 436 (1890)

MCELVAINE v. BRUSH
142 U.S. 155 (1891)

O'NEIL v. VERMONT
144 U.S. 155 (1892)

These cases dealt with the meaning of the ban on CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT and with the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Kemmler was sentenced to die in the electric chair, then recently invented. He argued that infliction of death by that device would violate the Fourteenth Amendment, because its PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause or its DUE PROCESS clause meant that no state could inflict a cruel execution. The Court unanimously ruled that a cruel execution would be one involving torture or lingering death, "something inhuman and barbarous," but that the electric chair was a "humane" form of execution. The Court also held that no clause of the Fourteenth Amendment banned punishments not deemed cruel by state courts. Unlike Kemmler, McElvaine explicitly argued that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel punishments; he also argued that solitary confinement of a convict sentenced to death was cruel. Unanimously the Court met and rejected both contentions. In O'Neil's case, however, Justices STEPHEN J. FIELD, DAVID J. BREWER, and JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN in DISSENTING OPINIONS declared that the Fourteenth Amendment applied Eighth Amendment rights and all "fundamental" rights to the states.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

KENNEDY, ANTHONY M.
(1936– )

Anthony M. Kennedy has fulfilled the objectives of President RONALD REAGAN in choosing him to fill the vacancy on the Supreme Court created by the retirement of Justice LEWIS F. POWELL.

First, President Reagan expected that Kennedy's noncontroversial background would ensure him swift confirmation by the Senate. After graduating from Harvard Law School in 1961, Kennedy had worked as a lawyer and lobbyist in California until President GERALD R. FORD appointed him to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1975. While on the bench, Kennedy, who also taught constitutional law at McGeorge School of Law, evolved as a relatively colorless, nonideological conservative, but gained notoriety for writing the lower court opinion striking down the LEGISLATIVE VETO—a result subsequently affirmed by the Supreme Court in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983). In February 1988 the Senate unanimously confirmed Kennedy.

President Reagan also hoped that Kennedy would join Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST and Justices BYRON R. WHITE, SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, and ANTONIN SCALIA to form a conservative majority that would curtail the initiatives of both the WARREN COURT and the BURGER COURT. During his first two terms on the Court, Kennedy did in fact cast the crucial fifth vote with these Justices in several 5–4 decisions expanding state control in the fields of ABORTION, CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, and CIVIL RIGHTS.

However, Kennedy has demonstrated little potential as a leader of the current conservative Justices, others of whom have striven to apply complex interpretative theories to constitutional issues. Instead, Kennedy has emerged as a classically conservative Justice: he has thus far avoided articulating any overarching philosophy of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION and has been reluctant to challenge PRECEDENT.

Kennedy's votes support a view of FEDERALISM under which the states check federal power and are responsible for matters on which the Constitution provides no clear prohibitions. For example, Kennedy joined Justice Scalia's separate opinion in Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co. (1989), which would have denied Congress the power to lift the states' ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity in exercising its legislative powers under Article I. Kennedy also joined Will v. Michigan (1989) and DESHANEY V. WINNEBAGO COUNTY DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1989), which effectively held that neither the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT nor SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, U.S. CODE significantly altered state sovereignty. Similarly, Kennedy maintained in dissent in MISSOURI V. JENKINS (1990) that by upholding a federal court order commanding a school district to impose a tax, the majority impermissibly expanded federal court power at the expense of "fundamental precepts for the democratic control of public institutions."

Kennedy's opinions reflect his belief in a living constitution that recognizes, even against claims of individual liberties, the need for government to adapt to changes in technology and its responsibilities. For example, in SKINNER V. RAILWAY LABOR EXECUTIVES ASSOCIATION (1989) and TREASURY EMPLOYEES UNION V. VON RAAB (1989) Kennedy explained that the FOURTH AMENDMENT did not preclude DRUG TESTING of railway workers after railroad accidents and of customs workers when there was no individualized suspicion and no evidence of drug abuse in the customs service. Similarly, Kennedy rejected FIRST AMENDMENT challenges to a municipal regulation in Ward v. Rock Against Racism (1989) that required performers at an outdoor theater to use the city's sound system and technician, even though the requirement restricted certain speakers and messages.

Kennedy's hesitancy to reverse or to expand precedent reflects his preference for deciding cases on the narrowest available grounds and to affect settled doctrine as little as possible. Accordingly, in Saffle v. Parks (1990) Kennedy read precedents narrowly in order to deny federal HABEAS CORPUS relief because the respondent had raised a new legal claim that could not be applied retroactively on collateral review. Kennedy also hewed closely to precedent in Barnard v. Thorstenn (1989) in holding that residency requirements for admission to the Virgin Islands bar violated the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of Article IV.

In WEBSTER V. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES (1989), Kennedy refused to join Justice Scalia's concurrence urging overruling of ROE V. WADE (1973), but joined Chief Justice Rehnquist's PLURALITY OPINION that rejected the trimester analysis used by the Roe Court for measuring the importance of the state's interest. Similarly, in CITY OF RICHMOND V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989) Kennedy refused to join Justice Scalia's concurrence challenging a city's set-aside of public funds for minority contractors, as well as the congressional program on which it was modeled, which had been upheld in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980). Kennedy's concurrence emphasized that Fullilove posed a difficult but separate issue concerning the scope of congressional power under section 5 of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In PATTERSON V. MCLEAN CREDIT UNION (1989), Kennedy narrowly reaffirmed RUNYON V. MCCRARY (1976). Although the Runyon Court had applied 42 U.S.C. section 1981 to restrict racial discrimination in private school admissions, Kennedy refused to apply the statute's prohibitions of discrimination in the "formation" or "making" of contracts to racial harassment in the conditions of employment.

Dissenting in James v. Illinois (1990), Kennedy reluctantly accepted precedents imposing the EXCLUSIONARY RULE on the states, but suggested the rule should not have been applied to prevent the prosecution from using illegally obtained evidence to impeach the defendant and other defense witnesses in a criminal trial. Similarly, in Jones v. Thomas (1989), Kennedy acknowledged, but refused to extend, the traditional DOUBLE JEOPARDY prohibition (against multiple sentences for the same offense) to preclude the petitioner's continued confinement under a longer sentence after he had completed a commuted sentence imposed for the same offense. He also explained in WASHINGTON V. HARPER (1990) that the involuntary administration of antipsychotic drugs to a violent prisoner comported with both SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS and PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS.

However, in his dissent in COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY V. ACLU (1989), Kennedy urged abandoning the Court's traditional test in ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE cases. He argued that the Court's test separated church and state more than the Framers intended.

The major exception to Kennedy's narrow construction of individual rights is his concurrence in TEXAS V. JOHNSON (1989), in which the Court held 5–4 that the First Amendment protected flag burning as political speech. Kennedy explained that "the flag protects even those who would hold it in contempt."

Kennedy's steadfast refusal to offer a sophisticated alternative to the grander constitutional visions of his fellow conservatives may foretell a modest role for him. Ironically, such a role would reflect Kennedy's vision of the Court's modest role in a system governed by traditional notions of federalism.

MICHAEL J. GERHARDT
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Flag Desecration; Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5 (Framing); Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5 (Judicial Construction).)

Bibliography

CHEMERINSKY, ERWIN 1989 Foreword: The Vanishing Constitution. Harvard Law Review 103:43–104.

MALTZ, EARL M. 1990 The Prospects for a Revival of Conservative Activism in Constitutional Jurisprudence. Georgia Law Review 24:629–668.

KENNEDY, ANTHONY M.
(1936– )
(Update)

After spending his first few terms on the Supreme Court as a reliable if nonideological conservative Justice, Anthony M. Kennedy has emerged as a "swing vote" on the REHNQUIST COURT. His predecessor, Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, JR., played a similar role on the BURGER COURT, but unlike Powell, Kennedy does not tend to stake out intermediate positions on controversial issues. Instead, Kennedy has strong views that happen to place him at the Court's center. In some areas he joins the conservative bloc, consisting of Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, and Justices ANTONIN SCALIA, CLARENCE THOMAS, and (on many issues) SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR. In other areas, Kennedy joins the moderate-to-liberal bloc, consisting of Justices JOHN PAUL STEVENS, DAVID H. SOUTER, RUTH BADER GINSBURG, and STE-PHEN G. BREYER. The one near-constant is that Kennedy's position commands at least four other votes.

Kennedy's views about the relation between the states and the federal government are illustrative. He has joined the conservative bloc in a string of decisions invalidating federal laws as infringing upon state SOVEREIGNTY. These cases alternatively invoke the TENTH AMENDMENT, Printz v. United States (1997); the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT, Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida (1996); or Congress's limited enumerated powers, UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995), City of Boerne v. Flores (1997); but they consistently display a skepticism toward federal power. Kennedy does not, however, romanticize the states in the way that the other conservatives appear to do. He was the only member of the Court who voted to invalidate both the federal Gun-Free School Zones Act and a state's efforts to impose TERM LIMITS on members of its congressional delegation, Thornton v. U.S. Term Limits (1995). As he wrote in a concurrence in the latter case: "That the States may not invade the sphere of federal sovereignty is as incontestable, in my view, as the corollary proposition that the Federal Government must be held within the boundaries of its own power when it intrudes upon matters reserved to the States." The driving force behind Kennedy's FEDERALISM jurisprudence is neither nationalism nor STATES' RIGHTS, but an abiding belief in limited government at all levels.

Kennedy's libertarian streak also informs his individual rights jurisprudence. He generally takes an expansive view of FREEDOM OF SPEECH rights under the FIRST AMENDMENT, although he recognizes a legitimate role for government regulation in cases involving a risk of private monopolization of speech, TURNER BROADCASTING SYSTEM V. FCC (1997), and government-funded speech, RUST V. SULLIVAN (1991), NEA v. Finley (1998). The funding "exception" has its limits, though, as Kennedy argued in a (partially) DISSENTING OPINION sympathetic to speakers claiming a right to access to public spaces, even nontraditional spaces such as public airports, INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS V. LEE (1992).

Kennedy's sharpest disagreement with the conservative bloc concerns the role of the Court in enforcing constitutional rights beyond those expressly enumerated in the text, under the doctrine of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. In PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992), Kennedy, O'Connor, and Souter jointly authored an opinion reaffirming the "central holding" of ROE V. WADE (1973). Although the Casey opinion relied in part on the doctrine of STARE DECISIS, it also contained a ringing endorsement of the practice of judicial protection for unenumerated rights. In other contexts as well, Kennedy has disagreed with the claim that the Constitution protects only those rights spelled out in the text or widely accepted at the time of its adoption.

If Kennedy's endorsement of a right to ABORTION and other unenumerated rights has disappointed conservatives' hopes, they have found his jurisprudence on questions of race more to their liking. He interprets the constitutional requirement of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS to mandate "color-blindness" in nearly all circumstances, and has thus voted to strike down AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs and ELECTORAL DISTRICTING in which race was the predominant factor in the drawing of district lines.

The principal themes of Kennedy's equal protection jurisprudence—and much of his rights jurisprudence more generally—are inclusion and fairness. Outside the context of affirmative action, this has often led Kennedy to cast liberal votes. For example, in Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co. (1991), he found that the Constitution bars race-based PEREMPTORY JURY CHALLENGES, even in civil cases. Kennedy's opinion in that case reflects an extremely expansive view of the doctrine of what constitutes STATE ACTION, because he saw this approach as necessary to ensure that persons not be denied the opportunity to carry out their duty as jurors simply on the basis of their race. The theme of inclusion also explains his opinion for a 5–4 Court in LEE V. WEISMAN (1992). Although Kennedy usually votes to permit significant state ACCOMMODATION OF RELIGION, his opinion in Lee invalidated an official prayer at a public high school graduation. The opinion roundly condemns the suggestion that no violation occurred simply because the students were not required to participate in the graduation ceremony in order to receive their degrees: "to say a teenage student has a real choice not to attend her high school graduation is formalistic in the extreme," Kennedy wrote.

ROMER V. EVANS (1996) may be the apotheosis of Kennedy's individual rights jurisprudence. In that case, the Court addressed a challenge to an amendment to the Colorado constitution prohibiting the state or any of its subdivisions from enacting or enforcing laws protecting homosexuals from discrimination. Without deciding whether governmental discrimination on the basis of SEXUAL ORIENTATION is inherently suspect, and without even citing BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986), which upheld the criminalization of homosexual sodomy, Kennedy's opinion in Romer invalidates the Colorado amendment as born of an irrational antipathy towards an unpopular group. Although Kennedy nominally uses the least demanding test for constitutionality under the equal protection clause— the RATIONAL BASIS test—the opinion's great strength (or from the perspective of those who disagree, its glaring weakness), is its extremely sparse use of formal legal categories.

In Romer, Kennedy appears to be speaking to the nation at large, explaining why the Colorado amendment offends basic principles of fairness and inclusion, and thus offends the Constitution as well. These principles lie at the center of Kennedy's constitutional vision, and thus at the center of the Rehnquist Court's constitutional vision as well.

MICHAEL C. DORF
(2000)

Bibliography

AMAR, AKHIL R. 1997 Justice Kennedy and the Ideal of Equality. Pacific Law Journal 28:515–532.

EDELMAN, PAUL H. and CHEN, JIM 1996 The Most Dangerous Justice: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Mathematics. Southern California Law Review 70:63–105.

FRIEDMAN, LAWRENCE 1993 The Limitations of Labeling: Justice Anthony M. Kennedy and the First Amendment. Ohio Northern University Law Review 20:225–262.

SULLIVAN, KATHLEEN M. 1992 The Supreme Court 1991 Term—Foreword: The Justices of Rules and Standards. Harvard Law Review 106:22–123.

KENNEDY, JOHN F.
(1917–1963)

John Fitzgerald Kennedy entered the White House in 1961 as the heir to the liberal, Democratic party tradition of WOODROW WILSON, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, and HARRY S. TRUMAN. Youthful, vigorous, and blessed with extraordinary rhetorical powers, Kennedy saw himself as an activist chief executive and pledged to "get the country moving again," especially with respect to economic growth and international competition with the Soviet Union. But during his one thousand days in office, Kennedy's performance often lagged behind his promises.

His appointments to the Supreme Court were unexceptional. To the first vacancy, created by the retirement of CHARLES WHITTAKER, he named deputy attorney general BYRON R. WHITE, a former All American football player, Rhodes Scholar, and campaign adviser. White's intellect and productivity exceeded those of his predecessor; he often aligned himself with the conservative faction on the WARREN COURT. To replace Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER and to fill the chair once occupied by OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO, Kennedy named ARTHUR GOLDBERG, a hard-working, conscientious labor lawyer, who usually voted with the liberals on the Warren Court but was blessed with neither intellectual brilliance nor a dashing prose style.

Kennedy's appointments to the lower federal courts were often dreadful, especially in the southern circuits, where "senatorial courtesy" gave great influence to segregationist Democratic senators. The result was Kennedy's appointment of a number of federal district judges who were openly segregationist and, in some instances, openly racist. On the other hand, Kennedy did place THURGOOD MARSHALL on the circuit court in New York; the Department of Justice, under the prodding of Attorney General ROBERT F. KENNEDY, began to intervene to protect CIVIL RIGHTS workers in the South; and Solicitor General Archibald Cox became a forceful and articulate spokesman for racial justice.

The struggle of black Americans to batter down the walls of segregation and win access to the voting booths of the deep South was the great domestic constitutional issue of the Kennedy years. The administration's response to this crisis blended pragmatism and expediency with idealism and occasional moral outrage. While forcing the South to accept the token integration of higher education, the administration did not push hard for similar results in the primary and secondary grades. The official violence inflicted upon civil rights activists during the Birmingham, Alabama, demonstrations led Kennedy to propose to Congress legislation which became, after his death, the landmark CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. Many students of the Kennedy presidency regard his televised address in support of this legislation as his finest hour. On the other hand, the Kennedy brothers were not enthusiastic supporters of the 1963 March on Washington, and under pressure from FBI Director J. EDGAR HOOVER they endorsed the electronic surveillance of civil rights leader MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

If civil rights received growing constitutional protection from the Kennedy administration, CIVIL LIBERTIES often suffered at the hands of a regime that espoused vigorous presidential leadership and believed that the ends usually justified the means. Outraged that the nation's leading steel producers had raised prices in defiance of an informal agreement with labor and the White House, Kennedy threatened the offending corporations with tax audits, securities law investigations, and cancellation of defense contracts. Robert Kennedy's unremitting war against organized crime figures skirted the boundary of assorted illegalities, including WARRANTLESS SEARCHES and ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING. By waging a clandestine war against Fidel Castro's communist regime in Cuba, the Kennedy brothers also displayed a cavalier attitude about the RULE OF LAW. Operation Mongoose, directed by the attorney general, involved acts of sabotage and terrorism against the Cuban regime, most of them in violation of the neutrality laws.

Although their motives were sometimes the highest, John Kennedy and his closest advisers often fostered a disrespect for legal norms and an inflated conception of executive power that would haunt the nation during the decade after his assassination in 1963.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

Bibliography

NAVASKY, VICTOR 1977 Kennedy Justice. New York: Atheneum.
PARMET, HERBERT S. 1983 JFK: The Presidency of John F. Kennedy. New York: Dial Press.

KENNEDY, ROBERT F.
(1925–1968)

After brief service in the Department of Justice, Robert F. Kennedy joined the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the United States Senate (then headed by JOSEPH MCCARTHY) in 1953 as assistant counsel. When John McClellan became chairman in 1955 he appointed Kennedy chief counsel. In 1957 Kennedy became chief counsel of McClellan's Senate Rackets Committee and achieved national fame during the committee's investigations of teamsters' union leaders David Beck and James Hoffa.

Kennedy was appointed attorney general in 1961 by his brother, President JOHN F. KENNEDY. In this post he distinguished himself by vigorous enforcement of CIVIL RIGHTS—desegregating schools and interstate transportation facilities—and by finally securing the conviction of Hoffa on jury-tampering charges. (See HOFFA V. UNITED STATES.) As the President's closest adviser he exerted more influence on FOREIGN AFFAIRS than most attorneys general, heading the "executive committee" of the National Security Council during the Cuban missile crisis of 1962.

As a United States senator from New York (1965–1968), Kennedy voted for the GULF OF TONKIN RESOLUTION but later opposed President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's conduct of the VIETNAM WAR. He was assassinated by a Palestinian nationalist while campaigning for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1968.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

LASKY, VICTOR 1968 Robert F. Kennedy: The Man and the Myth. New York: Trident.

KENNEDY, ROBERT F.
(1925–1968)
(Update)

Robert Kennedy was named ATTORNEY GENERAL of the United States in 1961 by his brother President JOHN F. KENNEDY. A graduate of Harvard College and the University of Virginia Law School, he had served as counsel for Senate committees in the 1950s and acquired a reputation as an able and relentless prosecutor. His appointment was ascribed to nepotism and provoked widespread criticism.

Kennedy surrounded himself with an exceptionally able group of lawyers, headed by Archibald Cox of the Harvard Law School as SOLICITOR GENERAL and by BYRON R. WHITE, later of the Supreme Court, as deputy attorney general. In time, he won general respect for capable, humane, and nonpolitical administration of the Department of Justice.

The major challenge was the enforcement of CIVIL RIGHTS statutes and decisions. Robert Kennedy brought about the end of SEGREGATION in interstate transportation and used government intervention, including federal marshals, to support black students seeking entry to the University of Mississippi (1962) and the University of Alabama (1963).

Civil rights activists criticized the Justice Department for segregationist appointments to the southern bench and for unwillingness to assume local POLICE POWER in protection of civil rights workers. The problem of FEDERALISM and civil rights caused Kennedy anguish, but he believed that LOCAL GOVERNMENTS had primary responsibility for law enforcement and feared the implications of a national police force.

The key to racial justice in his view was voting: "From participation in the elections," he said, "flow all other rights." Department of Justice lawyers fanned out across the South to fight VOTING RIGHTS cases. In 1963, after outrages in Birmingham and elsewhere in the South, the Kennedys submitted a comprehensive civil rights bill to Congress. The CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, passed after President Kennedy's assassination, was the most far-reaching civil rights statute since RECONSTRUCTION.

Like all attorneys general from 1920 to 1970, Kennedy had the problem of J. EDGAR HOOVER, the autocratic and increasingly tendentious chief of the FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION (FBI). Kennedy required the FBI to hire black agents, to reduce its obsession with communism, and to move into such neglected fields as civil rights and organized crime.

Kennedy personally argued the case of GRAY V. SANDERS (1963), in which the Supreme Court struck down the Georgia county-unit system and affirmed the principle of ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE. He secured provision of counsel and reform of the BAIL system in the interests of INDIGENT defendants, and his Committee on Juvenile Delinquency laid the foundation for the War on Poverty in the later 1960s.

He also played a role in FOREIGN AFFAIRS but as the President's troubleshooter, not as his legal adviser. The Central Intelligence Agency covert action that the younger Kennedy promoted against Fidel Castro's Cuba, like all covert action, violated international law. During the Cuban missile crisis, however, he opposed a surprise air strike on Cuba, observing that "a sneak attack was not in our traditions." After serving nine prickly months as LYNDON B. JOHNSON's attorney general, Kennedy resigned and ran successfully for the Senate from New York. He was assassinated in 1968.

As attorney general, Robert Kennedy, though not a legal technician himself, had a high appreciation of technical legal ability in others, sought impartial enforcement of domestic law, gave new impetus to the movement for racial justice, and organized one of the strongest Departments of Justice in recent times.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.
(1992)

Bibliography

NAVASKY, VICTOR 1971 Kennedy Justice. New York: Atheneum.
SCHLESINGER, ARTHUR M., JR. 1978 Robert F. Kennedy and His Times. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

KENT, JAMES
(1763–1847)

James Kent, a New York jurist, influenced American constitutional jurisprudence through both his writings and his judicial opinions. Largely because of his Commentaries on American Law, Kent was as important a legal figure as any in nineteenth-century America. The Commentaries went through fourteen editions by 1900 and innumerable popular abridgments. After publication of the fifth edition, editors came and went, but they wrought their changes mostly in the notes, leaving Kent's work intact. For approximately three-quarters of a century Kent was for many lawyers, throughout the country, their primary legal authority.

Originally a two-volume set when it appeared in 1826, the Commentaries were quickly expanded to four. Ostensibly the book was commenced after Kent's mandatory retirement from the bench on reaching age sixty in 1823. Yet, it is possible to see the work in process through Kent's carefully crafted opinions beginning with his appointment to the New York Supreme Court in 1798, and continuing while he was the state's chancellor, 1814–1823. And it is scarcely stretching matters to consider the writing of the Commentaries a lifelong process.

Kent's twenty-five years of judicial opinions were imbued with the federalism of the late eighteenth century. At the heart of Kent's jurisprudence was an independent judiciary whose role was to maintain society's moral order. Because of a quirk in New York's 1777 constitution, Kent participated in the veto process as a member of the Council of Revision, which considered all bills passed by the legislature. This process meant that New York judges would have little reason to exercise JUDICIAL REVIEW when a statute's constitutionality was questioned in a case. Having approved the steamboat monopoly bill on several occasions while sitting on the council, for example, New York judges would be unlikely to declare the law contrary to the federal constitution when such a challenge was made in Livingston v. Van Ingen (1812) and GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1819, 1820).

The moral order that Kent and his brethren sought to maintain covered many facets of life, including freedom of expression. There was no room in Kent's order of things for BLASPHEMY—"it tends to corrupt the morals of the people, and to destroy good order," he wrote in People v. Ruggles (1811)—but a Federalist printer was afforded the defense of truth to the COMMON LAW charge of criminal libel against THOMAS JEFFERSON in PEOPLE V. CROSWELL (1804). The New York Supreme Court was evenly divided in Croswell, so that Kent's opinion, based on ALEXANDER HAMILTON's argument, did not become law in itself. A year later the legislature made truth a defense in libel suits, provided the alleged libelous matter "was published with good motives and for justifiable ends." Kent and his colleagues were careful, moreover, in their interpretation of the law, subsequently inserted in the state constitution of 1821, to protect officeholders, setting the groundwork for Root v. King (1829), which kept a bridle on attacks on New York public officials until NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964).

Kent made another major contribution to constitutional law in Livingston v. Van Ingen (1812), by elaborately enunciating the doctrine of concurrent commerce powers. The Livingston-Fulton steamboat monopoly symbolized New York's encouragement of commercial enterprise. Under the statute creating the monopoly, any competitor was required to get a license in order to run a steamboat on New York waters. In his opinion for the state's court of last resort, Kent legitimized the monopoly in a decision that reversed Chancellor JOHN LANSING's refusal to grant the monopoly an INJUNCTION against unlicensed competition. Of particular constitutional moment was the argument that the monopoly violated the federal Constitution's COMMERCE CLAUSE. In rejecting this argument, Kent asserted that in the absence of actual conflict between state and national laws, states retained the powers to regulate commerce. Seven years later in Ogden v. Gibbons (1819), Kent found no such conflict between the monopoly and the federal coasting act of 1793. In the United States Supreme Court, however, that served as the basis for JOHN MARSHALL's invalidation of the monopoly in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824). Kent's doctrine of concurrent commerce powers persisted, though, largely through the efforts of his former law clerk and judicial colleague, SMITH THOMPSON, and for a time it won the support of the TANEY COURT.

Kent was also responsible for first enunciating what would become the Cherokee doctrine. Speaking for the New York court in Goodell v. Jackson (1823), Kent fully developed the paternalistic notion that American Indian peoples, though subject, were sovereign nations, a theme adopted by Thompson in his Cherokee Nation v. Georgia dissent (1831), which in turn was adopted by Marshall for the Supreme Court in Worcester v. Georgia (1832). (See CHEROKEE INDIAN CASES.)

Important as Kent's occasional constitutional opinions may have been, his major contribution to constitutional development remains the Commentaries. There is apparent irony in this accomplishment because Kent did not emphasize constitutional law; instead, he salted that subject into the great body of American law between the law of nations and the construction of wills. Kent succeeded in putting constitutional law in its proper perspective compared to other important aspects of the law. In addition, Kent admirably digested the great Marshall opinions so as, in the opinion of THOMAS REED POWELL, to make them decidedly more palatable than they were in the original. Needless to say, the Commentaries continued to vote Federalist.

DONALD ROPER
(1986)

Bibliography

BAUER, ELIZABETH KELLEY 1952 Commentaries on the Constitution 1790–1860. New York: Columbia University Press.

HORTON, JOHN T. 1939 James Kent: A Study in Conservatism 1763–1847. New York: Appleton-Century Co.

KENT v. DULLES
357 U.S. 116 (1958)

This decision severely limited the State Department's discretionary passport policies. During the Cold War era, the department routinely denied passports to those who refused to sign a noncommunist affidavit. The Supreme Court held that the department lacked statutory authority for this policy and went on to remark in OBITER DICTUM that the RIGHT TO TRAVEL, which it traced back to MAGNA CARTA, was protected by the DUE PROCESS clause of the FIFTH AMENDMENT.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS

See: Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions

KER v. CALIFORNIA
374 U.S. 23 (1963)

In Ker the Supreme Court clarified the constitutional standards governing the states in SEARCH AND SEIZURE cases. MAPP V. OHIO (1961), in applying the federal EXCLUSIONARY RULE against the states, had left undetermined whether they would retain some latitude to fashion their own search rules. The Court answered this question in Ker, holding that the protection against state searches granted by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT is coextensive with that of the FOURTH AMENDMENT against federal searches. Only Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN disagreed. The Court's single-standard position, he feared, might lead to dilution of federal search safeguards because the Court would be reluctant to fetter the states with standards beyond their reach.

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

KEYES v. SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1
413 U.S. 189 (1973)

Keyes, the Denver school DESEGREGATION case, was the first such case to reach the Supreme Court from a district outside the South. The case gave the Court an opportunity to decide whether the fact of separation of the races in a city's schools was sufficient to justify desegregation remedies, even in the absence of any history of state law commanding SEGREGATION or any deliberate segregative action by the school board. The Court found it unnecessary to decide this question. Deliberate segregative actions of the board in one substantial part of the city, the Court said, raised a presumption of de jure segregation affecting the whole district; absent a showing that the district's parts were truly unrelated, a districtwide remedy would be approved on the basis of SWANN V. CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BOARD OF EDUCATION (1971). The Court thus affirmed a busing order affecting twelve percent of the district's pupils. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN wrote for a Court that was no longer unanimous.

Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, in a separate opinion that was more dissent than concurrence, argued that the time had come to scrap the DE FACTO/DE JURE distinction. In his view, Swann effectively required a school board to provide a remedy not only for segregation deliberately brought about by its own action or by state law but also for residential segregation—a fact of urban life throughout the country. "Segregative intent" was an illusory concept, he said. Once the fact of racial separation is shown, a board should have the duty to take appropriate steps to minimize school segregation. Massive busing, however, was not an appropriate remedy in his opinion, chiefly because of its costs to the values of the neighborhood school. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, concurring, also thought that the de facto de jure distinction made no sense but thought busing an appropriate remedy. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER concurred in the result, Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST dissented, and Justice BYRON R. WHITE did not participate.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Columbus Board of Education v. Penick; School Busing.)

KEYISHIAN v. BOARD OF REGENTS
385 U.S. 589 (1967)

ADLER V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1952) was one of the cases in which the Supreme Court upheld a wide range of regulations barring "subversives" from government employment. Keyishian overruled Adler and was the culmination of a series of later decisions restricting LOYALTY-SECURITY PROGRAMS, typically by invoking the VAGUENESS and OVERBREADTH doctrines. Keyishian struck down some parts of a complex New York law limiting employment in public teaching; the law's use of the term "seditious" was unconstitutionally vague. Other parts of the law were invalid because they prohibited mere knowing membership in the Communist party without the specific intent required by ELFBRANDT V. RUSSELL (1966). Keyishian confirmed the Court's previous decisions rejecting the doctrine that public employment is a privilege to which government may attach whatever conditions it pleases.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

KIDD v. PEARSON
128 U.S. 1 (1888)

A unanimous Court distinguished manufacturing and all forms of PRODUCTION from INTERSTATE COMMERCE, holding that a state act prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicants did not conflict with the national power to regulate interstate commerce and that the manufacture of a product for export to other states did not make it an article of interstate commerce.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

KILBOURN v. THOMPSON
103 U.S. 168 (1881)

Until this case Congress believed that its power of conducting investigations was unlimited and that its judicial authority to punish contumacious witnesses for contempt was unquestionable. After this case both the investigatory and CONTEMPT POWERS of Congress were distinctly limited and subject to JUDICIAL REVIEW. Not until MCGRAIN V. DAUGHERTY (1927) did the Court firmly establish the constitutional basis for oversight and investigatory powers. The decision in Kilbourn was so negative in character that the legitimate area of LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATIONS seemed murky.

Kilbourn developed out of the House's investigation, by a select committee, into the activities of a bankrupt banking firm that owed money to the United States. The committee subpoenaed Kilbourn's records, which he refused to produce, and interrogated him, but he refused to answer on the ground that the questions concerned private matters. The House cited him for contempt and jailed him. He in turn sued for false arrest, and on a writ of HABEAS CORPUS he obtained a review of his case before the Supreme Court.

Unanimously, in an opinion by Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER, the Court held that neither house of Congress can punish a witness for contumacy unless his testimony is required on a matter concerning which "the House has jurisdiction to inquire," and, Miller added, neither house has "the general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen." The subject of this inquiry, Miller said, was judicial in nature, not legislative, and a case was pending in a lower federal court. The investigation was fruitless also because "it could result in no valid legislation" on the subject of the inquiry. Thus, the courts hold final power to decide what constitutes a contempt of Congress, and Congress cannot compel a witness to testify in an investigation that cannot assist remedial legislation.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR.
(1929–1968)

Martin Luther King, Jr., preeminent leader of the black freedom movement of the 1950s and 1960s, repeatedly challenged America to live up to the egalitarian principles set forth in the three RECONSTRUCTION era amendments. "If we are wrong, the Constitution of the United States is wrong," King told his Alabama colleagues in an unpublished speech on December 5, 1955, the day that Montgomery's black citizens began a year-long campaign against discriminatory seating practices on city buses. Victory in that struggle catapulted King to national prominence as an exponent of nonviolent protest against racial oppression, and throughout the twelve remaining years of his life King pursued and expanded his challenge to injustice and exploitation internationally as well as domestically.

Pointing out in his 1964 book, Why We Can't Wait, that the United States was "a society where the supreme law of the land, the Constitution, is rendered inoperative in vast areas of the nation" because of explicit RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, King described the CIVIL RIGHTS struggle as a resumption "of that noble journey toward the goals reflected in the PREAMBLE to the Constitution, the Constitution itself, the BILL OF RIGHTS and the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS." Protest campaigns in segregationist strongholds such as Birmingham and Selma, Alabama, stimulated national support for landmark legislative achievements such as the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 and the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965, and produced an all-but-complete victory over de jure segregation by the middle of that decade.

Recognizing that other evils more subtle than segregation also tangibly afflicted the daily lives of millions of black people, King broadened his attack to include all forms of poverty and economic injustice, saying that the movement had to go beyond civil rights to human rights. That progression, coupled with King's outspoken condemnations of America's militaristic foreign policy, particularly its participation in the VIETNAM WAR, led King to advocate basic changes in American society reaching far beyond his previous attacks on racial discrimination.

Identified as a prominent advocate of CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE against immoral segregation statutes even before his influential 1963 "Letter from Birmingham Jail," King defended his position by reference to the long tradition of NATURAL RIGHTS thinking. In his early years of civil rights activism King said that peaceful, willing violation of such statutes forced courts to void unconstitutional provisions, but toward the end of his life King expanded his argument, contending that the weightier moral demands of social justice sometimes required that nondiscriminatory laws also be violated. If any laws blocked the oppressed from confronting the nation with moral issues of human rights and economic justice, then such laws rightfully could be breached. Although King until 1966 had believed that depicting the brutalities of racism best attracted national support for civil rights, in his final years King repeatedly suggested that protesters might have to coerce concessions from unwilling federal officials by obstructing the orderly functioning of society until the desired policy changes were made.

King's challenge to American racism helped to close the gap between constitutional principles and discriminatory practices; his broader struggle against other forms of human injustice left a legacy that will stimulate future generations for years to come.

DAVID J. GARROW
(1986)

Bibliography

GARROW, DAVID J. 1986 Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, 1955–1968. New York: William Morrow.

KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR. 1964 Why We Can't Wait. New York: New American Library.

KING, RUFUS
(1755–1827)

Rufus King, a Harvard-educated lawyer who had been an officer in the Revolutionary War, represented Massachusetts in the Congress of the Confederation from 1784 to 1787. He was a principal author of the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE, and wrote its provisions prohibiting SLAVERY and protecting the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS against legislative impairment.

Although he originally opposed either calling a convention or radically altering the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, he represented Massachusetts at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. King soon became a spokesman for those who favored a strong national government and for the interests of the large northern states. Very early in the debates he advocated consolidation rather than confederation: although he recognized that it was impossible to annihilate the states, he thought they should be stripped of much of their power. He argued against equal representation of the states in the SENATE, and he favored popular election of the President. King proposed the CONTRACT CLAUSE, and, although it was voted down in the Committee of the Whole, he saw that it was inserted into the Constitution by the Committee on Style, of which he was a member. In opposition to GOUVERNEUR MORRIS, he supported the admission of new states on terms of equality with the old. King was also one of the first to recognize publicly that the politically important division of the country was not between large and small states, but between North and South.

Almost immediately after attending the Massachusetts ratifying convention, he moved to New York and was elected one of its original United States senators. King served in the Senate from 1789 to 1796, and was a leading spokesman for ALEXANDER HAMILTON (his political patron) and the Federalist administration.

King returned to the Senate in 1813. Although an opponent of the War of 1812, he refused to attend the HARTFORD CONVENTION, denounced New England's threat of SECESSION, and supported the government financially. Serving in the Senate until 1825, King participated in the debates over the MISSOURI COMPROMISE. Although not an abolitionist, King opposed the extension of slavery, and he contended that it was within the power of Congress to make permanent abolition of slavery a condition of Missouri's admission as a state. He insisted upon constitutional guarantees of the rights of black Missourians.

In his public career, King was the Federalist candidate for vice-president (1804, 1808) and President (1816), and was twice minister to Great Britain (1796–1803, 1825–1826).

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

KINGSLEY BOOKS, INC. v. BROWN
354 U.S. 436 (1957)

Kingsley authorized broad civil remedies to control the merchandising of OBSCENITY. The Supreme Court upheld a New York statute permitting state officials to obtain INJUNCTIONS against the sale of allegedly obscene materials before a judicial determination that the materials were obscene and, after trial, to seize and destroy any material found to be obscene. Rejecting assertions that the statutory scheme was an unconstitutional PRIOR RESTRAINT, the majority concluded that the scheme in actual application did not differ from the criminal remedies sanctioned in Alberts v. California (1957), decided the same day. (See ROTH V. UNITED STATES.)

The dissenters argued that numerous procedural defects rendered the statute unconstitutional. The seizure and destruction of the obscene books were tantamount to "book burning," according to Chief Justice EARL WARREN, for books were judged outside the context of their use. Justices WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS and HUGO L. BLACK, jointly dissenting, argued that an injunction before trial was censorship. They also would have required a finding of obscenity for each publication of the condemned work rather than regulating speech like "diseased cattle and impure butter." Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN contended that the statute was vastly defective for permitting a judge, rather than a jury, to determine a work's obscenity.

KIM MCLANE WARDLAW
(1986)

KINGSLEY INTERNATIONAL PICTURES CORP. v. REGENTS
360 U.S. 684 (1959)

In Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents the state of New York had refused to issue a license for the motion picture Lady Chatterley's Lover because it "alluringly portrays adultery as proper behavior." There was no claim that the film constituted an INCITEMENT TO UNLAWFUL CONDUCT. Without deciding whether all licensing schemes for motion pictures were unconstitutional the Supreme Court held that the refusal to grant this license violated the FIRST AMENDMENT. The Court reaffirmed that motion pictures were within the scope of the First Amendment and proclaimed that the amendment's "basic guarantee" is "the freedom to advocate ideas," including the idea that adultery may in some cases be justified.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

KINSELLA v. KRUEGER

See: Reid v. Covert

KIRBY v. ILLINOIS
406 U.S. 682 (1972)

In an effort to eviscerate UNITED STATES V. WADE (1967) without overruling it, a plurality of the Supreme Court held that the RIGHT TO COUNSEL does not apply to pretrial identification procedures that occur before INDICTMENT or other indicia of formal criminal charges. The case involved the most suggestive confrontation imaginable: a one-to-one presentation of the person upon whom police had found a robbery victim's credit cards. Yet the Court held that because this confrontation occurred before Kirby had been formally charged, it was not a "critical stage" of the proceedings requiring counsel to preserve a future right to a FAIR TRIAL.

The distinction between pre- and postindictment identification procedures is dubious for two reasons. First, the vast majority of LINEUPS occur while cases are under investigation, and thus before indictment. Second, all the dangers of irreparable mistaken identification and the inability of counsel to reconstruct the pretrial confrontation—which had been the foundation of Wade—apply whether the identification occurs before or after formal charging. The plurality's startling misreading of precedent was highlighted when Justice BYRON R. WHITE, who dissented in Wade, dissented in Kirby also, saying that Wade compelled the opposite result.

Kirby leaves untouched the possible DUE PROCESS objections to an unfair pretrial confrontation. Proof of unfairness would require suppression of testimony about the pretrial procedure as well as the in-court identification by a witness whose perceptions were possibly tainted. A due process objection may be made whether the pretrial confrontation has occurred before or after formal charging.

Of course, it is much more difficult for the accused to show that a confrontation was fundamentally unfair than to prove that it was done without counsel.

BARBARA ALLEN BABCOCK
(1986)

KIRSCHBAUM v. WALLING
316 U.S. 517 (1942)

After UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941) the Court decided many cases on the coverage of the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, which benefited employees "engaged in commerce or in the PRODUCTION of goods for commerce." Congress by no means had made the statute coextensive with the limits of its power over INTERSTATE COMMERCE, but every time the Court ruled that the statute covered certain employees, it brought their activities within the scope of the COMMERCE CLAUSE. The leading case is Kirschbaum, which extended statutory coverage—and thus the commerce power—to employees who were at least one step away from production. On the theory that service and maintenance employees kept a building safe and habitable, the Court held that a landlord who rented space to a firm that manufactured goods destined for interstate commerce had to pay his janitors and elevator operators the minima fixed by the statute. In Borden Milk Co. v. Barella (1945), the Court upheld application of the statute to service employees in a building occupied by the executive offices of a company that carried on its interstate manufacturing elsewhere. In Martino v. Michigan Window Cleaning Co. (1946), the employees who benefited from the statute—window cleaners employed by a company to service an industrial building—were two steps removed from production for commerce. Similarly, in D. A. Schulte v. Gangi (1946), the Court extended the statute and the commerce power to the maintenance people employed by a building owner who rented space to a firm that worked on intrastate goods and returned them to a contractor who subsequently shipped some of them across state lines. Employees sometimes did lose, but the Court's interpretations in these cases showed that the commerce power virtually authorized Congress to regulate any business, however remote its economic connection with interstate commerce.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

KLOPFER v. NORTH CAROLINA
386 U.S. 213 (1967)

Prior to the Supreme Court's decision in Klopfer, only defendants in federal courts enjoyed the Sixth Amendment right to a SPEEDY TRIAL. Consequently, legislation in many states permitted prosecutors to postpone bringing pending cases to trial indefinitely. Declaring such state laws unconstitutional, the Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice EARL WARREN, held that the right to a speedy trial is a FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT incorporated by the DUE PROCESS CLAUSE of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and thus fully applicable in state trials.

WENDY E. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Incorporation Doctrine.)

KNIGHT COMPANY, E. C., UNITED STATES v.
156 U.S. 1 (1895)

The issue in the Supreme Court's first interpretation of the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT hung on the lawfulness of the Sugar Trust's acquisition of its competitors, and the decision nearly eviscerated the act. An 8–1 Court used the doctrine of DUAL FEDERALISM in dismissing a government suit to dissolve the trust.

When the American Sugar Refining Company (the Sugar Trust) acquired four Philadelphia refineries in 1892 it controlled ninety-eight percent of domestic sugar manufacturing. Attorney General RICHARD OLNEY, who inherited the case from his predecessor, believed that the Sherman Act was founded on a false economic theory; he believed that free competition had been "thoroughly discredited" and that the act should have regulated trusts as a natural development, not prohibited them. There is, however, little evidence of deliberate carelessness in Olney's preparation of the case. Although the MAJORITY OPINION commented upon a lack of EVIDENCE to demonstrate a restraint of trade, the government never believed that such a showing was necessary. Prior decisions had clearly held sales to be a part of commerce; the majority would admit as much here, and a lower court conceded that the trust had sought control of both refining and sales. Clever defense strategy successfully shifted the Court's attention from restraint of INTERSTATE COMMERCE to a consideration whether the commerce power extended to manufacturing.

Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER's opinion for the Court endorsed the defendants' argument. By repeating that manufacturing was separable from commerce, the Court made a formally plausible distinction based solely on precedent. (See KIDD V. PEARSON.) Although the Sugar Trust had monopolized manufacturing, the Court found no Sherman Act violation because the acquisition of the Philadelphia refineries involved INTRASTATE COMMERCE. Although manufacturing "involves in a certain sense the control of its disposition . . . this is a secondary and not the primary sense." The trust did not lead to control of interstate commerce and so "affects it only incidentally and indirectly." This directindirect effects test of the reach of federal regulation had been mentioned in earlier cases (see EFFECTS ON COMMERCE) and was here employed to reach unrealistic ends: "Contracts, combinations, or conspiracies to control domestic enterprise in manufacture, agriculture, mining, PRODUCTION in all its forms, or to raise or lower prices or wages, might unquestionably tend to restrain external as well as domestic trade, but the restraint would be an indirect result, however inevitable and whatever its extent, and such result would not necessarily determine the object of the contract, combination or conspiracy."

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, dissenting, posed the basic question: "What, in a legal sense, is a restraint of trade?" The trust was in business to sell as well as manufacture sugar, and most of its sales obviously constituted interstate commerce. Relying on GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), Harlan posited a broad view of the commerce power. Any obstruction of commerce among the states was an impairment of that commerce and must be treated as such. The majority's construction of the Sherman Act left the public "at the mercy of combinations." The Sugar Trust's inevitable purpose of preventing free competition doomed it as a restraint of trade. "The general government is not placed by the Constitution in such a condition of helplessness that it must fold its arms and remain inactive while capital combines . . . to destroy competition." Harlan correctly believed that the issue should not have been the contracts of acquisition but rather the trust's control over commerce in sugar.

By excluding manufacturing monopolies from the scope of the antitrust act, the decision in Knight cleared the way for the greatest merger and consolidation movement in American history. Chief among the industries taking advantage of the opportunities given them by the Supreme Court were manufacturing and the railroads. Such massive combines as United States Steel Corporation, American Can Company, International Harvester, and Standard Oil of New Jersey can trace their origins to this period. From 1879 to 1897 fewer than a dozen important combinations had been formed, with a total capital of around one billion dollars. Before the century ended, nearly two hundred more combinations formed, with a total capital exceeding three billion dollars. Of some 318 CORPORATIONS in business in 1904, nearly seventy-five percent had been formed after 1897.

The Court's opinion also seriously injured the concept of national supremacy; Fuller's distinction between production and commerce lasted until 1937. In the meantime, the Court had created what EDWARD S. CORWIN called a "twilight zone" in which national regulation of corporations was uncertain and haphazard. Although the Court would apply the Sherman Act to railroads within two years (see UNITED STATES V. TRANS-MISSOURI FREIGHT ASSOCIATION), not until the reinterpretation in NORTHERN SECURITIES CO. V. UNITED STATES (1904) would the Sherman Act become an effective tool against big business.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

EICHNER, ALFRED S. 1969 Emergence of Oligopoly: Sugar Refining as a Case Study. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

KNOX, PHILANDER C.
(1853–1921)

Although Philander Chase Knox, a Pittsburgh corporation lawyer, had helped create the United States Steel Corporation, he became an active antitrust prosecutor as THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S ATTORNEY GENERAL (1901–1904). Knox initiated the efficient and meticulous prosecution in NORTHERN SECURITIES CO. V. UNITED STATES (1904) and successfully argued that case before the Supreme Court. He also began victorious cases against the Salt Trust, the Coal Trust, and the Beef Trust, the latter culminating in the STREAM OF COMMERCE doctrine in SWIFT & COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1905). Knox's actions helped revive the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT and insured a prominent political career after his resignation in 1904. He served as WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT's secretary of state (1909–1913) and later, in the Senate, played a major role in railroad rate legislation. An "irreconcilable" over the League of Nations, Knox believed it imposed unconstitutional obligations under the TREATY POWER.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

KNOX v. LEE

See: Legal Tender Cases

KOLENDER v. LAWSON
461 U.S. 352 (1983)

The facts of this case, not revealed by the official report, enhanced its interest. Lawson was a law-abiding black man of unorthodox attire and grooming who suffered frequent police harassment when he walked in white neighborhoods. A 7–2 Supreme Court held VOID FOR VAGUENESS a California statute obligating persons who "wander" the streets to provide credible and reliable identification and to explain their business to the police. The majority reasoned that the statute vested excessive discretion in the police to decide whether to stop and interrogate a suspect or leave him alone in the absence of PROBABLE CAUSE to arrest him. The Court also suggested that the statute compromised the constitutional right to freedom of movement.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

KONIGSBERG v. STATE BAR
353 U.S. 252 (1957)
366 U.S. 36 (1961)

In Konigsberg I the Supreme Court held that refusal to answer questions about political associations was constitutionally insufficient to justify a state bar association finding of failure to demonstrate good moral character, and consequent denial of bar admission. In Konigsberg II the Court upheld a second denial of admission based on the ground that refusal to answer obstructed full investigation of the applicant's qualifications.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

KOREAN WAR

In June 1950 North Korea attacked South Korea; within a week President HARRY S. TRUMAN committed American air, sea, and ground forces to South Korea's defense. The resulting three-year involvement lasted into the administration of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER and became the largest undeclared war in American history prior to the Vietnam involvement.

The initial rush of events created enduring confusion about the constitutional basis for the American intervention. On June 25, the day following the attack, the United States obtained a United Nations Security Council resolution ordering North Korean withdrawal. Two days later, with fighting continuing, the Security Council requested U.N. members to assist in repelling the aggression. That day, without congressional approval, President Truman publicly ordered American air and naval support for the South Koreans, and throughout his remaining tenure in office he persistently called the conflict a United Nations POLICE ACTION. The key American decisions had actually preceded the U.N. request, however, and critics, led by Senator Robert A. Taft, convincingly demonstrated that pertinent provisions of the UNITED NATIONS CHARTER (having status as treaty law in the United States) and the United Nations Participation Act gave no constitutional authority to the American President. The necessary agreements for United States peacekeeping forces had never been concluded with the Security Council.

Careful defenders of Truman's actions, especially Secretary of State Dean Acheson, argued that Truman's authority derived from his duty as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF to protect American interests. One such interest was the preservation of the United Nations as an instrument for peace; another was the security of American forces in the Pacific area. The defenders relied, too, on presidential control of FOREIGN AFFAIRS and on the alleged precedent of eighty-five prior instances of presidential use of military forces without a DECLARATION OF WAR. Not surprisingly, critics also found these sources insufficient, strongly disagreeing about the meaning of Congress's power "to declare war" and about the legal relevance of past episodes of unilateral presidential action. Truman nonetheless followed Acheson's advice and explicitly refused to request formal authorization from Congress.

The war had other constitutional dimensions, as well. In April 1951, after serious policy disagreements, Truman dismissed his outspoken Korean and Far Eastern commander, General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, thereby reaffirming the principle of civilian control over the military. (See CIVIL-MILITARY RELATIONS). Later, in April 1952, when a strike threatened military production for Korea, the President seized American steel mills, an action subsequently held unconstitutional in YOUNGSTOWN SHEET AND TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952), a decision that arguably narrowed future presidential prerogatives. The Korean engagement also intensified clashes over the FIRST AMENDMENT by contributing to the anticommunist sentiment tapped by Senator Joseph R. McCarthy. Similarly, the war provided context and impulse for the partially successful congressional effort, in the "Great Debate" of 1951, to restrict additional presidential commitment of troops to Europe. Finally, the war figured rhetorically in calls for limiting the TREATY POWER and EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS through the BRICKER AMENDMENT.

By the time of the Korean armistice on July 27, 1953, American casualties numbered 142,000, including 33,600 deaths. The war thus stands squarely as de facto precedent for presidential war-making of substantial magnitude, and more so because American courts, in typical fashion, refrained from ruling on its constitutional base. Ironically, memories of the domestic debates over Korea helped generate later efforts, such as the GULF OF TONKIN RESOLUTION (1964), to obtain prior congressional endorsement of foreign military ventures.

CHARLES A. LOFGREN
(1986)

Bibliography

LOFGREN, CHARLES A. 1969 Mr. Truman's War: A Debate and Its Aftermath. Review of Politics 31:223–241.

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1972 The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row.

KOREMATSU v. UNITED STATES

See: Japanese American Cases

KOVACS v. COOPER
336 U.S. 77 (1949)

After earlier suggesting that a ban on SOUND TRUCKS would be invalid, the Supreme Court held that "loud and raucous" loudspeakers could be prohibited as a reasonable regulation of time, place, and manner of speech. The opinion by Justice STANLEY REED noted interests in residential tranquillity, and it is cited as a PRIVACY decision. Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, concurring, delivered a major attack on the PREFERRED FREEDOM doctrine.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

KRAMER v. UNION FREE SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 15
395 U.S. 621 (1969)

New York limited school district VOTING RIGHTS to residents who owned (or leased) real property or were parents (or guardians) of public school children. Following HARPER V. VIRGINIA BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), the Supreme Court held, 6–3, that this restriction denied the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS to an adult resident living in his parents' home.

Chief Justice EARL WARREN wrote for the Court. A RATIONAL BASIS for the voting limitation was not enough; it must be justified as necessary to promote a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST. Assuming that New York could limit voting to persons especially interested in school affairs, this law's classification was insufficiently tailored to that purpose; an uninterested, non-taxpaying renter could vote, but Kramer, a taxpayer interested in school matters, could not.

The Harper dissenters also dissented here, speaking through Justice POTTER STEWART. The Constitution conferred no right to vote, and no racial classification was involved. Thus there was no reason to heighten judicial scrutiny, and there was a rational basis for limiting the vote to probably-interested persons.

On the same day, in Cipriano v. Houma, the Court unanimously invalidated a Louisiana law allowing only property taxpayers to vote on a revenue bond issue.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

KU KLUX KLAN ACT

See: Force Acts

KUNZ v. NEW YORK
340 U.S. 290 (1951)

In a case involving a street-corner preacher whose sermons vigorously denounced other religions, the Supreme Court struck down an ordinance requiring a permit to hold religious meetings in public places. Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON, for an 8–1 majority, wrote that "New York cannot vest restraining control over the right to speak on religious subjects in an administrative official where there are no appropriate standards to guide his action." The ordinance was "clearly invalid as a PRIOR RESTRAINT on the exercise of FIRST AMENDMENT rights."

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

KURLAND, PHILIP B.
(1921–1996)

Philip B. Kurland was, with ALEXANDER M. BICKEL, one of the principal scholarly critics of the WARREN COURT. Beginning with a sharply pointed and controversial foreword in 1964 to the Harvard Law Review's annual survey of the Supreme Court's work, Kurland condemned what he saw as the Court's penchant to undertake social reform at the expense of PRECEDENT, history, and practical consequences. His Cooley Lectures at the University of Michigan, published as Politics, the Constitution, and the Warren Court (1970), were a lawyer's meticulous, and often sarcastic, critique of almost every aspect of the Court's work. He also edited collections of extrajudicial essays (Felix Frankfurter and the Supreme Court, 1970) and judicial opinions by Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER (Mr. Justice Frankfurter and the Constitution, 1971), for whom he had clerked after a clerkship with JEROME N. FRANK following his graduation from Harvard Law School and the University of Pennsylvania. Kurland readily identified himself with Frankfurter's view of the judicial role. The emphasis of both was on "judicial restraint," although not to the point of ignoring what both viewed as bright lines established either by the text of the Constitution or by settled precedent.

Although often mentioned in speculative short lists for an appointment to the Court in the 1970s, he never sought judicial office and spent all but three years of his forty-three-year career teaching at the University of Chicago, in both the College and the Law School. He served as an adviser to numerous federal and state governmental bodies, including the SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE on several occasions. Senator SAMUEL J. ERVIN consulted him during the WATERGATE affair. Near the end of his career, Kurland played a prominent role in op-ed pages and as an adviser to the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, opposing the nomination of Robert H. Bork to the Court in 1987.

Kurland's scholarly legacy rests less on his theoretical work—although Religion and the Law (1960) remains influential—than on his trenchant critiques of particular cases or issues, such as school DESEGREGATION and SEPARATION OF POWERS (Watergate and the Constitution, 1978); and on his editorial work, which included founding The Supreme Court Review in 1960 and co-editing the multivolume collection of commentaries on the Constitution, The Founders' Constitution (1986, with Ralph Lerner). At his death, he left two unfinished projects, an edition of Frankfurter's letters and the authorized biography of ROBERT H. JACKSON.

DENNIS J. HUTCHINSON
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Judicial Activism and Judicial Restraint.)

L

LABOR AND THE ANTITRUST LAWS

Problems relating to the application of antitrust law to labor result from a basic incompatibility between two public policies: the first, embodied in the SHERMAN ACT of 1890, prohibits efforts by anyone to monopolize or restrain competition in the product market; the second, embodied in the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT of 1932 and the WAGNER ACT of 1935, permits workers to combine into unions in order to bargain collectively with employers. COLLECTIVE BARGAINING necessarily assumes, however, the elimination of competition between employees in dealings with their employers; hence the unions' need to achieve a monopoly of the labor market. The ultimate goal of every union is to remove wages, hours, and working conditions as factors in the competition between employers.

The hotly debated question whether Congress intended to include unions within the coverage of the Sherman Act was resolved by the Supreme Court in LOEWE V. LAWLOR (1908), which held a union liable for violation of the Act. Efforts to reverse this result in the CLAYTON ACT of 1914, which declared that the "labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce," and which forbade federal courts from granting INJUNCTIONS against specified kinds of peaceful conduct in labor disputes, were frustrated by extremely narrow constructions of the statutory language by the Supreme Court.

United States v. Hutcheson (1941), which held that the Sherman Act does not reach acts by a union in its own self-interest that do not involve combination with nonlabor groups, marked the beginning of a new period of virtual immunity for unions under the antitrust laws. And in Allen Bradley v. Local 3, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (1945) the Court, while holding that a conspiracy between the union and electrical parts manufacturers and contractors to monopolize the industry in New York City violated the Sherman Act, declared that if the union had achieved the same result through parallel but separate agreements with each employer, the arrangement would not have been illegal. Thus, Norris-LaGuardia's comprehensive prohibition against the issuance by federal courts of injunctions in labor disputes, the Wagner Act's authorization of the granting by the National Labor Relations Board of "official patents of monopoly" through its certification procedures, and the rise of industry-wide bargaining combined to create a doctrine of "licit monopoly" of the labor market by unions, while the Sherman Act continued to prevent similar domination of the product market by business enterprises.

By the mid-1960s, however, the pendulum had begun to swing back. In United Mine Workers v. Pennington (1965) a badly divided Supreme Court held that a union's conspiracy with large mine operators to drive small operators out of the market by establishing wage scales that the latter could not afford to pay violated the antitrust laws. Ten years later, in Connell Construction Company v. Plumbers & Steamfitters Local 100 (1975), the Supreme Court distinguished union activity that eliminates competition over wages and working conditions—immune under the antitrust laws, even though it affects price competition among employers, because such restriction is the inevitable consequence of collective bargaining—from union activity restricting competition in the product market—unprotected because (in this case) its effect was to drive all nonunion employers, including the more efficient ones, out of the market, whether or not they met union standards for wages and working conditions. The Court's 5–4 decision also held that even though the union's conduct violated the secondary boycott and "hot cargo" provisions of the TAFT-HARTLEY ACT of 1947, for which express penalties are prescribed in that statute, the union was not shielded from additional liability under the Sherman Act.

The critics of the Court's decisions in Pennington and Connell point out that in both cases the issues involved were mandatory subjects of bargaining under the labor laws. They contend that the legislative history of those laws makes clear that Congress intended to provide specific and exclusive remedies for violations of their substantive provisions (e.g., illegal "secondary boycotts" and "hot cargo" clauses) and rejected the proposed revival of remedies such as injunctions at the request of private parties, as well as punitive damages, which are available under the antitrust laws.

Unquestionably, judicial application of the antitrust laws to labor not only has seriously hampered union efforts to impose uniform wages, hours, and working conditions in the labor market but also has created considerable confusion in the administration of laws governing labor-management relations. It is also true, however, that unrestricted union efforts to monopolize labor markets adversely affect product markets in respect of the cost and availability of products. The question is whether antitrust laws are the proper mechanism for striking a proper balance between the right of workers to organize and to bargain collectively and the right of employers and the general public to be free of union coercive practices that raise prices, restrict output, or otherwise control the product to the detriment of consumers.

Inasmuch as unions derive their coercive powers from industry-wide and market-wide organizations, it is often proposed that they should be precluded from organizing more than one employer in an industry, and that collusion between separate unions should be proscribed. This proposal for "fragmented bargaining" probably is not politically feasible; moreover, it would have its least effect in oligopolistic industries, where, presumably, it is needed the most, and would have its greatest impact in atomized industries, where it is needed the least. Finally, fragmented bargaining would so weaken union organizations as to undermine completely the national labor policy favoring collective bargaining.

It appears that no satisfactory way has been found to reconcile free-market competitive policies with those permitting workers to combine and to engage in peaceful concerted activities for their mutual aid and protection. The preferable way to establish the necessarily shifting equilibrium between them would seem to be through legislation dealing with specific problems rather than through the application by the judiciary of antitrust laws designed primarily for other purposes.

BENJAMIN AARON
(1986)

Bibliography

HILDEBRAND, GEORGE H. 1962 Public Policy and Collective Bargaining. Pages 152–187. New York: Harper & Row.

MELTZER, BERNARD D. 1965 Labor Unions, Collective Bargaining, and the Antitrust Laws. University of Chicago Law Review 32:659–734.

ST. ANTOINE, THEODORE J. 1976 Connell: Antitrust Law at the Expense of Labor Law. Virginia Law Review 62:603–631.

LABOR AND THE CONSTITUTION

An important aspect of constitutional law has been the connection between individual rights and state or national power to regulate economic affairs. The constitutional treatment of employment is a paradigmatic example: what is the status of the relationship between employer and employee? What power does government have to change it? Of course, the answers to these questions depend on whether they are asked about the pre- or post-NEW DEAL era.

Before the mid-1930s, labor legislation was subjected to searching JUDICIAL REVIEW by a Supreme Court committed to a laissez-faire treatment of economic issues under the DUE PROCESS clauses and a limited conception of federal authority under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. Since the New Deal, constitutional questions involving labor have been dominated by issues of expression and association, and the classification of labor activity as "economic" or "political."

The constitutional treatment of employment prior to the New Deal is best understood against the background of the COMMON LAW, a law dominated by concepts of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT and employment at will. The employer had the right to discharge an employee at any time, and the employee had supposedly equivalent right to quit at any time.

At an early stage, concerted actions by workers to affect contractual relations sometimes were treated as criminal conspiracies. Thus, in the Philadelphia Cordwainers' Case (1806), a strike for higher wages by a group of shoemakers was held to be illegal. "A combination of workmen to raise their wages may be considered in a twofold view: one is to benefit themselves, the other is to injure those who do not join their society. The rule of law condemns both."

Later in the nineteenth century, the courts recognized the right of workers to join together. Commonwealth v.

Hunt (1842) is the landmark. Chief Justice LEMUEL SHAW, for the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, held that, for a combination of workers to constitute a CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY, the state must prove that the workers had specific criminal objectives or used specific criminal methods. Thereafter, the common law treatment of labor focused on the limits of legitimate labor activity—whether combinations of workers had illegal purposes or used illegal methods.

But many courts at common law continued to take a restrictive view of legal labor activity. In Vegelahn v. Gunter (1869), for example, the Massachusetts Court found that strikers had used "intimidation" to interfere with the contractual relationship of the employer and strikebreakers. The "coercive" methods ranged from threats of personal injury to simple "persuasion and social pressure." Similarly, in Plant v. Woods (1900), the same court found that a threat by strikers that the employer could "expect trouble in his business" indicated that the strike was "only the preliminary skirmish" in violent industrial warfare; the workers had given "the signal, and in doing so must be held to avail themselves of the degree of fear and dread which the knowledge of such consequences will cause in the minds of those . . . against whom the strike is directed." Thus, in measuring "illegal" objectives and methods, common law courts often assumed that even a low level of labor activity constituted a "signal" that was inherently coercive.

This common law view of the permissible limits of labor activity was read into the Constitution by the Supreme Court in the late nineteenth century, as it interpreted SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS and elaborated a restrictive conception of the federal commerce power.

The Supreme Court constitutionalized the common law of employment by placing "freedom of contract" within the liberty protected by the FIFTHand FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS, Many important cases concerned legislation designed to regulate the labor market as to hours, wages, and working conditions. This type of legislation—such as the wages and hours law in the leading case of LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905)—was invalidated if, in the Court's view, it unreasonably interfered with the contractual freedom of employer and employee. Even when such legislation was upheld, as in MULLER V. OREGON (1908), the Court made a detailed inquiry into the substantive reasonableness of the law.

Notions of freedom of contract were also applied to the activities of labor unions. In 1898, in the aftermath of a violent Pullman strike, Congress passed the ERDMAN ACT, outlawing YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS—contracts by which employees agreed not to join labor unions. In Adair v. United States (1908) the Supreme Court held that the act violated the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment: "the employer and the employee have equality of right, and any legislation that disturbs that equality is an arbitrary interference with the liberty of contract which no government can legally justify in a free land. . . ." The Court struck down a similar state statute in COPPAGE V. KANSAS (1915), and, in the 1917 case of HITCHMAN COAL V. MITCHELL, relied on the constitutional protection of yellow dog contracts in holding that federal courts could prevent unions from organizing at plants they knew to be covered by such contracts. And in TRUAX V. CORRIGAN (1921) the Court held that an Arizona statute forbidding INJUNCTIONS against PICKETING was unconstitutional, since it protected an activity (picketing) that wrongfully interfered with employers' property rights, in violation of due process.

The Supreme Court narrowly interpreted the commerce power at the beginning of the New Deal, striking down measures such as "Hot Oil" Codes, the AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT, and the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT. This development was nothing new. Although there had been swings in doctrine, the Court had generally viewed congressional power under the commerce clause with suspicion in the area of employment relations. In HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918), for example, the Court struck down an act banning commerce in goods produced by child labor, and twenty years later, in CARTER V. CARTER COAL CO. (1936), it struck down an act regulating hours and wages in the coal industry.

The constitutional treatment of employment was changed radically by the watershed events of the New Deal. This period saw the Supreme Court reject its earlier laissez-faire interpretations of due process and its narrow vision of federal commerce power.

During the New Deal the Court abandoned its view of freedom of contract in employment relations. In WEST COAST HOTEL V. PARRISH (1937) the Court sustained a state minimum wage law for women, holding that contractual freedom could be limited by a reasonable exercise of STATE POLICE POWERS: "Even if the wisdom of the policy be regarded as debatable and its effect uncertain, still the legislature is entitled to its judgment."

National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. (1937) upheld the WAGNER NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT (NLRA), which entitled workers to organize and required employers to bargain with their employees' chosen representatives. The Court found that the act did not invade freedom of contract: an employer was not compelled to make any agreement, but only to bargain with the employees' representatives in recognition of the "fundamental right" of workers to organize. The Court distinguished the "yellow dog" contract cases on the grounds that the NLRA did not interfere with an employer's right to discharge employees, but only prohibited coercion of employees in the guise of discharge. Despite this disclaimer, it is clear that the Court was departing radically from the rule of its prior cases: the employer was prohibited from discharging employees for union activities, and was required to bargain in good faith with its employees' unions. (See WAGNER ACT CASES.) This new treatment of labor activity was reinforced the same year in Senn v. Tile Layers Union, in which the Court upheld a state law permitting peaceful picketing in conjunction with a labor dispute; although the Court distinguished cases such as Truax, the picketing involved was neither more peaceful nor less coercive than in prior cases.

The new approach to due process was exemplified by Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, writing for the Court in Osborn v. Ozlin (1940), in an opinion reminiscent of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES's classic dissent in Lochner: "It is immaterial that state action may run counter to the economic wisdom either of Adam Smith or of J. Maynard Keynes, or may be ultimately mischievous even from the point of view of avowed state policy. Our inquiry must be much narrower. It is whether [the state] has taken hold of a matter within her power, or has reached beyond her borders to regulate a subject which was none of her concern. . . ."

In the 1937 Jones & Laughlin case, the Court upheld the NLRA under the commerce clause. The act regulated industrial strife, which had a "close and substantial relation" to commerce, and which was therefore within Congress's "plenary" power to regulate commerce.

The Court also upheld the NATIONAL POLICE POWER in the field of employment relations. UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941) sustained the constitutionality of the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, which prohibited the interstate shipment of goods not meeting wage and hour requirements. Overruling the Hammer and Carter Coal cases, the Court confined its inquiry to the question whether the activity regulated had substantial EFFECTS ON COMMERCE. "The motive and purpose of a regulation of interstate commerce are matters for the legislative judgment upon which the Constitution places no restriction and over which the courts are given no control. . . ."

In sum, the New Deal saw the Supreme Court abandon its protection of the common law of employment in the name of the Constitution. The Court dropped its laissez-faire reading of due process and its restrictive interpretation of the commerce power. Employers are no longer apt to be successful if they claim that their constitutional rights to liberty or property are invaded by ECONOMIC REGULATION, or by state protection of union activity. They have little chance should they claim that congressional regulation of employment exceeds the commerce power.

While the Court has never explicitly revived the due process protection for freedom of contrast or similar economic rights in the context of labor relations, it has continued to see a residuum of inherent employer economic freedom that has a quasi-constitutional dimension manifested in statutory interpretation. This residuum has emerged around the issues of the right of an employer to subcontract work formerly done by its employees, or to close down all or part of its operations. Two questions have presented themselves: whether the employer may be required to bargain with its employees' union about such a decision, and whether such a decision would constitute discriminatory discharge of employees if motivated by antiunion animus.

The NLRA requires an employer to bargain over wages, hours, and working conditions; as to subjects not affecting these areas, an employer may act unilaterally. In Fibreboard Paper Products v. NLRB (1964) the Supreme Court held that an employer is required to bargain over a decision to subcontract work, where such subcontracting would simply replace employees with nonemployees doing the same work, and where the employer's motive is to cut costs by reducing the work force. Justice POTTER STEWART, in a concurring opinion, argued that an employer could not be compelled to bargain over managerial decisions "which lie at the core of entrepreneurial control," "those management decisions which are fundamental to the basic direction of a corporate enterprise. . . ."

The Court adopted Justice Stewart's position in First National Maintenance v. NLRB (1981), holding that the employer may unilaterally "shut down part of its business purely for economic reasons. . . ." The Court, as if this were a constitutional holding, read Congress's intent narrowly to avoid interference with entrepreneurial freedom: "Congress had no expectation that the elected union representative would become an equal partner in the running of the business enterprise. . . . Management must be free from the restraints of the bargaining process to the extent essential for the running of a profitable business."

The NLRA also prohibits an employer from discharging employees in retaliation for union activities. In Textile Workers Union v. Darlington Manufacturing Co. (1965) the Court held that it was not a discriminatory discharge for an employer to close his entire operation and discharge his entire work force, even if motivated by antiunion animus, because the employer would derive no "future benefit" from such a decision. As for a partial shutdown, this would constitute a discriminatory discharge only if it served to discourage union activity in the remainder of the employer's enterprise. Again, the Court construed congressional intent narrowly, as if it were avoiding a constitutional issue: the proposition that a single businessman cannot choose to go out of business if he wants to would represent such a startling innovation that it should not be entertained without the clearest manifestation of legislative intent or unequivocal judicial precedent so construing the Labor Relations Act. These cases were decided on statutory grounds, but they have clear constitutional emanations. The decisions are couched in terms of an inherent, absolute economic liberty untouched by regulatory statutes that look in a contrary direction.

For four decades after the New Deal, no congressional enactment was declared to have exceeded the limits of the commerce power. Congress was allowed virtually unlimited discretion. The consensus was that, as the Supreme Court stated in WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942), "effective restraints on its exercise must proceed from political rather than judicial processes"—anything Congress passed was within the commerce power.

In 1976, in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY, however, the Court invalidated the application of the Fair Labor Standards Act to public employees, holding that the TENTH AMENDMENT prevents Congress from exercising its commerce power with respect to "functions essential to [the] separate and independent existence" of states and their subdivisions. Nevertheless, it does not seem likely in the labor field that Congress will lose much power to regulate by further restriction of the commerce power or the rebirth of economic due process. Indeed, early in 1985 in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY, the Court explicitly overruled National League of Cities.

With the proposition established during the New Deal that government support of organized labor does not threaten the constitutional freedom of employers, the fundamental issues shifted to problems of association and expression. These problems arise in the framework of a constitutional jurisprudence which generally distinguishes sharply, for purposes of legislative authority and judicial review, between issues of economic regulation (narrow judicial review) and of the regulation of political activity (substantial review).

In this jurisprudence a key question becomes the classification of activity as "economic" or "political." With a few early exceptions, labor activity generally has been viewed, by both Congress and the Supreme Court, as economic. The "proper" role of unions has been confined to "economic" issues surrounding the collective bargaining process, with the consequence that labor's rights of expression are narrower than those attaching to organizations classified as political, and that Congress has a broader power to regulate association and expression in the labor context.

Prior to the New Deal, the right to organize a union was constitutionally unprotected. Since the New Deal, however, it has become well established (for example, in NAACP V. ALABAMA, 1958) that the protection of the FIRST AMENDMENT encompasses a right of association. But in the labor context it has not been necessary for the Supreme Court explicitly to find that the right to join a union is protected by FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY AND ASSOCIATION. The right is protected by statute, most prominently Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act: "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. . . ."

What the Supreme Court has held is that peaceful organizing activities are constitutionally protected. In HAGUE V. CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS (1939) the Court held that FREEDOM OF SPEECH and assembly attached to the dissemination of information regarding the NLRA, as well as peaceful assembly "for the discussion of the Act, and of the opportunities and advantages offered by it. . . ." And in Thomas v. Collins (1945) the Court held that freedom of speech and assembly were violated by a statute requiring union organizers to register prior to engaging in any organizing activities, including giving speeches to groups of workers. Although the Court characterized the union activity as economic, it rejected the proposition that "the First Amendment's safeguards are wholly inapplicable to business or economic activity." The case was therefore treated under the First Amendment's requirement that a restriction on speech or assembly be justified by clear public interest, threatened not doubtfully or remotely but by CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER.

Most lower courts have interpreted the Hague and Thomas cases to establish a constitutional right to join a labor union. Thus, despite being clearly classified as economic activity, joining a union is protected by the First Amendment. However, the classification of labor activity as economic has consequences for the constitutional treatment of strikes and picketing.

The THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, prohibiting involuntary servitude, probably protects the right of an individual employee to withhold his or her services. The constitutional status of strikes, however, is unclear. One reason for this is that strikes are "concerted activity" protected by the NLRA; it is therefore usually possible to decide strike questions without facing the constitutional question. However, extensive regulation and limitation of the right to strike has been permitted ever since the New Deal; it thus seems that, at most, the right has a low level of constitutional protection.

Legal limitations on strikes have been based on both their objectives and their methods. Prior to the NLRA, strikes were treated under the "illegal objectives" test of the common law; work stoppages with purposes held by courts to be illegal were prohibited. And today, strikes with certain objectives are unprotected under Section 7 of the NLRA. Thus, for example, a strike loses its protection if its purpose is to compel the employer to commit an unfair labor practice or violate other laws.

Section 7 also withholds protection from strikes that use illegal methods. For example, in NLRB v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corp. (1939) the Supreme Court declared unprotected a sitdown strike involving TRESPASS, destruction of property, and violation of state court injunctions. In Mastro Plastics v. NLRB (1956) the strike violated the NLRA's requirement of NOTICE to the employer; in Local 174 v. Lucas Flour (1962) the strike violated a "no-strike" clause in the union's contract with the employer.

Prior to the New Deal, labor picketing was readily enjoined, either because the ends sought were disapproved or because it was assumed to be intrinsically coercive. The Supreme Court turned this law around in the leading case of THORNHILL V. ALABAMA (1940). That case held unconstitutional a state statute banning all picketing near a business where the purpose of the picketing was to hinder the business. The Court adopted the "clear and present danger" test, treating labor activity as political activity: "The freedom of speech and of the press guaranteed by the constitution embraces at least the liberty to discuss publicly and truthfully all matters of public concern without previous restraint or fear of subsequent punishment. . . . In the circumstances of our times the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute must be regarded as within that area of free discussion that is guaranteed by the Constitution." The Court explicitly rejected the assumption that all labor picketing is inherently coercive; it also stated that some "coercion" is permitted by the First Amendment: "Every expression of opinion on matters that are important has the potentiality of inducing action in the interests of one rather than another group in society. But the Group in power at any moment may not impose penal sanctions on peaceful and truthful discussions of matters of public interest merely on showing that others might thereby be persuaded to take action inconsistent with their interests." The Court thus treated labor picketing as full-fledged political activity.

But the Court quickly retreated from this position. Since Thornhill, it has become well accepted that labor picketing may be regulated, without violating freedom of speech and assembly, if the picketing is found to be illegal in method or objective.

While violence is an easy case, the Court has—to some extent—returned implicitly to the old assumption that labor picketing is an inherently coercive "signal." This means that picketing can be extensively regulated. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, concurring in Bakery Drivers v. Wohl (1942), put it this way: "Picketing by an organized group is more than free speech, since it involves patrol of a particular locality and since the very presence of a picket line may induce action of one kind or another, quite irrespective of the nature of the ideas which are being disseminated."

The Court has also, as with other types of labor activity, maintained an "illegal objectives" limitation on picketing. The limitation has been most visible in two areas. The first is picketing with an objective to compel violation of state law or policy. This limitation was first articulated in Carpenters' & Joiners Union v. Ritter's Cafe (1942), where the Court held that the First Amendment did not protect picketing that urged an employer to act contrary to a state antitrust statute. By 1950, in Hughes v. Superior Court, the Court found a sufficient basis for prohibition in a purpose to violate a state "policy" announced by its courts.

The second visible category of picketing for an improper purpose is picketing for an object outlawed by the NLRA as "union unfair labor practices." For instance, the act explicitly prohibits some types of picketing designed to persuade an employer to recognize and bargain with the picketing union. But it is the secondary boycott that is the union unfair labor practice that is constitutionally most troublesome.

The act forbids a union to "threaten, coerce, or restrain" any person—usually a business—with the object of "forcing or requiring" that person to stop dealing with an employer with whom the union has a labor dispute.

The Supreme Court has recognized the potential conflict between such a prohibition and the First Amendment. In the Tree Fruits case, NLRB v. Fruit & Vegetable Packers (1964), the Court announced that it would construe the statute narrowly to avoid this constitutional difficulty: "Congress has consistently refused to prohibit peaceful picketing except where used as a means to achieve specific ends which experience has shown are undesirable." The Court therefore distinguished between picketing that attempted to persuade persons not to deal with the secondary employer (which was prohibited), and picketing attempting to persuade people not to buy products made by the primary employer (which was outside the act's prohibition). The Court thus permitted secondary picketing that was narrowly confined to the labor dispute with the primary employer. Subsequently, it limited even this narrow protection. In Safeco NLRB v. Retail Store Employees Union (1980), the Court held that the NLRA prohibits picketing confined to the primary employer's products, if those products constitute most of the secondary employer's business. In such a situation, boycotting the struck product is the same as boycotting the secondary employer.

Comparisons of the constitutional treatment of picketing with the treatment of other uses of the PUBLIC FORUM show that labor picketing is treated under standards different from other, similar activities. Consider two cases decided in 1982 by the Supreme Court, both decided without dissent. The cases had one thing in common: each involved a BOYCOTT and picketing by a group. The first, Longshoremen's Association v. Allied International, Inc., was a suit for damages arising out of the refusal of the Longshoremen's Union to unload cargo shipped from the Soviet Union, in protest against the Russian invasion of Afghanistan. The boycott was entirely peaceful, it was totally effective, and it was unanimously held to be illegal. The boycott violated the labor statute, and that statute, as applied to this situation, did not infringe anyone's First Amendment rights.

Two months later the Court handed down its opinion in NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware. That case involved a suit for damages brought by white merchants in Claiborne County, Mississippi. Their businesses had been disrupted by a boycott, organized by the NAACP in protest against the failure of public officials in the county to desegregate public schools and facilities, hire black policemen, select blacks for jury duty, and end verbal abuse of blacks by law enforcement officers. The boycott, which was held by the Mississippi courts to violate state law, was executed in a less than peaceful, if considerably effective fashion. And it was—in most respects—found by the Supreme Court to be protected by the First Amendment.

Although there are a number of nice legal distinctions that might be noted between these cases and although it may be that the NAACP could not have survived if the Mississippi courts had been affirmed, one is forced to conclude that the two decisions are deeply inconsistent with one another. Of course, there is considerable inconsistency in our decisional law. The trouble here is that the inconsistency grows out of stereotypical thinking. Although labor unions ordinarily are organizations dedicated to economic activity and although economic activity is subject to substantial governmental regulation, sometimes unions engage in political action. The NAACP is often, but perhaps not always, a political action organization and political activity is rightly subject to substantial government protection.

The distinction between economic and political activity is difficult to maintain. At the margin it is difficult to designate conduct as economic and not political, or as political and not economic. But maintenance of the distinction is necessary unless we are prepared either to reduce substantially our political freedom or to reestablish substantive judicial review of economic regulation. (See COMMERCIAL SPEECH.)

Nor is the difficulty of sustaining the distinction in these cases really the problem. All legal distinctions, after all, give actors and decision makers trouble at the margin. The real problem is that even as it is wrong to stereotype individuals, so too is it wrong to stereotype the organizations through which individuals seek to achieve their economic and political goals. In deciding what is protected and what may be regulated, legislatures and courts should look at the organizations' specific conduct, not their general characteristics.

Employer speech—communications by employers with their employees during union organization campaigns—is given significantly lower protection than is the political speech often said to be at the core of the First Amendment. During the early post-New Deal period, the National Labor Relations Board viewed any antiunion speeches or literature from the employer as "interference, restraint or coercion," in violation of the NLRA. This position was rejected in NLRB v. Virginia Electric & Power Co. (1941). The Supreme Court held that the act could not, within the First Amendment, prohibit employer speech unless it could be demonstrated, from a total course of conduct, that the speech was coercive. This view was codified in 1947, when the NLRA was amended to provide that speech may be used as evidence of an unfair labor practice only if it contains a "threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." In NLRB v. Gissel Packing (1969), the Supreme Court made clear that employer speech is entitled to some First Amendment protection, and that the 1947 amendment to the NLRA simply "implements the First Amendment. . . ."

But the actual treatment of employer speech in union organization campaigns makes clear the low level of First Amendment protection that speech enjoys. The NLRB announced as long ago as 1948 that it would regulate union certification elections under a "laboratory conditions" standard: "it is the Board's function to provide a laboratory in which an experiment may be conducted, under conditions as nearly ideal as possible, to determine the uninhibited desires of the employees." This approach has entailed extensive restriction and regulation of employer speech, on several grounds. For example, implied threats of harm to employees for unionization have been held to be illegal except where the consequences are beyond the employer's control and are based on demonstrable probabilities. And under NLRB rulings racial appeals are prohibited unless the party making the appeal proves "that it was truthful and germane. . . ."

As with employee speech and association, this framework differs significantly from mainstream First Amendment doctrine. First, this framework suffers from a vagueness problem; the NLRB and the courts regulate, on an ad hoc basis, speech that in the political arena could be regulated, if at all, only under narrow and precise statutes. Second, with respect to employer threats, labor law turns the First Amendment on its head: an employer may not threaten to close its operation if a union wins an election despite the fact that it would be legal for the employer to close. Thus, the employer is prohibited from advocating or predicting legal activity.

Finally, employer speech that appeals to racial prejudice is severely restricted, even though the First Amendment protects such speech in the political arena. Indeed, Nazis may march down the streets in a predominantly Jewish community, but an employer may not state that a union advocates "race-mixing."

The rights of PUBLIC EMPLOYEES, and the relationships of such employees to their employers, raise constitutional questions different from those in private employment. Initially one might think that the major reason for treating public employees differently is that the public employer is a governmental body, and thus that STATE ACTION is involved. This distinction, however, is far less important than the differing economic and political relationships between the union and employer in the two sectors. These differences were summarized by the Supreme Court in ABOOD V. DETROIT BOARD OF EDUCATION (1977):

> A public employer, unlike his private counterpart, is not guided by the profit motive and constrained by the normal operation of the market. Municipal services are typically not priced, and where they are they tend to be regarded as in some sense "essential" and therefore are often price-inelastic. . . . The government officials making decisions as the public "employer" are less likely to act as a cohesive unit than are managers in private industry, in part because different levels of public authority . . . are involved, and in part because each official may respond to a distinctive political constituency. . . . Finally, decisionmaking by a public employer is above all a political process. The officials who represent the public employer are ultimately responsible to the electorate. . . . Through exercise of their political influence as part of the electorate, the employees have the opportunity to affect the decisions of government representatives who sit on the other side of the bargaining table. . . . [P]ermitting public employees to unionize . . . gives the employees more influence in the decision making process than is possessed by employees similarly organized in the private sector.

These differences have justified differences in the constitutional treatment of the rights of public employees to join unions and to strike.

As with private employees, the Supreme Court has never explicitly held that public employees have a constitutional right to join a labor union. The Court has, however, found that public employees do not sacrifice their freedoms of association and expression by accepting positions with government. In KEYISHIAN V. BOARD OF REGENTS (1967), for example, the Court specifically rejected the premise that "public employment . . . may be conditioned upon the surrender of constitutional rights which could not be abridged by direct government action." Based on this principle and on the implicit constitutional protection of private union membership under the right of association, the prevailing authority in the lower courts is that public employees have a constitutional right to join a labor union. This right, however, appears to be subject to greater restriction than is the similar right of private employees. Some state courts have held that certain employees, such as police officers or fire-fighters, may be prohibited from joining unions on the grounds that membership in a union would be inconsistent with the performance of their important governmental functions.

The authority is virtually unanimous that public employees do not have a constitutional right to strike. Nor does the statutory protection of strikes by private employees raise a serious question of equal protection. The test here is whether the distinction between public and private employment is rational; it plainly is.

The other side of the expression and association issue is whether employees—in the private or public sector—have the right not to associate. In other words, does the Constitution permit employees to be compelled to support a union against their wishes and beliefs? In this area the economic view of labor activity is prominent: compulsion has been permitted, but only for the economic purposes of COLLECTIVE BARGAINING.

The issue has arisen primarily with regard to agreements between unions and employers to require all employees to pay dues or "agency shop fees" to the union. Most labor statutes, including the NLRA, explicitly permit unions and employers to agree to these requirements. The Supreme Court has found such statutes to be consistent with the First Amendment. In Railway Employees Department v. Hanson (1956) and Machinists v. Street (1961) the Supreme Court upheld the relevant provision of the Railway Labor Act. In the Abood case, the Court upheld a similar state statute that applied to public employees. The Court reasoned that the "free rider" problem (employees who would benefit from, but not pay for, representation) was sufficient justification for Congress and states to permit these agreements.

The courts have, however, consistently emphasized the constitutional limits of this doctrine: dues collected under compulsion may be used only for collective bargaining, and not for political or ideological ends. In both Street and Abood, the Supreme Court held that, were statutes to permit political use of these funds, the statutes would violate the employees' freedom of association.

Over the years major labor issues have presented themselves as important constitutional problems. Lochner v. New York (1905), for example—a case involving labor legislation—is perhaps the best known substantive due process decision of the pre-New Deal period. And the downfall of that doctrine in the economic area can be observed in Court decisions upholding labor legislation; so too can the expansion of federal power under the commerce clause. Moreover, labor issues have influenced the development of the constitutional rights of speech and association.

In the future, the Supreme Court is apt to render fewer constitutional decisions involving labor. Regulation dominates the field and its constitutionality is seldom in doubt. But it can be predicted with considerable confidence that statutory interpretation of labor statutes will reflect any changes in constitutional law that may occur.

HARRY H. WELLINGTON
(1986)

Bibliography

COX, ARCHIBALD et al. 1981 Labor Law: Cases and Materials, 9th ed. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

GETMAN, JULIUS and BLACKBURN, JOHN 1983 Labor Relations: Law, Practice, and Policy, 2nd ed. Mineola N.Y.: Foundation Press.

GORMAN, ROBERT 1976 Basic Text on Labor Law: Unionization and Collective Bargaining. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

GREGORY, CHARLES and KATZ, HAROLD 1979 Labor and the Law, 3rd ed. New York: W. W. Norton.

SUMMERS, CLYDE; WELLINGTON, HARRY; and HYDE, ALAN 1982 Cases and Materials on Labor Law, 2nd ed. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

WELLINGTON, HARRY 1968 Labor and the Legal Process. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

WELLINGTON, HARRY and WINTER, RALPH 1971 The Unions and the Cities. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

LABOR AND THE CONSTITUTION
(Update)

Labor relations present three principal kinds of constitutional issues. First, to what extent does the FIRST AMENDMENT protect employees' efforts to organize labor unions and solicit support, and to what extent does it limit the power of unions over their members? Second, how does the doctrine of federal preemption restrict the states in regulating union and management activities? Third, what DUE PROCESS guarantees may employers and employees invoke in response to federal and state laws establishing new substantive rules and remedies in employment?

Although the Supreme Court has never squarely determined whether there is a constitutional right to form a labor organization, the existence of such a right has generally been assumed since the decision of the Seventh Circuit in McLaughlin v. Tilendis (1968), dealing with public school teachers. Many Supreme Court cases have considered the validity of restrictions on unions' collective action, including attempts to enlist the aid of fellow employees or the public. In Dorchy v. Kansas (1926) the Court declared that there is no "absolute right to strike" under the Constitution and held that a state could prohibit a strike or group work stoppage for an illegal purpose, such as extortion. The Court also sustained, in Steelworkers v. United States (1959), the constitutionality of the provisions in the TAFT-HARTLEY LABOR RELATIONS ACT authorizing an eighty-day INJUNCTION against a strike that "imperil[s] the national health or safety." Finally, summary affirmance in Postal Clerks v. Blount (1971) of a three-judge federal district court decision seems to confirm that government employees have no constitutional right to strike. But the Court has never ruled whether there are any circumstances that would give rise to such a right on the part of private employees.

Separate articles in the main volumes of this encyclopedia cover the constitutionality of restraints on BOYCOTTS and PICKETING by labor unions. In DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Building Trades (1988), the Supreme Court engaged in some rather strained statutory interpretation to avoid "serious constitutional concerns" and held that a union's handbilling, as distinguished from picketing, did not "coerce" a shopping mall's tenants within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act. (The handbills asked customers not to deal with any of the neutral or "secondary" retailers in the mall.) The Court pinpointed the critical distinction between handbilling and picketing: "The loss of customers because they read a handbill urging them not to patronize a business, and not because they are intimidated by a line of picketers, is the result of mere persuasion." This emphasis on the means of communication does not fully explain why the same message, if delivered by a solitary picket wearing a large placard, should necessarily be intimidating and not persuasive.

Federal laws governing private employment and many state laws governing public employment authorize "union security" agreements. Such an agreement requires financial support of the union that acts as COLLECTIVE BARGAINING agent by all employees benefiting from its representation. The Supreme Court sustained these provisions against First Amendment claims of freedom of association in Railway Employees' Department v. Hanson (1956) and ABOOD V. DETROIT BOARD OF EDUCATION (1977). But to counter constitutional free speech issues, the Court also held in Machinists v. Street (1961) and Abood that a union could use compulsory financial contributions only for collective bargaining activities and not for political or ideological purposes opposed by an employee. The Court recognized there would be "difficult problems in drawing lines" in this area.

The WAGNER ACT enacted in 1935 and substantially revised in 1947 and 1959, forbids both employers and unions in INTERSTATE COMMERCE from coercing employees in their right to join, or not join, a labor organization. In addition, the 1947 Taft-Hartley Act amendments made the contracts of such employers and unions enforceable in the courts under federal law. Previously, state law generally applied to all these matters. In San Diego Building Trades v. Garmon (1959), the Supreme Court held that if activity in the labor field is "arguably subject" to federal protection or prohibition, the states must ordinarily yield jurisdiction. The Court added in Machinists Lodge 76 v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission (1976) that the states also cannot regulate conduct that Congress intended to leave unregulated.

There are several exceptions to this doctrine of federal PREEMPTION. Compelling local interests in the maintenance of domestic peace or minimum labor standards enable the states to deal with violence, malicious LIBEL, or TRESPASS to private property, and to prescribe requirements for job safety and insured health care plans. Even if conduct is arguably protected by federal law such as union access to employer premises during an organizing campaign—thus implicating federal supremacy most acutely—preemption does not follow invariably. In Sears, Roebuck and Co. v. San Diego Carpenters (1978), the Court concluded that a state court could determine whether a union's trespassory picketing was actually protected by federal law when the union had declined to seek a federal ruling on the issue, the employer had no way of obtaining one, and the trespass was "far more likely to be unprotected than protected." Finally, although federal substantive law is now applicable to union-employer contracts, the Supreme Court held in Dowd Box Co. v. Courtney (1962) that state courts retain concurrent jurisdiction over suits for their violation.

Federal and state labor legislation enacted during the twentieth century has often abrogated COMMON LAW claims, created new statutory rights and obligations, and substituted administrative proceedings for TRIAL BY JURY. These laws have posed due process and other constitutional questions. After some initial opposition, the courts have tended to sustain these innovations. The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a state WORKERS' COMPENSATION law in NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY V. WHITE (1917), of the federal unemployment tax in STEWARD MACHINE COMPANY V. DAVIS (1937), and of the National Labor Relations Act in NLRB v. Jones and Laughlin Steel Corp. (1937). But to avoid constitutional problems, the Court declared in Steele v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. (1944) that the federal labor laws, in granting majority unions the power of exclusive representation, also implied a duty to represent all the members of a bargaining unit fairly and nondiscriminatorily. A new round of battles over due process may have opened when the Montana Supreme Court ruled 4–3 in Meech v. Hillhaven West, Inc. (1989) that the state's pioneering "wrongful discharge" statute, which displaced common law claims for dismissal, did not violate the Montana Constitution's guarantee of "full legal redress."

THEODORE J. ST.ANTOINE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Freedom of Assembly and Association; Freedom of Speech.)

Bibliography

GORMAN, ROBERT A. 1976 Basic Text on Labor Law: Unionization and Collective Bargaining. Pages 209–215, 257–262, 655–661, 695–728. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

WELLINGTON, HARRY H. 1968 Labor and the Legal Process. Pages 145–184, 223–266. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

LABOR BOARD CASES

See: Wagner Act Cases

LABOR MOVEMENT

The American labor movement has had a passionate, paradoxical, and often bitter relationship with the Constitution. During the era of LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), from the 1880s to the 1920s, most judges agreed that labor was a commodity like any other; the Constitution guaranteed workers the right freely to sell their labor "just as the employer may sell his iron or coal." During these decades, state and federal courts protected employers' and individual workers' rights to contract and compete in the marketplace free from what judges deemed unwarranted governmental interferences. Courts voided many hours and safety laws as unconstitutional interferences with liberty of contract. Courts enjoined strikes and BOYCOTTS as tortious interferences with employers' freedom of enterprise. Even in "legal" strikes, many state and federal courts held that there was no such thing as peaceful PICKETING.

The burdens of repression and semi-outlawry drove trade unionists to develop an alternative constitutional outlook. They assailed the COMMON LAW view that labor was a mere commodity and that employers could acquire a property right in their workers' labor or "human capacities." The INJUNCTIONS that forbade strikers' "interference" with this right were, in labor's view, "judicial re-enactments of slavery." The THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT—even some of the Supreme Court's own Thirteenth Amendment decisions—seemed to support these claims. According to the unions, the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished slavery, was a "glorious labor amendment" that stood not only for self-owernship but also for labor's dignity and independence. These ideas drew upon the Lincolnian "Free Labor" philosophy of the Thirteenth Amendment's framers who vowed that the amendment would always stand as a shield against the oppression of "free labor both black and white."

Labor's constitutional critique of the injunction also invoked the FIRST AMENDMENT. However slight a feature of official constitutional doctrine, the First Amendment, in the eyes of nineteenth-century trade unionists, always stood for the sanctity of association by citizens and "uniting peaceably to redress wrongs." Injunctions against peaceful persuasion, meetings, publications, parades, and picketing "trampled on" this vision of the First Amendment.

During the Lochner era, only a few dissenting jurists embraced aspects of labor's constitutional vision. But labor's constitutional views were seconded by many NEW DEAL congressmen who championed the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT and WAGNER ACT. These statutes supplanted the old common law regime and ushered in the modern labor-law era. Then, with the demise of Lochner-era SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS and the emergence of a New Deal majority on the Supreme Court, the Court began to extend First Amendment protection to labor protest.

In THORNHILL V. ALABAMA (1940) the Court struck down a state antipicketing statute, declaring that "the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute must be regarded as within that area of free discussion that is guaranteed by the Constitution." Picketing was a means of communicating with the public about matters of public concern. Although decided on the narrow ground of OVERBREADTH, Thornhill established that restrictions on picketing were subject to the constraints of the First Amendment.

In Thornhill, the Court did not adopt organized labor's—and New Deal reformers'—view that liberty of labor protest was bound up with an alternative conception of labor and of industrial democracy. Instead, the Thornhill Court classified picketing as political speech, perhaps because it had just abandoned the economic due-process doctrines of the Lochner era and did not want to appear to be meddling anew in economic affairs. But the marketplace dimension of picketing was inescapable. Picketing is inextricable from strikes and boycotts: a form of moral and political expression at the same time it aims to produce marketplace pressure and advantage. The Court could not recognize and define a constitutional right to picket without confronting the question of constitutional protection for strikes and boycotts. After Thornhill, several lower federal courts began to forge substantial First and Thirteenth Amendment limits on the states' power to bar peaceful strikes and boycotts.

But the Supreme Court soon dissappointed those who expected it to recognize these nascent rights. Instead, the Court returned the issue to the common-law terrain, reaffirming the law's traditional role of restricting the scope of allowable protest and mutaul aid. In Carpenters & Joiners Union, Locale 213 v. Ritter's Cafe (1942) the Court upheld a state court injunction against peaceful picketing. "[R]ecognition of peaceful picketing as an exercise of free speech," the Court reasoned, "does not imply that the states must be without power" to confine the bounds of industrial disputes—in this case, to forbid any pickets urging the public to boycott a cafe whose owner "had awarded a building contract to a man who was unfair to organized labor." The state court had found that the boycott violated the state's ANTITRUST LAWS; the Supreme Court held that state courts and legislatures remained free to "draw the line" in this fashion, balancing "the effort of the employer to carry on his business free from the interference of others against the effort of labor to further its economic self-interest."

But the Supreme Court soon disappointed those who expected it to recognize these nascent rights. Instead, the Court returned the issue to the common-law terrain, reaffirming the law's tradtional role of restricting the scope of allowable protest and mutual aid. In Carpenter and Joiners Union, Local No. 213 v. Ritter's Cafe (1942) the Court upheld a state court injunction against peaceful picketing. "[R]ecognition of peaceful picketing as an excercise of free speach," the Court reasoned, "does not imply that the state must be without power" to confine the bounds of industrial disputes—in this case, to forbid any pickets urging the public to boycott a cafe whose owner "had awarded a building contract to a man who was unfair to organized labor." The state courts had found that the boycott violated the state's ANTITRUST LAWS; the Supreme Court held that state courts and legislatures remained free to "draw the line" in this fashion, balancing "the effort of the employer to carry on his business free from the interference of others against the effort of labor to further its economic self-interest.

In the new regime of judicial deference toward state regulation of business and commerce, this characterization of labor conflicts—as clashes of private economic interests—was a gloomy sign from labor's perspective. Beginning with Ritter's Cafe, the Court ceased characterizing industrial disputes and labor picketing as involving matters of public concern. By the 1950s, labor protest was held to involve "purely commercial activities which may be regulated by the state upon any reasonable basis." Organized workers once again were sellers of a commodity like any other, and judicial restraint was therefore the appropriate posture. Since the New Deal, primary strikes over wages and working conditions have enjoyed considerable statutory protection; but strikes or boycotts that fall outside the narrow circle of statutory or state court approval have found almost no shelter in the Constitution. Today, even peaceful picketing urging consumers not to buy the products of "unfair" employers continues to be routinely enjoined, and First Amendment challenges are routinely rebuffed.

Meanwhile, First Amendment doctrine has undergone transformations that render its treatment of labor protest anomalous. Nonlabor picketing now enjoys full First Amendment protection from content-based restrictions. Moreover, in NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co. (1982), the Court held that peaceful picketing by CIVIL RIGHTS groups in support of a boycott of white merchants was fully shielded by the First Amendment. The Court rejected the argument that the picketing was unprotected because the pickets frequently had no direct dispute with the merchants. The pickets' main goal was DESEGREGATION of local public facilities; thus, the boycott was largely a "secondary" one, in labor-law jargon. The Claiborne Court noted that no similar First Amendment protection shields picketing in support of labor boycotts, but the Court found the difference in constitutional status justified by the difference it perceived between the two kinds of boycotts. The black citizens' boycott involved "expression on public issues, which has always rested on the highest rung of the hierarchy of first amendment values." Labor boycotts, by contrast, involve mere clashes of economic interests. Forgetting what it once had recognized—that labor protest also involves "public issues"—the Court relegated labor picketing to a second-class status.

Many commentators have assailed the Court's "public issue" versus "labor" picketing distinction, particularly in light of the elevation of commercial advertising to the status of constitutionally protected speech. At the time of Thornhill, the Court regarded government regulation of COMMERCIAL SPEECH as falling within that domain of social and economic policy that it behooved the Court to leave alone. More recently, however, the Court in CENTRAL HUDSON GAS AND ELECTRIC CORP. V. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (1980) extended substantial First Amendment protection to commercial advertising so that it now enjoys more constitutional protection than peaceful labor picketing.

It may be that the Court continues to relegate labor protest to a second-class constitutional status because it does not view industrial conflict as a matter of much public concern. Other factors may also figure. Many current decisions rest on the hoary nineteenth-century assumption that picketing is inherently coercive. Today's courts still frequently seem unable to distinguish physical coercion on the part of pickets from the economic force exerted on an employer if uncoerced listeners are simply persuaded by the pickets' message.

Courts may also tolerate severe governmental restraints on labor protest in part because they see unions as powerful political and economic players, more or less evenly matched with their employer-adversaries. In fact, this parity has rarely existed; today, the labor movement is extremely weak—as weak, in some respects, as it was before the New Deal reforms. But it is unlikely that the courts will change the Constitution's treatment of labor protest unless workers and unions themselves again create on a massive scale a protest movement that appeals beyond existing law to an alternative constitutional tradition and the moral imagination of the public.

WILLIAM E. FORBATH
(1992)

Bibliography

FORBATH, WILLIAM 1989 The Shaping of the American Labor Movement. Harvard Law Review 102:1109–1256.

NOTE (Cynthia Estlund) 1982 Labor Picketing and Commercial Speech: Free Enterprise Values in the Doctrine of Free Speech. Yale Law Journal 91:938–960.

POPE, JAMES 1987 Labor and the Constitution: From Abolition to Deindustrialization. Texas Law Review 65:1071–1136.

LADUE (CITY OF) v. GILLEO
512 U.S. 43 (1994)

For communities seeking order and stability, political speech is often disruptive and disquieting. In recent years, private homeowners associations and public municipalities have sought to preserve order and aesthetic values by prohibiting political signs and placards from public display on lawns and from windows of homes. The Supreme Court held one such effort, by the City of Ladue in Missouri, to be an unconstitutional infringement of the FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

Ladue banned homeowners from posting on their property signs other than "for sale" and identification signs. Margaret Gilleo, who wished to post a small sign advocating a peaceful resolution to the GULF WAR, challenged the municipal ordinance as violative of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, writing for a unanimous Court, invalidated the law, reasoning that political signs on residential property were a "venerable means of communication" important for political campaigns and for "animat[ing] change in the life of a community."

The Court rejected the city's argument that the ban was essential to avoid "visual blight and clutter" and was justifiable as a "time, place or manner" restriction. Commercial signs also created visual clutter, and even if content neutral the ban foreclosed a vehicle of political speech for which persons of "modest means" had "no practical substitute." Residential signs, the Court explained, were too important a feature of American political culture to be prohibited absent truly compelling reasons.

ADAM WINKLER
(2000)

LA FOLLETTE, ROBERT M.
(1855–1925)

Robert Marion La Follette was one of the few giants in the history of the United States SENATE, ranking with HENRY CLAY and DANIEL WEBSTER. Born in a Wisconsin log cabin, he was graduated from his state's university in Madison, began his legal practice there, and spent three undistinguished terms (1885–1891) in Congress. During the farmer-labor unrest of the 1890s, La Follette grew considerably more liberal, and in 1901 he entered the governor's mansion with a reform program later called the "Wisconsin idea." It became the basis of the Progressive movement. La Follette, always a Republican, advocated the direct PRIMARY ELECTION as a method of nominating candidates, MINIMUM WAGE AND MAXIMUM HOURS laws, trade unionism, the popular REFERENDUM, strict regulation of the rates and services of railroads and public utilities by government commissions of experts, and radical tax reforms. His success as governor led to his election in 1905 as a United States senator.

During his twenty-year career as a senator he rivaled THEODORE ROOSEVELT and WOODROW WILSON as an influence for political liberalism. The leader of the Senate's Republican insurgents, he exerted special efforts on behalf of increasing the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, energetic enforcement of ANTITRUST LAW, a federal income tax law, direct election of senators, and women's suffrage. After the Supreme Court decided STANDARD OIL COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1911), La Follette denounced the RULE OF REASON and judicial usurpation of the legislative function. Unlike most Republicans he supported the appointment to the Supreme Court of LOUIS D. BRANDEIS; the two men were close friends, thought alike on most matters of political economy, and had collaborated in framing many reform measures. They differed on foreign policy. La Follette opposed American entry into WORLD WAR I and the League of Nations. Although unpopular for a while during the war, because of pro-German and pacifist sympathies, La Follette emerged from the war as the undisputed leader of American liberalism.

He excoriated illiberal decisions of the Supreme Court. When the Court held unconstitutional congressional measures against child labor and construed antitrust laws to cover trade union activities, La Follette began a national campaign to curb the Court. Because he opposed JUDICIAL REVIEW over Congress, he proposed a constitutional amendment that would have authorized Congress to overcome a judicial veto in the same way as it did a presidential veto, by reenacting the statute by a two-thirds majority.

In 1924, at the peak of his career, La Follette refused to support CALVIN COOLIDGE and formed the Independent Progressive party, which nominated him and BURTON K. WHEELER, a Democrat. The party had only a presidential ticket, no local, state, or other federal candidates. It supported La Follette's Court-curbing amendment and would have restricted judicial invalidation of congressional acts to the Supreme Court only; in addition, it would have fixed a ten-year tenure for federal judges. The Progressives also denounced the Ku Klux Klan, then at the height of its popularity, and the Communist party. They also favored collective bargaining by labor through union representatives of their choice, antimonopoly measures, the restoration of competition, and extensive government ECONOMIC REGULATION. La Follette drew one vote out of every six, compared to the one in twelve received by the Populists in 1892, but carried only his own state.

When "Fighting Bob" died in 1925, his casket was placed in the rotunda of the Capitol, a rare honor, and the nation remembered him, in the words of his own epitaph, as one who "stood to the end for the ideals of American democracy."

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

LA FOLLETTE, BELLE CASE and LA FOLLETTE, FOLA 1953 Robert M. La Follette. 2 Vols. New York: Macmillan.

LAIRD v. TATUM
408 U.S. 1 (1972)

Protesters against American involvement in the VIETNAM WAR sued to stop Army intelligence surveillance which they claimed had a CHILLING EFFECT on the exercise of their FIRST AMENDMENT rights. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER's opinion for the Court, in a 5–4 decision, held that the case lacked RIPENESS because the protesters had presented no "claim of specific present objective . . . or . . . future harm" but only the fear that "the army may at some future date misuse the information in some way" that would harm them.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

LAKE COUNTRY ESTATES, INC. v. TAHOE REGIONAL PLANNING AGENCY
440 U.S. 391 (1979)

Landowners claimed that an appointed bi-state agency regulating development had, through overregulation, unconstitutionally destroyed the economic value of their property. The Supreme Court, over Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL's dissent, extended TENNEY V. BRANDHOVE (1951) to acts of unelected officials and found members of the planning agency to be absolutely immune from suit under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE for their legislation-like acts. The Court also found the agency not to be protected by the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity available to states.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

LALLI v. LALLI
439 U.S. 259 (1978)

In Lalli a fragmented Supreme Court brought further confusion to the body of EQUAL PROTECTION doctrine governing classifications based on ILLEGITIMACY. A 5–4 majority upheld a New York law that allowed an illegitimate child to inherit from his or her father only if a court, during the father's lifetime and no later than two years after the child's birth, had declared the father's paternity. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, who had written the MAJORITY OPINION in TRIMBLE V. GORDON (1977), wrote for a plurality of three Justices. Powell distinguished Trimble as a case in which even a judicial order declaring paternity would not have allowed inheritance; only the marriage of the child's parents would suffice. In Lalli the state could properly insist on the "evidentiary" requirement of a judicial order to establish paternity. The other six Justices all thought Lalli and Trimble indistinguishable: the four Lalli dissenters, plus two who joined the majority in upholding the law. The latter two Justices voted in accordance with their Trimble dissents.

The precedential force of Trimble may be uncertain, but at least seven Justices (the Lalli plurality and dissenters) all agreed that the STANDARD OF REVIEW for testing classifications based on illegitimacy was more rigorous than the RATIONAL BASIS test. Such classifications, said the plurality, would be invalid unless they were "substantially related to permissible state interests."

The state's interest in Lalli was the achievement of finality in the settlement of decedents' estates. The court order requirement provided sure proof of paternity. The artificiality of the requirement, however, was illustrated dramatically by the facts of Lalli itself, as Justice BYRON R. WHITE, for the dissenters, made clear. The decedent had often acknowledged his children openly; he had even executed a notarized document referring to one of them as "my son" and consenting to his marriage. Paternity had been proved clearly; what was missing was the formality of a court order. Such a judicial proceeding, of course, is least likely in the case in which the father and his illegitimate child are closest, and the father's acknowledgment of paternity has been most clearly established by nonjudicial means. The New York estate planners who wrote the law contrived its inertia to lean against the children of informal unions. Lalli is thus reminiscent of an earlier legal order designed to assure a man that his wealth and status would attach to a woman only when he chose to formalize their union and would pass only to the children of such a union.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Freedom of Intimate Association.)

LAMAR, JOSEPH R.
(1857–1916)

Joseph Rucker Lamar, "an old-fashioned southern gentleman," served on the Supreme Court from 1911 until his death in 1916. As a Justice, Lamar approved the received doctrines of the time such as FREEDOM OF CONTRACT and AFFECTATION WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST. Lamar had been a leading Georgia attorney and had served as a state legislator and member of the Georgia Supreme Court (1903–1905) before his appointment to the Court. He was the fourth of President WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT's appointees and replaced EDWARD D. WHITE, whom Taft had promoted from Associate to Chief Justice.

Lamar joined a Court that included Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, leaning to the progressive side. Lamar usually voted with the majority of the Court; he wrote only eight dissents in four years, and one writer counted agreement in 150 of 154 cases sustaining exercise of STATE POLICE POWER and in 71 of 74 cases striking down such legislation. Lamar's apparent conciliation should not be taken to indicate disinterested acquiescence. In UNITED STATES V. GRIMAUD (1911) Lamar substantially strengthened the force of administrative rulings. Grimaud placed the law squarely behind such rulings; Lamar denied that administrative decisions constituted legislative DELEGATIONS OF POWER, and he upheld Congress's right to punish violations as criminal acts if it chose. Although he sometimes supported CIVIL RIGHTS, his most famous opinion came in a labor case: GOMPERS V. BUCK'S STOVE AND RANGE COMPANY (1911). Writing for a unanimous Court, Lamar declared that a secondary boycott constituted an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade which could be forbidden by INJUNCTION. He rejected the union's claim of FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

Lamar served on the WHITE COURT, a Court that increasingly favored propertied interests. His lack of imagination and creativity were likely seen as virtues by his contemporaries, characteristics of a man well-fitted for the Court.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

DINNERSTEIN, LEONARD 1969 Joseph R. Lamar. Pages 1973–1997 in Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court, 1789–1969. New York: Chelsea House.

LAMAR, L. Q. C.
(1825–1893)

Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus Lamar, draftsman of the Mississippi Ordinance of Secession, celebrated eulogist of CHARLES SUMNER, and "Great Pacificator" during the electoral crisis of 1877, was appointed to the Supreme Court by GROVER CLEVELAND in 1888. He was the first Democrat to be appointed in a quarter-century and the first ex-Confederate to serve on the Court. Lamar was sixty-two years old when he received his commission, the second oldest new Justice in the Court's history. But he had been the South's most prominent apostle of sectional reconciliation for more than a decade and the President was primarily interested in the nomination's symbolic dimensions.

Judging exhilarated Lamar, and he was among the Court's most productive members until debilitated by ill health in the spring of 1892. Construction of the public land laws was his specialty, reflecting his experience as Cleveland's reform-minded secretary of the interior. He was also valuable at the conference table. "His was the most suggestive mind that I ever knew," Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER reported, "and not one of us but has drawn from his inexhaustible store." Lamar was equally impressed by his brethren, calling them "the smartest old fellows I ever saw." In 1893, when reminiscing about a long career of public service as Confederate diplomat, congressman, senator, and cabinet official, he described his judicial experience as "the most impressive incident in my entire intellectual and moral life."

STRICT CONSTRUCTION and traditional canons of interpretation characterized his work in constitutional law. Lamar had no sympathy for the newly fashioned concept of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, and he concurred with Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY's strident dissent in Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co. v. Minnesota (1890), maintaining that the REASONABLENESS of price regulations was a legislative, not a judicial, question. He also resisted extension of the SWIFT V. TYSON (1842) "general jurisprudence" doctrine to industrial accident cases. Only in the well-trodden COMMERCE CLAUSE field did Lamar consistently vote to restrict the autonomy of the states. And though he was quick to strike down tax laws and police regulations that burdened interstate transactions, Lamar remained obsessed with the necessity of setting limits to Congress's commerce power. In KIDD V. PEARSON (1888), his most influential opinion, Lamar not only formulated the mischievous distinction between commerce and manufacturing but also stated its rationale. "If it be held that the term [commerce] includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future," he explained, "it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate, not only manufacture, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry." For a former Confederate whose cherished doctrine of state SOVEREIGNTY already had been extinguished, such a state of affairs was at once imaginable and unthinkable.

CHARLES W. MCCURDY
(1986)

Bibliography

MAYES, EDWARD 1896 Lucus Q. C. Lamar, His Life, Times, and Speeches. Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

MURPHY, JAMS B. 1973 L. Q. C. Lamar, Pragmatic Patriot. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

LAMB'S CHAPEL v. CENTER MORICHES UNION FREE SCHOOL DISTRICT
508 U.S. 384 (1993)

In Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District, the Supreme Court first established the important proposition that religion is a "viewpoint" that is entitled to protection from the unequal allocation of government benefits. Prior to this decision, it was often argued that religion is merely a subject matter, and that the government could exclude "religious" speakers from government benefits so long as it remained neutral among religions, and between religion and atheism or agnos-ticism. In a wide range of cases involving access to government PROPERTY or public benefits, the state may discriminate on the basis of subject matter but not viewpoint.

The case arose when a church, named Lamb's Chapel, sought to use an auditorium in a public school during nonschool hours to show a religious film on the subject of child rearing. Under rules set by the school district, school facilities could be used during nonschool hours for social, civic, or recreational meetings or entertainment. Pursuant to state law, however, the district adopted a rule prohibiting the use of this property "by any group for religious purposes."

The church sued, arguing that the school property was a designated PUBLIC FORUM and that it is unconstitutional to exclude a group from such a forum on the basis of the religious viewpoint of its speech. Although the DISTRICT COURT and the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit rejected this argument, the Supreme Court unanimously reversed and adopted the plaintiffs' position.

The decision was an extension of WIDMAR V. VINCENT (1981), which had permitted university students to use university facilities for religious speech. Lamb's Chapel further opened the door to expanded FREEDOM OF SPEECH rights by religious groups on government property and in other government-subsidized forums. If religion is a "viewpoint" then it cannot be used as a basis for exclusion, no matter what type of forum may be involved, in the absence of a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST to justify it. The only such justification that appears plausible is compliance with the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE. The Court held that the establishment clause does not bar a religious group from using government property on a neutral basis.

That analysis sparked a colorful CONCURRING OPINION by Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, who objected to the Court's reliance on the three-part test of LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971), which he described as similar to "some ghoul in a late-night horror movie that repeatedly sits up in its grave and shuffles abroad, after being repeatedly killed and buried."

MICHAEL W. MCCONNELL
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Accommodation of Religion; Government Aid to Religious Institutions; Lemon Test; Religion and Free Speech; Religious Liberty.)

LAMONT v. POSTMASTER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES
381 U.S. 301 (1965)

A 1962 act of Congress required the postmaster general to detain all unsealed mail of foreign origin determined to be "communist political propaganda," and to notify the addressee that the mail would be delivered only if he requested it by returning an official reply card. The Supreme Court, 8–0, held the act unconstitutional as an abridgment of the addressee's FIRST AMENDMENT rights. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, for the Court, declared that the act sought to control the flow of ideas and was at war with the wide-open discussion of ideas protected by the amendment.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Listeners' Rights.)

LANDIS, JAMES M.
(1899–1964)

James McCauley Landis was a gifted lawyer, professor and dean at Harvard Law School, and writer, whose outstanding contribution to American law was his theoretical analysis and practical championing of REGULATORY COMMISSIONS. He was a student of FELIX FRANKFURTER and coauthored The Business of the Supreme Court (1928) with him. Landis chaired both the Securities and Exchange Commission (1934–1937) and the Civil Aeronautics Board (1946–1947), served on the Federal Trade Commission (1933–1934), and wrote The Administrative Process (1938), a sympathetic analysis of regulatory commissions. The book discussed the limits on agencies imposed by Congress and the checks on them afforded by JUDICIAL REVIEW, and Landis downplayed the likelihood of administrative abuses of power, arguing that the true danger lay in lethargic enforcement of congressional policy. The efficiency with which these commissions could focus on economic problems by merging executive, legislative, and judicial powers impressed Landis, who saw administrative action as a practical means to achieve realistic ends.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

RITCHIE, DONALD A. 1980 James M. Landis, Dean of the Regulators. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LAND ORDINANCE OF 1784

See: Ordinance of 1784

LANDRUM-GRIFFIN ACT
73 Stat. 519 (1959)

Known as the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, Landrum-Griffin brought internal administration of labor unions within the realm of federal regulation and guaranteed union members certain basic rights. Its goal was union self-regulation and voluntary democratization.

Passage of the measure resulted from a growing national concern influenced by a Senate committee's findings of union leaders' corruption and autocratic behavior. Relying on Congress's constitutional authority to insure the free flow of INTERSTATE COMMERCE, the act restricted secondary BOYCOTTS; strictly controlled union elections; required strict reporting of the unions' financial transactions; outlawed extortion PICKETING; authorized state JURISDICTION over labor disputes not handled by the National Labor Relations Board; and modified union security provisions for certain national unions. In setting forth a Bill of Rights of Members of Labor Organizations, the act reversed the courts' tendency to allow union governance by self-established rules.

The act also made it a criminal offense for a Communist party member to serve as an officer or employee of a labor union until five years after termination of party membership. In UNITED STATES V. BROWN (1965) the Supreme Court ruled this section unconstitutional as a BILL OF ATTAINDER.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

MCLAUGHLIN, DORIS and SCHOOMAKER, ANITA 1979 The Landrum-Griffin Act and Union Democracy. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

LAND USE

See: Eminent Domain; Zoning

LANE v. WILSON

See: Literacy Test

LANGDON, JOHN
(1741–1819)

John Langdon, a financier and businessman who risked his large personal fortune in support of the Revolution, had, by 1787, already served in the Continental Congress and as a colonel in the Revolutionary War; he had also supervised shipbuilding for the navy and had been president of New Hampshire.

As chairman of New Hampshire's delegation to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, Langdon personally paid the delegation's expenses. He spoke often at the Convention and served on three committees. He favored such nationalist measures as a congressional veto over state legislation and a prohibition of state taxes on exports. He advocated prohibiting Congress, as well as the states, from emitting BILLS OF CREDIT.

After signing the Constitution, Langdon returned home to become leader of the proratification forces in the state convention. He was elected to the United States Senate and became its first president pro tempore; and he served seven more years as governor of New Hampshire.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

ROSSITER, CLINTON 1966 1787: The Grand Convention. New York: Macmillan.

LANSING, JOHN, JR.
(1754–1829?)

Mayor John Lansing of Albany was one of three delegates from New York to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. A former member of Congress and an ally of Governor George Clinton, Lansing was chosen to represent the antinationalist sentiment of the state's political leadership. Lansing was a coauthor of the PATERSON PLAN and a spokesman for the faction that opposed creating a strong national government. He and fellow New York delegate ROBERT YATES withdrew on July 10 charging that the convention was exceeding its congressional mandate to propose amendments to the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION.

In the New York debate over RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION Lansing was one of the anti-Federalist leaders. He was a delegate to the state ratifying convention where he urged defeat of the new Constitution and summoning of a new federal convention. After a proratification majority was assured, Lansing urged conditional ratification and then ratification reserving the right to secede. The long series of proposed amendments—including a BILL OF RIGHTS—that accompanied New York's instrument of ratification was largely Lansing's work.

After 1788 Lansing held state judicial office—serving as Chief Justice and Chancellor—but he never held any federal office except presidential elector.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

ROSSITER, CLINTON 1966 1787: The Grand Convention. New York: Macmillan.

LANZA, UNITED STATES v.
260 U.S. 377 (1922)

There is no DOUBLE JEOPARDY when both state and federal governments outlaw an offense and each prosecutes an individual for the same act. The United States indicted Lanza for violating the VOLSTEAD ACT after the state of Washington had already prosecuted him under a state statute enforcing PROHIBITION. A unanimous Supreme Court, dismissing Lanza's double jeopardy claim, declared that the double jeopardy forbidden by the Fifth Amendment was a second trial for the same offense in the same JURISDICTION. The Court concluded: "It follows that an act denounced as a crime by both national and state sovereignties is an offense against the peace and dignity of both, and may be punished by each." Lanza is still good law.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

LARKIN v. GRENDEL'S DEN, INCORPORATED
459 U.S. 116 (1982)

Dissenting alone, Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST observed that "silly cases" like this one, as well as great or hard cases, make bad law. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER for the Court aimed its "heavy FIRST AMENDMENT artillery," in Rehnquist's phrase, at a statute that banned the sale of alcoholic beverages within 500 feet of a school or church, should either object to the presence of a neighboring tavern. Originally, Massachusetts had absolutely banned such taverns but found that the objective of the STATE POLICE POWER, promoting neighborhood peace, could be fulfilled by the less drastic method of allowing schools and churches to take the initiative of registering objections. In this case a church objected to a tavern located ten feet away. Burger held that vesting the church with the state's veto power breached the prohibition against an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, on the grounds that the church's involvement vitiated the secular purposes of the statute, advanced the cause of religion, and excessively entangled state and church. Rehnquist argued that a sensible statute had not breached the wall of SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

LARSON v. DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN COMMERCE CORPORATION
337 U.S. 682 (1949)

This is a leading decision concerning the SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY of the United States. Plaintiff sued the head of the War Assets Administration (WAA), alleging that the Administrator had sold certain surplus coal to plaintiff, had refused to deliver the coal, and had entered into a contract to sell the coal to others. Because plaintiff sought injunctive relief against WAA officials, ordering them not to sell the coal or to deliver it to anyone other than plaintiff, and because the suit concerned property of the United States, the Supreme Court found the suit to be one against the United States and, therefore, to be barred by sovereign immunity. The Court distinguished Larson from suits against officers for acts beyond their statutory powers and from suits seeking to enjoin allegedly unconstitutional behavior, both of which the Court stated would not constitute suits against the sovereign, even if the plaintiff alleges the officer acted unconstitutionally or beyond his statutory powers, "if the relief requested cannot be granted merely by ordering the cessation of the conduct complained of but will require affirmative action by the sovereign or the disposition of unquestionably sovereign property." In cases involving suits against state officials, part of this passage apparently was contradicted by EDELMAN V. JORDAN (1974) and MILLIKEN V. BRADLEY (1977). In each of these cases the Court found that litigation to require a state to pay the costs of future compliance with the Constitution did not constitute a suit against the sovereign. The precise holding in Larson became an important and debated issue in PENNHURST STATE SCHOOL AND HOSPITAL V. HALDERMAN (1984), where the Court relied in part on Larson to hold that actions in federal court against state officials, alleging violations of state law, are prohibited by the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

LARSON v. VALENTE
456 U.S. 228 (1982)

Minnesota required charitable organizations to register and make disclosure when they solicited contributions. Religious organizations were exempted if more than half their contributions came from members. Members of the Unification Church sued in federal court to challenge the law's constitutionality. The Supreme Court, 5–4, held the law invalid.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for the Court, said that the law effectively granted denominational preferences, favoring well-established churches and disfavoring newer churches or churches that preferred public solicitation. This discrimination took the case out of the purpose-effects-entanglement test of LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971) for ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. Instead, Brennan invoked a searching form of STRICT SCRUTINY, which the state here failed to pass. The state's purported interests in preventing abuse in solicitation were not supported in the record. In any case, Brennan said, the Minnesota law failed Lemon's "entanglement" test by risking the politicizing of religion; one Minnesota legislator had remarked, "I'm not sure why we're so hot to regulate the Moonies [Unification Church] anyway."

The four dissenters thought the plaintiffs lacked STANDING to challenge the law. Two of them also dissented on the merits of the case, arguing that the law did not constitute an intentional discrimination among religions.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

LASKI, HAROLD J.
(1893–1950)

British political scientist and Socialist party leader Harold Joseph Laski influenced American constitutional thought both through his public writings and through his friendship with leading American jurists and political leaders. Laski studied political science at Oxford University under Ernest Barker, and from 1916 to 1920 was an instructor in government at Harvard University. While teaching at Harvard he met, and began a twenty-year correspondence with, Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, and he established an even longer-lasting friendship with Professor (later Justice) FELIX FRANKFURTER. He also numbered among his friends and correspondents President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT and Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO.

From 1920 until his death in 1950 Laski taught at the London School of Economics and Political Science. He continued to correspond with his American friends and frequently visited the United States. He affected American jurisprudence mainly by influencing those whose general approach to legal and constitutional problems is called LEGAL REALISM.

Although in his early books, written in America, he had embraced a pluralist doctrine of politics, Laski had by 1931 adopted the Marxist theory of history as class struggle, and thereafter he attempted to formulate a non-Soviet Marxist political theory. He never lost interest in American politics, and his last book was The American Democracy, a Marxist account of American history and institutions.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

DEANE, HERBERT A. 1954 The Political Ideas of Harold Laski. Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University.

HOWE, MARK DEWOLFE 1953 The Holmes-Laski Correspondence. 2 Vols. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LASSITER v. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES

See: Right to Counsel

LAU v. NICHOLS
414 U.S. 563 (1974)

San Francisco failed to provide non-English-speaking students of Chinese ancestry with an adequate education. The Supreme Court, without dissent, found such an effect to violate Title VI of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 even absent any intent to discriminate against the students. Lau's employment of an "effects" test under Title VI may not have survived REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), a question that divided the Court in Guardians Association v. Civil Service Commission (1983). Congress later expressed approval of Lau in enacting legislation to assist non-English-speaking students.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

LAW AND ECONOMICS THEORY

The "positive" economic theory of law argues that one can discern an economic logic implicit in law, constitutional as well as any other. Economic analysis can also play a normative role, providing a benchmark for assessing the soundness of any particular constitutional clause or interpretation. (As economics itself does not establish indisputable criteria of judgment, the benchmark itself may be blurry.) For some constitutional provisions or doctrines, the relevance of economics is obvious; the Fifth Amendment's takings clause is an example.

A market economy requires private property. One can imagine an economy of government firms relating to each other, to workers, and to consumers primarily through market operations. But if capital were allocated by government, this would be an odd parody of a market economy, and if capital were allocated by markets in the sense that individuals were free to place their capital where they chose, the firms would not be government firms. The Fifth Amendment's requirement of JUST COMPENSATION for the TAKING OF PROPERTY thus supplies a qualified protection for the market economy. The economist naturally asks how alternative constructions of the clause will affect incentives—the feature of a market economy that accounts in large measure for its productivity.

One might view the clause as aimed at assuring owners correct incentives to invest and improve property. The Supreme Court's focus on "investment-backed expectations" in PENN CENTRAL TRANSPORTATION CO. V. NEW YORK CITY (1978) suggests such a concern. But insurance against such risks could be provided by private insurers, and so the question arises why the duty to pay should fall on government. At least one answer—again look ing at incentives—is that such a duty will improve incentives for government decision makers, deterring the pursuit of programs that sacrifice a greater value than they produce.

Does such a view lead to a rule that compensation is required for government acts that fail some sort of cost-benefit test, and not for ones that pass? Clearly not. To resolve claims on such a basis would require the courts to assess the wisdom of virtually every government decision, a costly repetition of other branches' work. Because many of the benefits and costs of a program are political, this inquiry would take courts into areas where other institutions might have a comparative advantage. Finally, the Constitution establishes rights. Whether created for instrumental or for ethical reasons (e.g., a sense of the moral fitness of people's owning themselves and what they receive in free exchanges with others), a right would hardly be worthy of the name if it succumbed whenever a cost-benefit test ran against it. Thus, the economist, along with everyone else, would not define the protections of the taking clause by reference to "case utilitarianism" (assessing particular acts in terms of their direct effect on aggregate utility).

But the criterion of maximizing utility may help define the rules that embody constitutional rights—"rule utilitarianism." Reading the takings clause to require compensation for all government acts, for instance, would provide a strong incentive against wasteful government acts. But such a rule would entail enormous administrative and information costs—though never the costs of evaluating the program's benefits, as the rejected case-utilitarian view would. The concern for administrative costs suggests a reading of the takings clause that requires compensation for any act (or class of acts), except where its costs are relatively widespread—in the extreme case, for example, those of a change in monetary policy—so that the administrative costs of awarding compensation are high. (The compensation itself is not a social cost, but a transfer from taxpayers or users to whoever's property is taken. Effecting the transfer through raising taxes will usually impose secondary costs, however, by reducing economic incentives to engage in the taxed activity.)

In fact, many features of taking law seem to fit such a notion comfortably: the refusal to view all regulatory losses as automatically compensable, coupled with compensability for at least some extreme cases; consideration of "average reciprocity of advantage," offsetting benefits that a property owner may gain from a scheme as a whole, such as a historic district, and that would complicate any effort to compute compensation; and award of compensation for even a very small loss where it takes the form of a complete taking of all rights in a diminutive piece of property.

On the other hand, the courts' relative indifference to regulations sweeping away much of the value of undeveloped land raises a question about the judicial vision of the clause. Focus on incentives for property owners might support such relative indifference; the existence of land, as opposed to buildings, typically requires no investor effort. (In Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 1979, where human effort had created a waterway, the Supreme Court extended protections to private interests beyond what it would have afforded similar interests in a natural waterway.) Focus on incentives for government and recognition of the opportunity costs of undeveloped resources preempted by government might tilt the balance toward protection in some of these cases.

The takings clause may seem easy territory for demonstrating a constitutional concern for economic incentives, but broadly defined, such a concern pervades the document. The Framers' fear of excessive governmental power led them to rely on institutional incentives as a check. The SEPARATION OF POWERS rests on an assumption about human behavior familiar to economists: even in government, people will pursue personal advantage to a large degree. Thus, as in the private marketplace, the Constitution used private incentives to achieve a public end, ambition being made to counteract ambition, as JAMES MADISON put it in THE FEDERALIST #51.

The system of checks exposes a complex relation between effiiciency at different levels. While Judge Richard Posner has argued that seperation of powers is at least in part an effort to increase government efficiency by tailoring the institutional structure to particular government tasks, the structure also impedes government action, making it less efficient as an institution, But if some sort of overall efficiency by forstalling inefficient ECONOMIC REGULATION. On the other hand, once inefficient regulations exist, seperation of powers may decrease efficiency by delaying deregulation long after a consensus has developed that government intervention is unwise.

Another example of a per se inefficient activity may be the FIRST AMENDMENT ban on an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, which would seem to negate even government subsidies to religion that offset market failure and would thus presumably be efficient. But reading the clause as a requirement of government neutrality in religion, one can readily find a justification in economics, broadly conceived. The Framers could easily have thought that the costs of any government nonneutrality, in social and political divisiveness, would generally outweigh benefits.

If the Constitution does prefer a set of social "goods," such as minimal government and government neutrality toward religion and speech, there remains the problem of defining the degree of preference. Few good things come without costs, and one would naturally expect courts to be wary of constitutional interpretations that extend constitutional goods to a point of extravagant cost. The Constitution is not a "suicide pact," as Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON cautioned in TERMINIELLO V. CHICAGO (1949). Similarly, if "cost-benefit" sounds like an economist's approach, "balancing" the costs of alternative rules is surely no more than recognition that at some point one set of rights must yield to another. Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., wrote in Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter (1908), "All rights tend to declare themselves absolute to their logical extreme. Yet all in fact are limited by the neighborhood of principles of policy which are other than those on which the particular right is founded, and which become strong enough to hold their own when a certain point is reached."

Still, the economist's concern for cost may be special. The subject of economics is the problem of maximizing something (e.g., utility, wealth), subject to the constraint of scarcity. Whether the relevant scarcity is of conventional commodities or of constitutional goods, such as opportunities to communicate, the economist should have something useful to say. Indeed, an important insight of economics is that costs are simply benefits (goods) given up in pursuit of other goods. An economist should be quicker than most to spot opportunity costs and to dispel the fallacy that costs could ever be purely pecuniary. The costs of a policy, including a constitutional rule, are the goods, services, and benefits that it destroys or sacrifices. To the extent economic analysis of law flourishes, one may expect to find cost arguments more common, explicit, and sophisticated. Thus, although in CLEVELAND BOARD OF EDUCATION V. LAFLEUR (1974) the Court declared that "administrative convenience alone is insufficient to make valid what is otherwise a violation of due process of law," MATHEWS V. ELDRIDGE (1976) made such costs integral to its analysis of procedural due process.

What, then, is distinctive about the economic approach? Neither the interest in costs nor the balancing of the costs of various approaches seems unique to analysts of economic bent, even if economists typically press them furthest. There are, however, analytic tools employed by economists as a matter of course, but by others rarely, if at all.

One specialty of economics is the search for the true incidence of the costs of taxes, subsidies, and regulations. Inelastic suppliers and demanders bear these costs. A supply is inelastic if suppliers have few alternative uses of the relevant resources. A tax on coal production is likely to fall largely on the owners of coal in place, as there are few activities to which they can divert their coal-mining property. This is still more true if users of coal have many alternatives—that is, if demand is quite elastic. This is clearest where the coal tax of a single state is at issue, and demanders' substitutes include the supply of all coal producers outside the taxing state.

Use of the analysis is obvious for issues of the constitutionality of state taxes or regulations that are challenged as offending the DORMANT COMMERCE CLAUSE, that is, the courts' implied authority to strike down state rules that unduly intrude on INTERSTATE COMMERCE, even where Congress has been silent. Indeed, in assessing a coal severance tax against a COMMERCE CLAUSE attack, the Court alluded in Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Montana (1981) to the elasticity of demand as an important consideration, but declined to pursue the matter. The decision not to pursue it appears correct, for the "export" of the tax seems unlikely unless the taxing state has market power in the good. This will not be true unless the state accounts for a high proportion of supply or colludes with other supplying states. In either case, the state is likely to be so drastically outnumbered by importing states as to make a congressional remedy easy.

The search for incidence is useful in other, less obvious areas. The Supreme Court's PUBLIC FORUM jurisprudence, for example, rests on the notion that for a special class of speakers the burden of restrictions on the communicative use of public property is relatively severe because of their lack of alternative means of reaching an audience. Thus, Justice HUGO L. BLACK argued in Martin v. City of Struthers (1943) that "door to door distribution of circulars is essential to the poorly financed causes of little people." The question raised is a good one, but the asserted answer may be an oversimplification. Though doubtless the poor buy a lower per capita share of the food supply than the nonpoor, the nonpoor obviously do not "buy up" all the food. Similarly, it is far from clear that messages relating to causes involving the poor are underrepresented in market channels of communication. (To the extent that the poor are a demoralized underclass, they likely would not initiate many communications of any kind, including circulars and street demonstrations.)

The economist's training generally leads to a search for effects on ultimate consumers and providers. Where would-be speakers challenge a private property owner's speech restrictions, as at the shopping center in Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner (1972), or where a shopping center owner challenges a state's limits on his ability to restrain speech, as in PRUNEYARD SHOPPING CENTER V. ROBINS (1980), the Court has framed the dispute as one between the property rights of the owner and the free speech rights of speakers. But to the economist a more relevant formulation is the conflict between one set of property users' interest in communication and another set's interest in being free from the communications. A profit-seeking owner of a shopping center is a middleman, presumably seeking an economically optimal tradeoff: to allow speech up to the point where the benefit (captured by him in rents) exceeds the costs (suffered by him as diminished rentals as result of user resistance). The point suggests yet another perspective on the idea that the cost of communication on sidewalks, streets, or other government property is low. The speaker's out-of-pocket cost is low, to be sure, but in part because some of the burden is borne by those whose convenience or tranquillity is reduced. Of course, if government officials cannot charge fees to capture some of the benefits of free communication, yet do bear some of its costs (in the form of less personal tranquillity themselves), the public forum doctrine may be a justifiable subsidy to offset their skewed incentives in other branches.

If there is an economic logic implicit in constitutional law, is the reason that the Framers and the courts hace used the tools of ecconomic analysis intuitively rather than explicitly or that some process (e.g., the selectionof cases for litigation as a opposed to settlement) tends to screen out ecconomically unsound precedents? To the extent that the first explaination is sound, there may appear some tension between the positive economic theory—with incentives, with maximizing values subject to constraints, with tradeoffs at the margin, with identifying the true nature and incidence of costs—seem basic to any coherent approach to social nomic analysis thus seems inextricably linked to CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION, with perhaps no more at stake than degrees of sophistication.

STEPHEN F. WILLIAMS
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Economic Analysis and the Constitution; Economic Equal Protection; Economic Liberties and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

COASE, R. H. 1977 Advertising and Free Speech. Journal of Legal Studies 6:1–34.

CONFERENCE 1975 Economic Analysis of Political Behavior. Journal of Law and Economics 18:587–918.

EASTERBROOK, FRANK H. 1984 Foreword: The Court and the Economic System. Harvard Law Review 98:1–60.

EPSTEIN, RICHARD A. 1985 Takings. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

MCCONNELL, MICHAEL W. and POSNER, RICHARD A. 1989 An Economic Approach to Issues of Religious Freedom. University of Chicago Law Review 56:1–60.

POSNER, RICHARD A. 1986 Economic Analysis of Law, 3rd ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

SOWELL, THOMAS 1980 Knowledge and Decisions. New York: Basic Books.

SYMPOSIUM 1987 The Constitution as an Economic Document. George Washington Law Review 56:1–186.

LAW ENFORCEMENT AND FEDERAL–STATE RELATIONS

This country has long been committed to the notion that primary responsibility for law enforcement should reside in state and local governments. Over the past century, however, changes in the federal criminal system have affected the traditional balance among federal, state, and local responsibilities for law enforcement. We may be slowly moving in the direction of a national police force.

The Supreme Court has affirmed the constitutionality of an expanded federal legislative authority in the realm of criminal enforcement. Congress has enacted numerous statutes under this expanded federal authority. As a result, the federal criminal code has begun to look more and more like a state criminal code in its substantive content and even in its jurisdictional reach and form.

Over the long term, the balance among the several law enforcement JURISDICTIONS will be determined not only by the breadth of the law on the books but also by its implementation in practice. The type and magnitude of police resources available to the federal government and the attitudes of the electorate and decision makers in key governmental institutions are likely to determine whether a broad federal criminal authority will supplant state and local responsibilities. Here, too, some changes have begun.

The traditional allocation of law enforcement responsibilities assigns to local governments the basic policing of crimes such as homicide, theft, robbery, rape, burglary, muggings, and the like. Local police have responsibility for patrol, for immediate response to reports of crime, and for investigations. A huge number of local officers presently performs those functions nationwide, particularly in metropolitan areas. The idea of a "national police force" directed from Washington, D.C. taking over these functions seems far-reaching. But one can imagine substantial shifts in the traditional division between federal and local responsibilities that would be accompanied by growth of a significantly larger corps of federal police that might fairly be called a national police force.

The jurisdictional reach of the federal criminal code has expanded in many ways over the past century. Most federal criminal legislation not aimed at protecting direct federal interests, such as federal funds or property, has been constitutionally based in Congress's enumerated powers—for example, the POSTAL POWER, the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER, and the power to regulate commerce among the states. (See NATIONAL POLICE POWER.)

Use of the postal and taxing powers as a basis for federal criminal jurisdiction has not changed much over the years. The use of the mails was relied upon early in the mail fraud statute enacted in 1872. A comprehensive registration-tax scheme was utilized in the original major antinarcotics legislation, the HARRISON ACT of 1914. The COMMERCE CLAUSE which began its criminal law history as a fairly narrow jurisdictional base—requiring transportation or travel across a state line—in modern times has been expanded. In a number of statutes, federal jurisdiction is now based on the use of the facilities of commerce such as interstate telephone calls, telegrams, and any kind of interstate movement of persons or goods.

The EFFECT ON COMMERCE formula, originally developed in the economic regulation sphere, has also broadened the bases for federal criminal jurisdiction. The nexus with commerce required under that formula is not very substantial. And the "effect on commerce" formula itself has been extended to situations where the criminal activity merely takes place on the premises of a business whose operations affect commerce. Furthermore, in PEREZ V. UNITED STATES (1971) the Court accepted congressional findings that a type of criminal conduct was part of a class of activities affecting commerce, and held that that type of conduct could be made a federal crime without any showing of an effect upon commerce in the individual case. Although in most cases similar to Perez proof of an effect upon commerce probably can be shown, Perez represents the furthest expansion of the reach of federal criminal jurisdiction under the commerce power.

The necessity to rely upon enumerated powers led Congress to enact crimes in forms differing markedly from the usual state penal code. Often, otherwise innocuous conduct that provided the basis for federal jurisdiction became the central element of the offense. Congress made criminal the transportation in commerce of lottery tickets, or obscene literature, or women for immoral purposes; depositing a letter in the mails to execute a fraudulent scheme; or affecting commerce by robbery or extortion.

The odd form of these crimes has produced concerns peculiar to federal criminal law. The prosecution of federal crimes often overemphasizes the jurisdiction element. The Supreme Court in four decades has, in five mail fraud cases, faced the question whether mailing was done for purposes of the fraudulent scheme; during the same period, the Court has not once considered the sometimes perplexing question of what constitutes fraudulant conduct under the statute.

The jurisdictional reach of federal criminal statutes has also developed in an odd checkerboard pattern. For example, originally, federal law made it a crime to use the mails to defraud but not the telegraph or telephone. Many such inconsistencies have been eliminated, but some still remain.

The Perez decision may also have far-reaching effects on the form of federal crimes. The case is usually cited for its effect in expanding the jurisdictional reach of federal criminal laws. However, the more important impact of the case may be that Congress can now, if it is so minded, draft a criminal code in a form substantially identical to a state penal code. Under such a code, the federal prosecutor would not have to prove the jurisdictional element in a crime belonging to a commerce-related class of activity; the proof would resemble the evidence offered in comparable state prosecutions.

Congress has not yet fully taken up the Perez invitation. In addition to the consumer credit statute enacted in 1964, the most significant statutes using this drafting approach are the illegal gambling business statute and the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act, both enacted in 1970. Federal drug crimes, which were historically based on the taxing power, are now based on the commerce power and defined in traditional criminal law terms.

Many traditional crimes have long been subject to punishment under the federal criminal code where a direct federal interest is involved, when the offense occurs on federal property or in a location for which the federal government has a special responsibility, or when federal funds are involved or persons are injured. Thus murder, manslaughter, and rape are federal crimes when committed "within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States." And where criminal conduct on federal lands is not punishable by any specific federal enactment but would be a crime under state law, federal law incorporates state law and makes the conduct punishable.

However, traditional crimes have also been made federal offenses where no direct federal interest is involved. Legislation of this type is usually justified on the ground that the crimes involved are often committed by criminal groups organized and operating in more than one state, thus calling for nationwide investigation and prosecution. Such offenses are broadly defined, however, and do not limit federal prosecution to instances where the conduct involved can conveniently only be investigated and prosecuted by federal authorities.

There is today hardly a major crime category treated in state penal codes that is not also a federal crime, even in the absence of a direct federal interest. Ignoring for the moment the jurisdictional limits, examples of such crimes include: prostitution (MANN ACT, 1910); various forms of theft involving stolen motor vehicles, other stolen property, and theft from interstate shipments (Dyer Act, 1919); bank robbery (1934); robbery (Anti-Racketeering Act, 1934); extortion (Anti-Racketeering Act, 1934); kidnaping (1932); threats (1934); arson (Travel Act, 1961); bribery (Travel Act, 1961); rioting (1968); sexual exploitation of children (1978); and murder (RACKETEER INFLUENCED AND CORRUPT ORGANIZATIONS ACT, RICO, 1970).

In several instances, state crimes have played a more direct role in the federal criminal code. In three important pieces of complex criminal legislation—the Travel Act of 1961, the gambling business statute of 1970, and the RICO statute of 1970—Congress adopted the legislative technique of making the commission of certain crimes in violation of state law a federal crime under specified circumstances. In these instances, federal law did not simply cover the same ground as the state crime; it became identical to it.

The effect of these changes in jurisdictional reach, form, and substantive coverage has been to move the federal criminal code closer to the form and content of the fifty state penal codes with which it overlaps. Certain benefits have resulted from these changes. Many anomalies and inconsistencies in federal crime coverage have been eliminated. It is now also easier for the federal government, in a limited fashion, directly to supplement state and local efforts to combat ordinary crime.

These changes also have their costs. The old emphasis on jurisdiction and the checkerboard pattern of coverage have served as a constant reminder of the limited role of the federal government in protecting local communities against ordinary crime. As these elements in the code are eliminated, it becomes easier to think in terms of an expanded federal role.

The balance of responsibility necessarily will continue to remain with the states as long as federal law enforcement resources remain small in comparison to state and local forces, and federal prosecutions remain a small percentage of the total prosecutorial caseload of the country. Overall, there are about fifty major federal criminal enforcement agencies with approximately 50,000 field personnel. Most of these have specialized duties and limited jurisdiction. Approximately 35,000 federal felony prosecutions are initiated annually by about 2,000 federal prosecutors. This federal picture should be contrasted with that at the state and local levels where approximately 19,000 police agencies employ about 500,000 sworn officers, and in excess of 700,000 prosecutions are begun each year by more than 20,000 state and local prosecutors.

A dramatic increase in the number of federal law enforcement personnel or their combination in a single agency would have to occur in order to create the conditions for a major shift of law enforcement responsibilities to the federal realm. However, such a shift could also conceivably occur through a shift of military personnel into domestic law enforcement, or by the development of federal control over state and local agencies.

The growth of existing federal law enforcement agencies has been significant although not dramatic. In the past thirty years, the FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION (FBI), the largest federal law enforcement agency and the one with the most general criminal enforcement authority, has grown from 3,000 to 8,000 agents; the Secret Service has expanded from 300 to 1,500; and the Customs Service, from 150 to 600 agents. The Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) has grown tenfold from 200 to 2,000 agents.

The 1970s and 1980s have seen moves toward consolidation of separate agencies. The Bureau of Narcotics, originally located in the Treasury Department, was shifted to the Department of Justice, and later became the DEA. Recently the FBI, which had never before had any significant investigative responsibility for drug matters, moved strongly into that field and began working closely with DEA. DEA personnel may eventually be absorbed into the FBI, a move that would increase the personnel of that agency by more than one-fifth.

Even if agencies continue to grow and merge, a dramatic shift of law enforcement responsibility from state and local governments to the federal government seems unlikely in the foreseeable future. The creation of a single, really large corps of federal enforcement personnel would require considerable expansion of either the rate of growth or the practice of combining agencies.

Resources for a national police operation might also conceivably become available through increased use of the military to enforce domestic law. There is a strong tradition, founded in part in the same concerns as the commitment to local responsibility for law enforcement, against the involvement of the military in law enforcement. In the context of military surveillance activities directed against civilians, Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS once suggested that "turning the military loose on civilians even if sanctioned by act of Congress . . . would raise serious and profound constitutional questions." A statutory prohibition against the use of the military to enforce domestic law, the POSSE COMITATUS ACT, was enacted in 1878. The act makes it a crime to use the military forces "to execute the laws" except as expressly authorized by Congress or the Constitution.

The Supreme Court has not yet authoritatively interpretated the Posse Comitatus Act. Existing lower court interpretations permit some limited involvement of the military in domestic law enforcement. Several different constructions of the act were advanced in a series of decisions growing out of the occupation of Wounded Knee, South Dakota, by American Indian Movement members, for example, that the act is violated only by direct active use of federal troops in domestic law enforcement. Specific statutory exceptions also allow the domestic use of the military to enforce the laws, in cases of civil disorder, threats to federal property, and protection of federal parks, foreign dignitaries, and certain federal officials.

Increased federal efforts to combat drug smuggling have strained the Posse Comitatus Act. The desire to use navy ships and air force planes against smugglers led to enactment in 1982 of a statute that made further inroads on the act. Though limited, the new law is important because it is the first statutory modification of the Posse Comitatus Act for ordinary law enforcement purposes in the more than 100 years since its enactment. This is an area where special care should be taken; by a single stroke, Congress can effect a major change in the traditional law enforcement balance.

In the decades of the 1970s and 1980s there has been increasing federal involvement with state and local law enforcement. The Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, established in 1968 and terminated in the late 1970s, involved a massive FEDERAL GRANT-IN-AID program to state and local governments for law enforcement purposes. The potential of this technique for giving the federal government control over local law enforcement policy decisions has not been fully realized.

Formal arrangements of cooperation between federal and state and local agencies are also increasing. Fourteen federal organized crime strike forces and twelve special drug task forces involving cooperating teams of federal, state, and local law enforcement agents have been established in major cities throughout the country. Policymaking committees composed of federal, state, and local law enforcement officials also meet.

The picture presented is one of increasingly close cooperation and interdependence of law enforcement agencies at the federal, state, and local levels. The existing programs do not yet, however, add up to the establishment of a basis for federal control.

As long as there is a national consensus that the primary responsibility for law enforcement should remain at the local level there is no serious likelihood that Congress would authorize the resources to create a national police force to enforce what is becoming a true national criminal code. Any assessment of trends in the national consensus on an issue of this nature is, of course, difficult to make. One can only point to certain factors which serve as general indicators.

The focus and rhetoric of national discourse on the role of federal criminal law enforcement have changed somewhat in recent years. Crime has increasingly become a source of public concern and a standard topic of national political discussion. Correspondingly, the federal government's public pronouncements have assumed increasingly larger responsibilities for federal law enforcement. The federal emphasis in the 1950s and 1960s focused on organized crime and political corruption. In the 1970s the emphasis shifted to white-collar crime. In the 1980s the federal government has added to its emphasized responsibilities a massive attack on drugs and violence.

In the 1960s, the ATTORNEY GENERAL of the United States never spoke of the federal government's role in law enforcement without at least paying lip service to the principle that primary responsibility rests at the local level. In the 1980s the attorney general in his major addresses generally speaks of working closely with state and local law enforcement officials and the development of a national strategy.

Any serious moves toward substantial enlargement of federal law enforcement responsibilities might be opposed by state and local governments. As matters stand, these authorities typically welcome increasing federal assistance and involvement, because the crime problem is too big for local officials to handle alone. Of course, this condition augurs continued growth of the federal arm. One wonders when that growth will begin to be seen as a threat.

Congress itself continues to recite the local responsibility credo even while it expands the scope of the federal code. Although the Supreme Court has not imposed significant constitutional restraints on the reach of federal penal legislation, it has adopted a restrictive maxim of interpretation: unless Congress expresses itself unambiguously it will be presumed not to have intended to change the traditional state-federal balance in law enforcement. If the prospect of a national police force loomed on the horizon, would the Court resurrect significant constitutional limits?

Perceiving the prospect of a national police force simply in the continued expansion of the federal criminal code would be foolish. That growth, however, creates one of the conditions that would enable a national police force to function. And the very existence of an enlarged code may generate some pressure to enforce it actively. Nothing can happen, of course, unless the national consensus breaks down. There, too, some signals could mean that the "impossible" is at least possible. The development of a national police force is not imminent, but there are enough portents to suggest that we should keep in mind words uttered by Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER in YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952), a case involving assertion of national executive power: "The accretion of dangerous power does not come in a day. It does come, however slowly, from the generative force of unchecked disregard of the restrictions that fence in even the most disinterested assertion of authority."

NORMAN ABRAMS
(1986)

Bibliography

ABRAMS, NORMAN 1970 Report on Jurisdiction. Pages 33–66 in National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws: Working Papers, vol. 1. Washington, D.C.: The Commission.

——— 1986 Federal Criminal Law and Its Enforcement. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

SCHWARTZ, LOUIS B. 1948 Federal Criminal Jurisdiction and Prosecutors' Discretion. Law and Contemporary Problems 13:64–87.

STERN, ROBERT L. 1973 The Commerce Clause Revisited: The Federalization of Intrastate Crime. Arizona Law Review 15: 271–285.

LAW ENFORCEMENT AND FEDERAL–STATE RELATIONS (Update)

In 1995, the Supreme Court handed down an opinion that had the potential to rewrite federal–state relations in criminal enforcement. The ruling in UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ, a decision on the power of Congress to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE, involved a criminal prosecution of a twelfth-grade student for a violation of the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, which made it a federal offense "for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, is a school zone."

In López, the Court held that this statute was "invalid as beyond the power of Congress under the Commerce Clause." For the first time since the 1930s, the Court declared a federal statute unconstitutional on such a ground and thereby raised doubts about the COMMERCE CLAUSE underpinnings of much of the Federal Criminal Code.

Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST reviewed the traditional commerce power bases that have been upheld by the Court and found none of them present in López. Initially the Court's decision seems sound; upon reflection, however, doubts arise. After all, what is the guiding principle in the decision? Simply the absence of express connection to interstate commerce? If so, could Congress cure the constitutional defect by including findings in the statute regarding the impact on commerce of the possession of guns on school grounds; or using another approach, by requiring that the gun, or some of its parts, or the possessor of the gun, have traveled recently in interstate commerce? If so, the decision loses its significance and becomes formalistic in the extreme.

In the wake of the decision, numerous symposia were organized discussing the impact of López. Nor was there a stirring only in academia. Within the next few years, in reliance on the decision, frequent challenges to the constitutionality of other commerce-based federal criminal LEGISLATION were raised in the lower federal courts. A key question addressed in the academic consideration of the implications of the decision was whether this was an opening salvo in an attack by the Court on the practically unlimited scope of the exercise of commerce power authority by the Congress. Or was it simply "an isolated deviation from the strong current of precedents"?

If the lower court decisions are any index, López does not signal a revolution in commerce power DOCTRINE. Although there have been some decisions holding federal statutes unconstitutional, most of the case law has upheld the challenged statutes. Yet, the issue has not returned to the Court, and until that body rules again, the significance of López remains uncertain.

If López is not the harbinger of a revolution, one wonders why the Court chose this particular case to draw a constitutional line in the sand. Examining the case in light of how its facts bear on the federal–state relationship in criminal enforcement may shed some light on this issue. While such an examination may not produce a doctrinal principle underlying the decision, it does steer us toward pragmatic policy concerns relating to the enforcement of federal criminal statutes that may be quite relevant to the constitutional issues in such cases.

Articulated concerns about the federal–state relationship in criminal enforcement have surfaced in a set of Supreme Court cases involving issues of STATUTORY INTERPRETATION. One such early case is Rewis v. United States (1971), which involved the interpretation of the Travel Act that, among other things, makes it a federal crime to travel across a state line in aid of gambling. In Rewis, the Court construed the act as not covering the interstate travel of mere customers of a gambling establishment, stating, "an expansive Travel Act [i.e., one that would include the interstate travel of gambling customers within its coverage] would alter sensitive federal–state relationships, could overextend limited federal police resources, and . . . would transform relatively minor state offenses into federal felonies."

One can examine López through the same prism as Rewis and make strikingly similar observations. As in Rewis, the likely number of persons who would violate the federal statute, countrywide, might be substantial. Extensive enforcement of the López statute would disproportionately use up limited federal police resources, while limited enforcement inevitably would involve prosecutors in selecting a very few cases from a large number of possible prosecutions, making the selection, inevitably, rather arbitrary and capricious. Either way, serious stresses would be put on the sensitive federal–state relationship.

Further, although the nature of the crime and the criminal in López is undoubtedly different from that in Rewis, there nevertheless are similarities. However concerned we are about not having guns present where children are regularly found, the nature of the conduct involved in López is not, in and of itself, directly a form of serious criminality. The perpetrator is likely to be "a local student at a local school," and most of the persons likely to be prosecuted under the statute would not be typical criminals. While the underlying concern about potential violence in López is quite different from Rewis, federal prosecution of school children may be viewed, arguably, as not significantly different from prosecuting gambling customers. In Rewis, the Court had the luxury of being able to construe the statute narrowly to avoid federal–state concerns. Where that option is not available, the same type of concerns may have some impact on the constitutional decision that is rendered.

López probably is not the forerunner of a major upheaval in federal–state relations in criminal enforcement. Such a change may one day come, but it is more likely to come from the actions of legislators and officials in the U.S. Department of Justice and the work of scholars in the field, than from a sea change in commerce clause doctrine handed down by the Supreme Court.

NORMAN ABRAMS
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Federal Criminal Law.)

Bibliography

SYMPOSIUM 1995 Federalization of Crime: The Roles of the Federal and State Governments in the Criminal Justice System. Hastings Law Journal 46:965–1338.

——— 1995 Reflections on United States v. López. Michigan Law Review 94:533–831.

——— 1996 The Federal Role in Criminal Law. The Annals 543:9–166.

LAW OF THE LAND

The phrase "law of the land" has two connotations of constitutional dimension. In general usage it refers to a HIGHER LAW than that of COMMON LAW declaration or legislative enactment. As a result of the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, the Constitution is such a higher law; it is the "supreme law of the land." In the exercise of JUDICIAL REVIEW, the SUPREME COURT claims the office of ultimate interpreter of the Constitution. It has thus become commonplace to think of decisions of the Court as the law of the land.

A second connotation has a specialized meaning that reaches far back into English history and leaves its indelible mark on American constitutional law. In 1215, the barons of England forced King John to sign MAGNA CARTA, pledging his observance of obligations owed to them in return for their fealty to him. Among the provisions was one that declared (in translation from the Latin): "No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned or dispossessed or outlawed or banished, or in any way destroyed, nor will we go upon him, nor send upon him, except by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land." Magna Carta was necessarily a feudal document, but this provision was so worded that it retained meaning long after feudalism gave way to the modern constitutional state.

The term "law of the land" consequently continued in English usage, representing that body of FUNDAMENTAL LAW to which appeal was made against any oppression by the sovereign, whether procedural or substantive. By 1354 there had appeared an alternate formulation, "due process of law." In his Second Institute of the Laws of England (1642), Sir EDWARD COKE asserted that "law of the land" and "due process of law" possessed interchangeable meanings; nevertheless, the older version was not thereby supplanted. The PETITION OF RIGHT (1628) played no favorites with the two terms, demanding "that freemen be imprisoned or detained only by the law of the land, or by due process of law and not by the king's special command, without any charge."

In the politically creative period after Independence, American statesmen preferred "law of the land" to "due process," apparently because of its historic association with Magna Carta. All eight of the early state CONSTITUTIONS incorporating the guarantee in full or partial form employed the term "law of the land"; and the same was true of the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE (1787). The first appearance of "due process of law" in American organic law occurred in the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution (1791). But that switch of usage did not displace "law of the land." Throughout the nineteenth century state constitutions and state courts spoke in one voice or the other, or even both. As of 1903 a listing by THOMAS M. COOLEY of state constitutions incorporating the legacy from Magna Carta showed "law of the land" outrunning "due process of law." The trend subsequently has been to the latter phrase; yet a 1980 count found eleven states still expressing the guarantee as "law of the land."

The Glorious Revolution of 1688, embodying the political theory that parliamentary enactment was the practical equivalent of the "law of the land," presented a dilemma in interpretation when the versions of the guarantee were introduced into American thought and incorporated into most American constitutions. Legislative supremacy was unacceptable in the New World; the American view was that when sovereignty changed hands the English concept of limitations upon the crown now applied to the legislative as well as the executive branch. It followed that to construe the guarantee as forbidding deprivation of life, liberty, or property except by legislative enactment would be to render its protection meaningless. The puzzlement of American judges is understandable; only in the latter part of the nineteenth century had the concept been fully disentangled from the related concepts of regularized legislative process and SEPARATION OF POWERS.

The guarantee inherited from Magna Carta is unusual among constitutional limitations. On its face it is not absolute but conditional. The government may not act against persons except by the law of the land or by due process. The thrust is arguably procedural, suggesting original intent may have been to guarantee the protection of a trial. But it can carry substantive meanings as well; those meanings emerged early and had fully developed in England by the late seventeenth century.

Although the wording and position of the state constitutional guarantees varied—some using "law of the land," others "due process of law"; some appending the guarantee to a list of procedural rights, others making it a separate provision—the variation made little difference in judicial response at the procedural level. Not so, however, with respect to substantive content. Where, as in the constitutions of the Carolinas, Illinois, Maryland, and Tennessee, the wording was close to a literal translation of Magna Carta, the guarantee was extended to VESTED RIGHTS, independently of the criminal provisions of the procedural connotation. On the other hand, Connecticut and Rhode Island courts sustained PROHIBITION laws in the 1850s, holding that the phrase "due process of law" in their state constitutions was so enmeshed with entitlements of the criminally accused as to preclude inclusion of substantive right. A third series of cases, from Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and Pennsylvania, read substantive content into the guarantee despite close interrelation with procedural protections. WYNEHAMER V. NEW YORK (1856) requires special consideration. In that case the state's highest court invalidated a prohibition law, insofar as it destroyed property rights in existing liquor stocks, resting its decision on separate constitutional guarantees of both "due process" and "law of the land." Contrary to the opinion of some scholars, Wynehamer was not overruled by Metropolitan Board v. Barrie (1866); the former case applied to a law with retroactive application, the latter to one that was purely prospective.

The Fifth Amendment associates "due process" with other constitutional guarantees clearly procedural in character, and separates the guarantee of due process from the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION only by a comma. Yet in major decisions, DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), Hepburn v. Griswold (1870), and Adair v. United States (1908), the Supreme Court found substantive content in the clause.

In the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, due process is not linked to criminal procedure protections, but resembles those state constitutional provisions that had been held in state courts to have substantive content. However, the Supreme Court has disregarded the distinction between the two due process clauses in the federal Constitution. The Court has been abetted by numerous COMMENTATORS ON THE CONSTITUTION who, intent on denying the substantive element in due process, have ignored or misinterpreted the history of state constitutional guarantees of "due process" and "law of the land." The freedom from procedural connotation of Fourteenth Amendment due process made easier the path of substantive content from dissent in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873), to reception in Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company v. Minnesota, (1890), to full embrace in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). The Court's acceptance of the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE, with consequent reading into the Fourteenth Amendment of the various procedural protections enumerated in the BILL OF RIGHTS, largely equates the content of the two due process clauses. This development has written the final chapter in the reinterpretation of "law of the land."

FRANK R. STRONG
(1986)

Bibliography

HOWARD, A. E. DICK 1968 The Road from Runnymede: Magna Carta and Constitutionalism in America. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia.

REMBAR, CHARLES 1980 The Law of the Land: The Evolution of Our Legal System. New York: Simon and Schuster.

LEARY v. UNITED STATES
395 U.S. 6 (1969)

Timothy Leary, a celebrated 1960s connoisseur of mind-altering substances, was found in possession of marijuana and convicted of (1) failure to pay the federal marijuana tax; and (2) transportation and concealment of marijuana, knowing it had been illegally imported into the country. A unanimous Supreme Court held both convictions unconstitutional. Paying the tax would have incriminated Leary under state law; his omission to pay was justified by his RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. His other conviction had rested on a statutory presumption that a person in possession of marijuana knew it had been illegally imported. This presumption was irrational; much marijuana was grown in the United States. The presumption thus violated PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

LEAST RESTRICTIVE MEANS TEST

When the Supreme Court, in reviewing the constitutionality of legislation, uses the permissive RATIONAL BASIS standard, it demands only that a law be a rational means for achieving a legitimate governmental purpose. When the STANDARD OF REVIEW is more exacting, however, the Court looks more closely at the legislative choice of means, insisting on more than some minimal showing of rationality. In a SEX DISCRIMINATION case, for example, the legislation must be "substantially related" to achieving some important governmental purpose; when STRICT SCRUTINY is the appropriate standard of review, the law must be "necessary" to achieving a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST. However such a heightened standard of review may be phrased, it aims at providing as much protection for constitutional values and interests as may be consistent with the accomplishment of legislative goals. One commonly used formulation of this aim is the Court's insistence that legislation be the "least restrictive means" for attaining the ends the legislature seeks—that is, least restrictive on such constitutionally protected interests as the FREEDOM OF SPEECH, or equality, or the free flow of INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Some commentators have urged the Supreme Court to use a similar analysis in testing the reasonableness of legislative means even under the "rational basis" standard of review, as in cases involving challenges to ECONOMIC REGULATION. Thus far, however, the Court has employed "least restrictive means" reasoning only when it has consciously used a more demanding standard of review. Thus, in DEAN MILK COMPANY V. MADISON (1951), the Court struck down an ordinance specifying that milk sold in the city as "pasteurized" be pasteurized at an approved plant within five miles of the city center. The Court emphasized that "reasonable nondiscriminatory alternatives" were available to serve the city's health interests. (See STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE.) And in Shelton v. Tucker (1960) the Court invalidated a law requiring every Arkansas teacher to file an annual affidavit listing every organization to which he or she had belonged or made contributions within five years. The Court agreed that Arkansas had a strong interest in teacher fitness, but said the legislature's sweeping intrusion into associational privacy "must be viewed in the light of less drastic means for achieving the same basic purpose." A narrower inquiry, presumably, would serve that purpose.

Both decisions illustrate how the "least restrictive means" formula can help a court avoid casting aspersions on legislative motive. (See Legislation; Legislative Intent.) Madison's ordinance might have been designed to capture the pasteurization business; Arkansas undoubtedly was seeking to expose and dismiss teachers who were members of the NAACP. In neither case did the Supreme Court openly question the legitimacy of the legislative purpose; taking the government's statement of objective at face value, it said, in effect, "There are ways you could have accomplished that without intruding on constitutionally protected ground." One excellent reason for heightening the standard of review—and thus for insisting on "least restrictive means"—is the suspicion that legislators have acted for questionable purposes. (See SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION.)

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

NOTE 1969 Less Drastic Means and the First Amendment. Yale Law Journal 78:464–474.

LEBRON v. NATIONAL RAILROAD PASSENGER CORP.
513 U.S. 374 (1995)

In Lebron v. National Railroad Passenger Corp., the Supreme Court held that the National Railroad Passenger Corporation (Amtrak) must comply with the Constitution. Amtrak is a CORPORATION created by federal law, with a governing board appointed by the President, and it receives substantial federal funding. However, the statute creating Amtrak declares that it "will not be an agency or establishment of the United States government."

Michael Lebron signed a contract to display an advertisement on a huge billboard—about 103 feet long and 10 feet high—at Amtrak's Penn Station in New York City. Lebron's advertisement was a photomontage criticizing the Coors beer company's conservative political activities and especially its involvement in Central America. When Amtrak refused to allow display of the advertisement, Lebron sued, claiming infringement on his FIRST AMENDMENT right of FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

The Supreme Court ruled that Amtrak is the government for STATE ACTION purposes. Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, writing for the majority, declared: "We hold that where, as here, the Government creates a corporation by special law, for the furtherance of governmental objectives, and retains for itself permanent authority to appoint a majority of the directors of that corporation, the corporation is part of the Government for purposes of the First Amendment."

The Court emphasized that Amtrak was created by a federal statute to serve the national interest of providing railroad passenger service.

Lebron is important in that it makes it clear that government-created corporations such as the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, the Communications Satellite Corporation (COMSAT), the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, and the Legal Services Corporation, are part of the government and thus the Constitution applies to their activities.

ERWIN CHEMERINSKY
(2000)

LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION

In June 1857 less than thirty percent of registered voters in Kansas Territory elected a CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION dominated by proslavery delegates. Meeting in Lecompton, the convention drew up a constitution preparatory for statehood that guaranteed the rights of owners of slaves in the territory, excluded free blacks, and submitted to a REFERENDUM the question whether the constitution should be accepted with or without a clause prohibiting the importation of slaves into Kansas (rather than a referendum on the constitution as a whole). Viewing this as a travesty of his principle of territorial SOVEREIGNTY, Illinois Senator STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS broke with the administration of JAMES BUCHANAN, which was pressuring Congress to accept the Lecompton constitution, and led the struggle against it. In three referenda on the constitution, Kansas voted first to accept the constitution with slavery (6,226 to 569, with free-state voters abstaining), then to reject the constitution entirely (10,226 to 166 with proslavery voters abstaining), then finally to reject it entirely again (11,300 to 1,788).

The struggle over the Lecompton constitution left Kansas a territory until 1861, dissipated the influence of the Buchanan administration, drove Douglas into opposition, and destroyed the capacity of the Democratic party to serve as a unifying transsectional force.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

JOHANSES, ROBERT W. 1973 Stephen A. Douglas. New York: Oxford University Press.

LEE, REX EDWIN
(1935–1996)

United States SOLICITOR GENERAL, educator, and one of the nation's foremost Supreme Court advocates, Rex E. Lee was born in Los Angeles on February 27, 1935. He was undergraduate student body president at Brigham Young University and first in his class at the University of Chicago Law School. After law school, he served as a law clerk to Supreme Court Justice BYRON R. WHITE.

As a public servant, Lee held the positions of Assistant U.S. Attorney General in the administration of President GERALD R. FORD and Solicitor General in the administration of President RONALD REAGAN. During his four years as Solicitor General, he Served as the chief appellate advocate for the federal government and argued a number of cases of constitutional significance, with a particular emphasis on RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, SEPARATION OF POWERS, and FEDERALISM. In total, Lee presented oral argument before the U.S. Supreme Court on fifty-nine occasions.

In 1972, at the age of thirty-seven, Lee became the founding dean of the J. Reuben Clark Law School at Brigham Young University. After serving in the federal government and practicing law in the firm of Sidley & Austin, Lee returned to Brigham Young University where he became its tenth president.

A man of faith, Lee served his church, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, in a number of capacities throughout his life. At the young age of nineteen, he worked as a missionary in Mexico. Later in life, he served as a lay leader of congregations in the Washington, D.C. area and in Utah. Probably his most significant church service occurred while he served as law school dean and university president for Brigham Young University, the nation's largest church-owned university.

During his life, Lee wrote a number of books and essays on subjects ranging from law to religion. Two of his books, A Lawyer Looks at the Constitution (1981) and A Lawyer Looks at the Equal Rights Amendment (1980) provide insight into his moderate conservative philosophy of government. Lee also published a number of essays on religion and a book entitled What Do Mormons Believe (1992).

Lee had a family of seven children with his wife, Janet. He often depended on his family for support as he suffered the effects of cancer during the final eight years of his life. On March 11, 1996, Lee died after a ten-month battle with pneumonia. It was reported that from his hospital bed before his death he was preparing to give his sixtieth oral argument before the Supreme Court.

MICHAEL W. MCCONNELL
(2000)

Bibliography

FRIED, CHARLES 1991 Order and Law: Arguing the Reagan Revolution. New York: Simon & Schuster.

LEE, REX E. 1980 A Lawyer Looks at the Equal Rights Amendment. Provo, Utah: Brigham Young University Press.

——— 1981 A Lawyer Looks at the Constitution. Provo, Utah: Brigham Young University Press.

LEE, RICHARD HENRY
(1732–1794)

Educated in England, Richard Henry Lee practiced law in his native Virginia and became a justice of the peace in 1757. The next year he was elected to the House of Burgesses where his first speech was in favor of a measure to check the spread of SLAVERY. Lee was a leader of opposition to parliamentary taxation of the colonies and wrote the protest of the House of Burgesses against the Sugar Act (1764). When the royal governor dissolved the House of Burgesses in 1774, Lee introduced a resolution, adopted by the rump of the house, calling for a continental congress. As a delegate to the FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS Lee proposed formation of committees of correspondence (a plan he originated with PATRICK HENRY and THOMAS JEFFERSON) and adoption of the continental ASSOCIATION. In June 1776 Lee made the original motions in the Continental Congress for a DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, confederation, and seeking of foreign alliances. He later advocated Virginia's cession of western territorial claims in order to facilitate ratification of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION; and, in 1784, he was elected President of the United States in Congress Assembled.

Lee was chosen as a delegate to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 but declined appointment, citing conflict with his responsibilities as a member of Congress. When the new Constitution was submitted to Congress, Lee opposed it on the ground that the convention had exceeded its mandate. Seeing that he could not block the proposal, he attempted, but failed, to have Congress add a BILL OF RIGHTS (drafted by GEORGE MASON).

Lee was a leading opponent of RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. His seventeen "Letters from the Federal Farmer," widely printed in newspapers, were among the most influential of the various ANTI-FEDERALIST writings. In the letters Lee presented a wide-ranging critique of the new Constitution: it was consolidationist, not federal, and would rob the states of their SOVEREIGNTY; it was aristocratic, or even monarchical, in tendency, not republican; the coexistence of state and federal courts would lead inevitably to conflict; the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES was so broadly drawn as to permit foreigners and citizens of other states to sue a state in federal court; and, most important, there was no bill of rights. Lee argued and voted against ratification in the Virginia convention of 1788.

Lee was one of Virginia's original United States senators (1789–1792). He was chairman of the committee that drafted the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 and floor leader in the Senate for the Bill of Rights. Later in his senatorial career he became a supporter of the Federalist party and the economic program of ALEXANDER HAMILTON. A fervent opponent of slavery, Lee himself held about three dozen slaves.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

LEE, UNITED STATES v.
455 U.S. 252 (1982)

Members of the Amish religion object, on religious grounds, to paying taxes or receiving benefits under the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT. An Amish employer of Amish workers claimed a constitutional right to refuse to pay Social Security taxes. The Supreme Court unanimously rejected that claim. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, for the Court, accepted STRICT SCRUTINY as the appropriate STANDARD OF REVIEW in cases involving RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, but concluded that the government had established that mandatory participation was necessary to achieving the "overriding governmental interest" in maintaining the Social Security system. In a concurring opinion, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS argued against the strict scrutiny standard, saying that claimants of special religious exemptions from laws of general applicability must demonstrate "unique" reasons for being exempted—a standard that would be nearly impossible to meet.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

LEE v. WEISMAN
505 U.S. 577 (1992)

The principal of a public junior high school in Providence, Rhode Island, invited a clergyman, a rabbi, to give opening and closing prayers as part of the school's graduation ceremony. Although the rabbi composed the prayers himself, the officials gave him guidelines and advised that the prayers should be "nonsectarian." When a student challenged the constitutionality of this practice, the Supreme Court held, 5–4, that the school violated the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE of the FIRST AMENDMENT by informally pressuring students to participate in a state-sponsored and state-controlled religious exercise.

Before Weisman, it was widely thought that the appointment of several "conservative" Justices might lead the REHNQUIST COURT to overrule WARREN COURT decisions and permit school-sponsored prayers or other religious exercises as long as the school did not directly coerce anyone to participate. Weisman did not decide the broad question of whether noncoercive exercises would ever be an unconstitutional ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. Instead, the opinion (authored by Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, an appointee of President RONALD REAGAN) held that the school placed "subtle" coercive pressure on students to participate in prayer. The graduation ceremony, though formally voluntary, was important enough to students that they should not have to miss it in order to avoid exposure to prayer. And although the audience was only required to stand silently during the prayers, the Court said that a "reasonable dissenter" might feel this forced her to signify her approval of them.

Weisman showed that even those who limit the establishment clause's prohibitions to government "coercion" can disagree on the meaning of that term. Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, dissenting, argued that only coercion "by threat of penalty" should be unconstitutional; the majority's broader notion of "psychological" coercion, he argued, would require forbidding the Pledge of Allegiance in schools as well (since the state cannot compel citizens to endorse political ideas either).

The broad coercion analysis suggested that most official religious exercises by public schools would be forbidden. The majority also looked beyond issues of coercion, stating that with religious ideas, unlike political or social ideas, "government is not a prime participant" in debate and should remain uninvolved. However, Weisman did leave open the possible permissibility of religious acts sponsored by government in settings that arguably are less important or pressure-laden than a high school graduation, such as a courthouse open to all citizens, or even a high school football game.

THOMAS C. BERG
(2000)

Bibliography

CONKLE, DANIEL O. 1993 Lemon Lives. Case Western Reserve Law Review 43:865–882.

GREENE, ABNER S. 1995 The Pledge of Allegiance Problem. Fordham Law Review 64:451–490.

PAULSEN, MICHAEL STOKES 1993 Lemon is Dead. Case Western Reserve Law Review 43:795–863.

LEGAL CULTURE

The expression "legal culture" refers to opinions, attitudes, values, and expectations with regard to law and legal institutions. Every man and woman in society has at least some opinions on this subject—about judges, courts, the Supreme Court, or lawyers—but the expression, as the word "culture" implies, refers not so much to individuals as to generalizations about the opinions and values of members of some distinct group, class, category, or jurisdiction. One can speak about the legal culture of men as opposed to women, blacks as opposed to whites, or of salespeople, teachers, drug addicts, or people who live on farms. It may also be possible to make statistical generalizations about particular countries, so that it may make sense to talk about American legal culture as opposed to Portuguese or Korean legal culture.

One can distinguish between an "external" and an "internal" legal culture. The internal legal culture is the legal culture of those members of society "inside" the legal system, so to speak—that is, those who perform specialized legal tasks, for example, lawyers and judges. The legal culture of everybody else is external legal culture.

Concepts of legal culture are, or ought to be, significant for the understanding of constitutional history and in explaining how constitutional doctrine gets made. Political and social movements always provide the motor force for constitution making and for constitutional change; the decisions of high courts, which create the fabric of constitutional law, are always the product of concrete lawsuits, in which real parties with real social and economic interests are contending. In both cases, purposes, goals, and ideals of litigators and other actors (and of lawyers and judges) are the immediate cause of both stasis or change. Hence, legal culture, it can be argued, is what creates constitutional law and gives meaning and life to the constitutional system.

It is obvious that the texture of constitutional law has changed radically in the course of American history; yet the text of the Constitution itself has been extremely durable, not to say sluggish. The leading cases of modern constitutional law are or pretend to be "interpretations" or glosses on the post-CIVIL WAR amendments, which have not been altered in over a century; the BILL OF RIGHTS; or the text of the original Constitution, which is now some two centuries old. A scholar of 1870 or 1880 who woke from a century's sleep would simply not recognize today's body of constitutional doctrine; current EQUAL PROTECTION doctrine, for example, would be totally beyond his or her comprehension. Yet much of the standard work on both CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY and constitutional history has a strongly normative flavor, and it fails to come to grips with the powerful forces that have turned old doctrines topsy-turvy and pulled new doctrines into existence like rabbits from a magician's hat.

The radical changes in constitutional doctrine imply radical changes in internal legal culture; but these in turn are reflexes of radical changes in external legal culture, the culture of the educated community, of business and political leaders, and indeed, of the public at large. The Constitution, in fact, is always interpreted (and necessarily so) in the light of ruling ideas of the times. The Justices may make use of general social norms either consciously or unconsciously; because of the standardized and formalistic style in which Supreme Court decisions are written, it is not easy to know the level of awareness of the Justices or the way in which they conceive of their judicial role.

In the broadest sense, studies of constitutional doctrine and constitutional history that are sensitive to social context are studies of legal culture, although they do not necessarily use this term. Other studies deal with American culture and the Constitution more explicitly: Michael Kammen, for example, has written a history of the meaning and imagery of the Constitution in American culture—an exploration, among other things, of the symbolic importance of the Constitution in American politics and the cult of the Constitution as a "sacred" document.

Constitutional doctrine itself is a reflection of legal culture, but it would be naive to assume that the general public or any particular segment of it share the same views as the justices who enunciate legal doctrine. There has been some research on public attitudes toward CIVIL LIBERTIES and the Bill of Rights; such studies are necessarily studies of the congruence (or lack of congruence) of external and internal legal culture. The most important recent study (by Herbert McClosky and Alida Brill, in 1983) found that the general public tends to agree strongly with the general ideas behind the Bill of Rights, but on many specific issues, public opinion differs from the current state of doctrine—and from the views of legal and political elites. These differences tilt in a particular direction. The general public is less "liberal" than the Court and less "liberal" than legal and political elites on such issues as whether PORNOGRAPHY can be banned, whether atheists should be allowed to teach or hold public office, or how far to carry the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

So-called impact studies are also relevant to the study of legal culture. These are studies of the ways in which decisions of the Supreme Court, or other courts, are received, used, followed, evaded, or flouted by the public, or some particular part of the public. Legal culture is not only the source of doctrine; it monitors the reaction to doctrine and to specific decisions of the courts. There is a sizeable literature, for example, on reactions to the Supreme Court's decisions barring prayers from public schools. In the broadest sense, much of the vast literature on the controversy over ABORTION or on school DESEGREGATION is impact literature and, hence, relevant to the role of legal culture in the constitutional system. But there has not been much success as yet in framing general theories about impact or about the role of legal culture in producing compliant or noncompliant behavior.

The neglect of legal culture by constitutional scholars has undoubtedly impoverished the understanding of constitutional law. Normative arguments are tossed back and forth on many crucial issues: for example, what ways of "interpreting" the Constitution are legitimate and what ways are illegitimate. "Originalists" claim that the duty of judges is to seek out the ORIGINAL INTENT of the Framers; judges have no legitimate right to read their own values into the Constitution. Such arguments, rhetorically speaking, put the issue very starkly as a kind of either-or position. Apparently, the only alternative to STRICT CONSTRUCTION is a situation in which judges act arbitrarily, according to whim, and simply spin constitutional doctrines out of their heads. In a system of CHECKS AND BALANCES, where are the checks and balances on the power of the Supreme Court Justices to create law out of thin air?

One answer (there are many others) is that the Justices are constrained by internal and external legal cultures. The internal legal culture is inescapably inside the heads of the Justices. The Justices are lawyers, trained in a particular tradition. The internal legal culture has its own powerful symbols, its own language and etiquette; and the Justices operate in this context. Of course, each Justice is an individual man or woman; each has his or her own take on the internal legal culture. But this culture sets boundaries and limits within which the Court, of necessity, does its work.

The external legal culture is an even more powerful curb, in fact, if not in theory. The concept of legal culture assumes that judges never "invent" doctrine; that in any given period, the general legal culture sets limits, defines boundaries, and establishes a range of opinions no less than does the internal legal culture (the legal tradition). It is out of the question for a Supreme Court Justice today, no matter how "conservative," to be as retrograde on racial issues as the most "liberal" judge of the 1880s. The whole spectrum of opinion has shifted in the direction of racial equality, and the corresponding interpretation of the meaning of equal protection has shifted accordingly. The social context is the source of the norms that mold general opinion on matters of race. The norms change over time as context changes. The Justices today live in a world of computers, gene-splicing, and communication satellites, and their views are profoundly affected by the world all about them. They also live in a society dedicated more deeply to individual rights and to race and gender equality than the world of their predecessors. The study of legal culture is a study of this world, and those who stress this factor believe it is one of the best ways to understand where the Court has been, where it is, and where it is going.

LAWRENCE M. FRIEDMAN
(1992)

Bibliography

FRIEDMAN, LAWRENCE M. 1975 The Legal System: A Social Science Perspective. New York: Russell Sage Foundation.

——— 1990 The Republic of Choice: Law, Authority, and Culture. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

KAMMEN, MICHAEL 1986 A Machine that Would Go of Itself: The Constitution in American Culture. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

MCCLOSKY, HERBERT and BRILL, ALIDA 1983 Dimensions of Tolerance: What Americans Believe About Civil Liberties. New York: Russell Sage Foundation.

MUIR, WILLIAM K., JR. 1967 Prayer in the Public Schools: Law and Attitude Change. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

UROFSKY, MELVIN I. 1988 A March of Liberty: A Constitutional History of the United States. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

LEGAL POSITIVISM

See: Philosophy and the Constitution

LEGAL PROCESS

The legal process school of legal theory was a movement among legal scholars beginning in the 1950s and continuing through the end of the 1960s, a movement that represented an effort to craft a comprehensive theory of legal decisionmaking, especially in the public law area, to combat LEGAL REALISM and the doctrinal shifts reflected in the jurisprudence of the WARREN COURT. The foundation of this work was laid in a series of influential books and articles, most notably HENRY M. HART, JR., and Albert Sacks's magnum opus The Legal Process: Basic Problems in the Making and Application of Law (1958).

Although the sources of the legal process school are complex, the basic principles grew out of public law scholars' critiques of modern legal thought in both its theoretical and doctrinal aspects. Out of the post-war period came a skepticism about legal positivism, that is, the view that law represents nothing more nor less than the executable commands of the sovereign, and a skepticism about NATURAL LAW theory. Scholars working within the legal process tradition were determined to substitute both for positivism and natural law theory a theory of legal decisionmaking which would help students, scholars, and judges focus not on the outcomes of legal decisions but on the processes of legal institutions, especially courts. Moreover, in the period of the late 1950s and 1960s, these same scholars grew ever more concerned with the direction of the Warren Court's decisions. Critics of the era described the Warren Court as substituting a "jurisprudence of values" for the previously more restrained and moderate patterns of decisions in the NEW DEAL era. The problem, as these critics viewed it, was that the Court was writing particular ideological values and preferences into DOCTRINE, thus leaving the Court vulnerable to the essential legal realist charge that judicial decisionmaking was unprincipled, subjective, and chaotic.

In response both to the post-war angst about positivistic and natural law jurisprudence and to the perceived subjectivity of Warren Court jurisprudence, there emerged a cadre of legal academics who set out to rescue judicial decisionmaking from these threats. The result was the legal process movement of this era. While the legal process school describes a large and diverse collection of academic agendas, the school can be described as a project following four basic tenets: (1) a focus on neutral principles as guides to judicial decisionmaking, (2) a focus on reasoned elaboration as a method of adjudication, (3) a focus on comparative institutional competence in considering which institutions and processes ought to be employed in legal decisionmaking, and (4) a focus on restrained innovation in the implementation and development of law and legal reasoning.

The focus on neutral principles grew out of the legal realists' critique of judicial decisionmaking. In its strong form, legal realists decried the courts' tendencies toward inconsistent, unprincipled decisionmaking. Legal reasoning was, critics argued, at least unpredictable and at most nihilistic and driven by judges' personal ideologies. Scholars working in the legal process tradition, most notably Herbert Wechsler in his influential article "Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law," reacted decisively to legal realists' somewhat fatalistic view by offering the insight that there are durable legal principles worth following. These principles are drawn from various sources including legal texts, earlier decisions applied through STARE DECISIS, and general legal principles. Moreover, the task of the judge in adjudication is to recover these principles and to apply them in a neutral, principled way.

Neil Duxbury argues that this strain in legal process theory echoes classical legal thought in its rigid adherence to principled decisionmaking; therefore, he suggests, there is a fundamental connection between Langdellian formalism and process theory. Upon closer reflection, however, the differences outweigh the similarities. Whereas Langdellian classical legal thought emphasized logically coherent decisionmaking and syllogistic reasoning, the emphasis in legal process theory is on reason and neutral principles and not on the uncritical application of logical reasoning to legal disputes. Process theorists were dissatisfied with Langdell and his disciples on the one hand and with Karl Llewelyn and his fellow legal realists on the other.

Related to this emphasis on neutral principles is a focus on reasoned elaboration in adjudication. Process theorists maintained a scrupulous faith in reason. They favored a system of law in which legal institutions would make and apply law in a deeply analytical, transparent, and purposive way. Here the key intellectual figure was Lon Fuller.

In analyzing the "forms and limits of adjudication" and in tracing through the judicial reasoning process with the use of his famous hypothetical, the "Case of the Spelunchean Explorers," Fuller brought to life his conclusion that courts were well situated to resolve cases and further the sound development of law through fidelity to reason. This system of reasoned elaboration was juxtaposed against what process theorists regarded as the excesses of the jurisprudence of the era, especially the "incoherent" decisions of the Warren Court. For the most part, these theorists demurred on questions concerning the desirability of the results reached in cases such as BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), BAKER V. CARR (1962), and MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), decisions that obviously touched ideological nerves in the body politic. Rather, process theorists criticized these and other decisions for failing to accord with either neutral, principled decisionmaking or the recommended process of reasoned elaboration.

A third tenet of process theory is a focus on comparative institutional competence. In their legal process materials, Hart and Sacks offered through various extended examples and commentary an approach to legal reasoning and decisionmaking in the context of adjudication, LEGISLATION, and administration. Hart and Sacks began with the premise that law is made and applied in many different institutional contexts; they developed an analysis not only for the use of courts, legislatures, and ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES in carrying out their functions, but also for decisionmakers in assessing and evaluating the strengths and weaknesses of different institutions. A key assumption in this normative enterprise is that the legislature—the key lawmaker in a democratic polity—is made up of "reasonable persons pursuing reasonable aims reasonably." From this assumption, process theorists derived a structure of circumspect institutional power in matters concerning, for example, STATUTORY INTERPRETATION and the development of the law through COMMON LAW reasoning. They insisted on attention to the question of which institution is best suited to decide a particular dispute. Beyond offering rich comparative institutional analysis, perhaps the main contribution of Hart and Sacks's legal process enterprise is the intellectual spotlight it shines on the multiple sources and functions of law in modern society. In this respect, it provides a bridge to the law and society movement that emerged somewhat later as a significant enterprise emphasizing, among other things, the role of law in action and the complementary and competing institutions of legal decisionmaking in the modern era.

A fourth and final tenet of legal process theory is restrained innovation in the making and application of law. Process scholars emphasized the limits of adjudication and also the limited capacities of all legal institutions to move forward with legal change. In his influential Holmes lectures, The Bill of Rights (1958), Judge LEARNED HAND built upon the foundations of process theory in counseling caution on the part of judges in deciding constitutional cases. Hand's message was that courts ought to be extremely circumspect in the face of social and political change. Restrained innovation is counseled not merely by a particularly narrow conception of the judge's proper role but also by the anticipation of adverse effects of unnecessarily ambitious judicial creativity. In offering faith in reason and attentiveness to process values, scholars working in the legal process tradition hoped to elide some of the more serious consequences that, in their view, plagued more dynamic, expansive approaches to legal interpretation.

The legal process movement came under substantial criticism in the 1970s and 1980s. Scholars noted that there was an inadequate positive or empirical basis for process theory. In particular, the assumption of reasonable persons pursuing reasonable aims reasonably was regarded as quaint and unrealistic. Moreover, process theorists were criticized as having a too-crabbed picture of law as an instrument of social engineering. Finally, prominent critics of process theory, such as Ronald Dworkin on the right and the CRITICAL LEGAL STUDIES movement on the left, maintained that process theory ultimately masks substantive outcomes. The test for the utility of the theory, therefore, was whether it produced favorable substantive ends.

Perhaps the principal impact of the legal process movement was on the judges and Justices who came to the bench having been influenced by their legal process–inspired teachers in the 1960s and 1970s. The emphasis on restrained innovation and on reasoned elaboration is especially notable in the Supreme Court's contemporary constitutional and statutory interpretation jurisprudence. At the same time, these proceduralist patterns of restraint are in tension with strains of both liberal and conservative activism in modern judicial decisionmaking.

DANIEL B. RODRIGUEZ
(2000)

Bibliography

DUXBURY, NEIL 1995 Patterns of American Jurisprudence. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press.

FULLER, LON L. 1949 The Case of the Spelunchean Explorers. Harvard Law Review 62:616–645.

——— 1978 The Forms and Limits of Adjudication. Harvard Law Review 92:353–409.

HAND, LEARNED 1958 The Bill of Rights. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

HART, HENRY M., JR. and SACKS, ALBERT M. 1994 The Legal Process: Basic Problems in the Making and Application of Law, William Eskridge, Jr. and Philip Frickey, eds. St. Paul, Minn.: Foundation Press.

PELLER, GARY 1988 Neutral Principles in the 1950's. University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 21:561–622.

VETTER, JAN 1983 Postwar Legal Scholarship on Judicial Decision Making. Journal of Legal Education 33:412–423.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1959 Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 73:1–35.

WHITE, G. EDWARD 1973 The Evolution of Reasoned Elaboration: Jurisprudential Criticism and Social Change. Virginia Law Review 59:279–302.

LEGAL REALISM

Legal realism was the most significant movement that emerged within American jurisprudence during the 1920s and 1930s. Numerous factors conditioned this development, including pragmatism, SOCIOLOGICAL JURISPRUDENCE, and certain ideas of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. The legal realists were not, however, an organized or highly unified group of thinkers. Their concepts had diverse sources, their work branched out in many directions, and their responses to particular issues often varied. The substantial differences between Judge JEROME N. FRANK and Karl N. Llewellyn illustrate these tendencies. Even so, these men and the other realists shared a number of distinctive attitudes and ideas.

The term "legal realism" signifies the basic thrust of the movement, which was to uncover and to explain legal realities. This effort reflects the allegation that some of the most cherished beliefs of lawyers are myths or fictions. The major purpose of the realists' provocative criticisms of these beliefs was not, however, to undermine the American legal system. Rather, it was to facilitate development of an accurate understanding of the nature, interpretation, operation, and effects of law. The realists insisted that achievement of this goal was essential for intelligent reform of legal rules, doctrines, and practices.

This outlook contributed to the realists' intense dissatisfaction with prevailing modes of legal education and scholarship. Both were under the spell of the case method pioneered by Christopher Columbus Langdell, the influential dean of the Harvard Law School from 1870 to 1895. He conceived of legal science as a small number of fundamental principles derived from study of relatively few cases. This conception was anathema to the realists, most of whom taught at leading American law schools. Their objective was to reform and to supplement, however, rather than to discard, the case method. The changes they advocated included focus on the behavior of judges and other officials, on their actual decisions rather than broad precepts. This emphasis was essential for the understanding of "real" instead of mere "paper" rules. The realists also urged the broadening of legal education to embrace not only the law on the books but also its administration and social impact. The development of this approach required a much closer integration of law and the social sciences than was traditional.

Some of these ideas were an outgrowth of major themes of ROSCOE POUND's sociological jurisprudence. Still, the realists tended to develop criticisms of legal orthodoxies more radical than Pound's. This tendency is apparent from both the fact-skepticism of Judge Frank and the rule-skepticism of virtually all of the realists. The first of these doctrines stresses the difficulty of predicting findings of fact by judges or jurors, while the second emphasizes the limitations of legal rules. Rule-skepticism takes various forms, one of which is the conception of law as the past or future decisions of judges or other officials. Legal rules are descriptive or predictive rather than prescriptive generalizations about their behavior. This idea stems from Justice Holmes's predictive conception of law, which is one reason for the large shadow he cast over the realist movement.

Rule-skepticism also signifies distrust of the assumption that traditional legal rules or principles are the most influential determinant of judicial decisions. Numerous considerations explain this distrust, the degree of which varied among the realists. The most important factors were: a conviction of the possibility of widely different interpretations of established legal rules and principles; a belief in the existence of competing precedents, each of which could justify conflicting decisions in most cases; an awareness of the ambiguity inherent in legal language; a perception of the rapidity of socioeconomic change; and a study of the teachings of modern psychology. This last factor also influenced the realists' critique of judicial opinions. They attacked the syllogistic reasoning of judges on the ground that it failed to explain their choice of premises, which was all-important. This failure meant that opinions were often misleading rationalizations of decisions, the real reasons for which were unstated.

Rule-skepticism is the basis of some of the most important ideas of the legal realists. Their rejection of the conventional belief that judges do or should interpret rather than make law is a significant example. That belief is untenable because judicial legislation is unavoidable. Judges frequently must choose between competing decisions or interpretations, each of which is consistent with at least some precedents, rules, or principles. Although these generalizations limit judicial freedom, judges retain a substantial amount of room to maneuver.

This analysis underlies the realists' pragmatic approach to the evaluation of law, which emphasizes its practical results or effects. Rule-skepticism also influenced their de-emphasis of legal doctrine for the purpose of explaining and predicting judicial decisions. Instead, the realists stressed the importance of such factors as the personality, attitudes, or policies of judges. A similar emphasis characterized the behavioral jurisprudence developed largely by political scientists after WORLD WAR II.

Although most of the realists did not specialize in constitutional law, their ideas facilitate understanding of the decisions of the Supreme Court. The Justices frequently must choose between conflicting interpretations of the Constitution, each of which has some legal basis. Their choices depend most basically upon their values, which may vary among Justices and may change over time. These variations help to explain disagreements among the Justices as well as changes in constitutional doctrine. Realism was also a formative influence on the legal philosophy of Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS.

Despite the influence of the realists on American legal thought, the reaction to their ideas has not been uniform. In fact, large numbers of lawyers expressed varying degrees of dissatisfaction with the realist movement from its inception. If some of the concepts of the realists are unsatisfactory, others are enduring contributions to the study of law and the judicial process. Legal realism therefore warrants close scrutiny by students of constitutional law and judicial behavior.

WILFRID E. RUMBLE
(1986)

Bibliography

FRANK, JEROME 1949 Law and the Modern Mind. New York: Coward-McCann.

LLEWELLYN, KARL N. 1962 Jurisprudence: Realism in Theory and Practice. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

RUMBLE, WILFRID E. 1968 American Legal Realism: Skepticism, Reform, and the Judicial Process. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

TWINING, WILLIAM 1973 Karl Llewellyn and the Realist Movement. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

LEGAL TENDER CASES

The Legal Tender Cases include the decisions in Hepburn v. Griswold (1870), invalidating CIVIL WAR legislation authorizing paper money, and Knox v. Lee (1871) and Parker v. Davis (1871), sustaining postwar legal tender legislation. The various decisions reflect important developments in the nation's economic history, as well as in the Supreme Court's history, concerning the judicial role in questions of political economy, the nature and scope of judicial power, and the relation of politics to judicial opinions.

The greenback legislation of 1862 was designed to facilitate the financing of the Civil War, authorizing payments in demand notes, redeemable not in gold or silver but in interest-bearing twenty-year bonds. The notes were made "lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States." The Treasury issued over $400 million in paper money during the war. After 1865, as inflation grew and greenbacks depreciated, creditors demanded payment in specie or at least in paper money equivalent to the rising premium on specie.

Secretary of the Treasury SALMON P. CHASE presided over the government's wartime greenback program. His outward support for paper money only masked his deep-seated hostility. In March 1864, he composed an epigram reflecting his true feelings: "When public exigencies require, Coin must become paper. When public exigencies allow, Paper must become coin." Six years later, as Chief Justice, he invalidated his previous policy.

Chase's role in the first legal tender case provoked intense partisan wrangling, both on and off the bench, and raised questions of the Chief Justice's behavior as the Court's administrative leader. The legal tender controversy had become entangled in partisan politics, as Republicans defended their greenback policy and the opposition Democrats attacked it as unconstitutional and improper. The Justices lined up on the same political grounds. (Chase and the Republicans by then were mutually alienated and the Chief Justice already was courting the Democrats in hopes of winning their presidential nomination.) In numerous state cases, judges similarly voted along party lines.

Chase apparently was determined to project the Court into the political maelstrom of monetary policy. But he did so with a precarious majority. Following the arguments in Hepburn v. Griswold in 1869, Republican Justices DAVID DAVIS, SAMUEL F. MILLER, and NOAH SWAYNE unhesitatingly endorsed the greenback policy. Chase, joined by Democrats NATHAN CLIFFORD, STEPHEN J. FIELD, ROBERT C. GRIER, and SAMUEL NELSON voted to invalidate the 1862 law. Grier by then was so senile that his colleagues persuaded him to resign. Chase, however, included his vote in the majority.

Meanwhile, Congress had authorized increasing the number of Justices to nine, giving President ULYSSES S. GRANT two new appointments, including Grier's replacement. On February 7, 1870, he nominated WILLIAM STRONG, who as a member of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court had supported the legal tender legislation, and JOSEPH P. BRADLEY, a railroad lawyer whose clients clearly favored the paper money scheme. On that same day, Chase defiantly announced the decision holding the law unconstitutional. The resulting charge of "court packing" against Grant and the Republicans misses the point: Presidents always seek judges who will support their political goals. In this case, Chase and his allies must bear the responsibility for the Court's embarrassment when it reversed itself a year later.

Chase's opinion invoked some of JOHN MARSHALL's best aphorisms. The Court, he insisted, must declare what the law is and not enforce any law inconsistent with the Constitution. To a point, Chase followed Marshall's MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) discussions of IMPLIED POWERS, the NECESSARY AND PROPER clause, and the validity of laws consistent with the "letter and spirit of the Constitution." But where Marshall had appealed to the "spirit" of the Constitution to justify a BROAD CONSTRUCTION of congressional powers, Chase turned the notion on its head, construed those powers narrowly, and used the spirit to discover a limitation nowhere mentioned in the Constitution.

The Constitution, Chase maintained, was designed to establish justice, and a fundamental principle of justice was that preexisting private contracts should not be impaired by governmental action. The CONTRACT CLAUSE of the Constitution, however, applied to STATE ACTION; it said nothing regarding the federal government. But, Chase argued that the Constitution's Framers "intended that the spirit" of the contract clause would apply against all legislative bodies. His reliance on the Fifth Amendment was similarly strained. He found that the prohibition of contracts requiring specie payment in effect deprived people of their property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW; indeed, he maintained that the property was "taken" for a PUBLIC USE without the required JUST COMPENSATION.

Justice Miller's dissent pleaded for judicial restraint. He rebuked Chase's "abstract and intangible" arguments about the "spirit" of the Constitution. Following Marshall's broad reading of the necessary and proper clause, Miller suggested that "the degree of that necessity is for the legislature and not for the court to determine."

Partisan reactions to the decision were predictable. But the focused concerns for the result obscured the majority's far-reaching notions of judicial authority. Chase's bold assertions of judicial superintendence provoked virtually no negative reaction. The political and public acceptance of that doctrine gave a new legitimacy to judicial power. The nation had come a great distance from the protests against judicial excesses following DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857); indeed, Chase's opinion signaled a new chapter in judicial activism.

Significantly, the newly appointed Justice Strong, and not Miller, spoke for the majority in Knox v. Lee (1871) when the Court reversed itself. Strong largely followed Miller's interpretation of Congress's power and the necessity of congressional control over currency policy. But he responded only indirectly to Chase's presumptions of judicial power, contending that judges must assume the constitutionality of congressional acts and rely on congressional determination of what was "necessary and proper." He failed to rebuke Chase's reliance on the "spirit" of the Constitution. Finally, anticipating criticism for the dramatic reversal, Strong chided Chase for having forced the earlier decision when the Court was so divided and on the verge of receiving new appointees. The Chief Justice, joined by Nelson, Clifford, and Field dissented, with the latter two offering additional, separate opinions. The dissenting remarks largely reiterated the majority views of Hepburn v. Griswold.

Thirteen years later, in Juilliard v. Greenman, the Court, with only Field dissenting, sustained the peacetime use of greenbacks. Justice HORACE GRAY not only used the occasion to reaffirm the constitutionality of greenbacks but flatly declared that the policy involved "a POLITICAL QUESTION, to be determined by Congress when the question of exigency arises, and not a judicial question, to be afterwards passed upon by the Court." A half century later, Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES invoked Juilliard as the Court, in the GOLD CLAUSE CASES (1935), narrowly acquiesced in President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's decision to abandon the gold standard. What had begun as one of the most politically conscious and aggrandizing decisions by the Supreme Court ended in self-abnegation and deference to the political branches of the government.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

DAM, KENNETH W. 1982 The Legal Tender Cases. The Supreme Court Review 1982:367–412.

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1971 Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–1888, Vol. XVI of the Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Macmillan.

KUTLER, STANLEY I. 1968 Judicial Power and Reconstruction Politics. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

LEGISLATION

In addition to the separation of powers, there are at least two intersections of the Constitution and the legislative process. One concerns the obligation and capacity of legislatures to assess the constitutionality of their proposed enactments. The other concerns the federal judiciary's role in inducing legislatures to meet their constitutional obligations. Within this context there are issues common to state and congressional lawmaking.

The American constitutional scheme obligates legislatures to assess the constitutionality of proposed enactments and to enact only legislation they deem constitutionally permissible. Although this proposition may seem obvious, it has often been contradicted by respectable lawmakers, who assert that legislatures should engage in policymaking without regard to the Constitution and leave constitutional questions exclusively to the courts. Therefore the reasons that legislatures are obligated, no less than courts, to determine the constitutionality of proposed enactments deserve explanation.

If, as Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL asserted in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), the Constitution is a law paramount to ordinary legislation, then to assert that legislatures need not consult the Constitution is the equivalent of asserting that individuals need not consult the law before acting. To be sure, people sometimes act in disregard of the law, subject only to the risk of sanctions if they are caught and a court holds their actions to be unlawful. But it would be perverse to conclude from this observation that we are not obligated to obey the law.

The structure and text of the Constitution certainly imply that legislatures must initially determine the legality of their enactments. For example, how would Congress know whether it had the authority to enact a bill without consulting Article I and the other provisions that delegate limited powers to the national government? Indeed, some provisions of the Constitution are explicitly addressed to legislators. Article I, section 9, provides, "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed." The FIRST AMENDMENT says, "Congress shall make no law," and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT's prohibitions begin with the words, "No state shall make or enforce any law. . . ." Article VI binds legislators and officials "by Oath or Affirmation to support this Constitution. . . ." Although this command does not entail that all constitutional questions are open to all institutions at all times, it does imply that a legislator must vote only for legislation that he or she believes is authorized by the Constitution. If history matters, the obligation of legislatures to interpret the Constitution was affirmed and acted on by various of the Framers and by early legislators and Presidents—some of whom, indeed, expressed this duty or prerogative even in the face of contrary judicial interpretations.

The existence of JUDICIAL REVIEW is sometimes thought to relieve legislatures of the obligations to determine the constitutionality of their enactments. But Chief Justice Marshall's classic justifications for judicial review in Marbury do not necessarily imply a privileged judicial function. As Herbert Wechsler wrote: "Federal courts, including the Supreme Court, do not pass on constitutional questions because there is a special function vested in them to enforce the Constitution or police the other agencies of government. They do so rather for the reason that they must decide a litigated issue that is otherwise within their jurisdiction and in doing so they must give effect to the supreme law of the land. That is, at least, what Marbury v. Madison was all about." (Wechsler, 1965, p. 1006.) Other arguments for judicial review have accorded the judiciary a special role, and in COOPER V. AARON (1958) the modern Court claimed that it was "supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution." But the Court has never implied that JUDICIAL SUPREMACY implies judicial exclusively, or that its privileged position relieves other institutions of the responsibility for making constitutional judgments.

Indeed, some constitutional issues—so-called POLITICAL QUESTIONS—may be committed to the legislative and executive branches to the exclusion of the judiciary. For example, it is widely assumed that the Senate's judgment in an IMPEACHMENT proceeding is not reviewable by the courts even though the decision may involve controverted constitutional questions, and even though the Senate's role in cases of impeachment is more judicial than legislative. In such cases, at least, if the legislature does not consider the constitutional questions, no one will.

If legislatures are obligated to consider constitutional questions, what deference, if any, should they accord prior judicial interpretations of the Constitution? In what might be called the judicial supremacy view, a legislature is in essentially the same position as a state or lower federal court: it must treat the Supreme Court's rulings as authoritative and binding. This was the view expressed by the Court in Cooper v. Aaron. Quoting Marshall's assertion in Marbury that "[i]t is emphatically the province and the duty of the judicial department to say what the law is," the Justices continued: "This decision declared the basic principle that the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution, and that principle has ever since been respected by this Court and the Country as a permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system."

The polar view is that legislators and other officials may, or must, apply the Constitution according to their best lights. This position was asserted by Thomas Jefferson, ANDREW JACKSON, and ABRAHAM LINCOLN, among others. In vetoing the bill to recharter the Bank of the United States in 1832, Jackson wrote:

> It is maintained by advocates of the bank that its constitutionality in all its features ought to be considered settled by the decision of the Supreme Court [in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819)]. To this conclusion I can not assent. . . . The Congress, the Executive, and the Court must each for itself be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution. Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution swears that he will support it as he understands it, and not as it is understood by others. It is as much the duty of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and of the President to decide upon the constitutionality of any bill or resolution which may be presented to them for passage or approval as it is of the supreme judges when it may be brought before them for judicial decision. The opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress > than the opinion of Congress has over the judges, and on that point the President is independent of both. The authority of the Supreme Court must not, therefore, be permitted to control the Congress or the Executive when acting in their legislative capacities, but to have only such influence as the force of their reasoning may deserve.

The issues presented by these opposed positions are of more than theoretical or historical interest. They have surfaced in recent years in debates over Congress's authority under section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to interpret or apply the amendment differently from the Court, and over Congress's power to limit the JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS over particular issues. For present purposes, I will assume that Congress, as well as state legislatures, must operate within the constitutional doctrines exposited by the United States Supreme Court. What does this obligation entail?

The dimensions of legislative responsibility and some of the difficulties in meeting it are illustrated by considering a bill introduced in the 89th Congress to punish the destruction of draft cards. The bill was enacted in 1965, seemingly in response to public DRAFT CARD BURNING to protest the VIETNAM WAR. It was challenged on First Amendment grounds and upheld by the Court in UNITED STATES V. O'BRIEN (1968).

The governing constitutional standard (as the Court later recapitulated it in O'Brien) was that "a governmental regulation is sufficiently justified . . . if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is not greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest."

Because this area of judicial doctrine was already well developed in 1965, legislators considering the draft card destruction law did not have to engage in much independent constitutional interpretation. They were, however, required to apply existing doctrine to the situation that faced them.

First, a legislator had to determine that his or her reasons for supporting the bill were "unrelated to the suppression of free expression." This obligation meant that he could not vote for the bill if his dominant, or causative, reason for favoring it was to suppress antiwar protests (rather than, say, to facilitate the administration of the selective service). The obligation demanded only introspection, a modicum of self-awareness, and the courage or will to follow the law.

It is worth pausing for a moment to ask why the Constitution should be concerned with a legislator's motivation in voting for a measure rather than simply with the legislation itself. The answer begins with the observation that the First Amendment is designed to protect citizens' freedom to protest against government policies. The Amendment does not, however, forbid all laws that inhibit protests to any extent. For example, the Congress surely may prohibit burning anything, including draft cards, if the activity poses a fire hazard to property that Congress has the power to protect. Thus, legislators have discretion to compromise constitutional values in the pursuit of other legitimate ends of government. However, as the Court's reference to "important or substantial" interests suggests, the First Amendment demands that a legislator treat a law's inhibition of expression as a cost, indeed a cost that should not be lightly imposed. But a legislator who votes for the bill in order to suppress protest, treats the inhibition as a benefit, not a cost. He has confused the credits and debits column on the constitutional balance sheet, for he seeks to bring about the very result that the First Amendment seeks to avert.

The second factual determination—actually a mixture of law, fact, and judgment—stems from the requirement that the law further an "important or substantial governmental interest." In O'Brien the Court was required to speculate about the nature and importance of the interests furthered by the draft card law. As happens frequently in matters concerning the national defense, the Court gave Congress the benefit of the doubt. But, of course, the legislators know what ends they intend a law to serve. Judgments about the importance of those ends, and how well a proposed law will actually accomplish them, are among the core responsibilities of legislators—who do not owe themselves any benefit of the doubt. It would be ironic, to say the least, if the Court deferred to Congress's judgments in these matters when Congress had not actually considered the issues carefully and in good faith.

The preceding paragraphs have not distinguished between the responsibilities of "legislators" and the "legislature." How, in fact, is responsibility for constitutional decision making allocated within the lawmaking process?

The answer seems easiest with respect to motivation. Granting that not even psychoanalysis can always reveal our deepest motivations, a conscientious legislator usually knows why he or she supports or opposes a law. (A contrary position would call into doubt the very foundations of the legislative process.) The Constitution demands that legislators assure themselves that illicit motivations, such as suppressing expression or disadvantaging racial minorities, play no role in their decisions to support the legislation. A legislator who "personally" does not care to pursue an illicit end but who supports a measure to satisfy her constituents' or colleagues' desires for those ends must be taken to have incorporated their ends as her own.

However intimately legislators know their own minds, they often lack the expertise and time to assimilate the complex factual and legal information bearing on the constitutionality of a proposed law. In the ordinary run of cases, these issues must be addressed and resolved through institutional mechanisms. A number of such mechanisms exist and are actually employed.

Federal legislation is typically drafted by lawyers and other specialists—either in an executive agency or department or in a congressional committee—who are familiar with any potential constitutional issues presented by the legislation. The committee to which a bill is referred can call upon its own legal staff or on the American Law Division of the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress for assistance with constitutional questions. Individual legislators can also seek advice from the research service and from their own staffs, and constitutional issues may be raised in debates on the floor of the House and Senate. Before signing a bill, the President can consult with the Office of Legal Counsel or seek an opinion from the attorney general. Although most state legislators cannot avail themselves of such rich resources, all have analogous methods for assessing the constitutionality of proposed legislation.

It is sometimes said that legislators have too little time and too much political interest to take constitutional issues seriously. Surely, however, this remark cannot justify legislative inattention to questions of constitutionality—unless one believes that legislators should be held to a lower standard of law-abidingness than individuals or enterprises, who may also lack the time or inclination to follow the law. To the extent that the observation is accurate, it is a source of concern to anyone committed to constitutional democracy.

The principal deterrent against unconstitutional legislative action is the threat of judicial invalidation of a law on the ground of its substantive unconstitutionality. From time to time, courts have also engaged in what might be called "procedural review" of legislative decisions—review that focuses on the process by which the law was enacted.

Procedural review encompasses two different inquiries. One is whether the legislators acted out of unconstitutional motives; the other is whether the legislators adequately considered the factual and legal bases for the law. Chief Justice Marshall alluded to both inquiries in McCulloch v. Maryland (1819). With respect to unconstitutional motivation, he wrote: "Should Congress, . . . under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objectives not entrusted to the government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal . . . to say that such an act was not the law of the land." And he invoked the Executive's and Congress's attention to the underlying constitutional issues as a basis for judicial deference to their decision:

> The bill for incorporating the [first] bank of the United States did not steal upon an unsuspecting legislature, and pass unobserved. Its principle was completely understood and was opposed with equal zeal and ability. After being resisted, first in the fair and open field of debate, and afterwards in the executive cabinet, with as much persevering talent as any measure has ever experienced, and being supported by arguments which convinced minds as pure and as intelligent as this country can boast, it became law. . . . It would require no ordinary share of intrepidity to assert that a measure adopted under these circumstances was a bold and plain usurpation, to which the constitution gives no countenance.

Judicial inquiry into legislative motivation has had a checkered career. The Court in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) and BAILEY V. DREXEL FURNITURE COMPANY (1922) relied on Marshall's "pretext" statement to strike down federal child labor legislation, and the Court in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) expressed doubt whether the maximum hours law had been adopted for permissible motives.

Inquiries into legislative motivation declined with the judicial modesty of the late 1930s, but it reappeared with the WARREN COURT's resurgence of activism. The Court in ABINGTON SCHOOL DISTRICT V. SCHEMPP (1963) articulated this standard for assessing establishment of religion claims: "[W]hat are the purpose and primary effect of the enactment? If either is the advancement or inhibition of religion then the enactment exceeds the scope of legislative power as circumscribed by the Constitution." EPPERSON V. ARKANSAS (1968) applied the "purpose" aspect of this test to strike down a law forbidding the teaching of evolutionary theory. GOMILLION V. LIGHTFOOT (1960) struck down the Alabama legislature's redrawing of the boundaries of Tuskeegee on the ground that it was designed to exclude black citizens from the city limits. And GRIFFIN V. PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD (1964) held that the county could not constitutionally close its public schools with the motive of avoiding integration.

In contrast to these decisions, United States v. O'Brien (1968) refused to consider the defendant's contention that Congress enacted the draft-card destruction law in order to suppress antiwar protest rather than for any legitimate administrative purposes. And PALMER V. THOMPSON (1971) dismissed the plaintiff's claim that Jackson, Mississippi, had closed its swimming pools in order to avoid integrating them. Writing for the Court in Palmer, Justice HUGO L. BLACK emphasized that it was extremely difficult to determine an official's motivation and especially difficult "to determine the 'sole' or 'dominant' motivation behind the choices of a group of legislators." Black also remarked that "there is an element of futility in a judicial attempt to invalidate a law because of the bad motives of its supporters. If a law is struck down for this reason, rather than because of its facial contents or effect, it would presumably be valid as soon as the legislature . . . repassed it for different reasons."

More recently, the Court has repudiated the broadest implications of O'Brien and Palmer. In ARLINGTON HEIGHTS V. METROPOLITAN HOUSING DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION (1977) Justice LEWIS F. POWELL noted the importance of "[p]roof of racially discriminatory intent or purpose" to claims under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause. The Court held that the complainant was entitled—indeed, required—to prove that the town's refusal to rezone an area to permit multiple-family housing was discriminatorily motivated. The relevent standard was not whether the decision was solely or even dominantly motivated by racial considerations. Rather, proof that racial motivation played any part in the decision shifts to the decision maker "the burden of establishing that the same decision would have resulted even had the impermissible purpose not been considered." In Mt. Healthy City Board of Education v. Doyle (1977) the Court applied a similar standard in reviewing an employee's claim that he had been discharged for exercising First Amendment rights.

The current doctrine is correct. Legislative motives are not always obscure; nor does judicial review usually require inquiring into and aggregating the motives of individual legislators. As Justice Powell noted in Arlington Heights, the bizarrely shaped boundaries of Tuskeegee in Gomillion revealed "a clear pattern, unexplainable on grounds other than race." Sometimes, as in the school- and pool-closing cases, the historical background and sequence of actions leading up to the contested event may reveal invidious purposes. Placing a substantial burden on the complainant and permitting the respondent to show that the decision was in fact overdetermined by legitimate purposes amply protect against judicial invalidation of legislative policies that were based on legitimate considerations.

Indeed, this objective might be better achieved simply by invalidating a law where unconstitutional motives played any substantial role and permitting the legislature to consider the measure anew. Justice Black's concern to the contrary, such a course is not inevitably futile. Although a legislature may disguise its motivation and reenact the law for illicit reasons, it may also choose to reenact the law for entirely legitimate reasons—or the legislature may have lost whatever interest motivated it to act in the first instance. The Alabama legislature did not attempt to gerrymander Tuskeegee again, nor did Prince Edward County try to close its schools again for a "better" reason.

Judicial inquiry into unconstitutional motivation is sometimes said to be especially intrusive because it requires the judiciary to concern itself directly with the legislative process. In an important sense, however, any form of procedural review is less intrusive than substantive review. The Court leaves to the legislature its assigned task of weighing the costs and benefits of proposed legislation, and requires only that the legislature not count a constitutionally illicit objective as a benefit.

When a law is challenged on the ground that it does not further any valid interests, or does not further them sufficiently, the Supreme Court typically does not ask what ends the legislature actually sought to achieve, but hypothesizes possible objectives and asks whether the law can be upheld in terms of them. For example, in United States v. O'Brien, lacking any information about what legitimate objectives Congress actually sought to achieve through the draft card destruction law, the Court upheld the law on the basis of several administrative objectives that the Justices thought the law might serve.

In a widely cited 1972 article Gerald Gunther urged that the Court should be "less willing to supply justifying rationale by exercising its imagination. . . . [It] should assess the means in terms of legislative purposes that have substantial basis in actuality, not mere conjecture." Gunther asserted that a court need not delve into "actual legislative motivation" but can rely on legislative materials such as debates and reports or on a "state court's or attorney general office's description of purpose."

The Court has sometimes taken this approach. For example, in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) the Court held that the state's anticontraceptive law was not justified as a means of deterring illicit sexual intercourse—the only purpose urged by the state attorney general. The Court did not consider whether the law might be upheld on the more plausible (though constitutionally problematic) ground that the Connecticut legislature believed that contraception was immoral. Whatever the justification for this judicial strategy, it is not likely to identify the legislature's actual purposes: state courts and attorneys general have no privileged access to actual legislative purposes but must rely on the same public materials available to the Supreme Court.

In recent years some Justices, and occasionally a majority of the Court, have limited the objectives that can be considered in support of a challenged regulation to the decision maker's (supposed) actual objectives. This course is easiest for a court to follow when statutory limitations on an agency's mandate foreclose it from pursuing a broad range of objectives. For example, HAMPTON V. MOW SUN WONG (1976) invalidated a United States Civil Service regulation barring resident ALIENS from federal civil service jobs. Writing for the Court, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS assumed that Congress or the President might constitutionally have adopted such a requirement for reasons of foreign policy, but held that the commission's jurisdiction was limited to adopting regulations to "promote the efficiency of the federal service." Similarly, in REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), Justice Powell refused to consider whether the university's preferential admissions policy was justified as a remedy for past discrimination, holding that the regents were empowered only to pursue educational objectives.

The Supreme Court has sometimes relied on legislative history to refuse to uphold legislation on the basis of objectives that were not intended. For example, in Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld (1975), in assessing the constitutionality of the "mother's insurance benefit" provision of the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN wrote for the Court that "the mere recitation of a benign, compensatory purpose is not an automatic shield which protects against an inquiry into the actual purposes underlying a statutory scheme." Although the provision might have been designed to compensate for past economic discrimination against women, the legislative history belied this purpose and the Court refused to uphold the law on a false basis.

Legislative history is often sparse or nonexistent, however. A complex legislative scheme may make a myriad of classifications; the chances are slight that legislative materials will illuminate the classification challenged in any particular case; and the absence of legislative history does not mean that the legislators did not intend to pursue a particular objective. Partly because of these complexities, judicial efforts to limit the purposes on the basis of which laws can be justified have not followed a consistent pattern. The current state of the law is captured in Kassell v. Consolidated Freightways Corporation (1981), which struck down a state's highway regulation prohibiting double trailers as an undue burden on INTERSTATE COMMERCE. In a concurring opinion, Justice Brennan wrote that he would give no deference to the state's arguments based on safety because the law was not actually designed to promote safety but to protect local industries. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, dissenting, asserted that there was "no authority for the proposition that possible legislative purposes suggested by a state's lawyers should not be considered in COMMERCE CLAUSE cases." The plurality avoided the issue by rejecting the state's safety claims on the merits.

In McCulloch Marshall implied that the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES ACT was entitled to special deference because of the attention paid to the constitutional issues within the executive and legislative branches. Because of the difficulty of such an inquiry, however, and perhaps because of its perceived impropriety, the court has seldom conditioned deference on the extent to which the legislature actually considered the factual and legal issues bearing on the constitutional questions at stake. In Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills (1957) the Court gave a strained interpretation to a federal statute in order to avoid a difficult constitutional question of federal jurisdiction, to which Congress had apparently paid no attention. In a separate opinion, Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER noted that "this Court cannot do what a President sometimes does in returning a bill to Congress. We cannot return this provision to Congress and respectfully request that body to assume the responsibility placed upon it by the Constitution."

In an article on the Lincoln Mills case, ALEXANDER M. BICKEL and Harry Wellington responded that the Court could properly perform such a "remanding function" and that it had sometimes done so, albeit surreptitiously. KENT V. DULLES (1958) is often cited as an example. Rather than decide whether the secretary of state could constitutionally refuse to issue passports to members of the Communist party, the Court held that Congress had not delegated the secretary this authority, thus in effect returning the matter to Congress. More recently, Justice Stevens, dissenting in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980), explicitly urged such a "remand." Fullilove upheld a congressional provision requiring that ten percent of the federal funds allocated to public work projects be used to procure services from minority contractors. Justice Stevens's dissent started from the premise that the Constitution disfavors all racial classifications. Noting that the challenged provision was scarcely discussed in committee or on the floor of the Congress, he wrote:

> Although it is traditional for judges to accord the same presumption of regularity to the legislative process no matter how obvious it may be that a busy Congress has acted precipitately, I see no reason why the character of their procedures may not be considered relevant to the decision whether the legislative product has [violated the Constitution]. A holding that the classification was not adequately preceded by a consideration of less drastic alternatives or adequately explained by a statement of legislative purpose would be far less intrusive than a final decision [of unconstitutionality]. . . . [T]here can be no separation-of-powers objection to a more tentative holding of unconstitutionality based on a failure to follow procedures that guarantee the kind of deliberation that a fundamental constitutional decision of this kind obviously merits.

"Procedural" judicial review, which takes account of the legislature's consideration of relevant constitutional issues, has two objectives. First, it may foster legislative attention to the Constitution in the first instance. Second, it prevents constitutional concerns from falling between two stools—which happens when a court blindly defers to a judgment that the legislature did not in fact make.

Procedural review seems appropriate where a legislature evidently has ignored issues of law or fact that bear on the constitutionality of an enactment. It is questionable whether a general practice of procedural review would prove workable, however. Among other things, a court will have difficulty in assessing the adequacy of constitutional deliberation from external indicia. Justice Powell, concurring in Fullilove, thus responded to the argument that the legislation was not adequately supported by factual findings or debate:

> The creation of national rules for the governance of our society simply does not entail the same concept of record-making that is appropriate to a judicial or administrative proceeding. Congress has no responsibility to confine its vision to the facts and evidence adduced by particular parties. One appropriate source [of facts] is the information and expertise that Congress acquires in the consideration and enactment of earlier legislation. After Congress has legislated repeatedly in an area of national concern, its Members gain experience that may reduce the need for fresh hearings or prolonged debate when Congress again considers action in that area.

In addition to the specific powers and limitations found in the Constitution, the Court has interpreted the DUE PROCESS and equal protection clauses to impose general requirements of "rationality" on the outcome of the legislative process. As stated in F. S. Royster Guano Company v. Virginia (1920), the equal protection STANDARD OF REVIEW requires that "the classification must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest upon some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation. . . ." The modern Court has usually articulated an even less demanding RATIONAL BASIS requirement: the law, and any classifications it makes, must plausibly promote some permissible ends to some extent.

The rationality standards may provide a minimal judicial safeguard against laws whose only purpose is constitutionally illicit, without requiring a direct inquiry into legislative motivation. But they may also impose a broader requirement on the legislative process. They may imply what Frank Michelman has described as a "public interest" rather than a "public choice" model of the legislative process.

The public interest model is premised on the possibility of shared public values or ends. "[T]he legislature is regarded as the forum for identifying or defining, and acting towards those ends. The process is one of mutual search through joint deliberation, relying on the use of reason supposed to have persuasive force" (Michelman, 1977, p. 149). The public choice model regards "all substantive values and ends . . . as strictly private. . . . There is no public or general social interest, there are only concatenations of particular interests or private preferences. There is no reason, only strategy. . . . There are no good legislators, only shrewd ones; no statesmen; only messengers" (ibid., p. 148).

The constitutional implications of the two models can be illustrated by the city ordinance challenged in RAILWAY EXPRESS AGENCY V. NEW YORK (1949). The ordinance prohibited advertisements on the side of vehicles but exempted business delivery vehicles advertising their own business. The most obvious beneficiaries of the exemption were the city's newspapers.

If the Court had adopted a "public choice" model, it would have been pointless to subject the New York ordinance to a rationality requirement: the exemption would be permissible even if its only rationale were to "buy off" the newspapers to get the ordinance enacted or, indeed, to favor the newspapers over other advertisers. Under a "public interest" model, however, the Court would at least ask whether the exemption was related to some extrinsic purpose—and this it did. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS wrote for the Court that the "local authorities may well have concluded that those who advertise their own wares on their trucks do not present the same traffic problem in view of the nature or extent of the advertising which they use." In a concurring opinion, Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON pointed to "a real difference between doing in self-interest and doing for hire."

Thus, the Court seems nominally to adhere to a public interest model. But the weakness of the rationality standards, and the Court's generosity in imagining possible rationales for classifications (exemplified by Railway Express Agency itself), suggest some judicial ambivalence about the extent to which this model should be treated as a constitutional norm. There is some academic controversy about both the norm itself and its judicial enforceability.

JAMES BRADLEY THAYER asserted in his 1901 biography of John Marshall that judicial review implies a distrust of legislatures and that the legislatures "are growing accustomed to this distrust, and more and more readily incline to justify it, and to shed the consideration of constitutional restraints, . . . turning that subject over to the courts; and what is worse, they insensibly fall into a habit of assuming that whatever they can constitutionally do they may do. . . . The tendency of a common and easy resort to this great function is to dwarf the political capacity of the people, and to deaden its sense of moral responsibility." Assessing Thayer's argument is practically impossible, but it seems at least as plausible that the practice of judicial review is a necessary reminder to legislators that their actions are constrained by fundamental public law and not only by their constituents' interests or even their own moral principles.

Thayer's argument nonetheless underscores the point that the Constitution speaks directly to legislatures. In a properly functioning constitutional system, judicial review should be just that—the review of the legislature's considered judgment that the challenged act is constitutionally permissible. Whether this position is "realistic" is another matter. Surely, however, one cannot expect legislators to take their constitutional responsibilities seriously if they and the citizenry at large assume that they have none.

PAUL BREST
(1986)

Bibliography

BENNETT, ROBERT 1979 "Mere" Rationality in Constitutional Law: Judicial Review and Democratic Theory. California Law Review 67:1049–1103.

BICKEL, ALEXANDER and WELLINGTON, HARRY 1957 Legislative Purpose and the Judicial Function: The Lincoln Mills Case. Harvard Law Review 71:1–39.

BREST, PAUL 1971 An Approach to the Problem of Unconstitutional Legislative Motive. Supreme Court Review 1971:95–146.

ELY, JOHN H. 1970 Legislative and Administrative Motivation in Constitutional Law. Yale Law Journal 79:1205–1341.

GUNTHER, GERALD 1982 In Search of Evolving Doctrine on a Changing Court: A Model for a Newer Equal Protection. Harvard Law Review 86:1–48.

LINDE, HANS 1976 Due Process of Lawmaking. Nebraska Law Review 55:197–255.

MICHELMAN, FRANK 1977 Political Markets and Community Self-Determination: Competing Judicial Models of Local Government Legitimacy. Indiana Law Journal 53:145–206.

MORGAN, DONALD G. 1966 Congress and the Constitution: A Study in Responsibility. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press.

THAYER, JAMES BRADLEY 1901 John Marshall. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1965 The Courts and the Constitution. Columbia Law Review 65:1001–1014.

LEGISLATIVE CONTEMPT POWER

Anglo-American legislative bodies have exercised the power to punish nonmembers for contempt of their dignity and proceedings since the time when the High Court of Parliament exercised undifferentiated legislative and judicial power. There is no explicit constitutional warrant for the exercise of the power by Congress, but Congress has exercised it, nonetheless, at least since 1795. There were several instances in the nineteenth century of summary judgments being rendered against nonmembers for such acts of contempt as publishing abusive language about Congress or attempting to bribe its members. In Anderson v. Dunn (1821) the Supreme Court held that the power to punish contempts—at least of the latter sort—was inherent in "a deliberate assembly, clothed with the majesty of the people." In KILBOURNE V. THOMPSON (1881), however, the Supreme Court held that Congress did not possess COMMON LAW power to punish as contempt Kilbourne's failure to produce documents subpoenaed by an investigatory committee for a nonlegislative purpose.

Congress defined the statutory offense of contempt of Congress in 1857; this offense was triable before the house against which the contempt was committed, and a contemnor, once convicted, might be confined in the Capitol for the duration of the congressional session. Contempt of Congress remains a statutory offense, but it is no longer prosecuted at the bar of the house. Because bribery of members of Congress is now punishable as a separate offense, the most common contemporary form of contempt of Congress is refusal to testify at or to provide evidence for LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATIONS. The presiding officer of the offended house (ordinarily only if directed by a vote of the full house) certifies the circumstances of the contempt to the United States attorney in the district where the contempt was committed; the federal attorney may then prosecute the contemnor in federal court.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

GOLDFARB, RONALD L. 1963 The Contempt Power. New York: Columbia University Press.

LEGISLATIVE COURT

The term "legislative court" was coined by Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL to describe the status of courts created by Congress to serve United States TERRITORIES lying outside the boundaries of any state. Congress had not given the judges of the territorial courts the life tenure and salary guarantees that Article III of the Constitution required for judges of CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS, and Marshall needed to explain the anomaly of federal courts outside the contemplation of Article III. In AMERICAN INSURANCE CO. V. CANTER (1828) he concluded that Congress, in exercising its power to govern the territories, could establish courts that did not fit Article III's specifications. Today this concept of legislative courts embraces all courts created by Congress and staffed by judges who do not enjoy constitutional protection of their tenure and salaries. Examples include territorial courts, consular courts, the Tax Court of the United States, the Bankruptcy Court, the Court of Military Appeals, and the courts of local jurisdiction operating in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA and the Commonwealth of PUERTO RICO.

Just as a legislative court's judges fall outside Article III's guarantees of independence, so it is capable of handling business outside that Article's definition of "the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES"—something a constitutional court cannot constitutionally do. A legislative court, for example, can be assigned JURISDICTION to give ADVISORY OPINIONS to the President or Congress. Yet, despite Marshall's OBITER DICTUM in the Canter opinion that a legislative court is "incapable of receiving" jurisdiction lying within the judicial power, it is clear today that such courts, like administrative agencies, can constitutionally be assigned the initial decision of a great many cases within Article III's definition of that power. (See NORTHERN PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION CO. V. MARATHON PIPE LINE CO.) Their decisions on such Article III matters are reviewable by constitutional courts, including the Supreme Court, when Congress so provides.

With some difficulty, the Supreme Court has resolved controversies over the status of several courts. The federal courts formerly serving the District of Columbia were held protected by Article III's guarantees of life tenure and salary protection. In this sense, they were constitutional courts. However, the Court also held that the same courts could constitutionally be given work falling outside Article III's specification of CASES AND CONTROVERSIES within the judicial power. In 1970, Congress replaced these "hybrid" courts with a dual court system: the constitutional courts operate under Article III's strictures and the legislative courts handle the local judicial business of the District. In Palmore v. United States (1973) the Supreme Court upheld the local courts' power to try local crimes (established by congressional statute), despite their judges' lack of life tenure and salary guarantees.

Similarly, in Glidden Co. v. Zdanok (1962), the Court staggered to the ruling—based on two inconsistent opinions, pieced together to make a majority for the result—that the old Court of Claims (see CLAIMS COURT; UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT) and the COURT OF CUSTOMS AND PATENT APPEALS were constitutional courts, not legislative courts.

In essence a legislative court is merely an administrative agency with an elegant name. While Congress surely has the power to transfer portions of the business of the federal judiciary to legislative courts, a wholesale transfer of that business would work a fundamental change in the status of our independent judiciary and would seem vulnerable to constitutional attack.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

NOTE 1962 Legislative and Constitutional Courts: What Lurks Ahead for Bifurcation. Yale Law Journal 71:979–1012.

LEGISLATIVE FACTS

The growth of American constitutional doctrine has been influenced, from the beginning, by the traditions of the Anglo-American COMMON LAW. Judges make constitutional law, as they make other kinds of law, partly on the basis of factual premises. Sometimes these premises are merely assumed, but sometimes they are developed with the aid of counsel. However they may be determined, the facts on which a court's lawmaking is premised are called "legislative facts." In modern usage they are sometimes contrasted with "adjudicative facts," the facts of the particular case before the court.

Not all constitutional questions concern the validity of legislation. In the 1970s and 1980s, for example, the Supreme Court went through a period of reappraisal of the EXCLUSIONARY RULE, which excludes from a criminal case some types of EVIDENCE obtained in violation of the Constitution. One factual issue repeatedly raised during this reconsideration was whether the rule actually served to deter police misconduct. In considering that question, the Court was not second-guessing the judgment of a legislature. Yet the question was properly regarded as one of legislative fact; its resolution would provide one of the premises for the Court's constitutional lawmaking.

More frequently, however, the courts consider issues of legislative fact in reviewing the constitutionality of legislation. In many cases, particularly when the laws under review are acts of Congress, the legislature itself has already given consideration to the same fact questions. Congress sometimes writes its own factual findings into the text of a law, explicitly declaring the actual basis for the legislation. In such cases the courts typically defer to the congressional versions of reality. Similar legislative findings are only infrequently written into the enactments of state and local legislative bodies, but even there the practice has recently increased. It seems unlikely, however, that judges, especially federal judges, will pay the same degree of deference to those legislative findings.

The courts' treatment of issues of legislative fact is thus seen as a function of the STANDARD OF REVIEW used to test a law's validity. When a court uses the most permissive form of the RATIONAL BASIS standard, it asks only whether the legislature could rationally conclude that the law under review was an appropriate means for achieving a legitimate legislative objective. The BRANDEIS BRIEF was invented for use in just such cases, presenting evidence to show that a legislature's factual premises were not irrational. When the standard of review is heightened—for example, when the courts invoke the rhetoric of STRICT SCRUTINY—arguments addressed to questions of legislative fact can be expected to come from both the challengers and the defenders of legislation. A court's fact-finding task in such a case is apt to be more complicated; the complication is implicit in any standard of review more demanding than the "rational basis" standard, any real interest-balancing by the courts. Arguments about the proper judicial approach to the factual premises for legislation are, in fact, arguments about the proper role of the judiciary in the governmental system. (See JUDICIAL REVIEW; JUDICIAL ACTIVISM AND JUDICIAL RESTRAINT.)

The technique of the Brandeis brief was invented for the occasion of the Supreme Court's consideration of MULLER V. OREGON (1908), upholding a law regulating women's working hours, and has been in fairly frequent use ever since. Increasingly, however, counsel have sought to present evidence on issues of legislative fact to trial courts. An early example was SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO. V. ARIZONA (1945), in which the Supreme Court struck down a law limiting the length of railroad trains. For five and a half months the trial judge heard evidence filling some 3,000 pages in the record; he made findings of legislative fact covering 148 printed pages. Justice HUGO L. BLACK, dissenting, complained that this procedure made the judiciary into a "super-legislature," but courts cannot escape from this kind of factual inquiry unless they adopt Justice Black's permissive views and abandon most constitutional limits on STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

Nor are such trials of legislative fact limited to issues lying within the competence of people like safety engineers. When the California school finance case, SERRANO V. PRIEST (1972), was remanded for trial, the court took six months of expert testimony centered on a single question: Does differential spending on education produce differences in educational quality? (The court's unsurprising answer: Yes.)

As the Serrano and Southern Pacific cases show, proving legislative facts at trial is considerably more costly than filing a Brandeis brief. It permits cross-examination, however, and sharpens the focus for evidentiary offerings. Even when appellate review seems certain, the trial court's sorting and evaluation of a complex record can aid the appellate court greatly. Expert testimony, the staple of such a trial, typically rests on the sort of opinion and hearsay about which nonexperts ordinarily would not be permitted to testify. Legislative facts, of course, are tried to the judge and not to a jury; furthermore, questions of legislative fact, by definition, touch a great many "cases" not in court that will be "decided" by the precedent made in the court's constitutional ruling. Just as a constitutional case is an especially appropriate occasion for hearing the views of an AMICUS CURIAE, the widest latitude should be allowed to the parties (and to an amicus) to present evidence broadly relevant to the lawmaking issues before the court.

Ultimately there is no assurance that counsel's efforts to educate a court about the factual setting for constitutional lawmaking will improve the lawmaking itself. Yet our courts, with the Supreme Court's encouragement, continue to invite counsel to make these efforts. One of America's traditional faiths, which judges share with the rest of us, is a belief in the value of education.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

FREUND, PAUL A. 1951 On Understanding the Supreme Court. Boston: Little, Brown.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1960 Legislative Facts in Constitutional Litigation. Supreme Court Review 1960:75–112.

LEGISLATIVE IMMUNITY

The SPEECH OR DEBATE CLAUSE immunizes federal legislators from civil or criminal actions based on legislative acts. In TENNEY V. BRANDHOVE (1951) the Supreme Court, relying on the COMMON LAW immunity of legislators and the speech or debate clause, held legislators to be immune from federal civil suits based on legislative acts. This legislative immunity, however, does not preclude evidence of legislative acts in criminal prosecutions for corruption.

In what may be an expansion of common law legislative immunity, LAKE COUNTRY ESTATES, INC. V. TAHOE REGIONAL PLANNING AGENCY (1979) held that the appointed members of a bistate agency enjoyed legislative immunity from suits for constitutional violations. The Court also suggested that state legislative immunity does not depend on the existence of the speech or debate clause. Lake Country Estates' extension of absolute legislative immunity to un-elected officials may enable many public bodies or officials that promulgate rules of general application to rely on legislative immunity. For example, in Supreme Court of Virginia v. Consumers Union of the United States (1980) the Court concluded that state supreme court justices enjoyed legislative immunity from damages actions based on their promulgation of unconstitutional rules of conduct for the state bar.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1982 Section 1983: Doctrinal Foundations and an Empirical Study. Cornell Law Review 67:492–505.

LEGISLATIVE INTENT

Legislative intent is a construct that courts use to discern the meaning of legislative action, usually in the form of LEGISLATION. The concept is employed in many fields of law—including constitutional law—in the interpretation and application of statutes. In constitutional law, courts also use the concept in determining the purposes or goals of a legislature when they are relevant to deciding the constitutionality of the legislation.

In searching for legislative intent, courts appear to assume that legislation is aimed, in an instrumentally rational fashion, at achieving certain objectives or goals. Sometimes these objectives or goals are stated in rather discrete terms. In HINES V. DAVIDOWITZ (1941), for example, the Supreme Court decided that in passing a law requiring ALIENS to register with federal authorities, Congress had the objective of barring enforcement of state laws that required aliens to register with state officials. At other times, legislative intent is cast in more general terms. Thus in RAILWAY EXPRESS AGENCY V. NEW YORK (1949), the Supreme Court decided that the legislative goal in banning advertisements from some motor vehicles was the promotion of traffic safety.

There has been controversy about reference to legislative intent as a method of giving meaning to legislation, much as there has been controversy about reference to the Framers' intent as a means of giving meaning to the provisions of the Constitution itself. Two lines of criticism have developed, one rooted in doubt about the intelligibility of the concept of legislative intent, the other grounded in skepticism about the legitimacy of the political theory that an appeal to legislative intent presupposes.

Those who question the intelligibility of attempting to ascertain the intent of a legislature argue that it is impossible to ascribe an intent to a multi-member body. First, they point out the difficulty of ascertaining the individual intents of all the legislators and, second, they argue that even if the individual intents could be ascertained, there is no theoretically sound way to combine them to produce a coherent intent of the group.

Those who question the legitimacy of an appeal to legislative intent argue that as a matter of political theory, courts should not be bound by beliefs or wishes of legislators that were not written into the text of the statute but rather only the printed words of the legislation. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, for example, urged that courts should ask not what the legislature intended but rather only what the statute means. Instead of looking for evidence of legislative intent, courts should, according to Holmes, consult dictionaries and evidence of contemporary usage to construct the most acceptable interpretation of the statute's meaning.

More recent scholarly criticism has also questioned the validity of the assumption about legislative behavior that legislative intent presupposes. According to these critics, legislatures are merely market arenas in which private interests trade with each other through their legislators to further their own particular advantages. A search for a legislative intent beyond the immediate effects that the statute accomplishes is, according to his view, nonsensical and perhaps politically illegitimate as well.

Legislative intent has remained an important concept in constitutional law in spite of these criticisms. First, courts have developed various methods of dealing with the practical difficulties of constructing a legislative intent. Thus the difficulties associated with discovering the intent of each legislator and of aggregating these individual intents into a group intent have been addressed through the use of presumptions and, in some cases, outright fictions. Often, particularly in the case of state legislation, there is no evidence of legislative intent beyond the words of the statute, but the courts nevertheless generally say they are seeking legislative intention when they are deciding what the legislation means.

The courts indulge in similar assumptions when additional evidence does exist. For example, courts generally credit statements in committee reports as evidence of legislative purpose, even though there may be little reason to believe that many legislators read the report or agreed with it. Similarly, the speeches of proponents during floor debates (or even in public discourse outside the legislative arena) are also treated as evidence of legislative intent, even though few legislators may have been present during the floor debate (or heard the nonlegislative remarks). Some have argued that the legislative draftsmen or proponents are the "agents" of the legislature and therefore that their intent is the relevant legislative intent. Others urge that silent legislators who vote for the enactment share the intent of those who do speak in favor of the legislation. Another view is that legislatures in effect delegate to identifiable subgroups, such as committees, the task of setting legislative goals in the areas of the subgroups' specialties. Thus the intent of the legislature with respect to a transportation law would be assumed to be the same as the intent of the legislative committee on transportation. Whatever the rationale, courts have created a concept of legislative intent that does not purport to be a true measurement of the intents of the individual legislators. In effect, courts have personified legislatures and sought to ascribe to them an intent as if the legislature were a single person, one who sometimes speaks with several, often conflicting voices about what he wants to accomplish.

The more fundamental questions of political theory which challenge the legitimacy of looking to legislative intent have not been systematically addressed, at least by the courts. Courts have, by and large, assumed that if legislative intent can be constructed, it is relevant and even controlling in the interpretation of legislative action, at least where the terms of the statute are perceived to provide leeway for interpretation.

Legislative intent may have remained important for several reasons. First, the concept is used widely outside of constitutional law for statutory interpretation. Legislatures have learned what courts will consider in searching for legislative intent, and they have adjusted their processes in some measure to provide the appropriate signals to the courts—thus encouraging continued judicial reliance on legislative intent.

Second, adherence to legislative intent may be grounded in judicial support of what the judges believe to be a political ideal. Although courts may recognize that trading among private interests does occur, they may believe that our society nevertheless aspires to a model of legislation that is an instrumentally rational pursuit of objectives that further the public interest.

Finally, courts have evolved several STANDARDS OF REVIEW in constitutional law that make the legislature's goals or objectives relevant to the constitutionality of the legislation. These standards, such as the RATIONAL BASIS test, LEAST RESTRICTIVE MEANS analysis, and the tests for federal PREEMPTION of state regulatory authority, have no doubt helped insure that the search for legislative intent remains a significant part of constitutional adjudication.

Legislative intent is thus important in several areas of constitutional adjudication. Three examples are illustrative. First, courts look to legislative intent to determine whether a legislature gave an administrative official power to take the challenged action. In KENT V. DULLES (1958), for example, the secretary of state denied a passport because the applicant failed to state whether or not he was or had been a communist. The Supreme Court held that Congress had not intended to give the secretary of state the power to deny passports on those grounds. Similarly, courts have ruled on numerous occasions—Hines is an example—that a state statute cannot be enforced because Congress, by enacting legislation on the same subject matter, "intended" to preempt the field from state regulation.

Second, courts often look to legislative intent because the constitutionality of the challenged legislative action depends on the legislature's purpose. Thus legislation mandating that only single-family residences may be built in a certain zone is constitutional if the purposes of the law are to reduce traffic, limit demand on municipal resources, and provide a suburban atmosphere. It will be unconstitutional, however, if the legislative purpose is to exclude minorities from the municipality, as the Supreme Court suggested in ARLINGTON HEIGHTS V. METROPOLITAN HOUSING DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION (1977).

Third, legislative intent is relevant in those areas of constitutional decision making in which courts purportedly scrutinize the "fit" between legislative means and ends. In EQUAL PROTECTION law, for example, legislative classification that disadvantages one person vis-à-vis another is said to be constitutional only if the classification is rationally related to a legitimate legislative goal. While courts tend to hypothesize rather freely about what the legislature could have intended to achieve with the classification, evidence of legislative intent is clearly relevant. More important, when circumstances call for more rigorous scrutiny—as when the classification is based on sex or race—the courts are less willing to speculate about the legislature's possible purposes, and they search for concrete evidence of legislative intent.

The meaning of legislation—what the legislature sought to accomplish—is often important in constitutional law. Even though theoretical and practical problems are attendant on the concept of legislative intent, courts use the concept in ascribing meaning to legislation in the numerous doctrinal areas in which the courts themselves have made that meaning relevant.

SCOTT H. BICE
(1986)

Bibliography

DICKERSON, REED 1975 Statutory Interpretation: A Peek into the Mind and Will of a Legislature. Indiana Law Journal 50: 206–237.

MACCALLUM, GERALD C., JR. 1966 Legislative Intent. Yale Law Journal 75:754–787.

RADIN, MAX 1930 Statutory Interpretation. Harvard Law Review 43:863–885.

LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATION

Although congressional power to conduct investigations and punish recalcitrant witnesses is nowhere mentioned in the United States Constitution, the inherent investigative power of legislatures was well established, both in the British Parliament and in the American colonial legislatures, more than a century before the Constitution was adopted. Mention of such power in the early state constitutions was generally regarded as unnecessary, but the Massachusetts and Maryland constitutions both gave explicit authorization; the latter, adopted in 1776, empowered the House of Delegates to ". . . inquire on the oath of witnesses, into all complaints, grievances, and offenses, as the grand inquest of this state," and to ". . . call for all public or official papers and records, and send for persons, whom they may judge necessary in the course of inquiries concerning affairs relating to the public interest."

The basic theory of the power was and is that a legislative house needs it in order to obtain information, so that its law-making and other functions may be discharged on an enlightened rather than a benighted basis. Under the Constitution, the power was first exercised by the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES in 1792, when it appointed a select committee to inquire into the defeat by the Indians suffered the previous year by federal forces commanded by General Arthur St. Clair. The House empowered the committee "to call for such persons, papers and records as may be necessary to assist in their inquiries." After examining the British precedents, President GEORGE WASHINGTON and his cabinet agreed that the House "was an inquest and therefore might institute inquiries" and "call for papers generally," and that although the executive ought to refuse to release documents "the disclosure of which would endanger the public," in the matter at hand "there was not a paper which might not be properly produced," and therefore the committee's requests should be granted.

For nearly a century thereafter, investigations were conducted frequently and without encountering serious challenge, in Congress and the state legislatures alike. They covered a wide range of subjects, and their history is in large part the history of American politics. Among the most interesting state investigations were those conducted in 1855 by the Massachusetts legislature and the New York City Council, under the leadership of the "Know-Nothing" party, in which Irish Roman Catholicism was the target. Inquiries by the New York City Council into alleged Irish domination of the police force were challenged in the New York Court of Common Pleas, and Judge Charles Patrick Daly's opinion in Briggs v. McKellar (1855) was the first to hold that, unlike in Britain, in the United States the legislative investigative power is limited by the Constitution.

Fifteen years later, a congressional investigation was for the first time successfully challenged on constitutional grounds, in KILBOURN V. THOMPSON (1881). The House of Representatives had authorized a select committee to investigate the bankruptcy of the Jay Cooke banking firm (which was a depository of federal funds), and when the witness Kilbourn refused to answer questions, the House cited him for contempt and imprisoned him. After his release on HABEAS CORPUS, Kilbourn sued the House sergeant-at-arms for damages from false imprisonment. In an opinion by Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER, the Supreme Court sustained his claim on the grounds of constitutional SEPARATION OF POWERS, declaring that the Jay Cooke bankruptcy presented no legislative grounds for inquiry and that "the investigation . . . could only be properly and successfully made by a court of justice." The Court has never since invalidated a legislative inquiry on that particular basis, and it is probable that today, under comparable circumstances, a sufficient legislative purpose would be found. But the Court's ruling, that Congress's investigative and contempt powers are subject to JUDICIAL REVIEW and must conform to constitutional limitations, has not since been seriously questioned.

Exclusively until 1857, and commonly until 1935, Congress enforced its investigative power against recalcitrant witnesses by its own contempt proceedings: a congressional citation for contempt, and its execution through arrest and confinement of the witness by the sergeant-at-arms. (See LEGISLATIVE CONTEMPT POWER.) Judicial review of the contempt was usually obtained by habeas corpus. But the system was cumbersome, and effective only when Congress was in session. To remedy these shortcomings, Congress in 1857 enacted a statute making it a federal offense to refuse to produce documents demanded, or to answer questions put, by a duly authorized congressional investigatory committee. For some years both the contempt and the statutory criminal procedures were used, but since 1935 the contempt procedure has fallen into disuse. Challenges to congressional investigative authority are currently dealt with by INDICTMENT and trial under the criminal statute, now found in section 192, Title 2, United States Code, the constitutionality of which was upheld by the Supreme Court in In re Chapman (1897).

The tone of Justice Miller's opinion in the Kilbourn case raised doubts about the scope and even the existence of the congressional contempt power, which were repeatedly voiced during the early years of the twentieth century, when Congress conducted investigations damaging to powerful business and financial institutions. In 1912 the House Committee on Banking and Currency launched what became known as the "Money Trust Investigation," in which practically all the leading financiers of the time—J. P. Morgan the elder, George F. Baker, James J. Hill, and others—were called to answer charges of undue concentration of control of railroads and heavy industries in the hands of a few New York bankers. In 1924, SENATE committees probed allegations of corruption and maladministration in the Justice, Interior, and Navy departments.

The legality and propriety of these inquiries aroused vigorous public debate. The famous jurist JOHN HENRY WIGMORE wrote of a "debauch of investigations" which raised a "stench" and caused the Senate to fall "in popular esteem to the level of professional searchers of the municipal dunghills," while then Professor FELIX FRANKFURTER accused the critics of seeking to "divert attention and shackle the future," and argued that the investigative power should be left "untrammeled." The doubters and critics were encouraged when a federal district judge, relying on the Kilbourn case, quashed a Senate contempt citation against Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty's brother, but the investigative and contempt powers were vindicated when the Supreme Court reversed that decision and ruled in MCGRAIN V. DAUGHERTY (1927) that the investigation was proper as an aid to legislation, and that

Mally Daugherty could be required to testify on pain of imprisonment. Consequently, there were no serious or successful legal challenges to the many congressional investigations born of the Great Depression and the "NEW DEAL" period of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's administration. (See CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1933–1945.)

Until this time the main subjects of legislative investigations had been the civil and military operations of the executive branch, industrial and financial problems, and the operation of social forces such as the labor movement. Except for state investigations in the middle years of the nineteenth century directed at Masons and Roman Catholics, ideological matters had not been much involved.

The Russian Revolution of 1917, the spread of communist doctrine, and the Nazi seizure of dictatorial power in Germany soon emerged as major subjects of congressional concern. There were short-lived congressional investigations of communist propaganda in 1919 and 1930, and of Nazi propaganda in 1934. With the establishment of the HOUSE COMMITTEE OF UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES in May 1938, SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES emerged as the most publicized subject of congressional investigation.

During WORLD WAR II, in which the United States and the Soviet Union were allies, there was a lull in these inquiries, but the "Iron Curtain" and "Cold War" revived them, and by 1947 they were again front-page news. Soon, names of prosecutors and witnesses—for example, MARTIN DIES, RICHARD M. NIXON, Alger Hiss, Whittaker Chambers, JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY, and Patrick McCarran—became household words. The Senate authorized two bodies to join in the hunt for subversion: the Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Internal Security headed by Senator McCarran, and the Government Operations Committee's Subcommittee on Investigations under Senator McCarthy, respectively established in 1946 and 1950.

The principal activity of these agencies was summoning individuals to testify about the communist connections of themselves or others, and their proceedings contributed mightily to a period of public recrimination and bitter controversy that lasted for more than a decade. It was also a period of frequent criminal litigation involving congressional investigative power, as numerous witnesses were indicted for refusing to answer such questions. Some witnesses invoked the Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, and the Supreme Court, in three cases decided in 1955, was unanimously of the opinion that the right is available to witnesses before legislative committees, though three of the Justices thought that the witnesses had not clearly invoked it. Writing for the majority, Chief Justice EARL WARREN confirmed the congressional investigative power and stated further (Quinn v. United States):

> But the power to investigate, broad as it may be, is also subject to recognized limitations. It cannot be used to inquire into private affairs unrelated to a valid legislative purpose. Nor does it extend to an area in which Congress is forbidden to legislate. Similarly, the power to investigate must not be confused with any of the powers of law enforcement; these powers are assigned under our Constitution to the Executive and Judiciary. Still further limitations on the power to investigate are found in the specific individual guarantees of the BILL OF RIGHTS, such as the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination which is in issue here.

Other witnesses, however, invoked the FIRST AMENDMENT's guarantee of FREEDOM OF SPEECH as justification for their refusal to answer, and in 1956 and 1957 two such cases, SWEEZY V. NEW HAMPSHIRE and WATKINS V. UNITED STATES, the first involving a congressional and the second a state investigation, reached the Court. With only Justice TOM C. CLARK dissenting, the Court held that, as a general proposition, First Amendment rights are enjoyed by witnesses in legislative investigations.

But did the First Amendment protect these witnesses from the obligation to answer questions about individual connections with communism? The Court did not meet that issue and based its reversal of both convictions on nonconstitutional grounds. Watkins had not been told that the questions put to him were (as the federal statute requires) "pertinent to the question under inquiry," while in Sweezy's case it was not shown that the state legislature had authorized the investigative agency to ask the questions he declined to answer.

Three years later, however, by a 5–4 vote, the Court held that the First Amendment did not bar requiring a witness to answer questions regarding his own or others' communist connections. (See BARENBLATT V. UNITED STATES; UPHAUS V. WYMAN.) In his opinion for the Court in the former case, Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN undertook a "balancing . . . of the private and public interests at stake," and concluded that since the Communist party was not "an ordinary political party" and sought overthrow of the government "by force and violence," Congress had "the right to identify a witness as a member of the Communist Party." (See BALANCING TESTS.)

The authority of these two cases was somewhat tarnished in 1963 after Justice ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG had replaced Justice Frankfurter, who had been in the five-member majority. A Florida court authorized a state investigatory committee to require a local branch of the NAACP to produce its membership lists so that the committee could determine whether certain individuals suspected of communist connections were members of the NAACP. Once again the Court divided 5–4, and Justice Goldberg, writing for the majority in GIBSON V. FLORIDA

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE, ruled that, in the absence of any prior showing of connection between the NAACP and communist activities, such required disclosure was barred by the First Amendment. Three years later, in another New Hampshire investigations case, DeGregory v. New Hampshire Attorney General, the Court ruled, 6–3, that the state's interest was "too remote and conjectural" to justify compelling a witness in 1964 to testify about communist activities in 1957.

Since then there have been no Supreme Court and no important state or lower federal court decisions on the constitutional aspects of legislative investigative power. The Barenblatt case has not been overruled, and it is perhaps noteworthy that both the Gibson and DeGregory cases involved state rather than congressional investigations. The attitudes of the Justices who have joined the Court since 1966 remain untested.

It may be surmised, for the future, that if a plausible relation between a legislative inquiry and a valid legislative purpose can be shown, and there are no procedural flaws or manifestations of gross abuse, the Court will be reluctant to deny, on constitutional grounds, the power of a legislative investigating committee to require witnesses to answer questions or produce records.

A different situation might well obtain if a congressional investigating committee should seek to enforce the production of government documents involving NATIONAL SECURITY or for some other reason inappropriate for public disclosure. Presidents have on numerous occasions exercised the right first asserted by George Washington in 1792, to withhold documents "the disclosure of which would endanger the public" or otherwise contravene the public interest. (See EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE.) Congressional committee efforts to force the production of records of judicial conferences, or other confidential court papers, might likewise encounter constitutional objections based on the separation of powers. Up to the present time, these issues have not confronted the Supreme Court, and the political wisdom of avoiding such confrontations is manifest.

TELFORD TAYLOR
(1986)

Bibliography

CARR, ROBERT K. 1952 The House Committee on Un-American Activities. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

GOODMAN, WALTER 1968 The Committee. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux.

LANDIS, JAMES M. 1926 Constitutional Limits on the Congressional Power of Investigation. Harvard Law Review 40:153–226.

OGDEN, AUGUST RAYMOND 1945 The Dies Committee. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press.

POTTS, CHARLES S. 1926 Power of Legislative Bodies to Punish for Contempt. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 74: 691–780.

TAYLOR, TELFORD 1955 Grand Inquest: The Story of Congressional Investigations. New York: Simon & Schuster.

LEGISLATIVE JURISDICTION

See: Jurisdiction

LEGISLATIVE POWER

"Legislative power" is a distinctly modern conception which presupposes a modern understanding of "law." In medieval Europe the authority of laws was variously attributed to God, nature, or custom; human authorities "found" or "declared" or enforced the law but were not thought to create it. Consequently, medieval jurists did not distinguish "legislative" from "judicial" powers. Through the end of the sixteenth century, the English Parliament (like its continental counterparts) was primarily regarded as a court, an ultimate court of APPEAL for individuals as well as communities. It was at most an incidental consideration whether Parliament was "representative" because law was not a matter of will but of knowledge.

The modern conception traces the authority of law precisely to the will of the lawmakers. It is this assumption of a pure power to make or unmake the laws that allows for our artificially clear distinction between "legislative" (that is lawmaking) and "judicial" or "executive" (law-applying) powers. In acknowledging law as the creation of particular human wills, the modern view liberates government from encrusted tradition, from folklore and superstition, above all from manipulation by legalistic conjurings. At the same time, however, this view of law opens the chilling prospect of an unlimited coercive power, since the power to create the laws seems, by its very nature, superior to the constraints of law. This sort of reasoning, powerfully advanced by theorists of SOVEREIGNTY in the seventeenth century, was treated by WILLIAM BLACKSTONE in the next century as virtually self-evident: for any court to declare invalid an act of Parliament, he observed, "were to set the judicial power above that of the legislature, which would be subversive of all government."

The Framers of the American Constitution were nonetheless intent on curbing legislative power. Historians have noted that by the standards of their European contemporaries the constitutional perspective of the American Framers was somewhat archaic, most notably in the Framers' acceptance of a HIGHER LAW limitation on legislative power and in their indifference to questions about sovereignty or ultimate authority. But in the decisive respect, the concerns and accomplishments of the Framers reflected their quite modern recognition that no laws are simply given, that the scope of legislative assertion is vast and, as THE FEDERALIST conceded, "the legislative authority necessarily predominates." Thus they set out the legislative powers in the first and longest article of the Constitution, suggesting the primacy of these powers in the governmental scheme and implicitly identifying the reach of the federal government with the reach of its legislative powers. At the same time, the language of Article I emphasizes the open-endedness of legislative power precisely by its focus on the powers rather than the duties, objectives, or obligations of the legislative branch.

Perhaps the most important checks on legislative power in the Constitution are those that seem merely procedural or institutional. In the first place, the Constitution sets up a formidable institutional gauntlet for legislative proposals, requiring that they obtain majorities in each house of Congress and then secure approval from the President (or extraordinary majorities in Congress). The Constitution also seeks to assure some independent authority for the executive branch and the judiciary by removing the selection and tenure of these officers from immediate congressional control. Ultimately, almost all executive and judicial action depends on prior statutory authority and funding from Congress. And it is impossible to say with confidence when a legislative enactment (apart from an actual BILL OF ATTAINDER—imposing criminal sanctions on particular individuals) would be so specific and peremptory as to infringe the essential law-applying authority of the executive or the judiciary. But in practice the institutional reality of the SEPARATION OF POWERS usually does preserve a protective screen of independent judgment between the legislative will and the force of law as applied.

Direct limitations on legislative power in the Constitution are perhaps the most dramatic legacy of the Framers' distrust of legislative power, but they are probably not the most efficacious or important. From the outset, Congress has been emboldened to exercise powers beyond those specifically enumerated in Article I, either by construing implied powers or appealing to the requisites of national SOVEREIGNTY. The Supreme Court sought to give some force to these limitations in the early decades of this century in order to prevent Congress from preempting the legislative authority of the states. But these efforts were repudiated by the Court after the 1930s and the repudiation of judicially enforceable limits has been explicitly reconfirmed in the current era. Even the limitations imposed by the BILL OF RIGHTS on behalf of individual liberty have very rarely been construed by the Supreme Court in ways that threatened federal legislation.

As it has expanded, however, federal legislative power has also been dispersed in striking ways. In recent decades, the federal courts, invoking vague or general constitutional clauses, have assumed the power to impose elaborate requirements on states and localities in a more or less openly legislative (law-creating) manner. Meanwhile, since the 1930s, Congress has delegated more and more legislative power to federal administrative agencies. Though Congress retains the ultimate power to block what courts and agencies do, its passivity may or may not be properly construed as acquiescence. Thus the dispersal of legislative powers seems to threaten the central promise in the modern conception of law—that there is always an identifiable human authority to hold responsible for the law.

JEREMY RABKIN
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1955 The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutional Law. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1985 Constitutional Conflicts between Congress and the President. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

LEGISLATIVE PURPOSES AND MOTIVES

Article I of the Constitution vests all legislative powers in the Congress of the United States. Congress is thus ordained to be the policymaking arm of the government. Since Congress exercises this authority through the separate flexing of 435 members of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES and the 100 members of the SENATE, the statutes passed by Congress are always collective works—written, amended, and propounded by many. As a result, discerning a single purpose or motive for most statutes is not easy.

An individual member of Congress proposes legislation to solve a problem. As that proposal winds its way through the legislative process, many forces affect the proposal and its meaning. Witnesses favoring and opposing the proposal testify before committees, and their testimony may present an interpretation altogether different from that intended by the proposal's sponsor. While the bill remains in committee, amendments may be offered and voted upon, further changing the purposes or effects of the proposal. Constituents, hearing about the proposal, will express their views to their representatives, voicing still other potentially competing concerns and perceptions about the proposal. After the proposal comes out of the committee, frequently in amended form, it is further refined and amended in floor debate. Again, the purposes and perceptions of the legislators are vast and varied.

Once the proposal is approved in one chamber, the whole process is replicated in the other chamber. If further amendments are adopted in the second chamber, the differences between the two chambers' versions are ironed out in a "conference committee," consisting of legislators from both chambers. Only when the House and Senate approve an identical bill does the proposal go to the President for his approval.

With such a tortuous journey to complete, a piece of legislation rarely survives its odyssey with a clear purpose intact. As a result, judges and lawyers must devote much of their time and attention to the process of interpreting statutes. Although the judges, lawyers, and lawmakers have developed many rules and strictures for performing this task, there is much disagreement on what rules or strictures apply in a particular case.

Sometimes a legislative body will seek to ease the task of interpretation by putting a "preamble" or "statement of purposes" into the statute. Unfortunately, such efforts frequently end up as broad platitudes that do not help readers to discern more subtle nuances, such as the LEGISLATIVE INTENT or purpose of a statute. On occasion, the preamble is used to reassure dubious legislators that the statute does not have the effect that its plain words imply. Because these preambles are usually included as window dressing, most courts have rejected efforts to use the preamble to "trump" the plain meaning of the words of the statute. The title of a statute can also be misleading as to the law's real purposes. An infamous example from one of the state legislatures involved a statute entitled An Act Relative to Sheep and Swine that also imposed a residence requirement for candidates for public office.

The rules that the courts use in interpreting statutes are usually called the "canons of construction." There are perhaps a dozen well-known canons that are most frequently employed. The most commonly accepted canon is the "plain-meaning rule," which requires that a court first look at the words of the statute without regard to the floor debate or committee reports. On this view, if the plain meaning of the statute can be discerned from such a review of the wording, the court should look no further; the statute should be construed in accord with such plain meaning. Few statutes lend themselves easily to the plain-meaning approach. When the meaning is not clear, both judges and lawyers differ as to where to look next. Some look to the floor debate, and others look to the committee reports that accompany such a legislative proposal when it goes to the floor for debate. Some judges and scholars apply other canons of construction, on the theory that the legislators knew and used such canons in deciding what words to use. Still others delve into the testimony of committee witnesses for clues about congressional intent. All of the congressional activities that took place before the statute was passed are called collectively the "legislative history" of the statute. Because the activities are so multifarious, use of legislative history by the courts is sometimes disparaged as being comparable to a performer looking out at an audience and waving to his friends.

There is not much to indicate that the legislators in fact do their work with the canons of construction in mind. One of the canons states that expression of one thing excludes another, similar thing. Legislators frequently will insert specific amendments to emphasize a particular concern without considering this canon. Another canon (ejusdem generis) states that when an enumeration of examples is followed by a general catchall phrase, the catchall phrase can apply only to persons or things of the same general kind or class that were specifically mentioned. Notwithstanding this canon, the statutes and court decisions are full of examples where the catchall phrase was not so limited. In any event, the canons frequently contradict each other, and even when they are consistent, they are not always consistently applied.

All agree that the individual expressions of purposes by individual members of Congress ought not be controlling—not even when such an expression comes from the sponsor of the legislation. Statements of purpose voiced after the statute is passed are almost never given any weight; the theory of legislative interpretation turns on deciphering the purposes of the legislative body before the statute was voted upon.

Even the record of congressional debate may be suspect. Members of Congress frequently engage in artificial floor debate in an effort to influence the way in which a statute will be interpreted in the future. A dialogue will be written out between two or more members in which questions of interpretation of particular parts of the statute will be asked and answered. Because these dialogues usually involve only a few members and are not voted upon by the entire membership, the weight to be accorded such "debate" should be light. However, many judges are beguiled by such artificial legislative maneuvers.

Congress sometimes avoids elaborating the minute details of its intent by delegating the effectuation and elaboration of its purpose to an ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCY. A large number of statutes establish agencies to administer programs created by Congress. Two examples are the Environmental Protection Agency, which is mandated to administer and enforce the environmental laws passed by Congress, and the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is mandated to administer and enforce the securities laws passed by Congress. The laws usually provide that an appeal may be taken from the final decision of the administrative agency to the federal courts. In such an appeal, the interpretation placed on the statute by the agency charged with its administration is to be given great weight by the reviewing courts. Unless the agency has violated the plain meaning of the statute, the courts are supposed to defer to whatever interpretation the agency places upon the statute. The theory behind this doctrine, derived from Chevron USA, Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council (1984), is that the agency has been charged by Congress to be the main actor in that particular field, and the courts should not interfere with the discretion exercised by the agency.

Many STATE CONSTITUTIONS require the state legislatures to enact statutes limited to a single subject. This limitation makes it easier for the legislators and the citizenry to know what is in a statute and assists courts in interpreting the meaning of a statute. The United States Constitution has never contained such a limitation, and Congress routinely includes a variety of provisions and subjects in a single bill. A single continuing appropriation bill passed by the Congress can contain substantive law provisions covering a wide range of topics. Because some of these provisions are inserted during floor debate and do not have much legislative history, it is frequently difficult to decipher a provision intention or purpose except from the brief explanation that may be made by the sponsor.

Finding the legislative purpose or motive of a particular statute is one of the difficult tasks given over to administrative agencies and the courts.

ABNER J. MIKVA
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution; Securities Law and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

FRANKFURTER, FELIX 1947 Some Reflections on the Reading of Statutes. Columbia Law Review 47:527–546.

LLEWELLYN, KARL N. 1950 Remarks on the Theory of Appellate Decision and the Rules or Canons About How Statutes Are to Be Construed. Vanderbilt Law Review 3:395–406.

MIKVA, ABNER J. 1987 Reading and Writing Statutes. University of Pittsburgh Law Review 48:627–637.

LEGISLATIVE VETO

The legislative veto emerged in the 1930s as an effort to reconcile two conflicting needs. Executive officials sought greater discretionary authority, while Congress wanted to retain control over delegated authority without having to adopt new legislation for that purpose. The resulting accommodation permitted administrators to submit proposals that would become law unless Congress acted to disapprove by simple resolution (a one-house veto) or concurrent resolution (a two-house veto). Evolving forms of the legislative veto came to include requirements of congressional approval as well as opportunities for disapproval; Congress even vested some of the controls in its committees.

Although the legislative veto acquired a reputation as a congressional usurpation of executive power, initially the device favored the President. In 1932 Congress authorized President HERBERT C. HOOVER to reorganize the executive branch. His plans would become law within sixty days unless either house disapproved. The President did not have to secure the support of both houses, as would have been necessary through the regular legislative process. Instead, the burden was placed on Congress to veto his initiatives. Furthermore, to prevent presidential proposals from being buried in committee, filibustered, or changed by Congress, the law limited each opportunity for legislative veto by rules for discharging committees, restricting congressional debate, and prohibiting committee or floor amendments.

The executive branch began to view the legislative veto apprehensively when Congress attached it to statutes governing such important subjects as lend lease, IMMIGRATION, public works, energy, IMPOUNDMENT, federal salaries, foreign trade, and the WAR POWERS. As part of the congressional reassertion after the VIETNAM WAR and WATERGATE, legislative vetoes proliferated in the 1970s. By the late 1970s, Congress seemed on the verge of subjecting every federal regulation to some form of legislative veto.

The lower federal courts upheld some legislative vetoes and invalidated others, but carefully restricted their opinions to the particular statutes challenged. In 1982, however, the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS for the District of Columbia Circuit struck down three laws on such broad grounds as to cast a shadow of illegality over every type of legislative veto. The Supreme Court adopted this comprehensive approach in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), invalidating the Immigration and Nationality Act's authorization for either house of Congress to set aside the attorney general's decision to suspend the DEPORTATION of an alien.

Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, joined by five Justices, wrote the OPINION OF THE COURT. The one-house legislative veto in Chadha was unconstitutional because it violated both the principle of BICAMERALISM and the presentment clause of the Constitution, which requires every bill, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the SENATE and the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES is necessary (except a vote of adjournment) to be presented to the President. Whenever congressional action has the "purpose and effect of altering the legal rights, duties and relations of persons" outside the legislative branch, the Court said, Congress must act through both houses in a bill presented to the President.

Justice LEWIS F. POWELL concurred in the judgment on a narrower ground. Justice BYRON R. WHITE delivered a lengthy dissent, generally supporting the constitutionality of the legislative veto. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST also dissented, but only on the question of SEVERABILITY. He said that if the Court declared the legislative veto invalid, it should also strike down the attorney general's authority to suspend deportations.

The majority's opinion raises numerous questions. First, in holding the legislative veto severable from the attorney general's authority, the Court ignored clear evidence of a quid pro quo between Congress and the President. If severability could be discerned in this legislative history, presumably it can be found in nearly every statute establishing a legislative veto. This reasoning gives the executive branch a temporary one-sided advantage from an accommodation meant to balance executive and legislative interests.

Second, the Court asserted that the legislative veto's efficiency or convenience would not save it "if it is contrary to the Constitution. Convenience and efficiency are not the primary objectives—or the hallmarks—of democratic government. . . ." Although the legislative veto might be a "convenient shortcut" and an "appealing compromise," the Court said, it is "crystal clear from the records of the Convention, contemporaneous writings and debates, that the Framers ranked other values higher than efficiency." Here the Court played loose with history, for efficiency was indeed an important consideration for the Framers. The decade prior to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION saw an anxious and persistent search for a form of government that would perform more efficiently than the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION.

Third, the Court characterized the presentment clause as a means of giving the President the power of self-defense against an encroaching Congress. The President's veto would check "oppressive, improvident, or ill-considered measures." This argument is misleading in suggesting that the legislative veto, by evading the President's veto, threatened the independence of the executive branch. In fact, the legislative veto was directed only against measures submitted by the President. Congress could not amend his proposals, but must vote yes or no. A legislative veto, if exercised, simply reestablished the status quo. For example, if either house defeated a reorganization plan the structure of government would remain as before. The President did not need his veto for purposes of "self-defense."

Fourth, the Court said that the Framers had unmistakably expressed their "determination that legislation by the national Congress be a step-by-step, deliberate and deliberative process." But both houses of Congress regularly use "shortcut" methods that pose no problems under Chadha: suspending the rules, asking for unanimous consent, placing legislative riders on appropriations bills, and even passing bills that have never been sent to committee.

The Court's theory of government contradicts practices developed over a period of decades by the political branches. Neither administrators nor members of Congress want the static model proffered by the Court. The conditions that spawned the legislative veto over a half-century ago have not disappeared. Executive officials still want substantial latitude in administering delegated authority; legislators still want to maintain control without having to pass new legislation. Surely the executive and legislative branches will develop substitutes to serve as the functional equivalent of the legislative veto. Forms will change; the substance will not.

Instead of a one-house veto over executive reorganization, Congress is likely to require a joint resolution of approval. This device, which satisfies the tests of bicameralism and presentment, requires the President to obtain the support of both Houses within a specified number of days. If one house withholds its support, the effect is a one-house veto.

Internal House and Senate rules offer another option. Congress can require that funds be appropriated only after an authorizing committee has passed a resolution of approval. Although this procedure amounts to a committee veto, the Justice Department may acquiesce, accepting Congress's distinction between authorization and appropriation and reasoning that Congress can control its own internal processes.

Congress can also attach a rider to an appropriations bill to prevent an agency from implementing a proposed action. Because a President will rarely veto an appropriations bill (and probably will never do so because of an objectionable rider), the practical effect of this device is that of a two-house veto. Indeed, House-Senate comity will often produce the effect of a one-house veto.

Statutes can require that selected committees be notified before agency implementation of certain programs. Notification raises no constitutional issue, for it falls within the report-and-wait category already sanctioned by court rulings. But "notification" can become a code word for prior committee approval. Only in unusual circumstances would an agency defy the wishes of its oversight committees.

After Chadha, Congress will continue to use informal and nonstatutory methods to control the executive branch. Congress allows agencies to shift funds within an appropriation account provided they obtain committee approval for major changes. Agencies comply because they want to retain this administrative flexibility. Because these "gentlemen's agreements" are not placed in statutes, they are unaffected by Chadha. They are not legal in effect. They are, however, in effect legal.

Last, Congress has continued to authorize legislative vetoes in statutes adopted after Chadha. Although these provisions are unconstitutional under the Court's decision, agencies are likely to abide by them rather than alienate powerful support committees on Capitol Hill. When the practical needs of executive officials and legislators coincide, they nearly always prevail over formalistic notions of SEPARATION OF POWERS.

LOUIS FISHER
(1986)

Bibliography

BOLTON, JOHN R. and ABRAMS, KEVIN G. 1984 The Judicial and Congressional Response to the Invalidation of the Legislative Veto. Journal of Law and Politics 1:299–355.

STRAUSS, PETER L. 1983 Was There a Baby in the Bathwater? A Comment on the Supreme Court's Legislative Veto Decision. Duke Law Journal 1983:789–819.

SYLVESTER, KATHLEEN 1984 After Chadha, A Legal Void. National Law Journal, April 23, 1984, pp. 1, 8, 10.

LEHMAN v. SHAKER HEIGHTS

See: Captive Audience

LEISY v. HARDIN
135 U.S. 100 (1890)

Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER, speaking for a six-member majority, ruled that because Congress possesses an EXCLUSIVE POWER under the COMMERCE CLAUSE to regulate interstate transportation, no state may enact a liquor PROHIBITION statute that bars the sale in that state of liquors imported from other states and sold in their original packages. That Congress had not exercised its commerce power was equivalent to a declaration that commerce shall be free. Any DOCTRINE to the contrary, deriving from the LICENSE CASES (1847), said Fuller, was "overthrown." Congress might, however, specifically authorize a state to ban interstate liquors; the Court sustained such an act of Congress in In re Rahrer (1891).

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

LELAND, JOHN
(1754–1841)

A native of Massachusetts and a Baptist minister, John Leland preached in Virginia from 1776 to 1791, becoming a leader in the Baptists' struggle against the Anglican church establishment there and helping to bring about its dismantlement. At first he opposed the federal Constitution on the grounds that it lacked a BILL OF RIGHTS and safeguards against taxsupported clergy; but he later switched his stand—possibly converted by JAMES MADISON personally—and swung Virginia's Baptists behind ratification.

Leland held that state attempts to foster religion only corrupted religion. A defender of both civil and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, he supported religious rights for all, repudiating the notion of a Christian commonwealth. He opposed attempts to halt Sunday mail delivery, and by denying that government had power to pass sabbath laws, proclaim public days of prayer, or pay chaplains, he assumed a more radical stance on church and state than did most contemporary evangelicals.

THOMAS CURRY
(1986)

Bibliography

BUTTERFIELD, L. H. 1952 Elder John Leland, Jeffersonian Itinerant. American Antiquarian Society Proceedings 62:155–242.

LEMON v. KURTZMAN
403 U.S. 602 (1971) (I)
411 U.S. 192 1973) (II)

This case involved one of the school aid statutes produced by state legislatures in the wake of BOARD OF EDUCATION V. ALLEN (1968). Lemon I stands for three cases joined for decision by the Court. Lemon challenged the constitutionality of a Pennsylvania statute that authorized the Superintendent of Public Instruction to reimburse nonpublic schools for teachers' salaries, textbooks, and instructional materials in secular subjects. Erley v. DiCenso and Robinson v. DiCenso (1971) challenged a Rhode Island statute that made available direct payments to teachers in nonpublic schools in amounts of up to fifteen percent of their regular salaries.

Both statutes were unconstitutional, Chief Justice WARREN BURGER concluded, and he set forth a threefold test which continues to be invoked in ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION cases: any program aiding a church-related institution must have an adequate secular purpose; it must have a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion; and government must not be excessively entangled with religious institutions in the administration of the program. The Pennsylvania and Rhode Island schemes provided GOVERNMENT AID TO RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS. Burger argued that in order to see that these dollars were not used for religious instruction, the states would have to monitor compliance in ways involving excessive entanglement.

Lemon v. Kurtzman returned to the Court (Lemon II) two years later on the question of whether the Pennsylvania schools could retain the monies that had been paid out in the period between the implementation of law and the decision of the Supreme Court invalidating it in Lemon I. In a PLURALITY OPINION for himself and Justices HARRY BLACKMUN, LEWIS F. POWELL, and WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, Chief Justice Burger held that they could. An unconstitutional statute, he suggested, is not absolutely void but is a practical reality upon which people are entitled to rely until authoritatively informed otherwise. Justice BYRON R. WHITE concurred. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, joined by Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and POTTER STEWART, dissented. Douglas argued that there was "clear warning to those who proposed such subsidies" that they were treading on unconstitutional ground. "No consideration of EQUITY," Douglas suggested, should allow them "to profit from their unconstitutional venture."

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

LEMON TEST

The Lemon test is the three-part formula used by the Supreme Court to decide whether or not a government action violates the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE. The first part requires that the government action have a secular purpose; the second part demands that the action neither advance nor inhibit religion as its primary effect; and the final part dictates that the act not cause an excessive entanglement between church and state. The test was first announced in LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971), though its major components date back, at least, to the majority opinion in ABINGTON TOWNSHIP SCHOOL DISTRICT V. SCHEMPP (1963).

The test's first prong remained noncontroversial throughout most of the 1970s, with the Court invariably finding a secular purpose for statutes under review. Then came the Court's decision in Stone v. Graham (1979), which struck down a Kentucky law requiring the posting of the Ten Commandments in public classrooms. Kentucky claimed that the purpose of the posting was to inform students of the influence of the Ten Commandments on secular history—and, in fact, the Commandments were to be accompanied by a message pointing out their influence on the development of Western law. But the Court found this "avowed" secular purpose insufficient and claimed that the state's actual purpose was to promote religion. This distinction between "actual" and "avowed" secular purposes was adopted by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR in her restatement of the Lemon test in LYNCH V. DONNELLY (1984), and the distinction became increasingly important thereafter. In WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1984) the Court struck down a law providing for a schoolroom moment of silence because the legislators' actual motive was to promote religion; and in Edwards v. Aguillard (1987) the Court invalidated for the same reason Louisiana's Balanced Treatment Act, which claimed to promote ACADEMIC FREEDOM in the discussion of CREATIONISM.

The actual-purpose approach has drawn serious criticism; the most sustained critique of the approach was delivered by Justice ANTONIN SCALIA in his dissent in Aguillard. If religious motivation by itself invalidates a piece of legislation, wrote Scalia, then a great deal of legislation indeed may have to be invalidated: "Today's religious activism may give us the Balanced Treatment Act, but yesterday's resulted in the abolition of slavery, and tomorrow's may bring relief for famine victims." Moreover, if the Court really wants to strike down legislation on the basis of motivations, it had better go about it in a more thorough manner. Scalia suggested that to ascertain the dominant motivation behind a bill reliably, one would need to tally the views of every legislator. Scalia's criticism may have had an effect, for Justice O'Connor took a step back from the actual-purpose standard in her majority opinion in WESTSIDE COMMUNITY SCHOOLS V. MERGENS (1990).

But the first prong of Lemon is not the only part of the test to spark debate in recent years; controversy has also erupted over its second prong—spurred in part by the Court's maze of contradictory decisions involving GOVERNMENT AID TO RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS. Seeking greater clarity in the application of the second prong, Justice O'Connor has convinced a majority of her colleagues to reformulate it. The inquiry under the second prong has shifted from determining the primary effect of a government act to ascertaining whether the government action has "in fact conveyed a message of endorsement or disapproval" of religion. Under this new inquiry, an act may (or may not) violate the establishment clause, regardless of whether it advances or inhibits religion as a primary effect; the crucial factor is the public message conveyed by the act.

Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY has been the Court's most vocal critic of O'Connor's endorsement inquiry, and in COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY V. AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION (1989) he offered his own reformulation of Lemon's second prong in response. Kennedy's reformulation prohibits two types of government action: direct government benefits that tend to establish a state religion, and government coercion to engage in religious activity. Kennedy's opinion was joined by Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST and Justices Antonin Scalia and BYRON R. WHITE. All four Justices have indicated a dislike for the Lemon test, and Kennedy may be laying the groundwork to replace it altogether.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Religious Fundamentalism; Separation of Church and State.)

Bibliography

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1986 The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. Chapter 6. New York: Macmillan.

THEUER, JEFFREY S. 1988 The Lemon Test and Subjective Intent in Establisment Clause Analysis: The Case for Abandoning the Purpose Prong. Kentucky Law Journal 76:1061–1075.

LEMON TEST
(Update)

In LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971), the Supreme Court announced a three-part ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE test, under which a challenged government action, to be valid, must satisfy each of the following criteria: (1) it must have a secular purpose, (2) its "primary effect" must neither advance nor inhibit religion, and (3) it must not create an "excessive government entanglement with religion." The Court applied this test regularly for about fifteen years. Since the mid-1980s, however, the test increasingly has been criticized as excessively hostile to religion, historically misguided, and incoherent. Although the three Lemon factors remain relevant to judicial decisions, their strength has been modified substantially, and the future of even this modified Lemon test remains uncertain.

Only rarely has the Court invalidated a statute under the first part of the Lemon test. In Stone v. Graham (1979), the Court held that a statute requiring posting of the Ten Commandments in public classrooms was unconstitutional for want of a secular purpose. Similarly, in WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1984) and Edwards v. Aguillard (1987), the Court invalidated statutes that required, respectively, a moment of silence in public classrooms and the teaching of creationism in public schools. In other cases, the Court readily has found a secular purpose and proceeded to Lemon's effects and entanglement inquiries.

The Court has developed and modified its criteria for unconstitutional effects and entanglement primarily in cases reviewing GOVERNMENT AID TO RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS. Through the 1970s and 1980s, the premise of the Court's effects analysis was that religious schools are "pervasively sectarian" institutions in which religious and secular education are inextricably intertwined; accordingly, any "direct and substantial aid" to religious schools' "educational function" unconstitutionally advances religion. On this approach, modified substantially in recent years, the Court was most concerned that government-paid teachers or guidance counselors, sent into religious schools to perform even secular tasks, might conform to the sectarian environment and engage in religious indoctrination. The Court invariably invalidated such programs. Government must be certain that its employees do not engage in religious indoctrination, the Court said, and the sectarian environment made such certainty unattainable. Furthermore, even when government tried to avoid these unconstitutional effects—by monitoring its aid programs to ensure that they neither provided nor subsidized religious indoctrination—the Court held that these monitoring efforts unconstitutionally entangled government and religion.

The high-water mark of this approach came in the 1985 companion cases, School District of Grand Rapids v. Ball and AGUILAR V. FELTON. Even by that time, however, sharp criticism had begun to develop, both off the Court and among the Justices. The year before, in her LYNCH V. DONNELLY (1984) concurrence, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR had proposed what she called a "clarification" of the Lemon test, under which courts should inquire whether government has acted with the purpose or effect of conveying its endorsement or disapproval of religion. Alongside this endorsement test, O'Connor presented a weakened version of the Lemon entanglement inquiry. O'Connor's approach was less aggressively separationist than the conventional Lemon analysis, but more demanding than the other theories that began to proliferate on the Court.

One of those other theories was the "nonpreferentialist" approach that then-Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, announced in his 1985 Wallace v. Jaffree dissent. According to Rehnquist, the establishment clause's meaning is defined by its drafters' intention to bar only governmental preference for one sect over another. Four years later, Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY proposed yet another alternative test, under which the clause prohibits government from coercing participation in religious activity or delegating government power to religious groups. While Kennedy obtained a bare majority for his opinion in LEE V. WEISMAN (1992), holding that a clergy-led SCHOOL PRAYER at a public-school graduation was unconstitutionally coercive, he was unable to persuade his majority that coercion is the appropriate test.

Many commentators in the late 1980s and early 1990s believed that the Lemon test was either dead or in its death throes. But the Court was unable to establish majority support for any of the alternative tests. Still, by 1994 it became clear that five Justices agreed on a more limited modification of the Lemon framework. In three separate opinions filed in BOARD OF EDUCATION OF KIRYAS JOEL VILLAGE SCHOOL DISTRICT V. GRUMET (1994), Chief Justice Rehnquist, and Justices O'Connor, ANTONIN SCALIA, Kennedy, and CLARENCE THOMAS, suggested OVERRULING the Ball and Aguilar PRECEDENTS at the next opportunity.

Those five Justices seized that opportunity in AGOSTINI V. FELTON (1997). Agostini's procedural context was unusual: the City of New York, still enjoined from providing the program of remedial instruction invalidated in Aguilar, moved for relief from the Aguilar judgment. This context had an important effect: under the Court's earlier interpretation of the relevant procedural rule, the Court could not change the law in its Agostini decision. Instead, the Court could only recognize post-Aguilar changes already in place. Agostini's five-Justice majority, with O'Connor writing, found those changes in WITTERS V. WASHINGTON DEPARTMENT OF SERVICES FOR THE BLIND (1986), and Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District (1993). Both decisions had held that if government aid is available generally and neutrally, without regard to the nature of the institution at which it is expended, then the program is not readily subject to establishment clause challenge. Both decisions, further, held that because the challenged aid reached religious schools only through recipients' private choices, the state had not unconstitutionally subsidized religious indoctrination.

In Agostini's revised establishment clause test, Lemon's purpose inquiry remains unchanged, and the clause still bars the effect of advancing or inhibiting religion. But entanglement now is but one of three factors in the effects test, not a separate inquiry. The other two criteria of unconstitutional effect are whether the government action results in government indoctrination—either by government employees' own actions, or by state subsidization of religious education—and whether the action operates by reference to religion.

Some aspects of this revision are clear. Agostini decisively repudiates the presumption that publicly employed teachers and guidance counselors are likely to engage in religious indoctrination when charged with purely secular tasks. Agostini is clear, also, that government monitoring for indoctrination is not by itself unconstitutional entanglement. But other aspects are unclear, particularly when one considers the issue of school vouchers, or SCHOOL CHOICE, that seems destined for Court review. On one hand, a program making vouchers available to all needy students, regardless of whether they attend sectarian or nonsectarian schools, would have the generality and neutrality that now point toward constitutionality. Further, whether vouchers actually benefit religious schools would depend on recipients' private choices—a second factor Agostini identified as favoring constitutionality. On the other hand, however, the Court could invalidate such a program as an unconstitutional subsidy to religious indoctrination. A comprehensive voucher program would have the two consequences Agostini considers relevant to unconstitutional subsidy: government money would flow into religious schools' coffers, and the program likely would relieve religious schools of costs they otherwise would have borne. A program making vouchers generally available for specifically religious education, not just for secular instruction, would go well beyond the programs so far approved.

No doubt one reason for Agostini's ambiguity is continuing disagreement as to the proper establishment clause test. Another reason concerns the case's procedural context, which prevented the Court from reformulating—or admitting it was reformulating—establishment clause DOCTRINE. The Court would have done better to reconsider Aguilar and Ball in a context that would have allowed Lemon's systematic reexamination. The Court's claim not to have innovated in Agostini is unpersuasive, and the apparent agreement on a constitutional test could dissolve in the next case, in which the Court would be more free to revise its doctrinal position.

That next case will be before the Court in its 1999–2000 term. The issue in Mitchell v. Helms (CERTIORARI granted on June 14, 1999) is whether the government may provide secular instructional materials, such as computers, to sectarian as well as non-sectarian schools. The lower court applied Lemon precedents from the 1970s to invalidate the challenged aid. Those precedents are at least in tension with Agostini's rendition of the Lemon test, and the Court may well overrule them. Because the Court will be free in Mitchell from the procedural complications that affected Agostini, it could use the case as a vehicle for altering the constitutional test more systematically—perhaps adopting one of the alternative tests that various Justices have urged in separate opinions, or perhaps adopting a compromise version that presses the neutrality theme less ambiguously than did Agostini. But the Court need not do so to uphold the aid challenged in Mitchell, and nothing indicates that the Court is less divided as to the ideal establishment clause inquiry than it has been in the past. The long-term durability of Agostini's modified Lemon test likely will remain uncertain until the Court considers the voucher issue.

HUGH BAXTER
(2000)

Bibliography

BAXTER, HUGH 1998 Managing Legal Change: The Transformation of Establishment Clause Law. UCLA Law Review 46: 343–457.

LAYCOCK, DOUGLAS 1997 The Underlying Unity of Separation and Neutrality. Emory Law Review 46:43–74.
LEVINSON, SANFORD 1997 Religious Language and the Public Square. Harvard Law Review 105:2061–2079.
LEVY, LEONARD W. 1986 The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. New York: Macmillan.
MCCONNELL, MICHAEL 1992 Religious Freedom at a Crossroads. University of Chicago Law Review 59:115–194.

LEON, UNITED STATES v.

See: Good Faith Exception

LESBIANISM

See: Bowers v. Hardwick; Same-Sex Marriage; Sexual Discrimination; Sexual Orientation; Sexual Preference and the Constitution

LETTERS OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL

Letters of marque and reprisal are commissions that governments of belligerent powers grant to private shipowners (called "privateers") authorizing them to seize the vessels and property of enemy subjects on the high seas. During the Revolutionary War both the STATES and the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS issued letters of marque; but the Constitution grants Congress the power to issue them and denies it to the states. Although not a signatory to the Declaration of Paris (1856), which condemned privateering as contrary to the law of nations, the United States has issued no letters of marque since that time.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

LEVER FOOD AND DRUG CONTROL ACT
40 Stat. 276 (1917)

The administration proposed this legislation to Congress, arguing that "the existence of a STATE OF WAR" made it "essential to the national security and defense" for the federal government to control the supply and pricing of food and fuel. By subjecting those industries AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST to federal regulation, Congress effectively delegated control of significant sectors of the economy to the President. Section 4, the heart of the act, outlawed the destruction, waste, hoarding, or price-fixing of commodities. Further sections, in an exceptionally broad DELEGATION OF POWER, authorized the President to regulate the food industry and to seize and operate "any factory, packing house, oil pipe line, mine, or other plant" engaged in commodity production.

In United States v. L. Cohen Grocery Company (1921), a unanimous Supreme Court struck down section 4 for failing to set adequate standards for prices. The criminal provisions unconstitutionally delegated "legislative power to courts and juries" and deprived "the citizen of the right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him," violating the Fifth and Sixth Amendments. Although the Court struck down particular provisions for VAGUENESS, it did not reach the issue of the government's authority to regulate prices under the WAR POWERS, and the Lever Act would later serve as a model for other regulatory legislation

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

LEVY v. LOUISIANA
391 U.S. 68 (1968)

GLONA v. AMERICAN GUARANTEE & LIABILITY INSURANCE CO.
391 U.S. 73 (1968)

In these decisions the Supreme Court began to subject legislative classifications based on ILLEGITIMACY of parentage to heightened judicial scrutiny. Both cases arose out of Louisiana's statute allowing an action for damages on behalf of the survivors of a decedent against a person who wrongfully caused the decedent's death. Levy invalidated, 6–3, a provision denying an illegitimate child the right to recover damages for the death of a parent, and Glona invalidated, 6–3, a corresponding provision disallowing a parent's recovery of damages for the death of an illegitimate child.

The two opinions for the Court, by Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, were very brief. Douglas purported to accept the RATIONAL BASIS STANDARD OF REVIEW. The rights asserted, however, involved "the intimate, familial relationship between a child and his own mother." And illegitimacy bore no relation to the nature of the harm inflicted in either case. The accident of a child's illegitimate birth did not justify denying his rights, and if the state sought to punish the mother of an illegitimate child for her "sin," denying her wrongful death damages was an irrational means for doing so.

It is plain that in these cases the Court was employing a standard of review considerably more demanding than its "rational basis" language suggested. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, for the dissenters, took note of this heightened scrutiny, and opposed it. Any definition of the plaintiff class in a wrongful death statute must be artificial; a biological definition would attune the law neither to degrees of love nor to degrees of economic dependence between decedents and survivors. It was not irrational for Louisiana to "simplify" its wrongful death proceedings by using formal marriage as the key to defining the plaintiff class.

Left unspoken by both Douglas and Harlan was the time-dishonored use of the law of illegitimacy in many southern states as a covert form of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in controlling the transmission of wealth from white fathers to their racially diverse offspring.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

LIBEL AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

A central historical question about the FIRST AMENDMENT is to what extent it embodied the received eighteenth-century legal traditions of English law and governmental practice as they were reshaped and renewed in the colonial, revolutionary, and formative periods in America. Or was the amendment a break from these traditions? This issue can be stated either as a question of the intent of the Framers and ratifiers or as a matter of the normative impact of an authoritative text, elaborated in our century within an institutional matrix of JUDICIAL REVIEW radically different from that of the eighteenth century on either side of the Atlantic. However the question be stated, the historical problem is in essence whether the First Amendment is to be regarded as expressing a principle of continuity with the received legal tradition or as constituting a declaration of independence from English law, thereby projecting the American law of freedom of expression on a path of autonomous development.

The general view emphasizes continuity, both as a matter of the original understanding of the Framers of the First Amendment and as a matter of the amendment's later—much later—doctrinal elaborations. Indeed, we conventionally measure continuity or discontinuity by reference to the basic conceptual dichotomy of the English legal tradition, as formulated by WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, the oracle of the COMMON LAW for the framing generation:

> where blasphemous, immoral, treasonable, schismatical, seditious, or scandalous libels are punished by the English law . . . the liberty of the press, properly understood, is by no means infringed or violated. The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state, but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public: to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press: but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity [Commentaries on the Laws of England, 1765, Bk. 4, chap. II, pp. 151–52].

The issue whether the First Amendment embraced or departed from the English legal tradition with respect to subsequent punishment tends to be fixed on the treatment of SEDITIOUS LIBEL. The historical argument for the law of seditious libel has been that government ought to have power to punish its most abusive or subversive critics because criticism of government contains the seeds of a variety of evils—disobedience to government, public disorder, even violence—and that no government can subsist if people have the right to criticize it or to call its agents corrupt or incompetent. This is seen in the work of Leonard W. Levy, ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, and others who have lately examined the First Amendment's historical foundations by looking at seditious libel as the exclusive focus for probing the question of continuity and discontinuity with respect to subsequent punishments. Having narrowed the issue to seditious libel, the scholarly tradition put the question of continuity and discontinuity in all-or-nothing terms: Does the First Amendment as a matter of original understanding, or as a matter of latter doctrinal connotation, repudiate or embrace the concept of seditious libel?

When a question about the relationship of a controversial legal tradition to a broadly phrased constitutional text is put in such terms, the answers are likely to fall out along dialectical lines. So it has been with the rejection-or-reception issue concerning seditious libel. The heated debate on the question by the Federalists and Republicans in connection with the passage of the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS of 1798 has been echoed through our history. In modern scholarship, the dialectic begins in 1919 when Zechariah Chafee, troubled deeply by the World War I ESPIONAGE ACT prosecutions, wrote in the Harvard Law Review that the Framers of the First Amendment "intended to wipe out the common law of SEDITION, and to make further prosecutions for criticism of the government, without any incitement to law-breaking, forever impossible in the United States of America." Six months later, and plainly in emulation, Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES added the weight of his and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS's authority to the Chafee thesis, when he declared in his great dissent in the Abrams case: "I wholly disagree with the argument . . . that the first Amendment left the common law as to seditious libel in force. History seems to me against the notion." But the Chafee position never won the broad adherence that most modern scholars seem to think it had. In the World War I free speech cases before the Supreme court, John Lord O'Brien, who briefed the cases for the Justice Department, stated as the official view of the government that seditious libel prosecutions were not rendered invalid by the First Amendment, either as a matter of original intent or as correctly understood in 1919. And others, including EDWARD S. CORWIN, dissented from the Chafee position. Indeed, Chafee himself seems to have changed his tune by 1949, at least on the issue of the Framers' original intent: "The truth is, I think, that the framers had no very clear idea as to what they meant by 'the freedom of speech or the press.' " The dialectic about seditious libel and the First Amendment entered a new phase with the publication of Leonard W. Levy's seminal work, Legacy of Suppression, in 1960. This book argued that with respect to the general conceptions of FREEDOM OF THE PRESS prevalent at the time of the framing and ratification of the First Amendment, there was no solid evidence of a consensus to move away from a purely Blackstonian conception of freedom, that is, a conception limited to protecting only against previous restraints. In particular, Levy found considerable evidence that supported the continuing validity of seditious libel prosecutions, and no clear evidence that any lawyer, pamphleteer, philosopher, or statesman repudiated the concept of seditious libel. There was, Levy recognized, a growing sense of the necessity of the defense of truth, although far from a clear consensus even on that. And there was also a growing insistence on the independent power of the jury in a seditious libel prosecution to determine the issue of truth and the question of the seditious quality of any publication, as well as the other factual issues in the case.

Levy's account of the relationship of the First Amendment as a formal constitutional limitation on the power of Congress and his overall conception of intellectual and legal history respecting freedom of expression has from the beginning been confused by the problem of FEDERALISM. At the same time that he has insisted that the conception of freedom of the press guarded against abridgment by the First Amendment does not invalidate seditious libel, he has described the amendment as denying any power whatever by Congress to legislate with respect to the press, except to protect COPYRIGHT. Thus, he concluded that Congress had no power to pass the Sedition Act of 1798, but on federalism grounds, not because the Sedition Act violated any understandings about press freedom embodied in the First Amendment. The states and the federal courts remained empowered to try seditious libel prosecutions.

But Levy's interpretation of the "Congress shall make no law" language in the First Amendment has taken a distant backseat, in his own writing and in that of others, to his overriding emphasis that "the freedom of speech or of the press" was not understood to repudiate the concept of seditious libel. In other words, the First Amendment was understood to embody a Blackstonian conception of freedom of expression as a matter of original intent.

In NEW YORK TIMES CO. V. SULLIVAN (1964) the Supreme Court gave an authoritative modern answer to the question whether prosecution of seditious libel would survive the First Amendment. An advertisement in March 1960, placed by supporters of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., in the New York Times; recited the repressive activities of Alabama police with several minor inaccuracies and exaggerations. An Alabama jury awarded a local official $500,000 damages against the New York Times. The Supreme Court reacted with sweeping changes in the constitutional status of defamation law. Libel would no longer be viewed as a category of expression beneath First Amendment protection. Instead, the Court found that the political repudiation of the Sedition Act of 1798 had revealed the "central meaning" of the First Amendment: a right to criticize government and public officials. As the Court put it, "[A] rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all his factual assertions . . . leads to . . . 'self-censorship.' " The Alabama act, "because of the restraint it imposed upon criticism of government and public officials," was inconsistent with the First Amendment.

In place of actual falsity as a basis for liability, the Court imposed a new standard to govern defamation actions brought by public officials. Now, a public official could recover damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct only upon a showing "that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."

Sullivan effected important changes in constitutional law and practice. Defamation law previously had been left to the states, subject to gradual common law evolution in state courts not often exposed to First Amendment issues. Sullivan federalized this diversity of local rules into a single national body of doctrine overseen by a Court peculiarly sensitive to First Amendment problems. Furthermore, the intangibility of defamation law had left wide discretion in trial court juries; Sullivan imposed independent appellate court review of the facts in defamation actions as a First Amendment guarantee. And, in place of the complexity of overlapping liabilities, offsetting privileges, and jurisdictional diversity, Sullivan instituted a simple national rule that put a stringent burden of proof on plaintiffs.

Decisions following Sullivan extended the "actual malice" limitation on the law of defamation beyond the case of criticism of high public officials. The rule was expanded to apply to PUBLIC FIGURES in Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts and Associated Press v. Walker (1967). A plurality of the Court even stretched the rule to cover private figures, if the matter was "a subject of public or general interest," in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc. (1971). But the Court retreated from Rosenbloom three years later in GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974). Gertz held that a private person may recover without meeting the actual malice standard. Because private figures have only limited access to the media to correct misstatements of others, and because they have not assumed the risk of injury due to defamatory falsehoods against them, the Court found the interests of private figures to weigh more heavily than those of public figures. The states were left free to establish an appropriate standard of liability, provided they do not impose liability without fault. Moreover, the states were forbidden from awarding presumed or punitive DAMAGES absent a showing of actual malice. More recently, in DUN & BRADSTREET, INC. V. GREENMOSS BUILDERS, INC. (1985), the Court retreated still further, permitting recovery of presumed and punitive damages by a private plaintiff without a showing of actual malice, because the defamatory statements did not involve a matter of public concern.

The defamation decisions beginning with New York Times Co. v. Sullivan have had the twofold effect of highlighting the core purpose of the First Amendment and constitutionalizing the law of defamation. By invalidating the law of seditious libel, the Court recognized that criticism of government is the type of speech most deserving of First Amendment protection. By establishing minimum standards of liability and limitations on damages for public figures and some private plaintiffs, the Court federalized the law of defamation.

BENNO C. SCHMIDT, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. 1964 The New York Times Case: A Note on "The Central Meaning of the First Amendment." Supreme Court Review 1964:191.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1960 Legacy of Suppression: Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1984 Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press.

LIBEL AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT (Update)

The structure of the Supreme Court's libel DOCTRINE has changed very little since the mid-1980s—remarkably so given the breadth and depth of dissatisfaction that this doctrine has engendered. While NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964) deservedly remains an icon of modern FIRST AMENDMENT law, Sullivan's progeny—an extensive and highly complex body of cases constitutionalizing almost every aspect of the law of defamation—has come under attack for failing to protect the legitimate interests of either defamed individuals or the press and other speakers. Yet the Court's libel law doctrine by now has acquired, seemingly despite itself, the virtue of stability—an achievement itself likely to prevent any ambitious reform proposals from making headway.

Sullivan derives its importance from two essentially independent features. First, the decision stands as the Court's strongest statement of general First Amendment principle—that the "central meaning" of the First Amendment, revealed in the controversy over the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS of 1798, is to protect against all infringements the right of a sovereign people to criticize government policy and public officials. Second, the decision began the process by which the Court brought the federal Constitution to bear on the state COMMON LAW of defamation. In the course of this doctrinal development, the Court provided some level of constitutional protection to libelous speech extending far beyond attacks on official conduct.

The Court put in place the main building blocks of its libel law doctrine in the two decades following Sullivan. First, in Curtis Publishing Company v. Butts (1967), the Court held that the "actual malice" standard adopted in Sullivan for libel cases brought by public officials also applied in cases brought by PUBLIC FIGURES. The latter, just like the former, would have to show that the speaker had acted with knowledge of a statement's falsity or reckless disregard as to its truth. Although the Court tried on several occasions to put some limits on the "public figure" category, lower courts have interpreted it expansively, to apply both to celebrities of all kinds and to any individual involved, voluntarily or not, in any sort of public controversy. Next, in GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974), the Court held that private figures must prove negligence (itself a heightened standard compared to the common law rule of strict liability) to recover compensatory damages and actual malice to obtain presumed or PUNITIVE DAMAGES. Because of the difficulty of proving actual injury to reputation, as well as the expense of bringing libel litigation, many private figures subject to Gertz discover that their suits are tenable only with evidence of actual malice. Finally, the Court held in DUN & BRADSTREET V. GREENMOSS BUILDERS, INC. (1985) that in the small category of cases in which a private figure is defamed on "a matter of purely private concern" (like the faulty credit rating in the case), the actual malice standard does not apply to any part of the litigation. The upshot of the system is that the actual malice standard today governs most libel cases, although the occasional plaintiff manages to escape its strict proof requirements.

Since Dun & Bradstreet, the Court has tinkered with the actual malice standard, while also elaborating on the lesser included requirement of proving a defamatory statement's falsity. In Anderson v. Liberty Lobby (1986), the Court held that a public figure can defeat summary judgment only by showing with "convincing clarity" sufficient evidence of actual malice to create a genuine issue of material fact. And in Harte-Hanks Communications v. Connaughton (1989), the Court made clear that the actual malice standard requires proof of a libel defendant's actual state of mind, so that purposeful avoidance of truth, but not a gross failure to comply with professional standards, can establish the requisite liability. Further increasing the difficulty of bringing a libel suit, the Court held in Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps (1986) that not only public but also private figures bear the burden of proving a defamatory statement's falsity, at least if the speech is of public concern and the defendant is a member of the media. With respect to the nature of this proof, MASSON V. NEW YORKER MAGAZINE, INC. (1991) adopted as a constitutional requirement the common law rule that the falsity at issue must be material.

One problem with this body of law is sheer complexity. The Court now categorizes libel suits along multiple dimensions. The primary distinction, established in Gertz, relates to the status (public or private) of the plaintiff. A secondary but still important distinction relates to the nature (public or private) of the speech. This inquiry functions in two ways: by entering into the initial determination whether a plaintiff is a public or private figure (because one way to become a public figure is to participate in a "public controversy") and then, as held in Dun & Bradstreet, by dividing the private-figure category into two. Finally, a possible distinction lurks between media and nonmedia defendants; in Hepps and several other cases, the Court explicitly reserved the question whether this distinction too should have constitutional relevance. The intricate, even convoluted nature of this categorical scheme, governing as it does every important aspect of libel litigation, ill comports with the Court's usual concern for certainty and predictability in matters affecting FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

A related though more comprehensive problem is that the Court's libel doctrine often manages to frustrate the interests of both sides in libel cases—and in doing so, to frustrate as well the interests of the public. Application of the Sullivan rule usually deprives falsely defamed individuals of the ability to obtain monetary damages or any other effective remedy for reputational injury, however grievous. By the same token, application of the rule may prevent the public from ever learning of the falsity of widely disseminated libelous statements. The justification for accepting these consequences is that the actual malice standard promotes what the Sullivan Court called "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open" debate by removing the press's fear of liability for inevitable errors. Whether this trade-off makes sense may depend on whether the speech at issue lies at the core of First Amendment protection, as was true in Sullivan, or nearer to its periphery, as in the many libel cases involving celebrity gossip. But even if this issue is set to one side, the question remains whether the trade-off is in fact a trade-off—whether, that is, the public gets the uninhibited debate promised for the price paid. With regard to this question, the press routinely claims, and probably with good reason, that although the actual malice regime reduces the number of libel judgments, it greatly increases the size of judgments and, even more important, the costs of defense. Current libel law thus may thwart the correction and remedy of false defamatory statements without in any way lessening the self-censorship that the Sullivan Court acted to prevent.

This arguably miserable accommodation of competing interests spawned in the 1980s a kind of cottage industry in proposals for reforming libel law. Most of these proposals relied on reduced damage awards rather than heightened standards of liability to strike the appropriate balance in the area. One proposal would have relieved the libel plaintiff of any burden of proving fault, but offered as a remedy only a declaratory judgment of the defamatory statement's falsity. Other variants would have allowed the plaintiff to recover modest actual damages or given the plaintiff a choice between bringing a no-money, no-fault suit and trying to recover unlimited damages under the actual malice standard. The essential idea of this reform movement was to create a low-cost mechanism for correcting defamatory error, which would protect better than the Sullivan regime both reputational and free speech interests.

Even as these proposals multiplied, however, the Court's libel law doctrine began to acquire a surprising air of permanence. The Court took fewer and fewer libel cases in the 1990s, and the few decisions it did issue had little significance. Perhaps the Court believed that its accommodation of interests was superior to any of the alternatives. Or perhaps the Court thought that the need for stability counseled against further changes, even if a different approach might have been better in the first instance. Regardless of the cause, libel doctrine at the turn of the century seems settled in a way that few commentators would have predicted in the mid-1980s. And this very rootedness, with its attendant virtues, makes the prospects for the significant reforms urged at that time ever more unlikely.

ELENA KAGAN
(2000)

Bibliography

ANDERSON, DAVID 1991 Is Libel Law Worth Reforming? University of Pennsylvania Law Review 140:487–554.

EPSTEIN, RICHARD 1986 Was New York Times v. Sullivan Wrong? University of Chicago Law Review 53:782–818.

FRANKLIN, MARC A. 1986 A Declaratory Judgment Alternative to Current Libel Law. California Law Review 74:809–845.

KAGAN, ELENA 1993 A Libel Story: Sullivan Then and Now. Law and Social Inquiry 18:197–217.

LEVAL, PIERRE N. 1988 The No-Money, No-Fault Libel Suit: Keeping Sullivan in its Proper Place. Harvard Law Review 101:1287–1302.

LEWIS, ANTHONY 1991 Make No Law: The Sullivan Case and the First Amendment. New York: Random House.

POST, ROBERT C. 1986 The Social Foundations of Defamation Law: Reputation and the Constitution. California Law Review 74:691–742.

SCHAUER, FREDERICK 1984 Public Figures. William and Mary Law Review 25:905–935.

——— 1992 Uncoupling Free Speech. Columbia Law Review 92:1321–1357.

SMOLLA, RODNEY A. 1986 Suing the Press: Libel, the Media, and Power. New York: Oxford University Press.

SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1984 Hard Defamation Cases. William and Mary Law Review 25:891–904.

LIBERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONSTRUCTION

The liberal attitude toward the Constitution—admitting a range of internal differences—centers on the proposition that the Framers, as talented a group of democratic politicians as ever lived, expected their descendants to be at least as experimental as they were. When the Framers gathered in Philadelphia, they were improvising a novus ordo seclorum without a blueprint. JOHN ADAMS, working feverishly in London compiling the history of attempts at republican government, tried to summarize the lessons of history. JAMES MADISON had prepared himself by reading every relevant work that he and his mentor THOMAS JEFFERSON, then in Paris, could lay their hands on. ALEXANDER HAMILTON was satisfied that Thomas Hobbes had provided the essentials.

But delegates to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 mainly brought with them their experience in running provincial, state, and Confederation government. Collectively they had well over a thousand years of experience in office, from governor and Chief Justice down to mayor and justice of the peace. Of the fifty-five chosen, forty-four were, or had been, members of the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS; at a time when being a lawyer was very different from emerging from a law school assembly line and vanishing into a vacuum-packed corporate enviroment, thirty-five had done their apprenticeships, and JAMES WILSON and GEORGE WYTHE were eminent professors and legists. The only outstanding absentees from the political class were JOHN JAY a secretary of foreign affairs under the Confederation; John Adams in London; Thomas Jefferson in Paris; and PATRICK HENRY who was elected but refused to attend as he "smelt a rat," that is, he thought Jefferson was masterminding the convention through Madison, as had been the case in the Virginia legislature with the VIRGINIA STATUE OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Although with the exception of Madison and perhaps Hamilton they had not arrived with specific plans, they clearly shared a sense of mission: The United States government under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION had to be strengthened to prevent the infant nation from being eaten by the sharks that infested the international environment. Here the presence of GEORGE WASHINGTON was of immense symbolic value because of his known dedication to the principles of a free republic and the respect he had from the people. Washington was unanimously elected president of the Convention.

The Framers were well aware that they were not free-floating Platonic "guardians" who could impose their concept of a "republic" upon an unresisting populace. Hence, when the final document was signed on September 17, its principal architects considered it the best they could get rather than the fulfillment of an ideal. George Washington put it well in a letter: "You will readily conceive . . . the difficulties which the Convention had to struggle against. The various and opposit [sic] interests which were to be subdued, the diversity of opinions and sentiments which were to be reconciled; and in fine, the sacrifices which were necessary to be made on all sides for the General Welfare, combined to make it work of so intricate and difficult a nature that I think it is much to be wondered at that any thing could have been produced with such unanimity."

Hamilton and Madison, disappointed by the convention's rebuff to their centralizing initiative, agreed that the Constitution was an improvement over the Articles and set to work to get it ratified. South Carolina's PIERCE BUTLER probably spoke for most of his fellow Framers when he wrote, "View the system then as resulting from a spirit of Accommodation to different Interests, and not the most perfect one that the Deputies cou'd devise for a Country better adapted for the reception of it than America is at this day, or perhaps ever will be."

In the course of RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION by the state conventions, questions inevitably arose on the meaning of various articles. When one reads the replies that were given—in a universe wholly lacking in modern communications techniques—it rapidly becomes clear that a number of the delegates often were not quite sure what they had approved. They knew that in general terms they had established a republic with strong legislative and executive branches—the judicial article received little attention either in the Convention or in ratification debates—and hoped that the new government would provide the United States with the authority and the funds that were so sorely lacking under the Articles.

To head off a potentially dangerous demagogic anticonstitutionalist attack—claiming in essence that Hobbes's Leviathan was being covertly imposed on unsuspecting citizens—the Framers promised a BILL OF RIGHTS. The Constitution was ratified, the states organized presidential and congressional elections for that fall, and the Founding Fathers set to work finding appropriate positions for themselves and their friends in the new administration. Now they had to make this experiment in republican government work.

To summarize, the Framers had not descended from Mount Sinai with the Law carved in stone; they had contrived a mechanism designed to establish law and, if necessary, change it. The FIRST CONGRESS, for example, set up the Treasury Department as a dependency of Congress with the secretary reporting in person or in writing to the House and Senate. Alexander Hamilton's masterful recommendations on the public credit, the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, and the encouragement of manufactures were in the form of reports to Congress. In practice, however, the secretary was responsible to the President, and the law was later changed to reflect this. The Constitution requires the President to get the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the Senate to treaties; the advice provision vanished after Washington's one attempt to discuss pending Indian treaties with the Senate ended on such a chilly note that no President since has made the pilgrimage.

Indeed, there is a substantial body of evidence to suggest that the widely discussed "intent of the Framers" is a will-o'-the-wisp. We know their intention on structural matters—the division of powers between the executive, legislative, and judicial branches—but beyond that, things get murky. Once again the First Congress gives us a sense of the extent to which the Framers were not sure of their own objectives, for an intense debate arose over the question of the Senate's role in the President's dismissal power. In other words, if Senate approval is necessary for the appointment of, say, an ambassador, is Senate approval required to fire him? The consensus seemed to be that it was not, but the matter was not settled until MYERS V. UNITED STATES in 1926, and even today there is some ambiguity on the status of members of so-called independent regulatory commissions.

Without going into further detail, it is obvious that early generations of politicians and jurists were more concerned with how a problem could be solved than with how the Framers would have dealt with it. ABRAHAM BALDWIN, one of the most intelligent men who was both a politician and jurist, put it thus to his House colleagues in March 1796:

> It was not to disparage [the Constitution] to say that it had not definitely, and with precision, absolutely settled everything on which it had spoke. He had sufficient evidence to satisfy his own mind that it was not supposed by the makers of it at the time but that some subjects were left a little ambiguous and uncertain. It was a great thing to get so many difficult subjects definitely settled at once. . . . The few that were left a little unsettled might without any great risk be settled by practice or by amendments. . . . When he reflected on the immense difficulties and dangers of that trying occasion—the old Government prostrated and a chance whether a new one could be agreed on—the recollection recalled to him nothing but the most joyful sensations that so many things had been so well settled, and that experience had shown there was very little difficulty or danger in settling the rest.

This liberal spirit of experimentation was brilliantly exemplified by the Supreme Court under the leadership of Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL. Marshall's enmity toward his cousin Thomas Jefferson was surely fortified by the latter's penchant (at least before and after he served as President) for STRICT CONSTRUCTION of the Constitution. In the famous 1819 case MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND, the Chief Justice, in the course of echoing Hamilton's 1791 defense of the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States, took some time out to condemn this unimaginative perception of the nature of the Constitution. Wrote Marshall:

> A constitution to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature therefore requires that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose these objects be deducted from the nature of the objects themselves. . . . To have prescribed the means by which government should in all future time execute its powers . . . would have been an unwise attempt to provide by immutable rules for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can best be provided for as they occur.

Five years later in the steamboat case of GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) the Chief Justice really dispatched the narrow-minded critics of federal power: "Powerful and ingenious minds taking as postulates that the powers expressly granted to the government of the Union are to be contracted by construction into the narrowest possible compass, and that the original powers of the states be retained if any possible construction will retain them, may by a course of well-digested but refined and metaphysical reasoning, founded on these premises, explain away the constitution of our country and leave it a magnificent structure indeed to look at, but totally unfit for use." So much for metaphysicians and political philosophers.

In concrete terms Marshall's talent for improvisation to cope with pressing problems was spectacular. He invented the doctrine of POLITICAL QUESTIONS to provide the Court with a safe exit from risky enfilades in Foster v. Nielson (1829); in AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY V. CANTER (1828) he belatedly provided the constitutional rationale for acquiring new territories and, while he was at it, invented LEGISLATIVE COURTS, created under Article I and distinct from the CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS of Article III; and, to mention only two more, he developed the ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE in BROWN V. MARYLAND (1827) and the status of Indian tribes as "dependent domestic nations" in Worcester v. Georgia (1831). One could argue that John Marshall, following in the footsteps of the Framers (and he had been a delegate to the Virginia ratifying convention), set the pattern of creative experimentation for liberal CONSTITUTIONALISM.

Rather than compiling a catalog of constitutional improvisations, many of which have been initiated by the executive (ABRAHAM LINCOLN moved the power to suspend the writ of HABEAS CORPUS into Article II, where it has since remained) and the legislature (Congress in 1871 conferred citizenship on corporations for federal jurisdictional purposes), it would be wise to narrow the inquiry to a few specific areas. For example, what do steamships and television waves have in common? The answer is that they are subject to regulation by the federal government under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. The first stages in this triumph of fungibility were easy, for interstate water shipping, interstate railways, interstate trucking, and interstate telegraphs were tangible. The big jump took place in 1933 when the Supreme Court, in Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Bros., held radio waves to be analogous to telegraph signals and subsequently widened this to include television. The principle applied was Marshall's, namely, that it did not make any difference whether a boat was propelled by sail or engine; the vital aspect was that something was going from one state to another.

The liberal approach to constitutionalism has infuriated a lot of individuals and groups of all political persuasions. The focus here is not on whether the experiments were successful but on the modus operandi. At some points the improvisations were considered politically "reactionary" (for example, when the Court in the YELLOW DOG CONTRACT Case assumed that individual workers and industrial giants were bargaining-table equals and when it negated state minimum-wage laws). In other cases a howl went up that the Justices were "radical" (for example, when the Court protected criminal rights and when it legitimized ABORTION). Whatever the outcome, the result was founded on the experimental attitude. To put it differently, it would be extremely difficult to find a decision in which the majority view was buttressed by better probative evidence of the intention of the Framers than was the view of the dissenting minority.

To say that experimentation has been the only game in town since 1787 is a statement of historical fact, a fundament of the liberal tradition. Indeed, one could argue that the one area where stasis set in and experimentation became increasingly difficult and finally impossible was the mesh of SLAVERY and STATES' RIGHTS, leading to a ferocious Civil War in which roughly a million males out of a population of sixteen million ages fifteen to thirty-nine were killed or wounded. The Constitution of 1787 was a sanguinary failure.

If this is the liberal attitude toward the Constitution, what are the critical differences between it and the conservative view? In candor, it is hard to find substantial differences at the level of principle, for America's so-called conservatives have always found themselves carrying the intellectual baggage of that magnificent cadre of improvisers who founded the Republic. In Ireland in the 1690s many a big house had a portrait of the king over the mantelpiece mounted on pivots top and bottom. When the Jacobites came to town one pushed the picture around to display King James II; when the forces of William and Mary appeared, a similar push put their visages front and center. The problem with such a portrait in the context of the founding era is that the same portraits would appear on both sides: conservative constitutionalists have always endorsed experimentation sub silentio, but then denied that this in fact was their methodology. Presumably they have learned the technique at the feet of John Marshall.

For example, JOHN C. CALHOUN has been described as a man of rigid conservative principles, the hero of the states' rights cause. Yet in 1817 Calhoun casually observed that the Constitution "was not intended as a thesis for the logician to exercise his ingenuity on it. It ought to be construed with plain good sense."

Similarly, Robert H. Bork has become an icon of contemporary conservative jurisprudence, but in his book The Tempting of America: The Political Seduction of the Law (1990) he provides us with an example of the liberal, experimental mode worthy of John Marshall himself. In discussing BAKER V. CARR (1962)—which required states to establish election districts based on the formula ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE—Bork excoriated the WARREN COURT not for the result ("There is no doubt in my mind . . . that plaintiffs [demanding the end of rigged districting] deserved to win") but because the Court based its decision on the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

As it happens, the authors of the Fourteenth Amendment, like the Framers, had a talent for ambiguity, so it is an exercise in soothsaying to attempt a reconstruction of the precise meaning of equal protection. Let us simply say that the jury is still out, and will doubtless remain out indefinitely, on the legal consequences the drafting Committee of Fifteen had in mind in 1866. What is interesting is Bork's solution to the inequities created by malapportionment and how he explicates the constitutional rationale that would enable those who "deserved to win" to win. Let no one deny his imaginative creativity: he indicates that the Court could have avoided the equal protection quagmire quite simply by using the provision in Article IV, section 4, that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT."

This provision, launched by Madison in the VIRGINIA PLAN, was discussed on two occasions during the Convention. The weight of the evidence suggests it was designed to prevent any state from setting up, or having imposed upon it from without, a monarchical form of government. When it was invoked by the Dorrite rebels against the obsolete Rhode Island Charter in 1849, the Court said in LUTHER V. BORDEN that the legitimacy of Rhode Island's government was a "political question"; and when the clause was subsequently invoked in a desultory fashion in several other cases, the Justices echoed Chief Justice ROGER BROOKE TANEY's decision in Luther and held that the determination of republican governance was nonjusticiable.

Bork states that "for no very good reason" the Court held the proviso to be judicially unenforceable and suggests it should be overruled after 113 years as STARE DECISIS. Actually, some supporters of the liberal, experimental approach who thought of this at the time of COLEGROVE V. GREEN (1946) (the first major assault on malapportionment) and hit a brick wall would cheer Bork on. However, the historical evidence for the use of the "guarantee clause" is tenuous, at least as flimsy as that underpinning the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, for at the time of the ratification of the Constitution malapportionment was a major concern in a number of states. ELBRIDGE GERRY, a Framer, refused to sign the document, but not because it forbade the GERRYMANDER. It would seem that even Bork cannot resist temptation. As David Hume pointed out, creating a useful past is a delightful form of political entertainment. It is also a persistent highlight of American judicial behavior.

JOHN P. ROCHE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Bork Nomination; Cherokee Indian Cases; Conservatism; Justiciability; Original Intent; Political Philosophy of the Constitution; Pragmatism; Progressive Constitutional Thought; Progressivism.)

Bibliography

BORK, ROBERT H. 1990 The Tempting of America: The Political Seduction of the Law. New York: Free Press.

JACKSON, ROBERT H. 1941 The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy. New York: Knopf.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1988 Original Intent and the Framers' Constitution. New York: Macmillan.

MCDONALD, FORREST 1985 Novus Ordo Seclorum. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.

PETERSON, MERRILL 1987 The Great Triumvirate. New York: Oxford University Press.

ROCHE JOHN P. 1961 Courts and Rights. New York: Random House.

——— 1974 Shadow and Substance. New York: Macmillan.

WARREN, CHARLES 1922 The Supreme Court in United States History, 2 vols. Boston: Little, Brown.

LIBERALISM

In today's America the term "liberalism" is circulated mainly by those who pronounce it with scorn—by the political right and by academic theorists who have little else in common with the right. Yet the American nation was conceived in liberalism. The DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE proclaimed the liberal ideals of individual liberty, legal equality, and the rule of law. It also embraced the liberal doctrine that located the legitimacy of governmental power not in divine right but in the consent of the governed.

The Constitution, too, was mainly seen by its Framers through liberal lenses. What they saw was a SOCIAL COMPACT deriving its authority from "the people of the United States" and designed in major part to serve liberal purposes: "to establish justice," "to secure the blessings of liberty," and by dampening the causes of civil strife, "to insure domestic tranquility." What they did not see—or would not see—was the fundamental inconsistency of SLAVERY with all these purposes. Putting this enormity out of their minds, the Framers of the Constitution and the BILL OF RIGHTS saw the chief source of oppression in the power of the state and placed much of their hope for achieving liberal ends in a system of LIMITED GOVERNMENT.

The limits were both structural and substantive. Liberty was to be achieved both by the dispersal of the powers of government (see FEDERALISM; SEPARATION OF POWERS) and by broadly worded prohibitions on various kinds of governmental interference with the rights of individuals. Although the liberalism of the Framers was strongly influenced by the Enlightenment's notions of rationality, these substantive limitations were not the product of abstract reason. Rather, they were designed to serve intensely practical purposes for the new nation. The liberal doctrines of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, for example, seemed essential to the citizen participation on which the continued legitimacy of government would depend. Similarly, the liberal doctrine rejecting divine authority as the basis for governmental legitimacy served the cause of domestic peace. The Framers, well versed in recent British history, need not stretch their imaginations to see how the interactions of religion and government might plunge a nation into civil strife. A major purpose of both the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE and the guarantee of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY was to promote tolerance and thereby to moderate religion's capacity for political divisiveness.

Today's Constitution, the product of two centuries' worth of interpretation, differs dramatically from the Constitution of the Framers. Yet, what Louis Hartz called "the liberal tradition" has remained central in American constitutional law, surviving political and social upheavals and even a civil war of our own. Like all paradoxes, this contradiction of continuity and change is more apparent than real. Over the years liberalism, like the Constitution, has taken on a series of new meanings in response to changes in America's economic, social, and political conditions. Jacksonian democracy, the CIVIL WAR and RECONSTRUCTION, the late-nineteenth-century industrial expansion, the NEW DEAL, and the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT each brought a new version of liberalism that made its mark on the Constitution. The constitutional law of our time—like the term liberalism itself—evidences overlays of all these eras of social change, from the days of Adam Smith to the days of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. The decisions of the Supreme Court, the nation's leading expositor of the Constitution, have both reflected the transformations of liberalism and contributed to them.

In the nation's early years the individualist liberalism of JOHN LOCKE was tempered by a vision of REPUBLICANISM that imposed on the people's governors a moral responsibility to attune their public decisions to the general good, not merely their own self-interest or the interests of their constituents. This republican ideal was not wholly unrealistic so long as government was largely in the hands of the gentry. By around 1820, however, gentry rule had crumbled under the dual pressures of democratization and geographical expansion. In the era of ANDREW JACKSON the consent of the governed implied an electorate that was expanded to include most adult white men, and the body of citizens who could make effective use of individual freedom—especially economic freedom—was similarly expanded by a doctrine of equal liberties. The widening of the franchise was almost entirely the work of legislatures. The protection of economic freedom, however, became the business of the courts, acting in the name of the Constitution. The JUDICIAL ACTIVISM of the MARSHALL COURT (1803–1835) led the way in promoting a nationwide free-trade unit by striking down a number of state regulatory laws (see STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE; CONTRACT CLAUSE).

During the period before the Civil War, another doctrine of liberalism came to the fore, with major assists from the adherents of ABOLITIONIST CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY and from those who opposed SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES. "Free labor" became a slogan of the new REPUBLICAN PARTY and of ABRAHAM LINCOLN in particular (see LABOR MOVEMENT AND CONSTITUTIONAL DOCTRINE). The doctrine of free labor, infused with the liberal goals of democracy and individualism, received a strong impetus when the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION converted a war to save the Union into a war to free the slaves—a process that culminated in the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, ratified in 1865.

Generously interpreted, the Thirteenth Amendment might have served as a foundation for a sweeping constitutional guarantee of racial equality and for congressional legislation serving this end. The politics of Reconstruction impeded such an expansive interpretation, but did produce the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, with its broad guarantees of EQUAL PROTECTION and DUE PROCESS, and the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT, prohibiting racial discrimination in VOTING RIGHTS. The three Civil War amendments, along with a series of civil rights acts, were seen by their proponents as establishing a principle of equal citizenship that would carry out some of the unfulfilled liberal promises of the Declaration of Independence.

These hopes were soon dashed. By the end of the century, politics—North and South—had turned away from a concern for racial equality. The Supreme Court had followed suit in a series of decisions that converted the Civil War amendments and the Reconstruction CIVIL RIGHTS laws into guarantees of formal equality that offered little real protection for the substantive values of equal citizenship: respect, responsibility, and participation (see CIVIL RIGHTS CASES; PLESSY V. FERGUSON).

As politics increasingly turned to the business of industrial expansion, the dominant version of liberal individualism now focused on the freedom of industry and enterprise from ECONOMIC REGULATION. Beginning in the 1880s, for half a century the Supreme Court policed the boundaries of economic liberty, striking down a great many regulatory laws in the name of ECONOMIC DUE PROCESS and holding a number of federal statutes invalid as exceeding the power of Congress under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. During this period, and especially during WORLD WAR I and the Red Scare of 1919–1920, the Court gave little comfort to those who were urging a similarly expansive reading of other constitutional legacies of the Framers' liberal individualism—such as FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms.

It took the Great Depression and WORLD WAR II to effect a realignment that would give the center of the political stage to the liberalism of the New Deal. This rendering of liberalism, like the liberalism of Reconstruction, emphasized the necessity of substantive underpinnings for individual liberty. The New Deal's legislative program centered on economic democracy and social welfare, and to achieve these ends its leaders sought to guide the national economy with governmental regulation on an unprecedented scale. During the first term of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, an activist majority of the Supreme Court fought a rear-guard action against the new liberalism in the name of the old. In 1937, however, before Roosevelt had made a single appointment to the Court, the majority shifted. From that day to the present, the Court has routinely upheld economic regulation both by Congress and by the states and has also upheld the legislative framework of the modern welfare state (see TAXING AND SPENDING POWERS; SPENDING POWER). During the 1930s and 1940s, the Court also took its first steps toward reinvigorating the First Amendment.

All these developments in constitutional doctrine supported a liberalism in which equality meant not just formally equal laws but the substance of equal citizenship. The Court cooperated with the political branches in an effort to bring freedom and security to people who had been seen as outsiders and so to achieve a more inclusive definition of the national community. For a time, the Cold War, like the Red Scare before it, laid a restraining hand on political freedom and also marked a group of dissidents as outsiders. But just as the Cold War reached the peak of its influence on domestic politics, the new liberalism, with its impulse to extend the blessings of liberty to all Americans, took a giant step forward. The WARREN COURT opened the modern civil rights era with the decision in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954).

The Brown decision began a "second Reconstruction," not only by expanding the meaning of constitutional doctrines of racial equality, but also by providing a catalyst for a vigorous political movement, Congress responded with two momentous laws aimed at extending the substance of equal citizenship to the members of racial and ethnic minorities: the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 and the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. In its active liberal reshaping of constitutional doctrine, the Warren Court began in the civil rights field, but did not end there. Particularly during the last six years of the tenure of EARL WARREN as Chief Justice, the court not only extended judicial remedies for racial DESEGREGATION but also promoted political equality by ordering REAPPORTIONMENT of legislatures on the principle of "one person, one vote." The court also greatly expanded the substantive protections of the First Amendment and recognized a constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY. In the field of criminal justice the Court accomplished the INCORPORATION of nearly all the guarentees of the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Ammendment, thus applying them to the states as well as the national government. Furthermore, the court tightened the requirements of many of those guarantees, making th Constitution a significant limitation on police practices and the proceedures of state criminal courts.

Even after Chief Justice Warren retired in 1969, the constitutional momentum of the Warren Court carried the Court to further liberal activism. Most notably, the BURGER COURT in the 1970s expanded the reach of the equal protection clause to the field of SEX DISCRIMINATION and held in ROE V. WADE (1973) that the right of privacy largely forbade a state to criminalize a woman's choice to have an ABORTION. These two developments were closely related; women's right to control their own sexuality and maternity is critical to their ability to participate in society as equal citizens.

Political liberals generally have applauded all these constitutional developments. Yet each of them has produced its own "backlash" in the political arena. When President LYNDON B. JOHNSON signed the 1964 act into law, he predicted that the South would thus be handed to the Republican party. In Presidential politics, this prediction has been validated, starting with the successful "southern strategy" of RICHARD M. NIXON in 1968. Nixon explicitly criticized the Warren Court's decisions in the criminal justice area, and the four Justices that he appointed to the Court began the process that would eventually dismantle a considerable part of that doctrinal structure. As for civil rights, critics of the REHNQUIST COURT have said that the second Reconstruction lasted only a little longer than the first one did. In the 1980s a firm majority of the Court has embraced a doctrinal model centered on formal racial equality, sharply limiting the uses of AFFIRMATIVE ACTION and other group-based remedies for the group harm of racial discrimination. The right of privacy has not yet fulfilled its promise as a generalized protection of individual freedom in matters of intimate personal relations, but rather has been narrowed even in the area of abortion rights. Recent First Amendment developments are typified by the PUBLIC FORUM doctrine, which began as a means to expand expressive freedom and now serves mainly as a threshold barrier to turn away would-be speakers' claims. In the world of constitutional doctrine, as in the larger political world, modern liberalism has been obliged to assume a posture of defense.

The constitutional liberalism that animates political liberals today—and serves as the political right's bête noire—is a far cry from the liberalism of nineteenth-century economics that dominated constitutional doctrine for five decades. Its primary modern sources are the New Deal's social welfare concerns and the Warren Court's concerns for CIVIL LIBERTIES and for the inclusion of subordinated groups in the promise of America. Even so, today's liberalism continues to draw on the liberalism that infused the framing of the Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment: the rule of law, tolerance as a means to civil peace, individual rights to freedom from excessive governmental intrusion, and equal citizenship.

Although the political resistance to the New Deal had its main base in the business sector, today business has largely made its peace with the newer liberalism—not exactly embracing regulation, but accepting it. The most vehement opposition to affirmative action programs, for example, comes not from business groups, but from "social issues" conservatives who equally oppose the recognition of abortion rights or claims to sexual freedom. These citizens, who are presently the dominant voices on the political right, do not reject the liberal constitutional ideals of equality, individual rights, or tolerance, but argue that in recent decades liberals on the bench have abused their power to write a perverted version of those ideals into constitutional law.

For the "social issues" conservatives, these constitutional ideals are unchangeable; they took permanent shape when they were written into the Constitution. In this view constitutional equality means formally equal laws and no more; individual constitutional rights are limited to the specific rights of life, liberty, and property that the Framers had in mind; and the reach of constitutionally required tolerance is permanently confined by the morality of the Framers (see CONSERVATISM AND THE CONSTITUTION). They emphatically reject, for example, any claim to equality or rights of tolerance in the context of governmental discrimination on the basis of SEXUAL ORIENTATION, insisting that such matters be left to majoritarian community morality.

Constitutional liberalism is also under attack from quite another political direction, notably by theorists in the CRITICAL LEGAL STUDIES movement. These writers seek to "deconstruct" the very idea of rights by showing that all legal doctrine is indeterminate and therefore subject to manipulation in the interest of the powerful. Here, a countercurrent has developed among racial and ethnic minority writers who argue the practical utility of claims of rights in overcoming group subordination and point to the civil rights movement as an example of the liberating possibilities of rights—an argument the Framers of the Constitution surely would understand.

Another attack on liberalism by critical theorists, now joined by a number of feminist writers, centers on the potential of liberal-individualist attitudes for impoverishing the sense of self and submerging the sense of community responsibility—especially responsibility toward the down-and-out. Related to these concerns is the criticism that classical liberalism, locating the threat to individual freedom in the power of the state, neglects the oppressive capacity of nongovernmental actors, compounding the wrong by insisting on a strong publicprivate distinction. (See STATE ACTION—BEYOND RACE.)

From both sides, then, liberalism is challenged for undercutting the claims of community. A liberal tolerance may result in constitutional protections not only for consensual homosexual behavior but for racist speech or PORNOGRAPHY. (The antipornography cause in particular has produced an alliance between the political right and one branch of feminists.) Similarly, liberalism's long-standing devotion to Enlightenment-style rationality is under attack from both sides. The dominance of secular rationality is attacked by those who would promote SCHOOL PRAYERS or the teaching of CREATIONISM in public schools; and feminists and others argue that the instrumental rationality of the liberal welfare state's BUREAUCRACY is alienating and dehumanizing.

The critical theorists' critique of liberalism has yet to make a significant impact on constitutional law. The critique from the right, however, has been warmly received by the federal judiciary, which in large measure was reconstituted during the 1980s. Now it is liberal judges who are fighting a rear-guard action. Yet some important elements of the liberal constitutional inheritance from the New Deal and the Warren Court seem secure. Citizens at all points on the political spectrum continue to hold the federal government responsible for maintaining the health of the national economy, including high levels of employment. Although social welfare programs perceived as aiding the minority poor are anything but robust, SOCIAL SECURITY is the nearest thing we have to a political sacred cow, and some form of national health insurance seems likely to emerge soon. Explicit governmental discrimination against the members of subordinated racial or ethnic groups, we can assume, will be unconstitutional as long as we have the Constitution.

These examples are modest when they are measured against the modern liberal agenda; saying that the constitutional clock will not be turned back to 1950 or 1930 is not saying very much. For the moment, surely, liberals must seek their goals primarily in political arenas. In these arenas, however, we have already seen some important effects of racial equality in voting rights—for example, in the process of confirmation of Supreme Court Justices.

Undoubtedly, "the liberal tradition" will remain central in American constitutional jurisprudence because our constitutional culture is indelibly imprinted with the rhetoric of liberalism: equality, tolerance, individual rights. Another certainty, however, is that the meanings of these large abstractions will change in response to changes in American society. Today's political liberals will applaud some of those changes and regret others. But the process is one that no true liberal can lament.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

Bibliography

ALTMAN, ANDREW 1990 Critical Legal Studies: A Liberal Critique. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

CRENSHAW, KIMBERLÉ 1988 Race, Reform and Retrenchment: Transformation and Legitimation in Antidiscrimination Law. Harvard Law Review 101:1331–1387.

DIGGINS, JOHN P. 1984 The Lost Soul of American Politics: Virtue, Self-Interest, and the Foundations of Liberalism. New York: Basic Books.

FERGUSON, KATHY E. 1984 The Feminist Case Against Bureaucracy. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

HARTZ, LOUIS 1955 The Liberal Tradition in America: An Interpretation of American Political Thought Since the Revolution. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1989 Belonging to America: Equal Citizenship and the Constitution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

SHIFFRIN, STEVEN 1983 Liberalism, Radicalism, and Legal Scholarship. UCLA Law Review 30:1103–1217.

SMITH, ROGERS M. 1985 Liberalism and American Constitutional Law. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

UNGER, ROBERTO MANGABEIRA 1975 Knowledge and Politics. New York: Free Press.

WOLFF, ROBERT PAUL 1968 The Poverty of Liberalism. Boston: Beacon Press.

LIBERTY OF CONTRACT

See: Freedom of Contract

LICENSE CASES
5 Howard 504 (1847)

In three related cases decided the same day, the Court sustained the constitutionality of temperance statutes of states that had restricted the sale of liquor and required all dealers to be licensed. Although the Justices unanimously concurred in the disposition of the cases, six men wrote nine opinions, and there was no opinion for the Court because a majority could not agree on the reasoning. At one extreme Justice JOHN MCLEAN took the position that the DORMANT POWERS of Congress under the COMMERCE CLAUSE utterly excluded the exercise of CONCURRENT POWERS by the states; but McLean found that the statutes were not regulations of commerce but reasonable exercises of the POLICE POWER. At the other extreme Justice PETER DANIEL supported an exaggerated view of concurrent state commerce powers.

Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY' s view was the least doctrinaire. He observed that two of the three License Cases dealt with the retail sale of liquor that was no longer in the original package and therefore raised no INTERSTATE COMMERCE issue. (See ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE.) The third case, however, involved liquor imported in the original package from another state and sold in that unbroken package. Thus the business affected by the state's license law was in interstate commerce. Taney therefore confronted the question "whether the grant of power to Congress is of itself a prohibition to the States, and renders all State laws on the subject null and void." His answer to the question, unlike Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's, was that unless a state act came into conflict with a law of Congress, the state could constitutionally exercise a concurrent commerce power. On the other hand, he muddled his position by arguing that such a power was no more than the police power of the state, which he defined, promiscuously, as "nothing more or less than the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty to the extent of its dominions." His refusal to distinguish the police power from the commerce power and other powers left his opinion doctrinally murky, and like the opinions by the other Justices it failed to provide a usable test. At least two state judges, JAMES KENT and LEMUEL SHAW, avoided the Supreme Court's quest for a system of definitional categories by suggesting that if Congress did not brush away state legislation, it should be sustained in the absence of an actual or operational conflict with national legislation.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

LIEBER, FRANCIS

See: Commentators on the Constitution

LILBURNE, JOHN
(1614–1657)

John Lilburne, whose entire career was a precedent for freedom, was the catalytic agent in the history of the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. Primarily because of him, that right became a respected, established rule of the COMMON LAW. An agitator with an incurably inflamed sense of injustice, Lilburne was called Freeborn John, because of his incessant demands on behalf of the rights of every freeborn Englishman. No one in England could silence or outtalk him, no one was a greater pamphleteer, and no one was more principled in his devotion to political liberty, the rights of the criminally accused, and the freedoms of conscience and press. Making CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE a way of life, Lilburne successively defied king, parliament, and protectorate.

He first focused the attention of England on the injustice of forcing anyone to answer incriminating questions during his 1637 trial. After his release from prison in 1641, he joined the parliamentary cause, rose to a high military position, and became close to Oliver Cromwell; but he resigned his commission to be free to oppose the government. Four times he stood trial for his life, and he spent much of his last twenty years in jail, from which he smuggled out a torrent of tracts. He advocated a special CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION to write a constitution for England embodying the reforms proposed by the Levellers, the faction of constitutional democrats that he led.

When Parliament itself arrested and interrogated him, Lilburne became the first hostile witness in a LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATION to claim a right not to answer questions against or concerning himself. He successfully made the same claim, under his view of MAGNA CARTA and the PETITION OF RIGHT, before a common law court in 1649, when tried for TREASON. He appealed to the jury above the heads of the judges and convinced the jury to decide on the injustice of the laws used to persecute political prisoners. Twice he persuaded juries to acquit him. In his trials and writings he educated England on the relation of liberty to fair play and DUE PROCESS OF LAW. At his last trial he won the unprecedented right to secure a copy of the INDICTMENT against him and to be represented by counsel in a capital case. Cromwell finally imprisoned him without trial, and Lilburne died in jail.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1968 Origins of the Fifth Amendment. Pages 271–312. New York: Oxford University Press.

LIMITED GOVERNMENT

The idea of limited government is closely associated with political thinkers, mostly of medieval and modern periods, who placed special emphasis on preventing abuses of government. Some spoke of limitations connected with divine law and natural law; others spoke of a SOCIAL COMPACT establishing government for the sake of protecting property and other individual rights. Limited government was also a corollary of the more affirmative approach of ancient philosophers, who taught that ruling bodies could best maintain themselves by respecting social customs, moderating their policies, honoring the contributions of each social class in distributing governmental offices, and fostering self-restraint, patriotism, and other attitudes conducive to the general welfare.

In American constitutional thought limited government is often synonymous with CONSTITUTIONALISM itself. It has three more specific connotations resulting from the three principal ways in which the government can be said to be constitutionally limited: in a jurisdictional sense, limited in the objectives it may pursue; in a procedural sense, limited in the ways it may decide policy questions and adjudicate disputes involving individuals; and limited by the requirement that its policies be compatible with individual rights.

The first sense of limited government refers to the ENUMERATION OF POWERS through which the Constitution outlines the jurisdictional concerns of the national government. This method of limitation has failed. The enumeration of powers is now a dead letter as a result of the nationalizing tendencies of American economic and social life, which the Supreme Court has accommodated through its interpretations of the TENTH AMENDMENT, the COMMERCE CLAUSE, the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE, the GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE, and the CIVIL WAR amendments.

As for the second, or procedural, mode of limitation (structural limitations on policy formation and due process limitations on adjudication), some contemporary constitutionalists regard it as the only philosophically acceptable variety. These theorists tend to follow a value-neutral conception of constitutional democracy which is both at odds with citizen presuppositions about the goals of politics and supported by no compelling historical or philosophic argument. Respect for procedural ideas like SEPARATION OF POWERS, representative government, and DUE PROCESS is indeed central to American constitutionalism, but not because that tradition is indifferent to different ways of life and the ends of government. A traditional respect for procedure is rather an aspect of the Enlightenment commitment to liberal toleration or reasoning in human affairs, as opposed especially to precipitous decision and government in the name of divine authority. The value-neutral variety of proceduralism is inconsistent with this tradition because it denies the possibility of rationally defending the practices, conditions, and attitudes conducive to reasoning itself.

Americans typically associate limited government first and foremost with constitutional rights and JUDICIAL REVIEW. "By a limited constitution," wrote ALEXANDER HAMILTON in THE FEDERALIST #78, "I understand one which contains certain specified exceptions to the legislative authority; such, for instance, as that it shall pass no BILLS OF ATTAINDER, no EX POST FACTO laws, and the like. Limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice no other way than through the medium of courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution void."

Yet courts are also agencies of government, and groups throughout American history have opposed judicial protection of some rights as the least majoritarian and therefore least legitimate subordination of other rights. Some theorists believe society has a way of arriving at pragmatic adjustments of conflicting views (lax enforcement of laws against CONTRACEPTION and ABORTION, for example) that cannot be reconciled at the level of moral principle. They regard judicial intervention in behalf of those persons who brook no compromise as divisive to the point of undermining everyone's right to live in a peaceful society. Many citizens seem profoundly bitter over their loss of freedom to live and raise their children in communities that exclude sexually suggestive entertainment, political deviants, and others, including members of other races and religions. Their criticism of the judiciary's protection of rights suggests a community oriented understanding of rights, for they themselves want the right to be members of communities that use official power to exclude some kinds of people as equals or to exclude them altogether. This community-oriented conception is highly visible in the demands of some religious groups for organized prayer in public schools despite offense to others.

But a community orientation of sorts is also implicit in demands for public recognition of the RIGHTS OF PRIVACY like those involving property, sexual freedom, and conscience. In effect, persons who demand these rights seek the right to live in communities that honor the rights demanded. Rights to property, for example, are hardly secure if the general public is unwilling to exercise the restraint and undertake the sacrifices that honoring such rights entails. It is therefore not surprising that defenders of property should treat "free enterprise" as an article of the community's gospel and special identity. For if any rights are genuine exemptions from LEGISLATIVE POWER, their enjoyment must not be left to prudential calculation. And if the government has no authority to invade them, those rights must at once be grounded in higher authority and be essential to the nation's identity in a way that it would make no sense to violate them for the sake of saving the nation. The religious right wing of American politics has a point in contending that "secular humanism" is itself something of a religious imposition on fundamentalists, who are thereby forced to live among what they regard as evil practices. Maxims of liberal toleration are no answer to these people because liberals themselves cannot tolerate being governed by thoroughly dedicated fundamentalists—those who would live every aspect of their lives as they think they should, even if that should mean employing coercive government against those who would stop them. Religiously committed folk can be excused for believing that liberalism tolerates illiberalism only by degrading it to a form of play-acting to be confined to churches, the home, or wherever one goes for respite from the serious world of education, work, and government. Defending liberalism thus requires an argument (eventually a persuasive one) that liberalism is a better way of life—that, wherever feasible, it is better for human beings to have a liberal outlook and live in secular communities that tolerate illiberal speech only, not action.

Deepening ideological divisions in American life indicate that constitutional rights can place real limits on government only where public morality favors honoring rights. Hamilton said as much in The Federalist #84 where he criticized naïve reliance on BILLS OF RIGHTS to protect the rights themselves. "[W]hatever fine declarations may be inserted in any constitution," he said, the security of rights "must altogether depend on public opinion, and on the general spirit of the people and of the government." It follows that governments that would honor rights effectively should work for the social and economic conditions and attitudes that are favorable to honoring rights. If rights are to remain effective limits on government, the ends of government will have to include the virtue of its citizens. Limited government in a modern sense will have to converge toward limited government in an ancient sense.

SOTIRIOS A. BARBER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Checks and Balances; Unwritten Constitution.)

Bibliography

BARBER, SOTIRIOS A. 1984 On What the Constitution Means. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

BERNS, WALTER 1982 Judicial Review and the Rights and Laws of Nature. Supreme Court Review 1982:49–83.

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1928 The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 42:149–365.

DWORKIN, RONALD 1981 The Forum of Principle. New York University Law Review 56:469–518.

PURCELL, EDWARD A., JR. 1973 The Crisis of Democratic Theory. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky.

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM
(1809–1865)

Abraham Lincoln of Illinois served as President of the United States during the nation's greatest crisis, the CIVIL WAR. He had previously represented Illinois in the HOUSE

OF REPRESENTATIVES for a single term (1847–1849), during which he introduced the SPOT RESOLUTIONS, implicitly critical of President JAMES K. POLK's administration of the Mexican War, and supported the WILMOT PROVISO, which would have banned slavery from the territory acquired in that war. Lincoln rose to national prominence opposing the policies of Senator STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, especially Douglas's KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT, which extended SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES on a local-option basis. In 1856 he joined the fledgling Republican party. Lincoln opposed Douglas's reelection to the Senate in 1858, and the two candidates toured the state together, publicly debating the issues of slavery, POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY, and CONSTITUTIONALISM. During the LINCOLN-DOUGLAS DEBATES, Lincoln severely criticized Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY's decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) as a betrayal of the principles embodied in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Lincoln's election to the presidency in 1860 triggered the long-impending SECESSION of several slaveholding southern states. Lincoln's presidency was devoted to saving the Union, which meant, in his mind, the rededication of the nation to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and especially to the proposition that all men are created equal. This work of saving the Union, tragically cut short by an assassin's bullet, was Lincoln's great contribution to American constitutionalism.

In the Lincoln Memorial, directly behind the statue of the Great Emancipator, these words are inscribed:

> In this temple > as in the hearts of the people > for whom he saved the Union > the memory of Abraham Lincoln > is enshrined forever.

Lincoln did indeed save the Union. But the Union Lincoln saved was older than the Constitution; the Constitution was intended to form a "more perfect Union." When Lincoln began the Gettysburg Address with the magisterial "Fourscore and seven years ago . . ." he intended his listeners to understand that the birth date of the nation was 1776, not 1787, and that the principles of "government of the people, by the people, for the people" were those of the Declaration of Independence. The Constitution was intended to implement those principles more perfectly than had been done by the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. Lincoln at Gettysburg also intended his listeners—and the world—to know that there would be "a new birth of freedom" that would be accomplished by the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION, followed, as he intended that it would be, by the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT. (We may be confident that, had he lived, Lincoln would also have given his support to the FOURTEENTH and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS, as part of that same "new birth.")

To understand the Constitution as Abraham Lincoln did must mean, primarily and essentially, to understand the Constitution as an expression of the principles of the Declaration. To do this is to separate the interpretation of the Constitution from all forms of legal positivism, historicism, and moral relativism, that is to say, from all those forms of interpretation that are dominant today in the law schools, universities, and courts of the nation. For, contrary to Lincoln's expectations, his words at Gettysburg have been greatly noted and long remembered: it is their meaning that has been forgotten.

Lincoln did indeed save the Union. At the time of his inauguration, March 4, 1861, seven states had already seceded and joined together to form an independent government called the Confederate States of America. JAMES BUCHANAN, the outgoing President, had been confronted with the SOUTH CAROLINA ORDINANCE OF SECESSION on December 20, 1860, six weeks after Lincoln's election, and more than ten weeks before his inauguration. Buchanan declared secession to be unconstitutional, but coupled his denunciation of secession with a much harsher denunciation of abolitionism. He denied, moreover, that he as President could take any lawful action against secession. Whatever action the federal government ought to take, he lamely concluded, must originate in laws enacted by Congress. But Buchanan had nothing to suggest to Congress, and Congress, at this juncture—the representatives of eight slave states remaining on March 4, 1861—was as divided as the nation itself. No congressional majority could have been formed then for decisive action against the rebellion. Lincoln waited until Congress had gone home, and cannily maneuvered the South Carolinians into firing those shots against Fort Sumter that electrified the North and consolidated public opinion behind his leadership. He then issued his call for 75,000 troops, and set on foot those measures that eventually resulted in the forcible subjugation of the rebellion.

Lincoln insisted that the Constitution ought not to be construed in such a way as to deny to the government any power necessary for carrying out the Constitution's commands. The Constitution required the President to take an oath "to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution," and made it the duty of the President to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Lincoln held it to be absurd to suppose that it was unlawful for him to do those things that were indispensably necessary to preserve the Constitution by enforcing the execution of the laws. Even an action that might otherwise be unlawful, he said, might become lawful, by becoming thus indispensable. Lincoln never conceded that any of his wartime actions were unconstitutional. But supposing that one of them had been so, he asked, ". . . are all the laws but one to go unexecuted, and the Government itself go to pieces, lest that one be violated?"

Lincoln saved the Union. He prevented the United States from being divided into two or more separate confederacies. It was entirely likely that the North American continent would have been "Balkanized" had the initial secession succeeded. Like the Balkan states, the petty American powers would have formed alliances with greater powers, and North America would have become a cockpit of world conflict. All the evils that the more perfect Union was designed to prevent, those particularly described in the first ten numbers of THE FEDERALIST—large standing armies, heavy taxation, the restriction of individual liberties characteristic of an armed camp—would have come to pass. Civil and religious liberty, the supreme ends of republican government, would, with the failure of the American experiment, "perish from the earth." The "central idea of secession," Lincoln held, "is the essence of anarchy." A constitutional majority, checked and limited, and able to change easily with deliberate changes in public opinion and sentiment, "is the only true sovereign of a free people." To reject majority rule is to turn necessarily either to anarchy or to despotism.

The Lincoln Memorial says that Lincoln saved the Union for "the people." At the outset of the war Lincoln said, "This is essentially a people's contest." Today, when the foulest despotisms call themselves "people's republics," it requires a conscious effort to restore to our minds the intrinsic connection in Lincoln's mind between the cause of the people and fidelity to individual liberty under the rule of law in a constitutional regime. "Our adversaries," Lincoln said, at the outset of the war, "have adopted some declarations of independence, in which, unlike the good old one, penned by THOMAS JEFFERSON, they omit the words 'all men are created equal.' Why? They have adopted a temporary national constitution, in the preamble of which they omit, 'We the People,' and substitute 'We, the deputies of the sovereign and independent States.' Why? Why this deliberate pressing out of view the rights of men and the authority of the people?" Here is the core constitutional question of the Civil War. Lincoln was elected on a platform that called for the recognition of STATES' RIGHTS, "and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively." Such rights, the Republican platform asserted, and Lincoln repeated in his inaugural, were "essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend." For Lincoln, however, the rights of the states were themselves the political expression of the rights of the people, which in turn were the political expression of the rights of men. The proposition that embodied the rights of men was that to which—as he said at Gettysburg—the nation was dedicated at its conception. The Civil War was a result of the fact that the idea of states' rights, and of popular sovereignty, had become divorced, in the public mind of the Confederacy, from the original doctrine of equality in the Declaration of Independence.

The question posed by the Civil War, Lincoln said, was addressed to "the whole family of man." That Lincoln conceived of mankind as in some sense a "family" was of course but another expression of his belief in human equality. Lincoln's question was essentially the same as that addressed by ALEXANDER HAMILTON in The Federalist #1: "whether societies of men are really capable or not of establishing good government from reflection and choice, or whether they are forever destined to depend for their political constitutions upon accident and force." The election of Abraham Lincoln was a deliberate decision of the American people, in accordance with the canons of reflection and choice embodied in the Constitution. It remained to be seen therefore whether, in Lincoln's words, "discontented individuals, too few in numbers to control administration according to organic law [can arbitrarily] break up their government, and thus practically put an end to free government upon the earth." But because the leaders of the rebellion "knew their people possessed as much of moral sense, as much devotion to law and order . . . as any other civilized and patriotic people," it was necessary for them to invent "an ingenious sophism which, if conceded, was followed by perfectly logical steps . . . to the complete destruction of the Union. The sophism itself is, that any State of the Union may, consistently with the national Constitution . . . withdraw from the Union without the consent of the Union or of any other State."

The secessionists claimed that membership in the Union resulted from the acts by which the states had ratified the Constitution and that they might therefore withdraw by the same procedure. The Constitution itself, according to this theory, had no higher authority than the will of the people of the several states, acting in their constituent capacity.

In contradiction of this position, Lincoln presented a historical argument, that the Union was older than the states, that the rights of the states were only rights within the Union, and never rights outside of it or independent of it. Although the Declaration of Independence speaks, in its next to last sentence, of all those "Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do," none of them were ever done by any of the United States independently of each other. This argument, however, is not as conclusive as that other argument, independent of history, which follows from that "abstract truth applicable to all men and all times," to which, at Gettysburg, Lincoln said the nation had been dedicated. This argument Lincoln had been developing throughout his mature life, and is the ground of his constitutionalism, as indeed it is of all his moral and political thought. According to Lincoln, the Civil War was a "people's contest" because the rights of the states, and of the United States, were the rights of the people, either severally or generally. But what are the rights of the people? They are the rights with which the Creator has equally endowed all men—all human beings. These are the unalienable rights, among which are the rights to life, to liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness. Since all men have these rights equally, no man can rule another rightfully except with that other man's consent. Nothing better illuminates the division within the American mind that brought about the Civil War than this passage from a speech in reply to Douglas in 1854: "Judge Douglas," said Lincoln, "frequently, with bitter irony and sarcasm, paraphrases our argument by saying: 'The white people of Nebraska are good enough to govern themselves, but they are not good enough to govern a few miserable negroes!' Well, I doubt not that the people of Nebraska are, and will continue to be as good as the average of people elsewhere. I do not say the contrary. What I do say is, that no man is good enough to govern another man, without that other's consent. I say this is the leading principle—the sheet anchor of American republicanism." Slavery, Lincoln observed, is a violation of this principle, not only because "the Master . . . governs the slave without his consent; but he governs him by a set of rules altogether different from those which he prescribes for himself." Republicanism, for Lincoln, meant that those who live under the law share equally in the making of the law they live under, and that those who make the law live equally under the law that they make. Here in essence is the necessary relationship between equality, consent, majority rule, and the rule of law in Lincoln's thought. Here in essence is what unites the principles of the Declaration with the forms of the Constitution. Here is what enables us to distinguish the principles of the Constitution from the compromises of the Constitution (in particular, the compromises with slavery). Here is the essence of Lincoln's understanding of why the argument against slavery and the argument for free government are distinguishable but inseparable aspects of one and the same argument.

The people are collectively sovereign because the people individually, by their consent, have transferred the exercise of certain of their unalienable rights—but not the rights themselves—to civil society. They have done so, the better "to secure these rights." A just government will act by the majority, under a constitution devised to assure with a reasonable likelihood that the action of the majority will fulfill its purpose, which is the equal protection of the indefeasible and equal rights of all. The majority is the surrogate of the community, which is to say, of each individual. Majority rule is not merely obliged to respect minority rights; in the final analysis it has no higher purpose than to secure the rights of that indefeasible minority, the individual. The sovereignty of the people—or of the states—cannot be exerted morally or lawfully for any purpose inconsistent with the security of those original and unalienable rights. Although Lincoln denied any constitutional right to secede, he did not deny a revolutionary right, which might be exercised justly if "by the mere force of numbers, a majority should deprive a minority of any clearly written constitutional right."

In his inaugural address Lincoln repeated his oft-repeated declaration that he had no purpose, "directly or indirectly, to interfere with slavery where it exists." He had, he said, "no lawful right to do so" and he had "no inclination to do so." This, he held, was implied constitutional law, but he was willing to make it express, by an amendment to the Constitution. Lincoln would not, however, agree to any measures that might have as their consequence the extension of slavery to new lands where it did not already exist. As he wrote to his old friend ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS in 1861, "You think slavery is right, and ought to be extended; while we think it is wrong and ought to be restricted. That I suppose is the rub. It certainly is the only substantial difference between us." Many complex and elaborate explanations have been made of the causes of the Civil War. Lincoln's is at once the shortest and the most profound.

The South claimed the right to extend slavery on the ground that it was a violation of the fundamental equality of the states to allow the citizens of one state or section to emigrate into a federal TERRITORY with their property, while prohibiting the citizens of any other state or section from emigrating into that same federal territory with their property. Lincoln dealt with this argument in 1854—in his first great antislavery speech—as follows: "Equal justice to the South, it is said, requires us to consent to the extending of slavery to new countries. That is to say, inasmuch as you do not object to my taking my hog to Nebraska, therefore I must not object to you taking your slave. Now, I admit this is perfectly logical, if there is no difference between hogs and negroes."

Southerners had come to deny the essential difference between hogs and Negroes, in part because of the enormous economic stake that they had come to have in slave labor, because of the enormous burgeoning of the cotton economy. This was one cause of the change in their opinion of slavery, from a necessary evil to a positive good. Another may be seen in the following from one of Lincoln's 1859 speeches. Douglas, Lincoln said, had "declared that while in all contests between the negro and the white man, he was for the white man . . . that in all questions between the negro and the crocodile he was for the negro." Lincoln interpreted Douglas's statements as "a sort of proposition in proportion, which may be stated thus: As the negro is to the white man, so is the crocodile to the negro; and as the negro may rightfully treat the crocodile as a beast or reptile, so the white man may rightfully treat the negro as a beast or reptile." Douglas's references to "contests" between negroes and crocodiles, and between negroes and whites, reflected popular ideas of "the survival of the fittest" in the evolutionary process. Lincoln, in commenting on these remarks of Douglas, also went out of his way to deny the necessity of any such "contests." Alexander Stephens, who was inaugurated vice-president of the Confederacy in February 1861, conceded that the United States had been founded upon the proposition "that all men are created equal," and that that proposition had indeed (contrary to what Chief Justice Roger B. Taney had said in Dred Scott v. Sandford) included black men as well as white. But, Stephens went on, the Confederacy was "founded [and] its corner stone rests upon . . . the great truth that the negro is not the equal to the white man. That slavery—the subordination to the superior race, is his natural and normal condition." "This our new Government," Stephens added, "is the first in the history of the world, based upon this great physical and moral truth." The doctrine of racial superiority became a vital element in the conviction that slavery was a positive good. Without the conviction and the doctrine there could not have been a belief in the South of a constitutional right to extend slavery. That science, in one or another version of evolution, had established the inequality of the races, became the ground for the rejection of the doctrine that all men are created equal.

In fact, the doctrine of racial inequality involves the denial that there is any natural right, or that there are any "laws of nature and of nature's God." And this is to deny that constitutionalism and the RULE OF LAW rest upon anything besides blind preference. Justice would then be nothing but the interest of the stronger. Abraham Lincoln's speeches, before and during the Civil War, are the supreme repository for that wisdom that teaches us that we as moral beings ought to live under the rule of law. According to this wisdom, it is also in our interest to do so, because upon our recognition of the humanity of other men depends the recognition of our own humanity. And upon the recognition of our own humanity—by ourselves and by others—depends the possibility of our own happiness as human beings. Surely Lincoln was right in saying that the source of all moral principle—no less than of all political and constitutional right—was the proposition "that all men are created equal."

It is doubtful that the history of the world records another life displaying an integrity of speech and deed equal to that of Abraham Lincoln. With an almost perfect understanding of the theoretical ground of free, constitutional government was united an unflinching courage, and a practical wisdom, in doing what had to be done, lest popular government "perish from the earth." Whether, in the third century of the Constitution, Lincoln's legacy will survive in deed depends upon whether we can recover anything of his character and intelligence. But whether or not this republic lasts, as long as the world lasts Lincoln's speeches and deeds will remain as an emblem and a beacon of humanity to all men everywhere who may be struggling out of the dark valley of despotism and aspiring to the broad, sunlit uplands of freedom.

HARRY V. JAFFA
(1986)

Bibliography

BELZ, HERMAN 1969 Reconstructing the Union. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

FEHRENBACHER, DON E. 1978 The Dred Scott Case: Its Significance in American Law and Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

——— 1979 Lincoln and the Constitution. Pages 121–166 in Cullom Davis, ed., The Public and Private Lincoln: Contemporary Perspectives. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.

JAFFA, HARRY V. (1952) 1983 Crisis of the House Divided: An Interpretation of the Lincoln-Douglas Debates. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

NEVINS, ALAN 1950 The Emergence of Lincoln. 2 Vols. New York: Scribner's.

RANDALL, JAMES G. 1951 Constitutional Problems under Lincoln, rev. ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

LINCOLN, LEVI
(1749–1820)

Graduated from Harvard University and trained in law, Levi Lincoln fought as a Minuteman in the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and subsequently held several offices in the revolutionary government of Massachusetts. In 1780 he was a delegate to the convention that drafted the state constitution. After the Revolution he became a leader of the Massachusetts bar as well as a member of the legislature.

In 1781, Lincoln successfully argued in Quock Walker's Case (Caldwell v. Jennison) that the passage in the MASSACHUSETTS CONSTITUTION declaring that "all men are born free and equal" prohibited any legal recognition of slavery in the state. The decision effectively abolished slavery in Massachusetts.

Having early become a leader of the Republican party,

Lincoln served from 1801 to 1805 as attorney general of the United States in the first administration of THOMAS JEFFERSON. In 1811 he declined, on the ground of failing eyesight, President JAMES MADISON's offer of appointment as an associate Justice of the Supreme Court.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

LINCOLN AND CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY

Throughout his political career, most notably in the performance of his duties as chief executive during the CIVIL WAR, ABRAHAM LINCOLN was required to construe the Constitution. Three of Lincoln's constitutional constructions have assumed fundamental significance in American CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY. Basic to the decision to resist disruption of the Union, these constructions were presented in Lincoln's first inaugural address, on March 4, 1861.

The first of Lincoln's constitutional constructions denied a monopoly of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION to the judicial branch and asserted the authority of the political branches of the government to determine the meaning of the Constitution. Discussing the nature of a liberal REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT, Lincoln considered the proposition that constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court. He said that constitutional decisions of the Court were binding on the parties to a suit as to the object of that suit, and were entitled to very high respect and consideration by the other departments of government in parallel cases. Nevertheless, "if the policy of the government, upon vital questions, affecting the whole people, is to be irrevocably fixed by the decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made, in ordinary litigation between parties, in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent, practically resigned their government, into the hands of that eminent tribunal." Reiterating his criticism of the DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) decision, Lincoln affirmed the SEPARATION OF POWERS and the POLITICAL QUESTION DOCTRINE as essential elements in constitutional interpretation.

Lincoln's second constitutional construction asserted the necessity of majority rule as a fundamental principle in liberal republican government. Rejecting the Southern view that the right of SECESSION was the basic principle in the American political tradition, Lincoln said: "A majority, held in restraint by constitutional checks, and limitations, and always changing easily, with deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiments, is the only true sovereign of a free people." Stating that unanimity was impossible and that the rule of a minority was not legitimate as a permanent arrangement, Lincoln declared the majority principle to be the only alternative to anarchy or despotism. In deciding constitutional controversies, he reasoned: "If the minority will not acquiesce, the majority must, or the government must cease." And if "a minority, in such case, will secede rather than acquiesce, they make a precedent which, in turn, will divide and ruin them; for a minority of their own will secede from them, whenever a majority refuses to be controlled by such minority."

The third theoretically significant constitutional construction, providing further reason for rejecting secession as an American constitutional principle, concerned the nature of the Union and the Constitution. Claiming authority to prevent the disruption of the Union, Lincoln said: "I hold, that in contemplation of universal law, and of the Constitution, the Union of these States is perpetual. Perpetuity is implied, if not expressed, in the fundamental law of all national governments. It is safe to assert that no government proper, ever had a provision in its organic law for its own termination." Lincoln meant that the federal government, in essence, was the sovereign government of a nation and national people, not the coordinating authority or agent of "an association of States in the nature of a contract merely." Like all national governments, the government of the Union-nation was intended to last indefinitely. By the principles of political science and the law of nations, it possessed rightful authority to maintain its own existence against disintegration, as a means to the end of maintaining the purposes of the nation and of the Constitution by which the establishment of the government was ordained.

Lincoln's constitutional constructions crystallized earlier constitutional arguments and had a formative effect on constitutional law and theory for the indefinite future. Politically controversial, they were integral to practical decisions aimed at upholding the ends of the Constitution. Lincoln did not conceive of constitutional theory as an activity aimed at developing abstract normative propositions based on principles of moral philosophy external to the existing constitutional order.

HERMAN BELZ
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Nonjudicial Interpretation of the Constitution.)

Bibliography

ABBOT, PHILIP 1996 The Lincoln Propositions and the Spirit of Secession. Studies in American Political Development 10: 103–129.

BELZ, HERMAN 1998 Abraham Lincoln, Constitutionalism, and Equal Rights in the Civil War Era. New York: Fordham University Press.

DIETZE, GOTTFRIED 1968 America's Political Dilemma: From

Limited to Unlimited Democracy. Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins Press.

LINCOLN-DOUGLAS DEBATES (1858)

STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, running for reelection to the United States Senate, agreed to debate his Republican challenger, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, at seven joint appearances in rural Illinois during the summer of 1858. The resulting discourse, promptly reprinted in full in newspapers, produced a classic survey of alternatives for the future of SLAVERY and black people in the American constitutional system.

Douglas defended the concept of territorial SOVEREIGNTY: let the people of the territories, rather than Congress, decide the future of slavery there. He stated that he "cared not whether slavery be voted up or voted down" and accused Lincoln of advocating racial equality. Lincoln emphasized the incompatibility of Douglas's position with the decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), in which Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY had stated that a territorial legislature lacked power to exclude slavery. Douglas responded with the "FREEPORT DOCTRINE": a territorial legislature could exclude slavery simply by not enacting legislation supporting it. Lincoln hinted at a conspiracy involving Taney, Douglas, and the Pierce and BUCHANAN administrations to force slavery into the free states, an allegation Douglas indignantly denied by reasserting the power of each state to fully control its domestic policy.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

JAFFA, HARRY V. 1959 Crisis of the House Divided: An Interpretation of the Lincoln-Douglas Debates. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday.

LINCOLN'S PLAN OF RECONSTRUCTION (1863)

By 1863, President ABRAHAM LINCOLN adopted policies that affected RECONSTRUCTION in some of the seceded states. He appointed military governors in Louisiana, Tennessee, and North Carolina and recognized the provisional government of Virginia. The EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION took effect on January 1, 1863.

Lincoln issued his Proclamation of Amnesty and Reconstruction on December 8, 1863. In it, he offered AMNESTY to all participants in the rebellion, except high-ranking military and civilian officers. He announced his intention to appoint a military governor in each occupied state and to require each occupied state to accept all extant and future policy concerning SLAVERY and emancipation. But otherwise Lincoln's policy was conservative. It assumed preservation of the states' boundaries, constitutions, and laws (except those relating to slavery) and required neither black suffrage nor confiscation. Lincoln proposed to recreate an enfranchised citizenry in each state by requiring all persons to take an oath of future loyalty and support of the laws. When ten percent of a state's 1860 voters had taken the oath, they could reorganize the state's government.

The President's authority to recreate loyal state governments derived from several provisions of Article II, including his powers as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF, his PARDONING POWER, and his duty to see to the faithful execution of the laws. But, as with his earlier actions in calling for volunteers and suspending HABEAS CORPUS, Lincoln had to make the most of a document that had not contemplated SECESSION, CIVIL WAR, or Reconstruction.

Though Arkansas and Louisiana complied with Lincoln's terms, Congress refused to seat their representatives. Lincoln and Congress clashed over the more stringent congressional plan of Reconstruction embodied in the WADE-DAVIS BILL of 1864. President ANDREW JOHNSON later pursued Reconstruction policies similar to Lincoln's.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

BELZ, HERMAN 1969 Reconstructing the Union: Theory and Policy During the Civil War. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

LINE-ITEM VETO

The Constitution permits the President to sign or veto a bill as a whole. He may not pick and choose among the parts of a bill, signing some portions while vetoing others. Although most governors have VETO POWER over individual items, constitutional amendments to grant similar authority to the President have thus far been unsuccessful.

The Framers were familiar with the powers exerted by the British Board of Trade, which routinely reviewed thousands of acts submitted by the mainland of American colonies and disallowed some "in whole or in part." These disapprovals were more similar to JUDICIAL REVIEW than to an item veto, in the sense that vetoes prevent proposals from taking effect, while the board's actions came after the colonial measures were law. In any event, the Framers did not find the British precedent appealing for the Constitution being drafted.

The item veto did not materialize until the CONFEDERATE CONSTITUTION of 1861. Since that time, forty-three states have adopted some variation of the item veto for their governors. In 1873 President ULYSSES S. GRANT requested an item veto for the national executive, and at least a dozen Presidents have made similar appeals.

The fact that so many governors have the item veto is not a sufficient justification for giving the same power to the President. The federal-state analogy suffers from a number of deficiencies. The item veto exercised by governors is inseparable from a constitutional design that differs dramatically from the design of the federal Constitution, especially in the distribution of executive and legislative powers. A much greater bias against LEGISLATIVE POWER operates at the state level. State budget procedures also differ substantially from federal procedures. Appropriation bills in the state are structured to facilitate item vetoes by governors, but appropriation bills passed by Congress contain few items. Money is provided in large, lump-sum accounts.

Presidents regularly claim that with item-veto power they could carve out the "boondoggles and pork" that Congress supposedly includes in bills. However, Congress does not specify "pork barrel" projects in the bills presented to the President. Particular projects are identified in the conference report that accompanies a bill. These reports, which are not submitted to the President for his signature or veto, explain to executive departments and agencies how lump-sum funds are to be spent. The President cannot veto items, because there are no items to veto.

Congress could pattern itself after the states, taking the details from conference reports and inserting them into public laws. The results would not be attractive for agency officials, who like the latitude and flexibility of lump-sum funding. They do not want details, or items, locked into public law.

During the administration of RONALD REAGAN, the editorial page of the Wall Street Journal argued that the President already had item-veto authority. The theory is that the Framers anticipated that each discrete subject would be placed in a separate bill and presented to the President, giving him maximum discretion in using the veto power. Because Congress currently passes omnibus bills—including continuing funding and authorization for various programs—it is argued that an effective veto requires a power in the President to exercise item veto within these massive bills.

The historical record does not support this theory's view of the Framers' expectations. The first appropriations bill passed in 1789 was an omnibus measure, containing all funds for civilian and military programs. The same kinds of bills were enacted in 1790 and 1791. Evidently the members of the First Congres, which included many of the Framers who had participated in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, did not believe that Congress should pass seperate appropriations bills for every discrete program or activity.

A presidential item veto would have little effect on reducing federal deficits. Most of the federal budget is "uncontrollable" because of fixed costs to pay interest on the federal deficit, provide ENTITLEMENTS (such as SOCIAL SECURITY) for individuals, and reimburse contractors for work already done. Those appropriations could not be vetoed. However, an item veto could greatly increase EXECUTIVE POWER. Presidents and their assistants could use the threat of an item veto to coerce legislators into supporting presidential nominees, treaties, legislative goals, and spending priorities.

LOUIS FISHER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Budget Process.)

Bibliography

FEIN, BRUCE and REYNOLDS, WILLIAM BRADFORD 1989 Wishful Thinking on a Line-Item Veto. Legal Times, November 13, pp. 20, 24.

FISHER, LOUIS and DEVINS, NEAL 1986 How Successfully Can the States' Item Veto Be Transferred to the President? Georgetown Law Journal 75:159–197.

LINE-ITEM VETO
(Update)

The Line Item Veto Act of 1996 authorized the President to cancel in whole any dollar amount of discretionary budget authority (appropriations), any item of new direct spending (entitlements), and any limited tax benefit. Unlike the item veto available to forty-three governors, this measure did not allow the President to cancel items in bills presented to him. Only after signing a bill into law could the President exercise the cancellation authority, and he had to do that within five days. Congress could pass a bill disapproving the cancellations, but the President could veto that bill. Congress would then need a two-thirds majority in each chamber to override the veto.

President WILLIAM J. CLINTON canceled eighty-two items, all of them appearing in appropriations bills except for one item of direct spending and two items of limited tax benefits. The seventy-nine appropriation items totaled $477 million, a tiny percentage of the $526 billion appropriated in those bills. After Congress successfully reversed the cancellation of thirty-eight military construction projects ($287 million), the net reduction in appropriations was only $190 million. The three nonappropriation items amounted to $225 million, but the administration conceded that Clinton lacked authority to cancel one involving the federal retirement system.

Senator Robert C. Byrd and several colleagues challenged the constitutionality of the Line Item Veto Act. In Raines v. Byrd (1997), the Supreme Court ruled that the legislators lacked STANDING to bring the suit. A year later, the Court accepted a case from private parties who had been denied federal assistance because of Clinton's cancellations. In Clinton v. City of New York (1998), the Court held that the act violated the lawmaking procedures established by the Constitution, especially the PRESENTMENT clause that requires that all bills and resolutions be presented to the President for his signature or veto. Congress, said the Court, could not authorize the President to repeal parts of a statute.

Writing for a 6–3 majority, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS acknowledged that Congress in previous years had authorized the President to suspend certain statutory provisions in the field of international trade. He argued that those statutes "all relate to foreign trade," suggesting that the issue was not merely procedural (presentment clause) but possibly substantive as well (foreign versus domestic affairs).

Stevens said that if Congress wanted to give the President item-veto authority, it would have to act by constitutional amendment, not by statute. However, several of the dissenters identified line-item options that would have no problems under the presentment clause. Justice ANTONIN SCALIA pointed out that Congress could direct the President to spend "not in excess" of certain amounts, allowing the President not to spend anything. In a separate dissent, Justice STEPHEN G. BREYER said that Congress could direct the President to carry out certain programs unless he issued a certification that the program not take effect. In 1995, the U.S. SENATE passed a version of line-item authority that would not raise presentment problems either. Under a procedure called "separate enrollment," Congress could break the large appropriations bills into individual items and present each one to the President. Thus, despite the Court's opinion, the item-veto issue might return under a different name.

LOUIS FISHER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Veto Power.)

Bibliography

DEVINS, NEAL E. 1997 In Search of the Lost Chord: Reflections on the 1996 Item Veto Act. Case Western Reserve Law Review 47:1605–1642.

FISHER, LOUIS 1997 Line Item Veto Act of 1996: Heads-up from the States. Public Budgeting & Finance 17:3–17.

JOST, KENNETH 1997 Line-Item Veto: Can It Control Wasteful Federal Spending? CQ Researcher 7:529–552.

JOYCE, PHILIP G. and REISCHAUER, ROBERT D. 1997 The Federal Line-Item Veto: What Is It and What Will It Do? Public Administration Review 57:95–104.

LINEUP

In opinions whose subtext is unease about eyewitness identification procedures and testimony, the Supreme Court ruled in 1967 that a suspect is entitled to the presence of counsel at a lineup in order to preserve a FAIR TRIAL at which the witnesses can be meaningfully cross-examined. The opinions were delivered in the cases of UNITED STATES V. WADE and Gilbert v. California.

If a lineup is conducted without counsel, testimony about the lineup identification is automatically excluded. The question then becomes whether the witness who attended the illegally conducted lineup should be allowed to identify the witness at trial. This question centers on whether the witness could have made the in-court identification without having attended the lineup at which counsel was not present: whether, in other words, the witness had an independent source for the identification.

The lineup cases have generated much litigation and writing, both of a practical and a scholarly sort, about the role of counsel. The Court seemed to envision the attorney as a passive observer who would use what he saw to reconstruct for the fact-finder any unfairness in the lineup procedure. But a lawyer's skills are not necessary for observing, and reconstruction on cross-examination creates the risk that through the knowledge he displays in asking questions a lawyer may become a witness in his own case. Perhaps recognizing that having counsel at lineups was an interim measure and perceiving the analytical difficulties, the Court suggested that other techniques, such as photographing or videotaping lineups, could obviate the need for counsel.

The RIGHT TO COUNSEL at lineups was greatly undercut in Kirby v. Illinois (1972), in which the Court held that the right begins only "at or after the initiation of adversary criminal proceedings—whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, INDICTMENT, INFORMATION, or arraignment." Because most lineups are part of the investigative stage of a case and occur before any of the indices of a formal charge, Kirby necessarily implied that a lawyer or some other observer was not, in fact, generally required.

Untouched by Kirby, however, is the argument, made in Stovall v. Denno (1967), that identification procedures may be so "unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identification" as to violate DUE PROCESS OF LAW. An example of a due process violation would be showing a crime victim only the suspect dressed in clothes like those of the perpetrator when there was time to arrange a proper lineup. Once such a due process violation is proven, the issue shifts to whether it tainted the in-court identification: whether there was "a very substantial likelihood of irreparable mistaken identification." This decision mirrors that of a court in deciding whether a victim can make an in-court identification after attending a lineup where counsel was not present.

The effect of the lineup decisions has been to focus attention on all of the procedures used in pretrial CONFRONTATION of witnesses and suspects and thus to improve the fairness of these previously unobserved, but critically important, occasions.

BARBARA ALLEN BABCOCK
(1986)

Bibliography

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1974 Against the Law. Pages 242–258. New York: Harper & Row.

LINMARK ASSOCIATES v. WILLINGBORO
431 U.S. 85 (1977)

Without dissent, the BURGER COURT invalidated a local ordinance prohibiting real estate "For Sale" and "Sold" signs. The ordinance sought to reduce the flight by white homeowners from racially integrated neighborhoods. Although a ban upon all signs for aesthetic purposes might survive a constitutional test, wrote Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, this ordinance violated the FIRST AMENDMENT because the township had selected a particular message for prohibitions.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

LISTENERS' RIGHTS

The constitutional commitment to FREEDOM OF SPEECH is in part based on the simple idea that people have a right to say what they want to say without government interference. That is, freedom of speech protects the speaker. Yet the FIRST AMENDMENT themes of self-expression and speaker liberty have been recognized only sporadically in Supreme Court opinions. The more prevalent themes in First Amendment jurisprudence have been audience-oriented, albeit implicitly.

One classic justification of freedom of speech has been based on optimistic assessments about the capacity of the marketplace of ideas to distinguish between the false and the true. The emphasis of this justification is not that speakers have a right to say what they want to say, but that speakers must be free to speak so that the society can find truth, that is, so that listeners can hear and evaluate what is said. Listeners' rights are also strongly implicated by the notion that freedom of speech reflects a commitment to democratic self-government. If citizens are to decide how to respond to public issues, they must hear what others have to say. The listeners' rights emphasis of the self-government perspective is best illustrated by ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN's observation, approvingly cited by the Supreme Court in COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM V. DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE (1981): "What is essential is not that everyone shall speak, but that everything worth saying shall be said."

For many years, listeners' rights were protected with nary a listener before the Court. In routine cases, the aggrieved speaker invoked the rights of the listeners. In Thomas v. Collins (1945), for example, the Court invalidated an attempted prior restraint at the behest of the speaker, in part because of the rights of others "to hear what he had to say."

Ultimately, listeners were permitted to invoke their own rights without any speakers before the Court. In VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY V. VIRGINIA CITIZENS CONSUMER COUNCIL (1976), for example, consumers challenged a statute that prohibited pharmacists from advertising the prices of prescription drugs. No pharmacist was before the Court, only potential members of the audience for drug price advertising. The Court recognized the rights of "listener" plaintiffs to sue on their own behalf, observing that the First Amendment gives protection "to the communication, to its source and its recipients both."

LAMONT V. POSTMASTER GENERAL (1965) stands for an even broader principle. There the Court struck down a statute directing the postmaster general not to deliver certain "communist political propaganda" unless the addressee, upon notification, requested its delivery. The Court found this to be "an unconstitutional abridgment of the addressee's rights." Many of the potential senders of this "propaganda" were aliens outside the country who had no First Amendment rights of their own. The Court made this distinction explicit in Kleindeist v. Mandel (1972). Thus recipients of messages have a First Amendment right to hear that does not depend upon corresponding rights in the speaker. Such rights may extend to situations where the speaker is unwilling to speak; they are then usually referred to as the RIGHT TO KNOW. On the other hand, an unwilling recipient of a message may have a right not to hear, deriving from notions such as a right of privacy.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

Bibliography

BEVIER, LILLIAN 1980 An Informed Public, an Informing Press: The Search for a Constitutional Principle. Stanford Law Review 68:482–517.

EMERSON, THOMAS I. 1976 Legal Foundations of the Right to Know. Washington University Law Quarterly 1976:1–24.

LITERACY TEST

Many states used to require voters to be literate in English. The main constitutional problems raised by this practice arose from the use of literacy tests in southern and border states as a form of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION aimed at denying black citizens their VOTING RIGHTS in violation of the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. A typical law conditioned voter registration on the ability to read and write a provision of the state constitution selected by the registrar, to the registrar's "satisfaction." (An Alabama registrar once wrote this explanation for rejecting a black applicant: "Error in spilling.") Some laws also required the applicant to "interpret" or "explain" the constitutional provision, offering even greater opportunities for discriminatory application.

In Davis v. Schnell (1949) the Supreme Court summarily affirmed a lower court decision invalidating a requirement that a voter "understand and explain" an article of the United States Constitution; the registrar's discretion was so great that the test was an obvious "device to make racial discrimination easy." However, in Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections (1959) the Court unanimously upheld a bare literacy requirement, in the absence of any showing of discriminatory application. This distinction had been suggested by the Court as early as WILLIAMS V. MISSISSIPPI (1898).

Meanwhile, the Court had fought two minor voting rights skirmishes with Oklahoma. That state had required voters to pass a literacy test, but excepted any voter whose ancestors had been registered to vote in 1866. Because of this GRANDFATHER CLAUSE, only black registrants were required to take literacy tests; the Court readily invalidated this law in GUINN V. UNITED STATES (1915). After the decision, Oklahoma adopted a law requiring all new voters to register within a twelve-day period; because virtually all the new voters were black, this onerous procedure fell before the Fifteenth Amendment, which "nullifies sophisticated as well as simple-minded modes of discrimination," in Lane v. Wilson (1939).

The death blow to voter literacy tests was delivered not by the Court but by Congress, which approached the question gingerly. The VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 required certain states and counties to suspend their use of literacy tests for five years. This feature of the law was upheld in SOUTH CAROLINA V. KATZENBACH (1966). In the same year, KATZENBACH V. MORGAN (1966) upheld another feature of the 1965 act requiring states to confer the vote on some citizens who, having been educated in Puerto Rico, were literate in Spanish. In 1970, Congress suspended literacy tests for voting throughout the nation, a provision which the Court upheld in OREGON V. MITCHELL (1970) as a valid exercise of the power to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment. Finally, in 1975, Congress made the ban on literacy tests permanent. In practical terms, literacy tests for voters are a thing of the past, and the Supreme Court is unlikely to confront the Lassiter issue again.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

LEIBOWITZ, ARNOLD H. 1969 English Literacy: Legal Sanction for Discrimination. Notre Dame Lawyer 45:7–67.

LITIGATION

See: Public Law Litigation

LITIGATION STRATEGY

Litigation strategy in constitutional cases is shaped by a single animating principle—a desire to increase the likelihood that a black-robed bureaucrat called a judge will act on behalf of a politically vulnerable applicant to alter or set aside the act of a popularly accountable official. Although the degree of tension that exists between democratic political theory and constitutional litigation varies widely depending on the nature of the case and the attributes of the forum—a police brutality case litigated before an elected state judge poses no threat to democratic decision making; an EQUAL PROTECTION challenge to an act of Congress argued before an appointed, life-tenured, federal judge poses a more direct conflict—constitutional cases generally involve persons who are unable to secure redress through more conventional appeals to the political process. Litigation strategy in constitutional cases is designed to increase the potential that a judicial forum will rule in favor of such politically disfavored plaintiffs.

Sustained constitutional litigation in the United States has involved many sets of litigants, including abolitionists versus slaveholders in the period prior to the CIVIL WAR; radical reconstructionists versus southern revisionists in the period immediately following the Civil War; business CORPORATIONS versus populist reformers during the first third of the twentieth century; and civil libertarians versus majoritarians during the modern era. Although the political goals of the participants have varied widely, the strategic choices of the contestants have remained remarkably stable, involving five areas: choice of forum; selection of parties; articulation of theories of recovery; choice of tactics; and articulation of antidemocratic apologia.

Choice of forum is the most important strategic decision for a constitutional litigator. In choosing a forum, a constitutional litigator must choose between state and federal court; between a judge and jury; and sometimes between one judge and another. The outcome of many, if not most, constitutional cases turns as much on the wisdom of those strategic choices as on the intrinsic merits of the cases.

Because a constitutional plaintiff is generally seeking to trump a decision that enjoys the imprimatur of democratic decision making, the institutional capacity of the forum to render sustained anti- (or, at least, counter-) majoritarian doctrine is critical to the success of any constitutional litigation campaign. Judges who are themselves elected by the political majority or who are otherwise closely tied to the political process are least likely to enunciate sustained countermajoritarian doctrine. Judges who enjoy maximum political insulation are, on the other hand, in a position to ignore the short-term political consequences of their unpopular decisions. It would, for example, have been impossible for elected judges to have effectively enforced the fugitive slave clause in the pre-Civil War North on behalf of southern slaveholders, or the equal protection clause in the post-World War II South on behalf of black schoolchildren seeking an integrated education.

The search for an insulated judge in constitutional cases has generally led politically vulnerable plaintiffs—whether slaveholders, business corporations, or CIVIL RIGHTS activists—to seek a federal judicial forum, for federal judges are appointed and enjoy life tenure. Much of the procedural infighting that characterizes constitutional litigation revolves around attempts by plaintiffs to force claims into insulated federal forums and by defendants to deflect them to more politically accountable state courts.

The search for an insulated forum has led many constitutional litigators to view juries with suspicion. Not surprisingly, a principal litigation strategy of the abolitionist bar was to choreograph disputes about alleged fugitive slaves before free state juries in the hope that juries would decline to enforce the Fugitive Slave Act. (See FUGITIVE SLAVERY.) Modern civil rights lawyers have experienced analogous difficulty in persuading juries to return verdicts in favor of unpalatable plaintiffs whose rights may have been violated by a popularly responsible official.

Finally, the choice of forum involves a decision about the identity of the judge or, in less polite terms, judge-shopping. The identity of the judge in a constitutional case is extremely important for two reasons, one obvious and one less well understood. The obvious reason for judge-shopping involves the judge's politics. Because constitutional cases often turn on a clash of values and because the urgency with which a judge views a constitutional case may well depend on his or her view of the relative importance of the conflicting values, the same case may be decided differently by equally competent judges with differing value systems.

The less obvious reason why judge-shopping is important in constitutional cases involves the judge's technical competence. Victory for the plaintiff in constitutional cases depends upon persuading a judge that constitutional doctrine requires the overturning of a presumptively valid decision by another government official. Unless a judge is equipped to understand and evaluate complex argumentation about the meaning of ambiguous textual provisions and judicial PRECEDENT, it will be impossible to persuade the judge that doctrinal factors compel a decision for the plaintiff. Because the inertial advantage in constitutional cases almost always favors government defendants—failure to persuade the judge to act results in perpetuation of the challenged status quo—the inability of a judge to grapple with complex argumentation generally works to the disadvantage of a constitutional plaintiff.

In addition to care in selecting a forum, constitutional litigators expend a good deal of energy on the choice of a plaintiff, seeking to project the most sympathetic and appealing fact pattern. Because the judge's view of the equities may play a substantial role in the outcome of a constitutional case, the capacity of a constitutional plaintiff to evoke sympathy can be crucial. Constitutional lawyers have learned, moreover, that courts respond most favorably to fact patterns that emerge naturally from the interrelationship between a constitutional plaintiff and the government, but balk at being asked to decide artificially constructed TEST CASES.

A difficult decision constitutional litigators face in selecting a plaintiff is whether to bring the case as an individual action involving only named individuals or as a CLASS ACTION on behalf of all similarly situated persons. Militating in favor of class action status is its increased impact. A single class action can provide relief to thousands of people. Class actions, however, have drawbacks. Against the prospect of increased impact must be weighed the risk of loss, for members of a losing class are generally bound by the loss. Moreover, class actions can act as red flags to judges who would be sensitive to the claims of an individual plaintiff but who are reluctant to become involved in litigation seeking institutional change.

The selection of a defendant in a constitutional case also requires careful thought. Most important, the defendant must be capable of providing adequate relief. If injunctive relief is sought, the defendant must be sufficiently senior in the bureaucratic hierarchy to be able to promulgate and implement the changes sought by the action. At the same time, of course, the defendant must be sufficiently involved in the factual dispute giving rise to the lawsuit to justify naming him as an adverse party. If DAMAGES are sought, the defendant must have a sufficiently "deep pocket" to pay the judgment. A damage award against a judgment-proof defendant is hardly worth the effort.

One method of dealing with both the need for a high-ranking defendant and the quest for financial solvency is the naming of an entity-defendant such as the City of New York or the United States in addition to the individual defendants. The extremely complicated interplay between rules limiting the extent to which government entities can be sued in constitutional cases and plaintiffs' interest in suing government entities poses one of the serious tactical dilemmas in constitutional litigation.

A final—and less empirically verifiable—concern in selecting a defendant flows from what may be called the "Redneck-Mandarin dichotomy," which seeks to match a defendant and a judge from different educational and social backgrounds in the hope that the judge will be less constrained in exercising vigorous review powers. Although such an assumption is highly speculative, many constitutional litigators believe, for example, that they perceive a difference between many judges' willingness to exercise vigorous review of the actions of low-ranking police officers and the same judges' willingness to review the decisions of police commissioners.

Given the difficulty of overcoming the inertial advantage enjoyed by the government in constitutional cases, strategic considerations often play a role in the articulation of plaintiff's theory of recovery. It is often advisable to proceed by incremental stages and to develop alternatives to the primary constitutional theory. Thus, for example, litigation aimed at the OVERRULING of the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE enunciated by PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) proceeded by carefully calibrated constitutional steps designed to develop sufficient momentum to make the final decision in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) possible. It is, however, extremely difficult to execute a sustained litigation campaign over time, for the factors of chance and changing tides of legal analysis are difficult to predict. On the other hand, asking for too much too soon in the absence of a carefully laid doctrinal foundation places an intolerable degree of pressure on even a sympathetic judge.

In an effort to lessen the tension between constitutional litigation and democratic political theory, litigators often seek to articulate a process-based alternative to their principal substantive theory. Thus, litigators attacking FIRST AMENDMENT violations often invite the court to seize upon a narrower, process-based claim such as VAGUENESS or OVERBREADTH as the basis for invalidating a statute, rather than confront the substantive question of the legislature's power to enact it at all. Similarly, constitutional litigators often seek to link their constitutional theories with non-constitutional claims, such as a claim based on a statute or a COMMON LAW tort. Posing alternative theories of recovery provides a judge with a less dramatic means of protecting a constitutional value while providing effective relief to the plaintiff. Of course, many such alternative theories of recovery are subject to modification by the legislature, but the short-term result is often indistinguishable from success of the constitutional claim.

Although much litigation strategy depends on a perception of the degree to which constitutional law is shaped by value judgments, constitutional lawyers also recognize the extent to which constitutional litigation shapes community values. The process of bringing a constitutional lawsuit is educational as well as remedial. It seeks to expose the judge to a set of facts and a legal reality that would ordinarily be far from his or her consciousness. It seeks to inform the public of the existence of a social problem that, even if not ultimately amenable to constitutional resolution, requires increased public attention. Viewed as a part of the process by which the interests of the politically powerless can be protected in a democracy, constitutional litigation provides a mechanism not only for classic remedial action but for a sharpening of the underlying social issues for ultimate political resolution. Thus, for example, although under current legal standards it is difficult to establish a violation of the constitutional right of a minority community to receive equal municipal services (discriminatory purpose, not merely disparate effect, must be proven), constitutional litigation provides a forum for the dramatization of unequal treatment as a first step to a political resolution. Similarly, although only the most optimistic believed that courts would actually stop the VIETNAM WAR because it was supposedly carried on in violation of Article 1, section 8, of the Constitution, the repeated presentation of the issue both shaped public perception of the war and helped pave the way for the passage of the War Powers Resolution which attempted to deal with the legal issue of undeclared war.

Two major constraints limit the use of constitutional litigation as an educational vehicle. First is the ethical obligation to refrain from presenting frivolous or inappropriate claims to a court. Judicial attention is a scarce national resource which must be rationed, and lawyers must be prudent in presenting claims that cannot win. In the absence of a good faith belief in the legal—as opposed to the moral—soundness of a claim, it should not be presented to a court. Moreover, even if a claim is sufficiently substantial to satisfy ethical considerations, tactical considerations often argue against presenting a weak claim for adjudication. Losing a constitutional case risks the enunciation of dangerous precedent and acts to legitimate the challenged activity. Thus, although constitutional litigation plays an educational as well as a remedial role, its educational role should be a by-product of a bona fide attempt to secure a legal remedy.

A significant dilemma in planning and executing litigation strategy in constitutional cases is posed by the potential for conflict between the best interest of a plaintiff and the furtherance of the cause that precipitated the case into court. For example, a plaintiff who has gone to court to vindicate a principle and who poses a powerful TEST CASE may be confronted with a settlement offer which, while advantageous to the plaintiff, leaves the legal issue unresolved. Constitutional lawyers, while recognizing this conflict, generally resolve it in favor of the plaintiff and recommend acceptance to their clients, who then make the final decision. Despite the recognition that the interest of the client in a constitutional case should predominate over the advancement of the cause, a disturbing tendency exists on the part of both bench and bar to use a constitutional plaintiff as a convenient vehicle to trigger the enunciation of norms that may benefit society as a whole but which do little for the parties before the Court. William Marbury never did get his commission. (See MARBURY V. MADISON.)

Once a constitutional case is underway, three recurring tactical issues arise. Should immediate relief be sought, usually in the form of a preliminary INJUNCTION? Should the case be pursued as an abstract issue of law or should substantial resources be expended in developing the facts? And how broad a remedy should be sought? It is impossible to formulate even a general rule governing these three issues, except that attorneys with weak cases rarely seek preliminary injunctions and that issues of law should not be presented to a potentially hostile court in the absence of clearly established fact, given that a judge's freedom of action is greatest in determining the facts on an ambiguous record.

A parallel tactical issue defendants in a constitutional case face is whether to move to dismiss—and, thus, to assume the truth of the facts alleged in the complaint for the purposes of the motion—or to force plaintiffs to prove their facts by going to trial. Surprisingly, most defendants, in an effort to save time and resources, attempt dismissal motions, which require courts to rule on the theoretical validity of plaintiff's case without requiring plaintiff to establish the facts. Much constitutional law has been made in denying motions to dismiss and thus creating important legal precedents in cases where plaintiffs might have experienced difficulty in proving their allegations.

Finally, in presenting a constitutional case to a judge, a constitutional litigator will often seek to place it within one of three categories posing the least tension with democratic political theory in order to free the judge to exercise vigorous review. If the case involves a member of a DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITY, constitutional litigators will stress the inability of unpopular or disadvantaged minority groups to protect themselves within the traditional political process, thus invoking the special responsibility of courts to act as a bulwark against majoritarian overreaching. If the case involves significant political values, constitutional litigators will stress the responsibility of courts to guarantee the proper functioning of the democratic process. It is not antidemocratic, they argue, for a court to prevent the majority from refusing to permit the democratic process to function properly. If the case involves a "fundamental" value, like marriage or REPRODUCTIVE AUTONOMY, constitutional litigators will argue that the importance of such values warrants increased judicial protection. This third category involves the most controversial exercises of judicial power, because the selection of "fundamental" values appears subjective.

Ultimately, litigation strategy in constitutional cases, even at its most sophisticated, can exert only a relatively weak influence on the outcome. The adjudication of issues that impinge on deeply held values and in many other systems would be relegated solely to the political process is an inherently unpredictable phenomenon. No other area of law fits Tolstoy's vision of history so well as the claim of constitutional lawyers to be able to influence the ocean on which they most often bob like corks.

BURT NEUBORNE
(1986)

Bibliography

COVER, ROBERT M. 1975 Justice Accused: Anti-Slavery and the Judicial Process. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

GREENBURG, JACK 1977 Judicial Process and Social Change: Constitutional Litigation. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

KLUGER, RICHARD 1975 Simple Justice. New York: Knopf.

NEUBORNE, BURT 1977 The Myth of Parity. Harvard Law Review 90:1105.

LIVING CONSTITUTION

The phrase "the living Constitution" emerged from two developments at the end of the nineteenth century. The first was the influence of Darwinism and PRAGMATISM on traditional CONSITUTIONAL THEORY, and in particular their challenge to a more traditional, and conservative emphasis on remaining faithful to ORIGINAL INTENT and designs. The second development was the rising constituency for political reform in the early twentieth century after industrialization began putting pressure on eighteenth-century institutional arrangements.

The idea of the living Constitution should be seen in light of a relatively straightforward feature of our constitutional system: the document was intended to be the basis of American government for an indefinite period of time. The Framers believed that the Constitution embodied principles of a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT that had withstood the test of time. Thus, despite warnings from THOMAS JEFFERSON against imposing on future generations the "dead hand of the past," the supporters of the Constitution felt it was acceptable to entrench these arrangements in a constitutional system that was perpetual and marked by a difficult, formal AMENDING PROCESS.

It is sometimes claimed that the idea of the living Constitution received its first clear expression in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) when Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL wrote that "we must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding," one that was "intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." But it should be remembered that Marshall's intent was to offer an explanation for why the doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS, supplemented by the NECESSARY AND PROPER clause, should be interpreted to give the government flexibility in selecting "the necessary means for the execution of the powers conferred on the government." Marshall did not mean to imply that the actual powers of government might be reinterpreted whenever old understandings proved inconvenient or anachronistic. As Justice JOSEPH STORY explained in his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (1833), while the "means" by which the government pursues its ENUMERATED POWERS "must be subject to perpetual modification" it is equally important "not to enlarge the construction of a given power beyond the fair scope of its terms, merely because the restriction is inconvenient, impolitic, or even mischievous. If it be mischievous, the power of redressing the evil lies with the people by an exercise of the power of amendment. . . . [The Constitution] is to have a fixed, uniform, permanent construction. It should be, so far at least as human infirmity will allow, not dependent upon the passions or parties of particular times, but the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

By the end of the nineteenth century Charles Darwin's image of change had begun to replace Sir Isaac Newton's rule-bound universe as the exemplar of natural science, and philosophical pragmatism had begun to challenge older protestant commitments to the ongoing authority of inherited texts or principles. WOODROW WILSON would later explain in his Constitutional Government in the United States (1908) that although the Framers believed that politics "was a variety of mechanics" and the Constitution a "display [of] the laws of nature," we have since come to realize that "[s]ociety is a living organism and must obey the laws of life, not of mechanics" and "all that progressives ask or desire is permission—in an era when 'development,' 'evolution,' is the scientific word—to interpret the Constitution according to the Darwinian principle; all they ask is recognition of the fact that a nation is a living thing and not a machine."

Wilson and other reformers were obviously not asking for an opportunity to use the amendment process to establish new structures. Rather, they were challenging the inherited principle that the Constitution is to have a "permanent construction," arguing instead that judges should update their interpretations to make them more consistent with current assumptions and more serviceable to current problems. On the Supreme Court the theory of the living Constitution found expression in two related but distinct judicial traditions. The first is associated with Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., whose famous aphorism "the life of the law has not been logic: it has been experience" was initially intended as a description of COMMON LAW reasoning but would later inform much of his constitutional decisionmaking. As he put it in MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920), the words of the Constitution "have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters," and to be faithful to this "organism" the "case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago." Importantly, Holmes believed that if the political system was to be capable of addressing the new challenges of a rapidly changing world, it was important for judges to get out of the habit of impeding legislative experimentation with reference to inherited, anachronistic constitutional principles. As he put it in his DISSENTING OPINION in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), judges should not use the Constitution to prevent the "natural outcome of dominant opinion" from prevailing in LEGISLATION, except in extraordinary circumstances.

The second tradition associated with the new theory of the living Constitution can be traced to Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS. Brandies often agreed with Holmes about the advantages of deferring to experimental legislation, but unlike Holmes he also believed that a commitment to a living Constitution meant that judges had an obligation to update constitutional protections to enable them to address contemporary threats to liberty. When the Court ruled in OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928) that there was nothing in the language or origin of the FOURTH AMENDMENT that would apply to the practice of WIRETAPPING, Brandeis objected, saying that the Constitution "must have a . . . capacity of adaptation to a changing world"—not just the clauses that empower the government to address innovative problems, but also those clauses

"guaranteeing to the individual protection against specific abuses of power. . . . Time works changes, brings into existence new conditions and purposes. Therefore a principle to be vital must be capable of wider application than the mischief which gave it birth."

The years leading up to the NEW DEAL saw a pitched battle between an older tradition of interpretive stability against the emergent reformist tradition of the living Constitution. As increasing numbers of reform-minded lawyers and judges followed the example of Holmes and Brandeis, conservatives on and off the Court kept insisting, like Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND in his dissent in HOME BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION V. BLAISDELL (1934), that "[c]onstitutional grants of power and restrictions upon the exercise of power are not flexible as the doctrines of the common law are flexible," and that legitimate constitutional change had to take the form of amendment and not interpretive updates. This battle intensified after President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT aligned himself firmly behind those who argued that the meaning of the Constitution had to change with the times. This political development led increasing numbers of scholars sympathetic to the New Deal to speak out more strongly in favor of the living Constitution. Of this group none was more vocal or prolific than EDWARD S. CORWIN, who led the charge in favor of the view "that the Constitution must mean different things at different times if it is to mean what is sensible, applicable, feasible" and that its words must be "construed from a point of view which is sympathetic with the aspirations of the existing generation of American people, rather than that which is furnished by concern for theories as to what was intended by a generation long since dissolved into its native dust."

With the "switch in time" in 1937—when the Court abandoned its Lochner-era commitment to limited national government—the theory of the living Constitution became the dominant position on the Court, but it did not congeal into a unified new theory of interpretation. The original Holmes/Brandeis split continued to shape post–New Deal constitutional theory and practice. The Holmes version of constitutional adaptation through judicial deference was given voice by the former progressive, Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER. It is a fairly straight line from this position to the attempts of ALEXANDER M. BICKEL to convince the Court to embrace "the passive virtues" of judicial restraint, and then to the claim of Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST that the key feature of the living Constitution is "to enable the popularly elected branches of government, not the judicial branch, to keep the country abreast of the times."

Alongside this commitment to judicial deference is the modern liberal version of the tradition, articulated by Justices such as WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., who wrote that "the genius of the Constitution rests not in any static meaning it might have had in a world that is dead and gone, but in the adaptability of its great principles to cope with current problems and current needs." Within constitutional theory this Brandeisian version of the living Constitution is most notable in the work of legal philosopher Ronald Dworkin, particularly when he suggests that the specific provisions of the Constitution should be viewed as carriers of more general concepts of political morality that should be abstracted away from the specific understandings (or conceptions) of their drafters and applied in ways that more accurately reflect contemporary convictions and challenges.

Whether either version of the living Constitution can be reconciled with the original understanding of our constitutional system has been a central locus for debate among post–New Deal constitutional theorists. Still, if it be true that the alternative to this move is the kind of activist ORIGINALISM practiced by pre–New Deal conservatives, then we may come to see the theory of the living Constitution as an understandable—but still controversial—response to the pressures for political change within a difficult-to-amend constitutional system.

HOWARD GILLMAN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Amendment Process (Outside Article V); Judicial Activism and Restraint; Nonjudicial Interpretation of the Constitution; Transformation of Constitutional Law.)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1987 Corwin on the Constitution, Volume Two: The Judiciary, edited with an introduction by Richard Loss. Ithaca, N.Y. and London, England: Cornell University Press.

GILLMAN, HOWARD 1997 The Collapse of Constitutional Originalism and the Rise of the Notion of the "Living Constitution" in the Course of American State-Building. Studies in American Political Development 11:191–247.

HAMBURGER, PHILIP A. 1989 The Constitution's Accommodation of Social Change. Michigan Law Review 88:239–327.

HORWITZ, MORTON J. 1993 Foreword: The Constitution of Change: Legal Fundamentality Without Fundamentalism. Harvard Law Review 107:30–117.

KAMMEN, MICHAEL 1994 A Machine That Would Go of Itself. New York: St. Martin's Press.

KYVIG, DAVID E. 1996 Explicit and Authentic Acts: Amending the U.S. Constitution, 1776–1995. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.

RAKOVE, JACK N., ed. 1990 Interpreting the Constitution: The Debate Over Original Intent. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H. 1976 The Notion of a Living Constitution. Texas Law Review 54:693.

SIEGEL, STEPHEN A. 1990 Historicism in Late Nineteenth-Century Constitutional Thought. Wisconsin Law Review 1990: 1431–1547.

VARIOUS AUTHORS 1936 The Constitution in the Twentieth Century. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 185:1–200.

WHITE, G. EDWARD 1997 The "Constitutional Revolution" as a Crisis in Adaptivity. Hastings Law Journal 48:867–912.

LIVINGSTON, HENRY BROCKHOLST (1757–1823)

There is a modest puzzle regarding Henry Brockholst Livingston's more than sixteen years on the Supreme Court (1806–1823): why was he comparatively silent? Livingston, a New York Jeffersonian, was among the best qualified appointees ever named to the Court. Before his appointment to the New York Supreme Court in 1802, he was at the top of the legal profession, ranked as an equal of his frequent sparring mate, ALEXANDER HAMILTON. Livingston's opinions during his five years on the New York court demonstrated legal erudition, style, and wit. Some of his opinions are still required reading for law students. The New York reports indicate that Livingston had a constant urge to express his thoughts, and he was not only an extremely active dissenter but also constantly rendered SERIATIM OPINIONS. In his four years of New York judicial tenure, Livingston dissented twenty times, concurred on fourteen occasions, and delivered twenty-four seriatim opinions. Those statistics only begin to indicate the battle on the New York court, largely between Livingston and JAMES KENT, both of whom were first-rate jurists. The business of the New York court involved many significant matters but few constitutional questions. Livingston's dissent in Hitchcock v. Aicken (1803) argued that the FULL FAITH AND CREDIT clause should be interpreted broadly; ultimately, the MARSHALL COURT, including Livingston, agreed with this reasoning in Mills v. Duryee (1813).

In contrast to his active role on the New York court, Livingston was scarcely noticeable on the Marshall Court. In fifteen TERMS he dissented but three times and delivered only five CONCURRING OPINIONS. The fact that he had not shrunk from confronting some of the ablest judges in the country when on the New York court precludes any notion that he was overwhelmed by JOHN MARSHALL and associates. The difference in Livingston's roles on the state court and the Supreme Court is important largely for what it explains about the Marshall Court's constitutional jurisprudence. By the time of Livingston's appointment, Marshall's practice of having one Justice deliver a single opinion for the Court was settled. The Justices, moreover, willingly stifled their differences, save on questions of great moment, usually constitutional. Within this practice, the Justices' common values, regardless of party affiliation, normally made compromise possible. There are indications that Livingston initially had difficulty in adjusting to the ways of the Marshall Court. In the first few cases he heard, Livingston seemed particularly active in questioning counsel, as if he might have wished to dissent, but did not. Apparently, Livingston's policy preferences blended well with the Marshall Court's general mercantile orientation. While on the New York bench Livingston had served as a precursor for nineteenth-century instrumentalist judges who shaped the law to promote commercial development. In this respect, Livingston resembled a fellow Jeffersonian on the Court, WILLIAM JOHNSON. Because of the commercial atmosphere of his home community of Charleston, South Carolina, Johnson, like Livingston, had good reason for thinking as his brethren did on commercial questions. Johnson was even more nationalistic than Marshall. Unlike Johnson, however, THOMAS JEFFERSON apparently did not attempt to goad Livingston into expressing his differences as he had done while a state judge. Another reason that Livingston did not join Johnson and make plural the "first dissenter" may have been that Livingston got along with the rest of the Court much better than Johnson did. When Livingston died, JOSEPH STORY's rich eulogy to him indicated how fondly he was remembered. Finally, Livingston was a ready adherent to precedent, as he had demonstrated on the New York bench. When a question was settled, Livingston was unlikely to challenge its resolutions, even obliquely. In short, Livingston was a good team player, and our constitutional jurisprudence may be poorer for it. A clear example of the consequences of Livingston's proclivity for compromise is seen in STURGES V. CROWNINSHIELD (1819), in which the Court invalidated a New York insolvent law of 1811 because it had been applied retroactively. On circuit, Livingston had emphatically sustained the same law in Adams v. Storey (1817); yet he proceeded to compromise in Sturges. It seems likely that Marshall did not wish to say in his opinion that the states had CONCURRENT POWER to pass bankruptcy or insolvency laws, but he did—probably in response to Livingston's urging. Livingston's main role on the Marshall Court and in the development of constitutional jurisprudence was that of a compromiser. His opinions, with few exceptions, are forgettable.

DONLAD ROPER
(1986)

Bibliography

DUNNE, GERALD T. 1969 Brockholst Livingston. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court. New York: Chelsea House.

HASKINS, GEORGE LEE, and JOHNSON, HERBERT A. 1981 Foun- dations of Power: John Marshall, 1801–1815, volume II of Freund, Paul A., general editor, The Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Macmillan.

LIVINGSTON, ROBERT R., JR.
(1746–1813)

The son of a New York judge, Robert R. Livingston, Jr., was a member of the committees that drafted the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE (which he regarded as premature and did not sign) and the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. With JOHN JAY and GOUVERNEUR MORRIS he drafted the New York constitution of 1777. From 1777 to 1801 he was chancellor of New York. In 1788 he was chairman of the New York state convention where he vigorously supported RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. He was later minister to France (1801–1804) and, with JAMES MONROE, negotiated the LOUISIANA PURCHASE TREATY. Livingston became a partner of inventor Robert Fulton and secured a New York steamboat monopoly not broken until GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824).

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

LIVINGSTON, WILLIAM
(1723–1790)

Governor William Livingston, poet, lawyer, and Revolutionary general, signed the Constitution as a New Jersey delegate to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. Unable to attend regularly, Livingston was not active in the debates; but he was influential in securing New Jersey's early and unanimous ratification. He was the father of Justice BROCKHOLST LIVINGSTON and the guardian of young ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

LOAN ASSOCIATION v. TOPEKA
20 Wall. (87 U.S.) 655 (1875)

The Supreme Court has frequently resorted to HIGHER LAW doctrine to buttress an opinion, but only twice in its history, in TERRETT V. TAYLOR (1815) and in this case, has it relied exclusively on the higher law as the ground for decision. An 8–1 Court, in an opinion by Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER, held unconstitutional a Kansas statute that authorized the city of Topeka to issue public bonds, payable by taxes, for the benefit of a private company that built iron bridges. In the absence of some usable clause of the Constitution, Miller relied on judicially implied limitations on government power "which grow out of the essential nature of all free governments" and protect individual rights "without which the SOCIAL COMPACT could not exist." Topeka and the state legislature had believed that attracting a bridge company promoted public prosperity as did a railroad or a public utility, but because the Court saw only an improper exercise of the tax power "to aid private enterprise and build up private fortunes," it called the statute "a robbery" of the public. Taxation, the Could held, can be exercised only for a public use or public purpose. Justice NATHAN CLIFFORD, the sole dissenter, believed that JUDICIAL REVIEW should be exercised only when the Constitution imposed a prohibition either express or necessarily implied, but not when the Court believed that a legislature had violated "natural justice" or "a general latent spirit" supposedly underlying the Constitution.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

LOBBYING DISCLOSURE ACT
109 Stat. 691 (1995)

The first full-scale lobbying reform LEGISLATION passed into law since 1946, the Lobbying Disclosure Act of 1995 requires paid lobbyists to register with a national Office of Lobbying Registration and Public Disclosure and prohibits such lobbyists from providing gifts to legislators.

In previous decisions, the Supreme Court has recognized the protection of lobbyists by the FIRST AMENDMENT guarantee of the RIGHT TO PETITION. The 1946 Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, the only other omnibus lobbying regulation measure, was severely limited in its scope by the Court in U.S. v. Harriss (1954). Harriss established a very narrow definition of the term "lobbyist"; only those who have "direct communication with Members of Congress" were so defined for the purpose of the act, effectively excluding nearly all individuals from its regulatory mechanism.

The Lobbying Disclosure Act substantially broadens the definition of "lobbyist" established in Harriss. The act also significantly limits the actions of those defined as lobbyists, banning gifts to members of Congress and prohibiting lobbyists from receiving federal grants. The act thus clearly restricts the broad freedoms presently claimed by lobbyists under the First Amendment. Whether the Court will accept or reject this departure from Harriss will have a significant effect on its interpretation of First Amendment petitioning guarantees.

DAVID K. RYDEN
(2000)

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

The Constitution does not mention local governments, but because of their ubiquity and importance questions have inevitably arisen about how they are to be fitted into the conceptual world it creates. Differences in the structures and functions of local governments might have led the Supreme Court to develop a complex set of responses to those questions. Both history and state law, for example, furnish materials that would have permitted the Court to conclude that some activities of some local governments should be characterized as "private," thereby freeing those local governments from the limitations the Constitution imposes on the exercise of governmental power and permitting them to claim the protections it confers upon private interests.

Instead, the Court has, with minor exceptions, treated all local governments alike. In all their activities, all are "political subdivisions of the State created as convenient agencies for exercising such of the powers of the State as may be entrusted to them," as the Court wrote of municipal corporations in Hunter v. City of Pittsburgh (1907). Several important conclusions flow from this conception of local government.

First, in exercising whatever authority the state may have conferred on them, local governments are subject to the same limitations the Constitution imposes on the exercise of state power. Second, local governments have no constitutional rights against the state that created them. A state may, for example, dispose of a local government's property as though it were the state's own, with no obligation to compensate the local government from which the property is "taken." Third, states have plenary control over the distribution of governmental authority within their borders. Individuals do not have a constitutional right to be governed by local institutions rather than by the state directly, nor do they have a right to be governed by one rather than another local government.

The states' plenary authority over governmental organization is, of course, subject to the limitations the Constitution imposes on the exercise of all state authority. Thus, in GOMILLION V. LIGHTFOOT (1961), a state statute redrawing the boundaries of a municipality so as to exclude virtually all its black, and none of its white, residents was invalidated as racially discriminatory. And in Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1 (1982), the Court sustained a challenge to a statewide initiative that denied local school boards authority to bus students for the purpose of eliminating DE FACTO school SEGREGATION. Relying on HUNTER V. ERICKSON (1969), the Court held that a state could not structure its decision-making process "in such a way as to place special burdens on the ability of minority groups to achieve beneficial legislation." But in so holding, the Court was careful to reaffirm the state's power to assume control of the schools or, presumably, of all decisions concerning student placement. The invalidated initiative differed from such measures, in the Court's view, because it did not operate "in a race-neutral manner."

The states' plenary authority over their local governments may also be circumscribed by federal legislation. Thus, in Lawrence County v. Lead-Deadwood School District (1985) a federal statute authorizing local governments that receive federal payments in lieu of property taxes to spend funds "for any governmental purpose" was held to preempt a state statute which required that the funds be spent in the same way as general tax revenues. Just how far Congress may intrude on the states' power to control their local governments is uncertain, but in principle the question appears to be no different from that which arises whenever Congress regulates internal affairs of the states. In FERC v. Mississippi (1982) the Court sustained Congress's power to impose certain duties on state utility commissions, and in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985) the Court sustained Congress's power to subject states to the wage and hour provisions of the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT. These decisions establish that the power of Congress is very broad, perhaps extending to the limits of Congress's authority under its ENUMERATED POWERS. Neither decision, however, quite forecloses the possibility that the Court may yet find in the TENTH AMENDMENT a principle of state autonomy that imposes some limits on Congress's power to interfere with state control of the agencies of state government.

The doctrine that local governments are merely state agencies, if taken to a logical extreme, might be understood to undermine the devolution of state authority to them. To the extent that a state relies on local governments for the performance of various governmental functions, differences in the circumstances and policies of the local governments inevitably lead to disparate treatment of the state's citizens. If local governments are merely state agencies, it can be argued, the state should be held responsible for the disparities to the same extent it would if it had directly ordered them. Although territorial discrimination by the state often can be justified and has in particular circumstances been upheld by the Court, it seems plain that the acceptance of that argument would seriously threaten the institution of local self-government. Thus far, however, the Supreme Court has refused to apply the Hunter doctrine in so drily logical a fashion.

In SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973), the Court held that a state policy of relying on local school districts to finance a substantial percentage of the cost of operating local schools did not violate the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, even though there were marked differences among the school districts in both taxable resources and expenditures per pupil. Among the considerations that influenced the Court were the deeply embedded national tradition of local financing and control of schools and the more general threat that a contrary decision would have posed to traditional reliance on local governments to support and provide a broad range of other services.

MILLIKEN V. BRADLEY (1974) reflects similar deference to the tradition of local self-government. In that case, the Court reversed a decree ordering interdistrict SCHOOL BUSING as a remedy for unlawful segregation of the Detroit schools. In doing so, it rejected the district court's argument that "school district lines are no more than arbitrary lines on a map drawn "for political conve nience" that may be ignored whenever interdistrict relief is necessary to achieve an effective remedy. Said the Court, "No single tradition in public education is more deeply rooted than local control over the operation of schools." Due respect for that tradition, the Court held, precluded an interdistrict remedy unless other districts participated in bringing about the unlawful segregation or the state drew district lines to foster segregation.

A number of commentators have argued that Rodriguez, Milliken, and several other recent Supreme Court decisions that accord weight to the nation's traditions of local self-government are, if not inconsistent with the Hunter doctrine, at least in tension with it. But the Court has gone no further than to recognize those traditions when they are expressed in state law. For that reason, its recent decisions seem more an affirmation of the state's plenary authority over governmental organization than a retreat from it.

For reasons that have never been adequately explained, however, the Court has not followed the logic of Hunter in determining the reach of federal JUDICIAL POWER. A local government is treated as a "citizen of a state" for purposes of DIVERSITY JURISDICTION, though the same is not true of either the state or those of its political subdivisions of statewide authority that are regarded as merely its alter ego. Nor do local governments share the state's ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity from federal court suit.

TERRANCE SANDALOW
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Racial Discrimination; State Action.)

Bibliography

BRIFFAULT, RICHARD 1989 Our Localism. Columbia Law Review 89:85–111.

LEE, CAROL F. 1982 The Federal Courts and the Status of Municipalities: A Conceptual Challenge. Boston University Law Review 62:1–73.

LOCHNER v. NEW YORK
198 U.S. 45 (1905)

Lochner v. New York, a landmark decision of 1905, has been discredited by the evolution of constitutional law. Justice RUFUS W. PECKHAM, writing for a 5–4 majority of the Supreme Court, invalidated a New York state statute forbidding employment in bakeries for more than sixty hours a week or ten hours a day. The rationale for the Court's opinion was that the statute interfered with the FREEDOM OF CONTRACT and thus the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT's right to liberty afforded both the employer and the employee. The Court stated that under the statute, viewed as a labor law, the state had no reasonable ground for interfering with liberty by determining the hours of labor. Seen as a health law, the statute affected only the bakers and not the public. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the law was neither necessary nor appropriate to accomplish its health objective. Moreover, the Court was of the view that if the law were upheld for the bakers, laws designed to protect other workers would also have to be upheld. In either case, said the Court, the statute was an illegal interference with the right to contract.

Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, in an important and historic dissent, concluded that the legislature had the power to enact a law that interfered with full freedom to contract and that the personal biases of judges could not justify declaring a statute unconstitutional. Said Justice Holmes: "The constitution is not intended to embody a particular economic theory," an obvious reference to the laissez-faire view then widely accepted. Holmes's view was that a law interfered with the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of liberty only if "a rational and fair man necessarily would admit that the statute proposed would infringe fundamental principles of our people and our law." The dissent's view was that the statute, viewed either as a health or a labor law, did not violate these principles.

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN also dissented, arguing with Justice Holmes that the wisdom of the statute or of a particular economic theory is judicially irrelevant. Citing studies that showed the hazards of bakery work, Harlan noted that legislatures in many states had enacted legislation dealing with the number of hours in a work day. Said Justice Harlan: "[I]t is enough for the determination of this case, and it is enough for this Court, to know that the question is one about which there is room for debate and for at least honest difference of opinion." If there are "weighty substantial" reasons for enacting a law it ought "to be the end of [the] case, for the State is not amenable to the judiciary, in respect of its legislative enactments, unless such enactments are plainly, palpably, beyond all question, inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States."

The Court implicitly overruled the Lochner result in BUNTING V. OREGON (1917), but for three decades the decision influenced the Court as it scrutinized carefully and often struck down economic regulations as violations of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. It was not until the mid-1930s, in the wake of the Court-packing furor and especially the Court's approval of the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Act in National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation (1937), that judicial intervention in economic legislation declined. Although Lochner is now discredited, its focus upon substantive due process and FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS has emerged in cases dealing with both contraception and abortion, namely GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) and ROE V. WADE (1973).

WILLIAM B. GOULD
(1986)

LOCKE, JOHN
(1631–1704)

John Locke, the English philosopher of enlightenment, formulated the basic doctrines that influenced the American Framers of 1787. While his famous Second Treatise, "Of Civil Government" (1688), alludes to various traditional ways to limit governments, it sets forth an effectual new way, later called liberal CONSTITUTIONALISM. That comprised a sphere of individual liberty, fenced by a right to property, and fixed government, constituted by a majority's consent. Constitutional or civil government is to be representative, responsible, and limited, with powers separated as well as effective, and it is to be kept to its FUNDAMENTAL LAW by a perpetual threat of popular rebellion.

The first of Locke's Two Treatises of Government rebutted Robert Filmer's contention that monarchy exists by divine right, derived from the fatherly authority of Adam and of God. Locke thrust at paternalism, which he regarded as the natural foundation of uncivil government and of inhumane civilization in general. Mankind has inclined unthinkingly to obey fathers, who grew to be patriarchs of families and chiefs of tribes, and finally to be oppressive kings and nobles upheld by wealth, power, and the servile flatteries of traditional faiths. The Letter concerning Toleration (1689) espoused freedom of conscience and SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. Locke tried to remove religion from the magistrate's armory and to remake churches into voluntary associations keeping watch on government and on one another. The Letter counsels public toleration of religion, but as a thing merely private, and only of civil religions willing to tolerate other faiths and to obey the civil powers. In other writings Locke advocated a reasonable Christianity and a worldly and private education, and he explained human understanding prosaically, as reliably derived from sense impressions rather than from intuitions or divinations.

The first chapters of the Second Treatise set forth the famous doctrine of individualism: human beings are naturally free, equal, and occupied with securing themselves, not naturally subordinate to a superior or oriented to something noble or true above themselves. They are not subject to fathers or mothers so soon as they can "shift for themselves," or to husbands or wives if they no longer consent to be spouses, or to some gentleman or lord in his vineyard or estate. On the contrary, they have a natural right to acquire the means of life, to obtain the fruits of their own labor. Locke devised a private right of unlimited acquisition which implicitly indicts any leisured class, authorizes opportunity for the "industrious and rational," and provides powerful incentives for work, invention, and production. Locke was the philosophic father of capitalism, his plan whereby freedom of enterprise produces economic growth and the means of collective security. The profits of entrepreneurs, which Locke defended as incentives, occasioned the later attacks on capitalism as unjust and LIMITED GOVERNMENT as callously narrow.

The central chapters of the Second Treatise are Locke's prescription for public powers that will serve the people instead of exploiting them. He insisted upon powerful institutions, what THE FEDERALIST was to call effective or energetic government. A condition without government, Locke eventually maintained, is "very unsafe, very insecure," and people are "driven" to establish a LEGISLATIVE POWER to define laws, judges to apply them, and an executive to enforce them. Despite this agreement with the authoritarian Thomas Hobbes, Locke insisted that raising a state is easy compared to domesticating it. For domesticated or civil government the key is constitutionalism—government according to a man-made fundamental law agreeable to a majority. In particular, the supreme power, which Locke defines as a lawmaking power, is to be set up with a majority's consent (immediate or eventual, express or tacit). This supreme legislative power, however, is also and primarily to be shaped by Locke's enlightened prescriptions for a legislative limited, conditional, and rather democratic. Every actual legislature has by right only this legislative power, the natural CONSTITUTION behind any written constitution, and a consenting majority is to be supposed an enlightened majority. The legislature must aim to preserve individual rights, to govern by declared laws, not to impose TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION, and not to delegate its powers. Also, a legislature must be broadly representative of "populous" places filled with "wealth and inhabitants." Locke required an assembly of "deputies" of the people, while cautiously but pervasively impugning an aristocratic senate or house.

Locke provided for an executive power that is (unlike a monarch) subordinate to law and yet (like a monarch) able to act beyond law when public necessities require. The executive enforces law, unites the nation's forces for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Locke's "federative" power), includes the judiciary, and remains, unlike the legislature, permanently on duty. For purposes of lawmaking Locke subordinated the executive to the legislature and attacked executives (such as the British king) who shared in lawmaking. Locke's argument led discreetly toward government by a responsible ministry, a dependence on a popular legislature that was rejected when the American Founders devised the Presidency, and a constitutional monarchy, which is only a "head of the republic," "a badge or emblem" representing the people. Still, executive power is extended by political necessity. In extraordinary situations, such as civil war, executive "prerogative" may extend to actions without authorization of law or even in violation of fundamental law, as when ABRAHAM LINCOLN in 1861 raised troops and monies before Congress had assembled. Salus populi suprema lex est is the Two Treatises' motto: the people's benefit is the supreme law. Locke repeated this maxim, which shows the limits of constitutional law, as he urged a king to reapportion an oligarchic house into a representative legislature.

The Second Treatise ends by insisting on an extraconstitutional RIGHT OF REVOLUTION, to secure a constitutional order against tyranny and also to help bring about popular constitutionalism. While executive prerogative may extend to reform, it is not to include a "godlike" prince with "a distinct and separate interest," a despot who violates the fiduciary "trust" of office, a conqueror, a usurper, a tyrannical king, or a clique of the rich. Such excesses make power revert to the people, who may set up anew their legislature. Locke repeatedly called this doctrine new. Each of the last six chapters ends by holding up to governors and peoples the new right of popular rebellion. In effect, Locke justified rebellion against every regime not a constitutional republic, and justified "revolution" of traditional beliefs inimical to individualism and popular government, that is, of almost all traditional beliefs.

The American Framers accepted Locke's broad framework of NATURAL RIGHTS and civil government, while varying details of the Constitution in accord with the cautious versions of MONTESQUIEU and his followers, David Hume and Sir WILLIAM BLACKSTONE. Fearing a political zealotry that might rival the old religious wars, Montesquieu, in his Spirit of the Laws (1748), abstained from Locke's fiery language of natural and popular liberty. His modified Lockeanism would allow forms and structures to vary with circumstance, make the judiciary a third separate power, and allow a senate of the successful and wealthy. Montesquieu also sought to introduce humane civilization less by rebellion and more by the spread of commerce and by changes in the private law of contract and inheritance.

ROBERT K. FAULKNER
(1986)

Bibliography

HARTZ, LOUIS 1955 The Liberal Tradition in America. New York: Harcourt, Brace.

STRAUSS, LEO 1953 Natural Right and History. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

VILE, M. J. C. 1967 Constitutionalism and the Separation of Powers. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

LOCKHART, WILLIAM B.
(1906–1995)

William B. Lockhart was a major constitutional law figure for more than a half century. Closely identified with the University of Minnesota Law School, where he taught for twenty-eight years and was dean from 1956 to 1972, Lockhart also served on the law faculties at Stanford (1938–1946) and the University of California, Hastings (1975–1994). Although he occupied several prestigious administrative positions—president of the Association of American Law Schools, a longtime member of the Council of the American Law Institute, and chairman of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's controversial National Commission on Obscenity and Pornography—he was most prominently recognized for his seminal contributions to constitutional law scholarship. His series of articles on STATE TAXATION OF COMMERCE and OBSCENITY significantly influenced the Supreme Court and were often cited in its opinions, beginning in 1940 and continuing to the present time. On state taxation, he contended that the Court should abandon the so-called Formal Rule—that states may not tax any activity viewed by the Court as a part of INTERSTATE COMMERCE, even though the tax threatens no discriminatory burden on commerce—which had been used for a century to invalidate many state taxes. His view was finally accepted by the Court in 1977. His position on obscenity—that normal FIRST AMENDMENT protection should be afforded to all sex-related expression except for material treated as hard-core PORNOGRAPHY by its primary audience and the manner in which it is sold—has been less successful as a matter of constitutional DOCTRINE, although essentially followed in actual practice. Finally, Lockhart co-authored eight editions of a widely used casebook on constitutional law— the first edition published in 1964 and the most recent published in 1996—the hallmark of which was the inclusion of many selections from the literature woven into notes and questions that were contained throughout the materials.

JESSE H. CHOPER
(2000)

Bibliography

LOCKHART, WILLIAM B. 1975 Escape from the Chill of Uncertainty: Explicit Sex and the First Amendment. Georgia Law Review 9:533–587.

——— 1981 A Revolution in State Taxation of Commerce? Minnesota Law Review 65:1025–1061.

LOCKHART, WILLIAM B. and MCCLURE, ROBERT C. 1960 Censorship of Obscenity: The Developing Constitutional Standards. Minnesota Law Review 45:5–121.

LODGE, HENRY CABOT
(1850–1924)

A Harvard-trained lawyer who also earned the Ph.D. degree in history, Henry Cabot Lodge was elected three times to the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES and six times to the United States SENATE from Massachusetts. He was a close friend of President THEODORE ROOSEVELT and a national leader of the Republican party.

During his second term in Congress Lodge introduced a bill that would have provided for federal supervision of elections in order to protect the VOTING RIGHTS of black citizens in southern states. But he was wary of such Progressive innovations as women's suffrage and the DIRECT ELECTION of senators. He advocated the constant expansion of the United States through the annexation of Hawaii and other island TERRITORIES, and he supported the Spanish American War because it promised to lead to annexation of the Philippine Islands. During Roosevelt's administration Lodge was a leading congressional supporter of the Panama Canal project.

In 1918, Lodge used his position as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to lead the fight against the Treaty of Versailles. He based his opposition to the League of Nations, a key element of the treaty, on the unconstitutionality of commiting American military forces to combat without the express consent of Congress.

Lodge was known during his lifetime as "the scholar in politics." His vision of an American constitutionalism that was both conservative and nationalistic was presented, in part, in his biographies of GEORGE WASHINGTON, ALEXANDER HAMILTON, and DANIEL WEBSTER.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

GARRATY, JOHN A. 1965 Henry Cabot Lodge: A Biography. New York: Knopf.

LOEWE v. LAWLOR
208 U.S. 274 (1908)

This case fits a pattern of antilabor decisions that supported INJUNCTIONS against trade unions and struck down maximum hours acts, minimum wage acts, and acts prohibiting YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS. In Loewe, the Court, while crippling secondary boycotts, held that unions were subject to the antitrust laws and therefore were civilly liable for triple damages to compensate for injuries inflicted by their restraints on INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Loewe originated in an attempt by the United Hatters Union, AFL, to organize a manufacturer of hats in Danbury, Connecticut. Most hat firms in the country were unionized. The few nonunion firms sweated their workers and were able to undersell unionized competitors, threatening their survival as well as the jobs of their unionized labor. Loewe's firm refused to negotiate a union contract and defeated a strike. The union retaliated with a secondary boycott, a refusal by the national membership of the AFL to buy Loewe's hats or patronize retailers who sold them. Loewe sued the union under the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT after the boycott resulted in a substantial loss of orders. The union demurred to the charges, admitting that it had engaged in the boycott but alleging that it had not violated the antitrust law, because that law did not cover the activities of trade unions and because the boycott in this case was not a conspiracy in restraint of commerce among the states. Invoking the DOCTRINE of the Sugar Trust Case (UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO., 1895) that manufacturing is a purely local activity, the union claimed that neither it nor the manufacturer engaged in interstate commerce. Although Loewe's hats, once manufactured, were shipped to purchasing retailers in twenty-one states, the union argued that it did not interfere with the actual transportation across state lines and that any restraint on interstate commerce resulting from the boycott was, according to the Sugar Trust Case, remote and indirect.

Overruling a lower federal court decision in favor of the union, the Supreme Court, in a unanimous opinion by Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER, for the first time held that the Sherman Act applied to union activities; that a secondary boycott conducted across state lines is a conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce; and that even if the restraint were remote and indirect, the Sherman Act applied because it covered "every" combination in the form of a trust "or otherwise" in restraint of interstate commerce. In 1911, however, the Court embraced the RULE OF REASON, enabling it subsequently to find that corporations, not unions, might engage in reasonable restraints; that is, the act did not prohibit all restraints except by unions. In Loewe, however, the Court construed the act broadly, even to the point of using the STREAM OF COMMERCE DOCTRINE to show the scope of the commerce power. There is no evidence, however, that Congress, when adopting the Sherman Act, intended to cover union activities.

The case presents the phenomenon of a labor union being held within the terms of an antitrust act and contrasting opinions of the Court. In the Sugar Trust Case the Court held a ninety-eight percent monopoly not to violate the act because manufacturing is local and any effect upon or relationship with interstate commerce is necessarily indirect; here, though, a small hatmakers' union came within the act because its boycott was interstate, despite its having done nothing to control the price or transportation of the product of a manufacturer. Moreover, the decision in this case came one week after the decision in Adair v. United States (1908), where the Court declared that there is "no connection between interstate commerce and membership in a labor organization," as it struck down an act of Congress prohibiting the use of yellow-dog contracts by railroads against railroad workers engaged in interstate commerce. If Adair correctly invalidated the attempt by Congress to protect railroad workers under the commerce power, then a week later the Court should have decided that Congress under the same commerce power cannot, via the Sherman Act, reach an admittedly indirect relationship between a hatters' union and interstate commerce. Both the legislative history of the antitrust law and the Sugar Trust and Adair precedents opposed the decision in the Danbury Hatters' Case. Following the Court's decision, a triple-damages suit against the union in the lower federal court resulted in a fine of $252,000. The Danbury Hatters went unorganized, hatmakers everywhere suffered, and unionization everywhere was thwarted to an inestimable extent by the threat of Sherman Act suits. Loewe is one of the major cases on the subject of LABOR AND THE CONSTITUTION.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

LIEBERMAN, ELIAS 1960 Unions Before the Bar. Pages 56–70. New York: Harper & Row.

LONG HAUL-SHORT HAUL RATE DISCRIMINATION

Long haul-short haul discrimination was one of the most notorious abuses practiced by railroads in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The practice involved charging a higher rate for a short haul that was included within a longer haul over the same line. Although Congress outlawed this discriminatory practice in Section 4 of the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT (1887), the Supreme Court effectively nullified that section in ICC v. Alabama Midland Railway Company (1897). The Court rested its decision on the commission's power to grant exemptions if the long and short hauls did not occur "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions." Sufficient differences existed between hauls to justify departures from Section 4's prohibition. In 1910 Congress revived the prohibition by reenacting the long haul-short haul clause minus the "similar circumstances" clause. Carriers were now forbidden to charge higher rates for shorter (included) hauls regardless of different conditions, although the commission was still authorized to make exceptions. A unanimous Supreme Court sustained this provision to United States v. Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fe Railway Co. (1914).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

SHARFMAN, ISAIAH L. 1931–1937 The Interstate Commerce Commission. 4 Vols. New York: Commonwealth Fund.

LONGSHOREMEN'S ASSOCIATION v. ALLIED INTERNATIONAL

See: Labor and the Constitution

LOOSE CONSTRUCTION

See: Broad Construction

LÓPEZ, UNITED STATES v. 514 U.S. 549 (1995)

In United States v. López, a 5–4 Supreme Court struck down the Gun-Free School Zones Act, a federal statute that made it unlawful to carry a gun in a school zone. The law was supposedly passed under Congress's power to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE, but the statute did not require any specific "commercial" act. That is, the mere possession of a gun in a school zone, no matter how acquired or what its intended use, was made unlawful. In a cautiously stated but revolutionary opinion, Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST objected to the law principally on the ground that the mere possession of a gun had nothing to do with "commerce" or any kind of economic enterprise. The Chief Justice was particularly critical of the statute's failure to require that a particular act of gun possession be shown to have some kind of impact on interstate commerce, in the sense of commercial enterprise. While striking down the statute, the Court also emphasized that Congress had not made "findings regarding the effects of firearm possession in and around schools upon interstate and foreign commerce." To summarize, under the majority's opinion (1) federal power to regulate interstate commerce must have some limits; and (2) those limits are exceeded when the government shows no relationship between interstate commerce and a specific act of gun possession; but (3) Congress probably could save the statute either by requiring that in each particular case an impact on interstate commerce be shown, or by making specific background findings that gun possession generally has such an effect.

Three DISSENTING OPINIONS representing the views of four Justices criticized the majority for (1) underestimating the impact of guns on interstate commerce, which seemed obvious and could well be presumed; and (2) rolling back congressional power to regulate under the COMMERCE CLAUSE—an area where the Court had given Congress virtually unlimited discretion since the NEW DEAL, after several decades of close scrutiny during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

The most controversial opinion in López is a concurrence by Justice CLARENCE THOMAS, arguing that the Court should reconsider the meaning of the commerce clause in light of the way that the constitutional words "commerce among the several states" were used in the late eighteenth century when the Constitution was written. Under his reading those words conveyed to Congress much less power than Congress had actually assumed, and in fact reached only commercial transactions ("commerce") where the goods or services in question actually crossed a state line ("interstate").

The original meaning of "commerce among the several states" has been subject to a great deal of historical scholarship, much of which is inconsistent with Thomas's position. For example, late-eighteenth-century writers were much more careful than most people today about the different usage of "between" and the commerce clause word "among." Thomas's requirement of an activity that moves from one state to another is more consistent with the term "between." Something that happened "among" the states in the eighteenth century could easily have included interstate and purely intrastate activities. For example, "there is a great deal of activity among the bees this morning" would not necessarily mean that the bees were engaging in transactions with one another; each could be busily doing its own work. In his very famous 1953 book, Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States, the late WILLIAM W. CROSSKEY also pointed out that the late-eighteenth-century meaning of "commerce" was significantly less technical than it is today, and could refer to a variety of commercial and noncommercial activities, including such things as conversation or household management. Nevertheless, Thomas's opinion invites constitutional historians to return to these issues.

HERBERT HOVENKAMP
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Federalism.)

Bibliography

GRAGLIA, LINO 1996 United States v. López: Judicial Review under the Commerce Clause. Texas Law Review 74:719–771.

HOVENKAMP, HERBERT 1996 Judicial Restraint and Constitutional Federalism: the Supreme Court's López and Seminole Tribe Decisions. Columbia Law Review 96:2213–2247.

SYMPOSIUM 1995 Reflections on United States v. López. Michigan Law Review 94:533–830.

LOPEZ v. UNITED STATES
373 U.S. 427 (1963)

The Supreme Court held that a government agent may surreptitiously record a conversation with a criminal suspect and use the recording to corroborate his testimony. Lopez, a tavern keeper, offered a bribe to a federal tax agent who thereupon recorded the conversation. The Court refused to exclude the recording. Because the agent was on the premises with Lopez's consent, there was no TRESPASS and therefore no violation of the FOURTH AMENDMENT. Because the agent could testify to the conversation, he could use the recording to corroborate his testimony.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

LORETTO v. TELEPROMPTER MANHATTAN CATV CORP.
458 U.S. 419 (1982)

The Supreme Court in the modern era has used an interest balancing analysis to determine whether government regulation amounts to a TAKING OF PROPERTY for which JUST COMPENSATION must be paid. Here a New York law required landlords to allow cable television companies to install equipment on the landlords' property in order to serve tenants. The Supreme Court, 6–3, held that this governmental authorization of a "permanent physical occupation" of property was, of itself, a "taking"; in such a case no interest balancing need be done.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

LOTTERY CASE

See: Champion v. Ames

LOUISIANA PURCHASE TREATY
(1803)

The Louisiana Purchase Treaty (April 30, 1803) provided for the cession of the French province of Louisiana to the United States for approximately $11,250,000. France had reacquired Louisiana from Spain as part of Napoleon's plan to reestablish a French empire in the New World. The United States had tolerated weak Spanish control at the mouth of the Mississippi, especially since the Pinckney Treaty of 1795 gave Americans the right to navigate the river and use the port of New Orleans; but Louisiana in the hands of Napoleonic France threatened the security, commerce, and growth of the country. President THOMAS JEFFERSON sought a diplomatic resolution, hoping to obtain from France at least the continuation of Spanish guarantees and, at best, the cession of New Orleans together with the Floridas, if France possessed them. In a surprising about-face, however, Napoleon renounced the whole of Louisiana.

The acquisition of Louisiana—some 828,000 square miles, virtually doubling the land area of the United States—challenged the government in several ways. First, the boundaries were obscure. Was Texas included? Or West Florida? Jefferson made pretensions to both. Article III of the treaty said that the inhabitants should be incorporated in the Union and enjoy all the rights of citizens of the United States. Unfortunately, the Constitution Jefferson and his party were pledged to construe strictly made no provision for acquiring foreign territory, much less admitting that territory and its people into the Union. The treaty, Jefferson declared, was "an act beyond the Constitution" and ought to be sanctioned retroactively by amendment. He drafted a 375-word amendment. When congressmen objected that Louisiana might be lost because of constitutional scruples, Jefferson acquiesced in silent expansion of the TREATY POWER even as he reiterated his belief that it made the Constitution "a blank paper by construction." (The Supreme Court, in AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY V. CANTER, 1828, later upheld the authority to acquire and govern territory under the treaty and WAR POWERS.) The Senate ratified the treaty on October 20, 1803. Two months later the American flag was raised at New Orleans.

Government of the territory also raised constitutional difficulties. The Enabling Act, in October, vested the President and his agents with full powers, civil and military. Querulous Federalists said it made Jefferson "as despotic as the Grand Turk." The Louisiana Government Act six months later created the Orleans Territory in populous lower Louisiana, extended to it many federal laws, and vested authority in a strong governor and weak legislative council, both appointed by the President. In the view of the President and Congress the rights of self-government, for which Creole Louisianans were unprepared, should be introduced gradually as the territory became "Americanized" in its population, habits, and institutions. The Louisianans demanded immediate statehood. Although this was denied, Congress in March 1805 introduced the second stage of territorial government, including a representative assembly, more or less on the plan of the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE. Five years later the statehood commitment of the treaty was met. The American theory of an expanding union of equal self-governing states thus survived its severest test.

MERRILL D. PETERSON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Theories of the Union.)

Bibliography

BROWN, EVERETT S. 1920 The Constitutional History of the Louisiana Purchase, 1803–1812. Berkeley: University of California Press.

LOUISVILLE JOINT STOCK LAND BANK v. RADFORD
295 U.S. 555 (1935)

During the Great Depression of the 1930s foreclosure or default on payments threatened to extinguish the small, independent farmer who owned his own property. Congress, exercising its BANKRUPTCY POWER, came to his rescue by passing the FRAZIER-LEMKE (Farm Mortgage) ACT of 1934. The act provided that bankrupt farmers might require a federal bankruptcy court to stay farm mortgage payments for a period of five years, during which time the debtor retained possession of his property and paid his creditor a reasonable rental sum fixed by the court, and at the end of the five years the debtor could buy the property at its appraised value. Because the act operated retroactively it took away rights of the mortgagee, but the CONTRACT CLAUSE limits only the states, not Congress. In the face of that clause the Court had sustained a similar state act in HOME BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N V. BLAISDELL (1934). Nevertheless Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, for a unanimous Court, ruled the act of Congress void. He distinguished Blaisdell as less drastic: the statute there had stayed proceedings for two, not five, years. In effect Brandeis read the contract clause into the Fifth Amendment's DUE PROCESS clause, holding that the bankruptcy power of Congress must be exercised subject to SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. The statute deprived persons of property without due process by not allowing the mortgagee to retain a lien on mortgaged property. The oddest feature of this strained opinion is that it did not mention due process; Brandeis referred only to the clause that prohibited the taking of private property for a public purpose without just compensation, though the government took nothing and sought by the statute to preserve private property. The Court retreated from its position in WRIGHT V. VINTON BRANCH BANK (1937).

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

LOUISVILLE, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY v. MISSISSIPPI
133 U.S. 587 (1890)

A 7–2 Supreme Court held here that a state might lawfully require railroads to provide "equal but separate accommodations" without burdening INTERSTATE COMMERCE. The majority distinguished HALL V. DECUIR (1878) because the Louisiana Supreme Court had held in that case that the state act prohibiting SEGREGATION unlawfully regulated interstate commerce. Here, the Mississippi Supreme Court had said that the Mississippi statute applied solely to INTRASTATE COMMERCE. Moreover, this case did not involve a refusal of accommodations (as in DeCuir), so no question of "personal rights" arose. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, dissenting, relied on DeCuir.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

LOVELL v. CITY OF GRIFFIN
303 U.S. 444 (1938)

A municipal ordinance prohibited the distribution of circulars or any other literature within Griffin without a permit from the city manager. Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, for a unanimous Court, held the Griffin ordinance unconstitutional. The ordinance provided no standards to guide the city manager's decision. To vest an official with absolute discretion to issue or deny a permit was an unconstitutional prior restraint that violated the FIRST AMENDMENT. Because the ordinance was INVALID ON ITS FACE, Lovell was entitled to distribute her literature without seeking a permit, and to challenge the ordinance's validity when she was charged with its violation.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

LOVETT, UNITED STATES v.
328 U.S. 303 (1946)

In an opinion by Justice HUGO L. BLACK the Court declared unconstitutional a rider to an appropriation act of 1943 which provided that no salary or other compensation could be paid after November 1943 to three specified employees of the executive branch who had been branded as "subversives" by the HOUSE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES. Congress, Black wrote, had passed a BILL OF ATTAINDER, prohibited by Article I, section 9.

Justices FELIX FRANKFURTER and STANLEY F. REED rejected Black's bill of attainder analysis; but both agreed that the employees were entitled to recover money for the value of services rendered to the government, even after Congress had refused to disburse money to pay their salaries.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

LOVING v. VIRGINIA
388 U.S. 1 (1967)

For more than a decade following its decision in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) the Supreme Court avoided direct confrontation with the constitutionality of MISCEGENATION laws. In Loving, the Court faced the issue squarely and held invalid a Virginia law forbidding any interracial marriage including a white partner. The decision is a major precedent in the area of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION as well as the foundation of the modern "freedom to marry." (See MARRIAGE AND THE CONSTITUTION.)

A black woman and a white man, Virginia residents, went to the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA to be married, and returned to live in Virginia. They were convicted of violating the Racial Integrity Act and given one-year prison sentences, suspended on condition that they leave Virginia. The Virginia appellate courts modified the sentences but upheld the constitutionality of the law. The Supreme Court unanimously reversed; Chief Justice EARL WARREN wrote for the Court.

Citing the SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION language of Korematsu v. United States (1944) (see JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES), Warren said that a "heavy burden of justification" must be carried by a state seeking to sustain any racial classification. The fact that the law punished both the white and black partners to a marriage did not relieve the state of that burden. The law's announced goal of "racial integrity" was promoted only selectively. A white was prohibited from marrying any nonwhite except the descendants of Pocahantas; a black and an Asian, for example, could lawfully marry. The law's obvious goal was the maintenance of white supremacy; it had no legitimate purpose independent of racial discrimination and thus violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause. PACE V. ALABAMA (1883) was assumed to be overruled.

The Court's opinion also rested on an alternative ground: the statute violated SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, by interfering with "the freedom to marry." Quoting from the STERILIZATION case, SKINNER V. OKLAHOMA (1942), Chief Justice Warren called marriage "one of the 'basic civil rights of man,' fundamental to our very existence and survival." (See ZABLOCKI V. REDHAIL; FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION.)

Justice POTTER STEWART, concurring, merely repeated his earlier statement in McLaughlin v. Florida (1964) that a state could never make an act's criminality depend on the race of the actor.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

LOW-VALUE SPEECH

The role that assessments of the value of particular speech or categories of speech should play in FIRST AMENDMENT theory is much contested. Everyone agrees, however, that at some point judges should be barred from making assessments about the value of particular speech in deciding whether it may be regulated or prohibited. Moreover, the image of a content-neutral government, at least as a regulative ideal, is a powerful force in First Amendment law.

Commentators ordinarily describe judicial judgments about the value of speech as "exceptions." The norm is said to be that speech is protected and that judgments about the value of speech are foreign to the judiciary. Exceptions are often explained in terms of "low value" theory. Speech does not get protection or it gets less protection than other speech because it has low value.

Geoffrey R, Stone, the theory's principal exponent, argues that low-value theory justifiably plays a major role in the JURISPRUDENCE of the First Amendment. It is neccesary, he argues, because otherwise we should have to apply the same standards to private blackmail as to public debate. If we do not treat harmful, but relatively unimportant speech differently, we will dilute the expression "at the very heart of the guarentee." As Stone charecterizes the law, "the Court, applying [the low-value] approach, has held that several classes of speech have only low first amendment value, including express incitement, false statements of fact, obscenity, commercial speech, fighting words and child pornography." Once the Court has decided that speech has low value, according to Stone, it engages in "categorical balencing, through which it defines the precise circumstances in which the speech may be restricted." By contrast, in assesing high-value speech, "the court employees, not a balancing approach akin to its content-neutral balancing, but a far more speech-protective analysis." Thus low-value theory functions to preserve the autonomy of high-value speech from government regulation.

No doubt, many categories of unprotected speech are explainable in part because they are thought to be of low value. Moreover, some forms of otherwise protected speech are afforded less generous protection than is given to other forms of protected speech almost exclusively because they are seen to have less value. But no sharp line divides low-value from high-value speech, and low value theory cannot account for all of its important exceptions.

Consider the First Amendment's standard testing ground: advocacy of illegal action. Such advocacy is protected unless it is directed to inciting imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce imminent lawless action. Is unprotected advocacy really a form of low-value speech? One approach might be to say that any speech that can be prohibited is low-value by definition. This approach, however, substitutes tautology for analysis, and it does nothing to provide an ex ante divide between high-value and low-value speech.

In what sense, then, is INCITEMENT or unprotected advocacy a form of low-value speech? Notice that advocacy of illegal action is not in itself a form of low-value speech. Indeed, noninciting advocacy of illegal action in itself is fully protected by the First Amendment. This conclusion has been reached in light of powerful opinions by Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS about the value of such speech. Thus, advocacy of illegal action appears to be high-value speech. The reason why some types of advocacy of illegal action can be prohibited seems to have less to do with their value as speech than with their potential for harm.

Alternatively, even if the Court had silently repudiated Holmes and Brandeis, the label "low-value speech" would obscure the decision-making process. The Court did not start, and need not have started, its analysis of illegal action by asking wheter the category of speech was valuable or not. Indeed, in dealing with the issues, the Court has ordinarily begun with an assesssment of state interests. What ultimately is at stake in this context is an accommodation of the values of order and FREEDOM OF SPEECH. If the rules in the context of advocacy of illegal action are good ones, the reason is that those rules have protected order without unneccessary sacrifice of the First Amendment values. But First Amendment values have surely been sacrificed. If the rules governing advocacy of illegal action have the effect of muffling the voices of those who are most agitated against the system, we have suffered a substancial First Amendment loss. It demeans the speech and underestimates that loss to think about this as a part of low-value theory.

The same can be said for the rules attempting to regulate false statements of fact in LIBEL law. Certainly, from one perspective, high-value speech is at risk. Many think criticism of public officials and other PUBLIC FIGURES is "at the very heart of the guarantee." To fashion a set of rules in which plaintiffs succeed in allowing juries to scrutinize that criticism risks a major chilling effect. Moreover, the fact-finding process may simply mask the unleashing of juror prejudices about what speech should be free.

Presumably the protection of reputation requires findings of truth and falsity by juries, but that protection must be accompanied by a sense of First Amendment loss. To characterize any such process as a part of low-value theory would deemphasize the major risk to high-value speech, however the latter might be defined. The conflict between reputation and free speech necessitates a difficult choice. Something important must be abandoned, and that choice deserves emphasis.

Low-value theory avoids that emphasis. It offers the soothing prospect of characterizing free-speech doctrine as generally unthreatening to speech of general importance, but low-value theory cannot deliver. Like it or not, so-called high-value speech is subject to government regulation if a strong enough showing can be made.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Balancing Test; Child Pornography; Commercial Speech; Fighting Words; Obscenity; Pornography; Pornography and Feminism.)

Bibliography

SHIFFRIN, STEVEN H. 1990 The First Amendment, Democracy, and Romance. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

STONE, GEOFFREY R. 1983 Content Regulation and the First Amendment. William and Mary Law Review 25:189–252.

LOYALTY OATH

A mild form of loyalty oath is embedded in the Constitution itself. The President must swear (or affirm): "that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the constitution of the United States." And Article VI, in conjunction with the supremacy clause, requires that members of Congress, state legislators, and "all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several states, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support this constitution." These are usually called affirmative oaths, in contrast to negative oaths in which oath-takers are required to abjure certain beliefs, words, or acts. In their most searching form, negative oaths probe the past as well as the future.

In Article VI, the constitutional oath of support is immediately followed by the proscription of any religious test for holding office. Loyalty oaths, called test oaths, were rife in an age of warring faiths defended by princes. They tested orthodoxy of belief and thus loyalty to the sovereign. Henry VIII launched Anglo-American constitutional practice on a sea of oaths, whose chief purpose was to root out followers of the pope of Rome. The Stuart kings exacted oaths from the first settlers, and the settlers in turn invoked them against each other. When George Calvert, the Roman Catholic first Lord Baltimore, attempted to settle in Virginia, he was confronted with an oath that he could not take. He perforce made the hard voyage back to England; his successors got their own grant to what became Maryland and promptly imposed an oath pledging fidelity to themselves.

Wary though they became of oaths with a religious content, those who made our Revolution, as well as those who resisted it, routinely exacted political loyalty oaths from military and civilians under their control. When one occupying force displaced the other, it could become a matter of life and liberty to have one's name on the wrong roster. At the same time, there was room for claims of duress and duplicity. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN expressed with his usual pithiness what was doubtless a shared cynicism when he wrote in 1776: "I have never regarded oaths otherwise than as the last recourse of liars."

One might have thought that the Framers, with revolutionary excesses fresh in their memories, meant the constitutional oaths to be exclusive of any others; but when the CIVIL WAR came, loyalty oaths again became ubiquitous. In the Confederacy, oaths were linked to the passes routinely required for any travel. Of more gravity, taking an oath was often for captives and hostile civilians the only alternative to rotting in prison or starving. The multiplicity of oaths and the pressure to yield to them resulted in their becoming unreliable indicia of loyalty. Union authorities were impelled to create a bureaucracy to interrogate oath-takers, thus anticipating modern LOYALTY-SECURITY PROGRAMS.

President ABRAHAM LINCOLN favored relatively mild oaths pledging only future loyalty. The sterner Congress fashioned the "ironclad" test oath that required denials of past conduct that secessionists could not possibly make. Those oaths barred even repentant rebels from government and the professions. The Supreme Court plausibly characterized such oaths as legislative punishment, and declared them BILLS OF ATTAINDER, in the TEST OATH CASES (1867).

Little was heard of loyalty oaths in WORLD WAR I. After that war, many states singled out teachers for loyalty oaths; but they were only affirmative oaths on the constitutional model, repugnant chiefly because of the mistrust implicit in demanding them.

The waves of anticommunist sentiment that subsided only during the WORLD WAR II alliance with Russia led to a new proliferation of oaths that penalized membership in subversive organizations (sometimes specifying the Communist party) and advocacy or support of violent overthrow of governments.

All this came to a boil in the tormented Cold War–McCarthy era, when oaths old and new, state and federal, were combined with loyalty-security programs to purge communist influences from public employment and licensed occupations.

When oath cases came before the Court in the 1950s, it first sustained the constitutionality of elaborate oaths, requiring only that communist affiliations must be with knowledge of illegal ends (WIEMAN V. UPDEGRAFF, 1952), and suggesting that an employee must have an opportunity for an explanatory hearing (Nostrand v. Little, 1960). But in the 1960s, when the tide of public opinion turned against the excesses of the 1950s, the Court turned too. In half a dozen cases, of which the climactic one was KEYISHIAN V. BOARD OF REGENTS (1967), the Court found oaths that were barely distinguishable from those it had upheld in the 1950s to be void for vagueness or overbreadth. The majority opinions paraded an alarming catalog of possible dilemmas that teachers in particular could not escape and overwhelmed the expostulations of dissenters that the Court had created a "whimsical straw man" who was "not only grim but Grimm." For good measure, the Court, in UNITED STATES V. BROWN (1965), unsheathed the bill of attainder weapon of 1867 to strike down an oath that would exclude a former communist from any office in a labor union.

Such successes against negative oaths emboldened teachers and other public servants who resented having essentially affirmative oaths directed at them. But variants of the Article VI oath to support the Constitution were uniformly upheld. The capstone case was Cole v. Richardson (1972). There the Court, while reaffirming in generous FIRST AMENDMENT terms the 1960s cases, found no fault in an obligation first to support and defend the constitutions of the United States and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and, second, to oppose their violent overthrow. The second clause, Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER wrote, "does not expand the obligation of the first; it simply makes clear the application of the first clause to a particular issue. Such repetition, whether for emphasis or cadence, seems to be the wont of authors of oaths." He added in a footnote that "The time may come when the value of oaths in routine public employment will be thought not 'worth the candle' for all the division of opinion they engender." Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, arguing in partial dissent that the second clause should be repudiated, reflected the persisting division between willing and unwilling oath-takers when he wrote, understatedly, that "Loyalty oaths do not have a very pleasant history in this country."

The fear that hellfire would follow a false oath must have faded since the seventeenth century. Nowadays public exposure, and a perjury prosecution, are the serious sanctions. Compulsory oath-taking is welcome to some, a matter of indifference to others, an offense to conscience for a few. A notable instance of a loyalty oath that hit the wrong targets occurred at the University of California in 1949–1952. When the university regents, after prolonged and wounding controversy, insisted on their power to impose a noncommunist oath, twenty-six members of the faculty refused to take it and were ejected. They won a pyrrhic victory in the California Supreme Court, which held that the regents' oath had been supplanted by an oath required of all state employees, but that the statewide oath somehow did not contravene a state constitutional prohibition of any test oath beyond the constitutional oath of support. Some of the nonsigners in time returned; one became president of the university and so did the historian of the episode, who called it "a futile interlude."

RALPH S. BROWN
(1986)

Bibliography

GARDNER, DAVID P. 1967 The California Oath Controversy. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. 1959 To Try Men's Souls: Loyalty Tests in American History. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

SAGER, ALAN M. 1972 The Impact of Supreme Court Loyalty Oath Decisions. American University Law Review 22:39–78.

LOYALTY-SECURITY PROGRAMS

This hyphenated phrase refers chiefly to the measures that were taken under Presidents HARRY S. TRUMAN and DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to exclude from public employment, and from defense industries, persons who were believed to pose risks to national security. Because the gravest threat to security was believed to flow from world communism, loyalty and security programs were designed almost entirely to counter communist influence and penetration.

In earlier periods of tension attendant upon wars, LOYALTY OATHS were the preferred device for separating the loyal from the disloyal. If oaths were taken seriously, they were self-enforcing. But when necessity or duplicity led to bales of unreliable oaths, the authorities responded by empowering officials to go behind the oaths with investigations and to make their own judgments. Such procedures, usually under military control and untrammeled by judicial control, were widespread during the CIVIL WAR and RECONSTRUCTION.

WORLD WAR I was distinguished by the overzealous prying of the American Protective League and other amateurs who were given extraordinary aid and comfort by the Department of Justice. In WORLD WAR II the military departments, both determined to avoid the excesses of the crusade against the Kaiser, effectively centralized loyalty screening. They emerged with a minimum of criticism. After the war, the Soviet Union abruptly came to be viewed as enemy rather than ally. The insecurities of the postwar world aroused mistrust and anxiety. President Truman, aiming to forestall harsher congressional action, launched a new kind of program with his EXECUTIVE ORDER 9835 of March 21, 1947.

The Truman loyalty program covered all civilian employees. The Department of Defense had its own program for the armed services. Defense and the Atomic Energy Commission had programs for employees of defense contractors. The Coast Guard screened maritime workers. A few states developed systematic programs of their own. Many millions thus became subject to proceedings that sought to establish whether, in the language of E.O. 9835, there were "reasonable grounds" for a belief that they were disloyal (softened in 1951 to require only a finding of "reasonable doubt" as to loyalty). In 1953 President Eisenhower's Executive Order 10450 replaced the Truman program. It required employment to be "clearly consistent with the interests of the national security." That standard remains in effect.

All of these programs worked from personal histories supplied by the employee (or applicant) backed up by investigative reports. If "derogatory information" led to a tentative adverse judgment, that was usually the end for an applicant's chances of employment. But an incumbent could have the benefit of formal charges, a hearing, and review. The trouble was that the investigations ranged widely into associations, opinions, and flimsy appraisals. The sources of none of these were accessible to the employee. He could only guess who his detractors were.

These programs were only one array in the frantic mobilization against subversion. They were flanked by oaths and affidavits and questionnaires. To falsify any of these was a criminal offense. In order to establish what associations were forbidden, the 1947 executive order systematized the secret preparation and open use of the Attorney General's List of Subversive Organizations. Long before and for some years after the heyday of Senator Joseph R. McCarthy (1950–1954), congressional investigating committees took as their specialty the exposure of groups and individuals with communist ties. Their disclosures encouraged blacklists in private employment, notoriously in films and broadcasting. Senator McCarthy took the lead in stigmatizing the "Fifth-Amendment Communist"—a witness who invoked the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. Senator Patrick A. McCarran initiated the idea that naming names was the only true badge of repentance for those who said they were no longer communists. A mass of legislation sought to expose and condemn the Communist party and its affiliates, while the Department of Justice jailed its leaders for sedition.

All of these measures raised intertwining constitutional problems, so those of loyalty-security programs are not easily isolated. However, two strands can be picked out. First, there were demands for fair process, notably to confront the source of accusations. Second, there were claims for First Amendment rights, set against the supposed necessities of national security. However, the courts often trimmed the reach of the programs without deciding such issues. They would invoke their usual preference for avoiding constitutional collisions, and simply find that executive or legislative authority was lacking.

The position that DUE PROCESS OF LAW was wanting in the rules and administration of employment tests first had to surmount the proposition that employment was not a right but only a privilege that could be summarily withheld. First Amendment claims also encountered this barrier, curtly expressed in Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES's now battered epigram: "The petitioner may have a constitutional right to talk politics, but he has no constitutional right to be a policeman." After some early hesitation, this dismissive argument was itself dismissed, notably by Justice TOM C. CLARK, who was usually a steadfast supporter of security measures. In an oath case, WIEMAN V. UPDEGRAFF (1952), he wrote for the Court: "We need not pause to consider whether an abstract right to public employment exists. It is sufficient to say that constitutional protection does extend to the public servant whose exclusion . . . is patently arbitrary or discriminatory."

What process is then due? The government perennially opposes the right of confrontation by invoking the need to protect confidential informants. The court came close to requiring a trial-type hearing, with confrontation and cross-examination, in the industrial security case of Greene v. McElroy (1959). But it used the avoidance technique. It said that there would have to be, at the threshold, explicit authorization from the President or Congress to conceal sources, and that it could not find such authorization. The decision had little effect. The statute authorizing security removals of government employees still requires only that charges "be stated as specifically as security considerations permit." It is doubtful that, in a time of perceived crisis, and in sensitive employment, the Constitution would be read to compel confrontation.

The Court worked its way to a firmer position on narrowing grounds for removal. It found that First Amendment rights to freedom of association were impaired by a flat proscription of employing communists in a "defense facility." In UNITED STATES V. ROBEL (1967) the employee, a shipyard worker, was an avowed Communist party member. A majority of the Court, declaring that "the statute quite literally establishes guilt by association alone," held that some less restrictive means would have to be employed to guard against disruption or sabotage. If Robel and like cases are followed where charges of disloyalty are brought, and where the accusation stems from political associations, the government may be unable to remove an employee except for conduct that would support a criminal prosecution.

This does not mean an end to the reliance on prying and gossiping that made loyalty-security programs disreputable. In satisfying itself of the reliability of applicants for employment, the government (or a private employer) can still probe for flaws of character, so long as standards for expulsion do not invade areas protected by the First Amendment or by ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION. Investigators may even demand answers to questions, for example, on communist connections, that come close to protected zones, as long as the ultimate standards are correct, and the questions are helpful in seeing that the standards are satisfied. This seems to be the upshot of a tortuous line of cases involving admission to the practice of law.

From these unavoidable clashes between individual rights and security claims, a remarkable course of events has followed. Once the fevers of the 1950s had subsided, loyalty-security programs simply shrank to very modest levels. It is noteworthy that the VIETNAM WAR did not check the decline. Yet the KOREAN WAR, which broke out in 1950, undoubtedly deepened the fears of that era.

The contraction has been helped along by the courts. Congress and the executive have perhaps done more to limit the scale at which the federal programs have been operating (the last dismissal on loyalty grounds was in 1968). The PRIVACY ACT of 1974 and similar statutes greatly restricted the flow of official information about misbehavior. President RICHARD M. NIXON abolished the Attorney General's List in the same year. Nudged by lower court decisions, the Civil Service Commission first stopped asking applicants for nonsensitive positions about subversive associations, and then in 1977 scrapped the questions for sensitive jobs too. Appropriations for investigative staff both in the Federal Bureau of Investigation and in the Defense Department have declined.

Do recent developments represent a slackening of our defenses? A revulsion against the excesses of McCarthyism? Because the prime mover in all the loyalty-security programs was hostility to communism, the programs may revive if our relations with the Soviet Union worsen. If the programs do revive, it seems unlikely that the courts will check recurrence of past excesses.

RALPH S. BROWN
(1986)

Bibliography

BROWN, RALPH S. 1958 Loyalty and Security: Employment Tests in the United States. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

CAUTE, DAVID 1978 The Great Fear: The Anti-Communist Purge under Truman and Eisenhower. New York: Simon & Schuster.

DEVELOPMENTS IN THE LAW 1972 The National Security Interest and Civil Liberties. Harvard Law Review 85:1130–1326.

LEWY, GUENTER 1983 The Federal Loyalty-Security Program: The Need for Reform. Washington and London: American Enterprise Institute.

LUCAS v. 44TH GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF COLORADO

See: Reynolds v. Sims

LUCAS v. SOUTH CAROLINA COASTAL COUNCIL

505 U.S. 1003 (1992)

If the government takes land—say, to build a road—it has to pay the owner JUST COMPENSATION. But one of the most contested issues of constitutional law arises when the government, rather than physically appropriating land, affects its value through legislative or administrative action.

Lucas bought two oceanfront lots before South Carolina adopted the Beachfront Zone Management Act. Although houses had previously been built on neighboring parcels, the Coastal Council prevented Lucas from erecting new structures. Lucas challenged the act as an unconstitutional TAKING OF PROPERTY without just compensation. The Supreme Court, 6–2, agreed.

Writing for five Justices, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA held that where a regulation "denies all economically beneficial or productive use" of private PROPERTY, it requires compensation. This formalizes a per se rule for "total" REGULATORY TAKINGS. The Court remanded the case to determine whether Lucas's construction was already forbidden by COMMON LAW principles of nuisance or property. Of broader significance than the narrow facts of the case is the Court's attempt to clarify and strengthen a line of analysis begun by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (1922). Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY concurred in the judgment.

Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, in dissent, accused the Court of "launching a missile to kill a mouse." Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS questioned the new rule's arbitrariness: "A landowner whose property is diminished in value 95 percent recovers nothing, while an owner whose property is diminished 100 percent recovers the land's full value." Justice DAVID H. SOUTER would have dismissed the WRIT OF CERTIORARI as not ripe for review.

EDWARD J. MCCAFFERY
(2000)

LUJAN v. DEFENDERS OF WILDLIFE
504 U.S. 555 (1992)

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, held that an environmental organization had no STANDING because its members lacked "injury in fact" as required under Article III of the Constitution. Defenders of Wildlife sued under the federal Endangered Species Act (ESA), which provides that "any person" may sue to enjoin a federal agency from violating the ESA. Plaintiff sought expansion of a U.S. Interior Department rule requiring federal agencies to consult with the Secretary of the Interior to ensure that development projects within the United States do not threaten endangered species. Plaintiff contended that the ESA also required such consultation for projects in foreign countries. Two projects that would have been included under the broader rule were located in Egypt and Sri Lanka. Two members of Defenders of Wildlife had previously visited those countries. Neither had current travel plans, but both intended to return and hoped to see endangered species on their return visits.

The "any person" standing provision of the ESA is based on a "private attorney general" concept under which private individuals are authorized to enforce statutes for the benefit of the general public. Private attorney general statutes have repeatedly been upheld by the Court.

As a practical matter, Lujan may not be very important. For example, Scalia's opinion distinguishes Lujan from a qui tam standing case in which a plaintiff acting as a private attorney general gets a cash bounty. Further, Justices ANTHONY M. KENNEDY and DAVID H. SOUTER indicated that standing would have been proper if Defenders of Wildlife members had purchased airplane tickets or announced specific dates for future trips. As a theoretical matter, however, Lujan is a significant watershed. For the first time, the Court has held unconstitutional a grant of standing to a private person to enforce a federal statutory duty because that person does not satisfy the Court's understanding of injury in fact under Article III.

WILLIAM A. FLETCHER
(2000)

Bibliography

NICHOL, GENE R. 1993 Justice Scalia, Standing, and Public Law Litigation. Duke Law Journal 42:1141–1169.

SCALIA, ANTONIN 1983 The Doctrine of Standing as an Essential Element of the Separation of Powers. Suffolk Law Review 17:881–899.

SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1992 What's Standing After Lujan? Of Citizen Suits, "Injuries," and Article III. Michigan Law Review 91:163–236.

LURTON, HORACE H.
(1844–1914)

President WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT's nomination of his close friend and former colleague, Horace Lurton, to replace Justice RUFUS PECKHAM in December 1909 engendered some skepticism. A Confederate veteran of the CIVIL WAR, Lurton was sixty-six and a pronounced conservative. He was, however, known as a patient and gentle man who sought compromise, and his experience clearly fitted him for the office. Lurton had sat on the Tennessee Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals (with Taft and WILLIAM R. DAY) and had also taught constitutional law and served as dean of the Law School at Vanderbilt University.

Lurton did not write many majority opinions during his tenure on the Supreme Court. He was usually among a silent majority voting in favor of government authority to sustain, for example, the NATIONAL POLICE POWER (e.g., HOKE V. UNITED STATES, 1913) and the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT (STANDARD OIL COMPANY V. UNITED STATES, 1911); he dissented without opinion in HOUSTON, EAST & WEST TEXAS RAILWAY CO. V. UNITED STATES (1914). Most of his opinions dealt with procedural technicalities or the intricacies of employer liability laws.

One of the more frequent, though hardly regular, dissenters, Lurton was often in a minority with Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. Lurton's particular regard for precedent prompted extensive research to uncover those cases that would justify apparently inconsistent stances.

Shortly after his fourth term of court, in June 1914, Lurton died. His belief in law as the cement of society had led him to oppose JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, particularly when "a valid law, under the Constitution, is to be interpreted or modified so as to accomplish . . . [what a court] shall deem to the public advantage." Despite Lurton's prior experience, his career as a Justice provided little evidence of distinguished achievement.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

WATTS, JAMES F., JR. 1969 Horace H. Lurton. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court, 1789–1969. New York: Chelsea House.

LUTHER v. BORDEN
7 Howard (48 U.S.) 1 (1849)

In Luther v. Borden, a case arising from the aftermath of the Dorr Rebellion (1842), Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY enunciated the DOCTRINE of POLITICAL QUESTIONS and provided the first judicial exposition of the clause of the Constitution guaranteeing REPUBLICAN FORMS OF GOVERNMENT (Article IV, section 4).

Though Rhode Island was in the forefront of the Industrial Revolution, its constitutional system, derived from the royal charter of 1663 (which was retained with slight modifications as the state's organic act after the Revolution), was an archaic and peculiar blend of democratic and regressive features. Malapportionment and disfranchisement grew intolerably severe as the industrial cities and mill villages filled with propertyless native and immigrant workers. (Perhaps as many as ninety percent of the adult males of Providence were voteless in 1840.) Reform efforts through the 1820s and 1830s were unsuccessful. In 1841–1842, suffragist reformers adopted more radical tactics derived from the theory of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, asserting that the people had a right to reform or replace their government, outside the forms of law if need be. They therefore drafted a new state constitution (the "People's Constitution") and submitted it to ratification by a vote open to all adult white male citizens of the state. The regular government, meanwhile, also submitted a revised constitution (the "Freeholders' Constitution") to ratification, but only by those entitled to vote under the Charter. The people's Constitution was ratified, the Freeholders' rejected. Reform leaders then organized elections for a new state government, in which Thomas Wilson Dorr was elected governor. The two governments organized, each claiming exclusive legitimacy. The Freeholders' government declared martial law and, with the tacit support of President John Tyler, used state militia to suppress the Dorrites in an almost bloodless confrontation. It then submitted another revised constitution, ratified in late 1842, that alleviated the problems arising under the Charter.

Dorrites dissatisfied with this outcome created a TEST CASE from an incident of militia harassment and requested the Supreme Court to determine that the Freeholders' government and the subsequent 1842 constitution were illegitimate, on the grounds that the Freeholders' government was not republican and that the people of the state had a right to replace it, without legal sanction if necessary. Taney, for a unanimous Court (Justice LEVI WOODBURY dissenting in part on a martial law point), declined to issue any such ruling. After noting the insuperable practical difficulties of declaring the previous seven years of Rhode Island's government illegitimate, Taney stated that "the courts uniformly held that the inquiry proposed to be made belonged to the political power and not to the judicial." He went on to explain that Dorrite contentions "turned upon political rights and political questions, upon which the court has been urged to express an opinion. We decline doing so." Taney thus amplified a distinction, earlier suggested by Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL, between judicial questions (which a court can resolve), and political ones, which can be resolved only by the political branches of government (executive and legislative).

Taney further held that the GUARANTEE CLAUSE committed the question of the legitimacy of a state government to Congress for resolution, and that Congress's decision was binding on the courts, a point later reiterated by Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE in cases involving the legitimacy of congressional Reconstruction policies. Taney concluded his opinion with an empty concession to the political theory of the Dorrites: "No one, we believe, has ever doubted the proposition that, according to the institutions of this country, the SOVEREIGNTY in every State resides in the people of the State, and that they may alter and change their form of government at their pleasure. But whether they have changed it or not," Taney repeated, "is a question to be settled by the political power," not the courts.

Though the political question doctrine thereby created has never been explained by a definitive rationale, it has proved useful in enabling the courts to avoid involvement in controversies that are not justiciable, that is, not suitable for resolution by judges. (See BAKER V. CARR.)

WILLIAM W. WIECEK
(1986)

LYNCH v. DONNELLY
465 U.S. 668 (1984)

The Supreme Court significantly lowered the wall of SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE by sanctioning an official display of a sacred Christian symbol. Pawtucket, Rhode Island, included a crèche, or nativity scene, in its annual Christmas exhibit in the center of the city's shopping district. The case raised the question whether Pawtucket's crèche violated the Constitution's prohibition of ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION.

Chief Justice WARREN BURGER for a 5–4 Court ruled that despite the religious nature of the crèche, Pawtucket had a secular purpose in displaying it, as evinced by the fact that it was part of a Christmas exhibit that proclaimed "Season's Greetings" and included Santa Claus, his reindeer, a Christmas tree, and figures of carolers, a clown, an elephant, and a teddy bear. That the FIRST AMENDMENT, Burger argued, did not mandate complete separation is shown by our national motto, paid chaplains, presidential proclamations invoking God, the pledge of allegiance, and religious art in publicly supported museums.

Justice WILLIAM BRENNAN, dissenting, construed Burger's majority opinion narrowly, observing that the question was still open on the constitutionality of a public display on public property of a crèche alone or of the display of some other sacred symbol, such as a crucifixion scene. Brennan repudiated the supposed secular character of the crèche; he argued that "[f]or Christians the essential message of the nativity is that God became incarnate in the person of Christ." The majority's insensitivity toward the feelings of non-Christians disturbed Brennan.

A spokesman for the National Council of Churches complained that the Court had put Christ "on the same level as Santa Claus and Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer." Clearly, the Court had a topsy-turvy understanding of what constitutes an establishment of religion, because in LARKIN V. GRENDEL'S DEN (1982) it saw a forbidden establishment in a STATE POLICE POWER measure aimed at keeping boisterous patrons of a tavern from disturbing a church, yet here saw no establishment in a state-sponsored crèche.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

LYNG v. NORTHWEST INDIAN CEMETERY
485 U.S. 439 (1988)

The U.S. Forest Service planned to build a paved road and allow timber harvesting in an area held sacred by certain AMERICAN INDIANS. The Indians used the area, now part of a national forest, to perform religious rituals. The Supreme Court held 5–3 that the Forest Service action would not violate the free exercise clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT.

Writing for the majority, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR maintained that the free exercise clause was not implicated here because the Indians would not be coerced by the government's action into violating their religious beliefs. Hence, the government did not have to supply a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST to justify its action. The fact that the government activity would interfere with the Indians' religion was irrelevant because "the Free Exercise Clause is written in terms of what the govenment cannot do to the individual, not in terms of what the individual can extract from the government." Moreover, even if the Forest Service actions should 'virtually destroy the Indians' ability to practice their religion,' . . . the Constitution simply does not provide a principle that could justify upholding" their claims.

Writing for the dissenters, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN rejected the majority's narrow reading of the free exercise clause and argued that because the beliefs and activities implicated by the government action were "central" to the religion of the American Indians, the government must supply a compelling state interest to justify its action.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Religious Liberty.)

M

MACDONALD, UNITED STATES v.
456 U.S. 1 (1982)

Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER for a 6–3 Supreme Court reaffirmed that the protection of the SPEEDY TRIAL provision of the Sixth Amendment does not extend to the period before a defendant is officially accused of the crime and ceases once charges are dismissed. Thus, the period between dismissal of military charges and indictment later in a civil court could not be considered in determining whether delay violated the right to a speedy trial. Dissenters disagreed with the majority's reasoning that the interests served by the right to a speedy trial stood in no jeopardy before accusation or after dismissal of charges.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MACON, NATHANIEL
(1757–1837)

Nathaniel Macon, a North Carolina planter, opposed RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION because he thought the new government too powerful. Joining THOMAS JEFFERSON's Republican party, Macon was elected to Congress in 1791; with his party he opposed ALEXANDER HAMILTON's economic policies and the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS. As speaker (1801–1807), Macon, with his deputy, JOHN RANDOLPH, firmly guided the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES along administration lines. Although he briefly broke with Jefferson (1807–1809), he supported the unpopular EMBARGO ACTS. In the House (1791–1815) and later in the SENATE (1815–1826), Macon was a spokesman for STRICT CONSTRUCTION, and individual liberty.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

MADDEN v. KENTUCKY
309 U.S. 83 (1940)

A Kentucky statute taxing bank deposits outside the state at a rate five times higher than the tax on intrastate deposits was assailed as breaching several clauses of section one of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. By a 7–2 vote the Supreme Court, speaking through Justice STANLEY F. REED, declared that the states have broad discretion in their tax policies. Reed dismissed the arguments against the statute based on the EQUAL PROTECTION and DUE PROCESS clauses as insubstantial, but the decision in COLGATE V. HARVEY (1935) supported the argument based on the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause. On reconsideration the Court found that lending or depositing money is not a privilege of national CITIZENSHIP and therefore overruled Colgate.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MADISON, JAMES
(1751–1836)

James Madison, "the father of the Constitution," matured with the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Educated at a boarding school and at patriotic Princeton, he returned to the family plantation in Virginia at age twenty-one, two years before the infamous Coercive Acts. As Orange County mobilized behind the recommendations of the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, he joined his father on the committee of safety, practiced with a rifle, and drilled with the local militia company. As he wrote much later, in a sketch of an autobiography, "he was under very early and strong impressions in favor of liberty both civil and religious."

Civil and religious liberty were intimately linked in Madison's career and thinking. His early revolutionary ardor is the necessary starting point for understanding his distinctive role among the Founders. The young man first involved himself in local politics, in 1774, to raise his voice against the persecution of dissenters in neighboring Virginia counties. When feeble health compelled him to abandon thoughts of active military service, the gratitude of Baptist neighbors may have helped him win election to the state convention of 1776, which framed one of the earliest, most widely imitated revolutionary constitutions. (See VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION AND DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.) It seems appropriate that Madison's first major office should have been in this convention, his first important act to prepare amendatory language that significantly broadened the definition of freedom of conscience in the Virginia Declaration of Rights. The American Revolution, as he understood it, was a grand experiment, of world-historical significance, in the creation and vindication of governments that would combine majority control with individual freedom, popular self-government with security for the private rights of all. Through more than forty years of active public service, he was at the center of the country's search for a structure and practice of government that would secure both sorts of freedom. His conviction that democracy and individual liberty are mutually dependent—and, increasingly, that neither would survive disintegration of the continental Union—guided his distinctive contributions to the writing and interpretation of the Constitution.

Defeated in his bid for reelection to the state assembly—he refused to offer the customary treats to voters—the promising young Madison was soon selected by the legislature as a member of the Council of State. Two years later, in December 1779, the legislature chose him as a delegate to Congress. Here he gradually acquired a national reputation. He was instrumental in the management of Virginia's western cession, which prepared the way for ratification of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION and creation of a national domain. He introduced the compromise that resulted in the congressional recommendations of April 18, 1783, calling on the states to approve an amendment to the Articles granting Congress power to impose a five percent duty on foreign imports, to complete their western cessions, and to levy other taxes sufficient to provide for the continental debt. He learned that the confederation government's dependence on the states for revenues and for enforcement of its acts and treaties rendered it unable to perform its duties and endangered its very existence.

Reentering Virginia's legislature when his term in Congress ended, Madison became increasingly convinced that liberty in individual states depended on the Union that protected them from foreign intervention and from the wars and rivalries that had fractured Europe and condemned its peoples to oppressive taxes, swollen military forces, and the rule of executive tyrants. In 1786, as he prepared for the Annapolis Convention, Northerners and Southerners clashed bitterly in Congress over the negotiation of a commercial treaty with Spain. When Madison and other delegates decided to propose the meeting of a general convention to revise the Articles of Confederation, they acted in a context of profound, immediate concern for the survival of the Union.

By 1786, however, Madison no longer hoped that a revision of the Articles might reinvigorate the general government, nor was he worried solely by the peril of disunion. In all the states popular assemblies struggled to protect their citizens from economic troubles. Although Virginia managed to avoid the worst abuses, Madison thought continentally. Correspondents warned him of a growing disillusionment with popular misgovernment, particularly in New England, where SHAYS' REBELLION erupted in the winter of 1786. Virginia's own immunity from popular commotions or majority misrule appeared to him in doubt. He had not been able to achieve revision of the revolutionary constitution and had often suffered agonizing losses when he urged support for federal measures or important state reforms. In 1785, in his opinion, only the presence of a multitude of disagreeing sects had blocked the passage of a bill providing tax support for teachers of the Christian religion, which would have been a major blow to freedom of conscience and an egregious violation of the constitution. Personally disgusted by the changeability, injustices, and lack of foresight of even Virginia's laws, Madison feared that the revulsion with democracy, confined thus far to only a tiny (though an influential) few, could spread in time through growing numbers of the people. The crisis of confederation government, as he conceived it, was compounded by a crisis of republican convictions. Either could reverse the Revolution. Neither could be overcome by minor alterations of the Articles of Confederation. To save the Revolution, he wrote to EDMUND PENDLETON, constitutional reform must both "perpetuate the union and redeem the honor of the republican name."

No one played a more important part than Madison in bringing on the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, turning its attention to a sweeping transformation of the federal system, or achieving national approval of its work. Returning from Annapolis, he won Virginia's quick consent to a general convention, wrote the resolutions signaling the Old Dominion's serious commitment to the project, and helped persuade GEORGE WASHINGTON to lead a delegation whose distinguished quality encouraged other states to call upon their best. Reeligible at last, he rushed from Richmond to New York, reentered the Confederation Congress, and worked successfully for measures that significantly improved the prospects for a full, successful meeting. He researched the histories and structures of other ancient and modern confederations and somehow found the time to write a formal memorandum on the "Vices of the Political System of the United States," in which he argued that the mortal ills of the confederation government and the concurrent crisis in the states alike demanded the abandonment of the Articles of Confederation and the creation of a carefully constructed national republic. In Madison's vision, the republic would rise directly from the people; would possess effective, full, and independent powers over matters of general concern; and would incorporate so many different economic interests and religious sects that majorities would seldom form "on any other principles than those of justice and the general good." Urging other members of Virginia's delegation to arrive in Philadelphia in time to frame some general propositions with which the meeting might begin, he reached the city himself the best prepared of all who gathered for the Constitutional Convention.

Madison made several distinctive contributions to the writing of the Constitution. He was primarily responsible for the VIRGINIA PLAN: the resolutions that initiated the Convention's thorough reconstruction of the federal system and served throughout the summer as the outline for reform. In the early weeks of the deliberations, he persuasively explained why no reform could prove effective if it left the general government dependent on the states. Together with JAMES WILSON, he led the delegates who insisted on proportional representation, popular ratification of the fundamental charter, and a careful balance of authority between a democratic House of Representatives and branches more resistant to ill-considered popular demands. He also urged his fellows not to limit their attention to the weaknesses of the confederation, but to come to terms as well with the vices of democratic government in the states. Constitutional reform, he argued, must also overcome the crisis of republican convictions, both by placing limitations on the states and by creating a greater republic free from the structural errors of the local constitutions. With the latter plea particularly, he opened members' minds to a complete rethinking of the problems of democracy and to the possibility that liberty and popular control might both be safest in a large republic. Although the finished Constitution differed in a number of significant respects from his original proposals, Madison was, by general agreement of historians and his colleagues, the most important of the Framers.

All of which was only part of his enormous contribution to the Constitution's great success. Before departing for Virginia, where he led the Federalists to victory in a close and capably contested state convention, Madison reassumed his seat in the Confederation Congress, helped provide some central guidance for the ratification struggle, and joined with ALEXANDER HAMILTON to write the most important explanation and defense of the completed Constitution. His numbers of THE FEDERALIST, perhaps the greatest classic in the history of American political writing, rationalized the compromises made in the Convention, rendered the document intelligible in terms of democratic theory, and thus contributed as surely to the shaping of the Constitution as the work of the preceding summer. Since early in the nineteenth century, these essays have been recognized as an essential source for understanding the intentions of the Framers, and Madison's essential theme—that the Convention's work was perfectly consistent with the principles of the Revolution, a genuinely democratic remedy for the diseases most destructive to democracy—was still but the beginning of his effort to interpret and insure the triumph of the finished plan.

The reconstructed federal government initiated operations in April 1789. Madison immediately assumed the leading role in the first Congress, which was responsible for filling in the outline of the Constitution as well as for the national legislation it had been created to permit. He drafted parts of Washington's inaugural address, prepared the House of Representatives' reply, and helped defeat proposals to address the President as "highness"—important contributions to the early effort to define the protocol between the branches and to set a democratic tone for the infant regime. He initiated the deliberations that resulted in the first federal tariff and assured a steady source of independent federal revenues. He seized the lead again in the creation of executive departments, successfully insisting that the concept of responsibility required a presidential power to remove executive officials without the consent of Congress. Finally, he took upon himself the principal responsibility for preparing the constitutional amendments that became the BILL OF RIGHTS.

Early in the contest over RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION, Madison had denied the need for such amendments. He argued that the federal government had not been granted any powers that might threaten the liberties protected in the declarations of the states, and he warned that any effort to prepare a federal bill might actually endanger rights it was intended to preserve: an inadvertent error or omission could become the basis for a claim of positive authority to act. This very train of reasoning, however, suggests why he was open to a change of mind and offers some important clues to understanding his political and constitutional position in the years after 1789.

Throughout the course of constitutional reform, Madison had insisted no less strongly on the need for an effective central government than on a governmental structure that would guarantee the continuing responsibility of rulers to the ruled, along with a considerable residual autonomy for the people in their several states. Even as he worried over the excesses of majorities, he reminded correspondents of the perils posed by rulers who escaped a due dependence on the people; and even as he warned the Constitutional Convention not to leave the general government dependent on the states, he recognized the danger of excessive concentration of authority in federal hands. His contributions to The Federalist describe the new regime as neither wholly national nor purely federal in nature, but as a novel, complicated mixture under which concurrent state and central governments, each possessed of only limited authority, would each perform the duties for which they were best equipped and would both resist disturbance of a federal equilibrium that offered new protection for the people. During the ratification contest, Madison was forced to promise that amendments would be added once the Constitution was approved. He realized how useful this could be in reconciling skeptics to the system. But he was also predisposed to be receptive when THOMAS JEFFERSON insisted that a bill of rights would be a valuable, additional security for the liberties and powers that the states and people had intended to reserve.

Among the most consistent themes of Madison's career was his profound respect for FUNDAMENTAL LAW. Written constitutions, in his view, were solemn compacts which created governments and granted them the only powers they legitimately possessed. Rulers guilty of transcending them, he had written in his 1785 Memorial and Remonstrance against religious assessments, were "Tyrants," those who submitted "slaves." And usurpations of this sort, he added, ought to be resisted on their first appearance, as they had been early in the Revolution, before they could be strengthened by repeated exercise and "entangle the question in precedents." This scrupulous regard for fundamental charters encouraged Madison to change his mind about a bill of rights and shaped his conduct throughout the rest of his career.

Early in Washington's administration, Madison became alarmed about the sectional inequities and other consequences of Hamilton's political economy. He broke with Hamilton entirely when the secretary of the treasury proposed the creation of a national bank, protesting that the Constitution granted Congress no explicit power to charter such a corporation and that a doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS, justifying federal measures by a BROAD CONSTRUCTION of the general clauses, could completely change the character and spirit of a limited, federal system. During the 1790s, as Madison and Jefferson concluded that Hamilton and his supporters were deliberately attempting to subvert the Revolution—to concentrate all power in the general government and most of that in its executive departments—their insistence on a strict construction of the Constitution and a compact theory of its origins became an organizing theme of the Democratic-Republican opposition. Madison's Virginia Resolutions of 1798, part of a larger effort to arouse the states against the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS, which the Republicans regarded as a flagrant violation of the FIRST AMENDMENT, identified a Hamiltonian construction of the Constitution as a central feature of a Federalist conspiracy to sweep away all limitations on the exercise of federal power. Madison's great Report of 1800, explaining and defending the resolutions of 1798 against objections from other states, still stands as a striking landmark in the evolution of a modern, literalist interpretation of the First Amendment. In opposition to prevailing understandings that FREEDOM OF THE PRESS afforded guarantees against PRIOR RESTRAINT AND CENSORSHIP, but did not protect a publisher or author from criminal responsibility for statements tending to bring the government or its officers into disrepute, Madison insisted that the federal government was "destitute" of all authority whatever to interfere with the free development and circulation of opinion. In passages with major implications for the future, he denied that a FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES had ever operated and suggested that the essence of elective governments was inconsistent with even STATE ACTION to restrain "that right of freely examining public characters and measures and of free communication of the people thereon, which has ever been justly deemed the only effectual guardian of every other right."

In its constitutional dimensions, the Jeffersonian "Revolution of 1800" was intended by its leaders to restore the threatened federal balance and return the general government to the role and limits originally intended by the people. As Jefferson's secretary of state, principal lieutenant, and eventual successor, Madison continued to believe that governmental actions should "conform to the constitution as understood by the Convention that produced and recommended it, and particularly by the state conventions that adopted it." He conceded that there were occasions that might justify or even command departures from the letter of the Constitution. He defended the LOUISIANA PURCHASE on these grounds, suggesting that a power to acquire new TERRITORIES was inherent in the concept of a sovereign nation. As President, he acted on the basis of implied executive authority in ordering the occupation of West Florida. He even came to recommend rechartering a national bank, maintaining that repeated acts of every part of government, repeatedly approved of by the nation, had overruled his earlier opinion of the institution's unconstitutionality. In his final days in office, nevertheless, he vetoed a bill providing federal support for INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS. Although he favored federal action, he insisted on a constitutional amendment in advance. He still believed, as he had written in his "Letters of Helvidius" in 1793, that "a people who are so happy as to possess the inestimable blessing of a free and defined constitution cannot be too watchful against the introduction nor too critical in tracing the consequences of new principles and new constructions that may remove the landmarks of power."

Madison's regard for fundamental law is not to be confused with a minimalist conception of the constitutional scope of federal powers. He recommended the creation of a national university, although the Constitution delegated no explicit power to erect one. He believed that the Constitution granted Congress plenary authority over commerce, not merely ample power to impose a protective tariff but power even to require a temporary end to foreign trade as in the complete embargo or the various non-intercourse experiments preceding the War of 1812. He was as willing to defend the powers plainly granted to the federal government—over state militias, for example—as he was to guard the liberties protected by the Bill of Rights. Nevertheless, his leadership as President was characterized by deep respect for both the letter and the spirit of the federal compact. If he was diffident in leading Congress into proper preparations for a war, his serious regard for legislative independence was as much at fault as personality or circumstances. If he forbore perhaps too much in the face of flagrantly seditious opposition to the war, this forbearance was not for want of an imaginable alternative. ABRAHAM LINCOLN claimed the powers needed for a greater crisis. Madison deliberately attempted to conduct the War of 1812 at minimal expense to the republican and federal nature of the country. It was at once his weakness and his glory.

The father of the Constitution outlived all the other signers, becoming in his final years a rather troubled, though revered, authority on the creation and construction of the federal charter. The source of his discomfort was his own insistence that the Constitution was a compact among the sovereign peoples of the several states, who remained the only power competent to alter it or to deliver a definitive decision on its meaning. The great Virginian repeatedly denied that this interpretation justified the developing southern doctrine of state INTERPOSITION and NULLIFICATION. He had, in fact, warned Jefferson in 1798 against confusing the constituent authority of the peoples of the states with the powers of an individual state government. Yet neither was he willing to permit the federal courts a power of interpretation that would make the general government the final or exclusive judge in its own cause (or even to concede the courts the power to override the constitutional opinions of the executive and legislative branches). Trapped between his love of Union and his fear of grasping power, he was never able, never willing, to identify an agency or a procedure that, in case of a collision of conflicting understandings of the Constitution, could prevent a revolutionary recourse to the sovereign people. But, then, James Madison was Revolution's child. Admitting that the best constructed government could not secure a nation's liberty if it were not supported by a proper public spirit, he trusted to the end that mutual conciliation and restraint would prove sufficient to preserve the Union he had done so much to shape.

LANCE BANNING
(1986)

Bibliography

BANNING, LANCE 1984 "The Hamiltonian Madison: A Reconsideration." Virginia Magazine of History and Biography 92: 3–28.

BRANT, IRVING 1941–1961 James Madison. 6 Vols. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

KETCHAM, RALPH 1971 James Madison: A Biography. New York: Macmillan.

MCCOY, DREW R. 1980 The Elusive Republic: Political Economy in Jeffersonian America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

WOOD, GORDON S. 1969 The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1789. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

MADISONIAN CONSTITUTION

Constitutional scholars often describe the original Constitution of 1787 and its first ten amendments as Madisonian, and they have two good reasons to do so. First, JAMES MADISON was arguably the central historical actor in every phase of the political movement that led to the adoption of the Constitution, from the calling of the federal CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 to the ratification of the BILL OF RIGHTS in 1791. His preparations for the federal convention shaped its basic agenda and its politics. Even though several of the proposals he most favored were rejected, the completed Constitution still carried the marks of his substantial influence. Second, scholars typically rely on Madison's political writings— especially his most celebrated contributions to THE FEDERALIST—as the most authoritative statements of the underlying theory of politics and government that the Constitution embodied.

If Madison did play the critical role that historians ascribe to him, the reason was not only that experience and intellect suited him to do so, but also that he consciously made the task of promoting the project of constitutional reform his own cause. During his service in the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS (1780–1783), Madison was deeply involved in the effort to ratify and then amend the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, and he pursued the same ends as a member of the Virginia assembly from 1784 to 1786. Though Madison initially worried that the assembly's decision to invite other states to a conference to consider national problems of commerce might backfire, he went to the Annapolis Convention in September 1786 convinced that a radical step was necessary to break the impasse over reforming the Confederation. When it became evident that the meeting was too poorly attended to propose anything of substance, Madison joined the other commissioners in issuing a call for a general convention to meet in Philadelphia in May 1787. He then returned to Virginia to make sure that the assembly took the lead in inviting the other states to appoint delegates for the new convention.

Madison prepared for the convention by reflecting on both the history of other confederations and his own political experiences. These reflections supported one critical conclusion: Any federal union that relied, as did the Confederation, on the voluntary compliance of its member states with national decisions must always prove defective. Instead, the national government needed to be empowered to act directly upon the people, by enacting, executing, and adjudicating its own laws. This conclusion led to two others. First, the convention would need to think seriously about the proper composition of the three essential departments of government—legislative, executive, and judicial. Second, because a well-constructed legislature was bicameral, the rules of apportioning REPRESENTATION in both houses of a future Congress would become a source of controversy. Here Madison was intent on establishing that seats in both houses should be apportioned on the basis of population and perhaps wealth.

The deeper impetus for the solutions Madison wished the convention to adopt reflected his diagnosis of the problems of legislative misrule and popular politics in the individual states. Madison believed that the great source of instability in American government lay in the tendency of the state legislatures to act impulsively and unwisely, especially by enacting laws that violated the due rights of minorities and individuals. The legislature, and especially its lower house, was the branch of government most likely to encroach upon the legitimate powers of the other departments. The great challenge of designing the institutions of republican government was thus to protect the two weaker departments, the executive and judiciary, against legislative domination. But the problem was not merely an institutional one. For when legislatures overstepped their bounds or acted unjustly, Madison reasoned, they were likely to be acting in response to the improper desires of their constituents, or more to the point, the popular majorities whom they represented. To bring stability to republican government, Madison believed, required finding ways to insulate elected representatives from the passions and interests that swayed the electorate.

In drafting the VIRGINIA PLAN just before the Constitutional Convention assembled in May 1787, Madison converted this general diagnosis into a program of reform. Over the next four months, however, he met defeat on most of the crucial proposals that he supported most strongly. The rule of representation adopted for the U.S. SENATE, giving each state an equal vote, Madison thought fundamentally unjust. The Senate would also be elected by the state legislatures, which Madison regarded as nests of political demagoguery. To protect the executive and judiciary against legislative domination, Madison had proposed uniting these two weaker branches into a council of revision armed with a limited VETO POWER over Congress; instead the Constitution gave the veto to the President alone. To correct the vices of state LEGISLATION, Madison proposed giving Congress a veto over all state laws; instead, the Constitution envisioned limited JUDICIAL REVIEW of state legislation by a federal judiciary that Madison feared would be too weak to carry out this task.

The completed Constitution was thus far less Madisonian than Madison would have wished. Yet it is equally true that both the debates at Philadelphia and the document they produced were deeply influenced by Madison's diagnosis of what he called the "vices of the political system of the United States." No other delegate played a more important role in framing the convention's agenda, steering its deliberations, or elevating the tenor of its debates. And even if the Constitution disappointed his expectations, Madison's criticisms of the defects of the Confederation were the foundation on which the new plan of government rested.

After the Constitution was published, Madison agreed to contribute to the series of essays that ALEXANDER HAMILTON planned to publish to support its ratification. Madison's first essay, the tenth Federalist, appeared on November 22, 1787. Its importance was largely neglected by nineteenth-century commentators. But in his influential work, An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution (1913), CHARLES A. BEARD treated Federalist No. 10 as the paradigmatic statement of the political theory of the Constitution, and a host of later commentators who rejected most of Beard's reading of this text have nevertheless echoed the same judgment. Several of Madison's other essays for The Federalist—notably his discussion of FEDERALISM in Nos. 39, 45, and 46, and of the SEPARATION OF POWERS in Nos. 47–51—have attained nearly the same status.

Federalist No. 10 is a critical document because it disputes the conventional wisdom which then held that stable republican governments could safely exist only in compact, relatively homogeneous societies. This posed a formidable objection to the Constitution, because Americans could never approve a national government that did not take a suitably REPUBLICAN FORM. Federalist No. 10 turned this conventional wisdom on its head. The greatest danger to liberty arose when self-interested factions seized control of government, Madison argued, and this was far more likely to happen in small, homogeneous societies than in extended, diverse polities. Creating an extended national republic of diverse interests would reduce this danger, Madison concluded, and it might have the further benefit of enabling a superior class of lawmakers to gain election to Congress, where they could legislate more wisely than their counterparts in the states.

Federalist No. 10 explained why a national republican government was possible, but it did not describe how its institutions would be constructed or how they would operate. These were the subjects to which Madison turned in later essays. In Federalist No. 39, he patiently explained why the new government could only be described as a complicated amalgam of national, federal, and republican features—neither a confederation of fully sovereign states nor a consolidated unitary nation-state. The succeeding essays then provided a case-by-case defense of the particular powers that the proposed Constitution delegated to Congress. In Federalist Nos. 45–46, Madison further suggested that the states would retain significant political advantages over the national government. All of these essays sought to demonstrate that creating an effective national government would still leave the states in possession of their essential powers and even their political influence.

It was in Federalist Nos. 47–51, however, that the second fundamental element of the Madisonian theory of the Constitution became apparent. Here Madison set out to counter two other axioms of contemporary constitutional theory. One held that the best way to protect each of the three branches of government from encroachments by the others was to keep them rigidly separated in their powers and personnel; the other held that the greatest danger to this institutional separation of powers arose from the executive.

Madison countered these positions in several ways. He argued, first, that the theory of rigid separation was rarely followed in either British or American practice, and that indeed some mixture of powers across the branches might prove a better way of preserving the essential separation than an adherence to their rigid separation. Second, in republican governments the real danger to separation came from the "impetuous vortex" of the legislature, which could deploy its rulemaking authority and its superior political influence to overwhelm the other branches. From this it followed, third, that the people could not be expected to rally to the support of the threatened departments; it was far more likely that their passions and interests would inspire the legislature to overstep its bounds. The only security for protecting each branch within its proper sphere, Madison concluded in Federalist No. 51, was to give each branch of government some means of defense (the veto for the President, JUDICIAL REVIEW of legislation for the judiciary, the power of the purse for Congress), but also to encourage alliances between the weaker institutions against the stronger. Read carefully, Federalist No. 51 is really a defense of the potential alliance between the President and Senate against the danger from the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. But its general principle extends further. Rather than rely on a rigid theory of separation, a truly Madisonian constitution would strive to fashion pragmatic mechanisms for preventing any one branch of government from gaining lasting supremacy over the others.

Madison ended Federalist No. 51 with a restatement of the argument of Federalist No. 10, and this provides a revealing clue to his own understanding of the Constitution. If the extended republic worked as the latter essay had earlier predicted, Madison concluded, the actual danger that Congress would dominate the other branches might be mitigated, for the diversity of interests in the larger society should work to discourage the wrong kinds of majorities from forming to pursue their vicious ends. This restatement confirms that Madison himself believed that the benefits of the extended republic would lay the essential foundation of a truly Madisonian constitution.

JACK N. RAKOVE
(2000)

Bibliography

ADAIR, DOUGLASS 1951 The Tenth Federalist Revisited. William and Mary Quarterly 8:48–67.

——— 1957 "That Politics May Be Reduced to a Science": David Hume, James Madison, and the Tenth Federalist. Huntington Library Quarterly 20:343–360.

BANNING, LANCE 1995 The Sacred Fire of Liberty: James Madison and the Founding of the American Republic. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

BEARD, CHARLES A. 1913 An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution. New York: Macmillan.

BOURKE, PAUL 1975 The Pluralist Reading of James Madison's Tenth Federalist. Perspectives in American History 9:271–295.

DAHL, ROBERT 1956 A Preface to Democratic Theory. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

DIAMOND, MARTIN 1959 Democracy and The Federalist: A Reconsideration of the Framers' Intent. American Political Science Review 53:52–68.

EPSTEIN, DAVID F. 1984 The Political Theory of The Federalist. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

KETCHAM, RALPH 1971 James Madison: A Biography. New York: Macmillan.

NEDELSKY, JENNIFER 1990 Private Property and the Limits of American Constitutionalism: The Madisonian Framework and Its Legacy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

RAKOVE, JACK N. 1996 Original Meanings: Politics and Ideas in the Making of the Constitution. New York: Alfred Knopf.

ZVESPER, JOHN 1984 The Madisonian Systems. Western Political Quarterly 37:236–256.

MADISON'S "MEMORIAL AND REMONSTRANCE" (1785)

This remonstrance is the best evidence of what JAMES MADISON, the framer of the FIRST AMENDMENT, meant by an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. In 1784 the Virginia legislature had proposed a bill that benefited "Teachers of the Christian Religion" by assessing a small tax on property owners. Each taxpayer could designate the Christian church of his choice as the recipient of his tax money; the bill allowed non-church members to earmark their taxes for the support of local schools, and it upheld the "liberal principle" that all Christian sects and denominations were equal under the law, none preferred over others. The bill did not speak of the "established religion" of the state as had an aborted bill of 1779, and it purported to be based on only secular considerations, the promotion of the public peace and morality rather than Christ's kingdom on earth. Madison denounced the bill as an establishment of religion, no less dangerous to RELIGIOUS LIBERTY than the proposal of 1779 and differing "only in degree" from the Inquisition.

In an elaborate argument of fifteen parts, Madison advocated a complete SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE as the only guarantee of the equal right of every citizen to the free exercise of religion, including the freedom of those "whose minds have not yet yielded to the evidence which has convinced us." He regarded the right to support religion as an "unalienable" individual right to be exercised only on a voluntary basis. Religion, he contended, must be exempt from the power of society, the legislature, and the magistrate. In his trenchant assault on establishments including the one proposed by this mild bill—"it is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties"—and in his eloquent defense of separation, Madison stressed the point that separation benefited not only personal freedom but also the free state and even religion itself. His remonstrance, which circulated throughout Virginia in the summer of 1785, actually redirected public opinion, resulting in the election of legislators who opposed the bill, which had previously passed a second reading. Madison then introduced THOMAS JEFFERSON's proposal which was enacted into law as the VIRGINIA STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BRANT, IRVING 1948 James Madison, Nationalist 1780–1787. Pages 343–355. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

MADISON'S NOTES OF THE DEBATES

In the oral arguments in OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1824), a lawyer wondered what the intentions were of those who framed the Constitution when they included the CONTRACT CLAUSE. "Unhappily for this country and for the general interest of political science," he added, "the history of the Convention of 1787 which framed the Constitution of the United States is lost to the world." It was not lost, but no one who was not an intimate of JAMES MADISON knew that. Incredibly, JOHN MARSHALL wrote his great opinions on constitutional law and JOSEPH STORY wrote his Commentaries on the Constitution (1833) without knowing that Madison had in his possession his elaborate manuscript record of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

The Father of the Constitution not only wielded the greatest influence on its formation at the Convention, where he delivered over 200 speeches, but he also kept a record of the debates for nearly four months, a task that he later said "almost killed" him. He sat front and center in a "favorable position for hearing all that passed," and daily he composed a transcript from detailed notes kept of each session. Yet the memory that he had performed the task faded from the minds of participants.

In Madison's will of 1835, leaving his papers to his wife, he wrote that given the interest the Constitution "has inspired among friends of free Government, it was not an unreasonable inference that a report of the proceedings and discussions . . . will be particularly gratifying to the people of the United States, and to all who take an interest in the progress of political science and the course of true liberty." Why he failed to publish those records during his lifetime, indeed, why he kept them a secret, is inexplicable.

Madison worked on his manuscript intermittently for many years, revising and expanding as additional information became available. For example, he incorporated material from the official Journal, Acts and Proceedings of the Convention (1819) and even from ROBERT YATES's Secret Proceedings and Debates (1821), an Anti-Federalist work that contained useful details through July 5, 1787, including versions of Madison's own speeches. Madison's revisions of his original manuscript revealed his objective of making the record as full and accurate as possible.

After his death in 1836, Dolley Madison offered his papers to the United States. In 1837 Congress agreed on a price of $30,000, and in 1840, fifty-three years after the Convention, Madison's Notes of the Debates was published for the first of many times. It remains our most important source by far of what happened at the Constitutional Convention.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

MADISON, JAMES 1977 The Papers of James Madison, Robert A. Rutland, ed., vol. 10. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
WARREN, CHARLES 1928 The Making of the Constitution. Boston: Little, Brown.

MAGNA CARTA
(1215)

Magna Carta (Latin, great charter), one of the enduring symbols of LIMITED GOVERNMENT and of the RULE OF LAW, was forced upon an unwilling King John by rebellious barons in June of 1215. Since his accession in 1199, John had made enemies at every quarter. The barons resisted heavy taxation exacted to support the king's expensive and unsuccessful wars with the French. Lesser folk complained that royal officials requisitioned, often without payment, food, timber, horses, and carts. Justice in the courts became more sporadic. Quarreling with Pope Innocent III over the election of a new archbishop of Canterbury, John seized church properties, yielding only when the pope threatened to release the English people from their allegiance to the Crown.

By spring of 1215, the barons' discontent had ripened to the point that they formally renounced their allegiance after the king refused their demands that he confirm their liberties by a charter. Under severe pressure, John agreed to meet the barons at Runnymede. There the barons presented a list of demands, the Articles of the Barons, which were then reduced to the form of a charter—the document that later generations came to call Magna Carta.

The charter to which John agreed is an intensely practical document. Rather than being a philosophical tract redolent with lofty generalities, the charter was drafted to provide concrete remedies for specific abuses. Moreover, although the barons were rebelling against the abuse of royal power, they were not seeking to remake the fabric of feudal society. They sought instead to restore customary limits on the power of the Crown, distinguishing between rule according to law and rule by the imposition of arbitrary will.

The barons' interests were essentially selfish. They did not see themselves as disinterested advocates for the common good of the realm. Nevertheless, because the abuses of John's reign touched so many elements of English society, his opponents' demands had implications far beyond the barons' own interests. For example, the charter begins with the declaration that the liberties therein guaranteed run to "all the free men of our kingdom."

Many of Magna Carta's provisions concern feudal relationships having no counterpart in modern times. Certain of the charter's decrees, however, raise issues as vital now as then. Indeed, some of its provisions anticipate rights now embedded in American constitutional law. Among the more relevant are the following:

Chapter 39 declares, "No freed man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, outlawed, banished, or in any way destroyed, nor will We proceed against or prosecute him, except by the lawful judgment of his peers and by the LAW OF THE LAND." One should not read this language too broadly; for instance, "judgment of his peers" did not mean, as many have supposed, TRIAL BY JURY. But the requirement of proceedings according to the "law of the land" was significant in the development generally of the rule of law and more specifically of the concept of DUE PROCESS OF LAW. Indeed, "due process of law" and "law of the land" became interchangeable.

Chapter 40 states, "To no one will We sell, to none will We deny or delay, right or justice." Like chapter 39, this provision aimed at curbing abuses in the administration of justice. Several chapters (28, 29, 30, 31) relate to abuses in royal officials' requisitioning of private property and thus are the remote ancestor of the requirement of JUST COMPENSATION in the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Other chapters (20, 21, 22) require that fines be "according to the measure" of the offense and that fines not be so heavy as to jeopardize one's ability to make a living—reflecting the principle that the criminal law ought not to be administered in a vindictive or unduly oppressive way. Still other provisions deal with the liberties and free customs of cities and towns, with the free flow of commerce, and with church and state—all of these subjects being continuing concerns of American constitutional law.

Beginning with Henry III (who at age nine succeeded John in 1216), king after king reaffirmed Magna Carta. By the end of the fourteenth century, Magna Carta (which had been placed on the statute books in 1297) had established itself as more than a venerable statute; by then it was a FUNDAMENTAL LAW. In 1368, for example—over 400 years before MARBURY V. MADISON (1803)—a statute of Edward III commanded that Magna Carta "be holden and kept in all Points; and if there be any Statute made to the contrary, it shall be holden for none." Here one sees an early germ of the principle contained in the SUPREMACY CLAUSE of the United States Constitution.

The political turmoil of seventeenth-century England saw such parliamentarians as Sir EDWARD COKE and such pamphleteers as JOHN LILBURNE ("Free-born John") invoking Magna Carta against the pretensions of the Stuart kings. By the end of that century, climaxed by the Glorious Revolution, three new "liberty documents" had been brought into being to stand alongside Magna Carta as assuring the liberties of the subject—the PETITION OF RIGHT (1628), the HABEAS CORPUS ACT (1679), and the BILL OF RIGHTS (1689).

Magna Carta was early carried to the New World. In 1646, some discontented freemen in the Massachusetts colony complained that the laws and liberties they were entitled to as Englishmen were not being enforced. The colony's magistrates responded by drawing up the famous "parallels" of Massachusetts—one column entitled "Magna Charta," the other "fundamentalls of the Massachusetts," the purpose being to argue that the rights assured by Magna Carta and the common law were indeed not denied to the people of Massachusetts. When WILLIAM PENN founded Pennsylvania, he drew upon Magna Carta in drafting the new colony's Frame of Government and, in 1687, was responsible for the first publication in America of Magna Carta.

In the decade between the STAMP ACT (1765) and the outbreak of hostilities with the mother country, Magna Carta became part of the fabric of colonial arguments against British policies. In the petition by the Stamp Act Congress to the king, the Congress declared that both the colonists' right to tax themselves and the right of trial by jury (a right the Crown had circumvented by giving ADMIRALTY courts JURISDICTION to try cases under the Stamp Act) were "confirmed by the Great Charter of English Liberty."

During the period leading up to revolution, the colonists' arguments, in tracts and resolutions, were essentially eclectic. Appeals to the British Constitution, including Magna Carta, were intertwined with arguments that the colonists' entitlement to such rights as taxation only with their consent were based also on the colonial charters and on natural law. As SAMUEL ADAMS put it, Magna Carta itself was a declaration of Britons' "original, inherent, indefeasible NATURAL RIGHTS."

Independence accomplished, the Americans turned to the work of building their own constitutional governments, both state and ultimately federal. The new constitutions reveal both the legacy of British institutions, including Magna Carta, and their perceived limitations. By and large, the contributions of Magna Carta and the other British "liberty" documents are most evident in American bills of rights. Virtually every state constitution has a due process clause, some using the phrase "due process," others using Magna Carta's formulation of "law of the land." For example, the debt owed Magna Carta's chapter 39 is obvious in North Carolina's Declaration of Rights, framed in 1776, "That no freeman ought to be taken, imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold, liberties, or privileges, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, or deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the law of the land."

From the outset, however, American constitutional draftsmen understood their handiwork to go beyond Magna Carta. In North Carolina's ratifying convention (1789), JAMES IREDELL (later to serve on the Supreme Court) called Magna Carta "no constitution" but simply a legislative act, "every article of which the legislature may at any time alter." What Britain lacked, he concluded, the new American constitution supplied.

Throughout the nineteenth century, American courts, both state and federal, commonly invoked Magna Carta in shaping constitutional rights. Thus Magna Carta was relied on in cases involving (to give but a few examples) excessive court costs, open courts and certain remedies, notice and hearing, general application of the laws, and BILLS OF ATTAINDER. Gradually, as a corpus of indigenous American law developed, reliance upon Magna Carta became more and more attenuated, indeed largely rhetorical. By the twentieth century, Magna Carta had long since been irrevocably embedded into the fabric of American CONSTITUTIONALISM, both by contributing specific concepts such as due process of law and by being the ultimate symbol of constitutional government under a rule of law.

A. E. DICK HOWARD
(1986)

Bibliography

HOWARD, A. E. DICK 1968 The Road from Runnymede: Magna Carta and Constitutionalism in America. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia.

MAHAN v. HOWELL
410 U.S. 315 (1973)

The ideal REAPPORTIONMENT, following REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964), would establish state legislative districts of equal populations. The question remained: How much deviation from pure mathematical equality would be tolerated? In Mahan, the Supreme Court approved, 6–3, a deviation of sixteen percent in the districting of Virginia's lower house, justified by the state's "policy of maintaining the integrity of district lines."

In congressional districting, no such deviation from equality is tolerated (White v. Weiser, 1973). However, state legislative districting may include DE MINIMIS departures from equality (up to around ten percent) without any justification (White v. Regester, 1973).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MAHER v. ROE
432 U.S. 464 (1977)

The Supreme Court here sustained, 6–3, a Connecticut law limiting state medicaid assistance for abortions in the first trimester of pregnancy to "medically necessary" abortions (including "psychiatric necessity"), but providing such aid for childbirth. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, for the Court, rejected both the claim that the law violated the right of PRIVACY recognized in ROE V. WADE (1973) and the claim that the state's WEALTH DISCRIMINATION violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause.

There was to be "no retreat from Roe," but Connecticut had placed "no obstacles . . . in the pregnant woman's path to an abortion." An indigent woman suffered no disadvantage from the state's funding of childbirth; she might still have an abortion if she could find the wherewithal; Connecticut had not created her indigency. Nor did the scheme deny equal protection. There was no SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION requiring STRICT SCRUTINY of the law; neither had the state invaded any FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST by discriminating against the exercise of a constitutional right. The law satisfied the RATIONAL BASIS standard, for it was rationally related to promoting the state's interest in protecting potential life—an interest recognized in Roe itself.

Two companion decisions, Poelker v. Doe and Beal v. Doe, upheld a city's refusal to provide hospital services for an indigent woman's nontherapeutic abortion, and read the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT not to require a state to aid nontherapeutic abortions in order to receive federal medicaid grants.

Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, THURGOOD MARSHALL, and HARRY BLACKMUN all filed opinions dissenting in the three cases. They emphasized the "coercive" effect on poor women of the state's financial preference for childbirth, and the particularly harsh effect of adding unwanted children to poor households.

Even before Roe, wealthy women could have abortions by traveling to other states or abroad. Roe brought abortion within the means of middleclass women. The Maher majority Justices declined to extend the effective right to have an abortion beyond the boundaries of their own socioeconomic environment.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Abortion and the Constitution; Harris v. McRae; Reproductive Autonomy.)

MAJORITY OPINION

See: Opinion of the Court

MALLORY v. UNITED STATES

See: McNabb-Mallory Rule

MALLOY v. HOGAN
378 U.S. 1 (1964)

This is one of a series of cases in which the WARREN COURT nationalized the rights of the criminally accused by incorporating provisions of the Fourth through the Eighth Amendments into the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.) In Malloy it was the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. Malloy, a convicted felon on probation, was ordered to testify in a judicial inquiry into gambling activities. He refused to answer any questions concerning the crime for which he had been convicted, and he was held in contempt. Connecticut's highest court, relying on TWINING V. NEW JERSEY (1908) and Adamson v. California (1947), ruled that Malloy's invocation of the Fifth Amendment right had no constitutional basis in the state and that the Fourteenth Amendment did not extend the right to a state proceeding.

The Supreme Court reversed on the ground that the "same standards must determine whether an accused's silence in either a federal or a state proceeding is justified." Had the inquiry been a federal one, said Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN for a 5–4 majority, Malloy would have been entitled to refuse to answer because his disclosures might have furnished a link in a chain of evidence to connect him to a new crime for which he might be prosecuted. The Court held that "the Fifth Amendment exception from compulsory self-incrimination is also protected by the Fourteenth against abridgment by the States." Twining and Adamson, which had held to the contrary, were overruled, although the specific holding in Adamson relating to comments on the accused's failure to testify was not overruled until GRIFFIN V. CALIFORNIA (1965). Thus, Malloy stands for the DOCTRINE that the Fourteenth Amendment protects against state abridgment the same right that the Fifth protects against federal abridgment. Justices BYRON R. WHITE and POTTER STEWART did not expressly dissent from this doctrine; they contended, rather, that Malloy's reliance on his right to silence was groundless on the basis of the facts. Justices JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN and TOM C. CLARK opposed the incorporation of the Fifth Amendment right into the Fourteenth.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MANDAMUS, WRIT OF

(Latin: "We command.") A writ of mandamus is a judicial order to a lower court or to any agency or officer of any department of government, commanding the performance of a nondiscretionary act as a duty of office for the purpose of enforcing or recognizing an individual right or privilege. (See MARBURY V. MADISON.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MANN ACT
36 Stat. 825 (1910)

Congress sought to suppress prostitution in the so-called White Slave Act under the commerce power. Anyone transporting or aiding the transportation of a woman in INTERSTATE or FOREIGN COMMERCE "for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose, or with the intent and purpose to induce, entice, or compel such woman or girl" to such immoral acts was guilty of a FELONY. Persuasion to cross state lines for these purposes "whether with or without her consent" was likewise a felony. Another section doubled the already stiff penalties (five years imprisonment or $5,000) in cases involving women under eighteen years of age. The act also authorized the Commissioner-General of Immigration to "receive and centralize information concerning the procuration of alien women and girls" for such purposes and required brothel-keepers to file statements regarding alien employees, exempting the keepers from prosecution for "truthful statements."

In HOKE V. UNITED STATES (1913) the Supreme Court sustained congressional power to enact the law under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, relying squarely on CHAMPION V. AMES (1903): "Congress, as an incident to [the commerce power] may adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of police regulations."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

MANN-ELKINS ACT
36 Stat. 539 (1910)

The ELKINS ACT of 1903 and the HEPBURN ACT of 1906, as well as the decisions they prompted, had reinvigorated the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) after disastrous Supreme Court decisions such as INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION V. CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY CO. (1897). The Mann-Elkins Act granted the ICC, for the first time, the power to set original rates; it also authorized the commission to suspend applications for proposed rate increases until it had ascertained their reasonableness. Despite the statute's vesting the commission with such powers, determinations of reasonableness would still be subject to the extraordinarily flexible guidelines of the FAIR RETURN rule laid down in SMYTH V. AMES (1898). The act placed the ICC firmly in control by shifting the BURDEN OF PROOF on the question of reasonableness from the commission to the carriers. In addition, the act revived a prohibition against LONG HAUL-SHORT HAUL DISCRIMINATION, except where specifically allowed by the commission. The act also brought telephone, telegraph, and cable lines under ICC JURISDICTION. A unanimous Supreme Court sustained many of the act's provisions in United States v. Atchinson, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad (1914).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

MANSFIELD, LORD

See: Murray, William

MAPP v. OHIO
367 U.S. 643 (1961)

Mapp v. Ohio brought to a close an abrasive constitutional debate within the Supreme Court on the question whether the EXCLUSIONARY RULE, constitutionally required in federal trials since 1914, was also required in state criminal cases. Mapp imposed the rule on the states.

WOLF V. COLORADO (1949) had applied to the states the FOURTH AMENDMENT's prohibition against UNREASONABLE SEARCHES, but it had not required state courts to exclude from trial evidence so obtained. Mapp's extension of Wolf was based on two considerations. First, in Wolf the Court had been persuaded by the rejection of the exclusionary rule by most state courts; by 1961, however, a narrow majority of the states had independently adopted the rule. Second, the Wolf majority was convinced that other remedies, such as suits in tort against offending officers, could serve equally in deterring unlawful searches; time, however, had shown that such remedies were useless. "Nothing can destroy a government more quickly than its failure to observe its own laws," wrote Justice TOM C. CLARK for the Court, "or worse, its disregard of the charter of its own existence."

In Mapp v. Ohio the Court asserted emphatically that the exclusionary rule was "an essential part" of the Fourth Amendment and hence a fit subject for imposition on the states despite "passing references" in earlier cases to its being a nonconstitutional rule of evidence. Yet, in some hazy phrasing, the opinion also suggested that the Fifth Amendment's RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION was the exclusionary rule's constitutional backbone. Equally confusing was the Court's characterization of the rule as "the most important constitutional privilege" (that is, personal right) guaranteed by the Fourth Amendment while at the same time pointing to the rule's deterrent effect as justification for its imposition. More recently, the Court has settled on deterrence as the crucial consideration, and thus has refused to apply the rule in situations, such as GRAND JURY proceedings in CALANDRA V. UNITED STATES (1974), where in the Court's view the deterrent effect is minimal.

Three dissenters, in an opinion by Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, expressed "considerable doubt" that the federal exclusionary rule of WEEKS V. UNITED STATES (1914) was constitutionally based and argued that, in any event, considerations of FEDERALISM should allow the states to devise their own remedies for unlawful searches.

(Unlike the well-entrenched federal exclusionary rule, which has gone well-nigh unchallenged on the Court from the beginning, controversy concerning the rule for the states has continued unabated, both on and off the Court, since Mapp was decided.)

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

MARBURY v. MADISON
1 Cranch 137 (1803)

Marbury has transcended its origins in the party battles between Federalists and Republicans, achieving mythic status as the foremost precedent for JUDICIAL REVIEW. For the first time the Court held unconstitutional an act of Congress, establishing, if only for posterity, the doctrine that the Supreme Court has the final word among the coordinate branches of the national government in determining what is law under the Constitution. By 1803 no one doubted that an unconstitutional act of government was null and void, but who was to judge? What Marbury settled, doctrinally if not in reality, was the Court's ultimate authority over Congress and the President. Actually, the historic reputation of the case is all out of proportion to the merits of Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALLS unanimous opinion for the Court. On the issue of judicial review, which made the case live, he said nothing new, and his claim for the power of the Court occasioned little contemporary comment. The significance of the case in its time derived from its political context and from the fact that the Court appeared successfully to interfere with the executive branch. Marshall's most remarkable accomplishment, in retrospect, was his massing of the Court behind a poorly reasoned opinion that section 13 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 was unconstitutional. Though the Court's legal craftsmanship was not evident, its judicial politics—egregious partisanship and calculated expediency—was exceptionally adroit, leaving no target for Republican retaliation beyond frustrated rhetoric.

Republican hostility to the United States courts, which were Federalist to the last man as well as Federalist in doctrine and interests, had mounted increasingly and passed the threshold of tolerance when the Justices on circuit enforced the Sedition Act. (See ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS.) Then the lame-duck Federalist administration passed the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801 and, a week before THOMAS JEFFERSON's inauguration, passed the companion act for the appointment of forty-two justices of the peace for the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, prompting the new President to believe that "the Federalists have retired into the Judiciary as a stronghold . . . and from that battery all the works of republicanism are to be beaten down and erased." The new Circuit Court for the District of Columbia sought in vain to obtain the conviction of the editor of the administration's organ in the capital for the common law crime of SEDITIOUS LIBEL. The temperate response of the new administration was remarkable. Instead of increasing the size of the courts, especially the Supreme Court, and packing them with Republican appointees, the administration simply repealed the Judiciary Act of 1801. (See JUDICIARY ACTS OF 1802.) On taking office Jefferson also ordered that the commissions for the forty-two justices of the peace for the district be withheld, though he reappointed twenty-five, all political enemies originally appointed by President JOHN ADAMS.

Marbury v. Madison arose from the refusal of the administration to deliver the commissions of four of these appointees, including one William Marbury. The Senate had confirmed the appointments and Adams had signed their commissions, which Marshall, the outgoing secretary of state, had affixed with the great seal of the United States. But in the rush of the "midnight appointments" on the evening of March 3, the last day of the outgoing administration, Marshall had neglected to deliver the commissions. Marbury and three others sought from the Supreme Court, in a case of ORIGINAL JURISDICTION, a WRIT OF MANDAMUS compelling JAMES MADISON, the new secretary of state, to issue their commissions. In December 1801 the Court issued an order commanding Madison to show cause why the writ should not be issued.

A congressman reflected the Republican viewpoint when saying that the show-cause order was "a bold stroke against the Executive," and JOHN BRECKINRIDGE, the majority leader of the Senate, thought the order "the most daring attack which the annals of Federalism have yet exhibited." When the debate began on the repeal bill, Federalists defended the show-cause order, the independence of the judiciary, and the duty of the Supreme Court to hold void any unconstitutional acts of Congress. A Republican paper declared that the "mandamus business" had first appeared to be only a contest between the judiciary and the executive but now seemed a political act by the Court to deter repeal of the 1801 legislation. In retaliation the Republicans passed the repealer and altered the terms of the Court so that it would lose its June 1802 session and not again meet until February 1803, fourteen months after the show-cause order. The Republicans hoped, as proved to be the case, that the Justices would comply with the repealer and return to circuit duty, thereby averting a showdown and a constitutional crisis, which the administration preferred to avoid.

By the time the Court met in February 1803 to hear arguments in Marbury, which had become a political sensation, talk of IMPEACHMENT was in the air. A few days before the Court's term, Federalists in Congress moved that the Senate should produce for Marbury's benefit records of his confirmation, provoking Senator James Jackson to declare that the Senate would not interfere in the case and become "a party to an accusation which may end in an impeachment, of which the Senate were the constitutional Judges." By no coincidence, a week before the Court met, Jefferson instructed the House to impeach a U.S. District Court judge in New Hampshire, and already Federalists knew of the plan to impeach Justice SAMUEL CHASE. Jefferson's desire to replace John Marshall with SPENCER ROANE was also public knowledge. Right before Marshall delivered the Court's opinion in Marbury, the Washington correspondent of a Republican paper wrote: "The attempt of the Supreme Court . . . by a mandamus, to control the Executive functions, is a new experiment. It seems to be no less than a commencement of war. . . . The Court must be defeated and retreat from the attack; or march on, till they incur an impeachment and removal from office."

Marshall and his Court appeared to confront unattractive alternatives. To have issued the writ, which was the expected judgment, would have been like the papal bull against the moon; Madison would have defied it, exposing the Court's impotence, and the Republicans might have a pretext for retaliation based on the Court's breach of the principle of SEPARATION OF POWERS. To have withheld the writ would have violated the Federalist principle that the Republican administration was accountable under the law. ALEXANDER HAMILTON's newspaper reported the Court's opinion in a story headed "Constitution Violated by President," informing its readers that the new President by his first act had trampled on the charter of the peoples' liberties by unprincipled, even criminal, conduct against personal rights. Yet the Court did not issue the writ; the victorious party was Madison. But Marshall exhibited him and the President to the nation as if they were arbitrary Stuart tyrants, and then, affecting judicial humility, Marshall in obedience to the Constitution found that the Court could not obey an act of Congress that sought to aggrandize judicial powers in cases of original jurisdiction, contrary to Article III of the Constitution.

The Court was treading warily. The statute in question was not a Republican measure, not, for example, the repealer of the Judiciary Act of 1801. Indeed, shortly after Marbury, the Court sustained the repealer in STUART V. LAIRD (1803) against arguments that it was unconstitutional. In that case the Court ruled that the practice of the Justices in sitting as circuit judges derived from the Judiciary Act of 1789, and therefore derived "from a contemporary interpretation of the most forcible nature," as well as from customary acquiescence. Ironically, another provision of the same statute, section 13, was at issue in Marbury, not that the bench and bar realized it until Marshall delivered his opinion. The offending section, passed by a Federalist Congress after being drafted by OLIVER ELLSWORTH, one of the Constitution's Framers and Marshall's predecessor, had been the subject of previous litigation before the Court without anyone having thought it was unconstitutional. Section 13 simply authorized the Court to issue writs of mandamus "in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law," and that clause appeared in the context of a reference to the Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

Marshall's entire argument hinged on the point that section 13 unconstitutionally extended the Court's original jurisdiction beyond the two categories of cases, specified in Article III, in which the Court was to have such jurisdiction. But for those two categories of cases, involving foreign diplomats or a state as a litigant, the Court has appellate jurisdiction. In quoting Article III, Marshall omitted the clause that directly follows as part of the same sentence: the Court has appellate jurisdiction "with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." That might mean that Congress can detract from the Court's appellate jurisdiction or add to its original jurisdiction. The specification of two categories of cases in which the Court has original jurisdiction was surely intended as an irreducible minimum, but Marshall read it, by the narrowest construction, to mean a negation of congressional powers.

In any event, section 13 did not add to the Court's original jurisdiction. In effect it authorized the Court to issue writs of mandamus in the two categories of cases of original jurisdiction and in all appellate cases. The authority to issue such writs did not extend or add to the Court's jurisdiction; the writ of mandamus is merely a remedial device by which courts implement their existing jurisdiction. Marshall misinterpreted the statute and Article III, as well as the nature of the writ, in order to find that the statute conflicted with Article III. Had the Court employed the reasoning of Stuart v. Laird or the rule that the Court should hold a statute void only in a clear case, giving every presumption of validity in doubtful cases, Marshall could not have reached his conclusion that section 13 was unconstitutional. That conclusion allowed him to decide that the Court was powerless to issue the writ because Marbury had sued for it in a case of original jurisdiction.

Marshall could have said, simply, this is a case of original jurisdiction but it does not fall within either of the two categories of original jurisdiction specified in Article III; therefore we cannot decide: writ denied, case dismissed. Section 13 need never have entered the opinion, although, alternatively, Marshall could have declared: section 13 authorizes this Court to issue such writs only in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law; we have no jurisdiction here because we are not hearing the case in our appellate capacity and it is not one of the two categories in which we possess original jurisdiction: writ denied, case dismissed. Even if Marshall had to find that the statute augmented the Court's original jurisdiction, the ambiguity of the clause in Article III, which he neglected to quote, justified sustaining the statute.

Holding section 13 unconstitutional enabled Marshall to refuse an extension of the Court's powers and award the judgment to Madison, thus denying the administration a pretext for vengeance. Marshall also used the case to answer Republican arguments that the Court did not and should not have the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, though he carefully chose an inoffensive section of a Federalist statute that pertained merely to writs of mandamus. That he gave his doctrine of judicial review the support of only abstract logic, without reference to history or precedents, was characteristic, as was the fact that his doctrine swept way beyond the statute that provoked it.

If Marshall had merely wanted a safe platform from which to espouse and exercise judicial review, he would have begun his opinion with the problems that section 13 posed for the Court; but he reached the question of constitutionality and of judicial review at the tail-end of his opinion. Although he concluded that the Court had to discharge the show-cause order, because it lacked jurisdiction, he first and most irregularly passed judgment on the merits of the case. Everything said on the merits was OBITER DICTA and should not have been said at all, given the judgment. Most of the opinion dealt with Marbury's unquestionable right to his commission and the correctness of the remedy he had sought by way of a writ of mandamus. In his elaborate discourse on those matters, Marshall assailed the President and his cabinet officer for their lawlessness. Before telling Marbury that he had initiated his case in the wrong court, Marshall engaged in what EDWARD S. CORWIN called "a deliberate partisan coup." Then Marshall followed with a "judicial coup d'etat," in the words of ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE, on the constitutional issue that neither party had argued.

The partisan coup by which Marshall denounced the executive branch, not the grand declaration of the doctrine of judicial review for which the case is remembered, was the focus of contemporary excitement. Only the passages on judicial review survive. Cases on the REMOVAL POWER of the President, especially concerning inferior appointees, cast doubt on the validity of the dicta by which Marshall lectured the executive branch on its responsibilities under the law. Moreover, by statute and by judicial practice the Supreme Court exercises the authority to issue writs of mandamus in all appellate cases and in the two categories of cases of original jurisdiction. Over the passage of time Marbury came to stand for the monumental principle, so distinctive and dominant a feature of our constitutional system, that the Court may bind the coordinate branches of the national government to its rulings on what is the supreme LAW OF THE LAND. That principle stands out from Marbury like the grin on the Cheshire cat; all else, which preoccupied national attention in 1803, disappeared in our constitutional law. So too might have disappeared national judicial review if the impeachment of Chase had succeeded.

Marshall himself was prepared to submit to review of Supreme Court opinions by Congress. He was so shaken by the impeachment of Chase and by the thought that he himself might be the next victim in the event of Chase's conviction, that he wrote to Chase on January 23, 1804: "I think the modern doctrine of impeachment should yield to an appellate jurisdiction in the legislature. A reversal of those legal opinions deemed unsound by the legislature would certainly better comport with the mildness of our character than a removal of the judge who has rendered them unknowing of his fault." The acquittal of Chase meant that the Court could remain independent, that Marshall had no need to announce publicly his desperate plan for congressional review of the Court, and that Mar- bury remained as a precedent. Considering that the Court did not again hold unconstitutional an act of Congress until 1857, when it decided DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD, sixty-eight years would have passed since 1789 without such a holding, and but for Marbury, after so long a period of congressional omnipotence, national judicial review might never have been established.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BEVERIDGE, ALBERT J. 1916–1919 The Life of John Marshall, 4 vols. Vol. III:50–178. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1914 The Doctrine of Judicial Review. Pages 1–78. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

HAINES, CHARLES GROVE 1944 The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government and Politics, 1789–1835. Pages 223–258. Berkeley: University of California Press.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM W. 1969 A Critical Guide to Marbury v. Madison. Duke Law Journal 1969:1–47.

WARREN, CHARLES 1923 The Supreme Court in United States History, 3 vols. Vol. I:200–268. Boston: Little, Brown.

MARCHETTI v. UNITED STATES
390 U.S. 39 (1968)

GROSSO v. UNITED STATES
390 U.S. 62 (1968)

HAYNES v. UNITED STATES
390 U.S. 85 (1968)

UNITED STATES v. UNITED STATES COIN & CURRENCY
401 U.S. 715 (1971)

In Marchetti and Grosso the Supreme Court, in opinions by Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN from which only Chief Justice EARL WARREN dissented, held that the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION constituted an ironclad defense against a criminal prosecution for failure to register as a gambler pursuant to federal gambling statutes or to pay federal occupational and EXCISE TAXES on gambling. The Court overruled United States v. Kahriger (1953) and Lewis v. United States (1955), which had held that the Fifth Amendment right could not be asserted by professional gamblers because the federal gambling laws did not compel self-incrimination. In those earlier cases the Court reasoned that the right was inapplicable to prospective acts: a gambler had the initial choice of deciding whether to continue gambling at the price of surrendering his right against self-incrimination, or cease gambling and thereby avoid the need to register and pay the taxes. In 1968 the Court found its earlier reasoning "no longer persuasive."

Justice Harlan explained how the statutes worked. A gambler had an obligation to register annually with the Internal Revenue Service as one engaged in the business of accepting wagers. He paid a $50 occupational tax plus an excise tax of ten percent on the gross amount of all bets. He had to keep daily records of all bets and reveal those records to IRS inspectors. The issue posed by such congressional requirements was not whether the United States may tax gambling, for the unlawfulness of an activity did not preclude its taxation. The issue, rather, was whether the registration, record-keeping, and tax provisions whipsawed gamblers into confessing criminal activities. Federal and state laws made gambling illegal, and the IRS made available to law enforcement agencies the identities of those who complied with the gambling statutes. Gamblers therefore confronted substantial hazards of self-incrimination. On pain of punishment for not complying, they had to provide prosecutors with evidence of their guilt.

Marchetti was convicted of failing to register and pay the occupational tax, Grosso for failing to pay that tax and the excises. Reversing their convictions, the Court distinguished their cases from those in which a criminal had failed to file income tax returns for fear of self-incrimination and another in which the government had required record keeping from persons not engaged in an inherently suspect activity. The mere filing of a tax return, required of all, or the failure to keep routine business records did not identify anyone as a suspect of a crime. In Haynes, the Court ruled that a person possessing a sawed-off shotgun is suspect and therefore cannot be compelled to register his weapon, under the National Firearms Act, because of the hazard of self-incrimination. In United States Coin & Currency a 5–4 Court applied the Marchetti reasoning to a forfeiture proceeding involving property used to violate federal gambling laws.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS

The "marketplace of ideas" argument in FIRST AMENDMENT jurisprudence was first enunciated in Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES's dissenting opinion in ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919):

> But when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of > thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution. It is an experiment, as all life is an experiment. . . . While that experiment is part of our system I think that we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe and believe to be fraught with death, unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purpose of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country.

Holmes's stirring words recall similar but distinct passages from JOHN MILTON and JOHN STUART MILL. Extravagant as Holmes's passage is, it is in significant respects more careful than the implications of Milton's rhetorical question: "[W]ho ever knew truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter?" Holmes did not claim that truth always or even usually emerges in the marketplace of ideas. Holmes's claim was more confined—that the best test of truth is the competition of the marketplace.

On the other hand, Milton spoke of a free and open encounter; Holmes spoke of the competition of the marketplace. A recurrent problem in First Amendment cases is that these two notions are not the same. Those who seek access to the broadcast media, as in RED LION BROADCASTING V. FCC (1969), or to powerful newspapers, as in MIAMI HERALD PUBLISHING CO. V. TORNILLO (1974), argue that the competition of the marketplace is not free and open. They urge that truth cannot emerge in the market if the gatekeepers do not let it in. A more general criticism of the Holmes position is that the claim that the marketplace is the best test of truth cannot itself be tested without an independent test of truth, yet the argument by its terms denies any superior test of truth that is independent of the marketplace.

These criticisms aside, the question arises whether the marketplace argument overvalues truth. Holmes's view that the expression of opinion should be free until an immediate check is needed to "save the country" has never been adopted by the Supreme Court. Advocacy of illegal action, for example, may be restricted when it is directed to and likely to incite or produce imminent lawless action, whether or not the country itself is endangered. Indeed, if the marketplace argument extends to facts as well as opinions, it is clear that showings far more pedestrian than Holmes's proposed requirements are sufficient to justify repression. The expression of factual beliefs can be restricted in order to protect reputation or privacy, and, in the commercial sphere, to further any substantial government interest.

Nonetheless, the marketplace argument has been a powerful theme in First Amendment law. For example, some defamatory facts and all defamatory opinion are protected in order to guarantee the breathing space we need for robust, uninhibited, and wide-open debate. Ironically, however, the marketplace argument serves to restrict speech as well as to protect it. "Under our Constitution," said the Court in GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974), "there is no such thing as a false idea," yet obscenity is divorced from speech protection because it is thought to be unnecessary for the expression of any idea. At bottom, First Amendment methodology is grounded in a paradox. Government must be restrained from imposing its views of truth. But government itself determines when this principle has been abandoned.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

Bibliography

SCHAUER, FREDERICK 1978 Language, Truth and the First Amendment: An Essay in Memory of Harry Canter. Virginia Law Review 64:263, 268–272.

MARRIAGE AND THE CONSTITUTION

Although the constitutional "right to marry" was not securely confirmed by the Supreme Court until its decision in ZABLOCKI V. REDHAIL (1978), the Court had spoken of the freedom to marry as a FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT "liberty" as early as MEYER V. NEBRASKA (1923). Two WARREN COURT decisions had also laid the foundations for SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS protections of marriage. GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) had recognized a RIGHT OF PRIVACY for the marital relationship, and LOVING V. VIRGINIA (1967) had struck down a MISCEGENATION law not only as an unconstitutional RACIAL DISCRIMINATION but also as a due process violation. The Loving opinion was explicit enough in speaking of the "freedom to marry," but doubt lingered that the Court meant to carry the principle beyond the racial context of the decision.

Zablocki ended the doubt. The Court held invalid, on equal protection grounds, a law forbidding a resident to marry without a judge's approval when he or she had court-ordered child support obligations. The judge could not approve the marriage unless support payments were kept current and the children were unlikely to become public charges. Some concurring Justices thought the law defective on due process grounds. Zablocki's importance turns not on this doctrinal distinction but on its explicit recognition of marriage as a FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST, requiring STRICT SCRUTINY by the courts of direct and substantial governmental interference.

Just two months earlier, however, in Califano v. Jobst (1977), the Court had upheld a portion of the SOCIAL SE-CURITY ACT terminating disability benefits for a disabled dependent child of a wage earner when the child married a person not entitled to benefits under the act, even though that person was also disabled. Much of the discussion in Zablocki's several opinions was devoted to Jobst. The majority distinguished Jobst as lacking the "directness and substantiality of the interference with the freedom to marry" present in Zablocki. The message was clear: interferences with marriage would demand justification in proportion to their degrees of severity. In Zablocki as in Jobst a money cost was attached to marriage; in Zablocki that cost would be prohibitive in most cases covered by the law.

This version of judicial interest-balancing seems likely to uphold such state restrictions on marriage as blood tests, reasonable age requirements, and insistence on a mentally retarded person's ability to understand the nature of the marriage relationship, even when those restrictions are strictly scrutinized. On principle, the state's power to prohibit POLYGAMY or to deny homosexual couples marriage or some comparable status seems more vulnerable to attack. It would be unrealistic, however, to expect an extension of the constitutional right to marry to homosexuals in the near future. (See SEXUAL PREFERENCE AND THE CONSTITUTION.) And recognition of a constitutional right to multiple marriage is a poor bet even for the distant future.

The extension of constitutional protection to other intimate relationships more closely resembling traditional marriage is already at hand. Griswold's "privacy" protections have been effectively extended to the unmarried in EISENSTADT V. BAIRD (1972) and CAREY V. POPULATION SERVICES INTERNATIONAL (1977). Some states continue to recognize common law marriage, and others have concluded that support obligations may attach to the partners to some informal unions, once the unions end. As the number of unmarried couples living together increases, and as the incidents of unwed union come to resemble those of traditional marriage, formal marriage itself is more clearly seen in its expressive aspects, as a statement of commitment. In these circumstances it makes good sense to think of the right to marry as, in part, a FIRST AMENDMENT right.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Freedom of Intimate Association; Same-Sex Marriage.)

Bibliography

KARST, KENNETH L. 1980 The Freedom of Intimate Association. Yale Law Journal 89:624–692.

NOTE 1980 Developments in the Law: The Constitution and the Family. Harvard Law Review 93:1156–1383, 1248–1296.

MARSH v. ALABAMA
326 U.S. 501 (1946)

When a person sought to distribute religious literature on the streets of a company town, the Supreme Court, 5–3, upheld her FIRST AMENDMENT claim against the owner's private property claims. Stressing the traditional role of free speech in town shopping districts open to the general public, Justice HUGO L. BLACK for the Court noted that, aside from private ownership, this town functioned exactly as did other towns which were constitutionally forbidden to ban leafleting. Marsh served as the basis for the later attempt, aborted in HUDGENS V. NLRB (1976), to extend First Amendment rights to users of privately owned SHOPPING CENTERS.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

MARSH v. CHAMBERS
463 U.S. 783 (1983)

A 6–3 Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of legislative chaplaincies as not violating the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE mandated by the FIRST AMENDMENT. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER for the Court abandoned the three-part test of LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971) previously used in cases involving the establishment clause and grounded his opinion wholly upon historical custom. Prayers by tax-supported legislative chaplains, traceable to the FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS and the very Congress that framed the BILL OF RIGHTS, had become "part of the fabric of our society." Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, dissenting, asserted that Nebraska's practice of having the same Presbyterian minister as the official chaplain for sixteen years preferred one denomination over others. Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and THURGOOD MARSHALL, dissenting, attacked legislative chaplains generally as a form of religious worship sponsored by government to promote and advance religion and entangling the government with religion, contrary to the values implicit in the establishment clause—privacy in religious matters, government neutrality, freedom of conscience, autonomy of religious life, and withdrawal of religion from the political arena.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MARSHALL, JOHN
(1755–1835)

John Marshall, the third CHIEF JUSTICE of the Supreme Court (1801–1835), is still popularly known as the "Great Chief Justice" and the "Expounder of the Constitution." He was raised in the simple circumstances of backwoods Virginia, but his mother was pious and well educated and his father was a leader of his county and a friend of GEORGE WASHINGTON. Even though Marshall had little formal education, his extraordinary powers of mind, coupled with equity and good humor, made him a natural leader as a young soldier of the Revolution, as a member of the Richmond bar (then outstanding in the country), and as a general of the Virginia militia. He became nationally prominent as a diplomat, having outwitted the wily Charles Talleyrand while negotiating with France's Directory (1797–1798), and as a legislator, having supported Washington's FEDERALISM first in the Virginia Assembly (1782–1791, 1795–1797) and then in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES (1799–1800). In June 1800 President JOHN ADAMS named Marshall to replace the Hamiltonian John Pickering as secretary of state, and in January 1801, after the strife-ridden Federalists' epochal defeat, appointed him Chief Justice when JOHN JAY, the first Chief Justice, declined to preside again over "a system so defective."

From its inception Marshall had defended the Constitution. His experience in Washington's ragtag army had made him a national patriot while rousing his disgust with the palsied Confederation. At the crucial Virginia ratifying convention (June 1788) he replied in three important speeches to the fears of PATRICK HENRY and other Anti-Federalists. The proposed Constitution, he argued, was not undemocratic, but a plan for a "well-regulated democracy." It set forth in particular the great powers of taxing and warring needed by any sound government. The state governments would retain all powers not given up expressly or implicitly; they were independently derived from the people. A mix of dependence upon the people and independence and virtue in the judges would prevent federal overreaching. If a law were not "warranted by any of the powers enumerated," Marshall remarked prophetically, the judges would declare it "void" as infringing "the Constitution they are to guard." Two other nonjudicial interpretations of the Constitution are notable. In 1799 Marshall wrote a report of the Virginia Federalists defending the constitutionality of the ill-famed Sedition Act of 1798 (a law he nevertheless had opposed as divisive in the explosive political atmosphere surrounding the French Revolution). If the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE authorizes punishment of actual resistance to law, he argued, it also authorizes punishment of "calumnious" speech, which is criminal under the COMMON LAW and prepares resistance. A speech to Congress in 1800, once famous in collections of American rhetoric, defended the President's power required by JAY'S TREATY to extradite a British subject charged with murder on a British ship. Because the criminal and the location were foreign, Marshall argued, the question was not a case in law or equity for United States courts; although a treaty is a law, it is a "political law," the execution of which lies with the President, not the courts. The judiciary has no political power whatever; the President is "the sole organ of the nation in its external relations."

As Chief Justice, Marshall raised the office and the Supreme Court to stature and power previously lacking. After having two Chief Justices in eleven years, the Court had Marshall for thirty-four, the longest tenure of any Chief Justice before or since. Individual opinions SERIATIM largely ceased, and dissents were discouraged. The Court came to speak with one voice. Usually the voice was Marshall's. He delivered the OPINION OF THE COURT in every case in which he participated during the decisive first five years, three-quarters of the opinions during the next seven years, and almost all the great constitutional opinions throughout his tenure. Marshall's captivating and equable temper helped unite a diverse group of justices, many appointed by Republican Presidents bent on reversing the Court's declarations of federal power and restrictions of state power. In the face of triumphant Jeffersonian Republicans, suspicious of an unelected judiciary stocked with Federalists, Marshall was wary and astute. His Court never erred as the JAY COURT did in CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793), which had provoked the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT as a corrective. Nor did he cast antidemocratic contentions in the teeth of the Jeffersonians or their Jacksonian successors, thus to provoke (as had Justice Samuel Chase) impeachment proceedings. Marshall's judicial opinions encouraged grave respect for law, treated the Constitution as sacred and its Founding Fathers as sainted men, and fashioned a protective and compelling shield of purpose, principle, and reasoning.

His crucial judicial accomplishment was MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), which laid down the essentials of the American RULE OF LAW. Judges are to oversee executive and legislature alike, keeping the political departments faithful to applicable statutes, to the written Constitution, and to "general principles" of law protecting individual rights and delimiting the functions of each department. A series of important decisions secured individual rights, especially the right to acquire property by contract, against state and general governments. United States v. Burr (1807) expounded a narrow constitutional definition of TREASON and made prosecution difficult. STURGES V. CROWNINSHIELD (1819) set strict standards for voiding debts by bankruptcy. FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) and DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819) enforced as judicially protected contracts a state's sale of land and a state's grant of a corporate charter. Finally, several of Marshall's most famous opinions elaborated great powers for the national government and protected them from state encroachment.

MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) sustained Congress's authority to charter a bank and in general to employ broad discretion as to necessary and proper means for carrying out national functions. GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), the steamboat case, interpreted congressional power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE to protect a national market, a right of exchange free from state-supported monopoly. COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821) eloquently defended Supreme Court review of state court decisions involving FEDERAL QUESTIONS.

The presupposition of Marshall's CONSTITUTIONALISM was that the Constitution is FUNDAMENTAL LAW, not merely a fundamental plan, written to impose limits, not just to raise powers, and designed to be permanent, not to evolve or to be fundamentally revised. Interpretation is to follow the words and purposes of the various provisions; amendment is for subordinate changes that will allow "immortality" to the Framers' primary work. Marshall called a written constitution America's "greatest improvement on political institutions." It renders permanent the institutions raised by popular consent, which is the only basis of rightful government. Besides, the American nation was fortunate in its founding: it benefited from a remarkable plan, from a fortunate ratification in the face of jealousy and suspicion in states and people, and from the extraordinary firmness of the first President. Washington had settled the new federal institutions and conciliated public opinion, despite the "infinite difficulty" of ratification and a crescendo of attacks upon his administration as monarchic, aristocratic, and anglophile. So Marshall argued in the penetrating (if somewhat wooden) Life of George Washington, a biography he condensed into a schoolbook to impress on his countrymen the character and political principles of "the greatest man in the world."

Marshall understood the Constitution to establish a government, not a league such as that created by the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. The new government possessed sovereign powers of two sorts, legal (the judicial power) and political (legislative and executive). The special function of judges is to apply the law to individuals. It is a power extensive although not, Marshall consistently said, political or policy-oriented. Judicial JURISDICTION extends as far as does the law: common law, statute law, Constitution, treaties, and the law of nations (which Marshall influenced by several luminous opinions). In applying the law to individuals, courts are to care for individual rights, the very object of government in general. By "nature" or by "definition," courts are "those tribunals which are established for the security of property and to decide on human rights." Such rights are contained either in explicit constitutional provisions and amendments, or in "unwritten or common law," which the Constitution presupposes as the substratum of our law (and which Marshall thought was spelled out in traditional law books, such as Sir WILLIAM BLACKSTONE's Commentaries on the Laws of England). In short, courts are to construe all law in the light of the rights of person and property that are the object of law—as well as in the light of the constitutional authority of the other branches.

Marshall was fond of contrasting the Americans' "rational liberty," which afforded "solid safety and real security," with revolutionary France's "visionary" civic liberty, which had led to a despotism "borrowing the garb and usurping the name of freedom." While trying AARON BURR, Marshall repeatedly noted the "tenderness" of American law for the rights of the accused. His Life of Washington mixes praise of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and of conscience with attacks on religious persecution. Yet Marshall also said that morals and free institutions need to be "cherished" by public opinion; he would not suppose that a free MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS insures progress in public enlightenment. He did suppose that a rather free economic marketplace would lead to progress in national wealth. Marshall defended property rights in the sense of rights of contract or vested rights, rights that vest under contract and originate in a right to the fruits of one's labor and enterprise. By protecting industrious acquisitions the judiciary fosters the dynamic economy of free enterprise. Rational liberty is prudent liberty, which breeds power as well as wealth: the "legitimate greatness" of a "widespreading, rising empire," extending from "the Ste. Croix to the Gulph of Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific." By directly securing the rights of property, courts indirectly secure the "vast republic."

While courts are "the mere instruments of the law, and can will nothing," or at most possess a legal discretion governed by unwritten principles of individual rights, the executive and legislature enjoy broad political discretion for the safety and interrelation of all. President and Congress are indeed subordinate to the Constitution of ENUMERATED POWERS and explicit restrictions. Marshall did not follow ALEXANDER HAMILTON, and would not have followed some later Supreme Courts, in inferring a plenary legislative power. His arguments, however, take aim at enemies on the other flank, at Jeffersonian strict constructionists who allowed only powers explicit in the Constitution or necessarily deduced from explicit powers. A constitution of government is not a "legal code," Marshall replied, and its enumerated powers are vested fully and encompass the full panoply of appropriate means. In McCulloch, Marshall set forth the core of the American doctrine of SOVEREIGNTY: the need for great governmental powers to confront inevitable crises. Maryland had placed a prohibitive tax on a branch of the national bank, and its counsel denied federal authority to charter a bank (a power not explicit in the Constitution). Ours is a constitution, Marshall replied, "intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." Armies must be marched and taxes raised throughout the land. "Is that construction of the Constitution to be preferred which would render these operations difficult, hazardous, and expensive?" In a similar spirit Marshall defended an executive vigorous in war and FOREIGN AFFAIRS and able to overawe faction and rebellion at home. He struck down, as violating Congress's power to regulate commerce among the states, state acts imposing import taxes or reserving monopolistic privileges. The arguments are typical. Great powers are granted for great objects. A narrow interpretation would defeat the object: the words must be otherwise construed. Thus a nation is raised. Individual enterprise, a national flow of trade, and the bonds of mutual interest breach barriers of state, section, and custom. The machinery of government is geared for great efforts of direction and coercion. The national sovereign, limited in its tasks, supreme in all means needed for their accomplishment, rises over the once independent state sovereignties. Marshall acknowledged the states' independent powers as well as the complexities of federalism: America was "for many purposes an entire nation, and for others several distinct and independent sovereignties." He tried above all to protect the federal government's superior powers from what the Framers had most feared, the encroachments of the states, more strongly entrenched in the people's affections.

Like virtually all of the Framers, Marshall was devoted to popular government. Yet SHAYS' REBELLION of western Massachusetts farmers (1786–1787) had made him wonder whether "man is incapable of governing himself." He thought the new Constitution a republican remedy for the flaws of republican government, and for some time he thought constitutional restraints might suffice to rein the people to sound government. Marshall's republicanism encompassed both representative government and balanced government. The people are to grant their sovereignty to institutions for exercise by their representatives. A more substantial, virtuous, and enlightened Senate and President would balance the more popular House of Representatives, the dangerous house in a popular republic. Marshall came to be troubled by a decline in the quality of American leaders, from the great statesmen of the Revolution and founding, notably Washington, to the "superficial showy acquirements" of "party politicians." He came to be deeply disheartened by the tumultuous growth of democratic control, inspired by THOMAS JEFFERSON and consummated by ANDREW JACKSON. A "torrent of public opinion," inflamed by the French Revolution, aroused the old debtor and STATES' RIGHTS party during Washington's administration. It led to democratic societies, set up to watch the government, and then to a legislature that conveyed popular demands without much filtering. Marshall had anticipated that Jefferson would ally himself with the House of Representatives, and become leader of the party dominating the whole legislature, thus increasing his own power while weakening the office of President and the fundamentals of balanced government. During Jackson's terms (1828–1836), with the presidency transformed from a check on the majority to the tribune of the majority, Marshall favored reduction of its power, a tenure limited to one term, and even selection of the President by lot from among the senators. He called his early republicanism "wild and enthusiastic democracy," and came to doubt that the constitutional Union could endure in the face of resurgent sectionalism and populism.

The eventual dissolution of political balances made crucial Marshall's decisive accomplishment as he and Jefferson began their terms of office: the confirmation of the judiciary as interpreter and enforcer of the fundamental law. Although Marshall's opinion in Marbury denied that courts can exercise political power, it gave courts power to circumscribe the forbidden sphere, to determine the powers of legislatures and executives. Marshall's argument for this unprecedented judicial authority recalled "certain principles . . . long and well established." In deciding cases judges must declare what the law is. The Constitution is the supreme law. Judges must apply the Constitution in preference to statute when the two conflict—else the Constitution is not permanent but "alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it." The argument established the Supreme Court as enforcer of the constitutional government central to America's constitutional democracy. Marshall pointed to the horrors of "legislative omnipotence," only inconspicuously bestowing on courts a ruling potency as the voice of the Constitution. Marshall's opinion, the object of intense scrutiny ever since, was faithful to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION's supposition that there will be some JUDICIAL REVIEW of statutes and to its suspicion of democratic legislatures. It did not confront certain difficulties, notably those of a Supreme Court (like the TANEY COURT in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD, 1857) whose decisions violate the principles of the Constitution. Marshall's judicial reasonings were his attempt to keep judges, and his country, from violating the Constitution that preserves those principles.

ROBERT K. FAULKNER
(1986)

Bibliography

BEVERIDGE, ALBERT J. 1916–1919 The Life of John Marshall. 4 Vols. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1919 John Marshall and the Constitution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

FAULKNER, ROBERT K. 1968 The Jurisprudence of John Marshall. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

HOLMES, OLIVER WENDELL 1952 John Marshall. Pages 266–271 in Collected Legal Papers. New York: Peter Smith.

WHITE, G. EDWARD 1976 The American Judicial Tradition. Pages 7–34. New York: Oxford University Press.

ZIEGLER, BENJAMIN MUNN 1939 The International Law of John Marshall. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

MARSHALL, THURGOOD
(1908– )

Thurgood Marshall, the first black Justice of the Supreme Court, was born in Baltimore in 1908. After graduation from Lincoln University in Pennsylvania, Marshall attended Howard University Law School. Graduating first in his class in 1933, Marshall became one of CHARLES H. HOUSTON's protégés. He began practice in Baltimore, where he helped revitalize the local branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Houston, who had become special counsel to the NAACP in New York, was developing a program of litigation designed to attack segregated education in the South; Marshall joined the NAACP staff as Houston's assistant in 1936.

Of all the Justices who have served on the Supreme Court, Marshall has the strongest claim to having contributed as much to the development of the Constitution as a lawyer as he has done as a judge. At the start of his career, race relations law centered on the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE. In his initial years at the NAACP, Marshall brought a number of lawsuits challenging unequal salaries paid to black and white teachers in the South. After Marshall succeeded Houston as special counsel in 1938, he became both a litigator and a coordinator of litigation, most of it challenging segregated education. He also successfully argued a number of cases involving RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in the administration of criminal justice before the Supreme Court. When social and political changes during WORLD WAR II led to increased black militancy and support for the NAACP, Marshall was able to expand the NAACP's legal staff by hiring an extremely talented group of young, mostly black lawyers. Although he continued to conduct some litigation, Marshall gradually assumed the roles of appellate advocate and overall strategist. Relying on his staff to generate helpful legal theories, he selected the theory most likely to accomplish the NAACP's goals. This process culminated in the five lawsuits decided by the Supreme Court as BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954). Marshall had used his staff to develop these cases and the legal theory that segregation was unconstitutional no matter how equal were the physical facilities. After the Supreme Court held that segregation was unconstitutional and that it should be eliminated "with ALL DELIBERATE SPEED," Marshall and the NAACP staff devoted much of their attention to overcoming the impediments that southern states began to place in the way of DESEGREGATION. These impediments included school closures and investigations and harassment of the NAACP and its lawyers.

Marshall left the NAACP in 1961, having been nominated by President JOHN F. KENNEDY to a position on the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS for the Second Circuit. His confirmation to that position was delayed by southern opposition for over eleven months. During Marshall's four years on the Second Circuit, he wrote an important opinion holding that the DOUBLE JEOPARDY clause applied to the states, anticipating by four years the position that the Supreme Court would adopt in BENTON V. MARYLAND (1969), a decision written by Justice Marshall. He also urged in dissent an expansive interpretation of statutes allowing persons charged with crimes in state courts to remove those cases to federal court. (See CIVIL RIGHTS REMOVAL.) Marshall was nominated as solicitor general by President LYNDON B. JOHNSON in 1965. He served as solicitor general for two years, during which he supervised the disposition of criminal cases imperiled by illegal WIRETAPPING. Johnson appointed him in 1967 to succeed Justice TOM C. CLARK on the Supreme Court.

Justice Marshall's contributions to constitutional development have been shaped by the fact that for most of his tenure his views were among the most liberal on a centrist or conservative Court. As he had at the NAACP, and as have most recent Justices, Marshall relied heavily on his staff to present his views forcefully and systematically in his opinions.

For a few years after Marshall's appointment to the Court, he was part of the liberal bloc of the WARREN COURT. Despite the tradition that newly appointed Justices are not assigned important majority opinions, Justice Marshall wrote several important free speech opinions during his first two years on the Court. In STANLEY V. GEORGIA (1969), he held that a state could not punish a person merely for possessing obscene materials in his home; the only justification for such punishment, guaranteeing a citizenry that did not think impure thoughts, was barred by the First Amendment. Amalgamated Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza (1968) recognized the contemporary importance of privately owned SHOPPING CENTERS as places of public resort, holding that centers must be made available, over their owners' objections, to those who wish to picket or pass out leaflets on subjects of public interest. Pickering v. Board of Education (1968) established the right of public employees to complain about the way in which their superiors were discharging their responsibilities to the public.

With the appointment of four Justices by President

RICHARD M. NIXON, Justice Marshall rapidly found himself in dissent on major civil liberties issues. Stanley was limited by United States v. Reidel (1971) to private possession and not extended to what might have seemed its logical corollary, acquisition of obscene material for private use. Logan Valley Plaza was overruled in HUDGENS V. NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD (1976), and Pickering was limited by a relatively narrow definition of complaints relating to public duties in Connick v. Myers (1983). Marshall became part of a small liberal bloc that could prevail only by attracting more conservative members, who could be kept in the coalition by allowing them to write the majority opinions. In the series of death penalty cases, for example, Justice Marshall stated his conclusion that capital punishment was unconstitutional in all circumstances, but when a majority for a narrower position could be found to overturn the imposition of the death penalty in a particular case, he joined that majority.

Thus, after 1970, Marshall rarely wrote important opinions for the Court regarding FREEDOM OF SPEECH, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, or EQUAL PROTECTION. Two of his opinions in cases about the PREEMPTION of state law by federal regulations, Jones v. Rath Packing Co. (1977) and Douglas v. Seacoast Products (1977), seem likely to endure as statements of general principle. More often he was assigned to write opinions in which a nearly unanimous Court adopted a "conservative" position. For example, in Gillette v. United States (1971), Justice Marshall's opinion for the Court rejected statutory and constitutional claims to exemption from the military draft by men whose religious beliefs led them to oppose participation in some but not all wars. Undoubtedly because of his race and because of his desire to see a majority support positions helpful to blacks, Marshall rarely wrote important opinions in cases directly implicating matters of race, although he did write two significant dissents, one defending AFFIRMATIVE ACTION in REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), and another emphasizing blacks' lack of access to political power in MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980). But Justice Marshall's major contributions have come in areas where the experience of race has historically shaped the context in which apparently nonracial issues arise.

Marshall occasionally received the assignment in important civil liberties cases. His opinion in POLICE DEPARTMENT OF CHICAGO V. MOSLEY (1972) crystallized the equality theme in the law of freedom of speech. There he emphasized the importance for free expression of the rule that governments may not regulate one type of speech because of its content, in a setting where speech with a different content would not be regulated: "[G]overnment may not grant the use of a forum to people whose views it finds acceptable, but deny use to those wishing to express less favored or more controversial views . . . Selective exclusions . . . may not be based on content alone, and may not be justified by reference to content alone." Unless it were prohibited, discrimination based on content would allow governments, which ought to be controlled by the electorate, to determine what the electorate would hear. Although the Mosley principle is probably stated too broadly, because differential regulation of categories of speech such as OBSCENITY or COMMERCIAL SPEECH is allowed, still it serves as a central starting point for analysis, from which departures must be justified.

His opinion in Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County (1974) synthesized a line of cases regarding the circumstances in which a state might deny benefits such as nonemergency medical care for INDIGENTS to those who had recently come to the state. If the benefit was so important that its denial could be characterized as a penalty for exercising the RIGHT TO TRAVEL, it was unconstitutional.

Because of the relatively rapid shift in the Court's composition, most of Justice Marshall's major contributions to the constitutional development have come through dissents. Several major dissenting opinions by Justice Marshall have helped shape the law of equal protection. The opinions criticize a rigid approach in which classifications based on race and a few other categories are to be given STRICT SCRUTINY while all other classifications must be "merely rational." Marshall, in dissents in DANDRIDGE V. WILLIAMS (1970) and SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973), offered a more flexible approach. He argued that the courts should examine legislation that affects different groups differently by taking into account the nature of the group—the degree to which it has been discriminated against in the past, the actual access to political power it has today—and the importance of the interests affected. Under this "sliding scale" approach, a statute differentially affecting access to WELFARE BENEFITS might be unconstitutional while one with the same effects on access to public recreational facilities might be permitted. A majority of the Court has not explicitly adopted the "sliding scale" approach, but Justice Marshall's sustained criticisms of the rigid alternative have produced a substantial, though not entirely acknowledged, acceptance of a more nuanced approach to equal protection problems.

As Logan Valley Plaza showed, Justice Marshall has urged, usually in dissent, an expansive definition of those actors whose decisions are subject to constitutional control. In JACKSON V. METROPOLITAN EDISON CO. (1974) the majority found that the decision of a heavily regulated utility to terminate service for nonpayment was not "state action" under any of the several strands of that DOCTRINE. Justice Marshall's dissent argued that state involvement was significant when looked at as a whole and, more important, pointed out that on the majority's analysis the utility could, without constitutional problems, terminate service to blacks. On the assumption, confirmed in later cases, that the result is incorrect, Justice Marshall's argument effectively demonstrated that the "state action" doctrine is actually a doctrine about the merits of the challenged decision: if it is a decision that the Justices believe should not be controlled by the Constitution, there is no "state action," whereas if it is a decision that the Justices believe should be controlled by the Constitution, there is state action.

Finally, after joining the seminal opinion in GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1968), which held that the Constitution defined the procedures under which public benefits, the "new property" of the welfare state, could be taken away, Justice Marshall dissented in later cases where the Court substantially narrowed the scope of Goldberg. His position, in cases such as BOARD OF REGENTS V. ROTH (1972), has been that everyone must be presumed to be entitled to those benefits, and that the presumption can be overcome only after constitutionality-defined procedures have been followed.

In most of the areas of law to which Justice Marshall's opinions have made significant contributions the linked strands of race and poverty appear. Discrimination by nominally private actors and suppression of speech on racial issues have played an important part in the black experience. Similarly, wealth and poverty as grounds for allocating public resources are classifications closely linked to race. Justice Marshall's desire to adopt a more flexible approach to equal protection law stems from his awareness that only such an approach would allow the courts to address difficulties that the ordinary routines of society cause for the poor. For example, his dissent in United States v. Kras (1973) objected to the imposition of a fifty dollar filing fee on those who sought discharges of their debts in bankruptcy. But it would be misleading to conclude that Thurgood Marshall's most important role in constitutional development was what he did as a Justice of the Supreme Court. Rather it was what he did as a lawyer for the NAACP before and after the decision in Brown v. Board of Education.

MARK TUSHNET
(1986)

Bibliography

KLUGER, RICHARD 1976 Simple Justice. New York: Knopf.

MARSHALL, THURGOOD
(1908–1993)
(Update)

Thurgood Marshall has earned a unique place in American history on the basis of a long, varied, and influential career as a private attorney, governement lawyer, and appellate jurist. Two achievements in particular stand out. First, as counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), he has shaped the litigation that destroyed the constitutional legitimacy of state-enforced racial SEGREGATION. Second, as an Associate justice of the Supreme Court—the nation's first black Justice—he boldly articulated a liberal jurisprudence on a Court dominated by conservatives. No person in the history of the Supreme Court better illustrates the limits and possibilities of the jurist as dissenter.

Marshall was born July 2, 1908, in Baltimore, Maryland, attended that city's racially segregated public schools, and was graduated from Lincoln University. Excluded from the University of Maryland Law School by that state's racial policies, he received his law degree from Howard Law School. He excelled at Howard and came to the attention of the school's dean, CHARLES H. HOUSTON, a pioneer in the use of litigation as a vehicle of social reform. Although Marshall embarked on a conventional commercial practice upon graduation, he also participated, under Houston's guidance, in important, albeit unremunerative, CIVIL RIGHTS cases. Appropriately enough, his first consisted of a successful suit against the same state university system that had earlier excluded him. In Murray v. Maryland (1937) Marshall convinced the Court of Appeals of Maryland that the Constitution required the state to do more for black residents seeking legal education than merely offer them scholarships to attend out-of-state law schools.

In 1939 Marshall succeeded Houston as special counsel of the NAACP. Over the next two decades he traveled ceaselessly, addressing problems of racial inequality in a wide array of settings: from obscure local courts in which he sought to extract from hostile juries and judges a measure of justice for black defendants, to Korea where he investigated the treatment of black soldiers by United States military authorities, to black churches and lodges where he encouraged people in aggrieved communities to seek to vindicate their rights. He also argued thirty-two cases before the Supreme Court, prevailing in twenty-nine of them. His brilliant advocacy helped to convince the Supreme Court to invalidate practices that excluded blacks from primary elections (SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT), to prohibit segregation in interstate transportation (MORGAN V. VIRGINIA), to overturn convictions obtained from juries from which blacks had been illicitly barred (PATTON V. MISSISSIPPI), and to prohibit state courts from enforcing racially restrictive real estate covenants (SHELLEY V. KRAEMER). Marshall's greatest triumph arose from the skillfully orchestrated litigation that culminated in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), which invalidated state-enforced racial segregation in public schooling. By the close of the 1950s, Marshall had attained widespread recognition as a leading public figure and was known affectionately in much of black America as "Mr. Civil Rights."

The next stage in Marshall's career was marked by a series of high-level appointments. In 1961, President JOHN F. KENNEDY appointed him to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit over the strong objections of segregationist senators who delayed his confirmation for nearly a year. In 1965, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed Marshall SOLICITOR GENERAL of the United States. The first black American to hold this post, Marshall argued several important cases before the Court, including MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), in which he successfully urged the Court to impose greater limitations on the power of police to interrogate criminal suspects; HARPER V. VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), in which he successfully argued that state POLL TAXES violated the federal Constitution; and UNITED STATES V. GUEST (1966), in which he successfully defended the federal prosecution of white supremacists in Georgia who committed a racially motivated murder during the era of the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT.

In 1967, President Johnson set the stage for Marshall to cross the color line in another area of governmental service when he named him to a seat on the Supreme Court. Marshall's elevation vividly symbolized the ascendancy of values and interests he had long sought to advance. At the outset of Marshall's career on the Court, it was presided over by Chief Justice EARL WARREN and animated by a decidedly reformist ethos. Ironically, however, the liberal wing whose ranks Marshall fortified began to disintegrate soon after he took his seat. By the mid-1970s, the appointments of Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER and associate Justices LEWIS F. POWELL and WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST had brought to the fore a conservative ethos that has long confined Justice Marshall to the periphery of judicial power.

During his years on the Court, Justice Marshall has seldom held sway in the middle as a "swing" vote. Rather, he has made his mark as a judicial maverick—always independent, consistently bold, frequently dissenting. Keenly attentive to allegations of INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION, Justice Marshall has been strongly favorable to the claims of members of historically oppressed groups. However, he has repeatedly found himself at odds with the Court. MEMPHIS V. GREENE (1981) involved a city's decision to close a street, mainly used by blacks, which traversed a predominantly white neighborhood. The Court upheld the legality of the city's action. Justice Marshall perceived a violation of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, concluding that the city's action constituted a racially prejudiced "badge or incident of slavery." PERSONNEL ADMINISTRATOR OF MASSACHUSETTS V. FEENEY (1979) called into question a state law that provided an absolute preference for veterans of the ARMED FORCES in civil service positions, a system of selection that tended overwhelmingly to disadvantage women in relation to men. The Court upheld the statute. Justice Marshall condemned it as a violation of the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980) concerned an at-large voting scheme under which, for almost seventy years, no black had ever been elected to a seat on the ruling city commission in Mobile, Alabama, even though blacks constituted nearly a third of the city's population. The Court held that this electoral arrangement could be invalidated only if it were used as a vehicle of purposeful discrimination. Justice Marshall concluded that the system's racially disparate impact violated the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. ROSTKER V. GOLDBERG (1981) brought into question the constitutionality of a federal statute that requires men but not women to register for the military draft. Differing with the majority of his colleagues, Justice Marshall declared that the Court erred in placing its "imprimatur on one of the most potent remaining public expressions of "ancient canards about the proper role of women."

Critical of the Court for showing too little solicitude for those who have been historically victimized on the basis of race and gender, Justice Marshall has also rebuked the Court for displaying undue aggressiveness in defending the asserted rights of those who challenge affirmative action policies that provide preferences to women and racial minorities. Sharply distinguishing between benign and invidious discrimination, he has voted to uphold every AFFIRMATIVE ACTION plan the Court has reviewed. Here, too, he has been forced into dissent, objecting bitterly to decisions that have increasingly limited the permissible scope of affirmative action measures. In REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), the first affirmative action case that the Court resolved, Justice Marshall declared that "It must be remembered that during most of the past 200 years, the Constitution as interpreted by the [Supreme] Court did not prohibit the most ingenious and pervasive forms of discrimination against the Negro. Now, when a State acts to remedy the effects of that legacy of discrimination, I cannot believe that this same Constitution stands as a barrier."

A decade later, Justice Marshall continued to rail against an interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment that he considers perverse. In RICHMOND V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989), for instance, he dissented against a ruling that invalidated Richmond, Virginia's policy of reserving that for enterprises owned by racial minorities a designated percentage of business generated by the city. Observing that "It is a welcome symbol of racial progress when the former capital of the Confederacy acts forthrightly to confront the effects of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in its midst," he angrily chided his colleagues for taking "a deliberate and giant step backward." The Court's decision, he predicted, "will inevitably discourage or prevent governmental entities, particularly States and localities, from acting to rectify the scourge of past discrimination. This is the harsh reality of the majority's decision, but it is not the Constitution's command."

Other areas in which Justice Marshall's strongly held views have frequently been at odds with the Court's conclusions involve CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, ABORTION and the legal status of the poor—areas in which Marshall's jurisprudential commitments frequently overlap. Insisting that death penalties under all circumstances violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT, Justice Marshall has filed dissents against all executions that the Court has sanctioned. In AKE V. OKLAHOMA (1985), his advocacy on behalf of those charged with capital crimes succeeded in wringing from his colleagues a rare broadening of rights to which criminal defendants are entitled. Writing for the Court, Justice Marshall held that, at least in cases possibly involving the death penalty, DUE PROCESS requires states to afford indigent defendants the means to obtain needed psychiatric experts.

With respect to abortion, Justice Marshall has been among the most stalwart defenders of ROE V. WADE (1973), dissenting in every case in which the Court has upheld legislative inroads on what he views as a woman's broad right to decide whether or not to terminate a pregnancy. An example of his allegiance to Roe v. Wade (1973) is his dissenting opinion in MAHER V. ROE (1977), where he maintained that a state violated the Constitution by denying poor women funding for abortions while making funds available to them for expenses of childbirth. "Since efforts to overturn [Roe v. Wade] have been unsuccessful," he charged, "the opponents of abortion have attempted every imaginable means to circumvent the commands of the Constitution and impose their moral choices upon the rest of society." Articulating his anger with characteristic sharpness, Justice Marshall asserted that this case involved "the most vicious attacks yet devised" in that they fell on poor women—"those among us least able to help or defend themselves."

Throughout Justice Marshall's career on the Court he has vigorously attempted to improve the legal status of the poor. He has argued, for instance, that the federal courts should subject to heightened scrutiny state laws that explicitly discriminate on the basis of poverty. For the most part, however, his efforts have been stymied. One particularly memorable expression of Justice Marshall's empathy for the indigent is his dissent in United States v. Kras (1973), a case in which the Court held that federal law did not violate the Constitution by requiring a $50 fee of persons seeking the protections of bankruptcy. Objecting to the Court's assumption that the petitioner could readily accumulate this amount, Justice Marshall wrote that he could not agree with the majority > that it is so easy for the desperately poor to save $1.92 each week over the course of six months. . . . The 1970 Census found that over 800,000 families in the Nation had annual incomes of less than $1,000 or $19.23 a week. . . . I see no reason to require that families in such straits sacrifice over 5% of their annual income as a prerequisite to getting a discharge in bankruptcy. . . . It may be easy for some people to think that weekly savings of less than $2 are no burden. But no one who has had close contact with poor people can fail to understand how close to the margin of survival many of them are. . . . It is perfectly proper for judges to disagree about what the Constitution requires. But it is disgraceful for an interpretation of the Constitution to be premised upon unfounded assumptions about how people live.

On occasion Justice Marshall's dissents have succeeded in changing the mind of the Court. An example is the Court's response to claims of racially invidious discrimination in peremptory challenges. In SWAIN V. ALABAMA (1965) the Court had ruled that prosecutors could properly use race as a basis for peremptorily excluding potential jurors so long as they did so as a matter of strategy relating to a particular trial and not for the purpose of barring blacks routinely from participation in the administration of justice. By repeatedly dissenting from orders in which the Court refused to reconsider Swain and by showing in detail this decision's dismal practical consequences, Marshall finally convinced the Court to reverse itself—though even when it did in BATSON V. KENTUCKY (1986), Marshall still maintained that his colleagues had neglected to go far enough in ridding the criminal justice system of invidious practices.

For much of Justice Marshall's career on the bench, he seems to have deliberately avoided any extrajudicial controversies. Beginning in the 1980s, however, he appears to have altered his habits. He publicly criticized RONALD REAGAN, declaring that his civil rights record as President of the United States was among the worst in the twentieth century. He also chided President GEORGE BUSH for selecting DAVID H. SOUTER to occupy the seat on the Court vacated by Justice Marshall's long-time ally, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN. In an unprecedented action, Justice Marshall declared on a televised broadcast that, in his view, the President's choice was inappropriate.

Although Justice Marshall recieved considerable criticism for his comments on Presidents Regan and Bush, extrajudicial remarks that generated an even greater amount of contraversy stemmed from a speech that he gave in 1987 in the midst of the bicentenial celebration of the United States Constitution. Bodly challenging the iconography of American CONSTITUTIONALISM, he asserted that he did not find "the wisdom, foresight, and sense of justice exhibited by the framers [to be] particularly profound. To the contrary," he declared, "the government they devised was defective from the start," omitting, for example, blacks and women as protected members of the polity. Eschewing "flag waving fervor," Justice Marshall noted his intention to commemerate the bicentennial by recalling "the suffering, struggle, and sacrifice that has triumphed over much of what was wrong with the original document" and by also acknowleging the Constitution's unfulfilled promise.

Some detractors fault Justice Marshall on the grounds that his penchant for dissent has robbed him of influence that he might otherwise have wielded. Judging influence, however, is a dangerous endeavor. Justices JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS are as well respected on the basis of their dissenting opinions as they are respected for any other aspect of their illustrious careers. History may well bequeath the same fate to Justice Thurgood Marshall. Justice Marshall resigned from the Court in 1991.

RANDALL KENNEDY
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Badges of Servitude; NAACP Legal Defense Fund; Race and Criminal Justice; Race-Consciousness.)

MARSHALL v. BARLOW'S, INC.
436 U.S. 307 (1978)

In Marshall the Supreme Court held unconstitutional a congressional enactment authorizing Occupational Safety and Health Administration inspectors to conduct WARRANTLESS SEARCHES of employment facilities to monitor compliance with regulations. PROBABLE CAUSE for a warrant can, however, be satisfied on a lesser showing than that required in a search for criminal EVIDENCE.

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

MARSHALL COURT
(1801–1835)

In 1801 the Supreme Court existed on the fringe of American awareness. Its prestige was slight, and it was more ignored than respected. On January 20, 1801, the day President JOHN ADAMS nominated JOHN MARSHALL for the chief justiceship, the commissioners of the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA informed Congress that the Court had no place to hold its February term. The Senate consented to the use of one of its committee rooms, and Marshall took his seat on February 4 in a small basement chamber. At the close of 1809, Benjamin Latrobe, the architect, reported that the basement had been redesigned to enlarge the courtroom and provide an office for the clerk and a library room for the Justices. In 1811, however, Latrobe reported that the Court "had been obliged to hold their sittings in a tavern," because Congress had appropriated no money for "fitting up and furnishing the Court-room. . . ." After the British burned the Capitol in 1814 Congress again neglected to provide for the Court. It held its 1815 term in a private home, and for several years after met in temporary Capitol quarters that were "little better than a dungeon." The Court moved into permanent quarters in 1819. In 1824 a New York correspondent described the Court's Capitol chamber: "In the first place, it is like going down cellar to reach it. The room is on the basement story in an obscure part of the north wing. . . . A stranger might traverse the dark avenues of the Capitol for a week, without finding the remote corner in which Justice is administered to the American Republic." He added that the courtroom was hardly large enough for a police court.

The Supreme Court, however, no longer lacked dignity or respect. It had become a force that commanded recognition. In 1819 a widely read weekly described it as so awesome that some regarded it with reverence. That year THOMAS JEFFERSON complained that the Court had made the Constitution a "thing of wax," which it shaped as it pleased, and in 1824 he declared that the danger he most feared was the Court's "consolidation of our government." Throughout the 1820s Congress debated bills to curb the Court, which, said a senator, the people blindly adored—a "self-destroying idolatry." ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE, writing in 1831, said: "The peace, the prosperity, and the very existence of the Union are vested in the hands of the seven Federal judges. Without them, the Constitution would be a dead letter. . . ." Hardly a political question arose, he wrote, that did not become a judicial question.

Chief Justice Marshall was not solely responsible for the radical change in the Court's status and influence, but he made the difference. He bequeathed to the people of the United States what it was not in the political power of the Framers of the Constitution to give. Had the Framers been free agents, they would have proposed a national government that was unquestionably dominant over the states and possessed a formidable array of powers breathtaking in flexibility and scope. Marshall in more than a figurative sense was the supreme Framer, emancipated from a local constituency, boldly using his judicial position as an exalted platform from which to educate the nation to the true meaning, his meaning, of the Constitution. He wrote as if words of grandeur and power and union could make dreams come true. By the force of his convictions he tried to will a nation into being.

He reshaped the still malleable Constitution, giving clarification to its ambiguities and content to its omissions that would allow it to endure for "ages to come" and would make the government of the Union supreme in the federal system. Marshall is the only judge in our history whose distinction as a great nationalist statesman derives wholly from his judicial career. Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES once remarked, "If American law were to be represented by a single figure, sceptic and worshipper alike would agree without dispute that the figure could be one alone, and that one, John Marshall." That the Court had remained so weak after a decade of men of such high caliber as JOHN JAY, OLIVER ELLSWORTH, JAMES WILSON, JAMES IREDELL, WILLIAM PATERSON, and SAMUEL CHASE demonstrates not their weakness but Marshall's achievement in making the Court an equal branch of the national government.

Until 1807 he cast but one of six votes, and after 1807, when Congress added another Justice, but one of seven. One Justice, one vote has always been the rule of the Court, and the powers of anyone who is Chief Justice depend more on the person than the office. From 1812, BUSHROD WASHINGTON and Marshall were the only surviving Federalists, surrounded by five Justices appointed by Presidents Thomas Jefferson and JAMES MADISON; yet Marshall dominated the Court in a way that no one has ever since. During Marshall's thirty-five-year tenure, the Court delivered 1,106 opinions in all fields of law, and he wrote 519; he dissented only eight times. He wrote forty of the Court's sixty-four opinions in the field of constitutional law, dissenting only once in a constitutional case. Of the twenty-four constitutional opinions for the Court that he did not write, only two were important: MARTIN V. HUNTER'S LESSEE (1816), a case in which he did not sit, and OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1827), the case in which he dissented. He virtually monopolized the constitutional cases for himself and won the support of his associates, even though they were members of the opposing political party.

Marshall's long tenure coincided with the formative period of our constitutional law. He was in the right place at the right time, filling, as Holmes said, "a strategic place in the campaign of history." But it took the right man to make the most of the opportunity. Marshall had the character, intellect, and passion for his job that his predecessors lacked. He had a profound sense of mission comparable to a religious "calling." Convinced that he knew what the Constitution should mean and what it was meant to achieve, he determined to give its purposes enduring expression and make them prevail. The Court was, for him, a judicial pulpit and political platform from which to address the nation, to compete, if possible, with the executive and legislative in shaping public opinion.

Marshall met few of the abstract criteria for a "great" judge. A great judge should possess intellectual rectitude and brilliance. Marshall was a fierce and crafty partisan who manipulated facts and law. A great judge should have a self-conscious awareness of his biases and a determination to be as detached as human fallibility will allow. In Marshall the judicial temperament flickered weakly; unable to muzzle his deepest convictions, he sought to impose them on the nation, sure that he was right. He intoxicated himself with the belief that truth, history, and the Constitution dictated his opinions, which merely declared the law rather than made the law. A great judge should have confidence in majority rule, tempered by his commitment to personal freedom and fairness. Marshall did not think men capable of self-government and inclined to favor financial and industrial capitalism over most other interests. A great judge should have a superior technical proficiency, modified by a sense of justice and ethical behavior beyond suspicion. Marshall's judicial ethics were not unquestionable. He should have disqualified himself in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) because of his negligent complicity. He overlooked colossal corruption in FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) to decide a land title case by a doctrine that promoted his personal interests. He wrote the opinion in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) before hearing the case. Marshall's "juridical learning," as Justice JOSEPH STORY, his reverent admirer and closest colleague, conceded, "was not equal to that of the great masters in the profession. . . ." He was, said Story, first, last, and always, "a Federalist of the good old school," and in the maintenance of its principles "he was ready at all times to stand forth a determined advocate and supporter." He was, in short, a Federalist activist who used the Constitution to legitimate predetermined results. A great judge should have a vision of national and moral greatness, combined with respect for the federal system. Marshall had that—and an instinct for statecraft and superb literary skills. These qualities, as well as his activism, his partisanship, and his sense of mission, contributed to his inordinate influence.

So too did his qualities of leadership and his personal traits. He was generous, gentle, warm, charming, considerate, congenial, and open. At a time when members of the Court lived together in a common boarding house during their short terms in Washington, his charismatic personality enabled him to preside over a judicial family, inspire loyalty, and convert his brethren to his views. He had a cast-iron will, an astounding capacity for hard work (witness the number of opinions he wrote for the Court), and formidable powers of persuasion. He thought audaciously in terms of broad and basic principles that he expressed axiomatically as absolutes. His arguments were masterful intellectual performances, assuming that his premises were valid. Inexorably and with developing momentum he moved from an unquestioned premise to a foregone conclusion. Jefferson once said that he never admitted anything when conversing with Marshall. "So sure as you admit any position to be good, no matter how remote from the conclusion he seeks to establish, you are gone." Marshall's sophistry, according to Jefferson, was so great, "you must never give him an affirmative answer or you will be forced to grant his conclusion. Why, if he were to ask me if it were daylight or not, I'd reply, "Sir, I don't know. I can't tell." Marshall could also be imperious. He sometimes gave as the OPINION OF THE COURT a position that had not mustered a majority. According to one anecdote, Marshall is supposed to have said to Story, the greatest legal scholar in our history, "That, Story, is the law. You find the precedents."

The lengthy tenure of the members of the Marshall Court also accounts for its achievements. On the pre-Marshall Court, the Justices served briefly; five quit in a decade. The Marshall Court lasted—BROCKHOLST LIVINGSTON seventeen years, THOMAS TODD nineteen, GABRIEL DUVALL twenty-four, WILLIAM JOHNSON thirty, Bushrod Washington thirty-one, and Marshall outlasted them all. Story served twenty-four years with Marshall and ten more after his death; SMITH THOMPSON served fifteen years with Marshall and eight years after. This continuity in personnel contributed to a consistent point of view in constitutional doctrine—a view that was, substantially, Marshall's. From 1812, when the average age of the Court's members was only forty-three, through 1823—twelve successive terms—the Court had the same membership, the longest period in its history without a change, and during that period the Marshall Court decided its most important cases except for Marbury.

Marshall also sought to strengthen the Court by inaugurating the practice of one Justice's giving the opinion of the Court. Previously the Justices had delivered their opinions SERIATIM, each writing an opinion in each case in the style of the English courts. That practice forced each Justice to take the trouble of understanding each case, of forming his opinion on it, and showing publicly the reasons that led to his judgment. Such were Jefferson's arguments for seriatim opinions; and Marshall understood that one official opinion augmented the Court's strength by giving the appearance of unity and harmony. Marshall realized that even if each Justice reached similar conclusions, the lines of argument and explanation of doctrine might vary with style and thought of every individual, creating uncertainty and impairing confidence in the Court as an institution. He doubtless also understood that by massing his Court behind one authoritative opinion and by assigning so many opinions to himself, his own influence as well as the Court's would be enhanced. Jefferson's first appointee, Justice Johnson, sought to buck the practice for a while. He had been surprised, he later informed Jefferson, to discover the Chief Justice "delivering all the opinions in cases in which he sat, even in some instances when contrary to his own judgment and vote." When Johnson remonstrated in vain, Marshall lectured him on the "indecency" of judges' "cutting at each other," and Johnson soon learned to acquiesce "or become such a cypher in our consultations as to effect no good at all." Story, too, learned to swallow his convictions to enhance the "authority of the Court." His "usual practice," said Story, was "to submit in silence" to opinions with which he disagreed. Even Marshall himself observed in an 1827 case, by which time he was losing control of his Court, that his usual policy when differing from majority was "to acquiesce silently in its opinion."

Like other trailblazing activist judges, Marshall squeezed a case for all it was worth, intensifying its influence. For Marshall a constitutional case was a medium for explaining his philosophy of the supreme and FUNDAMENTAL LAW, an occasion for sharing his vision of national greatness, a link between capitalism and CONSTITUTIONALISM, and an opportunity for a basic treatise. Justice Johnson protested in 1818, "We are constituted to decide causes, and not to discuss themes, or digest systems." He preferred, he said, to decide no more in any case "than what the case itself necessarily requires." Ordinary Justices decide only the immediate question on narrow grounds; but Marshall, confronted by some trivial question—whether a justice of the peace had a right to his commission or whether peddlers of lottery tickets could be fined—would knife to the roots of the controversy, discover that it involved some great constitutional principle, and explain it in the broadest possible way, making the case seem as if the life of the Union or the supremacy of the Constitution were at stake. His audacity in generalizing was impressive; his strategy was to take the highest ground and make unnerving use of OBITER DICTA; and then, as a matter of tactics, almost unnoticeably decide on narrow grounds. Marbury is remembered for Marshall's exposition of JUDICIAL REVIEW, not for his judicial humility in declining JURISDICTION and refusing to issue the WRIT OF MANDAMUS. COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821) is remembered for Marshall's soaring explication of the supremacy of the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES, not for the decision in favor of Virginia's power to fine unlicensed lottery ticket peddlers. GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) is remembered for its sweeping discourse on the COMMERCE CLAUSE of the Constitution, not for the decision that the state act conflicted with an obscure act of Congress.

Marshall's first major opinion, in Marbury, displayed his political cunning, suppleness in interpretation, doctrinal boldness, instinct for judicial survival, and ability to maneuver a case beyond the questions on its face. Having issued the show cause order to Madison, the Court seemingly was in an impossible position once Jefferson's supporters called that order a judicial interference with the executive branch. To decide for Marbury would provoke a crisis that the Court could not survive: Madison would ignore the Court, which had no way to enforce its decision, and the Court's enemies would have a pretext for IMPEACHMENT. To decide against Marbury would appear to endorse the illegal acts of the executive branch and concede that the Court was helpless. Either course of action promised judicial humiliation and loss of independence. Marshall therefore found a way to make a tactical retreat while winning a great strategic victory for judicial power. After upbraiding the executive branch for violating Marbury's rights, Marshall concluded that the Court had no JURISDICTION in the case, because a provision of an act of Congress conflicted with Article III. He held that provision unconstitutional by, first, giving it a sweeping construction its text did not bear and, second, by comparing it to his very narrow construction of Article III. Thus he reached and decided the great question, not argued by counsel, whether the Court had the power to declare unconstitutional an act of Congress. By so doing he answered from the bench his critics in Congress who, now that they were in power, had renounced judicial review during the debate on the repeal of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801. Characteristically Marshall relied on no precedents, not even on the authority of THE FEDERALIST #78. Significantly, he chose a safe act of Congress to void—section 13 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, which concerned not the province of the Congress or the President but of the Supreme Court, its authority to issue writs of mandamus in cases of ORIGINAL JURISDICTION. But Marshall's exposition of judicial review was, characteristically, broader than the holding on section 13. Jefferson, having been given no stick with which to beat Marshall, privately fumed: "Nothing in the Constitution has given them a right to decide for the Executive, more than to the Executive to decide for them," he wrote in a letter. "The opinion which gives to the judges the right to decide what laws are constitutional, and what not, not only for themselves in their own sphere of action, but also for the Legislature and Executive also, in their spheres, would make the judiciary a despotic branch."

The Court did not dare to declare unconstitutional any other act of Congress which remained hostile to it throughout Marshall's tenure. STUART V. LAIRD (1803), decided shortly after Marbury, upheld the repeal of the Judiciary Act of 1801. (See JUDICIARY ACTS OF 1802.) A contrary decision would have been institutionally suicidal for the Court. Marshall's opinion in Marbury was daring enough; in effect he courageously announced the Court's independence of the other branches of the government. But he was risking retaliation. Shortly before the arguments in Marbury, Jefferson instructed his political allies in the House to start IMPEACHMENT proceedings against JOHN PICKERING, a federal district judge; the exquisite timing was a warning to the Supreme Court. Even earlier, Jeffersonian leaders in both houses of Congress openly spoke of impeaching the Justices. The threats were not idle. Two months after Marbury was decided, Justice Chase on circuit attacked the administration in a charge to a GRAND JURY, and the House prepared to impeach him. Senator WILLIAM GILES of Virginia, the majority leader, told Senator JOHN QUINCY ADAMS that not only Chase "but all the other Judges of the Supreme Court," except William Johnson, "must be impeached and removed." Giles thought that holding an act of Congress unconstitutional was ground for impeachment. "Impeachment was not a criminal prosecution," according to Giles, who was Jefferson's spokesman in the Senate. "And a removal by impeachment was nothing more than a declaration by Congress to this effect: you hold dangerous opinions, and if you are suffered to carry them into effect, you will work the destruction of the Union. We want your offices for the purposes of giving them to men who will fill them better."

Intimidated by Chase's impending impeachment, Marshall, believing himself to be next in line, wrote to Chase that "impeachment should yield to an APPELLATE JURISDICTION in the legislature. A reversal of those legal opinions deemed unsound by the legislature would certainly better comport with the mildness of our character than a removal of the Judge who has rendered them unknowing of his fault." Less than a year after his Marbury opinion the fear of impeachment led an anguished Marshall to repudiate his reasoning and favor Congress as the final interpreter of the Constitution. Fortunately the greatest crisis in the Court's history eased when the Senate on March 1, 1805, failed to convict Chase on any of the eight articles of impeachment. Marshall and his Court were safe from an effort, never again repeated, to politicize the Court by making it subservient to Congress through impeachment.

The Court demonstrated its independence even when impeachment hung over it. In Little v. Barreme (1804) Marshall for the Court held that President Adams had not been authorized by Congress to order an American naval commander to seize a ship sailing from a French port. Justice Johnson on circuit vividly showed his independence of the President who had appointed him. To enforce the EMBARGO ACTS, Jefferson had authorized port officers to refuse clearance of ships with "suspicious" cargoes. In 1808 Johnson, on circuit in Charleston, ordered the clearance of a ship and denounced the President for having exceeded the power delegated by the Embargo Acts. Jefferson could not dismiss as partisan politics Johnson's rebuke that he had acted as if he were above the law. Justice Brockholst Livingston, another Jefferson appointee, also had occasion in 1808 to show his independence of the President. Jefferson supported a federal prosecution for TREASON against individuals who had opposed the embargo with violence. Livingston, who presided at the trial, expressed "astonishment" that the government would resort to a theory of "constructive treason" in place of the Constitution's definition of treason as levying war against the United States and he warned against a "precedent so dangerous." The jury speedily acquitted. After the tongue-lashing from his own appointees, Jefferson won an unexpected victory in the federal courts in the case of the brig William (1808). Federal district judge John Davis in Massachusetts sustained the constitutionality of the Embargo Acts on commerce clause grounds. Davis, a lifelong Federalist, showed how simplistic was Jefferson's raving about judicial politics.

The evidence for the Court's nonpartisanship seems plentiful. For example, Justice Story, Madison's appointee, spoke for an independent Court in Gelston v. Hoyt (1818), a suit for damages against government officials whose defense was that they had acted under President Madison's orders. Story, finding no congressional authority for these orders, "refused an extension of prerogative" power and added, "It is certainly against the general theory of our institutions to create discretionary powers by implication. . . ."

On the other hand, the Court supported the theory of IMPLIED POWERS in McCulloch v. Maryland (1819), which was the occasion of Marshall's most eloquent nationalist opinion. McCulloch had its antecedent in United States v. Fisher (1804), when the Court initially used BROAD CONSTRUCTION to sustain an act of Congress that gave to the government first claim against certain insolvent debtors. Enunciating the DOCTRINE of implied powers drawn from the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE, Marshall declared that Congress could employ any useful means to carry out its ENUMERATED POWER to pay national debts. That the prior claim of the government interfered with state claims was an inevitable result, Marshall observed, of the supremacy of national laws. Although a precursor of McCulloch, Fisher attracted no opposition because it did not thwart any major state interests.

When the Court did confront such interests for the first time, in UNITED STATES V. JUDGE PETERS (1809), Marshall's stirring nationalist passage, aimed at states that annulled judgments of the federal courts, triggered Pennsylvania's glorification of state sovereignty and denunciation of the "unconstitutional exercise of powers in the United States Courts." The state called out its militia to prevent execution of federal judgments and recommended a constitutional amendment to establish an "impartial tribunal" to resolve conflicts between "the general and state governments." State resistance collapsed only after President Madison backed the Supreme Court. Significantly, eleven state legislatures, including Virginia's, censured Pennsylvania's doctrines and endorsed the Supreme Court as the constitutionally established tribunal to decide state disputes with the federal courts.

The Judge Peters episode revealed that without executive support the Court could not enforce its mandate against a hostile state, which would deny that the Court was the final arbiter under the Constitution if the state's interests were thwarted. The episode also revealed that if other states had no immediate stake in the outcome of a case, they would neither advance doctrines of state sovereignty nor repudiate the Court's supreme appellate powers. When Virginia's high court ruled that the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court did not extend to court judgments and that section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 was unconstitutional, the Marshall Court, dominated by Republicans, countered by sustaining the crucial statute in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1816). Pennsylvania and other states did not unite behind Virginia when it proposed the constitutional amendment initiated earlier by Pennsylvania, because Martin involved land titles of no interest to other states. The fact that the states were not consistently doctrinaire and became aggressive only when Court decisions adversely affected them enabled the Court to prevail in the long run. A state with a grievance typically stood alone. But for the incapacity or unwillingness of the Court's state enemies to act together in their proposals to cripple it, the great nationalist decisions of the Marshall Court would have been as impotent as the one in Worcester v. Georgia (1832). Worcester majestically upheld the supreme law against the state's despoliation of the Cherokees, but President ANDREW JACKSON supported Georgia, which flouted the Court. Even Georgia, however, condemned the SOUTH CAROLINA ORDINANCE OF NULLIFICATION, and several state legislatures resolved that the Supreme Court was the constitutional tribunal to settle controversies between the United States and the states.

The Court made many unpopular decisions that held state acts unconstitutional. Fletcher v. Peck, which involved the infamous Yazoo land frauds, was the first case in which the Justices voided a state act for conflict with the Constitution itself. Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, which involved the title to the choice Fairfax estates in Virginia, was only the first of a line of decisions that unloosed shrill attacks on the Court's jurisdiction to decide cases on a WRIT OF ERROR to state courts. In McCulloch the Court supported the "monster monopoly," the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress, and held unconstitutional a state tax on its Baltimore branch. In Cohens the Court again championed its supreme appellate powers under section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 and circumvented the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT. In STURGES V. CROWNINSHIELD (1819) the Court nullified a state bankruptcy statute that aided victims of an economic panic. In GREEN V. BIDDLE (1821) the Court used the CONTRACT CLAUSE when voiding Kentucky acts that supported valuable land claims. In OSBORN V. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES (1824) it voided an Ohio act that defied McCulloch and raised the question whether the Constitution had provided for a tribunal capable of protecting those who executed the laws of the Union from hostile state action.

When national supremacy had not yet been established and claims of state sovereignty bottomed state statutes and state judicial decisions that the Court overthrew, state assaults on the Court were inevitable, imperiling it and the Union it defended. Virginia, the most prestigious state, led the assault which Jefferson encouraged and SPENCER ROANE directed. Kentucky's legislature at one point considered military force to prevent execution of the Green decision. State attacks were vitriolic and intense, but they were also sporadic and not united. Ten state legislatures adopted resolutions against the Marshall Court, seven of them denouncing section 25 of the 1789 Act, which was the jurisdictional foundation for the Court's power of judicial review over the states. In 1821, 1822, 1824, and 1831 bills were introduced in Congress to repeal section 25. The assault on the Court was sharpest in the Senate, whose members were chosen by the state legislatures. Some bills to curb the Court proposed a constitutional amendment to limit the tenure of the Justices. One bill would have required seriatim opinions. Others proposed that no case involving a state or a constitutional question could be decided except unanimously; others accepted a 5–2 vote. One bill proposed that the Senate should have appellate powers over the Court's decisions.

Throughout the 1820s the attempts to curb the Court created a continuing constitutional crisis that climaxed in 1831, when Marshall despondently predicted the repeal of section 25 and the dissolution of the Union. In 1831, however, the House, after a great debate, defeated a repeal bill by a vote of 138–51; Southerners cast forty-five of the votes against the Court. What saved the Court was the inability of its opponents to mass behind a single course of action; many who opposed section 25 favored a less drastic measure. The Court had stalwart defenders, of course, including Senators DANIEL WEBSTER and JAMES BUCHANAN. Most important, it had won popular approbation. Although the Court had enemies in local centers of power, Americans thrilled to Marshall's paeans to the Constitution and the Union and he taught them to identify the Court with the Constitution and the Union.

A perceptible shift in the decisions toward greater tolerance for state action also helped dampen the fires under the Court in Marshall's later years. The coalition that Marshall had forged began to dissolve with the appointments of Justices Smith Thompson, JOHN MCLEAN, and Henry Baldwin. Brown v. Maryland (1827), MARTIN V. MOTT (1827), AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY V. CANTER (1828), WESTON V. CHARLESTON (1829), CRAIG V. MISSOURI (1830), and the CHEROKEE INDIAN CASES (1832) continued the lines of doctrine laid down by the earlier Marshall Court. But the impact of new appointments was felt in the decisions of Ogden v. Saunders (1827), WILLSON V. BLACKBIRD CREEK MARSH COMPANY (1829) and PROVIDENCE BANK V. BILLINGS (1830). In Marshall's last decade on the Court, six decisions supported nationalist claims against seventeen for state claims. During the same decade there were ten decisions against claims based on VESTED RIGHTS and only one sustaining such a claim. The shift in constitutional direction may also be inferred from the inability of the Marshall Court, because of dissension and illness, to resolve CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE V. WARREN BRIDGE, MAYOR OF NEW YORK V. MILN, and BRISCOE V. BANK OF KENTUCKY, all finally decided in 1837 under Marshall's successor against the late Chief Justice's wishes. Before his last decade the only important influence on the Court resulting from the fact that Republicans had a voting majority was the repudiation of a FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES.

What was the legacy of the Marshall Court? It established the Court as a strong institution, an equal and coordinate branch of the national government, independent of the political branches. It established itself as the authoritative interpreter of the supreme law of the land. It declared its rightful authority to hold even acts of Congress and the President unconstitutional. It maintained continuing judicial review over the states to support the supremacy of national law. In so doing, the Court sustained the constitutionality of the act of Congress chartering the Bank of the United States, laying down the definitive exposition of the doctrine of implied powers. The Court also expounded the commerce clause in Gibbons v. Ogden (1824), with a breadth and vigor that provided the basis for national regulation of the economy generations later. Finally, the Court made the contract clause of the Constitution into a bulwark protecting both vested rights and risk capital. Fletcher supported the sanctity of public land grants to private parties, encouraging capital investment and speculation in land values. NEW JERSEY V. WILSON (1812) laid down the doctrine that a state grant of tax immunity constituted a contract within the protection of the Constitution, preventing subsequent state taxation for the life of the grant. DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819) protected private colleges and spurred the development of state universities; it also provided the constitutional props for the expansion of the private corporation by holding that a charter of incorporation is entitled to protection of the contract clause. The Marshall Court often relied on nationalist doctrines to prevent state measures that sought to regulate or thwart corporate development. Just as national supremacy, judicial review, and the Court's appellate jurisdiction were often interlocked, so too the interests of capitalism, nationalism, and judicial review were allied. Time has hardly withered the influence and achievements of the Marshall Court.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BAKER, LEONARD 1974 John Marshall. New York: Macmillan.
BEVERIDGE, ALBERT J. 1919 The Life of John Marshall. Vols. 3 and 4. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1919 John Marshall and the Constitution: A Chronicle of the Supreme Court. New Haven: Yale University Press.
HAINES, CHARLES G. 1944 The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government and Politics, 1789–1835. Berkeley: University of California Press.
HASKINS, GEORGE LEE and JOHNSON, HERBERT Q. 1981 Foundations of Power: John Marshall, 1801–1815. Volume 2 of the Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Macmillan.
KONEFSKY, SAMUEL J. 1964 John Marshall and Alexander Hamilton. New York: Macmillan.
MORGAN, DONALD G. 1954 Justice William Johnson: The First Great Dissenter. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
WARREN, CHARLES 1923 The Supreme Court in United States History, 3 vols. Boston: Little, Brown.

MARSHALL PLAN

At the Harvard University commencement exercises on June 5, 1947, Secretary of State George C. Marshall proposed that the United States undertake a vast program of postwar economic aid to assist the countries of Europe to rebuild from WORLD WAR II. Neither Secretary Marshall nor President HARRY S. TRUMAN offered any constitutional authority for such a program, although some members of Congress, led by Senator ROBERT A. TAFT of Ohio, contended that the expenditure could not be justified under either the FOREIGN AFFAIRS power or the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER. Acting on the initiative of the United States, sixteen European nations formed the Organization of European Economic Cooperation (OEEC) which in turn issued a report setting forth Europe's collective needs and resources. The Soviet Union and other East European countries were invited to participate, but declined. Thereafter, on April 3, 1948, following the Soviet-sponsored coup in Czechoslovakia, which turned the tide of congressional opinion and caused the Marshall Plan expenditures to be justified as a national defense measure, the United States Congress passed the Economic Cooperation Act, to be administered by the Economic Cooperation Administration. Within four years and after the expenditure of $12-$13 billion in American loans and grants-in-aid, Europe made tremendous strides toward economic recovery. Coupled with increased military security (evidenced primarily in the signing of the NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY in 1949 and formation of the North Atlantic Alliance), this extensive economic recovery helped quell fears of Soviet expansion into Western Europe. The Marshall Plan and the OEEC resulting from it also created a precedent for further economic integration among the participating states of Western Europe.

BURNS H. WESTON
(1986)

Bibliography

PRICE, HARRY BAYARD 1955 The Marshall Plan and Its Meaning. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

MARTIAL LAW

See: Civil-Military Relations

MARTIN, LUTHER
(1748–1826)

Luther Martin represented Maryland in the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS and signed the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. He was attorney general of Maryland from 1778 to 1805 and one of the early leaders of the American bar. Martin also represented Maryland at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, where he was a leader of the small-state faction. Although he favored the Convention's purpose, he consistently advocated positions that would have prevented the establishment of a strong central government. Fearing tyranny, he endorsed a one-term presidency and opposed JAMES MADISON's plan to allow a congressional veto of state or local laws.

The question of congressional REPRESENTATION seemed to him one of the most vexing problems. He favored a unicameral legislature and spoke fervently against proportionate representation at the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, both in the Convention and afterward. His opposition in Philadelphia helped produce the deadlock that nearly wrecked the convention, but he served on the committee that framed the GREAT COMPROMISE and supported its recommendation. Martin favored JUDICIAL REVIEW but opposed authorizing Congress to create federal courts on the ground that state courts would suffice; they were bound by federal law and their decisions could be appealed to the Supreme Court. Martin also thought that the clause prohibiting interference with the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS was unwise; he warned of the inevitability of "great public calamities and distress" when such intervention would become essential—an argument vindicated in HOME BUILDING & LOAN V. BLAISDELL (1934). As the summer progressed, Martin grew increasingly restive. He opposed allowing suspension of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS and he strongly favored granting Congress power to tax or completely prohibit the slave trade. An opponent of SLAVERY, he labeled its recognition in the Constitution "absurd and disgraceful to the last degree." Martin also concluded that later changes rendered the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, which he originally had proposed, "worse than useless." For these reasons, and because the Constitution contained no BILL OF RIGHTS, he opposed its ratification. In his influential tract of 1788 against RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION, a major anti-Federalist statement, Martin presented the fullest argument of the time in favor of equal representation of the states in Congress. Despite his opposition to the Constitution, Martin later switched his party allegiance and became known as the "Federalist bulldog."

A brilliant lawyer despite his later alcoholism, Martin appeared frequently in the Supreme Court and in state trials; he defended his old friend Justice SAMUEL CHASE at the latter's IMPEACHMENT trial in 1804 and represented AARON BURR against a TREASON charge three years later, winning both cases. (See EX PARTE BOLLMAN AND SWARTWOUT.) Among dozens of Court appearances, his most famous cases were FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) and MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819). In McCulloch, he eloquently defended Maryland's right to tax the federally chartered Bank of the United States, arguing for the application of the Tenth Amendment. Shortly after losing McCulloch, Martin suffered a severe stroke. After living as a penniless derelict for some time, he was eventually taken in by Burr. He died in 1826.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

CLARKSON, PAUL S. and JETT, R. SAMUEL 1970 Luther Martin of Maryland. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

MARTIN v. HUNTER'S LESSEE
1 Wheaton 304 (1816)

Appomattox ultimately settled the issue that bottomed this case: were the states or was the nation supreme? As a matter of law, the opinion of the Supreme Court supplied the definitive answer, but law cannot settle a conflict between competing governments unless they agree to abide by the decision of a tribunal they recognize as having JURISDICTION to decide. Whether such a tribunal existed was the very issue in this case; more precisely the question was whether the Supreme Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION extended to the state courts. In 1810 Virginia had supported the Court against state sovereignty advocates. Pennsylvania's legislature had resolved that "no provision is made in the Constitution for determining disputes between the general and state governments by an impartial tribunal." To that Virginia replied that the Constitution provides such a tribunal, "the Supreme Court, more eminently qualified . . . to decide the disputes aforesaid in an enlightened and impartial manner, than any other tribunal which could be erected." (See UNITED STATES V. JUDGE PETERS.) The events connected with the Martin case persuaded Virginia to reverse its position. The highest court of the state, the Virginia Court of Appeals, defied the Supreme Court, subverted the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES as defined by Article III of the Constitution, circumvented the SUPREMACY CLAUSE (Article VI), and held unconstitutional a major act of Congress—all for the purpose of repudiating JUDICIAL REVIEW, or the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction over state courts and power to declare state acts void.

The Martin case arose out of a complicated and protracted legal struggle over land titles. Lord Fairfax died in 1781, bequeathing valuable tracts of his property in Virginia's Northern Neck to his nephew, Denny Martin, a British subject residing in England. During the Revolution Virginia had confiscated Loyalist estates and by an act of 1779, which prohibited alien enemies from holding land, declared the escheat, or reversion to the state, of estates then owned by British subjects. That act of 1779 did not apply to the estates of Lord Fairfax, who had been a Virginia citizen. The Treaty of Peace with Great Britain in 1783, calling for the restitution of all confiscated estates and prohibiting further confiscations, strengthened Martin's claim under the will of his uncle. In 1785, however, Virginia had extended its escheat law of 1779 to the Northern Neck, and four years later had granted some of those lands to one David Hunter. JAY'S TREATY of 1794, which protected the American property of British subjects, also buttressed Martin's claims. By then a Virginia district court, which included Judge ST. GEORGE TUCKER, decided in Martin's favor; Hunter appealed to the state's high court. JOHN MARSHALL, who had represented Martin, and James Marshall, his brother, joined a syndicate that arranged to purchase the Northern Neck lands. In 1796 the state legislature offered a compromise, which the Marshall syndicate accepted: the Fairfax devisees relinquished claim to the undeveloped lands of the Northern Neck in return for the state's recognition of their claim to Fairfax's manor lands. The Marshall syndicate accepted the compromise, thereby seeming to secure Hunter's claim, yet thereafter completed their purchase. In 1806, Martin's heir conveyed the lands to the syndicate, and in 1808 he appealed to the Court of Appeals, which decided in favor of Hunter two years later.

The Martin-Marshall interests, relying on the Treaty of 1783 and Jay's Treaty, took the case to the Supreme Court on a WRIT OF ERROR under section 25 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789. That section provided in part that the nation's highest tribunal on writ of error might reexamine and reverse or affirm the final judgment of a state court if the state court sustained a state statute against a claim that the statute was repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, or if the state court decided against any title or right claimed under the treaties or federal authority. Chief Justice Marshall took no part in the case, and two other Justices were absent. Justice JOSEPH STORY, for a three-member majority and against the dissenting vote of Justice WILLIAM JOHNSON, reversed the judgment of the Virginia Court of Appeals, holding that federal treaties confirmed Martin's title. In the course of his opinion Story sapped the Virginia statutes escheating the lands of alien enemies and ignored the "compromise" of 1796. The mandate of the Supreme Court to the state Court of Appeals concluded: "You therefore are hereby commanded that such proceedings be had in said cause, as according to right and justice, and the laws of the United States, and agreeable to said judgment and instructions of said Supreme Court . . ." (Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee, 1813).

The state court that received this mandate consisted of eminent and proud men who regarded the Supreme Court as a rival; the man who dominated the state court was SPENCER ROANE, whose opinion Story had reversed. Roane, the son-in-law of PATRICK HENRY, was not just a judge; he was a state political boss, an implacable enemy of John Marshall, and the man whom THOMAS JEFFERSON would have appointed Chief Justice, given the chance. To Roane and his brethren, Story's opinion was more than an insulting encroachment on their judicial prerogatives. It raised the specter of national consolidation, provoking the need to rally around the STATES' RIGHTS principles of the VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. Roane consulted with Jefferson and JAMES MONROE, and he called before his court the leading members of the state bar, who spoke for six days. Munford, the Virginia court reporter, observed: "The question whether this mandate should be obeyed excited all that attention from the Bench and Bar which its great importance truly merited." The reporter added that the court had its opinions ready for delivery shortly after the arguments. That was in April 1814, when the Republican political organization of Virginia dared not say anything that would encourage or countenance the states' rights doctrines of Federalist New England, which opposed the War of 1812 and thwarted national policies. Not until December 1815, when the crisis had passed and secessionism in the North had dissipated, did the Virginia Court of Appeals release its opinions.

Each of four state judges wrote opinions, agreeing that the Constitution had established a federal system in which SOVEREIGNTY was divided between the national and state governments, neither of which could control the other or any of its organs. To allow the United States or any of its departments to operate directly on the states or any of their departments would subvert the independence of the states, allow the creature to judge its creators, and destroy the idea of a national government of limited powers. Although conflicts between the states and the United States were inevitable, the Constitution "has provided no umpire" and did not authorize Congress to bestow on the Supreme Court a power to pass final judgment on the extent of the powers of the United States or of its own appellate jurisdiction. Nothing in the Constitution denied the power of a state court to pass finally upon the validity of state legislation. The states could hold the United States to the terms of the compact only if the state courts had the power to determine finally the constitutionality of acts of Congress. Section 25 of the Judiciary Act was unconstitutional because it vested appellate powers in the Supreme Court in a case where the highest court of a state has authoritatively construed state acts. In sum, the position of the Court of Appeals was that the Supreme Court cannot reverse a state court on a matter of state or even federal law, but a state court can hold unconstitutional an act of the United States. Thus, Roane, with Jefferson's approval, located in the state courts the ultimate authority to judge the extent of the powers of the national government; in 1798 Jefferson had centered that ultimate authority in the state legislatures. At the conclusion of their opinions, the Virginia judges entered their judgment:

> The court is unanimously of opinion, that the appellate power of the Supreme Court of the United States does not extend to this court, under a sound construction of the constitution of the United States; that so much of the 25th section of the act of Congress to establish the judicial courts of the United States, as extends the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to this court, is not in pursuance of the constitution of the United States; that the writ of error, in this cause, was improvidently allowed, under the authority of that act; that the proceedings thereon in the Supreme Court were Coram non judice [before a court without jurisdiction], in relation to this court, and that obedience to its mandate be declined by the court.

When the case returned a second time to the Supreme Court on writ of error, Marshall again absented himself and Story again wrote the opinion. The Martin Court, consisting of five Republicans and one Federalist, was unanimous, though Johnson concurred separately. Story's forty-page opinion on behalf of federal judicial review is a masterpiece, far superior to Marshall's performance in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) on behalf of national judicial review. In its cadenced prose, magisterial tone, nationalist doctrine, incisive logic, and driving repetitiveness, Story's opinion foreshadowed Marshall's later and magnificent efforts in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821), and GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), suggesting that they owe as much to Story as he to Marshall's undoubted influence on him. Because the Constitution, as Roane pointed out, had neither expressly empowered Congress to extend the Court's appellate jurisdiction to the state courts nor expressly vested the Court itself with such jurisdiction, Story had to justify BROAD CONSTRUCTION. The Constitution, he observed, was ordained not by the sovereign states but by the people of the United States, who could subordinate state powers to those of the nation. Not all national powers were expressly given. The Constitution "unavoidably deals in general language," Story explained, because it was intended "to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purpose of Providence." The framers of the Constitution, unable to foresee "what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable" to achieve its purposes, expressed its powers in "general terms, leaving to the legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects. . . ." From such sweeping premises on the flexibility and expansiveness of national powers, Story could sustain section 25. He found authority for its enactment in Articles III and VI.

Article III, which defined the judicial power of the United States, contemplates that the Supreme Court shall be primarily an appellate court, whose appellate jurisdiction "shall" extend to specified CASES AND CONTROVERSIES. "Shall" is mandatory or imperative: the Court must exercise its appellate jurisdiction in all cases, in law and EQUITY, "arising under the Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made. . . ." It is, therefore, the case, not the court from which it comes, that gives the Supreme Court its appellate jurisdiction, and because cases involving the Constitution, federal laws, and treaties may arise in state courts, the Supreme Court must exercise appellate jurisdiction in those cases. Contrary to Roane, that appellate jurisdiction did not exist only when the case came from a lower federal court. The Constitution required the establishment of a Supreme Court but merely authorized Congress to exercise a discretionary power in establishing lower federal courts. If Congress chose not to establish them, the Court's mandatory appellate jurisdiction could be exercised over only the state courts. The establishment of the lower federal courts meant that the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court extended concurrently to both state and federal courts.

Article VI, the supremacy clause, made the Constitution itself, laws in pursuance to it, and federal treaties the supreme law of the land, binding on state courts. The decision of a state court on a matter involving the supreme law cannot be final, because the judicial power of the United States extends specifically to all such cases. To enforce the supremacy clause, the Supreme Court must have appellate jurisdiction over state court decisions involving the supreme law. That a case involving the supreme law might arise in the state courts is obvious. Story gave the example of a contract case in which a party relied on the provision in Article I, section 10, barring state impairments of the OBLIGATIONS OF A CONTRACT, and also the example of a criminal prosecution in which the defendant relied on the provision against EX POST FACTO laws. The Constitution, he pointed out, was in fact designed to operate on the states "in their corporate capacities." It is "crowded" with provisions that "restrain or annul the sovereignty of the States," making the Court's exercise of appellate power over state acts unconstitutional no more in derogation of state sovereignty than those provisions or the principle of national supremacy. Not only would the federal system survive the exercise of federal judicial review; it could not function without such review. The law must be uniform "upon all subjects within the purview of the Constitution. Judges . . . in different States, might differently interpret a statute, or a treaty of the United States, or even the Constitution itself: If there were no revising authority to control these jarring and discordant judgments, and harmonize them into uniformity, the laws, the treaties and the Constitution of the United States would be different in different states," and might never have the same interpretation and efficacy in any two states.

Story's opinion is the linchpin of the federal system and of judicial nationalism. It remains the greatest argument for federal judicial review, though it by no means concluded the controversy. Virginia's hostility was so intense that a case was contrived in 1821 to allow the Supreme Court to restate the principles of Martin. (See COHENS V. VIRGINIA, 1821.) As a matter of fact, though, federal judicial review and the constitutionality of section 25 remained bitterly contested topics to the eve of the CIVIL WAR.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BEVERIDGE, ALBERT J. 1916–1919 The Life of John Marshall, 4 vols. Vol. IV:145–167. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

CROSSKEY, WILLIAM WINSLOW 1953 Politics and the Constitution, 2 vols. Pages 785–817. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

HAINES, CHARLES GROVE 1944 The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government and Politics, 1789–1835. Pages 340–351. Berkeley: University of California Press.

MARTIN v. MOTT
12 Wheaton 19 (1827)

Mott, having avoided militia duty during the War of 1812, was fined by a court-martial. The Constitution authorized Congress to call forth the militia, and President JAMES MADISON, under congressional authority, had called upon the state militias for military service. Several states, which opposed the war, obstructed compliance, arguing that the national government had no authority to determine when the state militias could be called or to subject them to federal governance. Mott relied on such arguments. The Court unanimously held, in an opinion by Justice JOSEPH STORY, that the President, with congressional authorization, had exclusive power to decide when and under what exigencies the militia might be called to duty, and that his decision not only binds the states but places their militias under the control of officers appointed by the President.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MARYLAND v. CRAIG
497 U.S. 836 (1990)

This is another Sixth Amendment case in which the Supreme Court declined to follow the express words of the text. Although the Court engaged in what is usually described as JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, it acted in a good cause and had PRECEDENT for its exception to the CONFRONTATION clause of the amendment. In every case in which HEARSAY evidence of any sort is admitted, the right of the accused to confront the witnesses against him or her becomes empty. In this case the Court held, 5–4, that the victim of child abuse may testify on closed circuit television to avoid the trauma of face-to-face confrontation with the accused.

Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, for the Court, reasoned that the state had a legitimate interest in protecting the child witness from psychological trauma. Face-to-face confrontation, assured by the text of the Sixth Amendment, turned out not to be an indispensable element of the confrontation guarantee.

Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, an unlikely spokesman for the liberal Justices who joined him, rested his dissent on the clear language of the text. He accused the majority of a line of reasoning that "eliminates the right." But his view on the admission of hearsay ("not expressly excluded by the Confrontation Clause") would also justify admission of television testimony in the presence of defense counsel—because the amendment does not expressly exclude such a procedure. Scalia further questioned whether the evidence of a frightened child was reliable. But the state, not the Court, should decide whether the child required protection. Scalia's final proposition, that the Court is not at liberty to ignore the confrontation clause, was at war with his several illustrations to the contrary.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

MARYLAND TOLERATION ACT
(April 2, 1649)

This landmark in the protection of liberty of conscience was the most liberal in colonial America at the time of its passage by the Maryland Assembly under the title, "An Act Concerning Religion," and it was far more liberal than Parliament's TOLERATION ACT of forty years later. Until 1776 only the Rhode Island Charter of 1663 and Pennsylvania's "Great Law" of 1682 guaranteed fuller RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Maryland's statute, framed by its Roman Catholic proprietor, Lord Baltimore (Cecil Calvert), was the first public act to use the phrase "the free exercise" of religion, later embodied in the FIRST AMENDMENT. More noteworthy still, the act symbolized the extraordinary fact that for most of the seventeenth century in Maryland, Roman Catholics and various Protestant sects openly worshiped as they chose and lived in peace, though not in amity. The act applied to all those who professed belief in Jesus Christ, except antitrinitarians, and guaranteed them immunity from being troubled in any way because of their religion and "the free exercise thereof." In other provisions more characteristic of the time, the act fixed the death penalty for blasphemers against God, Christ, or the Trinity, and it imposed lesser penalties for profaning the sabbath or for reproaching the Virgin Mary or the apostles. Another clause anticipated GROUP LIBEL laws by penalizing the reproachful use of any name or term such as heretic, puritan, popish priest, anabaptist, separatist, or antinomian.

At a time when intolerance was the law in Europe and most of America, Maryland established no church and tolerated all Trinitarian Christians, until Protestants, who had managed to suspend the toleration act between 1654 and 1658, gained political control of the colony in 1689.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

HANLEY, THOMAS O'BRIEN 1959 Their Rights and Liberties: The Beginnings of Religious and Political Freedom in Maryland. Westminister, Md.: Newman Press.

MASON, GEORGE
(1725–1792)

An influential Virginia leader of the Revolutionary period, George Mason served only a single term (1759–1760) in the colony's House of Burgesses. Family responsibilities and a dislike for routine legislative work kept him at his estate in Fairfax County, where he was active in local public affairs. He was a member and treasurer of the Ohio Company (1752–1773), the Virginia enterprise to explore and settle the Northwest Territory. Mason opposed parliamentary taxation of the colonies and, as justice of the peace, connived at evasion of the Stamp Act. His Fairfax Resolves of 1774 were introduced by his friend and neighbor GEORGE WASHINGTON in the House of Burgesses and prefigured the Declaration and Resolves of the FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS. In 1775 Mason succeeded Washington as a member of Virginia's provisional legislature and was elected to the Committee of Safety, the de facto executive. At the Virginia convention of 1776, Mason wrote the VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS and a major part of the constitution. At the same convention he was appointed, along with GEORGE WYTHE, EDMUND PENDLETON, and THOMAS JEFFERSON, to a committee to revise the state's laws; and, although he resigned from the committee, many of his drafts were included in the final product. Throughout the Revolution he remained active in military and western affairs, and he was the author of an early plan for ceding the Northwest Territory to Congress and organizing its government.

Mason was at the meeting at Mount Vernon in 1785 that set in train the movement toward a constitutional convention; and he was elected to, but did not attend, the Annapolis Convention. He was a delegate to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 where he was one of the five most frequent speakers. He made his mark at the convention as a spokesman for republican nationalism. He favored a president elected directly by the people for a single seven-year term and assisted by a council. He opposed any mention of slavery in the Constitution as degrading to the document. He was a member of the committee that proposed the GREAT COMPROMISE but bitterly opposed the later compromise which gave twenty years' protection to the slave trade. Most decisively he desired to see a BILL OF RIGHTS included in the new constitution: "The laws of the United States are to be paramount to state bills of rights," he warned, and a constitutional guarantee of rights "would give great quiet to the people." The motion to draft a bill of rights was defeated, and Mason, who had been active in framing the new Constitution, accordingly refused to sign it. He sent his proposed bill of rights to RICHARD HENRY LEE who tried, but failed, to have Congress add it before transmitting the Constitution to the states.

Mason opposed RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION in the Virginia convention of 1788 because of its supposed antirepublican tendencies, its compromise with SLAVERY, and its want of a bill of rights. When the convention voted to ratify the Constitution it appended a declaration of rights that closely followed Mason's declaration of 1776.

Mason thereafter retired from public life. He declined appointment as a United States senator in 1790. Shortly before his death he told Thomas Jefferson that the machinations of ALEXANDER HAMILTON in favor of urban monied interests were bearing out Mason's predictions about the Constitution.

Throughout his public career Mason adhered to principle even in apparent contradiction to his self-interest. Although he held some 300 slaves he abominated slavery as an institution and favored a plan of gradual compensated emancipation preceded by education. Although he was an active Anglican layman, he favored measures to end the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION in Virginia.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

ROWLAND, KATE MASON 1892 The Life of George Mason, Including His Speeches, Public Papers, and Correspondence. New York: Putnam's.

RUTLAND, ROBERT ALLEN 1961 George Mason, Reluctant Statesman. Williamsburg, Va.: Colonial Williamsburg, distributed by Holt, Rinehart & Winston, New York.

MASSACHUSETTS v. LAIRD
400 U.S. 886 (1970)

In 1969, the legislature of Massachusetts attempted to nullify the VIETNAM WAR. It passed an act declaring the war unconstitutional, exempting Massachusetts citizens from service in the war, and directing the state attorney general to seek a Supreme Court ruling on the constitutionality of the war. Accordingly, the attorney general filed suit in the state's name against the secretary of defense, Melvin Laird, requesting an order prohibiting the secretary from sending any Massachusetts citizen to Vietnam. As the suit was between a state and a citizen of another state, it would have come within the ORIGINAL JURISDICTION of the Supreme Court. The Court, however, voted 6–3 to deny leave to file the complaint. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, who passionately desired an opportunity to rule on the constitutionality of the war, filed an unusual fourteen-page dissent from the denial memorandum.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

MASSACHUSETTS v. MELLON

See: Frothingham v. Mellon

MASSACHUSETTS BAY, COLONIAL CHARTERS OF (1629, 1691)

In 1629 King Charles I granted a royal charter to Puritan leaders of the New England Company, incorporating them as the Massachusetts Bay Colony. In the same year Puritan leaders received authorization to migrate to New England and take the charter with them. As a result the Puritans controlled Massachusetts and sought to create a godly commonwealth. The charter authorized the freemen of the company to meet in a General Court or legislature, and to choose a governor, a deputy governor, and assistants, seven of whom could function as the General Court. The charter vested power in these men to govern Massachusetts Bay in every respect and guaranteed that all inhabitants "shall have and enjoy all liberties and immunities of free and natural subjects . . . as if they . . . were born within the realm of England." The Puritans, who governed themselves, enjoyed the rights of Englishmen, and put an ocean between themselves and England, became obstinately independent.

Massachusetts admitted only church members to freemanship, but the little oligarchy in control refused to allow the freemen a right to participate in governing, a violation of the charter. In 1634 the freemen, on seeing the charter for themselves, demanded full participation in government. From then on, the freemen in the towns chose two deputies from each town as members of the General Court, making it a representative body. Conflict between the freemen and the assistants led to an agreement that without a majority vote of each no law should be passed; that soon led to BICAMERALISM. In the 1640s the battle of the freemen for their charter rights led to the MASSACHUSETTS BODY OF LIBERTIES and to the MASSACHUSETTS GENERAL LAWS AND LIBERTIES, which, with the charter, became the basis of FUNDAMENTAL LAW in the colony, the functional equivalent of a written CONSTITUTION.

In the succeeding decades Massachusetts proved to be aloof from English concerns and refractory in many ways, even claiming that its charter made it independent of Parliament. Relations deteriorated after the Restoration and finally, in 1684, England vacated the charter of 1629. In 1686 James II appointed his own governor of the new Dominion of New England, which combined the New England colonies, New York, and New Jersey. The king's governor ruled without a representative legislature and sought to insinuate the Church of England into Puritan New England. News of the overthrow of James II led to a parallel Glorious Revolution in New England—and elsewhere in America. Each of the colonies that had been absorbed within the dominion resumed its prior governmental practices.

In 1691 King William III, advised by people who had experienced the independence of Massachusetts, officially restored self-government to Massachusetts on royal terms. The charter of 1691 turned Massachusetts from comparative autonomy to a royal colony. The king appointed its governor and his deputy, and the governor could veto legislation—a model for a strong executive in later American history. The General Court consisted of two houses, the lower one elected by the people of the towns who sent two deputies each to the General Court; these elected representatives chose the governor's council, which also served as the upper house. The freemanship of church members disappeared under the new charter, which replaced the religious test with a property qualification on the right to vote. The General Court was empowered to legislate, to create a judicial system, and to elect the upper house—subject to the governor's veto. The government established by the second charter recognized a clear SEPARATION OF POWERS between the three branches. The charter also embodied the principle of liberty of conscience for "all Christians (Except Papists)" and, like the first charter, also guaranteed the rights of Englishmen.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

OSGOOD, HERBERT L. (1904) 1957 The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century. 3 Vols. Gloucester, Mass.: Peter Smith.

MASSACHUSETTS BOARD OF RETIREMENT v. MURGIA 427 U.S. 307 (1976)

In Murgia the Supreme Court, asked to subject AGE DISCRIMINATION to heightened judicial scrutiny, declined the invitation, 7–1. In a per curiam opinion the Court upheld a state law limiting membership in the uniformed state police to persons under the age of fifty, irrespective of an older person's ability to pass physical or other tests of qualification. There was not a murmur in the Court's opinion about IRREBUTTABLE PRESUMPTIONS, nor was age a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION; although the aged were not free from discrimination, they had not experienced "purposeful unequal treatment" or disabilities imposed "on the basis of stereotyped characteristics not truly indicative of their abilities." With that breathtaking inaccuracy behind it, the Court applied the most permissive form of RATIONAL BASIS review, noted that physical ability generally declines with age, and concluded that because the mandatory retirement rule was not "wholly unrelated" to the objective of maintaining a physically fit police force, the law was valid. Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, in lone dissent, repeated his long-standing argument that the Court should abandon its "two-tier" system of STANDARDS OF REVIEW in favor of a system that matched the level of judicial scrutiny in EQUAL PROTECTION cases to the interests at stake in each case.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MASSACHUSETTS BODY OF LIBERTIES (1641)

The Massachusetts Body of Liberties, which resulted from popular demand that the fundamental law of the colony be written, was primarily a set of constitutional safeguards protecting personal freedom and the procedures of DUE PROCESS. By 1634 the colonists were demanding publication of the colony's laws as a curb on the magistrates' discretionary powers. The magistrates opposed publication as a restraint of their lawful powers; they believed that law should develop in Massachusetts Bay as had the COMMON LAW in England, over time and by custom. More to the point, publication would invite direct comparison with English law and one provision of the charter forbade establishment of any laws repugnant to those of England.

For the remainder of the decade a number of attempts were made to formulate a document that would satisfy these demands. One plan, drawn up by the Reverend John Cotton, may have been rejected because of its biblical severity or its failure to be sufficiently comprehensive. In 1638, the Reverend Nathaniel Ward, a barrister active at Lincoln's Inn before his emigration, submitted a proposal that was eventually sent to the towns for their consideration and revision early in 1641. Despite years of inaction and obstruction by the magistrates the General Court finally adopted this draft that autumn.

The first "liberty," paraphrasing the thirty-ninth article of MAGNA CARTA, specified conformity to the traditional rights of Englishmen, as exemplified in Magna Carta and the common law, and to "the word of God." The Body of Liberties was undeniably a product of the Puritan colony: a large portion outlined ecclesiastical rights and responsibilities. One section, drawn from Cotton's code, listed twelve capital crimes and cross-referenced each one to the appropriate biblical verse.

Over forty liberties were devoted to "Juditiall Proceedings" and their adjunct rights. In addition to defining a few lesser offenses, the Body of Liberties provided extensive guarantees for each step in legal proceedings. The use of summonses was regulated and a right to BAIL was assured. Written pleadings were permitted in court and, unlike English practice, cases would not be abated for minor technical errors. Parties were granted the right to TRIAL BY JURY and to challenge any of the jurors. Other liberties protected rights now taken for granted. Among these were provisions for a SPEEDY TRIAL, a limited privilege against self-incrimination, as well as prohibitions of DOUBLE JEOPARDY and "inhumane barbarous and cruel" punishments. (See CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT.) The Body of Liberties also guaranteed FREEDOM OF SPEECH in courts and public assemblies and freedom of movement. Other sections covered the "Liberties of Women," children's rights, and those of servants.

Despite these and other innovations the deputies were dissatisfied with the document. They found it overly broad and poorly defined and insisted upon specified penalties—the Body of Liberties provided them only for capital crimes—and precise limits to magisterial power. Eventually, widespread discontent resulted in the passage in 1648 of the extensively detailed MASSACHUSETTS GENERAL LAWS AND LIBERTIES.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

HASKINS, GEORGE L. 1960 Law and Authority in Early Massachusetts. New York: Macmillan.

MASSACHUSETTS CIRCULAR LETTER (February 11, 1768)

This document reveals the American conception of a CONSTITUTION as a supreme FUNDAMENTAL LAW limiting government by definite restraints upon power. SAMUEL ADAMS drafted the document, which the Massachusetts House of Representatives adopted and sent to the assemblies of other colonies to secure their assent to the contention that the TOWNSHEND ACTS of 1767 and all other taxes levied by Parliament on America were unconstitutional. The right to private property, Adams wrote, is an unalterable natural and constitutional right "engrafted into the British Constitution, as a fundamental law. . . ." Parliament had violated that right by TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION. Although Parliament was the supreme legislature in the empire, it could act lawfully only within the sphere of its legitimate powers. Echoing the Swiss jurist EMERICH DE VATTEL, who distinguished a constitution from ordinary statutory law, Adams declared that in all free states the constitution is fixed, and "as the supreme Legislative derives its Power and Authority from the Constitution, it cannot overleap the bounds of it, without destroying its own foundation. . . ." The constitution, Adams stated, "ascertains and limits" both SOVEREIGNTY and allegiance.

London censured the "Seditious Paper" of Massachusetts and declared that Massachusetts had subverted "the true principles of the constitution." To the British, as Sir WILLIAM BLACKSTONE contended in his Commentaries, Parliament could not act unconstitutionally; it knew no practical limits. To the Americans, an unconstitutional act was one that exceeded governmental authority. "Unconstitutional" did not mean impolitic or inexpedient, as it meant in Britain; it meant a lawless government act that need not be obeyed. The Massachusetts Circular Letter thus fortified the emergence of a new conception of constitutional law.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

MILLER, JOHN C. 1943 Origins of the American Revolution. Pages 257–264. Boston: Little, Brown.

MASSACHUSETTS CONSTITUTION
(October 25, 1780)

The "Constitution or Form of Government for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts" is the classic American state CONSTITUTION and the oldest surviving written constitution in the United States (or the world), distinguished in addition by the fact that it was framed by the world's first CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. But for two states which merely modified their COLONIAL CHARTERS, all the original thirteen states except Massachusetts had adopted their first constitutions by 1778 and in every case the body that enacted ordinary legislation framed the constitution and promulgated it. The Massachusetts legislature also framed a constitution but resorted to the novel step of submitting it to the voters for approval, and they rejected it. Then, in accordance with a proposal first advanced in the CONCORD TOWN RESOLUTIONS of 1776, a special constitutional convention elected for the sole purpose of drawing up a document of FUNDAMENTAL LAW performed the task and sent it out for ratification, article by article. Universal manhood suffrage prevailed in the vote for delegates to the convention and for popular ratification. Massachusetts, following democratic procedures for institutionalizing the SOCIAL COMPACT THEORY of government to devise a frame of government and a supreme law, provided the model that subsequently became common throughout the United States. The Massachusetts constitution of 1780, with amendments, still continues as the constitution of that commonwealth.

JOHN ADAMS, the principal framer of the constitution, once proudly wrote, "I made a Constitution for Massachusetts, which finally made the Constitution of the United States." His exaggeration was pardonable, because no other state constitution so much influenced the framing of the national Constitution. Some earlier state constitutions had referred to the principle of SEPARATION OF POWERS but had made their legislatures dominant, even domineering. Massachusetts not only provided the fullest statement of the principle but also put it into practice. Its judges, appointed by the governor, were to hold office "during GOOD BEHAVIOR" with undiminishable salaries. Its governor was the model for the presidency of the United States. He was to be elected by the voters, rather than by the legislature as in other states, and be a strong executive. He appointed the members of his own council or cabinet and, indeed, appointed all judicial officers down to local magistrates and registers of probate as well as sheriffs, coroners, and the state attorney general. He was "commander-in-chief of the army and navy"; he had the PARDONING POWER; and he alone among the first governors of the thirteen states had a sole VETO POWER over legislation, which could be overridden only by a two-thirds vote of both houses. The state senate and house of representatives were also precursors of the national bicameral system. No original state constitution had a better system of CHECKS AND BALANCES than Massachusetts's.

Its constitution was divided into three parts: a preamble, a declaration of rights, and a frame of government. The preamble, on the general purposes of the state, explicitly embodied the social compact theory of the origin of the body politic. The declaration of rights, although containing little not found in constitutions previously framed by other states, was the most comprehensive compendium of its kind, and it phrased the rights which it guaranteed in language most influential in framing the BILL OF RIGHTS of the Constitution of the United States. The injunction against " UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures" in the FOURTH AMENDMENT derives from the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights, and the injunction "shall not" instead of the pallid "ought not" ("liberty of the press ought not be restrained") was also a Massachusetts innovation. The one grave deficiency of the Massachusetts document was its creation of a multiple ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION that was inconsistent with its guarantee of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAMS, WILLI PAUL 1980 The First American Constitutions. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

PETERS, RONALD M., JR. 1978 The Massachusetts Constitution of 1780: A Social Compact. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.

MASSACHUSETTS GENERAL LAWS AND LIBERTIES

In 1646, the General Court of Massachusetts Bay appointed a committee to "correct and compose in good order all the liberties, lawes, and orders extant with us." The committee's work, publication of which was delayed until 1648, was far more comprehensive than the earlier MASSACHUSETTS BODY OF LIBERTIES. The framing of the General Laws and Liberties capped a movement for codification that had grown because the Body of Liberties had failed to curb the magistrates' discretion. Frequent legislation compounded popular confusion over the state of the law, but even so, the General Laws did not include all the laws in force.

The new code incorporated eighty-six of the one hundred items in the Body of Liberties and covered subjects from business regulations to property laws. It generally followed English practice. Plaintiffs could easily attach land, the law guaranteed a SPEEDY TRIAL, and juries could return "special" verdicts—practices foreign to English proceedings. Also unlike English practice, forms of action were relatively unimportant; substance took precedence in Massachusetts. Like contemporary English statutory abridgments and practice manuals, the General Laws were listed alphabetically to encourage reference and use. They were revised in 1660 and 1672 and served as the prototype for other colonies' legal codes.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

MASSACHUSETTS RESOLUTIONS

See: Embargo Acts

MASSES PUBLISHING COMPANY v. PATTEN
244 Fed. 535 (1917)

Judge LEARNED HAND's Masses opinion was one of the first federal opinions dealing with free speech. It remains influential even though Hand was reversed by the court of appeals and many years later himself abandoned his initial position. A postmaster had refused to accept the revolutionary monthly The Masses for mailing, citing the ESPIONAGE ACT. Hand, sitting in a federal district court, interpreted the act not to apply to the magazine. He noted that any broad criticism of a government or its policies might hinder the war effort. Nevertheless, to suppress such criticism "would contradict the normal assumption of democratic government." Hand advanced a criminal incitement test. He conceded that words can be "the triggers of action" and, if they counseled violation of law, were not constitutionally protected. If, however, the words did not criminally incite and if the words stopped short "of urging upon others that it is their duty or their interest to resist the law . . . one should not be held to have attempted to cause its violation."

Hand's concentration on the advocacy content of the speech itself is thought by some to be more speech-protective than the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER rule's emphasis on the surrounding circumstances.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

MASSIAH v. UNITED STATES
377 U.S. 201 (1964)

After a defendant had been indicted and released on BAIL, a bugged co-defendant who had turned police informer, engaged him in an incriminating conversation. The Supreme Court held that the Sixth Amendment prohibits deliberate elicitation of information from an indicted person in the absence of his counsel and ruled that defendant's incriminating statements were inadmissible at trial.

BARBARA ALLEN BABCOCK
(1986)

MASSON v. NEW YORKER MAGAZINE, INC.
501 U.S. 496 (1991)

A case more interesting for its facts than important for its holding, Masson v. New Yorker Magazine, Inc. required the Supreme Court to consider the circumstances in which the press is subject to LIBEL claims for deliberately fabricating quotations.

The case arose from an article written by Janet Malcolm for The New Yorker concerning Jeffrey Masson's tenure as Projects Director of the Sigmund Freud Archives—a tenure abruptly terminated when Masson accused Freud of fraud and declared the "sterility of psychoanalysis throughout the world." Malcolm's article included lengthy quotations attributed to Masson that made him appear less than attractive. As one review of the article quoted by the Court said: "Masson, the promising psychoanalytic scholar, emerges gradually as a grandiose egoist—mean-spirited, self-serving, full of braggadocio, impossibly arrogant and, in the end, a self-destructive fool. But it is not Janet Malcolm who calls him such: His own words reveal this psychological profile." Masson claimed, however, that he had not in fact said many of the words that Malcolm put in his mouth. He brought a libel suit, which focused on six statements that Malcolm had attributed to him in the article but that nowhere appeared in the more than forty hours of tape recordings she had made of their conversations.

As the case was presented to the Court, Malcolm conceded for purposes of her summary judgment motion that she had deliberately fabricated the quotations. Masson for his part conceded that he was a PUBLIC FIGURE under the Court's libel jurisprudence and therefore would have to show at trial that Malcolm published a defamatory statement with "actual malice"—that is, knowledge of the statement's falsity or reckless disregard as to its truth. The question on the summary judgment motion was whether a reasonable jury could find, on the basis of the fabricated quotations, that Masson met this constitutional requirement.

The Court held that the appropriate standard in a case of this kind was whether the deliberate alteration of the speaker's words effected a "material change" in their meaning. If the fabrication did so, and if the changed meaning then caused harm to reputation, even a public figure could recover in a libel action; if, however, the fabrication carried with it no such change in meaning, then dismissal of the suit was appropriate. The Court saw this standard as but one variant of the usual COMMON LAW principle, now treated as an integral part of the actual malice standard, that "substantial" even if not complete or literal truth will defeat a libel action. Applying its standard, the Court held that five of the six fabricated quotes at issue materially changed the meaning of what Masson had said and therefore could go to a jury.

Although the Masson case received considerable press attention, perhaps because of the striking contrast between the professional reputation of the journalistic defendants and the seriousness of the charges leveled against them, the Court's decision probably will matter little either to the press or to defamed individuals. The press should have little difficulty living with a rule that subjects them to liability for fabricated quotes only when these materially depart from, rather than essentially paraphrase, the substance of what their subjects say; even within the journalistic profession, almost no one believes that this rule imposes a substantial or an unreasonable burden. And the victims of deliberate falsification should have little difficulty recovering under this rule if and to the extent that they have suffered real injury; the Court's standard cuts off suit only when the alteration of the subject's words cannot be thought to have harmed reputation. However sensational, the problem of fabricated quotes lies at the margin of journalistic behavior (indeed, this is precisely what makes the problem sensational), and the Masson decision occupies a similar place in the Court's by now expansive libel doctrine.

ELENA KAGAN
(2000)

Bibliography

BOLLINGER, LEE 1991 The End of New York Times v. Sullivan: Reflections on Masson v. New Yorker Magazine. Supreme Court Review 1991:1–46.

MASTER, SPECIAL

See: Special Master

MATHEWS v. ELDRIDGE
424 U.S. 319 (1976)

GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970) established a PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS right to an evidentiary hearing prior to the termination of state WELFARE BENEFITS. Eldridge, whose Social Security disability benefits had been terminated without a prior hearing, could be pardoned for thinking that Goldberg controlled his case. In the event, a 6–2 Supreme Court explained how that view was mistaken, and established its basic test for determining whether a particular procedure satisfied the demands of DUE PROCESS.

The government conceded that the disability benefit was the sort of statutory "ENTITLEMENT" that constituted a "PROPERTY" interest protected by the due process guarantee. The government nonetheless argued that a prior hearing was not required; rather, due process was satisfied by a posttermination hearing at which the beneficiary might review the evidence, submit evidence of his own, and make arguments for reconsideration. Under the existing procedures, a beneficiary who prevailed in such a posttermination hearing was entitled to full retroactive relief. A majority of the Court agreed with the government's argument.

In a passage often quoted in later opinions, the Court set out the factors relevant to determining "the specific dictates of due process," once a "liberty" or "property" interest is impaired: "First, the private interest that will be affected by the official action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and finally, the Government's interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail." Here, eligibility for disability benefits was not based on need, the standard for welfare eligibility in Goldberg. The Court assumed that a delayed payment would harm the typical disability beneficiary less than the typical welfare recipient. The medical question of disability, in contrast with the "need" question in a welfare case, was more focused and less susceptible to erroneous decision. The costs of pretermination hearings would be great. In short, the Court balanced its factors on the government's side.

The Eldridge due process calculus implies a strong presumption of constitutionality of whatever procedures a legislative body or government agency may choose to provide persons deprived of liberty or property. This presumption grows naturally out of the Court's limited choice of factors to be balanced, emphasizing material costs and benefits and ignoring the role of procedural fairness in maintaining each individual's sense of being a respected, participating citizen.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MATTHEWS, STANLEY
(1824–1889)

Stanley Matthews's political connections and his legal work for railroads led to his Supreme Court nomination in 1881; these same activities also nearly prevented him from taking a place on the bench. Like his predecessor, NOAH SWAYNE, Matthews had been an Ohio antislavery Democrat and a Democratic appointee as a United States attorney. By 1860, however, he had switched to the Republican party. After CIVIL WAR military service, he became an important leader of the Cincinnati bar. Before the Ohio Supreme Court, Matthews represented the Cincinnati Board of Education and supported its authority to abolish religious instruction in the public schools. His eloquent argument defended SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE as the best way to insure RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Matthews served as one of RUTHERFORD B. HAYES's lawyers during the contested electoral battle in 1877. Near the end of his administration, Hayes nominated Matthews to succeed Swayne, but because of internal Republican patronage feuds, as well as questions about Matthews's railroad connections, the SENATE took no action. President JAMES A. GARFIELD, under pressure from Hayes's allies and prominent business interests, resubmitted the nomination. After a long, bitter fight, the Senate confirmed Matthews by a one-vote majority.

Matthews clearly served railroad interests when he joined the Court's decision in WABASH, ST. LOUIS & PACIFIC RAILROAD CO. V. ILLINOIS (1886), substantially weakening the state regulatory doctrine of Munn v. Illinois (1877). Similarly, he concurred in the nearly unanimous decision in the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883), which capped a legal and political counterassault against racial equality.

The Wabash case, while limiting state regulation, decisively stimulated federal ECONOMIC REGULATION under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. Matthews relied on an expansive conception of national power in BOWMAN V. CHICAGO AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY CO. (1888), ruling invalid a state's prohibition of liquor shipments from other states. However desirable the state's regulation, Matthews said, it infringed on Congress's EXCLUSIVE POWER. In Poindexter v. Greenhow (1885) Matthews relied on the CONTRACT CLAUSE when he held that states could not lawfully repudiate their debts.

Matthews's most important cases involved the interpretation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. In HURTADO V. CALIFORNIA (1884) he held for the Court that even in a capital case an accusation by INFORMATION rather than INDICTMENT by a GRAND JURY did not deny DUE PROCESS OF LAW contrary to the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The Hurtado ruling stood for nearly a half century as a barrier to any tendency toward nationalizing CIVIL RIGHTS and CIVIL LIBERTIES. Yet in YICK WO V. HOPKINS (1886) Matthews spoke for the Court on one of those rare occasions when it advanced civil rights. Holding unconstitutional the discriminatory application of a San Francisco ordinance requiring licensing of wooden laundries, used to destroy Chinese businesses, Matthews described the Fourteenth Amendment in libertarian terms that usually were reserved for corporate cases. Indeed, he cast the plight of the Chinese in language that any good entrepreneur could understand: "For, the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery itself."

Matthews spoke for the Court in one of the Mormon anti-polygamy cases, sustaining congressional action and invoking the prevailing norms of the family and marriage. He also voted to strike down the Ku Klux Klan laws in UNITED STATES V. HARRIS (1883); he agreed with the majority that AMERICAN INDIANS were not citizens in Elk v. Wilkins (1884); and he concurred that state MISCEGENATION laws were constitutional in PACE V. ALABAMA (1883).

Matthews epitomized the nation's retreat from the reforming zeal of RECONSTRUCTION. The controversy surrounding Matthews's appointment eventually subsided, and he carried out his duties until his death in early 1889.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

FILLER, LOUIS 1969 Stanley Matthews. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the Supreme Court, Vol. 2:1351–1378. New York: Chelsea House.

MAGRATH, C. PETER 1963 Morrison R. Waite: The Triumph of Character. New York: Macmillan.

MAXIMUM HOURS AND MINIMUM WAGES LEGISLATION

Regulation of the employment relationship was an important aspect of the movement toward state intervention in economic affairs, which began in the late 1800s. The transition from small individual to large corporate employers and the development of a factory system with a numerous wage-earning class resulted in pervasive exploitation of employees. The principal method of alleviating the economic injustice was statutory regulation of employment conditions. The spectrum of protective legislation was wide, including factory safety, child labor, workers' compensation, and the hours and wages of employment. In these early days the laws were state laws.

The protracted constitutional contest over hours and wage legislation was one aspect of the larger theme of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, a concept developed by the Supreme Court at the turn of the century. Liberty included FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, which included the employment contract, of which hours and wages were the main components. The Court held that laws regulating hours and wages violated the guarantee of DUE PROCESS OF LAW if the purpose of the law was invalid or if the means were not reasonably related to a valid purpose.

Hours legislation began in the 1870s. Reformers perceived the duration of the workday as related to the employees' health and safety, protection of which was a valid legislative purpose. In its first opinion on the subject, HOLDEN V. HARDY (1898), the Court sustained a law limiting the hours of men working in mines to eight a day. The hazardous nature of the work justified the limitation as a valid health and safety measure. In MULLER V. OREGON (1908) an hours limitation for women was sustained on the theory that the "weaker sex" required special protection.

Beyond these two exceptional situations the Court at first prohibited hours regulation. The prototype case was LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). A 5–4 Court invalidated a law restricting the work of bakery employees to ten hours a day and sixty hours a week. Despite massive documentation, the Court refused to recognize that the baking industry posed any special health danger to which hours of work were reasonably related. More broadly, the Court concluded that the law was not truly a health law, but a "purely labor law" to regulate hours, an impermissible objective.

This strict view yielded to persistent pressures. In BUNTING V. OREGON (1917) hours regulation of adult males in factories was sustained as a valid health measure, a result clearly inconsistent with Lochner, which was not even mentioned in the opinion. Thereafter the validity of hours regulation was not seriously questioned.

Massachusetts passed the first minimum wage statute in 1912 and within ten years there were fifteen such state laws. Proponents urged that health was impaired by wages below a subsistence level. The Court was at first unpersuaded, and, in ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923), it invalidated a District of Columbia minimum wage law for women. Wages were the "heart of the contract" and, unlike hours, had no relation to health. Contrary to hours regulation, women were entitled to no special wage protection. The minimum wage was invalid also because it bore no relation to the value of the service rendered. But a law curing this deficiency was invalidated in MOREHEAD V. NEW YORK EX REL. TIPALDO (1936).

One principal justification for protective legislation was that the inequality of economic power between employers and employees made true freedom of contract illusory. This argument was expressly rejected by the Court, which candidly declared in COPPAGE V. KANSAS (1915) that it was "impossible to uphold freedom of contract and the right of private property without at the same time recognizing as legitimate those inequalities of fortune that are the necessary result of the exercise of those rights." Social Darwinism was thus enshrined in the Constitution.

In 1937, that year of constitutional revolution, minimum wage legislation became constitutional by a 5–4 vote. WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH upheld a minimum wage for women. Adkins was overruled. The Court purported surprise at the employer's reliance on liberty of contract. Not only was the health/subsistence rationale accepted but, more broadly, it was now accepted as a valid legislative purpose to prevent "exploitation of a class of workers who are in unequal position with respect to bargaining power."

Federal regulation of hours and wages was first exercised in limited contexts. An eight-hour day for railroad workers was upheld under the COMMERCE CLAUSE in WILSON V. NEW (1917). Congress has long regulated both wages and hours of work performed by employees of contractors with the federal government. Examples are the Davis-Bacon Act, which regulates wages for work on public buildings and other public works, and the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, which regulates both wages and hours for work on supply contracts. The constitutionality of both statutes is unquestioned under the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER.

Finally, in the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT of 1938, Congress legislated for private employment generally, superseding most state laws. The act required the payment of a minimum wage and overtime for all hours over forty a week to all employees engaged in commerce or the production of goods for commerce. The main purpose was not health but to bolster the economy. The FLSA was sustained under the commerce power in UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941). A substantive due process argument was rejected without analysis. It was "no longer open to question" that neither Fifth nor FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT due process limited the fixing of minimum wages or maximum hours, and it made no difference that the regulations applied to both men and women.

That has been the view of the matter ever since. In other contexts the Court repudiated the Lochner substantive due process approach to protective legislation. What was once a burning issue now appears to be a closed chapter in constitutional law. The scope of the STATE POLICE POWER was underscored in striking fashion by the upholding in Day-Brite Lighting, Inc. v. Missouri (1952) of a law that required employers to give employees four hours off from work in order to vote—with full pay.

WILLIAM P. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

DE VYVER, FRANK T. 1939 Regulation of Wages and Hours Prior to 1938. Law and Contemporary Problems 6:323–332.

DODD, E. MERRICK 1943 From Maximum Wages to Minimum Wages: Six Centuries of Regulation of Employment Contracts. Columbia Law Review 43:643–687.

MAXWELL v. DOW
176 U.S. 581 (1900)

This case was decided at a time when the Court was subjecting the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to an accordionlike motion, expanding SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS to protect the rights of property and contracting PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS for persons accused of crime. After HURTADO V. CALIFORNIA (1884), when the Court held that the concept of due process did not guarantee INDICTMENT by GRAND JURY, persons accused of crime resorted to the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE, claiming that the Fourteenth Amendment, through either its due process clause or its PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause, incorporated provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS, thus extending to the states the same trial standards. Utah accused Maxwell by an INFORMATION, rather than an indictment, and tried him by a jury of eight rather than twelve. The Fifth and SIXTH AMENDMENTS would have made such procedures unconstitutional in federal courts. Maxwell argued that the Fourteenth Amendment guaranteed the federal standards in state proceedings. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, dissenting, adopted Maxwell's arguments. Justice RUFUS PECKHAM, for the remainder of the Court, held that neither the due process nor the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment embodied Fifth or Sixth Amendment rights. Peckham also ruled that TRIAL BY JURY "has never been affirmed to be a necessary requisite of due process of law" and that an eight-member jury was constitutional. In 1968 DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA, overruling Maxwell, held trial by jury to be a fundamental right of due process of law for persons accused of crime, but under today's constitutional law, the JURY SIZE need not be twelve members in a state proceeding.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MAYFLOWER COMPACT

See: Social Compact Theory

MAYOR OF NEW YORK v. MILN
11 Peters 102 (1837)

This was the first case decided by the TANEY COURT involving a COMMERCE CLAUSE issue, and the Supreme Court finessed that issue. Justice JOSEPH STORY, dissenting alone, said that he took consolation in knowing that the late Chief Justice (JOHN MARSHALL) concurred in his view that the city of New York had unconstitutionally regulated FOREIGN COMMERCE, a subject exclusively belonging to Congress. The city required incoming ship captains to supply vital statistics on every immigrant they brought to harbor. The city argued that passengers were not commerce, but if they were, the voyage having ceased, no foreign commerce was involved; the requirement of the information on passengers was an exercise of the POLICE POWER, a precautionary measure against paupers, vagabonds, convicts, and pestilence.

By a vote of 6–1, in an opinion by Justice PHILIP BARBOUR, the Court sustained the regulation as a valid exercise of the police power. Barbour disavowed giving any opinion on the question whether the states shared CONCURRENT POWERS over foreign commerce. Justice SMITH THOMPSON, concurring separately, agreed with Story that the facts showed a regulation of foreign commerce, but he believed that in the absence of congressional legislation, the states retained a CONCURRENT POWER. The early and simplistic victory for the police power in this case solved little, because the Court did not face the question of the scope of the police powers when they affected SUBJECTS OF COMMERCE.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MAYSVILLE ROAD BILL
(1830)

President ANDREW JACKSON's veto of the Maysville Road Bill challenged the INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS component of HENRY CLAY'S AMERICAN SYSTEM on constitutional and policy grounds and enhanced the role of the President in the legislative process.

In 1816, President JAMES MADISON vetoed the "Bonus Bill," which would have provided federal support for internal improvements such as the Cumberland Road, on the ground that the Constitution did not authorize expenditure of federal funds for anything except the powers explicitly enumerated in it. The Maysville Road Bill would have funded completion of a twenty-mile spur of the National Road entirely within the state of Kentucky. Jackson defended his veto on the ground that the Maysville Road was wholly intrastate and therefore outside the power of the federal government. Jackson also vetoed the bill in order to promote economy in the national government. He thus asserted a presidential prerogative in legislative policy, as well as a quasi-constitutional position, associated with the Democratic Party for the next thirty years, of hostility to expenditure of federal funds for internal improvements.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Veto Power.)

MCCARDLE, EX PARTE
7 Wallace (74 U.S.) 506 (1869)

In Ex Parte McCardle, Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE, for the Supreme Court, validated congressional withdrawal of the Court's jurisdiction over appeals in HABEAS CORPUS proceedings under an 1867 statute but reasserted the Court's appellate authority in all other habeas cases.

A federal circuit court remanded William McCardle, a Mississippi editor hostile to Republican Reconstruction policies, to military custody. When he appealed to the Supreme Court, Democrats predicted that the Justices would use his case as a vehicle to hold unconstitutional the trial of civilians by military commissions in southern states undergoing RECONSTRUCTION. Democrats inferred from the earlier decision of EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866) that a majority of the Court believed that military commissions could not constitutionally try civilians accused of crimes where courts were functioning in peacetime. Alarmed congressional Republicans, seeing this essential machinery of Reconstruction threatened, enacted a narrow statute in 1868 that revoked Supreme Court appellate authority in habeas cases under the HABEAS CORPUS ACT OF 1867.

In the McCardle opinion, Chief Justice Chase acknowledged the validity of this repeal under the "exceptions clause" of Article III, section 2, but pointedly reminded the bar that the 1868 repealer "does not affect the JURISDICTION which was previously exercised." In Ex Parte Yerger (1869), the Court promptly affirmed this OBITER DICTUM, accepting a habeas appeal under section 14 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 and rebuking Congress for the 1868 repealer. McCardle is therefore historically significant as evidence not of judicial submission to political threats during Reconstruction but rather of the Court's uninterrupted determination to preserve its role in questions of CIVIL LIBERTIES.

McCardle remains important in the modern debate on congressional power to curtail the Supreme Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION over cases raising controversial issues such as SCHOOL BUSING, school prayer, and abortion. Some constitutional scholars have argued that Congress cannot erode the substance of the JUDICIAL POWER of the United States vested in the Supreme Court by Article III, section 1, through jurisdictional nibbling at the Court's appellate authority, but the extent to which Congress can affect substantive rights by jurisdictional excisions remains controverted.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Judicial System, Federal.)

MCCARRAN ACT

See: Internal Security Act

MCCARRAN-WALTER ACT

See: Immigration and Alienage

MCCARTHY, JOSEPH R.

See: McCarthyism

MCCARTHYISM

On February 9, 1950, Senator Joseph R. McCarthy of Wisconsin claimed that 205 communists were presently "working and shaping the policy of the State Department." Although McCarthy produced no documentation for this preposterous charge, he quickly emerged as the nation's dominant Cold War politician—the yardstick by which citizens measured patriotic or scurrilous behavior. McCarthy's popularity was not difficult to explain. Americans were frightened by Soviet aggression in Europe. The years since WORLD WAR II had brought a series of shocks—the Hiss trial, the fall of China, the KOREAN WAR—which fueled the Red Scare and kept it alive.

President HARRY S. TRUMAN played a role as well. In trying to defuse the "Communist issue," he established a federal LOYALTY-SECURITY PROGRAM with few procedural safeguards. The program relied on nameless informants; it penalized personal beliefs and associations, not just OVERT ACTS; and it accelerated the Red hunt by conceding the possibility that a serious security problem existed inside the government and elsewhere. Before long, state and local officials were competing to see who could crack down hardest on domestic subversion. Indiana forced professional wrestlers to sign a LOYALTY OATH. Tennessee ordered the death penalty for those seeking to overthrow the state government. Congress, not to be outdone, passed the INTERNAL SECURITY ACT of 1950 over Truman's veto, requiring registration of "Communist action groups," whose members could then be placed in internment camps during "national emergencies."

Despite his personal commitment to CIVIL LIBERTIES, President Truman appointed four Supreme Court Justices who opposed the libertarian philosophy of WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS and HUGO L. BLACK. As a result, JUDICIAL REVIEW was all but abandoned in cases involving the rights of alleged subversives. The Court upheld loyalty oaths as a condition of public employment, limited the use of the Fifth Amendment by witnesses before congressional committees, and affirmed the dismissal of a government worker on the unsworn testimony of unnamed informants. As ROBERT G. MCCLOSKEY noted, the Court "became so tolerant of governmental restriction on freedom of expression as to suggest it [had] abdicated the field."

By the mid-1950s, the Red Scare had begun to subside. The death of Joseph Stalin, the Korean armistice, and the Senate's censure of Senator McCarthy all contributed to the easing of Cold War fears. There were many signs of this, though none was more dramatic than the Supreme Court's return to libertarian values under Chief Justice EARL WARREN. In Slochower v. Board of Higher Education (1956) the Court overturned the discharge of a college teacher who had invoked the Fifth Amendment before a congressional committee. In Sweezy v. New Hampshire (1956) it reversed the conviction of a Marxist professor who had refused, on FIRST AMENDMENT grounds, to answer questions about his political associations. In WATKINS V. UNITED STATES (1957) it held that Congress had "no general authority to expose the private affairs of individuals without justification. . . ." "No inquiry is an end in itself," wrote Warren. "It must be related to and in furtherance of a legitimate [legislative] task of Congress."

The reaction in Congress was predictable. A South Carolina representative called the WARREN COURT "a greater threat to this union than the entire confines of Soviet Russia." Bills were introduced to limit the Court's JURISDICTION in national security cases, and legislators both state and federal demanded Warren's IMPEACHMENT. Although this uproar probably caused some judicial retreat in the late 1950s, the Supreme Court played an important role in blunting the worst excesses of the McCarthy era.

DAVID M. OSHINSKY
(1986)

Bibliography

OSHINSKY, DAVID M. 1983 A Conspiracy So Immense: The World of Joe McCarthy. New York: Free Press.

MCCLESKEY v. KEMP
481 U.S. 279 (1987)

McCleskey, a black Georgian, on being sentenced to death for the murder of a white person, sought a writ of HABEAS CORPUS on the claim that Georgia's capital-sentencing procedures violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and the CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT clause of the Eighth Amendment. He based his claim on "the Baldus study," a statistical examination of Georgia's more than 2,000 murder cases during the 1970s. The study showed a significant correlation between race and prosecutors' decisions to seek the death penalty and jurors' recommendations of the death penalty. For example, death was the sentence in twenty-two percent of the cases involving black defendants and white victims, in eight percent of the cases involving white defendants and white victims, and in three percent of the cases involving white defendants and black victims. The Supreme Court, held 5–4, that McCleskey did not show that Georgia had acted unconstitutionally in sentencing him to CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

The infirmity of McCleskey's argument, according to Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, for the Court, consisted in his failure to prove that he personally had been the target of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION or that the race of his victim had anything to do with his sentence. Anyone invoking the equal-protection clause in a capital-sentencing case has the burden of showing that deliberate discrimination had a discriminatory effect "in his case." McCleskey's reliance on the Baldus study proved nothing with respect to him; moreover, every jury is unique, so that statistics concerning many juries do not establish anything regarding a particular one.

McCleskey also argued that the state violated the equal protection clause by enacting the death penalty statute and retaining it despite its supposedly discriminatory application. Powell dismissed this argument because it had no support from proof that the legislature passed and kept a capital punishment act because of its racially discriminatory effect. The Court had previously held in Gregg v. Georgia (1976) that Georgia's capital-sentencing system could operate fairly.

The Court found McCleskey's Eighth Amendment argument no more persuasive. In Gregg it had ruled that the jury's discretion was controlled by clear and objective standards. The statute even required the trial court to review every sentence to determine whether it was imposed under the influence of prejudice, whether the evidence supported it, and whether the sentence was disproportionate to sentences in similar cases. Moreover, the judge had to consider the question whether race had any role in the trials. Absent proof that the Georgia system operated arbitrarily, McCleskey could not prove a violation of the Eighth Amendment by showing that other defendants had not received the death penalty.

McCleskey also argued that Georgia's system was arbitrarily applied "because racial considerations may influence capital sentencing decisions." Statistics, Powell replied, show only a "likelihood," which was insufficient to establish an "unacceptable risk" of racial prejudice.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for the dissenters, argued the Eighth Amendment issue. He believed that a death sentence should be voided if there was a risk that it might have been imposed arbitrarily. Brennan believed that McCleskey should not have to prove discrimination in his own case; it was enough that the risk of prejudice, which Brennan believed was established by the statistical study, "might have infected the sentencing decision." McCleskey's claim warranted the Court's support because his was the first case challenging the system, not on how it might operate but "on empirical documentation of how it does operate." Black Georgians who killed whites were sentenced to death at nearly twenty-two times the rate of blacks who killed blacks and at more than seven times the rate of whites who kill blacks. This proved the point about disproportionate sentencing for the dissenters.

Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, who also spoke for them, used similar evidence to maintain that Georgia's capital-sentencing procedures conflicted with the equal-protection clause. Racial factors impermissibly affected the system from indictment to sentencing: "The Baldus study demonstrates that black persons are a distinct group that are singled out for a different treatment in the Georgia capital sentencing system." The BURDEN OF PROOF, Blackmun contended, should be on the state to demonstrate that racially neutral procedures yielded the racially skewed results shown by the study.

The Court's opinion is not easy to explain, unless one accepts the belief of dissenters that the Court did not wish to open a can of worms. McCleskey's claims taken to their logical conclusion undermined principles that buttressed the entire CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM. His equal-protection and "cruel and unusual punishment" arguments, if accepted, could have applied to punishments in noncapital cases and to procedures before SENTENCING and might have resulted in abolition of the death penalty as well.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Capital Punishment and Race; Capital Punishment Cases of 1972; Capital Punishment Cases of 1976; Race and Criminal Justice.)

MCCLOSKEY, ROBERT G.
(1916–1969)

Robert G. McCloskey earned his Ph.D. at Harvard University, and he taught American government at Harvard from 1948 to 1969. He was by training a political scientist and by scholarly instinct a historian concerned with contemporary events; the modern Supreme Court created a challenge that filled the major portion of his intellectual life. The philosophy of judicial self-restraint in the light of the Court's limited competence and resources appealed to McCloskey at least in part because it struck a chord in his own character. He distrusted the flamboyant, preferring cautious interpretation. By nature judicious, he was suspicious of a Court that too precipitously proclaimed eternal verities. He wrote American Conservatism in the Age of Enterprise (1951), The American Supreme Court (1961), and The Modern Supreme Court (published posthumously in 1972), and he edited the papers of Justice JAMES WILSON.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

MCCOLLUM v. BOARD OF EDUCATION
333 U.S. 203 (1948)

During the late 1940s and 1950s "RELEASED TIME programs" were popular around the country. Public school boards and administrators cooperated with churches and synagogues to provide religious education for students according to their parents' choices. Under the arrangement in Champaign-Urbana, Illinois, students whose parents had so requested were excused from their classes to attend classes given by religious educators in the school buildings. Nonparticipating pupils were not excused from their regular classes.

McCollum, whose child Terry attended the public schools, challenged the Illinois practice on the grounds that it violated the establishment clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT. The case was the first church-state controversy to reach the Court since EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION the year before, and Justice HUGO L. BLACK again delivered the opinion of the Court.

Referring to the theory of strict separation announced as OBITER DICTUM in his Everson opinion, Black held that the Illinois arrangement fell squarely within the First Amendment's ban. He stressed particularly the utilization of tax-supported facilities to aid religious teaching.

Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER concurred in an opinion in which Justices ROBERT JACKSON, WILEY B. RUTLEDGE, and HAROLD H. BURTON joined. These four had dissented from Everson's approval of state aid to the transportation of children to religious schools.

Justice Jackson also concurred separately, rejecting the sweeping separationism of the Black opinion. Pointing out that there was little real cost to the taxpayers in the Illinois program, he agreed that the Court should end "formal and explicit instruction" such as that in the Champaign schools, but cautioned against inviting ceaseless petitions to the Court to purge school curricula of materials that any group might regard as religious.

Justice STANLEY F. REED, the lone dissenter, had concurred in the result in Everson. Here he argued that the majority was giving "establishment" too broad a meaning; unconstitutional "aid" to religion embraced only purposeful assistance directly to a church, not cooperative relationships between government and religious institutions.

McCollum seemed to represent a deepening Supreme Court commitment to the theory of strict SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, but it was significantly limited by another released-time case, ZORACH V. CLAUSEN (1952).

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

MCCRAY v. UNITED STATES
195 U.S. 27 (1904)

Together with CHAMPION V. AMES (1903), the decision in McCray played a seminal role in the expansion of a NATIONAL POLICE POWER. Responding to lobby pressure, Congress in 1902 passed a clearly discriminatory EXCISE TAX on oleomargarine colored yellow to resemble butter. Relying on its power to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE, Congress sought to force yellow oleo off the market by taxing it at a rate forty times greater than naturally colored oleo. The act was attacked as an encroachment on STATE POLICE POWERS, a TAKING OF PROPERTY without DUE PROCESS, and a violation of the fundamental principles inherent in the Constitution.

Justice EDWARD D. WHITE, for a 6–3 Court, refused to inquire into Congress's intent and sustained the tax. He argued that the Court could not examine the wisdom of a particular act and, reiterating an OBITER DICTUM from Champion, said the remedy for "unwise or unjust" acts ". . . lies not in the abuse by the judicial authority of its functions, but in the people, upon whom . . . reliance must be placed for the correction of abuses." The Court pointedly dismissed WILLIAM GUTHRIE's argument that the validity of a tax ought to be determined by its natural and reasonable effect, regardless of pretext, though it would adopt his reasoning in BAILEY V. DREXEL (1922). The act's purpose—to suppress the sale of yellow oleo rather than to raise revenue—was immaterial. White concluded a judicial abdication of power in this case (although the Court would reassert it in Bailey) by stating that the Court could not help but sustain a congressional act even if that body "abused its lawful authority by levying a tax which was unwise or oppressive, or the result of the enforcement of which might be to indirectly affect subjects not within the powers delegated to Congress."

Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER and Justices HENRY B. BROWN and RUFUS PECKHAM dissented without opinion.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

MCCREE, WADE HAMPTON, JR.
(1920–1987)

Wade McCree was a member of the generation of black lawyers Governor G. Mennen Williams of Michigan once described as "revolutionaries," individuals who by talent and determination succeeded in opening doors that previously had been closed to members of their race. A graduate of Fisk University and Harvard Law School, McCree spent several years in private practice, but then entered upon a career of public service that continued through four decades and earned for him a reputation as one of the most distinguished lawyers of his time.

After serving as a member of the Michigan Workmen's Compensation Commission and as an elected Wayne County circuit judge, he was appointed by President JOHN F. KENNEDY to the UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT for the Eastern District of Michigan. Five years later, in 1966, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON elevated him to the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS for the Sixth Circuit, on which he served until 1977, when President JIMMY CARTER appointed him SOLICITOR GENERAL. In 1981, he joined the faculty of the University of Michigan Law School, where he served as the Lewis M. Simes Professor until his death. McCree was the first black or among the first blacks to hold each of these positions.

Widely admired for his judicious manner and temperament, his careful craftsmanship, and the breadth and depth of his knowledge, McCree quickly gained a reputation as a judge's judge. As a judge, and more particularly as a judge on an "inferior court," he was constrained within limits set by others, but within the limits of his office he sought to advance what he regarded as the deepest purposes of law, the fair treatment of individuals and the protection of their liberty and security. McCree's career, both on the bench and off, demonstrates the contribution to those goals that can be made in a life spent in the law.

TERRANCE SANDALOW
(1992)

Bibliography

TRIBUTES 1987 Wade Hampton McCree, Jr. Michigan Law Review 86:217–265.

MCCULLOCH v. MARYLAND
4 Wheat. 316 (1819)

Speaking for a unanimous Supreme Court, Chief JUSTICE JOHN MARSHALL delivered an opinion upon which posterity has heaped lavish encomiums. JAMES BRADLEY THAYER thought "there is nothing so fine as the opinion in McCulloch v. Maryland." ALBERT BEVERIDGE placed it "among the very first of the greatest judicial utterances of all time," while William Draper Lewis described it as "perhaps the most celebrated judicial utterance in the annals of the English speaking world." Such estimates spring from the fact that Marshall's vision of nationalism in time became a reality, to some extent because of his vision. Beveridge was not quite wrong in saying that the McCulloch opinion "so decisively influenced the growth of the Nation that, by many, it is considered as only second in importance to the Constitution itself." On the other hand, Marshall the judicial statesman engaged in a judicial coup, as his panegyrical biographer understood. To appreciate Marshall's achievement in McCulloch and the intense opposition that his opinion engendered in its time, one must also bear in mind that however orthodox his assumptions and doctrines are in the twentieth century, they were in their time unorthodox. With good reason Beveridge spoke of Marshall's "sublime audacity," the "extreme radicalism" of his constitutional theories, and the fact that he "rewrote the fundamental law of the Nation," a proposition to which Beveridge added that it would be more accurate to state that he made of the written instrument "a living thing, capable of growth, capable of keeping pace with the advancement of the American people and ministering to their changing necessities."

The hysterical denunciations of the McCulloch opinion by the aged and crabbed THOMAS JEFFERSON, by the frenetically embittered SPENCER ROANE, and by that caustic apostle of localism, JOHN TAYLOR, may justly be discounted, but not the judgment of the cool and prudent "Father of the Constitution," JAMES MADISON. On receiving Roane's "Hampden" essays assaulting McCulloch, Madison ignored the threat of state nullification and the repudiation of JUDICIAL REVIEW, but he agreed with Roane that the Court's opinion tended, in Madison's words, "to convert a limited into an unlimited Government." Madison deplored Marshall's "latitude in expounding the Constitution which seems to break down the landmarks intended by a specification of the Powers of Congress, and to substitute for a definite connection between means and ends, a Legislative discretion as to the former to which no practical limit can be assigned." Few if any of the friends of the Constitution, declared Madison, anticipated "a rule of construction . . . as broad as pliant as what has occurred," and he added that the Constitution would probably not have been ratified if the powers that Marshall claimed for the national government had been known in 1788–1789. Madison's opinion suggests how far Marshall and the Court had departed from the intentions of the Framers and makes understandable the onslaught that McCulloch provoked. Although much of that onslaught was a genuine concern for the prostration of STATES' RIGHTS before a consolidating nationalism, Taylor hit the nail on the head for the older generation of Jeffersonians when he wrote that McCulloch reared "a monied interest."

The case, after all, was decided in the midst of a depression popularly thought to have been caused by the Bank of the United States, a private corporation chartered by Congress; and McCulloch was a decision in favor of the hated bank and against the power of a state to tax its branch operations. The constitutionality of the power of Congress to charter a bank had been ably debated in Congress and in Washington's cabinet in 1791, when ALEXANDER HAMILTON proposed the bank bill. Constitutional debate mirrored party politics, and the Federalists had the votes. The Court never passed judgment on the constitutionality of the original BANK OF THE UNITED STATES ACT, though it had a belated opportunity. In 1809 a case came before the Court that was remarkably similar to McCulloch: state officials, acting under a state statute taxing the branches of the bank, forcibly carried away from its vaults money to pay the state tax. In Bank of the United States v. Deveaux (1809), Marshall for the Court, deftly avoiding the questions that he confronted in McCulloch, found that the parties lacked the DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP that would authorize JURISDICTION. With the bank's twenty-year charter nearing expiration, a decision in favor of the bank's constitutionality might look like pro-Federalist politics by the Court, embroiling it in a dispute with President

Madison, who was on record as opposing the bank's constitutionality, and with Congress, which supported Madison's policies.

The United States fought the War of 1812 without the bank to help manage its finances, and the results were disastrous. The war generated a new wave of nationalism and a change of opinion in Madison's party. In 1816 President Madison signed into law a bill chartering a second Bank of the United States, passed by Congress with the support of young nationalists like HENRY CLAY and JOHN C. CALHOUN and opposed by a Federalist remnant led by young DANIEL WEBSTER. The political world was turned upside down. The bank's tight credit policies contributed to a depression, provoking many states to retaliate against "the monster monopoly." Two states prohibited the bank from operating within their jurisdictions; six others taxed the operations of the bank's branches within their jurisdictions. The constitutionality of Maryland's tax was the issue in McCulloch, as well as the constitutionality of the act of Congress incorporating the bank.

Six of the greatest lawyers of the nation, including Webster, WILLIAM PINKNEY, and LUTHER MARTIN, argued the case over a period of nine days, and only three days later Marshall delivered his thirty-six-page opinion for a unanimous Court. He had written much of it in advance, thus prejudging the case, but in a sense his career was a preparation for the case. As Roane conceded, Marshall was "a man of profound legal attainments" writing "upon a subject which has employed his thoughts, his tongue, and his pen, as a politican, and an historian for more than thirty years." And he had behind him all five Jeffersonian-Republican members of the Court.

Arguing that Congress had no authority to incorporate a bank, counsel for Maryland claimed that the Constitution had originated with the states, which alone were truly sovereign, and that the national government's powers must be exercised in subordination to the states. Marshall grandiloquently turned these propositions around. When Beveridge said that Marshall the solider wrote McCulloch and that his opinion echoed "the blast of the bugle of Valley Forge" (where Marshall served), he had a point. Figuratively, Old Glory and the bald eagle rise up from the opinion—to anyone stirred by a nationalist sentiment. The Constitution, declared Marshall, had been submitted to conventions of the people, from whom it derives its authority. The government formed by the Constitution proceeded "directly from the people" and in the words of the PREAMBLE was "ordained and established" in their name, and it binds the states. Marshall drove home that theme repeatedly. "The government of the Union . . . is, emphatically, and truly, a government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them, and for their benefit." A bit later Marshall declared that the government of the Union though limited in its powers "is supreme within its sphere of action. . . . It is the government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all." And it necessarily restricts its subordinate members, because the Constitution and federal laws constitute the supreme law of the land. Reading this later, ABRAHAM LINCOLN transmuted it into "a government of the people, by the people, for the people."

Marshall's opinion is a state paper, like the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, the Constitution itself, or the Gettysburg Address, the sort of document that puts itself beyond analysis or criticism. But there were constitutional issues to be resolved, and Marshall had not yet touched them. Madison agreed with Roane that "the occasion did not call for the general and abstract doctrine interwoven with the decision of the particular case," but McCulloch has survived and moved generations of Americans precisely because Marshall saw that the "general and abstract" were embedded in the issues, and he made it seem that the life of the nation was at stake on their resolution in the grandest way.

Disposing affirmatively of the question whether Congress could charter a bank was a foregone conclusion, flowing naturally from unquestioned premises. Though the power of establishing corporations is not among the ENUMERATED POWERS, seeing the Constitution "whole," as Marshall saw it, led him to the doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS. The Constitution ought not have the "prolixity of a legal code"; rather, it marked only "great outlines," with the result that implied powers could be "deduced." Levying and collecting taxes, borrowing money, regulating commerce, supporting armies, and conducting war are among the major enumerated powers; in addition, the Constitution vests in Congress the power to pass all laws "necessary and proper" to carry into execution the powers enumerated. These powers implied the means necessary to execute them. A banking corporation was a means of effectuating designated ends. The word "necessary" did not mean indispensably necessary; it did not refer to a means without which the power granted would be nugatory, its object unattainable. "Necessary" means "useful," "needful," "conducive to," thus allowing Congress a latitude of choice in attaining its legitimate ends. The Constitution's Framers knew the difference between "necessary" and "absolutely necessary," a phrase they used in Article I, section 10, clause 2. They inserted the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE in a Constitution "intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." They intended Congress to have "ample means" for carrying its express powers into effect. The "narrow construction" advocated by Maryland would abridge, even "annihilate," Congress's discretion in selecting its means. Thus, the test for determining the constitutionality of an act of Congress was: "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." That formula yielded the conclusion that the act incorporating the bank was valid.

Such was the BROAD CONSTRUCTION that "deduced" implied powers, shocking even Madison. The Court, he thought, had relinquished control over Congress. He might have added, as John Taylor did, that Marshall neglected to explain how and why a private bank chartered by Congress was necessary, even in a loose sense, to execute the enumerated powers. In Construction Construed (1820) Taylor gave five chapters to McCulloch, exhibiting the consequences of Marshall's reasoning. Congress might legislate on local agriculture and manufactures, because they were necessary to war. Roads were still more necessary than banks for collecting taxes. And:

> Taverns are very necessary or convenient for the offices of the army. . . . But horses are undoubtedly more necessary for the conveyance of the mail and for war, than roads, which may be as convenient to assailants as defenders; and therefore the principle of implied power of legislation will certainly invest Congress with a legislative power over horses. In short, this mode of construction completely establishes the position, that Congress may pass any internal law whatsoever in relation to things, because there is nothing with which war, commerce and taxation may not be closely or remotely connected.

All of which supported Taylor's contention that Marshall's doctrine of implied powers would destroy the states and lead to a government of unlimited powers, because "as ends may be made to beget means, so means may be made to beget ends, until the co-habitation shall rear a progeny of unconstitutional bastards, which were not begotten by the people."

Marshall's reasoning with respect to the second question in the case incited less hostility, though not by much. Assuming Congress could charter the bank, could a state tax its branch? Marshall treated the bank as a branch or "instrument" of the United States itself, and relying on the SUPREMACY CLAUSE (Article VI), he concluded that if the states could tax one instrument to any degree, they could tax every other instrument as well—the mails, the mint, even the judicial process. The result would cripple the government, "prostrating it at the foot of the States." Again, he was deducing from general principles in order to defeat the argument that nothing in the Constitution prohibits state taxes on congressionally chartered instruments. Congress's power to create, Marshall reasoned, implied a power to preserve. A state power to tax was a power to destroy, incompatible with the national power to create and preserve. Where such repugnancy exists, the national power, which is supreme, must control. "The question is, in truth, a question of supremacy," with the result that the Court necessarily found the state act unconstitutional.

That was Marshall's McCulloch opinion. Roane and Taylor publicly excoriated it, and Jefferson spurred them on, telling Roane, who rejected even federal judicial review, "I go further than you do." The Virginia legislature repudiated implied powers and recommended an amendment to the Constitution "creating a tribunal for the decision of all questions, in which the powers and authorities of the general government and those of the States, where they are in conflict, shall be decided." Marshall was so upset by the public criticism that he was driven for the first and only time to reply in a series of newspaper articles. Still, Ohio allied itself with Virginia and literally defied, even nullified, the decision in McCulloch. (See OSBORN V. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES; COHENS V. VIRGINIA.) Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, and Tennessee also conducted a guerrilla war against the Court, and Congress seriously debated measures to curb its powers. Fortunately the common enemies of the Court shared no common policies. McCulloch prevailed in the long run, providing, together with GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), the constitutional wherewithal to meet unpredictable crises even to our time. McCulloch had unforeseen life-giving powers. Marshall, Beveridge's "supreme conservative," laid the constitutional foundations for the New Deal and the Welfare State.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BEVERIDGE, ALBERT J. 1916–1919 The Life of John Marshall, 4 vols. Vol. IV: 283–339. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

HAINES, CHARLES GROVE 1944 The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government and Politics, 1789–1835 Pages 351–368. Berkeley: University of California Press.

WARREN, CHARLES 1923 The Supreme Court in United States History, 3 vols. Vol. I:499–540. Boston: Little, Brown.

MCELVAINE v. BRUSH

See: Kemmler, In Re

MCGOWAN, CARL
(1911–1987)

Carl McGowan served on the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS for the District of Columbia Circuit from 1963 until his death. Before his appointment, he had a private practice and served on the law faculty of Northwestern University. He was a judge whose intelligence and humanity made him suited to the craft. His opinions were lucid in style and expression, sound in analysis, and combined intellectual acuity, practical understanding, and good sense.

McGowan could not be pigeonholed as a "liberal" or a "conservative." He was the sort of judge a lawyer might wish for before knowing which side of the case he had to argue. McGowan won the respect and affection of his colleagues on the bench as well as of the bar of the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. He counseled not by preaching but by example. He was learned in the law, evenhanded in approach, honest, and wise. His ability to conciliate between opposing views allowed his court to resolve cases on common ground. McGowan's dissents barely match the number of terms he served on the court—some twenty-five dissents in a quarter century's service. From the mid-1960s to the mid-1980s, the overall dissent rate in the D.C. Circuit in cases with published opinions hovered around 13 percent; indicative of McGowan's moderating influence, in cases in which he was a panel member, that rate was five percent.

Judge McGowan's patient genius worked through many perplexing constitutional issues. In Rothstein v. Wyman (2d Cir. 1972), for example, his opinion delineated the critical line drawn by the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT between what federal courts can and cannot order states to do. In Nixon v. Administrator of General Services (D.D.C. 1976) he persuasively analyzed a panoply of constitutional objections pressed on behalf of a former president. In high tribute to Judge McGowan, the Supreme Court's majority essentially adopted his reasoning on the hard questions of SEPARATION OF POWERS, EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE, invasion of privacy, freedom of expression, and BILL OF ATTAINDER.

RUTH BADER GINSBURG
(1992)

Bibliography

POWELL, LEWIS F., JR., et al. 1988 In Memoriam Judge Carl McGowan. George Washington Law Review 56:681–702.

MCGOWAN v. MARYLAND

See: Sunday Closing Laws

MCGRAIN v. DAUGHERTY
273 U.S. 135 (1927)

In KILBOURN V. THOMPSON (1881) the Supreme Court had held that because Article I of the Constitution assigned Congress no power beyond the lawmaking power, Congress might constitutionally investigate "the private affairs of individuals" only for the purpose of gathering information to write new legislation. McGrain restated this requirement of legislative purpose, but rejected, 8–0, a challenge to the contempt conviction of the brother of Harry M. Daugherty who had failed to appear before a Senate committee investigating the failure of former Attorney General Daugherty to prosecute the malefactors in the Teapot Dome scandal.

In reality the investigation was not aimed at developing new legislation but at exposing malfeasance in the executive branch, a task that might have been deemed constitutionally appropriate for Congress if it were not for the simplistic Kilbourn theory. The gap between theory and reality was bridged by the creation of a presumption that congressional investigations had a legislative purpose, a presumption that was not to be overcome simply by showing that an investigation also had a purpose of public exposure.

The McGrain technique of requiring a legislative purpose for a congressional investigation, and then invoking a presumption of legislative purpose even when exposure was clearly a principal motive, had important consequences in post-World War II cases where anticommunist investigating committees were seeking to punish leftist speakers by public exposure precisely because the FIRST AMENDMENT prohibited Congress from passing legislation punishing such speech. The Court invoked the presumption of legislative purpose both to blind itself to the actual "exposure for exposure's sake" being conducted and to establish a congressional interest in lawmaking that outweighed whatever incidental infringement on speech the Court was willing to see.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Legislative Investigation.)

MCHENRY, JAMES
(1753–1816)

Irish-born physician James McHenry was a Maryland delegate to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 and a signer of the Constitution. Absent for most of June and July, he participated little in debate; but, when present, he took detailed notes which are a valuable record of the deliberations. He was later secretary of war (1796–1800).

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

MCILWAIN, CHARLES H.
(1871–1968)

Charles Howard McIlwain, a lawyer and political scientist, taught at Princeton and Harvard Universities. His major fields of interest were political theory and British constitutional history. His The American Revolution: A Constitutional Interpretation won the Pulitzer Prize in 1923. In that book he showed that the revolution was "the outcome of a collision between two mutually incompatible interpretations of the British constitution." His Constitutionalism: Ancient and Modern (1940, revised 1947) argued that the essence of CONSTITUTIONALISM was the balance between governmental power and the JURISDICTION of an independent judiciary and traced the roots of American constitutionalism through English history to classical Rome.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

MCKEIVER v. PENNSYLVANIA
403 U.S. 528 (1971)

Although IN RE GAULT (1967) extended some basic procedural rights to juvenile offenders, young people continued to be tried in most states before judges who exercised great discretion, supposedly to protect juveniles. McKeiver, a juvenile defendant, faced possible incarceration for five years and requested TRIAL BY JURY, which the state denied. By a 6–3 vote, the Supreme Court decided that DUE PROCESS OF LAW does not guarantee trial by jury to juvenile offenders. Justice HARRY BLACKMUN for a plurality of four wrote an opinion based on the unrealistic premise that the juvenile system is fundamentally sound and enlightened, but he did not explain how it assured fundamental fairness. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN found Blackmun's opinion romantic but concurred nevertheless because he still opposed DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968), which extended trial by jury to the states. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN concurred because he thought, mistakenly, that publicity served as a check on juvenile court judges. Justices WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, HUGO L. BLACK, and THURGOOD MARSHALL dissented. McKeiver short-circuited expectations that the Court would require essentially all the rights of the criminally accused for juveniles who commit adult crimes and face the prospect of serious punishment.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MCKENNA, JOSEPH
(1843–1926)

Few Justices sat longer upon the Supreme Court than Joseph McKenna, the son of an Irish immigrant baker, who served for twenty-seven years from 1898 until 1925 under three Chief Justices. During McKenna's tenure, the nation's political system grappled with the problems generated by industrialization, urbanization, and rising class conflict. The same problems followed many of the issues that came before the Court, whose decisions lacked consistency and predictability.

When President WILLIAM MCKINLEY named McKenna, his old House of Representatives colleague, to the seat vacated by Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD, he recognized not distinction at the bar or on the bench but loyal service. McKenna had been a four-term representative from California, a member of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, and attorney general of the United States. In these roles McKenna had earned a justified reputation for devotion to the Republican party, the protective tariff, and the interests of his chief patron, the railroad mogul Leland Stanford. Even as a member of the circuit court, McKenna had written several opinions protecting Stanford's powerful Southern Pacific company from the unfriendly behavior of local and state officials who sought to regulate the carrier's rates and terminal facilities.

As a member of the Supreme Court during the high tide of the Progressive era, however, McKenna supported the efforts of THEODORE ROOSEVELT's and WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT's administrations to bring the country's major railroads under a larger measure of administrative control through the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC). Times had changed. By the turn of the century, even the railroads desired a degree of federal regulation that would protect them from conflicting state laws and the debilitating rate wars which drained away profits. McKenna wrote opinions for the Court that confirmed the new relationship between the carriers and the federal government by upholding the ICC's statutory powers with respect to fact-gathering and rate-making.

McKenna also became a robust supporter of congressional efforts to regulate other aspects of the nation's economic and social life under authority of the COMMERCE CLAUSE. He joined Justice JOHN M. HARLAN's crucial opinion in CHAMPION V. AMES (1903), which laid the foundation for a NATIONAL POLICE POWER by giving Congress the authority to exclude from the channels of INTERSTATE COMMERCE supposedly harmful goods such as lottery tickets. McKenna later applied this principle in his own opinions, which sustained the PURE FOOD AND DRUG ACT and also the Mann Act, banning the transportation of women in interstate commerce for immoral purposes.

To his great credit, McKenna was able to accept the extension of the national power doctrine to child labor in the famous case of HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918), even while others who had endorsed the earlier decisions turned their backs upon logic and history. Nor did he join the majority in the case of ADAIR V. UNITED STATES (1908), where six Justices overturned Congress's attempt to ban YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS on the nation's railroads. McKenna's dissent placed the authority of Congress to regulate commerce above the contractual freedom of corporate management.

A stout nationalist and a moderate Republican who remained capable of accepting many progressive reforms, McKenna nonetheless displayed a checkered record with regard to state and federal efforts to assist the working class and organized labor. He refused, for example, to permit the state of Kansas to outlaw yellow dog contracts in all private industry, although he endorsed Congress's effort to do so on the interstate railroads. He cast his vote with RUFUS PECKHAM in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) and with GEORGE H. SUTHERLAND in ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923), when the majority struck down MAXIMUM HOURS AND MINIMUM WAGE LEGISLATION on the grounds of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. Yet McKenna spurned that conservative shibboleth in MULLER V. OREGON (1908), WILSON V. NEW (1917), and BUNTING V. OREGON (1917). On the other hand, not many opinions could match in reactionary tone McKenna's dissent in the Arizona Employers' Liability Cases (1919), where he argued that liability without fault violated the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Like most of his brethren on the WHITE COURT, McKenna gave the green light to federal and state efforts to stamp out dissent during WORLD WAR I. He voted to uphold the convictions of Charles Schenck and Eugene V. Debs as well as those of Jacob Abrams and Joseph Gilbert, although the latter two cases provoked sharp dissents from OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS. If sometimes contractual freedom had to give way before the power of Congress, McKenna believed, so, too, did the liberty to protest against the government in time of war.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

Bibliography

MCDEVITT, BROTHER MATTHEW 1946 Joseph McKenna: Associate Justice of the United States. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University Press.

SEMONCHE, JOHN E. 1978 Charting the Future: The Supreme Court Responds to a Changing Society, 1890–1920. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

MCKINLEY, JOHN
(1780–1852)

Like several other Jacksonian Justices on the TANEY COURT, John McKinley was a product of the Southwest. Born in Virginia, he went with his family to Kentucky where he learned law and began practice. In 1818 he moved to Huntsville, Alabama, then a frontier town, where he practiced law and pursued a diversified political career—first as a supporter of HENRY CLAY and then, when Clay's fortunes waned in Alabama, of ANDREW JACKSON. This timely shift got him a Senate seat in 1826. He served there until 1830, when he lost reelection. He then returned to the Alabama legislature, and in 1832 he went to the United States House of Representatives where he served for one term. After another term in the state legislature in 1836, he was elected by that body to the Senate but chose instead to accept an appointment to the Supreme Court from MARTIN VAN BUREN in 1837.

McKinley's legislative career lacked distinction, but the policy preferences he revealed were those that would guide his work on the Court: in addition to unswerving loyalty to Jackson and Van Buren, he was a strict states' rights man, though he never argued out his case philosophically or constitutionally. In good Jacksonian fashion he was suspicious of monopolies and hated the second Bank of the United States. He also had a strong preference for land laws that favored small settlers and a firm belief that SLAVERY was a state problem and that property in slaves was entitled to legal protection.

McKinley's fifteen years on the Supreme Court (1837–1852) were unproductive and frustrating, both for him and for those who worked with him. In general, states' rights ideas guided his judicial behavior, but he never spoke for the Court in any important cases. He took his duties seriously, as Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY pointed out in his brief eulogy, and was decent and fairminded to the best of his ability. But during his entire tenure, which was interrupted by illness and frequent absences, he wrote only about twenty opinions for the Court, all routine.

Perhaps his most notorious opinion came in BANK OF AUGUSTA V. EARLE (1839) where, both on circuit and in a lone dissent at Washington, he held that a CORPORATION chartered in one state (a bank in the Earle case) could not do business within the boundaries of another state without the latter's express consent. McKinley's position was consistent with a deep concern for state SOVEREIGNTY, but it was, as Justice JOSEPH STORY observed in dismay, totally unrealistic in an age when interstate corporate business was increasingly the norm. McKinley dissented twenty-three times but none of his dissents attracted support and none pioneered new law. Many were unwritten, evidence of the Justice's increasing isolation from the ongoing operations of the Court.

McKinley was also isolated on his own circuit, although Supreme Court Justices, as senior circuit judges, ordinarily dominated the district judges with whom they sat. Not so on the Fifth Circuit where district judges Philip K. Lawrence and, to a lesser extent, Theodore H. McCaleb held the upper hand. There is evidence also that leading members of the circuit bar held the Justice in disrepute. Part of the problem was the 10,000 miles of annual travel (which left McKinley little time to study cases) and the large number of cases (2,700 at each of the two terms in 1839 by his reckoning). His circuit also included Louisiana, where the civil law received from France and the COMMON LAW formed a mixture that was well-nigh incomprehensible to all save lawyers who grew up with it. The main difficulty on circuit as on the full Court, however, was McKinley himself. His talents were simply too modest for the duties of his office. Even his eulogizers found nothing about his legal ability to praise, and all evidence points to the correctness of CARL B. SWISHER's assessment: that John McKinley, of all the Justices on the Taney Court, was the least distinguished.

R. KENT NEWMYER
(1986)

Bibliography

GATELL, FRANK O. 1969 John McKinley. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel (eds.), The Justices of the United States Supreme Court 1789–1969, Vol. 1, pages 769–792. New York: Chelsea House.

Proceedings in Relation to the Death of the Late Judge McKinley 1852 14 Howard iii–v.

MCKINLEY, WILLIAM
(1843–1901)

William McKinley, an Ohio Republican who was President of the United States from 1897 to 1901, spent most of his term in office preoccupied with foreign affairs. An imperialist, he advocated the annexation of Hawaii and, after successfully prosecuting a war against Spain, acquired the Philippines and PUERTO RICO for the United States. McKinley continued the domestic policies of his predecessor, GROVER CLEVELAND, but unlike most Chief Executives in the late nineteenth century, McKinley saw the presidency as a powerful office. He frequently relied on expert and academic commissions to offer him advice on specific problems.

McKinley's lack of interest in enforcing the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT paralleled BENJAMIN HARRISON's, but McKinley's failure to enforce the law vigorously is more significant because he held office during the second greatest merger movement in American history. His three attorneys general—one of whom, JOSEPH MCKENNA, would be his sole appointment to the Supreme Court—initiated only three cases under the act. The most important ANTITRUST cases decided during McKinley's tenure, UNITED STATES V. TRANS-MISSOURI FREIGHT ASSOCIATION (1897) and Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States (1899), had been started under prior administrations.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

GOULD, LEWIS L. 1980 The Presidency of William McKinley. Lawrence: Regents Press of Kansas.

MCLAUGHLIN, ANDREW C.
(1861–1947)

A protégé of THOMAS COOLEY at the University of Michigan, Andrew Cunningham McLaughlin took over his course in American constitutional history and later taught that subject at the University of Chicago for thirty years. In his 1914 presidential address before the American Historical Association, McLaughlin criticized CHARLES BEARD's monolithic emphasis on economic factors. McLaughlin also rejected the tone of exaltation that imbued the work of JOHN FISKE and others on the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. In his first major book, Confederation and Constitution (1905), McLaughlin emphasized the constructive aspects of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION and of the Confederation period. He construed the Articles as the product of a war against centralism and as the world's first written CONSTITUTION to establish a federal system, whose origins he traced to the British Empire. His other important works, distinguished for their judicious interpretations, were Courts, Constitutions, and Parties (1912), Foundations of American Constitutionalism (1932), and Constitutional History of the United States (1935), which won a Pulitzer Prize.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MCLAUGHLIN v. FLORIDA

See: Miscegenation

MCLAURIN v. OKLAHOMA STATE REGENTS

See: Sweatt v. Painter

MCLEAN, JOHN
(1785–1861)

John McLean's appointment to the Supreme Court on March 6, 1829, was ANDREW JACKSON's first and the first from the old Northwest and Ohio, where McLean had grown to manhood. He studied law with Arthur St. Clair, Jr., was admitted to the bar in 1807, and maintained an active full-time practice in Lebanon, Ohio, until his 1812 election to Congress, where he served two terms. As a National Republican, he favored a protective tariff and a national bank. From 1816 to 1822 he served as judge of the Ohio Supreme Court where he gained a respect for the COMMON LAW and developed a penchant for bending it "to the diversity of our circumstances," as he put it in one case. While serving on that court, McLean assiduously cultivated political favor, first with JAMES MONROE and JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, and, when the latter began to falter, with Jackson. His efforts paid off, first in 1822 with an appointment as Commissioner of the General Land Office, then in 1823 as Postmaster General, where his brilliant administrative abilities won him a national reputation. Adams reappointed him to head the Post Office Department, and Jackson was willing to do the same but nominated him to the Supreme Court when McLean indicated an unwillingness to make political removals.

McLean served as Associate Justice from 1829 to 1861, during a period of rapid transition in American law. At the outset the new Justice inclined toward Jacksonian STATES' RIGHTS dogma, as in his dissent from CONTRACT CLAUSE orthodoxy in CRAIG V. MISSOURI (1830). More revealing yet was his practical-minded opinion for the majority in BRISCOE V. BANK OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY (1837), which held that the notes of the Commonwealth Bank were not BILLS OF CREDIT prohibited by Article I, section 10, even though the state owned the bank and the notes circulated as legal tender.

Despite his result-oriented approach in such cases as Briscoe and MAYOR OF NEW YORK V. MILN (1837) (where he supported STATE POLICE POWER regulations against the charge that they were regulations of INTERSTATE COMMERCE), McLean was not a Jacksonian judge. Indeed, he moved steadily toward a conservative nationalism similar to that of Justice JOSEPH STORY, who became his closest friend on the Court. That McLean was solidly conservative on property rights and CORPORATION questions is clear from his majority opinion in behalf of contractual sanctity in PIQUA BRANCH BANK V. KNOOP (1854). His nationalism was apparent in the CHEROKEE INDIAN CASES (Worcester v. Georgia) in 1832 (where he joined JOHN MARSHALL against Georgia and Jackson), and in Holmes v. Jennison in 1840 (where he concurred in ROGER B. TANEY's dissent which asserted the supremacy of the federal government in the area of foreign policy). His "high-toned FEDERALISM" in COMMERCE CLAUSE cases can be seen in the LICENSE CASES (1847) and PASSENGER CASES (1849) and in his majority opinion in Pennsylvania v. Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company (1852) which struck down a Virginia law authorizing a bridge that obstructed commerce over a navigable river. His dissent in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS OF PHILADELPHIA (1851) reaffirmed the theory of his friend Story that the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce belonged exclusively to Congress.

McLean disliked SLAVERY and his opinions often revealed his free-soil sentiments; but he regularly conceded the legality of the institution. Thus his separate opinion in PRIGG V. PENNSYLVANIA (1842) upheld the right of northern states to protect free Negroes from unlawful rendition, but it also affirmed the power of Congress to require the states to return fugitives. Equivocation was unavoidable, too, in GROVES V. SLAUGHTER (1841) where in a separate opinion McLean argued that slavery was a local institution under state control and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce did not prevent a state from regulating the importation of slaves. Free states presumably could prohibit slaves from being brought into their jurisdiction and liberate slaves once they arrived, but slave states could also regulate imports and exports of slaves for sale. On circuit McLean also ruled against freedom when he thought the law obliged him to do so.

McLean's proslavery decisions, which were condemned in the free-soil press, increasingly ran counter to his presidential plans which, to the distress of some of his colleagues, he relentlessly pursued from the bench. In DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) his political ambition, now focused on the Republican party, influenced his judicial behavior. In a separate dissent, he argued that Congress had the power to prohibit slavery in the TERRITORIES, that Negroes could be citizens, and that Dred Scott was free by virtue of his residence in a free state and a free territory. McLean has been unfairly blamed for the Court's wide-ranging, politically explosive decision—a burden we now know should fall most heavily on Taney and JAMES M. WAYNE. But there is no doubt that McLean's determination to dissent gave Taney and Wayne a good excuse to confront the whole problem of SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES.

McLean was not a legal scholar, he pioneered no new DOCTRINE, and he did not greatly refine the process of constitutional adjustment to new circumstances that was the hallmark of the TANEY COURT. Greatness, however, is not only rare but relative, and on a Court burdened with mediocrity McLean looked good. His opinions were generally solid and persuasive (as in the great copyright case of Wheaton v. Peters in 1834) and he assuredly carried more than his share of the Court's heavy work load (with nearly 250 majority opinions and numerous dissents). He was one of the few Justices of the period who went to the considerable trouble of publishing his circuit opinions (in six volumes) and whose circuit opinions were worth publishing. It is true that his political ambition contributed to the politicization of the judicial process. Still, he cherished the Court as an institution and worked diligently through it to preserve the Union under the Constitution.

R. KENT NEWMYER
(1986)

Bibliography

GATELL, FRANK O. 1969 John McLean. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel (eds.), The Justices of the United States Supreme Court, 1789–1969, Vol. 1, pages 535–567. New York: Chelsea House.

WEISENBURGER, FRANCIS P. 1937 The Life of John McLean: A Politician on the United States Supreme Court. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.

MCNABB-MALLORY RULE

Partly in response to the problem posed by the VOLUNTARINESS test, the Supreme Court made an unexpected departure from that test in McNabb v. United States (1943) and Mallory v. United States (1957). Under the "McNabb-Mallory Rule," a confession obtained by law enforcement officers during a period of unnecessary delay in bringing an arrested person before a magistrate for arraignment was inadmissible in federal prosecutions. The rule was based not on constitutional grounds but on the Court's supervisory authority over the administration of criminal justice in the federal courts. The rule created more problems than it attempted to solve, and in 1968, Congress abolished it.

In McNabb, five brothers were arrested for murder and held in barren detention cells for forty-eight hours. Isolated from friends and family, and without the assistance of counsel, they were repeatedly interrogated until confessions were obtained. (See POLICE INTERROGATIONS AND CONFESSIONS.) Only after they confessed were they taken before a magistrate for arraignment. The confessions were admitted into EVIDENCE at trial and the McNabbs were convicted.

The Court, with only Justice STANLEY F. REED dissenting, reversed the convictions on the ground that they were unlawfully obtained during a period of prolonged custodial delay. Federal laws in effect at the time of the Court's decision required officers to take an arrested person "immediately" before a magistrate for arraignment. At arraignment, the magistrate advises the defendant of the charges against him, of his constitutional rights, and sets a preliminary hearing date at which the government must show legal cause for the detention.

Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER devoted much of his opinion for the Court to an analysis of the policies behind the immediate arraignment laws. He concluded that they were intended to protect the rights of arrested persons and to deter the police from secret third-degree interrogation of persons not yet arraigned.

Finding that the officers who arrested the McNabbs had acted in willful disobedience of the laws requiring immediate arraignment, the Court suppressed the confessions. Suppression, Frankfurter explained, would promote the policies behind the laws and ensure the fair and effective administration of the federal criminal justice system by disallowing convictions based on unfair police procedures.

Two years after McNabb, Congress adopted Rule 5(a) of the FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE. The rule required that an arrested person be taken, "without unnecessary delay," before the nearest available commissioner or any other nearby officer empowered to commit persons charged with offenses against the laws of the United States. The rule, by failing to include remedies for its violation, left intact the McNabb mandate that confessions obtained during a period of unlawful detention be suppressed. Any questions regarding the continuing viability of the McNabb rule were put to rest by the Court's opinion in Mallory.

Mallory was arrested with two other suspects on rape charges. Although the police had sufficient evidence to consider Mallory the prime suspect, he was not arraigned until ten hours after his arrest, during which time he was continually interrogated and finally signed a written confession. At trial, the signed confession was introduced into evidence; Mallory was convicted and received the death sentence.

Frankfurter delivered the opinion of a unanimous Court, which held the confession inadmissible because Mallory had not been arraigned without unnecessary delay as required by Rule 5(a). The Court's interpretation of Rule 5(a) was based on the principles announced earlier in the McNabb decision. Delays in arraignment must be prevented in order to prevent abusive and unlawful law enforcement practices aimed at obtaining confessions of guilt from suspects in custody who have not been informed by a judicial officer of the charges against them or of their constitutional rights.

After Mallory the law prevailing in the federal courts, commonly referred to as the "McNabb-Mallory Rule," was that any confession made by a suspect under arrest, in violation of Rule 5(a), was inadmissible in evidence. The problem with the McNabb-Mallory Rule was that it operated arbitrarily to exclude from evidence otherwise free and voluntary confessions merely because of delay in arraignment. In other words, the United States Supreme Court had failed to consider the obvious: a delayed arraignment does not imply the involuntariness of a confession.

Criticized as illogical and unrealistic, the McNabb-Mallory Rule was abolished in 1968 when Congress enacted Title II of the OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT. The act provides in part that confessions shall not be inadmissible solely because of delay in arraignment, if they are voluntary and made within six hours of arrest or during a delay in arraignment that is reasonable, considering the transportation problems in getting a defendant before a magistrate. Thus, the voluntary nature of the confession is the test of its admissibility, and delay in arraignment is only one factor for the judge to consider.

WENDY E. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

STEPHENS, OTIS H., JR. 1973 The Supreme Court and Confessions of Guilt. Pages 63–89. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press.

MCREYNOLDS, JAMES C.
(1862–1946)

James Clark McReynolds, a Tennessee Democrat, first came to national attention as an antitrust prosecutor during the THEODORE ROOSEVELT and WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT administrations. He was a Tennessee Gold Democrat, friendly with Colonel Edward House, WOODROW WILSON's key adviser. His antitrust reputation led to his appointment as Wilson's attorney general in 1913. Within a year, however, McReynolds found himself at odds with the administration and powerful congressmen. Wilson "kicked McReynolds upstairs" to the Supreme Court in 1914. From then until his retirement in 1941, McReynolds distinguished himself as a consistent and implacable foe of Progressive and NEW DEAL regulatory programs.

McReynold's hostility to trusts largely derived from his ideas of individualism and freedom from arbitrary restraints. Throughout his judicial career he resolutely supported the business community and was instinctively suspicious of governmental regulation. "If real competition is to continue, the right of the individual to exercise reasonable discretion in respect of his own business methods must be preserved," McReynolds wrote in FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION V. GRATZ (1920). In that case, the Court limited the authority of the FTC, the creation of which had been one of the Wilson administration's primary achievements; McReynolds wrote that the courts, not the commission, would decide the meaning of "unfair method of competition." In St. Louis and O'Fallon Railroad v. United States (1929) the Court resolved a long-standing dispute between the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) and railroads as to whether original or replacement costs should be considered for valuation and rate purposes. Speaking for a narrow majority, McReynolds overturned ICC policy by ruling that the commission had to base its determination of rates on replacement costs, which were higher.

McReynolds resisted the claims of organized labor. For example, he joined his colleagues in rejecting federal child labor laws and a District of Columbia minimum wage statute. When the Court in 1919 sustained an Arizona law holding employers responsible for on-the-job accidents whether or not they were negligent, McReynolds dissented, caustically arguing that such laws served "to stifle enterprise, produce discontent, strife, idleness and pauperism."

Without exception, McReynolds supported the conviction of political radicals during the "Red Scare" period following WORLD WAR I a decade later, when the Court turned against restrictive state measures on speech and press, McReynolds parted company with the majority, dissenting in STROMBERG V. CALIFORNIA (1931) and NEAR V. MINNESOTA (1931). Similarly, McReynolds's ill-concealed contempt for blacks led to dissent from decisions striking down an all-white primary law and ordering a new trial for the Scottsboro defendants. Finally, when the Court, in MISSOURI EX REL. GAINES V. CANADA (1938), began its long process of overturning segregation, McReynolds bitterly assailed the majority opinion.

Some of McReynolds's opinions defending individual rights remain relevant. In MEYER V. NEBRASKA (1923) he spoke for the Court in striking down a state statute prohibiting German language instruction in the public schools; in PIERCE V. SOCIETY OF SISTERS (1925) he ruled against an Oregon statute that had the effect of proscribing parochial school education; and in CARROLL V. UNITED STATES (1925) he vehemently protested against violations of the FOURTH AMENDMENT in enforcing PROHIBITION. In MYERS V. UNITED STATES (1926) he dissented from what he considered to be an almost unlimited approval of presidential power to remove federal officials, a view vindicated nine years later when the Court unanimously rejected President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's attempt to remove a federal trade commissioner.

The New Deal years provide the sharpest focus for McReynolds's views of constitutional law, both when he joined in majority opinions and later in the bitter dissents that represent his most familiar legacy. McReynolds combined his ideological reaction to the New Deal with a passionate, almost pathological, hatred for Franklin D. Roosevelt. The Justice was scathing in his private remarks and, at times, indiscreet in public. In his courtroom dissent in the GOLD CLAUSE CASES (1935) McReynolds emotionally proclaimed: "This is Nero at his worst. The Constitution is gone!" When the New Deal gained a few early Court victories, McReynolds dissented, as in the gold clause cases, in NEBBIA V. NEW YORK (1934), and in ASHWANDER V. TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY (1936). As one of the "Four Horsemen," he participated in striking down thirteen New Deal measures between 1934 and 1936. When the Court made its famous shift, beginning in 1937 with WEST COAST HOTEL COMPANY V. PARRISH and the WAGNER ACT CASES, McReynolds joined his fellow conservatives in outraged dissent. As their spokesman in National Labor Relations Board v. Friedman-Marks Clothing (1937), he argued that the WAGNER ACT regulated production, not commerce, and thus exceeded the boundaries of congressional power as set in long-standing precedents. Similarly, he considered the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT unconstitutional; he registered a lone dissent against the approval of the securities registration provisions of the PUBLIC UTILITIES HOLDING COMPANY ACT; and, finally, he provided the sole dissent to the Court's recognition in 1940 that labor PICKETING was entitled to protection as an exercise of FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

Few Supreme Court Justices have been more outspoken or more doctrinaire than McReynolds; and few have been so incompatible with colleagues. McReynolds refused to speak to fellow Wilson appointee John H. Clarke, who was too liberal, and to LOUIS D. BRANDEIS and BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO, who were both liberal and Jewish. Even Chief Justice Taft found him "selfish and prejudiced" and difficult to like. He was committed to laissez-faire individualism and racial segregation, and he was unyielding and hostile to any political beliefs he regarded as deviant.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

MASON, ALPHEUS THOMAS 1956 Harlan Fiske Stone: Pillar of the Law. New York: Viking.

PASCHAL, JOEL F. 1951 Mr. Justice Sutherland: A Man Against the State. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

MECHANICAL JURISPRUDENCE

This pejorative epithet was introduced in 1908 by the American jurist ROSCOE POUND. It and similar rubrics—"the jurisprudence of conceptions," "slot machine, phonograph, T-square theories of law"—were widely used to caricature patterns of juristic thought and judicial action that deduced conclusions from unexamined, predetermined conceptions by purely mechanical logical processes, disregarded socioeconomic realities and practical consequences, and understated the degree of judicial lawmaking by attributing a machinelike automatism to the judicial process.

The "sociological jurisprudence" and "legal realism" of Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, HARLAN FISKE STONE, and BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO were often hailed as correctives for mechanical jurisprudence because they viewed law and logic instrumentally as means to social ends, and they acknowledged judicial lawmaking.

A perennial juristic allurement, mechanical jurisprudence was exemplified by many Supreme Court "economic DUE PROCESS" and COMMERCE CLAUSE decisions between 1895 and 1937. In due process cases such as LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) and ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923), the Court invoked the laissez-faire doctrine, FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, which regarded workers and employers as bargaining equals, in holding state and federal legislation unconstitutional. In commerce clause cases such as UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. (1895) and CARTER V. CARTER COAL CO. (1936), the Court used economically unrealistic distinctions between "commerce" and PRODUCTION, and "direct" and "indirect" EFFECTS ON COMMERCE in invalidating federal legislation. A classic expression of mechanical jurisprudence is the passage of Justice Owen Roberts's opinion in UNITED STATES V. BUTLER (1936) where he said the Court had only to compare the statute with the appropriate constitutional clause to see if they squared.

Such decisions led finally to President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's 1937 "Court reform" bill, designed, he said, "to save the Constitution from the Court and the Court from itself." But the Court swiftly reversed and reformed itself, abandoning these mechanical constitutional interpretations. Later, in WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942), it reemphasized that its recognition of economic realities had made "the mechanical application of legal formulas no longer feasible."

HOWARD E. DEAN
(1986)

Bibliography

POUND, ROSCOE 1908 Mechanical Jurisprudence. Columbia Law Review 8:605–623.

STERN, ROBERT L. 1951 The Problems of Yesteryear—Commerce and Due Process. Vanderbilt Law Review 4:446–468.

MEDIA AND THE CONSTITUTION

See: Broadcasting; Freedom of the Press; Free Press/Fair Trial; Journalistic Practices, Tort Liability, and the Freedom of the Press

MEESE COMMISSION

The Attorney General's Commission on Pornography, better known as "The Meese Commission" after Attorney General Edwin Meese, was charged to "determine the nature, extent, and impact on society of pornography in the United States, and to make specific recommendations to the Attorney General concerning more effective ways in which the spread of pornography could be contained, consistent with constitutional guarantees." The committee included three attorneys, two psychologists, a city council member, a federal judge, a social worker, a magazine editor, and a priest. It had a balanced religious and political composition as well.

After a year of extensive hearings, field trips, and study, the commission produced a 1,960-page report. If the size of the report were not daunting enough, the findings of the commission were relatively inconclusive. Although the commission did take a stand on the issue of PORNOGRAPHY—something a similar presidential commission established during the Nixon administration failed to do—it did not wholly condemn pornography as the right, especially the religious right, and feminists had hoped. Instead, it unanimously condemned sexually explicit material that is violent in nature; sexually explicit materials that show situations where women are humiliated, demeaned, and subjugated; and CHILD PORNOGRAPHY in any form.

A major problem the commission faced was its inability to define key terms. The commission found it difficult to define "pornography," "obscenity," and "hardcore." In the end, it could do no better than Justice POTTER J. STEWART had in JACOBELLIS V. OHIO (1964). Stewart, although not defining pornography, qualified it by stating, "I know it when I see it." Hampered by the inability to define key terms, the commission called for further research.

JEFFREY D. SCHULTZ
(1992)

Bibliography

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S COMMISSION ON PORNOGRAPHY 1986 Final Report. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

KEATING, CHARLES H., JR., 1970 Report of Charles H. Keating, Jr., Commissioner: Commission of Obscenity and Pornography. Cincinnati, Ohio: Charles H. Keating, Jr.

STANMEYER, WILLIAM 1986 The Pornography Commission Report: A Plea for Decency. Benchmark II:227–236.

MEIKLEJOHN, ALEXANDER
(1872–1964)

Alexander Meiklejohn was a philosopher, president of Amherst College, and director of an experimental college at the University of Wisconsin. After his long academic career he became a CIVIL LIBERTIES publicist. His Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government (1948) presented the FIRST AMENDMENT as the foundation of political democracy. He advocated that citizens should have the same unlimited FREEDOM OF SPEECH as their representatives. Regarding the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER TEST and BALANCING TESTS as annulments of the First Amendment, he criticized OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and ZECHARIAH CHAFEE as proponents of a stunted interpretation of free speech. In the McCarthy period he defended the right of communists to teach. His essay, "The First Amendment Is An Absolute," written when he was almost ninety, summarized his position, which was not really absolutist. Distinguishing "the freedom of speech" from "speech," he believed that private defamation, OBSCENITY, perjury, false advertising, and solicitation of crime were not constitutionally protected. His ABSOLUTISM seems to have extended to speech concerning all matters of public policy, education, philosophy, arts, literature, and science, but he believed that even protected speech was subject to reasonable regulations of time and place. Meiklejohn was closer to Holmes and Chafee than he admitted.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MEMOIRS v. MASSACHUSETTS
383 U.S. 413 (1966)

Nine years after ROTH V. UNITED STATES, still unable to agree upon a constitutional definition of OBSCENITY, the Supreme Court reversed a state court determination that John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure, commonly known as Fanny Hill, was obscene. The three-Justice PLURALITY OPINION, written by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, held that the constitutional test for obscenity was: "(a) the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to a prurient interest in sex; (b) the material is patently offensive because it affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters; and (c) the material is utterly without redeeming social value."

Despite an OBITER DICTUM in JACOBELLIS V. OHIO (1964), it was believed—and the Massachusetts courts had held—that Roth did not require unqualified worthlessness before a book might be deemed obscene. Justice Brennan twisted the Roth reasoning (that obscenity was unprotected because it was utterly worthless) into a constitutional test that was virtually impossible to meet under criminal standards of proof. Thus a finding of obscenity would become rare, even where the requisite prurient interest appeal and offensiveness could be demonstrated.

The Massachusetts courts had tried the book in the abstract; a host of literary experts testified to its social value. The circumstances of the book's production, sale, and publicity were not admitted. Justice Brennan noted that evidence that distributors commercially exploited Fanny Hill solely for its prurient appeal could have justified a finding, based on the purveyor's own evaluation, that Fanny Hill was utterly without redeeming social importance.

Justices HUGO L. BLACK, WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, and POTTER J. STEWART concurred in the result, Black and Douglas adhering to their view that obscenity is protected expression. Stewart reiterated his view that the First Amendment protected all but "hard-core pornography."

Justice TOM C. CLARK, dissenting, rejected the importation of the "utterly without redeeming social value" standard into the obscenity test, which he believed would give the "smut artist free rein." Reacting against the continuous flow of pornographic materials to the Supreme Court, he reasserted that the Court should apply a "sufficient evidence" standard of review of lower courts' obscenity decisions.

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, dissenting, argued that although the federal government could constitutionally proscribe only hard-core pornography, the states could prohibit material under any criteria rationally related to accepted notions of obscenity.

Justice BYRON R. WHITE, also dissenting, argued that Roth counseled examination of the predominant theme of the material, not resort to minor themes of passages of literary worth to redeem obscene works from condemnation.

KIM MCLANE WARDLAW
(1986)

MEMORANDUM ORDER

Most orders of any court are not accompanied by opinions, but are simply stated in memorandum form. The Supreme Court issues thousands of such memorandum orders each year, granting or denying such requests as applications for review, applications for permission to appear IN FORMA PAUPERIS, applications for permission to file briefs AMICI CURIAE, or PETITIONS FOR REHEARING.

Some memorandum orders effectively decide cases; the denial of a petition for CERTIORARI is one example, and another is the dismissal of an APPEAL "for want of a substantial federal question." Occasionally the Court summarily affirms the decision of a lower court, issuing no opinion but only a memorandum order. The denial of certiorari generally has little force as a PRECEDENT; however, both lower courts and commentators do draw conclusions concerning the Court's view when they see a consistent pattern of refusal to review lower court decisions reaching the same conclusion. The summary affirmance of a decision in a memorandum order does establish a precedent, but the precedent is limited to the points necessarily decided by the lower court, and does not extend to the reasoning in that court's opinion. The practice of deciding major issues through memorandum orders is often criticized on the ground that decisions will not be understood as principled if they are not explained.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BROWN, ERNEST J. 1958 The Supreme Court, 1957 Term—Foreword: Process of Law. Harvard Law Review 72:77–95.

MEMPHIS v. GREENE
451 U.S. 100 (1981)

Because the City of Memphis blocked a street at the point where a white neighborhood bordered a black neighborhood, residents of the black neighborhood had to drive around the white neighborhood in order to get to and from the city center. Black residents brought a CLASS ACTION against the city, seeking an INJUNCTION to keep the street open. They failed in the federal district court, but the court of appeals held that the closing violated their right to hold and enjoy property, guaranteed by the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866.

The Supreme Court, with Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS writing for a 6–3 majority, rejected the statutory claim, saying the street closing had caused only minor inconvenience, and had not damaged the plaintiff's property values. The question remained whether the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, of its own force, forbade anything but slavery itself. The Court did not reach this broad question, saying only that the street closing here was not a BADGE OF SERVITUDE. Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, for the dissenters, scored the majority for ignoring "the plain and powerful symbolic message of the 'inconvenience' ": to fence out "undesirables."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MENTAL ILLNESS AND THE CONSTITUTION

Mental illness has played two apparently different roles in American law generally: as a limitation on state authority to impose ordinary legal standards on individuals and as a basis for increasing state authority over individuals. The paradigmatic limiting use of mental illness is the defense of insanity for conduct that would otherwise be subject to criminal liability. Its paradigmatic use to increase state authority is in civil commitment of people who, apart from their mental illness, would not be subject to state confinement or control. In both guises, however, the same underlying justification is advanced—that a mentally ill person deserves specially beneficial treatment from the state, either to excuse him from ordinary standards of criminal liability or to protect and treat him under civil commitment laws.

Until the 1960s, constitutional doctrine paid scant attention to any of the legal usages for mental illness. Beginning in that decade, lower federal courts began to scrutinize these uses and to invoke constitutional norms in the service of that scrutiny. The central problem was that the promise of special beneficence for mental illness proved false on close examination. Although insanity was denoted a defense to criminal liability, in practice defendants thus found "not guilty" were automatically confined to state maximum security institutions indistinguishable from prisons (and often with harsher custodial conditions), were provided with virtually no psychiatric treatment, and were typically held for longer terms than if they had been convicted of the offenses charged. Similarly, individuals who were civilly committed, ostensibly for protection and treatment, in fact were regularly confined in brutal state institutions, provided no semblance of psychiatric treatment, subjected to degrading impositions such as numbing, physically harmful drug dosages, strait-jacketed isolation, and confined for long terms.

Confronted with these facts, federal courts found various violations of constitutional rights, all derived essentially from the proposition that DUE PROCESS required the state to justify any deprivation of liberty and, where that justification was based on a promise of beneficent treatment, to fulfill that promise. Thus the District of Columbia Circuit Court held in Rouse v. Cameron (1966) that those found not guilty by reason of insanity had a "right to treatment" and not simply custodial confinement, and in Bolton v. Harris (1968) that these defendants could not be automatically confined after an insanity acquittal but only if found "mentally ill" and "in need of treatment" according to civil commitment standards. For civilly committed people generally, that court found in Lake v. Cameron (1966) a liberty-based presumption against automatic commitment to a secure institution and a consequent right to treatment in the "least restrictive alternative" setting. Other federal courts concluded that civilly committed people generally had a constitutional right to treatment and that civil commitment must rest on proof of "danger to self or others," not simply mental illness as such, and proof moreover that would satisfy the criminal law "beyond REASONABLE DOUBT."

For more than a decade after these rulings, the Supreme Court held back from any definitive holding either to endorse or to reject these doctrinal innovations. During the 1960s, the Court did demonstrate concern for the problem of unfulfilled and even hypocritical state promises of therapeutic benefits as a justification for increased social controls. The most significant context for this Supreme Court concern was not mental illness but rather the juvenile court system, where states sought to justify the absence of criminal law procedural protections by invoking the promise of therapy. In IN RE GAULT (1967) the Court found these promises insufficiently convincing and required extensive recasting of juvenile court procedures.

In 1972 the Supreme Court first addressed the systemic implications of this same problem for state authority generally premised on mental illness. In Jackson v. Indiana the Court overturned common state practice regarding criminal defendants found mentally incompetent to stand trial. Traditional doctrine purported to excuse such disabled defendants from standing trial, ostensibly to benefit them; but the practical consequence was that these defendants were treated in the same way and as badly as those found not guilty by insanity. The defendants were given long-term, even lifetime, confinement in harsh facilities without semblance of psychiatric care, even if the offense charged were a petty MISDEMEANOR. The Court ruled in Jackson that this disposition violated due process; the conditions of this confinement must provide treatment with reasonable prospect that the defendant will be made competent to stand trial. The practical result of this ruling has been substantially to increase the treatment resources provided to defendants found incompetent for trial. To justify the confinement of defendants who, after a substantial period of confinement, remain disabled for trial purposes, a state must invoke its civil commitment laws.

With this one exception, however, the Supreme Court was hesitant during the 1970s to address the constitutional law issues raised by state invocations of mental illness. The dominant motif of the Court's work during this time can be seen in its resolution in 1979 of the question of the requisite BURDEN OF PROOF in civil commitment proceedings. The Court acknowledged that substantial due process liberty interests were at stake, but nonetheless concluded that the state's beneficent purpose toward the allegedly mentally ill person justified a less stringent burden than the criminal standard of proof; hence in Addington v. Texas (1979) the Court required an intermediate standard of "clear and convincing evidence."

This impulse to find some seeming middle ground between fundamentally opposed premises is also apparent in the Court's equivocal approach to the question of a constitutional right to treatment for persons confined to state mental institutions. In O'CONNOR V. DONALDSON (1975) the Court ruled that a state could not commit a person on grounds of mental illness alone but only with an added finding of danger to self or others. The Court refused, however, to decide whether a state was obliged to provide treatment to such a person rather than impose merely custodial confinement. The same issue returned to the Court in Youngberg v. Romeo (1982), this time regarding an institutionalized person who was retarded rather than mentally ill. Again the Court avoided a definitive resolution, ruling that the plaintiff was constitutionally entitled to "minimal treatment" that reasonably promised to reduce his aggressive outbursts—as opposed to the harsh behavior controls, such as prolonged shackling, that the state had used. The Court did not, however, reach the broader issue whether the state was obliged to provide treatment with any promise of greater benefits such as ultimate freedom from confinement.

In 1983 the Court departed from its previous pattern of equivocation in these matters. In a 5–4 decision the Court held in Jones v. United States that a criminal defendant found not guilty by insanity could be confined to a mental institution without regard to the maximum term for which he might have been sentenced for the offense charged. The Court ruled, moreover, that the insanity acquittal itself justified the defendant's confinement without any necessary invocation of civil commitment standards, thus effectively disapproving the 1968 court of appeals decision in Bolton. The Court in effect treated the "criminally insane" as different from either "criminals" or the "insane." This differential treatment can work a marked disadvantage, as the defendant in the Jones case found. But, the Court appeared to conclude, the defendant chooses to plead criminal insanity and thus knowingly embraces the risk of his ultimate disadvantage. Indeed, in AKE V. OKLAHOMA (1985) the Court made it easier to invoke the insanity defense by ruling that an indigent defendant is entitled to a court-appointed psychiatrist. The specific context of that case was a capital offense, where the risk of indefinite confinement following an insanity acquittal might seem invariably worthwhile; but the Court did not limit its holding to capital cases.

It is not clear whether the Court's definitive rulings in the context of criminal insanity will be followed by similar resolutions in other aspects of state authority regarding mentally ill people. The Court may have felt a special need to address criminal insanity as such because of the extraordinary public attention resulting from John Hinckley's acquittal for insanity in 1982 on the charge of attempting to assassinate President RONALD REAGAN. Whatever the future directions of judicial rulings, however, the underlying questions regarding the justifications for and scope of state authority in these matters remain difficult.

The dominant theme of the constitutional principle set out by lower courts in the 1960s and 1970s has been that mental illness is relevant to the exercise of state power only where the state promises therapeutic benefit, and that the Constitution requires that this promise be kept. Keeping the promise, however, is easier said than done. Both diagnosis and treatment of mental illness is uncertain. Furthermore, adequate therapy, either in state institutions or in community treatment facilities, will require supervision of complex bureaucracies and large expenditures of funds. Supervision of this process will severely strain both the courts' enforcement capacities and traditional conceptions of judicial authority. Some observers thus conclude that the lower courts were correct in seeing the failure and even hypocrisy of states regarding their therapeutic promises, but these courts merely compounded this error by invoking the Constitution to add new promises that similarly cannot be fulfilled.

If courts cannot and should not attempt to enforce the promise of therapy, what response is proper in the face of egregious state abuses? Some have argued that states should simply be barred from giving mental illness special legal relevance in any circumstances, as a justification either for increasing or withholding state power over individuals. In this view, states could confine people for "dangerousness" only by applying ordinary criminal law standards, and those standards should make no special dispensation for the mentally ill. A few states have essentially abolished the insanity defense and sharply limited the availability of civil commitment. Similarly, some judicial decisions such as Rogers v. Okin (1980) have found a constitutional right to refuse treatment, notwithstanding that a person has been civilly committed as mentally ill and dangerous. The premise of these decisions is not that the state might fail to keep its therapeutic promise; it is rather that the promise may be kept with excessive rigor, and that the state may thereby transgress valued boundaries of individual integrity and dignity. Though these lower court decisions do not directly embrace the view that would abolish all state mental illness powers, they share the underlying suspicion of therapeutically justified state impositions, and they apparently prefer modes of social control that do not directly purport to invade mental processes, such as imprisonment for criminal convictions.

This underlying premise is a temptingly plausible response to the sorry history of state abuse of the mentally ill. But the premise fails both as social policy and as constitutional doctrine. The consequences were disastrous for large numbers of people who were removed from state institutions in the 1960s and 1970s, in part as a response to court decisions, and were "dumped" into communities with no facilities to receive them or willingness to respond to their special needs. As constitutional doctrine, the abolitionist doctrine relies on a conception of due process "liberty" that takes insufficient account of the psychological conditions of individual autonomy that lie beneath this prized constitutional right. This conception ignores the ways in which mental illness can distort an individual's capacity to acknowledge his need for help, including state-administered assistance. It may be that state power can never be trusted to provide this help, that this is the lesson of the history of state abuse of mentally ill people in the criminal and civil law context. But this lesson has not yet been clearly written into constitutional doctrine.

ROBERT A. BURT
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Disabilities, Rights of Persons With; Disability Discrimination.)

Bibliography

BROOKS, ALEXANDER D. 1974 Law, Psychiatry and the Mental Health System, and 1980 Supplement. Boston: Little, Brown.

BURT, ROBERT A. 1979 Taking Care of Strangers: The Rule of Law in Doctor-Patient Relations. New York: Free Press.

SCULL, ANDREW 1977 Decarceration: Community Treatment and the Deviant: A Radical View. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall.

MENTAL ILLNESS AND THE CONSTITUTION (Update)

Beginning in the 1960s, lower federal courts scrutinized with increasing intensity state claims that special statutory treatment of mental illness, either as a basis for civil commitment to psychiatric institutions or for apparent exemptions from ordinary criminal liability, were in fact beneficial to the affected individual. For almost two decades the Supreme Court was cautiously supportive of this effort, though only equivocally addressing the lower courts' most expansive findings of constitutional protections. In 1983, however, the Court definitively rejected one protective path that some lower courts had pursued; in Jones v. United States, the Court ruled that a criminal defendant found not guilty by reason of insanity could be confined to a mental institution without regard to the maximum term for which he might have been sentenced for the offense charged and, moreover, that the defendant could be confined without regard to the standards for mental illness civil commitment.

Two significant decisions since 1983 suggest that the Court more generally has resolved to abandon its prior tolerance, if not wholehearted support, for judicial scrutiny of state authority regarding mental illness. In Allen v. Illinois (1986), the Court ruled that the Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION does not apply to commitment proceedings based on mental illness, thus upholding the use of derogatory evidence obtained from a court-ordered psychiatric interview. The Court accepted at face value both the state's characterization of the proceedings as "civil" (even though the statute under review applied only to mentally ill people who were "sexually dangerous" and had already been charged with a criminal offense) and the state's claim that the purpose of the commitment was "treatment, not punishment" (even though the person would be confined for an indeterminate term in a maximum-security facility adjoining, though administratively distinct from, a state prison). Similarly, in WASHINGTON V. HARPER (1990) the Court ruled that a criminally convicted prisoner could be compelled to take psychotropic medication without any recourse to judicial proceedings to examine either the prisoner's mental competency or need for the medication. The Court thus effectively disapproved the extensive prior efforts of lower federal courts to establish constitutional protections against forced medication for civilly committed people, as in Rennie v. Klein (1983) and Rogers v. Okin (1984).

The Supreme Court's disavowal of this kind of judicial scrutiny comes at a time of popular arousal about homeless people in urban areas, many of whom appear to be mentally ill. Their visibly disturbing presence has been widely blamed on past judicial inquiries into conditions in mental institutions and the "deinstitutionalization" movement given impetus by these court decisions. Many states have responded to this popular concern by enacting more liberal standards for civil commitment, not only to avert "dangerous" conduct but also to forestall "substantial mental deterioration." Though some lower courts have constitutionally invalidated such liberalized criteria, it is unlikely that the Supreme Court today would agree.

In one limited context the Supreme Court has recently enlarged the state's obligation to give special advantage to mentally ill people; in FORD V. WAINWRIGHT (1986) the Court ruled that states are constitutionally prohibited from executing a mentally incompetent person. But this apparent beneficence has a twist that ironically corresponds to the overall direction of the Court's recent jurisprudence regarding mental illness: the state will now provide psychiatric treatment to incompetent people so that, when cured, they can be killed.

ROBERT A. BURT
(1992)

Bibliography

KIESLER, CHARLES A. and SIBULKIN, AMY E. 1987 Mental Hospitalization: Myths and Facts About a National Crisis. Newbury Park, Calif.: Sage.

MENTAL RETARDATION AND THE CONSTITUTION

The Supreme Court first addressed the constitutional status of mentally retarded people in BUCK V. BELL (1927).

In an opinion by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, the Court upheld a state statute authorizing compulsory STERILIZATION of "mental defectives." In dismissing the claim that this imposition wrongly discriminated against retarded people and thereby denied them EQUAL PROTECTION under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, Holmes appeared to invoke "minimal scrutiny" (as it was later termed), holding that the legislature might reasonably find retardation both inheritable and socially harmful. It was not until the 1970s that courts took a different, more protective stance toward retarded people. In so doing, they challenged the social attitudes of fear and aversion that lay beneath not only sterilization laws but also the general state policy, dating from the late nineteenth century, of excluding retarded people from community facilities (such as public schools) and consigning them to large, geographically isolated residential institutions.

The modern decisions involved two constitutional approaches. The first approach was to recognize a constitutional "right to treatment" for residents of state institutions. This right was initially formulated in 1971 when a federal district court held that brutal custodial conditions in an Alabama institution must be remedied by intensive educational and treatment programs conducted by new cadres of professionally qualified staff. In Youngberg v. Romeo (1982) the Supreme Court effectively endorsed this constitutional holding, deriving as a proposition of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS that, although the state was not required to offer any services to retarded people, if the state chose to provide residential facilities, then those facilities must meet certain minimal standards.

The second constitutional approach was initially formulated in 1972, when a federal district court overturned a state statute excluding retarded children from public schools on the ground that they were "ineducable." The court appeared to conclude that all retarded people were educable to some degree. This holding was quickly adopted by other federal courts to overturn similar state statutes and, moreover, was endorsed by Congress in the EDUCATION OF ALL HANDICAPPED CHILDREN ACT (1975) requiring education of all children, no matter how severely impaired, as a condition on federal funding of public schools.

These two constitutional approaches of substantive due process and equal protection analysis were blended by a 1977 district court ruling that a state institution for the retarded must be wholly closed and its residents moved to small-scale community homes on the grounds that the "right to treatment" could not be effectively protected in any large, isolated institutional setting and that, like racial SEGREGATION, separation of retarded people from contact with mentally normal people was INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION. A congressional act of 1975 also indicated preference for community over institutional retardation facilities; but the Supreme Court, in PENNHURST STATE SCHOOL V. HALDERMAN (1981) without addressing the initial constitutional ruling, held that Congress had spoken only with "hortatory" rather than mandatory intention.

In 1985 the Supreme Court finally did address the question whether mentally retarded people warranted specially protected constitutional status, but its answer was ambiguous. The specific issue in CLEBURNE V. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER (1985) was the validity of a local ZONING ordinance that specifically excluded group residences for "feeble-minded" people, even though fraternity and sorority houses, dormitories, and nursing homes for "convalescents or aged" people were explicitly permitted. The Fifth Circuit overturned the ordinance, citing the immutability of retardation, its stigmatized social history (as evidenced by sterilization laws based on spurious scientific findings and by brutalizing, isolated institutional residences), and the political vulnerability of retarded people. Because retardation could be relevant to some state classifications such as school programming or employment eligibility, however, the court found that it was more like gender than like race, a "quasi-suspect" rather than a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION. Applying intermediate scrutiny, the court found insufficient justification for the zoning exclusion.

The Supreme Court declined to follow this analysis. It concluded that retardation classifications warranted no special judicial scrutiny for several reasons: the legitimate relevance of retardation for some classificatory purposes, the nonjudicial expertise seemingly required to evaluate such purposes, and the political strength of retardation advocates as evidenced by the 1975 congressional acts (notwithstanding that Congress had also acted against race and gender discrimination in recent decades). The Court nonetheless invalidated the zoning ordinance on the ground that it was based merely on "vague, undifferentiated fears" about retarded people. This rationale does not readily fit the conventional conception of "minimal scrutiny" equal protection analysis, given that fears regarding the irrationality and uncontrollability of retarded people have some plausible claim to factuality, even though this claim is unreliably documented and inapplicable to most retarded people.

The Court's invalidation of the zoning ordinance in Cleburne must thus rest on an unacknowledged premise, either that minimal scrutiny equal protection analysis (as applied to all state classifications) now requires more clearly demonstrated reasonableness than has heretofore been demanded or that retarded people do warrant some degree of special judicial protection to ensure that differential classifications of them have factual bases beyond "vague, undifferentiated fears."

ROBERT A. BURT
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Disabilities, Rights of Persons With; Disability Discrimination.)

Bibliography

BURT, ROBERT A. 1985 Pennhurst: A Parable. Pages 265–364 in Robert Mnookin, ed., In the Interest of Children. New York: W. H. Freeman.

MERCY KILLING

See: Euthanasia; Right to Die

MERE EVIDENCE RULE

A SEARCH WARRANT must identify the place to be searched and the items to be seized. Such items may include fruits or instrumentalities of crime (such as stolen money or burglar's tools) or contraband (such as illegal drugs). In Gouled v. United States (1921) the Supreme Court held that search warrants could not issue to seize mere EVIDENCE of crime.

In WARDEN V. HAYDEN (1967), however, the Court held that warrants could issue for mere evidence so long as there was a "nexus" between the evidence and the criminal behavior. ZURCHER V. STANFORD DAILY (1978) illustrates the effect of the rule's abandonment. The Stanford University student newspaper published photographs of a campus disturbance between the police and demonstrators. Because the police observed only two of their assailants, a warrant was obtained for a search of the newspaper's offices. The warrant affidavit did not allege any involvement in the unlawful acts by newspaper staff members. During the search, police examined the paper's photographic labs, files, desks, and waste paper baskets. Since no new evidence was discovered, no items were taken.

One commentator has summarized the "mere evidence rule" after Zurcher as follows: Zurcher represents a case in which none of the items searched for by the police was a fruit or instrumentality of a crime, or contraband. Under the pre-Hayden rule, the warrant used in Zurcher could not have been issued. Yet the present broad rule is so well established that the Supreme Court's majority opinion did not even discuss the issue.

CHARLES H. WHITEBREAD
(1986)

Bibliography

WHITEBREAD, CHARLES H. 1980 Criminal Procedure. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

MERITOR SAVINGS BANK, FSB v. VINSON
477 U.S. 57 (1986)

In Meritor the Supreme Court unanimously held that sexual harassment that created a "hostile environment" in the workplace constituted EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION in violation of Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. The Court thus gave its blessing to an interpretation that was already well established in the guidelines of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) and in the lower federal courts.

A woman who had been employed by a bank for four years sued her branch manager and the bank for injunctive relief and for both compensatory and punitive damages, alleging that the manager had demanded and obtained sexual favors from her, including some incidents of forcible rape. She stated that she had not reported these facts to the manager's superiors because she was afraid of her manager. The manager disputed these allegations, and the bank contended that it neither knew nor approved of any sexual harassment by the manager. The bank further argued that the prohibitions of Title VII were limited to discrimination causing economic or tangible loss, not psychological harm.

Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, writing for the Court, rejected the latter argument. Title VII was intended to strike at all disparate treatment of men and women. The EEOC guidelines were also persuasive authority that Title VII is concerned with noneconomic injury. The guidelines had explicitly recognized sexual harassment that creates "an intimidating, hostile, or offensive working environment" to be a form of SEX DISCRIMINATION that violates the act, and lower courts had arrived at a similar interpretation in cases involving both racial harassment and sexual harassment.

Even if the plaintiff's sexual relationship with the manager were "voluntary," the Court said, that is not a defense to a Title VII action; rather, the question is whether the manager's sexual advances were "unwelcome," a determination to be made on the totality of the circumstances shown in the record. The Court declined to rule in the abstract on the question of the bank's liability for the actions of its manager. It followed the EEOC's brief, agreeing that an employer is absolutely liable when a supervisory employee offers economic benefits for sexual favors, but refusing to extend the rule of absolute liability to a "hostile environment" case. The Court also rejected the bank's argument that the mere existence of a grievance procedure insulated it from liability. The issue of the employer's liability, the Court suggested, should first be addressed by the lower courts in the context of specific findings of fact.

Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, writing for four Justices, concurred separately to address the question of employer liability. He would follow the EEOC guidelines on this point. These guidelines went beyond the EEOC's own brief to the Court, making an employer generally responsible for supervisory employees' sexual harassment whether or not that conduct was authorized or forbidden and whether or not the employer knew or should have known of the conduct.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

Bibliography

ABRAMS, KATHRYN 1989 Gender Discrimination and the Transformation of Workplace Norms. Vanderbilt Law Review 42: 1183–1248.

MACKINNON, CATHARINE A. 1979 Sexual Harassment of Working Women. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

METRO BROADCASTING, INC. v. FCC
497 U.S. 547 (1990)

In this decision the Supreme Court, 5–4, upheld two aspects of an AFFIRMATIVE ACTION program approved by Congress in the area of BROADCASTING. In 1986 members of racial and ethnic minorities, who constitute about one-fifth of the nation's population, owned just over two percent of the radio and television broadcasting stations licensed by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). Two FCC policies aim to bring a greater racial and ethnic diversity to broadcast ownership. First, the FCC considers minority ownership as one factor among many in making comparative judgments among applicants for new licenses. Second, the FCC seeks to increase minority ownership through a "distress sale" policy. Normally, a licensee cannot transfer its license during the time when the FCC is considering whether the license should be revoked. As an exception to this policy, such a broadcaster may sell its license before the revocation hearing to a minority-controlled broadcaster that meets the FCC's qualifications, provided that the price does not exceed seventy-five percent of the station's value. Congress, in appropriating money for the FCC, ordered that these programs be continued.

In Metro Broadcasting both of these policies were challenged as denials of the guarantee of EQUAL PROTECTION that the Court has recognized in the Fifth Amendment's DUE PROCESS clause. Writing for the majority, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN strongly emphasized Congress's adoption of the two minority ownership policies. The proper STANDARD OF REVIEW for congressional affirmative action was not STRICT SCRUTINY but the intermediate standard that the Court has previously used, for example, in cases of SEX DISCRIMINATION. This standard requires that Congress have an "important" purpose for its legislation and that the racial classification be "substantially related" to achieving that purpose.

For the majority of the Court, the FCC's policies easily satisfied this test. The interest in diversifying broadcast programming accorded with the long-recognized policy of the Federal Communications Act to ensure the presentation of a wide variety of views. The Supreme Court had recognized this need in the context of the scarcity of electronic frequencies in RED LION BROADCASTING CO. V. FCC (1969), sustaining the FCC's "fairness doctrine." The FCC had quite reasonably determined that racial and ethnic diversity in broadcast ownership would promote diversity in programming, and Congress had repeatedly endorsed this view by rejecting proposals that would arguably reduce opportunities for minority ownership, such as a proposal to deregulate broadcasting. The Court, said Justice Brennan, must give great weight to the joint administrative-congressional determination of a connection between minority ownership and programming diversity. The minority ownership policies did not rest on impermissible stereotyping, but on the need to diversify programming. The FCC had considered other means of achieving this diversification and had reasonably concluded that these means were relatively ineffective. The burden imposed by these two policies on nonminority applicants for broadcast licenses was not impermissibly great.

Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR wrote for the four dissenters. Arguing that any race-conscious program must pass the test of strict scrutiny, she rejected the claim that broadcasting diversity was a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST or even an important one. Furthermore, the policies were not narrowly tailored; they assumed a connection between minority ownership and program content, and they ignored other race-neutral means of assuring programming to serve a diversity of audiences, such as direct regulation of programming.

The importance of Metro Broadcasting as a precedent remains to be seen. Justice Brennan's retirement from the Court may lead to a resurgence of the rhetoric of strict scrutiny, even for congressional programs of affirmative action. However, as Justice O'Connor noted in her concurrence in WYGANT V. JACKSON BOARD OF EDUCATION (1986), the practical difference between compelling and important purposes, or between necessary and substantially related means, may be less than a surface reading of opinions suggests.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

Bibliography

EULE, JULIAN N. 1990 Promoting Speaker Diversity: Austin and Metro Broadcasting. Supreme Court Review 1990:105–132.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE CO. v. WARD
470 U.S. 869 (1985)

This decision departed from a long series of Supreme Court decisions upholding the constitutionality of state taxes against attack under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause. Alabama taxed the gross premiums of insurance companies by imposing a one percent tax on companies organized in Alabama, and a tax of three percent or four percent on companies organized in other states. In an opinion by Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, the Supreme Court held, 5–4, that this discrimination failed even the RATIONAL BASIS test, because its only articulated purpose—to create a tax advantage for domestic economic interests over out-of-state interests—was illegitimate. Congress, in its 1945 act permitting the states to discriminate in favor of local insurance companies, had insulated such laws from attack under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, but had not purported to speak to any issue of equal protection.

In an unusual division of the Court, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR dissented, joined by Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, THURGOOD MARSHALL, and WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST. Justice O'Connor pointed to previous decisions recognizing the legitimacy of state efforts to promote domestic industry, and made the unanswerable point that Alabama's tax scheme was rationally related to such a purpose. Furthermore, she said, Congress in 1945 understood that it was authorizing laws of this very kind. She also accused the majority of reviving active judicial scrutiny of state ECONOMIC REGULATION. Although the latter prediction seems unlikely to come true, the fear that it expresses is not dispelled by the majority's opinion.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

COHEN, WILLIAM 1985 Federalism in Equality Clothing: A Comment on Metropolitan Life Insurance Company v. Ward. Stanford Law Review 38:1–27.

MEYER v. NEBRASKA
262 U.S. 390 (1923)

Meyer represented an early use of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS doctrine to defend personal liberties, as distinguished from economic ones. Nebraska, along with other states, had prohibited the teaching of modern foreign languages to grade school children. Meyer, who taught German in a Lutheran school, was convicted under this law. The Supreme Court, 7–2, held the law unconstitutional. Justice JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS wrote for the Court in Meyer and in four companion cases from Iowa, Ohio, and Nebraska. Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, joined by Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND, dissented in all but the Ohio cases.

McReynolds began with a broad reading of the "liberty" protected by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT: "it denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint, but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and, generally, to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men." State regulation of this liberty must be reasonably related to a proper state objective; the legislature's view of reasonableness was "subject to supervision by the courts." The legislative purpose to promote assimilation and "civic development" was readily appreciated, given the hostility toward our adversaries in World War I. However, "no adequate reason" justified interfering with Meyer's liberty to teach or the liberty of parents to employ him during a "time of peace and domestic tranquillity."

Holmes concurred in the Ohio cases, because Ohio had singled out the German language for suppression. But he could not say it was unreasonable for a state to forbid teaching foreign languages to young children as a means of assuring that all citizens might "speak a common tongue." Because "men might reasonably differ" on the question, the laws were not unconstitutional.

Meyer was thus a child of LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), taking Lochner's broad view of the judicial role in protecting liberty. Yet, although substantive due process has lost its former vitality in the field of ECONOMIC REGULATION, Meyer's precedent remains vigorous in the defense of personal liberty. Meyer was reaffirmed in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), LOVING V. VIRGINIA (1967), and ZABLICKI V. REDHAIL (1978), three modern decisions protecting the FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MIAMI HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY v. TORNILLO
418 U.S. 241 (1974)

It may be argued that FREEDOM OF SPEECH is meaningless unless it includes access to the mass media so that the speech will be heard. Here the Supreme Court unanimously struck down a Florida statute requiring a newspaper to provide a political candidate free space to reply to its attacks on his personal character. Noting that the statute infringed upon "editorial control and judgment," the Court held that "any [governmental] compulsion to publish that which 'reason' tells . . . [the editors] . . . should not be published is unconstitutional."

Tornillo was a major blow to proponents of a right of access. When compared to RED LION BROADCASTING COMPANY V. FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION (1969), it raises the question whether the FIRST AMENDMENT provides greater protection for the press than for the electronic media. In light of the large number of one-newspaper towns, the scarcity rationale for allowing government to compel access to broadcast channels would seem to apply even more strongly to the print media. Ultimately the distinction may be between the public ownership of the channels and the private ownership of the print media. If so, the Court has not explained or defended this linking of speech rights to property rights.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

MICHAEL M. v. SUPERIOR COURT
450 U.S. 464 (1981)

A boy of 17 was convicted of rape under a California statute making it a crime for a male to have intercourse with a female under 18; the girl's age was 16. A fragmented Supreme Court voted 5–4 to uphold the conviction against the contention that the statute's SEX DISCRIMINATION—the same act was criminal for a male but not for a female—denied the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.

There was no opinion for the Court. The majority Justices, however, agreed in accepting the California Supreme Court's justification for the law: prevention of illegitimate teen-age pregnancies. The risk of pregnancy itself, said Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, served to deter young females from sexual encounters; criminal sanctions on young males only would roughly "equalize" deterrents.

The dissenters argued that California had not demonstrated its law to be a deterrent; thirty-seven states had adopted gender-neutral statutory rape laws, no doubt on the theory that such laws would provide even more deterrent, by doubling the number of persons subject to arrest. When both parties to an act are equally guilty, argued Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, to make the male guilty of a FELONY while allowing the female to go free is supported by little more than "traditional attitudes toward male-female relations."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MICHELIN TIRE COMPANY v. ADMINISTRATOR OF WAGES
423 U.S. 276 (1976)

Opening the way for increased local revenue, a unanimous Court overruled Low v. Austin (1872) and sustained a state property tax on imported goods even though they retained their character as imports. The Court held that the IMPORT-EXPORT CLAUSE did not prohibit such a tax if it were imposed without discrimination on all goods in the state.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Original Package Doctrine.)

MICHIGAN v. LONG

See: Adequate State Grounds; Stop and Frisk

MICHIGAN v. SUMMERS
452 U.S. 692 (1981)

A 6–3 Supreme Court held that if the police had a valid warrant to search a home for illegal drugs, they had authority to detain the occupants of the premises during the search. They could therefore lawfully require a suspect to remain in the house, arrest him after finding the contraband, and search his person incident to the arrest. The dissenters argued that the FOURTH AMENDMENT prevented the police from seizing a person without PROBABLE CAUSE in order to make him available for arrest should probable cause be revealed by the search.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MICHIGAN DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE v. SITZ
496 U.S. 444 (1990)

Recent FOURTH AMENDMENT cases reflect a pattern of rejection by the Supreme Court of claims based on the right against unreasonable SEARCH AND SEIZURE. This case fits that pattern, yet the decision of the Court seems right.

Because of the slaughter on public highways caused by drunk drivers, the Michigan State Police instituted a program of sobriety checkpoints. All drivers passing through a checkpoint, usually after midnight, were stopped and examined briefly for signs of intoxication. Suspected drunk drivers were directed out of the flow of traffic for further investigation; all others were permitted to continue. The average stop took twenty-five seconds.

A 6–3 Supreme Court held that although the stop was a seizure in the sense of the Fourth Amendment, it was a reasonable one because the intrusion was slight and served a substantial public interest. The dissenters, led by Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, believed that the intrusion violated the Fourth Amendment. Much of Steven's opinion challenged the wisdom of the legislative policy authorizing the sobriety-checkpoint program. His challenge to its constitutionality was founded on the absurd proposition that "unannounced investigatory seizures are, particularly when they take place at night, the hallmarks of regimes far different from ours," and he referred to Nazi Germany. Moreover, Stevens weakened his argument based on the Fourth Amendment by offering the opinion that a permanent, nondiscretionary checkpoint program would not violate the amendment. He supposed that a state could condition the use of its roads on the uniform administration of a breathalizer test to all drivers, thereby keeping drunks off the roads.

The intrusiveness of the means upheld by the Court's majority, led by Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, was considerably less than that of the means favored by Stevens. In addition, the majority did not debate the wisdom of the policy before it. Its deference to the legislature seemed submissive, however, and its constitutional analysis stopped when it took notice of the twenty-five-second intrusion.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

MIDDENDORF v. HENRY
425 U.S. 25 (1976)

A 5–3 Supreme Court ruled that servicemen have no RIGHT TO COUNSEL in summary courts-martial. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST's majority opinion concluded that such proceedings did not constitute criminal prosecutions within the Sixth Amendment's guarantee, and he also disposed of a Fifth Amendment DUE PROCESS claim as without merit.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

MIFFLIN, THOMAS
(1744–1800)

General Thomas Mifflin, a wealthy Philadelphia Quaker, was a member of the Pennsylvania Assembly and of the First and Second Continental Congresses before serving as quartermaster general of the Army (1775–1778). He was elected to Congress in 1782, and in 1783 became President of the United States in Congress Assembled. Mifflin was speaker of the Pennsylvania Assembly in 1787, when he was chosen as chairman of his state's delegation to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. The records of the convention do not indicate that Mifflin ever spoke in the debates, although he did sign the Constitution. In 1790 he presided over the state CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. He served as governor of Pennsylvania from 1790 to 1799, a period that included the WHISKEY REBELLION.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

ROSSITER, CLINTON 1966 1787: The Grand Convention. New York: Macmillan.

MILITARY AND THE CONSTITUTION

See: Armed Forces; Military Justice; Sexual Orientation and the Armed Forces

MILITARY JUSTICE

The Constitution, in language taken from the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, empowers Congress to "make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces." Congress has enacted Articles of War and Articles for the Government of the Navy since 1775, but in 1950 the two systems were fused in the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).

Criminal justice under the UCMJ resembles that in civilian courts more than it differs. As in most states, the type of trial court depends on the gravity of the offense. Petty offenses are dealt with by nonjudicial punishment or summary court-martial; more serious offenses may be tried before a special or general court-martial. The types of court-martial differ in number of members and in the maximum punishment they may impose. The rules of EVIDENCE are about the same as in the federal courts; and a defendant tried by a special or general court-martial enjoys the RIGHT TO COUNSEL at government expense. The Supreme Court held in Middendorf v. Henry (1976) that the right to free counsel does not apply in summary courts-martial, which more closely resemble administrative hearings than criminal trials.

The major difference between military and civilian criminal justice is the absence of a jury. The members of the court are appointed by the convening authority, who can, theoretically, "pack the court." However, the accused can avoid the possibility of command influence by electing trial by a military judge sitting alone, who is responsible only to the Judge Advocate General of his service. When the military judge sits with members of a court-martial his role is like that of a civilian judge, except that the members determine the sentence if the accused is convicted. There is an elaborate system of review but, except in a limited class of cases, APPEAL to the Court of Military Appeals (three civilian judges appointed by the President) is not by right.

The UCMJ does not provide for review by any civilian court: findings and sentences of courts-martial, as affirmed under the code, are "final and conclusive" and "binding upon all . . . courts . . . of the United States." The Supreme Court has always held that, absent provision by Congress, there can be no direct appeal from the decisions of military tribunals. The federal courts have, however, developed several techniques of collateral review—notably HABEAS CORPUS, MANDAMUS, and suits for back pay in the COURT OF CLAIMS—which effectively ensure that military courts are subject to constitutional supervision.

The federal courts had long collaterally reviewed court-martial convictions to ensure that there was JURISDICTION over person, offense, and sentence. The Supreme Court after World War II imposed new limits on court-martial jurisdiction over person and offense. In the UCMJ, courts-martial were granted jurisdiction over many categories of civilians, including honorably discharged servicemen and civilians accompanying the armed forces outside the United States. In a series of decisions, including UNITED STATES EX REL. TOTH V. QUARLES (1955) and REID V. COVERT (1956), the Supreme Court held that a court-martial could not constitutionally try any civilian in peacetime. There are still some gray areas, such as jurisdiction over retired regulars and certain reservists.

Thereafter the Court held that a court-martial could not constitutionally try a member of the armed forces for an offense that had no "service connection"; the leading case, O'Callahan v. Parker (1969), involved the attempted rape of a civilian by a soldier off-post, on leave, and out of uniform. Despite a subsequent decision in which the Court suggested a dozen factors to be considered in determining whether a crime was "service-connected," there are still many doubtful cases, particularly those involving off-post use or possession of drugs. The Court of Military Appeals and the inferior federal courts have made two exceptions to the requirement of service connection. Considering that O'Callahan was based on the loss of TRIAL BY JURY, they have permitted courts-martial to try offenses regardless of service connection committed outside the jurisdiction of American civilian courts or punishable by not more than six months' confinement, so that the accused would not in any case be constitutionally entitled to a jury.

Until after World War II the BILL OF RIGHTS had no application to courts-martial: if jurisdiction existed over person, offense, and sentence, federal courts would not consider allegations of even the grossest unfairness. Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE, concurring in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), declared that "the power of Congress, in the government of the land and naval forces, is not affected by the fifth or any other amendment." Historical evidence concerning the framers of the Bill of Rights justifies Chase's dictum: President JAMES MADISON, for example, approved the conviction of General William Hull in 1814, although the court-martial had denied Hull's request for the assistance of counsel.

The Supreme Court has never set aside a court-martial conviction for denial of constitutional DUE PROCESS, but it would almost certainly do so if confronted with a clear case of such denial. No such case has yet reached the Court because the protections of the Bill of Rights (except trial by jury and the right to BAIL) are embodied in the UCMJ. A coerced confession, for example, would violate not only the Fifth Amendment but also the UCMJ and thus constitute a denial of "military due process." In addition the Court of Military Appeals has consistently construed the UCMJ in such a way as to avoid conflict with the Supreme Court's construction of the Constitution. Military exigency may, however, justify some relaxation of civilian standards. Military rulings on constitutional issues must conform to Supreme Court standards, absent a showing that special military conditions require a different rule. Thus PARKER V. LEVY (1974) held that the "general articles" which prohibit "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman" and "disorders and neglects to the prejudice of good order and discipline" are not unconstitutionally vague or overbroad.

JOSEPH W. BISHOP, JR.
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Armed Forces.)

Bibliography

BISHOP, JOSEPH W., JR. 1974 Justice under Fire: A Study of Military Law. Chaps. 2, 3, 4. New York: Charterhouse.

WIENER, FREDERICK BERNAYS 1958 Courts-Martial and the Bill of Rights: The Original Practice. Harvard Law Review 72:1–49, 266–304.

MILITARY RECONSTRUCTION ACTS
15 Stat. 2 (1867)
15 Stat. 14 (1867)

The first Military Reconstruction Act established procedures for the resumption of self-government and normalized constitutional status for ten states of the former Confederacy. Though it preserved extant governments intact for the time being, it authorized military peacekeeping and required adoption of new state constitutions. It also mandated black suffrage.

By February 1867, congressional Republicans realized that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, even if ratified, constituted an insufficient program of RECONSTRUCTION. They were unwilling to accept the forfeited-rights theory of southern state status propounded by Rep. THADDEUS STEVENS, or to sanction indefinite military governance. However, the intransigence of President ANDREW JOHNSON and the Machiavellian politics of congressional Democrats, who both demanded immediate and unconditional restoration of white rule in the South, convinced the Republicans that federal supervision of the process of recreating state governments was essential if the freedmen and Republican war objectives were not to be abandoned.

The first Military Reconstruction Act divided the ex-Confederate states (Tennessee excepted) into five military districts each under the command of a regular brigadier general, who was charged with peacekeeping responsibilities. He was empowered to use either ordinary civilian officials or military commissions to accomplish this objective. Though the commissions were authorized to overrule civilian authorities if necessary, the act did not replace the state governments previously created under presidential authority. Rather, under the first and subsequent Military Reconstruction Acts (1867–1868), the commanding general was required to call for the election of delegates to CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS. In these elections, blacks were entitled to vote, and whites disfranchised by the Fourteenth Amendment were excluded. The new state constitution had to enfranchise blacks. When it was ratified by a majority of eligible voters, elections were to be held under it for new state governmental officials. Only then would the existing governments cede authority. The new legislature had to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment and present its state constitution to Congress. Congress would then complete the process by admitting the state's congressional delegation to their seats.

President Johnson vetoed the first measure, asserting several grounds for its unconstitutionality. First, it imposed an "absolute domination of military rulers" whose "mere will is to take the place of all law," subjecting the southern people to "abject slavery." Second, Congress lacked power to impose governments on the southern states, particularly because those states remained part of the Union. Third, the act would deny individual liberties, including the requirements of TRIAL BY JURY, warrants, DUE PROCESS, and HABEAS CORPUS. Johnson also opposed the measure because the requirements of black suffrage would "Africanize the southern part of our territory," and, finally, because the anomalous status of the ten states which had been denied representation in Congress since 1865 cast a cloud over legislation affecting them. Congress immediately overrode the veto.

Under the procedure specified by the Military Reconstruction Acts, all southern states were reorganized and readmitted between 1868 and 1870. The military presence remained for nearly another decade, however, because of turbulence caused by antiblack and anti-Unionist terrorism. The Republican governments established under congressional Reconstruction were overthrown by "Conservative" or "Redeemer" white-supremacist Democratic regimes by 1877, when the process of Reconstruction was effectively terminated.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Constitutional History, 1865–1877.)

MILITIAS, MODERN

The mid-1990s have included the presence in American political life of paramilitary "militia movements" organized, by their lights, to serve as the first line of defense against the loss of basic constitutional freedoms. Their opponents altogether plausibly describe them as ultrachauvinistic, often racist, radical movements based largely in rural America and threatened by the modern bureaucratic state, general social developments within American society, and the implications of an increasingly globalized political economy. From this perspective, they are far more likely to be threats to, rather than defenders of, constitutional liberty.

What entitles these modern militias to a place in a book on the U.S. Constitution is their claim to be the entities protected by the very words of the SECOND AMENDMENT: "A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed." That is, members of organized militias describe themselves as precisely those persons explicitly protected against federal (and, through the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, state) regulation of the private possession of firearms.

Their opponents instead argue that the amendment's reference to "a well regulated Militia" limits any constitutional protection to an official militia organized and regulated by states themselves. The modern militia movement, on the other hand, has no ties with any formal government and therefore has no special constitutional protection.

An 1886 decision by the Supreme Court, Presser v. Illinois, offers some support for this view, inasmuch as it upheld an Illinois law prohibiting "any body of men whatever, other than the regular organized volunteer militia of the State, and the troops of the United States . . . to drill or parade with arms in any city, or town, of this State, without the license of the Governor thereof." The Court, however, also rejected the applicability of the Second Amendment to the states at all—this was well before the Court began "incorporating" the BILL OF RIGHTS against the states—so it is not dispositive as to the meaning of the amendment, though it would occasion great surprise if the modern Court were in fact to deviate from the Presser DOCTRINE. (A number of western states have adopted similar prohibitions of military training.)

Still, defenders of the legal rights of the modern militia movement would undoubtedly note that "militia," as an eighteenth-century term of art, referred to a group considerably broader than a discrete body of citizens organized into a state-regulated body. No less a worthy than George Mason, one of the primary advocates of a Bill of Rights—indeed, he refused to sign the Constitution because it lacked one—wrote "Who are the Militia? They consist now of the whole people." He was not alone in this view, and many discussants at the time distinguished the "general militia" from a "select militia." Given that one of the reasons to protect the right to bear arms was a profound fear of a corrupt state, they would scarcely have been happy with a definition of militia that protected only those deemed worthy by the state itself.

These arguments are scarcely frivolous, as an intellectual matter, but it is impossible, as a practical matter, to believe that mainstream legal analysts able to gain nomination and confirmation to the federal courts will be receptive to them. Instead, one can fairly confidently predict that the judiciary will be no more willing to interpret the Second Amendment in ways that would protect members of the militia movement than were judges to interpret the considerably clearer words of the FIRST AMENDMENT in the 1950s to protect members of the Communist Party. Those viewed by the mass public as genuine security threats will rarely be protected by the judiciary, regardless of constitutional language.

SANFORD LEVINSON
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Incorporation Doctrine; Radical Constitutional Interpretation; Right of Revolution.)

Bibliography

KONIAK, SUSAN 1996 When Law Risks Madness. Cardozo Studies in Law & Literature 8:65–107.

MALCOLM, JOYCE 1994 To Keep and Bear Arms: The Origins of an Anglo American Right. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

WILLIAMS, DAVID C. 1996 The Militia Movement and the Second Amendment Revolution: Conjuring with the People. Cornell Law Review 81:879–952.

MILKOVICH v. LORAIN JOURNAL CO.
497 U.S. 1 (1990)

This is a major free press case that has been widely misunderstood, especially by the news media. The Los Angeles Times, for example, called it a "huge setback" for freedom of the press. Under the heading, "Supreme Court Strips Away 'Opinion' as Libel Defense," the Times announced that the Court had unanimously demolished "a widely used media defense against libel suits, ruling that a writer or speaker may be sued for statements that express opinion." The Times censured the Court for having acted "with astonishing recklessness . . . when it overturned nearly two decades of precedent and ruled that the First Amendment does not automatically protect expressions of opinion from being found libelous." A dramatic increase in LIBEL litigation was foreseen as a result of the Court's chilling just the sort of "serious speech the First Amendment was intended to protect." Every critic, editorialist, cartoonist, and commentator faced trial, the Times predicted.

In fact, the Court did not diminish the First Amendment's protection of opinion and overruled no precedents, let alone two decades of them. It did hold, however, that opinion requires no new constitutional protection because the conventional safeguards of freedom of expression adequately protect opinion in libel cases. It held, too, that if an expression of opinion implied an assertion of objective fact on a matter of public concern, no liability for defamation would exist unless the party bringing suit proved that the publication was false and published with malice in the case of a public official or a PUBLIC FIGURE, or false and published with "some level of fault" in the case of a private individual involved in a matter of public concern.

In this case, the publication accused a private individual of perjuring himself in a judicial proceeding on a matter of public concern, but the accusation was couched in terms of opinion, for example, "anyone who attended the [wrestling] meet . . . knows in his heart that [Coach] Milkovich . . . lied at the hearing." Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, for the Court, observed that the writer should not escape liability merely because he used words such as "I think," because he might do as much damage to an individual's reputation as he would by saying flatly that he had lied.

The publishing company sought a special rule distinguishing "fact" from "opinion" and exempting opinion from the law of libel. This is what the Court refused to do because some opinions connoted facts for which their authors ought to be responsible. The Court made clear, however, that "a statement of opinion relating to a matter of public concern which does not contain a provably false factual connotation will receive full constitutional protection."

Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and THURGOOD MARSHALL dissented, but only on the question as to whether the publisher in this case should be held accountable for libel. Significantly, Brennan, who was the Court's foremost exponent of FREEDOM OF THE PRESS in libel cases, declared that Rehnquist addressed the issue of First Amendment protection of opinion "cogently and almost entirely correctly. I agree with the Court that . . . only defamatory statements that are capable of being proved false are subject to liability under state libel law." Thus, the Court did not diminish constitutional protections of opinion and held, properly, that existing First Amendment doctrines adequately served to insulate from libel prosecutions the expression of sheer opinion in matters of public interest.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

MILL AND FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

Chapter Two of John Stuart Mill's On Liberty, first published in 1859, remains to this day the classic exposition of the liberal argument for FREEDOM OF SPEECH. Mill wrote the essay with the active collaboration of his wife Harriet Taylor, who died during the interval between its original composition and publication. Although the argument purports to rest on a utilitarian claim regarding the net consequences of unregulated expression, his treatment of the subject can be read instead as grounded in the character ideal of the inquisitive, open-minded person, an ideal that might justify a policy of toleration independent of any empirical calculation of collective consequences.

Mill wrote On Liberty at what he perceived to be the dawn of the age of mass society, in the wake of the Industrial Revolution and the most significant broadening of the franchise in English history. In the essay he identifies the greatest threat to liberty to be not the transgressions of tyrants or corrupt factions but rather laws and informal social sanctions supported by large popular majorities. He considered the spirit of his age to be inhospitable to independent thought and unconventional experiments in living. He lamented that mid-Victorian England had become a nation of timid, complacent, constricted persons, conformist in outlook and suspicious of innovators. He urged a robust principle of free expression, together with a more general principle of liberty, as an antidote.

Mill's treatment of the liberty of thought and discussion considers the reasons for tolerating speech under three different assumptions regarding its truth. First, an unconventional idea, at risk of suppression by means of legal or social sanctions, might be true. Second, it might be wholly false. Third, it might be partly true and partly false.

If an idea is true, there is an obvious case for letting it circulate. However, why should would-be regulators be guided by this possibility in the case of heretical ideas they know with great confidence to be false? Mill responds that such confidence is frequently misplaced. To act on it is to assume one's infallibility. Mill's point is more empirical than logical. Proponents of speech regulation usually concede the logical possibility that ideas they hold to be true could be false, and vice versa. But they seldom, in particular instances, give credence to that possibility for the purpose of guiding their actions. Mill finds this troubling because he is impressed by how regularly the conventional wisdom of one time and place is seen by later ages and different peoples to be the sheerest folly. In On Liberty he catalogues many such dramatic alterations of understanding, including the modern assessment in retrospect of the executions of Socrates and Christ, and of the persecution of the early Christians by the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, one of the wisest, most learned men of his day.

In the course of urging a greater appreciation of the possibility that heretical ideas might actually be true, Mill addresses the argument that truth has inherent power to prevail over falsehood. If so, the costs of suppressing nascent true ideas would be only temporary, and the fact that a widely held belief has gained adherents over time would be strong evidence of its validity. Mill denies that truth has any such inherent power to prevail: "the dictum that truth always triumphs over persecution is one of those pleasant falsehoods which men repeat after one another till they pass into commonplaces, but which all experience refutes." The only advantage truth possesses, he asserts, is that a suppressed true idea may be rediscovered at a later time when conditions for its reception are more favorable.

A final argument for suppressing heretical ideas even if they might be true is that the received wisdom may be socially useful independent of its truth value. Mill is scornful of this notion. He asserts that an idea's social utility depends to a large extent, even if not exclusively, on its truth. We cannot assess the usefulness of an idea if we cannot consider reasons why it may not be true.

Mill does not deny that the received wisdom could in fact be true. Indeed, among the strongest arguments in On Liberty are those that proceed from the assumption that the ideas society wishes to suppress are wholly false. Mill concedes that a society's confidence in its most cherished tenets could strengthen the capacity to act on those beliefs. He maintains, however, that such confidence flows not from the suppression of false ideas but from the willingness to consider all points of view, and from the consequent perception that the best that could be said in opposition to the received wisdom has been articulated and found wanting.

Not only confidence but lively understanding ensues from the experience of fending off the challenges of dissenters, Mill claims. He decries "the deep slumber of a decided opinion" and asserts that in the absence of controversy "teachers and learners go to sleep at their post." He notes that Cicero claimed to study the arguments of his opponents with much greater care and imagination than he devoted to learning his own side of a case. Mill recommends that practice for those engaged in truth seeking as well as forensics. He goes so far as to say that we ought to thank someone who has produced a skillful challenge to our beliefs, for such a person has done for us that which we otherwise should feel the need to do on our own.

Most ideas at risk of legal or social suppression, Mill observes, are neither wholly true nor wholly false but rather contain a mixture of truth and falsity. It is important that such ideas be allowed to circulate because they contribute to the process of adaptation. Wisdom is not so much a matter of demonstrative proof or refutation but of finding the right balance between "the standing antagonisms of practical life"—between, for example, stability and reform, cooperation and competition, luxury and abstinence, or liberty and discipline. Progress ordinarily entails the replacement of one partial truth with another that is somewhat better adapted to its time.

Although his critics sometimes accuse him of intellectual elitism, Mill himself considered his principle of liberty to be for the masses. It is not, he says, "to form great thinkers that freedom of thinking is required. On the contrary, it is as much, and even more indispensable, to enable average human beings to attain the mental stature which they are capable of." Progress is most often achieved, he maintains, when "the dread of heterodox speculation is for a time suspended" and "the yoke of authority" is broken. Only then, will "the mind of a people" be stirred up from its foundations so as to raise "even persons of the most ordinary intellect to something of the dignity of thinking beings."

Mill did not advocate an unqualified freedom of expression. "[E]ven opinions lose their immunity," he says, "when the circumstances in which they are expressed are such as to constitute their expression a positive instigation to some mischievous act." He offered an example to illustrate the limits of his principle: "An opinion that corn-dealers are starvers of the poor, or that private property is robbery, ought to be unmolested when simply circulated through the press, but may justly incur punishment when delivered orally to an excited mob assembled before the house of a corn-dealer, or when handed about among the same mob in the form of a placard."

Mill's discussion of the liberty of thought and expression constitutes just one part of his comprehensive treatment of the subject of liberty. The full essay On Liberty, he states in the introduction, is designed to assert "one very simple principle." He describes that principle as follows: "The only purpose for which power can rightfully be exercised over any member of a civilized community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others." Given the centrality of this harm principle to Mill's overall project, it is perhaps surprising that his discussion of free speech does not explore the various ways that expression and communication might cause harm. This omission has led some observers to conclude that his argument for free speech has more to do with a claim about the irreducible attributes of personhood or the essential conditions for human flourishing than with any sort of balanced calculation of consequences. Although Mill disclaims any reliance on the notion of NATURAL RIGHT, his emphasis on individual character and on "the liberty of conscience, in the most comprehensive sense" suggests that he wished to protect free speech not because he thought it does no or little harm but because he considered it fundamental to life itself.

VINCENT BLASI
(2000)

Bibliography

BERLIN, ISAIAH 1969 John Stuart Mill and the Ends of Life. In Four Essays on Liberty. London: Oxford University Press.

MCCLOSKEY, H. J. 1970 Liberty of Expression: Its Grounds and Limits. Inquiry 13:219–237.

STEPHEN, JAMES FITZJAMES 1873 Liberty, Equality, Fraternity. New York: Holt & Williams.

WALDRON, JEREMY 1992 Mill and the Value of Moral Distress. In Liberal Rights. Cambridge, Eng.: Cambridge University Press.

MILLER, SAMUEL F.
(1816–1890)

Samuel Freeman Miller was a towing figure on the Supreme Court from his appointment by ABRAHAM LINCOLN in 1862 until his death in 1890. He sat with four Chief Justices, participated in more than 5,000 decisions of the Court, and was its spokesman in ninety-five cases involving construction of the Constitution. No previous member of the Court had written as many constitutional opinions.

Miller's contemporaries regarded him as one of the half-dozen great Justices in American history, a remarkable achievement for a self-educated lawyer who had never held public office, either in his native Kentucky or in adopted Iowa, prior to his appointment to the Court. Justice HORACE GRAY claimed that if his legal training had been less "unsystematic and deficient," Miller would have been "second only to [JOHN] MARSHALL."

Miller looked and acted the part of a great magistrate. He was tall and massive; he had a warm, unaffected disposition and was said to be "as ready to talk to a hod-carrier as to a cardinal." His instinct for what he often called "the main points, the controlling questions," his impatience with antique learning and philosophical abstraction, and his unrivaled reputation for industry, integrity, and independence all enhanced his stature. Candor and intellectual self-reliance pervaded his opinions, and he often stated quite bluntly his assumption that law and practical good sense were of one piece: "This is the honest and fair view of the subject, and we think it conflicts with no rule of law" (Pettigrew v. United States, 1878); "if this is not DUE PROCESS OF LAW it ought to be" (Davidson v. New Orleans, 1878); "this is just and sound policy" (Iron Silver Mining Co. v. Campbell, 1890).

Statecraft rather than formal jurisprudence was Miller's forte, and he emerged as the Court's balance-wheel soon after coming to the bench. His career ultimately spanned three tumultuous decades in which the Justices constantly quarreled, often rancorously, about the scope of federal and state powers and the Court's role in protecting private rights against the alleged usurpations of both. Scores of cases involved highly charged political issues. Yet Miller always remained detached. He never permitted differences of opinion to affect personal relations with his brethren; he met counsels of heat and passion with chilly distaste. Miller's capacity for detachment was, in part, a matter of personality. But it was also a function of his modest view of the Court's role in the American system of government. He resisted doctrinal formulations that curtailed the discretion of other lawmakers, spoke self-consciously about "my conservative habit of deciding no more than is necessary in any case," and often succeeded in accommodating warring factions of more doctrinaire colleagues by narrowing the issue before the Court. As early as 1870, Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE said he was "beyond question, the dominant personality upon the bench."

The first principles of Miller's constitutional understanding were derived from HENRY CLAY and the Whig party. Although he abandoned the Whigs for the Republican party in 1854, Miller never ceased to regard Clay as the quintessential American statesman or to reaffirm the Kentucky sage's belief in a BROAD CONSTRUCTION of national powers, the primacy of the legislative department in shaping public policy, and the duty of government at all levels to encourage material growth. Miller's adherence to the first two principles was especially apparent in his work on the CHASE COURT. In EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), he joined the minority of four, concurring, who suggested that Congress might constitutionally have established martial rule in Indiana. And in Tyler v. Defrees (1870), a confiscation case, Miller flatly rejected the doctrine "long inculcated, that the Federal Government, however strong in a conflict with a foreign foe, lies manacled by the Constitution and helpless at the feet of a domestic enemy." Early in 1868, when the movement to impeach President ANDREW JOHNSON gathered momentum and the Court initially established jurisdiction in EX PARTE MCCARDLE, Miller conceded privately that "in the threatened collision between the Legislative branch of the government and the Executive and judicial branches I see consequences from which the cause of free government may never recover in my day." He added, however, that "the worst feature I now see is the passion which governs the hour in all parties and persons who have a controlling influence." In contrast, Miller not only counseled caution and delay while Congress proceeded to divest the Court of jurisdiction over McCardle but also dissented in TEXAS V. WHITE (1869). He regarded the status of states still undergoing military reconstruction as a POLITICAL QUESTION which only Congress could decide. Hepburn v. Griswold (1870), the first of the LEGAL TENDER CASES, evoked his most celebrated defense of congressional authority. There Miller sharply criticized the majority's reliance on the "spirit" of the Constitution, which, he insisted, "substitutes . . . an undefined code of ethics for the Constitution, and a court of justice for the National Legislature. . . . Where there is a choice of means, the selection is for Congress, not the Court."

Miller was not always such a positivist in rejecting considerations arising from the spirit of the Constitution. In the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873), which came up during fierce public debate over the Enforcement and Klu Klux Klan Acts, Miller intervened decisively to preserve "the main features" of the federal system. Although the powers of Congress were not directly at issue, his opinion for the Court undercut every FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT theory that had been advanced in other cases to justify federal jurisdiction over perpetrators of racially motivated private violence. The Fourteenth Amendment's PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause, Miller explained for a majority of five, protected only the handful of rights that necessarily grew out of "the relationship between the citizen and the national government." The really fundamental privileges and immunities of CITIZENSHIP, including the rights to protection by the government, to own property, and to contract, still remained what they had been since 1789—rights of state citizenship. To bring all CIVIL RIGHTS under the umbrella of national citizenship, Miller concluded, would be "so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions" and would so "fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress" that it should not be permitted "in the absence of language which expresses such purpose too clearly to admit of doubt."

Over the succeeding seventeen years, Miller's voting record in civil rights cases remained consistent with the views he expounded in 1873. He joined the majority in UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876) and the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883), both of which severely reduced the range of "appropriate legislation" Congress was authorized to enact; he voted to invalidate the Ku Klux Klan Act altogether in UNITED STATES V. HARRIS (1883). In EX PARTE YARBROUGH (1884), an important Enforcement Act case, Miller consolidated his formal approach to protecting civil rights in a federal system. Speaking for a unanimous Court, he sustained federal jurisdiction over persons who violently interfered with the exercise of VOTING RIGHTS in a federal election. Congress's authority to reach private action in Yarbrough, he explained, flowed not from the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT but from both its power to regulate the time, place, and manner of federal elections and its duty "to provide, in an election held under its authority, for security of life and limbs to the voter." By emphasizing the national ramifications of private action in Yarbrough, Miller managed to distinguish Cruikshank in much the same way that he had distinguished between rights of national citizenship and rights of state citizenship in the Slaughterhouse Cases. Both formulations were designed to set principled limits to the exercise of Congress's affirmative powers to protect civil rights.

The impulse to preserve "the main features" of the federal system also shaped Miller's work in cases involving governmental interventions in economic life. He was certainly not immune to the laissez-faire ethos of the late nineteenth century, and his opinion for the Court in LOAN ASSOCIATION V. TOPEKA (1875) has long been regarded as one of the most significant expressions of natural law constitutionalism in American history and as an important building block in the growth of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. There he held that a contract for $100,000 in municipal bonds, issued to lure a manufacturing firm to Topeka, was unenforceable. The people's tax dollars, he proclaimed, could not "be used for purposes of private interest instead of public use." Yet Miller resisted the urge, spearheaded by Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD, to link the "public use" principle with the Fourteenth Amendment and the concept of "general jurisprudence" in order to limit the exercise of all the states' inherent powers—police, taxation, and eminent domain.

The sweeping doctrines advanced by Field and other doctrinaire advocates of laissez-faire conflicted with three working principles of Miller's constitutional understanding, each of which militated against dramatic enlargement of federal judicial power at the expense of the states. The first was his Whiggish predisposition to allow state governments ample room to channel economic activity and develop resources for the general good. A broad construction of the Fourteenth Amendment, he asserted in the Slaughterhouse Cases, "would constitute this Court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States" and generate state inaction, even in the face of clear public interests, for fear of endless litigation. Miller also believed that it was not the function of federal courts to sit in judgment on state courts expounding state law. He repeatedly invoked this second working principle in the long line of cases that began with GELPCKE V. DUBUQUE (1864). There the Court insisted that municipal bonds issued to subsidize railroad construction were unquestionably for a "public use" despite recent state court decisions to the contrary. The Gelpcke majority defended federal judicial intervention on the ground that municipal bonds were a species of commercial paper and therefore the question of bondholder rights "belong[ed] to the domain of general jurisprudence." Miller dissented. In his view, extension of the principle of SWIFT V. TYSON (1842) to the construction of state statute law was an unconscionable act of federal usurpation, and he accurately predicted that it would spawn a generation of conflict between federal courts and recalcitrant state and local officials.

The apparent inconsistency between Miller's opinion in Loan Association v. Topeka and his stance in the Slaughterhouse Cases and in the Gelpcke line of municipal-bond cases is readily explained. All of them did raise similar conceptual issues; each hinged, in part, on the application of the "public use" principle to governmental aid of private enterprise in the form of either monopoly grants or cash subsidies. But for Miller, if not for his colleagues, the controlling factor in Loan Association v. Topeka was that it had been tried under the DIVERSITY JURISDICTION of a federal court, and pertinent state law had not yet been framed on the subject. As a result, Miller later explained in Davidson v. New Orleans (1878), the Court had been free to invoke "principles of general constitutional law" which the Kansas court was equally free to adopt or reject in subsequent cases involving similar circumstances. The concepts of substantive due process and "general jurisprudence," on the other hand, failed to maintain the ample autonomy for state governments which Miller regarded as an indispensable component of the American polity.

Miller ultimately failed to stave off the luxuriation of substantive due process, just as he had failed to curb the majority's impulse to invoke Swift in the municipal-bond cases. "It is in vain to contend with judges who have been at the bar the advocates for forty years of rail road companies, and all the forms of associated capital," he told his brother-in-law late in 1875. "I am losing interest in these matters. I will do my duty but will fight no more." Yet Miller's views did make a difference, particularly in the conference room. What remained influential was Miller's third working principle of constitutional interpretation. He recommended resistance to Field's syllogistic reasoning and quest for immutable principles; he suggested, instead, that once the Court had determined to protect private rights against state interference, it was best to decide cases on the narrowest possible grounds, to employ open-ended doctrinal formulas amenable to subsequent alteration, and to elaborate the meaning of due process through what he called a "gradual process of inclusion and exclusion." Thus Miller described local aid of manufactures as "robbery" in Loan Association v. Topeka, but he added that "it may not be easy to draw the line in all cases so as to decide what is a public use in this sense and what is not." He also endorsed the notoriously vague doctrine of "business AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST" in Munn v. Illinois (1877). And in CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RY. V. MINNESOTA, (1890), when the Court finally invalidated a state law on due process grounds, Miller concurred "with some hesitation" but filed an opinion cautioning his colleagues against the adoption of a rigid formula, such as "fair value," to determine whether rate-making authorities had acted "arbitrarily and without regard to justice and right."

Miller's immediate successors disregarded the advice, but during the 1930s interest revived in his conception of the judicial function, particularly among FELIX FRANKFURTER's circle at the Harvard Law School. Frankfurter, who called Miller "the most powerful member of his Court," insisted in 1938 that judging was not at all like architecture. Rather than framing doctrinal structures with clean lines and the appearance of permanence, Frankfurter explained, "the Justices are cartographers who give temporary location but do not ultimately define the evershifting boundaries between state and national power, between freedom and authority." Miller could not have described his own views with greater clarity or force.

CHARLES W. MCCURDY
(1986)

Bibliography

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1938 Mr. Justice Miller and the Supreme Court, 1862–1890. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FRANKFURTER, FELIX (1938) 1961 Mr. Justice Holmes and the Supreme Court. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

GILLETTE, WILLIAM 1969 Samuel Miller. Pages 1011–1024 in Leon Friedman and Fred Israel, eds., The Justices of the Supreme Court, 1789–1965. New York: Chelsea House.

MILLER v. CALIFORNIA
413 U.S. 15 (1973)

PARIS ADULT THEATRE I v. SLATON
413 U.S. 49 (1973)

For the first time since ROTH V. UNITED STATES (1957), a Supreme Court majority agreed on a definition of OBSCENITY. The Court had adopted the practice of summarily reversing obscenity convictions when at least five Justices, even if not agreeing on the appropriate test, found the material protected. The states were without real guidelines; and the requirements of JACOBELLIS V. OHIO (1964) that each Justice review the material at issue had transformed the Court into an ultimate board of censorship review.

To escape from this "intractable" problem, the Miller Court reexamined obscenity standards. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER's majority opinion, reaffirming Roth, articulated specific safeguards to ensure that state obscenity regulations did not encroach upon protected speech. The Court announced that a work could constitutionally be held to be obscene when an affirmative answer was appropriate for each of three questions:

> (a) whether "the average person applying contemporary community standards" would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interes. . . . ;
> (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and
> (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value.

Three aspects of the Miller formula are noteworthy. First, the work need not be measured against a single national standard, but may be judged by state community standards. Second, state obscenity regulations must be confined to works that depict or describe sexual conduct. Moreover, the states must specifically define the nature of that sexual conduct to provide due NOTICE to potential offenders. Third, the Court rejected the "utterly without redeeming social value" standard of MEMOIRS V. MASSACHUSETTS (1966). To merit FIRST AMENDMENT protection, the work, viewed as a whole, must have serious social value. A token political or social comment will not redeem an otherwise obscene work; nor will a brief erotic passage condemn a serious work.

In a COMPANION CASE, Paris Adult Theater I, the Court held that regulations concerning the public exhibition of obscenity, even in "adult" theaters excluding minors, were permissible if the Miller standards were met. The prohibition on privacy grounds against prosecuting possession of obscene material in one's home, recognized in STANLEY

V. GEORGIA (1969), does not limit the state's power to regulate commerce in obscenity, even among consenting adults.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, joined by Justices POTTER J. STEWART and THURGOOD MARSHALL, dissented in both cases. Abandoning the views he expressed in Roth and Memoirs, Brennan concluded that the impossibility of definition rendered the outright suppression of obscenity irreconcilable with the First Amendment and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The Court's inability to distinguish protected speech from unprotected speech created intolerable fair notice problems and chilled protected speech. Furthermore, "institutional stress" had resulted from the necessary case-by-case Supreme Court review. Instead of attempting to define obscenity, Brennan would balance the state regulatory interest against the law's potential danger to free expression. He recognized the protection of juveniles or unconsenting adults as a state interest justifying the suppression of obscenity. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, separately dissenting, also denounced the vague guidelines that sent persons to jail for violating standards they could not understand, construe, or apply.

The Court's attempt to articulate specific obscenity standards was successful to the extent it reduced the number of cases on the Supreme Court docket. Nevertheless, as Justice Brennan noted, and the history of obscenity decisions confirms, any obscenity definition is inherently vague. The Court thus remains the ultimate board of censorship review.

KIM MCLANE WARDLAW
(1986)

Bibliography

LOCKHARD, WILLIAM B. 1975 Escape from the Chill of Uncertainty. Georgia Law Review 9:533–587.

MILLER v. JOHNSON
515 U.S. 900 (1995)

In Miller v. Johnson, the Supreme Court overturned Georgia's Eleventh Congressional District, which was nowhere near as ill-compact as North Carolina's Twelth Congressional District challenged in SHAW V. RENO (1993) but whose creation could be laid almost entirely to insistence by the U.S. Department of Justice that Georgia create two additional black-majority congressional districts. Writing for the majority, Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY asserted that the Department of Justice had made improper use of its preclearance authority under section 5 of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 (as amended) in pursuit of a policy of maximizing the number of black-majority districts, and that racial considerations were predominant in the creation of the Eleventh District. Miller demonstrated that even districts that were not especially ill-compact or in blatant violation of traditional districting criteria could be struck down under the Shaw standard if the Court majority were convinced that existing irregularities could only be explained in racial terms.

Miller also showed the importance of the views of Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR as a pivotal vote. O'Connor, in addition to joining the MAJORITY OPINION, wrote a two-paragraph CONCURRING OPINION in which she sought to reassure critics of Shaw that the Court was not going throw out all use of race as a districting criterion. In particular, she asserted that the Shaw test was "a demanding one," and that to invoke STRICT SCRUTINY, "a plaintiff must show that the State has relied on race in substantial disregard of customary and traditional districting practices." However, what this latter phrase means in practice seems very much in the eyes of the beholder. The DISSENTING OPINION, written by Justice RUTH BADER GINSBURG (and joined in whole or part by three other Justices), in effect denied that the district violated this test.

BERNARD GROFMAN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Electoral Districting; Voting Rights.)

Bibliography

GROFMAN, BERNARD, ed. 1998 Race and Redistricting in the 1990s. New York: Agathon Press.

MILLETT v. PEOPLE OF ILLINOIS
117 Illinois 294 (1886)

This was the first case in which a court held a regulatory statute unconstitutional on the ground that it violated the doctrine of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. Illinois required coal-mine owners to install scales for the weighing of coal in order to determine the wages of miners. Millett, an owner, contracted with his miners, in violation of the statute, to pay by the boxload rather than by weight. The state supreme court, overturning his conviction, unanimously declared that the statute deprived him of DUE PROCESS substantively construed. Miners, the court said, could contract as they pleased in regard to the value of their labor, and owners had the same freedom of contract. The court summarily dismissed the contention that the regulation was a valid exercise of the POLICE POWER on the ground that the legislature had not protected the miners' safety or the property of others. A few months later the Pennsylvania high court, in Godcharles v. Wigeman (1886), held unconstitutional a state act that prohibited owners of mines or factories from paying workers in kind rather than in money wages. Such cases were forerunners of LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) and its progeny.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MILLIGAN, EX PARTE
4 Wallace 2 (1866)

In 1861, Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY contrived a possibility of executive-judicial, civil-military clashes (Ex parte Merryman); in 1863 the Supreme Court averted similar confrontations (EX PARTE VALLANDIGHAM; PRIZE CASES). But in 1866–1867, the CHASE COURT, in the TEST OATH and Ex parte Milligan decisions, overcame its restraint.

In 1864, an Army court sentenced Lambden (spelling various) Milligan, a militantly antiwar, Negrophobe Indianan, to death for overtly disloyal activities. President ANDREW JOHNSON commuted the sentence to life imprisonment. Milligan's lawyer, employing the 1863 HABEAS CORPUS ACT, in 1865 appealed to the federal circuit court in Indiana for release. The judges, including Justice DAVID DAVIS, divided on whether a civil court had JURISDICTION over a military tribunal and on the legitimacy of military trials of civilians. This division let the petition go to the Supreme Court. There, in 1866, Attorney General HENRY STANBERY denied that any civil court had jurisdiction; special counsel BENJAMIN F. BUTLER insisted on the nation's right to use military justice in critical areas.

Milligan's lawyers included JAMES A. GARFIELD, JEREMIAH BLACK, and DAVID DUDLEY FIELD. Milligan, they argued, if indictable, was triable in civil courts for TREASON. Alternatively, they insisted that the Army court had failed to obey the 1863 Habeas Corpus Act's requirement to report on civilian prisoners. Further, they asserted that the Constitution's barriers against the use of military power in a state not in rebellion were fixed and unmodifiable, though Congress, they admitted, had authority to use military justice in the South.

All the Justices concurred about the military court's dereliction in not reporting Milligan's arrest. For the Court's bare majority, Justice Davis held that neither President nor Congress could establish military courts to try civilians in noninvaded areas, and, implicitly, that the final decision as to what areas were critical was the Court's. Martial law must never exist where civil courts operated, he stressed, although both had co-existed since the war started. SALMON P. CHASE, speaking also for Justices Samuel Miller, Noah Swayne, and JAMES WAYNE, disagreed. Congress could extend military authority in Indiana under the WAR POWERS without lessening BILL OF RIGHTS protections, Chase asserted. The option was Congress's, not the Court's.

The majority view in Milligan was at once seized upon by supporters of President Johnson, the white South, and the Democratic party, though even Justice Davis stressed that he referred not at all to the South. Until military reconstruction clarified matters, the duties of the Army, acting under President Johnson's orders and the FREEDMEN'S BUREAU statute, were complicated greatly by misuses of the Milligan decision in the southern state courts, complications increased by the Test Oath decisions. Taken together, the Milligan and the Test Oath decisions greatly limited the capacity of both the nation and the states to provide more decent, color-blind justice in either civil or military courts (including those of the Freedmen's Bureau), and to exclude from leadership in politics and the professions persons who had sparked SECESSION and war.

In subsequent decades, legal writers THOMAS COOLEY and ZECHARIAH CHAFEE reconstructed Milligan into a basic defense of individual liberty and of civilian primacy over the military. Both men were flaying dragons perceived by Victorian Social Darwinists and by critics of WORLD WAR I witch-hunts. Milligan was never a merely theoretical threat. Neither the civil police and courts of Indiana nor the federal government, except for the Army, evidenced capacity to deal with him. In light of existing alternatives, the Army's decision to try Milligan (not its failure to report its decision and verdict) is defensible.

Republican criticism of the Milligan decision never threatened the Court. Instead, from 1863 through 1875, the Congress increased the Court's habeas corpus jurisdiction as well as that in admiralty, bankruptcy, and claims. The Milligan decision, paradoxically, became a major step in the Court's successful effort to regain the prestige that it had squandered in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), and that Taney had risked dissipating altogether in Merryman.

HAROLD M. HYMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

GAMBIONE, JOSEPH G. 1970 Ex Parte Milligan: The Restoration of Judicial Prestige? Civil War History 16:246–259.

KUTLER, STANLEY I. 1968 Judicial Power and Reconstruction Politics. Chaps. 6–8. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MILLIKEN v. BRADLEY
418 U.S. 717 (1974)
433 U.S. 267 (1977)

The DESEGREGATION of public schools in many large cities poses a problem: the cities are running out of white pupils, as white families move to the suburbs. In the early 1970s, some federal district judges began to insist on desegregation plans embracing not only city districts but also surrounding suburban districts. In the first such case to reach the Supreme Court, the Justices divided 4–4, thus affirming without opinion the DECISION of the court of appeals, which had reversed the district court's order for metropolitan relief. The case had come from Richmond, Virginia; Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, the former president of the Richmond school board, had disqualified himself.

Milliken, the Detroit school desegregation case, came to the Court the next year. Justice Powell participated, and a 5–4 Court held that interdistrict remedies were inappropriate absent some showing of a constitutional violation by the suburban district as well as the city district. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER wrote for the majority, joined by the other three appointees of President RICHARD M. NIXON and by Justice POTTER STEWART. Justices THURGOOD MARSHALL, BYRON R. WHITE, and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS all wrote dissenting opinions, and Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN also dissented.

This decision was the first major setback for school desegregation plaintiffs, but it did not entirely foreclose metropolitan relief. Justice Stewart, who joined the majority opinion, concurred separately as well, saying he would be prepared to accept metropolitan relief not only where a suburban district had committed a constitutional violation, but also where state officials had engaged in racially discriminatory conduct such as racial gerrymandering of district lines or discriminatory application of housing or ZONING laws.

When the Detroit case returned to the Court three years later, it added a weapon to the arsenal of desegregation remedies. As part of a desegregation decree, the district court ordered the establishment of remedial education programs; the Supreme Court unanimously affirmed, with the Chief Justice again writing for the Court. The remedy must not exceed the constitutional violation, he wrote, but here, unlike the situation in Milliken I, the remedy was "tailored to cure the condition that offend[ed] the Constitution."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MILTON AND FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

The renowned poet John Milton's Areopagitica, written in 1644, is the earliest extended essay on the FREEDOM OF THE PRESS that continues to be read today. The essay was prompted by a decision of Parliament to reinstate the practice of licensing all books and pamphlets. This occurred a few short years after the institutions of crown censorship, including the infamous Star Chamber, had been abolished as part of a general challenge by the legislature to royal authority. In the interim after the abolition of crown licensing, as a civil war was raging, the leaders of Parliament became distressed both by the efflorescence of radical religious ideas circulating in the streets and by the effectiveness of propaganda then being disseminated by forces loyal to the King. Milton, along with many of his Puritan brethren, was disillusioned by this return to centralized control over thought. He implored the Parliament to have more faith in the English people by trusting them with unlicensed books and pamphlets.

Milton's argument is divided into four parts. First, he asserts that licensing writings is a relatively recent practice, developed by the Roman Catholic Church to thwart the Protestant Reformation and reaching its logical culmination in the Spanish Inquisition. Enlightened regimes tracing back to ancient Greece and Rome eschewed the policy of licensing, Milton claims. In identifying the regulation of speech with the Catholic Church, Milton appealed to the sympathies of his overwhelmingly Protestant audience, and to their widely held fears that the Stuart monarchs planned to return England to the Catholic fold.

Second, Milton argues that exposure to evil is necessary to knowledge of the good. He notes how the wisest thinkers throughout history have made it a point to study the systems of thought they were ultimately to reject and refute. "I cannot praise," says Milton, "a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary. . . ." The theological notion of temptation figures prominently in this part of the argument. "[T]hat which purifies us is trial," Milton asserts, "and trial is by what is contrary."

The third section of the essay develops the claim that as a practical matter the licensing of books and pamphlets will not achieve its intended objectives. It is not easy, Milton observes, to determine which writings are truly evil and dangerous. What is to be done, for example, with "books which are partly useful and excellent, partly culpable and pernicious. . . ." If all such works were denied publication, the "commonwealth of learning" would be badly damaged. To evaluate writings in a discerning manner, a licenser "had need to be a man above the common measure, both studious, learned, and judicious. . . ." But this sort of work will not attract such a person, for "there cannot be a more tedious and unpleasing journey-work, a greater loss of time levied upon his head, than to be made the perpetual reader of unchosen books and pamphlets, oft times huge volumes." Given the drudgery of the job, "we may easily foresee what kind of licensers we are to expect hereafter, either ignorant, imperious, and remiss, or basely pecuniary."

Moreover, even if censors were discerning, evil writings would circulate underground. And evil ideas can be spread by means other than books and pamphlets. Milton likens the futile project of licensing to "the exploit of that gallant man who thought to pound up the crows by shutting his park gate."

The fourth part of the argument of Areopagitica is the longest and the most impassioned. Here Milton waxes poetic regarding the harm that censorship does to the spirit of inquiry, both religious and political. It is an assault on the dignity of a writer, he says, to distrust him as though he were a truant schoolboy, to make him "trudge to his leave-giver" to obtain permission to publish. This demeaning distrust extends also to the general population of readers. If we "dare not trust them with an English pamphlet," says Milton, "what do we but censure them for a giddy, vicious, and ungrounded people, in such a sick and weak state of faith and discretion, as to be able to take nothing down but through pipe of a licenser."

One crucial consequence of the distrust implicit in licensing is its devastating effect on the general level of spiritual and political energy. Images of sloth and torpor abound in the essay. "[O]ur faith and knowledge thrives by exercise," Milton contends. Truth can be compared to "a streaming fountain; if her waters flow not in perpetual progression, they sicken into a muddy pool of conformity and tradition." The aim of censorship is a debilitating stasis, "a dull ease and cessation of our knowledge," an "obedient unanimity," the "forced and outward union of cold and neutral and inwardly divided minds."

Milton's regard for dynamism and ferment caused him to express a much higher opinion of the religious radicals of his day than was common, even among other proponents of toleration. Parliament's return to the practice of licensing had been prompted in part by the outpouring of bizarre, extravagant versions of Protestant theology that had greeted the lifting of crown censorship. This caught the mainstream Protestants who controlled Parliament by surprise and alarmed them greatly because they took seriously the notion of blasphemy and considered the stakes to be nothing less than divine favor at a pivotal moment in the history of both the Reformation and the English nation. Milton, in contrast, viewed the radical sectarians as a source of energy and potential revelation, despite his own rather more conventional theological views. "Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making." Parliament's fear of heresy, he says, is exactly the wrong theological response: "Under these fantastic terrors of sect and schism, we wrong the earnest and zealous thirst after knowledge and understanding which God hath stirred up in this city. What some lament of, we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men, to reassume the ill-deputed care of their religion into their own hands again."

Milton's disdain for censorship derived in part from his belief that each person must take responsibility for his religious convictions and must form those convictions by an active process of inquiry. Also central to his position was his belief that the capacity of mortals to know the truth is very limited such that human laws designed to protect the known truth from heretical opinions are more likely to preserve error than to serve their intended purposes. Milton considered the search for truth to be never-ending until the Second Coming, and a matter of slow, fitful, halting progress. "[H]e who thinks we are to pitch our tent here, and have attained the utmost prospect of reformation that the mortal glass wherein we contemplate can show us, till we come to beatific vision, that man by this very opinion declares that he is yet far short of truth." The problem of false appearances figures prominently in Milton's argument. Truth, he asserts, "may have more shapes than one." Its "first appearance to our eyes, bleared and dimmed with prejudice and custom, is more unsightly and unplausible than many errors, even as the person is of many a great man slight and contemptible to see to."

Milton's understanding of the relationship between the FREEDOM OF SPEECH and the search for truth was informed not only by his notions of personal responsibility and human incapacity but also by his belief in divine providence. The circulation of heretical ideas is not as threatening as the proponents of censorship suppose because just when "false teachers" are "busiest in seducing" the populace, "God then raises to his own work men of rare abilities, and more than common industry" to revise previous errors and "go on some new enlightened steps in the discovery of truth." "For who knows not that truth is strong, next to the Almighty?" Because of divine providence, "though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting, to misdoubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?"

As much as he insisted upon personal responsibility and struggle in matters of faith, and as impressed as he was with the limitations of human knowledge, Milton nevertheless explicitly excepted Roman Catholics from his argument for toleration. "I mean not tolerated popery," he says, "and open superstition, which, as it extirpates all religions and civil supremacies, so itself should be extirpate. . . ." Defenders of Milton have observed that almost all his fellow proponents of toleration made this exception and that the fear of Catholic military designs dominated the politics of Stuart England, not least the political struggle during the civil war between the Parliament and the Crown for the allegiance of the general populace. Had Milton urged the toleration of Catholics he would have lost credibility with his intended Parliamentary audience. Milton's critics point out that an argument that emphasizes the need to confront supposed falsehood would seem to require the toleration of the most feared and powerful "supposed falsehood" of the day.

The Areopagitica is noteworthy as a rich repository of images and characterizations pertaining to censorship and free inquiry, and as an imaginative development of the point that there is positive value in grappling with ideas that may turn out to be false and evil. Interpretative debates persist regarding whether Milton's argument is limited solely to controversies over the regulation of religious speech, whether it constitutes only a case against the prior licensing of speech with no implications for disputes over other forms of control such as criminal penalties, and whether the author's refusal to tolerate Catholics renders his plea for free expression incoherent and/or hypocritical. The extent to which Milton's analysis was informed by his deep faith in divine providence and by the particular view of truth he derived therefrom raises questions regarding how much the Areopagitica has to offer the modern age. However these matters are resolved, Milton's observations about the importance of maintaining energy and his penetrating satirical comments about the dynamics and pretensions of censorship preserve the continuing value of the essay.

VINCENT BLASI
(2000)

Bibliography

BARKER, ARTHUR 1942 Milton and the Puritan Dilemma. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.

HALLER, WILLIAM 1955 Liberty and Reformation in the Puritan Revolution. New York: Columbia University Press.

KOLBRENER, WILLIAM 1997 Milton's Warring Angels. Cambridge, Eng.: Cambridge University Press.

LOEWENSTEIN, DAVID 1992 Milton and the Drama of History. Cambridge, Eng.: Cambridge University Press.

SMITH, NIGEL 1990 Areopagitica: Voicing Contexts 1643–45. In David Loewenstein and James Turner, eds., Politics, Poetics, and Hermeneutics in Milton's Prose. Cambridge, Eng.: Cambridge University Press.

MINERSVILLE SCHOOL DISTRICT v. GOBITIS

See: Flag Salute Cases

MINIMUM WAGES

See: Maximum Hours and Minimum Wages Legislation

MINISTERIAL ACT

A ministerial act is one an official performs as a matter of legal duty, without any personal discretion and without judging the merits. For example, in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL described delivery of an appointee's commission as a ministerial act of the secretary of state.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

MINNESOTA v. BARBER
136 U.S. 313 (1890)

The Supreme Court unanimously held unconstitutional as a violation of the COMMERCE CLAUSE a Minnesota statute that prohibited the sale for human consumption of meat slaughtered in another state and not inspected in Minnesota. The statute, the Court declared, forced citizens to buy only Minnesota meat, denying them the benefits of competition in INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MINNESOTA RATE CASES
230 U.S. 352 (1913)

In these cases a unanimous Supreme Court reaffirmed state power to regulate INTRASTATE COMMERCE even if it should indirectly affect INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES stressed the supremacy of federal authority but, reaching back to COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS OF PHILADELPHIA (1852), held that states could regulate interstate commerce when Congress had not yet chosen to act.

The cases before the Court represented extensive litigation throughout the country. The Railroad & Warehouse Commission of Minnesota and the state legislature had issued orders fixing maximum rail rates within the state. Although the rates they set were purely intrastate, both sides agreed that interstate rates would be affected. The cases arose as STOCKHOLDERS' SUITS to prevent the application of the prescribed rates to interstate operators. (See EX PARTE YOUNG.) On the principal question whether the orders fixed rates that interfered with interstate commerce, Hughes agreed that if the rates imposed a direct burden on commerce, they must fall. He then began a lengthy exposition of the nature of commercial regulation in the federal system, concluding that "it is competent for a state to govern its internal commerce . . . although interstate commerce may incidentally or indirectly be involved." Unless and until Congress acted, state action might well be legal even if touching interstate commerce. Only Congress could judge the necessity for action and, having decided to, it could intervene "at its discretion for the complete and effective government" of even local conduct affecting interstate commerce. The Minnesota actions were, therefore, within the state's power but would be superseded if Congress acted. The Court thus broadly upheld state ratemaking authority; it also implicitly affirmed federal power over intrastate railroad activity affecting interstate commerce, a significant step it would take explicitly the following year in HOUSTON, EAST & WEST TEXAS RAILWAY COMPANY V. UNITED STATES, (1914).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

MINOR v. HAPPERSETT
21 Wallace 162 (1875)

MORRISON R. WAITE delivered the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court holding that a woman, though a citizen of the United States and of the state in which she resides, had no right to vote as a privilege of national CITIZENSHIP protected by the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The laws of her state allowed only men to vote, and the amendment did not change that by making any new voters.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MINTON, SHERMAN
(1890–1965)

Born in Indiana in 1890, Sherman Minton attended Indiana University and Yale Law School. After military service during WORLD WAR I, several years in private practice, and brief service as attorney for an Indiana state agency, Minton was elected to the United States Senate in 1934. A fervent advocate of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT'S "NEW DEAL," Minton supported measures expanding the federal government's role in ECONOMIC REGULATION powers despite his concern that the Supreme Court might declare such measures unconstitutional. As the Court repeatedly struck down New Deal legislation, Minton proposed that the votes of at least seven Justices be necessary to invalidate an act of Congress; in 1937, Minton worked vigorously for the enactment of Roosevelt's Court reorganization plan. After Minton was defeated for reelection in 1940, he served briefly as one of Roosevelt's special assistants. In the spring of 1941 Roosevelt appointed Minton to the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. In 1949 President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed Minton to the Supreme Court to fill the vacancy created by the death of Justice WILEY B. RUTLEDGE; this appointment was as much a product of Truman's close friendship with Minton as of Truman's desire to appoint Justices with prior judicial experience. Ill health forced Minton's retirement in 1956.

Minton believed that the Supreme Court could not impose libertarian standards upon a government and a people that did not favor them. Minton's commitment to judicial restraint and his resistance to what he perceived as JUDICIAL POLICYMAKING followed directly from his frustration as a senator with the Court's opposition to New Deal legislation and his participation in efforts to curb the Court's powers.

Minton disappointed liberals who had hoped that he would work as vigorously for judicial protection of individual liberties as for the legitimation of governmental economic regulation. He consistently voted to uphold statutes and other governmental programs intended to protect the national security, rejecting challenges asserting violation of individual liberties. In CRIMINAL PROCEDURE cases, Minton tended to uphold convictions. For example, in UNITED STATES V. RABINOWITZ (1950) Minton held for the Court that the FOURTH AMENDMENT permits WARRANTLESS SEARCHES and seizures, so long as they are reasonable. Where litigants sought review of state criminal decisions, Minton was reluctant to disturb state procedures or court decisions absent a showing of significant unfairness affecting the verdict. Minton was ready to invalidate STATE ACTION discriminating against minorities, but he was disinclined to find state action. He emphasized the literal meaning of congressional statutes, rarely resorting to external aids or evidence of legislative intent; in the absence of express statutory language, federal regulation did not preempt concurrent state regulation.

Minton stressed the importance of the Court's collegial atmosphere. He disliked personal disputes among the Justices and did his best to reduce their intensity or to dissipate them altogether. Minton viewed the task of writing opinions for the Court as the preparation of functional instruments of collective policy. He rarely wrote concurrences or dissents, for he believed that separate opinions tended to vitiate the authority of majority opinions and to sow discord among the Justices. After his retirement in 1956, Minton minimized the significance of his tenure on the Court; he believed that his most important judicial act was his vote in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) to strike down SEGREGATION of public schools.

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

Bibliography

WALLACE, HARRY L. 1959–1960 Mr. Justice Minton: Hoosier Justice on the Supreme Court. Indiana Law Journal 34:145–205, 383–424.

MIRANDA v. ARIZONA
384 U.S. 436 (1966)

Miranda is the best known as well as the most controversial and maligned self-incrimination decision in the history of the Supreme Court. Some of the harshest criticism came from the dissenters in that case. Justice BYRON R. WHITE, for example, declared that the rule of the case, which required elaborate warnings and offer of counsel before the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION could be effectively waived, would return killers, rapists, and other criminals to the streets and have a corrosive effect on the prevention of crime. The facts of Miranda, one of four cases decided together, explain the alarm of the four dissenters and of the many critics of the WARREN COURT. The majority of five, led by Chief Justice EARL WARREN, reversed the kidnap-and-rape conviction of Ernesto Miranda, who had been picked out of a LINEUP by his victim, had been interrogated without mistreatment for a couple of hours, and had signed a confession that purported to have been voluntarily made with full knowledge of his rights, although no one had advised him that he did not need to answer incriminating questions or that he could have counsel present. The Court reversed because his confession had been procured in violation of his rights, yet had been admitted in EVIDENCE. Warren conceded that the Court could not know what had happened in the interrogation room and "might not find the . . . statements to have been involuntary in traditional terms." Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, dissenting, professed to be "astonished" at the decision. Yet the Court did little more than require that the states follow what was already substantially FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION (FBI) procedure with respect to the rights of a suspect during a custodial interrogation.

The doctrinal significance of the case is that the Fifth Amendment's self-incrimination clause became the basis for evaluating the admissibility of confessions. The Court thus abandoned the traditional DUE PROCESS analysis that it had used in state cases since BROWN V. MISSISSIPPI (1936) to determine whether a confession was voluntary under all the circumstances. (See POLICE INTERROGATIONS AND CONFESSIONS.) Moreover, the Court shifted to the Fifth Amendment from the Sixth Amendment analysis of ESCOBEDO V. ILLINOIS (1964), when discussing the RIGHT TO COUNSEL as a means of protecting against involuntary confessions. Miranda stands for the proposition that the Fifth Amendment vests a right in the individual to remain silent unless he chooses to speak in the "unfettered exercise of his own will." The opinion of the Court lays down a code of procedures that must be respected by law enforcement officers to secure that right to silence whenever they take a person into custody or deprive him of his freedom in any significant way.

In each of the four Miranda cases, the suspect was not effectively notified of his constitutional rights and was questioned incommunicado in a "police-dominated" atmosphere; each suspect confessed, and his confession was introduced in evidence against him at his trial. The Court majority demonstrated a deep distrust for police procedures employed in station-house interrogation, aimed at producing confessions. The Miranda cases showed, according to Warren, a secret "interrogation environment," created to subject the suspect to the will of his examiners. Intimidation, even if only psychological, could undermine the will and dignity of the suspect, compelling him to incriminate himself. Therefore, the inherently compulsive character of in-custody interrogation had to be offset by procedural safeguards to insure obedience to the right of silence. Until legislatures produced other procedures at least as effective, the Court would require that at the outset of interrogation a person be clearly informed that he has the right to remain silent, that any statement he makes may be used as evidence against him, that he has the right to the presence of an attorney, and that if he cannot afford an attorney, one will be appointed to represent him.

These rules respecting mandatory warnings, Warren declared, are "an absolute prerequisite to interrogation." The presence of a lawyer, he reasoned, would reduce coercion, effectually preserve the right of silence for one unwilling to incriminate himself, and produce an accurate statement if the suspect chooses to speak. Should he indicate at any time before or during interrogation that he wishes to remain silent or have an attorney present, the interrogation must cease. Government assumes a heavy burden, Warren added, to demonstrate in court that a defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his right to silence or to a lawyer. "The warnings required and the waiver necessary in accordance with our opinion today are prerequisites," he emphasized, "to the admissibility of any statement made by a defendant."

Warren insisted that the new rules would not deter effective law enforcement. The experience of the FBI attested to that, and its practices, which accorded with the Court's rules, could be "readily emulated by state and local law enforcement agencies." The Constitution, Warren admitted, "does not require any specific code of procedures" for safeguarding the Fifth Amendment right; the Court would accept any equivalent set of safeguards.

Justice TOM C. CLARK, dissenting, observed that the FBI had not been warning suspects that counsel may be present during custodial interrogation, though FBI practice immediately altered to conform to Warren's opinion. Clark, like Harlan, whose dissent was joined by Justices POTTER STEWART and Byron White, would have preferred "the more pliable dictates" of the conventional due process analysis that took all the circumstances of a case into account. Harlan also believed that the right against self-incrimination should not be extended to the police station and should not be the basis for determining whether a confession is involuntary. White wrote a separate dissent, which Harlan and Stewart joined, flaying the majority for an opinion that had no historical, precedential, or textual basis. White also heatedly condemned the majority for weakening law enforcement and for prescribing rules that were rigid, but still left many questions unanswered. (See MIRANDA RULES.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

KAMISAR, YALE 1980 Police Interrogations and Confessions. Pages 41–76. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

WHITEBREAD, CHARLES H. 1980 Criminal Procedure. Pages 292–310. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

MIRANDA RULES

In MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) the Supreme Court held that a person subject to custodial POLICE INTERROGATION must be warned that any statement he makes can be used against him, that he has a right to remain silent, and that he has a right to the presence of an attorney and that one will be appointed for him if he is indigent. A defendant may waive these rights. A WAIVER must be voluntary and intelligent. In the absence of a fully effective alternative, these warnings must be given and a valid waiver taken as the constitutional prerequisite to the admissibility of any product of custodial police interrogation.

The Miranda opinion left unresolved numerous issues. For example: When is a person in custody? What constitutes interrogation? What are the standards for measuring the validity of a purported waiver of the Miranda rights? May voluntary statements that are inadmissible for failure to comply with Miranda be introduced to impeach the credibility of a defendant's trial testimony? How is the burden of proving VOLUNTARINESS and compliance with the Miranda requirements allocated?

Post-Miranda cases have lessened considerably the constraints the decision had imposed upon law enforcement officials. For example, the police are required to give a suspect the Miranda warnings only if the suspect is in custody at the time of interrogation. In OROZCO V. TEXAS (1969) the Court held that a person is in custody any time that he is not free to leave whether in his own home, a hospital, a police car, or the stationhouse. ESTELLE V. SMITH (1981) held that when an indicted defendant, who has not put his mental state in issue, is compelled to undergo a court-ordered psychiatric examination, he is in custody and is entitled to the Miranda warnings prior to the evaluation by a mental health professional. However, most courts have held that a suspect is not in custody when in an open, natural environment. Examples include STOP AND FRISK situations, traffic arrests, accident investigations, or searches at international borders.

The second prerequisite to requiring the Miranda warnings is that the suspect be the subject of interrogation. The Miranda opinion defined interrogation as "questioning initiated by law enforcement officers." In RHODE ISLAND V. INNES (1980), the Court elaborated, stating that "interrogation" meant "express questioning or its functional equivalent" including "any words or actions on the part of the police . . . reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the subject." By contrast, a statement freely and voluntarily made without any interrogation is admissible as a "threshold confession" or "spontaneous statement." If, for example, a person walks into a police station and states that he has killed someone, the police are not required to stop the person wishing to speak and give that person the warnings.

If both custody and interrogation are present, the police must give the warnings or take a valid waiver before proceeding. The police may not presume that a suspect knows of the Miranda rights. The form of the warnings may vary, however, so long as the words used give a clear, understandable warning of all the rights, taking into account the circumstances and the characteristics of the suspect.

In OREGON V. ELSTAD (1985) the Supreme Court held that an invalid confession obtained without the suspect being informed of his Miranda rights would not invalidate a later confession made after the suspect was informed of his rights, so long as the confession was obtained without coercion. However, in NEW YORK V. QUARLES (1984) the Court established a "public safety" exception, stating that if reasonable concern for public safety is present, a police officer need not recite the Miranda warnings before questioning a suspect in custody.

The accused, after receiving the warnings, may voluntarily waive any of his Miranda rights. The government must demonstrate voluntariness under all the circumstances. A signed waiver form is strong, but not conclusive, evidence of voluntariness. An effective waiver need not be written, however, and it may be implied from the accused's conduct.

Once the suspect terminates the interrogation or requests counsel, he may not be reinterviewed without being provided access to the requested attorney even if the suspect is given a second set of Miranda warnings. In EDWARDS V. ARIZONA (1981) the Court held that once an accused requests counsel, questioning must cease until counsel is present or until the accused "initiates further communication, exchanges or conversation with the police." In Smith v. Illinois (1984), the Court followed this precedent by holding that, once the accused has requested an attorney, no further questions or responses may be used to cast doubt on the request.

By contrast, in Fare v. Michael C. (1979) the Court held that a juvenile's request for a probation officer during questioning does not have the same constitutional effect as a request for a lawyer. The Court based its distinction on the fact that a lawyer's principal responsibility is to defend his client, while a probation officer has a duty to report and prosecute misconduct by a juvenile. In addition, probation officers are not necessarily qualified to provide legal assistance. Consequently, a juvenile's request for his probation officer is not a per se invocation of the Miranda RIGHT TO COUNSEL.

The issue of voluntariness arises in nonwaiver contexts as well. The Court has held that voluntary confessions obtained in violation of the Miranda rules, though not admissible in the State's case-in-chief as evidence of guilt, may be admitted to impeach a testifying defendant's credibility. In the leading case, HARRIS V. NEW YORK (1971), the defendant denied in court that he had sold heroin to an undercover agent. During cross-examination, Harris was asked whether he had made certain statements following his arrest that were inconsistent with his in-court testimony. Even though the prosecution conceded that the statements were obtained in violation of Miranda, the Supreme Court upheld the trial judge's ruling that the statements could be considered by the jury in evaluating the defendant's credibility.

When the defendant's statements are truly involuntary, they may not be admitted into evidence for any purpose. Mincey v. Arizona (1978) is illustrative, holding that the defendant's statements were inadmissible because they were obtained while the defendant was hospitalized and barely able to speak.

Whether the issue arises in the waiver or in the impeachment context, the burden of proving voluntariness under all the circumstances rests on the government. Miranda described it as a "heavy burden," a term which a number of courts have interpreted as requiring proof beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT. The Supreme Court, however, stopped this trend by holding, in Lego v. Twomey (1972), that proof by a preponderance of the evidence will suffice in federal court, though the states may impose a higher burden in state proceedings.

CHARLES H. WHITEBREAD
(1986)

Bibliography

WHITEBREAD, CHARLES H. 1980 Criminal Procedure. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

MIRANDA RULES
(Update)

MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) held that a statement obtained from a criminal defendant through custodial interrogation is inadmissible against that defendant unless the police obtained a waiver of the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION after warning the suspect of both the right to remain silent and the RIGHT TO COUNSEL. Recently, the Supreme Court has issued decisions favorable to the government concerning several Miranda issues: the definition of custodial interrogation, in Arizona v. Mauro (1989); the adequacy of warnings provided to persons in custody, in Duckworth v. Eagan (1989); and the standard that governs the validity of waiver, in Colorado v. Spring (1987) and Colorado v. Connelly (1986). Although in Arizona v. Robertson (1988) the Court reaffirmed the proscription of questioning until counsel appears, once the suspect requests counsel, the police need not advise the suspect of a lawyer's efforts to consult with him or her, as the Court held in Moran v. Burbine (1986).

The most significant of these developments is the holding in Connelly and Spring that a Miranda waiver is valid so long as the police did not obtain the waiver through conduct that would render a confession "involuntary" as a matter of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS. The Miranda opinion stated that "a heavy burden rests on the Government to demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to . . . counsel." Connelly, a lunatic, confessed at the behest of "the voice of God." Spring waived Miranda rights after government agents led him to believe that the questioning would concern an illegal firearms transaction, but the interrogation eventually included questions about a homicide. Spring's waiver was not knowing, and Connelly's was not intelligent. The Court nonetheless approved admission of both CONFESSIONS, stating in Connelly that "there is obviously no reason to require more in the way of a "voluntariness' inquiry in the Miranda waiver context than in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT confession context."

The Justices would not likely approve waiver of the right to counsel at trial by a person in Connelly's condition or by a person like Spring, who misunderstood the seriousness of the charge. Yet in Patterson v. Illinois (1988), the Court held that in the interrogation context the claimed waiver of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, a right initiated by a formal charge with the prospect of a trial, is tested under the Connelly standard. Ironically, the standard governing the waiver of rights is strictest in the courtroom, where coercion and deception are least likely, and most lenient in the stationhouse or the police cruiser, where these dangers are greatest.

Not many police departments are likely to depart from the verbal formulation of the warnings given by the Miranda opinion, and in few cases does a lawyer attempt to advise an arrested person who did not invoke the Miranda right to counsel. Commonly, however, the government claims that the accused waived his or her Miranda rights. The ability of police interrogators to induce suspects to waive their rights explains the consistent empirical finding that the Miranda doctrine has had a negligible effect on police effectiveness. Because Miranda was inspired by dissatisfaction with the vacuous and unpredictable due process approach, stating the test for waiver in the same terms as the voluntariness test comes close to full circle from the law that preceded Miranda.

But the Court's retrenchment of the Miranda doctrine is not the whole story. In one sense, the most important development in confessions law is Miranda's continued survival, emphasized by cases such as Roberson, in which the Court approved the exclusion of valuable evidence obtained without police brutality. At least since HARRIS V. NEW YORK (1971), a majority of the Justices have believed that Miranda was wrongly decided. A majority continues to describe the Miranda rules as prophylactic safeguards rather than constitutional entitlements, a distinction that is not compatible with Miranda's presumption that statements obtained without a valid waiver are compelled within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment. Despite the erosion of their Fifth Amendment foundation, the Court refuses to abandon the Miranda rules.

The failure of recent efforts to have Miranda overruled confirms that STARE DECISIS, even without more, will sustain the decision. During the presidency of RONALD REAGAN, the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy issued a lengthy report calling for Miranda's demise. The report effectively pointed out the inconsistency of Harris and its progeny with Miranda itself; but on several points, including the key issue of law enforcement effectiveness, the report made an embarassingly weak case for obliterating a landmark. Not only did the Court as a whole reject the department's effort; the report was not approved by a single Justice in any concurring or dissenting opinion.

So Miranda lives, a symbol of commitment to civil liberty that conveniently does little to obstruct the suppression of crime. But at the borders of the Miranda rules, a skeptical Supreme Court majority has taken frequent opportunities to limit their scope. The most likely future development along these lines is approval of the suggestion advanced by two Justices, concurring in Duckworth v. Eagan, to the effect that claims by state prisoners that their convictions violated Miranda should not be cognizable in federal HABEAS CORPUS proceedings.

DONALD A. DRIPPS
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Police Interrogation and Confessions; Procedural Due Process of Law, Criminal.)

Bibliography

KAMISAR, YALE et al. 1989 Modern Criminal Procedure, 6th ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, OFFICE OF LEGAL POLICY 1986 Report to the Attorney General on the Law of Pre-trial Interrogation. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

MISCEGENATION

The fear of racial mixture migrated to the New World with the earliest colonists. In 1609, planters headed for Virginia were reminded by a preacher of the injunction that "Abrams posteritie keepe to themselves." Of course, they did no such thing. From the beginning, there was a shortage of women; white men freely interbred with both Indian and black women, even before the great waves of slave importation. During the era of SLAVERY, interracial sex cut across all strata of the white male population, from the poorest indentured servants to the wealthiest planters. THOMAS JEFFERSON was merely the most celebrated of the latter. Mulattoes were, in fact, deliberately bred for the slave market. Miscegenation laws, forbidding an interracial couple to marry or live together, were not designed to prevent interracial sex but to prevent the transmission of wealth and status from white fathers to their interracial offspring. Laws governing ILLEGITIMACY served a similar purpose, particularly in southern states. To this day, a majority of "blacks" in the United States are of interracial descent.

The adoption of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT offered an obvious opportunity for the Supreme Court to hold miscegenation laws unconstitutional on EQUAL PROTECTION grounds. When the occasion arose in PACE V. ALABAMA (1883), however, the Court unanimously upheld such a law, saying that it applied equally to punish both white and black partners to an intimate relationship. The constitutional validity of miscegenation laws went largely unquestioned until the great mid-twentieth-century rediscovery of racial equality as the Fourteenth Amendment's central meaning. Following BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), it was only a matter of time before the miscegenation issue would reach the Supreme Court. As it happened, the period of time was short. In Naim v. Naim (1955–1956) the Court fudged, dismissing an appeal in a jurisdictional evasion that Herbert Wechsler properly scored as "wholly without basis in the law." Unquestionably, the Court adopted this avoidance technique because of the political storm that had greeted the Brown decision. Playing on the white South's fear of race mixture was a standard scare tactic of politicians favoring SEGREGATION. Recognizing this fear, the NAACP, in planning its assault on segregated higher education, had deliberately chosen as its plaintiff in MCLAURIN V. OKLAHOMA STATE REGENTS (1950) a sixty-eight-year-old graduate student. The Brown opinion itself had been carefully limited to the context of education, and the Naim evasion was cut from the same political cloth.

For a decade, the Court was spared the inevitable confrontation. In Mclaughlin v. Florida (1964), it invalidated a law forbidding unmarried cohabitation by an interracial couple. Assuming for argument the validity of the state's law forbidding interracial marriage, the Court nonetheless held that the cohabitation law denied equal protection. The reasoning of Pace v. Alabama, the Court said, had not withstood analysis in more recent decisions. Finally, in LOVING V. VIRGINIA (1967), the Court put an end to the whole ugly pretense about "racial purity," holding invalid a law forbidding interracial marriage. Equal protection and SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS grounds served as alternative basis for the decision. Loving thus stands not only for a principle of racial equality but also for a broad "freedom to marry." (See FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION.) The principle of equality is often liberty's cutting edge.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

FRAZIER, E. FRANKLIN 1939 The Negro Family in the United States. Chap. IV. (rev. ed. 1966). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MYRDAL, GUNNAR 1944 An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy. Chap. 5. New York: Harper & Brothers.

MISDEMEANOR

A misdemeanor is one of a class of offenses considered less heinous, and punished less severely, than FELONIES. Generally, misdemeanors are punishable by fine or by incarceration in facilities other than penitentiaries for terms of up to one year. Federal law and most state statutes classify all crimes other than felonies as misdemeanors. Two standards have traditionally been used to distinguish felonies from misdemeanors: the place of imprisonment (a penitentiary as opposed to a jail); and the length of imprisonment (more than one year for felonies, a lesser term for misdemeanors).

The Supreme Court has held that criminal defendants charged with misdemeanors are entitled to certain guarantees of the BILL OF RIGHTS. In ARGERSINGER V. HAMLIN (1972), an indigent defendant was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon, a misdemeanor offense, and sentenced to ninety days in jail. An attorney was not appointed to represent the defendant even though he did not waive this right. The Supreme Court ruled that the RIGHT TO COUNSEL was applicable to misdemeanors where the defendant received a jail term. In Scott v. Illinois (1979), however, the Supreme Court declined to find a right to counsel at trial where loss of liberty is merely a possibility and does not, in fact, occur.

The Supreme Court also held, in BALDWIN V. NEW YORK (1970), that the Sixth Amendment requires that defendants accused of serious crimes be afforded the right to TRIAL BY JURY. This right applies to misdemeanors where imprisonment for more than six months is authorized. (See INFORMATION.)

CHARLES H. WHITEBREAD
(1986)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, W. and SCOTT, A. 1972 Criminal Law. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

MISHKIN v. NEW YORK

See: Memoirs v. Massachusetts

MISSISSIPPI v. JOHNSON
4 Wallace (71 U.S.) 475 (1867)

GEORGIA v. STANTON
6 Wallace (73 U.S.) 50 (1868)

In these cases, the Supreme Court refused to enjoin President ANDREW JOHNSON and Secretary of War EDWIN M. STANTON from enforcing the MILITARY RECONSTRUCTION ACTS. The Justices unanimously refused to act in the Mississippi case, holding that legislatively mandated executive duties were not enjoinable. Georgia subsequently argued that the military laws threatened its corporate sovereignty, but Justice SAMUEL NELSON found this a POLITICAL QUESTION unfit for judicial scrutiny. Nelson hinted, however, that the Court might favorably consider an action based on property rights. Shortly afterward, in an unreported case (Mississippi v. Stanton, 1868), the Justices evenly divided on that question. Consequently, the judiciary never ruled on the constitutionality of military reconstruction; yet these decisions involved an important recognition of SEPARATION OF POWERS and the limits of JUDICIAL POWER.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

MISSISSIPPI UNIVERSITY FOR WOMEN v. HOGAN
458 U.S. 718 (1982)

Joe Hogan, a male registered nurse, was rejected by a state university's all-female school of nursing. A 5–4 Supreme Court held that Hogan's exclusion violated his right to EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. For the majority, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR rejected the argument that, by excluding males, the university was compensating for discrimination against women. Rather, the all-female policy "tends to perpetuate the stereotyped view of nursing as an exclusively woman's job." The university thus failed the test set by CRAIG V. BOREN (1976) for SEX DISCRIMINATION cases. The dissenters, making a case for diversity of types of higher education, emphasized that Hogan could attend a coeducational state nursing school elsewhere in Mississippi.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MISSOURI v. HOLLAND
252 U.S. 416 (1920)

Missouri v. Holland confirmed the status of treaties as supreme law. Although becoming "perhaps the most famous and most discussed case in the constitutional law of foreign relations" it arose from a narrower Progressive era desire to prevent indiscriminate killing of migratory birds, which key states had proved unable or unwilling to end by themselves. Congress first legislated hunting restrictions in March 1913, but lower federal courts invalidated them on TENTH AMENDMENT grounds as exceeding the federal government's commerce power, intruding on STATE POLICE POWERS, and usurping the states' well-established position in American law as trustees for their citizens of wild animals. The federal government feared the outcome of a final test of the 1913 act sufficiently to delay Supreme Court action. Instead, responding to suggestions from Elihu Root and others, the Wilson administration concluded the Migratory Bird Treaty of 1916 with Great Britain (acting on behalf of Canada). This committed both nations to restrict hunting of the birds, and in the United States President WOODROW WILSON signed implementing legislation in July 1918.

Several lower courts, including one that had ruled against the 1913 legislation, quickly upheld the 1918 act. In one of these cases the state of Missouri had sought to enjoin federal game warden Ray P. Holland from enforcing the new law. Appealing to the Supreme Court, Missouri argued that because, in the absence of a treaty, the legislation would be clearly invalid on Tenth Amendment grounds, it must fall even with a treaty base, for otherwise constitutional limitations would become a nullity. The Supreme Court upheld the 1918 legislation in a 7–2 vote (but with no written dissent filed).

Echoing the government's defense of the challenged act, the core of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES's opinion for the Court was a standard federal supremacy argument. Whether or not the 1913 legislation had been invalid, the 1918 act implemented a treaty; because the Constitution explicitly delegated the TREATY POWER to the federal government and gave status as supreme law to treaties made "under the authority of the United States," Tenth Amendment objections had no force.

Less restrained, even cryptic, was Holmes's language, which provided a basis for years of controversy. After questioning whether the requirement that treaties be made under the authority of the United States meant more than observance of the Constitution's prescribed forms for treaty-making, Holmes defended an organic, expansive conception of the Constitution. Its words had "called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters." The Migratory Bird Case needed consideration "in light of our whole experience." The question finally became whether the treaty was "forbidden by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the 10th Amendment." Holmes thereby camouflaged his admissions that treaties must involve matters of national interest and must not contravene specific constitutional prohibitions.

In the 1920s and early 1930s, when the Court often adhered to the doctrine of DUAL FEDERALISM, Missouri v. Holland arguably offered constitutional grounds for otherwise suspect federal legislation if appropriate treaties were concluded. (Proponents of child labor regulation toyed with the approach.) Fears about its potential in this respect lingered into the 1950s, when the case was a frequent target for backers of the BRICKER AMENDMENT. Yet after 1937 the Supreme Court routinely accepted broader interpretations of TAXING AND SPENDING POWERS, the COMMERCE CLAUSE, and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, so in practice the case's importance diminished.

CHARLES A. LOFGREN
(1986)

Bibliography

HENKIN, LOUIS 1972 Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

LOFGREN, CHARLES A. 1975 Missouri v. Holland in Historical Perspective. Supreme Court Review 1975:77–122.

MISSOURI v. JENKINS
495 U.S. 33 (1990)

Jenkins produced a unanimous result but with two sharply differing opinions on an important question concerning the power of federal courts to remedy school DESEGREGATION. A federal district court, after ordering the desegregation of the Kansas City school district, ordered the state of Missouri and the district to share the costs of the remedy, which included substantial capital improvements to make the integrated schools more attractive and thus to reduce "white flight." The district had exhausted its capacity to tax as defined by state law, and so the court ordered the district's property-tax levy increased through the next several fiscal years. The court of appeals affirmed the tax increase order, but the Supreme Court unanimously reversed. The majority, in an opinion by Justice BYRON R. WHITE, held that the district court had abused its discretion in imposing the tax itself when an alternative to such an intrusive order was available. That alternative, said Justice White, would be for the district court to order the school district to levy property taxes at a rate adequate to fund the desegregation remedy.

Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, joined by three other Justices, concurred in the result but disagreed strongly with the majority's conclusion that the district court had power to order the district to levy such a tax. That order, he said, would exceed the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES established in Article III of the Constitution. Taxation would be a legislative function, and the hiring and supervision of a staff to administer the funds so levied would be a political function. Justice Kennedy distinguished GRIFFIN V. COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY (1964), in which the Court had upheld the power of a district court to order a school district to levy taxes to reopen schools that had been closed in evasion of a desegregation order. Griffin, he said, involved an order to exercise an existing power to tax; in Jenkins, the school district would have to exceed its powers under state law. He suggested that the district court might have accomplished the desegregation of Kansas City's schools—although not with the particular remedies chosen—by means that did not require funding beyond the district's current means. Desegregating schools was an important objective, he said, but the limits on judicial power must be strictly observed.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Judicial Power and Legislative Remedies.)

MISSOURI v. JENKINS
515 U.S. 70 (1995)

In Missouri v. Jenkins, the Supreme Court considered once again the limits on the type of relief that a federal district court judge can order in a SCHOOL DESEGREGATION case. At issue was an ambitious DESEGREGATION order requiring salary increases for teachers and staff in the Kansas City school district and the continued funding of an extensive remedial education program.

The Court, in a 5–4 decision, struck down this desegregation order, holding that it went beyond the scope of the constitutional violation it sought to redress. The Court, with Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST writing for the majority, argued that the dominant purpose of the desegregation order was to attract nonminority students from outside the predominantly minority Kansas City school district and thereby to increase racial mixing in the Kansas City schools. The Court concluded that because the district court had found unlawful segregation only within the Kansas City school district, it did not have authority, in accordance with MILLIKEN V. BRADLEY (1974), to fashion a remedy for the purpose of increasing interdistrict desegregation.

In a DISSENTING OPINION, Justice DAVID H. SOUTER argued that district judges in school desegregation cases must have broad latitude to remedy the vestiges of segregation and to utilize remedies that may affect other school districts.

The decision reflects the Court's ongoing desire to end the era of judicial supervision of school districts and to return the control of schools to local officials.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS
(2000)

Bibliography

JOONDEPH, BRADLEY W. 1996 Missouri v. Jenkins and the De Facto Abandonment of Court-Enforced Desegregation. Washington Law Review 71:597–681.

MISSOURI COMPROMISE
(1820)

The Missouri Compromise provided a simple constitutional and geographical expedient for resolving a crisis of the Union growing out of SLAVERY's expansion into the western TERRITORIES. Because the compromise formed the basis of a balance of the free and slave states in the Union for a generation, its abrogation in the 1850s destabilized the constitutional system and intensified the disruption of the Union.

In 1819, Representative James Tallmadge of New York offered an amendment to the Missouri statehood enabling bill that would prohibit the further introduction of slavery into Missouri and would free all children born to slaves after the state's admission, but hold them in servitude until age 25. Free-state congressmen supported congressional power thus to restrict the admission of Missouri by arguments derived from four constitutional sources: the new states clause of Article IV, section 3, giving Congress discretionary authority to admit new states into the Union; the territories clause of the same article and section, empowering Congress to make "Regulations respecting the Territory" of the nation; the slave trade clause of Article I, section 9, permitting congress to control the "Migration" of persons; and the GUARANTEE CLAUSE of Article IV, section 4, which required all states to have a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT. Supporters of the Tallmadge amendment, citing the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, argued that slavery was incompatible with republican government.

Opponents of the Tallmadge amendment rejected all these arguments, insisting particularly that the logical implications of the republicanism argument would subvert slavery in the states where it already existed. The first Missouri crisis was resolved by a package of statutes that admitted Missouri without the Tallmadge restriction, admitted Maine as a free state, and prohibited the introduction of slavery into the remainder of the Louisiana Purchase territory north of Missouri's southern boundary. This compromise was subsequently supplemented by an informal process of admitting paired free and slave states, thus preserving a balance between the sections in the SENATE.

On the eve of its statehood Missouri precipitated the second crisis by adopting provisions in its new constitution that would have prohibited the abolition of slavery without the consent of slaveholders and that required the state legislature to prohibit the ingress of free blacks. Constitutional arguments over the second controversy turned on the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of Article IV, section 2, which introduced the question of the constitutional status of free black people. This issue went unresolved because the compromise that settled the second crisis simply provided that nothing Missouri might do in legislative compliance with the constitutional mandate should be construed to deny any citizen a privilege or immunity to which he was entitled, a toothless provision that Missouri flouted in 1847 by excluding free blacks.

THOMAS JEFFERSON warned at the time that "a geographical line, coinciding with a marked principle, moral and political, once conceived and held up to the angry passions of men, will never be obliterated." His somber prediction was fulfilled in the 1850s. The WILMOT PROVISO of 1846, which would have prohibited the introduction of slavery into territories acquired as a result of the Mexican War, inaugurated a period of controversy that terminated in the destruction of the Union in 1860. Democrats and southern political leaders in 1848 began to insist that the first Missouri restriction was unconstitutional and to demand its repeal. Repeal was accomplished by the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT of 1854; and Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY gratuitously held that the Missouri Compromise had been unconstitutional all along in his opinion in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857). Yet during Secession Winter, Senator JOHN J. CRITTENDEN resurrected the Missouri Compromise as the centerpiece of his compromise proposals, which recommended extrapolating the Missouri line all the way to the Pacific. But by 1860 sectional developments had made the constitutional settlement of 1820 obsolete.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

MOORE, GLOVER 1953 The Missouri Controversy, 1819–1821. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.

MISSOURI EX REL. GAINES v. CANADA
305 U.S. 337 (1938)

This was the first decision establishing minimum content for equality within the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE. Missouri law excluded blacks from the state university; Gaines, a black applicant, was thus rejected by the university's law school. Missouri's separate university for blacks had no law school, and so the state offered to pay his tuition at a law school in a neighboring state. Represented by NAACP lawyers, Gaines sought a WRIT OF MANDAMUS to compel his admission to the state university law school. The state courts denied relief, and the Supreme Court reversed, 6–2.

Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, for the majority, said, "The admissibility of laws separating the races in the enjoyment of privileges afforded by the State rests wholly upon the equality of the privileges which the laws give to the separated groups within the State." The case was thus a doctrinal milestone on the road to BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954). Henceforth the Court would demand real equality in a segregated system of education. Because the education of blacks in the southern and border states had emphasized separateness and deemphasized equality—even equality of physical facilities and school spending—it would have been enormously expensive for the states to satisfy the test of Gaines by providing parallel educational systems. Brown's question—whether segregation itself imposed an unconstitutional inequality—was a natural extension of the inquiry launched in Gaines.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILROAD v. HUMES
115 U.S. 512 (1885)

A CORPORATION, invoking the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, employed SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS against a state statute, but the Supreme Court, led by Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD, unanimously construed due process in an exclusively procedural sense. A statute might seriously depreciate the value of property, Field declared, but "if no rule of justice is violated in the provisions for the enforcement of such a statute," it could not be said to deprive a person of property without due process. The case was a replay of Davidson v. New Orleans (1878), which Field quoted. In 1886, the Court began to abandon the Davidson-Humes view of due process. (See STONE V. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MISTRETTA v. UNITED STATES
488 U.S. 361 (1989)

In Mistretta the Supreme Court, 8–1, upheld the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 against the constitutional challenges that it was an unconstitutional DELEGATION OF POWER and that it violated the principle of SEPARATION OF POWERS by intruding the federal judiciary into functions that are legislative.

Congress has the power to fix the sentence for a federal crime. Historically Congress has, in practical effect, delegated a considerable part of this power to the judicial branch through the mechanism of setting a range of possible sentences for the same offense—for example, one to five years of imprisonment. This scheme gives the judge authority to select the sentence appropriate in a particular case—typically including the possibility of probation—in light of the circumstances of the offense, the defendant's history and sense of responsibility, and the like. The possibility of a presidential pardon remained. In recent years, too, Congress allowed the judge to sentence the defendant to an indeterminate term, leaving the actual release date to the U.S. Parole Commission, an agency located in the executive branch. The system not only divided power among the three branches of the federal government, but also produced wide-ranging variation in the severity of sentences.

These disparities persisted despite the best efforts of sentencing institutes, judicial councils, and the Parole Commission. Concern for sentencing inequities, combined with a desire to express a tough attitude toward crime, led Congress to adopt the 1984 act. This act authorized the creation of the United States Sentencing Commission, "an independent commission in the judicial branch" composed of seven members appointed by the President with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the Senate. Three of the members must be federal judges chosen by the President from a list of six submitted by the JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES. The commission was authorized to prepare guidelines for essentially determinate SENTENCING, specifying sentences for various types of crimes and categories of defendants. A judge must adhere to the guidelines except when a case presents aggravating or mitigating circumstances of a kind not specified in the guidelines. The commission is to review and revise the guidelines periodically.

John Mistretta, sentenced on the basis of the guidelines by a federal district court for the sale of cocaine, appealed to the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS and petitioned the Supreme Court for CERTIORARI before judgment in the court of appeals. The Supreme Court granted the petition and affirmed the sentence. Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, writing for the Court, quickly rejected Mistretta's delegation of power challenge. Congress can constitutionally delegate its legislative power to an agency if it specifies clear standards for the agency to follow in carrying out its rule-making power. Congress gave the Sentencing Commission a clear set of specific goals, including lists of the factors to be considered in establishing grades of offense and categories of defendants. These lists leave considerable discretion to the commission, but the statute's standards are sufficiently clear to allow a reviewing court to determine whether the commission had followed the will of Congress.

Justice Blackmun wrote at greater length in rejecting the broader separation of powers challenge that the Sentencing Commission was a judicial body exercising legislative powers. The commission's work undoubtedly involved political judgment, but the practical consequences of locating the commission within the judicial branch did not threaten to undermine either the integrity of the judiciary or the power of Congress. On the question of locating the commission within the judicial branch, Justice Blackmun emphasized that the commission is not a court and does not exercise judicial power; that Congress can override the commission's determinations at any time; and that the questions assigned to the commission had long been exercised by the judiciary in the aggregate, deciding case by case.

Justice Blackmun found "somewhat troublesome" the participation in the commision of judges appointed under Article III of the Constitution. Nonetheless, he concluded that the constitution does not prohibit Article III judges from taking on extrajudicial functions in their individual capacities, that Congress and the President had historically aquiesced in federal judges' assumption of such duties, and that the Court's own precedents supported the constitutionality of the practice. Some kinds of extrajudicial service might have adverse effects on the public's sense of the judiciary's independence, but the commision's work was "essentially neutral" in the political sense and designed primarily to govern tasks done entirely within the judicial branch. Although the President could remove the commision members for neglect of duty or malfeasance, this power did not extend to the dismissal of federal judges as judges. Justice Blackmun made clear that there were limits to such extrajudicial services by judges of the CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS, but he could find no constitutionally significant practical effect on the work of the judicial branch from these judge's service on this commision. The emphasis on "practical" and "functional" considerations is the central theme throughout Justice Blackmun's opinion.

Justice ANTONIN SCALIA dissented, arguing that Congress could not constitutionally delegate its legislative power to an agency whose sole power was to make laws, even laws going under the name of "guidelines." This opinion represents the strongest effort in the modern era to revive the delegation doctrine as a serious limit on congressional authority to enlist other agencies in lawmaking. Justice Scalia lamented the Court's tendency to tolerate blurring of the lines separating the powers of the three branches of the federal government. Scolding the majority in a manner now familiar, he offered a restatement of today's operative rule: "the functions of the Branches should not be commingled too much—how much is too much to be determined, case-by-case, by this Court." If we disregard the tone, this restatement seems exactly on the mark. Even so, it is not clear how the national government can be run on a formalistic model of separation of powers that already seemed too confining in 1794 when JOHN JAY, while he was Chief Justice of the United States, went to London to negotiate the agreement we now call JAY'S TREATY.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

MITCHUM v. FOSTER
407 U.S. 225 (1972)

The federal anti-INJUNCTION statute prohibits a federal court from granting an injunction to stay state court proceedings "except as expressly authorized by Act of Congress, or where necessary in aid of its JURISDICTION, or to protect or effectuate its judgments." In Mitchum, relying on the "basic alteration" in our federal system wrought by the RECONSTRUCTION-era legislation, the Supreme Court decided that SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE (originally part of the Civil Rights Act of 1871), constituted an exception to the prohibition despite the absence of an express reference in section 1983 to the anti-injunction statute. Recent scholarship, which implicitly supports Mitchum, suggests that the original 1793 version of the anti-injunction statute sought merely to prohibit individual Supreme Court Justices from enjoining state proceedings and was not intended to be a comprehensive ban on federal injunctions against state proceedings. The Court's prior decision in YOUNGER V. HARRIS (1971) limits Mitchum's practical importance. Younger, which relied on nonstatutory grounds, severely restricted federal courts' discretion to enjoin pending state proceedings.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

M. L. B. v. S. L. J.
519 U.S. 102 (1996)

A Mississippi trial court terminated M. L. B.'s parental rights to two minor children. When she sought to appeal, the state insisted on advance payment of some $2,300 in fees for preparation of the trial record; because she lacked the money to pay the fees, her appeal was dismissed. The Supreme Court held, 6–3, that conditioning appeal from a trial court termination of parental rights on a parent's ability to pay violated the DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION clauses of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Writing for the Court, Justice RUTH BADER GINSBURG recognized that previous decisions had not extended the rule of GRIFFIN V. ILLINOIS (1957) to guarantee ACCESS TO THE COURTS in all civil cases. She noted, however, that in cases "involving controls or intrusions on family relationships" the Court had been more receptive to both due process and equal protection claims. Mississippi's policy was not an ordinary refusal to subsidize the exercise of a constitutional right. Here, by analogy to a criminal case, M. L. B. sought "to be spared from the State's devastatingly adverse action." Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, concurring, would have placed the decision solely on due process grounds.

Dissenting, Justice CLARENCE THOMAS relied on the argument of the second Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN in his dissent in Griffin: that due process did not require an appeal, and that equal protection was not violated by a state's failure to make up for an indigent's ability to pay for a service necessary to secure an appeal. Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST and Justice ANTONIN SCALIA joined in this part of the dissent. Thomas, joined only by Scalia, also said he would be inclined to OVERRULE Griffin.

KENNETH L. KARST
(2000)

MOBILE v. BOLDEN
446 U.S. 55 (1980)

A fragmented Supreme Court majority upheld, 6–3, Mobile's at-large system for electing city commissioners, although the system diluted the voting strength of black voters by submerging them in a white majority. The plurality found that purposeful RACIAL DISCRIMINATION had not been demonstrated. (See WASHINGTON V. DAVIS; ROGERS V. LODGE.) In 1982 Congress amended the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 to permit reliance on racially discriminatory "results" to show a violation of the act's prohibitions.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MONELL v. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES
436 U.S. 658 (1978)

In 1961, MONROE V. PAPE had held municipalities effectively immune from suit under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE. Monell reinterpreted the legislative history relied upon in Monroe to conclude that municipalities may be sued under section 1983 but are liable only for acts constituting official policy. Not every violation of federal rights by municipal employees gives rise to an action against the municipality.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

MONETARY POWER

The monetary power of Congress flows from one express constitutional grant and a melange of others, cemented by the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE. The enumerated power deals with coin and has never been significant in American constitutional law. Congress's more important powers over the money supply—to charter banks and endow them with the right to issue circulating notes, to emit BILLS OF CREDIT, and to make government paper a legal tender—are only implied. From the administration of GEORGE WASHINGTON to the age of FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, few questions were debated with more intensity than the nature and scope of Congress's IMPLIED POWERS over the currency. At no point, however, did the Supreme Court offer sustained resistance to the extension of Congress's authority. In MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), the lodestar case on the monetary power, the MARSHALL COURT upheld incorporation of a bank as an appropriate means for executing "the great powers, to lay and collect taxes; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to declare and conduct a war; and to raise and support armies and navies." The HUGHES COURT invoked the same undifferentiated list of enumerated powers, reinforced by the necessary and proper clause, in the GOLD CLAUSE CASES (1935), where the last potential limitation on Congress's monetary power was swept away.

Two factors account for the Court's acquiescence. The ambiguous legacy of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 was especially important. Monetary questions loomed large in the political history of the Confederation era, and some of the Founders, perhaps a majority, wanted to constitutionalize a settlement. They acted decisively to curtail state power. Article I, section 10, provides that "no state shall . . . coin money; emit bills of credit; [or] make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." But the Founders were more circumspect when dealing with the scope of national power. JAMES MADISON's motion to vest Congress with a general power "to grant charters of incorporation" was not adopted because, as RUFUS KING explained, the bank question might divide the states "into parties" and impede ratification. JAMES WILSON suggested that the power to incorporate a bank was implied anyway; but GEORGE MASON, the only other delegate to speak on the matter, disagreed.

Conflicting conceptions of implied powers also materialized without being resolved in the much longer debate on Congress's authority to augment the money supply with government paper. The original draft of the Constitution, as reported to the convention by the Committee of Detail, empowered Congress "to borrow money and emit bills on the credit of the United States." When this section was reached in debate, GOUVERNEUR MORRIS moved to strike out the emission clause; the motion was ultimately carried by a vote of nine states to two. Yet there was no meeting of minds on the implications of Morris's motion before the roll call. Wilson, Mason, and virtually everyone else who spoke assumed that striking out the emission power was equivalent to prohibiting congressional exercise of such a power. Morris said that "the monied interest will oppose the plan of government if paper emissions be not prohibited." But NATHANIEL GORHAM remarked that he was for "striking out, without inserting any prohibition." And that was precisely what happened. Gorham neither mentioned the concept of implied powers nor flatly stated that eliminating the power to emit was by no means equivalent to prohibiting it. His remarks nonetheless suggest that at least some of the Founders assumed, despite Morris's protestations to the contrary, that to vote for his motion was to leave the paper money question to be settled as problems arose.

The sequence of federal legislation on banking and the currency was the second factor that shaped the growth of Congress's monetary power in constitutional law. Once the Constitution had been ratified, Congress was required to assert implied powers either to incorporate a bank or to issue paper money. Sanctioned exercise of one power could be expected to provide at least a modicum of constitutional authority for assertion of the other. Yet the Founders' distrust of government paper was so intense that it was possible for a skillful statesman to obscure the close constitutional relationship between the powers to incorporate banks and emit paper money by treating the former as a conservative policy alternative to the latter. ALEXANDER HAMILTON was such a statesman.

In his Report on the National Bank (1790) Hamilton stressed the "material differences between a paper currency, issued by the mere authority of Government, and one issued by a Bank, Payable in coin." The proposed national bank, he said, would serve as a financial arm of the government and a ready lender to the Treasury; its capital stock, consisting primarily of public securities, would be monetized in the form of bank notes redeemable in specie, thereby multiplying the nation's active capital and stimulating trade. Paper money, in contrast, was just too "seducing and dangerous an expedient," for "there is almost a moral certainty of its becoming mischievous." Much of the constitutional theory he mustered later to justify Congress's power to incorporate a bank was equally applicable to its power to issue paper money. But it is unlikely that the congressmen who approved the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES ACT or President Washington, who signed the bill despite forceful constitutional arguments against it by THOMAS JEFFERSON and others, would have sanctioned Hamilton's BROAD CONSTRUCTION of the government's implied powers in order to facilitate emissions of paper money. In view of JOHN MARSHALL's language regarding the sanctity of contracts in OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1827), it is equally significant the McCulloch involved national bank notes rather than depreciated government paper.

Between 1812 and 1815 there occurred another series of events with implications almost as great as McCulloch for the development of Congress's monetary power. The First Bank's charter expired in 1811; its successor was not created until 1816. When the War of 1812 began, then, the government had to finance its operations without the aid of a national banking system. On four separate occasions Congress followed President Madison's recommendation and authorized the emission of Treasury notes, fundable into government bonds and receivable for all duties and taxes owed to the government. Every piece of paper issued in 1812, 1813, and 1814 had a large denomination, carried a fixed term, and bore interest. But the 1815 issue was of bearer notes without interest, in denominations from three, five, and ten dollars upward, receivable in payments to the United States without time limit. Debate in Congress suggests that the notes were fully expected to circulate as currency. Nobody objected to them on constitutional grounds and all were retired soon after the war. Nevertheless, the 1815 Treasury notes provided what John Jay Knox later called "a fatal precedent."

Knox's was a shrewd observation. The Madison administration's Treasury notes were indistinguishable from the bills of credit which Gouverneur Morris and others thought they had prohibited at the Constitutional Convention. In defense of his motion to strike the emission clause, Morris had emphasized that "a responsible minister" could meet emergencies without resort to bills of credit. The remaining power "to borrow money," he had explained, would enable the Treasury to issue "notes"—a term which he understood to mean interest-bearing, fixed-term paper in contradistinction to "bills" which he defined as interest-free paper issued by the government in payment of its obligations. The Treasury notes emitted by the Madison administration were clearly of the latter variety. Moreover, the receivability of those notes for all public debts undermined Madison's own constitutional understanding of 1787. He had suggested that the Convention ought to retain the emission power while expressly prohibiting the power to make government paper a legal tender.

As he noted in his journal, however, Madison had "acquiesce[d]" in the Convention's decision once he "became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes as far as they could be safe and proper; and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency and particularly for making the bills a tender either for public or private debts." At Philadelphia, moreover, only Madison had emphasized the legal tender question. And as the bullionists on the Court learned during the post-Civil War LEGAL TENDER CASES, it was extremely difficult to deny Congress the legal tender power once its power to emit bills of credit had been conceded and McCulloch had established its discretion in the choice of appropriate means.

Yet the distrust of money-supply decisions made by legislation retained such great vitality during the nineteenth century that an attempt was made to proscribe irredeemable government paper on constitutional grounds. It came in Hepburn v. Griswold (1870). Speaking for a 4–3 majority, Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE declared that the legal tender legislation he had recommended during his tenure as ABRAHAM LINCOLN's secretary of the treasury was invalid insofar as it impaired the value of preexisting private debts. Chase began by reiterating Marshall's McCulloch commentary on implied powers and "the painful duty of this tribunal" with regard to laws inconsistent with the "letter and spirit" of the Constitution. He admitted that Congress had an "undisputed power" to emit bills of credit; in VEAZIE BANK V. FENNO (1869) he had said that Congress might even levy prohibitive taxes on the notes of state-chartered banks in order "to provide a currency for the whole country." But the legal tender power was distinguishable. It was not necessary, though perhaps convenient, for Congress to impart legal tender qualities to its paper in order to guarantee circulation. And legislation that impaired contracts was not only contrary to the "spirit" of the Constitution as Marshall and others had understood it but also deprived creditors of property without DUE PROCESS or JUST COMPENSATION.

The narrow construction of Congress's authority expounded in Hepburn did not endure. SAMUEL MILLER, dissenting along with NOAH SWAYNE and DAVID DAVIS, had claimed that the majority's reliance on the "spirit" of the Constitution substituted "an undefined code of ethics for the Constitution." In their view, McCulloch had established that "where there is a choice of means, the selection is for Congress, not the Court." WILLIAM STRONG and JOSEPH BRADLEY, whom ULYSSES S. GRANT nominated to the Court on the very day Hepburn was decided, agreed with the Hepburn dissenters and voted to overrule Chase's previous majority in Knox v. Lee (1871). Bradley stated in a concurring opinion that once the power to emit bills of credit had been conceded, "the incidental power of giving such bills the quality of legal tender follows almost as a matter of course." Strong's opinion for the Court responded forcefully to the "TAKING" claims advanced in Hepburn. An 1834 act passed pursuant to Congress's power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," he pointed out, had established a new regulation of the weight and value of gold coins. Creditors had sustained consequential injuries as a result, for antecedent debts had become "solvable with six per cent less gold than was required to pay them before." But it had never been imagined that Congress had taken property without due process of law. Congress's implied monetary powers, Strong concluded, were as plenary as its enumerated monetary power: "Contracts must be understood as made in reference to the possible exercise of the rightful authority of the government, and no obligation of contract can extend to the defeat of legitimate governmental authority."

Two other Chase Court decisions, Bronson v. Rodes (1869) and Trebilock v. Wilson (1872), reflected the law's continuing favor for freedom in private contract despite Strong's sweeping language regarding the plenary nature of Congress's monetary power. There the Court held that agreements specifically requiring payment in gold and silver coin could not be satisfied by tenders of irredeemable government paper. Coin was still a legal tender under federal law, the Court explained; because the Legal Tender Acts did not expressly prohibit parties from drafting contracts requiring payment in specie, it remained "the appropriate function of courts . . . to enforce contracts according to the lawful intent and understanding of the parties." Creditors found Bronson and Trebilock particularly reassuring in the Populist era. Although the Civil War greenbacks became redeemable at par in 1879, apprehensions of currency devaluation by "free coinage" of silver prompted virtually all draftsmen of long-term debt obligations to specify repayment in gold coin of a given weight and fineness. But the monetary crisis of 1933 led not only to another, apparently final abandonment of the gold standard and a substantial depreciation of the currency but also to a joint resolution of Congress that proclaimed gold clauses in private contracts to be "against public policy" and void. Eight years later, EDWARD S. CORWIN remarked that "no such drastic legislation from the point of view of property rights had ever before been enacted by the Congress."

The Court nonetheless sustained the resolution by a 5–4 margin in the GOLD CLAUSE CASES (1935). In Bronson and Trebilock, Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES explained for the majority, the Court had mandated the enforcement of contracts containing gold clauses at a time when Congress had not prohibited such agreements. Now Congress had acted; "parties cannot remove theirs transactions from the reach of dominant constitutional power by making contracts about them." JAMES MCREYNOLDS filed a discursive dissent in which he claimed, among other things, that the Constitution "is gone." In one respect his argument had some merit. Many of the Founders, perhaps a majority, had assumed that adoption of Gouverneur Morris's motion to strike the power to emit bills of credit precluded all government paper designed to circulate as money. Yet contracts were enforceable in government paper and only government paper after 1933. From another perspective, however, McReynolds's claim was simply perverse. The constitutional text does not forbid Congress to issue paper money, and American constitutional law not only sets limitations on what government does but also legitimizes government's authority to act affirmatively in the face of changing public interests. It was no accident that when Marshall emphasized the importance of remembering that "it is a constitution we are expounding," he did so in the leading case involving Congress's monetary power.

CHARLES W. MCCURDY
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1941 Constitutional Revolution, Ltd. Claremont, Calif.: Claremont Colleges.

DAM, KENNETH W. 1982 The Legal Tender Cases. Supreme Court Review 1981:367–412.

HURST, JAMES WILLARD 1973 A Legal History of Money in the United States, 1774–1970. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.

KNOX, JOHN JAY 1882 United States Notes: A History of the Various Uses of Paper Money by the Government of the United States. New York: Scribner's.

MONROE, JAMES
(1758–1831)

James Monroe was the last veteran of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION to serve as President of the United States. He had abandoned his studies at the College of William and Mary to join the army, and he rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel. He later read law under THOMAS JEFFERSON and, in 1782, was elected to the legislature of his native Virginia. From 1783 to 1786 he represented Virginia in Congress, where one of his chief concerns was the unsuccessful attempt to amend the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION to provide for a stronger central government. A committee chaired by Monroe drafted an amendment that would have given Congress the power to regulate commerce, but no action was taken on the amendment.

Notwithstanding his views on the Confederation, Monroe opposed RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION, primarily because it created too strong a central government and vested too much power in the President. He publicly professed to see in the proposed system a tendency toward monarchy and aristocracy, and he privately complained that the South would be outvoted on sectional issues.

From 1790 to 1794, Monroe represented Virginia in the United States Senate. There he was a leader of the Republican party and an opponent of the programs of ALEXANDER HAMILTON and especially of the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES ACT. He left the Senate in 1794 to become ambassador to France. He served as governor of Virginia (1799–1802), then held diplomatic posts abroad for the Jefferson administration, including an assignment as one of the negotiators of the LOUISIANA PURCHASE TREATY. He was again elected governor in 1811 but resigned to become secretary of state under President JAMES MADISON. During the War of 1812 he also acted as secretary of war.

Monroe's presidency (1817–1825) was notable for the rhetoric of constitutional literalism and STRICT CONSTRUCTION. He opposed congressional schemes for federally funded INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS (such as highways and canals) on the grounds that there was no constitutional authority for them; but he suggested a constitutional amendment to confer such authority. In 1820, despite reservations about the constitutionality of its conditions on admission of a state, Monroe approved the MISSOURI COMPROMISE limiting expansion of SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES. And in 1823, on the advice of Secretary of State JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, he asserted presidential control over FOREIGN AFFAIRS by proclaiming the MONROE DOCTRINE. During his administration, the opportunity for peaceful westward development was assured by the negotiation of treaties fixing the borders of the United States with Canada and with the Spanish and Russian possessions in North America.

The most pressing constitutional question of his time was the place of slavery in the American republic. Himself a slaveholder, Monroe favored gradual, compensated emancipation followed by settlement of ex-slaves in Africa. To that end he was a founding member of the American Colonization Society; and the capital of Liberia, the African state settled through the society's efforts, was named in his honor.

Monroe's last active role in public affairs was as president of the Virginia CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION of 1829.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

AMMON, HARRY 1971 James Monroe: The Quest for National Identity. New York: McGraw-Hill.

MONROE v. PAPE
365 U.S. 167 (1961)

This case, a fountainhead of modern CIVIL RIGHTS doctrine, arose out of an unconstitutional search conducted by Chicago police officers. The victim sought damages in an action brought under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, which authorizes suits for deprivations, under COLOR OF LAW, of rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States. Monroe settled that section 1983 protects all FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT rights and not merely those narrowly defined rights that the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) found to be protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause. Early litigation under section 1983 had suggested possible links between the scope of the privileges and immunities clause and the rights protected by section 1983. Monroe also confirmed earlier holdings in federal civil rights cases that the phrase "under color of" law in section 1983 includes official acts not authorized by state law. Monroe's third holding, that cities could not be made defendants in section 1983 cases, was overruled in MONELL V. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1978).

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

MONROE DOCTRINE

2 Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents 207 (1823)

The United States, the first true revolutionary nation, became, in 1823, the guardian of the emerging revolutionary states of the New World. The American constitutional ideal of republican, LIMITED GOVERNMENT, founded on NATURAL RIGHTS and SOCIAL COMPACT, stood in opposition to the constitutional system of Europe, based on hereditary privilege. The countries of the Western Hemisphere, becoming independent in the early nineteenth century, would, in rejecting the European system, seem naturally to embrace the American ideal.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, secretary of state to President JAMES MONROE, perceived the threat to the Americas from the reactionary Concert of Europe and the Holy Alliance. Adams formulated, and Monroe announced, a policy of resistance to any attempt to restore European hegemony in the Americas. Although Adams counseled use of diplomatic channels, Monroe, on the advice of Secretary of War JOHN C. CALHOUN, announced the doctrine in his 1823 State of the Union Message.

The proclamation of the Monroe Doctrine was a significant assertion of executive power in FOREIGN AFFAIRS. Although Monroe's address repeatedly stressed America's neutrality in European wars and in the colonial revolutions against Spain, his declaration that "we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety" was a clear warning that American interests would be vindicated by force, if necessary. The President, therefore, committed the country to potential military action outside its borders and announced the fact to Congress rather than asking for congressional authorization.

The Constitution, of course, makes no provision for so sweeping an assertion of executive authority over foreign affairs or so general a commitment of American power abroad. Yet the Monroe Doctrine swiftly became part of the UNWRITTEN CONSTITUTION, the accretion of customs and precedents that fill the constitutional lacunae.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

PERKINS, DEXTER 1955 A History of the Monroe Doctrine. Boston: Little, Brown.

MONTESQUIEU
(1689–1755)

The political philosophy of Charles de Secondat, Baron de la Brede et de Montesquieu, was an important influence on American constitutional thought. The leading republican theorist of the generation immediately preceding the American Revolution, he was referred to more frequently by the delegates to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 than any other theoretical writer. JAMES MADISON (in THE FEDERALIST #43) called him "the oracle . . . who is always consulted and cited." In the debates on the RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION the authority of Montesquieu was invoked by partisans ranging from Luther Martin to ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

Montesquieu's most important work was The Spirit of the Laws (1748). The book seems obscure and difficult to most readers, at least partly because the author tried to combine a philosophic inquiry, intended for a few readers only, with practical political advice meant for a much wider audience. In Montesquieu's practical teaching, based on observation, philosophic reflection, and firsthand experience, the American founders found the apparent resolution of two key problems of American politics: how to reconcile popular government with a vast extent of territory and how to reconcile energetic government with the security of liberty.

Montesquieu was the first political philosopher to treat FEDERALISM at any length. He believed, with the classical theorists, that republican government was possible only in small societies, for there alone could be found the virtue and public-spiritedness necessary if people are to govern themselves. But small republics are in constant danger from larger, despotic neighbors. The solution was the federal republic: "a convention by which several bodies politic consent to become citizens of a larger state . . . a society of societies who form a new one, which can enlarge itself through new associates who join."

But a large republic, even a federal republic, is liable to destruction through internal strife. Sectional and religious differences divide the people and make republican virtue impossible. For this, too, Montesquieu had an answer: "Commerce cures destructive prejudices; and it is almost a general rule that wherever there is commerce there are gentle ways of life." Commerce tends to make people peaceful and tolerant, and it makes them aware of their interdependence for security and comfort.

Montesquieu's greatest influence on American CONSTITUTIONALISM is seen in the twin doctrines of SEPARATION OF POWERS and CHECKS AND BALANCES. Montesquieu adopted the idea of separation of powers from JOHN LOCKE, but he fundamentally modified it by defining the three branches of government as legislative, executive, and judicial. Although Montesquieu introduced separation of powers in a famous chapter "On the Constitution of England," that chapter actually comprises not a description of the English government but rather a presentation of the conditions necessary for liberty and safety. Checks and balances, according to Montesquieu, are modifications of separation of powers necessary to keep any one branch of government from becoming despotic and to promote harmony of action.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

ALLEN, WILLIAM BARCLAY 1972 Montesquieu: The Federalist-Anti-Federalist Debate. Unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Claremont Graduate School.

PANGLE, THOMAS L. 1973 Montesquieu's Philosophy of Liberalism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MOODY, WILLIAM H.
(1853–1917)

After studying law in the offices of novelist-lawyer Richard Henry Dana, William Henry Moody of Massachusetts first came to national attention as a special prosecutor in the Fall River ax-murder case of Lizzie Borden (1892). In 1895 he went to Congress where he served as a Republican until President THEODORE ROOSEVELT appointed him secretary of the navy in 1902. When PHILANDER C. KNOX left the administration for the Senate in 1904, Moody replaced him as attorney general. Philosophically comfortable with the President, Moody spent much of his tenure directing the prosecution of the Beef Trust. Although Knox had begun the case, Moody successfully argued SWIFT & COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1905) before the Supreme Court, helping to lay the basis for the STREAM OF COMMERCE doctrine. As attorney general, Moody directed active participation by the Department of Justice in many facets of national ECONOMIC REGULATION, from antitrust proceedings to railroad regulation under the ELKINS ACT.

Roosevelt rewarded Moody's service and his commitment to a strong national government by appointing him to succeed Justice HENRY B. BROWN on the Supreme Court in 1906. Although Moody's service on the Court formally lasted until 1910, he was rarely present the last two years. Moody took part in relatively few cases during his tenure, but his opinions fulfilled Roosevelt's expectations and reflected Moody's moderate PROGRESSIVISM. As a Justice, Moody continued his support of regulatory legislation, often voting with the Court to extend or strengthen federal authority. Moody joined the majority in LOEWE V. LAWLOR (1908), holding that the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT covered labor boycotts, and he wrote for the dissenters in the first EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY CASES (1908), asserting that Congress had power to regulate employer-employee relations in INTERSTATE COMMERCE issues. Although that dissent typified Moody's willingness to expand the reach of federal powers, he also supported exercises of STATE POLICE POWER when they worked no interference with federal powers. An adherent of judicial self-restraint, Moody opposed judicial legislation and he silently concurred in MULLER V. OREGON (1908), in which the BRANDEIS BRIEF offered convincing EVIDENCE to the Court of the benefits of maximum hours legislation. In TWINING V. NEW JERSEY (1908), perhaps his best-known opinion, Moody, for the Court, declared that the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION was not an "essential element" of DUE PROCESS OF LAW incorporated in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and applicable to the states. If the people of the state were dissatisfied with the law, he declared, recourse "is in their own hands."

Stricken with acute rheumatism, Moody retired in 1910 and died, a semi-invalid, seven years later.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

MOORE, ALFRED
(1755–1810)

A staunch FEDERALIST in an ANTI-FEDERALIST state, Alfred Moore served as North Carolina's attorney general from 1782 to 1791 and was prominent in securing RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION there. He defended the state Confiscation Act in BAYARD V. SINGLETON (1787), opposing JUDICIAL REVIEW. President JOHN ADAMS appointed him to the Supreme Court in 1799 but he resigned in 1804 because of ill health. During his tenure Moore wrote only one opinion, in Bas v. Tingy (1800), a prize case. Moore's unexceptional opinion, together with those of the other Justices, lent support to congressional legislation dealing with the quasi-war with France.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

MOORE v. CITY OF EAST CLEVELAND
431 U.S. 494 (1977)

Although it produced no OPINION OF THE COURT, Moore is a major modern Supreme Court precedent confirming the Constitution's protection of the family. A 5–4 Court held invalid a city ordinance limiting occupancy of certain residences to single families and defining "family" in a way that excluded a family composed of Inez Moore, her son, and two grandsons who were not brothers but cousins. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, for a plurality of four Justices, concluded that "such an intrusive regulation of the family" required careful scrutiny of the regulation's justification. The city's asserted justifications—avoiding overcrowding, traffic and parking problems, and burdens on its schools—were served only marginally by the ordinance. The plurality thus concluded that the ordinance denied Mrs. Moore liberty without DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, concurring, characterized the ordinance as a TAKING OF PROPERTY without due process or compensation. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, dissenting, would have required Moore to exhaust her state administrative remedies before suing in federal court. Three other Justices dissented on the merits, rejecting both due process and EQUAL PROTECTION attacks on the ordinance and more generally opposing heightened judicial scrutiny of legislation merely on the basis of its effect on a family like the Moores.

The PLURALITY OPINION has become a standard citation for the reemergence of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, and more specifically for a constitutional right of an extended—but traditional—family to choose its own living arrangements. In a wider perspective the decision can be seen as part of the growth of a FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION. The decision was not, however, a blow against covert RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. East Cleveland was a predominantly black city, with a black commission and city manager. The ordinance, like ordinances in many white communities, was designed to maintain middle-class nuclear family arrangements. In this perspective, the PLURALITY OPINION is seen to collide with Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas (1974), which had upheld an ordinance excluding "unrelated" groups from single-family residences. Justice Powell's distinction of Belle Terre amounted to this: families are different. But he offered no definition of "family" apart from a generalized bow to "a larger conception of the family," including an extended family of blood relatives, for which he found support in "the accumulated wisdom of civilization." Of such stuff is substantive due process made.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BURT, ROBERT A. 1979 The Constitution of the Family. Supreme Court Review 1979:329, 388–391.

MOORE v. DEMPSEY
261 U.S. 86 (1923)

Moore was a landmark for two of the twentieth century's most important constitutional developments: the emergence of the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT as a limitation on state CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, and the assumption by the federal judiciary of a major responsibility for supervising the fairness of state criminal processes, through HABEAS CORPUS proceedings.

For all its importance, the case began as a squalid episode of racist ferocity. Returning from WORLD WAR I, a black Army veteran sought to organize black tenant farmers of Phillips County, Arkansas, into a farmers' union. In October 1919—a year disfigured by racial violence in both North and South—these farmers held a meeting in a rural church to plan efforts to obtain fair accountings from their white landlords. At this remove in time it requires effort to understand that such a meeting, in such a place, for such a purpose, was seen as revolutionary. A sheriff's deputy fired at the church; blacks who were armed fired back, killing the deputy and wounding his companion. Hundreds of new deputies were sworn; they and hundreds of troops arrested most of the county's black farmers, killing resisters. Responsible estimates of the black dead ranged from twenty-five to 200.

About 120 blacks were indicted for various crimes, including the murder of the deputy. The trial juries, like the grand jury that had issued the INDICTMENTS, were all white. Twelve men were convicted of murder and sentenced to death; dozens of others were sentenced to long prison terms. The twelve sentenced to death filed APPEALS in two groups of six each. One group, after multiple appeals, was released in 1923 by order of the Arkansas Supreme Court, for excessive delay in their retrial. The convictions of the remaining six, however, were affirmed by the state supreme court, and the U.S. Supreme Court denied certiorari. They unsuccessfully sought habeas corpus in the state courts, and again the Supreme Court declined to review the case.

By now the NAACP had mounted a national fundraising drive to support the six petitioners. Their execution, set for September 1921, was postponed by the filing of a habeas corpus petition in the federal district court. That court dismissed the writ. On direct appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, 7–2, with an opinion by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. (The opinion refers, apparently erroneously, only to the five petitioners who were tried together; the petition of the sixth was consolidated for hearing and decision.)

On REMAND to the district court, counsel for the six petitioners struck a deal; the habeas corpus petition would be dismissed and the sentence commuted to twelve years' imprisonment, making the men eligible for immediate parole. In 1925 the governor of Arkansas granted an "indefinite furlough," releasing them along with the others convicted following the Phillips County "insurrection."

The federal habeas corpus petition in Moore alleged that counsel appointed to represent the five defendants tried together did not consult with his clients before the trial; requested neither delay nor change of VENUE nor separate trials; challenged not a single juryman; and called no defense witnesses. The trial took forty-five minutes, and the jury "deliberated" less than five minutes. A lynch mob had been dissuaded from carrying out its purpose by a local committee, appointed by the governor to combat the "insurrection," who assured the mob that justice would be done swiftly. Two black witnesses swore they had been whipped and tortured into testifying as the prosecution wished. Holmes summarized the petition: "no juryman could have voted for an acquittal and continued to live in Phillips county, and if any prisoner, by any chance, had been acquitted by a jury, he could not have escaped the mob."

The Supreme Court held that these facts, if proved, justified two conclusions: the state had violated PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS, and the federal district court should grant the writ of habeas corpus. Today both conclusions seem obvious. In 1923, however, the Supreme Court had not yet begun to impose significant federal constitutional limitations on the fairness of state criminal proceedings. Moore lighted the path that would lead, in less than half a century, to an expansion of the liberty protected by the due process clause, applying virtually the entire BILL OF RIGHTS to the states. (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.)

Moore's other conclusion, concerning the reach of federal habeas corpus, also broke new ground. In FRANK V. MANGUM (1915), a case involving strikingly similar facts, the Court had rejected a claim to federal habeas corpus relief on the ground that the state courts had provided a full "corrective process" for litigating the accused's federal constitutional claims. Only in the absence of such a corrective process, the Court had held, could a federal habeas corpus court intervene. Moore did not explicitly overrule Frank, but it did look in a different direction. Justice Holmes, in his characteristically laconic way, said only that if "the whole proceeding is a mask," with all participants in the state trial swept to their conclusion by a mob, and if the state courts fail to correct the wrong, "perfection in the [state's] machinery for correction" could not prevent the federal court from securing the accused's constitutional rights. The right claimed in Moore, of course, goes to the essence of due process of law; when the basic fairness of a state criminal trial is challenged, the fact that the state courts have already had a chance to look into the matter seems a weak justification for barring federal habeas corpus.

From Moore through FAY V. NOIA (1963), the Supreme Court steadily widened access to federal habeas corpus for persons challenging constitutionality of state convictions. STONE V. POWELL (1976) and WAINWRIGHT V. SYKES (1977) marked the BURGER COURT's reversal of the direction of doctrinal change. Indeed, Stone revived the doctrine of Frank v. Mangum in cases involving claims based on the FOURTH AMENDMENT's guarantee against UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures. Yet, despite these limitations, Moore's legacy, even in the field of federal habeas corpus, remains vital to a system of national constitutional standards of fairness for persons accused of crime.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BATOR, PAUL M. 1963 Finality in Criminal Law and Federal Habeas Corpus for State Prisoners. Harvard Law Review 76: 441, 483–493.

WATERMAN, J. S. and OVERTON, E. E. 1933 The Aftermath of Moore v. Dempsey. St. Louis Law Review (now Washington University Law Review) 18:117–126.

MOOSE LODGE #107 v. IRVIS
407 U.S. 163 (1972)

Irvis, a black, was refused service at a Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, branch of the Moose Lodge, a fraternal organization whose fraternity knew bounds. Irvis sued under federal CIVIL RIGHTS laws for an INJUNCTION requiring the Pennsylvania liquor board to revoke the lodge's license so long as it continued to discriminate on the basis of race. The Supreme Court held, 6–3, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, that Irvis was not entitled to the relief he sought. The state's licensing was not, of itself, sufficient to satisfy the STATE ACTION limitation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and the Constitution offered no protection against RACIAL DISCRIMINATION by a private club.

In the majority's view, nothing in the case approached the "symbiotic relationship" between the state and private racial discrimination shown in BURTON V. WILMINGTON PARKING AUTHORITY (1961). Although Pennsylvania liquor licensees were subjected to a number of state regulations, that supervision did not "encourage" racial discrimination. Furthermore, because many liquor licenses had been issued in the area, the lodge's license fell short of creating a state-supported monopoly. Thus the state had not implicated itself in the lodge's discriminatory policies.

Justices WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS and WILLIAM J. BRENNAN wrote separate DISSENTING OPINIONS, each joined by Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL. The dissenters emphasized the degree of monopoly power of clubs licensed to sell liquor and the state's detailed regulation of licensees.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MOOTNESS

Article III's CASE OR CONTROVERSY restriction precludes federal courts from declaring law except in the context of litigation by parties with a personal stake in a live dispute that judicial decision can affect. They may not resolve moot questions—questions whose resolution can no longer affect the litigants' dispute because events after the commencement of litigation have obviated the need for judicial intervention. However live the issues once were, however much the parties (and the public) may desire a declaration of law, and however far the litigation may have progressed when the mooting events occur, Article III requires dismissal of the lawsuit. Common examples include a criminal defendant's death during appeal of a jail sentence, enactment of a new statute superseding one whose enforcement the plaintiff seeks to enjoin, or full satisfaction of a party's litigation demands.

Other cases exhibit less certainty that the substantive issues raised no longer need judicial action to forestall anticipated harm. In these cases, mootness questions are more troublesome. They inevitably introduce discretion to exercise or withhold judgment, discretion potentially influenced by the substantive issues' public importance. Thus, in DEFUNIS V. ODEGAARD (1974) a divided Supreme Court refused to decide the constitutionality of a race-conscious AFFIRMATIVE ACTION program for law school admissions when it appeared fairly certain that the challenger, who had only become a student through lower court victories, would be graduated irrespective of the lawsuit's outcome.

Several DOCTRINES reveal mootness to be a matter of degree. First, when changed circumstances moot the main dispute, but adjudication could produce collateral consequences, the issue is not moot, as when a prisoner's sentence expires before his appeal is decided, but the conviction might subject him to other civil or criminal penalties. Second, cases where defendants voluntarily agree to refrain from challenged behavior are not moot absent proof that they are unlikely to resume the behavior. This rule protects plaintiffs by preventing defendants from manipulating the mootness doctrine to avoid adverse decisions. Third, issues are not moot, despite passage of the immediate problem, when they are "capable of repetition, yet evading review," that is, when they arise sporadically, do not persist long enough to be reviewed before ceasing each time, and are reasonably likely to threaten the challengers again. Suits challenging ELECTION rules, where the immediate election passes before judicial resolution but the rules probably would affect the challengers in subsequent elections, or litigation challenging an abortion restriction that necessarily can apply to a woman only during the term of pregnancy are important instances where an unbending application of the mootness doctrine might deny judicial protection to persons periodically subject to harm. Finally, the Court generously allows a CLASS ACTION to continue, despite developments eliminating any need to protect the party bringing the lawsuit on behalf of the class, if the case is not moot as to other members of the class.

These refinements give federal courts some flexibility either to reach issues of their choice without pressing necessity to protect the parties or to decline to rule by insisting on a higher degree of probability that the threat of harm continues. Like other JUSTICIABILITY doctrines, mootness is not only a constitutional doctrine itself but a somewhat pliable tool of constitutional governance.

JONATHAN D. VARAT
(1986)

Bibliography

NOTE 1974 The Mootness Doctrine in the Supreme Court. Harvard Law Review 88:373.

MOOTNESS
(Update)

Constitutional litigation often takes place on two distinct planes. First, the parties disagree about whether government has wrongfully injured the plaintiff's liberty or PROPERTY interests. Second, the subject matter of the litigation sets the stage for a larger legal and ideological debate. If some event ends the parties' disagreement about the plaintiff's injury, so that a judicial decision would have no consequences for the parties, the case is said to be moot. The question is whether the case may continue to serve as a vehicle for settling the larger debate.

In general, the Supreme Court has answered this question negatively. A relatively straightforward case of mootness was presented in Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona (1997). The voters of Arizona had narrowly approved a ballot INITIATIVE establishing English as the state's official language. The plaintiff, Maria-Kelly Yñíguez, was a state insurance claims manager who in her daily work spoke Spanish to clients who understood only Spanish. Worried that the new law would prohibit her from speaking any Spanish on the job, she sued state officials, claiming that the initiative violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause.

After the trial court ruled in her favor, Yñíguez resigned from state employment to take another job, thus mooting the case. Yet both Yñíguez and backers of the initiative urged the courts to settle the constitutionality of the "OFFICIAL ENGLISH" LAW. The Supreme Court not only refused to allow the suit to go forward, but vacated all the proceedings in the courts below. Lacking a personal stake in the constitutionality of the initiative, Yñíguez no longer had a JUSTICIABLE dispute against the state.

The Court sometimes uses the mootness rules to adjust the timing of controversial decisions. In DEFUNIS V. ODEGAARD (1974), the Court refused to decide a challenge to AFFIRMATIVE ACTION in law school admissions, even though the "capable of repetition, yet evading review" exception used the previous term in ROE V. WADE (1973) appeared to apply. After the issue had percolated for four years, the Court decided REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), brushing aside a weighty argument that the case was moot. In another dubious opinion, Boston Firefighters Union, Local 718 v. Boston Chapter, NAACP (1983), the Court found a challenge to affirmative action in public hiring moot, only to decide the same issue the next year in a case that seemed no less moot, FIREFIGHTERS LOCAL UNION NO. 1784 V. STOTTS (1984).

In using the mootness DOCTRINE to refine the timing of its controversial decisions, the Court has consciously or unconsciously followed a practice once urged by Professor ALEXANDER M. BICKEL. He argued that the Court should use the mootness, STANDING, RIPENESS, and POLITICAL QUESTION doctrines in a frankly unprincipled manner so that proper timing would allow the Court to decide the merits of cases in a principled manner. Rather than hand down a decision when it would be especially divisive, the Court should wait until public opinion has matured to some degree.

History has yet to pronounce on the wisdom of this practice. Making unprincipled rulings on mootness grounds creates a tension with the Court's tradition of giving reasoned explanations for its decisions. Lawyers and lower court judges puzzle over technical-looking opinions that add up to little more than, "Better wait." Worse yet, unprincipled decisionmaking threatens the very public credibility that the Court seeks to protect.

EVAN TSEN LEE
(2000)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1986 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics, 2nd ed. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

FALLON, RICHARD H., JR. 1984 Of Justiciability, Remedies, and Public Law Litigation: Notes on the Jurisprudence of Lyons. New York University Law Review 59:1–75.

LEE, EVAN TSEN 1992 Deconstitutionalizing Justiciability: The Example of Mootness. Harvard Law Review 105:603–669.

MOREHEAD v. NEW YORK EX REL. TIPALDO
298 U.S. 587 (1936)

In June 1936 the Supreme Court ended its term with an opinion so startling that even the Republican party repudiated it at the party's national convention. The Republican plank read: "We support the adoption of State laws to abolish sweatshops and child labor and to protect women and children with respect to MAXIMUM HOURS, MINIMUM WAGES and working conditions. We believe that this can be done within the Constitution as it now stands." "This" was precisely what the Court had ruled could not be done. It had defended STATES' RIGHTS as it struck down national legislation, and in NEBBIA V. NEW YORK (1934) it had declared, "So far as the requirement of DUE PROCESS of law is concerned, a state is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare. . . ." Just two weeks before the Tipaldo decision, the Court had announced, in CARTER V. CARTER COAL COMPANY (1936), as it had in the SCHECHTER POULTRY CORP. V. UNITED STATES (1935), that the regulation of labor was a local matter reserved by the TENTH AMENDMENT to the states, and specifically the Court had referred to the fixing of wages as a state function. Thus the resolution of Tipaldo came as a surprise. The Court used the FREEDOM OF CONTRACT doctrine, derived from SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, to hold that the states lack power to enact minimum wage laws. The precedent that controlled the case, the Court ruled, was ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923).

Although Adkins had seemed to block minimum wage legislation, the Court grounded that decision on the statute's failure to stipulate that prescribed wages should not exceed the value of labor services. New York had carefully framed a minimum wage law for women and children that embodied the Court's Adkins standard: the state labor commission was empowered to fix wages "fairly and reasonably commensurate with the value of the service or class of service rendered." By a 5–4 vote the Court held the state act unconstitutional. Justice PIERCE BUTLER, speaking for the majority, declared, "Forcing the payment of wages at a reasonable value does not make applicable the principle and ruling of the Adkins Case." The right to make contracts for wages in return for work "is part of the liberty protected by the due process clause," Butler said, and the state was powerless to interfere with such contracts. Women were entitled to no special consideration. Any measure that deprived employers and women employees the freedom to agree on wages, "leaving employers and men employees free to do so, is necessarily arbitrary."

Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES dissented on ground that the statute was a reasonable exercise of the POLICE POWER, and he distinguished this case from Adkins because the Tipaldo statute laid down an appropriate standard for fixing wages. Justices HARLAN FISKE STONE, LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, and BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO concurred in Hughes's opinion but in a separate dissent by Stone they went much further. Stone accused the majority of having decided on the basis of their "personal economic predilections." He repudiated the freedom of contract DOCTRINE, adding: "There is grim irony in speaking of the freedom of contract of those who, because of their economic necessities, give their services for less than is needful to keep body and soul together." Following the reasoning of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, dissenting in Adkins, Stone declared that it made no difference what wage standard the statute fixed, because employers were not compelled to hire anyone and could fire employees who did not earn their wages. Stone would have followed the principle of Nebbia, which the majority ignored, and he would have overruled Adkins. A year later, after President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT proposed packing the Court, it overruled Adkins and Tipaldo in WEST COAST HOTEL V. PARRISH (1937).

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

LEONARD, CHARLES A. 1971 A Search for a Judicial Philosophy: Mr. Justice Roberts and the Constitutional Revolution of 1937. Pages 88–93. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press.

MORGAN v. VIRGINIA
328 U.S. 373 (1946)

This was the first transportation SEGREGATION case brought to the Supreme Court by the NAACP; counsel for the appellant were THURGOOD MARSHALL and WILLIAM H. HASTIE. A Virginia law required racial segregation of passengers on buses. A black woman, riding from Virginia to Maryland, refused to move to a rear seat; she was convicted of a MISDEMEANOR and fined $10. Eighteen states forbade such segregation of passengers, and ten states required it. In 1878 the Supreme Court had invalidated a state law forbidding racial segregation on an interstate carrier as an undue burden on INTERSTATE COMMERCE in HALL V. DECUIR. The NAACP lawyers rested on the Hall precedent, and did not argue that the Virginia law violated the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In an opinion by Justice STANLEY F. REED, the Supreme Court held, 7–1, that the law unduly burdened interstate commerce. Although the usual analysis of a STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE involves a balance of burdens on commerce against competing state interests such as health or safety, the Court avoided any discussion of a state interest in segregation, saying only that a uniform national rule of passenger seating was required for interstate carriers, if any rule was to be adopted. Justice HAROLD BURTON dissented.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

MORMON CHURCH v. UNITED STATES

See: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints v. United States

MORRILL ACT
12 Stat. 503 (1862)

The Morrill Land Grant College Act provided a basis for state support of public universities and thereby profoundly influenced the course of American higher EDUCATION.

Under the Land Ordinance of 1785, section 16 of every township was sold and the proceeds used to create a "school fund." In the late 1850s, Vermont Republican Justin Morrill promoted the "Illinois Idea," which would have authorized further land grants to create an "industrial college" in each state. But southern Democrats objected on constitutional grounds, seeing in Morrill's bill a threat to STATES' RIGHTS. In 1862, with these opponents withdrawn from Congress, the Land Grant College Act was passed. It provided that 30,000 acres of public lands be assigned to each state for each of its senators and representatives (or land scrip in an equivalent amount issued to states lacking available public lands). The proceeds of the land sales were to be invested to support a college "to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts," as well as "military tactics," "in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes." The American land-grant colleges are the result of this policy.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

MORRIS, GOUVERNEUR
(1752–1816)

A lawyer and businessman descended from a wealthy, landed family, Gouverneur Morris was elected to New York's first provincial congress in 1775. The next year, he was a member of the committee that drafted the state's first CONSTITUTION and wrote the message to New York's delegates to the Continental Congress instructing them to vote for the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. He was himself sent to the Continental Congress in 1778 and was a signer of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. In 1780 he moved to Philadelphia and served as assistant superintendent of finance under ROBERT MORRIS. In this last capacity, he drafted a report to Congress that contained the first official proposal for a national currency: a decimal coinage based on the Spanish dollar.

Gouverneur Morris was elected to Pennsylvania's delegation to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. In the debates of the Convention he spoke more frequently than any other delegate. He was an advocate of strong national government, but also of aristocratic privilege. His view of humankind was extraordinarily cynical, and, distrusting any higher motives, he desired to institutionalize private interests as a guarantee of liberty. Although, like Robert Morris, he proposed a senate chosen for life from men of great wealth, the proposal arose partly out of fear that otherwise the rich would corrupt the democratic elements of the regime. He favored a provision to allow Congress to veto state laws and wanted to unite the executive and judiciary in a council of revision to veto national legislation. He favored direct election of the President and congressional representation proportional to taxation; he opposed any constitutional protection of slavery or the slave trade. He was against giving Congress the power to admit new states on terms of equality, and throughout his life he advocated governing the western territories as provinces while retaining power in the East.

Morris was elected to the Committee on Style, along with WILLIAM SAMUEL JOHNSON (its chairman), JAMES MADISON, JAMES WILSON, and RUFUS KING. The committee entrusted Morris with the duty of preparing its report, and so Morris became the principal author of the actual words of the Constitution. He also devised the formula for signing the document—the signatures bearing witness to the unanimous consent of the states—and drafted the letter by which the Convention transmitted its work to Congress.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON asked Morris to collaborate in writing THE FEDERALIST, but Morris declined. He served as a senator from New York from 1800 to 1803, supporting the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801 and advocating the annexation—by force if necessary—of Louisiana. His public career also included a brief term as minister to France and the founding chairmanship of the Erie Canal Commission.

Morris opposed the War of 1812 as sectional and ill-conceived. The former champion of strong national government became an advocate of STATES' RIGHTS; he even counseled SECESSION of New York and New England from the Union. Morris was disappointed when the HARTFORD CONVENTION resolutions failed to embody that step.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

MINTZ, MAX M. 1970 Gouverneur Morris and the American Revolution. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

ROOSEVELT, THEODORE 1888 Gouverneur Morris. (American Statesman Series.) Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

MORRIS, ROBERT
(1734–1806)

The English-born merchant and patriot Robert Morris was an early supporter of colonial rights, opposing the Stamp Act and signing the Non-Importation Agreement in 1765. As a member of the Second Continental Congress (1776–1788), Morris voted against the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE because it was premature; but he later signed the Declaration as well as the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. He earned the nickname "Financier of the Revolution" because of his role in raising money to support the Army. In 1781, Congress chose him to be superintendent of finance. While serving in that capacity he organized the Bank of North America, chartered by Congress as a device for borrowing money to pay the costs of the new government. In 1783, he resigned the "insupportable situation" of superintendent of finance, giving as his reason that "to increase our debts while the prospect of paying them diminishes does not consist with my ideas of integrity."

He was a member of the Pennsylvania delegation to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. There he nominated GEORGE WASHINGTON to be presiding officer, but otherwise, despite his reputation in Pennsylvania politics as a speaker who "bears down all before him," he remained silent throughout the debates. He was a strong nationalist, and desired a Senate comprising men of great and established property appointed for life. Morris signed the Constitution, and, in a letter, recommended it as "the subject of infinite investigation, disputation, and declamation," but still the work not of angels or devils but of "plain, honest men."

Morris and his friends supported the Constitution not least because it promised economic stability, security of contracts, and relief from the harassment of the Bank of North America by the state governments. But Morris's support for ratification seems only to have increased the fervor of some anti-Federalists.

Morris would have been a leading candidate to become the first secretary of the treasury, but he did not want the post. Instead, in 1789, he was elected to the United States SENATE, where he became a leader of the FEDERALIST faction and a key ally of ALEXANDER HAMILTON in the matter of the assumption of state debts.

Morris retired from public life in 1795, and devoted his time to the management of his financial affairs, including his speculation in western lands. That speculation brought him, in 1797, to financial ruin and to three and one-half years in debtors' prison.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

MORRISON v. OLSON

See: Constitutional History, 1980–1989; Independent Counsel; Special Prosecutor

MORROW, WILLIAM W.
(1843–1929)

William W. Morrow served nearly thirty-two years on the federal bench. President BENJAMIN HARRISON in 1892 appointed him to the Northern District of California; President WILLIAM MCKINLEY in 1897 elevated him to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, where he served until retirement in 1923.

His most influential opinion came in In Re Wong Kim Ark (1897). Morrow relied on history and precedent in the Ninth Circuit to define a COMMON LAW basis for CITIZENSHIP. He held that under the first section of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT a child whose parents were subjects of the emperor of China but domiciled in the United States at the time of the child's birth derived his citizenship from the place of birth rather than the father's citizenship. Morrow's opinion, which the Supreme Court affirmed in UNITED STATES V. WONG KIM ARK (1898), confirmed the claims of thousands of Chinese to American citizenship.

Morrow's opinion in United States v. Wheeler et al. (1912) revealed his profound suspicion of federal authority. Arizona officials had refused to prosecute the perpetrators of the Bisbee deportations, in which private citizens had forcibly removed over 200 members of the Industrial Workers of the World from Arizona to New Mexico. The United States sought to prosecute the leaders of the deportation under the conspiracy section of the FORCE ACT OF 1870. Morrow, however, rejected federal intervention. He held that the Fourteenth Amendment applied only to those rights explicitly provided for by Congress and which had not been historically entrusted to the states. Morrow reasoned that the acts of private individuals did not constitute STATE ACTION under the amendment, that the 1870 act applied only to the rights of freedmen, and that Congress had not passed any statute making kidnapping a federal crime. Morrow refused to allow the federal government to intervene, no matter how just the cause, in an area traditionally left to the STATE POLICE POWER.

Morrow's conservative jurisprudence paralleled his Republican politics. Through three decades of service on the Ninth Circuit he provided leadership to a court committed, like himself, to precedent and DUAL FEDERALISM.

KERMIT L. HALL
(1986)

Bibliography

JURY, JOHN G. 1921 William W. Morrow. California Law Review 10:1–7.

MUELLER v. ALLEN
463 U.S. 388 (1983)

In this major case on the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, the Supreme Court altered constitutional law on the issue of state aid to parents of parochial school children. The precedents had established that a state may not aid parochial schools by direct grants or indirectly by financial aids to the parents of the children; whether those aids took the form of tax credits or reimbursements of tuition expenses did not matter. In this case the state act allowed taxpayers to deduct expenses for tuition, books, and transportation of their children to school, no matter what school, public or private, secular or sectarian.

Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST for a 5–4 Court ruled that the plan satisfied all three parts of the purpose, effect, and no-entanglement test of LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971). That all taxpaying parents benefited from the act made the difference between this case and the precedents, even though parents of public school children could not take advantage of the major tax deduction. Rehnquist declared that the state had not aided religion generally or any particular denomination and had not excessively entangled the state with religion even though government officials had to disallow tax deductions for instructional materials and books that were used to teach religion. According to the dissenters, however, the statute had not restricted the parochial schools to books approved for public school use, with the result that the state necessarily became enmeshed in religious matters when administering the tax deductions. The dissenters also rejected the majority point that the availability of the tax deduction to all parents distinguished this case from the precedents. The parents of public school children simply were unable to claim the large deduction for tuition. Consequently the program had the effect of advancing the religious mission of the private sectarian schools.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MUGLER v. KANSAS
123 U.S. 623 (1887)

In Mugler the Supreme Court took a significant step toward the acceptance of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, announcing it would henceforth examine the reasonableness involved in an exercise of STATE POLICE POWER. A Kansas statute prohibited the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor; the state arrested Mugler for making and selling malt liquor and also closed a brewery for being a public nuisance.

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN addressed the issue: did the Kansas statute violate the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT guarantee of DUE PROCESS OF LAW? He declared that such a prohibition "does not necessarily infringe" any of those rights. Although an individual might have an abstract right to make liquor for his own purposes, as Mugler contended, that right could be conditioned on its effect on others' rights. The question became who would determine the effects of personal use on the community? Harlan found that power lodged squarely in the legislature which, to protect the public health and morals, might exercise its police power. But, bowing to JOSEPH CHOATE's argument, he admitted that such power was limited. Harlan asserted that the courts would not be bound "by mere forms [or] . . . pretenses." They had a "solemn duty—to look at the substance of things"; absent a "real or substantial relation" of the act to its objects, the legislation must fall as a "palpable invasion of rights secured by the FUNDAMENTAL LAW." The Kansas statute easily passed this test, however, and Harlan denied any interference or impairment of property rights. Harlan likewise dismissed the contention that the closing of a brewery amounted to a TAKING OF PROPERTY without JUST COMPENSATION, thereby depriving its owners of due process. Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD dissented in part, urging the Court to adopt substantive due process.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Allgeyer v. Louisiana.)

MULLER v. OREGON
208 U.S. 412 (1908)

Despite the Supreme Court's previous rejection of a maximum hour law for bakers in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), here the Justices unanimously sustained an Oregon statute limiting women to ten hours' labor in "any mechanical establishment, or factory, or laundry." The sole issue was the law's constitutionality as it affected female labor in a laundry. Lawyers for Muller contended that the law violated FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, that it was class legislation, and that it had no reasonable connection with the public health, safety, or welfare. The state countered with LOUIS D. BRANDEIS's famous brief elaborately detailing similar state and foreign laws, as well as foreign and domestic experts' reports on the harmful physical, economic, and social effects of long working hours for women.

Justice DAVID BREWER, speaking for the Court, based his opinion on the proposition that physical and social differences between the sexes justified a different rule respecting labor contracts, thereby allowing him to distinguish Lochner. Although the Constitution imposed unchanging limitations on legislative action, Brewer acknowledged that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT's liberty of contract doctrine was not absolute. He invoked HOLDEN V. HARDY (1898), sustaining an eight-hour day for Utah miners, and portions of Lochner that similarly approved some exceptional regulations. Brewer declared that although the legislation and opinions cited in the BRANDEIS BRIEF were not "authorities," the Court would "take judicial cognizance of all matters of general knowledge."

The accepted wisdom that women were unequal and inferior to men animated Brewer's opinion. Women's physical structure and their maternal functions, he said, put them at a disadvantage. Long hours of labor, furthermore, threatened women's potential for producing "vigorous" children; as such their physical well-being was a proper object of interest "in order to preserve the strength and vigor of the race." Beyond Brewer's concerns for the "future well-being of the race," he contended that the long historical record of women's dependence upon men demonstrated a persistent reality that women lacked "the self-reliance which enables one to assert full rights." Legislation such as the Oregon maximum hour law, Brewer concluded, was necessary to protect women from the "greed" and "passion" of men and therefore validly and properly could "compensate for some of the burdens" imposed upon women.

Taken out of context, Brewer's remarks obviously reflected paternalistic and sexist notions. Yet they also reflected prevailing sentiments, which he invoked to justify an exception to his normally restrictive views of legislative power. The same arguments were advanced by those who sought an opening wedge for ameliorating some of the excesses of modern industrialism.

Although the Muller decision did not overrule Lochner, it reinforced a growing line of precedents to counter Lochner. Muller eventually led to BUNTING V. OREGON (1917), approving maximum hour laws for both sexes, a decision that Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT believed in 1923 had tacitly overruled Lochner—mistakenly, as it turned out, for the Court invoked Lochner to strike down a minimum wage law in ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923).

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Sex Discrimination.)

Bibliography

MASON, ALPHEUS T. 1946 Brandeis: A Free Man's Life. New York: Viking Press.

MULTIMEMBER DISTRICT

A multimember district (MMD) is a political district with more than one representative. European countries with proportional REPRESENTATION divide multiple representatives proportionally by party vote, normally producing many small, doctrinaire parties and volatile, schismatic governments. In United States MMDs, at-large, winner-take-all elections have been the rule, notably with ELECTORAL COLLEGE delegations. Winner-take-all puts more than proportional value on shiftable votes. Scholars believe that it has helped produce the American pattern of stable, center-seeking, two-party coalitions attentive to minorities who can form part of a winning coalition.

A ten-member, winner-take-all MMD offers less demographic variety—and less direct claim on any particular representative—than ten single-member districts; so MMDs have often been attacked for depersonalizing representation and submerging minorities. On the other hand, voters in MMDs have a mathematical advantage over voters in single-member districts (SMDs) because a 110 vote for ten representatives has more chance of affecting the overall election outcome than a full vote for one representative. Moreover, MMD representatives, who answer to one large constituency rather than to ten small ones, are thought more likely to vote as a bloc than SMD representatives. Hence, an MMD voter may have less access to his representative than does an SMD voter, but he also may have more power over electoral and legislative outcomes.

MMDs share with GERRYMANDERS the "standards problem": the incommensurability of the various ways in which dilution or concentration of a group can enhance or diminish the group's power for different purposes. Short of ordering proportional representation, there is no way to equalize a group's (or a group member's) effective power. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has been cautious in intervening against MMDs, as it has against gerrymanders. In Delaware v. New York (1966) it was unmoved by Delaware's argument that New York voters, with sixty-four delegates to the Electoral College, has 2.3 times as much chance to affect the election outcome as Delaware voters, with only three delegates.

Likewise, with the exceptions of judicially created MMDs and legislatively created ones drawn with the proven intent of submerging minorities, the Court has been tolerant of MMDs, even where their effect has been to submerge minorities. In Whitcomb v. Chavis (1971) and MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980) the Court held that submerging a minority is not per se a violation of the FOURTEENTH or FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. Purposeful discrimination must also be shown, as in White v. Regester (1973) and ROGERS V. LODGE (1982), where the plaintiffs demonstrated intentional discrimination against minority groups. Congressional critics (of the Mobile case) in 1982 succeeded in amending the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 to make racially disproportionate election results one "circumstance" relevant to the determination of a violation of the act. The amendment added a proviso that racially proportional representation is not required, but it left to the courts the task of giving meaning to its calculatedly uncertain operative language.

WARD E. Y. ELLIOT
(1986)

Bibliography

BANZHAF, JOHN E. 1966 Multi-Member Electoral Districts—Do They Violate the "One Man, One Vote" Principle? Yale Law Journal 75:1309–1338.

ELLIOT, WARD E. Y. 1975 The Rise of Guardian Democracy: The Supreme Court's Role in Voting Rights Disputes, 1845–1969. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS, GLOBAL MARKETS, AND THE CONSTITUTION

Multinational corporations (MNCs) are regulated by domestic and INTERNATIONAL LAW. In the United States, CORPORATIONS are normally established pursuant to state law, and their activities are regulated by state and federal law as limited by the Constitution. The authority of the United States to regulate activities of MNCs abroad is subject to limits established by international law.

Typically a "parent" MNC will conduct its operations in countries abroad through "subsidiary" corporations that the parent owns or controls. Under international law a corporation takes the nationality of the country in which it is incorporated, and that country thereby acquires the authority to regulate the conduct of its corporate nationals anywhere in the world. Thus, the United States has international law authority to tax and otherwise to regulate the worldwide conduct of its parent MNCs. In cases such as Blackmer v. United States (1932), the Supreme Court has confirmed the constitutional authority of Congress to adopt such LEGISLATION. Politically, however, Congress has generally been reluctant to impose U.S. economic regulation on American MNCs abroad for fear of putting them at a competitive disadvantage as against European and Asian competitors. The principal exceptions have been where regulation had high foreign policy significance, as in economic sanctions, or was important domestically, as in ANTITRUST and anticorruption legislation.

Most controversially the United States has claimed authority to regulate the conduct of foreign subsidiaries of U.S. parent MNCs in the case of economic sanctions legislation, even though those subsidiaries are also nationals of the foreign country where they are incorporated. The result has often been a conflict between the respective countries' trade and economic policies (involving countries such as China, the former Soviet Union, Iran, Libya, and Cuba), with the result that major trading partners of the United States have challenged its authority under international law to impose such regulation extraterritorially. In the face of intense opposition the United States has negotiated compromises, provided administrative and judicial relief to otherwise applicable penalties, and otherwise moderated its claims in particular cases, but it continues to defend the legitimacy under international law of its extraterritorial application of nationality-based economic sanctions law. The Supreme Court has never denied Congress's constitutional authority to adopt such legislation. Indeed, the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that, for purposes of determining the law to be applied in American courts, a subsequent statute supersedes an earlier inconsistent international rule—that is to say, Congress may violate international law. The International Court of Justice has not ruled on the U.S. position regarding the legality of its extraterritorial economic sanctions legislation under international law, although European courts have rejected it.

Under international law a country also has authority to regulate the conduct of MNCs within its territory, and Congress has similar power in the United States under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. Here too the United States has asserted the power to apply its law extraterritorially, for example, over the foreign conduct of foreign MNCs having a direct and substantial effect in the United States. These assertions have also been controversial politically and have been challenged as violative of international law. The Supreme Court has nevertheless upheld Congress's authority to pass such legislation. American courts normally construe ambiguous statutes to be consistent with international law, and Justice ANTONIN SCALIA has recently opined that international law requires a narrow construction of the antitrust laws in an extraterritorial context. The majority of the Supreme Court, however, declined to so hold. Thus, even the foreign activities of foreign MNCs are constitutionally subject to U.S. regulation if they cause a direct and substantial effect here. Again, an act of Congress supersedes international law as far as American courts are concerned.

Despite the potentially bewildering maze of nationality- and territorial-based regulation, and the potentially significant conflict that could result, MNCs' exploitation of global markets has been facilitated by international law. To the extent that legitimate economic regulation is strictly limited to a nation's territory or to its own corporate nationals, MNCs can better plan their operations. In addition, the free-trade regime centered on the World Trade Organization (WTO) provides stable rules on tariffs, quotas, taxation, subsidies, and unfair pricing of traded goods. The objective of the regime is to promote free trade, and the WTO now supervises related subjects including trade in services, intellectual property protection, and protection of investment and capital flows. All these international law guarantees significantly benefit MNCs in their development of global markets. Moreover, the WTO has introduced a legal dispute–settlement system, which promises to be more effective than previous international law institutions. Some of the U.S. assertions of extraterritorial application of law described above can even be challenged in the new WTO courts, so that Congress may be further inhibited from exercising its full constitutional power to regulate MNCs abroad.

To date, the focus of international law has been to support MNCs, with less attention to the ancillary social and environmental consequences of their access to global markets. Efforts in the United Nations to draft a Code of Conduct to regulate the behavior of MNCs have never been completed. Other codes, like those produced by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), the International Labor Organization (ILO), and MNCs themselves, are either voluntary or are not legally binding. Consequently, the only effective regulation of MNCs is national legislation and even this alternative is limited by international law.

PHILLIP R. TRIMBLE
(2000)

Bibliography

BORN, GARY B. and WESTIN, DAVID 1992 International Civil Litigation in United States Courts, 2nd ed. Boston: Kluwer Law and Taxation Publishers.

MUNDT-NIXON BILL
(1948–1949)

Karl Mundt of South Dakota and RICHARD M. NIXON of California, members of the HOUSE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES, sponsored the first anticommunist bill of the Cold War era. They contended that a house-cleaning of the executive department and a full exposure of past derelictions regarding communists would come only from a body in no way corrupted by ties to the administration. The measure (HR 5852) contained antisedition provisions but also reflected the view that the constitutional way to fight communists was by forcing them out into the open. The bill thus would have required the Communist party and "front" organizations to register with the Department of Justice and supply names of officers and members. It would also require that publications of these organizations, when sent through the mails, be labeled "published in compliance with the laws of the United States, governing the activities of agents of foreign principals."

The measure passed the HOUSE by a large margin but failed in the SENATE after becoming a controversial factor in the presidential campaign of 1948. The bill was denounced by the Republican candidate, Thomas E. Dewey, and numerous respected national publications as a form of unwarranted thought control.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Subversive Activity.)

Bibliography

COHEN, MURRAY and FUCHS, ROBERT F. 1948 Communism's Challenge and the Constitution. Cornell Law Quarterly 34: 182–219, 352–375.

MUNICIPAL BANKRUPTCY ACT
48 Stat. 798 (1934)

This legislation, amending the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, declared "a national emergency caused by increasing financial difficulties of many local governmental units." Hearings on the bill disclosed that over 2,000 municipalities in all forty-eight states were in default—including such cities as Detroit and Miami—to an estimated total of nearly three billion dollars. The act conferred ORIGINAL JURISDICTION on federal bankruptcy courts in proceedings for the relief of "any municipality or other political subdivision of any State." Such taxing districts were thus enabled to file petitions asserting their inability to meet their debts. The act required submission of a "plan of readjustment" to accommodate a municipality's debts. The courts could enforce a plan that was "fair [and] equitable" and was approved by either two-thirds or three-quarters of the creditors, depending on the nature of the district. Section 80(k) stated that "nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed to limit or impair the power of any State to control . . . any political subdivision" and required state approval of these bankruptcy petitions.

A 5–4 Supreme Court invalidated this act in ASHTON V. CAMERON COUNTY WATER DISTRICT (1936), but the Court sustained a substantially similar act in United States v. Bekins (1938).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

JACKSON, ROBERT H. 1941 The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy. New York: Knopf.

MUNICIPAL IMMUNITY

Although precise practice varied among the states, two distinctions shaped municipalities' COMMON LAW liability. First, cities were immune from harms resulting from the exercise of governmental functions, such as fire protection, but they were not immune for harms attending proprietary functions, such as running a business. This sovereignlike immunity drew upon cities' legal connection to sovereign states, but it was independent of the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity which states enjoy from suit in federal court. Since Lincoln County v. Luning (1890), cities and counties have not been viewed as part of the state for Eleventh Amendment purposes. Second, courts distinguished between discretionary functions, for which cities were immune, and ministerial activities, for which cities were not immune. As long as municipal liability was largely a branch of common law liability, courts articulated no significant distinctions between the treatment of federal claims against cities and claims brought under state law.

MONROE V. PAPE (1961), which reinvigorated SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, and transformed the liability of state and local officials for violations of federal law into a question of federal statutory interpretation, laid the groundwork for greater municipal liability for violations of federal rights. But Monroe also retarded this development by interpreting section 1983 not to authorize suits against municipalities for violations of federal law. Indeed, the Court suggested that Congress doubted its constitutional authority to do so.

Between 1961 and 1978 litigants employed, with mixed success, various techniques to exploit Monroe's federalization of official liability law, while at the same time avoiding Monroe's holding that section 1983 did not authorize suits against cities. While these techniques were still developing, MONELL V. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1978) drastically changed the law of municipal liability. Monell reinterpreted the legislative history relied on in Monroe, concluded that Congress had meant to subject cities to suit for violations of federal law, and overruled Monroe's limitation on suits against cities. But Monell also held that Congress had not intended cities to be liable merely because they had employed an individual wrongdoer. Under Monell, cities are liable for violation of federal law only if the violation is "by its lawmakers or by those whose edicts or acts may fairly be said to represent official policy."

The question whether an alleged violation of federal law may be characterized as official policy became even more critical when, in OWEN V. CITY OF INDEPENDENCE (1980), the Court held that cities may not rely on the good faith defense available to individual officials as part of the law of EXECUTIVE IMMUNITY. Owen also severed the final links between municipalities' common law immunities and their modern amenability to suit under federal law. The Court rejected reliance by cities on sovereign-based immunities; a higher sovereign, the United States, had in section 1983 commanded municipal liability. The immunity for discretionary acts fell because "a municipality has no 'discretion' to violate the Federal Constitution." Cities achieved a modest victory when, in City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc. (1981), the Court reaffirmed their traditional immunity from punitive damages claims.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

SCHNAPPER, ERIC 1979 Civil Rights Litigation After Monell. Columbia Law Review 79:213–266.

MUNN v. ILLINOIS

See: Granger Cases

MURDOCK v. PENNSYLVANIA
319 U.S. 105 (1943)

A city ordinance required anyone offering goods for sale or engaged in solicitation (as opposed to sale from fixed premises) to obtain a license and pay a fee. Jehovah's Witnesses charged with violating the ordinance challenged it as a violation of the free exercise clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT.

Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, delivering the OPINION OF THE COURT, held that although the Witnesses offered literature for sale, their activity was "as evangelical as the revival meeting," occupying the same high estate under the First Amendment as worship in churches and preaching from pulpits. On the same day the Court vacated the judgment in Jones v. Opelika (1942), where the Court had previously upheld such an ordinance against a similar challenge.

Justice STANLEY F. REED dissented, arguing that Jones v. Opelika had been correctly decided. Justices OWEN ROBERTS, FELIX FRANKFURTER, and ROBERT H. JACKSON joined Reed's dissent. Justice Frankfurter also dissented separately, arguing that persons are not constitutionally "exempt from taxation merely because they may be engaged in religious activities or because such activities may constitute the exercise of a constitutional right."

Murdock represented a step away from the traditional doctrine of REYNOLDS V. UNITED STATES (1879) which had held that otherwise valid secular regulations could be enforced against nonconforming behavior even if that behavior were religiously motivated. (See RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.)

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

MURPHY, FRANK
(1890–1949)

President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT appointed Frank Murphy to the Supreme Court in 1940. Murphy, who had been mayor of Detroit and governor of Michigan, was ATTORNEY GENERAL at the time of his appointment as a Justice. As attorney general he created the Civil Rights Section (now division) of the Department of Justice and supported a vigorous antitrust program. As spokesman for the Supreme Court in constitutional matters, Murphy made modest but significant contributions. But as author of CONCURRING and DISSENTING OPINIONS in constitutional areas of individual freedom, Murphy voiced some of the more eloquent and impassioned defenses of human liberty in the Court's history.

Murphy's tenure on the Court spanned the decade of the 1940s. That period witnessed the consolidation of the federal and state power to deal with pressing economic and social problems. Murphy eagerly joined in this judicial retreat from the philosophy of LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). Murphy's contribution to the de-Lochnerization of constitutional law was highlighted by his opinions for the Court in North American Co. v. Securities & Exchange Commission (1946) and American Power & Light Co. v. Securities & Exchange Commission (1946). Those decisions validated the "death sentence" clauses of the PUBLIC UTILITY HOLDING COMPANY ACT of 1935, the last major piece of NEW DEAL legislation to be challenged. In language reminiscent of JOHN MARSHALL's language in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), Murphy declared that the COMMERCE CLAUSE is "an affirmative power commensurate with the national needs." It gives Congress authority "to undertake to solve national problems directly and realistically, giving due recognition to the scope of state power," as well as to other constitutional provisions.

His first assignment to write a Court opinion produced a historic chapter in the development of FREEDOM OF SPEECH. In THORNHILL V. ALABAMA (1940) the Court held an Alabama antipicketing statute unconstitutional on its face. Murphy wrote that information concerning labor disputes is "within the area of free discussion . . . guaranteed by the Constitution." Such speech can be abridged only if there is a CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER that substantive evils may arise before the merits of the discussion can be tested in the market of public opinion. The Court, though later permitting certain "time, place, and manner" restrictions on picketing, has never repudiated the Thornhill doctrine.

Another landmark free speech opinion written by Murphy was CHAPLINSKY V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1942). Although controversial, the decision proved to be an influential forerunner of the Court's doctrinal notion that certain kinds of speech are of such slight social value as not to deserve full FIRST AMENDMENT protection. Such speech, said Murphy, includes "the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or 'FIGHTING' WORDS—those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate BREACH OF THE PEACE."

Murphy also made a provocative contribution to the once raging judicial battle over whether the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT totally or only selectively incorporates the BILL OF RIGHTS. While agreeing with Justice HUGO L. BLACK's total INCORPORATION DOCTRINE, Murphy in a dissent in Adamson v. California (1947) proposed an "incorporation-plus" approach. A state proceeding, he wrote, may be so wanting in DUE PROCESS as to warrant constitutional condemnation "despite the absence of a specific provision in the Bill of Rights." Murphy's suggestion has proved functionally similar to the Court's final choice of the "selective incorporation approach."

Murphy was seldom assigned to write majority opinions in other constitutional areas. Among the few that he did write were the short-lived Fourth Amendment opinion in TRUPIANO V. UNITED STATES (1948) and the influential FULL FAITH AND CREDIT opinion in Industrial Commission v. McCartin (1947). Thus most of his deeply held views on the constitutional rights of individuals had to find expression in concurring and dissenting opinions. Through these he developed his judicial philosophy and expressed his ardent opposition to restricting the constitutional rights of racial and religious minorities, the economically disadvantaged, and those accused of crime.

The most durable and the most highly praised of all these individualized opinions is his dissent from what Murphy called "this legalization of racism" in KOREMATSU V. UNITED STATES (1944). The Court there upheld the wartime relocation of all persons of Japanese ancestry residing on the West Coast. Murphy dissected the military report upon which the relocation was based, and found the report filled with discredited and questionable racial and sociological factors beyond the realm of expert military judgment. To Murphy, the relocation was nothing more than racial discrimination that was "utterly revolting among a free people who have embraced the principles set forth in the Constitution of the United States." This dissent has been described by commentators as a classic in Supreme Court literature, and as one that "should be engraved in stone."

In Falbo v. United States (1944), Justice Murphy wrote that the law "knows no finer hour than when it cuts through formal concepts and transitory emotions to protect unpopular citizens against discrimination and persecution." His instinctive empathy for the constitutional rights of the oppressed and the unpopular constitutes Murphy's lasting contribution to the development of constitutional law.

EUGENE GRESSMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

FINE, SIDNEY 1984 Frank Murphy: The Washington Years. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

HOWARD, J. WOODFORD 1968 Mr. Justice Murphy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

MURPHY, PAUL L.
(1923–1997)

Born in Caldwell, Idaho in 1923, Paul L. Murphy earned his B.A. at the College of Idaho in 1947 and his M.A. and Ph.D. at the University of California at Berkeley in 1948 and 1953, respectively. At the time of his death in 1997, he was Regents' Professor of History and American Studies and Adjunct Professor of Political Science at the University of Minnesota, Twin Cities, and Distinguished Adjunct Professor at Hamline University School of Law. He was also serving as President of the American Society for Legal History. Murphy expressed his deep personal commitment to individual autonomy, individual dignity, and individual self-determination in his teaching and scholarship and his active involvement in the AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION. He was an inspirational teacher, a superb scholar, and a loving friend.

In 1963 Murphy reminded scholars, lawyers, and judges of the importance of history in CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. He challenged historians to reclaim constitutional history and accord the field its proper place within American history generally and to provide "the most accurate, thoroughly documented, and impeccable history we are capable of producing" to help lawyers and judges build "a new order seeking a new level of equal rights and social justice through law." Murphy set the example with his own scholarship. His books include The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969 (1972); The Meaning of Freedom of Speech: First Amendment Freedoms from Wilson to FDR (1972), which won the ABA's Silver Gavel Award; and World War I and the Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States (1979). With James Morton Smith, he edited a document collection, Liberty and Justice, long regarded as a standard text in United States constitutional history. Murphy also published numerous articles, essays, and reviews in professional journals, law reviews, and book chapters on such diverse subjects as POLITICAL PARTIES, Native American rights, the Passaic Textile Strike of 1926, various BILL OF RIGHTS guarantees, and judges.

Murphy's scholarship, like his teaching, was interdisciplinary. His approach emphasized the importance of social, economic, political, and cultural contexts in which constitutional cases arise and judicial decisions are made. Through prodigious research in remarkably wide-ranging materials, which he synthesized into crisp narrative, Murphy explained changing legal DOCTRINE within the evolving social, economic, and political structures of twentieth-century America. Political activists, minorities, social and political elites, public interest groups, economic and social organizations, business institutions, professional associations, and academics play important roles in shaping public attitudes toward CIVIL LIBERTIES and individual rights, which, in turn, affect judicial outcomes. As a scholar and an academic, Murphy embodied the best of the American liberal tradition. A student and custodian of the FIRST AMENDMENT, a sacred article of his personal constitution, Murphy championed the role of law in securing individual freedom, justice, and equality.

ROBERT J. KACZOROWSKI
(2000)

Bibliography

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1963 Time To Reclaim: The Current Challenge of American Constitutional History. American Historical Review 69:64–79.

——— 1972 The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row.

——— 1972 The Meaning of Freedom of Speech: First Amendment Freedoms From Wilson to FDR. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press (Winner of the American Bar Association Gavel Award).

——— 1979 World War I and The Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States. New York: W.W. Norton.

MURPHY v. FLORIDA
421 U.S. 794 (1975)

Jack "Murph the Surf" Murphy appealed a Florida robbery conviction. He claimed that he was denied a FAIR TRIAL because the jurors learned about his previous robbery and murder convictions, and about the circumstances of the instant case, from newspaper reports. The Supreme Court, 8–1, sustained his conviction.

Speaking through Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, the Court held that juror exposure to information concerning the accused does not presumptively deny DUE PROCESS OF LAW. Since the VOIR DIRE did not discover juror hostility and there was no inflamed community sentiment, the totality of circumstances did not show inherent or actual prejudice.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Free Press/Fair Trial.)

MURPHY v. FORD
390 F. Supp. 1372 (1975)

On September 8, 1974, President GERALD R. FORD granted to his predecessor, RICHARD M. NIXON, a "full, free and absolute pardon . . . for all offenses" that he might have committed while President. A Michigan lawyer brought suit in federal District Court for a DECLARATORY JUDGMENT invalidating the pardon. The District Court judge dismissed the suit, holding that the PARDONING POWER is unlimited, except in cases of IMPEACHMENT, and may as properly be exercised before criminal proceedings begin as after conviction. Citing THE FEDERALIST, the judge argued that the intention of the Framers in establishing the pardoning power was to provide for just such instances.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Articles of Impeachment of Richard M. Nixon; Watergate and the Constitution.)

MURPHY v. WATERFRONT COMMISSION OF N.Y. HARBOR

See: Two Sovereignties Rule

MURRAY, WILLIAM
(Lord Mansfield)
(1705–1793)

The leading Tory constitutionalist of the eighteenth century, William Murray was appointed a judge after a career as a barrister and parliamentarian and service as attorney general. As Baron (later Earl) Mansfield, he was Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench from 1756 until 1788. He was active in the debates of the House of Lords and served for fifteen years in the cabinet. He opposed repeal of the Stamp Act in 1766, arguing that since the colonists were virtually represented in Parliament their complaints of TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION were without merit. Mansfield was a firm advocate of coercion in dealing with America, and he was the author of the Quebec Act of 1775.

In the WILKES CASES of 1763–1770 he held GENERAL WARRANTS illegal. He was tolerant of religious deviance and disapproved of prosecution of either Roman Catholic recusants or Protestant dissenters. In SOMERSET'S CASE (1772) he freed an escaped slave who had been recaptured in England, ruling that slavery was too odious to be supported by COMMON LAW. In SEDITIOUS LIBEL cases he allowed the jury to decide only the fact of publication, reserving the question of law—whether the published words were libelous—to be decided by the judge.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

MURRAY'S LESSEE v. HOBOKEN LAND & IMPROVEMENT COMPANY
18 Howard 272 (1856)

This case raised the question whether an act of Congress provided DUE PROCESS OF LAW in the proceedings it laid down for exacting payments due to the treasury by collectors of the customs. For the first time the Supreme Court expounded the meaning of due process of law, which limited all branches of government. The Court interpreted due process exclusively in terms of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS. The settled usages and modes of proceedings in English law, "before the emigration of our ancestors," that were not unsuited to the civil and political conditions of America constituted due process.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

MUSKRAT v. UNITED STATES
219 U.S. 346 (1911)

In one of a series of TEST CASES, the Court here refused to hear the suits involved because the parties failed to meet the constitutional requirement of CASES OR CONTROVERSIES (Article III, section 2). Congress had authorized certain Indians to sue the United States in the COURT OF CLAIMS and directed the ATTORNEY GENERAL to defend. The object was to determine the validity of certain congressional acts regarding Indian lands. The Court dismissed the suits, denying that Congress had the authority to create a case and designate parties to it.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority; Collusive Suit.)

"MUST CARRY" LAW

The development of the cable television industry has revolutionized the way most Americans watch television. Until the 1960s, television signals were broadcast through the air into people's homes and picked up by receivers in the television sets. Such signals used the electromagnetic spectrum, which has limited frequencies, and could only travel relatively short distances. Because of these technological limitations, Congress, through the Federal Communications Commission, claimed the power to regulate BROADCASTING in order to license and control the use of the limited number of frequencies or "channels" and to impose certain content restrictions and public interest obligations on the broadcasters given those licenses.

Because of the short range of broadcast signals, viewers could only receive programs transmitted by local broadcasting "stations," and people in remote areas got very poor signal reception. Cable television fundamentally changed the picture. First, cable transmits video signals through fiberoptic cables, not electromagnetic frequencies, and thus has the capacity to carry dozens, if not hundreds, of different channels at one time. Second, by transmitting their signals through cable wires, rather than through the air, cable operators can easily send their programs to distant places.

Initially, cable was used primarily to improve reception of broadcast stations in crowded urban or remote rural areas. But because of the large number of channels a cable station could transmit, the cable industry developed a large number of new sources of programming, and hundreds of new cable networks, such as Nickelodeon, The Discovery Channel, and Cable News Network (CNN), were created. Because of better reception and wider programming, cable soon became the source of transmission of programming to approximately 60 percent of the households in America.

Broadcasters felt threatened by this new source of programming and, more importantly, by the control that cable operators had over the broadcasters' ability to reach their audience. The broadcasters were dependent on cable operators to carry their programs over cable wires into homes that had switched to cable. Yet, the broadcasters were in competition with the cable industry over channels and programming. What was to keep the local cable company from refusing to carry the local broadcasting stations in order to enhance the market for the new cable networks and programs? And, if broadcasters were forced out of business, they argued, that would reduce the diversity of programming, and also harm the 40 percent of the American families that did not subscribe to cable. Cable operators had a "chokehold" over broadcasters and television programming.

At the urging of the broadcast industry and others, Congress passed the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992. That law mandated that all cable operators had to carry a reasonable number or percentage of "local commercial television stations" and local "noncommercial educational television stations" among the channels on their cable systems. The larger the number of channels, the more broadcast stations the system had to carry. Overall, the result was that approximately one-third of the channels on any cable system had to be made available for use by local commercial or noncommercial broadcast stations.

These "must carry" rules were challenged as violating the FIRST AMENDMENT rights of cable operators and programmers. But in a 1994 ruling, TURNER BROADCASTING SYSTEM V. FCC, the Supreme Court held that those rules were constitutional.

JOEL M. GORA
(2000)

Bibliography

MASETH, MICHAEL W. 1995 Comment: The Erosion of First Amendment Protections of Speech and Press: The "Must Carry" Provisions of the 1992 Cable Act. Capital University Law Review 24:423–456.

MEYERSON, MICHAEL I. 1995 Authors, Editors, and Uncommon Carriers: Identifying the "Speaker" Within the New Media. Notre Dame Law Review 71:79–125.

SYMPOSIUM 1997 Telecommunications Law: Unscrambling the Signals, Unbundling the Laws. Columbia Law Review 97:819–1201.

MYERS v. UNITED STATES
272 U.S. 52 (1926)

An 1876 statute authorized presidential appointment and removal of postmasters with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the SENATE. (See APPOINTING AND REMOVAL POWER.) President WOODROW WILSON appointed Myers with Senate consent but later removed him without consulting that body. Myers filed suit in the COURT OF CLAIMS and appealed that court's adverse decision to the Supreme Court.

Chief Justice, and former President, WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, in a broad construction of Article II, found the statute unconstitutional. For a 6–3 majority he insisted upon the necessity for the nation's chief executive officer to be able to remove subordinates freely: "To hold otherwise would make it impossible for the President . . . to take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS, and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS dissented. Brandeis declared that implying an unrestricted power of removal from the power of appointment "involved an unnecessary and indefensible limitation upon the constitutional power of Congress." History and present state practice demonstrated "a decided tendency to limit" the executive's removal power, and he also cited the DOCTRINES of CHECKS AND BALANCES and the SEPARATION OF POWERS.

The Court limited the doctrinal reach of Myers in HUMPHREY'S EXECUTOR V. UNITED STATES (1935).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

N

NAACP v. ALABAMA
357 U.S. 449 (1958)

In this decision the Supreme Court first recognized a FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION guaranteed by the FIRST AMENDMENT. Alabama, charging that the NAACP had failed to qualify as an out-of-state CORPORATION, had sought an INJUNCTION preventing the association from doing business in the state. In that proceeding, the state obtained an order that the NAACP produce a large number of its records. The association substantially complied, but refused to produce its membership lists. The trial court ruled the NAACP in contempt and fined it $100,000. The state supreme court denied review, and the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously reversed.

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN wrote for the Court. First, the NAACP had STANDING to assert its members' claims; to rule otherwise would be to require an individual member to forfeit his or her political privacy in the act of claiming it. On the constitutional merits, Harlan wrote: "Effective advocacy . . . is undeniably enhanced by group association"; thus "state action which may have the effect of curtailing the freedom to associate is subject to the closest scrutiny." The privacy of association may be a necessary protection for the freedom to associate "where a group espouses dissident beliefs." Here, disclosure of NAACP membership in Alabama during a time of vigorous civil rights activity had been shown to result in members' being fired from their jobs, physically threatened, and otherwise harassed. Only a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST could justify this invasion of political privacy. That compelling interest was not shown here. The names of the NAACP's rank-and-file members had no substantial bearing on the state's interest in assuring compliance with its corporation law.

This same technique—solemnly accepting the state's account of its purposes, ignoring possible improper motives, and concluding that those state interests were not "compelling"—was employed in other cases involving efforts by southern states to force disclosures of NAACP membership such as Bates v. Little Rock (1960) and Shelton v. Tucker (1960).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Commission.)

NAACP v. BUTTON
371 U.S. 415 (1962)

The Supreme Court held that Virginia statutes forbidding one person to advise another that his legal rights had been violated and to refer him to a particular attorney were unconstitutional as applied to activities of the NAACP and its legal defense fund. The furtherance of litigation designed to challenge the constitutionality of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION was a mode of expression and association protected by the FIRST and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS. The Court acknowledged that INTEREST GROUP LITIGATION, aimed at changing constitutional law through TEST CASES, was not only professional legal activity subject to state regulation but also constitutionally protected political activity.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

NAACP v. CLAIBORNE HARDWARE COMPANY

See: Labor and the Constitution

NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE & EDUCATIONAL FUND

The NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc., was founded in 1939 by board members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to conduct the legal program of the association through a corporation qualified to receive tax deductible contributions. The association was not tax exempt, because it lobbied. Board members of the association served on the board of the Fund; the Fund's director and some of its lawyers also were employees of the association.

In 1957 the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) objected to the interlocking staff and board because it enabled an organization not tax exempt to influence one entitled to tax exemption. The IRS required termination of the interlocking arrangement. Thereafter the Fund and the association were no longer formally linked, and the Fund functioned entirely independently with its own board, staff, budget, and policies. The Fund has since represented individuals and organizations with no relationship to the association at all as well as members and branches of the association.

In 1984 the Fund's staff consisted of twenty-four lawyers, with offices in New York and Washington, D.C., and several hundred cooperating lawyers across the United States. Its budget was $6.7 million. It has served as a model for the public interest law movement generally, including other legal defense funds, such as those dealing with discrimination against Hispanics, Asians, women, the handicapped, homosexuals, and the aged, as well as public interest firms representing environmental, consumer, migrant worker, and other groups.

The Fund's director-counsel was THURGOOD MARSHALL, who served until 1961 and was succeeded by Jack Greenberg, who directed the organization until 1984, when he was succeeded by Julius L. Chambers. The Fund has been involved in most of the leading cases dealing with racial discrimination in the United States, including BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), which held unconstitutional racial SEGREGATION in public education, the principle of which was ultimately extended to all other governmental activities. Brown was the culmination of a planned litigation effort which built upon earlier Fund cases involving RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in graduate and professional schools. In the 1960s, the Fund provided representation in most of the cases generated by the CIVIL RIGHTS movement, including representation of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., Thereafter, following passage of the Civil Rights Acts of the mid-1960s, the Fund brought most of the leading cases enforcing those laws. The Fund has represented civil rights claimants in more than 2,000 cases dealing with education, employment, VOTING RIGHTS, housing, CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, health care, and other areas of the law.

JACK GREENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

RABIN, ROBERT L. 1976 Lawyers for Social Change: Perspectives on Public Interest Law. Stanford Law Journal 28:207–261.

NAFTA

See: North American Free Trade Agreement

NARCOTICS REGULATION

See: Drug Regulation

NARDONE v. UNITED STATES
302 U.S. 379 (1937)

After the Supreme Court largely exempted ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING from constitutional control in OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928), protection against WIRETAPPING was sought legislatively. In 1934, Congress passed the COMMUNICATIONS ACT, section 605 of which provided that "no person" could intercept and divulge radio and wire communications. In Nardone v. United States the Supreme Court ruled that section 605 extended to federal agents; later the Court applied it also to state officers in Benanti v. United States (1957). The Justice Department construed section 605 very narrowly, however, and it was rarely invoked. It has been largely superseded by Title III of the OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT (1968).

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

NASHVILLE CONVENTION RESOLUTIONS
(1850)

Fearing that Congress might enact the WILMOT PROVISO, abolish the slave trade in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, or adopt other antislavery measures, southern separatists called for a convention of slave states to meet at Nashville in June 1850. The convention adopted resolutions asserting that: the TERRITORIES were the joint property of the people of all the states; Congress could not discriminate among owners of different kinds of property in the territories, and hence could not exclude slaves; and the federal government must protect all forms of property, including slaves, in the territories. However, the moderates who dominated the convention added that if the free states refused to recognize these principles, the slave states would accept a division of the territories by extending the MISSOURI COMPROMISE line to the Pacific, an extraordinary concession on the central constitutional issue that disgusted the radicals. A poorly attended adjourned session of the convention, dominated by radicals, met in November 1850, denounced the COMPROMISE OF 1850, advocated SECESSION, but proposed no immediate program. The resolutions of the Nashville Convention are thus significant principally as an indication of the slave states' inability to unite on a secessionist platform.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Slavery and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

POTTER, DAVID M. 1976 The Impending Crisis, 1848–1861. New York: Harper & Row.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE

See: NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund

NATIONAL EMERGENCIES ACT

See: Emergency Powers

NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE ARTS v. FINLEY

See: First Amendment; Freedom of Speech; Public Forum

NATIONAL ENVIRONMENTAL POLICY ACT

See: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT
48 Stat. 195 (1933)

The National Industrial Recovery Act (NIRA) was the best-known and, perhaps, in President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's words, "the most important and far-reaching legislation ever enacted" by the NEW DEAL Congress. The act was designed to curb unemployment, stimulate business recovery, and end the competitive wars of the Great Depression. By May 1935, over 750 codes covering some twenty-three million people had been created under the NIRA's authority. Even before Roosevelt's inauguration, his "brain trust" had begun to plan a recovery bill. Introduced May 17, 1933, the bill raised questions of constitutionality. Congress passed it, however, and Roosevelt signed it into law on June 16.

The act declared a national emergency and justified congressional action under the COMMERCE CLAUSE and the GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE. Section 2 established the National Recovery Administration (NRA) to supervise the NIRA, limiting its operation to two years. The heart of the act, section 3, provided for the framing of "codes of fair competition" by private businessmen and trade associations. After meeting certain requirements and obtaining presidential approval, these codes became "standards of fair competition" with the full force of federal law, regulating industrywide prices, wages, and practices. Such an extraordinary DELEGATION OF POWER was unprecedented: it allowed private citizens to draft codes to rule industry and provided, at best, minimal policy guidelines and standards. Violations of the codes "in any transaction in or affecting INTERSTATE or FOREIGN COMMERCE [were] deemed an unfair method of competition in commerce within the meaning of the FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT." Upon complaint or failure of an industry to formulate a code, the President could establish a compulsory code. Section 7 prescribed three mandatory provisions for every code: availability of COLLECTIVE BARGAINING, employee freedom from coercion to join or refrain from joining a union, and compliance with regulated MAXIMUM HOURS AND MINIMUM WAGES. The various clauses of this section constituted the broadest regulation of wages and hours in American history to that date. The NRA also incorporated in its "blanket code" a provision outlawing child labor in industries without specific codes. Although the NIRA prohibited monopolies and monopolistic practices, it exempted code-covered industries from the antitrust laws. Title II of the NIRA established a Public Works Administration to stimulate construction and, by spending its $3.3 billion budget, to increase purchasing power.

Serious questions of the act's constitutionality eventually reached the Supreme Court, however, and in SCHECHTER POULTRY CORP. V. UNITED STATES (1935) a unanimous Court voided the NIRA for unconstitutionally delegating power to the President and exceeding the limits of the commerce power. Despite this decision and PANAMA REFINING COMPANY V. RYAN (1935), invalidating other provisions, Congress gradually replaced the act with new and more effective legislation. Although historians debate whether the NRA impeded or encouraged recovery and reform, the lessons of this experiment in economic planning provided valuable experience for drafting later legislation such as the WAGNER (NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS) and FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACTS.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

LYON, LEVERETT S. et al. 1935 The National Recovery Administration: An Analysis and Appraisal. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

ROOS, CHARLES F. 1937 NRA Economic Planning. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACTS

See: Taft-Hartley Labor Relations Act; Wagner Act

NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES v. USERY
426 U.S. 833 (1976)

This case proved that obituaries for DUAL FEDERALISM were premature. It arose after Congress amended the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT (FLSA), in 1974, to extend wages-and-hours coverage to nearly all public employees. Several states, cities, and intergovernmental organizations sought to enjoin enforcement of the new provisions. Admitting that the employees in question would come within the federal commerce power if they worked in the private sector, the plaintiffs argued that congressional regulation of employment conditions for state and municipal workers violated "the established constitutional DOCTRINE of INTERGOVERNMENTAL IMMUNITY." A three-judge district court disagreed, ruling that under Maryland v. Wirtz (1968), which had upheld the application of wages and hours regulations to public schools and hospitals, an employee's public status was irrelevant to the scope of congressional authority. On APPEAL, the Supreme Court reversed the lower court, 5–4, holding that the FLSA amendments could not constitutionally be applied to public employees performing "traditional governmental functions."

Writing for the Court, Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST initially confronted the sweep of the COMMERCE CLAUSE recognized in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824). The grant of congressional power was plenary, he conceded, but did not override "affirmative limitations" on Congress. The TENTH AMENDMENT provided the most explicit source for such a limitation, for in Fry v. United States (1975) the Court had offered the dictum that the amendment "expressly declared the constitutional policy that Congress may not exercise power in a fashion that impairs the States' integrity or their ability to function effectively in a federal system." Yet Rehnquist emphasized a less explicit limitation—the overall federal structure. Within it, states perform essential governmental functions, and state decisions about these functions, which include fire protection and law enforcement, must be free from federal interference. Wages and hours legislation constituted a forbidden infringement, because it "operate[s] directly to displace the States' freedom to structure integral operations in areas of traditional governmental functions. . . ." Indeed, he expressly held the Court had wrongly decided Wirtz.

But the meaning of National League of Cities as precedent is not clear. Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN qualified his crucial fifth vote with a concurrence that interpreted the Court as "adopt[ing] a balancing approach." For him, the decision did not preclude regulation of states in areas, such as environmental protection, where the federal interest was demonstrably greater. And the Court itself expressly left open the power of Congress to regulate even traditional state functions by employing the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER or by enforcing the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. (See FITZPATRICK V. BITZER.)

In dissent, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN charged that the decision contained "an ominous portent of destruction of our constitutional structure" and delivered a "catastrophic body blow" to the commerce power. In his view, Rehnquist had misread earlier case law and had abandoned the plain meanings of the commerce and SUPREMACY CLAUSES. Moreover, Rehnquist's "essential function test" was "conceptually unworkable," for it failed to clarify the distinction between essential and other state activities.

The Court's opinion did lack a reasoned test for determining the essential functions of states "qua states." It also ran counter to forty years of judicial acceptance of broad congressional power under the commerce clause. Accordingly, National League of Cities led to further litigation over state immunity from federal regulation and injected the Supreme Court into issues long dormant. In GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985) a different 5–4 majority flatly overruled National League of Cities, but the dissenters promised that disinterment of the 1976 decision awaited only one more vote.

CHARLES A. LOFGREN
(1986)

Bibliography

BARBER, SOTIRIOS A. 1976 National League of Cities v. Usery: New Meaning for the Tenth Amendment? Supreme Court Review 1976:161–182.

LOFGREN, CHARLES A. 1980 The Origins of the Tenth Amendment: History, Sovereignty, and the Problem of Constitutional Intention. Pages 331–357 in Ronald K. L. Collins (ed.), Constitutional Government in America. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press.

NAGEL, ROBERT F. 1981 Federalism as a Fundamental Value: National League of Cities in Perspective. Supreme Court Review 1981:81–109.

NATIONAL POLICE POWER

The "national police power" is not, strictly speaking, a constitutional power of Congress. Rather, it is a phrase describing the power of Congress, acting under the enumerated powers, to enact "police legislation." The term "police legislation" includes criminal law as well as health, morals, safety, antidiscrimination, and environmental statutes.

Under our federal system, national police power regulation has always been controversial. Police matters are historically state or local concerns, and yet some problems seem to call for a national solution. The recurring issues, therefore, are whether Congress should address a problem that has historically been attacked at the state or local level and whether the courts can articulate any principled limits on congressional power to do so.

The Constitution provides a number of sources of power for national police legislation. The most important are the congressional powers to regulate commerce, to tax, and to spend. However, several other powers should not be overlooked. The postal power makes possible laws to protect consumers from fraudulent or obscene materials transmitted through the mails, subject to significant First Amendment limitations. The enabling clauses of the THIRTEENTH and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS open the way for a variety of antidiscrimination laws. (See JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968), racial discrimination in housing; UNITED STATES V. GUEST (1966), violence against minorities in the use of public facilities.)

Because such local activities as manufacturing or gambling are not themselves interstate commerce, they are not, without more, subject to federal commerce clause regulation. However, constitutional developments during the twentieth century have marked out two techniques which, alone or in combination, permit virtually unlimited regulation of local activity under the aegis of the COMMERCE CLAUSE: prohibition of INTERSTATE COMMERCE and linking a local activity to an "effect" on interstate commerce.

A few early statutes prohibited particular forms of interstate commerce (such as transportation of diseased cattle or use of unsafe locomotives) because they physically endangered the stream of commerce. In 1895, however, Congress took a further critical step by prohibiting the interstate transportation of lottery tickets. Transportation of the tickets harmed nobody; Congress was obviously concerned that the use of the tickets in the receiving state was harmful to public morals. Thus the prohibition on transportation really was a technique to assist the states in stamping out national (or international) lotteries. Under traditional assumptions, of course, the regulation of gambling or of consumer fraud was a state responsibility, but individual state regulation of lotteries had proved ineffectual.

In CHAMPION V. AMES (1903), often referred to as "The Lottery Case," the Supreme Court upheld the federal statute by a 5–4 vote. The majority believed that the shipment of articles in interstate commerce that were harmful to the public safety or morals was a "misuse" of commerce, the prohibition of which lay well within the commerce power. This rationale paved the way for many later statutes which treated various goods or persons as "outlaws" of commerce and thus prohibited their shipment. For example, the courts upheld regulation or prohibition of interstate transportation of adulterated food, prostitutes, obscene literature, and stolen cars upon the authority of Champion. In addition, the Court upheld statutes banning the interstate shipment of items (such as liquor or goods produced by convict labor) that violated the laws of the receiving state.

In addition to permitting regulation of interstate transportation of goods, Champion provided authority for regulation of the use of the goods after they arrived. Finally, although most of the commerce-prohibition cases involved regulation of purely commercial activity, the Court in Caminetti v. United States (1917) found no constitutional objection to punishing a man for transporting a woman to whom he was not married across the state lines for immoral, but wholly noncommercial, purposes. (See HOKE V. UNITED STATES.)

The usefulness of the commerce-prohibiting technique suffered a temporary but sharp reverse after Congress decided to use it for the purpose of abolishing child labor. In HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) the Supreme Court held that Congress could not prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of goods made by children, because the goods were lawfully produced in the state of origin and harmless both to interstate commerce and to users in the receiving state. The government tried to show that the law was necessary to achieve fair interstate competition, because states allowing child labor had an unfair advantage over those prohibiting it. The Court said that Congress had no power to equalize comparative advantages or disadvantages among the states.

Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES's dissent in Hammer seemingly demolished the majority opinion and ultimately became the law when UNITED STATES V. DARBY overruled Hammer in 1941. Darby made clear that Congress could prohibit the interstate shipment of harmless goods manufactured by workers whose wages or working hours violated the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT. The Court in Darby accepted the theory, rejected by the Hammer majority, that Congress could use the commerce-prohibiting technique to improve labor conditions in the state of origin and to achieve fair competition among states. After Darby, therefore, there was no longer any obstacle to the achievement of police goals by the prohibition of interstate commerce in people or goods, absent the violation of some other constitutional norm.

In the landmark commerce clause case of GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL seemingly established that a local activity could be regulated by Congress under the commerce clause if the activity "affected" other states. Nevertheless there arose a confusing body of case law on the extent to which local affairs could be regulated because of their effect on interstate commerce. On the one hand, for example, the Shreveport case, HOUSTON, EAST AND WEST TEXAS RAILWAY V. UNITED STATES (1914), allowed the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate intrastate railroad rates because low rates for intrastate hauls and high rates for interstate hauls unfairly discriminated against interstate commerce. On the other hand, early antitrust cases, including UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. (1895), cast doubt on Congress's power to regulate monopolies in manufacturing because manufacturing was considered local; the Court evidently assumed that granting regulatory power to the national government would prevent the states from regulating the activity.

In several cases during the 1930s, narrow majorities of the Supreme Court invalidated New Deal legislation that sought to regulate local activity affecting interstate commerce (such as labor relations in coal mining in CARTER V. CARTER COAL CO., 1936). By the late 1930s, however, these cases had been disapproved. By the time of WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942) there was no longer any dobt that Congress had power to regulate purely local and individually trivial activities which (when cumulated) substatially affected interstate commerce. In that case the Court ruled that Congress could regulate home consumption of wheat because of its aggregate effect on an inerstate market.

Thus the "affecting commerce" rationale was available when Congress turned to national police legislation. The Fair Labor Standards Act not only prohibited interstate transportation of goods manufactured by persons whose wages or hours violated the act; it also directly prohibited the production of such goods for interstate commerce. United States v. Darby upheld the manufacturing prohibition on two distinct theories. The Court held that manufacturing could be prohibited (even if transportation had not been prohibited) because production of goods under substandard labor conditions was a form of unfair competition that substantially affected interstate commerce. In addition, the Court upheld the manufacturing ban as a necessary and proper incident of Congress's power to prohibit interstate transportation of the goods. This latter theory opened the way for Congress to ban virtually any local activity if it also bans interstate transportation of the persons who conduct the activity or the goods produced by it.

Congress has frequently resorted to the "affecting commerce" rationale when it pursues fundamentally noneconomic objectives. The Court has generously upheld federal statutes upon determining that Congress has "rationally" concluded that a local activity substantially affected commerce. For example, the Court upheld in KATZENBACH V. MCCLUNG (1964) a federal prohibition on racial discrimination, as applied to a restaurant that had purchased food from a local seller who had purchased it in interstate commerce. The Court's tenuous theory was that Congress could rationally conclude that discrimination in such restaurants decreased interstate sales of food. (See HEART OF ATLANTA V. UNITED STATES.)

The "affecting commerce" rationale has opened the way for a vast expansion of federal criminal law. In PEREZ V. UNITED STATES (1971) the Court upheld a conviction under the federal loan-sharking statute, even though the defendant had no apparent contact with interstate commerce. In previous cases, such as Katzenbach v. McClung, the characteristic used to identify the regulated party had a connection to interstate commerce, but in Perez, the characteristic ("loan-sharking") had no such connection. However, the Court deferred to congressional findings that loan-sharking is used by multistate organized crime rings to raise or launder money to take over legitimate businesses. It then held that because loansharks as a "class" substantially affect interstate commerce, any member of the class can be reached by a federal criminal statute, regardless of the individual's actual interstate connections. Of course, this approach is drastically over-inclusive, but it is justifiable because it is difficult to ascertain in a given case whether a particular loanshark has connections to organized crime and thus to interstate commerce. The Perez theory that Congress can criminalize an entire class, when some members of that class substantially affect interstate commerce, undergirds several other federal racketeering, gambling, and drug abuse statutes. (See LAW ENFORCEMENT AND FEDERAL-STATE RELATIONS.)

The "prohibiting commerce" and the "affecting commerce" techniques, used separately or together, thus provide the authority for virtually limitless expansion of national police power. Given only slight ingenuity in statute-drafting, a local activity which Congress wishes to regulate or prohibit can be linked somehow to interstate commerce.

Nevertheless, the Court has employed a number of low-visibility judicial techniques to slow the federalization of police power. It has frequently construed narrowly statutes that make unexpected intrusions into local domains, reasoning that Congress should clearly state its intention to expand national police power. Moreover, in construing federal criminal statutes, the Court takes into account its view of an appropriate balance between state and federal law enforcement. These constructional techniques require Congress at least to face and consider the implications of a drastic extension of federal power. Similarly, the Court may hold that an ambiguous criminal statute fails to give fair warning to those affected by it if a broad construction would punish essentially local activity.

In considering congressional police power under the commerce clause, the most important open question is whether a majority of the Supreme Court will hold that a "trivial" effect on interstate commerce is an insufficient foundation. A number of Justices have written that questions of degree are important to them and that the cumulative effect on commerce of the class of regulated activities must be "substantial." In several cases involving federal stripmining legislation, for example, including HODEL V. VIRGINIA SURFACE MINING AND RECLAMATION ASSOCIATION and Hodel v. Indiana (1981), the court unanimously upheld statutes which regulated stripmining on steep slopes and on farmland against claims that land use control is a uniquely local function. The Court found that Congress had acted rationally in identifying the environmental effects of stripmining as substantial burdens on interstate commerce and that the means chosen by Congress were rational. Two Justices wrote separately to emphasize that their concurrence was based on the substantiality of the effect. In the past, other Justices have expressed similar reservations. If a majority of the Supreme Court were actually to assess the substantiality of the effect on commerce of the class of regulated activities before upholding a statute, it would be much less clear than it seems today that the Constitution imposes no effective limit on the national police power under the commerce clause.

By using its power to tax an activity, Congress can discourage, regulate, or prohibit the activity. Consequently, a power intended to furnish Congress with the means for raising revenue can be effectively employed for police purposes. Occasional taxpayers have contended that a so-called tax is really regulatory in purpose and effect, and consequently not a tax at all. In early cases, such as UNITED STATES V. DOREMUS (1919), the Court upheld tax statutes with patently obvious regulatory goals, taking the tax label at face value. The court turned a blind eye to the fact that the tax would destroy the taxed business, that it produced little or no revenue, or that its administrative provisions were inappropriate for tax collection.

However, when Congress sought to prohibit child labor by taxing income from the sale of products made by children, the Court rebelled. In BAILEY V. DREXEL FURNITURE CO. (1922) it concluded that the tax was actually a regulatory measure, for it provided for a tax of ten percent on annual net income if the taxpayer knowingly used child labor on even a single occasion. Thus, said the Court, Congress had used the taxing power as a pretext for an attempt to regulate manufacturing—something it had previously held beyond Congress's power.

Ultimately, the court abandoned any effort to distinguish taxation from regulation. In upholding the federal gambling tax, which obviously was intended to stamp out illegal gambling rather than to raise revenue, the Court noted that a federal tax is valid even though it may destroy the taxed activity, raises little revenue, and contains enforcement provisions more appropriate to a criminal statute than a tax provision. In United States v. Kahriger (1953), decided over a strong dissent by Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, the Court held that unless the tax law contains penalty or administrative provisions "extraneous to any tax need," it is valid.

The Court later limited its Kahriger precedent. MARCHETTI V. UNITED STATES (1968) held that the registration requirement for gamblers entailed coerced self-incrimination, in violation of the Fifth Amendment. Nevertheless, unless a tax runs afoul of a specific provision of the Bill of Rights, it seems unlikely that the Court will ever again seek to patrol the troubled border between taxation and regulation. There is little need for the distinction, now that virtually any activity it seeks to regulate through taxation could be easily reached through the commerce power.

Through its power to spend for the general welfare,

Congress can enlist state or private cooperation in achieving an endless list of regulatory goals. All it needs to do is place conditions on offers of federal money. If the offer is sufficiently generous, the recipients are virtually certain to accept the conditions.

In the 1930s the Supreme Court made a doomed attempt to limit the traditional practice of regulation through conditional grants. It held that a federal program of payments to farmers, upon condition that they contractually agree to limit their acreage, was an invalid attempt to regulate agriculture and thus an incursion into a matter left to the states. In UNITED STATES V. BUTLER (1936) it declared that Congress could not purchase submission to a regulation that it could not impose directly.

The Butler prohibition on conditional spending lasted only a year. The SOCIAL SECURITY ACT contained a joint federal-state taxing and spending program to pay unemployment compensation. To induce the states to participate, Congress imposed a payroll tax on employers. However, a taxpayer received a credit of ninety percent of the federal tax if its state levied a payroll tax and adopted a system for distributing benefits that complied with the federal statute. As a practical matter, this credit, which had the effect of a federal expenditure, required states to participate in the program. Nevertheless, the court upheld that statute in STEWARD MACHINE COMPANY V. DAVIS (1937), approving the concept of "cooperative federalism" and declaring that no state was coerced into adopting an unemployment compensation system. However, the Court indicated that it might have some doubts if the federal law imposed conditions that were unreasonable or unrelated in subject matter to legitimate national objectives or entailed surrender by states of quasi-sovereign powers.

Since Steward Machine, the Court has consistently upheld conditional spending programs in the few cases that have raised the issue. For example, in Oklahoma v. Civil Service Commission (1947) it sustained a system of conditional highway construction grants to states. A recipient state had to consent to a provision in the HATCH ACT precluding administration by any person involved in political campaigns. Because the state was free to reject federal funding, no coercion was involved.

Conditional federal grants have been used to achieve a wide variety of federal police objectives, particularly in the areas of environmental protection, affirmative action, education, and health services. However, in PENNHURST STATE SCHOOL V. HALDERMAN (1981) the Court sounded a warning. If a state is to be bound by a condition on its receipt of federal funds, the condition must be unambiguously stated in the statute. Otherwise, a state's acceptance might not have been knowing and voluntary. Like the requirement that Congress make a clear statement that it intends a criminal statute to reach an essentially local activity, the clear statement rule of Pennhurst requires Congress to focus on the issue of federalism when it adopts a conditional spending program.

Congress has ample power to achieve national police power objectives. The commerce clause, the postal, taxing, and spending power, and the enabling clauses of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments furnish authority for almost any conceivable expansion of national regulatory jurisdiction. However, the Court has suggested (sometimes in OBITER DICTUM) potential limitations on these powers which might someday be invoked to constrain an extension of federal authority.

Much more important than any judicially imposed limits are the political constraints on the national police power. Various structural elements of the national government assure sympathetic treatment for arguments based on federalism; for example, states opposing federal intrusion are protected by the fact that each state has two senators (regardless of population). Among other factors, state legislative control over House districting and the state-oriented organization of national political parties also assure respectful treatment for state or local contentions that extension offederal regulation is unnecessary. Similarly, the selection of the President by the Electoral College emphasizes the importance of states. The powerful representation of states at the national level, the tradition that police regulation is performed at the state level, and the inertia of Congress all work together to assure that intrusions by the national government into matters of state concern are likely to occur only when a broad national consensus emerges that centralization is necessary.

MICHAEL ASIMOW
(1986)

Bibliography

CUSHMAN, ROBERT E. 1919 National Police Power under the Commerce Clause of the Constitution. Minnesota Law Review 3:289–319, 381–412, 452–483.

——— 1920 National Police Power under the Postal Power of the Constitution. Minnesota Law Review 4:402–440.

KADEN, LEWIS B. 1979 Politics, Money and State Sovereignty: The Judicial Role. Columbia Law Review 79:847–897.

STERN, ROBERT L. 1973 The Commerce Clause Revisited: Federalization of Intrastate Crime. Arizona Law Review 15:271–285.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1954 The Political Safeguards of Federalism: The Role of the States in the Composition and Selection of the National Government. Columbia Law Review 54:543–560.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION CASES

See: Amending Process; Eighteenth Amendment

NATIONAL SECURITY ACT
69 Stat. 495 (1947)

This act embodies the most comprehensive reorganization ever undertaken of the means by which the WAR POWERS are to be exercised. The act unified the command of the armed forces, officially organized the Joint Chiefs of Staff, created the Air Force department, and established the office of secretary of defense. The separate army and navy establishments recognized in the Constitution, together with the air force, became a single, permanent "National Military Establishment."

Furthermore, the act erected, within the executive branch, the National Security Council. The original intention of Congress seems to have been to constrict the President's freedom of action in defense and FOREIGN AFFAIRS by prescribing the persons to be consulted and the manner of consultation in national security decision making. In fact, however, strong and politically skillful Presidents have used the council to strengthen their own positions, as, for example, President JOHN F. KENNEDY did during the Cuban missile crisis of 1962.

Under the National Security Council the act created the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), with a broad charter to conduct foreign intelligence-gathering activities, as well as to process and disseminate intelligence gathered by other agencies. The act specifically prohibited domestic intelligence activities on the part of the CIA.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

NATIONAL SECURITY AND THE FOURTH AMENDMENT

The right to individual privacy and the preservation of national security have jarred against each other for centuries. "National security cases . . . often reflect a convergence of First and FOURTH AMENDMENT values not present in cases of 'ordinary' crime," wrote Justice LEWIS F. POWELL for a unanimous Supreme Court in UNITED STATES V. UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT (1972). The early English cases, such as the WILKES CASES (1763–1770), establishing the right to keep the government out of a home unless it has PROBABLE CAUSE and a judicially approved warrant to enter, arose from successful challenges by political dissidents to searches by royal officers hunting for seditious writings. Preventing such infringements on both personal security and free expression was the main purpose of the Fourth Amendment. Today, Presidents claim inherent executive power to break into homes, to make physical SEARCHES AND SEIZURES, to open mail, and to video-tape, WIRETAP, and bug—again in order to protect national security.

Where the surveillance is directed against national security threats by domestic groups or individuals, the Supreme Court has held that the President has no inherent executive power, and a warrant must first be obtained. The government's needs will not be presumed to outweigh the threats such a power poses for the rights of free speech and personal security; rather, a search against domestic threats must be approved in advance by a neutral magistrate. The Court did suggest that Congress could authorize less stringent procedures for domestic intelligence gathering than for crime detection, but so far Congress has not done so.

Foreign national security issues have been treated very differently. Courts have generally accepted the claim of inherent presidential power to use electronic surveillance, video-tapes, and physical entries against both foreigners and Americans in order to obtain foreign intelligence, without obtaining prior judicial approval. The power is justified on several grounds: the need for stealth, speed, and secrecy to counter foreign threats; the executive's superior experience and knowledge of FOREIGN AFFAIRS and the judiciary's relative lack of competence in such matters; and the executive's primacy in foreign affairs in the constitutional scheme. This power is limited to intelligence gathering, so that when the investigation becomes a criminal investigation and the warrantless interception is made for the purpose of gathering evidence for a prosecution, the requirements of Title III of the OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT must be satisfied. This inherent intelligence gathering power, moreover, can be exercised only by the President or the attorney general; a lower-level official cannot authorize intelligence-gathering break-ins or wiretaps on his own, without judicial approval.

In 1976, a Senate committee issued a massive documentation of the many abuses of Fourth Amendment rights perpetrated by executive officers and the intelligence agencies from the 1930s through the 1970s. The Central Intelligence Agency, for example, admitted wiretapping people it considered "left-wingers" both in this country and abroad in a project it called "Operation Chaos," even though the agency had no authority to operate domestically. It was trying to find links between antiwar groups and foreign powers, which were never found. The military eavesdropped on radio messages in the late 1960s and early 1970s in connection with civil disorders, with full knowledge that such eavesdropping was illegal. In 1969, President RICHARD M. NIXON authorized taps on four journalists and thirteen government employees, allegedly to discover who was leaking foreign affairs information; these taps were kept in operation for over two years even though it quickly became clear that nothing pertinent to the leaks was being learned.

In reaction to these revelations and to the Watergate abuses, Congress in 1978 banned electronic surveillance for foreign national security purposes within the United States, without prior judicial approval. Under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) the executive branch no longer has inherent power to tap and bug for foreign intelligence-gathering purposes. With the approval of the attorney general, a federal official may apply to a specially selected court (composed of regular federal judges) which sits in secret. The court must issue a warrant if it finds probable cause to believe, first, that the target is a foreign power or agent, and, second, that certain procedures to minimize the interception have been set up; an American who, on behalf of a foreign power, engages in clandestine intelligence gathering that may involve criminal activity, may be considered a foreign agent, though not for activities protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT. Other control procedures are also established, though they are less stringent than those for electronic surveillance for crime detection under Title III. The FISA applies to foreign intelligence gathering by any type of electronic, mechanical, or other surveillance device, but not to physical break-ins, mail openings, and the like—these remain subject to the more traditional claims of inherent presidential power.

Although the FISA was held constitutional by a federal district court, there is still no definitive Supreme Court ruling on the existence of inherent executive power to break into homes for foreign national security purposes or to eavesdrop on Americans without a warrant.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

Bibliography

CARR, JAMES G. 1977 (1981 supp.) The Law of Electronic Surveillance. New York: Clark Boardman.

SCHWARTZ, HERMAN 1977 Taps, Bugs, and Fooling the People. New York: Field Foundation.

UNITED STATES, CONGRESS, SENATE SELECT COMMITTEE TO STUDY GOVERNMENTAL OPERATIONS WITH RESPECT TO INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES 1976 III Final Report. 94th Congress, 2d session.

NATIONAL TREASURY EMPLOYEES UNION, UNITED STATES v.
513 U.S. 454 (1995)

The U.S. Congress in 1989 prohibited federal employees from receiving any compensation for any outside speeches or articles. In challenging the statute's constitutionality, the National Treasury Employees Union condemned the law's broad sweep, noting that postal workers were banned from accepting fees for lectures on religion and federal scientists could not supplement their income by writing dance reviews. The Supreme Court, by a 6–3 vote, agreed that the statute violated the FREEDOM OF SPEECH rights of federal employees below the level of GS-16, but left questions concerning upper-level federal employees unanswered.

The MAJORITY OPINION, authored by Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, emphasized the public interest in permitting federal employees to speak on matters of public concern, and the ways in which bans on compensation might chill such speech. Nathaniel Hawthorne and Herman Melville wrote major works while on the public payroll, and the Justices seemed concerned that the statute under attack might deter future literary geniuses in the civil service. The majority opinion further recognized that banning low-level PUBLIC EMPLOYEES from being compensated for their outside speeches and articles would not improve the efficiency of the workplace by improving morale or preventing corruption, though few employers encourage their employees to moonlight.

United States v. National Treasury Employees Union offers less to public employees than meets the eye. A Court committed to judging the free-speech rights of public employees on a case-by-case basis merely seemed offended by the crudeness of the restriction under constitutional attack. In the last half of the 1990s, federal employees retain the right to criticize the local production of Swan Lake, but place themselves at risk if they publicly challenge decisions made by their agencies.

MARK A. GRABER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: First Amendment; Patronage; Public Employees and Free Speech; Waters v. Churchill.)

NATIONAL TREASURY EMPLOYEES UNION v. VON RAAB
489 U.S. 656

In this companion case to SKINNER V. RAILWAY LABOR EXECUTIVES ASSOCIATION, the Supreme Court upheld 5–4, the constitutionality of federal regulations requiring urine testing of all Customs employees involved in drug interdiction, carrying weapons, or handling classified materials. Justices ANTONIN SCALIA and JOHN PAUL STEVENS, who had supported the majority in Skinner, joined the Skinner dissenters in this case.

Scalia believed that considerations of public safety and the relation between drugs and accidents had justified the departure from individualized suspicion in Skinner. These considerations did not prevail in this case. NO EVIDENCE existed to show that Customs employees used drugs, let alone that such use jeopardized the public. Accordingly, the public safety could not be furthered by the urinalysis required of these employees. The search itself, Scalia believed, was "particularly destructive of privacy and offensive to personal dignity." The Court majority, however, remained convinced that the government had a compelling interest in ensuring the physical fitness of the employees required to submit to urine testing.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

NATIONAL UNITY, GROUP CONFLICT, AND THE CONSTITUTION

Writing on behalf of the Supreme Court in SHAW V. RENO (1993), Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR complained that race-sensitive REAPPORTIONMENT schemes reinforce "the perception that members of the same racial group . . . think alike, share the same political interests, and will prefer the same candidates at the polls." In her view, "Racial GERRYMANDERS, even for remedial purposes, may balkanize us into competing racial factions." She accordingly concluded that the Constitution prohibits states from drawing bizarrely shaped legislative districts on the basis of racial criteria.

O'Connor's argument highlights some basic principles of American democracy. Democracy cannot be reduced to majoritarianism. In a purely majoritarian system, 40 percent of the people can lose 100 percent of the time. That would be unfair; true democracy requires that government speak on behalf of the whole people, rather than a mere part of the people—even if the part is a majority.

Nevertheless, American democracy relies heavily on majoritarian elections. These elections are likely to be a satisfactory means for implementing democracy only if one of two conditions holds. The first possibility is that interests might vary greatly from person to person, so that everybody is in the majority on some issues. If so, everybody would occasionally benefit from majoritarian procedures.

The second possibility is that citizens might take an interest in one another. They might, in other words, place an affirmative value upon the happiness of their fellow citizens, including citizens in the minority. If so, members of the minority would enjoy virtual REPRESENTATION through the concerns of the majority.

Both conditions are put in jeopardy by enduring, cohesive political factions. When such factions exist, interests vary from group to group, rather than from person to person. As a result, members of minority groups may find that they are consistent losers in a polarized political process. Moreover, people in one faction are likely to be hostile to those in competing factions.

Shaw thus relied on sound premises. National unity is a structural principle of American democracy, much like FEDERALISM or the SEPARATION OF POWERS. The constitutional aspiration to establish democratic government requires that the state presume Americans can best flourish if they live and work together. Laws that "balkanize [Americans] into competing factions" may thus be unconstitutional even if they meet with the approval of minority groups. Indeed, when rival factions dislike or distrust one another, they may find separation more appealing than cooperation.

As the Shaw Court recognized, racial divisions—and especially the divisions between black and white Americans—have always been the most potent source of political factionalism in the United States. Nevertheless, although Shaw relied on sound principles, its application of them was dubious. The Court treated racial gerrymanders as though they segregated citizens on the basis of race. In fact, though, the districts reviewed in Shaw were among the most integrated in America.

Shaw's antisegregation rhetoric would have been more appropriate in BOARD OF EDUCATION OF KIRYAS JOEL VILLAGE SCHOOL DISTRICT V. GRUMET (1994). Kiryas Joel involved a school district gerrymandered so that a village inhabited solely by Hasidic Jews could run its own school system. The Hasidim had previously sent their children to the neighboring Monroe-Woodbury school district, but the Hasidic children had been teased and mistreated. Since neither community liked the other, both were happy with the segregated district.

The constitutional commitment to national unity, however, forbids the state from endorsing this kind of separatist impulse. The Court rightly held the Kiryas Joel school district unconstitutional under the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE. In a CONCURRING OPINION, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS called attention to the fact that New York had "affirmatively support[ed] a religious sect's interest in segregating itself." Stevens rightly said that it would have been better for New York to "further the strong public interest in promoting diversity and understanding in the public schools."

CHRISTOPHER L. EISGRUBER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Electoral Districting; Religious Liberty.)

Bibliography

EISGRUBER, CHRISTOPHER L. 1994 Political Unity and the Powers of Government. UCLA Law Review 41:1297–1336.

——— 1997 Democracy, Majoritarianism, and Racial Equality: A Response to Professor Karlan. Vanderbilt Law Review 50:347–360.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1989 Belonging to America: Equal Citizenship and the Constitution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

SYMPOSIUM 1997 Group Conflict and the Constitution: Race, Sexuality and Religion. Yale Law Journal 106:2313–2561.

NATIVE AMERICANS

See: American Indians and the Constitution; Cherokee Indian Cases; Tribal Economic Development and the Constitution

NATIVE HAWAIIAN SOVEREIGNTY MOVEMENTS

The Kingdom of Hawai'i was an independent country with formal treaty relationships with the United States and other countries until it was overthrown in 1893 by a rebellious group of westerners, many of whom were U.S. citizens, with the active support of U.S. diplomats and military troops. President GROVER CLEVELAND condemned the overthrow and rejected the request of the rebels that Hawai'i be annexed to the United States. But congressional leaders refused to support his desire to restore the monarchy and for five years Hawai'i was governed by those that had led the revolution. In 1898, after WILLIAM MCKINLEY had become President and gave his support to annexation, this option was formally presented to Congress. The two-thirds vote necessary for the U.S. SENATE to ratify a TREATY could not be obtained, but a simple majority in both the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES and the Senate adopted a JOINT RESOLUTION supporting annexation, and Hawai'i became a TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES. Pursuant to this annexation, 1,800,000 acres of land that had been previously governed by the monarchs and government of the Kingdom of Hawai'i were "ceded" to the United States.

In 1921, Congress transferred 200,000 of these acres to the Hawaiian Home Lands Commission to be made available to persons with at least 50 percent Native Hawaiian ancestry. In 1959, the residents of Hawai'i voted overwhelmingly to became the fiftieth state. Congress then accepted Hawai'i into the Union and transferred about 1,200,000 acres of the ceded lands to the state, to be used for specific public purposes, including "the betterment of the conditions of the Native Hawaiian people." In 1978, the people of Hawai'i amended the state constitution to create the Office of Hawaiian Affairs (OHA), which thereafter received 20 percent of the revenues produced by the ceded lands held by the state government to promote Native Hawaiian culture and economic interests.

The U.S. Congress passed another joint resolution in 1993, which President WILLIAM J. CLINTON signed, apologizing for the participation of U.S. agents in the overthrow, characterizing the overthrow as "illegal" and in violation of INTERNATIONAL LAW, acknowledging that the subsequent "cession" of 1,800,000 acres of lands to the United States was "without the consent of or compensation to the Native Hawaiian people of Hawai'i or their sovereign government," and calling for steps to be taken to achieve a "reconciliation" between the Native Hawaiian people and the U.S. government. Hawai'i's state legislature has enacted statutes expressing similar views, and has taken steps to facilitate the establishment of a sovereign Native Hawaiian nation.

Since 1972, Congress has included Native Hawaiians in many federal programs designed to benefit AMERICAN INDIANS and Alaskan Natives. In Morton v. Mancari (1947), the Court ruled that preferential and separate programs for natives are based on a "political" relationship rather than a "racial" classification, and are constitutional if they are rationally linked to the protection or promotion of self-government, self-sufficiency, or native culture. Congress has stated explicitly in many enactments that a special political relationship exists between the United States and the Native Hawaiian people, similar to the status of other Native Americans. However, the legitimacy of this conclusion is occasionally challenged by those who argue that preferences for Native Hawaiians constitute RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. This issue is being reviewed by the Supreme Court in Rice v. Cayetano during the 1999–2000 session.

Many Native Hawaiians have acted individually or through organizations to promote the establishment of a sovereign Native Hawaiian government. Some Native Hawaiians favor complete independence from the United States, arguing that the 1993 Apology Resolution recognizes the illegitimacy of U.S. annexation of Hawai'i and that the 1959 vote for statehood was tainted because Native Hawaiians were not properly educated, because the option of independence was not given to the voters, and because the United States violated international law by allowing nonnatives to immigrate to the islands and surpass the Native Hawaiians numerically.

Other Native Hawaiians favor a nation-within-a-nation model similar to the relationship between federally recognized Indian tribes and the United States. Under this approach, the Native Hawaiian nation would determine its own membership, control land and resources, tax and zone, charter CORPORATIONS, establish schools, administer justice, and so on. It would have a direct relationship with the U.S. government and would be immune from most state regulations. A final approach sometimes mentioned is the state-within-a-state model; that is, to become a political subdivision of the state. Under this model, Native Hawaiians would have the same rights as a county or municipality, with some autonomy and control of land and resources, but subject to overall regulation by the state.

In 1996, the Hawaiian Sovereignty Elections Council, a twenty-member group established by the state legislature, organized the Native Hawaiian Vote, a mail ballot asking whether Native Hawaiians supported moving toward self-determination. About 73 percent of those who responded voted yes, but this process was criticized by some Native Hawaiians because fewer than half of those who received the mail ballots returned them. In 1997, the Hawai'i Legislature enacted a statute calling for a "lasting reconciliation" and "a comprehensive, just, and lasting resolution," and established a joint committee to determine which lands should be transferred to the Native Hawaiians.

As of this writing, most of the Native Hawaiian groups interested in sovereignty are meeting together to develop a process to create a Native Hawaiian nation. Although difficult issues remain to be resolved, the momentum to achieve this goal now seems irreversible.

JON M. VAN DYKE
(2000)

NATURAL GAS REGULATION

See: Economic Regulation

NATURALIZATION

Naturalization was defined by the Supreme Court in Boyd v. Nebraska ex rel. Thayer (1892) as "the act of adopting a foreigner, and clothing him with the privileges of a native citizen." Congress, under Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, has complete discretion to determine what classes of ALIENS are eligible for naturalization; an individual may claim naturalization as a right only upon compliance with the terms that Congress imposes. Exercising this discretion in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, Congress denied eligibility to those persons who advocate the violent overthrow of the government and limited it to those who have resided in the United States for at least five years, are of "good moral character," and take an oath in open court to support and defend the Constitution, to bear true faith and allegiance to the same, and to bear arms or perform noncombative service in behalf of the United States.

Any naturalized citizen who is proved to have taken the oath of CITIZENSHIP with mental reservations or to have concealed acts or affiliations that, under the law, would disqualify him for naturalization, is subject, upon these facts being conclusively shown in a proper proceeding, to cancellation of his certificate of naturalization. While this action remedies a fraud on the naturalization court that the United States would otherwise be powerless to correct, it subjects a naturalized citizen to possible loss of CITIZENSHIP from which native-born citizens are spared and thus arguably calls into question Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS's announcement in Schneider v. Rusk (1964) that "the rights of citizenship of the native-born and of the naturalized person are of the same dignity and are coextensive."

Although naturalization normally is accomplished through individual application and official response on the basis of general congressional rules, naturalization can also be extended to members of a group, without consideration of their individual fitness. Such collective naturalization can be authorized by Congress, as in cases of naturalization of all residents of an annexed TERRITORY or of a territory made a state, or by a treaty.

RALPH A. ROSSUM
(1986)

Bibliography

GORDON, CHARLES and ROSENFIELD, HARRY N. 1984 Immigration Law and Procedure, Vol. 3, chaps. 14–18. New York: Matthew Bender.

HERTZ, MICHAEL T. 1976 Limits to the Naturalization Power. Georgetown Law Journal 64:1007–1045.

NATURAL LAW

See: Higher Law; Natural Rights and the Constitution

NATURAL RIGHTS AND THE CONSTITUTION

The Constitution as it came from the Philadelphia convention contained no bill of rights. Indeed, the word right (or rights) appears only once in it, and there only in the context of Congress's power to promote the progress of science and useful arts "by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries" (Article 1, section 8). In the view of the Anti-Federalists, the Constitution should have begun with a statement of general principles, or of "admirable maxims," as PATRICK HENRY said in the Virginia ratifying debates, such as the statement in the VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS OF 1976: "That all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter a state of society, they cannot by any compact deprive or divest their posterity; namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety." In short, a bill of rights ought to be affixed to the Constitution containing a statement of natural rights.

The Federalists disagreed. They conceded that the Constitution might properly contain a statement of civil rights, and they were instrumental in the adoption of the first ten amendments which we know as the BILL OF RIGHTS, but they were opposed to a general statement of first principles in the text of the Constitution. However true, such a statement, by reminding citizens of the right to abolish government, might serve to undermine government, even a government established on those principles. And, as Publius insisted, the Constitution was based on those principles: "the Constitution is itself, in every rational sense, and to every useful purpose, A BILL OF RIGHTS" (THE FEDERALIST #84). It is a bill of natural rights, not because it contains a compendium of those rights but because it is an expression of the natural right of everyone to govern himself and to specify the terms according to which he agrees to give up his natural freedom by submitting to the rules of civil government. The Constitution emanates from us, "THE PEOPLE of the United States," and here in its first sentence, said Publius, "is a better recognition of popular rights than volumes of those aphorisms which make the principal figure in several of our State bills of rights and which would sound much better in a treatise of ethics than in a constitution of government." Natural rights point or lead to government, a government with the power to secure rights, and only secondarily to limitations on governmental power.

This is not to deny the revolutionary character of natural rights, or perhaps more precisely, of the natural rights teaching. The United States began in a revolution accompanied by an appeal to the natural and unalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. But these words of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE are followed immediately by the statement that "to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men." Natural rights point or lead to government in the same way that the Declaration of Independence points or leads to the Constitution: the rights, which are possessed by all men equally by nature (or in the state of nature), require a well-governed civil society for their security.

The link between the state of nature and civil society, or between natural rights and government, is supplied by the laws of nature. The laws of nature in this (modern) sense must be distinguished from the natural law as understood in the Christian tradition, for example. According to Christian teaching, the natural law consists of commands and prohibitions derived from the inclinations (or the natural ordering of the passions and desires), and is enforced, ultimately, by the sanction of divine punishment. According to Hobbes and Locke, however—the principal authors in the school of natural rights—the laws of nature are merely deductions from the rights of nature and ultimately from the right of self-preservation. Because everyone has a natural right to do whatever is necessary to preserve his own life, the state of nature comes to be indistinguishable from the state of war where, in Hobbes's familiar phrase, life is solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short; even in Locke's more benign version, and for the same reason, the state of nature is characterized by many unendurable "inconveniences." In short, in the natural condition of man the enjoyment of natural rights is uncertain and human life itself becomes insufferable. What is required for self-preservation is peace, and, as rational beings, men can come to understand "the fundamental law of nature" which is, as Hobbes formulates it, "to seek peace, and follow it." From this is derived the second law of nature, that men enter in a contract with one another according to which they surrender their natural rights to an absolute sovereign who is instituted by the contract and who, from that time forward, represents their rights. More briefly stated, each person must consent to be governed, which he does by laying down his natural right to govern himself. In Locke's version, political society is formed when everyone "has quitted his natural power"—a power he holds as of natural right—and "resigned it up into the hands of the community." In the same way, Americans of 1776 were guided by "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God" when they declared their independence and constituted themselves as a new political community. Commanding nothing—for these are not laws in the proper sense of commands that must be obeyed—the laws of nature point to government as the way to secure rights, a government that derives its "just powers from the consent of the governed." (See SOCIAL COMPACT THEORY.)

It is important to understand that in the natural rights teaching neither civil society nor government exists by nature. By nature everyone is sovereign with respect to himself. Civil society is an artificial person to which this real person, acting in concert with others, surrenders his natural and sovereign powers, and upon this agreement civil society becomes the sovereign with respect to those who consented to the surrender. It is civil society, in the exercise of this sovereign power, that institutes and empowers government. So it was that "we [became] the People of the United States" in 1776 and, in 1787–1788, that we ordained and established "this Constitution for the United States of America." The Constitution is the product of the "will" of the sovereign people of the United States (The Federalist #78).

The power exercised by this people is almost unlimited. Acting through its majority, the people is free to determine the form of government (for, as the Declaration of Independence indicates, any one of several forms of government—democratic, republican, or even monarchical—may serve to secure rights) as well as the organization of that government and the powers given and withheld from it. It will make these decisions in the light of its purpose, which is to secure the rights of the persons authorizing it. This is why the doctrine of natural rights, if only secondarily, leads or points to limitations on government; and this is why the people of the United States decided to withhold some powers and, guided by the new "science of politics" (The Federalist #9), sought to limit power by means of a number of institutional arrangements.

Among the powers withheld was the power to coerce religious opinion. Government can have authority over natural rights, said THOMAS JEFFERSON, "only as we have submitted [that authority] to them, [and] the rights of conscience we never submitted, we could not submit."

Among the institutional arrangements was the SEPARATION OF POWERS, and the scheme of representation made possible by extending "the sphere of society so as to take in a greater variety of parties and interests thus making it less probable that a majority of the whole will have a common motive to invade the rights of other citizens" (The Federalist #10). First among these rights, according to Locke, is the property right, for, differing somewhat from Hobbes in this respect, Locke understood the natural right of self-preservation primarily as the right to acquire property. Publius had this in mind when he said that "the first object of government . . . [is] the protection of different and unequal faculties of acquiring property" (The Federalist #10). The large (commercial) republic is a means of securing this natural right as well as the natural right of conscience, for, within its spacious boundaries, there will be room for a "multiplicity of [religious] sects" as well as a "multiplicity of [economic] interests" (The Federalist #51).

Just as a "respect to the opinions of mankind" required Americans to announce the formation of a people that was assuming its "separate and equal station . . . among the powers of the earth," so a jealous concern for their natural rights required this people to write a Constitution in which they not only empowered government but, in various complex ways, limited it.

WALTER BERNS
(1986)

Bibliography

JAFFA, HARRY V. 1975 The Conditions of Freedom: Essays in Political Philosophy. Pages 149–160. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

STORING, HERBERT J. 1978 The Constitution and the Bill of Rights. Pages 32–48 in M. Judd Harmon, ed., Essays on the Constitution of the United States. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat.

STRAUSS, LEO 1953 Natural Right and History. Introduction and chap. 5. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

NAVIGABLE WATERS

See: Subjects of Commerce

NAZIS

See: Extremist Speech

NEAGLE, IN RE

See: Sawyer, Lorenzo

NEAL v. DELAWARE
103 U.S. 370 (1881)

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, for a majority of 7–2, laid down an important principle in JURY DISCRIMINATION cases: the fact that no black person had ever been summoned as a juror in the courts of a state presents "a prima facie case of denial, by the officers charged with the selection of grand and petit jurors, of that equality of protection" secured by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Neal differed from VIRGINIA V. RIVES (1880), here reaffirmed, because the prisoner in Rives had merely alleged the exclusion of blacks, which the state denied, while here the state conceded the exclusion. The state chief justice explained that "the great body of black men residing in this State are utterly unqualified by want of intelligence, experience or moral integrity, to sit on juries." Harlan called that a "violent presumption." Neal did nothing to prevent the elimination of blacks from juries in the South, because in the absence of a state confession of constitutional error, blacks had the burden of proving deliberate and systematic exclusion of their race. (See NORRIS V. ALABAMA.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

NEAR v. MINNESOTA
283 U.S. 697 (1931)

Although GITLOW V. NEW YORK (1925) had accepted for the sake of argument that the FIRST AMENDMENT'S FREEDOM OF SPEECH guarantees were applicable to the states through the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT,

Near was the first decision firmly adopting the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE and striking down a state law in its totality on free speech grounds. Together with STROMBERG V. CALIFORNIA (1931), decided in the same year and also with a 5–4 majority opinion by Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, Near announced a new level of Supreme Court concern for freedom of speech.,

A Minnesota statute authorizing injunctions against a "malicious, scandalous and defamatory newspaper, magazine or other periodical" had been applied against a paper that had accused public officials of neglect of duty, illicit relations with gangsters, and graft. Arguing that hostility to PRIOR RESTRAINT AND CENSORSHIP are the very core of the First Amendment, the Court struck down the statute. Yet Near, the classic precedent against prior restraints, is also the doctrinal starting point for most defenses of prior restraint. The Court commented in OBITER DICTUM that "the protection even as to previous restraint is not absolutely unlimited," and listed as exceptions wartime obstruction of recruitment and publication of military secrets, OBSCENITY, INCITEMENTS, to riot or forcible overthrow of the government, and words that "may have all the effect of force."

In emphasizing the special First Amendment solicitude for criticisms of public officials, whether true or false, Near was an important way station between Gitlow's implicit acceptance of the constitutional survival in the United States of the English COMMON LAW concept of SEDITIOUS LIBEL and the rejection of that concept in NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964).

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

NEBBIA v. NEW YORK
291 U.S. 502 (1934)

Both the desperate economic conditions in the American dairy industry and the legal responses to the dairy crisis, during the depression years 1929–1933, exemplified the dilemmas that the Great Depression posed for American law. Vast, unmarketable surpluses of fluid milk and other dairy products, widespread mortgage foreclosures in dairy centers of rural America, and wild swings in dairy prices and consumption, all spelled extreme distress for the industry and its marketing institutions.

Among the states that responded with new legislation was New York, whose dairy industry constituted about half the value of its farm income and served the great urban concentration of population in the city of New York and its metropolitan area. In framing a program to deal with the crisis, New York's lawmakers knew they were forced to walk through a constitutional minefield. Despite provisions of the 1933 federal AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT intended to give the states some latitude in control of dairy commerce involving interstate milksheds, federal district courts around the country had struck down state laws seeking to control interstate movements of fluid milk or the terms on which it could be marketed. In addition, even laws seeking to regulate only in-state production and distribution were challenged as invalid under the AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST rule; indeed, in numerous previous decisions the Supreme Court had in obiter dicta listed dairies among the enterprises that clearly were "ordinary" or "purely private" businesses, not affected with a public interest and therefore not subject to price regulation. In NEW STATE ICE CO. V. LIEBMANN (1932), for example, the Court had denied the legislature of Oklahoma authority to regulate ice manufacturing and selling on the ground that it was "a business as essentially private in its nature as the business of the grocer, the dairyman, the butcher, the baker, the shoemaker, or the tailor."

Mindful of this background, the New York legislature conducted a lengthy investigation of the fluid milk industry and its travails. In addition to making a record, thereby, as to the condition of the farmers and distribution system, the price collapse and its consequences, and the extensive effects of the crisis on the state's economy, when the legislature drafted a new Milk Control Law in March 1933, it explicitly denominated it as emergency legislation and provided for its termination one year following. By this maneuver, the legislators hoped to slip the knot of "affected with a public interest" and give the Milk Control Law safe harbor in the EMERGENCY POWERS and POLICE POWER area in the event that courts proved unimpressed with the statute's assertion that the milk industry was "a business affecting the public health and interest."

Like similar legislation enacted in New Jersey, Illinois, and other dairy states, the New York law included power to fix prices in the virtually plenary grant of authority to the milk control agency that was established. The board was also empowered to license producers, establish maximum retail prices and the spread between prices paid producers and charged consumers, and regulate interstate fluid milk entrants to the New York market.

The price-fixing provision came before the bench in an appeal from the conviction of a storekeeper for selling milk at retail below the price established by the new milk control agency. When the New York Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction, the case was carried to the Supreme Court. Counsel contended that price control violated the "affected with a public interest" standard, subjecting Nebbia to improper regulation in violation of his FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT right to DUE PROCESS.

By a 5–4 vote, the Court upheld the New York law.

Justice OWEN J. ROBERTS's opinion did not rest on the narrow grounds that the milk control program was of an emergency nature; instead, it addressed in broadest possible terms the nature of the police power and the constitutional limitations upon which states might exercise it. The long history of the "affected with a public interest" doctrine came to an end with Nebbia, the majority opinion going back to Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE's language in Munn v. Illinois (1877). (See GRANGER CASES.) Waite had used the phrase "affected with a public interest" as the equivalent of "subject to the exercise of the police power," the Court now declared: "It is clear that there is no closed class or category of businesses affected with a public interest, and the function of courts in the application of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments is to determine in each case whether circumstances vindicate the challenged regulation as a reasonable exertion of governmental authority or condemn it as arbitrary or discriminatory." By repudiating the doctrine of affection with a public interest, which was based on SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS OF LAW, the Court weakened the due process clause as a bastion of property rights. The due process clause, Roberts observed, made no mention of sales, prices, business, contracts, or other incidents of property. Nothing, he added, was sacred about the prices one might charge. The state, Roberts declared, "may regulate a business in any of its aspects, including the prices to be charged for the products or commodities it sells." The crux of this opinion, which prefigured a transformation in constitutional law, was this statement: "So far as the requirement of due process is concerned . . . a state is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare, and to enforce that policy by legislation adapted to its purpose. The courts are without authority either to declare such policy, or, when it is declared by the legislature, to override it."

Handed down not long after HOME BUILDING LOAN ASSOCIATION V. BLAISDELL (1934), a decision that did extensive damage to once sacrosanct CONTRACT CLAUSE doctrine, the Nebbia decision was anathema to property-minded conservatives who saw the juridical scaffolding for VESTED RIGHTS as collapsing in the early New Deal years, even before the Court fight and the wholesale reversal of doctrine that came after 1935. Indeed, Nebbia may be read as present-day constitutional law.

HARRY N. SCHNEIBER
(1986)

Bibliography

GOLDSMITH, IRVING B. and WINKS, GORDON W. 1938 Price Fixing: From Nebbia to Guffey. Pages 531–553 in Douglas B. Maggs, ed., Selected Essays on Constitutional Law. Chicago: Association of American Law Schools.

NEBRASKA PRESS ASSOCIATION v. STUART
427 U.S. 539 (1976)

In Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart the Court addressed for the first time the constitutionality of a prior restraint on pretrial publicity about a criminal case. Noting the historic conflict between the FIRST and SIXTH AMENDMENTS, the Court refused to give either priority, recognizing that the accused's right to an unbiased jury must be balanced with the interests in a free press. At issue was a narrowly tailored GAG ORDER in a sensational murder case restraining the press from publishing or broadcasting accounts of the accused's confessions or admissions or "strongly implicative" facts until the jury was impaneled.

Applying the standard of DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951) and inquiring whether "the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability justified such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger," the Court struck down the gag order. To determine whether the record supported the extraordinary measure of a prior restraint on publication, the Court considered the nature and extent of pretrial news coverage, the likelihood that other measures would mitigate the effects of unrestrained pretrial publicity, and the effectiveness of a restraining order to prevent the threatened danger, and, further, analyzed the order's terms and the problems of managing and enforcing it. The gag order was critically flawed because it prohibited publication of information gained from other clearly protected sources.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, joined by Justices POTTER J. STEWART and THURGOOD MARSHALL, concurring, argued that a prior restraint on the press is an unconstitutionally impermissible method for enforcing the Sixth Amendment. Refusing to view the First and Sixth Amendments as in irreconcilable conflict, he noted that there were numerous less restrictive means by which a fair trial could be ensured. Justice BYRON R. WHITE doubted whether prior restraints were ever justifiable, but did not believe it wise so to announce in the first case raising that question. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL emphasized the heavy burden resting on a party seeking to justify a prior restraint.

KIM MCLANE WARDLAW
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Free Press/Fair Trial; Prior Restraint and Censorship.)

NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE

The enumeration of powers in Article I, section 8, gives Congress the power to do such specific things as "regulate commerce . . . among the several States" and "raise and support Armies." At the end of the list is the power "to make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof." The ANTI-FEDERALISTS called this the "elastic clause" or the "sweeping power." They predicted it would centralize all governmental power in the national government. JAMES MADISON denied this charge in THE FEDERALIST #23. He observed that the clause spoke of power to execute only those powers that were specified elsewhere in the document, and that the power vested by the clause would have been implicit in the grant of other powers even without the clause. (See IMPLIED POWERS.) The clause, therefore, did not conflict with the principle of enumerated national powers, Madison argued. Events have vindicated Anti-Federalist fears.

THOMAS JEFFERSON and ALEXANDER HAMILTON took opposing positions on the meaning of the word "necessary" in the clause during their debate in 1791 on the constitutionality of the first BANK OF THE UNITED STATES ACT. Hamilton argued that the nation needed a BROAD CONSTRUCTION of congressional powers so that the government could employ a wide variety of means useful to the discharge of its responsibilities. Jefferson countered that a broad construction would enable Congress to encroach upon the reserved powers of the states whenever its measures might serve as means to ends within its enumerated powers. To safeguard STATES' RIGHTS, such encroachments should be permitted only when "absolutely necessary," said Jefferson—only, that is, when failure to encroach would nullify the grant of federal power. Hamilton's view prevailed first with President GEORGE WASHINGTON in 1791 and later in the Supreme Court, when JOHN MARSHALL's opinion in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND upheld the second national bank in 1819.

Marshall construed national powers in terms of a few authorized national ends. Most important, he understood the COMMERCE POWER and related powers as authorizing the pursuit of national prosperity and the various military and diplomatic powers as authorizing the pursuit of national security. This ends-oriented conception of national powers was the view of The Federalist #41, which also gave greatest emphasis to the goals of national prosperity and security. When Marshall held in McCulloch that Congress could pursue its authorized ends without regard for the reserved powers of the states, he was saying, in effect, that Congress could do what it wanted to relative to state powers so long as it gave the right reasons. Marshall suggested a hierarchy of constitutional values, with state powers subordinated to Congress's version of national prosperity and security. The opinion thus brought virtually all state powers within Congress's potential control, because, with changing conditions, Congress might consider any social practice (education, for example) as an instrument of the nation's prosperity and security.

But to suggest that Congress can act for the right reasons is not to say that Congress can disregard states' rights at will. Marshall's theory of the necessary and proper clause was still consistent with the idea of enumerated powers because it presupposed a limited number of nationally authorized ends. Marshall thus stated that the judiciary would be prepared to invalidate pretextual uses of national power to reach ends reserved to the states. In the twentieth century, the Supreme Court refused to give effect to Marshall's commitment to invalidate pretextual uses of congressional power, thus fulfilling the Anti-Federalist prediction of what the clause eventually would be.

The Court first upheld pretextual uses of power as means to eliminating state bank notes in VEAZIE BANK V. FENNO (1869) and margarine colored to resemble butter in McRay v. United States (1904). These acts were aimed at what Congress considered the nation's economic health. They were therefore valid under Marshall's theory of the commerce power. But, in the meanwhile, the Court had moved away from Marshall's conception to a limited view of the nation's commerce as those things that crossed state lines. Pretexts were necessary unless the Court chose to abandon this artificial view; instead of correcting the mistake which necessitated pretexts, the Court established precedents for them. Later the Court upheld enactments that obviously were not aimed at the national goals implicit in Congress's enumerated powers. The Court thus upheld the TAXING POWER as a weapon against drug abuse in UNITED STATES V. DOREMUS (1919) and the commerce power as a means of combating gambling, illicit sex, and other practices usually said to be reserved to the STATE POLICE POWER, as in HOKE V. UNITED STATES (1913). These decisions turned Marshall's theory of the necessary and proper clause on its head. Where Marshall had upheld incursions into state powers as means to nationally authorized ends, the Court was now upholding national powers as means to state ends. As a result the NATIONAL POLICE POWER can today be used to reach an indefinite variety of purposes, and the necessary and proper clause authorizes almost anything that might be useful for addressing what Congress views as a national problem.

Limits on national power do remain in the BILL OF RIGHTS, in other sources of individual rights such as the CIVIL WAR amendments, and in principles derived from the Constitution's institutional arrangements. Because the states do constitute a part of those arrangements, the Court still says it will protect various state rights to participate in federal government action, such as the right to equal representation in the Senate. But such states' rights limitations on national power are of little contemporary significance. For the most part, the necessary and proper clause has been construed in a way that has destroyed the notion that the enumeration of powers limits the national government.

SOTIRIOS A. BARBER
(1986)

Bibliography

BERNS, WALTER 1961 The Meaning of the Tenth Amendment. Pages 126–148 in Robert A. Goldwin, ed., A Nation of States. Chicago: Rand McNally.

GUNTHER, GERALD, eds. 1969 John Marshall's Defense of McCulloch v. Maryland. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press.

NELSON, SAMUEL
(1792–1873)

On March 5, 1845, Samuel Nelson became a Justice of the Supreme Court and judge of the Second Circuit. President JOHN TYLER nominated the New York Democrat in the belief that his record of moderation compiled over twenty-one years in the New York courts, including thirteen as associate and then chief justice of the state supreme court, would resolve eighteen months of wrangling between the chief executive and the SENATE over the high court vacancy. Unanimous Senate confirmation made Nelson the Court's thirty-first justice.

Nelson's most significant contribution to constitutional development involved the admiralty clause in Article III, section 2, of the Constitution. That clause specified that the federal courts should exclusively exercise the ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION. He interpreted the clause to extend federal JURISDICTION while retaining for the states an area of constitutional responsibility. Nelson first suggested the position, later adopted by the full Court in PROPELLER GENESEE CHIEF V. FITZHUGH (1851), that where INTERSTATE COMMERCE was involved the admiralty clause extended federal jurisdiction to inland rivers and lakes (New Jersey Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchant's Bank, 1848). He carefully rooted this expansion in an 1845 act that established admiralty jurisdiction in "certain cases, upon the lakes and navigable waters connecting with" the oceans. Nelson left to state courts responsibility for vessels that operated on lakes and rivers exclusively within the same state. This interpretation rested on two constitutional themes that pervaded his other opinions: congressional domination of matters of law as opposed to constitutional principles, and belief in a scheme of dual SOVEREIGNTY.

Even in this single instance of doctrinal leadership Nelson lost the initiative. New members of the Court and the quickening tempo of commercial life in the western United States rendered his emphasis on dual sovereignty obsolete. Almost always eager for accommodation, he acquiesced. In 1869 he spoke for the Court in holding that from the time of Genesee Chief federal admiralty jurisdiction on the lakes and rivers stemmed from the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 rather than from the act of 1845 (The Eagle v. Frazer, 1869). Through this about-face, Nelson acknowledged that litigants could use federal district courts in admiralty cases arising in INTRASTATE COMMERCE.

The concept of dual sovereignty also informed his attitude toward the COMMERCE CLAUSE. In the LICENSE CASES (1847) and PASSENGER CASES (1849) he concurred with Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY's opinions sustaining STATE POLICE POWER, and in the 1849 cases he was the only Justice not to write a separate opinion. When Congress acted under the commerce clause, Nelson supported national power. Speaking for the Court in Pennsylvania v. Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Co. (1856), his most important commerce clause opinion, he confirmed Congress's power to deal with navigation and interstate commerce on inland rivers.

Nelson's constitutional jurisprudence also stressed JUDICIAL SELF-RESTRAINT and SEPARATION OF POWERS. He voted only once with a majority to strike down a federal law in Hepburn v. Griswold (1870). He deferred to presidential management of FOREIGN AFFAIRS, but dissented in the PRIZE CASES (1863) because he thought President ABRAHAM LINCOLN had infringed on Congress's war-making powers.

Nelson believed that federal JUDICIAL POWER should protect slaveholders, but that the Court should exercise it benignly. Acting on this belief, he persuaded the Court in 1856 to rehear DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857). In his draft opinion for the Court, he argued that the laws of Missouri made Scott a slave and that the Court could ignore the questions of the legal status of slaves and the constitutionality of the MISSOURI COMPROMISE. This position raised the hackles of Justices JOHN MCLEAN and BENJAMIN R. CURTIS, and Chief Justice Taney took from Nelson responsibility for preparing the Court's opinion. Nelson, believing that the Chief Justice's decision to reach major issues was unwise, submitted his draft opinion for the Court as his own, even retaining the pronoun "we" in the printed version.

Nelson continued in the post-CIVIL WAR era as a hard-working jurist and able legal technician. He agreed in February 1871 to serve on the Alabama Claims Commission. His appointment by a Republican president underscored as much his reputation as an impartial jurist as it did his knowledge of admiralty, maritime, and prize law.

Nelson resigned from the Court on November 28, 1872. Often described as a doughface (a Northerner who took a southern view on slavery), Nelson is better understood as a political moderate concerned about the fate of the Union, disposed to antislavery rather than proslavery views, and committed to the position that the judicial role should emphasize discretion, restraint, and deference to legislative leadership. In view of his twenty-six years on the Court, he contributed surprisingly little to constitutional jurisprudence.

KERMIT L. HALL
(1986)

Bibliography

GATELL, FRANK OTTO 1969 Samuel Nelson. Pages 817–839 in Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court 1789–1969: Their Lives and Major Opinions. New York: Chelsea House.

NEUTRAL PRINCIPLES

"Neutral principles" refers to a debate that took place throughout the late 1950s and the 1960s (and still resonates today) regarding the role of the judiciary in American democracy. Participants in the debate were, for the most part, law professors and judges, but their debate spilled into the broader society in the form of widely publicized speeches and articles published in the popular press. In essence, the debate was about whether there is a way to distinguish the judicial function from ordinary politics, and about the power of judges to strike down laws as unconstitutional.

The neutral principles debate arose in the context of controversial decisions rendered by the Supreme Court under the leadership of Chief Justice EARL WARREN. In 1954, the Court decided BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION, which ordered the DESEGREGATION of public schools. The Court was criticized, especially in the South, but academic commentary for a time was largely positive. Then, in 1957 and 1958, the Court decided a number of cases favoring the rights of Communists and communist-sympathizers, and there was a strong backlash against the Court in some quarters. It was against this backdrop that, in February 1958, Judge LEARNED HAND delivered his famous Holmes Lecture at the Harvard Law School. Hand was regarded as one of the preeminent judges in the country. His address surprised many people, for in it he was very critical of the Court. Hand attacked the idea of an activist judiciary, and even took the Court to task for its decision in Brown.

The following year, Professor Herbert Wechsler delivered his Holmes Lecture, entitled Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law, in which he responded to Hand. Wechsler supported the idea of JUDICIAL REVIEW, but insisted that when courts decide constitutional cases, the most important factor is that they reach their decision by applying "neutral principles" that "transcend the case at hand." Although he said he personally favored the decision in Brown, Wechsler was unable to identify a neutral principle equally applicable to "a Negro or a segregationist" that made it clear that the Constitution's requirement of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS required the desegregation of schools. According to Wechsler, Brown was about the FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION, and he could not find a way to choose between "denying the association to those individuals who wish it or imposing it on those who would avoid it."

Wechsler's address set off a furious debate over the idea of neutral principles. Some, such as Professor Louis Pollak, supported the idea of neutrality, but felt it was possible to identify a neutral principle to justify Brown: No majority race should subjugate a minority race. Many other constitutional scholars felt that the very idea of neutrality as advanced by Wechsler was naïve or bankrupt. Although their views differed, these scholars, among them ALEXANDER M. BICKEL, Arthur Selwyn Miller, Eugene Rostow, Charles Black, Martin Shapiro, and Jan Deutsch generally believed that what mattered ultimately was whether any given decision of the Court was morally correct and could garner acceptance among the body politic.

The neutral principles position taken by Wechsler must be understood in its broader social and jurisprudential context. In the first half of the twentieth century, a group of scholars commonly referred to as the LEGAL REALISTS argued that legal outcomes inevitably were influenced by the views of the judges applying the law, and by the social milieu in which decisions were rendered. This Realist insight troubled many, for it seemed to deny law its neutrality and to equate law with politics. A later group of scholars developed a school of thought known as the "Legal Process" school, which sought to preserve a unique role for law apart from politics. In the view of the Legal Process school, the secret to sound constitutional decisions was "reasoned elaboration." By relying on reason, courts could differentiate their work from that of the more political branches of government. Wechsler was a Legal Process scholar, and it was in this context that he challenged the Court to rely on neutral principles to avoid being seen as a "naked power organ." Other Legal Process scholars who advocated reliance on reasoned elaboration were HENRY M. HART, JR., and PHILLIP B. KURLAND. Opponents of the Legal Process scholars doubted whether reason alone either achieved the sort of neutrality that Wechsler advocated, or was a sufficient basis for deciding cases.

Neutral principles played an important role in the more enduring debate over the role of the Court and JUDICIAL REVIEW. Many of the WARREN COURT'S progressive decisions, such as those involving FREEDOM OF SPEECH, RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, and REAPPORTIONMENT won broad popular support, but that support declined by the late 1960s. The Court expanded the rights of criminal suspects at a time when crime rates were rising, and RICHARD M. NIXON was elected President vowing to appoint Justices to the Supreme Court who would follow closely the original meaning of the Constitution. The Court became a special target of controversy after it decided ROE V. WADE (1973), which guaranteed a woman the right to ABORTION. Many critics of Roe complained that the right to abortion could not be found in the Constitution. In the face of skepticism about neutral principles and the power of reasoned elaboration, these critics now began to insist that Supreme Court Justices adhere closely to the text of the Constitution and the intentions of those who drafted and ratified it, in order to avoid imposing judicial preferences on the body politic. Thus, the neutral principles debate served as a bridge between the insights of the Legal Realists, and the modern-day debate over the proper method of constitutional interpretation.

BARRY FRIEDMAN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Constitutional Interpretation; Constitutional Theory; Original Intent; Originalism.)

Bibliography

DUXBURY, NEIL 1995 Patterns of American Jurisprudence. New York: Oxford University Press.

FRIEDMAN, BARRY 1997 Neutral Principles: A Retrospective. Vanderbilt Law Review 50:503–536.

HAND, LEARNED 1958 The Bill of Rights. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

HOROWITZ, MORTON J. 1992 The Transformation of American Law 1870–1960: The Crisis of Legal Orthodoxy. New York: Oxford University Press.

MILLER, ARTHUR SELWYN and HOWELL, RONALD F. 1960 The Myth of Neutrality in Constitutional Adjudication. University of Chicago Law Review 27:661–695.

PELLER, GARY 1988 Neutral Principles in the 1950's. University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 21:561–622.

POLLAK, LOUIS H. 1959 Racial Discrimination and Judicial Integrity: A Reply to Professor Wechsler. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 108:1–34.

SEBOK, ANTHONY J. 1996 Reading the Legal Process. Michigan Law Review 94:1571–1595.

SHAPIRO, MARTIN 1963 The Supreme Court and Constitutional Adjudication: Of Politics and Neutral Principles. George Washington Law Review 31:587–606.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1959 Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 73:1–35.

NEW CHRISTIAN RIGHT

See: Religious Fundamentalism

NEW DEAL

During the New Deal years, from 1933 to the end of WORLD WAR II, the nation experienced an era of protracted economic crisis and social dislocation, a dramatic change in national political alignments, and then mobilization for total war. A society contending with changes and emergencies of this order, especially with an enormously popular reformist President in office, cannot easily avoid profound challenges to its constitutional order; and so it was for America in this era. Every major aspect of political controversy in this period found expression of varying kinds in constitutional discourse and conflict, and these constitutional battles both reflected and actively intensified the bitter ideological polarization that bedeviled the nation's politics.

When the New Deal era came to a close just after the war, the constitutional as well as political landscape of the country had been transformed. With respect both to governmental institutions and policies and to formal constitutional doctrine, things as they had stood in 1933 had been largely swept away. The transformations of governance and politics in the New Deal era brought far-reaching reform of constitutional law, accomplished without benefit of formal constitutional amendment on any question except the repeal of PROHIBITION. The new constitutional order that emerged, moreover, would stand firmly for half a century as the basic framework of the modern welfare, regulatory, and national-security state. In most particulars, the new order proved durable enough to survive determined efforts by neoconservatives in the 1980s to overturn some of the most important New Deal doctrines and reforms.

President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT at the outset of his presidency characteristically struck a pose that seemed to dismiss offhandedly the need for worries about constitutional difficulties. "Our Constitution is so simple and practical," he declared in his first inaugural address in 1933, "that it is possible always to meet extraordinary needs by changes in emphasis and arrangement without loss of essential form." But what changes in "emphasis" and "arrangement" he had in mind! Even the legislative programs and executive actions of the "First Hundred Days" posed a broad challenge to prevailing doctrines in constitutional law, especially regarding the protection of vested economic rights against government's hand and the proper limits of the national government's authority in the federal system. Nor did the challenge recede or soften significantly in the years immediately following, as Roosevelt and his party generated a prolix legislative and administrative record that would repeatedly inspire bitter constitutional controversies.

Virtually every element of the New Deal administration's policies, especially their idealistic nuances and implications, bore the imprint of Roosevelt's own thinking. The direction and extraordinary scope of the New Deal's challenge to the traditional role and perogatives of the states, for example, were signaled early by Rooselvelt when he was governor of New York: "In our business life and in our social contracts," he declared in 1929, "we are little controlled by the methods and practices employed by our forefathers." Why, then, he asked, be "content . . . to accept and continue to use the local machinery of government which was first devised generations or even centuries ago?" This kind of iconoclasm and willingness to experiment with governmental structures structures was soon to be directed against the states. Impatience with antiquated institutional legacies was linked with Roosevelt's robust "Old Progressive" faith in bringing enterprise to bear on social and economic problems. Hence, the President readily endorsed the regional approach (exemplified by the TENNESEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT OF 1933) to problems that trascended state lines. Similarly, he was sypathetic to a national planning approach (as was espoused by his National Resource Planning Board and the agricultural price-support and production-controll efforts); and he also fostered the system of direct federal grant-in-aid support to city governments for public housing, airports, and other projects in ways that dramaically enhanced municipal autonomy within the states.

Perhaps of greatest long-run importance to governmental practice was Roosevelt's own proclivity to devolve on appointive agencies and their expert staffs the responsibility for defining the "public interest" in the course of setting regulatory policies—a preference shared by the New Deal majorities in Congress as they crafted the design of new regulatory agencies. Roosevelt regularly pressed on Congress and the public the urgency of the social and economic programs he was proposing—both the programs of the "Hundred Days," designed to break the terrible spiral of despair, and those of the ensuing years, designed to effect enduring reforms, including a systematic (and, to many, a radical) redistribution of income and wealth. The argument for urgent action, for room to experiment, and for administration with maximal flexibility and discretion was cast from the start in terms of the necessities associated with a "national emergency." As New Deal programs expanded, however, this view was translated into the more general argument for wide-ranging agency discretion and a reliance on experts for policy making. In the context of the war emergency after 1938, this tendency became even more pervasive.

The question remained: what constitutional principles, if any, restrained such claims by the chief executive? The New Deal answer in light of the Depression crisis tended increasingly to be couched as a majoritarian rationale: "Does anybody believe," asked Senator Lewis Schwellenbach of Washington, one of Roosevelt's closest allies in Congress, "that the founding fathers intended to set up a form of government which would prevent that government from solving the current problems of the people?" Roosevelt phrased the issue similarly in his first radio speech of his second term, the address in which he fired the first shot in the COURT-PACKING battle. It was the entire "modern movement for social and economic progress through legislation" that was at stake, the President declared, referring dramatically to "one-third of a nation ill-nourished, ill-clad, ill-housed." He rejected as outrageous the notion that the judiciary might deny Congress the authority "to protect us against catastrophe by meeting squarely our modern social and economic conditions."

In private correspondence with Schwellenbach, the President referred to their common view of the constitutional issues as the cause of "liberal democracy." New Deal victories by "overwhelming" popular majorities in 1932 and 1936, the President repeatedly contended in his public messages on the constitutional question, had provided an "overwhelming mandate" for immediate action to put the programs of "liberal democracy" in place.

Roosevelt and the constitutional imperatives embodied in his programs for this "liberal democracy" successfully prevailed beginning in 1937, as a new majority in support of the New Deal emerged virtually overnight on the HUGHES COURT and later became a dependable reliance for Roosevelt as he made new appointments. Similarly, the President would prevail in virtually all particulars when he assumed vastly expanded executive emergency authority in the military and foreign-policy realms during the pre-war neutrality period and the years of combat in a global arena that followed the Pearl Harbor disaster.

The President thus placed his personal stamp on the most dramatic political initiatives of the era; however, there were also more enduring legacies of the New Deal in the nation's constitutional development. An inventory of this heritage from the 1930s and World War II must embrace not only the dramatic changes that were ardently debated in their own day, but also the various effects of conflict and innovation only dimly discerned by either friends or critics of Roosevelt's social and economic programs and the wartime initiatives.

Prominent in the inventory of change was the movement of national authority and active intervention into many vital areas of social and economic life that before 1933 had been left by Congress largely to the states and had been only marginally affected by national law. A vast array of legislation from 1933 to 1937 bespoke this dramatic occupation by Congress of policy areas that traditionally had been extremely decentralized in practice; some of them, moreover, had been specifically designated by the Supreme Court's conservative majority as being within the exclusive purview of the states as a matter of TENTH AMENDMENT guarantees, or as a matter of judicially defined categories that differentiated "national" from "local" activities under terms of the COMMERCE CLAUSE or in light of the doctrine of a limited number of enumerated powers.

Thus, by 1941 the working constitutional system had become a system in which formal constitutional issues of FEDERALISM had been recast completely in light of new realities generated by New Deal innovations. A definitive redistribution of both policy responsibilities and power had occurred. There was comprehensive restructuring of agriculture as a managed sector, a formal preemption of labor law through the Wagner Act and its guarantees of the right to organize, adoption of minimal federal standards for wages and hours, and the establishment of a vast regional energy and economic development program through the Tennessee Valley Authority. Federal regulatory authority was extended over the securities markets, and there was a dramatic expansion of national regulation in the transportation, antitrust, and banking fields. The New Deal also instituted the first massive ENTITLEMENT programs with the passage of the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT in 1935; this measure became the foundation stone of the modern national WELFARE STATE.

One concomitant of this powerful move toward centralization of governmental responsibilities was a transformation in the distribution of funds and expenditures. In 1929, with expenditures of $2.6 billion, the budget of the national government was only one-third the amount of state and local expenditures; but a decade later, federal expenditures were $9 billion, exceeding the combined amounts spent by state and local government. Linked with this aspect of new "giant government"—emergence of the national government as a modern Leviathan—was the New Deal's explicit adoption in 1938 of Keynesian principles for fiscal policy. Although growth of the national government establishment was not in itself a development that implicated constitutional questions directly, as a reality of governance and power, "big government" transformed the entire context of the debate over constitutional principles.

More explicitly cast in constitutional terms was the matter of federal grants in aid to state and local government, which rose from $193 million in 1933 to a floodtide level of $2.9 billion in 1939. Although welfare and relief comprised some eighty percent of these sums in each year, the vast aggregate amount in 1939 embraced a range of new programs for natural-resources management, public housing, and health services as well as the more traditional highway aid and agricultural research funds. In this arena of initiative, the Supreme Court posed no serious obstacles; in the 1923 case of FROTHINGHAM V. MELLON, it already had upheld the practice of attaching conditions to federal grants. Decisions in the late 1930s reaffirmed this view. Taken as a whole, the grant-in-aid programs became an important element of what has been termed the modern system of COOPERATIVE FEDERALISM, displacing the older principles and practices of DUAL FEDERALISM.

In its devastating response to the early New Deal measures for industrial reorganization and agricultural market controls, the Supreme Court in SCHECHTER POULTRY CORPORATION V. UNITED STATES (1935) did strike down key legislation in part because of what it found to be a promiscuous violation of the principles of SEPARATION OF POWERS. After the new liberal majority had established the credo of Roosevelt's "liberal democracy" in a dominant position in the Court's decisions after 1936, however, the delegation of rule-making authority to the new administrative and regulatory agencies won virtually routine approval with the Justices. Indeed, judicial deference to agency discretion became one of the most durable—and also most problematic—features of the longer-term New Deal legacy in American law.

For the most part, it was regulation of economic interests that was at stake when challenges were raised against administrative prerogatives; and as the Court abandoned its commitment to defend economic or entrepreneurial liberty on the same basis as it would the political elements of liberty (see PREFERRED FREEDOMS), such challenges lost their doctrinal authoritativeness. Not until the 1960s did political leaders and legal scholars entirely sympathetic with the goals of New Deal-style benefit programs and regulatory regimes begin to worry much about excessive paternalism and discretion. They became concerned particularly with the degree to which the New Deal legacy had produced a system of social benefits, franchises, subsidies, and services that were dispensed by elaborate bureaucracies. In this system, some groups and individuals were favored, while others might be held virtually in thrall because of Byzantine or Kafkaesque procedural standards or simply because of high-handedness and capriciousness. Only then, thirty years after the system had begun to emerge from New Deal legislation and twenty years after the Administrative Procedure Act became law, were the Constitution's procedural guarantees reappraised with a view toward real equality of treatment and fairness in the agencies' administration of social programs and regulations.

When war broke out in Asia and Europe, the Roosevelt administration's policies carried the "emergency" doctrine and delegation of powers to an entirely new level. In September 1939, the President declared a "limited emergency" by EXECUTIVE ORDER, thereby assuming the authority to expand the military forces and to take other measures under war statutes. After the Pearl Harbor attack, the two WAR POWERS ACTS (December 1941 and March 1942) gave the President unprecedented delegated powers under which he erected a massive bureaucracy with coercive powers to direct mobilization. The March 1941 Lend-Lease Act also delegated the spending power, providing the legal basis for over $50 billion in grants of supplies and credits to the Allies.

In one of the most extraordinary documents in the entire history of American constitutional law, Roosevelt in September 1942 threatened that if Congress failed to meet his wishes with respect to repealing a section of the price-control laws in light of the war emergency, he would assume the power to nullify the law on his own authority. Congressional deference averted a constitutional confrontation on the issue.

The war period was of special importance with respect to civil liberties. In one of the most grievous violations of any groups' rights in the modern era, the Roosevelt administration authorized by EXECUTIVE ORDER 9066 (later validated by Congress) the removal in 1942 of the entire Japanese-ancestry population from the West Coast and their prolonged internment in concentration camps until nearly the end of the war. Meanwhile, the army took advantage of a declaration of martial law in Hawaii by the territorial governor in the hours after Pearl Harbor, maintaining a comprehensive military regime with suspension of civilian justice in criminal matters until late 1944, long after any credible threat of invasion of the Hawaiian Islands had passed. In the notorious JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES (1943–1944), the Supreme Court upheld the removal and internment decisions; but when the Hawaiian policy was finally challenged (DUNCAN V. KAHANAMOKU), the Court ruled that the army had acted illegally in suspending civilian government and justice beyond the time justified by military necessity.

Although the wartime record on CIVIL LIBERTIES was thus marred by excesses of the military authorities—and although the army in each instance had full support of the White House—the more enduring heritage of the New Deal in race relations and constitutional equal protection has a different face. Although failing to support federal antilynching bills or any positive CIVIL RIGHTS legislation that would have attacked SEGREGATION, Roosevelt and the agency administrators generally pressed hard to see that blacks received an equitable share of the benefits of federal welfare and relief programs. The President supported the Justice Department's creation in 1939 of what became the Civil Rights Division; and within a few years, this unit's lawyers had undertaken a variety of prosecutions—the most significant being the case of UNITED STATES V. CLASSIC (1941)—challenging RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in the electoral process in the southern states. The Justice Department's new concern for equal rights and civil liberties also served to enhance the significance of Supreme Court decisions (including especially HAGUE V. CIO in 1939) (that were then strengthening FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees and laying the essential doctrinal groundwork for the much farther-reaching civil liberties and civil rights jurisprudence of the WARREN COURT era. In sum, racial equality and civil liberties had been brought within the ambit of the New Deal agenda—the essential counterweight to unrestrained majoritarianism that many feared was embodied in Roosevelt's attack on the Court in 1936 and even, albeit in a more reflective mode, in the constitutional theories calling for "judicial self-restraint" championed in the wake of the Court fight (see JUDICIAL REVIEW AND DEMOCRACY).

The American constitutional order in 1945, at President Roosevelt's death, had thus witnessed far-reaching changes in the allocation of state versus federal powers, in the extent and style of intervention by government in social and economic affairs, and in the role of the national authorities in regard to individual rights and liberties. In the realm of doctrine, the Supreme Court had reinterpreted the commerce clause so completely that the Justices would soon declare it to be simply "as broad as the economic needs of the nation" (American Power & Light v. SEC). After the decision of WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942), the economic regulatory powers of the Congress seemed to be plenary, with no economic activity protected from congressional determination of what was of national significance. As early as 1934, in NEBBIA V. NEW YORK, the Court had discarded traditional economic due process and AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST doctrine—two of the main props of traditional VESTED RIGHTS analysis that had been used to restrain severely the state's regulatory powers. In UNITED STATES V. DARBY LUMBER COMPANY (1941) the Court cast into the dustbin of history, it seemed, the old view of the Tenth Amendment, declaring now that the amendment "states but a truism" and was merely "declaratory." Meanwhile, the New Deal administration posed a new challenge to state sovereignty over valuable natural resources by asserting a federal property claim based on "paramount rights" over the offshore oil and any other resources of the continental shelf, long considered to be under state ownership out to a distance of three miles. With the emergence of the new civil rights and civil liberties jurisprudence exemplified by Classic, the university-segregation decision of MISSOURI EX REL. GAINES V. CANADA (1938), and other decisions, the potentialities of the emerging changes in law became clear. Whether one interprets these changes, as friends of the Roosevelt Administration sought to do, as a "return to the Constitution" (a reversal of conservative doctrines that had become dominant in violation of correct principles), or instead, as a positive advancement of law to meet the urgent requirements of a modern industrial society in crisis, the New Deal era did indeed bequeath to postwar America a constitutional order dramatically transformed.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(1992)

Bibliography

BIXBY, DAVID M. 1981 The Roosevelt Court, Democratic Ideology, and Minority Rights: Another Look at United States v. Classic. Yale Law Journal 90:741–814.

HURST, JAMES WILLARD 1977 Law and the Social Order in the United States. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1972 The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row.

PARRISH, MICHAEL E. The Great Depression, the New Deal, and the American Legal Order. Washington Law Review 59:723–750.

SCHEIBER, HARRY N. 1989 Economic Liberty and the Constitution. In Essays in the History of Liberty. San Marino, Calif.: The Huntington Library.

——— and SCHEIBER, JANE L. 1990 Constitutional Liberty in World War II: Army Rule and Martial Law in Hawaii. Western Legal History 3:341–378.

NEW DEAL
(Constitutional Significance)

The NEW DEAL era was a time of extraordinary constitutional ferment, witnessing significant constitutional change in a strikingly wide variety of areas. Just as the Supreme Court was evincing increasing solicitude for CIVIL RIGHTS and CIVIL LIBERTIES, particularly in the realms of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, the Justices substantially eroded the DOCTRINE of INTERGOVERNMENTAL IMMUNITY from taxation, dramatically relaxed the restraints imposed upon state governments by the CONTRACT CLAUSE, and sanctioned a major reorientation of monetary policy. At the same time, the executive branch emerged with significantly enhanced authority in both domestic and FOREIGN AFFAIRS. Yet the expansions of the powers of Congress to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE and to spend for the GENERAL WELFARE, along with the demise of economic SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS OF LAW, are generally regarded as the period's signal contributions to the modern American constitutional landscape.

Of these three, developments in the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER jurisprudence were arguably the least significant. To be sure, the Court's embrace of the Hamiltonian interpretation of the spending power, announced in UNITED STATES V. BUTLER (1936) and confirmed in the Social Security Cases, freed future Congresses from concern that the power to spend was limited to ends identified in the other ENUMERATED POWERS of Article I, section 8. Yet federal grants-in-aid to states and municipalities, widely employed in such New Deal programs as the Public Works Administration, were already a well-established feature of American "cooperative" FEDERALISM. Moreover, exercises of the spending power could easily be insulated from JUDICIAL REVIEW under the taxpayer STANDING doctrine announced in FROTHINGHAM V. MELLON (1923). So long as Congress appropriated the funds to be spent from general revenue rather than from an account funded by a particular tax, no taxpayers had standing to challenge the propriety of the expenditure. While the New Deal ushered in the modern welfare state with its dramatic increases both in the volume of federal expenditures and in the purposes to which Washington's largesse was directed, such congressional capacity was already latent in the structure of contemporary constitutional doctrine.

Indeed, the American constitutional order on the eve of the Great Depression was hardly an unregulated regime of laissez-faire. By 1930 the Court had already upheld a vast array of state POLICE POWER statutes, including regulations of working hours and child labor, worker's compensation statutes, wage and payment regulations, utility and price regulations, and state ANTITRUST laws. Far more notorious, however, were cases in which the Court had invalidated a workplace or price prescription on the ground that it interfered with the FREEDOM OF CONTRACT or applied to a business that was not "affected with a public interest." The HUGHES COURT excised these closely related substantive due process doctrines from the constitutional lexicon, upholding extensive legislative control of wages, prices, and collective bargaining. Henceforth "regulatory legislation affecting ordinary commercial transactions" would enjoy a virtually irrebuttable presumption that it provided DUE PROCESS OF LAW. In tandem with contemporaneous developments in COMMERCE CLAUSE jurisprudence, these decisions cleared the remaining impediments to the emergence of the modern regulatory state.

Federal regulation of the economy was of course not a New Deal innovation. By 1930 the Court had already sanctioned extensive regulation of business practices in interstate commerce, upholding initiatives ranging from the FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT and federal antitrust laws to the PURE FOOD AND DRUG ACT. The Court had similarly approved extensive federal supervision of the railroad industry, stamping its imprimatur on not only the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT, but the Federal Employers Liability Act, the Safety Appliance Act, and the Railway Labor Act as well. Under the SHREVEPORT DOCTRINE, federal regulatory power over the railroads extended even to intrastate activities when they bore a "close and substantial" relation to interstate commerce. Such "local" activities as mining, manufacturing, and agricultural production were typically held to affect interstate commerce only "indirectly," and were thus frequently beyond congressional control. However, even local activities such as transactions in stockyards and on grain exchanges could be reached by Congress if they were situated in a "current" or "stream" of interstate commerce. Under both the Shreveport doctrine and the current of commerce doctrine, however, federal regulation of local enterprise was limited by the due process requirement that the business regulated be, like railroads, stockyards, and grain exchanges, "affected with a public interest."

Two events of the New Deal period dramatically expanded the scope of federal power. First, by lifting the "affected with a public interest" limitation in due process jurisprudence, the Court allowed more general application of commerce clause PRECEDENTS previously restricted to a handful of enterprises. This development opened new opportunities for federal regulation of such domains as industrial labor relations and the agriculture and energy sectors. Second, by 1942 the Court had explicitly retired the old local/national and direct/indirect dichotomies that had framed commerce clause jurisprudence for more than half a century. The consequences of this abandonment were twofold. First, a plenary commerce power underwrote unprecedented expansion of both the national administrative state and the role of federal law in daily life. Much of the nation's economic activity would become subject to the JURISDICTION of REGULATORY AGENCIES, and the commerce power eventually became the vehicle of choice for federal oversight of everything from civil rights to street crime. Second, because these old distinctions had also been central to DORMANT COMMERCE CLAUSE jurisprudence, their exile from the affirmative commerce clause context prompted the Court to reformulate the clause's negative implications. In years to come such cases would focus not on whether the activity regulated was "local" or the regulation affected commerce "directly," but rather on whether the state or local government was discriminating against or unduly burdening interstate commerce. Decoupling affirmative and dormant commerce clause doctrine served to prevent omnicompetent federal power from implicitly obliterating state and local regulatory prerogatives.

Recent years have seen a revival of academic interest in the New Deal. Central to the lively scholarly discussion has been the question of how best to characterize the period's constitutional development. Some scholars see an abrupt constitutional "revolution" in 1937; others claim a more gradual "transformation" began earlier in the decade (if not earlier in the century) and concluded in the early 1940s. Some see in this development a "rediscovery" of the Constitution after a period of activist corruption, whereas others view it as a mistaken departure from established and appropriate constitutional norms. Where some detect a "translation" or adaptation of the Constitution to changed circumstances, still others observe a shift in interpretive practice that transformed the very meaning of constitutional adaptivity. One prominent scholar contends that the Constitution was actually "amended" outside the procedure specified by Article V when the Court forged new constitutional law in response to the will of the people expressed in the "critical election" of 1936. The debate has taken on greater urgency in an era of political and judicial retrenchment, as some commentators seek not only to describe the change, but also to legitimate and draw prescriptive force from it. Yet beneath these differences in characterization rests a consensus that the New Deal era was the principal constitutional watershed of the twentieth century.

BARRY CUSHMAN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Amendment Process (Outside of Article V); Constitutional History, 1933–1945; Roosevelt, Franklin D.)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE 1998 We the People: Transformations. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

CUSHMAN, BARRY 1998 Rethinking the New Deal Court: The Structure of a Constitutional Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press.

FRIEDMAN, RICHARD D. 1994 Switching Time and Other Thought Experiments: The Hughes Court and Constitutional Transformation. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 142: 1891–1984.

LESSIG, LAWRENCE 1995 Understanding Changed Readings: Fidelity and Theory. Stanford Law Review 47:395–472.

LEUCHTENBURG, WILLIAM E. 1995 The Supreme Court Reborn: The Constitutional Revolution in the Age of Roosevelt. New York: Oxford University Press.

WHITE, G. EDWARD 1997 The "Constitutional Revolution" as a Crisis in Adaptivity. Hastings Law Journal 48:867–912.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT v. PIPER
470 U.S. 274 (1985)

In Piper the Supreme Court followed United Building and Construction Trades Council v. Camden (1984) and applied a two-step analysis for applying the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of Article IV. The Court held, 8–1, that

New Hampshire's rule limiting the practice of law to New Hampshire citizens violated the clause. First, the clause was properly invoked; doing business in the state is a privilege that is "fundamental" to the preservation of interstate harmony. Second, the state had not sufficiently justified its exclusion of Piper, who lived in Vermont, 400 yards from the New Hampshire border, and intended to maintain a law office in New Hampshire.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

NEW JERSEY v. T. L. O.
469 U.S. 325 (1985)

In New Jersey v. T. L. O. a unanimous Supreme Court held that the FOURTH AMENDMENT's prohibition against unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES applies to searches of students conducted by public school officials. A majority of the Court (6–3) also held that school officials need not obtain a SEARCH WARRANT before searching a student under their authority and that their searches can be justified by a lower standard than probable cause to believe that the subject of the search has violated or is violating the law. Instead, the legality of the search depends on the reasonableness of the search under all the circumstances.

According to Justice BYRON R. WHITE's majority opinion, determining reasonableness requires a twofold inquiry: first, whether the search was justified at its inception, and, second, whether the search as actually conducted was reasonably related in its scope to the circumstances that initially justified it. Ordinarily, the search is justified at its inception if there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will produce EVIDENCE that the student has violated or is violating either the law or the school rules. The search is permissible in scope if the measures adopted are reasonably related to the objectives of the search and are not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction.

PATRICK DUTTON
(1986)

Bibliography

DUTTON, PATRICK 1985 School Searches: Recent Applications of the United States and California Constitutions. Journal of Juvenile Law 9:106–128.

NEW JERSEY v. WILSON
7 Cranch 164 (1812)

This case was the vehicle by which the Supreme Court made a breathtaking expansion of the CONTRACT CLAUSE. In the colonial period New Jersey had granted certain lands to an Indian tribe in exchange for a waiver by the Indians of their claim to any other lands. The grant provided that the new lands would be exempt from taxation in perpetuity. In 1801, over forty years later, the Indians left the state after selling their lands with state permission. The legislation repealed the tax exemption statute and assessed the new owners, who challenged the constitutionality of the repeal act.

A unanimous Supreme Court, overruling the state court, held that the grant of a tax immunity was a contract protected by the contract clause. By some species of metaphysics the Court reasoned that the tax immunity attached to the land, not to the Indians, and therefore the new holders of the land were tax exempt. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's opinion, voiding the state tax, gave a retroactive operation to the contract clause; the grant of tax immunity predated the clause by many years. More important, Marshall ignored the implications of his DOCTRINE that such a grant was a contract. According to this decision, a state, by an act of its legislature, may contract away its sovereign power of taxation and prevent a successive legislature from asserting that power. The doctrine of VESTED RIGHTS, here converted into a doctrine of tax immunity, handicapped the revenue capabilities of the states, raising grave questions about the policy of the opinion. As a matter of political or constitutional theory, the Court's assumption that an attribute of SOVEREIGNTY can be surrendered by a legislative grant to private parties or to their property was, at the least, dubious. Although Marshall restricted the states, he allowed them to cede tax powers by contract rather than thwart the exercise of those powers on rights vested by contract.

The growth of CORPORATIONS revealed the significance of the new doctrine of tax immunity. States and municipalities, eager to promote the establishment of banks, factories, turnpikes, railroads, and utilities, often granted corporations tax immunity or other tax advantages as an inducement to engage in such enterprises, and the corporations often secured their special privileges by corrupt methods. This case permitted the granting of tax preferences and constitutionally sanctioned political corruption and the reckless development of economic resources. But permission is not compulsion; the legislatures, not the judiciary, granted the contracts. The Court simply extended the contract clause beyond the intentions of its framers to protect vested rights and promote business needs.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

NEW JERSEY COLONIAL CHARTERS

New Jersey received its first charter from its proprietors, John Berkeley and George Carteret, in 1664. The charter established representative institutions of government, contained a clause on RELIGIOUS LIBERTY similar to that in the RHODE ISLAND CHARTER of 1663, and guaranteed that only the general assembly could impose taxes. In 1676 Berkeley sold his share of New Jersey to Quakers, leaving Carteret proprietor of East New Jersey. In 1677 the Quaker proprietors issued a "Charter or Fundamental Laws, of West New Jersey," the work, probably, of WILLIAM PENN. The charter included clauses on liberty of conscience, TRIAL BY JURY, and several protections for the criminally accused; the charter is memorable, however, because it functioned as a written CONSTITUTION of FUNDAMENTAL LAW. It began with the provision that the " COMMON LAW or fundamental rights" of the colony should be "the foundation of the government, which is not to be altered by the Legislative authority . . . constituted according to these fundamentals. . . ." The legislature was enjoined to maintain the fundamentals and to make no laws contradicting or varying from them.

In 1682 a Quaker group headed by Penn gained control of East New Jersey and in the following year issued "The Fundamental Constitutions" for that province. The charter of 1683, which was modeled on the Pennsylvania Frame of Government of 1682 (see PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL CHARTERS), recognized CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION, banned any ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, paraphrased chapter 39 of MAGNA CARTA, and included a variety of provisions that resembled a bill of rights, far more numerous than in the English BILL OF RIGHTS of 1689. Although New Jersey became a royal colony in 1702, the seventeenth-century Quaker charters are significant evidence of the grip which CONSTITUTIONALISM had upon influential colonial thinkers.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

ANDREWS, CHARLES MCLEAN 1936 The Colonial Period of American History. Vol. 3:138–180. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

NEW JERSEY PLAN

The adoption of the VIRGINIA PLAN by the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 frightened state sovereignty supporters and nationalists from small states. A BICAMERAL Congress apportioned on the basis of population would have enabled the great states to dominate the new government. On June 15, 1787, WILLIAM PATERSON of New Jersey introduced a substitute plan that retained the "purely federal" (confederated) character of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. Under the Article a unicameral Congress in which each state had one vote preserved the principle of state equality.

As CHARLES PINCKNEY observed, if New Jersey had an equal vote, she would "dismiss her scruples, and concur in the national system." The New Jersey plan, though merely amending the Articles, was a small states' nationalist plan, not a state sovereignty plan. It recommended a Congress with powers to regulate commerce and to raise revenue from import and stamp duties, and it would have authorized requisitions from the states enforceable by a national executive empowered to use the military against states defying national laws and treaties. The plan recommended a national judiciary with broad JURISDICTION, extending to cases arising out of the regulation of commerce and the collection of the revenue. The nucleus of the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, making national law the supreme law of the states, was also part of the plan. It was a warning to large-state nationalists that they would have to compromise on the issue of REPRESENTATION. The Committee of the Whole defeated the plan 7–3, with one state divided. The Convention was thereafter stymied until the GREAT COMPROMISE was adopted. (See CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1776–1789.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BRANT, IRVING 1950 James Madison: Father of the Constitution, 1787–1800. Pages 46–54. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

NEW ORLEANS v. DUKES
427 U.S. 297 (1976)

Only once since 1937 has the Supreme Court struck down a state ECONOMIC REGULATION as a denial of the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. That case was Morey v. Doud (1957). In Dukes, the Court unanimously overruled Morey; a per curiam opinion reaffirmed the appropriateness of the RATIONAL BASIS standard of review in testing economic regulations against the demands of both equal protection and SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS.

Dukes involved a New Orleans ordinance prohibiting the sale of food from pushcarts in the French Quarter, but exempting vendors who had been selling from pushcarts for eight years. This GRANDFATHER CLAUSE, said the Court, was rationally related to the city's legitimate interest in preserving the area's distinctive character while accommodating substantial reliance interests of long-term businesses.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

NEW RIGHT

As a political phenomenon New Right jurisprudence is a reaction against the broad protection of individual rights advanced by the WARREN COURT. Intellectually the New Right proposes a style of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION that emphasizes fidelity to received historical materials and legal forms in order to foreclose judicial reliance on moral philosophy. Among the most prominent proponents of New Right jurisprudence are former Attorney General Edwin Meese, Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, and scholar-jurist Robert H. Bork.

The great aim in fashioning an approach to constitutional interpretation must, for the New Right, be to find public, politically neutral standards that curb judicial willfulness. "The framers' intentions with respect to freedoms," as Bork put it, "are the sole legitimate premise from which constitutional analysis may proceed." The great temptation for judges armed with the power to review legislative acts (and for losers in the political process who retain the capacity to influence judges) is to strike down laws that they do not like on the grounds furnished by some broad, vague, and easily manipulated constitutional phrase. The only antidote for judicial tyranny is history—the authority of the original, public sense of what a particular phrase or clause was meant to accomplish.

This reliance on ORIGINAL INTENT, however, cannot be a mechanical process. Principles must be discerned and applied to particular circumstances and problems (such as WIRETAPPING) that the Framers could not have foreseen. Most originalists seek to discern and apply the primary purpose of a clause rather than the Framers' specific intentions. And so even a practice specifically accepted by the Framers of the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, such as segregated schooling, might be unconstitutional.

The second element in New Right jurisprudence is an emphasis on democracy or majority rule as the touchstone of constitutional authority. Against the background of POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY, the power of unelected judges to strike down laws made by the people's representatives appears anomalous and in need of close containment. The emphasis on popular rule also supports the resort to historical intentions: When judges rely on the Framers' intentions, they can claim simply to be upholding a superior expression of popular will (the Constitution as originally understood) to an inferior one (the will of this legislature).

The New Right's third basic commitment is its foursquare opposition to the role of moral theory in constitutional interpretation. Whatever one might think of natural law or moral objectivity, in political practice moral arguments must always be regarded as nothing more than expressions of personal preferences and desires. Thus, according to Bork, "every clash between a minority claiming freedom from regulation and a majority asserting its freedom to regulate requires a choice between the gratifications (or moral positions) of the two groups." The New Right believes that to allow moral judgment any substantial role in constitutional interpretation licenses judges to overturn duly made laws on personal, ideological grounds.

The fourth and final plank in the New Right program is the identification of the extension of individual rights with an assault on community in the name of moral relativism. Both Bork and Meese approvingly quote the conservative British jurist Lord Patrick Devlin: "What makes a society is a community of ideas, not political ideas alone but also ideas about the way its members should behave and govern lives." More judicially mandated individual freedom, it seems, equals more relativism and less community.

Each of the components of New Right jurisprudence has been subjected to criticism. Original intentions, it has been said, are often extremely difficult to discern. What is to count as evidence? How do we distinguish intentions from hopes and aspirations? Did the Framers intend us to be guided by their intentions? Perhaps most tellingly, what do we make of the broad moralistic language that was often chosen and written into the Constitution? Bork wants to regard the NINTH AMENDMENT and the Fourteenth Amendment's PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause as unintelligible "ink blots" on the document because to treat them as the broad delegations that they appear to be would give too much power to judges. The New Right's sense of how much JUDICIAL POWER is too much seems, in spite of professions of political neutrality, rooted less in a careful reading of history than in a reaction against the JUDICIAL ACTIVISM spawned by the Warren Court.

The New Right's emphasis on the Constitution's basically democratic character misses, some have charged, the equally basic role of individual liberty in the founding design. A basic commitment to broad individual rights helps legitimate the powers of a Court remote from popular passions and prejudices. The practical moral skepticism of the New Right is also subjected to debate: Do we not have widely shared working standards of morality? Does not the New Right itself implicitly invoke and depend upon a democratic political morality and an ethic of judicial self-restraint?

The New Right's claim that individual rights will replace community morality with relativism seems highly dubious, not to mention odd, in light of the New Right's own professed skepticism. In becoming more tolerant, open, and respectful of individual freedom a community would seem to be changing, perhaps even improving, its morality rather than dropping it. With its capacity to insist that majorities treat minorities reasonably, the Supreme Court appears well situated to improve community morality.

New Right jurisprudence appeals to political skeptics who identify judicial activism, new and old, with elite tyranny. The sharpest opponents of the New Right are those who believe that the Constitution itself raises moral questions for interpreters and that an active, morally reflective Court advances the causes of individual liberty and reasonable self-government.

STEPHEN MACEDO
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Bork Nomination; Conservatism; Constitution and Civic Ideals; Critical Legal Studies; Deconstructionism; Liberalism; Originalism; Political Philosophy of the Constitution; Segregation.)

Bibliography

BERGER, RAOUL 1977 Government by Judiciary. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

BORK, ROBERT H. 1990 The Tempting of America: The Political Seduction of the Law. New York: Free Press.

MACEDO, STEPHEN 1987 The New Right v. the Constitution. Washington, D.C.: Cato Institute.

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H. 1976 The Notion of a Living Constitution. Texas Law Review 54:693–704.

NEWSMAN'S PRIVILEGE

See: Reporter's Privilege

NEW STATE ICE COMPANY v. LIEBMANN
285 U.S. 262 (1932)

An Oklahoma law required ice dealers to obtain a license before entering the market because their business was AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST. A 6–2 majority could find no exceptional circumstances such as monopoly or emergency—that is, no public interest in regulation—justifying the restriction and so struck down the law as a violation of DUE PROCESS. Echoing Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES'S dissent in TYSON BROTHER V. BANTON (1927), Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, with Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE concurring, insisted that the assessment of local conditions and requirements was a legislative concern. Seeking to justify a state's right to experiment with social and economic legislation, Brandeis wrote: ". . . we must be ever on our guard, lest we erect our prejudices into legal principles."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Nebbia v. New York; Ribnik v. McBride.)

NEW YORK v. BELTON

See: Automobile Search

NEW YORK v. FERBER
458 U.S. 747 (1982)

This decision demonstrated the BURGER COURT'S willingness to add to the list of categories of speech excluded from the FIRST AMENDMENT'S protection. New York, like the federal government and most of the states, prohibits the distribution of material depicting sexual performances by children under age 16, whether or not the material constitutes OBSCENITY. After a New York City bookseller sold two such films to an undercover police officer, he was convicted under this law. The Supreme Court unanimously affirmed his conviction.

Justice BYRON R. WHITE, for the Court, denied that state power in this regulatory area was confined to the suppression of obscene material. The state's interest in protecting children against abuse was compelling; to prevent the production of such materials, it was necessary to forbid their distribution. CHILD PORNOGRAPHY—the visual depiction of sexual conduct by children below a specified age—was "a category of material outside the protection of the First Amendment."

The Court also rejected the argument that the law was overbroad, thus abandoning a distinction announced in BROADRICK V. OKLAHOMA (1973) to govern OVERBREADTH challenges. Henceforth the overbreadth doctrine would apply only in cases of "substantial overbreadth," whether or not the state sought to regulate the content of speech.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

NEW YORK v. MILN

See: Mayor of New York v. Miln

NEW YORK v. QUARLES
467 U.S. 649 (1984)

Justice WILLIAM REHNQUIST, for a 5–4 Supreme Court, announced a public safety exception to the MIRANDA RULES. In a situation where concern for the public safety must supersede adherence to MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), the prosecution may use in EVIDENCE incriminating statements made during a custodial interrogation before the suspect receives notice of his constitutional rights. Here, the Court reinstated a conviction based on the evidence of a gun and information concerning its whereabouts. Dissenters disagreed on whether the case showed a threat to the public safety, but produced no principled argument against the exception to Miranda.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

NEW YORK v. UNITED STATES
505 U.S. 144 (1992)

IN GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985), the Supreme Court seemed to reject a strong JUDICIAL ROLE in protecting states from congressional regulatory authority. But in New York v. United States and Printz v. United States (1997), the Court renewed its earlier commitment to protecting state autonomy. Together, New York and Printz hold that Congress may not commandeer state or local legislative or executive officials to formulate or administer a federal regulatory program that otherwise falls within the Article I authority of Congress. These decisions leave Congress with ample authority to encourage states to implement federal policies, but limited authority to coerce them to do so.

In New York, the Court invalidated the "take title" provision of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1985. This provision required each state by 1996 either to regulate, in congressionally acceptable ways, the disposal of publicly or privately generated radioactive WASTE, or to take title to the waste and hence assume liability for it. The Court offered two main arguments for its conclusion. The first concerned ORIGINAL INTENT: In replacing the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION with the Constitution, claimed the Court, the Framers intended to replace an ineffectual regime in which Congress could regulate only the states and not individual citizens, with the conceptually opposite regime in which Congress could regulate only individual citizens but not states. The Court also professed a concern for maintaining clear lines of political accountability, and claimed that commandeering might lead citizens within a state erroneously to ascribe responsibility for unpopular policy decisions to "puppet" state officials rather than the actual federal decisionmakers behind the scenes.

Printz involved a challenge to provisions of the federal Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act that required state law enforcement officers to expend a "reasonable effort" to conduct background checks as part of a federal handgun control policy. Defending the statute, the United States argued that New York was distinguishable because the Brady Act coerced only the administration of federally defined law, rather than state legislative lawmaking in pursuance of general federal objectives. By compelling only relatively ministerial activities, asserted the United States, the act neither interfered with the state's sovereign lawmaking capacity and autonomy, nor did it realistically threaten to muddle political accountability. But the Court rejected these efforts to distinguish New York, making clear that Congress cannot commandeer state executive officials any more than legislative ones, by imposing ministerial burdens any more than regulatory ones. The Court replied that the principle of state autonomy inherent in the notion of "dual sovereignty" is undermined whenever Congress targets states for the imposition of affirmative regulatory or executory duties.

The doctrinal rule emerging from New York and Printz—Congress may not conscript state officials to do its bidding—may seem intuitively appropriate as an interpretation of dual sovereignty, and has the further merit of establishing a bright line capable of easy judicial enforcement. The Court's reasoning in these decisions has been criticized, however, for its overly formalist quality. While the Court invoked commonplace clichés about how state autonomy may frustrate federal tyranny, the Court failed to consider carefully how an anticommandeering rule serves the values underlying our federalist regime. Moreover, the Court's formalist structural and historical arguments purporting to deduce an anticommandeering rule from abstract notions of dual sovereignty seem somewhat forced, belying any suggestion that the REHNQUIST COURT is less "activist" as defined by aggressive review of democratically enacted statutes than either the WARREN COURT or BURGER COURT.

Both New York's and Printz's practical impact on federal–state relations may be quite limited. First, the cases leave open the possibility that Congress may still commandeer state administrative resources pursuant to a few specific grants of power, including the power of Congress under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, SECTION 5 to enforce that amendment's rights against the states. Second, the cases affirmed the authority of Congress to encourage states to enact and enforce regulations designed to achieve federal goals through either of two noncoercive means. Congress may condition federal subsidies on the willingness of states to administer federally desired programs, and Congress may threaten to PREEMPT state programs unless they conform to federal standards. As Congress has employed these noncoercive tools far more frequently than coercive ones, New York and Printz may have greater symbolic than practical import for our regime of FEDERALISM.

EVAN H. CAMINKER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Dual Federalism; López, United States v.; Sovereignty; State Immunity from Federal Law.)

Bibliography

CAMINKER, EVAN H. 1995 State Sovereignty and Subordinacy: May Congress Commandeer State Officers to Implement Federal Law? Columbia Law Review 95:1001–1089.

——— 1997 Printz, State Sovereignty, and the Limits of Formalism. The Supreme Court Review 1997:199–248.

PRAKASH, SAIKRISHNA B. 1993 Field Office Federalism. Virginia Law Review 79:1957–2037.

POWELL, H. JEFFERSON 1993 The Oldest Question of Constitutional Law. Virginia Law Review 79:633–689.

NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY v. WHITE
243 U.S. 188 (1917)

The New York Workmen's Compensation Act of 1914 made employers liable to compensate injured workers in certain cases without regard to fault. The statute thereby departed from time-honored COMMON LAW rules of liability, particularly the fellow-servant doctrine and contributory negligence. The act established a graduated scale of compensation based on the loss of earning power, prior wages, and the character and duration of the disability suffered. Death benefits would be paid according to the survivors' needs.

Here, a night watchman was injured while guarding tools and materials used in the construction of a new station and tracks designed for INTERSTATE COMMERCE. A 9–0 Supreme Court held that the watchman was not in interstate commerce within the meaning of the first EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT. Justice MAHLON PITNEY, for the Court, declared that his work "bore no direct relation to interstate transportation." Pitney rejected claims that the New York act violated the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT's prohibition against a TAKING OF PROPERTY without DUE PROCESS OF LAW and deprived both parties of the FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. "It needs no argument to show that such a rule [fellow-servant] is subject to modification or abrogation by a state upon proper occasion." Because "the public has a direct interest in this as affecting the common welfare," the Court sustained the act as a reasonable exercise of the STATE POLICE POWER. Pitney also rejected the argument that the exclusion of certain workers from the statute's coverage was an arbitrary classification in violation of the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. He concluded that the classification was reasonable in view of the "inherent risks" associated with the various occupations.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

NEW YORK CHARTER OF LIBERTIES AND PRIVILEGES
(October 30, 1683)

The first enactment of the first general assembly in New York was a statute but had the characteristics of a charter or CONSTITUTION of FUNDAMENTAL LAW. Its purpose was to establish a government "that Justice and Right may be Equally done to all persons . . . ," an early forerunner of the principle of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. After describing the organs of government and empowering every freeholder to vote for representatives, the statute paraphrased chapter 39 of MAGNA CARTA and provided that no taxes should be imposed but by the general assembly. Then followed protections of the rights of the criminally accused, including a right to INDICTMENT by GRAND JURY in criminal cases. Another provision of the document, after protecting RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, created a multiple ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. It allowed the towns on Long Island to elect Christian ministers of their choice, to be supported by town rates, and declared that "all" the other Christian churches in the province were "priviledged Churches . . . Established" by law. Elsewhere in Christendom, an established church meant a church of a single denomination preferred over all others.

The Privy Council disallowed the statute in 1686. In 1691, after James II was overthrown, the general assembly substantially reenacted it but again it was disallowed, probably because it curbed the royal prerogative. Although the statute never became law, it is early evidence of the high regard that colonists had for Magna Carta, written guarantees of their liberties, and the principle that there should be no TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

ANDREW, CHARLES MCLEAN 1936 The Colonial Period of American History. Vol. 3:114–121. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

NEW YORK STATE CLUB ASSOCIATION v. NEW YORK CITY

See: Freedom of Association

NEW YORK TIMES CO. v. SULLIVAN
376 U.S. 254 (1964)

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., was arrested in Alabama in 1960 on a perjury charge. In New York a group of entertainers and civil rights activists formed a committee to help finance King's defense. They placed a full-page advertisement in the New York Times appealing for contributions. The ad charged that King's arrest was part of a campaign to destroy King's leadership of the movement to integrate public facilities and encourage blacks in the South to vote.

It asserted that "Southern violators" in Montgomery had expelled King's student followers from college, ringed the campus with armed police, padlocked the dining hall to starve them into submission, bombed King's home, assaulted his person, and arrested him seven times for speeding, loitering, and other dubious offenses.

L. B. Sullivan, a city commissioner of Montgomery, filed a libel action in state court against the Times and four black Alabama ministers whose names had appeared as endorsers of the ad. He claimed that because his duties included supervision of the Montgomery police, the allegations against the police defamed him personally.

Under the common law as it existed in Alabama and most other states, the Times had little chance of winning. Whether the statements referred to Sullivan was a fact issue; if the jury found that readers would identify him, it was immaterial that the ad did not name him. Because the statements reflected adversely on Sullivan's professional reputation they were "libelous per se"; that meant he need not prove that he actually had been harmed. The defense of truth was not available because the ad contained factual errors (for example, police had not "ringed the campus," though they had been deployed nearby; King had been arrested four times, not seven). A few states recognized a privilege for good faith errors in criticism of public officials, but Alabama was among the majority that did not.

The jury awarded Sullivan $500,000. In the Alabama Supreme Court, the Times argued such a judgment was inconsistent with FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, but that court merely repeated what the United States Supreme Court had often said: "The First Amendment of the United States Constitution does not protect libelous publications."

When the case reached the Supreme Court in 1964, it was one of eleven libel claims, totaling $5,600,000, pending against the Times in Alabama. It was obvious that libel suits were being used to discourage the press from supporting the CIVIL RIGHTS movement in the South. The Times urged the Court to equate these uses of libel law with the discredited doctrine of SEDITIOUS LIBEL and to hold that criticism of public officials could never be actionable.

Only three Justices were willing to go that far. The majority adopted a more limited rule, holding that public officials could recover for defamatory falsehoods about their official conduct or fitness for office only if they could prove that the defendant had published with "actual malice." This was defined as "knowledge that [the statement] was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." The Court further held that this element had to be established by "clear and convincing proof," and that, unlike most factual issues, it was subject to independent review by appellate courts. The Court then reviewed Sullivan's evidence and determined that it did not meet the new standard.

The decision was an important breakthrough, not only for the press and the civil rights movement but also in FIRST AMENDMENT theory. Until then, vast areas of expression, including libel and commercial speech, had been categorically excluded from First Amendment protection. Also, the decision finally repudiated the darkest blot on freedom of expression in the history of the United States, the Sedition Act of 1798.

Over the next few years, the Court went out of its way to make the new rule effective. It defined "reckless disregard" narrowly (St. Amant v. Thompson, 1967). It extended the Sullivan rule to lesser public officials (Rosenblatt v. Baer, 1966), to candidates for public office (Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 1971), to PUBLIC FIGURES (Associated Press v. Walker, 1967), and to criminal libel (Garrison v. Louisiana, 1964). After 1971 the Court retreated somewhat, declining to extend the Sullivan rule to private plaintiffs and permitting a de facto narrowing of the public figure category.

From its birth the rule has been criticized, by public officials and celebrities who believe it makes recovery too difficult, and by the news media, which argue that the rule still exposes them to long and expensive litigation, even though ultimately they usually win. The Court, however, has shown no inclination to revise the rule. In Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union (1984), the Court was invited to dilute it by abandoning independent appellate review of findings of "actual malice." The Court refused, holding such review essential "to preserve the precious liberties established and ordained by the Constitution."

DAVID A. ANDERSON
(1986)

Bibliography

KALVE, HARRY, JR. 1964 The New York Times Case: A Note on "The Central Meaning of the First Amendment." Supreme Court Review 1964:191–221.

PIERCE, SAMUEL R., JR. 1965 The Anatomy of an Historic Decision: New York Times Co. v. Sullivan. North Carolina Law Review 43:315–363.

NEW YORK TIMES CO. v. UNITED STATES
403 U.S. 713 (1971)

New York Times Co. v. United States, more commonly known as the Pentagon Papers case, is one of the landmarks of contemporary prior restraint doctrine. Only NEAR V. MINNESOTA (1931) rivals it as a case of central importance in establishing the FIRST AMENDMENT's particular and extreme aversion to any form of official restriction applied prior to the act of speaking or the act of publication.

The dramatic facts of the case served to keep it before the public eye even as it was being litigated and decided. On June 12, 1971, the New York Times commenced publication of selected portions of a 1968 forty-seven-volume classified Defense Department study entitled "History of United States Decision Making Process on Vietnam Policy" and a 1965 classified Defense Department study entitled "The Command and Control Study of the Tonkin Gulf Incident Done by the Defense Department's Weapons Systems Evaluation Group in 1965." Collectively these documents came to be known as the Pentagon Papers. Within a few days other major newspapers, including the Washington Post, the Los Angeles Times, the Detroit Free Press, the Philadelphia Inquirer, and the Miami Herald also commenced publication of the Pentagon Papers. The papers had been provided to the New York Times by Daniel Ellsberg, a former Defense Department official and former government consultant. Ellsberg had no official authority to take the Pentagon Papers; his turning over the papers to the New York Times was similarly unauthorized.

When the newspapers commenced publication, the United States was still engaged in fighting the VIETNAM WAR. Claiming that the publication of the Pentagon Papers jeopardized national security, the government sought an INJUNCTION against any further publication of the papers, including publication of scheduled installments yet to appear. In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, Judge Murray Gurfein issued a temporary restraining order against the New York Times, but then denied the government's request for a preliminary injunction against publication, finding that, in light of the extremely high hurdle necessary to justify a prior restraint against a newspaper, "the publication of these historical documents would [not] seriously breach the national security." (See PRIOR RESTRAINT AND CENSORSHIP.) The United States immediately appealed, and the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, on June 23, 1971, remanded the case for further consideration in light of documents filed by the United States indicating that publication might pose "grave and immediate danger to the security of the United States." The Second Circuit continued to enforce the stay it had previously issued, in effect keeping the Times under the restraint of the temporary restraining order. On the same day, however, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, in a case involving the Washington Post's publication of the Pentagon Papers, affirmed a decision of the district court refusing to enjoin further publication. On June 24, the New York Times filed a petition for a WRIT OF CERTIORARI and motion for expedited consideration in the Supreme Court, and on the same day the United States asked that Court for a stay of the District of Columbia circuit's ruling in the Washington Post case. The two cases were consolidated and accelerated, with briefs filed on June 26, oral argument the same day, and a decision of the Supreme Court on June 30, only seventeen days after the first publication of the papers in the New York Times.

In a brief PER CURIAM opinion, the Supreme Court affirmed the District of Columbia Circuit, reversed the Second Circuit, and vacated the restraints. Noting the "heavy presumption" against prior restraints, and the consequent "heavy burden of . . . justification" necessary to support a prior restraint, the Court found that the United States had not met that especially heavy burden.

The Court's per curiam opinion was accompanied by a number of important separate opinions by individual Justices. Justices HUGO L. BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS made it clear that in their view prior restraints were never permissible. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN would not go this far, but found it noteworthy that "never before has the United States sought to enjoin a newspaper from publishing information in its possession." For him "only governmental allegation and proof that publication must inevitably, directly, and immediately cause the occurrence of an evil kindred to imperiling the safety of a transport already at sea [citing Near v. Minnesota] can support even the issuance of an interim restraining order." In agreeing that the restraint was improper, Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL emphasized the absence of statutory authorization for governmental action to enjoin a newspaper. And Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, joined by Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER and Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, dissented. The dissenters were disturbed by the alacrity of the proceedings, and in addition thought that the executive's "constitutional primacy in the field of FOREIGN AFFAIRS" justified a restraint at least long enough to allow the executive to present its complete case for the necessity of restriction. The most doctrinally illuminating opinions, however, were those of Justices POTTER J. STEWART and BYRON R. WHITE. For them only the specific nature of the restriction rendered it constitutionally impermissible. Had the case involved criminal or civil sanctions imposed after publication—subsequent punishment rather than prior restraint—they indicated that the First Amendment would not have stood in the way.

As highlighted by the opinions of Justices Stewart and White, therefore, the Pentagon Papers case presents the problem of prior restraint in purest form. The judges had the disputed materials in front of them, and thus there was no question of a restraint on materials not before a court, or not yet published. And the evaluation of the likely effect of the materials was made by the judiciary, rather than by a censorship board, other administrative agency, or police officer. Under these circumstances, why might a prior restraint be unconstitutional when a subsequent punishment for publishing the same materials would be upheld? What justifies a constitutional standard higher for injunctions than for criminal sanctions? It cannot be that prior restraints in fact "prevent" more things from being published, for the deterrent effect of a criminal sanction is likely to inhibit publication at least as much as an injunction. Someone who is willing knowingly to violate the criminal law, in order to publish out of conscience, may also be willing to violate an injunction. Is the special aversion against prior restraint, visible in the Pentagon Papers case, based on principle, or is it little more than an anachronism inherited from JOHN MILTON and WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, and transferred from a milieu in which prior restraint was synonymous with unreviewable determinations of an administrative censorship board?

The result in the Pentagon Papers case was not inconsistent with prior cases. The case did, however, present more clearly the puzzling nature of the virtually absolute prohibition against prior restraints under circumstances in which subsequent punishment of the very same material would have been permissible. Yet the case is also significant for reasons that transcend the doctrine of prior restraint. When confronted with a constitutional objection to a governmental policy, a court typically must evaluate the justification for the policy, and assess the likelihood of some consequences that the policy is designed to prevent. When that consequence and the governmental attempt to forestall it relates to war, national security, or national defense, judicial deference to governmental assertions of likely consequences has traditionally been greatest, even if the putative restriction implicates activities otherwise protected by the Constitution. When national security has been invoked, constitutional protection has often been more illusory than real. At every level in the Pentagon Papers case the courts conducted their own independent assessments of the likely dangers to national security and to troops overseas. The Supreme Court's decision was at least partly a function of the Justices' unwillingness to accept governmental incantation of the phrase "national security" as dispositive. Certainly executive determinations concerning the effect of publications on national security still receive greater deference than do other executive predictions about the effect of publications. But the Pentagon Papers case stands for the proposition that even when national security is claimed the courts will scrutinize for themselves the necessity of restriction. The decision, therefore, speaks not only to prior restraint but also, and more pervasively, to the courts' willingness to protect constitutional rights even against wartime governmental restrictions imposed in the name of national security.

FREDERICK SCHAUER
(1986)

Bibliography

HENKIN, LOUIS 1971 The Right to Know and the Duty to Withhold: The Case of the Pentagon Papers. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 120:271–280.

JUNGER, PETER 1971 Down Memory Lane: The Case of the Pentagon Papers. Case Western Reserve Law Review 23:3–75.

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. 1971 Foreword: Even When a Nation Is at War. Harvard Law Review 85:3–36.

NIEMOTKO v. MARYLAND
340 U.S. 268 (1951)

The VINSON COURT here unanimously reversed the convictions of two Jehovah's Witnesses who had been charged with disorderly conduct for attempting to hold religious services in a city park without a permit. Local officials had refused to issue the permit, citing ordinances or administrative standards that governed the procedure, but such permits had been routinely approved for other religious and patriotic groups. The city's refusal to issue a permit to the Jehovah's Witnesses under these circumstances, the Court held, was both an unconstitutional prior restraint on speech and a denial of EQUAL PROTECTION.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

NIMMER, MELVILLE B.
(1923–1985)

After his graduation from Harvard Law School Melville Nimmer practiced law in Los Angeles for more than a decade. During that time he wrote the foundational article elaborating the "right of publicity," a right to control the commercial use of one's own identity. He also produced Nimmer on Copyright (1st ed., 1963), a four-volume treatise rightly called "magisterial," which soon became the nation's leading authority on copyright law. In 1962 he joined the law faculty of the University of California, Los Angeles, where he was a much-loved teacher of copyright law (later expanded into entertainment law), contracts, and constitutional law.

Although Nimmer's constitutional law scholarship ranged over such diverse topics as American CIVIL RIGHTS legislation and judicial review in Israel, the main focus of his attention was the FIRST AMENDMENT. He practiced what he preached, serving the AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION as counsel in a number of cases, including COHEN V. CALIFORNIA (1971). In Cohen the Supreme Court adopted Nimmer's argument severely restricting the assumption, casually made in CHAPLINSKY V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1942), that profanity lay outside the First Amendment's protection. The case produced one of Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN'S most noteworthy opinions, and today it is widely taught in law school courses dealing with the FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

Nimmer's First Amendment articles dealt with movie censorship, LIBEL and invasion of privacy (see PRIVACY AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT), SYMBOLIC SPEECH, national security secrets, the special role of the press clause, and—inevitably—the relation of COPYRIGHT to the First Amendment. (He wrote on three of these topics for this Encyclopedia.) In these writings he developed a theory of "definitional balancing" that became one of the theoretical centerpieces of his last major work on constitutional law, Nimmer on Freedom of Speech: A Treatise on the Theory of the First Amendment (1984). Nimmer planned to supplement this treatise regularly, and specifically to apply his theories to "national security, breach of the peace, commercial speech and obscenity." When he died the next year, his colleagues and the larger community lost much more than those products of a gifted legal mind.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

Bibliography

MELVILLE B. NIMMER SYMPOSIUM 1987 UCLA Law Review 34: 1331–1903 (includes a complete list of Nimmer's published works).

NINETEENTH AMENDMENT

Ratification of the women's suffrage amendment in 1920 marked the culmination of a struggle spanning three quarters of a century. Under the leadership of organizations including the National Woman's Suffrage Association and the National Women's Party, over 2 million women participated in some 900 campaigns before state and federal legislators, party officials, and referendum voters. By the time the amendment was adopted, a majority of the states had already given some recognition to women's VOTING RIGHTS.

Political agitation for enfranchisement began in 1848, at the first women's rights convention in SENECA FALLS, New York. In its Declaration of Sentiments, the convention included suffrage as one of the "inalienable rights" to which women were entitled. As the century progressed, the vote assumed increasing importance, both as a symbolic affirmation of women's equality and as a means to address a vast array of sex-based discrimination in employment, education, domestic law, and related areas. Once the Supreme Court ruled in MINOR V. HAPPERSETT (1875) that suffrage was not one of the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES guaranteed by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to women as citizens, the necessity for a state or federal constitutional amendment became apparent.

The struggle for women's rights was a response to various forces. Urbanization, industrialization, declining birth rates, and expanding educational and employment opportunities tended to diminish women's role in the private domestic sphere while encouraging their participation in the public sphere. So too, women's involvement, first with abolitionism and later with other progressive causes, generated political commitments and experiences that fueled demands for equal rights.

Those demands provoked opposition from various quarters. The liquor industry feared that enfranchisement would pave the way for PROHIBITION, while conservative political and religious leaders, as well as women homemakers, painted suffrage as an invitation to socialism, anarchism, free love, and domestic discord. Partly in response to those claims, many leading suffragists became increasingly conservative in their arguments and increasingly unwilling to address other causes and consequences of women's inequality. That strategy met with partial success. As they narrowed their social agenda, women's rights organizations expanded their political appeal. The growing strength of the suffrage movement, together with women's efforts in WORLD WAR I, finally helped prompt the United States to join the slowly increasing number of Western nations that had granted enfranchisement.

Yet to many leading women's rights activists, the American victory proved scarcely less demoralizing than defeat. The focus on enfranchisement had to some extent deflected attention from other issues of critical importance for women, such as poverty, working conditions, birth control, health care, and domestic relations. Without a unifying social agenda beyond the ballot, the postsuffrage feminist movement foundered, splintered, and for the next half century, largely dissolved. During that period, women did not vote as a block on women's issues, support women candidates, or, with few exceptions, agitate for women's rights. Despite their numerical strength and access to the ballot, women remained subject to a vast range of discrimination in employment, education, WELFARE BENEFITS, credit standards, family law, and related areas. Although the Nineteenth Amendment itself was urged as a ground for qualifying women to serve on juries, most courts rejected this argument except where jury service was tied to voter status.

Yet however limited its immediate affects, the Nineteenth Amendment marked a significant advance toward equal rights. Enfranchisement was a necessary if not sufficient condition for women to exercise significant political leverage. Moreover, the skills, experience, and self-esteem that women gained during the suffrage campaign helped lay the foundation for a more egalitarian social order.

DEBORAH L. RHODE
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Anthony, Susan Brownell; Stanton, Elizabeth Cady; Woman Suffrage; Woman Suffrage Movement.)

Bibliography

CATT, CARRIE CHAPMAN and SHULER, NETTIE ROGERS 1970 Woman Suffrage and Politics. New York: Americana Library Edition.

STANTON, ELIZABETH CADY et al., eds. 1881–1922 History of Woman Suffrage. New York: Fowler Wells.

NINTH AMENDMENT

Largely ignored throughout most of our history, the Ninth Amendment has emerged in the past twenty years as a possible source for the protection of individual rights not specifically enumerated in the Constitution's text. Although no Supreme Court decision has yet been based squarely on an interpretation of the Ninth Amendment, it has been mentioned in several leading cases in which the Court enlarged the scope of individual rights. Lawyers, scholars, and judges are understandably intrigued by a provision that, on the basis of language, seems ideally suited to provide a constitutional home for newly found rights: "The enumeration of certain rights in the Constitution shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

The historical origins of the Ninth Amendment lay in JAMES MADISON's concern that the inclusion of specified rights in the BILL OF RIGHTS might leave other rights unprotected. He recognized, moreover, that the inherent limitations of language could thwart the intent of the authors of the Bill of Rights to provide a permanent charter of personal freedom. These concerns, which led Madison originally to question the wisdom of a Bill of Rights, caused him to propose, in the First Congress, a resolution incorporating the present language of the Ninth Amendment. It was adopted with little debate.

It is not surprising that the Ninth Amendment lay dormant throughout most of our history. The holding in BARRON V. BALTIMORE (1833) that the Fifth Amendment was not applicable to the states limited the scope of the Ninth Amendment also: all provisions of the Bill of Rights restricted the United States only. Moreover, the federal government, being one of limited powers, did not move into those areas of activity that would trigger claims of infringement of rights not specified in the Constitution. Challenges to federal actions were more likely to take the form that the President or Congress lacked power under the Constitution rather than that the actions abridged an individual right. Even the specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights spawned only a trickle of litigation until well into the twentieth century.

The states, of course, had broad POLICE POWERS to legislate in the areas of welfare, health, education, morality, and business. Until the latter part of the nineteenth century, however, the Supreme Court's review of state legislation served primarily to assure that states did not unduly burden or tax interstate businesses. Court decisions in these areas were not based on individual rights but rather on a judicially created doctrine that Congress's power to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE carried with it a prohibition against state laws that were viewed by the Court as unreasonably burdensome or discriminatory as applied to interstate businesses. The post-Civil War Amendments provided the textual basis for challenges to state law as violating individual rights.

The Supreme Court, however, moved quickly to limit the scope of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. In the famous SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) the Court virtually eliminated the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as a protection for individual rights by limiting the clause to such rights as interstate travel, petitioning the federal government for redress of grievances, protection while abroad, or the privilege of HABEAS CORPUS. The EQUAL PROTECTION and DUE PROCESS clauses were also narrowly interpreted so as to preclude broad challenges to state regulatory statutes, as was the Thirteenth Amendment in Slaughterhouse and the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883).

Despite the Slaughterhouse Cases, those seeking constitutional support for the protection of property rights against ECONOMIC REGULATION looked elsewhere in the Fourteenth Amendment, and ultimately found a home in the due process clause. Toward the end of the nineteenth century the Court expanded the meaning of "liberty" and "property" to include the right to enter into business relationships. Hundreds of state laws were invalidated under this expanded concept of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. This view of the Fourteenth Amendment, together with narrow interpretations of Congress's power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE and the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER, led to the NEW DEAL constitutional crisis of the 1930s. In the spring of 1937 a narrow Court majority shifted ground, broadening Congress's enumerated powers and limiting the due process clause to its present scope, namely, that state regulatory laws should bear a reasonable relationship to a valid legislative purpose. Throughout this long constitutional journey the Ninth Amendment was an unused instrument, because those who challenged state laws relied primarily on the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause whose scope had been so broadened that there was no need to develop a theory of unenumerated rights.

As the Court in the 1930s and 1940s finally rejected the claim that the Constitution contained rights that protected business against government regulation, the enumerated rights in the Bill of Rights were gradually being incorporated into the meaning of the words "liberty" and "property" of the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. By the end of the 1960s, substantive rights guaranteed by the FIRST AMENDMENT, and most of the procedural rights of the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Amendments were made binding on the states. In this legal development the Ninth Amendment was inconsequential, because the Court employed the judicial technique of incorporating into the due process clause rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights. There was little need to develop the concept of "unenumerated" rights, so long as the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provided the vehicle for making the Bill of Rights binding on the states.

Thus, during the early 1960s, as the process of incorporating the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment was moving forward, the Supreme Court maintained a consensus developed as early as UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938). On matters of economic and social legislation (the type of law that gave rise to the substantive due process controversies of the pre-New Deal era) the Supreme Court would have a limited role to play. Legislation (either state or federal) would be assumed to be valid unless arbitrary or unreasonable, or unless shown to violate a specific provision of the Constitution. Laws reflecting prejudice against certain minorities, or laws infringing personal liberties of the kind enumerated in the Bill of Rights, or other specific provisions of the Constitution, would be subject to a more demanding form of judicial scrutiny.

The Court remained divided on the meaning of specific constitutional guarantees, but these divisions resulted from differences over the meaning of enumerated rights, rather than from differences over whether newly identified, unenumerated, rights should be read into the Constitution. In this constitutional world, an amendment that spoke of unenumerated rights had little to offer as a defense of personal rights. However, a Connecticut law that prohibited the use of contraceptives jolted this consensus and led to the emergence of the Ninth Amendment as a possible vehicle for the protection of rights not specifically guaranteed in other provisions of the Constitution. After two decades of not enforcing its statute, and after thwarting attempts to overturn it in the Supreme Court, Connecticut prosecuted a doctor who was giving contraceptive advice to a married couple in a BIRTH CONTROL clinic. He was charged with "aiding and abetting" a violation of the law prohibiting the use of contraceptives.

The case, GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), presented a difficult problem for a Court majority wedded to the notion that only arbitrary, or capricious, or invidiously discriminatory laws, or those that violated a specific constitutional right, could be invalidated. All of the Justices agreed that the Connecticut statute was foolish, but the Court was obviously troubled as to why it was unconstitutional for a state to decide that it wished to discourage extramarital sexual relations and that the ready availability of contraceptives, including contraceptives for married persons, increased the likelihood of extramarital sex by eliminating the fear of pregnancy. Connecticut claimed that in order to achieve the objective of deterring sex outside of marriage the state could prohibit the use of all contraceptives, thus making them less available. If no specific constitutional right had been violated, why could not Connecticut make its own mistakes, leaving it to the people, through their elected representatives, to correct them?

The Supreme Court's answer, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, was to create a right of marital privacy which was found in "penumbras, formed by emanations" from other guarantees found in enumerated rights, specifically those in the First, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Amendments. The Ninth Amendment was also mentioned, but the constitutional approach of the majority was to expand existing rights in order to create a new right of marital privacy which the Connecticut law was held to contravene.

Three Justices (Chief Justice EARL WARREN and Justices ARTHUR GOLDBERG and WILLIAM J. BRENNAN), in an opinion by Goldberg, relied specifically on the Ninth Amendment as an additional basis for striking down the law. Justice Goldberg's standard for defining rights "retained by the people" seemed to strike a widely criticized note of open-ended substantive due process. He referred to FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS and to the "traditions" and "conscience of our people" in order to determine whether a right was to be regarded as "fundamental." It is not surprising that this language prompted a vigorous dissent from Justice HUGO L. BLACK, who regarded the majority and concurring Justices as having engaged in the same unprincipled personal jurisprudence as the conservative Justices who had written the concept of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT into the Constitution in the early part of the twentieth century.

Viewed in isolation, the Griswold case might have been regarded merely as involving a slight broadening of enumerated rights to encompass the basic right to decide whether or not to conceive a child. Whether the Court reached this result by finding the new right lurking in "pe-numbras" formed by "emanations" from existing rights, or by discovering new "unenumerated" rights, was probably of no great concern, because the Connecticut statute was so unreasonable, even in the context of the state's asserted objective of promoting moral behavior, that the law should have been declared invalid under a REASONABLENESS standard. But strong movements were developing in the country during the 1960s and 1970s. Women were moving rapidly toward equality of opportunity to participate in American life. Attitudes about private sexual behavior, marriage, cohabitation, and family relationships were all changing toward an increased respect for individual choice.

In the 1970s the Court responded by recognizing some of these new attitudes and enshrining them in constitutionally protected rights. In EISENSTADT V. BAIRD (1972), for example, the principles of Griswold were extended to include the right of an unmarried person to the acquisition and use of contraceptives. The culmination of this trend was ROE V. WADE (1973), where the Court recognized constitutional protection of a woman's right to procure an abortion, particularly during the first twenty-six weeks of pregnancy. Roe v. Wade, in turn, generated renewed debate among constitutional scholars over the proper role of the Court in intervening to overturn the legislative decisions of democratically elected legislatures. In this debate the Ninth Amendment started to assume new significance because it provided a possible textual basis for an expanded jurisprudence of individual liberty.

The Ninth Amendment was mentioned in Roe v. Wade, but only as one of a number of constitutional provisions to support the Court's conclusion that "liberty" encompassed a woman's child-bearing decision. Justice Douglas, who had written the majority opinion in Griswold, based his concurrence in Roe v. Wade primarily on the Ninth Amendment and suggested a broad range of personal autonomy rights such as "control over development and expression of one's intellect, interest, tastes, and personality," "freedom of choice in the basic decisions of one's life respecting marriage, divorce, procreation, contraception, and the education and upbringing of children," "freedom to care for one's health and person, freedom from bodily restraint or compulsion, freedom to walk, stroll, or loaf."

After Roe v. Wade (perhaps relying on Justice Douglas's expansive concurrence) some litigants sought to use the Ninth Amendment as a basis for expanding personal autonomy rights beyond the scope of sexual privacy. Many lower courts appeared receptive to such claims as the right, under the Ninth Amendment, to control one's personal grooming and appearance and the right to be protected from disclosing personal information. However, in Kelley v. Johnson (1976) the Supreme Court upheld a regulation limiting the length of a police officer's hair. Personal autonomy issues continue to be litigated, but the Ninth Amendment is rarely involved as a basis for decision.

Because interest in the Ninth Amendment started with cases involving sexual privacy, it is not surprising that the amendment continues to be used to attack state antisodomy laws. Apart from a summary affirmance in 1976 of a district court opinion, the Court has not specifically addressed the issue of the rights of homosexuals. In 1985 the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit upheld a Ninth Amendment claim that right of private consensual sexual behavior was beyond the reach of state regulation. But even if the Supreme Court should sustain the decision of the Circuit Court the Supreme Court's preferred rationale is likely to be substantive due process, that is, enlarging the definition of "sexual privacy" as part of the "liberty" protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.

One could well conclude that the Ninth Amendment should be allowed to return to the oblivion it experienced prior to the Griswold case. Persistent references to the Ninth Amendment by lower court judges, however, and even by Supreme Court Justices (for example, Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER in RICHMOND NEWSPAPERS, INC. V. VIRGINIA, 1980) suggest that the amendment could serve as an analytical tool for the appraisal of new claims of constitutional rights. If it is to serve as something more than a superfluous additional citation, the Ninth Amendment must offer the promise of the development of a more coherent body of law than has thus far emerged as the Court has recognized new claims of unenumerated constitutional rights.

At present the Court deals with such rights primarily through the technique employed in Griswold and its progeny. The Court usually tries to base its decisions on one or more specific constitutional provisions, and then expands those provisions to include new rights. Typical was the Richmond Newspaper case, where the Court held that the public had a right of access to criminal trials. Chief Justice Burger's PLURALITY OPINION was based on principles said to derive from the First Amendment, even though the amendment itself specifically guarantees, for these purposes, only the rights of speech, press, and assembly. The Chief Justice made specific reference to rights that were not "enumerated" in the Constitution and pointed out that James Madison's concern with the danger of protecting only enumerated rights led to the adoption of the Ninth Amendment.

Despite his reference to the Ninth Amendment, the Chief Justice's approach in Richmond Newspapers would appear to be similar to earlier cases, including Griswold, where new rights were recognized because they were analogous to existing rights. Freedom of association is a judicially recognized derivation of the First Amendment protection for freedom of expression, and the requirement of proof beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT is derived from the enumerated guarantee of due process. Recognizing the right of marital privacy or the right to terminate a pregnancy may involve a greater leap from the enumerated rights in the First, Fourth, and Fifth Amendments, but the technique of deriving the rights from enumerated rights did not start with Griswold or Roe v. Wade. Once the leap is made, the further development of the right becomes merely a matter of interpretation of the newly perceived rights.

An alternate approach to the development of unenumerated rights would look instead to the open-ended clauses of the Constitution such as the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clauses in Article IV and the Fourteenth Amendment, or the due process clause—or even no clause at all. Some Justices have viewed the developments since Griswold as a revival of open-ended substantive due process. This view has characterized the approach of Justices FELIX FRANKFURTER and JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN to the incorporation of procedural rights into the Fourteenth Amendment. They would have relied on the meaning of "liberty" rather than on the lifting of a "right" from the Bill of Rights and transferring the right to the Fourteenth Amendment (the approach of Justice Brennan and ultimately a majority of the Court).

If the Ninth Amendment is to serve as a meaningful vehicle for the protection of UNENUMERATED RIGHTS, it should, at the least, have something more to offer than the expansion of enumerated rights exemplified by Roe v. Wade and Richmond Newspapers or the open-ended substantive due process approach of Justices Frankfurter, Harlan, and Stewart. The Ninth Amendment offers two potential contributions: historical justification and constitutional standard. The historical justification, articulated by Justice Goldberg in Griswold and by Chief Justice Burger in Richmond Newspapers, provides a powerful support for the argument that "unenumerated rights" have a place in the Constitution.

The same history also suggests a constitutional standard: a range of rights protected by the entire text of the Constitution. To leave the Ninth Amendment open-ended, with no obligation on the part of judges to link unenumerated rights to enumerated rights, would render the amendment indistinguishable from the nontextually based substantive due process. Moreover, confining "retained" rights to those analogous to enumerated rights would be consistent with Madison's conception of the Ninth Amendment. He was not seeking to create new rights. He was concerned that the enumeration of the rights in the Bill of Rights could not possibly take into account similar but undefined rights that could not be fully delineated in a constitutional text. The Ninth Amendment was the original "safety net" to compensate for the imperfection of language and the inability to provide for changing circumstances. Such an approach leaves room for a gradual expansion of rights, but requires some grounding for each newly recognized right in the constitutional text. A text-based standard is one that requires far less justification, in terms of democratic political theory, than a frankly noninterpretivist standard.

Does the Ninth Amendment, as so limited, add an additional dimension to the technique employed in Griswold or Richmond Newspapers? If rights "retained" under the Ninth Amendment are those analogous to rights found elsewhere in the Constitution, how does this approach differ from the approach of Justice Douglas in Griswold, which found rights in the "penumbras" formed by "emanations" from existing rights?

One obvious response is that the Ninth Amendment is itself a textual, historically valid justification for this approach to the enforcement of enumerated rights. It thus has a "leg-up" in the quest for legitimacy of judicial intervention. Moreover, Ninth Amendment analysis should derive from the entire text of the Constitution and not merely from other rights. Thus, as Justice Brennan noted in Zobel v. Williams (1982), the RIGHT TO TRAVEL can be discerned as a necessary consequence of nationhood as embodied in several constitutional provisions. Similarly, protection of VOTING RIGHTS can be derived from constitutional provisions that contemplate broad voter participation. The Ninth Amendment has never defined absolute rights. Rather, jurisprudence based on the Ninth Amendment will require placing on the balancing scales those individual unenumerated rights that might otherwise be ignored but that are sufficiently analogous to enumerated rights, or to our governmental structure, as to require constitutional protection.

NORMAN REDLICH
(1986)

Bibliography

BLACK, CHARLES 1981 Decision According to Law. New York: Norton.

DUNBAR, L. 1956 James Madison and the Ninth Amendment. Virginia Law Review 42:627–643.

ELY, J. H. 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LAYCOCK, DOUGLAS 1981 Taking Constitutions Seriously: A Theory of Judicial Review by John Hart Ely. Texas Law Review 59:343–394.

PATTERSON, B. 1955 The Forgotten Ninth Amendment 27; The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretations, S. Doc. No. 92–82, 92d Cong.

REDLICH, N. 1961 Are There Certain Rights . . . Retained by the People? NYU Law Review 37:787, 802–808.

RHOADES, LYMAN and PATULA, RODNEY R. 1973 The Ninth Amendment: A Survey of Theory and Practice in the Federal Courts Since Griswold v. Connecticut. Denver Law Journal 50:153–176.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM 1981 Slouching Toward Bethlehem with the Ninth Amendment. Yale Law Journal 91:207–216.

NINTH AMENDMENT
(Update)

The Supreme Court's reliance on the Ninth Amendment to justify a constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY in the landmark cases of GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) and ROE V. WADE (1973) ignited great interest in the long-ignored amendment. Scholars wrote a flurry of articles about it, and lower federal courts began accepting Ninth Amendment challenges to a variety of statutes. After Roe, however, the Supreme Court consistently abstained from any further use of the Ninth Amendment. Its most notable rejection came in BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986). In Bowers, the federal court of appeals had held a statute criminalizing sodomy unconstitutional because it violated the right of privacy protected by, among other provisions, the Ninth Amendment. The Court, in a 5–4 decision, reversed. Though the Court noted that "[r]espondent does not defend the judgment below based on the Ninth Amendment, the Equal Protection Clause, or the Eighth Amendment," its refusal to extend the right of privacy grounded in the DUE PROCESS clause to this type of statute, together with its earlier refusals to rely on the Ninth Amendment, signaled that future legal challenges based on the Ninth Amendment would not likely be successful.

This is where the situation might have remained had President RONALD REAGAN not nominated appellate court judge Robert H. Bork to the Court in 1987. During his famously televised confirmation hearing, Bork was questioned by SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE Chairman Joseph Biden, as well as by Senators Strom Thurmond, Ted Kennedy, and Dennis DeConcini, about whether the right of privacy was supported by the Ninth Amendment. Bork initially suggested that the rights "retained by the people" referred solely to rights mentioned in state constitutions. Later he added: "I would be delighted" to use the Ninth Amendment "if anybody showed me historical evidence" as to what the Framers meant. Then Bork offered a provocative analogy that received wide attention: "I do not think you can use the ninth amendment unless you know something of what it means. For example, if you had an amendment that says 'Congress shall make no' and then there is an ink blot and you cannot read the rest of it and that is the only copy you have, I do not think the court can make up what might be under the ink blot if you cannot read it." Bork said he knew of no evidence that the Framers of the Ninth Amendment intended it to protect a "dynamic category of rights, that is, under the ninth amendment the court was free to make up more Bill of Rights."

Analogizing any part of the Constitution's text to an "ink blot"—while invoking the absence of historical inquiry—was sure to elicit an academic response. Bork's very public dialogue, followed by the SENATE's denial of his confirmation, sparked a renewed interest in the Ninth Amendment among constitutional scholars and an explosion of new articles and books on the subject ensued. Most, but not all, academic writers were friendlier to the use of the amendment than was either Bork or the Court. New historical research undercut the state constitutional rights thesis posited by Bork and others and supported the view that the rights "retained by the people" was a reference to inherent or NATURAL RIGHTS. What still divides scholars is whether the Ninth Amendment authorizes the judicial protection of the natural rights to which it refers.

Paralleling the academic response to Bork's treatment of the Ninth Amendment was the reaction of subsequent Court nominees when each was asked about the amendment. Justice DAVID H. SOUTER, for example, testified that "the starting point for anyone who reads the Constitution seriously is that there is a concept of limited governmental power which is not simply to be identified with the enumeration of those specific rights or specifically defined rights that were later embodied in the bill. If there were any further evidence needed for this, of course, we can start with the ninth amendment." Souter's denial that he had anything novel to contribute to the jurisprudence of the Ninth Amendment provoked Biden to respond: "It is novel that you acknowledge it, based on our past hearings in this committee. One of the last nominees said it was nothing but a waterblot on the Constitution, which I found fascinating." Souter went on to testify that he had no reason to doubt that the Ninth Amendment "was an acknowledgment that the enumeration was not intended to be in some sense exhaustive and in derogation of other rights retained." In response to the question of whether a majority acting through government can violate inherent rights that precede the state, Souter testified that the job of the Court is "to define and protect this point beyond which government simply cannot go or cannot go without the most strong justification."

Souter's testimony was to prove prophetic. In PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992), the Court overturned portions of a Pennsylvania ABORTION law. Speaking for a plurality in a rare jointly authored opinion, Justices ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, and Souter relied explicitly on the Ninth Amendment: "Neither the Bill of Rights nor the specific practices of States at the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment marks the outer limits of the substantive sphere of liberty which the Fourteenth Amendment protects. See U.S. Const., Amdt. 9." It then quoted with approval the statement of the second Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN that "the full scope of the liberty guaranteed by the Due Process Clause cannot be found in or limited by the precise terms of the specific guarantees elsewhere provided in the Constitution. This 'liberty' is not a series of isolated points pricked out in terms of the taking of property; the freedom of speech, press, and religion; the right to keep and bear arms; the freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures; and so on. It is a rational continuum which, broadly speaking, includes a freedom from all substantial arbitrary impositions and purposeless restraints, . . . and which also recognizes, what a reasonable and sensitive judgment must, that certain interests require particularly careful scrutiny of the state needs asserted to justify their abridgment."

Casey represents the high-water mark, to date, of judicial willingness to use the Ninth Amendment. Following Casey, and throughout the 1990s, the Court did not employ the Ninth Amendment or even refer to it and, unlike the rush of enthusiasm that followed Griswold and Roe, neither did lower courts increase their receptivity to Ninth Amendment arguments. Off the bench, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA has expressed skepticism about the Ninth Amendment, and its future will undoubtedly depend on the judicial philosophies of future nominees to the Court. It will also depend on whether judges or academics can develop ways to put the Ninth Amendment into effect without seeming to authorize unbridled judicial discretion to strike down statutes. As Biden observed during Justice Kennedy's confirmation hearing, Justices "are reluctant to use it because once you start down that road on the ninth amendment, then it becomes very difficult to figure where to stop; what are those unenumerated rights."

One possibility involves modifying the prevailing "presumption of constitutionality." Under this judicially created DOCTRINE, as explained in the famous Footnote 4 of UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938), courts will presume a statute to be constitutional unless "it appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as those of the first ten amendments. . . ." But if the courts shift the presumption only when a statute violates "a specific prohibition," do they not disparage or deny" the "other" rights "retained by the people" in violation of the Ninth Amendment? If courts do not even-handedly employ heightened scrutiny whenever a statute infringes on any rightful exercise of a citizen's liberty, have they not disparaged those liberties that were unenumerated?

Although distinguishing "rightful exercises of liberty" from mere "license" appears to pose the same problem of indeterminacy that attaches to identifying unenumerated rights directly, the problem may be less serious than first appears. State tort, property, and contract law doctrines routinely distinguish rightful from wrongful exercises of liberty, and federal judges regularly defer to state law in deciding cases between private parties in which there is DIVERSITY JURISDICTION. Moreover, federal courts frequently identify "liberty interests" that they then balance against governmental interests. Such liberty interests are, however, indistinguishable from rightful exercises of liberty (as opposed to license). In addition, the people, acting through state INITIATIVES or REFERENDUMS, could directly declare certain liberties to be fundamental.

Perhaps, then, federal courts could protect unenumerated rights by increasing the scrutiny of federal statutes restricting the exercise of individual liberties that constitute legitimate "liberty interests" insofar as they are neither tortious nor violative of the contract or property rights of another person. It would then fall to the federal government to show why such interferences with liberty are truly "necessary and proper," the legal standard supplied by the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE.

Adopting such a "presumption of liberty" would protect the unenumerated rights retained by the people in a manner very similar, if not identical, to the way the enumerated liberties of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS are protected under the FIRST AMENDMENT. Such a presumption would effectively negate the inference that JAMES MADISON sought to avoid when he drafted the Ninth Amendment: "that those rights which were not singled out, were intended to be assigned into the hands of the general government." As for protecting unenumerated liberties from infringements by states, the current weight of scholarly opinion is that, contrary to the SLAUGHTER-HOUSE CASES (1873), this protection is best accomplished by reference to the PRIVILEGES OR IMMUNITIES clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT—though the existence of the Ninth Amendment argues against rigidly limiting these privileges and immunities solely to "the enumeration in the constitution of certain rights."

RANDY E. BARNETT
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Bork Nomination.)

Bibliography

BARNETT, RANDY E., ed. 1989, 1993 The Rights Retained by the People: The History and Meaning of the Ninth Amendment, Vols. 1 & 2. Fairfax, Va.: George Mason University Press.

BARNETT, RANDY E. 1997 Necessary and Proper. UCLA Law Review 44:745–793.

MASSEY, CALVIN R. 1995 Silent Rights: The Ninth Amendment and the Constitution's Unenumerated Rights. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

SYMPOSIUM 1988 Interpreting the Ninth Amendment. Chicago-Kent Law Review 64:37–268.

YOO, JOHN CHOON 1993 Our Declaratory Ninth Amendment Emory Law Journal 42:967–1043.

NIX v. WILLIAMS
467 U.S. 431 (1984)

A 7–2 Supreme Court held that although an accused's incriminating statements could not be admitted as EVIDENCE because police had interrogated him in violation of his RIGHT TO COUNSEL, physical evidence discovered on the basis of his incriminating statements could be introduced against him if the prosecution, by a preponderance of proof, could show that such evidence would inevitably have been discovered even in the absence of accused's statements. The case produced an "inevitable discovery" exception to the EXCLUSIONARY RULE: any FRUIT OF THE POISONOUS TREE may be used as evidence if it would have been inevitably or ultimately discovered, just as if it had been discovered on the basis of independent or uncontaminated leads. (See BREWER V. WILLIAMS.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

NIXON, RICHARD M.
(1913–1994)

Richard Milhous Nixon, the thirty-seventh President of the United States, was born in Yorba Linda, California. An alumnus of Whittier College and Duke University Law School, he practiced law in Whittier, California, from 1937 to 1942. After a brief stint in the enforcement of wartime price controls, he entered the Navy and served with it in the South Pacific. Upon his release from duty he was elected to the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES from the Twelfth District of California. Shortly he gained national prominence as a member of the HOUSE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES, and he played a decisive role in generating the perjury case against Alger Hiss. Nixon was elected to the SENATE from his home state in 1950, gaining new notoriety in denouncing the Democrats for having "lost" China to communism. In 1952 he was elected vice-president as the running mate of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. Nixon had riveted national attention—once again—with an impassioned defense on radio and television of his acceptance of money from a political "slush" fund. As vice-president he drew international notice through his "kitchen debate" with Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev. Nixon was nominated for President by his party in 1960, but lost to the Democrats' JOHN F. KENNEDY in a close election. Two years later Nixon ran for governor of California and lost. He reentered the private practice of law, this time in New York City. Maintaining and broadening his political contacts, he was again nominated for the presidency by the Republicans in 1968. His campaign theme was a pledge to heal the divisions in the nation that the Vietnam War had created and to bring the hostilities to an honorable conclusion. He won a plurality of the popular vote over the Democrats' HUBERT H. HUMPHREY and George C. Wallace, candidate of the American Independence Party.

As President, Nixon took advantage of the dramatic expansion of the office that had been taking place since the time of FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, recognizing that the public had grown accustomed to regarding the Chief Executive as the undisputed architect of national policies. But Nixon stretched his authority with less restraint than his predecessors, undertaking steps violative of the law and of the Constitution itself. A full explanation for his actions may never be forthcoming. Possibly he felt keenly that his party's inability to capture or control Congress would continue to frustrate his desire to dismantle many New Deal and Great Society programs. He may also have been guided by inner compulsions of ambition and feelings of inadequacy he never articulated. Nixon, at any rate, interpreted by his own lights the constitutional prerogatives of his office, including an assumed right to ignore or modify the letter and intent of laws.

Nixon, for example, did not consider himself obligated to respect the law of 1972 requiring that EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS arrived at with foreign governments be reported to Congress within sixty days, cavalierly submitting them late. Moreover, he sometimes negotiated them at a lower diplomatic level and labeled them "arrangements." Under Nixon's stewardship, executive agreements were entered into on major matters and formal treaties almost invariably on minor matters—a reversal of the traditional relationship between the two forms of diplomatic undertakings.

Although a few Presidents had sometimes impounded funds appropriated by Congress, the step was generally taken in conformity with congressional intent or under the President's authority as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF. Nixon broke fresh ground in his assertion of a constitutional power to decline to spend appropriated funds. For him IMPOUNDMENT was a legitimate tool of the President to alter policy set by Congress—and he employed it on a scale hitherto unknown. While some of the funds he refused to release came out of military, space, and public works appropriations, vast amounts also came out of social and environmental programs. By 1973 Nixon's impoundments totaled about $18 billion, between seventeen and twenty percent of the funds he could claim to control. Nixon and his aides maintained that he was following patterns established by previous Presidents. The evidence is, however, that his predecessors did not aim to contravene the will of Congress, but merely postpone immediate expenditure. Nixon, on the other hand, used impoundment to terminate or curtail programs. He defended his actions on the ground that the executive power of the President included a constitutional right to be the people's defender against Congress's inability to hold down nondefense spending.

Nixon's boldness had the effect of giving the executive an item veto of appropriation bills—a remedy long sought by Presidents, and provided for in the CONFEDERATE CONSTITUTION, but consistently withheld from Presidents since first requested by President ULYSSES S. GRANT in 1873. Whatever the merit of the device, Nixon's insistence on exercising it in defiance of Congress was a usurpation of power.

Although WIRETAPPING without formal authorization had long been employed occasionally by Presidents, Nixon was the first Chief Executive who systematically resorted to its use. His practice of it grew out of a determination to keep under wraps the "secret" B-52 raids over Cambodia in 1969. Nixon was apparently fashioning a new conception of his office, metamorphosing it into a "plebiscitary presidency"—one in which the Chief Executive would assume widened power under the Constitution, relying on a reshaped Supreme Court to validate his actions. Nixon's expressed concern was that leaks of information about the "secret war" were putting national security in jeopardy. He ordered the tapping of telephones of members of the National Security Council staff and of several newspaper reporters. The taps were conducted without court order and in patent violation of Title III of the OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT of 1968. By countenancing not only illegal wiretapping but, shortly, burglary (in the case of Daniel Ellsberg, who revealed the so-called Pentagon Papers), the hiring of agents provacateurs (to conduct "dirty tricks" in election campaigns), and the subverting of the Internal Revenue Service (to punish "enemies"), Nixon was substituting his personal sanction for established law.

In assuming this prerogative, Nixon believed he was exercising what he regarded as INHERENT POWER to maintain national and domestic security. This claim of "inherent power," sometimes also set forth by previous Presidents, has never been recognized as valid by the courts. In United States v. United States District Court (1972) the Supreme Court by an 8–0 vote ruled unconstitutional the Nixon administration's practice of engaging in domestic electronic surveillance without a judicial warrant.

Nixon's assertion of an EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE to reject a SUBPOENA became the issue in the case of UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974). The suit revolved around Nixon's refusal to surrender tapes containing information relevant to the prosecution of some of his close aides for offenses that included obstruction of justice by "covering up" the administration's involvement in the WATERGATE break-in. In its unanimous decision requiring the President to turn over the tapes, the Supreme Court recognized that a President is entitled to confidentiality of communication—needful for "protection of the public interest in candid, objective, and even blunt or harsh opinion in presidential decisionmaking." But, the Court concluded, "when the ground for asserting privilege as to subpoenaed material sought for use in a criminal trial is based only on the generalized interest in confidentiality, it cannot prevail over the fundamental demands of DUE PROCESS OF LAW in the fair administration of criminal justice. The generalized assertion of privilege must yield to the demonstrated, specific need for EVIDENCE in a pending criminal trial."

Nixon toyed with the idea of disobeying the decision, but decided to comply, surrendering the tapes covered in the decision. Indeed, he published their contents, thus providing the House Judiciary Committee with the "smoking gun"—the now famous words in which the President counseled inducing the Central Intelligence Agency to limit the FBI's investigation of the Watergate burglary.

Nixon's use of the POCKET VETO was also remarkable. As intended by the Framers of the Constitution it may be used at the end of a session of Congress when a President who does not sign a bill cannot return it to Congress because it stands adjourned. Nixon unhesitatingly used pocket vetoes when Congress was merely in brief recess. In Kennedy v. Simpson (1973) a district court overturned as misused Nixon's pocket veto of the Family Practice of Medicine Bill, which had been opposed by only three members of Congress.

Nixon's transgressions of the law and the Constitution contributed to the passage of two major pieces of legislation. One was the CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET AND IMPOUNDMENT CONTROL ACT of 1974, which detailed the arrangements under which Congress may monitor the deferral by a President of appropriated funds. The second law, responding to the deployment of troops in Asia, first by President LYNDON B. JOHNSON and then by Nixon, was the War Powers Resolution of 1973, severely restricting the ability of a President to use military force outside the United States without congressional authorization. Nixon and all succeeding Presidents have denounced this law as an unconstitutional abridgment of the power of the President to direct the armed forces.

Nixon made two nominations to the Supreme Court that failed of confirmation. In 1969 he submitted the name of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth of South Carolina, a designation that met implacable opposition from CIVIL RIGHTS groups and labor unions. Early the following year Nixon sent forward the name of Judge G. Harrold Carswell of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Florida. Denounced as a racist in many quarters, although he had renounced his older views on race, Carswell was also opposed as lacking the superior qualifications required for a seat on the highest court.

In addition to placing HARRY A. BLACKMUN of Minnesota, LEWIS F. POWELL, JR., of Virginia, and WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST of Arizona on the Supreme Court, Nixon also appointed the fourteenth Chief Justice, Judge WARREN E. BURGER of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, whose conservative speeches and advocacy of judicial restraint appealed to the President. Nixon had been especially impressed by an address that Burger delivered in 1967 on the subject of "law and order," from which Nixon had borrowed during the 1968 campaign for the Presidency. He was mindful, too, of the support Burger had given him during his critical time in the 1952 campaign.

Nixon was the first Chief Executive to resign the Presidency—a consequence of the Watergate affair that convulsed the nation from 1972 to 1974. The reasons for the burglary—carried out by Nixon's political aides at the headquarters of the Democratic party—have never been adduced. From the start of the investigation the administration tried to cover up its connection to the crime. In the long drawnout effort to get at the truth, the focus of the quest became the President himself: what did he know and when did he know it? The evidence lay in the recordings of conversations in his office that Nixon was revealed to have been making for years. The President turned over the critical tapes just as the House of Representatives seemed on the verge of voting to impeach him. He surrendered his office on August 9, 1974. The following month, his successor, GERALD R. FORD, issued the former President a "full, free, and absolute" pardon for any crimes he may have committed.

HENRY F. GRAFF
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Articles of Impeachment of Richard M. Nixon; Impeachment.)

Bibliography

KURLAND, PHILLIP B. 1978 Watergate and the Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

NATHAN, RICHARD P. 1973 The Plot That Failed: Nixon and the Administrative Presidency. New York: Wiley.

NIXON, RICHARD M. 1978 R.N.: The Memoirs of Richard Nixon. New York: Grosset Dunlap.

SCHLESINGER, ARTHUR M., JR. 1973 The Imperial Presidency. Boston: Little, Brown.

WHITE, THEODORE H. 1975 Breach of Faith: The Fall of Richard Nixon. New York: Atheneum.

NIXON, UNITED STATES v.
418 U.S. 683 (1974)

This litigation unfolded contemporaneously with congressional investigation of the Watergate affair and with proceedings in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES for the IMPEACHMENT of President RICHARD M. NIXON. (See WATERGATE AND THE CONSTITUTION.) A federal GRAND JURY had indicted seven defendants, including Nixon's former attorney general and closest White House aides, charging several offenses, including conspiracy to obstruct justice by "covering up" the circumstances of a burglary of Democratic party offices in Washington. The grand jury named Nixon as an unindicted co-conspirator. A special prosecutor had been appointed to handle this prosecution. To obtain evidence, the special prosecutor asked Judge John Sirica to issue a SUBPOENA ordering Nixon to produce electronic tapes and papers relating to sixty-four White House conversations among persons named as conspirators, including Nixon himself.

Judge Sirica issued the subpoena in mid-April 1974; on May 1, Nixon's counsel moved to quash the subpoena and to expunge the grand jury's naming of the President as a co-conspirator. Sirica denied both motions and ordered Nixon to produce the subpoenaed items. When Nixon appealed, the special prosecutor asked the Supreme Court to hear the case, bypassing the court of appeals. The Court granted that motion and advanced argument to July 8. On July 24 the Court upheld the subpoena, 8–0, including the votes of three Nixon appointees. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, formerly a Justice Department official under the indicted ex-attorney general, had disqualified himself. A week following the decision, before Nixon had complied with it, the House Judiciary Committee recommended his impeachment. When Nixon turned over the tapes on August 5, they included a conversation that even his strongest supporters called a "smoking gun." On August 9 the President resigned.

A year earlier a White House press officer had said Nixon would obey a "definitive" decision of the Supreme Court about the tapes. At ORAL ARGUMENT in the Supreme Court, however, Nixon's counsel, pressed to say that the President had "submitted himself" to the Court's decision, evaded any forthright promise of compliance. Even after the Court's decision, the press reported, Nixon and his aides debated for some hours whether he should comply with the subpoena. Some have reported that the Court's unanimity was an important factor influencing that decision.

The Court itself seems to have been impressed with the need for unanimity; its bland opinion, formally attributed to Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, bore the external marks of a document hurriedly negotiated—as investigative reporters have said it was. The Court brushed aside objections to its JURISDICTION, such as the FINAL JUDGMENT RULE. Nixon also argued that the courts had no jurisdiction over an "intra-branch" dispute between the President and his subordinate, the special prosecutor. Responding, the Court emphasized the "uniqueness" of the conflict, but apart from that comment its argument bordered on incoherence. After gratuitously remarking that the executive branch had exclusive discretionary control over federal criminal prosecutions, the Court reversed field, discovering a guarantee of independence for the special prosecutor in the regulation that appointed him and promised not to remove him absent a consensus among certain congressional leaders. Both the Court's propositions were dubious. (See APPOINTING AND REMOVAL POWER.) Yet the Court marched on to some heroic constitutional issues concerning relations between the executive and judicial branches.

Both sides had appealed to the abstraction of SEPARATION OF POWERS. Nixon argued first that the judiciary lacked power "to compel the President in the exercise of his discretion," and second that the President enjoyed an EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE to keep confidential his conversations with his advisers. The first argument blurred two separate issues: the President's immunity from judicial process and the POLITICAL QUESTION issue of his discretion to control disclosure of his conversations. This latter claim of absolute executive privilege overlapped his second main argument. That argument began with an absolute privilege claim, but if that claim failed the President sought to persuade the Court to recognize a wide scope for a qualified privilege.

The special prosecutor, opposing both PRESIDENTIAL IMMUNITY and the claim of absolute privilege, assumed the existence of a qualified privilege. That privilege was lost, he argued, when there was substantial reason to believe that the participants in a presidential conversation had been planning a crime.

The Court's opinion, like Nixon's argument, blurred the boundaries of separate issues in the case. The decision to uphold the subpoena, however, implicitly rejected the claim of presidential immunity, and the Court expressly rejected the claim of absolute privilege. A qualified privilege did exist, the Court said—by way of assumption, not demonstration—but the privilege was defeated when the specific confidential information sought was shown to be relevant, admissible evidence for a pending federal prosecution. The Court thus disposed of the case without mentioning Nixon's own possible complicity in crime; it dismissed the question whether the President could constitutionally be named as a co-conspirator.

Today some form of a qualified executive privilege is assumed to exist, but the scope of the privilege remains largely undefined. Nixon's most important contribution to our constitutional law, however, lay elsewhere: in its reaffirmation that even the highest officer of government is not beyond the reach of the law and the courts. Nixon's brief had included this remark, designed to reassure: "it must be stressed we do not suggest the President has the attributes of a king. Inter alia, a king rules by inheritance and for life." The Nixon decision reminded us that there are also other differences.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

SYMPOSIUM 1974 United States v. Nixon. UCLA Law Review 22:1–140.

WOODWARD, BOB and ARMSTRONG, SCOTT 1979 The Brethren: Inside the Supreme Court. Pages 285–347. New York: Simon and Schuster.

NIXON v. ADMINISTRATOR OF GENERAL SERVICES
433 U.S. 425 (1977)

Ex-president RICHARD M. NIXON sued to prevent implementation of the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act. In upholding the constitutionality of the act, the Supreme Court rejected Nixon's contentions that it violated SEPARATION OF POWERS and EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE, abridged Nixon's RIGHT OF PRIVACY and FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION, and constituted a BILL OF ATTAINDER.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

NIXON v. CONDON
286 U.S. 73 (1932)

After the decision in NIXON V. HERNDON (1927), Texas amended its statute, giving a political party's state executive committee the power to set voting qualifications for the party's PRIMARY ELECTIONS. The Democratic party's committee limited primary voting to whites. Nixon, a black, again was denied a primary ballot and again sued election officials for DAMAGES. The Supreme Court reversed a dismissal of the action, holding, 5–4, that the committee's conduct was STATE ACTION in violation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The line of "Texas primary cases" continued with GROVEY V. TOWNSEND (1935).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

NIXON v. FITZGERALD
457 U.S. 731 (1982)
HARLOW v. FITZGERALD
457 U.S. 800 (1982)

In these cases the Supreme Court significantly expanded the scope of EXECUTIVE IMMUNITY in actions for DAMAGES brought by persons injured by official action. Fitzgerald sued former President RICHARD M. NIXON and two of his aides, alleging that he had been dismissed from an Air Force job in retaliation for revealing to a congressional committee a two billion dollar cost overrun for a transport aircraft.

In Nixon the Court held, 5–4, that the President is absolutely immune from civil damages—not merely for the performance of particular functions but for all acts within the "outer perimeter" of his official duties. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, for the majority, rested his decision not on the text of the Constitution but on "the constitutional tradition of the SEPARATION OF POWERS." Unlike other executive officers, who have only a qualified immunity from damages actions, the President occupies a unique place in the government. He must be able to act without fear of intrusive inquiries into his motives. The dissenters agreed that some of the President's functions should be clothed in absolute immunity, but argued that a qualified immunity from suit was sufficient in most cases to protect presidential independence.

In Harlow the Court, 8–1, rejected the aides' claim of absolute immunity, but broadened the scope of qualified executive immunity. Under previous decisions, this immunity was lost when the official negligently violated "clearly established" rights or acted with malicious intention to deprive constitutional rights or to cause harm. The Court here eliminated the "malicious intention" test for losing the immunity. A great many actions for damages against executive officials are based on claims of right that are not "clearly established." Harlow forbids damages in such a case even though the official acts with malice.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

NIXON v. HERNDON
273 U.S. 536 (1927)

This decision was the first in a series of "Texas primary cases." Texas law disqualified blacks from voting in Democratic party PRIMARY ELECTIONS. Nixon, refused a ballot under this law, sued election officers for damages under the federal CIVIL RIGHTS laws, asserting a denial of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and a denial of the right to vote on account of race, in violation of the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. (See VOTING RIGHTS.) The Supreme Court reversed a dismissal of the action, holding for Nixon on his equal protection claim and not discussing the Fifteenth Amendment. The next case in the series was NIXON V. CONDON (1932).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

NIXON v. UNITED STATES
506 U.S. 224 (1993)

In Nixon v. United States, the Supreme Court held that a challenge to the U.S. SENATE's practice of permitting a committee to hear evidence against an impeached judge presented a nonjusticiable POLITICAL QUESTION. The petitioner Walter Nixon, a federal judge, had made false statements to a federal GRAND JURY that was investigating him for bribery. He argued that having a body smaller than the Senate receive evidence deprived him of a "trial" by the Senate, which, under Article I, section 3 has "the sole Power to try all Impeachments." A six-member majority of Justices found that "the use of the word 'try' in the first sentence of the Impeachment Trial Clause lacks sufficient precision to afford any judicially manageable standard of review of the Senate's actions." It further held that JUDICIAL REVIEW was precluded by the vesting in the Senate of the "sole" power of trial and conviction: "If the courts may review the actions of the Senate . . . , it is difficult to see how the Senate would be 'functioning . . . independently . . .' "

Had the majority reached the merits, Nixon probably still would have lost, as Justice BYRON R. WHITE argued in a CONCURRING OPINION. Many federal adjudications entail initial evidence-gathering by an official or entity other than the ultimate trier of fact. In contrast, the majority's nonmerits reasoning is peculiar. Given the constitutional inferences that the Court has confidently drawn in other adjudicative contexts, it seems incredible that the federal judiciary would be incompetent to determine what constitutes a legally sufficient impeachment trial. Nor would circumscribed judicial review seem to deprive the Senate of its "sole" power to conduct such trials.

Because impeachment is Congress's only constitutionally authorized check on miscreant judges, it is easy, however, to understand the Court's desire to exhibit self-restraint in policing the process. The Court may also have wanted to signal to the executive branch that it would not interfere with Congress's exclusive mechanism for forcing the removal of corrupt public officials.

PETER M. SHANE
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Judicial Impeachment.)

Bibliography

GERHARDT, MICHAEL J. 1993 The Senate's Process for Removing Federal Judges. Pages 139–242 in National Commission on Judicial Discipline and Removal, Research Papers of the National Commission on Judicial Discipline and Removal, Vol. I. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

——— 1994 Rediscovering Nonjusticiability: Judicial Review of Impeachments after Nixon. Duke Law Journal 44:231–276.

NLRB v. FRIEDMAN-HARRY MARKS CLOTHING CO.

See: Wagner Act Cases

NLRB v. FRUEHAUF TRAILER CO.

See: Wagner Act Cases

NLRB v. JONES & LAUGHLIN STEEL CORP.

See: Wagner Act Cases

NO-KNOCK ENTRY

Police are not allowed to enter a house to search or make an ARREST unless they have procured a warrant based on PROBABLE CAUSE, according to PAYTON V. NEW YORK (1980) and Vale v. Louisiana (1970). If police cannot get a warrant because of EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES, they may act on probable cause alone. In either case, the Supreme Court has not articulated specific rules for no-knock entries. At COMMON LAW, police could not make a forcible entry unless admittance was refused after they announced their authority and purpose, and the FEDERAL CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE prescribes the same requirements. But the Court has not made this rule into a formal FOURTH AMENDMENT requirement. Rather, the Court emphasizes that entries must always be reasonable, and forcible entries must be based on exigent circumstances. A few states authorize by statute the issuance of no-knock warrants, but any blanket sanctioning of such entries probably would be held to violate the Fourth Amendment.

CATHERINE HANCOCK
(1986)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1978 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. Vol. 2:122–140. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

NOLO CONTENDERE

(Latin: "I do not choose to contest [it].") This statement, variously defined as plea and not a plea, indicates that the defendant will not fight a charge against him. Of the same immediate effect as a guilty plea, it admits the facts charged but cannot be used as a confession of guilt in any other proceeding. Acceptance by a court is discretionary.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

NONINTERPRETIVISM

This ungainly name was invented as a counterpart of INTERPRETIVISM, the view that courts, in deciding on the meaning of the Constitution, should find their authoritative sources only in the constitutional text and the clearly established intentions of those who adopted the text. A noninterpretivitst, then, was one who believed that courts might properly go beyond these sources, enforcing constitutional norms not readily discernible in the text or the Framers' intentions, narrowly conceived. These terms lost their vogue fairly quickly because few commentators (and no judges) wanted to admit that their views were anything other than interpretations of the Constitution.

Today's commentary uses other terms that are more descriptive of their referents. "Textualism," for example, refers to a view that focuses closely on the Constitution's words. Almost no commentators now profess to be strict textualists. Justice HUGO L. BLACK is the modern Supreme Court's strongest claimant to being a textualist, and even he had his moments of backsliding. ORIGINALISM, which limits the authoritative sources to the text and the ORIGINAL INTENT of the Framers, has a number of adherents among today's commentators and a smaller number among the federal judiciary, but none among the Justices. By the end of the 1980s, however, sightings of noninterpretivists had become rarer than sightings of Bigfoot.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

Bibliography

BREST, PAUL 1980 The Misconceived Quest for the Original Understanding. Boston University Law Review 60:204–238.

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review, chaps. 1 and 2. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1988 Original Intent and the Framers' Constitution. New York: Macmillan.

PERRY, MICHAEL J. 1982 The Constitution, the Courts, and Human Rights. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

TUSHNET, MARK V. 1983 Following the Rules Laid Down: A Critique of Interpretivism and Neutral Principles. Harvard Law Review 96:781–827.

NONJUDICIAL INTERPRETATION OF THE CONSTITUTION

The requirement in Article VI, section 3, that public officers "support the Constitution" applies to all three branches of government, not merely the judiciary. In compliance with this constitutional mandate, legislators and executive officials have made major contributions over the years in interpreting and shaping the Constitution. Because jucidial doctrines often exclude the courts from deciding certain questions, the meaning of the Constitution may depend exclusively on determinations reached by the legislative and executive branches.

In the early decades of the American republic, before the Supreme Court began to establish PRECEDENTS for constitutional law, the Constitution had to be interpreted solely by members of Congress and executive officials. Such critical issues as FEDERALISM, INTERSTATE COMMERCE, the President's APPOINTING AND REMOVAL POWER, the investigative power of Congress, the TREATY POWER and FOREIGN AFFAIRS, SLAVERY, and INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS were debated and resolved by the political branches without any assistance from the judiciary. Many of these constitutional judgments were later accepted by the federal courts as binding interpretations.

The idea of JUDICIAL SUPREMACY begins with Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's declaration in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) that it is "emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." Bold words, but the political situation required Marshall to finesse the legal issue to avoid a confrontation with President THOMAS JEFFERSON he knew he could not win. Significantly, Marshall never again, throughout his long tenure on the bench, invalidated another act of Congress.

It is doubtful whether Marshall actually believed that the Supreme Court possessed the exclusive authority to decide the meaning of the Constitution. After Congress impeached and removed Judge JOHN PICKERING in 1804 and began proceedings to impeach Supreme Court Justice SAMUEL J. CHASE (with Marshall probably next in line), Marshall wrote to Chase on January 23, 1804, suggesting that members of Congress did not have to impeach judges because they objected to their legal opinions. Congress could simply reverse the decisions. Marshall advised Chase, "I think the modern doctrine of impeachment should yield to an appellate jurisdiction in the legislature. A reversal of those legal opinions deemed unsound by the legislatures would certainly better comport with the mildness of our character that [would] a removal of the Judge who has rendered them unknowing of his fault."

Marshall's letter to Chase is somewhat ambiguous. Could Congress reverse only statutory interpretations or constitutional decisions as well? Did reversal require a constitutional amendment or merely a statute? The context of Marshall's statement implies that he was quite willing to share with the other two branches the task of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION.

Obviously, neither Congress nor the Presidents accepted the Court as the final arbiter of constitutional law. Jefferson believed that constitutional decisions by one branch, including the judiciary, were to be given "no control to another branch." Each branch "has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the Constitution in the cases submitted to its action; and especially, where it is to act ultimately and without APPEAL." An example is the President's PARDONING POWER. Although the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS of 1798 had never been declared unconstitutional in the federal courts, Jefferson considered it a nullity when he became President and, accordingly, pardoned those who had been convicted under it. Congress later appropriated funds to reimburse individuals who had been fined under the Sedition Act, declaring in committee reports that the statute was "unconstitutional, null, and void." The Court later admitted in NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964) that the Sedition Act had been repudiated not by a court of law, but by the "court of history."

President ANDREW JACKSON also believed that each branch of government had an independent duty to interpret the Constitution. The Court upheld the constitutionality of the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), and Congress passed legislation to recharter it, but Jackson nevertheless vetoed the bill on the ground that Congress, the President, and the Court "must each for itself be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution. Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution swears that he will support it as he understands it, and not as it is understood by others." This broad concept of the VETO POWER has been adopted by all subsequent Presidents.

In a series of speeches in 1858, ABRAHAM LINCOLN denied that the Court's decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) represented the "last word" on the slavery issue, particularly with regard to the power of Congress to prohibit SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES and the rights of blacks. Lincoln considered the Court a coequal, not a superior, branch of government. In his inaugural address in 1861, he warned that if government policy on "vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed" by the Court, "the people will have ceased to be their own rulers."

