When the Constitution was adopted business was still largely a local phenomenon. Save for a handful of trading companies, few businesses reached beyond their local environment. The costs of communication and transportation, the uncertainties of the politics and the cultures of foreign environments, and the difficulties of controlling an organization over expanses of both time and space, made cosmopolitan enterprise expensive and problematic when possible, and more often impossible. Consequently, of necessity and habit, business enterprises were regarded as local.

At the time of the adoption of the Constitution, moreover, the corporation was not principally a business utility. Rather, it was a vehicle for the creation of entities more generally, such as municipal corporations and charitable corporations, as well as business corporations. Contemporary corporate law reflected that understanding. Each corporate entity, whether business or not, was a product of the energies of the local citizenry and the sanction of the sovereign body legislating the entity into existence. These creations came to be seen as products of the agreement of a sovereign body and a group of individuals who agreed to create a legal entity for certain purposes. Only occasionally were those purposes economic. Because business enterprise was local and severely limited in scale and scope, most businesses existed without being chartered by the sovereign.

In a federal constitutional system of DUAL SOVEREIGNTY, however, which sovereign had the power to create business entities quickly became controversial as the physical, temporal, and spatial boundaries for economic activity began very gradually to melt away. Entrepreneurial choice, however, was also legally limited.

States not only chartered corporations but also regulated them, usually through the charter itself. Entrepreneurs who sought the advantages of the corporate form, such as monopoly rights and limited liability (although there is today an important debate about whether these advantages, especially limited liability, were as prevalent or as advantageous as historians have long assumed), submitted to certain regulations as a condition of incorporation. Because state legislatures granted the charters—creation of subordinate legal entities being the prerogative of the sovereign, and SOVEREIGNTY residing ultimately in the legislature—corporations were legislative creations. Their creation thus occasioned, especially in times of antibusiness sentiment, stringent limits on corporate behavior and even outright denials of charters.

State legislative sovereignty was not, however, absolute. The courts, especially the Supreme Court, spent much effort, especially in the early nineteenth century, to create the preconditions for cosmopolitan, even national, businesses and to limit parochial control of those businesses by the states. In its early decisions it noted that corporations were creatures of common law as well as charter, thus claiming for itself a role in defining corporate existence. It laid this claim in DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1816) by defining corporations as contracts between the sovereign and the individual corporators, and then using the CONTRACTS CLAUSE to prohibit states from changing the terms of such contracts after the charter was granted. It legimated congressional charters by validating the charter of the Bank of the United States in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) though Congress did not take advantage of this power often. The Court used its own power to create the presumption that a corporation might operate across state lines unless excluded from doing so, and then limited the terms on which a state might exclude. In these, and many other ways, the Court helped to create the legal regime that allowed corporations to reincorporate at will, and thus to take advantage of the economic and political conditions that made both the "race to the bottom" and the "climb to the top" plausible interpretations of the history of corporate federalism.

GREGORY A. MARK
(2000)

Bibliography

BUTLER, HENRY A. 1985 Nineteenth-Century Jurisdictional Competition in the Granting of Corporate Privileges. Journal of Legal Studies 14:129–166.

MARK, GREGORY A. 1998 The Court and the Corporation: Jurisprudence, Localism, and Federalism. Supreme Court Review 1997:403–437.

CORPORATE POWER, FREE SPEECH, AND DEMOCRACY

Although CORPORATIONS do not enjoy all constitutional rights enjoyed by individuals—for example, neither the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION under the Fifth Amendment nor the right against interstate discrimination under the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of Article IV has been extended to corporate entities—they have been held to enjoy the right of FREEDOM OF SPEECH under the FIRST AMENDMENT. Numerous First Amendment claims have been litigated on behalf of media corporations invoking the FREEDOM OF THE PRESS as well as free speech. But the free speech clause has also been extended to nonmedia corporations. In FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON V. BELLOTTI (1978), the Supreme Court invalidated a state law prohibiting any corporation from making contributions or expenditures for the purpose of influencing the vote on any state ballot INITIATIVE or REFERENDUM question other than one directly affecting its business. And in Pacific Gas & Electric (PG&E) v. Public Utilities Commission (1986), the Court invalidated a requirement that a utility corporation carry unwanted literature in its billing envelope. Each of these cases was decided over a vigorous DISSENTING OPINION objecting that speech rights should be limited to natural PERSONS, and that speech restrictions were a permissible condition upon government's grant of the considerable privileges of the corporate form.

Critics of corporate free-speech rights argue that corporations, which lack souls or personalities, cannot have any right comparable to that of individuals in self-expression. As Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST wrote in dissent in PG&E, to ascribe "to such artificial entities an 'intellect' or 'mind' for freedom of conscience purposes is to confuse metaphor with reality." But the majority of the Court, in extending free-speech protection to corporations, has reasoned that the First Amendment protects values beyond speaker autonomy—specifically, the values of ensuring the free flow of information to the public and preventing the government from entrenching itself in power by distorting debate or suppressing dissident views. These systemic values, the Court has concluded, counsel against allowing government to regulate speech even when the speaker is a corporation.

A further reason for the Court's approach may well be the serious line-drawing problems that would attend any attempt to exclude corporations from free-speech protection. A tobacco manufacturer is a corporation, but so is a book publisher, a BROADCASTING company, a daily newspaper, and a nonprofit advocacy group. Excluding all corporations from the First Amendment would untenably exclude the speech of nonprofit advocacy organizations. But excluding only for-profit corporations would eliminate most newspapers, publishers, and broadcasters—an outcome incompatible with freedom of the press. Any attempt to exempt the institutional media would raise intractable problems of deciding who counts as a member. And although corporations do enjoy certain state-conferred advantages such as limited liability and tax benefits, government confers similar advantages on a range of other collective entities, from LABOR unions to POLITICAL PARTIES, that surely would not be disqualified from First Amendment protection on that account.

Still, critics object that corporate enjoyment of free-speech rights may itself distort or dampen debate and diversity in public discourse, so that corporate speech regulation will enhance rather than inhibit the freedom of speech. Such objections rest in part on the disproportionate market power of corporations, and the fear that freedom for corporate speakers will produce public debate dominated by those that are economically powerful. As Justice BYRON R. WHITE objected in dissent in Bellotti, corporations have acquired "vast amounts of money which may, if not regulated, dominate not only the economy but also the very heart of our democracy, the electoral process." A related but separate objection is that corporations will be able to use wealth aggregated for economic purposes to express political views without regard to whether they reflect the actual opinions of owners, customers, or employees.

The Court has acknowledged the second but not the first of these objections. It has maintained that regulations aimed at the content of speech may not be justified by the goal of equalizing relative speaking power—whether by inhibiting the speech of wealthy corporations or wealthy individuals. But in a narrowly divided 1990 decision, AUSTIN V. MICHIGAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, the Court held that for-profit corporations may be required to segregate their expenditures on behalf of political candidates from their corporate treasuries in order to deal with "the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form and that have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas." Similar segregation requirements, the Court had previously held in Federal Election Commission v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life (1986), may not constitutionally be imposed on nonprofit advocacy organizations, which present no similar danger of distortion. Thus, Austin stands as a shallow bow to the critics against a general backdrop of constitutional protection for corporate speech.

While the First Amendment has been held to bar most direct regulation of corporate speech through content-based laws, it also has been held to permit a wide range of content-neutral structural regulation of speech markets. For example, in TURNER BROADCASTING SYSTEM V. FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION (1994, 1997), the Court held that Congress may require cable operators to carry broadcast programs they would otherwise drop in order to ensure competition in the video programming market and diversity in the broadcast choices available to households lacking cable television. Nor does current First Amendment law bar enforcement of general ANTITRUST LAW against media conglomerates found to have excessive market power. All that is required is that the goal of such structural regulation be economic rather than ideological, and that the regulation not be needlessly broad.

KATHLEEN M. SULLIVAN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Corporate Citizenship; Electoral Process and the First Amendment.)

Bibliography

BAKER, EDWIN C. 1995 Turner Broadcasting: Content-Based Regulation of Persons and Presses. Supreme Court Review 1994:57–128.

BEZANSON, RANDALL P. 1995 Institutional Speech. Iowa Law Review 80:735–824.

FISS, OWEN M. 1996 Liberalism Divided: Freedom of Speech and the Many Uses of State Power. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.

VARIOUS AUTHORS 1997 Speech and Power: Is First Amendment Absolutism Obsolete? The Nation 265:3:11–19.

CORPORATIONS AND THE CONSTITUTION

The United States is the organizational or the corporate society par excellence. Seen sociologically, numerous societal entities of a corporate nature exist. From the perspective of constitutional law, only the business corporation has the status of being a PERSON. Those enterprises are social organizations midway between the state and the individual, owing their existence to the latter's need for organization and the former's reluctance to supply it. They are part of the greatest silence of the Constitution—the nature and operation of the economy. Except for a few nebulous provisions in Article I, plus the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS clause and the property provisions of the Fifth Amendment, all is left to inference. Neither business corporations nor unions nor any other private organization (for example, universities, farmers' legions, veterans' leagues, and the like) are mentioned.

As a consequence, corporate organizations fit uneasily into constitutional theory. As collectivities, they are the principal units of today's political pluralism. The giant corporations dominate the economy, both domestically and internationally. It was not always so. As late as 1800, only about 300 business corporations existed. Industrialization, coupled with massive governmental aid (pursuant to ALEXANDER HAMILTON's principles), so burgeoned corporate growth that during the 1850s more were formed than ever before. After the CIVIL WAR, the "trusts"—the forerunners of today's corporate giants—flowered.

The large corporations do not fit into democratic theory. Centers of economic and thus of political power, some are so mighty as to challenge the SOVEREIGNTY of the state. Constitutional decisions of the Supreme Court have formed a major part of the legal basis for that dominating position. DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819) set the tone. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL read the CONTRACT CLAUSE to nullify New Hampshire's attempt to alter Dartmouth's charter, originally granted by the English crown. In well-known language, Marshall called the corporation "an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law." He thus made it clear that corporations, although collectivities, were private entities, and by labeling them "artificial beings" he paved the way for the Court in 1886 to declare that corporations are PERSONS protected by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. (Also in 1819, Marshall ruled that Congress had IMPLIED POWER to form corporations when "NECESSARY AND PROPER" to carry out its expressly granted powers. The decision, MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND, is also noteworthy for its theory of BROAD CONSTRUCTION of the Constitution.)

As constitutional persons, corporations were able to invoke the DUE PROCESS clauses to fend off adverse regulations. By inventing the concept of SUBSTANTIVE (or economic) DUE PROCESS, the Supreme Court helped to defang the Granger, Populist, and nascent LABOR MOVEMENTS. FREEDOM OF CONTRACT was read into the Constitution; laissez-faire economics became constitutional DOCTRINE. By that one development the Court catapulted JUDICIAL REVIEW into a powerful instrument of governance.

LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) is the best known economic due process decision. Over a famous dissent by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, the Court invalidated a statute regulating the hours of workers in bakeries, because both the company's and the workers' freedoms to contract were improperly invaded. So many similar decisions were rendered that by 1924 John R. Commons called the Court "the first authoritative faculty of political economy in the world's history."

That practice was altered by the Great Depression: in 1937 the Court grudgingly conceded that economic policy was a province of federal legislation. The turning point came in WEST COAST HOTEL CORP. V. PARRISH (1937) and the WAGNER ACT CASES (National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 1937). The latter decision in practical effect "constitutionalized" political pluralism. FERGUSON V. SKRUPA (1963) illustrates the modern, and doubtless permanent, attitude of the Court toward ECONOMIC REGULATION.

Noneconomic regulation is a different matter. In FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON V. BELLOTTI (1978) the Court invalidated a Massachusetts statute prohibiting corporations from spending money to influence elections. Corporate managers now have an unabridgeable right not only to spend their personal funds to further their political views but to use the money of others (in legal theory, corporations are owned by the stockholders). Although fictional persons, corporations by judicial legislation are attaining many of the rights of natural persons.

Neither political theorists nor economists have produced a satisfactory theory of conscious economic cooperation and its effect on the constitutional order. The Supreme Court refuses to recognize the corporation for what it is—a private government that, save in label, differs little from public government. Americans are governed as much—perhaps more—by corporations as they are by the official organs of government. Corporations, moreover, have such an influence upon the governmental structure that a version of corporatism is in process of creation.

Corporations were originally considered to be arms of the state—divisions of society established to get some of the public's business done. Today, paradoxically, they are both associations of individuals and constitutional persons. As such, they challenge orthodox constitutional theory. Their governmental character could be acknowledged by the Supreme Court; but the Justices have usually refused to do so. However, SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1944) did apply constitutional norms to a corporate body (albeit not a chartered corporation)—the Democratic party; and in MARSH V. ALABAMA (1946) a business corporation operating a "company town" was subjected to the limits of the FIRST AMENDMENT.

The giant corporations have assets that overshadow those of most of the states (and, indeed, most nation-states). They have created a national economic system that makes a decentralized political order impractical. Traditional concepts of FEDERALISM have consequently had to give way to notions of nationalism. In recent decades, many corporations have become transnational and they are creating an international economic order. They thus challenge the political order of the nation-state much as their predecessors altered the original federal system.

Corporate bodies, whether business or otherwise, have become so socially significant that in one perspective they have replaced the individual (the natural person) as the basic unit of society. The modern corporation has created societies with structural foundations different from those of the past. Constitutional theory must therefore adapt itself to the corporation on three levels: federalism (in many respects corporations are in effect the most important units of local government); nationalism (where the transnational corporation challenges the sovereignty of the nation-state); and individualism (the natural person must become adapted to living in a hierarchic, bureaucratic society). To date, little scholarly activity has addressed any of these levels.

ARTHUR S. MILLER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Corporate Citizenship; Corporate Federalism; Corporate Power, Free Speech, and Democracy; Multinational Corporations, Global Markets, and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

COLEMAN, JAMES S. 1974 Power and the Structure of Society. New York: W. W. Norton.

COMMONS, JOHN R. 1924 Legal Foundations of Capitalism. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

MILLER, ARTHUR SELWYN 1976 The Modern Corporate State: Private Governments and the Constitution. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

CORRIGAN v. BUCKLEY
271 U.S. 323 (1926)

Reviewing a RESTRICTIVE COVENANT case from the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, the Supreme Court unanimously held that it presented no substantial constitutional question. The Court dismissed Fifth and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT claims because they referred to government and state, not individual, actions. (Surprisingly, the Court failed to mention that the Fourteenth did not apply in the District.) Although these amendments provide for equal rights, they did not in any manner prohibit or invalidate contracts entered into by private individuals in respect to the control and disposition of their own property. The Court therefore dismissed the case for want of JURISDICTION.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Shelley v. Kraemer; State Action.)

CORWIN, EDWARD S.
(1878–1963)

Edward S. Corwin, McCormick Professor of Jurisprudence at Princeton University, succeeded the nineteenth-century titans James Kent, Joseph Story, and THOMAS M. COOLEY. Corwin's understanding of constitutional and political thought distinguished him from these lawyers and judges, who exemplified Edmund Burke's maxim that the study of law sharpens the mind by narrowing it. Matchless learning in government and history made him an eminent COMMENTATOR ON THE CONSTITUTION.

Corwin's Liberty against Government (1948) was a major defense of liberty as the fundamental American principle. The Twilight of the Supreme Court (1934) upheld the NEW DEAL with an idea of national power that left presidential and congressional power without statable limits. Corwin later more persuasively and moderately pondered the New Deal's extension of governmental power in relationship to the Founders' intention. In UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941) Chief Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE had cited Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's definition of congressional power over INTERSTATE COMMERCE in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) and Marshall's interpretation of NECESSARY AND PROPER in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819). Corwin persuasively denied that Marshall would have consented to be "thus conscripted in the service of the New Deal": "Liberty, the spacious liberty of an expanding nation, not social equality, was the lodestar of his political philosophy." Corwin's bow to the "great Chief Justice" Marshall showed that Corwin, too, championed liberty.

Public law, said Corwin, is the "law that governs government itself"; political theory is the branch that explains the moral source of the law's authority. Corwin identified his topics and accomplishments in public law as the origins and development of the idea of liberty against government, "the most important theme of American constitutional legal history"; JUDICIAL REVIEW in historical perspective; DUAL FEDERALISM; and the Presidency.

The Constitution and What It Means Today (1920, 1958), his best known work, combined scholarship and simplicity. Popular education for Corwin kept the Constitution from becoming a "craft mystery," whether one of bench and bar or of behaviorism. Corwin's most important work was The President: Office and Powers (1957), which concluded that the autonomous and self-directing idea of the Presidency had triumphed. Decades before the WATERGATE crimes he prophetically challenged the excesses of presidential power with the idea of liberty against government. The most important condition of the people's moderation in liberty was religious instruction. Corwin's Constitution of Powers in a Secular State (1951) opposed Supreme Court decisions against religious instruction in the public schools, arguing that the American people understand democracy as a system of ethical principles "grounded in religion." Hence, religion in effect should habituate Americans to virtue; virtue should guide the use of liberty.

Corwin's preeminence arose in part from his emphasis on fundamentals, restoration of natural law, explanations of doctrine, grasp of the perennial themes of American politics and history, and understanding of the enduring principles that prop the Constitution. In teaching future scholars, Corwin had, according to Alpheus T. Mason, the gift "of reaching within each person, of discovering something firm and worthwhile, of encouraging him to stand on it." As Corwin himself put it, "a noble emulation is the true source of excellence."

RICHARD LOSS
(1986)

Bibliography

LOSS, RICHARD 1977 Edward S. Corwin: The Constitution of the Dominant Presidency. Presidential Studies Quarterly 7: 53–65.

———, ed. 1981 Corwin on the Constitution, Volume I, The Foundations of American Constitutional and Political Thought, the Powers of Congress, and the President's Power of Removal. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

STEVENS, RICHARD G. 1980 The Constitution and What It Meant to Corwin. Political Science Reviewer 10:1–53.

CORWIN AMENDMENT
(1861)

On 2 March 1861, in a futile attempt to prevent the secession of the slaveholding states, Congress proposed, and sent to the states for ratification, a constitutional amendment designed to protect SLAVERY in the states where it existed. The amendment, written by Representative Thomas Corwin of Ohio, would have prohibited any future constitutional amendment authorizing Congress to abolish or interfere with the "domestic institutions" of any state. Although the amendment went on specifically to include the institution of "persons held to service or labor," it is not clear what other domestic institutions, if any, might have been protected.

The Corwin Amendment was proposed after President-elect ABRAHAM LINCOLN rejected the CRITTENDEN compromise proposals, which would have permitted slavery in some federal territories. Its intended effect was that, although slavery would survive in the existing slave states, there would never be any new slave states admitted to the union, and slaveholders would be an ever diminishing minority. In any case, the Corwin Amendment was largely a symbolic gesture of conciliation, as six southern states had already seceded by the time it was proposed. The legislatures of only two states (Ohio and Maryland) voted to ratify the Corwin Amendment.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

HYMAN, HAROLD M. 1967 The Narrow Escape from the Compromise of 1860: Secession and the Constitution. Pages 149–166 in Harold M. Hyman and Leonard W. Levy, eds., Freedom and Reform. New York: Harper & Row.

COUNSEL, RIGHT TO BE REPRESENTED BY

See: Right to Counsel

COUNSELMAN v. HITCHCOCK
142 U.S. 547 (1892)

The first Supreme Court decision on immunity statutes, Counselman remained the leading case until it was distinguished away in KASTIGAR V. UNITED STATES (1972). Appellant refused to testify before a federal GRAND JURY on the ground that he might incriminate himself, though he had been granted USE IMMUNITY under an 1887 act of Congress guaranteeing that his evidence would not be used against him criminally, except in a prosecution for perjury. Counselman thus raised the question whether a grant of use immunity could supplant the Fifth Amendment right of a person not to be a witness against himself in a criminal case. The government contended that an investigation before a grand jury was not a criminal case, which could arise only after an INDICTMENT should be returned, but that in any instance, Counselman had received immunity in return for his testimony.

Justice SAMUEL BLATCHFORD for a unanimous Court declared that it is "impossible" that the clause of the Fifth Amendment could mean only what it says, for it is not limited to situations in which one is compelled to be a witness against himself in a "criminal case." The object of the clause is to insure that no person should be compelled as a witness "in any investigation" to testify to anything that might tend to show he had committed a crime. "The privilege is limited to criminal matters, but it is as broad as the mischief against which it seeks to guard," and therefore it applied to grand jury proceedings that might result in a prosecution. Clearly, said Blatchford, a statute cannot abridge a constitutional privilege nor replace one, "unless it is so broad as to have the same extent in scope and effect." The statute did not even do what it purported to do; it did not bar use of the compelled testimony, for its fruits could be used against the witness by searching out any leads, originating with his testimony, to other evidence that could convict him. No statute leaving the witness subject to prosecution after answering incriminating questions can have the effect of supplanting the constitutional provision. The 1887 act of Congress was unconstitutional because it was not a "full substitute" for that provision.

Thus the Court introduced the extraordinary doctrine that a statute could be a substitute for a provision of the Constitution, after having said that a statute could not "replace" such a provision. But the statute, to be constitutional, must serve "co-extensively" with the right it replaces. The Court laid down the standard for TRANSACTIONAL IMMUNITY: to be valid the statute "must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates."

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Right Against Self-Incrimination.)

COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY v. AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION
492 U.S. 573 (1989)

Each year the County of Allegheny set up a variety of exhibits to commemorate the holiday season. Inside the county courthouse, a crèche was displayed on the grand staircase. Outside the courthouse stood a Christmas tree and a menorah, the latter a symbol of Hanukkah. The outside display was accompanied by a sign describing it as part of the city's salute to liberty. A splintered Supreme Court ruled that the crèche violated the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE, but the menorah did not.

Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to the crèche. He argued that the crèche violated the second prong of the LEMON TEST because it expressed a patently religious message, as indicated by an accompanying banner with the words "Gloria in Excelsis Deo!" ("Glory to God in the Highest!"). However, Blackmun argued that the menorah did not endorse religion because in context it was devoid of religious significance. The menorah and Christmas tree together merely symbolized the different facets of the "same winter-holiday season, which has attained a secular status in our society."

Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR rejected Blackmun's reasoning with respect to the menorah, although she concurred in the Court's judgment. Unlike Blackmun, O'Connor readily acknowledged the religious meaning of the menorah, but argued that its display was permissible because in context it "conveyed a message of pluralism and freedom of belief" rather than endorsement. Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JOHN PAUL STEVENS, and THURGOOD MARSHALL disagreed. They contended that both the Christmas tree and the menorah were religious symbols and that their display effected a dual endorsement of Christianity and Judaism.

Four Justices on the Court—WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, ANTONIN SCALIA, BYRON R. WHITE, and ANTHONY M. KENNEDY—took issue with the Court's ruling on the crèche. Writing for this group, Justice Kennedy argued that the guiding principle in establishment-clause cases should be government neutrality toward religion—but neutrality properly understood. Given the pervasive influence of the "modern administrative state," said Kennedy, complete government nonrecognition of religion would send "a clear message of disapproval." Hence, some government recognition of religion may actually further the goal of neutrality. As applied to this case, for the government to recognize only the secular aspects of a holiday with both secular and religious components would signal not neutrality but "callous indifference" toward the religious beliefs of a great many celebrants. Such hostility is not required by the Constitution according to Kennedy. As long as holiday displays do not directly or indirectly coerce people in the area of religion and the displays do not tend toward the establishment of a state religion, they should be constitutional. Under this standard, the crèche, the Christmas tree, and the menorah were all permissible.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Establishment of Religion; Lynch v. Donnelly; Religious Liberty; Separation of Church and State.)

COURT MARTIAL

See: Military Justice

COURT OF CLAIMS

See: Claims Court

COURT OF CUSTOMS AND PATENT APPEALS

The Court of Customs Appeals was established by Congress in 1909 to hear appeals from the Board of General Appraisers, a body that itself heard appeals from decisions by customs collectors. (In 1926 the Board became the United States Customs Court, and in 1980 that court was converted into the United States COURT OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE.) In 1929 Congress renamed the court and expanded its jurisdiction. The new Court of Customs and Patent Appeals (CCPA) heard, in addition, appeals from the Patent Office in both patent and trademark cases.

In 1958 Congress declared the CCPA to be a CONSTITUTIONAL COURT, created under Article III. In Glidden Co. v. Zdanok (1962) the Supreme Court held, 5–2, that the CCPA was, indeed, an Article III court, despite its statutory authorization to do some nonjudicial business. There was no opinion of the Court, and the theories supporting the decision were in conflict. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, for three Justices, concluded that the CCPA had been an Article III court since 1930, when Congress had granted its members life tenure during good behavior. Justice TOM C. CLARK, for the other two majority Justices, said that the 1958 declaration of Congress had converted the CCPA into a constitutional court. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, joined by Justice HUGO L. BLACK, dissented, arguing that the court remained a LEGISLATIVE COURT despite the congressional declaration. Thus, while a majority rejected each theory argued in support of the decision, the result was acceptance of the CCPA's Article III status.

In the FEDERAL COURTS IMPROVEMENT ACT (1982) Congress abolished the CCPA, transferring its JURISDICTION to a newly established UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

COURT OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

In 1926 Congress converted the Board of General Appraisers, which had been hearing APPEALS from decisions of customs collectors, into the United States Customs Court. In 1956, Congress declared that the court was established under Article III. Because the court's business is strictly "judicial" and its members are appointed for life during good behavior, it is probably a CONSTITUTIONAL COURT on the same reasoning that was applied to the COURT OF CUSTOMS AND PATENT APPEALS (CCPA).

In 1980 Congress changed the Customs Court's name to the United States Court of International Trade and extended its JURISDICTION to include additional noncustoms matters relating to international trade. Its decisions, formerly reviewed by the CCPA, today are reviewed by the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

COURT OF MILITARY APPEALS

In the Uniform Code of Military Justice, enacted in the aftermath of WORLD WAR II, Congress established the Court of Military Appeals (COMA). A civilian body, whose three judges serve for fifteen-year terms, COMA reviews questions of law arising in certain serious court-martial cases. COMA, which heard its first case in 1951, has never been part of the federal judiciary. The whole military justice system, COMA included, is part of the governance of the armed forces. Since 1983, however, many of COMA's decisions have been reviewable by the Supreme Court on petition for CERTIORARI. Whether or not such a review has taken place, a person in custody as a result of a court-martial decision can apply for HABEAS CORPUS in a federal district court. (See MILITARY JUSTICE.)

Like many another judicial or military institution, COMA has sought to expand its jurisdiction. It has developed a notion of its own "inherent powers," which it has used to nudge the military justice system toward increasing resemblance to the civilian system of criminal justice, notably by tightening the requirements of procedural fairness. Although some military officers have strongly criticized COMA's "constitutionalizing" innovations, most proposals for statutory restoration of the old order have died in congressional committees.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

WILLIS, JOHN T. 1972 The Constitution, the United States Court of Military Appeals and the Future. Military Law Review 57:27–97.

——— 1972 The United States Court of Military Appeals: Its Origin, Operation and Future. Military Law Review 55:39–93.

COURT-PACKING PLANS

"Court packing" is an ambiguous phrase. It arises more frequently as an epithet in political disputation than as an analytical term in scholarly discourse. "Packing" connotes a deliberate effort by an executive, especially a President, to appoint one or more (usually more) judges to assure that decisions will accord with the ideological predisposition of that executive. Webster's New International Dictionary defines "pack" as "to . . . make up unfairly or fraudulently, to secure a certain result." Yet not everyone agrees on what is unfair, and it is not at all extraordinary for Presidents to take pains to ascertain that a prospective nominee is likely to behave in ways that will not be out of harmony with the ends of their administrations.

Furthermore, the word "packing" has been employed with respect to two different situations—when a President is filling vacancies that have arisen in the natural course of events, and when a President seeks legislation to increase the membership of courts to create additional opportunities for appointments that may shape the outcome of pending and future litigation.

Although political antagonists have taken advantage of the elasticity of the word to raise the charge of Court packing through much of our history, scholars have largely concentrated their attention on three particular episodes. The first of these events took place on the night of March 3, 1801, when in his final hours in office, President JOHN ADAMS sat up very late signing commissions of sixteen appointees to circuit judgeships and forty-two justices of the peace for the District of Columbia, including one William Marbury. All these offices had been created in the last three weeks of his term by an obliging Federalist Congress, and Adams, outraged by the victory of the Democratic Republicans in 1800 and fearful of its consequences for the nation, busied himself filling the posts with faithful partisans to serve as a restraint on his successor, THOMAS JEFFERSON. This melodrama of the "midnight judges" would subsequently lead to the landmark case of MARBURY V. MADISON (1803).

Historians long thought they had detected another instance of Court packing during RECONSTRUCTION. In 1870, at a time when the membership of the Court had been reduced, the Supreme Court, in Hepburn v. Griswold, struck down the Legal Tender Act of 1862 as applied to debts incurred before its enactment. The 4–3 vote strictly followed party lines. A year later, in Knox v. Lee and Parker v. Davis, the decision was reversed when the three dissenters in the earlier ruling were joined by two new appointees, both Republicans, of President ULYSSES S. GRANT. Their appointments followed the action of Congress restoring the Court to nine Justices. This sequence gave credibility to the allegation that the Court had been packed in order to save the Republican administration's monetary policy. In fact, however, scholars now agree that neither the augmentation of the size of the bench nor these appointments resulted from partisan or ideological motivations.

By far the most important Court-packing plan in American history emerged out of a conflict between the Supreme Court and the administration of FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT in the Great Depression. In 1935 and 1936, the Court again and again struck down NEW DEAL laws, including those creating the two foundation stones of Roosevelt's recovery program, the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT and the AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1935 (AAA). Most of these rulings came on split decisions, with OWEN J. ROBERTS joining the conservative "Four Horsemen"—PIERCE BUTLER, JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS, GEORGE SUTHERLAND, and WILLIS VAN DEVANTER—to form a five-man majority, sometimes augmented by the Chief Justice, CHARLES EVANS HUGHES.

The Roosevelt administration responded by exploring a number of possibilities for curbing the powers of the Supreme Court. As early as May 1935, Attorney General HOMER S.CUMMINGS directed one of his aides to look into how the Court's authority to pass on constitutional questions could be limited. Rumors had circulated from the beginning of the New Deal era that Court packing might someday be attempted, and at a cabinet meeting at the end of 1935, the President mentioned packing the Court as the first of a series of options. A cabinet official noted in his diary, however, that Roosevelt characterized it as "a distasteful idea." Still, Roosevelt more than once alluded to the episode in Great Britain earlier in the century when the threat of creating several hundred new peers had compelled the House of Lords to approve reform legislation.

Initially, critics of the judiciary assumed that redress could be achieved only by amending the Constitution, but the behavior of the Court in 1936 turned the thinking of the administration in new directions. When Justice HARLAN F. STONE, in a biting dissent in BUTLER V. UNITED STATES (1936), accused the majority in the 6–3 ruling invalidating the AAA processing tax of a "tortured construction of the Constitution," he fostered the idea that Congress need not alter the Constitution because properly interpreted it could accommodate most of the New Deal. Instead, Congress should concern itself with the composition of the Court.

The replacement of even one Justice could shift 5–4 decisions toward approval of FDR's policies without any modification of the Constitution. Yet, although this Court was the oldest ever, not a single vacancy developed in all of Roosevelt's first term. Increasingly, the administration looked for a solution that would eschew the tortuous process of constitutional amendment and instead, by the much simpler procedure of an act of Congress, overcome obstruction by elderly judges.

Shortly after winning reelection in November 1936, Roosevelt told Cummings that the time to act had come. Not only had the Court struck down fundamental New Deal laws in his first term, but in addition, it was expected to invalidate innovative legislation such as the National Labor Relations Act and the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT when it ruled on these statutes early in his second term. Moreover, although he had won an overwhelming endorsement from the people in a contest in which he had carried all but two of the states, he was constrained from taking advantage of this mandate because if he tried to put through measures such as a wages and hours law the Court was likely to wipe out those laws too. He saw little prospect that the Court might change its attitude; in the very last decision of the term, MOREHEAD V. NEW YORK EX REL. TIPALDO (1936), it had shocked the nation by striking down a New York State minimum wage law for women, thereby indicating that it did not merely oppose concentrated power in Washington, but was in the President's words, creating a "no-man's land' where no Government—State or Federal—can function." Under these circumstances, FDR was determined not to be like President JAMES BUCHANAN, who sat passively while his world collapsed about him.

During the month of December, Cummings put together the specific proposal that Roosevelt embraced. Cummings was influenced by the political scientist EDWARD S. CORWIN, who suggested linking an age limit of seventy years for Justices to the appointment of additional members of the bench, but he did not find the precise formula until he came upon a 1913 memorandum by James C. McReynolds, then attorney general, recommending that when a judge of the lower federal courts did not retire at seventy the President be required to appoint an additional judge. Cummings seized McReynolds's idea and applied it to the Supreme Court as well. He also worked out a rationale for the scheme by incorporating it in a package of proposals for relieving congestion in the federal judicial system. Roosevelt, for his part, savored the irony that the original notion had come from McReynolds, now the most hostile Justice on the Court.

Through all these months, the President had given little indication of what he was considering. After the adverse decision in SCHECHTER POULTRY CORPORATION V. UNITED STATES, he had said, "We have been relegated to the horse-and-buggy definition of interstate commerce," but so loud were objections to this remark that he made almost no public utterance about the Court for the next year and a half and did not raise the issue in the 1936 campaign. No cabinet officer save Cummings knew of the surprise he was about to spring, and he confided nothing to his congressional leaders until the very end.

On February 5, 1937, Roosevelt stunned the nation by sending to Congress a plan to reorganize the federal judiciary. He prefaced the proposal by claiming that aged and infirm judges and insufficient personnel had created overcrowded federal court dockets and by asserting that "a constant and systematic addition of younger blood will vitalize the courts." To achieve this goal, he recommended that when a federal judge who had served at least ten years waited more than six months after his seventieth birthday to resign or retire, a President might add a new judge to the bench. He could appoint as many as six new Justices to the Supreme Court and forty-four new judges to the lower federal tribunals.

The President's message elicited boisterous opposition. From the very first day, opponents characterized his scheme as "court packing" and accused Roosevelt of tampering with the judiciary. Within weeks, they had forced him to back away from his crowded dockets-old age rationale by demonstrating that the Supreme Court was abreast of his work. Especially effective was a letter from Chief Justice Hughes read by Senator BURTON K. WHEELER at the opening of hearings before the SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE. An increase in the size of the Court, Hughes objected, would not promote efficiency, but would mean that "there would be more judges to hear, more judges to confer, more judges to discuss, more judges to be convinced and to decide."

Despite fervent and well-organized protests, commentators concluded that the legislation was likely to be approved because Roosevelt had such huge Democratic majorities in both houses of Congress. After the 1936 elections, the Republicans were reduced to only sixteen members in the Senate. In the House, the Democrats had a 4–1 advantage. Although there were some conspicuous defectors, such as Wheeler, it seemed unlikely that enough Democrats would break with a President who had just won such an emphatic popular verdict of approval to deny him the legislation he sought.

A series of unanticipated decisions by the Court, however, drastically altered this situation. On March 29, the Court, in a 5–4 ruling in WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH (1937), validated a minimum wage act of the state of Washington essentially the same as the New York law it had struck down the previous year. Two weeks later, in a cluster of 5–4 decisions, it upheld the constitutionality of the WAGNER (NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS) ACT. In May, by 5–4 and 7–2, it validated the Social Security Act. The critical development in these votes was the switch of Justice Roberts, who for the first time since the spring of 1935, broke away from the Four Horsemen to uphold social legislation. Roberts's turnabout gave Roosevelt a 5–4 advantage, which swelled to a prospective 6–3 when, also in May, one of the Four Horsemen, Willis Van Devanter, announced that he was retiring. On that same day, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted, 10–8, to recommend against passage of the bill, and administration polls of the Senate found that as a consequence of these developments Roosevelt no longer had the votes. "A switch in time," it was said, "saved nine."

Roosevelt, however, persisted in trying to put through a modified Court-packing measure, and he almost succeeded. In June, he advanced a compromise raising the suggested retirement age from seventy to seventy-five years and permitting him only one appointment per calendar year. Although watered down, this new version preserved the principle of the original bill and would give him two new Justices by January 1, 1938 (one for the calendar year 1937 and one for 1938), as well as a third Justice for the Van Devanter vacancy. In July, when Court-packing legislation finally reached the Senate floor, the opposition found that Roosevelt had a majority for this new proposal if it could be brought to the floor. The President's advantage, however, rested on the influence of the domineering Senate Majority Leader, Joseph T. Robinson, but when shortly after the debate began, Robinson died, Roosevelt's expectation went down with him. On July 22, the Senate voted to inter the bill in committee.

Roosevelt had suffered a severe defeat, but he insisted that, although he had lost the battle, he had won the war. To the Van Devanter vacancy, he soon named HUGO L. BLACK, an ardent New Dealer and supporter of Court packing, and within two and a half years of his defeat, he was able to appoint a majority of the nine Justices. This "Roosevelt Court," as it was called, never again struck down a New Deal law. Indeed, it took so expansive a view of the commerce power and the spending power and so circumscribed the due process clause that scholars speak of the "Constitutional Revolution of 1937." Not once since then has the Court stuck down any significant law—federal or state—regulating business. The struggle over Court packing, however, cost Roosevelt dearly, for it solidified a bipartisan conservative coalition arrayed against further New Deal reforms.

Although no President since Roosevelt has advocated a Court packing statute, the charge of packing has been raised against three of his successors. When, in his final year in office, LYNDON B. JOHNSON sought to elevate Associate Justice ABE FORTAS to the Chief Justiceship, conservative Republicans charged him with a "midnight judge" kind of maneuver to deny his probable successor, RICHARD M. NIXON, the opportunity to make the selection, and after revelations about Fortas's comportment, the endeavor failed. So frank was Nixon in turn about stating his desire to reverse the doctrines of the WARREN COURT that he was accused of trying to pack the Supreme Court with conservative jurists when he made nominations such as those of Clement Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell. Both of these nominations were rejected, but Nixon won confirmation of four other choices, including WARREN E. BURGER as Chief Justice, although they were sometimes to disappoint him by their subsequent behavior. An even louder outcry arose over RONALD REAGAN's selections. His attempt to place Robert Bork on the Supreme Court was turned aside, but he secured approval of four other nominees, all regarded as sharing his conservative outlook. He had even greater success in the lower federal courts. His efforts were decried as, in the title of one book, Packing the Courts: The Conservative Campaign to Rewrite the Constitution, but neither Reagan nor Nixon had acted markedly differently from such twentieth-century predecessors as WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, WARREN G. HARDING, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, although none of the others may have exhibited such sedulous ideological zeal.

WILLIAM E. LEUCHTENBURG
(1992)

Bibliography

ALSOP, JOSEPH and CATLEDGE, TURNER 1938 The 168 Days. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran.

LEUCHTENBURG, WILLIAM E. 1966 The Origins of Franklin D. Roosevelt's "Court Packing" Plan. In Philip B. Kurland, ed. The Supreme Court Review: 1966. Pages 347–400. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

——— 1969 Franklin D. Roosevelt's Supreme Court "Packing" Plan. In Harold M. Hollingsworth and William F. Holmes, eds., Essays on the New Deal. Pages 69–115. Austin: University of Texas.

COURTS AND SOCIAL CHANGE, I

Since the mid-twentieth century, courts in the United States have been involved in many of the most important, difficult, and emotional issues of modern politics. From racial and gender equality to ABORTION to reform of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, court decisions have ordered change on a broad scale on behalf of relatively powerless groups that have suffered from both past and present discrimination. Further, such litigation has often occurred, and appears to have been most successful, when the other branches of government have failed to act. Indeed, for many, part of what makes American democracy exceptional is that it includes the world's most powerful court system, protecting minorities and defending liberty, in the face of opposition from the democratically elected branches. But have courts contributed to social change?

Supreme Court decisions are not self-implementing. As ALEXANDER HAMILTON pointed out long ago, courts are particularly dependent on the actions of others. Hamilton argued in THE FEDERALIST #78, that the judiciary "has no influence over either the sword or the purse . . . and must ultimately depend upon the aid of the executive arm even for the efficacy of its judgments." Without the support of government, or of citizens, court decisions ordering social change are unlikely to affect or change people's lives in important ways.

Those seeking social change through litigation often must rely on the Constitution, and the set of beliefs that surround it. The problem they face is that the Constitution is not unbounded; certain rights are enshrined in it and others are not. For example, there are no constitutional rights to decent housing, adequate levels of welfare or health care, or clean air, while there are constitutional rights to minimal governmental interference in the use of one's PROPERTY. Lacking a strong constitutional foundation for their litigation, reformers often must push the courts to read the Constitution in an expansive or "liberal" way. This presents an additional obstacle to change due to judicial awareness of the need for predictability in the law and the politically exposed nature of judges whose decisions go beyond the positions of electorally accountable officials. Thus, the nature of rights in the U.S. legal system, embedded in the Constitution, and the institutional reticence of judges, may constrain the courts in producing social change by preventing them from hearing or responding positively to many claims.

The result of these factors—lack of constitutional rights, lack of power of implementation, lack of JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE—is that courts are constrained from producing social change. Courts decisions can sometimes contribute to change, but only when there is broad political support for it. Consider, for example, one of the most famous Supreme Court decisions ordering social change on behalf of a relatively powerless group within society, BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954).

Given the praise accorded to the 1954 Brown decision and its holding that race-based SEGREGATION of public schools was unconstitutional, examining its actual effects produces quite a surprise. The surprise is that a decade after Brown little had changed for most African American students living in the eleven states of the old Confederacy that had required race-based school segregation by law. For example, in the 1963–1964 school year, barely one in one hundred (1.2 percent) of these African American children was in a nonsegregated school. That means that for nearly ninety-nine of every one-hundred African American children in the South a decade after Brown, the finding of a constitutional right changed nothing.

Change came to school systems in the South in the wake of congressional and executive branch action. Title VI of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 required the cut-off of federal funds to programs receiving federal monies where RACIAL DISCRIMINATION was practiced and the 1965 Elementary & Secondary Education Act provided a great deal of federal money to generally poor Southern school districts. This combination of federal funding and Title VI gave the executive branch a tool to induce DESEGREGATION when it chose to do so. When the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare began to threaten fund cut-offs to school districts that refused to desegregate, dramatic change occurred. By the 1972–1973 school year, over 91 percent of African American school children in the eleven Southern states were in integrated schools, up from 1.2 percent in the 1963–1964 school year.

Brown shows that U.S. courts by themselves can almost never be effective producers of social change. At best, they can second the social reform acts of the other branches of government. Problems that are unsolvable in the political context can rarely be solved by courts. Turning to courts to produce social change substitutes the myth of America for its reality. It credits courts and judicial decisions with a power they do not have.

GERALD N. ROSENBERG
(2000)

Bibliography

DAHL, ROBERT A. 1957 Decision-Making in a Democracy: The Role of the Supreme Court as a National Policy-Maker. Journal of Public Law 6:279–295.

HAMILTON, ALEXANDER; MADISON, JAMES; and JAY, JOHN 1961 (1788) The Federalist. Clinton Rossiter, ed. New York: New American Library.

GALANTER, MARC 1974 Why the 'Haves' Come Out Ahead: Speculations on the Limits of Social Change. Law & Society Review 9:95–160.

HOROWITZ, DONALD L. 1977 The Courts and Social Policy. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

MCCLOSKEY, ROBERT G. 1994 The American Supreme Court, 2nd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

ROSENBERG, GERALD N. 1991 The Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring About Social Change? Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SCHEINGOLD, STUART A. 1974 The Politics of Rights. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

COURTS AND SOCIAL CHANGE, II

The apparent accomplishments of the WARREN COURT led liberals to believe that the Supreme Court could contribute substantially to social change. They saw BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) as the precursor of the CIVIL RIGHTS movement of the 1960s, and the Court's CRIMINAL PROCEDURE decisions such as MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) as the driving force behind substantial changes in police practices. Even after the retirement of Chief Justice EARL WARREN, ROE V. WADE (1973) suggested that the Court's decisions might lead to major changes in important social practices. The Court's decisions in the 1970s striking down statutes as SEX DISCRIMINATION similarly supported the view that the Court could be an important force for social change.

Overall, however, the BURGER COURT and the REHNQUIST COURT suggested to liberals that their enthusiasm for the courts might have been misplaced. The Burger Court initially invalidated CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, but then endorsed state efforts to reestablish it. The Court rejected an early challenge to state laws making homosexual sodomy illegal in BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986). It also eroded important Warren Court PRECEDENTS, relieving school districts of further obligations to undo the effects of racial SEGREGATION, and refused to extend the Warren Court's criminal procedure holdings. By the 1990s, some liberal constitutional scholars thought, society's protection of the rights the Warren Court singled out was not significantly different from the situation that had existed in the early years of Warren's tenure.

These events led to a more subtle understanding of the Court's relation to social change. A long-standing view, going back to at least the early 1900s, is that the Court "follows the election returns": Court decisions simply ratify changes that have already taken place. A defender of this view would contend, for example, that major changes in the social role of women preceded the Court's gender discrimination decisions of the 1970s. The courts' withdrawal from the field of school desegregation occurred after changes in the political climate made SCHOOL BUSING and other desegregation remedies increasingly unpopular.

Political scientist Gerald Rosenberg mounted an important attack on the view that the courts could play a large part in inducing major social changes. Rosenberg pointed out that no significant amount of desegregation occurred in the deep South until the mid-1960s, a decade after Brown, and took place only when Congress enacted civil rights statutes that threatened recalcitrant districts with the loss of federal financial assistance. Then, observing that the Court's ABORTION decisions succeeded in making abortions more easily available, Rosenberg argued that the courts' ability to contribute to social change varied depending on the kind of change involved. The segregation cases showed that the courts could do little when success depended on the cooperation of other political actors. Abortion was different, in Rosenberg's view, because the Court's decisions created a market that could be satisfied by private parties without government support.

Rosenberg's critics believed that he failed adequately to take account of indirect effects of court decisions. They argued that Brown had important effects, which Rosenberg minimized, on the spirits of civil rights activists, encouraging them to continue their activities because they knew that the Court agreed with their vision of the Constitution.

This criticism suggests that the courts can affect social change along two dimensions. Rosenberg focused on immediate effects on actual practices, while his critics focused on longer-range effects accomplished by changing the understandings people have of what the Constitution requires. The critics' position is that courts change the way people think about the Constitution, and those changed views then lead people to support new policies. Contrary to this position are public opinion surveys showing that the courts have relatively small effects on public understandings, because the public either does not know of what the courts have done, or misinterprets the messages the courts have attempted to send.

In response, scholars who believe the courts do have important effects have directed attention away from immediate effects on social practices and on beliefs about the Constitution. They argue that the courts have produced a general American "rights-consciousness." For some, this makes Americans willing to sue to vindicate what they believe are their rights far more frequently than is appropriate, generating an "adversary culture" that makes it more difficult to resolve conflicts both large and small. For others, rights-consciousness endorses a highly individualist way of thinking about social problems, which makes it more difficult for Americans to develop group-oriented theories and strategies that might be more effective in vindicating the very rights at issue.

MARK TUSHNET
(2000)

Bibliography

GARROW, DAVID 1994 Hopelessly Hollow History: Revisionist Devaluing of Brown v. Board of Education. Virginia Law Review 80:151–160.

GLENDON, MARY ANN 1991 Rights Talk: The Impoverishment of Political Discourse. New York: Free Press.

ROSENBERG, GERALD 1991 The Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring About Social Change? Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

TUSHNET, MARK 1984 An Essay on Rights. Texas Law Review 62:1363–1403.

COURTS OF APPEALS

See: United States Courts of Appeals

COVER, ROBERT M.
(1943–1986)

Born in Boston in 1943, Robert M. Cover earned his B.A. from Princeton University in 1965. In 1963 Cover had left Princeton to work for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) in Georgia, where he was jailed and beaten. Although he became a superb scholar and an inspirational teacher and friend, Cover remained an engaged activist. He believed that "legal meaning is a challenging enrichment of social life, a potential restraint on arbitrary power and violence." He never separated himself or his work from that pursuit.

Cover received his LL.B. from Columbia Law School in 1968, at which time he immediately joined the Columbia faculty. He moved to Yale Law School in 1972 and was named the Chancellor Kent Professor of Law and Legal History in 1982.

Cover won the Ames Prize for Justice Accused: Antislavery and the Judicial Process (1975). This book probed the moral dilemma confronting northern judges opposed to slavery on moral grounds who nonetheless believed that the law of antebellum America required them to order fugitive slaves returned to their masters. In addition, Cover coauthored books on procedure and wrote numerous articles about how narrative, myth, and history "invite new worlds" by illuminating the tension between law and the normative worlds we construct.

Cover's pathbreaking work stressed that judicial language is unlike literary language because it involves actual violence, pain, and death. He explored new facets of jurisdiction, law and religion, civil rights, and civil liberties. If a dominant theme emerged in the radically interdisciplinary work of this "anarchist who love[d] law," it was exploration of how law might be a bridge toward the creation of new narratives and better actualities. To Cover, law should involve a conscious quest for a juster justice.

Cover died of a heart attack in 1986.

AVIAM SOIFER
(1992)

Bibliography

MEMORIAL ISSUE 1987 Yale Law Journal 96:1699–1984.

COX v. LOUISIANA
379 U.S. 536 (1965)
379 U.S. 559 (1965)

Some black students were jailed in a courthouse for PICKETING segregated lunch counters. About 2,000 other black students marched there and, in accordance with police instructions, lined a sidewalk 101 feet away. Whites gathered. Cox made a speech that elicited some grumbling from whites; the police ordered the demonstration broken up; the students were dispersed.

Justice ARTHUR GOLDBERG writing for the Supreme Court reversed Cox's BREACH OF THE PEACE conviction, finding that Cox's actions threatened no violence and that the police could have handled any threat from the whites. The Court also held the breach of peace statute unconstitutionally vague and overbroad as construed by the state supreme court to define breach as "to arouse from a state of repose . . . to disquiet."

In striking down Cox's conviction for obstruction of public passages because the statute's actual administration had vested discretion in city officials to forbid some parades and allow others, the Court emphasized that violation of nondiscriminatory traffic laws would not be protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT. The court reversed Cox's conviction for picketing near a courthouse because the police, by directing the demonstrators to a particular sidewalk, had led them to believe that it was not near the courthouse within the terms of the statute so that a subsequent conviction created a "sort of entrapment," in violation of DUE PROCESS. Nevertheless, in dictum it invoked the old doctrine that picketing was subject to reasonable regulation as "speech plus" and supported the authority of a state legislature to forbid picketing near a courthouse because of its danger to the administration of justice.

Although Cox is often cited as a case establishing the concept of a PUBLIC FORUM, the Court went out of its way to say "We have no occasion . . . to consider the constitutionality of the . . . non-discriminatory application of a statute forbidding all access to streets and other public facilities for parades and meetings."

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

COX v. NEW HAMPSHIRE
312 U.S. 569 (1941)

In this seminal decision, Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, writing for a unanimous Supreme Court, synthesized a series of cases involving speeches, parades, and meetings in parks and on streets. He held that there was a "right of assembly . . . and . . . discussion of public questions immemorially associated with resort to public places," but that such a right was limited by the authority of local government to make reasonable regulations governing "the time, place and manner" of such speech, if the regulations did not involve "unfair discrimination" among speakers. The Court upheld a state law requiring parade licenses issued by local governments on the grounds that, as construed by the state supreme court, it authorized only such reasonable and nondiscriminatory regulations. Cox is one of the building blocks in the creation of the doctrine of the PUBLIC FORUM.

This case took on renewed importance in the context of the CIVIL RIGHTS demonstrations of the 1960s. The crucial problem under the Cox test is often whether a law purporting to be a neutral regulation of traffic and noise control is actually a façade behind which local authorities seek to deny a public forum to speakers whose speech they dislike.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

COX BROADCASTING CORP. v. COHN
420 U.S. 469 (1975)

In Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn the Supreme Court held that broadcasting the name of a rape victim, derived from public court documents open to public inspection, could not constitutionally be made the basis for civil liability. The Court left open the questions whether liability could be imposed for a similar broadcast if the name had been obtained in an improper fashion, or if the name had not been directly derived from the public record, or if the name had not appeared in a public record open to public inspection, or if the public record were inaccurate.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

COY v. IOWA
487 U.S. 1012 (1988)

Coy was convicted of sexually assaulting two thirteen-year-old girls. During his trial, the girls gave testimony in front of a screen that blocked Coy from their sight. Coy claimed that use of the screen violated his right to CONFRONTATION guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment. The Supreme Court agreed, holding that face-to-face examination of witnesses testifying at trial is a fundamental guarantee of the confrontation clause.

Writing for the majority, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA argued that open accusations seem integral to the very idea of fairness; moreover, face-to-face confrontation serves the end of truth because it is more difficult for witnesses to lie (or lie convincingly) when they must do so to the face of the person their testimony will harm. Scalia argued that the Court's previously carved out exceptions to the confrontation clause were inapposite because they dealt with out-of-court statements and not testimony given during trial. Whether there may be exceptions to the confrontation clause even at trial, Scalia was unwilling to say. All he would acknowledge is that if such exceptions exist they must be "necessary to further an important public policy."

Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, in one of her characteristically narrow concurrences, claimed that nothing in the ruling should be construed as forbidding state efforts to protect child witnesses, and she listed several types of state action that she thought would not raise a "substantial Confrontation Clause problem." O'Connor also seized on the majority's concession that exceptions to the confrontation clause may exist when "necessary to further an important public policy." The key word, O'Connor pointed out, was "necessary," and this would likely be the focus of future litigation. It was; and in 1990, the Court took up the issue again in MARYLAND V. CRAIG.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

COYLE v. SMITH
221 U.S. 559 (1911)

This decision construed the guarantee of a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT in a case involving a state's admission to the Union. The enabling act admitting Oklahoma specified the location of the state capital, a condition which the Oklahoma legislature soon violated. The Supreme Court struck down the limitation as outside the limits of Congress's power over admission.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

CRACK COCAINE AND EQUAL PROTECTION

During the 1980s, the federal government and many states adopted particularly harsh sentences for possessing or trafficking in crack cocaine. This SENTENCING has become controversial because it is borne largely by African American defendants, and because penalties at both the federal and state level are much lower for possession or sale of powder cocaine, the form of cocaine with which defendants of other races tend to get caught. In federal court, for example, crack defendants since 1986 have received by statute the same sentences imposed upon defendants convicted of trafficking in one hundred times as much powder cocaine.

Crack and powder cocaine are different forms of the same drug. Indeed, crack cocaine is made from powder cocaine, and the conversion process is simple and inexpensive, so it tends to occur toward the end of the distribution chain. Unlike powder cocaine, though, crack cocaine can be smoked, which makes its psychotropic effects more intense and shorter lasting, and also makes it far more addictive. Crack also is easier than powder cocaine to handle in small quantities, and hence easier to sell to the poor.

Federal constitutional challenges to heightened sentences for crack cocaine trafficking have failed without exception. Because crack laws do not explicitly distinguish between defendants on the basis of race or any other SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION, courts have subjected the laws to "minimal scrutiny" under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause. Such scrutiny asks merely whether the lines the law draws have a RATIONAL BASIS. The crack laws have passed this test easily, because cocaine is demonstrably more dangerous when it comes in the form of crack. As a consequence, the federal courts of appeals have unanimously rejected equal protection challenges to the crack sentences. In contrast, the Minnesota Supreme Court struck down an enhanced state penalty for trafficking in crack cocaine, but only after concluding that the equal protection guarantee in Minnesota's state constitution was more demanding than its federal analogue.

Some commentators have applauded the federal decisions and criticized the Minnesota court, reasoning that because crack cocaine does particular damage in poor, black communities, heightened penalties for crack trafficking hurt black drug dealers but help blacks as a whole. But others have been less sanguine. Federal judges have repeatedly attacked the crack laws as draconian, and some scholars have suggested that conventional equal protection analysis takes no account of the most troubling features of the crack penalties: the extent of the difference between the treatment of crack and powder cocaine, the special need for fairness in meting out criminal sanctions, and the grounds for suspecting that the crack sentences might be less severe were they not imposed almost entirely upon black defendants. Thus, the resounding failure of constitutional challenges to the federal crack sentences may speak less to the merits of the sentences than to the inadequacies of equal protection DOCTRINE.

DAVID A. SKLANSKY
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Drug Regulation; Race and Criminal Justice.)

Bibliography

KENNEDY, RANDALL 1997 Race, Crime, and the Law. New York: Random House.

SKLANSKY, DAVID A. 1995 Cocaine, Race, and Equal Protection. Stanford Law Review 47:1283–1322.

CRAIG v. BOREN
429 U.S. 190 (1976)

It is ironic that the leading modern decision setting the STANDARD OF REVIEW for claims of SEX DISCRIMINATION involved discrimination against men, concerning an interest of supreme triviality. Oklahoma allowed women to buy 3.2 percent beer upon reaching the age of eighteen; men, however, had to be twenty-one. A young male would-be buyer and a female beer seller challenged the law's validity. The young man became twenty-one before the Supreme Court's decision; his challenge was thus rejected for MOOTNESS. The Court held that the seller had STANDING to raise the young man's constitutional claims, and further held, 8–1, that the law denied EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST dissented.

Speaking through Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, the Court held that classifications based on gender were invalid unless they served "important governmental objectives" and were "substantially related to achievement of those objectives." This intermediate standard was a compromise between the two views of the majority in FRONTIERO V. RICHARDSON (1973) as to the level of judicial scrutiny of both legislative objectives and legislative means. Under the RATIONAL BASIS standard of review, the objective need be only legitimate, and the means (in equal protection language, the classification) only rationally related to its achievement. At the opposite end of the continuum of standards of review, STRICT SCRUTINY demands a legislative objective that is a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST, and means that are necessary to achieving that objective. The Craig standard appears to have been deliberately designed to fall between these two levels of judicial scrutiny of legislation.

In the years since Craig, the Supreme Court has often invalidated classifications based on sex but typically has not challenged the importance of legislative objectives. Instead, the Court generally holds that a sex classification is not "substantially related" to a legislative goal. In Craig itself, the Court admitted that traffic safety, the state's objective, was important, but said maleness was an inappropriate "proxy for drinking and driving."

Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, concurring, doubted the utility of multitiered levels of judicial scrutiny in equal protection cases, and commented that men, as a class, have not suffered "pervasive discrimination." The classification was objectionable, however, because it was "based on the accident of birth," and perpetuated "a stereotyped attitude" of young men and women. Because the state's traffic safety justification failed, the law was invalid.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

CRAIG v. MISSOURI
4 Peters 410 (1830)

Craig defined BILLS OF CREDIT, which no state may issue without violating Article I, section 10, of the Constitution. By a 4–3 vote the Supreme Court ruled that bills of credit mean any paper medium intended to circulate as money on the authority of a state, even if not designated as legal tender in payment of debts. Missouri, lacking currency, authorized state loan offices to issue loan certificates, on collateral, to private citizens, in amounts ranging from fifty cents to ten dollars; the certificates could be used for payment of taxes and official salaries. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's opinion invalidating the state act, though constitutionally correct, ignored economic realities: many states desperately needed a circulating medium. Senator THOMAS H. BENTON, for Missouri, defending its certificate law before the Court, thunderingly defended state sovereignty. The disastrous consequences of Craig provoked denunciations of the court and yet another movement in Congress to repeal section 25 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, the grant of APPELLATE JURISDICTION under which the Court had reversed state court judgments and held state acts unconstitutional. The repeal movement failed, but a solid South ominously opposed the Court.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Briscoe v. Bank of Commonwealth of Kentucky.)

CRAMER v. UNITED STATES
325 U.S. 1 (1945)

On the night of June 12, 1942, several specially trained saboteurs were put ashore from a German submarine near Amagansett, New York, with orders to disperse throughout the United States and to sabotage the American war effort. Anthony Cramer, a naturalized American citizen of German background, befriended two of the saboteurs, met with them, and was suspected of assisting them in their mission. However, the only overt acts to which two witnesses could testify were two meetings between Cramer and one of the saboteurs, who was an old friend of Cramer's. The prosecution was unable to produce the testimony of two witnesses concerning what took place at the meetings or to establish that Cramer gave information, encouragement, shelter, or supplies to the saboteurs. Cramer was tried for and convicted of TREASON, and he appealed his conviction to the Supreme Court.

The Cramer case marked the first time that the Supreme Court passed on the meaning of the treason clause of Article III, section 2, of the Constitution. Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, for a 5–4 Court, held that the overt acts testified to by two witnesses must be sufficient, in their setting, to sustain a finding that actual aid and comfort was given to an enemy of the United States. Although there was other EVIDENCE of Cramer's Nazi sympathies and of his assistance to the saboteur, the overt acts—the meetings—were not in themselves treasonable, and the conviction could not stand.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Haupt v. United States; Quirin, Ex Parte.)

Bibliography

BELKNAP, MICHAL R. 1980 The Supreme Court Goes to War: The Meaning and Implications of the Nazi Saboteur Case. Military Law Review 89:59–95.

CRANCH, WILLIAM
(1779–1855)

President JOHN ADAMS in March 1801 commissioned his nephew, William Cranch, assistant judge of the newly created Circuit Court for the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. President THOMAS JEFFERSON in 1806 surprised Cranch, a loyal Federalist, by elevating him to chief judge, a post he filled until his death, half a century later.

Cranch simultaneously undertook the unofficial position of reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. His nine volumes of reports, for which he derived compensation at public sale, covered the period from the August Term, 1801, to the February Term, 1815. The role of the law reporter in Cranch's time commanded professional respect and even glamour. These reports, which added luster to the judge's reputation, received favorable comment, even from Jeffersonian opponents.

Cranch's first major constitutional opinion, United States v. Bollman et al. (1807), stressed the independence and power of the federal judiciary, themes that pervaded his other major opinions. President Jefferson in early 1807 had sought a bench warrant for the arrest of Erik Bollman and Samuel Swartwout on charges of TREASON in the Burr Conspiracy. Cranch dissented from the decision by the court's other two judges to issue the warrant. He took exception to the English doctrine of constructive treason. He also rejected the proposition that an executive communication from the President, without either an oath or affirmation, established sufficient probability of treasonous activity.

Three decades later Cranch spoke for a unanimous court in upholding the power of the judiciary to intervene in executive affairs. United States ex rel. Stokes v. Kendall (1837) stemmed from an alleged debt due Stokes and others for services they claimed to have rendered to the Post Office. When Postmaster General Amos Kendall refused to pay, despite congressional direction to do so, Stokes sought a WRIT OF MANDAMUS. Although no circuit court had ever issued such a writ against the executive branch, Cranch held that his court could do so. He found that the judicial power could properly issue a writ to command performance of a purely ministerial function by the head of an executive department.

Cranch remained a thoroughgoing Federalist long after that party ceased to exist. His opinions powerfully affirmed the role of the federal judiciary. His most important legacy was the establishment of the Circuit Court and its successors in the District of Columbia as the major forums in which to adjudicate causes involving executive departments and agencies.

KERMIT L. HALL
(1986)

Bibliography

CARNEL, WILLIAM F. 1901 Life and Times of William Cranch, Judge of the District Circuit Court, 1801–1855. Records of the Columbia Historical Society 5:294–310.

CRAWFORD v. BOARD OF EDUCATION
458 U.S. 527 (1982)

WASHINGTON v. SEATTLE SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1
458 U.S. 457 (1982)

By statewide votes, both Washington and California sought to limit the use of SCHOOL BUSING for purposes of DESEGREGATION. A 1978 Washington INITIATIVE effectively prohibited school boards from assigning children to public schools outside their residential neighborhoods for purposes of racial integration. A 1979 amendment to the California Constitution prohibited state courts from ordering school busing unless busing would be available in a federal court as a remedy for a violation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The Supreme Court sustained the California measure, 8–1, but held the Washington measure invalid, 5–4.

In the Seattle case, Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN wrote for the majority. Following the precedent of HUNTER V. ERICKSON (1969), he concluded that the Washington law placed a special burden on racial minorities, using an issue's racial nature to define the local decision-making structure. For the dissenters, Justice LEWIS F. POWELL argued that the Washington law had not altered the political process at all, but had merely adopted a neighborhood school policy—something a local school board itself remained free to do, within the limits of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Justice Powell wrote for the Court in the Crawford case. The California courts had previously read the state constitution to forbid DE FACTO as well as DE JURE school SEGREGATION. There was, however, no "ratchet" principle in the Fourteenth Amendment; the state could constitutionally adopt federal EQUAL PROTECTION standards. The amendment, Powell said, was not adopted with a racially discriminatory purpose; it chiefly reflected a choice for the neighborhood school policy. Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, dissenting, considered the two cases indistinguishable. Indeed, the opinions of Justice Powell in the two cases bear marked similarities; yet, if Hunter be taken as the critical precedent, the distinction is supportable. A line is none the worse for being thin.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

CREATIONISM

Creationism is the belief that plants and animals were originally created by a supernatural being substantially as they now exist. Proponents of creationism today are primarily evangelical Christians who adopt a literal reading of the book of Genesis in the Bible. Several hundred creationists also hold advanced science degrees and claim that the best scientific evidence supports creationism; these creationists advocate what they call "scientific creationism."

Scientific creationism is far afield from prevailing scientific orthodoxy, and although most of its proponents are evangelicals, many evangelicals do not subscribe to it. Scientific creationism teaches that the earth is several thousand years old, rather than several billion, and that much of the fossil record was created in a worldwide deluge, rather than by the gradual accumulations of the ages. It harkens back to catastrophism of the type dominant in the scientific community before the theories of Charles Lyell and Charles Darwin gained acceptance. Scientific creationists claim that the fossil record supports the idea that when life first appeared it was already complicated and multifaceted; at the very least, they argue, the fossil record shows no support for the gradual progression of life forms taught by classical Darwinian theory. Much of the evidence cited by creation scientists comes from evolutionists, who continue to have marked disagreements with one another about the mechanism by which evolution occurs.

Creationism originally became a constitutional issue because creationists tried to keep evolution from being taught in the public schools, a policy the Supreme Court struck down as violative of the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE in EPPERSON V. ARKANSAS (1968). Creationism remains a constitutional issue, however, because creationists now seek to have scientific creationism taught in public schools. In fact, they have sought state laws that require the teaching of creationism side-by-side with evolution.

Opponents of these laws maintain that teaching creationism is tantamount to teaching religion and hence abridges the establishment clause; as evidence for their position, they point to the religious underpinnings of creationism and claim that few if any scientists hold creationist beliefs. Creationists respond that how they derived their theory is irrelevant; the sole question is whether or not it can be validated by scientific research. As for the dearth of scientists who are creationists, creation scientists point to their own doctorates in science from secular universities. Nevertheless, creationists readily admit that few scientists have adopted creationism, but claim that this is the result of prejudice on the part of evolutionists, marshaling evidence that graduate students and professors believing in creationism have been systematically discriminated against because of these beliefs. Creationists argue that laws requiring the teaching of scientific creationism alongside evolution are required to break the stranglehold of such prejudice.

In response to creationist concerns, Louisiana enacted a law requiring the balanced treatment of the theories of "evolution science" and "creation science" in the public schools. The act defined the respective theories as "the scientific evidences for [creation or evolution] and inferences from those scientific evidences." The act did not mandate that either theory be taught in the schools; but it did demand that if one was taught the other must be taught. The act also required that neither evolution nor creation science be taught "as proven scientific fact."

The Supreme Court held 7–2 that the act failed the first part of the LEMON TEST because it did not have a valid secular purpose; hence, the statute was unconstitutional on its face under the establishment clause.

Writing for the majority, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN rejected the act's explicitly stated secular purpose of "protecting ACADEMIC FREEDOM" because the statute did not in any way enhance the freedom of teachers to teach science. Brennan also rejected the contention that Louisiana wanted to ensure "fairness" by requiring that all the evidence regarding origins be taught, noting that the law unequally provided for the development of curriculum guides for creation science, but not evolution.

The core of Brennan's argument, however, was his determination that creation science embodies "religious doctrine" and that the "preeminent purpose of the Louisiana legislature was . . . to advance the religious viewpoint that a supernatural being created humankind." Brennan sought to show from the legislative record that legislators in fact supported the act because evolution contradicted their own religious beliefs. Hence, the motivations of the legislators, rather than the clear language of the act, was the decisive factor in invalidating the law.

Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, joined by Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, filed a lengthy dissent attacking many of the central premises of the majority's opinion. Scalia maintained that the majority was able to dismiss the act's stated secular purpose only by misconstruing it. According to Scalia, the "academic freedom" the act sought to guarantee related not to the teachers, but to the students, whom the legislature wanted to be able to study various views of the origin and development of life. Furthermore, the act on its face treated evolution and creation science equally, and the few differences that did exist could be readily explained. For example, the state provided for the development of study guides for creation science, but not evolution because "of the unavailability of works on creation science suitable for classroom use . . . and the existence of ample materials on evolution."

Scalia saved his most cutting remarks for the majority's inquiry into the subjective motives of Louisiana's legislators. Scalia showed through copious citations that the majority had distorted legislators' intentions. But in Scalia's view, even had the majority correctly read the motives in this case, motives alone should not have invalidated the law. The act should have been struck down only if its objective language clearly violated the Constitution or if the primary effect of the law in practice was to advance religion impermissibly (a question not before the Court).

Edwards v. Aguillard raises questions both difficult and deep; it is not really analogous to cases dealing with school prayer or Bible reading because these practices are devotional exercises clearly designed to inculcate religious truth. In this case, however, the state officially disclaimed any intention to present creationism as "true." So even if creationism is inherently religious—as the Court determined—it is not necessarily the case that teaching about it promotes religion in violation of the establishment clause. As Justice LEWIS F. POWELL pointed out in his concurring opinion, the Court has often maintained that public schools have the right to teach objectively about religion. So to strike down the Louisiana law, the Court not only had to find creationism religious, but it had to maintain that the purpose of the law was to teach creationism as true. As a factual matter, however, this was by far the weakest link in the Court's logic.

Why then did the Court rule as it did? One can only speculate; but it would not be inappropriate to point out the obvious: creationism conjures up images of the Scopes trial and intolerant fundamentalists who are none too bright. In the battle between science and superstition, creationism has been accounted superstition, and one can readily understand why the Court would be reluctant to uphold a law that might appear to sanction creationism. Unfortunately, there are problems with excluding beliefs like creationism from the classroom entirely.

Evolution remains so controversial primarily because it is part of a much larger debate over the nature and meaning of life. The study of how life began almost inevitably raises questions of why: Why did life begin? Why are humans rational? Why is there order in the universe? Men and women have debated these questions for thousands of years, considering them to be some of the most important inquiries human beings can undertake. Yet these are the very sorts of questions that modern science cannot answer. All modern science can legitimately offer are tentative explanations about the physical process by which life developed after it first appeared; of its own accord, it can tell us nothing of the purpose or meaning of the development of life. Nor, in all probability, will it ever unravel the mystery of how life first arose from nonlife. The result is that if one relegates the discussion of the origin and development of life to science textbooks that discussion will be, at best, incredibly impoverished because modern science cannot legitimately provide answers to questions of meaning and purpose. At worst, the discussion will be disingenuous because attempts will be made to answer the questions of meaning in the guise of science. One does not need to know much of recent history to realize that science has been used quite often to justify a variety of philosophically laden schemes, from social darwinism to eugenics. The encroachment of science into the domains of philosophy and theology may be more subtle in the public schoolroom, but it occurs nevertheless. It can be seen in the 1959 biology text that declared that "nothing supernatural happened" when life first arose or in more recent texts that emphasize "chance" and "randomness" as the sole determinants of how life developed. Such statements advance philosophical and theological claims just as surely as creationism; yet these claims are allowed because they are made in the name of science. In such a situation, one can readily understand why some creationists have tried to distance their theory from its religious underpinnings; they know this is the only way their ideas will get a fair hearing.

It might be better if public schools—and the Court—recognized more forthrightly that both philosophy and theology have a place in the discussion of origins and that their inclusion in school curricula need not be equated with their advancement by the state. One can teach about various theories, after all, without advocating any of them.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Religious Fundamentalism; Separation of Church and State.)

Bibliography

BERGMAN, JERRY 1984 The Criterion: Religious Discrimination in America. Richfield, Minn.: Onesimus.

BIRD, WENDELL R. 1978 Freedom of Religion and Science Instruction in Public Schools. Yale Law Journal 87:515–570.

CURTIS, V. KAY 1988 Religion: Church and State Relations: Balanced Treatment of Theories of Origins—Edwards v. Aguillard. Oklahoma Law Review 41:740–758.

CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY

The modern crime of conspiracy punishes the act of agreement with another to do something unlawful, and the vagueness and breadth of its scope are the legacies of seventeenth-century English judges who invented its COMMON LAW progenitor. Constitutional DOCTRINE has not shaped the boundaries of this crime; it is, indeed, the other way around. Most paradoxically, the crime has served both as a tool for the suppression of FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms and as a weapon for the defense of rights to racial equality. Like all political issues, the definition of "unlawful" conspiracies fluctuates with the moral hemlines of history.

In the eighteenth century, the English crime came to encompass the agreement to do any "immoral" acts, even noncriminal ones. This became an element of American conspiracy law as well, and one of its early critics was Chief Justice LEMUEL SHAW of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court. In Commonwealth v. Hunt (1842) Shaw put an end to conspiracy prosecutions of laborers who organized to seek such noncriminal goals as higher wages or a CLOSED SHOP. Criminal goals, of course, remained punishable, and trade union conspiracy prosecutions died out in the 1890s only because they were replaced by judicial resort to the labor INJUNCTION. Statutes prohibiting noncriminal conspiracies remained on the books, but their demise was hastened by state court decisions holding them void for VAGUENESS or violative of the EX POST FACTO clause.

Federal conspiracy prosecutions commenced in 1867 with the enactment of a Federal Criminal Code provision prohibiting conspiracies to defraud the United States. The rise of organized crime during Prohibition provided the impetus for the expansion of federal conspiracy offenses; the RACKETEER INFLUENCED AND CORRUPT ORGANIZATIONS ACT of 1970 is an exemplar of their sweeping scope. In 1925, Judge LEARNED HAND labeled conspiracy "the darling in the prosecutor's nursery," because of the progovernment features that mark conspiracy trials. HEARSAY statements of co-conspirators are admissible in evidence, and conspiratorial membership may be inferred solely from conduct showing a desire to further the conspiracy's goals. In Pinkerton v. United States (1946) the Court held conspirators liable for every crime committed by co-conspirators, including those of participants whose existence was unknown but foreseeable. The DOUBLE JEOPARDY clause does not bar separate, consecutive sentences for these offenses and the conspiracy itself. VENUE will lie anywhere an act is committed in furtherance of the conspiracy, often effectively nullifying the SIXTH AMENDMENT right to be tried where a crime is committed. Conspirators may be tried en masse, and fringe participants thus become tainted with the culpability of the ringleaders.

It is small wonder that in Krulewitch v. United States (1949) Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON declared that the "elastic, sprawling and pervasive" nature of the crime of conspiracy poses a "serious threat to fairness" in the administration of justice. Yet while many commentators call for limitations on the crime, DUE PROCESS arguments meet with recurrent failure in the courts. This amoeboid offense remains entrenched in state and federal law and in legislative proposals for criminal code reform.

Conspiracy was a potent weapon for the prosecution of political dissidents during WORLD WAR I, and these cases brought the Supreme Court to its first important encounter with the First Amendment's guarantees of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. The ESPIONAGE ACT of 1917 prohibited conspiracies to obstruct the draft or cause insubordination in the armed services, and in SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919) and FROHWERK V. UNITED STATES (1919) a unanimous Court affirmed the conspiracy convictions of dissidents who had circulated antidraft publications. In Schenck, Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES declared that only a CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER of a conspiracy's success would justify conviction, but this formula was not an important limitation in these cases, where the danger was assumed. Justices Holmes and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS later argued for greater speech protections, but their pleas went unheeded for a generation. Conspiracy convictions of eleven national Communist party leaders were affirmed in DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951), even though the danger posed by their conspiracy to advocate the overthrow of the government was evidenced only by the party's structure and tenets. The doctrinal thaw came in 1957, with Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN's opinion in YATES V. UNITED STATES portending the formula of BRANDENBURG V. OHIO (1969). Brandenburg allows prosecution for speech crimes—including conspiracy to advocate—only when advocacy of imminent, illegal action is likely to incite such action.

Brandenburg's weakness as a limit on conspiracy prosecutions is that it only guarantees defendants the benefit of appellate court scrutiny of jury verdicts. It provides no more than an indirect caution for legislative reliance on conspiracy statutes or prosecutorial decisions to seek indictments. Protection of speech interests rests ultimately in the court of public opinion, and the VIETNAM WAR era dissidents found an uncertain haven there. The "Chicago Seven" protesters at the 1968 Democratic National Convention were acquitted of conspiring to travel interstate with intent to incite a riot, but they were convicted of other INCITEMENT offenses. Benjamin Spock and William Sloane Coffin were convicted of conspiring to counsel draft evasion, based on their support of a DRAFT CARD BURNING rally in Boston. After appellate court reversals in United States v. Dellinger (1972) and United States v. Spock (1969), reprosecution was halted only because the government decided to give up trying. The CHILLING EFFECT of such prosecutions is irremediable, and judicial vindication of speech rights often becomes a matter of better late than never.

The concept of conspiracy can serve CIVIL LIBERTIES as aptly as it defeats them. After the CIVIL WAR, Congress prohibited conspiracies "to injure, oppress, threaten or intimidate" any citizen's free exercise of constitutional rights, and also provided a civil action for DAMAGES against conspirators. Narrow judicial construction of these rights defeated their enforcement in the era of UNITED STATES V. HARRIS (1883) and the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883). But Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS's opinion in SCREWS V. UNITED STATES (1945) revived prosecutions of state officials, while UNITED STATES V. GUEST (1966) brought similar vindication against private individuals, and GRIFFIN V. BRECKENRIDGE (1971) opened the damage remedy door. Debate continues over the scope of rights protected by these remedies. But conspiracy's contribution toward curbing civil rights violators remains as notable as its role in rounding up racketeers.

CATHERINE HANCOCK
(1986)

Bibliography

FILVAROFF, DAVID B. 1972 Conspiracy and the First Amendment. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 121:189–253.
JOHNSON, PHILLIP E. 1973 The Unnecessary Crime of Conspiracy. California Law Review 61:1137–1188.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT
78 Stat. 552 (1964)

By the Criminal Justice Act Congress provided that counsel must be furnished at public expense for INDIGENT defendants in federal criminal cases. The act requires each district court to formulate a plan for furnishing counsel, subject to supervision by the circuit judicial council and the Judicial Conference of the United States. The act provides that counsel shall be furnished from the defendant's first appearance before a court or magistrate through the APPEAL process, and authorizes reimbursement for such expenses as investigations and expert testimony.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Right to Counsel.)

CRIMINAL JUSTICE AND DUE PROCESS

The application to the CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM of the DUE PROCESS clauses of the Fifth Amendment and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT raises three principal issues. First, which of the provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS relating to police practices and criminal trials are "incorporated" by the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause so as to apply against the states as well as the federal government? Second, what doctrinal framework should be used to evaluate claims about PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS in the criminal as opposed to civil context? Third, what doctrinal framework should be used to evaluate claims about substantive limits on police practices, or what has come to be known as SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS?

The INCORPORATION question is a consequence of the Supreme Court's decision in the post–WORLD WAR II era to pursue a doctrinal strategy of "selective incorporation" by which it considered each individual provision of the Bill of Rights and determined whether that provision was so fundamental so as to apply against the states pursuant to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Although the Court explicitly rejected Justice HUGO L. BLACK's theory of "total incorporation" (by which every provision of the Bill of Rights would be incorporated against the states), it accomplished much the same result through "selective incorporation," given that almost every provision of the Bill of Rights has been individually incorporated.

As for criminal justice, almost every provision of the Bill of Rights relating to police practices and the conduct of criminal trials has been incorporated against the states. The FOURTH AMENDMENT limit on unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES and its EXCLUSIONARY RULE have been incorporated, as have the Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION and its MIRANDA RULES. In addition, the Fifth Amendment's DOUBLE JEOPARDY clause, the Eighth Amendment's CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT clause, and almost every provision of the Sixth Amendment relating to criminal trials have all been incorporated.

Nonetheless, two important exceptions to this trend toward expansive incorporation are worth noting in the criminal justice context. First, the Fifth Amendment's GRAND JURY clause has never been incorporated. Although that clause has been interpreted to require that all federal FELONY cases be based on an INDICTMENT by a grand jury, the Court explicitly rejected such a requirement for state criminal proceedings in the nineteenth-century case HURTADO V. CALIFORNIA (1884), and it has never revisited the issue. Thus, states are constitutionally free to structure their charging mechanisms in other ways. A substantial number of states use grand juries for some cases, but some jurisdictions give prosecutors greater power to charge by information than would be constitutionally permissible in federal courts, and some jurisdictions use alternative (and perhaps more rigorous) methods to "check" prosecutorial charging decisions. Among those alternatives are judicially conducted preliminary hearings or judicial inquests, also known as "one-man grand juries." Second, although the Court incorporated the Sixth Amendment right to TRIAL BY JURY in nonpetty criminal cases in DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968), it failed to incorporate that aspect of the jury right that requires JURY UNANIMITY in federal criminal trials. This peculiar result arose from the fragmentation of the Court in the 1970s. Four Justices (led by Justice BYRON R. WHITE) believed that the Sixth Amendment required neither federal nor state criminal juries to be unanimous; four other Justices (led by Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS) believed that the Sixth Amendment required both federal and state criminal juries to be unanimous. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, JR., provided the fifth, "swing" vote on the matter, declaring that the Sixth Amendment required jury unanimity in federal, but not in state, cases. Thus, both in grand jury practice and in the degree of unanimity required of criminal juries, states remain significantly freer than the federal government to pursue their own policies without running afoul of the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause.

The second set of issues raised by the intersection of the due process clause and the criminal justice system—the requisites of procedural due process—have become murkier in recent years. On occasion in the last few decades, the Court has seemed to assume that the doctrinal framework for analyzing claims of inadequate procedures should be the same in the civil and criminal contexts. Thus, for example, in deciding whether indigent criminal defendants should be entitled to state-funded psychiatric assessments in CAPITAL PUNISHMENT trials, the Court applied the same BALANCING TEST that the Court had applied to claims regarding procedural due process in civil contexts. However, in a more recent case, Medina v. California (1992), the Court explicitly rejected this approach and held that the standard should be one more deferential to state interests: courts should uphold a challenged state procedure "unless it offends some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental." The Court reasoned that in light of the explicit provisions of the Bill of Rights relating to criminal procedure, expansive readings of the due process clause would give inadequate deference to considered legislative judgments. After Medina, it remains to be seen both how deferential the Court's standard will turn out to be, and how the Court will choose whether a particular procedural challenge should be considered under a specific provision of the Bill of Rights or under the more general due process clause.

The third principal issue—substantive due process—has likewise been addressed recently by the Court, and in a similar fashion that has both narrowed the scope of possible challenges and raised questions about the future. The Court has held, from the early part of this century, that the due process clause not only ensures fair procedures, as its text most obviously suggests; it also is the source of certain substantive limits on governmental power. In the criminal justice context, the Court has held that the due process clause renders unconstitutional some police practices and some treatment of pretrial detainees. The Court has assumed that the "deliberate indifference" of governmental actors to certain kinds of harms—for example, inattention to prisoners' medical needs—is enough to violate the due process clause. But in County of Sacramento v. Lewis (1998), a case involving a high-speed POLICE PURSUIT that resulted in death, the Court held that the "deliberate indifference" standard was too accommodating to plaintiffs in cases that involve on-the-spot police decisionmaking. In such a context, a court should decline to find a violation of due process unless the actions of the police were so egregious as to "shock the conscience." It remains to be seen which other contexts within the criminal justice system will be held to require the more deferential "shocks the conscience" standard. The narrowing of opportunities for substantive due process challenges within the criminal justice system reflects the growth of a more general skepticism on the Supreme Court for "substantive" regulation under the due process clause.

CAROL S. STEIKER
(2000)

CRIMINAL JUSTICE AND RACE

See: Race and Criminal Justice

CRIMINAL JUSTICE AND TECHNOLOGY

In 1928 Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS warned that "discovery and invention have made it possible for the government, by means far more effective than the rack, to obtain disclosure in court of what is whispered in the closet." And, he went on to ask, "can it be that the Constitution affords no protection against such invasion of individual security?" In OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928) the Supreme Court responded yes to Brandeis's question: the Constitution "affords no protection."

Today the Court continues to give virtually the same answer. Thus, in United States v. Knotts (1983), Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST wrote that "nothing in the FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibit[s] the police from augmenting the sensory facilities bestowed upon them at birth with such enhancement as science and technology afforded them in this case." That case involved a mobile tracking device, but the same attitude is reflected in many other cases and contexts. The Court has virtually abdicated any role in shaping a response to the threats to liberty and individual rights posed by the new technology, leaving the problem to the occasional efforts of the Congress and to the state legislatures and courts.

The Olmstead WIRETAPPING controversy set the pattern. There the Court construed the Fourth Amendment to deny any constitutional protection against devices that do not involve a physical trespass and the seizure of tangible documents. Nine years later, in NARDONE V. UNITED STATES (1937), the Court construed a federal statute codifying federal radio and telecommunications law to prohibit wiretapping, much to everyone's surprise. The limitations of this approach were reflected in the virtual failure of the statute to reduce wiretapping significantly and in the Court's understandable refusal in Goldman v. United States (1942) to apply the statute to the next significant technological development, a detectaphone placed against a wall that could overhear conversations in another room without physically trespassing.

Now, a half century later, Brandeis's warning is more timely than ever, for we have developed technologies that make these early devices seem primitive. These new technologies include tiny, almost invisible video and audio surveillance devices that can function at short or long distances and by night as well as day, such as a "miniawac," which can spot a car or a person from 30,000 feet in the air; electronic bracelets and anklets that signal a probation or parole officer if his or her charge goes more than a short distance from home; and chemical dust that can be used with ultraviolet detectors for tracking. Computer matching of records in different places can also provide vast amounts of information about a person. Many other techniques involving new biological and medical technology are also being developed.

The Court's resistance to imposing constitutional controls on the use of technological advances in the CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM stems in part from the law enforcement and constitutional contexts in which these issues arise. Almost always the question before the Court has been whether a convicted criminal is to go free because the enforcement authorities have used some technological device without meeting constitutional requirements. Only for a brief period in its history (1961–1967) has the Court not been reluctant to tolerate such an outcome.

The constitutional provision at issue in these cases is usually the Fourth Amendment, which imposes restrictions only on SEARCH AND SEIZURE. The Court's analytic approach has been to dichotomize surveillances into "searches" and "nonsearches," with the latter denied any Fourth Amendment protection at all; other constitutional provisions, such as the Fifth Amendment's ban on compelled self-incrimination, have been construed as inapplicable to the use of most technological devices. SCHMERBER V. CALIFORNIA (1966) illustrates that point.

This dichotomous approach, together with the Court's general reluctance to recognize the special impact of modern technology on individual liberty, was illustrated just a few years after it overruled Olmstead in KATZ V. UNITED STATES (1967). A sharply divided Court in UNITED STATES V.

WHITE (1971) refused to recognize a constitutionally protected right not to have one's conversation with another person secretly transmitted electronically by the latter to police listening some distance away. "Inescapably, one contemplating illegal activity must realize and risk that his companions may be reporting to the police," wrote Justice BYRON R. WHITE, and to him there was no significant difference "between probable informers on the one hand and probable informers with transmitters on the other." But as the dissenting Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN wrote, "third-party bugging . . . undermine[s] that confidence and sense of security that is characteristic of . . . a free society. It goes beyond the . . . ordinary type of "informer situation." The "assumption of risk" analysis used by the Court is circular, insisted Justice Harlan, for "the risks we assume are in large part reflections of laws that translate into rules [our] customs and values. . . . The critical question, therefore, is whether . . . we should impose on our citizens [such] risks . . . without at least the protection of a warrant." Moreover, the Fourth Amendment is designed to protect all of us, not just people "contemplating illegal activities," and the Court's approach precluded constitutional protections when a confidential conversation turns out to be wholly innocent.

The White unconcern for differences in degree that become differences in kind has been reflected in virtually every constitutional case involving modern technology that the Court has faced. For example, seeking anonymity in a crowd and moving to out-of-the-way places are ways to preserve some privacy in a surveillance-pervaded crowded society. In United States v. Knotts the Court ruled that an electronic device, a "beeper," surreptitiously attached to a container that emitted electronic signals, enabling the police to trace the container wherever it went, did not call for constitutional protection; the Court reasoned that "visual surveillance from public places along [the] route" of the person with the container would have provided the same information. Only if the beeper enters a house with the container and continues to operate is there a privacy encroachment requiring a SEARCH WARRANT. The same reasoning can obviously apply to beepers secretly attached to people.

The Court has been equally indifferent to the threats to privacy and liberty posed by modern expansions of visual surveillance. Walls and distance—which we ordinarily use to protect privacy—are not very effective safeguards in today's world. Video surveillance can now be conducted from great distances and often with the capability of listening as well. So far, the Court has tended to ignore distance as a factor. In a series of three decisions in the late 1980s the Court consistently upheld surveillance from above enclosed areas, even when the surveillance was made possible only by the use of highly sophisticated equipment. In Dow Chemical Co. v. United States (1986), Dow had a 2,000-acre chemical factory, around which it maintained elaborate security that barred ground-level views; it also investigated any low-level flights. Any further protection against intrusion, such as a roof over the entire facility, would have been prohibitively expensive. An Environmental Protection Agency airplane took approximately seventy-five pictures of the plant from altitudes as high as 12,000 feet. The camera's precision was so great that the pictures could be enlarged over 240 times without significant loss of detail or resolution; it was possible to see pipes and wires as small as one-half inch in diameter. Finding the plant similar to an OPEN FIELD, a 5–4 majority of the Court denied constitutional protection against the surveillance.

In Dow, the Court suggested that more protection might be available to a private residence than to a large industrial complex. But in California v. Ciraolo (1986) the same 5–4 majority decided the same way when police flew a private plane 1,000 feet above Ciraolo's yard, which he tried to protect with a six-foot outer fence and a ten-foot inner fence; the police saw a marijuana plant in the yard on a small plot, which they photographed. Despite Ciraolo's precautions, Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER concluded that even though Ciraolo had a REASONABLE EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY in his backyard, it was "unreasonable for [him] to expect that his marijuana plants were constitutionally protected from being observed with the naked eye from an altitude of 1,000 feet," because the observation occurred in public "navigable air space" and the members of the public could look down as they flew overhead. As Justice LEWIS F. POWELL observed in dissent, however, the likelihood of such an observation by a private person on a public or private plane is "virtually nonexistent."

The Court confirmed its indifference to the privacy of areas under surveillance a few years later in Florida v. Riley (1989), when it concluded that observations from a helicopter hovering 400 feet above a partially covered greenhouse in the defendant's backyard did not implicate the Fourth Amendment. The Court stressed that the helicopter was not violating the law, "did not interfere with respondent's normal use of the greenhouse," observed no "intimate details," and caused "no undue noise, no wind, dust or threat of injury." The Court did not explain why any of these should be determinative in deciding whether the greenhouse was entitled to be free from unrestricted surveillance.

An especially serious threat to individual liberty arises from the computer revolution. Seeking medical care, participating in public welfare programs, engaging in regulated activities, or even acting as consumers requires us to provide third parties vast amounts of personal information that previously we could have kept confidential. Data that were once either nonexistent or kept in a shoebox or file cabinet are now on someone else's computer disks. Moreover, those records that did exist were stored in public or private files usually scattered in a great many places, making it difficult to develop a full dossier on anyone. That difficulty is now a thing of the past. Computer matching pulls together masses of information in different files, information that can dog one throughout one's existence. As sociologist Gary Marx points out, "this can create a class of permanently stigmatized persons," making it impossible for people to overcome past mistakes and failures and to start a new life. Rehabilitation may be rendered impossible.

The Supreme Court has not dealt directly with computer matching, but has effectively denied constitutional protection to the privacy of a key element in that process: the records themselves. In United States v. Miller (1976) the Court refused to require police to meet Fourth Amendment requirements when they subpoenaed a bank's microfilm records of a suspect's checks, bank statements, deposit slips, and other bank transaction records. The Court found no "legitimate expectation of privacy in these records and documents because all contain only information voluntarily conveyed to the banks and exposed to their employees in the ordinary course of business. . . . The depositor takes the risk, in revealing his affairs to another, that the information will be conveyed by that person to the government." The result is that the enormous mass of information that we must "voluntarily convey" in order to live in a modern world is now without constitutional protection. This includes not only bank and medical records but even the telephone numbers we call, which are not conveyed to any one at all but simply recorded for billing purposes by usually inanimate equipment. In Smith v. Maryland (1979) the Court refused to require constitutional prerequisites for installation of a pen register that recorded the numbers of outgoing telephone calls. Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN wrote that "the switching equipment that processed those numbers is merely the modern counterpart of the operator who, in an earlier day, personally completed calls for the subscriber." Wayne LaFave noted the "ominous proposition that modern technology cannot add to one's justified expectation of privacy, but can only detract from it."

Finally, the Court has extracted a principle from one of the oldest forms of "technology" that would render newer technology one of the greatest threats to privacy and other individual rights. In concluding in United States v. Place (1983) that use of a dog's sense of smell to detect drugs in a suitcase did not raise Fourth Amendment concerns, the Court said, "A 'canine sniff' by a well-trained narcotics detection dog . . . does not expose non-contraband items that otherwise would remain hidden from public view . . . [and is] limited both in the manner in which the information is obtained and in the content of the information revealed." This approach would seem to be counter to the proposition that an intrusion cannot be validated by what it turns up. Moreover, if accuracy and unobtrusiveness are criteria, then what lies in store if, as Justice Brandeis feared, we do indeed develop ways that can unobtrusively detect the presence of incriminating materials by foolproof methods?

And why should techniques be limited to searching out tangible items; what of incriminating expressions or even thought revealed by new medical or chemical technology? At this point the Court might balk, but so far its CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY would impose few if any controls.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1992)

Bibliography

FISHMAN, CLIFFORD S. 1985 Electronic Tracking Devices and the Fourth Amendment: Knots, Karo the Questions Still Unanswered. Catholic University Law Review 34:277–395.

LAFAVE, WAYNE 1987 Search and Seizure. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

MARX, GARY T. 1988 Undercover Police Surveillance in America. Berkeley: University of California Press.

OFFICE OF TECHNOLOGY ASSESSMENT 1985 Federal Government Information Technology: Electronic Surveillance and Civil Liberties. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

The BILL OF RIGHTS has sometimes been likened to a national code of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE. However, the Constitution regulates many important aspects of criminal justice that are not "procedural" in any sense; at the same time, it fails to regulate many other important aspects, both procedural and nonprocedural. Moreover, features of the criminal justice system that are subject to extensive constitutional limitations are not, in practice, so strictly regulated as is commonly believed. It is therefore appropriate to reflect on which important aspects of criminal justice are and are not governed by the Constitution, what factors explain these patterns, and what the future role of the Constitution should be in defining fundamental norms of criminal justice.

To evaluate the role of constitutional norms in criminal matters, it is necessary to analyze the entire criminal justice system. Each political entity in the United States (local, state, or federal) has such a system; it consists not only of the rules of EVIDENCE and procedure applicable in criminal matters, but also the major institutions of criminal justice (for example, the police, lawyers, judges, court and correctional officials), as well as the provisions of the criminal law (crimes, defenses, and penalties). This system can be envisioned as a process that begins with the definition of the criminal law and the institutions of justice; proceeds "chronologically" through increasingly selective stages of investigation, charging, adjudication, appellate review, and punishment; and ends with the continuing careers of convicted offenders, who all too often, begin the process all over again. Each of these stages of the process raises fundamental issues of justice and of individual-state relations that might be, but often are not, regulated by constitutional norms. At the same time, the enforcement of any such norm is limited by that norm's systemic context; specific rules are dependent on other rules, many of which are not subject to federal constitutional regulation. Thus, changes in specific constitutional norms are often canceled by compensating changes in other rules or practices in the same or different parts of the system.

The following is a list of the major issues at each stage of the above chronological flow model that are and are not subject to significant constitutional regulation:

1. The definition of crimes and penalties is largely unregulated by the Constitution, except for certain limitations imposed by the EX POST FACTO, BILL OF ATTAINDER, and EQUAL PROTECTION clauses, the FIRST AMENDMENT and Eighth Amendment, the RIGHT OF PRIVACY, and the VAGUENESS and fair notice doctrines. Almost all issues relating to the definition of defenses (e.g., self defense, intoxication, and insanity) are unregulated.

2. Except for the appointment and tenure of federal judges, the requirements of judicial neutrality in the issuance of warrants and at trial, and certain First Amendment limitations on the hiring and firing of public employees, the institutions of criminal justice are not regulated at all by the federal Constitution; many are also not closely governed by STATE CONSTITUTIONS. Important unregulated issues include selection and internal supervision of police, prosecutors, and correctional officials; selection and tenure of state judges; and training of police, prosecutors, judges, and defense attorneys.

3. The investigation of criminal charges is covered by highly detailed constitutional limitations as to SEARCH AND SEIZURE, POLICE INTERROGATION AND CONFESSIONS, the RIGHT TO COUNSEL, and BAIL. Important unregulated issues include police decisions to investigate or not investigate, to use informants and undercover police officers, and to charge some offenders and offenses, but not others; magistrate shopping; nighttime arrests and searches; searches when no one but police are present; use of arrest and pretrial detention in minor cases; prompt appearance in court; appellate review of pretrial detention; and nonbail release conditions.

4. Prosecutorial decisions to select offenders and charges, to later drop charges, and to engage in PLEA BARGAINING as to charges and the sentence, or both, have an enormous impact on case outcomes. However, except for very limited equal-protection and "vindictive prosecution" standards, these critical decisions are not regulated by the Constitution.

5. Other pretrial procedures covered by the Constitution include the GRAND JURY (in federal cases only), certain aspects of DISCOVERY, motions to exclude evidence, and SPEEDY TRIAL. However, the powers of the prosecution and the defense to obtain statements from potential witnesses (other than the defendant) before a trial are not regulated by the Constitution.

6. Extensive FAIR TRIAL rights are provided by the Constitution; examples are TRIAL BY JURY, right to counsel, CONFRONTATION with state witnesses, BURDEN OF PROOF, RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, and DOUBLE JEOPARDY. Important unregulated issues include the admissibility of the defendant's prior convictions or other misconduct, separation of guilt and sentencing evidence and findings, the necessity of written findings of guilt, multiple trials for the same offense in different states or in both state and federal systems, and most issues involving joinder of offenses and offenders in a single trial.

7. Many of the fair trial standards also apply to SENTENCING proceedings, but they apply more flexibly. The Constitution does not require formal findings or reasons for a particular sentence, nor does it limit guilty plea concessions. Except for the imposition of CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, sentencing decisions need not be structured by guidelines. The Eighth Amendment sets some limits on disproportionately severe prison terms and fines, and sentences are also limited by certain First Amendment, equal protection, and right of privacy rules, but most sentences are not constitutionally regulated either as to their form or severity.

8. The FREEDOM OF THE PRESS and fair trial principles govern media publicity and access to trials and certain pretrial proceedings.

9. Although HABEAS CORPUS rights are guaranteed, it is not clear whether the Constitution guarantees defendants any right to direct appeal in state cases. If an appellate system is provided, it must meet minimal equal protection and DUE PROCESS requirements, but the number of appellate levels, composition of courts, and nature of appealable issues are not regulated.

10. Victims have no rights under the Constitution—to be heard or to appeal, to be protected, or to receive compensation.

11. Compensation of citizens for unconstitutional search, arrest, pretrial detention, or imprisonment is available under federal CIVIL RIGHTS statutes, but is subject to important limitations (for example, judicial immunity and police officer's defense of reasonable belief that arrest or search was lawful).

12. The Constitution guarantees very few PRISONERS' RIGHTS. Most fair trial rights do not apply to decisions such as prison discipline, transfers, parole, and revocation of probation.

To understand why the Constitution regulates criminal matters so selectively, it is necessary to consider not only the implications of FEDERALISM, but also the textual sources and historical development of federal constitutional norms. The constitutional texts applicable to criminal cases are mostly found in the Bill of Rights (1791) and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT (1868). Of these, only the latter applies directly to the states, and it did not provide much concrete guidance until the 1960s, when the WARREN COURT, with use of the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE, began to hold that certain Bill of Rights guarantees were implicit in the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Because there were very few federal criminal cases until the twentieth century, there was little early case law interpreting Bill of Rights guarantees. Indeed, before the adoption of the EXCLUSIONARY RULE in federal cases in 1914, there was virtually no case law, because there was no criminal court remedy encouraging defendants to litigate constitutional claims.

The Supreme Court's application of the exclusionary rule to state criminal cases in 1961, along with its expansion of the availability of habeas corpus and right to counsel in 1963, set the stage for a veritable explosion of constitutional case law during the final years of the Warren Court. Nevertheless, this expansion was constrained by the texts of the Bill of Rights. These texts were written in response to specific perceived abuses of the late eighteenth century. Moreover, they were written at a time when crime tended to be local and relatively disorganized, and before the development of organized police forces and the emergence of the public prosecutor's monopoly over the bringing of cases to trial. Considering these dramatic changes in the nature of crime and criminal justice, the Bill of Rights remains remarkably relevant today, but it fails to address many fundamental issues of modern criminal justice. In the absence of specific provisions, the courts have had to create new rights either by broad analogy to specific rights, or by applying the more open-ended provisions of the due-process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. However, both approaches weaken the legitimacy of such newly recognized rights and make them vulnerable to attack.

This inherent vulnerability of the Warren Court's jurisprudence, combined with the appointment of more conservative Justices by Presidents RICHARD M. NIXON and RONALD REAGAN, substantially slowed the expansion of criminal-process safeguards during the 1970s; indeed, the Supreme Court began to cut back on the scope of substantive rights and the availability of exclusionary and habeas corpus remedies. Notions of federalism also provided justification for this conservative shift; many believed that the Warren Court had gone too far in imposing strict federal standards on state criminal justice systems faced with rapidly rising crime rates and inadequate resources. Also, the relatively late development of these standards in federal cases and their very recent application to state cases lent some support to the view that they were not truly fundamental, at least in state cases.

But the Supreme Court did not simply relax the standards in state cases. Because the majority of Justices still accepted the premise of the selective incorporation doctrine—that a uniform definition of each right should apply in state and federal criminal cases—the conservative decisions of the 1970s and 1980s resulted in the lowering of constitutional standards in federal cases as well. Congress responded with a few statutory safeguards, and the Supreme Court's own FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE continued to provide certain standards more restrictive than the Constitution requires. At the same time, many state courts responded by relying more and more on STATE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW to provide greater protections. In addition, state statutes, rules of procedure, and evidence codes continued to provide important safeguards in areas where constitutional law had retreated or had never been applied.

The degree of the Supreme Court's conservative shift since 1970 should not be overstated. Indeed, a closer analysis of the jurisprudence of the Warren Court reveals that it too had doubts about the wisdom of expanding and strictly enforcing constitutional standards in state and federal criminal cases. Six themes that cut across the spectrum of specific rights illustrate this ambivalence. Although these themes became much clearer in the 1970s and 1980s, they were already evident in the Warren Court era.

First, even the Warren Court recognized that some procedural rights are less important than others. The most important rights were those directly related to the integrity of the adversary system, particularly the right to counsel. Such rights, when violated, were more likely to receive retroactive application and to lead to automatic reversal of a conviction. At the other end of the spectrum, receiving the least protection, were FOURTH AMENDMENT rights. In theory, such rights involve fundamental issues of individual freedom from governmental oppression. In practice, however, they tend only to be asserted by defendants who, in light of illegally seized physical evidence, appear to be clearly guilty of criminal conduct. Thus, the Warren Court recognized several important limitations on these rights and related exclusionary remedies; for example, these rights received little if any retroactive application. Post-Warren Court decisions reflect this "hierarchy of rights" theme even more strongly.

Second, even the adversary-system rights given highest priority by the Warren Court were not applied with equal strictness at all stages of the criminal process. Except for police interrogations covered by MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), the right to counsel was not applied before the filing of formal charges. Similarly, the Court did not show much interest in extending fair trial standards to critical decisions made by correctional authorities, such as disciplinary isolation and revocation of parole. Indeed, the Supreme Court (along with most lower courts) adopted a "hands off" approach toward the entire correctional process. Decisions after 1970 did recognize some rights for prisoners and extended counsel rights to some preindictment proceedings. It remains true, however, that constitutional fair trial guarantees apply primarily at trial; the criminal justice system is not, on the whole, really an "adversary" system.

Third, even some trial rights were not deemed applicable to all criminal cases: the Warren Court held that there is no right to a jury trial for "petty offenses" (maximum sentence not exceeding six months' imprisonment). The petty-offense limitation was later applied in different form to the right to counsel at trial. The rationale for this limitation, also widely followed in nonconstitutional procedural rules, is that more severe penalties require more exacting procedures of adjudication. During the pretrial investigative stage, however, the opposite rule applies: more serious offenses give the citizen fewer rights and the police greater power, for example, to make warrantless entries to arrest.

Fourth, the Warren Court's failure to condemn certain problematic features of American criminal justice implied that fundamental concepts, such as due process and equal protection, may mean different things in criminal cases than they do in other contexts. This view was later explicitly adopted by the Court in Gerstein v. Pugh (1975), holding that the Fourth Amendment defines (sometimes less strictly) "the "process that due' for seizures of person or property in criminal cases." The Warren Court never questioned the traditional use of money bail to condition pretrial release, even though such use often constitutes blatant WEALTH DISCRIMINATION. The Court held that the right to vote could not be lost by inability to pay a POLL TAX,, yet it allowed the right of physical liberty before conviction to be lost by inability to post bail. Similarly, the Warren Court never seriously questioned the dominant form of adjudication of criminal cases, that is, plea bargaining, which would seem to be either an UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITION on the exercise of rights or a case of coerced waiver of rights. It scarcely seems imaginable that the Warren Court would have tolerated in any other context an institutionalized practice whose main purpose is to discourage the exercise of constitutional rights.

Fifth, the Warren Court recognized that police and courts have a practical need for easily administered "bright-line" rules that disregard the specific circumstances of each case. Although most of the Warren Court's bright lines tended to be overly broad with respect to individual rights, some tilted more in the other direction, for example, the automatic right to conduct a limited SEARCH INCIDENT TO ARREST. Later Supreme Court decisions have struck the opposite balance: most, but not all, bright-line rules favor the police.

Finally, the Warren Court undercut many of its liberal, prodefendant rights by recognizing significant limitations on the scope of exclusionary remedies. Thus, defendants lack STANDING to object to even the most outrageous violations of another person's rights; they cannot object to the use of illegally seized evidence to contradict their own testimony on the witness stand; remote products ("fruits") of illegality remain admissible in the prosecution's case, and there is no criminal court remedy for an illegal arrest that does not produce any such evidentiary fruits; and the admission of clearly excludable evidence generally does not require reversal if the reviewing court concludes, in light of the untainted evidence, that admission was HARMLESS ERROR. These exceptions were greatly expanded (and became more numerous) in later Supreme Court decisions; meanwhile, field studies of the exclusionary rule confirmed what perhaps was true even under the Warren Court: exclusion of evidence is rare, occurring in less than one percent of cases, many of which still result in conviction.

Why are fundamental constitutional rights so weakly enforced, even by liberal judges? In addition to the important reasons of history and federalism, noted earlier, there are a number of factors peculiar to the criminal process. First, enforcement of rights usually costs money, and the criminal justice system is inherently underfunded: crime often increases much faster than prisons can be built; legislatures enact moralistic and "get tough" laws, but not the tax increases necessary to pay for their enforcement; and criminal laws are rarely repealed or reduced in severity because there are no votes for the elected official who is, or even appears to be, "soft" on crime or immorality. Second, in part as a result of the first problem, almost all cases are resolved by a guilty plea rather than by trial; defendants who plead guilty waive not only their trial rights, but frequently also their rights to contest the introduction of illegally obtained evidence.

Third, the remedies for constitutional violations create problems of their own. The exclusionary rule often requires courts to throw out reliable evidence; retrial after appellate reversal of conviction may be impossible because of lost evidence, witnesses, and testimony. Fourth, the actors purportedly regulated by constitutional norms retain substantial unregulated discretion—not only because of the need to limit caseloads to stay within resource limits, but also because the correctness of the actors' decisions often turns on case-specific factual determinations, such as voluntariness of consent or waiver, which does not permit close regulation by legal norms. In any case, such norms govern relatively few issues; officials deal with cases and defendants under many rules and at many stages of system processing, and each stage provides opportunities to undercut or evade the occasionally strict rule.

Finally, it must be admitted that Americans are deeply ambivalent about some of their most fundamental ideals of justice. Such ideals often make it more difficult to arrest and convict criminals; particularly in times of rapidly increasing crime rates, most citizens prefer to protect themselves and their property rather than criminals. Even where constitutional norms are designed to protect the innocent, they are necessarily most likely to be asserted by a guilty defendant. As noted earlier, this is almost always true in the Fourth Amendment area, but it is generally true throughout the system. The presumption of innocence itself is somewhat counterintuitive: most arrested persons and certainly most defendants brought to trial are guilty, or ought to be; if they were not, our criminal justice system would be grossly defective. Similarly, the right against compelled self-incrimination is contrary to the general duty to testify and the view that wrongdoers have a duty to admit their mistakes; the right to a vigorous defense is contrary to the view that wrongdoers should not be assisted in their efforts to conceal the truth and avoid punishment; and limits on deceptive police practices are contrary to the view that sometimes it is necessary to fight fire with fire. In light of these value conflicts, citizens—and sometimes even lawyers and judges—may lose sight of the importance of our most fundamental criminal-procedure safeguards.

What, then, can we conclude about the proper role of the Constitution in criminal matters? Despite the problems described, Americans certainly must not stop trying to improve the quality of criminal justice. Moreover, constitutional norms play a central role in these efforts—defining, as the Supreme Court said of the CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT clause, "the evolving standards of decency which mark the progress of a maturing society." At the same time, constitutional norm setting has its limits. Only the most fundamental and lasting norms can be expressed in the constitutional text. Moreover, the case law articulating such norms must not get too far ahead of our ability and willingness to enforce these rules; otherwise, idealism and hope turn to hypocrisy and cynicism.

The Constitution is only one source of norms in criminal cases; other major sources are state constitutions, statutes, codes of criminal procedure and evidence, model law and procedural codes, administrative regulations, and the COMMON LAW,. Increasingly, Americans have begun to look to statements of international human rights; although the INFLUENCE OF THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION ABROAD once made the United States a leader in this field, international norms have now progressed to the point where they sometimes set standards more strict than, or in areas not covered by, the American Constitution.

RICHARD S. FRASE
(1992)

Bibliography

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION 1980 ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, 4 vols., 2nd ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE 1975 A Model Code of Prearraignment Procedure. Philadelphia: American Law Institute.

FRASE, RICHARD S. 1986 Criminal Procedure in a Conservative Age: A Time to Rediscover the Critical Nonconstitutional Issues. Journal of Legal Education 36:79–82.

FRIENDLY, HENRY J. 1965 The Bill of Rights as a Code of Criminal Procedure. California Law Review 53:929–956.

KAMISAR, YALE; LAFAVE, WAYNE; and ISRAEL, JEROLD H. 1990 Modern Criminal Procedure: Cases, Comments, Questions, 7th ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. and SCOTT, AUSTIN W., JR. 1986 Criminal Law, 2nd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

ZIMRING, FRANKLIN E. and FRASE, RICHARD S. 1980 The Criminal Justice System: Materials on the Administration and Reform of the Criminal Law. Boston: Little, Brown.

CRIMINAL LAW

See: Federal Criminal Law

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

"It was a great day for the human race," Charles E. Merriam wrote in Systematic Politics (1945), "when the idea dawned that every man is a human being, an end in himself, with a claim for the development of his own personality, and that human beings had a dignity and a worth, respect for which is the firm basis of human association." This idea is the predicate for that branch of American constitutional law which is concerned with criminal procedure, for this body of law is deliberately weighted in favor of persons accused of crime. This pronounced tilt of the law is based on the assumption that it is vitally necessary to protect the dignity inherent in all human beings, regardless of their station in society.

The commitment of the Constitution to protect in some emphatic way the rights of criminal defendants is reflected in the fact that such protection is a principal theme of the federal BILL OF RIGHTS. Similar protections appear in the bills of rights that form parts of all state CONSTITUTIONS. Even before the ratification of the Bill of Rights in 1791, however, the Constitution in its original form did not ignore the subject altogether. Thus, the privilege of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS was guaranteed, and both BILLS OF ATTAINDER (legislative convictions for crime) and EX POST FACTO laws (laws making criminal acts that were innocent when done) were forbidden (Article I, sections 9 and 10). TRIAL BY JURY "for all crimes" was also guaranteed (Article III, section 2), and the offense of TREASON was defined with meticulous care to prevent abuse of a charge often made on flimsy grounds in moments of great political excitement (Article III, section 3).

The Bill of Rights filled in many more details by spelling out a long list of guarantees designed to protect criminal defendants: freedom from "unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES" (FOURTH AMENDMENT), INDICTMENT, by GRAND JURY, freedom from DOUBLE JEOPARDY, the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, the right to DUE PROCESS OF LAW (Fifth Amendment), the right to a speedy and PUBLIC TRIAL by an impartial local jury, the right to notice of charges, the right to confront adverse witnesses (i.e., cross-examination), the right to have the assistance of counsel (SIXTH AMENDMENT), and freedom from excessive BAIL and from the infliction of CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT (Eighth Amendment). In addition, section 1 of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, with its provision that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," eventually opened the door to considerable supervision of criminal justice in the states by the federal courts.

This commitment to the safeguarding of the rights of defendants in criminal cases was deeply rooted in the COMMON LAW system which the earliest settlers brought with them from England. In ancient Anglo-Saxon and Norman times, questions of guilt or innocence were determined by such ritualistic devices as trial by battle or ordeal, or by compurgation (oath-taking), which were largely appeals to God to work a miracle establishing the defendant's innocence. Actually, private vengeance, taking the form of private war or blood feuds, was the principal check on criminal conduct. But by the time the first colonies were established in America, the basic procedures characteristic of modern jurisprudence had taken form. The essence of modern adjudication is the discovery of innocence or guilt through the presentation of proofs and reasoned argument.

Furthermore, it is important that under common law a person accused of crime carries with him the presumption of innocence, which means that the defendant is not obliged to prove his innocence, but rather that the BURDEN OF PROOF is on the prosecution to prove guilt. In addition, jurors must be instructed by the presiding judge that they may convict only if they find that guilt has been established "beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT," which is the greatest quantum of proof known to the law. In most civil litigation a preponderance of evidence suffices to support a verdict. Thus, in a landmark English case, Woolmington v. D.P.P. (1935), the House of Lords ruled clearly wrong an instruction of the trial judge to the effect that since the accused had shot his wife, the law presumed him to be guilty of murder unless he could satisfy the jury that death was due to an accident. "No matter what the charge or where the trial," Lord Sankey declared, "the principle that the prosecution must prove the guilt of the prisoner is part of the common law of England and no attempt to whittle it down can be entertained."

The common law rules relating to the presumption of innocence and the burden of proof are part of the law prevailing in every American state. For example, following the completion of a modern, revised criminal code in Wisconsin, the legislature adopted a statute that declared: "No provision of the criminal code shall be construed as changing the existing law with respect to presumption of innocence or burden of proof." These principles are also firmly rooted in federal jurisprudence. As Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, dissenting in Leland v. Oregon (1952), wrote, "From the time that the law which we have inherited has emerged from dark and barbaric times, the conception of justice which has dominated our criminal law has refused to put an accused at the hazard of punishment if he fails to remove every reasonable doubt of his innocence in the minds of jurors. It is the duty of the Government to establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt." Similarly, the Supreme Court has ruled that the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt in criminal cases is a due process requirement binding upon the state courts. It is, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN asserted in IN RE WINSHIP (1970), "a prime instrument for reducing the risk of convictions resting on factual error. The standard provides concrete substance for the presumption of innocence. . . ." According to the Supreme Court, the states are required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt all elements of the crime with which the defendant was charged, and the jury must be so instructed. An instruction is improper if it has the effect of reducing substantially the prosecution's burden of proof or of requiring the defendant to establish his innocence beyond a reasonable doubt.

The solicitude of American constitutional law for the rights of the accused is so great that the American system has been described as a defendant's law, in contrast with inquisitorial systems of other countries which give the prosecution many advantages not available in the United States. American public law on this important subject rests upon the recognition of several important considerations that are not the product of abstract theorizing or mere sentimentalism but rather the result of historical experience over centuries of time. For one thing, it is an unquestionably legitimate, indeed essential, function of government to apprehend, try, and punish convicted criminals. But it is also the duty of those public officials who operate the criminal justice system to avoid violating the law themselves in their zeal to combat crime. Of course, our society has a serious crime problem which government cannot and should not ignore, but it has long been recognized that at some point the price of law enforcement may be exorbitant. As Justice Frankfurter observed in Feldman v. United States Oil Refining Co. (1944), "The effective enforcement of a well designed penal code is of course indispensable for social security," but he went on to say: "The Bill of Rights was added to the original constitution in the conviction that too high a price may be paid even for the unhampered enforcement of the criminal law and that, in its attainment, other social objects of a free society should not be sacrificed."

Surely, one of the indispensable objectives of a free society is to avoid the disorganizing consequences of lawlessness by public officials. Thus Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES observed in his celebrated dissenting opinion in the Supreme Court's first WIRETAPPING case, OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928), that "we must consider two objects of desire, both of which we cannot have, and make up our minds which to choose. It is desirable that criminals should be detected and to that end that all available evidence should be used. It is also desirable that the government should not itself foster and pay for other crimes, when they are the means by which the evidence is to be obtained. . . . We have to choose, and for my part I think is a less evil that some criminals should escape than that the Government should play an ignoble part." In a separate dissenting opinion in the same case, Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS warned that government forcefully teaches by example, that crime is contagious, and that "if the Government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy." To permit the government to commit crimes, he asserted, in order to convict criminals, "would bring terrible retribution."

Without question, if unrestrained by law, the police could apprehend and prosecutors could secure the conviction of far more lawbreakers than they now manage to catch and convict. For example, if the police had a free hand to break into any dwelling or other building and to rummage around as they please, looking for stolen goods or other contraband, such as controlled substances, unquestionably they would solve more crimes and put more thieves, burglars, drug peddlers, and other criminal characters in jail. But the price would be prohibitively high, since it would entail the destruction of a cherished aspect of privacy. Similarly, if the police were completely free to torture suspects, more confessions would be secured, and the conviction rate would rise significantly, but again, other values must be weighed in the balance. These values include avoiding the risk of convicting innocent people who cannot endure the pain and avoiding the danger of encouraging unprofessional, brutal police conduct which employs uncivilized methods shocking to the conscience. Obviously, choices must be made between the desire to catch and punish lawbreakers and our concern for maintaining the legal amenities of a civilized society. The search for a tolerable balance between these competing objectives is what much of our constitutional law is all about. As Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS remarked, in An Almanac of Liberty (1954), "a degree of inefficiency is a price we necessarily pay for a civilized, decent society. The free state offers what a police state denies—the privacy of the home, the dignity and peace of mind of the individual." Aside from the fact that one hundred percent law enforcement would make the building of additional jails the highest priority of the country, it simply cannot be achieved without devoting resources far beyond what we can afford, considering all the other important functions for which government is responsible, and without resorting to methods that are almost universally deplored in civilized countries.

The various rights secured for the accused by our constitutional law are not technicalities; due process of law is at the center of our concept of justice. The overall purpose of our legal system is not so much to secure convictions as to render justice. Our rules of constitutional law are not only designed to protect people who are in trouble with the law but also to assure us that those who are engaged in the often exciting business of law enforcement will observe those time-tested rules which in large measure constitute the essence of fair procedure. "Let it not be overlooked," Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, dissenting in SHAUGHNESSY V. UNITED STATES (1953), wrote, "that due process of law is not for the sole benefit of the accused. It is the best insurance for the Government itself against those blunders which leave lasting stains on a system of justice. . . ."

There are additional compelling reasons that explain and support our legal system's concern for protecting the rights of persons accused of crime. For one thing, a criminal case is essentially a contest between an individual and a government, that is to say, between parties of vastly unequal strength. This disparity in the strength of the parties is especially visible in the modern age of powerful governments. The teaching of experience the world over is that inequality tends to beget injustice, and where the parties are so unequal, a determined effort must be made to redress the imbalance of power. Thus, the accused is entitled to seek a reversal of a conviction in an appellate court, but the prosecution may not get an acquittal reversed, for the double jeopardy principle forbids it. In this respect, the scales of justice are tipped in favor of the weaker party.

In addition, our concern for the defendant's rights rests upon an understanding that for most people it is a very serious matter indeed to be accused by the government of having committed a crime. The possible consequences range from loss of employment to disruption of family life, injury to reputation, and, ultimately, loss of personal liberty. It follows that one accused of crime is likely to be in such deep trouble that he or she must have every opportunity to combat the charges, as fully, as quickly, and as decisively, as possible. Many rights—bail, a public and SPEEDY TRIAL, CONFRONTATION, of accusers, and assistance of counsel—facilitate an early and effective defense, or at the very least, make one possible.

Furthermore, one of the major purposes of assuring a full measure of due process of law is to promote the sense of community by giving all of us the feeling that even guilty persons have been treated fairly. As Justice Douglas observed in Brady v. Maryland (1963), "Society wins not only when the guilty are convicted but when criminal trials are fair; our system of the administration of criminal justice suffers when any accused is treated unfairly." As Justice Brennan said in FURMAN V. GEORGIA (1972), "Even the vilest criminal remains a human being possessed of common human dignity."

In a larger sense, our body of procedural law in the criminal field seeks to combat abuse of the POLICE POWER of the state. Police brutality is the hallmark of totalitarian and dictatorial systems of government. The twentieth century has been well schooled in the fearful menace of the midnight knock on the door, the ransacking of private dwellings by the police without legal warrant, the use of torture to break the will, and the ultimate indignity of incarceration in brutal concentration camps. For these compelling reasons our constitutional law was deliberately formulated to prevent the unrestrained exercise of police power.

Indeed, if one looks closely at the elements of the constitutional right to a FAIR TRIAL it becomes clear that for every rule there is a persuasive reason. The basic rights of the accused are responses to our concrete historical experience. Why, for example, does American constitutional law assure defendants representation by counsel? The answer was explained with convincing clarity by Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND in POWELL V. ALABAMA (1932):

> The right to be heard would be, in many cases, of little avail if it did not comprehend the right to be heard by counsel. Even the intelligent and educated layman has small and sometimes no skill in the science of law. If charged with crime, he is incapable, generally, of determining for himself whether the indictment is good or bad. He is unfamiliar with the rules of evidence. Left without the aid of counsel he may be put on trial without a proper charge, and convicted upon incompetent evidence, or evidence irrelevant to the issue or otherwise inadmissible. He lacks both the skill and knowledge adequately to prepare his defense, even though he has a perfect one. He requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him.

In GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963), the case that extended the RIGHT TO COUNSEL in state courts to all persons charged with felonies, Justice HUGO L. BLACK argued that it was an obvious truth that a person too poor to hire a lawyer cannot be assured a fair trial. He pointed out that government spends vast sums of money to engage the services of lawyers to prosecute, and that few defendants who can afford them fail to hire the best lawyers they can find to present their defenses, from which it follows that "lawyers in criminal courts are necessities, not luxuries."

To cite another example, in all American jurisdictions, state and federal, double jeopardy—which means essentially putting a person on trial twice for the same offense—is forbidden. Once a defendant has been tried and acquitted, he may not be put on trial a second time, even though the prosecution has found fresh relevant evidence not previously available to it or has discovered that serious legal errors were made at the trial. As explained by Justice Black in Green v. United States (1957): "The underlying idea, one that is deeply ingrained in at least the Anglo-American system of jurisprudence, is that the State with all its resources and power should not be allowed to make repeated attempts to convict an individual for an alleged offense, thereby subjecting him to embarrassment, expense, and ordeal and compelling him to live in a continuing state of anxiety and insecurity, as well as enhancing the possibility that even though innocent he may be found guilty."

There are equally persuasive reasons for the guarantee of trial by jury. Justice BYRON R. WHITE noted, in the landmark case of DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968), that the right of trial by jury is "an inestimable safeguard against the corrupt or overzealous prosecutor and against the compliant, biased, or eccentric judge." The jury, one of the distinctive features of Anglo-American jurisprudence, is the result of several centuries of concrete experience; it has changed in the past, in many different ways, and it is still a dynamic institution. The authors of the Constitution were thoroughly familiar with the jury system and made careful provision for it in the original document, before the Bill of Rights filled in additional details. Thus, our criminal law procedure has always reflected a reluctance to entrust prosecutors and judges with unchecked powers over life and liberty.

Similarly, there are compelling reasons why American constitutional law protects the individual against UNREASONABLE SEARCHES AND SEIZURES, the main reason being the desire to protect the RIGHT OF PRIVACY. This "right to be left alone," as Justice Brandeis asserted in his notable dissenting opinion in Olmstead, is "the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized man." Fresh from his Nuremberg experience, Justice Robert Jackson wrote, in a spirited dissent in BRINEGAR V. UNITED STATES (1949), that the Fourth Amendment rights "are not mere second-class rights but belong in the catalog of indispensable freedoms. Among deprivation of rights, none is so effective in cowing a population, crushing the spirit of the individual and putting terror in every heart. Uncontrolled search and seizure is one of the first and most effective weapons in the arsenal of every arbitrary government." Justice Jackson also pointed out that because police officers are themselves the chief invaders of this right, the responsibility for protection against unreasonable searches and seizures has fallen on the courts.

An ancient teaching of English and American law is that to compel a person to convict himself or herself of a crime by being coerced into giving unwilling testimony is inadmissible. Our criminal jurisprudence makes the assumption that everyone is innocent until proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt on the basis of competent evidence; the prosecution has the duty to prove guilt. Because the accused is not required to establish his innocence, it follows that he cannot be required to supply testimony that would lead to a conviction. The Fifth Amendment's guarantee against compulsory self-incrimination is thus neither an alien nor a novel doctrine but rather, as Justice Douglas wrote in An Almanac of Liberty, "one of the great landmarks in man's struggle to be free of tyranny, to be decent and civilized. It is our way of escape from the use of torture. It is part of our respect for the dignity of man."

The rights of the accused in American criminal procedure are not static but respond to changing social values and moral concepts. This dynamism is reflected in the judicial interpretation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. Thus Chief Justice EARL WARREN wrote in TROP V. DULLES (1958): "The Amendment must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." Similarly, in FURMAN V. GEORGIA, the Supreme Court for the first time held that the death penalty is unconstitutional under certain circumstances, Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL observing that "a penalty that was permissible at one time in our Nation's history is not necessarily permissible today." The court similarly made new law when it ruled in Estelle v. Gamble (1976) that deliberate indifference of a jailer to the medical needs of prisoners constituted an "unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain" proscribed by the Eighth Amendment. Similarly, the right to be free from unreasonable searches or seizures had to be given a progressively broadened scope as we moved into the age of electronic gadgetry. Given the dynamic character of American life, flexibility of interpretation was inevitable if a living Constitution was to retain its vitality, and the broad and generous character of constitutional language contributed to that flexibility.

Many policy questions relating to criminal procedure must be understood in the context of the federal character of the American system of government. Certain important powers are delegated by the Constitution to the national government, and except as the states are limited by that Constitution—which is the supreme law of the land—the TENTH AMENDMENT confirms that the states retain power over all other matters. One of the most important residual powers of the states is the power to define and punish crimes. Although Congress was not expressly empowered to enact a general code of criminal statutes, it was assumed from the beginning that the national government could enforce its laws by imposing criminal sanctions. The doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS provided the necessary doctrinal underpinning. For example, the delegated power to tax includes by implication the power to punish persons who commit tax frauds. The federal criminal code has expanded steadily since 1789 and is today a lengthy document. Even so, most criminal laws are state laws, and a very large majority of persons in jail are incarcerated in state institutions. That the criminal law in all its facets is mainly state law is a well-understood fact of American life. In a special message to Congress in 1968, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON pointed out that crime "is essentially a local matter. Police operations—if they are to be effective and responsible—must likewise remain basically local. This is the fundamental premise of our constitutional structure and of our heritage of liberty." It follows, said the President, that "the Federal Government must never assume the role of the Nation's policeman."

Decisions of state courts are not reviewable by the Supreme Court if they involve only issues of state law, as to which the highest state court speaks the last word. For example, a 1967 case involved an appeal from the Texas courts regarding the state's habitual-criminal statute. Under this statute, the trial jury is fully informed of previous criminal convictions and the state is not obliged to have a two-stage trial, one devoted to the pending charge and a second to a consideration of the previous convictions. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled in Spencer v. Texas that as a matter of national constitutional law the state is not required to provide a two-stage trial. Declining to interfere, the Court held that this matter is controlled by state procedural law; the Court is not "a rule-making organ for the promulgation of state rules of procedure."

There are, in fact, two avenues available to seek federal judicial review of the decisions of state courts in criminal cases. First of all, if a convicted defendant has taken whatever appeals are available to him under state law in the state courts and if he has sought review of a substantial federal (as distinguished from state law) question, then the Supreme Court has JURISDICTION to review the judgment on direct review if it chooses to do so. Second, one who is in custody following conviction in a state court and has exhausted his available postconviction state remedies may, in a proper case, assert his federal legal claim by applying to a federal district court for a writ of habeas corpus. Accordingly, whether through direct review by the Supreme Court or through habeas corpus proceedings, federal courts often correct state courts where federal rights have been denied. But federal courts do not sit merely to correct errors alleged to have occurred in state courts. As the Supreme Court said in Herb v. Pitcairn (1945), "Our only power over state judgments is to correct them to the extent that they incorrectly adjudge federal rights."

The key question, then, is: what is a federal right? A short answer is: any right arising under the Constitution of the United States, statutes of Congress, or treaties. But the provisions of the Constitution relating to basic rights are stated in vague and general language that does not in terms apply to the states. Indeed the Court held in a landmark case, BARRON V. BALTIMORE (1833), that the Bill of Rights did not apply to the states. This holding was based on the proposition that the Bill of Rights was intended only to supply additional protection from violations by the new, untested national government, and that wherever the states were limited by the constitution, the language to this effect was always explicit. Prior to the Civil War, federal court review of state criminal convictions under the Bill of Rights was not possible.

A major change in our whole system of government began in 1868 with the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Not until 1923, however, did the Supreme Court undertake to employ this clause as a limit on state criminal procedure. In the leading case of MOORE V. DEMPSEY, the Court held that a conviction in a trial dominated by a mob was a violation of due process and could be remedied by a federal court through issuance of a writ of habeas corpus. In such a proceeding the federal court must make an independent evaluation of the facts, even though the state's highest appellate court has upheld the correctness of the conviction. The Supreme Court, too, on direct review, began to reverse state convictions as violations of due process. In 1932 the Court ruled that the Sixth Amendment right to representation by counsel, at least in capital cases, is an indispensable element of a fair trial which is guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Later decisions extended the constitutional right to counsel in state courts to include any offense punishable by imprisonment for any period of time. Other decisions, most of which were made after World War II by the WARREN COURT, applied to the states, as due process requirements, most of the other provisions of the Bill of Rights which are designed to protect persons accused of crime. For example, in MAPP V. OHIO (1961) the Court extended to the states the EXCLUSIONARY RULE, long applicable in federal prosecutions by reason of the Fourth Amendment. Henceforth state courts, too, would be required to exclude from criminal trials all evidence secured as a result of unreasonable searches and seizures. Similarly, a state violates due process if it subjects a person to compulsory self-incrimination (MALLOY V. HOGAN, 1964), if it denies trial by jury at least where nonpetty offenses are involved (DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA, 1968), or if it subjects a defendant to the hazards of double jeopardy (BENTON V. MARYLAND, 1969). In fact, by 1970 all of the criminal procedure provisions of the Bill of Rights were made applicable to the states by way of Fourteenth Amendment due process, except the Fifth Amendment guarantee of indictment by grand jury and the Eighth Amendment prohibition of excessive bail. The bail guarantee very likely will be incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment when the issue comes to the Supreme Court in the proper form. All the other rights of the accused guaranteed by the Bill of Rights are now regarded as elements of Fourteenth Amendment due process, enforceable against the states through federal judicial process. In the words of the Court, they are "fundamental principles of liberty and justice," or are "basic in our system of jurisprudence," or are " FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS essential to a fair trial," or are "the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty." (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.)

Not only does Fourteenth Amendment due process now incorporate most of the Bill of Rights, it also has an independent force wholly outside of the Bill of Rights. For example, in the famous case of Mooney v. Holohan (1935), the Court ruled that a state has denied the accused due process of law if the prosecution has deceived the court and jury by presenting testimony known to be perjured. Similarly, in Jackson v. Virginia (1979), the Court ruled that a state court conviction can pass the test of Fourteenth Amendment due process only if a rational trier of fact could find that each essential element of the crime had been established "beyond a reasonable doubt."

The expansion of the list of federally enforceable constitutional rights available to defendants in state courts has come a long way in enlarging both the review powers of the Supreme Court and the habeas corpus jurisdiction of the federal district courts. The federal courts are establishing more and more standards in the area of criminal justice which the states are obliged to observe.

In operating the CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM, government must make some hard choices, since basic objectives undergirding that system often conflict. On the one hand, there is the due process model, preferred by the courts, which stresses our concern for maintaining the legal amenities of a civilized community. This process, adversarial and judicial in character, seeks to protect the dignity and autonomy of the individual. On the other hand, there is the crime control model, preferred by most law enforcement officials, which emphasizes the need to apprehend, try, and punish lawbreakers. The principal procedural objective is the quick, efficient, and reliable handling of persons accused of crime. The method is essentially administrative and managerial in character, operating, especially in respect to MISDEMEANORS, on assembly-line principles. Accordingly, many law enforcement officials are critical of what they see as the Supreme Court's tenderness on the subject of defendants' rights, arguing that change has been too rapid and too far-reaching. Impatience has even been expressed by a few Justices of the Court itself. An experienced California trial judge, Macklin Fleming, has gone so far as to accuse the Court of pursuing the unattainable objective of "perfect justice." It is difficult, perhaps impossible, to locate the exactly right balance between the due process model and the crime control model. But in seeking to achieve a tolerable balance the Supreme Court has moved with considerable caution, deciding one case at a time, and always within the mainstream of American culture and its dominant legal traditions.

DAVID FELLMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

CASPER, JONATHON D. 1972 American Criminal Justice: The Defendant's Perspective. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall.

CORTNER, RICHARD C. 1980 The Supreme Court and the Second Bill of Rights. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

FELLMAN, DAVID 1976 The Defendant's Rights Today. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

FLEMING, MACKLIN 1974 The Price of Perfect Justice. New York: Basic Books.

FRIENDLY, HENRY J. 1967 The Bill of Rights as a Code of Criminal Procedure, in Benchmarks. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

GOLDSTEIN, ABRAHAM S. 1960 The State and the Accused: Balance of Advantage in Criminal Procedure. Yale Law Journal 69:1149–1199.

PACKER, HERBERT L. 1964 Two Models of the Criminal Process. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 113:1–68.

CRIMINAL SYNDICALISM LAWS

Criminal syndicalism statutes were but one of several kinds of statutes punishing manifestations of unpopular thought and expression for their probable bad tendency enacted during and just after WORLD WAR I by many midwestern and western states. The laws were a response to the economic unrest of the postwar period, specifically to the doctrines and activities of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), and to the antiradical hysteria prompted by the Russian Revolution of 1917. Twenty-two states and territories enacted—and eight other states considered but rejected—criminal syndicalism statutes between 1917 and 1920. Attempts to enact a federal criminal syndicalism law in 1919 and 1920 came to nothing, but the Smith Act of 1940 was patterned after the earlier model.

The Idaho statute, the first of its kind and a model for those adopted by other states, defined criminal syndicalism as "the doctrine which advocates crime, sabotage, violence or other unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform." Offenses punished as FELONIES under such statutes included oral or written advocacy of criminal syndicalism; justifying commission of or attempts to commit criminal syndicalism; printing or displaying written or printed matter advocating or advising criminal syndicalism; organizing or being or becoming a member of any organization organized or assembled to teach or advocate criminal syndicalism, or even presence at such an assembly. Though most citizens and state legislators believed that these statutes were directed solely against the use or advocacy of force and violence, in practice they jeopardized FREEDOM OF SPEECH, because they were used to punish those who expressed or even held opinions offensive to the majority of the community.

Criminal syndicalism statutes almost uniformly survived constitutional challenges in the state courts. In WHITNEY V. CALIFORNIA (1927) the United States Supreme Court upheld the California Criminal Syndicalism Act; Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS's eloquent opinion, concurring only in the result, set forth the most sophisticated formulation of the theoretical foundations and practical applications of the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test previously formulated in other FIRST AMENDMENT cases. In Fiske v. Kansas (1927), the first decision overturning a conviction under a criminal syndicalism statute, the Supreme Court merely invalidated the statute's application, holding that the state had not shown that the defendant had advocated any but lawful methods to achieve the goals of the IWW. In DE JONGE V. OREGON (1937) a unanimous Court struck down the application of the Oregon Criminal Syndicalism Act to defendants who had merely attended a peaceful meeting of the Communist party; the Oregon legislature later repealed the statute. The labor troubles of the 1930s prompted efforts to strengthen existing criminal syndicalism laws, but these came to nothing, and several states followed Oregon's example in repealing their criminal syndicalism statutes. State criminal syndicalism statutes fell into disuse after the 1930s; in BRANDENBERG V. OHIO (1969) the Supreme Court declared the Ohio Criminal Syndicalism Act unconstitutional on its face, overruling Whitney, adopting the principles of Justice Brandeis's concurring opinion, and making successful prosecutions under criminal syndicalism statutes virtually impossible.

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

Bibliography

CHAFEE, ZECHARIAH, JR. 1941 Free Speech in the United States. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

DOWELL, ELDRIDGE FOSTER 1939 A History of Criminal Syndicalism Legislation in the United States. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science, Series 57, No. 1.

CRITICAL LEGAL STUDIES

"Critical legal studies" refers to a development in American jurisprudence in the late 1970s and 1980s. Its originators were self-consciously affiliated with leftist political movements. Their understanding of the law, including constitutional law, was influenced by the experience of the movements for CIVIL RIGHTS and against the VIETNAM WAR, in which, as they saw it, appeals to legality—in the form of saying that RACIAL DISCRIMINATION was unconstitutional and that the war was being conducted illegally—played an important but complex role. Their intellectual position was shaped in large measure by an understanding of American LEGAL REALISM that took realism's implications to be more radical than many of its first proponents may have believed. The radical reading of legal realism was supported, in critical legal studies, by an understanding of what were perceived as the intellectual difficulties of the liberal tradition, which produced the tensions that the realists attempted unsuccessfully to resolve.

The most direct legacy of legal realism to critical legal studies was the idea of indeterminacy. Critical legal studies understood the realist message to be that law, again including constitutional law, was shot through with "contradictions," in the sense that, at least in any socially significant case, legal arguments that were professionally defensible were available for a rather wide range of outcomes and rules, some of which might differ radically from others. According to critical legal studies, this indeterminacy resulted from the fact that the liberal tradition attempted to, but could not, suppress what Duncan Kennedy, an early proponent of critical legal studies, called "the fundamental contradiction" of social life—that people are both fearful of, and dependent upon, other people. In the critical legal studies analysis, the central themes of the liberal tradition, expressing suspicion of government efforts to promote "the good" in societies where there were fundamental differences over what constitutes the good, drew primarily on the fear of other people. Yet, according to critical legal studies, because social life necessarily places people in relations of dependence on each other, law cannot, and does not, simply express the fear of others. Rather, law attempts to express both aspects of the fundamental contradiction, which is what generates the possibility of acceptable legal arguments leading to radically different results.

To deal with the point that the indeterminacy thesis is in tension with the fact that lawyers can predict with some assurance how judges will resolve many contentious legal issues, even if the issues could in some sense be regarded as open to decision either way, critical legal studies relies on claims about law as ideology. In one version, influenced by Marxist social thought, indeterminacy is resolved in fact by the political predispositions of the judges, and predictability occurs because the judges, and lawyers too, are drawn from a relatively narrow range of social classes, whose interests they promote. The conspiratorial overtones of this account are reduced in another version of the argument that law is a form of ideology. This version, influenced by the work of Michel Foucault, argues that indeterminacy is resolved because on a higher level of abstraction some general ideology about reason and the state is embedded in modern culture, so that many of the more radical possibilities are ruled out of contention from the start.

Critical legal studies is a form of general jurisprudence, and the indeterminacy thesis was developed primarily in connection with private law. The critical legal studies analysis of constitutional law has two important strands. The first, drawing on the private law studies, is a critique of the distinction between public and private that pervades law and appears in constitutional law in the form of the STATE ACTION doctrine. According to that doctrine, the Constitution regulates only actions by government, leaving private parties free to shape their relations and to control their property without regard to constitutional norms.

One key element in the legal realist analysis of private law, however, was that the private law of property and contract could fairly be characterized as a form of delegating public authority to private individuals, subject always to public control through, for example, doctrines restricting the enforcement of contracts on the ground that they violate public policy. Given that analysis of private law, the state action doctrine appears incoherent, and for critical legal studies SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948), holding unconstitutional judicial enforcement of racially restrictive property covenants, is not an anomaly, as it is in many mainstream accounts of constitutional law, but is instead a necessary implication of the analysis of the publicprivate distinction.

The second important strand in the critical legal studies analysis of constitutional law has been the "critique of rights." The critique of rights applies the indeterminacy thesis to the individual rights provisions of the Constitution. Vacillation by the Supreme Court over the importance of intent versus effect in antidiscrimination law, for example, is taken to reflect not just the political shift from the WARREN COURT to the BURGER COURT and now the REHNQUIST COURT but also the indeterminacy of the idea of nondiscrimination itself. The critique of rights accepts the proposition that there is general agreement on the importance of certain FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS, so long as the claims are either that there are such rights (without specifying what they are) or that the rights are acknowledged and enforced in abstract terms. But, the critique of rights contends that, as is always the case when socially significant claims are made, when it comes to enforcing these abstract rights in particular contexts, neither the Constitution nor the Court's precedents even weakly determine what the Court does. Rather, what matters are the current political predispositions of the members of the Supreme Court, a fact that is reflected in the general understanding that we can talk about "conservatives" and "liberals" on the Court.

The critique of rights is augmented and given a political twist by an analysis of the Supreme Court as one of the branches of a unitary government. In this analysis, influenced by mainstream political science, the Court is treated as a political body whose central role, symbolized by the political processes by which Justices are appointed, is to act on behalf of those interests who control the political system over the medium to long run. With this political understanding as a background, the critique of rights argues that, as a general matter with some exceptions, the Supreme Court will interpret—and historically has interpreted—the individual rights provisions of the Constitution primarily to protect the interests of established groups, particularly the owners of large aggregations of property. LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), for an earlier period, and the Court's recent CAMPAIGN FINANCE decisions, for the modern period, exemplify the Court's commitment to an interpretation of the Constitution in the service of established power groups.

Apart from general challenges to the indeterminacy thesis across the board, the main criticism of the critique of rights has been offered by minority scholars and liberal defenders of the legacy of the Warren Court. For them, the Warren Court's decisions show that, at least on occasion, the Supreme Court's articulation of individual rights can both advance the interests of minority groups and express a vision of a way of organizing society in which existing holders of power might be displaced.

Most proponents of the critique of rights accept both of these points. As to the first, though, they make several points. First, if we examine the entire history of the Supreme Court, the Warren era appears almost as an aberration. Second, many of the Warren Court's decisions might be understood in political terms as advancing the political agenda of the NEW DEAL political coalition, which may have retained control of the courts after it shattered in the political branches. BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954, 1955), a key example used against the critique of rights, would be seen as the Court's enforcement of a national view against SEGREGATION—which was, among other things, embarrassing the United States during the period of Cold War ideological competition with the Soviet Union—against the wishes of a recalcitrant region. If the Warren Court was the judicial expression of the New Deal coalition, it is not surprising, according to the critique of rights, that when the New Deal coalition lost power in the political branches, the Supreme Court eventually abandoned the Warren Court's ideology.

The critique of rights also argues, in response to both of the minority challenges, that the appeal to rights may indeed be a way of expressing opposition to the existing social order, but that those appeals may also be politically damaging. The appeal to rights can be politically damaging because it may divert resources into litigation and a focus on the courts. According to this view, successful legal appeals to rights may sometimes be more harmful than unsuccessful ones. Having secured one victory in the courts, a minority movement may rest on its laurels, relying on the courts to continue to protect its interests and overlooking the fact that permanent victories occur, given the role of the courts in the political system, only if the winners in the courts eventually secure the backing of the political branches. In addition, once a movement achieves a major victory in the courts, such as ROE V. WADE (1973) was for the women's movement, it may make the reasonable short-term judgment that it should devote resources to further judicial action—for example, relying on the courts to strike down laws aimed at undermining or whittling away at Roe. This would allow its opponents to adopt the strategy (which may be more successful in the long run) of influencing state and local legislatures, Congress, and the President.

In this view, however, the appeal to rights can also be an expression of opposition to the established order, precisely because the indeterminacy of law rests on the fundamental contradiction of social life. That contradiction means that any system of law contains competing views of the good social order. Thus, adherents of utopian visions of an alternative social order can argue that their preferred social order would realize values already acknowledged in the law but imperfectly implemented in the present order. In addition, the general public respect for fundamental human rights—at least when they are stated in the abstract—gives the advocate of some novel right or of the extension of an acknowledged right an initial rhetorical advantage in public discussions of those claims.

According to the critique of rights, then, the utility of appeals to rights will depend on a careful analysis of the particular circumstances and settings in which the appeals are made. If a social movement can rely on the language of rights without diverting its resources into litigation, for example, many of the disadvantages of the appeals to rights disappear. Yet, although the idea of making appeals to rights without relying on the courts is sensible, in the political culture of the United States, people who invoke rights but do not seek to have the courts implement them are likely to be seen as using a form of language that their behavior belies. Similarly, political circumstances sometimes are favorable for the use of the utopian appeals to rights in litigation as a method of securing legal victories or as a method of mobilizing a constituency. Such favorable circumstances appear to have been present for the civil rights movement during the Warren era. Proponents of the critique of rights would caution, however, that careful analysis of the particulars is necessary in order to make a judgment about whether the advantages of an appeal to rights outweigh the disadvantages.

With the apparent dissolution of much of the Warren Court legacy on the Supreme Court in the late 1980s, the critical legal studies perspective on constitutional law may gain some added force, for the Warren era may become understood as the kind of aberration that critical legal studies has always contended it was. On the other hand, to the extent that critical legal studies is a self-consciously leftist political movement, leftists and liberals may find recourse to the language of rights even more essential in a conservative era.

MARK TUSHNET
(1992)

Bibliography

KELMAN, MARK 1987 A Guide to Critical Legal Studies. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

TUSHNET, MARK 1988 Red, White, and Blue: A Critical Analysis of Constitutional Law. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

UNGER, ROBERTO 1986 The Critical Legal Studies Movement Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

CRITICAL RACE THEORY

Critical race theory embraces a movement of leftist scholars, most of them scholars of color situated in law schools, whose work challenges the ways in which race and racial power are constructed and represented in American legal culture and more generally in American society. Although critical race theory scholars differ in object, argument, accent, and emphasis, their work is unified by two common interests. The first is to understand how a regime of white supremacy and its subordination of people of color have been maintained in America, and, in particular, to examine the relationship between that social structure and professed ideals such as "the RULE OF LAW" and "EQUAL PROTECTION". The second is a desire not merely to understand the vexed bond between law and racial power but to change it. Critical race theory scholars share an ethical commitment to human liberation—even as they reject conventional notions of what such a conception means, and often disagree among themselves over the specific directions of change.

Critical race theory expresses deep dissatisfaction with traditional mainstream CIVIL RIGHTS discourse, which has been shaped in terms that exclude radical or fundamental challenges to status quo institutional practices in American society by treating the exercise of racial power as rare and aberrational rather than as systemic and ingrained. In this view, liberal race reform, by reinforcing the basic myths of American meritocracy, has served to legitimize the very social practices—in employment offices and admission departments—that were originally targeted for reform. Critical race theory scholars have drawn important insights from the CRITICAL LEGAL STUDIES movement's critique of the role of law in constituting and rationalizing an unjust social order. In particular they agree with critical legal studies scholars in rejecting a traditional view that distinguishes law from politics, holding that politics is open-ended, subjective, discretionary, and ideological, whereas law is determinate, objective, bounded, and neutral. Critical race theory scholars embrace the critical legal studies critique of this view, but they part company with one strand of critical legal studies scholarship that deploys a certain postmodern critique of racial identity to challenge the coherence of any intellectual project centered on race. Critical race theory scholars have framed this particular critique as an attack against color-consciousness that differs from the recent conservative devotion to "col-orblindness" only in its rhetorical politics. For critical race theory scholars, even though race is socially constructed—the idea of biological race is "false"—race is nonetheless real in the sense that there is a material dimension and weight to the experience of being "raced" in American society, a materiality that in significant ways has been produced and sustained by law.

Critical race theory scholarship thus offers a theoretical vocabulary for the practice of progressive racial politics in contemporary America, even as it seeks to expose the irreducibly political character of the REHNQUIST COURT majority's hostility toward policies that would take race into account in redressing historical and contemporary patterns of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. One arena for deployment of critical race theory is the debate over AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, in which civil rights liberals have seemed unwilling to see the hidden racial dimensions of the meritocratic mythology that their conservative opponents have so deftly used to control the terms of current debate. Critical race theory understands that, claims to the contrary notwithstanding, distributions of power and resources that were racially determined before the advent of affirmative action will continue to produce predictable patterns of racial disempowerment if affirmative action be abandoned. The conceptions of merit employed by opponents of affirmative action function not as a rational basis for distributing resources and opportunity, but rather as a repository of hidden, race-specific preferences for those who have the power to determine the meaning and consequences of "merit." Critical race theory scholars have shown that the putatively neutral baseline from which affirmative action is said to represent a deviation is in fact a mechanism for perpetuating the distribution of rights, privileges, and opportunity established under a regime of uncontested white supremacy. A return to that so-called neutral baseline would mean a return to an unjust system of racial power.

Critical race theory can also bring a useful perspective to the debate over the proliferation of economic, political, and social relations across national borders which has come to be known as globalization. In this perspective, generalized references to "north" and "south" or to "rich" and "poor" nations figure as metaphorical substitutes for serious and sustained attention to the racial and ethnic character of the massive distributive transformations that globalization has set in motion. An indifference to questions of racial ideology and power is seen in liberal and leftist efforts to emphasize questions of class structure in explaining the political significance of global economic processes within the United States. These explanations leave out the current dynamics of racial power, ignoring the racial composition of the communities that have been chosen to bear the sharp edge of economic dislocation. Yet, even a cursory review of current national discourses about issues such as public education, IMMIGRATION, and WELFARE reform demonstrates the degree to which questions of race and racial ideology stand at the very center of today's debates. These developments defy explanations in terms of liberal accounts of poverty and social inequality, or leftist formulations about the historical class relations between labor and capital. An inquiry informed by critical race theory would examine the way a certain brand of racial politics has been mobilized to buffer the massive upward distribution of resources and opportunity in the United States, and would explore the way racial ideologies have been used to justify relatively open border policies toward our northern neighbors, even as we close off our borders to those from the south.

Finally, critical race theory scholars seek to contribute to the discussion within communities of color over the future direction of antiracist politics. Powerful voices of racialism have been raised, particularly within the African American community, in which contemporary racial crisis is frequently represented as a reflection of unmediated white power. What racialists too often fail to note is that the same narrow politics of racial solidarity helped to rally African Americans behind the nomination of CLARENCE THOMAS to the Supreme Court. Justice Thomas has been an active participant in the evisceration of the post– civil rights political coalition. Similarly, the black racialist account proffers a vision of racism that portrays racial power primarily through its impact on African American males. By rendering the particular experiences of black females invisible, this form of racialist politics effectively denies the struggle against racialized gender oppression a place on the antiracist agenda.

Questioning regnant visions of racial meaning and racial power, critical race theorists seek to fashion a set of tools for thinking about race that will avoid the traps of racial thinking. Political interventions that overlook the multiple ways in which people of color are situated and resituated as communities, subcommunities, and individuals will do little to promote effective countermobilization against today's newly empowered right. Critical race theory scholars have sought to prevent this waste of political effort by illuminating the ways in which issues of racial ideology and power continue to matter in American life.

KIMBERLÉ CRENSHAW
NEIL GOTANDA
GARY PELLER
KENDALL THOMAS
(2000)

Bibliography

CRENSHAW, KIMBERLÉ; GOTANDA, NEIL; PELLER, GARY; and THOMAS, KENDALL, eds. 1995 Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings That Formed the Movement. New York: New Press.

DELGADO, RICHARD, ed. 1995 Critical Race Theory: The Cutting Edge. Philadelphia: Temple Uiversity Press.

CRITTENDEN, JOHN J.
(1787–1863)

A Kentucky lawyer, John Jordan Crittenden was a United States attorney general (1841, 1850–1853) and senator (1817–1819, 1835–1841, 1842–1848, 1855–1861). In late 1828 President JOHN QUINCY ADAMS nominated him to the Supreme Court, but the Senate's Democratic majority killed the appointment. A border state Whig, Crittenden always supported compromise on slavery. Thus, as President Millard Fillmore's attorney general, Crittenden vigorously enforced the 1850 fugitive slave law. But he also opposed ANNEXATION OF TEXAS, the Mexican War, the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT, and Kansas statehood, because these issues raised the politically disruptive question of SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES. In December 1860 Crittenden proposed four resolutions and six constitutional amendments to settle the SECESSION crisis. The resolutions condemned the northern PERSONAL LIBERTY LAWS and reasserted the constitutionality of the fugitive slave laws. The amendments—one of which declared the others "unrepealable"—would have compensated masters for unrecovered fugitive slaves and given permanent protection to slavery where it already existed and in all existing territories or those "hereafter acquired" which were south of the MISSOURI COMPROMISE line. Crittenden's only concession to northern sentiments was to propose the permanent prohibition of slavery north of the Missouri Compromise line; however, many Northerners read "hereafter acquired" as an invitation for proslavery filibustering in Latin America. Furthermore, Republicans opposed any western extension of slavery. Southern extremists, on the other hand, wanted secession, and not compromise. Thus, only the amendment permanently protecting slavery in the existing states was approved by Congress. From 1861 to 1863 Crittenden worked to prevent Kentucky's secession and limit the war to preserving the Union. Thus, he opposed the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION, the CONFISCATION ACTS, the use of black troops, West Virginia statehood, and other administration policies.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

KIRWAN, ALBERT D. 1962 John J. Crittenden: The Struggle for the Union. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.

CROLY, HERBERT
(1869–1930)

New York journalist and social critic Herbert David Croly was the leading intellectual of the Progressive movement. Croly's The Promise of American Life (1909) became the programmatic handbook of the reformers: in it he advocated strengthening the federal government as the special protector of working people and the creation of a "WELFARE STATE." His inspiration was the nationalism of ALEXANDER HAMILTON rather than the individualism of THOMAS JEFFERSON. Croly believed that the process of government should be separated from politics and placed in the hands of experts. Croly advised President WOODROW WILSON, but his greatest influence on public affairs was as editor of The New Republic.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

CROSS-EXAMINATION, RIGHT OF

See: Confrontation, Right of

CROSSKEY, WILLIAM W.
(1894–1968)

William Winslow Crosskey's reputation as a constitutional historian rests upon his Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States (1953, 1960), a learned, controversial reinterpretation of the framing of the Constitution. Crosskey, a professor of law at the University of Chicago, argued that the Framers of the Constitution sought to create a unitary system of government with virtually unlimited legislative powers, that Congress would have supreme authority within the constitutional system, and that the power of JUDICIAL REVIEW was intended merely as a means for the judiciary to defend itself against encroachments by the other branches of government. Crosskey began with two premises: first, that the words of the Constitution should be understood according to the meanings they had in common usage in 1787; and, second, that the source relied upon by most historians to determine the intent of the Framers, JAMES MADISON'S Notes of the Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787, had been deliberately distorted by Madison to support the "limited-powers" interpretation of the Constitution favored by Jeffersonian Republicans. Crosskey's third volume, completed posthumously by William W. Jeffrey, Jr., and published in 1980, asserted that nationalist sentiments and ideas pervaded the political climate in the United States from the Revolution to the opening of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787.

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT

The Eighth Amendment provides that "excessive BAIL shall not be required . . . nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted." Similar provisions now exist in virtually all state constitutions. Even if they did not, the federal constitutional prohibition has been held in Robinson v. California (1962) to be binding on the states through the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT'S DUE PROCESS CLAUSE.

A legal prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment appears to have originated in the English BILL OF RIGHTS in 1688. Its purpose then was to curtail the shockingly barbarous punishments that were so common during that period.

How the prohibition was to be applied to American society, with its different values and legal system, remained unclear a century after the enactment of the American BILL OF RIGHTS. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Supreme Court did occasionally interpret the cruel and unusual punishment language, mostly as it related to the means for executing CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. However, not until the 1970s did the Supreme Court begin to give extensive consideration to the scope and meaning of the prohibition apart from capital punishment. The Court did not decide until 1977, for example, whether the cruel and unusual punishment clause applied to persons who had not been convicted of crime. INGRAHAM V. WRIGHT (1977) raised the question whether the corporal punishment of school children constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The Court held that it did not, stating that the Eighth Amendment provision is applicable only to persons convicted and incarcerated for crimes. In the Court's view, the prohibition was not necessary to protect children in public institutions, as other protections were available. Since Ingraham, the Supreme Court has also held that the Eighth Amendment is inapplicable to persons detained for treatment or detention and not punishment, such as persons committed to mental institutions (Youngblood v. Romero, 1982) or detained awaiting trial (Bell v. Wolfish, 1979). Any protection against improper punishments in such situations derives from due process of law and not the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

Since the late 1970s, in a number of cases involving noncapital sentences and the treatment of prison inmates, the Court has generally given a narrow interpretation of the cruel and unusual punishment clause.

Prior to Supreme Court review of the issue, several federal and state courts had held that a sentence could be invalid on cruel and unusual punishment grounds if its length was disproportionate to the offense. Courts used several measures to determine whether a particular sentence violated the Eight Amendment: the nature of the crime, and particularly whether violence was involved; comparison of the individual sentence or statutory sentencing scheme with sentences or schemes for similar crimes in other jurisdictions; and comparison of the individual sentence or statutory sentencing scheme for the particular crime with those for other similar or more serious crimes in the same jurisdiction. Thus a federal court of appeals struck down a life sentence imposed on an offender under a Texas statute authorizing a life sentence for a person convicted of felonies on three separate occasions. In this case, the three felonies included: fraudulently using a credit card to obtain $80.00 worth of services; passing a forged check for $28.36; and obtaining $120.75 by false pretenses. The three convictions occurred over a nine-year period. In RUMMEL V. ESTELLE the Supreme Court reversed; the 5–4 majority refused to apply the comparative measures used by lower courts. Instead, it gave great weight to legislative judgments on criminal sentences and to the deterrence of habitual offenders. The fact that Rummel was eligible for early release on parole apparently eased the majority's decision. After Rummel, it was uncertain what circumstances might justify judicial intervention on cruel and unusual punishment grounds in cases not involving habitual offender statutes. In Hutto v. Davis (1982), in a PER CURIAM opinion, the Court, over three dissents, held that a forty-year sentence for possession of nine ounces of marijuana did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The Court reiterated the Rummel majority's view that federal courts should be "reluctan[t] to review legislatively mandated terms of imprisonment" and that "successful challenges to the proportionality of particular sentences" should be "exceedingly rare."

In 1983, in SOLEM V. HELM, however, the Supreme Court invalidated a life sentence without possibility of parole for a person convicted under a recidivist statute. The immediate charge involved passing a check for one hundred dollars written on a nonexistent account; all his prior felony convictions were for nonviolent crimes against property. The Court, in a 5–4 decision, applied a proportionality test in applying the cruel and unusual punishment clause. Even after this decision, it appears that the burden of attacking a sentence of a term of years on disproportionality grounds, at least in the federal courts, will be difficult to carry. Some state supreme courts have been more willing to use state constitutional counterparts to the Eighth Amendment to strike down terms that seem excessive relative to the crime committed.

In earlier cases, the Supreme Court did reverse some sentences involving issues other than their length. In TROP V. DULLES (1958), for example, the Court concluded that depriving a person of nationality for conviction by court-martial of wartime desertion constituted cruel and unusual punishment. Also, in WEEMS V. UNITED STATES (1909), the Court held that the crime of being an accessory to the falsification of a public document could not justify a twelve-to-twenty-year sentence at hard labor with chains and a permanent deprivation of civil rights.

The Supreme Court has also applied the Eighth Amendment to reverse the punishment of a person simply because of his status or condition. In Robinson v. California (1962) the Court held that punishing a person for being a drug addict constitutes cruel and unusual punishment. The Court refused, however, to apply this same reasoning six years later when it was asked to invalidate an alcoholic's conviction of public drunkenness in Powell v. Texas (1968).

In summary, the Supreme Court has rarely relied on the federal prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment to overturn a criminal sentence. The Court has also applied the prohibition sparingly to challenges by prisoners to prison conditions, even though courts have frequently found these conditions to be shocking.

Without question, most prisons throughout the country are archaic, overcrowded, filthy, and understaffed, and provide few worthwhile vocational or recreational activities for prisoners. Because the prison population is growing dramatically at a time when resources to maintain it are shrinking proportionately, prison conditions are deteriorating. In several cases in the late 1970s and early 1980s, the Supreme Court attempted to articulate standards for applying the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment to challenges against prison conditions. In Rhodes v. Chapman (1981) the Court summarized these standards as follows: "Today the Eighth Amendment prohibits punishments which, although not physically barbarous, involve the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, or are grossly disproportionate to the severity of the crime. Among unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain are those that are totally without penological justification." The Court has not yet applied these standards to the intentional physical abuse of prisoners. It has, however, cited with approval a court of appeals decision, Jackson v. Bishop (1968), which proscribed the whipping of prisoners.

Holt v. Finney (1978) confronted the Supreme Court with its first Eighth Amendment challenge to prison conditions. The lower courts had declared that the general conditions of the Arkansas state prison system constituted cruel and unusual punishment. Among the conditions challenged were: administration of much of the prisons' activities by inmate trustees; dangerous barracks; overcrowded and filthy conditions in isolation or punishment cells and the poor diet of prisoners in these cells; and lack of any rehabilitation programs. The lower courts entered sweeping orders requiring major improvements in the prisons. Among these improvements were restrictions on the numbers of prisoners placed in isolation cells, a requirement that bunks be placed in these cells, a discontinuation of the "grue" diet, and a limit of thirty days in an isolation cell. The state appealed the thirty-day limitation. In a cautious opinion, the Supreme Court upheld the lower court's conclusion. Although it held that confinement in punitive isolation is not a per se violation of the Eighth Amendment, the Court stated that such confinement may become a violation depending on the conditions of isolation. If violations do occur, the Court said, remedies may include a limit on the time to be spent in isolation; the thirty-day restriction of the lower court seemed supportable in this case.

The Supreme Court reached a different result in a constitutional challenge to overcrowding in an Ohio prison. In Rhodes v. Chapman (1981) the issue was "double-bunking" prisoners in cells originally designed for single inmates. The courts below had found this practice to violate the Eighth Amendment because prisoners were serving long sentences; the prison was thirty-eight percent over capacity; decency required more living space; prisoners spent much of their time in their cells; and double-bunking was a regular practice, not a temporary condition.

The Supreme Court reversed, holding that there was no evidence that double-bunking in this case "inflicted unnecessary or wanton pain or [was] grossly disproportionate to the severity of crimes warranting punishment." The Court found that double-bunking did not lead to "deprivation of essential food, medical care, or sanitation" or to increased violence among inmates. In the Court's view, the Constitution "does not mandate comfortable prisons," and judges should be reluctant to intervene in prison condition cases unless the conditions were "deplorable" or "sordid": "In discharging [their] oversight responsibility, however, [federal] courts cannot assume that State legislatures and prison officials are insensitive to the requirements of the Constitution or to the perplexing sociological problems of how best to achieve the penal function in the criminal justice system."

In another opinion, Estelle v. Gamble (1976), the Supreme Court established some minimum requirements for the provision of health care in prisons. Stating that the government must provide medical care to those whom it punishes by incarceration, the Court held that "deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of prisoners constitutes unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain proscribed by the Eighth Amendment." The Court placed several limits on successful claims, however. For example, an inadvertent failure to provide adequate medical care would not constitute "unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain." Nor would an accident, simple negligence, or a disagreement as to treatment options.

Thus, although the Supreme Court had indicated that the Eighth Amendment does protect prisoners from deplorable conditions, for the most part the Court has not shared the view of many lower courts or of prison experts as to what conditions are deplorable.

The Supreme Court has yet to consider a number of other important questions, such as the factors that must be weighed in assessing challenges to the conditions of a prison as a whole; the constitutional limits on behavior modification programs, including drug usage programs; and the minimum requirements for providing a secure environment for prisoners. Precedent suggests that the Supreme Court will be as cautious in addressing these and other related prison condition issues as it has been in confronting other asserted impositions of cruel and unusual punishment.

SHELDON KRANTZ
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Institutional Litigation.)

Bibliography

GRANNUCCI, ANTHON F. 1969 Nor Cruel and Unusual Punishment Inflicted. California Law Review 57:839–865.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LEGAL STATUS OF PRISONERS 1977 American Bar Association Standards Relating to the Legal Status of Prisoners. American Criminal Law Review 14:377–629.

KRANTZ, SHELDON 1983 Corrections and Prisoners' Rights in a Nutshell, 2nd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

SHERMAN, MICHAEL and HAWKINS, GORDON 1981 Imprisonment in America: Choosing the Future. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

UNIFORM LAW COMMISSION 1978 Model Sentencing and Convictions Act. New York: National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

UNITED NATIONS ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL 1957 Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners. New York: United Nations Publications.

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT
(Update 1)

The Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment clause, derived from COMMON LAW and held to restrain the states as well as the federal government, applies to noncapital as well as capital criminal punishments. The concept of cruel and unusual punishments, while undoubtedly meant to address extremely harsh or painful methods and kinds of PUNISHMENT, also incorporates ideas of excessiveness, proportionality, and appropriateness. It is therefore relative, and whether a particular punishment is cruel and unusual depends on prevailing societal standards, objectively determined, regarding punishments. The Supreme Court has held that the clause outlaws not only punishments that are barbarous, involving torture or the intentional and unjustifiable infliction of unnecessary pain, but also forbids confinements whose length or conditions are disproportionate to the severity of crimes, serious deprivations of prisoners' basic human needs, loss of CITIZENSHIP as a punishment, and punishments for status.

In WEEMS V. UNITED STATES (1910) the Court held the Philippine punishment of cadena temporal unconstitutional as applied. The imposed punishment for the crime of making a false entry in a public record—not shown to have injured anyone—was fifteen years' imprisonment at hard and painful labor with chains, loss of CIVIL LIBERTIES, and governmental surveillance for life. The Court, in Estelle v. Gamble (1976), also held that deliberate indifference to a prisoner's serious medical needs constitutes cruel and unusual punishment. In Hutto v. Finney (1978) it upheld a lower court's conclusion that routine conditions in the Arkansas prison system were so inhumane as to be cruel and unusual. Earlier, the Court had determined in TROP V. DULLES (1968) that imposing loss of citizenship on a native-born citizen for desertion in wartime was cruel and unusual because it destroyed the person's political existence and made him stateless. In implicit recognition that states may define as crimes only acts, conduct, or behavior, the Court, in Robinson v. California (1962), held criminal imprisonment for the status of being a drug addict, unaccompanied by any acts, cruel and unusual.

The question to what degree the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment clause may limit the power of a state to define the length of a prison sentence has been troublesome. The issue arises most often in challenges to recidivist statutes mandating life sentences on persons having three or more consecutive felony convictions or to sentencing statutes requiring extremely long sentences for those convicted of small drug offenses. Originally, in a number of cases raising disproportionate-length challenges to such statutes, the Court took the view that legislatures had extremely wide latitude in setting felony sentence lengths and that it would rarely, if ever, find such statutes unconstitutional. Thus, in RUMMEL V. ESTELLE (1980) the Court upheld a life sentence imposed on a person who was separately convicted and imprisoned for three nonviolent felonies, involving illegally acquiring money in the amounts of $80, $28.36, and $120.75. The only mitigation in the sentence was a possibility of parole after twelve years. In Hutto v. Davis (1982) the defendant received a sentence of forty years in prison and a fine of $20,000 for possession and distribution of nine ounces of marijuana, and the Court upheld this statute as well, although the average sentence for similar offenders was approximately three years.

Although these two cases suggested that the Court, in practice, did not accept any constitutional standard of length proportionality in felony cases, in a subsequent case a different Court majority strongly endorsed and articulated just such a standard. In SOLEM V. HELM (1983) the Court struck down, as uconstitutionally disproportionate in length, a sentence of life imprisonment without possibility of parole for a defendant convicted for a seventh felony, which involved uttering a "no-account" check for $100. The Court held that although no sentence is per se unconstitutional, the cruel and unusual punishment clause requires that criminal sentences must be proportionate to the crime for which the defendant has been convicted. The judgment whether a sentence is proportionate turns on an analysis guided by consideration of the gravity of the offense and harshness of the penalty; sentences imposed on other criminals in the same JURISDICTION; and sentences imposed on commission of the same crime in other jurisdictions. Solem, however, overturned no prior case law, and the current Court is strongly disposed to accept legislative judgments. The only reasonable conclusion to draw is that the principle of length proportionality is weak and, except in rare cases, unlikely to stand as a check on disparate and extremely long sentences.

GARY GOODPASTER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Prisoners' Rights.)

Bibliography

GRANUCCI, ANTHONY F. 1969 "Nor Cruel and Unusual Punishments Inflicted": The Original Meaning. California Law Review 57:839–865.

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT
(Update 2)

Three major trends in state and federal SENTENCING have dominated the punishment arena during the last two decades: first, the reduction of judicial discretion and the correlative enactment of fixed sentencing guidelines in non-CAPITAL PUNISHMENT cases; second, the adoption of severe prison terms for habitual offenders and for designated crimes, also known as "three strikes, you're out" (or CAREER CRIMINAL SENTENCING LAWS) and "mandatory minimum" statutes; and third, the implementation of new capital murder statutes after the Supreme Court's decision in Gregg v. Georgia (1976), as well as the more recent adoption of the death penalty by the federal government and by several states. These developments have presented a number of challenges to Eighth Amendment jurisprudence and have given rise to three important controversies: first, what proportionality test applies to noncapital sentences; second, whether the twin constitutional goals of consistency and individualized sentencing in capital cases can be reconciled; and third, whether the risk that RACIAL DISCRIMINATION may infect the imposition of the death penalty violates the Eighth Amendment.

The Court has been deeply divided over the proportionality test to apply in noncapital cases. In Harmelin v. Michigan (1991), a case involving a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole for the possession of 672 grams of cocaine, the Court severely narrowed the proportionality test that it had articulated in SOLEM V. HELM (1983). Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, joined by Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, invited the Court to eliminate all proportionality review in noncapital cases. Scalia and Rehnquist interpreted the Eighth Amendment to prohibit only certain modes of punishment (like drawing and quartering) and unusual penalties not prescribed by law. In the controlling, CONCURRING OPINION of Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, joined by Justices SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR and DAVID H. SOUTER, Kennedy preserved a narrow proportionality principle that "forbids only extreme sentences that are 'grossly disproportionate' to the crime," but nevertheless concluded that the sentence at issue was not grossly disproportionate. Kennedy relegated the analysis of the other two prongs of the earlier three-prong Solem proportionality test, namely intrajurisdictional and interjurisdictional comparative analyses, to cases where gross disproportionality is found.

In the capital context, the Court has articulated an intricate set of constitutional rules in an attempt to fulfill the mandate of Furman v. Georgia (1972) and Gregg to eliminate arbitrariness and ensure fairness in capital sentencing. The Court's opinions have pursued the twin Eighth Amendment objectives of consistency and individualized sentencing. In pursuit of consistency, the Court has narrowed the definition of permissible aggravating circumstances and required that the discretion of sentencing juries be channeled. In pursuit of individualized sentencing, the Court has required the admission of any mitigating evidence and the jury's consideration of that evidence. The increasing tension in recent years between these twin constitutional commands has led several members of the Court to conclude that they are simply incompatible. Former Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, dissenting from the denial of CERTIORARI in Callins v. Collins (1994), concluded that the Eighth Amendment's competing constitutional commands could not be reconciled and that the death penalty, as presently administered, violates the Eighth Amendment. Justices Scalia and CLARENCE THOMAS have joined Blackmun in acknowledging the incompatibility of the goals of consistency and individualized sentencing, but have instead decided to discard the principle of individualized sentencing.

Racial discrimination has continued to plague capital sentencing schemes in a number of states. The Baldus study found that, in Georgia during the 1970s, the likelihood of being sentenced to death for killing white victims was 4.3 times greater than the likelihood of being sentenced to death for killing black victims, holding constant 39 other nonracial explanatory variables. The study raised the possibility that considerations of race were injecting arbitrariness in the imposition of the death penalty. The Court assumed the validity of the Baldus study in MCCLESKEY V. KEMP (1986), but nevertheless concluded that the risk that racial bias infected the Georgia capital sentencing system was not significant under the Eighth Amendment.

BERNARD E. HARCOURT
(2000)

Bibliography

KENNEDY, RANDALL 1988 McCleskey v. Kemp: Race, Capital Punishment, and the Supreme Court. Harvard Law Review 101:1388–1443.

STEIKER, CAROL and STEIKER, JORDAN 1995 Sober Second Thoughts: Reflections on Two Decades of Constitutional Regulation of Capital Punishment. Harvard Law Review 109: 355–438.

SUNDBY, SCOTT E. 1991 The Lockett Paradox: Reconciling Guided Discretion and Unguided Mitigation in Capital Sentencing. UCLA Law Review 38:1147–1208.

CRUIKSHANK, UNITED STATES v.
92 U.S. 542 (1876)

Cruikshank paralyzed the federal government's attempt to protect black citizens by punishing violators of their CIVIL RIGHTS and, in effect, shaped the Constitution to the advantage of the Ku Klux Klan. The case arose out of a federal prosecution of nightriders responsible for the Colfax Massacre of 1873 in Grant Parish, Louisiana. Several hundred armed whites besieged a courthouse where hundreds of blacks were holding a public assembly; the attackers burned down the building and murdered about 100 people. The United States tried Cruikshank and others involved in the massacre and convicted three for violating section six of the FORCE ACT OF 1870. That act, which survives as section 241 of Title 18 of the United States Code, is a general conspiracy statute making it a federal crime, then punishable by a $5,000 fine and up to ten years in prison, for two or more persons to conspire to injure or intimidate any citizen with the intent of hindering his free exercise of any right or privilege guaranteed him by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

In a unanimous opinion by Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE, the Court ignored the statute and focused on the INDICTMENT to ascertain whether the rights Cruikshank and others interfered with were granted or secured by the United States. Reasserting the theory of dual CITIZENSHIP advanced in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873), Waite concluded that the United States cannot grant or secure rights not under its JURISDICTION. Examining in turn each right named in the indictment as having been deprived, Waite found that they were all "left under the protection of the States." None was a federal right. The right to peaceably assemble predated the Constitution and remained "subject to state jurisdiction." The United States could neither infringe it nor protect it, for it was not an attribute of United States citizenship. So too the right to bear arms. The right to be secure in one's person, life, and liberty was protected by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT against state deprivation, but for protection of that right, sovereignty "rests alone with the States." The amendment, said Waite, "adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another." Thus the violence here conducted by private persons could not be reached by Congress, which was limited to assuring that the states do not violate the amendment's prohibitions. As for the right to vote, the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT merely protected against discrimination based on race. The Constitution did not confer the right to vote on anyone; that right was not, Waite said, an attribute of national citizenship.

By such reasoning the Court held that the indictment did not show that the conspirators had hindered or prevented the enjoyment of any right granted or secured by the Constitution. Accordingly, no conviction based on the indictment could be sustained, and the Court ordered the defendants discharged. The conspiracy statute remained impotent until revived in recent times by the Department of Justice, but the Court did not sustain a conviction under the statute until 1966 (United States v. Price; United States v. Guest), when the Court vitiated Cruikshank.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

MAGRATH, C. PETER 1963 Morrison R. Waite. Pages 120–134. New York: Macmillan.

CRUZ v. BETO

See: Religious Liberty

CRUZAN v. DIRECTOR, MISSOURI DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

See: Right to Die

CULTS AND THE CONSTITUTION

The term "cult," currently used to designate a particular unpopular and feared new religious group often claiming a personal relationship between its leader and the Divinity, is not found explicitly in the original Constitution, the FIRST AMENDMENT's free exercise or establishment clause, or the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT'S EQUAL PROTECTION clause. Among the most prominent of these groups in recent times have been the Unification Church, the Worldwide Church of God, Inc., the Church of Scientology, and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness.

Cults, which have experienced varying degrees of discrimination and persecution by law enforcement officials, have consistently claimed that the Constitution does not sanction legal distinctions between them on the one hand and long-established and respected faiths on the other. They note, too, that historically most of the now well-established and fully respected faiths, including Baptists, Roman Catholics, Jews, Mormons, Christian Scientists, and Jehovah's Witnesses, have been subjected to governmental discrimination before achieving acceptability and equal treatment.

The claim to equal treatment was upheld in LARSON V. VALENTE (1982) where the Supreme Court held unconstitutional a Minnesota statute, enforced against the Unification Church, that imposed special registration and reporting requirements upon religious groups that received more than half of their income from nonmembers, a provision the Court found to have been aimed at unpopular cults. This provision, the Court said, constituted precisely the sort of official denominational preference and discrimination forbidden by the establishment clause in the absence of a compelling interest not otherwise amenable to protection. Moreover, the statute also violated the clause by authorizing excessive governmental entanglement with and politicizing of religion.

Compelling registration is only one comparatively mild sanction imposed by government upon religious cults. Although that term had not yet become popular in 1944, when United States v. Ballard was decided by the Supreme Court, that decision ruled unconstitutional a mail fraud conviction of "I Am" members who obtained donations by representing that their leader was divinely appointed with supernatural powers to heal the incurably ill. To allow a jury to determine the truth or falsity of religious doctrines, the Court said, would render vulnerable representations concerning the miracles of the New Testament, the divinity of Christ, life after death, and the power of prayer. The First Amendment permits only a determination whether the defendants themselves actually believed that what they recounted was true, not whether it was actually true.

Other devices applied against cults include denial of tax exemption, dissolution of the corporate structure and seizure of assets (as in CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS V. UNITED STATES, 1890), and prosecution for disturbance of the peace (as in CANTWELL V. CONNECTICUT, 1940, involving Jehovah's Witnesses).

Whatever may have been the Court's response in earlier times, today it accords cults the same constitutional protection accorded to long-standing and commonly accepted faiths.

LEO PFEFFER
(1986)

Bibliography

New York University Review of Law and Social Change 1979–1980 Volume 9, #1: Proceedings of Conference on Alternative Religions, Government Control and the First Amendment.

CUMBERLAND ROAD BILL

See: Internal Improvements

CUMMINGS, HOMER S. (1870–1956)

A prominent Connecticut Democrat, Homer S. Cummings served as attorney general under President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT from 1933 to 1939, defending much of the NEW DEAL legislation in the Supreme Court. He broke with recent practice when he personally argued the GOLD CLAUSE CASES (1935), and the Court reiterated much of his argument in its opinions. Cummings strongly supported Roosevelt's COURT-PACKING plan as "clearly constitutional" and privately suggested a constitutional amendment requiring justices to retire at seventy. With Carl McFarland, he wrote Federal Justice (1937), a history of the Department of Justice based on previously neglected manuscript materials. Cummings instituted reform of federal criminal and administrative procedures, helping secure adoption of the FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE in 1938.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

CUMMINGS v. MISSOURI

See: Test Oath Cases

CURFEW LAWS

See: Juvenile Curfew Laws

CURTILAGE

See: Open Fields Doctrine

CURTIS, BENJAMIN R.
(1809–1874)

Benjamin Robbins Curtis of Massachusetts generally rates high marks for his six-year tenure on the Supreme Court. His bold dissent in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), followed by his dramatic resignation, largely accounts for his reputation. Yet Curtis's contributions to the development of constitutional law transcend that one case.

Curtis's prominence in the Dred Scott case is ironic, considering the fact that he received his appointment in 1851 because he was a northern Whig, acceptable to southern slave interests. By that time, he already was a leading figure in Boston legal circles. He had been selected in 1846 to succeed Justice JOSEPH STORY as an overseer (trustee) of Harvard College, and he was highly regarded for his promotion of procedure and litigation reforms. In 1851 he represented the Boston school board against the desegregationists in ROBERTS V. CITY OF BOSTON. But most important, Curtis had also endorsed Senator DANIEL WEBSTER's efforts in the COMPROMISE OF 1850, had advocated strict enforcement of the new Fugitive Slave Act, and had fought abolitionists and free-soilers, even opposing CHARLES SUMNER's successful Senate campaign in 1851. Shortly afterward, President MILLARD FILLMORE, following Webster's recommendation, nominated Curtis to succeed Justice LEVI WOODBURY. The only criticism came from the abolitionist press. Southern politicians, however, were satisfied and the Democratic Senate quickly confirmed the appointment.

Curtis's first major opinion, in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1851), reflected both his legal skills and his willingness to follow the middle ground of his patron, Daniel Webster. The case involved the limiting effects of the COMMERCE CLAUSE on state regulation, a subject that had divided the TANEY COURT since 1837. Southerners feared congressional regulation of interstate traffic in slaves, and consequently sought to interpret the commerce power narrowly. In Cooley Curtis acknowledged broad congressional authority over foreign and INTERSTATE COMMERCE, but the case challenged the validity not of congressional action but of local pilotage regulations for the port of Philadelphia. Curtis devised a compromise between the EXCLUSIVE POWER and CONCURRENT POWER views. His doctrine of SELECTIVE EXCLUSIVENESS recognized exclusive congressional power over subjects demanding uniform national regulation, but invited state regulation, in cases where Congress had not acted, of subjects admitting of diverse local regulation.

Curtis again demonstrated a shrewd practicality coupled with an ability to make law responsive to new conditions when he upheld federal regulations of steamboat operations. In Steamboat New World v. King (1854) Curtis applied the emerging law of negligence to the rapidly expanding technology of steamboating. In addition, he confirmed that federal admiralty jurisdiction applied to all inland, navigable waters. A year before the Dred Scott controversy over the content of the Fifth Amendment's DUE PROCESS clause, Curtis had discussed the subject in MURRAY'S LESSEE V. HOBOKEN LAND AND IMPROVEMENT COMPANY (1856) and had followed a traditional procedural interpretation of the clause.

The understanding of Curtis's role in Dred Scott has shifted with historiographical tides. When it was fashionable to view the CIVIL WAR as a "reconcilable conflict," Curtis was seen as a provocateur; but when the Dred Scott decision is seen as Chief Justice ROGER TANEY's attempt to make the nation safe for slavery, Curtis's opinion emerges as a calm, reasoned historical and legal brief properly explicating national authority to regulate SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES. Curtis's opinion differed from Taney's conclusions in nearly every respect. He demonstrated historically that blacks could be American citizens, and hence could sue in the federal courts. Equally important, he offered constitutional language and long-standing historical precedent to justify congressional regulation of slavery in the territories. Curtis's comments on the need for judicial restraint were pointed: "To engraft on any instrument a substantive exception not found in it must be admitted to be a matter attended with great difficulty. . . . To allow this to be done with the Constitution, upon reasons purely political, renders its judicial interpretation impossible because judicial tribunals . . . cannot decide upon political considerations."

Curtis resigned a few months after the Dred Scott decision. He was dissatisfied with his circuit duties and his inadequate salary, and the Dred Scott imbroglio convinced him that he and his colleagues could no longer work together effectively and harmoniously.

During the Civil War, Curtis emerged as an outspoken critic of Lincoln's unprecedented exercise of PRESIDENTIAL POWERS. In good Whig fashion, he leveled constitutional attacks on Lincoln for suspending the writ of HABEAS CORPUS and for issuing the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION. Yet, following the war, he endorsed the sentiments of the National Union Convention in 1866 and advocated exclusive presidential control of reconstruction. Two years later, he joined WILLIAM M. EVARTS and others to represent President ANDREW JOHNSON in his IMPEACHMENT trial. Curtis's defense of the President argued that Johnson was not an "acting President," as some claimed, and that the TENURE OF OFFICE ACT unduly interfered with the President's constitutional prerogative to remove executive officers—an argument the Supreme Court came to accept half a century later. Finally, he offered a ringing affirmation of the FIRST AMENDMENT to defend Johnson against the charge that he had "improperly" spoken of Congress.

In his last years, Curtis had a lucrative law practice and argued more than fifty cases before the Supreme Court. Most noteworthy were his briefs in behalf of federal regulation of the insurance industry in PAUL V. VIRGINIA (1869) and his defense of the legal tender laws in Hepburn v. Griswold (1870).

Curtis's all too brief career on the Supreme Court must exclude him from a short list of truly great jurists. But he displayed uncommon skills, especially a talent for closely reasoned and logical arguments. His defense and understanding of the Constitution, on and off the bench, mark contributions that have been affirmed by the passage of time.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

CURTIS, GEORGE TICKNOR and CURTIS, BENJAMIN R., eds. 1879 Life and Writings of Benjamin Robbins Curtis. Boston: Little, Brown.

FEHRENBACHER, DON E. 1978 The Dred Scott Case: Its Significance in American Law and Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

LEACH, RICHARD H. 1952 Benjamin Robbins Curtis: Judicial Misfit. New England Quarterly 25:507–523.

CURTIS, GEORGE T.
(1812–1894)

A leading Boston attorney, George Ticknor Curtis ordered the rendition to SLAVERY of Thomas Sims in 1852 while serving as a Fugitive Slave Law Commissioner. (See SIMS' CASE.) In 1856 he represented Dred Scott before the United States Supreme Court in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD. Curtis wrote numerous legal treatises, three political biographies, and a two-volume History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution (1854–1858)—revised as Constitutional History of the United States (1889–1896). This work presents a classic Federalist-Whig interpretation of American political and constitutional history. It was begun at the suggestion of DANIEL WEBSTER and reflects the senator's approach to the Constitution and the Union.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

FISH, CARL RUSSELL 1930 George T. Curtis. Dictionary of American Biography, Vol. 4, pp. 613–614.

CURTISS-WRIGHT EXPORT CORPORATION, UNITED STATES v.
299 U.S. 304 (1936)

Nearly two years after Paraguay and Bolivia went to war in 1932, Congress authorized President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT to embargo American arms shipments to the belligerents if he found that the action might contribute to reestablishing peace. Indicted in January 1936 for conspiring to violate the embargo resolution and Roosevelt's implementing proclamation, Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation demurred on grounds of unconstitutional DELEGATION OF POWER. Recent rulings against NEW DEAL legislation in PANAMA REFINING CO. V. RYAN (1935) and SCHECHTER POULTRY CORP. V. UNITED STATES (1935) lent weight to the company's position, and the district court sustained the demurrer. On appeal, however, the Supreme Court approved the embargo resolution and proclamation with a ringing endorsement of independent presidential authority in the area of FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

For a 7–1 majority, Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND defended the embargo measures by distinguishing between powers of internal and external SOVEREIGNTY, a distinction the government had not employed in arguing Curtiss-Wright. For him, the federal government's domestic authority derived from states having delegated power via the Constitution. External sovereignty had passed, however, from the British Crown to the United Colonies and then to the United States in their collective capacities, with the states severally never possessing it nor delegating it. "Rulers come and go; governments end and forms of government change; but sovereignty survives." In the realm of foreign relations, the authority of the federal government therefore equaled that of any sovereign nation, and the usual constitutional divisions between the President and Congress were largely irrelevant, as was the normal prohibition on delegation of legislative power. Keenly aware of the need for energy and dispatch in the delicate business of conducting foreign relations, the Framers had endorsed this arrangement, Sutherland claimed, and early statesmen put it into practice. Although dissenting, Justice JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS filed no opinion.

Later characterized as dictum-laden, Sutherland's argument made sense within the constitutional climate of the 1930s and in view of his own commitments. The government, for example, had claimed that the 1934 embargo resolution and proclamation met the straited Panama-Schechter requirement that delegatory legislation specify the findings of fact the President must make before taking the anticipated action. Such an approach ignored the plausible objection that findings involving diplomatic and military imponderables were no firmer than those already disallowed as "opinion" in Schechter. An alternative was simply to rely on judicial precedent and legislative practice regarding delegation in areas cognate to foreign relations. Sutherland did examine earlier embargo, tariff, and kindred measures in which Congress had given latitude to the President, but he did so primarily as a means of showing that his view of external sovereignty had been accepted from the beginning. Neither judicial nor legislative iterations carried the same weight as the original intent and first principles he valued so highly. Perhaps most important, Sutherland himself had broached the external-internal distinction the previous May, in CARTER V. CARTER COAL COMPANY (1936), and had earlier explicated his full theory of sovereignty in his book Constitutional Power and World Affairs (1919).

The real weakness of Sutherland's opinion was its faulty history. Scant evidence exists that the Framers held the extraconstitutional understanding of the foreign relations power he attributed to them. Sutherland also misconstrued many of the earlier episodes and commentaries that, he argued, were informed by his theories of sovereignty and plenary executive authority. Curtiss-Wright nevertheless had timing on its side. It soon provided a base for upholding EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS as domestic law in UNITED STATES V. BELMONT (1937) and UNITED STATES V. PINK (1942). More broadly, Sutherland's opinion appealed to proponents of an expanded presidential role as the United States acquired global responsibilities, engaged in nuclear diplomacy, fought undeclared wars, and debated the requirements of internal security.

CHARLES A. LOFGREN
(1986)

Bibliography

LEVITAN, DAVID M. 1946 The Foreign Relations Power: An Analysis of Mr. Justice Sutherland's Theory. Yale Law Journal 55:467–497.

LOFGREN, CHARLES A. 1973 United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation: An Historical Reassessment. Yale Law Journal 83:1–32.

CUSHING, WILLIAM
(1732–1810)

William Cushing served on the United States Supreme Court, in an undistinguished manner, for nearly twenty-one years. Born into a politically well-connected, upper middle class Massachusetts family, he graduated from Harvard College, and then studied law; he was admitted to the bar in 1755. He practiced law in Maine, where he represented the interests of large landholders against squatters and debtors. In 1771 he succeeded his father as a judge of the Massachusetts Superior Court. Because many of his family had loyalist leanings and he owed his position to a royal appointment, Cushing expressed his political views cautiously during the 1770s, when colonial resistance to British policies turned into revolution. Although he chose the patriot side in 1776, some ardent radicals doubted his enthusiasm for independence. Nonetheless he was appointed to the newly created superior court and became chief justice for the state in 1777 when JOHN ADAMS resigned the post. He also served as a member of the convention that wrote the MASSACHUSETTS CONSTITUTION of 1780.

While chief justice, Cushing played an important role in bringing about the end of slavery in Massachusetts, beginning with COMMONWEALTH V. JENNISON (1783). In his charge to the jury, Cushing interpreted the clause of the state constitution that declared that "all men are born free and equal" as abolishing slavery in the state. Unsympathetic to the debtors in western Massachusetts who prevented the collection of taxes and closed the courts during SHAYS' REBELLION, Cushing opposed their activities while riding circuit and presided over the TREASON trial of the leaders; some of his sentences included the death penalty. He advocated RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION in 1788 and served as vice-president of the state ratifying convention.

GEORGE WASHINGTON appointed Cushing the first associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1789. Despite his extensive judicial experience he did not play a very active role on the Court. Although he participated in many of the most important cases of the 1790s—CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1973), Ware v. Hylton (1796), HYLTON V.

UNITED STATES, (1796), and CALDER V. BULL (1798)—his opinions tended to be brief, and dealt with narrow legal and procedural questions. Ceremonious in his deportment, Cushing was the last member of the Court to wear a wig. His affability and courtesy enabled him to enforce the Sedition Act with minimal rancor. After 1800, illness, age, and the difficulties of riding circuit caused him considerable hardship. He could no longer adequately perform his duties, and he probably would have retired early if a federal pension had been available. He died, while still a member of the Supreme Court, in 1810.

RICHARD E. ELLIS
(1986)

Bibliography

JOHNSON, HERBERT ALAN 1969 William Cushing. Pages 57–70 in Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., Justices of the Supreme Court, 1789–1969, Vol. I. New York: Chelsea House.

CUSHMAN, ROBERT E.
(1889–1969)

Robert Eugene Cushman taught constitutional law for many years at Cornell University. His landmark anthology, Leading Constitutional Decisions (1925; 16th ed. by Robert F. Cushman, 1982), quickly established itself as a standard casebook for constitutional law and history courses. Cushman founded and edited the Cornell Studies on Civil Liberty; the contributors to this series of monographs included Robert K. Carr, Milton R. Convitz, Walter Gellhorn, James Morton Smith, and Cushman himself. Cushman described his monograph, Civil Liberties in the United States (1956), as "a guide to current problems and experience." A synoptic description of the state of the law and an attempt to chart its future development, it was well-received, although some critics questioned its formalistic approach and its skeletal coverage of various issues. Cushman's major scholarly work, The Independent Regulatory Commissions (1941), a byproduct of his service with the President's Committee on Administrative Management (1937); prophetically proposed the separation in independent regulatory commissions of the prosecutorial and adjudicative functions. For many years he wrote the American Political Science Review's annual survey of the work of the Supreme Court. From 1958 until his death, Cushman was editor-in-chief of the Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution; he was succeeded by MERRILL JENSEN.

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

CUSTODIAL INTERROGATION

See: Police Interrogation and Confessions

D

DAIRY QUEEN, INC. v. WOOD
369 U.S. 469 (1962)

The owners of the "Dairy Queen" trademark sued a licensee alleging breach of contract and trademark infringement and asking for injunctive relief and an "accounting." Since this was a case in EQUITY, U.S. District Judge Wood denied the defendant's motion for a jury trial.

A unanimous Supreme Court, speaking through Justice HUGO L. BLACK, held that Wood's decision deprived Dairy Queen of its SEVENTH AMENDMENT rights: although the complaint asked for an "accounting," it was really a suit for damages or debt. As Black wrote, "the constitutional right of TRIAL BY JURY cannot be made dependent upon the choice of words used in the pleadings."

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

DALLAS, ALEXANDER J.
(1759–1817)

Admitted to the bar in 1785, Alexander James Dallas practiced law in Philadelphia. He supplemented his income by reporting the opinions of the courts that sat in that city, including the Supreme Court of the United States (1790–1800). From 1801 to 1814 he was United States attorney for eastern Pennsylvania.

As secretary of the treasury under President JAMES MADISON (1814–1816), Dallas secured enactment of the highest federal taxes to that date, restored confidence in the currency, and dictated terms of the second BANK OF THE UNITED STATES ACT (1816). In 1815 he was also acting secretary of war.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

DAMAGES

From the earliest days of COMMON LAW, courts have ordered the payment of money ("damages") to compensate for legal wrongs. Two related but separable lines of cases shape the availability of damages for violations of constitutional rights. One line of cases involves inyterpretation of SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, and its express provision for "an action at law" to redress deprivations of constitutional rights by state officials. Since the revival of section 1983 in MONROE V. PAPE (1961), it has been understood that damages are available to compensate for sonstitutional violations by state officials. CAREY V. PIPHUS (1978) reaffirmed this understanding, but held that substantial damages could not be recovered for PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS violations without proof of injury. Smith v. Wade (1983) clarified the standards governing awards of PUNITIVE DAMAGES under section 1983.

In actions against federal officials, which are not governed by section 1983, the Court, in BIVENS V. SIX UNKNOWN NAMED AGANTS OF THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF NARCOTICS (1971), inferred a damages action based on the FOURTH AMENDMENT. Later cases, such as DAVIS V. PASSMAN (1979), extended the implied constitutional damages action to other constitutional provisions. The Bivens line of cases may be viewed as an extension of EX PARTE YOUNG (1908) and other decisions that allowed actions for injunctive relief to be based directly on the Constitution.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

NEWMAN, JON O. 1978 Suing the Lawbreakers: Proposals to Strngthen the Section 1983 Damages Remedy for Law Enforcers' Misconduct. Yale Law Journal 87:447–467.

DAMAGES CLAIMS
(Update to Damages)

At least since MARBURY V. MADISON was decided in 1803, it has been understood that the United States Constitution is law, enforceable by courts and superior in status to LEGISLATION. In some surprising particulars, however, exactly what that means is far from clear. Since the early 1970s a good deal of both judicial and academic attention has been focused on the propriety of recognizing what are called constitutional damages claims. Compensatory and punitive actions based directly on the Constitution raise significant questions concerning the role of the judiciary in the American system of govenment. The Supreme Court's response to the tensions presented by the creation of constitutional damages actions has been a complex and confusing one.

The Constitution has traditionally been enforced through a variety of remedial mechanisms. Marbury's embrace of JUDICIAL REVIEW itself adopts a constitutional enforcement measure—a "negative" judicial authority to ignore statutes that conflict with the terms of the Constitution. Since OSBORN V. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES was decided in 1824, INJUNCTIONS have been used to prevent government officials from engaging in future constitutional violations. In this century, the judiciary's equitable enforcement powers have been stretched to include certain nontraditional remedies, such as the exclusion of relevant evidence in criminal trials and the busing of school children in DESEGREGATION cases.

On one level, lawsuits seeking monetary compensation for the violation of constitutional rights are commonplace. SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, U.S. CODE, creates an action at law for constitutional injuries sustained at the hands of persons acting "under color" of state or local authority. Public employees terminated unconstitutionally by state agencies, the victims of unlawful arrests, persons subjected to discrimination prohibited by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and myriad other plaintiffs have successfully recovered money damages from state and local officials in constitutional causes of action based on section 1983.

There is, however, no counterpart to section 1983 for federal officials. If, for example, an FBI agent or a treasury officer exceeds the strictures of the FOURTH AMENDMENT, any damage claim instigated by the victim must be rooted directly in the Constitution. The general federal-question jurisdictional statute (28 U.S.C. 1331) empowers the UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS to entertain cases arising under the Constitution. But no statutory directive explicitly creates a cause of action for money damages. And the power of federal judges to infer such claims from the sparse language of the constitutional charter has proven a matter of considerable complexity.

In BIVENS V. SIX UNKNOWN NAMED AGENTS, decided in 1971, the Supreme Court held for the first time that federal officials can be sued for damages under the Fourth Amendment. Bivens, allegedly without PROBABLE CAUSE, had been "manacled . . . in front of his wife and children" while federal officials threatened to "arrest the entire family." The Court concluded that the "injuries consequent" to an illegal search provide the basis for an "independent claim both necessary and sufficient to make out . . . [a] cause of action." The Bivens case thus seemed to open the door to the recognition of a full complement of constitutional damage claims.

To a significant degree, however, Bivens's promise has remained unfulfilled. The decision determined that the Fourth Amendment is directly enforceable against federal officials through damage decrees. It was silent, however, about other provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS. In the decade following the ruling, the Supreme Court held that the implied antidiscrimination component of the Fifth Amendment (DAVIS V. PASSMAN (1979)) and the CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS prohibition of the Eighth Amendment (Carlson v. Green, 1980) would sustain damages actions. But in Stanley v. Lucas (1987), the Justices determined that a former serviceman could not assert a constitutional damage claim against the ARMED FORCES for being involuntarily subjected to LSD testing—in apparent violation of the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fifth Amendment. And other decisions have disapproved free speech (Bush v. Lucas, 1983) and PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS (Schweiker v. Chilicky, 1988) claims lodged against federal officials.

The set of principles that guide the Supreme Court's constitutional damages claims cases is, in several aspects, surprising. According to Carlson v. Green, victims of individualized constitutional violations by federal officials are said to "have a right to recover damages . . . in federal court despite the absence of any statute conferring such a right." The action may be defeated, however, in two instances. First, relief will be denied if the government official demonstrates the existence of "special factors counselling hesitation in the absence of affirmative action by Congress." Second, the constitutional claim will fail if Congress, by providing an alternative remedy or by clear legislative directive, has indicated that JUDICIAL POWER should not be exercised. "Special factors" have been found to exist in the military and civil service contexts, and more recently, intricate statutory schemes like the SOCIAL SECURITY system have been deemed adequate substitutes for constitutional review.

It is unusual, of course, for exercises in CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION—like Bivens itself—to be effectively overturned or displaced by congressional enactment. Marbury v. Madison would seem to argue otherwise. Nor is it commonplace for the Court openly to admit that constitutional violations will be remedied unless "special factors" counsel against enforcement. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL argued in COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821), for example, that "we have no more right to decline the exercise of jurisdiction which is given, than to usurp that which is not given."

Damages actions are typically either created by statute or, if fashioned through the COMMON LAW process, subject to legislative revision or rejection. Bivens-type cases occupy a hazy middle ground between traditional constitutional interpretations and common law adjudication. It is perhaps not surprising, therefore, that the decisions are riddled with compromise as well.

GENE R. NICHOL
(1992)

Bibliography

DELLINGER, WALTER E. 1972 Of Rights and Remedies: The Constitution as a Sword. Harvard Law Review 85:1532–1564.

HILL, ALFRED 1969 Constitutional Remedies. Columbia Law Review 69:1009–1161.

MERRILL, THOMAS W. 1985 The Common Law Powers of Federal Courts. University of Chicago Law Review 52:1–72.

MONAGHAN, HENRY P. 1975 Foreword: Constitutional Common Law. Harvard Law Review 89:1–45.

NICHOL, GENE R. 1989 Bivens, Chilicky and Constitutional Damages Claims. Virginia Law Review 75:1117–1154.

DAMES & MOORE v. REGAN
453 U.S. 654 (1981)

The United States hostage crisis was settled by the 1981 Algerian Agreement under which, inter alia, the United States undertook to terminate certain litigation by American claimants against Iran and its agencies. Under the agreement, the claims involved were required to be submitted to binding international arbitration. By EXECUTIVE ORDER, President JIMMY CARTER suspended various claims pending in American courts. Certain American claimants challenged this action as exceeding presidential authority. The Supreme Court upheld the President's authority to conclude and implement this part of the agreement on the basis of his constitutional FOREIGN AFFAIRS powers. It relied on congressional acceptance of broad presidential power during crises in foreign affairs, and on Congress's historic acquiescence in the practice of settling American claims by EXECUTIVE AGREEMENT. The Court also held that if the agreement caused a TAKING OF PROPERTY within the scope of the Fifth Amendment, American nationals had a remedy for compensation in the CLAIMS COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The decision effectively permitted the President to remove a category of cases from federal court JURISDICTION (although the Court characterized its action as only approving a change in the "applicable substantive law"). And it opened the way to subsequent "takings" litigation over a broad area of foreign economic policy. In both respects the Court went beyond previous decisions involving presidential executive agreement authority, and treated the presidential executive agreement as fully equivalent to a Senate-approved treaty. Accordingly, it seems to be the most sweeping judicial recognition to date of presidential foreign relations power.

PHILLIP R. TRIMBLE
(1986)

Bibliography

MARKS, LEE R. and GRABOW, JOHN C. 1982 The President's Foreign Economic Powers after Dames & Moore v. Regan: Legislation by Acquiescence. Cornell Law Review 68:68–103.

TRIMBLE, PHILLIP R. 1984 Foreign Policy Frustrated—Dames & Moore, Claims Court Jurisdiction and a New Raid on the Treasury. Columbia Law Review 84:317–385.

DANDRIDGE v. WILLIAMS
397 U.S. 471 (1970)

Dandridge stifled the infant DOCTRINE, born in cases such as GRIFFIN V. ILLINOIS (1956) and DOUGLAS V. CALIFORNIA (1963), that governmental WEALTH DISCRIMINATION, like RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, demanded strict judicial scrutiny of its justifications. Maryland provided welfare aid to dependent children on the basis of need, partly determined by the number of children in a family. However, payment to any one family was limited to $250 per month, irrespective of the family's size. A 6–3 Supreme Court, speaking through Justice POTTER STEWART, characterized the case as one involving "social and economic" regulation, and applied the RATIONAL BASIS standard of review. Here there were legitimate state interests in encouraging employment and avoiding distinctions between welfare recipients and the working poor. Although some welfare beneficiaries were unemployable, the maximum-grant rule was generally reasonable.

Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, dissenting, rejected the idea of two separate STANDARDS OF REVIEW, rational basis and STRICT SCRUTINY. He argued for a "sliding scale" of judicial supervision that would demand progressively more state justification as the classification in question bore more heavily on the powerless and in proportion to the importance of the interest at stake. Here, where indigent children were being deprived of basic subsistence as defined by the state's own standards of need, the permissive rational basis standard was inappropriate. Marshall also argued that the maximum-grant rule was invalid even under that permissive standard, given the state's aim of aiding children and the unemployability of a large proportion of welfare recipients.

After Dandridge, it became futile to argue to the Supreme Court either that welfare subsistence was a FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST or that wealth discrimination implied a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION. Since 1970 the Court has regularly shied away from decisions that would place the judiciary in the position of allocating state resources.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

DANE, NATHAN
(1752–1835)

A loyal graduate of Harvard College, Nathan Dane of Beverly, Massachusetts, became a lawyer, politician, and scholar. In 1787, while representing his state in Congress, he single-handedly composed the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE. Its provision outlawing slavery derived from Thomas Jefferson's LAND ORDINANCE OF 1785, but Dane deserves credit for writing the various other provisions that amounted to the first national BILL OF RIGHTS. It included, too, a precursor of the CONTRACT CLAUSE.

After serving in various state offices, Dane was forced by deafness to retire to his law practice and to legal scholarship as the century ended. Although he attended the HARTFORD CONVENTION, he spent most of his energies on a compendium of American law, published in eight volumes between 1820 and 1829 and known as "Dane's Abridgment." The work earned him the name of "the American Blackstone" and the money that he gave to develop Harvard Law School. Dane Hall was the first building and Dane himself chose the first Dane Professor, Justice JOSEPH STORY.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

JOHNSON, ANDREW W. 1986 The Life and Constitutional Thought of Nathan Dane. New York: Garland Publishing.

DANIEL, PETER V.
(1784–1860)

Peter Vivian Daniel, a Virginian born in 1784, served as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States from 1841 until his death in 1860. His opinions were notable for the extremist positions he adopted on constitutional issues, including the powers of the federal and state governments, the status of CORPORATIONS, and SLAVERY.

Daniel, a Republican and later a Jacksonian Democrat, served in the Virginia General Assembly, as privy councillor, and as lieutenant governor. President ANDREW JACKSON appointed him to the U. S. District Court in 1836 and President MARTIN VAN BUREN to the Supreme Court in 1841. There the bulk of his work involved cases concerning land titles, procedure, and EQUITY. However, he did participate in most of the major constitutional decisions of the TANEY COURT. But in all instances save one, he spoke either in a concurring or in a dissenting opinion.

Viewing the federal Constitution as a compact among sovereign states, Daniel opposed the extension of federal regulatory authority in COMMERCE CLAUSE cases and extolled the states' POLICE POWER (LICENSE CASES, 1847; PASSENGER CASES, 1849). He concurred in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1851) because he denied that the subject matter of that case (pilotage regulation) was within the federal commerce power at all. In the first Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge case (1851), Daniel condemned the use of the commerce power to restrict commerce on navigable rivers. Daniel's hostility to federal ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION sprang from the same source and was buttressed by his insistence on preservation of JURY TRIAL. He dissented in PROPELLER GENESEE CHIEF V. FITZHUGH (1851), one of the few times in which he disagreed with Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY, opposing the extension of federal admiralty jurisdiction to nontidal waters. In his Searight v. Stokes dissent (1845), Daniel insisted that the federal government lacked any power at all to finance INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, going far beyond the constitutional doctrine of Jackson's MAYSVILLE ROAD BILL veto (1830).

Daniel was an inveterate foe of banks and corporations, seeking unsuccessfully to deny them access to federal courts as the "Citizens" requisite to Article III jurisdiction (Rundle v. Delaware and Raritan Canal Co., 1852, dissent). In his dissent in Planters Bank v. Sharp (1848), he sought to limit the CONTRACT CLAUSE's scope as a restraint on state regulatory power over corporations. In the only significant constitutional case where he spoke for the Court, WEST RIVER BRIDGE V. DIX (1848), Daniel upheld the state's use of EMINENT DOMAIN and police power to condemn corporate property.

In his later years, Daniel came to despise the institutions and values of the free states. His concurrence in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) was remarkable for its intemperate condemnation of the MISSOURI COMPROMISE and for his insistence that no free blacks could be citizens.

Daniel himself best evaluated his contribution to the work of the Court in his Genesee Chief dissent: "My opinions may be deemed to be contracted and antiquated, unsuited to the day in which we live, but they are founded upon deliberate convictions as to the nature and objects of LIMITED GOVERNMENT."

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

FRANK, JOHN P. 1964 Justice Daniel Dissenting: Peter V. Daniel. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

DARBY LUMBER COMPANY, UNITED STATES v.
312 U.S. 100 (1941)

This decision held the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT of 1938 to be a valid exercise of federal power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. That was no surprise after the 1937 decisions upholding the WAGNER (NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS) ACT and after the retirement of the four Justices who had voted consistently for a narrow interpretation of the commerce clause. The opinion of Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE was nevertheless of great significance. For instead of speaking in terms of such nonconstitutional concepts as "direct" and "indirect," it returned to basic constitutional principles as to the scope of the power of Congress.

The commerce clause itself precluded states with high labor standards from protecting their wage levels by forbidding the entry of goods produced elsewhere at lower wages. This meant that in the absence of federal legislative action, states with the lowest labor standards could drive the standards down throughout the country. In 1916 Congress first sought to meet this problem by barring the interstate transportation of goods produced by children. Although that statute was clearly a regulation of INTERSTATE COMMERCE the Supreme Court held it unconstitutional by a vote of 5–4 in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) because the purpose of the act was to control what occurred during the course of intrastate PRODUCTION. Five years later, in ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923), the Court ruled, 6–3, that the DUE PROCESS clause forbade the fixing of minimum wages by either federal or state governments.

The downward spiral of prices and wages during the Great Depression of the 1930s forced employers seeking to survive to reduce wages to incredibly low levels. Congress sought to deal with this problem by requiring the codes of fair competition under the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT to prescribe MAXIMUM HOURS AND MINIMUM WAGES. SCHECHTER POULTRY CORP. V. UNITED STATES (1935), holding the NRA unconstitutional, brought this program to a halt, and CARTER V. CARTER COAL COMPANY (1936), holding that Congress lacked power to regulate labor conditions and relations in the coal industry, seemed to create an insurmountable impediment. Unpredictably, this lasted for only a year, when Carter was in substance overruled in the WAGNER ACT CASES (1937) and Adkins was overruled in WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH (1937). The result was passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act in June 1938.

That statute prescribed a minimum wage of twenty-five cents per hour for employees engaged in interstate commerce or in producing goods for such commerce. Payment of fifty percent more for overtime was required for all hours over forty-four per week (to be reduced to forty after two years). The act penalized violation of those standards or interstate shipment of goods produced in violation of them.

The lumber industry was typically afflicted with depressed wage rates; wages ranged from ten to twenty-seven and one-half cents per hour. The annual average wage for all lumber industry employees in Georgia in 1937 was $389. Fred Darby was paying his employees twelve and one-half to seventeen cents per hour; he devised a scheme to continue doing so after the Fair Labor Standards Act became effective, and he was indicted.

Although the other federal lower courts had seen the light after the Labor Board cases and sustained the new statute, the Georgia district judge deemed himself bound to follow HAMMER V. DAGENHART and CARTER until the Supreme Court explicitly overruled them. Accordingly, he dismissed the INDICTMENT as an invalid regulation of manufacture, not interstate commerce, and the government appealed directly to the Supreme Court.

In upholding the statute Justice Stone spoke for a unanimous Court—undoubtedly because Justice JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS had retired three days before. The Court first held that the prohibition against the interstate shipment of goods produced under substandard labor conditions was "indubitably a regulation of [interstate] commerce." And this was none the less so because the motive or purpose may have been to control the "wages and hours of persons engaged in manufacture." The commerce power of Congress, as defined in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), "may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution." "The motive and purpose of a regulation of interstate commerce are matters for the legislative judgment upon which the courts are given no control." The contrary decision in HAMMER V. DAGENHART "by a bare majority of the Court over the powerful and now classic dissent of Mr. Justice [OLIVER WENDELL] HOLMES" was accordingly overruled.

In determining the validity of the regulation of wages and hours for manufacturers, the Court adopted the approach approved in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), the initial pronouncement on the scope of the ENUMERATED POWERS. The test was whether a regulation of intrastate activities was an "appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the granted power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce." The directness or indirectness of the effect on such commerce was not mentioned, although the substantiality of the effect was. (See EFFECTS ON COMMERCE). The Court noted that legislation under other powers had often been sustained "when the means chosen, although not themselves within the granted power, were nevertheless deemed appropriate aids to the accomplishment of some purpose within an admitted power. . . ." The policy of excluding from interstate commerce goods produced under substandard labor conditions could reasonably be effectuated by prohibiting such conditions for manufacturers producing for interstate distribution. That would suppress a method of interstate competition Congress deemed unfair.

The opinion flatly rejected the contention that the TENTH AMENDMENT restricted the enumerated powers. That amendment, which provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the states are reserved to the states respectively or to the people," did not deprive the federal government of "authority to resort to all means for the exercise of a granted power which are appropriate and plainly adapted to the permitted end." "The amendment states but a truism that all is retained which has not been surrendered."

Darby was followed a year later by WICKARD V. FILBURN in which the Court alluded to the NECESSARY AND PROPER clause, which MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND had emphasized, as the source of the power of Congress to regulate intrastate transactions. It also identified the cases which Darby had disapproved by implication, among others Hammer, Schechter, and Carter. Darby and Wickard together have provided the foundation for commerce clause interpretation thereafter. They firmly establish that the national economic system is subject to the control of the only entity that can possibly control it, the federal government.

ROBERT L. STERN
(1986)

Bibliography

DODD, E. MERRICK 1946 The Supreme Court and Fair Labor Standards, 1941–1945. Harvard Law Review 59:321–375.

STERN, ROBERT L. 1946 The Commerce Clause and the National Economy, 1933–1946. Harvard Law Review 59:645–693, 883–947.

DARNEL'S CASE

See: Petition of Right

DARTMOUTH COLLEGE v. WOODWARD

4 Wheaton 518 (1819)

The most famous and influential CONTRACT CLAUSE case in our history, Dartmouth College was a boon to higher education and to corporate capitalism. The case established the DOCTRINE, never overruled, that a CORPORATION charter or the grant by a state of corporate rights to private interests comes within the protection of the contract clause. Although the case involved a small college in New Hampshire rather than a manufacturing concern, a bank, or a transportation company, the Court seized an opportunity to broaden the contract clause by making all private corporations its beneficiaries. DANIEL WEBSTER, counsel for the college, said that the judgment was a "defense of VESTED RIGHTS against Courts and Sovereignties," and his co-counsel, Joseph Hopkinson, asserted that it would "secure corporations . . . from legislative despotism. . . ." Corporations were still a recent innovation; JAMES KENT, in his Commentaries on American Law (1826), remarked that their rapid multiplication and the avidity with which they were sought by charter from the states arose as a result of the power that large, consolidated capital gave them over business of every sort. The Court's decision in the Dartmouth College case, Kent said, more than any other act proceeding from the authority of the United States, threw "an impregnable barrier around all rights and franchises derived from the grant of government; and [gave] solidity and inviolability to the literary, charitable, religious, and commercial institutions of our country." Actually, FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) had made the crucial and original extension of the contract clause, construing it to cover public and executed contracts as well as private executory ones. The Dartmouth College doctrine was a logical implication.

The college case was a strange vehicle for the doctrine that emerged from it. Dartmouth, having been chartered in 1769 in the name of the crown to christianize and educate Indians, had become a Christian college for whites and a stronghold of the Congregationalist Church, which had benefited most from the laws establishing the Protestant religion in New Hampshire. The college had become embroiled in state politics on the side of the Federalists, who supported the establishment. When in 1815 the trustees removed the president of the college, they loosed a controversy that drew to the ousted president a coalition of Jeffersonians and religious denominations demanding separation of church and state. The reformers having swept the state elections in 1816, the legislature sought to democratize the college by a series of statutes that converted it into a state university under public control, rather than a private college as provided by the original charter. The state supreme court sustained the state acts, reasoning that the institution had been established with public aid for public purposes of an educational and religious nature. The state court held that the contract clause did not limit the state's power over its own public corporations.

On APPEAL, the Supreme Court held that Dartmouth was a private eleemosynary corporation whose VESTED RIGHTS could not be divested without infringing a continuing obligation to respect inviolably the trustees' control of property given to the corporation for the advancement of its objectives. The Court held unconstitutional the state acts subjecting Dartmouth to state control and ordered Woodward, the treasurer of the institution who had sided with the state, to return to the trustees the records, corporate seal, and other corporate property which he held.

At every step of his opinion Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL misstated the facts about the history of the original charter in order to prove that it established a purely private corporation. That, perhaps, was a matter primarily of interest to the college, which, contrary to Marshall, had received its charter not from George III but from the governor of the colony; moreover, the private donations, which Marshall said had been given to Dartmouth on condition of receiving the charter, had been given unconditionally to an entirely different institution, Moor's Charity School for Indians, and had been transferred to Dartmouth over the donors' objections. Also, the funds of the college, contrary to Marshall, did not consist "entirely of private donations," because the endowment of the college at the time of the issuance of the chapter derived mainly from grants of public lands. Even if the grant of the charter were a contract, as Marshall said it "plainly" was, Parliament could have repealed it at will. The Chief Justice conceded the fact but added that a repeal would have been morally perfidious. If, however, the charter were subject to revocation at the will of the sovereign authority, or the grantor, the "contract" did not bind that party and created no obligation that could be impaired.

Marshall conceded that at the time of Independence, the state suceeded to the power of Parliament and might have repealed or altered the charter at any time before the adoption of the Constitution. The provision in Article I, section 10, preventing states from impairing the obligation of a contract, altered the situation. That clause, Marshall conceded, was not specifically intended to protect charters of incorporation: "It is," he said boldly, "more than possible that the preservation of rights of this description was not particularly in the view of the framers of the constitution," but the clause admitted no exceptions as far as private rights were concerned. "It is not enough to say that this particular case was not in the mind of the convention when the article was framed, nor of the American people when it was adopted." In the absence of proof that the language of the Constitution would have been altered had charters of incorporation been considered, the case came within its injunction against state acts impairing the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

Although Marshall can be doubted when he said, "It can require no argument to prove that the circumstances of this case constitute a contract," his general doctrine, that any state charter for a private corporation is a constitutionally protected contract, was not far-fetched. The Court must construe the text, not the minds of its framers, and, as he said, "There is no exception in the constitution, no sentiment delivered by its contemporaneous expounders, which would justify us in making it." If a state granted a charter of incorporation to private interests, the charter has "every ingredient of a complete and legitimate contract," should it be made on a valuable consideration for the security and disposition of the property conveyed to the corporation for management by its trustees in perpetuity. Unless, as Justice JOSEPH STORY stressed in his concurring opinion, the government should reserve, in the grant of the charter, a power to alter, modify, or repeal, the rights vested cannot be divested, except by the consent of the incorporators, assuming they have not defaulted. Whether, however, a modification of the charter, as in this case, impairs an obligation, if the charter be executed and by its terms should not specify a term of years for the corporation's existence, is another question. In Fletcher v. Peck, however, the Court had brought executed as well as public contracts within the meaning of the contract clause. Marshall construed contract rights sweepingly, state powers narrowly.

Max Lerner's comment on the case, referring to Webster's peroration, is provocative. "Every schoolboy," he wrote, "knows Webster's eloquent plea and how Marshall, whom the Yazoo land scandals had left cold, found his own eyes suffused with tears, as Webster, overcome by the emotion of his words, wept. But few schoolboys know that the case had ultimately less to do with colleges than with business corporations; that sanctity of contract was invoked to give them immunity against legislative control, and that business enterprise in America never had more useful mercenaries than the tears Daniel Webster and John Marshall are reputed to have shed so devotedly that March day in Washington. . . ." In fact, the reserved power to alter or repeal, of which Story spoke, limited corporate immunity from legislative control. Moreover, the protection given by the Court to corporate charters came into play after the legislatures, not the Court, issued these charters, often recklessly and corruptly, without consideration of the public good; Marshall's opinion should have put the legislatures and the public on guard. Finally, the case had a great deal to do with higher education as well as business. Dartmouth College is the MAGNA CARTA of private colleges and universities, and, by putting them beyond state control, provided a powerful stimulus, not only to business corporations but also to the chartering of state institutions of higher learning. Unable to make private institutions public ones, the states established state universities.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BEVERIDGE, ALBERT J. 1916–1919 The Life of John Marshall, 4 vols. Vol. IV:220–281. Boston: Little, Brown.

HAINES, CHARLES GROVE 1944 The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government and Politics, 1789–1835. Pages 378–419. Berkeley: University of California Press.

SHIRLEY, JOHN M. (1879) 1971 The Dartmouth College Causes and the Supreme Court. New York: Da Capo Press.

STITES, FRANCIS N. 1972 Private Interest and Public Gain: The Dartmouth College Case, 1819. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.

DAVIS, DAVID
(1815–1883)

David Davis's Supreme Court appointment in 1862 stemmed from his longtime legal and political association with ABRAHAM LINCOLN. Throughout the CIVIL WAR, Davis loyally supported the administration in the PRIZE CASES (1863) and EX PARTE VALLANDIGHAM (1864), but he opposed the President regarding emancipation and military trials of civilians. At one point, Davis urged Lincoln to withdraw the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION, believing that it would only increase southern resistance and border-state hostility toward the Union. The military trial issue, however, aroused Davis's unrelenting enmity and criticism. Appropriately, Davis delivered the Court's unanimous opinion in EX PARTE MILLIGAN in 1866, holding that civilian trials by presidentially created military commissions were unconstitutional. Davis, joined by the four Democrats on the bench, added that Congress could not authorize such commissions, provoking sharp dissent from Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE and the other three Republicans.

Democrats and Southerners claimed that the subsequent Republican military reconstruction program was unconstitutional on the basis of Milligan. But Davis's opinion really offered little comfort on this point. While he found that the "laws and usages of war" could not apply where civil courts were open, he qualified this conclusion by specifying those "states which have upheld the authority of the government." In his private correspondence, Davis showed that he was disturbed by contemporary interpretations. He noted that there was "not a word said in the opinion about reconstruction, the power is conceded in insurrectionary states."

Disenchanted with the Republicans, and equally wary of the Democrats, Davis castigated the partisan wrangling that characterized the RECONSTRUCTION period. He opposed suffrage for blacks, stating that "the thrusting on them [of] political rights is to their injury." He advocated the preservation of traditional state powers, and he expressed alarm "at the tendency to consolidated Govt manifested by the Republican party." Yet he believed that the military reconstruction program would have been avoided if the Democrats and the South had accepted the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Davis displayed little inclination to have the judiciary thwart the Republican program, however. He was with the majority in TEXAS V. WHITE (1869). He also resisted the attempts of some colleagues to force a decision in EX PARTE MCCARDLE (1868) before Congress repealed the appropriate JURISDICTION legislation, thinking "it was unjudicial to run a race with Congress." Finally, he opposed a motion to challenge the Reconstruction Act on property rights grounds in Mississippi v. Stanton (1868).

Davis's sense of restraint characterized his votes in most of the other issues involving the Civil War and Reconstruction. Despite the libertarian concerns he had expressed in Milligan, he joined the dissenters who favored upholding both federal and state TEST OATHS. He also joined the dissenters who favored sustaining LEGAL TENDERS in Hepburn v. Griswold (1870) and then joined the new majority a year later when the decision was reversed. His political conservatism, combined with his notions of JUDICIAL RESTRAINT, best explains his adherence to the majority view in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873).

Davis's literal reading of the compact clause (Article I, section 10), however, led him to dissent in Virginia v. West Virginia (1871) when he denied the legality of West Virginia's annexation of two western Virginia counties during the Civil War. And in Miller v. United States (1871), a key case testing the CONFISCATION ACT of 1862, he supported the act's constitutionality but found reversible error. In a number of circuit rulings involving confiscation, his insistence on procedural fairness largely masked his distaste for the law.

In the Court's consideration of emerging economic questions in the 1870s, Davis again adopted rather traditional views on federalism and state prerogatives. He dissented, for example, in PHILADELPHIA & READING RAILROAD V. PENNSYLVANIA (the State Freight Tax Case, 1873), arguing that a state tax imposed on freight tonnage was simply a business tax and not an interference with INTERSTATE COMMERCE. In a long series of municipal bond cases in the 1860s and 1870s, Davis usually supported Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER's vigorous battle against the Court's attempts to provide bondholders protection from state taxation or repudiation. In his most notable statement on the issue, Davis dissented when the Court held that the interest of nonresident bondholders could not be taxed. In State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds (1873), Davis relied on traditional state statutes requiring taxation of "all mortgages [and] money owned by solvent debtors." Such taxation, he said, did not impair any contractual obligations between creditors and those who issued bonds. A quarter-century later, Davis's views were adopted by a new majority.

Despite his prominence and reputation, Davis produced few noteworthy constitutional opinions beyond his contribution in Milligan. In truth, he was misplaced as a Supreme Court Justice. He preferred the involvement of political life or trial court work. Davis eagerly sought the presidency and he courted anti-Grant elements within the Republican party in 1872. He finally resigned in 1877 when the Illinois legislature elected him to the Senate. He eventually was elected President pro tem, prompting Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE, who deplored Davis's political ambitions, to remark that the position was "as near to the Presidency as he can get."

Davis himself offered the most candid and fitting estimate of his judicial career. "[A]s I never did like hard study, the work is not always agreeable," he wrote to his brother-in-law in 1870. "I believe I write the shortest opinions of any one on the bench, & if I had to elaborate opinions & write legal essays as some Judges do, I would quit the concern. I like to hold trial court, but this work on an appellate bench is too much like hard labor."

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Constitutional History, 1861–1865; Constitutional History, 1865–1877.)

DAVIS, JEFFERSON
(1808–1889)

A Mississippi planter, Jefferson Davis graduated from West Point, served with distinction in the Mexican War, and was a congressman (1845–1846), senator (1847–1851, 1857–1861) and secretary of war (1853–1857). In 1861 he reluctantly resigned from the Senate when Mississippi left the Union. Davis served as Confederate President (1861–1865) and at the end of the CIVIL WAR was indicted for TREASON and jailed but never tried because prosecutors were unsure they could legally convict him. Stripped of his CITIZENSHIP, Davis never returned to politics, but he did write a tedious and defensive two-volume history of SECESSION and his presidency, The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government (1881).

Davis came to national political prominence with his opposition to the COMPROMISE OF 1850. He was one of ten senators who voted against California statehood. Davis supported only the 1850 Fugitive Slave Act, which he thought should be passed and enforced "as a right not to be estimated . . . by the value of the property, but for the principles involved." Unlike JOHN C. CALHOUN, with whom he usually agreed, Davis opposed a constitutional amendment to secure southern rights in all the TERRITORIES. Davis supported extending the MISSOURI COMPROMISE line to California.

After Calhoun's death Davis was the Senate's foremost supporter of southern rights and STATES' RIGHTS. He asserted that secession was constitutional because: the Constitution did not prohibit it nor provide power to coerce a state to remain in the Union; the national government was created by "the states," not "the people," and therefore the states could exist separately from the national government; and the Union "was in the nature of a partnership between individuals without limitation of time" and could be dissolved by the unilateral action of any of the parties.

Davis was ambivalent, however, on whether the theoretical right of secession should be implemented. He opposed secession at the NASHVILLE CONVENTION (1850), arguing that southern rights could be protected within the Union. In 1851 he unsuccessfully sought the Mississippi governorship on a "states' rights" ticket, but later in the decade he opposed states' rights parties because he thought southern interests could best be protected by alliances with sympathetic northern Democrats. In 1860 he attempted to mediate a compromise that would have taken John Bell, JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE, and STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS out of the presidential contest, in favor of a single Democratic candidate. In 1858 he said publicly that if a Republican were elected "I should deem it your duty to provide for your safety outside the Union." In 1859 he said that the John Brown raid meant that loyalty to the Constitution required secession. Even so, after ABRAHAM LINCOLN's election Davis urged compromise, and served on the Committee of Thirty-Three. Only when this committee failed did he support secession.

Davis was ambivalent in other ways. He believed that blacks were inferior to whites, that congressional prohibition of the African slave trade was unconstitutional, and that the federal government should not interfere with slavery. Yet his plantation was a model, surpassed only by his brother's for treating blacks with compassion and for giving them a great deal of self-government. He opposed reopening the slave trade on moral grounds and in 1865 advocated emancipation to save the Confederacy. He saw secession as a conservative measure to protect the Constitution from tyranny by Lincoln and the national government. But as Confederate president, Davis implemented CONSCRIPTION, suspension of HABEAS CORPUS, and impressment of supplies. A lifelong states' rights man, Davis was vilified by politicians and governors as he sought, unsuccessfully, to create a Confederate national policy.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

DODD, WILLIAM E. 1907 Jefferson Davis. Philadelphia: George Jacobs.

MCCARDELL, JOHN 1979 The Idea of a Southern Nation. New York: Norton.

DAVIS, JOHN W.
(1873–1955)

One of the nation's most celebrated lawyers, John William Davis served as SOLICITOR GENERAL under WOODROW WILSON, winning WILSON V. NEW (1917) and the SELECTIVE DRAFT LAW CASES (1918). In 1924 he was the Democratic candidate for President. He remained prominent at the Supreme Court bar, successfully challenging NEW DEAL legislation, and in 1952 Davis attacked HARRY S. TRUMAN's seizure of the steel mills as a "usurpation" of power "without parallel in American history." (See YOUNGSTOWN SHEET AND TUBE COMPANY V. SAWYER.) He won that case but would lose his last one: Briggs v. Elliott (1954). Arguing this companion case to BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), Davis dismissed arguments about SEGREGATION's psychological harm and urged the continued validity of the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL rule.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

DAVIS v. ALASKA

See: Compulsory Process, Right to

DAVIS v. BEASON
130 U.S. 333 (1890)

Davis involved an Idaho territorial statute directed at POLYGAMY. The law required voters to foreswear membership in any organization that "teaches, advocates, counsels or encourages" its members to undertake polygamous relationships. Davis was convicted of swearing falsely.

Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD, speaking for the Supreme Court, saw the case as identical to REYNOLDS V. UNITED STATES (1879). The free exercise clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT protected religious beliefs not acts that prejudiced the health, safety, or good order of society as defined by the legislature operating under its POLICE POWER. Field concluded that if something is a crime, then to teach, advise, or counsel it cannot be protected by evoking religious tenets.

The decision became one of the principal underpinnings of what later came to be called the "secular regulation" approach to the free exercise clause whereby no religious exemptions are required from otherwise valid secular regulations.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

DAVIS v. PASSMAN
442 U.S. 228 (1979)

Congressman Otto Passman fired Davis, a female member of his staff, because "it was essential that the [job] be [held by] a man." Such SEX DISCRIMINATION normally violates Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 but Congress had exempted itself from that act's coverage. Davis therefore brought suit directly under the Constitution, alleging that sex discrimination by members of Congress violates the EQUAL PROTECTION guarantees contained in the Fifth Amendment. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and over four dissents, found that Davis had stated a cause of action. The Court extended its holding in BIVENS V. SIX UNKNOWN NAMED AGENTS OF THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF NARCOTICS (1971) to allow direct private damage actions under the Fifth Amendment. The majority did not discuss the SPEECH OR DEBATE CLAUSES' effect, if any, on the action.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

DAVIS v. SCHNELL

See: Literacy Test

DAY, WILLIAM R.
(1849–1923)

William Rufus Day was named to the Supreme Court by THEODORE ROOSEVELT in 1903, after WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT had declined the nomination to remain at his post in the Philippines. Coincidentally, Day had replaced Taft on the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1899 when President WILLIAM MCKINLEY dispatched Taft to the Pacific outpost.

Day's tenure spanned the Progressive era. He generally favored the movement's interventionist thrust, particularly state regulatory actions. Day's decisions relating to federal power, however, were more ambivalent, as reflected by his famous opinion in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918), which invalidated a congressional attempt to regulate child labor premised on the COMMERCE CLAUSE. Unlike many STATES' RIGHTS advocates, he consistently supported state police regulations.

Justice Day faithfully followed the precedent of UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT COMPANY (1895), holding that Congress's INTERSTATE COMMERCE power did not extend to PRODUCTION. For example, in Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company v. Yurkonis (1915) he declined to extend coverage of the federal EMPLOYERS LIABILITY ACT to coal miners even though the coal they produced eventually was used in interstate commerce. Three years later, in the child labor case, Day elaborated his conception of FEDERALISM with an expansive discussion of the TENTH AMENDMENT and its limitations on national power. He found that a congressional law prohibiting the interstate transportation of goods made by child labor unconstitutionally regulated production.

Generally, however, Day supported federal regulation of business. In Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company v. Robinson (1914), he wrote an opinion sustaining amendments to the HEPBURN ACT that greatly expanded federal JURISDICTION in railroad regulation, and in Harriman v. Interstate Commerce Commission (1908) he vigorously dissented from an opinion by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES that weakened the commission's SUBPOENA powers. Day also consistently sided with the government in antitrust suits. Soon after his appointment, he provided the decisive vote for the government in NORTHERN SECURITIES COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1904). Although he acquiesced in the Court's RULE OF REASON doctrine in STANDARD OIL COMPANY V. UNITED STATES and UNITED STATES V. AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY(1911), Day expressed reservations toward the doctrine in a number of opinions that strongly supported the SHERMAN ACT. Finally, in United States v. United States Steel Corporation (1920), he led the dissenters who hotly disputed the Court's approval of the corporation's control of most of the steel industry. Consistently acting as a principled foe of monopoly, Day advocated governmental intervention to destroy concentrated power and insure competition.

Despite Day's views in the child labor case, he supported the concept of a NATIONAL POLICE POWER based on the commerce clause. In Pittsburgh Melting Company v. Totten (1918) he sustained the Meat Inspection Act of 1906, and in HOKE V. UNITED STATES (1913) he offered a classic defense of the police power to uphold the MANN ACT. Congress's control over commerce, he said, was "complete in itself," and Congress might adopt "not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of police considerations."

Similarly, Day upheld widespread uses of state police powers. He joined Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN's dissent in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), and he supported the Court's approval of compulsory VACCINATION in JACOBSON V. MASSACHUSETTS (1905). Day consistently rejected the rigid FREEDOM OF CONTRACT dogma of Lochner. In McLean v. Arkansas (1909) he wrote to sustain state mining safety regulations and deferred to legislative prerogative: "The [state] legislature being familiar with local conditions is, primarily, the judge of the necessity of such enactments." Although the judiciary might have different views of social policy, Day insisted judges had no warrant to interfere. When the Court invalidated a state law prohibiting YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS in COPPAGE V. KANSAS (1915), Day protested against a literalist view of liberty of contract and, ignoring the Lochner precedent, he argued that "liberty of contract may be circumscribed in the interest of the State and the welfare of its people."

Day served on the Court until 1922. His opinions, though not memorable, were relatively free from rigid dogma. He contributed significantly to the Court's general approval of the expanded scope of governmental authority, federal and state. In the latter part of his career, that support extended to the prosecution of dissenters and radicals as he consistently sided with the government in the "Red Scare" cases. His 1918 child labor opinion unfortunately has served to obscure his more enduring contributions to constitutional law, such as his support for national regulatory power and an expanded state police power authority.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

MCLEAN, JOSEPH E. 1946 William Rufus Day: Supreme Court Justice from Ohio. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

DAYTON, JONATHAN
(1760–1824)

Jonathan Dayton, the youngest signer of the Constitution, represented New Jersey at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. He spoke several times at the Convention in support of small-state positions. He was afterward speaker of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES and a senator. In 1807 he was arrested for conspiring with AARON BURR but was not tried.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

DAYTON BOARD OF EDUCATION v. BRINKMAN

See: Columbus Board of Education v. Penick

DAYTON-GOOSE CREEK RAILWAY COMPANY v. UNITED STATES
263 U.S. 456 (1924)

A unanimous Supreme Court here sustained the constitutionality of the recapture provision of the ESCH-CUMMINGS TRANSPORTATION ACT of 1920. The Dayton-Goose Creek Railway earned a return exceeding six percent of its property value, prompting the Interstate Commerce Commission to ask what arrangements it had made to contribute to the fund for which the act had provided. The railroad then sought an INJUNCTION against enforcement of the act, alleging the provision's unconstitutionality. Sixteen railroads, including some of the most powerful of the day, filed AMICUS CURIAE briefs.

Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT asserted that Congress's power over INTERSTATE COMMERCE was not limited to prescribing reasonable rates and voiding unjust ones. Its regulatory power was "intended . . . to foster, protect, and control the commerce with appropriate regard to the welfare of those who are immediately concerned, as well as the public at large, and to promote its growth and insure its safety." Because private railroads offered a public service, Congress might regulate them in order to assure performance of that function. After considering the necessity and justification for the recapture provisions, Taft concluded that the railroad's obligation to serve the public limits it to only "fair or reasonable profit." Reducing a carrier's income to what the Court deemed a FAIR RETURN did not constitute a TAKING OF PROPERTY without compensation because the act made the carrier only a trustee of any "excess." The government was entitled to appropriate that amount for "public uses because the appropriation takes away nothing which equitably belongs either to the shipper or to the carrier."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

DEAN MILK COMPANY v. CITY OF MADISON
340 U.S. 349 (1951)

A Madison, Wisconsin, city ordinance that prohibited the sale of milk pasteurized at a plant more than five miles outside city limits provided the basis for clarification of the limits on STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE. A 6–3 Supreme Court invalidated the law as an "undue burden on INTERSTATE COMMERCE" because it effectively barred the sale of milk from firms in neighboring Illinois. Justice TOM C. CLARK also found a discrimination against outside producers which could not be sustained as an exercise of the state's POLICE POWER when "reasonable nondiscriminatory alternatives" were available, as here.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

DEATH PENALTY

See: Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and Race; Capital Punishment Cases of 1972; Capital Punishment Cases of 1976

DEBS, IN RE
158 U.S. 564 (1895)

Eugene V. Debs, head of the American Railway Union, petitioned for a writ of HABEAS CORPUS on the ground that he had been imprisoned illegally, for contempt of court, because of his defiance of an INJUNCTION issued by a United States CIRCUIT COURT. That draconian injunction, which became a model for subsequent injunctions in American LABOR disputes, sought to end the strike by Debs's union against railroads hauling Pullman sleeping cars. The Pullman Company and the managers association of twenty-four railroad CORPORATIONS, according to a later federal investigation, sought to crush the strike and the union rather than accept any peaceable solution. The managers jubilantly described the injunction as a "gatling gun on paper." It prohibited the strikers from attempting to obstruct the movement of mail or INTERSTATE COMMERCE by the struck railroads. It also forbade the use of "persuasion" aimed at preventing workers from doing their jobs.

Justice DAVID J. BREWER, speaking for a unanimous Supreme Court, delivered a breathtakingly broad opinion based not on any statutory authority for the injunction, but on general principles of national supremacy. "The strong arm of the national government," he declared, "may be put forth to brush away all obstructions to the freedom of INTERSTATE COMMERCE or the transportation of the mails.

If the emergency arises, the army of the Nation, and all its militia, are at the service of the Nation to compel obedience to its laws." Similarly, Brewer added, the United States might invoke the power of its courts to remove obstructions by injunctions. Brewer's opinion transcended the particular injunction in this case; he failed to examine its terms, though it outlawed persuasion as well as force and assumed that the refusal to work for a railroad is an obstruction of commerce and the mails.

National supremacy, which the Court rendered nearly impotent to cope with obstructions to commerce caused by giant corporations, triumphed against the militant union. The union never recuperated from its defeat in this case and soon disintegrated. Debs taught that injunctions could be effective union-smashing devices. They became common afterward. The case also foreshadowed the use of the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT against unions. The circuit court had issued the injunction mainly on the ground that the strike was a combination in restraint of interstate commerce. The Supreme Court said that it did not dissent from that conclusion but preferred to rest its judgment on "broader ground."

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

LINDSEY, ALMONT 1942 The Pullman Strike. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

DEBS v. UNITED STATES
249 U.S. 211 (1919)

During his long and controversial career as a LABOR leader and radical, Eugene V. Debs twice ran afoul of the federal government, which looked upon his activities as a threat to the nation's economic and political orthodoxy. In 1894 he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for contempt of court as part of the GROVER CLEVELAND administration's efforts to crush the Pullman boycott in Chicago. In IN RE DEBS (1895) the United States Supreme Court affirmed this conviction and upheld the sweeping labor INJUNCTION which Debs and other leaders of the American Railway Union were alleged to have violated. Two decades later, as the leader of the American Socialist Party and one of the most visible critics of the WOODROW WILSON administration's decision to enter WORLD WAR I, Debs again found himself in federal court, this time charged with violating the ESPIONAGE ACT of 1917.

Debs was tried and convicted on the basis of a speech he delivered at a socialist, antiwar rally in Canton, Ohio, for inciting insubordination, disloyalty, and mutiny in the armed forces and for obstructing military recruitment. In his oration, Debs praised other imprisoned leaders of the party who had been convicted for aiding and abetting resistance to the draft. In the course of his speech Debs also accused the government of using false testimony to convict another antiwar activist and he labeled the war as a plot by "the predatory capitalist in the United States" against the working class, "who furnish the corpses, having never yet had a voice in declaring war and . . . never yet had a voice in declaring peace." He told the audience that "you need to know that you are fit for something better than slavery and cannon fodder," and he ended by noting: "Don't worry about the charge of TREASON to your masters; but be concerned about the treason that involves yourselves." Debs was sentenced to ten years in prison.

When the Debs case reached the Supreme Court, a postwar "red scare" had descended on the nation. CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY trials of leaders of the Industrial Workers of the World were still underway. The Department of Justice had embarked on a large-scale program that would culminate in the PALMER RAIDS and the deportation of hundreds of ALIEN radicals.

Without even a reference to the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test enunciated a week earlier, a unanimous Supreme Court affirmed Debs's conviction in an opinion written by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. Although Holmes conceded that "the main theme" of Debs's speech had concerned socialism, its growth, and its eventual triumph, he argued that "if a part of the manifest intent of the more general utterance was to encourage those present to obstruct recruiting . . . the immunity of the general theme may not be enough to protect the speech." As Harry Kalven has remarked, "It is somewhat as though George McGovern had been sent to prison for his criticism of the [VIETNAM] war." Holmes saw the case as a routine criminal appeal; in a letter to Sir Frederick Pollock, Holmes referred to the Debs case, saying, "there was a lot of jaw about free speech."

Debs remained in federal prison long after the armistice. Although a convicted felon, he received the Socialist Party nomination for President in 1920 and nearly a million votes. President Wilson, in failing health and embittered by the war and its critics, refused to pardon Debs before leaving the White House in 1921. His successor, the Republican conservative WARREN G. HARDING, displayed greater compassion by granting the socialist leader a pardon.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

Bibliography

FREUND, ERNST 1919 The Debs Case and Freedom of Speech. The New Republic, May 3, 1919, p. 13. Reprinted in University of Chicago Law Review 40:239–42 (1973).

DECISION

A decision is the final determination by a competent tribunal of matters of law and fact submitted to it in a CASE OR CONTROVERSY. The decision is ordinarily in writing and comprises the JUDGMENT or decree in the case. The decision is not itself law, but only evidence of the law; and the value of a case as precedent derives less from the decision than from the reasoning behind the decision. The term "decision" is one of popular usage and not a technical legal term.

The Supreme Court reaches its decisions in CONFERENCE following the ORAL ARGUMENT of a case. A vote is taken after each Justice has had a chance to state his or her views. The decision is announced by means of a memorandum order or as part of a formal opinion.

In casual usage, the decision is often confounded with the OPINION OF THE COURT, a usage sanctioned by certain law dictionaries and a number of court opinions. In precise usage, however, the decision is the conclusion reached by the court, while the opinion is a statement of the reasoning by which the decision was reached. In the simplest terms, the decision answers the question: who won the case.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

DECLARATION AND RESOLVES OF FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS

See: First Continental Congress, Declarations and Resolves of

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE
1 Stat. 1 (July 4, 1776)

America's most fundamental constitutional document was adopted by the United States in Congress on July 4, 1776. The Declaration of Independence may carry little weight in the courts; it may, for all its being placed at the head of the Statutes at Large and described in the United States Code as part of the "organic law," have no legally binding force. Yet it is the Declaration that constitutes the American nation. John Hancock, president of the Continental Congress, transmitting the Declaration to the several states, described it as "the Ground & Foundation of a future Government." JAMES MADISON, the Father of the Constitution, called it "the fundamental Act of Union of these States."

The Declaration of Independence is the definitive statement for the American policy of the ends of government, of the necessary conditions for the legitimate exercise of political power, and of the SOVEREIGNTY of the people who establish the government and, when circumstances warrant, may alter or abolish it. No mere tract in support of a bygone event, the Declaration was and remains the basic statement of the meaning of the United States as a political entity.

The historical event, the Revolution, provided the occasion for making that statement. RICHARD HENRY LEE, on instructions from the Virginia convention, introduced three resolutions on June 7, 1776: to declare the colonies independent, to establish a confederation, and to seek foreign alliances. Each of the resolutions was referred to a select committee, one of which was charged with preparing "a declaration to the effect of the first resolution." Lee's motion was adopted on July 2, the Declaration two days later.

Although the Congress had appointed for the task a distinguished committee, including JOHN ADAMS of Massachusetts, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN of Pennsylvania, ROGER SHERMAN of Connecticut, and ROBERT LIVINGSTON of New York, THOMAS JEFFERSON of Virginia actually penned the Declaration. So well did Jefferson express the sentiments of the Congress that his committee colleagues made only a few changes in his draft.

Jefferson, by his own account, turned to neither book nor pamphlet for ideas. Nor did he seek to expound a novel political theory. His aim was to set forth the common sense of the American people on the subject of political legitimacy. To be sure, there are ideas, and even phrases, that recall JOHN LOCKE: the Declaration follows Locke in stressing the NATURAL RIGHTS of man as the foundation of the political order. But the concept of man's natural autonomy, modifiable only by his consent to the rule of others in a SOCIAL COMPACT, was long acknowledged in the American colonies; it inhered in congregational church polity, and it was transmitted through such theoretical and legal writers as EMERICH DE VATTEL, Jean-Jacques Burlamaqui, and Samuel Pufendorf, as well as by the authors of CATO'S LETTERS and other popular works.

The Declaration of Independence has a structure that emphasizes its content. It begins with a preamble, by which the document is addressed not to the king of Great Britain or to the English public, but to the world at large, to the "opinion of mankind." Moreover, the purpose of the document is said explicitly to be to "declare the causes" that impelled the Americans to declare their independence from Britain.

There had been other revolutions in British history, but this one was different. From the barons at Runnymede to the Whigs who drove James II from the throne, British insurgents had appealed to the historic rights of Englishmen. The declarations they extracted—from MAGNA CARTA to the BILL OF RIGHTS—were the assurances of their kings that the ancient laws obtaining in their island would be respected. The preamble of the Declaration of Independence makes clear that this is not the case with the American Revolution. The case of Britain's rule in America was to be held up to a universal standard and exposed as tyrannical before a "candid world." Against the selfsame standard all government everywhere could be measured. Everyone who reads the Declaration with his eyes open must be struck by this fact: the Declaration justifies the independence of the American nation by appeal not to an English or an Anglo-American standard, but to the universal standard of human rights.

There follows next a statement of the ends of government and of the conditions under which obedience to government is proper. "All men are created equal . . . endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights . . . among [which] are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Equality is the condition of men prior to government—logically prior, not chronologically. But that equality is not equality of condition, or even equality of opportunity; certainly it is not equality of intelligence, strength, or skill. The equality that men possess by nature is equality of right. There is, among human beings, none with a right to rule the others; God may claim to rule human beings by right, human beings may rule the brutes by right, but no human being has a claim to rule another by right.

The rights with which men are endowed are said to be "unalienable." That is, human rights may be neither usurped nor surrendered, neither taken away nor given up. The Declaration rejects the false doctrine of Thomas Hobbes (more gently echoed by WILLIAM BLACKSTONE) that men on entering society and submitting to government yield their natural rights and retain only "civil" rights, dispensed and revoked at the pleasure of the sovereign.

"To secure these rights, governments are instituted among men." The purpose of government is to protect the natural rights which men possess, but which, in the absence of government, they are not secure enough to enjoy. Government in society is not optional, it is a necessary condition for the enjoyment of natural rights. But the institution of government does not create an independent motive or will in society. All just powers of government derive "from the consent of the governed."

The Declaration asserts that the people retain the right of revolution, the right to substitute new constitutions for old. But it also asserts that the exercise of that right is properly governed by prudence—a prudence that the Americans had shown in the face of great provocation.

The next section of the Declaration is a bill of indictment against George III on the charge of attempted tyranny. The specifications are divided almost evenly between procedural and substantive offenses. The fact that the king—by his representatives in America—assembled the provincial legislatures at places far from their capitals or required persons accused of certain crimes to be transported to England for trial, evinced a tyrannical design by disregard of procedural safeguards. But even when the established procedures were followed, as in giving or withholding assent to legislation, the result could be tyrannical; for example, the suppression of trade, the discouragement of population growth, and the keeping of standing armies in peacetime were acts according to the forms of due process that unjustly deprived the Americans of their liberty. Still other acts, such as making the royal assent conditional on surrender of the right of representation and withholding assent from bills to create provincial courts, were tyrannical in both form and substance.

The most critical charge, the thirteenth, was that the king had conspired with others—the British Parliament—to subject the Americans to a JURISDICTION foreign to their constitution. The Americans had come to see that a compact existed between the British king and each of his American provinces by which the king exercised executive power in each even as he did in the home island, and that the common executive was the sole governmental connection between America and Britain. The imperial constitution, as the Americans had come to understand it, no more permitted the British legislature to regulate the internal affairs of Massachusetts or Virginia than it did the provincial legislatures to regulate the internal affairs of England or Scotland. But the British legislature could not breach the compact between the king and the provinces because Parliament was not a party to that compact. The king, however, by conniving at that usurpation, did breach the compact.

The final five accusations deal with the fact that Britain and America were at war. One charge that Jefferson included, but Congress struck out, accused the king of waging "cruel war against human nature itself" by tolerating the introduction of SLAVERY into the colonies and sanctioning the slave trade. Only two states, Georgia and South Carolina, objected to the passage, but the others acquiesced to preserve unanimity. In any case, the condemnation of slavery was implicit in the opening paragraphs of the Declaration.

The conclusion of the document asserts that the Americans had tried peaceably to resolve their differences with the mother country while remaining within the empire, and in a final paragraph contains the actual declaration that the erstwhile colonies were now independent states.

Whether the colonies became independent collectively or individually was a matter of debate for at least a hundred years. At the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, JAMES WILSON, and ALEXANDER HAMILTON advanced the former position, while LUTHER MARTIN maintained the latter position. At least until the Civil War, different THEORIES OF THE UNION arose based on differing interpretations of the act of declaring independence.

Considered as a tract for the times, as a manifesto for the Revolutionary cause, the Declaration marks an important step in American constitutional development. The resistance to British misrule in America had, at least since the French and Indian Wars, been based on an appeal to the British constitution. The Americans had charged that the imposition of taxes by a body in which they were not represented and the extension to them of domestic LEGISLATION by a Parliament to whose authority they had not consented violated the ancient traditions of British government. The constitution, that is, the arrangement of offices and powers within the government and the privileges of the subjects, had been overridden or altered by the British Parliament. Although the differences between the American provinces and the mother country were great, they were differences about, and capable of resolution within, the British constitutional framework. The liberties that the colonists had claimed were based on prescription.

When independence was declared, the British constitution became irrelevant. The liberties claimed in the Declaration are grounded in natural law; they are justified by reason, not by historical use. The American Revolution was, therefore, the first and most revolutionary of modern revolutions. Not the quantity of carnage but the quality of ideas distinguishes the true revolution. In the Declaration was recognized a HIGHER LAW to which every human law—constitution or statute—is answerable. The British constitution, as it then existed, was tried by the standards of that higher law and found guilty of tyranny. As the British constitution, so every constitution, including the American Constitution, may be tried; and on conviction the sentence is that the bonds of allegiance are dissolved.

Much of American constitutional history has revolved around the attempt to reconcile the nation's political practice with the teachings of the Declaration. The gravest problem in our constitutional history was SLAVERY. Although the Congress struck out Jefferson's condemnation of slavery as "cruel war against human nature," the founders clearly understood that slavery was incompatible with the principles of liberty and equality that they espoused.

Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY, in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), tried to read the black man out of the Declaration. But this was a distortion of the history and the plain meaning of the document. Even JOHN C. CALHOUN had not stooped to this, choosing rather to denounce the Declaration than to pervert its meaning. The antithesis between the Declaration and the existence of chattel slavery was recognized by the slave power in Congress when, during the gag rule controversy, any petition referring to the Declaration of Independence was automatically treated as a petition against slavery and laid on the table.

The intimate connection between the Declaration of Independence (and therefore of antislavery) and the Constitution became the theme of the political career of ABRAHAM LINCOLN. When the slavery question divided the nation, Lincoln, with the voice of an Old Testament prophet, called for rededication to the principles of the Declaration. During Lincoln's presidency, the Civil War, begun as a challenge to the Union, was won as a struggle to vindicate the Declaration of Independence. It was fought to prove that a nation "dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal" could endure.

The putative antagonism between America's two basic documents, invented by the slave power in the nineteenth century, was revived as a political theme during the Progressive movement. Authors like J. ALLEN SMITH and CHARLES A. BEARD contended that the Constitution's system of FEDERALISM, SEPARATION OF POWERS, CHECKS AND BALANCES, and bicameralism frustrated the unfettered will of the people allegedly set free by the Declaration. Smith and Beard posited a virtually bloodless coup d'état by wealthy conservatives—a "Thermidorian reaction" to the success of the democratic revolution. Thus constitutional forms were attacked as illegitimate, notwithstanding that they were intended to preserve the Declaration's regime of LIMITED GOVERNMENT.

The Beard-Smith thesis remained popular as long as the Constitution seemed to be a barrier to social reform and redistribution of wealth and income by the government. The later twentieth century, however, witnessed another change in the attitude of intellectuals toward the two documents. President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT appointed a sufficient number of Supreme Court Justices to insure that the Court would ratify his policies as constitutional. Later, the WARREN COURT devised a host of new "constitutional" rights and remedies for criminal defendants, ethnic minorities, and political dissenters. The Constitution was transformed into a "living" document, that is, one almost infinitely malleable in the hands of enlightened judges. History, understood as progress, rather than nature thereafter dictated the ends of government. The Declaration of Independence, with its references to "the laws of nature and of nature's God," although revered as a symbol of American nationality, ceased to be regarded as the source of authoritative guidance for American politics.

The Constitution of the United States is sometimes pronounced, by scholars or politicians, to be neutral with respect to political principles. But the Constitution was not framed in a vacuum. It was devised as the Constitution of the nation founded by the Declaration of Independence. The Declaration prescribes the ends and limits of government, and proclaims the illegitimacy of any government that fails to serve those ends or observe those limits. The Constitution is thus ruled by the Declaration. The Constitution provides for the government of the regime created by the Declaration: the regime of equality and liberty.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

BECKER, CARL L. 1922 The Declaration of Independence. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

DIAMOND, MARTIN 1975 The Declaration and the Constitution: Liberty, Democracy and the Founders. The Public Interest 42:39–55.

HAWKE, DAVID 1964 A Transaction of Free Men: The Birth and Course of the Declaration of Independence. New York: Scribner's.

JAFFA, HARRY V. 1959 The Universal Meaning of the Declaration of Independence. Chap. 14 of The Crisis of the House Divided. New York: Doubleday.

WHITE, MORTON 1978 The Philosophy of the American Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press.

DECLARATION OF WAR

The Constitution gives Congress the power "to declare War . . ." (Article I, section 8, clause 11). There is no explicit provision for any other exercise by the United States of its sovereign power to make war, although the President is made "COMMANDER IN CHIEF of the Army and Navy of the United States . . ." (Article II, section 2). But the draftsmen were certainly familiar with the concept of undeclared war, usually with limited purposes and theaters of operation, such as the French and Indian War of 1754–1756 and the opening campaign of the Seven Years War between England and France, in which GEORGE WASHINGTON had fought as a lieutenant colonel. Indeed, ALEXANDER HAMILTON observed that "the ceremony of a formal denunciation [i.e., declaration] of war has of late fallen into disuse" (THE FEDERALIST #25). Whether the Framers intended to give Congress the paramount power to wage war against other sovereigns is a question that has ever since been debated but not formally resolved. The problem had not, of course, arisen under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, when all federal (or confederate) power was vested in the Continental Congress. The records of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION furnish no clear answer. The draft submitted by the Committee on Detail on August 6, 1787, gave Congress the power "to make war." When it was considered eleven days later, on motion by ELBRIDGE GERRY and JAMES MADISON, "make" was changed to "declare." The brief debate gives no indication of any effect the change was intended to have on the allocation of war-making power between President and Congress. For what it is worth, some years later Hamilton expressed the view that making war was essentially an executive function, while Madison thought the power belonged primarily to Congress.

Whatever the Framers may have intended, the practice has clearly been in accord with the Hamiltonian view. The United States has fought only five declared wars (the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Spanish War, WORLD WAR I, and WORLD WAR II), but the President has committed the armed forces to combat on more than 150 other occasions, from JOHN ADAMS'S undeclared naval war with France in 1798–1799 to the KOREAN WAR and the VIETNAM WAR. (See also POLICE ACTION; STATE OF WAR.) The CIVIL WAR was, of course, undeclared, since a declaration would have constituted a recognition of Confederate SOVEREIGNTY, but it was treated as war for the purposes of international law. (See PRIZE CASES, 1863.) As a practical matter, whether a formal declaration of war adds much to the power of the President is doubtful, so long as Congress furnishes the necessary men and money. Thus, during the Vietnam War the lower federal courts held that Congress, by supplying troops and arms, made the President's actions constitutional; and the Supreme Court let their decisions stand. (See MASSACHUSETTS V. LAIRD.)

Congress has occasionally attempted to assert its primacy in war, but without much success. In 1896, when a group of congressmen proposed to declare war on Spain, GROVER CLEVELAND scotched the project by informing them that as Commander in Chief he had no intention of using the Army and Navy for any such purpose. The WAR POWERS RESOLUTION of 1973, enacted over President RICHARD M. NIXON'S veto, provides in substance that before the President can commit the armed forces to actual or potential combat he must first "consult" with Congress and must withdraw the forces within ninety days unless Congress declares war or provides "specific authorization" for their continued employment.

Scholars disagree on the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution. In any case, it seems unlikely to have much practical effect, as President GERALD R. FORD demonstrated in 1975 when he immediately, and with a minimum of "consultation," used the armed forces to rescue an American vessel, the Mayaguez, and its crew, who had been seized by the communist regime in Cambodia. History suggests that it will be politically very difficult for Congress to deny support when the troops are actually fighting. If there is any historical difference between wars declared by Congress and other wars, it seems to be that the former have usually been larger in scale and have had as their goal not some more or less limited objective, such as rescuing American citizens or defending an ally from attack, but the total defeat of the enemy.

JOSEPH W. BISHOP, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

CRUDEN, JOHN C. 1975 The War-Making Process. Military Law Review 69:35–143.

LOFGREN, CHARLES A. 1972 War-Making Power under the Constitution: The Original Understanding. Yale Law Journal 81:672–702.

ROSTOW, EUGENE V. 1972 Great Cases Make Bad Laws: The War Powers Act. Texas Law Review 50:833–900.

DECLARATORY JUDGMENT

Until the beginning of the twentieth century, most American courts would entertain lawsuits only when plaintiffs sought redress for harm already suffered or imminently threatened. Except in certain real property actions, the plaintiff was not deemed harmed simply because uncertainty about his or her legal rights made potentially beneficial conduct too risky to undertake. For example, if a manufacturer were uncertain about whether a new product would infringe another's patent, or a would-be demonstrator were uncertain whether the planned demonstration was protected under the FIRST AMENDMENT, the only choices were to refrain from acting or to proceed and wait to be sued or prosecuted.

The declaratory judgment is a judicial remedy that allows the uncertain individual instead to file suit, asking a court to determine the legal rights in question. It reflects the view, long accepted in land title law, that paralysis due to uncertainty is real harm that courts should alleviate.

Over the first decades of the twentieth century, the states and the federal government adopted this remedy by statute. Declaratory judgments came into use not only to eliminate uncertainty but also to provide a similar but less coercive remedy to individuals eligible for injunctive relief.

Under Article III, the life-tenured federal judiciary may not give ADVISORY OPINIONS but may hear only real disputes between adverse, concretely interested parties. Because declaratory judgments are typically sought in advance of liability-causing conduct, there were early doubts that declaratory judgment actions would satisfy this requirement, known as RIPENESS. To allay this concern, the drafters of the federal declaratory judgment statute limited the remedy to "case[s] of actual controversy within [the courts'] JURISDICTION."

The Supreme Court held in Perez v. Ledesma (1971) that, for reasons of comity, a person being prosecuted in a state court for violation of a state criminal law may not seek a declaratory judgment in a federal court that the law is unconstitutional. Prior to a state prosecution, however, an individual may obtain a federal declaration of constitutional rights. That individual may have to flirt so dangerously with actual prosecution in order to satisfy the ripeness requirement, however, that the declaratory judgment may not be able to perform its salutary function of encouraging constitutionally protected conduct.

The plaintiff in a declaratory judgment action is frequently the person who would be a defendant in a more traditional lawsuit, and the elements of a complaint for declaratory relief often differ from those of a more traditional complaint. In applying legal doctrines that antedated the declaratory remedy to this new form of litigation, courts sometimes require that the suit be transposed to what it would have been had the declaratory remedy not existed. Thus, in determining whether the right to TRIAL BY JURY exists in a suit for a declaratory judgment, the courts must ascertain whether the claim could have been filed as an action at COMMON LAW had the declaratory judgment not been invented. Similarly, in determining whether a suit arises under federal law within the meaning of the FEDERAL QUESTION statute, the courts must ascertain whether the federal element would have appeared in the plaintiff's prima facie case had the suit been brought for a conventional remedy. Unfortunately, there is not always only one conventional alternative to a given declaratory judgment action, and this cumbersome transposition process has been difficult to administer.

CAROLE E. GOLDBERG-AMBROSE
(1986)

Bibliography

NOTE 1949 Developments in the Law: Declaratory Judgments, 1941–1949. Harvard Law Review 62:787–885.

DECONSTRUCTION

The topic of deconstruction and the Constitution arises chiefly because of work done since 1978 by the left-oriented scholars of the Conference on CRITICAL LEGAL STUDIES, who have applied modern continental critical theory, including literary theory, to Anglo-American law. The issues involved also descend from the rise of PRAGMATISM in American philosophy in the late nineteenth century and its influence on American JURISPRUDENCE via the skepticism of OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., and the later adherents of LEGAL REALISM. This dual ancestry is not coincidental. Deconstruction was popularized by the French critical philosopher Jacques Derrida, especially in his 1974 book Of Grammatology. Though most influenced by Friedrich Nietzsche, Derrida also drew on a forebear of American pragmatism, Charles Peirce.

Like many pragmatists, deconstructionists take a radical stance toward the epistemological doubts that have occupied modern philosophy since Descartes. In their view, although the various ways in which human minds represent their experiences to themselves (from organic sensations to oral languages, to conventional writing) may bear some complex relationship to an external physical reality, they never provide a direct, unmediated grasp of it. The visual sensation of seeing the color "red," the sounds of the English adjective "red," and the written word "red" may somehow signify to us something that is really out there, but we cannot claim that our physical sensation or our oral or written terms are full or necessary representations of it. The something might cause different physical sensations in different individuals or sensory apparatuses, and certainly it can be signified by different sounds or written marks. All this is uncontroversial in most modern epistemologies.

What deconstructionists distinctively stress is that our sense of the meaning of our particular representations, our regard of those representations as signs for external somethings, is heavily dependent on the relationship of the representations or signs to some existing system of representations or signs. Obviously, the meaning readers of written English assign to the written marks "red" requires familiarity with the system of signs that is written English. The meaning speakers of English assign to the spoken sounds of "red" requires knowledge of English as a system of sound signs. Even the visual sensation we call "red" has its meaning for us only by reference to other sensations and to a system of terms that classifies and labels those sensations for us, a system that partly constitutes our knowledge of colors. The sensation, too, is for us a sign that gains much of its sense from a system of signs.

Deconstructionists therefore see all human experience as heavily defined and constructed by vast webs of signs that get their meaning more clearly from their relationship to other signs than from reality. We still presume that some such reality exists, that human minds have formed systems of signs to give reality a measure of order and meaning, and that reality can somehow prompt sensations in us that may persuade us to revise the signs we use to depict it. But deconstructionists stress that our choice of particular signs to represent reality is always in some measure arbitrary, influenced more by the preexisting set of signs available to us than any self-evident demands of external reality. Hence, we cannot have much confidence that any set of signs is an accurate representation of reality. All such systems are but partial interpretations, discernibly built out of other partial interpretations that at best show aspects of the world, and those through a glass darkly.

Yet we persist in taking our interpretations, our systems of signs, to be something more. We present them to ourselves (or they present themselves to us) as reliable windows or maps revealing an external reality of matter andor reason that can be rendered present to our minds and senses. Like Nietzsche and the pragmatists, deconstructionists urge us to abandon this old dualistic "metaphysics of presence," in which we try to pierce through our mental limitations to grasp fully an external truth beyond. Instead, we should admit that our world of experience is always composed largely of questionable interpretations, partial perspectives, and contingent systems of signs. We should therefore turn inquiry away from the "reality" for which signs allegedly stand, toward a greater understanding of the components, possibilities, and limitations of systems of signs. The world will then be seen as sets of signs or texts, melding philosophy and other modes of inquiry into literary theory.

Deconstruction is one means toward a better understanding of these texts. One deconstructs something—a novel, a treatise, a law, a political institution—by viewing it as a system of signs and unraveling it to reveal its reliance on preexisting systems of signs to make it meaningful; its consequent vulnerability to multiple meanings, depending on which of the systems of signs it incorporates, is stressed, along with its embodiment of those systems' biases and of the contradictions within them and among them, and thus its inevitable incompleteness and incoherencies. To be sure, one may also find insights that seem worth preserving. But ultimately one can always show any text to be another partial, ambiguous system of signs constructed out of other such systems.

Unlike the early scientific resolutive-compositive method of inquiry, moreover, the point of deconstruction is not to give us a fuller understanding of how the object of analysis functions while otherwise leaving it intact after we mentally reconstruct it. Deconstruction always invalidates much of what a text initially appeared to do or say, altering our sense of it. We may then strive to construct new accounts of the text's themes that are more comprehensive because they encompass what we have learned; but those accounts will ultimately remain partial interpretations.

The appeal of all this for critical scholars in Anglo-American law should be clear. National legal systems can plausibly be viewed as systems of signs for which people make strong claims. They are said to have considerable internal coherence and to be largely accurate representations of external social and political worlds and of appropriate moral principles. Those claims seem integral to a legal system's very legitimacy. But, via deconstruction, one can often show that many legal terms derive from preexisting discourses identified with particular ruling groups and that they express those groups' interests more clearly than they express any objective moral principles. Legal language can also be shown to be subject to multiple inconsistent interpretations, depending on which elements are stressed. Thus, the law may seem indeterminate or incoherent, gaining definition only from those who wield enough power to make their interpretations stick.

Critical legal scholars have deconstructed the doctrines of judicial and ADMINISTRATIVE LAW in numerous areas of American law, such as contracts, property, and criminal law, in just these ways. At times, however, they have moved too quickly to two types of conclusions that represent shallow readings of the implications of deconstruction. Some align deconstruction with Marxism, attempting to show that legal doctrines at bottom express capitalist class interests rooted in material relations of production. Such readings have some force, but in deconstructionist terms they do not go far enough unless they concede that the various Marxisms are but further systems of signs and that Marxist claims to have grasped the truth of external material reality are highly vulnerable to deconstructionist debunking. Other critical legal scholars write as if the American legal system is peculiarly guilty of insuperable internal contradictions and ambiguities, implying that a system ordered on different principles would overcome these problems. But again deconstruction suggests that although there are more or less encompassing interpretations, all systems of signs will always be vulnerable to demonstrations of their inadequacy.

These points can be exemplified by showing how we might begin deconstructing the Constitution. Its PREAMBLE says that "We the People of the United States" are ordaining and establishing the document. Those words seem to assume a traditional understanding of flesh-and-blood persons consciously using words as authoritative signs, accurately representing themselves and their thoughts and giving new order to their lives.

But deconstructing interpreters can challenge that picture in all the ways just suggested. "We the People" is, after all, plainly a kind of metaphor: no reader really thinks all the people of the United States directly established the Constitution. Interpreters can easily show, moreover, that the text's terms, derived largely from the discourse of American elites, treat many as virtually invisible nonpeople (e.g., indentured servants, women, African Americans, Native Americans, all of whom the document relegates to lesser categories, explicitly or implicitly). Thus, deconstruction might first suggest that the Constitution is a misleading, biased creation of elites alone, as leftist critics assert.

Next, one can deconstruct the Constitution to display internal dissonances. For instance, in contrast to the Preamble, the last article of the original Constitution (Article VII) indicates that the Constitution must be ratified by nine state conventions. Here the Constitution seems established more by a supermajority of the states, or of these state conventions, than by "We the People." Wrestling with whether the text finally describes itself as a product of the national populace or the states has long led analysts to conclude that it is opaque or inconsistent, incapable of constituting a government without added meaning supplied by its interpreters. If so, it is less a constitution than it purports to be.

Deconstruction of "We the People" can be taken still deeper yet. We might question how much of its meaning derives from reference to any flesh-and-blood inhabitants of the United States, then or now, be they a national populace, ruling elites, or state citizens. For some readers, the opening words actually summon up thoughts of Founding Fathers who are plainly not all "the People," but a few, and whose identities are provided much more by enduring national myths than any perceptions of the Founders' physical reality. Insofar as readers do think of "the People," moreover, they are likely to imagine the type of entity portrayed in certain traditions of political writing and novels—a heroic demos of anti-aristocratic republicans, unified by a general will and acting as a collective moral agent capable of political transformations. That may be a stirring image, but it is one expressing knowledge of certain systems of signs, not of the particular persons living in the United States in 1787–1789.

The power of those political traditions in shaping our reading of the Constitution suggests in turn that these systems of signs are actually providing much of the Constitution's meaning that the text purports to derive from "the People." If so, the most fundamental political claim of the Constitution, the claim that it is the creation of responsible human agents who are guiding their own collective destiny, may appear to be a myth. The Constitution now seems much more a set of signs drawn from other systems of signs that constituted the consciousness of "We the People" than a law created by "We the People." In short, deconstruction of "We the People" can lead us to think of political agency in a different way, a subjectless way that is sharply opposed to what the text initially seemed to suggest.

There is something to be learned from each of these three deconstructionist readings of the Constitution, culminating in this challenge to meaningful human agency itself. Yet we should also recall that the partiality of every existing interpretation does not by itself show that they are all simply false. The existence of contradictions in a text or a body of laws does not alone prove that its essential themes are indefensible. And the dependence of our minds on the many systems of signs that order our worlds of experience does not prove that we cannot play a significant role in coming to understand those worlds somewhat better and in reordering them beneficially.

Like the "cynical acid" concerning the determinacy of legal rules and factual judgments that the legal realists earlier provided, deconstruction simply renders certain particular claims of these sorts less credible. It does not prevent us, after encompassing the insights it provides us, from going on to construct systems of ideas and institutions that seem more satisfactory than their predecessors, albeit still imperfect. Nor does it tell us much about how such constructive efforts should proceed. Thus, deconstruction itself represents but a partial contribution to understanding the Constitution and judging what it can and should mean, how and whether it can and should work, today and in the future.

ROGERS M. SMITH
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Political Philosophy of the Constitution.)

Bibliography

DERRIDA, JACQUES 1974 Of Grammatology, trans. Gayatri Spivak. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

KELMAN, MARK 1987 A Guide to Critical Legal Studies. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

NIETZSCHE, FRIEDRICH 1966 Beyond Good and Evil: Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future, ed. Walter Kaufmann. New York: Random House.

DE FACTO/DE JURE

De facto and de jure are old COMMON LAW terms meaning, respectively, "in fact" and "in law." In older usage, de facto carried at least a hint of reference to illegitimacy or illegality. Thus, a usurper might be called a de facto king, or a corporation whose formation was irregular might be called a de facto corporation. As these examples suggest, the connotation often was that for some legal purposes the person or institution would be treated as if there were no irregularity. De jure, on the other hand, carried a suggestion of lawfulness or rightfulness.

In modern constitutional law, these terms have come to be used almost exclusively in the context of racial SEGREGATION, and particularly segregation in the public schools. In this context the connotations concerning lawfulness are reversed. De jure segregation refers to the separation of pupils by race resulting from deliberate action by state officials, such as the legislature or the school board. De facto segregation refers to the racial separation of pupils by other causes, and particularly through the adoption of the "neighborhood school" policy in a community characterized by residential separation of the races. The Supreme Court has held that only de jure segregation violates the Constitution. (See COLUMBUS BOARD OF EDUCATION V. PENICK; DAYTON BOARD OF EDUCATION V. BRINKMAN.)

There is some artificiality in this distinction. When a school board's members are aware of racial patterns in residential neighborhoods, and they draw school attendance district lines in ways that do not minimize the racial separation of pupils, it would not do violence to the language to call the results of their action de jure segregation. Yet the courts tend not to "find" the "fact" of de jure segregation in this circumstance.

On the other hand, deliberately segregative actions of the school board in the rather distant past may be held to constitute de jure segregation, so that the school board remains under a continuing obligation to dismantle a "dual" (segregated) system by taking affirmative remedial action, such as the busing of children. The Columbus and Dayton cases that are cited above exemplify this line of reasoning.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Keyes v. School District No. 1; School Busing; Swann v. Charlotte-Mechlenburg Board of Education.)

Bibliography

SEDLER, ROBERT ALAN 1979–1980 The Constitution and School Desegregation: An Inquiry into the Nature of the Substantive Right. Kentucky Law Journal 68:879–969.

DEFAMATION

See: Libel and the First Amendment

DEFUNIS v. ODEGAARD
416 U.S. 312 (1974)

DeFunis challenged the constitutionality of the University of Washington law school's use of racial preferences in admitting students. The case was expected to be a decisive test for AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs in higher education. Instead, by a 5–4 vote, the Supreme Court held that the case was moot, because the law school would graduate DeFunis at the end of the current term, however the case might be decided. Cynics, remembering how the Court had recently dealt with the argument of MOOTNESS in ROE V. WADE (1973), suggested that the majority had been readier to reach the merits of the ABORTION issue in Roe than it was to face the problem presented by DeFunis.

Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, who thought the case was not moot, wrote an opinion on the merits. He concluded that the law school had denied DeFunis, a nonminority applicant, the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS by awarding a preference solely on the basis of race. Justice Douglas commented that minority applicants should be evaluated specially to avoid cultural bias in admissions, but he did not explain how a school could evaluate minority applicants separately without devising a scale to measure them against other applicants. Such a scale would necessarily involve setting goals for minority representation. DeFunis was Justice Douglas's last chance to speak to these issues, which returned to the Court in REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), after his retirement.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

DE JONGE v. OREGON
299 U.S. 353 (1937)

The Oregon Criminal Syndicalism Law was declared unconstitutional as applied to a person who conducted a meeting of the Communist party at which "neither CRIMINAL SYNDICALISM nor any unlawful conduct was taught or advocated." The Supreme Court held that peaceful speech at a peaceful, open meeting could not be punished constitutionally simply because of party sponsorship even if it were assumed that the party advocated violent overthrow of government. "Peaceable assembly for lawful discussion," declared Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES for an 8–0 Court, "cannot be made a crime."

This is one of the early cases "incorporating" the FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY provisions of the FIRST AMENDMENT into the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, thus making them binding on the states. Unlike many other speech cases of the 1920s and 1930s, De Jonge rests firmly on freedom of speech rather than on collateral due process grounds such as VAGUENESS. It also foreshadows later, not altogether successful, attempts by the Court to distinguish between those Communist party members and activities devoted to constitutionally protected advocacy and those implicated in incitement to revolutionary violence.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

DELEGATION OF POWER

Early in American constitutional history the Supreme Court announced a rule that Congress could not delegate its power to the President or others. Yet the practical demands of an increasingly complex governmental environment have forced Congress to delegate, often quite broadly. The Court has rationalized all but a few delegations without abandoning the rule of nondelegation. This has been accomplished through successively more permissive formulations of the rule. Though the rule is in a state of desuetude, some revival is possible in the aftermath of the Court's invalidation of a LEGISLATIVE VETO in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983).

A few commentators call the rule against delegations a judge-made doctrine lacking genuine constitutional status. This suggests the untenable proposition that genuine rules of constitutional law must be explicit in the constitutional document. Building on a COMMON LAW maxim against redelegation of delegated authority and on JOHN LOCKE's observation that only the sovereign people can determine the legitimate location of legislative authority, most commentators have found nondelegation implicit in the SEPARATION OF POWERS and in concepts of representative government and DUE PROCESS OF LAW. The status of the rule thus secured, debate has concentrated on exactly what it prohibits.

As if the rule prohibited all delegations, nineteenth-century judges tried to reconcile it with the practical needs of government by denying that delegations in fact were delegations in law. In The Brig Aurora (1813) the Supreme Court held that Congress had not breached the rule by empowering the President to make factual finding on which the application of a previously declared congressional policy—an embargo—was contingent. In Wayman v. Southard (1825) the Court permitted a delegation to federal judges for "filling up the details" of part of the Federal Process Act of 1792. Though the rules announced in these cases were modest when stated in the abstract, the delegations themselves were the objects of acrimonious political conflict. By the early 1900s, power to declare facts and fill up details had become the foundation for the delegation of such discretionary authority to the President and administrative agencies as power to decide which grades of tea to exclude from import, to make rules regulating grazing on lands in national forests, and even to vary tariffs on imported goods.

In J. W. HAMPTON & COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1928) the Court formulated a more realistic delegation doctrine when it acknowledged that transfers of discretionary authority were essential to the effectiveness of Congress's will in modern conditions. The new rule was that congressional delegation is permissible if governed by adequate "legislative standards," a term that now includes statutory specifications of facts to be declared, preambulatory statements of legislative purpose, and even judicial imputations of legislative purpose inferred from legislative and administrative history.

The Court has rarely taken the standards requirement seriously. Illustrative of a pattern that prevails to the present, Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Brothers (1933) found adequate guidance for issuing radio station licenses in what Congress called the "public convenience, interest, and necessity." This pattern was interrupted when the Court unexpectedly used the delegation doctrine against the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT (1933) in PANAMA REFINING COMPANY V. RYAN (1935) and SCHECHTER POULTRY CORPORATION V. UNITED STATES (1935). But the spirit of these decisions was not to survive, and by the middle of World War II the Court had returned to using the delegation doctrine more for rationalizing than for limiting transfers of congressional power.

As if delegations were not broad enough, the Court in United States v. Mazurie (1975) suggested an even more permissive approach. UNITED STATES V. CURTISS-WRIGHT EXPORT CORPORATION (1936) had seemed to hold that because the President had independent powers in the field of FOREIGN AFFAIRS, the standards requirement for congressional delegations to the President could be relaxed in that area. At a time when Panama and Schechter had recently limited the scope of delegated power, Curtiss-Wright was a reasonable move toward flexibility in foreign affairs. But Curtiss-Wright featured an unorthodox theory of extraconstitutional or inherent governmental power, and the need for a special approach to foreign affairs delegations disappeared as the Court returned to its old permissiveness toward delegations generally. During the VIETNAM WAR, however, the nondelegation doctrine was raised in opposition to American policy, and, although the Court successfully avoided the issue, government lawyers invoked CurtissWright before congressional committees. One of these lawyers was WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, who later led the Court to its first reaffirmation of Curtiss-Wright's delegation doctrine in Mazurie, a relatively noncontroversial case involving a delegation to the tribal council of an American Indian tribe over liquor sales on a reservation. The tribe's council, said Justice Rehnquist, had "independent authority over tribal life," just as the President had over foreign affairs, and Curtiss-Wright was cited for a new rule that the standards requirement is "less stringent in cases where the entity exercising the delegated authority itself possesses independent authority over the subject matter." In light of what "less stringent" can mean today, Mazurie has a potential for rationalizing virtual abdications of congressional responsibility, not only to the President but to the states, whose legal claims to "independent authority" are stronger than that of Indian tribal councils.

Since the 1930s and with accelerated frequency after the Vietnam War, Congress used the legislative veto to recapture power lost through broad delegations. To the extent—perhaps modest—that regulatory and political conditions permit, Congress may choose to delegate more narrowly now that the legislative veto is unavailable. And if the Court really has renewed its commitment to the separation of powers, it may honor the standards requirement with something more than mere lip service.

SOTIRIOS A. BARBER
(1986)

Bibliography

BARBER, SOTIRIOS A. 1975 The Constitution and the Delegation of Congressional Power. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

DAVIS, KENNETH C. 1958 Administrative Law Treatise. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

DELEGATION OF POWER
(Update)

The delegation doctrine concerns Congress's power to give or delegate the rulemaking authority it has to the executive or judicial branches. In most of the cases involving the doctrine, litigants have challenged congressional delegation of rulemaking authority to ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES.

By the early 1980s the Supreme Court seemed to have a well-established position on the scope of Congress's power to delegate its rulemaking power. The Court held, as a matter of formal doctrine, that Congress could not delegate its power "to legislate," for such a delegation would violate the Constitution's command that "all legislative Powers . . . shall be vested in a Congress." But the Court also held that Congress could seek "assistance" from the other branches in exercising its LEGISLATIVE POWER and therefore could give the other branches authority to enact rules to "fill in" the details of congressional policy. Yet, although the formal doctrine purported to set some judicially enforceable limits on congressional delegations, the Court's application of the doctrine imposed virtually no limits on Congress's power to delegate rulemaking authority.

The Court's decisions held that to be constitutional a delegation must contain a congressionally adopted policy or set of "intelligible principles" to guide and confine the other branch in its rulemaking activity. The Court stated that such intelligible principles were necessary to ensure that the other branch merely implemented or filled in the details of policy that Congress had adopted. It also held that the standards were necessary to give the courts a means of measuring whether the other branch had complied with the scope of Congress's delegation and thus to measure whether the other branch had acted in conformity with the "will of Congress."

This delegation doctrine was virtually without force. With two exceptions in the 1930s, the Court found that all of Congress's delegations contained sufficient intelligible principles. Many of the approved principles—such as "consistent with public convenience, interest and necessity" and "just and reasonable"—were so broad and vague that they gave the other branch seemingly unconfined discretion in exercising its rulemaking authority.

The Court's lenient, accommodating approach in applying the "intelligible principles test" led many commentators to charge that the Court paid mere lip service to the test and, as a result, failed to enforce a meaningful judicial limitation on Congress's delegations. Indeed, the Court's approach seemed to reflect a judicial judgment that congressional delegation of rulemaking authority is inevitable and desirable and that the difficulties of creating more restrictive constitutional rules or principles were greater than the benefits of doing so.

Then, in 1983, the Supreme Court did invalidate a congressional delegation of its decision-making power, and some thought that the Court might be signaling a stricter approach to delegation challenges. In IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983) the Court held that the one-house LEGISLATIVE VETO was unconstitutional. For over fifty years, some legislation delegating congressional authority to the executive branch had provided that specified executive action could be annulled by one house of Congress. In Chadha, for example, Congress delegated power to the ATTORNEY GENERAL to allow ALIENS to remain in the country, even though their visas had expired. The legislation delegating this power provided that either house of Congress could, nonetheless, overturn the attorney general's determination in a particular case by adopting a resolution. The attorney general allowed Chadha to stay after his visa expired, but the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES passed a resolution ordering him to leave. Accepting that Congress has the power to set the terms for aliens to remain in the country, the Court ruled that setting or revising those terms was a legislative act and that Congress could exercise its legislative power only through legislation, which requires action by both houses and presentation to the President. Congress could not vest its legislative power in one of its own houses.

The Chadha majority did not consider the one-house veto as a delegation issue. But as Justice BYRON R. WHITE pointed out in dissent, Chadha in effect imposed a significantly more stringent limitation on Congress's power to delegate its authority than the Court had imposed in the preceding fifty years. Some thought that the Court's more stringent approach would be limited to congressional delegations to parts of Congress. Others speculated that Chadha might signal the Court's willingness to scrutinize all the delegations more closely, as some members of the Court, most notably Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, have sometimes urged.

The Court has recently indicated that speculation about the broader implications of Chadha probably is not warranted. In two significant cases during the 1988 term, the Court reaffirmed its use of the intelligible principles test and emphasized its long tradition of upholding delegations in light of the need for flexibility in formulating and enforcing federal policy. In MISTRETTA V. UNITED STATES (1989), the Court upheld Congress's delegation of power to the Sentencing Commission to promulgate a new system of determinate sentences for federal crimes. And in Skinner v. Mid-America Pipeline (1989), the Court sustained Congress's delegation of power to the secretary of transportation to establish and collect pipeline-safety user fees. The pipeline case seems particularly significant because in an earlier decision the Court had seemed to suggest that it might employ greater scrutiny in testing the constitutionality of Congress's delegation of its power to tax. Skinner belies that suggestion.

The Court's approach in delegation cases can be contrasted with its approach in cases charging that Congress has appropriated the powers of another branch. In those cases, the Court is far less deferential. For example, in BOWSHER V. SYNAR (1986) the Court held that Congress acted beyond its authority in attempting to give "executive" power to the comptroller general, who is responsible to Congress, not the executive branch. The difference in judicial scrutiny may reflect a conclusion that JUDICIAL POWER need not be exercised to prevent one branch from giving away some of its powers but should be exercised to prevent one branch from usurping the powers of another. A branch can protect against relinquishing its own power simply by refusing to delegate; it must rely on the courts to prevent another branch from invading its domain.

Moreover, although the Court rarely invalidates congressional delegation of its rulemaking authority on constitutional grounds, the Court does require that such delegations be clearly made. Such a requirement protects against congressionally unauthorized rulemaking by the other branches. For example, in National Cable Television Association v. United States (1974), the Court held that the Federal Communications Commission overstepped its delegated authority in seeking to cover its administrative costs through user fees, noting that such fees could be viewed as taxes and that congressional delegations of its revenue-raising power should be "narrowly construed." As the Skinner case shows, Congress can delegate the power to collect revenue when it chooses to do so, but the Court will require a clear statement that such delegation is intended, lest the other branches intrude without permission into the congressional domain.

SCOTT H. BICE
(1992)

Bibliography

ARANSON, PETER H. et al. 1982 A Theory of Legislative Delegation. Cornell Law Review 68:1–67.

SYMPOSIUM 1987 The Uneasy Constitutional Status of the Administrative Agencies: Part 1, Delegation of Powers to Administrative Agencies. American University Law Review 36: 295–442.

DELIBERATE SPEED

See: All Deliberate Speed

DELIBERATIVE DEMOCRACY

Deliberative democracy aspires to combine two fundamental values in the design of political institutions— political equality and deliberation. The idea is to combine the equal consideration of everyone's views (political equality) with conditions that facilitate those views' being formed on the basis of good information, good faith discussion, and a balanced account of competing arguments (deliberation). Some theorists have held that the American Constitution has, from the beginning, been an attempt to create the social conditions where deliberative democracy might be possible, at least among representatives who speak for, or act for, the people.

JAMES MADISON, most notably, was committed to the "republican principle" (which entailed political equality) as well as to a scheme of government that would "refine the popular appointments by successive filtrations," as he said at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. The aspiration for deliberative democracy was famously expressed by Madison in FEDERALIST No. 10, where he said representatives "refine and enlarge the public views by passing them through a chosen body of citizens." ALEXANDER HAMILTON added, in Federalist No. 71, "The republican principle demands that the deliberate sense of the community should govern . . . but it does not require an unqualified complaisance to every sudden breeze of passion, or to every transient impulse which the people may receive from the arts of men, who flatter their prejudices to betray their interests." It is representatives who must "withstand the temporary delusion" to "give time and opportunity for more cool and sedate reflection." The Federalist distinguishes deliberative public opinion, filtered through representatives considering the public interest on the basis of cool and sedate reflection, from the more direct expressions of the public will that can be twisted by vicious arts of campaigning and persuasion. Directly consulting the people can be dangerous because the people may be motivated by passions or interests to form factions adverse to the rights of others or to the general interest. Such factions are not motivated by deliberative public opinion, the Federalists believed. Indeed deliberation might well have prevented the evils of more DIRECT DEMOCRACY as experienced by the ancient Athenians. Madison speculates in Federalist No. 63 that a representative and deliberative body like the U.S. SENATE might have protected the Athenians from "decreeing to the same citizens the hemlock on one day and statues on the next." It was, after all, the Athenians who killed Socrates.

The Federalist position was that deliberative democracy could be practiced only in small representative bodies that preserved some independence from the public. No matter what the character of the participants, too large a body would make deliberative democracy impossible. "Had every Athenian citizen been a Socrates, every Athenian Assembly would still have been a mob," Madison asserts in Federalist No. 55. Madison also resisted attempts to include a "right of instruction" in the BILL OF RIGHTS, a right that would have stripped legislators of decisionmaking autonomy. Similarly, the Federalists opposed annual or even very frequent ELECTIONS in order to give legislators flexibility to deliberate in the public interest.

The ANTI-FEDERALISTS opposed the "filter" theory of REPRESENTATION because they thought that only the more educated and privileged would get to do the representing or filtering for everyone else. In such elite bodies, ordinary citizens such as simple farmers would not be included. The Anti-Federalists advocated a very different theory of representation, one modeled on a different metaphor, the "mirror." As Melancton Smith argued, in opposing the Constitution at the New York ratification convention, representatives "should be a true picture of the people, possess a knowledge of their circumstances and their wants, sympathize in all their distresses, and be disposed to seek their true interests." Anti-Federalists sought frequent elections, TERM LIMITS, and any measures that would increase the closeness of resemblance between representatives and those they represented. In Rhode Island, the Anti-Federalists even held a REFERENDUM on the Constitution. Tiny Rhode Island was the only state to submit the Constitution to direct vote of the people. The Federalists, thinking such a method inappropriate and sensing probable defeat, boycotted the referendum and the Constitution was voted down. The Federalists argued that the only way to consult "the people in their assembled collective capacity" would be to gather representatives who "could reason, confer and convince each other." Only through a small representative body, such as the state conventions prescribed for approving the Constitution, could a deliberative decision be taken. The Anti-Federalist strategy of consulting the public without a requirement of organized deliberation (although the Anti-Federalists did conduct their referendum through votes of town meetings) represented the first salvo in a long war of competing conceptions of democracy. In the long run, the Federalist emphasis on deliberation and discussion may well have lost out to a form of democracy, embodied in referendums and INITIATIVES, and in other forms of direct consultation that achieve political equality—regardless of whether or not it is also accompanied by deliberation.

In the more than two centuries since the founding of the Republic, many changes, both formal and informal, in the American political system have served to promote political equality through more direct public consultation, but at the cost of deliberation. Consider what has happened to the ELECTORAL COLLEGE, the election of senators, the presidential selection system, the development and transformation of the national POLITICAL PARTY conventions, the rise of referenda (particularly in the Western states), and the development of public opinion polling. People vote directly and their votes are counted equally. Many aspects of Madisonian "filtration" have disappeared in a system that has taken on increasing elements of what might be called "plebescitary" democracy (embodied in referenda, primaries, and the influence of polls).

The Electoral College was originally intended to be a deliberative body, meeting state by state, that would choose the most qualified person. Now if members of the Electoral College exercise independent judgment, they are condemned as "faithless electors" and may be subject to challenge in the courts. Senators are elected directly since the SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT (which came into effect in 1913). Primaries and referenda bring to the people decisions that were previously made by political elites—party leaders in the case of nominations and legislators in the case of laws. Public opinion polls bring substantive issues directly to the public (in representative samples) without any opportunity for "filtering" or deliberation.

Yet this movement to more direct consultation has come at a cost—a loss in the institutional structures that provide incentives for deliberation. Much SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH has established that ordinary citizens suffer from "rational ignorance" (to use Anthony Downs's famous phrase). Each individual voter or citizen can see that his or her individual vote or opinion will not make much difference to policy outcomes, and so there is little reason to make the effort to become more informed. The result is a consistently low level of knowledge in the American electorate about politics and policy. Hence, the pursuit of political equality through increasingly direct methods of public consultation has produced a loss in political information, informed choice, and deliberation.

Some theorists have held that the Framers of the Constitution foresaw this problem from the beginning and, in the words of Yale Law School Professor Bruce Ackerman, developed a "dualist theory" of democracy. Most of the time the public is inattentive and uninformed, just as social science has established. Ackerman calls the resulting condition "normal politics." However, every once in a while, the Republic is seized by an issue or a crisis and there are sustained periods of "mobilized deliberation," which Ackerman calls "constitutional moments." Thus far, there have been at least three: the founding of the Republic, RECONSTRUCTION, and the NEW DEAL. In each case, deliberative democracy is practiced for a period long enough for fundamental principles to be seriously debated and established. The result is the possibility of informal constitutional change—informal because it takes place outside the confines of the formal amendment process specified in Article V.

The "constitutional moment" combines political equality and deliberation—for a "moment" or brief period of time. There are other efforts to realize both principles, at least for informal processes of public consultation that might advise policymakers and improve the public dialogue. "Deliberative Opinion Polling" selects random samples of the public and brings them together for several days of deliberation. The result is an explicit attempt to combine the two forms of representation at odds in the founding of the Republic: the filter and the mirror, the process of deliberation, and a small microcosm that is a picture of the whole. Through scientific random sampling a more representative group can be created than anything envisioned by the Anti-Federalists. And through sustained deliberation, the public's views can, in a sense, be refined and enlarged. All of this is to say that the quest to realize "deliberative democracy" continues in policymaking, the study of public opinion, and CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION.

JAMES S. FISHKIN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Amending Process; Amendment Process (Outside Article V); Constitutional Dualism.)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE A. 1991 We the People: Foundations. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1998 We the People: Transformations. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

BESSETTE, JOSEPH M. 1994 The Mild Voice of Reason: Deliberative Democracy and the American National Government. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

DOWNS, ANTHONY 1956 An Economic Theory of Democracy. New York: Harper and Row.

FISHKIN, JAMES S. 1991 Democracy and Deliberation: New Directions for Democratic Reform. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

——— 1995 The Voice of the People: Public Opinion and Democracy. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

KRAMNICK, ISAAC 1988 The "Great National Discussion": The Discourse of Politics in 1787. William and Mary Quarterly 45:3–31.

MADISON, JAMES; HAMILTON, ALEXANDER; and JAY, JOHN 1987 The Federalist Papers (originally published 1788). New York: Penguin Books.

RAKOVE, JACK N. 1996 Original Meanings: Politics and Ideas in the Making of the Constitution. New York: Random House.
STORING, HERBERT J. 1981 What the Anti-Federalists Were For. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1993 Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech. New York: Free Press.
——— 1993 The Partial Constitution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

DELIMA v. BIDWELL

See: Insular Cases

DEMEANOR EVIDENCE

See: Confrontation, Right of

DE MINIMIS NON CURAT LEX

(Latin: "The law does not concern itself with trifles.") It is a maxim of the COMMON LAW that the courts will not intervene in disputes where the substance of the controversy is insignificant. For example, a court will not hear a case that turns on an amount less than a dollar or a time period shorter than a day.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Cases and Controversies.)

DEMOCRACY

See: Communications and Democracy; Corporate Power, Free Speech, and Democracy; Deliberative Democracy; Democratic Theory and Constitutional Law; Direct Democracy

DEMOCRATIC THEORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Much of American CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY and law is concerned with the existence and significance of conflict between democracy and constitutionalism as implemented in this country. Democracy is often thought to be in conflict both with constitutionalism as a general matter and with the institutional implementation that Americans have largely come to identify with constitutionalism, JUDICIAL REVIEW.

Whether there is any inconsistency depends first on the nature of constitutionalism and the particular features of the constitution in question. At the very least a constitution is a set of rules that describe a structure of government, a way of making official decisions. The U.S. Constitution, like many others, is entrenched, which is to say that the ordinary legislative processes for which it provides are not empowered to change the Constitution itself. Congress, for example, may not provide in LEGISLATION that there shall be three senators from every state. Again like many others, the U.S. Constitution goes beyond prescribing a structure and places substantive limits on the power of the government it creates. The theory of constitutionalism is especially concerned with entrenchment and the hierarchical system of legal rules that produces it.

A constitution can conflict with democratic principles if it sets out a nondemocratic structure of government or if it sets out a democratic structure but limits the power of the government so created. The standard argument that the U.S. Constitution is undemocratic rests on a relatively simple concept of democracy, assuming that it consists of simple majority rule, either directly or through a representative legislature. By this test the constitutional structure itself is undemocratic because the U.S. SENATE and the ELECTORAL COLLEGE give disproportionate weight to the influence of voters in small states. Moreover, the ordinary government, itself only somewhat majoritarian, is subject to limits that can be overridden only through the even less-majoritarian AMENDING PROCESS of Article V. Amendment requires a SUPERMAJORITY of three- fourths of the states, so that even a small minority of the population can block constitutional change.

To the extent that the Constitution still protects state autonomy from national legislation it might be said to be undemocratic in one more way, because reserved state powers can block the decision of a national majority. Yet, clashes between local and national majorities present a problem concerning the definition of the relevant political community.

Whether there is really a conflict between the Constitution and democracy, however, depends on the content of democratic theory. Much of American constitutional commentary concerns the presence or absence of that conflict, and hence turns on the proper understanding of democracy. In particular, those who argue that constitutionalism and the U.S. Constitution do not actually conflict with democracy commonly appeal to a more sophisticated notion of democracy than the absolute rule of a majoritarian assembly. Three strategies of reconciling constitutionalism and democracy are especially important. Of those, two maintain that entrenchment and substantive limitations can provide prodemocratic corrections for the failings of ordinary representative government, while the third rejects an essentially procedural understanding of democracy.

According to the first such argument, representative as-semblies are prone to make decisions that reflect the short-term but not the long-term views of their constituents. Seemingly undemocratic structures like BICAMERALISM and substantive limitations like the CONTRACT CLAUSE can respond to those tendencies. On this account such limitations are a form of collective self-binding, the standard example of which is Odysseus's strategy of having himself bound to the mast while he listened to the Sirens' song. Fearful of what they and their representatives may do in perilous economic times, for example, the people in a sober moment of constitution-making may adopt a provision like the contracts clause banning state impairment of contractual obligations, thus limiting the legislature's flexibility in times of crisis.

Whether such arrangements perform as designed is a question for political science. Whether they are consistent with democracy is a question for normative democratic theory. Three questions seem particularly important. First is the basic issue of establishing the power of decision when the people are divided. May a majority, or a supermajority, properly bind a minority? To the extent that democracy entails such binding, as in most conceptions it does, it is in an important sense collectivist, allowing the choices of individuals to be overridden by those of groups. Second are issues associated specifically with self-binding where the model is an action by one individual, for example, someone who puts the alarm clock on the other side of the room before going to bed. Whether such self-management techniques are actually desirable requires a surprisingly intricate investigation. It must be explained, for example, why the choices made by an individual at one time are more authentic than those made at another. Finally, because constitutions generally endure beyond the lives of those who make them, the claim that constitutional self-binding is consistent with democracy requires a theory in which the decisions of one group of citizens count as self-binding with respect to their successors.

Much has been said about the last question, the problem of the "dead hand." It becomes serious when there is a real question whether a self-binding limitation introduced into the constitution in the past would enjoy contemporary democratic support. If not, whether the constitution is consistent with democracy depends on the temporal dimension of democracy. According to some approaches, collective political entities are continuous for purposes of establishing political obligation, with the result that people alive today may legitimately be bound by the choices of their predecessors. The question of intertemporal political obligation was debated with particular vigor around the time of the U.S. Constitution's framing.

The second approach to reconciling constitutionalism and democracy rests on the claim that representative assemblies and other policymakers are apt to reflect the views of their constituents too little, not too much. Where the interests of agents and principals are different, the principals will want to take steps to check the power of their agents. A classic example involves political dissent. Incumbents in office have strong incentives to suppress dissent, for example by limiting the ability of outsiders to report on official misconduct. A strong law of SEDITIOUS LIBEL is one familiar way of accomplishing that end.

If the people are to rule, however, they must have information about the conduct of their agents and in particular must have information about official misconduct. They thus have interests very different from those of incumbents in office. One way of dealing with this divergence of interests is to take basic questions concerning the operation of the political process out of the hands of the ordinary legislature by resolving those questions in a constitution. Protections for FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS are central examples.

As regulation of the political process moves beyond basic protection for political dissent it raises questions that must be referred to democratic theory. For example, many people believe that political influence will depend on personal wealth when the most effective means of access to public debate are controlled by private hands. Such disparities of influence are thought by some to be inconsistent with democracy. That conclusion has important implications for the rules governing political debate and hence for the constitutional entrenchment of such rules.

Finally, it is possible to reconcile familiar features of the U.S. Constitution with democracy by taking a nonprocedural view of democracy, one that breaks democracy's usual association with majority, or indeed popular, rule. One might think, for example, that the commitment to POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY really rests on a commitment to equality in certain substantive respects, so that what is more substantively egalitarian is more democratic. Whether a constitution is democratic, according to this theory, depends on that constitution's consonance with the deeper theory on which democracy itself rests.

This step is especially attractive if one is seeking to justify the substantive limitations in the U.S. Constitution that are now widely thought predominantly to protect political minorities. For example, constitutional antidiscrimination norms often provide such protection. Reconciling such norms with majoritarian democracy has posed a major problem for constitutional theory. If an important component of democracy is truly substantive, however, and if its substance is egalitarian, that problem of theory becomes much easier to solve. Nonprocedural conceptions of democracy, however, are quite controversial.

As the preceding discussion suggests, the potential inconsistency between democracy and an entrenched constitution is not tied to the particular enforcement mechanisms that any constitution may employ. Judicial review is not a necessary condition for that conflict. Nor is it a sufficient condition. A judiciary that somehow was confined to enforcing clear rules in a constitution that was itself democratic would raise no problems with respect to democracy. That would be true no matter how the judges were chosen and no matter how they could be removed.

Judicial review is potentially undemocratic to the extent that it puts the power of choice in the hands of judges. The supposed clash between democracy and judicial review is so prominent in American constitutional debate because it is so common for the judiciary to apply textually unclear constitutional provisions, or to apply principles that the judges have found to be implicit in the Constitution, in ways that appear closely to track the views of the judges as to desirable outcomes. When that happens constitutional adjudication resembles substantive policymaking whereby the judiciary displaces the decisions made by nonjudicial governmental actors. Because of their indirect selection and life tenure, American federal judges are frequently regarded as less accountable to the people than are elected officers.

As a result, judicial review as practiced in America encounters what ALEXANDER M. BICKEL called the countermajoritarian difficulty. Whether that difficulty is real depends first of all on the extent to which the courts make substantive choices. When they do, the question whether their decisions are likely to be less democratic than those of other governmental decisionmakers is once again one for political science and democratic theory. Leading attempts to solve the countermajoritarian difficulty generally rely on arguments that reconcile the Constitution itself with democracy. Thus Bickel argued that because of the institutional characteristics of the judiciary, substantive judicial choice will in certain important areas reflect the long-term views of the people better than will the output of the more directly electoral process. In a similar vein, John Hart Ely has sought to justify large parts of contemporary constitutional doctrine on the grounds that it enhances democracy by mitigating the agency problems associated with representative legislatures. Implicit in a position like Ely's is a claim concerning the institutional tendencies of courts: that they will in general produce the kinds of doctrines that reinforce, rather than hinder, democracy.

There are commentators who reject all such attempts to reconcile American constitutional practice with democracy and conclude that the conflict is irresolvable. Those who take that position often then say, so much the worse for constitutionalism, or so much the worse for democracy.

JOHN C. HARRISON
(2000)

Bibliography

AMAR, AKHIL R. 1991 The Bill of Rights As a Constitution. Yale Law Journal 100:1131–1210.

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill.

DWORKIN, RONALD 1996 Freedom's Law. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

ELSTER, JON and SLAGSTAD, RUNE, eds. 1988 Constitutionalism and Democracy. New York: Cambridge University Press.

GOLDWIN, ROBERT A. and SCHAMBRA, WILLIAM A., eds. 1980 How Democratic is the Constitution? Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research.

HART ELY, JOHN 1980 Democracy and Distrust. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

DEMONSTRATION

The FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees the right of persons to congregate peaceably in large numbers in appropriate public spaces in order to communicate ideas or grievances. In Edwards v. South Carolina (1963) the Court described an assemblage of 187 protesters on the grounds of a state capitol as "an exercise of . . . basic constitutional rights in their most pristine and classic form." Mass demonstrations cannot be prohibited simply on account of their size or their need to occupy public land.

Constitutional litigation over demonstrations tends to focus on three issues. First is the question of what public spaces must be made available to demonstrators. By virtue of the number of persons involved, mass demonstrations can be disruptive of other activities even when the demonstrators remain peaceable and orderly. When must those other activities give way to the First Amendment claims of persons who wish to engage in a mass demonstration?

The Supreme Court has never given a definitive and comprehensive answer to that question, and probably never could. The Court has indicated, however, that demonstrations in PUBLIC FORUMS such as streets, sidewalks, and parks cannot be subjected to a blanket prohibition. On the other hand, the Court has upheld regulations that entirely prohibited demonstrations in a jailyard and in areas of a military base otherwise open to the public.

Second, the issue has arisen whether a demonstration can be prohibited or postponed on the ground that audience hostility to the demonstrators threatens to produce a BREACH OF THE PEACE. The Court has inveighed against any such "heckler's veto" in OBITER DICTUM, and has reversed disorderly conduct convictions of speakers who continued their orderly protests in the face of potentially threatening crowds. In language quoted many times in the United States Reports, the Court stated in TERMINIELLO V. CHICAGO (1949):

> [A] function of free speech under our system of government is to invite dispute. It may indeed best serve its high purpose when it induces a condition of unrest, creates dissatisfaction with conditions as they are, or even stirs people to anger. Speech is often provocative and challenging. It may strike at prejudices and preconceptions and have profound unsettling effects as it presses for acceptance of an idea. That is why freedom of speech . . . is . . . protected against censorship or punishment, unless shown likely to produce a clear and present danger of a serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance, or unrest.

Despite strong dicta and case outcomes favorable to speakers, it cannot be said with assurance that a hostile audience can in no circumstances provide a basis for disallowing a demonstration. The Court has yet to decide a case in which the regulatory authority was confined by a narrowly drawn statute and the police could not contain the HOSTILE AUDIENCE by the exercise of due diligence. There is also the unresolved question of whether demonstrators who wish to proceed in the face of a hostile audience have a First Amendment right to do so on repeated occasions, or whether at some point the mounting costs of police protection for the demonstrators might justify a prohibition on the continuation of their expressive activity.

A third set of issues that arise frequently in disputes over demonstrations concerns the doctrine of prior restraint. Demonstrators who wish to assemble in large numbers can be required to obtain permits in advance, despite the general presumption in First Amendment law against licensing. Officials who administer permit systems for marches and rallies are required to rule upon permit requests expeditiously, and to validate denials in court on a strict timetable. Thus, administrative delay is not permitted to serve as an indirect means of prohibiting mass demonstrations. If a permit request is under administrative or judicial consideration by the time a demonstration is scheduled to take place, the demonstrators may be permitted to proceed without a permit and defend against a prosecution on the ground that they exhausted all channels of prior approval and were entitled under the First Amendment to have their permit request granted. However, demonstrators who do not both apply for a permit and pursue all channels of appeal may be prosecuted for holding a march or rally without a permit, despite the fact that had they applied for a permit they would have been entitled under the Constitution to have it issued.

A fourth issue concerning demonstrations that has not generated a great deal of litigation to date but could do so in the future is whether persons who engage in mass demonstrations can be made to pay the costs of municipal services that attend the event. The Court has indicated in dictum that reasonable costs for such services as clean-up, police protection, and the provision of toilets can be assessed against the demonstrators. However, such assessments can be quite large for major events and can be used as a means of discouraging demonstrations. This issue of cost assessment was important in the litigations during the 1970s over the proposed march of American Nazis in the predominantly Jewish community of Skokie, Illinois, and could emerge as a focus of controversy in other cases.

VINCENT BLASI
(1986)

Bibliography

BAKER, C. EDWIN 1983 Unreasoned Reasonableness: Mandatory Parade Permits and Time, Place, and Manner Regulations. Northwestern University Law Review 78:937–1024.

BOLLINGER, LEE C. 1982 The Skokie Legacy: Reflections on an "Easy Case" and Free Speech Theory. Michigan Law Review 80:617–633.

DENATURALIZATION

American CITIZENSHIP can be lost in two ways: denaturalization and EXPATRIATION. Denaturalization is the official cancellation, for cause, of a certificate of naturalization. It can be employed only against a person who has secured his citizenship by NATURALIZATION. Once denaturalized, a person is again an ALIEN in the eyes of the law; unlike the expatriate, he is considered never to have been a citizen. As an alien, the denaturalized former citizen is vulnerable to DEPORTATION and, in the case of a denaturalized criminal, to extradition.

Denaturalization, like naturalization, is governed by statute—currently, the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. Congress derives the implied power to denaturalize from its express power set forth in Article I, section 8, to "establish a uniform Rule of Naturalization." Congress has provided for denaturalization when a person's citizenship has been "illegally procured" or "procured by concealment of a material fact or by willful misrepresentation."

Denaturalization has been employed against naturalized citizens because of their membership in communist, Nazi, or other organizations espousing doctrines deemed antithetical to American allegiance. In such cases, the ground for denaturalization is that citizenship has been illegally procured because the applicant failed to comply with the statutory condition that he be attached to the principles of the American Constitution for the five years immediately preceding his naturalization. Also under the act, membership in such an organization within five years of naturalization is "prima facie evidence" of a lack of attachment prior to naturalization.

Denaturalization has also been employed against criminals and racketeers (thereby rendering them subject to deportation), on the ground that they obtained their American citizenship by lying about their criminal past. In such a case, even though the courts have held that denaturalization proceedings are suits in EQUITY and are governed by the FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE, the government must prove that the naturalized citizen lied about his criminal past, and thus, in effect, must prove the crime. The Supreme Court has stated, however, that the government need not meet the usual standard of proof for criminal guilt, as the defendant is subject not to penal sanctions but only to denaturalization.

Recently denaturalization suits have also been brought against Nazi war criminals. The central issue in these cases has been falsification or concealment of objective facts about the person's past. Although the courts have been unanimous that the alleged misrepresentations must be material, they have disagreed over whether a misrepresentation is sufficiently material if the truth, which by itself would not have been sufficient to bar the granting of citizenship, would nevertheless have provided leads for uncovering facts of the person's past that would have precluded his naturalization.

Litigants sometimes challenge the constitutionality of denaturalization, arguing either that it reduces naturalized citizens to second class status (in that they can be stripped of citizenship on grounds and by procedures that cannot be applied to native-born citizens), or that Congress's power to naturalize does not carry with it the implied power to denaturalize. To date such arguments have proven unsuccessful.

RALPH A. ROSSUM
(1986)

Bibliography

GORDON, CHARLES and ROSENFIELD, HARRY N. 1984 Immigration Law and Procedure, Vol. 3, chap. 20. New York: Matthew Bender.

ROCHE, JOHN P. 1952 Statutory Denaturalization. University of Pittsburgh Law Review 13:276–327.

DENNIS v. UNITED STATES
341 U.S. 494 (1951)

Eugene Dennis and other high officials of the Communist party had been convicted of violating the ALIEN REGISTRATION ACT of 1940 (the Smith Act) by conspiring to advocate overthrow of the government by force and violence. LEARNED HAND, writing the Court of Appeals opinion upholding the constitutionality of the act and of the conviction, was caught in a dilemma. He was bound by the Supreme Court's CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER rule, and the government had presented no evidence that Dennis's activities had created a present danger of communist revolution in the United States. Hand, however, believed that courts had limited authority to enforce the FIRST AMENDMENT. His solution was to restate the danger test as: "whether the gravity of the evil, discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." Because Dennis's conspiracy to advocate was linked to a grave evil, communist revolution, he could be punished despite the remote danger of communist revolution. Hand's restatement allowed a court to pay lip service to the danger rule while upholding nearly any government infringement on speech. If the ultimate threat posed by the speech is great enough, the speaker may be punished even though there is little or no immediate threat.

The Supreme Court upheld Dennis's conviction with only Justices HUGO L. BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS dissenting. Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON'S PLURALITY OPINION adopted Hand's restatement of the danger rule. At least where an organized subversive group was involved, speakers might be punished so long as they intended to bring about overthrow "as speedily as circumstances would permit."

Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER's concurrence openly substituted a BALANCING TEST for the danger rule, arguing that the constitutionality of speech limitations ultimately depended on whether the government had a weighty enough interest. Congress, he said, surely was entitled to conclude that the interest in national security outweighed the speech interests of those advocating violent overthrow.

Decided at the height of the Cold War campaign against communists, Dennis allied the Court with anticommunist sentiment. No statute would seem more flatly violative on its face of the First Amendment than one that made "advocacy" a crime. Indeed, in YATES V. UNITED STATES (1957) the Court later sought to distinguish between active urging or incitement to revolution, which was constitutionally punishable "advocacy," and abstract teaching of Marxist doctrine, which was constitutionally protected speech.

Defenders of the clear and present danger rule criticize Dennis for abandoning that rule's essential feature, the immediacy requirement. Such commentators see the Court as correcting its Dennis error in BRANDENBURG V. OHIO (1969) in which the Court returned to something like "clear and present danger" and placed heavy emphasis on the immediacy requirement. Justices Black and Douglas subsequently treated Dennis as a case applying the clear and present danger rule and thus as an illustration of the failure of the rule to provide sufficient protection for speech and of the need to replace it with the more "absolute" free speech protections urged by ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN. Proponents of balancing applaud Hand's

"discounting" formula as one of the roots of the balancing doctrine, although only the most ardent proponents of judicial self-restraint support Frankfurter's conclusion that Congress, not the Court, should do the final balancing.

It is possible to read Dennis, Yates, and Brandenburg together as supporting the following theory. The clear and present danger rule, including a strong immediacy requirement, applies to street-corner speakers; so long as their speech does not trigger immediate serious harms, others will have the opportunity to respond to it in the marketplace of ideas, and the government will be able to prepare protective measures against violence that may follow. However, where organized, subversive groups engage in covert speech aimed at secret preparations that will suddenly burst forth in revolution, the "as speedily as circumstances will permit" test is substituted for the immediacy requirement. Covert speech cannot easily be rebutted in the marketplace of ideas; by the time underground groups pose a threat of immediate revolution, they may be so strong that a democratic government cannot stop them or can do so only at the cost of many lives.

Whether or not the Communist party of Eugene Dennis constituted such a covert, underground group impervious to the speech of others and posing a real threat of eventual revolution, a theory such as this is probably the reason the Smith Act was never declared unconstitutional and Dennis was never overruled although both have been drastically narrowed by subsequent judicial interpretation.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1951 Bowing Out Clear and Present Danger. Notre Dame Lawyer 27:325–359.

MENDELSON, WALLACE 1952 Clear and Present Danger—From Schenk to Dennis. Columbia Law Review 52:313–333.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE v. MORENO

See: Department of Agriculture v. Murry

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE v. MURRY
413 U.S. 508 (1973)
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE v. MORENO
413 U.S. 528 (1973)

Piqued by the activities of protesting students and members of "hippie communes" during the VIETNAM years of agony, Congress in 1971 amended the Food Stamp Act to deny eligibility for food subsidies to two classes of applicants: "unrelated" persons living together and persons claimed by others in the previous year as tax dependents. On the same day the Supreme Court struck down both these amendments. Moreno, 7–2, invalidated the "unrelated" limitation on "Fifth Amendment EQUAL PROTECTION" grounds; the amendment was irrelevant to the act's goals of nourishing the needy and aiding agriculture, and harming "hippies" for their unpopularity was not a legitimate legislative purpose. The law thus lacked a RATIONAL BASIS. Murry, 5–4, held the "tax dependency" limitation an unconstitutional IRREBUTTABLE PRESUMPTION. A claimant might be needy during the current year although dependent on another during a previous year; yet the law denied any opportunity to qualify for aid by demonstrating need.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

DEPORTATION

Deportation is the removal of an ALIEN out of the country. Congress has plenary power to deport aliens, even of long residence; its power rests upon the same grounds and is as unqualified as its power to exclude aliens from entering the country. Aliens permitted to enter and reside in the United States remain subject to the power of Congress to order them deported. Congress may direct that all aliens leave the country, or that some leave and others stay, distinguishing between the two by such tests as it thinks appropriate. While aliens cannot be deported without DUE PROCESS OF LAW, guaranteed to them by the Fifth Amendment, they are entitled only to PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS: NOTICE and a HEARING at which they may seek to show that they do not come within the classification of aliens whose deportation Congress has directed. (A resident of the United States who claims to be a citizen cannot be deported without a judicial trial.)

Initially, deportation was conceived of only as a method for expelling aliens who had entered the country illegally. Soon, however, Congress employed it to remove aliens who had entered legally but had violated conditions attached to continued residence. Thus, for example, the Immigration Act of 1917 provided for the deportation of aliens convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude. Other statutory grounds for deportation, now codified in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, include violation of alien registration requirements, drug trafficking, addiction to narcotics, becoming a public charge within five years after entry, or membership in the Communist party or other subversive organizations.

By its express terms, the Immigration and Nationality

Act applies retroactively to any alien belonging to any class enumerated in the statute, notwithstanding that the alien entered the United States prior to the date of the statute or that the facts alleged to justify deportation occurred prior to that date. Because deportation is not considered a punishment, the prohibition of the EX POST FACTO clause of the Constitution does not apply, and retroactive application of provisions specifying grounds for deportation was upheld in Lehmann v. Carson (1957).

In Harisiades v. Shaughnessy (1952) Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS declared in his dissent that "an alien, who is assimilated in our society, is treated as a citizen so far as his property and his liberty are concerned. . . . If those rights, great as they are, have constitutional protection, I think the more important one—the right to remain here—has a like dignity." To date, this view has not been able to overcome the two basic propositions announced in the Court's seminal deportation case, Fong Yue Ting v. United States (1893), that Congress has the INHERENT POWER to order deportation and that deportation is not a criminal punishment.

RALPH A. ROSSUM
(1986)

Bibliography

GORDON, CHARLES and ROSENFIELD, HARRY N. 1984 Immigration Law and Procedure, Vol. 1, chaps. 4–5; Vol. 2, chaps. 6–8. New York: Matthew Bender.

NOTE 1962 Deportation and Exclusion. Yale Law Journal 71: 760–792.

DESEGREGATION

Freed finally of slavery's shackles, blacks in America began the long quest for racial equality. Desegregation, a generic term used to describe elimination of the SEGREGATION and RACIAL DISCRIMINATION that nonwhites confronted at life's every turn, has been the equivalent of their Holy Grail.

While blacks have attacked barriers based on color across a spectrum that includes VOTING, employment, housing, the administration of justice, access to public facilities, and even sex and marriage, the elimination of discrimination in the public schools has been and remains the most important goal for black Americans in their continuing struggle against racism in this country.

At an early time in the nation's history, blacks hoped an already hostile society might at least share their fear, as a black minister phrased it, "for our rising offspring to see them in ignorance in a land of gospel light." That petition presented in 1787 to the Massachusetts legislature sought a separate school for Boston's black children whose parents had withdrawn them from the harassment and ridicule heaped on them by white teachers and students in some of the new nation's first public schools.

The legislature denied the petition, which reflected fears shared by succeeding generations of black parents who all during the nineteenth century filed dozens of law suits with state courts seeking relief from the racial discrimination they found in the public schools. Depending on the times and the character of the discrimination they faced, black parents have sought equal educational opportunity for their children through the advocacy of either racially separate or integrated schools.

With few exceptions, the courts were no more sympathetic to these petitions than were the school boards whose policies sometimes excluded black children from the public schools entirely and always subjected them to conditions that left little doubt as to which students were deemed members of the superior race. In ROBERTS V. CITY OF BOSTON (1850) a state court rejected a school desegregation petition almost two decades before the adoption of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT; three decades after its ratification, the United States Supreme Court concluded in PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) that the Fourteenth Amendment did not prohibit state-sanctioned segregation, citing the Roberts decision as support for the reasonableness of what it called SEPARATE BUT EQUAL facilities. Plessy provided the Constitution's blessing for laws throughout the South that required racial segregation not only in public schools, but in every possible public facility, including cemeteries and houses of prostitution.

The law and much of society enforced the "separate" phase of the Plessy standard to the letter, but the promise of "equal" facilities received only the grudging attention of a public whose racial attitudes ranged from apathy to outright hostility. Deep-South states spent far less for the schooling of black children than for whites. Despite a major effort to equalize segregated schools as a means of forestalling the steadily increasing number of CIVIL RIGHTS challenges in the 1950s, the South as a whole expended an average of $165 for every white child, and only $115 for each black in 1954, the year in which segregated schools were ruled unconstitutional.

More than a half century after its Plessy decision, the Supreme Court in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) reviewed the "separate but equal" DOCTRINE in the light of education's importance for children in a modern society, and concluded that the Fourteenth Amendment's EQUAL PROTECTION clause was violated by segregated schools "even though the physical facilities and other "tangible" factors may be equal. . . ."

Chief Justice EARL WARREN's ringing rhetoric in the Brown opinion condemned racially segregated schooling as "inherently unequal." He found that the separation by the state of children in grade and high schools solely on the basis of race "generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone."

This decision was the result of long years of planning and litigation by the NAACP, and the committed work of lawyers including THURGOOD MARSHALL and Robert L. Carter, social scientists like Kenneth Clark, and hundreds of courageous black parents and their children. The decision, most blacks were convinced, required the elimination of segregated school facilities. Black parents knew that state-mandated black schools were a racial insult, and most hoped that if their children attended schools with whites, they would more likely gain access to the same educational resources as white children.

But the determination of civil rights groups representing an ever-increasing number of black parents seeking to join in school desegregation suits was met by the equally determined and, at least initially, far more powerful resistance of southern whites who strongly opposed sending their children to school with blacks and greatly resented the federal coercion involved in school desegregation orders which they equated with the occupation of the region by Union forces following the CIVIL WAR.

Arguably, opposition by southern working class whites could be predicated on the basis that, by invalidating segregation laws, Brown betrayed postReconstruction promises of white superior status made to them by policymakers in return for political support given during periods when populist movements sought to challenge the monopoly of economic power held by the upper class.

Although the Supreme Court refused to turn the clock back to 1868 to determine whether the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment had intended to condone segregated schools, an examination of postReconstruction history shows that policies of segregation reflected a series of political compromises through which working class whites settled their demands for social reform and greater political power. C. Vann Woodward and other historians have shown that segregated schools and facilities were established by legislatures at the insistence of the white working classes who saw color barriers as official confirmation that the society's policymakers would maintain even the poorest whites in a permanent status superior to that designated for blacks.

While not willing to acknowledge that its school desegregation decision would deprive whites of long-held rights of superior status based on race, the Court in Brown v. Board of Education II (1955), signaled that it was aware of the major social upheaval its ruling would require. Rejecting the black petitioners' requests for immediate relief, the Court chose a procedure that would permit the individual resolution of administrative and academic problems. It mandated only a "prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance," and returned the cases to the district courts with the admonition that orders and decrees be entered to admit plaintiffs to public schools on a racially nondiscriminatory basis "with ALL DELIBERATE SPEED. . . ."

But the Court's conciliatory efforts did not avoid and may have encouraged a period of massive resistance by southern elected officials, a rise in the Ku Klux Klan and other white supremacist groups, and a general upswing in economic intimidation and threats of physical violence against blacks deemed responsible for or participants in the civil rights movement. The Court met open resistance in Little Rock, Arkansas, and elsewhere with firm resolve, as in COOPER V. AARON (1958), but for several years condoned pupil placement laws and other procedural devices clearly designed to frustrate any meaningful compliance with the Brown mandate.

Federal courts were far less cautious in applying the Brown decision as the controlling precedent in cases challenging racial segregation in other public facilities. Thus, in the first half-dozen years following Brown, civil rights groups succeeded in desegregating state-operated places of recreation, government buildings, and transportation facilities.

Finally, in 1964, during the height of the SIT-IN protest movement that was bringing an end to "Jim Crow" policies in many hitherto segregated privately owned facilities not covered by the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court indicated that the time for mere deliberate speed had run out, in GRIFFIN V. SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY (1964). But the success of a decade of white resistance to school desegregation was reflected in the statistics. In the eleven states of the old Confederacy, a mere 1.17 percent of black students were attending school with white students by the 1963–1964 school year. The dirgelike progress of school desegregation finally gained momentum through a series of far-reaching lower court orders combined with the federal government's enforcement of Title VI of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. This provision required the cut-off of federal financial assistance to entities that followed racially discriminatory policies. The federal government's enforcement of Title VI was seldom vigorous, but even the threat of losing the federal monies made available under a host of new antipoverty and educational assistance programs in the late 1960s persuaded hundreds of southern school districts that some form of compliance was in their best interests.

In 1968, the Supreme Court in GREEN V. NEW KENT COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD virtually eliminated the offer by a school board of "freedom of choice" to all children as a sufficient compliance with desegregation requirements. The decision was hailed by civil rights lawyers who believed that the Brown mandate could not be implemented unless public schools were rendered nonidentifiable by race. This goal, articulated in the Green case by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN as requiring school boards to formulate plans that promise "realistically to convert promptly to a system without a "white' school and a "Negro' school, but just schools," was furthered when the Court applied the Green standard to a large, urban school district in North Carolina in SWANN V. CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BOARD OF EDUCATION (1971). A few years later, the Court held a large northern school district subject to a similar standard in KEYES V. SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1 OF DENVER, COLORADO, (1973). (See SCHOOL BUSING.)

But while the percentage of children attending desegregated schools increased impressively, opposition to school desegregation remained. Resistance focused on plans like those approved in both Swann and Keyes requiring the transportation of children in order to achieve a measure of desegregation in each school roughly equivalent to the percentages of white and nonwhite children in the district as a whole. Opponents had gained national political strength, and their support likely played an important role in the election of RICHARD M. NIXON as President in 1968. The Nixon administration adopted policies that had the effect of slowing the federal government's participation in the school desegregation campaign, but the Supreme Court rejected Administration-sponsored delay requests in ALEXANDER V. HOLMES COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION (1969) and Carter v. West Feliciana Parish School Board (1970), although not without cracks in the solid front of unanimous opinions the Court had handed down in school desegregation cases since Brown I.

By 1974, in MILLIKEN V. BRADLEY, an APPEAL from lower court orders requiring the consolidation with the seventy percent black Detroit school system of fifty-three predominantly white suburban school districts, those cracks had grown into a chasm between divergent viewpoints on the appropriateness of school desegregation remedies. The insistence of civil rights lawyers that courts had unlimited discretion to impose racial-balance oriented plans to remedy proven segregation resulted in a significant change in the standards for proving school district liability for violating the Constitution.

In a 5–4 decision, the Court in Milliken held that federal courts could not impose multidistrict remedies to cure a single district's segregation absent findings that the other included school districts had failed to operate unitary school systems within their districts, or were responsible for the segregation in the other districts. Proof of this character could be found in few districts without histories of official, statemandated segregation, and thus plans to desegregate large, urban school districts through metropolitanwide plans were rendered inoperable.

By the late 1970s, roughly half of all nonwhite children in the nation resided in the country's twenty to thirty largest school districts. Minority children averaged sixty percent of the school population in these districts and close to seventy percent in the ten largest districts. Politically if not physically, desegregation in these districts on the Green-Swann model became increasingly difficult.

Lower courts, impressed by detailed prescriptions of racial wrongdoing by urban school boards, continued at the urging of civil rights lawyers to grant relief requiring reassignments and busing to change the racial makeup of schools. But the Supreme Court, now quite divided, set increasingly difficult liability standards in cases from Dayton and Columbus, Ohio; Omaha, Nebraska; Austin, Texas; Milwaukee, Wisconsin; and Indianapolis, Indiana. Plans requiring wholesale reassignment of children in these districts were finally approved, mainly because the proof of past discrimination was so clear. There was little judicial enthusiasm for continued reliance on a remedial process about which there was so much controversy as to its effectiveness even among civil rights proponents.

By this time, a great many black communities were questioning the continued validity of the "neither black schools nor white schools" desegregation approach that had stood as an article of faith since the early post-Brown years. Disenchantment was prompted by the hundreds of black schools closed and the scores of black teachers and principals dismissed in the course of the school desegregation process. In addition, black parents were discovering that the sacrifice involved in busing children across town to mainly white schools did not always eliminate racial discrimination. More litigation had to be prosecuted to challenge resegregation tactics as varied as the use of standardized tests to track black students into virtually all-black classrooms, to the exclusion of blacks from extracurricular programs. In most desegregated school systems, black students were far more likely to be suspended and expelled for disciplinary violations than white students. Black parents able to enroll their children in desegregated schools all too often found themselves protesting policies of in-school discrimination quite similar to those that had led their late eighteenth-century predecessors to petition for separate schools.

The NAACP and the few other groups who sponsored most school desegregation litigation remained firm in their belief that identifiably black schools would always be inferior and must be eliminated. But local black groups in several cities including Atlanta, St. Louis, Detroit, Dallas, Boston, and Portland, Oregon, decided that mainly black schools in black neighborhoods might provide effective schooling for their children if black parents could be involved more closely in faculty hiring, curriculum selection, and other policymaking aspects of these schools.

In 1975, a court of appeals approved in Calhoun v.

Cook, over the vigorous objection of the national NAACP office, a settlement of a twenty-year-old Atlanta school case providing full faculty and employee desegregation but only limited pupil desegregation in exchange for a school board promise to hire a number of blacks in top administrative positions, including a black superintendent of schools.

A few years later, in Milliken v. Bradley II (1977), the Supreme Court approved without dissent a Detroit desegregation plan that gave priority to a range of "educational components" while limiting pupil desegregation in the district that was by now more than eighty percent black to a provision that no school be less than thirty percent black. The Court though was unable to decide and left standing a lower court ruling that an almost all-black subdistrict created by the Dallas school desegregation plan met school desegregation standards. The record showed both that housing patterns and geographical conditions would have made desegregation difficult and that much of the black community in the subdistrict supported its retention.

Public resistance to school desegregation continued into the 1980s even though the likelihood of new court orders was lessened by the Supreme Court's application of higher standards of proof even in litigation where metropolitan relief was not sought. For example, California voters approved an amendment to their state constitution barring state courts from ordering racial balance remedies in cases where, absent a finding that the school board was guilty of a specific intent to discriminate, the Fourteenth Amendment would not require racial balance relief. The Supreme Court upheld this provision in Crawford v. Los Angeles Unified School District (1982).

Civil rights organizations mobilized to meet such challenges, but local black groups increasingly opted for programs that promised to provide equal educational opportunity in neighborhood schools. At the same time, many black parents either moved to suburban areas or sent their children out of their neighborhoods to enable them to attend predominantly white schools.

The quest for effective schooling in the 1980s mirrors those made by black parents in the 1780s and during all the periods between. They and their children have recognized that neither separate schools nor integrated schools will automatically eliminate racist policies intended to provide priority to white children for scarce educational resources. School desegregation programs mandated by the Brown decision, and earnestly sought in hundreds of court cases, have served to slow but have not otherwise much discouraged those policies.

Beyond the real gains made by blacks during the Brown years, there remain millions of black and other minority children whose schooling remains both segregated and inferior. For them, there is ample basis for parental fears as they watch their rising offspring grow "in ignorance in a land of gospel light."

DERRICK A. BELL
(1986)

Bibliography

BELL, DERRICK A. (1973) 1980 Race, Racism and American Law. Boston: Little, Brown.

KALODNER, HOWARD I. and FISHMAN, JAMES J., eds. 1978 Limits of Justice: The Courts' Role in School Desegregation. Cambridge, Mass.: Ballinger.

KLUGER, RICHARD 1976 Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Knopf.

WOODWARD, C. VANN (1955) 1974 The Strange Career of Jim Crow. New York: Oxford University Press.

DESHANEY v. WINNEBAGO COUNTY DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES
488 U.S. 189 (1989)

When Joshua DeShaney was one year old, his parents were divorced; the court awarded custody of Joshua to his father, who moved to Wisconsin and remarried. When Joshua was three, his father's second wife complained to the county department of social services (DSS) that the father was abusing the child, hitting him and leaving marks on him. DSS officials interviewed the father, who denied the charges; DSS did not pursue the matter. A year later Joshua was admitted to a hospital with multiple bruises and abrasions; the examining doctor notified DSS; DSS immediately obtained a court order taking custody over Joshua, but the DSS investigating team decided there was insufficient evidence of child abuse to retain Joshua in the court's custody. The father promised DSS that he would enroll Joshua in a preschool program and undertake counseling for himself. A month later the hospital emergency room notified DSS that Joshua had been treated again for suspicious injuries; the caseworker concluded there was no basis for action. Over the next six months the caseworker visited the home, repeatedly saw injuries on Joshua's head, and noted that he had not been enrolled in the preschool program. She recorded all this in her files and did nothing more. About a month later, the emergency room notified DSS that Joshua had been admitted with injuries they believed caused by child abuse. On the caseworker's next two home visits, she was told Joshua was too ill to see her. DSS took no action. Four months later, the father beat four-year-old Joshua, who lapsed into a coma; Joshua suffered severe brain damage, but lived. He is expected to spend the rest of his life in an institution for the profoundly retarded.

The father was tried and convicted of child abuse, but the case that reached the Supreme Court was a civil action, brought by Joshua's mother against DSS and some DSS employees, seeking damages on the ground that DSS had deprived Joshua of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS OF LAW in violation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The lower courts denied relief and the Supreme Court affirmed, 6–3. For the majority, Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST concluded that the due process clause imposed no affirmative duty on the state or its officers to protect a citizen's life or liberty against private persons' invasions. Furthermore, no such constitutional duty arose merely because DSS had known of Joshua's situation and indicated its intention to protect him. The case differed from those in which the Court had recognized a state duty to assure minimal safety and medical treatment for prisoners and institutionalized mental patients, for here the state had done nothing to restrain Joshua or otherwise prevent him from protecting himself or receiving protection from other persons. The harm, in other words, "was inflicted not by the State of Wisconsin, but by Joshua's father."

For the dissenters, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN castigated the majority for so limited a view of the prison- and mental-hospital cases. Here the state had set up DSS to protect children in precisely Joshua's situation, thus encouraging citizens generally to rely on DSS to prevent child abuse. One had to ignore this context to conclude, as the majority did, that the state had simply failed to act. Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, in a separate dissent, objected to the majority's formalistic distinction between STATE ACTION and state inaction; the state had assumed responsibility for protecting Joshua from the very abuse that deprived him of much of what it means to have a life.

In a great many ways the Supreme Court has imposed affirmative duties on the states to compensate for inequalities or other harms not directly of the states' making. (See ACCESS TO THE COURTS; RIGHT TO COUNSEL; MENTAL RETARDATION AND THE CONSTITUTION; PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, CIVIL.) Its decisions in these areas recognize, if only partially, the artificiality of insisting that constitutional guarantees be rigidly confined to action that is formally governmental, ignoring the interlacing of public and private action that characterizes much behavior in America's complex society. As DeShaney sadly illustrates, a mechanical application of the judge-made state-action limitation on the Fourteenth Amendment can permit the systematic evasion of public responsibility.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

Bibliography

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1989 The Curvature of Constitutional Space: What Lawyers Can Learn from Modern Physics. Harvard Law Review 103:1–39.

DEVELOPMENTALLY DISABLED ASSISTANCE AND BILL OF RIGHTS ACT

89 Stat. 486 (1975)

This statute established a grant program under which participating states receive federal financial assistance to aid them in creating programs for the developmentally disabled, a term that refers mainly to the mentally retarded. To qualify for federal funds states must take AFFIRMATIVE ACTION to hire qualified handicapped individuals, submit a plan to evaluate the services provided under the act, have a habitation plan for each person receiving services under a program funded under the act, and have in effect a system to protect and advocate the rights of persons with developmental disabilities. The act's "bill of rights" for the developmentally disabled includes the rights to appropriate treatment in a setting least restrictive of the patient's liberty, to a well-balanced diet, to sufficient medical and dental services, to be free of restraint as punishment, to be free of excessive use of chemical restraints, to be visited by relatives, and to a safe environment. In PENNHURST STATE SCHOOL AND HOSPITAL V. HALDERMAN (1981) the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST and over three dissents, held that the "bill of rights" portion of the act does not confer on the developmentally disabled any substantive rights to appropriate treatment in the least restrictive setting. The act "does no more than express a congressional preference for certain kinds of treatment."

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Disabilities, Rights of Persons With.)

Bibliography

EISENBERG, THEODORE 1981 Civil Rights Legislation. Pages 886–887. Charlottesville, Va.: Michie Co.

DEVOLUTION AND FEDERALISM IN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

The word "devolution" became a staple in political discourse with the capture by the REPUBLICAN PARTY of decisive majorities in both houses of Congress in the 1994 election. Under the banner of a "Contract with America," and directed by Speaker Newt Gingrich, who outspokenly demanded absolute acceptance of party leadership, the new majority in the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES undertook to implement a broadly based neoconservative agenda. One main instrument for achievement of that agenda's specific goals was a carefully crafted shift in policymaking authority and administrative responsibility, away from the national government and into the hands of the states.

Many of the key portions of the 1994 conservative agenda were a restatement of main themes in the policies pursued by the White House and the Republican Party during the administrations of RONALD REAGAN and GEORGE H.W. BUSH. One of these themes was embodied in an attack on the powers of federal regulatory agencies in general, with emphasis particularly on the Environmental Protection Agency, the National Labor Relations Board, and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration. Also prominent were demands for reduction of federal capital gains taxes and for tempering the progressivity of federal taxation. Conservatives also condemned what they termed an unwarranted "activism" by so-called liberal judges in the federal courts—a reflection of the conservatives' dissatisfaction (dating from the time of the WARREN COURT DESEGREGATION and criminal justice decisions) with the Supreme Court's interpretations of minority rights, with judicial broadening of the criteria for STANDING to litigate environmental and consumer causes, and with the emerging concept of the entitlement rights of welfare clients and others against bureaucratic decisions. Withal, as Herman Belz indicated in his "CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, 1980–1989" entry in this encyclopedia, the 1980s witnessed the consolidation of a conservative program of deregulation and reestablishment of "market values"; pursuit of a social agenda; and the paradoxical attack on taxes and the bugaboo of "big government" that went forward with a steady burgeoning of federal deficits in the annual budgets of the Reagan years. And, as Belz emphasized, polarization of political differences and the dynamics of conflict were heightened by the persistence of divided government, with one party controlling one or both houses of Congress while the other held the presidency—a situation that would continue to pertain throughout most of the presidency of WILLIAM J. CLINTON as well.

Other elements of the 1994 "Contract with America" platform, however, reflected a significant extension of the earlier programs and a distinct hardening of ideological lines. These developments involved opposition to ABORTION rights; AFFIRMATIVE ACTION in the schools and the workplace; and federal welfare and health programs, especially those designed to reach the poorest (and hence politically the most vulnerable) elements of the nation's citizenry. (The only plank in the 1994 platform that was not pursued zealously was CAMPAIGN FINANCE reform, which proved to be of less interest as a concrete legislative goal to the newly elected senators and representatives than it had been as a campaign pledge.)

A notable feature of the 1994 agenda was the extent to which conservatives pursued their goals through a shifting of policymaking responsibility and administrative authority out of the federal government's control and into that of the states. So insistent and so broad in scope was this effort that some analysts applied the term "devolution revolution" to what was being attempted, especially with regard to the attack on the inherited policies and institutions of the post-1935 welfare state and its social security, health care, and welfare programs. An increasing number of state legislatures and governorships won by the Republicans enhanced the attractiveness of such devolution ideas as they were advanced by the congressional leadership. And, indeed, the 1994 Republican Governors' Conference welcomed the election as "a historic moment of opportunity—an occasion when the political climate makes possible fundamental change in the federal–state relationship."

Whatever the differences between 1980s conservatism and the heightened ideological character of the new Republican strategies that crystallized in 1994, a vital element of continuity was the extent to which the conservative appeal was articulated in explicitly constitutional terms, and not merely in the language of policy or the imperatives of specific versions of morality. Devolution, in this sense, appeared as a constitutional imperative, a return to "ORIGINAL INTENT" and "correct" principles. The champions of devolution thus appealed to a version of the Framers' principles in 1787, downplaying the intent or historical development of the post–CIVIL WAR "nationalizing" amendments (the THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, and FIFTEENTH), to argue for a federal constitutional order in which state sovereignty was central to governmental legitimacy. Also mobilized was a new emphasis on the need to rebuild safeguards of state autonomy that conservatives regarded as assured by the TENTH AMENDMENT, which they interpreted anew in terms akin to the Supreme Court's view in the 1850s and again in the 1920s and early 1930s, at the height of conservative STATES' RIGHTS jurisprudence.

Reinforcing this political campaign to devolve powers and programs was the movement of the conservative bloc on the REHNQUIST COURT to revitalize Tenth Amendment restraints on the reach of congressional regulatory powers, to reassert ELEVENTH AMENDMENT–based barriers to suits against the state governments, and to retrench in the important realm of federal procedure with regard to welfare clients' rights and standing for litigants in public interest suits. Now the 1980s strategy of appointing federal judges at all levels who would be likely to advance the conservative agenda was reinforced by a strategy of withholding consent for Clinton judicial appointments seen as "too liberal." By the end of the 1990s, the results of this strategy were evident in, for example, the decisions in Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida (1996) and UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995) that dramatically revealed the cramped and hostile view of modern federal government powers that was held generally by a five- Justice majority on the Court. Then, in June 1999, the Court handed down three decisions (Alden v. Maine and related cases) that heavy-handedly reversed long-held DOCTRINES so that the states and their agencies (including state research universities) would be immunized from damages in PATENT and trademark suits, and so that millions of state employees would be denied the right to sue in state courts for damages for violation of national labor-law entitlements and (presumably ) other federally guaranteed rights.

Viewed in a longer historical perspective, the political and constitutional confrontations of the 1990s over devolution policy and law are new variants of a persistent dynamic—the debate over "sorting out" which realms of law and policy should be governed from Washington, and which from the states and local governments. The issue had been joined in the earliest years of the Republic, when the Federalists and the emerging Jeffersonian parties had debated in constitutional terms such questions as the powers appropriate to a national bank (questions that ultimately reached the Supreme Court in formal constitutional terms in the 1819 case of MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND). Throughout the pre–Civil War years, too, every aspect of the anti-SLAVERY debate had been embedded in a constitutional framework of doctrine regarding FEDERALISM. The new and explicitly nationalized constitutional order that emerged after the Civil War fundamentally changed the framework of those debates, but the terms of argument had remarkable continuities. Thus, even after the foundations of a federal administrative law in the 1880s, and significant expansion of centralized power in banking, ANTITRUST, and LABOR relations, much of the Progressive era's politics was dominated by the question of how much power the national government ought to excercise and to what extent states' rights—a cause always kept at the forefront, partly because Southern segregationists were determined to retain state control of race relations—should be respected. Similarly, the constitutional issues of the interwar years, climaxing in the responses to the Great Depression in the NEW DEAL period, were constantly framed in terms of the legitimate reach and limitations of state versus federal power.

Those who would recite the mantra of states' rights and "state sovereignty" in recent times have had to carry the burden of its historic association with racism and Jim Crow. Still, a determination to take seriously the constitutional requirements of federalism has never been the exclusive preoccupation of extremists. A federal "creed" commonly has been given respect, or at least lip service, by politicians and lawyers across the political spectrum. Progressive intellectuals and judges, too, have recognized the imperatives of federalism as a consideration in policy. Thus FELIX FRANKFURTER, writing in 1922 of the Court's invalidation of a federal anti-child labor law, said "We must pay a price for federalism," even when that price must be "the [constitutional] impotence of the federal government to correct glaring evils unheeded by some of the states." Even the New Deal administration fashioned some of its major departures in policy, such as the Social Security system, in the style of "cooperative federalism" that gave the states a major policy role and extensive fiscal support through grants-in-aid, rather than going full-bore toward nationalization of policy and administration. And during the administration of LYNDON B. JOHNSON—the high point of post-war expansion of the national government's role in social legislation, regulation, and welfare programs—the President's principal advisers contended that by adopting a cooperative state–federal approach for many of his initiatives Johnson was honoring "our whole national history as a federal system." Similarly, few in the Democratic Party's leadership in the post-Johnson years have taken an ideological position against devolution in areas of law they have seen as susceptible of assignment to the states or as requiring for efficiency's sake a shift of authority away from the center. It has been intended and anticipated consequences, not the issue of devolution in raw ideological or constitutional form, that have divided the liberal and centrist elements in both major POLITICAL PARTIES on questions of major policy change. Despite the conservative opposition to Clinton's posture on major policy questions—concededly not a posture of wholesale antigovernmentalism—he too has been willing to make important concessions to the states, as for example in accepting the compromise of a sweeping WELFARE RIGHTS reform bill in 1996 that diminished federal authority and transferred vital discretionary powers to the states.

At the end of the twentieth century, it would appear likely that one reform successfully supported by conservatives and more generally by state officials has been set in place for a long time. This is the policy against "unfunded mandates," by which Congress had extended rights as entitlements to individuals and groups without providing state and local governments with funding that would permit them to fulfill those mandates. This change is a two-faceted victory for its proponents. On the one hand, it constrains the national government with respect to instituting new programs; on the other, it is linked with the larger, and legally distinct, policy of devolution insofar as it effectively curbs the power of federal courts to play a major role in defining benefits and entitlements in terms of constitutional rights, or to extend the terms of specific LEGISLATION through STATUTORY INTERPRETATION. Moreover, many of the same political leaders who call for devolution and for enhancement of state authority have led a successful campaign since the late 1970s to curtail, often radically, the fiscal competence of the states by dint of extreme constraints on their taxing powers.

Still, the ongoing controversy over federalism and devolution can take unexpected turns in the hands of judges. Thus, the REHNQUIST COURT, in a decision that startled nearly all commentators but was welcomed on its substantive terms by opponents of the new welfare cutbacks, in SAENZ V. ROE (1999) eviscerated one of the strongest devolutionist features of the 1996 welfare law. The Court held invalid Congress's devolution to state governments of the power to establish a two-tier system of benefits that would disadvantage newly arrived residents by limiting them to the level of benefits that the states of their previous residency allowed. In respect to devolution, then, not only evolving Tenth Amendment law and the enhanced political power of neoconservatives, but also as a countervailing force in the courts, the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the Fourteenth Amendment might well operate in a complex judicial role in the continuing evolution of state–federal relations.

The latest moves by the Justices seem to confirm the wisdom of the late Carl Friederich when he contended that as a working system, American federalism cannot be understood unless it is analyzed in dynamic terms—as a process, and not only a concept to be interpreted in formalistic doctrinal terms.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(2000)

Bibliography

MASHAW, JERRY L. and CALSYN, DYLAN S. 1996 Block Grants, Entitlements, and Federalism: A Conceptual Map of Contested Terrain. Yale Law & Policy Review/Yale Journal on Regulation 14:297–323.

MELNICK, R. SHEP 1994 Between the Lines: Interpreting Welfare Rights. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

SCHEIBER, HARRY N. 1996 Redesigning the Architecture of Federalism—An American Tradition: Modern Devolution Policies in Perspective. Yale Law & Policy Review/Yale Journal on Regulation 14:227–296.

DIAL-A-PORN

With the development of new telephone technologies, the transmission of sexually explicit messages over the phone lines has become a multimillion dollar business. Telephone pornography raises special difficulties because many children call telephone sex lines unbeknown to parents. Some companies engaged in telephone pornography actually solicit business from minors, distributing advertisements for their services on school playgrounds. In one highly publicized case in California, a twelve-year-old boy who had been exposed to a pornographic phone message sexually assaulted a four-year-old girl.

In response to concerns about the effects of telephone pornography on children, Congress in 1983 banned all "obscene or indecent" commercial phone messages transmitted to persons under the age of eighteen. Pursuant to provisions of the law, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) developed procedures by which telephone pornography companies could restrict their services to adults, including message scrambling, mandatory payment by credit card, and special access codes for users. Use of these procedures provided a defense against prosecution under the law. In 1988, however, an appellate court held the FCC regulations unconstitutional; and a few months later, Congress decided that its previous law was not sufficient to remedy the problem and subsequently banned "obscene or indecent" telephone messages directed to all persons, regardless of age.

In Sable Communications of California, Inc. v. FCC (1989), the Supreme Court upheld Congress's ban on "obscene" phone messages by a vote of 6–3, but it unanimously struck down the prohibition against "indecent" messages. Writing for the majority, Justice BYRON R. WHITE noted that the Court had already decided that OBSCENITY is not protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT; hence the ban on obscene phone messages was clearly constitutional under the Court's previous decisions. The indecency restriction was a different matter. Applying the COMPELLING STATE INTEREST test the Court regularly uses in free speech cases, White argued that the government undoubtedly has a compelling interest in eliminating indecent messages directed at children. However, the wholesale ban on indecent phone messages was not narrowly tailored to further that interest. According to White, nothing indicated that the regulations promulgated under the previous law would not have protected children sufficiently. White hinted, but did not decide, that those previous regulations were constitutional.

Concurring, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA pointed out that while the Court forbade the government from prohibiting all indecent phone messages, it did not hold that public utilities have an obligation to carry such messages. In other words, regardless of the provisions of federal law, a utility could make a business decision not to carry sexually explicit message services.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN agreed with the Court's invalidation of the ban on indecent phone messages, but he objected to its approval of the obscenity provisions, noting: "I have long been convinced that the exaction of criminal penalties for the distribution of obscene materials to consenting adults is constitutionally intolerable."

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

DIAMOND v. CHAKRABARTY

See: Patent

DICEY, ARTHUR V.

See: Rule of Law

DICKINSON, JOHN
(1732–1808)

The conservative patriot leader John Dickinson, scion of a wealthy Quaker family, was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in London in 1757 and soon after returning to America became one of the most prosperous lawyers in Philadelphia. He served in the colonial legislatures of both Delaware and Pennsylvania, and in 1765 he rose to continental prominence with his pamphlets opposing the Sugar Act and the Stamp Act.

A delegate to the STAMP ACT CONGRESS (1765), Dickinson was the author of that body's Declaration of Rights and Grievances, ostensibly a loyal, even humble, petition to the king. Dickinson's resolutions condemned as unconstitutional the levying of internal taxes upon the colonists by the British Parliament and denounced as subversive of liberty the trial of offenses against tax laws by admiralty courts without juries. Dickinson himself later referred to the Declaration of Rights and Grievances as the first American BILL OF RIGHTS.

After the passage of the TOWNSHEND ACTS in 1767 Dickinson established himself as the preeminent American interpreter of the constitutional relationship between the colonies and Britain. His "Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania" (1767–1768), published in all but four American newspapers, advanced an understanding of the British constitution that made Parliament supreme in imperial matters but proscribed all TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION. Moreover, he abandoned the distinction between external and internal taxes in favor of a distinction based on purpose: if a duty was laid for the purpose of raising revenue, rather than regulating commerce, then it was taxation and fell under the constitutional proscription. The Farmer's Letters counseled petition for repeal of, rather than resistance to, unconstitutional legislation.

By the time he wrote his long essay on "The Constitutional Power of Great Britain" in 1774, Dickinson had come to think of the British Empire as federal—comparable to the Swiss Confederation or the United Netherlands. The British king was king of the American colonies, but "a parliamentary power of internal legislation over these colonies appears . . . equally contradictory to humanity and to the Constitution, and illegal."

In 1774 Dickinson represented Pennsylvania in the First Continental Congress. The petition to the king and the address to the inhabitants of Canada, adopted pursuant to the DECLARATION AND RESOLVES, were products of Dickinson's pen. In 1775, at the Second Continental Congress, he worked with THOMAS JEFFERSON drafting the Declaration of the Causes and Necessity of Taking Up Arms. But Dickinson was still committed to the idea of a resolution of the crisis within the constitutional system of the British Empire. He opposed immediate separation from Britain and refused to sign the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

On June 12, 1776, the Congress, anticipating independence, appointed a committee to draft a plan of union. Dickinson was the dominant member of that committee and the principal author of the draft ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION reported to Congress on July 12. Dickinson's draft called for no mere alliance or league of sovereign states but for a permanent union with a national government. The "United States assembled" was to be heir to those powers of regulation and general legislation legitimately exercised before independence by the British Parliament, while each "colony" retained "sole and exclusive Regulation and Government of its internal police, in all matters that shall not interfere with the Articles of this Confederation." True to the "Farmer's" principles, Dickinson inserted a provision that "the United States assembled shall never impose or levy any Taxes or Duties, except in managing the Post-Office." Dickinson's draft Articles were regarded by many in Congress, especially Southerners, as too centralizing, and even some who favored Dickinson's position despaired of securing ratification. Only after considerably weakening the government to be established by the Articles did Congress finally propose them to the states.

When his stand on independence cost Dickinson his seat in Congress and his colonelcy in the militia, he enlisted in the army as a private soldier. But in November 1776 he was elected to Congress by Delaware, and he was later made a brigadier general in the Delaware militia. In 1779 he signed the Articles of Confederation to signify Delaware's ratification.

Dickinson served as president of Delaware in 1781–1782 and as president of Pennsylvania in 1782–1785. In both states he was recognized as a leader of the conservative party. Although a slaveholder, he favored abolition of SLAVERY, and he opposed its extension into the Northwest Territory.

In 1785 he retired to his estate in Delaware, but he was recalled to public service in 1786 and elected a delegate from Delaware to the ANNAPOLIS CONVENTION. Dickinson was chosen president of the convention, which discussed commercial problems under the Confederation and which issued the first call for a federal constitutional convention.

Notwithstanding his poor health, Dickinson accepted appointment to represent Delaware at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. Although he was an active and conscientious delegate, his contribution to the work of the convention was not among the most important. A nationalist of long standing, he represented a small state and often had to balance competing interests. He was the first to propose a bicameral congress with equal REPRESENTATION of the states in one house and representation apportioned by population or financial contribution in the other—a proposal that later became the basis of the GREAT COMPROMISE. He favored abolition of the slave trade but acquiesced in the compromise that imposed a twenty-year moratorium on congressional power to accomplish it. He wanted Congress to be the dominant branch of government, with full authority to remove Presidents and judges; and he wanted to limit executive power and to create a council to share the President's appointing power. Forced by illness to leave the convention early, Dickinson authorized a colleague to sign his name to the finished Constitution.

Dickinson wrote a series of nine newspaper essays (signed "Fabius") in support of RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION; they were influential, especially in Pennsylvania. He declined appointment as a United States senator from Delaware and never held public office under the new Constitution.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

FORD, PAUL LEICESTER, ed. 1970 Political Writings of John Dickinson. New York: DaCapo.

JACOBSON, D. L. 1965 John Dickinson and the Revolution in Pennsylvania. Berkeley: University of California Press.

STILLE, CHARLES J. 1891 Life and Times of John Dickinson. Philadelphia: Historical Society of Philadelphia.

DICTA

See: Obiter Dictum

DIES, MARTIN
(1900–1972)

Martin Dies, an anti-NEW DEAL Democrat from Texas, served in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES from 1931 to 1945 and from 1953 to 1961. In 1938 he became chairman of the special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, forerunner of the HOUSE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES. Dies and his committee attained national prominence through sensational exposés of supposed Fascist, Nazi, and communist activity in government, labor unions, and industry. His published lists of government employees who were "Communists or Communist dupes," the publicity he gave to unsubstantiated accusations, and his disregard of normal CIVIL LIBERTIES foreshadowed the activities of Senator Joseph McCarthy.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

DIFFERENCE AND CONSTITUTIONAL EQUALITY

Central to our liberal tradition is the conviction that we share a universal human nature, from which follows our common entitlement, or right, to be treated with respect and dignity. Central to our commitment to the RULE OF LAW, and to our constitutional scheme of governance, is the conviction that we are all entitled to legal equality, or equal treatment under the law. And yet our individual identity is clearly formed, in part, by traits that we share with some but not others. Women and men have different biological roles and capacities in reproduction, for example, and African Americans and whites have profoundly different political and cultural histories. Furthermore, all LEGISLATION, from the simplest criminal statute to the highest constitutional norm, virtually by definition, categorizes citizens, treating some quite differently from others. Thus, we claim and aspire to a universality belied by our differentiating traits, and we are committed to legal equality in the face of the brute inequalities that law itself creates. How, then, to justify law, and the differences it creates and mirrors among us?

In the mid- and late-twentieth century, the Supreme Court, under the sweeping language of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT guarantee of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS, developed a rich body of law and principle in response to these central paradoxes. Basically, the Court now reads the mandate of "equal protection of the laws" as imposing upon state and federal legislation a requirement of rationality. If the lines drawn by a law between different groups of people reflect a real difference between them, then the law is rational and upheld; if not, it constitutes a failure of equal protection and might be struck. A law imposing a minimum age on drivers, for example, is not a denial of equal protection because the line it draws is basically rational: the legally created difference between sixteen and seventeen year-olds does reflect, albeit only crudely, a real relation between the driving abilities and maturity of older and younger teenagers. Some legislative categories, however, are based on inherently SUSPECT CLASSIFICATIONS, some so suspect as to create a virtually insurmountable presumption against their constitutionality. Racial categories are of this sort. Racially segregatory laws simply do not reflect any real difference between citizens. They are presumptively irrational, and consequently unconstitutional.

This deceptively simple formula—equality requires rationality—has the virtue of underscoring the coherence of our basic liberal and legalistic ideals. The prohibition on irrational legal categories and the insistence that racial categories are presumptively irrational not only restate our commitment to universality while permitting the categorization of citizens necessary to sensible legislation, but also remind us of the deeply divisive consequences of the historically disastrous belief, held by most whites through most of this country's history, in black difference and inferiority. The "folding" of the liberal commitment to universalism, the legalistic ideal of equal treatment, and the clear understanding that legislation premised on a belief in black difference and inferiority violates the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects us against the danger of repeating the most horrific chapter of our history. In spite of its strengths, however, and its breathtakingly elegant restatement of liberal ideals, this deceptively simple understanding of the meaning of equal protection has produced tremendous dissension and division within the Supreme Court, and has triggered the production of a vast and exceedingly complex body of DOCTRINE. The core problems with the Court's formulaic solution—that equality requires rationality, that rationality requires that legislative distinctions track real differences, and that racial differences are simply not real, but rather a product of bigoted perception—are threefold.

First, not all racial differences are a problem of or created by bigoted perception, and not all legislation that tracks or targets those differences is necessarily malign. That the belief in black inferiority necessarily rests on a belief in black difference certainly does not imply that all claims of racial difference rest on a racist and false commitment to black inferiority or white superiority. Rather, some differences are real and in need of redress: differences in average income levels, educational achievement, and infant mortality rates between otherwise comparable black and white communities are examples. Noting these differences, and legislating in a way meant to redress them, may be good or bad policy, but it is clearly not the same thing, and not the same evil, as legislatively segregating the races because of the presumed inferiority of African Americans. Nevertheless, and in spite of the clear difference between "benign" discrimination, or AFFIRMATIVE ACTION (meant to eradicate the patterns of subordination from which perceptible differences stem) and "malign" discrimination (meant to create, tolerate, or perpetuate that very subordination), the Court's commitment to the ideal of a "colorblind" constitution, which would neither see nor tolerate legislated racial difference, has cast the constitutionality of affirmative legislation designed to ameliorate the consequences of our racist past into considerable doubt.

The second problem with the Court's understanding of equality and difference is simply that even if it be true that claims of racial difference are so often coupled with beliefs in racial inferiority that it is morally sensible to view with suspicion all legislation that racially delineates, it is not at all clear that a recognition of other deep or inherent differences between groups of people—between men and women, or ALIENS and citizens, or mentally competent and incompetent adults—is similarly badly motivated, or that legislation that presumes or respects those differences courts social disaster. Sometimes, of course, such delineations are indeed badly motivated, and in a way that does echo our racial histories. The turn of the century "paternalistic" laws prohibiting women's participation in professional life, or denying women VOTING RIGHTS, or excusing them from JURY SERVICE, for example, did seem to be premised in part on a claim of women's intrinsic differences, and that claim was in turn wedded to a belief in female inferiority and vulnerability. But some "paternalistic" laws are not so clearly harmful, or so unambiguously motivated. Laws granting widows but not widowers a presumption of dependency in determining various benefits, for example, might be based on a wrongful and harmful "stereotype" of female dependency, or it might be an attempt, akin to an affirmative action program, to protect women who have spent their adult lives in nonremunerative domestic realms, against the harmful effects of a market economy that fails to recognize or compensate household and domestic labor. Laws that permit or require employers to protect female workers' job security against the risk of a pregnancy-related disability, even when they do not similarly protect all disabled workers, might be based on the paternalistic and pernicious notion that because women but not men have babies they must be protected against the harsh reality of the workaday world, or it might be based on a commendable attempt to equalize the abilities of men and women to combine parenthood and work.

The third problem with the Court's equation of equality with rationality, and of rationality with a tracking of difference, is that it is blind to the harms law can effect by ignoring, rather than fetishizing, differences. Just as a flat tax will disproportionately hurt the poor and help the rich, so a flat rule requiring, for example, that all firefighters or police officers have a minimum height or weight, will disproportionately exclude women from the ranks, and, to whatever extent height and weight fail to correlate with job performance, they effect this exclusion for no good reason. Similarly, a language proficiency requirement, evenhandedly applied, will disproportionately exclude those for whom English is a second language, and test score requirements will disproportionately exclude those who do not test well. If laws permitting or requiring either private or public employers to use such criteria are constitutionally permissible even where their relevance to the performance legitimately expected of employees is weak or nonexistent, then these laws will themselves be complicit in the perpetuation of societal subordination of already disadvantaged groups. And, their complicity lies in their failure to take real differences into account, not in their counterfactual and demeaning insistence on difference in the face of a deeper, more real, or truer universality.

These problems have prompted constitutional commentators to suggest alternative approaches to the problems of equality and difference. One approach, originating in some forms of radical FEMINIST THEORY and CRITICAL RACE THEORY, suggests that societal differentiations between groups such as women and men and blacks and whites are themselves invariably a function of, or caused by, political subordination, and that it is precisely that political subordination that is forbidden by our constitutional commitment to equality. It is subordination that creates the perception of difference, and it is subordination that is, basically, unconstitutional. Hence, all perceived "differences" are windows to subordination, which the law should be required to address. This is sometimes called the "antisubordination" approach: the law should concern itself with the eradication of the subordination that causes differentiation, rather than with a rational mirroring of difference. Where a law aggravates or furthers, rather than ameliorates or addresses, such subordination, it should be invalidated as unconstitutional and violative of our commitment to equality, and it should be struck down regardless of whether it echoes or challenges perceived differences.

A second approach, sometimes called an "acceptance" approach and which stems from some forms of difference feminism or cultural feminism, reads in the equal protection clause a mandate that states take whatever steps are necessary, not to track differences nor to eradicate them, but rather to render the differences harmless or inconsequential. This approach has enormous appeal, particularly for its common-sense acknowledgment that some differences are properly cherished rather than viewed with suspicion, and should only cause concern to the degree they may cause unnecessary suffering. That women generally undergo pregnancy, childbirth, and lactation in order to reproduce, while men simply ejaculate, for example, is surely one such difference: it is a difference that is impossible to deny, and one that many men and women take great pleasure in. But it is also one that, presently, does have harmful consequences for women. Those consequences, however, are not necessarily consequences of the difference, or put differently, the difference itself need not have harmful consequences. Laws, such as those requiring employers to protect the job security of pregnant workers, can be used to prevent harm. Similarly, that women presently earn less than men at least in part because women engage in more childcare, is a difference that also has enormous consequences, many of them harmful to women. Those harms as well could be at least in part ameliorated through legal intervention: laws could, for example, require that the paycheck of a wage earner married to a spouse working in the home be issued jointly to both spouses, or even be divided equally between them, with the stay-at-home spouse receiving a full half. On this approach, it would be the failure to take action to render difference harmless—rather than the recognition of difference itself—that constituted the constitutional violation.

Both of these alternative approaches, however, arguably founder on the slippery slope to socialism. Surely the differences that are most subordinating are the differences caused by our unequal distribution of wealth in this society, and surely those wealth differences are the precise differences that most cry out to be rendered "harmless." Under either an antisubordination or an acceptance approach to difference and equality, the wealth difference would raise a constitutional problem, it would be something to be eradicated or something to be "made harmless." These two alternative approaches would suggest that at least vast differences in wealth should be viewed as constitutionally suspect. This result seems counterintuitive, and counterexperiential, particularly given the undeniable historical role of the Constitution in the protection of private PROPERTY against public redistribution.

What should we make of this conclusion? If we hold fast to our commitment to private property, and to our view of the Constitution as its guardian, then that commitment and that view should indeed weigh against either of these alternative conceptions of equality and difference. Perhaps, though, the difficulty lies not so much with these alternative conceptions of equality, as with our assurance that vast wealth differences are constitutionally unobjectionable, and even constitutionally protected. Such assurance might not be warranted. Minimally, the emergence of these alternative conceptions of constitutional equality might prompt us to reexamine our conviction that our constitutional ideals of equality, equal protection, and liberty all buttress, rather than undermine our conviction that unchecked differences of wealth produced by an unchecked market are constitutionally protected against redistribution. Rather than discard conceptions of constitutional equality on the grounds that they throw the constitutionality of unchecked capital into question, perhaps we should reexamine, openly and without precommitment, whether or not it is truly the case that our constitutional commitment to an ideal of equality can co-exist with our tolerance of massive wealth differences, and the extraordinary inequalities to which it leads. Perhaps our tolerance of great wealth disparities and our espousal of ideals of equality can co-exist. But perhaps they cannot. If not, then this simultaneous constitutional tolerance of the institutions of wealth and capital, and constitutional celebration of equality, is surely a contradiction as central, and as momentous, and as disabling, as our country's contradictory embrace, in the first century of its existence, of the peculiar institution of SLAVERY, and our simultaneous espousal of the moral and constitutional ideal of liberty.

ROBIN WEST
(2000)

Bibliography

BECKER, MARY 1987 Prince Charming: Abstract Equality. Supreme Court Review 1987:201–247.

FISS, OWEN 1976 Groups and the Equal Protection Clause. Philosophy and Public Affairs 5:107–177.

GILLIGAN, CAROL 1982 In a Different Voice: Psychological Theory and Women's Development. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LAWRENCE, CHARLES and MATSUDA, MARI 1996 We Will Not Go Back: Making the Case for Affirmative Action. Boston, Mass.: Houghton-Mifflin.

LITTLETON, CHRISTINE 1987 Reconstructing Sexual Equality. California Law Review 75:1279–1337.

MACKINNON, CATHERINE 1987 Feminism Unmodified: Discourses on Life and Law. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

——— 1991 Reflections on Sex Equality Under Law. Yale Law Journal 100:1281–1328.

MINOW, MARTHA 1990 Making All the Difference: Inclusion, Exclusion and American Law. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

WEST, ROBIN 1997 Caring for Justice. New York: New York University Press.

DIFRANCESCO, UNITED STATES v.
449 U.S. 117 (1980)

In this case on the DOUBLE JEOPARDY clause of the Fifth Amendment a 5–4 Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of the ORGANIZED CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1970, which in special instances granted to the United States the right to APPEAL a criminal sentence. Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN for the majority, rejecting the dissenters' contention that review of a sentence is comparable to the review of a verdict of acquittal, held that a government appeal that succeeded in increasing a sentence did not constitute double jeopardy.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

DILLON, JOHN F.
(1831–1914)

Elected a member of the Iowa Supreme Court at thirty-one, John Forrest Dillon was a leading advocate of the PUBLIC PURPOSE doctrine. In 1869 President ULYSSES S. GRANT appointed Dillon to the Eighth Circuit Court, but after ten years' service Dillon resigned to accept a professorship at Columbia University Law School. Within three years he left that post to enter private practice, and he soon represented major business interests including Jay Gould and the Union Pacific Railroad.

Although Dillon was not an original thinker, his writings and speeches helped establish his tremendous reputation. He served as president of the American Bar Association in 1892 and delivered the prestigious Storrs Lectures at Yale University shortly thereafter. These were published in 1895 as The Laws and Jurisprudence in England and America, and in them Dillon claimed that the DUE PROCESS CLAUSE of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT "in the most impressive and solemn form places life, liberty, contracts, and property . . . among the fundamental and indestructible rights of all the people of the United States." He endorsed SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS and rhapsodized on the distinction of America's written CONSTITUTIONS: their limitations on government. Restraints such as SEPARATION OF POWERS and CHECKS AND BALANCES were just two of the many means available to prevent "despotism of the many,—of the majority." Dillon also wrote an influential treatise on Municipal Corporations (1872).

As a judge, Dillon narrowly construed the public purpose DOCTRINE. He believed that a municipal corporation had the authority to tax to support a public purpose, but incidental public benefits did not justify such taxation. Moreover, he believed that the judiciary could inquire into the legislative purpose and that private enterprises (with the sole exception of railroads) did not qualify under the doctrine. He thus wrote laissez-faire ideas into the law as limitations on legislative power (Loan Association v. Topeka, Commercial National Bank of Cleveland v. Iola, both 1873). Dillon appeared frequently before the Supreme Court where, in UNITED STATES V. TRANS-MISSOURI FREIGHT ASSOCIATION (1897) he urged the Court to adopt the RULE OF REASON whereby the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT would be read to prohibit only unreasonable restraints of trade, a position finally adopted in STANDARD OIL COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1911).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

JACOBS, CLYDE E. (1954)1973 Law Writers and the Courts. New York: Da Capo Press.

DIONISIO, UNITED STATES v.
410 U.S. 1 (1973)

A gambling suspect refused a federal court's order to provide a voice sample to a GRAND JURY, and was adjudged in civil contempt and committed to custody. The Supreme Court affirmed. The Court rejected, 7–2, a claim that the order violated the suspect's RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, saying that the voice sample was to be used only for identification, not for the content of the statements. A 6–3 majority also rejected a claim that the order violated the FOURTH AMENDMENT. Because there was no "seizure" here, there was no need to demonstrate the reasonableness of the grand jury's request.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

DIRECT AND INDIRECT TAXES

The Constitution imposes two major limitations on the federal power to tax. Direct taxes can be levied only if allocated among the states according to population. All other taxes (indirect taxes) must be uniform among the United States.

The requirement of apportioning direct taxes apparently was included because the southern states feared that they would bear excessive burdens on land and slaves—a fear demonstrated by the fact that (until the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT) only three-fifths of slaves were counted in the population. Nobody in the Convention appeared to be very clear, however, on just what was a direct tax that had to be allocated.

The issue first came to the Supreme Court in HYLTON V. UNITED STATES (1796). A duty laid on carriages was challenged as being a direct tax. The Court pointed out the difficulties with direct taxes, particularly the fact that while the total amount allocated to each state related to the population of that state, the individual taxpayers (in this case the owners of carriages) would pay quite different amounts depending not only on population but also on the relative numbers of the taxable subjects within the state. The Court expressed doubt that any taxes other than a capitation tax or a tax on the value of land could be called direct taxes. Over the next century the issue seldom arose, for Congress levied very few taxes beyond customs duties until the CIVIL WAR. However, the Court did hold that a tax of ten percent on state-issued currency (VEAZIE BANK V. FENNO, 1869), a tax on the succession to a decedent's property (Scholey v. Rew, 1875), and income taxes (Springer v. United States, (1881) were all indirect, not direct taxes.

The income tax involved in Springer had remained in effect only until 1872. By the 1890s, however, many groups called for a reduction in federal dependence on tariffs for revenue and for an income tax on wealthier persons. In 1894 a statute was passed imposing a tax on all incomes over $4,000. Facing a challenge to this tax, the Supreme Court reversed its earlier stand and in POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOANTRUST CO. (1895) held the tax a direct tax and so invalid because not apportioned. The Court's new position was that taxes on the rents or income of real estate and taxes on personal property or the income from personal property were direct taxes and must be apportioned, though taxes on income from other sources would not be direct taxes.

A few years later there was another attempt to enact an income tax law. More conservative members of Congress countered by presenting a proposal to amend the Constitution to provide that income taxes need not be apportioned. Perhaps to their surprise, the SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT was proposed by Congress in 1909 and secured ratification by three-fourths of the states in 1913. The result, of course, was to open the door to the major federal revenue producer.

During the twentieth century there have been occasional attempts to litigate various taxes as being direct—but never with success. Congress does not impose capitation taxes nor property taxes—and all other kinds of taxes apparently are indirect.

The requirement that indirect taxes be uniform has given little difficulty. In upholding a federal tax on legacies in Knowlton v. Moore (1900), the Court said that what is required is geographical uniformity. A tax is uniform when it operates with the same force and effect in every place where the subject of it is found. It does not matter that the subject may exist in some states and not in others so long as the tax is the same. Thus, the Court in Fernandez v. Wiener (1945) upheld a federal statute imposing death taxes on community property—even though such property existed in only the few states that had adopted the community property system. In United States v. Ptasynski (1983) the Court cast some doubt on the geographical limitation by upholding a provision exempting Alaskan oil from a crude oil windfall profit tax. (See TAXING AND SPENDING POWER.)

EDWARD L. BARRETT, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

PAUL, RANDOLPH E. 1954 Taxation in the United States. Pages 46–58. Boston: Little, Brown.

DIRECT DEMOCRACY

Those who framed the Constitution opted for a system of representative government rather than direct democracy. The true distinction between the "pure democracies of Greece" and the American government, explained JAMES MADISON in THE FEDERALIST #63, lay "in the total exclusion of the people in their collective capacity from any share in the latter." It was this distinction that the Federalists believed might permit American government to succeed where other democracies had failed. Placing the exclusive power of ordinary lawmaking in governors distinct from the governed, said Madison, would refine and enlarge public views "by passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens" whose wisdom, patriotism, and love of justice would make them unlikely to sacrifice the interest of the country "to temporal or partial considerations." Representative bodies afforded greater opportunities for deliberation and debate. Popular masses were perceived as too quick to form preferences, frequently failing to consider adequately the interests of others, and overly susceptible to contagious passions.

Part of the Framers' distrust of popular rule was the threat it posed to creditor rights and individual property interests. And the well-heeled delegates had plenty to fear from the masses of have-nots. Indeed, some historians contend that the central problem that prompted the convening of the delegates at Philadelphia was not the weaknesses of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION but concern over an excess of POPULISM in the states. In any case, Madison and his fellow Federalists labored mightily—and successfully—to block an attempt to include in the FIRST AMENDMENT a right of the people to "instruct their representatives."

In the early part of the twentieth century the Progressives successfully introduced two forms of direct democracy at the state level—the INITIATIVE and the REFERENDUM. These innovative reforms, now a part of the lawmaking process in more than half the states, were a response to the widely perceived corruption and control of legislators by wealthy interest groups. The Progressives sought to curb legislatures by placing corrective power in the citizenry. The initiative allows the voters to propose and enact legislation by simple majority vote. Initiatives are thus designed to rectify corruption that impedes legislation by circumventing the legislative framework. Conversely, referenda are directed against corruption that produces legislation by adding an additional layer to the lawmaking process. The referendum allows the voters to reject laws previously enacted by the legislature. Thus, the two Progressive reforms simultaneously make it both less difficult and more difficult to enact laws.

Not long after many of the western states began to use the initiative device, its constitutionality came under attack. In Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Oregon (1912), the Supreme Court was asked to rule whether a state's use of a voter initiative to enact a tax measure was consistent with the REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT guaranteed to the states by Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution. The taxpayer argued that the representative nature of republican government precluded the people from taking legislative functions into their own hands. The Court never reached the merits of this claim, holding instead that whether a state government is "republican" was a POLITICAL QUESTION that courts were not competent to answer. The Court, treating the challenge as an attack on the legitimacy of the Oregon government, relied on LUTHER V. BORDEN (1849) for the proposition that such a matter was properly to be resolved by the political branches of the national government (Congress and the President).

The JUSTICIABILITY bar to the resolution of the constitutional challenge to citizen lawmaking remains securely in place. But although the Supreme Court has never passed on the constitutionality of direct democracy devices in general, the Court has condemned its use in particular applications. In HUNTER V. ERICKSON (1969) the Supreme Court struck down a voter initiative altering a city charter to require that any OPEN HOUSING LAWS passed by the city council be approved by voter referendum before taking effect. The Court's majority held that by making open housing laws more difficult to enact, the charter amendment erected special barriers to legislation favoring ethnic and religious minorities and therefore violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Similar concerns led the Court to invalidate an anti-SCHOOL BUSING initiative passed by the voters of the state of Washington. In Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1 (1982), a 5–4 majority thwarted the voter reversal of an attempt by Seattle school authorities to achieve racial balance through involuntary busing. The majority's route to its conclusion that the initiative offended the equal protection clause cannot easily be mapped. At times, Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, the opinion's author, appears to find impermissible racial motivation. He notes that "there is little doubt that the initiative was effectively drawn for racial purposes," a fact of which he believed the Washington electorate was "surely aware." Elsewhere in the opinion, he seems to rest the decision on the customized alteration of the normal decision-making process for issues of unique interest to minority groups. In such instances, Blackmun suggests, inquiry into motivation is not necessary. This latter reading is reinforced by the 8–1 decision in CRAWFORD V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1982), handed down the same day.

Over Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL's lone dissenting observation that the case was indistinguishable from Seattle, the Court in Crawford sustained an amendment to the California Constitution (approved overwhelmingly by both houses of the California legislature and ratified by the voters) stripping state courts of the power to order busing, except in cases of Fourteenth Amendment violations. It is not uncommon for commentators to express amazement that the two cases were decided by the same Court, much less on the same day. The Court's conclusion in Crawford that the California amendment was not adopted with a racially discriminatory purpose is difficult to square with its opposite assessment on a similar record in Seattle.

What differentiates Seattle from Crawford, however, is the role of direct democracy. The sponsors of the Washington initiative sought to circumvent the representative process that produced Seattle's pupil reassignment plan. The school board had historically made considerable efforts to alleviate the isolation of the district's sizable minority population. Local attempts to recall the board members responsible for some of these efforts had failed. The initiative process afforded an opportunity for the populace to reverse the minority's gains. In marked contrast to the Washington process, the California amendment in Crawford was a joint effort of the legislature and the voters. Here was not a case of the people bypassing a representative body. The Madisonian nightmare, so stark in Seattle, was largely absent from the California reaction against a zealous judiciary. None of this is explicit in the two opinions. Indeed, neither opinion makes any serious effort to distinguish its companion case. The Justices were understandably hesitant to announce explicitly a distinction grounded on a distrust of electoral majorities. But it is hard to reconcile the two results on any other ground.

Nowhere is the tension between the Madisonian fears of popular masses and the American democratic ideal more in evidence than in an interchange between Justice HUGO L. BLACK and Thurgood Marshall, then solicitor general, that occurred during the oral argument in REITMAN V. MULKEY (1967). By an overwhelming majority, California voters had adopted an initiative measure amending the state constitution to repeal existing open housing laws and forbid the enactment of new ones. During ORAL ARGUMENT, Marshall stressed that this authorization of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in the private housing market had been the result of voters bypassing the representative process. "Wouldn't you have exactly the same argument," he was asked, if the provision challenged "had been enacted by the California legislature?" "It's the same argument," Marshall replied, "I just have more force with this." "No," interjected Justice Black, "it seems to me you have less. Because here, it's moving in the direction of letting the people of the States . . . establish their policy, which is as near to a democracy as you can get."

Hugo Black was undoubtedly right in observing that direct voter legislation is quite a bit closer to "democracy" than legislative products. What his vision obscures, however, is the intentional nature of the gap between true democracy and the republican form of government carved out by those who drafted the Constitution. Representative government was designed to capture the virtues of POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY without being tainted by its vices. Accountability to the electorate was to be the touchstone of legitimacy. But the Framers opted for the virtues of agency, favoring a removed deliberation over the impassioned decision making of participatory democracy.

Two-thirds of those questioned in a 1987 nationwide Gallup survey said that citizens ought to be able to vote directly on some state and local laws, and a poll conducted in 1977 found more than half in favor of a constitutional amendment for a national initiative. In the late 1970s, the Senate held extensive hearings on just such a proposed amendment. Despite the sponsorship of more than fifty members of Congress and supportive testimony by a wide range of both conservatives and liberals, the proposal died in committee. Americans are not, it seems, quite ready to abandon their commitment to the Framers' preferences.

JULIAN N. EULE
(1992)

Bibliography

BELL, DERRICK 1978 The Referendum: Democracy's Barrier to Racial Equality. Washington Law Review 54:1–29.

CRONIN, THOMAS E. 1989 Direct Democracy. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

EULE, JULIAN N. 1990 Judicial Review of Direct Democracy. Yale Law Journal 99:1503–1590.

DIRECT DEMOCRACY
(Update)

The 1990s witnessed no abatement in the trend for American voters to employ the direct ballot increasingly in their politics, and vital constitutional questions have continued to surface in the federal courts centering on the legitimacy of various INITIATIVE and REFERENDUM measures. Indeed, the term "government by initiative" has become a commonplace in political commentary. Most of the initiatives and referenda in the states have been designed to achieve legislative reforms. However, many of the most controversial, both as to their policy effects and as to their constitutionality, have been framed not as ordinary LEGISLATION but rather as amendments to the state constitutions. Especially notable in recent years have been direct-ballot measures that may be termed "rights-reducing," that is to say, intended to reduce the rights that may be claimed under state law by individuals and groups. The constitutionality of the plebiscitary process itself, in its several variants, has also been the subject of attention in these debates and in several cases before the Supreme Court.

The Court has sought on the one hand to define the standards by which the constitutionality of specific procedures for the direct ballot can be tested, and, on the other, it has applied EQUAL PROTECTION analysis and other criteria to decide on the constitutional validity of the legislative results of plebiscites in the states. As noted by the late JULIAN N. EULE and other notable commentators, the Court's record has been marked by significant ambiguities, lacunae, and apparent inconsistencies. The impression of inconsistencies in the jurisprudence of direct-ballot constitutionality has left open the door to widely varying results in the lower courts. This uncertainty is evident, for example, in the litigative history of Proposition 209, a California constitutional amendment passed by the state's voters in 1996 with the result of ending state AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs that employed gender or race classifications. The federal district court issued an INJUNCTION against enforcement, on the ground that in order to reverse this measure, the minorities and women affected adversely could not use ordinary political and legislative process but instead carried the special burdens of action exclusively through constitutional amendment—a more costly and difficult procedure. In this respect, the district court applied the standard regarding "special barriers" to obtaining redress through regular political processes, as formulated in HUNTER V. ERICKSON (1969) and later opinions. The district court also cited several Supreme Court decisions requiring STRICT SCRUTINY of measures that could disadvantage racial minorities, and contended that in light of predictable adverse effects on minorities and women the Proposition 209 amendment was invalid as a violation of equal protection. Shortly afterward, however, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit overturned the district court's decision, declaring that because women and minorities actually comprised in total a majority of the citizenry of California, no equal protection issue or procedural flaw stood in the way of its validation. Tellingly, however, the Ninth Circuit judges also complained that they found themselves "caught in the cross-fire of seemingly irreconcilable Supreme Court precedent." In the last analysis, they declared, it was properly "the general rule of our constitutional democracy" that the judgment of federal courts should not be exercised to "trump self-government." The Supreme Court declined to hear arguments in an appeal of the Ninth Circuit decision.

The Ninth Circuit decision reflected a strong strain of historic deference to state direct-ballot measures that had been articulated in the Supreme Court by, for example, Justice HUGO L. BLACK, who believed that, absent a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST or clear indication of discriminatory animus and effects, plebiscitary measures should be regarded as admirable examples of "devotion to democracy, not to bias, discrimination, or prejudice." An example of where such deference can lead, especially in a taxation case, was the decision of the Supreme Court in Nordlinger v. Hahn (1992). The Court upheld the constitutionality of a 1978 California ballot measure, Proposition 13, which set up a two-tier tax system that gave vast advantages to existing PROPERTY owners over those who would acquire property after the amendment went into effect; the majority upheld the measure even though explicitly declaring that it was manifestly unjust in its operation.

The same Justices who let stand the Proposition 209 decision when appealed from the Ninth Circuit had decided differently in an earlier direct-ballot case, ROMER V. EVANS (1996), which also concerned minority rights and special barriers in political process. Over protests by the dissenters that the Court was involving itself in "cultural debate[s]" that ought not concern the judiciary, the majority ruled unconstitutional a Colorado state constitutional amendment, adopted by initiative, that would have invalidated all local ordinances barring discrimination based on SEXUAL ORIENTATION. Declaring that this amendment violated the equal protection clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT "[by making] a class of persons a stranger to its laws," Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY wrote for the majority that homosexuals would thereby be denied the "safeguards that others enjoy" and would be rendered "unequal to everyone else." The Court also referred to the extra political barrier placed on homosexual citizens to obtain redress: They would need to resort to state-level constitutional amendment as the only procedure available if the amendment were to be applied.

A different strain in the Court's jurisprudence on the direct ballot has been intertwined with FIRST AMENDMENT DOCTRINE, and to some degree also with FEDERALISM considerations, as the Court has assessed state measures designed to address alleged flaws of direct democracy in actual practice. Criticisms have been directed especially at the influence of money, the use of professional signature gatherers and data banks, manipulation of public opinion through distortive ballot language and printed arguments in voter pamphlets, and the like. These ills are often compounded by low rates of participation by eligible voters in elections that institute fundamental changes of policy and law. Because of these features of actual practice, the critics contend, the initiative and referendum have become the very embodiment of special-interest and single-issue politics that undermine the deliberative virtues (and the checks and balance) of ordinary legislative procedure. There is, in this view, an "excess of democracy."

But how far can the states legitimately regulate the direct-ballot process, and still have their legislation survive challenges under the "exacting scrutiny" standard that pertains in First Amendment matters? This issue came before the Court in Buckley v. American Constitutional Law Foundation (1998), commonly referred to as "Buckley II" to differentiate it from the landmark case BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976) in which First Amendment protection of speech was invoked to strike down strict federal restrictions on political campaign contributions. In Buckley II, the Court struck down a set of regulations affecting the solicitation of signatures in the petition phase of the direct ballot process in Colorado. The state had required solicitors to wear badges with personal name identification and had prohibited signature gathering by nonresidents and residents who were not registered to vote. No compelling state interest was shown, the majority ruled, because other means were available to control corruption or fraud. But the Justices also reaffirmed a concept of the initiative process—especially the petition phase when measures are qualified for the ballot—as involving "core political speech" protected by the First Amendment. In dissent, however, Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, consistently with the view of state prerogatives that he has expressed in many federalism opinions, declared flatly that "[s]tate ballot initiatives are a matter of state concern"; he found no merit in the majority's application of First Amendment constraints.

The continuing importance of the direct ballot has been manifested in hundreds of measures in recent years, among them votes to restrict the rights of immigrants; reduce state protection of defendants' rights in CRIMINAL PROCEDURE; enhance "victims' rights"; articulate environmental rights; establish a RIGHT OF PRIVACY; introduce new economic regulations or, alternatively, immunize private property from some of regulation's economic effects; limit the TAXING OR SPENDING POWERS; and reform the structure and powers of state government. In sum, the plebiscitary movement maintains its momentum at the century's close. And it is safe to anticipate a continuing debate over the constitutional dimensions of the great historic question regarding the place of populistic lawmaking process in a republican polity. The core dilemma was expressed by JAMES MADISON when he argued in FEDERALIST No. 49, that "a constitutional road to the decision of the people" must be kept open, as it was the people on which a republic's legitimacy must rest; but that because plebiscitary process carried "the danger of disturbing the public tranquillity by interesting too strongly the public passions," only rarely, and on great issues of public life, should the citizenry want to resort to direct votes. This cautionary view will undoubtedly continue to operate in counterpoint with arguments that the direct ballot is the "most democratic of procedures" (as it was termed in the dissent in Romer), requiring special deference from the judiciary. And it will continue to be an urgent question whether the JUDICIAL POWER should be deployed more vigorously so as to assure that fundamental constitutional values are not overwhelmed by the "public passions" that Madison and his colleagues feared so greatly at the nation's founding.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(2000)

Bibliography

EULE, JULIAN N. 1990 Judicial Review of Direct Democracy. Yale Law Journal 99:1503.

MICHELMAN, FRANK I. 1998 "Protecting the People from Themselves," or How Direct Can Democracy Be? UCLA Law Review 45:1717–1734.

SCHACTER, JANE S. 1995 The Pursuit of "Popular Intent": Interpretive Dilemmas in Direct Democracy. Yale Law Journal 105:107–176.

SCHEIBER, HARRY N. 1997 The Direct Ballot and State Constitutionalism. Rutgers Law Journal 28:787–823.

TARR, G. ALAN, ed. 1996 Constitutional Politics in the States: Contemporary Controversies and Historical Patterns. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

DIRECT ELECTIONS

Whenever there has been dissatisfaction with the performance of appointing officials, whether party, legislative, or electoral college, there has been a demand for direct elections. The Progressive era (1890–1920) marked a heyday for such demands, producing direct election of senators (SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT), direct nomination of state party candidates (through PRIMARY ELECTIONS), and, in many cities and states, direct legislation through INITIATIVE and REFERENDUM, and direct RECALL of candidates. After most close presidential elections, there has also been talk of direct election of the President in place of the ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Direct election of the President and direct party primaries have been criticized on policy (but not constitutional) grounds for weakening the two-party system. Initiative and referendum, besides being criticized as "plebiscitary," have been challenged as violative of the GUARANTEE CLAUSE, but such challenges have uniformly been found nonjusticiable. The leading case is Pacific States Telephone Company v. Oregon (1912).

WARD E. Y. ELLIOTT
(1986)

Bibliography

BONFIELD, ARTHUR E. 1962 The Guarantee Clause of Article IV, Section 4: A Study in Constitutional Desuetude. Minnesota Law Review 46:513–572.

DIRKSEN, EVERETT M. (1896–1969)

Everett McKinley Dirksen represented Illinois as a United States congressman (1933–1949) and senator (1951–1969). Despite a previous record as an isolationist in FOREIGN AFFAIRS and a reactionary in domestic affairs, he contributed to the legislative successes of the Democratic Presidents when he was the Republican leader of the SENATE in the 1960s. Dirksen was an eccentric—flamboyant in style, florid in oratory, and organ-voiced; he was also a superb parliamentary tactician and a politician who was exceptionally inconsistent in his policies. On matters of constitutional interest, he supported MCCARTHYISM and opposed the censure of Senator Joseph R. McCarthy, and savagely criticized the Supreme Court for opinions he disliked, especially on REAPPORTIONMENT, SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, and the rights of the criminally accused. Dirksen favored bills to curb the Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION, proposed a constitutional amendment to allow prayers in public schools, and led a movement that failed by the vote of one state to convene a constitutional convention. Yet the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 and the VOTING RIGHTS ACTS OF 1965 would not have been passed without his support.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

SCHAPSMEIER, EDWARD L. 1985 Dirksen of Illinois: Senatorial Statesman. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

DISABILITIES, RIGHTS OF PERSONS WITH

When Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., declared in BUCK V. BELL (1927) that the state's POLICE POWER authorized involuntary sterilization of individuals thought to be mentally impaired, he asserted, "It is better for all the world, if instead of waiting to execute degenerate offspring for crime, or to let them starve for their imbecility, society can prevent those who are manifestly unfit from continuing their kind. . . . Three generations of imbeciles is enough." His statement embodied three assumptions about people with disabilities that have since provoked repeated and partially successful constitutional challenges. The first assumption was that people with disabilities do not enjoy the same basic rights as anyone else, such as the rights to procreate or to be free from involuntary medical treatment. The second assumption was that people with disabilities have no special rights should their conditions leave them vulnerable to legal, social, or physical jeopardy. The third assumption was that society's interests always outweigh the interests of people who have or who are perceived to have disabilities.

Inspired by the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENTS for blacks and for women, in the 1950s and 1960s, advocates for people with disabilities drew on changing medical knowledge about mental and physical disabilities. During the same years, increased federal funds for research and services reached those with mental disabilities and helped to support a movement for their rights. Advocates attacked the segregation produced by institutional settings. They also challenged the deprivation of VOTING RIGHTS; rights to have sexual relations; rights to marry; rights to have children; rights of access to jobs, housing, and transportation; and rights to treatment and services. The disability rights movement attained periodic success in constitutional adjudication in the lower federal courts, which in turn supported federal legislation backed by congressional findings of constitutional rights and also provided the backdrop for landmark Supreme Court DUE PROCESS, and EQUAL PROTECTION decisions.

Initial lawsuits maintained that people with disabilities retained the same rights held by others. On this theory, confinement of persons on grounds of MENTAL ILLNESS or MENTAL RETARDATION should not deprive them of other liberties, and the confinement itself should be justified by provision of services or treatment. The court of appeals so reasoned in Donaldson v. O'Connor (1974) and then built on this judgment with Wyatt v. Aderholt (1974), which declared on PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS grounds a right to treatment for persons civilly committed to state mental institutions. It was this right to treatment that Congress incorporated in the DEVELOPMENTALLY DISABLED ASSISTANCE AND BILL OF RIGHTS ACT (1975).

Although the Supreme Court refrained from endorsing the right to treatment at that time, it reinforced the disability rights movement by unanimously announcing in O'CONNOR V. DONALDSON (1975) that "a State cannot constitutionally confine without more [justification] a nondangerous individual who is capable of surviving safely in freedom by himself or with the help of willing and responsible family members or friends." The Court also reasoned that mere public intolerance could not justify the deprivation of physical liberty.

Elaborating the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT due process theory of liberty, advocates argued that the right to treatment included a right to be treated in the least restrictive setting possible, which meant the setting least confined and removed from the rest of the community. A series of lawsuits challenging the conditions and absence of treatment at a large institution in Pennsylvania produced the disappointing decision in PENNHURST STATE SCHOOL V. HALDERMAN (1981) that the Developmental Disability Act did not confer any substantive right to appropriate treatment in the least restrictive environment. This Supreme Court conclusion occurred after years of litigation had already propelled the states to move people from institutions to community-based facilities.

Then the Supreme Court took the occasion of one more lawsuit arising from the same Pennsylvania institution to announce a constitutional right to treatment for people with disabilities confined in state institutions. In Youngberg v. Romeo (1982) the Court declared that the due-process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment assures (1) safe conditions of confinement; (2) freedom from bodily restraints; and (3) training or "habilitation," meaning a duty to provide at least "such training as an appropriate professional would consider reasonable to ensure the individual's safety and to facilitate his ability to function free from bodily restraints."

The emerging right to treatment also spawned arguments for a right to refuse treatment. Lower federal courts in cases such as Rennie v. Klein (1978) recognized a constitutional privacy right of involuntary mental patients to refuse medication. In WASHINGTON V. HARPER (1990) the Supreme Court announced that forced administration of antipsychotic drugs violates a constitutional liberty interest, but that due process can be satisfied by administrative processes less formal than a court hearing. During the same term, the Court acknowledged in Cruzan v. Missouri Department of Health (1990) that a constitutionally protected liberty interest in refusing unwanted medical treatment may be inferred from its prior decisions. In Cruzan, the first Supreme Court decision addressing the RIGHT TO DIE, the Court acknowledged that incompetent as well as competent persons have a constitutionally protected liberty interest in consenting to or refusing treatment. Yet this interest did not forbid a state from requiring clear and convincing evidence that the patient herself would want to terminate life-sustaining treatment. Having spoken on this issue, the Court, like many state courts, may start to hear right-to-die and treatment cases affecting severely disabled adults, infants, and children.

Implicit in the due process liberty cases is the theme of equal protection, which has also inspired an independent line of opinions articulating rights of persons with disabilities. Adcocates achieved early constitiutional success by linking claims about disablilities to arguments against racial SEGREGATION. Thus in Hobson v. Hansen (1967), affirmed in Smuck v. Hobson (1969), the district court ruled public-school ability-tracking unconstitutional in light of its racially segregative impact. In Larry P. v. Riles (1979) the district court found unconstittutional I.Q. tests for placing students in classes for the "educable mentally retarded" because of a foreseeable racial impact.

Charges of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION trigger STRICT SCRUTINY under the equal-protection clause. Yet the Supreme Court has resisted claims that strict scrutiny should also apply to charges of discrimination on the basis of disability. In CLEBURNE V. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER, INC. (1985) the Court expressly rejected the assertion that persons with disabilities are members of a suspect or semisuspect classification.

Nonetheless, the Court in Cleburne did give unusually sharp teeth to its low-level rational-relationship scrutiny. It found that a city requirement of a special-use permit for a proposed group home for persons with mental retardation violated the equal-protection clause. Locating group homes in residential neighborhoods would be essential to the goal of moving disabled people out of remote institutions and into the mainstream community. The city of Cleburne had created a special ZONING permit requirement for the operation of a group home for mentally retarded persons. The majority of the Court found no RATIONAL BASIS for believing that the proposed group home would pose a special threat to the city's interests and rejected fear and negative attitudes by community members as inadequate bases for treating mentally retarded individuals differently from others. Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, joined by Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and HARRY A. BLACKMUN, maintained that the Court's majority had in effect applied heightened scrutiny and should explicitly accord such scrutiny given the history and continuing legacy of segregation of and discrimination against people with mental retardation.

A combination of equal protection and due process arguments produced the landmark decisions in Mills v. Board of Education (1973) and Pennsylvania Ass'n for Retarded Children v. Pennsylvania (1971), which decreed that children with disabilities have constitutional rights to equal educational opportunity, and exclusion from public schooling violates these rights. Congress expressly relied on the constitutional dimensions of these district court decisions in promulgating the EDUCATION FOR ALL HANDI-CAPPED CHILDREN ACT of 1975. Sometimes known as the "special education" statute, this act provides federal moneys to assist states in extending free appropriate public education to children with disabilities.

Drawing from procedural due-process doctrines, the act calls for individualized evaluations of each child's educational and health needs and an administrative process providing opportunities for parents to participate and raise objections to proposed placements. The act also echoes the right to treatment, but locates it within the context of compulsory schooling. The act introduces the desegregation concept of mainstreaming children with disabilities in regular classrooms to the extent possible. For students who still require instruction in separate classrooms or separate facilities, the act calls for selecting the placement that is the least restrictive—the one most approximating the mainsteam classroom. Finally, the statute calls for related medical services to ensure that students with special physical needs are not excluded from instruction due to medical needs.

Disability rights advocates have struggled to combine arguments for extending to people with disabilities the same liberty interests enjoyed by others with the use of arguments for special claims for treatment and even rights to refuse treatment that might not arise for others. The REHABILITATION ACT of 1973 included section 504, a nondiscrimination provision modeled after the CIVIL RIGHTS statutes drafted to guard against both racial discrimination and SEX DISCRIMINATION. A central idea developed in this context is that people entitled to protection against discrimination include those who are perceived to be disabled, whether or not they actually are disabled. On this basis, people who have had a disease or an illness or people who may be perceived to have an illness or a deformity have been extended statutory protections, as in School Board of Nassau County v. Arline (1987).

Antidiscrimination principles also animate the Fair Housing Act Amendments of 1988 that protect persons with disability and the AMERICANS WITH DISABILITY ACT (1990), heralded by many as the most important and extensive legislation ever adopted on behalf of persons with disability. Yet enduring questions about the meaning of equality and the degree of requisite accommodation will arise both as statutory questions and as constitutional questions concerning the scope of JUDICIAL POWER to order expenditures to accommodate previously excluded groups. Ending the exclusion of physically handicapped persons requires architectural renovation, new communication technologies, and other potentially costly changes. Ending the exclusion of persons with mental disabilities may require the creation of new kinds of institutions, like group homes, which involve money and trained personnel as well as changed community attitudes. Devising programs for persons with AIDS or at risk of AIDS would also involve large expenditures.

Federal courts implementing statutory and constitutional rights for persons with disabilities may confront claims of ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity asserted by states against court-ordered expenditures. In analogous cases involving court-ordered remedies for school segregation and prison conditions, courts have ruled that inadequate resources can never be an adequate justification for a state to deprive persons of their constitutional rights.

Much has changed since Justice Holmes's 1927 opinion in Buck v. Bell; the law recognizes many of the same rights for persons with disabilities as for others. Courts and legislatures have articulated special rights to help disabled persons overcome legal, social, and physical jeopardy. Will the Constitution direct an answer to the question when societal interests outweigh the interests of persons with disabilities? Perhaps the future constitutional challenge is to locate within societal interests the interests of persons with disabilities so the very terms of the questions will change.

MARTHA MINOW
(1992)

Bibliography

BURGDORF, ROBERT L. and BURGDORF, MARCIA PEARCE 1977 The Wicked Witch Is Almost Dead: Buck v. Bell and the Sterilization of Handicapped Persons. Temple Law Quarterly 50: 955–1034.

MINOW, MARTHA 1990 Making All the Difference: Inclusion, Exclusion, and American Law. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

NOTE 1973 Right to Treatment. Harvard Law Review 86: 1282–1306.

STUDENT AUTHORS 1974 Developments in the Law: Civil Commitment of the Mentally Ill. Harvard Law Review 87:1190–1406.

TRIBE, LAURENCE 1988 American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

DISABILITY DISCRIMINATION

The rights of people with disabilities have not received much protection under the Constitution. Statutes such as the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, section 504 of the REHABILITATION ACT of 1973, and the AMERICANS WITH DISABILITIES ACT of 1990 have created most of the rights that exist in this area.

The most disappointing decision by the Supreme Court involving people with disabilities was the Court's 1927 decision in BUCK V. BELL. At the age of sixteen, Carrie Buck became pregnant and had her baby taken away from her. She was most likely raped in the foster home at which she was working as a caretaker. Because her mother had been found to be "feeble-minded," it was easy for her foster parents to claim that Carrie, too, was "feeble-minded" and have her housed in the "State Colony for Epileptics and Feeble Minded" where the superintendent, empowered by state law to perform a surgical procedure upon her for the purpose of rendering her sterile, began proceedings to do so. She was eighteen at the time of the intended procedure.

In upholding the power of the state to sterilize her, Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., delivered the OPINION OF THE COURT in which he recited the now- famous passage: "Three generations of imbeciles are enough." "It is better for all the world, if instead of waiting to execute degenerate offspring for crime, or to let them starve for their imbecility, society can prevent those who are manifestly unfit from continuing their kind." Scholars, in fact, have disputed whether Carrie or her daughter were "feeble-minded." Her mother appears to have been an unfortunate victim of poor family circumstances—her husband died at a young age leaving her with three children to raise and no means of support. In Buck, the various courts accepted the unchallenged assertion that Carrie was illegitimate whereas public records indicate that her parents were married at the time of her birth. Her school records also reveal that she had performed well in school before being sent to live in a foster home. In her impoverished world, however, it was easy to have the facts distorted with little or no legal challenge.

The Court's decision in Buck is often blamed for spurring on other states to enact compulsory sterilization statutes. And as recently as 1973, the Court mentioned the Court's holding in Buck without disapproval in ROE V. WADE.

The legal status of people with disabilities improved somewhat with the Court's 1985 decision in CLEBURNE V. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER, INC. (1985). In that case, a Texas city denied a special use permit for the operation of a group home for the mentally retarded, acting pursuant to a municipal ZONING ordinance requiring permits for such homes. Under city law, a special use permit was required for "hospitals for the insane or feeble-minded." The city council had determined that the proposed group home should be classified as a "hospital for the feebleminded" and voted 3–1 to deny a special use permit. Cleburne Living Center challenged that decision under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The Cleburne Living Center urged the Supreme Court to follow the lower court and apply "heightened scrutiny" to their claim, analogous to the intermediate scrutiny used in cases of SEX DISCRIMINATION. The Court rejected this invitation, concluding that such a standard would not give state and local government sufficient latitude to respond to the genuine differences between mentally retarded persons and others. Instead, the Court applied "RATIONAL BASIS; scrutiny under which a state "may not rely on a classification whose relationship to an asserted goal is so attenuated as to render the distinction arbitrary or irrational." Usually, classifications are found to be constitutional under this lower STANDARD OF REVIEW. In Cleburne, however, the Court concluded that the city's action could not pass constitutional muster. "The short of it is that requiring the permit in this case appears to rest on an irrational prejudice against the mentally retarded, including those who would occupy the [group home]." It therefore affirmed the holding of the appellate court that the ordinance was unconstitutional.

The Cleburne decision was hailed as a victory for the disability rights community, and a possible first step toward recognition of heightened scrutiny. That possibility, however, has not been realized. The appellate courts have steadfastly interpreted Cleburne as holding that mere rational basis scrutiny applies to disability-based distinctions. Thus, individuals with disabilities have generally found that statutory rather than constitutional challenges are a more successful avenue for their complaints.

RUTH COLKER
(2000)

Bibliography

SMITH, J. DAVID and NELSON, K. RAY 1989 The Sterilization of Carrie Buck: Was She Feebleminded or Society's Pawn? Far Hills, N.J.: New Horizon Press.

DISANTO v. PENNSYLVANIA
273 U.S. 34 (1927)

Protection of the public health and welfare temporarily lost ground to the COMMERCE CLAUSE in this case. A Pennsylvania statute required the licensing of persons selling steamship tickets to or from foreign countries. The Court declared the law a "direct" interference with FOREIGN COMMERCE, over the dissents of Justices Harlan Fiske Stone, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS. Stone found the directindirect test of EFFECTS ON COMMERCE "too mechanical, too uncertain . . . and too remote . . . to be of value." He proposed a more pragmatic test: "the actual effect on the flow of commerce," a view which prevailed in 1941 when this decision was overruled by California v. Thompson.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Parker v. Brown.)

DISCOVERY

Discovery is a procedure by which one party obtains information from the adverse party in his case. This disclosure of information in criminal proceedings includes statements, documents, test results, reports, and other similar items. Although there is a very broad power to discover items in the exclusive possession of an adverse party in civil proceedings, the Supreme Court stated in Weatherford v. Bursey (1977) that "there is no general constitutional right to discovery in a criminal case."

In civil cases, the predominant means for discovery are depositions and interrogatories. In criminal cases, no jurisdiction expressly permits the defense to discover prosecutorial information through interrogatories. Most juruisdictions allow depositions in criminal cases only for the purpose of preserving testimony. Most jusdictions also have statutes or court rules similar to FEDERAL RULE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE 16 governing defense discovery which require the prosecution to disclose items such as: (1) written or recorded statements (including GRAND JURY testimony) of the defendant and, in some states, of any co-defendant; (2) the substance of any oral statment of the defendant (and, in some states of a co-defendant) that the prosecution intends to use at trial; (3) the defendant's prior criminal record; (4) relevant documents and other tangible objects; and (5) results and reports of physical or mental examinations and of scientific tests or experiments.

The prosecutorial duty to disclose exculpatory information is based on the view that the primary task of the prosecutor is to see justice done and DUE PROCESS upheld through the fair treatment of accused persons. If this duty is breached, the defendant is entitled to a new trial.

The leading modern case on this duty is Brady v. Maryland (1963). In separate trials, the petitioner and a companion were convicted of murder and sentenced to death. At his trial, the petitioner admitted participating in the crime but claimed that his companion had done the actual killing. Prior to trial the petitioner's attorney requested the prosecution to allow him to examine all the companion's statements to the police. One such statement, in which the companion admitted the actual killing, was withheld by the prosecution and did not come to the petitioner's attention until after his conviction was affirmed on APPEAL. The Supreme Court held that "the suppression by the prosecution of EVIDENCE favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution."

In order to determine whether particular information should have been disclosed, courts consider whether the defendant made a specific request for the information at issue or a more general request for exculpatory information. They also consider to what extent the information was material to the outcome of the trial. When a specific request is made, withholding information is seldom excusable. Even when a general request is made or the defense fails to request exculpatory information, withholding clearly material information, such as the fact that particular testimony is perjured, is not permissible. In determining materiality, the test is whether the withheld information creates a reasonable doubt in the mind of the trial judge as to the defendant's guilt.

There is no clear rule as to when exculpatory information must be disclosed, but it would seem that some circumstances would require pretrial disclosure in order to permit the defense adequate time to prepare its case.

Generally, the prosecutor decides what evidence should be disclosed, although the trial court may occasionally decide in camera whether a particular piece of evidence is favorable to the defendant and should therefore be disclosed to him.

Finally the Supreme Court indicated in United States v. Agurs (1976) and Smith v. Phillips (1982) that the focus should be whether the prosecutor's failure to disclose rendered the trial fundamentally unfair, not the extent of prosecutorial culpability.

CHARLES H. WHITEBREAD
(1986)

Bibliography

SALTZBURG, STEPHEN 1980 American Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

WHITEBREAD, CHARLES H. 1980 Criminal Procedure. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITIES

The idea of the "discrete and insular minority" originated in the now famous footnote four of the opinion in UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS COMPANY (1938). Justice HARLAN F. STONE, writing for only a plurality of the Court, queried—without answering the question—"whether prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities, and which may call for a correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry." In the wake of the Court's about-face in 1937, Justice Stone was serving notice that the Court might not accord the same deference to statutes directed at "discrete and insular minorities" that it would to statutes directed at ECONOMIC REGULATION.

The Court made little use of the concept until the early 1970s, when it began to delineate the class characteristics of such groups. Included were groups that had been "saddled with such disabilities, or subjected to such a history of purposeful unequal treatment, or relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process." Although race, nationality, and alienage seem to have been firmly established as class characteristics of the "discrete and insular minority," the Court has refused to extend such class status to illegitimates, the poor, or conscientious objectors.

REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978) presented the question of the "discrete and insular minority" in a new light. The question in Bakke was whether the same "solicitude" should be applied to test a governmental action designed to benefit rather than injure a "discrete and insular" minority. The university, citing Carolene Products, argued that STRICT SCRUTINY was reserved exclusively for "discrete and insular minorities." Four Justices agreed that a white male needed no special protection from the political process that authorized the actions of the university. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL rejected this argument: "the "rights created by the . . . FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT are, by its terms, guaranteed to the individual. The rights established are personal rights. . . .' The guarantee of EQUAL PROTECTION cannot mean one thing when applied to one individual and something else when applied to a person of another color."

In FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980) the Court, for the first time since the JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES (1943–1944), upheld a racial classification that was expressed on the face of a law. Fullilove involved a challenge to an act of Congress authorizing federal funds for local public works projects and setting aside ten percent of those funds for employment of businesses owned by Negroes, Hispanics, Orientals, AMERICAN INDIANS, and Aleuts. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, writing for a plurality, called for judicial deference to Congress's power under section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, as equivalent to "the broad powers expressed in the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE. . . ." The irony was that the idea of the "discrete and insular minority" in its inception was designed to curtail such deference when racial classifications were involved.

BENIGN RACIAL CLASSIFICATIONS, it is sometimes said, are justified because they do not involve the stigma of INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION. The recipients of the benefits that accrue from the "benign" classification are not branded as members of an "inferior race" as they would be if the classification were an invidious one. This theory erects "stigma" as the standard for equal protection rights. Absent any such stigma the implication is that the Constitution is not offended, even if individuals must bear burdens created by a classification that otherwise would be disallowed by the equal protection clause. As Burger stated in Fullilove, "a sharing of the burden' by innocent parties is not impermissible." To use the idea of stigma as a racial class concept is, in effect, to translate equal protection rights into class rights.

But the intrusion of class into the Constitution is a dangerous proposition, one that is at odds with the principles of the constitutional regime—principles ultimately derived from the proposition that "all men are created equal." Class considerations explicitly deny this equality because they necessarily abstract from the individual and ascribe to him class characteristics that are different—and necessarily unequal—from those of individuals outside the class. A liberal jurisprudence must disallow all class considerations. When there is a conflict between two different "discrete and insular minorities," which should be accorded preference? No principle can answer this question. And the question is not merely theoretical. The Court has already faced this dilemma in cases such as UNITED JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS V. CAREY (1977) and Castenada v. Partida (1977), and in a pluralistic society it is inevitable that many more such cases will arise. Equal protection can be the foundation of a genuine liberal jurisprudence only if it applies to individuals. As Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN remarked in his powerful dissent in PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896), the case that established the SEPARATE-BUT-EQUAL DOCTRINE, "[o]ur Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens. In respect of CIVIL RIGHTS, all citizens are equal before the law." This is undoubtedly still the essential principle of liberal government.

JAMES MADISON argued, in THE FEDERALIST #10, that in a large, diverse republic with a multiplicity of interests it was unlikely that there would ever be permanent majorities and permanent minorities; thus there would be little probability that "a majority of the whole will have a common motive to invade the rights of other citizens." On this assumption, the majorities that do form will be composed of coalitions of minorities that come together for limited self-interested purposes. The majority will thus never have a sense of its own interest as a majority.

By and large, the solution of the Founders has worked remarkably well. There have been no permanent majorities, and certainly none based exclusively on race. Understanding American politics in terms of monolithic majorities and "discrete and insular minorities"—as the Supreme Court appears to do—precludes the creation of a common interest that transcends racial class considerations. By transforming the Fourteenth Amendment into an instrument of class politics, the Court risks either making a majority faction more likely by heightening the majority's awareness of its class status as a majority, or transforming the liberal constitutional regime into one no longer based on majority rule.

EDWARD J. ERLER
(1986)

Bibliography

ELY, JOHN H. 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Pages 75–77 and 135–179. Cambrige, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

ERLER, EDWARD J. 1982 Equal Protection and Personal Rights: The Regime of the "Discrete and Insular Minority." Georgia Law Review 16:407–444.

KARST, KENNETH L. and HOROWITZ, HAROLD W. 1974 Affirmative Action and Equal Protection. Virginia Law Review 60:955–974.

DISCRIMINATION

See: Age Discrimination; Antidiscrimination Legislation; Disability Discrimination; Race and Sex in Antidiscrimination Law; Racial Discrimination; Sex Discrimination

DISMISSED TIME

See: Released Time

DISORDERLY CONDUCT

See: Breach of the Peace

DISSENTING OPINION

In cases in which the judges of a multijudge court are divided as to the DECISION, it is customary for those in the minority to file a dissenting OPINION. This practice is followed in the Supreme Court of the United States. In recent years, dissenting opinions have been filed in as many as seventy percent of all cases decided by the Court. In a typical TERM over 150 separate dissenting opinions are filed by Justices who find themselves on the losing side.

The author of a dissenting opinion tries to explain why the Court should have decided the case differently. Often a dissenting Justice will attempt to provide the public with an interpretation of the MAJORITY OPINION in order to narrow its scope or to restrict its impact. A strong dissenting opinion may go far to weaken the decision and may point the way for future litigation.

The opinion of the Court is written by a Justice on the prevailing side designated by the Chief Justice (or the senior Justice in the majority), and must reflect a consensus of the majority. Dissenters have a freer hand: they can make their point more sharply because they do not need to accommodate colleagues who might balk at aspects of their argument. Before the decision of a case is announced, the draft opinions circulate among the Justices. A well-argued dissent can induce the author of the majority opinion to modify its content, either to retain majority support, as in EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1947), or to respond in kind to a particularly harsh attack, as in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857). In an extraordinary case, the dissent may attract enough support actually to become the majority opinion.

Dissents are most common during change in the ideological composition of the Court. For a time the dissents portend an imminent revolution in the tendency of judicial thought and point to the future course of decisions. Once the revolution is perfected there follows a time when the dissents resist the new orientation and recall the old orthodoxy. Two of the Court's great dissenters were Justices JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN (1833–1911) and OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, each of whom stood against the majority of his day and took positions that much later were adopted by the Court.

CHARLES EVANS HUGHES once wrote that "a dissent in the court of last resort is an appeal to the brooding spirit of the law, to the intelligence of a future day. . . ." Contemporaneously, HARLAN F. STONE wrote that "dissents seldom aid in the right development of the law. They often do harm."

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"If any of their officers, or creatures, should attempt to oppress the people, or should actually perpetrate the blackest deed, he has nothing to do but get into the ten miles square. Why was this dangerous power given?" The "dangerous power" to which GEORGE MASON objected so vehemently at the Virginia ratifying convention was that vested in Congress by the seventeenth clause of Article I, section 8, "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may . . . become the seat of the government of the United States." That the power to legislate for the capital district should be controversial was a surprise to JAMES MADISON, who had proposed it in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. He defended the provision as the means by which the federal government might "be guarded from the influence of particular states, or from insults."

The district was established on the banks of the Potomac River between Maryland and Virginia, at a site chosen by GEORGE WASHINGTON, and Congress assumed JURISDICTION over it on February 27, 1801. The location of the capital was agreed to by northern Federalists in exchange for southern acquiescence in federal assumption of state revolutionary war debts. But that location, south of Mason's and Dixon's line, resulted in the greatest national disgrace before the Civil War, namely, that the federal capital was a bastion of slavery and the home of a flourishing slave market. Not until the COMPROMISE OF 1850 was even abomination of slave trading extinguished.

Originally, the District of Columbia comprised one hundred square miles of land ceded by Virginia and Maryland, and three municipal corporations, Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria. Alexandria was retroceded to Virginia in 1846, at the request of its inhabitants, and the district has since comprised less than seventy square miles. Since 1871, there has been a single municipal corporation coextensive with the district. The 1980 population of over 600,000 was larger than the populations of each of four states.

During most of its history the district's lawmaking was done directly by Congress. There was a brief period of home rule, under a government like those of the TERRITORIES, from 1871 to 1874, during which the district plunged deeply into debt. From 1878 until 1974 the district was governed by three commissioners appointed by the President. Home rule was restored by passage of the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION AND SELF-GOVERNING ACT in 1973 and adoption of a city charter in 1974. Since that time the district has been governed by an elected mayor and council, although Congress must approve the budget and retains a veto over other legislation.

The legal status of residents of the District of Columbia is anomalous. The Framers of the Constitution apparently did not foresee a large permanent population in the district distinct from the population of the surrounding states. Even the CITIZENSHIP of district residents, who were not citizens of any state, was uncertain until adoption of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT (1868). At least from Hepburn v. Ellzey (1805) until the Supreme Court sustained an amendment to the JUDICIAL CODE in National Mutual Insurance Company v. Tidewater Transfer Company (1949), citizens of the district could not sue or be sued in federal court under DIVERSITY JURISDICTION. Moreover, district residents were unable to vote for presidential electors until passage of the TWENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT (1961), and they remain unrepresented in Congress to this day (except, since 1970, by a nonvoting delegate). In 1978, Congress proposed the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REPRESENTATION AMENDMENT, which would have given the district a status equivalent to statehood, but the amendment failed of RATIFICATION by the state legislatures.

The district has often been the site of experiments in "model legislation," such as the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA MINIMUM WAGE ACT (1918) and the District of Columbia Crime Control Act (1970). The district is also the focus of demonstrations, small and great, against government policies, ranging from Coxey's army (1894) and the bonus marchers (1932) to Resurrection City (1968) and the marches against the VIETNAM WAR. The right to carry demands for redress of grievances directly to the seat of government is a unique expression of FREEDOM OF PETITION.

Creation of a capital district outside the jurisdiction of any of the constituent states has been copied by other federal unions, including Australia, Brazil, India, and Mexico. The idea that no one member of the federation should control the conditions under which the central government works has thus become a part of the modern theory of FEDERALISM. The all-too-real practical difficulty is that the conditions come to be controlled instead by those who make up the permanent infrastructure of the government and whose perceived interest is in the perpetual growth of that government. In the United States itself, the District of Columbia remains an anomaly, a city dependent almost entirely upon the public payroll serving as the capital of a republic dedicated to the principle of free private enterprise.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA
(Update)

After nearly two hundred years since assuming exclusive JURISDICTION over the District of Columbia, Congress continues to tinker with the governmental structure of the district and to disfranchise its citizens.

The 1990s witnessed the effective end of a twenty-year experiment with home rule in the district. A series of fiscal and management crises, coupled with remarkably high crime rates, led Congress to pass LEGISLATION creating a "control board" to oversee the district's governance. Its five members appointed by the President, the control board assumed most of the powers of the elected mayor and city council.

The institution of the control board further diluted the limited opportunities for self-government enjoyed by the district's citizens. Although the TWENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT granted the district a voice in the ELECTORAL COLLEGE, district citizens do not have full REPRESENTATION in Congress.

(They have a delegate in the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES who can vote in committee, but not on the final passage of legislation.) With the end of home rule, the over 500,000 citizens of the district have no formal say in legislation governing their communities.

The disfranchisement of district citizens contravenes the famous rallying principle of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, "No taxation without representation." Yet, despite scholars' sound constitutional arguments for extending VOTING RIGHTS to district citizens based on the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, neither the courts nor the political branches show any inclination to establish a truly REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT in the district.

ADAM WINKLER
(2000)

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA MINIMUM WAGE LAW
40 Stat. 960 (1918)

Congress, in its capacity as legislature for the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, enacted this minimum wage law for women and minors "to maintain them in good health and to protect their morals." Seeking to ground the act on the POLICE POWER, Congress established a Minimum Wage Board with power to compel testimony and other EVIDENCE. The act authorized the board to investigate wage conditions of women and minors in the District of Columbia and to fix their minimum wages on the basis of adequacy "to supply the necessary cost of living." The act required the board to provide PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS; it also provided for APPEALS to courts of the District and made violations punishable as MISDEMEANORS. The Supreme Court declared the act unconstitutional in Adkins v. Children's Hospital (1923) as a violation of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS OF LAW, but when the Court overruled Adkins in WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH (1937), Attorney General HOMER CUMMINGS declared that the law was in effect without any need for congressional reenactment.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Unconstitutionality.)

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REPRESENTATION AMENDMENT
92 Stat. 3795 (1978)

Twenty-three times since 1800, congressional representation for the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA had been sought, mainly on the grounds that taxation of District residents without REPRESENTATION in Congress was undemocratic. The modern District's predominantly black population is larger than that of each of ten states. In 1978 Congress proposed a constitutional amendment that would treat the district as a state is treated for purposes of congressional and ELECTORAL COLLEGE representation and for participation in presidential elections and RATIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS. It would have repealed the TWENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT, which had allowed district residents to vote for President and vice-president, while limiting district representation in the electoral college to that of the least populous state. As with other recent amendments, Congress fixed a seven-year time limit for ratification and provided that it would implement the amendment by legislation at a later date.

Although both houses of Congress passed the proposed amendment enthusiastically, it had slight chance of ratification because it would have added two senators and one representative to Congress, all almost certain to be both black and Democrats. In 1985, the period for ratification expired.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

BEST, JUDITH 1983 National Representation of the District of Columbia. Frederick, Md.: University Publications of America.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SELF-GOVERNING AND GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION ACT
87 Stat. 774 (1973)

Limited home rule in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA had been a long-time desire of its inhabitants. Since 1874, the President had chosen the city's administrators and Congress had acted as the city's governing council. Washingtonians elected only their school board and a nonvoting delegate to the House of Representatives.

This 1973 act granted the District a council, a mayor, and increased self-government. It provided a charter for local government, subject to approval by a majority of the registered voters. Although Congress sought to avoid day-to-day responsibility for District affairs, it retained ultimate legislative authority as provided in Article I, section 8, including the power to legislate generally for the District and to veto local laws. The city government exercised the functions of several quasi-federal agencies: the Redevelopment Land Agency, the National Capital Housing Authority, and the District of Columbia Manpower Administration. The Act reorganized the National Capital Planning Commission, giving the mayor responsibility for District planning, excepting federal and international projects. Further, it required the President, in appointing judges to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals and the Superior Court, to choose from candidates submitted to him by a newly created District of Columbia Judicial Nomination Commission.

The act, while still denying the District congressional REPRESENTATION, satisfied a number of city residents' demands for local control over city affairs.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

DIVERSITY JURISDICTION

Under Article III of the Constitution, the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES extends to "Controversies between Citizens of different States . . . and between . . . the Citizens [of a State] . . . and foreign . . . Citizens or Subjects." This power is called diversity jurisdiction because its basis is the difference in CITIZENSHIP of the parties.

The accepted justification for diversity jurisdiction has been the need to protect out-of-state citizens against discrimination in state courts. However, the extent of such discrimination as of the time the Constitution was written is uncertain, and there is evidence that financial and commercial interests supported diversity jurisdiction in the hope of finding shelter from state laws and judicial systems favorable to debtors.

In fact, the diversity jurisdiction authorized in Article III is not confined to situations in which out-of-state citizens require protection. For example, a plaintiff may file a diversity action in her home state's federal court if she can obtain personal JURISDICTION over the defendant there. Also, it is constitutionally permissible for Congress to confer diversity jurisdiction even when citizens of the same state are on both sides of the litigation, so long as some out-of-state citizens are also parties. Congress has conferred jurisdiction in just such cases in the federal interpleader statute.

Congress has the power to determine how much of the constitutionally authorized diversity jurisdiction the lower federal courts may exercise. It has enacted a general statute that allows the federal courts to hear some but not all types of diversity cases either originally or on REMOVAL. Examples of excluded cases are those in which less than a required amount is in controversy, those in which there is incomplete diversity (that is, at least one plaintiff is from the same state as at least one defendant), and those which the defendant seeks to remove from his or her home state's court.

In 1946 Congress first provided expressly for diversity jurisdiction over suits involving citizens of the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA and TERRITORIES. In National Mutual Insurance Co. v. Tidewater Co. (1949), the Supreme Court upheld the law because two Justices were willing to declare that the District of Columbia was a "state" within the meaning of the diversity clause of Article III, and three Justices concluded that Congress could confer the jurisdiction even if it were not within the Article III judicial power.

The citizenship of parties for purposes of applying the general diversity statute is not always obvious. Some problems have been solved by statute. For example, problems arising from the Court's 1844 decision that a CORPORATION is a citizen of its state of incorporation were resolved by a congressional declaration that a corporation is a citizen of both the state of its incorporation and of the state where its principal place of business is located. Others have been handled by judicial interpretation, which has held, for example, that an individual is a citizen of the state in which he or she is domiciled at the time suit is filed. Difficult interpretive problems remain, however.

Under the Rules of Decision Act, as interpreted in ERIE RAILROAD V. TOMPKINS (1938), a federal court hearing a diversity case must apply the substantive law of the state in which it is located. It must also employ that state's CHOICE OF LAW rules and any of the state's procedural rules that have a predictable effect on the outcome of the case and do not conflict with the FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE or some overriding federal policy. In cases in which state law is unclear or has not yet been decided, the federal court must strive to resolve the case as the state's highest court would, drawing direction from trends and policies manifest in state judicial opinions at all levels. The state courts are not bound by the federal court's decisions interpreting state law.

It is doubtful that Congress could constitutionally enact a law giving to the federal courts or assuming for itself the power to develop substantive law for diversity cases. Although the Erie opinion avoided this constitutional issue, fundamental notions of state sovereignty and the limited role of the federal government dictated the decision's interpretation of the Rules of Decision Act. Notwithstanding these limitations, Congress may enact and has enacted rules of procedure regulating diversity cases, even though the rules also affect substantive rights. And because of the federal interest in the orderly and fair treatment of individuals engaged in multistate transactions, Congress likely could also constitutionally enact a body of federal choice of law rules applicable to diversity actions.

Declining concern over the need to protect out-of-state citizens against discrimination in state courts, coupled with rising distress over the heavy caseload of the federal courts, has spawned proposals to eliminate the federal courts' general diversity jurisdiction. While some continue to praise diversity jurisdiction for the continued acquaintance it offers federal judges with the common law process and the access it offers litigants (albeit selectively) to the often superior federal procedural system, those who support congressional repeal of diversity jurisdiction seem to be approaching success. Eventually it may come to be used only in complex, multistate cases, such as CLASS ACTIONS and interpleaders, in which the federal courts' power to issue process nationwide offers substantial advantages over state jurisdiction.

CAROLE E. GOLDBERG-AMBROSE
(1986)

Bibliography

ELY, JOHN HART 1974 The Irrepressible Myth of Erie. Harvard Law Review 87:693–740.

SHAPIRO, DAVID 1977 Federal Diversity Jurisdiction: A Survey and a Proposal. Harvard Law Review 91:317–355.

DIVORCE AND THE CONSTITUTION

The constitutional power of the states to prescribe conditions for marriage and divorce went largely unchallenged until the mid-twentieth century. Once Americans became highly mobile, however, new constitutional questions emerged. Divorce might be difficult under some states' laws, and well-nigh impossible under others', but in some places the courthouse doors were open. Could two North Carolinians go to Nevada, stay there for six weeks of "residence," obtain EX PARTE divorces from their respective North Carolina spouses, marry each other, and return to live in North Carolina without being guilty of bigamous cohabitation? In two cases entitled Williams v. North Carolina (1942, 1945), the Supreme Court answered that question conditionally. The Nevada divorces were valid, and must be given FULL FAITH AND CREDIT by North Carolina, if the travelers really were domiciled in Nevada when they received their divorces. However, domicile was a jurisdictional requirement for the Nevada courts; North Carolina might constitutionally retry the issue of the previous Nevada domicile, and, if its courts found that domicile lacking, might punish its straying residents.

The Williams "solution" soon crumbled. The Court held in 1948 that if both husband and wife entered appearances in the Nevada proceeding, then neither of them could later challenge the Nevada divorce by way of COLLATERAL ATTACK. Nor could a third party attack such a JUDGMENT. Perhaps the "true" domiciliary state might prosecute for bigamy in a case just like Williams, but few states had North Carolina's zeal for such prosecutions.

Since mid-century American law in this area has undergone two distinct but related revolutions. First, almost all the states now permit the dissolution of marriage on at least one "no fault" ground. Second, in a variety of contexts the Supreme Court has recognized not only a constitutional right to marry but a broad FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION. It is doubtful that a state's interest in preserving a marriage against the will of one spouse would be given the same weight today that the Court gave it in the 1940s. In SOSNA V. IOWA (1975) the majority did remark that domicile was still a jurisdictional requirement for divorce, but the Court might take a different view if a latter-day prosecutor were to bring bigamy charges in circumstances closely resembling the Williams facts. (See MARRIAGE AND THE CONSTITUTION.)

Sosna itself upheld Iowa's one-year durational RESIDENCE REQUIREMENT as a condition on access to the state's divorce court, rejecting the argument that this limitation denied the constitutional RIGHT TO TRAVEL with the comment that the state had not denied divorce but only delayed it. Lawyers, including Justices, are experts in rationalizing; each day's delay in getting a divorce is surely a denial of one day's single status and of the right to remarry. The Sosna rationalization was aimed at distinguishing the Court's earlier decision in BODDIE V. CONNECTICUT (1971). Boddie held, on PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS grounds, that INDIGENTS could not constitutionally be denied ACCESS TO THE COURTS in divorce cases for inability to pay filing fees. The Court there remarked on the "basic importance" of marriage, and took note that the state had a monopoly over its dissolution—and thus the availability of lawful remarriage.

The Court has not recognized a "right to divorce" analogous to the "right to marry" confirmed in LOVING V. VIRGINIA (1967) and ZABLOCKI V. REDHAIL (1978). However, we are not far from the recognition that the Constitution demands important justification for any significant interference with a spouse's freedom to terminate a marriage. Although the virtual disappearance of highly restrictive divorce laws makes less urgent the recognition of this constitutional liberty, that same change in state law surely alters the climate in which the Justices would evaluate the state's interests urged in opposition to the claim of associational freedom.

The collateral issue of child custody can also raise constitutional issues. Of necessity, a domestic relations court must have wide discretion in awarding custody. Yet because the parent-child relation is itself an intimate association of "fundamental" importance, it is vital that the custody decision not be made arbitrarily. The presumption of custody for the mother over a child of "tender years," for example, raises grave issues concerning SEX DISCRIMINATION. Racial and religious grounds for custody obviously raise constitutional danger signals, as PALMORE V. SIDOTI (1984) shows. And for a court to deny custody to a parent simply because he or she is living with another adult outside marriage, or is involved in a homosexual relationship, would also raise serious problems of associational freedom. Of course, at some level of maturity well below the age of adulthood, the child's preference—his or her own associational freedom—takes on constitutional weight that may dominate the custody decision. The Supreme Court has only begun its exploration of these painful subjects. Surely an early priority for the Court will be the reexamination of its old assumptions about the interests that justify a state's imposing its own preferred family patterns on the individuals who must live in them.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

GARFIELD, HELEN 1980 The Transitory Divorce Action: Jurisdiction in the No-Fault Era. Texas Law Review 58:501–547.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1980 The Freedom of Intimate Association. Yale Law Journal 89:624–692.

NOTE 1980 Developments in the Law: The Constitution and the Family. Harvard Law Review 93:1156, 1308–1350.

DNA TESTING AND GENETIC PRIVACY

Constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY issues in the context of genetic testing may arise as federal, state, and local governments engage in the collection of DNA samples for DNA identification testing. These tests produce patterns of DNA banding that are highly specific to each individual. Such DNA banding patterns are useful for determining disputed paternity and for matching suspects to forensic samples in either criminal or military settings, among others. To facilitate such genetic identification, both law enforcement agencies and the military have begun assembling databases of DNA patterns. Additionally, many states have enacted laws requiring compulsory DNA sampling of convicted criminals. In analyzing the privacy implications of such testing, it is important to bear in mind that the patterns themselves contain essentially no information related to genetic disease or other expressed physical or behavioral genetic traits, only a highly individualized pattern of DNA fragments.

The federal Constitution contains no explicit right of privacy, but privacy is implicated in the constitutional restrictions on SEARCH AND SEIZURE under the FOURTH AMENDMENT, and the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION under the Fifth Amendment. In SCHMERBER V. CALIFORNIA (1966), the Supreme Court held that warrantless removal of a blood sample from a suspect for purposes of blood alcohol testing constitutes a search under the Fourth Amendment. However, the Court held that because blood drawing is a safe, routine, and minimally invasive medical procedure, such a search did not intrude on the suspect's privacy, and was permissible with PROBABLE CAUSE. The Court also held that the taking of such evidence did not implicate the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, as this right extends only to compelled oral testimony.

From this PRECEDENT, courts have more recently held that taking forensic DNA samples is not a form of compelled "self-incrimination," and is a permissible government search. Indeed, some forms of DNA identification tests can be done with a hair root or other bodily samples obtained by even less invasive procedures than drawing blood. Additionally, where compulsory testing of convicted criminals is concerned, the required showing of probable cause is much lower because convicts, having forfeited many of their CIVIL RIGHTS, have diminished privacy interests.

An additional important source of constitutional privacy arises from the line of reproductive rights cases including ROE V. WADE (1973). These cases establish a constitutional right against governmental intrusion into aspects of reproductive privacy. Despite the conceptual relationship between genetics and procreation, reproductive privacy does not appear to be implicated by DNA identification tests. The Supreme Court has stressed that these cases deal only with direct governmental intrusion into "protected decisionmaking" related to procreation, childbearing, and related familial choices. DNA identification testing does not impede or directly burden an individual's ability to beget, bear, or rear a child.

An additional aspect of constitutional privacy arises from a right of informational privacy found by the Supreme Court in WHALEN V. ROE (1977). This constitutional right restricts the ability of the government to compile personal information about individuals. However, the courts have held this right to be sharply limited. Government collection of such information is usually permissible when the government can show a legitimate reason for doing so, and takes some steps to restrict access to the information. Because DNA identification patterns contain little personal information, and governmental need for such information is compelling, collection of such patterns is probably permissible under Whalen, particularly since Congress has enacted some statutory protections against unauthorized disclosure or use of information in law enforcement DNA collection.

DAN L. BURK
(2000)

DOCTRINE

In constitutional law as in other pursuits of revelation, initiates commonly refer to "doctrines": bodies of rules or principles either authoritatively declared or systematically advocated. Some such doctrines have been simple; the ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE is an example. Others, such as the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE, may become shorthand references to larger and more complex creations of the legal mind. More inclusively, one may speak of a doctrine as the body of principles ruling any branch of law, including constitutional law: the doctrine governing PRIOR RESTRAINTS on speech, for example, or the doctrine governing discrimination based on ILLEGITIMACY. In any such use, "doctrine" refers to a body of judicial interpretations of a particular branch of law.

Even more generally, one may speak of constitutional "doctrine" in the abstract, referring to the whole body of rules and principles resulting from the judicial process of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. Our constitutional law, apart from a few rules explicitly stated in the text of the Constitution (such as the requirement that a senator be thirty years old), consists almost entirely of doctrine made by judges in the tradition of the Anglo-American COMMON LAW. Doctrine thus develops as precedents are made by decisions in particular cases. One branch of constitutional doctrine, in fact, is designed in part to assure that the federal courts' lawmaking is informed by the need to apply doctrine to concrete facts. (See CASES AND CONTROVERSIES.) There is therefore a human quality in nearly every constitutional case; a court's opinion normally begins with a recitation of actual facts touching the lives of named individuals. One danger in an era of CLASS ACTIONS and INSTITUTIONAL LITIGATION is that those techniques carry some risk of squeezing the human flavor out of a case, with attendant costs to the process of keeping doctrine attuned to life. Yet implied in the idea of doctrine is the elaboration of principles transcending the concerns of particular individuals, to provide guidance—or comfort—to people in the aggregate.

Doctrinal formulas may outlive their usefulness, as the "original package doctrine" has. When they do, they fall into disuse or are explicitly abandoned. One of the paradoxes of law is that it strives to provide the security of enduring rules and principles yet is compelled to adjust to the demands of an evolving human society. Constitutional doctrine is rarely tidy and nearly always susceptible to manipulation; it is full of ambiguity and vagueness; "absolute" rules either give way to interest-balancing or serve as interest-balancing's disguises. Doctrine was ever history's handmaiden.

Yet constitutional doctrine has had generating force of its own. It is hard to imagine what this country would have been like but for the nation-building doctrinal contributions of the MARSHALL COURT. And the doctrinal development begun by BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) has been a major influence in our twentieth-century social and political life. If constitutional doctrine sometimes seems no more than a chapter in a given era's political story, it is sometimes a chapter that advances the plot.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

DODGE v. WOOLSEY
18 Howard 331 (1856)

The PIQUA BRANCH BANK V. KNOOP (1854) decision striking down the tax on banks enraged the people of Ohio. They exercised SOVEREIGNTY by amending their state CONSTITUTION to empower and require their legislature to tax all banks, regardless of any tax-immunity or tax-preference clauses in their charters. Woolsey, a stockholder of a bank, sued the bank, as well as the tax collector, in a state court to enjoin the collection of a tax authorized by the state legislature under the new amendment to the state constitution. The Supreme Court, by a vote of 6–3, for the first time sustained its JURISDICTION in a STOCKHOLDER'S SUIT and ruled that the state could no more impair the OBLIGATION OF A CONTRACT, contrary to the CONTRACT CLAUSE, by its constitution than by a statute. Justice JOHN A. CAMPBELL, one of the dissenters, angrily asserted that his brethren had established the DOCTRINE that the final power over public revenues was to be found not in the people "but in the numerical majority of the judges of this court. . . ." Besides his heat, he raised a profound question: "Should it be that a state of this Union had become the victim of vicious legislation, its property alienated, its powers of taxation renounced in favor of chartered associations, and the resources of the body politic cut off, what remedy has the people against the misgovernment?" Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY answered for the majority by saying that the people govern themselves, wisely or not, and are bound to their contracts by the Constitution. By 1862 the Court handed down five more decisions involving the taxation of Ohio banks. The state finally capitulated, and the Court irrevocably committed itself to the doctrine that a grant of tax privileges could not be repealed for the life of the contract.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

DOE, CHARLES
(1830–1896)

Charles Cogswell Doe, associate justice of the New Hampshire Supreme Court from 1859 to 1874, and chief justice from 1876 to 1896, is remembered as one of the country's greatest COMMON LAW judges. He is less renowned for his contributions to constitutional law. One reason may have been his bold originality. During his years on the bench, constitutional law was less tolerant of the unorthodox and less receptive to eccentric genius than was the common law. And Doe was original if not eccentric. The perspective from which he viewed the state constitution is an example. The drafters of the document had adopted words indicating they were writing a SOCIAL COMPACT and Doe insisted it had to be interpreted as a social compact. Under the other types of constitutions—those that were organic laws, not compacts—the government, Doe maintained, possesses INHERENT POWERS limited by certain enumerated provisions (for example, the federal BILL OF RIGHTS). When the liberty of a citizen is pitted against the authority of the state, the citizen must find specific wording to restrain government. A constitution that is a compact, by contrast, has no place for inherent power. As a result, Doe held in Wooster v. Plymouth (1882), CIVIL RIGHTS are not immunities but "privileges which society has engaged to provide in lieu of the natural liberties so given up by individuals" under the "contract." The proposition that the compact made government an agent, and individual rights absolute except when specifically surrendered, permitted Doe to relieve the citizen of the burden of establishing constitutional limits on state authority. The state had to demonstrate that the power it claimed had, by compact, been delegated to it.

The chief constitutional DOCTRINE resulting from the social compact doctrine was equality. "The bill of rights," Doe ruled in State v. U.S. & Canada Express Co. (1880), "is a bill of their equal, private rights, reserved by the grantors of public power." Equality, he added, is "practically the source and sum of all rights, and the substance of the constitution." Doe sought to make equality the most fundamental civil right protecting nineteenth-century Americans.

The national development in constitutional law most troublesome to Judge Doe was the United States Supreme Court's decision in the SINKING FUND CASES (1879). Fearing that the ruling endangered private property rights, he wrote several opinions hoping to diminish those cases' influence. In Corbin's Case (1891) Doe even invented the concept of "constitutional estoppel" to bar the state government from taking an action that in a corporate charter it had expressly reserved the right to take. Doe's particular genius even led him to criticize FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) and DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819), two decisions most contemporaries thought protected property rights. Doe believed they weakened property rights and increased arbitrary legislative power. Better had they been decided on the SEPARATION OF POWERS principle than on the CONTRACT CLAUSE.

In Doe's hands, the separation of powers principle became a means of enlarging his court's JURISDICTION. His distrust of legislative power resulted in support of laissez-faire principles, but his belief that courts should impose common law tests of reasonableness on business supported a measure of regulation. The supremacy of constitutional limitations was his foremost principle.

JOHN PHILLIP REID
(1986)

Bibliography

REID, JOHN PHILLIP 1967 Chief Justice: The Judicial World of Charles Doe. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

DOE v. BOLTON

See: Roe v. Wade

DOLAN v. CITY OF TIGARD
512 U.S. 374 (1994)

Governments often require landowners to satisfy conditions before issuing building permits. Under the Supreme Court's opinion in Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987), landowners can challenge such conditions as violating the Fifth Amendment's TAKINGS clause when they lack an "essential nexus" to the harms of development.

Dolan sought permission from the City of Tigard, Oregon to expand her retail hardware business, which was partially situated on a floodplain. The Planning Commission conditioned its approval on Dolan's agreeing to dedicate both her land within the floodplain to improve the city's flood control system and an additional 15-foot strip for a pedestrian/bicycle pathway. The Court held, 5–4, that these conditions constituted a taking of property.

The MAJORITY OPINION, authored by Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, found that the "essential nexus" test of Nollan was met. But this was not enough. An exaction should also bear a "rough proportionality" to the corresponding harm. "No precise mathematical calculation is required, but the city must make some sort of individualized determination that the required dedication is related both in nature and extent to the impact of the proposed development." Finding no such "individualized determination" in the case, the Court found an unconstitutional takings instead.

In dissent, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS criticized the Court for resurrecting heightened JUDICIAL REVIEW of regulations similar to Lochner-era SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS jurisprudence. He argued that the uncertainty of assessing environmental harms should justify deference to legislative processes where the government can demonstrate rationality and impartiality of its conditions. Justice DAVID H. SOUTER wrote a separate dissent, in which he argued that proportionality ought to be considered part of the "essential nexus" test of Nollan.

EDWARD J. MCCAFFERY
(2000)

DOMBROWSKI v. PFISTER
380 U.S. 479 (1965)

Dombrowski marks the high point of the Supreme Court's willingness to authorize federal district court interference with pending state criminal proceedings. When decided, Dombrowski seemed to suggest that such interference was warranted when the state statutes forming the basis of the prosecution were alleged to violate the First Amendment overbreadth doctrine. The CHILLING EFFECT—a term first used in Dombrowski—on First Amendment rights of prosecutions under such statutes derived from the fact of the prosecution, thereby rendering successful defense of the prosecution an inadequate remedy for the chilling effect. Dombrowski was "reinterpreted" in YOUNGER V. HARRIS (1971) and has since been of little precedential or practical importance.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

DOMESTIC COMMERCE

See: Intrastate Commerce

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE CLAUSE

Article IV, section 4 of the U.S. Constitution provides:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

The last phrase in this section, known as the domestic violence clause, was added to the Constitution in response to SHAYS' REBELLION in Massachusetts in 1786–1787 in which disgruntled Massachusetts farmers shut down the state courts and threatened the legislature. Congress, acting under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION and concerned that rebellion might affect other states, attempted to raise federal troops from neighboring states, but was ignored. When the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION began, three months after Shays' Rebellion was resolved, the drafters included among the Constitution's purposes the need "to insure domestic tranquility" and added the domestic violence clause.

The domestic violence clause commits the power to protect the states to the "United States" rather than to any particular branch. In 1792 Congress assigned to the President the duty to respond on behalf of the United States, a statutory power the President retains today. Presidents have used their authority sparingly. The first President to use this authority was apparently RUTHERFORD B. HAYES who, in 1877, was asked by the governor of West Virginia (because the state legislature was not in session) to send federal troops to help suppress a railroad LABOR riot. On several occasions Presidents have declined to respond to requests for assistance because the state had not demonstrated the insufficiency of its own resources or because an official, and not the state legislature, had made the request.

The domestic violence clause has long had a secondary meaning. It was frequently cited during two critical periods—the drafting of the Constitution in 1787 and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT enforcement debates— as evidence that the states, not the federal government, had the primary responsibility for criminal law enforcement. Some of the Framers, who were concerned that the new federal government would usurp traditional state power over crime, pointed out that the Constitution expressly granted to the United States the power to punish only three crimes: treason, counterfeiting, and piracy on the high seas. They then argued that the domestic violence clause reserved to the states the power to define and punish domestic crime.

These arguments were renewed during the debates over early CIVIL RIGHTS legislation enforcing the Fourteenth Amendment. Those who favored an expansive view of the Fourteenth Amendment made a two-step argument: (1) The clause obligated the federal government to intervene when a state was overwhelmed by domestic disturbances and requested assistance, and (2) crimes committed within a state constituted evidence of the state's inability to deal with domestic disturbances and, accordingly, the guarantee of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS justified federal intervention whether or not the state requested it. Those who favored a more limited view of the Fourteenth Amendment argued that the domestic violence clause was itself a limitation on the powers of Congress and that the federal government could not invade the inherent power of states to punish crime, at least not without a proper request from the state.

The arguments over the relationship between the domestic violence clause and the power of Congress to punish crime have never been addressed by the courts. In LUTHER V. BORDEN (1849), the Supreme Court held that the determination of when a state government has properly requested federal assistance under the domestic violence clause belongs to the political branches exclusively. Since that time the courts have declined invitation to construe the duty of the United States under the clause. Accordingly, the constitutional role of the domestic violence clause remains somewhat obscure.

JAY S. BYBEE
(2000)

Bibliography

BYBEE, JAY S. 1997 Insuring Domestic Tranquility, Lopez, Federalization of Crime and the Forgotten Role of the Domestic Violence Clause. George Washington Law Review 66:1–83.

COMMENT 1966 Federal Intervention in the States for the Suppression of Domestic Violence: Constitutionality, Statutory Power, and Policy. Duke Law Journal 1966:415–462.

FERGUSON, CLARENCE C. 1959 The Inherent Justiciability of the Constitutional Guaranty Against Domestic Violence. Rutgers Law Review 13:407–425.

RICH, BENNETT M. 1941 The Presidents and Civil Disorder. Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution.

WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1972 The Guarantee Clause of the U.S. Constitution. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

DOREMUS, UNITED STATES v.
249 U.S. 86 (1919)

Congress moved to suppress illegal drug trafficking in the HARRISON ACT of 1919 by compelling persons dealing in narcotics to register with the federal government. The act further imposed a $1 annual license tax, an exercise of the NATIONAL POLICE POWER. Justice WILLIAM R. DAY, for a 5–4 Supreme Court, sustained the entire act even though the provision at issue was the one requiring the use of federal forms for recording transactions. "The act may not be declared unconstitutional," Day said, "because its effect may be to accomplish another purpose as well as the raising of revenue." He found the tax section closely related to the rest of the act. By ignoring LEGISLATIVE INTENT—and his own recent opinion in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) where such intent had been dispositive—he chose to follow the line of precedents beginning with CHAMPION V. AMES (1903). A single-sentence dissent found that the act overstepped Congress's delegated powers and invaded the states' RESERVED POLICE POWER.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Drug Regulation; Taxing and Spending Powers.)

DOREMUS v. BOARD OF EDUCATION
342 U.S. (1952)

A New Jersey statute provided for the reading, without comment, of five verses of the Old Testament at the opening of each public school day. This was challenged as an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION by a taxpayer of the town of Hawthorne who had had a child in its school system.

Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, writing for the Supreme Court, rejected the STANDING of the plaintiff to raise the constitutional question. His child had been graduated from school, so that his claim as a parent suffered from MOOTNESS. Furthermore, because there was no showing that public money was spent on the practice, the plaintiff's taxpayer status gave him no stake in the litigation.

Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, with whom Justices STANLEY F. REED and HAROLD BURTON agreed, dissented. A taxpayer, Douglas argued, had a general interest in how the schools of the community were managed. The effect of this disposition was to defer for a decade decision on the constitutional merits of religious exercises in public schools.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

DORMANT COMMERCE CLAUSE

The Constitution does not explicitly restrict STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE. While the COMMERCE CLAUSE of Article I authorizes congressional displacement of state commercial regulation, the constitutional text is silent regarding the residuum of power left to the states where Congress has not acted. It has long been accepted, however, that the mere grant of authority to Congress—even if unexercised—implies some restrictions on the states. A panoply of terms is applied to this constitutional implication. Among the most popular are the "negative commerce clause" or the "dormant commerce clause."

Surprisingly there was little discussion at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 on the subject of free trade. Consequently, the Supreme Court felt obligated to justify the implied limitation on the state by reference to the events that precipitated the call for a convention rather than to what transpired at the gathering. The ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION era was marked by commercial warfare between the states. The resulting barriers to national trade, which threatened the vitality and peace of the Union, are often viewed as a primary catalyst for the Convention of 1787.

Judging from the constitutional language alone, one might conclude that the Framers left protection of national trade to congressional supervision rather than judicial enforcement. This expectation, however, does not appear to have been the vision of the principal Framer. JAMES MADISON anticipated that competing economic interests would neutralize each other in Congress and prevent the enactment of national regulation of interstate trade. The commerce clause, explained Madison in a letter written a half-century after the Constitution's drafting, would act "as a negative and preventive provision against injustice among the States themselves, rather than as a power to be used for the positive purposes of the General Government." Under Madison's impasse theory, Congress would be unable to act because of political impediments, and the state would be powerless to act because of limited authority.

Madison's theory did not address the question of who was to bring the states back in line when they transcended their authority. Logic pointed to the courts. If Congress were paralyzed in the face of potent and conflicting local interests, only the courts could protect the national interest in free trade. Few expressed this sentiment better than OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR. Too often, observed Holmes, state action is taken "that embodies what the Commerce Clause is meant to end." The Union "would be imperiled," he warned, if the Court lacked power to void such laws. The Court's active role in scrutinizing state commercial regulation suggests that most of Holmes's successors have shared his concern.

The Court's dormant commerce clause jurisprudence has two distinctive branches. Under the "discrimination" branch, the Court invalidates state legislation discriminating against INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Under the "undue burdens" branch, the Court will strike down even neutral state regulations if the burden imposed on the interstate commerce is clearly excessive in relation to the local benefits.

The discrimination branch has been relatively noncontroversial. Even those who question the propriety of judicial balancing of trade burdens and local benefits generally concede the need for discrimination review. The dormant commerce clause, however, seems an odd vehicle for attacking interstate discrimination. The antidiscrimination provision of Article IV's PRIVILEGE AND IMMUNITIES clause seems far more appropriate.

In its original form, as contained in the Articles of Confederation, the privileges and immunities clause specifically addressed the problem of commercial isolationism, providing that the inhabitants of each state "shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states; and . . . shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other States, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof." Little evidence exists on why the clause was pared down when carried over to the Constitution. CHARLES PINCKNEY, generally believed to have drafted the shorter version, assured the convention that no change in substance was intended. The term "privileges and immunities" probably was seen as sufficiently comprehensive to obviate the need for explicit references to ingress, regress, trade, and commerce.

If the positive command of the privileges and immunities clause were given the broad scope that was likely intended, resort to the commerce clause's negative inferences would be unnecessary for resolution of the discrimination cases. That the Court has not followed this route is attributable largely to PAUL V. VIRGINIA (1869). Paul held that CORPORATIONS were not "citizens" within the privileges and immunities clause. Notwithstanding subsequent construction of the DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION clauses to encompass corporations as "persons" and the recognition of corporate CITIZENSHIP for purposes of Article III's diversity provisions, the holding in Paul remains a bar to corporate invocation of the antidiscrimination shield of Article IV.

Although some Justices and commentators believe that the Court may be proceeding under the wrong constitutional provision, almost no one questions the validity of the judicial role in voiding state discrimination against interstate commerce. However, the Court's continued willingness to strike down evenhanded state regulation because of "undue" burdens on the nation's free trade is a matter of substantial controversy. The present scope of congressional power dwarfs whatever James Madison may have anticipated. Moreover, the judicial expansion of the national commercial power is punctuated by the frequency with which Congress exercises its authority. Madison's image of a Congress deadlocked by competing geographic economic interests is seldom visible. Naturally, differences of perspective within Congress sometimes prevent consensus. But Congress has mechanisms to circumvent such stalemates. When impasses occur, Congress can shift decision-making responsibility onto the shoulders of REGULATORY AGENCIES by broad and often standardless delegations of power.

The rationale for the Court's zealous oversight of state commercial regulation has thus been substantially undermined. This led Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, in a CONCURRING OPINION in CTS Corp. v. Dynamics Corp. (1985) and a dissent in Tyler Pipe Industries, Inc. v. Washington State Department of Revenue (1987), to observe that absent rank discrimination—which he suggested is better dealt with under the privileges and immunities clause—the role of invalidating state legislation that unduly burdens free trade properly belongs with Congress. This view parallels another FEDERALISM development.

In GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985), the Supreme Court abdicated any role in preserving the balance of power between the states and the federal government, deciding that the struggle over the scope of Congress's commercial power was best suited for the political arena. The states that petitioned for judicial assistance were told to fight their battle in Congress. This, said the Court, is how the Framers wished the scales of power to be balanced. Yet when a state regulates commerce in a congressional vacuum, the Court is there to ensure that the national economic interest will be adequately protected. The scales are not, after all, allowed to tip according to the political wind. The Court is keeping its thumb on the congressional side.

JULIAN N. EULE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Dormant Powers.)

Bibliography

EULE, JULIAN N. 1982 Laying the Dormant Commerce Clause to Rest. Yale Law Journal 99:425–485.

REGAN, DONALD H. 1986 The Supreme Court and State Protectionism: Making Sense of the Dormant Commerce Clause. Michigan Law Review 84:1091–1287.

DORMANT COMMERCE CLAUSE (Update)

The "dormant commerce clause" limits state power to obstruct economic nationalism. At the core of this principle is the idea that states may not overtly discriminate against INTERSTATE COMMERCE. For example, when New Jersey blocked importation of solid WASTE from other states, the Supreme Court found a constitutional violation in PHILADELPHIA V. NEW JERSEY (1978). In cases like West Lynn Creamery, Inc. v. Healy (1994), the Court has continued to insist that protective tariffs and similar trade barriers offend this antidiscrimination principle.

Courts sometimes invoke the dormant commerce clause to strike down state laws that are not discriminatory on their face. In a leading case, Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Commission (1977), the Supreme Court invalidated a North Carolina law that barred the display on apple crates of any grading symbol other than the federal Department of Agriculture grade. The Court reasoned that this law, although superficially neutral, unjustifiably burdened growers from the state of Washington, who had developed their own distinctive grading system. Courts often evaluate evenhanded regulatory laws under the BALANCING TEST set forth in Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc. (1970), which provides that such laws "will be upheld unless the burden imposed on [interstate] commerce is clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits."

State taxing measures have provided a common source of dormant commerce clause litigation. In Complete Auto Transit, Inc. v. Brady (1977), the Court summarized its many holdings in the tax field with a test that focuses on the presence of (1) nondiscrimination; (2) fair apportionment; (3) a reasonable nexus between the taxed activity and the taxing state; and (4) an appropriate relation between the burden imposed by the tax and the services afforded to the taxpayer by the state. In cases like Oklahoma Tax Commission v. Jefferson Lines, Inc. (1995), the Court has continued to apply this four-step methodology.

In some situations the dormant commerce clause does not operate even when state laws are facially discriminatory. A quarantine exception permits states to block the importation of articles, such as germ-infested rags, whose very movement creates risks of contagion. The dormant commerce clause also does not apply when a state acts as a market participant rather than a market regulator; for example, courts have upheld "buy local" laws under which a state insists on making its own purchases solely from in-state suppliers. Discriminatory state laws may escape invalidation if there is no less-restrictive alternative for achieving an important state interest; thus the Court, in Maine v. Taylor (1986), upheld a state's outright ban on the importation of baitfish where there was no other way to safeguard native fish populations from certain diseases. In Camps Newfound/Owatonna, Inc. v. Town of Harrison (1997), the Court suggested that the dormant commerce clause would not invalidate monetary subsidies limited to in-state businesses even if they had the same effect as unlawfully discriminatory tax benefits. Finally, even if a state law otherwise would violate the dormant commerce clause, Congress can validate the law by way of ordinary LEGISLATION enacted pursuant to its commerce power, without the need for a constitutional amendment.

Particularly because the dormant commerce clause lacks a clear textual foundation, it is sometimes decried as illegitimate. But such luminaries as JAMES MADISON endorsed the principle, and many analysts argue that it reflects the central aims of the Framers. In the end, proponents of the principle have won out, for the Court has recognized and applied some form of the dormant commerce clause for more than 140 years.

DAN T. COENEN
(2000)

Bibliography

BITTKER, BORIS I. 1999 Bittker on the Regulation of Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Gaithersburg, Maryland: Aspen Law & Business.

COENEN, DAN T. 1989 Untangling the Market Participant Exemption to the Dormant Commerce Clause. Michigan Law Review 89:395–488.

——— 1998 Business Subsidies and the Dormant Commerce Clause. Yale Law Journal 107:965–1053

COLLINS, RICHARD P. 1988 Economic Union as a Constitutional Value. New York University Law Review 63:43–129.

EULE, JULIAN N. 1982 Laying the Dormant Commerce Clause to Rest. Yale Law Journal 99:425–485.

HELLERSTEIN, JEROME R. and HELLERSTEIN, WALTER 1993 State Taxation, 2nd ed. Boston, Mass.: Warren Gorham Lamont.

REGAN, DONALD H. 1985 The Supreme Court and State Protectionism: Making Sense of the Dormant Commerce Clause. Michigan Law Review 84:1091–1287.

DORMANT POWERS

A constitutional power is called dormant if it is granted by the constitution but is not currently being exercised. For a variety of reasons Congress may not see fit to exercise power which it has been granted by the Constitution. These dormant powers may be "awakened" whenever Congress chooses to exercise them.

The federal system of the United States presumes that the states possess the governmental powers not taken away from them by the Constitution. In vesting powers in the federal government, the Constitution grants the national government EXCLUSIVE POWER over some matters of national scope, but CONCURRENT POWERS with the states over other matters. When a power granted to the federal government lies dormant, its effect depends on whether it is an exclusive or concurrent power. When the Supreme Court concludes that the subject matter requires uniform national regulation, then the states are not free to exercise the power even though Congress has not legislated in the area. By its silence Congress is presumed to have decreed that the subject shall remain free of regulation. If, on the other hand, the subject of the power admits of locally diverse regulation, as in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1851), states may legislate until Congress intervenes.

When Congress awakens a dormant power by legislating, its act will preempt inconsistent state laws by force of the SUPREMACY CLAUSE of Article VI. However, the courts do not always hold that Congress has preempted state law simply because it has granted power to a federal administrative agency to regulate an area. If the agency has not exercised the power given to it, then the states may yet be free to regulate the subject just as if the power were still dormant.

GLEN E. THUROW
(1986)

Bibliography

PRITCHETT, C. HERMAN 1977 The American Constitution, 3d ed. Pages 150–216. New York: McGraw-Hill.

DORR v. UNITED STATES

See: Insular Cases

DOUBLE JEOPARDY

Double jeopardy is the most ancient procedural guarantee provided by the American BILL OF RIGHTS. Rooted in Greek, Roman, and canon law, the right not to be put twice in jeopardy may be regarded as essential to a right to TRIAL BY JURY, and is well established in the law of other nations.

The Fifth Amendment of the Constitution includes the simple phrase: "nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." Yet this phrase, which has been copied in most American state constitutions, conceals a number of complex policy issues, many of which are still unsettled in American law in spite of numerous judicial interpretations since its birth in 1791.

In the course of time American courts abandoned any insistence that the jeopardy required involve a risk of life or limb, even though that had been an important consideration under the harsh criminal law of eighteenth-century England. Thus, the policy underlying the double jeopardy protection does not depend upon the hazard of severe physical punishment or death.

The English COMMON LAW recognizes the pleas of autrefois acquit (former acquittal) and autrefois convict (former conviction) to preclude retrial of an accused person, but American law has taken a more expansive view of the right. In America a prior accusation without a verdict could result in a successful plea of double jeopardy. The American version of the right is more generous to accused persons in many other respects, making double jeopardy an important potential source of protection.

In Green v. United States (1957) Justice HUGO L. BLACK provided a persuasive explanation of the American concept of double jeopardy. He suggested that the guarantee against double jeopardy is aimed primarily at three potential abuses of governmental power: "The underlying idea, one that is deeply ingrained in at least the Anglo-American system of jurisprudence, is that the state with all its resources and power should not be allowed to make repeated attempts to convict an individual for an alleged offense, thereby (1) subjecting him to embarrassment, expense and ordeal and (2) compelling him to live in a continuing state of anxiety and insecurity, as well as (3) enhancing the possibility that even though innocent he may be found guilty."

Double jeopardy policy embodies a conflict between a defendant's interest in "being able once and for all, to conclude his confrontation with society," as the Court said in United States v. Jorn (1970), and the public interest in a full and accurate prosecution. To preclude retrial of an accused person on some technical defect in the presentation of the prosecution's case is not in the public interest. Conversely, individuals must be protected against repeated risks of criminal punishment so that they may conclude their confrontation with society in a just manner and resume their normal lives as free citizens.

Surprisingly, it was not until 1969 that the Supreme Court extended the Fifth Amendment's double jeopardy prohibition to state criminal prosecutions. In BENTON V. MARYLAND (1969) the Court finally held "that the double jeopardy prohibition of the Fifth Amendment represents a fundamental ideal in our constitutional heritage." Since then the Court has been deeply involved in reviewing double jeopardy questions, refining and reconsidering many of its earlier interpretations of the clause. Now the Supreme Court is the chief source of policymaking in double jeopardy matters, although some state legislatures have begun to reexamine the DOCTRINE in the process of revising state criminal codes to eliminate overlapping criminal offenses.

Double jeopardy law involves at least four distinct policy questions. The first concerns the time when jeopardy begins or "attaches." Clearly, pretrial proceedings are not covered by double jeopardy, but at some point after a trial opens jeopardy is said to "attach." The second double jeopardy question is the legal significance to be accorded political boundaries such as statefederal, statemunicipal, nationalinternational. Third is the problem arising from the numerous definitions of crime which sometimes carve up criminal deeds into small parcels of criminalized behavior. These multiple offense categories could give rise to multiple prosecutions unless bounded by the double jeopardy protection. Finally, there is the issue raised by a criminal appeal (by the defendant or the state) with its potential of a new trial reviving the same risks to the liberty of the defendant.

All these issues are embraced within the American doctrine of double jeopardy and none has been definitively resolved. American double jeopardy law has become one of the most complex areas of JUDICIAL POLICYMAKING. English law on the subject lacks the complexity of American law because it is confined largely to the issue of the effect of a prior final judgment. American law is distinctive in its subtle interplay among the interests of the accused person, the prosecution, and the society at large. However, American double jeopardy law is confused by the judicial failure to separate the strands of double jeopardy and to pursue the essential purposes served by double jeopardy. Indeed, close reading of Supreme Court decisions reveals some conflict among the Justices concerning the goals of double jeopardy policy.

In Crist v. Betz (1978) the issue of attachment of double jeopardy was called "the lynchpin for all double jeopardy jurisprudence," but it still is not clearly settled. The federal rule is that jeopardy attaches at the time when the jury is sworn, and this federal rule now extends to state proceedings as well. The rule takes effect when the first witness is sworn in a case tried before a judge. After this point, in the absence of exceptional circumstances, the defendant's jeopardy begins, and it cannot be begun again merely because the prosecution wishes to retry a stronger case at a later time.

However, it is possible for the prosecution to retry a case that has been aborted short of FINAL JUDGMENT if it can bear the heavy burden of showing "manifest necessity" for repetitious proceedings. Courts have wrestled vainly in an effort to define the nature of the "manifest necessity" that justifies reprosecution. Recently the Supreme Court has developed a balancing test to weigh the interests of the prosecution and the defendant. Now, if a mistrial is based upon an error by the state that could be manipulated to strengthen the prosecution's case, a defendant is entitled to immunity from reprosecution if he chooses to oppose the mistrial, but not if he requests it. But the Supreme Court has wavered in its mistrial decisions, even overruling itself at times.

Attachment doctrines apply to JUVENILE PROCEEDINGS as well as to adult criminal trials, so that jeopardy attaches to an adjudicatory finding in juvenile court, preventing a subsequent trial in the criminal court for the same conduct. However, a closed master's hearing for a juvenile has been treated as a pretrial event, not an attachment of jeopardy.

The clearest interpretation of double jeopardy policy appears in the area of separate prosecutions for the same offense by federal and state governments. According to BARTKUS V. ILLINOIS (1959), double jeopardy is inapplicable when a defendant is charged with having violated the laws of two or more different "sovereigns." Yet, after a barrage of criticism of the Supreme Court ruling, the attorney general adopted a policy of avoiding federal reprosecution of a matter already tried by a state where the state prosecution rested upon the same act or acts. This discretionary policy remains an administrative restraint upon federal prosecution. In 1970 the Supreme Court held in Waller v. Florida that a state and its municipalities were not "separate sovereigns" in this sense; successive prosecutions thus were barred by the double jeopardy clause.

The most complex and least settled area of double jeopardy involves the meaning of "same offense" in the Fifth Amendment clause. The basic federal rule does not prohibit imposition of two or more punishments for the same activity. Instead, the Supreme Court has largely left it to the Congress and the state legislatures to carve up a single act or series of acts into an appropriate set of criminal offenses. The possibility of fragmentation of a single act into a number of criminal offenses with separate trials for each generally is not an occasion for judges to invoke the double jeopardy protection, although the Supreme Court has made some limited attempts to do so.

The double jeopardy clause is not a barrier to an APPEAL by the prosecution in a criminal case. The government may appeal decisions in a criminal case only if authorized by statute. Since the ORGANIZED CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1970, which grants the right to appeal a sentence imposed upon a "dangerous special offender," reviews of sentences are available to the federal government. The Supreme Court has held in United States v. DiFrancesco (1980) that the increase of a sentence on review under this statute does not constitute multiple punishment in violation of the double jeopardy clause. Whenever a defendant appeals from his own conviction he is usually said to have "waived" his right to plead double jeopardy.

Taken together, double jeopardy doctrines appear still to be somewhat unsettled in the United States. The general contours of double jeopardy have been described since 1969 in increasing detail. Yet inconsistencies and uncertainties continue. This most ancient of American rights is subject to judicial balancing. Increasingly, the balance has been more favorable to the prosecution, contracting the generous scope of double jeopardy evident in earlier years. Since the Supreme Court has been deeply divided on double jeopardy issues we may expect continued developments of policy with changes in judicial personnel. States may have more stringent views of double jeopardy policy under their own double jeopardy provisions. Therefore some states may set higher standards than the Supreme Court for the protection of defendants.

JAY A. SIGLER
(1986)

Bibliography

FRIEDLAND, MARTIN 1969 Double Jeopardy. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

SIGLER, JAY A. 1969 Double Jeopardy: The Development of a Legal and Social Policy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

WESTIN, PETER and DRUBEL, RICHARD 1979 Toward a General Theory of Double Jeopardy. Supreme Court Review 1978:81–169.

DOUBLE JEOPARDY
(Update 1)

Over the past few years, the Supreme Court has decided a substantial number of cases involving double jeopardy issues. For the most part, these decisions continued a trend noted in the Encyclopedia of giving additional flexibility to the doctrine, although several notable exceptions expanded the protection provided by the clause. The most significant developments concerned two topics: multiple crimes arising from the same conduct and sentencing. The most disturbing development occurred under the dual-sovereignty doctrine.

In the area of multiple offenses, the Supreme Court continues to adhere to the position that the legilslative branch has virtually unlimited power to define as seperate crimes and to punish cumulatively individual steps within a criminal trasaction and the completed transaction as well. The well-worn test set out in Blockburger v. United States (1932) determined whether the offenses are seperate by asking if each "requires proof of a fact which the other does not," This has been constructed as a rule of statutory construction, which is not controlling within a single prosecution if the LEGISLATIVE INTENT is clear and that multiple punishments are intended.

However, where individual crimes arising from the same events are adjudicated separately, a sharply divided Court expanded the protection of the double jeopardy clause beyond the confines of the Blockberger test. In Grady v. Corbin (1990), the Court concluded that a prosecution for vehicular manslaughter was barred where the defendant had been convicted previously of driving while intoxicated based on the same automobile accident. The Court reasoned that successive prosecutions present dangers that require protection under the double jeopardy doctrine even in circumstances where the two crimes do not constitute the "same offense" under the Blockberger test. It formulated a new and certainly more complicated test: The guarantee against double jeopardy is violated by subsequent criminal prosecution when the government establishes an essential element of that crime by proving conduct that constituted an offense for which the defendant has been previously prosecuted.

The decision in Grady v. Corbin unsettled the law with regard to the important concept of what constitutes the "same offense." Its immediate practical effect will be to encourage, if not require, the government to prosecute in a single case all charges arising from the same transaction because some of those that share a common element will be barred by the double jeopardy clause if they are prosecuted later. How this decision will be reconciled with the body of related doctrine—and even whether it will stand the test of time given the Court's history of dramatically changing course on double jeopardy issues—remains to be seen. Indeed, the conflicting nature of the Court's double jeopardy jurisprudence was apparent from cases decided during the same term. In Dowling v. United States (1990), the Supreme Court determined that EVIDENCE of criminal conduct was not barred by the collateral estoppel concept of double jeopardy, even though the defendant had been found not guilty in an earlier trial of that criminal conduct. Dowling and Grady v. Corbin can be reconciled because the crimes in Dowling were not part of the same transaction, but the two cases demonstrate that there is no broad consensus within the Court on basic principles, particularly the application of this "same transaction" concept.

In the area of SENTENCING, the Court decided a number of significant cases. Although the clause does not apply to civil penalties, the Court concluded that in a very rare case a penalty traditionally considered remedial can be so overwhelmingly disproportionate to the damage caused that it must be considered punishment with a purpose of deterrence or retribution. In this circumstance, presented by a series of penalties in United States v. Halper (1989), the double jeopardy clause bars imposition of civil penalties subsequent to criminal conviction and punishment.

The Court has determined that the double jeopardy clause does not in general prohibit the government, pursuant to statutory authorization, from appealing a sentence or prohibit a court from increasing that sentence after review. In contrast, the double jeopardy clause does impose some limits on resentencing in CAPITAL PUNISHMENT litigation. In Bullington v. Missouri (1981), the Court concluded that the clause prohibits imposing a death sentence on resentencing where a jury initially imposed a life sentence. The trial-type proceedings involved in such a determination render a decision not to impose a death penalty the equivalent of an acquittal at trial. The double jeopardy clause does not, however, bar the trial judge, under statutory authorization, from overriding a jury recommendation of life imprisonment and imposing a death sentence.

The Court concluded that the double jeopardy doctrine permits either resentencing or judicial modification of a sentence in two other areas. First, it held in Morris v. Mathews (1986) that where the defendant is convicted of both a jeopardy-barred greater offense and a lesser offense that is not so barred the error may be corrected without resentencing by simply substituting the lesser-included conviction, unless the defendant can demonstrate a reasonable probability that he or she would not have been convicted of the lesser offense absent the joint trial with the jeopardy-barred offense. Second, the decision in Jones v. Thomas (1989) held that as long as the resentencing remains within legislatively intended limits an appellate court could modify an initially invalid consecutive sentence by vacating the shorter sentence and crediting the defendant for the time served even after the defendant had fully satisfied the shorter sentence. In reaching this conclusion, the Court dismissed longstanding PRECEDENT apparently prohibiting resentencing after the defendant had satisfied one of two alternative sentences.

In a disturbing, although not doctrinally surprising, opinion, the Court extended to prosecutions by separate states its very broad HOLDING that double jeopardy is inapplicable where the same conduct is prosecuted by state and federal governments. Reasoning that this dual-sovereignty doctrine rests on the critical determination that two entities draw authority to punish from separate sources of power, the Court concluded in HEATH V. ALABAMA (1985) that the doctrine operates between states as it does between state and federal governments.

On first examination, applying the doctrine to two states appears to present no major issues. However, an examination of the facts of the case and the underlying policies presents a different picture. Heath involved a kidnapping that began in Alabama and ended in a murder across the nearby state line in Georgia. Pursuant to a plea bargain in Georgia, the defendant avoided the death penalty in exchange for a life sentence. He was then prosecuted in Alabama for the same murder and sentenced to death. The Supreme Court's decision resulted in affirming that death sentence.

At a practical level, the operation of the dual-sovereignty doctrine permitted two states to enjoy all the advantages of multiple prosecutions that the double jeopardy clause was intended to prevent. Admittedly, however, these advantages can accrue to the prosecution whenever the dual-sovereignty doctrine is applied. The major difference in this case is that the two sovereigns were protecting the same policy interest—punishing the taking of human life. When the state and federal government are involved, there has historically been not only a separate source of political power, but also a separate interest protected.

Heath demonstrates that the Supreme Court is steadfast in its commitment to a monolithic and absolute dual-sovereignty doctrine in the context of double jeopardy. Given the expansion of federal JURISDICTION to almost every area of state criminal law, this position is understandable, if not defensible. Currently, the different policy interest protected by the federal prosecution is often imaginary, and the decision in Heath makes recognition of this fact unnecessary.

ROBERT P. MOSTELLER
(1992)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. and ISRAEL, JEROLD H. 1985 Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

THOMAS, GEORGE C. 1988 An Elegant Theory of Double Jeopardy. University of Illinois Law Review 1988:827–885.

DOUBLE JEOPARDY
(Update 2)

In the 1990s, the Supreme Court decided a number of cases dramatically revising the prevailing interpretation of the Fifth Amendment's double jeopardy clause. These decisions have generally continued the Court's trend of leaving more leeway for state and federal legislatures, as well as prosecutors, to decide how many prosecutions and civil proceedings they will bring to punish a defendant for an act or course of conduct.

On the subject of what constitutes the "same offense" for double jeopardy purposes, a sharply divided Court, only three terms after deciding Grady v. Corbin (1990) on a 5–4 vote, overruled that decision by a similarly split vote in United States v. Dixon (1993) and returned to the older Blockburger definition of "same offense." Instead of defining "offenses" by determining whether two prosecutions are based on the same conduct (as in Grady), courts will now ask only whether each of the two statutes defining the offenses charged contains an element the other does not. Under this test, the Court allowed a defendant to be prosecuted for an assault even though he had already been punished, in a CONTEMPT proceeding, for violating a protective order by committing the same assault, as long as the statutes defining the two offenses each required proof of a different additional fact.

Defining when the double jeopardy clause prohibits successive proceedings for the same offense also caused the Court considerable trouble and second thoughts. A person who is convicted of an offense may be subjected to more than one kind of punishment for that offense—both a fine and a prison sentence, for example. But the double jeopardy clause prohibits the government from taking two bites of the apple by bringing multiple proceedings seeking different "punishments" for the same offense, even if one of those proceedings is labeled "civil." United States v. Halper (1989) ruled that the government could not criminally prosecute a person who had already been punished in a "civil" proceeding by a fine so disproportionate to the harm done that it could not be considered "solely remedial." Applying a similar test, a bitterly divided Court in Montana Department of Revenue v. Kurth Ranch (1994) found that a Montana tax for possession and storage of dangerous drugs was "punishment," and that the state was therefore not allowed to impose that fine in a civil proceeding and also bring a separate criminal prosecution (although both penalties could have been leveled in the same proceeding). But applying this same subjective test and distinguishing Halper rather tortuously, the Court two years later concluded that CIVIL FORFEITURE is not "punishment" for double jeopardy purposes, partly because of its historical pedigree. Because of this conclusion, the defendant in United States v. Ursery (1996) was allowed to be criminally prosecuted for a marijuana offense even though, in an earlier proceeding, the government had forfeited his home and PROPERTY due to the presence of the same marijuana; and another defendant, in United States v. $405,089.23 (1996), faced a forfeiture proceeding after a separate criminal prosecution even though the government could have sought forfeiture as a penalty originally. Finally, in Hudson v. United States (1998), the Court, split 5–4, disavowed Halper's mode of analysis. Even though a "civil" fine is intended in part as a deterrent, it may still be considered a remedial measure that therefore does not constitute "punishment" within the meaning of the double jeopardy clause, especially if it can be shown that the legislature intended the measure to be a civil penalty. Like the newly restricted definition of "same offense," which frees legislatures from judicial supervision of their decisions about how many offenses may be based on the same conduct, this new, narrowed test allows the government freedom to decide how many proceedings to bring, even when based on the "same offense."

The same split on the Court over the issue of how much leeway legislatures should be allowed reappeared in the area of SENTENCING. The Court had previously held that double jeopardy protections do not generally attach at sentencing. Applying this maxim expansively, the Court in Witte v. United States (1995) ruled that a defendant may be prosecuted for an offense on the basis of conduct that has already been used as "relevant conduct" at a sentencing proceeding in an earlier prosecution, leading to a substantial increase in that sentence. Taking the theory that sentencing is not governed by the same rules as trial one step further, the Court in United States v. Watts (1996) held that a defendant's sentence may even be enhanced by an allegation on which the jury at his trial had actually acquitted him (because the standard of proof at sentencing is lower).

In the past, the Court had applied double jeopardy principles to capital sentencing in Bullington v. Missouri (1981), holding that the prosecution may not seek the death penalty in a retrial of a defendant who had been given a life sentence on the same charge and then successfully appealed the conviction. But in Schiro v. Farley (1994), the Court allowed a state to proceed to the penalty phase of a capital proceeding even though the jury had implicitly acquitted the defendant of facts the state would be required to prove at the penalty phase in order to sustain a capital sentence. The Court also distinguished Bullington in the noncapital case of Monge v. California (1998), a case brought under a state "three strikes" law where the state had not proven all the facts required by the statute to show that the defendant should have his sentence doubled because he had an eligible earlier conviction. After the enhanced sentence was reversed on appeal for insufficient evidence about the previous conviction, the state was allowed to try again, and to submit proof of the required factors. The Court, split 5–4 once again, held that this relitigation was permissible because it only concerned a sentencing factor in a noncapital case.

One of the few areas of double jeopardy law that has caused no dissension on the Court has been one of the most controversial in other arenas. Although the Court has never overruled or even questioned the dual sovereignty DOCTRINE, the successive state and federal prosecutions of the Los Angeles police officers who were videotaped beating Rodney King provoked a new flurry of academic and public debate about whether the Court's interpretation of the double jeopardy clause is more formalistic than fair. Scholarly opposition to the doctrine, from academics writing from a wide range of perspectives (from civil libertarians to adherents of ORIGINALISM), continued to be overwhelming. The officers' conviction in federal court, following their acquittal in state court, convinced many observers of the truth of one of the double jeopardy clause's central tenets—prosecutorial practice makes perfect.

SUSAN N. HERMAN
(2000)

Bibliography

AMAR, AKHIL REED and MARCUS, JONATHAN 1995 Double Jeopardy Law After Rodney King. Columbia Law Review 95:1–59.

HERMAN, SUSAN N. 1995 Reconstructing the Bill of Rights: A Reply to Amar and Marcus's Triple Play on Double Jeopardy. Columbia Law Review 95:1090–1111.

SYMPOSIUM 1994 The Rodney King Trials: Civil Rights Prosecutions and Double Jeopardy. UCLA Law Review 41:509–720.

THOMAS, GEORGE C., III 1998 Double Jeopardy: The History, the Law. New York: New York University Press.

DOUGLAS, STEPHEN A.
(1813–1861)

An Illinois lawyer and judge, Stephen Arnold Douglas served in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES (1843–1847) and the SENATE (1847–1861), where he chaired the powerful committee on the TERRITORIES from 1847 until 1859. Throughout his career Douglas was a strong Democratic partisan who advocated western expansion, railroad development, and compromise on slavery. A major political figure throughout the 1850s, Douglas closed his career with his losing presidential campaign in 1860. When the CIVIL WAR began Douglas rallied to the cause of the Union despite his hostility toward Lincoln and his familial and residual political ties to the South.

Throughout his career Douglas attempted to finesse the issue of SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES while supporting territorial acquisition and western settlement. Douglas hoped such a policy would lead to a presidential nomination from a united Democratic party. Practical politics dovetailed with Douglas's personal beliefs that blacks were inferior to whites, that slavery was a legitimate institution deserving of constitutional and political protection, and that ABOLITIONISTS were troublemakers or worse.

The key to Douglas's program was POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY, which would allow settlers to decide the slavery issue for themselves, and thus not require Congress, and the national Democratic party, to take a position on slavery in any particular territory. Ultimately, Douglas's position proved costly. Proslavery Democrats eventually demanded federal protection for slavery in the territories and opposed any Democrat who would not support them. On the other hand, Northerners, in Illinois and elsewhere, came to oppose the spread of slavery into the western territories. By 1858 Douglas discovered he could not satisfy the voters at home and remain a viable presidential candidate in the South.

As early as 1844–1845 Douglas had advocated that settlers in the West be allowed to decide for themselves the status of slavery. In Congress he urged the organization of the Oregon Territory without slavery because settlers there did not want slavery. In the House and Senate Douglas enthusiastically supported all American claims in Oregon and the Mexican War, and he opposed the WILMOT PROVISO. As chairman of the Committee on the Territories, Douglas secured the organization of the Oregon and Minnesota territories without slavery. In August 1850, Douglas resurrected the compromise measures of HENRY CLAY'S "Omnibus Bill" and adroitly guided them through the Senate, one bill at a time, as the COMPROMISE OF 1850. The Compromise included the infamous Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, the admission of California without slavery, and organization of the rest of the Mexican Cession with slavery. The compromise satisfied few, but it halted a SECESSION movement then building in the South and probably delayed the Civil War by ten years.

In 1854 Douglas supported the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT in the expectation that it would stimulate western expansion and set the stage for a transcontinental railroad, which he hoped would begin in Chicago. The act repealed the MISSOURI COMPROMISE, refused "to legislate slavery into any Territory of State, nor to exclude it therefrom," and left the settlers "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." Northern resentment of this sellout to slavery resulted in Democratic electoral defeats and formation of the Republican party, while popular sovereignty in the territories quickly degenerated into "bleeding Kansas." Douglas lost political support throughout the North, but he explained to hostile constituents that popular sovereignty would lead to a free Kansas. In 1858, however, Kansas petitioned for statehood under the proslavery LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION. Douglas opposed the Lecompton Constitution because it was ratified by fraud, did not represent the majority in Kansas, and thus was not a fair expression of popular sovereignty. For this opposition Douglas was virtually read out of his party. Later that year, in debate with ABRAHAM LINCOLN during the Senate race, Douglas defended the Supreme Court's decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) and the Kansas-Nebraska Act by asserting in the FREEPORT DOCTRINE that territorial governments could prevent slavery by denying it police protection or supportive legislation. Despite opposition from the Buchanan wing of his own party, as well as Lincoln, Douglas was reelected to the Senate. In 1859 his party, dominated by Southerners, stripped him of his Territorial Committee chairmanship because of his apostasy on the Lecompton Constitution and his Freeport Doctrine. Openly a presidential candidate since 1852, Douglas led a divided party in 1860. He ran second in popular votes and a distant fourth in electoral votes. Douglas opposed SECESSION and before his death in 1861 urged Lincoln to call out enough troops to defend the Union.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

JAFFA, HARRY V. 1959 Crisis of the House Divided: An Interpretation of the Lincoln-Douglas Debates. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday.

JOHANNSEN, ROBERT W. 1973 Stephen A. Douglas. New York: Oxford University Press.

DOUGLAS, WILLIAM O.
(1898–1980)

William Orville Douglas was appointed to the Supreme Court by President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT on April 15, 1939, the youngest appointee since JOSEPH STORY, 128 years earlier. Illness forced his retirement on November 12, 1975, but he had surpassed by nearly two years the record for longevity of service previously held by STEPHEN J. FIELD.

As a child, Douglas contracted polio and overcame the residual weakness in his legs through long solitary hikes. When his father died before Douglas's sixth birthday, his mother was left nearly penniless with three children. Douglas knew grinding poverty and from his childhood, through all of his education, he worked to support himself and his family. Three views that colored his outlook on life emerged from this period and strongly influenced his legal views. Above all an individualist, he believed that, if given enough room by society, one could achieve full potential through self-reliance and hard work. At the same time, he formed a deep sympathetic bond with the outcasts and disadvantaged of society, particularly the poor, racial minorities, and political radicals. Finally, he harbored a lingering resentment of "the establishment," a view that later matured into a distrust of concentrations of power, whether of the private sector, the police, or government generally. A number of Douglas's legal positions trace their origin to these three linked premises, from his populist view of the antitrust laws to his repeated insistence that the function of the BILL OF RIGHTS was to take government off the backs of the people.

Douglas's career prior to his appointment to the Court also explains the hallmarks of his judicial style. (Over the years, even admirers of the Justice's substantive conclusions criticized his opinions for insufficiently explaining the origins of novel legal DOCTRINES, for carelessness in setting out the limits and definitions of the principles announced, and for unnecessary inconsistency in arguments made from one case to another.) Douglas was always a superior student, with an intellect in the genius range, yet from high school through law school, as he explained in his autobiography, "I had been trotting while I learned." His work obligations and his other activities left little time for reflection. Douglas was a quick study.

Douglas described both his initial appointment as a law teacher and his appointment to the Supreme Court as furnishing new leisure for intellectual contemplation. Intellectual habits, however, are not so easily set aside. Douglas was never contemplative. His habit was to analyze swiftly mountains of data, get to the heart of a controversy, and decide. He was impatient with extended discussion as an aid to decision, with long indecision prior to decision, and with excessive concern for peripheral issues. He remained a loner who spent little time trying to proselytize other members of the Court to his own views. In the Court's conferences and in his separate opinions, he was content to state his positions without adapting them to gain greater acceptance from either his brethren or the scholarly community.

Douglas's impatience with traditional legal style in opinions is also easily explained. As a law professor at Columbia and Yale, Douglas was at the center of the realist movement in jurisprudence. (See LEGAL REALISM.) The realists shared the view that traditional judicial opinions obscured rather than explained the reasons for decision. Douglas's own approach to his fields of business organization, securities regulation, and bankruptcy was to study the political, economic, and social institutions with which the law dealt and to shape the law to cope with contemporary problems presented by those institutions. And so it was with his approach to constitutional law. Douglas viewed much of the elaborate argument in standard Court opinions as so much "Harvard fly paper." Indeed, he delighted in sharp criticism of his opinion-writing style, which he viewed as the carping of the conservative legal establishment. He remained a pragmatist who did not try to develop a general theory of constitutional adjudication. Often he was content to let Justices with whom he agreed develop the overarching theories. He was indifferent to scholarly debates about the abstract limits of JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, and he did not have a consistent theory explaining his own pattern of judicial restraint and active judicial intervention.

The substance of Douglas's constitutional jurisprudence can best be explained by contrast with the views of the two other major figures among Roosevelt's appointees to the Court—FELIX FRANKFURTER and HUGO L. BLACK. Between 1937 and 1939, when these three joined the Court, the chief constitutional controversies were still perceived as those of the previous decade—the Court's "economic due process" theory had restrained state ECONOMIC REGULATION, and its "dual federalism" theory had limited federal power to regulate the national economy. The mainstream of constitutional law thought was still preoccupied by the mistakes of the "old Court" in writing its own notions of laissez-faire economics into constitutional limits on state and federal power. All of Roosevelt's appointees shared the opinion that these decisions of the old Court had been erroneous. The major battles surrounding economic due process, and the legitimate scope of federal economic regulatory authority, however, were over before Roosevelt appointed a single Justice to the Court. (See WAGNER ACT CASES; WEST COAST HOTEL V. PARRISH.)

The early 1940s brought new problems, with personal liberty claims asserted under the FIRST AMENDMENT, and attacks on criminal convictions for procedural irregularities of constitutional dimension. For Frankfurter, the lessons of the Court's previous excesses in second-guessing state and federal economic regulation applied here. It was inappropriate for judges to block decisions of political majorities simply because judges held deep personal views that those decisions were wrong. Issues of personal liberty involved a balance between legitimate interests of government and claims of constitutionally protected liberty. Judges must defer to reasonable governmental accommodations of these competing interests. Moreover, in the case of challenged state laws, interests of FEDERALISM imposed additional constraints.

For a brief initial period, Black and Douglas accepted the Frankfurter position. In Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940), the first of the FLAG SALUTE CASES, Justice Frankfurter wrote for the Court, sustaining a law compelling salute to the flag against a challenge by children of Jehovah's Witnesses, whose religious beliefs forbade their participation. (Only Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE dissented.)

The break with Frankfurter came soon. Black and Douglas shared similar concerns about the rights of minorities and about fair procedures in state and federal criminal trials. In 1942, dissenting in Jones v. Opelika, a case sustaining a state license tax applied to the sale of religious literature, they announced that they had recanted their position in Gobitis. Jones was overruled a year later in MURDOCK V. PENNSYLVANIA (1943), with Douglas writing for the Court. The same year, West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette overruled Gobitis, with Black and Douglas joining Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON's opinion.

Even though Black and Douglas often wrote jointly in constitutional cases involving claims of constitutionally protected liberty, it was Black who was the theoretician. Black gradually evolved the views that protection of liberty required the Court to give liberal—and even literal—construction to the Bill of Rights, and that the Bill of Rights restricted not only the national government but also state governments, because, historically, it had been "incorporated" into section one of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.) Douglas and Black often clashed with Frankfurter on both issues throughout the 1940s and 1950s.

In Adamson v. California (1947) the Court decided, 5–4, that the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION of the Fifth Amendment was inapplicable to the states. Justice Frankfurter, concurring, defended the Court's position that the historic and practical meaning of due process was not contained in the specific provisions of the Bill of Rights, but he also insisted that working out the limits of DUE PROCESS OF LAW required more than personal judgments according to a judge's idiosyncratic sense of justice. Black, joined by Douglas, wrote a lengthy dissent arguing that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated the "specific" standards of the Bill of Rights.

As time passed, Black, again joined by Douglas, further insisted that the guarantees of the Bill of Rights were specific indeed. Characteristic was their position concerning the First Amendment—that it literally forbade all government restrictions upon the content of "speech," leaving to the government power only to regulate "conduct" (for example, YATES V. UNITED STATES, 1957, separate opinion). Justice Frankfurter predictably insisted that free speech claims involved a balance between competing interests and required deference to legislative choices (BEAUHARNAIS V. ILLINOIS, 1952). During the 1950s, the Frankfurter position usually prevailed. Black and Douglas were often in lonely dissent as the Court sustained a series of state and federal antisubversion measures. With the appointment of Chief Justice EARL WARREN and Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN in the mid-1950s, the dissenting group grew to four.

After Frankfurter's retirement in 1962, the substance, if not the rhetoric, of many of the Black and Douglas dissenting opinions prevailed. Although the Court rejected total "incorporation" of the Bill of Rights, a process of "selective incorporation" of "fundamental" provisions applied nearly all of its provisions to state governments (for example, GRIFFIN V. CALIFORNIA, 1965, overruling Adamson v. California). The provisions of the Bill of Rights governing procedure in criminal trials were expansively construed in cases such as MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966). And while no other Justice accepted the Black-Douglas theory that the First Amendment literally protected all speech, the Court's cases of the 1960s rejected the Frankfurter position that the First Amendment tolerated all reasonable governmental restriction on speech. (See NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN; BRANDENBURG V. OHIO.)

The 1960s, however, brought new constitutional problems and a noticeable split between Justices Black and Douglas. There was a negative side to Black's theory pinning activist protection of liberty to the literal meaning of the Bill of Rights. For Black, the Bill of Rights defined not only the minimum guarantees of constitutionally protected liberty but also the maximum. As with Frankfurter's approach, the restrictive branch of Black's theory could be traced to the judicial excesses of the past. The "old Court" had used a natural law approach to write into the Constitution laissez-faire economic policies not fairly reflected in the document's history or text. For Black it was equally wrong for judges to import subjective notions of personal liberty into the Constitution. If judges balanced competing interests in interpreting the Constitution, there was danger beyond the certainty that judges would "balance away" constitutional restrictions with which they were unsympathetic. Judges might also use an open-ended balancing process to create rights according to their subjective predilections.

In Adamson v. California, two other dissenting Justices—FRANK MURPHY AND WILEY B. RUTLEDGE—had agreed with Black and Douglas that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated the Bill of Rights as restrictions on state government. They had disagreed, however, with the contention that the Bill of Rights was the outer limit of constitutionally protected liberty. In their view, the Fourteenth Amendment's conception of due process required "fundamental standards of procedure . . . despite the absence of a specific provision of the Bill of Rights." Black and Douglas, on the other hand, had condemned the "natural law-due process formula" which allowed courts "to roam at large in the broad expanse of policy and morals and to trespass, all too freely, on the legislative domain. . . ."

In the late 1940s and the 1950s Douglas continued to support Black's literalist position. Occasional votes can be identified during this period, however, to suggest that his agreement with Black was only skin deep. In Francis v. Resweber (1947), decided only months before Adamson, the Court permitted a state to electrocute a man after a first attempt at his execution had failed. The vote was again 5–4. This time Black concurred in the result, without opinion. Douglas, along with Murphy and Rutledge, joined Justice HAROLD BURTON's dissent. The same year, another 5–4 vote, in Kotch v. Board of River Pilot Commissioners (1947), sustained a Louisiana law that limited the occupation of river pilots to friends and relatives of incumbents. Black wrote for the Court, but Douglas and Murphy joined Rutledge's dissent.

In the late 1960s, more cases arose testing the negative side of Black's constitutional literalism and the break with Black had become apparent. (Interestingly, Douglas never openly conceded that he had recanted his agreement with Black in the Adamson case. Only in the posthumously published second volume of his autobiography does he admit that the Murphy and Rutledge position was one with which he "in the years to come, was inclined to agree.") The pattern of voting disagreements with Black in the 1960s was no longer episodic but dramatic. Their differences can be seen on a wide range of issues, all centering on Black's consistent rejection of what he called the "natural law" approach to constitutional adjudication and Douglas's growing willingness to go beyond the literal text of the document.

Douglas wrote the Court's opinion in HARPER V. VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), striking down poll taxes in state elections under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause. Black dissented. Douglas also wrote for the Court in LEVY V. LOUISIANA (1968), striking down a state law discriminating against children born out of wedlock. Again, he relied on an expansive interpretation of the equal protection clause. Justice Black was in dissent and, three years later (Labine v. Vincent, 1971), wrote an opinion for the Court that seemed at the time to overrule Levy. Here, Black emphasized the absence of any "specific constitutional guarantee." Douglas, of course, was in dissent. Douglas endorsed open-ended theories extending the Fourteenth Amendment's restrictions on STATE ACTION to actions by private business. Black disagreed, insisting that in the absence of federal legislation, the Fourteenth Amendment was inapplicable to private conduct. (See BELL V. MARYLAND.) With reference to limitations on the time, place, or manner of speech activities on public property, Douglas was prepared to balance the need for available avenues of dissent against competing state interests, if the balance favored freedom of expression. Black disagreed. In ADDERLEY V. FLORIDA (1966), a 5–4 decision sustaining a sheriff's order that protesters leave a jail driveway, Black wrote for the Court and Douglas for the dissent. Finally, Douglas was prepared to interpret the Constitution to require government to follow fair criminal, civil, and administrative procedures even where those requirements could not be tied to specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights. Black, of course, disagreed. (See IN RE WINSHIP; GOLDBERG V. KELLY.)

The most dramatic clash between the two former judicial allies occurred in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965). Douglas wrote for the Court, striking down a state law forbidding the use of contraceptive devices. In that case, Black's dissent was predictable, since no provision of the Bill of Rights dealt with the issue. Douglas made a valiant attempt in his opinion to maintain the façade of his agreement with Black eighteen years earlier in Adamson. The opinion explained that the right of marital privacy was within "penumbras, formed by emanations" of specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights. (See PENUMBRA THEORY.) The façade was thin, particularly as Douglas relied on the NINTH AMENDMENT for the proposition that constitutionally protected liberty was not limited to the specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights. Just how far removed from even the "penumbras" of the Bill of Rights was Douglas's own conception of the constitutional guarantee of privacy became apparent years later in his concurrence in the abortion cases (Doe v. Bolton and ROE V. WADE, 1973; see also RIGHT OF PRIVACY.) Here, he explained that the term "liberty" in the Fourteenth Amendment, as he read it, was broader than the Court's conception of a right to freedom of choice in the areas of marriage, divorce, procreation, contraception, and the education and upbringing of children. It included "the freedom to care for one's health and person, freedom from bodily restraint or compulsion, freedom to walk, stroll or loaf." These, too, were rights that he insisted could not be abridged by government absent a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST.

Douglas had come to believe that the excesses of the old Court in the economic due process cases had not been that the judges read personal values into the fabric of the Constitution. The problem was, rather, that the Court's laissez-faire economic values were the wrong values. For Douglas, the "right" values had been clear all along. They required protecting the individual's right to self-fulfillment, protecting the politically powerless from unsympathetic legislative majorities, insulating the individual from excess concentrations of governmental and private power, and insisting that government procedures be fundamentally fair.

These values best explain Douglas's decisions, up until the end. In his own written instructions for his funeral service, conducted in Washington, D.C., in January 1980, Douglas requested that Woody Guthrie's song "This Land is Your Land" be sung. He patiently explained that some had falsely assumed the song to be a hymn to socialism. Quite to the contrary, he said, the song was in praise of the freedom to wander from place to place which had received constitutional protection in his opinion for the Court in Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville (1972).

The Papachristou decision was a fitting epitaph. Douglas had written for a unanimous Court striking down a local VAGRANCY ordinance under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The technical basis for the decision was that the ordinance was unconstitutionally vague. Insofar as activities that were "normally innocent" were made crimes, an unfettered discretion was placed in the hands of the police. But, quoting Walt Whitman, Henry David Thoreau, and Vachel Lindsay, he went on to argue that wandering and strolling were more than merely "innocent" activities. They were "historically part of the amenities of life as we have known them. They are not mentioned in the Constitution or in the Bill of Rights. These unwritten amenities have been in part responsible for giving our people the feeling of independence and self-confidence, the feeling of creativity. These amenities have dignified the right of dissent and have honored the right to be nonconformists and the right to defy submissiveness. They have encouraged lives of high spirits rather than hushed, suffocating silence." The Papachristou opinion, in its results, its style, and the values it enshrined, was vintage Douglas.

WILLIAM COHEN
(1986)

Bibliography

COUNTRYMAN, VERN 1977 The Douglas Opinions. New York: Random House.

DOUGLAS, WILLIAM O. 1974 Go East, Young Man: The Early Years. New York: Random House.

——— 1980 The Court Years: 1939–1975. New York: Random House.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1969 Invidious Discrimination: Justice Douglas and the Return of the "Natural-Law-Due-Process Formula." UCLA Law Review 16:716–750.

POWE, L. A., JR. 1974 Evolution to Absolutism: Justice Douglas and the First Amendment. Columbia Law Review 74:371–411.

SIMON, JAMES F. 1980 Independent Journey: The Life of William O. Douglas. New York: Harper & Row.

DOUGLAS v. CALIFORNIA
372 U.S. 353 (1963)

Douglas, decided the same day as GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963), established an EQUAL PROTECTION right for INDIGENTS to be supplied counsel by the state, free of charge, to represent them in direct APPEALS from their criminal convictions. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, for a 6–3 majority, followed the lead of GRIFFIN V. ILLINOIS (1956): DUE PROCESS might not require the state to offer appellate review of convictions, but once appeals were granted as of right, they must be made effectively available for all. The state's procedure, which provided appellate counsel only when the appeals court found such an appointment appropriate, denied "that equality demanded by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT."

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, dissenting, elaborated on his Griffin dissent. The Fourteenth Amendment had enacted no "philosophy of leveling"; the state had no affirmative duty to relieve the poor from the handicaps of poverty. Due process was satisfied by the reasonableness of the state's procedure for appointing counsel.

Douglas appeared to be a major precedent pointing toward strict judicial scrutiny of WEALTH DISCRIMINATION. However, the BURGER COURT ended such speculations, even in the field of criminal justice. (See ROSS V. MOFFITT; STRICT SCRUTINY.)

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

DOWDELL v. UNITED STATES

See: Insular Cases

DOWLING, NOEL T.
(1885–1969)

Constitutional problems of FEDERALISM were the chief interest of Noel Thomas Dowling, Columbia University's principal teacher of constitutional law for three decades (1926–1956). Joining the Columbia faculty in 1922, Dowling, a gentle Alabamian, moved into constitutional law when the more corrosive THOMAS REED POWELL departed for Harvard. The main sources of Dowling's influence were his casebook, his articles, and his consulting activities.

Dowling's widely used book, Cases on Constitutional Law, was first published in 1937, at the height of the New Deal crisis. Its major theme reflected his lifelong concern: "the regulatory power of government, national and state." His teaching stressed the lawyer's role in constitutional litigation. His emphasis on statutes and LEGISLATIVE FACTS reflected his long participation in the work of Columbia's Legislative Drafting Research Fund.

Dowling advised on the drafting of a number of federal and state statutes. PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE CO. V. BENJAMIN (1946), upholding the MCCARRAN ACT of 1945 granting congressional permission for continued state regulation of insurance, was a special vindication for Dowling's emphasis on the broad scope of the congressional "consent" power. Similarly, Chief Justice HARLAN F. STONE's "balancing" opinion in SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO. V. ARIZONA (1945) vindicated Dowling's advocacy of a significant judicial role in curbing state intrusions on free trade in the absence of congressional action.

GERALD GUNTHER
(1986)

Bibliography

SYNPOSIUM 1958 A Tribute to Noel Thomas Dowling. Columbia Law Review 58:589–613.

DOWNES v. BIDWELL

See: Insular Cases

DRAFT CARD BURNING

The burning of Selective Service registration certificates—or "draft cards"—was a brief and dramatic episode that punctuated the early opposition to the VIETNAM WAR. Many draft registrants, often before television cameras, publicly burned their cards to demonstrate their refusal to participate in the draft. These events attracted wide attention and often served as a rallying point for war protesters.

Congress responded in 1965 by amending the Universal Military Training and Service Act to make it a FELONY when any person "knowingly destroys [or] knowingly mutilates" his registration certificate. This law was challenged by David O'Brien with the aid of the AMERICAN CIVIL LIB-ERTIES UNION. O'Brien had burned his registration certificate before a sizable Boston crowd, including several FBI agents. He was indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced to prison in the Massachusetts District Court, but the United States Court of Appeals held that the 1965 law unconstitutionally abridged FREEDOM OF SPEECH because it interfered with O'Brien's "symbolic" protest against the war.

In United States v. O'Brien (1968), the Supreme Court in an opinion by Chief Justice EARL WARREN reversed the Court of Appeals and upheld the challenged law and O'Brien's conviction. The Court first ruled that the Government has a "substantial interest in assuring the continued availability" of draft cards—for example, so that the individual can prove he has registered and so communication between registrants and local boards can be facilitated, particularly in an emergency. Second, in a more far-reaching holding, the Court rejected O'Brien's claim that the 1965 amendment was unconstitutional because Congress sought to suppress freedom of speech. The Court did not determine whether that in fact was Congress's purpose. Instead it ruled that such a purpose would not invalidate the law in light of the principle that courts may not "restrain the exercise of lawful [congressional] power on the assumption that a wrongful purpose or motive has caused the power to be exercised." (See MCCRAY V. UNITED STATES.)

Only Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS dissented from the Court's decision, in an opinion that dwelt less on draft card burning than on the power of Congress to initiate a peacetime draft. The O'Brien case led to a sharp curtailment of draft card burning and opponents of the Vietnam War turned to other forms of protest.

NORMAN DORSEN
(1986)

Bibliography

ALFANGE, DEAN, JR. 1968 Free Speech and Symbolic Conduct: The Draft Card Burning Case. Supreme Court Review 1968: 1–52.

DRAPER v. UNITED STATES
358 U.S. 307 (1959)

In Draper the Supreme Court held that information provided by a previously reliable informer, even though hearsay and not within the personal knowledge of the police, is sufficient to establish PROBABLE CAUSE for an arrest, at least when there is substantial corroboration for the information.

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

DR. BONHAM'S CASE

See: Bonham's Case

DRED SCOTT v. SANDFORD
19 Howard 393 (1857)

Closely associated with the coming of the CIVIL WAR, DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD remains one of the most famous decisions of the United States Supreme Court. It is certainly the prime historical example of judicial power exercised in the interest of racial subordination, and, as such, it stands in sharp contrast with BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), handed down almost a century later.

Scott was a Missouri slave owned by an army medical officer named John Emerson, who took him to live at military posts in Illinois and in federal territory north of 3630 where SLAVERY had been prohibited by the MISSOURI COMPROMISE. In 1846, Scott brought suit against Emerson's widow in St. Louis, claiming that he had been emancipated by his residence on free soil. Missouri precedent was on his side, and after two trials he won his freedom. In 1852, however, the state supreme court reversed that judgment. By a 2–1 vote and in bitterly sectional language, it declared that the state would no longer enforce the antislavery law of other jurisdictions against Missouri's own citizens. Scott's residence elsewhere, it held, did not change his status as a slave in Missouri.

Normally, the next step should have been an APPEAL to the United States Supreme Court, but a recent decision in the somewhat similar case of STRADER V. GRAHAM (1851) may have persuaded Scott's legal advisers that the Court would refuse to accept JURISDICTION. They decided instead to initiate a brand new suit for freedom in the federal CIRCUIT COURT for Missouri against Mrs. Emerson's brother, John F. A. Sanford of New York, who had been acting as her agent in the Scott litigation and may even have become the slave's owner. Sanford's New York CITIZENSHIP provided the foundation for DIVERSITY JURISDICTION. So began the case of Dred Scott v. Sandford (with Sanford's name misspelled in the official record).

Up to this point, the principal issue in Scott's suit had been how residence on free soil affected the legal status of a slave. It was a familiar issue that dated back to the noted British case of Somerset v. Stewart (1772) and had been dealt with in a number of state court decisions. (See SOMERSET'S CASE.) During the early decades of American independence, a tacit sectional accommodation had prevailed. Southerners accompanied by slaves were generally able to travel and sojourn in free states without interference. At the same time, southern courts joined in upholding the rule that a slave domiciled in a free state became forever free. Beginning in the 1830s, however, this arrangement broke down under antislavery pressure. State after state in the North withdrew the privilege of maintaining slaves while sojourning, and there was growing judicial acceptance of the view that any slave other than a fugitive became free the moment he set foot on free soil. (See COMMONWEALTH V. AVES.) To Southerners the change meant not only inconvenience but also insult, and by the 1850s they were retaliating in various ways.

Dred Scott v. Sandford raised an additional issue. In order to maintain a suit in federal court, Scott had to aver that he was a citizen of Missouri. Sanford's counsel challenged this assertion with a plea in abatement arguing that Negroes were not citizens and that the Court therefore lacked jurisdiction. The trial judge ruled that any person residing in a state and legally capable of owning property was qualified to bring suit under the diverse-citizenship clauses of the Constitution and the JUDICIARY ACT. On the merits of the case, however, he instructed the jury in favor of the defendant. Like the Missouri Supreme Court in Scott v. Emerson, he declared that Scott's status, after returning to Missouri, depended entirely upon the law of that state, without regard to his residence in Illinois and free federal territory. The jury accordingly brought in a verdict for Sanford.

The case then proceeded on WRIT OF ERROR to the United States Supreme Court, whose membership at the time consisted of five southern Democrats, two northern Democrats, one northern Whig, and one Republican. Argument before the Court in February 1856 introduced another new issue. For the first time, Sanford's lawyers maintained that Scott had not become free in federal territory because the law forbidding slavery there was unconstitutional. This, of course, was the issue that had inflamed national politics for the past decade and would continue to do so in the final years of the sectional crisis. With a presidential contest about to begin, the Justices prudently ordered the case to be reargued at the next session. On March 6, 1857, two days after the inauguration of James Buchanan, Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY finally read the decision of the Court.

Although Taney spoke officially for the Court, every other member had something to say, and only one concurred with him in every particular. The effect of the decision was therefore unclear, except that Dred Scott had certainly lost. Seven Justices concluded that at law he remained a slave. Taney, in reasoning his way to that judgment, also ruled that free blacks were not citizens and that Congress had no power to prohibit SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES. But were these declarations authoritative parts of the decision?

According to some contemporary critics and later historians, Taney did not speak for a majority of the Court in excluding Negroes from citizenship. Their conclusion rests upon the assumption that only those Justices expressly agreeing with him can be counted on his side. Yet, since Taney's opinion was the authorized opinion of the Court, it seems more reasonable to regard only those Justices expressly disagreeing with him as constituting the opposition. By this measure, the opinion never encountered dissent from more than two Justices at any major point. Furthermore, five Justices in their opinions spoke of the citizenship question as having been decided by the Court. In other words, the authoritativeness of that part of Taney's opinion was attested to by a majority of the Court itself.

More familiar is the charge that Taney indulged in OBITER DICTUM when he ruled against the constitutionality of the Missouri Compromise restriction after having decided that Scott was not a citizen and so had no right to bring suit in a federal court. "Obiter dictum" was the principal battle cry of the Republicans in their attacks on the decision. By dismissing Taney's ruling against territorial power as illegitimate, they were able to salvage the main plank of their party platform without assuming the role of open rebels against judicial authority. What the argument ignored was Taney's not unreasonable contention that throughout his opinion he was canvassing the question of jurisdiction. Having concluded that Scott could not be a citizen because he was a Negro, the Chief Justice elected to fortify the conclusion by demonstrating also that Scott could not be a citizen because he was a slave. Such reinforcement was especially appropriate because some of the Justices were convinced that the Court could not properly review the citizenship question.

It therefore appears that none of Taney's major rulings can be pushed aside as unauthoritative. In any case, the long-standing argument over what the Court "really decided" has been largely beside the point; for Taney's opinion was accepted as the opinion of the Court by its critics as well as its defenders. As a matter of historical reality, the Dred Scott decision is what he declared it to be.

Taney devoted about forty-four percent of his opinion to the question of Negro citizenship, thirty-eight percent to the territorial question, sixteen percent to various technical issues, and only two percent to the original question of whether residence on free soil had the legal effect of emancipating a slave. Throughout the entire document, he made not a single concession to antislavery feeling but instead committed the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES totally to the defense of slavery. Behind his mask of judicial propriety, the Chief Justice had become privately a fierce southern sectionalist, seething with anger at "Northern insult and Northern aggression." His flat legal prose does not entirely conceal the intensity of emotion that animated his Dred Scott opinion.

The citizenship issue concerned the status of free Negroes only; for everyone agreed that slaves were not citizens. Yet Taney persistently lumped free Negroes and slaves together as one degraded class of beings who "had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority." Thus all blacks, in his view, stood on the same ground. Emancipation made no difference. Negroes could not have been regarded as citizens by the Framers of the Constitution, he declared, because at the time they "had no rights which the white man was bound to respect." These notorious words were not mere historical commentary as defenders of the Chief Justice have often insisted. Taney also held that the constitutional status of Negroes had not changed at all since 1787, which meant that in 1857 they still had no federal rights that white men were bound to respect. His reasoning excluded blacks not only from citizenship but also from every protection given to persons by the Constitution.

Much more forceful in its political impact was Taney's ruling against the constitutionality of the antislavery provision in the Missouri Compromise. He began by dismissing as irrelevant the one clause of the Constitution in which the word "territory" appears, preferring instead to derive the territorial power of Congress by implication from the power to admit new states. No less remarkable is the fact that he never said precisely why the antislavery provision was unconstitutional. Historians have inferred from one brief passage that he based his holding on the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fifth Amendment. Yet there is no explicit statement to that effect, and in the end he did not declare that congressional prohibition of slavery in the territories violated any part of the Constitution; he said only that it was "not warranted" by the Constitution, a phrasing that suggests reliance on the principle of strict construction.

Not satisfied with ruling in effect that the Republican party was organized for an illegal purpose, the Chief Justice also struck a hard blow at northern Democrats and the doctrine of POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY. If Congress could not prohibit slavery in a territory, he said, neither could it authorize a territorial legislature to do so. This statement, being on a subject that did not arise in the case, was dictum. It exemplified Taney's determination to cover all ground in providing judicial protection for slavery. The dissenting Justices, JOHN MCLEAN and BENJAMIN R. CURTIS, rejected Taney's blanket exclusion of Negroes from citizenship. Having thus affirmed Scott's capacity to bring suit in a federal court, they proceeded to the merits of the case while denying the right of the Court majority to do so. Both men upheld the constitutionality of the Missouri Compromise restriction by interpreting the territory clause, in Republican style, as an express and plenary delegation of power to Congress. They went on to maintain that antislavery law, state or federal, dissolved the legal relationship between any master and slave coming within its purview, thereby working irrevocable emancipation.

Antislavery critics made good use of the dissenting opinions in launching an angry, abusive attack upon the Court majority and its judgment. The influence of the decision on the sectional conflict is difficult to assess. No doubt it contributed significantly to the general accumulation of sectional animosity that made some kind of national crisis increasingly unavoidable. It also aggravated the split in the Democratic party by eliciting STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS'S FREEPORT DOCTRINE and inspiring southern demands for a territorial slave code. At the same time, there is reason to doubt that the decision enhanced Republican recruiting or had a critical effect on the election of ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

For the two principals in the case, the verdict of the Court made little difference. John Sanford died in an insane asylum two months after the reading of the decision. Dred Scott was soon manumitted, but he lived only sixteen months as a free man before succumbing to tuberculosis. The constitutional effect of the decision likewise proved to be slight, especially after the outbreak of the Civil War. The wartime Union government treated Dred Scott v. Sandford as though it had never been rendered. In June 1862, Congress abolished slavery in all the federal territories. Later the same year, Lincoln's ATTORNEY GENERAL issued an official opinion holding that free men of color born in the United States were citizens of the United States. The THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT (1865) and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT (1868) completed the work of overthrowing Taney's decision.

The Dred Scott case damaged Taney's reputation but did not seriously weaken the Supreme Court as an institution. Aside from its immediate political effects, the case is significant as the first instance in which a major federal law was ruled unconstitutional. It is accordingly a landmark in the growth of JUDICIAL REVIEW and an early assertion of the policymaking authority that the Court would come to exercise more and more.

DON E. FEHRENBACHER
(1986)

Bibliography

EHRLICH, WALTER 1979 They Have No Rights: Dred Scott's Struggle for Freedom. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

FEHRENBACHER, DON E. 1978 The Dred Scott Case: Its Significance in American Law and Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

SWISHER, CARL B. 1974 The Taney Period, 1836–1864, Volume V of the Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Macmillan.

DRUG ABUSE

See: Controlled-Substance Abuse; Drug Regulation

DRUG REGULATION

Congress's power to regulate the manufacture, distribution, and use of narcotic drugs, formerly limited by a considerable body of constitutional DOCTRINE based on the TENTH AMENDMENT, today is regarded as plenary, limited only by the guarantees of the BILL OF RIGHTS.

The Constitution nowhere expressly grants to Congress power to regulate narcotics. Congress's efforts to regulate the area have thus relied on its powers to tax and regulate foreign and interstate commerce, and on its implied power to make laws enforcing treaty obligations. In the early part of this century, though, the Supreme Court viewed these powers as being constrained by the Tenth Amendment, which, the Court repeatedly held, reserved the POLICE POWER exclusively to the states; federal laws attempting to usurp the police power were void.

Thus, for example, tax statutes were void unless they indicated on their face a revenue purpose rather than an intent to exercise reserved police power. As the Court stated in United States v. Jin Fuey Moy (1916), a tax statute would be upheld where it was clearly designed to raise revenue, even though it had "a moral end as well as revenue in view," provided that moral ends were reached "within the limits of a revenue measure." In practice, purported taxes would seldom be voided, but ambiguities in statutory language would be resolved by reference to the purported revenue purpose.

The requirement of a revenue purpose has become less important over time. Congress quickly became adept at structuring tax measures to pass the facial scrutiny of the courts. At the same time, the Court's review of purpose became more cursory. Indeed, at least one lower court expressed the view that a tax purpose is no longer required. In any case, the expansion of the COMMERCE CLAUSE power has made the use of the TAXING POWER unnecessary, and the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 repealed most prior federal statutes based on the taxing power.

The development of the commerce power largely paralleled that of the taxing power. The Court for many years distinguished sharply between the commerce power granted to the federal government and the police power reserved to the states. The Court's decision in CHAMPION V. AMES (1903), though, established that Congress had the power to ban goods dangerous in themselves from interstate and FOREIGN COMMERCE. Under this power, Congress was free to ban trade in narcotics with foreign countries and between states, but had no power to regulate the intrastate manufacture or sale of narcotics. Thus, prosecution of narcotics violators under federal law required a case-by-case showing that the drugs in question were involved in foreign or interstate commerce, although Congress could create a statutory presumption that drugs of a type normally imported from foreign countries had been so imported.

Now that the courts have sweepingly interpreted the commerce clause, Congress may impose sanctions without showing in each prosecution that the narcotics transaction affected interstate commerce. Challenges to recent federal narcotics regulations have been routinely brushed aside by the courts.

Congress has also occasionally regulated drugs through the TREATY POWER. Thus, a law requiring narcotics addicts to register with customs upon leaving the United States was valid as a measure to carry out the nation's obligations under the Hague Convention of 1912, a treaty ratified by the Senate. With the rise of the commerce power, however, Congress has had little need for the treaty power in regulating narcotics.

Congress's power to regulate narcotics is, of course, limited by the Bill of Rights. In general, these limits are the same in narcotics cases as in other criminal cases; for example, Congress may not authorize unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES or CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT of narcotics violators. Nonetheless, the BURGER COURT's contraction of the reach of the Fourth Amendment has led some commentators to speak ironically of a "narcotics exception" to that guarantee.

One issue unique to the narcotics laws, however, has arisen from the FIRST AMENDMENT's guarantee of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. Several religious groups in the United States use drugs in their observance. The question thus arises whether the federal and state governments may constitutionally forbid the possession and use of drugs for religious purposes. The Supreme Court has held that only a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST can justify substantial infringement of the right to free exercise of religion. This compelling interest must, under the holding in SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963), be "some substantial threat to public safety, peace or order."

Two state courts have found that this standard bars legislative prohibition of the use of peyote by members of the Native American Church in their religious ceremonies. California, indeed, has found that the same ban applies to any person who uses peyote in connection with a bona fide religious practice, even if the person is not a member of any recognized religious group. In a 1964 case involving a "self-styled peyote preacher" the California Supreme Court granted a new trial to determine whether the defendant's professed religious belief was bona fide. Most courts, however, have rejected this view. As of 1983, courts in at least five states have held that the interest of defendants in free exercise of religion is outweighed by the compelling governmental interest in controlling the distribution and use of dangerous drugs.

Whether or not Congress is constitutionally compelled to do so, it has occasionally granted exemptions for the sacramental use of otherwise controlled substances. Just as sacramental wine was exempted from the provisions of the National Prohibition Act (1919), the Controlled Substances Act of 1970 exempted from its prohibitions the sacramental use of peyote. Although the Drug Enforcement Agency has consistently interpreted this exemption as being available only to members of the Native American Church, at least one lower court has held that Congress intended to exempt all bona fide religious groups using peyote for sacramental purposes and regarding the drug as a deity.

Other than this single exemption for peyote, however, the federal narcotics laws have not authorized sacramental use of otherwise forbidden drugs. Nor have the courts yet recognized any religious claims other than those made for peyote. The Supreme Court has not yet spoken on the matter, and constitutional claims for religious exemptions to the narcotics laws cannot be regarded as wholly frivolous. Still, neither the Supreme Court nor the lower courts seem currently to view these claims with favor.

JOHN KAPLAN
(1986)

Bibliography

BONNIE, RICHARD J. 1980 Marijuana Use and Criminal Sanctions. Charlottesville, Va. Michie Co.

KAPLAN, JOHN 1970 Marijuana: The New Prohibition. New York: World Publishing Co.

——— 1983 The Hardest Drug: Heroin and Public Policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MOORE, MARK H. and GERSTEIN, DEAN R., eds. 1981 Alcohol and Public Policy: Beyond the Shadow of Prohibition. Washington, D.C.: National Academy Press.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON MARIHUANA AND DRUG ABUSE 1973 Drug Use in America: Problem in Perspective. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

DRUG REGULATION
(Update 1)

The breadth of congressional power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE to regulate the manufacture, distribution, and possession of psychoactive drugs remains unquestioned. In recent years, however, strong measures taken by the federal and state governments to prevent and punish drug offenses have raised constitutional objections grounded in the BILL OF RIGHTS. The most controversial of these measures has been the use of chemical testing to detect the presence of illicit drugs in a person's urine or other body fluids.

Beginning in the mid-1980s, many public and private employers began to require urine testing as a condition of employment. The FOURTH AMENDMENT ban against UNREASONABLE SEARCHES is implicated when a governmental agency requires its employees or applicants for employment to submit to urine testing or when the government requires private employers (such as railroads) to test their employees. The collection and subsequent analysis of a person's urine is clearly a "search" for Fourth Amendment purposes, so the constitutional controversy has focused on when such testing is "reasonable" in light of the government's objectives and the employees' interests in personal privacy. It is generally agreed that urine testing is "reasonable," even in the absence of a SEARCH WARRANT, if it is based on PROBABLE CAUSE, or "individualized suspicion," that a particular employee has used illicit drugs. The controversial question is whether, and under what circumstances, employees can be required to submit to urine testing as part of a random or universal screening program.

In 1989 the Supreme Court upheld two screening programs, rejecting the argument that urine testing is per se unreasonable in the absence of individualized suspicion. However, in upholding testing programs for U.S. Customs agents and for railroad employees, the Court closely scrutinized the governmental objectives and the testing protocols. For example, in NATIONAL TREASURY EMPLOYEES UNION V. VON RAAB (1989), the Court held that the Customs Service's interests in the integrity and safety of its work force and in the protection of sensitive information justified the urine testing of all employees applying for or holding positions involving interdiction of illicit drugs or requiring the carrying of firearms. Taking its cue from Von Raab, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals subsequently held in Harmon v. Thornburgh (1989) that these same interests did not justify the random testing of attorneys in the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Measures taken to suppress drug use have also been challenged under the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT. Trafficking in illicit drugs is typically punishable by lengthy periods of imprisonment, and under many statutes, severe sentences are mandatory. However, in Hutto v. Davis (1982), the Supreme Court rejected a proportionality challenge to two consecutive twenty-year sentences for possessing and distributing nine ounces of marijuana, and the Sixth Circuit Court in Young v. Miller (1989) refused to set aside a mandatory nonparolable life sentence imposed by Michigan on a female first offender who had been convicted of possessing at least 650 grams of heroin. Acknowledging that the sentence "borders on overkill," that Michigan permits parolable life sentences for armed robbery or second-degree murder, and that only one other state authorized a sentence of such severity for drug offenses, the Sixth Circuit Court nonetheless found no constitutional impediment to "Michigan's efforts to punish major drug traffickers to the fullest extent of the law, even those who are first offenders."

In 1990 the Supreme Court resolved a question discussed at length in the main volumes of the Encyclopedia—whether bona fide sacramental use of peyote is protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT guarantee of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. In EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON V. SMITH (1990) the Court held that Oregon's criminal prohibition against possession of peyote could constitutionally be applied to sacramental use of the drug and that a state employee could therefore be fired and denied unemployment compensation for having used peyote at a religious ceremony of the Native American Church. The Court's opinion is less noteworthy for the result it reached than for its reformulation of the governing constitutional rule. As noted in the Encyclopedia, under the BALANCING TEST articulated in SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963), the issue is whether the state's interest in suppressing use of illicit drugs is sufficiently compelling to override the individual's interest in religious liberty. However, in the peyote case, the Court held that the government is not required to exempt religiously motivated actors from generally applicable and otherwise valid criminal prohibitions.

RICHARD J. BONNIE
(1992)

Bibliography

ROTHSTEIN, MARK 1987 Drug Testing in the Workplace: The Challenge to Employment Relations and Employment Law. Chicago-Kent Law Review 63:683–743.

DRUG REGULATION
(Update 2)

Congress and the states have broad authority to regulate the sale, possession, and manufacture of narcotic drugs. The states regulate under their inherent POLICE POWER to act for the health, safety, and welfare of the public. Congress's power arises from its constitutional grants of power to tax and to regulate FOREIGN COMMERCE and INTERSTATE COMMERCE. To date, the expansive powers of Congress have been unaffected by a recent Supreme Court decision resurrecting a FEDERALISM-based limitation on the reach of the COMMERCE CLAUSE. In UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995), the Court held that a federal statute prohibiting gun possession near schools exceeded the authority of Congress. Such activity, the Court said, was not economic in nature and, even if engaged in on a large scale, did not substantially affect interstate commerce. This ruling produced a flurry of challenges to federal statues, including major drug regulation statutes such as the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970. Although none of these cases has yet reached the Court, lower courts have uniformly accepted Congress's detailed findings that intrastate manufacture, distribution, and possession of controlled substances, as a class of activities, have a substantial and direct effect on interstate drug trafficking and that effective control of interstate trafficking requires regulation of both intrastate and interstate activities. Congress may regulate all such activities and may impose sanctions without showing in each prosecution that a particular narcotics transaction affected interstate commerce.

Despite the broad scope of their powers, federal and state governments must still comply with the individual liberty protections of the BILL OF RIGHTS. Over the past decade strong, even harsh, antidrug laws have provoked numerous constitutional challenges. But successful challenges have been few. Courts have, for example, rejected claims that lengthy, mandatory sentences for drug offenses constitutes CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT. Courts have also given federal and state governments a relatively free hand to employ two of their most controversial antidrug strategies: suspicionless DRUG TESTING and forfeitures of PROPERTY connected to drug activity.

When the government conducts drug testing of employees, students, or persons under government supervision or when it requires private industry such as railroads or airlines to conduct such testing, the chief constitutional check is the FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibition on UNREASONABLE SEARCH and seizures. Courts agree that the collection and analysis of a person's blood, urine, or hair intrudes on recognized expectations of privacy and amounts to a search. The essential question is whether such testing is reasonable.

If the government conducts a SEARCH OR SEIZURE as part of a criminal investigation, reasonableness requires PROBABLE CAUSE or reasonable suspicion that the individual has engaged in wrongdoing. But drug testing programs subject persons such as police officers, airline pilots, or job applicants to testing solely because they are within the targeted group. To evaluate these suspicionless drug testing programs, the Court has developed the "special needs" DOCTRINE. The Court permits abandonment of individualized suspicion if a search or seizure is prompted by a purpose, or special need, other than criminal law enforcement. To determine whether such suspicionless schemes are reasonable, the Court asks whether, on balance, the need to search outweighs the intrusion the search entails. This free-form, case-by-case BALANCING TEST has resulted in Court approval of most drug testing programs.

First, the courts almost always characterize the intrusion of drug testing as "minimal." In the absence of strip searches or other similarly intrusive methods, they view the taking of blood or the collection of urine or hair as a common occurrence, usually no more intrusive than a physical exam in a doctor's office or the loss of privacy associated with using a public restroom. And, usually, testing data are disclosed only to a limited number of persons and reveal only illicit drug use and not other information, such as pregnancy or diabetes.

Second, the government's need to conduct drug tests is routinely found to outweigh the minimal intrusion that they involve. The Court has upheld mass, suspicionless drug testing of high school athletes to respond to the "crisis" of drug use and insubordination in the schools. It has permitted suspicionless testing of U.S. Customs Service employees to deter drug use among agents whose job was drug interdiction, or who carried guns, or handled classified information. But the government's justification for drug testing can sometimes be too flimsy. In CHANDLER V. MILLER (1997), the Court struck down a Georgia law that required all candidates for public office to undergo drug testing. Georgia failed to show there was any drug use problem among candidates or any danger to public safety. It also failed to show why ordinary public scrutiny of such officials was inadequate to deter or detect drug use. After Chandler, government drug testing remains relatively easy to justify, but some actual drug use problem or concern for public safety must be demonstrated.

One of the government's most popular (and most profitable) antidrug devices is CIVIL FORFEITURE of assets. Typical civil forfeiture laws permit the government, on a bare bones showing of probable cause, to seize any property thought to be proceeds of a crime or suspected of being used or intended for use in criminal activity. The prime targets for forfeiture are assets connected to drug trafficking and possession. The government has seized cars, boats, planes, farms, houses, cash, and even livestock connected to drug manufacture and possession.

In civil forfeitures, the property is thought to be the guilty or offending party and seizure is permitted whether or not the owner is charged with or convicted of a crime. The government does not have to honor rights associated with criminal proceedings, such as proof beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT or TRIAL BY JURY. Indeed, the owner must prove the property's innocence or lose it entirely. Civil forfeitures are subject to some constitutional boundaries. PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS requires that property owners have prior NOTICE and a hearing before the government seizes land or other immovable property. Seizure of property only incidentally or haphazardly associated with criminal activity can be equivalent to a fine and limited by the excessive fines clause. However, although individual Justices have acknowledged the harshness of the civil forfeiture remedy, the Court has taken refuge in the long historical acceptance of civil forfeitures and has rejected any fundamental assault on its scope. Thus it declined to view forfeiture as a punishment subject to the DOUBLE JEOPARDY clause. It also rejected the idea that DUE PROCESS prevents the seizure of property from innocent owners; that is, owners who were unaware that others used their property, such as a car, to engage in drug trafficking.

MARY M. CHEH
(2000)

Bibliography

CHEH, MARY M. 1994 Can Something This Easy, Quick, and Profitable Also Be Fair? Runaway Civil Forfeiture Stumbles On the Constitution. New York Law School Law Review 39: 1–48.

LAFAVE, WAYNE 1996 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment (with 1998 Supplement). St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

LEADING CASE 1997 Suspicionless Drug Testing. Harvard Law Review 111:289–299.

NOTE 1997 Drug Testing and the Fourth Amendment: What Happened to Individualized Suspicion? Drake Law Review 46:149–172.

DRUG TESTING

Increasingly through the 1980s, federal and state governments required testing of a person's blood, urine, breath, and hair to try to determine recent drug or alcohol use. President Ronald Reagan's Executive Order No. 12564 hastened this trend by ordering federal executive agencies to develop and implement such programs for their employees. Other tested groups have included military personnel, defendants subject to pretrial release, probationers, PRISONERS and parolees, state employees (especially those involved in law enforcement and transportation), high school and college athletes and other students, women seeking obstetrical care and their neonates, and parents in child abuse and neglect cases.

When required or encouraged by the government, drug-testing programs raise fundamental issues for FOURTH AMENDMENT jurisprudence. Judicial legitimation of such programs may over time lead to substantial alteration of the predominant paradigms of privacy. Such programs present very different issues from the blood test in SCHMERBER V. CALIFORNIA (1966), which the Supreme Court permitted on the grounds that medical personnel administered it based on PROBABLE CAUSE of intoxication and that EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES excused the lack of a SEARCH WARRANT.

In its 1988 term the Supreme Court upheld in large part two federal testing programs. In SKINNER V. RAILWAY LABOR EXECUTIVES' ASS'N. (1989), the Court upheld regulations of the Federal Railroad Administration that required railroads to test the urine and blood of employees in major train accidents. NATIONAL TREASURY EMPLOYEES UNION V. VON RAAB (1989) upheld urine testing of Customs Service employees as a condition of promotion to positions that involve direct drug interdiction or the carrying of guns. The Court remanded for further consideration the issue of employee testing for promotion to positions allowing access to "sensitive" information.

All Justices agreed that a compelled production and subsequent chemical analysis of urine, blood, and breath are invasions of a person's REASONABLE EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY and therefore a search and possibly a seizure. For the first time outside of a prison context, the Court's majority concluded that a search of a person's body may be analyzed as an ADMINISTRATIVE SEARCH and thus may be upheld without individualized suspicion. Applying a test derived from a 1985 school search case, NEW JERSEY V. T.L.O., and developed in the 1986 term in cases involving searches of a junkyard, a probationer's home, and an employee's desk, the Court concluded that a government's "special needs," apart from those of normal law enforcement, can justify dispensing with the presumption that compliance with the warrant clause determines the reasonableness of the search. Such justification occurs at least when a warrant or probable clause requirement (or some lesser standard of individualized suspicion) would interfere with the state's satisfying its special needs.

Finding that such requirements were not practical because they would frustrate the government's achievement of its goals, the Court concluded that the drug-testing programs were reasonable in view of the importance of the state's interest, as weighed against individual privacy interests. It treated the latter as limited because of the reduced privacy expectation of employees, especially those in such highly regulated and scrutinized jobs as railroaders and Customs Service officers. The Court also noted the programs' efforts to employ accurate tests and to obtain employee medical data that could improve test interpretation, recognizing that the accuracy of a test affects a search's reasonableness (as well as the due process validity of any decision, such as dismissal, predicated on the test). To the extent the testing procedure is not particularly reliable, as can easily be the case, the government's interest is reduced.

Although these decisions approve widespread testing without individualized suspicion, they involve only testing that is triggered by a special event such as an accident or an application for promotion. Some lower court decisions have more deferentially reviewed the facts of challenged programs and upheld testing that lacked some of the restrictions crafted into the Customs Service program. Such programs involve more sustained and less predictable invasions of privacy and increase the discretionary power of superiors over subordinates that Fourth Amendment jurisprudence can limit. For example, courts have upheld repeated random or systematic drug tests of employees, such as flight controllers, police officers, and prison guards, without a triggering event. With respect to large classes of employees among whom the interest in deterring drug use is less substantial, lower courts have also approved testing based on an individualized suspicion that is less than probable cause.

As the Court gives more scope to administrative search doctrine, officials may rely increasingly on such searches rather than on a police officer's discretionary decision to search based on an individual suspicion of crime. Any such development will increasingly pose the question of the appropriate standard of JUDICIAL REVIEW in assessing the reasonableness not of an individual officer's acts but of a general legislative or executive program. The evidence justifying the program and the rules limiting discretion will be relevant to such an assessment. While in Von Raab the government plausibly hypothesized risks that might arise from a Customs officer's drug use, no evidence of drug abuse within the Customs Service was available. In accepting such hypothetical justifications, the Court's scrutiny was far from searching. This deference is consistent with the Court's explicit refusal to consider the availability of less intrusive means in determining reasonableness. Yet, in remanding some of the regulations for further consideration, the Court showed that its scrutiny was not of the lowest order.

The Court could confine the reach of these two cases largely to governmental employment by attributing them to the special scrutiny to which public employees may be subjected in hiring, retention, and promotion and thus treat these cases as variants of an UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITIONS problem. Yet, the numbers of persons covered by such testing and the intensity of these searches raise the question whether these decisions may signal a basic paradigm shift in Fourth Amendment law away from the presumption that reasonableness is defined by the warrant clause. The BURGER COURT and the REHNQUIST COURT have for years been edging in this direction rhetorically and in a series of ad hoc judgments; whether in retrospect Von Raab will be a watershed case cannot yet be determined.

The "special needs" rule risks a doctrinal unraveling of the warrant clause presumption in two ways. If the range and number of administrative searches increase, distinguishing administrative searches with a civil enforcement rationale from criminal enforcement searches will become ever more difficult. Second, a burgeoning of administrative searches will have the doctrinally unjustified and politically unattractive result of affording the criminal suspect more privacy protection than the populace at large.

These decisions are also noteworthy for the extent to which they permit intrusions on the body as a routine matter. They legitimate the role that intruding on bodily privacy can play in disciplining the civilian adult population. No appreciation is found in the Court's opinions that the body is the home of the self. The only noticeable concern is with the shame of scrutinized urination, a matter that testing programs sometimes address by providing only for aural supervision.

Also of note is their impact on the Fourth Amendment values of particularity and informational privacy. Depending on the kind of chemical analyses permitted, drug tests can provide a recent history—whether accurate or not, extending back many weeks—of legal and illegal drug use, which may have occurred solely in the home's privacy. They can also provide information about bodily and psychosomatic conditions such as pregnancy, HIV antibodies, diabetes, epilepsy, and depression.

In other, often more public situations that do not involve the employment relationship, the need to identify and seize a person may present a preliminary practical impediment to drug testing. In MICHIGAN DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE V. SITZ (1990), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of temporary seizures at sobriety checkpoints. Officers briefly stopped all cars, examined the driver for signs of intoxication, and presumably observed what was in plain view. Upon finding signs of intoxication, the officer would direct the driver to a side location to examine his license and registration and to test sobriety. The state police established these checkpoints for short periods of time without prior notice to the public and without providing reasons for their location and timing.

The court reviewed these seizures by appling a reasonableness BALANCING TEST derived from Brown v. Texas (1979), but without first making a finding of "special needs" as in Von Raab. Presumably, the distinction between these two tests is that the Court treats brief seizures of persons in cars upon the highway, even for the routine law enforcement purposes, as less intrusive than searches. Subjecting the program's justification to a more lenient scrutiny than was used in Von Raab, the Court easily concluded that the state's interest in a program that outweighs the individual's liberty interests in avoiding brief detention. As in Von Raab, the Court refused to base its reasonableness judgement on the availability of other effective means of achieving state objectives that less seriously burden Fourth Amendment values. Accordingly, it refused to consider substantial evidence that checkpoints are far less effective in identifying and apprehending drunk drivers than are seizures based on articulable suspicion. It is too early to tell whether and how the power to seize without individualized suspicion will be combined with a Von Raab drug search.

ROBERT D. GOLDSTEIN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Search and Seizure.)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE 1987 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

SCHULHOFER, STEPHEN 1989 On the Fourth Amendment Right of the Law-Abiding Public. Supreme Court Review 1989:87–163.

ZEESE, KEVIN 1989 Drug Testing: Legal Manual. New York: Clark Boardman.

DRUG TESTING
(Update)

Government drug testing of employees, students, and others such as persons on probation, is now a widespread and entrenched phenomenon. The chief constitutional limit on such testing is the FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibition on UNREASONABLE SEARCH and seizures. Because courts agree that the collection and analysis of a person's blood, urine, or hair is a search, the key question is whether such testing is reasonable.

When the government conducts a SEARCH OR SEIZURE as part of a criminal investigation, reasonableness requires PROBABLE CAUSE or reasonable suspicion that the individual has engaged in wrongdoing. But the requirement of individualized suspicion would doom modern drug testing programs because they are blanket, suspicionless searches of mostly innocent people. In a series of cases the Supreme Court excused the need for individualized suspicion when a search was conducted for a "special need" other than ordinary law enforcement. But it was unclear whether a special need was a standard for judging testing programs or simply an invitation to balance the "minimal" intrusion of drug testing against the important social problem the government was addressing.

In Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton (1995) the Court upheld random urinalysis of public school student athletes, saying that students in school had a reduced expectation of privacy; that being monitored while providing a urine specimen was no more intrusive than using a public restroom; and that testing was needed to combat a proven drug use problem in the schools. In dissent, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR insisted that suspicionless testing was contrary to bedrock Fourth Amendment requirements and could only be justified if the government had a specific and substantial need to test and proved that a suspicion-based approach was unworkable.

The Court moved toward O'Connor's position in CHANDLER V. MILLER (1997). Although the Court did not reverse any prior rulings, it said that suspicionless testing, even if only minimally intrusive, is permissible only if the government shows actual evidence of a drug use problem or real hazards flowing from possible drug use. The government must also explain why ordinary suspicion-based law enforcement methods are inadequate and show that its testing program actually responds to the problem it identified. In Chandler, the Court struck down a Georgia law that required all candidates for public office to undergo drug testing. Georgia failed to show there was any drug use problem among candidates or any danger to public safety. It also failed to show why ordinary public scrutiny of such officials was inadequate to deter or detect drug use.

MARY M. CHEH
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Drug Regulation.)

Bibliography

RECENT DEVELOPMENT 1998 Reining in the National Drug Testing Epidemic: Chandler v. Miller. Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review 33:253–272.

ZEESE, KEVIN 1996 Drug Testing: Legal Manual. Deerfield, Ill.: Clark Boardman Callaghan.

DUAL FEDERALISM

EDWARD S. CORWIN devised the term "dual federalism" to describe a constitutional theory enunciated by the Supreme Court and by many COMMENTATORS ON THE CONSTITUTION at various times (and to various purposes) in the nation's history—a theory concerning the proper relationships between the national government and the states. This theory, Corwin wrote, embodied four postulates of constitutional interpretation: "1. The national government is one of ENUMERATED POWERS only; 2. Also, the purposes which it may constitutionally promote are few; 3. Within their respective spheres the two centers of government are 'sovereign' and hence 'equal'; 4. The relation of the two centers with each other is one of tension rather than collaboration."

This theory gives enormous importance to the TENTH AMENDMENT, with its declaration that powers not delegated to the national government and not prohibited to the states by the Constitution "are reserved to the States respectively, or the people." (The ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION had reserved to the states powers that were not "expressly delegated" to Congress.) Confronted with the competing concept of national authority in the Constitution's SUPREMACY CLAUSE, proponents of dual federalism have insisted that the Tenth Amendment holds a superior position. The TANEY COURT, especially in the LICENSE CASES, often portrayed the states' reserved powers as a constitutional limitation on the legitimate authority of Congress. In the post-CIVIL WAR period, the Court built another constitutional monument to dual federalism theory in its doctrine of INTERGOVERNMENTAL IMMUNITIES. In the hands of a conservative, property-minded judiciary in the late nineteenth century, dual federalism became a potent instrument for invalidation of federal regulatory measures. In HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) the Court's majority took an extreme view of the Tenth Amendment, declaring that it forbade even a federal regulation of interstate commerce when the regulation's purpose was to invade the province of the states' reserved powers.

A series of decisions in the late 1930s, however, put to rest the formal constitutional theory of dual federalism. The Court's revised interpretations of the COMMERCE POWER, the CONTRACT CLAUSE, and the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER all rejected Tenth Amendment limitations on national authority. Meanwhile, the Court also validated the administrative innovations of COOPERATIVE FEDERALISM, in the form of extensive programs of FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID to the states.

The only serious reappearance of dual federalism theory in post-NEW DEAL constitutional law has been in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976), in which a concept of inviolable powers and functions of the "states as states" became a limitation on congressional regulatory power, in this instance the power to establish wages and hours for municipal workers.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1950 The Passing of Dual Federalism. Virginia Law Review 36:1–24.

MASON, ALPHEUS THOMAS 1968 Federalism: Historic Questions and Contemporary Meanings. The Role of the Court. In Valerie, Earl, ed., Federalism: Infinite Variety in Theory and Practice. Itasca, Ill.: F. E. Peacock Publishers.

SCHEIBER, HARRY N. 1978 American Federalism and the Diffusion of Power. University of Toledo Law Review 9:619–680.

DUANE, JAMES
(1733–1797)

James Duane, a wealthy New York lawyer and conservative political leader of the Revolutionary period, served in the Continental Congress (1774–1784) and helped write and secure ratification of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. As mayor of New York City (1784–1789) he presided over the Mayor's Court case of RUTGERS V. WADDINGTON (1784), a disputed precedent for JUDICIAL REVIEW. Not named, because of his nationalist views, as a delegate to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, he attended the New York convention and worked for RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. He was later the first UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT judge in New York (1789–1794).

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

DUE PROCESS OF LAW

A 1354 act of Parliament reconfirming MAGNA CARTA paraphrased its chapter 29 as follows: "That no man . . . shall be put out of Land or Tenement, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without being brought in Answer by due Process of Law." This was the first reference to due process in English legal history. Chapter 29 of the 1225 issue of Magna Carta originally concluded with the phrase "by the LAW OF THE LAND." Very probably the 1354 reconfirmation did not equate "the law of the land" with "due process of law"; the two were not synonymous. Due process in the 1354 enactment, and until the seventeenth century, meant an appropriate COMMON LAW writ.

In the Five Knights Case (see PETITION OF RIGHT), JOHN SELDEN, the great parliamentarian, said in defense of the accused that "No freeman shall be imprisoned without due process of law," meaning that the "law of the land" was an equivalent for "either INDICTMENT or PRESENTMENT." Sir EDWARD COKE, in his commentary on Magna Carta, also equated due process with the law of the land, meaning regularized courses of proceeding in common law prosecutions for crime. Coke's primary claim was that the law of the land was the common law, one of several rival systems of law then prevalent in England. When abolishing the courts of High Commission and Star Chamber, Parliament in 1641 quoted the due process phraseology of the act of 1354 and added that trials by "ordinary Courts of Justice and by the ordinary course of law" protected property right against arbitrary proceedings. JOHN LILBURNE and his Levellers agreed, but they also asserted that due process signified a cluster of procedural protections of the criminally accused, including TRIAL BY JURY, the RIGHT TO COUNSEL, and the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. By the mid-seventeenth century due process and the law of the land referred to PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS in both civil and criminal cases. The "law of the land" usage, however, was the dominant one, and "due process" continued to be used in the very limited sense of a writ appropriate to a legal proceeding. A century later WILLIAM BLACKSTONE discussed various processes—original, mesne, and final—without discoursing on due process of law per se. After referring to indictment in capital cases and the principle that "no man can be put to death without being brought to answer by due process of law," Blackstone referred to the different writs that summoned an accused to trial in MISDEMEANOR and FELONY cases.

In the American colonies the usage was similar. In deference to Magna Carta, the "law of the land" formulation was by far the most common, although a variety of paraphrases existed. The MASSACHUSETTS BODY OF LIBERTIES (1641) guaranteed that one's life, liberty, and property could not be deprived except by "some expresse law of the Country warranting the same, established by a generall Court and sufficiently published"—that is, by known, standing law. West New Jersey protected the same substantive rights by a clause guaranteeing "due trial and judgment passed by twelve good and lawful men." New York in 1683 sought a charter that incorporated the famous chapter of Magna Carta with a clause requiring "by due course of law." Probably the first American reference to "due process of law" was in a Massachusetts act of 1692 endorsing chapter 29 of Magna Carta.

During the controversy with Great Britain leading to the American Revolution, Americans frequently spoke of trial by jury, FUNDAMENTAL LAW, the law of the land, no TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION, and a gamut of CIVIL LIBERTIES, but rarely referred to due process of law. Their references to the "law of the land" had no fixed or single meaning. They meant by it a variety of safeguards against injustice and abuses of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE; they equated it with NOTICE, hearing, indictment, trial by jury, and, more generally, with regular forms of common law procedure and even the fundamental law itself or constitutional limitations on government. The "law of the land" was an omnibus phrase whose content ranged from specific writs to the concept of CONSTITUTIONALISM, and the phrase connoted protection of substantive rights—life, liberty, and property—as well as various precedural rights. Later, due process inherited all the content and connotations of law of the land.

All the first state constitutions used the "law of the land" phraseology, as did the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE OF 1787. No state constitution included a due process clause until New York's of 1821, although Mississippi's constitution of 1817 referred to "due course of law." Before the Civil War, only five state constitutions referred to "due process of law." All others had the older "law of the land" equivalent.

The first American constitution to include a due process clause was the Constitution of the United States in its Fifth Amendment, ratified in 1791. The clause reflected JAMES MADISON's preference. For reasons unknown, he recommended that no person should be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The four states which had ratified the Constitution with recommendations for a comprehensive BILL OF RIGHTS urged versions of chapter 29 of Magna Carta, although only one, New York, referred to "due process of law" rather than "law of the land." The due process clause of the Fifth Amendment was ratified without any discussions that illumine its meaning. Although every clause of the Constitution is supposed to have its own independent meaning, rendering no clause tautological, the due process clause was an exception. It pacified public apprehensions, bowed toward Magna Carta, and reinforced specific rights such as trial by jury.

When the Supreme Court construed the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment for the first time in MURRAY V. HOBOKEN LAND COMPANY (1856), it declared that although due process limited all branches of the government, it had only the procedural connotations that derived from the settled usages and modes of proceeding which characterized old English law suited to American conditions. Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY's opinion in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) passingly employed SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS OF LAW, which had cropped up in some state decisions and in ABOLITIONIST CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY as well as proslavery theory. The FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT's due process clause, taken verbatim from the Fifth's, proved to be the turning point in the national acceptance of "due process of law" as the common usage rather than the "law of the land" usage. In the last third of the nineteenth century, state constitutions finally substituted "due process" for "law of the land," and judicial decisions, state and federal, as well as legal treatises, expounded "due process of law," making it the most important and influential term in American constitutional law.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

HOWARD, A. E. DICK 1968 The Road from Runnymede: Magna Carta and Constitutionalism in America. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia.

JUROW, KEITH 1975 Untimely Thoughts: A Reconsideration of the Origins of Due Process of Law. American Journal of Legal History 19:265–279.

MOTT, RODNEY 1926 Due Process of Law. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

DUE PROCESS OF LAW, PROCEDURAL

See: Procedural Due Process of Law, Civil; Procedural Due Process of Law, Criminal

DUE PROCESS OF LAW, SUBSTANTIVE

See: Substantive Due Process

DULANY, DANIEL
(1722–1797)

Daniel Dulany was a member of the Delaware governor's council (1757–1774) and one of the most prominent lawyers in America. In 1765 he published a pamphlet opposing the Stamp Act and arguing that "there is a clear distinction between an Act imposing a Tax for the single Purpose of raising a Revenue, and those Acts which have been made for Regulation of Trade." He denounced the doctrine of virtual representation as a "cobweb, spread to catch the unwary, and intangle the weak."

Dulany was a delegate to the STAMP ACT CONGRESS but later opposed the AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

DUN & BRADSTREET, INC. v. GREENMOSS BUILDERS, INC.
472 U.S. 749 (1985)

The PLURALITY OPINION in this case may portend significant changes in the constitutional DOCTRINE governing LIBEL AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT. Dun & Bradstreet, a credit reporting business, falsely and negligently reported to five subscribers that Greenmoss had filed a petition in bankruptcy, and also negligently misrepresented Greenmoss's assets and liabilities. In an action for defamation, Greenmoss recovered substantial compensatory and punitive damages. Vermont's highest court held that the principle of GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974) did not apply in actions against defendants who were not part of the press or broadcast media. A fragmented Supreme Court avoided this question but affirmed, 5–4.

Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, for a three-Justice plurality, concluded that Gertz—which had held, among other things, that punitive damages could not be awarded against a magazine without proof of knowing or reckless disregard of the falsity of the statement—was applicable only to "expression on a matter of public concern." Justice Powell spoke only generally about the content of the "matter of public concern" standard, but hinted that "media" speech might qualify automatically for protection under Gertz. Dun & Bradstreet's report, however, involved "matters of purely private concern." Although such speech is "not wholly unprotected" by the FIRST AMENDMENT, he concluded, it can be the basis of a punitive damages award even absent a showing of reckless disregard of the truth. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER and Justice BYRON R. WHITE, in separate CONCURRING OPINIONS, expressed willingness to abandon Gertz altogether, but meanwhile agreed with this radical surgery on Gertz.

In a footnote pregnant with meaning, Justice Powell remarked that some kinds of constitutionally protected speech are entitled only to "reduced protection"—COMMERCIAL SPEECH, for example. But he did not place Dun & Bradstreet's report in the latter category, and thus raised speculation that the majority may be prepared to adopt a "sliding scale" for the FREEDOM OF SPEECH, with varying (and, as yet, unspecified) degrees of constitutional protection for each kind of speech, depending on the Justices' determinations about the value of the speech and the context in which it is uttered.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for the four dissenters, agreed that credit reports were not central to First Amendment values, but argued nonetheless that the Gertz requirements should apply to this case: credit and bankruptcy information was "of public concern." Justice Brennan noted with satisfaction that six Justices (the dissenters and authors of the concurring opinions) had rejected a distinction between the First Amendment rights of "media defendants" and of others sued for defamation.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

DUNCAN v. KAHANAMOKU
327 U.S. 304 (1946)

Interpreting the scope of MARTIAL LAW established in Hawaii after the bombing of Pearl Harbor, Justice HUGO L. BLACK, for the Supreme Court, concluded that the Hawaiian Organic Act of 1900 extended constitutional guarantees to that TERRITORY. The creation of military courts empowered to try civilians violated the SIXTH AMENDMENT right to a FAIR TRIAL, thus contravening the intent of Congress. Chief Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE and Justice FRANK MURPHY wrote separate CONCURRING OPINIONS. Stone would have given greater scope to martial law but found the claim of EMERGENCY POWER unjustified here. Murphy joined the Court's opinion but preferred to rest on constitutional grounds, citing EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866). Justices HAROLD BURTON and FELIX FRANKFURTER, in dissent, argued that the military situation and the conduct of the war, as an executive function, justified the emergency steps taken here.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

DUNCAN v. LOUISIANA
391 U.S. 145 (1968)

A 7–2 Supreme Court here overruled several earlier decisions and held that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT incorporated the Sixth Amendment right to TRIAL BY JURY. Louisiana tried Duncan for battery, a MISDEMEANOR charge punishable by up to two years' imprisonment. The court denied his request for a jury trial and sentenced him, upon conviction, to sixty days and a $150 fine. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the Justices abandoned the approach used in PALKO V. CONNECTICUT (1937) and Adamson v. California (1947), where the Court had examined the circumstances to determine whether they preserved the implicit DUE PROCESS requirement of "fundamental fairness." In his opinion in Duncan, Justice BYRON R. WHITE asked instead whether trial by jury was "fundamental to the American scheme of justice" and concluded that history supported an affirmative response. Conceding a court's duty to distinguish between petty and serious offenses to determine which cases warranted this protection, White declined to do so as a general rule. He declared that an offense punishable by more than two years' imprisonment was sufficiently serious to apply the Sixth Amendment guarantee. Penalties involving less than six months' time were not accorded that right. As usual, Justices HUGO L. BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, concurring separately, advocated the total INCORPORATION DOCTRINE. Justices JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN and POTTER STEWART, dissenting, asserted that "the Court's approach and its reading of history are altogether topsy-turvy." Later decisions in WILLIAMS V. FLORIDA (1970) and Apodaca v. Oregon (1972) have limited the extent of the right incorporated.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

DUNN v. BLUMSTEIN
405 U.S. 330 (1972)

Tennessee restricted voting to persons with one year of residence in the state and three months in the county. The Supreme Court, 6–1, speaking through Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, held this limitation a denial of the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. The durational RESIDENCE REQUIREMENTS had to pass the test of STRICT SCRUTINY, both because they penalized exercise of the RIGHT TO TRAVEL interstate and because they restricted the FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST in voting. The state's asserted justifications for the requirements were not necessary for achieving COMPELLING STATE INTERESTS. Fraud could be prevented by the LESS RESTRICTIVE MEANS of requiring registration thirty days before an election. The objective of an informed electorate bore only a tenuous relation to length of residence. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER dissented. The recently appointed Justices LEWIS F. POWELL and WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST did not participate.

The following year, the Court approved fifty-day residency requirements in Marston v. Lewis (1973) and Burns v. Fortson (1973).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS COMPANY v. DEERING
254 U.S. 443 (1921)

In a case that brought the apparently prolabor provisions of the CLAYTON ACT before the Supreme Court, a 6–3 majority held that the act had placed no substantial bar to issuing INJUNCTIONS against labor unions. Section 6 of the act allowed unions to "lawfully [carry] out . . . legitimate objects," and section 20 denied the issuance of injunctions in a labor dispute unless essential to protect property. Duplex sought an injunction against a SECONDARY BOYCOTT which had been brought to force unionization of their open shop, claiming injury to and destruction of INTERSTATE COMMERCE. The Court declared that the boycott, even though peaceful, was not a "lawful method" of achieving the union's ends and thus violated the antitrust laws. According to the Court, section 6 only approved methods not expressly forbidden. Moreover, the majority redefined section 20: "labor dispute" was not meant generically but applied only "to parties standing in proximate relation to a controversy," an unwarranted gloss. They thus confined the section to a mere reflection of precedent, undoing congressional action.

Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, joined by Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and JOHN H. CLARKE, dissented. Brandeis argued that the defendants shared a "common interest" with the employees, and the majority's denial of the existence of a dispute, within the act's meaning, simply ignored reality. Section 20, said the dissenters, attempted to render both sides equal. Although the Court refused to acknowledge that the Clayton Act had legalized any new methods for labor's use, a similar decision in BEDFORD CUT STONE V. JOURNEYMEN STONECUTTERS (1927) prompted enactment of the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT in 1932, reversing the doctrinal direction.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Labor and the Antitrust Laws.)

DU PONCEAU, PETER S.
(1760–1844)

Peter S. Du Ponceau arrived in America from France as Baron von Steuben's interpreter. Following service in the Revolution, he became a citizen of Pennsylvania where he was admitted to the bar in 1785. He defended the radical state CONSTITUTION of 1776 and was an ANTI-FEDERALIST, but as time passed he became a Jeffersonian Republican. He declined THOMAS JEFFERSON's offer of the chief justiceship of Louisiana. Du Ponceau was a founder and provost of the Law Academy of Pennsylvania. Among his books were A Dissertation on the Nature and Extent of the Jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States (1824), in which he advocated a FEDERAL COMMON LAW, and A Brief View of the Constitution of the United States (1834), in which he sought a middle course between a consolidated government and STATES' RIGHTS. In general he taught moderate nationalism and the supremacy of the union.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BAUER, ELIZABETH K. 1952 Commentaries on the Constitution. Pages 65–78. New York: Columbia University Press.

DUVALL, GABRIEL
(1752–1844)

Although he served as a Justice of the United States Supreme Court for nearly a quarter of a century, Gabriel Duvall had a relatively small impact on the development of American constitutional law. Born into a prominent Maryland Huguenot family, he studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1788. He supported the movement for independence during the 1770s, and held a number of minor posts under the revolutionary government. Following the adoption of the Maryland Constitution of 1777 he served as clerk of the State House of Delegates. In 1782 he was elected to the Maryland State Council and in 1787 to the House of Delegates as a representative from Annapolis. He was selected to be a delegate to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, but, for reasons that are unclear, he declined to serve. He supported THOMAS JEFFERSON during the political battles of the 1790s, and was elected as a Democratic-Republican to Congress in 1794. He resigned the position less than two years later to become a judge of the Maryland Supreme Court. He helped to organize Maryland successfully for the Republicans in 1800 and often advised Jefferson and JAMES MADISON on appointments there. In December 1802 Jefferson appointed him to be the first comptroller of the United States Treasury.

In 1811 President Madison appointed Duvall to the United States Supreme Court. On the most important and controversial cases of the period—Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1816), Gibbons v. Ogden (1824), and BROWN V. MARYLAND (1827)—Duvall followed the lead of JOSEPH STORY and JOHN MARSHALL, and he even supported the Chief Justice when he dissented in Ogden v. Saunders (1827). Dartmouth College v. Woodward was the only major case in which he failed to support Marshall, but since he dissented without opinion, it is not possible to determine his reasons. It is clear that Duvall knew and understood the law, and he did write straightforward and creditable opinions for the Court in several minor commercial law and maritime cases: Archibald Freeland v. Heron, Lenox and Company (1812); United States v. January and Patterson (1813), Prince v. Bartlett (1814); and The Frances and Eliza v. Coates (1823).

Although no abolitionist, Duvall had definite antislavery leanings. Dissenting from a Supreme Court ruling in Mina Queen and Child v. Hepburn (1812), in which HEARSAY evidence had been excluded "from a trial in which two black persons attempted to establish their freedom," he argued, with some force, "It appears to me that the reason for admitting hearsay evidence upon a question of freedom is much stronger than in cases of pedigree or in controversies relative to the boundaries of land. It will be universally admitted that the right to freedom is more important than the right of property." In another case, LeGrand v. Darnall (1829), speaking on behalf of the Court, Duvall ruled that a slaveholder's deeding of property to his ten-year-old son by a slave woman implied an intention to free the boy, despite a Maryland law that denied manumission to any slave under forty-five years of age.

As he grew older, Duvall's increasing infirmities and deafness caused numerous problems and considerable embarrassment for the Court. For almost a decade his resignation was expected, but he did not step down until January 1835, when he received assurances that ANDREW JACKSON planned to appoint fellow Marylander ROGER B. TANEY to the bench. Duvall died nine years later at the age of ninety-two.

RICHARD E. ELLIS
(1986)

Bibliography

DILLARD, IRVING 1969 Gabriel Duvall. Pages 419–429 in Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., Justices of the Supreme Court 1789–1969. New York: Chelsea House.

E

EAKIN v. RAUB
12 Sargeant & Rawle 330 (Pa. 1825)

In this otherwise insignificant Pennsylvania case, JOHN BANNISTER GIBSON offered the classic rationale for JUDICIAL RESTRAINT. His opinion is an explicit refutation of JOHN MARSHALL's arguments for JUDICIAL REVIEW in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), a position which Gibson confessed he had once accepted, but more as "a matter of faith than of reason."

Gibson's major premise was that the judiciary had no right or power to void legislation without express constitutional warrant. Like Marshall, Gibson agreed that under a written CONSTITUTION, no branch of government could claim more than its granted powers. But as the legislature was supreme within the limits of its grant, Gibson argued, the judiciary could not annul those powers without "direct authority" from the constitution, "either in terms or by irresistible implication." While the judiciary might interpret legislation, it had no power to "scan the authority of the lawgiver." The legislature was superior, Gibson concluded, because "the power to will and to command is essentially superior to the power to act and obey."

Legislative indiscretions and abuses severely tested Gibson's fidelity to his principles. In Norris v. Clymer (1845) Gibson acknowledged that he had altered his views on judicial review because the Pennsylvania constitutional convention of 1837, by its silence, apparently sanctioned the power, and also "from experience of the necessity of the case." While Gibson undoubtedly moderated his views for some circumstances, he remained generally faithful to the notion of legislative superiority and the wisdom of judicial restraint. The "experience of the necessity of the case" involved legislative private acts that granted equity. The legislature had given substantially complete EQUITY jurisdiction to the courts in 1836, yet continued to act on its own, inevitably provoking clashes with the judiciary. In Greenough v. Greenough (1849) Gibson strongly defended an exclusive sphere for judicial power: "[T]he judicial power . . . is . . . so distributed . . . that the legislature cannot exercise any part of it." The next year, in De Chastellux v. Fairchild, he struck down an act ordering a new trial in an action of TRESPASS." The power to order new trials is judicial," he said; "but the power of the legislature is not judicial."

In the Eakin opinion Gibson emphasized judicial independence, and he acknowledged legislative sovereignty, but only "within the limit of its powers." Further, he anticipated cases such as De Chastellux when he said that a legislative act directing a reversal of a court judgment would be "a usurpation of judicial power." Finally, he declared that when the judiciary was the prescribed organ to execute the constitution, such as in the conduct of trials, the judges were bound to follow the constitution, a legislative act notwithstanding.

Throughout the remainder of his long career, Gibson adhered to the spirit of Eakin. He insisted that the legislature's apprehension of public sentiment, not the fear of judicial interposition, offered the most effective barrier to unconstitutional action. With language similar to later opinions by MORRISON R. WAITE and OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, Gibson declared that the responsibility for overcoming abusive acts rested not with the courts, but with the people, who were "wise, virtuous, and competent to manage their own affairs."

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

E. C. KNIGHT COMPANY, UNITED STATES v.

See: Knight Company, E. C., United States v.

ECONOMIC ANALYSIS AND THE CONSTITUTION

To what extent do "economic" ideas and concepts better enable us to understand the American Constitution?

One persisting characterization of the Constitution is that it succeeded both in arresting a decline in the American economy occurring under (and because of) the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION and in initiating an epoch of great prosperity. In reality, the shape of the economy during the 1780s was not particularly unsatisfactory. Indeed, in 1786 BENJAMIN FRANKLIN was willing to declare that "America was never in higher prosperity." But deflation injured creditors such as farmers, thereby provoking SHAYS' REBELLION in Massachusetts as well as inducing the enactment by the states of debtors' relief legislation.

The 1789 Constitution authorized the federal government to tax and to regulate commerce and centralized in the national government the power to print money. The long-range economic implications of these particular grants of power have been profound; their short-range consequences, however, may well have been modest. The federal power to tax was lightly exercised for many decades, and the federal power to print money was of limited importance in an era when "monetary policy" had not yet been recognized as a major instrument of national economic policy. The burst of prosperity in the decades following adoption of the Constitution owed largely to a surge in foreign trade, promoted by America's neutrality during the Napoleonic Wars—a neutrality that had been facilitated, to be sure, by the Constitution's recognition of centralized authority over foreign policy.

The first comprehensive "Economic Interpretation of the Constitution" to attract great attention was that of CHARLES A. BEARD in his celebrated 1913 study. Rejecting the popular view of the Constitution as the noble product of patriotic impulses, Beard assessed the Constitution as an "economic document" designed to advance certain economic interests to the detriment of others. In particular, he believed that "personalty" interests—"money, public security, manufacturers, and trade and shipping"—prevailed at the expense of "landed" interests of farmers and others, as well as at the expense of the unpropertied general public. Beard further asserted that the entire constitutional process had been initiated by a small group of men "immediately interested through their personal possessions in the outcome of their labors." In the preface to his 1935 edition, however, Beard denied that he had meant to suggest that the Framers were merely seeking to enrich themselves personally; rather, Beard explained, the Framers' own economic holdings merely made them receptive to the claims of more general economic groups.

The empirical ambitions that Beard displayed in his research remain commendable. But his particular empirical conclusions have been disputed by more recent scholarship. For example, those attending the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION owned more in realty than they owned in securities; and it is not clearly true that creditors as a class supported the Constitution's RATIFICATION. Those portions of the Constitution that Beard singled out as establishing its economic preferences were the Constitution's general system of CHECKS AND BALANCES, which supposedly served to inhibit the unpropertied majorities; Congress's powers over taxation, war, commerce, and public lands; and the prohibitions on state coinage of money and on state impairment of contractual obligations. The DUE PROCESS clause of the FIFTH AMENDMENT Beard barely mentioned—even though the due process clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT had served as the basis for the Supreme Court's notorious decision in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) just eight years previously. Much of Beard's analysis of the Constitution now seems badly forced. In particular, his treatment of checks and balances is extraordinarily reductionistic in its failure to acknowledge that they were designed to serve any purpose other than the protection of certain property interests. In all, Beard's economic interpretation—though a major event in constitutional historiography—no longer commands adherents.

Economists have long been concerned with the objective of economic efficiency, and modern economists have developed an elaborate analysis in support of this objective. Might it be that the goal of efficiency has constitutional status? Insofar as original intent is relevant, information is needed on the economic views of the Framers. One philosophy common in eighteenth-century America was classical republicanism, which, in commending community, equality, and public virtue, was capable of disparaging commercial activity. The Framers, however, were also exposed to the newer tradition of Lockean liberalism, which strongly endorsed individualism and commercial activity. Propitiously, Adam Smith's The Wealth of Nations was published in 1776, the year of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. Consistent with Smith's free market approach, ALEXANDER HAMILTON in THE FEDERALIST #11 espoused the idea of an open national economy: "The veins of commerce in every part will be replenished and will acquire additional motion and vigor from a free circulation of the commodities of every part." Hamilton began that paper with the observation that "the prosperity of commerce" is "a primary object of [enlightened states-men's] political cares"—an observation that evidently contemplated mercantilist, rather than laissez-faire, policies. In The Federalist #10, JAMES MADISON made clear that he was hardly an economic egalitarian. "The first object of government" is to protect "the diversity of faculties of man, from which the rights of property originate." Elsewhere, however, The Federalist set forth theories that were imbued with republicanism; and in a 1792 essay Madison recommended policies that would "raise extreme indigence towards a state of comfort." In all, the free market interests of the Framers should neither be ignored nor exaggerated.

From the early nineteenth century on, free-market norms have exerted their most continuing influence upon constitutional doctrine through the negative underside of the COMMERCE CLAUSE. According to Justice ROBERT JACKSON in H. P. Hood & Sons v. DuMond (1949), "Our system . . . is that every farmer and every craftsman shall be encouraged to produce by the certainty that he will have free access to every market in the nation, that no home embargoes will withhold his exports, and that no foreign state will by custom duties or regulation exclude them. Likewise, every consumer may look to the free competition from every producing area in the Nation to protect him from exploitation by any." The Supreme Court has frequently endeavored to protect out-of-state sellers, out-of-state buyers, and multistate transportation concerns from discriminatory or excessive burdens imposed by self-interested state governments. In SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY V. ARIZONA (1945), for example, the Court invalidated an Arizona statute limiting the lengths of trains operating in Arizona: the Court found that the statute's burdens on INTERSTATE COMMERCE were substantial, its safety benefits probably trivial. At times, however, the Court has been reluctant to intervene even when the prospect of Justice Jackson's "exploitation" has seemed keen. If a state enjoys a monopoly on an important natural resource, then the state, by imposing a substantial tax on the extraction of that resource, can "export" its tax burden, enriching its local treasury at the expense of consumers throughout the nation. Yet in Commonwealth Edison Company v. Montana (1981) a divided Supreme Court declined to hold that Montana's thirty percent severance tax on coal violated the commerce clause. The Court majority did not clearly disagree with the proposition that an "exported" state tax violates commerce clause ideals if it is not "fairly related to the services provided by the state." But the majority seemed to regard it as beyond the judicial function to assess the incidence of such a tax and to compute the value of those state-provided "services." (See STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE.)

Though the commerce clause imposes some limits on the states, its primary and explicit purpose is to confer powers on the federal Congress. In GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) the Court, in expansively interpreting what counts as interstate commerce, upheld a congressional enactment that implicitly abrogated a New York rule creating a steamboat monopoly between certain New York and New Jersey ports. Because this monopoly plainly offended free-market norms, the federal statute in Gibbons vindicated what Justice Jackson in Hood regarded as the "vision of the Founders." But what would the result have been in Gibbons had it been Congress, rather than the state, that had insisted on a monopoly? In exercising its commerce clause powers in the twentieth century, Congress has frequently chosen to restrict rather than enhance the competitive process. What is noteworthy is that the Supreme Court has found this in no way problematic. Justice Jackson's opinion in WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942) was shrewd in its perception of how intra-farm (and hence intrastate) events could have an aggregate impact on interstate economic arrangements. But the opinion was strikingly uninterested in the extent to which the federal statute it was approving brought about the cartelization of the otherwise highly competitive agricultural economy, thereby curtailing production and elevating consumer prices. Perhaps the point is that the "vision of the Founders," as understood by the Court, is not a competitive economy as such, but merely an economy free of anti-competitive restrictions imposed by the states. Besides accounting for the assumed irrelevance of free-market norms to congressional action under the commerce clause, this attribution of purpose can also explain the fact that the negative underside of the commerce clause has never been thought directly applicable to private monopolies that might severely restrict competition. Consider, however, Paul Freund's view that the spirit—though not the letter—of the commerce clause anticipates a "free national market," and that the commerce clause therefore needs to be supplemented by a strong federal antitrust program.

In the first third of the Twentieth Century, the Court did engage in a rather broad-ranging implementation of free-market values. The Court proceeded primarily in the name of the due process clauses of the Fourteenth and Fifth Amendments, clauses which enabled it to review all state and federal legislation, without regard to interstate impacts. During these years, the quite sophisticated approach of an Adam Smith was frequently replaced by the insensitive dogmatism of the Social Darwinist movement, thereby provoking Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES's Lochner quip that "the Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics." Since 1937, by contrast, the Court has consistently declined to invalidate "economic" legislation on substantive due process grounds and has stubbornly refused to subject that legislation to even minimal review. In WILLIAMSON V. LEE OPTI-CAL CO. (1955), for example, the Court unanimously and unhesitatingly upheld an Oklahoma statute requiring consumers to employ a licensed doctor merely in order to fit old eyeglass lenses into new frames.

Judicial tolerance of inefficient economic enactments is probably for the best. Economic analysis is an acquired taste; courts should not insist that legislators be educated in basic economic concepts, let alone that they keep abreast of the current literature on externalities and public goods. Moreover, most economists would acknowledge that a legislature might properly choose to sacrifice economic efficiency in order to achieve some desired distribution of wealth among societal groups. Also, even if certain private conduct is economically acceptable, a legislature could properly conclude that the conduct is interpersonally unfair in the particular way it enables A to cause harm to B.

Nevertheless, the argument favoring somewhat greater judicial scrutiny of inefficient legislation is not altogether without merit. In Lynch v. Household Finance Corp. (1972), a PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS case, the Court—drawing on John Locke, John Adams, and WILLIAM BLACKSTONE—recognized an important connection between property and liberty. In addition, recent "commercial speech" cases such as VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY V. VIRGINIA CITIZENS CONSUMER COUNCIL, INC. (1976) have attached considerable constitutional significance to marketplace norms. Moreover, aggressive JUDICIAL REVIEW is often defended on the ground of its ability to correct predictable breakdowns in the legislative process. Southern Pacific itself relied, for commerce clause purposes, on the Court's idea that out-of-state railroads are likely to be unrepresented in the state's legislative processes. For due process purposes, "consumers" as such are anything but a DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITY. But—as an economic analysis of the legislative process lucidly suggests—the very diffusion of consumers throughout society signifies that consumers may fare poorly in the legislature when challenged by producer groups, which are far better able to mobilize themselves in seeking protective legislation.

In any event, given the Supreme Court's position that neither the commerce clause (as a grant of power) nor the due process clause (as a restriction of power) includes any significant free-market content, it appears likely that Congress, if it chooses, could enact socialism (the ultimate rejection of market values) as this country's form of economic organization. It seems hard to deny that Congress could offer a RATIONAL BASIS on behalf of a socialist program that would satisfy the trivial demands of the commerce and due process clauses. To be sure, the takings clause would require that the nationalization of industry achieve a PUBLIC USE. But recent interpretations of the public use doctrine make it doubtful that the doctrine places any limits on Congress's choice of economic philosophy.

It is true that the takings clause would require Congress to afford JUST COMPENSATION to the shareholders of any companies nationalized. As a general matter, the just compensation requirement serves to rule out at least certain legislative efforts to redistribute wealth, whether by socialism or by more modest measures. It should not be forgotten that the progressive federal income tax—a central feature of federal policy during the last forty years—required for its legality a constitutional amendment. Still, the Supreme Court's invalidation of a pre-amendment federal income tax in POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST COMPANY (1895) rested on a dubious interpretation of the DIRECT TAXES clause. Consider, moreover, a general tax on wealth or property, the proceeds of which are dedicated to financing welfare programs: it seems entirely clear that such a tax would not constitute a prohibited "taking." It appears, then, that wealth redistribution is constitutionally quite acceptable so long as it is both candid and even-handed.

When a "taking" does occur, the "just compensation" that the takings clause requires has long been defined in terms of "fair market value." This "fair market value" gloss introduces, almost by hypothesis, certain capitalist values into constitutional doctrine. Yet that gloss can also be critiqued precisely from a free-market perspective. Assume a neighborhood of homes which, if individually available for sale, would each yield a price of $100,000. At any one time, however, only a limited number of houses are in fact offered for sale. To state that a homeowner is not interested in selling for $100,000 is to acknowledge that he presently values his ownership of the house at some figure in excess of $100,000. That excess is what economists call "consumer surplus." "Fair market value" provides less than full compensation in that it deprives the homeowner of this consumer surplus. From an ethical perspective, compensation that is less than full is arguably less than "just." Moreover, economic analysis can make clear that a "fair market value" standard for compensation has the practical effects of subsidizing government in its land acquisitions (by negating consumer surplus) and distorting government EMINENT DOMAIN choices (by encouraging government to ignore variations in consumer surplus among property owners).

Yet an economic analysis also verifies that the problem of measuring full compensation resists easy solution. Rendering consumer surplus compensable would not be satisfactory: consumer surplus would be notably difficult to quantify on an individual basis, and compensability would invite owners to dissemble in representing their surpluses' magnitude. Reminded of the difficulties involved in establishing the proper price for an eminent-domain forced sale, an economist might question the very practice of forced sales: he might suggest that the government be deprived of the eminent domain power altogether, thereby remitting the government to the opportunities afforded by the ordinary real estate market for purposes of acquiring land. Yet it is precisely the economist who can explain why this solution, too, would not always be satisfactory. Without the government's power of eminent domain, the owner of the final parcel within a tract of land that the government has otherwise succeeded in acquiring would be in a position—knowing of the government's situation—to extract an excessive monopoly price from the government-buyer. Because governments engage in tract acquisition more frequently than private parties do (only governments build superhighways, for example), it may make sense to limit the eminent domain power to governmental bodies. Obversely, the fact that the eminent domain power is generally limited to governments helps explain why private parties often are not in a good position to initiate large-tract projects.

As suggested above, an economic analysis is at least able to deepen understanding of the implications of constitutional doctrine. Correspondingly, such an analysis can correct what would otherwise be misunderstandings. In SHAPIRO V. THOMPSON (1969), for example, the Supreme Court considered the states' argument that WELFARE BENEFITS can be properly be denied to indigents who move into a state in order to collect higher benefits. Such an argument, the Court suggested, rested on the implicit premise that such welfare applicants are not "deserving"—a premise that the Court then rejected as unsound. But from the economist's useful perspective, the problem is not the grantee's desert but rather the grantor's incentives. States, anticipating an influx of indigents if welfare benefits are increased, may be dissuaded from raising those benefits, a dissuasion that might ill serve whatever the public's preference may be for compassionate welfare programs. Given an economic point of view, Shapiro unwittingly reduces the feasibility of state-administered welfare programs, thereby strengthening the argument in favor of the nationalization of welfare.

At the minimum, economic analysis can assist in identifying the costs or inefficiences of any proposed constitutional ruling. It is, of course, for the courts then to determine what weight to accord these costs in interpreting constitutional doctrine. The economist would be disturbed, however, by any disparagement of these costs that seems naive or inadequately considered. In Shapiro, for example, there is language stating that administrative inefficiencies, no matter what their magnitude, are automatically "uncompelling" for purposes of STRICT SCRUTINY review. But it is far from clear that the Court really adheres to such a position. In recent procedural due process opinions such as MATHEWS V. ELDRIDGE (1976), the Court has taken the efficiency criterion significantly into account.

In a number of important ways, then, an economic analysis can be clearly beneficial in the process of constitutional analysis. Nevertheless, economics will probably never achieve, in constitutional studies, the influence that it has secured in certain other fields of law. There are too many constitutional doctrines that endorse ideas or values that are largely beyond the economist's jurisdiction. To employ an extreme example, the economist's recognition of people's "taste for discrimination" is of little help in understanding the Constitution's moral assessment that racial discriminations are inherently invidious.

GARY T. SCHWARTZ
(1986)

Bibliography

BEARD, CHARLES A. (1913) 1935 An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution. New York: Macmillan.

ELLIOT, B. W. (1941) 1979 Dynamics of Ascent. New York: Knopf.

EPSTEIN, DAVID F. 1984 The Political Theory of the Federalist. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

EPSTEIN, RICHARD A. 1985 Takings. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FREUND, PAUL A. 1961 The Supreme Court of the United States. Cleveland, Ohio: World Publishing Co.

GOLDWIN, ROBERT A. and SCHAMBRA, WILLIAM A., eds. 1982 How Capitalist Is the American Constitution? Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute.

LEE, SUSAN P. and PASSELL, PETER 1979 A New Economic View of American History. New York: Norton.

MCDONALD, FORREST 1979 We the People: The Economic Origins of the Constitution. New York: Samuel Insull.

POSNER, RICHARD A. 1977 Economic Analysis of Law. Boston: Little, Brown.

WOOD, GORDON S. 1969 The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

WRIGHT, ESMOND 1978 Fabric of Freedom 1763–1800. New York: Hill & Wang.

ECONOMIC DUE PROCESS

"Economic due process" is the name given to the doctrine that the Supreme Court used to strike down a variety of economic regulations in the first third of the twentieth century. The core of the doctrine is the conception that the central interest protected by the DUE PROCESS clauses is "liberty of contract." Given that assumption, the Court could not justify ECONOMIC REGULATION as a means to redress inequality of bargaining power between contracting parties, such as workers and employers. Moreover, economic legislation that purported to be based on other objectives—such as protecting public health, morals, or safety—was examined by the Court to ensure that the challenged legislation reasonably advanced those objectives.

The doctrine reached its full form in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), where a bare majority of the Court struck down a state law limiting bakery workers' maximum hours to sixty per week. Because the Constitution protected liberty of contract, economic regulation for its own sake was invalid, and thus, a state legislature could not regulate the hours of bakery workers to protect them from exploitation. A "labor law, pure and simple" would be unconstitutional. The hours of workers could be regulated only to protect the interests within the POLICE POWER—health, safety, welfare, or morality. Even if the legislature passed the law with the stated purpose of protecting workers' health, the Court would still ask whether the law was necessary for that purpose. This inquiry was designed to ensure that the law was not in fact a pretext for forbidden economic regulation.

There were two distinct criticisms of the Lochner decision. One was that the Court did not give sufficient weight to the judgment of the New York legislature that excessive hours of work jeopardized the health of bakery workers. Three of the four dissenting Justices in Lochner conceded that New York could not limit bakers' hours to prevent their economic exploitation. They would, however, have accepted New York's judgment that the measure was necessary to protect health. A more fundamental objection was that the Constitution permitted economic regulation for economic motives. A prophetic solo dissent by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., disagreed with the Court's major premise that the Constitution protected liberty of contract. He said, "A Constitution is not intended to embody a particular economic theory. . . . It is made for people of fundamentally differing views."

In the three decades that followed, the Court upheld most challenged economic regulations on the ground that they protected public health, safety, or morals. Indeed, in BUNTING V. OREGON (1971) it upheld a law fixing maximum hours for factory workers. However, the Court struck down a significant number of laws that it considered to be interferences with a free market. In ADAIR V. UNITED STATES (1908) and COPPAGE V. KANSAS (1915), the Court invalidated laws that outlawed labor contracts forbidding employees to join labor unions. The Court overturned a minimum wage law in ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923) and a law that fixed prices in TYSON BROTHER V. BANTON (1927). And in NEW STATE ICE COMPANY V. LIEBMANN (1932), the Court invalidated a law that limited business entry for businesses that were not public utilities.

The Court abandoned its free-market approach to the due process clause in NEBBIA V. NEW YORK (1934), where it sustained a Depression-era law fixing minimum prices for milk. A bare majority of the Court concluded that a "state may regulate a business in any of its aspects, including the prices to be charged for the products or commodities it sells." Two years later, in MOREHEAD V. NEW YORK EX REL. TIPALDO (1936), the Court unexpectedly invalidated a law setting minimum wages for women workers. That decision was, however, overruled the following year in WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH (1937). Since 1937, no decision of the Supreme Court has held an economic regulatory measure invalid under the due process clause.

The decision in Nebbia abandoned the idea that business regulation for economic motives was forbidden. During the Lochner era, the Court had decided whether laws were reasonably necessary to promote police-power objectives only because it sought to ensure that the police power was not a subterfuge for economic regulation. Once the Court decided that economic regulation need not be justified by the police power, it might have been concluded that economic regulations are valid whether or not they are reasonable, and occasionally, the Supreme Court has said this. In FERGUSON V. SKRUPA (1963), Justice HUGO L. BLACK, writing for the Court, said that in rejecting Lochner the Court had abandoned the doctrine "that due process authorizes courts to hold laws unconstitutional when they believe the legislature has acted unwisely."

Conventional due process doctrine seems to say, however, that economic regulatory legislation might be invalid if sufficiently unreasonable. In Nebbia the Court stated that laws violated due process if they did not have "a reasonable relation to a proper legislative purpose" or if they were "arbitrary." In UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938), the Court upheld the Filled Milk Act of 1923, which prohibited the shipment of skimmed milk compounded with vegetable oil in interstate commerce. A lower federal court decided that the law lacked RATIONAL BASIS because filled milk was not deleterious to health. The opinion of Justice HARLAN F. STONE said that in the application of the rational basis test, "the existence of facts supporting the legislative judgment is to be presumed, for regulatory legislation affecting ordinary commercial transactions is not to be pronounced unconstitutional unless in the light of the facts made known or generally assumed it is of such a character as to preclude the assumption that it rests upon some rational basis within the knowledge and experience of legislators."

Although the Court, in the Carolene Products case, concluded that the Filled Milk Act did rest on a permissible congressional finding that filled milk was injurious to health, its OBITER DICTA suggested that the law could be challenged if the facts presented to the lower court proved that the law's lack of wisdom was not debatable: "Where the existence of a rational basis for legislation whose constitutionality is attacked depends upon facts . . . such facts may properly be made the subject of judicial inquiry, . . . and the constitutionality of a statute predicated upon the existence of a particular state of facts may be challenged by showing to the court that those facts have ceased to exist."

In one sense, there is no difference between the dictum in Ferguson v. Skrupa—that the due process clause does not permit an inquiry into legislative reasonableness—and the dictum of Carolene Products that suggests the possibility of a trial to show that a law lacks a rational basis. For more than fifty years, Supreme Court decisions, without exception, have upheld all economic regulations challenged under the due process clause.

In another sense, however, the Carolene Products approach has produced a different outcome than would have occurred if the Court had adhered consistently to the Ferguson dictum. Lower courts frequently conduct trials to determine whether laws challenged as a violation of due process are reasonable. Occasionally, lower federal courts decide that state or federal laws lack a rational basis. Although the Supreme Court has uniformly reversed those decisions when appealed, the laws may be effectively invalidated when there is no appeal. For example, in Milnot Co. v. Richardson a lower federal court decided that the Filled Milk Act—the same law sustained in Carolene Products—was unconstitutional because it lacked a rational basis. The federal government, not sympathetic to the objectives of the statute, did not appeal.

A few academic commentators have argued that the Court's withdrawal from judgment in the economic due process area has gone too far. Some have argued that the Court should use the rational basis formula to invalidate laws that have no real purpose except to favor one economic interest at the expense of a competing interest or the public. Indeed, some state courts use the due process clause, or some other provision, in state constitutions in exactly this manner. The Supreme Court, however, has neither acknowledged nor followed that advice. In WILLIAMSON V. LEE OPTICAL COMPANY (1955), for example, the Court sustained a state law forbidding a dispensing optician to duplicate eyeglasses without a prescription from an optometrist or ophthalmologist. Opticians argued, with some merit, that the law was unnecessary to protect public health and that the legislature's real purpose was to give optometrists and ophthalmologists a monopoly on the sale of eyeglasses. The Court answered that the law might encourage people to have their eyes examined more often, although a more candid answer might have been that it did not matter whether the law was unabashed economic favoritism.

All the Justices appointed in the last fifty years have agreed that the Lochner line of decisions represented an abuse of JUDICIAL POWER. The consensus about economic due process is the starting point of current debate about constitutional law. The point of Justice Holmes's Lochner dissent was that it was irresponsible for Justices to read their own subjective economic preferences into the due process clause. Is it equally an abuse of power to read the due process clause to overturn state legislation that restricts noneconomic liberties? Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, writing for the Court when it struck down a state ban on BIRTH CONTROL devices in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), insisted that there was a difference between judging the propriety of laws that "touch economic problems, business affairs or social conditions" and those that involve such personal liberties as "an intimate relation of husband and wife." Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, writing for the Court in ROE V. WADE (1973), which struck down laws restricting ABORTION, acknowledged and quoted Holmes's admonition in his Lochner dissent that the Constitution "is made for people of fundamentally differing views, and the accident of our finding certain opinions natural and even familiar, or novel, and even shocking, ought not to conclude our judgment upon the question whether statutes embodying them conflict with the Constitution of the United States." The opinion went on, however, to conclude that the due process clause protects "personal rights that can be deemed "fundamental."

Lochner is a discredited and overruled decision, but its ghost continues to haunt contemporary constitutional law debate.

WILLIAM COHEN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Labor Movement; State Police Power.)

Bibliography

COX, ARCHIBALD 1987 The Court and the Constitution. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

HETHERINGTON, JOHN A. C. 1958 State Economic Regulation and Substantive Due Process of Law. Northwestern University Law Review 53:13–32.

LINDE, HANS A. 1970 Without "Due Process": Unconstitutional Law in Oregon. Oregon Law Review 49:125–187.

MCCLOSKY, ROBERT G. 1962 Economic Due Process and the Supreme Court: An Exhumation and Reburial. Supreme Court Review 1962: 34–62.

WONNELL, CHRISTOPHER T. 1983 Economic Due Process and the Preservation of Competition. Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 11:91–134.

ECONOMIC EQUAL PROTECTION

During the heyday of the doctrine of ECONOMIC DUE PROCESS, the EQUAL PROTECTION clause took a backseat to the DUE PROCESS clause. In BUCK V. BELL (1927), Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., called an argument that a law was invalid because its application was confined to an unreasonably small number of people "the usual last resort of constitutional arguments." Still, the "last resort" succeeded, and laws were invalidated under the equal protection clause when burdensome business regulations unreasonably (in the Court's view) exempted some businesses from the burden. In Smith v. Cahoon (1931), for example, the Supreme Court invalidated a law requiring compulsory insurance for trucks because it exempted those carrying agricultural products. The next-to-last decision of this kind was Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Insurance Co. v. Harrison (1937). The Court held that a law forbidding stock insurance companies from acting through salaried agents violated equal protection because the restriction did not apply to mutual insurance companies.

Since 1937, the Court has invalidated an economic regulatory law on the basis of similar reasoning only once: Morey v. Doud (1957) struck down an Illinois law regulating the sale of money orders because American Express money orders were exempted by name. In NEW ORLEANS V. DUKES (1976) the Court characterized Morey as "the only case in the last half century to invalidate a wholly economic regulation solely on equal protection grounds" and overruled it.

Since 1976, two cases have applied the equal protection clause to "wholly economic regulations," but each case was unique. In METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY V. WARD (1985), a bare majority of the Court invalidated a tax on insurance companies because local companies were exempted. This discriminatory tax statute would have been invalid under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, except that Congress had authorized states to impose taxes that burdened out-of-state insurance companies. The Court concluded that discrimination against out-of-state business was nonetheless prohibited by the equal protection clause. Allegheny Pittsburgh Coal Co. v. County Commission of Webster County (1989) invalidated a tax assessor's practice of valuing recently sold property at its sale price for property tax purposes, while valuing property that had not changed hands at a level far below its present market value. In a footnote, the Court commented that its decision was only applicable to an "aberrational" administrative practice that was illegal under state law. The Court did not decide whether the assessor could justify an identical but legally authorized practice on the ground that it was unfair to tax "unrealized paper gains in the value of property."

In a much-cited CONCURRING OPINION in an earlier case, Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON argued that there was a substantial difference between economic due process, which the Court had appropriately rejected, and economic equal protection. In RAILWAY EXPRESS AGENCY V. NEW YORK (1949), the Court upheld a law that prohibited advertising signs on vehicles, but exempted a sign advertising the business of the vehicle owner. The Court lamely concluded that the distinction between signs advertising the vehicle owner's own business and those advertising some other business was reasonable, because New York could reasonably conclude that the latter signs were more distracting. Concurring, Justice Jackson concluded that signs of both classes were equally distracting, but argued that a better reason to uphold the distinction was that New York could decide that it was fair to exempt those who advertised their own businesses. In a much-quoted OBITER DICTUM he argued that a requirement of equality should be given more than lip service in cases of ECONOMIC REGULATION: "There is no more effective practical guaranty against arbitrary and unreasonable government than to require that the principle of law which officials would impose upon a minority must be imposed generally. . . . Courts can take no better measure to assure that laws will be just than to require that laws be equal in operation."

Justice Jackson's dictum has had only a minor influence on Supreme Court decisions. Government lawyers rarely respond to equal protection challenges with the bald reply that the difference in treatment between groups is simply the outcome of INTEREST GROUP politics. Most often, there is an attempt to justify a particular group's exemption from a burden with the argument that exemption promotes a praiseworthy public purpose. The Court has uniformly credited those arguments, no matter how farfetched, in economic regulation cases. In WILLIAMSON V. LEE OPTICAL COMPANY (1955), for example, the Court sustained a law prohibiting opticians from duplicating eyeglasses without a prescription from an ophthalmologist or optometrist. The Court said that a legislature might conclude that although the optician had the ability to duplicate the lenses without a prescription, the prohibition would encourage people to have their eyes examined more often. It is easy enough to show that the public health justification in Williamson was an afterthought to uphold a law that the legislature passed to protect the business of two groups of eye-care professionals from competition of a third.

Much contemporary legislation is, in fact, based on interest-group politics. But because the Court has rejected the free-market constitutional command of economic due process, it is doubtful that the Court would accept the argument of a few legal commentators that it should seriously ask whether the outcomes of interest-group pressures further the public good. Questions about whether it is fair to promote the interests of one economic group at the expense of another will likely be left to the political processes for the foreseeable future.

One prominent argument in this area begins by conceding the point that laws can be justified as the outcomes of interest-group politics. So long as government lawyers seek to uphold a law's exemptions and classifications on good-government grounds, however, courts should limit themselves to those arguments and insist that there be a "real and substantial" relationship to those good-government grounds. Critics of this approach argue, among other things, that its adoption would only promote more elaborate legislative "boilerplate," to supply stronger less-than-candid good-government justifications to explain the outcomes of interest-group politics.

Be that as it may, in cases involving economic regulation, economic equal protection has met the same fate as economic due process.

WILLIAM COHEN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Economic Freedom; Economy.)

Bibliography

GUNTHER, GERALD 1972 Forward: In Search of Evolving Doctrine on a Changing Court: A Model for a Newer Equal Protection. Harvard Law Review 86:1–48.

LINDE, HANS A. 1975 Due Process of Lawmaking. Nebraska Law Review 55:197–255.

SUSTEIN, CASS R. 1985 Interest Groups in American Public Law. Stanford Law Review 38:29–87.

ECONOMIC LIBERTIES AND THE CONSTITUTION

Contrary to its existing practice, the United States Supreme Court was once a strong guarantor of economic liberties. This was the period (1897–1937) of "economic due process." The Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT provide that neither the federal nor state governments shall deprive any person "of life, liberty, or PROPERTY, without DUE PROCESS OF LAW." The Court interpreted these prohibitions to mean that government could not, except in specified or extraordinary circumstances, prevent individuals or corporations from freely engaging in the production and distribution of goods and services.

However, since 1936 the Supreme Court has abandoned this interpretation; economic regulations now are subject to a very low level of review pursuant to which they are upheld whenever rationally related to the achievement of legitimate state purposes. Supporters of the more recent policy conclude that as a result, the Court has wisely steered a neutral role in the nation's economic affairs. Another interpretation of this policy, however, is that it has denied many people a fundamental liberty in a society dedicated to liberty—the opportunity to engage in economic activity. Our Constitution, it is argued, was not intended to be neutral in the conflict between liberty and authority, especially in the economic area.

There is little question that the Framers of the Constitution sought to limit greatly the commercial powers of the states. The tariffs and other economic barriers erected by the states against each other were a major source of discontent with the existing confederation. The regulatory abuses of the state legislatures are not so well detailed, but probably were no less responsible for such sentiments. According to ALEXANDER HAMILTON, writing in 1801, "creditors had been ruined or in a very extensive degree, much injured, confidence in pecuniary transactions had been destroyed, and the springs of industry have been proportionately relaxed" because of the failure of the states to safeguard commercial freedoms.

The deterioration of the economy that followed the revolutionary period led the states to what CHARLES EVANS HUGHES once described as "an ignoble array of legislative schemes for the defeat of creditors and invasion of contractual relations." Among other things, the states passed stay laws extending the due dates of notes and installment laws allowing debtors to pay their obligations in installments after they had fallen due. (See Debtors' Relief Legislation.)

JOHN MARSHALL, later Chief Justice, said in Virginia's ratification convention that economy and industry were essential to happiness, but the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION took away "the incitement to industry by rendering property insecure and unprotected." The Constitution, on the contrary, would "promote and encourage industry." JAMES MADISON stated that the passage of laws infringing contractual obligations "contributed more to that uneasiness which produced the convention . . . than those which accrued . . . from the inadequacy of the Confederation to its immediate objectives." During the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 Madison said that an important object of the Union was "the necessity of providing more effectively for the security of private rights, and the steady dispensation of justice. . . . Was it to be supposed that Republican liberty could long exist under the abuses of it, practiced in [some of the] states?" ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE, Marshall's biographer, understandably concluded that the "determination of commercial and financial interests to get some plan adopted under which business could be transacted, was the most effective force that brought about [the Philadelphia convention]."

Several provisions of the Constitution appear to have been intended to curtail the economic regulatory authority of government. These are the prohibitions on the passage of EX POST FACTO laws which affect both the state and federal governments, and the ban on state laws impairing the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS. At the time the Constitution was framed and ratified, the term "ex post facto law" was applied to both penal and civil retroactive laws. In the criminal law, it was accepted that an ex post facto law was one that rendered an act punishable that was not punishable when it was committed. The term also described civil laws that operated retroactively to the detriment of a private owner of an iterest acquired or existing under prior law. Justice JOSEPH STORY of the MARSHALL COURT asserted that "every statute, which takes away or impairs VESTED RIGHTS acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability, in respect to the transactions or considerations already passed, must be deemed retrospective."

Newspapers and judges of that period considered that stay and installment laws operated ex post facto. Members of Congress used the term in the broad sense. Some leading constitutional scholars held similar views on the meaning of the clauses. Although accounts of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION do not disclose precisely how the Framers defined the term, they are consistent with the view that ex post facto included retroactive civil laws. Nevertheless, a 1798 Supreme Court decision, CALDER V. BULL, interpreted the ex post facto clauses as applying solely to penal laws, thereby removing them as an important restraint on the regulatory powers of the federal and state legislatures.

In Chief Justice Marshall's opinion, the CONTRACT CLAUSE was intended to safeguard FREEDOM OF CONTRACT—which made it, under this view, a severe curb on state economic regulation. According to the Chief Justice, if a law limited the written understanding of the parties, it impaired their contractual obligation whether it was enacted before or after execution of the agreement.

However, the Supreme Court, in a 4–3 decision in OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1827), ruled that the clause did not cover contracts executed subsequent to the adoption of a law: that is, it applied only to retroactive and not to prospective laws. The case involved a New York bankruptcy law, adopted prior to the execution of the promissory obligation in issue. In his only dissent on a constitutional issue in his thirty-four years as Chief Justice, Marshall vigorously contended that the New York law, although passed before the execution of the note, changed the understanding of the parties, and therefore impaired the obligation of their contract. The majority decision in the case followed a quarter of a century of failure to obtain a national bankruptcy law. Marshall's interpretation would have greatly limited the operation of state bankruptcy laws, and the majority rejected this outcome.

The BILL OF RIGHTS also evidences constitutional concern for material rights. The TAKINGS clause of the Fifth Amendment states that private property shall not be taken for PUBLIC USE without JUST COMPENSATION. The Fifth Amendment also states that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The SECOND AMENDMENT prohibits the confiscation of arms. The THIRD AMENDMENT restricts the quartering of troops. The FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibits unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES, and the Eighth Amendment prohibits excessive BAIL and fines.

Those who doubt that the Constitution protects the material rights from infringement by the states should consider section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, the second sentence of which reads: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States: nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law." The framers of this amendment, the Congress of 1866, were concerned about protecting property and economic liberties as well as other personal rights.

While opinion is divergent as to the full meaning of the quoted language, commentators generally agree that it was primarily intended to make constitutional the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866, placing it beyond the power of any subsequent Congress to repeal. The chief purpose of this act was to provide federal protection for the freed blacks in the exercise of certain described liberties.

The 1866 law was not confined to the protection of blacks. It was also intended to secure equality of rights for most other citizens. Thus Senator Lyman Trumbull, who wrote the original bill, viewed it as affecting state legislation generally, quoting in his introductory statement from a note to WILLIAM BLACKSTONE's commentaries: "In this definition of civil liberty it ought to be understood, or rather expressed, that the restraints introduced by the law should be equal to all, or as much as the nature of things will admit." The statute emphasized material, and not political or intellectual, considerations. It protected against discriminatory treatment the rights of most native-born citizens "to make and enforce contracts . . . and to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property."

The debates on section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment further spell out Congress's commitment to preserving the material rights. Frequently quoted in the debates was Justice BUSHROD WASHINGTON's definition in CORFIELD V. CORYELL (1823), stating that privileges and immunities included "the right to acquire and possess property of every kind." For the thirty-ninth Congress, Sir William Blackstone and Chancellor JAMES KENT were highly authoritative on the powers and purposes of government. Both strongly emphasized the importance of economic and property rights in a free society.

There should be little doubt that the values of foremost importance to the Framers of many provisions of the Constitution encompassed the protection of economic and property rights.

BERNARD H. SIEGAN
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1948 Liberty Against Government. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

MCCLOSKEY, ROBERT G. 1962 Economic Due Process and the Supreme Court. Supreme Court Review 1962:34–62.

SIEGAN, BERNARD H. 1981 Economic Liberties and the Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

——— 1984 The Economic Constitution in Historical Perspective. In Richard M. McKenzie, ed., Constitutional Economics. Pages 39–53. Lexington, Mass.: D.C. Heath.

ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY ACT
78 Stat. 580 (1964)

Moving rapidly to consolidate his control over the administration he inherited from JOHN F. KENNEDY, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON in January 1964 declared "war on poverty" and announced his aim of building a "Great Society." The Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 was the centerpiece of the Johnson program.

Building on a BROAD CONSTRUCTION of the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER, the architects of the act erected a new conception of the role of the federal government. The government was to eliminate the "culture of poverty" that kept some people in economic distress. The act established several new agencies, the most important of which was the Office of Economic Opportunity (later the Community Services Administration) within the Executive Office of the President. It also created a plethora of new programs: Job Corps, Neighborhood Youth Corps, Head Start, etcetera.

From the beginning the war on poverty faced problems, and no poor person ever benefited from it as much as the bureaucrats who ran it. Funds were targeted on the basis less of economic need than of political patronage. And simultaneous expenditure for the war on poverty and the war in Vietnam depleted the treasury and fueled runaway inflation.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

ECONOMIC REGULATION

In the field of economic policy, the composite constitutional powers of American governments—federal, state, and local—are extremely broad. Granted that governments may not implement economic policies that would violate the guarantees of the BILL OF RIGHTS or a few other constitutional limitations, within these spacious constraints there is little that governments may not do. But what they must or should do is more complex. As to macroeconomic policy, whose main instruments are monetary and fiscal, powers amount virtually to duties, for government could not function without taxing and borrowing, nor could the economy run at all smoothly if government declined to issue any money or take any steps to control its value. (See BORROWING POWER; MONETARY POWER; TAXING AND SPENDING POWER.) Just how these essential functions should be carried out is a matter of art and of debate, but few contend that the functions need not be carried out at all. However, as to microeconomic policies—those identified by usage as the substance of "economic regulation"—constitutional powers have not been regarded as inescapable duties. Although governments may intervene directly to regulate prices, wages, quality of products, and various other aspects of markets, they need not do so. Wages, for instance, have been regulated at some times but not others, in some occupations but not all, and so as to set minima but not maxima. In short, economic regulation is constitutionally optional.

Nonetheless, American governments have always practiced economic regulation, albeit in varying forms and degrees. Moreover, they have always been considered to possess broad authority to regulate, even if during a relatively short interval at the beginning of this century the federal courts invalidated a few particular forms of economic regulation without, however, casting doubt on the legitimacy of most other forms. This historically continuous practice of economic regulation shows that American governments were never dogmatically addicted to laissez-faire, notwithstanding a broad though sometimes faltering preference for private enterprise, and that the Constitution, as intended, written, and interpreted, is not a manifesto in favor of laissez-faire.

Before the CIVIL WAR, the constitutional authority of the states to carry on any and every form of economic regulation was seldom questioned. And this acceptance was not for want of regulations to question. On the contrary, state and local governments set the prices to be charged by wagoners, wood sawyers, chimneysweeps, pawnbrokers, hackney carriages, ferries, wharfs, bridges, and bakers; required licensing of auctioneers, retailers, restaurants, taverns, vendors of lottery tickets, and slaughterhouses; and inspected the quality of timber, shingles, onions, butter, nails, tobacco, salted meat and fish, and bread. This very incomplete list attests to an intention to exercise detailed control over the operation of markets, especially (though not only) those that have since been characterized as providing "public services" and those thought to be morally dubious because of association with usury, betting, intoxication, or excessive jubilation.

In the few instances before the Civil War when such regulations came before its eyes, the Supreme Court roundly affirmed their constitutional propriety, always provided (for so the issues arose) that the state's legislation did not collide with the federal commerce power. So in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) JOHN MARSHALL referred to "the acknowledged power of a state to regulate . . . its domestic trade" and to adopt "inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws . . . , and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, etc." In the LICENSE CASES (1847), ROGER B. TANEY defined the STATE POLICE POWER as "nothing more or less than the powers of . . . every sovereignty . . . to govern men and things," including commerce within its domain, powers absolute except as restrained by the Constitution. Again, in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1851) the Court upheld the constitutionality of a state law requiring ships in the port of Philadelphia to employ local pilots, and further regulating the qualifications of pilots and their fees. Only one notable judgment of the time, by the highest court of New York, seems on casual reading to cast doubt on a state's regulatory power. In WYNEHAMER V. PEOPLE (1856) that court invalidated a law prohibiting the sale, and even the possession, of hard liquor on the ground that the statute acted retroactively and thus fell afoul of the DUE PROCESS clause in the state's constitution. The Justices agreed that a PROHIBITION law framed to operate prospectively would lie entirely within the legislature's power, and the only Justice who expressed reservations about outright prohibition went on to say: "It is . . . certain that the legislature can regulate trade in property of all kinds." Long and widespread practice throughout the country confirmed that state legislatures can indeed regulate the terms and conditions not only of trade but also of PRODUCTION, as well as entry into various occupations—though courts repeatedly insisted that the states' police powers, broad though they were, must be limited by profound constitutional antipathy to arbitrary action, such as that instanced by Justice SAMUEL CHASE in CALDER V. BULL (1798): "a law that takes property from A. and gives it to B."

Nor was this broad scope of the police power curtailed by decisions following shortly after the ratification of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT in 1868. In the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) the majority of the Supreme Court upheld a Louisiana law that closed down all slaughtering inside New Orleans, confined it to a designated area outside the city, and gave a single private company the right to operate a slaughterhouse there, despite the complaint by butchers that the statute, by depriving them of part of their usual trade, violated the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES and due process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court concluded that the police power undoubtedly authorized regulation of slaughtering, and that the prohibitions imposed on the states by the amendment should not be interpreted as a limitation on reasonable exercises of the police power.

A broadly similar view prevailed in Munn v. Illinois (1877), which concerned the validity of a statute fixing the maximum charge to be levied by grain elevators in Chicago. Against the defendants' plea that the ceiling thus set on their earnings effectively deprived them of property without due process, Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE marshaled the long history of adjudication prior to 1868: "It was not supposed that statutes regulating the use, or even the price of the use, of private property necessarily deprived an owner of his property without due process of law." The word "necessarily" signaled a departure from the majority's blunt assertion in Slaughterhouse that due process should not box in the police power. Instead, the Court adopted in Munn the pared-down principle that states could, without offending against due process, regulate the prices of some kinds of business, "those AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST" or, as later usage had it, public service businesses. The tempting inference, that ordinary, "private" businesses are immune to economic regulation, though lent plausibility by some hints in the text, is not confirmed by any forthright judicial statement. (See GRANGER CASES.)

The "affectation with a public interest" DOCTRINE, though frequently invoked by courts in support of state regulation of railroads and public utilities, did not always carry the day. The first notable deviation, not only from Munn but from the longer previous tradition, took place in ALLGEYER V. LOUISIANA (1897). In question was Allgeyer's right to buy marine insurance from a New York company despite a Louisiana statute prohibiting out of state insurance companies from doing business there without a license. While conceding the state's power to regulate or even to exclude insurance companies domiciled in other states, the Court concentrated on every American citizen's privilege to pursue an "ordinary calling or trade" and, in the course of it, to make such contracts as might be useful and proper. By interfering with a person's exercise of that privilege, the Court unanimously held, Louisiana had abridged the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of liberty and property. To believe, however, as the decision's admirers and detractors alike have believed, that the Court thus read a sweeping FREEDOM OF CONTRACT into the Fourteenth Amendment, so as to equate all economic regulation with denial of due process, is to ignore a vital passage in the opinion, where RUFUS PECKHAM declared that the police power of a state "cannot extend to prohibiting a citizen from making contracts . . . outside the limits and JURISDICTION of the State, and which are also to be performed outside of such jurisdiction." Cavalier disregard of that essential qualification has made the Allgeyer opinion seem what it was not. If further evidence were needed, it was supplied by the Court's decision one year later in HOLDEN V. HARDY (1898), where the majority of seven upheld an act of Utah regulating the hours of labor in mines and smelters, without any suggestion that mines and smelters are businesses affected with a public interest, and notwithstanding considerable interference with freedom of contract.

Supposedly initiated by Allgeyer, the triumph of "economic due process" or SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS—a triumph never fully consummated—was supposedly completed by LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). Inasmuch as the Supreme Court there struck down a statute that limited the work of bakers to sixty hours a week, the decision could be so represented. But a close reading of the opinions, including the dissents, leads to the sounder conclusion that the statute was invalidated because, while purporting to be a measure for the public health, it adopted means that (in the majority's view) had no reasonable relation to that end, or alternatively because it was really an effort to interfere in the bargaining between master and employee, an effort lying outside the proper scope of the police power as constrained by the due process clause.

That the Lochner decision did not undermine economic regulation was demonstrated three years later in MULLER V. OREGON (1908), when the Supreme Court (with only one new member) upheld a restriction on hours of work of women as a reasonable means of achieving the proper end of public health, and was demonstrated again in BUNTING V. OREGON (1917), where the statute applied to men as well as women and to overtime wage rates as well as to hours. In ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923), however, the Court once again sailed closer to the Lochner tack, when it disallowed a minimum wage law. Nevertheless, despite the Lochner-Adkins line and reliance on decisions before, during, and after the brief era of laissez-faire activism, many states continued to pass and enforce laws regulating the conditions of labor as well as other economic relations, especially after the onset of the Great Depression.

The older line of interpretation, temporarily obscured but not reversed, was restored to predominance by the Supreme Court's decision in NEBBIA V. NEW YORK (1934). Here, while apparently relying on Munn v. Illinois (1877), the Court effectively reversed it by holding "that the private character of a business does not necessarily remove it from the realm of regulation of charges or prices." Indeed, the Court went on to say that it had upheld an extensive variety of economic regulations, a statement the accuracy of which it vindicated by citing some hundred PRECEDENTS that it had laid down during the three or four decades earlier. A further step toward closing the Lochner episode was taken in WEST COAST HOTEL V. PARRISH (1937); and the final (at least until the present) bit of punctuation was supplied in UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS COMPANY (1938) when the Court committed itself not to invalidate regulatory legislation unless the law's irrationality offended against due process or it otherwise contravened specific constitutional guarantees such as those in the Bill of Rights.

Meanwhile, economic regulation by the federal government had been undergoing a roughly parallel development. Substantively it was less extensive, because until about the Civil War economic activity within the several states far outweighed that which crossed the boundaries of any state, because the federal government spent less and did less than state and local governments, and not at all because the federal government was more attached than were state and local governments to laissez-faire. Ample evidence to the contrary is afforded by the protective tariffs so vigorously advocated by ALEXANDER HAMILTON and HENRY CLAY and so widely supported, by the subsidies granted to transportation facilities in the name of INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, and by close regulation of ships and sailors involved in interstate and foreign navigation. If nevertheless the federal government did little to implement the COMMERCE CLAUSE during its first century, Congress's latent constitutional power was recognized and approved. When Marshall wrote in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) that the commerce power "is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution," he prefigured later judicial pronouncements that the commerce power is effectively the NATIONAL POLICE POWER.

As might have been expected, the coexistence of two tiers of police power occasioned increasing collisions when, after the Civil War, the federal government expanded the exercise of its own power. Such collisions might have been resolved by simple-minded recourse to the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, but that solution would not have appealed strongly to judges who remembered that the professed objective of the Civil War had been, on the one side, to protect the autonomy of the states and, on the other side, to preserve a Union (rather than replace it by a unitary state). Recollections of the crisis reinforced the traditional effort to delineate clear boundaries between the domains of the states and that of the federal government.

A striking specimen of this issue arose from the increasing efforts of state governments after the Civil War to regulate railroad rates, and in particular to prohibit what many shippers regarded as iniquitous discrimination. In this instance a railroad had charged a shipper a certain amount for sending goods from one place in Illinois to

New York City while charging another shipper less for sending the same sort of goods from another place in Illinois to New York City, though the latter distance was greater than the former. This habitual practice, known as LONG-HAUL-SHORT-HAUL DISCRIMINATION, violated an Illinois statute. In WABASH, ST. LOUIS, PACIFIC RAILWAY V. ILLINOIS (1886) the Supreme Court decided that, although the Illinois courts had confined application of the statute to transportation within the state, the statute was nevertheless invalid as applied to contracts for continous transportation through several states, so "interfering with and seriously embarrassing" interstate commerce. The counterargument, that state statutes of this sort might be permitted to stand until the federal government might occupy the field, became moot when in the following year Congress passed the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT, which among other things established the first federal REGULATORY AGENCY, the Interstate Commerce Commission. For twenty-seven years thereafter, until announcement of the SHREVEPORT DOCTRINE, a relatively comfortable equilibrium recognized the exclusive power of states to regulate purely intrastate transportation and of the federal government to regulate purely interstate transportation, though controversy occasionally erupted as to whether some particular regulation by one tier of government materially spilled over into the other's domain.

Concerning enterprises other than transportation, it was harder to draw a neat line between what is a fixture within a state and what though within a state is visiting it as a bird of passage or, according to a habitual metaphor, "flowing" through it. This difficulty was manifested in UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. (1894), the Supreme Court's first ruling on the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT. It arose from a suit asking that the courts invalidate contracts by which the "Sugar Trust" had purchased four independent refineries, so achieving an almost complete monopoly of refining. Considering that the government had attacked the contracts rather than the trust itself, that the contracts concerned factories necessarily installed within a state, and that no proof had been offered to connect the contracts with a scheme to restrain interstate commerce, the Court held that the contracts were not reached by the Sherman Act; as so construed, the act was valid. In dissent, Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN objected that the nub of the case was not the sugar trust's acquisition of the four refineries but its monopolization of interstate commerce. One may suppose that, contrary to Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER's pronouncement that "commerce succeeds to manufacture," Harlan would have preferred to say that manufacture, when ancillary to interstate commerce, falls within federal legislative power.

Similar partitioning of state and federal domains persisted in most such decisions down to 1936, accompanied by judicial reminders that if the reach of the commerce power were excessively widened, the states would be rendered economically otiose. So in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) the Supreme Court, while agreeing that the working hours of children in mines and factories should be regulated (and in fact was regulated by every state), invalidated a federal child labor law on the ground that it would disturb the desirably "harmonious" balance between the police power and the commerce power. Similarly, when ruling in Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States (1935) that poultry slaughterers in New York City could not be reached by federal regulation, Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES wrote: "If the commerce clause were construed to reach all enterprises and transactions which could be said to have an indirect effect upon interstate commerce, the Federal authority would embrace practically all the activities of the people and all the authority of the State over its domestic concerns would exist only by sufferance of the Federal Government."

That traditional view was substantially revised by National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation (1937), decided while President Franklin D. Roosevelt's Court reorganization plan was being vigorously debated. Technically the turn hinged on the Court's finding that the defendant company, besides owning steel mills and mines, owned and operated interstate railroads and water carriers and sales offices throughout the country; as the company was "a completely integrated enterprise," one in which manufacture and commerce might be said to have been completely unified, its relations with labor unions in its steelworks and mines as well as in its railroads and water carriers were properly subject to federal regulation. On a narrow view, the Court continued to adhere to the principle that state and federal regulation must coexist—as the Court took trouble to emphasize in UNITED STATES V. DARBY LUMBER COMPANY (1941)—and merely found federal power applicable to "national" firms; on a broader view the Court had considerably shifted the dividing line. The virtual obliteration of the line was confirmed by WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942), where the Court upheld federal regulation of wheat farming, by reinterpreting production as well as consumption on the farm, previously understood to be inherently local, as ingredients of an "economic market" which, being national and indeed international, was properly subject to federal regulation.

Rash though it may be to suppose that one can identify historical patterns, it might nevertheless be ventured that economic regulation by the states was never impeded by laissez-faire nor, except briefly and partially, by the doctrine of substantive due process, and that economic regulation by the federal government has expanded, generally though unsteadily, as a proportion of the whole. This summary, assuming it to be accurate, does not of course endorse the logical rigor of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION that underlay those tendencies, nor does it prejudge their political desirability. Those who see private enterprise as self-serving and chaotic conclude that extensive economic regulation is a condition of social welfare; whereas minimalists maintain that economic regulation is desirable only in the event of market failure, that is, only in relation to enterprises that give rise to oppressive externalities or to industries that are natural monopolies. The Constitution provides ample scope for the former view but imposes no restrictions corresponding to the latter view. Despite some indications of "deregulation" in legislation and adjudication since 1960, it would be foolhardy to predict whether economic regulation will diminish or increase during the future.

WILLIAM LETWIN
(1986)

Bibliography

HALE, ROBERT L. 1952 Freedom Through Law: Public Control of Private Governing Power. New York: Columbia University Press.

HAMMOND, BRAY 1957 Banks and Politics in America from the Revolution to the Civil War. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

HANDLIN, OSCAR 1947 Commonwealth: A Study of the Role of Government in the American Economy. New York: Oxford University Press.

KOONTZ, HAROLD and GABLE, RICHARD W. 1956 Public Control of Economic Enterprise. New York: McGraw-Hill.

LETWIN, WILLIAM 1965 Law and Economic Policy in America: The Evolution of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

LIEBHOFSKY, H. H. 1971 American Government and Business. New York: Wiley.

MORRIS, RICHARD B. 1946 Government and Labor in Early America. New York: Columbia University Press.

WILSON, JAMES Q., ed. 1980 The Politics of Regulation. New York: Basic Books.

ECONOMIC REGULATION
(Update)

The term "economic regulation" has no clearly defined meaning. In its narrowest sense, it is probably limited to government control of prices, outputs, and market entry. At one time, such regulation was widespread, covering major industries such as transportation, energy, telecommunications, and agriculture. Beginning in the mid-1970s, however, such traditional forms of government regulation have been in retreat, and "deregulation" has been the watchword. Since the 1930s, constitutional law has been thought to place little restriction on these traditional forms of economic regulation. Even less constitutional guidance has been found relating to deregulation.

In the meantime, business activities have been subjected to new federal forms of regulation governing EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION, worker safety, pollution, and other "social" issues. We might more broadly define economic regulation, then, as government regulation of activities relating to market transactions, actual or potential. Given this very broad subject matter, it is obvious that in specific cases economic regulations might happen to implicate all manner of constitutional DOCTRINES. Thus, in some sense, the constitutional topic of "economic regulation" is indeed a broad one.

Yet, the fact that some constitutional rule may happen to apply to an economic activity as well as to noneconomic activities is of no particular interest. Rather, the interesting question is the distinctive constitutional status of economic regulation. In other words, we need to ask when the government's power is either increased or decreased by virtue of the fact that the regulated activity is connected with the marketplace.

Although this distinction does not play a central role in current doctrine, the Supreme Court does sometimes give distinctive treatment to regulation of economic activities. A familiar example is the COMMERCIAL SPEECH doctrine, which provides a lower protection for speech that is integrally related to market transactions. Two recent cases from other areas of constitutional law also provide illustrations that the marketplace nexus retains significance in constitutional analysis.

The first example is UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995). López involved a federal statute that criminalized possession of firearms in school zones. The Court held, for the first time since the NEW DEAL, that a federal regulation of private activity exceeded congressional power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. What is most notable for present purposes, however, is the Court's care to distinguish the case from PRECEDENTS involving economic regulation. For instance, the Court observed that even WICKARD V. FILBURN (1942) (which the Court called "perhaps the most far reaching example of commerce clause authority over intrastate activity"), "involved economic activity in a way that the possession of a gun in a school zone does not." In contrast, the statute before the Court had "nothing to do with 'commerce' or any sort of economic enterprise, however broadly one might define those terms." Nor was it "an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated." Hence, the firearms statute could not be sustained "under our cases upholding regulations of activities that arise out of or are connected with a commercial transaction, which viewed in the aggregate, substantially affects interstate commerce."

Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY's CONCURRING OPINION (joined by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR), also stressed the distinction between congressional power over economic and noneconomic activity. He felt bound by precedent to recognize "congressional power to regulate transactions of a commercial nature." Hence, he argued, the Court was foreclosed "from reverting to an understanding of commerce that would serve only an eighteenth-century economy"; precedent also precluded "returning to the time when congressional activity was limited by a judicial determination that those matters had an insufficient connection to an interstate system." In short, he said, "Congress can regulate in the commercial sphere on the assumption that we have a single market and a unified purpose to build a stable national economy."

Although governmental authority to restrict economic activity is broad, it is not unlimited. That is the teaching of LUCAS V. SOUTH CAROLINA COASTAL COUNCIL (1992). Lucas involved a state regulation that, as construed by the lower courts, completely eliminated the economic value of certain beachfront land. With narrow exceptions, the Court held, a regulation must be considered a TAKING OF PROPERTY if it "denies all economically beneficial or productive use of land." Note that it is only economically beneficial uses that are protected; that is, only the ways in which the land or its product might enter into some market transaction. The Court found "the notion . . . that title is somehow held subject to the 'implied limitation' that the State may subsequently eliminate all economically valuable use is inconsistent with the historical compact recorded in the Takings Clause that has become part of our constitutional culture." But Lucas, assuming it would continue to receive the support of a majority today, is a narrow holding, applying only to direct regulations of land (as opposed to personal PROPERTY) that destroy 100 percent of its economic value. The holdings in other recent takings cases are also quite narrow. Land is protected from economic regulation, but apparently only in extreme cases.

In short, the commercial sphere continues to be subject to nearly plenary regulation. (Contrast the much broader protection given to the "noneconomic" spheres of politics, media, religion, and family.) FEDERALISM plays little role in restraining national LEGISLATION of commercial activities, and the right to enter into such activities receives special protection only in the case of extreme restrictions on land use. Thus, despite its critics, the post– New Deal distinction between personal and economic rights seems largely intact.

DANIEL A. FARBER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Economic Due Process; Economic Liberties; Interstate Commerce; Property Rights; State Regulation of Commerce.)

Bibliography

FARBER, DANIEL A.; ESKDRIGE, WILLIAM N., JR.; and FRICKEY, PHILIP P. 1998 Constitutional Law: Themes for the Constitution's Third Century, 2nd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Group.

LAZARUS, RICHARD 1997 Counting Votes and Discounting Holdings in the Supreme Court's Taking Cases. William and Mary Law Review 38:1099.

LESSIG, LAWRENCE 1995 Translating Federalism: United States v. López. Supreme Court Review 1995:125–215.

ECONOMICS OF AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

The Supreme Court has mandated that government AFFIRMATIVE ACTION plans must serve some COMPELLING STATE INTEREST and must be narrowly tailored to further this interest. Economics doesn't have much to say about whether, say, remedying RACIAL DISCRIMINATION is a compelling interest, but the tools of economics can shed light on what types of affirmative action programs satisfy the narrow tailoring requirement (or LEAST RESTRICTIVE MEANS TEST). Economic analysis suggests that the most narrowly tailored affirmative action program (1) will be racially explicit (rather than the Court's current preference for "race neutral means to increase minority participation"); (2) will use a sliding scale of credits in which the size of the racial preferences declines with minority participation; and (3) may at times create "quasi-quotas" that effectively ensure a participation floor for minorities.

The idea that a remedy needs to be tailored to further the government's legitimate interest is captured in part by the unexceptional idea that remedial classifications should not be too overinclusive or underinclusive. The Court, for example, in RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J.A. CROSON CO. (1989) was particularly concerned about the problem of overinclusion; that is, giving affirmative action preferences to people (such as Aleuts) who were not injured by past discrimination in a particular jurisdiction. However, the same opinion also expressed a strong preference for the "the use of race-neutral means to increase minority business participation." This preference for "race-neutral means"—such as general subsidies for small entrepreneurs—necessarily conflicts with the Court's aversion to overly inclusive programs. If preferring the minuscule number of Aleuts in Richmond is "grossly overinclusive," then extending preferences to a much larger class of whites—as would race-neutral subsidies—a fortiori would fail the narrow tailoring requirement. Narrowly tailoring the beneficiary class for remedial subsidies so that it will not be overinclusive necessitates explicit racial classifications.

Clearly, the Court has something more in mind by narrow tailoring than a mere insistence on not too much over- or underinclusion. Indeed, the Court's decisions suggest that narrow tailoring may also require that racial preferences not unduly burden nonminorities. Government decisionmakers are constitutionally required to remedy discrimination using the least restrictive alternative. Here, too, economic analysis can be of help—especially in evaluating the relative costs (burdens to minorities) and benefits (remedying racial discrimination) of different affirmative action programs. Narrow tailoring implies a sensitivity to the contours and scope of racial preferences and economic analysis is especially attuned to analyzing effects on the margin.

Simple economics suggests that the Court's antipathy for quotas is overstated. Quotas may be more narrowly tailored to achieve the government's remedial interest than many other types of racial preferences. While quotas are imperfectly tailored because they mandate an inflexible level of minority participation, bidding credits (and other preferences) may be poorly tailored because they induce too much uncertainty and volatility in minority participation.

The question of whether affirmative action racial preferences should be implemented with quotas or credits is similar to the more general question of whether laws should take the form of quantity or price regulation. Economists such as Martin Weitzman and Robert Cooter have suggested circumstances where either type of regulation might be the most efficient. Applied to the question of affirmative action, these models suggest that more narrowly tailored programs will exhibit a "sliding scale" of racial preferences in which the size of the preference will vary inversely with the degree of successful minority participation in the program. Under a narrowly tailored program, the farther minority participation falls below what it would be in the absence of discrimination, the larger the racial preference government might legitimately confer.

Sliding-scale preferences may come close to setting aside a minimum quota of contracts for minority bidders, but such quasi-quotas (for fractions of the legitimate remedial goal) are consistent with narrow tailoring when dramatic shortfalls in minority participation would undermine the government's remedial effort. For example, in an industry where the government has a legitimate interest in increasing minority participation to 30 percent (the fair estimate of what it would have been absent discrimination), the government might find that allowing minority participation to fall below 5 percent would affect the long-term viability of all minority business. Under such circumstances, the government might be justified under the narrow tailoring principle in granting substantial bidding credits for 5 percent of government contracts, effectively guaranteeing that at least 5 percent will go to minorities.

Quasi-quotas can be defended as narrowly tailored remedies because they cause decisionmakers to internalize the true social costs of dramatic shortfalls in minority participation. The problem with simple (invariant) bidding credits is that the participation of minorities may fluctuate in ways that are inconsistent with narrow tailoring of the preferences to the government's underlying remedial interest. Quasi-quotas for a fraction of the overall remedial goal dampen this potential damaging fluctuation. And because the quasi-quota would only set aside a fraction of the government's legitimate remedial goal, it would impose a smaller burden on the interests of nonbeneficiaries. Finally, granting minority enterprises guarantees of minimum participation can increase the quality of minority participants—so as to reduce the long-term disparity between minority and nonminority recipients.

Economics also suggests that sometimes government can remedy private discrimination without unduly burdening nonminorities. Government racial preferences in procurement, for example, can counteract private underutilization in the same market without unduly burdening nonminority firms who are by hypothesis overutilized in the overall market because of their race.

IAN AYRES
(2000)

Bibliography

AYRES, IAN 1996 Narrow Tailoring. UCLA Law Review 43: 1781–1838.

AYRES, IAN and VARS, FREDERICK E. 1998 When Does Private Discrimination Justify Public Affirmative Action? Columbia Law Review 1998:1577–1641.

COOTER, ROBERT 1984 Prices and Sanctions. Columbia Law Review 84:1523–1560.

ECONOMIC STABILIZATION ACT
84 Stat. 799 (1970)

This measure authorized the most comprehensive peacetime ECONOMIC REGULATION in American history. The act extended a temporary sweeping DELEGATION OF POWER which authorized the President "to issue such orders and regulations as he may deem appropriate to stabilize prices, rents, wages, and salaries at levels not less than those prevailing on May 25, 1970." It authorized federal courts to issue INJUNCTIONS to enforce the presidential orders and mandated a $5,000 penalty for violation. A Democratic Congress passed the act at a time of persistent inflation; Republicans charged it was an election-year ploy attacking President RICHARD M. NIXON for failure to curtail rising unemployment, high interest rates, and a balance of payments deficit.

Nixon signed the measure but indicated he would have preferred to veto it and had no intention of using its authority. He opposed committing vast regulatory power to presidential discretion; if Congress favored controls, he said, it should "face up to its responsibilities and make such controls mandatory." One year later, amid growing disapproval of his economic policies, Nixon used the act to impose a ninety-day freeze on wages, prices, and rents. The President twice requested and received congressional extension as "in the public interest." The act was allowed to expire in 1974.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

SILK, LEONARD 1973 Nixonomics. New York: Praeger.

ECONOMY

The United States Constitution is much more than the formal document ratified in 1789. It is the preeminent symbol of the American preference for continuity over radical change, a collection of myths that provides a common faith, and a complicated dialogue between written and unwritten rules of law. As such it reflects and embodies many of the conflicting values at the core of American culture. The law itself, as an extended commentary on the Constitution, has perpetuated many of those conflicts by seeking to balance essentially irreconcilable objectives. It has always attempted, with mixed success, to reconcile elitism and democracy, individual opportunity and community, enterprise and equity, growth and stability, competition and cooperation, and freedom and responsibility. Moreover, it has both liberated and encouraged economic growth even as it has tried to make economic institutions responsible and accountable.

The Constitution's Framers could not anticipate the dramatic changes that occurred in the United States during the first half of the nineteenth century. After all, they drafted the document to serve an economy in which most farmers practiced subsistence agriculture and in which factories were rare, transportation limited, banking and credit primitive, and business transactions simple and direct. Nevertheless, the Constitution provided a congenial legal environment during the first phase of industrialization. The rapid expansion of the nation in size and population was an inherently decentralizing force, as the Supreme Court recognized when it began to interpret the COMMERCE CLAUSE and the CONTRACT CLAUSE. The Court might have defined constitutional power over the economy in several ways. For example, in explaining the meaning of the commerce clause, it might have prohibited the states from enacting any statutes regarding interstate trade. It might also have ruled that state laws could coexist with federal laws in the absence of direct conflict between the two or that the states could legislate only until Congress decided to address the same subject. But in an age when the fear of centralized power was all-pervasive, particularly in the South, the Court's decisions were inevitably compromises. Although the Court prohibited states from taxing the federal government, blocked them from limiting or excusing debts, denied their right to violate corporate charters, banned them from directly interfering with INTERSTATE COMMERCE, confirmed the sanctity of contracts between individuals in two or more states, and granted CORPORATIONS perpetual existence—all important prerequisites to the establishment of national markets—it left the states plenty of responsibilities. They could charter, license, and regulate businesses, and they could regulate working conditions. And because the Constitution provided for a government of ENUMERATED POWERS, leaving a broad economic arena to the states under the TENTH AMENDMENT, the relationship between federal and state law hinged on the assumption that state statutes were constitutional unless prohibited by the Constitution or preempted by Congress.

In short, even JOHN MARSHALL's most nationalistic decisions reinforced the idea of separate realms of power with separate responsibilities. The Supreme Court's commentary on economic powers did not end with its early decisions regarding the commerce and the contract clauses. Following the depression of 1837, the Court formally recognized a general federal commercial law and a national credit system protected by "impartial" federal courts. That business law provided national rules for the marketplace, but did not entirely displace state rules. Hence, corporations could "forum shop" for the laws, state or federal, best suited to their needs. Then, at the end of the century, the I. M. Singer Company and the Big Four meat-packing firms persuaded the Court to strike down state licensing and tax laws designed to exclude the products of out-of-state corporations. By doing so, the Court may have played an even more important part in creating a continental market than did the railroads.

During the nineteenth century the Constitution was defined as much by the inaction of Congress as by the actions of the Supreme Court. Preoccupied as it was with a host of thorny sectional issues, Congress refused to intervene in new questions concerning the relative powers of the states and the federal government. For example, although the Constitution granted the power to coin money to the national government, Congress did not authorize the issuance of national bank notes until the CIVIL WAR. In the meantime, state-chartered commercial banks issued debt instruments that doubled as the nation's currency. Equally significant, Congress used the central government's power to issue corporate charters, which Marshall had read into the Constitution in 1819, only to create national banks and to encourage a few land-grant railroads. Congress might have used the commerce power to license bridges and highways—a logical extension of the power over interstate trade—but transportation decisions were left almost entirely to the states and to private enterprise. Moreover, although the Constitution permitted Congress to enact uniform BANKRUPTCY laws, Congress used that power seldom and reluctantly, leaving the states to pass extensive debtor legislation.

By failing to limit the states' powers in most economic spheres, the Constitution indirectly encouraged legal experimentation and innovation. So did the structure of government mandated by the Constitution. The tendency of FEDERALISM to disperse power to the local level reinforced the dependence of Americans on quasi-governmental associations, such as commercial federations, civic organizations, and booster clubs—organizations that often served as better forums for collective action than did formal institutions of government. Given the decentralized nature of the pre-Civil War political system and the lack of major ideological differences between the POLITICAL PARTIES, the controversies over tariffs, banks, and internal improvements reflected localism and particularism more than STATES' RIGHTS. Not only did federalism institutionalize the nation's centrifugal, localistic impulses; it also reinforced the American tendency to view economic conflicts in constitutional and legal terms, and it reduced tension among competing economic groups by providing a variety of jurisdictions in which to fight for their objectives.

By barring certain acts, the Constitution encouraged the states to expand powers indisputably their own, especially their POLICE POWERS over private property. For example, had the EMINENT DOMAIN power not been granted to private companies, the construction of bridges, turnpikes, canals, and railroads—and industrial development in general—would have been impeded. Individual property owners could be recalcitrant. Railroads needed to acquire broad ribbons of land; without the state's power of condemnation, the property had to be purchased at great expense on the open market. In 1807 the Schuylkill and Susquehanna Navigation Company failed to complete its canal because of the high prices it had to pay for land and water rights.

But under the new eminent domain statutes, which spread throughout the nation after the 1830s, indirect damages were not subject to compensation, and benefits to property not taken—such as any appreciation in property values—could be deducted from required compensation. Those were important subsidies to public works. The courts also limited the liability of transportation companies for injuries to workers, and the legislatures enacted new laws relaxing penalties for usury and debt.

The transformation of law was linked to the emergence of the business corporation, which tapped a vast pool of small investors, permitted them to transfer and withdraw their funds quickly, spread the risk of investment, and limited their liability. But the railroads grew so fast and became so powerful that by the 1870s and 1880s the promotion of capital investment had given way to demands for regulation in many parts of the nation.

Regulation has served many purposes, including the disclosure of illicit activities, the restraint of monopolies and oligopolies, fact gathering, the protection of industries from harmful competition, publicizing the problems of various businesses, and coordinating business activities. It has also served more ritualistic, almost mythic, purposes consistent with the dictates of CONSTITUTIONALISM. For example, it has maintained the illusion of accountability, the notion that the economy works in rational ways subject to public control. It has also perpetuated the idea that there is a "public interest," not just a multitude of special interests competing for preference in an open market. And it has formally acknowledged free competition, one of the most cherished American values. The classical model of free competition was valued not only because it promoted economic efficiency or even provided maximum individual opportunity but also because it built character and mollified some of the antisocial elements in unrestrained individualism.

The promotion of businesses by the state—such as providing exclusive charters, tax exemptions, land, or capital—had always implied a right to regulate those businesses. That right had been freely admitted, at least by businesses that served the public, such as canals and railroads. But by the end of the nineteenth century, corporations tried to free themselves from restrictions—except when restrictions served their interests. State and federal courts aided them in many ways, such as by limiting the state police powers, exalting freedom of the courts, and devising SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS to limit the power of Congress and the state legislatures. Because many congressional leaders shared the assumptions of the Supreme Court's conservative majority, Congress failed to provide the basic ground rules needed for effective antitrust actions. It did not, and probably could not, define what size business should be. Those who supported antitrust actions were not well armed with evidence concerning the potential impact of that policy on income distribution, on the concentration of wealth, on the efficiency of production, and on a host of related matters.

The American respect for private property and the RULE OF LAW, as well as the inability of Congress and the legislatures to decide how big was too big and what constituted "unfair" business practices, made regulation all the more difficult. The SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT (1890) failed more for this reason than because of opposition from the courts or the power of special interests. Not surprisingly, the regulatory commission became the favored alternative not just to antitrust prosecutions but also to using taxation, federal incorporation, or NATIONAL POLICE POWER to discipline the economy. The Interstate Commerce Commission, created in 1887, set the legalistic precedent of case-by-case regulation, and that approach blended well with the faith of many Progressive politicians in panels of experts working through a process relatively immune from political influence. Many reformers favored regulatory commissions because they considered the political process clumsy and easily corrupted. They also assumed that men of good will could compromise or reconcile their differences if they could find reliable facts and that fact-finding was a job for experts.

At the federal level, the regulatory commission was a child of the Progressive Era, but the number of commissions proliferated during the 1930s with the establishment of the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Bonneville Power Authority, the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), and the multitude of National Recovery Administration code boards. The SEC brought credibility and order to the securities industry largely because the agency's first chairman, James M. Landis, recognized the value of close relations with the stock industry. For example, the SEC provided "advance opinions" in response to specific regulatory questions, a dramatic departure from the formal adjudicatory procedures followed by both the ICC and the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). Yet, despite the number and influence of the NEW DEAL commissions, they did little to change the shape of industrial America. Instead, they showed the limits of commission-style regulation. The reform movement of the 1930s included many competing visions: a cartelized industrial order regulated by business leaders through trade associations; a sink-or-swim free market economy; a corporate state in which government provided both centralized planning and a forum where different interest groups could resolve their differences; and the older Progressive ideal of government as a referee, intervening only to insure that participants followed the rules. The regulatory commission had become a cheap alternative to structural reform.

After WORLD WAR II, regulatory commissions faced increasing criticism. Some critics charged that the commissions were elitist and undemocratic: by combining executive, legislative, and judicial functions in appointive bodies, the agencies constituted a "fourth branch of government" that was clandestine, remote, and capricious. Other critics insisted that over time regulatory boards became narcissistic and bureaucratized as the reform impulse suffocated under crushing caseloads and the staggering range of trivial detail encountered in day-to-day deliberations. Others complained that commissions were not independent enough, that they were too subject to political interference, such as being staffed by political hacks and cronies unsympathetic to regulation. Still another criticism was that commissions were easily "captured" by those they regulated, either through direct means or through the subtle process by which the regulator gradually came to speak the same language and to hold the same economic philosophy as the regulated. Finally, many politicians and academics charged that commissions were grossly inefficient, a judgment hard to dispute when cases brought before the Civil Aeronautics Board and the FTC often took years to settle.

Two things happened in the postwar period. First, the old constitutional goal of balancing public and private, individual acquisitiveness and the common welfare, and stability and growth seemed anachronistic—perhaps even faintly absurd—to many Americans who had come of age in the RONALD REAGAN era. And second, to most Americans the size of a business became far less important than its sense of social responsibility. During the 1960s and 1970s, Americans discovered the dangers of DDT, phosphates in laundry detergents, propellants in aerosol cans, lead-based paints, nuclear power, radioactive wastes, chemical dumps, oil spills, saccharin, Pintos, Corvairs, Volkswagens, and dozens of other staples of modern industrial society. Economic regulation gave way to social and environmental regulation as the Environmental Protection Agency (1970), the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission (1970), the Consumer Product Safety Commission (1972), the Mining Enforcement and Safety Administration (1973), the Office of Strip Mining Regulation and Enforcement (1977), and a host of other agencies demonstrated their popularity. In 1981 the EPA alone had more employees than the ICC, FTC, SEC, and Federal Power Commission, even though the youngest of those four had been around for nearly fifty years and the oldest for almost a hundred. Moreover, while "con sumers" had little affect on New Deal regulatory policies, the Sierra Club, the National Audubon Society, Common Cause, and many other citizen groups gave the public far greater influence over the new regulation.

Over time, the law has been far more successful in its quest to encourage economic growth than in its representation of interests outside the marketplace. The Framers faced many difficult problems, none more vexing than how to elevate basic principles of law above the push and pull of day-to-day politics without rendering those principles blind to new economic needs. Of necessity, the Constitution transcended time and place. To ensure that the law would be responsive yet responsible, two choices were made: vast economic power was granted to state and local governments to decide their economic futures, and the courts and stand-in regulatory commissions were left to resolve most conflicts. Promotion and regulation were clearly complementary, and they often pulled in the same direction, but the balance inherent in the nineteenth-century law was impossible to maintain.

DONALD J. PISANI
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution; Federal Trade Commission Act; Interstate Commerce Act; Preemption; Progressive Constitutional Thought; Progressivism; Property Rights; Regulatory Agencies; Securities Law.)

Bibliography

FRIEDMAN, LAWRENCE M. 1985 A History of American Law. New York: Simon and Schuster.

——— and SCHEIBER, HARRY N., eds. 1988 American Law and the Constitutional Order: Historical Perspectives. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

HALL, KERMIT L. 1989 The Magic Mirror: Law in American History. New York: Oxford University Press.

PISANI, DONALD J. 1987 Promotion and Regulation: Constitutionalism and the American Economy. Journal of American History 74:740–768.

EDELMAN v. JORDAN
415 U.S. 651 (1974)

This decision defines states' ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity from suit in federal court. Plaintiffs, alleging that Illinois welfare officials were unconstitutionally administering a welfare program financed by state and federal funds, sought the payments wrongfully withheld. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, held the Eleventh Amendment to bar the request for retroactive relief but suggested that, as in EX PARTE YOUNG (1908), the Eleventh Amendment would not bar relief requiring the state to pay the costs of future constitutional compliance. In MILLIKEN V. BRADLEY (1977), the Court reconfirmed Edelman by requiring a state to pay the costs of future constitutional compliance.

Edelman also developed the principles regulating Congress's power to modify the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity. First, limiting earlier holdings such as Parden v. Terminal Railway (1964), Edelman held that mere participation by a state in a federal welfare program does not constitute a waiver of the state's Eleventh Amendment protection. It thus confirmed the narrow approach to waiver signaled by Employees v. Department of Public Health and Welfare (1973). Second, despite Congress's power to abrogate states' Eleventh Amendment immunity, Edelman stated that actions brought under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, are limited by the Eleventh Amendment. At the time, the state's protection from section 1983 actions seemed to stem from the Court's holding in MONROE V. PAPE (1961) that Congress had not meant to render cities liable under section 1983. With the overruling of that portion of Monroe in MONELL V. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1978), the question whether section 1983 abrogated the states' Eleventh Amendment immunities reemerged. In QUERN V. JORDAN (1979), a sequel to Edelman, the Court held that section 1983 was not meant to abrogate the states' Eleventh Amendment protection.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1972 (TITLE IX)
86 Stat. 373

Title VI of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 prohibits discrimination on the ground of race, color, or national origin in programs receiving federal financial assistance. Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 extends Title VI's ban to discrimination on the basis of sex in federally assisted education programs. Title IX excludes from its coverage fraternities, sororities, Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, and similar organizations, and scholarships awarded to beauty contest winners; the act does not require sexually integrated living facilities. Title IX instructs federal departments to implement its provisions through rules or regulations and authorizes termination of funding in cases of noncompliance.

Title IX has played a major role in increasing female athletic opportunities at educational institutions, and North Haven Board of Education v. Bell (1982) held that Title IX could reach sexually discriminatory employment practices. In Cannon v. University of Chicago (1979) the Supreme Court held that Title IX may be enforced through private civil actions. (See SEX DISCRIMINATION.)

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

DORSEN, NORMAN et al. 1979 Emerson, Haber and Dorsen's Political and Civil Rights in the United States, 4th ed. Vol. II: 771–774, 883–893. Boston: Little, Brown.

EDUCATION AND THE CONSTITUTION

Basic to any discussion of the role of courts in educational decision making is the primacy of education in American ideology. Americans believe that education is central to the realization of a truly democratic and egalitarian society. It is through education that the skills necessary to exercise the responsibilities of citizenship and to benefit from the opportunities of a free economy will be imparted, no matter how recently arrived or previously disadvantaged the individual. Thus courts are concerned with protecting access to education. Moreover, since decision making by those charged with the administration of public education is seen as one of the most significant areas of law in terms of its effects on the lives of individuals and groups in our society, courts are inevitably drawn into reviewing the legitimacy of those decisions.

Education is primarily a state function in large part delegated to local school districts; the federal government has no direct constitutional responsibility for education. Nevertheless, Congress has enacted laws providing FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID to state and local educational agencies, as well as laws protecting the CIVIL RIGHTS of various categories of students. The constitutional authority for these statutes and their implementing regulations comes from Article I, section 8, clause 1, of the Constitution—the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER—which has been interpreted to permit Congress to attach conditions to the receipt of federal funds. Constitutional authority for congressional civil rights mandates governing educational institutions may also lie in section 5 of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In the absence of federal legislation, are there constitutional constraints on the extent to which school authorities can control education and regulate the lives of students and teachers? Conversely, do students and teachers have the same constitutional rights as all citizens in our society, or are these rights limited within the school environment? The courts have acknowledged the importance of education to our democratic society and the importance of schools in preserving and transmitting the values—social, moral, or political—on which our society rests. The challenge is to inculcate those values without stifling the exercise of the freedom of expression, the freedom of religion, and other constitutional rights.

Until the middle of the twentieth century, education was almost the sole prerogative of school administrators and local boards of education. There were few legal constraints on school authorities and even fewer legal entitlements for teachers and students. Today various competing groups and individuals seek to control educational decision making—school boards, school administrators, teachers, parents, students, community leaders, minority groups, and federal and state agencies. Their struggles for control have often ended up in the courts. Since BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), the Supreme Court has decided cases involving nearly every major area of educational policy.

Whether states may constitutionally compel all children to be educated in state-run schools was resolved by the Supreme Court in PIERCE V. SOCIETY OF SISTERS (1925), which held that while the state may compel all children to obtain schooling, parents have a constitutional right to choose between public and private schools. Nearly fifty years after Pierce, however, the Court held that there are certain constitutional interests of parents and children that may outweigh the state's interest in compelling children to attend school. The Court, in WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972), emphasized that parental direction of the religious upbringing of their children is an important interest to be protected. Although education is important to our democratic society, the interest of the state in compelling two more years of education beyond the eighth grade was outweighed by the burden on the RELIGIOUS LIBERTY of Amish parents. Only the dissent discussed the possibility that the child's interest might differ from that of the parent. In this perspective, Yoder seems not so much a case about the rights of children as a contest between parents and state over the power to inculcate values.

The state has a much greater role to play in selecting the curriculum and regulating what is taught in its own schools than it does in private schools. Education necessarily involves the process of selection; it also requires some degree of order to carry out the educational mission. However, as the Supreme Court noted in TINKER V. DES MOINES INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT (1969), students (and teachers) do not "shed their constitutional rights . . . at the schoolhouse gate." Nevertheless, these rights may be circumscribed because of the "special characteristics of the school environment." The constitutional claims made on the courts with regard to schooling have been directed principally toward the protection of individual freedom and the attainment of equality. In the first instance, the countervailing factors are the stability and order of the educational enterprise; in the second instance, they center on differing conceptions of equality and the extent to which the educational enterprise is constitutionally obligated to respond to the equity-based claims of various groups absent a showing of intentional discrimination.

There has been much litigation regarding constitutional limitations on the inculcation of religious, political, and moral values in the public schools. The principal cases resolving the question of the proper place of RELIGION IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS were decided in the early 1960s. In ENGEL V. VITALE (1962) the Supreme Court held that a nondenominational prayer written by the New York Board of Regents for use in the public schools violated the FIRST AMENDMENT's prohibition of an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. A year later, in ABINGTON SCHOOL DISTRICT V. SCHEMPP (1963), the Court struck down the practice of reading verses from the Bible and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer in public schools, holding that the state's obligation to be neutral with regard to religion forbids it to conduct a religious service even with the consent of the majority of those affected. Justice TOM C. CLARK was careful, however, to distinguish between the study of religion or of the Bible "when presented objectively as part of a secular program of education" and religious exercises. In Stone v. Graham (1980), the Court held unconstitutional a Kentucky law that required that the Ten Commandments be posted on the walls of public school classrooms. The Court indicated, however, that the case would be different if the Ten Commandments were integrated into the school's curriculum, where the Bible could be studied as history, ethics, or comparative religion.

Although the extent to which religious socialization can be undertaken by school authorities has been sharply limited by the courts, the constitutional limits on political and moral socialization are less clear. West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette acknowledged the right of school authorities to attempt to foster patriotism in the schools, but held that the Constitution protects the right of nonparticipation in a patriotic ritual that, in effect, coerces an expression of belief. So too, the First Amendment appears to prevent the editing out of particular ideas with a view to prescribing orthodoxy in politics, religion, or other matters of opinion, but the removal of books and curricular materials from the school library may be permitted when it is done for educational reasons. In so holding, the PLURALITY OPINION in BOARD OF EDUCATION V. PICO (1982) recognized a limited right of students to receive information, at least in the context of removal of books from a school library, that was protected by the First Amendment.

The reverse side of the coin involves the extent to which parents have a constitutional right to exempt their children from being socialized by public schools to values to which they object. Absent a clear establishment clause claim, it is unlikely that parents can demand, on moral or philosophical grounds, that certain books or courses be excluded from the public school curriculum approved by school authorities. And absent a clear free exercise claim, it is also unlikely that parents can exempt their children from courses to which they may object, particularly as Pierce protects the option of sending their children to private schools if they disagree with the values being taught in the public school.

To what extent does the Constitution protect the right of free expression of students and teachers in the school environment? Complete freedom of expression is inconsistent with the schooling enterprise, which requires order and control. In Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969) the Court said that although an "undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance is not enough to overcome the right to freedom of expression," school officials could limit expression if they showed that "the forbidden conduct would "materially and substantially interfere with the requirements of appropriate discipline in the operation of the school."

With regard to First Amendment protection for student organizations, the Supreme Court, in Healy v. James (1972), held that "associational activities need not be tolerated where they infringe reasonable campus rules, interrupt classes, or substantially interfere with the opportunity of other students to obtain an education." Nevertheless, because the denial of recognition of a student organization is a form of prior restraint, school authorities have a heavy burden of proving the likelihood of disruption. Although the college in the Healy case had denied Students for a Democratic Society access to campus facilities, various other student organizations were permitted such access. Thus, Healy might be read as concerned with equal treatment—that is, if a college generally permits student organizations access to its facilities, although it could exclude all such organizations, it may not exclude an organization based on the political or social views it espouses. (See also WIDMAR V. VINCENT, 1981.)

May a teacher's right of expression be restricted in light of the special demands of the school environment? This question arises in a variety of contexts. Is the right of the teacher as citizen to free expression circumscribed by being an employee of the school system? Does the teacher as a professional have the right to determine course content, the selection of books, and the ideas and values to be presented in the classroom? Another question, not yet clearly resolved, is whether there is an independent right of ACADEMIC FREEDOM protected by the Constitution or whether that freedom is merely a corollary of the students' RIGHT TO KNOW.

The Supreme Court has never decided a case that squarely dealt with academic freedom in the classroom. Although KEYISHIAN V. BOARD OF REGENTS (1967) noted that academic freedom is "a special concern of the First Amendment" and that "the classroom is peculiarly the " MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS'," the case involved neither the classroom nor the teacher's right to choose the curriculum or to teach in any particular way. Justice HUGO L. BLACK, in his concurring opinion in EPPERSON V. ARKANSAS (1968), expressed a narrow view of the "academic freedom" protected by the First Amendment: "I am . . . not ready to hold that a person hired to teach school children takes with him into the classroom a constitutional right to teach sociological, economic, political, or religious subjects that the school's managers do not want discussed. . . . I question whether . . . "academic freedom' permits a teacher to breach his contractual agreement to teach only the subjects designated by the school authorities that hired him."

Although lower court decisions vary significantly as to whether "academic freedom" in the classroom is constitutionally protected, OBITER DICTUM in the PLURALITY OPINION in Pico suggested that school authorities have unfettered discretion to inculcate community values through the curriculum. If this view prevails, the teacher would appear to have no unilateral right to dictate the lessons (especially value lessons) to which the student will be exposed. If the classroom is the vehicle for imparting values, it cannot also be an open "marketplace of ideas."

Other issues of "academic freedom" actually involve the extent to which the freedom of expression of teachers as citizens, outside the classroom, must be balanced against the interest of the state as employer. For example, the Supreme Court held in Pickering v. Board of Education (1968) that, "absent proof of false statements knowingly or recklessly made by him, a teacher's exercise of his right to speak on issues of public importance may not furnish the basis for his dismissal from public employment." However, if the teacher's statements had been shown to have impeded his or her performance in the classroom or otherwise interfered with the regular operation of the schools, the speech might not be protected. And it is not clear whether protection would extend to teachers who voice their criticisms in the classroom.

The extent to which the Constitution constrains school authorities in the manner in which institutional rules and regulations are applied to students and teachers has been extensively litigated. Must certain procedures be followed before a student can be searched for EVIDENCE of the commission of a crime or a violation of a school rule, or before disciplinary action can be taken for failure to comply with institutional rules and norms?

A search made of private property is ordinarily held to be "unreasonable" under the FOURTH AMENDMENT if made without a valid SEARCH WARRANT. Even when the circumstances are such that courts have permitted warrantless searches, however (such as when necessary to prevent concealment or destruction of evidence), such searches usually require a showing of a PROBABLE CAUSE. However, the Supreme Court, in balancing school authorities' "substantial" interest in maintaining discipline against students' legitimate expectations of privacy, has fashioned a less protective standard. In NEW JERSEY V. T.L.O. (1985) the Court held that a search by school authorities is constitutional when there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will turn up evidence, and when "the measures adopted are reasonably related to the objectives of the search and not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction." Moreover, there is no warrant requirement for school searches.

Important constitutional values are incorporated in our notions of procedural fairness. GOSS V. LOPEZ (1975) held that state-created entitlements to a public education are protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; thus, the right to attend school may not be withdrawn on the ground of misconduct, absent fair procedures for determining whether the misconduct has occurred. However, having decided that some process is due, the procedural requirements in the school environment are minimal. In the case of a ten-day suspension of a student for disciplinary reasons, Goss required only that the student be given notice of the charges and an opportunity to explain his or her version of the story. Immediate removal from school may be justified in some cases even before the hearing. The hearing itself may simply be a brief meeting between the student and the administrator minutes after the alleged transgression. More stringent safeguards, however, may be required for deprivations of education significantly longer than the ten-day period involved in Goss. Just two years after Goss, the Court held, in INGRAHAM V. WRIGHT (1977), that although the administration of corporal punishment for violating school rules implicated a constitutionally protected liberty interest, "the traditional COMMON LAW remedies were fully adequate to afford due process." Thus, no advance procedural safeguards were constitutionally required. Because, according to the Supreme Court in BOARD OF CURATORS V. HOROWITZ (1978), academic grades and evaluations typically involve more subjective and evaluative judgments than do disciplinary decisions, the determination of "what process is due" turns on whether the disputed action is deemed to be academic or disciplinary in nature.

Yet another constitutional constraint on the public schools is embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment's EQUAL PROTECTION clause. The assertion of an entitlement to a minimum educational opportunity, to equal access to the schooling process, or to a specified educational outcome seeks to impose an affirmative obligation upon public schools. The most fully matured and litigated definition of equal educational opportunity is the right of minority students to be free of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. The principal issues have concerned the requirements for finding that the Constitution has been violated, and the scope of the remedy once a constitutional violation has been established. The courts have held that intentional actions of school authorities constitute de jure SEGREGATION and, in some cases, that intent to segregate can be inferred from actions that have the foreseeable effect of fostering segregation. The courts have also held that the lapse of time between past acts and present segregation does not alone eliminate the presumption of causation and intent. Courts have also coped with the question whether RACIAL QUOTAS or AFFIRMATIVE ACTION to assist minorities who have been handicapped by past discrimination are unconstitutional, what are permissible remedial techniques (such as zoning, pairing of schools, or SCHOOL BUSING), when a systemwide remedy is permissible and what proof is required before a systemwide remedy can be ordered, and whether a court may require that school district boundaries be reorganized in order to devise an effective remedy.

Some students seeking equal educational opportunity are asserting a right to be free of dicrimination on the basis of gender. However, most of the case law has developed under Title IX of the EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1972 and its implementing regulations, and few of these cases have been decided on constitutional grounds.

In CRAIG V. BOREN (1976) the Supreme Court indicated that gender would not be treated as a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION as is race, but as a category requiring an intermediate level of judicial scrutiny. Thus, a gender classification must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to the achievement of those objectives before it can be upheld. MISSISSIPPI UNIVERSITY FOR WOMEN V. HOGAN (1982), involving the exclusion of males from MUW's School of Nursing, held that the state had failed to meet this standard. The state had argued that its single-sex admissions policy was designed to compensate for discrimination against women, but was unable to show that women had suffered discrimination in the field of nursing. For the majority, not only was the policy excluding males from the School of Nursing not compensatory, it tended "to perpetuate the stereotyped view of nursing as an exclusively women's job." The state also failed to show that the gender-based classification was substantially related to its purported compensatory objective. SEPARATE BUT EQUAL educational offerings, if truly equal, and policies that are truly compensatory may still be constitutionally permitted in the case of gender.

Equal educational opportunity has sometimes been defined in terms of financial resources. The school finance reform movement of the early 1970s concerned inequalities in educational resources among school districts within a state. The issue in those cases was whether such inequalities were constitutionally impermissible. In SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973) the Supreme Court held that because Texas's school finance system neither employed a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION nor touched on a fundamental interest, the financing scheme must be assessed in terms of the RATIONAL BASIS standard of review. The Supreme Court's opinion distinguished differences among school districts from a state "financing system that occasioned an absolute denial of educational opportunities to any of its children." Those statements raise two related questions: First, under what circumstances, if any, is exclusion of a class of children from public schools constitutionally justifiable? Second, if absolute deprivation of an education is unconstitutional, can this principle be extended to certain children who, although attending public schools, are "functionally excluded?" PLYLER V. DOE (1982) raised the first question and LAU V. NICHOLS (1974) the second.

In Plyler v. Doe the Court held invalid a state statute that permitted school districts to bar illegal alien children from public schooling. Lau v. Nichols involved non-English-speaking children who, even though they had the same access as other children to teachers and books, were "functionally excluded" because they could not understand what went on in the classroom where only English was spoken. The Court struck down this "functional exclusion" of students on statutory grounds.

Although students with limited English proficiency and handicapped students, like minorities or women generally, have sought equal treatment with respect to educational offerings, in some circumstances they have sought to impose affirmative duties on government to remove barriers to their opportunity to obtain an equal education—barriers that were not of the government's making. If they do not receive special treatment, the argument goes, they do not have an opportunity equal to that of others to take advantage of the education the government offers to all. The Supreme Court has not yet held that this latter approach to equal educational opportunity, focusing on an affirmative duty to provide special, additional services for certain groups, is constitutionally dictated; the only cases to come before the Court have been decided on statutory grounds.

CLEBURNE V. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER, INC. (1985) suggested in OBITER DICTUM that the handicapped are entitled only to application of the rational relationship standard to their equal protection claims. However, now that Plyler v. Doe has recognized the importance of education, perhaps the handicapped will receive some special solicitude for their claims to education. On the other hand, Plyler v. Doe involved the total exclusion of undocumented alien children from public schooling. Even in Rodriguez, the Court suggested that the total deprivation of education might be constitutionally impermissible. Thus, arguably, the total exclusion—or perhaps even the functional exclusion—of handicapped children from education would be unconstitutional, but there would be no constitutional violation in a state's failure to provide the special treatment and additional educational resources needed to bring them to the same starting line as other children.

Since Americans view education as of utmost importance to the maintenance of both their political and their economic systems, as well as to the well-being of the individual and his or her family, schooling is compulsory. The school is, on the one hand, the agency of government closest to the day-to-day lives of people and, on the other hand, the most inherently coercive. Thus courts have been concerned with the appropriate balance between individual liberties and societal interests as well as equal access to an education.

BETSY LEVIN
(1986)

Bibliography

GOLDSTEIN, STEPHEN R. 1976 The Asserted Constitutional Right of Public School Teachers to Determine What They Teach. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 124:1293–1357.

HIRSCHOFF, JON 1977 Parents and the Public School Curriculum: Is There a Right to Have One's Child Excused from Objectionable Instruction? Southern California Law Review 50:871–959.

LEVIN, BETSY 1977 Current Trends in School Finance Reform Litigation. Duke Law Journal 1977:1099–1137.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM W. 1970 The Constitutional Rights of Teachers and Professors. Duke Law Journal 1970:841–879.

YUDOF, MARK G.; KIRP, DAVID L.; VAN GEEL, TYLL; and LEVIN, BETSY 1982 Educational Policy and the Law. Berkeley, Calif.: McCutchan.

EDUCATION AND THE CONSTITUTION
(Update)

Although the first compulsory attendance law was enacted in Massachusetts in 1852, public and private education were almost exclusively governed by state constitutional provisions and statutes until the 1920s. In three landmark constitutional decisions from 1923 to 1927—MEYER V. NEBRASKA (1923), PIERCE V. SOCIETY OF SISTERS (1925), and Farrington v. Tokushige (1927)—the Supreme Court affirmed the authority of the states to compel attendance at public or private schools. In so doing, however, it declared that the states may neither abolish private education nor regulate it so severely that private schools are effectively turned into public schools.

The "Pierce compromise," which recognized the role of the state in compelling school attendance, but preserved private alternatives, was premised on the economic rights of private schools, the recognition that there are constitutional limits on the states' legitimate authority to inculcate particular values and attitudes in children, and on natural law theories of the rights of parents to direct the upbringing of their children. Put somewhat differently, parents may choose to supplement the basic education provided by the state by relying on private schools, but governments have no constitutional obligation to pay for private education. Parents may choose a private school that reflects their religious, educational, and other values, but the state has the authority to regulate those schools reasonably to accomplish its legitimate socialization and citizenship objectives.

Meyer and its progeny have never been overruled by the Supreme Court, despite their reliance on now repudiated notions of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS in the economic sphere, and they provide the foundation for all subsequent constitutional decisions in the education field. Only one narrow constitutional exception to compulsory attendance has been fashioned, in WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972), and this exception was for Amish students claiming that modern public high schools undermined their religious faith and practices. Furthermore, state courts, under federal and state constitutional provisions, have restrained state authorities from too closely constraining the operation of private religious schools.

Some modern commentators, however, believe that the "Pierce compromise" would rest more comfortably on FIRST AMENDMENT grounds. The idea is that a state monopoly over elementary and secondary education would imperil democratic values as government agencies sought to establish an ideological conformity that would jeopardize the rights of adult citizens to formulate and express their own points of view, particularly with respect to matters of public policy. The underlying assumption is that indoctrination by the state may be as dangerous to freedom of expression as direct government censorship of what speakers may say.

The theme of Meyer and Pierce was carried forward in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, decided by the Court in 1943. A majority of the Justices held that West Virginia could not constitutionally require its students to salute the American flag in violation of their personal beliefs. Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON did not challenge the notion that public schools may seek to inculcate patriotic values, but he held that the compelled expression of belief was an unconstitutional means of achieving that end. Although the case involved Jehovah's Witnesses, the decision rested on the students' freedom of expression, not their right of free exercise of religion. AMBACH V. NORWICK (1979) reinforces the view that the key factual element in Barnette was the coerced declaration of belief. In Ambach, the Court held that a state may prefer American citizens to resident aliens in selecting teachers on the theory that citizens are more knowledgeable and effective in communicating American cultural and political values.

Two decades after Barnette, the Court, acting under the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE of the First Amendment, declared in ENGEL V. VITALE (1962) and ABINGTON TOWNSHIP SCHOOL DISTRICT V. SCHEMPP (1963) that the states and school districts may not require or sponsor SCHOOL PRAYER. The Court, evidencing some skepticism as to whether such prayers ever might be genuinely voluntary, completely abolished sponsored prayer in public schools, even for students wishing to engage in such prayer. In effect, the Court treated the ban on establishing religion as a substantive limit on governmental expression in public schools. In reaching this result, the Court was at pains to distinguish between ritual indoctrination of religion and the study of religion as an academic subject.

But in the years after WORLD WAR II, the major concern of the federal courts was less the need to cabin state indoctrination than it was to vindicate the rights of African Americans and other groups to an equal educational opportunity. The landmark decision, of course, was BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, a 1954 decision in which a unanimous Supreme Court declared that segregation of students by race in public schools violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Brown was elaborated on in a series of decisions—including GREEN V. COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF NEW KENT (1969), SWANN V. CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BOARD OF EDUCATION (1971), KEYES V. SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1 OF DENVER (1973), MILLIKEN V. BRADLEY (1974), and Board of Education of Oklahoma City Public Schools v. Dowell (1991)—seeking to define unlawful SEGREGATION, to establish the legal framework for remedying past RACIAL DISCRIMINATION (including the constitutionality of continuing to rely on neighborhood assignment of pupils), to pass on the appropriateness of interdistrict remedies, and to define when a "unitary" or nondiscriminatory school system had been established. Much of the debate centered on what affirmative steps a school district must take, including the busing of children to more remote schools to achieve a racial balance, once a constitutional violation has been proven.

In the 1960s and early 1970s, a number of groups sought to be included under the umbrella of Brown, urging that they had been victims of discrimination in the public schools. For example, handicapped students argued that they could not constitutionally be excluded from public schooling, students from poor families urged that the District of Columbia allocated less money to schools in the poorer neighborhoods, and Asian American students, in LAU V. NICHOLS (1974), alleged that the absence of special instruction in English for students with limited proficiency in English functionally excluded them from a public education in violation of the equal protection clause. These lawsuits met with varying degrees of success.

The era of equal educational opportunity in constitutional litigation largely came to an end in 1973 with the Supreme Court's ruling in SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973). Texas relied extensively on local property taxes to support public education, and students from poor districts, with low property values, alleged that the resultant distribution of funds discriminated against them in violation of the equal protection clause. In this context, the Court held that education is not a fundamental interest under the Fourteenth Amendment. Unless a particular group was the object of a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION (that is, historically disadvantaged groups such as African Americans), the Court would not apply a rigorous standard of review to relative denials of educational opportunity, but would uphold educational policies that "bear some rational relationship to legitimate state purposes." The Court concluded that the state's interest in local control of education constituted such a legitimate purpose and that local financing was a rational means of achieving it. After Rodriquez, and with few exceptions outside the realms of race and alienage (e.g., PLYLER V. DOE, 1982), equal educational opportunity claims were litigated under federal statutes enacted to protect particular classes of students (for example, the handicapped, students with limited English proficiency, and women) and under state constitutional provisions.

The modern era in constitutional litigation in the education field is dominated by the struggle for the hearts and minds of coming generations of citizens. The public schools have become the battlegrounds for essentially ideological wars. Under a variety of constitutional provisions, most notably the speech and religion clauses of the First Amendment, the Supreme Court has been asked to intervene to resolve disputes over Darwinism and creationism, fundamentalist Christianity and secularism, CONSERVATIVISM and LIBERALISM, and feminism and advocacy of traditional roles for women. In addressing these divisive and controversial issues, the Court has tended to focus on the motivation of school authorities. If they make curricular and other choices in good faith and if they seek to advance educational objectives, then the decision is virtually insulated from JUDICIAL REVIEW. If, in contrast, they act to suppress a political ideology or to indoctrinate religious values in children, then their actions may violate the First Amendment.

By way of example, under WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1985), moments of silence are permissible only if their purpose, in context, is not to advance religion. Similarly, according to Edwards v. Aguillard (1987), a state may not require that theories of the origin of Homo sapiens contrary to Darwinism be taught if the decision is motivated by religious concerns. And federal appellate courts have held in Smith v. Board of School Commissioners (1987) and Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education (1987) that an emphasis on secular values in textbooks and courses is permissible so long as the impetus is not hostility toward religion.

The socialization perspective also yields insights into constitutional decisions involving students and teachers. In TINKER V. DES MOINES INDEPENDENT COMMUNITY SCHOOL DISTRICT (1969) the Supreme Court held that students may engage in expressive activity in public schools (wearing black armbands to protest the VIETNAM WAR) as long as their speech does not threaten a substantial disruption of or material interference with the schools' educational activities. In other words, students may not thwart the schools' ability to communicate, but subject to that caveat, they may express their personal points of view—even if they are inconsistent with those taken by school authorities, thereby reducing the schools' ability to indoctrinate students.

Under BETHEL SCHOOL DISTRICT V. FRASER (1986), Tinker is inapplicable to vulgar student expression because limits on such expression are appropriate to schools' educational mission. Furthermore, according to the Court's decision in HAZELWOOD SCHOOL DISTRICT V. KUHLMEIER (1988), Tinker protects only the personal speech of students. When they participate in curricular activities—for example, as staff members for a school newspaper organized as part of a journalism course—they must conform to reasonable school policies on the content of the publication. Finally, 0a majority of the Justices have stated in BOARD OF EDUCATION V. PICO (1982) that library books may be removed from a school library if the books are pedagogically unsuitable or vulgar; they may not be removed because the school board wishes to suppress an ideology with which it disagrees.

A similar analysis may be applied to the academic freedom of elementary and secondary school teachers. If a school district insists on educational grounds that teachers assign particular books, then their academic freedom in the classroom has not been violated, according to a Tenth Circuit decision in Carey v. Board of Education (598 F.2nd 535, 1979). If, however, there is a systematic effort to suppress a type of book in order to exclude particular ideas or ideologies, then the school authorities have invaded the academic freedom of the teachers. Thus, for example, it is one thing to exclude books on Russian history because no courses on Russian history are offered or resources are limited; it is quite another thing to do so because the books discuss Marxist ideas.

The current constitutional standard seeks to distinguish between indoctrination and education. It is questionable whether such a distinction can be applied by federal courts in a principled and predictable manner. Schools stress many values: students are told that racial discrimination, drug abuse, and murder are wrong; they are told that democratic participation, civility, and honesty are right. Thus, the source of the distinction between indoctrination and education may lie more in the nature of the values being promulgated than in the process of communication.

MARK G. YUDOF
(1992)

Bibliography

VAN GEEL, TYLL 1987 The Court and American Education Law. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books.

YUDOF, MARK G. 1983 When Government Speaks. Berkeley: University of California Press.

——— 1984 The Quest for the Archimedean Point. Indiana Law Journal 59:527–564.

YUDOF, MARK G. et al. 1991 Educational Policy and the Law, 3rd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

EDUCATION OF HANDICAPPED CHILDREN ACTS

84 Stat. 175, 88 Stat. 579,
89 Stat. 773, 91 Stat. 230

Title VI of the Elementary and Secondary Education Amendments of 1970, the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975 (EAHCA), and the Education of the Handicapped Amendments of 1974 and 1977 provide funds and a variety of federal programs to assist states in educating and training handicapped individuals. In states receiving federal educational assistance for handicapped children, the acts require a state policy assuring all handicapped children the right to a free appropriate public education, assuring private school education at no cost to parents if children are placed in private schools as the means of fulfilling state responsibilities under the acts, offering an individual educational plan for every handicapped child, and providing education with nonhandicapped children to the "maximum extent appropriate." The acts require substantial procedural safeguards to assure receipt of a free appropriate public education. EAHCA provides a private right of action, after exhaustion of administrative remedies, to compel compliance.

Board of Education v. Rowley (1982), the Supreme Court's first interpretation of EAHCA, held that the statutorily mandated "free appropriate public education" need not provide each child an opportunity to achieve her full potential. The statute mandates only an "adequate" education, one reasonably calculated to enable the child to achieve passing marks and advance from grade to grade.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Disabilities, Rights of Persons With.)

Bibliography

BURGDORF, ROBERT L., JR. 1980 The Legal Rights of Handicapped Persons. Pages 213–245. Baltimore: Paul H. Brookes.

EDWARDS v. AGUILLARD

See: Creationism

EDWARDS v. ARIZONA
451 U.S. 477 (1981)
OREGON v. BRADSHAW
462 U.S. 1039 (1983)

In Edwards, involving application of the MIRANDA RULES, the Court held that when an accused has invoked his right to have counsel present during interrogation, he has not waived that right simply by responding to further POLICE INTERROGATION unless he himself initiated additional communication. In Bradshaw the defendant, who had been advised of his rights and had asked for an attorney, later initiated a conversation with an officer who reminded him that he had no obligation to speak to the police. The prisoner said he understood, continued talking, and confessed. A plurality of the Court decided that the conviction in Bradshaw involved no breach of the rule of Edwards, which was meant to prevent badgering by the police.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

EDWARDS v. CALIFORNIA
314 U.S. 160 (1941)

The years of the Great Depression were especially harsh for residents of the Dust Bowl. Many migrated to the West, and particularly California, in conditions of poverty graphically detailed in John Steinbeck's novel, The Grapes of Wrath (1939). California's hospitality to this "huge influx of migrants" was reflected in its "Okie law," making it a MISDEMEANOR knowingly to assist an indigent person in entering the state. Edwards, a Californian, went to Texas and drove his indigent brother-in-law back to California. For his troubles, he was given a six-month suspended jail sentence for violating the Okie law.

The Supreme Court unanimously reversed the conviction. Justice JAMES F. BYRNES, for the Court, concluded that the law violated the COMMERCE CLAUSE. The state's concerns with health and the integrity of its welfare funds were insufficient to justify so severe a burden on INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, concurring, would have rested decision on the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Interstate travel was a privilege of national CITIZENSHIP, and to deny that privilege to indigents would create an inferior class of citizens. Justices HUGO L. BLACK and FRANK MURPHY joined this opinion.

Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, concurring, agreed with Justice Douglas but also remarked that indigence was "a neutral fact—constitutionally an irrelevance, like race, creed, or color."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Equal Protection of the Laws; Wealth Discrimination.)

EFFECTS ON COMMERCE

"At the beginning Chief Justice [JOHN] MARSHALL described the federal commerce power with a breadth never yet exceeded." So said Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON for a unanimous Supreme Court in WICKARD V. FILBURN (1946), in the course of an opinion recognizing the broad sweep of Congress's modern power to regulate the national economy under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. Marshall's opinion in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) read that clause's reference to commerce "among the several States" to mean "that commerce which concerns more States than one."

For the Constitution's first century, however, Congress did little to regulate INTERSTATE COMMERCE. The first major national regulatory laws were the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT of 1887, regulating railroads, and the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT of 1890. It fell to another Supreme Court to define the scope of congressional power, and at first the Court's definition was narrow. In UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. (1895) the Court interpreted the Sherman Act, which prohibited monopolizing "any part of the trade or commerce among the several States," to exclude from its coverage a monopoly of sugar refining. Manufacturing was not commerce, said the Court; that "commerce might be indirectly affected" by a manufacturing combination producing ninety-eight percent of the nation's refined sugar was insufficient to bring the combination under the act's terms.

"Direct" effects on commerce, however, were found in a series of Sherman Act cases culminating in SWIFT & CO. V. UNITED STATES (1905). (See also STAFFORD V. WALLACE.) Yet the Court persisted in its assertion that manufacturing was not commerce, even to the extent of holding in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) that a congressional regulation of the interstate transportation of goods made by child labor was invalid because its purpose was to regulate manufacturing.

Meanwhile, the Court was developing quite another view of congressional power to regulate railroads. In Houston, East and West Texas Railway Co. v. United States, the "Shreveport case" (1914), the Court upheld an Interstate Commerce Commission order requiring a railroad to equalize certain interstate and intrastate rates. Such railroads were "common instrumentalities" of interstate and local commerce; the ICC was regulating only the relation between local and interstate rates. Taken seriously, the SHREVEPORT DOCTRINE implies congressional power to regulate intrastate activity because of its effect on interstate commerce.

After two decades of resisting the implications of the Shreveport case, the Court returned to its logic in National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation (1937), the most important judicial victory for FRANKLIN ROOSEVELT'S NEW DEAL. There the Court upheld the WAGNER ACT's regulation of collective bargaining in application to a large steel manufacturer that obtained its raw materials in interstate commerce, manufactured steel in Pennsylvania, and shipped finished products to many other states. The opinion was written by Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, who had written the Shreveport case's opinion. A strike by manufacturing employees, said Hughes, would "directly" obstruct interstate commerce. "It is the effect upon commerce, not the source of the injury, which is the criterion."

In every succeeding case, the Supreme Court has applied this "effects on commerce" rationale to sustain congressional power. WICKARD V. FILBURN was the culminating case of ECONOMIC REGULATION, upholding congressional control of a small farmer's on-the-farm consumption of wheat, on the theory that Congress had a RATIONAL BASIS for believing that the aggregate of all such farmers' consumption would have "a substantial economic effect" on commerce. More recently the Court has employed similar reasoning to sustain congressional regulations aimed at distinctly noneconomic purposes. (See PEREZ V. UNITED STATES, extortion through "loan sharking"; HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL V. UNITED STATES, racial segregation). Today, the "effects on commerce" rationale effectively allows Congress to be the judge of its own commerce clause powers.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

STERN, ROBERT L. 1946 The Commerce Clause and the National Economy, 1933–1946. Harvard Law Review 59:645–693, 883–947.

EICHMAN, UNITED STATES v.

See: Flag Desecration

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

The Eighteenth Amendment was framed and adopted to give a peacetime constitutional basis to the national PROHIBITION of alcoholic beverages, originally imposed as a war measure. Congress proposed the amendment in December 1917, and ratification was completed thirteen months later. Congress adopted the National Prohibition Act (VOLSTEAD ACT) to provide a mechanism for enforcement and penalties for violation of the prohibition.

The prohibition amendment provided the occasion for several controversies about the character and extent of the amending power. In Ohio, for example, the voters, by REFERENDUM, attempted to rescind their legislature's ratification of the amendment; but the Supreme Court held that procedure unconstitutional in Hawke v. Smith (1920). The Court, in the National Prohibition Cases (1920), rejected a number of arguments that the amendment was itself unconstitutional because of purported inherent limitations on the AMENDING POWER, including the contention that ordinary legislation cannot be made part of the Constitution and the assertion that the Constitution cannot be amended so as to diminish the residual SOVEREIGNTY of the states. In the same case the Court held that the requirement of a two-thirds vote in each house to propose amendments was met by the vote of two-thirds of the members present and voting and that amendments automatically become part of the Constitution when ratified by three-fourths of the states, whether or not promulgated by Congress or the secretary of state. In United States v. Sprague (1931) the Court rejected the argument that the amendment should have been ratified by state conventions rather than by state legislatures, holding that the mode of RATIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS was a matter of congressional discretion.

Prohibition, a product of the reforming impulse that characterized PROGRESSIVE CONSTITUTIONAL THOUGHT, proved very difficult to enforce; and the widespread disregard of federal law scarcely tended toward that moral improvement that the authors intended. In 1933, the Eighteenth Amendment became the only constitutional amendment ever to be wholly rescinded when it was repealed by passage of the TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

EIGHTH AMENDMENT

See: Bail; Capital Punishment; Cruel and Unusual Punishment; Punitive Damages

EISENHOWER, DWIGHT D.
(1890–1969)

The nation has often rewarded its military heroes by electing them to the presidency. General of the Army Dwight David Eisenhower, who had commanded the Allied forces in Europe during WORLD WAR II, was President from 1953 to 1961. A 1915 graduate of West Point, Eisenhower held no public office—except his military command—before being elected President.

Eisenhower was a "moderate" Republican: conservative on economic matters but often liberal on social issues. Although he privately expressed to Chief Justice EARL WARREN his disapproval of BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), he proposed, and successfully pressed for passage of, the CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS OF 1957 and 1960, the first such acts since Reconstruction. They expanded VOTING RIGHTS and created the CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION. In 1957, when the governor of Arkansas resisted a federal court's SCHOOL DESEGREGATION order (see COOPER V. AARON), the Eisenhower administration obtained an INJUNCTION forbidding the use of the National Guard to prevent INTEGRATION. When anti-integration rioting broke out in Little Rock, and the local authorities proved unable or unwilling to suppress it, Eisenhower ordered regular federal troops to the city.

Perhaps because of his military background Eisenhower was more cautious than some Presidents in exercising his power as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF. He brought the KOREAN WAR to an end and, thereafter, no American troops were actively engaged in combat during his administration. When Chinese communists bombarded the Nationalist-held islands of Quemoy and Matsu, Eisenhower sought, and obtained, a JOINT RESOLUTION of Congress authorizing American military action, if necessary. In 1958, again authorized by congressional resolution, he ordered Marines to Lebanon to maintain order, but they did no actual fighting.

In foreign affairs, Eisenhower's was an activist administration. During the Eisenhower presidency the mutual defense treaty with Nationalist China and the Southeast Asia (SEATO) Treaty were signed, each committing the United States to the defense of distant—and not necessarily democratic—countries. Under the SEATO pact Eisenhower in 1954 began the American policy of assistance to South Vietnam that continued through the VIETNAM WAR (1965–1973). Eisenhower supported the United Nations campaign of "anticolonialism," opposing America's European allies in Suez and Africa.

Domestically, Eisenhower was criticized for not speaking out forcefully against Senator Joseph R. McCarthy of Wisconsin, whose inquiries into communist influence in government threatened CIVIL LIBERTIES and often involved GUILT BY ASSOCIATION. Eisenhower promulgated EXECUTIVE ORDER 10450, which revamped the existing LOYALTY-SECURITY PROGRAM for federal employees.

During his two terms in the White House Eisenhower suffered three serious illnesses and was, for a time, virtually incapacitated. During those periods, Vice-President RICHARD M. NIXON presided over the cabinet and the National Security Council while routine matters were handled by a powerful White House staff. Eisenhower's illnesses raised questions about PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION in case of disability that were not resolved until passage of the TWENTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT.

Eisenhower made four APPOINTMENTS OF SUPREME COURT JUSTICES: Chief Justice EARL WARREN (1953) and Associate Justices JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN (1955), WILLIAM J. BRENNAN (1956), and CHARLES E. WHITTAKER (1957). Ironically, the moderate conservative Eisenhower made his most lasting mark on American constitutional history by appointing Justices who turned the Court toward liberal activism.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

GREENSTEIN, FRED I. 1982 The Hidden Hand Presidency: Eisenhower as Leader. New York: Basic Books.

EISENSTADT v. BAIRD
405 U.S. 438 (1972)

At a BIRTH CONTROL lecture, Baird gave contraceptive foam to a woman presumed to be unmarried. Convicted in a Massachusetts court for distributing a contraceptive device, Baird sought federal HABEAS CORPUS. On appeal the Supreme Court, 6–1, held the conviction unconstitutional. Four Justices, concluding that GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) would bar prosecution for distribution of contraceptives to married persons, held that the EQUAL PROTECTION clause forbade the state to outlaw their distribution to the unmarried. Two Justices relied on Griswold alone, saying the record had not shown the recipient to be unmarried. Chief Justice WARREN BURGER dissented.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Freedom of Intimate Association; Right of Privacy.)

EISNER v. MACOMBER
252 U.S. 189 (1920)

A 5–4 Supreme Court declared that stock dividends did not constitute income subject to taxation under the SIX-

TEENTH AMENDMENT. Justice MAHLON PITNEY agreed that dividends were a "mere readjustment of the evidence of a capital interest already owned." Justices OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, WILLIAM R. DAY, and JOHN H. CLARKE joined the DISSENTING OPINION of LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, who argued that the dividends represented profit (and thus income) and that the power conferred by the amendment ought to be measured by "the substance of the transaction, not its form." The Court subsequently narrowed the DOCTRINE of Eisner through a series of exquisite distinctions.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

ELASTIC CLAUSE

See: Necessary and Proper Clause

ELECTED JUDICIARY

Federal judges are appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. Appointment is for life. Although there was substantial disagreement among the delegates to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 about how to select judges, ALEXANDER HAMILTON's proposal for lifetime presidential appointments ultimately prevailed and has remained intact for two centuries.

This system was not without its critics, however. Chief among them was THOMAS JEFFERSON, who argued that the independence of the judiciary should be subject to the people's will. While President, Jefferson urged that federal judges should be removed from office upon the recommendation of Congress to the President. In his old age, Jefferson expressed regret that the Constitution did not provide for the removal of judges on a simple majority vote of the legislature, the branch most responsive to the public will. Many historians have attributed Jefferson's antipathy toward the judiciary to his personal animosity toward his distant cousin, Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL.

Initially, the states also established appointive systems for the selection of judges. Five states entrusted the appointive power to the governor, and eight vested the appointive power in one or both houses of the legislature. To this day, the legislature selects most judges in Connecticut, South Carolina, and Virginia, and state supreme court justices are elected by the legislature in Rhode Island.

Gradually, however, states began adopting systems by which judges were popularly elected. Public perception that property owners controlled the judiciary led to reform, initially at the lower trial court levels. In 1832, Mississippi became the first state in which all judges were popularly elected. An electoral system was adopted in New York at the New York Constitutional Convention of 1846. By the time the CIVIL WAR began, twenty-four of the thirty-four states had established elected judiciaries. Newly admitted states all adopted popular election for most judges.

Disenchantment with the popular election of judges grew during the latter half of the nineteenth century. Judicial candidates were invariably selected by political machines, which typically controlled them after their election. Judicial corruption and incompetence became commonplace. In 1906, in his classic address on the "Causes of Popular Dissatisfaction with the Administration of Justice," ROSCOE POUND claimed that "putting courts into politics, and compelling judges to become politicians in many JURISDICTIONS . . . has almost destroyed the traditional respect for the bench." By the turn of the century, several states converted their judicial elections into nonpartisan races. Today, nonpartisan elections are used to select most or all judges in seventeen states. Only thirteen states still utilize partisan elections to select most or all judges.

A return to the appointive system, utilizing a commission to make nominations, was endorsed by the American Bar Association in 1937. Three years later, Missouri became the first state to adopt this scheme, since known as the Missouri Plan. Thirty-one states now use some variation of the plan for selection of at least some of their judges. In many of these states, the appointment is not for life, however. The judge serves a limited term and must face the voters in a retention election. Normally, retention elections are uncontested. In 1986, however, a well-financed campaign against the retention of three justices of the state supreme court in California succeeded in removing them from the court.

The rising cost of election campaigns for judicial offices has led to increasing concerns about the propriety of campaign fund-raising by judges. In many states, million-dollar campaigns for state supreme court seats represent the largest share of judicial campaign expenditures and large corporations are major contributors to the campaigns. In 1986, for example, five justices of the Texas Supreme Court received $387,700 in campaign contributions from Texaco and Pennzoil while a lawsuit between them was pending before the court.

Unfortunately, the debate between proponents of judicial independence and those who exalt judicial accountability frequently masks a hidden agenda. Thus, in one era, those with a liberal agenda decry the entrenched power of a conservative judiciary; in another era, liberal judges are defended with fervent loyalty to the concept of judicial independence.

At a time when political campaigns have been reduced to raising large campaign chests to finance blizzards of fifteen-second television commercials, however, the wisdom of subjecting judges to election contests must be seriously questioned. In political campaigns the complex issues being decided by judges tend to be oversimplified. Frequently, an emotional issue such as CAPITAL PUNISHMENT or ABORTION becomes the campaign's focal point. The risk becomes substantial that judicial outcomes will become simple reflections of the prevailing political winds. The death penalty offers a startling example. The three justices removed from the California Supreme Court in 1986 were subjected to a bitter campaign that characterized voting for their removal as "three votes for the death penalty." After they were replaced, the affirmance rate in review of death penalty judgments jumped from 7.8 percent to 71.8 percent, with very few precedents being overtly overruled. Nationally, there is a close correlation between the method of selection of justices of a state supreme court and that court's affirmance rate in death penalty appeals. For the period 1977–1987, death penalty affirmance rates varied among state supreme courts according to manner of judicial selection as follows:

| | |
|---|---|
| Executive appointment: | 26.3% |
| Uncontested retention elections: | 55.3% |
| Nonpartisan contested elections: | 62.9% |
| Partisan contested elections: | 62.5% |
| Legislative appointments: | 63.7% |

The dependence of judges upon traditional sources of campaign funds also raises serious questions about their ability to remain impartial when their campaign supporters appear as litigants or lawyers in cases before them. The Code of Judicial Conduct, adopted by the American Bar Association in 1972, does not require a judge to disqualify himself or herself if a campaign contributor is a party to a case.

Often when lawyers have a choice of filing a case in state or federal court, they opt for federal court because they have greater confidence the case will be decided by an impartial tribunal, unaffected by the vagaries of local politics. Even the most conscientious state judges have expressed discomfort with the prospect of campaigning for reelection and with that prospect's subliminal impact upon their decision-making process. As California Supreme Court Justice Otto Kaus put it, "It's hard to ignore a crocodile in your bathtub."

Although many of those appointed to the state and federal benches are politicians before they get there, the goal should be to permit them to cease political activity once they put on their robes. At the federal level, that goal has been largely achieved. At the state level, however, it does not appear that an elected judiciary can be insulated from the corrupting influence of campaign fund-raising. A 1971 report of the American Bar Association concluded, "There is no harm in turning a politician into a judge. He may become a good judge. The curse of the elective system is that it turns every elected judge into a politician."

GERALD F. UELMEN
(1992)

Bibliography

BERKSON, LARRY et al. 1981 Judicial Selection in the United States: A Compendium of Provisions. Chicago: American Judicature Society.

DUBOIS, PHILLIP L. 1980 From Ballot to Bench: Judicial Elections and the Quest for Accountability. Austin: University of Texas Press.

ELECTION FINANCE

See: Campaign Finance

ELECTIONS, REGULATION OF

Defining "democracy," Henry B. Mayo has argued that the "one institutional embodiment . . . universally regarded as indispensable in modern democracies is that of choosing the policy-makers [representatives] at elections held at more or less regular intervals." In addition to their central democratic function of providing a mechanism for popular choice of officials, parties, and policies, elections have also been credited with two other important democratic functions: offering a forum for public participation and education in politics; and legitimizing the state's coercive authority and peacefully resolving social conflicts, because the public will generally accept officials and policies selected through fair, participative processes.

The Constitution, by its terms, mandates elections only for members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate. Article I, section 2, provides that members of the House shall be elected by the people of the respective states, and the SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT provides similarly for senators. Persons meeting the qualifications necessary to vote for members of the larger house of the legislature in each state are constitutionally eligible to vote for representatives and senators. The Supreme Court, in WESBERRY V. SANDERS (1964), held also that "as nearly as practicable one man's vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as another's." Subsequently, the Court has reaffirmed, in Kirkpatrick v. Preisler (1969), that in drawing congressional district boundaries states must "make a good-faith effort to achieve precise mathematical equality."

Characterizing its previous decisions, the Supreme Court, in Rivera-Rodriguez v. Popular Democratic Party (1982), said that it has "rejected claims that the Constitution compels a fixed method of choosing state or local officers or representatives." The guarantee clause of Article IV, section 4, has been construed to raise only POLITICAL QUESTIONS within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress and does not, therefore, make state methods for selecting officials subject to constitutional adjudication in the federal courts. Nonetheless, every state employs popular elections to select presidential electors and its governor and legislature. Other state executive, administrative, and judicial officials, and all manner of local officials are also elected. In all, about 540,000 federal, state, and local offices are filled by election. In addition, the prevailing method of selecting political party nominees and of choosing final contenders in nonpartisan elections is the primary election.

Thirty-seven states provide for popular review of policymaking by the use of referenda, and twenty-one states allow popular instigation of policy through initiative elections. Referendum elections are also widely used in local governments throughout the nation, especially to review tax levies and charter revisions; and initiative elections are available in some local jurisdictions.

Although the Constitution prescribes elections only for Congress, virtually all elections have gradually been constitutionalized and therefore in some degree nationalized. The FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT prohibits the states from impairing the franchise on the basis of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The NINETEENTH AMENDMENT forbids discrimination in electoral qualification based on sex; and the TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT prevents the states from imposing "any poll tax or other tax" as a condition of voting for a candidate for federal office. The TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT effectively grants the right to vote to all eligible citizens at eighteen years of age.

In the modern era, the right to vote has been declared a "fundamental right" under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, in REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964), because it is "preservative of other basic civil and political rights." The Supreme Court has therefore declared, in KRAMER V. UNION FREE SCHOOL DISTRICT (1969) and HARPER V. VIRGINIA BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), that every classification defining the right to vote in elections must be subject to strict judicial scrutiny and can be sustained only by independent judicial examination which finds "important," "compelling," or "overriding" state interests justifying restrictions on voting rights.

Mayo has argued that elections effectively promote democracy only if two conditions obtain. First, there must be "political equality in which [each] person should have one vote . . . and each vote should count equally." Second, citizens must have the "freedom to oppose," consisting of "formal rules . . . of effective choice—secret ballot, freedom to run for office, and freedom to speak, assemble, and organize for political purposes." It is these conditions for effective elections that the Supreme Court has generally promoted by declaring the vote a fundamental right and by rejecting poll taxes, residence requirements of extended duration, race and sex qualifications, limits on campaign spending, wide deviations from the ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE principle, and impediments to candidacy that significantly narrow voters' choices.

DAVID ADAMANY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Brown v. Socialist Workers '74 Campaign Committee.)

Bibliography

MAYO, HENRY B. 1960 An Introduction to Democratic Theory. New York: Oxford University Press.

NOTE 1975 Developments in the Law—Elections. Harvard Law Review 88:1111–1339.

ELECTORAL COLLEGE

The Electoral College was hurriedly improvised by the Framers to placate all factions, provide a mechanism for electing GEORGE WASHINGTON, and leave hard questions for the states to resolve after Washington's retirement. Yet it turned out, unexpectedly, to be the forming and sustaining mold of the American party system.

At conception, the College was partly democratic and responsive to the large states, partly aristocratic and answerable to small states. It was apportioned mostly by population, with a delegate for each congressman and senator, and a state could select its delegates in any way it pleased. The Framers seem to have expected that, after Washington, the delegates—acting deliberatively or as agents of state legislatures—would normally fail to muster a majority for one candidate, and that most elections would be settled in the House of Representatives, with one vote per state.

This happened only in 1824, when the House chose JOHN QUINCY ADAMS over ANDREW JACKSON, the frontrunner in popular and electoral votes. In 1800 the House also elected THOMAS JEFFERSON, who tied with his running mate AARON BURR in the Electoral College. This deadlock led to the adoption of the TWELFTH AMENDMENT, which separated the votes for President and vice-president and gave the College its essential modern written constitutional constraints.

In the same decades, the College acquired two powerful unwritten constraints: party control and unit vote. Party control originated in congressional nominating caucuses in 1796 and shifted to state and national nominating conventions during the 1830s. It ended the notion of unbound, deliberative delegates seeking "continental" leadership. POLITICAL PARTIES, not delegates, did the deliberation.

The unit vote, chosen by all but one state by 1836, delivered each state's delegation as a unit to the winner of its popular vote. Unit voting already prevailed in the House and in most state elections, but the Electoral College gave it its widest leverage. It is kind to winners, hard on second parties, and almost prohibitive of third parties. It forces competition for shiftable votes, and it rewards inclusive, center-seeking, accommodational parties (and groups) while discouraging narrow, ideological, exclusive ones. Many scholars believe that the American two-party system has its roots in the unit vote and its taproot in the Electoral College.

The College has prompted two complaints, both largely, but not wholly, theoretical. It might elect as President an "unrepresentative" candidate who had won a minority of the popular vote or had been chosen deliberatively by "unfaithful" delegates, or who was chosen by a House manipulated by splinter groups. Or it might favor some voters against others: urban against rural, liberal against conservative, North against South, or large state against small. Yet we have had only two clear minority Presidents (RUTHERFORD B. HAYES and BENJAMIN HARRISON), one House-chosen President (John Quincy Adams), no Presidents chosen by the rare, unfaithful delegate, and no constitutional crisis over any of these contretemps.

The College was once thought to favor "pivotal" large-state over small-state voters, and hence urban, liberal over rural, conservative interests, but political change and closer analysis have qualified this impression. Liberals who defended the College in the 1950s fought unsuccessfully to abolish it, in favor of direct election, in the 1960s and 1970s.

Any of the major reform proposals—direct election, proportional representation by state, and election by congressional district—arguably would change outcomes of close elections. JOHN F. KENNEDY would have lost the 1960 election, with the same votes cast, under the proportional or district systems. But surely the same vote would not have been cast, for any alternative system would have changed voting and campaign strategies. The district system might have given more weight to rural voters, the direct or proportional systems to third parties. Changes in the party system in either case could have been profound.

These complexities may explain why Congress, which considers proposing an amendment to abolish the Electoral College after most close elections, has never actually done so. The Supreme Court has been likewise acquiescent, upholding state delegate allocations against all challenges and refusing, in Delaware v. New York (1966), to hear Delaware's complaint that New York voters had 2.3 times better odds of affecting the outcome of a presidential election.

WARD E. Y. ELLIOTT
(1986)

Bibliography

CEASER, JAMES W. 1979 Presidential Selection: Theory and Development. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

ELLIOTT, WARD E. Y. 1975 The Rise of Guardian Democracy: The Supreme Court's Role in Voting Rights Disputes, 1845–1969. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

PIERCE, NEAL R. 1968 The People's President: The Electoral College in American History and the Direct-Vote Alternative. New York: Simon & Schuster.

ELECTORAL DISTRICTING, I

The number of members to be elected to a given legislative body and the voting rule by which that body will be chosen are commonly laid down in statute. The United States, like most democratic nations of the world, elects representatives from geographically defined election districts. At issue are the election method, the criteria for drawing district lines (or GERRYMANDERING), specifying who will actually do the redistricting, and the nature of legal and/or administrative review of redistricting choices.

In the United States most elections are conducted under the rule that the candidate receiving the greatest number of votes will be chosen. Congressional elections now take place in single-member districts, but this practice has not always been uniform. Prior to 1842, the smaller states commonly elected members to Congress in at-large elections with entire states as the electorate. At both the state and local level, at-large and multimember district elections in areas of high minority concentration have come under increasing challenge as dilutive of minority voting rights as a result of litigation brought under the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 (as Amended in 1982) or directly under the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution. Both the proportion of states using multimember districts for state legislative elections and the proportion of cities using at-large elections have declined over the past several decades.

In the overwhelming majority of states the legislative body itself is responsible for drawing new plans (usually after the decennial CENSUS). In most states the governor has VETO POWER over state and congressional plans. In some states, legislative or congressional districting is entrusted to nonpartisan or bipartisan commissions.

Many criteria have been proposed to guide districting in the United States and multiple and potentially conflicting "reasonable" goals can be advocated for redistricting decisionmaking. The exercise of state redistricting authority is subject to JUDICIAL REVIEW under federal standards involving Article I, section 2; the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT; and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (as amended); as well as by state courts acting exclusively in terms of state law issues. Until 1993, redistricting case law appeared to be a largely settled area, with no real changes from the 1980s to the 1990s apparent in terms of "ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE" or vote dilution standards. That situation changed dramatically when the Supreme Court decided SHAW V. RENO (1993) and its progeny and brought turmoil into the area of race-related districting.

It is convenient to divide proposed districting criteria into three categories: (1) formal (e.g., one person, one vote; compactness; contiguity), (2) racial, and (3) political. In the racial and political categories, we can usefully further distinguish between criteria that focus on intent and those that focus on the outcomes (or anticipated outcomes) of the redistricting process. It is also useful to differentiate different criteria for districting according to their legal derivations and legal force. In this analysis, "primary" criteria are mandated by the Constitution. "Secondary" criteria are those that derive explicitly from state constitutional provisions or from federal statutes. "Tertiary" criteria are those that, in a particular instance, derive their force from being implicitly embedded in state or local statute. "Supplementary" criteria, finally, are those that have no legal sanction in constitution or statute, whatever may be their moral force or the normative arguments in their favor.

Primary criteria must be satisfied by any redistricting plan. Lower-order criteria cannot, of course, override the primary criteria of the federal Constitution. It is important, however, to recognize that the status of any particular criterion as secondary, tertiary, or supplemental will vary with the particular legal context (e.g., from state to state, locality to locality). Moreover, the binding force of any particular criterion will vary with the nature of the constitutional or statutory language concerning its use. Some criteria may be lexicographically ordered. Some may be specified to apply only to the extent that they do not come into conflict with other criteria of higher or coordinate status.

The most important of the primary districting criteria is the one person, one vote standard derived from the Fourteenth Amendment (for state and local legislative bodies) and from Article I (for the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES). The Court has taken a two-pronged approach to operationalizing the one person, one vote standard. For state and local bodies, plans where the maximum deviation from strict population equality is less than 10 percent are generally considered to be prima facie valid and some plans with even higher deviations have been approved. In contrast, for the U.S. House, one person, one vote has been interpreted to require that deviations be reduced to the greatest extent feasible, and this has led the Court to reject congressional plans with even minuscule population deviations.

Almost all academic commentators on the one person, one vote cases have expressed the view that a zero-deviation-tolerance standard for congressional districting makes no sense, given measurement errors in the underlying census data and the reality that the decennial U.S. census provides only a snapshot of a constantly changing population. Moreover, an undue insistence on numerical equality substantially interferes with the implementation of other districting criteria.

The next most important primary districting criterion is the equal protection standard for the REPRESENTATION of various types of minority groupings. This standard has been instantiated in different ways for different types of groups.

For POLITICAL PARTY supporters, the test laid down in Davis v. Bandemer (1986) seems to invalidate only virtual exclusion of a group from the political process and/or electoral success. However, there is considerable dispute as to how to interpret the Bandemer test. What can be said is that only one of the post-Bandemer challenges to plans as being unconstitutional partisan gerrymanders has proved successful, and the facts of that successful challenge are so unusual that it is hard to extrapolate from that case to others. Thus, for all intents and purposes, Bandemer appears not to be influential.

For racial groups (and certain other ethnic groups designated for special protection by the Voting Rights Act), at minimum, the equal protection standard requires that there be no "retrogression" in racial representation other than what would occur on the basis of demographic shifts in underlying populations.

In 1993, in Shaw, with further clarifications in subsequent cases such as MILLER V. JOHNSON (1995), the Court laid down a new constitutional test: plans may not use race as their predominant or exclusive criterion. We will need to wait until the post-2000 districting cases to see how the Shaw test is to be reconciled with the nonretrogression test and with the most important of the secondary redistricting criteria—the need to avoid "minimizing or canceling out the vote" of the racial and ethnic groups protected under the Voting Rights Act.

In states covered in whole or in part by section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, the Voting Rights Section of the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) must verify that proposed plans "do not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote." If DOJ is not convinced, it can deny preclearance, which voids the plan unless the DOJ decision be reversed by the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia—something that in the 1980s and 1990s almost never happened. In any districting situation, litigation can also be brought to challenge a plan as a "dilution" under the standards laid down in the 1982 amendments to section 2 of the Voting Rights Act as interpreted in Thornburg v. Gingles (1986).

Other secondary criteria may be embedded in state constitutions, such as language about contiguity and/or compactness of districts. Tertiary criteria may be found in a bill enacting a districting plan and stating the criteria that the proposed plan is supposed to have followed, such as respecting political subunit boundaries to the extent feasible or nonfragmentation of "communities of interest." Even when such criteria are not explicitly mentioned they may serve as a test for whether a plan is one in which race was not the sole or preponderant criterion. Other criteria, such as minimizing change from previous district lines, although not in any way mandated, have been held to be permissible by courts.

BERNARD GROFMAN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Voting Rights.)

Bibliography

DAVIDSON, CHANDLER and GROFMAN, BERNARD 1994 The Quiet Revolution in the South: The Impact of the Voting Right Act, 1965–1990. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

GROFMAN, BERNARD 1983 "Criteria for Districting: A Social Science Perspective." UCLA Law Review 33:77–184.

GROFMAN, BERNARD, ed. 1990 Political Gerrymandering and the Courts. New York: Agathon Press.

GROFMAN, BERNARD; HANDLEY, LISA; and NIEMI, RICHARD 1992 Minority Representation and the Quest for Voting Equality. New York and London: Cambridge University Press.

ELECTORAL DISTRICTING, II

The constitutional guidelines governing federal electoral districting require that federal representatives be apportioned among the states "according to their respective Numbers," that representatives not exceed one for every thirty thousand persons, that every state have at least one representative, and that federal district boundaries not cross state lines.

Originally, the Constitution made few demands on states in the conduct of their electoral districting practices and for good reason. As JAMES MADISON and ALEXANDER HAMILTON highlighted in THE FEDERALIST Nos. 52 and 59, electoral practices and procedures were highly political in nature, subject to a variety of considerations in every state, and would not lend themselves to a uniform rule of resolution. It made little sense to provide more than the minimum required in the constitutional text, because additional restrictions were impractical and arguably unnecessary. Hamilton added that had the Constitution introduced an authority in the federal government to regulate state elections, this would have been immediately denounced as an unwarranted transposition of power and a premeditated attempt to destroy state governments.

In the early 1960s, the Supreme Court ignored Hamilton's and Madison's admonitions—and perhaps the Constitution itself—imposing new and unparalleled restrictions on state and federal districting. The circumstances—disproportionate legislative districts that frequently imposed a rural stranglehold on state and congressional elections—may have justified judicial intervention. In BAKER V. CARR (1962), the Court ruled that REAPPORTIONMENT issues were no longer POLITICAL QUESTIONS best left to the political departments of government to resolve but could be reviewed by the judiciary for potential constitutional violations. One year later the Court established the ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE rule, and two years later the Court mandated equipopulous districts for congressional elections and for both houses of state legislatures.

The one person, one vote decisions raised a host of problems for electoral districting. First, how precise was the numerical equality required by the equipopulous districts requirement? In 1983 the ineluctable logic of one person, one vote was used by the Court to strike down a New Jersey congressional districting scheme in which the difference between the largest and smallest districts was less than 0.7 percent. Justice BYRON R. WHITE, dissenting, proclaimed that it suspended credulity to believe that such a trifling deviation from absolute population equality somehow detracted from "fair and effective" REPRESENTATION, the touchstone in reapportionment and redistricting cases. Yet the New Jersey ruling was consistent with the assumption throughout the reapportionment cases: that equal representation meant equally populated districts. Once this identification had been made, such exacting demands on population equality were the natural, if perhaps austere, consummation of the earlier reapportionment case law.

The one person, one vote rule formalized the reapportionment process, employing a standard that was easy to quantify but that failed to account for other factors that might create voting inequalities: the influence of POLITICAL PARTIES, money, and INTEREST GROUPS, in addition to GERRYMANDERING, multimember districts, and bloc voting. If voters had a right to effective representation, as the Court had declared in the reapportionment cases, was the Court not obliged to account for these electoral inequalities as well? This second problem evades resolution because it is impossible to distribute political power in such a way as not to advantage or disadvantage one group while attempting to accommodate another.

In the context of racial and ethnic minorities, the courts and federal government have attempted to provide effective representation by generally mandating that jurisdictions dismantle multimember or at-large districts and create some majority-minority single-member districts. Again, the intractable nature of the politics of representation arises here, for it is by no means clear that minorities are more effectively represented when packed into districts in which minority-preferred candidates may be elected than when they are spread out through a number of districts in which their influence may be broader, even if their preferred candidates are not elected.

In the 1990s, the constitutional requirement of equipopulous districts, the sophisticated districting technology available, and the demand by the U.S. Department of Justice that states covered by the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 create majority-minority districts in proportion to the minority populations in the jurisdictions covered, combined to create bizarrely shaped racially gerrymandered districts in a number of states. These districts were successfully challenged on EQUAL PROTECTION grounds in SHAW V. RENO (1993) AND ITS PROGENY, where the Court held that districts in which race was the predominant factor motivating the creation of their boundaries were unconstitutional.

Ironically, the equal protection clause from which the right to effective representation derived, a right incorporated into the Voting Rights Act, has now been used successfully to attack the very race-conscious districting that was intended to promote effective representation. The difficult question that courts and the other branches of government will have to resolve in the future is how to reconcile the now reasserted individual rights protected by the equal protection clause with the group or interest-based rights underlying effective representation.

ANTHONY A. PEACOCK

(2000)

Bibliography

CORTNER, RICHARD C. 1970 The Apportionment Cases. Knoxville:University of Tennessee Press.

ELLIOTT, WARD E. Y. 1974 The Rise of Guardian Democracy: The Supreme Court's Role in Voting Rights Disputes, 1845–1969. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

GROFMAN, BERNARD N. and DAVIDSON, CHANDLER, eds. 1992 Controversies in Minority Voting: The Voting Rights Act in Perspective. Washington, D.C.: The Brooking Institution.

PEACOCK, ANTHONY A., ed. 1997 Affirmative Action and Representation: Shaw v. Reno and the Future of Voting Rights. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press.

RUSH, MARK E. 1993 Does Redistricting Make a Difference? Partisan Representation and Electoral Behavior. Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press.

SCHER, RICHARD K.; MILLS, JON L.; and HOTALING, JOHN J. 1996 Voting Rights and Democracy: The Law and Politics of Districting. Chicago: Nelson-Hall Publishers.

SWAIN, CAROL M. 1993 Black Faces, Black Interests: The Representation of African Americans in Congress. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

THERNSTROM, ABIGAIL M. 1987 Whose Votes Count? Affirmative Action and Minority Voting Rights. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

ELECTORAL DISTRICTING, FAIRNESS, AND JUDICIAL REVIEW

Democratic governance requires that governors be accountable to the voters. As political thinkers from Condorcet to Kenneth Arrow have noted, however, the will of the voters can only be determined through institutional channels that imperfectly reflect the electorate's preferences. Those institutional channels are controlled by incumbent officials who, unfortunately, have every incentive to resist change that may threaten their sinecure. The Constitution responds to this problem only partially by requiring a population-based apportionment of the Congress every ten years, but saying little else about the mechanisms for selecting governors.

Even the limited apportionment constraint is not self-executing. For example, the 1920 CENSUS revealed that, for the first time, a majority of the population was found in urban areas and was concentrated in the manufacturing centers of the North and Midwest. The incumbent Congress simply refused to reapportion itself out of office and the constitutional command of REAPPORTIONMENT was disregarded for an entire decade. The same pattern was repeated in most states, despite comparable state constitutional commands for apportioning legislative seats. By the time of the reapportionment cases of the 1960s, disparities in the population base of state legislative districts exceeded 40 to 1.

In COLEGROVE V. GREEN (1946), Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, writing for a plurality of the Supreme Court, forbade any judicial intervention lest the courts be dragged into the "political thicket" of apportionment. Despite the Court's invocation of institutional limitations, no other actor could address the maldistribution of political opportunity. The election of federal and state legislatures was contaminated by malapportionment and officials so elected saw no gain in disrupting a beneficial status quo. State courts proved as unresponsive as the Supreme Court, leaving underrepresented voters no channel through which to wrest back political power.

The stalemate ended abruptly with the landmark cases of BAKER V. CARR (1962) and REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964) which, in turn, rejected the POLITICAL QUESTION doctrine and announced the ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE rule of apportionment. Together with their companion cases of the early 1960s, Baker and Reynolds quickly undid the most visible and egregious affront to fair distribution of political opportunity. The sweep of these cases cannot be underestimated: the reapportionment cases were arguably the most far-reaching pronouncement of JUDICIAL REVIEW since the first enunciation of that power in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803). Within only a few years, the system of REPRESENTATION in virtually every state in the country had been radically overhauled under an exercise of judicial power that was as popularly accepted as it was effective.

While malapportionment was the visible target, the reapportionment cases introduced a more substantive concern with what Reynolds termed "the achieving of fair and effective representation for all citizens." The early reapportionment cases reveal a fundamental concern that control over the redistricting process could distort the outcomes of a legitimate electoral process. In the first blush of its reapportionment revolution, the Court entertained the idea that numerical equality could guarantee fundamental political fairness. Over the next two decades, that illusion fell victim to computer-driven GERRYMANDERING through which partisan aims could be achieved consistent with the equipopulation principle. The legacy of Baker and Reynolds was a readily JUSTICIABLE one person, one vote principle that served as a mild constraint on partisan distortions of the political process. The promise to deliver a broader conception of "political fairness" was largely unrealized.

The limits of that legacy were apparent in Karcher v. Daggett (1983), a clear partisan gerrymander of New Jersey that was, at bottom, faithful to the equipopulation principle. The Court refused to undertake a more searching inquiry into political fairness, and instead struck down the plan under an absolutist requirement of numerical exactness among districts—even though the population deviations involved were less than the margin of error of the underlying census numbers.

In Davis v. Bandemer (1986), the Court finally unmoored the issue of political fairness from numerical malapportionment by creating an independent constitutional cause of action for partisan gerrymandering. However, the Court's evidentiary standard of proving "consistent degradation" of political opportunity has proven impossible to meet in light of the limited number of elections available within the decennial redistricting cycle. Unlike Baker, whose Delphic musings were quickly followed by the easily applied one person, one vote standard of Reynolds, Bandemer has yielded no progeny capable of operationalizing its efforts to constrain excesses of partisan manipulation of the political process. The unenforceability of Bandemer stands in marked contrast to the more aggressive enforcement of the prohibition on racial gerrymandering under equally uncertain constitutional standards, as evidenced by SHAW V. RENO (1993) and its progeny.

The Court's elusive search for appropriate judicial review of political fairness hesitates between the need to police abuses in the political order and uncertainty over how to avoid unseemly judicial immersion in pure politics. So far, the Court has resisted the appeal of Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS to a uniform albeit complex test for self-serving dealing that focuses on procedural irregularities and outward appearances of improper consideration. Perhaps inspired by the ready application of the equipopulation principle, the Court appears stuck awaiting the next appearance of an easily applied justiciable standard.

SAMUEL ISSACHAROFF

(2000)

Bibliography

ISSACHAROFF, SAMUEL 1993 Judging Politics: The Elusive Quest for Judicial Review of Political Fairness. Texas Law Review 71:1643–1703.

ISSACHAROFF, SAMUEL; KARLAN, PAMELA S.; and PILDES, RICHARD H. 1998 The Law of Democracy. New York: Foundation Press.

KARLAN, PAMELA S. 1996 Cousins' Kin: Justice Stevens and Voting Rights. Rutgers Law Journal 27:521–541.

KLARMAN, MICHAEL J. 1997 Majoritarian Judicial Review: The Entrenchment Problem. Georgetown Law Review 85:491–553.

ELECTORAL PROCESS AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Prior to 1890, political activity in the United States was generally unregulated. By 1990, however, government regulation of the electoral process extended to CAMPAIGN FINANCE, BALLOT ACCESS, candidate speech, and regulation of POLITICAL PARTY affairs. This regulation is motivated by a variety of perceived problems, including negative campaigning and the influence of large campaign donors, and by the need for orderly elections.

Although the extent to which the FIRST AMENDMENT covers COMMERCIAL SPEECH or PORNOGRAPHY has long been a topic of debate, there has been virtually unanimous agreement that political speech and association is at the core of the First Amendment, and so entitled to the highest level of protection. Regulation of the electoral process, almost by definition, implicates this speech and association.

First Amendment problems are obvious when the state seeks to prohibit candidates who express certain views from running for office, as in Communist Party v. Whitcomb (1974), striking down a requirement that candidates take a LOYALTY OATH, or when LEGISLATION directly limits political speech, as in Mills v. Alabama (1966), striking down a ban on election-day newspaper editorials. For similar reasons, proposals to ban negative campaign ads have been constitutional nonstarters.

However, electoral regulation can also raise less obvious First Amendment concerns. For example, the FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION means little if the state refuses to grant a party a place on the ballot. Such regulation can be necessary to provide for orderly elections, but there is evidence, such as Williams v. Rhodes (1968), that these laws have also been used to reduce political competition and to prevent unpopular views from gaining a public hearing.

Rights of association can also be infringed by regulation of political parties' internal affairs. Parties are intimately woven into the electoral law of many states, yet remain voluntary, private associations, not state agencies. The Supreme Court has found it difficult to balance these roles, but in the 1980s and 1990s issued several decisions striking down, on freedom of association grounds, state efforts to regulate party affairs.

The clash between free speech and the regulatory impulse is most troublesome in the field of campaign finance. Large contributions to candidates raise concerns of both political equality and corruption. But, as the Court recognized in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976), limits on political contributions and spending have the effect of limiting political speech, and so can be justified only by the most COMPELLING STATE INTEREST.

Ultimately, efforts to curtail the influence of private spending on political campaigns may be futile. By the 1990s many politically active groups were bypassing candidates' campaigns completely, choosing instead to run advertisements that discussed candidates' positions on issues, often in harsh or glowing terms, but which stopped short of specifically endorsing or opposing a candidate. Because these "issue ads" can influence election results, numerous proposals have been made to restrict them. But the Court struck down such limits in Buckley, noting that the discussion of issues is perhaps the most vital part of the First Amendment, and that the distinction between discussion of candidates and discussion of issues often dissolves in practice. Candidates both campaign on, and are identified with, issues.

By 1997, some had become so frustrated with the constitutional restraints on campaign finance regulation that the U.S. SENATE considered a constitutional amendment to allow greater restrictions on issues ads and private campaign donations. But such restrictions would have the odd result, in many situations, of leaving overtly political speech with less protection than commercial speech, NUDE DANCING, or FLAG DESECRATION. Absent such an amendment, the Court has shown little inclination to move in that direction.

BRADLEY A. SMITH
(2000)

Bibliography

LOWENSTEIN, DANIEL H. 1993 Associational Rights of Major Political Parties: A Skeptical Inquiry. Texas Law Review 71: 1741–1792.

POLSBY, DANIEL D. 1976 Buckley v. Valeo: The Special Nature of Political Speech. Supreme Court Review 1976:1–47.

SMITH, BRADLEY A. 1991 Judicial Protection of Ballot Access Rights. Harvard Journal of Legislation 28:167–217.

——— 1997 Money Talks: Speech, Corruption, Equality, and Campaign Finance. Georgetown Law Journal 86:45–99.

SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1992 Free Speech Now. Pages 255–316 in Cass R. Sunstein and Richard A. Epstein, eds., The Bill of Rights in the Modern State. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING

A Constitution written in the eighteenth century does not easily accommodate events and developments two centuries later. This has been especially true of the FOURTH AMENDMENT guarantee against unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES. Originally designed to deal with British soldiers breaking into buildings to search for smuggled goods under overly broad GENERAL WARRANTS, in this century it has had to deal with electronic eavesdropping. In 1928 Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, dissenting in OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES, observed that " WRITS OF ASSISTANCE and GENERAL WARRANTS are but puny instruments of tyranny and oppression when compared with wiretapping." Today, there are surveillance devices far more penetrating and efficient than wiretapping, such as tiny microphones that catch the softest utterance hundreds of feet away; pen registers that record telephone numbers; "beepers" that trace movements over miles and for days; and electronic intensifiers that permit photography in almost complete darkness. Continuing advances in miniaturization and surveillance technology will produce even more intrusive and undetectable devices.

At first, the Supreme Court refused to apply any of the BILL OF RIGHTS to these technologies. The FIRST AMENDMENT ramifications were emphasized by Justice Brandeis in his Olmstead dissent when he pointed out the link between freedom of expression and invasions of personal security, a link established as early as the WILKES CASES (1763–1770), the first great English cases establishing the right of personal security against governmental intrusion. The Olmstead majority did not even mention the First Amendment, however, and that silence continues—the First Amendment has played an insignificant role in constitutional analyses of electronic surveillance, although in UNITED STATES V. UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT (1972) the Supreme Court did address First Amendment considerations relevant to domestic NATIONAL SECURITY intelligence surveillance. In Olmstead the Fifth Amendment was explicitly ruled inapplicable, and electronic surveillance was held not to be a form of compelled self-incrimination. That ruling has been reaffirmed in cases such as HOFFA V. UNITED STATES (1966).

It is the Fourth Amendment that has become the primary constitutional instrument for control of electronic surveillance, and even that development was delayed some forty years. In 1928, the Supreme Court ruled in Olmstead, over dissents by Justices Brandeis and OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, that the Fourth Amendment was limited to physical intrusions on property (TRESPASSES) that "seized" material objects, not intangible conversations. Olmstead was gradually eroded in the 1950s and 1960s, particularly with respect to conversations. The trespass aspect of Olmstead remained applicable, however, until 1967, when KATZ V. UNITED STATES extended Fourth Amendment protection to conversations and other things that people reasonably expect to keep private.

During the forty years between Olmstead and Katz, electronic surveillance was not left completely uncontrolled, however. Although the trespass requirement produced the ruling in Goldman v. United States (1942) that a room microphone placed against the outside of a wall did not violate the Fourth Amendment, telephone wiretapping itself was held to be prohibited by section 605 of the COMMUNICATIONS ACT of 1934, and this prohibition was applied to both federal and state law enforcement officers in NARDONE V. UNITED STATES (1937) and Benanti v. United States (1955). New York State also established statutory procedures for regulating electronic surveillance.

Empirical studies of wiretapping prior to 1968 showed that the controls established by these laws were ineffective. The Justice Department construed section 605 so narrowly that it was rarely invoked; judicial supervision of state wiretapping was virtually nonexistent. In addition, two forms of wiretapping and bugging remained completely uncontrolled: national security wiretapping, done pursuant to presidential directives; and surveillance with the consent of one of the parties to the conversation.

As to national security surveillances, the FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION (FBI) installed over 7,000 wiretaps and room microphones during 1940–1960, and one treasury agent additionally admitted to having installed over 10,000 wiretaps and microphones between 1934 and 1948; other federal agencies also did electronic eavesdropping. Although all of these intrusions were purportedly for national security purposes, many were revealed to be for crime control or political purposes, the most notorious of which was the massive electronic surveillance of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., between 1963 and 1968 ordered by FBI Director J. EDGAR HOOVER.

Consent surveillance, either on a telephone extension or with informers equipped with secret radio transmitters or recorders, is probably the most widely practiced type of electronic surveillance, although so much of electronic surveillance remains secret that one cannot be certain. The Supreme Court had consistently held, before and after the Katz decision, that under both the Constitution and the Communications Act, consent surveillance is free from virtually all constitutional or statutory controls. Leading cases on this point include ON LEE V. UNITED STATES (1952) and UNITED STATES V. WHITE (1971). The only federal restriction prior to 1968 was a very limited rule of the Federal Communications Commission barring secret recordings.

Ever since the 1937 Nardone decision, the Justice Department had sought authority for electronic surveillance. This effort gained impetus from Attorney General ROBERT F. KENNEDY's campaign against organized crime in 1961–1963 and the revelation that FBI Director Hoover had illegally installed hundreds of taps and bugs on alleged organized crime figures under the "national security" authority, many of which stayed in place for many years; the disclosure of these surveillances placed scores of convictions in jeopardy. With the Court's decisions in BERGER V. NEW YORK (1967) and Katz, the stage was set for congressional action. In these two decisions the Court discarded the "trespass" requirement imposed by Olmstead, ruled that electronic surveillance was subject to Fourth Amendment requirements, and set out relatively detailed requirements for a valid statute, including: (1) a specification and detailed description of the place to be searched, the conversations to be overheard, and the crime under investigation; (2) a limit on the period of intrusion; and (3) adequate NOTICE of the eavesdropping to the people overheard.

Six months after Katz, Congress passed the OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT (1968), Title III of which legitimated electronic surveillance for law enforcement purposes. The statute provides that electronic surveillance of conversations is prohibited, upon pain of a substantial jail sentence and fine, except for: (1) law enforcement surveillance under a court order; (2) certain telephone company monitoring to ensure adequate service or to protect company property; (3) surveillance of a conversation where one participant consents to the surveillance; and (4) national security surveillance insofar as it is within the President's inherent constitutional powers, whatever those may be. Law enforcement surveillance must meet certain procedural requirements, which include: (1) an application by a high ranking prosecutor; (2) surveillance for one of the crimes specified in Title III; (3) PROBABLE CAUSE to believe that a crime has occurred, that the target of the surveillance is involved, and that EVIDENCE of that crime will be obtained by the surveillance; (4) a statement indicating that other investigative procedures are ineffective; and (5) an effort to minimize the interception.

A judge must pass on the application and may issue the order and any extensions if the application meets the statutory requirements. Shortly after the surveillance ends, notice must be given of the surveillance to some or all of the persons affected, as the judge decides, unless he agrees to postpone the notice. Illegally obtained evidence may not be used in any official proceedings, and a suit for damages may be brought for illegal surveillance, though a very strong good faith defense is allowed. In addition, the manufacture, distribution, possession, and advertising of devices for electronic surveillance for private use are prohibited.

The legislation is written in terms of federal officials but it also authorizes state surveillance if a state passes a law modeled on the federal statute, though the state may (as have some states, like Connecticut) impose more stringent requirements. More than half the states plus the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA have passed such statutes, though many rarely use the authority. State surveillance is concentrated in New York, New Jersey, and Florida, mostly for narcotics and gambling offenses.

Title III raised many constitutional issues but almost all have been resolved in its favor. For example, a common contention is that electronic eavesdropping is inherently uncontrollable and necessarily intrudes on vast numbers of innocent people who use phones or rooms under surveillance, thus violating the particularization requirements of the Fourth Amendment. In order to meet this objection, and to avoid turning the surveillance authorization into a general warrant, Title III requires that interceptions be minimized. The Supreme Court, however, made this requirement very easy to meet by its decision in Scott v. United States (1978). The lower courts do not impose sanctions for the failure to minimize interception, partly because minimization is often very difficult to achieve or supervise. One federal judge in a major drug case excused the interception of seventy-three calls between a suspect's babysitter and her friends and classmates with the comment that although these conversations were indeed "teenage trivia . . . the eavesdropper, unless possessed of the prescience of a clairvoyant, could hardly predict when they might become relevant, or when they might be interrupted by an adult with more pressing problems." There are also many cases where police do not minimize interceptions even though they could. For example, some police listen to every conversation, including privileged conversations between lawyers and their clients, but record only those they think appropriate. In one case, it was accidentally revealed that police had recorded all conversations but had prepared a minimized set for use in court. Where room microphones are used, minimizing the interceptions is virtually impossible, especially if the microphones are placed in areas to which the public has access.

The Berger case also seemed to require that the interception be limited to specific and quite short time periods. Title III, however, permits thirty-day authorizations on a twenty-four-hour per day basis, with an unlimited number of extensions, and many interceptions remain in continuous operation for many months. The Report on Applications for Orders Authorizing or Approving the Interception of Wire or Oral Communications for 1981, issued by the Administrative Office of the United States Court, indicates that almost half the 106 federal interceptions reported for 1981 lasted thirty or more days.

One of the most significant ways of enforcing Fourth Amendment requirements is by imposing sanctions for their violation. Imposing these sanctions, of course, requires an awareness by the victim that a search has taken place, and of how it was conducted. With a conventional search, such conditions are easy to meet, but electronic surveillance is surreptitious and may never be discovered. The Supreme Court has therefore insisted that notice of the interception be given to the persons named in the application as targets of the surveillance. The statute, however, permits indefinite postponement of this notice, and this provision, too, has been upheld.

Critics have charged that judicial supervision has been minimal and ineffective, particularly on the state level. At hearings before the National Commission for the Review of Federal and State Laws Relating to Electronic Surveillance, many witnesses lamented the inability or unwillingness of state judges to supervise the process closely.

Passage of the statute, while effectively ending the constitutional debate, has not ended the dispute over the value of electronic eavesdropping. Critics have charged that the device is used almost exclusively for minor crimes involving gambling and drugs; is quite useless for major crimes and especially those involving organized crime, the avowed target of the statute; is very expensive; is largely unsupervised by the judiciary; and has invaded the privacy of millions. For support, they rely on the staff studies of the National Commission. Proponents reply that the technique has produced some very useful results, that many of the problems are those attending any new technique, and that more sophisticated use will produce better results. The opposing views were set out in detail in the Report of the National Commission; over a vigorous minority dissent the majority of the commission supported the use of electronic surveillance under the statute, with some modification.

Two types of surveillance remain uncontrolled by Title III: consent intrusions and national security surveillance. Title III totally exempts interceptions by government officials if an official is a party to the conversation of if there is consent by one of the parties; a private interception that is consented to is also exempt, unless the interception is for the purpose of committing a tortious, criminal, or "other injurious act," the meaning of which is not clear. Several states, however, have imposed more stringent requirements on consent surveillance than the federal statute, such as a warrant, either by statute (California, Georgia) or under their own state constitutions (Alaska, Montana). The Supreme Court, however, continues to rule in cases like United States v. White (1971) that consent surveillance does not implicate the Fourth Amendment.

National security surveillance continues to pose difficult constitutional questions. Presidents since FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT have claimed inherent executive power to use electronic surveillance to obtain intelligence for national security purposes, and have authorized such intrusions on their own, without prior judicial approval. Most courts have upheld such a power, where national security surveillance involving foreign powers and agents is concerned. But where American citizens or groups are targeted for domestic security purposes, the Supreme Court, in United States v. United States District Court, ruled unanimously that the President has no INHERENT POWER to use warrantless electronic surveillance. The Court did suggest that Congress could authorize procedures for domestic intelligence gathering that are less stringent than those of Title III for law enforcement, but so far Congress has not done so.

Intelligence gathering for foreign security purposes is now governed by statute. The 1976 Report of the Senate Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to the Intelligence Agencies disclosed massive abuses of executive power to tap telephones and bug rooms for national security purposes, often with the approval of the incumbent President. These abuses included taps on the telephones of National Security Agency advisers authorized by President RICHARD M. NIXON in 1969; on the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce in 1941; on congressmen in the early 1960s in connection with the "sugar lobby"; and FBI taps and bugs on Martin Luther King, Jr., to find "communist" influence. From 1940 to 1975, the FBI alone installed some 10,000 taps and bugs; the National Security Agency, the Central Intelligence Agency, local police, and many other governmental agencies have also engaged in national security surveillance.

These disclosures resulted in the passage in 1978 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires approval from a court for national security surveillances of foreign powers or agents. The President is denied extrastatutory inherent or other power to use electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence within the United States—though not outside—and no Americans may be eavesdropped upon unless their activities have some element of criminality about them. The court operates secretly, and there have been very few published rulings and very little public information about it. The constitutionality of this act and its procedures—which are much less demanding than those under Title III for law enforcement purposes—has been sustained.

The courts have also tried to grapple with other forms of electronic surveillance. In Smith v. Maryland (1979) pen registers, which record the telephone numbers called, were held outside Title III and not in conflict with the Fourth Amendment; the Supreme Court concluded that the user has no reasonable expectation of privacy in the numbers called. Electronic signaling devices ("beepers") attached to cars to enable their movements to be traced have also been held to be without Fourth Amendment protection because cars are generally traced while on public streets and highways (United States v. Knotts, 1983); if the device is attached to a container or other item that is taken into a private area, however, a warrant and probable cause are required (United States v. Karo, 1984).

In 1928, after describing the dangers that the emerging modern technology presented to individual liberty, Justice Brandeis asked, "Can it be that the Constitution affords no protection against such invasions of individual security?" Almost a half century later, it is clear that such protection is available—if the nation wants it.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Criminal Justice and Technology.)

Bibliography

ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS 1968–1982 Reports on Applications for Orders Authorizing or Approving the Interception of Wire or Oral Communications. Washington, D.C.: Administrative Office.

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION PROJECT ON STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE 1974 Standards Relating to the Administration of Criminal Justice; Electronic Surveillance. Pages 33–52. New York: Institute of Judicial Administration.

CARR, JAMES G. 1977 (with 1983 supp.) The Law of Electronic Surveillance. New York: Clark Boardman.

NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR THE REVIEW OF FEDERAL AND STATE LAW RELATING TO ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE 1976 Report and Staff Studies. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

SCHWARTZ, HERMAN 1968 The Legitimation of Electronic Eavesdropping: The Politics of "Law and Order." Michigan Law Review 67:455–510.

——— 1977 Taps, Bugs, and Fooling the People. New York: Field Foundation.

UNITED STATES CONGRESS, SENATE SELECT COMMITTEE TO STUDY GOVERNMENTAL OPERATIONS WITH RESPECT TO INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES 1976 III Final Report. 94th Congress, 2d session.

ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT

79 Stat. 27 (1965)

This first general school aid bill in American history broke an impasse that had long stymied legislation to provide federal moneys to elementary and secondary schools. Previous efforts toward such action had foundered on the question whether EDUCATION was a state, not federal, function; whether segregated school systems should receive federal aid; and whether aid to private as well as public schools would violate the FIRST AMENDMENT's establishment clause. The segregation issue had been settled by the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. The 1964 elections had filled Congress with federal aid advocates untroubled by STATES' RIGHTS issues. The church-state controversy over federal assistance to parochial schools continued but was generally resolved here for the first time.

As passed, the measure, which appealed to the CHILD BENEFIT THEORY, authorized specialized aid to districts with children from low-income families. Private schools would share in aid to some specialized services such as shared-time projects and educational television. The act gave school districts wide discretion in using the federal funds; it required, however, that the funds be used to meet the special needs of educationally deprived children and that private schools be included in any benefit sharing. The act also authorized for five years grants to states for purchase of textbooks and library material, and for funding supplementary community educational services that schools could not provide. It expanded the 1954 Cooperative Research Act, authorizing a five-year program of grants for new research and training in teacher methods, and it provided for grants to strengthen state departments of education.

Despite overwhelming congressional support for the act, critics continued to express constitutional doubts. The use of public funds for books in parochial schools and special educational centers could not be justified, it was argued, because funds would be channeled directly to religious schools. The AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION contended that providing instructional materials and supplementary services to church schools was an unconstitutional subversion of the principle of SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. In FLAST V. COHEN (1968) the measure was challenged on First Amendment grounds, but the Court did not rule on the constitutional issues in the case.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

ELEVENTH AMENDMENT

The Eleventh Amendment of the Constitution provides that "the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or EQUITY, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of a foreign State." Congress submitted this amendment, on votes of twenty-three to two in the Senate and eighty-one to nine in the House of Representatives, for ratification in March 1794. By February 1795, the legislatures of three-fourths of the states had ratified, but, because of delays in certification of this action, adoption of the amendment was not proclaimed until 1798.

According to traditional theory the purpose of the amendment was to correct an erroneous interpretation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court. Impetus for the amendment undoubtedly was the unpopular decision in CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793)—one of seven early suits instituted against a state by citizens of other states or by ALIENS. In Chisholm the Court, voting 4–1, held that the judicial power of the United States and the JURISDICTION of the Court reached such suits under the provision in Article III extending the federal judicial power to "Controversies between a State and Citizens of another State . . . and between a State . . . and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects."

Although the language of Article III is broad enough to support the Chisholm holding, proponents of the theory that the amendment was adopted to correct an error in constitutional interpretation have argued that (1) the doctrine of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY, exempting the sovereign from unconsented suits, was part of the COMMON LAW heritage at the time the Constitution was adopted, and hence implicitly qualified some delegations of judicial power in Article III; and (2) an understanding to that effect emerged during the ratification debates.

Existence of an implicit common law qualification upon the various delegations of federal judicial power is doubtful, however. While the supposition that the immunity doctrine was already incorporated into American law appears sound, at least some state immunity surely was surrendered under the Constitution. The purpose behind the various delegations of judicial power to the United States was to create a judiciary competent to decide all cases "involving the National peace and harmony." Surrender—rather than retention—of state immunity is consonant with that objective. Nor is the argument that the ratification debates evidenced an understanding that the states would be immune from suit persuasive. While ALEXANDER HAMILTON, JAMES MADISON, and JOHN MARSHALL offered assurances to that effect in reply to Anti-Federalist objections, these objections were not quieted; and other leading Federalists, including EDMUND RANDOLPH and JAMES WILSON—members of the Committee of Detail where most provisions of Article III were drafted—took the contrary view.

While some proponents of the Eleventh Amendment probably understood it to be corrective, the broad support enlisted for its adoption can be better explained in terms of diverse perceptions and objectives. These ranged from the desire of STATES' RIGHTS advocates to repudiate the extravagant nationalism manifested by Federalist justices in their Chisholm opinions, to Federalist perceptions that the amendment effected only a relatively insignificant restriction upon part of the DIVERSITY JURISDICTION of the federal judiciary. Experience was accumulating that suit against a state in the Supreme Court was cumbersome and unnecessary for the maintenance of federal supremacy. Moreover, assumption of a major portion of state indebtedness and rapid liquidation of the remainder had allayed a Federalist concern that partially accounted for the original grant of federal judicial power.

Judicial construction of the amendment has been shaped by the view that as a corrective measure, it restored common law sovereign immunity as an implicit qualification upon some grants of judicial power in Article III. As interpreted, the amendment bars any suit against a state, including those raising federal questions, instituted by private plaintiffs, regardless of CITIZENSHIP (Hans v. Louisiana, 1890), as well as by foreign states (Monaco v. Mississippi, 1934) in federal court. In general, only where another state or the United States is plaintiff, is a state subject to unconsented suit in federal court (Virginia v. West Virginia, 1907; United States v. Mississippi, 1965). The amendment does not affect Article III rights of a state to institute suits in federal courts, nor does it preclude appeals by private plaintiffs in actions commenced by a state. (See COHENS V. VIRGINIA.)

Although the amendment literally limits the federal judicial power—which, by general rule, may not be modified by consent of the parties—as shorthand for the doctrine of sovereign immunity, it has always been interpreted to permit exercises of Article III powers upon a state's waiver of immunity from suit in federal court. Such waivers ordinarily must be explicit (EDELMAN V. JORDAN, 1974); however, implied and imputed waivers, although exceptional, are not unknown (Parden v. Terminal Railway, 1964).

The amendment imposes an absolute bar against unconsented suits commenced in federal court by private plaintiffs against state governments and their agencies. To this generalization, there is a single but increasingly important exception. Congress, pursuant to its enforcement powers under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, may create federal causes of action against the states and thereby deprive them of immunity (FITZPATRICK V. BITZER, 1976). Whether such authority can be inferred from other powers delegated to the national government has not been settled.

The exemption from suit enjoyed by the states under the amendment does not extend to their political subdivisions nor, in general, to governmental corporations (Lincoln County v. Luning, 1890). Of paramount importance in restricting the impact of the amendment is the availability of relief in suits instituted against state officers for acts performed or threatened under color of unconstitutional state legislation. The issues whether and to what extent the amendment bars suits against state officers for official acts have occasioned more litigation under the amendment than any others, and the course traversed by the Court from OSBORN V. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES (1824) through In re Ayers (1887) to EX PARTE YOUNG (1908) was tortuous. In some early cases the amendment was held applicable only to suits in which a state was a defendant of record, but this rule was never firmly established. Later cases turned on whether a suit against a state officer was substantially a suit against the state itself. In Ayers the Court held that a suit against a state officer is a suit against the state unless the officer's act, if stripped of its official character, constitutes a private wrong; but this rigorous test was abandoned in Ex parte Young, a landmark case which, despite its unpopularity at the time, fixed the law for the future. While adhering to the general rule that a suit against a state officer is barred by the amendment if it is substantially against the state itself, the Court adopted the fiction that mere institution of state judicial proceedings by a state officer pursuant to an allegedly unconstitutional statute is a wrong for which federal equitable relief is available. The theoretical difficulties posed by this formulation are grave and many, but in facilitating direct access to the federal courts to test the validity of state legislation, Young is of transcendent importance in maintaining federal supremacy and the RULE OF LAW. Adopted as the instrument of judicial protection of the rights of property and enterprise, the Young principle today does the same essential service in the protection of personal rights and liberties. Even so, not every act of a state may be reached through suit against its officers. Where such suits are adjudged to be against the state itself—actions affecting the public treasury for past wrongs and those seeking to dispossess the state of property—the Eleventh Amendment remains a bar (Edelman v. Jordan, 1974).

CLYDE E. JACOBS
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Atascadero State Hospital v. Scanlon; Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Halderman.)

Bibliography

JACOBS, CLYDE E. 1972 The Eleventh Amendment and Sovereign Immunity. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

NOWAK, JOHN E. 1975 The Scope of Congressional Power to Create Causes of Action Against State Governments and the History of the Eleventh and Fourteenth Amendments. Columbia Law Review 75:1413–1469.

ELEVENTH AMENDMENT
(Update 1)

The Eleventh Amendment is at the center of an important debate about state accountability under federal law. Part of the debate is historical: What was the amendment originally intended to do? Part of the debate concerns modern doctrine: What should the amendment mean today?

Everyone agrees that the Eleventh Amendment was adopted to overturn the result reached by the Supreme Court in CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793). In Chisholm, the Court heard a case brought by a citizen of South Carolina against the state of Georgia on a contract. The suit involved no question of federal law. It was brought under a provision of Article III conferring jurisdiction over "Controversies between a State and Citizens of another State." Despite Georgia's claim of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY from suit, the Court held that Georgia could be compelled to appear.

The amendment provides: "The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any foreign state." The historical debate concerns not whether but how the amendment was intended to overrule Chisholm. There are two ways to understand what the adopters of the amendment intended.

The first is to read the amendment as forbidding suits brought against states by out-of-state citizens or by foreign citizens or subjects. Under this reading, federal courts cannot take jurisdiction over such suits, even if a federal question is involved. The second is to read the amendment as repealing a jurisdiction that had previously been authorized. Under this reading, suits cannot be brought against states by out-of-state citizens or by foreign citizens or subjects merely because of the character of the parties. But if there is any other basis for jurisdiction, such as the existence of a federal question, suits are permitted. Under either reading of the amendment, ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION is not affected, for the amendment refers only to suits "in law or equity."

The Supreme Court was not forcEd to choose between the two readings of the amendment until after the CIVIL WAR. Eventually, the Court chose to read the amendment as forbidding jurisdiction whenever an out-of-stater or a foreigner sued a state, as a way of protecting southern states from suit under the federal CONTRACT CLAUSE after they defaulted on state-issued revenue bonds. The Court then filled in the "missing" term of the amendment by holding in Hans v. Louisiana (1890) that the underlying principle of the amendment required that suits by in-staters be forbidden as well. In this century, the Court has further expanded the prohibition of the amendment by reading it to prohibit suits by foreign countries (Principality of Monaco v. Mississippi, 1934) and in admiralty (Ex parte New York, No. 1, 1921).

In recent years, a number of legal scholars have argued that reading the amendment as only repealing the party-based jurisdiction of Article III is historically more accurate. Four Justices of the Supreme Court, led by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, have shared this view and have argued that modern doctrine should be brought into line with this understanding. In Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co. (1989), however, a majority of the Court refused to incorporate this historical view into modern doctrine.

Although the Court reads the Eleventh Amendment to forbid federal court jurisdiction even when federal law provides the basis for private parties' suits against the states, the prohibition may be avoided or overcome in a number of ways. First, a state may waive its sovereign immunity by a voluntary appearance. As Edelman v. Jordan (1974) illustrates, however, a state may raise a sovereign immunity defense for the first time on appeal after having made a voluntary appearance at trial and having lost on the merits of the dispute. Second, the Supreme Court held in Cohens v. Virginia (1821) that the Eleventh Amendment does not apply to appeals to the Supreme Court from the state courts. Third, a state's subdivisions are not protected by the amendment. Under the principle enunciated in Lincoln County v. Luning (1890) a municipality, county, or school board may be sued in federal court under federal law without regard to the Eleventh Amendment.

Fourth, suit may be brought against a state officer for prospective relief. The foundation case is Ex parte Young (1908), in which the Court permitted an INJUNCTION prohibiting a state officer from acting unconstitutionally. The principle was expanded to permit injunctions ordering affirmative actions by state officials in Edelman v. Jordan (1974). But the same decision held that a federal court is forbidden to award monetary relief that will necessarily come out of the state treasury.

Finally, Congress may abrogate the states' sovereign immunity by statutes explicitly so providing. Under an abrogating statute, a state may be sued directly for the retroactive monetary relief otherwise unavailable under Edelman. The first case to allow congressional abrogation was Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer (1976), which sustained a statute enacted under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The Court suggested in City of Rome v. United States (1980) that statutes passed under the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT could also abrogate state sovereign immunity. Most recently, the Court sustained an abrogating statute passed under the COMMERCE CLAUSE in Pennsylvania v. Union Gas (1989). The combined reach of the Fourteenth Amendment and the commerce clause is such that Congress has considerable freedom to abrogate state sovereign immunity so long as it employs language making its intention clear.

After the Court's decision in Union Gas, the debate among the Justices over the original meaning of the amendment may have lost most of its practical significance. Under current doctrine there appears to be no significant constraint on the power of Congress to authorize suit against the states, beyond the limitations inherent in the ENUMERATED POWERS under which Congress has acted. This position is not greatly different from that which would be achieved if the Eleventh Amendment were read as merely repealing party-based jurisdiction, leaving intact FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION for private suits brought under valid federal law. The most important difference is that the present doctrine requires Congress to speak clearly in lifting the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit in federal court.

WILLIAM A. FLETCHER
(1992)

Bibliography

FLETCHER, WILLIAM A. 1983 A Historical Interpretation of the Eleventh Amendment: A Narrow Construction of an Affirmative Grant of Jurisdiction Rather than a Prohibition Against Jurisdiction. Stanford Law Review 35:1033–1131.

GIBBONS, JOHN J. 1983 The Eleventh Amendment and State Sovereign Immunity: A Reinterpretation. Columbia Law Review 83:1889–2005.

ORTH, JOHN V. 1987 The Judicial Power of the United States: The Eleventh Amendment in American History. New York: Oxford University Press.

ELEVENTH AMENDMENT
(Update 2)

The Eleventh Amendment was the first change in the Constitution in response to a Supreme Court decision. In 1793, CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA upheld the Court's ORIGINAL JURISDICTION over an action on a contract by a citizen of South Carolina against the state of Georgia. The Eleventh Amendment, adopted in 1798, responded to that decision. It provides: "The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State."

There is substantial disagreement over what this amendment means. The current view of the Court is that Chisholm created a "shock of surprise," because it had never been thought that a state could be sued by private persons, and that the amendment was intended to protect states from such suits. This view reads the amendment, though in terms a limitation on federal JURISDICTION, as embodying a doctrine of state SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY. To understand why this reading is controversial, more history is in order.

Pre–CIVIL WAR decisions raised alternative and at times narrow interpretations of the amendment, for example, suggesting a "party of record" rule to avoid a bar when a state as such was not named as defendant, or hinting that the amendment did not apply when jurisdiction was based, not on who the parties were, but on the "arising under federal law" grant of power. By 1890, however, Hans v. Louisiana laid the basis for the current view, holding that a federal court could not hear a suit by a Louisiana bondholder against his state on a federal claim of unconstitutional impairment of contract. Even though the Eleventh Amendment by terms prohibited only a limited class of plaintiffs from suing, Hans reasoned that the amendment would never have been passed had it been understood to permit claims by in-staters, and that it should be read to provide immunity to a state from a suit by any private person. Later decisions expanded this immunity to include, for example, suits brought by foreign states or suits in ADMIRALTY.

As the activities of modern governments grew and came to overlap, state and local governments increasingly became subject to the substantive reach of federal statutes. Under Lincoln Co. v. Luning (1890), local governments are not regarded as "the state" for purposes of the Eleventh Amendment and accordingly can be sued in federal court. In Parden v. Terminal Railway of Alabama (1964), the Court, in a 5–4 decision, permitted a federal statutory claim against a state in federal court, arguing that states "surrendered a portion of their sovereignty" in agreeing to Congress's ENUMERATED POWERS and that by participating in the regulated activity (running a railroad) states waived their immunity. Soon the Court modulated its approach, insisting on more explicit "clear statements" to find congressional intent to authorize federal court suits against states or to find state waiver of immunity.

In a significant advance for state accountability under law, Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer (1974) upheld Congress's power, when acting to enforce the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, to subject states to suit in federal courts. New scholarship began to reexamine the amendment's text and history, arguing that the amendment did not restrain Congress from specifically authorizing suits, based on federal laws, against states. Many concluded that the amendment did not embody a broad principle of state immunity from federal court suit, but rather was a carefully limited repeal of a party-based head of jurisdiction over states, that left intact both FEDERAL QUESTION and admiralty heads of power. This "diversity repeal" view made sense of the limited text of the amendment, of the support for its enactment from both FEDERALISTS and ANTI-FEDERALISTS, and of the Court's subsequent appellate practice in federal question cases coming from the state courts.

In 1989, Union Gas v. Pennsylvania, by a 5–4 vote, upheld Congress's power to authorize suits against states under Article I. The PLURALITY OPINION extended the reasoning of Fitzpatrick to the COMMERCE CLAUSE, holding that if Congress spoke clearly enough, it could abrogate states' immunity when acting under the commerce clause, a plenary power that also limits state powers. In some tension with other DOCTRINES, the plurality treated the amendment as a limit on the Court's power to construe jurisdictional provisions to abrogate sovereign immunity, but not as a limit on Congress's power to abrogate state sovereign immunity pursuant to its plenary powers. The plurality's rationale would permit congressional abrogation of immunity, if in clear terms, under other Article I provisions. But its reign was short. Union Gas was OVERRULED by Seminole Tribe v. Florida (1996).

Endorsing Hans, Seminole Tribe, 5–4, concluded that Congress lacks power under Article I to abrogate states' constitutional immunity from suit. This immunity, merely exemplified by the amendment, protects state treasuries from federal judgments and state sovereignty from the "indignity" of being sued by individuals for any kind of relief. Thus, "[e]ven when the Constitution vests in Congress complete lawmaking authority over a particular area," Congress cannot authorize "suits by private parties against unconsenting states," and a law extending federal jurisdiction to disagreements between tribes and states over gambling on AMERICAN INDIAN reservations was thus unconstitutional. Seminole Tribe distinguished, and thus apparently preserved, Congress's power to abrogate immunity from suit under the Fourteenth Amendment, added to the Constitution after the Eleventh Amendment and designed as an explicit limit on state power.

Under Seminole Tribe, it is thus important to determine whether a particular federal statute that subjects states to suits in federal court has been properly enacted under Congress's powers under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, SECTION 5, or instead has been validly enacted only under an Article I power, for example, over INTERSTATE COMMERCE. For it is only under the Fourteenth Amendment (or possibly other post–Civil War amendments) that Congress may have power to create causes of action enforceable against states, as such, without their consent. Since Seminole Tribe, lower court decisions have considered whether Congress validly abrogated state immunity in enacting laws concerning, for example, BANKRUPTCY, COPYRIGHT PATENT, minimum wage, AGE DISCRIMINATION, and DISABILITY DISCRIMINATION under the Fourteenth Amendment. In two 1999 decisions, the Court gave a narrow reading to Congress's power under section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, holding unconstitutional two different federal remedial statutes authorizing suits against states. In Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board v. College Savings Bank (1999), the Court held that, although patents were a form of property protected by the Fourteenth Amendment from state "deprivations" without DUE PROCESS OF LAW, Congress's abrogation of states' immunity from suit for patent infringement was unconstitutional because of the possibility that state remedies would sufficiently compensate the patentholder and thereby provide due process. In College Savings Bank v. Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board (1999), the Court held that injuries to a business from unfair competition in violation of the federal Lanham Act were not deprivations of "property interests" for due process purposes and thus Congress had no basis under the Fourteenth Amendment for abrogating states' immunity to such claims. As of this writing, the Court has granted CERTIORARI in a case challenging the constitutionality of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act's abrogation of state immunity.

Eleventh Amendment doctrine does permit mechanisms for affirmative enforcement of federal law other than suits against states in federal courts. The most important of these are EX PARTE YOUNG (1908) actions against state officers for prospective injunctive relief against violations of federal (though not state) law. But while state officers may be sued for damages in their individual capacities, suits against state officers for such "retroactive" relief as accrued monetary liabilities payable from the state treasury are prohibited, as are some suits against state officers involving state interests in property. Seminole Tribe preserves the rule that prospective relief against state officers to prevent continuing violations of federal law is generally permitted, though the Court there refused to permit such an action on the somewhat implausible ground that it was impliedly precluded by the federal statute's authorization (held unconstitutional) of suit against the state directly. Whether the Ex parte Young doctrine will be substantially narrowed remains to be seen.

Other mechanisms for enforcing federal law against states include suits by the federal government, consented-to suits in state or federal courts, and suits by other states. The Eleventh Amendment does not bar the United States from suing a state. Some federal statutes, for example, the Fair Labor Standards Act, include provisions authorizing suit by the United States with recoveries ultimately payable over to individual beneficiaries. (The constitutionality of "qui tam" actions against states—that is, actions brought by private parties in the name of the United States to recover damages for fraud against the federal government, a portion of which recovery goes to the private party—is before the Court as of this writing.) States are not immune from suits by sister states, so long as the plaintiff state is not suing merely as parens patriae for a small number of private interests. Although the amendment does not apply to a suit against one state in the courts of another under Nevada v. Hall (1979), Alden v. Maine (1999) holds that states can constitutionally refuse to consent to suits against themselves in their own courts under federal law, thereby substantially limiting the practical availability of relief in state courts.

Finally, unlike other constitutional limits on federal JUDICIAL POWER that cannot be disregarded on the parties' consent, a state can waive its constitutional immunity, consenting to jurisdiction in either federal or state court. However, in College Savings Bank the Court overruled Parden and held that Congress may not require states to consent to suit as a condition of being permitted to engage in activity subject to regulation under the commerce clause. Such a constructive waiver theory, the Court said, was indistinguishable from abrogation, and the "voluntariness of the waiver [is] destroyed when what is attached to the refusal to waive is the exclusion of the State from otherwise lawful activity." The Court, however, preserved Congress's authority to insist on a consent-to-suit clause in approving bi-state compacts, or as a condition for receiving federal funds.

The recent expansion of states' immunity from federal jurisdiction is in tension with RULE OF LAW ideas spreading elsewhere in the world. While this entry describes the current state of the law, the closely split decisions of the decade beginning in 1989 may foreshadow further uncertainties on the amenability of states to federal court process for enforcement of federal law, particularly considering Seminole Tribe's interaction with other developments in FEDERALISM. For now, the Eleventh Amendment bars Congress from subjecting states to suits in federal court for violations of federal laws enacted under Article I of the Constitution, and limits the relief that may be sought against state officers, and a comparable doctrine of constitutional sovereign immunity protects states from suit on federal claims in their own courts.

Postscript. In Kimel v. Florida Board of Regents (2000), the Court held that Congress's attempted abrogation of states' Eleventh Amendment immunity for claims under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) was not constitutional. Application of the ADEA to the states had been upheld as an exercise of commerce clause power in EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION (EEOC) V. WYOMING (1983), but Seminole Tribe held that Congress lacks power to abrogate sovereign immunity from suit under that clause. The basic question in Kimel was whether the ADEA was a valid exercise of Congress's power under the Fourteenth Amendment, section 5, so as to authorize Congress to abrogate the states' immunity from suit. The Court, finding that the ADEA was clearly intended to abrogate the states' immunity, nonetheless held that Congress lacked power to act under the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court reasoned that age is not a "suspect" basis for classification, and that states accordingly had latitude to make rational age classifications; yet the ADEA generally prohibits state employers from relying on "age as a proxy for other qualities." Because rational age classifications by states are permissible under the Constitution, the Court held that the act could not be justified as "proportional" to violations of section 1 that Congress has power to remedy. And because the ADEA could not be upheld as an exercise of Fourteenth Amendment power, it could not constitutionally abrogate the states' immunity from suit.

VICKI C. JACKSON
(2000)

Bibliography

AMAR, AKHIL REED 1987 Of Sovereignty and Federalism. Yale Law Journal 96:1425–1520.

FLETCHER, WILLIAM A. 1983 A Historical Interpretation of the Eleventh Amendment: A Narrow Construction of an Affirmative Grant of Jurisdiction Rather Than A Prohibition Against Jurisdiction. Stanford Law Review 35:1033–1131.

GIBBONS, JOHN 1983 The Eleventh Amendment and State Sovereign Immunity: A Reinterpretation. Columbia Law Review 83:1889–2129.

JACKSON, VICKI C. 1988 The Supreme Court, The Eleventh Amendment, and State Sovereign Immunity. Yale Law Journal 88:1–126.

——— 1997 Seminole Tribe, the Eleventh Amendment and the Potential Evisceration of Ex Parte Young. New York University Law Review 72:495–546.

MARSHALL, WILLIAM P. 1989 The Diversity Theory of the Eleventh Amendment: A Critical Evaluation. Harvard Law Review 102:1372–1396.

MELTZER, DANIEL J. 1996 The Seminole Decision and State Sovereign Immunity. Supreme Court Review 1996:1–65.

ORTH, JOHN V. 1987 The Judicial Power of the United States: The Eleventh Amendment in American History. New York: Oxford University Press.

VAZQUEZ, CARLOS 1997 What Is Eleventh Amendment Immunity? Yale Law Journal 106:1683–1806.

ELFBRANDT v. RUSSELL
384 U.S. 11 (1966)

By a 5–4 vote, the WARREN COURT struck down a section of Arizona's Communist Control Act of 1961, which subjected state employees to perjury prosecutions if they subscribed to a state LOYALTY OATH while members of the Communist party, later joined the party, or joined "any other organization" having for "one of its purposes" the overthrow of the government. For the majority, Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS argued that even knowing membership in the Communist party could not expose one to criminal punishment without proof of specific intent to further the organization's illegal goals of violent revolution. Such a law "infringes unnecessarily on protected freedoms. It rests on the doctrine of " GUILT BY ASSOCIATION' which has no place here. . . ."

The dissenters were led by Justice BYRON R. WHITE. "If a government may remove from office . . . and . . . criminally punish . . . its employees who engage in certain political activities," White wrote, "it is unsound to hold that it may not, on pain of criminal penalties, prevent its employees from affiliating with the Communist Party or other organizations prepared to employ violent means to overthrow constitutional government."

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

ELKINS v. UNITED STATES
364 U.S. 206 (1960)

In Elkins the Supreme Court overthrew the SILVER PLATTER DOCTRINE, an exception to the EXCLUSIONARY RULE allowing use in federal prosecutions of evidence seized by state officers in illegal searches. Two changes had undermined the authority of the doctrine since it was formulated in WEEKS V. UNITED STATES (1914). First, the extension of the constitutional prohibition of unreasonable searches to the states in WOLF V. COLORADO (1949) meant that the doctrine now permitted federal courts to admit evidence unconstitutionally seized. Second, the doctrine vitiated the policies of about half the states, which had in the meantime independently adopted an exclusionary rule.

The Elkins opinion, in addition, contains the most thorough and convincing analysis in favor of the exclusionary rule to be found in any opinion of the Court; it thus laid the groundwork for imposition of the rule on the states the following year in MAPP V. OHIO (1961).

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

ELKINS ACT
32 Stat. 847 (1903)

The decisions in INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION V. CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY (1897) and its companion case, ICC v. Alabama Midland Railway Company, had stripped the Interstate Commerce Commission of much of its regulatory power. As a result, many of the evils the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT had been designed to remedy had revived. One of the most pernicious abuses was the practice of rebating. Federal legislation forbidding the practice would not only save the railroads money but also protect them against demands imposed by the trusts. Sponsored by the railroads, the Elkins Act made any deviation from the published rate schedule (whether a rebate or a general rate reduction) a criminal offense. Although Congress repealed the imprisonment penalty, it quadrupled the fine and directly subjected the corporations to the penalty; no longer could the principal escape punishment for its agents' acts. Anyone who sought or received a rebate (or other rate concession) was equally liable to criminal penalties. Despite the act's significance, further legislation would prove necessary. Charges were now enforced, but the ICC was still powerless to replace discriminatory rates. Congress would expand ICC powers and extend regulatory control over the rails in the HEPBURN and MANN-ELKINS ACTS.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

SHARFMAN, ISAIAH L. 1931–1937 The Interstate Commerce Commission. Vol. 1. New York: Commonwealth Fund.

ELLSWORTH, OLIVER
(1745–1807)

Oliver Ellsworth played a key role in the creation of the United States Constitution in 1787 and the establishment of a national judiciary during the Constitution's first decade.

Born into a well-established Connecticut family, he entered Yale in 1762, but left after two years to attend the College of New Jersey (Princeton) where he was graduated with a B.A. in 1766. Ellsworth returned to Connecticut and studied theology for about a year, but abandoned it for the law and was admitted to the bar in 1771. One of the ablest lawyers of his day, he built up an extremely lucrative practice. He also entered politics and was elected to the state's General Assembly in 1773. A warm supporter of the patriot cause against Great Britain, he helped supervise the state's military expenditures during the war for independence, was appointed state attorney for Hartford in 1777, a member of the Governor's Council in 1780, and a judge of the Connecticut Supreme Court in 1785. He also served as one of the state's representatives to the Continental Congress for six terms (1777–1783). While in Congress he became a member of the Committee of Appeals which heard appeals from state admiralty courts, and in this capacity he ruled on the important case of Gideon Olmstead and the British sloop Active which eventually culminated in UNITED STATES V. PETERS (1809).

In 1787 Connecticut selected him to be one of its three delegates to the federal CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION in Philadelphia. He played an active role at the convention and won respect for his orderly mind and his effectiveness as a debater. Ellsworth favored the movement to establish a strong and active federal government with the power to act directly on individuals and to levy taxes, as a substitute for the weak central government created by the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. But he also thought that the VIRGINIA PLAN went too far in a nationalist direction. "The only chance of supporting a general government lies in grafting it on those of the original states," he argued. In particular, he opposed the idea of apportioning representation in both houses of Congress according to population, to the clear advantage of larger states. To resolve the differences between the large and the small states he helped forge the successful GREAT COMPROMISE which apportioned representation in the lower house according to population and in the Senate by a rule of equality, with each state having two senators. Ellsworth also played an active role on the Committee on Detail which produced the basic draft of the United States Constitution.

Following adoption of the Constitution, Connecticut elected Ellsworth to the United States Senate. He recognized that the Constitution as written and ratified was only a basic outline; an actual government had to be created and its powers implemented. He supported ALEXANDER HAMILTON's financial program and was opposed to attempts to ally the United States too closely with France, but his most important contribution was the drafting of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789. This law was in many ways an extension of the Constitution itself, for it fleshed out the terse third article of that document which dealt with the nature and powers of the federal judiciary. The Judiciary Act of 1789 specified that the Supreme Court should consist of six Justices, that each state should have a district court, and that there should be three circuit courts consisting of two Supreme Court Justices sitting with a district judge. Under this law the fedral courts were given exclusive JURISDICTION in a number of important areas and CONCURRENT JURISDICTION with the state courts in other matters. The act also provided that decisions of the state courts involving the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States could be appealed to the Supreme Court.

In 1796 President GEORGE WASHINGTON appointed Ellsworth Chief Justice of the United States. He held the post for three years but had little impact. The cases he heard were not very significant, illness limited his participation in the duties of the Court, and a diplomatic mission took him out of the country. Perhaps his most important decision came in Wiscart v. Dauchy (1796) in which he examined the relationship of the Supreme Court to the district and circuit courts, established a series of important rules dealing with WRITS OF ERROR, and extended COMMON LAW procedures in APPEALS to EQUITY and ADMIRALTY jurisdiction as well. His opinions tended to be brief, to the point, and nationalist in orientation. In United States v. La Vengeance (1796) he expanded the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts to inland navigable rivers, the Great Lakes, and other water routes away from the high seas; and while riding circuit in United States v. Isaac Williams (1799) he upheld the English common law DOCTRINE that citizens of a country did not have a right to expatriate themselves without their native country's consent.

As Chief Justice, Ellsworth encouraged the practice of the Supreme Court's handing down PER CURIAM opinions, with a single decision representing the will of the entire court, as opposed to having separate SERIATIM opinions by the individual Justices. JOHN MARSHALL, who succeeded Ellsworth as Chief Justice, considered the continuation and further development of this practice all-important in maintaining respect for the authority of the Court when it handed down controversial decisions.

In 1799 Ellsworth, over the protest of some of his closest associates, agreed to a request from President JOHN ADAMS to be part of a special diplomatic mission to resolve the undeclared naval war with France. The mission was a success, but Ellsworth became ill while abroad, resigned the chief justiceship in October 1800, and stayed in England to recuperate. By the time he returned to America the Jeffersonians had triumphed and he retired from public life.

RICHARD E. ELLIS
(1986)

Bibliography

BROWN, WILLIAM GARROTT 1905 The Life of Oliver Ellsworth. New York: Macmillan.

GOEBEL, JULIUS, JR. 1971 History of the Supreme Court of the United States, Vol. 1: Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801. New York: Macmillan.

ELLSWORTH COURT

See: Supreme Court, 1789–1801

EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION
12 Stat. 68 (1863)

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, employing the Constitution's WAR POWERS, announced the Emancipation Proclamation on September 22, 1862. It had its roots in ABOLITIONIST CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY. Although Lincoln's swift rise in the Republican party was due in part to his outspoken opposition to the extension of SLAVERY, on the outset of the war he was bound by the Constitution (Article IV, section 2) and federal laws on FUGITIVE SLAVES that required federal officials to return runaways, even to disloyal owners. Politically ambitious Union general George B. McClellan, a conservative would-be Democratic presidential candidate, sternly enforced the 1850 law; generals BENJAMIN F. BUTLER and John Charles Frémont, by contrast, refused to return runaways in their commands and armed some against rebel guerrillas. Lincoln countermanded the latter's orders to dim the issue of arming Negroes and to keep policy in civilians' hands.

Negroes continued to flee to Union lines no matter what orders civilians or generals issued. Awareness grew in the Union army and among bluecoats' families and other correspondents that almost the only trustworthy southerners were blacks. Gradually, sentiment increased that to return runaways was indecent and illogical, for slaves were the South's labor force. In Congress, with few exceptions, Democrats remained uneducable on the runaway issue and damned as unconstitutional any mass emancipation whether by EXECUTIVE ORDER or statute and whether or not involving colonization of freedmen abroad or compensation to loyal owners. Republicans, from Lincoln down, altered their opinions on race matters. Some northern states softened racist BLACK CODE clauses in constitutions and civil and criminal laws; some made laws color-blind. Congress, in addition to the CONFISCATION ACTS and with Lincoln's assent, enacted laws in March, April, and June 1862, respectively, that prohibited military returns of disloyal owners' runaways without requiring a judicial verdict of disloyalty, ended slavery in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA with compensation to owners, and forbade slavery in the federal TERRITORIES, thus challenging part of DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857). In effect, Republicans, retaining their basic view of the Constitution as an adaptable instrument, were adopting aspirations that abolitionist constitutionalists had long advanced.

Fearing conservative gains in the 1862 congressional and state elections, congressional Republicans then marked time. Lincoln did not have this option. He determined to reverse two centuries of race history if continued Confederate intransigence forced further changes and if the Union won the war.

Therefore, following the Antietam "victory," Lincoln proclaimed that unless slaveowners in still-unoccupied states of the Confederacy (he excluded unseceded slaveholding states) publicly renounced the rebellion by January 1, 1863, their slaves "shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free." All Union military personnel must positively assist, not merely not impede, runaways from slavery. With respect to unseceded slaveholding states, Lincoln encouraged "immediate or gradual" emancipation by state initiative, with compensation to loyal owners and colonization of freedmen abroad.

The Proclamation was not an immediate success. It diminished opinion abroad favoring recognition of the Confederacy. Few southern whites abjured the rebellion before the deadline. Lincoln, on New Year's Day 1863, announced the Proclamation to be in effect. But he had enlarged his horizons, adding an announcement that he would recruit blacks for the Union's armies. Relatively few blacks lived in northern states. Lincoln's new policy, if successful—which meant if Union voters persevered, if enough slaves kept coming into Union lines, and if Union forces occupied enough Confederate areas—could drain the South of its basic labor force and augment the Union's military power.

The policy eventually succeeded. Almost 200,000 black bluecoats, overwhelmingly southern in origin, helped to crush the rebellion. Dred Scott was made irrelevant. Though black Union soldiers and sailors suffered inequities in rank, pay, and dignity compared to whites, their military record made it impossible for the nation to consider them again as submen in law, though racists advocated the retrograde view. Compared to their prewar status even in the free states, blacks' legal and constitutional conditions improved as a result of the Proclamation. It initiated also an irreversible revolution in race relationships leading to the WADE-DAVIS BILL, the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, and the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866. But the eventual consequence of the Emancipation Proclamation was Appomattox; thereby, alternatives forbidden by Dred Scott, by the 1861 Crittenden Compromise, and by the aborted Thirteenth Amendment of 1861, became options. This society could be slaveless, biracial, and more decently equal in the constitutions, laws, and customs of the nation and the states.

HAROLD M. HYMAN
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Civil War.)

Bibliography

BELZ, HERMAN 1978 Emancipation and Equal Rights: Politics and Constitutionalism in the Civil War Era. New York: Norton.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. and WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1982 Equal Justice under Law: Constitutional Development 1835–1875. Pages 252–255. New York: Harper & Row.

OATES, STEPHEN B. 1977 With Malice Toward None: The Life of Abraham Lincoln. New York: Harper & Row.

VOEGELI, V. JACQUES 1967 Free But Not Equal: The Midwest and the Negro During the Civil War. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

EMBARGO ACTS
(1807–1809)

For fifteen months the United States under President THOMAS JEFFERSON pursued a policy of economic coercion against foreign powers as an alternative to war. In retaliation for attacks on American commerce during the Napoleonic wars, a compliant Congress gave Jefferson everything he requested, including five embargo acts which sought to compel England and France to respect American maritime rights in return for a restoration of American trade. The first three acts, which interdicted that trade, could be constitutionally defended by a doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS that Jefferson once thought inimical to American liberty. In United States v. The William (1808) a federal district court invoked a BROAD CONSTRUCTION of the COMMERCE CLAUSE, reinforced by the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE, to justify a ruling that the power to regulate commerce included the power to prohibit it. Justice WILLIAM JOHNSON of the Supreme Court, a Jefferson appointee, rebuked the President in a circuit case, Gilchrist v. Collector (1808), for having exceeded his statutory authority in enforcing the embargo acts, and another Jefferson appointee, Justice BROCKHOLST LIVINGSTON, in United States v. Hoxie (1808), scathed the President for insinuating the doctrine of constructive treason into a prosecution for violation of the acts. The draconian fourth embargo act carried the administration to the precipice of unlimited enforcement powers and mocked Republican principles by its concentration of authority in the President, its employment of the navy for enforcement, and its disregard of the FOURTH AMENDMENT's protection against UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures. Unconstitutional military enforcement characterized the fifth embargo act, which rivaled any legislation in American history for its suppressiveness. The embargo acts, having failed their purpose, lapsed when Jefferson left office.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

EMERGENCY BANK ACT
48 Stat. 1 (1933)

When FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT took office on March 4, 1933, banks had closed in thirty-eight states. The next day Roosevelt declared a national bank holiday, suspended all gold transactions, and called a special session of Congress for March 9. On that day Congress rushed through, and that same evening Roosevelt signed, a bill submitted by the White House aimed at ending the panic that had begun earlier that year. The bill ratified Roosevelt's actions, which he had based on the questionable authority of the 1917 Trading With the Enemy Act. The act gained constitutional significance by thus expanding executive authority. Congress also gave the President discretionary authority over national and Federal Reserve banks. The act provided for calling in all gold and gold certificates in circulation and assessed criminal penalties for hoarding. The government could appoint conservators for the assets of insolvent banks, and the Treasury could license the reopening of sound ones and reorganize the remainder. The act further authorized the emergency issuance of paper notes up to a limit of one hundred percent of the value of government bonds in its member banks.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

EMERGENCY COURT OF APPEALS

In the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, Congress established a comprehensive system of administrative control over prices, as a means of checking the inflation that accompanied this country's entry into WORLD WAR II. The Act created a temporary Emergency Court of Appeals, staffed by federal judges from the district courts and courts of appeals, with exclusive JURISDICTION to determine the validity of price control regulations. Regulated persons thus could not challenge the administrative regulations' constitutionality or statutory authorization in the ordinary state or federal courts—either in injunctive proceedings or by way of defense to criminal prosecutions for their violation. The only course open was to obey the regulations and challenge their validity in the newly created court.

In a series of decisions, the most important of which was YAKUS V. UNITED STATES (1944), the Supreme Court upheld the validity of this scheme (Lockerty v. Phillips, 1943; Bowles v. Willingham, 1944; see also JUDICIAL SYSTEM).

A Temporary Emergency Court of Appeals, established in 1971, is similarly staffed by judges from other federal courts. It hears appeals from the district courts in cases arising under various congressional statutes regulating allocation and pricing of certain commodities.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BATOR, PAUL M.; MISHKIN, PAUL J.; SHAPIRO, DAVID L.; and WECHSLER, HERBERT, eds. 1973 Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System, 2nd ed. Pages 317–322. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

EMERGENCY POWERS

As justifications for taking emergency action without first receiving legislative authority, chief executives from different countries have relied on "reason of state" (raison d'état) and "prerogative." JOHN LOCKE, in the Second Treatise on Civil Government (1690), defined prerogative as the power to act "according to discretion for the common good, without the prescription of the law and sometimes even against it. . . ." More concise is the maxim salus populi suprema lex: the safety of the people is the supreme law.

The United States Constitution contains few provisions for emergency power. Congress has the power to meet emergencies by passing LEGISLATION. Under Article I, section 8, Congress may declare war and call forth the militia to suppress insurrections and to repel invasions. Article II authorizes the President to convene Congress "on extraordinary Occasions" for the purpose of enacting emergency legislation.

An exception to this statutory process is implied in the debates at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. The Framers recognized that the President might have to begin military operations for defensive purposes before Congress could act. When one of the delegates proposed that Congress be empowered to "make war," it was objected that legislative proceedings might at times be too slow for the safety of the country. "Declare" was substituted for "make," giving Congress the power to declare war but allowing the President discretionary authority "to repel sudden attacks."

For twentieth-century America, the concept of "defensive war" has expanded to include military actions far beyond the nation's borders. The long drawn-out war in Southeast Asia led to the WAR POWERS RESOLUTION of 1973, an effort to reconcile the war-making power of the President with the war-declaring power of Congress. The statute attempts to insure the "collective judgment" of both branches by requiring the President to consult with Congress "in every possible instance," to report to Congress within forty-eight hours after introducing forces into hostilities, and to withdraw those forces unless he receives congressional support within sixty or ninety days. Congress may at any time during this period pass a CONCURRENT RESOLUTION (which is not subject to veto) directing the President to remove forces engaged in hostilities. The consultation and reporting provisions have had mixed results. The LEGISLATIVE VETO mechanism in the War Powers Resolution was declared invalid in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983).

Article I, section 9, permits the suspension of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS "in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion [when] the public Safety may require it." It has never been determined conclusively whether this power resides solely in Congress or is shared with the President. History supports the latter interpretation. In April 1861, while Congress was in recess, President ABRAHAM LINCOLN issued proclamations ordering a number of emergency actions, including the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Congress supported his initiatives, as did a sharply divided Supreme Court in the PRIZE CASES (1863).

Although Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY had earlier placed the power of suspension exclusively with Congress, in Ex parte Merryman (1861), Lincoln ignored the court order and continued to exercise emergency powers. His attorney general, EDWARD BATES, argued that the President shared with Congress the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. In such cases as EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866) and DUNCAN V. KAHANAMOKU (1946), the Supreme Court has held illegal the establishment of military tribunals to try civilians in areas where the civil courts are open. In these decisions, however, the Court took care to assert judicial control at the close of, rather than during, hostilities.

The President's emergency power has also grown because of authority delegated to him by Congress. These authorities would sometimes come to life whenever the President issued a proclamation declaring the nation to be in a state of emergency. A report issued by a Senate special committee in 1973 disclosed that four proclamations (issued by FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT in 1933, HARRY S. TRUMAN in 1950, and RICHARD M. NIXON in 1970 and 1971) brought to life 470 provisions of federal law. Each statute conferred upon the President some facet of control over the lives and property of American citizens.

The NATIONAL EMERGENCIES ACT of 1976 restricted the use of presidential emergency powers. The statute terminated emergency authorities two years from the date of the bill's enactment (September 14, 1976). For future national emergencies the President must publish a declaration in the Federal Register. Congress could terminate the national emergency by passing a concurrent resolution. After the Chadha decision, Congress substituted a joint resolution for the concurrent resolution. To prevent "emergencies" from lingering for decades without congressional attention or action, the 1976 statute contained an action-forcing mechanism. No later than six months after the President declares a national emergency, and at least every six months thereafter while the emergency continues, each House of Congress must meet to consider a vote to terminate the emergency.

The 1976 statute exempted certain provisions of law, including section 5(b) of the Trading With the Enemy Act, first enacted in 1917. This section had become a source of presidential authority in peacetime as well as wartime. President Roosevelt, for example, used section 5(b) in 1933 to declare a national emergency. Legislation in 1977 attempted to strengthen congressional control, allowing Congress to terminate an emergency by passing a concurrent resolution (a joint resolution would now be required). It was under the 1977 legislation that President Jimmy Carter seized Iranian assets in 1979, an action upheld by the Supreme Court two years later in DAMES & MOORE V. REGAN (1981).

LOUIS FISHER
(1986)

Bibliography

ROSSITER, CLINTON 1963 Constitutional Dictatorship: Crisis Government in the Modern Democracies. New York: Harcourt, Brace & world.

U.S. CONGRESS 1976 The National Emergencies Act (Public Law 94–412). Source Book: Legislative History, Texts, and Other Documents. Senate Committee on Government Operations and Senate Special Committee on National Emergencies and Delegated Emergency Powers. 94th Congress, 2d session.

EMERGENCY PRICE CONTROL ACT
56 Stat. 23 (1942)

The most important independent administrative agency set up during WORLD WAR II was the Office of Price Administration (OPA). The agency began studying plans for rationing and price fixing in April 1941 without benefit of statutory authority. The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 gave the OPA official status, with broad powers for price regulation and a price administrator to make the act effective. The administrator was given broad discretion to supervise and fix prices and rent ceilings, combat profiteering and speculation, expedite defense purchases without excessive waste, and place limits on wages and other income from PRODUCTION. From 1942 to 1945, the OPA approached complete regulation of prices and rents. To prevent sellers and landlords from seeking INJUNCTIONS in state or federal courts against enforcement of particular price orders, the statute directed all determinations of the legality of price orders, including their constitutionality, to an EMERGENCY COURT OF APPEALS, established in Washington, D.C.

Unlike most wartime agencies, the OPA was challenged in the courts. The Supreme Court was supportive, upholding in YAKUS V. UNITED STATES (1944) those portions of the EPCA delegating to the OPA power to fix prices; in Bowles v. Willingham (1944) the Court upheld an OPA rent-fixing directive. Yakus also upheld the channeling of issues of legality to the Emergency Court of Appeals, which had the effect of requiring other courts to enforce price orders irrespective of the question of their lawfulness. In Steuart and Bros. v. Bowles (1944), the system of "indirect sanctions," whereby the OPA imposed its controls on the economy without formal resort to the judicial process, was sustained; the Court refused to interfere with the principal coercive device whereby various executive agencies gave practical force to their directives.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

UNITED STATES OFFICE OF TEMPORARY CONTROLS 1947 The Beginnings of OPA. Washington, D.C.: Office of Temporary Controls.

EMINENT DOMAIN

In his argument as counsel in WEST RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY V. DIX (1848), the first case in which the Supreme Court ruled directly on the constitutionality of the states' power of eminent domain, DANIEL WEBSTER thundered against the whole concept of state discretion in "takings." Only in the past few years, he contended, had this power of eminent domain been recognized in American law. Claims for its legitimacy, moreover, were "adopted from writers on other and arbitrary [civil law] governments," he declared; and eminent domain could easily become an instrument for establishment by the states of "unlimited despotisms over the private citizens." Webster tried, in effect, to get the court to impose Fifth Amendment standards on the states.

Webster was engaged in a failing cause. Besides, his history was inaccurate and his predictions of disaster were simplistic. He was certainly right, however, in seeing the eminent domain power as a formidable threat to VESTED RIGHTS, corporate or individual. He understood that eminent domain condemnations might become a proxy for regulation under the POLICE POWER, undermining the CONTRACT CLAUSE as a bulwark of PROPERTY RIGHTS. He was right in raising the alarm when he did; when West River Bridge was argued there had been a vast increase in activity by government and private CORPORATIONS in exercise of eminent domain. The transportation revolution in America was in an expansionary phase; extensive new railroad construction reinforced the effects on PROPERTY law already felt from canal, turnpike, and bridge enterprises. All these ventures required use of the "taking" power in order to accomplish their purposes.

Contrary to Webster's version of legal history, government's power to expropriate privately owned property for a variety of public purposes had long been an element of Anglo-American law. The power of eminent domain was the power to compel transfers to government or government's assignees. In its constitutional version, even in the 1840s, it was understood as a power that could be exercised legitimately only for a PUBLIC USE or PUBLIC PURPOSE, and that required the payment of JUST COMPENSATION. In English decisions and statutes going back several centuries, in American colonial law, and in the state law of the early republic, this power of taking by governmental authority had been exercised for such purposes as road-building, fortifications, drainage (including the great Fens projects of England in the seventeenth century), navigational improvement on rivers, and construction of bridges and canals. In colonial Massachusetts, statute had extended a variant of the power into the manufacturing sector by authorizing builders of mills to dam up streams, flooding neighboring lands; these "milldam laws" provided for assessment of damages and payment of compensation in cash.

The Fifth Amendment—which the Supreme Court would rule in BARRON V. BALTIMORE (1833) was not applicable to the states—expressed the views and used language already embodied in several of the state constitutions adopted during the Revolutionary era. Thus the amendment's requirement that property could be taken "for public use" and on payment of "just compensation" had been foreshadowed by such documents as the 1780 Massachusetts Declaration of Rights, which declared that "whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive reasonable compensation therefor."

Although several early state constitutions lacked such language, uniformly the state courts, in reviewing takings cases, ruled that general principles of justice, the writings of the natural-law jurists, or the constitutional values reflected in the Fifth Amendment justified imposition by judges of both a "public use" and a "just compensation" limitation upon their legislatures' uses of the eminent domain power. It was a singular feature of legal development in the states, however, that despite the widespread formal adoption of such limitations, in fact only slight constraints were placed on the legislatures. In practice, compensation paid to persons suffering from takings was far below market value (and, because of offsetting benefits commonly calculated against damages, often they were paid nothing in cash); hence, eminent domain became an instrument for the subsidization, through cost reduction, of both governmental enterprises and favored private undertakings. "Public convenience" became, in most states, a legitimate reading of the "public use" requirement; and in practice, the legislatures enjoyed wide discretion in deciding what types of enterprise might be vested with the power to expropriate private property. Ironically, the very bridge and railroad corporations that Webster represented so often were among the greatest beneficiaries of eminent domain devolution in that era.

The Court in West River Bridge wholly rejected Webster's contentions, ruling that state eminent domain powers were "paramount to all private rights vested under the government." It left the state courts to decide for themselves whether compensation payments were just in particular cases, or whether DUE PROCESS requirements of state constitutions had been met.

So stood constitutional doctrine until the adoption of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Under its due process clause, the door was opened to challenges in federal courts of state eminent domain actions. Increasingly, too, in the late nineteenth century, the Supreme Court was called upon to rule upon the constitutionality of regulatory measures that activist state legislatures were enacting. The issue tended to take the form of defining a "taking," with the constitutional requirement it connoted, as opposed to bona fide use of the police power, which did not require compensation. The Court ruled in a succession of cases that the Fourteenth Amendment embodied the requirements of "public use" and "just compensation." It took a broad view, however, of what types of enterprise the states might aid with devolutions of the eminent domain power; in a series of cases on irrigation districts, drainage companies, individual enterprises and corporation activities in other areas such as logging and mining, and the more traditional areas of state activity, the Court upheld legislative discretion under a permissive "public use" standard.

In MUGLER V. KANSAS (1887), the Court attempted to distinguish between a taking, which required compensation, and uses of the police power, which it defined as laws abating nuisances or limiting uses of property that were harmful to "health, morals, or safety of the community," not compensable. But drawing the police powereminent domain line proved difficult; indeed, it perplexes the Court to the present day. In Pennsylvania Coal Company v. Mahon (1922), Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES argued that the police power and eminent domain power are on a single continuum; differences are a matter of degree, not qualitative. The Court has continued to struggle with the issue, and in modern land-use ZONING cases from EUCLID V. AMBLER REALTY (1926) to Agins v. Tiburon (1980) it has sought a firmer ground to replace the distinction Holmes found so appropriate.

The Court has upheld congressional discretion in deciding what purposes of federal eminent domain met the Fifth Amendment's "public use" requirement. In United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railway Company (1896), the Court declared acceptable any use "which is legitimate and lies within the scope of the Constitution." In United States ex rel. Tennessee Valley Authority v. Welch (1946) the Court carried the doctrine to an extreme, concluding that a congressional decision to authorize expropriation of property "is entitled to deference until it is shown to involve an impossibility." A few years later, Berman v. Parker (1954) upheld federal eminent domain takings to conduct an urban redevelopment project in the District of Columbia. Here the end was the public welfare, a "broad and inclusive" concept, the Court declared, that certainly embraced slum clearance and an urban development designed to be "beautiful as well as sanitary." Given the validity of this purpose, it was legitimate to invoke eminent domain, which was only a means. Congress must decide as to the need for the project and its design.

In its quest to develop standards to distinguish takings from legitimate exercise of the police power, the Court has probed to the heart of property concepts. What rights are "vested," how "reasonable expectations" should be defined, what obligations inhere in the ownership of private property—all are questions that come to the surface repeatedly in continuing litigation. Nearly 150 years ago, Chief Justice LEMUEL SHAW of Massachusetts admonished, in Boston Water Power Company v. Railroad (1839), that the eminent domain power "must be large and liberal, so as to meet the public exigencies, and it must be so limited and constrained, as to secure effectually the rights of the citizen; and it must depend, in some instances, upon the nature of the exigencies as they arise, and the circumstances of individual cases." Shaw's view may have lacked prescriptive potential, but it has proved remarkably accurate in predicting the direction that the law would take—and the perplexities that would beset the best efforts of lawmakers and judges to produce definitive formulae.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff.)

Bibliography

DUNHAM, ALLISON 1962 Griggs v. Allegheny County in Perspective: Thirty Years of Supreme Court Expropriation Law. Supreme Court Review 1962:63–106.

GRANT, J. A. C. 1931 The "Higher Law" Background of the Law of Eminent Domain. Wisconsin Law Review 6:67–85.

HURST, JAMES WILLARD 1964 Law and Economic Growth: The Legal History of the Lumber Industry in Wisconsin, 1836–1915. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

SCHEIBER, HARRY N. 1971 The Road to Munn: Eminent Domain and the Concept of Public Purpose in the State Courts. Perspectives in American History 5:327–402.

STOEBUCK, WILLIAM B. 1972 A General Theory of Eminent Domain. Washington Law Review 47:553–608.

——— 1980 Police Power, Takings, and Due Process. Washington and Lee Law Review 37:1057–1099.

EMINENT DOMAIN
(Update)

One of the most challenging and enduring puzzles in American constitutional law is how one distinguishes a compensable TAKING OF PROPERTY from a legitimate and noncompensable exercise of the POLICE POWER. To suggest the Supreme Court's approach to the question, Harry N. Scheiber, author of the Encyclopedia's principal article on eminent domain, looked back and away from the Court to Chief Justice LEMUEL SHAW of Massachusetts. Shaw had observed in 1839 that much depends "upon the nature of the exigencies as they arise, and the circumstances of individual cases." As of 1985, Scheiber concluded, Shaw's view "lacked prescriptive potential, but it has proved remarkably accurate in predicting the direction that the law would take—and the perplexities that would beset the best efforts of lawmakers and judges to produce definitive formulae."

Even in 1985, however, there were at least some "definitive formulae" by which to identify regulatory takings. First, it had long been thought that government regulatory action resulting in physical invasion of private PROPERTY should always be regarded as a taking, no matter how trivial the intrusion, and this per se rule was firmly endorsed by the Court in LORETTO V. TELEPROMPTER, INC. (1982), at least if the government invasion was "permanent." A second per se rule—that government regulation of nuisance-like activity was never to be regarded as a taking, no matter how substantial the burden of the regulation—was also clear enough.

Neither of these per se rules could be of much importance in the modern regulatory state, for modern regulation seldom results in physical invasions and commonly reaches beyond the mere control of nuisances. Yet, in this broad and important middle ground, the Court in 1985 was self-consciously drawing the line between takings and the police power in just the ad hoc fashion that Shaw had long ago foreseen. The two per se rules aside, the Court's approach was one of balancing a number of considerations, including the mix and breadth of benefits and burdens worked by a regulation, its economic impact, and the extent of its interference with concrete investment-backed expectations. The ad hoc approach played into the two per se rules as well, because temporary physical invasions were to be examined in terms of balancing and because the characterization of something as a nuisance is itself a matter of more or less.

Have matters changed since 1985? The answer depends in large part on three cases decided by the Court in 1987: Nollan v. California Coastal Commission, Keystone Bituminous Coal Association v. DeBenedictis, and First English Evangelical Lutheran Church v. County of Los Angeles. Unfortunately, the meaning of these cases is hardly clear. Some analysts see in them an unwelcome move away from ad hoc balancing. In their view, the Court has now confirmed the two per se rules mentioned above and added more, such that the law of regulatory takings is being resolved into a series of categorical "either-ors." Either a regulation (controlling other than nuisances) is categorically a taking because it results in a permanent physical invasion, specifically undermines a distinct investment-backed expectation, or totally eliminates the property's economic value, or it is categorically not a taking at all. But other commentators see in the 1987 decisions yet more evidence that the Court remains unable to develop what Scheiber called "definitive formulae."

The foregoing disagreement aside, there are other puzzles in the takings cases of 1987. Nollan found a taking where the regulatory authority had conditioned a development permit on the property owners' dedication of a lateral easement of public passage across their land. This decision suggests that some regulatory programs will be subjected to heightened judicial scrutiny in the course of determining takings questions, but it is far from clear how broadly this suggestion should be read. Keystone Bituminous, in the course of upholding Pennsylvania's Subsidence Act against a takings claim, seems to overrule the opinion of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., in Pennsylvania Coal Company v. Mahon (1922), the centerpiece of regulatory takings law; yet the Court never says as much. And Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, in his dissent in First English Evangelical Lutheran Church, poses a nice problem for the Court's endorsement in that case of INVERSE CONDEMNATION as a remedy for regulatory takings.

First English finally announced what had been anticipated ever since the dissenting opinion of Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN in San Diego Gas and Electric Company v. City of San Diego (1981). First English holds that in the event of regulatory takings, property owners are entitled to the JUST COMPENSATION required by the Fifth Amendment, including interim DAMAGES for the period the offending regulation remains in effect. "Once a court determines that a taking has occurred, the government retains the whole range of options already available—amendment of the regulation, withdrawal of the invalidated regulation, or exercise of eminent domain." But amendment or withdrawal no longer permits the government to escape liability, as it did before. Once the taking has occurred, "no subsequent action by the government can relieve it of the duty to provide compensation for the period during which the taking was effective."

Of all that the Court has decided about takings since 1985, only the remedy of inverse condemnation appears to be clear, yet even it is cloudy. The cloud looms because of the Court's admonition that it is not dealing "with the quite different questions that would arise in the case of normal delays in obtaining building permits, changes in zoning ordinances, and the like which are not before us." Here a temporary loss of use might not be a taking at all. But how, Justice Stevens wonders, is one to draw the line between such "everyday regulatory inconveniences" and compensable temporary takings? In any event, if a regulation can affect a significant percentage of some property's value without being held a taking—and this is clearly the law—then why should a regulation not be allowed to affect as well a significant percentage of the property's useful life?

The law of takings seems little clearer today than it did in 1985, inverse condemnation in principle aside.

JAMES E. KRIER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution; Property Rights; Regulatory Agencies.)

Bibliography

SYMPOSIUM 1988 The Jurisprudence of Takings. Columbia Law Review 88:1581–1794.

EMPLOYEE SPEECH RIGHTS
(Private)

Employees in the private sector enjoy FIRST AMENDMENT rights like any other citizens. But those constitutional rights run only against the government—against STATE ACTION—and not against the private employer, who poses the chief threat to employees' FREEDOM OF SPEECH at and about the workplace. So the speech of private sector employees implicates the First Amendment only in those rare instances when the government acts to suppress that speech.

The paucity of First Amendment issues in the private sector workplace has contributed to an impoverished conception of the significance of employee speech and of the workplace as a forum for expression. The workplace is often seen as simply a component of the market, a domain of purely instrumental relations. Yet workplace issues, and related issues of class and wealth, are central to individuals' lives and to public debate. The workplace is where people discuss these issues, as well as other social and political issues, current events, popular culture, and personal concerns. It is thus an important arena for deliberation among citizens and for the formation of personal ties that transcend family, neighborhood, and racial and ethnic boundaries. But there is little recognition of the unique importance of workplace speech in those relatively rare cases in which private sector employee speech is threatened by state action.

Until recently, government suppression of private employee speech was largely confined to the arena of LABOR law—the law governing unions and collective bargaining. First Amendment challenges to restrictions on labor speech have a mixed record. Although peaceful labor picketing is a recognized form of protected expression, the Supreme Court has upheld numerous laws that prohibit picketing based on its purpose or effect. The Court has treated the constitutional implications of these prohibitions rather casually, failing to explain, for example, why labor picketing is less protected than CIVIL RIGHTS picketing. On the other hand, the Court has cited First Amendment concerns as the basis for narrowly construing a National Labor Relations Act provision to avoid banning consumer handbilling.

The law of discriminatory WORKPLACE HARASSMENT has recently called attention to the constitutional speech rights of private sector employees. Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 prohibits employers from discriminating against employees, and from subjecting them to a "hostile work environment," on the basis of sex, race, ethnicity, and religion. Other laws, state and federal, extend the hostile environment theory to harassment on the basis of age, disability, and veteran status. Employers can be held liable for a hostile environment based partly or entirely on the speech of subordinate employees. As a result, harassment DOCTRINE induces employers to prohibit employee speech that could contribute to harassment liability, whether or not it constitutes harassment. Because Title VII operates indirectly, by inducing private actors to censor speech, the constitutional issue is obscured and seldom litigated. But it is serious nonetheless. Citing fear of liability, some employers have sought to purge the workplace of comments, jokes, or cartoons that might offend some employee on the basis of race, sex, religion, ethnicity, or other protected status.

Employers who read harassment law as a reason to ban any "suggestive" or conceivably offensive speech may be overreacting to the law; but in the absence of clear limitations on the sort of expression that may count toward liability, the reaction is foreseeable. The vague contours of hostile environment law are thus responsible for a serious constriction of the freedom of working people to communicate at work. Some pruning is in order.

The Court suggested a drastic solution in R.A.V. V. CITY OF ST. PAUL (1992). While condemning most attempts to suppress racist and sexist speech, the majority suggested in dicta that Title VII may be defensible: It is "directed not against speech but against conduct"—that is, EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION—and it only "incidentally" restricts "a particular content-based subcategory of a proscribable class of speech," such as "sexually derogatory 'fighting words.' " This defense of harassment law is strikingly narrow: Hostile environment law would be drastically pruned if only FIGHTING WORDS, OBSCENITY, and other traditionally unprotected speech could be actionable. This standard takes too little account of the peculiar vulnerability of the workplace audience. It would render discrimination law powerless to prevent hostile coworkers from using obnoxious and bigoted speech to make the workplace intolerable for minority and female coworkers.

The solution to this dilemma may lie in a workplace-specific standard focusing on the time, place, and manner of alleged harassing speech. For example, speech that is personally directed at an unwilling listener, or that is not reasonably avoidable by unwilling listeners, exploits the workplace setting and the economic constraints on employees, and deserves lesser constitutional protection. Employers and employees alike need a definitive resolution of the problem of verbal workplace harassment, a resolution that recognizes both the free speech interests of employees and the special vulnerability of the workplace audience.

CYNTHIA L. ESTLUND
(2000)

Bibliography

BECKER, MARY 1996 How Free Is Speech at Work? UC Davis Law Review 29:815–873.

ESTLUND, CYNTHIA L. 1997 Freedom of Expression in the Workplace and the Problem of Discriminatory Harassment. Texas Law Review 75:687–777.

GREENAWALT, KENT 1995 Fighting Words: Individuals, Communities, and Liberties of Speech. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

VOLOKH, EUGENE 1992 Freedom of Speech and Workplace Harassment. UCLA Law Review 39:1791–1872.

EMPLOYEE SPEECH RIGHTS
(Public)

The FREEDOM OF SPEECH rights of PUBLIC EMPLOYEES have evolved from simplicity to complexity. Late nineteenth and early twentieth century judges thought public officials could require citizens to surrender their constitutional rights in order to obtain or continue receiving government benefits or government jobs. "The petitioner may have a constitutional right to talk politics," Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., famously declared in McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford (1892), "but he has no constitutional right to be a policeman." McAuliffe and other cases allowed public employees to be fired for criticizing their departments, because "[t]he servant . . . takes the employment on the terms which are offered him."

This rule did not survive the coming of the welfare state, where most Americans depended on some government benefit and many held government jobs. The Supreme Court during the second half of the century sensibly rejected both McAuliffe and the hard distinction between constitutional rights and mere state privileges that had enabled public officials to trade state benefits for constitutional liberty. Public employees first gained a measure of freedom when in WIEMAN V. UPDEGRAFF (1952) the Justices unanimously agreed that persons who belonged to "innocent" political organizations could not be banned from state jobs. Sixteen years later, the Justices extended this ruling and laid down vague guidelines for determining when public employees could speak without fear of losing their jobs. Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL in Pickering v. Board of Education of Will County, Illinois (1968) declared that the official constitutional standard required "a balance between the interests of the [public employee], as a citizen, in commenting upon matters of public concern and the interest of the State, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees."

The general rules governing the free-speech rights of public employees seem fairly libertarian at first glance. Judicial opinions celebrate the contribution such public employees as Nathaniel Hawthorne and Herman Melville have made to public discourse, and constitutional protection has been extended, in Board of Commissioners v. Wabaunsee County v. Umbehr (1996), to private contractors who do business with the state. The BURGER COURT struck a blow at traditional PATRONAGE practices, ruling in Elrod v. Burns (1976) and Branti v. Fishel (1980) that public employees could not be hired or fired simply on the basis of their political affiliations, unless "party affiliation is an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of the public office involved." Although the Justices have sustained measures forbidding political campaigning by public employees, the Court in UNITED STATES V. NATIONAL TREASURY EMPLOYEES UNION (1995) declared unconstitutional as applied to civil servants below the level of GS-16 a 1989 statute barring all federal employees from accepting any compensation for outside speeches or articles.

When actually applied on a case-by-case basis, however, the Pickering guidelines have strongly favored public employers. The Justices in Connick v. Myers (1983) narrowly defined matters of public concern when ruling that an assistant district attorney could be fired for complaining about working conditions in her department. Several years later, in WATERS V. CHURCHILL (1994), the Justices held that public employees could be constitutionally fired on the basis of what their supervisors erroneously thought they said, even though their actual statements may have been constitutionally protected. The opinion of Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR in that case emphasized that courts should generally defer to government claims concerning what restrictions on speech were necessary to the efficient operation of public services.

Waters and other recent cases may indicate that public employees have free-speech rights only when a government attorney foolishly asserts that the Constitution does not give that employee any rights. Whenever public employers give more particularized reasons as to why a particular speech warrants termination, the FIRST AMENDMENT as construed by the REHNQUIST COURT is not likely to be very protective of the free-speech rights of public employees. In the latter half of the 1990s, the Justices may begin their opinions by highlighting the value of speech by public employees; however, maintaining the efficiency of the public workplace as defined by public employers remains the more important value.

MARK A. GRABER
(2000)

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACTS
34 Stat. 232 (1906)
35 Stat. 65 (1908)

In the first Employers' Liability Act of June 1906, Congress extended nationwide protection to railroad workers against the arsenal of COMMON LAW defenses which employers had so effectively used to defeat personal injury suits. This act rendered every common carrier engaged in INTERSTATE COMMERCE liable to its employees for all damages resulting from negligence. Congress thus discarded the "fellow-servant" rule which had exculpated employers in accidents caused by another workman's negligence. Moreover, contributory negligence would not bar recovery and the law directed juries, not judges, to determine questions of negligence and assess damages proportionally. The act also prohibited the use of insurance or other benefits as a defense against damage suits. When a 5–4 Supreme Court declared this act unconstitutional because it extended to railroad employees not engaged in interstate commerce, Congress passed a second version of the act in April 1908. Although substantially the same, the new act covered only employees actually working in interstate commerce. Congress also added several sections further protecting employees and extended the period of limitation on actions from one to two years. As it had implied in its first decision, the Court unanimously sustained the act in the second set of EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY CASES (1912).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY CASES
207 U.S. 463 (1908)
223 U.S. 1 (1912)

The first EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT, passed in 1906, made a common carrier liable for the on-the-job injury or death of any employee and eliminated the "fellow-servant" rule by which an employer had been relieved of liability for an injury to one worker caused by another's negligence. In the first Employers' Liability Cases, a 5–4 Supreme Court held that Congress had exceeded its INTERSTATE COMMERCE power.

Justice EDWARD D. WHITE's opinion for the Court (only Justice WILLIAM R. DAY concurred completely in his opinion) addressed two objections to the act: that Congress had no power to regulate the subject, and that the act regulated things outside the scope of the commerce power. He dismissed the first objection. The COMMERCE CLAUSE set no limits on subjects regulated. Indeed, the Court decided only the extent of Congress's power, not the wisdom of its action. "We fail to perceive any just reason for holding that Congress is without power to regulate the relation of master and servant . . . [as a subject of] interstate commerce." The argument that the act had unconstitutionally regulated INTERSTATE COMMERCE proved more troublesome. Because the act imposed liability on employers "without qualification or restriction as to the business in which the carriers or their employees may be engaged at the time of injury, of necessity [it] includes subjects wholly outside the power of Congress to regulate commerce." White refused to accept the contention that the Court ought to interpret the act as applying solely to interstate commerce even though it did not explicitly say so.

Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER and Justice DAVID J. BREWER concurred in Justice RUFUS PECKHAM's opinion endorsing White's result but retreating from White's statement about Congress's power over master-servant relations. In a lengthy dissent, Justice WILLIAM MOODY argued that the Court was obliged to read the statute so as to preserve its constitutionality. "We think that the act, reasonably and properly interpreted, applies . . . only to cases of interstate commerce . . . and not to domestic commerce."

After Congress enacted another version of the law accommodating the majority's objections, a unanimous Court upheld its constitutionality. Justice WILLIS VAN DEVANTER's opinion broadly asserted the reach of Congress's power over the subject. He disposed of the objection that the act, by discarding COMMON LAW doctrines, had exceeded Congress's power: "A person has no property, no vested interest, in any rule of common law." The act also promoted safety and advanced commerce, and Van Devanter dismissed the contention that it violated the DUE PROCESS CLAUSE's guarantee of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION

Employment discrimination on grounds of race, sex, nationality, or religion may be challenged under two acts of Congress. One of the statutes, now codified as Title 42 of the United States Code, section 1981, is a survivor of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866, enacted for the protection of former slaves. As originally enacted, the statute was not seen as an employment discrimination statute. It conferred upon blacks the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue and to enjoy on a par with whites the protection of laws. The act was passed pursuant to Congress's authority under section 2 of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, and Congress proposed the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT in order to assure the act's validity. After the Reconstruction era, however, it and other Reconstruction-era civil rights legislation fell into disuse until the 1960s. Not until Johnson v. Railway Express Agency, Inc. (1975) did the United States Supreme Court confirm the application of section 1981 to RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in private-sector employment. This statute's use in employment discrimination cases has become secondary to reliance on Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, which was enacted by Congress as part of a comprehensive statute prohibiting discrimination on grounds of race, sex, religion, or national origin in employment, PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS, and federally funded programs.

Enactment of the 1964 Act followed a long period of civil rights DEMONSTRATIONS against the kinds of discrimination the act prohibited. For twenty years preceding the enactment of Title VII, more than 200 fair employment practice bills had been proposed in the Congress, but none had passed. Allegations of a Title VII violation often are accompanied by additional allegations of a section 1981 violation.

Another survivor of Reconstruction-era legislation now codified as 42 United States Code 1985(c), was originally designed to protect blacks from Ku Klux Klan violence. The Supreme Court, in Great American Federal Savings and Loan Association v. Novotny (1979), rejected the view that section 1985(c) provides an independent remedy for the adjudication of rights protected by Title VII.

The constitutionality of Title VII of the 1964 act was never seriously questioned. The power of Congress to enact Title VII, either under the COMMERCE CLAUSE or to enforce the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, seems to have been assumed. In 1972 Congress extended the coverage of Title VII to include employment discrimination by state and local governments. Subsequently, it was argued that backpay awards and attorneys' fees levied by a federal court against a state under the amended Title VII violated the jurisdictional limitations of the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT. However, in FITZPATRICK V. BITZER (1976) the Supreme Court rejected that argument, holding that the 1972 amendment was a valid exercise of Congress's enforcement power under section 5 of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

REGINALD ALLEYNE
(1986)

Bibliography

COMMENT 1980 Developments in the Law—Section 1981. Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 15:29–277.

DEAN, JOHN P. 1978 Title VII and Public Employers: Did Congress Exceed Its Powers? Columbia Law Review 78:372–408.

HILL, HERBERT 1977 The Equal Employment Opportunity Acts of 1964 and 1972: A Critical Analysis of the Legislative History and Administration of the Law. Industrial Relations Law Journal 2:1–96.

EMPLOYMENT DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES OF OREGON v. SMITH
484 U.S. 872 (1990)

Two drug and alcohol abuse counselors were fired from their jobs after ingesting the hallucinogenic drug peyote during a religious ceremony of the Native American Church. They were subsequently denied unemployment compensation by the state of Oregon because the state determined they had been discharged for work-related "misconduct." The workers filed suit, alleging that the denial of compensation violated the free exercise clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT. The Supreme Court disagreed by a vote of 6–3.

If the Court had handled Smith as it had handled most of its previous cases in the field of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, it would have first asked whether Oregon had a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST to deny unemployment compensation to the fired workers. If Oregon could demonstrate such an interest, and the denial of compensation was narrowly tailored to further that end, the denial would have been upheld. But the Court did not treat Smith as it had previous cases. Instead, it used Smith to abolish the compelling-interest standard for challenges brought under the free exercise clause.

Writing for five members of the Court, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA made the astonishing claim that the Court had never really applied the compelling-interest standard to free exercise claims. According to Scalia, the Court had "never held that an individual's religious beliefs excuse him from compliance with an otherwise valid law prohibiting conduct that the State is free to regulate." Of course, the Court had held precisely that in several cases, most notably CANTWELL V. CONNECTICUT (1943) and WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972). But Scalia noted that these cases implicated other constitutional rights besides free exercise, and he suggested that those other rights were the decisive factor in the Court's decisions to hold unconstitutional particular applications of certain general laws. In Cantwell, the invalidated licensing law impinged on the FREEDOM OF SPEECH; in Yoder, the compulsory education law infringed on the "right of parents . . . to direct the education of their children." Scalia concluded from this that only when the free-exercise clause is joined with other constitutional protections may it invalidate particular applications of general laws. As a practical matter, this means that the free exercise clause alone means very little. Generally applicable laws that do not implicate other constitutional rights are constitutional, no matter how difficult they make it for certain persons to practice their religion; indeed, it is conceivable that a generally applicable law could destroy certain religious groups entirely and yet survive a free exercise challenge under Scalia's approach. Only laws that expressly seek to regulate religious beliefs or to proscribe certain actions only when they are engaged in for religious reasons violate the free exercise clause according to the Court's new standard.

Concurring in the judgment, but disavowing the Court's reasoning, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR attacked the majority opinion as "incompatible with our Nation's fundamental commitment to individual religious liberty." Carefully recalling prior precedents, O'Connor showed that the compelling-interest test had been applied much more consistently by the Court in free exercise cases than Scalia had suggested. O'Connor further defended the test as an appropriate method by which to enforce "the First Amendment's command that religious liberty is an independent liberty. . . ." Applied to the case at hand, O'Connor believed that the free exercise claim could not prevail, however, because exempting the two workers from drug laws would significantly impair the government's "overriding interest in preventing the physical harm caused by the use of a Schedule I controlled substance."

Justices THURGOOD MARSHALL, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, and HARRY A. BLACKMUN joined most of Justice O'Connor's concurring opinion, but they disagreed with her ultimate conclusion, arguing that enforcement of drug laws against the religious ingestion of peyote was in no way necessary to fulfill the state's legitimate interest in circumscribing drug use. The state had argued that an exemption of the claimants in Smith would invite a flood of other claims for exemption to drug laws based on religious beliefs; but Blackmun pointed out that many states already have statutory exemptions for religious peyote use and have suffered no such difficulty.

The debate on the Court that erupted in Smith over what standard to apply to free exercise claims was dramatic; and yet it was not entirely unexpected, having been foreshadowed in several previous cases, including GOLDMAN V. WEINBERGER (1986) and O'LONE V. ESTATE OF SHABAZZ (1987). It also had been preceded for some years by a vigorous debate among scholars such as Walter Berns and Michael McConnell. Berns had long characterized the Court's decision in Yoder as contrary to American republicanism. His view clearly triumphed in Smith. Whether or not the Court's new approach is any better than its old one, however, is open to question.

One can certainly understand why the Court might want to restrict challenges under the free exercise clause. When only the members of a particular religious group may use an illegal drug or ignore compulsory education laws, the free exercise clause appears to undermine the equality before the law established by the rest of the Constitution. Scalia's approach seeks to avoid this contradiction by defining free exercise in terms of other constitutional rights, such as freedom of speech, FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION, and EQUAL PROTECTION. Scalia has a keen theoretical mind, and one can readily see the analytical power of his approach. Under his scheme, religious liberty will be protected by general rights applicable to all, rather than by specific exemptions granted only to those who hold peculiar religious beliefs. The principle of equality before the law will be maintained. That this approach may indeed afford protection to religious liberty is demonstrated by the recent development of the doctrine of EQUAL ACCESS, which is premised on free-speech and free-association protections rather than the free-exercise clause.

Yet one can legitimately wonder—as Justice O'Connor did in Smith—whether Scalia's approach will actually protect the free exercise of religion to its fullest extent. One suspects that it could only do so if the Court were willing to give an expansive reading to other constitutional rights in order to make up for its restricted interpretation of free exercise. Indeed, Scalia himself had to resort to an UNENUMERATED RIGHT of parental control over a child's education to explain the Court's previous ruling in Wisconsin v. Yoder within his framework. But the REHNQUIST COURT appears to be in no mood to give a broad reading to any rights just now, which makes its evisceration of the free exercise clause all the more troubling.

Government today wields a wide array of regulatory powers that the Court no longer even presumes to question; the "compelling state interest" test may be the only practical way to insulate religious groups from the destructive effects of such regulatory powers. The Court's failure to appreciate this fact raises troubling questions about its commitment to religious freedom for all.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

Bibliography

BERNS, WALTER 1976 The First Amendment and the Future of American Democracy, Chapter 2. New York: Basic Books.

MCCONNELL, MICHAEL W. 1990 The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion. Harvard Law Review 103:1409–1517.

EN BANC

(French: "As a bench.") The term often applies to appellate courts, and in particular to the UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS. Commonly only a three-member panel of a federal court of appeals hears a case. When the full membership is sitting—whether by its own choice or at a litigant's request—the case is heard before them en banc. In the federal courts of appeals, the decision of a panel is reconsidered en banc if a majority of the full court's members agree on such a hearing.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

ENDO, EX PARTE

See: Japanese American Cases

ENFORCEMENT ACTS

See: Force Acts

ENGEL v. VITALE
370 U.S. 421 (1962)

The Board of Regents of the State of New York authorized a short prayer for recitation in schools. The Regents were seeking to defuse the emotional issue of religious exercises in the classroom. The matter was taken out of the hands of school boards and teachers, and the blandest sort of invocation of the Deity was provided: "Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and beg Thy blessings upon us, our teachers, and our country." School districts in New York did not have to use the prayer, and if they did, no child was required to repeat it. But if there were any prayer in a New York classroom it would have to be this one. The Board of Education of New Hyde Park, New York, chose to use the Regents' Prayer and directed its principals to cause it to be said aloud at the beginning of each school day in every classroom.

Use of the prayer was challenged as an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. Justice HUGO L. BLACK, writing for the Court, concluded that neither the nondenominational nature of the prayer nor the fact that it was voluntary could save it from unconstitutionality under the establishment clause. By providing the prayer, New York officially approved theistic religion. With his usual generous quotations from JAMES MADISON and THOMAS JEFFERSON, Black found such state support impermissible.

Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS concurred separately. He had more trouble than Black concluding that the prayer established religion "in the strictly historic meaning of these words." What Douglas feared was the divisiveness engendered in a community when government sponsored a religious exercise.

Only Justice POTTER STEWART dissented, concluding that "the Court has misapplied a great constitutional principle." Stewart could not see how a purely voluntary prayer could be held to constitute state adoption of an official religion. For Stewart, an official religion was the only meaning of "establishment of religion." He noted that invocations of the Deity in public ceremonies of all sorts had been a feature of our national life from its outset. Without quite saying so, Stewart asked his brethren how the Regents' Prayer could be anathematized on establishment clause grounds without scraping "In God We Trust" off the pennies.

Engel v. Vitale was the first of a series of cases in which the Court used the establishment clause to extirpate from the public schools the least-commondenominator religious invocations which had been a traditional part of public ceremonies—especially school ceremonies—in America.

The decision proved extremely controversial. It has been widely circumvented and there have been repeated attempts to amend the Constitution to undo the effect of Engel.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

Bibliography

BERNS, WALTER 1976 The First Amendment and the Future of American Democracy. Pages 33–76. New York: Basic Books.
MUIR, WILLIAM K., JR. 1967 Prayer in the Public Schools. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

ENGLISH BILL OF RIGHTS

See: Bill of Rights (English)

ENGLISH CONSTITUTION

See: British Constitution

"ENGLISH ONLY" LAWS

See: "Official English" Laws

ENMUND v. FLORIDA
458 U.S. 782 (1982)

Before this decision, nine states permitted infliction of the death penalty on one who participated in a FELONY resulting in a murder, even if committed by confederates. Earl Enmund drove the getaway car in a robbery at which codefendants killed the victims when he was not present and had not premeditated murder. A 5–4 Court held that the CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT clause of the EIGHTH AMENDMENT, which the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT extended to the states, prevented imposition of the death penalty. Capital punishment was disproportionate to the crime when Enmund had not himself killed, attempted to kill, intended to kill, or even intended the use of lethal force.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

ENTANGLEMENT TEST

See: Government Aid to Religious Institutions

ENTITLEMENT

Both the Fifth Amendment and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT protect "life, liberty or property" against deprivation "without due process of law." At least according to the constitutional text, when citizens seek to challenge a government's action as a violation of the due process clause, they must adduce some interest in "life, liberty or property" of which they have been deprived.

In the field of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW, the Supreme Court traditionally read the phrase "life, liberty or property" as an undifferentiated whole, giving individuals the right to appropriate NOTICE and hearing whenever the government subjected them to "grievous loss." This broad interpretation, however, was often limited by the RIGHT-PRIVILEGE DISTINCTION, according to which benefits that the government was not legally obligated to grant could be denied or terminated without constitutional constraint. Thus, a "grievous loss" occasioned by a denial of "largess" would not trigger constitutional requirements of fair procedure under the due process clause.

In the years following WORLD WAR II, as the involvement of government in social welfare programs and the domestic economy continued to increase, it became clear that government allocation of largess constituted a powerful mechanism for government oppression if left unconstrained. In GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970), in the course of an opinion imposing constitutionally mandated procedural requirements on the termination of WELFARE BENEFITS, the Court announced in obiter dictum the elimination of the largess or privilege exception to the demands of due process. The claim that "public assistance benefits are a privilege and not a right" was unavailing, according to Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, because "welfare benefits are a matter of statutory entitlement for persons qualified to receive them," functioning more like "property" than "gratuity." The loss of benefits imposed a "grievous loss" and thus called forth the demands of due process.

Two years later, in BOARD OF REGENTS V. ROTH (1972) and Perry v. Sinderman (1972), the Court moved the concept of "entitlement" from the margins of due process doctrine to its core. In passing on the claims of untenured professors employed by state colleges to hearings before being dismissed from their posts, the majority opinions of Justice POTTER STEWART took the position that it was not the "weight" of interests affected by public action that invoked the protection of due process but their "nature." Rather than evaluating the "grievousness" of injuries inflicted by discharge, the Court required the instructors to demonstrate that their discharge amounted to a deprivation of technically defined "liberty" or "property."

The liberty protected by due process was delineated in Roth as a matter of federal constitutional law. The Court referred to historically rooted concepts of liberty: beyond freedom from bodily restraint and assault, it included the "privileges long recognized as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men." Property interests, on the other hand, were said to find their source outside the Constitution in "rules or understandings that secure certain benefits and that support claims of entitlement to those benefits." Beyond the areas protected as liberty, therefore, an entitlement grounded in "some independent source such as state law" was a necessary condition for a claim to procedural due process protection. Because under state law Roth's employment was terminable at will, he had no property entitlement upon which to base his demands for due process. The Court left it open for Perry to show some "binding understanding" not embodied in the written terms of his contract that could support a "legitimate claim of entitlement."

In subsequent cases, the Court clarified the proposition that legislative alteration of the terms of the entitlement does not trigger a requirement of notice and hearing, but only administrative action predicated upon alleged failures to meet the terms of the entitlement. Decisions involving prison release and good-time credit programs, like Wolff v. McDonnell (1974) and Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebraska Penal and Correctional Complex (1979) have extended the entitlement concept to conditions of liberty conferred by state laws or regulations. A hearing before deprivation of credit toward release or other prison perquisites granted to a duly sentenced prisoner is required only when the law granting the liberty is sufficient to vest an entitlement.

The reliance on positive law entitlements outside of the Constitution to define the applicability of constitutional protection forces the Supreme Court to spend considerable effort defining what constitutes a sufficiently clear and binding entitlement to invoke the protection of procedural due process. In Roth the Court differentiated between an unprotected "unilateral expectation" and a "legitimate claim of entitlement" that could support a property interest. Subsequent opinions have looked primarily to statutes, regulations, and contractual provisions to draw the line of demarcation, but have not required great specificity of entitlement to generate protection. Positive law that leaves official decision makers entirely unconstrained in dispensing benefits or employment has been held to create no protected interests; when criteria in positive law provide substantive limitations on official discretion binding on the decision-makers, even standards as vague as "good cause" or "probable ability to fulfill the obligations of a law abiding life" have enabled citizens to claim the protection of due process.

A great deal has been held to turn on the particular official choice of language, as well as state court glosses on it. The difference between benefits that "shall be granted if" and that "shall not be granted unless" particular criteria are met can lead to outcomes that vary considerably among cases that seem otherwise quite similar. Under current doctrine, policymakers who seek to control the decisions of street-level bureaucrats with written criteria for actions must pay the price of providing due process to the citizens whom those decisions affect. Given the rule-governed nature of most modern bureaucracies, this doctrine means hearings are widely available. It also means, however, that policymakers who seek to escape federal due process constraints have an incentive to leave their subordinates entirely without formal guidance.

The reliance on positive law in defining entitlements has led to a doctrinal conundrum. It is not uncommon for the very statute or regulation that defines the property or liberty entitlement to provide procedures to terminate that interest. In these cases, it has been argued that the entitlement protected is simply the entitlement to retain the benefit until it has been terminated in accordance with statutory procedures. If those procedures have been followed, the argument goes, termination deprives the citizen of no property and federal due process can require nothing more.

Whatever its logical appeal, this argument, originally articulated by Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST in his PLURALITY OPINION in ARNETT V. KENNEDY (1974), is an invitation for government to eliminate the constraints of due process in the administration of statutorily created interests by attaching nugatory procedural protections to their statutory definition of interests. The Court, in Cleveland Board of Education v. Loudermill (1985), acknowledged this danger in forcefully rejecting the Rehnquist argument. Justice BYRON R. WHITE wrote for eight members of the Court that once the positive law of a state lays the groundwork for an entitlement, the constitutionally mandated procedures for terminating that interest were unaffected by the procedures that a state might attach. Although state law determines whether an individual is entitled to the protections of due process by defining their entitlements, the Constitution defines what due process requires. "The categories of substance and procedure are distinct," the Court held. "Were the rule otherwise, the due process clause would be reduced to a mere tautology."

SETH F. KREIMER
(1992)

Bibliography

MONAGHAN, HENRY P. 1977 Of Liberty and Property. Cornell Law Review 62:401–444.

SMOLLA, RODNEY 1982 The Reemergence of the Right-Privilege Distinction in Constitutional Law: The Price of Protesting Too Much. Stanford Law Review 35:69–120.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1987 American Constitutional Law, 2nd. ed. pp. 663–714. Westbury, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

ENTRAPMENT DEFENSE

The entrapment defense is not constitutionally safeguarded and raises no constitutional issue unless a guilty defendant claims that law enforcement conduct violates the fundamental fairness mandated by DUE PROCESS OF LAW; if such a constitutional defense were to be recognized by the Supreme Court the effect would, like an EXCLUSIONARY RULE, be aimed at deterring unlawful police conduct.

Entrapment is a means of securing evidence to convict by luring a person into the commission of a crime of which he is suspected. Ordinarily the duty of an officer of the law is to deter crime and apprehend those who commit it, not to incite or instigate it. Certain offenses of a clandestine or consensual character, however, are difficult to expose and punish except by some degree of covert government participation. Official deceit is not necessarily illegal or unconstitutional. Undercover police work is particularly effective in uncovering crimes that involve gambling, drugs, prostitution, and official corruption. Nevertheless the government should not fight crime with crime.

When an undercover officer has gained the confidence of a radical organization and encouraged its members to engage in terrorist activities and provided them with the weapons and explosives to do so, he has become an agent provocateur who has conceived and procured the commission of a crime that would not have occurred but for him. If an officer posing as an imposter approaches a law-abiding person with no criminal record and induces him to smuggle contraband, the officer has passed the law's tolerance and the smuggler's guilty conduct may be legally excusable. When entrapment goes too far, it creates a legal defense which, like insanity or killing to save one's own life, merits a verdict of not guilty. The question in any case is whether the evidence shows that entrapment is a sufficient defense by a person who has in fact committed the crime charged against him. The mere fact that a government agent provides a favorable opportunity to one willing and ready to break the law is not entrapment for the purpose of making good a defense; if, however, the defendant had no previous intent to commit the offense and did so only because the police induced him, the verdict should be an acquittal.

Entrapment comes before the Supreme Court as a nonconstitutional defense in cases involving federal crimes. The Justices have always divided into two wings: one focuses on the criminal intent or predisposition of the defendant to commit the crime; the other focuses on the conduct of law enforcement officers. The view that has always prevailed, from the first case, Sorrells v. United States (1932), to Hampton v. United States (1976), is that it is no entrapment for the police merely to instigate the crime; they must also instigate its commission by luring an innocent person with no previous disposition to commit it. The criminal design, as Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES said in 1932, must originate with the authorities who implant the predisposition in the mind of an otherwise innocent person and incite him to commit it so that they may prosecute. Thus, in United States v. Russell (1973), the Court sustained the conviction of the manufacturer of an illegal drug, who claimed that the government had violated due process when an undercover agent supplied him with an essential chemical ingredient. But the ingredient was harmless, its possession was not illegal, and, above all, the defendant was already engaged in the criminal enterprise. In Hampton, however, a government informant supplied an illegal drug and arranged its sale by the defendant to undercover agents. Although the government deliberately set him up, the Court stressed that his previous propensity to commit the crime negated his entrapment defense. He was, in a phrase of Chief Justice EARL WARREN, "an unwary criminal" rather than an "unwary innocent."

Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST wrote the entrapment opinions of the BURGER COURT, from which Justices POTTER STEWART, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, and THURGOOD MARSHALL dissented. The dissenters insisted that the majority's focus on the criminal's predisposition is "subjective," and they preferred an "objective" test: whether, despite predisposition, police conduct instigated the offense. The objectivity of that view, however, can be deceptive, and it ignores criminal intent. Doubtless, though, the trend of decision has made the entrapment defense nearly useless if a jury does not accept it. If the "outrageousness" of police conduct should pass the threshold of judicial tolerance in some future case, the Court may find a due process basis for the entrapment defense.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

DUNHAM, DAN S. 1977 Hampton v. United States: Last Rites for the "Objective" Theory of Entrapment? Columbia Human Rights Law Review 9:223–262.

O'CONNER, PETER J. 1978 Entrapment versus Due Process: A Solution to the Problem of the Criminal Conviction Obtained by Law Enforcement Misconduct. Fordham Urban Law Journal 7:32–53.

ROSSUM, RALPH A. 1978 The Entrapment Defense and the Teaching of Political Responsibility. American Journal of Criminal Law 6:287–306.

ENUMERATED POWERS

Instead of establishing a national government with a general power to do whatever it might deem in the public interest, the Constitution lists the authorized powers of Congress. The chief source of these "enumerated powers" is Article I, section 8, which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce among the several states, tax and spend, raise and support military forces, and so on. This enumeration has been supplemented by other grants, including authority to enforce the CIVIL WAR amendments.

The enumeration of powers has both a negative and a positive implication. Enumerating or specifying powers implies that some of government's ordinary concerns are beyond the constitutional competence of the national government. This implication is made explicit by the TENTH AMENDMENT. Nevertheless, the founding generation wanted to solve such specific problems as commercial hostility among the states and an unpaid war debt. When THE FEDERALIST defended the proposed national powers it cited the desiderata that might be achieved through their successful exercise. The enumeration of powers thus implies affirmative responsibilities as well as limited concerns. These competing implications are associated with competing approaches to constitutional interpretation and different conceptions of the normative character of the Constitution as a whole. As a reminder of a line between national and state powers, the enumeration of powers suggests THOMAS JEFFERSON's view of the Constitution as a contract between sovereign states to be construed with an eye to preserving state prerogatives. As a reminder of affirmative responsibilities the enumeration suggests JOHN MARSHALL's view of the Constitution as a charter of government to be construed in ways that permit achievement of the social objectives it envisions. History has not favored the Jeffersonian view.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, in The Federalist #84, cited the enumeration of powers as one reason for opposing a BILL OF RIGHTS. Not only were bills of rights unnecessary in countries whose governments possessed only those powers that their people had expressly granted, specifying rights could undermine the enumeration of powers by suggesting "to men disposed to usurp" that the Constitution authorized all that the bill of rights did not prohibit. The result Hamilton ostensibly feared was achieved through constitutional doctrines that accompanied the nation's progress toward the economically integrated industrial society Hamilton favored. These doctrines included Hamilton's own theories of the SUPREMACY CLAUSE and the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE, theories that influenced

John Marshall's doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819).

Marshall's original theory of implied powers was consistent with the idea of enumerated powers because it removed STATES' RIGHTS burdens on national power while insisting that national concerns were limited. In the twentieth century, however, the Supreme Court changed the meaning of implied powers and gave nationalist readings to the general welfare clause and other powers. The aggregate and practical effect of these interpretations was to empower the national government to deal with anything that Congress may perceive as a national problem. This development has all but eliminated the restrictive implication of the enumeration of powers, leaving the Bill of Rights and the Constitution's institutional norms as the principal limitations on national power.

SOTIRIOS A. BARBER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: General Welfare Clause; Tenth Amendment.)

Bibliography

ALFANGE, DEAN, JR. 1969 Congressional Power and Constitutional Limitations. Journal of Public Law 18:103–134.

BARBER, SOTIRIOS A. 1984 On What the Constitution Means. Chap. 4. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY IMPROVEMENT ACT

See: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution

ENVIRONMENTAL REGULATION AND THE CONSTITUTION

Indirectly, at least, the Constitution provides the federal government with power to regulate on behalf of environmental quality, but it also sets limits on the power. It sets limits, likewise, on the regulatory power of the states. What it does not do, at present, is grant the "constitutional right to a clean environment" so avidly sought in the heyday of environmental concern, the decade of the 1970s. Thus, the one unique aspect of the general topic considered here has no doctrinal standing; the remaining aspects are matters of doctrine, but they are not unique to environmental regulation. It is quite sufficient, then, merely to illustrate the wide range of constitutional issues that arise in the context of environmental regulation, and to suggest the nature of the debate on the question of a constitutional right to an environment of good quality.

Environmental lawmaking at the national level of government—whether by Congress, the executive, or indeed the federal courts—became important only in the 1970s, but the beginnings reach back well into the nineteenth century, if not farther. This history, especially the strong federal presence of recent years, makes apparent the significant constitutional authority of the central government in regard to the environment. Granting that it is a government of LIMITED POWERS, and mindful of occasional suggestions "that these powers fall short of encompassing the breadth of concerns potentially subject to environmental regulation," one can still conclude, with Philip Soper, "that no conceivable measure reasonably intended to protect the environment is beyond the reach" of federal authority.

The most important source of federal power to regulate in the environmental field is found in the COMMERCE CLAUSE. The clause, especially as it pertains to congressional authority to regulate activities affecting commerce, has been so expansively applied by the federal courts as to justify federal control of virtually any problem of environmental pollution. Some pollution sources, such as automobiles and ships, move in INTERSTATE COMMERCE; other sources manufacture products that do so; pollution affects such mainstays of interstate commerce as agricultural commodities, livestock, and many raw materials; pollutants themselves can be seen as products, or at least by-products, moving "in commerce" across state lines. An imaginative federal district court relied upon this last theory to sustain the Clean Air Act in United States v. Bishop Processing Company (D.Md. 1968).

These views lend support not only to the federal air pollution control program but also to programs concerning noise, pesticides, solid waste, toxic substances, and water pollution. Regarding the last especially, Congress can draw on its unquestioned authority over navigable waters, and on the willingness of the federal courts to regard as navigable any waters of a depth sufficient, as someone once said, to float a Supreme Court opinion.

The federal government can draw on other sources of power, at least on a selective basis, to support programs of environmental regulation. The property clause of Article IV, section 3, for example, gives Congress the power to "make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting" the property of the United States. In Kleppe v. New Mexico (1976) the clause was relied upon to sustain the Wild Free-Roaming Horses and Burros Act of 1971 as a "needful regulation" "respecting" public lands, against New Mexico's claim that the federal government lacked authority to control the animals unless they were moving in interstate commerce or damaging public lands. It seems clear that under the property clause Congress may regulate the use of its own lands, and perhaps adjacent lands as well, to protect environmental conditions and promote ecological balance on government property.

Other powers relevant to environmental regulation include the TAXING POWER, which presumably would authorize effluent and emission fees to control pollution; perhaps the ADMIRALTY power, as a basis for controlling pollution from ships; and the power to approve INTERSTATE COMPACTS, as an indirect means by which to impose federal environmental standards on compacting states, as the Court suggested in West Virginia ex rel. Dyer v. Sims (1951), involving a compact among eight states to control pollution in the Ohio River system. And the Supreme Court may draw on its ORIGINAL JURISDICTION to shape a FEDERAL COMMON LAW of pollution in suits between states or between a state and the citizens of another state.

The TREATY POWER provides yet another basis for federal environmental quality and conservation measures. The leading case here is MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920), sustaining the Migratory Bird Act of 1918. Congress enacted the legislation in question in order to give effect to a treaty between the United States and Great Britain. Missouri, claiming "title" to birds within its borders, sought to prevent a federal game warden from enforcing the Act. The Court, through Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, rejected the state's contention. Treaties, under the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, are the "supreme Law of the Land"; so too are acts of Congress " NECESSARY AND PROPER for carrying into Execution" the treaty power vested in the president and the Senate. Missouri v. Holland is of particular interest because the Court upheld the Migratory Bird Act notwithstanding the fact that a similar act, not based on a treaty, had earlier been invalidated as beyond the scope of congressional power. As Soper remarks, the case "accordingly seems to stand for the proposition that Congress may do by statute and treaty what it has no power to do by statute alone."

The specific basis for the state's claim in Missouri v. Holland was the TENTH AMENDMENT, which reserves to the states powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution. The provision introduces the subject of constitutional limitations (as opposed to powers) that may apply to programs of environmental regulation, and illustrates a limitation applicable only to the federal government, and not to the states.

The Tenth Amendment figured prominently in a series of cases involving the federal Clean Air Act and decided by several courts of appeals in the 1970s. A central question in the cases was whether the amendment foreclosed the federal Environmental Protection Agency from promulgating regulations compelling various implementation and enforcement measures by the states, under threat of fines and imprisonment for recalcitrant state and local officials. The courts of appeals divided on the question, at least one of them intimating a constitutional violation, one explicitly finding no violation, and one interpreting the Clean Air Act in such a way as to sidestep the issue. The Supreme Court granted certiorari and heard argument in several of the cases, but it ultimately declined to reach the merits because counsel for the United States conceded that the regulations in question would have to be rewritten to eliminate requirements that states adopt implementation and enforcement measures. The Court's later decisions in HODEL V. VIRGINIA SURFACE MINING AND RECLAMATION ASSOCIATION (1981) and Federal Energy Regulatory Commission v. Mississippi (1982) show that Congress can constitutionally place great pressures on the states to regulate, so long as it uses indirect means for doing so.

Another constitutional limitation operating upon state but not federal environmental protection programs arises from the supremacy clause. The limitation may come into play in two common respects. One of these involves PREEMPTION and is illustrated by BURBANK V. LOCKHEED AIR TERMINAL, INC. (1973), where the Court concluded that federal legislation, including the Noise Control Act of 1972, reflected a congressional intention to "occupy the field" of aircraft noise regulation; hence, Burbank's noise ordinance was held invalid under the supremacy clause. The second application of the clause is illustrated in Hancock v. Train (1976) and Environmental Protection Agency v. State Water Resources Control Board (1976), in which the Court held that the supremacy clause sheltered federal facilities from permit requirements imposed by state governments pursuant to the Clean Air Act and the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, respectively, absent a clear congressional indication to the contrary.

The remaining constitutional limitations on environmental regulation apply more or less equally to state and federal government alike. We can put aside the general question of state authority to regulate on behalf of the environment. States, unlike the federal government, are not creatures of limited powers. It has long been acknowledged that the STATE POLICE POWER justifies the widest range of health and safety measures insofar as the federal Constitution is concerned, absent some conflict with supreme federal law. This generalization stood fairly firm even during the most active period of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS review by the federal judiciary. And it bears mention, regarding health and safety measures, as the Court said in Northwestern Laundry v. Des Moines (1916), that "the harshness of such legislation, or its effect upon business interests, short of a merely arbitrary enactment, are not valid constitutional objections. Nor is there any valid Federal constitutional objection in the fact that the regulation may require the discontinuance of the use of property or subject the occupant to large expense in complying with the terms of the law or ordinance."

The BILL OF RIGHTS may bear on state and federal environmental regulation just as it may bear on regulation generally. Recent cases illustrate the point. Thus the FIRST AMENDMENT came into play in Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego (1981), where a local ordinance controlling billboards and the like for the sake of safety and aesthetics was invalidated insofar as it pertained to noncommercial advertising. In Air Pollution Variance Board of Colorado v. Western Alfalfa Corporation (1974), the issue was whether the FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures was violated when a health inspector entered the grounds of a pollution source to make an opacity check of smoke coming from a chimney. The Court held the entry lawful under a line of cases sustaining "open field" searches. In United States v. Ward (1980), the Court held that civil penalties imposed for violating certain provisions of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act pertaining to oil spills were not "quasi-criminal" so as to implicate the Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION (or, presumably, the Sixth Amendment's procedural restrictions applicable to criminal prosecutions). Similarly, Atlas Roofing Co. v. Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission (1976) held that administrative civil penalty provisions of the Occupational Safety and Health Act did not contravene the SEVENTH AMENDMENT right to TRIAL BY JURY.

In principle, the takings clause of the Fifth Amendment might be thought to contain the most significant restriction on state and federal environmental regulation. The clause, which applies to the states through the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, provides: "nor shall private property be taken for PUBLIC USE, without JUST COMPENSATION." It is clearly recognized that a government regulation can work a taking, but it is seldom held that it actually does. Most environmental regulations challenged on taking grounds are alleged to reach too far, to reduce value too much, and thus to transgress the bounds drawn by Justice Holmes in one of his most famous—and least informative—generalizations, uttered in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (1922): "that while property may be regulated to a certain extent, if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking." The statement suggests that if a regulation reduces property value by a great deal, a taking will be found. In practice, however, the courts tend to look not at value lost but value left. If the regulation leaves significant value intact, then usually it will be upheld. The central case in point is PENN CENTRAL TRANSPORTATION COMPANY V. NEW YORK CITY (1978), upholding New York's historic landmark preservation law as applied to Grand Central Terminal, notwithstanding very large losses to the terminal's owners. In any event, the takings clause has little bite in the context of conventional environmental regulation because control of nuisance-like activities has long escaped takings challenges even if the value of the regulated property is reduced to zero. Because virtually any environmental regulation can be characterized as a nuisance control measure, virtually none is likely to be regarded as a taking.

The state and federal governments, then, may regulate rather freely on behalf of environmental quality, but are they constitutionally obliged to do so? Nothing in the federal Constitution says as much. There are arguments that diligent and imaginative searching would find the right between the lines of text, chiefly in the "penumbra" of the Bill of Rights, or as a fundamental personal right protected by the NINTH AMENDMENT, or as a right "implicit in the concept of ORDERED LIBERTY" and guaranteed by the DUE PROCESS clause. The Supreme Court and all but a few federal district courts have been unmoved by these arguments. Courts generally have displayed an unwillingness to make the difficult business of environmental policy a matter of constitutional principle, a point reflected in state court decisions holding that state constitutional amendments setting out environmental rights are not self-executing but require, rather, legislative implementation. The courts, quite obviously, feel ill-equipped to play a role thought better suited to legislatures. It is not that the environment is somehow less important than other recognized constitutional values, but rather that it is less amenable to adjudication.

Richard B. Stewart summarizes the arguments in this regard: a constitutional right to environmental quality would give courts ultimate responsibilities for making resource allocation decisions beyond their analytic capabilities; for trading off allocative efficiency and distributional equity without any principled means by which to do so; and for engineering and implementing dynamic policies through the clumsy and apolitical means of litigation. Stewart adds:

> A familiar justification for constitutional protection of given interests is that they are held by a "discete and insular" minority or are otherwise chronically undervalued because of basic structural defects in the political process. This rationale has been utilized by advocates of a constitutional right to environmental quality, buttressing it by claims that environmental degradation violates "fundamental" interests in health and human survival and implicates the fate of future generations that are unrepresented in the political process. But the spate of environmental legislation enacted by federal and state governments over the past ten years flatly contradicts the general claim that the political process suffers from structural defects that necessitate a constitutional right to environmental quality [Development, 1977: 714–715].

Whether future generations will agree is an open question.

JAMES E. KRIER
(1986)

Bibliography

SOPER, PHILIP 1974 The Constitutional Framework of Environmental Law. Pages 20–125 in E. Dolgin and T. Guilbert, eds., Federal Environmental Law. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

STEWART, RICHARD B. 1977 The Development of Administrative and Quasi-Constitutional Law in Judicial Review of Environmental Decisionmaking: Lessons from the Clean Air Act. Iowa Law Review 62:713–769.

——— 1977 Pyramids of Sacrifice? Problems of Federalism in Mandating State Implementation of National Environmental Policy. Yale Law Journal 86:1196–1272.

ENVIRONMENTAL REGULATION AND THE CONSTITUTION (Update 1)

In recent years, three issues have dominated the constitutional side of environmental law. The first issue involves the ability of administrative agencies to obtain access to private property and business records for purposes of inspection. These FOURTH AMENDMENT problems are not, however, distinctive to the environmental area, but are typical of those involving ADMINISTRATIVE SEARCH in general.

The second issue involves FEDERALISM. Since the doctrine of NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976) met its demise in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985), Congress has faced no constitutional obstacles to environmental regulation. Where state regulation is concerned, however, COMMERCE CLAUSE and PREEMPTION problems remain recurring sources of litigation. State environmental regulations often burden interstate businesses and may sometimes be a pretext for protectionism. Although some state regulatory measures have fallen afoul of the dormant commerce clause, courts on the whole have been sympathetic to environmental measures and willing to give them the benefit of the doubt in commerce clause cases. The results in preemption cases are much less predictable. As the federal regulatory presence has grown, the difficulties of coordinating local regulations with federal rules have become more widespread. As a result, state regulations are not infrequently held to be preempted by federal law.

The third major constitutional issue involves government regulation of private lands. Under some circumstances, a regulation that "goes too far" can be an unconstitutional TAKING OF PROPERTY. Efforts at enviromental preservation can severely restrict the use of property, therby raising taking problems.

One of the best-known cases is a Wisconsin Supreme Court decision, Just v. Marinette County (1972). Just involved a Wisconsin statute that allowed only limited uses of wetlands, such as harvesting of wild crops, forestry, hunting, and fishing. Other uses required a special permit. Essentially, this law required special permission before any commercial or residential use could be made of the property. The Wisconsin Supreme Court upheld the statute, despite the severe restriction on land use, because of the strong public interest in preserving wetlands. Other state courts have split on the constitutionality of similar statutes.

The Supreme Court has considered several environmental takings cases. In Keystone Bituminous Coal Association v. DeBenedictus (1987) the Court upheld a Pennsylvania statute that required underground coal miners to provide support for surface structures. A similar Pennsylvania statute had been held unconstitutional in a wellknown opinion by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR.,, but the current statute was found to be unobjectionable because it required only a small fraction of the total coal deposits to be left in the ground. On the other hand, in Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987) the Court took a much different approach. Nollan involved a couple who wanted to build a larger beach house. As a condition for receiving a permit, the California Coastal Commission required them to allow the public to walk along the beach. Justice ANTONIN SCALIA found a taking because there was an insufficient nexus between the state's goal of preserving the public's right to view the ocean and the requirement that the public be allowed to walk along the beach.

As these two decisions indicate, the outcomes in taking cases are often unpredictable. This uncertainty is a particular problem for environmental regulators and land-use planners, for a mistake can result in an award of damages as well as an injunction against the taking.

With these exceptions, constitutional issues have not loomed large in federal environmental law. By and large, like most regulations of economic activities, environmental statutes have received only minimal judicial scrutiny. As a result, the major issues in environmental law have involved statutory interpretation rather than constitutional disputes.

DANIEL A. FARBER
(1992)

Bibliography

MICHELMAN, FRANK 1988 Takings, 1987. Columbia Law Review 88:1600–1629.

ROSE, CAROL 1984 Mahon Reconsidered: Why the Takings Issue Is Still a Muddle. Southern California Law Review 57: 561–599.

ENVIRONMENTAL REGULATION AND THE CONSTITUTION
(Update 2)

While disputes over STATUTORY INTERPRETATION and other subconstitutional issues continue to dominate environmental law, in recent years the field of environmental law has been significantly influenced by the Supreme Court's constitutional jurisprudence on FEDERALISM, the TAKINGS clause of the Fifth Amendment, and Article III STANDING. Taken together, these constitutional developments may signal a period of retrenchment and decentralization in environmental regulation. The Court's renewed concern for state SOVEREIGNTY and PROPERTY RIGHTS, and its resistance to liberal standing principles for "private attorneys general" are noticeable departures from past trends. At a minimum, it is clear that constitutional issues now loom larger than ever in environmental law.

In a series of split decisions, the REHNQUIST COURT has tightened the constraints on Congress's authority to direct state institutions or impose upon state resources. In NEW YORK V. UNITED STATES (1992), the Court invalidated the "take title" provision of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Act Amendments of 1985 as violative of the TENTH AMENDMENT prohibition on "commandeering" state legislatures. The offending section specified that a state or regional compact that fails to provide for the disposal of all internally generated WASTE by a particular date must, upon the request of the waste's generator or owner, take title to, and possession of, the waste. In New York, the Court clarified the relationship between the COMMERCE CLAUSE and the Tenth Amendment, holding that even where Congress exercises its legitimate commerce clause authority, the method it chooses must not run afoul of the Tenth Amendment. Relying on New York, the Court in Printz v. United States (1997) held unconstitutional provisions that imposed on state law enforcement officers a duty to investigate the eligibility of would-be gun purchasers. The Court held that the Tenth Amendment forbids the commandeering of state executive officers just as it does the conscription of state legislatures in the service of federal regulatory objectives.

In UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995), the Court invalidated as insufficiently related to INTERSTATE COMMERCE a federal statute criminalizing handgun possession near schools. For the first time in over fifty years, the Court explicitly limited Congress's commerce clause authority, raising potential questions about the extent of federal environmental power. In still another important case for state sovereignty, Seminole Tribe v. Florida (1996), the Court held that Congress cannot abrogate states' ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity from suit in federal court pursuant to its Article I powers.

After Seminole, claims for damages against states or state agencies for liability pursuant to federal environmental statutes were to be adjudicated in state courts unless a state waived its immunity from suit in federal court. However, in the 1998–1999 term, the Supreme Court further curbed federal authority over states in three controversial 5–4 rulings. Most significantly for environmental law, the Court held in Alden v. Maine (1999) that Congress lacks the power under Article I to subject non-consenting states to private suits for damages in state courts for violations of federal law. Still available post-Alden are private suits in both state and federal court seeking injunctive relief against state officers for ongoing violations of law under the EX PARTE YOUNG (1908) exception to SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY. The effect of Alden on environmental law remains an open question. Injunctive relief rather than penalties tends to be the most important feature of private actions against states for violations of federal environmental law, making the continued availability of injunctive relief in such private actions important. Alden may significantly impair private cost–recovery suits against states for remediation of hazardous waste sites under the federal superfund law, however. Of course, the federal government itself may still seek damages in both state and federal courts for state violations of federal law.

The revival of a states' rights vision of federalism and the imposition of constraints on federal power has significant implications for environmental law. Most federal environmental statutes passed since 1970 extend Congress's reach into historically local matters and rely heavily on the states for implementation and administration, an approach to regulation known as "cooperative federalism." These statutes contain a range of measures designed to induce state cooperation—measures that invite closer constitutional scrutiny in the wake of the Court's federalism jurisprudence. Following López, several federal courts have entertained commerce clause challenges to major environmental statutes such as the Endangered Species Act, the Clean Water Act, and the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Recovery Act. To date, however, these challenges have been mostly unsuccessful. Following New York, federal courts have struck down a number of statutory provisions for conscripting state governments to administer federal programs in violation of the Tenth Amendment.

Still, although federal courts have repudiated the most obvious examples of federal commandeering, nonetheless they seem prepared to tolerate the liberal use of Congress's TAXING AND SPENDING POWER in "inducing" state cooperation. For example, in Virginia v. Browner (1996), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit rejected a challenge to the Clean Air Act's sanction provisions, which allow the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to withhold federal highway funds and impose other measures on noncomplying states. The Court upheld the provisions as "inducements," as opposed to "outright coercion." The question remains whether imposing conditions on a state's receipt of federal funds can ever rise to the level of coercion. While the revival of federalism symbolically undermines the strong federal role in environmental regulation, perhaps the federalism cases portend less a judicial brake on federal environmental regulation than a warning to the federal government to be careful in crafting state inducements.

Over the last decade, the Court has also ventured further into land use regulation. Building upon its holding in Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987), the Court in DOLAN V. TIGARD (1994) invalidated an exaction requiring a landowner to provide a public greenway in exchange for a permit to build a parking lot adjacent to her plumbing and electrical supply store. The Court held that in addition to a "sufficient nexus" between the regulated use and the proposed exaction, there must be a "rough proportionality" between the two. The exaction in Dolan failed to meet the latter criterion, thus violating the takings clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Taken together, Nollan and Dolan threaten to chill local land use regulation.

In LUCAS V. SOUTH CAROLINA COASTAL COUNCIL (1992), the Court invalidated South Carolina's Beachfront Management Act as an unconstitutional taking of private property, as applied to a particular landowner. The impugned legislation forbade development of beachfront property on the barrier island beach where Lucas had, prior to the act's passage, purchased an empty lot. The trial court had held that the act's prohibition on development reduced the value of Lucas's land to nothing, a finding left undisturbed on appeal. The Court held that state regulatory statutes that reduce land value to nothing are unconstitutional takings unless the proposed restrictions are part of the landowner's title to begin with, consonant with background COMMON LAW nuisance or property principles. Of particular interest is the Court's decision in Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel (1998), in which a plurality opined that severe, disproportionate, and extremely retroactive liability in the form of economic regulation may amount to an unconstitutional taking. The trend in takings law may constrict the ability of federal and state governments to impose environmentally protective regulation on private property without paying substantial costs.

The Rehnquist Court has also retreated from the liberal standing principles that helped to open the administrative process to citizen participation over the last several decades. In LUJAN V. DEFENDERS OF WILDLIFE (1992), the Court denied standing to a national environmental organization suing under the citizen suit provision of the Endangered Species Act. The plaintiffs challenged the exemption of overseas projects from a rule requiring that federal agencies consult with the U.S. Department of the Interior to minimize the effect of their projects on endangered species. The plaintiffs alleged that their own personal and professional interests in endangered species would be harmed by federally funded development projects. In denying standing, the Court held that the plaintiffs' injuries were not sufficiently "imminent" to establish the Article III standing requirement of injury in fact, nor, according to a plurality, would those injuries be redressable by a favorable court decision. While in many cases the more stringent "imminence" requirement will merely require plaintiffs to be more precise in alleging injury, the redressability requirement, which forces plaintiffs to demonstrate that a favorable decision would in fact alleviate the harm, is less easily rectified and may result in the dismissal of some cases if adopted by a majority of the Court in the future. The Court acknowledged in Lujan that its holding made standing "substantially more difficult" to achieve when the plaintiff is not herself the object of government action. At this writing, the Court has granted CERTIORARI on a case—Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services—that will clarify the stringency of the redressability requirement.

In coming years, the DUE PROCESS clause may be a fertile source of constitutional jurisprudence relevant to environmental law. Due process issues to watch include the imposition of caps on PUNITIVE DAMAGE awards in toxic contamination suits; the definition of knowledge and fault requirements for environmental crimes; environmental justice challenges to federal and state environmental laws that disproportionately burden minorities with environmental risk; and the retrospective imposition of strict liability on defendants in toxic tort suits.

JODY FREEMAN
(2000)

EPPERSON v. ARKANSAS
393 U.S. 97 (1968)

Arkansas prohibited the teaching in its public schools "that mankind ascended or descended from a lower order of animals." In dealing with a challenge to the law based on establishment clause and FREEDOM OF SPEECH grounds, Justice ABE FORTAS, speaking for the Supreme Court, concluded that the Arkansas law violated the establishment clause. "There can be no doubt," he said, "that Arkansas sought to prevent its teachers from discussing the theory of evolution because it is contrary to the beliefs of some that the book of Genesis must be the exclusive source of the doctrine of the origin of man."

Justice HUGO L. BLACK and Justice POTTER STEWART concurred in brief opinions resting on VAGUENESS grounds. The Black opinion raised important GOVERNMENT SPEECH issues that are still unresolved.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Creationism.)

EQUAL ACCESS

For over two decades litigation involving religion and the public schools focused on state-sponsored religious exercises. This pattern changed during the 1980s, as student-led religious groups sought access to school facilities on the same basis as other student groups. These groups claimed that once a public school opened its premises to extracurricular student groups, it created a limited PUBLIC FORUM and could not discriminate against some groups on the basis of the content of their speech; hence, the school was obliged to grant "equal access" to religious student groups that wanted to use school facilities. Equal access found a legal footing in WIDMAR V. VINCENT (1981), where the Supreme Court held that a public university could not close its facilities to religious student groups once it had opened them for use by other groups because to do so would violate the religious students' FREEDOM OF SPEECH guaranteed by the FIRST AMENDMENT.

Despite Widmar, most secondary schools continued to reject requests by religious students to meet on school premises, as did most federal courts; indeed, until 1989 every federal appellate court to rule on the issue held that it would violate the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE for secondary schools to allow religious student groups to meet on the same basis as other student groups. The basic rationale for these lower-court holdings came from a federal appellate opinion by Judge Irving Kaufman in Brandon v. Guilderland (1980). In Brandon, a group of high school students sought permission to meet before school in an empty classroom to pray and read the Bible. The school district denied the request. Judge Kaufman argued that the district could not accede to the students' petition because to do so would impermissibly advance religion and excessively entangle church and state in violation of the second and third prongs of the LEMON TEST.

Kaufman's main argument was psychological: "To an impressionable student even the mere appearance of secular involvement in religious activities might indicate that the state has placed its imprimatur on a particular creed. This symbolic inference is too dangerous to permit." Critics of the decision disagreed. Chief Justice WARREN BURGER, dissenting in BENDER V. WILLIAMSPORT (1986), argued that one must objectively distinguish between state advancement of religion and individual advocacy of religion; whereas the former activity is prohibited by the First Amendment, the latter is "affirmatively protected." The fact that "some hypothetical students" might mistake individual religious expression for state religion was irrelevant according to Burger, who added: "No one would contend that the State would be authorized to dismantle a church erected by private persons on private property because overwhelming evidence showed that other members of the community thought the church was owned and operated by the state."

When the Supreme Court declined to resolve the constitutionality of equal access, Congress intervened by passing the Equal Access Act in 1984. The act applies to all public secondary schools receiving federal money that also maintain a "limited open forum," which exists whenever a school allows "one or more noncurriculum related student groups to meet on school premises during noninstructional time." The act forbids schools with a limited open forum from discriminating against student groups because of the content of their speech.

In BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE WESTSIDE COMMUNITY SCHOOLS V. MERGENS (1990) the Supreme Court held that the act does not violate the establishment clause as applied to religious student groups, but declined to rule whether the equal-access rights guaranteed by statute are also required by the First Amendment. The Court will likely have another opportunity to deal with this First Amendment issue. As equal-access theory is based primarily on the freedom of speech, it lends itself to a broader range of activities than just the student meetings protected by the Equal Access Act. More recent cases have focused, for example, on the right of students to distribute religious publications to classmates on school premises. These cases have yet to reach the Supreme Court.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Religion in Public Schools; Religious Fundamentalism; Religious Liberty; Separation of Church and State.)

Bibliography

WEST, JOHN G., JR. 1991 The Changing Battle over Religion in the Public Schools. Wake Forest Law Review 26:361–401.

WHITEHEAD, JOHN W. 1989 Avoiding Religious Apartheid: Affording Equal Treatment for Student-Initiated Religious Expression in Public Schools. Pepperdine Law Review 16:229–258.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION (EEOC) v. WYOMING
460 U.S. 226 (1983)

The EEOC sought to enforce the AGE DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT ACT (ADEA) against the state of Wyoming in a case involving the involuntary retirement of a fifty-five-year-old game warden. The Supreme Court, 5–4, upheld the ADEA as so applied. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for the Court, found congressional power in the COMMERCE CLAUSE, and rejected the state's claim, based on NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976), that it was immune to this form of congressional regulation. The majority was composed of the four dissenters in Usery plus Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN.

Wyoming, Brennan said, failed the third part of the formula of Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining and Reclamation Association (1981): the ADEA did not "directly impair" Wyoming's ability to "structure integral operations in areas of traditional governmental functions." Wyoming could use other means to test the fitness of game wardens—or, as the ADEA allowed, justify the necessity of the age limit. The ADEA would affect state finances and state policies only marginally. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, for the four dissenters, employed the same Hodel formula and concluded that the ADEA was unconstitutional as applied to a state.

This decision helped set the stage for Usery's overruling in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1984).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Intergovernmental Immunity.)

EQUALITY

See: Difference and Constitutional Equality; Equal Protection of the Laws

EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS

The ancient political ideal of equality did not find explicit recognition in the text of the Constitution until the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT was ratified in 1868. Yet equality was an American ideal from the earliest colonial times. There was irony in the expression of the ideal in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE; the newly independent states generally limited voting to white male property owners, and THOMAS JEFFERSON, the Declaration's author, was the troubled owner of slaves. Even so, one feature of white American society that set it apart from Europe was an egalitarian climate for social relations. The Constitution's ban on TITLES OF NOBILITY symbolized the nation's determination to leave behind the old world's privileges of monarchy and aristocracy.

Jefferson, who believed in an aristocracy of "virtue and talents," understood that equality of opportunity was consistent with wide disparities among individuals' wealth and power. The equality he envisioned was, above all, equality before the law. The principle of universal laws, equally applicable to all citizens, itself provided a foundation for a market economy whose competitive struggles would lead to further inequalities. An equality that was formal, or legal, thus would undermine the "equality of condition" that attracted some of Jefferson's contemporaries. Yet formal equality was something that mattered greatly in the nation's first decades, and it matters greatly today. When Europeans remark, as they still do, on America's relatively high degree of equality, they are referring not to equality of wealth or political power but to equality of social status. With pardonable literary exaggeration, Simone de Beauvoir said it this way: "the rich American has no grandeur; the poor man no servility; human relations in daily life are on a footing of equality. . . ."

The Fourteenth Amendment's wording emphasizes legal equality. A state is forbidden to "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." On its face this language seems to demand no more than even-handed enforcement of laws as they are written. Such a reading, however, would drain all life from the guarantee of equal protection. On this view even a law barring blue-eyed persons from state employment would pass constitutional muster if the state applied it equally, without discrimination, to all applicants, refusing jobs only to those who were blue-eyed. No one has ever seriously argued for so restricted a scope for the equal protection clause. The Supreme Court casually dismissed the idea with a passing comment in YICK WO V. HOPKINS (1886): "the equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws."

At the other extreme of silliness, the Yick Wo statement might be taken literally, interpreting the equal protection clause to forbid the enforcement of any law that imposed any inequality. As Joseph Tussman and JACOBUS TEN BROEK showed nearly forty years ago, so sweeping a reading would convert the clause into a constitutional prohibition on legislation itself. All laws draw lines of classification, applying their rules only to some people (or some transactions or phenomena) and not to others. Furthermore, the very existence of law—that is, of governmental regulation of human behavior—implies inequality, for some individuals must evaluate the behavior of others and enforce the state's norms by imposing sanctions on the recalcitrant. In Ralf Dahrendorf's biting formulation, "all men are equal before the law but they are no longer equal after it." Given the diverse characteristics of humans, the achievement of equality as to one aspect of life necessarily implies inequalities as to other aspects. And if it were possible to construct a society characterized by total, uncompromising equality, no one would want to live in that society.

Then what kinds of inequality are prohibited by the equal protection clause? The abstraction, equality, cannot resolve cases; the question always remains, equality as to what? To give meaning to the equal protection clause requires identification of the substantive values that are its central concern. The inquiry begins in the history leading to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, but it does not end there. To understand the substantive content of the equal protection clause, we must consider not only what it meant to its framers, but also what it has come to mean to succeeding generations of judges and other citizens.

Just what role the framers had in mind for the equal protection clause remains unclear; the amendment's sketchy "legislative history" has been given widely divergent interpretations. All the interpreters agree, however, that the framers' immediate objective was to provide an unshakable constitutional foundation for the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866. That act had been passed over the veto of President ANDREW JOHNSON, who had asserted that it exceeded the powers of Congress.

The 1866 act had declared the CITIZENSHIP of all persons born in the United States and subject to its JURISDICTION. This declaration, later echoed in the text of the Fourteenth Amendment, had been designed to "overrule" the assertion by Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY in his opinion for the Supreme Court in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) that black persons were incapable of being citizens. Taney had said that blacks—not just slaves but any blacks—were incapable of citizenship, because blacks had not been members of "the People of the United States" identified in the Constitution's PREAMBLE as the body who adopted that document. Blacks has been excluded from membership in the national community, according to Taney, because they were "considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority. . . ." Discriminatory state legislation in force when the Constitution was adopted, Taney said, negated the conclusion that the states "regarded at that time, as fellow-citizens and members of the sovereignty, a class of beings whom they had thus stigmatized; . . . and upon whom they had impressed such deep and enduring marks of inferiority and degradation. . . ."

This dubious reading of history is beside the point; Dred Scott's relevance to our inquiry is that Taney's assumptions about racial inferiority and restricted citizenship were just what the drafters of the 1866 act sought to destroy. There was to be no "dominant race" and no "subordinate and inferior class of beings," but only citizens. Indeed the act's conferral of various CIVIL RIGHTS was aimed at abolishing a new system of serfdom designed to replace SLAVERY in the southern states. That system rested on the BLACK CODES, laws methodically imposing legal disabilities on blacks for the purpose of maintaining them in a state of dependency and inferiority.

The 1866 act, after its declaration of citizenship, provided that "such citizens, of every race and color [including former slaves], shall have the same right [to contract and sue in court and deal with property, etc.] as is enjoyed by white citizens. . . ." The "civil rights" thus guaranteed were seen as the equal rights of citizens. When President Johnson vetoed the bill, he similarly linked the ideas of citizenship and equality, and argued that the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT was an insufficient basis for congressional power. Congress overrode Johnson's veto, but from the time of the veto forward, a major purpose of the promoters of the Fourteenth Amendment, then under consideration in Congress, was to secure the constitutional foundations of the 1866 act.

The amendment, like the act, begins with a declaration of citizenship. In the same first section, the amendment goes on to forbid a state to "abridge the PRIVILEGES OR IMMUNITIES of citizens of the United States," to "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without DUE PROCESS OF LAW," or to deny a person "the equal protection of the laws." No serious effort was made during the debates on the amendment to identify separate functions for the three clauses that followed the declaration of citizenship. The section as a whole was taken to guarantee the equal enjoyment of the rights of citizens.

Beyond those specific goals, nothing in the consensus of the Fourteenth Amendment's framers would have caused anyone to anticipate what the Supreme Court made of the amendment in the latter half of the twentieth century. Yet the Fourteenth Amendment was not written in the language of specific rights, such as the right to contract or buy or sell property, but was deliberately cast in the most general terms. The broad language of the amendment strongly suggests that its framers were proposing to write into the Constitution not a "laundry list" of specific civil rights but a principle of equal citizenship.

To be a citizen is to enjoy the dignity of membership in the society, to be respected as a person who "belongs."

The principle of equal citizenship presumptively forbids the organized society to treat an individual either as a member of an inferior or dependent caste or as a nonparticipant. As Taney recognized in his Dred Scott opinion, the stigma of caste is inconsistent with equal citizenship, which demands respect for each individual's humanity. Further, a citizen is a participant in society, a member of a moral community who must be taken into account when community decisions are made. Citizenship also implies obligations to one's fellow citizens. The values of participation and responsibility contribute to the primary citizenship value of respect, but they are also independently significant as aspects of citizenship.

For the first eight decades of the Fourteenth Amendment's existence, its interpretation by the Supreme Court was largely a betrayal of the constitutional ideal of equal citizenship. First by inventing the STATE ACTION limitation on the Fourteenth Amendment in the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883), and then by giving racial SEGREGATION the stamp of constitutional validity in the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL decision of PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896), the Supreme Court delivered virtually the entire subject of race relations back into the hands of the white South. The equal citizenship principle was left to be articulated in dissenting opinions. Notable among those dissents were the opinions of Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) and of Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN in the Civil Rights Cases and Plessy v. Ferguson. The latter dissent included a passage that is now famous: "In view of the Constitution, in the eye of the law, there is in this country no superior, dominant, ruling class of citizens. There is no caste here. Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens." For half a century, those words expressed not a reality but a hope.

Outside the field of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, the equal protection clause had little force even during the period when the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was in active use as a defense against various forms of ECONOMIC REGULATION. By the 1920s, Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES could say in BUCK V. BELL (1927), with accuracy if not with compassion, that the equal protection clause was the "usual last resort of constitutional arguments."

Even during the years when Holmes's "last resort" epithet summarized equal protection jurisprudence, the NAACP was pinning its hopes for racial justice on the federal judiciary, and was winning some victories. The Supreme Court had struck down LITERACY TESTS for voting that contained GRANDFATHER CLAUSES exempting most white voters, in GUINN V. UNITED STATES (1915) and Lane v. Wilson (1939); the Court had begun the process of holding "white primaries" unconstitutional; and it had invalidated racial zoning in BUCHANAN V. WARLEY (1917). And after the nation had emerged from the Great Depression and World War II, the judicial climate was distinctly more hospitable to equal protection claims.

The Depression had brought to dominance a new political majority, committed to active governmental intervention in economic affairs for the purpose of achieving full employment and major improvements in wages and the conditions of labor. The judiciary's main contribution to those egalitarian goals was to free the legislative process from the close judicial supervision of economic regulation that had attended the flowering of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS doctrines in the recent past. The war not only ended the Depression; it was a watershed in race relations. The migration of blacks from the rural South to northern and western cities, which had slowed during the Depression, dramatically accelerated, as wartime industry offered jobs that black workers had previously filled only rarely. Urban blacks were soon seen as a potent national political force. By the end of the war, the Army had begun the process of racial integration. Wartime ideology, with its scorn for Nazi racism, had lasting effects on the public mind. Even as the Supreme Court was upholding severe—and racist—wartime restrictions in the JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES (1943–1944), it reflected a new national state of mind in its celebrated OBITER DICTUM in KOREMATSU V. UNITED STATES (1944): "All legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. . . . [C]ourts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny."

In the immediate postwar years the Supreme Court held unconstitutional the judicial enforcement of RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS in SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948), and it even ruled that the equal protection clause forbade some forms of segregation in state universities. (See SWEATT V. PAINTER, 1950.) The expected return to economic depression did not materialize. Instead, the country entered a period of unprecedented economic expansion. Good times are the most propitious for egalitarian public policies; it is relatively easy for "haves" to share with "have-nots" when they see their own conditions as steadily improving. The time was ripe, in the 1950s, for important successes in the movement for racial equality.

On the national scene, however, the political branches of government remained disinclined to act. One-party politics in the South had given disproportionate influence in the Congress to Southerners whose seniority gave them chairs of major committees. With President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER reluctant to intervene, the prospects for effective civil rights legislation seemed dim. Thus was the stage furnished when Eisenhower appointed EARL WARREN to the Chief Justiceship in 1953.

In Warren's first term the Court decided BROWN V.

BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954)—still the leading authoritative affirmation that the Constitution forbids a system of caste—and in so doing began what PHILIP KURLAND has called an "egalitarian revolution" in constitutional law. Brown was a major event in modern American history. Race relations in America would never again be what they were on the eve of the decision. The political movement for racial equality took on new vitality, and other egalitarian movements drew encouragement from that example. The constitutional law of equal protection gained powerful momentum, and the doctrinal effects went well beyond the subject of racial equality. If Brown itself represented JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, it was no more than a shadow of what was to come. The equal protection clause became the cutting edge of the WARREN COURT's active intervention into realms that previously had been left to legislative choice.

Two doctrinal techniques served these egalitarian ends. First, the Court heightened the STANDARD OF REVIEW used to test the constitutionality of certain laws, insisting on STRICT SCRUTINY by the courts of legislation that employed a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION or discriminated against the exercise of a FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST. Second, the Court relaxed the "state action" limitation on the Fourteenth Amendment, bringing new forms of private conduct under the amendment's reach. Although the BURGER COURT later revitalized the "state action" limitation and slowed the advance of equal protection into new doctrinal territory, it made its own contributions to the development of the principle of equal citizenship.

Once the Court had firmly fastened the "suspect classification" label to racial discrimination, other forms of discrimination were attacked in the same terms. Some Justices have refused to find any legislative classification other than race to be constitutionally disfavored, but most of them have been receptive to arguments that at least some nonracial discriminations deserve heightened scrutiny. Thus, while only discrimination against ALIENS has been assimilated to the "suspect classifications" category—and even that assimilation is a sometime thing—the Court has announced clearly that judicial scrutiny should be heightened in some significant degree for SEX DISCRIMINATION or legislative classifications based on ILLEGITIMACY. Not only in these opinions but also in opinions refusing to apply similar reasoning to other forms of discrimination, the Court has developed a consensus on two sets of factors that are relevant in determining a classification's degree of "suspectness" or disfavor, and thus the level of justification which courts should demand for it.

The first set of factors emphasizes the equal citizenship value of respect; these factors reflect the judiciary's solicitude for the victims of stigma. A classification on the basis of a trait that is immutable and highly visible—such as race or sex—promotes stereotyping, the automatic assignment of an individual to a general category, often implying inferiority. The second set of factors, emphasizing the equal citizenship value of participation, focuses on the historic disadvantages (especially political disadvantages) of DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITIES. Both the phrase and the idea antedate Warren Court activism; they come from Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE's opinion for the Court in UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938). Legislation that burdens a group likely to be neglected by the legislature is a natural candidate for special judicial scrutiny.

The equal citizenship themes of respect, participation, and responsibility also informed the Warren Court's decisions demanding close examination of the justifications for legislative discrimination against the exercise of "fundamental interests." Those decisions, in theory, might have been rested on grounds of substantive due process rather than equal protection. In fact, the Burger Court, which refused to recognize any new "fundamental" interests in equal protection doctrine, employed similar reasoning under the heading of due process, with corresponding attention to the values of equal citizenship. (See ABORTION AND THE CONSTITUTION; FAMILY AND THE CONSTITUTION; RIGHT OF PRIVACY.) The equal protection cases, however, identify only three clusters of interests as "fundamental": VOTING RIGHTS and related interests in equal access to the electoral process; certain rights of ACCESS TO THE COURTS (which have come to be explained more recently on due process grounds); and rights concerning marriage, procreation, and family relations. (See FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION.)

Voting, of course, is one of the core responsibilities of citizenship. Perhaps more important, it is the citizen's preeminent symbol of participation as a valued member of the community. Access to the courts, like voting, is instrumentally valuable as a way to protect other interests. But—also like voting—the chance to be heard is an important citizenship symbol. To be listened to, to be treated as a person and not an object of administration, is to be afforded the dignity owed to a citizen. Finally, the marriage and family cases similarly implicate the citizenship values of respect, responsibility, and participation. Marriage and parenthood do not merely define one's legal obligations; they define one's status and social role and self-concept. For the state to deny a person the right and responsibility of choice about such matters is to take away the presumptive right to be treated as a person, one of equal worth among citizens. None of these "fundamental" interests is entirely immune from state interference; what the principle of equal citizenship requires is that government offer weighty justification before denying their equal enjoyment.

In retrospect the whole apparatus of differential standards of review can be seen as judicial interest-balancing, thinly disguised: the more important the interest in equality, the more justification was required for its invasion by the government. Perhaps the Warren Court's majority chose to clothe its decisions in a "judicial"-sounding system of categories because the Justices were sensitive to the charge that they were writing their own policy preferences into the equal protection clause, and not just "interpreting" it. As a consequence, the Court extended the reach of equal protection without ever explicitly articulating the substantive content of the equal protection clause.

The Warren Court, in its final years, was well on the way to effective abandonment of the "state action" limitation on the Fourteenth Amendment, finding "significant state involvement" in all manner of private racial discriminations that denied their victims full participation in the public life of the community. Once Congress passed the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, however, it became unnecessary for the Court to complete its dismantling job; now there was a federal statutory right of access to PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS such as hotels, restaurants, and theaters. When the Court in JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968) discovered the Thirteenth Amendment as a source of congressional power to forbid most other private racial discrimination, the chief practical motivation for doing away with the "state action" doctrine was removed. In later years, a different majority of Justices has gone far to restore the "state action" limitation to its former status but at the same time it has both reaffirmed the power of Congress to stamp out private racial discrimination and promoted that purpose with an expansive interpretation of existing civil rights acts.

The right to participate in the community's public life—even those portions of public life that are owned and managed by private persons—is an essential ingredient of effective citizenship, part of what it means to be a respected member of society. The "state action" limitation, when the Supreme Court invented it, insulated the "private" choices of the owners of public accommodations and other commercial businesses not only from the direct reach of the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of equal protection but also from congressional vindication of the rights of equal citizenship. Although "state action" remains an impediment to the application of the equal protection clause to some private conduct, Congress can protect, and has protected, the most important claims to participation by all citizens in society's public life.

To say that the principle of equal citizenship is the substantive core of the equal protection clause, and that the Supreme Court's recent equal protection jurisprudence has centered on the values of equal citizenship, is not to decide particular cases. Equal citizenship is not a decisional machine but a principle that informs judgment by reference to certain substantive values. Like other constitutional principles, it is inescapably open-ended. The Warren Court's expansion of the content of equal protection doctrine was regularly greeted with the criticism that the Court had not specified exactly how far its egalitarian principles would reach. The critics did no more than echo what Jeremy Bentham had said more than a century earlier: the abstraction, equality, is insatiable; where would it all end?

This "stopping-place" problem is implicit in any constitutional guarantee of equality. Most obviously, it lies at the center of the question of affirmative governmental obligations to reduce inequality. In a few decisions over the past three decades the Supreme Court has imposed on government the duty to compensate for the inability of INDIGENTS to pay various costs or fees required for effective access to the courts. The Burger Court's consciousness of the stopping-place problem produced two types of response. Some claims of access, although accepted, were explained as resting on rights to procedural fairness, and thus on due process rather than equal protection grounds. (See BODDIE V. CONNECTICUT.) Other access claims were rejected, halting further extension of the demands of equal protection. (See ROSS V. MOFFITT.) Yet the Court has not been willing to put an end to the notion that some inequalities, although not caused directly by the state, are constitutionally intolerable, requiring governmental action to relieve their victims from some of their consequences.

Similarly, consciousness of the stopping-place problem has influenced the Court's definition of what constitutes a legislative discrimination based on race, or gender, or, presumably, any other disfavored classification. After flirting in some school segregation cases with a view that would equate de facto with de jure segregation, the Court declared in the employment discrimination case of WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976) that it was not enough, in making a claim of racial discrimination, to show that legislation had a racially discriminatory impact. To succeed, such a claim must be based on a showing of official discriminatory purpose. (See LEGISLATION.) The "impact" principle, said the Court, "would be far reaching and would raise serious questions about, and perhaps invalidate, a whole range of tax, welfare, public service, regulatory, and licensing statutes that may be more burdensome to the poor and to the average black than to the more affluent white." In other words, where would it all end?

What is needed, in dealing with the stopping-place problem as with any other aspect of equal protection interest-balancing, is the guidance that can be found in the Fourteenth Amendment's substantive values. Some inequalities will invade the core values of equal citizenship, and others will touch them hardly at all. The level of justification required for governmental action—or failure to act—will vary according to the magnitude of that invasion. Some economic inequalities may be so severe as to impose a stigma of caste, but most do not. Part of our tradition of responsible citizenship, after all, is to provide for oneself and one's family. The principle of equal citizenship is not a charter for economic leveling but a presumptive guarantee against those inequalities that dehumanize or seriously impair one's ability to participate as a member of society. To say that such determinations turn on questions of degree is merely to acknowledge that no constitutional principle is a substitute for judicial judgment.

Since the late 1960s a number of governmental and private bodies have voluntarily taken steps to compensate for inequalities that are the legacy of past societal discrimination, and generally to integrate various institutions by race and by gender. These AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs, sometimes in the form of racial or gender-based quotas for employment or housing or admission to higher education, do not merely equalize. Every equality begets another inequality. Even absent a quota, when a person's race becomes a relevant qualification for a job, all other relevant factors are diminished in weight. To put the matter more concretely, an individual can lose the competition for the job on the basis of his or her race. If affirmative action is constitutionally justified—and the Supreme Court has largely validated it—the reasons lie not in any lack of sympathy for such arguments, but in the weight of countervailing considerations supporting the programs. The Justices' various opinions upholding affirmative action have mainly sounded the theme of remedying past discrimination, but other arguments emphasize the urgency of integrating American institutions in the present generation.

The debate over affirmative action has touched a more general issue: the appropriate role of groups in equal protection analysis. In one view, group membership is simply irrelevant. The text of the equal protection clause provides its guarantees to "any person," and much of our constitutional tradition is individualistic. Yet, inescapably, a claim to equality is a claim made on behalf of a group. If every law draws some line of classification, then it is also true that every individual is potentially classifiable according to an enormous variety of characteristics. Legislative classification implies a selection of certain attributes as the relevant ones—the "merits" that justify conferring a benefit (or "demerits" that justify a burden). Once such a classification is written into law, any individual is classified either with the group of persons who possess the "merits" (or "demerits") or with the group of those who do not. To complain against a classification scheme is not merely to say "I am wronged," but to say "We—the whole group of individuals disadvantaged—are wronged." Indeed, any claim based on a rule of law is intelligible only as a demand to be treated the same as other members of a group, that is, all others who share the relevant "individual" attributes specified by the rule.

The origins of the Fourteenth Amendment strongly suggest that a group, defined by race just as the Dred Scott opinion had defined it, was intended to be the amendment's chief beneficiary. If today the equal protection clause prohibits other forms of inequality, there is nothing incongruous about viewing that development in one perspective as the recognition of the claims of groups of people: women, aliens, illegitimate children, homosexuals, the handicapped. When equal citizenship is denied, the denial typically takes a form that affects not merely isolated individuals but classes of people.

The equal protection clause limits only the states; nothing in the constitutional text expressly imposes an analogous limit on the federal government. Yet since BOLLING V. SHARPE (1954) the Supreme Court has consistently interpreted the Fifth Amendment's due process clause to guarantee equal protection against federal denial. This interpretation has roots in the original Constitution's assumption that the new national government would have a direct relationship with individuals. The idea of national citizenship was current long before the Civil Rights Act of 1866. And that citizenship, as Justice Bradley argued in his dissent in the Slaughterhouse Cases, implies some measure of equality before the law. Bolling, a companion case to Brown v. Board of Education, presented a challenge to school segregation in the District of Columbia. Brown held the segregation of state schools unconstitutional, and Chief Justice Warren said it would be "unthinkable" if a similar principle were not applied to the national government. After the Fourteenth Amendment's reaffirmation of national citizenship, such a result would, indeed, have been unthinkable.

The Warren Court's expansion of constitutional guarantees of equality necessarily implied an expansion of the powers of the national government. The Civil War amendments were reinterpreted to give Congress sweeping powers to reach virtually all racial discriminations, public and private. The Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause became the basis for intensified intervention by the federal courts into areas previously governed by local law and custom, as a new body of uniform national law replaced local autonomy. As the "state action" limitation was relaxed, the Constitution brought the commands of law to areas previously regulated by private institutional decision. In ALEXANDER BICKEL's phrase, the Warren Court's main themes were "egalitarian, legalitarian, and centralizing."

The desegregation of places of public accommodations in the South is an instructive example. The Supreme Court first held unconstitutional all forms of state-sponsored segregation, including segregation of public beaches, parks, golf courses, and restaurants. Then, cautiously, it began to apply the same reasoning to some privately owned public accommodations, finding "state action" in the most tenuous connections between public policy and the private decision to segregate. Finally, in HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL CO. V. UNITED STATES (1964) the Court moved swiftly to validate the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which forbade segregation in most public accommodations that mattered. In all these actions the Court promoted the extension of a body of uniform national law to replace the local laws and customs that had long governed southern communities, with an earlier Supreme Court's blessing.

These changes in the law governing racial discrimination in public accommodations were, in one perspective, a repetition of a course of events that had been common in the Western world since the seventeenth century. An older system, basing a person's legal rights on his or her status in a hierarchical structure, came to be replaced by a newer law that applied impersonally to everyone. The abolition of slavery, the 1866 Civil Rights Act, the Civil War amendments—all had been earlier episodes in this same historical line. And the law that liberated individuals from domination based on race, like the law that previously had broken feudal hierarchies and the power of the guilds, was the law of the centralized state. If one were asked to compress three centuries of Western political history into three words, the words might be: "egalitarian, legalitarian, and centralizing."

Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, concurring in EDWARDS V. CALIFORNIA (1941), remarked that the Fourteenth Amendment's privileges and immunities clause was aimed at making United States citizenship "the dominant and paramount allegiance among us." Whatever the historical warrant for that assertion, it reflects today's social fact. We think of ourselves primarily as citizens of the nation, and only secondarily as citizens of the several states. The Constitution itself has become our pre-eminent symbol of national community, and the judiciary's modern contributions to our sense of community have centered on the principle of equal citizenship.

It is hard to overstate the importance of the ideal of equality as a legitimizing force in American history. For the SOCIAL COMPACT theorists of the eighteenth century whose thinking was well-known to the Framers of the original Constitution, some measure of equality before the law was implicit in the idea of citizenship. DANIEL WEBSTER, speaking of "the LAW OF THE LAND," agreed: "The meaning is, that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities, under the protection of the general rules which govern society." By Webster's time, support for the principle of equality of opportunity could be found even among the most comfortable Americans, who saw in that principle a way to justify their advantages. More generally, the egalitarian spirit that has promoted a national consciousness has also lent legitimacy to government. There has been just enough truth in the belief that "anyone can grow up to be President" to provide a critical measure of the diffuse loyalty that is an essential ingredient of nationhood.

Never in our history has it been true that anyone might aspire to the presidency. Slavery and racial discrimination are only the most obvious and uglier counterexamples; not until our own time have women's aspirations to such high position become realistic. Yet the guarantee of equal protection of the laws, even during the long decades when lawyers deemed it a constitutional trifle, stood as a statement of an important American ideal. Much of the growth in our constitutional law has resulted when the downtrodden have called the rest of us to account, asking whether we intend to live up to the principles we profess. Vindication of the constitutional promise of equal citizenship did not take its rightful place on our judicial agenda for an unconscionably long time, and it remains far from complete. What is most remarkable, however, is the nourishment that the promise—the promise alone—has provided for a national community.

KANNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BELL, DERRICK A., JR. 1980 Race, Racism, and American Law, 2nd ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1970 The Supreme Court and the Idea of Progress. New York: Harper & Row.

BLACK, CHARLES L., JR. 1969 Structure and Relationship in Constitutional Law. Pages 51–66. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FISS, OWEN M. 1976 Groups and the Equal Protection Clause. Philosophy and Public Affairs 5:107–177.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1977 The Supreme Court, 1976 Term—Foreword: Equal Citizenship under the Fourteenth Amendment. Harvard Law Review 91:1–68.

KINOY, ARTHUR 1967 The Constitutional Right of Negro Freedom. Rutgers Law Review 21:387–441.

MICHELMAN, FRANK I. 1969 The Supreme Court, 1968 Term—Foreword: On Protecting the Poor Through the Fourteenth Amendment. Harvard Law Review 83:7–59.

POLE, J. R. 1978 The Pursuit of Equality in American History. Berkeley: University of California Press.

RAE, DOUGLAS 1981 Equalities. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

TOCQUEVILLE, ALEXIS DE 1945 Democracy in America, P. Bradley, ed., 2 vols. New York: Vintage Books.

TUSSMAN, JOSEPH and TEN BROEK, JACOBUS 1949 The Equal Protection of the Laws. California Law Review 37:341–381.

WESTEN, PETER 1982 The Empty Idea of Equality. Harvard Law Review 95:537–596.

EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS
(Update 1)

Two questions have dominated the Supreme Court's equal protection opinions since 1985. The first, largely a matter of rhetoric, is the question of the appropriate STANDARD OF REVIEW. The second and more important question is the relevance of racial groups in determining the existence of discrimination and in providing legislative or judicial remedies for the harms of discrimination.

The uninitiated reader of the Court's opinions surely would think the process of decision in an equal protection case begins with a selection of the appropriate standard of judicial review from among three well-worn formulas: (1) STRICT SCRUTINY, which requires the government to offer compelling justification for an inequality it has imposed, and so generally results in the invalidation of governmental action; (2) RATIONAL BASIS, in which the Court pays strong deference to the government's assertions of justification and generally upholds the governmental action; or (3) the "intermediate," "heightened" scrutiny that falls between these two polar extremes, requiring "important" justification. Then, the same reader might imagine, the Court measures the government's asserted justifications against the proper standard of review, and on that basis reaches judgment.

More skeptical readers know that the order of the decisional process is often quite the reverse, with a judgment on the merits of the case preceding—even dictating—the selection of a standard of review as an opinion's rhetorical structure. The skeptics know, too, how misleading it is to speak of "the" standard of review, given the Court's occasional willingness to require significant justification in the name of "rational basis" review. Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL has long (and accurately) insisted that the Court's decisions add up to a sliding scale in which the standard of review varies according to the importance of the interests at stake. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS made a similar point when he said, "There is only one equal protection clause." In equal protection cases, as in other cases, the Court decides by weighing interests.

The Court's post-1985 equal protection decisions are illustrative. A 6–3 majority of the Justices used the traditional, highly deferential, "rational basis" standard to uphold two acts of Congress governing eligibility for welfare benefits and food stamps in Lyng v. Castillo (1986) and Lyng v. Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers (1988). Similarly, in Kadrmas v. Dickinson Public Schools (1988), the Court upheld, 5–4, a state law authorizing some school districts to impose on unwilling parents user fees for school-bus transportation. The majority specifically rejected the argument of two dissenting Justices that PLYLER V. DOE (1982) demanded heightened judicial scrutiny for wealth classifications governing access to public education. Plyler's opinion had been written in the language of "rational basis" review, but no one among the Justices or the Court's commentators had been deceived into believing that the Court was being deferential to the legislature's judgment. In fact, the Court in Kadrmas explicitly called Plyler a case of heightened scrutiny. The post-1985 decisions may be less than satisfying, but they are conventional applications of existing doctrine.

The dissenters' invocation of Plyler v. Doe reminds one, however, that Justices can make "rational basis" into the equivalent of heightened scrutiny when they are so inclined. Two recent cases evoked such responses. ATTORNEY GENERAL OF NEW YORK V. SOTO-LOPEZ (1986) was a challenge to a state law that gave veterans of the armed forces a preference in civil-service hiring, but only if the veterans were New York residents when they entered the forces. A four-Justice plurality concluded that the law failed to pass the heightened scrutiny demanded by the RIGHT TO TRAVEL. Two other Justices rejected both the "right to travel" argument and the conclusion that heightened scrutiny was appropriate; nonetheless, they concluded that the law lacked a rational basis and so violated the equal protection clause. Plainly, this is not a classical "rational basis" decision, any more than was Plyler v. Doe.

In CLEBURNE V. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER (1985) the Justices were unanimous in holding unconstitutional a Texas town's refusal to grant a ZONING variance to allow the operation of a group home for mentally retarded persons. The court of appeals had concluded that an official classification based on MENTAL RETARDATION required justification at the level of "intermediate" scrutiny, but a majority of the Supreme Court disagreed. Vigorously arguing that the proper standard was "rational basis," the majority proceeded to a meticulous examination of the justifications offered by the town, rejecting each one as insufficient. As Justice Marshall, concurring, pointed out, Cleburne has taken its place alongside Plyler as a leading modern example of the sliding scale of standards of review in action.

In at least two kinds of cases, the "rational basis" standard, initially given "bite" in the fashion of Plyler and Cleburne, has been transformed into candid recognition of a more rigorous judicial scrutiny of governmental justifications. The law of SEX DISCRIMINATION moved from the "rational basis" explanation of Reed v. Reed (1971) to the explicit "intermediate" scrutiny of CRAIG V. BOREN (1976). A similar rhetorical change is visible in the law governing classifications based on the legal status of ILLEGITIMACY. First came the "rational basis" language of LEVY V. LOUISIANA (1968); eventually, the open adoption of "intermediate" scrutiny in Clark v. Jeter (1988). These progressions exemplify the normative power of the factual: the practice of heightened scrutiny eventually leads to its formal recognition as doctrine. It is not extravagant to expect a similar treatment of the claims of the mentally retarded in some future opinion. In the end, the standard of JUDICIAL REVIEW seems not so much to govern decisions as to provide a rhetorical framework on which lawyers and judges can fasten the substantive considerations that are the heart of argument and decision: the harms of governmental actions to constitutionally protected interests and the government's justifications for those actions.

In contrast, arguments about the relevance of group harms and the validity of group remedies are of major importance in deciding cases—and, indeed, in deciding whether the nation will seriously address the continuing harms of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. Certainly racial discrimination happens to people one by one, but it happens because they are members of a racial group. The harms of group subordination have multiple causes; actions are harmful because of their contexts. Yet our current constitutional law pays little attention to context and, instead, centers on a principle demanding no more of government than formal racial neutrality. To establish a claim of racial discrimination that violates the equal protection clause, normally one must show that identifiable officers of the government have purposefully acted on a racial ground to produce the harm in question—a proposition typically hard to prove.

A rare case in which the requisite purpose was found was Hunter v. Underwood (1985). The Supreme Court concluded that a clause in Alabama's 1901 state constitution disenfranchising persons convicted of crimes of "moral turpitude" had been adopted for the purpose of preventing black citizens from voting and continued in the present to have racially disparate effects. Accordingly, the Court held that it was unconstitutional for the state to deny the vote on the basis of a conviction for the MISDEMEANOR of passing a worthless check. The Court based its conclusion about the law's continuing racially disparate effects on statistics showing that blacks in two Alabama counties had been disenfranchised under the law at a rate at least 1.7 times the rate for whites.

Two years later, however, in rejecting an equal protection attack on the constitutionality of the death penalty, a majority of the Justices refused to give similar weight to a statistical demonstration of racial discrimination. A study of some 2,000 Georgia murder cases in the 1970s showed dramatic racial disparities in the likelihood that CAPITAL PUNISHMENT would be imposed. In MCCLESKEY V. KEMP (1987) the Court decided, 5–4, that those statistics were irrelevant; to prevail on a claim of racial discrimination, a defendant must show some specific acts of purposeful discrimination by the prosecutor, jury, or judge in his or her own case. Surely the majority Justices understood that a contrary decision would have threatened wholesale reversals of death sentences—a course they were unwilling to take.

Both the Hunter and McCleskey cases raised questions concerning the relevance of group subordination in equal protection analysis. McCleskey illustrates the present majority's devotion to the principle of formal racial neutrality and its reluctance to accept a showing of disparity among racial groups as proof of the discrimination that violates the equal protection clause. In interpreting a number of federal CIVIL RIGHTS statutes, however, the Court has accepted this sort of statistical proof of discrimination.

The issue of the constitutionality of AFFIRMATIVE ACTION brings together the rhetorical question of the standard of judicial review and the more substantive question of group remedies. Although, since 1985, the Supreme Court has remained fragmented on both these aspects of affirmative action, the practical effects of the decisions show a remarkable stability.

Given the acceptability of statistical proof of violation of a number of major antidiscrimination laws, many an affirmative-action program amounts to the substitution of one group remedy for another. Accordingly, there is broad agreement among the Justices on the validity of affirmative-action programs that are seen to be genuinely remedial. Yet the dominant principle for the Court's current majority is one of formal racial neutrality, and there is some awkwardness in squaring affirmative action with this principle. In two recent affirmative-action cases—WYGANT V. JACKSON BOARD OF EDUCATION (1986), on public hiring, and RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989), on public contracting—the key opinions were written by Justices LEWIS F. POWELL and SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR. On the surface, these opinions minimize group concerns, but together they make clear how a public institution can constitutionally adopt an affirmative action program. The approved method, explained as a form of remedy for past discrimination, makes judicious use of statistics showing racial disparities. In short, Justices Powell and O'Connor have found a way to use the language of individual justice in the cause of ending group subordination.

The prevailing opinions in Wygant and Croson emphasize the "strict scrutiny" standard of review, employing this standard both in evaluating the justifications for affirmative action as a remedy for past discrimination and in requiring "narrow tailoring" of a racially based remedy. In METRO BROADCASTING, INC. V. FCC (1990), however, a different 5–4 majority announced that the less demanding "intermediate" scrutiny was appropriate in evaluating an affirmative-action program approved by Congress. In an opinion by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, the majority upheld a congressionally approved program of the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) for a limited number of racial preferences in the distribution of broadcast licenses. Here the majority said that Congress was not limited to providing remedies for past discrimination; rather, the affirmative-action program was aimed at achieving a greater diversity in broadcast programming. The four dissenters, in opinions by Justice O'Connor and Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, insisted on "strict scrutiny" for congressional affirmative action as well as for state or local governmental programs and argued that the nonremedial purpose of broadcasting diversity was not a sufficiently compelling governmental purpose to pass the test.

Even after the retirement of Justice Brennan, there remains a majority of Justices who agree that Congress has the power, in enforcing the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, to remedy societal discrimination, both private and governmental, through affirmative-action programs. Presumably, in future cases, that result will be described, as it was in Croson, as consistent with "strict scrutiny." Indeed, in Metro Broadcasting itself one might have imagined an opinion upholding the FCC's diversity program as broadly "remedial." In the affirmative-action context, as elsewhere in equal protection doctrine, discussions of the standard of review serve purposes that are mainly rhetorical.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Capital Punishment and Race; Discrete and Insular Minorities; Race and Criminal Justice; Race-Consciousness; Racial Preference.)

Bibliography

BELL, DERRICK A. 1987 And We Are Not Saved: The Elusive Quest for Racial Justice. New York: Basic Books.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1989 Belonging to America: Equal Citizenship and the Constitution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

KENNEDY, RANDALL L. 1988 McCleskey v. Kamp: Race, Capital Punishment, and the Supreme Court. Harvard Law Review 101:1388–1433.

LAWRENCE, CHARLES R., III 1987 The Id, the Ego, and Equal Protection: Reckoning with Unconscious Racism. Stanford Law Review 39:317–388.

MINOW, MARTHA 1987 The Supreme Court, 1986 Term—Foreword: Justice Engendered. Harvard Law Review 101: 10–95.

EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS
(Update 2)

The equality value of the equal protection clause is implicated most strongly when the government discriminates against groups. Discrimination on the basis of identifiable group membership, such as race, gender, alienage, birth out of wedlock, or SEXUAL ORIENTATION means that all members of the disfavored group are disadvantaged by governmental action because of their group membership. The constitutional permissibility of discrimination on the basis of group membership depends on whether the government can provide an adequate justification for the specific act of discrimination. The matter of adequate justification is influenced in part by the degree of scrutiny called for under the articulated STANDARD OF REVIEW applicable to discrimination against the particular group. But it is also influenced by the Supreme Court's value judgments about the premises underlying the discrimination.

The paradigmatic form of discrimination on the basis of identifiable group membership in American society has been RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. The Court has long held that all racial discrimination is suspect and so is subject to the STRICT SCRUTINY standard of review. The specific act of racial discrimination must be shown to be "precisely tailored to advance a compelling governmental interest." Applying this exacting standard of review, the Court has held unconstitutional virtually all governmental action discriminating against African Americans and other racial or ethnic minorities in the last half of the twentieth century. However, the Court has also held that the equal protection clause prohibits only intentional racial discrimination. Facially neutral laws that have the demonstrable effect of disadvantaging racial minorities as a group are not subject to constitutional challenge absent evidence of an invidious purpose to discriminate on a racial basis.

The most controverted constitutional issue of racial equality today is the permissibility of race-based AFFIRMATIVE ACTION designed to overcome the inequality that exists between African Americans (and other racial- ethnic minorities) and whites, inequality that has resulted from a long history of official and unofficial racial discrimination. On the one hand, the preference for racial minorities as a group embodied in affirmative action programs causes individual whites to suffer discrimination because of their race, and so is inconsistent with the principle of formal racial neutrality. On the other hand, this racial preference advances the objective of substantive racial equality. The tension between the principle of formal racial neutrality and the objective of substantive racial equality is reflected in the difficult and often divided Court decisions as to the constitutional permissibility of race-based affirmative action.

The one point on which the Court is agreed is that racial preference is constitutionally permissible when it is precisely tailored to overcome the present consequences of identified past discrimination for which the governmental entity employing racial preference is itself responsible. Since 1990, however, the Court has limited the use of race-based affirmative action for this purpose, emphasizing that there must be a substantial basis in evidence for finding the existence of identified past discrimination. In ADARAND CONSTRUCTORS, INC. V. PEÑA (1995), the Court held that racial preference programs adopted by Congress are subject to the same "strict scrutiny" standard of review as racial preference programs adopted by state and local governments, effectively overruling METRO BROADCASTING, INC. V. FCC (1990).

The Court, in SHAW V. RENO (1993) AND ITS PROGENY, has also held that when a state seeks to remedy the dilution of minority political power caused by past discrimination in voting, it is not justified in using race as the predominant factor in ELECTORAL DISTRICTING. The state may not draw electoral districts in an irregular form in disregard of "traditional districting criteria" in order to create a legislative district in which racial minority voters are in the majority. There is also a question as to whether the Court will continue to follow its earlier decision in REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), where it held that a public university may use race-conscious admissions criteria in order to achieve a racially diverse student body.

The clear trend in equal protection jurisprudence today is toward a requirement of formal racial neutrality. For the most part, governmental efforts to overcome substantive racial inequality will have to be accomplished by racially neutral means, which are likely to be less effective than race-based affirmative action. This result, interacting with the conclusion that the equal protection clause prohibits only intentional racial discrimination, seriously limits governmental efforts to achieve substantive racial equality in American society.

In times past, classifications on the basis of gender were pervasive in American law, and were based on stereotyped assumptions about men and women and their respective societal roles. These gender-based classifications reinforced male domination and female subordination, but in many of their specific applications they disadvantaged men as well as women. The Court held in CRAIG V. BOREN (1976) that SEX DISCRIMINATION is subject to "intermediate" scrutiny, and that in order to be upheld, it must be "substantially related to advancing an important governmental interest."

In applying this standard of review, the Court has insisted on an "exceedingly persuasive justification" for any gender-based classification. The Court has found such a justification to exist only where the particular gender-based classification had the purpose and effect of remedying the present consequences of past societal discrimination suffered by women as a group or was related to biological and physical differences between men and women and their different roles in the reproductive process. Because gender-based classifications are constitutionally disfavored, they have generally been eliminated in federal and state laws and replaced with gender-neutral criteria, such as "surviving spouse," "dependent spouse," "custodial parent," and the like. In UNITED STATES V. VIRGINIA (1996), one of the very few cases involving gender-based classifications to come before the Court in recent years, the Court held that Virginia could not constitutionally exclude women from the citizen-soldier training afforded by the Virginia Military Institute, a state-supported military college.

The Court's interpretation of the equal protection clause necessarily influences the political decisions of Congress and the state legislatures with respect to discrimination on the basis of identifiable group membership. Although the Court, applying strict scrutiny, has held that the equal protection clause precludes the states from discriminating against resident ALIENS with respect to entitlement to governmental benefits, such as WELFARE, it has also held that Congress's plenary power over IMMIGRATION and NATURALIZATION requires extreme judicial deference to Congress's treatment of resident aliens. When Congress discriminates against resident aliens, for example, by denying them WELFARE BENEFITS, the deferential RATIONAL BASIS standard of review applies, and such discriminations are routinely held to be constitutionally permissible. This broad constitutional power has played a role in the political process in recent years. In the Welfare Reform Act of 1996, Congress denied many welfare benefits to resident aliens.

The Court's approach to discrimination against NONMARITAL CHILDREN highlights how the matter of adequate justification is influenced by the Court's value judgments about the premises underlying the discrimination. Saying that it is "illogical and unjust" to penalize out-of-wedlock children for the circumstances of their birth, the Court, applying an articulated "important and substantial relationship" standard of review, has held unconstitutional all of the traditional forms of discrimination against children born out of wedlock, such as denying welfare benefits to a family that includes nonmarital children.

The Court held that discrimination against gay and lesbian persons solely on the basis of their sexual orientation was "arbitrary and irrational" and so was unconstitutional even under the lower scrutiny of the rational basis standard of review. In ROMER V. EVANS (1996), the Court, applying this standard of review, held violative of equal protection a Colorado state constitutional provision that excluded discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation from the protection of state and local antidiscrimination laws. Writing for the Court, Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, said that the law "imposed a disadvantage born of animosity toward the class of persons affected," and that, "[a] law declaring that in general it shall be more difficult for one group of citizens than for others to seek aid from the government itself is a denial of equal protection of the laws in the most literal sense." Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, in dissent, accused the majority of taking sides in a "culture war," and said that Colorado was entitled to enact a law expressing the view that homosexuality was "morally wrong and socially harmful."

The Court's opinion in Romer reflects a strong commitment to the value of equality and makes clear that the constitutional guarantee of equal protection forbids government to discriminate against gay and lesbian persons solely because of their status as members of a disfavored group. Any laws that disadvantage persons because of their sexual orientation thus must be justified on grounds that are independent of majority hostility. In this connection, Congress has excluded openly homosexual persons from serving in the Armed Forces. The government has generally succeeded in persuading lower courts that this exclusion is rationally related to legitimate military concerns. The constitutionality of this exclusion has not yet been decided by the Court.

ROBERT A. SEDLER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Adoption, Race, and the Constitution; Antidiscrimination Legislation; Asian Americans and the Constitution; Race, Reproduction, and Constitutional Law; Sexual Orientation and the Armed Forces.)

Bibliography

ALEINIKOFF, ALEXANDER T. 1991 A Case for Race-Consciousness. Columbia Law Review 91:1060–1125.

BRADLEY, CRAIG M. 1994 The Right Not to Endorse Gay Rights: A Reply to Sunstein. Indiana Law Journal 70:29–38.

CARTER, STEPHEN L. 1991 Reflections of an Affirmative Action Baby. New York: Basic Books.

CULP, JEROME M., JR. 1994 Colorblind Remedies and the Intersectionality of Oppression: Policy Arguments Masquerading as Moral Claims. New York University Law Review 69: 162– 196.

FARBER, DANIEL A. and SHERRY, SUZANNA 1996 The Pariah Principle. Constitutional Commentary 13:257–284.

FLAGG, BARBARA J. 1994 Enduring Principles: On Race, Process and Constitutional Law. California Law Review 82:935–980.

FOSTER, SHEILA 1993 Difference and Equality: A Critical Assessment of the Concept of "Diversity." Wisconsin Law Review 1993:105–161.

FRANKE, KATHERINE M. 1995 The Central Mistake of Sex Discrimination Law: The Disaggregation of Sex from Gender. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 144:1–99.

GINSBURG, RUTH BADER 1992 Speaking in a Judicial Voice. New York University Law Review 67:1185–1209.

GRAGLIA, LINO A. 1996 "Affirmative Action," Past, Present, and Future. Ohio Northern Law Journal 23:1207–1225.

MACKINNON, CATHERINE A. 1991 Reflections on Sex Equality Under Law. Yale Law Journal 100:1281–1328.

SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1994 Homosexuality and the Constitution. Indiana Law Journal 70:1–28.

SYMPOSIUM 1993 Sexual Orientation and the Law. Virginia Law Review 79:1419–1902.

——— 1995 Voting Rights After Shaw v. Reno. Rutgers Law Review 26:517–773.

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

In March 1972, Congress proposed an Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the United States Constitution. The amendment provided:

> Section 1. Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.
> Section 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.
> Section 3. The Amendment shall take effect two years after the date of ratification.

In May 1982, the extended deadline for ratification expired without the necessary approval from three-fourths of the states; fifteen had never ratified and five had voted to rescind their ratification. Challenges to the legality of those rescissions and to Congress's extension of the ratification deadline became moot.

Proponents subsequently reintroduced the amendment in Congress, thus continuing a campaign that began a half-century earlier. Some version of an equal rights amendment had surfaced in every congressional term between 1923 and 1972. In the view of most proponents, the text adopted in 1972 was designed to prohibit gender classifications except those concerning personal privacy, physical characteristics, or past discrimination. The rationale was that a constitutional prohibition would avoid piecemeal remedies for various forms of discrimination. Such a mandate would also subject sex-based classifications to a more rigorous standard of review than that prevailing under FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT doctrine, which allows discrimination substantially related to an important state purpose.

Although conceived as a measure to unite women, the amendment has often divided them. Throughout its history, the ERA campaign has triggered fundamental controversies about the meaning of equality and the means to attain it in a society marked by significant disparities in sexual roles. Much debate has centered not on legal entitlements but on cultural aspirations. Dispute has focused on the amendment's effect concerning laws purportedly advantaging women, such as protective labor legislation, marital support requirements, and military service exemptions. Particularly during the earlier part of the century, opponents contended that equality in formal mandates could never secure equality in fact. So long as female wage earners and homemakers were more economically vulnerable than men, a demand for equal rights appeared out of touch with social realities. By contrast, ERA proponents contended that protective legislation had often "protected" women from opportunities for higher paid vocations, and had legitimated stereotypes on which invidious discrimination rested. Supporters also noted that by the time Congress proposed the amendment in 1972, much sex-based regulation had been either invalidated or extended to men, and that which remained could be cast in sex-neutral terms.

So too, much of the discrimination that the amendment was originally designed to redress was, by the 1970s, illegal under various judicial, executive, and legislative mandates. Accordingly, the ERA ratification campaign frequently focused on symbolic rather than legal implications. To proponents, a constitutional mandate would serve as an important affirmation of women's equal status and as a catalyst for change in social practices beyond the scope of legal regulation. For opponents, however, the amendment's symbolic subtext represented an assault less on gender discrimination than on gender differences, and an invitation for further encroachments on states' rights.

In the ratification struggle of the 1970s, ERA supporters lacked the leverage to make their interests felt. But if the equal rights campaign helps inspire and empower women to expand their political influence, then the struggle itself may prove more important than its constitutional consequences.

DEBORAH L. RHODE
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Feminist Theory.)

Bibliography

BOLES, JANET 1979 The Politics of the Equal Rights Amendment. New York: Longmans.

BROWN, BARBARA A.; EMERSON, THOMAS I.; FALK, GAIL; and FREEDMAN, ANN E. 1971 The Equal Rights Amendment: A Constitutional Basis for Equal Rights for Women. Yale Law Journal 80:872–985.

RHODE, DEBORAH L. 1983 Equal Rights in Retrospect. Journal of Law and Inequality 1:1–72.

EQUITABLE RESTRAINT

See: Abstention Doctrine

EQUITY

First named (in Article III) among the subjects to which the judicial power "shall extend" are "all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." The word "equity" has here a technical meaning well comprehended by American lawyers of the eighteenth century, and today still generally familiar to lawyers in all legal systems derived from that of England. The explanation is necessarily historical.

In a development more than well begun in the Middle Ages, and pretty much completed by Stuart times, England developed a unique double system of courts at the national level—the courts of "law," or COMMON LAW courts, and the "court of equity"—or, as it was often called, the "court of chancery."

The common law courts administered a system of law that was radically deficient, first as to remedies available, and, second, as to the breadth of considerations that could be taken into account in the formation of decisions. These courts could in most cases award only damages in money, in many cases a step inadequate to the doing of full justice. The common law courts were also excessively formalistic. If, for example, an error occurred in the transcription of a written contract, the common law courts had no conceptual apparatus for dealing with the mistake. Similarly, they had little capacity for taking into account the problems created by fraud. And the "trust," an institution of great importance, was utterly unknown to the "common law."

During the Middle Ages, suitors who could not get full justice out of the common law courts began to appeal to the Lord Chancellor, a high royal official, for supplementary or corrective help. By Tudor times, this practice had become firmly institutionalized, so that the Lord Chancellor became in some sense a judicial officer, hearing and dealing with such pleas. Little by little, the "chancery" came to be a court. This court had at its disposal a remedy enormously more versatile and efficient than the award of damages—the remedy of the order, or command, that the defendant do or refrain from doing something. The chancery court, in contrast to the courts of common law, knew nothing of the jury; the Chancellor decided all issues of fact and law.

This "court of chancery" opened its eyes, moreover, to many things the common law courts were institutionally disabled from seeing. While a suitor in the common law courts might, for example, get a JUDGMENT in his favor on a written contract procured by fraud on his part, the chancery court might order him to give up the fraudulently procured instrument, or to refrain from suing on it, or even to refrain from collecting on a "law" judgment he had already procured by using it.

Because this chancery court so often intervened in the name of a higher justice or of "conscience," it came to be thought of as (and called) a "court of equity." By the time of the drafting of the Constitution, the doctrines and practices of this kind of "equity" had become well systematized. And most of the new states had borrowed from English practice the two-part system of "law" courts and "chancery" courts, with the doctrines and remedial apparatus of equity available in the latter. It is against this background that the constitutional phrase, "cases in law and equity," is to be understood. "Cases in law" were such cases as would be heard by the common law courts; "cases in equity" were such as would be heard by the Court of Chancery, in England or in a state mirroring the English division.

At the very beginning, the new national government rejected (in the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789) the idea of totally separate courts of "law" and of "equity." The lower federal courts combined "legal" and "equitable" JURISDICTION in the same judges. But the ancient division was in some sense continued. Down to 1938, the federal district court had the two separate sides of "law" and "equity," respectively—in addition to such special jurisdictions as admiralty and bankruptcy. Even today, after the formal merger of "law" and "equity" cases under the single name of "civil action," lawyers still refer, for example, to the INJUNCTION (an order to do or not to do something) as "equitable relief."

"Equity" cases, in the language of Article III, are of great importance. The injunction is enormously more flexible and powerful than the remedies—mostly the award of damages—available to the court in a "case at law." Dramatic examples abound. It would have been impossible even to begin thinking about the lower federal courts' desegregating the schools if those courts had not had jurisdiction over "cases in equity" seeking orders to state officials. On this jurisdictional grant, indeed, rests the whole elaborate development of efficacious relief against official action thought to be unconstitutional—ranging from injunctions against the enforcement of unconstitutional laws (as in PIERCE V. SOCIETY OF SISTERS, 1925, enjoining state enforcement of a law requiring all pupils to go to public schools) to the running of state prisons by an Alabama district judge. (See INSTITUTIONAL LITIGATION.) The modern history of practical constitutional safeguards is a history of the use of the "equitable" remedy of injunction, together with the remedy of the DECLARATORY JUDGMENT—a remedy that would probably have been judged outside the "judicial power" were it not for its close analogy to "cases in equity."

Another characteristic of "cases in equity," overpoweringly important in the use of the national judicial power to protect constitutional rights against action of the states, is that the "court of equity" does not use the jury. This, as far as we can tell, is a gift of history; there appears to be no intrinsic reason why a local jury should not find "the facts" in, say, school desegregation cases. Experience shows that local juries will not often convict, for example, in prosecutions for CIVIL RIGHTS crimes, where the jury is constitutionally required. The whole course of development of national protection of human rights against local oppression might have been quite different if it were not for the fact that the "court of equity," the Lord Chancellor's court, sat without a jury—so that the federal judge, wielding the vital weapons in the "equity" remedial armory, does the same.

CHARLES L. BLACK, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

FISS, OWEN M. 1972 Injunctions. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

MCCLINTOCK, HENRY LACY 1948 Handbook of the Principles of Equity. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

ERDMAN ACT
30 Stat. 424 (1898)

The report of a commission appointed by President GROVER CLEVELAND to investigate the Pullman strike of 1894 (see IN RE DEBS) prompted this act, one of the earliest federal acts providing for the arbitration of railway labor disputes. The act applied to all railroads and their employees engaged in INTERSTATE COMMERCE and provided mediation of any labor dispute "seriously interrupting or threatening to interrupt" interstate commerce. If mediation failed to resolve the dispute, the parties could turn to an arbitration board whose award would be binding and enforceable through EQUITY proceedings. Neither strikes nor lockouts were permitted during arbitration or ninety days after an award. Section 10 made it a MISDEMEANOR for any employer to require, as a condition of employment, any discriminatory agreements, particularly with regard to union membership. Clearly aimed at outlawing YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS, section 10 fell in Adair v. United States (1906) as a violation of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. The act otherwise operated quite successfully, and Congress fortified its mediation provisions in 1913. A bitter nationwide strike in which both sides refused to invoke mediation, however, forced replacement of the act three years later with the ADAMSON EIGHT-HOUR ACT.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

TAYLOR, BENJAMIN J. and WITNEY, FRED 1971 Labor Relations Law, 2nd ed. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall.

ERIE RAILROAD CO. v. TOMPKINS
304 U.S. 64 (1938)

The Supreme Court in Erie posed the question whether the "oft-challenged doctrine of SWIFT V. TYSON (1842) shall now be disapproved," and answered that it should. The Court rejected its earlier construction of the Rules of Decision Act, originally section 34 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, and held that the "laws of the several states"—which, except as otherwise required by federal law, are to be "regarded as rules of decision" in civil actions in the federal courts "in cases where they apply"—included all of the decisional or COMMON LAW of the states.

Erie, like Swift, involved an exercise of the DIVERSITY JURISDICTION of the federal courts. In Erie, plaintiff Tompkins brought a federal court suit against the railroad for personal injuries, and the court of appeals upheld a substantial jury verdict in the face of the railroad's claim that it had not violated the limited duty owned to plaintiff under the decisional law of the state where the injury occurred. That court concluded that, in the absence of a state statute, the question of the scope of the railroad's duty was one not of "local" but of "general" law, and under the general law the railroad had a duty of care that the jury could properly find to have been broken.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, reversed and remanded for application of state law with respect to the scope of the railroad's duty. The Court concluded that (1) the refusal in Swift to read the mandate of the Rules of Decision Act as embracing all of the decisional law of the states was based on an incorrect construction of the purpose of that act; (2) the construction in Swift had prevented uniformity in the administration of state law and had permitted "grave discrimination by noncitizens [of a state] against citizens"; and (3) the doctrine of Swift represented "an unconstitutional assumption of powers by the Courts of the United States." Justices PIERCE BUTLER and JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS dissented; Justice STANLEY F. REED concurred in part, believing it unnecessary to reach the constitutional issue addressed by the Court.

Although the parties in Erie had not briefed the question whether Swift should be overruled, there had been intimations of the Court's intentions in earlier majority and dissenting opinions. And while the Erie result itself still finds general acceptance, the years since the decision have seen much debate about its rationale, scope, and application.

DAVID L. SHAPIRO
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Federal Common Law, Civil.)

ERNST, MORRIS
(1888–1976)

With his colleague ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS, Morris Ernst served as general counsel to the AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION from 1929 to 1954. Together with Hays and ROGER BALDWIN, Ernst fought to protect individual rights against government action. Although he excoriated both the Ku Klux Klan and the Communist party, he defended members of both organizations. He was a staunch opponent of government censorship and defended James Joyce's novel against OBSCENITY charges in the Ulysses trial (1934). Ernst participated in a number of well-known cases, including COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS V. SACCO AND VANZETTI (1921), HAGUE V. CIO (1939), and the Associated Press v. NLRB (1937), one of the WAGNER ACT CASES. He wrote several popular books championing civil liberties.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

ERROR, WRIT OF

A writ of error is an order of an appellate court, directing a lower court to transmit the record of a case that it has decided, for review by the appellate court. The JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 established the writ of error as the means of invoking the APPELLATE JURISDICTION of both the CIRCUIT COURTS and the Supreme Court. For a century, the writ of error was, in practice, virtually the exclusive method of invoking review by the Supreme Court. In the cases specified by law for issuance of the writ, review by the Supreme Court was obligatory. In 1891 Congress reorganized the federal judiciary, establishing the circuit courts of appeals. (See CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS ACT.) In some cases, these courts' decisions were final, unless the courts certified questions for review by the Supreme Court, or the Supreme Court in its discretion granted WRITS OF CERTIORARI to review their decisions. In 1925, in the course of reducing the Supreme Court's obligatory JURISDICTION and expanding the Court's discretionary control of its docket, Congress changed the name of the writ of error; since that time the Supreme Court's theoretically obligatory appellate jurisdiction has been invoked by APPEAL.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

ROBERTSON, REYNOLDS and KIRKHAM, FRANCIS R. 1951 Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, ed. Richard F. Wolfson and Philip B. Kurland. Pages 191–196, 756, 806–807. Albany, N.Y.: Matthew Bender.

ERVIN, SAMUEL J.
(1896–1985)

A conservative Democrat who graduated from Harvard Law School in 1922, Samuel J. Ervin described himself as an "ol' country lawyer" from North Carolina, his native state. In 1954 he left that state's supreme court to enter the United States SENATE. During his two decades as a senator, he supported business against labor and opposed CIVIL RIGHTS legislation, equal rights for women, voting by eighteen-year-olds, and federal encroachments on STATES' RIGHTS. He also became a strict separationist on church–state issues, and he opposed intrusive searches, computer invasions of privacy, preventive detention, and any other measures he deemed subversive of the Constitution. By 1973 he was respected as the Senate's expert on the Constitution. Central casting destined him to be chairman that year of the Senate's Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities—the WATERGATE committee. As chairman, he was a relentless but fair interrogator who expressed outrage when witnesses equivocated or lied. The televised hearings made him a national celebrity as the watchdog of the Constitution who preached the constitutional responsibilities of those entrusted with public office. Ervin projected a grandfatherly image of a judicious moralist, the very model of integrity when models were in short supply. The public adored "Senator Sam," and he adored the Constitution.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

ERVIN, SAMUEL J., JR. 1980 The Whole Truth: The Watergate Conspiracy. New York: Random House.

ERZNOZNIK v. CITY OF JACKSONVILLE
422 U.S. 205 (1975)

An ordinance prohibited drive-in movie theaters from showing films containing nudity on screens visible from public streets or places. Conceding that the films were constitutionally protected speech, the city asserted an authority to protect its citizens, particularly minors, against unwilling exposure to offensive materials. The Supreme Court declared the ordinance unconstitutional, holding that people on public streets, unlike people in their homes or people on buses who are a captive audience, have only a limited interest in privacy which does not justify the city's discrimination among movies based solely on content.

KIM MCLANE WARDLAW
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Obscenity.)

ESCH-CUMMINGS TRANSPORTATION ACT
41 Stat. 456 (1920)

Congress favored the return of the railroads to private ownership and operation after government control during WORLD WAR I. This act accomplished that objective and altered Congress's regulatory approach. It did not seek to prevent abuses so much as to strengthen the industry and foster the public interest. The act granted the Interstate Commerce Commission extensive new powers including the authority to set minimum rates, oversee fiscal operation of the roads, regulate acquisitions and consolidations, and supervise services. One provision prescribed a rate-making rule to assure "a FAIR RETURN upon the aggregate value of the railroad property," allowing the ICC to determine what constituted such a return. A recapture clause, inserted to protect weaker lines, required that roads earning a return over six percent divide that profit between a reserve fund for their own stability and a general fund (administered by the ICC) to compensate those railroads earning under four and one-half percent. The Supreme Court sustained this clause in DAYTON-GOOSE CREEK RAILWAY V. UNITED STATES (1924). The act also established labor boards with JURISDICTION over a variety of disputes.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

SHARFMAN, ISAIAH L. 1931–1937 The Interstate Commerce Commission. Vol. 1. New York: Commonwealth Fund.

ESCOBEDO v. ILLINOIS
378 U.S. 478 (1964)

Daniel Escobedo was arrested and taken to the police station for questioning. Over the course of several hours, his repeated requests to see his lawyer were refused and his lawyer sought unsuccessfully to consult with him. The Supreme Court held that Escobedo's subsequent confession was obtained in violation of his Sixth Amendment RIGHT TO COUNSEL. For the first time, the Court spoke of "an absolute constitutional right to remain silent," which the presence of a lawyer would facilitate. Escobedo is important also because it presaged MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) in discussing the possibility that warnings about the right to counsel might serve to cure the infirmity of in-custody interrogation.

Although Escobedo retains historical significance, the arguments in POLICE INTERROGATION AND CONFESSION cases have largely shifted from the Sixth to the Fifth Amendment with an emphasis on whether warnings were given, and given correctly, and whether the right to remain silent was waived.

The case has lost authority as precedent in another respect. It seemed to establish a practical flexible standard for the time when Sixth Amendment rights would come into play: when "the investigation is no longer a general inquiry into an unresolved crime but has begun to focus on a particular suspect." This approach was specifically abandoned in Kirby v. Illinois (1972), when the court limited Escobedo to its facts and ruled that the right to counsel does not attach until adversary judicial proceedings have been initiated.

BARBARA ALLEN BABCOCK
(1986)

ESPIONAGE ACT
40 Stat. 451 (1917)

When on April 2, 1917, President WOODROW WILSON asked Congress to recognize a STATE OF WAR, he included in his indictment of Germany the activities of German agents in the United States. Such activity, he said, should be treated with "a firm hand of stern repression." Nine weeks later, a much discussed and much amended Espionage Act was signed into law.

The initial measure, an amalgamation of seventeen bills prepared in the attorney general's office, was intended to "outlaw spies and subversive activities by foreign agents." Critics, particularly in the American press, quickly complained that the measure was far too restrictive and imposed a type of PRIOR RESTRAINT AND CENSORSHIP potentially destructive to basic American liberties. Thus, despite Wilson's contention that the administration must have authority to censor the press since this was "absolutely necessary to the public safety," the most overt censorship provisions were removed. The belief of a majority of national lawmakers that now the bill could not be used to suppress critical opinion overlooked the fact that two of the twelve titles of the act as passed still bore directly on freedom of expression. One provided punishment for (1) making or conveying false reports for the benefit of the enemy; (2) seeking to cause disobedience in the armed forces; and (3) willfully obstructing the recruiting or enlistment service. Another section closed the mails to any item violating any of the act's provisions.

The constitutional basis of these two provisions rested on a broad interpretation of the federal WAR POWERS and upon the argument that a denial of use of the mails did not constitute censorship, since the federal courts had ruled that the mails constituted an optional federal service. Thus, it was argued, refusal to extend the facility did not deprive anyone of a constitutional right. Further, the measure's supporters argued that FREEDOM OF SPEECH was not absolute and could not protect a person who deliberately sought to obstruct the national war effort.

The difficulty of applying the law, however, was clear from the outset, since the statute sought to punish questionable intent, a difficult factor to measure. With punishment set at a $10,000 fine, imprisonment for up to twenty years, or both, and with its interpretation largely in the hands of patriotic enforcers, many suffered under the measure and its subsequent amendments. The Justice Department prosecuted more than 2,000 cases. At least 1,050 citizens were convicted under its terms, including Industrial Workers of the World leaders, Socialists (especially Eugene V. Debs), and a number of suspect hyphenates, particularly German Americans, whose verbal criticism of aspects of the war were often brutally repressed. The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the act's prohibitions on causing disobedience in the armed forces and obstructing enlistment in a series of postwar decisions: SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919), Frohwerk v. United States (1919), DEBS V. UNITED STATES (1919).

Under the mails provisions, the postmaster general exercised virtually dictatorial authority over the effective circulation of the American press, a power which he used capriciously and subjectively for punitive reasons. In an effort to preserve FIRST AMENDMENT values through the process of statutory construction, Judge LEARNED HAND construed the mails provision narrowly to exclude its application to ordinary criticism of government policies, including war policy. Hand's decision, however, was reversed by the court of appeals. (See MASSES PUBLISHING CO. V. PATTEN.)

The measure remained on the books through the 1920s and 1930s and was reenacted in March 1940, Congress increasing its penalties for peacetime violation. The Supreme Court narrowed its application in Hartzel v. United States (1944) by interpreting its provisions through a literal application of Holmes's clear and present danger test.

The government again turned to it in 1971, seeking unsuccessfully to prevent the publication by the New York Times of the "Pentagon papers," which the government called harmful to the security of the United States. (See NEW YORK TIMES CO. V. UNITED STATES.)

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: World War I.)

Bibliography

CHAFEE, ZECHARIAH 1941 Free Speech in the United States. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

MURPHY, PAUL 1979 World War I and the Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States. New York: Norton.

ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE

Three themes dominate recent Supreme Court decision making under the First Amendment's ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION clause. First, the Court has continued to follow the doctrinal framework of EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1947) and LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971), but with increasing emphasis on the "endorsement or disapproval" inquiry advocated by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR. Second, the Court has steered a selective course in applying this framework, upholding certain governmental practices but invalidating others. Third, and potentially most significant, the Justices stand at the brink of a radical change in doctrine. Although a majority of the Court continues to follow Everson and Lemon, there is growing support for an alternative interpretation that would dramatically weaken the principle of SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

In Everson, the Supreme Court adopted a broad interpretation of the establishment clause, one that forbids governmental favoritism for religion over irreligion as well as for one religion over another. Since 1971, this broad interpretation has been implemented through the three-part LEMON TEST. Under Lemon, a statute (or other governmental action) can be upheld only if it satisfies three requirements: "First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibitsreligion...; finally, the statute must not foster "an excessive governmental entanglement with religion."

Despite persistent criticism, the Court continues to embrace the Everson interpretation and the Lemon test. The Court has reformulated the first two parts of Lemon, however, by emphasizing the "endorsement or disapproval" inquiry that Justice O'Connor initially proposed in her concurring opinion in LYNCH V. DONNELLY (1984). In WALLACE V. JAFFREE (1985) and Edwards v. Aguillard (1987), the Court adopted O'Connor's formulation of the "purpose" inquiry: "The purpose prong of the Lemon test asks whether government's actual purpose is to endorse or disapprove of religion." In COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY V. ACLU (1989) the Justices likewise relied on O'Connor's formulation to modify Lemon's "primary effect" requirement. Thus, the Court held that regardless of purpose, governmental action has a constitutionally impermissible effect if it appears to endorse or disapprove religion. "The Establishment Clause, at the very least," wrote the Court, "prohibits government from appearing to take a position on questions of religious belief."

Justice O'Connor's approach does not eliminate difficult questions of application. As suggested by Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos (1987), for example, there is no "endorsement" when government merely "accommodates" religion by removing burdens that government itself has created. More generally, the line between partisan "endorsement" and neutral "acknowledgment" may be exceedingly difficult to draw.

With or without the O'Connor reformulation, the Lemon test provides no more than a framework for analysis. Its application requires an exercise of judgment, an exercise of judgment that depends on the context of specific cases and on the individual philosophies of the Justices. In its recent cases, the Court's applications of Lemon have suggested a relaxation of establishment clause restraints on GOVERNMENT AID TO RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS and activities. At the same time, the Court has applied the clause forcefully to prohibit government from advancing religion through the public school curriculum, and it has adopted a fact-specific approach for cases involving religious symbols.

If government singles out religion for special economic benefits, the Supreme Court continues to find an establishment clause violation. Thus, in TEXAS MONTHLY, INC. V. BULLOCK (1989) the Court invalidated a Texas sales tax exemption that was limited to religious periodicals. For governmental programs that include secular as well as religious beneficiaries, however, the Court's decisions in WITTERS V. WASHINGTON DEPARTMENT OF SERVICES FOR THE BLIND (1986) and BOWEN V. KENDRICK (1988) suggest a relaxation of the Court's prior doctrine. In Witters, the question was whether the establishment clause required the state of Washington to deny vocational rehabilitation funds to an individual attending a Christian college in preparation for a religious career. The Washington State Supreme Court had held that the denial was mandated by Lemon's second prong, but the United States Supreme Court unanimously disagreed. Although the opinion of the Court was narrowly drawn, separate concurring opinions, joined by a majority of the Justices, gave a broad reading to MUELLER V. ALLEN (1983), one that apparently would support the constitutionality of any neutrally drawn educational assistance program, even if most of the individual beneficiaries used the funds for religious training.

In Bowen the Court rejected a facial challenge to a federal statute designed to combat teenage sexual relations and pregnancy. In addressing these religiously sensitive topics, the statute not only permitted but expressly encouraged the involvement of religious organizations. Nonetheless, the Court refused to invalidate the statute either in its entirety or with respect to religiously affiliated grantees. Although the Court remanded for a determination of whether particular grants might render the statute unconstitutional as applied, it refused to presume that religiously affiliated grantees would use their grants "in a way that would have the primary effect of advancing religion."

The Court's permissive treatment of governmental funding programs has not been duplicated in the public school context. In Edwards v. Aguillard the Court considered a challenge to Louisiana's Balanced Treatment Act, which provided that evolution could not be taught in the public schools unless accompanied by the teaching of CREATIONISM. With only two Justices dissenting, the Court concluded that the act violated the first prong of Lemon and therefore was unconstitutional. Citing mandatory attendance policies and the impressionability of young students, the Court noted that it was "particularly vigilant in monitoring compliance with the Establishment Clause in elementary and secondary schools." Unpersuaded by the legislature's articulation of a secular purpose, the Court concluded that the act was designed "to alter the science curriculum to reflect endorsement of a religious view that is antagonistic to the theory of evolution." The Court found that this "preeminent religious purpose" was at least the "primary purpose" of the act and that the act therefore "endorses religion in violation of the First Amendment."

The Supreme Court's treatment of governmental displays of religious symbols shows neither the permissiveness of the funding cases nor the "particular vigilance" the Court has exercised in policing the public school curriculum. Instead, the Court has adopted a fact-specific approach that requires case-by-case determinations of whether particular religious displays have the purpose or effect of endorsing religion. In County of Allegheny v. ACLU the Court considered challenges to two separate holiday displays in downtown Pittsburgh, one of a crèche, the other of a menorah. A sharply divided Court found that the crèche violated the establishment clause but that the menorah did not. The Court emphasized that the crèche stood essentially alone in the Allegheny County Courthouse and included a banner that read "Gloria in Excelsis Deo." By contrast, the menorah was placed beside a large Christmas tree and was accompanied by a sign proclaiming the City of Pittsburgh's "salute to liberty." Focusing on the second prong of Lemon, as modified by Justice O'Connor, the Court concluded that the crèche sent an impermissible message of religious endorsement, whereas the menorah, in context, sent a permissible message of cultural diversity and freedom of belief.

The Court's recent applications of its establishment clause doctrine are significant and controversial in their own right. A far more important development, however, may be just around the corner. For years, critics have attacked Everson and Lemon for their alleged hostility to religion. To date, the Court has resisted these attacks, affirming the basic wisdom of its doctrinal framework and continuing to enforce a meaningful separation of church and state. The Court is changing, however, and it may be within one vote of a dramatic shift in doctrine. Speaking for four Justices in County of Allegheny, Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY wrote that "substantial revision of our Establishment Clause doctrine may be in order." Suggesting the direction such revision might take, he argued that governmental "support" for religion should be permitted unless it involves coercion, "proselytizing" for a particular religion, or "direct benefits" so substantial as to in fact establish or tend to establish a state religion. It seems clear that the four Justices joining this opinion would support a fundamental retreat from the Court's existing doctrine.

Justice Kennedy's suggested course would seriously threaten the political-moral principles and policies that are furthered by the Court's prevailing approach. Governmental "support" for religion causes harm to the religious and irreligious individuals who are not within the government's favor. This harm creates feelings of resentment and alienation, which in turn cause injury to the political community itself. At the same time, the purported support for religion is often illusory; it may demean religion and work to its long-term detriment. The Supreme Court's establishment clause doctrine works to ensure a proper respect for the religious and irreligious beliefs of individuals, supports the maintenance of a religiously inclusive political community, and does no disservice to the important role of religion in our society. Whatever its weaknesses, this doctrine should not be abandoned.

DANIEL O. CONKLE
(1992)

Bibliography

CONKLE, DANIEL O. 1988 Toward a General Theory of the Establishment Clause. Northwestern University Law Review 82: 1113–1194.

NOTE 1987 Developments in the Law: Religion and the State. Harvard Law Review 100:1606–1781.

SMITH, STEVEN D. 1987 Symbols, Perceptions, and Doctrinal Illusions: Establishment Neutrality and the "No Endorsement" Test. Michigan Law Review 86:266–332.

ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE (Update)

At the close of the twentieth century, the Supreme Court's jurisprudence of the establishment clause appears to be in radical transition. Between WORLD WAR II and the 1980s, the Court adhered to a largely separationist understanding of the establishment clause, under which public institutions and programs—and especially public schools—were understood to be exclusively secular, and religious institutions were barred from participation in many government-funded programs. That understanding was reflected in the controversial three-part test of LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971), which required that government action have a secular purpose; have a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion; and refrain from excessive entanglement between religion and government.

Each of these parts of the LEMON TEST received criticism, mostly on the ground that they had the effect of requiring discrimination against, or hostility toward, religion. As the years wore on, the Lemon test became encrusted with multiple conflicting interpretations, rendering it largely indeterminate.

Beginning with WIDMAR V. VINCENT (1981), the Supreme Court began a shift toward an interpretation based on the idea of neutrality: that the FIRST AMENDMENT prohibition on the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION permits the government to allow religious institutions and religiously motivated individuals to share in the benefits of public life without discrimination. Widmar involved a public university that allowed student groups to use empty facilities for meetings. In order to preserve a strict SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, the university refused to permit the use of facilities for religious activities. That meant that a student group could meet on campus to discuss sex, drugs, rock and roll, politics, or Shakespeare, but could not meet to pray or study the Bible. Reversing the appellate court, the Supreme Court held that the establishment clause is not offended by the neutral provision of facilities to religious and secular student groups on an evenhanded basis, and that the FREEDOM OF SPEECH guarantee forbids the exclusion of any group on the basis of the content of its speech.

The Widmar paradigm of "equal access" soon began to spread to other constitutional issues. First, the Court approved tax credits that could be used for expenses at public or private schools. Then, Congress extended the principle of "equal access" to high school student groups. In 1986, the principle was extended by a unanimous Supreme Court to an issue of funding, which had previously been the area of the most rigid strict separationism. In that case, WITTERS V. WASHINGTON DEPARTMENT OF SERVICES FOR THE BLIND (1986), the Court held that aid that is "made available generally without regard to the sectarian-nonsectarian, or public-nonpublic nature of the institutions benefited" does not generally violate the establishment clause.

In subsequent cases, the Court held that a government-provided sign language interpreter could be used by a student at a Roman Catholic high school; that religious symbols may be displayed in a public square; and that a public university may (indeed must) fund a student publication with a religious viewpoint. In all of these cases, the dispositive consideration was that the aid was provided on a neutral basis, without favoring or disfavoring religion.

It is a sign of the shift in DOCTRINE that every one of these decisions required reversing the lower court. It takes a certain period of time before a new legal principle works its way into the ordinary law of the lower courts. In this context, the process has been prolonged by the Court's reluctance to OVERRULE its earlier decisions. In particular, the Court has declined to overrule Lemon even though it has not relied on that case to strike down a government policy in almost fifteen years. As a result, inconsistent decisions have piled up, and lower courts are uncertain about the state of the law.

Indeed, the Supreme Court has not been prepared to adopt the neutrality approach unreservedly. In ROSENBERGER V. RECTOR & VISITORS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA (1995), where the Court approved the funding of a religious student magazine on a neutral basis, the MAJORITY OPINION, authored by Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, cabined the holding with three distinctions that are difficult to square with any coherent theory of the First Amendment: that the aid came in the form of a payment of the printer's bill rather than a subsidy to the group; that the student group was not organized as a "religious organization"; and that student mandatory activity fees are not the same as taxes. One suspects that the purpose of these distinctions is to allow the Court to retreat from the neutrality principle in the future, if it wishes, without overruling this decision.

In other important areas of establishment clause jurisprudence, doctrine is also in flux. Since the mid-1980s, the Court has generally approved the idea that legislatures and executive officials may accommodate the exercise of religion, even when not compelled to do so under the free exercise clause, subject to certain limitations. However, in practice, the Court has been reluctant to approve of AC-COMMODATION OF RELIGION in many cases. The standard for legitimacy of religious accommodations therefore remains unsettled.

The closest to a "test" for legitimate accommodations is found in the PLURALITY OPINION written by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., in TEXAS MONTHLY, INC. V. BULLOCK (1989). The plurality stated that the government may single out religious organizations for a special accommodation when it is designed to relieve a substantial government-imposed burden on the exercise of religion, or where the accommodation does not impose a substantial burden on third parties. (It is unclear whether both of these criteria need to be satisfied, or just either one.) As a result of the vagueness of these standards, as well as the lack of a majority opinion, this area remains very much in doubt.

In BOARD OF EDUCATION OF KIRYAS JOEL VILLAGE SCHOOL DISTRICT V. GRUMET (1994), the Court implied that it is generally unconstitutional for the government to accommodate a particular religious group, where there is no satisfactory legal guarantee that similarly situated religious groups would receive comparable accommodations. As a practical matter, that makes it difficult for legislatures to make accommodations except in broad terms, and makes it difficult for executive officers to do so at all. It is not clear whether that principle was intended to be so sweeping.

MICHAEL W. MCCONNELL
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Government Aid to Religious Institutions; Religion in Public Schools; Religious Liberty.)

Bibliography

LUPU, IRA C. 1993 The Lingering Death of Separationism. Geroge Washington Law Review 62:230–279.

MCCONNELL, MICHAEL 1992 Religious Freedom at a Crossroads. University of Chicago Law Review 59:115–194.

MONSMA, STEPHEN V. and SOPER, J. CHRISTOPHER, eds. 1998 Equal Treatment of Religion in a Pluralistic Society. Grand Rapids, Mich.: W. B. Eerdmans.

SYMPOSIUM 1992 Religion in Public Life: Access, Accommodation, and Accountability. George Washington Law Review 60:599–856.

ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION

The FIRST AMENDMENT begins with the clause, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion. . . ." There are two basic interpretations of what the framers meant by this clause. In EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1947), the first decision on the clause, the Supreme Court unanimously adopted the broad interpretation, although the Justices then and thereafter disagreed on its application. (See SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.) Justice HUGO L. BLACK declared that the clause means not only that government cannot set up a church but also that government cannot aid all religions impartially or levy a tax for the support of any religious activities, institutions, or practices. "In the words of [THOMAS] JEFFERSON," Black said, "the clause against establishment of religion by laws was intended to erect "a wall of separation between Church and State."

EDWARD S. CORWIN, a distinguished constitutional scholar who espoused the narrow view of the clause, asserted that the Court's interpretation was "untrue historically." What the clause does, he wrote, "and all that it does, is to forbid Congress to give any religious faith, sect, or denomination preferred status. . . . The historical record shows beyond peradventure that the core idea of "an establishment of religion' comprises the idea of preference; and that any act of public authority favorable to religion in general cannot, without manifest falsification of history, be brought under the ban of that phase" (Corwin, "Supreme Court as National School Board," pp. 10, 20). Justice POTTER STEWART, dissenting in ENGEL V. VITALE (1962), endorsed the narrow view when he noted that a nondenominational school prayer did not confront the Court with "the establishment of a state church" or an "official religion."

The debate in the First Congress, which proposed the First Amendment, provides support for neither the broad nor the narrow interpretation. The history of the drafting of the clause, however, is revealing. Congress carefully considered and rejected various phrasings that embraced the narrow interpretation. At bottom the amendment was an expression of the intention of the Framers of the Constitution to prevent Congress from acting in the field of religion. The "great object" of the BILL OF RIGHTS, JAMES MADISON, had said, when introducing his draft of amendments to the House, was to "limit and qualify the powers of Government" for the purpose of making certain that none of the powers granted could be exercised in forbidden fields, including religion. The history of the drafting of the establishment clause does not provide a clear understanding of what was meant by the phrase "an establishment of religion." But the narrow interpretation, which permits government aid to religion in general or on a nonpreferential basis, leads to the impossible conclusion that the First Amendment added to Congress's powers. The amendment meant to restrict Congress to the powers that it possessed, and since it had no power to legislate on matters concerning religion, and therefore could not support religion on any basis, Congress would have had no such power even in the absence of the First Amendment. To suppose that an express prohibition on power vests or creates power is capriciously unreasonable. The Bill of Rights, as Madison said, was not framed "to imply powers not meant to be included in the enumeration."

Congress did not define "an establishment of religion" because its members knew from common experience what they meant. At the time of the framing of the amendment, six states maintained or authorized establishments of religion. That amendment denied to Congress the power to do what those states were doing, and since Everson the states come under the same ban. An establishment meant to the framers of the amendment what it meant in those states. Thus, reference to the American experience with establishments at the time of the framing of the Bill of Rights is essential to any understanding of what the clause in question meant.

The narrow interpretation is based on European precedents but the European form of an establishment was not the American form, except in the Southern colonies before the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, and the European meaning of establishment was not the American meaning. The revolution triggered a pent-up movement for separation of church and state in the nine states that had establishments. Of these nine, North Carolina (1776), New York (1777), and Virginia (1786) separated church and state. Each of the remaining six states made concessions to anti-establishment sentiment by broadening their old establishments. After the Revolution, none maintained a single or exclusive establishment. In all six an establishment of religion was not restricted to a state church or a system of public support of one denomination; in all an establishment meant public support of all denominations and sects on a nonpreferential basis.

Three of these six states were in New England. The MASSACHUSETTS CONSTITUTION (1780) authorized its towns and parishes to levy taxes for the support of Protestant churches, provided that each taxpayer's money go to the support "of his own religious sect or denomination" and added that "no subordination of any one sect or denomination to the other shall ever be established by law." An establishment in Massachusetts meant government support of religion. Congregationalists, for a few decades, benefited the most, because they were the most numerous and resorted to various tricks to fleece non-Congregationalists out of their share of religious taxes. But the fact remains that Massachusetts had a multiple, not a single, establishment under which Baptist, Episcopalian, Methodist, and Unitarian churches were publicly supported until the establishment ended in 1833. In 1784 Connecticut and New Hampshire modeled their multiple establishments after that of Massachusetts, ending them in 1818 and 1819, respectively.

In the South, where the Episcopal Church was the sole established church before the revolution, three states either maintained or permitted establishments of religion, and in each the multiple form was the only legal one. Maryland (1776) permitted its legislature to tax for the support of "the Christian religion," with the proviso that every person had the right to designate the church of his choice, making every Christian church an established church on a nonpreferential basis. The legislature sought to pass an enabling act in 1785, but the nonpreferential system was denounced as an establishment and defeated. The situation in Georgia was the same as in Maryland, and a revised constitution (1789), which was in effect when the First Amendment was adopted, continued the multiple establishment system, allowing each person to support only his own church. South Carolina restricted its multiple nonpreferential establishment to Protestant churches. The last Southern establishment died in 1810. Virginia sought to emulate the Maryland system, but a general assessment bill benefiting all Christian churches failed, thanks to the opposition of most non-Episcopal denominations and to MADISON'S MEMORIAL AND REMONSTRANCE; the VIRGINIA STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM (1786) then separated church and state.

In none of the six states maintaining or allowing establishments at the time of the framing of the First Amendment was any church but a Christian one established. The multiple establishments of that time comprehended the churches of every denomination and sect with a sufficient number of adherents to form a church. Where Protestantism was established it was synonymous with religion; there were either no Jews or no Roman Catholics or too few of them to make a difference. Where Christianity was established, as in Maryland, which had a significant Roman Catholic minority, Jews were scarcely known. To contend that exclusive establishments of one religion existed in each of the six states ignores the novel American experiment with multiple establishments on an impartial basis. Europe knew only single-church establishments. An establishment of religion in the United States at the time of the First Amendment included nonpreferential government recognition, aid, or sponsorship of religion. The framers of the amendment looked to their own experience, not Europe's.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Creationism; Larkin v. Grendel's Den, Incorporated; Lynch v. Donnelly; Marsh v. Chambers; Mueller v. Allen; Thornton v. Caldor, Inc.; Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State; Wallace v. Jaffree; Widmar v. Vincent.)

Bibliography

ANTIEAU, CHESTER JAMES et al. 1964 Freedom from Federal Establishment: Formation and Early History of the First Amendment Religion Clauses. Milwaukee, Wisc.: Bruce Publishing Co.

COBB, SANFORD H. 1902 The Rise of Religious Liberty in America. New York: Macmillan.

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1949 The Supreme Court as National School Board. Law and Contemporary Problems 14:3–22.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1986 The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. New York: Macmillan.

ESTELLE v. SMITH
451 U.S. 454 (1981)

A unanimous Supreme Court held that the protection of the MIRANDA RULES applied to every phase of an in-custody prosecution, and that a psychiatrist's testimony introduced at the penalty phase of a capital trial violated the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. At the pretrial interview on which the testimony was based, the defendant had not received the appropriate warnings about his right to silence.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

ESTES v. TEXAS
381 U.S. 532 (1965)

The trial of Billy Sol Estes for swindling involved a FREE PRESS/FAIR TRIAL confrontation in which the Supreme Court held that televising trials was inherently prejudicial to a FAIR TRIAL. Circuslike live television and radio broadcasts of Estes's pretrial hearings involved such extensive disruption of the courtroom that many changes were ordered for coverage of the trial. Although live broadcasts of the actual trial were forbidden, excerpts from the proceedings were broadcast regularly.

The Court split 5–4 on the constitutionality of televising the proceedings. Justices HUGO L. BLACK, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, POTTER STEWART, and BYRON R. WHITE called the practice unwise and dangerous, but not constitutionally objectionable. Chief Justice EARL WARREN and Justices ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS joined an opinion by Justice TOM C. CLARK seeking to ban television completely from the courts—subject to future developments (see CHANDLER V. FLORIDA)—as a violation of the right to a fair trial. Both the jury and the witnesses, Clark declared, would be under great pressure and be more self-conscious, aware of a large public audience; prospective witnesses might be influenced by the proceedings. The judge would have additional responsibilities (and temptations), and the defendant would be subject to "a form of mental—if not physical—harassment." Clark said, "A defendant on trial for a specific crime is entitled to his day in court, not in a stadium, or a city or nationwide arena." Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN approved the ban here, but indicated he would do so only in cases of "great notoriety."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

EUCLID v. AMBLER REALTY COMPANY
272 U.S. 365 (1926)

This case established the constitutionality of ZONING laws to regulate land use. In Euclid a Cleveland suburb sought to preserve an area of single-family dwellings by excluding even two-family dwellings and apartment houses, as well as commercial properties and public buildings. Against claims drawn from supposed deprivations of liberty and property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW and a supposed denial of the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS, a 6–3 Supreme Court, speaking through Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND, sustained the comprehensive zoning ordinance. It was, the Court ruled, a legitimate STATE POLICE POWER measure intended to maintain the residential area and thus protect the community's health, peace, and safety. As a result of this leading decision on comprehensive zoning laws, no argument drawn from the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT or from the takings clause is likely to survive judicial scrutiny in the absence of an ordinance that is demonstrably unrelated to the improvement of a community.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

EULE, JULIAN N.
(1949–1997)

Julian N. Eule was an exceptionally successful classroom teacher in the law schools at Temple University (1977–1984) and the University of California, Los Angeles (1984–1997). His enthusiasm and ebullience stimulated and challenged his colleagues and students and enlivened his constitutional law scholarship. Those writings centered on three concerns vital to representative government: keeping the channels open for the people's communications, keeping government actors accountable to the people, and seeking institutional strategies to protect against the subordination of groups. Eule's scholarship was not just an academic exercise; it was a quest for usable principles to make American democracy work. In striving for that high purpose he insisted on testing his arguments against the facts of American political life. Even during his last illness, he gave energy and hope to everyone around him. His gallantry in the face of adversity is a lesson for democracy's advocates throughout the legal profession.

KENNETH L. KARST
(2000)

Bibliography

SIDEBAR 1997 Julian Eule, 1949–1997. UCLA Law 20:2–7.
SYMPOSIUM 1998 Voices of the People: Essays on Constitutional Democracy in Memory of Professor Julian N. Eule. UCLA Law Review 45:1523–1776.

EUTHANASIA

Euthanasia, or mercy killing, has long engaged the attention of philosophers and others concerned with the morality of offering the incurably ill the dignity of a choice whether to end their lives. Only recently, however, has euthanasia become a subject of constitutional debate. Active assistance to suicide remains a crime throughout the country, and the sort of euthanasia actively practiced on the defective newborn and on some very old persons who are ill beyond hope is also murder. Neither of these forms of euthanasia raises any serious constitutional issue. It is "passive euthanasia"—the withholding of aids to the preservation of life—that has been discussed in constitutional terms. Unfortunately, "the RIGHT TO DIE," perhaps because it is so effective a slogan, has beclouded discussion of genuine issues of personal choice.

The Supreme Court has not yet confronted these matters. Undoubtedly, however, there is some constitutional right to refuse medical treatment. Compulsory VACCINATION has been upheld against the claim that it deprived its reluctant beneficiary of liberty without DUE PROCESS OF LAW. A strong governmental interest in protecting public health justified that invasion of an unwilling person's body, however, and no such interest is present in the ordinary case of a person who refuses medical treatment. Even absent any claim to RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, the idea of a right to refuse treatment follows easily from the Supreme Court's modern recognition of constitutional rights to personal autonomy, offered in the name of "privacy." The Court's decisions affirming the right of a woman to have an abortion are cases in point.

In the context of euthanasia, however, the constitutional right to refuse treatment fits awkwardly into the typical dilemma a patient's doctors and relatives face. Even if a person has previously directed her doctors not to use artificial means to prolong life, she will ordinarily be unconscious for a time before dying and thus incapable of forming any present intention to refuse aid. Usually, of course, the problem of passive euthanasia arises in connection with patients in a persistent vegetative state who have given no directions whatever to their doctors. To invoke the concept of a constitutional right to die in such a case, as New Jersey's supreme court did in Matter of Quinlan (1976), is to beg the critical question whether someone in such a state can have any rights at all. The decision of the Quinlan court authorizing the termination of artificial life supports seems justified, but surely its justification appropriately responds to interests of the patient's relatives, not the patient's constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

SYMPOSIUM 1977 In Re Quinlan. Rutgers Law Review 30:243–328.

EVANGELICALS AND THE CONSTITUTION

See: Religious Fundamentalism

EVANS v. ABNEY
396 U.S. 435 (1970)

The 1911 will of U.S. Senator Augustus O. Bacon gave land to the city of Macon, Georgia, in trust for use as a park for white persons only. The city's operation of the park on these terms could not survive the Supreme Court's decisions invalidating state-sponsored SEGREGATION, and the city was replaced by private trustees. When the Supreme Court held, in Evans v. Newton (1966), that the park must still be open to all races, Bacon's residuary heirs claimed the land, arguing that the trust had failed. The Georgia courts agreed, and the Supreme Court held, 5–2, that this judicial enforcement of Bacon's racially discriminatory disposition of property did not constitute STATE ACTION in violation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Justice HUGO L. BLACK, for the majority, distinguished SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948), saying that Abney involved no RACIAL DISCRIMINATION: the terminated park was unavailable for blacks and whites alike. Justices WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS and WILLIAM J. BRENNAN dissented.

Abney's importance lay in showing that Shelley did not stand for a broad principle forbidding judicial enforcement of any and all private racial discrimination. It also began the BURGER COURT's revitalization of the state action limitation as a barrier to enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

EVARTS, WILLIAM MAXWELL
(1818–1901)

William Maxwell Evarts, called "the Prince of the American Bar," was probably the most famous, successful, and influential lawyer of his time. He defended ANDREW JOHNSON in the President's IMPEACHMENT trial, and he served as attorney general, secretary of state, and United States senator (Republican, New York). Twice Evarts almost became CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States. His lasting impact on American constitutional law derived from his pathbreaking arguments as counsel and his authorship of the CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS ACT (1891). In the GRANGER CASES (1877) he argued that rate regulation interfered with the management and beneficial use of private property, reducing profits and thereby taking private property without JUST COMPENSATION or DUE PROCESS OF LAW. He lost that case, but his argument was destined for eventual acceptance. IN RE JACOBS (1885) was his greatest constitutional triumph. His argument, which the New York Court of Appeals adopted, advanced SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS OF LAW and the doctrine of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. Evarts was a stalwart champion of VESTED RIGHTS and an opponent of government regulation. The Circuit Courts of Appeals Act (Evarts Act) created the modern three-tier structure of the federal courts and the discretionary WRIT OF CERTIORARI by which the Supreme Court manages its APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

TWISS, BENJAMIN 1942 Lawyers and the Constitution. Pages 93–109. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

EVARTS ACT

See: Circuit Courts of Appeals Act

EVERSON v. BOARD OF EDUCATION
330 U.S. 1 (1947)

A New Jersey statute authorized local school boards to reimburse parents for the cost of public transportation of students to both public and private schools. Such reimbursement for the cost of transportation to church-related schools was challenged as an unconstitutional ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION.

Justice HUGO L. BLACK delivered the opinion of a 5–4 Supreme Court. He began with a consideration of the background of the establishment clause, which relied heavily on the writings of JAMES MADISON and THOMAS JEFFERSON, but he had little to say about the actual legislative history of the FIRST AMENDMENT's language in the First Congress. Black concluded that the establishment clause "means at least this":

> Neither a state nor the federal government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions or prefer one religion over another. . . . No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach and practice religion. . . . In the words of Jefferson, the clause against the establishment of religion by law was intended to erect "a wall of separation between church and State."

But after this sweeping separationist pronouncement, Justice Black pirouetted neatly and upheld the New Jersey program on the grounds that the state aid in that case was a public safety measure designed to protect students and could in no way be construed as aid to church-related schools.

Four dissenters were convinced that Justice Black had missed the point. Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON likened Black's MAJORITY OPINION to Byron's Julia who, "whispering I will ne'er consent, consented." What could be more helpful to a school, Jackson asked, than depositing the students at its door? Justice WILEY B. RUTLEDGE, with whom Justices Jackson, FELIX FRANKFURTER, and HAROLD BURTON joined, also filed a lengthy dissent. Justice Rutledge also made lavish use of the writings of Madison and Jefferson, and argued that the New Jersey program could not be justified as a public safety expenditure.

Everson stands at the entrance to the maze of law and litigation concerning participation by church-related schools in public programs. It was the first major utterance by the Supreme Court on the meaning of the establishment clause. Those favoring strict separation between religious institutions and government were pleased by Black's rhetoric and dismayed by his conclusion; those favoring a policy of flexibility or accommodation in church-state relations reacted the opposite way. That Everson satisfied no one and enraged many was portentous.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

Bibliography

JOHNSON, RICHARD M. 1967 The Dynamics of Compliance. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press.

MORGAN, RICHARD E. 1972 The Supreme Court and Religion. Pages 76–122. New York: Free Press.

EVIDENCE

Excepting cases that may be decided by applying legal rules to undisputed facts, the determination of disputed factual propositions must be central to adjudicating the rights and liabilities of litigants. As an initial matter, a society might adopt an "inquisitorial" system, under which a public official investigates and decides the facts. In the Anglo-American legal tradition, however, we structure the litigation process so that every dispute has at least two parties, each charged with the primary responsibility for proving its factual propositions and therefore discovering and presenting the evidence to support its version of the facts before an impartial arbiter.

In criminal cases, this adversary system is reinforced by rules that place the BURDEN OF PROOF on the prosecution, presuming that the defendant is innocent, and that grant the defendant a RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION—thus shielding him from being forced to be a witness against himself, and depriving the prosecution of an obvious source of evidence. The structuring of criminal litigation as a contest between the state as prosecutor and the defendant—with the judge as arbiter—has two major consequences. First, this procedure gives greater weight to the autonomy of the individual litigant. Second, placing responsibility on each party to advance its own cause will, in general, result in the production of more evidence for the finder of fact than would be produced by disinterested—and perhaps bored and overworked—public officials. Though our prototypical case is the criminal case, we use similar procedures and rules in civil cases.

In both civil and criminal cases, TRIAL BY JURY means that a group of laymen decides issues of disputed fact. A great many of the intricacies of our laws of evidence result from two specific worries about the jury. The first is that the jury may systematically overvalue or undervalue some kinds of evidence, such as HEARSAY. The second is that the ad hoc nature of the jury, which is empaneled to decide a particular case, will produce a verdict at odds with the values of a legal system handling many cases over a long period of time. Often a rule of evidence will keep out testimony not so much because a jury might overweigh it but simply because other policies of the law are entitled to equal weight along with the proper resolution of factual issues. In this category fall the exclusion of reliable evidence because it has been unconstitutionally seized; because it has been obtained in violation of the MIRANDA RULES; because it is a coerced confession (which, though typically unreliable, may in a particular case be thoroughly corroborated); or because its exclusion is necessary to enforce a privilege, such as that protecting confidential communications between the attorney and the client.

Nor is the exclusion of evidence confined to cases where we choose this means of vindicating the rights of the individual. Though it is by no means clear that the rule is of constitutional dimension, every Anglo-American JURISDICTION in civil and (until the passage of California's "Victims' Bill of Rights" initiative) in criminal cases kept from the jury certain evidence of the prior character of the accused—not so much because the jury might overvalue it as out of fear that the jury might succumb to the temptation to be lawless and decide that the defendant was either so bad a person that he should be punished regardless of his fault in the particular case at issue. That kind of jury behavior might appeal to common sense, but it would be at odds with our principles requiring a particular act as a precondition of guilt and requiring fair NOTICE of the charge made against a defendant.

Despite the huge body of statutory and COMMON LAW evidence law, the Constitution nowhere states flatly a rule as to admissibility of evidence and refers to evidence in only one place—the requirement of two witnesses to the same overt act before a conviction of TREASON may be returned. Moreover, apart from the rules as to SEARCH AND SEIZURE and selfincrimination, the rules of evidence have largely escaped the Supreme Court's constitutional supervision. In criminal cases, however, two lines of cases have partially constitutionalized the law of evidence. The first involves the defendant's right to exclude inculpatory hearsay evidence that otherwise would be admitted under one or another of the exceptions to the general rule excluding hearsay; the second involves the defendant's rights to introduce exculpatory evidence notwithstanding common or statutory law purporting to exclude such evidence. Both these lines grow out of the Sixth Amendment. The first grows out of the CONFRONTATION clause, which guarantees that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him." The second line also stems in part from the Sixth Amendment right of the accused to " COMPULSORY PROCESS for obtaining witnesses in his favor," and in part from the DUE PROCESS clause.

Historically, courts read the confrontation clause as guaranteeing only the right of the accused to be present at his trial and to cross-examine any witnesses testifying there. In the 1960s, however, the Supreme Court began to view the clause as forbidding use in a criminal trial of certain inculpatory hearsay declarations. Thus, the Court held in POINTER V. TEXAS (1965) that the clause rendered inadmissible at a criminal trial a transcript of inculpatory testimony elicited during a preliminary hearing at which the defendant was not represented by counsel from a prosecution witness who was no longer available to testify. Likewise, a codefendant's out-of-court confession that also implicated the accused was held inadmissible in Bruton v. United States (1968) when the codefendant invoked his right against self-incrimination and refused to take the stand at the trial. Similarly, in Barber v. Page (1968) the Court held that preliminary hearing testimony of an absent witness was inadmissible when the prosecutor had failed to make a good-faith effort to obtain the presence of the witness at the trial. These rulings by the Court threw the validity of inculpatory hearsay evidence into doubt. The Court seemed to be drifting toward a rule that would in effect preclude the use of all such hearsay.

California v. Green (1970) arrested this drift. In Green, a prosecution witness testified adversely to the defendant during a preliminary hearing at which the defendant's attorney subjected him to a rigorous cross-examination. At the later trial, however, the witness claimed to have suffered a memory lapse and refused to repeat his testimony. The prosecutor then read into evidence portions of the preliminary hearing testimony. The Court held that, under these circumstances, admission of the hearsay did not violate the confrontation clause. The Court stated that its previous confrontation clause decisions had all rested on the inability of the defendant effectively to cross-examine witnesses, and that where, as here, defendant had once had a full and fair opportunity to cross-examine, there was no constitutional impediment to the hearsay.

Green made it clear that when the declarant was unavailable at the trial, his declaration would be admissible if he had been subject to meaningful cross-examination by defendant's counsel at the time he made the declaration. The meaning of "unavailability" and the nature of "meaningful cross-examination" were left open to interpretation, but clearly where these criteria were met, the evidence was admissible. By the same token, Green left little doubt that when the declarant was available at the trial for meaningful cross-examination, evidence of his out-of-court declaration would be admissible even if he had not been subject to cross-examination at the time he made the statement.

Since Green, the Court's decisions have withdrawn even further from the constitutionalization of hearsay law. The Court made apparent in Ohio v. Roberts (1980) that hearsay evidence of a declarant's out-of-court statements will be admissible, even when the defendant has never had an opportunity to cross-examine the declarant, provided that the declarant is truly unavailable and that the statements bear adequate "indicia of reliability." "Reliability can be inferred without more in a case where the evidence fails within a firmly footed hearsay exception," that is, an exception "rest[ing] upon such solid foundations" that "virtually any evidence within them" will in fact be reliable. Thus, dying declarations are admissible, as are properly administered business and public records. Hearsay evidence is admissible even under less "firmly rooted" exceptions when there is a particularized showing of its trustworthiness under the circumstances. Thus, under some circumstances, at least, declarations against penal interest and party admissions by coconspirators (such as a spontaneous admission by a coconspirator to his prison cellmate) are admissible.

The Court's decisions since Green thus have confined the pre-Green decisions narrowly to their facts. Apparently, the Court is unlikely to find that evidence admitted under an established hearsay exception offends the confrontation clause, unless, as in Barber v. Page, a prosecutor falsely alleges for purposes of the exception that a declarant is unavailable, or, as in Bruton v. United States, the hearsay consists of a codefendant's confession which ostensibly is read into evidence against him alone but in fact contains statements inculpating other defendants in the same trial, and the codefendant refuses to take the stand. Moreover, even when a defendant alleges a Barber or Bruton violation, the Court is unlikely to find that the facts of the case at hand justify reversal. Twice since Green the Court has refused to sustain arguments that a prosecutor had failed to make a good-faith effort to find absent declarants, and repeatedly the Court has found even clear and admitted violations of the Bruton rule to result in merely HARMLESS ERROR not justifying reversal.

It would seem, then, that the Court has substantially withdrawn from the field of writing hearsay law. While it has not explicitly reverted to the traditional view of the confrontation clause in this area, the manner in which it has analyzed hearsay exceptions in recent cases leaves little doubt of its reluctance significantly to reduce the prosecutor's ability to introduce evidence falling within ancient, recognized exceptions.

The rules of evidence traditionally have been held to bind defendants as well as the state. The first significant developments in the line of cases recognizing defendants' rights to introduce exculpatory evidence despite rules of evidence excluding it grew out of the compulsory process clause. In Washington v. Texas (1967) the Court overturned a Texas statute that rendered accomplices incompetent to testify for each other. The Court held that the compulsory process clause forbade the state "arbitrarily [to] den[y defendants] the right to put on the stand a witness who was physically and mentally capable of testifying to events that he had personally observed and whose testimony would have been relevant and material to the defense."

In Chambers v. Mississippi (1973) the Court faced a case in which it might have used compulsory process reasoning but used the due process clause instead. In Cham- bers the defendant was charged with murder for shooting a police officer during a crowd incident. Another man, McDonald, who had been in the crowd, had confessed to the shooting, and substantial evidence pointed to the truth of this confession, but McDonald had repudiated the confession and had not been charged in the case. The trial judge allowed Chambers to present two witnesses who claimed actually to have seen McDonald fire the shots, but the judge barred the testimony of witnesses who had not seen the incident but to whom McDonald had made damaging admissions, ruling that this testimony did not fall within any applicable state hearsay exception. In addition, the judge permitted Chambers to call McDonald to the stand and to read his prior confession into evidence, but when McDonald repudiated the confession on the stand and offered an alibi, the judge refused to allow Chambers to examine McDonald as an "adverse witness," ruling that because McDonald had not actually alleged the defendant's guilt, his testimony was not "adverse" within the meaning of Mississippi's exception to the rule that a party may not impeach his own witness.

The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the trial judge's exclusion of this exculpatory evidence had violated the due process clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. The trial judge's refusal to allow Chambers to examine McDonald, who was a "witness against him" even if not an "adverse" witness under Mississippi law, constituted prejudicial error. In addition, the Court held that the trial judge's refusal to allow the exculpatory hearsay testimony of the three witnesses to whom McDonald had confessed violated Chambers's right "to present witnesses in his own defense." Although the language used by the Court in discussing these issues is reminiscent of the confrontation and compulsory process clauses of the Sixth Amendment, the Court did not explicitly rest its decision on these clauses. Rather, the Court announced only that "[t]he right of an accused in a criminal trial to due process is, in essence, the right to a fair opportunity to defend against the State's accusations," and that "under the facts and circumstances of this case the rulings of the trial court deprived Chambers of a fair trial."

The Court has applied Chambers in only one other case. In Green v. Georgia (1979) the defendant was convicted of rape and murder, and a second trial was then held to decide whether CAPITAL PUNISHMENT would be imposed. At this trial, the defendant sought to introduce a witness who had previously testified for the prosecution at the trial of Moore, the defendant's coconspirator. The witness intended to testify, as he had testified at Moore's trial, that Moore had admitted to him that Moore alone had fired the shots that killed the victim, and that the defendant had not been present when the shots were fired. The trial judge, however, ruled this testimony inadmissible as hearsay. At Moore's trial the witness's repetition of Moore's declaration had fallen within the admission exception to the hearsay rule, but its repetition at Green's trial did not fall within the exception. In a brief opinion, the Supreme Court reversed. It noted that the excluded evidence was highly relevant to a critical issue in the trial and that substantial reasons existed to assume its reliability: it was a statement against Moore's penal interest made spontaneously by him to a close friend and for which there was ample corroborating evidence. Most important, the prosecution had considered the evidence reliable enough to use against Moore at his trial. Under these circumstances, the Court ruled, "the hearsay rule may not be applied mechanistically to defeat the ends of justice."

The future of this line of cases is not easy to foresee. The cases may stand for no more than the proposition that the Court will reverse a conviction when it is convinced that a gross injustice has been done. But they seem to stand for more. They seem to suggest that the Court has begun to read into the Constitution the ethical rule that the state's proper goal is not merely to get a conviction but to get a conviction only if justice demands it. Thus, the cases suggest, the prosecutor may not object to evidence that the defense seeks to introduce on any ground other than that it is wasteful of time, or likely to distract the jury's attention from the real issues of the case. This consideration, always important ethically, rises to constitutional significance when failure to abide by it leads to the exclusion of strongly credible exculpatory evidence that is highly relevant to critical issues in the trial.

JOHN KAPLAN
(1986)

Bibliography

MAGUIRE, JOHN M. 1947 Evidence, Common Sense, and Common Law. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

MCCORMICK, CHARLES T. 1954 Handbook of the Law of Evidence. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

MORGAN, EDMUND M. 1961 Basic Problems of Evidence. Philadelphia: American Bar Association.

THAYER, JAMES BRADLEY 1898 Preliminary Treatise on Evidence at Common Law. Boston: Little, Brown.

WIGMORE, JOHN HENRY 1961 Evidence in Trials at Common Law, rev. by John T. Naughton. Boston: Little, Brown.

EVIDENTIARY PRIVILEGE

To say that a person possesses an evidentiary privilege means that he or she cannot be compelled, as a witness, to disclose certain ("privileged") information. The possessor of the privilege (the privilege "holder") may also be entitled to prevent others who share the privileged information from disclosing it. The holder may waive the privilege by failing to assert it in timely fashion, by explicitly consenting to the disclosure of privileged information, or by engaging in conduct interpreted as consent (for example, voluntarily testifying to a portion of the privileged matter). In state courts, the contours of evidentiary privileges are determined by state law. In federal courts, they are determined by federal law, though at times the federal approach has been to defer to state rules of privilege, as specified, for example, in Federal Rule of Evidence 501.

Unlike most of the evidentiary rules of exclusion (such as those excluding HEARSAY or irrelevant evidence), the testimonial privileges do not exclude EVIDENCE because it is unreliable, prejudicial, or lacking in fact-finding utility. Rather, they exclude it despite its potential value; the privileges promote goals other than rational fact-finding. To be aware of these goals is to understand why traditional evidentiary privileges can readily take on constitutional dimensions. The interests served by the privileges are commonly phrased in terms that are uncompromisingly utilitarian. For example, privileges concerned with the protection of confidential communications—such as those between husband and wife, attorney and client, doctor and patient, priest and penitant, parent and child (a developing privilege)—are commonly justified on such reasoning: first, that the free flow of communication is indispensable to these important relationships; second, that confidentiality is essential to their free flow. An alternative perspective would support the claims of confidentiality not for such narrowly instrumental reasons but because confidentiality serves the participants' interest in privacy, whether or not the possibility of compulsory disclosure would hinder free communication.

Similar justifications, both instrumental and noninstrumental, could be generated in support of another kind of privilege, protecting interests other than confidentiality. An example is the phase of the husband-wife privilege permitting one spouse to refuse to testify against another, whether or not the testimony may concern intraspousal communications.

Although these privileges were not in their original conception constitutionally based, today they are often seen as implicating constitutional values. The justifications for many of the privileges could be reformulated in terms of constitutional principles. The attorney-client privilege, invoked by a criminal defendant, could draw support from the RIGHT TO COUNSEL, the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, and the DUE PROCESS clauses of the Constitution. Indeed, if the attorney-client privilege were not a common law privilege, some version of it probably would have to be invented to satisfy constitutional requirements. FIRST AMENDMENT arguments could likewise be mustered in support of the priest-penitent privilege and the REPORTER'S PRIVILEGE (which in some states protects against compelled disclosure of a newsperson's sources of information). And, efforts to pierce the confidentiality of certain communications—such as those between husband and wife, priest and penitent, or psychiatrist and patient—could be challenged as infringements of a constitutionally protected RIGHT OF PRIVACY.

On the other hand, just as evidentiary privileges sometimes draw support from constitutional principles, sometimes their enforcement may prove incompatible with other constitutional requirements. Thus to deny a criminal defendant the use of testimony important to his or her defense, out of respect for a privilege invoked by a witness, might run afoul of the defendant's right of CONFRONTATION, to COMPULSORY PROCESS, or to due process of law; the conflicting constitutional claims of the defendant and the witness would then have to be resolved.

LEON LETWIN
(1986)

Bibliography

CLEARY, E. 1984 McCormick on Evidence, 3rd ed. Pages 170–187. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

NOTE 1985 Developments in the Law—Privileged Communications. Harvard Law Review 98:1450–1666.

EVITTS v. LUCEY
469 U.S. 387 (1985)

Interpreting DOUGLAS V. CALIFORNIA (1963), the Supreme Court held, 7–2, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, that the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT requires the effective assistance of counsel during a defendant's first appeal, as of right, from a criminal conviction. (The Court had previously held that the RIGHT TO COUNSEL at the trial level comprehended effective assistance.) The procedural posture of this case made it unnecessary to spell out standards for judging the effectiveness of counsel on appeal; the Court thus left those standards for another day. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST and Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER dissented, arguing that the trial and appellate levels presented different degrees of need for counsel's assistance, and predicting that the decision would allow convicted defendants to "tie up the courts" with petitions for HABEAS CORPUS based on claims of ineffectiveness of appellate counsel.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

EXCESSIVE FINES

See: Punitive Damages

EXCISE TAX

In its original meaning an excise was a tax on goods manufactured or produced within the taxing country, as opposed to a duty or IMPOST on imports. Undoubtedly, this was the sense in which it was used in the constitutional grant of power to Congress to collect "taxes, duties, imposts and excises." In modern times an excise tax is any tax imposed on the manufacture or sale of a commodity, engaging in an occupation, or enjoying any other privilege. It is distinguished from a direct tax, such as a POLL TAX or an ad valorem property tax.

EDWARD L. BARRETT, JR.
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Direct and Indirect Taxes; State Taxation of Commerce.)

EXCLUSIONARY RULE

When the police obtain evidence by violating the BILL OF RIGHTS, the victim of their misconduct may lack any effective legal remedy. Yet some enforcement mechanism is necessary if several important constitutional guarantees are to be a reality and not merely expressions of hope. The Supreme Court responded to this concern by developing a series of rules that have come to be known in the aggregate as the exclusionary rule. In typical application, the rule is that evidence obtained in violation of a person's constitutional rights cannot be used against that person in his or her trial for a criminal offense. The rule is most frequently applied to exclude evidence produced by SEARCHES OR SEIZURES made in violation of the FOURTH AMENDMENT. However, a coerced confession obtained in violation of the defendant's Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, or a statement taken from the defendant in violation of his Sixth Amendment's guarantee of the RIGHT TO COUNSEL, would also be inadmissible at his trial.

The term "exclusionary rule" is of modern origin, but even at COMMON LAW a coerced confession was excluded or inadmissible as evidence, because its involuntariness cast serious doubt on its reliability. No one today seriously argues that this long-standing rule of evidence should be abandoned. Other aspects of the exclusionary rule, however, have been the source of major controversy among members of the judiciary, professional commentators, law enforcement officials, and the public.

The controversy did not become intense until the era of the WARREN COURT. But as far back as WEEKS V. UNITED STATES (1914) the Supreme Court had unanimously held that evidence seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment was inadmissible in a federal criminal prosecution. However, even after the Court had held in WOLF V. COLORADO (1949) that the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures was applicable to the states, the Court had continued until 1961 to resist the argument that the exclusionary rule should also be extended to state prosecutions. In that year, in MAPP V. OHIO, the Warren Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment did, indeed, impose on the states the exclusionary rule derived from the Fourth Amendment. Subsequent decisions broadened the Sixth Amendment guarantee of the right to counsel to govern the procedures for police interrogation and for the use of LINEUPS; each of these developments was accompanied by an extension of the exclusionary rule to state-court proceedings. Since the "FRUIT OF THE POISONOUS TREE" DOCTRINE requires the exclusion not only of evidence immediately obtained by these various forms of constitutional violation but also of other evidence derived from the initial violations, the exclusionary rule in its modern form results in the suppression of many items of evidence of unquestioned reliability and the acquittal of many persons who are guilty.

The primary purpose of the exclusionary rule, as the Supreme Court said in Elkins v. United States (1960), "is to deter—to compel respect for the constitutional guaranty in the only effectively available way—by removing the incentive to disregard it." Yet this deterrent function is only part of the exclusionary rule's justification. A court that allows the government to profit from unconstitutional police action sullies the judicial process itself, by becoming an accomplice in an unlawful course of conduct. When the Court first applied the rule in Mapp to state-court prosecutions, it said:

> There are those who say, as did Justice (then Judge) [BENJAMIN N.] CARDOZO, that under our constitutional exclusionary doctrine "the criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered." . . . In some cases this will undoubtedly be the result. But, . . . "there is another consideration—the imperative of judicial integrity." . . . The criminal goes free, if he must, but it is the law that sets him free. Nothing can destroy a government more quickly than its failure to observe its own laws, or worse, its disregard of the charter of its own existence. As Mr. Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, dissenting, said: . . . "Our government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. . . . If the government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law."

The evidence seized in an illegal search—a knife, a packet of heroin, counterfeit plates—is as trustworthy and material as if the search had been lawful. The rule's critics argue that to protect the privacy of the search victim by letting a guilty person escape responsibility for his crime is illogical. It would make more sense, they say, to use the evidence (as do the courts in Great Britain, for example) and provide civil or criminal remedies against the errant police officers. If the rule's purpose is to deter police lawlessness, the critics argue, the rule misses the point: prosecutors, not police officers, feel the immediate effects of the rule. If the rule is designed to maintain respect for the courts, they ask how the public can be expected to respect a system that frees criminals by suppressing trustworthy evidence of their guilt.

How many criminals do go free when the constable blunders? Inadequate studies provide no clear-cut answer, except that opponents of the exclusionary rule grossly exaggerate the number of felons it sets loose, and they tend to dramatize the worst cases. In California, whose supreme court has created the most stringent exclusionary rule in the nation, a study by the National Institute of Justice showed that .78 percent of all accused felons are not prosecuted because of search and seizure problems, and of those released, nearly three-fourths were involved in drug-related cases. The effect of the exclusionary rule is slight in cases involving violent crimes. When the charge is murder, rape, assault, or robbery, prosecutors decide not to proceed in one out of every 2,500 cases. Studies of felony court records in other states reach similar conclusions. Only 0.4 percent of all cases that federal prosecutors decide not to prosecute are rejected because of search problems. At the trial level, motions to suppress illegally seized evidence are rarely granted in cases of violent crime. If the exclusionary rule were abolished, the conviction rate in all felony cases would increase by less than half of one percent. Translated into absolute figures, however, thousands of accused felons are released nationally as a result of the exclusionary rule, most of them in drug and weapons possession cases. Street crime does not flourish, though, because of the exclusionary rule, even though it does protect criminals, as do all constitutional rights. They also protect society and help keep us free.

The rule's effectiveness in deterring illegal searches is hotly debated. The critics point out that some ninety percent of criminal prosecutions do not go to trial but are disposed of by pleas of "guilty." (The figure varies from state to state, and according to the nature of the crime.) Without a trial, there is no evidence for the rule to exclude. In the huge number of cases in which the police make arrests but the persons arrested are not prosecuted, the exclusionary rule has, of course, no immediate application. The rule's proponents reply that the decision whether to prosecute or accept a defendant's "guilty" pleas on a lesser offense may itself be influenced by the prosecutor's estimate of the potential operation of the exclusionary rule if the case should go to trial. (In jurisdictions where separate procedures are established to rule on motions to suppress evidence, the rule normally will have operated in advance of the trial.)

Undeniably, however, the exclusionary rule has no application at all to the cases that cry out most for a remedy: cases of police misconduct against innocent persons, who are never even brought to the prosecutors' attention, and cases of illegal searches and seizures made for purposes other than collecting evidence to support prosecutions. In TERRY V. OHIO (1968) Chief Justice EARL WARREN admitted: "Regardless how effective the rule may be where obtaining conviction is an important objective of the police, it is powerless to deter invasions of constitutionally guaranteed rights where the police either have no interest in prosecuting or are willing to forego successful prosecution in the interest of serving some other goal." The police may deliberately engage in illegal searches and seizures for a number of reasons: to control crimes such as gambling or prostitution; to confiscate weapons or contraband or stolen property; or to maintain high visibility either to deter crime or to satisfy a public clamoring for aggressive police action. In none of these cases will the exclusionary rule inhibit police violations of the Bill of Rights.

The rule does not in fact significantly impede the police, despite contentions from the rule's opponents that it handcuffs the police. A 1984 report prepared for the National Center for State Courts concluded that a properly administered search warrant process can protect constitutional rights without hampering effective law enforcement. Nevertheless, police try when possible to conduct search and seizure under some exception to the warrant requirement. The overwhelming number of searches and seizures are warrantless. In 1980, for example, only about 1,000 warrants were issued in Los Angeles in about 300,000 cases. Police usually try to make CONSENT SEARCHES or searches under what they claim to be EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES, or they conduct a search to confiscate contraband or harass criminals, without attempting a prosecution. In the few cases in which they seek warrants, they get them almost as if magistrates rubber-stamp their applications, and almost all warrants survive in court despite motions to suppress. Motions to suppress are made in about five percent of all cases but are successful in only less than one percent of all cases. Still more important is the fact that only slightly over half of one percent of all cases result in acquittals because of the exclusion of evidence.

Even when the rule does operate to exclude evidence in a criminal trial, it has no direct, personal effect on the police officer whose misconduct caused the rule to be invoked. The rule does not require discipline to be imposed by the officer's superiors, nor does either civil or criminal responsibility follow as a matter of course. Police officers are prosecuted only extremely rarely for their official misdeeds. Suits for damages by victims are inhibited not only by the defense of "good faith" and PROBABLE CAUSE but also by the realization that most officers are neither wealthy nor insured against liability for their official acts. Unsurprisingly, most victims conclude that a lawsuit is not worth its trouble and expense. In the typical case of an illegal search, neither the judge who excludes the fruits of the search from evidence nor the prosecutor whose case is thereby undermined will explain to the officer the error of his ways. The intended educational effect of judicial decisions is also diminished by the time-lag between the police action and its final evaluation by the courts. Even if an officer should hear that a court has excluded the evidence he found in an illegal search some months ago, he will probably have forgotten the details of the event. Incentives and sanctions that might influence the officer's future behavior are not within the exclusionary rule's contemplation. On the other hand, advocates of the rule emphasize that it is meant to have an institutional or systemic effect on law enforcement agencies generally, not necessarily on particular officers.

The officer is apt to respond not to judicial decisions (which he may regard as unrealistic if they impede his work) but to departmental policies and the approval of his colleagues and superiors. One whose main job is the apprehension of criminals and the deterrence of crime will have a low tolerance for what he sees as procedural niceties. He may even shade the truth in making out a report on a search or when testifying in court. It is not unheard of for the police to arrange to make a valid arrest at a place where they can conduct a warrantless SEARCH INCIDENT TO THE ARREST, and thus evade the requirement of a SEARCH WARRANT based on probable cause to believe that evidence of crime is in that place. To the extent that the courts have used the exclusionary rule to educate the police, then, the main things learned seem to have been the techniques for evading the rule.

Summarizing the criticisms of the exclusionary rule, Dallin H. Oaks has said:

> The harshest criticism of the rule is that it is ineffective. It is the sole means of enforcing the essential guarantees of freedom from unreasonable arrests and searches and seizures by law enforcement officers, and it is a failure in that vital task.
>
> The use of the exclusionary rule imposes excessive costs on the criminal justice system. It provides no recompense for the innocent and it frees the guilty. It creates the occasion and incentive for large-scale lying by law enforcement officers. It diverts the focus on the criminal prosecution from the guilt or innocence of the defendant to a trial of the police. Only a system with limitless patience with irrationality could tolerate the fact that where there has been one wrong, the defendant's, he will be punished, but where there have been two wrongs, the defendant's and the officer's, both will go free. This would not be an excessive cost for an effective remedy against police misconduct, but it is a prohibitive price to pay for an illusory one.

Despite the severity of criticisms, the exclusionary rule's chief critics have not proposed its total abolition. However, the Supreme Court has limited the rule's application in significant ways. Thus, for the most part, only the victim of an illegal search has standing to claim the benefits of the exclusionary rule; if A's house is searched in violation of the Fourth Amendment, and evidence is found incriminating B, the evidence can be used in B's trial. (State courts are free to extend the exclusionary rule to such cases; some state courts have done so, concluding that the point of the rule is not to protect people against being convicted but to deter the police.) Similarly, in UNITED STATES V. CALANDRA (1974) the Court held that illegally obtained evidence is admissible in grand jury proceedings, and it ruled in HARRIS V. NEW YORK (1971) that it can be used for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of the accused at his trial. Some uses of illegally obtained evidence have been tolerated as HARMLESS ERROR. More important, the GOOD FAITH EXCEPTION to the exclusionary rule allows the use of evidence obtained with a search warrant if the police reasonably believed the warrant to be valid, even though it later proves to be illegal. The rule has also been held inapplicable to collateral proceedings for postconviction relief such as HABEAS CORPUS. The Court's opinions in these cases have repeated the familiar criticisms of the exclusionary rule; their logic would seem to suggest abandonment of the rule altogether.

Yet the exclusionary rule remains, largely because no one has yet suggested an effective alternative means for enforcing the Bill of Rights against police misconduct. A federal statute dating from Reconstruction authorizes the award of damages against state or local officials (including police officers) who violate individuals' constitutional rights. In 1971, the Supreme Court found that the Fourth Amendment itself implicitly authorized similar damages awards against federal officers who violated the Amendment. The future effectiveness of such remedies will depend in part on the Supreme Court itself, as it spells out the victim's BURDEN OF PROOF in these cases and the measure of damages. Partly, however, the civil-damages alternative depends for its effectiveness on legislation to provide for real compensation to victims when the police officers are judgment-proof, and for real punishment of officers for constitutional violations when the payment of damages is unrealistic.

Meanwhile, the Supreme Court has only the exclusionary rule, which everyone agrees is an imperfect deterrent to police misbehavior. The rule survives, then, for want of better alternatives. But it also stands as a symbol that government itself is not above the law.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Electronic Eavesdropping; New York v. Quarles; Police Interrogation and Confessions; Warrantless Searches; Wiretapping.)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1978 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 3 vols. St. Paul: West Publishing Co.

OAKS, DALLIN H. 1970 Studying the Exclusionary Rule. University of Chicago Law Review 37:665–757.

SCHROEDER, WILLIAM 1981 Deterring Fourth Amendment Violations: Alternatives to the Exclusionary Rule. Georgetown Law Review 68:1361–1426.

STEWART, POTTER 1983 The Road to Mapp v. Ohio and Beyond: The Origins, Development and Future of the Exclusionary Rule in Search-and-Seizure Cases. Columbia Law Review 83:1365–1404.

EXCLUSIVE POWERS

The Constitution divides governmental power in two ways: between the states and the federal government, and among the three branches of the federal government. Some powers are vested exclusively in one authority, and may not be exercised by any other authority.

The exclusive powers of the federal government include not only all power over FOREIGN AFFAIRS but also certain domestic powers that affect the whole country. Not all of the powers granted to the federal government by the Constitution are exclusive in character; some may be exercised concurrently and independently by both state and federal governments, or may be exercised by the states until Congress acts.

The Constitution makes clear the exclusive character of some powers by explicitly prohibiting the states from exercising them (such as the treaty power). In some other cases, the courts have held the grant to be exclusive when the subject of the power is national in character or requires one uniform system or plan. In some cases the states, with the express permission of Congress, may exercise an exclusive power of the national government.

The states also possess exclusive powers. Because the Constitution establishes a government of limited powers, any domestic governmental power not granted to the federal government by the Constitution and not prohibited by it to the states remains an exclusive power of the state government.

Within the federal government a power may be possessed exclusively by one of the three branches of government. The separation of powers implies that each branch of government has its exclusive sphere of power, which it can independently exercise and from which the other branches are excluded. In theory the legislative power, executive power, and judicial power each belong exclusively to one branch of government. This exclusive power is compatible with the influence of other branches over some part of its exercise. Only Congress may legislate, but legislation may be affected by the President's veto power and the power of the courts to declare statutes unconstitutional. Powers not explicitly granted to one branch have been found by the courts to belong exclusively to Congress, the President, or the courts when they are in their nature exclusively legislative, executive, or judicial.

Although the complexities of modern government require much sharing of power among governmental authorities, the constitutional principles of federalism and the separation of powers require also the maintenance of the proper exclusive spheres of power.

GLEN E. THUROW
(1986)

Bibliography

PRITCHETT, C. HERMAN 1977 The American Constitution, 3d ed. Pages 150–216. New York: McGraw-Hill.

EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS

Executive agreements—that is, international agreements concluded between heads of state or their representatives, commonly without the necessity of parliamentary approval—are nowhere explicitly authorized in the Constitution. The Constitution is silent about international agreement-making except as it vests in the President, in cooperation with the Senate, the power to make and enter into treaties. Nevertheless the principle has long been established that the capacity of the United States to negotiate and enter into international agreements is not exhausted by the TREATY POWER. This principle has been repeatedly recognized in the actual conduct of United States FOREIGN AFFAIRS since the early days of the Republic. Since the mid-nineteenth century, but especially since WORLD WAR II, the use of executive agreements in United States practice has exceeded the use of treaties by an increasingly wide margin.

The expression "executive agreement," which is not widely used outside the United States but which has its equivalents abroad, is understood by the Department of State to refer, in general, to any international agreement brought into force relative to the United States without the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the Senate that is constitutionally required for treaties. In particular, it is understood to refer to three kinds of agreements: those made pursuant to, or in accordance with, an existing treaty; those made subject to congressional approval or implementation ("congressional-executive agreements"); and those made under, and in accordance with, the President's constitutional powers ("sole executive agreements"). None of these executive agreements is subject to the formal treaty-making process specified in Article II, section 2, clause 2, of the Constitution.

A treaty-based executive agreement, provided that it is within the intent, scope, and subject matter of the parent treaty, has the same validity and effect as the treaty itself and is subject to the same constitutional limitations. Deriving from one of the elements of "the supreme law of the land," it takes precedence over all inconsistent state laws and follows the customary rule favoring the instrument later in time in case of inconsistency with a federal statute. A conspicuous example of a treaty-based executive agreement is the traditional compromis defining the terms of submission to adjudication or arbitration under a basic convention. Another is found in the hundreds of STATUS OF FORCES AGREEMENTS and other agreements required to carry out the NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY, the linchpin of United States policy in Europe since WORLD WAR II.

A congressional-executive agreement is based on either a prior or a subsequent act of Congress authorizing the making of the agreement or providing general authority for the executive action needed internationally to implement the legislation in question. The scope or subject matter of the agreement is the same whether the congressional act comes before or after the negotiation of the agreement; the act of Congress often takes the form of an authorization to enter into or effectuate an agreement already negotiated. In principle, however, the agreement must reside within the joint powers of Congress and the President in order to have constitutional validity. An agreement outside the legal competence of Congress or the President, authorities generally agree, would be unconstitutional. On the other hand, as the American Law Institute has commented, "the source of authority to make a congressional-executive agreement may be broader even than the sum of the respective powers of Congress and the President," and "in international matters the President and Congress together have all the powers of the United States inherent in its SOVEREIGNTY and nationhood and can therefore make any international agreement on any subject." In any event, partly out of a concern to CHECK AND BALANCE the President in the conduct of foreign affairs, the vast majority of executive agreements entered into by the United States—for example, the Lend-Lease Agreements of World War II and the Trade Expansion Acts of 1934 and 1962—are of this type. Like its treaty-based counterpart, deriving from one of the elements of "the supreme law of the land," the congressional-executive agreement supersedes all inconsistent state law and follows the customary rule favoring the instrument later in time in case of inconsistency with a federal statute.

Sole executive agreements are international agreements entered into by the President without reference to treaty or statutory authority, that is, exclusively on the basis of the President's constitutional powers as chief executive and COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF, responsible for United States foreign relations and military affairs. Department of State records indicate that only a small percentage of executive agreements are of this type and that the great majority have dealt with essentially routine diplomatic and military matters. Accordingly, with relatively minor exception (such as agreements settling pecuniary and personal injury claims of citizens against foreign governments), they have had little direct impact on private interests and therefore have given rise to little domestic litigation. However, in part out of fear that the President might undertake by international agreement what would be unconstitutional by statute, as in fact occurred in MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920), such agreements have not been free of controversy. Two issues in particular continue to stand out.

First there is the question, not yet conclusively settled, of whether Congress may legislate to prohibit or otherwise limit sole executive agreements. Although comprehensive limitations on such agreements, including the proposed BRICKER AMENDMENT of 1953–1954, have so far failed to be adopted, Congress has nonetheless occasionally restricted presidential authority in ways that appear to preclude some executive agreements. For example, the War Powers Resolution of 1973, requiring congressional authorization to introduce combat troops into hostile situations, arguably restrains the President from making agreements that would commit United States armed forces to undeclared foreign wars. Similarly, the Arms Control and Disarmament Act of 1961 forbids the limitation or reduction of armaments "except pursuant to the treaty making power . . . or unless authorized by further legislation of the Congress of the United States." The validity of such restrictions upon presidential authority has been challenged by Presidents and has yet to be determined by the Supreme Court.

Second, while it is widely accepted that the President, under the "executive power" clause, has the authority to conclude sole executive agreements that are not inconsistent with legislation in areas where Congress has primary responsibility, there is a question as to whether the President alone may make an agreement inconsistent with an act of Congress or, alternatively, whether a sole executive agreement may supersede earlier inconsistent congressional legislation. The prevailing view, rooted in the belief that it would be unconscionable for an act of a single person—the President—to repeal an act of Congress, is that sole executive agreements are inoperative as law in the United States to the extent that they conflict with a prior act of Congress in an area of congressional competence. This is the position taken by a federal appeals court in United States v. Guy W. Capps, Inc. (4th Circuit, 1953) and by the American Law Institute. The Supreme Court has not yet rendered a definitive decision in these respects, however.

The foregoing two issues aside, there is broad agreement about the scope and effect of sole executive agreements as a matter of constitutional law. Like the other two kinds of executive agreements, they are subject to the same limitations applicable to treaties, they are not limited by the TENTH AMENDMENT, and they supersede all inconsistent state law.

In sum, all three categories of executive agreements bespeak a historic trend toward strong executive leadership in foreign affairs. Only three final points need be added. First, the judgment to resort to these agreements in lieu of the treaty alternative is essentially a political one, affected more by surrounding circumstances than by abstract theories of law. Second, once in force, executive agreements are presumptively binding upon the United States and the other parties to them under international law, to the same extent and in the same way as treaties. Third, the international obligations assumed under such agreements survive all subsequent limitations or restrictions in domestic law.

BURNS H. WESTON
(1986)

Bibliography

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE 1965 Restatement of the Law, Second: Foreign Relations Law of the United States. Pages 361–448. St. Paul, Minn.: American Law Institute.

——— 1980 Restatement of the Law: Foreign Relations Law of the United States (Revised), Tentative Draft No. 1. Pages 71–144. Philadelphia: American Law Institute.

BERGER, RAOUL 1972 The Presidential Monopoly of Foreign Relations. Michigan Law Review 71:1–58.

BORCHARD, EDWIN 1944 Shall the Executive Agreement Replace the Treaty? Yale Law Journal 53:664–683.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1972 Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Pages 173–188. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

MCDOUGAL, MYRES and LANS, ASHER 1945 Treaties and Congressional-Executive Agreements: Interchangeable Instruments of National Policy. Yale Law Journal 54:181–351, 534–615.

EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS
(Update)

Article II of the Constitution empowers the President to make treaties with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of two-thirds of the U.S. SENATE. An "executive agreement" is an agreement with a foreign government signed by a member of the executive branch without the advice and consent of the Senate. When the executive acts unilaterally the agreement is known as a "sole executive agreement"; when the executive acts with the approval of a simple majority of both houses of Congress the agreement is known as a "congressional–executive agreement." The President has discretion to decide whether to sign an international agreement in the form of an Article II treaty, a sole executive agreement, or a congressional–executive agreement. In deciding which form of agreement is appropriate, the President will consider the relative importance of the agreement, the likelihood of obtaining a SUPERMAJORITY of the Senate or a simple majority of both houses, and the domestic legal effect of the agreement.

The Constitution does not expressly authorize executive agreements. Article I prohibits states from entering into "an Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power," without congressional authorization. Some commentators have suggested that this reference indicates that the Framers understood that there were forms of international agreements other than Article II treaties. There is strong evidence that the Framers were referring to international agreements that do not bind the nation in the future. The term "Agreement or Compact" probably derived from the eighteenth-century treatise The Law of Nations by EMERICH DE VATTEL. In this treatise, Vattel defined an agreement or compact as a contemporaneous exchange that imposes no future obligation. For example, a state might use a compact to settle disputed borders with another state or foreign government. By contrast, Vattel defined a treaty as binding the state in perpetuity. One could infer that the Framers intended that an Article II treaty would bind future administrations, unlike other forms of agreements, including executive agreements.

No executive agreements were concluded until 1817, when President JAMES MONROE signed the Rush–Bagot Agreement with Britain to limit military forces along the Great Lakes. Monroe subsequently doubted the constitutionality of this executive agreement and sought the Senate's advice and consent. By 1900, only 124 executive agreements had been concluded over 111 years, and none of them operated to bind the United States prospectively. Presidents understood that an executive agreement, unlike an Article II treaty, could not bind a President's successors. For example, President THEODORE ROOSEVELT concluded an executive agreement to assume responsibility for Santo Domingo's customs house, but subsequently he decided that, because the agreement might operate prospectively, he needed the Senate's advice and consent.

By the 1930s Presidents increasingly relied on executive agreements. President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT signed more than 600 agreements in his four terms in office. Still, Roosevelt respected the traditional distinction between treaties and executive agreements. Then–Attorney General ROBERT H. JACKSON advised Roosevelt that when "negotiations involve commitments as to the future," they "are customarily submitted for the ratification by a two-thirds vote of the Senate before the future legislative power of the country is committed."

President HARRY S. TRUMAN used executive agreements for the first time in lieu of treaties to bind the nation prospectively when he signed the Bretton Woods Agreements in 1945 establishing the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, and a protocol in 1947 binding the United States to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). Congress approved the Bretton Woods Agreements as congressional–executive agreements, but neither the Senate nor Congress ever approved the 1947 GATT.

Since 1947, Presidents have employed Article II treaties and executive agreements interchangeably. The vast majority of all international agreements has been in the form of executive agreements. These include important trade agreements such as the NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT (NAFTA), the Canadian Free Trade Agreement, and the World Trade Organization (WTO).

One critical issue is whether an executive agreement should have the same effect on domestic law as an Article II treaty. Article VI of the Constitution provides that treaties "shall be the Supreme Law of the Land." The Supreme Court has interpreted that provision to mean that a treaty supersedes any contrary state law or state constitutional provision and any prior inconsistent federal law. Some commentators have argued that an executive agreement can have the same effect as an Article II treaty in displacing state and federal law. In United States v. Belmont (1937) and United States v. Pink (1942), the Court enforced a sole executive agreement settling outstanding claims by U.S. nationals against the Soviet Union as a condition to reestablishing diplomatic relations. In DAMES & MOORE V. REGAN (1981), the Court upheld a claims settlement agreement negotiated unilaterally by President JIMMY CARTER with Iran for the release of U.S. hostages. The agreement effectively nullified a default judgment obtained by Dames & Moore for a breach of contract by Iran. Other scholars dispute the implication that a President could legislate federal law without any congressional authorization simply by making an agreement with a foreign leader. The domestic legal status of executive agreements remains contestable.

JOEL R. PAUL
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Treaty Power.)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE and GOLOVE, DAVID 1995 Is NAFTA Constitutional? Harvard Law Review 108:799–928.

BORCHARD, EDWIN 1944 Shall the Executive Agreement Replace the Treaty? Yale Law Journal 53:616–683.

JACKSON, JOHN H. 1967 The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in United States Domestic Law. Michigan Law Review 66:249–313.

MCDOUGAL, MYERS and LANS, ASHER 1945 Treaties and Congressional-Executive or Presidential Agreements: Interchangeable Instruments of National Policy: I. Yale Law Journal 54:181–351.

MCLURE, WALLACE 1941 International Executive Agreements. New York: Columbia University Press.

PAUL, JOEL R. 1998 The Geopolitical Constitution: Executive Expediency and Executive Agreements. California Law Review 86:671–773.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1995 Taking Text and Structure Seriously: Reflections on Free-Form Method in Constitutional Interpretation. Harvard Law Review 108:1221–1303.

EXECUTIVE DEFIANCE OF "UNCONSTITUTIONAL" LAWS

Presidents in recent years have asserted that they may refuse to comply with any provision of law that they believe is unconstitutional. This weapon is far more versatile and more potent than the VETO POWER, for it may be applied surgically to selected portions of a law and cannot be overridden by Congress. Defenders of this claimed executive authority urge that since each branch takes an oath to support the Constitution, each therefore has an equal right to interpret that document for itself. Just as JUDICIAL REVIEW permits judges to reject unconstitutional laws, "presidential review" gives the President the same option. Yet even accepting the "departmentalist" view that each branch enjoys autonomy in construing the Constitution, it does not follow that the President may refuse to execute an allegedly unconstitutional law. Despite its appeal in terms of symmetry and logic, "presidential review" is contrary to the ORIGINAL INTENT. Unlike judicial review, which was frequently endorsed at the Federal Convention and in the state ratification debates, the Founders rejected the notion that the executive may refuse to execute laws that it deems to be unconstitutional.

The President's failure to honor a statute because of its alleged unconstitutionality is equivalent to the "suspending power" that English kings employed for 400 years before it was abolished by the BILL OF RIGHTS (ENGLISH) of 1689. Through this royal prerogative, the Crown was able to nullify all or portions of a law—sometimes on the ground that it was unconstitutional.

The Founders were careful not to confer this prerogative on the American President. Article II thus enjoins the President to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed." In marked contrast to the duty placed on judges by the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, the President's obligation extends to all laws, not just those "made in pursuance" of the Constitution. The Framers also insisted on giving the President only a qualified rather than an absolute veto, even though the primary purpose of the veto was to shield the executive against unconstitutional laws. By rejecting an absolute veto, the Convention necessarily anticipated that laws might be enacted over a President's constitutional objection. Should this occur it would be up to the judiciary—not the executive—to check the statute's enforcement. Had the Founders envisioned that Presidents could refuse to execute "unconstitutional" laws, the veto would have been superfluous in the very setting for which it was principally designed. Finally, if there had been any hint that the President would have authority to suspend allegedly unconstitutional laws, the ANTIFEDERALISTS would have been quick to object, for one of their chief objections to the Constitution was that the President would be "as much a King as the King of Great-Britain." Yet nowhere in the Antifederalist literature is there any mention of a presidential suspending power.

Throughout most of our history, the executive has honored this original understanding by implementing even those statutes to which the President has constitutional objections. The first known instance of presidential defiance of an "unconstitutional" law occurred in 1860, almost three-quarters of a century after the Constitution was ratified. Between 1789 and 1973 there were only ten occasions when a President refused to comply with an allegedly unconstitutional law. Since the mid-1970s, however, such defiance has become more common. Rather than using the veto against laws it believes to be unconstitutional, the White House now often issues a "signing statement" charging that parts of a bill the President has just signed into law are invalid. Though the executive does not always follow through on these objections, refusals to comply with allegedly unconstitutional laws are no longer a rarity. From 1974 through 1980, there were as many instances of presidential defiance as had occurred during the previous 185 years. The Supreme Court has not yet been presented with a case challenging this growing presidential practice. If the Court respects the intent of the Founders it will declare the practice to be unconstitutional.

CHRISTOPHER N. MAY
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Impoundment of Funds; Judicial Supremacy; Line-Item Veto; Nonjudicial Interpretation of the Constitution.)

Bibliography

CALABRESI, STEVEN G. and PRAKASH, SAIKRISHNA B. 1994 The President's Power to Execute the Laws. Yale Law Journal 104: 541–665.

EASTERBROOK, FRANK H. 1989–1990 Presidential Review. Case Western Reserve Law Review 40:905–929.

MAY, CHRISTOPHER N. 1998 Presidential Defiance of "Unconstitutional" Laws: Reviving the Royal Prerogative. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

PAULSEN, MICHAEL S. 1994 The Most Dangerous Branch: Executive Power to Say What the Law Is. Georgetown Law Journal 83:217–345.

RECENT LEGAL OPINIONS CONCERNING PRESIDENTIAL POWERS 1994 Arkansas Law Review 48:311–346.

SCIGLIANO, ROBERT 1989 The President's "Prerogative Power." Pages 236–256 in Thomas E. Cronin, ed., Inventing the American Presidency. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.

EXECUTIVE IMMUNITY

In tracing the development of executive immunity in the United States, one should separate immunity for constitutional violations from immunity for nonconstitutional violations and immunity of federal officials from immunity of state officials. State officials' immunity for nonconstitutional violations is a matter left to each state's laws. At least since enactment in 1871 of SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, state officials have been liable for some federal constitutional violations. Until well into the twentieth century, however, their immunity in constitutional cases had not been fully explored because there were relatively few federal constitutional restrictions on state officials' behavior. By the middle of the twentieth century, federal officials, who are not covered by section 1983, seemed immune from actions for both constitutional and nonconstitutional misbehavior. Within a few decades, however, with the exception of the President, no executive official, state or federal, was fully immune from damage actions for constitutional violations.

In the Massachusetts case of Miller v. Horton (1891) Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, writing for the majority, narrowly restricted state officials' state-law immunity from suit. Even reasonable, good-faith behavior might trigger liability if found to violate the Constitution or some other legal limit. But in Spaulding v. Vilas (1896) and other cases, the Supreme Court was more protective of federal executives. And in subsequent years, many states provided their executives with more generous protection from suits in state courts, particularly when their acts were viewed as discretionary rather than ministerial.

Gregoire v. Biddle (1949) highlighted the movement away from Miller v. Horton. In an influential opinion by Judge LEARNED HAND for the United States Court of Appeals, Gregoire suggested that a federal executive officer's malice would not render him liable for an otherwise lawful act. Gregoire was read as conferring broad immunity upon federal officials. Barr v. Matteo (1959) accentuated this trend when, in a case generating no majority opinion, the Supreme Court seemed to hold federal officials absolutely immune from defamation suits.

After Barr, the Supreme Court paused in its treatment of federal executive immunity to explore the liability, under section 1983, of state officers charged with constitutional violations. In a series of cases, including PIERSON V. RAY (1967), SCHEUER V. RHODES (1974), and WOOD V. STRICKLAND (1975), the Court held that unconstitutional acts by state executive officials would not trigger liability under section 1983 if the officials acted under a reasonable, good-faith belief that their behavior was constitutional. But they enjoyed no absolute immunity. Scheuer v. Rhodes, in which a governor was found not to have absolute immunity, dispelled illusions some had entertained about special status for high officials.

This experience with state officials undoubtedly influenced the Court's subsequent treatment of federal officials. In BUTZ V. ECONOMOU (1978), over four dissents, the Supreme Court held that the good-faith defense, and not the rule of Barr, applied to damage actions against federal officials for constitutional violations. Prior statements about absolute immunity, and the importance of the ministerialdiscretionary dichotomy, in effect were limited to cases involving common law torts. Harlow v. Fitzgerald (1982) reaffirmed and modified the limited immunity of high federal executive officials and NIXON V. FITZGERALD (1982) found the federal chief executive, the President, to enjoy the absolute immunity that Scheuer had denied to state chief executives.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

JAFFE, LOUIS L. 1963 Suits against Governments and Officers: Damage Actions. Harvard Law Review 77:209–239.

SCHUCK, PETER H. 1981 Suing Our Servants: The Court, Congress, and the Liability of Public Officials for Damages. Supreme Court Review 1980:281–368.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

Executive orders, a class of presidential documents, primarily regulate actions of government officials and agencies. Although most executive orders are issued under specific statutory authorization, some, including President HARRY S. TRUMAN'S STEEL SEIZURE order and executive orders affecting CIVIL RIGHTS, are issued on the President's own authority under Article II. Executive orders were not numbered until 1907 and were not required to be published until 1935.

Executive orders have taken on particular importance in times of war and in the field of civil rights. President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's executive orders played a key role in the WORLD WAR II Japanese relocation program, sustained in the JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES (1943–1944). Most executive orders concerning civil rights relate to employment by government contractors. Executive Order 8802 (1941), generated by a wartime need for labor, established a Committee on Fair Employment Practices to carry out a policy of nondiscrimination in defense industries. EXECUTIVE ORDERS 9980 AND 9981 (1948) declared a national policy of nondiscrimination in federal employment and sought to foster equality of treatment in the armed services. Executive Order 11603 (1962) attempted to promote nondiscrimination in federally assisted housing. On the more mundane level, executive orders also have been a vehicle through which Presidents promulgate the never-ending plans for reorganizing the executive branch of government.

With the enactment of ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION in the 1960s and the expansion of constitutional prohibitions on government discrimination, executive orders prohibiting discrimination became less important. They continue, however, to provide internal authority regulating the federal government's employment and contracting policies. And in requiring employers to take AFFIRMATIVE ACTION to hire minorities and women, EXECUTIVE ORDER 11246 (1965) goes further than fair employment statutes. It has been a significant factor in pressuring government contractors to hire minority and female workers.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Presidential Ordinance-Making Power.)

Bibliography

MORGAN, RUTH P. 1970 The President and Civil Rights: Policy-Making by Executive Order. New York: St. Martin's Press.

EXECUTIVE ORDER 9066 AND PUBLIC LAW 503 (1942)

On February 19, 1942, citing the necessity for "every possible protection against espionage and against sabotage," President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT issued an EXECUTIVE ORDER authorizing various military commanders to designate any area in the United States from which "any or all persons may be excluded" at their discretion. Although based on a 1918 WAR POWERS act, the order resulted from vigorous anti-Japanese sentiment on the West Coast. Despite its broad wording, the order was enforced almost exclusively against persons of Japanese ancestry. The order conveyed a remarkably broad DELEGATION OF POWER but failed to distinguish between American citizens and ALIENS or even between loyal and disloyal citizens. To provide for enforcement, the War Department drafted a bill making it a federal crime for a civilian to disobey a military relocation order. The bill passed Congress without dissent and Roosevelt signed it into law on March 21. Few spoke out against the use of these two measures to deprive some 110,000 people (an entire community was relocated in ten "camps") of their CIVIL RIGHTS. The Supreme Court sustained the evacuation and relocation in three JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES (1943–1944), despite a vigorous dissent by Justice FRANK MURPHY objecting to the "legalization of racism."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

EXECUTIVE ORDER 10340
(1952)

On April 8, 1952, on the eve of a nationwide strike of steelworkers, President HARRY S. TRUMAN issued Executive Order 10340, directing the secretary of commerce to take possession of and operate the plants and facilities of eighty-seven major steel companies. The order anticipated that the plants would continue to be run by company managers, preserving the rights and obligations of the companies until corporation officials and union leaders settled their dispute. As justification for averting a work stoppage, the order referred to Truman's proclamation of December 16, 1950, declaring the existence of a national emergency and the dispatch of American fighting men to Korea. The order called steel "indispensable" for producing weapons and war materials, for carrying out the programs of the Atomic Energy Commission, and for maintaining the health and vitality of the American economy.

Although Truman based the order on authority under "the Constitution and laws of the United States, and as President of the United States and COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the armed forces of the United States," the Justice Department later argued in court that Truman had acted solely on inherent executive power without any statutory support. On June 2, 1952, the Supreme Court declared the Executive Order invalid.

LOUIS FISHER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Steel Seizure Controversy; Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer.)

Bibliography

MARCUS, MAEVA 1977 Truman and the Steel Seizure Case: The Limits of Presidential Power. New York: Columbia University Press.

EXECUTIVE ORDER 11246
(1965)

Executive Order 11246 required government contractors to take AFFIRMATIVE ACTION to ensure nondiscriminatory employment practices. Employers complying with the order may encounter employees or potential employees who claim that affirmative action violates Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 or the Constitution. UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA V. WEBER (1979), which sustained some affirmative action by private employers, does not foreclose all such claims. Efforts to undermine the order by amending the 1964 act have failed. Part I of the order, which banned discrimination and required affirmative action by the federal government, was superseded by Executive Order 11478 (1969) and by the 1972 extension of the 1964 act to government employees.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

EXECUTIVE ORDERS 9835 AND 10450
(1947, 1953)

As a result of domestic political and security pressures after 1945, Presidents HARRY S. TRUMAN and DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER instituted sweeping loyalty investigations of federal workers. Truman's Executive Order 9835, affecting over two million employees, established loyalty review boards in executive departments to evaluate information provided by Federal Bureau of Investigation or Civil Service Commission investigations and informants. The basic standards for dismissal required "reasonable grounds for belief in disloyalty," which included evidence of affiliation with groups on the ATTORNEY GENERAL'S LIST of subversive organizations. Critics who alleged widespread subversion nevertheless demanded more stringent measures, and Truman's Executive Order 10241 (April 28, 1951) altered the criterion to one of "reasonable doubt" of loyalty. The change effectively shifted the burden of proof to the accused or suspected employee. Eisenhower, however, later complained that the Truman program reflected "a complacency . . . toward security risks," such as homosexuals and alcoholics, and in April 1953, he issued Executive Order 10450 that made security, not loyalty, the primary concern.

The loyalty probes produced new bureaucracies, with agendas of their own and standards and practices that varied widely in different departments. Between 1947 and 1956, approximately 2,700 employees were dismissed and another 12,000 resigned because of the inquiries. After 1953, the security program provided for immediate suspension without pay, and many employees undoubtedly resigned to avoid the stigma of combating the charges, however flimsy. Then, too, the program's shroud of secrecy, including the use of unknown informants, made challenges difficult.

The Supreme Court responded cautiously to the program. In Bailey v. Richardson (1951) an evenly divided bench sustained Bailey's dismissal even though she had been denied an opportunity to confront her accusers. The same day, in JOINT ANTI-FASCIST REFUGEE COMMITTEE V. MCGRATH, the Court questioned the procedures for compiling the attorney general's list of subversive organizations, yet did not prevent its continued use. Some individuals successfully challenged their dismissals, but courts carefully avoided broader constitutional issues. In Peters v. Hobby (1955) the Supreme Court overturned a medical professor's dismissal because his position was nonsensitive, yet the Justices ignored Peters's challenge against secret informers. Similar reasoning was employed in Cole v. Young (1956) to reverse the discharge of an employee who had challenged the use of the attorney general's list as a violation of rights of association. The real turning point came in Service v. Dulles (1957) when the Court reversed the dismissal of one of the "China Hands" who had been purged from the State Department. Finally, in Greene v. McElroy (1959), Chief Justice EARL WARREN condemned the use of "faceless informers," unknown to the accused. Without determining constitutional issues, the Court held that the government's evidence must be disclosed to the individual to give him an opportunity to refute it.

Although the Court's decisions undoubtedly demonstrated that abusive, illegal governmental actions could be brought to account, such challenges required extraordinary individual persistence and courage as well as financial and emotional cost. For all the government's efforts, the results were dubious. Judith Coplon, convicted of passing Justice Department documents to a Soviet agent, had escaped the program's net. And in 1954, the Civil Service Commission acknowledged that no communist or fellow traveler had been uncovered in its probes.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

HARPER, ALAN D. 1969 The Politics of Loyalty. Greenwich, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

EXECUTIVE ORDERS 9980 AND 9981 (1948)

When issued by President HARRY S. TRUMAN, Executive Orders 9980 and 9981 were among the most far-reaching federal antidiscrimination measures adopted since Reconstruction. Executive Order 9980 authorized the establishment of review boards within federal executive departments and agencies to which employees claiming racially discriminatory treatment could appeal. It also established a Fair Employment Board to coordinate and supervise executive antidiscrimination policy and to hear appeals from agency and department review boards.

Executive Order 9981 declared it "to be the policy of the President that there shall be equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons in the armed services without regard to race, color, religion or national origin." To this end, the order established the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Services to study and resolve the problem of SEGREGATION in the armed forces. Issued under pressure from black leaders, and in the midst of a reelection campaign, the order and the committee's recommendations were crucial first steps to desegregating the armed services.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

BERMAN, WILLIAM C. 1970 The Politics of Civil Rights in the Truman Administration. Pages 116–120. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.

EXECUTIVE POWER

Article II of the Constitution vests "the executive power" of the United States in the President, whereas Article I vests in Congress those legislative powers "herein granted," and Article III says that the JURISDICTION of the federal courts extends only to the subjects enumerated in the article. The common reader would normally construe these provisions to confer the entire executive power on the President, while granting Congress and the courts only parts of the legislative and judicial authority of the United States. As so often happens, however, the common reader has had a difficult time. From the first term of President GEORGE WASHINGTON, there has been a considerable debate over the scope of the President's executive power.

One party, labeled "Super-Whigs" by EDWARD S. CORWIN, views all the powers of the national government with grudging suspicion as necessary but distasteful restraints on the powers of the states or the people. For members of this party, the first principle of constitutional exegesis is that the Constitution provides limited and ENUMERATED POWERS that should be narrowly construed. They read the first sentence of Article II as a "mere designation" of the President's office and would confine the President's authority strictly to those examples of the executive power mentioned in the constitutional text: the VETO POWER, the power to receive ambassadors, the duty to execute faithfully the laws, and the others.

The other participant in the debate, the party of those who interpret law in the manner of JOHN MARSHALL, read the vesting clause of Article II as a grant to the President of a broad and independent range of authority to be defined historically and by the necessities of circumstance, and not limited to the powers and duties mentioned in the text. For this party, "the executive power" includes not only IMPLIED POWERS, but also the prerogative and emergency powers of the British Crown unless limited or denied to the President by the Constitution.

The issue has long since been settled by usage and by decisions of the Supreme Court in cases such as EX PARTE MILLIGAN, In re Neagle (1890), and IN RE DEBS (1895), but it continues to enjoy a half-life in the literature of the Constitution.

In his perceptive study, The Creation of the Presidency, 1775–1789, C. C. Thach, Jr. concludes that Article II admits "an interpretation of executive power which would give to the President a field of action much wider than that outlined by the enumerated powers." Thach has no doubt that this consequence of the text was contemplated and intended because the dominant force governing the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 was not the theories of MONTESQUIEU and WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, popular as they were, but the experience of the state and the national governments between 1776 and 1787. To the majority of the founding fathers, led by JAMES WILSON, JOHN JAY, JAMES MADISON, and GOUVERNEUR MORRIS, the lesson of this experience was the danger of unbridled legislative power and the necessity for a strong and accountable national executive "to counterbalance legislative predominance. Neither theorist nor foreign model was needed to demonstrate that fact. The state legislatures' excesses and the incompetency of Congress as an administrative body produced the presidency." This is why Article I, section 6, forbids any member of Congress from holding an executive office during his or her term and why the Convention rejected several proposals that would have diluted the unity of the presidency or subordinated the office to a congressional committee.

Thach's judgment has been vindicated by the ebb and flow of history, despite the survival of a minority view favoring congressional supremacy. Upheavals of public opinion like those of the later stages of the VIETNAM WAR and the WATERGATE scandal caused the pendulum to swing more violently than usual in the direction of congressional power, but—thus far, at any rate—James Wilson's conception of the presidency has recovered from the vehemence of periodic congressional attacks and prevails in public opinion, governmental practice, and constitutional law.

The reasons for this pattern are simple, but fundamental: they correspond to functional necessity. Congress cannot conduct the day-to-day business of a vast government, the central task of the executive power. The size, history, and habits of Congress make it an admirable legislative body, but for these reasons also make it impossible for Congress, even through committees and committee staff, to constitute the operational arm of a government capable of "energy, secrecy, and dispatch."

It is equally apparent that no American President can preempt the legislative power and rule by decree, at least not for long. It is not always easy to discover at what point in the process of government a statute is constitutionally necessary. But as a matter of principle, there is a boundary between the legislative and executive functions, no matter how difficult it sometimes is to draw. As a matter not only of legal obligation, but of institutional resistance, every President is forced sooner or later to respect the limits of the tripartite system of government, sanctioned as it is by the conviction that "there can be no liberty" in a society where the executive and legislative functions are combined and where the judiciary is not separated from both the other branches.

Congress had to consider the indispensable elasticity of these concepts when it met for the first time in 1789. In considering a statute to establish the first three departments of the government, Congress faced the question as to whether it was constitutionally required to give the President the power to remove heads of the departments or whether the President had that power under Article II, with or without a statute. The Constitution made it clear that only the President could nominate these officers, but could not appoint them without the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the SENATE. Congress could provide other procedures for "inferior" officers or officers to be appointed by the courts. Were the new cabinet ministers to serve at the President's pleasure or was IMPEACHMENT required to remove them? Could the President remove them only with the advice and consent of the Senate? Could the Senate or Congress as a whole remove them on its own motion, whatever the President thought?

Madison led the extended debate on the bill in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, and in the end, Congress decided to say nothing on the subject, but to leave the outcome to practice and to the courts. Madison contended that the officers should be deemed to serve at the President's pleasure. The principal reason he offered for discovering an "implied" power of removal in Article II was that the President could not be expected faithfully to execute the laws if he were not given a free hand to dismiss his chief subordinates; neither the Senate nor Congress as a whole should have a binding vote in the conduct of the administrative business of the government, save through legislation. It followed, Madison concluded, that the President alone was responsible and accountable for the removal of officials.

Madison's position on the constitutional basis of the President's removal power was tested in a famous episode. During the passionate battles between President ANDREW JOHNSON and Congress over policy in the military occupation of the South, Congress passed the TENURE OF OFFICE ACT, providing that certain heads of departments could serve until their successors were qualified. The provision was designed by Congress to prevent Johnson from dismissing Secretary of War EDWIN M. STANTON, who was in charge of the military occupation of the South. Stanton was removed by Johnson, however, and the House of Representatives proceeded to impeach the President, largely for violating the statute. The President, of course, was acquitted by the Senate. Some sixty years later, the Supreme Court declared the Tenure of Office Act unconstitutional in MYERS V. UNITED STATES (1926).

To confirm that the authority of a President to remove a member of his CABINET is an integral part of "the" executive power was hardly the end of the story. The Myers case did not concern the removal of a cabinet member, but of a postmaster. At the present stage in the evolution of the law on the subject, it can be said that the President's "absolute" power to remove federal officials is clear only for those of senior political responsibility whose appointments have been confirmed by the Senate. In contrast, military officers and foreign-service officers receive their commissions from the President after a senatorial vote of consent, but can only be discharged after compliance with statutory procedures for assuring them justice. For officials below the political level, Congress can qualify or abolish the President's removal power by passing civil-service legislation or by other means and direct the appointment of members of boards, commissions, and independent agencies for fixed terms. However, the Supreme Court has held in RUTAN V. REPUBLICAN PARTY OF ILLINOIS (1990) that the FIRST AMENDMENT prevents state governors from discriminating among lower-level state officials on political grounds with regard to promotions, dismissals, and other aspects of employment. This line of cases surely applies also to the national government.

The same pattern of adjustment and accommodation between President and Congress is manifest in other lines of decisions that distinguish between the executive and the legislative functions—those on pardons, for example. This Encyclopedia considers the relations of Congress and the President in the field of FOREIGN AFFAIRS in a number of articles, so this phase of the problem will not be addressed here. This article will, however, recall the ways in which the President and Congress share powers with respect to the important subject of appropriations.

It is often said that Congress has exclusive authority over the national purse because of the provisions in Article I, section 9, that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in Consequence of appropriations made by law," and in Article I, section 7, that all money bills must originate in the House of Representatives. From the beginning, however, questions have arisen about the import of these words. The questions were raised with new intensity by the controversy over President RONALD REAGAN's handling of the IRAN-CONTRA AFFAIR.

Does the word "law" in the phrase "appropriations made by law" mean only statutory law, or does it include the President's actions pursuant to his prerogative and EMERGENCY POWERS under the Constitution as well? President Washington spent unappropriated funds to put down the WHISKEY REBELLION, and ABRAHAM LINCOLN spent two million dollars in unappropriated funds for war material during the early months of the CIVIL WAR, while Congress was not in session. President WOODROW WILSON and a number of other Presidents have taken comparable actions.

Article I, section 9, prohibits the spending of unappropriated funds. Does it therefore by implication allow the President not to spend funds, even when they have been appropriated? When the Armistice in Europe was signed in 1945, could President HARRY S. TRUMAN cancel military procurement contracts? The practice of presidential IMPOUNDMENT OF FUNDS already appropriated goes back at least to President THOMAS JEFFERSON. On rare occasion, Presidents have relied on their inherent constitutional powers both to spend funds without benefit of statutory authority and not to make expenditures that had been authorized by statute.

Such acts have been treated as presenting a special constitutional problem fraught with overtones of tyranny. In situations of this kind, it has been normal practice for Presidents to report such expenditures or decisions not to spend to Congress, often with a request that Congress join its authority to that of the President by approving the action already taken. While some conclude that President Lincoln acted unconstitutionally in spending two million dollars of unappropriated funds in 1861 for the purpose of resisting the Confederacy, this author is of the opinion that Lincoln was legally correct in characterizing his action as constitutional.

The existence of an emergency does not suspend the Constitution; it merely changes the state of facts to which the law must be applied. As a matter of international law and constitutional law alike, the government of the United States possesses all the powers it requires to function in the society of nations. Like every other constitution, the Constitution of the United States contemplates the possibility of emergencies and makes provision for dealing with them. When Presidents invoke their emergency powers, they are acting under the Constitution, not beyond its limits, regardless of whether they are right or wrong in judging the scope of their powers. There is no other way for them to act. The general constitutional norms of reasonableness apply to the field of emergency actions as they do to other exercises of executive (and legislative) authority. In scrutinizing actions taken by the executive in the name of emergency, however, Congress, the courts, and the people may conclude that what the President did was justifiable as going no further than was reasonably necessary to carry out the President's constitutional responsibility under the circumstances.

Even if Lincoln could have assembled Congress in emergency session in the spring of 1861, his political judgment that such a session would have been impolitic, to say the least, was an important part of this constitutional responsibility. In defending Washington's unorthodox method of financing the suppression of the Whiskey Rebellion, ALEXANDER HAMILTON spoke of a presidential prerogative to make temporary "advances" against future congressional appropriations. This is a possible approach to the constitutional problem; it is analytically more precise, however, to treat such presidential actions as exercises of an autonomous presidential power. Congress may approve after the event, as frequently happens when Presidents use the national force on their own authority. The PRIZE CASES (1863). But the President's action meets the standard of Article I, section 9, whether Congress approves or not.

Involving the claim of emergency, however, by no means justifies every decision the President (or Congress) takes to resolve it, as shown in Ex Parte Milligan (1866). In the context of the Constitution as a whole and considering the possibilities of abuse, the President's power to spend unappropriated funds should be confined to the minimum necessary for the purpose.

During the administration of RICHARD M. NIXON, a major controversy between Congress and the presidency developed about the existence and the extent of the President's power not to spend appropriated funds. The controversy resulted in the CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET AND IMPOUNDMENT ACT of 1974. This statute distinguishes between appropriations that authorize expenditures and those that mandate them. In the first category, the Act acknowledges a power in the President to sequester appropriated funds for a limited period, giving Congress time to reconsider its prior decision. Where an appropriation is mandatory, however, the President is required to carry it out.

These problems in determining the respective role of the legislature and the executive in spending public funds, important as they are, do not address the principal constitutional issues raised by the growing tendency of Congress to use riders on appropriation bills, LEGISLATIVE VETOES, standing congressional oversight committees, and other legislative methods as devices for taking executive powers unto itself. The pracitce of "tacking foreign matter to money bills" was familiar to the Constitutional Convention and has been familiar ever since, both in money bills and more generally. No constitutional way to protect the President's veto by requiring Congress to enforce a rule of "germaneness"—that is, a rule that would confine each act to one subject—has yet been developed. Two approaches to the problem are currently being discussed: the LINE ITEM VETO and a more vigorous judicial development of the Supreme Court's analysis and conclusions in cases like Springer v. Government of the Philippine Islands (1928), IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), BOWSHER V. SYNAR (1986), and Commodity Future Trading Commission v. Schor (1986), all of which recognize the importance of enforcing the constitutional distinction between legislative and executive power, whatever form the encroachment may take. There has been some support for the novel argument that a constitutional basis for the item veto already exists and should be declared by the Supreme Court rather than by constitutional amendment. Whether or not so radical a step is taken, however, it is to be expected that the Court will pursue the initiative it took in Chadha and Bowsher.

EUGENE V. ROSTOW
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Congress and Foreign Policy; Congressional War Powers; Executive Prerogative; Pardoning Power; Senate and Foreign Policy.)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWIN S. 1940 and 1957 The President: Office and Powers. New York: New York University Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1975 Presidential Spending Power. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

THACH, CHARLES C., JR. 1922 The Creation of the Presidency, 1775–1789. Baltimore Md.: The Johns Hopkins Press

EXECUTIVE PREROGATIVE

Executive prerogative refers to the President's constitutionally based authority to declare policy, take action, and make law without congressional support or in the face of inconsistent congressional LEGISLATION. This authority may be seen as a corollary of the SEPARATION OF POWERS under which the President has exclusive EXECUTIVE POWER that Congress may not invade because Congress's authority is limited to LEGISLATIVE POWERS. Executive prerogative may also refer to certain EMERGENCY POWERS under which the President may act contrary to the Constitution, such as spending funds without an appropriation or contrary to an act of Congress that would properly be classified as a legislative act. In the view of some eighteenth-century political theorists, the President could act extraconstitutionally or illegally if circumstances required, but he would have to seek subsequent ratification of the act. More recently, the President has justified such action on the basis of an inherent or implied authority conferred by the Constitution.

Executive prerogative mostly relates to FOREIGN AFFAIRS but may also include domestic acts, such as actions during war or national emergency, dismissal of CABINET officers appointed with Senate participation, and assertion of EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE to protect communications of executive branch officials from congressional or judicial inquiry.

The Constitution does not expressly delegate a "foreign affairs" power to the President or to any single branch of the government. Indeed, the Constitution delegates most specific foreign relations powers to the Congress. These powers include the powers to declare war, to regulate FOREIGN COMMERCE, and to define and punish offenses against the law of nations, piracy, and FELONIES committed on the high seas, as well as the powers to authorize an army, navy, and MILITIA and to make rules for the regulation of land and naval forces. Congress therefore has concurrent authority and substantial practical influence over all aspects of foreign affairs. Notwithstanding this authority, the President dominates foreign affairs. Yet the Constitution delegates relatively few foreign relations powers to the President, and several of these powers are shared with the Senate or Congress. The President has the power to make treaties and appoint ambassadors, but only with the participation of the Senate. His power as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF is subject to limitation by the congressional war, legislative, and appropriations powers. The President has the power to receive ambassadors, the duty (and implicitly the power) to take care that laws (including treaties and customary international law) be faithfully executed, and a general executive power. But executive prerogative rests more on historical practice and functional necessity than on constitutional text.

Much of the President's dominance of foreign affairs is based on extralegal factors, such as access to the media and political party status. Most presidential foreign affairs authority derives from congressional support. For example, Congress has delegated to the President plenary authority over foreign commerce. It has also authorized and funded a standing armed force, a vast intelligence bureaucracy, and dozens of agencies with thousands of officials participating in all facets of international organization and activities. Having created the bureaucracies, Congress has generally been content to let the executive run them. Executive prerogative has historically sanctioned the President's right to recognize foreign states and governments, establish diplomatic relations, initiate negotiations, determine the content of communications with foreign governments, conduct intelligence operations, conclude presidential EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS, and initiate military action.

Executive prerogative has been controversial since the first administration of GEORGE WASHINGTON. After Washington declared neutrality in 1793 in the war between France and Great Britain, ALEXANDER HAMILTON and JAMES MADISON debated his authority under the pseudonyms Pacificus and Helvidius. The structure of the debate, and even the arguments advanced, have been used repeatedly in foreign policy clashes between the President and Congress, most recently in the IRAN-CONTRA AFFAIR. The Washington declaration amounted to a decision not to declare war and implicitly interpreted a treaty with France not to require U.S. entry into the war.

Madison rejected Washington's authority to issue the declaration because in his view neutrality pertained to declaration of war, a congressional power, and to the application of a treaty, a power shared with the Senate. Madison viewed constitutional powers as strictly separated so that any activity within the scope of a legislative power was precluded to the President. He also advocated a narrow construction of the executive power and other presidential authorities specified in the constitutional text. In Madison's view, the President could only execute laws and policies established by Congress.

Hamilton took a broad view of the executive power, arguing that its scope was limited only by explicit exceptions such as Senate participation in treaty making and congressional power to declare war. Thus, the President could preserve peace until Congress declared war. As the "organ of intercourse" between the United States and foreign nations, the President could make, interpret, suspend, and terminate treaties; recognize foreign governments; and execute the laws of nations (including the law of neutrality). In Hamilton's view, the President shared power with the legislature in war and treaty making.

Washington established other important precedents supporting presidential foreign affairs power. He authorized military actions against AMERICAN INDIANS without congressional authorization and dispatched an envoy without Senate approval. He also asserted executive privilege against both the Senate and Congress to protect treaty-negotiating instructions, and he effectively eliminated the Senate's "advice" function in treaty making. Other early Presidents also established major precedents justifying presidential foreign affairs power. JOHN ADAMS initiated presidential executive agreements. THOMAS JEFFERSON committed funds to purchase military supplies without an appropriation and dispatched the navy to protect U.S. vessels against pirates off Africa.

Since then, presidential authority has fluctuated with the strength of particular Presidents and the exigencies of the moment, depending on what the President has claimed and what the Congress has tolerated. The courts generally have declined to adjudicate these controversies. On the few occasions when the Supreme Court has addressed questions of presidential power, it has almost always sided with the President.

In a much-quoted passage, Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND, in UNITED STATES V. CURTISS-WRIGHT EXPORT CORP. (1936), referred to "the very delicate, plenary and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the federal government in the field of international relations." Sutherland explained that "[t]he President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it." Sutherland offered a functional explanation: "if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment . . . is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation . . . must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom. . . . [H]e, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries. . . . He has his confidential sources of information. He has his agents in the form of diplomatic, consular and other officials. Secrecy in respect of information gathered by them may be highly necessary, and the premature disclosure of it productive of harmful results. . . ."

In Chicago and Southern Air Lines v. Waterman S. S. Corp. (1948) Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, after noting the importance of secret intelligence in executive decision making, added: "[T]he very nature of executive decisions as to foreign policy is political, not judicial. Such decisions are wholly confided by our Constitution to the political department of the government. . . . They are delicate, complex and involve large elements of prophecy. They are and should be undertaken only by those directly responsible to the people whose welfare they advance or imperil. They are decisions of a kind for which the Judiciary has neither aptitude, facilities nor responsibility and have long been held to belong in the domain of political power not subject to judicial intrusion or inquiry."

In YOUNGSTOWN SHEET TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952), however, the Court denied an executive emergency power to seize steel mills during the KOREAN WAR. The determinative factor was that Congress had earlier declined to give the President such authority. Jackson's concurring opinion, which is now the standard framework for analysis, held that the President's authority is maximum when exercised pursuant to express or implied congressional authorization, but is "at its lowest ebb" when exercised contrary to the express or implied will of Congress. Jackson recognized a "zone of twilight" where there is neither a grant nor a denial of presidential authority. The branches then have concurrent authority, and "Congressional inertia, indifference or quiescence may sometimes, at least as a practical matter, enable if not invite, measure on independent presidential responsibility." In DAMES & MOORE V. REGAN (1981) the Court upheld a presidential executive agreement eliminating causes of action in federal courts for claims against foreign governments, contrary to a statute conferring jurisdiction over such cases, on the basis of congressional acquiescence to earlier executive agreements dealing with such claims. Presidents have also negotiated export restraint measures covering steel and automobiles at odds with the antitrust laws, and Congress has acquiesced.

In the absence of much judicial guidance, presidential foreign affairs power has been shaped by political compromises between Congress and the President. Almost all exercises of presidential power, including politically controversial ones, have the sanction of congressional acquiescence.

Executive prerogative builds on the negotiation function. Everyone agrees that the President has exclusive authority to recognize foreign states and governments, establish diplomatic relations, and control official communications with foreign governments. The President declares foreign policy, although important declarations like the MONROE DOCTRINE or support for the African National Congress typically require congressional action to be effective. Executive branch officials, with congressional acquiescence, have also construed executive prerogative to include the right to preserve confidentiality of diplomatic communications and related executive deliberations.

The President may negotiate an international agreement on any subject matter. He decides whether to conclude it on the basis of Article II or the constitutionally equivalent procedure of authorization by Congress. He may conclude some international agreements without any congressional participation. These agreements have sometimes been controversial, but the Supreme Court has approved. In UNITED STATES V. BELMONT (1937) and UNITED STATES V. PINK (1942), the Court upheld an executive agreement that superseded state law. In Dames & Moore v. Regan (1981) the Court upheld an executive agreement inconsistent with a federal statute. After the VIETNAM WAR and WATERGATE, the President fended off congressional attempts to regulate executive agreements. The President may also interpret, suspend, and terminate Article II treaties without Senate participation.

The most controversial aspect of executive prerogative concerns the presidential war power. This authority rests in part on the commander-in-chief clause and in part on congressional authorization of military forces and acquiescence in their use. Since WORLD WAR II, the President has frequently initiated military activities without a congressional DECLARATION OF WAR. Examples include military actions in Korea, the Dominican Republic, Lebanon, Grenada, the Persian Gulf, and Panama. During the Vietnam War, Congress challenged the President, passing the War Powers Resolution over the President's veto. Subsequent presidents disregarded its major limitation, sending troops to the Middle East, Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Some members of Congress complained, but Congress acquiesced to presidential military action, at least for limited purposes. Executive branch officials have also claimed constitutionally based authority to initiate covert intelligence operations.

Only rarely has a President acted contrary to congressional prohibition. In some contexts, however, functional theory and historical practice constitutionally justify such action, whether as an emergency power or, under contemporary theory, as a synergistic product of the textual powers of the President. One cannot anticipate the contexts in which such action may be required, and it is therefore difficult to define rules in principled terms. The prospect for congressional acquiescence seems crucial. The President does not have a general power to override acts of Congress for foreign-policy purposes. Nevertheless, the foreign relations power may justify action inconsistent with acts of Congress when foreign policy urgency requires and Congress seems likely to acquiesce. Presidential exercise of power is subject to congressional review to weigh the genuineness of the urgency and wisdom of the action. If Congress disagrees, it can repudiate the President formally. Congressional action in response to assertions of presidential prerogative should in turn prevail and constitutional lawmaking continue.

PHILLIP R. TRIMBLE
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Congress and Foreign Policy; Congressional War Powers; Presidential War Powers; Senate and Foreign Policy; War, Foreign Affairs, and the Constitution; War Powers.)

Bibliography

BALDWIN, GORDON 1976 The Foreign Affairs Advice Privilege. Wisconsin Law Review 1976:16–46.

CORWIN, EDWARD 1917 The President's Control of Foreign Relations. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1985 Constitutional Conflicts Between Congress and the President. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

GLENNON, MICHAEL J. 1990 Constitutional Diplomacy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1972 Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

KOH, HAROLD HONJU 1990 The National Security Constitution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

LOBEL, JULES 1989 Emergency Power and the Decline of Liberalism. Yale Law Journal 98:1385–1433.

NOTE 1968 Congress, the President, and the Power to Commit Forces to Combat. Harvard Law Review 81:1771–1805.

——— 1984 The Extent of Independent Presidential Authority to Conduct Foreign Intelligence Activities. Georgetown Law Journal 72:1855–1883.

WRIGHT, QUINCY 1922 The Control of American Foreign Relations. New York: Macmillan.

EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE

Executive privilege refers to a right of the chief executive to refuse to produce documents within his control in response to a demand from either the legislative or judicial departments of the national government. There would seem to be no question that the chief magistrate need not respond to such demands from departments of state governments. Raoul Berger has asserted that "executive privilege is a myth," a creature of the Presidents who have asserted this claim to immunity without foundation in the Constitution. Although the Constitution does provide for legislative privilege, there are no words in the Constitution on which to base any such executive privilege. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court, in UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974), wrote executive privilege into the Constitution on the grounds that it inheres in the notion of SEPARATION OF POWERS that is immanent in our basic document:

> The expectation of a President to the confidentiality of his conversations and correspondence, like the claim of confidentiality of judicial deliberations, for example, has all the values to which we accord deference for the privacy of all citizens and, added to these values, is the necessity for protection of the public interest in candid, objective, and even blunt or harsh opinions in presidential decision-making. A President and those who assist him must be free to explore alternatives in the process of shaping policies and making decisions and to do so in a way many would be unwilling to express except privately. These are the considerations justifying a presumptive privilege for Presidential communications. The privilege is fundamental to the operation of Government and inextricably rooted in the separation of powers under the Constitution.

The privilege as created by the Court in Nixon is not, however, an absolute one. Interests of the other branches of government may override the presidential interest in the privilege. And in Nixon the executive privilege was held subordinate to the claim of a GRAND JURY for EVIDENCE "that is demonstrably relevant in a criminal trial." Thus, the weight of the privilege to withhold information differs according to its function. It is at its lowest force when it "is based only on the generalized interest in confidentiality." It is at its strongest when the claim is based on the ground of "military or diplomatic secrets."

The Supreme Court's constitutional DOCTRINE of executive privilege is still in its nascency. The Court, in Nixon, particularly eschewed passing on "the balance between the President's generalized interest in confidentiality and the need for relevant evidence in civil litigation, [or] with that between the confidentiality interest and congressional demands for information, [or] with the President's interest in preserving state secrets." In the absence of constitutional language, the constitutional meaning of executive privilege depends totally on judicial creation, for "it is the province and duty of this Court "to say what the law is."

Prior to the Nixon decision, the question of executive privilege, especially as it related to demands of Congress on the executive branch, was resolved in the political rather than the judicial arena. It was a contest of wills, with each side exerting its own powers and its own claims on public opinion, which was frequently dispositive of the issue. The strongest power of the Congress lies in its control over the purse and its threat to cut off funding from programs as to which Congress makes inquiry and as to which the executive branch declines to produce the documents sought. The greatest force on the side of the executive branch lies in its capacity to delay acquiescence, since most executive privilege questions become moot or stale through the passage of time.

The problem has a long history in this country, going back to the time that President GEORGE WASHINGTON declined to deliver to the House of Representatives documents relating to JAY'S TREATY, on the grounds that it was none of the business of the House to participate in the treaty process and that all relevant information had, indeed, been delivered to the Senate, whose job it was to advise and consent on the content of treaties. When in the Burr case JOHN MARSHALL subpoenaed communications in the hands of President THOMAS JEFFERSON, Jefferson decided which he would and which he would not provide. In Burr the judiciary proved helpless against the adamancy of the President to withhold documents, although the Court might have tried to invoke the CONTEMPT POWER.

Since the investigatory or oversight power of Congress is itself an implied rather than a granted power, its claim to access to presidential papers generally rests on as weak a reed as does the President's claim to immunity from producing the information. Both are implicit rather than express constitutional rights. But the case differs where Congress, particularly the House, is investigating the question of misbehavior of executive branch officials. The Congress is particularly charged by the IMPEACHMENT provisions of the Constitution with the duty of "throwing the rascals out." And surely they must have access to relevant information to determine whether an executive official, be it the President himself, has committed "high crimes and misdemeanors" for which he might be impeached and convicted. But the problem of executive privilege has not arisen in the impeachment context. Rather the impeachment power is used to justify a general congressional power of investigation.

It is with regard to Congress's legislative duty to secure knowledge on which to base its laws or to assure itself that the President is, indeed, engaged in the faithful execution of the laws which Congress has enacted that "executive privilege" problems tend to arise. History provides us with no doctrinal answer to the correct meaning of executive privilege here. Most are agreed that the privilege can be claimed only by the President himself or by a government official at the command of the President. It is not to be invoked even by the vice-president or the secretary of state except through the President. There is little other consensus. Impeachable offenses aside, the privilege is strong where, as the Court noted, it is concerned with military or state secrets. Beyond this, history shows only that the balance between the two constitutional claims, Congress's to be able to perform its duties and the President's to perform his own, has been resolved on an ad hoc basis, with the President having the greater ability to manipulate public opinion, and Congress being able to invoke only the time-consuming processes of contempt and fiscal restraints.

Now that the Supreme Court seems to have made the question of executive privilege a judicial rather than a political one, some further elucidation may be forthcoming. But, except in times of crisis such as the Watergate affair, the mills of the courts, like the mills of the gods, grind so very slowly that they may prove inadequate to provide greater definition to the amorphous concept of executive privilege. This is especially the case since the Court recognized the privilege as a conditional one and not an absolute one, requiring balancing by a judicial arbiter without any special competence to perform the task. It may be predicted, however, that where the conflict is between the judicial and executive branches, as it was in the Nixon case, the judicial branch is more likely to prevail, at least in a criminal case or one in which the government itself is seeking the information. But, as between Congress and the President, the Court is likely to be found where it is usually found, aligned with the executive branch.

Executive privilege could cover immunities other than the right to reject a demand for information from another branch. In the Nixon period, the question arose, speculatively, whether a President of the United States could be arrested, indicted, and tried for crime while still in office. That a successful impeachment would leave the person charged with no immunity to arrest, INDICTMENT, and trial is made clear by the words of the Constitution itself. On the other hand, it says nothing about executive immunity while in office. Without judicial precedent or judgment, there appeared to be agreement that the President of the United States and only the President must be immune from interruption of his duties while he holds office, subject only to the necessity for responding to impeachment charges. There is no moment when the President is not on duty, even while on vacation. This immunity, whether termed executive privilege or not, derives from the implications of the Constitution much more readily than his right to refuse to produce documents, which need not interrupt his presidential obligations.

One must assume, too, that the President, like everyone in the nation, can claim the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION both in Congress and in the courts. The practical effects on the electorate of such a claim make it highly unlikely that it will ever be invoked. And again, the privilege not to incriminate himself is not the executive privilege as that term is generally used.

The contours of executive privilege remain hard to define, and certainty is not likely to come soon, if ever.

PHILIP B. KURLAND
(1986)

Bibliography

BERGER, RAOUL 1974 Executive Privilege: A Constitutional Myth. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

KURLAND, PHILIP B. 1978 Watergate and the Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

UNITED STATES SENATE, JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, SUBCOMMITTEE ON SEPARATION OF POWERS 1971 Executive Privilege: The Withholding of Information by the Executive. 92nd Congress, 1st session. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

———, SUBCOMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE AND SEPARATION OF POWERS, AND COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS, SUBCOMMITTEE ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS 1973 Freedom of Information: Executive Privilege; Secrecy in Government. 3 Vols. 93rd Congress, 1st session. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE
(Update)

The term "executive privilege" has been applied to explain and define a variety of immunities claimed by the President to resist inquiries or impositions by other branches of government.

In the broadest sense, the term covers claims by the President that he is not subject to any type of judicial process while serving in his office. However, whether or not the President can be indicted and tried for a criminal offense while in office (an issue that has yet to be resolved), the Supreme Court held in CLINTON V. JONES (1997) that he can be required to appear and answer as a defendant and to testify in a civil case for acts committed before he became President. A President can also be ordered to respond to a subpoena for tapes (and documentary materials) in a criminal case, as the Court held in UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974). Presumably he could also be obliged to give testimony in such cases, so long as one of the narrower testimonial privileges described below does not specifically apply. When President WILLIAM J. CLINTON was asked to give testimony before the Monica Lewinsky GRAND JURY convened by INDEPENDENT COUNSEL Kenneth Starr, he chose to appear voluntarily rather than test the extent of his testimonial immunity.

On the other hand, in NIXON V. FITZGERALD (1982), the Court held that Presidents cannot be sued for damages for acts taken while in office.

In the narrowest sense, executive privilege covers only specific testimonial privileges under which the President may refuse to produce documents or permit testimony by members of the executive department to either Congress or the courts on matters relating to the operation of that branch.

With respect to resisting inquiries by Congress, Presidents going back to GEORGE WASHINGTON have refused to disclose materials relating to the interior workings of the presidential office. Presidents JOHN ADAMS, THOMAS JEFFERSON, and ANDREW JACKSON similarly asserted the privilege in the nineteenth century and every President since FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT did so in our time.

When privilege is asserted before Congress, the only weapon available to the legislative branch is to vote a CONTEMPT citation and seek to obtain penalties or a compliance order before the courts. Generally, a compromise is then worked out between the two branches. In the rare instances that an assertion of executive privilege before Congress was presented to the courts, generally the executive department's claim has been upheld or the case has been held to lack JUSTICIABILITY.

Executive privilege has also been asserted by the President or executive department members in judicial proceedings, generally in criminal cases. Commentators and the courts have noted that the term has been applied in at least five separate situations. Included in this category are the "state secrets" privilege covering NATIONAL SECU-RITY matters, and the privilege to withhold the names of informers or information relating to pending criminal investigations.

Another recognized privilege is the "presidential communications" privilege established by the Court in United States v. Nixon. Under that DOCTRINE, communications to and from the President before and after a presidential decision has been made are ordinarily immune from process, based on SEPARATION OF POWERS concerns. Breach of that privilege is possible only after a compelling showing of need by the person seeking the information.

The most frequently invoked form of executive privilege is the "deliberative process" privilege. Under that doctrine, the President, on behalf of any executive branch officer, may refuse to disclose recommendations and deliberations comprising part of the process by which governmental decisions and policies are formulated. To invoke this privilege, the President must show that the material sought to be discovered related to communications made before a governmental decision was made (it was "predecisional") and that it related to the method chosen or advice given to arrive at the decision.

Even if such a showing is made, the privilege can be overcome by a showing of need, less than that required to breach the "presidential communications" privilege. Among the considerations that must be balanced by the courts are the importance of the evidence, the availability of alternate sources of information, the significance of the litigation and the extent of government misconduct sought to be examined.

New assertions of executive privilege were made during the Monica Lewinsky investigation involving President Clinton. But the courts rejected any claim of privilege by U.S. Secret Service agents or by government lawyers asserting an attorney–client privilege not to respond to questions involving possible criminal activity within their knowledge.

LEON FRIEDMAN
(2000)

Bibliography

BERGER, RAOUL 1974 Executive Privilege: A Constitutional Myth. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

ROZELL, MARK J. 1994 Executive Privilege: The Dilemma of Secrecy and Democratic Accountability. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press.

EXHAUSTION OF REMEDIES

Exhaustion-of-remedies questions arise in at least two areas of constitutional adjudication. Since Ex parte Royall (1886), state prisoners have been required to exhaust available, effective state court remedies before seeking federal HABEAS CORPUS relief from allegedly unconstitutional state convictions. Congress codified this result more than half a century later. The exhaustion requirement, which is not constitutionally mandated, is said to reflect the Court's sensitivity to relations between federal and state courts; a federal court is prevented from reviewing a state conviction until state courts have had a chance to correct constitutional errors.

In another class of cases seeking to vindicate constitutional rights, the Supreme Court does not require exhaustion of state judicial remedies. In MONROE V. PAPE (1961) and a series of later cases, the Court has stated that there is no requirement of exhaustion of state judicial remedies before bringing an action against state officials under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE. Patsy v. Board of Regents (1982) held that litigants bringing section 1983 cases also need not exhaust state administrative remedies and thereby resolved a long-standing conflict among the courts of appeal. In the Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (1980),Congress imposed an exhaustion-of-administrative-remedies requirement upon certain prisoners bringing actions under section 1983.,

The exhaustion requirement in habeas corpus cases, and its absence in section 1983 cases, generates difficulty in deciding whether to require exhaustion in constitutional actions brought by prisoners, many of which may be brought either as habeas actions or as section 1983 cases. In Preiser v. Rodriguez (1973) the Court held that exhaustion was required in a case close to "the core of habeas corpus," that is, one attacking the validity of a prisoner's conviction or otherwise challenging the fact or duration of confinement. When the prisoner challenges the conditions of confinement, the Court said, the nonexhaustion rule applicable to section 1983 cases governs. Perhaps inspired in part by the long-standing exhaustion requirement in habeas corpus cases, much modern CIVIL RIGHTS legislation reflects sensitivity to state prerogatives by requiring complainants initially to present claims to state authorities. Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 requires resort to state antidiscrimination agencies before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission may act on a complaint. Title VIII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1968 requires federal administrators to allow state and local housing agencies the first chance at a housing discrimination complaint. But post-Civil War ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION, such as the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF1866 and 1870, reflected no such sensitivity. And the practice is not uniform in modern statutes. The VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 expressly rejects any requirement of exhaustion of administrative or other remedies before initiation of actions in federal court. Other civil rights statutes simply do not address the issue.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

COMMENT 1974 Exhaustion of State Administrative Remedies in Section 1983 Cases. University of Chicago Law Review 41: 537–556.

NAHMOD, SHELDON H. 1979 Civil Rights & Civil Liberties Litigation. Pages 143–148. Colorado Springs, Colo.: Shepard's.

EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES SEARCH

Although the Supreme Court has denounced WARRANTLESS SEARCHES as "per se unreasonable under the FOURTH AMENDMENT," it has recognized "a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions" to this rule based on exigent circumstances. A SEARCH WARRANT, which in ordinary circumstances provides constitutional reasonableness for a search, may be dispensed with if the delay involved in obtaining the warrant might defeat the purpose of the search. In fact, far more searches are made without warrants than with them. The warrantless search is "exceptional" only in the sense that exceptional (that is, exigent) circumstances are needed to justify it.

Five types of warrantless searches have thus far received the Court's sanction. In WEEKS V. UNITED STATES (1914) the Court upheld SEARCH INCIDENT TO ARREST of a person—and, in later cases, of the area under the arrestee's control—in order to disarm him and prevent the destruction of EVIDENCE. The search of an automobile on the road is constitutional when there is PROBABLE CAUSE to believe the automobile is transporting contraband. As the Court said in CARROLL V. UNITED STATES (1925), to delay the AUTOMOBILE SEARCH is to risk the escape of driver and vehicle. "Hot pursuit" of a suspected felon into a building was held reasonable in WARDEN V. HAYDEN (1967). Delaying to obtain a warrant might endanger the lives of the pursuing officers and others. Such a search may continue until the suspect is apprehended and his weapons are seized. In SCHMERBER V. CALIFORNIA (1966) the Court permitted the compulsory taking of blood from an individual to determine whether he was intoxicated while driving when there was probable cause to believe that he was. The exigency in such cases is furnished by the fact that the level of alcohol in the blood diminishes after its intake ceases. In TERRY V. OHIO (1968) the Court upheld the practice of stopping a suspect and frisking his outer clothing to discover concealed weapons, even when probable cause for an arrest is lacking, provided that circumstances entitle an officer to believe that a criminal venture is about to be launched and that his safety or that of others is endangered.

The concept of exigent circumstances is an open one. Indeed, in Mincey v. Arizona (1978) the Court indicated that officers may enter and search without a warrant upon reasonable belief that there is a "need to protect or preserve life or avoid serious injury. . . ."

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

Bibliography

LANDYNSKI, JACOB W. 1971 The Supreme Court's Search for Fourth Amendment Standards: The Warrantless Search. Connecticut Bar Journal 45:2–39.

EX PARTE

(Latin: "From the part [of]. . . .") A legal proceeding is said to be ex parte if it occurs on the application or for the benefit of one party without NOTICE to or contest by an adverse party. In the reports such a case is entitled "Ex parte. . ." followed by the name of the party at whose instance the case is heard. A proceeding of which an adverse party has notice, but at which he declines to appear, is not considered ex parte. Writs, INJUNCTIONS, etcetera, are said to be ex parte when they are issued without prior notice to an affected party.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

EX PARTE . . .

See under name of party

EXPATRIATION

Expatriation was defined by the Supreme Court in Perkins v. Elg (1939) as "the voluntary renunciation or abandonment of nationality and allegiance." It refers to the loss of CITIZENSHIP as a result of voluntary action taken by a citizen, either native-born or naturalized. By expatriation, a citizen becomes an ALIEN; he divests himself of the obligations of citizenship and loses the rights connected with those obligations. In general, he can regain citizenship only by the process of NATURALIZATION.

At COMMON LAW, a person owed perpetual allegiance to the country of his birth and could not expatriate himself without the consent of that country. Initially, there was an inclination in the United States to follow this rule. In 1868, however, Congress explicitly broke with that tradition and declared by statute that "the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Congress did so in order to establish that persons naturalized in the United States did not continue to owe allegiance to foreign governments. Congress seemed to rely on the simple mechanism of formal renunciation to determine whether a citizen actually wished to expatriate himself. Because the statute made expatriation dependent upon the voluntary action of the individual, it raised no constitutional questions about Congress's power over expatriation.

Determination of volition, however, has never been limited to formal renunciation, and through a series of nationality statutes, culminating in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, Congress has identified various actions that indicate a citizen's desire voluntarily to expatriate himself. These actions include obtaining naturalization in a foreign state, taking an oath of allegiance to a foreign state, serving in a foreign army, voting in a foreign election, desertion from the armed forces, TREASON against the United States, assuming public office under the government of a foreign state for which only nationals of that state are eligible, formal renunciation of citizenship either in the United States or abroad, and leaving or remaining outside the United States during either a war or a national emergency for the purpose of evading military service.

Congress's power to declare that such actions constitute voluntary renunciation, even when the individual who so acts claims not to have intended to renounce his citizenship, was rarely challenged by the courts until the 1960s. Nationality laws were shielded from judicial scrutiny because the courts believed it was beyond their competence to examine matters so intimately related to foreign affairs. However, in the landmark decision of AFROYIM V. RUSK (1967), the Supreme Court restored citizenship to a naturalized citizen who was considered by the government to have expatriated himself by voting in an Israeli parliamentary election. The Court held that although Congress can provide a mechanism by which an individual can voluntarily expatriate himself, volition is a judicially ascertainable quality and the government bears the BURDEN OF PROOF that the citizen's renunciation was truly voluntary. Put simply, Afroyim made the statutory presumption of volition rebuttable rather than conclusive.

While the BURGER COURT seemed to retreat from these principles in Rogers v. Bellei (1971), in Vance v. Terrazas (1980) it reaffirmed Afroyim and held that the government must prove specific intent to surrender citizenship and not simply the voluntary commission of an expatriating act. At the same time, the Court upheld the rebuttable presumption that an act of expatriation is performed with the specific intention of relinquishing citizenship and held that Congress is free to prescribe as the evidentiary standard for proving this intention the "preponderance-of-the-evidence" standard of proof.

RALPH A. ROSSUM
(1986)

Bibliography

GORDON, CHARLES and ROSENFIELD, HARRY N. 1984 Immigration Law and Procedure, Vol. 3, chap. 20. New York: Matthew Bender.

SCHWARTZ, DAVID F. 1975 American Citizenship after Afroyim and Bellei: Continuing Controversy. Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 2:1003–1028.

EXPOSITION AND PROTEST
(1828–1829)

JOHN C. CALHOUN drafted the Exposition in 1828. The next year, the legislature of South Carolina published the Exposition in amended form along with its own resolution of protest against the TARIFF ACT OF 1828. Like most of the great controversial documents in American politics it took the form of a discourse on the meaning of the Constitution. It argued the case for STRICT CONSTRUCTION of the powers of the federal government and spelled out the doctrine of NULLIFICATION.

Rejecting the argument that a protective tariff was justified by custom and precedent, the Exposition declared: "Ours is not a government of precedent. . . . The only safe rule is the Constitution itself." But even the Constitution was not a safe rule if its interpretation were left to Congress and the Supreme Court, which were its creatures. The only authoritative interpreter was the constituent body itself, the people of the states in convention.

According to the Exposition, if a convention in any state declared a federal law unconstitutional, the law was null and void in that state until the Constitution was amended to authorize the disputed act. Should an amendment pass the state would have no recourse but SECESSION.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

FREEHLING, WILLIAM W. 1965 Prelude to Civil War: The Nullification Controversy in South Carolina, 1816–1865. New York: Harper & Row.

EX POST FACTO

IN THE FEDERALIST #84 ALEXANDER HAMILTON argued that "the creation of crimes after the commission of the fact, or, in other words, the subjecting of men to punishment for things which, when they were done, were breaches of no law" has been "in all ages" one of "the favorite and most formidable instruments of tyranny." Indeed, ex post facto legislation has generally been regarded as a violation of the fundamental DUE PROCESS requirement that there must be fair warning of the conduct which gives rise to criminal penalties. The Framers of the Constitution believed so strongly that ex post facto laws were contrary to the principles of republican government that they proscribed their use in two different provisions of the Constitution: Article I, section 9, as a specific exception to the powers of the United States Congress, and Article I, section 10, as a specific prohibition on the powers of state legislatures.

Justice SAMUEL CHASE in CALDER V. BULL (1798) provided what has since come to be regarded as the authoritative delineation of the kinds of LEGISLATION that fall within the Constitution's prohibition against ex post facto enactments:

> 1st. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; and punishes such action. 2d. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was, when committed. 3d. Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment, than the law annexed to the crime, when committed. 4th. Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and received less, or different, testimony, than the law required at the time of the commission of the offence, in order to convict the offender.

Although there is some question about the Framers' intent, the Supreme Court has consistently followed Chase's lead in restricting the ex post facto rule to criminal laws. Thus the Court has held that the deportation of ALIENS, the loss of a passport, and the denial of certain benefits do not fall within the ex post facto exception because they are not punishments in a criminal sense even though they may be "burdensome and severe." In the TEST OATH CASES (1867), however, the Court held that oaths that disqualified people from holding certain offices or practicing certain professions constituted ex post facto laws.

The essential ingredient of an ex post facto law is its retrospective character; but not all retrospective laws are ex post facto in the technical meaning of the term. An ex post facto law not only is retrospective but also injures those to whom it is directed by imposing or increasing criminal penalties. For example, Weaver v. Graham (1981) invalidated retroactive application to a prisoner of a law reducing "good time" credits against a sentence. Retrospective laws that ameliorate penalties, however, are not ex post facto.

The rights affected by retrospective legislation must be substantial. As the Court held in Beazell v. Ohio (1925), statutory changes in trial procedures or rules of EVIDENCE "which do not deprive the accused of a defense and which operate only in a limited and unsubstantial manner to his disadvantage, are not prohibited." Thus, the ex post facto prohibition secures "substantial personal rights against arbitrary and oppressive legislation without limiting legislative control of remedies and procedures that do not affect matters of substance." Of its own weight, the ex post facto prohibition applies only to legislative acts, and not to changes in the law effected by judicial decisions. But where an unforeseeable statutory construction by a court is applied retrospectively in a manner that is tantamount to ex post facto legislation, that construction is barred by the due process clause. Although the particular application of the ex post facto clause has generated much controversy and debate, and involves, on occasion, the most intricate and detailed considerations, there seems to be almost universal agreement that the Constitution's prohibition against ex post facto legislation remains one of the mainstays of constitutional government.

EDWARD J. ERLER
(1986)

Bibliography

FIELD, OLIVER P. 1922 Ex Post Facto in the Constitution. Michigan Law Review 20:315–331.

NOTE 1975 Ex Post Facto Limitations on Legislative Power. Michigan Law Review 73:1491–1516.

EXTRADITION

See: Fugitive from Justice

EXTRATERRITORIALITY

Around the turn of the century, the Supreme Court placed strict territorial limits on the application of United States constitutional and statutory law. In the case of In re Ross (1891) the Court held that a citizen could be tried by an American consular court, without INDICTMENT by GRAND JURY and without TRIAL BY JURY, for crimes aboard an American ship in Japan. The Court flatly declared that "[t]he Constitution can have no operation in another country." And in American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co. (1909) Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES asserted that "[a]ll legislation is prima facie territorial." Although he acknowledged that exceptions could be found in the case of laws applying on the high seas or in "uncivilized" countries, Holmes said "the general and almost universal rule is that the character of an act as lawful or unlawful must be determined wholly by the law of the country where the act is done." No doubt these sweeping statements, even then, were not literally followed. In any event, today DOCTRINES limiting the extraterritorial application of both the Constitution and statutory law have been abandoned.

In REID V. COVERT (1956) the Court effectively overruled Ross and held that Congress could not deprive a citizen of the right to a jury trial in a court-martial abroad where CAPITAL PUNISHMENT was potentially involved. Justice HUGO L. BLACK said: "When the Government reaches out to punish a citizen who is abroad, the shield which the Bill of Rights and other parts of the Constitution provide to protect his life and liberty should not be stripped away just because he happens to be in another land." This decision signaled the end of territorial limitations on the Constitution.

In United States v. Toscanino (2d Cir. 1974) a lower court applied the FOURTH and Fifth AMENDMENTS where American officials instigated enforcement activity by foreign officials that included torture and violated United States treaty obligations. Although other courts have declined to apply CONSTITUTIONAL REMEDIES in the circumstances of particular cases before them, they agree that the Bill of Rights may apply where the United States government instigates conduct that "shocks the conscience." The JUST COMPENSATION clause of the Fifth Amendment has also been held applicable to TAKINGS OF PROPERTY abroad in several lower court cases. As a general rule, therefore, the Constitution now unquestionably applies to acts of government abroad.

At the same time the special circumstances that are invariably present in these cases influence the scope of constitutional protection afforded. Although the court only occasionally confronts these questions, it seems clear that protection against government action abroad is more difficult to obtain than in similar cases without a foreign element. This is especially true when foreign policy or national security interests are at issue, as was the case in UNITED STATES V. CURTISS-WRIGHT EXPORT CORP. (1936). Indeed, in HAIG V. AGEE (1981) the Supreme Court questioned whether the FIRST AMENDMENT would apply at all to government suppression of speech abroad, where the speech threatened American intelligence activity.

Perhaps the most accurate description of the modern approach to extraterritorial application of constitutional law was made by Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN in Reid v. Covert. He took exception to the broad suggestion that "every provision of the Constitution must be deemed automatically applicable to American citizens in every part of the world." He believed that "the question is which guarantees of the Constitution should apply in view of the particular circumstances, the practical necessities, and the possible alternatives which Congress had before it." The Harlan view seems more likely to prevail in a world of increased American involvement and interdependence than the absolutist approach of Justice Black.

A related issue of historical interest was whether the Constitution applied to TERRITORIES acquired by the United States. Constitutional guarantees limiting legislative and executive power were applicable only when Congress, expressly or by clear implication, "incorporated" the acquired territory into the United States. In unincorporated territories only undefined "fundamental" liberties were guaranteed.

Finally, the courts have repeatedly applied federal statutes to conduct abroad, assuming other jurisdictional prerequisites were met. Occasionally limitations on the application of a particular statute have been imposed, but those limitations have normally been based on the presumed intent of Congress or on international comity, not the Constitution.

PHILLIP R. TRIMBLE
(1986)

Bibliography

COUDERT, FREDERICK R. 1926 The Evolution of the Doctrine of Territorial Incorporation. Columbia Law Review 26:823–850; Iowa State Bar Association Report 1926:180–228.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1972 Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Pages 266–269. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

KAPLAN, STEVEN M. 1977 The Applicability of the Exclusionary Rule in Federal Court to Evidence Seized and Confessions Obtained in Foreign Countries. Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 16:495–520.

NOTE 1985 Predictability and Comity: Toward Common Principles of Extraterritorial Jurisdiction. Harvard Law Review 98:1310–1330.

EXTRATERRITORIALITY
(Update)

At the start of the twentieth century, both federal LEGISLATION and the U.S. Constitution were presumed to apply only within the territory of the United States. In the case of In re Ross (1891), the Supreme Court stated that "[t]he Constitution can have no operation in another country." And in American Banana Company v. United Fruit Company (1909), the Court refused to apply the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT extraterritorially, declaring that "the general and almost universal rule is that the character of an act as lawful or unlawful must be determined wholly by the law of the country where the act is done." At the end of the twentieth century, however, federal statutes are frequently applied to both U.S. and foreign nationals outside the United States, although the protections of the BILL OF RIGHTS are not always afforded to foreign nationals abroad.

It is clear that Congress has constitutional authority to legislate extraterritorially, even if doing so violates INTERNATIONAL LAW (which it generally does not). The territorial reach of a statute is therefore a question of congressional intent. The Supreme Court sometimes assumes that Congress does not intend to regulate conduct outside the United States, applying the so-called presumption against extraterritoriality. For example, in Equal Employment Opportunity Commission v. Arabian American Oil Company (1991), the Court held that Title VII did not prohibit EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION by an American company against an American citizen abroad. Because the presumption's principal modern justification is the notion that Congress is primarily concerned with domestic conditions, it should not be applied when foreign conduct affects domestic conditions. And in Hartford Fire Insurance v. California (1993), the Court ignored the presumption and held that the Sherman Antitrust Act applied to anticompetitive conduct by foreign companies that caused substantial, intended effects in the United States, OVERRULING the specific holding of American Banana.

It is also clear that the Bill of Rights applies extraterritorially, but whether it applies to foreign nationals or only to U.S. nationals abroad depends on the theory one adopts. Under an "organic" theory, the Bill of Rights constrains the government wherever it acts. In REID V. COVERT (1957), a case involving a U.S. citizen overseas, Justice HUGO L. BLACK observed, "the United States is entirely a creature of the Constitution. Its power and authority have no other source. It can only act in accordance with all the limitations imposed by the Constitution." Under a "compact" theory, by contrast, the Constitution is viewed as a compact between the American people and their government that does not limit the government's treatment of foreign nationals.

In United States v. Verdugo-Urquídez (1990), the Court adopted a compact theory for the FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibition against unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES. The Court held that the Fourth Amendment did not apply to U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents searching the residences of a Mexican national in Mexico. Verdugo-Urquídez reasoned that because the text of the Fourth Amendment referred to the right of "the people" to be free from UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures, it applied only to U.S. citizens and to others who had established substantial, voluntary connections with the United States. Such reasoning implies, however, that other provisions of the Bill of Rights, like the FIRST AMENDMENT guarantee of FREEDOM OF SPEECH, the DUE PROCESS clause, and even the TAKINGS clause, which are not limited to "the people," may apply extraterritorially to U.S. and foreign nationals alike.

The due process clause may have particular relevance for the extraterritorial application of federal statutes. One interesting question is whether the extraterritorial application of U.S. law requires "significant contacts" such that its application is "neither arbitrary nor fundamentally unfair," as Allstate Insurance v. Hague (1981) required in the domestic, conflict-of-laws context. Another is whether Congress may constitutionally impose liability for conduct that is compelled by foreign law. The Court noted in Societé Internationale v. Rogers (1958) that dismissing the complaint of a party who could not comply with DISCOVERY orders because of Swiss bank secrecy laws would raise "serious constitutional questions" under the due process clause.

WILLIAM S. DODGE
(2000)

Bibliography

BORN, GARY B. 1992 A Reappraisal of the Extraterritorial Reach of U.S. Law. Law and Policy in International Business 24:1–100.

BRILMAYER, LEA and NORCHI, CHARLES 1992 Federal Extraterritoriality and Fifth Amendment Due Process. Harvard Law Review 105:1217–1263.

DODGE, WILLIAM S. 1998 Understanding the Presumption Against Extraterritoriality. Berkeley Journal of International Law 16:85–125.

KRAMER, LARRY 1991 Vestiges of Beale: Extraterritorial Application of American Law. Supreme Court Review 1991:179–224.

NEUMAN, GERALD L. 1991 Whose Constitution? Yale Law Journal 100:909–991.

EXTREMIST SPEECH

Extremist speech is generously protected under the FIRST AMENDMENT to the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court in this century. What speech should be classified as "extremist" is, of course, a difficult matter, one that will vary from culture to culture. In some countries advocating FREEDOM OF SPEECH may itself be "extremist." But in the United States the label of extremist speech is reserved for speech that advocates violent overthrow of the government, the commission of serious crimes (such as assassination), racism, and anti-Semitism or discrimination against other minorities or groups. And, in this country, it has been decided that this speech will receive constitutional protection.

Probably the most widely known contemporary instance of the protection of extremist speech arose in the late 1970s when a small group of neo-Nazis from Chicago announced their intention of conducting a march in the Chicago suburb of Skokie, home to some 40,000 Jews and several thousand survivors of WORLD WAR II German concentration camps. The city resisted, enacting a number of ordinances prohibiting, among other things, speech known as group libel, that is, speech that would "portray criminality, depravity or lack of virtue in, or incite violence, hatred, abuse or hostility toward a person or a group of persons by reason of reference to religious, racial, ethnic, national or regional affiliation." The AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, on behalf of the neo-Nazi group, challenged the city's interference with the proposed march as unconstitutional under the First Amendment. The Courts sustained the challenge. Both the Illinois Supreme Court and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in two separate cases, held that under modern Supreme Court precedents it was beyond doubt that even this most offensive speech was constitutionally protected, absent a showing that the speech was about to turn into illegal conduct.

In fact, cases involving extremist speech constitute the backbone of the First Amendment jurisprudence. This is true, in part, because the very first cases involving free speech issues to come before the Supreme Court (which did not occur until 1919) involved extremist speech. The Supreme Court, therefore, began the process of developing modern First Amendment jurisprudence in contexts where the issue at hand was to define the outer boundaries of the principle of free speech. Many cases followed over the next seventy years, of which the Skokie case was one.

As a result of these cases, much judicial and academic ink has been spent on deciding what should be the test for establishing the limits of the First Amendment. Various formulations have been devised. It has been said that First Amendment protection ends when there is a CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER to the society (the test OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES initially proposed in 1919); when speech explicitly advocates illegal action (the test proposed by Judge LEARNED HAND in 1918); when speech will in the due course of events threaten the overthrow of government (which was approximately the test the Court followed during the nadir of First Amendment protection in the era of MCCARTHYISM); or when speech threatens imminent serious illegal behavior and is directly intended to incite such action (the prevailing test today).

Cases involving extremist speech have been so important to the development of First Amendment jurisprudence because they have raised independent, or separate, theoretical issues about the role and meaning of the modern idea of freedom of speech. Two major issues should be noted.

First, drawing the boundaries of freedom of speech involves more than just knowing what the basic purposes of the First Amendment are. Because we live in an imperfect world, rules of law, including constitutional law, must prepare for tears and snags of a practical world. Language is rarely precise enough to foreclose mistaken applications of the rules we devise. Institutions must be relied upon to apply the rules, and the quality of institutional decisions will be dependent on the quality of the people who compose them. Thus, the extremist speech cases have posed a second issue: To what extent must unworthy speech be protected in order to insure that truly worthy speech—speech that advances the purposes of the First Amendment—will in fact be preserved? The difficulties of drawing that line, to achieve in a practical world the right level of free speech, are immense. One must consider to what extent legislative institutions will themselves be sensitive to freedom of speech, the degree to which citizens will be deterred from speaking by the perceived possibility of hostile government action, and the courage of judges to stand up to improper legislative attempts to interfere with valuable speech. Therefore, drawing the outer line at which constitutional protection stops generates its own important and fascinating issues, beyond the issue of deciding what purposes or values underlie the First Amendment. As a general proposition it may be said that modern First Amendment protection uses extremist speech to give "breathing space" to the right of freedom of speech.

But there is an even more important reason why extremist speech cases have commanded such attention over the past seventy years. It may well be the case that extremist speech protection furthers a distinctive First Amendment value, separate from its function of affording ample leeway to valuable speech. The classic rationales for free speech see the relationship between free speech and the discovery of truth and a democratic system of government. These have been forcefully articulated in cases involving extremist speech. But there is another potential First Amendment meaning, or value, at stake in these cases involving speech deeply threatening to basic values of American society. Extremist speech is often bad, as socially harmful as other bad acts that are regularly subject to social regulation. That means that free speech may be a special context in which the society chooses to let bad acts go unregulated as a symbolic act of self-recognition of the difficulties of dealing appropriately with bad acts—as, for example, by being too intolerant in the ordinary political process or by reacting with excessive harshness when bad acts are punished. This rationale of free speech focuses on the relationship between that principle and the general virtue of tolerance. It may well be, in other words, that the centrality of the extremist speech cases in the First Amendment jurisprudence arises out of the fact that they have added a new and significant, and distinctively American, role to the idea of freedom of speech.

LEE C. BOLLINGER
(1992)

Bibliography

BAKER, C. EDWIN 1989 Human Liberty and Freedom of Speech. New York: Oxford University Press.

BOLLINGER, LEE C. 1986 The Tolerant Society: Freedom of Speech and Extremist Speech in America. New York: Oxford University Press.

EYEWITNESS IDENTIFICATION

Eyewitness identification can be powerful EVIDENCE in a criminal prosecution. Yet an identification can easily be wrong, whether made soon after the crime or in court. Because identifications can have a potentially devastating impact and are of questionable reliability, courts are especially concerned with them. Triers of fact typically assume that an eyewitness to a crime can accurately discern and remember the physical characteristics of the perpetrator. However, extensive research proves that powers of observation and recall are quite deficient.

The legal system cannot fully rectify problems with identification; it cannot affect a witness's perceptual and recall capabilities. However, the law can try to control any conscious or unconscious attempt by the police or prosecution to supply what perception and memory cannot.

Although the courts have never directly supervised the use of identification techniques, the Supreme Court has tried to minimize mistaken identification by requiring that procedures most likely to produce inaccurate results comport with certain constitutional requirements. Both the Sixth Amendment RIGHT TO COUNSEL and the DUE PROCESS clauses of the Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT provide defendants with substantive bases for questioning identifications.

In UNITED STATES V. WADE (1967) the defendant participated in a postindictment LINEUP conducted without notice and in the absence of his counsel. The Supreme Court held that the Sixth Amendment required invalidation of the defendant's subsequent conviction because a postindictment lineup was a "critical stage," when substantial prejudice to defendant's rights could result and counsel could help to avoid the prejudice.

However, the Supreme Court held in KIRBY V. ILLINOIS (1972) that the right to counsel does not extend to pretrial identification procedures employed before adversarial judicial proceedings are initiated. In Kirby the defendant was arrested and later identified in a police station confrontation at which the defendant was not advised of his right to counsel and his attorney was not present. The Court clarified the "initiation of adversarial proceedings" in Moore v. Illinois (1977), where the defendant was identified by a victim during a preliminary hearing where his counsel was not present. In Moore the Court held that adversarial proceedings had begun at the preliminary hearing, rather than only after the indictment.

In UNITED STATES V. ASH (1973) a witness observed a photographic array prior to trial, and defendant's counsel was not present. The Court held that there is no right to counsel at such displays and that right to counsel is limited to "trial-like confrontations." In a photographic display, the defendant is not present and does not confront the prosecutor or the adversarial system.

The Supreme Court held in Stovall v. Denno (1967) that the guarantee of due process of law protects an accused from identification procedures that are "so unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identification" as to deny a defendant due process of law. In Stovall the Court held that a one-to-one emergency confrontation between the accused and an injured witness in a hospital room did not violate due process because it was not unnecessarily suggestive and was not substantially likely to lead to misidentification.

The due process questions of suggestibility returned to the Court in the following years. In Simmons v. United States (1968) the felons who had robbed a bank were still at large. The police showed six snapshots to witnesses, who identified the defendants from the photos. Guidelines of the International Association of Chiefs of Police require a photographic array to include eight photographs. However, in this case, the Court found that the compelling need for identification of the robbers justified the suggestive procedure as long as there was little danger of misidentification and rejected the defendants' due process claim. Then in Neil v. Biggers (1972) the Court emphasized reliability over suggestibility in analyzing a due process claim. In Neil the Court accepted the reliability of a station-house show-up at which the defendant was identified in an accidental encounter at a water fountain seven months after the crime. The Court denied the defendant's due process claim.

In Manson v. Brathwaite (1977) the Court reaffirmed that the reliability of an identification is the "linchpin" of due process analysis. In Manson an undercover police officer purchased heroin from a seller while standing near him in a well-lit hallway for two or three minutes. A few minutes later the undercover officer described the seller to another officer, who gave the undercover officer a picture of the defendant. Two days later, the undercover officer identified the picture as a photograph of the person from whom he had bought heroin. The Manson Court held that a single photographic display of an accused did not create a substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification, for it was done by a trained police officer. To prevail on a due process claim, then, a defendant must prove both unnecessary suggestiveness and substantial likelihood of misidentification.

The remedy for violation of either the Sixth Amendment right to counsel or the due process standards is exclusion of the pretrial evidence and of any in-court identification derived from the tainted pretrial identification. To limit the application of this severe remedy, the Supreme Court has developed the "independent source" test, by which an in-court identification is admissible if it derives from a source independent of the tainted identification. A source is independent if there has been prior opportunity to observe the criminal act, an easy identification, and no past misidentification. However, in Moore the Court held that criminal prosecution may begin as early as the initial appearance, at least for the purpose of determining the right to counsel.

At a suppression hearing, usually held prior to trial, the court determines admissibility of pretrial identification evidence. Generally, the prosecution bears the burden of establishing the presence of counsel or intelligent waiver by the accused or of showing that an in-court identification derives from a source independent of tainted pretrial identification. The burden of proving a violation of due process, however, is on the defendant. In some jurisdictions, if the defendant can show that an identification process was unnecessarily suggestive, then the burden shifts to the government to show the justification of exigent circumstances.

Admissibility and credibility are separate questions. Identification evidence found admissible, usually by the judge, is not necessarily credible. The jury decides whether it believes that the witness has made an accurate identification.

Properly conducted lineups are least likely to result in misidentification. A court has the authority to order an accused to participate in a lineup. A court may, in its discretion, order a lineup at the request of the defendant, but the defendant has no constitutional right to a lineup either before trial or in the courtroom during trial. A court may also allow the defendant to sit in the audience. Sound litigation tactics require counsel for the defendant to observe the lineup procedure for reliability but not participate or use the lineup for DISCOVERY.

CHARLES H. WHITEBREAD
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Procedural Due Process of Law, Criminal.)

Bibliography

BUCKOUT, ROBERT 1980 Nearly 2,000 Witnesses Can Be Wrong. Bulletin of the Psychonomic Society 16:307–310.

WHITEBREAD, CHARLES H. 1986 Criminal Procedure. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

Original 1986 Editorial Board

Henry J. Abraham

Charles L. Black, Jr.

Robert H. Bork

William J. Brennan, Jr.

Henry Steele Commager

Martha A. Field

Ruth Bader Ginsburg

Erwin N. Griswold

Gerald Gunther

Harold M. Hyman

Philip B. Kurland

Alpheus T. Mason

Paul L. Murphy

C. Herman Pritchett

Harry N. Scheiber

Martin Shapiro

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

SECOND EDITION

Edited by
Leonard W. Levy
and
Kenneth L. Karst

Adam Winkler, Associate Editor for the Second Edition

Dennis J. Mahoney, Assistant Editor for the First Edition
John G. West, Jr., Assistant Editor for Supplement I

MACMILLAN REFERENCE USA
An imprint of the Gale Group
New York

Macmillan Library Reference USA
1633 Broadway
New York, NY 10019

Printed in the United States of America

Printing Number
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Encyclopedia of the American Constitution / edited by Leonard W. Levy and Kenneth L. Karst.—2nd ed. / Adam Winkler, associate editor for the second edition.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 0-02-864880-3 (hard cover : alk. paper)
1. Constitutional law—United States—Encyclopedias. I. Levy, Leonard Williams, 1923– II. Karst, Kenneth L. III. Winkler, Adam.
KF4548 .E53 2000
342.73—dc21 00-029203

This paper meets the requirements of ANSI-NISO Z39.48-1992 (Permanence of Paper).

F

FAIR COMMENT

See: Libel and the First Amendment

FAIR HEARING

In numerous contexts the Constitution requires the state to afford its citizens DUE PROCESS, which frequently includes an adversarial voicing of opposed contentions. "Fair hearing" in this broadest sense could thus include both the specific constitutional guarantees that attach to criminal trials and the more general requirement that civil litigation meet minimal standards of fairness. Among lawyers, however, the term more narrowly refers to the procedure that must be afforded to persons involved not in judicial trials but in some less formal dispute with the state. Speaking to that issue, the Supreme Court has asked when the Constitution requires any process and what that process should be. For some time the Court focused on the first question, assuming that if any process was due, it would resemble a formal trial; later decisions emphasized the flexibility of appropriate process.

For due process requirements to attach to any proceedings, they must, by involving governmental action that threatens life, liberty, or property, fall within the requirements of the Fifth and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS. Following in the wake of the welfare state, the Court has expanded its definition of property to include entitlements to various government benefits (for example, welfare and disability payments, tenured positions in state employment). Many threatened deprivations of such benefits consequently require due process, and the question becomes what that process must be. The Court has never answered that question in categorical terms, insisting that each situation calls for a rather individualized judgment. It has, however, suggested some minimal criteria and a set of factors to be considered in striking the balance from case to case. In deciding what process is due, one must consider "first, the private interest . . . affected by the official action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and finally, the government's interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirements would entail" (MATHEWS V. ELDRIDGE, 1976). These factors represent an attempt to arrive at conclusions about two aspects of process: timing and elaborateness.

At a minimum, due process requires notice that tells the person threatened with deprivation the reason for the action and how he can challenge its factual and legal bases. Usually notice and such an opportunity must precede the deprivation, but even this proposition is not invariable; thus in a case of a threat to public health or other emergency situation, a seizure could occur first and notice and hearing afterward.

More difficult than the question of the timing of the required process is its nature. Because the Court has been unable to articulate guidelines applicable to all situations, it defines appropriate processes on a case-by-case basis. Consequently one can fully understand the requirements of due process only by sampling a large number of cases. It is, however, possible to suggest some rough guidelines and some distinctions. The first might be the line between situations requiring formal adjudicatory hearings, as for the termination of WELFARE BENEFITS in GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970), and those that do not: the more serious the deprivation, the more likely the Court is to require a trial-type hearing. Even when such a hearing is not required, one can further differentiate situations according to the formality of the process required: the state must provide a written statement of reasons for ending disability benefits and give the recipient a chance to respond (Mathews v. Eldridge), but a school official need engage only in a brief oral conversation before suspending a student, as in GOSS V. LOPEZ (1975). Indeed, the Court has approved procedures that are not even adversarial in the normal sense, for example, an expulsion proceeding in which a medical student has an opportunity to demonstrate her medical skills to several local doctors over several days. (See BOARD OF CURATORS V. HOROWITZ.)

The consequence of such flexibility is that a constitutionally "fair hearing" need not entail a hearing at all, and even if it does that hearing may occupy various points along a continuum of adjudicatory formality. Such flexibility results from the Court's attempts, once it has concluded that due process attaches, to tailor the process to the situation at hand, taking some account of the stakes for the adversaries and of the goals of process. Some commentators have criticized the Court for the narrowness of its focus, arguing that the goals of process include the dignity of the participants as well as the accuracy of the result; the Court has seemed unpersuaded of this point.

The constitutional focus on fair hearings in administrative law has drawn attention to a number of areas presenting similar profiles—to which, however, due process does not apply, either because the institutions involved are private or because life, liberty, or property is not threatened. Nevertheless, under the influence of the constitutional cases many institutions (such as private schools or trade associations) have adopted processes that resemble those that might be required if due process did apply. Some of these procedures have resulted from legislation or regulation and an occasional judicial decision using COMMON LAW; others have come voluntarily. In either case the consequence has been a softening of the lines between the practices of public and private institutions; there is thus a sense in which one can speak of a fair hearing as a practice (though not a constitutional requirement) of many areas of institutional life.

If fairness does not always require a hearing, it is nevertheless true that the constitutional ideal described by the term has permeated many areas of life where neither fairness nor a hearing is constitutionally required. The result, in a society of large institutions and sometimes uncertain responsibility for decisions, has been a requirement taking many forms but having at its basis the idea that persons about to be adversely affected have the right to know why and to respond.

STEPHEN C. YEAZELL
(1986)

Bibliography

FRIENDLY, HENRY 1975 Some Kind of Hearing. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 123:1267–1317.

MASHAW, JERRY L. 1976 The Supreme Court's Due Process Calculus for Administrative Adjudication in Mathews v. Eldridge: Three Factors in Search of a Theory of Value. University of Chicago Law Review 44:28–59.

VERKUIL, PAUL 1975 The Ombudsman and the Limits of the Adversary System. Columbia Law Review 75:845–861.

FAIR HOUSING LAWS

See: Open Housing Laws

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT
52 Stat. 1060 (1938)

The Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), usually called the federal wage and hour law, was adopted in 1938. For all covered employees the act required the payment of a minimum wage (initially 25 cents an hour) and time and one-half for all hours worked over forty a week. Child labor was forbidden under certain circumstances. The act prohibited the shipment in INTERSTATE COMMERCE of goods produced under substandard conditions. There were numerous and complicated exemptions.

The constitutionality of the act under the COMMERCE CLAUSE was sustained by the Supreme Court in UNITED STATES V. DARBY LUMBER CO. (1940). Since then the act has been amended many times, principally to increase periodically the minimum wage, which reached $3.35 an hour in 1981, to expand coverage, and to provide more effective enforcement.

The act originally covered employees engaged in commerce or in the PRODUCTION of goods for commerce. Production was defined to include activities necessary to the actual production.

Coverage based on engagement in commerce includes employees engaged in the actual movement of commerce, such as transportation, shipping, and communications. It also includes employees whose work involves the distribution or receipt of goods across state lines. The Supreme Court upheld application of the act to employees who did construction or repair work on interstate instrumentalities and even to employees who prepared plans and specifications for the construction or repair of interstate instrumentalities.

Under the extended production definition, many fringe activities were found necessary to production. Thus, the Court upheld application to employees of an office building occupied by a corporation which at other locations produced goods for commerce and to employees of an independent contractor washing windows in industrial plants that produced goods for commerce.

These decisions, although they involved statutory construction, demonstrated the enormous scope of the commerce power even under coverage formulas less extensive than that used to describe the constitutional maximum, "affecting" commerce. The breadth of the Court's holdings led Congress in 1949 to amend the statute to confine the extended production definition to activities "closely related" and "directly essential" to production.

The reduced coverage effectuated by this change was largely nullified, however, by a 1961 amendment providing for "enterprise" coverage. Before 1961 coverage was determined for each employee; thus, some employees of an employer could be covered while others were not. "Enterprise" coverage extended to all an employer's employees, if at least two employees were covered individually and the enterprise did a requisite annual dollar volume of business. The constitutionality of "enterprise" coverage was upheld by the Court in Maryland v. Wirtz (1967).

Other aspects of the act have also received expansive interpretation. Thus, the term "employee" has been defined in accordance with "economic reality" rather than COMMON LAW rules, and applied to persons who in other contexts would be independent contractors. These cases illustrate the peculiar American phenomenon of defining "employee" differently under various statutes, so that an employee may be covered under one statute and not under another.

What constitutes compensable work time has presented a special problem under the FLSA. In Armour & Co. v. Wantoch (1944), involving firefighters, the Court held that inactive waiting time was compensable work time. Time spent in travel between the mine entrance and the underground cutting face was held compensable in Tennessee Coal, Inc. & Railroad v. Muscoda Local (1944). Finally, in Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co. (1946), the Court required payment for time spent by employees walking between the factory gate and their work place. Many lawsuits were promptly filed claiming billions of dollars in back wages. Congress responsed by enacting the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, which distinguished between an employee's compensable principal activity and noncompensable preliminary and after-working activities. Employers were thus absolved in most cases from liability under the Mt. Clemens Pottery decision. The Court held, however, that time spent changing clothes, when necessitated by the nature of the work, is a principal activity and thus compensable.

The FLSA applies on a work week basis. Overtime is required for hours in excess of forty a week. The required time and one-half premium is applied to the employee's "regular rate of pay" which is determined by dividing the total weekly compensation (including straight wages plus all fringe benefits) by the number of hours worked. Because employee pay plans are of great variety, determination of the regular rate of pay frequently is a difficult problem.

Among the principal exemptions from the FLSA are executive, administrative, and professional employees (which terms have special definitions), employees of small retail or service establishments, and some employees engaged in agriculture. Special provision is made for learners, apprentices, students, and the handicapped.

The act is enforced by individual employee suits for back wages, or suits by the secretary of labor seeking an INJUNCTION as well as back wages. Individual suits are preempted by suits by the secretary. Liquidated DAMAGES are authorized. TRIAL BY JURY is available in employee suits, but generally is denied in combined injunction-back-wage suits by the secretary. The FLSA is unique in labor legislation in providing criminal prosecution for willful violators. Such actions are handled by the Justice Department, but have not been a major aspect of the statute's enforcement.

Originally the FLSA applied only to private employment. In 1966 it was extended to employees of state hospitals and schools; this extension was sustained in Maryland v. Wirtz (1967). In 1974 Congress extended the FLSA to almost all state and local government employees. In NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976) the Court held that the TENTH AMENDMENT protected state sovereign functions against commerce power regulation and overruled Maryland v. Wirtz. Usery in turn was overruled by GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985). Congress responded the same year with legislation authorizing states and cities to reimburse employees for overtime with compensatory time off in lieu of cash payment.

In 1938 the principal purpose of the FLSA was to combat the Depression by increasing the purchasing power in the hands of the lowest-paid workers. Thus, it has been called the original antipoverty law. Fifty years later, the wisdom of the act and its effect on the economy are still debated, but the FLSA survives as a permanent and major piece of American labor legislation.

WILLIAM P. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

PLAYER, MACK 1975 Enterprise Coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act: An Assessment of the First Generation. Vanderbilt Law Review 28:283–347.

WILLIS, ROBERT N. 1972 The Evolution of the Fair Labor Standards Act. University of Miami Law Review 26:607–634.

FAIRNESS DOCTRINE

Born out of a progression of decisions by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) and then codified by Congress in 1959, the fairness DOCTRINE requires a BROADCASTING license holder "to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance." Although the doctrine was upheld against a FIRST AMENDMENT challenge in RED LION BROADCASTING COMPANY V. FCC (1969), it has been perceived increasingly as an intrusive exception to the First Amendment, with diminishing justification.

The doctrine, applicable to radio and television licensees and to some cable operators, requires a licensee that presents a controversial issue to provide a reasonable amount of time for contrasting viewpoints. A less frequently litigated aspect of the doctrine requires affirmative coverage of issues important to the public. Finally, the doctrine assures persons who are disparaged on the airwaves a limited right to respond.

The doctrine reflects a distinction in the way Congress and the courts have conceived of newspapers, on the one hand, and broadcasters on the other. Thus, in MIAMI HERALD V. TORNILLO (1974) the Supreme Court held unconstitutional on First Amendment grounds a Florida statute that required a newspaper to grant a right of reply to persons attacked in its columns. The Court did not distinguish Red Lion but ignored it.

Recently a campaign to narrow, if not eliminate, the fairness doctrine has gained momentum. When the fairness doctrine was in full sway, its justification was a supposed scarcity of the channels available for transmission of broadcast signals. Those who wished to communicate by the printed word were not curtailed by government action or the rationing of resources. On the other hand, the number of channels for radio and television transmission was demonstrably limited. Cable television and other new technologies have undermined the "scarcity" justification for regulation by providing abundant new channels.

Some have argued that the spectrum of broadcasting channels is a public resource, and thus that the federal government can insist that a private user of that resource give voice to many speakers. In another perspective, emphasis on the right of the licensee to be an unencumbered editor is misplaced. Expressing this view, in Red Lion, the Court said that "it is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of broadcasters, which is paramount." (See LISTENERS' RIGHTS.)

Recent commentary has proposed quite a different solution to the "fairness" issue: setting aside segments of broadcast time, or even whole channels, for public access. Owners of broadcasting stations would have no editorial control over these "soapboxes of the air." Broadcasters generally consider the fairness doctrine a badge of second-class citizenship in the ranks of the press. The FCC, in the early 1980s, confined the fairness doctrine's scope and considered its repeal. As an interim measure the FCC announced that asserted violations would not be adjudicated individually, but would be considered when a broadcaster sought renewal of a license. Still, despite these limits, the doctrine continues to influence the culture of television. Producers of national and local television news programs take great care to present at least two sides of important controversial issues.

MONROE E. PRICE
(1986)

Bibliography

BOLLINGER, LEE 1976 Freedom of the Press and Public Access: Toward a Theory of Partial Regulation of the Mass Media. University of Michigan Law Review 75:1–42.

FAIRNESS DOCTRINE
(Historical Development and Update)

From its establishment in 1934 the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) discouraged broadcast station owners from airing biased presentations of controversial issues. In 1939 the National Association of Broadcasters (NAB) echoed the FCC's fair treatment approach. Responding at least in part to Father Charles Coughlin's controversial anti-Semitic broadcasts, NAB adopted a voluntary code that discouraged stations from editorializing and encouraged balanced treatment of controversial issues. In 1940 the FCC applied these principles in its Mayflower decision, which banned on-air editorializing by station owners involved in BROADCASTING. Although the FCC's no-editorializing policy was never challenged in the courts, scholars have long criticized it as a clear violation of broadcasters' FIRST AMENDMENT rights.

In 1946 the FCC promulgated "The Blue Book," in which it suggested that broadcasters had an affirmative duty to cover subjects of a controversial nature. At this point NAB lobbied the FCC to overturn its Mayflower decision and to recognize a broadcasters' right to editorialize. In 1949 the FCC agreed to permit editorializing, but continued its commitment to fair treatment of controversial issues in its "Report on Editorializing," which included what came to be known as the "fairness doctrine." The doctrine required broadcasters to cover controversial issues of public importance and provide a reasonable opportunity for the presentation of opposing viewpoints on these issues. Broadcasters preferred blanket permission to editorialize and complained about the fairness doctrine on FREEDOM OF SPEECH grounds. However, the FCC enforced fairness doctrine violations only at license renewal time and even then was extremely reluctant to deny renewal on that basis. The lack of official enforcement of the doctrine left it constitutionally unchallenged until the 1960s.

In the 1960s the FCC increased its enforcement of the fairness doctrine, and it developed further the principle that fairness required broadcasters to offer response time to persons personally attacked by commentators. When the FCC ordered a station to provide response time for such an attack, the station brought a First Amendment challenge in RED LION BROADCASTING CO., INC. V. FCC (1969). The Supreme Court upheld the fairness doctrine as justified by the governmental interest in allocating and regulating the broadcast spectrum as a scarce resource. The constitutional significance of Red Lion is the lower degree of scrutiny given to laws burdening the First Amendment rights of broadcasters.

Since Red Lion, however, judges, scholars, and policymakers have expressed increasingly shrill opposition to the scarcity rationale for government regulation of broadcasting, with commentators arguing either that the rationale was never sound or that technological change has rendered it no longer sound. Heeding these calls, a deregulatory FCC abolished the fairness doctrine in 1987. It found that the doctrine was inconsistent with the FCC's mission to regulate broadcasting in the public interest, and that the doctrine had a CHILLING EFFECT on speech in violation of the First Amendment. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit reviewed this decision in Syracuse Peace Council v. FCC (1989), but it did not reach the First Amendment question, holding that the FCC had acted within its discretion when abolishing the doctrine, which was not required by statute.

The Supreme Court declined to review Syracuse Peace Council, and the Court has avoided revisiting Red Lion. Nonetheless, the Court has expressed skepticism about the continuing vitality of the scarcity rationale as applied to broadcasting. In addition, the Court has chosen not to extend Red Lion to new media. In TURNER BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC. V. FCC (1994), the Court applied heightened scrutiny to regulations of the cable industry, and in Reno v. ACLU (1997), the Court declined to apply Red Lion to regulation of the INTERNET. Scholars seeking to justify new media regulation have frequently turned from the scarcity rationale to other regulatory rationales, such as intrusiveness in the home and the need to protect children from violence.

In the late 1980s Congress tried twice to enact the fairness doctrine into law, but opposition from Presidents RONALD REAGAN and GEORGE H. W. BUSH on First Amendment grounds thwarted these efforts. A Republican Congress is unlikely to seek reenactment of the fairness doctrine, but a Democratic Congress with a Democratic President could conceivably revive it. The doctrine's demise appears to have encouraged the development of talk radio, which some scholars interpret as evidence that the doctrine did in fact chill speech.

Today the fairness doctrine is but a legacy that lives on in the Supreme Court's Red Lion PRECEDENT, which itself reflects an earlier era of First Amendment jurisprudence rather than current scholarly thinking on the subject.

AMY L. TORO
(2000)

Bibliography

BARRON, JEROME A. 1989 What Does the Fairness Doctrine Controversy Really Mean? Hastings Communications/Entertainment Law Journal 12:205–44.

HAZLETT, THOMAS W. and SOSA, DAVID W. 1997 Was the Fairness Doctrine a "Chilling Effect"?: Evidence from the Postderegulation Radio Market. Journal of Legal Studies 26:279–301.

KRATTENMAKER, THOMAS G. and POWE, L. A., JR. 1985 The Fairness Doctrine Today: A Constitutional Curiosity and an Impossible Dream. Duke Law Journal 1985:151–176.

ROWAN, FRED 1984 Broadcast Fairness, Doctrine, Practice and Prospects. New York: Longman.

SIMMONS, STEVEN J. 1978 The Fairness Doctrine and the Media. Berkeley: University of California Press.

FAIR RETURN ON FAIR VALUE

The DOCTRINE of a fair return on a fair value, which the Supreme Court propounded in SMYTH V. AMES (1898), provided that any government regulation of rate schedules charged by railroads or utilities must allow a reasonable profit or fair rate of return based on a fair valuation of the property. The principal considerations were the original cost of the property, and the cost of reproducing it at the time of the rate regulation. Having entered the business of supervising the details of ratemaking, the Court remained in that business until 1944.

The Court first provided the basis for the doctrine by equating rate regulation with EMINENT DOMAIN: just compensation must accompany a TAKING OF PROPERTY, and to the Court a rate regulation was comparable to a taking. In CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE, AND ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY V. MINNESOTA (1890) the Court declared that the failure to allow a company to charge reasonable rates for the use of its property constituted an unconstitutional taking of property or a violation of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS OF LAW comparable to a taking. In REAGAN V. FARMERS' LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY (1894) the Court voided rates because they were fixed so low that they virtually took property without compensation. (See GRANGER CASES.) In Smyth v. Ames the Court, in a unanimous opinion by Justice JOHN M. HARLAN, proclaimed that a company was entitled to receive a reasonable profit based on the rates it could charge and that a reasonable rate must be determined by the fair value of the property. To ascertain that value, Harlan declared that among the matters to be considered "and given such weight as may be just and right in each case" are the following: "the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses. . . ."

Prior to WORLD WAR I, the Court usually relied on original costs in determining whether a particular rate schedule yielded a fair return. The Court switched to reproduction costs after the war, when prices and costs rose, thereby challenging more rates. Smyth's vague and flexible standards allowed the Court to act as it wished, without restraints. In UNITED RAILWAYS & ELECTRIC COMPANY V. WEST (1930), for example, the Court voided rates allowing a profit of 6.26 percent on the ground that anything less than 7.5 percent was "confiscatory."

Fair value governed fair return standards against the opposition of Justices LOUIS D. BRANDEIS and OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, who attacked the doctrine as legally and economically unsound. In 1939, Justices FELIX FRANKFURTER and HUGO L. BLACK called for the rejection of the doctrine, and in 1942 the Court indicated that the determination of property value, although useful, was not indispensable. Finally, in FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION V. HOPE NATURAL GAS (1944), the Court rejected the fair value doctrine. Thereafter the Court permitted government ratemaking bodies to fix rates without judicial interference, on condition that the ratemaking process respected PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

HALE, ROBERT L. 1952 Freedom through Law. New York: Columbia University Press.

FAIR TRIAL

The requirement of a fair trial in criminal proceedings has its constitutional source in the due process clause of the Fifth and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS, which declares that no person shall be deprived of "life, liberty, or property, without DUE PROCESS OF LAW." Other provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS deal explicitly with particular aspects of a criminal trial. Historically, the coverage of those provisions has tended to expand, narrowing the application of the more general provision. The "incorporation" of provisions of the Fifth and SIXTH AMENDMENTS into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is especially noteworthy in this respect, having had the effect of eliminating the need for fair-trial analysis of issues in state cases covered by those provisions. While important elements of a fair trial are thus treated individually, the requirements can be summarized generally as a hearing before a competent, impartial tribunal, at which the prosecutor does not present the government's case inaccurately or unfairly and the defendant has an opportunity to present his case fully and effectively.

Ordinarily, any judge of a court having JURISDICTION is presumed to be competent to hear a criminal case. However, a judge is presumed not to be impartial if he has a substantial personal interest in a verdict against the defendant. The requirement of a fair trial prohibits a judge from sitting in that circumstance. In Tumey v. Ohio (1927) the Supreme Court held invalid a local practice assigning the mayor of a village as judge in criminal cases, because the compensation for his judicial services and other income for the village accrued only if the defendant were convicted and a fine imposed. In In re Murchison (1955) the Court overturned convictions for criminal contempt following a trial before the same judge who was the defendants' accuser and the principal witness against them.

The Sixth Amendment gives a criminal defendant the right to be tried by an "impartial jury." That provision, which applies to federal and state trials, entitles the defendant to a jury selected from a representative cross-section of the community, without inclusions or exclusions because of sex, nationality, race, or other impermissible classifications. (See JURY DISCRIMINATION.) The jury finally chosen need not have any particular composition or be representative of the community as a whole.

The defendant must have a reasonable opportunity to uncover bias or prejudice of an individual juror. This is afforded by VOIR DIRE, the examination of prospective jurors. The trial judge or the prosecutor and defense counsel question the members of the jury panel to reveal any basis for disqualification in the particular case. The trial judge has broad discretion to direct the conduct and scope of the examination, provided it is adequate to ensure the jurors' impartiality. Counsel for either side may challenge a juror "for cause" if there is a basis for disqualification and then exercise a limited number of "peremptory" challenges without explanation. In an effort to secure an impartial jury, the prosecutor may, under the DOCTRINE of SWAIN V. ALABAMA (1965), exercise peremptory challenges on the basis of group factors such as race or nationality.

However fair the formal means for ensuring an impartial tribunal, a trial conducted in an atmosphere of mob violence or insistent public pressure for conviction does not meet the constitutional standard. (See MOORE V. DEMPSEY.)

The Sixth Amendment gives a criminal defendant the RIGHT TO BE INFORMED OF THE ACCUSATION. This right, which is essential to a fair trial, requires that the statement of the offense charged identify the criminal conduct and the circumstances of the alleged crime precisely enough for the defendant to prepare his defense.

Although the constitutional guarantee of a fair trial does not ordinarily entitle the defendant to PRETRIAL DISCLOSURE of the EVIDENCE against him, all jurisdictions allow limited pretrial DISCOVERY of evidence and some allow rather full discovery subject only to special exceptions. Whenever evidence against the accused is disclosed, the defendant is entitled to enough time to prepare to meet it; if evidence is not disclosed before trial, the defendant may be entitled to a continuance. Furthermore, as the Court held in Wardius v. Oregon (1973), the defendant cannot be obliged to disclose evidence before trial unless the prosecution has a reciprocal obligation; fundamental fairness requires that discovery be "a two-way street."

Most of the evidentiary requirements of a fair trial are now subsumed under the CONFRONTATION and COMPULSORY PROCESS clauses of the Sixth Amendment, which, as incorporated into the Fourteenth, are applied to state criminal trials. A defendant has the rights "to be confronted with the witnesses against him" and "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." As part of his right to hear and challenge the evidence against him, the defendant has a right to be present at the trial. (He may lose this right by absenting himself voluntarily or interfering with the orderly conduct of the trial.) Like other constitutional rights, the right to be present cannot be unnecessarily burdened; accordingly, since Estelle v. Williams (1976) a defendant cannot be required to appear at trial in prison clothing. Where jurors have obtained information from a person who did not appear as a witness, some courts have treated the event as a violation of the right to confront witnesses.

The confrontation clause also limits the use of out-of-court statements of persons who are not present in court. With few exceptions, an available witness must testify in person, so that he can be cross-examined by the defense. If a witness is not available, his out-of-court statement can be used as evidence only if there are indications of reliability sufficient to satisfy the purpose of confrontation at trial. (See HEARSAY RULES.)

The right to compulsory process assures the defendant that he will be able to present evidence favorable to his case. On occasion, the Supreme Court has held that the application of a state procedural requirement or the trial judge's conduct of the trial denied the defendant an opportunity to present critical evidence and has reversed the conviction, relying on the compulsory process clause or directly on the due process clause.

The Sixth Amendment gives a defendant the right "to have the assistance of counsel for his defense," which requires that counsel be appointed for an INDIGENT defendant in any case in which a sentence of imprisonment is imposed. Before this provision was made applicable to the states by incorporation into the Fourteenth Amendment, an indigent state defendant had a right to appointed counsel only if counsel were necessary to a fair trial. The appointment of counsel was required for defendants who were unable to defend themselves effectively because of their ignorance, or illiteracy, or youth, or because the circumstances of the case made professional skills essential; capital cases were invariably deemed to require the appointment of counsel. Since the decisions in GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963) and ARGERSINGER V. HAMLIN (1972), the RIGHT TO COUNSEL applies alike in federal and state cases. It is possible although unlikely that in a minor case in which the Sixth Amendment's provision was inapplicable, the defense would be so difficult and complex that counsel would be required for a fair trial.

The requirements of a fair trial embodied in the due process clause continue to govern the conduct of the prosecution, which is not the subject of another, particular provision of the Bill of Rights. Although the prosecution is responsible for the presentation of the case against the defendant, its concern must be, as the Court said in BERGER V. NEW YORK (1967), "not that it shall win a case, but that justice shall be done. . . . It is as much [the prosecutor's] duty to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrongful conviction as it is to use every legitimate means to bring about a just one."

The prosecutor's obligation of fairness requires him to avoid conduct calculated or likely to mislead the jury. The knowing use of false evidence, including testimony of a witness, is ground for reversal of a conviction. If the prosecutor knows that a witness has testified falsely about a material fact, he must take steps to correct the falsehood. The obligation not to use false evidence extends to the government as a whole; even if the prosecutor at trial is unaware that evidence is false, a blameworthy failure of the police or others in the prosecutor's office or elsewhere in the government to avoid or remedy the falsehood is a denial of a fair trial.

The prosecutor has a parallel obligation to disclose evidence favorable to the defendant if, as the Court said in United States v. Agurs (1976), the "evidence is obviously of such substantial value that elementary fairness requires it." The constitutional obligation of fairness does not require the prosecution to disclose all evidence that might possibly be helpful to the defense. The test following a conviction is whether the undisclosed evidence "creates a REASONABLE DOUBT that did not otherwise exist." The duty to disclose evidence in response to a specific request by the defense is greater; if the evidence is material at all the prosecutor must either honor the request or inform the court of his refusal.

Aside from his obligation to present the evidence fully, the prosecutor must avoid arguments or conduct before the jury that might mislead it or prejudice it against the defendant. In his opening and closing arguments as well as his questioning of witnesses, the prosecutor is expected not to depart from the evidence or to lead the jury away from a dispassionate judgment based on the evidence. Isolated improper remarks of a prosecutor usually are not deemed to have denied a fair trial, especially if they do not appear to have been a deliberate violation and the trial judge has taken corrective action such as instructing the jury to disregard the remarks. In order to determine whether the standard of fair trial has been met, the prosecutor's conduct is examined in the context of the whole trial.

In a number of situations, the demands of a fair trial are opposed by conflicting demands based on the FIRST AMENDMENT's protection of FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. Pretrial publicity of a case may make it more difficult or impossible to impanel an impartial jury. A fair trial does not require that jurors have been entirely ignorant of the facts of a case but only that, having in mind the news coverage and atmosphere of the community, they be able to decide according to the evidence. The Supreme Court has occasionally reversed a conviction because members of the jury were presumed to have, or acknowledged that they had, strong preconceptions of the defendant's guilt because of extensive coverage of the case in local news media.

A similar problem has sometimes arisen during trial. In Sheppard v. Maxwell (1966) the Supreme Court concluded that prejudicial pretrial publicity in the news media as well as the "carnival atmosphere" created by the media in and around the courtroom during trial had denied the defendant a fair trial. In ESTES V. TEXAS (1965) the Court concluded that television coverage of portions of a sensational trial that had also been the subject of massive pretrial publicity was impermissible. There is, however, no absolute constitutional prohibition against radio, television, or photographic coverage of a trial, which may, as the Court held in CHANDLER V. FLORIDA (1981), be allowed if it is conducted in a manner consistent with a fair trial.

The Supreme Court held, in RICHMOND NEWSPAPERS, INC. V. VIRGINIA (1980), that the First Amendment protects the right of the public to attend criminal trials. (In contrast, the right to a PUBLIC TRIAL in the Sixth Amendment is a right of the defendant alone.) Therefore, all other measures for ensuring a fair trial, such as sequestration of witnesses or jurors, must be considered before the public can be excluded, whether or not the defendant asks for exclusion. The Court has indicated strongly that a trial court should exercise its authority in whatever manner will afford a fair trial without closing it to the public.

Unlike some of the more particular provisions of the Bill of Rights that have to do with criminal process, the requirement of a fair trial retains the flexibility of a general standard and is not susceptible to precise definition by a set of rules. While important aspects of a fair trial are covered by other constitutional provisions, some remain within the ambit of the general standard. Jurisprudentially, the principal difference is that, unlike some particular constitutional rules, the general standard does not invalidate a conviction for a single instance of prejudicial error or unfairness. Rather it is set in the context of the whole trial, and a conviction will be reversed only if the trial as a whole was unfair. The standard of a fair trial also serves as a reminder of the government's relationship with an individual even when it seeks to convict him of a crime and as the repository of changing or enlarged conceptions of what fairness in the criminal process requires.

LLOYD L. WEINREB
(1986)

Bibliography

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION 1968 Standards Relating to Fair Trial and Free Press. New York: Institute of Judicial Administration.

FELLMAN, DAVID 1976 The Defendant's Rights Today. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

KAMISAR, YALE; LAFAVE, WAYNE R.; and ISRAEL, JEROLD H. (1965) 1986 Modern Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1974 Against the Law. New York: Harper & Row.

WEINREB, LLOYD L. (1969) 1987 Criminal Process. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

FAMILY AND THE CONSTITUTION

Family relations have an uncertain, even ambivalent constitutional status in Supreme Court decisions. If the Constitution protects the family against external interference, it also permits the establishment of public moral standards to regulate social relations among adults and to protect children from apparently harmful parental conduct.

This ambivalence appeared early. In MEYER V. NEBRASKA (1923) the Supreme Court opined that FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT "liberty" included the right "to marry, establish a home and bring up children." The Court did not explain, however, why this right stopped short at monogamy. In REYNOLDS V. UNITED STATES (1878) it had upheld Congress's power to forbid POLYGAMY in the TERRITORIES notwithstanding the religiously grounded objections of Mormon settlers. Nor did the Court subsequently explain how the right "to bring up children" was consistent with the compulsory STERILIZATION of a woman considered retarded by state authorities upheld in BUCK V. BELL (1927). One discernible principle did unify these early cases: the Constitution protects only family relations that judges consider "normal" and "wholesome." This principle might occasionally lead judges to substitute their views of normality for legislative impositions (as in Meyer where the state had forbidden schoolroom teaching of children in any language but English); it hardly serves, however, as a MAGNA CARTA for the protection from state interference of family sanctity and autonomy.

The prospect that constitutional doctrine might be elevated to serve this broader protective purpose emerged in the 1960s, as cases involving family relations began to appear in unprecedented numbers on the Supreme Court's docket. But in fact the decided cases exemplify the same conflicting strains as before. The first of the modern cases was GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), striking down a state law that prohibited anyone including married couples from using contraceptives. The Court spoke of marriage as "intimate to the degree of being sacred" and found a constitutionally protected " RIGHT OF PRIVACY surrounding the marriage relationship." In subsequent cases, however, the Court has been reluctant to extend this familial privacy right beyond the conventionally conceived marriage bond. Although EISENSTADT V. BAIRD (1972) recognized the right of unmarried persons to practice contraception, in Doe v. Commonwealth's Attorney (1976) the Court summarily affirmed a lower court's rejection of a constitutional attack on a state law criminally proscribing homosexual relations even among consenting adults in private. Similarly in Belle Terre v. Boraas (1974) the Court upheld a municipal ZONING restriction excluding communal families unless they were "related by blood, adoption or marriage"; and yet in MOORE V. CITY OF EAST CLEVELAND (1977) the Court struck down zoning restrictions that limited residence to nuclear families and excluded multigenerational families with blood ties. The theme that runs through these two zoning cases and through Griswold and Doe is that the Constitution protects "families" when they reflect conventional social definitions of decency and morality.

The Court does not unquestioningly defer to legislative conceptions of appropriately conventional family relations. The Court has struck down familial regulations reflecting RACIAL DISCRIMINATION as in LOVING V. VIRGINIA (1967), or SEX DISCRIMINATION regarding alimony entitlements as in Orr v. Orr (1979), or required consent for adoptive placement as in Caban v. Mahammed (1979). But even in these cases the Justices appear guided more by their own conceptions of appropriate social conventions for family relations than by any principle of protection of individuals against state interference with their autonomous choices in family matters.

The constitutional status of parent-child relations is the result of similar conflicting impulses. In the adult relations cases, the underlying conflict is essentially between principles of individual autonomy and of community, between the individual's FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION and the right of a group to define and enforce common standards of conduct on every group member. For state regulation of parent-child relations, these same conflicting principles are at stake, but the conflict extends even into these principles' very definition.

Thus the state can plausibly claim that it must restrict parental conduct to protect and enhance the child's developing capacity for individual autonomy. The claim is implicit in compulsory education laws, in laws permitting state intervention to override parental directives in disputes between parent and child (particularly adolescent children), and in laws proscribing child abuse or neglect. Parents, however, can plausibly claim that a child's capacity to develop as an autonomous individual is impaired by state impositions on parental conduct beyond the most minimal standards to protect the child's physical integrity. Thus even if constitutional DOCTRINE should give priority to individual autonomy over communitarian claims in adult relations, this priority does not resolve disputes regarding state regulation of parental conduct when both the state and the parents can plausibly claim to speak for the child's developing capacity for individual autonomy.

These disputes have occurred in three different contexts: claims by state authorities that parents' conduct was harmful to children; claims by parents that their children were harmed by state conduct, particularly in public schools; and claims by children, particularly older children, that state authorities should take their sides in disputes with their parents. In none of these contexts do the decided cases yield consistent constitutional principles.

The unresolved tension between competing principles was particularly evident in two Supreme Court decisions in successive terms that considered the application of constitutional norms to state abuse and neglect statutes. In Santosky v. Kramer (1982) the Court held that states must meet a higher burden of proof than the ordinary civil standard before the parent-child relationship could be terminated on grounds of harmful parental conduct; but in Lassiter v. Department of Social Services (1981) the Court had held that the parental relationship was not of sufficient constitutional weight to require the appointment of counsel to give indigent parents effective assistance against state actions for termination.

A similar if less blatant inconsistency is evident in the Court's rulings regarding the rights of parents to constrain state impositions on their children in public schools. Thus in INGRAHAM V. WRIGHT (1977) the Court ruled that school officials were free to inflict corporal punishment on students notwithstanding parental objections that the punishment was physically and psychologically harmful to their children; but in WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972) the Court had ruled that school officials could not require Amish children to attend secondary schools in the face of their parents' objections that this imposition was harmful to the children and inconsistent with the parents' views on proper child-rearing practices.

In the Amish case, the Court emphasized the religious basis for the parents' claims, a factor that might serve to distinguish the parents' claim in the corporal punishment case. But parental claims to preclude state interference in their decisions regarding children were not similarly honored, notwithstanding the religious grounding of such claims, in PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. DANFORTH (1976) where the parents objected to their unmarried pregnant daughters' wish to obtain an abortion. The minors' abortion and the Amish case might be distinguished on the ground that the pregnant minors openly disagreed with their parents while the Amish students apparently concurred with theirs. But this view of the abortion case—that the Constitution not only permits but requires state intervention to protect the autonomous wishes of older children from being overridden by their parents—cannot readily be squared with the Court's subsequent ruling in PARHAM V. J. R. (1979) essentially upholding parents' authority to confine their adolescent children in psychiatric institutions, notwithstanding the children's objections and claims for independent judicial protection.

These decisions raise at least the suspicion that the same guiding principle is at work in these parent-child-state cases as appeared in the cases regarding state regulation of adult familial relations—the principle that the Justices are not prepared to find constitutional protection for family status as such but only for those families whose conduct meets the Justices' particular approval. This principle could explain the Court's deference to Amish parents who generally succeed in imposing rigid behavioral controls on their children, as the Court repeatedly stressed in Yoder, or its deference to parents' wishes to confine their socially disruptive children in psychiatric institutions. A judicial preference for such behavior controls might also explain the Court's refusal to defer to parents' objections to school corporal punishment or to parents' resistance to abortions when they had failed effectively to constrain their unmarried daughters' indulgence in sexual relations.

The Court has not been unanimous in these cases, and no Justice has explicitly defended this particular child-rearing principle as a constitutional norm. Yet the logical plausibility of this harmonizing principle does suggest that current constitutional doctrine gives no special status to family relations as such, either between parents and child or among adults. The occasional rhetorical flourishes in Supreme Court opinions about the "constitutional sanctity" of the family does not yet reflect any consistent constitutional principle.

ROBERT A. BURT
(1986)

Bibliography

BURT, ROBERT A. 1979 The Constitution of the Family. The Supreme Court Review 1979:329–395.

GOLDSTEIN, J. et al. 1973 Beyond the Best Interests of the Child. New York: Free Press.

——— 1979 Before the Best Interests of the Child. New York: Free Press.

KARST, KENNETH L. 1980 The Freedom of Intimate Association. Yale Law Journal 89:624–692.

FARETTA v. CALIFORNIA
422 U.S. 806 (1975)

In Faretta the Supreme Court reversed the conviction of a defendant forced to accept the services of a public defender in a FELONY case, holding that the Sixth Amendment guarantees the right to self-representation when a defendant "knowingly and intelligently" requests it.

This is a major decision about the WAIVER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS because the argument of the state and the dissent was that society has an interest in a FAIR TRIAL, independent of the defendant's desires. Recognition of such an interest would necessarily mean that the trial judge must have discretion to reject even a knowing and intelligent waiver of the RIGHT TO COUNSEL.

Standby counsel may be appointed over the defendant's objection to aid him should he request help at the trial, or to intervene if the termination of self-representation becomes necessary.

BARBARA ALLEN BABCOCK
(1986)

FARRAND, MAX
(1869–1945)

Anyone who cares seriously to study the work of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 owes a debt to Max Farrand. Farrand, professor of history at Stanford (1901–1908) and Yale (1908–1925) Universities and later director of research at the Huntington Library, compiled and edited all the known Records of the Federal Convention (1911, revised 1937). That work was more influential than his narrative history books, which were intended for undergraduate or popular audiences.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

FAY v. NOIA
372 U.S. 391 (1963)

The Great Writ of HABEAS CORPUS allows state prisoners to seek federal court review of constitutional errors made at their trials, but the JUDICIAL CODE requires EXHAUSTION OF REMEDIES in state court, in order to preserve comity between state and federal courts. Charles Noia's 1942 murder conviction was based solely on a coerced confession procured in violation of his FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT rights to DUE PROCESS. He chose not to file a state APPEAL, however, because he feared that a new trial might end in a death sentence. Years later, he sought review of his due process claim in state courts, but they held that his original failure to appeal was a procedural default that barred further review. In Fay, a 6–3 Supreme Court held that his failure was not a "deliberate bypass" of state procedures and thus no bar to habeas corpus relief.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, speaking for the majority, posited a "manifest federal policy" that liberty rights should not be denied without the fullest opportunity for federal JUDICIAL REVIEW. The concept of comity could not justify denying habeas corpus relief for failure to exhaust a remedy no longer available. As for the state's interests in insuring finality of criminal judgments, or exacting compliance with its procedures through default rules, these could not outweigh the "ideal of fair procedure" and the historic habeas corpus policy favoring the free exercise of federal judicial power to enforce this ideal. Finally, the state's rejection of Noia's claim could not be treated as an ADEQUATE STATE GROUND, for this jurisdictional deference would unduly burden the vindication of federal rights. Only when a defendant deliberately evaded state adjudication would FEDERALISM concerns justify the denial of habeas corpus review.

As dissenting Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN noted, Fay marked a dramatic expansion of federal power to supervise state criminal justice. The concepts of exhaustion and adequate state grounds were modified to make room for a generous view that excused defendants from uncalculated WAIVER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS in state proceedings. The "deliberately bypassing" defendant was a rare one, and Fay's scope freed most defendants from forfeiting their rights through procedural defaults of every kind. Simultaneously, the WARREN COURT's application of the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments to the states codified a Bill of Rights for criminal defendants. Fay insured a broad federal path of enforcement for these new guarantees, in an era when the state path of review was not always open or receptive to constitutional claims.

The BURGER COURT era brought a less hospitable federal climate for criminal defendants and, not surprisingly, also brought a corresponding change in the habeas corpus barometer, emerging clearly in WAINRIGHT V. SYKES (1977). Fay's deliberate bypass rule did not endure as an exclusive measure of federalism interests, because a new "manifest" federal policy came to elevate the state's interest in finality above the ideal of fair procedure. With this new federalism, the whole point of habeas corpus review was transformed from the protection of constitutional rights to the protection of those with a claim to innocence.

CATHERINE HANCOCK
(1986)

Bibliography

COVER, ROBERT M. and ALEINIKOFF, T. ALEXANDER 1977 Dialectical Federalism: Habeas Corpus and the Court. Yale Law Journal 86:1035–1102.

FBI

See: Federal Bureau of Investigation

FEDERAL . . . ACT

See also under word following "Federal"

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) is a division of the Department of Justice supervised by the attorney general. Although a CABINET officer since the 1790s, the ATTORNEY GENERAL did not oversee federal law enforcement and did not even head a federal department until congressional legislation of 1870 created the Department of Justice. The attorney general's responsibilities originally involved arguing major cases before the Supreme Court and advising the President on constitutional questions. The combination of the RECONSTRUCTION experience with the enactment of legislation regulating INTERSTATE COMMERCE in 1887 and preventing corporate mergers in 1890, however, led attorneys general to recognize the need for experienced investigators to secure evidence to prosecute violators of the ANTITRUST and interstate commerce laws. Accordingly, in July 1908 Attorney General Charles Bonaparte, by EXECUTIVE ORDER, created a special investigation division within the Department of Justice, the Bureau of Investigation, formally renamed the Federal Bureau of Investigation in 1935.

Thereafter, the FBI's investigative reponsibilities increased as new laws expanded the definition of interstate commerce crime (the MANN ACT of 1910 and the Dyer Act of 1919) and law enforcement responsibilities (laws criminalizing kidnapping and bank robbing) and barred specified political activities that threatened the nation's internal security (the ESPIONAGE ACT of 1917 and the Smith Act of 1940). Yet this expansion raised no unique constitutional question both because it was legislatively mandated and because the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Espionage and Smith Acts, which impinged on speech and association.

The FBI's activities have raised constitutional issues because of the Bureau's monitoring of "subversive" activities, particularly since 1936. In striking contrast even to the abusive PALMER RAIDS of 1920, which had been based on the 1918 Immigration Act's alien deportation provisions, after 1936 the FBI did not seek evidence to effect prosecution; and its "intelligence" investigations were authorized solely under secret executive directives (President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's oral directive of August 1936) or public executive orders (President HARRY S. TRUMAN's March 1947 order establishing the Federal Employee Loyalty Program). In acquiring intelligence about dissident activities, the FBI's purposes became either to service White House interests and those of the increasingly powerful FBI director or, in the case of federal loyalty-security programs, to anticipate espionage by identifying "potentially disloyal" federal employees. In time, the FBI's dissemination activities extended beyond the executive branch—at first, during the 1940s, informally and then after the 1950s formally, to governors and to carefully selected reporters, columnists, prominent national leaders, and members of Congress. Rather than prosecuting individuals for violating federal laws, the FBI instead brought about the dismissal of "subversive" employees by disseminating information on state employees to state governors under a code-named Responsibilities Program and by exposing publicly other "subversives," often through covert assistance to the HOUSE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES, Senator Joseph McCarthy, and the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee. Adopting a more aggressive tack after 1956, FBI officials instituted two other formal programs, COINTELPRO and Mass Media, both having as their purpose the discrediting of targeted organizations and their adherents.

These programs were not subject to JUDICIAL REVIEW both because they had no law enforcement purpose and because they were conducted secretly. Furthermore, these covert efforts to "harass, disrupt and discredit" targeted organizations or to disseminate derogatory information about political activists to favored journalists, members of Congress, Presidents, governors, and prominent citizens were based on a commitment to contain political change.

The FBI's activities raised other constitutional questions in view of some of the Bureau's investigative techniques. Despite the legislative ban against WIRETAPPING of the COMMUNICATIONS ACT of 1934 and the FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibition of UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures, from 1940 forward the FBI installed wiretaps and bugs and conducted break-ins when investigating "subversive" activities and at times during sensitive criminal investigations. These techniques were authorized under secret directives issued either by Presidents (Franklin Roosevelt's May 1940 authorization of wiretapping), the attorney general (Herbert Brownell's May 1954 authorization of bugging), or solely by the FBI director (J. EDGAR HOOVER's 1942 authorization of break-ins). Theoretically, information so obtained could not be used for prosecution. However, two individuals inadvertently uncovered the FBI's ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING at a time when they were the subjects of criminal inquiries. Intercepted messages included attorney-client conversations, and in both cases, the disclosures led the courts to overturn the defendants' convictions.

Contrary to the rationale that gained currency during the 1960s of inherent presidential powers, when FBI officials first employed these electronic surveillance techniques in the 1940s they privately conceded their illegality and accordingly sought to preclude public discovery of potentially controversial practices. For example, when outlining how requests for his approval to conduct break-ins were to be submitted, FBI Director Hoover characterized this technique as "clearly illegal." Because break-ins offered the opportunity to acquire otherwise unobtainable information about "subversive" activities (membership and subscription lists, financial records, correspondence and memoranda), Hoover was willing to risk use of this technique. To avert discovery, however, the FBI director devised a special records procedure, "Do Not File," to ensure the undiscoverable destruction of such records and further to allow FBI officials to affirm, in response to congressional SUBPOENAS or court-ordered DIS-COVERY motions, that a search of the FBI's "central records system" uncovered no evidence of illegal conduct. This FBI practice raised additional constitutional question insofar as, beginning in the late 1950s, break-ins were employed during some criminal investigations.

ATHAN THEOHARIS
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: McCarthyism.)

Bibliography

THEOHARIS, ATHAN and COX, JOHN STUART 1988 The Boss. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

UNGAR, SANFORD 1975 FBI. Boston: Atlantic/Little, Brown.

FEDERAL COMMON LAW, CIVIL

In the English legal tradition to which this country is heir, judge-made COMMON LAW—law developed by courts in the absence of applicable LEGISLATION—has played a critical role in the determination of rights, duties, and remedies. But because our federal government is one of limited, delegated powers, the questions whether and under what circumstances the federal courts are empowered to formulate federal common law have been the subject of much debate. Although it is now settled that the federal courts do have such authority in civil matters, the debate continues over the sources of that authority and the proper scope of its exercise.

The Supreme Court's decision in ERIE RAILROAD CO. V. TOMPKINS (1938) marks a watershed in the evolution of this problem. Prior to that decision, the federal courts did not strive to develop a federal, or national, common law binding on the states and indeed on occasion denied that it existed (Wheaton v. Peters, 1834; Smith v. Alabama, 1888). Yet the Supreme Court, in SWIFT V. TYSON (1842), upheld the authority of the federal courts, in cases within the DIVERSITY JURISDICTION, to determine certain controversies on the basis of "general principles and doctrines" of jurisprudence and without regard to the common law decisions of the state courts. Thus, during the reign of Swift v. Tyson, the federal courts exercised considerable common law authority over a variety of disputes, ultimately extending well beyond the interstate commercial controversy involved in Swift itself and involving matters apparently not subject to federal legislative power. The decisions rendered in these cases, however, did not purport to bind the state courts, and the result was often the parallel existence of two different rules of law applicable to the same controversy, with the governing rule dependent on the forum in which the controversy was adjudicated.

Historians disagree on the justification—statutory and constitutional—of the Swift decision. In one view, the decision was not rooted in contemporary understanding of the nature of the common law but instead represented the use of judicial power to aid in the redistribution of wealth to promote commercial and industrial growth. A contrasting position is that the decision was fully consistent with the perception of the time that the common law of commercial transactions was not the command of the sovereign but rather was both the embodiment of prevailing customs and a process of applying them to the case at hand.

There is general agreement, however, that the Court expanded Swift well beyond its originally intended scope and that its OVERRULING, in Erie, reflected a very different perception of the proper role of the federal courts. The Court in Erie, speaking through Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, concluded that there was no "general" federal common law—that the Rules of Decision Act, originally section 34 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, required adherence to state decisional or common law in controversies such as Erie itself, a case that fell within federal JURISDICTION solely on the basis of the parties' diversity of citizenship.

But the Erie decision helped bring to the surface the existence of what has been called a "specialized" federal common law, operating in those areas where the application of federal law seems warranted even though no federal constitutional or legislative provision points the way to a governing rule. Indeed, on the very day that Erie was decided, the Court in Hinderlider v. La Plata River & Cherry Creek Ditch Co. (1938), again speaking through Justice Brandeis, said that "whether the water of an interstate stream must be apportioned between the two States is a question of 'federal common law' upon which neither the statutes nor the decisions of either State can be conclusive."

What is the source of the authority to formulate federal common law—law that, unlike decisions rendered pursuant to Swift, binds state and federal courts alike? To some extent, the source may be traced to specific constitutional provisions, such as the grant of ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION in Article III, or the prohibition of unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES in the FOURTH AMENDMENT. (See BIVENS V. SIX UNKNOWN NAMED AGENTS, declaring the existence of a damage remedy for a Fourth Amendment violation.) But the line between CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION, on the one hand, and the exercise of common law authority, on the other, is indistinct, and there is often disagreement among both judges and commentators about the function the courts are performing. The significance of this disagreement is more than semantic, for the ability of the legislative branch to modify or reject a Supreme Court ruling is plainly more circumscribed if the ruling is seen to be required by the Constitution than if the ruling is a common law one authorized but not compelled by the FUNDAMENTAL LAW.

In other instances, the source of judicial authority may be found in a particular federal statute. Infrequently, the congressional command is explicit, as in the mandate in Rule 501 of the Federal Rules of Evidence that in certain cases questions of evidentiary privilege "shall be governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience." More often, the legislative direction is, at best, implicit and the judicial role may be viewed as that of implementing federal legislative policy by filling the gaps left by the legislation itself. Once again, the line between statutory construction and the exercise of common law authority is not easily drawn.

In a significant number of cases, the exercise of authority to formulate federal common law is difficult to trace to a specific provision in the Constitution or in a statute. In such cases, the authority may be attributed more broadly to the nature of the judicial process, to the structure of our federal constitutional system, and to the relationships created by it. The authority, in other words, may be rooted in necessity. As Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON put it, concurring in D'Oench Duhme Co. v. F.D.I.C. (1942): "Were we bereft of the common law, our federal system would be impotent. This follows from the recognized futility of attempting all-complete statutory codes and is apparent from the terms of the Constitution itself."

Some examples of the exercise of this authority may help to clarify its scope. Perhaps most important is the category of those interstate or international disputes that, in the words of the Supreme Court, "implicate conflicting rights of States or our foreign relations" (Texas Industries, Inc. v. Radcliff Materials, Inc., 1981). Such disputes do not always fall within the specific jurisdictional grants of Article III applicable to certain interstate or international controversies. In any event, the existence of a conflict between the interests of two states may make it inappropriate for the law of either to govern of its own force. And controversies affecting our relations as sovereign with foreign nations may require a single federal response rather than a cacophony of responses rooted in varying state laws. (See ACT OF STATE DOCTRINE.)

Another leading instance of the exercise of common law authority embraces controversies involving the rights, obligations, or proprietary interests of the United States. In such controversies, especially those arising in the administration of nationwide programs, formulation of federal common law may be warranted by the need for uniform treatment of the activities of the federal government or, more modestly, for some degree of federal supervision of the application of state law to those activities.

The amorphous origins and uncertain scope of the federal common law power underscore the need to recognize certain limitations that are anchored in the concerns of FEDERALISM and of SEPARATION OF POWERS. The first of these concerns focuses on the interests of the states in preserving a measure of autonomy on matters properly within their sphere—interests reflected in the TENTH AMENDMENT. Because federal law is often interstitial in character—written against a background of state laws governing basic human affairs—the concern for federalism supports a presumption that state law ought not to be displaced in the absence of a clear legislative direction, a sharp conflict between the state law and federal program, or the existence of a uniquely federal interest requiring protection. To some extent, this presumption is supported by and reflected in the provision of the Rules of Decision Act that state laws shall constitute the rules of decision except where otherwise required by the Constitution or by federal treaty or statute. But the last phrase of that act—limiting its command to "cases where they (the rules of decision) apply"—gives the provision a circularity that affords little guidance to the resolution of particular problems of potential conflict between federal and state authority.

Even when the exercise of federal authority is warranted, a careful balancing of state and federal interests may lead to the adoption of state laws rather than to the imposition of a uniform federal rule, so long as the state laws in question are compatible with federal interests. Such results were reached, for example, in De Sylva v. Ballentine (1955), involving a definition of "children" under the Federal Copyright Act, and United States v. Kimbell Foods, Inc. (1979), dealing with the priority of federal government liens arising from federal lending programs.

The second concern—that of separation of powers—springs from the belief that the primary responsibility for lawmaking should rest with the democratically elected representatives in the legislative branch. At a time when the common law function was seen in terms primarily of the application of established customs and usages, the concern for the proper separation and allocation of federal powers had less force than it does today, when there is more emphasis on the creative potential of the common law. Moreover, the separation of powers question is not unrelated to the regard for state interests, since the bicameral federal legislature is structured in such a way as to protect the states against action that might be taken by a legislature apportioned solely on the basis of population.

Concern that the courts not usurp a function that is properly legislative has led to an emphasis on LEGISLATIVE INTENT in many instances in which the federal courts have been asked to articulate new rights or develop new remedies not specifically provided for by statute. Moreover, the Supreme Court has stressed the ability of Congress to displace federal common law with statutory regulations, even in some instances in which the source of authority is the Constitution itself.

The problems inherent in the exercise of common law power have been highlighted in the Supreme Court's struggle with the question of implied remedies for federal constitutional or statutory violations. Since Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents (1971), the Court has generally been willing to allow a person harmed by unconstitutional action to sue for damages, despite the lack of any constitutional or statutory provision for suit. But persons harmed by violations of federal statutes have frequently been held unable to obtain relief in the absence of an express statutory remedy or strong evidence of legislative intent to permit such a remedy.

In both types of cases the Supreme Court has perhaps too readily yielded its authority to exercise a principled discretion in determining whether traditional common law remedies should be available to implement federal policy. The tendency toward formalistic insistence on a remedy for every wrong in cases involving constitutional violations, and toward ritualistic invocation of legislative intent in order to deny a remedy in cases of statutory infractions, suggests a relinquishment of the judicial responsibility that lies at the heart of our common law heritage.

DAVID L. SHAPIRO
(1986)

Bibliography

BATOR, PAUL; MISHKIN, PAUL J.; SHAPIRO, DAVID L.; and WECHSLER, HERBERT (1953) 1973 and 1981 Supp. Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System. Pages 691–832. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

BRIDWELL, RANDALL and WHITTEN, RALPH U. 1977 The Constitution and the Common Law. Lexington, Mass.: Lexington Books.

FIELD, MARTHA A. 1986 Sources of Law: The Scope of Federal Common Law. Harvard Law Review 99:883–984.

FRIENDLY, HENRY J. 1964 In Praise of Erie—And of the New Federal Common Law. New York University Law Review 39: 383–422.

FREYER, TONY ALLAN 1979 Forums of Order: The Federal Courts and Business in American History. Greenwich, Conn.: Jai Press, Inc.

HILL, ALFRED 1967 The Law-Making Power of the Federal Courts: Constitutional Preemption. Columbia Law Review 67:1024–1081.

HORWITZ, MORTON J. 1977 The Transformation of American Law, 1780–1860. Pages 211–252. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

REDISH, MARTIN H. 1980 Federal Jurisdiction: Tensions in the Allocation of Judicial Power. Pages 79–107. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES

One of the leading Jeffersonian jurists, ST. GEORGE TUCKER, noted with alarm that Chief Justice OLIVER ELLSWORTH and Justice BUSHROD WASHINGTON had laid down the general rule that the COMMON LAW was the unwritten law of the United States government. The question whether the Constitution adopted the common law, Tucker wrote, > is of very great importance, not only as it regards the limits of the JURISDICTION of the federal courts; but also, as it relates to the extent of the powers vested in the federal government. For, if it be true that the common law of England has been adopted by the United States in their national, or federal capacity, the jurisdiction of the federal courts must be co-extensive with it; or, in other words, unlimited: so also, must be the jurisdiction, and authority of the other branches of the federal government [Tucker, Blackstone's Commentaries, 1803, I, 380].

Tucker's answer to the question was that the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES under Article III was limited to the subjects of congressional legislative power and that common law did not give jurisdiction in any case where jurisdiction was not expressly given by the Constitution. Tucker's view eventually prevailed, but it was probably not the view of the Constitution's Framers.

Article III extends the judicial power of the United States to all cases in law and EQUITY arising under the Constitution, treaties, and "Laws of the United States." The latter phrase could include common law crimes. At the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, the Committee of Detail reported a draft declaring that the Supreme Court's jurisdiction extended to "all Cases arising under the Laws passed by the Legislature of the United States." The Convention without dissenting vote adopted a motion striking out the words "passed by the Legislature." That deletion suggests that "the Laws of the United States" comprehended the common law of crimes, as well as other nonstatutory law.

The legislative history of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 suggests a similar conclusion. A draft of that statute relating to the jurisdiction of both the federal district and federal circuit courts (sections nine and eleven as enacted) gave these courts "cognizance of all crimes and offenses that shall be cognizable under the authority of the United States and defined by the laws of the same." The italicized phrase, deleted from the act's final text, might have restricted criminal jurisdiction to statutory crimes. Whether a federal court was to apply a federal common law of crimes or apply the common law of the state in which a crime was committed is not clear.

What is clear is that the first generation of federal judges assumed jurisdiction in cases of nonstatutory crimes. Justice JAMES WILSON, an influential Framer of the Constitution, at his state's ratifying convention had endorsed federal prosecutions at common law for criminal libels against the United States. In 1793 he instructed a federal GRAND JURY on the virtues of the common law, which included, he said, the law of nations. The grand jury indicted Gideon Henfield for breaching American neutrality by assisting a French privateer in the capture of a British ship; the INDICTMENT referred to "violation of the laws of nations, against the laws and constitution of the United States and against the peace and dignity of the United States." ALEXANDER HAMILTON prepared the indictment, which Attorney General EDMUND RANDOLPH (another Framer) helped prosecute. Justice Wilson, joined by Justice JAMES IREDELL and Judge RICHARD PETERS, constituted the federal CIRCUIT COURT that tried Henfield's nonstatutory offense. Henfield, having been at sea when President GEORGE WASHINGTON proclaimed American neutrality, pleaded ignorance. Secretary of State THOMAS JEFFERSON, who had urged Henfield's prosecution and endorsed Wilson's opinion as to the indictability of the offense, explained that the jury acquitted because the crime was not knowingly committed. JOHN MARSHALL, in his Life of Washington, described the prosecution as having been based on an offense "indictable at common law, for disturbing the peace of the United States."

Subsequent common law prosecutions were not so fuzzy. In 1793 a federal grand jury indicted Joseph Ravara, a consul from Genoa, for attempting to extort money from a British diplomat. Justice Wilson, joined by Peters, ruled that the circuit court had jurisdiction, although Congress had passed no law against extortion. Justice Iredell argued that the defendant's diplomatic status brought him within the exclusive ORIGINAL JURISDICTION of the Supreme Court. Ravara was tried in 1794 by a circuit court consisting of Jay and Peters, who instructed the jury that the offense was indictable at common law, part of the LAW OF THE LAND. The jury convicted. In 1795 a federal court in New York, at the instigation of Attorney General Randolph, indicted Greenleaf, the editor of the New-York Journal, for criminal libel, a common law crime. The case was dropped, but in 1797 the editor was again indicted for the same crime and convicted by a court presided over by Chief Justice Oliver Ellsworth, an influential Framer and chief author of the Judiciary Act of 1789. In Massachusetts in 1797 Ellsworth ruled that the federal circuit court possessed jurisdiction over crimes against the common law, which the laws of the United States included, and therefore might try persons indicted for counterfeiting notes of the Bank of the United States (not then a statutory offense).

In the same year a federal grand jury followed Justice Iredell's charge and indicted a congressman, Samuel J. Cabell, for the common law crime of SEDITIOUS LIBEL, but the prosecution was aborted for political reasons. In 1798, before Congress passed the Sedition Act, prosecutions for seditious libel were begun against Benjamin Bache, who soon died, and John Burke, who fled the country before Justice WILLIAM PATERSON could try him. In 1799 Ellsworth and Iredell, in separate cases, told federal grand juries that the federal courts had common law jurisdiction over seditious libel and, in Ellsworth's words, over "acts manifestly subversive of the national government." He added that an indictable offense need be defined only by common law, not statute.

The sole dissenting voice in this line of decision was that of Justice SAMUEL CHASE in Worrall's Case (1798), where the common law indictment was for attempted bribery of a federal official. Judge Peters disagreed with Chase's argument that no federal common law of crimes existed, and the jury convicted. Chase, however, changed his opinion in United States v. Sylvester (1799), when he presided over a common law prosecution for counterfeiting. Thus, Chief Justices Jay and Ellsworth and Justices Wilson, Paterson, Iredell, and Chase endorsed federal court jurisdiction over common law crimes. The Jeffersonians, by then, vehemently opposed such views, arguing that only the state courts could try common law crimes. When Jefferson was President, however, Judge Pierpont Edwards, whom he had appointed to the federal district court in Connecticut, sought and received common law indictments against several persons for seditious libel against the President and the government. Jefferson knew of the common law prosecutions by the federal court and did not criticize them or take any actions to halt them, until he learned that one of the defendants could prove the truth of his accusation that the President had once engaged in a sexual indiscretion. The prosecutions were dropped except for those against Hudson and Goodwin, editors of Hartford's Connecticut Courant, who challenged the jurisdiction of the federal court.

By this time the administration had a stake in a ruling against federal jurisdiction over common law crimes. After much government stalling until a majority of Jeffersonian appointees controlled the Supreme Court, UNITED STATES V. HUDSON AND GOODWIN was finally decided in 1812. Without hearing ORAL ARGUMENTS and against all the precedents, a bare majority of the Court, in a brief opinion by Justice WILLIAM JOHNSON, ruled that the question whether the federal courts "can exercise a common law jurisdiction in criminal cases" has been "settled in public opinion," which opposed such jurisdiction. Moreover, the Constitution had not expressly delegated to the federal courts authority over common law crimes. "The legislative authority of the Union must first make an act a crime, affix a punishment to it, and declare the Court that shall have jurisdiction of the offense."

Justice JOSEPH STORY, who had not made known his dissent at the time, did so in a circuit opinion in 1813 and forced a reconsideration of the rule of Hudson and Goodwin. In United States v. Coolidge (1816), decided without argument, Johnson, noting that the Court was still divided (Marshall and Washington probably supported Story), refused to review the 1812 decision in the absence of "solemn argument." Thus the great question was resolved without reasoned consideration, to the enormous detriment of the power of the United States courts to define criminal acts.

Although "judge-made" or nonstatutory federal crimes disappeared after the Coolidge decision, federal courts continued to exercise common law powers to enforce law and order within their own precincts (see CONTEMPT POWER) and continued to employ a variety of common law techniques, forms, and writs in the enforcement of congressionally defined crimes. The FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE reflect that fact, as does Marshall v. United States (1959). By its "supervisory powers" over lower federal courts and, through them, over federal law enforcement officers, the Supreme Court can still be said, loosely, to exercise an interstitial common law authority with respect to federal crimes.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

CROSSKEY, WILLIAM W. 1953 Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States, 2 vols. Chaps. 20–24. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

GOEBEL, JULIUS, JR. 1971 Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801. Volume 1 of Freund, Paul, ed., The Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court. New York: Macmillan.

PRESSER, STEPHEN B. 1978 "A Tale of Two Judges: Richard Peters, Samuel Chase, and the Broken Promise of Federalist Jurisprudence." Northwestern Law Review 73:26–111.

TUCKER, ST. GEORGE 1803 Blackstone's Commentaries, with Notes of Reference to the Constitution and Laws of the Federal Government of the United States and of the Commonwealth of Virginia, 5 vols. Philadelphia: Young & Small.

WARREN, CHARLES 1923 "New Light on the History of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789." Harvard Law Review 37:49–132.

WHARTON, FRANCIS, ed. 1849 (1970) State Trials of the United States During the Administrations of Washington and Adams. New York: Burt Franklin.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

See: Broadcasting; Communications Act; Regulatory Agencies

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION v. LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS

See: Government Speech

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION v. PACIFICA FOUNDATION

438 U.S. 726 (1978)

In FCC v. Pacifica Foundation the Court held that limited civil sanctions could constitutionally be invoked against a radio broadcast containing many vulgar words. The Court stressed that its holding was limited to the particular context, that is, to civil sanctions applied to indecent speech in an afternoon radio broadcast when, the Court assumed, children were in the audience. The opinion did not address criminal sanctions for televised or closed circuit broadcasts or late evening presentations, nor did it illuminate the concept of indecent speech except to suggest that occasional expletives and Elizabethan comedies may be decent enough even in the early afternoon.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

FEDERAL COURTS IMPROVEMENT ACT

96 Stat. 25 (1982)

This act reorganized several specialized federal courts. It merged the former COURT OF CLAIMS and COURT OF CUSTOMS AND PATENT APPEALS into a new UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT, transferring to the new court the former courts' JURISDICTION, and staffing it with the judges of the superseded courts. The Federal Circuit is a CONSTITUTIONAL COURT, staffed by twelve judges with life terms.

The act also created a new CLAIMS COURT to handle the trial functions formerly performed by commissioners (later called trial judges) of the old Court of Claims. The Claims Court is a LEGISLATIVE COURT; its sixteen judges serve for fifteen-year terms. Appeals go to the Federal Circuit.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

SYMPOSIUM 1983–1984 The Federal Courts Improvement Act. Cleveland State Law Review 32:1–116.

FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAW

In the past two decades, Congress has enacted many new types of criminal statutes, such as the RACKETEER INFLUENCED AND CORRUPT ORGANIZATIONS ACT (RICO) and the continuing criminal enterprise and money-laundering offenses. New approaches to criminal penalties and sentencing have also been adopted, including criminal forfeiture, high mandatory sentences, and the sentencing guidelines. Although the government has been prosecuting these new crimes and penalties, often in combination, for many years, with few exceptions their constitutionality has not been tested in the Supreme Court.

The Constitution as applied to the substantive federal criminal law is largely dormant. The Supreme Court infrequently agrees to review cases raising issues of interpretation of federal criminal statutes. Even rarer is the case in which the Court agrees to consider the constitutionality of a substantive criminal statute. And cases in which the Court holds either substantive criminal legislation or prosecutorial action to be unconstitutional are rarer still. This is not for want of a large number of federal criminal cases in which such issues are raised, nor for a lack of applicable constitutional provisions or doctrines against which federal criminal statues and prosecutions can be tested—for example, DOUBLE JEOPARDY, VAGUENESS, and CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT.

There have been a few recent exceptions to the prevailing pattern. In Grady v. Corbin, a 1990 decision arising out of a state drunk driving-criminal homicide prosecution, the Supreme Court adopted a revised double-jeopardy test that, among its most important effects, may have an impact on federal RICO and continuing criminal enterprise prosecutions.

Before Grady, the principal test for determining whether the Constitution was violated by successive prosecutions under two different criminal statutes for the same criminal act or transaction was the doctrine described in Blockburger v. United States (1932): that the double-jeopardy prohibition is not violated if each of the statutes involved in the two prosecutions requires proof of a fact that the other statute does not.

The effect of Blockburger has been generally to permit separate prosecutions growing out of the same conduct (even if the essence of the charges are similar) as long as they were based on different federal criminal statutes. In the federal criminal context, the Blockburger standard is easily met; there is little coherence or consistency in the way federal crimes are drafted, and the nature of most of these statutory offenses is such that they have elements quite different from all others.

In Grady, the Court ruled that the Blockburger test should still be applied in the first instance. If this standard is satisfied by a comparison of the elements of the two offenses, it is to be followed by a further inquiry under which the subsequent prosecution is barred if "the government, to establish an essential element of an offense charged in that prosecution, . . . prove[s] conduct that constitutes an offense for which the defendant has already been prosecuted."

Rather than focusing, as does Blockburger, on the statutory elements alone, this latter test requires a comparison of what the prosecutor attempts to prove at both of the trials. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, writing for the majority in Grady, took pains, however, to note that "[t]his is not . . . [a] same evidence test. The critical inquiry is what conduct the . . . [government] will prove, not the evidence . . . [it] will use to prove that conduct."

Depending on its subsequent interpretation, application of the Grady test could impose an important restriction on the government's ability to prosecute RICO and continuing criminal-enterprise cases. The RICO offense is committed when a person conducts the affairs of an enterprise (a continuing conspiratorial group or legal entity, such as a corporation or a governmental agency) through a pattern of racketeering activity that involves the commission of two or more related predicate offenses.

Before Grady, the government could, and often did, prosecute RICO cases relying on predicate offenses for which the accused had previously been tried and convicted (and even offenses of which the accused had been acquitted). Grady's abandonment of Blockburger as the exclusive test of double jeopardy in successive-prosecution cases can be argued to bar the use as predicate offenses in RICO (and, for similar reasons, in continuing criminal enterprise cases) of crimes for which the accused has previously been tried. If the Grady test is applied as Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, in dissent, suggested it would be—that is, "where the charges arise from a single criminal act, occurrence, episode, or transaction, they must be tried in a single proceeding"—the decision will have the effect of barring separate trials of a RICO charge and the predicate offenses on which the RICO count is based.

An early post-Grady decision, United States v. Esposito (1990), handed down by a federal court of appeals, has taken a contrary view, however, holding that Grady does not bar a prosecution of the predicate crimes where there has been a prior acquittal on the related RICO charge. Esposito relied mainly on the earlier Supreme Court decision in Garrett v. United States (1985), a case only briefly cited in Grady.

Garrett involved the double-jeopardy implications of a continuing criminal-enterprise prosecution where the facts underlying a prior conviction of marijuana importation were used to prove one of the three predicate offenses on which the continuing criminal-enterprise charge was based. The Supreme Court ruled that the double-jeopardy prohibition was not violated where the prior conviction was only one incident of conduct that occurred on two single days during the five-year course of conduct that was the basis for the continuing criminal-enterprise charge.

Although Garrett seems to be a relevant precedent in deciding on the effect of Grady on RICO and continuing criminal-enterprise prosecutions, the question remains whether, after Grady, Garrett is still good law and, if so, whether in a RICO or continuing criminal-enterprise prosecution, the government in proving conduct underlying a prior conviction as a predicate offense is trying to "establish an essential element of . . . [the] offense charged in that prosecution" (emphasis added).

Grady does not affect another application of the same Blockburger test—its use as the constitutional standard for determining whether separate punishments can be imposed for offenses tried together. Accordingly, even after Grady, there is no constitutional bar to the practice of prosecuting, along with a RICO count, separate predicate offenses (even those based in essentially the same harmful conduct) whose statutory elements differ from each other and those in the RICO statute and, following conviction on all of the charges, imposing separate punishments for each of the several crimes.

Grady is a modern rarity, a constitutional decision that may impose a substantive restriction on the enforcement of the federal criminal law, but there is a chance that it will not remain very long on the books. It was a 5–4 decision, with Justice Scalia, joined by Justices SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, and Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST dissenting. Given the close division in the case, the subsequent retirement of the author of the majority opinion, Justice Brennan, and the fact that the Court's articulation of double-jeopardy doctrine seems to be continually evolving, the case is a possible candidate for early overruling.

Apart from Grady, no other recent significant constitutional decision has served to restrict the use of the many innovative federal crime statutes and punishments enacted during the past two decades. The closest that the Court has come recently to such a decision is Justice Scalia's concurring opinion in H.J., Inc. v. Northwestern Bell Telephone Co. (1989) (joined by the same three Justices who joined him in dissent in Grady), in which he raised doubts about whether a key element of the RICO statute—the "pattern" requirement in the "pattern of racketeering activity" phrase—meets the constitutional proscription against vagueness in criminal statutes.

The H.J. decision itself involved a civil action under the provision of the RICO statute that authorizes a private treble-damage suit to be brought by a person injured by a criminal RICO violation. Justice Scalia noted that because RICO has criminal applications "as well," it "must, even in its civil applications, possess the degree of certainty required for criminal laws." A corollary follows from this proposition. A decision in a civil RICO suit that the "pattern of racketeering" phrase used in defining the criminal violation is constitutionally infirm would apply equally in the criminal context. Thus, a constitutional decision that might in its immediate impact serve to insulate business people from treble-damage actions could also serve to protect organized-crime figures from federal criminal prosecution. Of course, it remains to be seen whether the concurring opinion in H.J. will gain another adherent and ripen into a constitutional restriction on the breadth of the RICO statute.

An innovative aspect of the RICO and drug statutes, the punishment of criminal forfeiture, was recently considered in Caplin and Drysdale, Chartered v. United States (1989), where the Court held that neither the Fifth nor the Sixth Amendment exempts from forfeiture assets that a criminal defendant proposes to use to pay defense counsel. In a related case, United States v. Monsanto (1989), the Court upheld the constitutionality of a pretrial order freezing such assets in a defendant's possession.

A more central constitutional challenge to criminal forefeiture, litigated in some of the courts of appeals, but yet to be considered by the Supreme Court, is the question as to whether, given the nature and circumstances of the offense, a forefeiture might be grossly disproportionate under the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment clause.

Under the RICO statute, the prosecutor may seek forfeiture of the convicted person's entire interest in an enterprise the affairs of which were carried on in violation of the statute; the statutory forfeiture provision contains no limitation. Moreover, once the accused is convicted, forfeiture is mandatory; the judge has no discretion to reduce the amount. Thus, a person who owns all or most of a corporation and violates the federal criminal law, for example, by accepting or paying some kickbacks may, as a result of a RICO conviction, forfeit his or her entire interest in the corporation to the government.

In United States v. Busher (1987), taking to heart the Supreme Court's ruling in SOLEM V. HELM (1983) (the Eighth Amendment "prohibits not only barbaric punishments, but also sentences that are disproportionate to the crime committed"), the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the Eighth Amendment limits extreme criminal forfeitures under RICO (and under the drug laws) to insure that the punishment imposed is not "disproportionate to the crime committed." Some of the other circuits have ruled similarly.

None of these decisions has been reviewed by the Supreme Court. However, the Court has agreed to consider an appeal on an Eighth Amendment ground in a drug case that might shed some light on the forfeiture punishment issue. In Harmelin v. Michigan, the Court will decide whether a mandatory term of life imprisonment without parole imposed on a person with no prior criminal record, who has been convicted of possession of slightly more than a pound of cocaine, violates the eighth amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment. The case will be considered in the 1990–1991 term.

There has been one recent important constitutional decision affecting a key element in the federal criminal enforcement system, MISTRETTA V. UNITED STATES (1989), where the Court sustained the United States Sentencing Commission against a constitutional challenge claiming that the legislation setting up the Commission delegated excessive legislative power to the Commission and violated separation of powers doctrine.

In 1984, with a view to eliminating excessive disparity in federal sentences, the Congress enacted the Sentencing Reform Act setting up the Sentencing Commission as an independent body in the Judicial Branch, with authority to establish binding Sentencing Guidelines that, based upon detailed factors relating to the offense and the offender, provide for a range of determinate sentences for all federal offenses.

In Mistretta, the Court ruled that the Sentencing Reform Act sets forth "more than . . . [the] 'intelligible principle' or minimal standards" that are required under traditional nondelegation doctrine prohibiting excessive delegations of legislative authority: "Developing proportionate penalties for hundreds of different crimes by a virtually limitless array of offenders is precisely the sort of intricate, labor-intensive task for which delegation to an expert body is especially appropriate."

While recognizing that the Sentencing Commission "unquestionably is a peculiar institution within the framework of our Government," the Court rejected the argument that the structure of the Commission violated separation of powers doctrine insofar as it required Article III judges, who sit on the Commission with other nonjudicial appointees selected by the President, to exercise legislative authority; and also required those judges to share their judicial rulemaking authority with nonjudges; and threatened judicial independence insofar as the President is given authority to remove the judges from the Commission.

Mistretta is a significant decision since it sustains against constitutional attack the basic structural change relating to federal sentencing that Congress had effected by enacting the Sentencing Reform Act. Although there are further constitutional issues that may be raised in cases applying the guidelines—for example, whether the guidelines violate due process insofar as they restrict judicial discretion to weigh individual factors in sentencing—the message of Mistretta is that the Sentencing Commission and its guidelines are here to stay.

Although Mistretta is significant, it is also sui generis. It is a unique decision relating to a new institutional structure and does not detract at all from the observation made earlier that the Constitution is largely dormant as applied to the substantive federal criminal law.

Of course, given the current makeup of the Court, public attitudes toward crime, and the historical reluctance of the Court to adjudge substantive federal criminal legislation unconstitutional, even were the Court to agree to review the constitutionality of these new measures, it would be unlikely that any of them would be found invalid. Still, even if declarations of unconstitutionality are unlikely, it would be helpful to the bench and bar if the Court were to review these issues with greater frequency.

The import of the Court's general reluctance to review many issues of statutory interpretation and the constitutionality of substantive federal criminal laws and related issues (while inexplicably continuing frequently to delve deeply into the minutiae of Fourth Amendment search and seizure issues) goes far beyond the direct effect of the Court's failure to consider the relevant issues; it influences the lower federal courts, which see many more federal criminal cases than the high court, and it may also be having an impact on the Congress.

Not surprisingly, federal district courts and courts of appeals generally do not give extended consideration to claims challenging the constitutionality of the new federal criminal statutes such as RICO. Correspondingly and perhaps more importantly, they also appear generally not even to be influenced very much by constitutional values in their interpretation of federal criminal statutes. This may not be unexpected in a climate created by a high court that itself is paying little attention to such issues. Yet in a system of judicial review, one expects constitutional values to be applied not only as a basis for determining the validity of criminal statutes, but as an element influencing, in appropriate cases and to a limited extent, issues of statutory interpretation.

In recent years, Congress has legislated an explosion in federal criminal statutes. At the same time, the legislature seems to be paying less and less attention to statutory details and has even become careless in the drafting process. In 1984, 1986, and 1988, Congress enacted comprehensive legislative packages encompassing a large number of federal criminal subjects; in the 1988 legislation, for example, a significant number of the provisions were directed to correcting drafting errors in the earlier legislation. Although it is not possible to demonstrate any direct linkage between the Supreme Court's inattention to the federal criminal law and the increase in legislative action in this area and the corresponding increase in drafting sloppiness, one might expect the Congress to be affected in its actions if the Court were to enter this arena more frequently.

Were the Court more actively to review and perhaps occasionally invalidate federal legislative or executive action in the criminal sphere affecting substantive interests, the effect might go far beyond the specific issues being decided. It might influence federal judges' approach to issues of interpretation of federal criminal statutes and also affect the kinds of cases prosecutors bring and the kind of positions they take in cases being brought. Most important, it could influence the Congress and have a significant impact on the form and content of future federal criminal legislation.

NORMAN ABRAMS
(1992)

Bibliography

ABRAMS, NORMAN 1986 Federal Criminal Law and Its Enforcement. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

——— 1989 The New Ancillary Offenses. Criminal Law Forum 1:1–39.

KURLAND, ADAM H. 1989 The Guarantee Clause as a Basis for Federal Prosecution of State and Local Officers. Southern California Law Review 62:367–491.

LYNCH, GERARD E. 1987 Rico: The Crime of Being a Criminal, Parts I & II, Parts II & III. Columbia Law Review 87:661–764, 920–984.

FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAW
(Update)

If a constitutional snapshot is taken of the current status of the federal criminal law, the picture that emerges is somewhat changed from a decade ago. It continues to be the case that the Supreme Court does not with great frequency label as unconstitutional federal prosecutorial action, judicial penalties, or federal criminal statutes under the DOCTRINES of DOUBLE JEOPARDY, CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT, excessive fines, or void for VAGUENESS, but there have been some new developments.

Although the Court is reviewing fewer criminal cases overall, the Justices are addressing more federal criminal cases, particularly those involving key issues of STATUTORY INTERPRETATION or questions arising under the SENTENCING guidelines and criminal forfeiture. This activity has marginally increased the number of cases in which the Court has addressed constitutional issues in a federal criminal context.

In 1993, in United States v. Dixon, the Court OVERRULED its earlier decision in Grady v. Corbin (1990) that had established a new test for double jeopardy in a successive prosecution context. Grady had applied a "same conduct" test as a supplement to the Blockburger test which provides that in successive prosecution cases, if each of the statutes involved in the two prosecutions contains an element that the other does not, double jeopardy does not bar the second prosecution. In Dixon, a majority of the Court ruled that Grady had been wrongly decided and reinstated the Blockburger test as the exclusive means of adjudging whether the double jeopardy standard has been violated in a successive prosecution context.

The Court also applied the double jeopardy clause in cases involving both civil sanctions and criminal prosecution. As in the Grady and Dixon cases, the Court overruled a decision that had won the Court's approval only a handful of years earlier.

In Hudson v. United States (1997), which involved administrative sanctions imposed against bankers followed by their indictment for the same conduct, a majority of the Court "largely disavowed" the approach developed in 1989 in United States v. Halper. The Court adopted a two-pronged test for determining whether double jeopardy barred the second prosecution. Were the administrative sanctions imposed intended by Congress to be civil? If so, were they nevertheless punitive in nature or effect despite the congressional intent? Only the "clearest proof" would suffice to overturn the legislative intent. In both Dixon and Hudson, the Court returned to an approach that is easier to apply; one that focuses mainly on the statutory setting rather than the particular circumstances of the case; one that makes it more difficult for a defendant to sustain a claim of double jeopardy.

Because forfeiture is now part of a number of federal criminal statutes, it should not surprise that during this period, the Court also addressed constitutional issues regarding the use of this sanction. First, in Alexander v. United States (1993), the Court held that criminal forfeiture is "no different, for Eighth Amendment purposes, from a criminal fine," and in the same year in Austin v. United States, relying in part on Halper, the Court ruled that CIVIL FORFEITURE is limited by the excessive fines clause of the Eighth Amendment if at least part of its purpose was punishment.

Subsequently in United States v. Usery (1996), the Court ruled that, for purposes of the double jeopardy clause, civil IN REM forfeitures under the drug laws and money laundering statutes were not punitive and not to be treated as criminal. The approach used in Austin was thus restricted to the excessive fines clause.

Then in 1998, in United States v. Bajakajian, the Court applied the excessive fines clause to strike down the criminal IN PERSONAM forfeiture of $357,144 that the defendant had been transporting out of the country without reporting it as required by federal law. The majority concluded that the forfeiture of the "property involved in the [failure to report] offense" constitutes punishment and is thus a fine within the meaning of the excessive fines clause. The majority proceeded to use the same standard applied under the cruel and unusual punishments clause—gross disproportionality—as the test of constitutionality under the fines clause.

While the double jeopardy and excessive fines clauses have been applied by the Court in recent federal criminal cases, the void for vagueness doctrinal area continues to be quiescent. One case is worth mentioning because it involved what the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals described as the "most ambiguous of federal criminal statutes." In United States v. Lanier (1997), the Court unanimously rejected a vagueness challenge to Title 18, section 242, which makes it a federal crime for a person acting willfully and under COLOR OF LAW to deprive another of rights protected by the Constitution. A local judge who allegedly sexually assaulted several women in his chambers had been charged with a violation of section 242.

The Supreme Court stated that the "touchstone" of vagueness doctrine is "whether the statute, either standing alone or as construed, made it reasonably clear at the relevant time that the defendant's conduct was criminal." The Court remanded the case to the Court of Appeals to determine whether, in light of preexisting law, the unlawfulness of the judge's behavior under the Constitution was apparent. The decision appears to leave open the possibility of a wide-ranging use of section 242 to address conduct not covered by other federal criminal statutes, and it suggests that the Court is not likely to restrict on vagueness grounds other broad criminal statutes found in the Federal Criminal Code.

In its recent constitutional decisions affecting the federal criminal law, the Supreme Court has shown a willingness to strike down prosecutorial action and judicial penalties, but it has not invalidated criminal statutes on substantive grounds. That the Court has been closely divided in many of its recent constitutional rulings, and that dissenting Justices (not always the same group) have not been reluctant to overrule recent PRECEDENTS when they later obtain a majority, does not bode well in the near term for the stability, certainty, and predictability of federal criminal law.

NORMAN ABRAMS
(2000)

Bibliography

AMAR, AKHIL R. 1997 Double Jeopardy Law Made Simple. Yale Law Journal 106:1807–1848.

JEFFRIES, JOHN C., JR. 1985 Legality, Vagueness and the Construction of Penal Statutes. Virginia Law Review 71:189–244.

KING, NANCY J. 1996 Portioning Punishment: Constitutional Limits on Successive and Excessive Penalties. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 144:101–196.

THOMAS, GEORGE C., III 1995 A Blameworthy Act Approach to the Double Jeopardy Same Offense Problem. California Law Review 83:1027–1070.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACTS

Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act
85 Stat. 497 (1971)
Federal Election Campaign Act
86 Stat. 3 (1971)
Federal Election Campaign Act
88 Stat. 1263 (1974)

The success of constitutional democracy depends upon the integrity and autonomy of the electoral process. But whether that integrity is threatened more seriously by wealthy individuals and organizations than by regulations that prevent individuals and organizations from using their resources to promote candidates and policies is a matter for debate. During the 1970s several attempts at campaign finance "reform" were enacted, resulting in an almost complete switch from private to public financing at least of the presidential general election campaigns.

Two reform statutes were enacted in 1971: the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) and the Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act. The former required any committee receiving or spending more than $1,000 in a campaign for federal office to register with the federal government and publish reports of contributions and expenditures. It also prohibited contributions under names other than that of the actual donor and limited total expenditures on campaign advertising. The second statute created a fund of public money to replace private contributions in financing presidential election campaigns. By means of a "check-off" device, taxpayers would nominally designate one dollar of their annual federal income tax payment for the election campaign fund. Acceptance of these public funds precluded a party or campaign committee from accepting any private contributions.

The FECA of 1974 was an extremely comprehensive effort to regulate the "time, place, and manner" of electing federal officials. Among the provisions of the 1974 act were: maximum spending limits for presidential nominating and general election campaigns; federal matching funds for qualifying candidates in major party nominating campaigns; complete federal funding of major party candidates in the general election campaign; limits on contributions of individuals, organizations, and political action committees to campaigns for Congress and for the presidential nominations; limits on campaign spending per state in presidential nomination campaigns; and rigorous accounting and reporting requirements for campaign finance committees. In addition, the 1974 act created a six-member Federal Elections Commission to enforce the other provisions of the act; the commission was to comprise members appointed by the President, the speaker of the House of Representatives, and the president pro tempore of the Senate.

The Supreme Court heard major constitutional challenges to the 1974 act even as the first campaign was being conducted under it. In BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976) the Court held unconstitutional the method of appointment of the commission (because the Constitution grants to the President alone the power to appoint federal officers) and all the spending limitations imposed other than as a condition for receiving federal matching funds. The rationale for the latter holding was that the commitment of funds in support of a candidate or cause was a form of expression protected under the FIRST AMENDMENT.

The tendency toward public financing of electoral campaigns, with accompanying regulation, works to the advantage of incumbents and to the disadvantage of challengers, who usually need to spend more than their opponents to overcome the advantages of incumbency. The scheme for financing and regulating the presidential election campaigns serves to insulate the two major parties from challenges by third parties or independent candidates. While claiming to protect the people from the "fat cats," federal politicians have taken steps to protect themselves from the people.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

ALEXANDER, HERBERT E. 1980 Financing Politics: Money, Elections and Political Reform. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly.

FEDERAL ENERGY AGENCY v. ALGONQUIN SNG, INC.
426 U.S. 548 (1976)

A unanimous Supreme Court, through Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, upheld the constitutionality of oil import licensing fees imposed under the Trade Expansion Act (1962) and the Trade Act (1974). Under those statutes the President was authorized to "adjust" imports of commodities if the importation was in such quantities or under such conditions as to threaten national security. This was not an improper DELEGATION OF POWER, as the laws established preconditions for and limits upon its exercise. Furthermore, the court ruled, license fees were as acceptable a means of adjusting levels of importation as quotas.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

FEDERAL FARM BANKRUPTCY ACT

See: Frazier-Lemke Acts

FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID

Federal grants-in-aid are subventions to state or local governments, private institutions, or individuals in support of a wide variety of undertakings. Early in the nineteenth century, governmental transfers of land were used to support road construction and agricultural education. Cash grants to states for diverse functions, such as vocational EDUCATION, forest fire prevention, and maternal health, came of age in the decades preceding the NEW DEAL. The public welfare programs established in 1935 greatly expanded the federal role in state finances. But it is the proliferation of categorical grants since 1960 that has rendered them the principal instrument of federal influence over social services and urban affairs. This recent extraordinary growth reflects an unplanned series of fragmented national responses to state fiscal inadequacy in the face of increased demand for collective goods.

Most of the current 500 or so national grant programs are intergovernmental, and federal monies under them constitute about one-quarter of the annual expenditures of both state and local governments. Notwithstanding federalism-inspired movements toward less directive federal grants, known as REVENUE SHARING and block grants, most aid programs remain categorical, with narrowly defined undertakings and detailed conditions imposed on the receiving agencies.

Grants are made pursuant to Congress's broad discretion to spend for the GENERAL WELFARE and common defense. Like other national powers, grant-making authority rests on permissive and expansive constitutional principles established during the post-New Deal era of judicial reaction and retreat, typified by such cases as STEWARD MACHINE CO. V. DAVIS (1937) and Oklahoma v. Civil Service Commission (1947). The recurrent use of grant conditions to impose national solutions on traditionally local issues suggests that the political safeguard of FEDERALISM constraining Congress in the use of national regulatory power is less operative in the exercise of grant-making authority. (See TAXING AND SPENDING POWER.)

For many years intergovernmental relationships in grant programs were understood to be administrative, cooperative, professional, and donative. Consequently, federal judges declined to intervene in grievances founded on grant programs. This aloofness markedly changed with the advent of antipoverty litigation in the late 1960s, when courts acknowledged that private beneficiaries of public WELFARE BENEFITS were entitled to relief against state and local laws and practices inconsistent with federal grant conditions. Litigation over grants soon became a staple of federal court dockets, with suits by federal grantor agencies and local government grantees as well as by private parties. The judicial decisions, while providing a novel and potent injunctive remedy, broadly construed and uniformly validated federal goals and conditions. Federal courts thus placed their stamp of approval on Congress's expansive use of federal grants.

Grants differ from regulation in that they entail expenditures, not direct commands and sanctions, as the inducement for conforming activity. Because of this difference, courts maintain that state and local governmental participation in grant-in-aid programs is voluntary, not coerced. They consequently reject attacks on grant conditions, on the ground that onerous or intrusive requirements can be avoided by the "simple expedient" of not yielding and of refusing the grant. This choice of the state or city is largely fictional in light of citizen-industry mobility and the competition among states for resources. But courts cannot intelligibly resolve the question of whether federal grants have overborne the "free will" of government units.

On several recent occasions Congress has further reduced the difference between grants and regulation through the creation of new grant-in-aid directives without additional federal funding. Instead of monetary inducements, Congress has chosen to condition continuation of eligibility under well-established, and usually large, aid programs on conformity with its new requirements. This tying arrangement has the look of regulation, but its validity seems beyond question so long as there is a plausible relationship between the new program or condition and the national purposes of the older one.

For example, states may be required to supplement or to provide welfare payments in order to remain eligible for large Medicaid health care grants; the justification is that income maintenance and health-care support once were within a single grant program, and, more fundamentally, that subsistence payments significantly affect the health of the impoverished. Similarly Congress has tied the availability of federally insured mortgages to state participation in a flood control program; has tied the entire portmanteau of federal health dollars to state adoption of an elaborate apparatus for health systems planning and cost control; and has tied highway grants to state regulation of billboards, state enforcement of a federal speed limit, and state adoption of a national minimum age for drinking. There may be constitutional limits on tying new conditions to older grant programs, but the limits remain unenforced and unexplored.

The basic constitutional constraint on grant conditions is that they must be relevant to the purpose of a grant program. Here, as elsewhere, Congress has an exceedingly large discretion to determine relationships between means and goals. Fair treatment of private beneficiaries and efficiency are the two primary categories of relatedness, and they obviously can carry a good deal of baggage. In addition, Congress of late has established a web of elaborate "cross-cutting" conditions applicable to all or most grant-in-aid programs concerning, for example, the handicapped, environmental impacts, labor and procurement standards, citizen participation, merit hiring, and CIVIL RIGHTS. Administrative enforcement of grant conditions played a major role in the DESEGREGATION of southern schools. To be sure, many of these restrictions would fall within congressional powers under the COMMERCE CLAUSE and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, but there is significance in Congress's casting them as grant-in-aid conditions. The judicial assumption that states have the option not to accept the grants apparently makes it easier for Congress to impose new and controversial obligations on the states.

The TENTH AMENDMENT limit established in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976) has not been applied to grants founded on the spending power, no doubt because such a ruling would eviscerate the current system of federal grants. Numerous federal grant conditions directly affect the structure and operation of state and local governments. Grant programs not only pervasively alter the spending priorities of governmental units, but, through the imposition of conditions, also allocate power between state and local governments (and occasionally between governors and legislatures), dictate hiring practices and employment benefits, and, by barring partisan political activity, limit the occasions on which officials administering departments having grants may be elected.

There is, finally, the Supreme Court's assimilation of grant programs to regulatory ones in its holding that state laws inconsistent with the terms of federal grants are invalid under the SUPREMACY CLAUSE. Although not fully explicated, this theory has been used repeatedly to warrant injunctive relief against grantee noncomplicance with national conditions. Traditionally, federal administrative enforcement of grant conditions had been exceptionally lax, perhaps designedly so. Third-party suits for injunctive relief have altered this convention, while enlarging the role of federal courts in monitoring and enforcing grant programs. As a consequence, there is now more law and less discretion defining and governing the relationships under national grants.

LEE A. ALBERT
(1986)

Bibliography

LAPIERRE, D. BRUCE 1983 The Political Safeguards of Federalism Redux. Washington University Law Quarterly 60:779–1056.

MAXWELL, J. and ARONSON, J. R. (1965) 1977 Financing State and Local Government. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

FEDERAL IMMUNITY ACT
68 Stat. 745 (1954)

The growing tendency in the early 1950s of witnesses before congressional committees to refuse to testify by relying on the Fifth Amendment's RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION led Congress in 1954 to amend previous statutes and provide revised immunity arrangements. The purpose of the measure was to bypass the Fifth Amendment by giving Congress the power to grant a reluctant witness immunity from prosecution and compel the individual to testify. Either house of Congress by majority vote or a congressional committee by a two-thirds vote could grant immunity from prosecution to a witness in a national security investigation, provided an order was first obtained from a United States District Court judge. The statute required the attorney general to be given advance notification and an opportunity to offer objections. The law also permitted UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS to grant immunity to witnesses before courts or GRAND JURIES. Witnesses thus immunized faced the choice of testifying or going to jail. The Fifth Amendment could not be raised as a barrier to compulsory testimony.

In ULLMAN V. UNITED STATES (1956) the Supreme Court sustained its constitutionality.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Immunity Grant.)

FEDERALISM

Federalism is a political system in which different levels of government agree to share power in governing the same territory. Constitutional federalism in the United States refers both to the constitutional provisions for the national and the state governments to exist and to perform particular functions in the federal system of governance, and to the sets of relationships—among states, and between states and the federal government—for which the Constitution provides a framework. JUDICIAL REVIEW of federalism refers to the limits on federal and state action that courts will enforce on behalf of the federal structure of the Constitution.

Constitutional Federalism. Constitutional federalism in the United States emerged out of practical experiences under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION and political exigencies. Experience showed that greater centralization was essential, but the political leadership of the states would not have been prepared to give up their states' self-governing powers to a separate and entirely national government. This pragmatic reality is reflected in the assumption, in many parts of the Constitution, that the states will continue as separate governments, each having a legislature, an executive authority, and courts. The provisions for selecting members of Congress presuppose that state legislatures exist; the provisions for calling forth the militia presuppose an executive authority in each state; and the SUPREMACY CLAUSE presupposes a state judiciary. Even the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, which substantially changed the balance of powers between the national and the state governments, contemplates the continued existence of the states as self-governing entities. Section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment, which penalizes states for VOTING RIGHTS discrimination in elections of members of the state legislature or for state executive or judicial officers, contemplates not only the states' existence but also the continued operation of the three branches of state government.

U.S. federalism has been the subject of theoretical debate from its beginnings. FEDERALIST No. 39 described the provisions of the Constitution as partly national and partly confederated. Federalist No. 59 offered a political theory of the value of federalism: it would serve as a "double security" for the preservation of liberty, with each level of government presumably having motives to check abuses by the other. In United States Term Limits v. Thornton (1995), the influential concurrence of Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY linked U.S. federalism to coexisting CITIZENSHIPS (state and federal) and political accountability, emphasizing that both state and national government representatives are selected by the people and that each level of government is accountable to the people.

Among the values claimed for federalism as a constraint on national power are (1) its liberty-preserving, tyranny-preventing possibilities, (2) the potential for decentralized government to maximize the satisfaction of individual preferences by allowing citizens to choose among diverse regimes by moving from one to another, (3) the opportunities for more active political participation at lower levels of government whose units are smaller, (4) the possibilities for developing cross-cutting allegiances among different groups in society, given that state boundaries for the most part do not correspond to such deeply divisive characteristics as race, religion, or language, and (5) the greater prospects offered by decentralization for useful innovation in government design and policy. But whether constitutional constraints on national power actually serve these goals remains contested. National power in the last half-century has been an important force for liberty and equality as against tyrannical policies of state-sponsored racial SEGREGATION, though in recent years some state or local jurisdictions have moved ahead of federal policies in advancing CIVIL RIGHTS for gays and lesbians. Vigorous federal action, especially in economic or environmental spheres, can sometimes avoid "races to the bottom" that would constrain rather than enhance state choices, though whether states would race to the bottom, or to the top, in some important areas of regulation remains in contest. If the only significant politics is at the national level, participation in state or local politics may be less meaningful. Cross-cutting allegiances may be temporary products of contingent demographic distributions rather than a value of federalism itself. And, some would say, experimentation can be achieved through nationally directed but decentralized programs.

Debate over the "value" of federalism in the United States continues. Edward Rubin and Malcolm Feeley, for example, argue that federalism, as a constraint on national power, is a "national neurosis," grounded in history but serving no current constitutional value, and thus should never be the basis for invalidating or interpreting a federal statute. At another pole, scholars such as Steven Calabresi argue that judicial enforcement of federalism-based limits on national power is as important as judicial enforcement of individual rights–based limits. Still others, such as Larry Kramer, explore the federal structure's empirical effects on national politics and governance.

A related controversy has developed over the basis, and scope, of judicial enforcement of federalism-based limits on state regulation under the DORMANT COMMERCE CLAUSE doctrine. Values of diversity and efficiency have been invoked in favor of more relaxed review of state programs; public choice analysis, on the other hand, has been invoked to support judicial enforcement of "bargains" among the states that will be economically advantageous in the long run to all if cheating can be avoided. There is disagreement both about the source of the limits (e.g., whether from the grant of power to Congress over INTERSTATE COMMERCE or from the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES of citizenship clause in Article IV) and over the value of some of the more recent manifestations of federalism-based invalidations of state regulatory action (especially those in the area of ENVIRONMENTAL REGULATION). Justices ANTONIN SCALIA and CLARENCE THOMAS have sought, from ORIGINALIST or TEXTUALIST perspectives, to unravel the COMMERCE CLAUSE as a source of judicially imposed restraints on the states, while upholding judicially enforced bans on state discrimination against out-of-staters or interstate commerce under the privileges and immunities clause, or the import–export clause.

Judicial Review of National Action. The debate over the values of federalism is only loosely linked to debate over the role of judicial review. While those who see no value in the maintenance of federal structures may be opposed to judicial enforcement of purported federalism-based limits on national or state power, those who see value in federalism are nonetheless of very different minds on the proper role of judicial review. Building on Herbert Wechsler's work, some argue that federalism values are adequately protected by the structural role of the states in the national political process, or even that federalism challenges to national action should be regarded as lacking JUSTICIABILITY. Others, including Barry Friedman and Vicki Jackson, argue that the historical embeddedness of federalism, RULE OF LAW concerns, or the constitutionally prescribed functions of the states, contemplate some judicially enforceable federalism-based limits on national power. And still others, including Roderick Hills, Jr., argue for judicial enforcement of federalism-based limits to promote accountability and efficiency in national decision-making.

Despite proclamations of the death of federalism in the 1970s, the 1990s have seen a renewed willingness by the Supreme Court to invalidate federal laws based on federalism concerns. Two somewhat distinct lines of cases can be identified, one dealing with federal regulations that apply to the states as such, and the other dealing with federal regulation of the activity of private entities.

(i) Federal Regulation of State Governments. In Maryland v. Wirtz (1966), the Court held that the commerce clause authorized federal regulation of the employment practices of state governments, and upheld an extension of the federal minimum wage law to a limited group of state and local government public employees. But in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1974), the Court found merit in TENTH AMENDMENT objections to Congress's further extension of the federal minimum wage law to municipal transit workers. Under National League of Cities, the Tenth Amendment barred federal action if it regulated states as such, affecting attributes of state sovereignty in areas of traditional government function, without compelling federal need. Seeking to apply this standard, the lower courts reached conflicting decisions on a range of questions and for several years the Court declined to invalidate other extensions of federal law to the states. Then, in GARCÍA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985), the Court, by a 5–4 vote, OVERRULED National League of Cities. It concluded that the effort to identify traditional government functions protected by the Tenth Amendment was inconsistent with federalism's dynamic potential, and that the national political process would generally be sufficient to protect the interests of the states. García was widely read as an abandonment by the Court of federalism-based judicial review of national action.

Instead, in the 1990s, the Court began to abandon the premise of García. In GREGORY V. ASHCROFT (1991), a STATUTORY INTERPRETATION decision holding the federal AGE DISCRIMINATION law inapplicable to state judges, the Court wrote at length about the values of federalism and the need for a constrained national government. In NEW YORK V. UNITED STATES (1992), the Court held unconstitutional a federal statute that required a state by a certain date either to designate a site for disposal of radioactive WASTE or to assume liabilities of private generators and holders of radioactive waste in the state, a choice that the Court found to be an effort to coerce or "commandeer" the state legislature. According to the OPINION OF THE COURT by Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, the 1787 Constitution abandoned federal power to regulate the states as such, substituting for it federal power to regulate private persons. Moreover, the Court suggested, to permit Congress to require states to legislate would confuse the lines of political accountability. García's basic rationale was ignored, and its holding distinguished and narrowed. The statute upheld in García, the Court said, was one generally applicable to private as well as state entities. In Printz v. United States (1997), the Court extended the anticommandeering rule of New York to invalidate a federal law requiring local law enforcement authorities to perform background checks on gun purchasers. Distinguishing this case from the well-settled obligation of state courts to entertain federal claims, the Court held that the federal government cannot require state executive or legislative bodies to enforce or administer federal law. As of this writing, the Court has granted CERTIORARI in a case challenging Congress's power to require states to limit their own disclosures of drivers' records and raising the question whether Congress, under Article I, can enact laws that regulate but do not "commandeer" the states.

City of Boerne v. Flores (1997) suggests that the Court's reinvigoration of federalism as a limit on national action will also apply to Congress's power under the Fourteenth Amendment. Flores held that Congress exceeded its powers under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, SECTION 5 in enacting the RELIGIOUS FREEDOM RESTORATION ACT (RFRA), which prohibited state and local governments from applying generally applicable laws in ways that substantially burdened religious practice, unless the laws met the "compelling interest" test of STRICT SCRUTINY. First, the Court held that Congress lacked power to treat conduct that, under the Court's caselaw, did not violate the free exercise clause as if it did violate that clause. Moreover, the Court held, although Congress does have some power to impose prophylactic measures prohibiting conduct that does not itself violate section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment in order to prevent other conduct that does, such a remedial or preventive use of the section 1 power must be proportional and congruent to actual violations. It concluded that the sweep of RFRA was broader than any record of such violations would warrant and thus found RFRA unconstitutional, while also suggesting that Congress had violated SEPARATION OF POWERS principles in acting on a theory different from the theory previously approved by the Court in enforcing rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. (Flores carried to its logical extreme might suggest that, had Congress sought to outlaw racial segregation by the states after PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) was decided but before Plessy was in substance overruled by BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), Congress's action could have been challenged as violating the separation of powers.) Two 1999 decisions by the Court expanded on Flores, holding unconstitutional, as not supported by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress's abrogation of ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity on claims for PATENT infringement and Lanham Act violations.

(ii) Federal Regulation of Private Activity. In the years following the NEW DEAL, the Court upheld federal power under the commerce clause to regulate a wide range of private activities, in areas ranging from civil rights to crimes such as loansharking. The Court's reasoning appeared to allow little room either for consideration of the interests of states or the effect of federal LEGISLATION on the balance of powers between national and state governments. Nor did the Court engage in rigorous judicial scrutiny of congressional motives or reasons for acting. But in UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995), for the first time since the New Deal, the Court struck down a federal law regulating private behavior as beyond Congress's ENUMERATED POWERS. The statute prohibited possession of a firearm within 1,000 feet of a school, but included no explicit findings supporting a connection to interstate commerce or otherwise linking the prohibited action to an enumerated source of federal power. Invoking the notion of dual sovereignty, in which the states needed to have a sphere of regulation that the federal government was not involved in, the Court held that the connection to interstate commerce was too obscure, the rationales for upholding the law too sweeping, and the subject matter too closely connected to areas traditionally regulated by the states to pass constitutional muster.

(iii) Related Cases. In addition to these lines of cases involving substantive powers of Congress, the Court has also restricted Congress's power to give federal courts JURISDICTION over certain cases against states. Overruling a prior decision, the Court in Seminole Tribe v. Florida (1996) held that under the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT, Congress lacked power to subject states to unconsented-to suits in federal courts to enforce legislation enacted pursuant to Article I of the Constitution, and in several later cases restricted the availability of judicial remedies, in federal and state courts, against states for violations of substantively applicable federal law.

Unanswered Questions. These developments leave many questions unanswered. Recent federalism decisions, including Printz and Seminole Tribe, require the courts to determine the source of power for various congressional enactments because, under current doctrine, Congress has more power to impose substantive obligations and judicial remedies on state governments when Congress acts pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment than pursuant to the commerce clause. Thus, whether Congress can subject states to private remedies under, for example, the federal minimum wage law, will depend on whether such a statute is a valid exercise of Congress's power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment. In Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board v. College Savings Bank (1999), the Court recognized a patent as PROPERTY protected by the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, but nonetheless held the patent law's abrogation of the states' SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY from suit to be unconstitutional under Flores because state remedies might provide all relief to which patentholders were constitutionally entitled for infringements, and thus abrogation of immunity was not proportional to constitutional injuries Congress could properly seek to remedy or forestall. Flores and its progeny thus clearly demonstrate that the Court cannot be expected simply to defer to whatever Congress does in claimed exercises of its Fourteenth Amendment powers.

Likewise subject to challenge under Flores are a range of federal laws prohibiting state and local governments from engaging in conduct that would not, of itself, violate the Fourteenth Amendment EQUAL PROTECTION clause as interpreted by the Court. In WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976), the Court held that only intentional discrimination violates the Fourteenth Amendment. Yet federal statutes (such as Title VII) that apply to state and local governments prohibit "disparate impact" actions, or prohibit discrimination based on categories (age, disability) that the Court has held are not SUSPECT CLASSIFICATIONS for purposes of equal protection analysis. Whether this and other statutes will meet Flores's "proportionality" test for congressional power under the Fourteenth Amendment, section 5, remains for future decisions.

The Court's 1999 Eleventh Amendment and state sovereign immunity decisions did not question Congress's substantive authority to extend patent laws, or minimum wage laws, to the states. While the reasoning behind the anticommandeering rule of New York and Printz might be thought to raise questions about Congress's power under Article I to regulate the states pursuant to laws such as the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, New York distinguished García as involving a generally applicable statute. On this basis, the Fair Labor Standards Act, other federal laws that apply to employment decisions by public and private employers (including antidiscrimination laws), or laws like the patent and COPYRIGHT laws, would remain constitutional as applied to the states (even if the available judicial remedies were more limited). New York's distinction between laws directed at state governments because of their governmental capacities and more generally applicable laws that incidentally apply to states may be justified by the added constraints on imprudent national legislation that enactment of generally applicable legislation entails. Printz, moreover, noted the distinction as being of potential relevance. Unless the Court were prepared to completely overrule García, Congress's substantive authority to extend otherwise valid, generally applicable laws to state and local governments seems likely to survive at least in part.

In light of the revival of federalism as a judicially enforced limit on national power, exercises of federal TAXING AND SPENDING POWERS may well be subject to renewed challenge, in efforts to extend the more state- protective approaches of the commerce clause to these other important powers. PREEMPTION challenges may also reflect the Court's renewed sensitivity to protecting state governments from perceived federal overreaching.

Finally, international developments may apply new pressures on the Court's federalism doctrines. MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920) treats the federal TREATY POWER as unlimited by federalism-based constraints on Congress's enumerated powers that may operate in the domestic sphere. Yet as the United States increasingly becomes a party to international treaties and EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS, this doctrine is likely to be retested. Increased development of INTERNATIONAL LAW and its extension to relations between sovereign states and their own citizens is likely to be reflected in theories and cases presented to federal courts. While some scholars argue that federal courts lack power to apply international norms as part of federal COMMON LAW (in part because of the adverse effects on state authority), others would embrace the internationalization of federal law. And where international obligations are assumed by the United States through means other than the procedure for U.S. SENATE ratification of treaties by a two-thirds vote, federalism challenges might be particularly pressing.

More vigorous enforcement of federalism-based limits on national power seems likely to continue under the current Supreme Court, which has expressed its concerns not only in adjudicated cases but in other policy statements including the Long Range Plan for the Federal Courts and in Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST's Annual State of the Judiciary Addresses. A more difficult question is the relationship between this significant change in the law of judicial review of federalism issues, and the practice and structure of constitutional federalism. Some formal DEVOLUTION of power to the states was a feature of legislation enacted in the 104th Congress, including WELFARE reform and the Unfunded Mandates Act. What role the change in judicial decisions will play in supporting or encouraging this process is unclear.

What does seem clear is that the Court will continue to treat federalism as an important and judicially enforceable constitutional principle that will on occasion constrain national power. Given the degree to which federal assumptions remain part of the constitutional structure, it is consistent with U.S. rule of law traditions for the Court to do so. What also seems clear from history is that judicial efforts substantially to limit Congress's reasoned exercise of its enumerated powers are likely to be politically destabilizing, ineffective, or both. History suggests that the fundamental organization of the United States through the states does afford mechanisms for the concerns of people in different states to make themselves felt in the national political process, and thus supports a deferential stance for judicial review of national action that is not alleged to infringe on individual rights nor to interfere with the states' ability to maintain their own legislative, executive, and judicial branches.

Postscript. In Reno v. Condon (2000), the Court, refusing to extend the anticommandeering doctrine, upheld the constitutionality of the federal Driver's Privacy Protection Act (DPPA). With some exceptions, the DPPA prohibits motor vehicle bureaus from releasing driver's license information without taking steps to assure the individual's consent to such disclosures. The Court rejected South Carolina's argument that this statute unconstitutionally commandeered state officials to enforce or administer a federal scheme. State compliance with federal law as required by this act, the Court said, differed from states being compelled to enforce federal law by regulating third parties. The Court also concluded that the law was "generally applicable" in that it regulated all "entities that participate as suppliers to the market for motor vehicle information"—both states and private resellers of that information.

VICKI C. JACKSON
(2000)

Bibliography

BAKER, LYNN 1995 Conditional Federal Spending After López. Columbia Law Review 95:1911–1989.

BEDNAR, JENNA and ESKRIDGE, WILLIAM N., JR. 1995 Steadying the Court's "Unsteady Path": A Theory of Judicial Enforcement of Federalism. Southern California Law Review 68: 1447–1491.

BRADLEY, CURTIS A. and GOLDSMITH, JACK L. 1997 Customary International Law as Federal Common Law: A Critique of the Modern Position. Harvard Law Review 110:815–876.

BRIFFAULT, RICHARD 1994 "What About the 'Ism'?" Normative and Formal Concerns in Contemporary Federalism. Vanderbilt Law Review 47:1303–1353.

CALABRESI, STEVEN G. 1995 "A Government of Limited and Enumerated Powers": In Defense of United States v. López. Michigan Law Review 94:752–831.

CAMINKER, EVAN 1995 State Sovereignty and Subordinacy: May Congress Commandeer State Officers to Implement Federal Law? Columbia Law Review 95:1001–1089.

FRIEDMAN, BARRY 1997 Valuing Federalism. Minnesota Law Review 82:317–412.

GARDBAUM, STEPHEN 1996 Rethinking Constitutional Federalism. Texas Law Review 74:795–838.

HILLS, RODERICK M., JR. 1998 The Political Economy of Cooperative Federalism: Why State Autonomy Makes Sense and "Dual Sovereignty" Doesn't. Michigan Law Review 96:813–944.

JACKSON, VICKI C. 1998 Federalism and the Uses and Limits of Law: Printz and Principle? Harvard Law Review 111: 2180–2259.

KADEN, LEWIS B. 1979 Politics, Money and State Sovereignty: The Judicial Role. Columbia Law Review 79:847–897.

KRAMER, LARRY 1994 Understanding Federalism. Vanderbilt Law Review 47:1485–1561.

LAPIERRE, D. BRUCE 1985 Political Accountability in the National Political Process: The Alternative to Judicial Review of Federalism Issues. Northwestern University Law Review 80: 577–665.

LAWSON, GARY and GRANGER, PATRICIA B. 1993 The "Proper" Scope of Federal Power: A Jurisdictional Interpretation of the Sweeping Clause. Duke Law Journal 43:267–336.

MERRITT, DEBORAH JONES 1988 The Guarantee Clause and State Autonomy: Federalism for a Third Century. Columbia Law Review 88:1–78.

PRAKASH, SAIKRISHNA BANGALORE 1993 Field Office Federalism. Virginia Law Review 79:1957–2037.

REGAN, DONALD H. 1995 How to Think About the Federal Commerce Power and Incidentally Rewrite United States v. López. Michigan Law Review 94:554–614.

REVESZ, RICHARD 1992 Rehabilitating Interstate Competition: Rethinking the "Race-to-the-Bottom" Rationale for Federal Environmental Regulation. New York University Law Review 67:1210–1254.

RUBIN, EDWARD L. and FEELEY, MALCOLM 1994 Federalism: Some Notes on a National Neurosis. UCLA Law Review 41: 903–952.

SHAPIRO, DAVID L. 1995 Federalism: A Dialogue. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press.

TUSHNET, MARK 1996 Federalism and Liberalism. Cardozo Journal of International and Comparative Law 4:329–344.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1954 The Political Safeguards of Federalism: The Role of the States in the Composition and Selection of the National Government. Columbia Law Review 54:543–560.

FEDERALISM, CONTEMPORARY PRACTICE OF

The Supreme Court does not enforce constitutional FEDERALISM. Rather, it enforces sufferance federalism, that is, federalism as determined by Congress, a weak form of federalism in which state laws govern particular subjects only so far as Congress decides and in which Congresss controls such subjects as it sees fit. The Court also does not now recognize any significant distinction between taxing a state and taxing a private business; the former may be subjected to national taxes imposed by Congress in any circumstance applicable to the latter. And the Court interprets the SPENDING POWER not as a limited power enabling the government to defray the expenses of its own operations and programs but as a power available to Congress to use to eliminate diversity among state laws according to its own choice. At the same time, the Supreme Court also deems Congress to possess power to restrict the means by which state or LOCAL GOVERNMENTS might attempt to raise their own revenue for their own programs, without depending on appropriations from Congress. This renders each state dependent on such funds as Congress may see fit to budget, with such strings attached as Congress decides as a way to force changes in laws otherwise not subject to its control. In brief, in the aggregate of its federalism decisions the Court acts overall as an agency of the national government on federalism questions. "Judicially constrained dual federalism" does not accurately describe federalism in the United States. Rather, "sufferance federalism"—federalism to such extent as the national government decides to be appropriate—is the system virtually de jure in the United States.

Several examples of mere sufferance federalism have been provided in four recent decisions of the Supreme Court. Instructive on the point is South Dakota v. Dole (1987), which sustained an act of Congress that disapproved state statutes permitting any person over eighteen years of age to purchase beer. Congress desired that the minimum state drinking age should be raised to twenty-one. The means selected by Congress were efficient to this end. It reduced federally appropriated matching highway funds to any state in which the lawful minimum drinking age was lower than Congress desired the state legislature to enact and reduced these funds by such a fraction as Congress could be confident would be sufficiently harsh that no state could hold out against the penalty thus imposed.

The Court, over two dissents, rejected the view that the spending power is a power merely to meet the government's own operating BUDGET as a national government (the view JAMES MADISON had held). It also rejected the view that Congress's power was at most a power to set the conditions of a general or a specific program it would be willing to help fund (e.g., the construction of such highways as would be built to congressional specifications of design, quality, and materials). Rather in Dole the Court accepted the additional view that the spending power is available to Congress to use as an oblique power for the "indirect achievement of objects which Congress is not empowered to achieve directly." It is a power, in short, to require states to adopt the same substantive law on a given subject as their neighbors have, insofar as Congress sees fit, or be penalized under federal programs of assistance at such level of disadvantage Congress is confident will be sufficient to bring about the change it desires in their laws. As illustrated by the Dole case, the Court thus acts as an active department in federalism matters, that is, an enforcing department of the national government, validating Congress's preferences not merely in respect to its own laws but in respect to the content of state law as well. The three other major federalism decisions by the Court in the most recent five years (1985–1990) are of the same general hue.

In South Carolina v. Baker (1988), for example, the Court sustained an act of Congress eliminating the federal tax deductibility of interest income received on bearer bonds issued by state or local governments, bonds commonly used as a means of financing state or local operations. In sustaining this act, the Court overruled its own unanimous holding in POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN TRUST (1895). Then, going beyond the facts of the case and the immediate legal question, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN volunteered that Congress might also forbid states from attempting to raise revenue by issuing such bonds at all. In Justice Brennan's view, if Congress felt that such bonds would be a hindrance to its own collection of national taxes, it might outlaw their use by the states. To the objection that this would leave the states effectively subject to Congress ("sufferance federalism"), Justice Brennan was unfazed: "[S]tates must find their protection from congressional regulation through the national political process, not through judicially defined spheres of [respective national and state powers]."

In a related federalism development involving the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT and state immunity from suits brought by private parties in federal court, a majority of the Court overruled still another unanimous and equally long-standing contrary decision. It held that Congress could subject states to money DAMAGE CLAIMS in federal courts without their consent or waiver of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY despite the Eleventh Amendment, which as applied by the Court a full century earlier in Hans v. Louisiana (1890), was deemed by the Court to preclude such FEDERAL JURISDICTION. In this third new case, Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co. (1989) the Court thus reinterpreted the Constitution to favor congressional power once again.

The fourth case in the Court's recent quartet is of the same character. In GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985), the Court overruled its own decision that was then less than a decade old, holding that Congress may directly command the terms of state employment to the same extent it had presumed to regulate wages and hours in private employment. The case overruled was NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976).

In large measure, however, these developments are not thematically new, despite the fact that three of the four constituitonal federalism cases involved such complete inconsistencies with the Supreme Court's own prior decisions as to require its previous interpretations of the Constitution to be set aside. Rather, the passing terms of the Supreme Court have but hardened what has been, overall, a one-way twentieth-century trend. Writing in 1950 in the Virginia Law Review, the distinguished constitutional historian EDWARD S. CORWIN summarized the developments in "The Passing of Dual Federalism." His conclusions were accurate even for the time:

> [T]he Federal System has shifted base in the direction of a consolidated national power. . . . [The] entire system of constitutional interpretation touching the Federal System is today in ruins. Today neither the State Police Power nor the concept of Federal Equilibrium is any "ingredient of national legislative power," whether as respects subject-matter to be governed, or the choice of objectives or of means for its exercise. [Today] "Cooperative Federalism" spells further aggrandizement of national power. . . . Resting as it does primarily on the superior fiscal resources of the National Government, Cooperative Federalism has been, to date, a short expression for a constantly increasing concentration of power at Washington in the instigation and supervision of local policies.

To be sure, even as implied in Corwin's article a half-century ago, the system of dual federalism was not originally expected to be administered by the Supreme Court in this one-sided fashion. Rather, in theory, it spoke to the Constitution's original differential apportionment of legislative powers (between the national and state governments) and a certain equilibrium in different spheres of respective national and constrained state powers that was meant to be held in place under the superintendence of the Supreme Court. The powers constitutionally apportioned were separated between limited—albeit important—powers under congressional control and the larger number left to the separate determination by legislature within each state. Subjects not believed to require a common regime of uniform national regulation—and thus not identified in Article I or elsewhere as subject to congressional disposition—were reserved from the national government to such differential treatment as the domestic law of each state might reflect. Madison characterized this basic arrangement in THE FEDERALIST #45: "The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the federal government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite."

The Supreme Court, while fully expected to grant full enforcement to acts of Congress within its ENUMERATED POWERS ("few and defined"), was equally expected to withhold enforcement from any not within them. Indeed, it was the latter obligation of the courts that was particularly emphasized in the course of the RATIFICATION debates. In Pennsylvania, JAMES WILSON put the point reassuringly in the following terms: "If a law should be made inconsistent with those powers vested by this instrument in Congress, the judges, as a consequence of their independence, and the particular powers of government being defined, will declare such law to be null and void." In The Federalist #78, ALEXANDER HAMILTON specifically adverted to the federalism-checking function of the courts: "If it be said that the legislative body [Congress] are themselves the constitutional judges of their own powers, . . . it may be answered that this cannot be the natural presumption, where it is not to be collected from any particular provision in the constitution. . . . It is far more rational to suppose that the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority." In the Virginia convention, JOHN MARSHALL took the same view: "If they [Congress] were to make a law not warranted by any of the powers enumerated, it would be considered by the judges as an infringement of the Constitution which they are to guard. They would not consider such a law as coming under their jurisdiction. They would declare it void."

Moreover, according to Marshall, a law that might nominally come within the limits of some enumerated power vested in Congress should—and would—be held void by the courts if it were discoverable that it was but a means to effectuate a control over a matter not entrusted to Congress, a matter reserved to the internal disposition of each state. On the very point of policing the equilibrium of federalism against abuse by congressional indirection in the exertion of its powers (as in South Dakota v. Dole), Marshall insisted in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND on the obligation of the judges to disallow the attempt: "[S]hould congress, under pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not trusted to the [national] government it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say, that such an act was not the law of the land." This is the same position Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER repeated concretely, dissenting in United States v. Kahriger (1953): "[W]hen oblique use is made of the taxing power as to matters which substantively are not within the powers delegated to Congress [in this instance, whether gambling within a state ought or ought not be suppressed—a commonplace criminal law subject of state and local law and nowhere entrusted to Congress to decide], the Court cannot shut its eyes to what is obviously, because designedly, an attempt to control conduct which the Constitution left to the responsibility of the States, merely because Congress wrapped the legislation in the verbal cellophane of a revenue measure."

The constitutional checks felt to be desirable in respect to state laws not subject to congressional pleasure were in turn expressly (albeit quite narrowly) provided for principally in the special provisions of Article I, section 10 (forbidding state EX POST FACTO LAWS or impairing the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACT). Later, to be sure, between 1865 and 1870, these limitations were significantly enlarged in the Civil War amendments—in respect to which Congress is given strong powers of enforcement. However, subject to these limitations and such others as might be variously reflected internally in each state in keeping with its own constitution as interpreted by the states' own courts (rather than as the federal courts might want), it was the varietals of state law—not national law—that were meant to occupy the fields not given to Congress to command.

The main check against persistent immoderation of state law (for example, criminal law, family law, TORTS, local business regulation, trusts and estates) lay not in any possible PREEMPTION by Congress—it being understood that there was no such general power of preemption provided or vested in Congress by the Constitution. Instead, the main check that might keep the character of state laws from reaching extremes not forbidden by the constitution itself inhered in the porousness of state boundaries and the freedom of state citizens to move away from a state to a different state, taking their skills and personal property with them. Any persistent tendency toward immoderation in state legislation was thus constrained to the extent it was deemed constitutionally desirable to have it constrained—not by a supererogatory general authority in Congress, but by the consciousness of each state that it could not prevent its citizens from considering the comparative advantage of a different state or veto the free movement of persons and of personal property within the United States.

In contrast, modern federalism, or sufferance federalism, eliminates this alternative check on state laws, as it tends also to eliminate differences among the states themselves. Insofar as processes of democratic centralism (Congress) can impose uniform preemptive national legislation regardless of subject matter (as the Constitution is now construed by the Supreme Court to permit—largely via the COMMERCE CLAUSE), such difference as any particular state law might provide as a contrast with that of some other state can be made of no consequence even within that state. Whatever the state law may permit to those within that state, it remains true that even all those moving to or residing in that state must reckon with the separate and enforceable prohibition Congress has already enacted and made applicable to them as a matter of federal law, a law fully enforceable via the federal courts. They must therefore conform to that law, rather than merely to the law of the state, regardless of where they reside. And insofar as Congress has been persuaded to regulate them in keeping with how others (though not including the state of their residence) may want them to be regulated by federal law, it will make no difference where they attempt to go. However, even more obtains under sufferance federalism than this. Because powers vested in Congress are interpreted to permit it to effectively determine the very content of state laws (as they are now so interpreted in general), then to the extent that INTEREST GROUPS and states with influence in Congress find themselves embarrassed or vexed by some distinction the internal laws of some few other states provide by way of contrast with themselves, they may act through Congress to compel the legislatures in every state to revise those states' own laws to conform to the preference already adopted in their states. Either way, then, such differences as may tend to exhibit themselves in certain laws of different states even today remain subject to congressional sufferance and elimination, if, as, and when Congress so decides.

It is the interpretive stance of the Supreme Court (e.g., on the scope of the power to "regulate commerce among the several states," equating it with a power to regulate or prohibit whatever may affect commerce, whether or not it is commerce that Congress cares about in the particular case) and not the literal abrogation of JUDICIAL REVIEW on the federalism question that is solely responsible for the change to sufferance federalism in the United States. The Court continues to be nominally willing to review substantive federalism, but it invariably sustains such preemptions of directions or commands that Congress presumes to enact as long as Congress goes through certain formal motions in the course of enacting its bills; however, it is not a refusal to hear or to entertain the case as such. This distinction might appear to be merely scholastic insofar as the practical results would appear to be the same as though the Court had abrogated judicial review of federalism cases. But it is more than scholastic precisely because the Court's current position does not leave the merits of the federalism objection unaddressed; rather, it denies the merits of those objections—that is, it decides the cases in which they arise. Accordingly, an amendment currently being pressed in thirty-three state legislatures (approved by fifteen legislatures, by one house in six others, and pending in twelve more) that, if proposed and ratified, would require the Court to address and decide the merits of federalism objections in cases otherwise appropriately raising such questions, would change nothing at all. Proposals of this sort proceed on a misunderstanding of judicial behavior on the Supreme Court. Sufferance federalism in the United States is not the result of the nonreviewability of federalism cases arising under the Constitution; rather, it is the result of the Supreme Court's own disposition to find that it is merely this form of federalism the Constitution of the United States provides.

WILLIAM W. VAN ALSTYNE
(1992)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD 1950 The Passing of Dual Federalism. University of Virginia Law Review 36:1–23.

EPSTEIN, RICHARD 1989 The Proper Scope of the Commerce Clause. In Ellen Frankel Paul, ed., Liberty, Property, and Government. Albany: State University of New York Press.

PATTERSON, JAMES 1969 The New Deal and the States: Federalism in Transition. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

STERN, ROBERT 1973 The Commerce Clause Revisited—The Federalization of Intrastate Crime. Arizona Law Review 15: 271–285.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM 1985 The Second Death of Federalism. Michigan Law Review 83:1709–1733.

——— 1987 Federalism, Congress, the States and the Tenth Amendment: Adrift in the Cellophane Sea. Duke Law Journal 87:769–799.

——— 1989 Dual Sovereignty, Federalism and National Criminal Law: Modernist Constitutional Doctrine and the Nonrole of the Supreme Court. American Criminal Law Review 26:1740–1759.

FEDERALISM, HISTORY OF

Reflecting on the achievements of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, JAMES MADISON, wrote in 1831 that the Framers had lacked even "technical terms or phrases" to describe accurately the governmental system they designed. Prior to 1787, the term "federal" had been used to signify confederation, a system in which SOVEREIGNTY remained with the constituent states that ceded certain elements of authority to a central government—and in which the central authority's legislature merely could propose measures to the states for approval. By contrast, in what was known as "consolidated" government, typical of the modern European nation-state, the central authority was the repository of sovereignty and the power of the locally based units of government depended entirely upon it. The Founders departed from all the historical precedents in both these modes, Madison declared, to produce a system that was "a novelty and a compound." It is this system that we know as American federalism, with its combination of features associated with both the consolidated (or unitary) nation-state and the old-style confederational form of government.

Nearly two centuries of colonial history in North America had afforded only rare examples of cooperation and coordination that presaged even in a remote way the system devised in 1787. In 1643, Plymouth, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Haven formed a league called the United Colonies of New England. Commissioners appointed by the four governments dealt with boundary questions, missions to the Indians, and even coordination of military operations in the Indian war of 1675–1676; but the organization soon faded into obscurity. The only serious effort at united action after that time and involving surrender of any colonial powers was the abortive Albany Plan of Union of 1754. Designed by BENJAMIN FRANKLIN and THOMAS HUTCHINSON, the plan would have created a council of the colonies and an executive appointed by the Crown. In addition to being empowered to declare war, conclude treaties with the Indian nations, and regulate territories outside the existing colonial boundaries, the council would have been given authority to impose taxes. But the plan foundered, with not a single colonial assembly giving assent to the proposal.

Certain qualities of the British colonial system itself had foreshadowed American federalism. Although formal authority remained squarely in the hands of the British government, still the colonies were given significant latitude in governing their own affairs. The sudden centralization of power after 1763, when the British decided to tighten the reins and impose new taxes and administrative reforms, precipitated the Revolutionary crisis. Even the exigencies of newly declared independence and armed conflict with Britain had not induced the American states, however, to surrender claims to sovereignty in the interest of national unity. Indeed, the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION specifically provided that each state would retain "its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, JURISDICTION and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled." Article III, moreover, described the government only as "a firm league of friendship." The notorious weaknesses of government under the Articles, leading to demands for basic reform by 1786–1787, derived from precisely this perpetuation of the states' prerogatives.

What the Convention sought to create in 1787 was a system in which some measure of sovereignty would be retained for the states; but the national government would be given powers ample enough to govern effectively, operate directly upon the citizens, and establish the nation as a credible presence in international affairs. The continued existence of the states as separate legal entities was an essential component of the original understanding embodied in the Constitution. Structural features that assured the states of great influence included the system of REPRESENTATION in Congress (including equal representation for each state in the Senate), the AMENDING PROCESS, and the voting by state in the House of Representatives in presidential elections not resolved in the ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Equally important was the concept of enumerated powers. The jurisdiction of the proposed national government, wrote Madison in THE FEDERALIST #39, extended "to certain enumerated objects only, and [left] to the several states a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects." The "general principle" underlying enumeration of the central government's powers, as JAMES WILSON later wrote, was "that whatever object was confined in its nature and operation to a particular State ought to be subject to the separate government of the States; but whatever in its nature and operation extended beyond a particular State, ought to be comprehended within the federal jurisdiction." On this principle was designed Article I, section 8, with its enumeration of the specific powers of Congress, including control over foreign and INTERSTATE COMMERCE, coinage, and the military and naval forces; the power to establish roads and post offices, inferior federal courts, and an organized militia; and authority as well to declare war and conclude treaties, to create a federal district as the seat of government, and to govern TERRITORIES and regulate property of the United States. Specific limitations were also embraced in the original document of 1787: the prohibition against import and export taxes, grants of TITLES OF NOBILITY, BILLS OF ATTAINDER, suspension of HABEAS CORPUS except during rebellions or invasions, or congressional interference with the slave trade for a period of twenty years. Demarcating the boundaries of the states' authority were provisions in Article I, section 10, that prohibited the states from enactment of EX POST FACTO LAWS, bills of attainder, or laws impairing the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACT. The Constitution also forbade the states from entering into treaties or imposing duties or tonnage fees without permission of Congress.

The seeds of controversy over the proper reach of the bounds of national power were to be found, however, in the GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE and in the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE. Article VI, moreover, included the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, holding that all laws and treaties made under the Constitution "shall be the supreme Law of the Land." Opponents of the Constitution cited all these provisions as evidence that the Constitution could easily justify a dangerous centralization of power, overwhelming the states and rendering their alleged residual sovereignty a nugatory matter. A new tyranny, according to this view, could easily be the result of consolidated, unitary government.

Anticipating exactly such objections, the Framers built into the federal design a guarantee of a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT to each state. The PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES, and extradition provisions further buttressed state authority. The most important consequence of concern about the centralization of power and potential tyranny, however, was the movement for a BILL OF RIGHTS. The first nine amendments, together with the original provisions of the Constitution prohibiting the states from enacting bills of attainder or abrogating contracts, represented an effort to establish national ideals of justice—defining boundaries beyond which government must respect the rights of individual citizens. The Bill of Rights served to reinforce federalism itself as a bulwark of defense for liberty against concentrated governmental power.

What values were intended to be served by this new system of federalism, a system described by a New York judge in 1819 as a "complex and peculiar structure" that permitted the states and the national government to move "in different spheres but occupying the same territorial space, operating upon and for the benefit of the same people"? The first value, designed to protect liberty and to give republican principles full play, was maintenance of government "close to the people." The champions of the Constitution contended that by giving a continuing—and vital—role to the states, popular oversight of governmental operations would be effective and there would be a high degree of participation in public affairs. These same contentions have been heard ever since in the arguments for a federal division of powers in American government.

A second value given a high place in the rationale for federalism was diversity itself. Regional differences in cultural values and local preferences on matters of law and policy would be permitted and find expression when important powers of government remained with the states. Providing in this manner for diversity meant, as Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS argued in NEW STATE ICE COMPANY V. LIEBMANN (1932), that "a single courageous state may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory, and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the rest of the country."

Efficiency was another value intended to be promoted by federalism. Loading all the functions of government upon authority at the center is not only potentially dangerous to liberty; it is also potentially the cause of congestion, complexity, and ineffectiveness. Even unitary, consolidated governments find it necessary to devolve certain functions on subnational or local authority. As Madison wrote in The Federalist #14, even if the states were to be abolished, "the general government would be compelled, by the principle of self-preservation, to reinstate them in their proper jurisdiction." What distinguishes a system founded on the principles of federalism from a consolidated system, however, is that federalism recognizes the legitimacy of exclusive state claims to some meaningful autonomy in important areas of law and policy. Power to control at least some of the things that really matter, in the regulation of society's affairs, must be left to the states.

A notable distinguishing feature of American federalism, consistent with the effective pursuit of these values, is the provision for constitutional amendment. What seemed a rational division of authority in the largely agrarian-commercial nation of 1787 will not be rational (or even minimally workable) two hundred years later in an integrated industrial nation with over fifty times the population of 1787. Most of the major changes in the American federal system, both in formal doctrine and in actual governmental practice, have occurred in response to that problem. By a remarkable insight of the Framers, expressed through the amendment process explicitly and the judicial processes by implication, they provided mechanisms for successful adaptation to changing circumstances and national values.

The principles of a federal system require that major changes in the boundaries of authority between the states and the national government should be accomplished by the prescribed amendment process. Such fundamental change should not occur through a process of ordinary legislation or mere administrative innovations in policy. The actual operation of the American system has sometimes conformed to this ideal: fundamental change in the structure of powers within the system were initiated, for example, by the CIVIL WAR and RECONSTRUCTION amendments. Yet at other times basic changes in federal-state relationships were effected without resort to the amendment process. Even the THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS, for example, ratified decisions already made on the bloody battlefields of the Civil War. The doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS was a judicial invention in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819). The dramatic swing in antebellum interpretation of the COMMERCE CLAUSE—first the MARSHALL COURT's nationalistic interpretation; then, the TANEY COURT's assertion of DUAL FEDERALISM and concurrent powers—came about by judicial innovations in doctrine. Vast changes in law and policy, not least the abandonment of economic due process and the emergence of new presidential EMERGENCY and WAR POWERS, have occurred since 1933 without benefit of constitutional amendments.

Provisions for accommodating new states in the course of national expansion is another important feature of the federal scheme. The thirteen original states took the chance, in effect, that they would be confronted by new sectional alignments and powerful interests hostile in some measure to their own. It was a certainty that each new state taken into the Union would significantly dilute the power of the original states in the Senate, and, as population grew in newer areas, would dilute even more their power in the House of Representatives and in the Electoral College. This provision for the admission of new states underlined the values fundamental to the original understanding: government close to the people, diversity, and efficiency.

A legacy of the Founders not easily separated from their creation of a federal system is the "federal creed" that has been as influential in shaping political behavior as constitutional provisions have been in shaping the dynamics of government. By "federal creed" is meant habitual skepticism with regard to centralized power. It was expressed vividly in Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass:

> To the States or any of them or any city of the States, > Resist much, obey little.
> Once unquestioning obedient, once fully enslaved, no nation state, city of this earth, ever afterward resumes its liberty.

These lines express a political reality of the nineteenth century, namely, that whenever a policy was considered, debate typically centered not only on the wisdom of the policy itself but also on the cognate question: what level of government—the states or Washington—ought legitimately to have responsibility? It was the enduring popular commitment to the values of federalism, some historians contend, that kept the nation from accepting full-scale reorganization as a consolidated, unitary government in the Civil War years. Instead, despite such centralizing measures as the wartime banking laws and the postwar adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, there remained a strong faith in the desirability of a meaningful "state sovereignty." The culture of federalism was expressed in the enigmatic pronouncement of the Supreme Court in TEXAS V. WHITE (1869) that "the Constitution in all its provisions looks to an indestructible Union composed of indestructible states." Similar convictions about the states' continuing importance found voice in COLLECTOR V. DAY, two years later, when the Court asserted that surviving aspects of state sovereignty made the states "as independent of the general government as [it] is independent of the states."

Opponents of centralized power appealed to such convictions in the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century, when they argued for narrow construction of the commerce clause and found in the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment authority for declaring unconstitutional congressional regulatory measures. The same federal creed led many reformers in the Progressive era to prefer uniform state codes to outright imposition of uniformity in law by congressional action. In the New Deal years and down to the present day, moreover, opponents of the welfare and regulatory features of modern policy have expressed their views in terms that extolled state sovereignty and deplored the centralizing of power in Washington as contrary to the Framers' intent.

The variety and ingenuity of such arguments have led many commentators to conclude that the federal creed is a convenient, all-purpose shield behind which to advocate special-interest positions. The most egregious example in the nation's history has been the invocation of STATES' RIGHTS as a justification for policies of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. Conservative jurists also created a constitutional void within which neither the national government nor the states could legislate to regulate economic interests; federalism became the handmaiden of laissez-faire. Inconsistency in the application of federal principles in the 1920s led THOMAS REED POWELL to remark that "the sacred slogan of states' rights is easily forgotten when employers wish their laborers sober but unctuously invoked when they wish them young" (a reference to southern opposition to child-labor laws and support of national prohibition). In the post-WORLD WAR II era, moreover, some of the most outspoken champions of "small government" and states' rights, and opponents of the nationalization of economic and social policy, have also been most consistently in favor of massive increases in the size of the national armed forces and even of federal surveillance of political activists and other infringements on CIVIL LIBERTIES.

Even if one concedes that federalism can be a smokescreen behind which special interests can pursue selfish aims or hide inconsistencies, the prominence of the traditional values of federalism in political rhetoric indicates that such arguments are regarded as effective. They are, in effect, appeals to the values of a "federal" political culture: American political consciousness retains inherited and much reiterated notions that certain important values are best served by decentralization of power.

Some prominent contemporary students of American federalism claim that the abstract concept of separate governments (state and national), with separate responsibilities and constituencies, is—and indeed always has been—a fiction. According to this view, despite the "fiction" of ENUMERATED POWERS there has always been an overlap of responsibilities and a significant measure of federal-state sharing of power. "Dual federalism"—the concept of state and national governments occupying distinct, separate spheres of authority—is in this version of our history only a myth. Contrary to this view is another that contends that until 1861 the federal system in actuality functioned much as the model of "dual federalism" prescribed, and after the Civil War, there began a progressive centralization of power which continued until the 1980s.

The evaluation of such contending views depends upon analysis not only of doctrinal development but also of the system's practical operation. How has government actually behaved, and to what extent has power been centralized or decentralized in important areas of policy, at different stages of the nation's history? In fact, the story of American federalism is one of progressive centralization. Except for the overarching continuity infusing the whole record—the progressive centralization of power, step by step—distinct stages in the history of federalism indicate fundamental discontinuities.

The first stage was the period from the founding, in 1787–1789, to the Civil War. In this period, a remarkable array of governmental functions were exclusively, or nearly so, in the hands of the states. Power was diffused, and what "sharing" was found tended to be confined to the most superficial types of cooperation between state and national governments. Criminal law, definition of the requirements of due process, prison management, and criminal punishment were all state functions. So was the definition of property rights, confined only by the contract clause decisions of the Supreme Court. The power of EMINENT DOMAIN was exercised by the states virtually without a check by federal authority. Public education and labor relations, even slavery, were state matters. The states controlled the content of commercial law, family law, and such COMMON LAW matters as the rules of torts, nuisance, and liability. Also decentralized were CORPORATION law, most of taxation policy, and the design and control of the nation's transport system. At no other time after 1861 were the theoretical maxims of dual federalism so closely approximated by government in action.

The decentralization of real power before 1861 persisted even though the Marshall Court was handing down a series of landmark "nationalizing" decisions that lay the doctrinal groundwork for centralization. Even the Marshall Court left the door open for robust state regulatory activity. By the late 1830s, moreover, the Taney Court had begun to develop the doctrine of "concurrent powers," and it had shored up the STATE POLICE POWER with its decision in CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE V. WARREN BRIDGE (1837). Congress simply abstained from acting in many areas of policy that had been left open to it by the Marshall Court's doctrines. The state governments, therefore, held the reins in many vital areas of policy; the structure and dynamics of power were decentralized. One consequence of this decentralization was significant state-to-state variation in the substantive content of law in property, labor, family, and criminal law. The differences between law in slave states and free states were only the most dramatic illustration of such diversity.

The period from 1861 to 1890 was the second stage in the development of American federalism. Formal constitutional change came with the Civil War and had transforming doctrinal and practical consequences, deriving from the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments. Meanwhile, Congress in the 1860s was enacting CIVIL RIGHTS laws, instituting an income tax (terminated after the war), inaugurating a national banking system, subsidizing transcontinental railroad projects, and expanding the size and reach of the federal bureaucracy generally. Thus power was centralized at an entirely unprecedented level, both in control of the economy and in protection of individual rights. Laws expanding the jurisdiction of the federal courts further concentrated power in the national government. In 1887, the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT inaugurated federal ADMINISTRATIVE LAW and centralized the regulation of the railroads. In 1890, the SHERMAN ACT marked the beginning of federal business law. Although such measures continued the centralizing trend in the distribution of real power, nonetheless elements of dual federalism persisted: property law, criminal justice, family relations, labor law, and most of an infant system of business regulation all remained nearly exclusively with the states.

The third stage of American federalism occupied the years 1890–1933. It was an era of accelerating centralization of policy responsibilities—although diversity persisted and the states did continue to exercise a wide-ranging discretionary authority, without substantial federal interference or direction, in many areas of law. Large-scale aid for irrigation in the West commenced with the Carey Act of 1894; and the Newlands Act of 1902 established an even larger national policy presence in that area. The PURE FOOD AND DRUG ACT (1906) signaled a trend toward exercise of the NATIONAL POLICE POWER, augmenting controls imposed through use of the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER, POSTAL POWER, and commerce power. Both the Federal Reserve Act of 1913 and the CLAYTON ANTITRUST ACT of 1914 greatly extended federal administrative law, displacing state regulatory powers. Over the next seventy years, one of the most influential changes was the SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT, which set the stage for the national government's use of income taxes as a major source of revenues. Midway in this period, moreover, came the dramatic temporary expansion of centralized power occasioned by WORLD WAR I. Although the conservative dominance of Congress in the Republican 1920s slowed the centralizing trend, even in that decade new responsibilities were assumed or expanded by the national government. They included the institution of FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID to the states for infant and maternity care, and expansion of the federal roads program, established earlier. The 1920 Transportation Act and the Federal Power Act of the same year also enlarged the regulatory powers of the federal government.

Ironically, these expansions of centralized power occurred in counterpoint with recurrent expressions of dual federalism and LIMITED GOVERNMENT doctrines by the Supreme Court. The most important initiatives of Congress struck down by the Court were the income tax instituted in 1893 and the 1916 KEATING-OWENS CHILD LABOR ACT. Matters such as labor relations were "entrusted to local authority" by the Constitution, the Court asserted in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918); child labor was "a purely local matter in which federal authority does not extend," and to permit Congress to regulate child labor risked permitting "our system of government [to] be practically destroyed"! Yet the same judges who subscribed to such doctrines of federalism also adhered to the doctrine of economic due process. Hence, when the Court reviewed regulatory and welfare legislation enacted by the states, it frequently struck down such laws under the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court thus immunized many business interests against regulation by either the state or the national government. The federal judiciary's activism in the cause of laissez-faire and dual federalism, ironically, was evidence of a negative type of centralization: the Supreme Court stood as censor of the states in vital social and economic matters.

Against this background of mixed constitutional doctrine and new centralizing initiatives, intergovernmental relations in the modern "sharing" mode emerged. Its most important feature was grants of cash aid to the states. Congress often tied strings to such aid, requiring planning of state programs and some degree of auditing by federal officers. By 1920, eleven programs were paying $30 million annually to the states—about 2.5 per cent of state revenues, or about a tenth the proportion paid by such grants-in-aid in the early 1980s—with most of the payments representing highway construction funds.

In the field of civil rights, the Court made only a small dent in the solid shield of states' rights behind which Jim Crow legislation, disfranchisement of blacks, and control of racial violence remained the exclusive responsibility of state governments. In the South, white supremacy reigned. In the area of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, however, there was some movement by the Court toward applying Fourteenth Amendment constraints on state action.

The fourth stage of American federalism's development embraced the NEW DEAL and World War II years, from 1933 to 1945. This period witnessed the wholesale centralization of policy responsibilities, a movement spurred by the worst economic depression in the nation's history and by four years of total mobilization for war. In the wake of centralizing initiatives by Congress came a dramatic shift in constitutional doctrine by the Supreme Court. To be sure, the Court initially erected doctrinal barriers to the innovations of FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's New Deal administration; but by 1937–1938 a modern "constitutional revolution" had occurred without benefit of formal constitutional amendment. The Court discarded the doctrine of economic due process, and it adopted an interpretation of the commerce clause that validated unprecedented expansion of federal interventions in the economy and of social welfare and relief programs.

One policy area after another that previously had been in the states' hands came into the domain of federal action. Congress made agriculture a managed sector beginning in 1933; and the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT had much the same effect in the manufacturing sector from 1933 to 1935. The TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT inaugurated regional development under federal auspices, and national programs proliferated in the conservation and reclamation fields. The WAGNER ACT of 1935 established a comprehensive federal policy of collective bargaining in labor relations, instituting national administrative law in the labor field; and by 1938 wages and hours legislation had augmented the basic labor law by setting uniform national standards. Congress authorized massive federal relief and subsidized work programs; and the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT and unemployment-compensation legislation of 1935 marked a new era of nationally sponsored and directed welfare policy. The net of federal regulatory power was thrown over many areas of industry formerly controlled, if at all, by the states: BROADCASTING, trucking, waterways, the securities exchanges, and previously unregulated segments of the banking industry. Meanwhile grants-in-aid—and the model of COOPERATIVE FEDERALISM of which they were an essential component—began to dominate federal-state relationships. True "sharing," in which the bulk of funding came from Congress, thus became a prominent feature of the working federal system; yet decisions tended to be made at the center, both as to policy and as to funding, with the states exercising administrative functions and serving as conduits for federal money.

Still, except for the three and a half years of war, when emergency powers extended to the national control of virtually every feature of the nation's life, the states remained a source of diversity in the American system of government. Yet the number and the significance of policy areas under their control had been so reduced that a new-modeled federal system had clearly become dominant.

The final stage in the history of federalism dates from 1945 to the present day. Its main feature, at least until the administration of RONALD REAGAN beginning in 1981, was a continued trend toward centralization. Four characteristics of this centralization movement are particularly important. First is the permanent status of large-scale standing military forces, their support taking as much as half of the federal government's operating expenses—something without precedent in peacetime prior to 1940. Second is the tendency toward stronger federal guarantees of civil rights. All three branches of government contributed to the civil rights expansion. The executive branch enforced racial integration of the armed forces and required AFFIRMATIVE ACTION programs of firms taking government contracts. Congress defined new guarantees of rights in areas such as PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS, and employment; it also enacted legislation under which executive departments instituted affirmative action and equal opportunity policies in labor relations, education, and other areas. The judiciary played a leading role, with the line of DESEGREGATION cases elaborating the principles of BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954). The Court also carved out new areas of federal constitutional rights, such as the RIGHT OF PRIVACY and rights against SEX DISCRIMINATION.

The third major characteristic of centralization since 1945 is the rapid growth in the 1960s and 1970s, and the continued importance since then, of federal grants-in-aid to the states. The design and initiation of new grant programs, especially those associated with the "Great Society" measures of the LYNDON B. JOHNSON administration, led some analysts to speak of a "near monopolization of innovation by the central government" as a novel form of primary centralization. A fourth characteristic of post-1945 centralization is the continued enlargement of the scope of congressional regulatory concerns. Congress instituted far-reaching controls over air and water pollution, occupational health and safety, food and drug quality, and energy resources. Despite a strong movement in the Jimmy Carter and especially the Reagan years toward "deregulation," the federal regulatory presence in the mid-1980s remained far greater than that of the 1950s.

The Supreme Court seldom has stood in the way of such trends. Indeed, its role has been that of leader in the REAPPORTIONMENT and civil rights areas. In reviewing regulatory measures, only once since 1937 has the Court invoked states' rights or the commerce clause in such a way as to limit congressional power; that one exception was NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976), a decision of limited application although notable for its assertion of the rights of the states "as states." Some state activities, the Court held, were beyond the reach of national wage and hour standards. Yet the Court has validated all other federal regulatory measures.

The scores of modern grant-in-aid programs have included many that bypassed the state governments: federal funds were awarded directly to cities and local special-purpose districts. Another hallmark of recent intergovernmental relations is what may be termed "managerialism," taking the form of program realignments, reliance on new budgeting concepts, oversight of programs by regional-level federal offices, and increased attention by Congress to the quality of governmental services at all levels. In 1958, Congress created the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, which became a major proponent of reforms in aid programs and also an exemplar of the new-style managerialism in action.

Successive Presidents have championed the realignment of powers and policy responsibilities, as between the nation and the states. Thus Lyndon Johnson called for a "creative federalism" that would involve private-sector institutions as well as all levels of government in jointly administered programs. Some of Johnson's Great Society program complicated intergovernmental relations by permitting community organizations to challenge the existing governmental and political establishments. A reaction to the Johnson-era programs and politics was embodied in RICHARD M. NIXON's call for a "new federalism." His proposals took the form of combining increased executive power with increasing reliance on REVENUE SHARING and "block grants" instead of categorical or conditional grants-in-aid. Although during Jimmy Carter's administration general revenue sharing was continued, the President sought to reemphasize the problems of major urban centers and depressed minority populations; he also sought to impose tighter control on grants-in-aid, to assure the realization of congressional objectives.

Ronald Reagan announced his own brand of "new federalism" on taking office in 1981. Both in his rhetoric and by administrative actions, he sought to turn the clock back dramatically on many features of modern federalism. National political dialogue was infused, for the first time in many years, with an orthodox small-government, anticentralist ideology little heeded since New Deal days. Previous Republican Presidents—DWIGHT EISENHOWER, Nixon, and GERALD R. FORD—had all accepted in varying degrees, and even expanded in some respects, the permanent legacy of the New Deal. But in the 1980s, Reagan led a much more deeply rooted challenge to some of the welfare state and regulatory state foundations of the modern federal system. At the same time, he endorsed legislation designed to curb the authority of the federal courts, especially in the civil rights and CRIMINAL PROCEDURE areas; and he gave his support to constitutional amendments designed to permit school prayer in public schools, to require balanced BUDGETS, and to permit the states to prohibit abortions. Reagan's programs underlined his admiration for the constitutional doctrines and policies of federalism dominant in Republican circles in the 1920s.

Once again, therefore, in the Reagan years, federalism was at the center of political debate in America; and once again, the values of federalism were being invoked for purposes that transcended the mere reordering of federal-state relationships. The classic concerns of federalism in theory—diffusion of power, diversity, liberty, efficiency—remained in the forefront of public attention. How to square the ideals expressed in the original understanding with the social and economic realities of the late twentieth century remained a profoundly important issue.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(1986)

Bibliography

BEER, SAMUEL 1973 The Modernization of American Federalism. Publius 3:49–95.

DAVIS, RUFUS 1978 The Federal Principle: A Journey through Time in Quest of Meaning. Berkeley: University of California Press.

GRODZINS, MORTON 1966 The American System: A New View of Government in the United States, ed. Daniel Elazar. Chicago: Rand, McNally.

MACMAHON, ARTHUR W., ed. 1955 Federalism: Mature and Emergent. New York: Columbia University Press.

PATTERSON, JAMES 1969 The New Deal and the States: Federalism in Transition. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

SCHEIBER, HARRY N. 1975 Federalism and the American Economic Order, 1789–1910. Law & Society Review 10:57–118.

——— 1978 American Federalism and the Diffusion of Power. University of Toledo Law Review 9:619–680.

WALKER, DAVID 1981 Toward a Functioning Federalism. Cambridge, Mass.: Winthrop.

WRIGHT, DEIL 1978 Understanding Intergovernmental Relations. North Scituate, Mass.: Duxbury Press.

FEDERALISM, THEORY OF

The American federal system came into existence when the United States declared its independence in 1776. Indeed, the very process of declaring independence involved a series of reciprocal initiatives and actions on the part of the colonies; the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS declared independence for all thirteen colonies in one act, federal to the extent that the declaration itself was a culmination of this interplay and was undertaken by delegates from the states, each state speaking with one voice.

The foundation of the United States was a federal act par excellence, involving a consistent and protracted interplay between the colonies (later states) and the Congress, which they created as a single, national body to speak in their collective name. In the year that the representatives of the people of the colonies collectively declared the independence of the United States, other representatives of the same people were reconstituting the colonies themselves as states. Four colonies—New Hampshire, South Carolina, Virginia, and New Jersey—adopted state CONSTITUTIONS in 1776 before the adoption of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, and four more—Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, and North Carolina—did likewise before the year was out. Within sixteen months, all the former colonies except Massachusetts had adopted constitutions.

At one time this fact was used to argue that considerable disagreement existed over whether the states preceded the Union. Today it is generally agreed that both came into existence simultaneously—in the original federal act of the United States as such. In sum, all of the ambiguities of diversity in unity endemic to federalism were present at the creation. Even local governments (in this case the towns and counties) participated in the constitutional drafting and ratifying processes.

As Americans moved westward, they created new states "from scratch," in virtually every case establishing local and territorial institutions under the aegis of the federal government, but generally as a result of local initiatives. Ultimately, these new polities, with their new populations, would be admitted to the federation as states, fully equal to their sisters under the Constitution. Thus the American federation expanded from the Atlantic to the Pacific by settling what were, to white Americans, empty lands and organizing them politically.

The last of the forty-eight contiguous states was admitted in 1912; and Alaska and Hawaii, the two noncontiguous states, were added in 1959 and 1960, respectively, after relatively long periods of territorial status. In the same decade, the United States embarked upon a new experiment in federalism by creating a category of commonwealth or "free associated state," whose people, as American citizens, voted to associate their polity with the United States under a special charter. This new arrangement was devised for Puerto Rico, which became the first "free associated state" in 1952. In 1976 a similar arrangement was made with the Northern Mariana Islands. In both cases small, populated TERRITORIES sought that status to increase their autonomy, not to diminish it. (See COMMONWEALTH STATUS.)

Historically, then, the United States model is that of a political entity that was federal from its founding. The American states did not have to find a common cultural denominator because they had one from the first. All of their regimes were of the same character and their level of economic development was roughly equal. No plan for intercolonial union was ever put forth that was not federal in character. The American colonial period, indeed, had been a period of incubation for a uniquely American approach to governance, which properly can be termed "federal democracy."

Federal democracy is the authentic American contribution to democratic thought and republican government. Its conception represents a synthesis of the Puritan idea of the covenant relationship as the foundation of all proper human society and the constitutional ideas of the English natural rights school of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries. Contractual noncentralization—the structured dispersion of power among many centers whose legitimate authority is constitutionally guaranteed—is the key to the widespread and entrenched diffusion of power that remains the principal characteristic of and argument for federal democracy.

Federal democracy is a composite notion that includes a strong religious component. The religious expression of federalism was brought to the United States through the theology of the Puritans, who viewed the world as organized through the covenants that God had made with mankind, binding God and man into a lasting union and partnership to work for the redemption of the world, but in such a way that both parties were free, as partners must be, to preserve their respective integrities. Implicit in the Puritan view is the understanding that God relinquished some of His own omnipotence to enable men to be free to compact with Him.

According to federal theology, all social and political relationships are derived from that original covenant. This theological perspective found its counterpart in congregationalism as the basis of church polity and the town meeting as the basis of the civil polity. Thus, communities of believers were required to organize themselves by covenant into congregations just as communities of citizens were required to organize themselves by covenant into towns. The entire structure of religious and political organization in New England reflected this application of a theological principle to social and political life.

Even after the eighteenth-century secularization of the covenant idea, the behavioral pattern resurfaced on every frontier, whether in the miners' camps of southwestern Missouri, central Colorado, and the mother lode country of California, in the agricultural settlements of the upper Midwest, or in the wagon trains that crossed the plains, whose members compacted together to provide for their internal governance during the long trek westward.

It should not be surprising that Americans early became socialized into a kind of federalistic individualism that recognized the subtle bonds of partnership linking individuals even as they preserved their individual integrities. William James was later to write about the federal character of these subtle bonds in his prescription for a pluralistic universe as a "republic of republics."

In strictly governmental terms, federalism is a form of political organization that unites separate polities within an overarching political system, enabling all to maintain their fundamental political integrity and distributing power among general and constituent governments so that they all share in the system's decision-making and executing processes. In a larger sense, federalism represents the linking of free people and their communities through lasting but limited political arrangements to protect certain rights or liberties and to achieve specific common ends while preserving their respective integrities. To reverse the order, federalism has to do, first and foremost, with a relationship among entities, and then with the structure that embodies that relationship and provides the means for sustaining it. Originally federalism was most widely recognized as a relationship to which structural questions were incidental; but since the creation of the American federal system, in which a new structure was invented to accommodate that relationship, federalism has become increasingly identified in structural terms. This usage in turn has contributed to a certain emphasis on legal and administrative relations between the units and to a neglect of the larger question of the relationships federalism is designed to foster throughout the polity.

Although, in a strictly constitutional sense, American federalism is a means by which the national government shares authority and power with the states, the influence of federal principles actually extends far beyond the institutional relationships that link the federal, state, and local governments. The idea of the federal commonwealth as a partnership is a key principle of federalism and the basis of its integrative powers. Like all partnerships, the commonwealth is bound by a compact—the Constitution—that sets the basic terms of the partnership to insure, among other things, the preservation and continued political viability of its basic political units.

The principle of partnership has been extended far beyond its simple sense of a relationship between the federal and state governments. It has come to serve as the guiding principle in most of the political relationships that tie institutions, groups, interests, and individuals together in the American system. The term "partnership" describes a relationship that allows the participants freedom of action while acknowledging the ties that require them to function in partnership.

Partnership implies the distribution of power among several centers that must negotiate cooperative arrangements with one another in order to achieve common goals. Although the basic forms of the partnership are set forth in the United States Constitution, the actual character of the federal system is delineated, maintained, and made functional only partly by constitutional devices. The role of the Constitution (and of its primary interpreters, the courts) should not be minimized; yet equally important is the way in which the institutions and purposes of federalism are maintained through the political process. The political process, as it affects the federal-state-local relationship most directly, is made manifest through four basic political devices: territorial democracy, the dual system of laws and courts, the POLITICAL PARTY system, and the system of public-private "complexes."

The basic pattern of political organization in the United States is territorial. That is to say, American politics is formally organized around units of territory rather than economic or ethnic groups, social classes, or the like. The nation is divided into states, and the states are divided into counties, and the counties are divided into townships or cities or special districts, and the whole country is divided into election districts of varying sizes. This organization means that people and their interests gain political identity and formal representation through their location in particular places and their ability to capture political control of territorial political units.

A second basic device is the multiple system of laws and courts tied to the federal division of powers. In the nation as a whole, state law is the basic law. Federal law is essentially designed to fill in the gaps left by the existence of fifty different legal systems. Thus both state and federal courts are bound by state-made law unless it is superseded by the Constitution or by federal statutory law. The complexity of this system is compounded by the nature of the dual court structure, with each state and the federal government having its own complete court system. The federal courts have asserted extensive superiority in interpreting the manner in which the United States Constitution protects the rights of American citizens (who, of course, are also citizens of their states). Led by the United States Supreme Court, which is constitutionally placed at the apex of both court systems, the federal courts interpret federal law, review the work of the state courts, and enforce the laws of the states in which they are located in cases that come under federal JURISDICTION.

The third basic political channel is the party system. The Democratic and Republican parties represent two broad confederations of otherwise largely independent state party organizations that unite on the national plane primarily to gain public office. Despite the greater public attention given to the national parties, the real centers of party organization, finance, and power are on the state and local planes. This noncentralization of the parties helps to maintain generally noncentralized governments and to perpetuate a high degree of local control even in the face of "big government." Thus the party system is of great importance in maintaining the basic structure of American politics and basic American political values, including those of federalism.

The fourth political device, the system of public-private "complexes," is partly reflected in the character of interest group activity. The partnership system extends outward to include private elements as well as governments—both public nongovernmental bodies, such as civic, philanthropic, educational, health, and welfare associations, and private profit-making bodies. These private associations and bodies often work so closely with their governmental allies that it is difficult to distinguish where the public interest ends and the private interest begins.

As a federation, the United States differs from a confederation of essentially separate political systems where the overarching authority is deliberately weak. At the same time, in the noncentralized American system, there is no central government with absolute authority over the states, but there is a strong national or general government coupled with strong state and local governments that share authority and power, constitutionally and practically.

The first important feature of a federation, following the American pattern, is the fundamental role and importance of the federal constitution as an organic law. The American Constitution reflects a federal approach to political SOVEREIGNTY, rejecting the idea that states or governments are sovereign as such, and holding that the people are the ultimate repositories of sovereignty and that governments have only "powers," delegated to them by the people. That approach precludes any notion of INHERENT POWERS. Under the Constitution, all powers possessed by the federal government are delegated to it by the people. The federal government has no inherent powers, although, as a result of those delegated, it gains some inherent extensions of its power. So, for example, because the people have delegated to the federal government the power to conduct some aspects of FOREIGN AFFAIRS, the President is understood to have acquired certain IMPLIED POWERS to negotiate with foreign governments. Once the people delegated the principal power, the implied power flowed automatically, but the second is theoretically dependent upon the first. From time to time, Presidents have claimed that they have inherent powers in the fields of foreign affairs and defense that are not subject to constitutional limitations but, rather, flow from the status of the United States as a sovereign state. Although the United States Supreme Court has recognized the existence of inherent powers, it has clearly limited them. This approach has been possible in the United States because of the dual character of the American founding, which enabled Americans to avoid confronting the issue of sovereignty head on.

Accordingly, as ANDREW C. MCLAUGHLIN suggested, the American federal system was designed to provide for the government of a large civil society without reliance upon hierarchical principles. In its original form, the American political system was designed as a matrix of polities, an indefinite number of structured political arenas linked to one another within the framework provided by the national and state constitutions. These arenas were to be distinguished from one another not on the basis of being "higher" or "lower" in importance but on the basis of the relative size of the constituencies they served. It was further assumed that the arenas were essentially equal, because size, of itself, was no measure of importance. Tasks were designed to be assumed or shared within the matrix on the assumption that sometimes a smaller arena is more appropriate than a larger one and that sometimes the reverse is true. The federal government was constitutionally mandated to serve the largest arena and to maintain the entire structure by assuring the continuity of the matrix itself. The role of the state governments in serving the basic divisions in the matrix was affirmed in the constitutional arrangement, and the states established local governments to serve the smallest arenas. Today the matrix consists of thousands of local arenas within the national framework, divided into fifty basic units—the states of the federal Union.

The American system has increasingly emphasized COOPERATIVE FEDERALISM rather than DUAL FEDERALISM as the basis of its operations. The American pattern of federalism has been cooperative since its beginnings, because since its inception most powers and competences have been treated as concurrent, shared by the various planes of government. In Morton Grodzins's terms, it is not a layer cake but a marble cake. Therefore, in the American polity, it is especially difficult to define what is exclusively in the federal sphere of competence, or in the state sphere, or in the local sphere.

The American federal system is at once extraordinarily simple and unusually complex. The simplicity of the federal system lies in a formal structure of federal, state, and local governments and in the outline of formal relationships between them. The complexity of the system lies in the myriad relationships that have developed between the governments and those who make them work. People often tend to take it for granted that national problems are handled in Washington; state problems in the state capital; and local problems at city hall or in the county courthouse. But, although it is easy to say that this is how things should be, it is well-nigh impossible to take a specific issue or function and to determine that it is exclusively national, state, or local.

The constitutional place of the states in the federal system is determined by four elements: the provisions in the federal and state constitutions that either limit or guarantee the powers of the states vis-à-vis the federal government; the provisions in the federal Constitution that give the states a role in the composition of the national government; the subsequent interpretations of both sets of provisions by the courts (particularly the United States Supreme Court); and the unwritten constitutional traditions that have evolved informally and have only later been formally recognized through the first three, directly or indirectly. The federal constitutional provisions outlining the general position of the states must always be taken into consideration even if some of them can be transcended through politics in specific situations. The specific limitations and guarantees of state powers fall into four basic categories: general concern for the integrity of the states as well as their subordination to the Union; some brief provisions ensuring the states a role in the common defense; a delineation of the role of the states in the two central areas of positive governmental activity at home, management of commerce and raising of revenues; and a description of state responsibilities in the administration of justice.

The procedure by which the basic status of the Union may be revised is found in Article V of the United States Constitution.

Similar procedures are found in most federal constitutions in the world. They underline one of the paramount characteristics of a federation: the revision of the basic status of the union is not totally dependent on the member states. Individual states have no right to veto changes adopted through the accepted procedure. When they oppose an amendment to the constitution—or demand an amendment—they are not sure to win.

One of the most important features of American federalism lies in the impossibility of the member states to abandon the federation. As the Civil War dramatically affirmed, there is no right of SECESSION. The United States Supreme Court, responding to that war, set down the accepted definition of the American federation in TEXAS V. WHITE (1869): "The Constitution in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States."

Another characteristic of federalism in the United States is the existence of federal norms, whether legal, administrative, or judicial, that bear directly upon the federation citizens, without any need of intervention of the member states. The architects of the American system recognized that a successful federal system, something more than a loose confederation of states, required that both the national and the state governments be given substantial autonomy. They also recognized that each had to have some way to influence the other from within as well as through direct negotiation. The federal government has the power to deal directly with the public, that is to say, with the citizenry of the states. The states, in turn, have a major role in determining the composition of the federal government and the selection of those who make it work.

DANIEL J. ELAZAR
(1986)

Bibliography

ELAZAR, DANIEL J. 1962 The American Partnership: Intergovernmental Cooperation in the Nineteenth Century United States. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

——— 1984 American Federalism: A View from the States. New York: Harper & Row.

GRODZINS, MORTON 1966 The American System: A New View of Government in the United States. Chicago: Rand McNally.

HART, HENRY and WECHSLER, HERBERT 1953 The Federal Courts and the Federal System. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

MCLAUGHLIN, ANDREW C. (1932) 1972 The Foundations of American Constitutionalism. Gloucester, Mass.: Peter Smith.

OSTROM, VINCENT 1971 The Political Theory of the Compound Republic. Blacksburg: Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Center for the Study of Public Choice.

VILE, M. J. C. 1961 The Structure of American Federalism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

WRIGHT, DEIL S. 1978 Understanding Intergovernmental Relations. North Scituate, Mass.: Duxbury Press.

FEDERALISM AND CIVIL RIGHTS

In the scheme of the United States Constitution, the concept of FEDERALISM requires respect for the distinct legal authorities and diverse cultures of the separate states, but the concept of CIVIL RIGHTS requires adherence to uniform rules emanating either directly from the national Constitution or indirectly from various congressional enactments. The two concepts are thus bound in a structural tension.

This tension has persisted since the RECONSTRUCTION amendments, when the national government first seriously began to create federal civil rights that could be asserted against the states. These rights, together with the expansion of federal JUDICIAL POWER necessary to enforce them, were self-conscious efforts to eradicate aspects of the indigenous culture of the southern states traceable to the institution of SLAVERY. Federal civil rights were thus born in a burst of national centralization.

Ironically, these rights were interpreted by courts in such a way as to permit racial subordination to endure even in the absence of slavery. The FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT in particular was understood to establish civil rights that were primarily economic in nature, most notably the right of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. In the era after LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), federal courts were so persistent in using this right to strike down social reform legislation in the states that Thomas Reed Powell was moved to "question whether judicial centralization is not pushed to an extreme under our federal system."

In this context, the values of federalism acquired a distinctively progressive cast. In 1932, for example, Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, in his dissent in NEW STATE ICE COMPANY V. LIEBMANN, gave his influential and ringing defense of federalism as a "laboratory" for "novel social and economic experiments." When, after the constitutional crisis of the NEW DEAL, the Supreme Court backed off from its enforcement of laissez-faire economic rights, these same federalist values led some to challenge the Court's creation of a vigorous regime of noneconomic civil rights. In ADAMSON V. CALIFORNIA (1947), for example, Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER opposed Justice HUGO L. BLACK's proposal to "incorporate" the guarantees of the BILL OF RIGHTS into the Fourteenth Amendment for application against the states. Frankfurter argued that the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE would "tear up by the roots much of the fabric of law in the several States, and would deprive the States of opportunity for reforms in legal process designed for extending the area of freedom."

In this way the values of federalism became associated with conservative opposition to the establishment of federal noneconomic civil rights. This association reached its apex when the concept of STATES' RIGHTS was used to challenge the legitimacy of BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954, 1955) and the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT, a conjunction that came close to discrediting the values of federalism as effective limitations on the establishment of civil rights.

Certainly by the mid-1960s, as the nation committed itself to the recognition and implementation of civil rights, the values of federalism were in eclipse. The Supreme Court incorporated virtually all of the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment for application against the states, and it aggressively enlarged its interpretation of the scope and application of those rights. The incorporation of most of the FOURTH AMENDMENT, Fifth Amendment, and Sixth Amendment forced the states to comply with uniform national standards in the area of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE. The Court's expansion of FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY resulted in the invalidation of numerous state regulations that had heretofore been deemed perfectly acceptable reflections of local culture. And the Court's firm commitment to rights of racial and ethnic equality effectively outlawed the Jim Crow culture of the southern states. Congress significantly participated in this process of establishing national civil rights through its enactment of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1968, and the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965.

By the end of the WARREN COURT era, the rhetoric of federalism had virtually disappeared from the ongoing debate about the substance of civil rights. For example, when the BURGER COURT deliberated whether the EQUAL PROTECTION clause should require STRICT SCRUTINY of gender classifications, it argued the question almost entirely in terms of the independent merits of the position, rather than in terms of the effect that such scrutiny would have on the ability of diverse states to enact laws that reflected distinct cultural attitudes toward controversial issues of gender equality. Similarly, when the Burger Court in ROE V. WADE endowed women with the constitutional right to have an ABORTION, it barely discussed the implications of the decision for the values of federalism.

The end of the 1960s witnessed a political renaissance of the values of federalism, a renaissance that later intensified during the presidency of RONALD REAGAN. This renaissance found judicial expression in debates over the reach of federal judicial power, rather than in debates over the nature of the substantive civil rights protected by that power. Thus, both the Burger Court and the REHNQUIST COURT invoked values of federalism in order to curb the authority and accessibility of federal courts, which the Warren Court had greatly expanded in an attempt to enforce fully the civil rights that it had recognized.

For example, in an important line of cases that originated with YOUNGER V. HARRIS, the Burger Court invoked the principles of "our Federalism" in order to limit the availability of federal EQUITY relief. The Court explained these principles as a "notion of "comity,' that is, a proper respect for state functions," and the belief that the nation "will fare best if the States and their institutions are left free to perform their separate functions in their separate ways." The Court invoked similar notions of COMITY to justify restrictions on ACCESS TO THE COURTS for federal writs of HABEAS CORPUS, expansive interpretations of state immunity from federal judicial power under the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT, strict presumptions against waivers of that immunity, and limitations on the authority of federal courts to issue injunctions broadly restructuring state and local government institutions. The tension between civil rights and federalism thus continued, although in a somewhat modulated key.

That tension may profitably be analyzed by inquiring into the values served by the concepts of civil rights and federalism. Civil rights, at least those that emanate from the Constitution, serve mainly to protect persons from the exercise of governmental authority. The persistent image is that of individuals safeguarded by courts from the domination of an overpowering government. From this perspective, it makes no difference whether government power is exercised at the state or federal level.

Yet federalism is committed to the proposition that it is usually preferable to exercise power at the local rather than national level. There are many different rationales for this preference, ranging from efficiency to experimentation. But there are two justifications that are most directly responsive to the values underlying the claim for civil rights.

The first accepts the premise that it is vitally important to protect individual liberty from the excesses of state power, but it views courts as, in the long run, unreliable institutions for securing that protection. Individual freedom is better served, so the argument runs, by establishing the states as centers of power that are competitive with the federal government, in the expectation that the resulting diffusion of power will effectively check the potential for abusive government. To establish the states as independent centers of power, however, requires ceding to them autonomy from a uniform regime of civil rights emanating from the federal government. On this account, then, the resolution of the tension between civil rights and federalism ought to depend upon how the long-term benefits to civil rights anticipated from the structural arrangements of federalism compare against the short-term benefits that would result from judicial enforcement of federal civil rights.

The second justification for federalism strikes deeper, for it denies that the image underlying the rationale for civil rights is adequate as a description of local state governments. State governments, according to this argument, are closer to the people and hence more fully realize the values of political participation. Thus, they should not be pictured as overreaching and impersonal governments estranged from their citizens, but rather as more nearly authentic communities, in which political processes both form and express genuine social commitments. The national imposition of uniform civil rights would therefore be both unnecessary and deeply disruptive of these positive local processes. On this account, then, the resolution of the tension between civil rights and federalism ought to depend upon whether states can more accurately be described as representing authentic and inclusive communities or as impersonal and potentially oppressive governments.

Given the difficult and perplexing nature of these inquiries, it is clear why the tension between federalism and civil rights has endured, and in all likelihood will continue to do so.

ROBERT C. POST
(1992)

Bibliography

POST, ROBERT C. 1988 Justice Brennan and Federalism. In Harry N. Scheiber, ed., Federalism: Studies in History, Law and Policy, pp. 37–45. Berkeley, Calif.: Berkeley Press.

POWELL, THOMAS REED 1931 The Supreme Court and State Police Powers, 1922–1930. Virginia Law Review 17:529–556.

RAPACZYNSKI, ANDRZEJ 1985 From Sovereignty to Process: The Jurisprudence of Federalism After Garcia. Supreme Court Review 43:29–38.

SANDALOW, TERRANCE 1980 Federalism and Social Change. Law and Contemporary Problems 43:29–38.

FEDERALISM AND ENVIRONMENTAL LAW

Environmental protection was viewed as a state or local responsibility until the post–WORLD WAR II era when pollution problems assumed national scope. Congress responded initially by providing financial assistance to encourage state and local governments to control pollution. Federal grants for construction of municipal sewage treatment plants were the most prominent of these programs. The perceived failure of state and local regulation led Congress during the 1970s and 1980s to establish comprehensive national regulatory programs to protect the environment.

Most of the federal laws employ a "cooperative" FEDERALISM approach in which a federal agency establishes minimum national standards that states may opt to implement or to leave implementation to federal authorities. The Clean Air Act, the Clean Water Act, the Safe Drinking Water Act, and federal hazardous waste LEGISLATION require the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to set minimum national standards, while authorizing delegation of authority to administer these programs to states. In states that fail to receive program delegation, the laws are administered by federal authorities.

Most federal environmental laws allow states to adopt more stringent standards than the federally mandated minimum. However, in a few instances Congress has chosen to preempt inconsistent state standards, usually when regulating products that are distributed nationally, such as chemicals regulated under the Toxic Substances Control Act and pesticide labels mandated under the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act.

The rise of the federal regulatory infrastructure has generated environmental policy conflicts between federal and state authorities. Four types of constitutional issues have arisen in conflicts over environmental federalism. First, states have argued that some federal environmental regulations impermissibly infringe on state SOVEREIGNTY in violation of the TENTH AMENDMENT. In NEW YORK V. UNITED STATES (1992), the Supreme Court struck down a federal requirement that states "take title" to any low-level radioactive waste generated within their borders if they had not made arrangements by a certain date for access to a disposal site for such waste. The Court found that the requirement violated the Tenth Amendment by "comandeering" the states' legislative processes to compel states to enact and enforce a federal regulatory program. Few federal environmental laws are vulnerable to Tenth Amendment challenges because most offer states a choice between regulating an activity according to federal standards or having state law preempted by federal regulation.

This "cooperative federalism" approach is less intrusive on state sovereignty than direct PREEMPTION. Congress also may condition the receipt of federal funds on state participation in federal environmental programs, which is a proper use of Congress's SPENDING POWER and consistent with the Tenth Amendment so long as the conditions bear some relationship to the purpose of the federal spending. Thus, the Clean Air Act's denial of federal highway funds to states that fail to meet national air quality standards is constitutional.

The Court's decision in UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995) that Congress's regulatory authority under the COMMERCE CLAUSE of Article I, section 8, extends to intrastate activities only when they substantially affect INTERSTATE COMMERCE has spawned a second set of challenges to federal environmental regulations. Arguments that some federal environmental laws exceed Congress's authority by regulating noncommercial activity that is wholly intrastate have been rejected by most courts because of the potential cumulative impact of even localized environmental damage.

A third source of constitutional limitations on federal authority is the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT, which makes states immune from suits for damages in federal court. In Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida (1996), the Court held that Congress cannot abrogate state SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY by exercising its authority under the commerce clause. This overruled the Court's prior decision in Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co. (1989), which had held that a state could be liable for the costs of environmental remediation under the federal "Superfund" law.

In a fourth set of cases, beginning with PHILADELPHIA V. NEW JERSEY (1978), the Court has used the DORMANT COMMERCE CLAUSE to strike down state laws that restrict the disposal of waste originating out-of-state or that seek to channel solid waste flows to local facilities, as in C & A Carbone, Inc. v. Town of Clarkstown (1994).

While federal regulations now dominate the field, states continue to play an important role in implementing and enforcing national environmental policy under a system of cooperative federalism.

ROBERT V. PERCIVAL
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Environmental Regulation; Waste, Pollution, and Federalism.)

Bibliography

DWYER, JOHN P. 1995 The Practice of Federalism Under the Clean Air Act. Maryland Law Review 54:1183–1225.

ESTY, DANIEL C. 1996 Revitalizing Environmental Federalism. Michigan Law Review 95:570–653.

PERCIVAL, ROBERT V. 1995 Environmental Federalism: Historical Roots and Contemporary Models. Maryland Law Review 54:1141–1182.

PERCIVAL, ROBERT V.; MILLER, ALAN S.; SCHROEDER, CHRISTOPHER H.; and LEAPE, JAMES P. 1996 Environmental Regulation: Law, Science, and Policy, 2nd ed. Boston, Mass.: Little, Brown.

STEINZOR, RENA I. 1996 Unfunded Environmental Mandates and the "New (New) Federalism": Devolution, Revolution, or Reform? Minnesota Law Review 81:101–227.

FEDERALISM AND SHARED POWERS

FEDERALISM and SEPARATION OF POWERS are the two principal techniques in America for dividing political power. Federalism allocates power between the national government and the states; separation of powers distributes power among three branches of the national government and within each of the state governments. Although these divisions of power characterize national and state government, many essential functions of government are shared. Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON deftly noted in YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952), "While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government. It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity." Jackson directed his observation to the doctrine of separation of powers, but it applies equally well to federalism.

Independence from England in 1776 left the thirteen American states without a central government. Under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, drafted in 1777 but not ratified until 1781, each state retained "its sovereignty, freedom and independence," with the exception of a few powers expressly delegated to the national government. Various attempts were made over the years to bring a measure of effectiveness to the Confederation, but it was finally agreed after the ANNAPOLIS CONVENTION in 1786 to meet in Philadelphia the following year "to devise such further provisions as shall appear to them necessary to render the constitution of the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union."

The delegates at Philadelphia rejected MONTESQUIEU'S theory that republican government could function only in small countries. He had argued that as a country increased in size, popular control must be surrendered, requiring aristocracies for moderate-sized countries and monarchies for large countries. JAMES MADISON, in THE FEDERALIST #10, made precisely the opposite argument: that republican government was more likely the larger the territory. In a small territory, a dominant faction could gain control. "Extend the sphere," Madison reasoned, "and you take in a greater variety of parties and interests; you make it less probable that a majority of the whole will have a common motive to invade the rights of other citizens."

Critics of the 1787 Constitution claimed that it promoted a national or consolidated form of government instead of preserving the independence of the states. An exceptionally blunt challenge came from the Virginia ratification convention, where PATRICK HENRY attacked the opening words of the Constitution: "What right had they to say, We, the people? . . . Who authorized them to speak the language of, We, the people, instead of, We, the states?" Madison answered these critiques in Federalist #39, pointing out that the Constitution contained features of a national character but also vested some power directly in the states. The proposed Constitution, he said, "is, in strictness, neither a national nor a federal Constitution, but a composition of both." By "federal" Madison meant *con*federal: a confederation of sovereign states, such as existed under the Articles of Confederation.

The Philadelphia Convention wrestled with two rival proposals. The VIRGINIA PLAN called for a strong central government, while the NEW JERSEY PLAN advocated a confederation with few national powers. The latter attracted little support. The GREAT COMPROMISE, promoted by OLIVER ELLSWORTH of Connecticut, combined two antagonistic ideas: representation by population in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES and equal voting power for each state in the SENATE. He explained to the Convention on June 29, "We were partly national; partly federal. The proportional representation in the first branch [the House] was conformable to the national principle & would secure the large States agst. the small. An equality of voices [in the Senate] was conformable to the federal principle and was necessary to secure the Small States agst. the large. He trusted that on this middle ground a compromise would take place."

The compromise gave the central government the power to collect taxes, regulate commerce, and declare war, along with other express functions, including the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE to carry into effect the ENUMERATED POWERS. National powers are reinforced by the SUPREMACY CLAUSE in Article VI, section 2: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Article I, section 9, prohibits the national government from taxing articles exported from any state or preferring the ports of one state over another, while Article I, section 10, prohibits a number of state actions, including entering into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; coining money; passing any BILL OF ATTAINDER or EX POST FACTO LAW; impairing the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS; or laying any IMPOSTS or duties on imports or exports without the consent of Congress, except what is "absolutely necessary" to execute its inspection laws.

The TENTH AMENDMENT provides that the powers "not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The Articles of Confederation gave greater protection to the states, which retained all powers, except those "expressly delegated" to the national government. When it was proposed in 1789 that the same phrase be inserted in the Tenth Amendment, Madison objected to the word "expressly" because it was impossible to delineate every function and responsibility of the federal government. There had to be, he said, room for IMPLIED POWERS "unless the Constitution descended to recount every minutiae." On the force of his argument, the word "expressly" was eliminated from the Tenth Amendment. In MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL relied on Madison's argument in upholding the power of Congress to establish a national bank, even though that power is not expressly included in the Constitution.

The suggestion that the Tenth Amendment contains substantive powers for states, even to the point of reinserting the word "expressly," has been made in such cases as Lane County v. Oregon (1868) and HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918). In MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920), however, the Supreme Court denied that the TREATY POWER was restricted in any way "by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment," and Justice HARLAN F. STONE, in UNITED STATES V. DARBY LUMBER COMPANY (1941), dismissed the Tenth Amendment as a "truism," meaning only "that all is retained which has not been surrendered." Nevertheless, the decisions in Fry v. United States (1975) and NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976) demonstrate that the Tenth Amendment retains vitality.

Many of the turf battles between the national government and the states have been fought over the scope of the COMMERCE CLAUSE. Commercial friction among the states after 1776 was a principal reason for discarding the Articles of Confederation and adopting a government with greater national powers. The enumerated powers given to Congress in Article I include the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." In GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), Chief Justice Marshall advanced a broad interpretation of the power of Congress to regulate commerce, but over the years, the Court employed other doctrines to distinguish between national and state powers. At times the two levels of government could exercise CONCURRENT POWERS. States were able to regulate commerce within their borders unless preempted by Congress. The Court also created the doctrine of exclusive JURISDICTIONS, promoting the theory of DUAL FEDERALISM, under which the states and the national government exercised mutually exclusive powers.

These doctrines appeared to be increasingly artificial with the rapid nationalization of the American economy. Traditional boundaries between INTRASTATE COMMERCE and INTERSTATE COMMERCE were swept aside when the operations of railroads, agriculture, and livestock acquired national structures. The Court even held that Congress could regulate actions inside a state that were simply related to interstate commerce. During World War I and World War II commercial and economic activities that normally fell within the jurisdiction of the states were controlled by the federal government.

During the period of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, which lasted from the 1890s to 1937, the Supreme Court struck down a number of regulatory efforts by Congress and state legislatures on the theory that the statutes interfered with the "liberty of contract," a fiction created by the judiciary to limit governmental power. Statutes enacted to establish minimum wages and maximum hours, to protect children from harsh labor practices, or to create better working conditions were regularly invalidated by state and federal courts.

Those judicial doctrines were eventually cast aside during the NEW DEAL revolution, especially after the COURT-PACKING PLAN in 1937. Although at one period the Court struck down congressional statutes because they invaded "local" activities within the control of state governments or because "manufacturing" was considered by the judiciary as local and thus beyond congressional control, these barriers to national action were eventually removed. A series of rulings, such as NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. (1937) and United States v. Darby Lumber Company (1941), gave solid support to Congress's interpretations of its powers under the commerce clause. In PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE COMPANY V. BENJAMIN (1946), a chastened Court offered this revealing assessment: "The history of judicial limitation of congressional power over commerce, when exercised affirmatively, has been more largely one of retreat than of ultimate victory."

In National League of Cities v. Usery (1976), the Supreme Court appeared to resuscitate state SOVEREIGNTY and the Tenth Amendment. The case involved the decision of Congress to extend federal hours-and-wages standards to state employees. In Maryland v. Wirtz (1968), the Court had upheld the extension of federal minimum wages and overtime pay to state-operated hospitals and schools. It even upheld, in Fry v. United States (1975), the short-term power of the President to stabilize wages and salaries for state employees. Nevertheless, National League refused to permit federal minimum-wage and maximum-hour provisions to displace state powers in such "traditional governmental functions" as fire prevention, police protection, sanitation, public health, and parks and recreation. This 5–4 decision overruled Wirtz on the ground that the congressional statute threatened the independent existence of states. In his dissent, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN objected that the Court had delivered "a catastrophic judicial body blow at Congress' power under the Commerce Clause."

The Court's bifurcation between "traditional" and "nontraditional" governmental functions spawned confusion in the lower courts. Many of the efforts of federal district courts to apply the standard in National League were rejected by the Supreme Court. Finally, in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority (1985), Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, whose concurrence had provided the fifth vote in National League, swung in the other direction to join with the four dissenters in overruling National League. He called attention to the frustrating struggle in federal and state courts to distinguish between traditional and nontraditional functions. He called the criteria in National League "unworkable," "inconsistent with established principles of federalism," and "both impracticable and doctrinally barren." Because of this decision, the protection of federalism has been left largely to the political process of Congress. The tone of the four dissents, however, suggests that Garcia might be living on borrowed time, reflecting the position of older members of the Court: Blackmun, Brennan, THURGOOD MARSHALL, BYRON R. WHITE, and JOHN PAUL STEVENS. WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, the author of National League, offered this advice in his Garcia dissent: "I do not think it incumbent on those of us in dissent to spell out further the fine points of a principle that will, I am confident, in time again command the support of a majority of this Court."

Although the position of the Court on National League and Garcia might be in a state of flux and easily reversible, the judgment of ANTONIN SCALIA during his nomination hearings in 1986 to be Associate Justice seems well grounded in history: "The primary defender of the constitutional balance, the Federal Government versus the states, . . . the primary institution to strike the right balance is the Congress. . . . The court's struggles to prescribe what is the proper role of the Federal Government vis-à-vis the State have essentially been abandoned for quite a while."

LOUIS FISHER
(1992)

Bibliography

ADVISORY COMMISSION ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS 1988 State Constitutional Law: Cases and Materials. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office.

ANTON, THOMAS J. 1989 American Federalism and Public Policy. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

CONLAN, TIMOTHY 1988 New Federalism: Intergovernmental Reform from Nixon to Reagan. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

O'BRIEN, DAVID M. 1989 Federalism as a Metaphor in the Constitutional Politics of Public Administration. Public Administration Review 49, no. 5:411–419.

FEDERALISM IN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

See: Devolution and Federalism in Historical Perspective

FEDERALIST, THE

In the eight months following the adjournment of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, ALEXANDER HAMILTON, JAMES MADISON, and JOHN JAY wrote a series of eighty-five essays in support of the proposed Constitution. These essays were published in newspapers and as a two-volume book under the title The Federalist. This work was intended to influence voters electing delegates to the ratifying conventions and the delegates themselves; and the length, detail, and subtlety of its argument suggest an additional intention of enlightening later generations. While some contemporaries thought other, simpler and briefer, writings better calculated to influence the decision of 1787–1788, The Federalist was regarded as a work of enduring value by THOMAS JEFFERSON ("the best commentary on the principles of government which ever was written"), GEORGE WASHINGTON, and others. It has remained the most comprehensive and profound defense ever written of the American form of government; and it has been, as Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL wrote in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), "justly supposed to be entitled to great respect" by courts engaged in "expounding the constitution."

The first section of The Federalist (#2 through #14) explains the advantages of a union as compared to independent American states. A large country is better suited than small countries to avoid or win wars, to pursue profitable commercial arrangements, and to raise revenue. Moreover, a large country's relative freedom from fear of war makes it more likely to preserve a free government. (Small countries facing frequent wars eventually accept the risk of being less free in order to be more safe.) Most novel was The Federalist's claim that a popular form of government would be more likely in a large country than in a small country to secure private rights and the public good. MONTESQUIEU and the Anti-Federalist writers who quoted him acknowledged that large countries ruled by monarchs enjoyed certain advantages in FOREIGN AFFAIRS, but insisted that only small republics could enjoy the internal advantages of a patriotic citizenry ruling itself for its own good. In the famous Federalist #10 Madison argued that even in the smallest republic the citizenry is not an "it" but a collection of diverse individuals. Those individuals' rights deserve protection, but their passions and interests can unite them in groups that oppose the rights of others or the public good. Madison offered a twofold defense of a large republic. First, the diversity of a large country makes it less likely that any single group will constitute a majority of the voters and therefore be able to oppress other groups by virtue of the republican principle of majority rule. Second, in a large republic elections will be more likely to choose "fit characters" who will pursue the public good. The conclusion that republican government was possible, indeed better, in a large country served to reconcile the unpleasant necessities that seem to require largeness with the deep-rooted desire to have a popular government.

Essays #15 through #36 explain the necessity of "energetic" government. Although the national government has limited purposes, it must be able to tax and raise armies. Under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, Congress could demand the necessary money and men but had to address its demands to the state governments, whose disobedience could not be punished and whose compliance therefore could not be counted on. The decisive innovation of the new Constitution was the government's ability to address its commands to individual citizens, each of whose inability to contemplate forcible resistance made him respectful of "the arm of the ordinary magistrate." By defending this innovation in the name of FEDERALISM, The Federalist transformed the meaning of that term. Whereas others regarded true federalism as requiring what Montesquieu called a "society of societies"—that is, a union composed of and ruling over political communities rather than individuals—The Federalist regarded that as a prescription for disunion, thus deserving the name "antifederal" for its inevitable tendency.

The prospect that the new government would be able to exercise its nominal powers and coerce citizens raised the question of how such an energetic government could be confined to its proper purposes and restrained from oppression. The Federalist did not look to a careful enumeration of granted or excluded powers to control the government, because mere "parchment" would do little by itself and because certain formidable powers (for example, taxation) could not be excluded or even limited in their extent. The government could only be controlled by being "well modeled," by having a "general genius" and "internal structure" that made it trustworthy. This meant first of all that the government was "wholly popular"; its whole power was entrusted to the representatives of the people, and could therefore be controlled by the people in elections. The Federalist #37 through #84 explains the "conformity of the proposed Constitution to the true principles of republican government."

The fact that popular elections permit the people to "oblige the government to control itself" exhausts neither The Federalist's prescription for a well-modeled government nor its argument for popular government. For one thing, the people are vulnerable to rulers who deceive them, misuse their powers between elections, or cancel elections. "A dependence on the people is no doubt the primary control on the government; but experience has taught mankind the necessity of auxiliary precautions." The auxiliary precautions are of various sorts, but all are designed to make ambition counteract ambition, so that no ruler's love of power is given free rein. A SEPARATION OF POWERS, legislative, executive, and judicial, insures that the people will be ruled in accordance with known laws that are enforced even against those who adopt them. The executive's VETO POWER both preserves this functional separation and, together with the legislature's BICAMERALISM, inhibits hasty lawmaking. The judiciary enjoys a tenure of GOOD BEHAVIOR to fortify judges in their task of preventing illegal executive acts and unconstitutional legislative acts. This last activity, now known as JUDICIAL REVIEW, was given its first sustained intellectual defense by Hamilton in The Federalist #78. Hamilton insisted on the court's duty to enforce the Constitution as law and indeed, because it was solemnly and authoritatively adopted by the people, as superior to the laws passed by the legislature, even if the legislature's laws were supported or instigated by the people themselves. The legislature's power of IMPEACHMENT provided a remedy against abuse of this judicial authority, or of the President's formidable powers. And the existence of state and national governments with independent powers to serve their own distinct objects gives each a platform and a motive to expose the other's encroachments.

The Federalist defended such auxiliary precautions (that is, precautions in addition to the people's electoral power) as reducing the chance that the government would betray and oppress the people as a whole. A more difficult problem, already explained in The Federalist #10, was that the people are not a whole, and that rulers elected by the majority might oppress the rights of minorities. The longer terms of senators, Presidents, and judges enabled them to oppose sudden and transient unjust impulses of the majority. A grateful people might reward such service once the heat of passion had cooled, or an excellent ruler might do his duty without reward; but the Constitution's institutions could not defend against an enduring majority's unjust passion or interest—hence the importance of a large country's diversity in making such majorities less likely.

The Federalist defends the "particular structure" of the Constitution not only as discouraging oppression but as encouraging good government. The task of a good national government is to secure the nation against foreign and domestic violence and to regulate its commerce so as to promote the general welfare. These activities in turn serve the most fundamental object of government, which is justice, meaning the protection of each individual's right to exercise his own faculties in the acquisition of property and in other activities. Thus an important accomplishment for any government is that it not itself be a source of injustice, that it achieve "the negative merit of not doing harm."

Further, positive merit of doing some good is encouraged by the Constitution's creation of offices in relatively small numbers and with relatively long terms, so as to encourage more capable candidates to seek office and to be elected and (more important) to put those elected in a situation in which they feel a personal motive to do some good. The experience officials could gain in office would help them devise means to promote the public good; and the distance of the people from direct rule would enable them to judge dispassionately and retrospectively the merit of their officials' policies according to their experience of the apparent effects of those policies. In the best case, officials moved by "the love of fame, the ruling passion of the noblest minds" would have an opportunity to "undertake extensive and arduous enterprises for the public benefit." Even in more ordinary cases, a durable senate would tend to foster stability in the laws and a single executive would be able to enforce them energetically.

The Federalist's defense of these institutions does not, however, deduce them entirely from the requirements of safe and good government. By those standards, The Federalist would not have found indefensible the "mixed" government of England, whose popularly elected House of Commons permits the people to restrain the government from oppression, whose king is an energetic executive, and whose House of Lords provides a source of stability and of protection for the rights of a minority. The Federalist emphatically defends the "strictly republican," "wholly popular" character of the American Constitution, which is made necessary by "that honorable determination, which animates every votary of freedom, to rest all our political experiments on the capacity of mankind for self-government." Not a knowledge of human fitness for self-government but an assertion of that fitness, or a knowledge of the human impulse to assert that fitness, justifies popular government. To protect the faculties of men requires protecting their faculty of passionately defending their own opinions, respecting their "pretension" to rule. The Federalist defended the American Constitution not only for its likely service of the interests of Americans but also for its tendency to "vindicate the honor of the human race."

The Federalist remains America's most important political book because it offers an explanation and defense of our form of government written by men who could not take the goodness or permanence of that regime for granted. Americans who study The Federalist today may find not only new reasons to appreciate the Constitution they inherit but also an account of government somewhat different from that assumed in contemporary opinion. For example, to The Federalist justice means impartial protection of the right to exercise one's faculties, not equal provision for the satisfaction of one's needs or desires. CONSTITUTIONALISM means that the people's solemn choice of their own form of government can be overridden only by a new, deliberate popular choice, not silently and gradually improved by judges trying to make the Constitution a living document. And REPRESENTATION is an arrangement that allows an opinionated people to select capable rulers and periodically pass formal judgment on their service of the public good, not an imperfect simulation of ancient direct democracy or a primitive version of modern opinion polling. The Federalist is thus both a source of understanding and appreciation of the American Constitution and a guide to reflection on its subsequent development.

DAVID F. EPSTEIN
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAIR, DOUGLASS 1974 Fame and the Founding Fathers. New York: Norton.

DIAMOND, MARTIN (1963) 1972 The Federalist. Pages 631–651 in Leo Strauss and Joseph Cropsey, eds., History of Political Philosophy. Chicago: Rand McNally.

EPSTEIN, DAVID F. 1984 The Political Theory of The Federalist. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

FEDERALISTS

Arguments about the meaning of the Constitution can be dated to the controversy over its adoption or to the congressional debates of 1789 about the power to remove subordinate executive officials. But not until the conflict over ALEXANDER HAMILTON'S proposal to create a BANK OF THE UNITED STATES did these disputes assume a partisan configuration and begin to take the form of two conflicting modes of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. When Hamilton's proposal came before the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES in February 1791, Congressman JAMES MADISON remembered that the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 had specifically declined to add the right to charter CORPORATIONS to the list of Congress's powers. Madison contended that incorporation of a bank was not an exercise of any of the delegated powers and could not be justified on other grounds without confiding an "unlimited discretion" to a limited regime and threatening its gradual transmutation into a unitary national system. Disturbed by Madison's objections, President GEORGE WASHINGTON requested the opinions of his principal advisers before he signed the bill. EDMUND RANDOLPH and Secretary of State THOMAS JEFFERSON agreed with their Virginia friend. Elaborating Madison's insistence that to step beyond the constitutional enumeration was "to take possession of a boundless field of power, no longer susceptible of any definition," Jefferson maintained that the incorporation of a bank was not a regulation of the nation's commerce, not a tax, and not a borrowing of money. To derive the power from the "general phrases," he continued, would render the enumeration useless, reduce the Constitution "to a single phrase," and, in practice, authorize the federal government to do anything it pleased.

Hamilton's rebuttal of his colleagues, which persuaded Washington to sign the bill, erected the essential framework for the BROAD CONSTRUCTION of the document that would prevail throughout the 1790s. In fact, the reasoning and phrasing of this great opinion would be closely followed by JOHN MARSHALL in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND in 1819. "If the end be clearly comprehended within any of the specified powers, and if the measure have an obvious relation to that end, and is not forbidden by any particular provision of the Constitution," Hamilton maintained, "it may safely be deemed to come within the compass of the national authority." Insisting that the Constitution's grant of sovereign powers necessarily implied a power to decide which means were most appropriate to federal ends, the secretary of the treasury rejected Jefferson's contention that the boundaries of federal power would be washed away if "NECESSARY AND PROPER" was construed to mean "convenient," "useful," "requisite," and "needful." A liberal interpretation of this phrase was vital, he observed, to an effective federal system: "The means by which national exigencies are to be provided for . . . are of such infinite variety, extent, and complexity that there must, of necessity, be great latitude of discretion in the selection and application of those means."

Hamilton's opinion on the national bank began with the assumption "that every power vested in a government is in its nature sovereign, and includes . . . a right to employ all the means requisite and fairly applicable to the attainment of the ends." It was not to be denied, the secretary argued, "that there are implied as well as express powers." Similar assumptions underpinned his "Letters of Pacifi-

cus" in 1793, with their defense of the inherent power of the chief executive to issue the Neutrality Proclamation. And yet, a "liberal" or "broad" construction of the reach of federal powers only partially describes the general tendency of Federalist interpretations of the Constitution. While the party was in power, Hamilton and other leaders generally assumed that the enduring dangers to the new regime would issue for the most part from the states' continual encroachments on the federal government's preserve and from a democratic people's tendency to favor an increasing concentration of the powers of the central government itself in the popularly elected lower house. Thus, the Federalists did seek as broad and flexible a definition of the general government's authority as reason would admit. They also usually attempted to defend the independence and prerogatives of the executive and the courts against encroachments by the Congress, which the Framers had intended to be more immediately responsive to the people. The most important constitutional collisions of the decade can all be helpfully illuminated in these terms. So could Federalist resistance to the Jeffersonians' repeal of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801, when many argued that the tenure of judges during GOOD BEHAVIOR should not be subverted by an abolition of their posts.

After 1793, foreign policy and its domestic repercussions dominated the intensifying party conflict, and Hamilton's defense of presidential leadership initiated an extended public argument about the meaning of the clause that vested "the executive power . . . in a President of the United States." "Pacificus" interpreted this phrase as granting an inherent body of executive prerogatives to the head of the executive department, "subject only to the exceptions and qualifications" defined by the Constitution. Writing as "Helvidius" at Jefferson's request, Madison condemned this doctrine as derived from the theory and practice of monarchical Britain and as striking "at the vitals" of a republican Constitution. Hamilton's interpretation, he insisted, would enable an ambitious President to take the country into war without congressional consent.

In practice, the conduct of the first two administrations did establish lasting precedents for firm executive direction of the country's international relations. In 1796 the House of Representatives asked Washington for documents relating to JOHN JAY's negotiation of a commercial treaty with Great Britain. Some members hoped to defeat the unpopular treaty by declining to appropriate the money necessary to carry it into effect. Washington's refusal to submit the papers to the House, which had no constitutional role in making treaties, was consistent with his general practice of an active leadership in foreign-policy concerns. JOHN ADAMS's decision to initiate a diplomatic resolution to hostilities with France, undertaken in the face of active opposition from his CABINET and from Federalists in Congress, was yet another potent contribution to the chief executive's command of his department and to presidential guidance in this field.

The diplomatic impasse that resulted in the naval war with France—undeclared but authorized by acts of Congress—also ended in the most ferocious constitutional collision of the decade. Fearing French collusion with their Jeffersonian opponents, as well as with a host of recent immigrants to the United States, Federalists in Congress took advantage of the patriotic fury sparked by revelation of the XYZ Affair to pass a range of crisis legislation. Their opponents sharply criticized the Alien Acts of 1798, which authorized the President—without judicial process and merely on suspicion—to deport any ALIEN whose presence he considered dangerous to the United States. But the Republicans reserved their most ferocious condemnations for a controversial companion law, aimed at the repression of domestic opposition.

The Sedition Act of 1798 made it a criminal offense to "write, print, utter, or publish . . . any false, scandalous, and malicious writing or writings against the government of the United States, or either House of Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with the intent to defame [them] or to bring them . . . into contempt or disrepute." To the Republicans, whose opposition culminated in the VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS, this legislation was a flagrant violation of the limits of Congress's delegated powers and of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Little less objectionable, they thought, were prosecutions grounded on the supposition that there was, in any case, a federal COMMON LAW of SEDITIOUS LIBEL.

The crisis laws of 1798 were major threats to private rights and public liberties as these would later be defined. Together with the argument for the existence of a FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES, they were supreme examples of the readiness of many Federalists to broaden federal authority by means of constitutional constructions that advanced a sweeping doctrine of inherent sovereign powers along with a constricted reading of the BILL OF RIGHTS. In defense of the Sedition Law, the Federalists contended that the First Amendment's guarantee of FREEDOM OF THE PRESS extended only to a prohibition of true censorship (or PRIOR RESTRAINT), not to prosecutions in the aftermath of publication. Because the act provided that the truth of a seditious utterance would be an adequate defense—and because it allowed juries, rather than judges, to decide whether such an utterance was libelous or not—the Sedition Act, its advocates maintained, was actually a liberalization of existing common law. These arguments did not disguise the Federalists' desire to break an opposition that was intensifying as danger of a French invasion disappeared. Neither did they hide the party's underlying fear of the results of open political competition; that fear was amply justified by the defeat of 1800.

From the LOUISIANA PURCHASE TREATY through the War of 1812, growing numbers of beleaguered Federalists retreated from the party's early, broad construction of the Constitution. In 1803 a few objected to the treaty, not because they shared the President's concern that there was no explicit constitutional foundation for the acquisition, but because the treaty promised that a territory not within the boundaries of the original United States (and likely to support their Jeffersonian opponents) would in time be granted statehood. If such a promise were constitutional at all, they argued, it lay within the prerogative of Congress. After 1808, with slighter strain, a larger number of Federalists bitterly denounced Jefferson's embargo, the Enforcement Acts, and other efforts to compel the warring European powers to respect the country's rights as a neutral. Congress's constitutional authority to regulate the nation's commerce, they maintained, did not include the power to prohibit it entirely. Moreover, the EMBARGO ACTS produced a vast extension of executive authority and nearly dictatorial intrusions by the military and the revenue collectors into the nation's economic life, violating both the spirit of the Constitution and the FOURTH AMENDMENT guarantees against UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures. To New Englanders especially, the long experiment with economic warfare, which was pressed in a variety of ways through the next three years, seemed evidence of Jeffersonian hostility to commerce in general and to New England as a region. For them, accordingly, a narrow definition of the commerce power proved a milepost on a general withdrawal into constitutional interpretations that the Federalists had once condemned.

The quick retreat into a narrow, sometimes tortured understanding of the Constitution was primarily, though not exclusively, a sectional response to the Republican ascendancy in national affairs. Although this doctrinal switch ended by discrediting the party as a whole, it won approval neither from the Federalist judiciary nor from many of the greatest architects of Federalist ideas. After the commencement of the War of 1812, the Massachusetts legislature, governor, and courts, building on the compact theory of the Constitution, insisted that the state executive, not Congress, should determine whether an "invasion" authorized the federal government to call forth the militia. All the New England states impeded federal employment of these forces, practicing state interposition in a way that even the Virginia and Kentucky legislatures had never actually attempted. Regional resistance to the war extended to flirtations with SECESSION or a separate peace and culminated in the HARTFORD CONVENTION of December 1814. This effort to extort concessions in the midst of war discredited the Federalists beyond redemption and nationalized a constitutional interpretation that all New England states had once condemned. The constitutional amendments the convention urged would have gravely weakened the effective federal regime, which was the most impressive legacy of Federalist administrations. Yet, even as the party died, the nationalistic constitutional construction of its greatest years were winning the endorsement of the MARSHALL COURT.

LANCE BANNING
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Alien and Sedition Acts; Commerce Clause; Foreign Affairs; Implied Powers; Jeffersonianism; Militia Clause; Republicanism; Treaty Power.)

Bibliography

MILLER, JOHN C. 1960 The Federalist Era, 1789–1801. New York: Harper & Row.

SMELSER, MARSHALL 1968 The Democratic Republic, 1801–1815. New York: Harper & Row.

SMITH, JAMES MORTON 1956 Freedom's Fetters. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

FEDERAL JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS, TENURE, AND INDEPENDENCE

In the federal judicial system the appointment and tenure of judges are governed by the Constitution and by statutes enacted by Congress. Neither the Constitution nor Congress controls the structure of state judicial systems or the appointment and tenure of judges of those courts; under state laws, judges are variously popularly elected or appointed by the governor or another state officer, with or without the consent of the legislature, a commission, or a confirming election. State judges do not have life tenure.

Federal courts are classified as "Article III courts," also known as CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS, and "Article I courts," also known as LEGISLATIVE COURTS. The constitutional courts are those courts specified in Article III, section 1, vesting the JUDICIAL POWER of the United States "in one supreme Court, and such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." These judges have lifetime tenure and compensation that cannot be reduced during their judicial service. Legislative courts encompass the remaining adjudicative tribunals that are congressionally established but do not have all of the characteristics required by Article III. Judges of legislative courts are appointed for terms of years; the jurisdiction of those courts is not coextensive with Article III courts' jurisdiction.

Except for recess appointments by the President to fill vacancies when the Senate is not in session (Article II, section 1), constitutional Justices and judges hold their offices "during good behavior," as Article III provides. In UNITED STATES EX REL. TOTH V. QUARLES (1955), the Court held that the GOOD BEHAVIOR clause guarantees such judges lifetime tenure, subject to removal only by IMPEACHMENT.

Article II, section 2, requires nomination of Article III Justices and judges by the President "with the advice and consent of the Senate." The role of the Senate under the ADVICE AND CONSENT clause has been debated since the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. The clause was adopted as a compromise in the closing days of the Convention as an alternative to proposals to grant appointing power to the President alone or to the Senate alone; the delegates did not discuss the meaning of the clause.

Senators have variously interpreted their constitutional obligations in proceedings to confirm presidential nominations to the judiciary. Some senators have treated their task as little more than a procedural formality unless the nominee is egregiously unfit for the judicial post to which he or she has been named or a serious flaw in the candidate's background is revealed during the deliberations. Other senators have expansively interpreted their responsibility to "advise" the President, including the advice that the President's choice is wrong. The history of confirmation battles strongly suggests that the fate of a particular nominee more often depends on the political views of the senators than on intellectual differences over CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. Apart from the individual characteristics of the nominee and the personal and political philosophies of the senators who act on a nomination, the outcome of the process is heavily influenced by the sensitivity of the judicial post to which the candidate has been named, the existing composition of that particular court, the relative power of the President and the Senate at the time of the nomination, and the prevailing national political climate. The closest senatorial scrutiny is usually given to nominees for the Supreme Court. The obvious reason is the tremendous importance of the Court. Less obvious is that senatorial courtesies do not have the same significance in confirmation of Supreme Court nominees as they do in nominations to district courts and courts of appeals. In the latter instances, the opposition of one senator from the nominee's home state is usually enough to doom confirmation, especially if the senator is a member of the President's political party.

Scant attention was given to the public interest in judicial confirmations before 1929 because, until then, the Senate acted upon all nominations in closed executive session unless the hearing was ordered open by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. Except in rare instances, such as the nomination of Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS in 1916 and of Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE in 1925, the necessary votes could not be mustered. The Senate rules were amended in 1929 to open all confirmation hearings.

Even after hearings were open, they were usually quiet events. Nominees were not called to appear before the SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE until 1939, when the nomination of FELIX FRANKFURTER was under consideration. Although he initially declined to appear, he later testified and was unanimously approved by the Senate. Since then, with few exceptions, nominees to Article III courts are routinely called to, and do testify before, the Judiciary Committee. The addition of televised hearings probably has not changed confirmation results, but at a minimum it has heightened the drama of controversial appointments and encouraged oratory.

Although the confirmation process is now generally available in living color, the roles of the actors in the prenomination process are neither public nor well known. The large cast includes the President, the inner circle of the White House, senators who are not members of the Judiciary Committee, congressional delegations, the ATTORNEY GENERAL, the Department of Justice, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the American Bar Association, and sometimes others.

Presidential means and motives for selecting nominees to the Supreme Court defy facile description. Supreme Court vacancies occur unpredictably and sporadically. For example, no vacancies on the Court appeared during President JIMMY CARTER's term, but Justice POTTER J. STEWART'S retirement gave President RONALD REAGAN his first appointment to the Court within a few months of his assuming office.

History gives substance to Justice Felix Frankfurter's description of Supreme Court nominations as "that odd lottery." Sometimes the presidential motivation for a particular appointment is evident, even if the means by which the person came to presidential attention are not. Thus, President HERBERT HOOVER's reason for nominating CHARLES EVANS HUGHES as CHIEF JUSTICE in 1930 was the economic plight of the country and his belief that Hughes would forward views that would help the President's economic policies. On the other hand, the source of President ULYSSES S. GRANT's choice of Caleb Cushing is known, but his motives in selecting him are not. The nominee was seventy-four years old, and his political philosophy was unknown. President Grant withdrew the nomination after he discovered Cushing's ties to the Confederacy. Both the source and motive are occasionally clear, as is true of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's nomination of Solicitor General THURGOOD MARSHALL.

History permits only a few generalizations about presidential choices for the Supreme Court. For example, the nominee will almost always be a member of the political party of the President, and in making selections the President will rely on the advice of trusted friends within and outside his administration and of those persons whose support, or nonopposition, will be needed to confirm the nominee or to assist the President in achieving other objectives on his political agenda.

Presidents have sometimes selected candidates for lower courts without initial outside consultation. Usually, however, the President makes his choice from a list of potential nominees submitted to him. For district courts, typically a nomination is initiated by a senator of the candidate's home state if the senator is of the President's political party. When no senator of the candidate's home state is of the President's party, the names may be suggested by the state governor, leaders of the President's party, members of the congressional delegation, or members of his administration. President Carter encouraged all senators to use regional or local panels to gather and submit potential nominees for district courts before making recommendations to him. Some senators still use such panels, although the White House has not recently urged them to do so.

Proposals for appointments to courts of appeals are initiated by an analogous process. Because courts of appeals' geographical jurisdiction is not confined within state lines, as the jurisdiction of a district court is, more senators have a say in these appointments than in appointments of district judges. Senators of the President's party continue to play an important initiating role, but some degree of senatorial courtesy is also extended to other senators in the affected states. President Carter departed from prior practice by issuing an EXECUTIVE ORDER establishing a nationwide commission, with panelists chosen from all states within each circuit to propose nominations. Senators could propose nominees in addition to those proposed by panels. The Reagan administration abolished the commission, relying instead on members of his administration and selected senators to perform the task, a process that more nearly resembled the practices before President Carter.

When potential nominees have been reduced to a short list, the candidates are screened by the Department of Justice and discussed with key senators and with leaders of the congressional delegation of the President's party. The Federal Bureau of Investigation is directed to search the background of potential nominees to discover evidence that might disqualify the candidate or embarrass the administration. Further screening is usually done by White House personnel to whom the President has delegated that task.

If all these preliminary tests look positive, the names on the short list will be submitted to the American Bar Association's Standing Committee on Federal Judiciary to test their professional qualifications. Committee rankings of district and circuit judge nominees are self-explanatory: "exceptionally well qualified," "well qualified," "qualified," and "not qualified." The rating system for Supreme Court nominees describes the candidates as "well qualified," "not opposed," and "not qualified." In committee parlance, "not opposed" means that the nominee is considered barely qualified. Presidents do not have to accept these ratings, but it is rare that a nomination has been forwarded to the Senate when the candidate has received poor grades from the Bar Association.

Appointments and tenure of judges to Article I courts do not follow the same scenario. Article I courts display almost as many variations as Charles Darwin's "singular group of finches," and Congress has adapted the system to each of the jurisdictional environments in which these courts sit. Even a partial taxonomy of Article I courts reveals their jurisdictional diversity: the district courts of the Canal Zone, Virgin Islands, Guam, and Northern Mariana Islands; the High Court of American Samoa; certain ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES with adjudicative powers; the United States COURT OF MILITARY APPEALS; the TAX COURT; the bankruptcy courts; and the local judiciary of the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. Appointment to these courts is made variously by the President, with or without senatorial confirmation, and, in the instance of the bankruptcy courts, by federal district judges. Judges of these courts serve designated terms in office, rather than having life tenure.

The constitutional legitimacy of Congress's establishing courts other than Article III courts has been repeatedly questioned from the early days of our Republic. The issue first came before the Supreme Court in AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY V. CANTER (1828), testing the constitutionality of Congress's creating TERRITORIAL COURTS staffed by judges without life tenure. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL, writing for the Court, held that Congress had the power to create "legislative courts," having judges of limited tenure with jurisdiction that was not coextensive with that of Article III courts. Since then, the Court has had second thoughts about the vexing constitutional restrictions on congressional delegation of jurisdiction to adjudicative tribunals that do not have all of the characteristics of Article III courts. Although the former Court of Claims survived constitutional attack when the Supreme Court held that it was a peculiar Article III court in Glidden Co. v. Zdanok (1962), the reorganized bankruptcy courts did not fare so well in NORTHERN PIPELINE CO. V. MARATHON PIPE LINE CO. (1982), in which a sharply divided Court struck down part of the legislative grant of jurisdiction to bankruptcy courts as an unconstitutional delegation of Article III jurisdiction.

Although appointments to the federal judiciary are heavily politicized, federal judges are thereafter completely independent of the politics that brought them to the bench, as some Presidents have unhappily learned when their appointees have not followed the philosophies they anticipated. Despite the divorce of the judges from politics, judges and Justices have not always been removed from the political realm. For example, in 1790, Chief Justice JOHN JAY and Associate Justice OLIVER ELLSWORTH temporarily shed their robes to represent the government in treaty negotiations with France and England. Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT actively participated in helping President WARREN G. HARDING select federal judges, and Chief Justice EARL WARREN in 1962 chaired the commission investigating the assassination of President JOHN F. KENNEDY. A number of Justices have been continuing confidants of Presidents and assisted them in formulating national policies.

Inevitable tensions are generated between independence and politics because the judiciary depends on Congress to authorize needed judgeships, to pay judicial salaries and authorize and pay for nonjudicial personnel assisting courts, and to provide for courtrooms and courthouses. Justices and judges commonly testify before Congress and write and speak on such issues affecting the judiciary and the administration of justice. Statutes and canons of judicial ethics announce rules designed to avoid collisions between independence and political influences.

Particularly sensitive conflicts are also generated when the need for judicial independence must be balanced against the need to sideline judges who are physically or mentally unable to perform their duties and to discipline errant federal judges short of impeachment. Little controversy has arisen from involuntarily retiring judges for disability. A storm of criticism followed the enactment of the 1980 Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act, which empowered a panel of judges to investigate complaints against a federal judge accused of "conduct prejudicial to the effective expeditious administration of the business of the courts" and authorized the panel to impose discipline, short of removal from office, if the panel should find wrongdoing. The act was attacked on two grounds: for infringing the constitutional freedom of judges from removal by procedures other than impeachment, and for posing a threat that such disciplinary proceedings could be used to subject judges to reprisals for unpopular decisions. Nonetheless, the statute has been sustained, and the opponents' fears of retaliation have not been realized.

The independence of the judiciary implies more than political neutrality. Numerous statutes, rules, and ethical principles seek to preserve judicial independence by foreclosing parties to litigation and other persons from improperly influencing judicial decisions. With a few carefully guarded exceptions, litigants, their lawyers, and others are forbidden to contact a judge about a pending case without prior permission and without contemporaneously informing all parties and their lawyers about the existence and substance of any such communications. Both civil and criminal penalties are used to punish persons who violate those rules.

SHIRLEY HUFSTEDLER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Appointing and Removal Power, Presidential; Appointments Clause.)

Bibliography

EDWARDS, DREW E. 1987 Judicial Misconduct and Politics in the Federal System: A Proposal for Revising the Judicial Councils Act. California Law Review 75:1071–1092.

FOWLER, W. GARY 1984 Judicial Selection Under Reagan and Carter: A Comparison of Their Initial Recommendation Procedures. Judicature 67:265–283.

FREUND, PAUL A. 1988 Appointment of Justices: Some Historical Perspectives. Harvard Law Review 101:1146–1163.

SLOTNICK, ELLIOT E. 1988 Federal Judicial Recruitment and Selection Research: A Review Essay. Judicature 71:317–324.

FEDERAL JUDICIAL ROLE

Article III of the Constitution creates the federal judicial system, defines its boundaries, and describes the characteristics of its judges. The Constitution specifically vests JUDICIAL POWER in "one supreme court" and authorizes Congress to create lower federal courts. Article III defines "federal judicial power" in reference either to subject matter (extending to "all Cases in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made" and to admiralty) or to the parties in the case (e.g., cases involving ambassadors, states, or citizens of different states).

Article III also describes attributes of federal judges "of both the supreme and inferior Courts." Such judges hold their offices during "good Behavior" and their salaries are protected against diminution. The GOOD BEHAVIOR clause is now understood as providing these judges with life tenure, subject to IMPEACHMENT and removal by the U.S. SENATE. The compensation clause has been a source of debate about whether congressional withholding of benefits, such as cost-of-living increases and forms of insurance, constitute infringements of constitutional protections.

Although the Constitution is open-ended about the existence of lower federal courts, Congress has many times since 1789 exercised its powers to create a lower federal judiciary and to reorganize the structure of and mandates to that judiciary. The federal judiciary was initially comprised only of district judges and Supreme Court Justices (who upon occasion joined together to create CIRCUIT COURTS). By early in the twentieth century, the federal judiciary had become a three-tiered structure, consisting of trial judges (district judges), intermediate appellate judges (circuit judges), and nine Supreme Court Justices. As of the 1920s, some 120 men held those positions; in several instances, a single federal district judge served the entire state.

Since the CIVIL WAR, Congress has steadily increased the role of the federal courts by exercising its constitutional powers to enact federal statutory rights and to vest enforcement powers in the government and/or private actors, authorized to file claims in federal courts. FEDERAL JURISDICTION is typically concurrent with state courts rather than exclusive. The federal court docket includes cases involving a wide array of subject matters, both civil and criminal, "arising under" federal law and including securities regulation, environmental laws, consumer protection, CIVIL RIGHTS, and pension and WELFARE benefits.

Given congressional decisions to expand the role of federal law, the federal judiciary has also needed to grow. Although one reading of the Constitution would have permitted such growth to occur only by the creation of more life-tenured, salary-guaranteed judges (what I term "constitutional judges" because, pursuant to Article III, they are nominated by the President, confirmed by the Senate and enjoy the structural protections detailed in the Constitution), neither the Congress nor the federal courts have insisted on that understanding of Article III.

Rather, beginning in the 1930s and blossoming since the 1960s, two other sets of "federal judges" have gained federal adjudicatory power. One group—magistrate and bankruptcy judges—are specified by statutes and work within Article III; these judges are selected by the constitutional judges and serve for renewable terms. A second set of judges—administrative law judges bearing a variety of titles—are also creatures of statute but are typically annexed to the agencies for which they decide cases, and their employment is governed by civil service provisions. Note that both sets of these statutory judges serve without constitutional protection for either their terms of office or their salaries.

In short, the three-tiered pyramid of the federal courts from the early part of the twentieth century has been replaced by a four-tiered system, with some 1,600–2,000 constitutional judges holding positions on the Supreme, intermediate appellate, and district courts, joined within Article III courts by another 750 statutory judges (magistrate and bankruptcy judges) who also work at the trial level, below or akin to the district court. The four tiers are supported by a staff of some 30,000, working in more than 500 court buildings. That structure is, in turn, augmented by two major groups of add-ons. First, some 2,000 administrative judges staff "courts" that are located in agencies. Second, arbitrators, mediators, and "neutrals" have been provided more recently under federal law, as both statutory and constitutional judges promote the use of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) in federal courts and in administrative agencies.

Reflective of the advent of ADR, the modes of judging have also shifted over the twentieth century. In 1938, the first uniform FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE were promulgated for all federal trial courts. Those rules specified a pretrial process that has since become the focus of contemporary litigation. Judges from the 1930s to the 1950s did not much use their powers under this discretionary pretrial rule. However, in the 1950s, when faced with what were then called "protracted cases" and what are now called "large-scale" or "complex" litigations, a group of judges within the federal judiciary began to advocate greater judicial control over attorneys. In the 1950s, the federal judiciary began systematic training—judicial education—to encourage judges to become "managerial judges." Judges were initially reticent to promote settlement of cases, but over the decades, leaders of the federal judiciary became increasingly insistent that the judicial role should encompass settlement efforts. The shift of role (from adjudicator to manager to settler) is reflected in a series of revisions during the 1980s and 1990s of civil procedure rules and in the enactment by Congress of statutes calling for additional efforts at management and for alternative dispute resolution in federal courts.

Just as the federal courts and Congress have worked in concert to enlarge the number of federal judges and to alter their daily practices, so have the federal courts and Congress reshaped the doctrinal requirements of Article III. The creation and institutionalization of a diverse set of federal judges result from congressional enactment of LEGISLATION for such judges, and also from federal judicial interpretation of Article III to permit the delegation of a range of judicial tasks to statutory judges who have neither life tenure nor salary protections. Early in the twentieth century, life-tenured judges were hesitant to permit much delegation, insisting, for example, on their own authority to review, de novo, certain kinds of facts as part of the "essential attributes of judicial power." More recently, however, life-tenured judges have upheld congressional statutes providing for trials (with parties' consent) by magistrate judges; conveying substantial powers to bankruptcy judges; authorizing administrative judges to hear related state claims in certain instances; and even, in narrow circumstances, permitting final decisionmaking power by arbitrators. In other words, creative readings of Article III have enabled the manufacture of federal judges outside its parameters. The charter for such judges is not unlimited; the Supreme Court insists on vaguely described constraints and some commentators argue that "Article III values" require access to life-tenured judges at least upon appeal of certain cases. But the decisions in the second half of the twentieth century recognize an ever- growing role for statutory federal judges.

In addition to the elaboration of tiers of judging, alteration of the modes of judging, and reinterpretation of Article III during the twentieth century, the federal judiciary also developed a corporate identity. In the early 1920s, Congress authorized a Judicial Conference, composed of senior appellate judges, to meet to consider systemic issues. In 1939, at the behest of the judiciary, Congress created the Administrative Office of the United States Courts to enable the judiciary to take on the staff work— budgeting, supplies, reports to Congress on the docket— that previously had been performed by the executive branch. In the early years of these institutional structures, federal judges saw their judicial role as limiting their dealings with Congress. Invoking constitutional obligations of adjudication, the federal judiciary as an institution generally declined to comment on legislation other than bills seeking additional judgeships or governing court procedure. In later years, the Judicial Conference began to take an active role in attempting to shape national policy about federal jurisdiction and to promote its vision of the federal courts' mandate and the work appropriate for life-tenured judges. In the 1970s, the federal judiciary started issuing "impact statements" arguing the likely effects of proposed legislation. In the 1990s, the Judicial Conference put forth its own Long Range Plan, making more than ninety recommendations to Congress. That plan's central premise is that federal courts should have limited jurisdiction; thus, Congress should adopt a presumption against creating new civil or criminal federal causes of action.

Because Article III's limitations of federal judicial power are tied to congressional powers to create federal law, the federal judicial role is closely linked to conceptions of congressional powers. During the last decade of the twentieth century, the Supreme Court revisited rulings made in the context of reviewing NEW DEAL and civil rights legislation. In a series of cases, the Court held that, when conferring jurisdiction on federal courts, Congress had exceeded its powers under either the COMMERCE CLAUSE, the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, or general FEDERALISM principles, or that Congress had failed to heed the limitations imposed by the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT'S SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY provisions. During the same decade, Congress also imposed new limitations on federal jurisdiction. These laws curtailed access for prisoners seeking review of their sentences through HABEAS CORPUS proceedings, and for immigrants contesting decisions by the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service. Congress has also limited the remedial authority of courts to enforce CONSENT DECREES mandating improved conditions in prisons. Litigants challenging the constitutionality of such restrictions have generally lost; the federal courts have thus far upheld most of these provisions. Federal judicial institutional advocacy for restrictions on federal jurisdiction are thus echoed in federal adjudication imposing or upholding such limits.

In sum, when one considers the federal judicial role, recurrent themes emerge, some that span this country's constitutional history and others that have arisen during the twentieth century. Debated, at the constitutional level, are the allocation of labor among adjudicatory bodies (state, federal, and tribal courts and administrative agencies) and among tiers of federal judges; the degree of deference owed to other court systems or state and local government officials (often referred to as "COMITY" and sometimes as "federalism"), to Congress and the executive (sometimes termed "SEPARATION OF POWERS"), to state executive officials, and to lower echelon judges within the system; and the respective roles of Congress and the courts in determining the permissible boundaries of federal judicial and LEGISLATIVE POWER. The issues that have come to prominence during the twentieth century include the boundaries, if any, of the federal judicial role as an administrative organization (using its corporate voice to advance a programmatic agenda developed by the Judicial Conference) and the question of how to deploy constitutional judges (as contrasted with statutory federal judges).

In light of such developments, Article III's description of federal judicial power requires reconsideration. Conventional constitutional discourse assumes that Article III is the paradigm of judicial independence and represents the pinnacle of political safeguards. Judicial independence on the federal side is often invoked in contrast to the perceived thinner protections afforded many state judges, serving for terms and by election.

But these distinctions recede when one considers the fit between the constitutional terms of federal judicial power and the current structures and deployment of that power. Article III—as read by judges chartered under its aegis—provides nothing for hundreds of federal judges existing outside its purview and little by way of institutional protection to the judiciary as an organization. Although judicial–congressional interactions have often resulted in agreements about how to expand resources, the growing reliance on statutory judges increases judicial dependence on Congress and leaves a large group of federal judges with authority to render an array of judgments but lacking attributes of independence associated with federal adjudication. On the other hand, given the willingness of life-tenured judges on the lower courts to delegate portions of their adjudicatory tasks elsewhere, and to assume roles as multipurpose dispute resolvers pressing for settlements that reduce their roles as adjudicators, Article III's structural protections insulate actors decreasingly committed to formal adjudicatory roles that enable public scrutiny of their exercise of the power of judgment.

The growing distance between Article III's description and the practices of federal adjudicators raises normative questions. Article III stands for the concept of a distinct judicial branch of government and for the ability of individual judges to render judgment independent from fear of economic retribution. Should that constitutional commitment be elaborated in the context of statutory federal judges, so that the transfer of judicial power to them is conditioned on the creation of structural protections akin to those afforded constitutional judges? If not, by what terms can one assess the role allocation between constitutional and statutory judges? The Constitution, as currently interpreted, offers little guidance on either issue. Understandings of the DUE PROCESS clause provide a conception that all judges must be impartial, but standards for impartiality of agency judges are not exacting. And, while invoking "Article III values," the Supreme Court has approved most delegations to nonconstitutional judges, and the federal judiciary as an agenda setter has pressed for expansion of those judges' roles. If adjudicatory processes are to retain political and legal significance in the coming decades, the jurisprudence of Article III, intertwined with understandings of constitutional mandates for due process, will require significant development.

JUDITH RESNIK
(2000)

Bibliography

FALLON, RICHARD H.; MELTZER, DANIEL J.; and SHAPIRO, DAVID L. 1996 Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System, 4th ed. Westbury, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

JACKSON, VICKI C. 1998 Federalism and the Uses and Limits of Law. Harvard Law Review 111:2180–2259.

JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES 1995 Long Range Plan for the Federal Courts. Washington, D.C.: Committee on Long Range Planning.

MONAGHAN, HENRY P. Constitutional Fact Review. Columbia Law Review 85:229–276.

RESNIK, JUDITH 1982 Managerial Judges. Harvard Law Review 96:374–448.

SYMPOSIUM 1998 Congress and the Courts: Jurisdiction and Remedies. Georgetown Law Journal 86:2445–2636.

FEDERAL MORTGAGE MORATORIUM ACT

See: Frazier-Lemke Acts

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

See: Regulatory Agencies

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION v. HOPE NATURAL GAS COMPANY
320 U.S. 591 (1944)

In SMYTH V. AMES (1898) the Supreme Court saddled state REGULATORY COMMISSIONS with a specious DUE PROCESS rule for setting public utility rates. Forty-six years later the Justices repudiated the rule of a FAIR RETURN ON FAIR VALUE. Prior to Hope, the Court relied primarily on original construction costs and reproduction costs as a means of determining property value.

Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, speaking for a 5–3 Court, based rate regulation on the POLICE POWER. Douglas declared: "In so far as the power to regulate involves the power to reduce net earnings, it must involve the power to destroy." He adhered to the recent trend of decisions which removed the Court from such determinations. Without mentioning Smyth, Douglas accorded regulatory commissions broad power to choose methods of evaluating property: "The Constitution does not bind rate-making bodies to the service of any single formula or combination of formulas." Henceforth, the determination of the reasonableness of a rate would be made by looking to the "end result" or "total effect." This pragmatic approach returned the burden of decision to the commissions because a rate order was "the product of expert judgment," carrying a presumption of validity. Even the dissenters did not feel bound to adhere to Smyth; they disagreed over the applicable statutory standard. In Hope, the Court eliminated judicial obstruction to effective administrative rate regulation.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

FEDERAL PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS

Although the story of federal protection of CIVIL RIGHTS is most conveniently told chronologically, two themes warrant separate mention. First, federal protection of civil rights has a paradoxical relationship with STATES' RIGHTS. All civil rights legislation has been opposed or limited in response to the argument that the federal government ought not involve itself in areas of state responsibility. The Supreme Court repeatedly has voiced this concern and, in the past, invalidated civil rights legislation partly on this ground. Deference to state law enforcement prerogatives always has been a centerpiece of Justice Department civil rights enforcement policy. And for many years Congress repeatedly rebuffed so basic a measure as antilynching legislation in the name of states' rights. Yet the original federal civil rights statutes, and their underlying constitutional amendments, were responses to outrages by states or to private outrages that states failed to ameliorate. Given the origins of the need for federal protection of civil rights, states' interests may have received undue weight in shaping federal civil rights policy.

Second, there is a seedy underside to the topic of federal protection of civil rights. For many years the federal government was more involved with denying blacks' rights than with protecting them. Well into the twentieth century federal employment policy included racial SEGREGATION and exclusion. De jure segregation in Washington, D.C., and the armed forces, government participation in segregated and racially isolated housing projects, racially prejudiced federal judges, and other circumstances demonstrate the depth of federal involvement in discrimination. Since the 1940s, however, there has been a trend toward increased federal protection of civil rights.

The Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands (the FREEDMEN'S BUREAU), created near the end of the CIVIL WAR, may be viewed as the federal government's initial civil rights enforcement effort. The Bureau's statutory charge, "the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel states," enabled it to perform a variety of social welfare functions. But this first effort to assist blacks was tainted by, among other factors, the Bureau's role in establishing the oppressive system of southern labor contracts. Although Bureau agents invalidated particularly harsh terms, such as those providing for corporal punishment, much depended on the local agent's views. The Bureau and the Union Army, no less than southern legislatures, felt most comfortable when blacks were on plantations under contract and not seeking their fortune in urban areas.

With few exceptions, federal protection of blacks via the Freedmen's Bureau terminated in 1868. Congress's other RECONSTRUCTION legislation employed a variety of techniques to protect civil rights. The CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 and the FORCE ACT of 1870 imposed penalties on those who enforced discriminatory features of the southern BLACK CODES, and the 1870 act made it a crime to conspire to hinder a citizen's exercise of federal rights. The 1870 act also provided special protection for black VOTING RIGHTS and the Force Act of 1871 went further by providing for the appointment of federal supervisors to scrutinize voter registration and election practices. The Civil Rights Act of 1871 authorized civil actions and additional criminal penalties against those who violated constitutional rights and authorized the president to use federal forces to suppress insurrections or conspiracies to deprive "any portion or class of . . . people" of federal rights. The CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875, the culmination of the Reconstruction period civil rights program, imposed civil and criminal sanctions for discrimination in PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS, public conveyances, and places of amusement.

Armed with the criminal provisions of the civil rights program, federal prosecutors brought thousands of cases in southern federal courts and established criminal actions as the primary vehicle through which the federal government protected civil rights. This burst of protective activity, along with the rest of Reconstruction, disintegrated with the COMPROMISE OF 1877 and the attendant withdrawal of federal troops from the South. In 1878, only twenty-five federal criminal civil rights prosecutions were brought in southern federal courts.

There are many reasons why federal criminal prosecutions were and are ineffective to protect civil rights. First, shortly after enactment of the post-Civil War ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION, the Supreme Court limited Congress's power to protect civil rights. UNITED STATES V. REESE (1876) and JAMES V. BOWMAN (1903) invalidated portions of the 1870 act. UNITED STATES V. HARRIS (1883) and Baldwin v. Franks (1887) struck down the CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY section of the 1871 act and the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883) found the 1875 act to be unconstitutional. These and other cases, including the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) and UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876), also narrowly construed constitutional provisions and statutory provisions that were not struck down. The entire federal statutory civil rights program therefore depended upon those provisions that, almost by happenstance, survived judicial scrutiny. And some of these were eliminated by the CIVIL RIGHTS REPEAL ACT of 1894 and a reorganization of federal law in 1909.

The principal criminal provisions that survived, now sections 241 and 242 of Title 18, United States Code, are not well suited to protecting civil rights. They always have been plagued by doubts about the particular rights they protect and the conduct they reach, and more generally by doubt about the federal government's role in law enforcement. Similar difficulties characterized federal civil remedies to protect civil rights. Finally, southern juries, until recently all white, have rarely convicted whites for violating the rights of blacks.

From the Compromise of 1877 until about 1940, reference to federal "protection" of civil rights would be misleading. Racism in America peaked in the early twentieth century, a fact reflected in the federal government's attitude toward blacks. THEODORE ROOSEVELT's lunch with Booker T. Washington summarized his administration's concern with civil rights. Roosevelt's successor, WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, did not even lunch with Washington, and under Taft and WOODROW WILSON segregation in federal employment was adopted. Neither Warren Harding nor Calvin Coolidge showed any inclination to rise above the worst racial attitudes of their times. As secretary of commerce, HERBERT HOOVER did desegregate the Census Bureau.

Attorney General FRANK MURPHY's decision in 1939 to establish a CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION within the Department of Justice represented a noticeable shift in federal enforcement activity. The new section studied the dormant post-Civil War statutes and adopted an enforcement program that led to such important decisions as UNITED STATES V. CLASSIC (1941) and SCREWS V. UNITED STATES (1945). Federal criminal civil rights prosecutions, however, did not grow beyond several dozen cases a year. But two decades later, in MONROE V. PAPE (1961), these cases served as precedents in establishing private enforcement of civil rights through SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE.

Creation of the Civil Rights Division combined with other events to generate pressure for progress in the civil rights field. In June 1941, President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT issued an EXECUTIVE ORDER creating a Fair Employment Practices Committee (FEPC). A response to defense needs and black political pressure, the executive order prohibited discriminatory employment practices on account of race, color, creed, or national origin in government service, in defense industries, and by trade unions. The order, administered by the FEPC, helped many northern blacks to obtain defense jobs and encouraged many southern blacks to move north.

But the nation was not ready for an aggressive federal civil rights program. Roosevelt himself was reluctant to propose or endorse civil rights legislation. In the 1930s, he even refused to endorse an antilynching bill pending in Congress. And where Roosevelt did act, Congress balked. Until 1944, the President's Emergency Fund financed the FEPC. Congress then required congressional approval for all executive expenditures. In 1946, the FEPC expired for lack of funds and subsequent efforts to establish a statutory FEPC failed.

The end of WORLD WAR II seemed to trigger or coincide with renewed violence against blacks. Following a Democratic party defeat in the 1946 congressional elections, President HARRY S. TRUMAN, in Executive Order 9008, created a presidential civil rights committee to conduct inquiries and to recommend civil rights programs. In its report, To Secure These Rights, the committee made far-reaching recommendations in the areas of voting, employment, and federally assisted programs, many of which would be enacted in the 1960s. Although President Truman recommended legislation based on the commission's report, his administration's civil rights accomplishments were to be on other fronts.

Truman, like other presidents, fostered civil rights most effectively in areas not requiring legislative action. Southern political power in Congress precluded significant civil rights legislation. In 1947, under black and liberal pressure, Truman authorized the Justice Department to submit an amicus curiae brief opposing judicial enforcement of racially RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS. Some believe this brief to have been influential in the Supreme Court's decision in SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948), which rendered racially restrictive housing covenants judicially unenforceable. From 1948 through 1951, Truman issued a series of executive orders which prohibited discrimination by defense contractors, established a committee to study compliance with government contract provisions prohibiting discrimination, provided processes for handling EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION complaints in federal departments and agencies, and called for equality of treatment and opportunity in the armed services.

Civil rights enforcement received little attention early in the administration of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, but there were important exceptions to this pattern. Executive Order 10479 (1953) extended the antidiscrimination provisions previously required in defense contracts to all government procurement contracts. And after BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), Eisenhower could not avoid civil rights issues. Southern recalcitrance in the face of Brown led to a federal-state confrontation in Little Rock, Arkansas, which was settled through the presence of federal troops. (See COOPER V. AARON.) But Little Rock marked no general turning point in the administration's enforcement efforts. Even when armed with increased authority to investigate denials of voting rights by the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1957, the Justice Department brought few cases.

JOHN F. KENNEDY's administration also began with little impetus toward substantial civil rights achievement. But the rising tide of civil rights activity, increased public awareness, and continued southern resistance to DESEGREGATION made new federal–state confrontations inevitable. In May 1961, federal marshals were employed to protect freedom-riders. In September 1962, in connection with efforts to integrate the University of Mississippi, heavily outnumbered federal marshals and federalized National Guard troops withstood an assault by segregationists. Only the arrival of thousands of federal troops restored order. In the Birmingham crisis of 1963, which gained notoriety for the brutal treatment of demonstrators by state and local law enforcement officers, the federal government tried to act as a mediator. The administration's inability under federal law to deal forcefully with situations like that in Birmingham led Kennedy to propose further federal civil rights legislation.

Within the executive branch, the Interstate Commerce

Comminssion, at the administration's request, promulgated stringent rules against discrimination in terminals. Armed with the CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS OF 1957 and 1960, the Civil Rights Division established by the 1957 Act conducted massive voter registration suits but secured only token improvements in black registration. Sometimes the judges blocking progress were Kennedy appointees. In November 1962 President Kennedy issued an executive order prohibiting discrimination in public housing projects and in projects covered by direct, guaranteed federal loans. And in executive orders in 1961 and 1963 Kennedy both required AFFIRMATIVE ACTION by government contractors and extended the executive branch's antidiscrimination program in federal procurement contracts to all federally assisted construction projects.

Soon after LYNDON B. JOHNSON succeeded to the presidency, he publicly endorsed Kennedy's civil rights legislation. Due in part to his direct support, Congress enacted the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, the most comprehensive civil rights measure in American history. The act outlaws discrimination in public accommodations, in federally assisted programs, or by large private employers, and it extends federal power to deal with voting discrimination. Title VII of the act created a substantial new federal bureaucracy to enforce antidiscrimination provisions pertaining to employment. The 1964 act also marked the first time that the Senate voted cloture against an anti-civil rights filibuster.

Despite the efforts of the Kennedy and Johnson Justice Departments, the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960, and 1964 proved inadequate to protect black VOTING RIGHTS. Marches and protests to secure voting rights led to violence, including an infamous, widely reported confrontation in Selma, Alabama, in which marchers were beaten. In March 1965, President Johnson requested new voting rights legislation. He included in his speech to the nation and a joint session of Congress the words of the song of the civil rights movement, "We shall overcome," thus emphasizing the depth of the new federal involvement in civil rights. By August, the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 was in place. Within ten years of its passage many more than a million new black voters were registered without great fanfare, with corresponding gains in the number of black elected officials. In 1968, after the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr., Congress enacted a fair housing law as part of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1968.

Unlike the Reconstruction civil rights program, Congress's 1960s civil rights legislation survived judicial scrutiny. In a series of cases from 1964 to 1976, the Supreme Court both sustained the new civil rights program and revived the Reconstruction-era laws. In Katzenbach v. McClung (1964) and HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL V. UNITED STATES (1964) the Court rejected constitutional attacks on the public accommodations provisions of the 1964 act. In SOUTH CAROLINA V. KATZENBACH (1966) and KATZENBACH V. MORGAN (1966) the Court rebuffed state challenges to the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. And in JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968) and RUNYON V. MCCRARY (1976) the Court interpreted the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF1866 to fill important gaps in the coverage of the 1964 and 1968 acts.

With the passage and sustaining of the 1964, 1965, and 1968 acts and the revival of the 1866 act, the legal battle against RACIAL DISCRIMINATION at least formally was won. The federal civil rights program encompassed nearly all public and private purposeful racial discrimination in public accommodations, housing, employment, education, and voting. Future civil rights progress would have to come through vigorous enforcement, through programs aimed at relieving poverty, through affirmative action, and through laws benefiting groups other than blacks.

Just as the civil rights movement was running out of traditional civil rights laws to support, two other issues brought federal civil rights protection near its outer limits. The comprehensive coverage of federal civil rights laws did not eliminate the inferior status of blacks in American society. Pressure mounted for assistance in the form of affirmative action programs. But these programs divided even the liberal community traditionally supportive of civil rights enforcement. Affirmative action, unlike antidiscrimination standards, meant black progress at the expense of what many believed to be legitimate opportunities of innocent individuals. In its most important aspects affirmative action survived the initial series of statutory and constitutional attacks.

In the 1970s, civil rights enforcement became engulfed in another controversy: whether to bus school children for purposes of desegregation. (See SCHOOL BUSING.) President RICHARD M. NIXON's 1968 "Southern strategy" included campaigning against busing. Within six months of Nixon's inaugural, the Justice Department for the first time opposed the NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATION FUND in a desegregation case. But under the pressure of Supreme Court decisions, and given the momentum of the prior administration's civil rights efforts, the Nixon administration did help promote new levels of southern integration. The administration, however, continued to lash out at "forced busing."

School desegregation also triggered a legislative backlash. In the 1970s the Internal Revenue Service, under the pressure of court decisions, sought to foster integration by denying tax benefits to private segregated academies and their benefactors. Congress, however, intervened to limit the Service's use of funds for such purposes. Similarly, Congress restrained executive authority to seek busing as a remedy for school segregation.

In the 1960s and 1970s, federal protection of civil rights reached beyond race. In the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, the AGE DECRIMINATION ACT OF 1975, the REHABILITATION ACT OF 1973, and other measures, Congress acted to protect the aged and the handicapped. And the Equal Pay Act of 1963, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and the EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1972 increased federal protection against sex descrimination. In each of these areas, attachment of antidiscrimination conditions to federal disbursements became a significant vehicle for civil rights enforcement.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

BERMAN, WILLIAM C. 1970 The Politics of Civil Rights in the Truman Administration. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.

BRAUER, CARL M. 1977 John F. Kennedy and the Second Reconstruction. New York: Columbia University Press.

CARR, ROBERT K. 1947 Federal Protection of Civil Rights: Quest for a Sword. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

GRESSMAN, EUGENE 1952 The Unhappy History of Civil Rights Legislation. Michigan Law Review 50:1323–1358.

HARVEY, JAMES C. 1973 Black Civil Rights During the Johnson Administration. Jackson: University and College Press of Missouri.

KONVITZ, MILTON R. 1961 A Century of Civil Rights. New York: Columbia University Press.

LITWACK, LEON F. 1979 Been in the Storm So Long: The Aftermath of Slavery. New York: Knopf.

FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION

Article III of the Constitution provides that the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES shall extend to all "Cases . . . arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and Treaties. . . ." This power is called federal question jurisdiction, because typically it entails the construction, application, or enforcement of federal law, including federal COMMON LAW. Performance of this function includes interpretation of the Constitution itself; thus federal question jurisdiction provides the jurisdictional basis for the federal courts' important power of JUDICIAL REVIEW. It is also the means by which Congress can secure a sympathetic and uniform interpretation of federal laws.

Although Congress has the power to make exceptions to the Supreme Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION over federal questions, it currently makes few of them. A few federal trial court decisions, such as those remanding cases to state court following removal, are unreviewable. The Supreme Court reviews state court decisions only when they are FINAL JUDGMENTS that have been rendered by the highest state court in which judgment is available. Such a judgment will not be reviewed if it rests on an independent and ADEQUATE STATE GROUND or if it lacks a substantial federal question (for example, raises only a federal issue already resolved in an earlier case).

Apart from these restrictions, the appellate federal question jurisdiction extends to every federal issue, factual or legal, part of the plaintiff's case or part of a defense, in either a civil or a criminal case. Even if federal law appears in a case solely because a state statute refers to and incorporates it, the Supreme Court may exercise its federal question jurisdiction if it finds an independent federal interest in assuring proper interpretation of the incorporated federal matter.

In contrast, when Congress first created the lower federal courts in 1789, it authorized them to hear only a few federal question cases of special importance, such as PATENT suits and suits involving treaty rights. After the CIVIL WAR, Congress realized that state courts would be reluctant to enforce newly created federal CIVIL RIGHTS, and authorized the federal courts to hear the enforcement actions. Then, in 1875, Congress used almost the exact language of Article III to empower federal courts to hear "all suits of a civil nature . . . arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made. . . ." The 1875 act, known as the general federal question statute, required that at least $500 be in controversy in the suit, a requirement that was increased gradually over time.

Notwithstanding the breadth of the general federal question statute, Congress has continued to enact more limited laws authorizing federal jurisdiction over particular kinds of federal questions. These laws, designed to aid in enforcing the vast array of federal rights created in recent decades, have not required any amount in controversy. The range of these specialized federal question statutes is so great that by 1970 few federal question cases drew only upon the general statute. In 1976 Congress eliminated the amount in controversy requirement for the only remaining significant group of such cases, suits alleging unconstitutional conduct by federal officers; and in 1980, it repealed the requirement altogether.

Because Congress's legislative powers are enumerated and limited, a complaint filed in federal court frequently invokes a combination of state and federal law. The issue then arises whether the federal element warrants labeling the case one that "arises under" federal law. For a federal court to have federal question jurisdiction, this inquiry must be determined affirmatively, both under Article III and under the general federal question statute.

Although some Supreme Court decisions, notably Justice BENJAMIM N. CARDOZO's opinion in Gully v. First National Bank (1936), have announced an equally demanding construction for both the Constitution and the statute, the currently accepted view is that the statute should be construed more narrowly than Article III despite the near identity of their language. In other words, Congress has a broad power but is assumed not to have exercised all of it. Interpretations of Article III have required that the plaintiff invoke some federal law to support a part of the claim for relief, whether or not the federal right is actually disputed by the defendant. (See OSBORN V. BANK OF UNITED STATES.) In a theory known as "protective jurisdiction," some judges and scholars have advanced the view that Congress should have the power to confer federal question jurisdiction even over a case arising under state law, when the claim implicates a strong, legistimate federal interest. The Supreme Court has not yet been required to decide whether Article III extends this far, although in some fields, such as BANKRUPTCY, the Court has approved federal question jurisdiction over suits involving only minor elements of federal law.

The Supreme Court has struggled to develop a narrower interpretive principle for the general federal question statute, seeking to allow adequate implementation of federal policy while avoiding an unnecessary deluge of cases into federal courts. For example, the statute is read to require the plaintiff's reliance on federal law to be revealed in the complaint according to traditional rules of pleading. It also appears that if plaintiff's reliance on federal law is not at the forefront of the claim, as when there is a dispute over present property rights that at some remote time had their source in federal law, jurisdiction will be denied under the general statute even though Congress could constitutionally confer it more specifically. Also, if the plaintiff relies on, refers to, and incorporates state law, the Court may refuse to allow the claim into federal court under the general statute because federal law will not be sufficiently at issue.

No single principle explains all the cases interpreting the general federal question statute. Despite this confusion, most types of cases have been classified either within or outside the federal question jurisdiction. To determine whether a new type of case combining federal and state elements falls within the statute's scope, the courts pragmatically assess the degree of federal interest in the subject matter of the litigation, the relative prominence of state and federal issues, and the likely burden on the federal judicial system of accepting jurisdiction in cases of that type.

The federal question jurisdiction authorized in Article III encompasses cases removed from state to federal court upon the defendant's assertion of a federal defense. Congress has not, however, conferred such broad federal question removal jurisdiction upon the federal courts. With a few exceptions, it has limited removal to cases that fall within original federal question jurisdiction under the general statute.

CAROLE E. GOLDBERG-AMBROSE
(1986)

Bibliography

COHEN, WILLIAM 1967 The Broken Compass: The Requirement That a Case Arise "Directly" under Federal Law. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 115:890–916.

MISHKIN, PAUL J. 1953 The Federal "Question" in the District Courts. Columbia Law Review 53:157–196.

FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

Article I of the Constitution empowers Congress to "constitute" lower federal courts and thus, by conventional assumption, to regulate practice and procedure in the cases heard in those courts. When the lower federal courts were first created in 1789, Congress enacted a law, known as the Conformity Act, that required each federal trial court to follow, in civil actions at law, the procedural rules of the state in which it was situated. By contrast, Congress directed the Supreme Court to promulgate federal procedures for federal admiralty and EQUITY cases respectively.

Under the Conformity Act, hypertechnical and arbitrary state procedures hampered the federal courts. Also, uniform procedures were not available for administration of federal law nationwide under the general FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION first conferred on the federal courts in 1875. Finally, in 1934, Congress adopted the Rules Enabling Act, which authorized the Supreme Court to promulgate federal procedural rules, subject to a congressional veto. Both Congress's power to delegate this authority and the Supreme Court's power to exercise it, consistent with the CASE OR CONTROVERSY requirement of Article III, have been upheld.

In accordance with the Act, the Supreme Court issued the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1938. Congress declined to veto them. The new rules combined law and equity into a single form of action while preserving the SEVENTH AMENDMENT right to TRIAL BY JURY on any issue that would have been so tried before the merger. While they incorporated state law with respect to some matters, such as provisional remedies, the rules also made important innovations, such as simplified pleading, liberal joinder of claims and parties, and greater emphasis on pretrial discovery of facts. Many state procedures have come to resemble the Federal Rules. And the new joinder rules have resulted in enlargement of the definition of a "case" for purposes of determining ANCILLARY and PENDENT JURISDIC-

TION in the federal courts. In 1966, admiralty actions were made subject to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, as amended to retain a few specialized rules for suits designated as admiralty actions in the pleadings.

Special constitutional problems have arisen when the Federal Rules have been employed in diversity actions. Congress and the federal courts do not have general substantive lawmaking power over cases simply because they are within the DIVERSITY JURISDICTION. Thus, when a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure differs from the procedural rule that would be applied in state court, and the difference in rules could affect the outcome of the case, the question arises whether the Federal Rule exceeds federal lawmaking authority and impermissibly intrudes on reserved state power. In Hanna v. Plumer (1963) the Supreme Court held that so long as a rule is "rationally capable of classification" as procedural, it is an appropriate subject of legislation under Congress's Article I power to create and regulate the lower federal courts, even though the rule may also affect substantive rights. It is unlikely that the Supreme Court, which promulgates the rules of civil procedure, would decide that those rules are not rationally classifiable as "procedural."

CAROLE E. GOLDBERG-AMBROSE
(1986)

Bibliography

WRIGHT, C. 1976 Federal Courts, 3rd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

After the FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE (1938) established a uniform set of procedures for the trial of civil cases in federal courts, Congress authorized the SUPREME COURT to make rules for the trial of federal criminal cases as well. With two Justices dissenting, the Supreme Court adopted the rules in 1944 and submitted them to Congress, which, by silence, approved them.

Before adoption of the rules, the trial of federal criminal cases was regulated by a varying and uncertain mixture of state and federal rules. The first achievement of the Federal Rules was simplification and clarification. The second was uniformity: the same rules would govern the major aspects of federal criminal trials all over the country. The federal appellate courts would now need to know only one body of procedural law, and all federal defendants would now enjoy similar rights and bear similar burdens.

Certain of the changes worked by the rules—for example, the substitution of a simplified complaint for the old, highly technical forms of INDICTMENT, and the consolidation of defense motions under a single heading—were clear gains by any measure. But probably the most significant achievement of the rules was to focus national attention on the regulation of the criminal process, which has consumed an enormous amount of professional and public attention ever since. Surely it was no accident that McNabb v. United States (1943), holding inadmissible a statement obtained from a suspect whom federal officers illegally detained, was decided while the rules were being considered; nor that McNabb was later reaffirmed in Mallory v. United States (1957) on the basis of Rule 5. (See MCNABB-MALLORY RULE.)

The rules have played a significant part in the expansion and clarification of defendants' rights: as an independent source of law, as a model for constitutional judgments, and as a means by which constitutional judgments could be elaborated. Two examples are illustrative. Rule 11, governing guilty pleas, was used as a guide in constitutional decision making and was itself amended to reflect and to elaborate case law. Rule 41, governing SEARCH WARRANTS, has likewise been modified to elaborate Supreme Court holdings, with respect, for example, to the permissible objects of search, and has also been used as a guide by the Court.

The administration, amendment, and interpretation of the Federal Rules have been heavily charged with constitutional significance, especially in a time of fundamental rethinking of the relation between government and the accused. For the most part this process has been carried on in a public and openminded way, largely immune from politically motivated oversimplifications.

JAMES BOYD WHITE
(1986)

Bibliography

MOORE, JAMES WILLIAM and WAXNER, MARVIN 1985 Rules of Criminal Procedure. Volume 8 of Moore's Federal Practice, 2nd ed. New York: Matthew Bender.

FEDERAL TEST ACTS

12 Stat. 430 (1862)
12 Stat. 502 (1862)
13 Stat. 424 (1865)
23 Stat. 21 (1868)

Early in the CIVIL WAR northern state and federal officials on an ad hoc basis administered oaths of allegiance to civilians suspected of disloyalty. In June 1862 Congress enacted the "jurors' test oath" which required persons sitting on federal GRAND and PETIT JURIES to swear to future loyalty and that they had not, in the past, voluntarily supported or given "aid or comfort" to the rebellion. The "Ironclad Test Oath" statute, enacted by Congress in July 1862, required all federal officeholders, except the President and vice-president, to swear they had "never voluntarily borne arms against the United States," aided the rebellion, nor "sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise" any office under the Confederacy. In 1864 the United States SENATE required that its members take this oath. In 1865 the "ironclad oath" was extended to attorneys practicing in federal courts, but in Ex parte Garland (1867) (one of the TEST OATH CASES) this extension was declared unconstitutional. From 1864 until 1868 the "ironclad oath" kept former Confederates from holding federal offices or being seated in Congress. After 1868 the Republican-dominated Congress allowed exceptions for members of their party (and later Democrats) who had served the Confederacy. The "jurors' oath" was used to prevent former Confederates from serving on juries until the repeal of all test oaths in 1884.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

HYMAN, HAROLD M. 1954 Era of The Oath: Northern Loyalty Tests During the Civil War and Reconstruction. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT
60 Stat. 842 (1946)

The Federal Tort Claims Act, enacted in 1946, relinquished an important part of the SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY of the United States and was part of a larger twentieth-century trend toward relaxing absolute barriers to suits against governments and officials. By this act, the United States consented to be sued for its agents' torts when private persons would be liable for such torts under the law of the place where the tort occurred. But the act fell short of imposing liability for all torts of United States agents. Generally, the tort must be compensable under state law. In addition, the act excluded liability for a vague category of behavior known as "discretionary functions." As originally enacted, the act also excluded liability for many torts that might arise in the context of law enforcement, including assault, battery, false imprisonment, and false arrest. In 1974, however, the Intentional Tort Amendment Act expanded government liability to include these and other torts. The act continues to exclude liability for defamation, misrepresentation, deceit, and interference with contract rights.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

SCHUCK, PETER H. 1983 Suing Government: Citizen Remedies for Official Wrongs. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

See: Regulatory Agencies

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION v. GRATZ
253 U.S. 421 (1920)

Section 5 of the FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT outlawed, but did not define, "unfair methods of competition." Justice JAMES MCREYNOLDS, for a 7–2 Supreme Court, upheld a contract exclusively binding customers to one supplier. Confining Federal Trade Commission (FTC) orders against unfair methods to those previously found illegal (a HOLDING reversed in 1934), the courts, not the commission, were henceforth to determine what section 5 meant. Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, joined by Justice JOHN H. CLARKE, dissented. They would have voided this practice, contending that "the Act left the determination to the Commission." They agreed that courts might determine whether—based on FTC findings—a practice was unfair, but they cautioned against overturning commission decisions without substantial reason.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Economic Regulation; Regulatory Agencies.)

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT
38 Stat. 717 (1914)

When the decisions in STANDARD OIL COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1911) and United States v. American Tobacco (1911) demonstrated that trusts could be dissolved, public calls for a policy regulating combinations and monopolies increased. Responding to President WOODROW WILSON's appeal, Congress created the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) on September 26, 1914. The act created no criminal offenses; the commission would advise business on how to conform to a policy of competition. Congress vested the commission with broad powers of investigation and recommendation regarding enforcement of the ANTITRUST laws, but the act did not cover banks or common carriers. (See INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.) Consisting of five commissioners, the FTC is a quasi-judicial tribunal whose findings of fact, if supported by testimony, are binding on the courts and whose decisions are reviewable there.

In furtherance of its goal of fostering competition, section 5 stated that "unfair methods of competition in commerce and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce are hereby declared illegal." Intentionally vague, this provision relied on judicial decisions and experience to give it meaning. By outlawing methods, it improved upon earlier statutes which prohibited only specific acts. Other sections (6 and 9) granted the commission power to require compliance: it could require written responses to inquiries, secure access to corporate books and records, and subpoena witnesses.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Federal Trade Commission v. Gratz.)

FEINER v. NEW YORK
340 U.S. 315 (1951)

Feiner was convicted of BREACH OF THE PEACE for derogatory remarks concerning President HARRY S. TRUMAN which provoked hostility and some threats from a "restless" crowd. Two police officers, fearing violence, ordered Feiner to stop. When he refused, they arrested him. Feiner marked the post-1920s Court's first use of the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER rule to uphold the conviction of a speaker. Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON spoke for the majority. JUSTICE FELIX FRANKFURTER's concurrence urged a balancing approach to replace the danger rule. This case, like TERMINIELLO V. CHICAGO (1949), raised the HOSTILE AUDIENCE problem.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

FELONY

The most common classification of crimes is between MISDEMEANORS and felonies. The Constitution does not control the definitions of felony and misdemeanor; the distinction usually is made by a state statute, or, in a few instances, by state constitution. Federal statutes define the scope of federal felonies and misdemeanors.

A state statute commonly will define a felony as a crime for which a person may be imprisoned in a state penitentiary (rather than a local jail) or as an offense for which a person may be imprisoned for a minimum length of time (such as six months or one year). The distinction between a felony and a misdemeanor may determine whether a police officer had statutory authority to arrest a person without a warrant, which state court has jurisdiction over a criminal charge, or whether the defendant will be subject to punishment under a habitual criminal statute which provides for increased punishment after conviction for several felonies.

Although the distinction between felonies and misdemeanors is an important one under state law, it is not significant for constitutional law purposes. There are three constitutional provisions, applicable to the prosecution of criminal cases, whose meaning or impact is dependent in part upon the seriousness of the crime charged, not upon the felony-misdemeanor distinction. These provisions are the Fifth Amendment GRAND JURY clause, the Sixth Amendment RIGHT TO COUNSEL, and the Sixth Amendment right to TRIAL BY JURY.

The Supreme Court has held that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT does not incorporate the Fifth Amendment's grand jury clause; that clause, therefore, is not applicable to state or local criminal prosecutions. In Ex parte Wilson (1885) the Supreme Court defined the federal crimes to which the grand jury clause applied as those "punishable by imprisonment at hard labor" in a federal penitentiary. Federal statutes and the FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE define a federal felony as any federal offense punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year. A federal felony prosecution must be initiated by a grand jury indictment. Someone charged with a federal misdemeanor may be prosecuted based on either an INFORMATION filed by the federal prosecutor or a grand jury indictment.

The Sixth Amendment guarantee of a right to counsel in all criminal prosecutions applies to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. The Supreme Court has held that the Sixth Amendment also gives an INDIGENT defendant the right to have the government provide him with an attorney in some, but not all, criminal cases. A defendant convicted of a crime cannot be sentenced to imprisonment for even one day unless he has had the opportunity to be represented by counsel at his trial. The government, however, need not appoint attorneys for indigent persons who are convicted of crimes that in fact are not punished by imprisonment. The determination whether the state is required to appoint counsel to represent an indigent defendant is not based on a felony-misdemeanor distinction. A state is not required to provide counsel to an indigent defendant charged with a serious crime so long as the conviction in fact does not result in imprisonment. Any right to an attorney in a case in which incarceration is not imposed would be based upon a case-by-case DUE PROCESS analysis.

The Sixth Amendment also provides that an accused person has a right to "an impartial jury." The jury trial provision of the Sixth Amendment has been incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment; it governs both state and federal prosecutions. Although the Sixth Amendment refers to the right to a jury trial in "all criminal prosecutions," the Supreme Court has ruled that the accused has a right to a jury trial, rather than a trial before a judge, only when he is charged with an offense that is not "petty." The Court has held that any offense punishable by incarceration for more than six months cannot be deemed "petty." Thus, regardless of the sentence a defendant actually receives, if the defendant is accused of an offense for which there is a possible sentence of more than six months of incarceration, he has a Sixth Amendment right to a trial by jury. The Supreme Court has not explained how courts are to distinguish between "petty" and "nonpetty" offenses where the crime is punishable by no more than six months' imprisonment.

JOHN E. NOWAK
(1986)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE, and ISRAEL, JEROLD 1984 Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

FEMINIST THEORY

Feminist theory encompasses such a large and diverse body of work that it can no longer be described succinctly. A partial definition might stress the relationships among and between, on the one hand, women, women's experience, perceptions and treatment of women, gender as a social category, masculinity and femininity, and sexuality, and, on the other, social and personal identity, language, religion, economic and social structures, law, philosophy, and knowledge. The multifaceted nature of current feminist theory has even led many feminists to use the term "feminist theories." This diversity also marks the use of feminist theory with respect to law.

Feminists trained in law tend to describe their theoretical work as "feminist legal theory" or "feminist jurisprudence." The early development of the field, in the late 1970s and early 1980s, was closely tied to traditional legal categories and analysis, even while it posed a significant challenge to the traditional use of such categories and methods. Its existence was made possible by the movement of significant numbers of women into the legal profession, and especially onto law school faculties, and by changes in interpretation of constitutional doctrine wrought by the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT. The extent of these changes began to manifest itself in Reed v. Reed (1971), in which the Supreme Court first interpreted the EQUAL PROTECTION clause as demanding significant justification for laws that formally discriminated against women. At first, then, feminist jurisprudence concerned itself primarily with elaboration of what equality might mean for women; a large proportion of the scholarship in the field remains focused on this question. However, in the 1990s the directions of feminist legal theory are likely to respond more to developments in feminist theory than to developments in legal theory or doctrine.

In some way all feminist theory concerns itself with describing, explaining, criticizing, and changing the social condition of women as a class from the perspective of, and on behalf of, all women. This project is pursued, however, in radically different ways, posing several kinds of challenges to traditional constitutional JURISPRUDENCE and practice: doctrinal, culture, textural, and structural.

Feminist theory criticizes constitutional doctrine primarily for its failure to center, or often even to consider, women's experience in fashioning, elaborating, and applying rules presented as "neutral." Decisions such as Geduldig v. Aiello (1974)—in which a majority of the Supreme Court rejected an equal protection challenge to the exclusion of pregnant women from a state disability insurance plan, finding the exclusion based on medical condition rather than on sex—are used to demonstrate the extent to which nonfeminist interpretations of equal protection treat as irrelevant or unimportant experiences that many women consider quite important to them as women. While agreeing on this criticism, however, feminist theorists tend to disagree among themselves on whether constitutional law should attempt to develop more "truly neutral" doctrines, what such doctrines might be like, and whether neutrality itself is possible or desirable.

Cultural challenges to constitutional law are of two primary types. Some theorists suggest that the replacement of a predominantly white male judiciary, legislature, and practicing bar with a profession that more closely represents the sex and race composition of the general population would tend to change law and legal practice in a variety of ways. Attempts to test these propositions range from examination of the opinions of women jurists, such as Supreme Court Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, to documentation of shifts in political language, to interviews with, and observations of, female lawyers. Other theorists abstract certain characteristics thought to be associated with women and attempt to elaborate the potential effects of a closer integration of such characteristics into constitutional law. Both of these types of cultural critique often draw on Carol Gilligan's suggestion that an "ethic of care," with its attendant focus on responsibility, connection, and relationship, could validly be added to the "ethic of justice" that biases both moral and legal theory toward an exclusive focus on rights, autonomy, and individualism.

Textual criticism focuses on the language of law, especially law's written texts. Judicial opinions, legislation, and even the Constitution itself may be read as examples of literary production not fundamentally dissimilar from novels, plays, or newspaper articles. Some feminist textual criticism examines language as it communicates certain assumptions about the appropriateness or relevance of women's presence or experience, and shares with doctrinal criticism the project of identifying the sex bias concealed under seemingly neutral practices. This type of criticism has led to some minor changes in legal language (e.g., the replacement of "reasonable man" with "reasonable person"), as well as to textual revisions with more substantive force, such as recrafting jury instructions on self-defense so that their language does not presume the situation of one man resisting another. More literary-oriented theory focuses on the use and deployment of words, images, and metaphors that may be understood as gendered, either in their conscious association with traditional notions of masculinity and femininity or in their historical or psychosocial association with sexuality, sexual courtship, or heterosexual intercourse. Such theorists find within legal texts a process of dichotomization between male and female and a hierarchical ordering of male over female that mirror the insights of structural theories.

Finally, feminist theory also examines both conceptual and rhetorical structures within law and the structure of law itself. Probably the most widely disseminated insight to arise from feminist theory with respect to law is the critique of the process by which law divides human life into a "public" realm, in which law, justice, equality, and politics are thought to be appropriate, and a "private" realm, in which ideals of harmony, sacrifice, and intimacy are to be protected from public scrutiny. The feminist critique of this public-private distinction makes several key points: (1) Legal actors, such as courts, which are themselves "public," decide where the line will be drawn between public and private, and thus shape "the private" through public actions. (2) The association of men with the public sphere and women with the private sphere is used to legitimize women's exclusion from the political life of the nation. (3) When women's experience with intimacy is one of violence—marital rape, wife battering, incest, or sexual coercion—the public-private distinction operates not to protect women's privacy from public scrutiny but to block women's ability to hold male intimates publicly accountable for their violence. (4) The very process of dichotomization that makes it possible to think of public and private life as two separate spheres reflects and strengthens the notion that women and men are fundamentally, necessarily, and naturally different, separate, and unequal. This critique has obvious implications for STATE ACTION doctrine, the choice to place women's reproductive rights under the rubric of the RIGHT OF PRIVACY, and interpretations of what PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS requires in a variety of situations.

Other structural critiques question traditionally presumed relationships between the state and the individual, law and society, normality and deviance, identity and politics, freedom and coercion, and the subjective and objective. The results of these inquiries have led some feminists to characterize the state, the law, or both as "male" in the social, rather than biological, sense of that term.

The Constitution plays a major role in creating or maintaining the structures critiqued by feminist theory. Feminist theory suggests that the Framers' constitution of a polity that excluded women of all races and classes, as well as men of certain races and classes, did not simply result in a partial realization of a vision that could, over time, be extended to those who had been left out. Instead, that decision created gaps and contradictions within the very definitions of what it means to be a polity, to create and limit a government, to "promote the general welfare," and even what it means to subscribe to a rule of "laws, not men [sic]."

CHRISTINE A. LITTLETON
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Constitution as Literature; Gender Rights; Women in Constitutional History; Woman Suffrage.)

Bibliography

DUBOIS, ELLEN et al. 1985 Feminist Discourse, Moral Values and the Laws—A Conversation. Buffalo Law Review 34:11–87.

KAY, HERMA HILL and LITTLETON, CHRISTINE A. 1988 Feminist Jurisprudence: What Is It? When Did It Start? Who Does It? Pages 844–887 in Herma Hill Kay, ed., Sex-Based Discrimination, 3rd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

LITTLETON, CHRISTINE A. 1987 Reconstructing Sexual Equality. California Law Review 75:1279–1337.

MACKINNON, CATHARINE A. 1989 Toward a Feminist Theory of the State. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

SHERRY, SUZANNA 1986 Civic Virtue and the Feminine Voice in Constitutional Adjudication. Virginia Law Review 72:543–616.

WEST, ROBIN L. 1988 Jurisprudence and Gender. Chicago Law Review 55:1–72.

WILLIAMS, PATRICIA 1988 On Being the Object of Property. Signs 14:5–24.

WILLIAMS, WENDY 1985 Equality's Riddle: Pregnancy and the Equal Treatment/Special Treatment Debate. New York University Review of Law and Social Change 13:325–380.

FERGUSON v. SKRUPA
372 U.S. 726 (1963)

This decision is often cited as a leading modern example of the Supreme Court's permissive attitude toward ECONOMIC REGULATION challenged as a violation of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS.

Kansas prohibited "the business of debt adjusting" except as an incident of the practice of law. The Court unanimously upheld this statute against a challenge to its constitutionality. Justice HUGO L. BLACK wrote for the Court. Any argument that the business of debt adjusting had social utility should be addressed to the legislature, not the courts. "We refuse to sit as a "super legislature to weigh the wisdom of legislation." The Court had given up the practice, common during the years before WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH (1937), of using "the "vague contours' of the Due Process Clause to nullify laws which a majority of the Court believed to be economically unwise." Justice Black, unlike many of his brethren, carried this same view of the judicial function into other areas of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION; see his dissents in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) and HARPER V. VIRGINIA BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966).

In Ferguson Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN concurred separately on the ground that the law bore "a rational relation to a constitutionally permissible objective." Apparently Justice Harlan wanted to maintain some level of judicial scrutiny of economic regulations, even if it were only the relaxed RATIONAL BASIS standard, and thought the Black opinion suggested a complete abdication of the judicial role in such cases.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

FESSENDEN, WILLIAM PITT
(1806–1869)

A Maine lawyer, congressman (1841–1843; 1853–1854), senator (1854–1864; 1865–1869), and secretary of the treasury (1864–1865), William Pitt Fessenden chaired the Senate Finance Committee during the CIVIL WAR and later the Joint Committee on Reconstruction. Although sympathetic to many radical goals, Fessenden always demanded strict adherence to constitutional principles. Thus, he opposed aspects of the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION, the legal tender acts, the CONFISCATION ACTS, and the TENURE OF OFFICE ACT. Although Senate majority leader, he voted to acquit ANDREW JOHNSON in his 1867 IMPEACHMENT trial, because he did not believe the President had committed an impeachable offense within the meaning of the Constitution.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

JELLISON, CHARLES ALBERT 1962 Fessenden of Maine, Civil War Senator. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press.

FEUDALISM AND THE CONSTITUTION

When the Framers referred to feudalism in the FEDERALIST, that abstraction served as a model of decentralized rule. Otherwise, they would have agreed with JOHN ADAMS, who in 1765 had authored a short dissertation on the topic: feudalism, merged perniciously with Romish religion, was what the Puritans left behind them in England; released from ignorance, dependence, and extreme poverty, their descendants were free to follow "the true map of man." This view was later endorsed by leading interpreters of "American exceptionalism." More recent research has shown it to be incomplete. Among the COMMON LAW hierarchies that ordered the relations of persons throughout medieval society, those in religious and commercial affairs were removed by the time Adams wrote and were now governed by Parliament. Other hierarchies remained; WILLIAM BLACKSTONE enshrined them as "private relations"—husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, guardian and ward—still under the aegis of the courts. These survived the AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The English development was transplanted into the United States as every state and territory except Louisiana received English common law and statutes into its own legal system. Ancient privileges still intact became VESTED RIGHTS, protected by the SEPARATION OF POWERS against legislative tampering. Following old rules of STATUTORY INTERPRETATION, and newer constitutional limitations, nineteenth-century judges read women's inheritance acts to preserve their husbands' interests against express language to the contrary, nullified maximum-hours statutes as invasions of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT between masters and servants, and struck down state liberty laws for violating slaveholders' common-law right of recaption.

The stubbornness of inherited hierarchy in the face of ideological and social democratization characterizes important constitutional struggles of the twentieth century. Among the most tumultuous was the conflict between employers and employees over the establishment of trade unions. Before the NEW DEAL, most judges held union activity to violate the master's ancient and constitutionally endorsed rights in the workplace. These rights were at issue in the COURT-PACKING "crisis" of 1936, finally resolved in NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., in which the Supreme Court upheld an act of Congress giving an employee a right to a reinstatement proceeding under the WAGNER ACT, a right "unknown to the common law."

Feudal privileges remained prominently on display in the setting of the family. Not until 1943 was a husband's common law right over the possession of his wife's earnings finally terminated. Justices on the REHNQUIST COURT have relied on Blackstone's codification of "private relations" between parents and children to support opinions on subjects ranging from ABORTION to school drug SEARCHES AND SEIZURES. In general, however, sufficiently pointed LEGISLATION in this realm will prevail.

These hierarchies by no means exhaust the feudal content of the Constitution. The writs of CERTIORARI, MANDAMUS, and HABEAS CORPUS, by which constitutional rights might be vindicated, are of medieval vintage. Habeas corpus, "the Great Writ," for instance, was put to its oldest purpose, of securing a party's custody rather than his or her release, in the case of slaves, and after the CIVIL WAR, of apprentices, children, and wives. The three branches of state, as well as the arrangements of FEDERALISM, redact, in their basic design, the intricate network of jurisdictions that was English government under Henry VII and his forebears.

KAREN ORREN
(2000)

Bibliography

ADAMS, JOHN 1765 An Essay on Canon and Feudal Law. In John Holroyd, Earl of Sheffield, ed., Observations on the Commerce of the American States with Europe and the West Indies. New York: Research Reprints (1783/1970).

BROWN, ELIZABETH GASPAR 1964 British Statutes in American Law, 1776–1836. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

HARTZ, LOUIS 1955 The Liberal Tradition in America. New York: Harcourt, Brace.

HURD, ROLLIN C. 1876 Treatise on the Right of Personal Liberty. Albany, N.Y.: W. C. Little.

SEDGWICK, THEODORE 1857 A Treatise on the Rules Which Govern the Interpretation and Application of Statutory and Constitutional Law. New York: J. S. Voorhies.

FEW, WILLIAM
(1748–1828)

William Few represented Georgia at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 and signed the Constitution. He attended the Convention irregularly (leaving to attend Congress), spoke infrequently, and served on only one committee. He afterward served as a senator and federal judge.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

FIELD, DAVID D.
(1805–1894)

David Dudley Field, older brother of Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD, won a number of important cases before the Supreme Court in his career as a highly successful lawyer, EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), Cummings v. Missouri (1867), and UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876) among them. His appearance on behalf of Jay Gould and Jim Fisk in the celebrated Erie Railroad scandal brought him popular criticism and charges of misconduct from his peers. He would later represent the Tweed Ring when his free services were rejected by the prosecution. As one biographer remarked, Field "was essentially a protestant, an originator, a breaker of precedents."

Field devoted his last decades to codification of municipal and international law. He also played a fundamental role in reforming the substantive and procedural codes of New York State; those codes would serve as models for many other states. He served as president of the American Bar Association, 1888–1889.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

FIELD, STEPHEN J.
(1816–1899)

Stephen Johnson Field is a massive figure in the history of the United States SUPREME COURT. Appointed by ABRAHAM LINCOLN in 1863 following six years of distinguished service on the California Supreme Court, Field remained on the bench until 1897 and established a record for length of tenure since surpassed only by WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS. For two generations he preached a radically new gospel of constitutional interpretation that fused natural law concepts, a theory of adjudication based on formally bounded categories of public power and private right, and a designing foresight about the Court's unique capacity to shape American public life. Field's contributions to American constitutional development are conventionally summed up in the phrase laissez-faire CONSTITUTIONALISM. But his profound impact on the institutional character of the Court outlasted his doctrinal formulations. Field was arguably the Court's first self-conscious "activist," and he was certainly the first Justice to describe judicial protection of substantive rights as a democratic endeavor. "As I look back over the more than a third of a century that I have sat on this bench," Field wrote in his valedictory letter, "I am more and more impressed with the immeasurable importance of this court. Now and then we hear it spoken of as an aristocratic feature of a Republican government. But it is the most Democratic of all. Senators represent their states, and Representatives their constituents, but this court stands for the whole country, and as such it is truly "of the people, by the people, and for the people" It was this fundamentally new conception of the Court's position in the American system of government and the manifold ways Field acted upon it during his long career that prompted EDWARD S. CORWIN to describe him as "the pioneer and prophet of our modern constitutional law."

Field's jurisprudence was essentially a constitutional version of the equal rights creed expounded by ANDREW JACKSON in his veto of the bill rechartering the Second Bank of the United States. Field understood democracy in terms of "the natural equal rights of the citizen," particularly equality in the marketplace; he was quick to distinguish the common good of the whole people from the focused demands of interest seekers that sometimes generated legislation favoring some and discriminating against others. Since the Court, like the President, represented "the whole country" rather than a narrow constituency, Field claimed that JUDICIAL REVIEW of legislation was at once the moral equivalent of the executive veto and a consummately democratic power. His two most famous opinions resonated with the substantive concerns of antebellum Jacksonians. The first was designed to protect the rights of the many against legal privileges granted to a few. Dissenting in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) Field denounced the "odious monopoly" produced by legislative skulduggery in Louisiana and claimed that the newly adopted FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT would become "a vain and idle enactment, which accomplished nothing" if the Court continued to permit state legislatures "to farm out the ordinary avocations of life" to favored corporations. In the second, POLLOCK V. FARMERS LOAN & TRUST CO. (1895), Field resisted a statute that, in his view, was designed to enable the many to steal from the few under color of law. There he attacked the mildly progressive federal tax on incomes as an "assault on capital . . . the stepping stone to others, larger and more sweeping, till our political contests . . . become a war of the poor against the rich; a war constantly growing in intensity and bitterness." If Field had been successful in persuading his colleagues to conceptualize the case as he did, the income tax would have been invalidated not because it was a DIRECT TAX but on the ground that its graduated rates violated the Constitution's requirement that "all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." For Field, uniformity mandated equal treatment; the chief defect of the statute was that it created a different rule for rich and poor, thereby violating the first principle of republicanism articulated by his Jacksonian mentors.

Field's penchant for pouring his ideological predispositions into open-ended textual phrases such as "uniform" and "due process" was apparent to colleagues throughout his career. Many were alarmed by his expansive conception of the judicial function; some regarded him as a dangerous man. DAVID DAVIS called him a "damned rascal" in 1866 and HORACE GRAY likened him to a "wild bull" three decades later. HENRY B. BROWN said he was "a man of great determination and indomitable courage, though lacking in judicial temperament." Yet it was impossible to ignore him. What made Field so formidable was his skill in translating the featureless generalities of the Constitution into a coherent system of principled standards. He had an uncanny ability to diagnose recurrent problems almost immediately and to frame rules derived from the COMMON LAW or the structure of the federal system that accommodated his value-laden premises. He anticipated future controversies and supplied mutually consistent solutions to all of them. For Field, these solutions were neither contingent nor variable; they were "true."

Few of the twenty-eight men with whom Field sat on the bench perceived the whole truth in precisely the way he did. But every Justice shared at least some of his premises, and most were willing to articulate one or more of his pet doctrinal formulations in an opinion for the Court. With each new handhold Field secured, however, his colleagues found it increasingly difficult to resist the entire array of rules he had proposed at the outset. The analogies linking each component of his system to the others were very compelling. As late as 1890, Field remained confident that the whole truth, as he understood it, would eventually be embraced by the Court. "[A]ny grave departure from the purposes of the Constitution . . . will not fit harmoniously with other rulings," he explained at the Centennial Celebration of the Organization of the Federal Judiciary. "[I]t will collide with them, and thus compel explanations and qualifications until the error is eliminated. . . . [T]ruth alone is immortal, and in the end will assert its rightful supremacy."

The system of rules Field proposed for integrating the Fourteenth Amendment into the existing corpus of constitutional law was breathtaking in scope. It also had a deceptively simple and, in its day, alluring structure. First, he called for a clear and immutable boundary between the public and private spheres in order to forestall legislation that emptied one pocket only to fill another. Here the operable phrase in the amendment was not due process so much as "take property." Beginning in the Slaughterhouse Cases, Field claimed that some businesses were purely private while others were public in "use." Firms that necessarily "held franchises of a public character appertaining to government," such as those that exercised the EMINENT DOMAIN power or occupied the public rivers or public streets, were public in "use." Consequently government might confer monopoly privileges on such firms, subsidize their operations with tax funds, and regulate their rates of charge. But manufacturers, food processors, warehouse operators, and other businesses that did not need to exercise public franchises were purely private. Those businesses had to be open to all entrants as a matter of common right and their operations could be subject neither to price regulations nor to public subsidy. In the GRANGER CASES (1877) Field added one corollary to this scheme. When government regulated the rates of firms public in "use," he asserted, the prices fixed must be subject to judicial review in order to ensure that service to the public was not "required without reward, or upon conditions amounting to the TAKING OF PROPERTY for PUBLIC USE without compensation." The Court's duty, he said, was "to draw the line between regulation and confiscation."

Field repeatedly claimed that judicial application of these doctrines required no great departure in constitutional interpretation. All the Court had to do was constitutionalize under the Fourteenth Amendment and apply in a systematic fashion the principles of "general constitutional law" articulated by SAMUEL F. MILLER in Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co. (1872) and LOAN ASSOCIATION V. TOPEKA (1874). There the Court proscribed exercises of the eminent domain and tax powers that amounted to "robbery," in the one case by designating irreparable injury to property as a taking and in the other by barring public spending "for purposes of private interest instead of public use." When the Court refused to apply the same principles to the POLICE POWER under the Fourteenth Amendment in the Granger Cases, Field dissented. "Of what avail is the constitutional provision that no State shall deprive any person of property except by DUE PROCESS OF LAW," he asked, "if the State can, by fixing the compensation which he may receive for its use, take from him all that is valuable in the property?" Beginning in STONE V. FARMER'S LOAN AND TRUST CO. (1886), however, the majority made one concession after another to Field's position. By 1898 only the doctrine of business AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST, which Field considered dangerously protean, remained to be pulled down before "the truth . . . asserted its rightful supremacy."

The second component of Field's Fourteenth Amendment system dealt with intergovernmental relations. His general theory was based on the Jacksonian principle of DUAL FEDERALISM: "a national government for national purposes, local governments for local purposes," and each "sovereign" within its assigned sphere such that neither was dependent upon or subordinate to the other nor, indeed, capable of clashing with it as long as the powers of each were properly defined. Thus Field eagerly joined majorities that imposed implied limitations on Congress's MONETARY POWER in Lane County v. Oregon (1869), its taxing power in COLLECTOR V. DAY (1871), and its commerce power in UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. (1895). Beginning in Tarble's Case (1871) he also developed implied limitations on the states' authority to impair the national government's independent energy in the exercise of its "acknowledged powers." Yet Miller, speaking for the majority in the Slaughterhouse Cases, claimed that the Fourteenth Amendment threatened to unravel these "main features of the federal system." What frightened Miller most was the assumption that if the Court had JURISDICTION to protect FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS under the amendment's first section, Congress must have jurisdiction to enact statutes affecting the same rights under the fifth section vesting it with power "to enforce, by appropriate legislation" the amendment's substantive provisions. One reason the majority gutted the PRIVILEGES OR IMMUNITIES clause, then, was to avoid articulating doctrine that might ultimately "fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress."

In Field's view, the Slaughterhouse majority was afraid of a phantom, for a STATE ACTION doctrine could stay the hand of Congress without disturbing the Court's jurisdiction. Here the operable phrase in the text was: "No State shall make or enforce any law." The Fourteenth Amendment, he asserted in dissent, only "ordains that [fundamental rights] shall not be abridged by State legislation." "The exercise of these rights . . . and the degree of enjoyment received from such exercise," he added in anticipation of UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876), "are always more or less affected by the condition and the local institutions of the State, or city, or town where he resides." These rights had never been a concern of the United States and the amendment did not make them one. The enabling clause in the fifth section, whatever its meaning, could not constitutionally enlarge the modest accretion to national authority envisioned by the first section. Because the amendment was not a grant of power but a series of limitations on state legislation, moreover, the Court could readily distinguish between national remedies for prohibited state action (laws that were not "true" exercises of the eminent domain, taxing, and police powers reserved to the states) and inappropriate acts of Congress invading the sphere of state authority. In practical application, the amendment would affect the federal system in a way comparable to the clauses of the Constitution forbidding the states from passing EX POST FACTO, laws, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

The WAITE COURT tentatively endorsed the state action doctrine in Cruikshank, and invoked it with a vengeance in UNITED STATES V. HARRIS (1883) and the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883). These decisions not only assuaged previous doubts about Congress's authority to use the Fourteenth Amendment as a grant of power but also prompted the Court to reconsider Field's blueprint for judicial intervention in government-business relations. Meanwhile, Field elaborated the third component of his Fourteenth Amendment theory. It addressed what he called INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION. Here Field was a singularly important pioneer, for he decided the federal case of first impression on circuit. At issue in Ho Ah Kow v. Nunan (1879) was the San Francisco "queue ordinance" requiring county prisoners to have their hair cropped. As it was "universally understood" that the regulation had been designed "to be enforced only against [the Chinese] race," Field explained, the ordinance violated the equal protection clause. This decision, along with Field's 1882 opinion striking down an anti-Chinese laundry ordinance, supplied the conceptual foundations for the Court's ringing proclamation of the antidiscrimination principle in YICK WO V. HOPKINS (1886).

Yet Field's understanding of "invidious discrimination" did not compel state governments to be colorblind. Dissenting in STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1880), where the Court invalidated a statute that limited jury service to whites, Field claimed that the equal protection clause dealt only with the CIVIL RIGHTS described in Ho Ah Kow. It "leaves political rights . . . and social rights . . . as they stood previous to its adoption." "Civil rights," he explained, "are absolute and personal and [a]ll persons within the jurisdiction of the State, whether permanent residents or temporary sojourners, whether young or old, male or female, are to be equally protected." But nobody in the Strauder majority was prepared to hold that the Fourteenth Amendment forbade the states from excluding Chinese aliens, women, or children from the jury box. The conclusion was inescapable that jury service could not be regarded as a "civil right," for which the amendment mandated "universality of the [equal] protection secured," but only as a "political right . . . conditioned and dependent upon the discretion of the elective or appointing power, whether that be the People acting through the ballot, or one of the departments of their government." The "social rights" to which Field only alluded in the Strauder stood on a similar footing. The capacity of individuals to marry or to have access to public goods such as libraries and schools had always been regulated by law on the basis of age, sex, race, and citizenship. "Such legislation is not obnoxious to the [equal protection] clause of the 14th Amendment," he said, "if all persons subject to it are treated alike under similar circumstances and conditions."

The Strauder majority flatly rejected the classification of rights that Field proposed. "The Fourteenth Amendment makes no attempt to enumerate the rights it is designed to protect," WILLIAM STRONG declared for the Court. "It speaks in general terms, and those are as comprehensive as possible." But once again a Field dissent proved to be prophetic. Three years later, speaking for a unanimous Court in PACE V. ALABAMA (1883), Field held that antimiscegenation laws were not forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment as long as both parties received the same punishment for their crimes. Equal protection mandated equal treatment, not freedom of choice; antimiscegenation laws restricted the liberty of blacks and whites alike. Underlying this ruling was an unarticulated premise of enormous importance: the legal classification "Negro" was not suspect per se. The doctrine of SEPARATE BUT EQUAL enunciated in PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) followed almost as a matter of course, especially after the Court had distinguished "civil rights" from "social rights" under the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT in the Civil Rights Cases. Even Field's distinction between "civil rights" and "political rights" eventually got incorporated into the Court's Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence, albeit in a form substantially different from what he proposed in Strauder. The Waite Court conceded from the outset that jury selection officials might constitutionally employ facially neutral yet impossibly vague tests of good character, sound judgment, and the like. In the absence of state laws expressly restricting participation to whites, JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN explained in Bush v. Kentucky (1883), the Court had no choice but to presume that jury commissioners had acted properly. When the "civil right" of equal opportunity to pursue an "ordinary trade" was at issue in Yick Wo, however, the Court unanimously invalidated the law not only because it had been administered with "an evil eye and an unequal hand" but also because it lacked adequate standards for controlling the discretion of public officials authorized to license the regulated trade.

Simply to sketch the basic contours of Field's jurisprudence is to suggest the degree to which his views, forged into a coherent system at an astonishingly early date and reiterated with great force throughout his record-shattering tenure on the Court, shaped the course of American constitutional law. His associates resisted the whole "truth," as Field understood it, to the very end, and Harlan predicted that he would spend even the final days with "his face towards the setting sun, wondering . . . whether the Munn case or the eternal principles of right and justice will ultimately prevail." Yet appellate judging in America is inherently a collective enterprise. The remarkable thing about Field's career is not that he failed to win every battle but that he eventually celebrated so many victories when the stakes were so very high. What endured was his claim that the Court was "the most [d]emocratic of all" governmental institutions. By acting on that belief Field not only transformed the character of judicial power in America but also influenced debate on the Court's legitimate role long after the structure of doctrine he helped to forge had been annihilated.

CHARLES W. MCCURDY
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1909 The Supreme Court and the Fourteenth Amendment. Michigan Law Review 7:643–672.

GRAHAM, HOWARD J. 1968 Everyman's Constitution: Historical Essays in the Fourteenth Amendment, the "Conspiracy Theory," and American Constitutionalism. Madison: State Historical Society of Wisconsin.

MCCURDY, CHARLES W. 1975 Justice Field and the Jurisprudence of Government-Business Relations. Journal of American History 61:970–1005.

SWISHER, CARL B. 1930 Stephen J. Field: Craftsman of the Law. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution.

FIELD v. CLARK
143 U.S. 649 (1892)

This is a leading case on the subject of DELEGATION OF POWER. The Tariff Act of 1890 authorized the President to suspend its free-trade provisions indefinitely as to countries discriminating against American products. The Supreme Court held, 7–2, that though the act invested the President with discretion, it did not invest him with "LEGISLATIVE POWER"; Congress had fixed adequate standards for his guidance.

Field is also often cited as a POLITICAL QUESTION precedent. Appellants argued that the enrolled act contained one section that the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES had not passed. The Court refused to examine this question; the act's transmission by the congressional leadership and its enrollment by the secretary of state conclusively established its content.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT
(Framing and Ratification)

In January 1869 adult black males could vote in only twenty states. Blacks had received the franchise in ten states of the South under the Reconstruction Act of March 1867 as part of the price of readmission to the Union set by the Republicans in Congress. Because Republicans also controlled the state government of Tennessee, blacks were enfranchised there. But many lived in the ex-slave border states that had been loyal to the Union, and they were not enfranchised. In the North, most blacks did not have the right to vote; however, there were minor exceptions in those states where the black population was small. The New England states except Connecticut allowed black suffrage, as did four midwestern states, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Iowa. But especially in the lower North, where most northern blacks lived, white voters in REFERENDUM after referendum had rejected their unrestricted enfranchisement. Indeed in 1868 the issue of black suffrage was thought to be so dangerous and debilitating to the Republican party that at the party's national convention the framers of the platform devised a double standard by endorsing black voting in the South while trying not to antagonize white voters in the North: thus each northern state could decide black suffrage without federal interference, but southern states must accept black voting as a matter of national policy.

In the presidential election of 1868 Republican candidate ULYSSES S. GRANT captured most of the electoral vote and the Republicans retained control of Congress. But beneath the surface the situation was not reassuring. Grant's electoral victory was much greater than his popular vote (only 52 percent). Without the southern black voter Grant would have lost the popular, though not the electoral, vote. In state after state Grant squeaked by with narrow margins. Indeed, a switch of a mere 29,862 votes out of the 5,717,246 cast for the two major party candidates (.52 percent) would have made the Democratic candidate president. Moreover, the Democrats gained seats in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES in Washington. And Republican majorities in state after state were slim indeed. Finally, Republican politicians throughout the South reported that little reliance could be placed on the southern black voter in the long run because of strong white influence and intimidation and because of black poverty, illiteracy, and inexperience. Danger signals in the South, defeats in state referenda in the North, and a narrow escape from defeat in the presidential election of 1868 taught the Republicans that their platform pledge to the North had to be ignored. Something must be done by the final session of the Fortieth Congress before the Democrats arrived in force.

The Republicans decided it was necessary to augment their strength by enfranchising more blacks, who could be expected to vote Republican en masse. Although egalitarians had begun the advocacy of black enfranchisement, politicians had made its achievement possible. Two years before, Congress had enfranchised blacks in the South because the Republicans then needed southern black votes to counter southern white votes. Now the Republicans also needed the support of northern and border blacks, especially in closely balanced states, and were willing to run limited risks and promote political reform in order to maintain power.

Therefore, during early 1869 the Republicans in the lame-duck Congress pressed for a constitutional amendment to secure impartial manhood suffrage in every state, thereby avoiding further popular rejection in state referenda. They opted for the usual but more indirect method of having Republican state legislatures that were still in session ratify the amendment. Thus they avoided the risk of possible rejection by special conventions.

The amendment finally passed Congress in late February 1869 after a number of compromises. To secure enough moderate votes, the sponsors had to omit a clause that would have outlawed property qualifications and LITERACY TESTS. Such a clause was dispensable because the tests would affect more Negroes in the South than in the North, and because the proponents of the amendment were intent primarily upon securing the northern Negro voter for the Republican party. For the same reasons, they omitted any provision banning RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in qualifications for officeholding. A provision for federal authority over voter qualifications was defeated, and so the potential for evasion in the southern and border states was left wide open.

The legislative history of the Fifteenth Amendment indicated no triumph of radical idealism but rather served to demonstrate its failure—a fact underscored by the fury and frustration of that band of radicals who had favored idealistic and uncompromising reforms. A moderate measure, the amendment had the support of those who understood the limits of party power and who had practical goals in mind; they took into account the possible difficulties of ratification. Time was short, the pressures were great, and the options were limited.

The primary objective—the enfranchisement of blacks in the northern and border states—was clearly understood, stated, and believed by the politicians, the press, and the people during the time when the amendment was framed and then considered by the state legislatures. As the abolitionist organ, the National Anti-Slavery Standard, declared, "evenly as parties are now divided in the North, it needs but the final ratification of the pending Fifteenth Amendment, to assure . . . the balance of power in national affairs." A black newspaper, the Washington New National Era, predicted the same for the border states. Indeed, most newspapers both in the North and in the South during 1869 and 1870 unequivocally, incontrovertibly, and repeatedly spoke of the Republican objective of ensuring party hegemony by means of the Fifteenth Amendment. Moreover, congressmen and state legislators, in arguing for passage and ratification, referred again and again to the partisan need for those votes. The southern black, already a voter, was not irrelevant; an important secondary purpose of the amendment was to assure the continuance of black suffrage in the South by forbidding racial discrimination as to the franchise in a virtually unrepealable amendment to the federal Constitution. Still, the anticipated importance of the black electorate in the North and in the borderland was clearly the overriding concern.

To be sure, the political motives of many Republican politicians were not incompatible with a sincere moral concern. The idealistic motive reinforced the pragmatic one: there was no conflict at the outset between the ideal and the practical or between the interests of the black electorate and those of the Republican party. A radical Republican congressman declared, "party expediency and exact justice coincide for once." A black clergyman from Pittsburgh observed that "the Republican Party had done the negro good but they were doing themselves good at the same time." Indeed, the amendment as framed was both bold and prudent: bold in enfranchising blacks despite concerted opposition and in ordering change by establishing constitutional guidelines; prudent in adapting methods to circumstances so that the amendment would not only pass Congress but also be ratified by the states.

Although the struggle over ratification lasted only thirteen months, it was hard going and the outcome was uncertain until the very end. To be sure, ratification was easy in safe Republican territory (New England and most of the Middle West) and in the South where Republican legislators did their duty. But the fight was especially close in the Middle Atlantic states and in Indiana and Ohio, where the parties were competitive and a black electorate had the potential for deciding victory or defeat. In the Democratic border states and on the Pacific Coast, where racial feeling ran high, Republicans feared that pushing the amendment would lose them votes; so they refrained from pressing for ratification in these regions. Nevertheless, in clear-cut conflicts of interest between state and national Republican party organizations, the national party was everywhere victorious. Mutinies in Rhode Island and Georgia were suppressed. The amendment had the backing of the Grant administration, with its rich patronage. By endorsing the amendment in his inaugural address, Grant placed the indispensable prestige of the presidency behind it; he then went beyond pronouncements by swinging Nebraska to ratify it. Those Republican politicians who held or aspired to hold national office added the weight of their influence. As one Ohioan advised, "By hook or by crook you must get the 15th amendment through or we are gone up."

The Fifteenth Amendment became law on March 30,

1870. Republican euphoria followed the hard battle for ratification. Grant, in his message to Congress, wrote that the amendment "completes the greatest civil change and constitutes the most important event that has occurred since the nation came to life." Blacks everywhere celebrated; they regarded the Fifteenth Amendment as political salvation, as a solemn written guarantee that would never be abridged. They now felt secure, protected by both the vote and the "long strong arm of the Government." Whites believed that since the Negro was now a citizen and a voter, he could take care of himself. Antislavery societies throughout the country disbanded, now confident that equality before the law was sufficient and that in any event, "no power ever permanently wronged a voting class without its own consent." But subsequent events made a mockery of such predictions in the South where Democrats denied blacks the franchise for almost a century.

WILLIAM GILLETTE
(1986)

Bibliography

GILLETTE, WILLIAM (1979) 1981 Retreat from Reconstruction, 1869–1879. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

——— (1965) 1969 The Right to Vote: Politics and the Passage of the Fifteenth Amendment. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

MITTRICK, ROBERT 1985 A History of Negro Voting in Pennsylvania during the Nineteenth Century. Unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Rutgers University, chap. 5.

FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT
(Judicial Interpretation)

The judicial interpretation of the Fifteenth Amendment has been closely intertwined with that of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, largely in a Southern context. Within a year of ratification (1870) Congress passed three FORCE ACTS forbidding both public and private interference with voting on the basis of race or color. Federal officials tried hard at first to enforce these laws, but they were daunted by hostility in the South and growing indifference in Congress and the Supreme Court. Prosecutions dropped sharply in 1874; RECONSTRUCTION ended in 1877; the Jim Crow era of systematic SEGREGATION began around 1890; and the conspiracy provisions of the Force Acts were dropped in 1894.

From Reconstruction to WORLD WAR I the Supreme Court showed more ingenuity in voiding VOTING RIGHTS actions than in upholding them. Although it was willing, under Article I, section 4, to uphold convictions and damage awards for ballot box fraud in federal elections, as in EX PARTE YARBROUGH (1884), it would not allow INDICTMENTS for conspiracy to bribe, even in federal elections as in JAMES V. BOWMAN (1903). It steadfastly refused to uphold convictions for private interference with voting rights in state or local elections in UNITED STATES V. REESE (1875) and UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876), or to uphold civil actions for a state official's refusal to register blacks, in Giles v. Teasley (1904).

The Court did shrug off arguments in Myers v. Anderson (1915) that the Fifteenth Amendment was itself void for diluting the votes of enfranchised whites and thereby depriving their states of equal suffrage in the Senate without their consent. But it did almost nothing to thwart the new franchise restrictions of the Jim Crow era—literacy, property, POLL TAX, residence, character, and understanding tests—designed to cull black and upcountry white voters. (See WILLIAMS V. MISSISSIPPI.) Only in GUINN V. UNITED STATES (1915) did it strike down a GRANDFATHER CLAUSE exempting descendants of 1867 voters from Oklahoma's LITERACY TEST—without, however, striking down the test itself. Guinn had no practical impact on voting registration, but it was important for serving notice that the Fifteenth Amendment bars subtle as well as blatant discrimination.

The Court moved against white PRIMARY ELECTIONS with more deliberation than speed. Party primary elections emerged in response to the regional party monopolies, Republican in the North, Democratic in the South, which followed the "realigning" election of 1896. By World War I, primaries were universal. The dominant party's nomination became the choice that counted, and general elections merely rubber-stamped the dominant party's nominee. This trend was earliest and most pronounced in the South. It weakened party discipline, lowered turnout drastically in general elections, strengthened the dominance of plantation whites, and froze out blacks almost completely.

Blacks challenged this exclusion in a famous series of Texas cases. In NIXON V. HERNDON (1927) and NIXON V. CONDON (1932) NAACP attorneys successfully attacked statutes barring blacks, and letting the parties bar blacks, from voting in primary elections. Counsel for both sides in Herndon argued the Fifteenth Amendment, but Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, speaking for a unanimous Court, found the statute instead a "direct and obvious infringement of the Fourteenth." The Court followed this precedent in Condon.

In attacking the discriminatory law under the Fourteenth, rather than the denial of a voting right under the Fifteenth, the Court ignored its earlier view that the pertinent section of the Fourteenth was not intended to protect voting rights. (See MINOR V. HAPPERSETT.) It also left

Texas free to repeal the Condon statute, while permitting the Democrats to exclude blacks legally through their own "private" action. (See GROVEY V. TOWNSEND.)

The Court returned to the Fifteenth Amendment to overrule Grovey in SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1944), finding STATE ACTION in laws governing the timing and conduct of primary elections and by the "fusing [in UNITED STATES V. CLASSIC (1941)] of primary and general elections into a single instrumentality for the choice of officers." Later, in TERRY V. ADAMS (1953), the Court extended this concept of "fusion into a single instrumentality" to invalidate a whites-only "preprimary" election used by the Jaybird party since 1889 to capture Democratic nominations in a Texas county.

Without the white primary, segregationist whites had only franchise restrictions to block black votes. These restrictions had reduced black registrations by a third in the nineteenth century, but they had only limited and temporary effect by the 1950s. Black literacy was up, and only three of the eleven Southern states—Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana—retained blatantly discriminatory literacy tests. These the Court struck down, along with nondiscriminatory tests where blacks had been segregated in inferior schools.

Congress greatly aided in expanding the black vote with jucidial protection in the CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS of 1957, 1960, and 1964, and especially with the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965, which authorized suspension of state literacy and character tests and provision of federal examiners to register blacks where discrimination was found. In 1970, congress wholly forbade literacy tests as a condition on voting in state elections.

Though the Court took almost seventy-five years to give the Fifteenth Amendment much practical effect, its interventions since World War II have greatly changed both the constitutional and political landscapes. Smith v. Allwright, with its broad reading of the Fifteenth Amendment looking through form to substance foreshadowed such great Fourteenth Amendment cases as SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948) and BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954). GOMILLION V. LIGHTFOOT (1960), which struck down a racial GERRYMANDER under the Fifteenth Amendment, was a bridge to BAKER V. CARR (1962).

Opening the primaries and the franchise to blacks brought them out of political exile. Black registration in the South, only five percent in 1940, grew to twenty-eight percent in 1960 and sixty-three percent in 1976, narrowing the gap between black and white registrations from forty-four percent to five percent. Black elected officials in the South increased from fewer than 100 to more than 1,000. White politicians stopped waving ax handles, standing in the doorways of segregated schools, and using terms like "burrhead" in public debate. The Court's enforcement of the Fifteenth Amendment may properly be described as late, but not little.

WARD E. Y. ELLIOTT
(1986)

Bibliography

ELLIOTT, WARD E. Y. 1975 The Rise of Guardian Democracy: The Supreme Court's Role in Voting Rights Disputes, 1845–1969. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

KEY, V. O., JR. 1949 Southern Politics. New York: Knopf.

KOUSSER, J. MORGAN 1974 The Shaping of Southern Politics: Suffrage Restriction and the Establishment of the One-Party South, 1880–1910. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

LAWSON, STEVEN F. 1976 Black Ballots: Voting Rights in the South, 1944–1969. New York: Columbia University Press.

FIFTH AMENDMENT

See: Double Jeopardy; Due Process of Law; Grand Jury; Right Against Self-Incrimination; Taking of Property

FIGHTING WORDS

In CHAPLINSKY V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1942) the Supreme Court upheld the conviction of a Jehovah's Witness who called a policeman "a God damned racketeer" and "a damned Fascist," holding that "fighting words"—face-to-face words plainly likely to provoke the average addressee to fight—were not protected by constitutional free speech guarantees. Viewed narrowly, the fighting words doctrine can be seen as a per se rule effectuating the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER principle, relieving the government of proving an actual INCITEMENT by taking the words themselves as decisive. Taken broadly, Chaplinsky strips "four-letter words" of free speech protection. "It has been well observed," Justice FRANK MURPHY said, "that such utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to the truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality."

The modern tendency of the Court has been to extend partial FIRST AMENDMENT protection to even the "excluded" areas of speech. To the extent that Chaplinsky refuses protection to four-letter words because they offend against taste or morality, it has been limited by recent decisions such as COHEN V. CALIFORNIA (1971), Gooding v. Wilson (1972), and Rosenfeld v. New Jersey (1972). The Justices appear to have been engaging in ad hoc analysis of what persons in what situations are entitled to a measure of protection from the shock to their sensibilities generated by words that, in the language of Chaplinsky, "by their very utterances inflict injury."

The shock aspect of four-letter words is obviously related to the shock element in OBSCENITY. In FCC V. PACIFICA FOUNDATION (1978) the Court upheld FCC regulation of "indecent" broadcasting that involved "patently offensive" four-letter words but was not obscene. While admitting that the words in question would warrant constitutional protection under certain circumstances, the Court held that in view of their capacity to offend, their slight social value in the conveying of ideas, and the intrusive character of speech broadcast into the home, their repeated use might constitutionally be banned at least in time slots and programming contexts when children might be listening.

The recent decisions suggest that outside the direct incitement to violence context the Court is prepared to balance PRIVACY against speech interests where four-letter words are at issue. Where statutes go beyond prohibiting incitement to violence, and also bar cursing or reviling, or using opprobrious, indecent, lascivious, or offensive language, they are likely to be held unconstitutionally vague or overbroad. (See Lewis v. New Orleans, 1974.)

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Balancing Test; Freedom of Speech.)

Bibliography

KONVITZ, MILTON 1978 Fundamental Liberties of a Free People. Chap. 17. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

SHEA, THOMAS 1975 Fighting Words and the First Amendment. Kentucky Law Journal 63:1–22.

FILIBUSTER

A filibuster is the strategic use of delay to block LEGISLATION, to force an amendment, or to prompt other action by the U.S. SENATE. Filibusters occur in the Senate, but not in the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, because only the Senate allows unlimited debate on any measure, and no motion exists by which a simple majority of senators can bring any debatable measure to a vote. The only way the Senate can vote on any matter subject to filibuster over the objection of even a single senator is to obtain CLOTURE (an end of debate) under Senate Rule XXII, which requires the votes of 60 senators.

Contrary to popular belief, a filibuster today is seldom conducted through actual extended speech on the Senate floor, but is accomplished rather by a senator threatening to speak indefinitely if a matter is brought before the Senate for a vote. Consequently, a filibuster occurs when senators credibly threaten the Senate leadership that they possess the requisite 41 votes to block cloture under Rule XXII. The widespread use of filibuster threats has effectively increased the number of votes it takes to enact controversial legislation from 51 (or 50 plus the Vice-President's vote) to 60. A majority of senators cannot change this because any revision of Rule XXII requires a vote of two-thirds of the Senate.

The conventional objection to the filibuster is that it is antimajoritarian and thus antidemocratic. The supermajority requirement of Rule XXII, however, is not alone among Senate procedures that are antimajoritarian. Notably, Senate rules empower committees to determine the content of proposed legislation and to decide whether legislation reaches the floor for a vote. Over the years, committees have exercised their power to block or divert action favored by majorities of the House and Senate. The filibuster may counteract the antimajoritarian aspects of the committee system by enabling individual senators to block legislation favored by a committee or to force changes rejected by a committee. Thus, the filibuster may work not so much against majority rule as against other forms of minority power.

The attacks on the constitutionality of the filibuster nonetheless focus on its antimajoritarian character. The Constitution is silent on the topic of filibusters; it neither authorizes nor prohibits them. There are two aspects of the filibuster rule that may be unconstitutional: one is that it requires a supermajority to enact legislation; the second is that a supermajority is required to change the voting rules. As to the first, the strongest arguments against the constitutionality of filibuster are textual. The Constitution specifically requires a supermajority vote in only seven situations. This enumeration of the instances where a supermajority was required suggests that the Framers assumed that a simple majority vote in each house would suffice for all other congressional action. Other constitutional provisions support the argument that the constitution makes a majority vote sufficient for action in the Senate. For instance, the provision specifying that a two-thirds vote can override a presidential VETO of legislation suggests that the Framers assumed that a majority vote would be sufficient for action by the Senate.

The problem with this textual argument is that the Constitution explicitly grants the Senate the power to determine its own rules and procedures. The list of instances in which the Constitution specifies that a supermajority is required does not compel the Senate to act by majority vote at all other times. Rather, the Senate is free to adopt its own rules for voting on all other matters.

The stronger argument against the constitutionality of the Senate rules regarding the filibuster lies in the supermajority requirement for changing Rule XXII. Senators can filibuster efforts to amend the Senate rules and Rule XXII requires agreement of two-thirds of those present and voting to obtain cloture on any motion to amend the rules. The Senate that adopted Rule XXII attempted to restrict the ability of all future Senates to change it. The entrenchment of the filibuster violates a fundamental constitutional principle that one legislature cannot bind a subsequent one. The popular sovereignty and legislative accountability upon which American democracy is premised are frustrated when one session of the legislature can prevent or limit action by future sessions, thus preventing the people's elected representatives from enacting laws favored by their constituents.

CATHERINE L. FISK
ERWIN CHEMERINSKY
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Supermajority Rules.)

Bibliography

EULE, JULIAN N. 1987 Temporal Limits on the Legislative Mandate: Entrenchment and Retroactivity. American Bar Foundation Research Journal 1987:379–459.

FISK, CATHERINE and CHEMERINSKY, ERWIN 1997 The Filibuster. Stanford Law Review 49:181–254.

MCGINNIS, JOHN O. and RAPPAPORT, MICHAEL B. 1995 The Constitutionality of Legislative Supermajority Requirements: A Defense. Yale Law Journal 105:483–511.

FILLMORE, MILLARD
(1800–1874)

A Buffalo, New York, lawyer and WHIG politician, Millard Fillmore was elected vice-president in 1848 and became President when ZACHARY TAYLOR died in 1850. Unlike Taylor, Fillmore enthusiastically supported passage of the COMPROMISE OF 1850 which he believed necessary to preserve the Union. His administration was particularly vigorous in enforcing the Fugitive Slave Law through the Christiana Treason Trials, and prosecutions of those involved in the Shadrach Rescue, the Jerry Rescue, and the abortive Sims Rescue. Fillmore was not renominated by the Whigs in 1852 and ran unsuccessfully as a Know-Nothing in 1856.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

RAYBACK, ROBERT J. 1959 Millard Fillmore: Biography of a President. Buffalo, N.Y.: Buffalo Historical Society.

FINAL JUDGMENT RULE

By congressional statute the federal courts of appeals are permitted, in the usual case, to exercise their APPELLATE JURISDICTION only over final judgments of the district courts. An additional provision authorizes review of district court orders granting, denying, or otherwise dealing with INJUNCTIONS, and of certain other INTERLOCUTORY orders less frequently given. Furthermore, a district judge may certify an interlocutory order for review by the court of appeals, and that court can, in its discretion, review such a nonfinal order. The Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction over cases coming from the state courts also is limited to final judgments of those courts. (The Supreme Court is not limited by this final judgment rule in hearing cases coming to it from a federal court of appeals; it can grant CERTIORARI in any case "in" the court of appeals.)

The final judgment rule, which aims at avoiding piecemeal appellate review, has so many judge-made exceptions that it has aptly been called "a permeable screen." Thus, a "collateral" order, unrelated to the merits of the case, may be reviewed if it presents an issue that might never be decided if the final judgment rule were strictly applied. Similarly, if rigorous application of the rule would do irreparable injury to some important federal policy, the Supreme Court has held that a nonfinal order can be reviewed. And in UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974) the Court permitted review of a nonfinal order of a district court ordering the President of the United States to turn over the "Watergate tapes," in order to avoid putting the President to the "unseemly" choice between obeying the order and refusing and being cited for contempt. It is hard to avoid the conclusion that the final judgment "rule" has been made into a technique for allowing review of those interlocutory orders the Supreme Court thinks should be reviewed even though they are not final.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

WRIGHT, CHARLES ALAN 1983 The Law of Federal Courts, 4th ed. Pages 697–717, 739–743. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

FIREFIGHTERS LOCAL UNION NO. 1784 v. STOTTS
467 U.S. 561 (1984)

The City of Memphis, Tennessee, laid off white firefighters with more seniority to protect the positions of less senior blacks who had been employed under a "race conscious" AFFIRMATIVE ACTION plan. The white firefighters sued, alleging that their seniority rights were explicitly protected by the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964.

Justice BYRON R. WHITE, writing for the Supreme Court's majority, agreed, noting that "mere membership in the disadvantaged class is insufficient to warrant a seniority award; each individual must prove that the discriminatory practice had an impact on him." White thus affirmed the proposition, which is explicit from the plain language of Title VII, that rights vest in the individual and not in the racial class, and that this fact demands a close fit between injuries and remedies. White's opinion raises some doubt about the power of courts to fashion classwide remedies where, as in race-conscious affirmative action plans, benefited individuals are not required to demonstrate individual injury. This case signals an important move toward the restoration of the principle that rests at the core of liberal jurisprudence—that rights adhere to the individual, and not to the racial class that one happens to inhabit.

EDWARD J. ERLER
(1986)

FIRST AMENDMENT

The First Amendment today protects the overlapping realms of the spirit—of belief, emotion, and reason—and of political activity against intrusion by government. The amendment directly forbids federal violation of the individual's RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, freedom of expression, FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY, and associated political liberties. The amendment indirectly forbids state violation because it is held to be incorporated into the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT's restrictions upon the powers of the states. The body of law presently defining First Amendment liberties has been shaped not so much by the words or intent of the original sponsors as by the actors and events of much later history. The story is one of the continual expansion of individual freedom of expression, of the FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, and, until 1980, of widening SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

The CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 saw no need to include guarantees of religious liberty, FREEDOM OF SPEECH, or other human rights. Most of the Framers believed in some such rights but supposed that the powers proposed for the new federal government were so severely limited by specific enumeration as to leave scant opportunity for either Congress or President to threaten individual liberty. The threats would come from state law and state governments. For protection against these, the Framers looked to the constitutions of the individual states. In the struggle for RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION, however, those who feared abuse of federal power exacted an undertaking that if the proposed Constitution were ratified by the states, the first Congress would be asked to propose amendments constituting a BILL OF RIGHTS. The First Amendment is thus the first and most far-reaching of the ten articles of amendment submitted by JAMES MADISON, proposed by Congress, and ratified by three-quarters of the states in 1791 solely as restrictions upon the new federal government, the powers of which were already severely limited.

The assumption that the amendment would have only a narrow function made it possible to ignore fundamental differences that would produce deep divisions more than a century later, after the amendment had been extended to the several states. The colonists held a variety of religious beliefs, though nearly all were Christian and a majority were Protestant. Whatever the limits of their tolerance back home in their respective states where one church was often dominant, they had reason to understand that the coherence of the federal union could be fixed only if the new federal government were required to respect the free exercise of religion. The men of South Carolina with their state-established religion and of Massachusetts with religion appurtenant to their state government could therefore support a prohibition against any federal ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION shoulder to shoulder with the deist THOMAS JEFFERSON and other eighteenth-century rationalists who opposed any link between church and state. Similarly, in applying ROGER WILLIAMS's vision of "the hedge or wall of separation between the garden of the church and the wilderness of the world," there was originally no need to choose between his concept of protection for the church against the encroachments of worldly society and Jefferson's concept of protection for the state against the encroachments of religion.

The conditions and political assumptions of 1791 also made it easy to guarantee "the freedom of speech or of the press" without accepting or rejecting the Blackstonian view that these guarantees bar only licensing and other previous restraints upon publication, leaving the government free to punish SEDITIOUS LIBELS and like unlawful utterances. Because the original amendment left the states unhampered in making and applying the general body of civil and criminal law, except as the people of each state might put restrictions into its own constitution, there was no need to consider how the First Amendment would affect the law of LIBEL and slander, the power of the judges to punish CONTEMPT of court, or the operation of laws punishing words and demonstrations carrying a threat to the public peace, order, or morality. Such questions could and would arise only after the First Amendment was extended to the states.

The fulcrum for extending the First Amendment to the states was set in place in 1868 by the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides in part: ". . . nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW."

The effects of the new amendment upon religious and political liberty and upon freedom of expression were slow to develop. As late as 1922 the Court declared in Pruden- tial Insurance Co. v. Cheek that "neither the Fourteenth Amendment nor any other provision of the Constitution of the United States imposes upon the States any restrictions about "freedom of speech." Within another decade, however, the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of expression had been incorporated into the Fourteenth by judicial interpretation. INCORPORATION of the other clauses, including the prohibition against laws "respecting an establishment of religion," followed somewhat later. Today the First Amendment restricts both state and federal governments to the same extent and in the same fashion.

Yet the historic sequence is important. Many questions of First Amendment law cannot be resolved truly in terms of the original intention because the questions could not arise while the original assumption held. Resolution of the issues was thus postponed until the middle decades of the twentieth century, an era in which liberalism, secularism, and individualism dominated American jurisprudence.

Disparate strains of thought were merged even in the writing of the First Amendment. Subsequent events, including current controversies, have poured new meaning into the words, yet the juxtaposition of the key phrases still tells a good deal about the chief strains in the philosophy underpinning and binding together guarantees of several particular rights.

The Framers put first the prohibition against any law "respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The sequence attests the primacy ascribed to religion. The colonists belonged to diverse churches. Many had fled to the New World to escape religious oppression. Rigid though some might be in their own orthodoxy, probably a majority rejected the imposition of belief or the use of government to stamp out heresy. Certainly, they rejected use of federal power.

It was natural for the authors of the amendment to link "the freedom of speech, or of the press" with freedom of religious belief and worship. The one church was breaking up in late sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Britain. New faiths were emerging based upon individual study of the Holy Word. The man or woman who has discovered the road to salvation has a need, even feels a duty, to bring the gospel to others. Liberty of expression benefits more than the speaker. Suppression would deny the opportunity to hear and read the word of God, and thus to discover the road to salvation. Modern legal analysis recognizes the importance of the hearers' and readers' access to information and ideas in cases in which the author's interest lacks constitutional standing or would, if alone involved, be subject to regulation. (See LISTENERS' RIGHTS.)

Concern for a broader spiritual liberty expanded from the religious core. The thinking man or woman, the man or woman of feeling, the novelist, the poet or dramatist, and the artist, like the evangelist, can experience no greater affront to his or her humanity than denial of freedom of expression. The hearer and reader suffer violation of their spiritual liberty if they are denied access to the ideas of others. The denial thwarts the development of the human potential, the power and responsibility of choice. Although concerned chiefly with religion, JOHN MILTON stated the broader concern in Areopagitica (1644), the single most influential plea, known to the Framers, for unlicensed access to the printing press.

The Enlightenment gave the argument a broader, more rationalistic flavor. Thomas Jefferson and other children of the Enlightenment believed above all else in the power of reason, in the search for truth, in progress, and in the ultimate perfectibility of man. Freedom of inquiry and liberty of expression were deemed essential to the discovery and spread of truth, for only by the endless testing of debate could error be exposed, truth emerge, and men enjoy the opportunities for human progress.

After JOHN STUART MILL one should perhaps speak only of the ability to progress toward truth, and of the value of the process of searching. The compleat liberal posits that he has not reached, and probably can never reach, the ultimate truth. He hopes by constant search—by constant open debate, by trial and error—to do a little better. Meanwhile he supposes that the process of searching has inestimable value because the lessons of the search—the readiness to learn, the striving to understand the minds and hearts and needs of other men, the effort to weigh their interests with his own—exemplify the only foundation upon which men can live and grow together.

It was not chance that America's most eloquent spokesman for freedom of speech, OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, was also a profound skeptic. Dissenting in ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919), he wrote:

> When men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution.

On the far side of the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech and of the press one finds the political rights "peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." (See FREEDOM OF PETITION; FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY AND ASSOCIATION.) The juxtaposition recalls that freedom of speech and of the press have a political as well as a spiritual foundation; and that the First Amendment protects political activity as part of and in addition to the world of the spirit. American thought, especially in Supreme Court opinions, puts the greater emphasis on the political function of free expression. In Garrison v. Louisiana (1964), for example, the Court explained that "speech is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government." ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN, perhaps the foremost American philosopher of freedom of expression, argued that whereas other constitutional guarantees are restrictions protecting the citizens against abuse of the powers delegated to government, the guarantees of freedom of speech and of the press hold an absolute, preferred position because they are measures adopted by the people as the ultimate rulers in order to retain control over the government, the people's legislative and executive agents. James Madison, the author of the First Amendment, expressed a similar thought in a speech in 1794. "If we advert to the nature of Republican Government, we shall find that the censorial power is in the people over the Government, and not in the Government over the people."

Despite the eloquence of Justice Holmes, most of us reject the notion that the ability of an idea to get itself accepted in free competition is the best test of its truth. Some propositions seem true or false beyond rational debate. Some false and harmful, political and religious doctrines gain wide public acceptance. Adolf Hitler's brutal theory of a "master race" is sufficient example. We tolerate such foolish and sometimes dangerous appeals not because they may prove true but because freedom of speech is indivisible. The liberty cannot be denied to some persons and extended to others. It cannot be denied to some ideas and saved for others. The reason is plain enough: no man, no committee, and surely no government, has the infinite wisdom and disinterestedness accurately and unselfishly to separate what is true from what is debatable, and both from what is false. To license one to impose his truth upon dissenters is to give the same license to all others who have, but fear to lose, power. The judgment that the risks of suppression are greater than the harm done by bad ideas rests upon faith in the ultimate good sense and decency of free people.

Constitutional law has been remarkably faithful to this philosophy in dealing with both religious and political ideas. In the prosecution of the leader of a strange religious cult for obtaining money by false pretenses, as in UNITED STATES V. BALLARD (1963), the truth or falsity of the leader's claims of miraculous religious experiences is legally irrelevant; conviction depends upon proof that the defendant did not believe his own pretenses. Similarly, although distaste for political ideology may have influenced some of the decisions in the 1920s affirming the convictions of anarchists and communists for advocacy of the overthrow of the government by force and violence, the social, political, or religious activists seeking changes that frighten or annoy all "right-minded" people receive wide protection in their resort to the SIT-INS, PICKETING, marches, mass demonstrations, coarse expletives, affronts to personal and public sensibilities, and other unorthodox vehicles that are so often their most effective means of expression. Such methods of expression may prejudice opposing public and private interests because of the time, place, or manner of communication, regardless of the content of the message; therefore, the amendment allows regulation of particular forms of expression, or of expression at a particular time or place, regardless of content, provided that the restriction protects important interests that cannot be secured by less restrictive means. The courts have typically scrutinized such restrictions, however, with an eye zealous to condemn as unconstitutional any statute or ordinance ostensibly designed to protect the public peace and order but phrased in such loose words as either to deter constitutionally protected expression or to invite discrimination by police, public prosecutors, or judges against radical "troublemakers" and other unpopular minorities. Thus, the American Nazis were secured the right to parade in uniform with swastikas in an overwhelmingly Jewish community many of whose residents had fled the Holocaust.

Distrust of official evaluation of the worth of ideas may also lie behind the decisions barring regulation of political debate in the interest of "fairness" or equality of opportunity. In BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976), holding that the freedom of speech clause bars laws restricting the dollars that may be spent in a political campaign, the Court observed: "The concept that government may restrict the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others is wholly foreign to the First Amendment." Similarly, in MIAMI HERALD V. TORNILLO (1974) the Court held a state law granting a political candidate a right of space in which to reply to a newspaper's attacks upon his or her record to be unconstitutional interference with the editorial freedom of the newspaper. Only in the area of BROADCASTING has the Court thus far recognized that realization of the ideal of free competition of ideas may be irreconcilable with total freedom from regulation in an era in which the public's chief sources of ideas and information are expensive media of mass communication, which are often under monopolistic control. Federal statutes and regulations subject radio and television broadcasters to loosely defined duties to present public issues fairly and to give a degree of access to political candidates and parties.

Although only deliberately false religious or political representations fall wholly outside the First Amendment, the law is more willing to try to separate the worthless from the valuable in the field of literature and the arts. The amendment gives no protection to "obscene" publications. For many years the definition of OBSCENITY was broad enough to cover works containing individual words or short passages that would tend to excite lustful thoughts in a particularly susceptible person. This standard condemned Lady Chatterley's Lover, An American Tragedy, and Black Boy. From 1930 to 1973 the legal definition of obscenity was gradually narrowed so tightly that many jurists concluded that the First Amendment would protect the most prurient of matter unless it was "utterly without redeeming social value." After 1973 changes in the composition of the Court led to a somewhat less permissive formulation. A work is obscene if a person applying contemporary community standards would find that it appeals to the prurient interest; if it represents or describes ultimate sexual acts, excretory functions, or the genitals in a patently lewd or offensive manner; and if it lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. YOUNG V. AMERICAN MINI THEATRES (1976) suggests that explicity sexual books and motion pictures, even when not obscene, may be regulated as to the places and perhaps the time and manner of their distribution in ways that are forbidden for other materials.

These exceptions from the principle that bars any branch of government, including the judiciary, from judging the value of ideas and sensations seem attributable partly to the emphasis that American law puts upon the political values of the First Amendment, partly to the diminishing but still traditional concern of government for public morals, and partly to the actual or supposed links between producers and distributors of commercial pornography and the criminal underworld.

So long as one is dealing with beliefs and expressions separable from conduct harmful to other individuals or the community, the essential unity of the philosophical core of the First Amendment makes it unnecessary to distinguish for legal purposes among religious beliefs, political ideologies, and other equally sincere convictions. In upholding the First Amendment privilege of Jehovah's Witnesses to refuse to join other school children in a daily salute to the United States flag, the Court pointedly refrained from specifying whether the privilege arose under the free exercise clause or the guarantee of freedom of speech: ". . . compelling the flag salute and pledge . . . invades the sphere of intellect and spirit which it is the purpose of the First Amendment to reserve from all official control." (See FLAG SALUTE CASES.) Test oaths, like particular beliefs, cannot be required for holding public office or receiving public grants. In upholding the conviction of a Mormon for POLYGAMY in REYNOLDS V. UNITED STATES (1879), despite his plea that the free exercise clause protected him in obeying his religious duty, the Supreme Court sought to erect this distinction between the realm of ideas and the world of material action into a constitutional principle: "Congress was deprived of all legislative power over mere opinion, but was left free to reach actions which were in violation of social duties or subversive of good order."

As the guarantees of the freedoms of speech and press and of free exercise of religion seek to bar hostile governmental intrusion from the realm of the spirit, so do modern interpretations of the establishment clause bar state sponsorship of, or material assistance to, religion. In the beginning religion and established churches were dominant forces in American life. Nearly all men and women were Christians; Protestants were predominant. In South Carolina the Constitution of 1778 declared the "Protestant religion to be the established religion of this State." Church and state were intertwined in Massachusetts. Where there was no official connection, both the laws and practices of government bore evidence of benevolent cooperation with the prevailing creeds. SUNDAY CLOSING LAWS were universal. Oaths were often required of state officials. Legislative sessions began with prayer. The crier in the United States Supreme Court still begins each session by invoking divine blessing. The coinage states, "In God We Trust." Church property was and remains exempt from taxation. As public education spread, prayers and Bible-reading became the first order of each school day.

These traditional links between church and state were challenged after incorporation of the First Amendment into the Fourteenth Amendment, not only by anticlerical secularists but also by religious minorities whose members were set apart by official involvement in religious practices and who were fearful that their isolation would hamper full assimilation into all aspects of American life and might stimulate INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION. The Supreme Court was then forced to choose among the competing strains of religious and political philosophy whose adherents had agreed only that the federal government, but not the States, should be barred from "an establishment of religion." The majority's inclination during the years 1945–1980 toward Jefferson's strongly secular, anticlerical view of the wall of separation between church and state led to two important lines of decision.

One line bars both state and federal governments from giving direct financial aid to sectarian primary and secondary schools even though the same or greater aid is given to the public schools maintained by government. The decisions leave somewhat greater latitude not only for aid to parents but also to include religious institutions in making grants for higher education. (See GOVERNMENT AID TO SECTARIAN INSTITUTIONS.)

The second important line of decisions required discontinuance of the widespread and traditional practice of starting each day in the public schools with some form of religious exercise, such as saying an ecumenical prayer or reading from the Bible. The latter decisions provoked such emotional controversy that in the 1980s, more than two decades after the decisions were rendered, fundamentalist groups were actively pressing for legislation abolishing the Supreme Court's JURISDICTION to enforce the establishment clause in cases involving school prayer, thus leaving interpretation of the clause to the vagaries of judges in individual states. (See RELIGION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.)

Even though the line between the realm of the spirit and the world of material conduct subject to government regulation is fundamental to the jurisprudence of the First Amendment, the simple line between belief and conduct drawn in the polygamy cases was too inflexible to survive as a complete constitutional formula. Religious duties too often conflict with the commands of civil authority. Conversely, the public has compelling interests in the world of conduct that sometimes cannot be secured without interference with the expression of ideas.

Two cases suggest the line limiting constitutional protection for religious disobedience to the commands of the state. In WISCONSIN V. YODER (1972) the Supreme Court held that the free exercise clause secured Amish parents the privilege of holding fourteen- and fifteen-year-old children out of high school contrary to a state compulsory attendance law but pursuant to their religious conviction that salvation requires simple life in a church community apart from the world and worldly influence. The Court's constitutional, judicial duty—the Court said—required balancing the importance of the interests served by the state law against the importance to believers of adherence to the religious practice in question. Striking such a balance, the Court held in Negre v. Larsen (1971) that a faithful Roman Catholic's belief that the "unjust" nature of the war in Vietnam required him to refuse to participate did not excuse his refusal to be inducted into the armed forces.

When belief is invoked to justify otherwise unlawful conduct, it may become significant that the First Amendment speaks of the free exercise of "religion," but not of other kinds of belief held with equal sincerity. In UNITED STATES V. SEEGER (1965) the Court skirted establishment clause questions by refusing to make any distinction between the teachings of religion and other moral convictions for the purposes of the Selective Service Act. That act exempted from military service CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS opposed to war in any form by reason of their "religious training and belief" and defined such belief as one "in relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation." A majority held that, despite the references to religion and a belief in a Supreme Being, the exemption extended "to any belief that occupies a place in the life of its possessor parallel to that filled by the orthodox belief in God of one who clearly qualifies for the exemption." In the Yoder case, on the other hand, the opinion of the Court by Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, calling upon the example of Henry D. Thoreau, stated that a "philosophical and personal" belief "does not rise to the demands of the Religion Clauses." Perhaps this declaration of orthodoxy puts an end to the question, but in an age of subjectivism it is likely to press for fuller debate and deliberation.

Where religious objectors seek exemption from laws of general application, both federal and state governments must walk a narrow line. On the one hand, the free execise clause may require exception. On the other hand, excepting religious groups from laws of general application may be an unconstitutional "establishment of religion." Here again the decisions call for ad hoc balancing of the individual and public interests affected by the particular legislative act.

The requirement of self-preservation exerts the strongest pressures upon government to violate the realm of the spirit by suppressing the publication of ideas and information. Here, as in other areas, judicial elaboration of the First Amendment has been increasingly favorable to freedom of expression.

The expansion of the freedom by interpretation began within a decade from ratification. WILLIAM BLACKSTONE had taught that the freedoms of speech and press were freedoms from PRIOR RESTRAINTS, such as licensing, and did not bar subsequent liability or punishment for unlawful words, including seditious libels. Dispute arose when Congress enacted a Sedition Act and the Federalist party then in office prosecuted the editors of journals supporting their political opponents, the Jeffersonian Republicans, for publishing false, scandalous, and malicious writings exciting the hatred of the people. (See ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS.) Thomas Jefferson and James Madison led the attack upon the constitutionality of the Sedition Act by drafting the VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS declaring that the act violated the First Amendment. The lower federal courts followed the orthodox teaching of Blackstone, upheld the act, and convicted the Republican editors. Jefferson pardoned them after his election to the presidency. Still later, Congress appropriated funds to repay their fines. Events thus gave the speech and press clauses an interpretation extending the guarantees beyond mere prohibition of previous restraints. The Supreme Court subsequently ratified the teaching of history.

The modern law defining freedom of expression began to develop shortly after WORLD WAR I when pacifists and socialists who made speeches and published pamphlets urging refusal to submit to conscription for the armed forces were prosecuted for such offenses as willfully obstructing the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States. In affirming the conviction in SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919), Justice Holmes coined the famous CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test: "The question in every case is whether the words used are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent." When Justice Holmes wrote these words, they gave little protection to propaganda held subversive by dominant opinion. Speaking or circulating a paper, the Justice held, is not protected by the First Amendment if the "tendency" of the words and the intent with which they are uttered are to produce an unlawful act. Later, after Justice Holmes's sensitivity to the dangers of prosecution for words alone had been increased by the prosecution of tiny groups of anarchists and communists for holding meetings and distributing political pamphlets in time of peace, criticizing the government, and preaching its overthrow by force and violence, he and Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS in a series of dissenting opinions tightened their definition of "clear and present danger" and laid the emotional and philosophical foundation for the next generation's expansion of the First Amendment guarantees. Justice Brandeis's eloquent opinion in WHITNEY V. CALIFORNIA (1927) is illustrative:

> Those who won our independence by revolution were not cowards. They did not fear political liberty. To courageous, self-reliant men, with confidence in the power of free and fearless reasoning applied through the processes of popular government, no danger flowing from speech can be deemed clear and present, unless the incidence of the evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion. If there be time to expose through discussion the falsehood and fallacies, to avert the evil by the processes of education, the remedy to be applied is more speech, not enforced silence. Only an emergency can justify repression. Such must be the rule if authority is to be reconciled with freedom. Such, in my opinion, is the command of the Constitution. It is, therefore, always open to Americans to challenge a law abridging free speech and assembly by showing that there was no emergency justifying it.
>
> Moreover, even imminent danger cannot justify resort to prohibition of these functions essential to effective democracy, unless the evil apprehended is relatively serious. . . . There must be the probability of serious injury to the state. Among freemen, the deterrents ordinarily to be applied to prevent crime are education and punishment for violations of the law, not abridgement of the rights of free speech and assembly.

In the 1920s a majority of the Justices consistently rejected the views expressed by Justices Holmes and Brandeis. GITLOW V. NEW YORK (1925) held that (1) a state, despite the First Amendment, may punish utterances inimical to the public welfare; (2) a legislative finding that a class of utterances is inimical to the public welfare will be accepted by the Court unless the finding is arbitrary or capricious; (3) the Court could not set aside as arbitrary or capricious a legislative finding that teaching the overthrow of the government by force or violence involves danger to the peace and security of the State because the spark of the utterance "may kindle a fire that, smoldering for a time, may burst into a sweeping and destructive conflagration"; and (4) the Court would not consider the kind or degree of evil threatened by a particular utterance if it fell within a class of utterances found by the legislature to be dangerous to the state.

Ironically, in the very years in which the Court was deferential to legislative restrictions upon radical political expression, the Court was going behind legislative judgment to invalidate minimum wage laws, the regulation of prices and other restrictions upon FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. Beginning in 1937, however, a philosophy of judicial self-restraint became dominant among the Justices. "We have returned to the original proposition that courts do not substitute their social and economic beliefs for the judgment of legislative bodies, who are elected to pass laws," the Court declared in FERGUSON V. SKRUPA (1963). (See JUDICIAL ACTIVISM AND JUDICIAL RESTRAINT.)

Such sweeping denigration of JUDICIAL REVIEW put civil libertarians in a dilemma. On the one hand, the need for consistency of institutional theory cautioned against activist judicial ventures even under the First Amendment. On the other hand, self-restraint would leave much CIVIL LIBERTY at the mercy of executive or legislative oppression. The only logical escape was to elevate civil liberties to a "preferred position" justifying standards of judicial review stricter than those used in judging economic regulations. The dissenting opinions by Justices Holmes and Brandeis seemed to point the way. Three rationales were offered:

(i) In a famous footnote in UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS COMPANY (1938), Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE suggested that legislation restricting the dissemination of information or interfering with political activity "may be subject to more exacting judicial scrutiny . . . than most other types of legislation" where the legislation "restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about the repeal of undesirable legislation." The rationale fails to justify STRICT SCRUTINY in cases involving religious liberty, freedom of expression in literature, entertainment, and the arts, and other nonpolitical, personal liberties.

(ii) "Personal liberties" deserve more stringent protection than "property rights." The rationale does not explain why holding property is not a preferred "personal" liberty.

(iii) Stricter review is appropriate in applying the First Amendment, and the First when incorporated into the Fourteenth, because the guarantees of the First Amendment are more specific than the general constitutional prohibitions against deprivation of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The difference in specificity is considerable, but its relevance is less obvious. Justice HUGO L. BLACK stood almost alone in the supposition that the language of the First Amendment could be read literally. (See ABSOLUTISM.) Perhaps the most that can be said is that the Bill of Rights marks particular spheres of human activity for which the Framers deemed it essential to provide judicially enforced protection against legislative and executive oppression. During the debate in Congress, James Madison observed: "If they [the Amendments] are incorporated into the Constitution, independent tribunals of justice will consider themselves in a peculiar manner the guardian of those rights; they will be an impenetrable bulwark against every assumption of power in the Legislative or Executive. . . ."

At bottom all the rationales assert that the ultimate protection for minorities, for spiritual liberty, and for freedom of expression, political activity, and other personal liberties comes rightfully from the judiciary. In this realm the political process, filled with arbitrary compromises and responsive, as in some degree it must be, to short-run pressures, is deemed inadequate to enforce the long-range enduring values that often bespeak a people's aspirations instead of merely reflecting their practices.

Propelled by this judicial philosophy, the Court greatly expanded the First Amendment guarantees of freedom of expression. The Court avowedly adopted the strict Holmes-Brandeis "clear and present danger" test for judging whether prosecution for a subversive utterance is justified by its proximity to activities the government has a right to prevent. The amendment bars restrictions upon the publication of information or ideas relating to public affairs because of harm which the government asserts will result from the impact of the message unless the government shows pressing necessity to avoid an immediate public disaster. The case of the Pentagon Papers (1971) illustrates the principle. (See NEW YORK TIMES V. UNITED STATES.) A consultant to the Department of Defense, cleared for access to classified information, gave copies of highly secret papers describing military operations and decision making to newspapers for publication. The Department of Justice upon instructions from the President asked the courts to enjoin publication, making strong representations that the risks of injury to national interests included "the death of the soldiers, the destruction of alliances, the greatly increased difficulty of negotiation with our enemies, the inability of our diplomats to negotiate . . . and the prolongation of the war." All the weight of these executive representations was insufficient to induce the Court to bar disclosure.

After 1940 the PREFERRED FREEDOMS theory coupled with the incorporation of the First Amendment into the Fourteenth led to Supreme Court review and invalidation or modification of many familiar state statutes and well-established COMMON LAW doctrines restricting or penalizing sundry forms of expression: libel and slander, contempt of court, obscenity, BREACH OF THE PEACE, and laws limiting access to the streets, parks, or other public places for the purposes of expression. A short reference to the law of contempt will illustrate the trend.

The interest in the impartial disposition of judicial business solely upon the evidence and arguments presented in court often conflicts with the interest in free discussion of public affairs. Newspaper editorials and like public pressures upon a judge may improperly influence or seem to influence the disposition of a pending judicial proceeding. In English and early American law such publications were enjoinable and punishable as contempt of court. Today the First Amendment is held to protect such expression. Similarly, the English law and some American decisions treated the pretrial publication of EVIDENCE as contempt of court where, as in a notorious criminal case, the publicity might reach actual or prospective jurors and serve to make it difficult to assure the accused a FAIR TRIAL and a jury verdict based solely upon the evidence presented in the court room. The Supreme Court has now set its face firmly against GAG ORDERS forbidding newspapers to print or broadcast or publicize confessions or other damaging evidence before their admissibility has been determined and they have been received in court.

The heavy emphasis that constitutional law puts upon the role of the First Amendment in the operation of representative government has led some commentators to ascribe special significance to the amendment's particular mention of "the freedom of the press" in addition to the more general guarantee of "the freedom of speech." In a crowded society, newspapers, radio, and television not only are the most effective vehicles for disseminating ideas and information but also have by far the best, if not the only, adequate resources for gathering information concerning the conduct of public affairs by the vast and omnipresent agencies of government. Starting from this premise, proponents of a "structural view" of the First Amendment argue that the special functions of the "fourth estate" entitle its members to special protection. Some of the claims to exemption from laws of general applicability have been patently excessive, such as the claims to exemption from antitrust laws, labor relations laws, and wage and hour regulation. With much greater force but scarcely greater success, the media have claimed that the First Amendment protects reporters in refusal to disclose their sources or give unpublished information to a court or GRAND JURY in compliance with the general testimonial obligation of all citizens. (See REPORTER'S PRIVILEGE.) On the other hand, the near-immunity from liability for libels upon public figures which the Court has granted to the press under the First Amendment has not yet been extended by that Court to other writers and publishers.

The words of the First Amendment move from religion to speech and press and then to the purely political rights of free assembly and petition for redress of grievances. Denials of the rights of assembly and petition have been infrequent. The express mention of a "right of the people peaceably to assemble" is also taken, however, to symbolize the much broader freedom of association that the amendment is held to secure.

The freedom of association thus far held to be protected by the First Amendment, while broad, is narrower than the freedom of individuals to associate themselves for all purposes in which they may be interested, the right debated by Thomas Hobbes and Jean-Jacques Rousseau, on one side, and, on the other side, by JOHN LOCKE. The enactment of labor relations acts securing employees the right to form, join, and assist labor unions made it unnecessary for workers to appeal to a constitutional right of freedom of association. Only the antitrust laws barring unreasonable restraints on competition impose substantial restrictions upon business combinations. In consequence, the decisional law treats association as a necessary and therefore protected incident of other First Amendment liberties: speech, political action, and religious purposes. Associations formed to provide legal services in litigation have been treated as "political" not only in the plausible instances of suits to establish civil liberties and CIVIL RIGHTS but also in the incongruous instances of actions for damages for personal injuries.

Legislative efforts to outlaw associations formed for religious or political purposes have been infrequent, except in the case of the Communist party. A decision in 1961 sustained the power of Congress to require the party to register and disclose its membership as a foreign-dominated organization dedicated to subversion of the government, but the sanctions directed at members, for example, denial of passports and employment in defense facilities, were held unconstitutional. Associations and their members have had more occasion to complain of coerced disclosure under disclosure laws and in LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATIONS. Prima facie the First Amendment protects privacy of association. Governmentally compelled disclosure must be justified by a showing of important public purpose. Where the unpopularity of the association makes it likely that disclosure will result in reprisals, an even stronger justification may be required. Similarly, a state must justify by a strong public purpose any interference with the conduct of a religious organization's or political party's internal affairs.

Any pressure for substantial new growth in First Amendment interpretation will probably come in three areas. First, the amendment was intended and has nearly always been construed as a prohibition against active government interference. Today government has a near-monopoly upon much information essential to informed self-government. Although FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACTS may at least partially satisfy the need, there is likely to be pressure to read into the First Amendment's explicit verbal barrier to abridgment affirmative governmental duties to provide access to official proceedings and even to supply otherwise inaccessible information in the government's possession.

Second, in the crowded modern world broadcasters, newspapers, and other media of mass communication dominate the dissemination of information and formation of public opinion. New technologies make prediction hazardous, but the concentration of control over the most influential media appears to be increasing. In this context the old assumption, that the widest dissemination of information and freest competition of ideas can be secured by forcing government to keep hands off, is open to doubt. Such questions as whether the First Amendment permits government regulation to secure fair access to the mass media and whether the amendment itself secures a right of access to media licensed by government may well multiply and intensify.

Third, the electoral influence of political advertising through the mass media, coupled with its high cost, gives great political power to the individuals and organizations that can raise and spend the largest sums of money in political campaigns. Even though decisions already rendered tend to accord political expenditures the same protection as speech, important future litigation over legislative power to limit the use and power of money in elections seems assured. (See CAMPAIGN FINANCING.)

The First Amendment secures the people of the United States greater freedom against governmental interference in the realms of the spirit, intellect, and political activity than exists in any other country. The future may bring shifts of boundary lines and emphasis. A threat to national survival could revive earlier restrictions. Generally speaking, however, the modern First Amendment appears to meet the nation's needs.

ARCHIBALD COX
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Children and the First Amendment.)

Bibliography

ABERNATHY, GLENN 1961 The Right of Assembly and Association. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.

CHAFEE, ZECHARIAH, JR. 1948 Free Speech in the United States. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

COX, ARCHIBALD 1981 Freedom of Speech in the Burger Court. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

EMERSON, THOMAS I. 1970 The System of Freedom of Expression. New York: Random House.

HOWE, MARK DEWOLFE 1965 The Garden and the Wilderness. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

KONVITZ, MILTON 1957 Fundamental Liberties of a Free People: Religion, Speech, Press, Assembly. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1963 Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History: Legacy of Suppression. New York: Harper & Row.

——— 1972 "No Establishment of Religion: The Original Understanding." Pages 169–224 in Judgments: Essays in American Constitutional History. Chicago: Quadrangle.

MEIKLEJOHN, ALEXANDER 1960 Political Freedom: The Constitutional Powers of the People. New York: Harper & Bros.

PFEFFER, LEO 1967 Church, State, and Freedom. Rev. ed. Boston: Beacon Press.

STOKES, ANSON PHELPS 1950 Church and State in the United States. 3 Vols. New York: Harper & Bros.

——— 1964 Church and State in the United States. Rev. ed., with Leo Pfeffer. New York: Harper & Row.

FIRST AMENDMENT
(Update 1)

Within the legal culture, the First Amendment is typically understood to protect from government abridgment a broad realm of what might be called "symbolic activity," including speech, religion, press, association, and assembly. Because these symbolic activities are intertwined with many other activities that the government is clearly empowered to regulate—for instance, education and economic relations—the courts have experienced considerable difficulty in distinguishing impermissible infringement on First Amendment freedoms from legitimate exercises of government authority. Much of Supreme Court doctrine in the First Amendment area is an attempt to develop and refine precisely this sort of distinction.

One dominant principle that has informed the Supreme Court's doctrinal development of this distinction is the principle of content neutrality. The principle of content neutrality suggests that government must be neutral as to the conceptual content of speech, religion, press, and symbolic activity in general. Hence, according to First Amendment doctrine, it is only in extreme circumstances and for the most important reasons that the Court will allow government to regulate symbolic activity because of its conceptual content. The converse of this judicial principle is that the Court will recognize a relatively broad governmental power to regulate symbolic activity because of its effects or its form. Putting these two principles side by side, the result is that content-based regulation is often found unconstitutional, whereas content-neutral regulation is often found to be constitutional. These two broad imperatives with their sharply divergent implications for case outcomes place great conceptual pressure on distinguishing the content-based from the content-neutral, or more specifically on distinguishing the conceptual or substantive content of symbolic activity from its form and effects.

Although there has been no shortage of attempts, both scholarly and judicial, to specify and refine the gist of this distinction, First Amendment doctrine remains relatively undeveloped and unstable in dealing with this recurrent tension. Indeed, the Supreme Court seems continually to shift the terrain for making the predicate determination of whether the government action is content-based or content-neutral. Often the Justices are divided on the question whether the critical content-neutrality determination should be made with respect to the express or apparent state interest, the underlying governmental intent or motivation, the statutory or regulatory description of the symbolic activity, the judicial description of the symbolic activities actually affected, or the judicial description of symbolic activities conceivably affected. Although the Supreme Court has fashioned numerous diverse and detailed doctrines to specify the appropriate grounds on which to make the content-neutrality determination, there is so much of this doctrine and it is so obviously overlapping that ample room remains for disagreement among the Justices, the advocates, and the commentators about how to characterize and hence decide particular First Amendment cases. The result is that in the 1980s the First Amendment—especially in the area of religion—has followed the FOURTH AMENDMENT in an entropic proliferation of fragmentary, ephemeral, and highly bureaucratized doctrine.

In consequence, it has become easy for Justices to find ample legal resources to disagree about whether some particular government action is content-neutral. The result is that a government action that is described as content-based by one group of Justices will often be characterized as effect-based or form-based by another group of Justices. Often the Justices will disagree about whether—and if so, to what extent—the conceptual content of a symbolic activity is divisible from its form or effects. In making determinations about whether some government action is content-neutral and in deciding to what extent the conceptual content of symbolic activity is distinguishable from its form, there is virtually no guiding Supreme Court doctrine. The result is that the importance of political ideology in the production of the legal conclusions of the Justices has become relatively transparent in the First Amendment area.

In Texas v. Johnson (1989), for instance, the Court overturned the conviction of a flag burner on the ground that the FLAG DESECRATION statute was aimed at suppressing speech on the basis of its content. Counsel for Texas had argued that the statute was aimed at preserving the flag as a symbol of nationhood and national unity. The majority concluded that this state interest was an instance of content-based suppression because it singled out for punishment those messages at odds with what Texas claimed to be the flag's meaning. For the majority, the state interest was intricately related to the content-based suppression of certain ideas. The dissent by Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST (joined by Justice BYRON R. WHITE and Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR), by contrast, viewed flag burning in less conceptual, less content-oriented terms. The dissent characterized flag burning as "a grunt and a roar"—not an essential part of the expression of ideas. Unlike the majority, these dissenters characterized the form and the content of the flag burner's protest as easily divisible. Indeed, the dissenters argued that the defendant could easily have chosen any number of vehicles other than flag burning to express his views. Accordingly, for the dissenters the Texas flag desecration statute merely removed one of these vehicles from the defendant's arsenal of available forms of expression.

This pattern of conflicting characterizations of state interests aimed at content, on the one hand, or form or effect, on the other, recurs frequently throughout the law of FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. For instance, in American Booksellers Assn., Inc. v. Hudnut (1986), Judge Frank Easterbrook of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, struck down the Indianapolis version of an antipornography civil rights ordinance originally drafted by Catharine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin. The ordinance defined PORNOGRAPHY as the graphic sexually explicit subordination of women and provided various civil rights remedies for injured parties. The proponents of the ordinance emphasized the subliminal socializing effects of pornography. They described pornography as harmful in its institutionalization of a subordinate role and identity for women. The proponents of the ordinance thus emphasized the material, constitutive, and hence instantaneous manner in which pornography visits its injurious effects on women. Judge Easterbrook, however, characterized the ordinance as based on content viewpoint, for the ordinance had the explicit aim and effect of condemning the view that women enjoy pain, humiliation, rape, or other forms of degradation. Judge Easterbrook noted that the harmful effects of poronography, like the effects of political views, depend upon—and are indeed indivisible from—the conceptual content of pornography.

In the related context of zoning restrictions on adult theaters, the Court, in CITY OF RENTON V. PLAYTIME THEATERS, INC. (1986), upheld a zoning ordinance that prohibited adult motion picture theaters from locating within 1,000 feet of a residential zone, church, park, or school—the effect being to exclude such theaters from approximately ninety-four percent of the land in the city. Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Rehnquist rejected the view that this ordinance was content-based and instead found that the "predominate intent" was to prevent undesirable secondary effects such as crime or decrease in property value. On the basis of this conception of predominant intent, the Chief Justice classified the zoning ordinance as one that did not offend the fundamental principle against content-based regulation. By contrast, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, dissenting with Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, argued that the ordinance's exclusive targeting of adult motion picture theaters—theaters that exhibit certain kinds of motion pictures—demonstrated the absence of content neutrality. For the dissent, the content-based character of the regulation was further evidenced by indications of the city council's hostility to adult motion pictures and by the failure of the ordinance to target other activities that could conceivably give rise to the undesirable secondary effects.

These divergences among the judges and commentators are readily understandable, given that as yet no coherent basis has been provided to distinguish content-neutral from content-based regulation or to specify the extent to which content is divisible from form or effect in the various kinds of symbolic activities. The absence of a coherent basis for such a distinction permits political preferences concerning the speech at issue and the importance of governmental interests at stake to play a role, though not necessarily a determinative role, in the decisions of the courts.

The same kind of politicization, the same problem of distinguishing content-neutral from content-based regulation, and the same tendency to produce more complex context-specific doctrine has been evident in the Supreme Court's treatment of religion cases. In COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY V. ACLU (1989), for instance, the Court fragmented over the constitutionality of two religious displays on public property during the Christmas-Hanukkah season. One display was of a crèche; the other display exhibited a Christmas tree and a menorah. On the basis of some exceedingly fine distinctions, the various opinions established that the menorah exhibition was constitutional while the crèche was not.

The importance of the distinction between content, on the one hand, and form and effect, on the other, was especially evident in the judicial disagreement over the constitutionality of the crèche display. Writing at times for the Court, for a plurality, and for himself, Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN concluded that the display of a crèche on public property during the Christmas season violated the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE because it endorsed a patently Christian message. Focusing on the message conveyed by the display, Justice Blackmun noted that the crèche was accompanied by the words "Glory to God in the Highest" and that unlike the crèche in the case of LYNCH V. DONNELLY (1984), there was nothing in the context of the display to detract from the crèche's religious message. Accordingly, Justice Blackmun concluded that the government was endorsing a religious message in violation of the establishment clause. One group of dissenting and concurring justices, Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, Justice White, and Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, rejected Justice Blackmun's establishment clause requirement of no government endorsement of religion. Turning away from an inquiry into the meaning of the government display of a crèche, this group of Justices focused attention on the effects of the crèche: they noted that there was no evidence of coerced participation in religion or religious ceremonies or of significant expenditures of tax money. On the whole then, the judicial disagreement here also organized itself around the determination of whether it is the conceptual meaning of the government action that matters or its forms and effect.

In the area of freedom of the press, the distinction between content-based and content-neutral regulation also plays an important role. In Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland (1987) the Court found unconstitutional a state law that imposed taxes on general-interest magazines but exempted newspapers and religious, professional, trade, and sports journals. The Court found this selective taxation scheme particularly disturbing because the different treatment accorded to the various magazines depended upon their content. The dissent of Justice Scalia and Chief Justice Rehnquist, by contrast, focused on the form and the effects of the tax scheme. Noting that the tax scheme merely withheld an exemption from the disfavored magazines, the dissent refused to equate the denial of an exemption to regulation or penalty on the disfavored magazines. The dissent noted that unlike direct regulation or prohibition, the denial of a subsidy was unlikely to be coercive. Focusing next on the effects of the tax scheme, the dissent noted that the tax was so small that it would be unlikely to inhibit the disfavored magazines. The dissent closed by hinting that given the indivisibility of form from subject matter in written material, it would not be possible to insist on a principled—that is, neutral—basis to distinguish permissible from impermissible subsidization.

It would be an overstatement to say that all of First Amendment doctrine turns upon the distinction between content-based regulation, on the one hand, and form-based or effect-based regulation, on the other. But the distinction does play an important role in the jurisprudence of the First Amendment. And yet, despite the important role played by this distinction, the Court has failed thus far to provide any coherent interpretation of the distinction. Indeed, at times, individual Justices deny the very possibility of making such a distinction—as in the selective yet oft-repeated claim that in a given symbolic context, form and effect are indeed inseparable from content.

PIERRE SCHLAG
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Extremist Speech; Freedom of Assembly and Association; Freedom of Petition; Religious Liberty; Separation of Church and State.)

Bibliography

BOLLINGER, LEE 1986 The Tolerant Society. New York: Oxford University Press.

GREENAWALT, KENT 1988 Religious Convictions and Political Choice. New York: Oxford University Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1985 Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press.

——— 1986 The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. New York: Macmillan.

SHRIFFRIN, STEVEN 1990 The First Amendment, Democracy, and Romance. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1988 American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. Pages 785–1061, 1154–1301. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

FIRST AMENDMENT
(Update 2)

As a general matter, the Supreme Court has held that laws directly restricting the freedom of individuals to express particular messages because those messages might have harmful or undesirable effects are presumptively—perhaps conclusively—unconstitutional. Indeed, the Court has not upheld a direct restriction on speech because it might persuade readers or listeners to engage in criminal activity since DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951); it has not upheld a direct restriction on speech because the ideas expressed might provoke a HOSTILE AUDIENCE response since FEINER V. NEW YORK (1951); and it has never upheld a direct restriction on the publication of truthful information because its disclosure would interfere with public or private interests in keeping the information confidential.

This powerful presumption against content-based restrictions on the FREEDOM OF SPEECH derives from the Court's judgment that such laws are particularly likely to distort public debate, to be enacted for constitutionally "improper" reasons (such as hostility to or disagreement with the particular views suppressed), and to be defended in terms of considerations that are thought to be inconsistent with the basic premises of the First Amendment (such as paternalism and intolerance). The paradigm of such a content-based restriction—"no person may criticize the war"—clearly illustrates each of these concerns.

Despite its strong presumption against content-based restrictions, the Court has upheld such restrictions in the special context of LOW-VALUE SPEECH. The low-value concept had its genesis in CHAPLINSKY V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1942), where the Court stated in dictum:

> There are certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem. . . . It has been well observed that such utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.

Although some commentators have criticized the low-value concept as incompatible with First Amendment theory, the DOCTRINE is essential to a well-functioning system of free expression. Without such a safety valve, one of two unacceptable results would follow: Either the burden of justification imposed on regulations of high-value speech, such as pure political expression, would be diluted, or the very demanding standards applied to regulations of high-value speech would have to be applied to low-value speech, with the result that government would not be able to regulate speech that should appropriately be regulated.

But even if the concept of low-value speech is legitimate, two questions remain: What categories of speech are "of such slight social value as a step to truth" that they may appropriately be regulated, and what are the circumstances in which such regulation is permissible? To answer these questions, the Court has employed two devices. First, the Court strongly presumes that all speech is of high value, and is thus entitled to the full protection of the First Amendment, unless the Court is persuaded that the particular category of speech at issue should fairly be found to be of only low First Amendment value. Second, if the Court concludes that a particular category of speech is of only low value, it then employs a form of categorical balancing to define the specific circumstances in which speech falling within the category may be regulated.

Examples of categories of expression the Court has held to be of low First Amendment value are OBSCENITY, FIGHTING WORDS, COMMERCIAL SPEECH, INCITEMENT TO UNLAWFUL CONDUCT, false statements of fact, and threats. Although the Court has insisted that, under the First Amendment, there is no such thing as a false idea, it has recognized that false statements of fact do not affirmatively contribute to public discourse. It has therefore held that actions for LIBEL do not implicate First Amendment values to the same extent as other restrictions on speech. Such actions are thus constitutionally permissible so long as the effort to establish liability for false statements of fact does not have an inadvertent CHILLING EFFECT on free speech more generally. In NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964), for example, the Court held that civil actions for libel brought by public officials are consistent with the First Amendment, but only if the plaintiff can prove that the publisher acted with knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth.

Similarly, in the incitement context the Court has held that express advocacy of law violation does not affirmatively contribute to public debate because such advocacy is inconsistent with the basic assumption of the First Amendment—that political change should be brought about through the democratic process rather than through force or violence. On the other hand, to avoid the potential that prosecutions for such advocacy could chill valuable expression, as occurred during the Communist era, the Court held in BRANDENBURG V. OHIO (1969) that even express advocacy of law violation cannot be punished unless it is "directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action."

In the fighting words context, the Court has concluded that such expression, which consists of the use of personal epithets directed at a particular individual, can be restricted as low-value speech because it is more akin to a punch in the nose than an effort to communicate ideas. But to avoid the possibility that the doctrine might be used to suppress more valuable expression, the Court has sharply limited the fighting words concept to the use of insulting and provocative epithets that describe a particular individual and are addressed specifically to that individual in a face-to-face encounter. Even the most offensive insults will not fall within the doctrine if they are delivered in a public speech or in a publication, or if they describe a group rather than a particular individual.

In recent years, the Court has resisted efforts to add three additional categories to the list of low-value speech—HATE SPEECH, PORNOGRAPHY, and indecent speech. Hate speech has been defined in many ways. Perhaps the most useful definition characterizes as hate speech any persecutorial, hateful, and degrading expression that conveys a message of group inferiority about a historically oppressed group. The argument for treating such speech as low value is that it presents an idea so historically untenable and so tied to the perpetuation of violence and discrimination that it is properly treated as outside the realm of protected discourse. The objection to this argument is that, unlike the established categories of low-value expression, laws against hate speech proscribe the advocacy of particular ideas because those ideas are offensive or dangerous. In R.A.V. V. CITY OF ST. PAUL (1992), the Court accepted this objection and invalidated an ordinance that prohibited the use of fighting words only if they are based on race, color, creed, religion, or gender. Although a restriction on all fighting words would be permissible, the Court held that this "narrower" restriction was an impermissible content-based discrimination against "those speakers who express views on disfavored subjects." As the Court observed, a racist could be punished for using racist fighting words under the ordinance, but a civil rights advocate could not be punished for using fighting words in response. The Court rejected the argument that this distinction could be sustained as an effort "to ensure the basic human rights of members of groups that have historically been subjected to discrimination."

The Court has long held that obscenity is of only low First Amendment value because such expression appeals primarily to the prurient interest in sex, depicts sex in a patently offensive manner, and lacks serious political, artistic, or scientific value. More recently, efforts have been made similarly to regulate pornography, which is defined as sexually explicit but nonobscene expression that graphically depicts women dehumanized as sexual objects or as sexual objects who enjoy pain, humiliation, or rape. The argument here is that whereas obscenity is concerned with morality and puritanism, pornography is concerned with oppression, discrimination, and violence. Although the categories of obscenity and pornography seem superficially similar, they are different in several important respects. Most importantly, obscenity, unlike pornography, cannot have any serious political, artistic, or scientific value; and pornography, unlike obscenity, expressly restricts a particular point of view—sexually explicit speech that portrays women as subordinate is forbidden, sexually explicit speech that portrays women as equal is permitted. For these reasons, in cases like American Booksellers Association v. Hudnut (1985), courts have generally rejected the argument that pornography can be characterized as low-value speech.

Finally, efforts have been made to restrict indecent speech, defined in various ways, but generally referring to expression that depicts sexual or excretory activities or organs in a patently offensive manner. Because this category reaches beyond obscenity, and is not limited to expression that appeals primarily to the prurient interest and lacks serious political, artistic, and scientific value, the Court has rejected the argument that indecent speech is of only low First Amendment value. In Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997), for example, the Court held that a prohibition on indecent speech over the INTERNET violates the First Amendment. On the other hand, the Court has occasionally upheld more modest regulations of indecent expression. Thus, in FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION V. PACIFICA FOUNDATION (1978), the Court upheld an FCC regulation that "channeled" the BROADCASTING of indecent profanity to hours in which minors are unlikely to be in the audience; in CITY OF RENTON V. PLAYTIME THEATRES (1986), the Court upheld a municipal ZONING regulation that excluded "adult" theaters from residential neighborhoods; and in National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley (1998), the Court upheld a federal statute that directed the NEA, in establishing procedures to judge the artistic merit of grant applications, to take into consideration "general standards of decency." In each of these cases, the Court rejected the notion that indecent speech is of low First Amendment value, but nonetheless strained to find a way to uphold the challenged regulation.

Although the precise contours of the low-value doctrine are subject to continuing exploration and debate, the doctrine plays a salutary role in First Amendment jurisprudence. Without it, the Court would have to test restrictions on political advocacy by the same standards it uses to test restrictions of obscenity and threats, or it would have to test restrictions of obscenity and threats by the same standards it uses to test restrictions on political advocacy. The low-value doctrine is better than either of those alternatives.

GEOFFREY R. STONE
(2000)

Bibliography

FRIED, CHARLES 1992 A New First Amendment Jurisprudence: A Threat to Liberty. University of Chicago Law Review 59:225–255.

MATSUDA, MARI 1989 Public Response to Racist Speech: Considering the Victim's Story. University of Michigan Law Review 87:2320–2359.

MACKINNON, CATHERINE 1985 Pornography, Civil Rights, and Speech. Harvard Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Law Review 20:1–54.

SUNSTEIN, CASS 1993 Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FIRST CONGRESS

One year after the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 adjourned, the Confederation Congress called the first federal elections. An overwhelming majority of Federalists were elected to this First Congress, which was expected to function as a quasi-constitutional convention. The tasks facing the new Congress were formidable because, according to Congressman JAMES MADISON, the legislators would be traveling "in a wilderness without a single footstep to guide" them. If Congress acted wisely, however, Madison felt that its "successors [would] have an easier task."

Not surprisingly, experienced men were selected to serve in the new Congress. Eleven of the first senators and nine congressmen had been delegates to the federal convention, and fourteen senators and twice as many congressmen had served in state ratifying conventions. GEORGE WASHINGTON told Lafayette that the new Congress "will not be inferior to any Assembly in the world."

The whole country anxiously anticipated the meeting of Congress at Federal Hall in New York City on March 4, 1789. However, much to the chagrin of Federalists, neither house had a quorum on the appointed day. Almost a month elapsed before the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES attained a quorum on April 1, followed five days later by the SENATE; at this time, a joint session of Congress performed its constitutionally assigned function of counting the presidential electoral votes. George Washington was declared President by a unanimous vote, while JOHN ADAMS, a distant second, was proclaimed vice president. Messengers were sent to Washington and Adams as Congress made plans for their reception and inauguration.

Early in April the House elected Frederick A. Muhlenberg of Pennsylvania speaker and John Beckley of Virginia clerk. The Senate elected JOHN LANGDON of New Hampshire president pro tempore and Samuel A. Otis of Massachusetts secretary. The House voted to hold open sessions except on sensitive matters such as Indian or military policy, whereas the Senate chose to keep its sessions closed. Two delegations came to the House under a cloud; opponents formally contested the elections of William Loughton Smith of South Carolina and the entire New Jersey delegation. Acting under Article I, section 5, of the Constitution, the House investigated the elections and declared that Smith and the New Jersey congressmen had been duly elected. The Senate, acting under Article I, section 3, drew lots to determine which senators would have initial terms of two, four, or six years that would give the Senate its distinctive staggered election every second year.

A week before Washington's inauguration, the Senate debated the titles to be given the President and vice president. Advocates of grandiose titles, such as "His Highness the President of the United States of America, and Protector of their Liberties," felt that the new republic needed such titles to command the respect of European nations. The House, however, disagreed, and the first conference committee settled the matter when the Senate agreed to the simple title of "Mr. President." The debate set the tone for the new government and symbolically marked a clear break with monarchy.

As expected, the House of Representatives initiated most legislation and the Senate became primarily a revisory body. The House proposed 143 bills to the Senate's 24. Except for the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, the Residency bill, and the act establishing the postmaster general, all major legislation originated in the House. Because neither house established a system of standing committees, each bill was submitted to an ad hoc committee that drafted legislation which was then considered by the committee of the whole.

The first bill enacted by Congress required all federal and state officials to take an oath to support the new Constitution. Within two years, Congress created the executive departments, provided for the federal judiciary, set the country's finances in order, proposed a federal BILL OF RIGHTS, approved a federal tariff, reenacted the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE, took over the states' lighthouses, and passed legislation for NATURALIZATION and COPYRIGHTS and PATENTS.

Early in Congress's first of three sessions, James Madison notified the House that he intended to introduce amendments to the Constitution. With little support from other congressmen who thought that the consideration of amendments was premature, Madison persevered; and on August 24, the House sent seventeen amendments in the form of a bill of rights to the Senate. The Senate combined some of Madison's amendments, tightened the language of others, and eliminated the amendments prohibiting the states from infringing on the freedoms of conscience, speech, and press and the right to jury trial. On September 25, 1789, Congress approved twelve of Madison's amendments, which were sent to the states for their legislatures to adopt.

Unquestionably, the most controversial issues during the First Congress centered on the secretary of the treasury's Report on Public Credit. In his report ALEXANDER HAMILTON proposed the funding of the federal debt, the federal assumption of the states' debts, the levying of an excise on distilled spirits, and the incorporation of a federal bank. No one denied the responsibility of the federal government to pay its own debt; however, some congressmen, led by Madison, opposed paying the debt at face value to speculators who had over the years accumulated a large percentage of the outstanding federal securities at greatly depreciated prices. Madison advocated paying speculators only a fraction of the face value of their holdings while providing partial compensation to the original holders. Madison also led the fight against other aspects of Hamilton's plan, arguing that the Constitution gave Congress no authority to take over the states' debts or to create a bank. To a great extent, the debate over these issues centered over a strict or broad interpretation of the Constitution. Did Congress only have delegated powers or, as Hamilton argued, did the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE allow Congress to exercise implied powers? President Washington agreed with Hamilton's broader interpretation and refused to veto the bank bill. Madison, in fact, had earlier compromised his strict interpretation of the Constitution by supporting the federal assumption of state debts in exchange for northern support for the movement of the federal capital from New York City, first to Philadelphia for ten years, and then permanently to a site on the banks of the Potomac River.

Precedents were also set by the First Congress in establishing the relationship between the Senate and the President. With some hesitation, the Senate welcomed President Washington to its chamber as he presented the Treaty of New York with the Creek Nation for ratification. The Senate felt uncomfortable with the executive waiting in its chamber for an immediate adoption of the treaty, and the President disliked the Senate's insistence on examining the treaty in greater detail. Washington vowed never again to present a treaty in person. Except in one case, the Senate confirmed Washington's appointments. A protracted debate occurred over the President's power to dismiss department heads without the Senate's approval. The controversy ended when John Adams broke a tie vote on a motion to strike wording from a foreign-relations bill giving the President the right of removal. By not specifying this right in terms of a congressional grant, Congress strengthened the presidency while restricting the Senate's executive power.

In two short years the new Congress had assuaged the fears of Anti-Federalists and stifled their attempts to call a second constitutional convention. Congress had breathed life into the new Constitution, set legislative precedents, created a structure of government, enacted the first phases of Hamilton's financial plan, and established working relationships between its two houses, between itself and the other two branches of the federal government, and between the federal government and the states. The actions of the First Congress, particularly its handling of the financial morass left by the Revolution, divided the new nation economically and ideologically and set the groundwork for the first nationwide political parties. John Trumbull wrote to Vice President Adams that "In no nation, by no Legislature, was ever so much done in so short a period for the establishing of Government, order public Credit & general tranquility." It was an auspicious beginning.

JOHN P. KAMINSKI
(1992)

Bibliography

BAKER, RICHARD ALLAN 1989 The Senate of the United States: "Supreme Executive Council of the Nation," 1787–1800. Prologue 21:299–313.

BICKFORD, CHARLENE BANGS and BOWLING, KENNETH R. 1989 Birth of the Nation: The First Federal Congress 1789–1791. Madison, Wis.: Madison House.

SILBEY, JOEL H. 1987 "Our Successors Will Have an Easier Task": The First Congress under the Constitution, 1789–1791. This Constitution 17:4–10.

SMOCK, RAYMOND W. 1989 The House of Representatives: First Branch of the New Government. Prologue 21:287–297.

FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, DECLARATIONS AND RESOLVES OF

(October 1, 1774)

The Coercive or Intolerable Acts, passed by Parliament in 1774, threatened colonial self-government. The Boston Port Act sought to starve Boston into paying a tax on tea and making reparations for the "Boston Tea Party." The Massachusetts Government Act altered the charter of the colony: it stripped the lower house of power to choose the upper house, which became the creature of the royal governor; it took from the town meetings the power to choose jurors and vested that power in sheriffs appointed by the governor; and it banned all town meetings not approved by the governor. The Administration of Justice Act allowed the governor to transfer to England trials involving the enforcement of revenue acts. The Quartering Act and the Quebec Act also contained provisions deemed reprehensible by many colonists.

To decide on measures for the recovery of American liberties, delegates from all colonies but Georgia assembled in Philadelphia. After defeating the plan of union proposed by JOSEPH GALLOWAY, the congress adopted a statement that defined the American constitutional position on the controversies with Parliament. Congress grasped a rudimentary principle of FEDERALISM, asserted various American rights, and condemned as "unconstitutional" the Coercive Acts and all the acts by which Parliament sought to raise a revenue in America. Rejecting Parliament's claim of unlimited power to legislate for America, the congress repudiated TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION and any parliamentary governance over "internal polity" but recognized Parliament's power to regulate "external commerce." Congress also grounded American rights, for the first time, in "the immutable laws of nature" as well as the British CONSTITUTION and COLONIAL CHARTERS. Among the rights claimed were free government by one's own representatives, TRIAL BY A JURY of the VICINAGE according to the COMMON LAW, FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY and petition (holding town meetings), freedom from standing armies in time of peace, and, generally, the rights to life, liberty, property, and all the liberties of English subjects. The document was a forerunner of the first state bills of rights.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BURNETT, EDMUND CODY 1941 The First Continental Congress. Pages 33–59. New York: Macmillan.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON v. BELLOTTI
435 U.S. 765 (1978)

Although the Supreme Court had extended FIRST AMENDMENT protections to newspapers that were organized as CORPORATIONS, this was the first case to hold explicitly that the FREEDOM OF SPEECH was not a "purely personal" right such as the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION and so might be claimed by corporations. In this case and in VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY V. VIRGINIA CITY CONSUMER COUNCIL (1976), the Justices adopted the position that where there is a willing speaker, he may be protected by the First Amendment not so much because of his own speech interest but because of the societal interest in maximizing the stock of information upon which the public may draw. Thus a banking corporation was held to have speech rights because limiting its speech would limit the electorate's access to vital information.

After defeat of a REFERENDUM authorizing a personal income tax, which was attributed by some to corporation-funded advertising, Massachusetts adopted a statute forbidding a corporation to spend money for the purpose of influencing the vote on referenda not directly affecting the corporation, including referenda on individual income taxation. In the face of this obvious attempt of protax legislators to muzzle their opponents, Justice LEWIS F. POWELL for the Court had little trouble concluding under a BALANCING TEST that the asserted state interests in preserving the integrity of the electoral process were not compelling and that the statute was not narrowly drawn to protect the interests of stockholders.

The dissent by Justices BYRON R. WHITE, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, and THURGOOD MARSHALL sounds the theme of a legitimate state interest in limiting the influence of money on elections raised in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976). Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST dissented alone on STATES' RIGHTS grounds.

With the recognition of corporate speech rights and the recognition of some First Amendment protection for COMMERCIAL SPEECH, the Court set the stage for a whole new area of freedom-of-speech jurisprudence, particularly in the light of the high levels of corporate institutional and issue advertising engendered by environmental, energy, and deregulation policies. Among the difficult problems are the rights of stockholders who oppose advertised corporate stances and the extent to which laws against false and misleading advertising constitutionally can be applied to advertisements that do more than offer a product for sale.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

FIRST WORLD WAR

See: World War I

FISHER, SYDNEY GEORGE

See: Commentators on the Constitution

FISKE, JOHN
(1842–1901)

A conservative Yankee educated at Harvard, where he later taught, John Fiske was a man of letters who published about a book a year, as many on science, philosophy, and religion as on history. He was essentially a great popularizer. His books were captivatingly written, bold in interpretation, and widely read. His most influential work as a historian was The Critical Period in American History, 1783–1789 (1888), which vividly depicted the weaknesses and deficiencies of the United States under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. For Fiske the Constitution was "a Fifth Symphony of statesmanship" that saved the nation from Balkanizing into petty states.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

FITZPATRICK v. BITZER
427 U.S. 445 (1976)

This case concerned Congress's power to modify states' ELEVENTH AMENDMENT immunity from suit in federal court. In the 1972 amendments to Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, Congress extended Title VII to forbid employment discrimination by state employers. In Fitzpatrick, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, the Court held that Congress, in exercising its FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT powers, and despite the Eleventh Amendment, could subject states to suit in federal courts for discriminatory behavior. Fitzpatrick was an important counterpoint to Employees v. Department of Public Health and Welfare (1973) and EDELMAN V. JORDAN (1974), cases that had held that other federal statutes were not meant to abrogate the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

FITZSIMONS, THOMAS
(1741–1811)

An Irish-born Roman Catholic and a successful merchant, Thomas FitzSimons signed the Constitution as a Pennsylvania delegate to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. He spoke infrequently and always in favor of a strong national government to foster and regulate commerce. He served in the first three Congresses under the Constitution, where he supported ALEXANDER HAMILTON'S policies.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

FIVE KNIGHTS' CASE

See: Petition of Right

FLAG BURNING

See: Flag Desecration

FLAG DESECRATION

The American flag, as a unique symbol embodying national pride and patriotism, evidences the unity and diversity which the country represents, and the varying ideals and hopes of its people. By the same token, the flag has frequently been used by those who wish to communicate opposition to—or even ridicule of—government policies.

Congress has enacted statutes that prescribe how the flag may be displayed and disposed of, and how and for what purposes it may be used. Many state laws prohibit flag "desecration" (casting "contempt" on a flag by "mutilating, defacing, defiling, burning or trampling upon" it) and "improper use" of flags (placing on a flag "any word, figure, mark, picture, design, drawing or advertisement").

In Halter v. Nebraska (1907) the Supreme Court upheld a state statute prohibiting flag desecration and use of the flag for advertising purposes. But that decision was rendered twenty years before the Court applied the FIRST AMENDMENT to the States, and it was not dispositive when protesters later challenged the constitutionality of flag desecration statutes.

In Smith v. Gorguen (1973), the Court reversed a conviction for wearing an American flag on the seat of the pants, ruling that the Massachusetts flag desecration statute was void for VAGUENESS. In Spence v. Washington (1974) the Court invalidated a Washington statute prohibiting the affixing of a symbol to the flag, holding that the display of a flag with a peace symbol superimposed on it was protected free expression. The Spence decision was consistent with other cases in which the Supreme Court recognized SYMBOLIC SPEECH as a form of activity protected by the First Amendment. On the other hand, the Court has upheld statutes forbidding flag burning, concluding as in Sutherland v. Illinois (1976) that they rested on a "valid governmental interest unrelated to expression—that is, the prevention of breaches of the peace and the preservation of public order."

NORMAN DORSEN
(1986)

FLAG DESECRATION
(Update)

The word "desecration" has religious overtones. It means defiling the sacred. Flag burning is the secular equivalent of the offense of BLASPHEMY, a verbal crime signifying an attack, by ridicule or rejection, against God, the Bible, Jesus Christ, Christianity, or religion itself. Flag burning is comparable to a verbal attack on the United States. Burning the nation's symbol signifies contempt and hatred by the flag burner of the things he or she believes the flag stands for, such as colonialism, imperialism, capitalism, exploitation, racism, or militarism. To the overwhelming majority of Americans, however, the flag embodies in a mystical and emotional way the loyalty and love they feel for the United States. With few exceptions we venerate the flag because it symbolizes both our unity and diversity; our commitment to freedom, equality, and justice; and perhaps above all, our constitutional system and its protection of individual rights.

Like blasphemy, therefore, flag burning tests the outermost limits of tolerance even in a free society. Burning the flag is a most offensive outrage that stretches to the breaking point the capacity of a nation to indulge dissidents. But that same form of desecration is not only an act of vandalism; it is symbolic expression that claims the protection of the free speech clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Therein lies the problem and the paradox: should the flag represent a nation whose people have a right to burn its revered symbol?

Imprisoning flag burners would not mean that book burning and thought control are next. We know how to distinguish vandalism from radical advocacy; we would not regard urinating on the Jefferson Memorial or spray painting graffiti on the Washington Monument as a form of constitutionally protected free speech. Special reasons exist for protecting the flag from the splenetic conduct of extremists. A society should be entitled to safeguard its most fundamental values, but dissenters have a right to express verbal opposition to everything we hold dear. Yet, nothing is solved by saying that it is better to live in a country where people are free to burn the flag if they wish, rather than in a country where they want to burn it but cannot. We know the difference between suppressing a particularly offensive mode of conduct and a particularly offensive message. The problem is, however, that the particular mode of conduct may be the vehicle for communicating that offensive message. To suppress the message by suppressing the conduct involves governmental abridgment of a First Amendment freedom. So the Supreme Court held in Texas v. Johnson in 1989.

In 1984 in Dallas, Gregory Johnson, a member of the Revolutionary Communist Youth Brigade, a Maoist society, publicly burned a stolen American flag to protest the renomination of RONALD REAGAN as the Republican candidate. While the flag burned, the protesters, including Maoists, chanted, "America, the red, white, and blue, we spit on you." That the flag burning communicated an unmistakable political message was contested by no one. The police arrested Johnson not for his message but for his manner of delivering it; he had violated a Texas statute that prohibited the desecration of a venerated object by acts that seriously offended onlookers.

State appellate courts reversed Johnson's conviction on ground that his conduct constituted constitutionally protected SYMBOLIC SPEECH. Given its context—the Republican convention; Reagan's foreign policy; the protestors' demonstrations, marches, speeches, and slogans—Johnson's burning the flag was clearly speech of the sort contemplated by the First Amendment. The Texas courts also rejected the state's contention that the conviction could be justified as a means of preventing breach of the public peace. In fact, the state admitted that no BREACH OF THE PEACE occurred as a result of the flag desecration. The Supreme Court, 5–4, affirmed the judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, spokesman for the majority, showed his political savvy by emphasizing that the courts of the Lone Star State, where red-blooded John Wayne patriotism flourishes, recognized "that the right to differ is the centerpiece of our First Amendment freedoms." Government cannot mandate a feeling of unity or "carve out a symbol of unity and prescribe a set of approved messages to be associated with that symbol." Brennan added that although the First Amendment literally forbids the abridgment of only "speech," the Court had labeled as speech a variety of conduct that communicated opinions, including the wearing of black arm bands to protest war, a sit-in by blacks to protest racial segregation, picketing, and the display of a red flag. Indeed the state conceded that Johnson's conduct was politically expressive. The question was whether that expression could be constitutionally proscribed, like the use of FIGHTING WORDS calculated to provoke a breach of peace. Apart from the fact that no breach occurred here, Brennan reminded, a prime function of free speech is to invite dispute. The "fighting words" doctrine had no relevance in this case because the message communicated by flag burning did not personally insult anyone in particular.

Whether the state could justify the conviction as a means of preserving the flag as a symbol of nationhood and national unity depended on the communicative impact of the mode of expression. Brennan insisted that the restriction on flag desecration was "content-based." Johnson's political expression, he declared, was restricted because of the content of the message that he conveyed. This point is important and unpersuasive. As Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST for the dissenters said, burning the flag was no essential part of the exposition of ideas, for Johnson was free to make any verbal denunciation of the flag that he wished. He led a march through the streets of Dallas, conducted a rally on the front steps of the city hall, shouted his slogans, and was not arrested for any of this. Only when he burned the flag was he arrested. Texas did not punish him because it or his hearers opposed his message, only because he conveyed it by burning the flag.

Brennan replied that by punishing flag burning the state prohibited expressive conduct. "If there is a bedrock principle underlying the First Amendment," he wrote, "it is that the Government may not prohibit the expression of an idea simply because society finds the idea itself offensive or disagreeable." By making an exception for the flag, Texas sought to immunize the ideas for which it stands. Whatever it stands for should not be insulated against protest. In the context of this case, the act of flag burning constituted a means of political protest. Compulsion is not a constitutionally accepted method of achieving national unity.

Brennan believed that the flag's deservedly cherished place as a symbol would be "strengthened, not weakened, by our holding today. Our decision is a reaffirmation of the principles of freedom and inclusiveness that the flag best reflects, and of the conviction that our toleration of criticism such as Johnson's is a sign and source of our strength." This was the Court's strongest point.

Texas v. Johnson provided Court watchers with the pleasure of seeing judicial objectivity at work, for the Court did not divide in a predictable way. The majority included Justices ANTONIN SCALIA and ANTHONY M. KENNEDY, Reagan-appointed conservatives, whereas the dissenters included Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, a liberal moderate. Stevens wrote his own dissent. He believed, oddly, that public desecration of the flag "will tarnish its value." He also thought that the Texas statute that the Court struck down did not compel any conduct or profession of respect for any idea or symbol. The case had nothing to do with disagreeable ideas, he said; it involved offensive conduct that diminishes the value of the national symbol. Texas prosecuted Johnson because of the method he used to express dissatisfaction with national policies. Prosecuting him no more violated the First Amendment than prosecuting someone for spray painting a message of protest on the Lincoln Memorial.

Rehnquist's dissent was suffused with emotional theatrics about the flag and patriotism. His point was that the flag was special, as two hundred years of history showed. Even if flag burning is expressive conduct, he reasoned, it is not an absolute. But he thought it not to be expressive conduct. Flag burning was no essential part of any exposition of ideas, he claimed, but rather was "the equivalent of an inarticulate grunt" meant to antagonize others. By the same reasoning, however, one might say that flag flying is also a grunt of patriotism. That does not alter the point that flag burning is malicious conduct—vandalism rather than speech.

Zealous politicians, eager to capitalize on their love for the flag and opposition to those who burned it, sought to gain political advantage from the Court's opinion. President GEORGE BUSH, a war hero, had helped spur a paroxysm of patriotism in 1988 by assaulting his opponent for having vetoed a bill that would have compelled teachers to lead their students in a Pledge of Allegiance every day. Bush, having made a photo opportunity of visiting a flag factory in 1988, made another after the decision in Texas v. Johnson, by holding a ceremony in the White House rose garden. Accepting a replica of the Iwo Jima Memorial, depicting the marines hoisting the flag on a bloody wartime site, Bush condemned flag burning as a danger to "the fabric of our country" and demanded a constitutional amendment outlawing desecration of the flag.

Cynical observers shouted "cheap politics" and criticized the President and his supporters for trying to cover up problems concerning the savings and loan scandals, the deterioration of the nation's schools, the ballooning national debt, the urban underclass, and the army of homeless beggars in American cities. Bush's opponents declared that he sought to desecrate the Constitution by indulging in escapist politics and seeking the first revision of the BILL OF RIGHTS in two centuries. Many conservatives in Congress agreed that tampering with the Bill of Rights was not the way to treat the problem of flag burning. Democrats, who felt obligated to "do something" at the risk of being branded unpatriotic, offered the Flag Protection Act of 1989, and so headed off the amendment movement. The new act of Congress provided that whoever knowingly mutilates, defaces, physically defiles, or burns the flag shall be fined or imprisoned for a year, or both.

Members of the "lunatic left" promptly defied the act of Congress by burning the flag on the Capitol steps for the benefit of the TV cameras. Shawn Eichman and company got the publicity they wanted and were arrested. They quickly filed motions to dismiss, on grounds that the act of Congress was unconstitutional; that is, the flag they burned symbolized their freedom to burn it. The government asked the Supreme Court to reconsider its holding in Texas v. Johnson by holding that flag burning is a mode of expression, like fighting words, that does not enjoy complete protection of the First Amendment.

The Court, by the same 5–4 split, refused to alter its opinion. Brennan, again the majority spokesman, acknowledged that the government may create national symbols and encourage their respectful treatment, but concluded that it went too far with the Flag Protection Act "by criminally proscribing expressive conduct because of its likely communicative impact." Desecrating the flag was deeply offensive to many people, like virulent racial and religious epithets, vulgar repudiations of conscription, and scurrilous caricatures, all of which came within the First Amendment's protection, notwithstanding their offensiveness.

The government sought to distinguish the Flag Protection Act from the state statute involved in Johnson, on the theory that the act of Congress did not target expressive conduct on the basis of the content of its message. The government merely claimed its authority to protect the physical integrity of the flag as the symbol of our nation and its ideals. Brennan replied that destruction of the flag could in no way affect those ideals or the symbol itself. The invalidity of the statute derived from the fact that its criminal penalties applied to those whose treatment of the flag communicated a message. Thus, United States v. Eichman, resulting in the voiding of the act of Congress, was a replay of Johnson.

Stevens, for the dissenters, recapitulated his previous contentions. He believed that the majority opinion concluded at the point where analysis of the issue ought to begin. No one, he declared, disagreed with the proposition that the government cannot constitutionally punish offensive ideas. But, he argued, certain methods of expression, such as flag burning, might be proscribed if the purpose of the proscription did not relate to the suppression of ideas individuals sought to express, if that proscription did not interfere with the individual's freedom to express those ideas by other means, and if on balance the government's interest in the proscription outweighed the individual's choice of the means of expressing themselves. Stevens expatiated on the flag as a symbol and insisted that the government should protect its symbolic value without regard to the specific content of the flag burner's speech. Moreover, Eichman and the other dissidents were completely free to express their ideas by means other than flag burning. Stevens apparently missed the point that Eich-man had a right to choose his own means of communicating his political protest. What disturbed Stevens most was the belief that flag burners actually have damaged the symbolic value of the flag. And he added the following in a veiled allusion to the shenanigans of would-be amenders of the Constitution: "Moreover, the integrity of the symbol has been compromised by those leaders who seem to advocate compulsory worship of the flag even by individuals whom it offends, or who seem to manipulate the symbol of national purpose into a pretext for partisan disputes about meaner ends."

