In December 1945, the defendant went to the United States consul at Yokohama and applied for registration as an American citizen. He stated under oath that he was a United States citizen and had not done various acts amounting to expatriation. He was issued a passport and returned to the United States in 1946. Shortly thereafter, he was recognized by a former American prisoner of war, whereupon he was arrested, tried, and convicted of treason.

In his appeal to the Court of Appeals, the defendant argued that he had renounced or abandoned his United States citizenship and was expatriated. The defendant contended that he had expatriated himself by his acts and conduct beginning in 1943, with the entry of his name in the Koseki. Prior to that time, he had been registered by the police as an alien. However, after that time, he was considered by Japanese authorities as a Japanese. He had his name removed as an alien; he changed his registration at the University from American to Japanese and his address from California to Japan; he used the Koseki entry to get a job at the Oeyama camp; he went to China on a Japanese passport; he accepted labor draft papers from the Japanese government; and he faced the east each morning and paid his respects to the Emperor. The Court of Appeals rejected the expatriation evidence and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas held that the evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the jury that the defendant had not renounced or lost his American citizenship at the time of the overt acts of treason. It was said that in view of the defendant's dual nationality, it could not be said as a matter of law that his action in registering in the Koseki and changing his registration from American to Japanese amounted to a renunciation of American citizenship within the meaning of the Nationality Act. Justice Douglas wrote that in view of the conflict between the defendant's statements at his trial, he felt no loyalty to the United States from March 1943 to late 1945. Additionally, due to his actions after Japan's defeat (when he applied for registration as an American citizen and for an American passport), the question whether he had renounced his American citizenship was peculiarly for the jury to determine.

The opinion reasoned that notwithstanding his dual nationality and his residence in Japan, the defendant owed allegiance to the United States and could be punished for treasonable acts voluntarily committed. Justice Douglas noted that the definition of treason contained in the Constitution provided no territorial limitation; therefore, an American citizen living beyond the territorial limits of the United States could be guilty of treason against the United States. It was said that an American citizen owes allegiance to the United States wherever he or she may reside.

In turning to the substantive elements of the crime, the opinion found that each of the overt acts of which the defendant was convicted was properly proven by two witnesses. Both witnesses established that the defendant gave aid and comfort to the enemy. The overt act of abusing American prisoners for the purpose of getting more work out of them in producing war materials for the enemy qualified as an overt act within the constitutional standard of treason, since it gave aid and comfort to the enemy. The opinion found that the other overt act, cruelty to American prisoners of war, gave aid and comfort to the enemy by helping to make all the prisoners fearful, docile, and subservient; reducing the number of guards needed; and requiring less watching — all of which encouraged the enemy and advanced the enemy's interests. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Vinson, in Which Black and Burton, JJ., Joined: The chief justice dissented from the Court's opinion. He believed that, beginning in March 1943, the defendant, "[a]s a matter of law, ... expatriated himself as well as that can be done." The chief justice argued that the defendant's "statements that he was still a citizen of the United States — made in order to obtain a United States passport after Japan had lost the War — cannot restore citizenship renounced during the War." See also Treason

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied due process of law because eight members of the grand jury that indicted him may not have been citizens.

Case Holding: The issue raised by the defendant may not be brought on a habeas petition to the United States Supreme Court when the matter could have been properly brought in a direct appeal.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Morita Keizo, was indicted by the Territory of Hawaii for capital murder. Prior to trial, the defendant requested the indictment be dismissed because eight members of the grand jury that indicted him were not citizens of the United States or the Territory of Hawaii. It was subsequently determined that the eight grand jurors were citizens of Hawaii only by virtue of judgments of naturalization in a circuit court of the territory. The trial court therefore denied the request to dismiss the indictment. The defendant was thereafter tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. The Hawaii Supreme Court affirmed the judgment.

A few days before the defendant's scheduled execution, he filed a petition for habeas corpus relief with the Hawaii Supreme Court, alleging once again that eight members of the grand jury were not citizens and that the judgment against him was therefore void. The appellate court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Moody: Justice Moody held that the defendant waived the merits of his argument by failing to appeal the initial ruling by the Hawaii Supreme Court affirming the judgment against him. The opinion reasoned as follows:

The principal question argued before us by counsel is, whether the eight members of the grand jury, whose qualifications were questioned, were naturalized by courts having the authority to naturalize aliens. But we find no occasion to decide or consider this question. If the [defendant] desired the judgment of this court upon it, he should have brought [an appeal] to the judgment of the supreme court of the territory which passed upon it in affirming the judgment of conviction in the trial court. He may not lie by, as he did in this case, until the time for the execution of the judgment comes near, and then seek to raise collaterally, by habeas corpus, questions not affecting the jurisdiction of the court which convicted him, which were open to him in the original case, and, if properly presented then, could ultimately have come to this court upon [appeal].... [N]o court may properly release a prisoner under conviction and sentence of another court, unless for want of jurisdiction of the cause or person, or for some other matter rendering its proceedings void. Where a court has jurisdiction, mere errors which have been committed in the course of the proceedings cannot be corrected upon a writ of habeas corpus, which may not, in this manner, usurp the functions of [an appeal]. These well-settled principles are decisive of the case before us. Disqualifications of grand jurors do not destroy the jurisdiction of the court in which an indictment is returned, if the court has jurisdiction of the cause and of the person, as the trial court had in this case. The indictment, though voidable, if the objection is seasonably taken, as it was in this case, is not void. The objection may be waived, if it is not made at all or delayed too long. This is but another form of saying that the indictment is a sufficient foundation for the jurisdiction of the court in which it is returned, if jurisdiction otherwise exists. That court has the authority to decide all questions concerning the constitution, organization, and qualification of the grand jury, and, if there are errors in dealing with these questions, like all other errors of law committed in the course of the proceedings, they can only be corrected by [appeal].

The judgment of the Hawaii Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Procedural Default of Constitutional Claims Issue Presented: Whether the defendant had a constitutional right to serve out a prior imprisonment sentence before he could be executed for another crime.

Case Holding: The defendant did not have a constitutional right to serve out a prior imprisonment sentence before he could be executed for another crime.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ellsworth Kelley, was indicted for capital murder by the State of Oregon. At the time of the crime, the defendant was an inmate at a State penitentiary serving a twenty-year sentence. The killing occurred during the defendant's attempt to escape from prison. The defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. The Oregon Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's claim that he could not be executed until after he served his previous imprisonment sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Taft: The chief justice held that the defendant did not have a constitutional right to serve out the remainder of his prison sentence before he could be executed. The opinion ruled stated the Court's reasoning succinctly as follows: "A prisoner may certainly be tried, convicted, and sentenced for another crime, committed either prior to or during his imprisonment, and may suffer capital punishment and be executed during the term. The penitentiary is no sanctuary, and life in it does not confer immunity from capital punishment provided by law. He has no vested constitutional right to serve out his unexpired sentence." The judgment of the Oregon Supreme Court was affirmed.

Issue Presented: Whether the prosecutor's evidence showing the defendant took part in an attempt to escape from jail required the penalty phase jury to be informed that he was not eligible for parole.

Case Holding: The prosecutor's evidence showing the defendant took part in an attempt to escape from jail required the penalty phase jury to be informed that he was not eligible for parole.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William Kelly, was charged by the State of South Carolina with the 1996 murder of Shirley Shealy. A jury found Kelly guilty of capital murder. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor put on evidence showing that while Kelly was in jail he took part in an escape attempt. Kelly requested the trial court inform the penalty phase jury that he would not be eligible for parole, if sentenced to prison. The prosecutor objected on the grounds that he did not put on evidence for the jury to find a future dangerousness aggravating circumstance. The trial judge refused to give Kelly's requested instruction. The jury sentenced Kelly to death. The South Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected Kelly's argument that he was entitled to have the penalty phase jury informed that he was not eligible for parole. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Souter: Justice Souter found that, even though the prosecutor was not seeking to establish a future dangerousness aggravating circumstance, Kelly was still entitled to have the jury informed that he was not eligible for parole. The opinion found that the penalty phase jury could only interpret the evidence of Kelly's conduct while in jail, as proof that he would be dangerous in the future. Under such circumstances, the opinion held that it was necessary to instruct the penalty phase jury that if they sentenced Kelly to prison he would not be eligible for parole. The judgment was reversed and the case remanded for a new sentencing hearing.

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, in Which Kennedy, J., Joined: The chief justice dissented from the Court's judgment. He took the position that the prosecutor did not suggest that Kelly would be a danger in the future if sentenced to prison.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas, in Which Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Thomas dissented from the Court's judgment. He argued that the Constitution does not require a parole-ineligibility instruction, regardless of what evidence a prosecutor provides for the jury. See also Parole Ineligibility Jury Instruction

Kemmler, William see Electrocution; In Re Kemmler

Kennedy, Anthony M. Anthony M. Kennedy was appointed as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1988. While on the Supreme Court, Kennedy has been known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Kennedy was born on July 28, 1936, in Sacramento, California. He received an undergraduate degree from Stanford University in 1958 and a law degree from Harvard University Law School in 1961. Kennedy's legal career included a private practice, teaching at McGeorge School of Law, and thirteen years as an appellate judge on the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. In 1988, President Ronald Reagan appointed Kennedy to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Kennedy has written a number of capital punishment opinions. His writings in this area of the law have shown a consistent conservative philosophy that favors the government over capital defendants. For example, in Tuilaepa v. California, two defendants challenged a penalty phase statutory factor as vague and misleading. Kennedy, writing for the Supreme Court, sidestepped legal analysis of the merits of the issue and held that constitutional vagueness review was deferential and therefore a factor is not unconstitutional if it has some commonsense core meaning that criminal juries should be capable of understanding. The problem legal analysts have found with Tuilaepa's reasoning is that the decision turned a blind eye to the real issue presented by the defendants, i.e., in addition to a possible commonsense understanding, the statutory factor left ajar the door for a jury to reach an irrational conclusion.

Kentucky The State of Kentucky is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on January 1, 1975.

Kentucky has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Kentucky Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Kentucky Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and thirteen judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of Kentucky are tried in the circuit courts.

Kentucky's capital punishment offenses are set out under Ky. Code § 507.020. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

- a. With intent to cause the death of another person, he causes the death of such person or of a third person; or
- b. Including, but not limited to, the operation of a motor vehicle under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life, he wantonly engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of death to another person and thereby causes the death of another person.

In addition, under Ky. Code § 509.040(2), kidnapping is a capital offense when the victim is not released alive or when the victim is released alive but subsequently dies as a result of (a) serious physical injuries suffered during the kidnapping; (b) not being released in a safe place; or (c) being released in any circumstances which are intended, known, or should have been known to cause or lead to the victim's death.

Capital murder in Kentucky is punishable by death, life imprisonment without parole, or imprisonment for a term of years. A capital prosecution in Kentucky is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment without parole or a term of years. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Kentucky.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Ky. Code § 532.025(2)(a) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The offense of murder or kidnapping was committed by a person with a prior record of conviction for a capital offense, or the offense of murder was committed by a person who has a substantial history of serious assaultive criminal convictions;

2. The offense of murder or kidnapping was committed while the offender was engaged in the commission of arson in the first degree, robbery in the first degree, burglary in the first degree, rape in the first degree, or sodomy in the first degree;

3. The offender by his act of murder, armed robbery, or kidnapping knowingly created a great risk of death to more than one person in a public place by means of a weapon of mass destruction, weapon, or other device which would normally be hazardous to the lives of more than one person;

4. The offender committed the offense of murder for himself or another, for the purpose of receiving money or any other thing of monetary value, or for other profit;

5. The offense of murder was committed by a person who was a prisoner and the victim was a prison employee engaged at the time of the act in the performance of his duties;

6. The offender's act or acts of killing were intentional and resulted in multiple deaths;

7. The offender's act of killing was intentional and the victim was a state or local public official or police officer, sheriff, or deputy sheriff engaged at the time of the act in the lawful performance of his duties; and

8. The offender murdered the victim when an emergency protective order or a domestic violence order was in effect, or when any other order designed to protect the victim from the offender, such as an order issued as a condition of a bond, conditional release, probation, parole, or pretrial diversion, was in effect.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Kentucky has provided by Ky. Code § 532.025(2)(b) the following statutory mitigating circumstances to permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity;

2. The capital offense was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance even though the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance is not sufficient to constitute a defense to the crime;

3. The victim was a participant in the defendant's criminal conduct or consented to the criminal act;

4. The capital offense was committed under circumstances which the defendant believed to provide a moral justification or extenuation for his conduct even though the circumstances which the defendant believed to provide a moral justification or extenuation for his conduct are not sufficient to constitute a defense to the crime;

5. The defendant was an accomplice in a capital offense committed by another person and his participation in the capital offense was relatively minor;

6. The defendant acted under duress or under the domination of another person even though the duress or the domination of another person is not sufficient to constitute a defense to the crime;

7. At the time of the capital offense, the capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct to the requirements of law was impaired as a result of mental illness or retardation or intoxication even though the impairment of the capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform the conduct to the requirements of law is insufficient to constitute a defense to the crime; and

8. The youth of the defendant at the time of the crime.

Under Kentucky's capital punishment statute, the Kentucky Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Kentucky uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. Defendants sentenced before March 31, 1998, have a choice of execution by lethal injection or electrocution. The State's death row facility for men is located in Eddyville, Kentucky, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Pee Wee Valley, Kentucky.

Pursuant to the laws of Kentucky, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor may commute a capital sentence to life imprisonment without parole.

Under the laws of Kentucky a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Ky. Code § 431.250:

The following persons, and no others, may attend an execution: the executioner and the warden of the institution and his deputy or deputies and guards; the sheriff of the county in which the condemned was convicted; the commissioner of the Department of Corrections and representatives of the Department of Corrections designated by him; the physician and chaplain of the institution; a clergyman and three other persons selected by the condemned; three members of the victim's family designated by the commissioner from among the victim's spouse, adult children, parents, siblings, and grandparents; and nine representatives of the news media as follows: one representative from the daily newspaper with the largest circulation in the county where the execution will be conducted, one representative from Associated Press Wire Service, one representative from Kentucky Network, Inc., three representatives for radio and television media within the state, and three representatives for newspapers within the state. Use of audiovisual equipment by the representatives is prohibited during the execution. The Department of Corrections shall issue administrative regulations which govern media representation during the execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Kentucky executed only two capital felons. A total of thirty-eight capital felons were on death row in Kentucky as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as eight black inmates, twenty-nine white inmates, and one Hispanic inmate. One death row inmate was female.

Kentucky Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty

The Kentucky Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty (KCADP) was founded in Kentucky in the late 1970s, shortly after the State reenacted a new death penalty statute. KCADP is a statewide nonprofit organization of over thirty religious and civic organizations. The mission of KCADP is the abolishment of the death penalty in Kentucky.

Through the leadership of its chairman, Rev. Patrick Delahanty, KCADP vigorously lobbied and obtained Kentucky leg-isolation in 1990 which abolished the imposition of the death penalty on mentally retarded capital felons. The KCADP was also instrumental in getting the State legislature to pass the 1998 Racial Justice Act. This legislation allows a capital felon to introduce at trial statistical evidence that shows racial bias in the imposition of the death penalty.

In 1998, KCADP launched its ABOLITION 2000 campaign. This project was a grassroots educational effort to make facts about executions known to all Kentuckians. The organization hopes that through the campaign, it will be able to mount enough pressure to force Kentucky legislators to repeal the State's death penalty statute.

Kenya Kenya recognizes capital punishment. Hanging is the method of execution used by Kenya to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is a mixture of English common law, Islamic law, and customary law. The nation's constitution was adopted on December 12, 1963.

The court system of Kenya consists of magistrate courts, high courts, and a court of appeals. Trials are open to the public. Judges preside alone over all cases. There is no jury system. Defendants enjoy a presumption of innocence, have the right to confront witnesses, have a right to present evidence, and have a right to retain counsel. Defendants have the right to appointed legal counsel in capital cases only. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Kidnapping The crime of kidnapping is a felony offense that is generally defined as the unlawful abduction of another person for ransom. Kidnapping, without more, cannot be used to inflict the death penalty. The Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits this as cruel and unusual punishment. However, the crime of kidnapping can play a role in a capital prosecution. If kidnapping occurs during the commission of a homicide, it may form the basis of a death-eligible offense and therefore trigger a capital prosecution. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Death-Eligible Offenses; Felony Murder Rule; Kidnapping Aggravator

Kidnapping Aggravator The crime of kidnapping committed during the course of a homicide is a statutory aggravating circumstance in a majority of capital punishment jurisdic-

Kintpuash, Jack In the fall of 1872, a group of Modoc Native Americans under the leadership of Jack Kintpuash left the Klamath Reservation in Oregon and moved into northeastern California. During their journey, they killed several people at Lost River. The Modocs were pursued by an Army unit and retreated into the lava beds region of northeastern California near Lake Tule.

The Modoc War became a national concern in April 1873 when Kintpuash killed General E. R. S. Canby, an army negotiator, during peace negotiations. Two months later, the Army was able to overtake the Modocs and force a surrender. Kintpuash was summarily tried for the killing of General Canby, found guilty, and sentenced to death. Kintpuash was executed October 3, 1873. See also Native Americans and Capital Punishment

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant was entitled to habeas relief due to the State's appellate court's refusal to hear his appeal. (2) Whether the defendant was entitled to habeas relief due to an alien taking part in his trial as a juror.

Case Holdings: (1) The defendant was not entitled to habeas relief due to the State's appellate court's refusal to hear his appeal because the Constitution does not require States provide appellate review of criminal judgments. (2) The defendant was not entitled to habeas relief due to an alien taking part in his trial as a juror because the issue was never presented to a State court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Henry Kohl, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of New Jersey. The defendant filed an appeal, but the New Jersey Supreme Court refused to hear the case. The defendant then filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court. In the habeas petition, the defendant argued he was unlawfully confined because the State's appellate court refused his appeal and because a foreign citizen was a member of the jury that convicted him. The federal court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that, under a prior decision of the Court, it was ruled that the Constitution does not require States provide appellate review of criminal cases. The opinion addressed the matter as follows:

In McKane v. Durston, 153 U.S. 684 (1894), we held that an appeal to a higher court from a judgment of conviction is not a matter of absolute right, independently of constitutional or statutory provisions allowing it, and that a state may accord it to a person convicted of crime upon such terms as it thinks proper.... [T]he refusal of the courts of New Jersey to grant [an appeal] to a person convicted of murder, or to stay the execution of a sentence, will not itself warrant a court of the United States in interfering in his behalf by writ of habeas corpus....

At all events, inasmuch as the right of review in an appellate court is purely a matter of state concern, we can neither anticipate nor overrule the action of the state courts in that regard, since a denial of the right altogether would constitute no violation of the constitution of the United States.

The chief justice turned to the defendant's argument that an alien sat on the jury that convicted him. The opinion noted that, under the laws of New Jersey, it was required that every juror be a citizen of the State. It was also noted that, at common law, an alien could not sit on a jury. The chief justice went on to point out that the defendant was not entitled to habeas relief because of a non-citizen participating in his trial as a juror. The opinion found that the issue was never presented to the trial court. The chief justice reasoned that the error in having an alien on the jury was waived by the defendant's failure to present in to a State court. The judgment of the federal court was affirmed.

Korea, North Capital punishment is recognized in North Korea. The nation uses the firing squad and hanging to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on German and Japanese law and communist legal theories. North Korea is a dictatorship under the absolute rule of the Korean Workers' Party. Kim Il Sung, as head of the party, ruled the nation until his death in 1994. His son, Kim Jong Il, was named general secretary of the party in October 1997. The nation revised its constitution in September 1998.

The judicial system is composed of people's courts, provincial courts, and a central court (highest court). Under North Korea's legal system, an independent judiciary and individual rights do not exist. In practice, the Public Security Ministry dispenses with trials in political cases and refers defendants to the Ministry of State Security for imposition of punishment. In non-political cases, lawyers are assigned to defendants. However, the role of the defendant's counsel is that of persuading the defendant to confess guilt. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Korea, South Capital punishment is permitted in South Korea. The nation uses hanging as the method of carrying out the death penalty. Its legal system is a mixture of European law and American law. The nation adopted its constitution on February 25, 1988. South Korea is a republic that has an executive branch, a unicameral legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

The judicial system of South Korea consists of trial courts, appeals courts, a supreme court, and a constitutional court. Trials are open to the public, but there is no trial by jury. Defendants enjoy the presumption of innocence, protection against self-incrimination, freedom from retroactive laws and double jeopardy, the right to a speedy trial, and the right of appeal. Death sentences are appealed automatically. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether application of a new State constitutional amendment to the defendant's case, which permitted prosecuting him for capital murder, violated the Ex Post Facto Clause of the federal Constitution.

Case Holding: Application of a new State constitutional amendment to the defendant's case, which permitted prosecuting him for capital murder, violated the Ex Post Facto Clause of the federal Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Kring, was charged with capital murder by the State of Missouri. The defendant entered a plea of guilty, however, to second-degree murder and was sentenced to twenty-five years' imprisonment. The defendant challenged the sentence in the State's appellate courts on the ground that he had an understanding with the prosecutor that, in pleading guilty to second-degree murder, he would be sentenced to not more than ten years' imprisonment. The Missouri Supreme Court reversed the judgment and remanded the case.

On remand, the defendant refused to withdraw his guilty plea and demanded to be sentenced to no more than ten years in prison. The trial court entered an order setting aside the guilty plea and ordering a general not-guilty plea be placed on the record. The defendant was tried by a jury, found guilty, and sentenced to death. On appeal, the defendant argued to the Missouri Supreme Court that, under the law which existed at the time the crime was committed, he could not be tried nor convicted of an offense greater than second-degree murder once he pled guilty to that offense. The appellate court agreed with the defendant, but ruled that a subsequent amendment to the State's constitution permitted him to be prosecuted for capital murder after withdrawal of his guilty plea to second-degree murder. The appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the Ex Post Facto Clause of the federal Constitution prohibited retroactive application of the change in the law. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Miller: Justice Miller ruled that application of the State constitutional amendment to the defendant's case violated the Ex Post Facto Clause. The opinion indicated that there were four distinct classes of laws embraced by the Ex Post Facto Clause: (1) every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal, and punishes such action; (2) every law that aggravates the crime or makes it greater than it was when committed; (3) every law that changes the punishment and inflicts a greater punishment than was annexed to the crime when committed; and (4) every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense in order to convict the offender.

The opinion further held that any law passed after the commission of an offense which in relation to that offense, or its consequences, alters the situation of a defendant to his or her disadvantage, is an ex post facto law. Justice Miller proclaimed that no one can be criminally punished in the nation except according to a law prescribed for the government before the imputed offense was committed and which existed as a law at the time. The opinion concluded: "Tested by these criteria, the provision of the constitution of Missouri which denies to [the defendant] the benefit which the previous law gave him of acquittal of the charge of murder in the first degree, on conviction of murder in the second degree, is, as to his case, an ex post facto law within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, and for the error of the supreme court of Missouri, in holding otherwise, its judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded to it, with direction to reverse the judgment of the criminal court of St. Louis."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Matthews, in Which Waite, CJ., and Bradley and Gray, JJ., Joined: Justice Matthews dissented from the Court's decision. He contended that the new constitutional amendment did not alter the crime for which the defendant was charged and therefore it could be applied to him. Justice Matthews wrote: "That law did not operate upon the offense to change its character; nor upon its punishment to aggravate it; nor upon the evidence which, according to the law in force at the time of its commission, was competent to prove or disprove it. It operated upon a transaction between the prisoner and the prosecution, which might or might not have taken place." See also Dobbert v. Florida; Ex Post Facto Clause; Holden v. Minnesota

Kuwait Kuwait recognizes capital punishment. The nation carries out the death penalty using hanging and the firing squad. Its legal system is based on Islamic law and civil law. Kuwait promulgated a constitution on November 11, 1962. Kuwait has been ruled by Amirs (princes) from the Al-Sabah family for over 200 years. The constitution and laws of Kuwait provide for judicial independence, but the Amir appoints all judges.

The court system of Kuwait consists of trial courts, a High Court of Appeal, and a Court of Cassation. Defendants have a right to retained counsel and, when indigent, must be appointed counsel in felony prosecutions. Both defendants and prosecutors may appeal trial court verdicts. Issue Presented: Whether the prosecutor's suppression of exculpatory evidence of the defendant's possible innocence required reversal of the defendant's conviction and death sentence.

Case Holding: The prosecutor's suppression of exculpatory evidence of the defendant's possible innocence required reversal of the defendant's conviction and death sentence and the granting of a new trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Louisiana charged the defendant, Curtis Lee Kyles, with capital murder. After the defendant's first trial ended in a hung jury, he was tried again. At the second trial, the defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence.

The defendant next filed a habeas corpus petition in a State trial court. In the habeas petition, the defendant alleged that the prosecutor withheld exculpatory evidence. The State trial court denied relief and the State's appellate court affirmed. He then sought relief on federal habeas in a district court, claiming that his conviction was obtained in violation of the United States Supreme Court's decision in Brady v. Maryland, which held that the suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment. The district court denied relief, and a federal Court of Appeals affirmed the denial. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Souter: Justice Souter held that suppression of the evidence violated Brady v. Maryland. He found that because the net effect of the suppressed evidence favoring the defendant raised a reasonable probability that its disclosure would have produced a different result at trial, the conviction could not stand and the defendant was entitled to a new trial. It was said that a review of the suppressed statements of eyewitnesses — whose testimony identifying the defendant as the killer was the basis of the prosecutor's case — revealed that their disclosure not only would have resulted in a markedly weaker case for the prosecution and a markedly stronger one for the defense, but also would have substantially reduced or destroyed the value of the prosecutor's two best witnesses.

The opinion noted that although not every item of the prosecutor's case would have been directly undercut if the suppressed evidence had been disclosed, it was significant that the physical evidence remaining unscathed would hardly have amounted to overwhelming proof that the defendant was the murderer. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Ginsburg and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens concurred in the Court's opinion. He indicated that he was writing separately only for the purpose of addressing the dissent's argument that the Court's docket was too busy to have granted certiorari in the case. Justice Stevens wrote:

Even aside from its legal importance, ... this case merits "favored treatment," for at least three reasons. First, the fact that the jury was unable to reach a verdict at the conclusion of the first trial provides strong reason to believe the significant errors that occurred at the second trial were prejudicial. Second, cases in which the record reveals so many instances of the state's failure to disclose exculpatory evidence are extremely rare. Even if I shared Justice Scalia's appraisal of the evidence in this case — which I do not — I would still believe we should independently review the record to ensure that the prosecution's blatant and repeated violations of a well-settled constitutional obligation did not deprive petitioner of a fair trial. Third, despite my high regard for the diligence and craftsmanship of the author of the majority opinion in the Court of Appeals, my independent review of the case left me with the same degree of doubt about [the defendant's] guilt expressed by the dissenting judge in that court.

Our duty to administer justice occasionally requires busy judges to engage in a detailed review of the particular facts of a case, even though our labors may not provide posterity with a newly minted rule of law.... I wish such review were unnecessary, but I cannot agree that our position in the judicial hierarchy makes it inappropriate. Sometimes the performance of an unpleasant duty conveys a message more significant than even the most penetrating legal analysis.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Kennedy and Thomas, JJ., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented from the Court's judgment. His dissent was centered upon what he believed to be a waste of time for the Court to have granted certiorari in the case: "The greatest puzzle of today's decision is what could have caused this capital case to be singled out for favored treatment. Perhaps it has been randomly selected as a symbol, to reassure America that the United States Supreme Court is reviewing capital convictions to make sure no factual error has been made. If so, it is a false symbol, for we assuredly do not do that. At, and during the week preceding, our February 24 Conference, for example, we considered and disposed of 10 petitions in capital cases, from seven States. We carefully considered whether the convictions and sentences in those cases had been obtained in reliance upon correct principles of federal law; but if we had tried to consider, in addition, whether those correct principles had been applied, not merely plausibly, but accurately, to the particular facts of each case, we would have done nothing else for the week. The reality is that responsibility for factual accuracy, in capital cases as in other cases, rests elsewhere — with trial judges and juries, state appellate courts, and the lower federal courts; we do nothing but encourage foolish reliance to pretend otherwise." Kyrgyzstan The death penalty is carried out in Kyrgyzstan. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on civil law. Kyrgyzstan became an independent nation in 1991. The nation's constitution was passed on May 5, 1993. The nation's republican form of government includes an executive branch, a legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

The judicial system of Kyrgyzstan includes trial courts, district and regional appellate courts, and a supreme court. Defendants are publicly tried before a judge and two assessors (citizens chosen from labor collectives). Defendants have a right to legal counsel, to cross-examine witnesses, and to appeal. The court may render one of three decisions in a criminal case: innocent, guilty, or indeterminate (that is, the case is returned to the prosecutor for further investigation).

Kyrgyzstan also recognizes local elders courts. These courts exercise authority over petty crimes, such as robbery, hooliganism, and theft. In the past, local elders courts were known to exceed their authority by trying major crimes and even levying capital punishment. However, abuses such as stoning and death sentences are believed to have abated. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

LaGrand Brothers Brothers Walter LaGrand and Karl LaGrand were executed in 1999 for capital murder by the State of Arizona. Walter was born on January 26, 1962, and Karl was on October 20, 1963. Both brothers were born in Augsburg, Germany. They moved to Arizona as children, after their mother married an American serviceman.

On the morning of January 7, 1982, the LaGrands left their home in with a plan to rob the Valley National Bank in Marana, Arizona. The brothers arrived in Marana sometime before 8:00 A.M. Because the bank was closed, they drove around Marana to pass time. They eventually stopped at a fast food restaurant adjacent to the bank. However, the manager of the restaurant told them the place was closed. The LaGrands then drove off.

At 8:00 A.M., an employee of the bank, Dawn Lopez, arrived for work. Lopez noticed two vehicles parked in the bank's parking lot, one of which she did not recognize. As Lopez parked her car, she observed the bank manager, Ken Hartsock, walking into the bank with another man whom she did not recognize. Lopez parked her car and walked toward the bank. As she moved passed the unknown vehicle, Walter LaGrand emerged from the car and asked her what time the bank opened. Lopez replied, "Ten o'clock." Lopez continued walking and went into the bank.

When Lopez entered the bank, she saw Hartsock standing by the vault with Karl LaGrand. Karl told her to sit down and opened his jacket to reveal what appeared to be a gun (the gun was not real). Walter then entered the bank. Walter expressed impatience before being told by Karl that Hartsock was unable to open the vault because he had only one-half of the vault combination.

The LaGrands then forced Lopez and Hartsock into an office where they bound their hands together with black electrical tape. Walter became agitated, accused Hartsock of lying, and then placed a letter opener to his throat, threatening to kill him if he was not telling the truth. Lopez and Hartsock were then gagged with bandanas.

At approximately 8:10 A.M., another bank employee, Wilma Rogers, arrived at the bank. Rogers immediately noticed an unknown vehicle in the parking lot and became suspicious. Rogers wrote down the license plate number of the unknown vehicle in the parking lot and then went to a nearby grocery store to telephone the bank. The LaGrands allowed Lopez to answer the phone. Karl held the receiver to Lopez's ear and listened to the conversation. Rogers asked for Hartsock but Lopez denied that he was there. Rogers then told Lopez that her car headlights were still on and that if she did not come out to turn them off she would call the sheriff. The LaGrands allowed Lopez to go outside to turn off her headlights, after warning her Hartsock would be killed if she did not return. Lopez left, but returned.

After Lopez returned, she was again tied up. As Lopez was being bound, Hartsock broke free and began fighting with the LaGrands. Hartsock was stabbed repeatedly before falling to the floor. Walter then turned to Lopez, who had also broken free, and stabbed her several times. The brothers then fled the bank and to Tucson.

Lopez was able to call for help. When the police arrived at the bank, Hartsock was dead. He had been stabbed twenty-four times. Lopez was rushed to a hospital, where she recovered from her stab wounds.

Based upon the license plate number obtained by Rogers, the police were able to quickly locate the brothers in Tucson. They were arrested within hours of the attempted bank robbery.

The LaGrands were charged with capital murder in the death of Hartsock. They were tried together in 1984. The jury returned a verdict of guilty against both brothers. On December 14, 1984, the trial court sentenced both brothers to death.

While the LaGrands were on death row, international efforts were made to prevent their executions. High-level German officials and United Nations officials intervened in an attempt to rescue the brothers. German officials were particularly agitated because their American consulate was not informed about the brothers until nine years after their convictions. The Germans argued that the brothers were citizens of Germany and therefore the German consulate in America should have been notified when the brothers were arrested.

International pressure did not prevent Arizona from executing the brothers. On February 14, 1999, Karl became the first German citizen executed in the United States since World War II. The method of execution used was lethal injection. Walter was executed on March 3, 1999. The method of execution used was lethal gas. The LaGrand brothers were buried in the Arizona State Prison cemetery in Florence, Arizona. See also Foreign Nationals and Capital Punishment; International Court of Justice Issue Presented: Whether the governor of New Jersey had authority to issue a reprieve of the defendant's execution and a subsequent death warrant for his execution.

Case Holding: The issue of whether the governor of New Jersey had authority to issue a reprieve of the defendant's execution and a subsequent death warrant for his execution did not present a federal question; therefore, jurisdiction did not reside in federal courts to address the matter.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Theodore Lambert, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of New Jersey. The New Jersey Supreme Court refused a direct appeal. Thereafter, the governor of the State granted a reprieve. At the end of the reprieve, the governor issued a death warrant for the defendant's execution. The defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus relief with the State's appellate court, which was refused. The defendant next filed a petition for habeas relief in a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that the governor did not have authority to issue a reprieve of his execution. Consequently, since the initial execution date had passed, there was no authority in the governor to issue a death warrant for his execution. The federal court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice ruled that the appeal had to be dismissed because it did not involve an issue for which the Court had jurisdiction over. The opinion reasoned as follows:

The constitution of New Jersey provides that the governor shall have power "to grant reprieves to extend until the expiration of a time not exceeding ninety days, after conviction." The verdict was returned June 15th. Sentence was passed October 13th, and a reprieve for 30 days was granted December 4, 1894. [The defendant] contends that the word "conviction" relates to the verdict of the jury, and not to the sentence of the court, and that, therefore, the governor had no power to grant the reprieve, nor subsequently to issue the warrant of execution. But the contention that [the defendant] cannot be made to pay the penalty for the crime of which he was adjudged guilty, because he was not executed at the time originally designated, by reason of the interposition of the governor at his instance, which [the defendant] alleges was, as matter of construction of the state constitution, unauthorized, was not sustained by the [state courts], to whom ... he applied, and their action is not open to review here. With the disposition of state questions by the appropriate state authorities, it is not the province of this court to interfere, and there is no basis for the suggestion of any violation of the constitution of the United States; the denial of due process of law; or deprivation of any right, privilege, or immunity secured to him by the constitution or laws of the United States.

The appeal was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. See also Clemency; Jurisdiction; Lambert v. Barrett (II)

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution was violated because the governor of New Jersey issued a second death warrant against the defendant more than ninety days after the defendant's sentence.

Case Holding: The Constitution was not violated because the governor of New Jersey issued a second death warrant against the defendant more than ninety days after the defendant's sentence, as the matter was purely an issue of State law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Theodore Lambert, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of New Jersey. The New Jersey Supreme Court refused a direct appeal. Thereafter, the governor of the State granted a reprieve. At the end of the reprieve, the governor issued a death warrant for the defendant's execution. The defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus relief with the State's appellate court, which was refused. The defendant next filed a petition for habeas relief in a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that the governor did not have authority to issue a reprieve of his execution. Consequently, since the initial execution date had passed, there was no authority in the governor to issue a death warrant for his execution. The federal court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue. However, the Supreme Court determined that the matters raised by the defendant did not present a federal question; therefore, it did not have jurisdiction to decide matters brought in the appeal.

After the case was remanded to State court, the governor issued another death warrant setting a new execution date. The defendant thereafter filed a habeas petition in a State court, which was dismissed. The defendant then filed another habeas petition in the federal district court, arguing that the governor was without authority to issue a death warrant ninety days after his sentence. Further, that the second death warrant was in the nature of a new sentence, which could not be made without the presence of the defendant, and it placed him twice in jeopardy of his life, in violation of the federal Constitution. The federal court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that the Constitution was not violated by the issuance of the second death warrant by the governor. The opinion addressed the matter as follows:

The constitution of New Jersey provides that the governor may grant reprieves "to extend until the expiration of a time not exceeding 90 days after conviction"; and [under] the criminal procedure act of the state it is provided that when a reprieve is granted to any convict sentenced to the punishment of death, and he is not pardoned, it shall be the duty of the governor to issue his warrant to the sheriff of the proper county for the execution of the sentence at such time as is therein appointed and expressed. It is contended that, if there is no reprieve, there can be no warrant; that there was no authority to issue either, except within 90 days after conviction; and that [the defendant] must be brought before the trial court, and a new date be fixed for the execution. But these are matters for the determination of the state courts, and they appear to have been passed upon adversely to [the defendant]. That result involves no denial of due process of law, or the infraction of any provision of the constitution of the United States.

The judgment of the federal district court was affirmed. See also Death Warrant; Lambert v. Barrett (I)

Issue Presented: Whether a death row inmate whose conviction became final before the decision in Espinosa v. Florida was rendered is foreclosed from relying on that decision in a federal habeas corpus proceeding because the decision announced a new rule.

Case Holding: A death row inmate whose conviction became final before the decision in Espinosa v. Florida was rendered is foreclosed from relying on that decision in a federal habeas corpus proceeding because the decision announced a new rule.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Cary Michael Lambrix, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Florida. After his conviction and sentence were upheld on direct appeal and habeas corpus review by Florida courts, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The district court denied relief. The defendant appealed the denial to a federal court of appeals. While the defendant's case was pending in the Court of Appeals, the United States Supreme Court rendered a decision in Espinosa v. Florida, which held that neither a trial court or an advisory jury could weigh or consider an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance in deciding a capital defendant's sentence. The defendant argued to the Court of Appeals that Espinosa was applicable to his case, because the judge and advisory jury in his case weighed an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance in imposing his death sentence. The Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's denial relief, after ruling that Espinosa announced a new constitutional rule which could not be applied retroactively to his case. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia held that a death row inmate whose conviction became final before Espinosa was decided was foreclosed from relying on that decision in a federal habeas proceeding. It was said that in determining whether a new constitutional rule may be applied retroactively in a habeas proceeding a court must (1) determine the date on which the defendant's conviction became final; (2) survey the legal landscape as it existed on that date to determine whether a State court then considering the defendant's claim would have felt compelled by existing precedent to conclude that the rule the defendant seeks was constitutionally required; and (3) if not, consider whether the relief sought falls within one of two narrow exceptions to non-retroactivity. The two narrow exceptions are that a new rule may be applied retroactively if it (1) placed an entire category of primary conduct beyond the reach of criminal law or prohibited imposition of a certain type of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense; or (2) was a watershed rule of criminal procedure implicating a criminal proceeding's fundamental fairness and accuracy.

It was said that a survey of the legal landscape, as of the date that the defendant's conviction became final, revealed that Espinosa was not dictated by any existing precedent and therefore it announced a new constitutional rule. Justice Scalia rejected the defendant's contention that the Court's decisions in Baldwin v. Alabama and Godfrey v. Georgia foreshadowed Espinosa. The opinion also ruled that Espinosa's new rule did not fall within either of the two narrow exceptions to the non-retroactivity doctrine. It was said that the first exception plainly had no application, since Espinosa did not decriminalize a class of conduct nor prohibit the imposition of capital punishment on a particular class of persons.

Additionally, the second exception was inapplicable because Espinosa did not create a watershed rule of criminal procedure implicating a criminal proceeding's fundamental fairness and accuracy. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Ginsburg and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's decision on the grounds that Espinosa did not create a new rule. He wrote in his dissent: "Our decision in Espinosa did not create a new rule forbidding trial courts from curing a jury's error, rather it held that 'if a weighing State decides to place capital sentencing authority in two actors rather than one, neither actor must be permitted to weigh invalid aggravating circumstances.' This holding is a logical consequence of applying Godfrey to Florida's sentencing scheme."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor dissented from the Court's decision on two grounds. First, she argued that the Court was wrong in not addressing the issue that the defendant's claim was barred because it was not raised timely in the State courts. Justice O'Connor contended that this issue had to be resolved before addressing the retroactivity issue. She indicated that the case should have been remanded to the Court of Appeals so that it could address the procedural default issue. As to the second ground of dissent, Justice O'Connor wrote that she agreed with Justice Stevens's position that Espinosa was not a new rule. *See also Baldwin v. Alabama; Espinosa v. Issue Presented: Whether the State of Indiana may constitutionally deny the defendant the right to have a free transcript of his coram nobis hearing for appeal purposes, solely because of his indigence.

Case Holding: The State of Indiana may not, consistent with the Constitution, deny the defendant the right to have a free transcript of his coram nobis hearing for appeal purposes, solely because of his indigence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, George Robert Brown, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Indiana. After an unsuccessful appeal to the Indiana Supreme Court, the defendant filed a petition for a writ of coram nobis in the trial court. The trial court held a hearing on the petition, but denied relief. The defendant then requested a free copy of the transcript of the hearing for appeal purposes. The trial court denied the request for a free transcript. The defendant appealed the denial of free transcript to the Indiana Supreme Court. The appellate court ruled that the State did not have to provide the defendant with a free transcript even though he was indigent.

The defendant then filed a petition for habeas corpus relief with a federal district court, alleging that his federal constitutional rights were violated by the State's refusal to provide him with a free transcript of his coram nobis hearing. The district court held that Indiana deprived the defendant of a right secured by the Fourteenth Amendment by refusing him appellate review of the denial of a writ of error coram nobis solely because of his poverty. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stewart: Justice Stewart observed that the rules of the Indiana Supreme Court expressly permit an appeal from the denial of a petition for a writ of coram nobis, but also require that a transcript be filed in order to confer jurisdiction upon the court to hear such an appeal. The opinion reasoned that a person with sufficient funds can appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of Indiana from the denial of a petition for a writ of coram nobis, but an indigent could be entirely cut off from any appeal at all. It was said that "the Court has held that a State with an appellate system which made available trial transcripts to those who could afford them was constitutionally required to provide means of affording adequate and effective appellate review to indigent defendants." Justice Stewart held that "once the State chooses to establish appellate review in criminal cases, it may not foreclose indigents from access to any phase of that procedure because of their poverty."

The opinion found that the State had deprived the defendant of a right secured by the Fourteenth Amendment by refusing him appellate review of the denial of his petition for a writ of coram nobis, solely because of his poverty. The opinion remanded the case to the district court "so that appropriate orders may be entered ordering Brown's discharge from custody, unless within a reasonable time the State of Indiana provides him an appeal on the merits to the Supreme Court of Indiana from the denial of the writ of coram nobis."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Harlan, in Which Clark, J., Joined: Justice Harlan concurred in the Court's decision. He expressed concern with the fact that the defendant's public defender counsel refused to assist in the appeal of the coram nobis petition, on the grounds that no issue of merit existed. Justice Harlan indicated that he believed the case should have been remanded with instructions to "the District Court to discharge the prisoner only if the Indiana Supreme Court fails, within a reasonable time, to accord him a review of the Public Defender's decision not to appeal the denial of coram nobis." See also Coram Nobis; Transcript of Proceeding

Issue Presented: Whether, at the time of the defendant's sentencing hearing, he and his counsel had adequate notice that the trial judge might sentence him to death.

Case Holding: The defendant's death sentence was imposed in violation of the Due Process Clause because of inadequate notice that the trial judge was considering death as a possible sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: On December 1, 1983, the State of Idaho charged the defendant, Bryan Lankford, with capital murder. During his arraignment, the trial judge advised the defendant that the maximum punishment under State law that he could receive if convicted was life imprisonment or death. A jury found him guilty, and, prior to his sentencing hearing, the trial court entered an order requiring the State to provide notice whether it would seek the death penalty. The State filed a negative response and there was no discussion of the death penalty as a possible sentence at the sentencing hearing, where both defense counsel and the prosecutor argued the merits of concurrent or consecutive, and fixed or indeterminate, sentence terms. At the conclusion of the sentencing, however, the trial judge sentenced the defendant to death.

In affirming the conviction and sentence, the Idaho Supreme Court rejected the defendant's claim that the trial court violated the Constitution by failing to give notice of its intention to consider imposing the death sentence, despite the State's notice that it was not seeking that penalty. The appellate court concluded that the express advice given the defendant at his arraignment, together with the terms of the Idaho Code, were sufficient notice to him that the death penalty might be imposed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the claim.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens wrote that the sentencing process in the case violated the Due Process Clause because, at the time of the sentencing hearing, the defendant and his counsel did not have adequate notice that the judge might sentence him to death. The opinion noted that there was nothing in the record to indicate that the trial judge contemplated death as a possible sentence or to alert the parties that the real issue they should have been debating at the hearing was the choice between life and death.

It was said that if defense counsel had been given fair notice that the trial judge was contemplating a death sentence, presumably, defense counsel would have advanced arguments at the sentencing hearing addressing the aggravating circumstances identified by the trial judge. No opportunity was presented for such a defense. The opinion held that it was unrealistic to assume that the notice provided by statute and the arraignment survived the State's response that it was not seeking the death penalty. Justice Stevens wrote that the trial judge's silence following that response had the practical effect of concealing from the parties the principal issues to be decided at the hearing. It was concluded: "If notice is not given, and the adversary process is not permitted to function properly, there is an increased chance of error, and with that, the possibility of an incorrect result.... [The defendant's] lack of adequate notice that the judge was contemplating the imposition of the death sentence created an impermissible risk that the adversary process may have malfunctioned in this case. The judgment of the Idaho Supreme Court is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion."

had adequate notice that he was subject to having the death penalty imposed against him. The dissent argued that the defendant knew that he had been convicted of capital murder and was told during his arraignment that he faced imprisonment for life or death. Justice Scalia concluded: "Because Lankford has not established that his counsel had any basis reasonably to believe that the death penalty was, either legally or as a practical matter, out of the case — and indeed he has not even established that his counsel unreasonably believed that to be so — we have no cause to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Idaho. In doing so, we seemingly adopt the topsy-turvy principle that the capital defendant cannot be presumed to know the law, but must be presumed to have detrimentally relied upon a misunderstanding of the law or a misinterpretation of the judge. I respectfully dissent."

Case Note: The decision in the case is fact-specific. That is, the decision did not hold that the Constitution required States provide defendants with notice (other than by statute) that the death penalty will be sought. The impact of the decision was limited to instances where a defendant has been misled into believing that he or she will not be subject to a sentence of death. See also Notice of Intent to Seek Death Penalty

Laos Capital punishment is recognized by Laos. The nation's legal system is based on French civil law and customary law. Laos promulgated a constitution on August 14, 1991. Laos is an authoritarian, one-party state ruled by the Laos People's Revolutionary Party. Although the nation's constitution provides for a system composed of an executive branch, a legislative branch, and a judicial branch, in practice, the Revolutionary Party governs the nation.

The judicial system of Laos consists of district courts, provincial courts, and a supreme court. Defendants have the right to public trials, the right to counsel, and to enjoy a presumption of innocence. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Larzelere, Virginia Gail On May 11, 1993, Virginia Gail Larzelere was sentenced to death by the State of Florida for masterminding the killing of her husband. Virginia was born on December 27, 1952. She was married to Dr. Norman Larzelere, a dentist, and she worked as the office manager for his dentistry practice. The couple had an adopted adult son named Jason.

On the afternoon of March 8, 1991, a masked gunman came into Norman's dental office and shot him with a shotgun. Norman died within a short time after being shot.

Subsequent to the shooting, Virginia and Jason were charged with the murder of Norman. Virginia's trial was held first. The prosecutor's theory was that Virginia and Jason conspired to kill Norman to obtain approximately two million dollars in life insurance and one million dollars in assets. To prove its theory, the prosecutor presented testimony from two of Virginia's former lovers. Both men testified that Virginia asked them to help her kill her husband. The prosecutor also called two other witnesses, Kristen Palmieri and Steven Heidle, who testified to a number of incriminating actions and statements made by Virginia regarding the murder. Palmieri and Heidle stated that Virginia told them that Jason committed the murder. Virginia gave Palmieri and Heidle the weapon used in the murder and told them to dispose of it.

Additional evidence by the prosecutor showed that Virginia gave several conflicting versions of the murder to police, with differing descriptions of the gunman and the vehicle in which he left. A patient who was present at the time of the murder heard

Virginia Gail Larzelere was sentenced to death in 1993 for her role in the murder of her husband. However, in 2005, a Florida court vacated the death sentence and ordered a new sentencing hearing. (Florida Department of Corrections)

The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. Following Virginia's trial, Jason was tried but acquitted of all charges.

On March 24, 2005, during a habeas corpus proceeding, a trial judge vacated Virginia's death sentence and ordered a new sentencing hearing. This decision was appealed to the Florida Supreme Court. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Last Execution of the Twentieth Century Sammie Felder became the last person executed in the United States in the twentieth century, when Texas executed him by lethal injection in December 1999.

Felder, an African American, was born in Texas on August 23, 1945. Most of his adult life was spent in and out of prison. The crime which sent him to prison the final time occurred on February 26, 1975. On that date, Felder stabbed to death a paraplegic during a robbery. He was apprehended in Idaho and extradited back to Texas, where he confessed to the crime.

In 1976, Felder was convicted and sentenced to death. Eventually a federal appellate court reversed the judgment, after finding Felder's confession was improperly obtained and admitted into evidence. Felder was retried in 1986, found guilty, and sentenced to death a second time. On December 15, 1999, the State of Texas executed Felder by lethal injection. See also First Execution of the Twenty-First Century

Last Meal It is customary for a condemned inmate to be offered a last meal before execution. Records show that most inmates accept a last meal, though a few reject the offer. Prisons generally have a budget limit as to how much a condemned inmate may order for a last meal. Some prisons restrict the food to that provided in the prison, while others will allow meals to be purchased outside the prison.

Karl LaGrand, Executed by Arizona, February 24, 1999

Two bacon, lettuce & tomato sandwiches on white bread, mayonnaise, 4 fried eggs, over-easy, medium portion of hash-brown potatoes, 2 breakfast rolls, small portion of strawberry jelly. One half-pint of pineapple sherbet ice cream, one 22-ounce of cup hot coffee, black, one medium slice of German chocolate cake with coconut-caramel icing, one 12 ounce cup of cold milk.

Walter LaGrand, Executed by Arizona, March 3, 1999

Six fried eggs, cooked over-easy, 16 strips of bacon, one large portion of hash-browns, one pint of pineapple sherbet ice cream, one breakfast steak well done. One 16-ounce cup filled with ice, one 7UP, 1 Dr. Pepper, 1 Coke, one portion of hot sauce, one cup of coffee, two packets of sugar and four Roloids tablets.

Last Statement

A ritual that has a long history in capital punishment is that of asking a condemned person if he or she has a last statement to make before being executed. The last-statement ritual has continued under modern capital punishment. As a general matter, if a condemned person has a last statement to make, it will be transcribed verbatim by an official present during the execution.

Occasionally, a prisoner will make a lengthy last statement, in which case only a summary of the statement will be transcribed.

Everywhere we live is ashshura." (North Carolina Department of Corrections)

Latvia The nation of Latvia maintains capital punishment, but abolished it for ordinary crimes in 1999. Latvia uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on civil law. Latvia first promulgated a constitution in 1922. Latvia regained its independence in 1991, after more than fifty years of being ruled by the former Soviet Union. The government consists of an executive branch, a legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

The judicial system of Latvia consists of trial courts, regional courts, and a supreme court. Defendants have a right to retained or appointed counsel, the right to confront witnesses, and a right to bail. Trials are generally public, but may be closed if state secrets might be revealed. Criminal cases are tried before a judge and two lay assessors. Defendants have the right to appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Law Enforcement Officer Aggravator The number of law enforcement officers feloniously killed in the line of duty has declined since the early 1970s. Between 1973 and 1979, there were 798 officers killed. During the entire decade of the 1980s, there were 801 officers killed. From 1990 to 1999, there were 647 officers killed. From 2000 to 2005, there were 341 police officers killed (Bureau of Justice Statistics, Homicide Trends in the United States, 2006).

The overwhelming majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made the killing of a law enforcement officer a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, if it is determined at the penalty phase that the victim was a law enforcement officer killed in the performance of his or her duty, the death penalty may be imposed. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Law of Parties Various legal theories are available which permit a prosecutor to obtain a conviction of defendant for capital murder, even though he or she did not actually perform the act which resulted in the victim's death. One such legal theory is known as the law of parties.

Under the law of parties it is immaterial that the actual murder was not participated in by the defendant. Even where the actual killer is only convicted of a lesser included offense of murder, a co-defendant may be prosecuted for murder on the theory that he or she aided, abetted, counseled, or procured the actual perpetrator to commit the homicide.

The law of parties does not apply at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution. At the penalty phase, the jury is required to make its determination based solely on the conduct and perceived intent of the defendant and not the actions or intent of his or her co-defendants.

The law of parties is circumscribed by the limitation that the lethal force act must be (1) in furtherance of a crime, (2) in prosecution of a common design, or (3) an unlawful act the parties set out to accomplish. In determining whether a defendant should be prosecuted for murder as a party to a homicide, courts look at events occurring before, during, and after the offense, as well as to the conduct of the parties which show an understanding and common design to kill the victim. The law of parties consists of four types of defendants: (1) principal in the first degree; (2) principal in the second degree; (3) accessory before the fact; and (4) accessory after the fact. Remarks about each follow.

Principal in the First Degree. A principal in the first degree is a defendant who, with the requisite mental state, actually performs the act which directly inflicts death upon a victim. Courts have held that a prosecution for murder may be sustained against a defendant as a principal in the first degree when the defendant and a co-defendant both shoot the victim, but it is not known which of the two actually fired the bullet that killed the victim. Moreover, where two or more persons take a direct part in a fatal beating of the victim, each participant may be prosecuted as principal in the first degree

Principal in the Second Degree. To be a principal in the second degree, a defendant must (1) be present at the scene of the crime and (2) aid, abet, counsel, command, or encourage the commission of the offense. The general rule is that one who aids and abets murder with the intent to assist the murder to completion may be prosecuted for capital murder. A principal in the second degree can be said to share the principal's intent to murder, when he or she knowingly intends to assist the principal in the commission of a crime and the murder is a natural and probable consequence of that crime. The Constitution does not prohibit jurisdictions from making a principal in the second degree equally responsible, as a matter of law, with a principal in the first degree.

A defendant may be convicted of first-degree murder premised as a principal in the second degree, even though no other party was convicted of first-degree murder. To establish a murder charge based on the theory of principal in the second degree, the prosecutor must show that (1) the defendant knew the crime was occurring, (2) the defendant associated him/herself with the effort to murder, (3) the defendant took part in murder as something he or she wished to bring about, and (4) the defendant committed some overt act to make the murder a success.

To prosecute a defendant for murder as a principal in the second degree, it is not necessary to prove an agreement between the defendant and another in advance of the criminal act or even at the time of the act. A defendant may be found constructively present and acting in concert with the principal in the first degree if the defendant shared the criminal intent with the principal and the principal knew it.

Accessory Before the Fact. The general rule is that an accessory before the fact of murder may be prosecuted for murder. To be prosecuted as an accessory before the fact of murder, (1) the defendant must have counseled, procured, commanded, encouraged, or aided the principal in killing the victim, (2) the principal must have murdered the victim, and (3) the defendant must not have been present when the killing occurred.

To successfully prosecute a defendant for murder as an accessory, the prosecutor must show the defendant had the intent to aid the principal and, in doing so, must have intended to commit the offense. A defendant may be prosecuted for first-degree murder as an accessory before the fact, even though the principal pled guilty to second-degree murder. A person who procures another to commit murder is an accessory before the fact of murder.

Accessory After the Fact. To sustain a charge of accessory after the fact, the prosecutor must show (1) the principal committed murder, (2) the defendant aided the principal in evading arrest, punishment, or escape, and (3) the defendant knew that principal committed the murder. An accessory after the fact may not constitutionally be punished with death.

Law of the Case Doctrine The law of the case doctrine provides that when an appellate court renders a decision on a legal issue in a case and remands the case for further proceedings in a lower court, the appellate court will not revisit the issue previously decided by it, in any subsequent proceeding involving the case. Courts have recognized, in the context of capital punishment cases, a manifest injustice exception to the law of the case doctrine. Under this exception, an appellate court is obligated to revisit an issue it previously decided in the case in order to prevent a manifest injustice from occurring. See also Dobbs v. Zant

Lebanon Capital punishment is recognized in Lebanon. The nation uses the firing squad and hanging to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is a mixture of Ottoman law, canon law, Napoleonic code, and civil law. Lebanon promulgated its constitution on May 23, 1926. Lebanon is a parliamentary republic having an executive branch, a legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

The judicial system is composed of trial courts, a supreme court, and judicial council (which tries national security offenses). Defendants have the right to counsel and the right to confront witnesses. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether Oregon may constitutionally impose upon capital felons the burden of proving insanity, as an affirmative defense, beyond a reasonable doubt.

Case Holding: The Constitution is not offended by imposing upon capital felons the burden of proving insanity, as an affirmative defense, beyond a reasonable doubt.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant in the case, Leland, was charged by the State of Oregon with capital murder. He pled not guilty and gave notice of his intention to use the insanity defense. Under State law, the defendant was required to prove insanity beyond a reasonable doubt. The defendant was found guilty by a jury. The trial court sentenced the defendant to death.

One issue raised by the defendant on appeal to the Oregon Supreme Court was that the federal Constitution prohibited requiring him to prove insanity beyond a reasonable doubt. The appellate court rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the defendant's claim.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clark: Justice Clark recognized that Oregon was the only jurisdiction that required a capital felon prove insanity beyond a reasonable doubt. It was noted that most states require insanity be proven by the lower standard of preponderance of the evidence. The opinion found little constitutional significance in the different standards: "While there is an evident distinction between these two rules as to the quantum of proof required, we see no practical difference of such magnitude as to be significant in determining the constitutional question we face here. Oregon merely requires a heavier burden of proof. In each instance, in order to establish insanity as a complete defense to the charges preferred, the accused must prove that insanity. The fact that a practice is followed by a large number of states is not conclusive in a decision as to whether that practice accords with due process."

Finding none of the defendant's arguments persuasive enough to impose the Constitution on this issue, Justice Clark wrote: "We are therefore reluctant to interfere with Oregon's determination of its policy with respect to the burden of proof on the issue of sanity since we cannot say that policy violates generally accepted concepts of basic standards of justice." Of crucial significance to Justice Clark was the fact "that the burden of proof of guilt, and of all the necessary elements of guilt, was placed squarely upon the State. As the jury was told, this burden did not shift, but rested upon the State throughout the trial, just as, according to the instructions, [the defendant] was presumed to be innocent until the jury was convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty." The opinion affirmed the judgment of the Oregon Supreme Court.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Black, J., Joined: Justice Frankfurter believed that constitutional due process prohibited Oregon from requiring the defendant prove insanity beyond a reasonable doubt. The dissent argued: "Because from the time that the law which we have inherited has emerged from dark and barbaric times, the conception of justice which has dominated our criminal law has refused to put an accused at the hazard of punishment if he fails to remove every reasonable doubt of his innocence in the minds of jurors. It is the duty of the Government to establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. This notion — basic in our law and rightly one of the boasts of a free society — is a requirement and a safeguard of due process of law in the historic, procedural content of 'due process.' Accordingly there can be no doubt, I repeat, that a State cannot cast upon an accused the duty of establishing beyond a reasonable doubt that his was not the act which caused the death of another."

Justice Frankfurter concluded that "it is a deprivation of life without due process to send a man to his doom if he cannot prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the physical events of homicide did not constitute murder because under the State's theory he was incapable of acting culpably." Lem Woon v. Oregon Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Lem Woon v. Oregon, 229 U.S. 586 (1913); Argued: April 25, 1913; Decided: June 9, 1913; Opinion of the Court: Justice Pitney; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: James E. Fenton argued; John F. Logan, Frank F. Freeman and Ralph E. Moody on brief; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: A. M. Crawford argued; Dan J. Malarkey and Walter H. Evans on brief; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: None; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: None

Issue Presented: Whether the federal Constitution required States to prosecute capital offenses by grand jury indictment.

Case Holding: The federal Constitution does not require States to prosecute capital offenses by grand jury indictment.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Lem Woon, was charged with capital murder by the State of Oregon. The charge brought against the defendant was made in an information and not an indictment. However, prior to the defendant's trial, an amendment to Oregon's constitution imposed a requirement that criminal prosecutions be made by grand jury indictment. The defendant was tried on the information and found guilty by a jury and sentenced to death. The Oregon Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's claim that due process of law required that he be prosecuted under an indictment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Pitney: Justice Pitney ruled that the amendment to the State's constitution requiring prosecutions by indictment was to be applied prospectively, as was previously ruled by the Oregon Supreme Court. The opinion found that the issue of retroactive application of the amendment was purely a question of State law that did not invoke federal constitutional law. The opinion also rejected the defendant's contention that, regardless of the amendment, he had a federal constitutional right to be prosecuted by grand jury indictment. Justice Pitney wrote that "the 'due process of law' clause does not require the state to adopt the institution and procedure of a grand jury." See also Grand Jury; Hurtado v. California; Prosecution by Information

Lesotho Lesotho recognizes capital punishment. The nation uses hanging as the method of carrying out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on English common law and Roman-Dutch law. Lesotho is a constitutional monarchy and adopted its constitution on April 2, 1993. Under the constitution, the king fills only a ceremonial role. The government is run by a prime minister, in conjunction with a legislature and judiciary.

The judiciary consists of trial courts, a court of appeal and a high court. Customary or traditional courts administer customary law in rural areas. Defendants have a right to a public trial, the right to bail, and the right to counsel. There is no right to trial by jury. Trials are presided over by a judge and two lay assessors. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Lesser Included Offense Instruction In a capital prosecution, the death penalty cannot be imposed if the guilt phase jury was not permitted to consider a verdict of guilt of a lesser included offense that was supported by evidence. Lesser included offenses to capital murder include a conviction for any degree of non-capital murder (second or third degree murder), voluntary or involuntary manslaughter, or an attempt to commit murder or manslaughter. Constitutional due process requires that a lesser included offense instruction be given only when the evidence warrants such an instruction. If insufficient evidence is presented tending to establish a lesser included offense, then due process does not require an instruction on a lesser included offense.

Providing the jury with the option of convicting on a lesser included offense ensures that the jury will accord the defendant the full benefit of the reasonable doubt standard. When the evidence establishes that the defendant is guilty of a violent offense but leaves some doubt as to an element justifying conviction of a capital offense, the failure to give the jury such a lesser included offense instruction inevitably enhances the risk of an unwarranted conviction.

A few exceptions to the general rule requiring lesser included offense instructions be given have been carved out. One exception occurs in the context of a capital felon being prosecuted on alternative theories of murder, such as premeditated and felony murder. In this situation it has been held that a defendant is not entitled to a jury instruction on the lesser included offense under the felony murder theory, when the jury is instructed on the lesser included offense under the alternative theory. A second exception occurs when a State does not provide for lesser included offenses to any offense. There is no constitutional requirement of a lesser included offense instruction for capital murder in such situations. See also Beck v. Alabama; Brown v. United States (II); Hopkins v. Reeves; Hopper v. Evans; Jury Instructions; Schad v. Arizona; Sparf v. United States

Lethal Gas The use of lethal gas as a method of execution is an early-twentieth-century Anglo-American jurisprudential phenomenon. The chemical agent used to carry out this method of execution is cyanide gas. Arizona was the first jurisdiction to actually have a gas chamber constructed.

Gee Jon became the first person to be executed by lethal gas when Nevada executed him on February 8, 1924. (Nevada State Library and Archives)

Lethal gas was first used by Nevada. The first person to be executed by lethal gas was a condemned Nevada inmate named Gee Jon. He was executed, at age 29, on February 8, 1924. Gee Jon was born in China, but spent most of his life in the United States.

Lethal Gas Jurisdictions.

Only four capital punishment jurisdictions provide for the use of lethal gas to execute the death penalty. Two jurisdictions, California and Missouri, utilize lethal gas as an option for all capital felons. One jurisdiction, Arizona, utilizes lethal gas as an option for inmates sentenced before a specific date. The fourth jurisdiction, Wyoming, has designated lethal gas as the method of execution in the event its primary method is found unconstitutional.

NUMBER OF JURISDICTIONS USING LETHAL GAS

Constitutionality of Lethal Gas. Several state appellate courts had, prior to 1983, addressed the issue of whether execution by lethal gas was a cruel and unusual method of punishment. The first such court to do so was the Nevada Supreme Court in the case of State v. Gee Jon, 211 P. 676 (Nev. 1923). This case involved two defendants, Gee Jon and Hughie Sing (Sing's sentence was eventually commuted to life imprisonment), who had been convicted and sentenced to death for committing the crime of murder. At the time of their crime, the State of Nevada had but recently changed its method of execution to lethal gas.

The defendants challenged the use of lethal gas as cruel and unusual punishment. The court in Gee Jon rejected this argument. In doing so, the court made the following observations:

What has been the punishment for centuries for the crime of murder, of the character we know as murder in the first degree? It has been death. For the state to take the life of one who perpetrates a fiendish murder has from time immemorial been recognized as proper. The [statute] in question authorizes the taking of the life of a murderer as a penalty for the crime which he commits. It is the same penalty which has been exacted for ages — sanctioned in the old biblical law of “an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.” It is true that the penalty has been inflicted in different ways; for instance, by hanging, by shooting, and by electrocution; but in each case the method used has been to accomplish the same end, the death of the guilty party. Our statute inflicts no new punishment; it is the same old punishment, inflicted in a different manner, and we think it safe to say that in whatever way the death penalty is inflicted it must of necessity be more or less cruel.

But we are not prepared to say that the infliction of the death penalty by the administration of lethal gas would of itself subject the victim to either pain or torture.... For many years animals have been put to death painlessly by the administration of poisonous gas.... No doubt gas may be administered so as to produce intense suffering. It is also true that one may be executed by hanging, shooting, or electrocution in such a bungling fashion as to produce the same result. But this is no argument against execution by either method.

... It may be said to be a scientific fact that a painless death may be caused by the administration of lethal gas.

Since 1983, several federal appellate courts have addressed the issue of whether lethal gas is a cruel and unusual punishment. The federal appellate courts are split on this issue. Two appellate courts, Gray v. Lucas, 710 F.2d 1048 (5th Cir. 1983), and Hunt v. Nuth, 57 F.3d 1327 (4th Cir. 1995), concluded that lethal gas was not cruel and unusual punishment, while the third court, Fierro v. Gomez, 77 F.3d 301 (9th Cir. 1996), reversed the decision in 117 S.Ct. 285 (1996) and came to the opposite conclusion. The United States Supreme Court eventually vacated the court of appeals decision in

Lethal gas chamber at San Quentin State Prison. (California Department of Corrections)

Walter Reppin is being strapped into the lethal gas chamber at the Colorado State Penitentiary in Canon City. Reppin's execution occurred on January 5, 1966. He was convicted of killing a taxi driver. (Denver Public Library)

Fierro. However, it did so without any guidance on the issue it reversed. In a terse one-paragraph memorandum opinion, the Court vacated the Fierro decision and merely remanded the case with instructions that the appellate court reconsider its judgment in light of the fact that the jurisdiction in controversy (California) amended its death penalty statute so that lethal gas would be used only if requested by a capital felon.

EXECUTIONS PERFORMED BY LETHAL GAS 1976–OCTOBER 2006

Two arguments are offered against the use of lethal gas as a method of execution. First, it is asserted that cyanide gas induces excruciating pain. Capital felons have been known to urinate, defecate, vomit, and drool while undergoing death by lethal gas. Second, and the primary threat to continued use of lethal gas, death by this method can take over ten minutes. It is argued that such a span of time amounts to pure torture.

Lethal Gas Protocol. In carrying out death by lethal gas, the condemned inmate will have a heart monitor attached to his or her chest prior to the execution. The inmate is then led into the gas chamber where he or she is strapped into a large chair. The chair used will have holes in it to permit the gas to flow upwards. The gas chamber itself is airtight and has windows so the witnesses can view the execution. The heart monitor is attached to an outside monitoring station so that the attending physician can declare the inmate dead.

Prison officials will place sulfuric acid in a large bowl below the inmate's chair. A small container of potassium cyanide is placed upon the sulfuric acid bowl. A switch located outside the gas chamber is used to empty the cyanide container into the bowl containing the sulfuric acid.

The effect of the cyanide gas will be to inhibit the body's ability to take in oxygen. The inmate will, in essence, strangle to death. The inmate will feel as if he or she is having a heart attack. Death will usually occur in six to eighteen minutes.

After the execution, ammonia gas will be pumped into the gas chamber to neutralize the cyanide gas. Prison officials wear gas masks when they enter the chamber to remove the body. See also Methods of Execution

Lethal Injection Lethal injection, as a method of execution, was not known to the common law. In the decision of Ex Parte Granviel, 561 S.W.2d 503 (Tex.Cr.App. 1978), the court noted:

"The intravenous injection of a lethal substance as a means of execution has not been heretofore utilized in this nation." Injection of a barbiturate and a paralytic agent into the blood stream of a capital felon represents a new method of execution. Lethal injection, as this new method is called, is a child of the 1970s.

Oklahoma was the first jurisdiction to provide by statute for execution by lethal injection. It did so on May 10, 1977. The first State to actually execute a prisoner by lethal injection was Texas. It did so on December 7, 1982, when Charlie Brooks became the first inmate to die by lethal injection.

Lethal Injection Jurisdictions. Lethal injection is provided as a method of execution in every capital punishment jurisdiction except Nebraska. The statutes in seven of those jurisdictions, Alabama, California, Florida, Missouri, South Carolina, Virginia, and Washington, provide for lethal injection as an option for all capital felons. In four jurisdictions, Arizona, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Utah, lethal injection is an option for inmates sentenced before a specific date. The remaining lethal injection jurisdictions utilize this method exclusively. The statutes set out below illustrate how jurisdictions provide for the infliction of lethal injection.

Colorado Code §§ 16-11-401 and 402: The manner of inflicting the punishment of death shall be by the administration of a lethal injection.... For the purposes of this part ... "lethal injection" means a continuous intravenous injection of a lethal quantity of sodium thiopental or other equally or more effective substance sufficient to cause death....

The execution shall be performed in the room or place by a person selected by the executive director and trained to administer intravenous injections. Death shall be pronounced by a licensed physician or a coroner according to accepted medical standards.

Oregon Code § 137.473: (1) the punishment of death shall be inflicted by the intravenous administration of a lethal quantity of an ultra-short-acting barbiturate in combination with a chemical paralytic agent and potassium chloride or other equally effective substances sufficient to cause death.... (2) The person who administers the lethal injection ... shall not thereby be considered to be engaged in the practice of medicine.

South Dakota Code § 23a-27a-32: The punishment of death shall be inflicted by the intravenous administration of a lethal quantity of an ultra-short-acting barbiturate in combination with a chemical paralytic agent and continuing the application thereof until the convict is pronounced dead by a licensed physician according to accepted standards of medical practice. An execution carried out by lethal injection shall be performed by a person selected by the warden and trained to administer the injection. The person administering the injection need not be a physician, registered nurse or licensed practical nurse.... Any infliction of the punishment of death by administration of the required lethal substance or substances in the manner required by this section may not be construed to be the practice of medicine and any pharmacist or pharmaceutical supplier is authorized to dispense the drugs to the warden without prescription, for carrying out the provisions of this section.

Two issues need to be highlighted regarding the above statutes. First, none of the statutes require that a medical professional administer the lethal drug. This issue has been a source of litigation by capital felons, who contend that the use of non-medical professionals increases the risk that death will be slow and agonizing.

A second matter involves the absence of a named ultra-short-acting barbiturate in the Oregon and South Dakota statutes. The Colorado statute designates (as an option) sodium thiopental as the lethal drug of choice. The majority of lethal injection jurisdictions follow Oregon and South Dakota in failing to name a specific lethal drug. This issue was litigated in Ex Parte Granviel, 561 S.W.2d 503 (Tex.Cr.App. 1978), where the defendant contended that failure to name a specific lethal drug made the death penalty statute vague and therefore constitutionally void. The defendant's position and the state's responses were set out in Granviel as follows:

[The defendant] argues it cannot be ascertained from the statute what substance or substances can be used in the injection and that the statute fails to offer any hint as to which substance or substances would be permissible. The State points out that the ... electrocution statutes throughout the United States have not prescribed the use of a chair, the amount of voltage, the volume of amperage, the place of attachment of electrodes, or whether or not AC or DC current shall be used. The earlier hanging statutes did not, the State argues, prescribe the type of gallows, the height of the fall, the type of rope or type of knot used, etc. Likewise, the State says, the laws relating to execution by firing squads did not specify the number of executioners, the muzzle velocity of the rifles, the type of bullets, or the distance of the guns to the condemned. The State urges the earlier execution statutes were never in any greater detail than the statute under attack and that none of them had been declared unconstitutional on the basis of being vague.

The Granviel court rejected the defendant's vagueness challenge and held:

While neither the exact substance to be injected nor the procedure surrounding the execution is expressly set forth in [the statute] we cannot conclude that failure to specify the exact substances and the procedure to be used render the statute unconstitutionally vague. The statute here, unlike penal statutes, was not intended to give fair notice of what specific behavior ... constitutes a criminal offense.... The context of the statute is a public statement of the general manner of execution. In this sense the statute is sufficiently definite....

So long as the statute is sufficiently complete to accomplish the regulation of the particular matters falling within the Legislature's jurisdiction, the matters of detail that are reasonably necessary for the ultimate application, operation and enforcement of the law may be expressly delegated to the authority charged with the administration of the statute.

The position of the Granviel court was not that the issue of the type of lethal drug used was irrelevant. The opinion acknowledged that the issue of the drug of choice was highly relevant and important. However, the court believed that the drug of choice was a matter that could be delegated to administrative officials to determine.

Constitutionality of Lethal Injection. Lethal

injection was devised as a method of execution because it is believed to be the most humane method of executing inmates. No attack on the constitutionality of lethal injection, per se, has ever succeeded. However, in two cases, Hill v. McDonough, 126 S.Ct. 2096 (2006), and Nelson v. Campbell, 541 U.S. 637 (2004), the United States Supreme Court allowed inmates to challenge the constitutionality of lethal injection in lower courts. Lethal injection has been criticized on various fronts as being an unacceptable method of execution. It has been argued that utilizing a needle to interject death can be painful and can necessitate surgery to impart the needle. It was reported that in a 1985 execution in Texas, it took a total of twenty-three attempts, covering a span of forty minutes, to inject the needle in a capital felon.

Next, it has been argued that the drugs used do not always induce a quick and painless death. When death comes slowly, it is contended that capital felons endure psychological trauma and in some instances physical pain.

The thorniest issue raised by opponents of lethal injection is that the drugs used have not been approved by the federal Food and Drug Administration (FDA) for the purpose in which they are being used. This issue was litigated in the United States Supreme Court in the case of Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821 (1985). The Supreme Court rejected the challenge on procedural grounds, thereby keeping the debate alive.

jection is brought into the execution chamber a few minutes prior to the appointed time of execution. The inmate is placed on a gurney and his or her wrists and ankles are then strapped to the gurney. A stethoscope and cardiac monitor leads are attached. Two sets of intravenous tubes are then inserted in each arm. Three commonly used drugs include sodium pentothal (puts the inmate to sleep); pavulon (stops one's breathing and paralyzes the muscular system); and potassium chloride (causes the heart to stop). The sodium pentothal is injected first to put the inmate into a deep sleep. When the inmate is sedated, the other drugs are introduced into his or her body. (Some jurisdictions only use two drugs.) When done properly, death by lethal injection is not painful and the inmate goes to sleep prior to the fatal effects of the pavulon and potassium chloride. *See also Execution Option Jurisdictions; Heckler v. Lewis v. Jeffers Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Lewis v. Jeffers, 497 U.S. 764 (1990); Argued: February 21, 1990; Decided: June 27, 1990; Opinion of the Court: Justice O'Connor; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Blackmun, in which Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens, JJ., joined; Dissenting Statement: Justice Brennan, in which Marshall, J., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: James S. Issue Presented: Whether the construction given to the statutory aggravating circumstance "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" was vague as applied to the defendant.

Case Holding: The construction given to the statutory aggravating circumstance "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" was not vague as applied to the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Jimmie Wayne Jeffers, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Arizona. On appeal to the Arizona Supreme Court, the defendant argued that the statutory aggravating circumstance used to impose the death penalty, murder committed in an "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner," was vague and unconstitutional. The appellate court rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court noted its recent ruling that the infliction of gratuitous violence on the victim is among the factors to be considered in determining whether the murder was especially heinous and depraved. It found the presence of this factor in light of evidence that the defendant had climbed on top of the dead victim and hit her in the face several times, causing additional wounds and bleeding. The appellate court noted further that the apparent relish with which the defendant committed the murder is another relevant factor under its decisions and concluded that the defendant's relish for his crime was evidenced by testimony that, while he was beating the dead victim, he called her a "bitch" and a "dirty snitch."

The defendant next filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The district court denied relief. A federal Court of Appeals granted relief to the defendant after finding that the

"especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" aggravating circumstance was unconstitutionally vague as applied to him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor ruled that the Court of Appeals erred in holding that the aggravating circumstance was vague. It was said that the construction given the aggravating circumstance by the State's appellate court was approved by the Court in Walton v. Arizona. The opinion stressed that if a State has adopted a constitutionally narrow construction of a facially vague aggravating circumstance and has applied that construction to the facts of the particular case, the fundamental constitutional requirement of channeling and limiting the capital sentencer's discretion has been satisfied. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun dissented from the majority opinion in the case. He believed that the majority was wrong in relying on the decision in Walton because, in his opinion, the Walton decision was wrongly decided. The dissent presented the argument as follows:

I think it is important that we be frank about what is happening here. The death penalty laws of many States establish aggravating circumstances similar to the one at issue in this case. Since the statutory language defining these factors does not provide constitutionally adequate guidance, the constitutionality of the aggravating circumstances necessarily depends on the construction given by the State's highest court. We have expressed apparent approval of a limiting construction requiring "torture or serious physical abuse." This Court has not held that this is the only permissible construction of an aggravating circumstance of this kind, but, prior to today, we have never suggested that the aggravating factor can permissibly be construed in a manner that does not make reference to the suffering of the victim. The decision today will likely result in the execution of numerous inmates, in Arizona and elsewhere, who would not otherwise be put to death. Yet neither in this case nor in Walton has the Court articulated any argument in support of its decision. Nor has the majority undertaken any examination of the way in which this aggravating circumstance has been applied by the Arizona Supreme Court. Instead, the Court relies on a conspicuous bootstrap. Five Members have joined the majority opinion in Walton, which in a single sentence asserts without explanation that the majority cannot "fault" the Arizona Supreme Court's construction of the statutory term "depraved." In the present case, the same five Members proclaim themselves to be bound by this scrap of dictum. In any context, this would be a poor excuse for constitutional adjudication. In a capital case, it is deeply disturbing....

The majority makes no effort to justify its holding that the Arizona Supreme Court has placed constitutionally sufficient limitations on its "especially heinous ... or depraved" aggravating circumstance. Instead, the Court relies entirely on a sentence of dictum from today's opinion in Walton—an opinion which itself offers no rationale in support of the Court's conclusion. The dissenting opinion in Walton notes the Court's increasing tendency to review the constitutional claims of capital defendants in a perfunctory manner, but the Court's action in this case goes far beyond anything that is there observed.

Arizona* as the basis for his dissent in this case. *See also Heinous, Atrocious, Cruel, or Depraved Aggravator; Maynard v. Cartwright; Richmond v. Lewis; Shell v. Mississippi; Stringer v. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant had a right to be present when jurors were selected for his trial.

Case Holding: The defendant had a right to be present when jurors were selected for his trial and a violation of that right invalidated his conviction and death sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Alexander Lewis, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. Federal jurisdiction was premised on the murder being committed on the lands of “the Cherokee Nation, in [Native American] country.” During the selection of jurors for the trial, the trial court created two lists containing the names of thirty-seven potential jurors. The trial court required the defendant and prosecutor to, independent of each other, make their “challenges” to the jury panel “and without knowledge on the part of either as to what challenges had been made by the other.” In his appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the defendant contended that his constitutional rights were violated by the method required for him to exercise his right to challenge potential jurors.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Shiras: Justice Shiras found that the defendant’s rights were violated by the method imposed for selecting jurors. It was said that a leading principle that pervaded the entire law of criminal procedure was that, after an indictment was returned, nothing may be done in the absence of the defendant. The opinion held: “It is the right of any one, when prosecuted on a capital or criminal charge, to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses; and it is within the scope of this right that he be present, not only when the jury are hearing his case, but at any subsequent stage when anything may be done in the prosecution by which he is to be affected.” Justice Shiras noted that “the record in a capital case must show affirmatively the prisoner’s presence in court, and that it was not allowable to indulge the presumption that everything was rightly done until the contrary appears.”

The opinion concluded: “We do not think that the record affirmatively discloses that the [defendant] and the jury were brought face to face at the time the challenges were made, but we think that a fair reading of the record leads to the opposite conclusion, and that the [defendant] was not brought face to face with the jury until after the challenges had been made and the selected jurors were brought into the box to be sworn. Thus reading the record, and holding, as we do, that making of challenges was an essential part of the trial, and that it was one of the substantial rights of the [defendant] to be brought face to face with the jurors at the time when the challenges were made, we are brought to the conclusion that the record discloses an error for which the judgment of the court must be reversed.” The judgment of the district court was therefore reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer dissented from the Court’s decision on the grounds that the record was insufficient for the Court to make a ruling on the issue presented. He wrote: “Where the question is as to the inferences to be drawn from a record, it is well to have its very language before us. The entire record bearing upon the matters in controversy consists of a single journal entry and a portion of the bill of exceptions.”

Dissenting Statement by Justice Brown: Justice Brown issued a statement indicating he dissented from the Court’s decision. See also Jury Selection Issue Presented: Whether the initial involuntary confession by the defendant tainted subsequent confessions, so as to preclude their use against the defendant.

Case Holding: The initial involuntary confession by the defendant tainted subsequent confessions, so as to preclude their use against the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Leyra, was arrested and charged with two capital murders by the State of New York. During his detention the defendant was interrogated extensively by police. The police brought in a psychiatrist with considerable knowledge of hypnosis and introduced to him to the defendant as a “doctor” brought in to give him medical relief from a painful sinus condition. By skillful and suggestive questioning, threats and promises, the psychiatrist obtained a confession. The police were able to obtain additional confessions to the same crimes after the psychiatrist left.

At trial, the prosecutor introduced the confession obtained by the psychiatrist. A jury convicted the defendant and he was sentenced to death. The New York Court of Appeals reversed the conviction on the ground that the confession was coerced. A second trial was held. At the second trial, the prosecutors introduced other confessions given to the police by the defendant. The defendant was again convicted and sentenced to death. The State’s appellate court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant then filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that the confessions used against him had been coerced. The district court denied relief. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black held: “The use of confessions extracted in such a manner from a lone defendant unprotected by counsel is not consistent with the due process of law required by the Constitution.” He rejected the contention that the confessions were not tainted by the confession obtained by the psychiatrist. Justice Black wrote:

The undisputed facts in this case are irreconcilable with [the defendant’s] mental freedom “to confess to or deny a suspected participation in a crime,” and the relation of the confessions made to the psychiatrist, the police captain and the state prosecutors is “so close that one must say the facts of one control the character of the other....” All were simply parts of one continuous process. All were extracted in the same place within a period of about five hours as the climax of days and nights of intermittent, intensive police questioning. First, an already physically and emotionally exhausted suspect's ability to resist interrogation was broken to almost trance-like submission by use of the arts of a highly skilled psychiatrist. Then the confession [the defendant] began making to the psychiatrist was filled in and perfected by additional statements given in rapid succession to a police officer, a trusted friend, and two state prosecutors. We hold that use of confessions extracted in such ... is not consistent with due process of law.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Minton, in Which Reed and Burton, JJ., Joined: Justice Minton dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the issue of the voluntariness of the confessions was a matter for the jury to decide. Justice Minton wrote:

We are now asked to hold that the later confessions were involuntary as a matter of law and that [the defendant] was denied due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment because the jury was allowed to consider the voluntariness of the subsequent confessions. It seems to me the very essence of due process to submit to a jury the question of whether these later confessions were tainted by the prior coercion and promises which led to the [initial] confession. I am familiar with no case in which this Court has ever held that an invalid confession ipso facto invalidates all subsequent confessions as a matter of law. It does not seem to me a denial of due process for the State to allow the jury to say, under all the facts and circumstances in evidence and under proper instructions by the court, whether the subsequent confessions were tainted or were free and voluntary.

Libya Capital punishment is allowed by Libya. The nation uses the firing squad and hanging to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Italian civil law and Islamic law. The nation's constitution was adopted on December 11, 1969. Libya has been ruled as a dictatorship by Colonel Mu'ammur Al-Qadhafi since 1969, when he led a military coup to overthrow the existing monarchy. In theory, Libya is ruled by its people through a series of popular congresses, but, in practice, Colonel Qadhafi and his inner circle control political power.

The judiciary is not independent of the government. The judicial system consists of trial courts, appellate courts, and a supreme court. Special revolutionary courts exist to try political offenses. Although defendants have the right to counsel in Libya, the private practice of law is illegal. All lawyers must be members of the Secretariat of Justice. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Life Imprisonment A defendant convicted of a capital offense does not have to be sentenced to death. The majority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide the alternative sentence of life imprisonment without parole, while a minority of jurisdictions permit the possibility of parole or a term of years.

There are several ways in which a convicted capital felon may receive a sentence other than death. First, the penalty phase factfinder may determine that the prosecutor failed to establish any statutory aggravating circumstances, in which case a sentence other than death is statutorily automatic. Second, the penalty phase factfinder, after finding at least one statutory aggravating circumstance exists, may nevertheless reject imposition of the death penalty and recommend or impose a sentence other than death. Third, the penalty phase factfinder may recommend the death penalty, but the trial judge may decide that based upon the evidence that a sentence other than death is appropriate. Finally, appellate courts may impose a sentence other than death, after finding an incurable prejudicial error occurred at the penalty phase when the capital felon was sentenced to death.

The argument has been made by capital felons, in life-imprisonment-without-parole jurisdictions, that they have a right to have the penalty phase jury informed that if they are sentenced to life imprisonment, instead of death, they will not be eligible for parole. Capital felons argue that such information is a valid non-statutory mitigating circumstance for the jury to consider and that the federal Constitution demands the penalty phase jury be informed about parole. Courts have responded, in general, that parole ineligibility is not a mitigating circumstance and, therefore, the federal Constitution does not require penalty phase juries be informed about parole ineligibility, absent the introduction of evidence of future dangerousness by the prosecutor. See also Parole Ineligibility Jury Instruction

LIFESPARK LIFESPARK is a non-profit organization located in Basel, Switzerland. The organization was founded in January 1993. The primary impetus for the creation of the organization may be gleaned from this statement provided by LIFESPARK:

Most of [the] world is moving swiftly toward complete rejection of the death penalty. But as country after country abolishes state-sanctioned killing, the USA continues to ignore this international trend. In a nation that many consider the standard bearer of human rights, over 3,500 men and women sit on death row. Nearly all of them are poor, many suffer from mental illness or mental retardation. A disproportionate number are people of color—some are innocent of the crimes for which they have been condemned to die.

The main initial focus of the group was on coordination of pen-friendship between death row inmates and European penals. The scope of the organization expanded over time and it now seeks to build a powerful organization of anti-death-penalty abolitionists. Internationally, LIFESPARK works with official humanitarian groups and religious bodies to develop and to promote anti-death-penalty activism. At the grassroots level, the organization has linked with individuals and humanitarian groups, establishing relationships to foster a worldwide abolition effect by informing people on all issues of capital punishment.

LIFESPARK has taken part in numerous international anti-death-penalty campaigns and initiatives. It has also set up a support team to make available general information about the death penalty and specific information on scheduled executions. It has initiated workshops, seminars, and visits to schools. LIFESPARK has made financial support and legal help available to inmates on death row and coordinated visits on death row.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to be confronted with the witnesses against him was violated by admitting into evidence, at the guilt phase, a non-testifying accomplice's confession that contained statements which accused the defendant of committing murder.

Case Holding: The defendant's Sixth Amendment right to be confronted with the witnesses against him was violated by admitting into evidence, at the guilt phase, a non-testifying accomplice's confession that contained statements which accused the defendant of committing murder.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Benjamin Lilly, was charged with capital murder in the commission of a robbery by the State of Virginia. Two accomplices, Mark Lilly (defendant's brother) and Gary Barker, were also charged in the crime. The three men had separate trials. During the guilt phase of the defendant's trial, the prosecutor called Mark Lilly as a witness against the defendant. Mark invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and refused to testify. Consequently, the prosecutor was allowed to introduce into evidence a written confession by Mark which implicated the defendant as the person who killed the robbery victim. Mark's confession was hearsay and inadmissible, but the trial court permitted its use under a hearsay exception for a declaration by an unavailable witness that is against the witness's penal interest. The jury convicted the defendant of capital murder and a sentence of death was imposed.

On appeal to the Virginia Supreme Court, the defendant argued that admission of Mark's confession violated the defendant's right to confront his accuser, as guaranteed under the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment. The appellate court rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Stevens Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens ruled that the admission of Mark's confession violated the defendant's Confrontation Clause rights. The opinion noted that the purpose of the Confrontation Clause is to ensure the reliability of evidence against a defendant by subjecting it to rigorous testing in a criminal trial through cross-examination of an adverse witness.

It was said that Mark's confession was inadmissible hearsay. The opinion pointed out that exceptions to the general exclusion of hearsay statements exist only where (1) the statements fall within a firmly rooted hearsay exception or (2) they contain particularized guarantees of trustworthiness such that adversarial testing would be expected to add little, if anything, to their reliability.

Justice Stevens indicated that hearsay statements are admissible under a firmly rooted hearsay exception when they fall within a hearsay category whose conditions have proven over time to remove all temptation to falsehood and to enforce as strict an adherence to the truth as would the obligation of an oath and cross-examination at a trial. One such firmly rooted hearsay exception involves statements that are against the declarant's penal or criminal interest. However, it was held that this exception cannot be extended to include admission of statements by an accomplice that shifts or spreads blame to a criminal defendant.

The opinion set aside the defendant's conviction and sentence and remanded the case for Virginia courts to consider whether the Confrontation Clause violation was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Breyer: Justice Breyer concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to articulate concerns he had with Confrontation Clause analysis and hearsay analysis. He stated in the concurrence:

As currently interpreted, the Confrontation Clause generally forbids the introduction of hearsay into a trial unless the evidence "falls within a firmly rooted hearsay exception" or otherwise possesses "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness."...

Viewed in light of its traditional purposes, the current, hearsay-based Confrontation Clause test ... is both too narrow and too broad. The test is arguably too narrow insofar as it authorizes the admission of out-of-court statements prepared as testimony for a trial when such statements happen to fall within some well-recognized hearsay rule exception....

At the same time, the current hearsay-based Confrontation Clause test is arguably too broad. It would make a constitutional issue out of the admission of any relevant hearsay statement, even if that hearsay statement is only tangentially related to the elements in dispute, or was made long before the crime occurred and without relation to the prospect of a future trial....

We need not reexamine the current connection between the Confrontation Clause and the hearsay rule in this case, however, because the statements at issue violate the Clause regardless.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia indicated in his concurrence that a classic Confrontation Clause violation occurred in the case. He emphasized: "Since the violation is clear, the case need be remanded only for a harmless-error determination."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas concurred in the Court's decision. His concurring opinion stressed his belief that the Confrontation Clause had limitations. He wrote: "Though I continue to adhere to my view that the Confrontation Clause 'extends to any witness who actually testifies at trial' and 'is implicated by extrajudicial statements only insofar as they are contained in formalized testimonial material, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions,' I [believe] ... that the Clause does not impose a 'blanket ban on the government's use of accomplice statements that incriminate a defendant.' Such an approach not only departs from an original understanding of the Confrontation Clause but also freezes our jurisprudence by making trial court decisions excluding such statements virtually unreviewable...."

Concurring Opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, in Which O'Connor and Kennedy, JJ., Joined: The chief justice concurred in the Court's judgment. He indicated that he was not prepared to give the Confrontation Clause the all-inclusive power intimated in the plurality opinion. The chief justice wrote: "This case ... does not raise the question whether the Confrontation Clause permits the admission of a genuinely self-inculpatory statement that also inculcates a codefendant.... A blanket ban on the government's use of accomplice statements that incriminate a defendant sweeps beyond this case's facts and this Court's precedents." Lincoln's Conspirators John Wilkes Booth was born in Bel Air, Maryland, in 1838. Between 1860 and 1863, Booth was a successful actor of Shakespearean roles. However, the Civil War turned his life away from acting and into a diabolical plan to help the Confederate cause.

In 1864, Booth entered into a conspiracy with several others to abduct President Abraham Lincoln. The kidnapping conspiracy quickly died, but Booth's determination to avenge the Confederates' likely loss of the war lived on. Eventually, Booth persuaded his conspirators to agree to killing President Lincoln, Vice President Andrew Johnson, Secretary of State William Seward, and General Ulysses S. Grant. The plan called for Secretary Seward and Vice President Johnson to be killed in their homes. President Lincoln and General Grant were to be killed during a theatrical performance at Ford's Theater in Washington, D.C.

On the night of April 14, 1865, less than a week after the South's surrender at Appomattox, Booth and his conspirators set their plan in motion. Secretary Seward was brutally attacked that evening in his home, but managed to survive. A conspirator stalked the residence of Vice President Johnson, but failed to make an attempt on his life. President Lincoln attended Ford's Theater, but General Grant did not. As the president sat in a box at the theater, Booth shot him through the head. The president died nine hours later. Booth managed to escape from the theater with a broken leg, but was captured twelve days later in a barn near Bowling Green, Virginia. Booth was shot while in the barn.

Immediately after the assassination, authorities arrested hundrreds of suspects. Eventually, authorities narrowed down the suspects to eight people: Mary Surratt, David Herold, Lewis Paine, George Atzerodt, Edman Spangler, Michael O'Laughlin, Samuel Arnold, and Dr. Samuel Mudd. On May 1, 1865, President Johnson ordered the formation of a military commission to prosecute the conspirators. Paine was charged with conspiracy and the attempted assassination of Secretary Seward. Herold was charged with conspiracy, leading Paine to Secretary Seward's home, and assisting Booth to allude capture. Atzerodt was charged with conspiring with to kill Vice President Johnson. Surratt was charged with conspiring with Booth and using her boardinghouse for the conspirators to meet. Dr. Mudd was charged with conspiring with Booth and with aiding him after his escape. Arnold was charged with being part of Booth's earlier plot to kidnap President Lincoln. O'Laughlin was also charged with conspiracy to kidnap the President. Spangler was charged with helping Booth escape from Ford's Theatre.

The trial began on May 10 and lasted until June 30. It was held at the Old Arsenal Penitentiary (present-day Fort McNair). Judge Advocate General Joseph Holt of the United States Army presided over the trial. All of the defendants were found guilty. Surratt, Paine, Herold, and Atzerodt were sentenced to death. Mudd, Arnold, and O'Laughlin received life sentences. Spangler was sentenced to six years' confinement. On July 7, 1865, Surratt, Paine, Herold, Atzerodt were hung by the neck until they were dead.

Lindbergh Kidnapping On the evening of March 1, 1932, twenty-month-old Charles Augustus Lindbergh, Jr., was kidnapped from the nursery on the second floor of his family's home near Hopewell, New Jersey. The child was the son of aviation pioneer and legend Charles Lindbergh and author Anne Morrow Lindbergh.

A ransom note demanding $50,000 was found on the nursery windowsill. The local police were contacted. The ransom was paid on the night of April 2, 1932, in a New York cemetery. However, on May 12, 1932, the child was found dead from a skull fracture. His body was discovered in a wooded area about four miles from the Lindbergh home. A two-year hunt for the murderer ensued. Eventually, the investigation was spearheaded by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Authorities got a break in the investigation a man purchased $5 worth of gas from a Manhattan service station. The money had a serial number that matched the one of the bills from the ransom money. An alert gas attendant named Walter Lyle wrote down the vehicle license plate number of the man who gave him the money. The car was traced to its owner, Bruno Richard Hauptmann. On September 19, 1934, Hauptmann was arrested by New York authorities. He was eventually extradited to New Jersey in 1935 to stand trial for murder.

Hauptmann was a thirty-five-year-old carpenter from Saxony, Germany. While in Germany, he developed a criminal record that included robbery and time in prison. He illegally entered the United States as a stowaway on a German ship on July 13, 1923. Hauptmann remained in the country as an undetected illegal alien. He married a waitress named Anna Schoeffler on October 10, 1925. In 1933, the couple gave birth to a son.

Bruno Richard Hauptmann was executed by the State of New Jersey on April 3, 1936. (New York City Police)

Hauptmann's trial began on January 3, 1935, in Flemington, New Jersey. The evidence against him was circumstantial but strong. Authorities found almost $14,000 from the ransom money in Hauptmann's garage. Shortly after the kidnapping, he quit his job as a carpenter and began investing large sums of money on the stock exchange. Tool marks on the ladder used to climb into the Lindbergh home matched tools owned by Hauptmann. Wood in the ladder was found to match wood used as flooring in his attic. The telephone number and address of the ransom delivery drop person were found scrawled on a doorframe inside a closet in his home. The handwriting on the ransom note matched samples of Hauptmann's handwriting. On February 13, 1935, the jury returned a verdict finding Hauptmann guilty of murder in the first degree. He was sentenced to death. On April 3, 1936, Hauptmann was electrocuted.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confessions were obtained and used in violation of the Constitution.

Case Holding: The defendant's confessions were not obtained or used in violation of the Constitution, even though the police used tactics that came close to the line of being constitutionally unacceptable.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Raymond Lisenba, also known as Robert James, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. The California Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his confessions were involuntary and therefore inadmissible at his trial. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Roberts: Justice Roberts held that the defendant's confessions were not obtained in violation of the Constitution, even though conduct used by the police in obtaining the confessions came close to the line of being constitutionally unacceptable. The opinion elaborated on due process principles involved in the use the confessions:

The gravamen of [the defendant's] complaint is the unfairness of the use of his confessions, and what occurred in their procurement is relevant only as it bears on that issue. On the other hand, the fact that the confessions have been conclusively adjudged by the decision below to be admissible under State law, notwithstanding the circumstances under which they were made, does not answer the question whether due process was lacking. The aim of the rule that a confession is inadmissible unless it was voluntarily made is to exclude false evidence. Tests are invoked to determine whether the inducement to speak was such that there is a fair risk the confession is false. These vary in the several states. This Court has formulated those which are to govern in trials in the federal courts. The Fourteenth Amendment leaves California free to adopt, by statute or decision, and to enforce such rule as she elects, whether it conform to that applied in the federal or in other state courts. But the adoption of the rule of her choice cannot foreclose inquiry as to whether, in a given case, the application of that rule works a deprivation of the [defendant's] life or liberty without due process of law. The aim of the requirement of due process is not to exclude presumptively false evidence, but to prevent fundamental unfairness in the use of evidence whether true or false. The criteria for decision of that question may differ from those appertaining to the State's rule as to the admissibility of a confession....

Like the Supreme Court of California, we disapprove the violations of law involved in the treatment of the [defendant], and we think it right to add that where a prisoner held incommunicado is subjected to questioning by officers for long periods, and deprived of the advice of counsel, we shall scrutinize the record with care to determine whether, by the use of his confession, he is deprived of liberty or life through tyrannical or oppressive means. Officers of the law must realize that if they indulge in such practices they may, in the end, defeat rather than further the ends of justice. Their lawless practices here took them close to the line. But on the facts as we [understood them], and in the light of the findings in the State courts, we cannot hold that the illegal conduct in which the law enforcement officers of California indulged by the prolonged questioning of the prisoner before arraignment, and in the absence of counsel, or their questioning ... coerced the confessions, the introduction of which is the infringement of due process of which the [defendant] complains. The [defendant] ... admits that no threats, promises, or acts of physical violence were offered him during this questioning or for eleven days preceding it. Counsel had been afforded full opportunity to see him and had advised him. He exhibited a self-possession, a coolness, and an acumen throughout his questioning, and at his trial, which negatives the view that he had so lost his freedom of action that the statements made were not his but were the result of the deprivation of his free choice to admit, to deny, or to refuse to answer.

The judgment of the California Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Black, in Which Douglas, J., Joined: Justice Black dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the confession was the result of coercion and compulsion. Justice Black outlined the facts upon which he dissented as follows:

Suspecting the defendant of murder they entered his home on Sunday, April 19, 1936, at 9 A.M. He was taken to a furnished house next door, in which the State's Attorney's office had installed a dictaphone. For the next forty-eight hours, or a little longer, the State's Attorney, his assistants, and investigators held James as their prisoner. He was so held not under indictment or warrant of arrest but by force. At about 4 A.M. Monday, one Southard, an investigator, "slapped" the defendant whose left ear was thereafter red and swollen. James was apparently kept at the State's Attorney's office during the daylight hours; the full extent to which he was questioned there is not clear. But on Monday and Tuesday nights, at the furnished house, with no one present but James and the officers, he was subjected to constant interrogation. The questioning officers divided themselves into squads, so that some could sleep while the others continued the questioning. The defendant got no sleep during the first forty-two hours after the officers seized him. And about 3:30 or 4 A.M. Tuesday morning, while sitting in the chair he occupied while being interrogated, at the very moment a question was being asked him, the defendant fell asleep. There he remained asleep until about 7 or 8 A.M. At about 11 A.M. the officers took him to jail and booked him on a charge of incest. During the entire forty-two hours defendant was held, he repeatedly denied any complicity in or knowledge of the murder of his wife.

The second episode during which the officers held defendant incommunicado, and which produced the confession, was on May 2 and in the early hours of May 3. About 11 A.M. on May 2 an investigator for the District Attorney took James from his cell to the chaplain's room of the jail. In the presence of an Assistant District Attorney he was confronted by [an accomplice] and told that [the accomplice] had made a confession implicating James in his wife's murder. James refused to talk and was then carried back to his cell. A short time later, under a purported order of court, the nature or authority of which does not appear, James was taken from the jail to his home, and then somewhere between 1 and 4 P.M. to the District Attorney's office. The doors were locked. From then until about midnight the District Attorney, his Assistants, and investigators, subjected James to constant interrogation. Upon asking for his attorney, James was told he was out of the city. He then asked for another but whatever efforts the officers made to satisfy this request were unsuccessful. He was again confronted with [the accomplice] but neither this nor the questioning had elicited an admission of any nature by midnight. At that time, according to the investigators, James said to one of them, "Can't we go out and get something to eat — if you fellows will take me out to eat now, I will tell you the story." He was taken out to eat by some of the officers, remained about an hour and a half, while at the restaurant made damaging admissions, and upon his return to the District Attorney's office, made the full statement which was used to bring about his conviction, completing it at about 3 A.M.

Literary Depictions of Capital Punishment The print media has a long history of informing the American public about capital punishment. Hundreds of thousands of books have appeared which depict capital punishment from all perspectives. Such depictions include fictional and nonfictional accounts of capital punishment.

One of the areas most frequently written on is that of the actual life and murders of capital felons. Historically, the public has had an unquenchable thirst for reading about the personalities that end up on death row. To some extent, literary tales of the life and times of capital felons has created a unique fraternity of celebrities. Executed death row inmates like Stanley "Tookie" Williams, Danny Rolling, John Wayne Gacy, and Aileen Wuornos garnered a flock of supporters and followers as a result of literary accounts of the capital crimes they were sentenced to death for committing.

Livingston, Henry B. Henry B. Livingston served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1807 to 1823. While on the Supreme Court, Livingston was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Livingston was born in New York City on November 25, 1757. He was educated at Princeton and was admitted to the New York bar in 1783. Livingston maintained a private legal practice for a number of years before being appointed a judge on the New York Supreme Court. In 1807, President Thomas Jefferson appointed Livingston to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Livingston was known to have written only one capital punishment opinion. The case of United States v. Smith presented a certified question from a federal trial court. The question presented was whether the defendant could be punished with death under the Piracy Act for plundering a ship. The majority in Smith answered the question affirmatively. Livingston wrote a dissenting opinion. He argued that the Piracy Act provision under review violated the Constitution because it defined piratical acts to mean anything that was on the law books involving the law of nations. Livingston died on March 18, 1823.

Local Government Executions Prior to the late 1800s, all executions were carried out by local government officials, such as county sheriffs. A movement was begun in the late 1800s to place the authority of carrying out executions exclusively in control of the State. This movement slowly swept the country until all jurisdictions placed responsibility for carrying out executions with the State (and federal government). Under modern capital punishment law, no local government has authority to execute any prisoner. See also McNulty v. California; Public Viewing of Execution

Issue Presented: Whether Ohio's death penalty statute violated the Constitution by limiting the sentencer's discretion to consider the circumstances of the crime and the record and character of the capital offender as mitigating factors.

Case Holding: The limited range of mitigating circumstances that may be considered by the sentencer under the Ohio death penalty statute violates the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Sandra Lockett, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by an Ohio court. The defendant appealed and argued, among other matters, that Ohio's death penalty statute did not give the penalty phase three-judge panel a full opportunity to consider mitigating circumstances in capital cases as required by the federal Constitution. The Ohio Supreme Court rejected the claim and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the case.

Plurality Opinion in Which Chief Justice Burger Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Stewart, Powell, and Stevens JJ., Joined: The plurality opinion pointed out that the Ohio death penalty statute limited mitigating circumstances that could be considered at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution to only the three factors specified in the statute and, once it is determined that none of those factors is present, the statute mandates the death sentence. The chief justice explained that the need for treating each defendant in a capital case with the degree of respect due the uniqueness of the individual is far more important than in non-capital cases, particularly in view of the unavailability of such post-conviction mechanisms in non-capital cases as probation, parole, and work furloughs.

The opinion concluded: "There is no perfect procedure for deciding in which cases governmental authority should be used to impose death. But a statute that prevents the sentencer in all capital cases from giving independent mitigating weight to aspects of the defendant's character and record and to circumstances of the offense proffered in mitigation creates the risk that the death penalty will be imposed in spite of factors which may call for a less severe penalty. When the choice is between life and death, that risk is unacceptable and incompatible with the commands of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments." The judgment of the Ohio Supreme Court, insofar as affirming the death sentence, was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun wrote in his concurrence that he "would reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ohio insofar as it upheld the imposition of the death penalty on [the defendant], but [he] would do so for a reason more limited than that which the plurality espouses, and for an additional reason not relied upon by the plurality."

The concurring opinion indicated that the death sentence should have been reversed on the grounds that (1) the Ohio death penalty statute was deficient in regard to the defendant, insofar as excluding consideration of her limited role in the crime as an aider and abettor, and (2) the criminal procedure rules of Ohio improperly gave the sentencing court full discretion to bar the death sentence in the interests of justice if a defendant pleads guilty or no contest, but no such discretion is given if the defendant goes to trial.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall concurred in the Court's judgment by indicating his longstanding belief that the Constitution prohibits imposition of the death penalty. He also added: "When a death sentence is imposed under the circumstances presented here, I fail to understand how any of my Brethren — even those who believe that the death penalty is not wholly inconsistent with the Constitution — can disagree that it must be vacated. Under the Ohio death penalty statute, this [defendant] was sentenced to death for a killing that she did not actually commit or intend to commit. She was convicted under a theory of vicarious liability. The imposition of the death penalty for this crime totally violates the principle of proportionality embodied in the Eighth Amendment's prohibition."

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice White: Justice White concurred in the Court's judgment on the basis "that it violates the Eighth Amendment to impose the penalty of death without a finding that the defendant possessed a purpose to cause the death of the victim." Justice White dissented from the plurality's conclusion "that the sentencer may constitutionally impose the death penalty only as an exercise of his unguided discretion after being presented with all circumstances which the defendant might believe to be conceivably relevant to the appropriateness of the penalty for the individual offender."

Justice White reasoned in dissent that "the effect of the Court's decision today will be to compel constitutionally a restoration of the state of affairs at the time Furman was decided, where the death penalty is imposed so erratically and the threat of execution is so attenuated for even the most atrocious murders that 'its imposition would then be the pointless and needless extinction of life with only marginal contributions to any discernible social or public purposes.' By requiring as a matter of constitutional law that sentencing authorities be permitted to consider and in their discretion to act upon any and all mitigating circumstances, the Court permits them to refuse to impose the death penalty no matter what the circumstances of the crime. This invites a return to the pre-Furman days when the death penalty was generally reserved for those very few for whom society has least consideration.”

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist concurred with the Court’s resolution of unmerited and non-dispositive issues in the case that were decided against the defendant (not reproduced or discussed here). He dissented with the Court’s decision to vacate the death sentence on the basis of the restriction Ohio’s death penalty statute placed on mitigating circumstances. He wrote: “Since all of [the defendant’s] claims appear to me to be without merit, I would affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ohio.”

Case Note: The decision in this case has had a tremendous impact on the penalty phase of capital prosecutions. The effect of the decision was to allow capital felons to introduce all relevant evidence at the penalty phase. Courts cannot exclude or limit any relevant mitigating evidence proffered by capital felons at the penalty phase, because under the decision in this case, to do so would violate the Constitution. In subsequent decisions, the Court has made clear that capital felons do not have a constitutional right to introduce or have the penalty phase jury instructed on non-relevant mitigating evidence. *See also Bell v. Issue Presented: Whether defense counsel’s failure to make an objection at the defendant’s sentencing proceeding — an objection that would have been supported by a decision which subsequently was overruled — constituted prejudice within the meaning of Strickland v. Washington.

Case Holding: Because the law which formed the basis of the defendant’s ineffective assistance claim was overruled, so that the complained of deficient performance of his counsel no longer existed, the defendant suffered no prejudice from the deficient performance within the meaning of Strickland v. Washington.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Bobby Ray Fretwell, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Arkansas. After exhausting State post-conviction remedies, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The defendant alleged ineffective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase of his trial, on the grounds that his attorney did not object to the use of a statutory aggravating circumstance that was also used at the guilt phase as part of the capital offense. At the time of the defendant’s trial, a federal court had found such duplication unconstitutional (that decision was later overruled). The district court granted habeas relief to the defendant, after concluding his counsel’s failure to raise the objection amounted to prejudice under the United States Supreme Court decision in Strickland v. Washington. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the district court’s decision. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice ruled that defense counsel’s failure to make the complained of objection during the sentencing proceeding did not constitute prejudice within the meaning of Strickland. The opinion noted that, under Strickland, ineffective assistance of counsel requires proof of (1) deficient performance and (2) resulting prejudice. It was said that, to show prejudice under Strickland, a defendant must demonstrate that counsel’s errors are so serious as to deprive him or her of a trial whose result is unfair or unreliable, not merely that the outcome would have been different. The chief justice reasoned that unfairness or unreliability did not result unless defense counsel’s ineffectiveness deprives the defendant of a substantive or procedural right to which the law entitles him or her. It was said that the defendant’s sentencing proceeding was neither unfair nor unreliable, because the case in which he relied to show that his attorney had a basis to make an objection was overruled. Therefore, the defendant suffered no prejudice from his counsel’s deficient performance.

The opinion rejected the defendant’s argument that prejudice is determined under the laws existing at the time of trial. The chief justice wrote that although contemporary assessment of defense counsel’s conduct is used when determining the deficient performance component of the Strickland test, the prejudice component was not dependent upon analysis under the law existing at the time of the deficient performance. The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O’Connor: Justice O’Connor concurred in the Court’s decision. She believed that the defendant’s claim had merit during his trial, because a judicial opinion existed at that time which supported an objection to the duplication of guilt phase offense elements with penalty phase statutory aggravating circumstances. However, she agreed with the Court’s opinion that the force of the defendant’s argument was lost because the judicial decision upon which the defendant relied was overruled, so that the complained of duplication was now constitutionally valid.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas concurred in the Court’s decision. He indicated that the Court of Appeals wrongly based its decision on the belief that the courts of Arkansas would have been bound to follow the lower federal court decision that had previously found unconstitutional the duplication of guilt phase offense elements with penalty phase aggravating circumstances. Justice Thomas wrote as follows: “The Supremacy Clause demands that state law yield to federal law, but neither federal supremacy nor any other principle of federal law requires that a state court’s interpretation of federal law give way to a (lower) federal court’s interpretation. In our federal system, a state trial court’s interpretation of federal law is no less authoritative than that of the federal court of appeals in whose circuit the trial court is located. An Arkansas trial court is bound by this Court’s (and by the Arkansas Supreme Court’s and Arkansas Court of Appeals’) interpretation of federal law, but if it follows [a federal court of appeals’] interpretation of federal law, it does so only because it chooses to, and not because it must.”

in the case. He argued against the Court's the new construction of the prejudice component of the Strickland test. Justice Stevens also indicated that he disapproved of the Court's creation of the new rule under Strickland, when all of the Court's precedents held that new constitutional rules would not be created or applied to capital cases that became final before the new rule was created. He believed the Court was using a double standard in which the bar against retroactive application of a new rule applied to capital defendants, but did not apply to governments. See also Right to Counsel

Issue Presented: Whether a federal court may deny a stay of execution and dismiss a first federal habeas petition for general equitable reasons.

Case Holding: A federal court may not deny a stay of execution and dismiss a first federal habeas petition for general equitable reasons.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Larry Grant Lonchar, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Georgia. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence on direct appeal. The defendant subsequently filed a State habeas corpus petition, but had it withdrawn and dismissed. Shortly before his scheduled execution, the defendant filed another State habeas petition, which was denied. The defendant then filed his first habeas petition in a federal district court. The State argued against the district court entering a stay of execution in the case, on the grounds that the defendant waited six years to file his first federal habeas petition. The district court issued the stay pending review of the petition, after determining that the Federal Habeas Corpus Rules permitted entry of the stay. A federal Court of Appeals reversed, on the grounds that equitable doctrines of fairness in the case, and not the Federal Habeas Corpus Rules, applied. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Breyer: Justice Breyer held that the Court of Appeals erred in denying the stay and dismissing the defendant's petition for special ad hoc equitable reasons. It was said that under the Court's decision in Barefoot v. Estelle, the general rule is that when a district court is faced with a request for a stay in a first federal habeas case, if the district court cannot dismiss the petition on the merits before the scheduled execution, it is obligated to address the merits and must issue a stay to prevent the case from becoming moot.

The opinion pointed out that Rule 9 of the Federal Habeas Corpus Rules permits dismissal of a first habeas petition, if the prosecuting authority has been prejudiced in its ability to respond due to the delay in filing the petition. It was noted that the district court was not asked to, and did not, make a finding of prejudice in the case under Rule 9. It was concluded that the case should have been examined within the framework of the Federal Habeas Corpus Rules, not according to generalized equitable considerations outside that framework. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, in Which Scalia, Kennedy, and Thomas, JJ., Joined: The chief justice concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to note that he believed the Court's opinion confused the issue presented. The chief justice stated that the case involved in order reversing a stay of execution and not dismissal of a petition for habeas relief.

Case Note: Larry Grant Lonchar was executed by electrocution on November 14, 1996, by the State of Georgia. See also Stay of Execution; Barefoot v. Estelle; Habeas Corpus Procedural Rules

Louisiana The State of Louisiana is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on July 2, 1973.

Louisiana has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Louisiana Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and seven associate justices. The Louisiana Courts of Appeal are divided into five circuits. Each circuit has a chief judge and at least seven judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Louisiana are tried in the district courts.

Louisiana's capital punishment offenses are set out under La. Code tit. 14 § 30. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

(1) When the offender has specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm and is engaged in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of aggravated kidnapping, second-degree kidnapping, aggravated escape, aggravated arson, aggravated rape, forcible rape, aggravated burglary, armed robbery, assault by drive-by shooting, first-degree robbery, second-degree robbery, simple robbery, terrorism, cruelty to juveniles, or second-degree cruelty to juveniles.

(2) When the offender has a specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm upon a fireman, peace officer, or civilian employee of the Louisiana State Police Crime Laboratory or any other forensic laboratory engaged in the performance of his lawful duties, or when the specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm is directly related to the victim's status as a fireman, peace officer, or civilian employee.

(3) When the offender has a specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm upon more than one person.

(4) When the offender has specific intent to kill or inflict great bodily harm and has offered, has been offered, has given, or has received anything of value for the killing.

(5) When the offender has the specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm upon a victim under the age of twelve or sixty-five years of age or older.

(6) When the offender has the specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm while engaged in the distribution, exchange, sale, or purchase, or any attempt thereof, of a controlled dangerous substance.

(7) When the offender has specific intent to kill and is engaged in ritualistic activities.

(8) When the offender has specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm and there has been issued by a judge or magistrate any lawful order prohibiting contact between the offender and the victim in response to threats of physical violence or harm which was served on the offender and is in effect at the time of the homicide.

(9) When the offender has specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm upon a victim who was a witness to a crime or was a member of the immediate family of a witness to a crime committed on a prior occasion and: (a) the killing was committed for the purpose of preventing or influencing the victim's testimony in any criminal action or proceeding whether or not such action or proceeding had been commenced; or (b) the killing was committed for the purpose of exacting retribution for the victim's prior testimony.

Capital murder in Louisiana is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Louisiana is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to sentence the defendant to life imprisonment without parole. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Louisiana.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under La. Code Cr.P.Art. 905.4 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The offender was engaged in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of aggravated rape, forcible rape, aggravated kidnapping, second-degree kidnapping, aggravated burglary, aggravated arson, aggravated escape, assault by drive-by shooting, armed robbery, first-degree robbery, second-degree robbery, simple robbery, cruelty to juveniles, second-degree cruelty to juveniles, or terrorism.

2. The victim was a fireman, constable, marshal, deputy marshal, sheriff, deputy sheriff, local or state policeman, commissioned wildlife enforcement agent, federal law enforcement officer, jail or prison guard, parole officer, probation officer, judge, attorney general, assistant attorney general, attorney general's investigator, district attorney, assistant district attorney, or district attorney's investigator engaged in his lawful duties.

3. The offender has been previously convicted of an unrelated murder, aggravated rape, aggravated burglary, aggravated arson, aggravated escape, armed robbery, or aggravated kidnapping.

4. The offender knowingly created a risk of death or great bodily harm to more than one person.

5. The offender offered or has been offered or has given or received anything of value for the commission of the offense.

6. The offender at the time of the commission of the offense was imprisoned after sentence for the commission of an unrelated forcible felony.

7. The offense was committed in an especially heinous, atrocious or cruel manner.

8. The victim was a witness in a prosecution against the defendant, gave material assistance to the state in any investigation or prosecution of the defendant, or was an eyewitness to a crime alleged to have been committed by the defendant or possessed other material evidence against the defendant.

9. The victim was a correctional officer or any employee of the Department of Public Safety and Corrections who, in the normal course of his employment was required to come in close contact with persons incarcerated in a state prison facility, and the victim was engaged in his lawful duties at the time of the offense.

10. The victim was under the age of twelve years or sixty-five years of age or older.

11. The offender was engaged in the distribution, exchange, sale, or purchase, or any attempt thereof, of a controlled dangerous substance.

12. The offender was engaged in ritualistic activities.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Louisiana has provided La. Code Cr.P.Art. 905.5 the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

a. The offender has no significant prior history of criminal activity;

b. The offense was committed while the offender was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance;

c. The offense was committed while the offender was under the influence or under the domination of another person;

d. The offense was committed under circumstances which the offender reasonably believed to provide a moral justification or extenuation for his conduct;

e. At the time of the offense the capacity of the offender to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was impaired as a result of mental disease or defect or intoxication;

f. The youth of the offender at the time of the offense;

g. The offender was a principal whose participation was relatively minor;

h. Any other relevant mitigating circumstance.

Under Louisiana's capital punishment statute, the Louisiana Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Louisiana uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Angola, Louisiana, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in St. Gabriel, Louisiana.

Pursuant to the laws of Louisiana, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor must obtain the consent of the State's Board of Pardons in order to grant clemency.

Under the laws of Louisiana, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by La. Code tit. 15 § 570:

A. Every execution of the death sentence shall take place in the presence of:

1. The warden of the Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola, or a competent person selected by him.

2. The coroner of the parish of West Feliciana, or his deputy.

3. A physician summoned by the warden of the Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola.

4. The operator of the electric chair, who shall be a competent electrician, who shall have not been previously convicted of a felony, or a competent person selected by the warden of the Louisiana State Penitentiary to administer the lethal injection.

5. A priest or minister of the gospel, if the convict so requests it.

6. Not less than five nor more than seven other witnesses, all citizens of the state of Louisiana.

B. No person under the age of eighteen years shall be allowed within the execution room during the time of execution.

C. Notwithstanding any other provision of law to the contrary, every execution of the death sentence shall take place between the hours of 6:00 P.M. and 9:00 P.M.

D. (1) The secretary of the Department of Public Safety and Corrections shall, at least ten days prior to the execution, either give written notice or verbal notice, followed by written notice placed in the United States mail within five days thereafter, of the date and time of execution to the victim's parents, or guardian, spouse, and any adult children who have indicated to the secretary that they desire such notice. The secretary, in such notice, shall give the named parties the option of attending the execution.

(2) The victim's parents or guardian, spouse, and any adult children who desire to attend the execution shall, within three days of their receipt of the secretary's notification, notify, either verbally or in writing, the secretary's office of their intention to attend. The number of victim relationship witnesses may be limited to two. If more than two of the aforementioned parties desire to attend the execution, then the secretary is authorized to select, from the interested parties, the two victim relationship witnesses who will be authorized to attend. In the case of multiple victims' families, the secretary shall determine the number of witnesses, subject to the availability of appropriate physical space.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Louisiana executed twenty-seven capital felons.

During this period, Louisiana did not execute any female capital felons, although one of its death row inmates during this period was a female. A total of eighty-seven capital felons were on death row in Louisiana as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as fifty-five black inmates, twenty-nine white inmates, two Hispanic inmates, and one Asian inmate.

Issue Presented: Whether the doctrine of separation of powers required that Congress, and not the president, make the policy determination respecting the aggravating factors that warrant the death penalty in military prosecutions.

Case Holding: The doctrine of separation of powers did not require that Congress, instead of the president, make the policy determination respecting the aggravating factors that warrant the death penalty in military prosecutions.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Dwight J. Loving, was convicted of capital murder at a general military court martial and sentenced to death. The military commander who convened the court martial approved the conviction and sentence. At the appellate level, the United States Army Court of Military Review and the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces affirmed the conviction and sentence. The military appellate courts rejected the defendant's contention that Congress's grant of authority to the president to promulgate aggravating circumstances that allowed imposition of the death penalty violated the constitutional separation of powers doctrine. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: The initial matter

Justice Kennedy addressed was the application of Furman v. Georgia and its progeny to military capital punishment. It was said that counsel for the military did not contest the application of the Court's death penalty jurisprudence to court martials, at least in the context of a conviction for capital murder committed in peacetime within the United States. Justice Kennedy concluded the Court would assume, without deciding, that Furman and the case law resulting from it were applicable to the offense and sentence in the case. With the "assumption" in place, Justice Kennedy held that, under the Eighth Amendment, the military capital sentencing scheme must genuinely narrow the class of persons eligible for the death penalty and must reasonably justify the imposition of a more severe sentence on a defendant compared to others found guilty of murder. It was found that the constitutional narrowing was not achieved in the statute authorizing capital punishment for murder. However, it was found that the aggravating circumstances promulgated by the president satisfied the constitutional narrowing of the class of military defendants subject to capital punishment for murder.

In turning to the issue of the constitutional legitimacy of the president to promulgate aggravating circumstances used to impose the death penalty, Justice Kennedy held that the president's congressionally authorized power to promulgate aggravating factors did not violate the separation of powers doctrine. The opinion pointed out that, under the separation of powers doctrine, the federal lawmaking function belonged to Congress and could not be conveyed to another branch of government. Justice Kennedy stated that the separation of powers doctrine did not mean, however, that only Congress could make a rule of prospective force. It was said that although Congress could not delegate the power to make laws, Congress may delegate to others the authority or discretion to execute the law under and in pursuance of its terms. The opinion rejected the defendant's argument that Congress lacked power to delegate to the president the authority to prescribe aggravating factors in military capital murder cases. Justice Kennedy concluded that "it would be contrary to the respect owed the President as Commander in Chief to hold that he may not be given wide discretion and authority. Thus, in the circumstances presented here, Congress may delegate authority to the President to define the aggravating factors that permit imposition of a statutory penalty, with the regulations providing the narrowing of the death-eligible class that the Eighth Amendment requires." The judgment of the Court of Appeals of the Armed Forces was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens concurred in the Court's opinion and judgment. He wrote separately to underscore that the victims in the case were connected to the military and that the Court was not deciding that the same constitutional standards would apply for capital military prosecutions where the victim was not connected to the military. Justice Stevens indicated: "The question whether a 'service connection' requirement should obtain in capital cases is an open one."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which O'Connor, J., Joined: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's judgment. He wrote separately to express his view that the Court's opinion should not have made comparisons to "the historical sharing of power between Parliament and the English throne." Justice Scalia indicated that because England does not have a written consti-tion, "[o]ur written Constitution does not require us to trace out that history."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas concurred in the Court's judgment. He wrote separately to point out his belief that the defendant did not present a legitimate issue, because the Court has never held that its constitutional capital punishment jurisprudence applied to military capital punishment. Justice Thomas wrote: "It is not clear to me that the extensive rules we have developed under the Eighth Amendment for the prosecution of civilian capital cases, including the requirement of proof of aggravating factors, necessarily apply to capital prosecutions in the military and this Court has never so held. I am therefore not certain that this case even raises a delegation question, for if Loving can constitutionally be sentenced to death without proof of aggravating factors, he surely cannot claim that the President violated the Constitution by promulgating aggravating factors that afforded more protection than that to which Loving is constitutionally entitled."

Case Note: The commentary written on this case has emphasized the Court's delicate balance in not encroaching upon the authority of the military to enforce its capital punishment laws. The Court was able to walk this type rope by "assuming without deciding." That its constitutional capital jurisprudence applied to the military for the purposes of the disposing of the case. See also Burns v. Wilson; Military Death Penalty Law

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution prohibits use of a guilt phase death-eligible special circumstance as a penalty phase statutory aggravating circumstance.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not prohibit use of a guilt phase death-eligible special circumstance as a penalty phase statutory aggravating circumstance.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Leslie Lowenfield, was charged with killing five people by the State of Louisiana. The death-eligible special circumstance of the offenses was the "intent to kill or inflict great bodily harm upon more than one person." The jury returned guilty verdicts on three counts of first-degree murder. At the penalty phase, the statutory aggravating circumstance relied upon by the prosecutor was "knowingly creating a risk of death or great bodily harm to more than one person." The penalty phase jury returned three death sentences after finding the existence of the statutory aggravating circumstance.

On appeal to the Louisiana Supreme Court, the defendant argued that the guilt phase death-eligible special circumstance was the same factor used to impose the death sentences at the penalty phase and that such duplication violated the federal Constitution. The appellate court disagreed and affirmed the convictions and sentences. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court seeking relief on the grounds asserted in State court. The district court denied relief and dismissed the petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice ruled that the Constitution did not prevent use of the guilt phase death-eligible special circumstance as a penalty phase statutory aggravating circumstance. The opinion reasoned as follows:

The use of "aggravating circumstances" is not an end in itself, but a means of genuinely narrowing the class of death-eligible persons and thereby channeling the jury's discretion. We see no reason why this narrowing function may not be performed by jury findings at either the sentencing phase of the trial or the guilt phase....

It seems clear to us ... that the narrowing function required for a regime of capital punishment may be provided in either of these two ways: the legislature may itself narrow the definition of capital offenses, as ... Louisiana has done, so that the jury finding of guilt responds to this concern, or the legislature may more broadly define capital offenses and provide for narrowing by jury findings of aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase....

Here, the "narrowing function" was performed by the jury at the guilt phase when it found the defendant guilty of three counts of murder under the provision that "the offender has a specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm upon more than one person." The fact that the sentencing jury is also required to find the existence of an aggravating circumstance in addition is no part of the constitutionally required narrowing process, and so the fact that the aggravating circumstance duplicated one of the elements of the crime does not make this sentence constitutionally infirm. There is no question but that the Louisiana scheme narrows the class of death-eligible murderers and then at the sentencing phase allows for the consideration of mitigating circumstances and the exercise of discretion. The Constitution requires no more.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented from the majority opinion. He believed that the Constitution prohibited States from duplicating guilt phase death-eligible special circumstances in the guise of penalty phase statutory aggravating circumstances. The dissent stated its argument as follows:

Adhering to my view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, I would vacate the decision below insofar as it left undisturbed the death sentence imposed in this case.

Even if I did not hold this view, I would vacate [the defendant's] sentence.... [T]he jury's sentence of death could not stand because it was based on a single statutory aggravating circumstance that duplicated an element of [the defendant's] underlying offense. This duplication prevented Louisiana's sentencing scheme from adequately guiding the discretion of the sentencing jury in this case and relieved the jury of the requisite sense of responsibility for its sentencing decision. As we have recognized frequently in the past, such failings may have the effect of impermissibly biasing the sentencing process in favor of death in violation of the Eighth and the Fourteenth Amendments....

In sum, the application of the Louisiana sentencing scheme in cases like this one, where there is a complete overlap between aggravating circumstances found at the sentencing phase and elements of the offense previously found at the guilt phase, violates constitutional principles in ways that will inevitably tilt the sentencing scales toward the imposition of the death penalty. The State will have an easier time convincing a jury beyond a reasonable doubt to find a necessary element of a capital offense at the guilt phase of a trial if the jury is unaware that such a finding will make the defendant eligible for the death penalty at the sentencing phase. Then the State will have an even easier time arguing for the imposition of the death penalty, because it can remind the jury at the sentencing phase, as it did in this case, that the necessary aggravating circumstances already have been established beyond a reasonable doubt. The State thus enters the sentencing hearing with the jury already across the threshold of death eligibility, without any awareness on the jury's part that it had crossed that line. By permitting such proceedings in a capital case, the Court ignores our early pronouncement that "a State may not entrust the determination of whether a man should live or die to a tribunal organized to return a verdict of death."

Case Note: The majority decision in the case had a tremendous impact on the creation of guilt phase death-eligible special circumstances that formed the basis of penalty phase statutory aggravating circumstances. Commentators have argued that the rate of death sentences returned by juries support Justice Marshall's dissenting argument, that such duplication unconstitutionally tilts the scales toward imposition of the death penalty.

Lundgren, Jeffrey see Ohio Cult Murders

Lurton, Horace H. Horace H. Lurton served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1910 to 1914. While on the Supreme Court, Lurton was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Lurton was born on February 26, 1844, in Newport, Kentucky. He received a law degree from Tennessee's Cumberland University Law School in 1867. In addition to having a successful private practice in Tennessee, Lurton was elected to the Tennessee Supreme Court in 1886. He also accepted an appointment as an appellate judge for the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals and served as dean of Vanderbilt University Law School. In 1910, President William Howard Taft nominated Lurton to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Lurton was known to have authored only one capital punishment opinion. In Wynne v. United States, the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether the United States had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for murder committed in a harbor of the Territory of Hawaii. Lurton, writing for the Court, held that the United States had jurisdiction over the offense. He wrote: "Unless, therefore, there was something in the legislation of Congress ... providing a government for the territory of Hawaii, which excluded the operation of [federal law], the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over the bay here in question, in respect of the murder there charged to have been committed, was beyond question." Lurton died on July 12, 1914.

Luxembourg Capital punishment was abolished in Luxembourg in 1979. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Lying-in-Wait Aggravator The common law recognized murder committed while lying in wait. The crime requires that a perpetrator secretly ambush an unsuspecting victim. Under modern capital punishment law, four jurisdictions, California, Colorado, Indiana, and Montana, have made murder committed while lying in wait a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, if it is shown at the penalty phase that a murder was committed while the defendant was lying in wait, the death penalty may be imposed. See also Aggravating Circumstances

MacArthur Justice Center The MacArthur Justice Center (MJC) is a nonprofit public interest law firm that was formerly based at the University of Chicago Law School, but is now headquartered at the Northwestern University School of Law. MJC is dedicated to fighting for human rights and social justice through litigation, with a particular emphasis on criminal cases that raise constitutional or other significant issues. MJC has been particularly active in capital cases. One of its attorneys represented and ultimately won the release of a death row inmate who was scheduled to be the first person executed in Illinois since 1962. MJC has submitted amicus briefs in several Illinois capital cases. The organization also played a leading role in bringing about the decision of Illinois Governor George Ryan to impose a moratorium of the death penalty in 2000 and his decision to commute the death sentences of all death row inmates in 2003. See also Ryan, George Homer McCarty, Henry Henry “Billy the Kid” McCarty (also known as William H. Bonney) was born on November 23, 1859, in New York City. In the 1870s, McCarty moved to Lincoln County, New Mexico. While in New Mexico, McCarty hired on as a cowboy for a cattle rancher named J. H. Tunstall. In February 1878, Tunstall was murdered by a rival cattle rancher. Tunstall’s death started what became known as the Lincoln County War.

McCarty was one of the leading players in the Lincoln County War. During a three-day shootout in July 1878, McCarty shot to death Sheriff Bill Brady, who was trying to stop the shootout. McCarty fled the area after killing the sheriff.

In 1880, a new Lincoln County sheriff, Pat Garrett, and a posse trapped McCarty and four of his confederates in a shack at Stinking Springs. After three fierce days of gun play, McCarty was captured on December 23, 1880.

McCarty was brought back to Lincoln County for trial in the death of Sheriff Brady. McCarty was convicted by a jury of murder and was sentenced to be hanged. However, while awaiting execution, McCarty escaped on April 28, 1881. During the escape, he killed two guards.

Sheriff Garrett set out to capture McCarty and return him for execution. Legend has it that the sheriff had no intention of capturing McCarty; he was intent on killing him. On July 13, 1881, Sheriff Garrett located McCarty in a hotel and shot him dead.

Legend has it that, while McCarty was charged with twelve murders by the time he was eighteen, he actually killed only four people in his life.

Issue Presented: Whether statistical evidence establishes Georgia’s capital punishment system is applied in a racially discriminatory manner and in violation of the Constitution.

Case Holding: Statistical evidence demonstrated some racial disparity in the application of Georgia’s capital punishment system, but such disparity did not sufficiently rise to the level of a constitutional violation.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Warren McCleskey, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death in 1978 by a Georgia court. On direct appeal, the Georgia Supreme Court affirmed and the United States Supreme Court denied certiorari. The defendant next filed for habeas corpus relief, but was denied by state and federal courts.

The defendant filed a second habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. In the second habeas claim, the defendant alleged that the Georgia capital sentencing process was administered in a racially discriminatory manner in violation of the Constitution. In support of the claim, defendant proffered a statistical study, called the Baldus study, that revealed a disparity in the imposition of the death sentence in Georgia based on the murder victim’s race and, to a lesser extent, the defendant’s race. The study was based on over 2,000 murder cases that occurred in Georgia during the 1970s and involved data relating to the victim’s race, the defendant’s race, and the various combinations of such persons’ races. The study indicated that black defendants who killed white victims have the greatest likelihood of receiving the death penalty. The district court rejected defendant’s constitutional claim and denied him relief. A Court of Appeals affirmed the district court’s decision. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the matter.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Powell: Justice Powell indicated that the defendant alleged that, based on the Baldus study, racial discrimination existed in Georgia’s capital punishment system in violation of the Equal Protection Clause and the Eighth Amendment. The opinion took up each constitutional claim separately.

As to the equal protection claim, Justice Powell ruled that the defendant offered no evidence specific to his own case that would support an inference that racial considerations played a part in his sentence and that the Baldus study was insufficient to support an inference that any of the decision makers in his case acted with discriminatory purpose. It was concluded that the Baldus study did not establish that the administration of the Georgia capital punishment system violated the Equal Protection Clause.

With respect to the defendant’s Eighth Amendment claim, Justice Powell found that there was no merit to the contention that the Baldus study showed that Georgia’s capital punishment system is arbitrary and capricious in application. The opinion held that the statistics did not prove that race entered into any capital sentencing decision or that race was a factor in the defendant’s case. Justice Powell stated that the likelihood of racial prejvidence shown by the study did not constitute the constitutional measure of an unacceptable risk of racial prejudice.

The majority opinion ruled that, at most, the Baldus study indicated a discrepancy that appeared to correlate with race, but such discrepancy did not constitute a major systemic defect. It was said that any mode for determining guilt or punishment has its weaknesses and the potential for misuse. Justice Powell found that despite such imperfections, constitutional guarantees are met when the mode for determining guilt or punishment has been surrounded with safeguards to make it as fair as possible. It was concluded that the Baldus study did not demonstrate that the Georgia capital sentencing system violated the Eighth Amendment. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Brennan indicated that he would vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals because the defendant established a constitutional violation. The thrust of the evidence relied upon by Justice Brennan to reach this conclusion was stated in his dissent as follows:

The Baldus study indicates that, after taking into account some 230 nonracial factors that might legitimately influence a sentencer, the jury more likely than not would have spared McCleskey's life had his victim been black....

Furthermore, even examination of the sentencing system as a whole, factoring in those cases in which the jury exercises little discretion, indicates the influence of race on capital sentencing. For the Georgia system as a whole, race accounts for a six-percentage point difference in the rate at which capital punishment is imposed. Since death is imposed in 11% of all white-victim cases, the rate in comparably aggravated black-victim cases is 5%. The rate of capital sentencing in a white-victim case is thus 120% greater than the rate in a black-victim case. Put another way, over half—55%—of defendants in white-victim crimes in Georgia would not have been sentenced to die if their victims had been black. Of the more than 200 variables potentially relevant to a sentencing decision, race of the victim is a powerful explanation for variation in death sentence rates—as powerful as nonracial aggravating factors such as a prior murder conviction or acting as the principal planner of the homicide.

These adjusted figures are only the most conservative indication of the risk that race will influence the death sentences of defendants in Georgia. Data unadjusted for the mitigating or aggravating effect of other factors show an even more pronounced disparity by race. The capital sentencing rate for all white-victim cases was almost 11 times greater than the rate for black-victim cases. Furthermore, blacks who kill whites are sentenced to death at nearly 22 times the rate of blacks who kill blacks, and more than 7 times the rate of whites who kill blacks. In addition, prosecutors seek the death penalty for 70% of black defendants with white victims, but for only 15% of black defendants with black victims, and only 19% of white defendants with black victims. Since our decision upholding the Georgia capital sentencing system in Gregg, the State has executed seven persons. All of the seven were convicted of killing whites, and six of the seven executed were black. Such execution figures are especially striking in light of the fact that, during the period encompassed by the Baldus study, only 9.2% of Georgia homicides involved black defendants and white victims, while 60.7% involved black victims....

The statistical evidence in this case thus relentlessly documents the risk that McCleskey's sentence was influenced by racial considerations. This evidence shows that there is a better than even chance in Georgia that race will influence the decision to impose the death penalty: A majority of defendants in white-victim crimes would not have been sentenced to die if their victims had been black. In determining whether this risk is acceptable, our judgment must be shaped by the awareness that "[t]he risk of racial prejudice infecting a capital sentencing proceeding is especially serious in light of the complete finality of the death sentence," and that "[i]t is of vital importance to the defendant and to the community that any decision to impose the death sentence be, and appear to be, based on reason rather than caprice or emotion." In determining the guilt of a defendant, a State must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. That is, we refuse to convict if the chance of error is simply less likely than not. Surely, we should not be willing to take a person's life if the chance that his death sentence was irrationally imposed is more likely than not. In light of the gravity of the interest at stake, petitioner's statistics on their face are a powerful demonstration of the type of risk that our Eighth Amendment jurisprudence has consistently condemned....

It is tempting to pretend that minorities on death row share a fate in no way connected to our own, that our treatment of them sounds no echoes beyond the chambers in which they die. Such an illusion is ultimately corrosive, for the reverberations of injustice are not so easily confined. "The destinies of the two races in this country are indissolubly linked together," and the way in which we choose those who will die reveals the depth of moral commitment among the living.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Marshall, Stevens, and Brennan, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun indicated in his dissent that "[t]he Court today sanctions the execution of a man despite his presentation of evidence that establishes a constitutionally intolerable level of racially based discrimination leading to the imposition of his death sentence."

A core concern expressed in the dissent was the Court's "departure from what seems to me to be well-developed constitutional jurisprudence." Justice Blackmun wrote: "The Court's assertion that the fact of McCleskey's conviction undermines his constitutional claim is inconsistent with a long and unbroken line of this Court's case law. The Court on numerous occasions during the past century has recognized that an otherwise legitimate basis for a conviction does not outweigh an equal protection violation. In cases where racial discrimination in the administration of the criminal justice system is established, it has held that setting aside the conviction is the appropriate remedy."

Justice Blackmun concluded that it was necessary to impose guidelines to minimize abuse of discretion by prosecutors in making decisions about whether to seek the death penalty. He wrote: "[T]he establishment of guidelines for [prosecutors] as to the appropriate basis for exercising their discretion at the various steps in the prosecution of a case would provide at least a measure of consistency."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Blackmun, J., Joined: Justice Stevens believed the defendant established a constitutional violation. In his dissent, he wrote: "In this case it is claimed—and the claim is supported by elaborate studies which the Court properly assumes to be valid—that the jury's sentencing process was likely distorted by racial prejudice. The studies demonstrate a strong probability that McCleskey's sentencing jury, which expressed 'the community's outrage—its sense that an individual has lost his moral entitlement to live,' was influenced by the fact that McCleskey is black and his victim was white, and that this same outrage would not have been generated if he had killed a member of his own race. This sort of disparity is constitutionally intolerable. It flagrantly violates the Court's prior 'insistence that capital punishment be imposed fairly, and with reasonable consistency, or not at all.'"

Justice Stevens argued that correcting the problem posed by Georgia's death penalty system would not necessitate abolishing capital punishment by the State altogether. The dissent addressed the matter as follows: "The Court's decision appears to be based on a fear that the acceptance of McCleskey's claim would sound the death knell for capital punishment in Georgia. If society were indeed forced to choose between a racially discriminatory death penalty ... and no death penalty at all, the choice mandated by the Constitution would be plain. But the Court's fear is unfounded. One of the lessons of the Baldus study is that there exist certain categories of extremely serious crimes for which prosecutors consistently seek, and juries consistently impose, the death penalty without regard to the race of the victim or the race of the offender. If Georgia were to narrow the class of death-eligible defendants to those categories, the danger of arbitrary and discriminatory imposition of the death penalty would be significantly decreased, if not eradicated."

Issue Presented: Whether detention in solitary confinement pending execution constituted cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the federal Constitution.

Case Holding: Detention in solitary confinement pending execution did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the federal Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Charles McElvaine, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of New York. On appeal, the New York Court of Appeals reversed the judgment and awarded a new trial. The defendant was tried a second time, convicted, and sentenced to death. The State's appellate court affirmed the second judgment. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that his detention in solitary confinement pending his execution constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the federal Constitution. The district court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that detention in solitary confinement while awaiting execution did not violate the federal Constitution. The opinion rejected the defendant's contention that, because the death warrant did not specify holding him in solitary confinement, the State could not detain him in such a manner. The chief justice reasoned that it was an implied necessary administrative task to hold the defendant in solitary confinement pending execution; therefore, the death warrant did not have to expressly provide for such detention. The judgment of the district court was affirmed. See also Death Row

Issue Presented: Whether a capital defendant must file a formal federal habeas corpus petition in order to obtain appointment of counsel and to establish a federal court's jurisdiction to enter a stay of execution.

Case Holding: A capital defendant is not required to file a formal federal habeas corpus petition in order to obtain appointment of counsel and to establish a federal court's jurisdiction to enter a stay of execution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Frank McFarland, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Texas and sentenced to death. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. Subsequently, a Texas trial court scheduled the defendant's execution date. The defendant, on his own, filed a petition requesting that the trial court stay or withdraw his execution date to allow him time to obtain free legal counsel for a state habeas corpus proceeding. The trial court ultimately declined to disturb the execution date. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the decision.

The defendant next filed a "motion" in a federal district court, requesting appointment of counsel under the federal habeas corpus statute and a stay of execution to give appointed counsel time to prepare and file a formal habeas corpus petition. The district court denied the request after finding that, because no post-conviction proceeding had been initiated under the federal habeas statute, the defendant was not entitled to appointment of counsel and the court lacked jurisdiction to enter a stay of execution. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the district court ruling after concluding that federal law expressly authorized federal courts to stay State proceedings while a federal habeas corpus proceeding is pending, but that no such proceeding was pending because the defendant's motion for stay and for appointment of counsel was not the equivalent of an application for habeas relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun ruled that a capital defendant need not file a formal habeas corpus petition in order to invoke his or her right to counsel under the federal habeas statute and to establish a federal court's jurisdiction to enter a stay of execution. The opinion found that the language and purposes of the federal habeas statute establish that the right to qualified appointed counsel adheres before the filing of a formal, legally sufficient habeas petition and includes a right to legal assistance in the preparation of such a petition. Therefore, the opinion reasoned, a post-conviction proceeding within the meaning of the statute is commenced by the filing of a death row defendant's motion requesting the appointment of counsel for his or her federal habeas proceeding. Justice Blackmun concluded that the defendant filed such a motion and was entitled to the appointment of a lawyer and a stay of execution. The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's decision that the federal habeas statute "entitles capital defendants pursuing federal habeas corpus relief to a properly trained attorney." However, Justice O'Connor dissented from the Court's decision that the federal habeas statute "allows a district court to stay an execution pending counsel's preparation of an application for a writ of habeas corpus.” She reasoned as follows: “In my view [the defendant] is not entitled under present law to a stay of execution while counsel prepares a habeas petition. The habeas statute provides in relevant part that [a] ‘justice or judge of the United States before whom a habeas corpus proceeding is pending, may ... stay any proceeding against the person detained in any State court.’ While this provision authorizes a stay in the habeas context, it does not explicitly allow a stay prior to the filing of a petition, and our cases have made it clear that capital defendants must raise at least some colorable federal claim before a stay of execution may be entered.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas, in Which Rehnquist, CJ, and Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Thomas dissented from the majority’s decision. He did not believe that the federal habeas statute authorized pre-petition appointment of counsel and stay of execution. He stated his position as follows: “Today the Court holds that a state prisoner under sentence of death may invoke a federal district court’s jurisdiction to obtain appointed counsel ... and to obtain a stay of execution ... simply by filing a motion for appointment of counsel. In my view, the Court’s conclusion is at odds with the terms of [the] statutory provisions. [The] statute allows a federal district court to take action, [appointing counsel or granting a stay], only after a habeas proceeding has been commenced.”

Issues Presented: (1) Whether States may give juries absolute discretion in determining whether a defendant receives a death sentence or a sentence of life imprisonment. (2) Whether States may require in capital prosecutions that guilt and punishment be determined in a single proceeding.

Case Holdings: (1) States may give juries absolute discretion in determining whether a defendant receives a death sentence or a sentence of life imprisonment. (2) States may require in capital prosecutions that guilt and punishment be determined in a single proceeding.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved two defendants, McGautha and Crampton, who were prosecuted by different jurisdictions. McGautha was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. Crampton was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Ohio. The judgments against both defendants were affirmed by the respective States’ appellate courts. Both defendants appealed to the United States Supreme Court, contending that their prosecutions violated due process of law because their respective juries had absolute discretion in selecting their punishment. Additionally, Crampton complained that he was denied due process of law because his guilt and punishment were determined in a single proceeding (McGautha had a bifurcated guilt and penalty phase trial). The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari and consolidated the cases to consider the issues presented.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan initially addressed the issue of juries having absolute discretion to decide punishment. He wrote that the Constitution was not offended by giving juries such authority. The opinion reasoned as follows:

Our function is not to impose on the States, ex cathedra, what might seem to us a better system for dealing with capital cases. Rather, it is to decide whether the Federal Constitution proscribes the present procedures of these two States in such cases....

In light of history, experience, and the present limitations of human knowledge, we find it quite impossible to say that committing to the untrammelled discretion of the jury the power to pronounce life or death in capital cases is offensive to anything in the Constitution. The States are entitled to assume that jurors confronted with the truly awesome responsibility of decreeing death for a fellow human will act with due regard for the consequences of their decision and will consider a variety of factors, many of which will have been suggested by the evidence or by the arguments of defense counsel. For a court to attempt to catalog the appropriate factors in this elusive area could inhibit rather than expand the scope of consideration, for no list of circumstances would ever be really complete. The infinite variety of cases and facets to each case would make general standards either meaningless “boiler-plate” or a statement of the obvious that no jury would need.

The opinion next turned to Crampton’s argument that due process required his guilt and punishment be determined in separate proceedings. Crampton contended that a unitary prosecution forced him to decide whether to put on evidence seeking mercy, while at the same time putting on evidence of his innocence. It was Crampton’s position that a jury would inevitably convict a defendant who puts on evidence seeking mercy, while simultaneously proffering evidence of innocence. Crampton believed the Constitution prohibited requiring a defendant to make a choice between putting on or not putting on evidence seeking mercy. Justice Harlan disagreed with Crampton and stated the Court’s position as follows:

Crampton’s argument for bifurcation runs as follows. He contends that under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, he had a right to be heard on the issue of punishment and a right not to have his sentence fixed without the benefit of all the relevant evidence. Therefore, he argues, the Ohio procedure creates an intolerable tension between constitutional rights. Since this tension can be largely avoided by a bifurcated trial, [the defendant] contends that there is no legitimate state interest in putting him to the election, and that the single-verdict trial should be held invalid in capital cases....

The criminal process, like the rest of the legal system, is replete with situations requiring “the making of difficult judgments” as to which course to follow. Although a defendant may have a right, even of constitutional dimensions, to follow whichever course he chooses, the Constitution does not by that token always forbid requiring him to choose. The threshold question is whether compelling the election impairs to an appreciable extent any of the policies behind the rights involved. Analysis of this case in such terms leads to the conclusion that [the defendant] has failed to make out his claim of a constitutional violation in requiring him to undergo a unitary trial.

The judgments against both defendants were affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Black: Justice Black concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to express his view that the Court did not have authority to restrict the States in the procedures used to prosecute capital offenders. Justice Black stated the following: "I concur in the Court's judgments and in substantially all of its opinion. However, in my view, this Court's task is not to determine whether the [defendants'] trials were 'fairly conducted.' The Constitution grants this Court no power to reverse convictions because of our personal beliefs that state criminal procedures are 'unfair,' 'arbitrary,' 'capricious,' 'unreasonable,' or 'shocking to our conscience.' Our responsibility is rather to determine whether [the defendants] have been denied rights expressly or impliedly guaranteed by the Federal Constitution as written. I agree with the Court's conclusions that the procedures employed by California and Ohio to determine whether capital punishment shall be imposed do not offend the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Douglas, in Which Brennan and Marshall, JJ., Joined: Justice Douglas dissented from the Court's decision. He wrote specifically on this issue of a unitary prosecution as follows:

In my view the unitary trial which Ohio provides in first-degree murder cases does not satisfy the requirements of procedural Due Process under the Fourteenth Amendment.

If a defendant wishes to testify in support of the defense of insanity or in mitigation of what he is charged with doing, he can do so only if he surrenders his right to be free from self-incrimination. Once he takes the stand he can be cross-examined not only as respects the crime charged but also on other misdeeds....

If the right to be heard were to be meaningful, it would have to accrue before sentencing; yet, except for allocution, any attempt on the part of the accused during the trial to say why the judgment of death should not be pronounced against him entails a surrender of his right against self-incrimination. It therefore seems plain that the single-verdict procedure is a burden on the exercise of the right to be free of compulsion as respects self-incrimination. For he can testify on the issue of insanity or on other matters in extenuation of the crime charged only at the price of surrendering the protection of the Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth....

The unitary trial is certainly not "mercy" oriented. That is, however, not its defect. It has a constitutional infirmity because it is not neutral on the awesome issue of capital punishment. The rules are stacked in favor of death. It is one thing if the legislature decides that the death penalty attaches to defined crimes. It is quite another to leave to judge or jury the discretion to sentence an accused to death or to show mercy under procedures that make the trial death oriented. Then the law becomes a mere pretense, lacking the procedural integrity that would likely result in a fair resolution of the issues. In Ohio, the deficiency in the procedure is compounded by the unreviewability of the failure to grant mercy.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Douglas and Marshall, JJ., Joined: Justice Brennan dissented from the Court's decision. He wrote specifically on the issue of granting juries absolute discretion in determining punishment, as follows:

These cases test the viability of principles whose roots draw strength from the very core of the Due Process Clause. The question that [the defendants] present for our decision is whether the rule of law, basic to our society and binding upon the States by virtue of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, is fundamentally inconsistent with capital sentencing procedures that are purposely constructed to allow the maximum possible variation from one case to the next, and provide no mechanism to prevent that consciously maximized variation from reflecting merely random or arbitrary choice. The Court does not, however, come to grips with that fundamental question. Instead, the Court misapprehends [the defendants'] argument and deals with the cases as if [the defendants] contend that due process requires capital sentencing to be carried out under predetermined standards so precise as to be capable of purely mechanical application, entirely eliminating any vestiges of flexibility or discretion in their use. This misapprehended question is then treated in the context of the Court's assumption that the legislatures of Ohio and California are incompetent to express with clarity the bases upon which they have determined that some persons guilty of some crimes should be killed, while others should live — an assumption that, significantly, finds no support in the arguments made by those States in these cases....

It is of critical importance in the present cases to emphasize that we are not called upon to determine the adequacy or inadequacy of any particular legislative procedure designed to give rationality to the capital sentencing process. For the plain fact is that the legislatures of California and Ohio, whence come these cases, have sought no solution at all. We are not presented with a State's attempt to provide standards, attacked as impermissible or inadequate. We are not presented with a legislative attempt to draw wisdom from experience through a process looking toward growth in understanding through the accumulation of a variety of experiences. We are not presented with the slightest attempt to bring the power of reason to bear on the considerations relevant to capital sentencing. We are faced with nothing more than stark legislative abdication. Not once in the history of this Court, until today, have we sustained against a due process challenge such an unguided, unbridled, unreviewable exercise of naked power. Almost a century ago, we found an almost identical California procedure constitutionally inadequate to license a laundry. Today we hold it adequate to license a life. I would reverse [the defendants'] sentences of death.

Case Note: Within a year of the Court's decision in this case, the position taken by the dissenting justices was used to strike down capital punishment in the nation. See also Furman v. Georgia

McKenna, Joseph Joseph McKenna served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1898 to 1925. While on the Supreme Court, McKenna was known as a conservative and pragmatic interpreter of the Constitution.

McKenna was born on August 10, 1843, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. His family background was humble and, consequently, McKenna was largely self-educated. He was able to study on his own to pass the bar in California, where his family had moved during his youth. McKenna's rise to prominence began when he was elected prosecutor of Solano County. He eventually won a seat in the United States House of Representatives in 1885. President Benjamin Harris appointed McKenna as an appellate judge for the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1892. Subsequent to a brief term as United States Attorney General, President William McKinley appointed McKenna to the Supreme Court in 1897. He was confirmed by the Senate in 1898.

While on the Supreme Court, McKenna issued a number of capital punishment opinions. His capital punishment opinions reflected a conservative, pro-government philosophy. For example, in writing the opinion for the Court in Valdez v. United States, McKenna retreated from fundamental principles of due process in holding that the absence of a defendant during the trial judge's visit to the crime scene did not deny him due process of law. In Bird v. United States (II), McKenna, again writing for the Court, upheld a murder conviction after ruling that the trial court did not commit error in refusing to instruct the jury on accomplice liability principles, though the defendant presented evidence on the issue. McKenna died on November 21, 1926.

McKinley's Assassination On September 6, 1901, President William McKinley was attending the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo, New York. As the president stood with friends and well-wishers, a stranger walked up to him wearing a bandage around his right arm. The stranger was Leon Czolgosz. Czolgosz extended his right arm, as if to greet the president. Instead, he fired two shots from a pistol concealed by the bandage. The shots struck the president in his abdomen. The president died two weeks later.

Leon Czolgosz was executed by electrocution at New York's Sing Sing Prison on October 29, 1901. (New York City Police)

Ten days after the shooting, Czolgosz was prosecuted for capital murder in New York. The trial took eight hours and twenty-six minutes. The jury returned a verdict of guilty. Czolgosz was sentenced to death. On October 29, 1901, Czolgosz was executed by electrocution at New York's Sing Sing Prison. After the execution, Czolgosz's body was destroyed with quicklime and acid.

Prior to his execution, Czolgosz stated that he killed the president because of a speech he had heard by "anarchist" Emma Goldman. Czolgosz believed that it was his duty, in furtherance of the cause espoused by anarchists, to kill a representative of capitalist society.

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution is violated by North Carolina's penalty phase requirement that the jury unanimously find the existence of a mitigating circumstance before such circumstance may be considered by the jury.

Case Holding: North Carolina's mitigating circumstance unanimity requirement violates the Constitution by preventing the sentencer from considering all relevant mitigating evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Dock McKoy, Jr., was convicted in a North Carolina court of capital murder. Under North Carolina's death penalty scheme, it was required that the penalty phase jury unanimously agree that a mitigating circumstance was proven to exist by the defendant before the jury could consider it in weighing aggravating circumstance against mitigating circumstance.

During the defendant's sentencing phase, the jury recommended the death penalty after finding unanimously (1) the existence of two statutory aggravating circumstances; (2) the existence of two of eight possible mitigating circumstances; (3) that the mitigating circumstances found were insufficient to outweigh the aggravating circumstances found; and (4) that the aggravating circumstances found were sufficiently substantial to call for the imposition of the death penalty when considered with the mitigating circumstances found.

The North Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's claim that it was unconstitutional to require the jury unanimously find the existence of a mitigating circumstance. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall determined that North Carolina's unanimity requirement violated the Constitution by limiting jurors' consideration of relevant mitigating evidence and was contrary to the Court's decision in Mills v. Maryland. The opinion found unpersuasive the fact that the jury could opt for life imprisonment without finding any mitigating circumstances, because there was still a requirement that such a decision be based only on the circumstances it unanimously found. Justice Marshall indicated that the result of the unanimity requirement was that one holdout juror could prevent the others from giving effect to evidence they feel called for a lesser sentence. This situation violated the Constitution and the decision in Mills. Under Mills, it is required that each juror be permitted to consider and give effect to mitigating evidence when deciding the ultimate question of whether to vote for a death sentence. The opinion vacated the defendant's sentence and remanded the case to the North Carolina Supreme Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the opinion.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White: Justice White wrote a concurring opinion in which he articulated what he believed were the parameters of the majority opinion. Justice White stated: "There is nothing in the Court's opinion, as I understand it, that would invalidate on federal constitutional grounds a jury instruction that does not require unanimity with respect to mitigating circumstances but requires a juror to consider a mitigating circumstance only if he or she is convinced of its existence by a preponderance of the evidence. Under such an instruction, any juror must weigh in the balance any mitigating circumstance that in his or her mind is established by a preponderance of the evidence, whether or not any other jurors are likewise convinced. Neither does the Court's opinion hold or infer that the Federal Constitution forbids a State to place on the defendant the burden of persuasion with respect to mitigating circumstances. On this basis, I concur in the Court's opinion."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun's concurring opinion emphasized the consistency of the resolution of the case with prior precedent. He also indicated that North Carolina's unanimity requirement was inconsistent with fundamental principles. On this issue, the concurrence stated: "[T]he North Carolina unanimity requirement ... represents an extraordinary departure from the way in which juries customarily operate. Juries are typically called upon to render unanimous verdicts on the ultimate issues of a given case. But it is understood that different jurors may be persuaded by different pieces of evidence, even when they agree upon the bottom line. Plainly there is no general requirement that the jury reach agreement on the preliminary factual issues which underlie the verdict."

Justice Blackmun also took issue with the State's contention that unanimity was required for both aggravating and mitigating circumstances; therefore, any unfairness balanced itself out. He wrote: "The possibility that a single juror with aberrational views will thwart the majority [and] therefore ... may work in favor of the capital defendant. But the injustice of a capital sentence in a case where 11 jurors believe that mitigation outweighs aggravation is hardly compensated for by the possibility that in some other case a defendant will escape the death penalty when 11 jurors believe death to be appropriate. The State's reliance on the 'symmetry' of its law seems to me to be the very antithesis of the constitutional command that the sentence be allowed to consider the 'character and record of the individual offender and the circumstances of the particular offense as a constitutionally indispensable part of the process of inflicting the penalty of death.'"

Concurring Opinion by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy concurred in the judgment by the majority. In his concurrence, he noted: "Application of the death penalty on the basis of a single juror's vote is 'intuitively disturbing.'" Justice Kennedy believed that the unanimity requirement "represents imposition of capital punishment through a system that can be described as arbitrary or capricious." The opinion supported its position as follows: "A holdout juror incident can occur under North Carolina's statute if all jurors find an aggravating factor they agree to be of sufficient gravity to support a penalty of death, and 11 jurors find an outweighing mitigating factor that one juror refuses, for whatever reason, to accept. If the jurors follow their instructions, as we must assume they will, the 11 must disregard the mitigating circumstance. After the balancing step of the statute is performed, there can be only one result. The 'judgment is death even though eleven jurors think the death penalty wholly inappropriate.' Given the reasoned, moral judgment inherent in capital sentencing by the jury, the extreme arbitrariness of this potential result is evident."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and O'Connor, J., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented on the basis that he did not believe the Constitution precluded North Carolina from requiring jury unanimity on mitigating circumstances. The dissent stated: "I think this scheme, taken as a whole, satisfies the due process and Eighth Amendment concerns enunciated by this Court. By requiring that the jury find at least one statutory aggravating circumstance, North Carolina has adequately narrowed the class of death-eligible murderers." See also Jury Unanimity; Mills v. Maryland

McLean, John John McLean served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1828 to 1861. While on the Supreme Court, McLean was known as a moderate with progressive tendencies in his interpretation of the Constitution.

McLean was born in New Jersey on March 11, 1785. He did not have a formal education, but was able to obtain sporadic tutoring during his youth. McLean studied law as an apprentice to a court clerk in Ohio. He was admitted to the Ohio bar in 1807. McLean went on to operate a newspaper, serve two terms in the United States House of Representatives, win an election to the Ohio Supreme Court, and be appointed United States Postmaster General. In 1828, President Andrew Jackson appointed McLean to the Supreme Court.

Although McLean served one of the longest terms of any member of the Supreme Court, he was known to write only one capital punishment opinion. In Ex Parte Wells, the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether the president had authority to pardon a defendant's death sentence upon the condition that the defendant remain in prison for life. The majority on the Court held that the president had such authority. McLean dissented. He argued that no statute gave the president such authority; therefore, the Court should not interpret the Constitution as permitting that authority. McLean died on April 4, 1861.

McNulty v. California Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: McNulty v. California, 149 U.S. 645 (1893); Argued: Not reported; Decided: May 15, 1893; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Fuller; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Carroll Cook argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: W. Issue Presented: Whether the repeal of a former death penalty procedure by the State of California prevented the defendant from being executed according to the repealed law.

Case Holding: The repeal of a former death penalty procedure by the State of California did not prevent the defendant from being executed according to the repealed law and, this issue being a purely State matter, cannot be examined by a federal court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, McNulty, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. The defendant appealed the judgment to the California Supreme Court. While the appeal was pending, the State made a procedural change to the manner in which the death penalty was carried out. Under the law of the State at the time of the commission of the defendant's crime, it was required that execution should be carried out not less than thirty nor more than sixty days after judgment, by the sheriff, within the walls or yard of a jail, or some convenient private place in the county. The new law required that the judgment should be executed in not less than sixty nor more than ninety days from the time of judgment, by the warden of one of the state prisons, within the walls thereof and that the defendant should be delivered to such warden within ten days from the judgment. The defendant contended to the State's appellate court that the new law violated the Ex Post Facto Clause of the federal Constitution and, since the old law was repealed, he could not be executed. The appellate court agreed that the new law could not apply to the defendant, but rejected the argument that he could not be executed under the repealed law that was in existence at the time of his crime. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

tice found that since the State's appellate court found that the federal Constitution prohibited application of the new procedure to the defendant, no federal question was posed in the case for the Court to address. The opinion reasoned: "The contention of counsel is that the execution of [the defendant] as ordered would be without due process, because the amendments ... repealed the former law, and left no law under which he could be executed, since the amendments could not be enforced because of their being in violation of the constitution. But this argument amounts to no more than the assertion that the supreme court of the state erred as to the proper construction of the statutes of California, an inquiry it is not within our province to enter upon.... In our judgment the decision of the supreme court of California, that he should be punished under the law as it existed at the time of the commission of the crime of which he was convicted, involved no federal question whatever." The appeal was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. See also Ex Post Facto Clause

McReynolds, James C. James C. McReynolds served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1914 to 1941. While on the Supreme Court, McReynolds was known as an ultra-conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

McReynolds was born in Elkton, Kentucky, on February 3, 1862. He received an undergraduate degree from Vanderbilt University in 1882 and a law degree from the University of Virginia School of Law in 1884. McReynolds's legal career included private practice, teaching at Vanderbilt, and the position of United States Attorney General. In 1914, President Woodrow Wilson appointed McReynolds to the Supreme Court.

McReynolds wrote only a few capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. The opinion which best illustrated McReynolds's ultra-conservative reputation is Malloy v. South Carolina. In Malloy, the defendant argued that constitutional ex post facto principles were violated by a change in South Carolina's laws, after he committed his offense, which changed the method of execution from hanging to electrocution. McReynolds, writing for the Court, rejected the defendant's argument. He wrote: "The constitutional inhibition of ex post facto laws was intended to secure substantial personal rights against arbitrary and oppressive legislative action, and not to obstruct mere alteration in conditions deemed necessary for the orderly infliction of humane punishment." McReynolds died on August 24, 1946.

Madagascar Madagascar recognizes capital punishment, but has not used the punishment within recent memory. Madagascar uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on French civil law and customary law. The nation's constitution was adopted on August 19, 1992.

The judicial system of Madagascar consists of trial courts, a court of appeals, a supreme court, and the High Constitutional Court. Trials are public and defendants have the right to counsel, to confront witnesses, and to enjoy a presumption of innocence. Madagascar also recognizes customary or traditional courts known as dina tribunals. In practice, dina tribunals deal with criminal cases in rural areas. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Maine The death penalty was abolished in Maine in 1887.

Majority Opinion Decisions rendered by appellate courts are not always unanimous. When a decision of an appellate court is handed down that has less than all the members concurring in the result or in the reasoning used in the opinion, it is called a majority opinion. A majority opinion is binding on all lower courts. See also Concurring Opinion; Dissenting Opinion; Per Curiam Opinion; Plurality Opinion

Malawi Malawi permits capital punishment. The legal system of the nation is based on English common law and customary law. The nation adopted its constitution on May 18, 1995. Malawi uses hanging to carry out the death penalty. In 1997, the former president of Malawi, Bakili Muluzil, placed a moratorium on the death penalty and commuted the death sentences of all prisoners on death row. This unilateral action by President Muluzi did not affect the laws in the nation, which permit capital punishment.

The judicial system of Malawi consists of the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal. Defendants have the right to a public trial, but not to a trial by jury. However, in murder cases, the High Court will use juries. Defendants have the right to legal counsel, the right to present and challenge evidence and witnesses, and the right of appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Malaysia Capital punishment is allowed in Malaysia. The nation uses hanging as the method of execution. Its legal system is based on English common law. The nation adopted its constitution on August 31, 1957. Malaysia's political structure is a complex constitutional monarchy. The head of the country is chosen by and from the hereditary rulers of nine of the states. The nation has a bicameral legislature consisting of a non-elected upper house and an elected lower house.

The judicial system of Malaysia consists of high courts, a court of appeal, a federal court, and a special court (tries cases against the king and the sultans). Under the laws of Malaysia, trials are public and defendants have the right to counsel, to bail, to enjoy the presumption of innocence, and to appeal. A single judge presides over criminal trials. There are no jury trials. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Maldives Maldives recognizes capital punishment, but the punishment is infrequently imposed. Its legal system is a mixture of Islamic law and English common law. The nation's constitution was adopted on June 4, 1968. Maldives is composed of 1,190 islands scattered across the Indian Ocean. Fewer than 200 of the islands are inhabited. Maldives has a parliamentary form of government with an executive branch, a unicameral legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

The judicial system is composed of trial courts and a high court. The judiciary is subject to executive influence. Under a 1995 presidential decree, rulings by the High Court can be reviewed by a five-member advisory council appointed by the president. The president also has authority to affirm judgments, order a second hearing, or overturn judgments. Defendants do not have a right to trial by jury. Defendants have a right to retain counsel and to confront witnesses. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Mali Capital punishment has not been officially abolished in Mali, but it has not been imposed with any frequency. Mali uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on French civil law and customary law. The nation's constitution was adopted on January 12, 1992.

The judicial system is composed of trial courts, a constitutional court, a high court of justice, and a supreme court. Trials are public and defendants have the right to retained or appointed counsel. Defendants are presumed innocent, have the right to confront witnesses, and have the right to appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issues Presented: (1) Whether defendant Malinski's confession was involuntary. (2) Whether the case against co-defendant Rudish was prejudiced by the use of defendant Malinski's confession.

Case Holdings: (1) Defendant Malinski's confession was involuntary; therefore, the judgment against him could not stand. (2) The case against co-defendant Rudish was not prejudiced by the use of defendant Malinski's confession because the trial court took measures to insulate Rudish from the confession.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The case involved two defendants, Malinski and Rudish, who were convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of New York. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed the judgments. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the constitutional challenge by Malinski that his confession was involuntary and the constitutional challenge by Rudish that his conviction was tainted by Malinski's involuntary confession. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas addressed the issue of Malinski's confession first: "If all the attendant circumstances indicate that the confession was coerced or compelled, it may not be used to convict a defendant. And if it is introduced at the trial, the judgment of conviction will be set aside even though the evidence apart from the confession might have been sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict." Justice Douglas then moved to a description of Malinski's confession:

Malinski was arrested while on his way to work on the morning of Friday, October 23, 1942. The police did not then arraign him but took him to a room in the Bossert Hotel in Brooklyn where he arrived about 8 A.M. He was immediately stripped and kept naked until about 11 A.M. At that time he was allowed to put on his shoes, socks and underwear and was given a blanket in which to wrap himself. He remained that way until about 6 P.M. Malinski claims he was beaten by the police during that period. The police denied this.... Sometime around 5:30 P.M. or 6:00 P.M., Malinski confessed to the police. After it was made Malinski was allowed to dress. Malinski was kept at the hotel that night and the next three days. The record does not show exactly how long and frequent the questioning was after the first confession. But it is clear that Malinski was questioned in the early hours of Saturday, the 24th, and at other times during that day. He was further questioned on Sunday, the 25th, and taken ... from the hotel to the scene of the crime where he identified several places which had a relationship to the commission of the crime and where he pointed out how the crime was executed. On Monday, the 26th, he was taken from the hotel to the police garage where he identified the automobile used in the robbery. At about 5:00 P.M. on Monday he was taken to a police station and questioned. On Tuesday morning, October 27th, about 2 A.M. he made a confession at the police station. That confession was introduced at the trial. Shortly thereafter — about 4:00 A.M. — he was booked and put in a cell and soon arraigned.

In view of the procedure used by the police to obtain a confession from Malinski, Justice Douglas ruled that the confession was involuntary.

Justice Douglas next turned to Rudish's contention that introduction of Malinski's confession was prejudicial to him. The opinion found that the manner in which the confession was used did not prejudice the case against Rudish. Justice Douglas explained the Court's position as follows:

[Rudish] did not confess to the police. He was tried jointly with Malinski, his counsel electing not to ask for a severance. We are asked to reverse as to Rudish because the confession of October 27th which was introduced in evidence against Malinski was prejudicial to Rudish. It is true that that confession referred to Rudish. But before that confession was offered in evidence the trial court with the complete approval of counsel for Rudish worked out a procedure for protecting Rudish, "X" was substituted for Rudish. The jury were plainly instructed that the confession was admitted against Malinski alone and that they were not to speculate concerning the identity of "X." When it came to the charge, the trial court submitted the case against Rudish separately from the one against Malinski. On this record the questions raised by Rudish involve matters of state procedure beyond our province to review. Since the case against him, both as tried and as sustained on review, was not dependent on Malinski's confession of October 27th, we think it inappropriate to vacate the judgment, though we assume that that confession was coerced. Whether our reversal of the judgment against Malinski would as a matter of state law affect that judgment against Rudish is not for us to say.

The opinion went on to reverse the judgment against Malinski, but affirmed the judgment against Rudish.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter concurred in the Court's opinion. He believed "that the judgment as to Malinski calls for reversal, leaving the disposition of Rudish's conviction in the light of such reversal to the New York Court of Appeals." Justice Frankfurter expressed his disfavor with the manner in which Malinski was interrogated as follows: "Considering the circumstances of Malinski's detention, the long and continuous questioning, the willful and wrongful delay in his arraignment and the opportunity that that gives for securing, by extortion, confessions such as were here introduced in evidence, the flagrant justification by the prosecutor of this illegality as a necessary police procedure, inevitably calculated to excite the jury — all these in combination are so below the standards by which the criminal law, especially in a capital case, should be enforced as to fall short of due process of law.”

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rutledge, in Which Murphy, J., Joined: Justice Rutledge concurred in the Court’s reversal of the judgment against Malinski. He dissented from the Court’s decision to affirm the judgment against Rudish. Justice Rutledge wrote: “This is a capital case. Rudish has been sentenced to death. The written confession involved him. It was used in evidence against Malinski.... There could be no valid basis for admitting this confession against Rudish in a separate trial. Due process does not permit one to be convicted upon his own coerced confession. It should not allow him to be convicted upon a confession wrung from another by coercion.”

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Murphy: Justice Murphy concurred in the Court’s reversal of the judgment against Malinski. He dissented from the Court’s decision to affirm the judgment against Rudish. Justice Murphy argued that it was “inconceivable ... that the admission of these tainted confessions was without influence in the conviction of the co-defendant Rudish.”

The ultimate catalyst in Justice Murphy’s opinion was not the substantive issue of the confession. He used the opportunity to write about prejudicial remarks made by the prosecutor:

Malinski, as well as his co-defendant Rudish, is an American of Jewish ancestry. The prosecutor made certain remarks in his statement to the jury that may have been intended and were indicative of a desire to appeal to racial and religious bigotry. He spoke of Malinski as a “jerk from the East Side” and referred to his residence in “the lower east side of Manhattan, where your life is not worth a pretzel.” This is a characterization of a territory containing a large proportion of Americans of like origin.

Those clothed with authority in court rooms of this nation have the duty to conduct and supervise proceedings so that an accused person may be adjudged solely according to the dictates of justice and reason. This duty is an especially high one in capital cases. Instead of an attitude of indifference and carelessness in such matters, judges and officers of the court should take the initiative to create an atmosphere free from undue passion and emotionalism. This necessarily requires the exclusion of attacks or appeals made by counsel tending to reflect upon the race, creed or color of the defendant. Here the defendants’ very lives were at stake and it was of the utmost importance that the trial be conducted in surroundings free from poisonous and dangerous irrelevancies that might inflame the jury to the detriment of the defendants. Brazen appeals relating to their race or faith had no relevance whatever to the grave issue facing the jury and could only be designed to influence the jury unfairly; and subtle and indirect attacks were even more dangerous and effective. Statements of this character are the direct antithesis of every principle of American justice and fair-play. They alone are enough to cast grave doubts upon the validity of the entire proceedings.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Stone, in Which Roberts, Reed, and Jackson, JJ., Joined: The chief justice concurred in the Court’s decision affirming Rudish’s judgment. He dissented from the Court’s decision to reverse Malinski’s judgment. The chief justice wrote:

Malinski, charged with murder, made several confessions of guilt, which were introduced in evidence at his trial. Two, made to the police, are alleged to have been coerced, the first on October 23rd and the other four days later on October 27th. During that time he admitted to the police other isolated facts which tended to fasten guilt upon him. Three friends of Malinski also testified that on several occasions shortly after the commission of the crime and long before his arrest, he voluntarily admitted to them and to his sister that he had committed the crime....

It is not the function of this Court, in reviewing, on constitutional grounds, criminal convictions by state courts, to weigh the evidence on which the jury has pronounced its verdict, also in the light of the arguments of counsel, or to sit as a superjury. We have, in appropriate cases, set aside state convictions as violating due process where we were able to say that the case was improperly submitted to the jury or that the unchallenged evidence plainly showed a violation of the constitutional rights of the accused. But we have not hitherto overturned the verdict of a state court jury by weighing the conflicting evidence on which it was based.

Judged by these standards, ... there was no denial of due process in submitting ... Malinski’s confessions to the jury in the manner in which they were in fact submitted, and that there is no constitutional ground for setting aside the jury’s verdict against him.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant’s confession was obtained in violation of his right to prompt presentment before a magistrate after his arrest.

Case Holding: The defendant’s confession was obtained in violation of his right to prompt presentment before a magistrate after his arrest.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Mallory, was arrested by the District of Columbia on a charge of rape. While in police custody, the defendant confessed to the crime. The confession was given after interrogation that occurred before the defendant was taken before a magistrate and advised of his rights. Under the rules of criminal procedure applicable to the District of Columbia, the defendant had a right to be taken promptly to a magistrate after his arrest. The defendant was convicted of rape and sentenced to death. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court found that the confession was admissible at trial even though the defendant was not promptly taken to a magistrate after his arrest. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter ruled that failure to take the defendant to a magistrate after his arrest violated Rule 5 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which required that an arrested person be taken before a committing magistrate without unnecessary delay. It was said that the requirement that arraignment of a defendant be without unnecessary delay was intended to interpose a neutral party between defendants and the prosecutorial system, for the purpose of informing defendants of their basic constitutional rights. The opinion outlined the defendant’s detention as follows:

The circumstances of this case preclude a holding that arraignment was “without unnecessary delay.” [The defendant] was arrested in the early afternoon and was detained at headquarters within the vicinity of numerous committing magistrates. Even though the police had ample evidence from other sources than the [defendant] for regarding the [defendant] as the chief suspect, they first questioned him for approximately a half hour. When this inquiry of a nineteen-year-old lad of limited intelligence produced no confession, the police asked him to submit to a "lie-detector" test. He was not told of his rights to counsel or to a preliminary examination before a magistrate, nor was he warned that he might keep silent and "that any statement made by him may be used against him." After four hours of further detention at headquarters, during which arraignment could easily have been made in the same building in which the police headquarters were housed, [the defendant] was examined by the lie-detector operator for another hour and a half before his story began to waver. Not until he had confessed, when any judicial caution had lost its purpose, did the police arraign him.

The judgment of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals was reversed.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Arraignment; Crimes Not Involving Death

Issue Presented: Whether procedural changes in South Carolina's death penalty law could be applied to the defendant.

Case Holding: Procedural changes in South Carolina's death penalty law could be applied to the defendant, even though the procedures were not in existence at the time of the commission of the defendant's crime.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Joe Malloy, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of South Carolina. The South Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's claim that the application of new death penalty procedures to him violated ex post facto principles. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice McReynolds: Justice McReynolds held that application to the defendant of new death penalty procedures did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. The opinion explained the Court's reasoning as follows:

Under the South Carolina laws effective when the crime was committed the punishment for one found guilty of murder without recommendation to mercy was death by hanging within the county jail, or its inclosure, in the presence of specified witnesses. The subsequent act prescribed electrocution as the method of producing death instead of hanging, fixed the place therefor within the penitentiary, and permitted the presence of more invited witnesses than had theretofore been allowed.

... The constitutional inhibition of ex post facto laws was intended to secure substantial personal rights against arbitrary and oppressive legislative action, and not to obstruct mere alteration in conditions deemed necessary for the orderly infliction of humane punishment....

The statute under consideration did not change the penalty — death — for murder, but only the mode of producing this, together with certain nonessential details in respect of surroundings. The punishment was not increased, and some of the odious features incident to the old method were abated.

The judgment of the South Carolina Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Ex Post Facto Clause

Mandamus The writ of mandamus is a common-law device used to compel an official to carry out a mandatory, non-discretionary act. A petition for a writ of mandamus will not be issued by a court, if the act sought to be compelled is one that is not mandatory by law for an official to perform. Also, if a defendant has another legal remedy available, mandamus will not be granted. See also Taylor v. Alabama

Mandate The term "mandate" is used to describe an order from an appellate court that makes its decision final and effective. When an appellate court makes a decision on a case appealed to it from a lower court, the appellate court will issue a mandate that embodies the appellate court's disposition of the case. A mandate is usually issued after an appellate court issues a written opinion of its decision. An example of the guidelines for issuing a mandate by federal courts is provided below:

Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure — Rule 41 Mandate.

a. Contents. Unless the court directs that a formal mandate issue, the mandate consists of a certified copy of the judgment, a copy of the court's opinion, if any, and any direction about costs.

b. When Issued. The court's mandate must issue 7 calendar days after the time to file a petition for rehearing expires, or 7 calendar days after entry of an order denying a timely petition for panel rehearing, petition for rehearing en banc, or motion for stay of mandate, whichever is later. The court may shorten or extend the time.

c. Effective Date. The mandate is effective when issued.

d. Staying the Mandate.

1. On Petition for Rehearing or Motion. The timely filing of a petition for panel rehearing, petition for rehearing en banc, or motion for stay of mandate, stays the mandate until disposition of the petition or motion, unless the court orders otherwise.

2. Pending Petition for Certiorari.

A. A party may move to stay the mandate pending the filing of a petition for a writ of certiorari in the Supreme Court. The motion must be served on all parties and must show that the certiorari petition would present a substantial question and that there is good cause for a stay.

B. The stay must not exceed 90 days, unless the period is extended for good cause or unless the party who obtained the stay files a petition for the writ and so notifies the circuit clerk in writing within the period of the stay. In that case, the stay continues until the Supreme Court's final disposition.

C. The court may require a bond or other security as a condition to granting or continuing a stay of the mandate.

D. The court of appeals must issue the mandate immediately when a copy of a Supreme Court order denying the petition for writ of certiorari is filed.

An issue that capital felons frequently contested under pre-modern capital punishment law was the setting of an imminent execution date by trial courts, before appellate courts issued their mandates. The United States Supreme Court ruled in a few early capital punishment cases that State trial courts could set imminent execution dates before it issued its mandate in appealed cases, although it believed the better practice would be to wait until its mandate was issued before setting an imminent execution date. In the case of Calderon v. Thompson, the Supreme Court held that an appellate court could not recall its mandate denying habeas corpus relief to a State prisoner, unless it does so to avoid a miscarriage of justice. See also Bell v. Thompson; Calderon v. Thompson; In Re Durrant; In Re Jurgio

Mandatory Death Penalty Statutes It is a common practice for legislatures to enact criminal offenses that carry mandatory penalties; that is, if a defendant is convicted of the offense, he or she must be sentenced according to the requirements of the statute. Mandatory sentencing statutes remove the discretion of trial judges to determine the appropriate punishment for defendants on an individualized basis.

Mandatory death penalty statutes existed in all of the original thirteen colonies prior to the Revolutionary War. Offenses that carried mandatory death sentences included murder, arson, rape, robbery, burglary, sodomy, piracy, and treason. The acceptance of mandatory death penalty statutes by the colonists was attributed to the common law and its insistence upon imposing the death penalty on all felony offenses.

Acceptance of mandatory death penalty statutes by the colonists slowly faded after the Revolutionary War ended. Over time, many states repealed all mandatory death penalty statutes, while others limited the number of offenses that were subject to mandatory death sentences. The United States Supreme Court did not squarely address this issue until 1976. In two cases in which it rendered written opinions, Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976), and Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976), the Supreme Court ruled that mandatory death penalty statutes violate the federal Constitution because they do not allow for an individualized determination as to the appropriateness of the death penalty, based upon the character of the capital defendant and the circumstances of the crime.

At the same time that the decisions in Woodson and Roberts were rendered, the Supreme Court issued memorandum decisions in forty-three capital murder cases, which invalidated death sentences because they were imposed under mandatory death penalty statutes. The states and number of cases involved in the memorandum decisions were North Carolina (thirty-four cases), Oklahoma (six cases), and Louisiana (three cases). See also Roberts v. Louisiana (I); Roberts v. Louisiana (II); Sumner v. Shuman; Woodson v. North Carolina

Manson Family Between July and August 1969, a religious cult known as the Manson Family killed nine people in the Los Angeles County area. The victims were Sharon Tate, Leno and Rosemary LaBianca, Gary Hinman, Steve Parent, Abigail Folger, Voityck Frykowski, Jay Sebring, and Donald Shea.

The Manson Family were followers of Charles Manson. Authorities estimate that, at one point, the Manson Family numbered over 100 followers.

Manson was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on November 12, 1934. He spent all of his youth living with different relatives in various states. The instability of his youth sent him to prison for much of his early adult life. Manson's initial troubles with the law involved only property crimes. On March 21, 1967, Manson was released from a long stretch in a California prison. This release started him along the path to a different type of crime — murder.

Manson took up residence in San Francisco upon his last release from prison. At this point in his life he believed he could make a living from writing songs. Manson mixed his song writing with drug use and began to attract followers, many of whom were very young women with troubled emotional lives. By supplying his followers with LSD and amphetamines, Manson quickly found that he could control them. The members of his newfound family who eventually killed people for him were Charles Watson, Patricia Krenwinkel, Bruce Davis, Steve Grogan, Susan Denise Atkins, Robert Beausoleil, Leslie Van Houton, and Linda Kasabian.

In spring of 1968, Manson and his family traveled to the Los Angeles area in an old school bus in search of someone to produce his songs. Eventually, Manson and a couple of his followers moved into the Canyon Road home of Gary Hinman, a music teacher with connections to pop singing groups. Hinman introduced Manson to Dennis Wilson of the Beach Boys, but Manson was not able to get Wilson to take any of his songs seriously.

After failing to get his songs recognized through Hinman, Manson and his followers convinced a rancher named George Spahn to let them live on his ranch. Manson continued to try to meet influential people in the music business, but was unsuccessful in persuading anyone to take his work seriously. Eventually, Manson became bitter. He decided to strike back violently at those he believed were responsible for stopping him from becoming a wealthy and famous songwriter.

The first victim of Manson's bitterness was Hinman. Manson and four of his followers visited Hinman in early August 1969, initially seeking money. When Hinman refused to provide them with money, Manson ordered one of his followers to kill him. The order was obeyed.

The next battleground was the Los Angeles home of a music industry executive that had rejected Manson. Manson had visited the home in March 1969, but learned that the music executive had moved and leased the home to Sharon Tate and her husband Roman Polanski. Manson did not like the treatment he received on his visit. On August 8, Manson sent four of followers to exact revenge at the Tate residence. When the four followers arrived, they found Tate (who was pregnant) at home with four guests, Steve Parent, Abigail Folger, Voityck Frykowski, and

Anderson*, 493 P.2d 880 (Cal. 1972), which invalidated the death penalty in California, and the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), which invalidated the death penalty in the nation. (Los Angeles Police)*

Jay Sebring. When Manson's followers left the home, Tate and her guests were dead — shot and stabbed to death.

On the night after the massacre at the Tate residence, Manson and some of his followers searched randomly for other victims. They eventually broke into the home of wealthy supermarket magnate Leno LaBianca and his wife Rosemary. Manson ordered three of his followers to kill the couple. The order was obeyed.

The final victim of Manson's quest for revenge was Donald Shea. He was a ranch hand on the ranch where Manson and his family were living. Shea was killed because he knew about the murders at the Tate residence.

Authorities were baffled by all of the killings. They were unable to find a suspect until after they arrested some of Manson's followers on auto theft charges. While they were locked up, one of Manson's followers began to brag to other inmates about taking part in the massacre at the Tate residence. Authorities learned of the bragging and turned their investigation on Manson (he was already in jail on a minor charge).

The investigation into Manson was fruitful. Authorities compiled enough evidence to bring murder charges against Manson and eight of his followers: Watson, Krenwinkel, Davis, Grogan, Atkins, Beausoleil, Houton, and Kasabian. Several trials were held between 1970 and 1972, which resulted in murder convictions and death sentences for Manson and his followers. However, as a result of a decision by the California Supreme Court in People v. Anderson, 493 P.2d 880 (Cal. 1972), which invalidated the death penalty in the state, and the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), which invalidated the death penalty in the nation, the death sentences for Manson and his followers were commuted to life imprisonment.

Marshall, John John Marshall served as chief justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1801 to 1835. While on the Supreme Court, Marshall was known as a forceful moderate interpreter of the Constitution.

Marshall was born in Virginia on September 24, 1755. His educational training was obtained primarily at home. Marshall practiced law in Virginia and was known to handle mostly appellate cases. He had a relatively uneventful political career that took him to Virginia's House of Delegates from 1782 to 1795. In 1798, Marshall was named an emissary to France. He served as a member of Congress from 1799 to 1800. In 1800, President John Adams appointed Marshall chief justice of the Supreme Court. He assumed that office on March 4, 1801.

Marshall was known to issue only a few capital punishment opinions as chief justice (in his capacity as a Supreme Court circuit judge he presided over a number of capital cases). The case of United States v. Bevins best illustrated the application of Marshall's moderate philosophy to capital punishment. The issue presented in Bevins was whether a federal court in Massachusetts had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for a murder committed on a military ship anchored in the Boston harbor. Marshall found that jurisdiction did not reside in the federal court because, by statute, such an offense had to be committed on waters outside the territory of any State. Marshall concluded that the offense charged against the defendant in Bevins was "unquestionably within the original jurisdiction of Massachusetts." Marshall died on July 6, 1835.

Marshall, Thurgood Thurgood Marshall served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1967 to 1991. While on the Supreme Court, Marshall was known as a liberal interpreter of the Constitution, with respect to individual liberties and rights.

Marshall was born in Baltimore, Maryland, on July 8, 1908. He obtained an undergraduate degree from Lincoln University and a law degree from Howard University School of Law in 1933. As an attorney, Marshall took up the cause of civil rights and comprised an impressive record of legal victories that help dismantle racial segregation in the United States. He was also active in arguing a number of capital punishment cases before the Supreme Court.

Marshall was appointed as an appellate judge for the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in 1961. In 1965, he was appointed Solicitor General of the United States. President Lyndon B. Johnson appointed Marshall as the first African American on the Supreme Court in 1967.

While on the Supreme Court, Marshall was an unrelenting opponent of capital punishment. The anti-death penalty position taken by Marshall eventually led him, alongside Justice William Brennan, to issue the greatest number of capital punishment dissenting opinions, memorandums, and statements than any other person to ever sit on the Supreme Court. The opinion which best captured Marshall's view of capital punishment was his concurring opinion in Furman v. Georgia, the case which temporarily halted executions in the nation. Marshall wrote in Furman:

It ... is evident that the burden of capital punishment falls upon the poor, the ignorant, and the underprivileged members of society. It is the poor, and the members of minority groups who are least able to voice their complaints against capital punishment. Their impotence leaves them victims of a sanction that the wealthier, better-represented, just-as-guilty person can escape. So long as the capital sanction is used only against the forlorn, easily forgotten members of society, legislators are content to maintain the status quo, because change would draw attention to the problem and concern might develop. Ignorance is perpetuated and apathy soon becomes its mate, and we have today's situation....

In striking down capital punishment, this Court does not malign our system of government. On the contrary, it pays homage to it. Only in a free society could right triumph in difficult times, and could civilization record its magnificent advancement. In recognizing the humanity of our fellow beings, we pay ourselves the highest tribute. We achieve a major milestone in the long road up from barbarism ... by shunning capital punishment.

Marshall died of heart failure in Washington, D.C., on January 25, 1993.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant proved that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant failed to prove that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him, by merely asserting such allegations in written motions without any evidence to support the claim.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Rufus Martin, was indicted for capital murder by the State of Texas. Prior to trial, the defendant motioned the trial court to dismiss the indictment on the ground that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. The motion was denied. After the jury was selected, the defendant moved to quash the panel of jurors chosen to preside over his trial, on the grounds that blacks were systematically excluded from the petit jury pool. The motion was denied. The defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the discrimination issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan held that the defendant failed to prove that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The opinion stated that the defendant had to do more than make bare assertions of discrimination. He had to present evidence to support his allegations. The opinion stated: "What an accused is entitled to demand, under the Constitution of the United States, is that, in organizing the grand jury as well as in the impaneling of the petit jury, there shall be no exclusion of his race, and no discrimination against them, because of their race or color. Whether such discrimination was practiced in this case could have been manifested only by proof overcoming the denial on the part of the state of the facts set out in the written motions to quash. The absence of any such proof from the record in this case is fatal to the charge of the accused that his rights under the 14th Amendment were violated."

Justice Harlan made clear that the Court was intolerant with racial discrimination in grand and petit jury selection, as he wrote:

For it is the settled doctrine of this court that whenever, by any action of a state, whether through its legislature, through its courts, or through its executive or administrative officers, all persons of the African race are excluded solely because of their race or color, from serving as grand jurors in the criminal prosecution of a person of the African race, the equal protection of the laws is denied to him, contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. So if, upon the hearing of the written motion to quash the panel of petit jurors, the facts stated in that motion had been proved, or if the opportunity to establish them by evidence had been denied to the accused, the judgment would be reversed.

But the record before us makes no such case. Although the accused in each of his written motions prayed the court to hear evidence thereon, it does not appear that he introduced any evidence whatever to prove discrimination against his race because of their color, or made any actual offer of evidence in support of either motion. The reasonable inference from the record is that he did not offer any evidence on the charge of discrimination, but was content to rely simply on his verified written motions, although the facts stated in them were controverted by the state. The trial court, it must be assumed from the record, had nothing before it, when deciding the motions to quash, except the written motions and the written answers thereto.

The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was affirmed. See also Coleman v. Alabama (I); Coleman v. Alabama (II); Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; Sims v. Georgia (II); Whitus v. Georgia

Martinsville Seven Between February 2, 1951, and February 5, 1951, the largest number of executions in the nation for the crime of rape occurred. During that period, the State of Virginia executed the so-called “Martinsville Seven”: Joe Henry Hampton, Frank Hairston, Booker T. Millner, Howard Hairston, Francis DeSales Grayson, John Clabon Taylor, and James Luther Hairston. All of the Martinsville Seven were African American.

The crime committed by the Martinsville Seven occurred on January 8, 1949, in the town of Martinsville, Virginia. On the afternoon of that day, Ruby Stroud Floyd was abducted from the street by the men, dragged to a wooded area near railroad tracks, and raped. The crime was reported and the authorities arrested the seven men responsible. The men gave varying degrees of confessions against each other.

Trials were held for the seven men in mid-1949 (there were only six trials because two of the men were tried together). They were each convicted and sentenced to death. In spite of strong protests from members of the African American community, the Martinsville Seven were sent to their deaths in Virginia’s electric chair.

Legal and social historians have criticized the execution of the Martinsville Seven on grounds other than innocence. The evidence, even without confessions, established that the men raped Floyd. The damaging indictment against the executions was the fact that between 1908 and 1950, the State of Virginia executed forty-five men for the crime of rape — all of whom were African American. Although white males were convicted of the crime of rape during that period, not one was ever put to death for the crime. It is for this reason that historians have called the execution of the Martinsville Seven a travesty of justice.

Maryland The State of Maryland is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on July 1, 1975.

Maryland has a three-tier legal system. The State’s legal system is composed of a court of appeals, a special court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Maryland Court of Appeals is presided over by a chief judge and six associate judges. The Maryland Court of Special Appeals is composed of a chief judge and twelve associate judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of Maryland are tried in the circuit courts.

Maryland’s capital punishment offenses are set out under Md. Code Crim.L. §2-201(a). This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. A deliberate, premeditated, and willful killing;
2. Committed by lying in wait;
3. Committed by poison; or
4. Committed in the perpetration of or an attempt to perpetrate: (i) arson in the first degree; (ii) burning a barn, stable, tobacco house, warehouse, or other outbuilding; (iii) burglary in the first, second, or third degree; (iv) carjacking or armed carjacking; (v) escape in the first degree from a State correctional facility or a local correctional facility; (vi) kidnapping; (vii) mayhem; (viii) rape; (ix) robbery; (x) sexual offense in the first or second degree; (xi) sodomy; or (xii) use of destructive devices.

Capital murder in Maryland is punishable by death or life imprisonment with or without parole. A capital prosecution in Maryland is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment without parole. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Maryland.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Md. Crim.L. Code § 2-203(g) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

- i. One or more persons committed the murder of a law enforcement officer while in the performance of his duties;
- ii. The defendant committed the murder at a time when he was confined in a correctional facility;
- iii. The defendant committed the murder in furtherance of an escape or an attempt to escape from or evade the lawful custody, arrest, or detention of or by an officer or guard of a correctional institution or by a law enforcement officer;
- iv. The victim was taken or attempted to be taken in the course of an abduction, kidnapping, or an attempt to abduct or kidnap;
- v. The victim was an abducted child;
- vi. The defendant committed the murder under an agreement or contract for remuneration or promise of remuneration to commit the murder;
- vii. The defendant employed or engaged another to commit the murder and the murder was committed under an agreement or contract for remuneration or promise of remuneration;
- viii. The defendant committed the murder while under a sentence of death or imprisonment for life;
- ix. The defendant committed more than one murder in the first degree arising out of the same incident; or
- x. The defendant committed the murder while committing or attempting to commit arson in the first degree; carjacking or armed carjacking; rape in the first degree; robbery; or sexual offense in the first degree.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Maryland has provided by Md. Crim.L. Code § 2-203(h) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

- i. The defendant previously has not been found guilty of a crime of violence; entered a guilty plea or a plea of nolo contendere to a charge of a crime of violence; or received probation before judgment for a crime of violence;
- ii. The victim was a participant in the conduct of the defendant or consented to the act that caused the victim’s death;
- iii. The defendant acted under substantial duress, domination, or provocation of another, but not so substantial as to constitute a complete defense to the prosecution;
- iv. The murder was committed while the capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of the defendant’s conduct or to conform that conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired due to emotional disturbance, mental disorder, or mental incapacity;
- v. The defendant was of a youthful age at the time of the murder;

vi. The act of the defendant was not the sole proximate cause of the victim's death;

vii. It is unlikely that the defendant will engage in further criminal activity that would be a continuing threat to society; or viii. Any other fact that the court or jury specifically sets forth in writing as a mitigating circumstance in the case.

Under Maryland's capital punishment statute, the Maryland Court of Appeals automatically reviews a sentence of death. Maryland uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility is located in Baltimore, Maryland.

Pursuant to the laws of Maryland, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor may commute a death sentence to any length of time he or she deems appropriate.

Under the laws of Maryland, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Md. Code Corr.Serv. § 3-907:

a. In addition to those individuals who are otherwise required to supervise, perform, or participate in an execution, the Commissioner shall select at least 6 but not more than 12 respectable citizens to observe the execution.

b. Counsel for the inmate and a member of the clergy may be present at the execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Maryland executed only five capital felons. During this period, Maryland did not have any female capital felons on death row. A total of eight capital felons were on death row in Maryland as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as five black inmates and three white inmates.

Mass Murder The phrase "mass murder" is defined differently for various purposes. As used here, mass murder means the intentional and unlawful killing of ten or more people in a single incident. There were relatively few mass murders in the United States during the twentieth century. The majority of such incidents occurred after 1980. Two of the most devastating incidents involved the Oklahoma bombing in 1995, when Timothy J. McVeigh killed 168 people, and the September 11, 2001, airplane attacks by foreign militants that killed 2,948 known victims.

MASS MURDER WEAPON 1927–1999

Massachusetts In 1984, the Massachusetts Supreme Court found the State's death penalty statute unconstitutional in Commonwealth v. Colon-Cruz, 470 N.E.2d 116 (Mass. 1984). The State has not amended the statute to correct the problems found with it by the appellate court. The last execution by the State was in 1947.

Massachusetts Citizens Against the Death Penalty Massachusetts Citizens Against the Death Penalty (MCADP) was founded in 1928 and is considered the oldest active anti-death penalty organization in the nation. MCADP was established in response to the 1927 executions of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti. Part of the success of the organization is shown by the fact that Massachusetts has not executed anyone since 1947. The organization maintains a newsletter called MCADP News.

Matthews, Stanley Stanley Matthews served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1881 to 1889. While on the Supreme Court, Matthews displayed a moderate philosophy on most issues, but embraced a few equal protection issues with a liberal disposition.

Matthews was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on July 21, 1824. He was a graduate of Kenyon College. Matthews studied law as an apprentice and was admitted to the bar in Tennessee. Matthews's career path included being a lawyer, newspaper editor, and trial judge. In 1877, he was elected to the United States Senate as a representative of Ohio. In 1881, President James Garfield nominated Matthews to the Supreme Court.

Matthews wrote only a few capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. However, one of his opinions, Hurtado v. California, had profound impact on capital punishment and criminal law in general. The issue raised in Hurtado was whether the Constitution permitted the State of California to use information, rather than a grand jury indictment, to prosecute a defendant. Matthews, writing for the Court, held that the Constitution did not require States to use an indictment to commence a criminal prosecution. Matthews wrote: "The natural and obvious inference is that, in the sense of the constitution, 'due process of law' was not meant or intended to include ... the institution and procedure of a grand jury in any case." Matthews died on March 22, 1889.

Issue Presented: Whether improper contact with the jury was made during its deliberations.

Case Holding: Improper contact with the jury was made during its deliberations; therefore, the judgment against the defendant could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Clyde Mattox, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that improper contact with the jury deprived him of a fair trial. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice wrote that two types of improper contact with the jury were alleged by the defendant. The defendant said the court bailiff improperly stated to the jury that the defendant had killed other people. The defendant also complained of the jury being given a newspaper reporting negatively about him. The chief justice found that the record substantiated the allegations by the defendant and that the conduct complained of warranted a new trial. The opinion explained:

It is vital in capital cases that the jury should pass upon the case free from external causes tending to disturb the exercise of deliberate and unbiased judgment. Nor can any ground of suspicion that the administration of justice has been interfered with be tolerated....

Private communications, possibly prejudicial, between jurors and third persons, or witnesses, or the officer in charge, are absolutely forbidden, and invalidate the verdict, at least unless their harmlessness is made to appear....

The jury in the case before us retired to consider of their verdict on the 7th of October, and had not agreed on the morning of the 8th, when the newspaper article was read to them. It is not open to reasonable doubt that the tendency of that article was injurious to the defendant. Statements that the defendant had been tried for his life once before; that the evidence against him was claimed to be very strong by those who had heard all the testimony; that the argument for the prosecution was such that the defendant's friends gave up all hope of any result but conviction; and that it was expected that the deliberations of the jury would not last an hour before they would return a verdict,— could have no other tendency. Nor can it be legitimately contended that the misconduct of the bailiff could have been otherwise than prejudicial. Information that this was the third person Clyde Mattox had killed, coming from the officer in charge, precludes any other conclusion.

The judgment of the federal trial court reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. See also Mauritania Capital punishment is carried out in Mauritania. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Islamic law. The constitution of Mauritania was adopted on July 12, 1991.

Issue Presented: Whether prospective jurors were unlawfully removed from the defendant's trial.

Case Holding: The issue of improper removal of potential jurors was raised for the first time in the Supreme Court; therefore, the issue would be remanded for a hearing in the lower federal courts.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Maxwell, was convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Arkansas. The Arkansas Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court alleging several constitutional procedural issues. The district court rejected the petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. In seeking review by the United States Supreme Court, the defendant raised an issue in his appeal that was not presented to the lower federal courts. The defendant alleged that several prospective jurors had been removed for cause from the jury panel in his case, merely because they voiced general objections to the death penalty. This issue was a matter that the Court held was impermissible in Witherspoon v. Illinois, a case decided after the defendant's trial. The Court granted certiorari to consider this belated issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion held that the defendant's claim that potential jurors were unlawfully removed from his case warranted full development by the lower courts. The opinion pointed out that under Witherspoon, "a sentence of death cannot be carried out if the jury that imposed or recommended it was chosen by excluding veniremen for cause simply because they voiced general objections to the death penalty or expressed conscientious or religious scruples against its infliction." It was said that "it cannot be supposed that once such people take their oaths as jurors they will be unable to follow conscientiously the instructions of a trial judge and to consider fairly the imposition of the death sentence in a particular case." Moreover, the opinion reasoned: "Unless a venireman states unambiguously that he would automatically vote against the imposition of capital punishment no matter what the trial might reveal, it simply cannot be assumed that that is his position." In view of the possible Witherspoon violation, the judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded to the district court for a full evidentiary hearing on the issue.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a statement indicating he dissented from the Court's decision because he believed Witherspoon was erroneously decided.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape, without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Jury Selection; Witherspoon v. Illinois

Issue Presented: Whether the statutory aggravating circumstance "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel" was constitutionally vague as applied to the defendant.

Case Holding: The statutory aggravating circumstance "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel" was constitutionally vague as applied to the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Cartwright, was found guilty of capital murder by an Oklahoma jury. During the penalty phase, the jury imposed the death penalty upon finding that two statutory aggravating circumstances, including the circumstance that the murder was "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel," had been established and that these circumstances outweighed the mitigating evidence. The Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence.

After exhausting State post-conviction remedies, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The district court denied relief. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the statutory aggravating circumstance "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel" was vague within the meaning of the Constitution. The appeal court also ruled that the Oklahoma courts had not adopted a limiting construction that cured the infirmity. The appellate court therefore enjoined the execution of the death sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White ruled that the statutory aggravating circumstance was unconstitutionally vague. The opinion rejected the State's contention that the death penalty should stand because the jury found another, unchallenged aggravating circumstance sufficient to sustain the sentence. It was said that Oklahoma had no procedure for attempting to save a death penalty when one of several aggravating circumstances found by the jury was held to be invalid or unsupported by evidence; it simply vacated the death sentence and automatically imposed a life imprisonment sentence. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, J., Joined: Justice Brennan issued a concurring statement joining the Court's opinion but indicating he "would direct that the resentencing proceedings be circumscribed such that the State may not reimpose the death sentence." *See also Heinous, Atrocious, Cruel, or Depraved Aggravator; Lewis v. Issues Presented: (1) Whether federal courts are bound by a ruling of the International Court of Justice which required courts of the United States to consider the defendant's claim for relief under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, notwithstanding the application of procedural default doctrines. (2) Whether federal courts must give effect to a judgment by the International Court of Justice.

Case Holding: The issues presented would not be addressed because the issues were pending before a Texas State court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: Jose Ernesto Medellin was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Texas for the 1993 murder of two girls. The conviction and death sentence were affirmed on direct appeal. Medellin then filed a State habeas corpus petition alleging that his rights under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations were violated because the State did not inform him of his rights to consular assistance. The State trial court rejected the claim, which was affirmed by the State's appellate court. Medellin then filed a federal habeas petition alleging a violation of the Vienna Convention. A federal district judge also rejected the claim and dismissed the petition. Medellin then filed for an application for appeal with a federal Court of Appeals.

While the application for appeal was pending, Mexico filed a complaint against the United States with the International Court of Justice. Mexico filed the complaint on behalf of fifty-four Mexican nationals on death row in various states, including Medellin. The complaint alleged that the Vienna Convention rights of the death row Mexican nationals were violated because they were never informed that they had a right to consular assistance when they were arrested. The International Court ruled in favor of Mexico and ordered that the United States review and reconsider the convictions and sentences of fifty-one of the Mexican nationals, notwithstanding the application of State and federal procedural default rules.

After the International Court rendered its judgment, the federal Court of Appeals denied Medellin's application for appeal. The Court of Appeals denied the application on procedural default grounds and because it found that the Vienna Convention did not provide any enforceable right to individuals. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the Vienna Convention claims in light of the International Court's judgment. However, while the case was pending in the Supreme Court, President George W. Bush issued a memorandum for the Attorney General, which provided that State courts must give effect to the judgment of the International Court. Subsequent to the president's memorandum and four days before the case was to be argued in the Supreme Court, Medellin filed another State habeas petition which relied upon the president's memorandum.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: As a result of the president's memorandum and Medellin's new State habeas petition, the Supreme Court decided to dismiss the writ of certiorari as improvidently granted. In doing so, the Court held: "In light of the possibility that the Texas courts will provide Medellin with the review he seeks pursuant to the [ICJ] judgment and the President's memorandum, and the potential for review in this Court once the Texas courts have heard and de-cidied Medellin's pending action, we think it would be unwise to reach and resolve ... the questions here presented."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Ginsburg, in Which Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Ginsburg concurred in the Court's judgment. She wrote separately in response to Justice O'Connor's dissenting opinion, which suggested the case be remanded to the federal Court of Appeals. Justice Ginsburg believed that the proper course was to permit the Texas courts to have an initial opportunity to address the issues presented.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which Stevens, Souter, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice O'Connor dissented from the Court's judgment. She argued that the case presented federal questions that should have been remanded for consideration by the Court of Appeals. Justice O'Connor also suggested that the Court of Appeals could have stayed further proceedings until after the Texas courts ruled on Medellin's habeas petition.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter: Justice Souter dissented from the Court's judgment. He argued that the Court should have stayed its proceeding until the Texas courts ruled on Medellin's petition or, alternatively, the Court should have ruled on the Court of Appeals' denial of Medellin's application for appeal.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Breyer, in Which Stevens, J., Joined: Justice Breyer dissented from the Court's judgment. He argued that the Court should have stayed its proceeding until the Texas courts ruled on Medellin's petition or, alternatively, the Court should have vacated the Court of Appeals' decision and remanded the case to that court. See also Foreign Nationals and Capital Punishment; International Court of Justice

Mens Rea The phrase "mens rea" means guilty mind or mental state. Except for a few non-capital regulatory offenses, called strict liability offenses, all crimes must have a mens rea. The recognized criminal mentes reae include intentional (referred to in some statutes as felonious, wanton, purposeful, or willful), knowing, reckless, and negligent. Prosecutors are required to prove the mens rea of an offense beyond a reasonable doubt.

All capital offenses have "intentional" as the requisite mens rea that must be proven at the guilt phase of a trial in order to convict a defendant. Under traditional capital punishment jurisprudence, mens rea played no role in the imposition of the death penalty. Traditional capital punishment required only that mens rea be proven in order to find a defendant guilty. Modern capital punishment law has carved out one exception to the general rule that mens rea is irrelevant for sentencing purposes.

Under modern capital punishment, the death penalty cannot be imposed upon a defendant convicted of a capital offense involving co-defendants if during the penalty phase it is shown that the defendant neither took life, attempted to take life, nor intended to take life. In this situation, in order for the death penalty to be imposed, a prosecutor is constitutionally required to establish, at the penalty phase, that the defendant's mental state was one of reckless indifference to the value of human life. See also Enmund v. Florida; Tison v. Arizona

Mentally Retarded Capital Felon Much debate has taken place on the question of whether the federal Constitution prohibits executing a capital felon who is mentally retarded. In Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302 (1989), the United States Supreme Court held that the Constitution did not prohibit executing a person who was mentally retarded at the time of execution. The Penry ruling was greeted with a great deal of criticism and ultimately rejected by many State legislatures. Ultimately Penry was overruled by the decision in Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002). The decision in Atkins yielded to public pressure and held that the Constitution prohibited executing mentally retarded prisoners.

Johnny Frank Garrett was seventeen years old when he committed capital murder in Texas. At the time of his execution on February 11, 1992, it was believed that he suffered from mental retardation. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

B. If the state files a notice of intent to seek the death penalty, the court, unless the defendant objects, shall appoint a prescreening psychological expert in order to determine the defendant's intelligence quotient using current community, nationally and culturally accepted intelligence testing procedures. The prescreening psychological expert shall submit a written report of the intelligence quotient determination to the court within ten days of the testing of the defendant. If the defendant objects to the prescreening, the defendant waives the right to a pretrial determination of mental retardation status. The waiver does not preclude the defendant from offering evidence of the defendant's mental retardation in the penalty phase.

C. If the prescreening psychological expert determines that the defendant's intelligence quotient is higher than seventy-five, the notice of intent to seek the death penalty shall not be dismissed on the ground that the defendant has mental retardation. If the prescreening psychological expert determines that the defendant's intelligence quotient is higher than seventy-five, the report shall be sealed by the court and be available only to the defendant. The report shall be released on the motion of any party if the defendant introduces the report in the present case or is convicted of an offense in the present case and the sentence is final. A prescreening determination that the defendant's intelligence quotient is higher than seventy-five does not prevent the defendant from introducing evidence of the defendant's mental retardation or diminished mental capacity at the penalty phase of the sentencing proceeding.

D. If the prescreening psychological expert determines that the defendant's intelligence quotient is seventy-five or less, the trial court, within ten days of receiving the written report, shall order the state and the defendant to each nominate three experts in mental retardation, or jointly nominate a single expert in mental retardation. The trial court shall appoint one expert in mental retardation nominated by the state and one expert in mental retardation nominated by the defendant, or a single expert in mental retardation jointly nominated by the state and the defendant, none of whom made the prescreening determination of the defendant's intelligence quotient. The trial court, in its discretion, may appoint an additional expert in mental retardation who was neither nominated by the state nor the defendant, and who did not make the prescreening determination of the defendant's intelligence quotient. Within forty-five days after the trial court orders the state and the defendant to nominate experts in mental retardation, or on the appointment of such experts, whichever is later, the state and the defendant shall provide to the experts in mental retardation and the court any available records that may be relevant to the defendant's mental retardation status. The court may extend the deadline for providing records on good cause shown by the state or defendant.

The statutory laws of Arizona provide an illustration of how courts determine whether a capital felon is mentally retarded.

Ariz. Code § 13-703.02. Mental Evaluations of Capital Defendants

A. In any case in which the state files a notice of intent to seek the death penalty, a person who is found to have mental retardation pursuant to this section shall not be sentenced to death but shall be sentenced to life or natural life.

E. Not less than twenty days after receipt of the records provided pursuant to subsection D of this section, or twenty days after the expiration of the deadline for providing the records, whichever is later, each expert in mental retardation shall examine the defendant using current community, nationally and culturally accepted physical, developmental, psychological and intelligence testing procedures, for the purpose of determining whether the defendant has mental retardation. Within fifteen days of examining the defendant, each expert in mental retardation shall submit a written report to the trial court that includes the expert's opinion as to whether the defendant has mental retardation.

F. If the scores on all the tests for intelligence quotient administered to the defendant are above seventy, the notice of intent to seek the death penalty shall not be dismissed on the ground that the defendant has mental retardation. This does not preclude the defendant from introducing evidence of the defendant's mental retardation or diminished mental capacity at the penalty phase of the sentencing proceeding.

G. No less than thirty days after the experts in mental retardation submit reports to the court and before trial, the trial court shall hold a hearing to determine if the defendant has mental retardation. At the hearing, the defendant has the burden of proving mental retardation by clear and convincing evidence. A determination by the trial court that the defendant's intelligence quotient is sixty-five or lower establishes a rebuttable presumption that the defendant has mental retardation. Nothing in this subsection shall preclude a defendant with an intelligence quotient of seventy or below from proving mental retardation by clear and convincing evidence.

H. If the trial court finds that the defendant has mental retardation, the trial court shall dismiss the intent to seek the death penalty, shall not impose a sentence of death on the defendant if the defendant is convicted of first degree murder.... If the trial court finds that the defendant does not have mental retardation, the court's finding does not prevent the defendant from introducing evidence of the defendant's mental retardation or diminished mental capacity at the penalty phase of the sentencing proceeding.

I. If the trial court finds that the defendant has mental retardation, the trial court shall dismiss the intent to seek the death penalty, shall not impose a sentence of death on the defendant if the defendant is convicted of first degree murder.... If the trial court finds that the defendant does not have mental retardation, the court's finding does not prevent the defendant from introducing evidence of the defendant's mental retardation or diminished mental capacity at the penalty phase of the sentencing proceeding.

MENTALLY RETARDED CAPITAL FELONS EXECUTED 1976-2002

Methods of Execution The development of methods to execute capital felons has been shaped by a desire to bring about the most efficient and humane way of carrying out executions. While the common law permitted disemboweling, beheading, burning, and quartering, Anglo-American jurisprudence resisted such methods of executions because of constitutional restraints on cruel and unusual punishments. The order in which execution methods developed in the United States was hanging, firing squad, electrocution, lethal gas, and lethal injection. Issue Presented: Whether a trial judge who knows or should know that a defendant's attorney has a conflict of interest must find that the conflict adversely affected counsel's performance before a defendant is entitled to a new trial.

Case Holding: A trial judge who knows or should know that a defendant's attorney has a conflict of interest must find that the conflict adversely affected counsel's performance before a defendant is entitled to a new trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Walter Mickens, Jr., was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Virginia for the 1992 murder of Timothy Hall. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal. The defendant filed a federal habeas corpus petition, alleging that his attorney had a conflict of interest that the trial judge knew or reasonably should have known. The conflict of interest involved the trial judge's appointment of the defendant's attorney to represent the victim, who was a juvenile, about a week before the victim was killed. A week after the victim's death, the trial judge appointed the same attorney to represent the defendant. The defendant argued that under the facts of his case prejudice should be presumed from the conflict of interest. The federal district court disagreed and denied habeas relief. A Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia found that the mere fact that the trial judge knew or reasonably should have known of the conflict of interest did not relieve the defendant of the burden of showing that the conflict adversely affected counsel's performance. The opinion stated: "The trial court's awareness of a potential conflict neither renders it more likely that counsel's performance was significantly affected nor in any other way renders the verdict unreliable." The opinion affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeals denying of habeas relief.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Kennedy, in Which O'Connor, J., Joined: Justice Kennedy joined the Court's opinion. He wrote separately to emphasize his belief that creation of a presumption of prejudice under the facts of the case would result in an unworkable rule.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's judgment. He argued that prejudice must be presumed under the facts of the case because the defendant, who was indigent, had no choice in the selection of counsel. Justice Stevens wrote: "A rule that allows the State to foist a murder victim's lawyer onto his accused is not only capricious; it poisons the integrity of our adversary system of justice."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter: Justice Souter dissented from the Court's judgment. He argued that the trial judge had a duty to inquire sua sponte into the conflict and that failure to do so warranted setting aside the judgment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Breyer, in Which Ginsburg, J., Joined: Justice Breyer dissented from the Court's judgment. He argued "that, in a case such as this one, a categorical approach is warranted and automatic reversal is required." See also Right to Counsel

Military Death Penalty Law From its inception, the United States Military has had the power to decree capital punishment during wartime. This authority, however, does not have a long history of being able to court martial and sentence members of the armed forces for capital offenses committed in the United States in peacetime. In the early history of the nation, the powers of court martial were fixed in the Articles of War. Congress enacted the first Articles of War in 1789. The Articles of War adopted by Congress placed significant restrictions on court martial jurisdiction over capital offenses. While the death penalty was authorized for fourteen military offenses, the Articles of War followed the English model of requiring the supremacy of civil court jurisdiction over ordinary capital crimes that were not special military offenses. In 1806, Congress debated and rejected a proposal to remove the death penalty from military jurisdiction.

Over the next two centuries, Congress expanded military jurisdiction. In 1863, Congress granted court martial jurisdiction to the military of common law capital crimes and the authority to impose the death penalty in wartime. In 1916, Congress granted to the military courts a general jurisdiction over common law felonies committed by service members, except for murder and rape committed within the United States during peacetime. Persons accused of murder or rape were to be turned over to the civilian authorities. In 1950, with the passage of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, Congress lifted the restriction on murder and rape.

Not until 1983 did the military confronted a challenge to the constitutionality of the military capital punishment scheme in light of the United States Supreme Court's 1972 decision in Furman v. Georgia. In that case and in United States v. Matthews, 16 M. J. 354 (1983), the military's highest court, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (formerly the Court of Military Appeals) invalidated the military's capital punishment scheme. The court found that the military's death penalty procedures failed to identify specifically the aggravating factors for which the death penalty could be imposed. In making its ruling, the court indicated that either Congress or the president could remedy the defect and that the new procedures could be applied retroactively.

President Ronald Reagan responded to the decision in Matthews on April 13, 1984. The president did so with an executive order promulgating the "Manual for Courts-Martial, United States, 1984." The manual, as embodied in the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Rules of Courts-Martial, reflects some of the concerns expressed by Furman v. Georgia in achieving a fair process for imposing capital punishment. (Although the opportunity has presented itself, the United States Supreme Court has never expressly ruled that Furman v. Georgia applied to military capital punishment.)

Under modern military capital punishment, crimes for which the death penalty may be imposed are set out under 10 U.S.C. § 877 et seq. and include desertion, assaulting or willfully disobeying a superior commissioned officer, mutiny, sedition, misbehavior before the enemy, subordinate compelling surrender, improper use of countersign, forcing a safeguard, aiding the enemy, spying, espionage, improper hazarding of a vessel, misbehavior of a sentinel or lookout, murder, felony murder, and rape. Most of the offenses punishable with death by the military are limited to wartime conduct.

A military capital prosecution is initiated by the convening authority, a high-ranking commanding officer. The convening authority picks those service members who will serve as jurors. The jury must consist of twelve members, unless twelve members are not reasonably available due to physical conditions or military exigencies, in which case the jury may consist of not less than five members. The defendant is permitted to have at least one-third of the jury consisting of enlisted personnel. A defendant is not permitted to have a bench (judge only). Nor is a defendant permitted to plead guilty to a capital offense.

A defendant in a military capital trial cannot be convicted of a capital offense unless the jury unanimously finds him or her guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. If guilt is determined, the case proceeds to the penalty phase. At the penalty phase, the prosecution must prove the existence of at least one codified aggravating circumstance beyond a reasonable doubt. (One exception is a conviction for spying, which carries a mandatory death sentence.) The aggravating circumstances are set out under Rule 1004(c) of the manual and include:

1. That the offense was committed before or in the presence of the enemy, except that this factor shall not apply in the case of a violation of Article 118 or 120;
2. That in committing the offense the accused:
 - A. Knowingly created a grave risk of substantial damage to the national security of the United States; or
 - B. Knowingly created a grave risk of substantial damage to a mission, system, or function of the United States, provided that this subparagraph shall apply only if substantial damage to the national security of the United States would have resulted had the intended damage been effected;
3. That the offense caused substantial damage to the national security of the United States, whether or not the accused intended such damage, except that this factor shall not apply in the case of a violation of Article 118 or 120;
4. That the offense was committed in such a way or under circumstances that the life of one or more persons other than the victim was unlawfully and substantially endangered, except that this factor shall not apply to a violation of Articles 104, 106a, or 120;
5. That the accused committed the offense with the intent to avoid hazardous duty;
6. That, only in the case of a violation of Article 118 or 120, the offense was committed in time of war and in territory in which the United States or an ally of the United States was then an occupying power or in which the armed forces of the United States were then engaged in active hostilities;
7. That, only in the case of a violation of Article 118(1):
 - A. The accused was serving a sentence of confinement for 30 years or more or for life at the time of the murder;
 - B. The murder was committed: while the accused was engaged in the commission or attempted commission of any robbery, rape, aggravated arson, sodomy, burglary, kidnapping, mutiny, sedition, or piracy of an aircraft or vessel; or while the accused was engaged in the commission or attempted commission of any offense involving the wrongful distribution, manufacture, or introduction or possession, with intent to distribute, of a controlled substance; or, while the accused was engaged in flight or attempted flight after the commission or attempted commission of any such offense;
 - C. The murder was committed for the purpose of receiving money or a thing of value;
 - D. The accused procured another by means of compulsion, coercion, or a promise of an advantage, a service, or a thing of value to commit the murder;
 - E. The murder was committed with the intent to avoid or to prevent lawful apprehension or effect an escape from custody or confinement;
 - F. The victim was the President of the United States, the President-elect, the Vice President, or, if there was no Vice President, the officer in the order of succession to the office of President of the United States, the Vice-President-elect, or any individual who is acting as President under the Constitution and laws of the United States, any Member of Congress (including a Delegate to, or Resident Commissioner in, the Congress) or Member-of-Congress-elect, justice or judge of the United States, a chief of state or head of government (or the political equivalent) of a foreign nation, or a foreign official, if the official was on official business at the time of the offense and was in the United States or in a place described in Mil. R. Evid. 315(c)(2), 315(c)(3);

G. The accused then knew that the victim was any of the following persons in the execution of office: a commissioned, warrant, noncommissioned, or petty officer of the armed services of the United States; a member of any law enforcement or security activity or agency, military or civilian, including correctional custody personnel; or any firefighter;

H. The murder was committed with intent to obstruct justice;

I. The murder was preceded by the intentional infliction of substantial physical harm or prolonged, substantial mental or physical pain and suffering to the victim;

J. The accused has been found guilty in the same case of another violation of Article 118;

K. The victim of the murder was under 15 years of age.

8. That only in the case of a violation of Article 118(4), the accused was the actual perpetrator of the killing or was a principal whose participation in the burglary, sodomy, rape, robbery, or aggravated arson was major and who manifested a reckless indifference for human life;

9. That, only in the case of a violation of Article 120:

A. The victim was under the age of 12; or

B. The accused maimed or attempted to kill the victim;

10. That, only in the case of a violation of the law of war, death is authorized under the law of war for the offense;

11. That, only in the case of a violation of Article 104 or 106a:

A. The accused has been convicted of another offense involving espionage or treason for which either a sentence of death or imprisonment for life was authorized by statute; or

B. That in committing the offense, the accused knowingly created a grave risk of death to a person other than the individual who was the victim.

For the offense of espionage, 10 U.S.C. § 906a(c) sets out specific aggravating circumstances. Under the statute, at least one of the following aggravating circumstances must be found to exist before a sentence of death is imposed for espionage:

1. The accused has been convicted of another offense involving espionage or treason for which either a sentence of death or imprisonment for life was authorized by statute.

2. In the commission of the offense, the accused knowingly created a grave risk of substantial damage to the national security.

3. In the commission of the offense, the accused knowingly created a grave risk of death to another person.

4. Any other factor that may be prescribed by the President by regulations under section 836 of this title (article 36).

The prosecution is required to give the defendant notice, prior to trial, of the aggravating circumstances that will be used at the penalty phase. Once the evidence in aggravation offered by the prosecution and evidence in mitigation offered by the defendant have been submitted to the jury, the jury is required to weigh all of the aggravating evidence in the case against evidence in mitigation. The death penalty may not be imposed unless the jurors unanimously conclude that the aggravating circumstances substantially outweigh the mitigating circumstances. However, even if every juror agrees upon the existence of an aggravating circumstance and concludes that the evidence in aggravation outweighs the mitigating evidence, any juror is still free to choose a sentence less than death which means that the jury must unanimously conclude that death is an appropriate sentence. If death is not imposed, the defendant may be sentenced to life with or without the possibility of parole.

When a death sentence is imposed, the record is initially reviewed by the convening authority, who has the power to reduce the sentence. If the convening authority approves the death sentence, the defendant will be moved to the military death row at the United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

Once the convening authority reviews the death sentence, the record of trial then goes before one of the military justice system's four intermediate appellate courts: the Army, Navy-Marine Corps, Air Force, or Coast Guard Court of Criminal Appeals. The branch of service that the defendant is in dictates which intermediate appellate court reviews the sentence. If the intermediate appellate court affirms the death sentence, the case then goes before the military's highest court, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces is a five-member court. Its judges are civilians appointed by the president with the advice and consent of the Senate to serve fifteen-year terms.

If the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces affirms the sentence, the case may be reviewed by the United States Supreme Court. The Supreme Court's certiorari jurisdiction over military justice cases was authorized in 1983. If the Supreme Court affirms the death sentence or denies certiorari, the death sentence is then reviewed by the president. If the president approves the death sentence, the defendant may seek habeas corpus relief from the federal courts. If habeas relief is ultimately denied, the defendant may then be executed lethal injection. The president has the power to commute a death sentence.

Lethal injection is used as the method of execution by the military. Pursuant to the "United States Army Corrections System: Procedures for Military Executions," the following persons are authorized to view an execution:

- a. The following individuals and representatives are authorized to be present at the execution:
 1. The CMDT, USDB.
 2. A representative from PMG.
 3. The USDB cadre, as deemed appropriate by the CMDT, for security purposes and to ensure professional military conduct of the execution.
 4. Contracted execution team members.
 5. The prisoner's counsel of record, if requested by the condemned prisoner.
 6. A chaplain designated by the CMDT, USDB or at the request of the prisoner, including contracted civilian clergy support.
 7. A minimum of 2 media representatives, selected under the direction of CPA, from a pool of media representatives requesting to witness the execution.

8. Representatives of the condemned prisoner's family, if requested by the prisoner.

9. The Governor of the afflicted state may designate a representative to be a witness, if the condemned prisoner was a member of the Army National Guard at the time of the offense.

10. The victim (if surviving), or one relative of the victim, or one representative of the victim.

b. No person under the age of 18 shall witness the execution.

c. The CMDT, USDB, will approve the list of witnesses (less news media witnesses).

The last capital felon executed by the military in the twentieth century was Army Private John Arthur Bennett. He was executed by hanging on April 13, 1961. Bennett had been convicted of rape and attempted murder. As of April 2006, there were nine inmates on military death row. The inmates were listed as six black inmates, two white inmates, and one Asian inmate.

Miller, Samuel F. Samuel F. Miller served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1862 to 1890. While on the Supreme Court, Miller was known as a moderate interpreter of the Constitution.

Miller was born in Richmond, Kentucky, on April 5, 1816. He received a medical degree from Transylvania University in 1838. During a decade of medical practice, Miller taught himself the law. In 1847, he was admitted to the bar in Kentucky. As a result of political activities as a lawyer in Iowa, President Abraham Lincoln appointed Miller to the Supreme Court in 1862.

Miller wrote a few capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. The capital punishment opinion that Miller was best remembered for was In Re Medley. In that case, Miller, writing for the Supreme Court, reversed a capital sentence as violating the Ex Post Facto Clause. In outlining the contours of ex post facto principles, Miller wrote that "it may be said that any law which was passed after the commission of the offense for which the party is being tried is an ex post facto law when it inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime at the time it was committed or which alters the situation of the accused to his disadvantage; and that no one can be criminally punished in this country except according to a law prescribed for his government by the sovereign authority before the imputed offense was committed, or by some law passed afterwards, by which the punishment is not increased." Miller died on December 13, 1890.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that the prosecutor used false evidence to convict him.

Case Holding: The defendant established that the prosecutor used false evidence to convict him.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Illinois prosecuted the defendant, Lloyd Eldon Miller, for rape and murder of a child victim. A crucial element of the circumstantial evidence against the defendant was a pair of men's underwear shorts, allegedly belonging to the defendant, which had stains that were identified by prosecution testimony as blood of the victim's blood type. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The conviction and sentence were affirmed by the Illinois Supreme Court.

In a subsequent habeas corpus proceeding in a federal district court, the defendant was allowed for the first time to have the underwear subjected to chemical analysis. The chemical testing revealed that the stains were not blood, but actually paint. The district court, for another reason, ordered defendant's release or prompt retrial. A federal Court of Appeals reversed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stewart: Justice Stewart observed that there were no eyewitnesses to the brutal crime which the defendant was charged with perpetrating. It was said that the only circumstantial link between the defendant and the crime during the trial was the purported blood-stained underwear. The opinion noted that the underwear had been found by the police three days after the murder and about a mile from the scene of the crime. The prosecutor's theory at trial was that the defendant had been wearing the shorts when he committed the murder and that afterwards he removed and discarded them.

The opinion stated that during the presentation of the prosecutor's evidence, the victim's mother testified that her daughter had type "A" positive blood. The prosecutor also called a chemist for the State Bureau of Crime Identification. This witness testified that the stains on the underwear were blood and that the blood was type "A." Justice Stewart indicated that subsequent testing of the underwear conclusively proved that the alleged bloodstains were nothing more than reddish paint. The opinion also stated that a memorandum was uncovered which showed that investigating officer informed the prosecutor that the underwear only contained paint stains. Justice Stewart concluded the opinion by stating: "More than 30 years ago this Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment cannot tolerate a state criminal conviction obtained by the knowing use of false evidence. There has been no deviation from that established principle. There can be no retreat from that principle here." The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Issue Presented: Whether a State prisoner must show, by clear and convincing evidence, that a State court decision was objectively unreasonable before a federal Court of Appeals may issue a certificate of appealability of a federal district judge's decision.

Case Holding: A State prisoner does not have to show, by clear and convincing evidence, that a State court decision was objectively unreasonable before a federal Court of Appeals may issue a certificate of appealability of a federal district judge's decision.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: In 1986, the State of Texas prosecuted Thomas Joe Miller-El for the murder of Doug Walker. During the trial, the prosecutor used peremptory strikes to remove ten of eleven potential African American jurors. Miller-El, an African American, objected to the jury that was ultimately selected, but the trial judge overruled the objection and held that the selection process was not racially discriminatory. The jury chosen convicted Miller-El of capital murder and he was sentenced to death. On appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals remanded the case for the trial judge to evaluate the jury discrimination claim under the test established by the United States Supreme Court in Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986). The trial court evaluated the issue under Batson, but found no discrimination. On a subsequent appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment. Miller-El filed a State habeas corpus petition but failed to obtain relief. Eventually, Miller-El filed a federal habeas petition. A federal district judge denied habeas relief. Miller-El requested a certificate of appealability of the district judge's decision, but a federal Court of Appeals refused to issue the certificate to allow an appeal. The Court of Appeals found that Miller-El was not entitled to appeal the district judge's decision because he failed to show that the State court decision was objectively unreasonable by clear and convincing evidence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to determine whether the Court of Appeals applied the correct standard in denying Miller-El a certificate of appealability.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy found that the Court of Appeals applied the wrong standard in denying Miller-El's appeal. The opinion reasoned as follows:

As mandated by federal statute, a state prisoner seeking a writ of habeas corpus has no absolute entitlement to appeal a district court's denial of his petition. Before an appeal may be entertained, a prisoner who was denied habeas relief in the district court must first seek and obtain a COA (certificate of appealability) from a circuit justice or judge....

A COA will issue only if the requirements of § 2253 have been satisfied. The COA statute ... permits the issuance of a COA only where a petitioner has made a “substantial showing of the denial of a constitutional right....”

The COA determination under § 2253(c) requires an overview of the claims in the habeas petition and a general assessment of their merits. We look to the District Court’s application of [the law] to petitioner’s constitutional claims and ask whether that resolution was debatable amongst jurists of reason. This threshold inquiry does not require full consideration of the factual or legal bases adduced in support of the claims. In fact, the statute forbids it. When a court of appeals sidesteps this process by first deciding the merits of an appeal, and then justifying its denial of a COA based on its adjudication of the actual merits, it is in essence deciding an appeal without jurisdiction.

To that end, our opinion in Slack v. McDaniel, 529 U.S. 473 (2000), held that a COA does not require a showing that the appeal will succeed. Accordingly, a court of appeals should not decline the application for a COA merely because it believes the applicant will not demonstrate an entitlement to relief. The holding in Slack would mean very little if appellate review were denied because the prisoner did not convince a judge, or, for that matter, three judges, that he or she would prevail. It is consistent with § 2253 that a COA will issue in some instances where there is no certainty of ultimate relief. After all, when a COA is sought, the whole premise is that the prisoner has already failed in that endeavor....

[T]he Court of Appeals recited the requirements for granting a writ under § 2254, which it interpreted as requiring petitioner to prove that the state-court decision was objectively unreasonable by clear and convincing evidence.

This was too demanding a standard on more than one level. It was incorrect for the Court of Appeals, when looking at the merits, to merge the independent requirements of [§ 2254]. [The requirement under § 2253] does not require petitioner to prove that a decision is objectively unreasonable by clear and convincing evidence. The clear and convincing evidence standard is found in § 2254(e)(1), but that subsection pertains only to state-court determinations of factual issues, rather than decisions. Subsection 2254(d)(2) contains the unreasonable requirement and applies to the granting of habeas relief rather than to the granting of a COA.

The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded to allow Miller-El to prosecute an appeal of the district court’s denial of habeas relief.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia joined the majority opinion. He wrote separately to highlight facts that he found persuasive to allow an appeal.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas dissented. He believed that the Court of Appeals applied the correct standard in denying a certificate of appealability. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; Habeas Corpus; Miller-El v. Dretke

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that the prosecutor exercised peremptory strikes to exclude potential jurors from taking part in his trial because of their race.

Case Holding: The defendant established that the prosecutor exercised peremptory strikes to exclude potential jurors from taking part in his trial because of their race.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: Thomas Joe Miller-El was prosecuted by the State of Texas for the 1986 murder of Doug Walker. During the jury selection phase of the trial, the prosecutor used peremptory strikes to remove ten of eleven potential African American jurors. Miller-El, an African American, raised an objection to the exclusion of African Americans from his trial, but the judge found the selection process was not racially discriminatory. The jury chosen convicted Miller-El of capital murder and he was sentenced to death. On appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals remanded the case for the trial judge to evaluate the jury discrimination claim under the test established by the United States Supreme Court in Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986). The trial court evaluated the issue under Batson, but found no discrimination. On a subsequent appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment. Miller-El filed a State habeas corpus petition but failed to obtain relief. Eventually, Miller-El filed a federal habeas petition. A federal district judge denied habeas relief. Miller-El thereafter requested a certificate of appealability of the district judge’s decision, but a federal Court of Appeals refused to issue the certificate. The Court of Appeals found that Miller-El was not entitled to appeal the district judge’s decision because he failed to show that the State court decision was objectively unreasonable by clear and convincing evidence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to determine whether the Court of Appeals applied the correct standard in denying Miller-El a certificate of appealability.

In an opinion, Miller El v. Cockrell, 537 U.S. 322 (2003), the Supreme Court found that the Court of Appeals applied the wrong standard in denying a certificate of appealability to Miller-El. The Supreme Court reversed the decision of the Court of Appeals and remanded the case to allow Miller-El to appeal. On remand, the Court of Appeals found that Miller-El failed to satisfy the Batson requirements for showing racial discrimination in selecting the jury. The United States Supreme Court again granted certiorari to consider whether a Batson claim was established.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Souter: Justice Souter found that Miller-El established a Batson claim of racial discrimination in the selection of the jury that convicted him. The opinion addressed the discrimination as follows:

The Court of Appeals concluded that Miller-El failed to show by clear and convincing evidence that the state court’s finding of no discrimination was wrong, whether his evidence was viewed collectively or separately. We find this conclusion as unsupportable as the dismissive and strained interpretation of his evidence that we disapproved when we decided Miller-El was entitled to a certificate of appealability. It is true, of course, that at some points the significance of Miller-El’s evidence is open to judgment calls, but when this evidence on the issues raised is viewed cumulatively its direction is too powerful to conclude anything but discrimination.

In the course of drawing a jury to try a black defendant, 10 of the 11 qualified black venire panel members were peremptorily struck. At least two of them, Fields and Warren, were ostensibly acceptable to prosecutors seeking a death verdict, and Fields was ideal. The prosecutors’ chosen race-neutral reasons for the strikes do not hold up and are so far at odds with the evidence that pretext is the fair conclusion, indicating the very discrimination the explanations were meant to deny.

The strikes that drew these incredible explanations occurred in a selection process replete with evidence that the prosecutors were selecting and rejecting potential jurors because of race. At least two of the jury shuffles conducted by the State make no sense except as efforts to delay consideration of black jury panelists to the end of the week, when they might not even be reached. The State has in fact never offered any other explanation. Nor has the State denied that disparate lines of questioning were pursued: 53% of black panelists but only 3% of nonblacks were questioned with a graphic script meant to induce qualms about applying the death penalty (and thus explain a strike), and 100% of blacks but only 27% of nonblacks were subjected to a trick question about the minimum acceptable penalty for murder, meant to induce a disqualifying answer. The State's attempts to explain the prosecutors' questioning of particular witnesses on nonracial grounds fit the evidence less well than the racially discriminatory hypothesis....

The state court's conclusion that the prosecutors' strikes of Fields and Warren were not racially determined is shown up as wrong to a clear and convincing degree; the state court's conclusion was unreasonable as well as erroneous.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded for entry of judgment granting Miller-El a new trial.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Breyer: Justice Breyer joined the majority opinion. He wrote separately to state his belief that peremptory jury strikes should be prohibited because of the difficulty in proving its misuse.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Thomas dissented. He believed that no racial discrimination occurred in selecting the jury. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; Miller-El v. Cockrell

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution is violated by an instruction to the penalty phase jury that it must unanimously agree on the existence of a mitigating circumstance.

Case Holding: An instruction given to the penalty phase jury that it must unanimously agree on the existence of a mitigating circumstance violates the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ralph Mills, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by a Maryland court. On appeal, the defendant challenged the sentence on the grounds that Maryland's capital punishment statute, as applied to him, was unconstitutionally mandatory. He argued that the statute requires imposition of the death sentence if the jury unanimously finds an aggravating circumstance, but cannot agree unanimously as to the existence of any particular mitigating circumstance. Thus, he asserted, even if some or all of the jurors believe that some mitigating circumstance or circumstances are present, unless they can unanimously agree on the existence of the same mitigating factor, the sentence necessarily will be death. The Maryland Court of Appeals rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider how the sentencing jury was instructed.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun indicated that in a capital prosecution, the penalty phase jury may not be precluded from considering, as a mitigating factor, any relevant circumstance. It was said that if the jury followed the instructions set out in the verdict form in the case, the jury would be precluded from considering mitigating evidence if only a single juror adhered to the view that such evidence should not be considered. Justice Blackmun found that while there was no extrinsic evidence of what the jury in the case actually thought, the portions of the record relating to the verdict form and the judge's instructions indicated that there was at least a substantial risk that the jury was misinformed. The opinion held: "We conclude that there is a substantial probability that reasonable jurors, upon receiving the judge's instructions in this case, and in attempting to complete the verdict form as instructed, well may have thought they were precluded from considering any mitigating evidence unless all 12 jurors agreed on the existence of a particular such circumstance. Under our cases, the sentencer must be permitted to consider all mitigating evidence. The possibility that a single juror could block such consideration, and consequently require the jury to impose the death penalty, is one we dare not risk." The judgment of the Maryland Court of Appeals was vacated insofar as the death sentence.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Brennan: The concurring opinion of Justice Brennan stated succinctly: "I join the Court's opinion and agree fully with its analysis as to why, under our current death penalty jurisprudence, the death sentence in this case must be vacated. I write separately only because the judgment, which is without prejudice to further sentencing proceedings, does not expressly preclude the reimposition of the death penalty. Adhering to my view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, I would direct that the resentencing proceedings be circumscribed such that the State may not reimpose the death sentence."

Concurring Opinion by Justice White: Justice White stated in his concurring opinion the following: "The issue in this case is how reasonable jurors would have understood and applied their instructions. That is the issue the Court's opinion addresses, and I am persuaded that the Court reaches the correct solution. Hence, I join the Court's opinion."

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, in Which O'Connor, Scalia, and Kennedy, JJ., Joined: The chief justice dissented on the grounds that the Court departed from existing law to find that the jury may have misinterpreted the trial court's instructions. The dissent stated: "[T]he relevant inquiry is not whether an impermissible interpretation of instructions to the jury, however improbable, is literally possible; it is instead 'what a reasonable juror could have understood the charge as meaning.' I think the instructions and charges to the jury in this case pass this test, and I would affirm [defendant's] sentence as well as his conviction." See also Jury Unanimity; McKoy v. Issue Presented: Whether the trial court properly instructed the jury on the crime of rape.

Case Holding: The trial court did not properly instruct the jury on the crime of rape; therefore, the judgment against the defendant could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Mills, was convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant was a citizen of the Cherokee Nation and the victim was not. The defendant appealed the judgment against him to the United States Supreme Court. In the appeal he contended that the trial court improperly instructed the jury on what was necessary to constitute the crime of rape. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Peckham: Justice Peckham held that the trial did not properly inform the jury of what was necessary for the commission of rape. The opinion explained as follows:

In [the jury instructions,] we think the court did not explain fully enough so as to be understood by the jury what constitutes in law nonconsent on the part of the woman, and what is the force, necessary in all cases of nonconsent, to constitute this crime. He merely stated that if the woman did not give consent, the only force necessary to constitute the crime in that case was that which was incident to the commission of the act itself. That is true in a case where the woman's will or her resistance had been overcome by threats or fright, or she had become helpless or unconscious, so that, while not consenting, she still did not resist. But the charge in question covered much more extensive ground. It covered the case where no threats were made, where no active resistance was overcome, where the woman was not unconscious, but where there was simply nonconsent on her part, and no real resistance whatever. Such nonconsent as that is no more than a mere lack of acquiescence, and is not enough to constitute the crime of rape. Taking all the evidence in the case, the jury might have inferred just that amount of nonconsent in this case. Not that they were bound to do so, but the question was one for them to decide. The mere nonconsent of a female to intercourse, where she is in possession of her natural, mental, and physical powers, if not overcome by numbers, or terrified by threats, or in such place and position that resistance would be useless, does not constitute the crime of rape on the part of the man who has connection with her under such circumstances. More force is necessary when that is the character of nonconsent than was stated by the court to be necessary to make out that element of the crime. That kind of nonconsent is not enough, nor is the force spoken of then sufficient, which is only incidental to the act itself.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied due process of law because the trial court would not grant him a continuance to depose witnesses.

Case Holding: The defendant was not denied due process of law because the trial court would not grant him a continuance to depose witnesses.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Isadore Minder, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. The Supreme Court of Georgia affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that he was denied due process of law because the trial court refused to postpone the trial and permit him to depose out-of-state witnesses. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that the defendant was not denied due process of law. The opinion reasoned as follows:

The requirements of the 14th Amendment are satisfied if trial is had according to the settled course of judicial procedure obtaining in the particular state, and the laws operate on all persons alike and do not subject the individual to the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government. Because it is not within the power of the Georgia courts to compel the attendance of witnesses who are beyond the limits of the state, or because the taking or use of depositions of witnesses so situated in criminal cases on behalf of defendants is not provided for, and may not be recognized in Georgia, we cannot interfere with the administration of justice in that state on the ground of a violation of the 14th Amendment in these particulars.

The judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court was affirmed.

Minnesota Minnesota abolished capital punishment in 1911.

MADP was founded for the purpose of preventing the creation of the death penalty in Minnesota. The organization has been active during the first part of the decade lobbying to help defeat proposed legislation designed to bring the death penalty to Minnesota.

Minton, Sherman Sherman Minton served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1949 to 1956. While on the Supreme Court, Minton was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Minton was born in Georgetown, Indiana, on October 20, 1890. He was a 1915 graduate of Indiana University. Minton obtained a law degree from Yale in 1916. After law school, Minton started a private law practice. In 1934, he was elected to the United States Senate. He was later nominated for a position as an appellate judge on the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. In 1949, President Harry S Truman appointed Minton to the United States Supreme Court.

Minton was known to write only a few opinions in capital punishment cases. The staunch conservative philosophy espoused by Minton was best illustrated in his dissenting opinion in Leyra v. Denno. In Leyra, the defendant argued that his initial involuntary confession tainted subsequent confessions, so as to preclude their use against him. The majority on the Court agreed with the defendant and reversed his capital sentence. Minton disagreed and wrote: "It seems to me the very essence of due process to submit to a jury the question of whether these later confessions were tainted by the prior coercion and promises which led to the [initial] confession. I am familiar with no case in which this Court has ever held that an invalid confession ipso facto invalidates all subsequent confessions as a matter of law. It does not seem to me a denial of due process for the State to allow the jury to say, under all the facts and circumstances in evidence and under proper instructions by the court, whether the subsequent confessions were tainted or were free and voluntary." Minton died on April 9, 1965.

Mississippi The State of Mississippi is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on April 23, 1974.

Mississippi has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Mississippi Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice, two presiding justices, and six associate justices. The Mississippi Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and nine judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of Mississippi are tried in the circuit Courts.

Mississippi's capital punishment offenses are set out under Miss. Code § 97-3-19(2). This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

a. Murder which is perpetrated by killing any state or federal law enforcement officer, including, but not limited to, a federal park ranger, the sheriff of or police officer of a city or town, a conservation officer, a parole officer, a judge, senior status judge, special judge, district attorney, legal assistant to a district attorney, county prosecuting attorney or any other court official, an agent of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Division of the State Tax Commission, an agent of the Bureau of Narcotics, personnel of the Mississippi Highway Patrol, and the employees of the Department of Corrections who are designated as peace officers by the Commissioner of Corrections, and the superintendent and his deputies, guards, officers and other employees of the Mississippi State Penitentiary or fireman while such person is acting in his official capacity or by reason of an act performed in his official capacity, and with knowledge of the victim's identity;

b. Murder which is perpetrated by a person who is under sentence of life imprisonment;

c. Murder which is perpetrated by use or detonation of a bomb or explosive device;

d. Murder which is perpetrated by any person who has been offered or has received anything of value for committing the murder, and all parties to such a murder, are guilty as principals;

e. When done with or without any design to effect death, by any person engaged in the commission of the crime of rape, burglary, kidnapping, arson, robbery, sexual battery, unnatural intercourse with any child under the age of twelve, or nonconsensual unnatural intercourse with mankind, or in any attempt to commit such felonies;

f. When done with or without any design to effect death, by any person engaged in the commission of the crime of felonious abuse and/or battery of a child or in any attempt to commit such felony;

g. Murder which is perpetrated on educational property;

h. Murder which is perpetrated by the killing of any elected official of a county, municipal, state or federal government with knowledge that the victim was such public official.

Capital murder in Mississippi is punishable by death or life imprisonment with or without parole. A capital prosecution in Mississippi is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Mississippi.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Miss. Code § 99-19-101(5) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

a. The capital offense was committed by a person under sentence of imprisonment.

b. The defendant was previously convicted of another capital offense or of a felony involving the use or threat of violence to the person.

c. The defendant knowingly created a great risk of death to many persons.

d. The capital offense was committed while the defendant was engaged, or was an accomplice, in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, or flight after committing or attempting to commit, any robbery, rape, arson, burglary, kidnapping, aircraft piracy, sexual battery, unnatural intercourse with any child under the age of twelve, or nonconsensual unnatural intercourse with mankind, or felonious abuse and/or battery of a child, or the unlawful use or detonation of a bomb or explosive device.

e. The capital offense was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody.

f. The capital offense was committed for pecuniary gain.

g. The capital offense was committed to disrupt or hinder the lawful exercise of any governmental function or the enforcement of laws.

h. The capital offense was especially heinous, atrocious or cruel.

In addition, in order to impose the death penalty, Miss. Code § 99-19-101(7) requires the penalty phase jury find one of the following factors: (a) the defendant actually killed; (b) the defendant attempted to kill; (c) the defendant intended that a killing take place; (d) the defendant contemplated that lethal force would be employed.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Mississippi has provided by Miss. Code § 99-19-101(6) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

a. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity.

b. The offense was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance.

c. The victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to the act.

d. The defendant was an accomplice in the capital offense committed by another person and his participation was relatively minor.

e. The defendant acted under extreme duress or under the substantial domination of another person.

f. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired.

g. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime.

Under Mississippi's capital punishment statute, the Mississippi Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Mississippi uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Parchman, Mississippi, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Pearl, Mississippi.

Pursuant to the laws of Mississippi, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The State's Parole Board investigates clemency requests.

Under the laws of Mississippi, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Miss. Code § 99-19-55(2):

When a person is sentenced to suffer death in the manner provided by law, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court to deliver forthwith to the Commissioner of Corrections a warrant for the execution of the condemned person. It shall be the duty of the commissioner forthwith to notify the State Executioner of the date of the execution and it shall be the duty of the said State Executioner, or any person deputized by him in writing, in the event of his physical disability, as hereinafter provided, to be present at such execution, to perform the same, and have general supervision over said execution. In addition to the above designated persons, the Commissioner of Corrections shall secure the presence at such execution of the sheriff, or his deputy, of the county of conviction, at least one but not more than two physicians or the county coroner where the execution takes place, and bona fide members of the press, not to exceed eight in number, and at the request of the condemned, such ministers of the gospel, not exceeding two, as said condemned person shall name. The Commissioner of Corrections shall also name to be present at the execution such officers or guards as may be deemed by him to be necessary to insure proper security. No other persons shall be permitted to witness the execution, except the commissioner may permit two members of the condemned person's immediate family as witnesses, if they so request and two members of the victim's immediate family as witnesses, if they so request. Provided further, that the Governor may, for good cause shown, permit two additional persons of good and reputable character to witness an execution. No person shall be allowed to take photographs or other recordings of any type during the execution. The absence of the sheriff, or deputy, after due notice to attend, shall not delay the execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Mississippi executed only eight capital felons. During this period, Mississippi did not execute any female capital felons, although one of its death row inmates during this period was a female. A total of sixty-six capital felons were on death row in Mississippi as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as thirty-five black inmates, thirty white inmates, and one Asian inmate.

Missouri The State of Missouri is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on September 28, 1975.

Missouri has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Missouri Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Missouri Court of Appeals is divided into three districts. Each district is composed of a chief judge and at least six judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of Missouri are tried in the circuit courts.

Missouri's capital punishment statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under a single circumstance. It is provided by Mo. Code § 565.020 that capital murder occurs when "[t]he offender knowingly causes the death of another person after deliberation upon the matter."

Capital murder in Missouri is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Missouri is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment without parole. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Missouri.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Mo. Code § 565.032(2) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The offense was committed by a person with a prior record of conviction for murder in the first degree, or the offense was committed by a person who has one or more serious assaultive criminal convictions;

2. The murder in the first degree offense was committed while the offender was engaged in the commission or attempted commission of another unlawful homicide;

3. The offender by his act of murder in the first degree knowingly created a great risk of death to more than one person by means of a weapon or device which would normally be hazardous to the lives of more than one person;

4. The offender committed the offense of murder in the first degree for himself or another, for the purpose of receiving money or any other thing of monetary value from the victim of the murder or another;

5. The murder in the first degree was committed against a judicial officer, former judicial officer, prosecuting attorney or former prosecuting attorney, circuit attorney or former circuit attorney, assistant prosecuting attorney or former assistant prosecuting attorney, assistant circuit attorney or former assistant circuit attorney, peace officer or former peace officer, elected official or former elected official during or because of the exercise of his official duty;

6. The offender caused or directed another to commit murder in the first degree or committed murder in the first degree as an agent or employee of another person;

7. The murder in the first degree was outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman in that it involved torture, or depravity of mind;

8. The murder in the first degree was committed against any peace officer, or fireman while engaged in the performance of his official duty;

9. The murder in the first degree was committed by a person in, or who has escaped from, the lawful custody of a peace officer or place of lawful confinement;

10. The murder in the first degree was committed for the purpose of avoiding, interfering with, or preventing a lawful arrest or custody in a place of lawful confinement, of himself or another;

11. The murder in the first degree was committed while the defendant was engaged in the perpetration or was aiding or encouraging another person to perpetrate or attempt to perpetrate a felony of any degree of rape, sodomy, burglary, robbery, kidnapping, or any felony offense;

12. The murdered individual was a witness or potential witness in any past or pending investigation or past or pending prosecution, and was killed as a result of his status as a witness or potential witness;

13. The murdered individual was an employee of an institution or facility of the department of corrections of this state or local correction agency and was killed in the course of performing his official duties, or the murdered individual was an inmate of such institution or facility;

14. The murdered individual was killed as a result of the hijacking of an airplane, train, ship, bus or other public conveyance;

15. The murder was committed for the purpose of concealing or attempting to conceal any felony offense;

16. The murder was committed for the purpose of causing or attempting to cause a person to refrain from initiating or aiding in the prosecution of a felony offense;

17. The murder was committed during the commission of a crime which is part of a pattern of criminal street gang activity.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Missouri has provided by Mo. Code § 565.032(3) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity;

2. The murder in the first degree was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance;

3. The victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to the act;

4. The defendant was an accomplice in the murder in the first degree committed by another person and his participation was relatively minor;

5. The defendant acted under extreme duress or under the substantial domination of another person;

6. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired;

7. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime.

Under Missouri's capital punishment statute, the Missouri Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Missouri provides for the election of lethal injection or lethal gas to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Mineral Point, Missouri, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Chillicothe, Missouri.

Pursuant to the laws of Missouri, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor has the discretion to appoint a board of inquiry to investigate a request for clemency.

Under the laws of Missouri, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Mo. Code § 546.740:

The chief administrative officer of the correctional center, or his duly appointed representative shall be present at the execution and the director of the department of corrections shall invite the presence of the attorney general of the state, and at least eight reputable citizens, to be selected by him; and he shall at the request of the defendant, permit such clergy or religious leaders, not exceeding two, as the defendant may name, and any person, other than another incarcerated offender, relatives or friends, not to exceed five, to be present at the execution, together with such peace officers as he may think expedient, to witness the execution; but no person under twenty-one years of age shall be allowed to witness the execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Missouri executed sixty-six capital felons. During this period, Missouri did not execute any female capital felons, although one of its death row inmates during this period was a female. A total of fifty-one capital felons were on death row in Missouri as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as twenty-one black inmates and thirty white inmates.

NUMBER OF EXECUTIONS BY MISSOURI 1976–OCTOBER 2006

Mistrial A trial judge is vested with the authority to grant a mistrial over the defendant’s objection, and discharge a jury whenever in his or her opinion there is a manifest necessity for the mistrial. A retrial after a mistrial properly granted is not prohibited by double jeopardy principles. However, an improperly granted mistrial to which the defendant objected, precludes a second prosecution for the same offense and acts as an acquittal. See also Thompson v. United States

Esparza, 540 U.S. 12 (2003); Argued: Not argued; Decided: November 3, 2003; Opinion of the Court: Per Curiam; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Not reported; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: Not reported

Issue Presented: Whether the failure of an indictment to charge the defendant as a principal offender was error.

Case Holding: The failure of an indictment to charge the defendant as a principal offender was not error where the defendant was the only person charged with committing the crime.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Gregory Esparza, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Ohio for the 1983 murder of Melanie Gerschultz. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal and during two State habeas corpus proceedings. The defendant filed a federal habeas petition alleging that the indictment against him was flawed because it did not charge him as a principal offender. A federal district court agreed and vacated the death sentence only. A Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court summarily decided the case without oral arguments. The per curiam opinion found that the error in the indictment was harmless, as found by the State courts. The opinion reasoned as follows:

According to the Sixth Circuit, Ohio’s failure to charge in the indictment that respondent was a “principal” was the functional equivalent of dispensing with the reasonable doubt requirement. Our precedents, however, do not support its conclusion. In non-capital cases, we have often held that the trial court’s failure to instruct a jury on all of the statutory elements of an offense is subject to harmless-error analysis....

We cannot say that because the violation occurred in the context of a capital sentencing proceeding that our precedent requires the opposite result. Indeed, a number of our harmless-error cases have involved capital defendants....

The Ohio Supreme Court has defined a “principal offender” as the actual killer, and in this case, the jury was instructed on the elements of aggravated murder, defined as purposely causing the death of another while committing Aggravated Robbery. The trial judge further instructed the jury that it must determine whether the State has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the offense of Aggravated Murder was committed while the Defendant was committing Aggravated Robbery. In light of these instructions, the jury verdict would surely have been the same had it been instructed to find as well that the [defendant] was a “principal” in the offense. After all, he was the only defendant charged in the indictment. There was no evidence presented that anyone other than respondent was involved in the crime or present at the store. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that the state court’s conclusion that [defendant] was convicted of a capital offense was objectively unreasonable. That being the case, we may not set aside its decision on habeas review.

The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the defendant’s death sentence was reinstated. See also Harmless Error Rule

Mitigating Circumstances The phrase “mitigating circumstances” refers to some aspect of a defendant’s character, record, or some extenuating aspect of a capital crime which, while it does not prevent the defendant from being found guilty of the crime, does make him or her less deserving of the penalty of death. Mitigating circumstances are factors that are introduced as evidence by a capital felon at the penalty phase, not guilt phase of a capital prosecution. There are two types of mitigating circumstances: statutory mitigating circumstances and non-statutory mitigating circumstances.

A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have created a limited number of statutory mitigating circumstances. From a practical matter, the only difference between statutory and non-statutory mitigators is that the former is embodied in statutes and the latter is not. This is so because it is constitutionally required that all relevant mitigating circumstances, whether statutory or non-statutory, be permitted at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution.

Submission to the penalty phase jury of an instruction on a relevant mitigating circumstance

Daniel Green (left) and Larry Demery (right) were found guilty of the 1993 capital murder of James Jordan, father of basketball legend Michael Jordan. The penalty phase juries in both cases found mitigating circumstances warranted rejection of the death penalty. Green and Demery were therefore sentenced to life imprisonment for their capital crime. (North Carolina Department of Corrections) is not automatic. In order to establish that a capital felon is entitled to a requested penalty phase jury instruction on a proffered mitigating circumstance, the defendant must show that the circumstance is one which a jury could reasonably find had mitigating value and that there is sufficient evidence of the existence of the circumstance to require it to be submitted to the jury. If the trial court determines the jury could not reasonably find the proffered mitigating circumstance exists in light of the evidence introduced, the jury will not be instructed to consider the mitigating circumstance.

There is no federal constitutional right to have the penalty phase factfinder treat proffered mitigating evidence as, in fact, mitigating. The law only requires that evidence considered mitigating by the capital defendant be presented in such a way as to allow the factfinder to determine if moral blameworthiness should be decreased. *See also Aggravating Circumstances; Franklin v. Mixed Petition for Habeas Corpus Relief A “mixed petition for habeas corpus relief” involves the filing of a federal habeas petition that raises claims addressed by a State court and claims which were not addressed by a State court. This situation presents several problems. First, as a general matter, federal courts may not address claims that were not presented to a State court. Second, under federal law, a one-year statute of limitations is placed upon the presentation of State claims to a federal court, once a State court has addressed the claim. As a result of the one-year statute of limitations, a State prisoner runs the risk of not being able to present a federal court with claims that were addressed by a State court if a petition is dismissed because it raised claims that were not addressed by a State court.

In the case of Rhines v. Weber, 544 U.S. 269 (2005), the United States Supreme Court set out guidelines for addressing a mixed petition. Rhines held that a federal court should stay and hold in abeyance claims that were addressed by a State court, in order to permit a prisoner to file the unaddressed claims with a State court, if (1) a prisoner had good cause for failing to initially present the claims to a State court, (2) the claims are potentially meritorious, and (3) there is no indication that the prisoner engaged in intentionally dilatory litigation tactics. It was also said in Rhines that if a court determines that issuance of a stay and abeyance is inappropriate, the court should allow the prisoner to delete the unaddressed claims and to proceed with the previously addressed claims, if dismissal of the entire petition would unreasonably impair the prisoner’s right to obtain federal relief. *See also Exhaustion of State Remedies Doctrine; Habeas Corpus; Procedural Default of Constitutional Claims; Rhines v. Molalla Forest Serial Killer Dayton Leroy Rogers was born in Moscow, Idaho, on September 30, 1953, but raised in Oregon. As a young man, Rogers showed early signs of a propensity to be violent with women. This initial display of violence occurred between 1972 and 1976. During this time, Rogers stabbed a young girl in the stomach and sexually assaulted several women. In the 1980s, Rogers’s aggression toward women catapulted into a series of brutal slayings.

On August 7, 1987, Rogers picked up a prostitute, Jennifer Smith, in Portland, Oregon. Rogers drove Smith to a Denny’s Restaurant in the nearby town of Oak Grove. While in the restaurant’s parking lot, Rogers attacked Smith with a knife. Smith screamed out for help, but by the time help arrived she had died. Smith sustained numerous stab wounds, including having her throat slit.

Rogers fled the crime scene in his pickup truck; however, while doing so, someone copied down the number of the license plate on the truck. The license plate number was given to the police when they arrived at the crime scene. Consequently, within hours of the murder, the police were able to apprehend Rogers at his auto repair shop in the town of Woodburn.

Several weeks after Rogers was arrested for Smith’s murder, the decomposed remains of a woman were found in an area of Molalla, Oregon, that was called the Molalla Forest. During the course of five days of searching through Molalla Forest, the police discovered the bodies of seven women. The decomposed condition of the remains of one of the women made it impossible for the police to ever identify her. The other six victims were identified as Lisa Mock, Maureen Hodges, Christine Adams, Nondace Cervantes, Reatha Gyles, and Cynthia DeVore.

The investigation into the Molalla Forest murders eventually led the police to Rogers. After Rogers was tried and convicted for the murder of Smith in 1988 (he was given a life sentence), a grand jury indicted him for the murder of the six known Molalla Forest victims. As reported in an opinion by the Oregon Supreme Court in State v. Rogers, 836 P.2d 1308 (Ore. 1992), during the trial for the murders a medical examiner described the injuries to each identified victim as follows:

1. Gyles: Six stab wounds to the lower back. The bone of one lower leg had been sawed through, and the foot had been sawed at ankle level.

2. Mock: Deep stab wounds to the lower back region. Both feet had been sawed off at the ankle and were found underneath the body. There were multiple saw marks on the right thighbone just above the knee.

3. Cervantes: Abdomen split open with sharp object from below the breastbone to the pubic area. The right nipple appeared to have been cut, and the left nipple had been cut and removed.

4. DeVore: The body was totally skeletonized. The upper back revealed stabbing injuries.

5. Adams: There were stab wounds to the back, and the right foot had been severed at the ankle. The hands were bound by a dog collar with the arms above the head when the body was found.

6. Hodges: The remains were scattered by animals. The legs below the knees were not found. The lower back revealed stabbing injuries.

In May 1989, a jury found Rogers guilty of murdering all six victims. In June 1989, the trial court sentenced Rogers to death. On automatic appellate review in 1992, the Oregon Supreme Court affirmed the convictions, but reversed the death sentences and ordered a new sentencing hearing. A second sentencing hearing was held and Rogers was again sentenced to death. On appeal in 2000, however, the State Supreme Court again found error and reversed the sentence and ordered a new sentencing hearing. A third sentencing hearing was held and, on March 7, 2006, Rogers was once again sentenced to death. See also Serial Killer

Mongolia Capital punishment is carried out in Mongolia. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is a mixture of Chinese, Russian, and Turkish systems of law. The nation's constitution was adopted on February 12, 1992.

The court system consists of local courts, provincial courts, a supreme court, and a constitutional court. Defendants are provided legal defense and a public trial. They may also question witnesses and appeal decisions. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Montana The State of Montana is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on March 11, 1974.

Montana has a two-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court and courts of general jurisdiction. The Montana Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Montana are tried in the district courts.

Montana's capital punishment offenses are set out under Mont. Code § 45-5-102. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

a. The person purposely or knowingly causes the death of another human being; or

b. The person attempts to commit, commits, or is legally accountable for the attempt or commission of robbery, sexual intercourse without consent, arson, burglary, kidnapping, aggravated kidnapping, felonious escape, felony assault, aggravated assault, or any other forcible felony and in the course of the forcible felony or flight thereafter, the person or any person legally accountable for the crime causes the death of another human being.

Capital murder in Montana is punishable by death, life imprisonment without parole, or imprisonment for a term of years. A capital prosecution in Montana is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. Montana requires by statute that only a judge may preside over the penalty phase. However, this requirement is unconstitutional because the United States Supreme Court held in Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002), that a jury must be used at the penalty phase, absent a waiver by the defendant.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Mont. Code § 46-18-303 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. (a) The offense was deliberate homicide and was committed: (i) by an offender while in official detention; (ii) by an offender who had been previously convicted of another deliberate homicide; (iii) by means of torture; (iv) by an offender lying in wait or ambush; (v) as a part of a scheme or operation that, if completed, would result in the death of more than one person; or (vi) by an offender during the course of committing sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, deviate sexual conduct, or incest, and the victim was less than 18 years of age. (b) The offense was deliberate homicide and the victim was a peace officer killed while performing the officer's duty.

2. The offense was aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim or the death by direct action of the offender of a person who rescued or attempted to rescue the victim.

3. The offense was attempted deliberate homicide, aggravated assault, or aggravated kidnapping committed while in official detention, by an offender who has been previously: (a) convicted of the offense of deliberate homicide; or (b) found to be a persistent felony offender.

4. The offense was sexual intercourse without consent, the offender has a previous conviction of sexual intercourse without consent..., and the offender inflicted serious bodily injury upon a person in the course of committing each offense.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Montana has provided by Mont. Code § 46-18-304 the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

a. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity.

b. The offense was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance.

c. The defendant acted under extreme duress or under the substantial domination of another person.

d. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of the defendant's conduct or to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired.

e. The victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to the act.

f. The defendant was an accomplice in an offense committed by another person, and the defendant's participation was relatively minor.

g. The defendant, at the time of the commission of the crime, was less than 18 years of age (federal law prohibits imposing death penalty in this situation).

h. The court may consider any other fact that exists in mitigation of the penalty.

Under Montana's capital punishment statute, the Montana Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Montana uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Deer Lodge, Montana, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Warm Springs, Montana.

Pursuant to the laws of Montana, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor must obtain the approval of the State's Board of Pardons in order to grant clemency.

Inmates Executed by Montana, 1976–October 2006

Name	Race	Date of Execution	Method of Execution
Duncan McKenzie	White	May 10, 1995	Lethal Injection
Terry A. Langford	White	February 24, 1998	Lethal Injection
David Dawson	White	August 11, 2006	Lethal Injection

Montenegro The death penalty is not imposed by Montenegro. It was abolished in 2002, when the country was part of Serbia. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Moody, William H. William H. Moody served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1906 to 1910. While on the Supreme Court, Moody was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Moody was born in Newbury, Massachusetts, on December 23, 1853. He received an undergraduate degree from Harvard in 1876. Moody studied law as an apprentice and was admitted to the bar in Massachusetts in 1878. He garnered national attention as one of the prosecutors in the unsuccessful murder trial of Lizzie Borden. Moody went on to be elected to the United States House of Representatives in 1895, where he remained until he accepted an appointment in 1902 to be Secretary of the Navy. He was subsequently appointed United States Attorney General in 1904. President Theodore Roosevelt appointed Moody to the Supreme Court in 1906.

Moody was known to have authored only one capital punishment opinion. In Keizo v. Henry, the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether the defendant was denied due process of law because eight members of the grand jury that indicted him may not have been citizens. Moody, writing for the Court, used a technical rule to avoid confronting the issue presented by the defendant. Moody wrote that the issue raised by the defendant could not be brought on a habeas petition to the Supreme Court when the matter could have been properly brought in a direct appeal. He reasoned: "Where a court has jurisdiction, mere errors which have been committed in the course of the proceedings cannot be corrected upon a writ of habeas corpus, which may not, in this manner, usurp the functions of [an appeal]." Ill health caused Moody to resign from the Court in 1910. Moody died on July 2, 1917.

Moore, Blanche In May 1989, Blanche Moore's second husband, Reverend Dwight Moore, was treated at a North Carolina hospital and diagnosed with arsenic poisoning. The police were informed of the diagnosis and launched an investigation. The investigation led to a court order permitting the exhumation of the bodies of Blanche's father, P. D. Kiser, Sr.; her first husband, James N. Taylor; and a former boyfriend, Raymond Reid. Autopsies of the three men all revealed that they died of arsenic poisoning. Moore was subsequently indicted for the murder of all three men and the attempted murder of her second husband.

Authorities ultimately only prosecuted Moore for the murder of her former boyfriend, Reid. During her trial, which was held in 1989, it was brought out that Moore began dating Reid in 1979. Reid initially became ill in January 1986. His illness began after spending New Year's Eve with Moore and having eaten some of her homemade potato soup. Shortly after the meal, Reid began experiencing severe symptoms of nausea, vomiting, and diarrhea. His condition became progressively worse, so that by May 1986 he had to be admitted to a hospital. When he was admitted, Reid's symptoms included excessive nausea and vomiting, loose stools, skin rash, edema, dehydration, bone marrow damage, blood cell abnormalities, electrolyte abnormality, tachypnea (progressive shortness of breath), respiratory failure, tachycardia (fast heartbeat), low blood pressure, kidney malfunction and shutdown, and numbness and tingling in his hands and feet. Each of the symptoms was characteristic of arsenic poisoning, but hospital officials did not make such a diagnosis at the time.

During Reid's time in the hospital, Moore regularly visited him and brought him food. Reid's condition grew unexplainably worse during his hospitalization. His condition reached a life-threatening stage and he had to be transferred to a larger hospital. His treating physician was never able to make a satisfactory diagnosis of the cause of Reid's multi-system failures.

Moore visited Reid at the new hospital. She was observed regularly bringing him food items from home such as iced tea, frozen yogurt, milkshakes, and soups. Once Reid's condition reached the point where he could not speak or move his limbs, Moore arranged to have his will drawn up leaving his entire estate to her. On October 7, 1986, Reid was pronounced dead from what hospital officials believed were complications attributable to

Blanche Moore was sentenced to death for poisoning her boyfriend. The prosecutor had evidence that Moore also poisoned to death her father and her first husband and attempted to kill her second husband by poisoning. (North Carolina Department of Corrections)

Guillain-Barre Syndrome. After Reid's death, Moore was reported as stating: "We cannot have an autopsy. He has been through too much. He wouldn't want to be cut on like this. We just — we cannot have one." No autopsy was performed at that time.

On June 13, 1989, Reid's body was exhumed. An autopsy revealed a concentration of arsenic in Reid's liver tissue thirty times higher than one might see in an average individual who was not having significant exposure to arsenic. The arsenic in Reid's brain tissue was approximately sixty-seven times higher than that expected in a normal individual. As a result of these findings, the medical examiner concluded that Reid died as a result of complications of arsenic poisoning. Trial testimony established that the arsenic levels in Reid's body had to be administered while he was in the hospital.

The prosecutor also presented the jury with extensive evidence concerning the deaths of Moore's father and her first husband and the illness of her second husband — all victims of arsenic poisoning. Evidence was also introduced which established that Moore forged a letter shifting the blame of Reid's death to someone else. The jury found Moore guilty of capital murder and she was sentenced to death. Moore is on death row in North Carolina. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Issue Presented: Whether the defendants presented sufficient allegations that their prosecution was dominated by mob violence so as to warrant a habeas corpus evidentiary hearing by a federal district court.

Case Holding: The defendants presented sufficient allegations that their prosecution was dominated by mob violence so as to warrant a habeas corpus evidentiary hearing by a federal district court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved six black defendants, Frank Moore, Ed Hicks, J. E. Knox, Ed Coleman, Paul Hall, and Frank Hicks, who were indicted for capital murder of a white victim by the State of Arkansas. The murder was highly publicized and resulted in random killing of blacks in the state. At the urging of concerned white citizens, the governor set the execution date of the defendants before they were fully prosecuted. All six defendants were eventually tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. The Arkansas Supreme Court affirmed the judgments. The defendants filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court, alleging that pre-trial publicity denied them a fair trial. The district court dismissed the petition without holding an evidentiary hearing to determine the merits of the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Holmes: Justice Holmes ruled that the defendants presented sufficient allegations that their prosecution was dominated by mob rule so as to require an evidentiary hearing by the district court. The opinion reasoned as follows:

In Frank v. Mangum, it was recognized of course that if in fact a trial is dominated by a mob so that there is an actual interference with the course of justice, there is a departure from due process of law; and that "if the State, supplying no corrective process, carries into execution a judgment of death or imprisonment based upon a verdict thus produced by mob domination, the State deprives the accused of his life or liberty without due process of law." We assume in accordance with that case that the corrective process supplied by the State may be so adequate that interference by habeas corpus ought not to be allowed. It certainly is true that mere mistakes of law in the course of a trial are not to be corrected in that way. But if the case is that the whole proceeding is a mask — that counsel, jury and judge were swept to the fatal end by an irresistible wave of public passion, and that the State Courts failed to correct the wrong, neither perfection in the machinery for correction nor the possibility that the trial court and counsel saw no other way of avoiding an immediate outbreak of the mob can prevent this Court from securing to the [defendants] their constitutional rights.

The judgment of the district court was reversed and the case remanded for an evidentiary hearing.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice McReynolds, in Which Sutherland, J., Joined: Justice McReynolds dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the defendants failed to present adequate evidence to warrant an evidentiary hearing. Justice McReynolds wrote: "The matter is one of gravity. If every man convicted of crime in a state court may thereafter resort to the federal court and by swearing, as advised, that certain allegations of fact tending to impeach his trial are 'true to the best of his knowledge and belief,' and thereby obtain as of right further review, another way has been added to a list already unfortunately long to prevent prompt punishment. The delays incident to enforcement of our criminal laws have become a national scandal and give serious alarm to those who observe. Wrongly to decide the present cause probably will produce very unfortunate consequences." See also Frank v. Mangum; Pre-trial Publicity Illinois, 408 U.S. 786 (1972); Argued: January 18, 1972; Decided: June 29, 1972; Opinion of the Court: Justice Blackmun; Concurring and Dissenting Opinion: Justice Marshall, in which Douglas, Stewart and Powell, JJ., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: James J. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's conviction and death sentence were valid when evidence was alleged to be suppressed and false evidence was alleged to be introduced against him.

Case Holding: The defendant's conviction was imposed validly; however, under the decision in Furman v. Georgia, the sentence of death was invalid.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Lyman A. Moore, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Illinois. The Illinois Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that evidence had been suppressed and false evidence had been introduced against him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun rejected the defendant's allegations of suppressed and false evidence. However, the opinion held that, in light of the Court's ruling in Furman v. Georgia, the defendant's death sentence could not stand, as it was imposed under procedures found unconstitutional in Furman. The judgment of the Illinois Supreme Court, insofar as it affirmed the death sentence, was reversed.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Douglas, Stewart, and Powell, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall concurred in the Court's decision to invalidate the death sentence. However, he dissented from the Court's decision to let the conviction stand. On the latter issue, he wrote as follows: "My reading of the case leads me to conclude that the prosecutor knew that evidence existed that might help the defense, that the defense had asked to see it, and that it was never disclosed. It makes no difference whatever whether the evidence that was suppressed was found in the file of a police officer who directly aided the prosecution or in the file of the prosecutor himself. When the prosecutor consciously uses police officers as part of the prosecutorial team, those officers may not conceal evidence that the prosecutor himself would have a duty to disclose. It would be unconscionable to permit a prosecutor to adduce evidence demonstrating guilt without also requiring that he bear the responsibility of producing all known and relevant evidence tending to show innocence."

Case Note: The case was one of three opinions issued by the Court, on the same day, invalidating death penalty statutes. See also Furman v. Georgia; Stewart v. Massachusetts

Moral Justification Mitigator Capital murder committed by a defendant who believed the killing was morally justified has been made a statutory mitigating circumstance in California, Colorado, Kentucky, Louisiana, New Mexico, and Tennessee. In these jurisdictions, if the penalty phase jury finds evidence of the killing being morally justified the jury may refuse to recommend imposition of the death penalty. Moratorium on Capital Punishment In the late 1990s, organizations throughout the nation began campaigns to bring about a halt to executions in the nation. Some groups seek to halt capital punishment for the purpose of implementing a method of imposing the punishment in a more fair and just manner. These organizations contend that the current methods for determining when the death penalty is imposed unfairly discriminate against minorities and the poor. Other groups are opposed to capital punishment per se and therefore seek to abolish the punishment forever.

Some of the more prominent organizations that have called for a moratorium on capital punishment include the American Bar Association, Amnesty International, United Nations Commission on Human Rights, and the American Civil Liberties Union.

In 1999, Nebraska legislators approved a bill calling for a moratorium and a study on the fairness of the death penalty's application. The State's governor vetoed the bill, but legislators voted unanimously to override the veto of the study portion of the bill. By the end of 2006, ten states had formal or informal moratoriums on executing inmates: Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio, and South Dakota.

International pressure has been placed on the United States from various European countries demanding that the nation ban capital punishment. The international opponents of capital punishment included a statement issued by former Pope John Paul II (1920–2005) asking the United States to abolish capital punishment.

Issue Presented: Whether, during voir dire of the jury for a capital offense, the Constitution permits a trial court to refuse inquiry into whether a potential juror would automatically impose the death penalty upon conviction of the defendant.

Case Holding: A trial court's refusal to inquire whether potential jurors would automatically impose the death penalty upon convicting a capital felon is inconsistent with and violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Derrick Morgan, was convicted in Cook County, Illinois, of first-degree murder and sentenced to death. During voir dire of the jury, the trial court refused the defendant's request to ask if any jurors would automatically vote to impose the death penalty regardless of the facts in the case. On appeal to the Illinois Supreme Court, the defendant argued that, under the federal Constitution, he had a right to voir dire the jury on the death-qualifying issue. The appellate court rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White observed that due process demands that a jury provided to a capital defendant at the sentencing phase must be impartial and fair. Because of this impartiality requirement, the opinion held that a capital defendant may challenge for cause any prospective juror who would automatically vote for the death penalty. It was said that such a juror would fail to consider the evidence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances as instructed by the trial court.

The majority opinion ruled that on voir dire in a capital prosecution the trial court must, at a defendant's request, inquire into the prospective jurors' views on capital punishment. Justice White asserted that part of the guarantee of a defendant's right to an impartial jury is an adequate voir dire to identify unqualified jurors. It was held that the defendant could not exercise intelligently his challenge for cause against prospective jurors who would unwaveringly impose death after a finding of guilt, unless he was given the opportunity to identify such persons by questioning them at voir dire about their views on the death penalty. Justice White found that the trial court's voir dire was insufficient to satisfy the defendant's right to make inquiry.

The opinion concluded: "Because the 'inadequacy of voir dire' leads us to doubt that [the defendant] was sentenced to death by a jury empaneled in compliance with the Fourteenth Amendment, his sentence cannot stand. Accordingly, the judgment of the Illinois Supreme Court affirming [the defendant's] death sentence is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia argued in dissent that a juror should not be disqualified because he or she is pro-death penalty. He stated his position as follows: "The fact that a particular juror thinks the death penalty proper whenever capital murder is established does not disqualify him. To be sure, the law governing sentencing verdicts says that a jury may give less than the death penalty in such circumstances, just as ... the law governing guilt verdicts says that a jury may acquit despite proof of elements x, y, and z. But in neither case does the requirement that a more defense-favorable option be left available to the jury convert into a requirement that all jurors must, on the facts of the case, be amenable to entertaining that option." See also Adams v. Texas; Boulden v. Holman; Darden v. Wainwright; Davis v. Georgia; Gray v. Mississippi; Jury Selection; Ross v. Oklahoma; Wainwright v. Witt; Witherspoon v. Illinois

Morocco Capital punishment is allowed in Morocco. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is a mixture of Islamic law and French and Spanish civil systems. The nation's constitution was adopted on March 10, 1972. The constitution of Morocco provides for a monarchy, with a parliament and an independent judiciary. Ultimate authority, however, rests with the king.

The judicial system consists of trials courts, an appeals court, and a supreme court. Defendants have the right to bail and the right to retained or appointed counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Motive A defendant's motive or reason for committing an offense is not an element of a crime. Defendants have contended, however, that failure to prove motive by the prosecution invalidates a conviction. This argument has never prevailed because motive, while helpful for the jury if shown, is not a prerequisite for a valid conviction. See also Johnson v. United States

Mountain Meadows Massacre In the spring of 1857, a group of approximately 140 men, women, and children left Arkansas in a wagon train destined for a new life in California. John T. Baker and Alexander Fancher headed the group. By early August of that year, the Baker/Fancher wagon train reached the Territory of Utah. At the time of the group's arrival in Utah, the Mormon population in the area was having aggressive difficulties with the federal government. The hostility between the Mormons and the federal government caused their leader, Brigham Young, to declare martial law in anticipation of an armed conflict with the federal government.

After reaching the Territory of Utah, the Baker/Fancher wagon train decided to rest at an area called Mountain Meadows. On September 7, 1857, the Baker/Fancher wagon train was attacked by a group of Mormons who were led by a church official named John Doyle Lee. Under Lee's leadership, the Mormons, along with a band of Native Americans, waged a gun battle with the Baker/Fancher party that lasted until September 11. When the shooting ended, approximately seventeen members (children) of the Baker/Fancher party remained alive.

Federal authorities investigated the Mountain Meadows massacre initially in 1858 and issued a warrant for the arrest of Lee. However, Lee escaped capture and remained in hiding until his eventual arrest in November 1874. Lee was prosecuted for the massacre in 1875, but the jury could not reach a unanimous verdict. A second trial was held and a new jury returned a verdict convicting Lee for his role in the massacre. On March 23, 1877, Lee was taken to the Mountain Meadows area where the massacre occurred and was executed by a federal firing squad.

Mudgett, Herman Herman Mudgett, alias Dr. Henry H. Holmes, was born on May 16, 1860, in Gilmanton, New Hampshire. Mudgett was a bright youth. He graduated from high school at sixteen and finished medical school at the University of Michigan when he was twenty-four. Beneath the brilliance was a side of Mudgett that eventually led him to murder hundreds of people.

Mudgett moved to Chicago in 1886, where he started a drug-store empire and built a hundred-room mansion. The mansion was secretly equipped with gas chambers, trap doors, acid vats, lime pits, fake walls, and secret entrances. Authorities found evidence to prove that during the 1893 World's Fair, Mudgett rented rooms to visitors and, after killing them, tried to collect insurance. He lured countless women to his mansion with the promise of marriage, but would throw them down an elevator shaft and gas them to death after they signed their life savings over to him. It was believed that he dismembered and skinned his victims and experimented with their corpses. When police grew suspicious about Mudgett, he burned his mansion and fled Chicago. In the ruins of the mansion, authorities found the remains of over two hundred people.

When Mudgett left Chicago, he ended up in Philadelphia. While in Philadelphia, Mudgett convinced a friend, Benjamin F. Pitezel, to join him in an insurance scheme. The plan called for Pitezel to take out a $10,000 life insurance policy and fake his death. Mudgett betrayed Pitezel and killed him. He then took the money and ran off to Canada with Pitezel's wife and three children. It was not long before Mudgett killed the three children and abandoned their mother.

Philadelphia authorities were able to track down Mudgett and bring him back to stand trial for Pitezel's murder. His trial began on October 28, 1895. The jury convicted him on November 4 and he was sentenced to death. He was finally hanged on May 7, 1896. Before his execution, Mudgett admitted to killing over two hundred women in his Chicago mansion. See also Serial Killer

Multiple Homicide Aggravator A large minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made the killing of more than one victim in a single episode a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend a death sentence if the evidence reveals multiple homicides

Mu'Min v. Virginia Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Mu'Min v. Virginia, 500 U.S. 415 (1991); Argued: February 20, 1991; Decided: May 30, 1991; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Rehnquist; Concurring Opinion: Justice O'Connor; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Marshall, in which Blackmun and Stevens, JJ., joined; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Kennedy; Appellate Defense Counsel: John H. Blume argued; Mark E. Daniel on brief; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: None; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: 1

Issue Presented: Whether the trial judge's refusal to question prospective jurors about the specific contents of pre-trial news reports of the crime to which they had been exposed violated the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury or his right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Case Holding: The trial judge's refusal to question prospective jurors about the specific contents of pre-trial news reports of the crime to which they had been exposed did not violate the defendant's constitutional rights.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Dawud Majid Mu'Min, was charged with capital murder by the State of Virginia. The case received extensive pre-trial publicity, partly out of community outrage over the fact that the defendant was serving a prison sentence for a previous murder conviction and was out of prison under a work program at the time of the second murder. During jury selection for the trial, the judge refused to ask any of the defendant's proposed questions relating to the content of news items that potential jurors might have seen or read.

Initially, the judge questioned the prospective jurors as a group, asking four separate questions about the effect on them of pre-trial publicity or information about the case obtained by other means. One juror who admitted to having formed a belief as to the defendant's guilt was excused for cause. Although eight of the twelve jurors eventually chosen admitted that they had read or heard something about the case, none of them indicated that they had formed an opinion based on the outside information or would be biased in any way. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The Virginia Supreme Court of Virginia affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court ruled that, while a criminal defendant may ask on voir dire whether a juror has previously acquired any information about the case, the defendant does not have a constitutional right to explore the content of the acquired information, but is only entitled to know whether the juror can remain impartial in light of the previously obtained information. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice held that the trial judge's refusal to question prospective jurors about the specific contents of pre-trial news reports to which they had been exposed did not violate the defendant's constitutional rights. The opinion noted, as a general matter, that voir dire examination of potential jurors serves the dual purposes of enabling the trial court to select an impartial jury and assisting attorneys in exercising peremptory challenges. It was said that the Court's prior cases stressed the wide discretion granted to trial courts in conducting voir dire in the area of pre-trial publicity and in other areas that might tend to show juror bias.

The opinion found that although precise inquiries about the contents of any news reports that a potential juror has read might reveal a sense of the juror's general outlook on life that would be of some use in exercising peremptory challenges, this benefit could not be a basis for making “content” questions about pre-trial publicity a constitutional requirement, since peremptory challenges are not required by the Constitution. It was further said that while content questions might be helpful in assessing whether a juror is impartial, such questions are constitutionally compelled only if the trial court’s failure to ask them renders the defendant’s trial fundamentally unfair. Justice Rehnquist found the voir dire examination conducted by the trial court adequately covered the subject of possible bias by pre-trial publicity. The judgment of the Virginia Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O’Connor: Justice O’Connor concurred in the Court’s opinion. She wrote separately to express her views as to why the issue of voir dire “content” questions should not be elevated to a constitutional right. Justice O’Connor wrote:

No one doubts that Dawud Majid Mu’Min’s brutal murder of Gladys Nopwasky attracted extensive media coverage. For days on end, the case made headlines because it involved a macabre act of senseless violence and because it added fuel to an already heated political controversy about the wisdom of inmate work-release programs. But the question we decide today is not whether the jurors who ultimately convicted Mu’Min had previously read or heard anything about the case; everyone agrees that eight of them had. Nor is the question whether jurors who read that Mu’Min had confessed to the murder should have been disqualified as a matter of law.... The only question before us is whether the trial court erred by crediting the assurances of eight jurors that they could put aside what they had read or heard and render a fair verdict based on the evidence....

The ... trial judge himself was familiar with the potentially prejudicial publicity to which the jurors might have been exposed. Hearing individual jurors repeat what the judge already knew might still have been helpful: A particular juror’s tone of voice or demeanor might have suggested to the trial judge that the juror had formed an opinion about the case and should therefore be excused. I cannot conclude, however, that “content” questions are so indispensable that it violates the Sixth Amendment for a trial court to evaluate a juror’s credibility instead by reference to the full range of potentially prejudicial information that has been reported. Accordingly, I join the Court’s opinion.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Blackmun and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall believed that the majority opinion was wrong and therefore dissented. He stated his position on the issue as follows:

Today’s decision turns a critical constitutional guarantee — the Sixth Amendment’s right to an impartial jury — into a hollow formality. Dawud Majid Mu’Min’s capital murder trial was preceded by exceptionally prejudicial publicity, and at jury selection 8 of the 12 jurors who ultimately convicted Mu’Min of murder and sentenced him to death admitted exposure to this publicity. Nonetheless, the majority concludes that the trial court was under no obligation to ask what these individuals knew about the case before seating them on the jury. Instead, the majority holds that the trial court discharged its obligation to ensure the jurors’ impartiality by merely asking the jurors whether they thought they could be fair.

The majority’s reasoning is unacceptable. When a prospective juror has been exposed to prejudicial pretrial publicity, a trial court cannot realistically assess the juror’s impartiality without first establishing what the juror already has learned about the case. The procedures employed in this case were wholly insufficient to eliminate the risk that two-thirds of Mu’Min’s jury entered the jury box predisposed against him. I dissent.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy dissented from the Court’s opinion. He believed that “content” questions were imperative for obtaining a fair trial in this case. Justice Kennedy articulated his concerns as follows:

Our precedents mark the distinction between allegations that the individual jurors might have been biased from exposure to pretrial publicity, and the quite separate problem of a case tried in an atmosphere so corruptive of the trial process that we will presume a fair trial could not be held, nor an impartial jury assembled....

Our inquiry, in my view, should be directed to the question of the actual impartiality of the seated jurors, and the related question whether the trial judge conducted an adequate examination of those eight jurors who acknowledged some exposure to press accounts of the trial....

I fail to see how the trial court could evaluate the credibility of the individuals seated on this jury. The questions were asked of groups, and individual jurors attested to their own impartiality by saying nothing. I would hold, as a consequence, that, when a juror admits exposure to pretrial publicity about a case, the court must conduct a sufficient colloquy with the individual juror to make an assessment of the juror’s ability to be impartial. The trial judge should have substantial discretion in conducting the voir dire, but, in my judgment, findings of impartiality must be based on something more than the mere silence of the individual in response to questions asked en masse.

Murder Murder is generally defined as the intentional or purposeful killing of another human being. Murder may be capital or non-capital. A defendant charged with capital murder is subject to receiving the death penalty, whereas a defendant charged with non-capital murder is not subject to being punished with death. Capital murder and non-capital murder are distinguished by special circumstances. That is, murder punished as a capital offense has specific underlying statutorily created factors that permit imposition of the death penalty. For example, murder of a police officer or murder committed by firing a gun out of a moving car. Jurisdictions have created a variety of special circumstances which permit murder to be transformed into capital murder. See also Death-Eligible Offenses

Murder, Inc. Murder, Inc., was the New York–based arm of organized crime during the 1930s. The undisputed boss of Murder, Inc., was Louis “Lepke” Buchalter.

Before joining the national crime syndicate, Buchalter was a small-time Jewish labor racketeer operating in Manhattan's garment district. Buchalter quickly caught the eyes of Meyer Lansky and Lucky Luciano when they formed the national crime syndicate. With Luciano's blessing, Buchalter was placed in charge of the enforcement arm of the syndicate. Buchalter did not disappoint his benefactors. With Buchalter in charge, it has been estimated that over a thousand people were killed nationwide by Murder, Inc. It is believed that Buchalter personally killed over a hundred people as the head of the most lethal crime group in American history.

Louis "Lepke" Buchalter's execution on March 4, 1944, marked the first time that an organized crime boss was executed by a government. (Library of Congress)

For six years, Buchalter brought terror to those who opposed the syndicate. His downfall came after he carried out a hit on a Jewish candy store clerk named Joseph Rosen. The pressure placed on the syndicate because of the murder of Rosen sent Buchalter into hiding. Buchalter revealed himself to authorities only after Luciano assured him everything would be okay. This was a mistake. Buchalter and two of his associates, Emanuel Weiss and Louis Capone (no relation to Al), were indicted for Rosen's death. In what became one of the most publicized trials in the nation's history, Buchalter, Weiss, and Capone were convicted of Rosen's murder. The sentence handed down was death. Murder, Inc., was effectively put out of business.

Four years after the trial, Buchalter, Weiss, and Capone were electrocuted on March 4, 1944. Buchalter's death marked the first time that an organized crime boss was executed by a government. See also Buchalter v. New York

Lawrence Bittaker is on California's death row. (California Department of Corrections)

Murder Mack Lawrence Bittaker and Roy Norris met in 1978 while was serving time together at the California Men's Colony at San Luis Obispo. The two men made a pact that, when they got out of prison, they would embark on a killing spree that involved murdering at least one girl that was between thirteen and nineteen years of age. Their plan included recording the events on videotape.

Bittaker was paroled on November 15, 1978. Upon his release, he obtained a van that he called "Murder Mack." Norris was released on June 15, 1979. The two men immediately joined forces and began putting their murder spree plan into operation.

On June 24, 1979, sixteen-year-old Cindy Schaeffer disappeared following a church gathering and was never seen again. Eighteen-year-old Joy Hall disappeared from Redondo Beach on July 8. On September 2, Jacqueline Lamp, thirteen, and Jackie Gilliam, fifteen, disappeared while hitchhiking in the Redondo Beach area. Shirley Ledford, sixteen, was abducted on October 31. Ledford was fortunate in managing to escape and was found the day after her disappearance in a Tijuana residential district. Ledford had suffered near strangulation, mutilation of her breasts and face, and slashed arms.

Through a lucky break, authorities located and arrested Bittaker and Norris on November 20, in connection with an assault in Hermosa Beach in September. The victim of the assault in Hermosa Beach was unable to positively identify her attackers; however, the authorities held Bittaker and Norris for parole violations due to possession of drugs.

Within a short period of being detained, Norris became unglued and began telling authorities tales of murder. According to Norris, young girls had been approached at random, photographed by Bittaker, and offered rides in Murder Mack, drugs, and modeling jobs. Norris reported that the girls were abducted forcibly and driven to remote mountainous areas where they were raped, tortured, and murdered. The first corroborative evidence authorities had of Norris's confession was a tape recording of one of the victim's final moments alive and 500 photographs of smiling young girls that were found in the Murder Mack.

Norris eventually led authorities to shallow graves in San Dimas Canyon and the San Gabriel Mountains, where skeletal remains of two victims were found. Authorities charged Norris and Bittaker with five counts of murder. However, the police believed the two were linked to the disappearance of thirty or forty other young victims.

On March 18, 1981, Norris pled guilty to five counts of murder. In return for his cooperation with authorities, Norris was sentenced to forty-five years to life, with the possibility of parole after thirty years. Bittaker had denied everything. During his trial, Bittaker testified that Norris informed him of the murders, but he had no personal knowledge or involvement in the killings. On February 17, a jury returned a guilty verdict against Bittaker. On March 24, in accordance with the penalty phase jury's recommendation, the judge sentenced Bittaker to death. Bittaker is on death row at San Quentin Prison. Norris is confined at Pelican Bay Prison. See also Serial Killer

Murphy, Francis William Francis William Murphy served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1940 to 1949. While on the Supreme Court, Murphy was known as a passionate liberal interpreter of the Constitution.

Murphy was born on April 13, 1890, in Harbor Beach, Michigan. Murphy was educated at the University of Michigan and was admitted to the Michigan's bar in 1914. His career included a practicing lawyer, municipal judge, mayor of Detroit, governor of the Philippines and Michigan, and United States Attorney General. In 1940, President Franklin D. Roosevelt nominated Murphy to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, he wrote a number of dissenting opinions in capital punishment cases. The dissenting opinion which best illustrated Murphy's reputation as a passionate liberal was written in Williams v. New York. In Williams, the defendant argued that due process of law was violated by the trial court's use of information from an undisclosed pre-sentence probation report in order to justify overriding the jury's recommendation of mercy and impose a death sentence. The majority on the Court found that due process was not violated. Murphy disagreed with the majority and wrote: "Due process of law includes at least the idea that a person accused of crime shall be accorded a fair hearing through all the stages of the proceedings against him. I agree with the Court as to the value and humanness of liberal use of probation reports as developed by modern penologists, but, in a capital case, against the unanimous recommendation of a jury, where the report would concededly not have been admissible at the trial, and was not subject to examination by the defendant, I am forced to conclude that the high commands of due process were not obeyed." Murphy died on July 19, 1949.

Issue Presented: Whether the Eighth Amendment or the Due Process Clause requires States to appoint counsel for indigent death row inmates seeking State post-conviction relief.

Case Holding: Neither the Eighth Amendment nor the Due Process Clause requires States to appoint counsel for indigent death row inmates seeking State post-conviction relief.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case was brought as a "class action" by indigent Virginia death row inmates who did not have counsel to pursue post-conviction proceedings. The class action was brought in a federal district court against various Virginia officials, alleging that the federal Constitution required that they be provided with counsel at the State's expense for the purpose of pursuing collateral proceedings related to their convictions and sentences. The district court concluded that Virginia provided constitutionally inadequate legal services to indigent death row inmates seeking post-conviction relief. The district court therefore ordered Virginia to develop a program for the appointment of counsel, upon request, to indigent death row inmates wishing to pursue habeas corpus in State court, but not in federal court. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Chief Justice Rehnquist Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which White, O'Connor, and Scalia, JJ., Joined: The chief justice ruled that neither the Eighth Amendment nor the Due Process Clause requires States to appoint counsel for indigent death row inmates seeking State post-conviction relief. It was said that State collateral proceedings are not constitutionally required as an adjunct to the state criminal proceeding and serve a different and more limited purpose than either the trial or appeal. The chief justice reasoned that Eighth Amendment safeguards imposed at the trial stage — where the court and jury hear testimony, receive evidence, and decide the question of guilt and punishment — were sufficient to assure the reliability of the process by which the death penalty was imposed. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor wrote a concurring in the case. In her concurrence, she indicated the following: "I join in the Chief Justice's opinion. As his opinion demonstrates, there is nothing in the Constitution or the precedents of this Court that requires that a State provide counsel in postconviction proceedings. A postconviction proceeding is not part of the criminal process itself, but is instead a civil action designed to overturn a presumptively valid criminal judgment. Nothing in the Constitution requires the States to provide such proceedings, nor does it seem to me that the Constitution requires the States to follow any particular federal model in those proceedings."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Kennedy, in Which O'Connor, J., Joined: Justice Kennedy concurred in the Court's judgment. He indicated: "It cannot be denied that collateral relief proceedings are a central part of the review process for prisoners sentenced to death." He noted, however, that the requirement of meaningful access to courts can be achieved in various ways, without constitutionalizing the right to counsel at the post-conviction stage. Justice Kennedy argued that States should be free to develop and implement their own plans for meeting the legal needs of death row inmates seeking post-conviction relief. He concluded: "While Virginia has not adopted procedures for securing representation that are as far reaching and effective as those available in other States, no prisoner on death row in Virginia has been unable to obtain counsel to represent him in postconviction proceedings, and Virginia's prison system is staffed with institutional lawyers to assist in preparing petitions for postconviction relief. I am not prepared to say that this scheme violates the Constitution."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the efforts undertaken by Virginia to assist death row inmates seek post-conviction relief were constitutionally unacceptable. He stated his opinion thus:

Two Terms ago this Court reaffirmed that the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution obligates a State "to assure the indigent defendant an adequate opportunity to present his claims fairly in the context of the State's appellate process. The narrow question presented is whether that obligation includes appointment of counsel for indigent death row inmates who wish to pursue state postconviction relief. Viewing the facts in light of our precedents, we should answer that question in the affirmative....

Ideally, "direct appeal is the primary avenue for review of a conviction or sentence, and death penalty cases are no exception. When the process of direct review ... comes to an end, a presumption of finality and legality attaches to the conviction and sentence." There is, however, significant evidence that in capital cases what is ordinarily considered direct review does not sufficiently safeguard against miscarriages of justice to warrant this presumption of finality. Federal habeas courts granted relief in only 0.25% to 7% of noncapital cases in recent years; in striking contrast, the success rate in capital cases ranged from 60% to 70%. Such a high incidence of uncorrected error demonstrates that the meaningful appellate review necessary in a capital case extends beyond the direct appellate process....

The postconviction procedure in Virginia may present the first opportunity for an attorney detached from past proceedings to examine the defense and to raise claims that were barred on direct review by prior counsel's ineffective assistance. A fresh look may reveal, for example, that a prior conviction used to enhance the defendant's sentence was invalid; or that the defendant's mental illness, lack of a prior record, or abusive childhood should have been introduced as evidence in mitigation at his sentencing hearing. Defense counsel's failure to object to or assert such claims precludes direct appellate review of them. The postconviction proceeding gives inmates another chance to rectify defaults. In Virginia, therefore, postconviction proceedings are key to meaningful appellate review of capital cases....

Of the 37 States authorizing capital punishment, at least 18 automatically provide their indigent death row inmates counsel to help them initiate state collateral proceedings. Thirteen of the 37 States have created governmentally funded resource centers to assist counsel in litigating capital cases. Virginia is among as few as five States that fall into neither group and have no system for appointing counsel for condemned prisoners before a postconviction petition is filed.

The basic question in this case is whether Virginia's procedure for collateral review of capital convictions and sentences assures its indigent death row inmates an adequate opportunity to present their claims fairly. The District Court and Court of Appeals en banc found that it did not, and neither the State nor this Court's majority provides any reasoned basis for disagreeing with their conclusion. Simple fairness requires that this judgment be affirmed.

Issue Presented: Whether the exclusion of blacks from the grand jury that indicted the defendant required his case be removed to a federal court for prosecution.

Case Holding: The exclusion of blacks from the grand jury that indicted the defendant did not require his case be removed to a federal court for prosecution because the federal removal statute required racial discrimination emanate from a State's constitution or laws.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Jim Murray, was indicted for capital murder by the State of Louisiana. Prior to trial, the defendant requested the indictment be dismissed, on the grounds that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. The trial court denied the request. The defendant then requested the case be removed to federal court, on the grounds that blacks were excluded from the grand jury. The trial court also denied this request. The defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the case should have been removed to a federal court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Shiras: Justice Shiras held that the federal removal statute did not authorize "a removal of the prosecution from the state court upon an allegation that jury commissioners or other subordinate officers had, without authority derived from the constitution and laws of the state, excluded [black] citizens from juries because of their race." The opinion made clear that removal required racial discriminatory conduct that was based upon a State's constitution or laws. Justice Shiras found that the defendant's "petition for removal complained of the acts of the jury commissioners in illegally confining their summons to white citizens only, and in excluding from jury service citizens of the race and color of the [defendant], but did not aver that the jury commissioners so acted under or by virtue of the laws or constitution of the state; nor was there shown, during the course of the trial, that there was any statutory or constitutional enactment of the state of Louisiana which discriminated against persons on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, or which denied to them the equal protection of the laws." It was ruled that the defendant was not entitled to have his case removed to a federal court because he did not allege racial discrimination under the State constitution or laws of Louisiana. The judgment of the Louisiana Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Legal Defense Fund

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Legal Defense Fund (LDF) was founded in 1940 under the leadership of the late Thurgood Marshall, who later became the first African American United States Supreme Court Justice. For more than half a century, LDF has mounted legal attacks aimed obtaining fairness in American society for blacks and other minorities. With a staff of twenty-five attorneys, assisted by lawyers throughout the country, LDF has participated in more cases before the United States Supreme Court than any institution other than the United States Solicitor General's office.

One of the areas in which LDF has concentrated its resources has been capital punishment. Attorneys for LDF were involved in such landmark decisions as Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), which halted executions in the nation, and Coker v. Geor- gia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977), which prohibited death penalty for rape. LDF has filed numerous amicus briefs throughout the country on behalf of capital felons.

The LDF is headquartered in New York City. In 1957, LDF became independent from its former parent organization, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

National Center for Victims of Crime The National Center for Victims of Crime (NCVC) is a Virginia-based nonprofit organization founded in 1985. NCVC is a national resource and advocacy center for victims of crime. The purpose of NCVC is to bring about a national commitment to help victims of crime rebuild their lives. NCVC has advocated for laws and public policies that create resources and secure rights and protection for victims. Utilizing its national database, NCVC refers crime victims to services that include crisis intervention, research information, assistance with the criminal justice process, counseling, and support groups.

National Coalition of Homicide Survivors The National Coalition of Homicide Survivors (NCHS) is a nonprofit organization that was founded in Florida by Gail Leland in 1998. The purpose of NCHS is to provide victim assistance services to homicide survivors. In carrying out its purpose, NCHS facilitates communication among individuals, professionals, and organizations who have an interest in the concerns of homicide survivors. An objective of NCHS is to have a national day of mourning legislatively implemented.

National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty The National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty (NCADP) is a Washington, D.C.-based national coalition of organizations and individuals committed to the abolition of capital punishment. The organization was founded in 1976 and has nearly 140 national, state, and local affiliates. The NCADP is considered by many to be the national leader of the capital punishment abolitionist movement.

The NCADP provides information, advocates for public policy, and mobilizes and supports people and institutions that oppose capital punishment. Through providing consultations, materials, training, and technical support, NCADP hopes to bring about total abolishment of capital punishment in the nation. The NCADP publishes and distributes several vital sources of information for abolitionists. Lifelines, the organization's newsletter, is produced bi-monthly and goes out to thousands of people across the globe. Articles included in this publication are written by NCADP affiliates, death row inmates, and abolitionists on the cutting edge of the anti-death penalty movement. The central purpose of Lifelines is to serve as a means of communication between abolitionists, death row inmates, and families that have been affected by capital crimes.

NATIVE AMERICANS EXECUTED 1976–OCTOBER 2006

NATIVE AMERICANS ON DEATH ROW JULY 2006

- NATIVE AMERICANS
- ALL OTHERS

Nauru Capital punishment has not been officially abolished in the nation of Nauru, but the punishment has not been imposed in recent memory. Nauru is a small Pacific island with about 10,500 inhabitants and is considered the world's smallest independent republic. The country gained independence in 1968. Its legal system is based on English common law. The nation adopted its constitution on January 29, 1968.

The judicial system of Nauru consists of trial courts and a supreme court. Defendants have a right to a public trial and to legal counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Nazi Spies In 1942, American soil was invaded by eight Nazi spies who were sent by Germany to destroy critical cities in the nation. George John Dasch, Richard Quirin, Ernest Peter Burger, Heinrich Harm Heinck, Edward John Kerling, Werner Thiel, Herman Otto Neubauer, and Herbert Hans Haupt were all born in Germany, though each had lived in the United States. They returned, separately, to Germany between 1933 and 1941.

After the declaration of war between the United States and Germany, the eight men received training at a sabotage school near Berlin, Germany, where they were instructed in the use of explosives and in methods of secret writing. At the conclusion of their training, they proceeded from Germany to a seaport in Occupied France. Upon arrival in Occupied France, Dasch, Burger, Heinck, and Quirin boarded a German submarine, which proceeded across the Atlantic to Amagansett Beach on Long Island, New York. The four men were there landed from the submarine on June 13, 1942. They carried with them a supply of explosives. After burying their German military uniforms, the four men proceeded in civilian dress to New York City.

The remaining four men, Kerling, Thiel, Neubauer, and Haupt, boarded another German submarine from Occupied France, which carried them across the Atlantic to Ponte Vedra Beach, Florida. On June 17, 1942, they came ashore carrying a supply of explosives. After burying their German uniforms, they proceeded in civilian dress to Jacksonville, Florida.

By June 27, 1942, all eight spies were captured by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). The FBI learned that the men came to the United States to destroy war industries and war facilities. They were captured before they could carry out any act of sabotage.

The swift capture of the spies was due to the ostensible defection of one of them — Dasch. On June 14, Dasch contacted the FBI from New York and stated that he had entered the country as a war saboteur. Dasch made a promise to phone the FBI again when he arrived in Washington, D.C. On June 19, Dasch kept his word and called the FBI. Shortly after the phone conversation, Dasch was arrested. After light interrogation, Dasch gave the FBI all the information needed to capture the other spies.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed an order on July 2, 1942, appointing a military commission to prosecute the defendants for offenses against the law of war and the Articles of War. The Military Commission was comprised of seven Army officers. The spies were appointed military legal counsel. The trial was held from July 8 to August 4, 1942. When the trial ended, all of the defendants were found guilty and sentenced to death.

President Roosevelt intervened and commuted the sentence of Dasch to thirty years and that of Burger to life imprisonment. The remaining spies were executed at the District of Columbia Jail on August 8, 1942. In April 1948, President Harry S Truman granted clemency to Dasch and Burger on condition of deportation. They were eventually taken to the American Zone of Germany and released. See also Ex Parte Quirin of a State discriminate against a defendant because of race. (2) Whether the defendant established that, in practice, Delaware officials have implemented the State's jury laws in such a manner as to systematically exclude blacks from all jury service.

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant satisfied the federal statute requiring removal of a State criminal case when the laws

Case Holdings: (1) The defendant did not satisfy the federal statute requiring removal of a State criminal case when the laws of a State discriminate against a defendant because of race, insofar as the jury laws of Delaware were interpreted by the courts of the State in a race-neutral manner. (2) The defendant established that, in practice, Delaware officials have implemented the State's jury laws in such a manner as to systematically exclude blacks from all jury service; therefore, his conviction and sentence could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William Neal, was indicted on a charge of rape by the State of Delaware. Prior to trial, the defendant filed a petition to have his case removed to a federal district court in Delaware, on the grounds that the State systematically excluded blacks from grand and petit juries. The relief sought was denied. The defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. The Delaware Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue of removal of the case to federal court.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan stated: "The essential question ... is whether, at the time the petition for removal was filed, citizens of the African race, otherwise qualified, were, by reason of the Constitution and laws of Delaware, excluded from service on juries because of their color." The opinion noted: "The court below, all the judges concurring, held that no such exclusion was required or authorized by the Constitution or laws of the State, and, consequently, that the case was not embraced by the removal statute as construed by this court." Justice Harlan agreed with the conclusion of the lower courts that the laws of Delaware, as interpreted by the State's courts, did not discriminate against blacks in grand and petit jury selection. Consequently, the case was not appropriate for removal to a federal court for prosecution.

The opinion pointed out that, while the State's laws may have been facially neutral and not subject to the federal removal statute, the implementation of those laws was still subject to constitutional oversight. Justice Harlan wrote: "[The defendant] is not without remedy if the officers of the State charged with the duty of selecting jurors were guilty of the offence charged in his petition. A denial upon their part, of his right to a selection of grand and petit jurors without discrimination against his race, because of their race, would be a violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, which the trial court was bound to redress." The opinion made clear "that while a [black] citizen, party to a trial involving his life, liberty, or property, cannot claim, as matter of right, that his race shall have a representation on the jury, and while a mixed jury, in a particular case, is not within the meaning of the Constitution, always or absolutely necessary to the equal protection of the laws, it is a right to which he is entitled, that in the selection of jurors to pass upon his life, liberty, or property, there shall be no exclusion of his race, and no discrimination against them, because of their color."

In turning to the evidence presented by the defendant, Justice Harlan found that the defendant had established that the jury laws of Delaware were implemented so as to systematically exclude blacks from grand and petit juries. He wrote:

The showing thus made, including, as it did, the fact that no [black] citizen had ever been summoned as a juror in the courts of the State,—although its [black] population exceeded twenty thousand in 1870, and in 1880 exceeded twenty-six thousand, in a total population of less than one hundred and fifty thousand,—presented a prima facie case of denial, by the officers charged with the selection of grand and petit jurors, of that equality of protection which has been secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States. It was, we think, under all the circumstances, a violent presumption which the State court indulged, that such uniform exclusion of that race from juries, during a period of many years, was solely because, in the judgment of those officers, fairly exercised, the black race in Delaware were utterly disqualified, by want of intelligence, experience, or moral integrity, to sit on juries. The action of those officers in the premises is to be deemed the act of the State; and the refusal of the State court to redress the wrong by them committed was a denial of a right secured to the prisoner by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The judgment of the Delaware Supreme Court was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Waite: The chief justice dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the evidence proffered by the defendant was not sufficient to sustain a finding of systematic discrimination. The chief justice also indicated that even if the discrimination was proven, the issue did not warrant reversal of the judgment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Field: Justice Field dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that "the mere fact that no persons of the [black] race were selected as jurors is not evidence that such persons were excluded on account of their race or color." Justice Field stated that "the fact that [black] persons had never, since the act of Congress of May 1, 1875, been selected as jurors may be attributed to other causes than those of race and color."

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection

Nebraska The State of Nebraska is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on April 20, 1973.

Nebraska has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Nebraska Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Nebraska Court Appeals is composed of a chief judge and five judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Nebraska are tried in the district courts.

Nebraska's capital punishment offenses are set out under Neb. Code § 28-303. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

The offender kills another person (1) purposely and with deliberate and premeditated malice, or (2) in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate any sexual assault in the first degree, arson, robbery, kidnapping, hijacking of any public or private means of transportation, or burglary, or (3) by administering poison or causing the same to be done; or if by willful and corrupt perjury or subornation of the same he purposely procures the conviction and execution of any innocent person.

Capital murder in Nebraska is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. Under Neb. Code § 29-2519 et seq., a capital prosecution is trifurcated into a guilt phase, aggravation phase, and mitigation-penalty phase. A jury is used at the guilt phase and aggravation phase, but not at the mitigation-penalty phase. The mitigation-penalty phase is presided over by a three-judge panel. Under this scheme, after a jury determines guilt, it must determine whether any statutory aggravating circumstance exists. If the jury finds that an aggravating circumstance exists, a three-judge panel hears mitigating evidence. The three-judge panel must unanimously agree that death is appropriate.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Neb. Code § 29-2523(1) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances:

a. The offender was previously convicted of another murder or a crime involving the use or threat of violence to the person, or has a substantial prior history of serious assaultive or terrorizing criminal activity;

b. The murder was committed in an effort to conceal the commission of a crime, or to conceal the identity of the perpetrator of such crime;

c. The murder was committed for hire, or for pecuniary gain, or the defendant hired another to commit the murder for the defendant;

d. The murder was especially heinous, atrocious, cruel, or manifested exceptional depravity by ordinary standards of morality and intelligence;

e. At the time the murder was committed, the offender also committed another murder;

f. The offender knowingly created a great risk of death to at least several persons;

g. The victim was a public servant having lawful custody of the offender or another in the lawful performance of his or her official duties and the offender knew or should have known that the victim was a public servant performing his or her official duties;

h. The murder was committed knowingly to disrupt or hinder the lawful exercise of any governmental function or the enforcement of the laws; or

i. The victim was a law enforcement officer engaged in the lawful performance of his or her official duties as a law enforcement officer and the offender knew or reasonably should have known that the victim was a law enforcement officer.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Nebraska has provided by Neb. Code § 29-2523(2) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a rejection of the imposition of the death penalty:

a. The offender has no significant history of prior criminal activity;

b. The offender acted under unusual pressures or influences or under the domination of another person;

c. The crime was committed while the offender was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance;

d. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime;

e. The offender was an accomplice in the crime committed by another person and his or her participation was relatively minor;

f. The victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to the act; or

g. At the time of the crime, the capacity of the defendant to appreciate the wrongfulness of his or her conduct or to conform his or her conduct to the requirements of law was impaired as a result of mental illness, mental defect, or intoxication.

Under Nebraska's capital punishment statute, a sentence of death is automatically reviewed by the Nebraska Supreme Court. By statute Nebraska authorizes the electric chair to carry out death sentences. However, on February 8, 2008, the Nebraska Supreme Court held that imposition of the death penalty by electrocution violated the State's constitution. The State's death row facility for men is located in Lincoln, Nebraska, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in York, Nebraska.

Pursuant to the laws of Nebraska, an executive panel, which includes the governor, has authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of Nebraska, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Neb. Code § 29-2534:

Besides the warden, the deputy warden, the executioner, in case one shall have been appointed by the warden, and his assistants, the following persons, and no others, may be present at the execution: the clergyman in attendance upon the prisoner, such other persons, not exceeding three in number as the prisoner may designate, and such other persons, not exceeding six in number, as the warden may designate.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Nebraska executed only three capital felons. During this period, Nebraska did not have any female capital felons on death row. A total of ten capital felons were on death row in Nebraska as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as one black inmate, six white inmates, and three Hispanic inmates.

Nebraskans Against the Death Penalty Nebraskans Against the Death Penalty (NADP) is the primary death penalty abolition organization in Nebraska. It was founded in 1981, after the governor vetoed a bill that would have repealed the death penalty in Nebraska. Work engaged in by NADP includes educating the public about the death penalty and charitable efforts toward death row inmates and those being prosecuted for capital crimes.

In 1999, NADP was instrumental in getting Nebraska's unicameral legislature to pass a bill that would have imposed a two-year moratorium on capital punishment and funded a study of the punishment. However, the governor vetoed the bill. The legislature was able to get enough votes to override that part of the bill, which called for funding a two-year study of capital punishment. The study will cost between $120,000 and $160,000. It will analyze the nearly 1,300 homicides committed in Nebraska since 1973 based on race, gender, economic status, and the crimes themselves. The study will be conducted by the Nebraska Crime Commission. The NADP is monitoring the process to promote a fair and honest study of the death penalty in Nebraska.

Issue Presented: Whether a defendant may file a complaint under § 1983, instead of a habeas corpus petition, to challenge use of a surgical procedure to carry out a death sentence by lethal injection.

Case Holding: A defendant may file a complaint under § 1983, instead of a habeas corpus petition, to challenge use of a surgical procedure to carry out a death sentence by lethal injection because it does not involve the lawfulness of the sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: In 1978, an Alabama jury convicted David Nelson of murdering Wilson Thompson. Nelson was sentenced to death for the murder. (There was another victim killed by Nelson but he ultimately received a life sentence for the second murder.) The conviction and death sentence were reversed on appeal and Nelson was tried a second time. The second trial ended with Nelson being found guilty and again sentenced to death. The judgment was upheld on direct appeal. Nelson subsequently filed a federal habeas corpus petition challenging the judgment. A federal district judge affirmed the conviction but reversed the death sentence and remanded the case for a new sentencing hearing. On remand, Nelson was again sentenced to death. The sentence was upheld on direct appeal. Nelson thereafter filed a federal habeas petition challenging the sentence. A federal district court denied relief. That decision was affirmed on appeal.

Three days before Nelson was set to be executed by lethal injection, he filed a civil rights complaint under § 1983. In the complaint, Nelson sought to stop his execution on the grounds that an unconstitutional surgical procedure had to be used to inject the drugs in his body because a needle could not be inserted into his veins. The federal district court found that Nelson's § 1983 complaint could not be used to challenge the surgical procedure. Consequently, the district court treated Nelson's complaint as a petition for habeas relief. The district court then dismissed the petition as being barred by federal law, which prohibits successive habeas petitions. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor held that Nelson could use § 1983 to attack the use of a surgical procedure to impose death by lethal injection. The opinion noted that when an inmate seeks to challenge the constitutionality of his/her conviction or sentence, a habeas petition is the proper procedure. However, where an inmate merely seeks to challenge a specific aspect of the procedure used in carrying out the death penalty, § 1983 may be used. Justice O'Connor further noted that there were limitations on the use of § 1983 by inmates:

itations. The Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995 (Act) imposes limits on the scope and duration of preliminary and permanent injunctive relief, including a requirement that, before issuing such relief, "[a] court shall give substantial weight to any adverse impact on ... the operation of a criminal justice system caused by the relief." It requires that inmates exhaust available state administrative remedies before bringing a § 1983 action challenging the conditions of their confinement. The Act mandates that a district court "shall," on its own motion, dismiss "any action brought with respect to prison conditions under section 1983 of this title ... if the court is satisfied that the action is frivolous, malicious, fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, or seeks monetary relief from a defendant who is immune from relief." Indeed, if the claim is frivolous on its face, a district court may dismiss the suit before the plaintiff has exhausted his state remedies.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded for a hearing on the merits of Nelson's claim. See also Hill v. McDonough; Section 1983 of the Civil Rights Act of 1871

Nevada The State of Nevada is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on July 1, 1973.

Nevada has a two-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court and courts of general jurisdiction. The Nevada Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Nevada are tried in the district courts.

Nevada's capital punishment offenses are set out under Nev. Code § 200.030(1). This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

- a. Perpetrated by means of poison, lying in wait or torture, or by any other kind of willful, deliberate and premeditated killing;
- b. Committed in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of sexual assault, kidnapping, arson, robbery, burglary, invasion of the home, sexual abuse of a child, sexual molestation of a child under the age of 14 years or child abuse;
- c. Committed to avoid or prevent the lawful arrest of any person by a peace officer or to effect the escape of any person from legal custody;
- d. Committed on the property of a public or private school, at an activity sponsored by a public or private school or on a school bus while the bus was engaged in its official duties by a person who intended to create a great risk of death or substantial bodily harm to more than one person by means of a weapon, device or course of action that would normally be hazardous to the lives of more than one person; or
- e. Committed in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of an act of terrorism.

Capital murder in Nevada is punishable by death, life imprisonment with or without parole, or imprisonment for a term of years. A capital prosecution in Nevada is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Nevada.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Nev. Code § 200.033 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The murder was committed by a person under sentence of imprisonment.
2. The murder was committed by a person who, at any time before a penalty hearing is conducted, is or has been convicted of another murder, or a felony involving the use or threat of violence to the person of another.
3. The murder was committed by a person who knowingly created a great risk of death to more than one person by means of a weapon, device or course of action which would normally be hazardous to the lives of more than one person.
4. The murder was committed while the person was engaged, alone or with others, in the commission of or an attempt to commit or flight after committing or attempting to commit, any robbery, arson in the first degree, burglary, invasion of the home or kidnapping in the first degree.
5. The murder was committed to avoid or prevent a lawful arrest or to effect an escape from custody.
6. The murder was committed by a person, for himself or another, to receive money or any other thing of monetary value.
7. The murder was committed upon a peace officer, correction officer or fireman who was killed while engaged in the performance of his official duty or because of an act performed in his official capacity, and the defendant knew or reasonably should have known that the victim was a peace officer, correction officer or fireman.
8. The murder involved torture or the mutilation of the victim.

9. The murder was committed upon one or more persons at random and without apparent motive.

10. The murder was committed upon a person less than 14 years of age.

11. The murder was committed upon a person because of the actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin, physical or mental disability or sexual orientation of that person.

12. The defendant has, in the immediate proceeding, been convicted of more than one offense of murder in the first or second degree.

13. The person, alone or with others, subjected or attempted to subject the victim of the murder to nonconsensual sexual penetration immediately before, during or immediately after the commission of the murder.

14. The murder was committed on the property of a public or private school, at an activity sponsored by a public or private school or on a school bus while the bus was engaged in its official duties by a person who intended to create a great risk of death or substantial bodily harm to more than one person by means of a weapon, device or course of action that would normally be hazardous to the lives of more than one person.

15. The murder was committed with the intent to commit, cause, aid, further or conceal an act of terrorism.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Nevada has provided by Nev. Code § 200.035 the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity.
2. The murder was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance.
3. The victim was a participant in the defendant's criminal conduct or consented to the act.
4. The defendant was an accomplice in a murder committed by another person and his participation in the murder was relatively minor.
5. The defendant acted under duress or under the domination of another person.
6. The youth of the defendant at the time of the crime.
7. Any other mitigating circumstance.

Under Nevada's capital punishment statute, the Nevada Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Nevada uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Ely, Nevada, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Carson City, Nevada.

Pursuant to the laws of Nevada, an executive panel, which includes the governor, has authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of Nevada, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Nev. Code § 176.355(1)(e):

1. The director of the department of corrections shall: ...
 - e. Invite a competent physician, the county coroner, a psychiatrist and not less than six reputable citizens over the age of 21 years to be present at the execution. The director shall determine the maximum number of persons who may be present for the execution. The director shall give preference to those eligible members or representatives of the immediate family of the victim who requested to attend the execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Nevada executed only twelve capital felons. During this period, Nevada did not execute any female capital felons, although one of its death row inmates during this period was a female. A total of seventy-nine capital felons were on death row in Nevada as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as twenty-nine black inmates, forty-one white inmates, eight Hispanic inmates, and one Asian inmate.

NUMBER OF EXECUTIONS BY NEVADA 1976–OCTOBER 2006

New Hampshire The State of New Hampshire is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on January 1, 1991.

New Hampshire has a two-tier legal system. The State’s legal system is composed of a supreme court and courts of general jurisdiction. The New Hampshire Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called superior courts. Capital offenses against the State of New Hampshire are tried in the superior courts.

New Hampshire’s capital punishment offenses are set out under N.H. Code § 630:1. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

- a. The murder of a police officer, correction officer, parole officer, probation officer, prosecutor or a judicial officer acting in the line of duty or when the death is caused as a consequence of or in retaliation for such person’s actions in the line of duty;
- b. Murder during the commission of, or while attempting to commit, kidnapping;
- c. By criminally soliciting a person to cause death or after having been criminally solicited by another for his personal pecuniary gain;
- d. Murder by the offender after being sentenced to life imprisonment without parole;
- e. Murder during the commission of, or while attempting to commit, aggravated felonious sexual assault;
- f. Murder during the commission of, or while attempting to commit, a drug offense.

Capital murder in New Hampshire is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in New Hampshire is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment without parole. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of New Hampshire.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under N.H. Code § 630:5(VII) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

- a. The defendant (1) purposely killed the victim; (2) purposely inflicted serious bodily injury which resulted in the death of the victim; (3) purposely engaged in conduct which the defendant knew would create a grave risk of death to a person, other than one of the participants in the offense and resulted in the death of the victim.
- b. The defendant has been convicted of another state or federal offense resulting in the death of a person, for which a sentence of life imprisonment or a sentence of death was authorized by law.
- c. The defendant has previously been convicted of 2 or more state or federal offenses punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than one year, committed on different occasions, involving the infliction of, or attempted infliction of, serious bodily injury upon another person.
- d. The defendant has previously been convicted of 2 or more state or federal offenses punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than one year, committed on different occasions, involving the distribution of a controlled substance.
- e. In the commission of the offense of capital murder, the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to one or more persons in addition to the victims of the offense.
- f. The defendant committed the offense after substantial planning and premeditation.
- g. The victim was particularly vulnerable due to old age, youth, or infirmity.
- h. The defendant committed the offense in an especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner in that it involved torture or serious physical abuse to the victim.

- i. The murder was committed for pecuniary gain.
- j. The murder was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from lawful custody.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, New Hampshire has provided by N.H. Code § 630:5(VI) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

- a. The defendant's capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was significantly impaired, regardless of whether the capacity was so impaired as to constitute a defense to the charge.
- b. The defendant was under unusual and substantial duress, regardless of whether the duress was of such a degree as to constitute a defense to the charge.
- c. The defendant is punishable as an accomplice in the offense, which was committed by another, but the defendant's participation was relatively minor, regardless of whether the participation was so minor as to constitute a defense to the charge.
- d. The defendant was youthful, although not under the age of 18.
- e. The defendant did not have a significant prior criminal record.
- f. The defendant committed the offense under severe mental or emotional disturbance.
- g. Another defendant or defendants, equally culpable in the crime, will not be punished by death.
- h. The victim consented to the criminal conduct that resulted in the victim's death.
- i. Other factors in the defendant's background or character mitigate against imposition of the death sentence.

Under New Hampshire's capital punishment statute, the New Hampshire Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. New Hampshire uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State also provides for the use of hanging, if for any reason lethal injection cannot be used. Pursuant to the laws of New Hampshire, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of New Hampshire, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by N.H. Code § 630:6:

The punishment of death shall be inflicted within the walls or yard of the state prison. The sheriff of the county in which the person was convicted, and 2 of his deputies, shall be present, unless prevented by unavoidable casualty. He shall request the presence of the attorney general or county attorney, clerk of the court and a surgeon, and may admit other reputable citizens not exceeding 12, the relations of the convict, his counsel and such priest or clergyman as he may desire, and no others.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, New Hampshire did not execute any prisoner. Nor did the State have anyone on death row during this period. The last execution by the State occurred in 1939.

New Jersey The death penalty was abolished by the State of New Jersey in December 2007.

New Mexico The State of New Mexico is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on July 1, 1979.

New Mexico has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The New Mexico Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The New Mexico Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and nine judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of New Mexico are tried in the district courts.

New Mexico's capital punishment offenses are set out under N.M. Code § 30-2-1(A). This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

- 1. By any kind of willful, deliberate and premeditated killing;
- 2. In the commission of or attempt to commit any felony; or
- 3. By any act greatly dangerous to the lives of others, indicating a depraved mind regardless of human life.

Capital murder in New Mexico is punishable by death or life imprisonment with parole. A capital prosecution in New Mexico is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of New Mexico.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under N.M. Code § 31-20A-5 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

- A. The victim was a peace officer who was acting in the lawful discharge of an official duty when he was murdered;
- B. The murder was committed with intent to kill in the commission of or attempt to commit kidnapping, criminal sexual contact of a minor or criminal sexual penetration;
- C. The murder was committed with the intent to kill by the defendant while attempting to escape from a penal institution of New Mexico;
- D. While incarcerated in a penal institution in New Mexico, the defendant, with the intent to kill, murdered a person who was at the time incarcerated in or lawfully on the premises of a penal institution in New Mexico;

E. While incarcerated in a penal institution in New Mexico, the defendant, with the intent to kill, murdered an employee of the corrections and criminal rehabilitation department;

F. The capital felony was committed for hire; and

G. The capital felony was murder of a witness to a crime or any person likely to become a witness to a crime, for the purpose of preventing report of the crime or testimony in any criminal proceeding, or for retaliation for the victim having testified in any criminal proceeding.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, New Mexico has provided by N.M. Code § 31-20A-6 the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

A. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity;

B. The defendant acted under duress or under the domination of another person;

C. The defendant's capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law was impaired;

D. The defendant was under the influence of mental or emotional disturbance;

E. The victim was a willing participant in the defendant's conduct;

F. The defendant acted under circumstances which tended to justify, excuse or reduce the crime;

G. The defendant is likely to be rehabilitated;

H. The defendant cooperated with authorities; and

I. The defendant's age.

Under New Mexico's capital punishment statute, the New Mexico Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. New Mexico uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Santa Fe, New Mexico. Pursuant to the laws of New Mexico, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of New Mexico, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by N.M. Code § 31-14-15:

A judgment of death must be executed within the walls of the state penitentiary at Santa Fe, and such execution shall be under the supervision and direction of the warden of said institution. The warden of the state penitentiary must be present at the execution and must invite the presence of a physician, the attorney general of the state and at least twelve reputable citizens, to be selected by him; and he shall, at the request of the defendant, permit such ministers of the gospel, not exceeding two, as the defendant may name, and any person, relatives or friends, not to exceed five, to be present at the execution, together with such peace officers as he may think expedient, to witness the execution. But no other persons than those mentioned in this section can be present at the execution, nor can any person under age be allowed to witness the same.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however New Mexico executed only one capital felon. A total of two capital felons were on death row in New Mexico as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as two white inmates.

New Mexico Coalition to Repeal the Death Penalty

The New Mexico Coalition to Repeal the Death Penalty is composed of organizations and individuals committed to repealing the death penalty in New Mexico. The organization has several committees, including legislative, educational, faith, and media. Its legislative committee focuses on introducing bills to repeal the death penalty in the New Mexico legislature. The education committee provides resources and teaching materials for school groups, religious communities, and others interested in learning more about the death penalty. The faith committee works with individual faith communities and religious leaders to promote dialogue and action around the issue. The media committee focuses on publicizing the organization's message, as well as death penalty-related events in the community.

Newton, Frances Elaine On the evening of April 7, 1987, Houston police responded to a call of possible shooting at the home of Adrian Newton. When the police arrived they found twenty-three-year-old Adrian dead from a bullet wound to his head. They also found Adrian's two children, seven-year-old Alton and twenty-one-month-old Farrah, dead from gunshot wounds.

On April 21, 1987, twenty-three-year-old Frances Elaine Newton, the wife of Adrian and mother of Alton and Farrah, filed a claim for a $50,000 life insurance policy she had taken out on her husband and children. The police arrested Frances the day after she filed the insurance claim and charged her with three counts of murder.

During the trial, which was held in 1988, the prosecutor was able to present strong circumstantial evidence that she murdered her husband and two children. The evidence revealed that Frances was having an affair with another man. A month before her husband and children were killed, she took out a life insurance policy, effective immediately, on her family.

Frances Elaine Newton was executed by lethal injection on September 15, 2005. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

On the day of the murders, Frances asked her brother-in-law to leave the home because she wanted to discuss marital problems with her husband. The brother-in-law left. Within hours of his departure, the killings occurred. Frances claimed to have an alibi, in that around the time of the murders she visited the home of a relative named Sondra Nelms. However, Nelms' testimony provided the strongest evidence against Frances. Nelms testified that when Frances arrived at her home she went to a nearby abandoned house carrying a bag and that she left the bag in the house. Police later found the bag in the abandoned house. The bag contained the murder weapon.

Additional evidence during the trial revealed that the dress Frances wore on the day of the killings contained gunpowder residue. Frances was ultimately convicted of the murders by a jury and sentenced to death. On September 15, 2005, Frances was executed by lethal injection.

New York The State of New York reenacted its death penalty laws after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on September 9, 1995. However, the death penalty laws of New York were invalidated by the State's highest court in People v. LaValle, 3 N.Y.3d 88 (2004). The New York legislature failed to pass legislation to amend the statute, though efforts were made. The last execution in the State occurred in 1963.

New Zealand New Zealand abolished capital punishment for ordinary crimes in 1961 and completely abolished the punishment for all crimes in 1989. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Ng, Charles Charles Ng, a former Marine and Hong Kong immigrant, was sentenced to death by the State of California on June 30, 1999. Ng was convicted of the murder of six men, three women, and two baby boys. He spent fourteen years fighting the charges, thus making his prosecution the longest in the history of California — and one of the costliest, at $14 million. Ng was arrested in Canada in 1985 and fought extradition for five years.

Charles Ng is on death row in the State of California after being convicted of killing eleven people. (California Department of Corrections)

The evidence in Ng's trial revealed that he and an accomplice named Leonard Lake, who committed suicide while in police custody in 1985, lured the victims to a cabin in California's Gold Rush Country in 1984 and 1985. The cabin was equipped with a bunker that was used as a prisoner's cell.

Videotapes revealed Ng and Lake tortured and raped their female victims before killing them. The police only recovered the bodies of two of the victims, but there was evidence of hundreds of pieces of charred bones around the cabin, leading authorities to conclude that the other victims were burned. Ng is on death row in California. See also Serial Killer

Nicaragua Capital punishment was abolished by Nicaragua in 1979. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Niger Capital punishment has not been officially abolished by Niger, but the punishment has been infrequently imposed. Niger uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on French civil law and customary law. Niger revised its constitution on May 12, 1996.

The judicial system is composed of trial courts, a court of appeals, and a supreme court. Customary courts try cases involving divorce or inheritance. Defendants have the right to retained or appointed counsel, to confront witnesses, and to enjoy a presumption of innocence. Defendants and prosecutors may appeal a judgment. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Nigeria Capital punishment is on the law books of Nigeria. The nation uses hanging and the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. The nation's legal system is based on English common law and customary law. Nigeria adopted a new constitution in May 1999.

The judicial system is composed of federal and state trial courts, appellate courts, and a federal supreme court. Trials in the court system are public. Defendants enjoy a presumption of innocence, have a right to legal counsel, and have a right to confront witnesses. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Night Stalker Between 1984 and 1985, the city of Los Angeles was gripped with fear, as the media proclaimed the city was being terrorized by an unidentified Night Stalker. During this period, the infamous Night Stalker randomly stalked and murdered thirteen people in their homes.

The police were at a loss for locating the Night Stalker until a break came on September 1, 1985. On that day, the police were able to obtain a picture of the Night Stalker and posted it throughout the city. On the day the picture was released, the Night Stalker was caught by residents of a neighborhood as he attempted to steal a car. The residents attacked him and held him until the police arrived. That evening, police arrested Richard Ramirez on suspicion of committing nineteen murders.

Ramirez was born February 29, 1960, to Mexican immigrant parents. He was reared in El Paso, Texas. He left home at the age of eighteen and headed for Los Angeles. Ramirez was considered a dangerous youth by those who knew him. He was known to be a heavy drug user who listened religiously to satanic music. Eventually, drugs and satanic music drove Ramirez to the point of rejecting his Catholic background and embracing satanic worship.

Ramirez was not brought to trial until January 10, 1989. The trial ended in July. The jury deliberated until September 20 before they brought back guilty verdicts on each of the charges. On October 3, the penalty phase jury voted for the death penalty. The trial judge responded by sentencing Ramirez to death thirteen times. The Night Stalker is on death row in California, continuing to worship Satan. See also Serial Killer

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was entitled to a jury trial to determine her sanity before the trial court fixed a new date for her execution.

Case Holding: The defendant was not entitled to a jury trial to determine her sanity before the trial court fixed a new date for her execution because such a requirement was not imposed under the common law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Elizabeth Nobles, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. When the case returned to the trial court, it was necessary to fix a new execution date because the initial one had expired while the case was being appealed. The defendant objected to the new sentencing proceeding on the grounds that she had become insane and requested a jury trial to determine whether she was insane. The trial court rejected the contention and set a new execution date. The defendant appealed the issue, but the State's appellate court affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White indicated that the defendant challenged the method of inquiry provided by the Georgia statutes for ascertaining whether a defendant who had been convicted of a crime was insane at the time of the inquiry. The defendant contended that the Georgia statutes afforded an opportunity to investigate the question of the insanity of a person convicted of crime only when the suggestion of insanity was made after conviction and sentence, but the statutes furnished no means of testing the question of insanity arising after conviction and before sentence. Justice White ultimately concluded that the defendant's argument was without merit, because she was not actually re-sentenced and therefore was not entitled to any pre-sentencing protections in determining her sanity. The opinion reasoned as follows:

Indeed, the question which arises on the record does not require a consideration of what would be due process of law under the fourteenth amendment, where insanity was suggested between verdict and sentence, or even at the time of sentence. This results from the fact that the suggestion of insanity relied on was made, not at the time of sentence, but long after the sentence had been imposed. As stated [in the record], the accused had been sentenced to death at the term of court where the verdict of guilty was found, and that when called into court again, ... it was for a resentence upon the verdict, because of the previous sentence having been regularly and legally superseded by the order of court. In the opinion of the supreme court of Georgia in this case, it finds this fact, and holds that under the Georgia statutes the [second] proceeding..., although called a "resentence," was in legal effect but a fixing of a new date for the execution of the previous sentence; the date fixed in the prior sentence having expired. In other words, the supreme court of Georgia holds that the prior sentence remained in force, and that the subsequent action of the court was but a mere fixing of the date for its execution....

From these considerations it follows that the only question which we are called upon to determine is whether, after a regular conviction and sentence, a suggestion of a then existing insanity is made, it is necessary, in order to constitute due process of law, that the question so presented should be tried by a jury in a judicial proceeding surrounded by all the safeguards and requirements of a common law jury trial, and even although by the state law full and adequate administrative and quasi judicial process is created for the purpose of investigating the suggestion. Without analysis of the contention, it might well suffice to demonstrate its obvious unsoundness by pointing to the absurd conclusion which would result from its establishment. If it were true that at common law a suggestion of insanity, after sentence, created on the part of a convict an absolute right to a trial of this issue by a judge and jury, then it would be wholly at the will of a convict to suffer any punishment whatever, for the necessity of his doing so would depend solely upon his fecundity in making suggestion after suggestion of insanity, to be followed by trial upon trial....

It being demonstrated by reason and authority that at common law a suggestion, made after verdict and sentence, of insanity, did not give rise to an absolute right on the part of a convict to have such issue tried before the court and to a jury, but addressed itself to the discretion of the judge, it follows that the manner in which such question should be determined was purely a matter of legislative regulation. It was therefore a subject within the control of the state of Georgia.

The judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Insanity while Awaiting Execution

Issue Presented: Whether the federal court had jurisdiction over a murder committed by Cherokee citizens against an adopted Cherokee citizen.

Case Holding: The federal court did not have jurisdiction over a murder committed by Cherokee citizens against an adopted Cherokee citizen.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved the prosecution of the defendant, Nofire, and several other unnamed defendants by the United States. The defendants were charged with the capital murder of a white person, Fred Rutherford, on the land of the Cherokee Nation. The defendants requested the federal trial court dismiss the case because the victim, though white, was a citizen of the Cherokee Nation and therefore the court was without jurisdiction to prosecute the case. Under the laws of the Cherokee Nation, any one marrying a member of the Cherokee Nation became a citizen thereof by adoption. The defendants established the victim had married a member of the Cherokee Nation. The trial court rejected the evidence of the victim's membership in the Cherokee Nation. The defendants were prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced to death. The defendants appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the trial court did not have jurisdiction to prosecute them. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer held that the federal court did not have jurisdiction over the offense charged against the defendants. The opinion explained:

[T]he courts of the Cherokee Nation have jurisdiction over offenses committed by one [of its citizens] upon the person of another, and this includes, by virtue of the statutes, both [Cherokees] by birth and [Cherokees] by adoption....

[I]t is evident that Rutherford intended to change his nationality, and become a Cherokee citizen. He took the steps which the statute prescribed, and did, as he supposed, all that was requisite therefor. He was marrying a Cherokee woman, and thus to a certain extent allying himself with the Cherokee Nation. He sought and obtained the license which was declared legally prerequisite to such marriage if he intended to become an adopted citizen of that Nation. That he also obtained a marriage license from the United States authorities does not disprove this intention. It only shows that he did not intend that there should be any question anywhere, by any authority, as to the validity of his marriage. He asserted, and was permitted to exercise, the right of suffrage as a Cherokee citizen. Suppose, during his lifetime, the Cherokee Nation had asserted jurisdiction over him as an adopted citizen; would he not have been stopped from denying such citizenship? Has death changed the significance of his actions? The Cherokee Nation ... has asserted its jurisdiction over the Cherokees who did the killing,— a jurisdiction which is conditioned upon the fact that the party killed was a Cherokee citizen. It appears, therefore, that Rutherford sought to become a citizen, took all the steps he supposed necessary therefor, considered himself a citizen, and that the Cherokee Nation in his lifetime recognized him as a citizen, and still asserts his citizenship. Under those circumstances, we think it must be adjudged that he was a citizen by adoption, and, consequently, the jurisdiction over the offense charged herein is, by the laws of the United States and treaties with the Cherokee Nation, vested in the courts of that Nation.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the case remanded with instructions to surrender the defendants to the authorities of the Cherokee Nation. See also Jurisdiction; Native Americans and Capital Punishment

Nolo Contendere Plea The phrase “nolo contendere” means “no contest.” In criminal prosecutions, a nolo contendere plea has the effect of a guilty plea, insofar as the punishment for a crime may be imposed based upon the plea. However, a nolo contendere plea is technically not a plea of guilty, nor a plea of innocence. The nolo contendere plea was originally designed to permit a defendant to avoid civil consequences that might result from a plea of guilty. For example, a defendant who assaults a victim is subject to both criminal and civil prosecution. Thus, if a defendant entered a plea of guilty to the criminal charge of assault, the victim could merely take the record of the guilty plea into a civil court and use it as conclusive evidence in a civil case against the defendant for the same conduct. By entering a plea of nolo contendere, a defendant does not give the victim conclusive proof of his or her guilt for use in a civil case. The nolo contendere plea is rare in capital prosecutions, but it has been used. See also Female Serial Killer; Guilty Plea

Binding/Nonbinding Jury Sentencing Determination

Non-Capital and Capital Sentencing Very often, the situation arises where a capital felon will be convicted of capital murder in addition to non-capital crimes during the same trial. An issue that arises frequently in this situation is whether the capital felon has a right to serve the non-capital prison sentence before having to be executed on the capital offense conviction. The universal rule on this issue is that a capital felon receiving a sentence of imprisonment, in addition to a sentence of death, does not have a right to serve the term of imprisonment before being executed.

Non-Capital Punishment Jurisdictions see Capital Punishment Jurisdictions

Non-Discrimination Jury Instruction A trend has begun wherein capital punishment statutes are expressly requiring trial judges to instruct penalty phase juries that they are not to consider the race, color, religious belief, national origin, or sex of capital felons when deliberating on their fate. Courts have been quick to observe that statutory non-discrimination jury instructions are not intended to eliminate jury consideration of legitimate mitigating factors, such as inferences which can be drawn from a capital felon who had a culturally difficult and deprived background. See also Jury Instructions; Race-Qualified Jury

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him; therefore, his conviction and death sentence could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Clarence Norris, was one of seven defendants convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Alabama. In Powell v. Alabama, the United States Supreme Court reversed the convictions of all seven defendants and ordered a new trial. After the remand, a motion for change of venue was granted and all the cases were transferred to another county. The defendant was tried separately, however, on remand. The jury convicted the defendant and he was again sentenced to death. On appeal, the Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant’s argument that his trial violated the federal Constitution on the grounds that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Hughes: The chief justice held that the defendant’s trial violated the Constitution because blacks were excluded from the grand and petit juries involved with the prosecution. The opinion stated: “Whenever by any action of a state, whether through its Legislature, through its courts, or through its executive or administrative officers, all persons of the African race are excluded, solely because of their race or color, from serving as grand jurors in the criminal prosecution of a person of the African race, the equal protection of the laws is denied to him, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.... The principle is equally applicable to a similar exclusion ... from service on petit juries. And although the state[’s] statute defining the qualifications of jurors may be fair on its face, the constitutional provision affords protection against action of the state through its administrative officers in effecting the prohibited discrimination.”

The chief justice found that the defendant adduced evidence to support the charge of unconstitutional discrimination in the actual administration of the state’s grand and petit jury statute. It was said that blacks had not “served on any grand or petit jury in that county within the memory of witnesses who had lived there all their lives.” The opinion indicated that county officials placed code words on forms that alerted them to which potential jurors on the master jury list were black. Through the use of such code words, officials were able to systematically exclude blacks from all jury service. The chief justice found that such evidence “in itself made out a prima facie case of the denial of the equal protection which the Constitution guarantees.” The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Patterson v. Alabama; Powell v. Alabama

North Carolina The State of North Carolina is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on June 1, 1977.

North Carolina has a three-tier legal system. The State’s legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The North Carolina Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The North Carolina Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and eleven associate judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called superior courts. Capital offenses against the State of North Carolina are tried in the superior courts.

North Carolina’s capital punishment offenses are set out under N.C. Code § 14-17. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

Murder ... perpetrated by means of a nuclear, biological, or chemical weapon of mass destruction, poison, lying in wait, imprisonment, starving, torture, or by any other kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, or which shall be committed in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of any arson, rape or a sex offense, robbery, kidnapping, burglary, or other felony committed or attempted with the use of a deadly weapon.

In addition, under N.C. Code § 14-17 it states that “any person under the age of 17 who commits murder in the first degree while serving a prison sentence imposed for a prior murder or while on escape from a prison sentence imposed for a prior murder shall be punished with death or imprisonment in the State’s prison for life without parole.” This provision is in conflict with the United States Supreme Court decision in Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005), which held that the death penalty cannot be imposed upon a person who was under eighteen when he or she committed capital murder.

Capital murder in North Carolina is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in North Carolina is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment without parole. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of North Carolina.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under N.C. Code § 15A-2000(e) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The capital felony was committed by a person lawfully incarcerated.
2. The defendant had been previously convicted of another capital felony or had been previously adjudicated delinquent in a juvenile proceeding for committing an offense that would be a capital felony if committed by an adult.

3. The defendant had been previously convicted of a felony involving the use or threat of violence to the person or had been previously adjudicated delinquent in a juvenile proceeding for committing an offense that would be a felony involving the use or threat of violence to the person if the offense had been committed by an adult.

4. The capital felony was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody.

5. The capital felony was committed while the defendant was engaged, or was an aider or abettor, in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, or flight after committing or attempting to commit, any homicide, robbery, rape or a sex offense, arson, burglary, kidnapping, or aircraft piracy or the unlawful throwing, placing, or discharging of a destructive device or bomb.

6. The capital felony was committed for pecuniary gain.

7. The capital felony was committed to disrupt or hinder the lawful exercise of any governmental function or the enforcement of laws.

8. The capital felony was committed against a law-enforcement officer, employee of the Department of Correction, jailer, fireman, judge or justice, former judge or justice, prosecutor or former prosecutor, juror or former juror, or witness or former witness against the defendant, while engaged in the performance of his official duties or because of the exercise of his official duty.

9. The capital felony was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel.

10. The defendant knowingly created a great risk of death to more than one person by means of a weapon or device which would normally be hazardous to the lives of more than one person.

11. The murder for which the defendant stands convicted was part of a course of conduct in which the defendant engaged and which included the commission by the defendant of other crimes of violence against another person or persons.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, North Carolina has provided by N.C. Code § 15A-2000(f) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity.

2. The capital felony was committed while the defendant was under the influence of mental or emotional disturbance.

3. The victim was a voluntary participant in the defendant’s homicidal conduct or consented to the homicidal act.

4. The defendant was an accomplice in or accessory to the capital felony committed by another person and his participation was relatively minor.

5. The defendant acted under duress or under the domination of another person.

6. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was impaired.

7. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime.

8. The defendant aided in the apprehension of another capital felon or testified truthfully on behalf of the prosecution in another prosecution of a felony.

9. Any other circumstance arising from the evidence which the jury deems to have mitigating value.

Under North Carolina's capital punishment statute, the North Carolina Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. North Carolina uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men and women is located in Raleigh, North Carolina. Pursuant to the laws of North Carolina, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of North Carolina, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by N.C. Code § 15-190:

The execution shall be under the general supervision and control of the warden of the penitentiary, who shall from time to time, in writing, name and designate the guard or guards or other reliable person or persons who shall cause the person, convict or felon against whom the death sentence has been pronounced to be executed.... At such execution there shall be present the warden or deputy warden or some person designated by the warden in the warden's place, and the surgeon or physician of the penitentiary. Four respectable citizens, two members of the victim's family, the counsel and any relatives of such person, convict or felon and a minister or member of the clergy or religious leader of the person's choosing may be present if they so desire. The identities, including the names, residential addresses, residential telephone numbers, and social security numbers, of witnesses or persons designated to carry out the execution shall be confidential.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, North Carolina executed forty-three capital felons. During this period, North Carolina executed one female capital felon, although five of its death row inmates during this period were female. A total of 188 capital felons were on death row in North Carolina as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as 100 black inmates, seventy-three white inmates, four Hispanic inmates, one Asian inmate, and ten Native American inmates.

NUMBER OF EXECUTIONS BY NORTH CAROLINA 1976–OCTOBER 2006

North Carolina v. Alford Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970); Argued: November 17, 1969; Reargued: October 14, 1970; Decided: November 23, 1970; Opinion of the Court: Justice White; Concurring Opinion: None; Concurring Statement: Justice Black; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Brennan, in which Douglas and Marshall, JJ., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: Doris R. Bray argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Jacob L. Safron argued; Robert Morgan and Andrew A. Vanore, Jr. on brief; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: None; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: 1

Issue Presented: Whether a guilty plea that represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternatives available to a defendant, especially one represented by competent counsel, is compelled within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment because it was entered to avoid the possibility of the death penalty.

Case Holding: A guilty plea that is voluntarily and intelligently made is not compelled within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment because it was entered to avoid the possibility of the death penalty.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: On December 2, 1963, the defendant, Alford, was indicted for the capital crime of first-degree murder by the State of North Carolina. At the time, State law provided for the penalty of life imprisonment when a plea of guilty was accepted to a first-degree murder charge. Defense counsel, in the face of strong evidence of guilt, recommended a guilty plea, but left the decision to the defendant. The prosecutor agreed to accept a plea of guilty to second-degree murder, which carried a penalty of two to thirty years' imprisonment.

Before the plea was finally accepted by the trial court, the court heard the sworn testimony of a police officer who summarized the State's case. Although there was no eyewitness to the crime, the testimony indicated that shortly before the killing, the defendant took his gun from his house, stated his intention to kill the victim, and returned home with the declaration that he had carried out the killing. After the summary presentation of the State's case, the defendant took the stand and testified that he did not commit the murder, but that he was pleading guilty because he faced the threat of the death penalty if he did not do so. In response to the questions of his counsel, he acknowledged that his counsel had informed him of the difference between second- and first-degree murder and of his rights in case he chose to go to trial. The trial court then asked the defendant if, in light of his denial of guilt, he still desired to plead guilty to second-degree murder and the defendant answered, "Yes, sir. I plead guilty on — from the circumstances that [my attorney] told me." The trial court accepted the guilty plea and sentenced the defendant to thirty years' imprisonment.

The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition a federal district court, arguing his plea was unconstitutional because the threat of the death penalty coerced his decision to enter the plea of guilty. The district court denied relief. However, a Court of Appeals granted relief after finding that the defendant's guilty plea was involuntary because it was motivated principally by fear of the death penalty. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White wrote that a guilty plea that represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternatives available to a defendant, especially one represented by competent counsel, is not compelled within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment because it was entered to avoid the possibility of the death penalty. The opinion reasoned that an accused may voluntarily, knowingly, and understandingly consent to the imposition of a prison sentence, even though he or she is unwilling to admit participation in the crime, or even if his or her guilty plea contains a protestation of innocence. It was said that: "The standard was and remains whether the plea represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant. That he would not have pled except for the opportunity to limit the possible penalty does not necessarily demonstrate that the plea of guilty was not the product of a free and rational choice, especially where the defendant was represented by competent counsel whose advice was that the plea would be to the defendant's advantage."

Justice White concluded that it was error for the Court of Appeals to find the defendant's guilty plea was invalid. Therefore, the judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a statement indicating he "concur[s] in the judgment and in substantially all of the opinion in this case."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Douglas and Marshall, JJ., Joined: Justice Brennan dissented on basis that the defendant had established that his guilty plea was not the product of free choice. The dissent reasoned and concluded, as follows: "I adhere to the view that, in any given case, the influence of such an unconstitutional threat 'must necessarily be given weight in determining the voluntariness of a plea.' And, without reaching the question whether due process permits the entry of judgment upon a plea of guilty accompanied by a contemporaneous denial of acts constituting the crime, I believe that at the very least such a denial of guilt is also a relevant factor in determining whether the plea was voluntarily and intelligently made. With these factors in mind, it is sufficient in my view to state that the facts set out in the majority opinion demonstrate that Alford was 'so gripped by fear of the death penalty' that his decision to plead guilty was not voluntary but was 'the product of duress as much so as choice reflecting physical constraint.' Accordingly, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals." See also Bradshaw v. Stumpf; Guilty Plea

Notice of Intent to Seek Death Penalty In the case of In Re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257 (1948), the United States Supreme Court held that the Constitution demanded that a defendant be given reasonable notice of a charge against him or her. The constitutional notice requirement is generally satisfied at the arraignment stage of a prosecution. At an arraignment, a defendant is formally given a copy of the charging instrument and is informed by the trial court of the nature of the accusation against him or her.

In the context of a capital prosecution, a charging instrument will inform a defendant that he or she is accused of an offense that may be punished with death. As a general matter, the Constitution does not require death penalty notice beyond that which is provided in the charging instrument and explained by the trial judge during arraignment.

Statutory Notice Requirement: A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions statutorily require prosecutors provide defendants notice of the intent to seek the death penalty, prior to the trial and independent of the notice provided at the arraignment in the charging instrument. Several justifications have been proffered for the stringent statutory notice requirement: (1) it is an acknowledgment that the death penalty is unlike any other form of punishment in its finality, (2) it insures that the plea bargaining process is effectively and fairly carried out, and (3) it enables a defendant to timely make a more intelligent determination of what evidence to present at trial.

JURISDICTIONS STATUTORILY REQUIRING DEFENDANTS BE GIVEN PRETRIAL NOTICE OF INTENT TO SEEK THE DEATH PENALTY

Notice in Multiple Murder Prosecution: In the case of Grandison v. State, 670 A.2d 398 (Md. 1995), the appellate court addressed the issue of notice to seek the death penalty in a multiple murder prosecution. The defendant in Grandison was prosecuted for committing two homicides. The prosecutor provided the defendant with statutory notice that the death penalty would be sought. However, the notice did not state that the death penalty would be sought for both homicides.

Subsequent to the defendant's convictions for multiple homicides, he appealed the convictions and argued that the statutory death penalty notice he received was inadequate. The defendant contended that he should have received notice that the death penalty would be sought for each murder. The Grandison court disagreed with the defendant in a cautious way. The court indicated that the record in the case revealed that the defendant was generally aware, before the trial started, that the death penalty would be sought for both murders. The court did not indicate what its decision on the issue would have been if the record did not show that the defendant was aware before the trial that the death penalty was going to be sought for both murders.

The Lankford Notice Exception: The United States Supreme Court developed what has become known as the Lankford notice exception, in the case of Lankford v. Idaho, 500 U.S. 110 (1991). Under the Lankford notice exception, if subsequent to an arraignment, a prosecutor explicitly indicates that the death penalty will not be sought in the case, such punishment may not be imposed, absent a timely notice that the punishment will in fact be sought. See also Lankford v. Idaho; Prosecutor

Notice of Statutory Aggravating Circumstances In response to the critical role of statutory aggravating circumstances in death penalty cases, a large minority of capital punishment jurisdictions require by statute that prosecutors provide defendants with pre-trial notice of the aggravating circumstances that will be used against them. In the case of People v. Arias, 913 P.2d 980 (Cal. 1996), it was held that pre-trial notice of aggravating circumstances is adequate if it gives a defendant a reasonable understanding of what to expect and prepare for at the penalty phase hearing.

JURISDICTIONS REQUIRING BY STATUTE THAT PRETRIAL NOTICE OF AGGRAVATING CIRCUMSTANCES BE GIVEN

Two primary concerns are addressed by the requirement of giving pre-trial notice of aggravating circumstances. First, the requirement provides a defendant with sufficient time to prepare a penalty phase defense to the aggravating circumstances. Second, this requirement can facilitate the plea bargaining process by letting the defendant know the strength of the prosecutor's penalty phase evidence.

In three capital punishment jurisdictions, Delaware, Indiana, and Nevada, it is required by statute that prosecutors provide defendants with notice of aggravating circumstances, prior to the start of the penalty phase of a capital murder prosecution. This requirement means that the notice does not have to be given until after the trial. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Nullification Instruction The vast majority of jurisdictions limit juries to making findings of fact and not conclusions of law. However, it is known that juries oftentimes disregard instructions and engage in what is called jury nullification. That is, determining the outcome of an issue based upon their personal beliefs instead of the dictates of the law. In the area of capital punishment, the Supreme Court has been called upon on two occasions to address the issue of trial judges giving nullification instructions to juries. That is, instructing the jury to make a decision that is inconsistent with the law. In Smith v. Texas, 543 U.S. 37 (2004), and Penry v. Johnson, 532 U.S. 782 (2001), the Supreme Court reversed death sentences because the juries in the cases were instructed in a manner that permitted them to disobey the law in deciding whether the death penalty should be imposed. See also Jury Instructions; Penry v. Johnson; Smith v. Texas

O

O'Connor, Sandra Day Sandra Day O'Connor was appointed an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1981. While on the Supreme Court, O'Connor displayed a moderate to conservative philosophy in her interpretation of the Constitution.

O'Connor was born in El Paso, Texas, on March 26, 1930. She graduated from Stanford University in 1950. O'Connor received her law degree from Stanford Law School in 1952. Her legal career included being a prosecutor, trial judge, and appellate judge on the Arizona Court of Appeals. In 1981, President Ronald Reagan appointed O'Connor as the first female associate justice on the Supreme Court. On January 31, 2006, O'Connor retired from the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, O'Connor wrote a considerable number of opinions in capital punishment cases. One of her opinions which had the greatest influence across criminal law in general was the capital case of Strickland v. Washington. That case involved a defendant who alleged that he pled guilty to capital murder and was sentenced to death because his attorney was constitutionally ineffective. O'Connor, writing for the Court, established a constitutional test to determine whether an attorney's performance was deficient to the point of violating the constitutional right to have effective assistance of counsel. Under the Strickland test, a defendant may prevail on an ineffective assistance of counsel claim only if he or she proves that the attorney's performance was deficient and that he or she suffered prejudice as a result of the deficiency. O'Connor held that the defendant did not satisfy the test she created. The test announced in Strickland is used across the board in determining allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel.

Ocuish, Hannah Hannah Ocuish was the youngest known female to be executed in the nation. The State of Connecticut charged Hannah with strangling and stoning to death a six-year-old child on July 21, 1786. The State convicted and sentenced her to death by hanging on October 12, 1786. On December 20, 1786, the death sentence was carried out. Hannah was twelve years old on the date of her execution. See also Juveniles Issue Presented: Whether the rule set out in Simmons v. South Carolina, that a capital defendant be permitted to inform the sentencing jury that he or she is parole ineligible, was a new rule and thereby inapplicable to the defendant's case.

Case Holding: The rule announced in Simmons v. South Carolina was a new rule and therefore inapplicable to the defendant's case.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: Virginia convicted the defendant, Joseph Roger O'Dell, of capital murder. During the sentencing phase, the defendant requested the trial judge instruct the jury that he was ineligible for parole if sentenced to life in prison. The trial judge refused to give the instruction. The jury determined that the defendant presented a future danger and sentenced him to death. The Virginia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence.

The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, arguing that, under the United States Supreme Court's decision in Simmons v. South Carolina, he had a constitutional right to have the jury instructed that he would not be eligible for parole if given a life sentence. The district court agreed with the defendant, after concluding that Simmons did not announce a new rule and could therefore be relied upon by the defendant. The defendant's death sentence was vacated. A federal Court of Appeals reversed the district court's decision, after concluding Simmons announced a new rule after the defendant's conviction became final and could therefore not be relied upon by him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas ruled that the requirement under Simmons, that a penalty phase jury be instructed that a defendant is not eligible for parole if his future dangerousness is an issue in the case, was a new rule announced after the defendant's conviction became final and could therefore not be relied upon by him. It was said that the rule announced in Simmons was new because it was not dictated by precedent existing at the time the defendant's conviction became final.

The opinion pointed out that, under the Court's precedents, a new constitutional rule cannot be applied to a conviction that had become final before the new rule was announced unless the new rule fell within one of two narrow exceptions. Justice Thomas indicated that to circumvent the general bar to retroactive application of a new constitutional rule, the new rule must have (1) placed an entire category of primary conduct beyond the reach of criminal law or prohibited imposition of a certain type of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense; or (2) was a watershed rule of criminal procedure implicating a criminal proceeding's fundamental fairness and accuracy.

The opinion found that the defendant's conviction became final in 1988 and Simmons was decided in 1994. Justice Thomas reasoned that at the time the defendant's conviction became final, no decision by the Court foreshadowed the rule announced in Simmons. The opinion rejected the defendant's argument that the Court's decisions in Gardner v. Florida and Skipper v. South Carolina foreshadowed or dictated the rule announced in Simmons. It was also determined that the rule in Simmons did not come within either of the two exceptions to the prohibition of retroactive application of a new constitutional rule. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's decision on the basis that Simmons did not announce a new rule. He stated his position as follows:

This case is not about whether O'Dell was given a fair sentencing hearing; instead, the question presented is whether, despite the admittedly unfair hearing, he should be put to death because his trial was conducted before Simmons was decided. Because the Court regards the holding in Simmons as nothing more than a novel "court made rule," it rejects [the defendant's] plea. In my view, our decision in Simmons applied a fundamental principle that is as old as the adversary system itself, and that had been quite clearly articulated by this Court in two earlier opinions....

[E]ven if the rule in Simmons could properly be viewed as a "new" rule, it is of such importance to the accuracy and fairness of a capital sentencing proceeding that it should be applied consistently to all prisoners whose death sentences were imposed in violation of the rule, whether they were sentenced before Simmons was decided or after. Moreover, to the extent that the fundamental principles underlying the rule needed explicit articulation by this Court, they clearly had been expressed well before O'Dell's 1988 sentencing proceeding.

Ohio The State of Ohio is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on January 1, 1974.

Ohio has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Ohio Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Ohio Courts of Appeals are divided into twelve districts. Each district is composed of at least three judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called Courts of Common Pleas. Capital offenses against the State of Ohio are tried in the Courts of Common Pleas. It is provided under Rule 20 of the Rules of Superintendence for the Courts of Ohio that, in capital cases, an indigent defendant must be appointed two attorneys with prior experience in capital prosecutions.

Ohio's capital punishment offenses are set out under Ohio Code § 2903.01. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

A. The offender purposely and with prior calculation and design, caused the death of another or the unlawful termination of another's pregnancy.

B. The offender purposely caused the death of another or the unlawful termination of another's pregnancy while committing or attempting to commit, or while fleeing immediately after committing or attempting to commit, kidnapping, rape, aggravated arson or arson, aggravated robbery or robbery, aggravated burglary or burglary, terrorism, or escape.

C. The offender purposely caused the death of another who is under thirteen years of age at the time of the commission of the offense.

D. The offender is under detention as a result of having been found guilty of or having pleaded guilty to a felony or who breaks that detention and caused the death of another.

E. The offender purposely caused the death of a law enforcement officer whom the offender knows or has reasonable cause to know is a law enforcement officer.

Capital murder in Ohio is punishable by death or life imprisonment with or without parole. A capital prosecution in Ohio is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Ohio.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Ohio Code § 2929.04(A) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the guilt phase and persuade the jury during the penalty phase that such proven aggravating circumstance outweighs any mitigating evidence:

1. The offense was the assassination of the president of the United States or a person in line of succession to the presidency, the governor or lieutenant governor of this state, the president-elect or vice president-elect of the United States, the governor-elect or lieutenant governor-elect of this state, or a candidate for any of the offices.

2. The offense was committed for hire.

3. The offense was committed for the purpose of escaping detection, apprehension, trial, or punishment for another offense committed by the offender.

4. The offense was committed while the offender was under detention or while the offender was at large after having broken detention.

5. Prior to the offense, the offender was convicted of an offense, an essential element of which was the purposeful killing of or attempt to kill another, or the offense being prosecuted was part of a course of conduct involving the purposeful killing of or attempt to kill two or more persons by the offender.

6. The victim of the offense was a law enforcement officer.

7. The offense was committed while the offender was committing, attempting to commit, or fleeing immediately after committing or attempting to commit kidnapping, rape, aggravated arson, aggravated robbery, or aggravated burglary, and either the offender was the principal offender in the commission of the aggravated murder or, if not the principal offender, committed the aggravated murder with prior calculation and design.

8. The victim of the aggravated murder was a witness to an offense who was purposely killed to prevent the victim's testimony in any criminal proceeding and the aggravated murder was not committed during the commission, attempted commission, or flight immediately after the commission or attempted commission of the offense to which the victim was a witness, or the victim of the aggravated murder was a witness to an offense and was purposely killed in retaliation for the victim's testimony in any criminal proceeding.

9. The offender, in the commission of the offense, purposefully caused the death of another who was under thirteen years of age at the time of the commission of the offense, and either the offender was the principal offender in the commission of the offense or, if not the principal offender, committed the offense with prior calculation and design.

10. The offense was committed while the offender was committing, attempting to commit, or fleeing immediately after committing or attempting to commit terrorism.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Ohio has provided by Ohio Code § 2929.04(B) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. Whether the victim of the offense induced or facilitated it;

2. Whether it is unlikely that the offense would have been committed, but for the fact that the offender was under duress, coercion, or strong provocation;

3. Whether, at the time of committing the offense, the offender, because of a mental disease or defect, lacked substantial capacity to appreciate the criminality of the offender's conduct or to conform the offender's conduct to the requirements of the law;

4. The youth of the offender;

5. The offender's lack of a significant history of prior criminal convictions and delinquency adjudications;

6. If the offender was a participant in the offense but not the principal offender, the degree of the offender's participation in the offense and the degree of the offender's participation in the acts that led to the death of the victim;

7. Any other factors that are relevant to the issue of whether the offender should be sentenced to death.

Under Ohio's capital punishment statute, the Ohio Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Ohio imposes death by lethal injection. The State's death row facility for men is located in Mansfield, Ohio, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Marysville, Ohio.

Pursuant to the laws of Ohio, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. Requests for clemency are investigated by the State's Adult Parole Authority, which can make a non-binding recommendation.

Under the laws of Ohio, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Ohio Code § 2949.25:

A. At the execution of a death sentence, only the following persons may be present:

1. The warden of the state correctional institution in which the sentence is executed or a deputy warden, any other person selected by the director of rehabilitation and correction to ensure that the death sentence is executed, any persons necessary to execute the death sentence by lethal injection, and the number of correction officers that the warden thinks necessary;
2. The sheriff of the county in which the prisoner was tried and convicted;
3. The director of rehabilitation and correction, or the director's agent;
4. Physicians of the state correctional institution in which the sentence is executed;
5. The clergyperson in attendance upon the prisoner, and not more than three other persons, to be designated by the prisoner, who are not confined in any state institution;
6. Not more than three persons to be designated by the immediate family of the victim;
7. Representatives of the news media as authorized by the director of rehabilitation and correction.

B. The director shall authorize at least one representative of a newspaper, at least one representative of a television station, and at least one representative of a radio station to be present at the execution of the sentence under division (A)(7) of this section.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Ohio executed only twenty-four capital felons. During this period, Ohio did not execute any female capital felons, although it had one female capital felon on death row. A total of 195 capital felons were on death row in Ohio as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as ninety-seven black inmates, ninety-one white inmates, three Hispanic inmates, two Asian inmates, and two Native American inmates.

Ohio Adult Parole Authority v. Woodard Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Ohio Adult Parole Authority v. Woodard, 523 U.S. 272 (1998); Argued: December 10, 1997; Decided: March 25, 1998; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Rehnquist; Concurring Opinion: Justice O'Connor, in which Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., joined; Concurring and Dissenting Opinion: Justice Stevens; Appellate Defense Counsel: Not reported; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: Not reported Issue Presented: Whether Ohio's clemency procedures for death row inmates violated the Due Process Clause or the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination.

Case Holding: Ohio's clemency procedures for death row inmates did not violate the Due Process Clause or the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Ohio convicted the defendant, Eugene Woodard, of capital murder and sentenced him to death. The Ohio Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. He was sentenced to death for aggravated murder committed in the course of a carjacking. His conviction and sentence were affirmed on appeal. Subsequently, the Ohio Adult Parole Authority (Authority) commenced its clemency investigation as required by State law. Pursuant to the death penalty statute of the State, in the case of an inmate under death sentence, the Authority must conduct a clemency hearing within forty-five days of the scheduled date of execution. Prior to the hearing, the inmate may request an interview with one or more parole board members. Counsel for the inmate is not allowed at that interview. The Authority must ultimately make a recommendation to the governor, even if the inmate subsequently obtains a stay of execution.

The Authority informed the defendant that he could have his voluntary interview with Authority members on a particular date and that his clemency hearing would be held a week later. The defendant responded by filing a federal civil rights lawsuit against the Authority, alleging that Ohio's clemency process violated his due process right and his right to remain silent. A federal district court granted judgment to the State. A federal Court of Appeals reversed, after finding the defendant's constitutional due process rights and right to remain silent were infringed upon by Ohio's clemency procedures. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice ruled that giving a death row inmate the option of voluntarily participating in an interview as part of the clemency process does not violate his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent. It was said that the Fifth Amendment prohibited compelled self-incrimination. It was reasoned that any testimony by the defendant before the Authority would be voluntary, not compelled.

The chief justice also held that the defendant did not establish a violation of the Due Process Clause in the nature of the clemency proceedings. It was said that traditional executive discretion existed in clemency proceedings and that such proceedings were rarely, if ever, appropriate subjects for judicial review.

The opinion concluded that neither the Due Process Clause nor the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination were violated by Ohio's clemency proceedings. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's decision. She indicated that, while Ohio's clemency procedures satisfied due process, she believed that the Court was incorrect in finding that judicial intervention in clemency proceedings should rarely, if ever, occur. Justice O'Connor was of the opinion that clemency proceedings were subject to judicial scrutiny for fundamental fairness like any other criminal process.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens concurred with the Court's resolution of the Fifth Amendment claim. However, he dissented from the Court's resolution of the Due Process Clause issue. Justice Stevens believed that clemency proceedings were subject to judicial review for fundamental fairness. He also believed that the defendant's due process claim should have been remanded to the lower courts for a determination of whether Ohio's clemency procedures provided minimal due process safeguards. *See also Calderon v. Ohio Cult Murders In August 1990, a Lake County, Ohio, jury found cult leader Jeffrey Lundgren guilty of the kidnapping and murder of five of his followers. The trial court subsequently sentenced Lundgren to death.

Until 1987, Lundgren lived a modest life as a bible school teacher and temple guide for the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in Kirkland, Ohio. Lundgren had taken the position in 1984 when he and his wife and son moved from their home in Missouri. The church supported Lundgren and his family and provided them with housing.

Lundgren destroyed the church's trust in him when it was discovered that funds he was responsible for maintaining had disappeared. In October 1987, he was fired and evicted from church housing. Eventually, Lundgren was excommunicated from the church.

By the time of Lundgren's expulsion from the church, he had attracted a small following from those who listened during his bible school classes. Consequently, Lundgren decided to start his own religious cult. He was able to rent a farm in a rural area outside of Cleveland from where he operated. About thirty people lived with Lundgren. His followers called him "Dad" and gave him their paychecks for common group expenses.

Lundgren's cult teachings included the belief that Christ would return and build a temple in Kirkland. He also taught the inner circle of his cult that ten followers had to be killed before Christ could establish Zion.

In January 1989, Lundgren began telling his followers they had to go on a wilderness trip before Zion would be possible. At the beginning of April of that year, the group began preparing for the wilderness trip. Those who worked left their jobs. Lundgren encouraged all of the followers to use up any of their available credit cards. On April 12, three of the followers secretly began digging a six-by-seven-foot pit in the dirt floor of Lundgren's barn.

One of the families that joined Lundgren's cult was Dennis and Cheryl Avery and their three daughters Trina, Rebecca, and Karen. The Avery family did not live on the farm, but they were faithful followers of Lundgren.

On April 17, the Averys were invited to dinner at Lundgren's farmhouse. After dinner, Lundgren went out to the barn with his son, Damon, and four followers. The Averys stayed in the house with Lundgren's wife Alice and other followers. At Lundgren's direction, each member of the Avery family was individually led out to the barn, where each was bound and gagged. After the men placed each Avery family member into the pit that was dug in the barn, Lundgren shot each person two or three times with a .45 caliber semiautomatic weapon. The men then filled the pit with dirt and stones. Afterwards, Lundgren and his followers went back to the farmhouse and held a prayer meeting.

The next day, April 18, Lundgren and his followers drove out to selected mountain campsites near Davis, West Virginia, where they lived in tents through October 1989. Some of the followers found jobs. While in West Virginia, Lundgren decided to take a second wife from among his followers. He chose follower Kathryn Johnson, who was already married to follower Larry Johnson. Dissension broke out over this decision. The group split up, with Lundgren and about ten of his followers moving to Missouri. In December, Larry Johnson contacted federal authorities about the Avery murders.

On January 3, 1990, Kirtland police dug up the pit in the barn and found the Avery family. Lundgren had shot Dennis twice in the back and Cheryl three times in the torso. He shot Trina once in the head and twice in the body, Rebecca in the back and thigh, and Karen in the head and chest. Police discovered that a .45 caliber semiautomatic weapon, belonging to Lundgren, had fired all of the bullets they recovered. Lundgren bought the weapon in 1987 and sold it in West Virginia in 1989. On January 7, 1990, federal authorities arrested Lundgren in California. He was extradited to Ohio.

The State of Ohio prosecuted Lundgren, his wife Alice, and son Damon, as well as other members of the cult. Lundgren was the only member to receive the death penalty. He was executed by lethal injection on October 24, 2006.

Ohioans to Stop Executions Ohioans to Stop Executions (OTSE) was founded in 1987. Its purpose is to abolish the use of capital punishment in the State of Ohio. The OTSE has taken the position that capital punishment in Ohio is not implemented fairly, fails to serve its legal purposes, and is overwhelmingly imposed on indigent, minority, underprivileged, and disadvantaged members of society. The organization utilizes educational tools to make the public aware of the problems it associates with capital punishment.

Activities engaged in by OTSE include organizing vigils, holding lectures, providing training, and distributing a newsletter. The organization has made arrangements to be made aware of when an execution is pending in Ohio. When it obtains such information, the organization will coordinate peaceful demonstrations, prayer vigils, services, and symbolic gestures such as bell ringing. OTSE also provides moral support to the inmate's family.

Oklahoma The State of Oklahoma is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on May 17, 1973.

Oklahoma has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Oklahoma Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice, a vice chief justice, and seven associate justices. The Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals is composed of a presiding judge, vice presiding judge, and three judges. The highest court of criminal appeals in the State is the Court of Criminal Appeals. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Oklahoma are tried in the district courts.

Oklahoma's capital punishment offenses are set out under Okla. Code tit. 21 § 701.7. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

A. The offender unlawfully and with malice aforethought causes the death of another human being.

B. The offender takes the life of a human being during, or if the death of a human being results from, the commission or attempted commission of murder of another person, shooting or discharge of a firearm or cross-bow with intent to kill, intentional discharge of a firearm or other deadly weapon into any dwelling or building, forcible rape, robbery with a dangerous weapon, kidnapping, escape from lawful custody, eluding an officer, first degree burglary, first degree arson, unlawful distributing or dispensing of controlled dangerous substances, or trafficking in illegal drugs.

C. The death of a child results from the willful or malicious injuring, torturing, maiming or using of unreasonable force by the offender or who shall willfully cause, procure or permit any of said acts to be done upon the child.

D. The offender unlawfully and with malice aforethought solicits another person or persons to cause the death of a human being in furtherance of unlawfully manufacturing, distributing or dispensing controlled dangerous substances, unlawfully possessing with intent to distribute or dispense controlled dangerous substances, or trafficking in illegal drugs.

E. The offender intentionally causes the death of a law enforcement officer or correctional officer while the officer is in the performance of official duties.

Capital murder in Oklahoma is punishable by death or life imprisonment with or without parole. A capital prosecution in Oklahoma is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose imprisonment for life. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Oklahoma.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Okla. Code tit. 21 § 701.12 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The defendant was previously convicted of a felony involving the use or threat of violence to the person;
2. The defendant knowingly created a great risk of death to more than one person;
3. The person committed the murder for remuneration or the promise of remuneration or employed another to commit the murder for remuneration or the promise of remuneration;
4. The murder was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel;
5. The murder was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or prosecution;
6. The murder was committed by a person while serving a sentence of imprisonment on conviction of a felony;
7. The existence of a probability that the defendant would commit criminal acts of violence that would constitute a continuing threat to society; or
8. The victim of the murder was a peace officer or guard of an institution under the control of the Department of Corrections, and such person was killed while in performance of official duty.

Oklahoma does not provide by statute any mitigating circumstances to the imposition of the death penalty. Even though the State does not provide statutory mitigating circumstances, the United States Supreme Court has ruled that all relevant mitigating evidence must be allowed at the penalty phase.

Under Oklahoma's capital punishment statute, the Oklahoma

W. A. Drew Edmondson is the Oklahoma Attorney General. His office represents the State in capital punishment appellate proceedings. (Oklahoma Attorney General Office)

Court of Criminal Appeals automatically reviews a sentence of death. Oklahoma uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State provides for use of electrocution should lethal injection be found unconstitutional; and provides for the use of a firing squad should electrocution and lethal injection be found unconstitutional. The State's death row facility for men is located in McAlester, Oklahoma, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

Pursuant to the laws of Oklahoma, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor requires the approval of the State's Pardon and Parole Board, in order to grant clemency.

Under the laws of Oklahoma, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Okla. Code tit. 22 § 1015:

A. A judgment of death must be executed at the Oklahoma State Penitentiary at McAlester, Oklahoma, said prison to be designated by the court by which judgment is to be rendered.

B. The judgment of execution shall take place under the authority of the Director of the Oklahoma Department of Corrections and the warden must be present along with other necessary prison and corrections officials to carry out the execution. The warden must invite the presence of a physician and the district attorney of the county in which the crime occurred, the judge who presided at the trial issuing the sentence of death, the chief of police of the municipality in which the crime occurred, if applicable, and the sheriff of the county wherein the conviction was had, to witness the execution; in addition, the Cabinet Secretary of Safety and Security must be invited and other correctional personnel deemed appropriate and approved by the Director. The warden shall, at the request of the defendant, permit the presence of such ministers of the defendant's choice, not exceeding two, and any persons, relatives or friends, not to exceed five, as the defendant may name; provided, reporters from recognized members of the news media will be admitted upon proper identification, application and approval of the warden.

C. In the event the defendant has been sentenced to death in one or more criminal proceedings in this state, or has been sentenced to death in this state and by one or more courts of competent jurisdiction in another state or pursuant to federal authority, or any combination thereof, and this state has priority to execute the defendant, the warden must invite the prosecuting attorney, the judge, and the chief law enforcement official from each jurisdiction where any death sentence has issued. The above mentioned officials shall be allowed to witness the execution or view the execution by closed circuit television as determined by the Director of the Department of Corrections.

D. A place shall be provided at the Oklahoma State Penitentiary at McAlester so that individuals who are eighteen (18) years of age or older and who are members of the immediate family of any deceased victim of the defendant may witness the execution. The immediate family members shall be allowed to witness the execution from an area that is separate from the area to which other nonfamily member witnesses are admitted, provided, however, if there are multiple deceased victims, the Department shall not be required to provide separate areas for each family of each deceased victim. If facilities are not capable or sufficient to provide all immediate family members with a direct view of the execution, the Department of Corrections may broadcast the execution by means of a closed circuit television system to an area in which other immediate family members may be located.

Immediate family members may request individuals not directly related to the deceased victim but who serve a close supporting role or professional role to the deceased victim or an immediate family member, including, but not limited to, a minister or licensed counselor. The warden in consultation with the Director shall approve or disapprove such requests. Provided further, the Department may set a limit on the number of witnesses or viewers within occupancy limits.

As used in this section, "members of the immediate family" means the spouse, a child by birth or adoption, a stepchild, a parent, a grandparent, a grandchild, a sibling of a deceased victim, or the spouse of any immediate family member specified in this subsection.

E. Any surviving victim of the defendant who is eighteen (18) years of age or older may view the execution by closed circuit television with the approval of both the Director of the Department of Corrections and the warden. The Director and warden shall prioritize persons to view the execution, including immediate family members, surviving victims, and supporting persons, and may set a limit on the number of viewers within occupancy limits. Any surviving victim approved to view the execution of their perpetrator may have an accompanying support person as provided for members of the immediate family of a deceased victim. As used in this subsection, "surviving victim" means any person who suffered serious harm or injury due to the criminal acts of the defendant of which the defendant has been convicted in a court of competent jurisdiction.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; Oklahoma executed eighty-three capital felons. During this period,

Oklahoma executed three female capital felons, although four of its death row inmates during this period were females. A total of ninety-one capital felons were on death row in Oklahoma as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as thirty-four black inmates, twenty-eight white inmates, three Hispanic inmates, and five Native American inmates.

NUMBER OF EXECUTIONS BY OKLAHOMA 1976–OCTOBER 2006

Oklahoma Bombing On April 19, 1995, Timothy James McVeigh intentionally triggered a bomb which killed 168 people in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. On August 14, 1997, McVeigh was sentenced to death by federal authorities. An accomplice, Terry Lynn Nichols, was eventually sentenced to life imprisonment for his role in the mass murder.

At the guilt phase of McVeigh’s trial, which began on April 24, 1997, and encompassed twenty-three days of testimony, the federal government proved the following set of facts against him.

In the fall of 1994, McVeigh and Nichols sought, bought, and stole all the materials needed to construct a 3,000–6000 pound bomb. In a letter to Michael and Lori Fortier written around September 1994, McVeigh disclosed that he and Nichols had decided to take some type of positive offensive action against the federal government in response to the government’s siege of the Branch Davidians in Waco, Texas, in 1993. On a subsequent visit to their home, McVeigh told the Fortiers that he planned to blow up a federal building. McVeigh later informed the Fortiers that he wanted to cause a general uprising in America and that the bombing would occur on the anniversary of the end of the Waco siege. McVeigh rationalized the inevitable loss of life by concluding that anyone who worked in the federal building was guilty by association with those responsible for Waco.

McVeigh stated that he had figured out how to make a truck into a bomb using fifty-five-gallon drums filled with ammonium nitrate combined with explosives. McVeigh demonstrated the shaped charge he intended to use for the bomb by arranging soup cans on the floor in the same triangle shape in which he was going to place fifty-five-gallon barrels filled with ammonium nitrate stole seven cases of Tovex explosives and a box of Primadet non-electric blasting caps from the Martin Marietta rock quarry near Marion, Kansas. On October 21, 1994, McVeigh purchased three drums of nitromethane at a racetrack outside of Dallas, Texas. Prior to the nitromethane purchase, McVeigh had sought bomb ingredients, including nitromethane, both in person and through the use of a prepaid telephone calling card under the name “Daryl Bridges.” Using various aliases, McVeigh and Nichols rented a number of storage lockers in Kansas where they stored the bomb components. In order to fund their conspiracy, McVeigh and Nichols robbed a gun dealer in Arkansas in November 1994.

Also, towards the end of 1994, McVeigh typed a number of letters discussing the justified use of violence against federal agents as retaliation for the events in Waco. McVeigh told his sister and one of his friends that he had moved from the propaganda stage to the action stage in his dispute with the federal government. McVeigh then warned his sister that “something big” was going to happen in April and asked her to extend her April 1995 Florida vacation. He also instructed her not to write to him anymore lest she incriminate herself. The manner in which the bombing was carried out closely tracked several books McVeigh bought, which he often encouraged his friends to read, describing how to make a powerful bomb mixing ammonium nitrate with nitromethane and romanticizing self-declared patriots who blow up federal buildings. McVeigh was familiar with explosives combined with nitromethane in the truck. McVeigh also diagramed the truck, barrels, and fusing system on a piece of paper and stated that he intended to use a Ryder truck. McVeigh told the Fortiers that he chose the Murrah Building in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, as the target because he believed that (1) the orders for the attack at Waco emanated from the building, (2) the building housed people involved in the Waco raid, and (3) the building’s U-shape and glass front made it an easy target. On a later trip through Oklahoma City, McVeigh showed Michael Fortier the Murrah Building, asking Fortier whether he thought a twenty-foot rental truck would fit in front of the building.

On September 30, 1994, and October 18, 1994, McVeigh purchased a total of 4,000 pounds of ammonium nitrate from the McPherson branch of the Mid-Kansas Cooperative using the alias “Mike Havens.” In October 1994, McVeigh and Nichols and had detonated a pipe bomb prior to the attack on the Murrah Building.

From April 14 to 18, 1995, McVeigh stayed at the Dreamland Motel located in Junction City, Kansas. On April 14, 1995, McVeigh purchased a yellow 1977 Mercury Marquis from Junction City Firestone in Junction City, Kansas. While waiting to take possession of the car from the dealer, McVeigh made a phone call to Elliott’s Body Shop in Junction City, Kansas, seeking a twenty-foot Ryder truck for a one-way rental to Omaha. McVeigh eventually drove to Oklahoma City in the rented Ryder truck on the morning of April 19, 1995. McVeigh parked the bomb-filled truck in front of the Murrah Building and ran to the yellow Mercury that he and Nichols had stashed as a getaway car in a nearby alley a few days before the bombing. McVeigh had a handwritten sign inside the yellow Mercury: “Not Abandoned; Please do not tow; will move by April 23 (Needs Battery & Cable).” McVeigh deliberately parked the car so that a building would stand between the car and the blast, shielding McVeigh from the explosion.

At 9:02 on the morning of April 19, 1995, a massive explosion tore apart the Murrah Building in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, killing a total of 168 people—163 people in the building and five people outside—and injuring hundreds more. Fifteen children in the Murrah Building’s daycare center, visible from the front of the building, and four children visiting the building were included among the victims. Eight federal law enforcement officials also lost their lives. The explosion, felt and heard six miles away, tore a gaping hole into the front of the Murrah Building and covered the streets with glass, debris, rocks, and chunks of concrete.

Just seventy-seven minutes after the blast, Oklahoma State Trooper Charles Hanger stopped the yellow Mercury driven by McVeigh because the car had no license tags. The stop occurred on Interstate 35, just before the exit for Billings, Oklahoma, precisely 77.9 miles north of the Murrah Building. Trooper Hanger arrested McVeigh upon discovering that he was carrying a concealed, loaded gun. Trooper Hanger transported McVeigh to Noble County Jail in Perry, Oklahoma, where McVeigh was booked and incarcerated for unlawfully carrying a weapon and transporting a loaded firearm. Noble County authorities took custody of McVeigh’s clothing and property, including earplugs, and issued him prison garb. Two days later, on April 21, 1995, the federal government filed a complaint against McVeigh for unlawful destruction by explosives. Oklahoma then transferred McVeigh to federal custody on the federal bombing charges. An FBI test performed later found that McVeigh’s clothing and the earplugs contained explosives residue, including PETN, EGDN, and nitroglycerine—chemicals associated with the materials used in the construction of the bomb.

A subsequent inventory search of the yellow Mercury uncovered a sealed envelope containing documents arguing that the federal government had commenced open warfare on the liberty of the American people and justifying the killing of government officials in the defense of liberty. Finally, three days after the arrest, Trooper Hanger found a Paulsen’s Military Supply business card on the floor of his cruiser bearing McVeigh’s fingerprints. McVeigh had written on the back of the card, “TNT @ $5/stick Need more” and “Call After 01, May, See if I can get some more.”

On August 10, 1995, a federal grand jury returned an eleven-count indictment against McVeigh and Nichols charging one count of conspiracy to use a weapon of mass destruction; one count of use of a weapon of mass destruction; one count of destruction by explosives; and eight counts of first-degree murder. On October 20, 1995, the government filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty. On February 19, 1996, the federal district court granted McVeigh's and Nichols' motion for a change of venue and transferred the case to Denver, Colorado. On October 25, 1996, the district court granted a motion for severance by McVeigh and Nichols and ordered that McVeigh's trial proceed first.

McVeigh's trial began with voir dire of prospective jurors on March 31, 1997. A jury of twelve with six alternates was sworn in by the district court on April 24, 1997, and opening statements commenced that same day. On June 2, 1997, the jury returned guilty verdicts on all counts charged in the indictment. The penalty phase of trial commenced on June 4, 1997, and concluded with summations and jury instructions on June 12, 1997. The jury deliberated for two days before returning special findings recommending that McVeigh be sentenced to death. After denying McVeigh's motion for a new trial, the district court accepted the jury recommendation on August 14, 1997, sentencing McVeigh to death. On June 11, 2001, McVeigh was executed by lethal injection. McVeigh was thirty-three years old at the time of his execution. See also Mass Murder; September 11 Attack

Oklahoma Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty

The Oklahoma Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty (OCADP) consists of organizations, individuals, human rights groups, churches, and other faith-based organizations. The organization seeks to abolish the death penalty in Oklahoma. OCADP provides information regarding the death penalty, encourages activism among concerned citizens, offers support to the loved ones of murder victims, and offers support to death row inmates and their loved ones.

Oman Capital punishment is allowed in Oman. Its legal system is based on English common law and Islamic law. Oman is a monarchy and has been ruled by the Al Bu Siid family since the eighteenth century. The nation has a bicameral legislature consisting of an upper chamber (appointed by the king) and a lower chamber (elected by popular vote). In 1996, the king (sultan) promulgated a constitution for the nation.

In 1999, the judicial system of Oman was revised. The court structure now consists of courts of first instance, courts of appeal, and a supreme court. Appeals from the Supreme Court may be taken to the king. The nation also has a state security court for prosecuting cases involving national security.

Defendants are presumed innocent and have the right to present evidence and confront witnesses. A defendant may hire an attorney, but there is no explicit right to be represented by counsel in all instances. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Opinion on the Appropriateness of Death Penalty

Capital felons have consistently argued that they have a right to introduce, during the penalty phase, testimony and petition letters from relatives and friends indicating death is not appropriate in their particular cases. It has been urged by capital felons that such evidence is mitigating and relevant. Some courts have rejected such evidence as being irrelevant. Other courts, however, permit such evidence as non-statutory mitigating evidence. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Opposition to Capital Punishment When the United States Supreme Court lifted the brief moratorium on capital punishment in 1976, it did so in the midst of strong opposition. During the ensuing decades, anti-death penalty advocates have grown larger in numbers and in their scope. There are literally thousands of national and international organizations that have formed for the express purpose of abolishing capital punishment in the United States and the world.

1. Reasons for Opposing Capital Punishment: Although the underlying motivation behind organizational and individual opposition to capital punishment varies, a few broad categories capture much of the impetus.

A. Religious grounds: Although the Judeo-Christian scriptures expressly endorse capital punishment for such offenses as murder, adultery, blasphemy, sodomy, idolatry, and incest, many organizations and individuals use religion as the basis for opposing the death penalty. Death penalty opponents point to Cain, the first biblical murderer, being punished with banishment and not death. They also cling strongly to biblical teachings on redemption and forgiveness, and the biblical admonishment "Thou shalt not kill," as cornerstones that make capital punishment inconsistent with their understanding of religious thought.

B. Philosophical grounds: Many of the most influential philosophers, such as John Locke, Immanuel Kant, and Jean-Jacques Rousseau, did not oppose capital punishment, in spite of their development of and belief in the principle that human beings were born with a "natural right to life." Many opponents of the death penalty have taken the "natural right to life" principle as the basis for opposing capital punishment. It is argued that governmental taking of life as punishment violates the condemned person's "natural right to life." The fact that a condemned person took the "natural right to life" of another does not excuse or justify a government's actions in taking the life of the condemned.

One of the leading writers on capital punishment, Hugo Adam Bedau, has articulated the utilitarian philosophy against capital punishment. Bedau contends that punishment should be administered with the most efficient and socially benefiting sanction. He believes the death penalty is not the best means of punishment because it is not the most efficient sanction and it does not benefit society — it in fact degrades society.

C. Lack of deterrence: One of the primary arguments made by proponents of capital punishment is that the punishment has a deterrent effect. Death penalty opponents contend that no supportable proof has ever been deduced which establishes that capital punishment has a meaningful deterrent effect. Death penalty opponents point to the historically consistent high level of homicides as irrefutable proof that capital punishment has no justifiable deterrent effect.

D. Discrimination: Death penalty opponents contend that capital punishment should be abolished because it is not meted out fairly in the nation. They point to statistics which show that capital punishment is disproportionately inflicted upon minorities and the poor.

E. Risk of executing the innocent: The justification for abolishing capital punishment that is embraced by most death penalty opponents is the risk of executing an innocent person. While no irrefutable evidence has ever been compiled to show that innocent persons were executed, a great deal of research has in fact given strong evidence that suggests many executed persons were in fact innocent. A study done in 1987 suggested that, between 1900 and 1985, there were twenty-three prisoners executed in the United States who were actually innocent of the crimes charged against them. Death penalty opponents argue that the risk of executing one innocent person is reason enough to abolish capital punishment.

2. Nations That Have Abolished Capital Punishment: There have been about eighty-seven countries that have abolished capital punishment as of 2006. That figure does not include nations that abolished the death penalty for ordinary crimes only or have not imposed the penalty in decades.

3. Constitutional Abolishment of Capital Punishment: Most of the nations of the world that have abolished capital punishment have done so through legislative acts. However, a few countries have taken the step of abolishing capital punishment per se or limiting its application through their constitutions. Nations that provide for the abolishment of capital punishment through their constitutions include Austria, Belgium, Cape Verde, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Finland, Germany, Haiti, Holland, Honduras, Iceland, Italy, Luxemburg, Marshall Islands, Federated States of Micronesia, Monaco, Mozambique, Namibia, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Panama, Portugal, Sao Tome and Principe, Spain, Sweden, Uruguay, and Venezuela.

4. International Agreements to Ban Capital Punishment: The international arena has produced several documents that call for the outright abolishment of capital punishment or limitations on its application.

A. Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: The United Nations sponsored this instrument. It provides for the abolishment of the death penalty. However, it allows nations to retain the death penalty in wartime.

B. Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty: The Organization of American States sponsored this instrument. Under this document, capital punishment must be abolished by all nations, but may be retained in wartime.

C. Protocol No. 6 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms concerning the Abolition of the Death Penalty: The Council of Europe sponsored this covenant. It provides for the abolishment of the death penalty in peacetime.

D. International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: The United Nations sponsored this agreement. It provides that capital punishment shall not be imposed for crimes committed by persons below eighteen years of age and shall not be carried out on pregnant women.

E. Convention on the Rights of the Child: The United Nations sponsored this document. It provides that capital punishment shall not be imposed for offenses committed by persons below eighteen years of age.

F. American Convention on Human Rights: The Organization of American States sponsored this instrument. It provides that capital punishment shall not be imposed upon persons who were under eighteen years of age or over seventy years of age at the time the crime was committed. It also prohibits imposition of the death penalty on pregnant women.

5. Public Opinion and the Death Penalty: National studies have shown that 70 percent of Americans approve of the death penalty. However, when asked to choose between the death penalty and alternative harsh prison sentences, only 41 percent of Americans preferred the death penalty. In a 1997 poll, it was reported that 53 percent of Americans believe that capital punishment does not deter criminal conduct.

Ordering Killing Aggravator A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide that murder committed as a result of an order or command by another is a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may impose the death penalty if it finds that the murder was ordered by another. See also Aggravating Circumstances

NUMBER OF JURISDICTIONS USING ORDERING KILLING AGGRAVATOR

Oregon The State of Oregon is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on December 7, 1978.

Oregon has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Oregon Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Oregon Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and nine judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of Oregon are tried in the circuit courts.

Oregon's capital punishment offenses are set out under Ore. Code § 163.115. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

- a. When it is committed intentionally;
- b. When it is committed by a person, acting either alone or with one or more persons, who commits or attempts to commit any of the following crimes and in the course of and in furtherance of the crime the person is committing or attempting to commit, or during the immediate flight therefrom, the person, or another participant if there be any, causes the death of a person other than one of the participants: arson in the first degree; criminal mischief in the first degree by means of an explosive; burglary in the first degree; escape in the first degree; kidnapping in the second degree; kidnapping in the first degree; robbery in the first degree; any felony sexual offense in the first degree; compelling prostitution; or assault in the first degree and the victim is under 14 years of age, or assault in the second degree and the victim is under 14 years of age; or
- c. By abuse when a person, recklessly under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life, causes the death of a child under 14 years of age or a dependent person and the person has previously engaged in a pattern or practice of assault or torture of the victim or another child under 14 years of age or a dependent person; or the person causes the death by neglect or maltreatment.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Ore. Code § 163.095 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the guilt phase.

- 1.a. The defendant committed the murder pursuant to an agreement that the defendant receive money or other thing of value for committing the murder.
- b. The defendant solicited another to commit the murder and paid or agreed to pay the person money or other thing of value for committing the murder.
- c. The defendant committed murder after having been convicted previously in any jurisdiction of any homicide.
- d. There was more than one murder victim in the same criminal episode.
- e. The homicide occurred in the course of or as a result of intentional maiming or torture of the victim.
- f. The victim of the intentional homicide was a person under the age of 14 years.

2.a. The victim was one of the following and the murder was related to the performance of the victim's official duties in the justice system: (A) a police officer; (B) a correctional, parole and probation officer or other person charged with the duty of custody, control or supervision of convicted persons; (C) a member of the Oregon State Police; (D) a judicial officer; (E) a juror or witness in a criminal proceeding; (F) an employee or officer of a court of justice; or (G) a member of the State Board of Parole and Post-Prison Supervision.

- b. The defendant was confined in a state, county or municipal penal or correctional facility or was otherwise in custody when the murder occurred.
- c. The defendant committed murder by means of an explosive.
- d. The defendant personally and intentionally committed the homicide.
- e. The murder was committed in an effort to conceal the commission of a crime, or to conceal the identity of the perpetrator of a crime.

- f. The murder was committed after the defendant had escaped from a state, county or municipal penal or correctional facility and before the defendant had been returned to the custody of the facility.

Capital murder in Oregon is punishable by death or life imprisonment with or without parole. A capital prosecution in Oregon is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jury must unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose life imprisonment with or without parole. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Oregon.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant under Oregon law, it is required by Ore. Code § 163.150(1)(b) that the penalty phase jury return an affirmative answer to each of the following questions:

- A. Whether the conduct of the defendant that caused the death of the deceased was committed deliberately and with the reasonable expectation that death of the deceased or another would result;
- B. Whether there is a probability that the defendant would commit criminal acts of violence that would constitute a continuing threat to society;
- C. If raised by the evidence, whether the conduct of the defendant in killing the deceased was unreasonable in response to the provocation, if any, by the deceased; and
- D. Whether the defendant should receive a death sentence.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Oregon has provided by Ore. Code § 163.150(1)(c)(A) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

The defendant's age, the extent and severity of the defendant's prior criminal conduct and the extent of the mental and emotional pressure under which the defendant was acting at the time the offense was committed.

Under Oregon's capital punishment statute, the Oregon Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Oregon uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Salem, Oregon. Pursuant to the laws of Oregon, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of Oregon, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Ore. Code § 137.473(1):

The judgment shall be executed by the superintendent of the Department of Corrections institution in which the execution takes place, or by the designee of that superintendent. All executions shall take place within the enclosure of a Department of Corrections institution designated by the Director of the Department of Corrections. The superintendent of the institution shall be present at the execution and shall invite the presence of one or more physicians or nurse practitioners, the Attorney General, the sheriff of the county in which the judgment was rendered and representatives from the media. At the request of the defendant, the superintendent shall allow no more than two members of the clergy designated by the defendant to be present at the execution. At the discretion of the superintendent, no more than five friends and relatives designated by the defendant may be present at the execution.

The superintendent shall allow the presence of any peace officers as the superintendent thinks expedient.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Oregon executed only two capital felons. During this period, Oregon did not have any female capital felons on death row. A total of thirty-three capital felons were on death row in Oregon as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as thirteen black inmates, twenty-six white inmates, two Hispanic inmates, one Asian inmate, and one unidentified inmate.

Oregon Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty The Oregon Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty (OCADP) is an organization formed for the purpose of abolishing the death penalty in Oregon. OCADP engages in efforts to educate the community, monitor death penalty cases, and advocate for humane and constitutional death row conditions of confinement. It also supports the needs and concerns of the families of victims, as well as the families of persons on death row.

Issue Presented: Whether the federal Constitution prohibits a State from limiting new residual doubt or innocence-related evidence a capital defendant can introduce at the penalty phase.

Case Holding: The federal Constitution does not prohibit a State from limiting new residual doubt or innocence-related evidence a capital defendant can introduce at the penalty phase.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Oregon charged Randy Lee Guzek with the 1987 capital murders of Rod and Lois Houser. During the guilt phase of the trial, Guzek presented an alibi defense. Guzek's grandfather and mother testified that he was with them when the murders occurred. The jury rejected the alibi defense and convicted Guzek of both murders. He was subsequently sentenced to death.

In the initial automatic appeal of the case, the Oregon Supreme Court affirmed the conviction, but ordered a new sentencing hearing. On remand, Guzek was again sentenced to death. A second appeal followed in which the Oregon Supreme Court again found error in the sentencing proceeding and ordered re-sentencing. On remand, Guzek was sentenced to death for the third time. Guzek again appealed. During the third appeal, the Oregon Supreme Court once again found the sentencing procedures faulty. In an effort to avert further errors at the fourth sentencing proceeding, the Oregon Supreme Court addressed the admissibility of new alibi evidence Guzek wanted to introduce at the fourth sentencing proceeding. The Oregon Supreme Court held that the federal Constitution provided Guzek with a right to introduce new alibi evidence at the penalty phase. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Breyer: Justice Breyer held that the federal Constitution did not demand that States permit capital defendants to introduce new residual doubt or innocence-related evidence during the penalty phase. The decision was justified as follows:

[T]he federal question before us is a narrow one. Do the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments grant Guzek a constitutional right to present evidence of the kind he seeks to introduce, namely new evidence that shows he was not present at the scene of the crime. That evidence is inconsistent with Guzek's prior conviction. It sheds no light on the manner in which he committed the crime for which he has been convicted. Nor is it evidence that Guzek contends was unavailable to him at the time of the original trial. And, to the extent it is evidence he introduced at that time, he is free to introduce it now, albeit in transcript form. We can find nothing in the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments that provides a capital defendant a right to introduce new evidence of this kind at sentencing....

Three circumstances, taken together, convince us that the State possesses the authority to regulate, through exclusion, the evidence that Guzek seeks to present. First, sentencing traditionally concerns how, not whether, a defendant committed the crime. But the evidence at issue here — alibi evidence — concerns only whether, not how, he did so.

Second, the parties previously litigated the issue to which the evidence is relevant — whether the defendant committed the basic crime. The evidence thereby attacks a previously determined matter in a proceeding at which, in principle, that matter is not at issue. The law typically discourages collateral attacks of this kind.

Third, the negative impact of a rule restricting defendant's ability to introduce new alibi evidence is minimized by the fact that Oregon law gives the defendant the right to present to the sentencing jury all the evidence of innocence from the original trial regardless. That law permits the defendant to introduce at resentencing transcripts and exhibits from his prior trial. The defendant here has not claimed that the evidence at issue was unavailable at the time of his original trial. Thus, he need only have introduced it at that time to guarantee its presentation (albeit through transcripts) to a resentencing jury as well.

The opinion vacated the judgment of the Oregon Supreme Court and remanded the case for proceedings not inconsistent with the opinion.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's judgment. In writing separately, Justice Scalia sought to make clear that "[a]lthough the Court correctly holds that there is no Eighth Amendment violation in this case, I would follow the Court's logic to its natural conclusion and reject all Eighth Amendment residual-doubt claims." P

Packer, Alfred Alfred Packer was the first person prosecuted in the United States for cannibalism. Packer was born in Pennsylvania on November 21, 1842. He was a shoemaker by trade, but spent some time in the military before wandering out west. In 1873, while in Provo, Utah, he was hired to as a guide for twenty men on a prospecting trip into the San Juan Mountains of Colorado. In January 1874, the group of prospectors stopped near Montrose, Colorado. While in the area they were warned not to try crossing the mountains until spring. Packer and five of prospectors decided to continue on into the mountains.

Alfred Packer was sentenced to death for the cannibal murders of five people, but his death sentence was reversed on appeal. (Colorado State Archives)

During early spring of 1874, Packer alone appeared near the town of Gunnison. He told people that he was left behind by the prospectors due to a leg injury. A search along the trail taken by the prospectors revealed strips of human flesh. Authorities questioned Packer and he gave a confession to killing and eating all five men. Packer was jailed in Saguache, but escaped to Wyoming. For nine years, Packer evaded capture. He was eventually captured in Cheyenne in 1883 and returned to Lake City, Colorado, to stand trial.

Packer was found guilty of murder and sentenced to be hanged in 1885. An appeal was taken and his conviction and sentence were reversed by the Colorado Supreme Court. Packer was retried, convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to forty years' imprisonment. Packer was released on parole in 1901. He later died on April 23, 1907.

Paid for Killing Aggravator The act of paying someone to kill another is a statutory aggravating circumstance when someone is killed. A large minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made such conduct a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon paid someone to kill another. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Pakistan Capital punishment is allowed in Pakistan. The nation uses hanging and stoning to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on English common law and Islamic law. The constitution of Pakistan was restored on December 30, 1985.

The judicial system is composed of magistrate courts, a sessions court, a high court, and a supreme court. Defendants have a right to a public trial, enjoy a presumption of innocence, and have a right to retained counsel. Attorneys are appointed for indigents only in capital cases. There are no jury trials. Defendants may be admitted to bail and may appeal judgments. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Palestinian Authority Palestinian Authority was established in 1994. Capital punishment is allowed by the Palestinian Authority. The firing squad is used to carry out the death penalty. The political structure includes an executive branch, a legislative branch, and a judicial branch. The legal system is based primarily on common law practices and Islamic legal principles.

The judicial system is composed of magistrate courts, courts of first instance, courts of appeal, and a supreme court. Additionally, a system of Shari'a and other religious courts are maintained to resolve matters of personal status. A major criticism of the Palestinian Authority is that defendants charged with capital crimes are too often the victims of secret trials that last minutes or a few hours and are prosecuted without access to legal counsel of their choosing. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the double jeopardy principles contained in the Fifth Amendment are applicable to States/

Case Holding: The double jeopardy principles contained in the Fifth Amendment are not applicable to States; therefore, the judgment against the defendant could stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Palko, was prosecuted for capital murder by the State of Connecticut. The jury found the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree and he was sentenced to confinement in the state prison for life. The prosecutor appealed the judgment to the Connecticut Supreme Court. The appellate court reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial.

At the second trial, the defendant was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. The State's appellate court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that double jeopardy principles of the Fifth Amendment prohibited a second prosecution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Cardozo: Justice Cardozo ruled that the double jeopardy principles of the Fifth Amendment were applicable against the federal government, but had no application to States. The opinion stated the matter as follows: "The argument for [the defendant] is that whatever is forbidden by the Fifth Amendment is forbidden by the Fourteenth also. The Fifth Amendment, which is not directed to the States, but solely to the federal government, creates immunity from double jeopardy. No person shall be 'subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.' The Fourteenth Amendment ordains, 'nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.' To retry a defendant, though under one indictment and only one, subjects him, it is said, to double jeopardy in violation of the Fifth Amendment, if the prosecution is one on behalf of the United States. From this the consequence is said to follow that there is a denial of life or liberty without due process of law, if the prosecution is one on behalf of the people of a state." Justice Cardozo rejected the defendant's reasoning and affirmed the judgment of the Connecticut Supreme Court.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Butler: Justice Butler issued a statement indicating he dissented from the Court's decision.

Case Note: The rule laid down in this case was eventually rejected by the Court in Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969), and the Fifth Amendment was made applicable to States through the Fourteenth Amendment.

Papua New Guinea The death penalty has not been officially outlawed by Papua New Guinea, but it has not been frequently invoked. Papua New Guinea uses hanging as the method of execution. Its legal system is based on English common law. The nation's constitution was adopted September 16, 1975.

The judicial system is composed of trial courts, a national court, and a supreme court. There are also village courts headed by laypersons, who adjudicate minor offenses under both customary and statutory law. Defendants have a right to public trials, to retained or appointed counsel, to confront witnesses, and to appeal convictions. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the Florida Supreme Court erroneously affirmed the defendant's death sentence on the grounds that he proffered no mitigating evidence during the penalty phase.

Case Holding: The Florida Supreme Court erroneously affirmed the defendant's death sentence on the grounds that he proffered no mitigating evidence during the penalty phase.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robert Parker, was convicted of two capital murder charges by the State of Florida. During the penalty phase, an advisory jury found that sufficient aggravating circumstances existed to justify a death sentence as to both murders, but that sufficient mitigating circumstances existed to outweigh those aggravating factors, and therefore recommended that the defendant be sentenced to life imprisonment on both counts. The trial judge accepted the jury's recommendation as to one of the murders, but overrode the recommendation for the other and sentenced the defendant to death.

On appeal, the Florida Supreme Court found invalid two of the six statutory aggravating circumstances relied upon by the trial court to be impose the death sentence. The appellate court affirmed the death sentence after declaring that the trial court had found no mitigating circumstances to balance against the four properly applied aggravating factors. The appellate court ruled that the facts suggesting the death sentence were "so clear and convincing that no reasonable person could differ."

The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The district court found that the death sentence was unconstitutional because the Florida Supreme Court failed to consider non-statutory mitigating evidence submitted by the defendant. The district court vacated the defendant's death sentence. A federal Court of Appeals disagreed with the district court and reversed its decision. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor held that the Florida Supreme Court acted arbitrarily and capriciously by failing to treat adequately the defendant's non-statutory mitigating evidence. The opinion indicated that although the trial judge's order imposing the death sentence did not state explicitly what effect he gave the defendant's non-statutory mitigating evidence, the Court concluded that the judge found and weighed such evidence before imposing the sentence. It was said that the record in the case contained substantial evidence, much of it uncontroverted, favoring mitigation.

The opinion reasoned that the State Supreme Court erred in concluding that the trial judge found no mitigating circumstances to balance against the aggravating factors and consequently erred in its review of the defendant's death sentence. Justice O'Connor observed that the State Supreme Court did not conduct an independent re-weighing of the evidence, since it explicitly relied on what it took to be the trial judge's findings of no mitigating circumstances. She noted that although a federal court on habeas review must give deference to a State's appellate court's resolution of an ambiguity in a state trial court's order, it need not do so where the State's appellate court's conclusion is not fairly supported by the record in the case. Justice O'Connor concluded that the State Supreme Court's affirmance of the death sentence, based upon nonexistent findings, was invalid because it deprived the defendant of the individualized treatment to which he was entitled under the Constitution.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded with instructions to return the case to the district court to enter an order directing the State of Florida to initiate appropriate proceedings in state court so that the defendant's death sentence may be reconsidered in light of the entire record of his trial and sentencing hearing and the trial judge's findings. The expressed no opinion as to whether the Florida courts had to order a new sentencing hearing.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice White, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Scalia and Kennedy, JJ., Joined: Justice White dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the record in the case was not so clear as to reach the conclusion that the trial court in fact found the existence of non-statutory mitigating evidence. Because of the lack of precise record, Justice White believed the Court should have deferred to the Florida Supreme Court's determination that the trial court found no mitigating evidence. He concluded: "I cannot countenance the Court's ... imaginative reconstruction of the record in this case. Therefore, I dissent, and would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals." Parole Ineligibility Jury Instruction When a capital defendant's future dangerousness is at issue during the penalty phase and the applicable law prohibits the defendant's release on parole, constitutional due process requires that the sentencing jury be instructed that the defendant would be ineligible for parole if given a life sentence. No such instruction is required if a defendant would, in fact, be eligible for parole. See also Kelly v. South Carolina; Life Imprisonment; Ramdass v. Angelone; Shafer v. Parole/Probation Officer Aggravator A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made the killing of a parole or probation officer a statutory aggravating circumstance. Those jurisdictions include Indiana, Louisiana, Oregon, Utah, and Washington. In such jurisdictions, if the penalty phase jury finds that the victim was a parole or probation officer killed during the course of his or her work, the death penalty may be imposed. See also Aggravating Circumstances Parole/Probation Release Aggravator The act of killing another while on parole or probation is a statutory aggravating circumstance. Four capital punishment jurisdictions, Arizona, Florida, Indiana, and Wyoming, have made such conduct a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon killed someone while on parole or probation. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holding: In light of the Court's determination of grand and petit jury racial discrimination in a companion case, Norris v. Alabama, the decision in this case was remanded for the Alabama Supreme Court to address the issue.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Haywood Patterson, was one of seven defendants convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Alabama. In Powell v. Alabama, the United States Supreme Court reversed the convictions of all seven defendants and ordered a new trial. After the remand, a motion for change of venue was granted and all the cases were transferred to another county. The defendant was tried separately, however, on remand. The jury found a verdict against him, which the trial judge set aside as against the weight of evidence. He was then brought to trial for a third time and was again convicted and sentenced to death. On appeal, the Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court failed to address the defendant's argument that his trial violated the federal Constitution, on the grounds that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Hughes: The chief justice ruled that because the Court found in a companion case, Norris v. Alabama, that blacks were systematically excluded from grand and petit juries in the county where the defendant was convicted, the defendant's case could not come out differently. However, because the Alabama Supreme Court had not addressed the issue, the Court determined the State's appellate court should have an opportunity to address the matter. The opinion stated: "[The Court was] not convinced that the [State] court, in the presence of such a determination of constitutional right, confronting the anomalous and grave situation which would be created by a reversal of the judgment against Norris, and an affirmance of the judgment of death in the companion case of Patterson, who had asserted the same right, and having regard to the relation of the two cases and the other circumstances disclosed by the record, would have considered itself powerless to ... provide appropriate relief.... At least the state court should have an opportunity to examine its powers in the light of the situation which has now developed. We should not foreclose that opportunity." The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was vacated and the case remanded.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Norris v. Alabama; Powell v. Alabama

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him; therefore, his conviction and sentence could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Patton, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Mississippi. The Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his conviction and sentence were invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black noted: "Sixty-seven years ago this Court held that state exclusion of [blacks] from grand and petit juries solely because of their race denied [black] defendants in criminal cases the equal protection of the laws required by the Fourteenth Amendment." In turning to the defendant's case, Justice Black found that the defendant had been the victim of racial jury discrimination. The opinion ruled: "We hold that the State wholly failed to meet the very strong evidence of purposeful racial discrimination made out by the [defendant] upon the uncontradicted showing that for thirty years or more no [black] had served as a juror in the criminal courts of Lauderdale County. When a jury selection plan, whatever it is, operates in such way as always to result in the complete and long-continued exclusion of any representative at all from a large group of [blacks], or any other racial group, indictments and verdicts returned against them by juries thus selected cannot stand." The judgment of the Mississippi Supreme Court was reversed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession to capital murder was obtained in violation of due process of law.

Case Holding: The defendant's confession to capital murder was obtained in violation of due process of law and therefore his conviction cannot stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Payne, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Arkansas. On appeal, the Arkansas Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his confession was obtained in violation of the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Whittaker: Justice Whittaker held that the defendant's confession was obtained in violation of due process of law. The opinion laid out the facts supporting the Court's conclusion as follows:

It is obvious from the totality of the course of conduct shown by undisputed evidence that the confession was coerced and did not constitute an "expression of free choice." That [the defendant] was not physically tortured affords no answer to the question whether the confession was coerced, for "[t]here is torture of mind as well as body; the will is as much affected by fear as by force.... A confession by which life becomes forfeit must be the expression of free choice."

... The undisputed evidence in this case shows that [the defendant], a mentally dull 19-year-old youth, (1) was arrested without a warrant, (2) was denied a hearing before a magistrate at which he would have been advised of his right to remain silent and of his right to counsel, as required by Arkansas statutes, (3) was not advised of his right to remain silent or of his right to counsel, (4) was held incommunicado for three days, without counsel, advisor or friend, and though members of his family tried to see him they were turned away, and he was refused permission to make even one telephone call, (5) was denied food for long periods, and, finally, (6) was told by the chief of police "that there would be 30 or 40 people there in a few minutes that wanted to get him," which statement created such fear in [the defendant] as immediately produced the "confession." It seems obvious from the totality of this course of conduct and particularly the culminating threat of mob violence, that the confession was coerced and did not constitute an "expression of free choice," and that its use before the jury, over [the defendant's] objection, deprived him of "that fundamental fairness essential to the very concept of justice," and, hence, denied him due process of law, guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The judgment of the Arkansas Supreme Court was reversed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan issued a concurring statement indicating he joined the Court's reversal of the judgment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Clark: Justice Clark dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the confession was voluntary and was not obtained in violation of due process. Justice Clark also contended that the Court should not have disturbed the judgment because under Arkansas law the jury determined whether a confession was voluntary. He reasoned that under the Court's precedents it should have assumed that the jury found the confession was coerced and rejected it. Justice Clark concluded that "even if the confession be deemed coerced, there is sufficient other evidence of guilt to sustain the conviction."

Dissenting Statement by Justice Burton: Justice Burton issued a dissenting statement indicating he believed the Court should "accept the conclusion of the state court and jury that [the defendant's] confession was voluntary." See also Right to Remain Silent

Issue Presented: Whether the Eighth Amendment bars the admission of victim impact evidence during the penalty phase of a capital trial.

Case Holding: The Eighth Amendment does not bar the admission of victim impact evidence during the penalty phase of a capital trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Pervis Tyrone Payne, was convicted of two capital murders by the State of Tennessee. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor presented evidence of the impact of the deaths on the victims' family members. During the prosecutor's closing argument, further statements were made as to the traumatic effect the deaths had on the victims' family. The defendant was sentenced to death for both murders. The Tennessee Supreme Court affirmed both convictions and sentences. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the admission of the victim impact evidence and the prosecutor's closing argument violated his Eighth Amendment rights under United States Supreme Court decisions in Booth v. Maryland and South Carolina v. Gathers, which held that evidence and argument relating to the victim and the impact of the victim's death on the victim's family were per se inadmissible at a capital sentencing hearing. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice announced that it was time to overrule Booth and Gathers. He ruled that the Eighth Amendment erected no per se bar prohibiting a capital sentencing jury from considering victim impact evidence relating to the victim's personal characteristics and the emotional impact of the murder on the victim's family nor precluded a prosecutor from arguing such evidence at a capital sentencing hearing. The chief justice concluded that to the extent that the Court held to the contrary in Booth and Gathers, those cases were overruled. The judgment of the Tennessee Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which White and Kennedy, JJ., Joined: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's decision. In doing so, she outlined her understanding of the Court's ruling as follows:

In my view, a State may legitimately determine that victim impact evidence is relevant to a capital sentencing proceeding. A State may decide that the jury, before determining whether a convicted murderer should receive the death penalty, should know the full extent of the harm caused by the crime, including its impact on the victim's family and community. A State may decide also that the jury should see "a quick glimpse of the life [the defendant] chose to extinguish," to remind the jury that the person whose life was taken was a unique human being.

Given that victim impact evidence is potentially relevant, nothing in the Eighth Amendment commands that States treat it differently than other kinds of relevant evidence. "The Eighth Amendment stands as a shield against those practices and punishments which are either inherently cruel or which so offend the moral consensus of this society as to be deemed 'cruel and unusual.'" Certainly there is no strong societal consensus that a jury may not take into account the loss suffered by a victim's family or that a murder victim must remain a faceless stranger at the penalty phase of a capital trial. Just the opposite is true. Most States have enacted legislation enabling judges and juries to consider victim impact evidence. The possibility that this evidence may in some cases be unduly inflammatory does not justify a prophylactic, constitutionally based rule that this evidence may never be admitted. Trial courts routinely exclude evidence that is unduly inflammatory; where inflammatory evidence is improperly admitted, appellate courts carefully review the record to determine whether the error was prejudicial.

We do not hold today that victim impact evidence must be admitted, or even that it should be admitted. We hold merely that if a State decides to permit consideration of this evidence, "the Eighth Amendment erects no per se bar." If, in a particular case, a witness' testimony or a prosecutor's remark so infects the sentencing proceeding as to render it fundamentally unfair, the defendant may seek appropriate relief under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which O'Connor and Kennedy, JJ., Joined: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's opinion. He wrote: "The Court correctly observes the injustice of requiring the exclusion of relevant aggravating evidence during capital sentencing, while requiring the admission of all relevant mitigating evidence. I have previously expressed my belief that the latter requirement is both wrong and, when combined with the remainder of our capital sentencing jurisprudence, unworkable. Even if it were abandoned, however, I would still affirm the judgment here. True enough, the Eighth Amendment permits parity between mitigating and aggravating factors. But more broadly and fundamentally still, it permits the People to decide (within the limits of other constitutional guarantees) what is a crime and what constitutes aggravation and mitigation of a crime."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Kennedy, J., Joined: Justice Souter wrote an opinion concurring in the Court's decision. He stated his views as follows:

I join the Court's opinion addressing two categories of facts excluded from consideration at capital sentencing proceedings by Booth v. Maryland and South Carolina v. Gathers: Information revealing the individuality of the victim and the impact of the crime on the victim's survivors. As to these two categories, I believe Booth and Gathers were wrongly decided.

To my knowledge, our legal tradition has never included a general rule that evidence of a crime's effects on the victim and others is, standing alone, irrelevant to a sentencing determination of the defendant's culpability. Indeed, as the Court's opinion today, and dissents in Booth and Gathers, make clear, criminal conduct has traditionally been categorized and penalized differently according to consequences not specifically intended, but determined in part by conditions unknown to a defendant when he acted.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Blackmun, J., Joined: In his dissenting opinion, Justice Marshall expressed alarm over the Court's decision to overrule Booth and Gathers. He believed such a decision was a prelude to further erosion of rights he believed were fundamental to the Constitution. Justice Marshall wrote:

Power, not reason, is the new currency of this Court's decisionmaking. Four Terms ago, a five-Justice majority of this Court held that "victim impact" evidence of the type at issue in this case could not constitutionally be introduced during the penalty phase of a capital trial. By another 5-4 vote, a majority of this Court rebuffed an attack upon this ruling just two Terms ago. Nevertheless, having expressly invited [Tennessee] to renew the attack, today's majority overrules Booth and Gathers and credits the dissenting views expressed in those cases. Neither the law nor the facts supporting Booth and Gathers underwent any change in the last four years. Only the personnel of this Court did.

In dispatching Booth and Gathers to their graves, today's majority ominously suggests that an even more extensive upheaval of this Court's precedents may be in store. Renouncing this Court's historical commitment to a conception of "the judiciary as a source of impersonal and reasoned judgments," the majority declares itself free to discard any principle of constitutional liberty which was recognized or reaffirmed over the dissenting votes of four Justices and with which five or more Justices now disagree. The implications of this radical new exception to the doctrine of stare decisis are staggering. The majority today sends a clear signal that scores of established constitutional liberties are now ripe for reconsideration, thereby inviting the very type of open defiance of our precedents that the majority rewards in this case. Because I believe that this Court owes more to its constitutional precedents in general and to Booth and Gathers in particular, I dissent.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Blackmun, J., Joined: The dissenting opinion of Justice Stevens continued the theme of Justice Marshall's dissent. Justice Stevens believed the Court went too far in overruling precedents. He wrote:

The novel rule that the Court announces today represents a dramatic departure from the principles that have governed our capital sentencing jurisprudence for decades. Justice Marshall is properly concerned about the majority's trivialization of the doctrine of stare decisis. But even if Booth v. Maryland, and South Carolina v. Gathers, had not been decided, today's decision would represent a sharp break with past decisions. Our cases provide no support whatsoever for the majority's conclusion that the prosecutor may introduce evidence that sheds no light on the defendant's guilt or moral culpability, and thus serves no purpose other than to encourage jurors to decide in favor of death rather than life on the basis of their emotions rather than their reason.

Until today our capital punishment jurisprudence has required that any decision to impose the death penalty be based solely on evidence that tends to inform the jury about the character of the offense and the character of the defendant; evidence that serves no purpose other than to appeal to the sympathies or emotions of the jurors has never been considered admissible. Thus, if a defendant, who had murdered a convenience store clerk in cold blood in the course of an armed robbery, offered evidence unknown to him at the time of the crime about the immoral character of his victim, all would recognize immediately that the evidence was irrelevant and inadmissible. Evenhanded justice requires that the same constraint be imposed on the advocate of the death penalty....

Given the current popularity of capital punishment in a crime-ridden society, the political appeal of arguments that assume that increasing the severity of sentences is the best cure for the cancer of crime, and the political strength of the "victims' rights" movement, I recognize that today's decision will be greeted with enthusiasm by a large number of concerned and thoughtful citizens. The great tragedy of the decision, however, is the danger that the "hydraulic pressure" of public opinion that Justice Holmes once described — and that properly influences the deliberations of democratic legislatures — has played a role not only in the Court's decision to hear this case, and in its decision to reach the constitutional question without pausing to consider affirming on the basis of the Tennessee Supreme Court's rationale, but even in its resolution of the constitutional issue involved. Today is a sad day for a great institution.

Case Note: The impact of the Court's decision on capital punishment was profound. The decision has enabled prosecutors to take full advantage of a weapon once thought to be too powerful to allow in capital prosecutions: empathy for the families of murder victims. In an effort to control the sweeping impact of the decision, many courts scrutinize and limit the use of victim impact evidence. See also Booth v. Maryland; California v. Brown; South Carolina v. Gathers; Victim Impact Evidence Peckham, Rufus W. Rufus W. Peckham served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1895 to 1909. While on the Supreme Court, Peckham was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Peckham was born on November 8, 1838, in Albany, New York. Peckham's education was obtained in private schools in the United States and abroad. He studied law as an apprentice in his father's law office and was admitted to the bar in New York in 1859. Peckham maintained a private practice for several years before taking a position as a prosecutor for Albany County. He eventually became a trial judge and was a member of New York's highest court. In 1895, President Grover Cleveland appointed Peckham to the Supreme Court.

Peckham wrote only a few capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. The conservative interpretation of the Constitution that Peckham was known for was best illustrated in the case of Valentina v. Mercer. The defendant in the case pled guilty to capital murder and was sentenced to death by a New Jersey trial court. She asked the Supreme Court to reverse the judgment on the grounds that New Jersey's procedure for accepting a guilty plea violated constitutional due process. Peckham, writing for the Court, rejected the argument. However, instead of addressing the constitutional challenge head-on, Peckham wrote that the Court did not have jurisdiction over the case because the issue presented was purely a state-law matter that did not involve a federal constitutional question. Peckham died on October 24, 1909.

Pecuniary Gain Aggravator The phrase "pecuniary gain" encompasses more than just money and can include anything that results in economic gain. The overwhelming majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made pecuniary gain a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon committed murder for pecuniary gain. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Penalty Phase Discovery see Discovery

Penalty Phase Evidence Capital felons have argued that the federal Constitution requires that the standard for introducing evidence at the penalty phase be higher than that which is used at the guilt phase. Courts have rejected this contention. As a general rule, any relevant evidence may be introduced during the penalty phase. Wide latitude is granted to parties in introducing evidence in aggravation and mitigation during the capital penalty phase. The evidence, generally, need not satisfy the more restrictive rules of evidence that govern the guilt phase. Such evidence must have a direct bearing on the statutory prerequisites for imposition of the death penalty.

At the penalty phase, the prosecutor and defense counsel may introduce and comment upon (1) any evidence raised at the guilt phase that is relevant to the special circumstances found in the indictment or information for which the capital felon was found guilty; (2) any other testimony or evidence relevant to the special circumstances found in the indictment or information; (3) evidence rebutting the existence of an aggravating or mitigating circumstance; (4) any pre-sentence report that was produced; and (5) any mental examination report that was produced. See also Hearsay; Hearsay Exception; Aggravating Circumstances; Mitigating Circumstances

Pennsylvania The State of Pennsylvania is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on March 26, 1974.

Pennsylvania has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, intermediate courts, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The State has two intermediate appellate courts: The first intermediate court is called the Superior Court and is composed of a president judge and fourteen judges. The second intermediate court is called the Commonwealth Court and is composed of a president judge and eight judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called Courts of Common Pleas. Capital offenses against the State of Pennsylvania are tried in the Courts of Common Pleas. It is provided by Rule 801 of the Pennsylvania Rules of Criminal Procedure that, in capital cases, a retained or appointed attorney for a defendant must have no less than five years' prior experience in the active practice of criminal law.

Pennsylvania's capital punishment statute, Pa. Code tit.18, § 2502(a), is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the special circumstance of the offender committing an intentional killing.

Capital murder in Pennsylvania is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Pennsylvania is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Pennsylvania.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Pa. Code tit. 42, § 9711(d) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The victim was a firefighter, peace officer, public servant concerned in official detention, judge of any court in the unified judicial system, the Attorney General of Pennsylvania, a deputy attorney general, district attorney, assistant district attorney, member of the General Assembly, Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Auditor General, State Treasurer, State law enforcement official, local law enforcement official, Federal law enforcement official or person employed to assist or assisting any law enforcement official in the performance of his duties, who was killed in the performance of his duties or as a result of his official position.

2. The defendant paid or was paid by another person or had contracted to pay or be paid by another person or had conspired to pay or be paid by another person for the killing of the victim.

3. The victim was being held by the defendant for ransom or reward, or as a shield or hostage.

4. The death of the victim occurred while defendant was engaged in the hijacking of an aircraft.

5. The victim was a prosecution witness to a murder or other felony committed by the defendant and was killed for the purpose of preventing his testimony against the defendant in any grand jury or criminal proceeding involving such offenses.

6. The defendant committed a killing while in the perpetration of a felony.

7. In the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to another person in addition to the victim of the offense.

8. The offense was committed by means of torture.

9. The defendant has a significant history of felony convictions involving the use or threat of violence to the person.

10. The defendant has been convicted of another Federal or State offense, committed either before or at the time of the offense at issue, for which a sentence of life imprisonment or death was imposable or the defendant was undergoing a sentence of life imprisonment for any reason at the time of the commission of the offense.

11. The defendant has been convicted of another murder committed in any jurisdiction and committed either before or at the time of the offense at issue.

12. The defendant has been convicted of voluntary manslaughter, or a substantially equivalent crime in any other jurisdiction, committed either before or at the time of the offense at issue.

13. The defendant committed the killing or was an accomplice in the killing, while in the perpetration of a felony drug crime.

14. At the time of the killing, the victim was or had been involved, associated or in competition with the defendant in the sale, manufacture, distribution or delivery of any controlled substance or counterfeit controlled substance, and the defendant committed the killing or was an accomplice to the killing and the killing resulted from or was related to that association, involvement or competition to promote the defendant's activities in selling, manufacturing, distributing or delivering controlled substances or counterfeit controlled substances.

15. At the time of the killing, the victim was or had been a nongovernmental informant or had otherwise provided any investigative, law enforcement or police agency with information concerning criminal activity and the defendant committed the killing or was an accomplice to the killing and the killing was in retaliation for the victim's activities as a nongovernmental informant or in providing information concerning criminal activity to an investigative, law enforcement or police agency.

16. The victim was a child under 12 years of age.

17. At the time of the killing, the victim was in her third trimester of pregnancy or the defendant had knowledge of the victim's pregnancy.

18. At the time of the killing the defendant was subject to a court order restricting in any way the defendant's behavior toward the victim.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Pennsylvania has provided by Pa. Code tit. 42, § 9711(e) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal convictions.

2. The defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance.

3. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired.

4. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime.

5. The defendant acted under extreme duress, although not such duress as to constitute a defense to prosecution or acted under the substantial domination of another person.

6. The victim was a participant in the defendant's homicidal conduct or consented to the homicidal acts.

7. The defendant's participation in the homicidal act was relatively minor.

8. Any other evidence of mitigation concerning the character and record of the defendant and the circumstances of his offense.

Under Pennsylvania's capital punishment statute, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Pennsylvania uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State has three sites for its death row facilities for men: Pittsburgh, Huntington, and Graterford, Pennsylvania. The facility housing female death row inmates is located in Muncy, Pennsylvania.

Pursuant to the laws of Pennsylvania, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor is required to obtain the advice of the State's Board of Pardons.

Under the laws of Pennsylvania, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Pa. Code tit. 61, § 3005:

a. No person except the following shall witness any execution under the provisions of this act:

1. The superintendent or his designee of the institution where the execution takes place.

2. Six reputable adult citizens selected by the secretary.

3. One spiritual adviser, when requested and selected by the inmate.

4. Not more than six duly accredited representatives of the news media.

5. Such staff of the department as may be selected by the secretary.

6. Not more than four victims registered with and selected by the victim advocate.

b. The Secretary of Corrections may refuse participation by a witness for safety or security reasons. The department shall make reasonable efforts to provide victims a viewing area separate and apart from the area to which other witnesses are admitted.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Pennsylvania executed only three capital felons. During this period, Pennsylvania did not execute any female capital felon, although four of its death row inmates during this period were females. A total of 228 capital felons were on death row in Pennsylvania as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as 139 black inmates, sixty-nine white inmates, eighteen Hispanic inmates, and two Asian inmates.

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant's right against self-incrimination was violated when evidence from his psychiatrist was introduced at the penalty phase which indicated the defendant was dangerous. (2) Whether the trial judge's nullification instruction prevented the penalty phase jury from giving effect to defendant's mitigating evidence.

Case Holdings: (1) Any error in allowing evidence from the defendant's psychiatrist to be introduced at the penalty phase was harmless. (2) The trial judge's nullification instruction prevented the penalty phase jury from giving effect to defendant's mitigating evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Johnny Paul Penry, was charged with the 1979 capital murder of Pamela Carpenter by the State of Texas. He was found competent to stand trial, although a psychologist testified that he was mildly to moderately retarded and had the mental age of a six-year-old. At the guilt phase of the trial, the defendant raised an insanity defense. The jury rejected the defendant's insanity defense and found him guilty of capital murder. At the penalty phase of the trial, the defendant requested the trial court instruct the jury that it should interpret evidence of his mental retardation and childhood abuse as mitigating circumstances and not as aggravating evidence. The trial court refused the request. The defendant was sentenced to death. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal. The defendant thereafter filed a State habeas corpus petition. The trial court denied relief. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed, after finding the jury was not adequately instructed on how to consider all of the defendant's mitigating evidence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari in Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302 (1989), and reversed.

The defendant was tried a second time. A jury found him guilty once again. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor presented evidence from the defendant's psychiatrist which indicated the defendant was dangerous. The defendant put on mitigating evidence of his mental impairment and childhood abuse. The defendant asked the trial court to give proffered instructions to the jury that would allow it to consider and give effect to his mitigating evidence. The trial court rejected the defendant's proposed instructions, but gave the jury instructions that purported to obligate the jury to give consideration to the defendant's mitigating evidence. The jury returned a death sentence. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal, and during a State habeas proceeding. The defendant thereafter filed a federal habeas petition. A federal district court rejected the defendant's claim that his rights were violated by using evidence from his psychiatrist and by giving the penalty phase jury a nullification instruction (instructions that required the jury to disregard the law in order to give effect to mitigating evidence). A federal Court of Appeals denied the defendant a certificate of appealability. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor rejected the defendant's argument regarding testimony from his psychiatrist, on the grounds that, to the extent it was error to allow the evidence, the error was harmless. As to the second issue, Justice O'Connor found that it had merit. The opinion found that the verdict form used did not require the jury to state whether mitigating evidence was found. Justice O'Connor held that this omission meant that the jury had to disregard the trial court's instructions in order to reject the death penalty. The case was remanded for a new sentencing proceeding.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Thomas concurred in the Court's resolution of the issue involving evidence from the defendant's psychiatrist. However, he dissented from the opinion regarding the nullification instruction. Justice Thomas argued that the jury was fully informed that they could reject the death penalty if there was sufficient mitigating evidence. *See also Mitigating Circumstances; Nullification Instruction; Penry v. Issues Presented: (1) Whether the Constitution is violated when a defendant proffers mitigating evidence that may be interpreted favorably or unfavorably and the trial court refuses to instruct the penalty phase jury on how it should consider and give effect to the defendant's mitigating evidence in imposing the sentence. (2) Whether the Constitution categorically prohibits executing a mentally retarded prisoner.

Case Holdings: (1) The Constitution is violated when a penalty phase jury is not instructed on how it may consider and give effect to the defendant's mitigating evidence in imposing its sentence. (2) The Constitution does not categorically prohibit executing a mentally retarded prisoner.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Johnny Paul Penry, was charged with the 1979 capital murder of Pamela Carpenter by the State of Texas. He was found competent to stand trial, although a psychologist testified that he was mildly to moderately retarded and had the mental age of a six-year-old. At the guilt phase of the trial, the defendant raised an insanity defense. The jury rejected the defendant's insanity defense and found him guilty of capital murder. At the penalty phase of the trial, the defendant requested the trial court instruct the jury that it should interpret evidence of his mental retardation and childhood abuse as mitigating circumstances and not as aggravating evidence. The trial court refused the request. The defendant was sentenced to death.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his death sentence violated the Eighth Amendment because (1) the jury was not adequately instructed on how to consider all of his mitigating evidence and (2) because it was cruel and unusual punishment to execute a mentally retarded person. After the United States Supreme Court denied certiorari on direct review, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The district court denied relief. The defendant appealed, but the Court of Appeals denied relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari under the habeas claim.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor agreed with the defendant that the absence of instructions informing the jury that it could consider and give effect to his mitigating evidence of mental retardation and abused background, by declining to impose the death penalty, denied him the constitutional right to have his sentence imposed based upon a consideration of his disadvantaged background and mental problems. The opinion indicated that in order for the punishment imposed to be directly related to the personal culpability of the defendant, the sentencer must be allowed to consider and give effect to mitigating evidence relevant to a defendant's background, character, and crime. Justice O'Connor reasoned that full consideration of such mitigating evidence enhances the reliability of the jury's sentencing decision.

The opinion rejected the defendant's claim that the Constitution barred executing mentally retarded prisoners. Justice O'Connor went to great lengths to distinguish an "insane" prisoner from a prisoner who was merely mentally retarded. The opinion noted that under common law and the Court's own precedent, Ford v. Wainwright, an insane prisoner could not be executed.

Justice O'Connor wrote that mentally retarded persons are individuals whose abilities and behavioral deficits can vary greatly depending on the degree of their retardation, their life experience, and the ameliorative effects of education and habilitation; therefore, as a generally matter, the Constitution does not prohibit executing mentally retarded prisoners.

Accordingly, the opinion reversed the judgment because of the failure of the trial court to adequately instruct the jury, but affirmed that part of the judgment which found the defendant's mental retardation did not prevent him from being executed.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, J., Joined: Justice Brennan concurred and dissented on the following grounds: "I agree that the jury instructions given at sentencing in this case deprived [the defendant] of his constitutional right to have a jury consider all mitigating evidence that he presented before sentencing him to die. I would also hold, however, that the Eighth Amendment prohibits the execution of offenders who are mentally retarded and who thus lack the full degree of responsibility for their crimes that is a predicate for the constitutional imposition of the death penalty."

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Blackmun, J., Joined: Justice Stevens concurred with the Court's reversal of the judgment on the issue of failure to instruct the jury properly. However, he believed the Constitution prohibited executing mentally retarded prisoners. He "would therefore reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals in its entirety."

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and White and Kennedy, JJ., Joined: Justice Scalia concurred with the Court's finding that mentally retarded prisoners can be executed consistent with the Constitution. He dissented on the Court's decision that the jury was not adequately instructed. Justice Scalia argued that the Constitution was not offended by the trial court's refusal to provide specific instructions on how to interpret the defendant's mental retardation and childhood abuse. He wrote: "The decision whether to impose the death penalty is a unitary one; unguided discretion not to impose is unguided discretion to impose as well. In holding that the jury had to be free to deem Penry's mental retardation and sad childhood relevant for whatever purpose it wished, the Court has come full circle, not only permitting but requiring what Furman once condemned ... [as] '[f]reakishly' and 'wantonly,' imposing the death penalty."

Case Note: The decision in the case garnered a significant amount of negative commentary because of its determination that mentally retarded prisoners may be executed. Several states responded to the decision by enacting statutes that expressly prohibit the execution of mentally retarded prisoners. Ultimately, the case was overruled by the decision in Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002), which held that the Constitution prohibited executing mentally retarded prisoners. See also Atkins v. Virginia; Ford v. Wainwright; Insanity while Awaiting Execution; Mentally Retarded Capital Felon; Mitigating Circumstances; Penry v. Johnson

People of Faith Against the Death Penalty People of Faith Against the Death Penalty (PFADP) is a special project of the North Carolina Council of Churches. PFADP was created for the purpose of abolishing the death penalty through the mobilization and education of the religious community of North Carolina. The organization advocates supportive letter writing to death row inmates, lobbying lawmakers, and holding vigils at the prison gates when executions occur.

Per Curiam Opinion A per curiam opinion is a written appellate opinion that does not assign the name of the appellate judge responsible for writing it. Per curiam opinions, as a general rule, do not create new principles of law. The United States Supreme Court has issued a number of per curiam capital punishment opinions. The most cited per curiam opinion by the Supreme Court was its ruling in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), which had the effect of striking down all capital punishment statutes in the nation. Issue Presented: Whether the identity of the victim was sufficiently identified to sustain the judgment against the defendant.

Case Holding: The identity of the victim was sufficiently identified to sustain the judgment against the defendant, even though the victim's body was burned almost beyond recognition.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Vuko Perovich, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. An appeal was filed on behalf of the defendant to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the conviction was invalid because the prosecutor failed to prove the identity of the victim of the crime. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer ruled that sufficient identification of the victim was established at the trial. The opinion addressed the issue as follows: "It is assigned for error that the court overruled a motion to instruct the jury to bring in a verdict of not guilty for the reason that the corpus delicti had not been proved.... While it is true there was no witness to the homicide and the identification of the body found in the cabin was not perfect, owing to its condition, caused by fire, yet, taking all the circumstances together, there was clearly enough to warrant the jury in finding that the partially burned body was that of [the named victim] and that he had been killed by the defendant.” The judgment of the federal trial court was affirmed. See also Biddle v. Perovich; Corpus Delicti

Issue Presented: Whether the Due Process Clause required California to provide the defendant with a judicial hearing to determine if he had returned to sanity as reported by a doctor in a non-judicial setting.

Case Holding: The constitutional issue presented would not be addressed in a habeas proceeding because the defendant had another adequate remedy under State law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Phyle, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. The California Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. After the defendant’s trial ended, he was found insane at a judicial hearing. Under the laws of California, he could not be executed while insane. A subsequent determination was made that the defendant was sane and his execution was scheduled. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in the California Supreme Court, challenging his scheduled execution on the grounds that he was insane. In his habeas petition, the defendant alleged that the doctor reached the determination of his return to sanity without notice and without any opportunity on the defendant’s part to obtain an original court hearing and adjudication of his sanity or even to obtain a court review of the doctor’s conclusion that he was sane. The defendant contended this procedure violated due process of law guaranteed to him by the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution. The appellate court rejected the habeas petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black ruled that the Court would not address the defendant’s constitutional issue in a habeas proceeding because, under the laws of California, the defendant had another remedy. The opinion indicated that, under the laws of California, the method for challenging the determination of the defendant’s sanity was through filing a writ of mandamus to “invoke judicial action to compel the warden to initiate judicial proceedings, and in which mandamus proceedings the court will hear and consider evidence to determine whether there is reason to believe that the [defendant] is insane.” Justice Black reasoned: “Applications for inquiries into sanity made by a defendant sentenced to death, unsupported by facts, and buttressed by no good reasons for believing that the defendant has lost his sanity, cannot, with any appropriate regard for society and for the judicial process, call for the delays in execution incident to full judicial inquiry. And a court can just as satisfactorily determine by mandamus as by direct application whether there are good reasons to have a full-fledged judicial inquiry into a defendant’s sanity.” The judgment of the California Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Douglas, Murphy, and Rutledge, JJ., Joined: Justice Frankfurter concurred in the Court’s decision. He wrote separately to express his view that the Court’s ruling was contingent upon representations made by the State’s counsel that mandamus would be available for the defendant to use in challenging the decision that he had returned to sanity. See also Insanity while Awaiting Execution; Solesbee v. Pierpont, Harry Harry Pierpont was born on October 13, 1902, in Muncie, Indiana. His life ended with the notoriety of being the only member of the Dillinger gang to be executed in the electric chair.

Pierpont’s first real brush with the law occurred in 1922, when he was convicted of attempted murder and sentenced to an Indiana reformatory for a term of two to fourteen years’ confinement. Pierpont was paroled two years later on March 6, 1924. Shortly after being released, he robbed a number of Indiana banks before fleeing to Michigan. Pierpont was arrested while in Michigan and extradited back to Indiana to stand trial. He was convicted and sent to prison on May 6, 1925. It was while Pierpont was in prison for the second time that he met John Dillinger (1903–1934) and other inmates who became part of the infamous Dillinger gang.

In early 1933, Dillinger was released from prison. After his release, Dillinger had guns smuggled into the prison to help Pierpont and other inmates escape. On September 26, 1933, Pierpont, Russell Clark, Charles Makley, and seven other inmates used the guns supplied by Dillinger to escape from prison. Shortly after his escape, Pierpont, along with Clark, Makley, and three other escapees, fled to Ohio and robbed a bank.

At the time of Pierpont’s prison break,

John Dillinger (left) and Harry Pierpont (right) were notorious killers and bank robbers. Dillinger met his fate in a hail of gunfire. Pierpont was executed in the electric chair on October 17, 1934. (Muncie Indiana Sheriff)

Dillinger was in jail in Lima, Ohio, awaiting trial for a bank robbery. On October 12, 1933, Pierpont, Clark, Makley and three other gang members went to the Lima jail to help Dillinger escape. During the jailbreak, Sheriff Jesse Sarber was fatally shot.

With Dillinger free once again, the gang went on a bank robbery spree in Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin. After the robberies, Pierpont, Dillinger, Makley, and Clark went to Tucson, Arizona, to evade capture. However, on January 25, 1934, all four men were captured. Pierpont, Makley, and Clark were extradited back to Ohio to be prosecuted for the murder of Sheriff Sarber and Dillinger was sent to Indiana to be prosecuted for crimes committed there.

In March 1934, Pierpont, Makley, and Clark were convicted of murdering Sheriff Sarber. Pierpont and Makley were given death sentences. Clark was sentenced to prison for life. On September 22, 1934, while waiting to be executed, Pierpont and Makley attempted to break out of prison. However, both men were shot. Makley was killed outright and Pierpont wounded. Although Pierpont had not fully recovered from his gun shot wounds, he was executed in the electric chair on October 17, 1934.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him; therefore, his conviction and death sentence could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Pierre, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Louisiana. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that his conviction was void because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black wrote: "Principles which forbid discrimination in the selection of Petit Juries also govern the selection of Grand Juries." It was said that in the prosecution of the defendant equal protection principles required "that, in the selection of jurors to pass upon his life..., there shall be no exclusion of his race, and no discrimination against them because of their color. The opinion found that the defendant produced sufficient evidence to establish that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand and petit juries involved in his prosecution. Justice Black noted: "The fact that approximately one-half of the Parish's [or county's] population were [black] demonstrates that there could have been no lack of [black] residents over twenty-one years of age." The opinion "conclude[d] that the exclusion of [blacks] from jury service was not due to their failure to possess the statutory qualifications." The judgment of the Louisiana Supreme Court was reversed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection Pitney, Mahlon Mahlon Pitney served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1912 to 1922. While on the Supreme Court, Pitney was known for his conservative interpretation of the Constitution.

Pitney was born in Morristown, New Jersey, on February 5, 1858. He attended Princeton University, where he graduated in 1879. Pitney studied law as an apprentice in a law office and was admitted to the bar in New Jersey in 1882. His career included a private legal practice, the United States House of Representatives, the New Jersey Senate, and a position as a State Supreme Court judge. In 1912, President William Howard Taft appointed Pitney to the Supreme Court.

Pitney was known to have written only two capital punishment opinions. In Lem Woon v. Oregon, Pitney wrote the opinion of the Court. The issue presented in Lem Woon was whether the Constitution required Oregon to prosecute capital offenses by grand jury indictment. Pitney wrote the federal Constitution did not require Oregon to prosecute capital offenses by grand jury indictment.

The opinion which gave Pitney the greatest legal notoriety was the decision in Frank v. Mangum. That case involved the prosecution of a Jewish American by the State of Georgia for the murder of a Christian woman. The case was emotionally turbulent, as local people sought swift justice against the defendant. The issue presented to the Supreme Court was whether the defendant's conviction and death sentence were obtained in violation of due process of law because of mob intimidation during his trial. Pitney, writing for the majority on the Court, found that there was no due process violation because of mob threats. (The defendant was eventually lynched by a mob after his sentence was commuted by a Georgia governor.) Pitney died December 9, 1924.

Place, Martha M. Martha M. Place (1855–1899) earned the dubious distinction of being the first woman to be executed by electrocution. Martha's journey to the execution chamber at New York's Sing Sing prison began in August 1893, when she was hired as a housekeeper for William W. Place. At the time of Martha's hiring, William lived with his fourteen-year-old daughter, Ida Place, in their Brooklyn home.

William and Martha were married three months after she was hired as a housekeeper. During the first few months of the marriage, the family got along well. In time, however, problems arose between Martha and Ida. As a result of persistent quarreling between them, tension surfaced between Martha and William. On February 7, 1898, the family conflicts reached deadly proportions. The events of that day were described by the New York Court of Appeals in People v. Place, 52 N.E. 576 (N.Y. 1899), as follows:

In the morning of Monday, [February 7, 1898], just before her husband left for his place of business, [Martha] said to him: "I want my money. I am going down town." To which he replied: "I shall not give you that money. I have said to you plainly what I mean, and I intend to stand by it this time." To this she answered: "If you don't give it to me, I will make it cost you ten times more." He then spoke to his daughter, and kissed her good-by. He bade his wife good-by, but did not kiss her. As he passed her in going from the house, she said something which he did not understand. Shortly after he left, [Martha] went into the back parlor, where Ida was sitting; and a conversation occurred as to family difficulties, during which Ida declared her intention to go away and not return. [Martha] asked her if her father gave her money that morning, to which she replied, "None of your business." [Martha] then remarked, "When he gives you money, he won't give me any," to which Ida answered, "That is nothing to you," and picked up a cigarette box and threw it at [Martha], who then "went for her." Ida again declared her intention to leave and not return, and then went up stairs. A few minutes later the servant of the family, who was in the back yard, heard a loud scream, which sounded like a woman's. She went into the kitchen, then into the hall, and opened the door to the stairway, when she heard sounds like doors being locked and some one screaming on the top floor. It stopped while she was listening, and she paid no further attention to it. After this Ida was never seen alive.... This occurrence took place at about a quarter after 8 o'clock. At nearly 9 o'clock [Martha] called the servant to her room on the top floor, told her she was going to give up the house, and that she would have to leave. She then paid her her wages, and five dollars in addition, as she had given her no notice of her discharge.... Although the servant expressed a desire to remain another day, to do the washing and ironing, [Martha] requested her to leave the house before Mr. Place came home; saying that she did not want her to remain, because when he came he might ask her questions....

[William] returned home about half past 6 P.M. As he entered the hallway he hung his coat and hat upon the rack, and started towards the back parlor, when he heard a noise at the head of the stairs, and saw [Martha] coming down. As he stood there he almost immediately received a blow upon his head from a hatchet or ax in her hands, and soon received a second blow upon the side of his head. He cried out, and made an effort to reach the front door. While passing along the hallway he received a third blow upon his hand. He reached the door, cried "Murder!" when some one came to his assistance, and he was taken to a neighbor's house, and from there to a hospital. Thereupon several persons entered the house. Upon going to the third story, they found Ida in her room, lying dead upon her bed. Her face was partially downward, with the head towards the foot of the bed.... Blood was oozing from her mouth, and there was a little upon the pillow or bedclothes.... The eyes were burned so that the pupils were of a bluish color, and there was some discoloration around the mouth and the right side of the cheek.... An expert called by the people testified that the cause of the decedent's death was asphyxia; that she was blind before her death, which was occasioned by some corrosive substance; that the existing condition of the mouth, throat, tongue, trachea, larynx, and pharynx was produced by violence, and could not have occurred from any other cause. The proof disclosed that [William] had in his desk in the house both pyrogallic and muriatic acid, that they were the only acids there, and that either would destroy the sight when thrown into the eye.

On March 18, 1898, Martha was indicted for the crime of murder in the first degree. A jury convicted her of the crime and, on March 20, 1899, the trial judge sentenced her to death. On April 8, 1899, Martha became the first woman to be executed by electrocution. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Plain Error Rule Under plain error rule, an appellate court may address an assignment of error that was not properly preserved at the trial court level, if there was in fact (1) an error, (2) that is plain, and (3) affects substantial rights. There is no constitutional right to have plain error review in death penalty cases. See also Jones v. United States (II)

Plurality Opinion A plurality opinion is one where a majority of the members of an appellate court agree on the result reached in a case, but only a minority of its members agree with the reasoning used in the opinion that announces the appellate court's decision. The reasoning used in plurality opinion issued by an appellate court is considered persuasive authority, not binding authority on lower courts. The United States Supreme Court has issued a number of plurality capital punishment cases. *See also Barclay v. Florida; Burns v. Wilson; Coker v. Issue Presented: Whether an indictment may set out two murder offenses.

Case Holding: An indictment may set out two murder offenses, in separate counts, which occurred close in time.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Pointer, was indicted by the United States with committing two murders "at the Choctaw Nation, in [Native American] country." The defendant was tried, convicted of both murders, and sentenced to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, arguing that the indictment was defective because it improperly contained two murder offenses. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan ruled that there was no merit to the defendant's contention that an indictment may not contain two murder offenses. The opinion reasoned as follows:

While recognizing as fundamental the principle that the court must not permit the defendant to be embarrassed in his defense by a multiplicity of charges embraced in one indictment and to be tried by one jury, and while conceding that regularly or usually an indictment should not include more than one felony, the authorities concur in holding that a joinder in one indictment, in separate counts, of different felonies, at least of the same class or grade, and subject to the same punishment, is not necessarily fatal to the indictment ... and does not, in every case, by reason alone of such joinder, make it the duty of the court, upon motion of the accused, to compel the prosecutor to elect upon what one of the charges he will go to trial. The court is invested with such discretion as enables it to do justice between the government and the accused. If it be discovered at any time during a trial that the substantial rights of the accused may be prejudiced by a submission to the same jury of more than one distinct charge of felony among two or more of the same class, the court, according to the established principles of criminal law, can compel an election by the prosecutor....

In the present case we cannot say, from anything on the fact of the indictment, that the court erred or abused its discretion in overruling the defendant's motion to quash the indictment or his motions for an election by the government between the two charges of murder. The indictment showed that the two murders were committed on the same day, in the same county and district, and with the same kind of instrument.... There was such close connection between the two killings in respect of time, place, and occasion that it was difficult, if not impossible, to separate the proof of one charge from the proof of the other. It is, therefore, clear that the accused was not confounded in his defense by the union of the two offenses of murder in the same indictment, and that his substantial rights were not prejudiced by the refusal of the court to compel the prosecutor to elect upon which of the two charges he would proceed.

The judgment of the federal trial court was affirmed. See also Grand Jury

Poison Aggravator The act of using poison to kill another is a statutory aggravating circumstance. Three capital punishment jurisdictions, California, South Carolina, and Utah, have made such conduct a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon used poison to kill someone. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Poland Poland abolished capital punishment in 1997. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Poland Brothers Michael Kent Poland was born on June 11, 1940. His brother, Patrick Gene Poland, was born on March 8, 1950. On February 3, 1983, the Poland brothers were placed on death row by the State of Arizona. Michael was executed by lethal injection on June 16, 1999. Patrick was executed by lethal injection on March 15, 2000.

The Poland brothers' journey to the execution chamber began on May 24, 1977. On that day, a Purolator van containing $328,180 in cash left Phoenix on a routine delivery to banks in various towns in northern Arizona. However, the van failed to make its deliveries. The police were notified and the abandoned van, with some $35,150 in cash, was discovered early the next day.

During the investigation into the apparent robbery, the police learned from witnesses that on the morning of May 24, the Purolator van was pulled over to the side of Highway 1-17 by what appeared to be a police car. The witnesses identified the two uniformed police officers as Michael and Patrick. Neither of the Poland brothers was employed as a police officer.

The police further learned that, on May 24, Michael and Patrick borrowed a pickup truck and tarpaulin from their father. The next day, the brothers rented a boat at a marina on Lake Mead. A few days later, the brothers returned their father's truck with a new tarpaulin.

In the middle of June, the dead body of Cecil Newkirk, one of the guards of the Purolator van, surfaced on the Nevada side of Lake Mead. The body was partially covered by a canvas bag. A week later, authorities found the dead body of the other Purolator guard, Russell Dempsey, a short distance from where Cecil's body had been found. Autopsies indicated drowning as the cause of both deaths. Divers searching the area recovered a tarpaulin and a license plate bearing the insignia found on Arizona Department of Public Safety automobiles.

Authorities searched the homes of Michael and Patrick on July 27. They found a number of weapons, including a taser gun, large amounts of cash, and items of police-type paraphernalia. The police also discovered a scanner and scanner key which were capable of monitoring radio frequencies and a notebook listing local police frequencies. Both of the brothers had cars with siren-type burglar alarms which could be activated from inside or outside of the car. It was learned that the brothers purchased a light bar which could be placed on top of an automobile and would resemble a law enforcement light bar.

Finally, the police learned that, while neither Michael nor Patrick had regular employment, they made numerous large purchases during June and July 1977. These purchases included appliances, furniture, motorcycles, and a business. The purchases were made in cash or by a cashier's check.

The Poland brothers were charged with the murder of the Purolator guards and robbery. They were tried together on October 23, 1979. They were both found guilty and, on April 9, 1980, they were both sentenced to death. The conviction and sentences were reversed on appeal by the Arizona Supreme Court because of various reasons, including jury misconduct. A new trial was awarded. The brothers were again tried together on November 18, 1982. They were found guilty a second time. On February 3, 1983, they were again sentenced to death. The second judgments were affirmed on appeal. Michael was executed by lethal Issue Presented: Whether the Double Jeopardy Clause bars a further capital sentencing proceeding when, on appeal from a sentence of death, the appellate court finds the evidence insufficient to support the only aggravating factor on which the sentencing court relied, but does not find the evidence insufficient to support the death penalty on other aggravating factors.

Case Holding: The Double Jeopardy Clause does not bar a further capital sentencing proceeding when, on appeal from a sentence of death, the appellate court finds the evidence insufficient to support the only aggravating factor on which the sentencing court relied, but does not find the evidence insufficient to support the death penalty on other aggravating factors.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, Michael and Patrick Poland, were convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder during the course of a robbery by the State of Arizona. On appeal, the Arizona Supreme Court reversed the convictions and death sentences. The appellate court found that the evidence was insufficient to support the trial judge's finding that the murder was "especially heinous, cruel, or depraved" (a statutory aggravating circumstance). The appellate court determined that the trial judge erred in finding the "pecuniary gain" statutory aggravating circumstance did not apply to robbery of a bank. The appellate court remanded the case for a new trial.

At the second trial, the defendants were again convicted of capital murder. At the second non-jury penalty phase proceeding, the trial judge found the existence of both, the "pecuniary gain" and "especially heinous, cruel, or depraved" statutory aggravating circumstances. The sentence of death was again imposed on each defendant. The Arizona Supreme Court affirmed the convictions and death sentences. In doing so, the appellate court found that the evidence did not support finding the existence of the "especially heinous, cruel, or depraved" factor, but the evidence did sustain finding the existence of the "pecuniary gain" factor. The appellate court also rejected the defendants' argument that the Double Jeopardy Clause barred re-imposition of the death penalty. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White ruled that re-imposing the death penalty on the defendants did not violate the Double Jeopardy Clause. The opinion acknowledged that in Bullington v. Missouri and Arizona v. Rumsey, the "Court held that a defendant sentenced to life imprisonment by a capital sentencing jury is protected by the Double Jeopardy Clause against imposition of the death penalty in the event that he obtains reversal of his conviction and is retried and reconvicted." Justice White stated that the decision in the case was not inconsistent with Bullington and Rumsey, because under those cases the relevant inquiry is whether there was a determination made that the prosecutor failed to prove its case for the death penalty and which meant that there was an acquittal on the sentence of death. The opinion addressed this issue as follows:

At no point during [the defendants'] first capital sentencing hearing and appeal did either the sentencer or the reviewing court hold that the prosecution had "failed to prove its case" that [the defendants] deserved the death penalty. Plainly, the sentencing judge did not acquit, for he imposed the death penalty. While the Arizona Supreme Court held that the sentencing judge erred in relying on the "especially heinous, cruel, or depraved" aggravating circumstance, it did not hold that the prosecution had failed to prove its case for the death penalty. Indeed, the court clearly indicated that there had been no such failure by remarking that "the trial court mistook the law when it did not find that the defendants 'committed the offense as consideration for the receipt, or in expectation of the receipt, of anything of pecuniary value,'" and that "[u]pon retrial, if the defendants are again convicted of first degree murder, the court may find the existence of this aggravating circumstance."

The judgment of the Arizona Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan and Blackmun, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented from the majority decision. He believed that the Double Jeopardy Clause was violated by the imposition of the death sentences a second time. He wrote:

In these cases, the trial judge found death to be the appropriate punishment because [the defendants'] offenses were "especially heinous, cruel, or depraved." On appeal, the Arizona Supreme Court held that the sole basis offered by the trial court to support its "conviction" of [the defendants] was insufficient as a matter of law....

The majority believes that, since other aggravating circumstances might have been found to support the "convictions," it was permissible to remand the cases for further factfinding on those alternative factors. But this overlooks what our cases have said a conviction is in the sentencing context — a determination that death is the appropriate penalty, not separate trials on the existence of all statutory aggravating circumstances, conducted seriatim. In these cases, that determination was reversed because there was insufficient evidence to support the ground relied on by the trial judge in reaching it. Any remand for further factfinding on the question whether the death sentence should be imposed was thereafter prohibited. In no other circumstance would the Double Jeopardy Clause countenance the offer of a second chance to the State and the trial judge to find a better theory upon which to base a conviction. Nor should it do so here. I dissent.

Pope John Paul II During the latter part of the 1990s, Pope John Paul II (1920–2005) took an aggressive role in speaking out against the use of capital punishment in the United States. The pope's strong anti-death penalty position bore fruit during his visit to the United States in January 1999.

While speaking in St. Louis, Missouri, the pope criticized capital punishment as cruel and unnecessary. During a prayer service, the pope made a passionate plea for mercy and forgiveness. In attendance at the prayer service was Missouri governor Mel Carnahan. On the day after the pope's prayer service, Governor Carnahan commuted the death sentence of Darrell Mease to life imprisonment. Mease had been scheduled for execution during the pope's visit to St. Louis. However, as a direct result of an unprecedented display of the pope's influence, Mease was spared execution. The pope died on April 2, 2005.

Portugal Capital punishment was abolished by Portugal for ordinary crimes in 1867 and was completely abolished for all crimes in 1976. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Post-Conviction Remedies see Habeas Corpus

Post-Crime Mitigating Evidence The issue of post-crime mitigation evidence concerns conduct by a capital defendant after he or she has been arrested. During the penalty phase of a capital prosecution, a defendant may seek to present evidence that he or she has been a "model" prisoner while awaiting trial. Such evidence is for the purpose of having a jury decline to impose the death penalty. The United States Supreme Court has held that a defendant has a right to present post-crime mitigation evidence. Post-Furman Capital Punishment see Impact of the Furman Decision Powell, Lewis F., Jr. Lewis F. Powell, Jr., served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1972 to 1987. While on the Supreme Court, Powell was known as a moderate conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Powell was born in Suffolk, Virginia, on November 19, 1907. He was educated at Washington and Lee University, where received a bachelor's degree in 1929 and a law degree in 1931. Powell also received a graduate degree from Harvard Law School in 1932. He led a relatively obscure and nonpolitical life as a practicing attorney until President Richard M. Nixon appointed him to the Supreme Court in 1972.

Powell wrote numerous capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. The capital punishment opinion he wrote which had the most impact was McCleskey v. Kemp. In McCleskey, the defendant presented statistical evidence to establish that Georgia's capital punishment system was being implemented in a racially discriminatory manner. Powell, writing for the Court, acknowledged that the statistical evidence showed a racial disparity in capital prosecutions in Georgia. However, Powell concluded that such disparity did not sufficiently rise to the level of a constitutional violation. Powell died on August 25, 1998.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendants had a federal constitutional right to appointment of counsel in their capital prosecutions by the State of Alabama.

Case Holding: The defendants had a federal constitutional right to appointment of counsel in their capital prosecutions by the State of Alabama.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved seven defendants, all black, convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Alabama. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the convictions and sentences. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendants' argument that they were denied counsel. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Sutherland: Justice Sutherland ruled that the defendants were denied the right to counsel within the meaning of the Constitution. His opinion addressed the issue as follows:

It is hardly necessary to say that the right to counsel being conceded, a defendant should be afforded a fair opportunity to secure counsel of his own choice. Not only was that not done here, but such designation of counsel as was attempted was either so indefinite or so close upon the trial as to amount to a denial of effective and substantial aid in that regard....

April 6, six days after indictment, the trials began. When the first case was called, the court inquired whether the parties were ready for trial. The state's attorney replied that he was ready to proceed. No one answered for the defendants or appeared to represent or defend them. Mr. Roddy, a Tennessee lawyer not a member of the local bar, addressed the court, saying that he had not been employed, but that people who were interested had spoken to him about the case. He was asked by the court whether he intended to appear for the defendants, and answered that he would like to appear along with counsel that the court might appoint.... [The trial court also appointed a local lawyer named Mr. Moody.]

It thus will be seen that until the very morning of the trial no lawyer had been named or definitely designated to represent the defendants.

Prior to that time, the trial judge had appointed all the members of the bar for the limited purpose of arraigning the defendants. Whether they would represent the defendants thereafter, if no counsel appeared in their behalf, was a matter of speculation only, or, as the judge indicated, of mere anticipation on the part of the court....

It is not enough to assume that counsel thus precipitated into the case thought there was no defense, and exercised their best judgment in proceeding to trial without preparation. Neither they nor the court could say what a prompt and thorough-going investigation might disclose as to the facts. No attempt was made to investigate. No opportunity to do so was given. Defendants were immediately hurried to trial.... Under the circumstances disclosed, we hold that defendants were not accorded the right of counsel in any substantial sense. To decide otherwise, would simply be to ignore actualities....

[T]he necessity of counsel was so vital and imperative that the failure of the trial court to make an effective appointment of counsel was ... a denial of due process within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. Whether this would be so in other criminal prosecutions, or under other circumstances, we need not determine. All that it is necessary now to decide, as we do decide, is that in a capital case, where the defendant is unable to employ counsel, and is incapable adequately of making his own defense because of ignorance, feeble-mindedness, illiteracy, or the like, it is the duty of the court, whether requested or not, to assign counsel for him as a necessary requisite of due process of law; and that duty is not discharged by an assignment at such a time or under such circumstances as to preclude the giving of effective aid in the preparation and trial of the case.

The judgments of the Alabama Supreme Court were reversed and the case was remanded for a new trial.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Butler, in Which McReynolds, J., Joined: Justice Butler dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the record did not support the claim of lack of counsel or ineffective assistance of counsel. Justice Butler wrote: "If there had been any lack of opportunity for preparation, trial counsel would have applied to the court for postponement. No such application was made. There was no suggestion, at the trial or in the motion for a new trial which they made, that Mr. Roddy or Mr. Moody was denied such opportunity or that they were not in fact fully prepared. The amended motion for new trial, by counsel who succeeded them, contains the first suggestion that defendants were denied counsel or opportunity to prepare for trial. But neither Mr. Roddy nor Mr. Moody has given any support to that claim. Their silence requires a finding that the claim is groundless for if it had any merit they would be bound to support it. And no one has come to suggest any lack of zeal or good faith on their part."

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide.

This case was significant because it marked the first time that the Court had enforced the Sixth Amendment right to counsel upon the States. The decision was limited, however, to appointment of counsel in capital cases. It was not until 1963 that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel was imposed upon States in non-capital cases. *See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Norris v. Alabama; Patterson v. Issue Presented: Whether it was error to permit psychiatrists to testify during the penalty phase that the defendant would be dangerous in the future.

Case Holding: It was error to permit psychiatrists to testify during the penalty phase that the defendant would be dangerous in the future when the manner in which the psychiatrists obtained information about the defendant violated his constitutional rights.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Powell, was charged with capital murder by the State of Texas. Prior to his trial, the court ordered that a psychiatric examination be conducted to determine his competency to stand trial. The defendant and his counsel were not notified that the defendant would be examined on the issue of future dangerousness and the defendant was not informed of his right to remain silent.

The guilt phase jury convicted the defendant of capital murder. During the penalty phase, the psychiatrists who examined the defendant were permitted to testify that he would commit future acts of violence that would constitute a continuing threat to society. The penalty phase jury sentenced the defendant to death. On appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, it rejected the defendant's claim that his constitutional rights were violated when the psychiatrists were allowed to testify on the issue of his future dangerousness. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The opinion held that the testimony of the psychiatrists during the penalty phase violated the defendant's constitutional rights. It was said that, under the Court's decisions in Estelle v. Smith and Satterwhite v. Texas, once a defendant is formally charged, the right to counsel precludes a psychiatric examination concerning future dangerousness without notice to counsel. Additionally, pursuant to Estelle, a capital defendant's constitutional right against compelled self-incrimination precludes subjecting a defendant to a psychiatric examination concerning future dangerousness without first informing the defendant of the right to remain silent and that anything the defendant says can be used against him or her at a sentencing proceeding. The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was reversed. See also Estelle v. Smith; Right to Counsel; Right to Remain Silent; Satterwhite v. Texas

Precedent see Binding Authority

Pre-Furman Capital Punishment The decision of the United States Supreme Court in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), placed a moratorium on a form of punishment that had its origins in the American colonies. The death penalty was commonly authorized for a wide variety of crimes in the American colonies prior to the Revolution.

The American colonies developed as an outgrowth of people migrating from England and other European nations. Virginia became the first colony when the first permanent English settlers arrived there in 1607. English settlers arrived to start the second colony in Massachusetts in 1620. By 1623, permanent settlements were made in New Hampshire. A year later, New York was founded by Dutch families. The fifth colony, Maryland, was settled in 1634. Connecticut followed in 1635 and Rhode Island in 1636. Swedes settled Delaware in 1638. New Jersey was established in 1664. Pennsylvania was settled by Quakers in 1681. North Carolina was settled in 1653 and South Carolina was carved out of it in 1670. (The Carolinas actually formed a single colony until 1730.) Georgia, the last of the thirteen colonies, was settled in 1733.

The colonies had from ten to eighteen capital offenses. In 1636, the Massachusetts Bay Colony listed thirteen crimes punishable by death. Most of the New England colonies held twelve offenses capital. Rhode Island, with ten capital crimes, had the least number of all of the colonies. Offenses punishable by death typically included murder, treason, piracy, arson, rape, robbery, burglary, and sodomy. Execution of criminals was carried out by such methods as drowning, stoning, hanging, and beheading.

In 1682, Pennsylvania, under William Penn, limited capital punishment to murder. Following Penn's death in 1718, however, Pennsylvania greatly expanded the number of capital offenses.

After the American Revolution, which was ended by the Treaty of Paris in 1783, the States uniformly followed the common law practice of making death the exclusive and mandatory sentence for certain specified offenses. Almost from the outset, juries in the new nation reacted unfavorably to the harshness of mandatory death sentences. The States initially responded to public dissatisfaction with mandatory death statutes by limiting the classes of capital offenses. This mild effort at reform did not prevent juries from refusing to convict defendants rather than subject them to automatic death sentences.

In 1794, Pennsylvania addressed the problem by confining the mandatory death penalty to murder of the first degree. Other jurisdictions followed and, within a generation, the practice spread to most of the States. Ultimately, however, the division of murder into degrees was not a satisfactory means of identifying defendants appropriately punishable with death.

The next step taken, first by Tennessee in 1838, was to grant juries sentencing discretion in capital cases. Tennessee's decision to abandon mandatory death sentences was followed by Alabama in 1841 and Louisiana in 1846. By the turn of the century, the federal government and twenty-three States had made death sentences discretionary for first-degree murder and other capital offenses. Fourteen additional States followed the trend by 1920. (In 1907, Kansas took the ultimate step and abolished capital punishment. Eight more states followed suit over the next ten years.) By 1963, all automatic death penalty statutes were replaced with discretionary jury sentencing.

EXECUTIONS IN THE U.S. 1930-1969

Providing jury discretion in the imposition of capital punishment did not resolve dissatisfaction with capital punishment. In the early years of the 1960s, death penalty opponents litigated in courts throughout the nation in an effort to halt capital punishment. The activities of death penalty opponents during that period led to an unofficial moratorium on executions, after Luis Jose Monge was executed in the gas chamber at Colorado State Penitentiary, on June 2, 1967.

The focus of discontent with capital punishment was threefold. Some people opposed the punishment because a disproportionate number of minorities were subjected to it. Other opponents found it unworkable because it was the poor in general who were subjected to the punishment. Finally, others were opposed to the punishment purely on the basis that it was a primitive and outmoded method of punishment.

The unofficial moratorium that was generated in 1967 became official on June 29, 1972, when the United States Supreme Court handed down its decision in Furman, which held that the procedures used to impose capital punishment violated the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause of the Eighth Amendment of the federal Constitution. See also Impact of the Furman Decision; Local Government Executions

Pregnant Aggravator Killing a woman who is pregnant is a statutory aggravating circumstance. Five capital punishment jurisdictions — Colorado, Delaware, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and Virginia — have made such conduct a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon killed a woman who was pregnant. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Preliminary Hearing The phrase “preliminary hearing” is typically used to describe any type of criminal hearing held before trial. However, the phrase has a technical meaning. In the strictest use of the phrase, a preliminary hearing refers to a specific hearing held to determine whether sufficient evidence exists to submit a case to the grand jury for indictment consideration.

In all grand jury jurisdictions, a preliminary hearing is usually presided over by a court of limited jurisdiction, such as a magistrate court. At the preliminary hearing, the magistrate must determine, without a jury, (1) whether there is probable cause to believe a felony crime was committed and (2) whether there is probable cause to believe that the named defendant committed the felony. If probable cause is found for both issues presented to the magistrate, the case is bound over to a court of general jurisdiction for the purpose of having a grand jury consider the matter. If the magistrate finds that probable cause is lacking for one or both of the dispositive issues, the charge must be dismissed.

During a preliminary hearing, a defendant has a right to be represented by counsel, to present evidence, and to cross-examine witnesses. Generally, trial court rules of evidence are relaxed at preliminary hearings.

Premeditation Aggravator Premeditated murder involves careful thought and planning in causing the intentional death of someone. A minority of jurisdictions have made evidence of premeditation a statutory aggravating circumstance that will permit the imposition of the death penalty. Those jurisdictions include Arizona, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, New Hampshire, and the federal government. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Preparation for Execution No single procedure is used by capital punishment jurisdictions in preparing a capital felon for execution, although similarities do exist for specific methods of execution. The protocols used by California, Arizona, Florida, Utah, and Washington in preparing an inmate for death are set out below.

California Lethal Injection Protocol

When Execution Order Is Received: As soon as the execution order is received, the condemned inmate is moved into a special security area of the prison. Based on hourly checks, staff document his/her behavior and bring anything unusual to the warden's attention.

The inmate receives priority visiting privileges; no visitors are turned away without authorization of the warden. Every effort is made to accommodate visits by the inmate's attorney including weekend or holiday visits if necessary.

Pre-Execution Reports: Two reports are prepared within three weeks of the established execution date. The first is 20 days before execution; the second is seven days before execution. Each report includes:

1. Psychiatric report — Results and interpretation of examinations, interviews and history of the inmate by three psychiatrists which will be used to determine the inmate's sanity.
2. Chaplain report — Comments on the inmate's spiritual and emotional well-being.
3. Summary of behavior — Observations noted by case worker and custody staff.
4. Cover letter from warden — Includes firsthand information from interviews, observations or communication with the inmate and his/her family or friends.

The seven-day pre-execution report discusses any changes that have occurred since the first report.

Sanity Review Requests: Within 30 to seven days before the execution, the inmate's attorney may submit current psychiatric information that may have a bearing on the sanity of the condemned inmate. This information will be provided to the panel of psychiatrists to consider in completion of the pre-execution psychiatric reports.

Last 24 Hours: During the day before the execution, the warden will make special arrangements for visits by approved family members, spiritual advisors, and friends.

About 6 P.M. the day before the execution, the inmate will be moved to the death watch cell which is adjacent to the execution chamber. From then on, a three-member staff unit will provide a constant death watch.

Soon after he is rehoused, the inmate will be served his last dinner meal. The prison makes every effort to provide the meal requested by the inmate.

Between 7 and 10 P.M., the inmate may be visited by the assigned state chaplain and the warden. The inmate may read, watch television, or play the radio. He can request special food items and coffee or soft drinks.

The family, spiritual advisors and friends the inmate has selected as witnesses may arrive up to two hours before the scheduled execution.

About 30 minutes before the scheduled execution, the inmate is given a new pair of denim trousers and blue work shirt to wear. He is escorted into the execution chamber a few minutes before the appointed time and is strapped onto a table.

The inmate is connected to a cardiac monitor which is connected to a printer outside the execution chamber. An IV is started in two usable veins and a flow of normal saline solution is administered at a slow rate. [One line is held in reserve in case of a blockage or malfunction in the other.] The door is closed. The warden issues the execution order.

The Execution: In advance of the execution, syringes containing the following are prepared: 5.0 grams of sodium pentothal in 20–25 cc of diluent; 50 cc of pancuronium bromide; 50 cc of potassium chloride. Each chemical is lethal in the amounts administered.

At the warden's signal, sodium pentothal is administered, then the line is flushed with sterile normal saline solution. This is followed by pancuronium bromide, a saline flush, and finally, potassium chloride. As required by the California Penal Code, a physician is present to declare when death occurs.

After all witnesses have left, the body is removed with dignity and care. Typically, the family claims the body. If not, the State makes the arrangements.

Arizona Lethal Gas Protocol

Receipt of Execution Warrant: When an inmate receives a Warrant of Execution, a schedule is developed for submission of related forms and inmate movement. From 24 to 48 hours prior to the scheduled execution, the inmate under a Warrant of Execution is transferred to the Death House.

Execution: One pound of sodium-cyanide is placed in a container underneath the gas chamber chair. The chair is made of perforated metal which allows the cyanide gas to pass through and fill the chamber. A bowl below the gas chamber contains sulfuric acid and distilled water. A lever is pulled and the sodium-cyanide falls into the solution, releasing the gas. It takes the prisoner several minutes to die. After the execution, the excess gas is released through an exhaust pipe which extends about 50 feet above Death House.

Florida Electric Chair Protocol

Testing the Chair: Prior to each execution, the execution equipment is tested. Additionally, testing of the execution equipment is performed a minimum of eight times each year. A "mock" execution is performed prior to each actual execution.

Selecting Executioner: Florida employs a single executioner. The executioner must exhibit a willingness to participate and must uphold the confidentiality of the execution proceedings. To select an executioner, the position is originally advertised in newspapers. Applications are taken and evaluated. Applicants are interviewed (but are not given a psychological evaluation). The Florida Department of Corrections does not report who conducts these interviews or evaluations or who selects the executioner, nor does the department report whether the executioner serves only for a single execution or serves until he resigns or is replaced. The executioner is compensated.

Execution Team: The execution team consists of administrative, maintenance, security, and medical staff who are selected by the superintendent of Florida State Prison. The superintendent is in charge of the team. The execution team members are not compensated for their services. Service on the team is voluntary for all members except for the superintendent and the medical executive director.

Phone Line Communication: At the direction of the superintendent, all calls are forwarded to the execution chamber from the Governor's office through a switchboard extension. Should institutional telephone lines fail at any time during the process, the switchboard operator immediately advises the Command Center, which is located within hearing range of the switchboard operator. Telephones in the execution chamber are checked. Staff also ensures that a fully charged cellular telephone is in the execution chamber. Sample telephone calls are placed to each telephone to ensure proper operation. The public address system is also checked to ensure its proper operation.

Staff establishes telephone communication with the Governor's office on behalf of the superintendent. This phone line remains open during the entire execution proceeding.

Execution Viewers: Official witnesses, who have reported to Florida State Prison's Administration Building, are greeted by two designated Department of Corrections' staff and, as a group, are escorted by the designated staff to the main entrance of Florida State Prison, cleared by security, and escorted to the staff dining room where they remain until escorted to the witness room of the execution chamber by the designated escort staff.

Authorized media witnesses are picked up at a designated media area at New River Correctional Institution by two designated Department of Corrections' escort staff, transported to the main entrance of Florida State Prison as a group, cleared by security, and escorted to the population visiting park where they remain until escorted to the witness room of the execution chamber by the designated escort staff.

Preparing Inmate: Staff at Florida State Prison supervises the shaving of the crown of the condemned offender's head and the offender's right leg from the knee to the ankle.

The offender is escorted to the shower area. Following the shower, the offender is returned to his assigned cell and issued underwear, a pair of trousers, a dress shirt or blouse (as appropriate) and socks. The offender wears no shoes. A suit coat is not worn by the offender during the execution but is placed on the offender's body after the execution proceedings.

Staff ensures that a salt-free, hypoallergenic, electrically-conductive gel is applied to the crown of the offender's shaven head and the calf of the offender's right leg in a total application of approximately 4 ounces.

Just prior to the execution, the superintendent reads the death warrant to the offender and the offender is allowed to make a last statement.

Staff applies restraints to the offender for escort into the execution chamber. Prior to the offender being escorted, security arrangements have been made for his movement from his Q-wing cell to the execution chamber in compliance with a schedule set by the superintendent. At the offender's request and subject to the approval of the superintendent or assistant superintendent, the chaplain may accompany the offender to the execution chamber. The time is recorded when the offender enters the chamber.

Execution: The offender enters the execution chamber and is placed in the electric chair. The chair is constructed of oak and is set on a rubber matting and bolted to a concrete floor. Lap, chest, arm, and forearm straps are secured. When the straps are secured, the restraints are removed and ankle straps are secured. A leg piece (anklet) is laced to the offender's right calf and a sponge and electrode is attached. Staff ensures that the sponge covers all areas of the electrode to prevent any contact of the electrode with the offender's skin, and also ensures that the sponge is sufficiently wet (slightly dripping). The headpiece is secured. The headgear consists of a metal headpiece covered with a leather hood which conceals the offender's face. The metal part of the headpiece consists of a copper wire mesh screen to which the electrode is brazened. A wet sponge is placed between the electrode and the offender's scalp. Excess saline solution from the sponge is dried with a clean towel. During the execution, two Department of Corrections' staff members are posted in the execution chamber to ensure that the offender is seated and that the electrocution equipment is properly connected.

A staff member then proceeds to the outside open telephone line to inquire of any possible stays of execution. If there are no stays, the execution proceeds.

The safety switch is closed. The circuit breaker is engaged. The execution control panel is activated. The executioner is signaled either verbally or by gesture to engage the execution switch and the automatic cycle begins. While the automatic cycle has five cycles only three cycles are used. The automatic cycle begins with the programmed 2,300 volts (9.5 amps) for eight seconds, followed by 1,000 volts (4 amps) for 22 seconds, followed by 2,300 volts (9.5 amps) for eight seconds. When the cycle is complete, the electrician indicates that the current is off. Equipment is disconnected. The manual circuit behind the chair is disengaged. The safety switch is opened. The time in which the execution switch is disengaged is recorded.

Two minutes after the electrical current ceases, the physician examines the offender's body for vital signs. The physician pronounces the offender's death and the time of death. The estimated average length of time that elapses from the time the offender is restrained to the time that death is determined is 10 minutes. The physician signs the death certificate, and the physician and physician's assistant ensure that the proper documents are recorded. If the offender is not pronounced dead, the execution cycle is then ordered to be repeated.

Post-Execution: The Governor is notified via the open phone line that the sentence has been carried out and that the offender has been pronounced dead. There is another announcement to the official witnesses and the media that the sentence has been carried out. Then, the witnesses and media are directed to exit the witness room. The official witnesses, except for the designated Inspector General (IG) witness, and the media pool is escorted from the witness room by designated Department of Corrections' escort staff. The designated IG witness remains in the witness room. After all other witnesses have exited the building, the IG designee is allowed entry into the execution chamber for evidence collection. The IG designee is authorized to collect both the head and leg sponges (which are placed in a plastic bag and securely sealed), inspect the execution equipment, make notes, and depart with these materials. If an unusual incident or problem should occur during an execution, the IG designee is also authorized to photograph the narrow and specific electrode contact points.

Staff coordinates the entry of hearse attendants for recovery of the offender's body. The offender is removed from the chair by the hearse attendants who are under supervision. The body is placed on a stretcher and then moved to a hallway outside the execution chamber. The executioner is compensated. A certification of death is obtained from the physician and is delivered to the hearse attendants prior to their departure.

As soon as possible after the execution proceeding, the superintendent forwards the death warrant to the Governor, indicating that the execution has been carried out and files a copy of the death warrant with the circuit court in which the condemned offender was convicted and sentenced to death. The correctional senior sentence specialist advises Central Records by teletype of the condemned offender's name and the date and time of death by execution.

Utah Firing Squad Protocol

Firing Squad Team: Prior to any execution, executioners, Death Watch teams, tie-down teams, and escorts are selected and trained and rehearsals are conducted.

The firing squad is composed of six members. One of these members is the squad leader. The members of the firing squad are certified police officers selected from a list supplied by a law enforcement agency and are selected by the executive director of the department or his designee. The weapons used are 30-30 caliber rifles. No special ammunition is used. The weapons are owned by the law enforcement agency where the squad member is employed and are serviced and maintained by that agency. Service on the firing squad is voluntary. The executive director and the warden are ultimately responsible for the execution team. The firing squad is compensated at the discretion of the executive director.

Execution: At the appropriate time, the condemned offender is led to the execution area or chamber, which is used for both lethal injection and firing squad executions. The offender is placed in a specially designed chair which has a pan beneath it to catch and conceal blood and other fluids. Restraints are applied to the offender's arms, legs, chest and head. A head restraint is applied loosely around the offender's neck to hold his neck and head in an upright position. The offender is dressed in a dark blue outfit with a white cloth circle attached by Velcro to the area over the offender's heart. Behind the offender are sandbags to absorb the volley and prevent ricochets. Dark sheets are draped over the sandbags.

When the offender is restrained, the warden asks the offender if he has any last statement to make. Following the offender's statement, a hood is placed over the offender's head. The warden leaves the room.

The firing squad members stand in the firing position. They support their rifles on the platform rests. With their rifle barrels in the firing ports, the team members sight through open sights on the white cloth circle on the offender's chest. On the command to fire, the squad fires simultaneously. One squad member has a blank charge in his weapon but no member knows which member is designated to receive this blank charge. Shortly after the shots are fired, death is determined. A physician and medical personnel from the Utah Department of Corrections stand right outside the execution area while the execution is taking place.

The estimated average length of time that elapses from the time that the offender is restrained to the time that death is determined is eight to ten minutes.

Washington Hanging Protocol

Execution Team: Washington does not have a designated "hangman" or executioner. The Superintendent will appoint and provide a briefing to those individuals selected to implement the execution. No individual is required to participate in any part of the execution procedure. One member of the execution team pushes the button that releases the trap door.

Equipment Preparation: Prior to the execution, the gallows area trap door and release mechanisms are inspected for proper operation, and a determination of the proper amount of the drop of the condemned offender through the trap door is calculated using a standard military execution chart for hanging. The rope, which is of manila hemp of at least three-quarters of an inch and not more than one-and-one-quarter inch in diameter and approximately 30 feet in length, is soaked and then stretched while drying to eliminate any spring, stiffness, or tendency to coil. The hangman's knot, which is tied pursuant to military regulations, is treated with wax, soap, or clear oil, to ensure that the rope slides smoothly through the knot. The end of the rope which does not contain the noose is tied to a grommet in the ceiling and then is tied off to a metal T-shaped bracket, which takes the force delivered by the offender's drop.

Examination of Inmate Prior to Execution: Prior to an execution, the condemned offender's file is reviewed to determine if there are any unusual characteristics the offender possesses that might warrant deviation from field instructions on hanging. If needed, a physical examination is conducted on the offender to determine if any special problems exist like obesity or deterioration of the bone or musculature structure that may effect the execution process. At this examination, the offender's height and weight are measured. Based upon this review of the offender's medical files and examination, the superintendent may consult with appropriate experts to determine whether deviation from policy is advisable to ensure a swift and humane death. For example, the offender may need a shoulder brace or have only one arm.

Execution: At the appropriate time on execution day, the condemned offender, in restraints, is escorted to the gallows area and is placed standing over a hinged trap door from which the offender will be dropped. Following the offender's last statement, a hood is placed over the offender's head. The hood is fashioned to have a rough outer surface of material and is split at the open end so that it comes well down over the offender's chest and back. Restraints are also applied. If the offender refuses to stand or cannot stand, he is placed on a collapse board. The noose is placed snugly around the offender's neck in such a manner that the knot is directly behind the offender's left ear.

Upon direction from the superintendent, a member of the execution team pushes a button that mechanically releases the trap door. The offender drops through the trap door. Escorts then move to the lower floor location to assist in the removal of the offender's body. After an appropriate time, the superintendent calls for the physician to make the pronouncement of death.

Pre-Sentence Report A pre-sentence report represents a descriptive history of a defendant who has been convicted of a crime. Pre-sentence reports are compiled by probation officers and submitted to trial judges for consideration prior to imposing sentence. The purpose of a pre-sentence report is to give a trial judge an individualized assessment of a defendant that includes a review of the defendant's family background and prior criminal history.

In the context of capital punishment, the United States Supreme Court has held that there is no federal constitutional right to have a pre-sentence report prepared in a capital prosecution. As a general rule, however, pre-sentence reports are prepared prior to the start of a capital penalty phase proceeding. Courts permit penalty phase juries to consider relevant mitigating and aggravating aspects of a pre-sentence report.

The United States Supreme Court had once held that a capital defendant did not have a constitutional right to see and contest information contained in a pre-sentence report that was considered in imposing a death sentence. However, the Court eventually reversed its position and has held that information in a pre-sentence report, to the extent it is relied upon to impose a sentence, must be seen by the defendant and an opportunity given to him or her to challenge information in the report. See also Williams v. New York

Issue Presented: Whether a sentence of death may be imposed under principles of felony murder when the underlying non-capital offense conviction is invalid.

Case Holding: The Due Process Clause prohibits imposition of a death sentence under a felony murder theory when the underlying non-capital offense conviction is invalid.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Presnell, was indicted by the State of Georgia on three counts of capital murder: (1) rape during the commission of murder; (2) kidnapping with bodily injury (aggravated sodomy) during the commission of murder; and (3) murder with malice aforethought. Only one victim was actually killed. During the guilt phase of the prosecution, the jury returned a verdict of guilty of all three capital murder charges.

At the penalty phase of the defendant's trial, the jury was instructed by the trial judge that it could impose the death penalty (1) for rape if that offense was committed while the defendant was engaged in the commission of murder, (2) for kidnapping with bodily injury (aggravated sodomy) if that offense was committed while the defendant was engaged in the commission of rape, or (3) for murder if that offense was committed while the defendant was engaged in the commission of kidnapping with bodily harm (aggravated sodomy). The jury found that all three offenses were committed during the commission of the specified additional offenses and it imposed three death sentences on the defendant.

On appeal, the Supreme Court of Georgia held that the first two death sentences imposed by the jury could not stand. Both sentences depended upon the defendant having committed forcible rape and the appellate court determined that the jury had not properly convicted the defendant of that offense. The appellate court affirmed the death sentence for murder committed during the commission of kidnapping with bodily harm (aggravated sodomy). The Supreme Court of Georgia rejected the defendant's contention that the sentence affirmed was unconstitutional because the underlying rape charge was invalid. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion held that the death sentence affirmed by the Supreme Court of Georgia violated principles of due process. It was said that a fundamental principle of due process is that a sentence of death cannot rest on an invalid underlying conviction. The Court found that the underlying conviction for kidnapping with bodily injury was not proven because the bodily injury (aggravated sodomy) element was not proven. Therefore the conviction and sentence of death were reversed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued a statement concurring in the Court's judgment and indicating that he believed the death penalty violated the Constitution per se.

Concurring Statement by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall issued a concurring statement indicating he joined the Court's judgment and pointed out that he believed that the death penalty in any proceeding was unconstitutional.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Powell, in Which Burger, CJ., and Rehnquist, J., Joined: Justice Powell issued a dissenting opinion: "If, as the per curiam opinion for the Court states, the Supreme Court of Georgia had found [the defendant] guilty of kidnapping with bodily injury in spite of a failure of the jury to return a proper guilty verdict for that crime, I would join this decision. My review of the record and the opinion of the Georgia court, however, has convinced me that [the defendant's] conviction for that crime might well have been upheld on the basis of the jury's proper verdict. Because the opinion of the Supreme Court of Georgia is fundamentally ambiguous on this point, I would remand the case for clarification rather than vacating [the defendant's] sentence of death. Accordingly, I dissent." See also Felony Murder Rule

Presumption of Innocence see Burden of Proof at Guilt Phase

Presumption of Innocence of Aggravators Capital felons have argued that they have a federal constitutional right to have trial courts instruct penalty phase juries that the law presumes a defendant is innocent of statutory aggravating circumstances and, consequently, the law presumes that the appropriate sentence for murder is punishment other than death. This contention has been uniformly rejected by courts considering the issue. Neither the federal Constitution nor any law imposes a presumption of innocence of statutory aggravating circumstances. Conversely, there is no presumption of guilt of any statutory aggravating circumstance. See also Aggravating Circumstances; Burden of Proof at Penalty Phase

Presumption That Death Is the Proper Sentence Capital felons have argued that death penalty statutes which provide that the trial court "shall impose" the death penalty if one or more aggravating circumstances are found and mitigating circumstances are held insufficient to call for leniency creates an unconstitutional presumption that death is the proper sentence. This argument has been rejected as an improper reading of the phrase "shall impose." It has been said that the phrase merely directs trial courts as to what they must do, if the evidence finds that a death sentence is appropriate. The phrase does not require trial courts presume that death is appropriate. Such a presumption would be unconstitutional if it was in fact required. See also Walton v. Arizona

Pre-trial Publicity The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees to the criminally accused a fair trial by a panel of impartial jurors. Under Anglo-American jurisprudence, there exists a presumption that a juror who has formed a pre-trial opinion about the outcome of a case cannot be impartial.

The biggest obstacle to impaneling an impartial jury is pre-trial publicity by the media. Unlike routine non-capital prosecutions, capital punishment prosecutions typically draw widespread pre-trial media coverage. Such coverage oftentimes makes it impossible for an impartial jury to be impaneled in the venue where the crime occurred. If it is determined before trial that media coverage of a crime was so extensive and prejudicial to the defendant that selecting an impartial jury is unlikely, the defendant is constitutionally entitled to have the trial venue changed. See also Buchalter v. New York; Darcy v. Handy; Due Process Clause; Irvin v. Dowd (II); Moore v. Dempsey; Mu'Min v. Virginia; Rideau v. Louisiana; Stroble v. California; Venue

Preventing Arrest Aggravator Conduct engaged in to prevent a person's arrest is a statutory aggravating circumstance when accompanied by murder. The majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made such conduct a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon committed murder while preventing his or her arrest. See also Aggravating Circumstances

NUMBER OF JURISDICTIONS USING PREVENTING ARREST AGGRAVATOR

Principal in the First Degree see Law of Parties

Principal in the Second Degree see Law of Parties

Prior Felony or Homicide Aggravator A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made the existence of a prior felony or homicide a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the death penalty may be imposed if it is found at the penalty phase that a defendant has a prior felony or homicide conviction.

Some courts have held that to be admissible during the penalty phase, a prior felony conviction judgment must have been entered against the capital defendant before the commission of the capital offense for which the death penalty is being sought. However, other courts have reasoned that contemporaneous convictions made prior to the capital sentencing phase may qualify as previous convictions in multiple victim prosecutions.

NUMBER OF JURISDICTIONS USING PRIOR FELONY OR HOMICIDE AGGRAVATOR

Courts restrict prosecutors to introducing only prior felony offenses during their penalty phase case-in-chief. Prosecutors may introduce evidence of prior non-felony convictions only as rebuttal evidence, if the capital felon opens the door to this by introducing evidence of good character or lack of a criminal history. Admissibility of evidence of prior convictions is limited to documents certifying the fact of a conviction, victim testimony or eyewitness testimony.

Evidence of unadjudicated conduct by the capital felon as an adult may be introduced in the prosecutor's penalty phase case-in-chief, only if the conduct involves violence against the victim. Unadjudicated conduct by a capital felon as a juvenile may only be introduced during the prosecutor's penalty phase case-in-chief, if the conduct involved a felonious crime of violence.

The factfinder at the penalty phase may not consider, as a statutory aggravator, a prior conviction that was unconstitutional and vacated. In order for a capital defendant to prevail on a claim that his or her death sentence was prejudicially based upon consideration of an unconstitutional prior conviction, he or she must show that the conviction was unconstitutional and that the punishment in the capital prosecution was enhanced in reliance upon the invalid conviction. See also Johnson v. Mississippi; Aggravating Circumstances

Prison Adjustment Mitigator Capital felons have contended that evidence which indicates they can adjust well to prison life is relevant and mitigating and, therefore, they should be allowed to present such evidence during the penalty phase. Courts directly addressing this issue have agreed with capital felons and permit the introduction of prison adjustment evidence as non-statutory mitigating evidence. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Prison Chaplain All capital punishment jurisdictions allow death row inmates to have access to spiritual advisors before execution. Although prison chaplains exist at all death penalty facilities, inmates may request that their own particular spiritual advisor speak with them before execution. See also Spiritual Advisor

Pro Bono Legal Service The federal Constitution does not require jurisdictions provide legal counsel for indigents beyond the initial appeal. If the initial appeal process is unfavorable to a defendant, any subsequent collateral attack on the judgment does not require appointment of counsel. Consequently, the vast majority of collateral attacks on judgments are made pro se, i.e., by inmates without legal counsel.

Frequently in capital punishment cases, attorneys will provide pro bono representation to death row inmates with legitimate grounds for collaterally attacking their judgment. Pro bono representation means that the attorney does not seek monetary compensation for his or her services.

Probation Sentence A sentence to probation is not an option in capital punishment law. No death penalty statute authorizes a sentencing court to consider probation for a defendant convicted of capital murder.

Procedural Default of Constitutional Claims Under the procedural default doctrine, a defendant may forfeit any alleged error in a prosecution by failing to present the issue to a court in the manner provided by general criminal procedural rules. It is said that the procedural default doctrine protects the integrity of the criminal justice system by imposing a forfeiture sanction for failure to follow applicable procedural rules, thereby deterring defendants from deviating from the jurisdiction's scheme.

The procedural default doctrine can be used to prevent a capital felon convicted in a State court from raising a federal constitutional claim in a federal court. That is, if a capital felon does not follow the procedures for presenting alleged constitutional errors to the attention of a State court, a federal court may employ the procedural default doctrine to preclude raising the issues in federal court.

Federal courts may not review federal habeas corpus claims that were defaulted on by a defendant in a State habeas corpus proceeding, unless the defendant can demonstrate (1) cause for the default; (2) actual prejudice as a result of the alleged violation of federal law; (3) that failure to consider the claims will result in a fundamental miscarriage of justice; or (4) that in light of new evidence, it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have found the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

Although a tactical or intentional decision to forgo a procedural opportunity in State court normally cannot constitute cause to excuse a default on a claim, the failure of counsel to raise a constitutional issue reasonably unknown to him or her is a situation in which the "cause for the default" requirement is met. Establishing that the factual or legal basis for a claim was not reasonably available to counsel or that some interference by public officials made compliance impracticable constitutes cause for the default. See also Actual Innocence Claim; Amadeo v. Issue Presented: Whether the imposition of the sentence of death for the crime of murder under the law of Florida violates the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Case Holding: The imposition of the sentence of death for the crime of murder under the law of Florida does not violate Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Charles William Proffitt, was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to death for first-degree murder by the State of Florida. The conviction and sentence was under a new death penalty statute enacted by Florida, in response to the decision in Furman v. Georgia, which had the effect of invalidating all capital punishment statutes in the nation.

Under Florida's new death penalty statute, if a defendant was found guilty of a capital offense, a separate evidentiary penalty phase hearing was held before the trial judge and jury to determine the sentence. At the penalty phase, the prosecution had to establish the existence of at least one statutory aggravating circumstance. The defense could present evidence in mitigation of the death penalty. The jury's verdict was determined by majority vote. However, it was only advisory. The actual sentence was determined by the trial judge. The new statute directed the trial judge to weigh the statutory aggravating and mitigating circumstances in determining the sentence to be imposed on a defendant. The new statute required that if the trial court imposed a sentence of death, it must set forth in writing its findings upon which the sentence of death was based as to the facts. The statute provided for automatic review by the Florida Supreme Court in all cases in which a death sentence had been imposed.

The defendant's conviction and death sentence were affirmed by the Florida Supreme Court. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that Florida's new death penalty statute was unconstitutional. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the constitutionality of Florida's new death penalty statute.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Powell Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Stewart and Stevens JJ.,

Joined: Justice Powell made clear at the outset that imposition of the death penalty was not per se cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The opinion then examined the procedures of Florida's new death penalty statute. Justice Powell wrote:

On the face these procedures ... appear to meet the constitutional deficiencies identified in Furman. The sentencing authority in Florida, the trial judge, is directed to weigh ... aggravating factors against ... mitigating factors to determine whether the death penalty shall be imposed. This determination requires the trial judge to focus on the circumstances of the crime and the character of the individual defendant. He must, inter alia, consider whether the defendant has a prior criminal record, whether the defendant acted under duress or under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance, whether the defendant's role in the crime was that of a minor accomplice, and whether the defendant's youth argues in favor of a more lenient sentence than might otherwise be imposed. The trial judge must also determine whether the crime was committed in the course of one of several enumerated felonies, whether it was committed for pecuniary gain, whether it was committed to assist in an escape from custody or to prevent a lawful arrest, and whether the crime was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel. To answer these questions ... the sentencing judge must focus on the individual circumstances of each homicide and each defendant.

In view of the procedures outlined in Florida's new death penalty statute, Justice Powell concluded: "Florida ... has responded to Furman by enacting legislation that passes constitutional muster. That legislation provides that after a person is convicted of first-degree murder, there shall be an informed, focused, guided, and objective inquiry into the question whether he should be sentenced to death. If a death sentence is imposed, the sentencing authority articulates in writing the statutory reasons that led to its decision. Those reasons, and the evidence supporting them, are conscientiously reviewed by a court which, because of its statewide jurisdiction, can assure consistency, fairness, and rationality in the evenhanded operation of the state law.... [T]his system serves to assure that sentences of death will not be 'wanton' or 'freakishly' imposed." The opinion affirmed the judgment of the Florida Supreme Court.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White, in Which Burger, CJ., and Rehnquist, J., Joined: Justice White wrote succinctly in his concurrence: "Under Florida law, the sentencing judge is required to impose the death penalty on all first-degree murderers as to whom the statutory aggravating factors outweigh the mitigating factors. There is good reason to anticipate, then, that as to certain categories of murderers, the penalty will not be imposed freakishly or rarely but will be imposed with regularity; and consequently it cannot be said that the death penalty in Florida as to those categories has ceased 'to be a credible deterrent or measurably to contribute to any other end of punishment in the criminal justice system.'"

Concurring Statement by Justice Blackmun: The concurring statement issued by Justice Blackmun read: "I concur in the judgment."

Dissenting Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued a statement referencing to his dissent in Gregg v. Georgia as the basis for his dissent in this case.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall issued a statement referencing to his dissent in Gregg v. Georgia as the basis for his dissent in this case.

Case Note: The decision in this case was significant because it was one of three decisions rendered by the Court in 1976, which had the effect of lifting the moratorium placed on capital punishment in the United States by the 1972 decision in Furman v. Georgia. See also Gregg v. Georgia; Jurek v. Texas

Prosecution by Information An "information" is a criminal-charging document that is drafted by a prosecutor and used to prosecute defendants. The use of an information came about as an alternative to the grand jury indictment. The United States Supreme Court has held that use of an information by States to prosecute capital offenders does not violate the federal Constitution. The federal Constitution does, however, require federal prosecutions of felony offenses be done by grand jury indictment. See also Grand Jury; Hurtado v. California; Lem Woon v. Oregon

Prosecutor The legal system in the United States may be divided into two broad categories: civil and criminal. In civil litigation, individual citizens hire private attorneys to represent their interests. In criminal litigation, a defendant has a constitutional right to be represented by private counsel (appointed or retained). However, the victim of a crime does not have a constitutional right to have a private attorney prosecute his or her case against a defendant. In criminal prosecutions, government attorneys called prosecutors represent the interests of a crime victim.

Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the primary criticism facing prosecutors involves the broad discretion they have in prosecuting capital cases. A proper understanding of prosecutorial discretion in Anglo-American jurisprudence begins with its origin on the shores of England.

The Prosecutor Under Common Law: The English Crown made criminal prosecution an unregulated for-profit business. All crimes in England were punishable by fines and physical forms of punishment. Under the common law, a fine included cash, as well as other personal and real property. Depending upon the nature of the offense, a convicted defendant's land could be confiscated by the Crown, as well as everything else he or she may have owned.

Although the English Parliament existed during the common-law era, the Crown was the true sovereign authority. As the sovereign authority, it was the duty and responsibility of the Crown to maintain the peace and enforce the laws of the realm. This duty and responsibility meant apprehending and prosecuting lawbreakers. The Crown delegated, in large part, both its arrest and prosecution duties to the general public. In other words, both the Crown and common citizens carried out criminal prosecutorial duties.

Prosecution by the Crown. The English Crown employed numerous legal advisors. Some of the legal offices created by the Crown included (1) king's advocate general, (2) king's attorney general, (3) king's solicitor general, and (4) king's serjeants. Legal advisors employed by the Crown enjoyed the benefits of the inherent prerogative of the Crown, due to their association with the Crown. This meant that, in practice, legal advisors of the Crown were viewed literally as being above all other attorneys and treated with absolute deference in courts of law. One scholar has said that the Crown's attorney did not represent the Crown in court because the Crown was theoretically always present. The attorney merely followed a case on behalf of the Crown. This framework of absolute deference to the Crown's attorneys laid the seeds of prosecutorial discretion that is present in Anglo-American jurisprudence today.

In fulfilling its duty of prosecuting criminal offenders, the Crown relied primarily upon its attorney general, though king's sergeants were known to have played a minor role in this area of litigation as well. The Crown's attorney general did not prosecute all crimes, although it had the authority to do so. Instead, the attorney general limited its attention to major felony crimes like treason, murder, outlawry, and robbery. The crime of murder and treason were of particular interest to the Crown because the real property of defendants convicted of either offense escheated to the Crown. Enormous fines were appended to other major felony offenses.

The fact that the attorney general selected the cases it would prosecute (those bringing the greatest bounty to the Crown) was a prerogative act of discretion that could not be challenged by the courts or anyone else, save the Crown itself. The attorney general represented the Crown and, as observed in Skinner v. Dostert, 278 S.E.2d 624 (W.Va. 1981), "[i]f the agent of the sovereign desired that a prosecution should [not occur], that was the end of the matter. The public subjects had no interest and could not be heard to complain."

Additionally, if the attorney general began a prosecution and decided it did not wish to proceed further or, if the prosecution was begun by a private citizen and the attorney general desired to terminate the action, it could do so by filing a nolle prosequi. It was noted by the court in Skinner that the nolle prosequi was "a statement by the [attorney general] that he would proceed no further in a criminal case.... The discretion to discontinue prosecution rested solely with the [attorney general] and it was unnecessary to obtain the permission of the court to give legal effect to this decision."

The underlying justification for permitting the attorney general to have absolute discretion in determining the fate of a prosecution anchored itself to the fact that the Crown, as sovereign authority, was theoretically the only party interested in the prosecution.

Prosecution by citizens. Under the common law, all citizens were permitted to prosecute criminal offenders in the name of the Crown. This privilege was monstrously abused because of the benefits that could be reaped by successful prosecutions. A citizen bringing a successful criminal prosecution could share in the proceeds of the invariably imposed fine.

Private prosecutors were also able to take advantage monetarily of the common law's rule that an acquittal could be appealed (rejected by Anglo-American jurisprudence). A defendant, acquitted of a crime, could be confined in jail pending an appeal of the acquittal. This situation usually resulted in the defendant entering a settlement agreement with the private prosecutor. The private prosecutor would agree to forego an appeal in exchange for a monetary payment by the defendant.

Evolution of the Public Prosecutor in America: The common law did not have a public prosecutor, as that term is understood today. Instead, the common law tolerated gross selective prosecution by the Crown's attorney general and wholesale prosecution by private citizens. Unfortunately, this chaotic method of prosecuting criminals was transplanted to the American colonies.

Fortunately, however, another method of prosecuting criminal defendants also took root in North America. This second method came not from England and the common law. When the Dutch founded the colony of New Netherland during the seventeenth century, they brought with them their system of prosecuting criminal defendants. A review of both methods of prosecution follows.

Common law prosecution in the colonies. The Crown appointed an attorney general in all of the colonies. The first appointment was made in Virginia in 1643. The primary task of colonial attorneys general was to promote and protect the financial interests of the Crown. This meant that the bulk of the legal work performed by the colonial attorneys general was civil in nature.

Colonial attorneys general were also responsible for prosecuting criminal defendants. However, this duty was neglected. Rarely did colonial attorneys general prosecute criminal defendants. They intervened in this area only when a notorious major felony occurred. A routine murder was not considered notorious unless it affected a colonial aristocrat.

The attitude of colonial attorneys general was the same as their brethren in England; i.e., if the Crown did not obtain a substantial benefit from criminal prosecutions, there would be no prosecution by the sovereign authority whose duty it was to prosecute all crimes. Colonial judges did not challenge the discretion exercised by colonial attorneys general.

Two factors caused colonial judges to defer to the prosecutorial discretion of colonial attorneys general. First, the judges followed the legal principles of the common law. Under the common law, it was held that the Crown's prosecutors had absolute discretion in deciding what course, if any, to take regarding a criminal offense. This common-law principle was echoed in modern times in the case of Newman v. United States, 382 F.2d 479 (D.C. Cir. 1967): "Few subjects are less adapted to judicial review than the exercise by the [prosecutor] of his discretion in deciding when and whether to institute criminal proceedings, or what precise charge shall be made, or whether to dismiss a proceeding once brought."

The Crown was the second factor which caused colonial judges to bow to the whim of colonial attorneys general. Colonial attorneys general were not ordinary attorneys. The Crown's prerogative was vested in colonial attorneys general when they carried out their legal duties. No colonial judge could muster the death-certain courage to tell the Crown when it should prosecute a criminal case.

The fact that colonial attorneys general rarely prosecuted criminal defendants did not mean that vigorous criminal prosecutions were nonexistent in the colonies. Crime was routinely prosecuted. The citizens of the colonies prosecuted the vast majority of crimes.

The chaotic private prosecutorial method that existed in England was allowed to flourish in the colonies. The inducement used to encourage colonists to prosecute criminals was the same carrot used in England. Private prosecutors reaped monetary rewards for successfully prosecuting criminals. They also reaped rewards by intimidating defendants into settling criminal charges, prior to trial, by paying them monetary sums.

Criminal prosecution in New Netherland. The Dutch ventured to North America and settled a colony in the seventeenth century. They called their colony New Netherland (comprised of parts of Delaware, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut). As would be expected, Dutch colonists brought with them the Dutch culture, social norms, and systems of government.

One aspect of the Dutch system of government brought with the colonists had a profound effect on Anglo-American jurisprudence. The legal system of the Dutch had an office called the schout. Although legal scholars rarely acknowledge the point, it was the principles undergirding the office of schout which shaped the prosecutorial system that America eventually adopted and utilizes to this day.

The schout was a public prosecutor. Unlike the chaotic system of prosecution tolerated by the common law, Dutch law entrusted the task of prosecuting criminals in a single office — the office of schout. Dutch colonists did not haul their neighbors into criminal courts on real or monetarily imagined charges. If a criminal offense occurred, the office of schout prosecuted the crime.

When the English eventually took New Netherland from the Dutch, the term schout was buried. However, the idea of entrusting a public prosecutor with the responsibility for prosecuting all crimes took root and blossomed in America. The public prosecutor of today is a distant cousin of the common law and the first cousin of the schout.

Modern Day Public Prosecutor: The nation's prosecutorial system is a hybrid of the common law and the schout. When the American colonists threw off the yoke of the Crown, they also tossed out the common law's ad hoc approach to prosecuting criminal defendants. The nation unanimously moved in the direction of imposing the duty of prosecuting criminal defendants upon individual governments. Neither the nation nor its legal system was prepared to continue depending upon private citizens to prosecute criminals. Crime would be prosecuted, but it would be under the schout model.

Steven D. Stewart is the prosecutor for Clark County, Indiana. His office has prosecuted several capital cases during his tenure in office. (Clark County Prosecutor)

Today, all jurisdictions have schouts, though they go by various names: district attorney, county prosecutor, state attorney, attorney general, or public prosecutor. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide for the election of prosecutors on a local, usually county, level.

Although Anglo-American jurisprudence rejected the common law's method of prosecuting crimes, the judiciary continues to adhere to the common-law principle that a prosecutor has broad discretion regarding the disposition of criminal cases. Although the nation is not governed by a Crown, the judiciary continues to allow prosecutors to have almost unassailable prosecutorial power and authority.

JURISDICTIONS THAT PROVIDE FOR POPULAR ELECTION OF CRIMINAL PROSECUTORS

The Powell propositions. In the case of Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598 (1985), Justice Powell articulated the modern-day justification for adhering to the common law's deference to prosecutors. Justice Powell reasoned as follows:

This broad discretion rests largely on the recognition that the decision to prosecute is particularly ill-suited to judicial review. Such factors as the strength of the case, the prosecution's general deterrence value, the Government's enforcement priorities, and the case's relationship to the Government's overall enforcement plan are not readily susceptible to the kind of analysis the courts are competent to undertake. Judicial supervision in this area, moreover, entails systemic costs of particular concern. Examining the basis of a prosecution delays the criminal proceeding, threatens to chill law enforcement by subjecting the prosecutor's motives and decisionmaking to outside inquiry, and may undermine prosecutorial effectiveness by revealing the Government's enforcement policy. All these are substantial concerns that make the courts properly hesitant to examine the decision whether to prosecute.

Justice Powell offered five propositions for the modern-day deference to prosecutors: (1) inability to systematically analyze the prosecutor's decision-making process; (2) oversight that would be too costly; (3) wholesale review that would clog up the system; (4) oversight that would discourage prosecutions; and (5) oversight that could make public otherwise hidden agendas.

The concerns expressed in the Powell propositions have merit. However, numerous commentators challenge the Powell propositions and the unbridled prosecutorial discretion they permit. At the core of arguments taken against deference to prosecutorial discretion stands one idea: prosecutors frequently abuse their discretion.

Death penalty charging discretion. The determination of whether to charge a person with a capital offense rests with the prosecutor. The power vested in the prosecutor is almost without limit.

Traditionally, the determination of what penalty a convicted defendant will receive is made by the presiding judge, based upon the penalty range provided by statute. For example, if a prosecutor obtains a conviction for rape and the penalty for the offense is five to fifteen years' imprisonment, the prosecutor cannot absolve the defendant from being subject to this penalty. At most, a prosecutor may recommend to the trial judge that the de-defendant receive probation or some other disposition. The court can accept or reject the recommendation. In other words, once a prosecutor charges a defendant with a crime, the penalty automatically attaches and the prosecutor cannot, sua sponte, remove the defendant from exposure to the penalty (short of dismissing the charge).

Tradition is abandoned, however, in capital murder prosecutions. In this context the prosecutor can invade the traditionally exclusive domain of the trial judge. All capital punishment jurisdictions give prosecutors statutory discretion to waive the death penalty, sua sponte, for any death-eligible offense. It was said in People ex rel. Carey v. Cousins, 397 N.E.2d 809 (Ill. 1979), that the exercise of this discretion does not violate “the separation of powers provision of [federal or state constitutions], in that the prosecutor is given power to exercise a part of the sentencing process, which should properly be a judicial function.”

The fact that a prosecutor waives or gives up the right to seek the death penalty in a case does not mean that the case will not be prosecuted. The prosecution continues, but the maximum penalty a defendant would face upon conviction would be life imprisonment.

Capital felons consistently challenge death sentences on the grounds that the statutes under which they were convicted and sentenced gave unbridled discretion to prosecutors to seek or deny invoking death penalty provisions. This argument has never found a prevailing ear. In the case of McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279 (1987), the United States Supreme Court held that the federal Constitution does not mandate guidelines for prosecutors in administering the death penalty statutes.

Absent a showing of arbitrary and invidious discrimination, prosecutors have tremendous latitude when selecting those eligible cases in which the death penalty will actually be sought. That is, the decision to prosecute capitally cannot be intentionally based upon race, religion, gender, social status, or any other arbitrary classification. Prosecutors are also prohibited from basing the decision to prosecute capitally on a defendant’s exercise of his or her statutory or constitutional rights.

Prosecutors are not required by the federal Constitution to give reasons why they are seeking the death penalty. Political motivation is not per se a legal basis for challenging the propriety of a prosecutor’s determination to seek the death penalty. Rather, the preeminent concern is whether a prosecutor has substantial evidence of statutory aggravating circumstances that would qualify a defendant for the death penalty. Courts have held that prosecutors may consider the wishes of a victim’s family in deciding whether to seek the death penalty. See also McCleskey v. Kemp; Notice of Intent to Seek Death Penalty

Prosecutor Aggravator A large minority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide that the killing of a prosecutor is a statutory aggravating circumstance. In such jurisdictions, if it is shown at the penalty phase that the victim was a prosecutor killed because of his or her public work, the death penalty may be imposed. See also Aggravating Circumstances (See chart at top of column 2.)

Protests Against Capital Punishment Thousands of national and international organizations have spoken out against capital punishment in the United States and are actively seeking to abolish the punishment. Organized public opposition to the death penalty has been largely without incident. Peaceful demonstrations have been ongoing outside of prisons, state capitals, and the United States Supreme Court. Organized protests have involved candlelight vigils in front of prisons on the day of a scheduled execution. On rare occasions, the police have been summoned to escort away a few overly aggressive demonstrators. Actual violence by organization members has not been reported.

One of the most intimidating death penalty protests occurred in February 2000. This protest involved only two Texas death row inmates. The two inmates captured a female correctional officer and held her hostage. This incident was triggered by the inmates as a form of protest over the living conditions of death row. After less than twenty-four hours, the two inmates released the correction officer unharmed and without any concessions being made by authorities. See also Opposition to Capital Punishment

Protocol No. 6 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms The Council of Europe (not the same as European Union) adopted Protocol No. 6 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms on April 28, 1983. Protocol No. 6 requires states to abolish the death penalty, except in time of war. The text of the protocol is set out below.

Article 1—Abolition of the death penalty: The death penalty shall be abolished. No one shall be condemned to such penalty or executed.

Article 2—Death penalty in time of war: A State may make provision in its law for the death penalty in respect of acts committed in time of war or of imminent threat of war; such penalty shall be applied only in the instances laid down in the law and in accordance with its provisions. The State shall communicate to the Secretary General of the Council of Europe the relevant provisions of that law.

Article 3—Prohibition of derogations: No derogation from the provisions of this Protocol shall be made under Article 15 of the Convention.

Article 4—Prohibition of reservations: No reservation may be made under Article 57 of the Convention in respect of the provisions of this Protocol.

Article 5—Territorial application:

1. Any State may at the time of signature or when deposit-ing its instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval, specify the territory or territories to which this Protocol shall apply.

2. Any State may at any later date, by a declaration addressed to the Secretary General of the Council of Europe, extend the application of this Protocol to any other territory specified in the declaration. In respect of such territory the Protocol shall enter into force on the first day of the month following the date of receipt of such declaration by the Secretary General.

3. Any declaration made under the two preceding paragraphs may, in respect of any territory specified in such declaration, be withdrawn by a notification addressed to the Secretary General. The withdrawal shall become effective on the first day of the month following the date of receipt of such notification by the Secretary General.

Article 6—Relationship to the Convention: As between the States Parties the provisions of Articles 1 to 5 of this Protocol shall be regarded as additional articles to the Convention and all the provisions of the Convention shall apply accordingly.

Article 7—Signature and ratification: The Protocol shall be open for signature by the member States of the Council of Europe, signatories to the Convention. It shall be subject to ratification, acceptance or approval. A member State of the Council of Europe may not ratify, accept or approve this Protocol unless it has, simultaneously or previously, ratified the Convention. Instruments of ratification, acceptance or approval shall be deposited with the Secretary General of the Council of Europe.

Article 8—Entry into force:

1. This Protocol shall enter into force on the first day of the month following the date on which five member States of the Council of Europe have expressed their consent to be bound by the Protocol in accordance with the provisions of Article 7.

2. In respect of any member State which subsequently expresses its consent to be bound by it, the Protocol shall enter into force on the first day of the month following the date of the deposit of the instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval.

Article 9—Depositary functions: The Secretary General of the Council of Europe shall notify the member States of the Council of:

- a. Any signature;
- b. The deposit of any instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval;
- c. Any date of entry into force of this Protocol in accordance with Articles 5 and 8;
- d. Any other act, notification or communication relating to this Protocol.

Protocol No. 13 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms

The Council of Europe (not the same as European Union) adopted Protocol No. 13 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms on May 5, 2002. Protocol No. 13 requires states to abolish the death penalty under all circumstances. The text of the protocol is set out below.

Article 1—Abolition of the death penalty: The death penalty shall be abolished. No one shall be condemned to such penalty or executed.

Article 2—Prohibition of derogations: No derogation from the provisions of this Protocol shall be made under Article 15 of the Convention.

Article 3—Prohibition of reservations: No reservation may be made under Article 57 of the Convention in respect of the provisions of this Protocol.

Article 4—Territorial application: 1. Any State may, at the time of signature or when depositing its instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval, specify the territory or territories to which this Protocol shall apply. 2. Any State may at any later date, by a declaration addressed to the Secretary General of the Council of Europe, extend the application of this Protocol to any other territory specified in the declaration. In respect of such territory the Protocol shall enter into force on the first day of the month following the expiration of a period of three months after the date of receipt of such declaration by the Secretary General. 3. Any declaration made under the two preceding paragraphs may, in respect of any territory specified in such declaration, be withdrawn or modified by a notification addressed to the Secretary General. The withdrawal or modification shall become effective on the first day of the month following the expiration of a period of three months after the date of receipt of such notification by the Secretary General.

Article 5—Relationship to the Convention: As between the States Parties the provisions of Articles 1 to 4 of this Protocol shall be regarded as additional articles to the Convention, and all the provisions of the Convention shall apply accordingly.

Article 6—Signature and ratification: This Protocol shall be open for signature by member States of the Council of Europe which have signed the Convention. It is subject to ratification, acceptance or approval. A member State of the Council of Europe may not ratify, accept or approve this Protocol without previously or simultaneously ratifying the Convention. Instruments of ratification, acceptance or approval shall be deposited with the Secretary General of the Council of Europe.

Article 7—Entry into force: 1. This Protocol shall enter into force on the first day of the month following the expiration of a period of three months after the date on which ten member States of the Council of Europe have expressed their consent to be bound by the Protocol in accordance with the provisions of Article 6. 2. In respect of any member State which subsequently expresses its consent to be bound by it, the Protocol shall enter into force on the first day of the month following the expiration of a period of three months after the date of the deposit of the instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval.

Article 8—Depositary functions: The Secretary General of the Council of Europe shall notify all the member States of the Council of Europe of:

- a. Any signature;
- b. The deposit of any instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval;
- c. Any date of entry into force of this Protocol in accordance with Articles 4 and 7;
- d. Any other act, notification or communication relating to this Protocol.

Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty

The General Assembly of the Organization of American States adopted the Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty on June 8, 1990. This protocol requires abolishment of capital punishment by all nations. The protocol has been ratified by eight nations. The text of the protocol is set out below.

Article 1: The States Parties to this Protocol shall not apply the death penalty in their territory to any person subject to their jurisdiction.

Article 2: 1. No reservations may be made to this Protocol. However, at the time of ratification or accession, the States Parties to this instrument may declare that they reserve the right to apply the death penalty in wartime in accordance with international law, for extremely serious crimes of a military nature. 2. The State Party making this reservation shall, upon ratification or accession, inform the Secretary General of the Organization of American States of the pertinent provisions of its national legislation applicable in wartime, as referred to in the preceding paragraph. 3. Said State Party shall notify the Secretary General of the Organization of American States of the beginning or end of any state of war in effect in its territory.

Article 3: 1. This Protocol shall be open for signature and ratification or accession by any State Party to the American Convention on Human Rights. 2. Ratification of this Protocol or accession thereto shall be made through the deposit of an instrument of ratification or accession with the General Secretariat of the Organization of American States.

Article 4: This Protocol shall enter into force among the States that ratify or accede to it when they deposit their respective instruments of ratification or accession with the General Secretariat of the Organization of American States.

Public Trial Under Sixth Amendment of the federal Constitution, criminal defendants have a right to a “public trial.” The constitutional right to a public trial seeks to prevent secretive prosecutions of citizens. Governments must prosecute criminal defendants in open court where the public may attend. However, qualifications exist to the right to a public trial. For example, courtrooms are limited in size so that only a fraction of a community may actually be able to attend a trial.

Although television cameras have the capacity to bring criminal trials into everyone’s home, the right to a public trial does not extend to the right of the media to bring cameras into a courtroom. Trial courts have discretion to bar cameras from court proceedings. See also Bill of Rights

Public Viewing of Execution All capital punishment jurisdictions impose restrictions on who may actually witness or view an execution. As outlined by the material under this heading, nonpublic executions were not always the norm in the nation.

Origin of Public Executions: The common law tolerated, for reasons that are forthcoming, having capital felons executed in full view of the public. Attending an execution was a routine part of life in England under the common law. People gathered, much as they gather today at sporting events, sometimes with joy and enthusiasm, to watch the condemned be put to death.

Anglo-American jurisprudence embraced England’s practice of inviting the public to watch capital felons die. Public executions were an integral part of the early development of America. Prior to the 1830s, all capital punishments in the United States were open to the public.

Neither England nor the United States permitted public executions for the sake of entertaining citizens. Two fundamental reasons guided the decision to allow the public to observe capital felons being put to death. One reason was aimed at the capital felon and the other was centered on the public.

The first justification for holding public executions involved the dehumanization of the capital felon. Capital crimes were offenses that society deemed unforgivable. Due to the perceived reprehensible nature of capital crimes, it was felt necessary to humiliate and degrade a capital offender by parading him or her in front of the public before, during, and after execution. Whether or not a capital felon felt humiliated and degraded — as opposed to feeling terrified — is an issue for psychologists to digest. Penologists believed capital felons felt dehumanized by being brought before the public for execution.

The second justification for holding public executions was grounded in the deterrent principle underpinning criminal punishment in general. It was thought that exposing the public to executions would deter others from committing, at minimum, capital crimes.

Movement Away from Public Executions: New York is historically credited with being the first jurisdiction to permit nonpublic executions. It did so by enacting a statute in 1835, which allowed the sheriff to hold executions out of public view. (Some revisionists have credited Pennsylvania with enacting a similar statute in 1834.) Without realizing it, New York set in motion a penological reform movement that eventually engulfed the nation.

The New York statute was heralded as representing the evolving decency of society. Public executions were symbolic of a crude and unsophisticated society. Such a spectacle dehumanized not only the capital felon, but it took away the humanity of those observing. In slow but steady fashion, the notion of evolving decency moved across the nation and jurisdictions began enacting statutes which took away the public’s ability to view executions. The force of this movement touched down in England where, in 1868, that nation abolished the practice of holding public executions.

The theme of evolving decency came full circle in 1936. It was in 1936 that the last public execution occurred in the United States (though some revisionists have suggested a later date). This execution took place in Owensboro, Kentucky. It was recorded that between ten and twenty thousand people came out to see the State of Kentucky hang twenty-two-year-old Ramsey Bethea.

Judicial Challenges to Nonpublic Executions: Removal of executions from the public’s eye has not gone unchallenged. Numerous attacks, cloaked in diverse motives, have been made to remove secrecy from executions. Some of the legal battles waged to reopen executions to the public are discussed below.

The Right of the Capital Felon and the Public. Penologists believe that public executions humiliate and degrade capital felons. This belief is difficult to digest when capital felons demand to have public executions. The first challenge to nonpublic executions came in 1890 and was made by a capital felon.

The United States Supreme Court picked up this challenge in the case of Holden v. Minnesota, 137 U.S. 483 (1890). The defendant in Holden had been sentenced to death for committing capital murder. At the time of his offense, Minnesota permitted public executions (Minnesota currently does not allow capital punishment). However, shortly before his scheduled execution, the state changed the law so that executions could no longer be held in public. The defendant argued that the change in law should not affect him because at the time of his offense executions were public. The defendant contended that the Constitution's ban on ex post facto laws prohibited the new law from applying to him. The Supreme Court rejected the defendant's position and held that executions may be held out of public view. The decision in Holden has stood the test of time in championing the proposition that the general public does not have a right to attend an execution.

The Media's Right to Film Executions. The First Amendment is a powerful constitutional provision. In crystal clear words, this amendment heralds the independence of the press (media) by proclaiming that governments cannot abridge the freedom of the press. Upon first impression, it would seem that governments cannot bar the media from filming or photographing executions. This first impression has met a sad fate in judicial decisions.

In 1990, California was preparing to execute its first capital felon in twenty-three years. The recipient of this dubious distinction was named Robert Alton Harris. A local San Francisco television station, KQED, wanted to film the execution for posterity. The station approached California officials with a request to record the execution, but was turned down. Unperturbed, the station filed an equity proceeding, styled KQED v. Vasquez, No. C-90-1383 (N.D.Cal. August 6, 1991), in a federal district court, seeking to force California to allow it to film Harris's execution. The district court rebuffed the station and held that the state of California could constitutionally exclude cameras from its execution chamber.

In the case of Halquist v. Dept. of Corrections, 783 P.2d 1065 (Wash. 1989), a producer of radio and television documentaries asked officials in the state of Washington to allow him to videotape the execution of Charles Campbell. When the producer was turned down, he filed an equity proceeding before the Washington Supreme Court. The producer contended that he had a right under Washington's constitution to film the execution.

The State constitutional provision relied upon by the producer in Halquist provided: "Every person may freely speak, write and publish on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right." The producer argued that the latter state constitutional provision guaranteed him the right to film the execution. The court rebuffed this argument by noting that "the right to publish applies only to those who have previously and lawfully obtained information." The court also added that there was "a substantial difference between the right to publish already acquired information and the right to attend a proceeding for the purpose of news gathering." In placing the last nail in the producer's coffin, so to speak, the court observed that the United States Supreme Court took the position that "the First Amendment does not guarantee the press a constitutional right of special access to information not available to the public generally."

In Garrett v. Estelle, 556 F.2d 1274 (5th Cir. 1977), the State of Texas sought reversal of a federal district court's decision ordering it to permit a television news cameraman to film executions. In reversing the decision of the federal district court, the court of appeals held the following:

Garrett asserts a first amendment right to gather news, which he contends can be limited only on account of a compelling state interest. He further argues that preventing him from using a motion picture camera to gather news denies him use of the tool of his trade and therefore denies him equal protection of the laws....

News gathering is protected by the first amendment, for without some protection for seeking out the news, freedom of the press could be eviscerated. This protection is not absolute, however. As the late Chief Justice Warren wrote for the Supreme Court, "The right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information."

... [T]he press has no greater right of access to information than does the public at large and ... the first amendment does not require government to make available to the press information not available to the public. This principle marks a limit to the first amendment protection of the press' right to gather news. Applying this principle to the present case, we hold that the first amendment does not invalidate nondiscriminatory prison access regulations.

... While we agree that the death penalty is a matter of wide public interest, we disagree that the protections of the first amendment depend upon the notoriety of an issue. The Supreme Court has held that the first amendment does not protect means of gathering news in prisons not available to the public generally, and this holding is not predicated upon the importance or degree of interest in the matter reported....

Garrett next argues that to prevent his filming executions denies him equal protection of the law, since other members of the press are allowed free use of their usual reporting tools. This argument is also without merit. The Texas media regulation denies Garrett use of his camera, and it also denies the print reporter use of his camera, and the radio reporter use of his tape recorder. Garrett is free to make his report by means of anchor desk or stand-up delivery on the TV screen, or even by simulation. There is no denial of equal protection.

The Right of a Felon to Videotape an Execution. Capital felons have argued that the methods used to execute the death penalty are cruel and unusual. Several capital felons have sought to prove this argument by offering into evidence videotapes of capital felons being put to death. To obtain such evidence, capital felons have to establish that they have a "right" to videotape executions.

In the case of Campbell v. Blodgett, 1993 U.S. App. LEXIS 1036 (9th Cir.), capital felon Charles Campbell filed an action in a federal district court seeking to force officials to allow him to videotape the hanging execution of Westley Allan Dodd. Campbell wanted to use the videotape in another proceeding where he had alleged that hanging was a cruel and unusual form of punishment. The federal district court denied the request. Campbell appealed to a federal Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals stated that a videotape of Dodd's hanging would be insufficient proof that hanging was cruel and unusual because it could not establish what degree of pain and suffering was endured. Therefore, the Court of Appeals affirmed the denial.

The case of Fierro v. Gomez, 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14445 (N.D.Cal.), presented a ray of hope for capital felons seeking to prove death penalty methods were cruel and unusual. Three capital felons brought this case into federal court: David Fierro, Alejandro Gilbert Ruiz, and Robert Alton Harris. In an effort to support their claim that California's use of lethal gas to execute felons was cruel and unusual punishment, the capital felons asked a federal district court to issue an order permitting them to videotape the execution of Harris. The capital felons argued that the videotape would conclusively establish that death by lethal gas was cruel and unusual punishment.

The district court held that such a videotape would have some relevancy on the defendants' claim. Therefore, the district court issued an order allowing the capital felons to videotape the execution of Harris. The court explicitly required that only Harris be videotaped and not anyone else attending the execution.

Robert Alton Harris's execution by the State of California was allowed to be videotaped by a death row inmate for the purpose of showing that death by lethal gas violated the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause of the Federal Constitution. (California Department of Corrections)

In the case of Petition of Thomas, 155 F.R.D. 124 (D.Md. 1994), a capital felon challenged the State of Maryland's method of execution as being cruel and unusual punishment. In an effort to prove his claim, the defendant asked a federal district court to allow him to conduct discovery on the state. Part of the discovery in which the defendant wanted to engage was that of videotaping the execution of another capital felon. The court in that case ultimately ruled that the defendant could conduct discovery to support his challenge to the state's method of execution and, as part of that discovery, he could videotape the execution of a consenting death row inmate.

Statutory Limitations on Access to Executions: Methodically detailed rules and regulations have been promulgated, by correctional agencies, which set out what the environment will consist of when an execution occurs. The overwhelming majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have provided, by statute, a few restrictions that help make up the rules and regulations for conducting an execution.

The following material reviews most of the statutory guidelines for carrying out the death penalty. It should be kept in mind that the bulk of the procedures for carrying out the death penalty are contained in administrative rules and regulations.

Attendance by Family Members of the Victim. Only four capital punishment jurisdictions allow, by statute, family members of a victim to attend the execution. Two of the jurisdictions, Delaware and Louisiana, allow only one family member of the victim to attend the execution. Another jurisdiction, Ohio, sets the limit at three family members. The fourth jurisdiction, Washington, imposes no statutory limit on the number of family members that can attend the execution.

Family or Friends of Capital Felon. Although the majority of capital punishment jurisdictions do not allow members of a victim's family to attend the execution, the situation is different for the capital felon. A majority of jurisdictions provide by statute that a capital felon's family or friends may attend the execution. Most of these statutes place restrictions on the number of family members and friends of the capital felon who may attend the execution.

JURISDICTIONS THAT STATUTORILY PERMIT FAMILY OR FRIENDS OF CAPITAL FELON TO ATTEND THE EXECUTION

Media Representation. Although no capital punishment jurisdiction currently allows executions to be televised, the unanimous bar is not found in statutes. Only four jurisdictions, Kentucky, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Tennessee, set out in statutes that audio-visual recorders are prohibited from being used at executions.

The majority of capital punishment jurisdictions do not provide by statute for media attendance at executions. The jurisdictions that do provide for media attendance by statute are divided into two types: (1) newspaper reporters only and (2) media generally (which includes newspaper, television and radio reporters).

1. Newspaper reporters only. Three capital punishment jurisdictions restrict, by statute, media presence at executions to that of newspaper reporters. Two of the jurisdictions, Alabama and Connecticut, do not set a numerical limitation on the number of newspaper reporters, while the third jurisdiction, Mississippi, limits the number at eight.

2. Media generally. The statutes in eleven capital punishment jurisdictions provide for general media representation at executions.

Jurisdictions Providing by Statute for General Media Representation at Executions

Jurisdiction	Total Media Representation
Kentucky	9
Utah	9
Tennessee	7
Pennsylvania	6
South Carolina	5
Ohio	3
South Dakota	1
Florida	no statutory limit
Oklahoma	no statutory limit
Washington	no statutory limit

Public Representation. The majority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide by statute for limited “respectable citizen” representation at executions. All of these jurisdictions, except for one, authorize correctional officials to select the public representation.

Number of Jurisdictions	Number of Public Representatives
1	10
2	no statutory limit

Citizen representation at an execution is voluntary. Persons selected by the appropriate authority do not have to attend the execution. It should also be noted that statutes use the phrase “respectable citizens” or “reputable citizens” to describe those who are selected as public representatives to attend executions, but fail to define the phrases.

Inmate Representation. North Carolina is the only jurisdiction to provide by statute that a capital felon may invite inmate friends to view the execution. Four capital punishment jurisdictions, Alabama, Missouri, Ohio, and Texas, exclude by statute inmates from attending a capital felon’s execution.

Spiritual Advisor. Hollywood popularized the notion of a capital felon going to the execution chamber with a priest close at hand. The classic depiction of this scenario involved Pat O’Brien playing a priest who attended James Cagney as he was ushered to the death chamber. Reality is not far behind Hollywood’s fictional accounts of executions. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions allow by statute for spiritual advisors to be present at executions. Two types of spiritual advisors are provided for in statutes: (1) prison chaplains and (2) personal spiritual advisors.

1. Prison chaplain. Five capital punishment jurisdictions permit by statute for prison chaplains to attend executions. Three of those jurisdictions, Indiana, Kentucky, and Wyoming, limit prison chaplain representation to one chaplain. The remaining two jurisdictions, Alabama and Texas, do not limit the number of prison chaplains that may attend an execution.

JURISDICTIONS THAT STATUTORILY ALLOWING PERSONAL SPIRITUAL ADVISORS TO ATTEND EXECUTIONS

2. Personal spiritual advisor. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions statutorily allow capital felons to invite their own personal spiritual advisors to be present at executions. These jurisdictions vary on the number of personal spiritual advisors that may be in attendance.

Physician Representation. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide by statute for the presence of physicians at executions. Physician representation at executions varies. Some jurisdictions limit that representation to one. A few jurisdictions set the limit at two, while others allow three physicians to be in attendance. Finally, a few jurisdictions do not have a statutory limit.

JURISDICTIONS THAT STATUTORILY PROVIDING FOR PHYSICIAN ATTENDANCE AT EXECUTIONS

Age Restrictions. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide statutory restrictions on the age of persons allowed to be in attendance at executions. Seven jurisdictions provide that no “minors” are to be in attendance, while two jurisdictions restrict attendance to persons 21 or over.

Other Witnesses. All executions are attended by correctional commissioners or wardens (or their respective designated representatives), executioners, limited security personnel and, of course, the capital felon scheduled for execution. Statutes round out execution witnesses with a limited number of other individuals.

1. Capital felon’s counsel. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions allow legal counsel for a capital felon to attend the execution.

2. Attorney general. The statutes in eight capital punishment jurisdictions allow the jurisdiction’s attorney general to attend executions.

3. Prosecutor. Five capital punishment jurisdictions allow the prosecutor responsible for bringing about the capital felon’s conviction and sentence to attend the execution.

4. Judge. It is provided in the statutes of four capital punishment jurisdictions that the judge who presided over the capital felon’s case may attend the execution.

5. Court clerk. New Hampshire is the only jurisdiction that allows the clerk of the court wherein the capital felon was convicted and sentenced to attend the execution.

Issue Presented: Whether California's capital punishment statute was invalid under the Constitution because it failed to require the California Supreme Court to engage in proportionality review of death sentences.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not require proportionality review of death sentences by appellate courts.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Harris, was convicted of capital murder by the State of California and was sentenced to death. The California Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's claim that California's capital punishment statute was invalid under the federal Constitution because it failed to require the California Supreme Court to compare the defendant's sentence with sentences imposed in similar capital cases and thereby to determine whether they were proportionate.

After habeas corpus relief was denied by State courts, the defendant sought habeas corpus relief in a federal district court. The district court denied relief. However, a federal Court of Appeals granted relief after finding that comparative proportionality review was constitutionally required. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White found that the Constitution did not demand appellate courts engage in proportionality review of death sentences. It was reasoned that the outcome of Gregg v. Georgia and its progeny did not hinge on proportionality review. Moreover, the opinion observed that merely because death penalty statutes in some jurisdictions require appellate courts engage in proportionality review, it does not mean that such review is indispensable or constitutional required.

Justice White concluded: "Any capital sentencing scheme may occasionally produce aberrational outcomes. Such inconsistencies are a far cry from the major systemic defects identified in Furman. As we have acknowledged in the past, 'there can be no perfect procedure for deciding in which cases governmental authority should be used to impose death.' As we are presently informed, we cannot say that the California procedures provided [the defendant] inadequate protection against the evil identified in Furman. The Court of Appeals therefore erred in ordering the writ of habeas corpus to issue. Its judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion."

curred with most of the Court's opinion. He was at odds with the majority's characterization of some of the Court's prior decisions. In summarizing his concurrence, Justice Stevens wrote: "[I]n each of the statutory schemes approved in our prior cases, as in the scheme we review today, meaningful appellate review is an indispensable component of the Court's determination that the State's capital sentencing procedure is valid. Like the Court, however, I am not persuaded that the particular form of review prescribed by statute in Georgia — comparative proportionality review — is the only method by which an appellate court can avoid the danger that the imposition of the death sentence in a particular case, or a particular class of cases, will be so extraordinary as to violate the Eighth Amendment."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, J., Joined: Justice Brennan argued long and forcefully in dissenting from the majority's opinion. He believed that proportionality review was a constitutionally indispensable part of capital punishment. The dissent presented its position as follows:

[I]n this case, the Court concludes that proportionality review of a death sentence is constitutionally unnecessary. Presumably this is so, even if a comparative review of death sentences imposed on similarly situated defendants might eliminate some, if only a small part, of the irrationality that currently surrounds the imposition of the death penalty. Because, in my view, the evidence available to the Court suggests that proportionality review does serve this limited purpose, I believe that the State of California, through a court of statewide jurisdiction, should be required to undertake proportionality review when examining any death sentence on appeal....

The question directly presented by this case is whether the Federal Constitution requires a court of statewide jurisdiction to undertake comparative proportionality review before a death sentence may be carried out. The results obtained by many States that undertake such proportionality review, pursuant to either state statute or judicial decision, convince me that this form of appellate review serves to eliminate some, if only a small part, of the irrationality that infects the current imposition of death sentences throughout the various States. To this extent, I believe that comparative proportionality review is mandated by the Constitution....

Disproportionality among sentences given different defendants can only be eliminated after sentencing disparities are identified. And the most logical way to identify such sentencing disparities is for a court of statewide jurisdiction to conduct comparisons between death sentences imposed by different judges or juries within the State. This is what the Court labels comparative proportionality review. Although clearly no panacea, such review often serves to identify the most extreme examples of disproportionality among similarly situated defendants. At least to this extent, this form of appellate review serves to eliminate some of the irrationality that currently surrounds imposition of a death sentence. If only to further this limited purpose, therefore, I believe that the Constitution's prohibition on the irrational imposition of the death penalty requires that this procedural safeguard be provided....

Perhaps the best evidence of the value of proportionality review can be gathered by examining the actual results obtained in those States which now require such review. For example, since 1973, the statute controlling appellate review of death sentences in the State of Georgia has required that the Supreme Court of Georgia determine "[w]hether the sentence of death is excessive or disproportionate to the penalty imposed in similar cases, considering both the crime and the defendant." Pursuant to this statutory mandate, the Georgia Supreme Court has vacated at least seven death sentences because it was convinced that they were comparatively disproportionate.

Similarly, other States that require comparative proportionality review also have vacated death sentences for defendants whose crime or personal history did not justify such an extreme penalty. (Citing numerous cases.)

What these cases clearly demonstrate, in my view, is that comparative proportionality review serves to eliminate some, if only a small part, of the irrationality that currently infects imposition of the death penalty by the various States. Before any execution is carried out, therefore, a State should be required under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments to conduct such appellate review. The Court's decision in Furman, and the Court's continuing emphasis on meaningful appellate review require no less.

The Court today concludes that our prior decisions do not mandate that a comparative proportionality review be conducted before any execution takes place.... At no point does the Court determine whether comparative proportionality review should be required in order to ensure that the irrational, arbitrary, and capricious imposition of the death penalty invalidated by Furman does not still exist. Even if I did not adhere to my view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment, I could not join in such unstudied decisionmaking.

Qatar Capital punishment is carried out in Qatar. The nation uses hanging and the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is a mixture of civil law and Islamic law. Qatar adopted a new constitution on June 9, 2005.

Qatar is a monarchy. It is governed by the ruling Al-Thani family through its head, the emir. Political parties are illegal in the country. The emir holds absolute power, although a prime minister (appointed by the emir) and advisory council assist in running the country.

The judicial system in Qatar was changed in 1999. The new system consists of the Courts of Justice, Shari'a Courts of First Instance, Appeal Court of Justice, Shari'a Court of Appeal, and Court of Cassation. The Courts of Justice are empowered to hear criminal cases and other matters. The Shari'a Courts are limited to resolving personal status issues. Trials in the Shari'a Court are not public. Defendants are not always permitted to be represented by counsel. There is no provision for bail in criminal cases. See also International Capital Punishment Nations Issue Presented: Whether the trial court committed error in refusing to permit the defendant's witness to render an opinion on the defendant's sanity at the time of the commission of the crime.

Case Holding: The trial court did not commit error in refusing to permit the defendant's witness to render an opinion on the defendant's sanity at the time of the commission of the crime because the witness was not an expert.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas P. Queenan, was indicted for capital murder by the State of Oklahoma. During his prosecution, the defendant raised the defense of insanity. Defense counsel called as a witness a lawyer who knew the defendant and asked the lawyer if it was his opinion that the defendant was insane at the time of the commission of the crime. The prosecutor objected to the question and the trial court refused to allow the lawyer to answer it. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The Oklahoma Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that he was denied due process of law because the trial court refused to permit his witness to render an opinion on his sanity. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Holmes: Justice Holmes held that the defendant was not denied due process of law on the grounds that his witness was precluded from rendering an opinion on the issue of insanity. The opinion addressed the matter as follows:

A lawyer, called as a witness for the defendant, stated that he knew the prisoner quite well; that the prisoner was his barber for some years, and that he saw him on the day before the killing. He then described the appearance and conduct of the prisoner, and said that at the time he did not notice any difference from the prisoner's usual demeanor. He then was asked if, since the killing, he had formed an opinion as to the prisoner's mental condition at that time. This opinion he was not allowed to state.... Some states exclude such opinions, even when formed at the time.... [T]o let a witness who is not an expert state an opinion upon sanity which he has formed after the event, when a case has arisen and become a matter of public discussion, [may not] be justified.... It is unnecessary to lay down the rule that it never can be done, for instance, when the opinion clearly appears to sum up a series of impressions received at different times. It is enough to say that, at least, it should be done with caution and not without special reasons. In this case the only knowledge shown by the witness was the familiarity of a man with his barber. So far as the evidence went, his present opinion might have been the result of interested argument, and, leaving such suggestions on one side, no reason of necessity or propriety was shown for the statement that would not have applied to any other man who had had his hair cut in the prisoner's shop. It does not appear that there was error in the ruling of the court.

The judgment of the Oklahoma Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Insanity Defense; Rules of Evidence

Race and Capital Punishment One of the historical criticisms of capital punishment in the United States is that the death penalty is disproportionately inflicted upon minority groups. The dominant factor behind the decision to invalidate capital punishment statutes in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), was statistical evidence which showed that minorities, particularly African Americans, were disproportionately represented in the execution chamber.

Post-Furman capital punishment is being challenged by anti-death penalty advocates on the grounds that the death penalty continues to be administered in a racially discriminatory manner. For example, between 1976 and October 2006, minorities made up 42.9 percent of all executed prisoners. A snapshot of the death row population of July 1, 2006, revealed that 54.7 percent of the prisoners on death row were minorities.

One capital punishment jurisdiction has taken the initiative to prevent racial discrimination in death sentencing. In 1998, the State of Kentucky passed legislation allowing death sentences to be challenged on racial grounds through the use of statistical evidence.

Kentucky Racial Justice Act of 1998

(1) No person shall be subject to or given a sentence of death that was sought on the basis of race.

(2) A finding that race was the basis of the decision to seek a death sentence may be established if the court finds that race was a significant factor in decisions to seek the sentence of death in the Commonwealth at the time the death sentence was sought.

(3) Evidence relevant to establish a finding that race was the basis of the decision to seek a death sentence may include statistical evidence or other evidence, or both, that death sentences were sought significantly more frequently:

(a) Upon persons of one race than upon persons of another race; or

(b) As punishment for capital offenses against persons of one race than as punishment for capital offenses against persons of another race.

(4) The defendant shall state with particularity how the evidence supports a claim that racial considerations played a significant part in the decision to seek a death sentence in his or her case. The claim shall be raised by the defendant at the pre-trial conference. The court shall schedule a hearing on the claim and shall prescribe a time for the submission of evidence by both parties. If the court finds that race was the basis of the decision to seek the death sentence, the court shall order that a death sentence shall not be sought.

(5) The defendant has the burden of proving by clear and convincing evidence that race was the basis of the decision to seek the death penalty. The Commonwealth may offer evidence in rebuttal of the claims or evidence of the defendant.

As the first of its kind in the nation, the Kentucky initiative must be placed in perspective. The legislation is concerned with the initiation of a capital prosecution. That is, it seeks to prevent prosecutors from using race as a basis for seeking the death penalty. In the final analysis, the Kentucky initiative falls short of providing the type of effective remedy sought by minorities and anti-death penalty advocates.

Studies have shown that two stages exist where improper motives may play a role in capital punishment. The decision to seek the death penalty is one stage. The Kentucky initiative addresses that stage. The second stage is the determination by the jury of whether the death penalty should be imposed. The Kentucky initiative does not address this stage. It has been argued that it is the second stage where the real problem of racial discrimination exists. In other words, even if prosecutors fairly and impartially chose cases for capital prosecution, juries may exhibit bias in making recommendations as to who actually should receive the punishment. See also African Americans and Capital Punishment; Asians and Capital Punishment; Hispanics and Capital Punishment; Native Americans and Capital Punishment Race-Qualified Jury It has been held that the constitutional guarantee of an impartial jury entitles a defendant, in a capital case involving interracial violence, to have prospective jurors questioned on the issue of racial bias. This right includes informing the prospective jurors of the race of the victim. This right is not automatic. To invoke the right of having a race-qualified jury, a defendant must specifically request the trial judge make an inquiry into racial opinions and beliefs. The requirements of this rule have not been extended outside of interracial violence criminal prosecutions. See also Aldridge v. Angelone, 530 U.S. 156 (2000); Argued: April 18, 2000; Decided: June 12, 2000; Plurality Opinion: Justice Kennedy announced the Court's judgment and delivered an opinion, in which Rehnquist, CJ., Scalia and Thomas, JJ., joined; Concurring Opinion: Justice O'Connor; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Stevens, in which Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: David I. Issue Presented: Whether the trial court was required to inform the penalty phase jury that the defendant was ineligible for parole.

Case Holding: The trial court was not required to inform the penalty phase jury that the defendant was ineligible for parole.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Bobby Lee Ramdass, was charged with the 1992 murder of Mohammed Kayani by the State of Virginia. A jury convicted the defendant of capital murder. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor sought to have the death penalty imposed based upon evidence of the defendant's future dangerousness. The defendant asked the trial court to instruct the jury that he would not be eligible for parole if sentenced to life imprisonment. The trial court refused to give the instruction. The jury sentenced the defendant to death. The judgment was eventually affirmed on direct appeal and during a State habeas corpus proceeding. The defendant thereafter filed a federal habeas proceeding. In that proceeding, the defendant argued that under the United States Supreme Court decision in Simmons v. South Carolina, 512 U.S. 154 (1994), he was entitled to have the penalty phase jury informed that he was ineligible for parole. A federal district court agreed and granted a new sentencing hearing. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Kennedy Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Rehnquist, CJ., Scalia and Thomas, JJ., Joined: Justice Kennedy found that Simmons was inapplicable and that the defendant was not entitled to have the jury informed that he was ineligible for parole. The opinion indicated that, under Simmons, when a defendant's future dangerousness is an issue, a jury is required to be informed that the defendant is ineligible for parole. Justice Kennedy stated that if future dangerousness is an issue, but a defendant is in fact eligible for parole, a jury need not be informed about parole. The opinion found that, under Virginia law, the defendant was not ineligible for parole; therefore, he was not entitled to have the jury informed about parole. The decision of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor concurred in the judgment. She argued that the State court's consideration of the issue was not inconsistent with federal law and therefore should have been affirmed on that ground alone.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Steven's dissented from the Court's judgment. He argued that because of other crimes committed by the defendant, he was in fact ineligible for parole. See also Parole Ineligibility Jury Instruction

Issue Presented: Whether the exclusion of professional persons from the grand jury that indicted the defendants denied them due process of law.

Case Holding: The exclusion of professional persons from the grand jury that indicted the defendants did not deny them due process of law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, J. G. Rawlins, Milton Rawlins, and Jesse Rawlins were convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death (a fourth defendant, Leonard Rawlins, was sentenced to life imprisonment) by the State of Georgia. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the judgments. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendants' contention that their convictions were invalid because "while there are in Lowndes county many lawyers, many preachers, many ministers, many doctors, many engineers and firemen of railroad trains, and many dentists, as many as ten of each class named, or other large number of each of said class, all citizens and residents of said county, and being competent and qualified jurors, as to age and uprightness, experience and intelligence, and as to all the legal qualifications of a juror, yet each and every one of these classes of citizens, and each and every member thereof in the county, is expressly and purposely excluded from the grand jury service by the commissioners failing and refusing to put any of said names in the box, so that, not being in the box, they cannot be legally drawn for service." The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Holmes: Justice Holmes held that the defendants were not denied due process of law because professional members of the community were excluded from grand jury service. The opinion explained as follows:

When the question is narrowed to its proper form the answer does not need much discussion. The nature of the classes excluded was not such as was likely to affect the conduct of the members as jurymen, or to make them act otherwise than those who were drawn would act. The exclusion was not the result of race or class prejudice. It does not even appear that any of the defendants belonged to any of the excluded classes. The ground of omission, no doubt, was that pointed out by the state court,— that the business of the persons omitted was such that they either would have been entitled to claim exemption, or that probably they would have been excused. Even when persons liable to jury duty under the state law are excluded, it is no ground for challenge to the array, if a sufficient number of unexceptional persons are present. But if the state law itself should exclude certain classes on the bona fide ground that it was for the good of the community that their regular work should not be interrupted, there is nothing in the 14th Amendment to prevent it. The exemption of lawyers, ministers of the gospel, doctors, and engineers of railroad trains — in short, substantially the exemption complained of — is of old standing, and not uncommon in the United States. It could not be denied that the state properly could have excluded these classes had it seen fit, and that undeniable proposition ends the case.

The judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court was affirmed.

Reece v. Georgia Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Reece v. Georgia, 350 U.S. 85 (1955); Argued: November 9, 1955; Decided: December 5, 1955; Opinion of the Court: Justice Clark; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Daniel Duke argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Eugene Cook argued; Robert H. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied due process of law by Georgia's requirement that a challenge to the composition of the grand jury must be made before an indictment was returned.

Case Holding: The defendant was denied due process of law by Georgia's requirement that a challenge to the composition of the grand jury must be made before an indictment was returned, when the defendant has shown that he was semi-literate and did not have counsel appointed until after the indictment was returned.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Amos Reece, was convicted of the rape and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. The Georgia Supreme Court reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial. The defendant was convicted at the second trial and again sentenced to death. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court ruled that the defendant failed to timely raise, at the trial court level, his claim that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clark: Justice Clark indicated: "The indictment of a defendant by a grand jury from which members of his race have been systematically excluded is a denial of his right to equal protection of the laws." The opinion noted that Georgia law required that objections of a defendant to the composition of a grand jury be raised before the indictment was returned. The opinion found that Georgia's procedure did not afford the defendant an opportunity to object to the composition of the grand jury because he was semi-literate and did not have counsel appointed until after the indictment was returned and he was arrested. Justice Clark stated that “it is utterly unrealistic to say that he had such opportunity when counsel was not provided for him until the day after he was indicted.” It was reasoned in the opinion “that the assignment of counsel in a state prosecution at such time and under such circumstances as to preclude the giving of effective aid in the preparation and trial of a capital case is a denial of due process of law.” Justice Clark found that the defendant’s counsel could not effectively represent him on a key procedural issue because, under Georgia law, the issue was lost before counsel was appointed.

The opinion found that the defendant had provided sufficient evidence to support his claim of racial discrimination in the composition of the grand jury. This evidence included documentation that no black person “had served on the grand jury in Cobb County for the previous 18 years.” The opinion indicated that while the defendant made out a prima facie case of discrimination, the Court would not decide the issue. Instead, Justice Clark ruled that the Georgia Supreme Court should first have an opportunity to address the merits of the claim. The judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court was vacated and the case remanded.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; Crimes Not Involving Death

Reed, Stanley Forman Stanley Forman Reed served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1938 to 1957. While on the Supreme Court, Reed was known as a moderate in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Reed was born in Macon County, Kentucky, on December 31, 1884. Reed was educated at Kentucky Wesleyan College where he received an undergraduate degree in 1902. Although Reed attended several law schools, he did not receive a law degree. He was admitted to the bar in Kentucky in 1910. Reed went on to hold several attorney positions with the federal government, including appointment as United States Solicitor General in 1935. In 1938 President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Reed to the Supreme Court.

Reed issued a number of capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. The capital punishment opinion which has kept Reed’s name current in legal discussion was his plurality opinion in Francis v. Resweber. The decision in Francis asked the question of whether the Constitution permitted a defendant to be executed more than once. The defendant in Francis was unsuccessfully executed by electrocution by the State of Louisiana. The defendant asked the Supreme Court to stop a second attempt at electrocuting him. The majority of the Court approved of a subsequent execution. Reed, announcing the decision of the Court and writing a plurality opinion, held: “For we see no difference from a constitutional point of view between a new trial for error of law at the instance of the state ... and an execution that follows a failure of equipment. When an accident, with no suggestion of malevolence, prevents the consummation of a sentence, the state’s subsequent course in the administration of its criminal law is not affected on that account.” In 1957, Reed retired from the Court. He died on April 2, 1980.

Rehnquist, William Hubbs William Hubbs Rehnquist served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1971 to 1986. In 1986, Rehnquist was appointed as chief justice of the Supreme Court. While on the Supreme Court, Rehnquist has been known as an ultra-conservative in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Rehnquist was born on October 1, 1924, in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. In 1952, he graduated from Stanford University Law School. In 1953, Rehnquist began the private practice of law. In 1969, he took a position as an attorney with the Department of Justice. President Richard M. Nixon appointed him to the United States Supreme Court as an associate justice in 1971. President Ronald Reagan elevated Rehnquist to the position of chief justice of the Supreme Court in 1986.

Rehnquist has written a considerable number of capital punishment opinions. In all of his capital punishment opinions, he has been consistent in taking a position that was ultra-conservative and primarily pro-government. A case illustrating Rehnquist’s ultra-conservative constitutional views is Dawson v. Delaware. In that case, the defendant was a member of a white racist prison gang. During the defendant’s capital sentencing proceeding, the prosecutor introduced evidence of the defendant’s gang membership to show that he would be dangerous if spared the death penalty. The defendant argued to the Supreme Court that the prosecutor should not have been allowed to use his right-wing gang membership against him. Rehnquist, writing for the majority of the Court, agreed with the defendant that his membership in a prison hate group was not relevant for determining the proper sentence in the case. Rehnquist died while in office on September 3, 2005.

placed on the fast track by statements made by Pope John Paul II in the latter part of 1990s calling for a global end to capital punishment. There was also a statement issued in 1999 by the Dalai Lama calling for a moratorium on capital punishment in the United States.

Although many religious institutions in the nation have come out to oppose capital punishment, the religious community is not unanimous on this issue. There are religiously based groups that support capital punishment. These groups point to the bible as justification for the death penalty. It has been noted that the bible imposes capital punishment for the following conduct: murder, rape, sodomy, incontinence, perjury, kidnapping, fornication, witchcraft, striking or cursing one's father or mother, theft, blasphemy, and Sabbath desecration.

Religious Organizing Against the Death Penalty Project

The Philadelphia-based Religious Organizing Against the Death Penalty Project (the Project) was created to bring together the religious community in the United States to work against capital punishment. The Project is coordinated by the criminal justice program of the American Friends Service Committee. The Project provides the religious communities with the tools and resources to become effective advocates for the abolition of the death penalty. Some of the practical work done by the Project includes getting people to sign a pledge to express individual opposition to capital punishment; designing action plans for working for the abolition of the death penalty; addressing the spiritual needs of families of murder victims; working with family members of those on death row; organizing anti-death penalty demonstrations and vigils; and testifying and lobbying against the death penalty.

Relevant Evidence Relevant evidence is generally defined as any evidence having a tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence more probable or less probable than it would be without such evidence. This definition is used to control admission of evidence at the guilt phase, as well as the penalty phase of a capital prosecution. Any evidence that is relevant may be considered during the penalty phase of a capital prosecution. Evidence may be relevant at the guilt phase, but precluded from introduction on other evidentiary grounds. See also Mitigating Circumstances; Rules of Evidence

Religion and Capital Punishment In 1999, the National Jewish/Catholic Consultation issued a joint statement calling for the abolishment of capital punishment. The National Jewish/Catholic Consultation was co-sponsored by the National Council of Synagogues and the National Conference of Catholic Bishops' Committee for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs. The joint statement of condemnation of capital punishment by the National Jewish/Catholic Consultation was in keeping with a growing trend by religious institutions in the 1990s to speak out publicly against capital punishment in the nation. This trend was

Stephen P. Morin volunteered to be executed. The State of Texas gave him his wish on March 13, 1985. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

Requesting Death The federal Constitution does not prohibit a capital felon from waiving his or her right to put on mitigating evidence during the penalty phase and requesting to be sentenced to death. However, before a capital defendant is permitted to waive his or her right to put on mitigating evidence at the penalty phase and request a sentence of death, a trial court must evaluate the possible mitigating circumstances and inform the defendant of any potential merit they may have.

In addition to have the right to request a death sentence at the penalty phase, a capital felon may request or volunteer to be executed once he or she is on death row. From 1976 to October 2006, a request to be put to death was made by and granted to 110 death row inmates.

Residual Doubt of Guilt The phrase “residual doubt of guilt” is used to refer to evidence submitted at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution which implies that a defendant is innocent of the crime. In several cases, the United States Supreme Court has made clear that a capital felon does not have a federal constitutional right to present residual doubt of guilt evidence at the penalty phase. In the case of Oregon v. Guzek, the Supreme Court addressed the issue by stating that “the parties previously litigated the issue to which the evidence is relevant — whether the defendant committed the basic crime [of murder]. The evidence thereby attacks a previously determined matter in a [sentencing] proceeding at which, in principle, that matter is not at issue.” Some courts expressly preclude introduction of residual doubt of guilt evidence at the penalty phase for mitigation purposes. However, other courts hold that residual doubt of guilt is a valid non-statutory mitigating circumstance for the penalty phase jury to consider. See also Franklin v. Lynaugh; Mitigating Circumstances; Oregon v. Guzek

Retroactive Application of a New Constitutional Rule Capital punishment decisions by the United States Supreme Court often proclaim new constitutional rules. A principle becomes a new rule if it breaks new ground, imposes a new obligation on the States or the federal government, or was not dictated by precedent existing at the time the defendant’s conviction became final.

A primary issue involving a new constitutional rule is whether it may be applied retroactively to capital cases decided prior to the announcement of the new rule. The general rule regarding retroactivity of a new constitutional rule is that, after a defendant’s conviction has become final, he or she may not use a subsequently created constitutional rule to attack the conviction in a federal habeas corpus proceeding. This prohibition has been applied to prevent the adoption of a new rule in cases actually being decided by the Supreme Court.

Two narrow exceptions have been carved out from the general prohibition against applying a new constitutional rule to convictions that have become final. A new rule may be applied retroactively if it (1) placed an entire category of primary conduct beyond the reach of criminal law or prohibited imposition of a certain type of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense; or (2) was a watershed rule of criminal procedure implicating a criminal proceeding's fundamental fairness and accuracy. See also Beard v. Issue Presented: Whether a federal district court may stay resolution of exhausted habeas claims in order to allow a defendant to present unexhausted claims to a State court.

Case Holding: A federal district court has discretion, if certain conditions are met, to stay resolution of exhausted habeas claims in order to allow a defendant to present unexhausted claims to a State court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Charles R. Rhines, was convicted of the 1992 murder of Donnivan Schaeffer by the State of South Dakota and was sentenced to death. The conviction and sentence were affirmed on direct appeal. Rhines filed a State habeas corpus petition, which was denied. Subsequently, Rhines filed a federal habeas petition. The prosecutor filed a motion to dismiss the federal petition because Rhines included several issues that were never addressed by a State court. Under the one-year statute of limitations provision of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, if the district court dismissed the petition, Rhines could not refile it in federal court. As a result of this hardship, the district court stayed and held in abeyance resolution of the claims that were properly filed and ordered Rhines to file the unexhausted claims in State court. A federal Court of Appeals held that the district court had no authority to issue an order staying and holding in abeyance resolution of the claims that were exhausted and properly filed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor:

Justice O'Connor held that issuing a stay and abeyance order when presented with a mixed petition should occur only under limited conditions. The opinion set out the circumstances for issuing a stay and abeyance order as follows:

[I]t likely would be an abuse of discretion for a district court to deny a stay and to dismiss a mixed petition if the petitioner had good cause for his failure to exhaust, his unexhausted claims are potentially meritorious, and there is no indication that the petitioner engaged in intentionally dilatory litigation tactics. In such circumstances, the district court should stay, rather than dismiss, the mixed petition. In such a case, the petitioner's interest in obtaining federal review of his claims outweighs the competing interests in finality and speedy resolution of federal petitions. For the same reason, if a petitioner presents a district court with a mixed petition and the court determines that stay and abeyance is inappropriate, the court should allow the petitioner to delete the unexhausted claims and to proceed with the exhausted claims if dismissal of the entire petition would unreasonably impair the petitioner's right to obtain federal relief.

The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded to that court to determine whether the district court's grant of a stay and abeyance constituted an abuse of discretion.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Ginsburg and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens joined the majority opinion. He wrote separately to underscore the fact that he did not believe a showing of "good cause," for failing to exhaust claims, should be strict in its application.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Ginsburg and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Souter joined the majority opinion in part. In his concurrence, he indicated that he would not require a showing of "good cause," but would simply require showing intentional dilatory tactics as grounds for denying issuance of a stay and abeyance. See also Exhaustion of State Remedies Doctrine; Habeas Corpus; Mixed Petition for Habeas Corpus Relief; Procedural Default of Constitutional Claims Issue Presented: Whether the Arizona Supreme Court properly cured the constitutional error in the defendant's death sentence that was caused by the vague "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" statutory aggravating circumstance.

Case Holding: The State's appellate court failed to cure the constitutional error in the defendant's death sentence that was caused by the "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" statutory aggravating circumstance, but the State's appellate court would be given an opportunity to cure the defective death sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Richmond, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Arizona. During the sentencing phase, the trial court found three statutory aggravating circumstances were proven to exist. Included among the three aggravating factors found was the "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" aggravator. The trial court sentenced the defendant to death. The Arizona Supreme Court found that the "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" aggravator was vague, but that, based upon a narrowing construction given to the aggravator, it was constitutionally sound. The appellate court affirmed the conviction and sentence.

The defendant subsequently filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, arguing that the "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" aggravator was constitutionally invalid. The district court agreed with the defendant and granted relief. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor ruled that the defendant's death sentence violated the Eighth Amendment, because the "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" aggravator was unconstitutionally vague at the time the sentencing judge gave it weight. It was held that the State's appellate court did not cure the error, because that court did not actually re-weigh the aggravating and mitigating circumstances in affirming the sentence.

The opinion concluded that the State's appellate court must be given an opportunity to correct the constitutional error by re-weighing the aggravating and mitigating circumstances with the invalid "especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner" aggravator removed. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded with instructions that the State's appellate court, within a reasonable period of time, either correct the constitutional error in the defendant's death sentence or vacate the sentence and impose a lesser sentence consistent with State law.

Concurring Statement by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas issued a concurring statement indicating he agreed with the Court's judgment that the State's appellate court failed to properly re-weigh the aggravating and mitigating factors.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that any error caused by the failure of the State's appellate court to re-weigh properly the aggravating and mitigating factors was harmless error. *See also Heinous, Atrocious, Cruel, or Depraved Aggravator; Lewis v. Issue Presented: Whether due process of law required the location of the defendant's trial be changed because of the locally televised showing of the defendant confessing to the charge against him.

Case Holding: Due process of law required the location of the defendant's trial be changed because of the locally televised showing of the defendant confessing to the charge against him.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Wilbert Rideau, was arrested by capital murder by the State of Louisiana. While in jail awaiting prosecution, the defendant confessed to the crime. The trial court denied the request. The confession was recorded on film and broadcast locally prior to the trial. Defense counsel requested the trial court change the venue of trial because of adverse pre-trial publicity. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that due process of law was violated by the trial court's denial of a change of venue. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stewart: Justice Stewart ruled that it was a denial of due process of law to refuse the request for a change of venue after the local exposure to the defendant personally confessing in detail to the crime. He stated the Court's position as follows:

The case now before us does not involve physical brutality. The kangaroo court proceedings in this case involved a more subtle but no less real deprivation of due process of law. Under our Constitution's guarantee of due process, a person accused of committing a crime is vouchsafed basic minimal rights. Among these are the right to counsel, the right to plead not guilty, and the right to be tried in a courtroom presided over by a judge. Yet in this case the people of [the] Parish saw and heard, not once but three times, a "trial" of Rideau in a jail, presided over by a sheriff, where there was no lawyer to advise Rideau of his right to stand mute....

[W]e do not hesitate to hold, without pausing to examine a particularized transcript of the voir dire examination of the members of the jury, that due process of law in this case required a trial before a jury drawn from a community of people who had not seen and heard Rideau's televised "interview." "Due process of law, preserved for all by our Constitution, commands that no such practice as that disclosed by this record shall send any accused to his death."

The judgment of the Louisiana Supreme Court was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Clark, in Which Harlan, J., Joined: Justice Clark dissented from the Court's decision. He did not believe the record showed such adverse publicity as to warrant reversing the conviction. Justice Clark wrote: "Unless the adverse publicity is shown by the record to have fatally infected the trial, there is simply no basis for the Court's inference that the publicity, epitomized by the televised interview ... [made the defendant's] trial a meaningless formality." He added further that,

“when the jurors testify that they can discount the influence of external factors and meet the standard imposed by the Fourteenth Amendment, that assurance is not lightly to be discarded.” See also Pre-trial Publicity; Venue

Issue Presented: Whether forcing the defendant to use the anti-psychotic drug Mellaril during his trial infringed upon the defendant's due process right to a fair trial.

Case Holding: Under the facts and circumstances of the case, forcing the defendant to use the anti-psychotic drug Mellaril during his trial infringed upon his due process right to a fair trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Nevada charged the defendant, David Riggins, with capital murder. Prior to trial, he complained of hearing voices and having sleep problems. The trial court ordered a psychiatric examination of the defendant's competency to stand trial. The defendant was found competent, but the examining psychiatrist prescribed the anti-psychotic drug Mellaril for the defendant. Defense counsel made a motion to suspend the drug's administration until after the defendant's trial, arguing that its use infringed upon his freedom, that its effect on his demeanor and mental state during trial would deny him due process, and that he had the right to show jurors his true mental state when he offered an insanity defense. The trial court denied the motion. The defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. On appeal, the Nevada Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that forced use of the Mellaril drug violated his constitutional rights. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor ruled that the forced administration of anti-psychotic medication during the defendant's trial violated his constitutional rights. He said that a defendant has an interest in avoiding involuntary administration of anti-psychotic drugs, protected under the Due Process Clause. The opinion reasoned that once the defendant motioned the trial court to terminate his treatment, the State became obligated to establish both the need for Mellaril and its medical appropriateness. It was indicated that due process would have been satisfied had the State shown that the treatment was medically appropriate and, considering less intrusive alternatives, essential for the defendant's own safety or the safety of others. Additionally, the opinion noted that the State also might have been able to justify the treatment, if medically appropriate, by showing that an adjudication of guilt or innocence could not be obtained by using less intrusive means. However, Justice O'Connor found that the trial court allowed the drug's administration to continue without making any determination of the need for its continuation or any findings about reasonable alternatives and it failed to acknowledge the defendant's liberty interest in freedom from anti-psychotic drugs.

The opinion found that there was a strong possibility that the trial court's error impaired the defendant's constitutionally protected trial rights. While the precise consequences of forcing Mellaril upon the defendant could not be shown from the trial transcript, the testimony of doctors who examined the defendant established a strong possibility that his defense was impaired. It said that Mellaril's side effects might have affected not only the defendant's outward appearance, but also his trial testimony's content, his ability to follow the proceedings, or the substance of his communication with counsel. The judgment of the Nevada Supreme Court was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote that medical evidence in the record indicated that involuntary medication with anti-psychotic drugs posed a serious threat to the defendant's right to a fair trial. Justice Kennedy concluded that, “absent an extraordinary showing by the State, the Due Process Clause prohibits prosecuting officials from administering involuntary doses of antipsychotic medicines for purposes of rendering the accused competent for trial.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas, in Which Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Thomas dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that forced use of anti-psychotic drugs did not deprive the defendant of a fair trial. Justice Thomas wrote: “I agree with the positions of the majority and concurring opinions in the Nevada Supreme Court: even if the State truly forced Riggins to take medication, and even if this medication deprived Riggins of a protected liberty interest in a manner actionable in a different legal proceeding, Riggins nonetheless had the fundamentally fair criminal trial required by the Constitution. I therefore would affirm his conviction.” See also Insanity

Riggs, Christina Marie In May 2000, Christina Marie Riggs was executed for the capital murder of her two children by the State of Arkansas. Christina was born in Lawton, Oklahoma, in 1971. Her childhood was marred by sexual abuse, drugs, and alcohol. At the age of seventeen, Christina gave birth, but placed the child up for adoption. In spite of her childhood problems, Christina graduated from high school and went on to be trained as a licensed practical nurse.

In 1991, Christina gave birth out of wedlock to her second child, Justin. She decided to keep Justin even though the father abandoned them. In 1993, Christina married a former boyfriend, John Riggs. In 1994, the couple gave birth to a child, Shelby Alexis. The family moved to Sherwood, Arkansas, in 1995, in order to be near Christina's mother. Christina was able to obtain a nursing job at Arkansas Heart Hospital in Little Rock. Not long after moving to Arkansas, the couple divorced. Confronted with life as a single parent with a modest income, Christina became extremely depressed. The depression led to thoughts of suicide and filicide, which culminated in the following events as described by the Arkansas Supreme Court in Riggs v. State, 3 S.W.3d 305 (Ark. 1999):

The record reveals that at the time of the murders of her children Riggs was a licensed practical nurse at the Arkansas Heart Hospital in Little Rock. On the last day of her work at the hospital which was November 4, 1997, she obtained Elavil, which is an antidepressant. She also obtained morphine and potassium chloride. She returned to her residence in Sherwood, and that night at about ten o'clock, she gave Elavil to her children to make them sleep. After they fell asleep, she injected Justin with potassium chloride. When he woke up crying in pain, she injected him with morphine. When that did not quiet him, she smothered him with a pillow. According to Riggs, Justin fought back as she smothered him. After her experience with Justin and the potassium chloride, she decided to smother Shelby with a pillow, which she did. She told police that Shelby only fought "a little bit." Following the murders, she moved the bodies of the dead children into her bedroom and placed them together in her bed. She wrote suicide notes to her mother, Carol Thomas; her sister, Roseanna Pickett; and a former husband, John Riggs. She next took a considerable dosage of Elavil and injected herself with potassium chloride. The drugs caused her to pass out on her bedroom floor. This was estimated to have occurred at approximately ten-thirty P.M. that same night.

The following day, which was November 5, 1997, Riggs's mother attempted to locate her and came to her house in Sherwood at about four o'clock in the afternoon. She found the bodies of the two children and her unconscious daughter. She called 911, and paramedics arrived on the scene. The paramedics eventually took Riggs to Baptist Memorial Hospital in North Little Rock at about five-thirty P.M., where her stomach was pumped and she was stabilized.

Meanwhile, the Sherwood police conducted a search of Riggs's home, where they found the suicide notes, the bottle of Elavil, the morphine, potassium chloride, and the used syringes. Back at the hospital, Riggs's family members had arrived, including her mother and sisters, and they asked to see her. The Sherwood Police Department had instructed police officers and hospital staff not to permit her to talk to or see her family. Shortly after midnight, Riggs's family retained an attorney to represent her. The attorney contacted the Sherwood Police Department and told police officers not to speak to Riggs without his being present.

On the morning of November 6, 1997, Detectives Charles Jones and Cheryl Williams of the Sherwood Police Department arrived to take Riggs's statement. At 9:20 A.M., Detective Jones gave Riggs Miranda warnings and took an eight-minute statement. In that statement, Riggs admitted to killing her children and explained the details of the killings, together with her attempted suicide. Riggs was released from the hospital several hours later and moved to the Pulaski County Jail. She was charged with two counts of capital murder. Later, she pled not guilty by reason of mental disease or defect.

Christina was tried for murder in June 1998. A jury convicted her of two counts of capital murder. During the penalty phase, Christina testified and asked the jury to sentence her to death. The jury sentenced her to death for both murders. Christina initially refused to allow an appeal of her case, but was eventually persuaded to do so. The convictions and death sentences were upheld on appeal. On May 2, 2000, Christina became the first woman to be executed by the State of Arkansas. She was executed by lethal injection. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Right to Counsel Under the common law of England, a defendant charged with treason or other felony was denied the aid of counsel. At the same time, however, parties in civil cases and defendants accused of misdemeanors were entitled to the full assistance of counsel. After 1688, the rule was abolished as to treason, but was otherwise adhered to until 1836, when, by act of the English Parliament, the full right was granted in respect of felonies generally.

The common law rule was rejected by the American colonies. Before the adoption of the federal Constitution, the Constitution of Maryland had declared: "That, in all criminal prosecutions, every man hath a right ... to be allowed counsel." The right to counsel provided by Maryland was adopted by other colonies as follows: the Constitution of Pennsylvania in 1776; the Constitution of New York in 1777; the Constitution of Massachusetts in 1780; and the Constitution of New Hampshire in 1784.

In the case of Pennsylvania, as early as 1701, the Penn Charter declared that "all Criminals shall have the same Privileges of Witnesses and Council as their Prosecutors." There was also a provision in the Pennsylvania statute of May 31, 1718, which provided that, in capital cases, counsel should be assigned to the prisoners. The original Constitution of New Jersey of 1776 contained a provision like that of the Penn Charter, to the effect that all criminals should be admitted to the same privileges of counsel as their prosecutors.

In Delaware's Constitution of 1776, it adopted the common law of England, but expressly excepted such parts as were repugnant to the rights and privileges contained in the Declaration of Rights. The Declaration of Rights, which was adopted on September 11, 1776, provided: "That in all Prosecutions for criminal offences, every Man hath a Right ... to be allowed Counsel."

North Carolina's Constitution of 1776 did not contain the guarantee to counsel, but a statute provided: "That every person accused of any crime or misdemeanor whatsoever, shall be entitled to council in all matters which may be necessary for his defense, as well to facts as to law." Similarly, in South Carolina, the original Constitution of 1776 did not contain the provision as to counsel, but it was provided as early as 1731, by statute, that every person charged with treason, murder, felony, or other capital offense should be admitted to make full defense by counsel learned in the law. In Virginia, there was no original constitutional provision on the subject of right to counsel, but, as early as 1734, there was an act declaring that in all trials for capital offenses the prisoner, upon petition to the court, should be allowed counsel. In Connecticut's Constitution of 1818, it provided that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have a right to be heard by himself and by counsel." However, it appears that the English common law rule had been rejected by Connecticut in practice long prior to 1796. The 1777 Constitution of Georgia did not contain a guarantee with respect to counsel, but its Constitution of 1798 provided that "no person shall be debarred from advocating or defending his cause before any court or tribunal, either by himself or counsel, or both." The first Constitution adopted by Rhode Island in 1842 contained the guarantee with respect to the assistance of counsel in criminal prosecutions. However, as early as 1798, Rhode Island provided by statute that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

Sixth Amendment Right to Counsel: The Sixth Amendment to the federal Constitution embodies the guarantee of the right to counsel. It is provided in the Sixth Amendment that: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall ... have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence." The United States Supreme Court imposed the Sixth Amendment right to counsel upon States in the case of Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963). The decision in Gideon held that the Sixth Amendment required indigent criminal defendants be provided with legal counsel paid for by the government. The right to counsel extends to trial proceedings only. There is no federal constitutional right to an attorney in post-conviction proceedings.

Right to Effective Assistance of Counsel: The Sixth Amendment right to counsel carries with it the right to have effective assistance of counsel. In Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668

(1984), the United States Supreme Court outlined the test for determining whether a defendant received effective assistance of counsel. Strickland held that a convicted defendant's claim that defense counsel's assistance was so defective as to require reversal of a capital conviction or setting aside of a death sentence requires that the defendant show (1) that defense counsel's performance was deficient and (2) that the deficient performance prejudiced the defense so as to deprive the defendant of a fair trial or sentencing. Failure to make the required showing of either deficient performance or sufficient prejudice defeats the ineffectiveness claim. Contemporary assessment of defense counsel's conduct is used when determining the deficient performance component of the test; the prejudice component is not dependent upon analysis under the law existing at the time of the deficient performance.

In the case of Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175 (2004), the Supreme Court noted that the requirement of showing prejudice under Strickland is not applicable when an attorney entirely fails to subject the prosecutor's case to meaningful adversarial testing. In such a situation there is a presumption of prejudice.

Right to Self-Representation: The constitutional right to counsel carries with it the right of self-representation. This right was first recognized by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975). The Faretta right, as it is called, may be exercised by a defendant charged with a capital offense. A capital defendant may waive his or her right to counsel and represent him/herself. The Faretta right is not absolute. The competency standard for waiving the right to counsel is whether the defendant has sufficient present ability to consult with his or her lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him or her. Even when a trial court determines that a defendant is competent to waive the right to counsel and represent him/herself, the court may still appoint "stand-by" counsel for the defendant to consult with as needed. Courts unanimously agree that a defendant who represents him/herself cannot raise, on appeal, the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel. Some cases have permitted defendants who have utilized stand-by counsel to raise an ineffective assistance of counsel claim on issues that the stand-by counsel was consulted on.

Statutory Counsel in Capital Cases: The law presumes all attorneys are competent to handle any type of legal matter. This presumption is rebuttable. The statutes in some capital punishment jurisdictions rebut this presumption by requiring attorneys, appointed to capital cases for indigent defendants, have a specific number of years of experience as practicing attorneys generally and, in some instances, such experience must be in criminal law. Right to Remain Silent The Fifth Amendment guarantees the right against self-incrimination. This constitutional provision provides that: "No person ... shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

In Court Silence: The right to remain silent is an expansive right. During a criminal trial, the right to remain silent permits a defendant to sit mute during the trial. That is, a defendant cannot be compelled to testify against him/herself. Part of the protection of the constitutional right to remain silent is that the failure of a defendant to testify in his or her own defense does not create any presumption against the defendant. If a defendant chooses not to testify at trial, no comment or argument about his or her failure to testify is permitted. If a prosecutor comments to the jury about a defendant's failure to testify, courts will generally grant a new trial.

A defendant's right not to be compelled to testify in a court proceeding is qualified. If a trial court grants a defendant immunity from prosecution, he or she may be compelled to testify or may be subject to being held in contempt of court.

Out of Court Silence: In addition to a defendant's right to remain silent in court, he or she also has a right not to be forced or tricked into making incriminating statements by government officials outside of a courtroom. In the case of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), the United States Supreme Court held that a suspect who has been formally arrested must be warned prior to any questioning (1) that he or she has the right to remain silent, (2) that anything he or she says can be used against him or her in a court of law, (3) that he or she has the right to the presence of an attorney, and (4) that if he or she cannot afford an attorney one will be appointed for him or her prior to any questioning if he or she so desires. After Miranda warnings have been given, a suspect may knowingly and intelligently waive these rights and agree to answer questions or make a statement. However, unless and until such warnings and waiver are demonstrated by the prosecution at trial, no evidence obtained as a result of interrogation can be used against a suspect. The voluntariness of a confession or incriminating statements must be determined by the trial judge and may not be submitted to the jury for determination.

In determining whether an individual was in custody, for Fifth Amendment purposes, a court must examine all of the circum-

When I left my home on Tuesday, October 25, I was very emotionally distraught. I didn't want to live anymore. I felt like things could never get any worse. When I left home, I was going to ride around a little while and then go to my mom's. As I rode and rode and rode, I felt even more lonely coming upon me about not wanting to live. I felt as if I couldn't be a good mom anymore, but I didn't want my children to grow up without a mom. I felt I had to end my love to protect us all from any grief or harm. I had never felt so lonely and so sad in my entire life. I was in love with someone very much, but he didn't love me and never would. I had a very difficult time sleeping that night. But I had had him very much and I could see why he could never be me. When I was 18, John D. Long Love, I had never felt so loved and secure as I did then. I wanted to and my life so bad and was in my car ready to get away, but I stopped. I went down and stopped. I then got out of the car and then stood by the car. I was crying. Why was I crying, why was I why was anything so bad to my life? I had no answers to these questions. I stopped to the point when I allowed my children to go down that ramp into the water without me. I took off running and screaming "Oh God! Oh God, no!" What have I done? What did you let this happen? I wanted to have my children so bad and go that, but I knew it was to late. I was an absolute mental case! I couldn't believe what I had done. I love my children and all my life. That will never change. I have prayed to them for forgiveness and hope that they will find it in heaven? to forgive me. I mean I meant to hurt them!! I am sorry for what has happened and I know what I need some help. I don't think I will ever be able to forgive myself for what I have done. My children, Michael and Mary, live with our heavenly father. Now God I know what they will never be hurt again. Be a mom, that means more than words could ever say.

I know from day one, the truth about grand, just I was so good. I didn't know what to do. It was very tough emotionally to sit and watch my family but let them die. It was time to bring a piece of mind to complete, making myself (them) believe to have the best and how they will. I broke down on Thursday, November 3 and told Sheriff Howard what the truth. It wasn't easy, just after the truth was out, I felt like the heart was lifted off my shoulders. I know now that it is going to be a rough and long road ahead of me. At the very moment, I don't feel I will be able to handle what's coming, but I have prayed to God what he give me the strength to survive each day and to see these times and situations in my life that will be extremely painful. I have put my total faith in God and he will take care of me.

stances surrounding the interrogation, but the ultimate inquiry is simply whether there was a formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement of the degree associated with a formal arrest. The initial determination of custody depends on the objective circumstances of the interrogation, not on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned. A police officer's subjective view that the individual under questioning is a suspect, if undisclosed, does not bear upon the question of whether the individual is in custody for purposes of Miranda.

An officer's knowledge or beliefs may bear upon the custody issue if they are conveyed, by word or deed, to the individual being questioned. Those beliefs are relevant only to the extent they would affect how a reasonable person in the position of the individual being questioned would gauge the breadth of his or her freedom of action. Even a clear statement from an officer that the person under interrogation is a prime suspect is not, in itself, dispositive of the custody issue. The weight and pertinence of any communications regarding the officer's degree of suspicion will depend upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case. In sum, an officer's views concerning the nature of an interrogation, or beliefs concerning the potential culpability of the individual being questioned, may be one among many factors that bear upon the assessment of whether that individual was in custody, but only if the officer's views or beliefs were somehow manifested to the individual under interrogation and would have affected how a reasonable person in that position would perceive his or her freedom to leave.

The prophylactic safeguards of Miranda have been extended to pre-trial, court-ordered psychiatric examinations of defendants charged with capital offenses. It has been held that a defendant's constitutional right against compelled self-incrimination precludes subjecting him or her to a psychiatric examination without first informing the defendant of the right to remain silent and that anything the defendant says can be used against him or her at a capital sentencing proceeding.

Courts have ruled that the inherent unreliability of an involuntary confession requires its exclusion from the penalty phase of a capital prosecution as a proffered non-statutory aggravating circumstance. The exclusion of such evidence is not diminished by the mere fact that a capital felon pled guilty to the crimes related to the confessions. See also Bill of Rights; *Bram v. Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution entitles a defendant to have a jury determine aggravating and mitigating circumstances at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution when a jury presided over the guilt phases.

Case Holding: Absent a waiver by the defendant, the Constitution does not permit a trial judge to determine aggravating and mitigating circumstances at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution when a jury presided over the guilt phase.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: On November 28, 1994, Timothy Ring and two accomplices robbed a Wells Fargo armored car and killed the driver. Ring was subsequently arrested and charged with capital murder and other crimes. A jury presided over the guilt phase of the case. At the conclusion of the trial, the jury found Ring guilty of felony murder. Under Arizona law, it was required in capital cases that the trial judge alone preside over the penalty phase, to determine the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances. The trial judge found two aggravating circumstances and one mitigating factor. After determining that the mitigating factor did not call for leniency, the trial judge sentenced Ring to death. In his appeal to the Arizona Supreme Court, Ring argued that, in light of the United States Supreme Court's decision in the non-capital punishment case of Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), his death sentence was invalid because he was denied the right to have a jury determine the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances. The State Supreme Court rejected the argument on the grounds that the United States Supreme Court had approved of Arizona's use of a judge at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution in the case of Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639 (1990). The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to determine whether Walton should be overruled in light of Apprendi.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Ginsburg: Justice Ginsburg determined that the decision in Walton could no longer remain good law in the face of Apprendi, even though Apprendi involved the use of a jury to increase a non-capital punishment sentence. The opinion addressed the issue as follows:

Although the doctrine of stare decisis is of fundamental importance to the rule of law, our precedents are not sacrosanct. We have overruled prior decisions where the necessity and propriety of doing so has been established. We are satisfied that this is such a case.

For the reasons stated, we hold that Walton and Apprendi are irreconcilable; our Sixth Amendment jurisprudence cannot be home to both. Accordingly, we overrule Walton to the extent that it allows a sentencing judge, sitting without a jury, to find an aggravating circumstance necessary for imposition of the death penalty. Because Arizona's enumerated aggravating factors operate as the functional equivalent of an element of a greater offense, Sixth Amendment requires that they be found by a jury.

The right to trial by jury guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment would be senselessly diminished if it encompassed the factfinding necessary to increase a defendant's sentence by two years, but not the factfinding necessary to put him to death. We hold that the Sixth Amendment applies to both. The judgment of the Arizona Supreme Court is therefore reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to underscore his belief that factors which increase any sentence should be proven beyond a reasonable doubt by a jury at the guilt phase. Justice Scalia also pointed out that he did not believe the decision in the case prevented a judge, rather than a jury, from imposing the death penalty. That is, a jury is only required to determine the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy wrote separately to emphasize that he believed Apprendi was wrongly decided, but that since it was now the law, it had to be applied to capital cases.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Breyer: Justice Breyer concurred in the Court's judgment, but not its reasoning. He believed that the Eighth Amendment, and not the Sixth Amendment, entitled a capital defendant to have a jury determine the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which Rehnquist, C.J., Joined: Justice O'Connor dissented from the majority opinion. She believed that Apprendi was wrongly decided and that the Court should have overruled Apprendi instead of Walton. See also Jury Trial; Schriro v. Summerlin; Walton v. Arizona

Ripper Crew Cult Murders The Ripper Crew was a satanic cult composed of Robin Gecht, Edward Spreitzer, and brothers Andrew and Thomas Kokoraleis. Authorities believed that, during 1981 and 1982, the cult members abducted and murdered eighteen women, many of whom were prostitutes, from the streets of Chicago.

The Ripper Crew murdered their victims in ritualistic fashion. They cut off the left breast of a victim and ate it as Gecht read passages from the Bible.

On October 6, 1982, authorities got a break in their investigation of the numerous unsolved disappearances of women from the Chicago streets. On that day, one of the Ripper Crew's victims was found alive beside a Chicago railroad track. Her left breast had been severed. The victim was able to identify Gecht as one of her attackers.

Andrew Kokoraleis (left) and Edward Spreitzer (right). Andrew was executed on March 16, 1999. Edward's death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment, as a result of Illinois Governor George Ryan's commutation of the death sentences of all death row inmates in the state in 2003. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

Gecht was arrested on October 20 and shortly thereafter all the members of the Ripper Crew were arrested. It did not take long before the Ripper Crew began pointing fingers at each other and telling authorities about some of their victims.

Gecht was prosecuted in September 1983 on attempted murder charges involving the surviving victim. He was found guilty and sentenced to 120 years in prison. Authorities were never able to obtain sufficient evidence to prosecute him for the murder of any of the victims. Thomas Kokoraleis was convicted of the death of one victim and sentenced to life imprisonment, but obtained a reversal of the conviction on appeal. Subsequently, he entered a plea bargain and was sentenced to seventy years in prison.

On April 2, 1984, Spreitzer pled guilty to four counts of murder and was sentenced to life imprisonment for each murder. Spreitzer was prosecuted in 1986 for the murder of another victim and was sentenced to death on March 20 of that year. Spreitzer's death sentence was eventually commuted to life imprisonment, as a result of Illinois governor George Ryan's commutation of the death sentences of all death row inmates in the state in 2003.

Andrew Kokoraleis was prosecuted for the murder of one victim and was sentenced to life imprisonment. He was subsequently prosecuted for the death of another victim. He was found guilty and, on March 18, 1985, was sentenced to death. On March 17, 1999, the State of Illinois executed Andrew Kokoraleis by lethal injection.

Robbery The crime of robbery is a felony offense that is generally defined as the unlawful taking of property of another, from his or her person or in his or her presence, through the use or threat of force or violence. Robbery, without more, cannot be used to inflict the death penalty. The Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits this as cruel and unusual punishment. However, the crime of robbery can play a role in a capital prosecution. If robbery occurs during the commission of a homicide it may form the basis of a death-eligible offense and therefore trigger a capital prosecution. Roberts, John G., Jr. John G. Roberts, Jr., was nominated by President George W. Bush to fill an associate justice vacancy on the United States Supreme Court in July 2005. However, while the nomination was pending confirmation by the United States Senate, the chief justice of the Supreme Court died on September 3, 2005. Consequently, President Bush withdrew Roberts's nomination for associate justice and, on September 6, 2005, Roberts was nominated to be chief justice of the Supreme Court. After swift confirmation proceedings, Roberts took his seat as chief justice on September 29, 2005. Roberts came to the Supreme Court with a reputation of having a conservative judicial philosophy.

Roberts was born in Buffalo, New York, on January 27, 1955. He received an undergraduate degree from Harvard College in 1976 and a law degree from Harvard Law School in 1979. After leaving law school, Roberts served briefly as a law clerk for the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and the United States Supreme Court. From 1981 to 1993, Roberts served as an attorney for several federal agencies. Between 1993 and 2003, Roberts maintained a private law practice in Washington, D.C. In 2003, he was appointed to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where he served until his appointment to the Supreme Court.

Roberts's conservative judicial reputation has revealed itself in the area of capital punishment. This was evident from his concurring and dissenting opinion in the capital case of House v. Bell. In Bell, the majority of the Supreme Court held that the defendant did not establish an actual innocence claim for independent federal habeas corpus purposes. However, the majority found that the defendant did present sufficient new evidence to permit his defaulted claims to be heard in a federal habeas proceeding. Roberts agreed with the majority that the defendant did not establish an actual innocence claim for an independent federal habeas proceeding. However, Roberts dissented on the second issue. Roberts took the extreme conservative position that, because it was possible that at least one juror might vote to convict the defendant, the defendant was not entitled to raise his defaulted claims in a federal habeas proceeding.

Roberts, Owen J. Owen J. Roberts served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1930 to 1945. While on the Supreme Court, Roberts was known as a justice whose judicial philosophy was not "black or white." Roberts took constitutional positions that swung from conservative to moderate to liberal.

Roberts was born in Germantown, Pennsylvania, on May 2, 1875. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania where he received an undergraduate degree in 1895 and a law degree in 1898. His career included being a prosecutor and law professor at the University of Pennsylvania. In 1930, President Herbert Hoover appointed Roberts to the Supreme Court.

Roberts was known to have written only three capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. The capital punishment opinion which has kept Roberts's name relevant in this area of the law was his opinion for the Supreme Court in Buchalter v. New York. The decision in Buchalter involved death sentences that were returned against three members of New York's infamous Murder, Inc., crime organization. In Buchalter, Roberts affirmed the judgments against the defendants, although clear evidence indicated the defendants' trial was marred by extensive pre-trial publicity. Roberts took a conservative approach to the issue of pre-trial publicity and deferred to the ruling by New York courts that due process of law was not infringed upon because of pre-trial publicity. Roberts retired from the Court in 1945 in order to return to academia. He died on May 17, 1955.

Issue Presented: Whether the mandatory imposition of the sentence of death for the crime of first-degree murder under the law of Louisiana violates the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Case Holding: The mandatory imposition of the sentence of death for the crime of first-degree murder under the law of Louisiana violates the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: On August 18, 1973, the defendant, Stanislaus Roberts, and three accomplices murdered a gas station attendant in Louisiana. The defendant was charged with first-degree murder under Louisiana's new death penalty statute, which was enacted in response to the invalidation of all death penalty statutes by the decision in Furman v. Georgia. The State's post-Furman death penalty statute mandated imposition of the death penalty for five categories of homicide. If a verdict of guilty of first-degree murder was returned, death was mandated regardless of any mercy recommendation.

The defendant was found guilty of first-degree murder and sentenced to death. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed, after rejecting the defendant's claim that the new mandatory death penalty statute was unconstitutional. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Stevens Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Stewart and Powell JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens asserted at the outset that the imposition of the death penalty was not per se cruel and unusual punishment violative of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. However, it was concluded that Louisiana's mandatory death penalty statute violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The plurality opinion gave the following reasons for the judgment of the Court:

The history of mandatory death penalty statutes indicates a firm society view that limiting the scope of capital murder is an inadequate response to the harshness and inflexibility of a mandatory death sentence statute. A large group of jurisdiction[s] first responded to the unacceptable severity of the common-law rule of automatic death sentences for all murder convictions by narrowing the definition of capital homicide. Each of these jurisdictions found that approach insufficient and subsequently substituted discretionary sentencing for mandatory death sentences.

The futility of attempting to solve the problems of mandatory death penalty statutes by narrowing the scope of the capital offense stems from our society's rejection of the belief that every offense in alike legal category calls for an identical punishment without regard to the past life and habits of a particular offender....

The constitutional vice of mandatory death sentence statute — lack of focus on the circumstances of the particular offense and the character and propensities of the offender — is not resolved by Louisiana's limitation of first-degree murder to various categories of killings. The diversity of circumstances presented in cases falling within the single category of killings during the commission of a specified felony, as well as the variety of possible offenders involved in such crimes, underscores the rigidity of Louisiana's enactment.... Even the other more narrowly drawn categories of first-degree murderer in the Louisiana law afford no meaningful opportunity for consideration of mitigating factors presented by the circumstances of the particular crime or by the attributes of the individual offender.

Louisiana's mandatory death sentence statute also fails to comply with Furman's requirements that standardless jury discretion be replaced by procedures that safeguard against the arbitrary and capricious imposition of death sentences. The State claims that it has adopted satisfactory procedures by taking all sentencing authority from juries in capital murder cases. This was accomplished, according to the State, by deleting the jury's pre-Furman authority to return a verdict of guilty without capital punishment in any murder case.

Under the current Louisiana system, however, every jury in a first-degree murder case is instructed on the crimes of second-degree murder and manslaughter and permitted to consider those verdicts even if there is not a scintilla of evidence to support the lesser verdicts. And, if a lesser verdict is returned, it is treated as an acquittal of all greater charges. This responsive verdict procedure not only lacks standards to guide the jury in selecting among first-degree murders, but it plainly invites the jurors to disregard their oaths and choose a verdict for a lesser offense whenever they feel the death penalty is inappropriate. There is an element of capriciousness in making the jurors' power to avoid the death penalty dependent on their willingness to accept this invitation to disregard the trial judge's instructions. The Louisiana procedure neither provides standards to channel jury judgments nor permits review to check the arbitrary exercise of the capital jury's de facto sentencing discretion.

The judgment of the Louisiana Supreme Court was reversed insofar as it upheld the death sentence imposed upon the defendant.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan wrote that he concurred in the judgment for the reasons stated in his dissenting opinion in Gregg v. Georgia.

Concurring Statement by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall wrote that he concurred in the judgment for the reasons stated in his dissenting opinion in Gregg v. Georgia.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice White, in Which Burger, CJ., and Blackmun and Rehnquist, JJ., Joined: Justice White believed that Louisiana's new death penalty statute did not violate the Constitution. He wrote: "As I see it, we are ... in no position to rule that the State's present law, having eliminated the overt discretionary power of juries, suffers from the same constitutional infirmities which led this Court to invalidate the Georgia death penalty statute in Furman v. Georgia." The dissent reasoned: "Louisiana [has] returned to the mandatory capital punishment system for certain crimes. [Its] legislature ha[s] not deemed mandatory punishment, once the crime is proved, to be unacceptable; nor have ... juries rejected it, for the death penalty has been imposed with some regularity. Perhaps we would prefer that the State had adopted a different system, but the issue is not our individual preferences but the constitutionality of the mandatory system chosen by the ... State. I see no warrant under the Eighth Amendment for refusing to uphold the statute."

Dissenting Statement by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice issued a statement indicating he dissented for the reasons set forth in his dissent in Furman v. Georgia.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun issued a statement indicating he dissented for the reasons set forth in his dissent in Furman v. Georgia.

Case Note: This case was one of numerous cases decided by the Court in 1976 which invalidated death sentences that were imposed under mandatory death sentence statutes. Subsequent to the decision in this case, Louisiana amended its death penalty statute so as to comply with the Constitution. *See also Mandatory Death Penalty Statutes; Roberts v. Issue Presented: Whether Louisiana's mandatory death penalty requirement for killing a law enforcement officer in the line of duty violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Case Holding: A mandatory death sentence imposed for killing a law enforcement officer in the line of duty violates the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Harry Roberts, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Louisiana. The victim of the offense was a police officer who, at the time of his death, was engaged in the performance of his lawful duties. As required by Louisiana's death penalty statute, punishment for the offense was a mandatory death sentence. The defendant was, accordingly, sentenced to death. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the constitutional validity of the mandatory death sentence.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion noted that shortly before the defendant filed his petition with the Court, it decided the case of Roberts v. Louisiana (I), wherein it was held that Louisiana could not enforce its mandatory death penalty statute for a conviction of first-degree murder where the victim was not a police officer. Therefore, the outcome of the case was dictated by Roberts v. Louisiana (I). The Court pointed out that “it is essential that the capital-sentencing decision allow for consideration of whatever mitigating circumstances may be relevant to either the particular offender or the particular offense.”

The opinion went on to reason as follows: “To be sure, the fact that the murder victim was a peace officer performing his regular duties may be regarded as an aggravating circumstance. There is a special interest in affording protection to these public servants who regularly must risk their lives in order to guard the safety of other persons and property. But it is incorrect to suppose that no mitigating circumstances can exist when the victim is a police officer. Circumstances such as the youth of the offender, the absence of any prior conviction, the influence of drugs, alcohol, or extreme emotional disturbance, and even the existence of circumstances which the offender reasonably believed provided a moral justification for his conduct are all examples of mitigating facts which might attend the killing of a peace officer and which are considered relevant in other jurisdictions.”

The Court found that imposition of a mandatory sentence of death for killing a police officer violated the Constitution. Therefore, the judgment of the Louisiana Supreme Court was reversed and the case remanded.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which White and Rehnquist, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun argued that the Constitution did not prohibit Louisiana from enforcing a mandatory death penalty for killing a police officer. He wrote that he “would uphold the State’s power to impose such a punishment ... and I would reject any statements or intimations to the contrary in the Court’s prior cases.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist, in Which White, J., Joined: Justice Rehnquist articulated strong disagreement with the majority’s decision. He believed that Louisiana had a constitutional right to enforce its mandatory death sentence statute. The dissent wrote: “The Court today holds that the State of Louisiana is not entitled to vindicate its substantial interests in protecting the foot soldiers of an ordered society by mandatorily sentencing their murderers to death. This is so even though the State has demonstrated to a jury in a fair trial, beyond a reasonable doubt, that a particular defendant was the murderer, and that he committed the act while possessing ‘a specific intent to kill, or to inflict great bodily harm upon, ... a peace officer who was engaged in the performance of his lawful duties....’ That holding would have shocked those who drafted the Bill of Rights on which it purports to rest, and would commend itself only to the most imaginative observer as being required by today’s ‘evolving standards of decency.’”

Dissenting Statement by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice issued a statement which read: “I would sustain the Louisiana statute and I therefore dissent on the basis of my dissenting statement in Roberts v. Louisiana (I), and that of Mr. Justice White in Woodson v. North Carolina.”

Case Note: The decision in this case was issued as a per curiam opinion, rather than a memorandum order, because it involved a different provision of Louisiana’s death penalty statute than did the plurality opinion in Roberts v. Louisiana (I). See also Mandatory Death Penalty Statutes; Roberts v. Louisiana (I);

Robinson v. United States Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Robinson v. United States, 324 U.S. 282 (1945); Argued: February 8, 1945; Decided: March 5, 1945; Opinion of the Court: Justice Black; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Rutledge, in which Murphy, J., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: Robert E. Hogan argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Edward J. Ennis argued and briefed; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: None; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: None

Issue Presented: Whether, under the Federal Kidnapping Act, a sentence of death may only be imposed if the victim’s injuries were permanent or the injuries were in existence at the time of the defendant’s sentencing.

Case Holding: Under the Federal Kidnapping Act, a sentence of death may be imposed even though the victim’s injuries were not permanent or the injuries were not in existence at the time of the defendant’s sentencing.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robinson, was indicted by the United States for violating the Federal Kidnapping Act (Act). The Act authorized the death sentence when the kidnapped victim was harmed. The evidence presented to the jury was to the effect that the kidnapping victim yielded to capture only after the defendant had twice violently struck her on the head with an iron bar; that while held in custody the victim’s lips were abraded and made swollen by repeated applications of tape on her mouth; and that wounds resulting from those assaults were not healed when she was liberated after six days of captivity. There was no evidence introduced that the injuries inflicted were permanent, or that the victim still suffered from them when the defendant was tried. The trial court instructed the jury that, in determining whether the victim had been liberated unharmed, they were limited to a consideration of her condition at the time she was liberated and that they were not authorized to recommend the death penalty if at the time of her liberation she had recovered from her injuries. The jury convicted the defendant and sentenced him to death.

The defendant appealed the judgment to a federal Court of Appeals, arguing that, under the Act, a sentence of death could only be imposed if the victim’s injuries were permanent or the injuries had to be in existence at the time of sentencing. The Court of Appeals rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black rejected the defendant’s argument that the Act required the victim’s injuries be permanent. The opinion found that the term “permanent injury” was not used in the Act. Justice Black stated the Court’s position as follows: “The quality of the injury to which Congress referred is not defined. It may be possible that some types of injury would be of such trifling nature as to be excluded from the category of injuries which Congress had in mind. We need indulge in no speculation in regard to such a category. The injuries inflicted upon his victim were of such degree that they cannot be read out of the Act’s scope without contracting it to the point where almost all injuries would be excluded. We find no justification whatever for grafting the word ‘permanent’ onto the language which Congress adopted.” The opinion stated further: “One thing about this Act is not uncertain, and that is the clear purpose of Congress to authorize juries to recommend and judges to inflict the death penalty, under certain circumstances, for kidnappers who harmed their victims. And we cannot doubt that a kidnapper who violently struck the head of his victim with an iron bar, as evidence showed that this [defendant] did, comes within the group Congress had in mind. This purpose to authorize a death penalty is clear even though Congress did not unmistakably mark some boundary between a pin prick and a permanently mutilated body. It is for Congress and not for us to decide whether it is wise public policy to inflict the death penalty at all. We do not know what provision of law, constitutional or statutory, gives us power wholly to nullify the clearly expressed purpose of Congress to authorize the death penalty because of a doubt as to the precise congressional purpose in regard to hypothetical cases that may never arise.”

The opinion also rejected the defendant’s contention that the victim’s injuries had to be in existence at the time of his sentencing. Justice Black wrote: “Nor can we construe the proviso as precluding the death sentence where the kidnapped person’s injuries have been healed at the time sentence is imposed. It is not to be assumed that Congress intended a matter of such grave consequence to defendants and the public to turn on the fortuitous circumstance of the length of time that a case is pending in the courts. Far too many contingencies are involved, for example, the time it takes to apprehend a criminal, the condition of the trial docket, and the uncertainties of appeals. We would long hesitate before interpreting the Act so as to make the severity of sentence turn upon the date sentence is ultimately imposed, even if the language of the Act more readily lent itself to such a construction than this one does. At the very least, the proviso’s language must mean that the kidnapped person shall not be suffering from injuries when liberated; the kidnapped person here was still suffering from her injuries when liberated.” The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rutledge, in Which Murphy, J., Joined: Justice Rutledge dissented from the Court’s decision. He believed the Act should not have been interpreted so as to impose the death penalty on the defendant under the facts of the case. Justice Rutledge argued as follows:

This case involves the law’s extreme penalty. That penalty should not rest on doubtful command or vague and uncertain conditions. The words used here, for its imposition, are too general and unprecise, the purposes Congress had in using them too obscure and contradictory, the consequences of applying them are too capricious, whether for the victim or for the kidnapper, to permit their giving foundation for exercise of the power of life and death over the citizen, though he be [a] convicted criminal. Other penalties might be rectified with time, if wrong. This one cannot be.

... I think the statute turns the power to impose the death penalty upon facts so vaguely defined that only judicial legislation can remedy the defect. This is not the kind of thing courts should be left to work out case by case through the gradual process of inclusion and exclusion. This business rather belongs to Congress, not to the courts. As the Court’s opinion states, though I think in contradiction of its judgment, “It is for Congress and not for us to decide whether it is wise public policy to inflict the death penalty at all.” Congress’ mandate in such matters must be clear; otherwise we, not Congress, decide. In this one it is beyond understanding.

penalty may not be imposed for crimes that do not involve death. See also Crimes Not Involving Death

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him; therefore, the judgment against him could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Dan Rogers, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Alabama. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant’s contention that the judgment against him was invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Holmes: Justice Holmes held that the defendant presented sufficient evidence to find that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury. It was said that under new provisions of the State’s constitution blacks were disqualified from serving on grand juries. The opinion concluded as follows: “We are of opinion that the Federal question is raised by the record, and is properly before us. That question is disposed of by Carter v. Texas, and it was error not to apply that decision. The result of that and the earlier cases may be summed up in the following words of the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Gray: ‘Whenever, by any action of a state, whether through its legislature, through its courts, or through its executive or administrative officers, all persons of the African race are excluded, solely because of their race or color, from serving as grand jurors in the criminal prosecution of a person of the African race, the equal protection of the laws is denied to him, contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.’” The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was reversed. *See also Carter v. Issue Presented: Whether detaining the defendant in solitary confinement until her execution was in violation of due process of law.

Case Holding: Detaining the defendant in solitary confinement until her execution was not in violation of due process of law, as such confinement was provided for by State law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Mary Mabel Rogers, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Vermont. Pursuant to statutory authority, the trial court sentenced the defendant to three months' hard labor, to be followed by three months of solitary confinement, which would be followed by execution by hanging. The Vermont Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. Subsequently, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging she was being held in solitary confinement violation of due process of law. The district court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Day: Justice Day held that confinement of the defendant in solitary confinement was authorized by the State's death penalty laws. The opinion ruled that due process of law was not violated in the manner in which the defendant was sentenced. Justice Day disposed of the case as follows:

The court, in sentencing the [defendant] to be hanged..., imposed a sentence of three months at hard labor until within three months of the time fixed for the execution, and three months of solitary confinement next before the day of execution....

In the present case no sentence or law is being violated, and, assuming the [defendant] to be held in solitary confinement, there is nothing to prevent her having relief at the hands of the state authorities, and nothing to show that the [defendant] is being deprived of her liberty in violation of any right secured to her by the Federal Constitution.

The extent of the right of the Federal courts to interfere by the writ of habeas corpus with the proceedings of courts and other authorities of a state is carefully defined by statute. When a prisoner is in jail he may be released upon habeas corpus when held in violation of his constitutional rights. In the case before us, assuming for this purpose that the [defendant] has been properly convicted and sentenced of one of the gravest offenses known to the law, she is properly restrained of her liberty while in custody, for the purpose of making the sentence effectual. If her custodian is improperly restricting her freedom more than is necessary or legal under state law, there is no reason to suppose that the state authorities will not afford the necessary relief. And certainly there is nothing in this branch of the case to justify Federal interference with the local authority intrusted with the keeping of the prisoner.

The reluctance with which this court will sanction Federal interference with a state in the administration of its domestic law for the prosecution of crime has been frequently stated in the deliverances of the court upon the subject. It is only where fundamental rights, specially secured by the Federal Constitution, are invaded, that such interference is warranted.

We are unable to find that the [defendant] has sustained any violation of rights secured by the Federal Constitution by the proceedings of the executive or judicial departments of the state of Vermont.

The judgment of the District Court was affirmed.

Issue Presented: Whether it was error for the courts of Connecticut to focus upon the truth or falsity of the defendant's confessions, in permitting their use at trial

Case Holding: It was error for the courts of Connecticut to focus upon the truth or falsity of the defendant's confessions, in permitting their use at trial, when the relevant constitutional inquiry was whether the confessions were coerced.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Rogers, was found guilty of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Connecticut. On appeal, Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his confessions were involuntary. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, arguing that his conviction violated the Due Process Clause because it was based upon his involuntary confessions. The district court denied relief. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter held that the defendant's conviction could not stand because the State court used the wrong test in determining the voluntariness of the confessions. It was said that the State courts focused upon whether the confessions were "probably" true, instead of ascertaining whether the confessions were coerced. Justice Frankfurter addressed the issues as follows:

Our decisions under that Amendment have made clear that convictions following the admission into evidence of confessions which are involuntary, i. e., the product of coercion, either physical or psychological, cannot stand. This is so not because such confessions are unlikely to be true but because the methods used to extract them offend an underlying principle in the enforcement of our criminal law: that ours is an accusatorial and not an inquisitorial system — a system in which the State must establish guilt by evidence independently and freely secured and may not by coercion prove its charge against an accused out of his own mouth....

From a fair reading of [the record], we cannot but conclude that the question whether Rogers' confessions were admissible into evidence was answered by reference to a legal standard which took into account the circumstance of probable truth or falsity. And this is not a permissible standard under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The attention of the trial judge should have been focused, for purposes of the Federal Constitution, on the question whether the behavior of the State's law enforcement officials was such as to overbear [the defendant's] will to resist and bring about confessions not freely self-determined — a question to be answered with complete disregard of whether or not [the defendant] in fact spoke the truth. The employment instead, by the trial judge and the Supreme Court of Errors, of a standard infected by the inclusion of references to probable reliability resulted in a constitutionally invalid conviction, pursuant to which Rogers is now detained "in violation of the Constitution." A defendant has the right to be tried according to the substantive and procedural due process requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment. This means that a vital confession, such as is involved in this case, may go to the jury only if it is subjected to screening in accordance with correct constitutional standards. To the extent that in the trial of Rogers evidence was allowed to go to the jury on the basis of standards that departed from constitutional requirements, to that extent he was unconstitutionally tried and the conviction was vitiated by error of constitutional dimension.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stewart, in Which Clark, J., Joined: Justice Stewart dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the Court should have remanded the case for a hearing to determine whether the confessions were involuntary. Justice Stewart believed: "Where, as here, the state trial court's determination of admissibility was at least partly affected by the impermissible factor of probable reliability, ... there can be no question of the federal court's duty to hold such a hearing." See also Right to Remain Silent

Issue Presented: Whether admission of evidence of an unrelated prior death sentence at the defendant's penalty phase proceeding violated the Constitution.

Case Holding: Admission of evidence of an unrelated prior death sentence at the defendant's penalty phase proceeding did not violate the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: John Joseph Romano was convicted of capital murder by the State of Oklahoma. During the penalty phase of his trial, the prosecutor introduced a copy of the judgment and death sentence the defendant had received for another, unrelated murder. The jury sentenced the defendant to a second sentence of death. In affirming the conviction and sentence, the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals acknowledged that the evidence of the defendant's prior death sentence was irrelevant to determining the appropriateness of the second death sentence, but found that admission of the evidence did not violate the United States Supreme Court's decision in Caldwell v. Mississippi or so infect the sentencing determination with unfairness as to amount to a denial of due process. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice held that admission of evidence regarding the defendant's prior death sentence did not amount to constitutional error. It was said that, under Caldwell, prosecutors are prohibited from introducing evidence that misleads the jury as to its role in the sentencing process. The opinion found that admission of the evidence did not contravene the principle established in Caldwell because the evidence did not affirmatively mislead the jury regarding its role in the sentencing process so as to diminish its sense of responsibility for the capital sentencing decision. The chief justice pointed out that the evidence was not false at the time it was admitted and did not even pertain to the jury's sentencing role.

The opinion acknowledged that the evidence may have been irrelevant, but that the jury's consideration of it did not render the sentencing proceeding so unreliable that it violated the Constitution. The chief justice found that the fact that the evidence may have been irrelevant as a matter of State law did not render its admission a federal constitutional error.

It was also said that introduction of the evidence did not so infect the trial with unfairness as to render the jury's imposition of the death penalty a denial of due process. The chief justice wrote that, presuming the trial court's instructions were followed, the instruction did not offer the jurors any means by which to give effect to the irrelevant evidence of the defendant's prior death sentence. The opinion concluded: "Even assuming that the jury disregarded the trial court's instructions and allowed the evidence of [the defendant's] prior death sentence to influence its decision, it is impossible to know how this evidence might have affected the jury. It seems equally plausible that the evidence could have made the jurors more inclined to impose a death sentence, or it could have made them less inclined to do so. Either conclusion necessarily rests upon one's intuition. To hold on the basis of this record that the admission of evidence relating to [the defendant's] sentence in the [other] case rendered [his] sentencing proceeding for [this] murder fundamentally unfair would thus be an exercise in speculation, rather than reasoned judgment."

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's decision on the basis that the evidence introduced was truthful. She wrote as follows:

I believe that [defendant's] Caldwell claim fails because the evidence here was accurate, at the time it was admitted. [The defendant's] sentencing jury was told that he had been sentenced to death — and indeed he had been. Introducing that evidence is no different than providing the jury with an accurate description of a State's appellate review process. Both may (though we can never know for sure) lessen the jury's sense of responsibility, but neither is unconstitutional. Though evidence like that involved in this case can rise to the level of a Caldwell violation, to do so the evidence must be both inaccurate and tend to undermine the jury's sense of responsibility.

It may well have been better practice for the State to agree to accept [the defendant's] stipulation offer, or to excise the sentencing information before submitting the Judgment and Sentence form to the jury. But under our precedents, because this evidence was accurate, I do not believe its introduction violated the Constitution.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the Constitution precluded introduction of evidence of the defendant's prior death sentence because it "created an unacceptable risk of leading the jurors to minimize the importance of their roles." Justice Blackmun concluded: "Even if this particular constitutional error were not present in this case, I would vacate Romano's death sentence and remand for resentencing in adherence to my view that the death penalty cannot be imposed fairly within the constraints of our Constitution."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Ginsburg, in Which Blackmun, Stevens, and Souter, JJ., Joined: Justice Ginsburg argued in her dissent that the principle established by Caldwell controlled the facts of the case and the sentence should therefore be vacated. She wrote: "In my view, this principle, reiterated throughout the Court's Caldwell opinion, covers the present case: The jury's consideration of evidence at the capital sentencing phase of ... Romano's trial, that a prior jury had already sentenced Romano to death, infected the jury's life-or-death deliberations as did the prosecutorial comments condemned in Caldwell. Accordingly, I would vacate the death sentence imposed upon Romano and remand for a new sentencing hearing." See also Prior Felony or Homicide Aggravator Issue Presented: Whether the constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel requires a defendant's attorney to make a reasonable effort to obtain and review material that counsel knows the prosecutor will rely upon as aggravating evidence at the penalty phase.

Case Holding: The constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel requires a defendant's attorney make a reasonable effort to obtain and review material that counsel knows the prosecutor will rely upon as aggravating evidence at the penalty phase.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Pennsylvania charged Ronald Rompilla with the 1988 capital murder of James Scanlon. A jury convicted the defendant of the crime. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor sought to establish several aggravating circumstances, one of which included the defendant's prior criminal record. Although the defendant's court-appointed counsel knew that the prosecutor was going to use the prior conviction record at the penalty phase, counsel failed to obtain and review the prior conviction file before the penalty phase proceeding began. At the conclusion of the penalty phase, the jury found the aggravating circumstances outweighed the mitigating circumstances and sentenced the defendant to death. The conviction and sentence were upheld on direct appeal and in a subsequent State habeas corpus proceeding.

The defendant eventually filed a federal habeas corpus petition. The defendant alleged in the petition that he was denied his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase, because his trial counsel failed timely to obtain and review his prior conviction file before the penalty phase proceeding began. A federal district judge agreed with the defendant and set aside the death sentence. However, a Court of Appeals found that there was no ineffective assistance of counsel and reversed the district judge's decision. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Souter: Justice Souter found that the defendant established ineffective assistance of counsel. In the opinion, Justice Souter set out detailed information that was in the prior conviction file, which could have been used as mitigating evidence and which could have better prepared defense counsel to rebut the aggravating information in the file. Justice Souter addressed the issue as follows:

The notion that defense counsel must obtain information that the State has and will use against the defendant is not simply a matter of common sense. As the District Court points out, the American Bar Association Standards for Criminal Justice in circulation at the time of Rompilla's trial describes the obligation in terms no one could misunderstand in the circumstances of a case like this one:

It is the duty of the lawyer to conduct a prompt investigation of the circumstances of the case and to explore all avenues leading to facts relevant to the merits of the case and the penalty in the event of conviction. The investigation should always include efforts to secure information in the possession of the prosecution and law enforcement authorities. The duty to investigate exists regardless of the accused's admissions or statements to the lawyer of facts constituting guilt or the accused's stated desire to plead guilty.

... It flouts prudence to deny that a defense lawyer should try to look at a file he knows the prosecution will cull for aggravating evidence, let alone when the file is sitting in the trial courthouse, open for the asking. No reasonable lawyer would forgo examination of the file thinking he could do as well by asking the defendant or family relations whether they recalled anything helpful or damaging in the prior victim's testimony. Nor would a reasonable lawyer compare possible searches for school reports, juvenile records, and evidence of drinking habits to the opportunity to take a look at a file disclosing what the prosecutor knows and even plans to read from in his case. Questioning a few more family members and searching for old records can promise less than looking for a needle in a haystack, when a lawyer truly has reason to doubt there is any needle there. But looking at a file the prosecution says it will use is a sure bet: whatever may be in that file is going to tell defense counsel something about what the prosecution can produce.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded for the State of Pennsylvania to retry the penalty phase or stipulate to a life sentence.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor concurred in the opinion of the Court. She wrote separately to underscore the fact that the Court's opinion did not impose any new burden on defense counsel in capital punishment cases. She argued that the Court merely applied the existing standards to determine whether counsel acted reasonably in making an investigation of the defendant's case.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Kennedy, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., Scalia and Thomas, JJ., Joined: Justice Kennedy dissented from the Court's judgment. He believed that the Court established a new standard which requires defense counsel to review all documents in a defendant's prior conviction file, regardless of the futility of such an investigation. *See also Court-Appointed Counsel; Mitigating Circumstances; Right to Counsel; Wiggins v. Issue Presented: Whether application of a new death penalty statute to the defendant violated ex post facto principles.

Case Holding: Application of a new death penalty statute to the defendant did not violate ex post facto principles because the new law only made minor procedural changes that did not adversely affect the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Rooney, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of North Dakota. The North Dakota Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the application of new death penalty procedures to him violated ex post facto principles. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan ruled that the changes in the State's death penalty law involved procedural matters that did not implicate the Ex Post Facto Clause. He said the new law merely (1) extended the time before execution, (2) required convicted capital felons be maintained in the State penitentiary prior to execution, and (3) required the execution take place within the State penitentiary. Under prior law, county jails were used to hold capital felons and execution of a death sentence was done in the yard of a county jail. Justice Day disposed of the case as follows:

We are of opinion that [the new statute] is not repugnant to the constitutional provision declaring that no state shall pass an ex post facto law. It did not create a new offense, nor aggravate or increase the enormity of the crime for the commission of which the accused was convicted, nor require the infliction upon the accused of any greater or more severe punishment than was prescribed by law at the time of the commission of the offense. The changes, looked at in the light of reason and common sense and applied to the present case, are to be taken as favorable, rather than as unfavorable, to him. It may be sometimes difficult to say whether particular changes in the law are or are not in mitigation of the punishment for crimes previously committed. But it must be taken that there is such mitigation when, by the later law, there is an enlargement of the period of confinement prior to the actual execution of the criminal by hanging. The giving, by the later statute, of three months additional time to live, after the rendition of judgment, was clearly to his advantage, for the court must assume that every rational person desires to live as long as he may. If the shortening of the time of confinement, whether in the county jail or in the penitentiary, before execution, would have increased, as undoubtedly it would have increased, the punishment to the disadvantage of a criminal sentenced to be hung, the enlargement of such time must be deemed a change for his benefit. So that a statute which mitigates the rigor of the law in force at the time a crime was committed cannot be regarded as ex post facto with reference to that crime. Besides, the extension of the time to live, given by the later law, increased the opportunity of the accused to obtain a pardon or commutation from the governor of the state before his execution.

Nor was the punishment, in any substantial sense, increased or made more severe by substituting close confinement in the penitentiary prior to execution for confinement in the county jail....

The objection that the later law required the execution of the sentence of death to take place within the limits of the penitentiary rather than in the county jail, as provided in the previous statute, is without merit. However material the place of confinement may be, in case of some crimes not involving life, the place of execution, when the punishment is death, within the limits of the state, is of no practical consequence to the criminal. On such a matter he is not entitled to be heard....

We are of opinion that the [new] law ... did not alter the situation to the material disadvantage of the criminal, and, therefore, was not ex post facto when applied to his case in the particulars mentioned.

The judgment of the North Dakota Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Ex Post Facto Clause

Issue Presented: Whether the Eighth Amendment prohibits imposing the death penalty on a person who was under eighteen years of age at the time he or she committed a capital crime.

Case Holding: The Eighth Amendment prohibits imposing the death penalty on a person who was under eighteen years of age at the time he or she committed a capital crime.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: In September 1993, Christopher Simmons, then age seventeen, and two younger juvenile accomplices burglarized the Missouri home of Shirley Crook. The three youths abducted Crook from her home and took her to a nearby river, where they drowned her. Several days after the murder, the police arrested Simmons and his accomplices. Simmons confessed to the murder. A jury later found him guilty of capital murder and he was sentenced to death. Simmons's conviction and sentence were affirmed on direct appeal and in federal habeas corpus proceedings. Subsequently, Simmons filed a State habeas petition with the Missouri Supreme Court. In the State proceeding, Simmons argued that the Eighth Amendment of the federal Constitution prohibited executing individuals who committed capital offenses while under eighteen years of age. The State Supreme Court agreed with Simmons and set aside the death sentence and imposed a sentence of life imprisonment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy agreed with the State Supreme Court that the Eighth Amendment barred executing a person who was under the age of eighteen when he or she committed a capital crime. The opinion in the case reasoned as follows:

A majority of States have rejected the imposition of the death penalty on juvenile offenders under 18, and we now hold this is required by the Eighth Amendment.

Because the death penalty is the most severe punishment, the Eighth Amendment applies to it with special force. Capital punishment must be limited to those offenders who commit a narrow category of the most serious crimes and whose extreme culpability makes them the most deserving of execution....

Three general differences between juveniles under 18 and adults demonstrate that juvenile offenders cannot with reliability be classified among the worst offenders. First, as any parent knows and as the scientific and sociological studies respondent and his amici cite tend to confirm, [a] lack of maturity and an underdeveloped sense of responsibility are found in youth more often than in adults and are more understandable among the young. These qualities often result in impetuous and ill-considered actions and decisions. It has been noted that adolescents are overrepresented statistically in virtually every category of reckless behavior. In recognition of the comparative immaturity and irresponsibility of juveniles, almost every State prohibits those under 18 years of age from voting, serving on juries, or marrying without parental consent.

The second area of difference is that juveniles are more vulnerable or susceptible to negative influences and outside pressures, including peer pressure. This is explained in part by the prevailing circumstance that juveniles have less control, or less experience with control, over their own environment.

The third broad difference is that the character of a juvenile is not as well formed as that of an adult. The personality traits of juveniles are more transitory, less fixed....

Our determination that the death penalty is disproportionate punishment for offenders under 18 finds confirmation in the stark reality that the United States is the only country in the world that continues to give official sanction to the juvenile death penalty.

The decision of the Missouri Supreme Court, prohibiting the execution of Simmons because of his age at the time of the crime, was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Ginsburg, J., Joined: Justice Stevens joined the majority opinion. He wrote a terse concurring opinion to emphasize his belief that the Eighth Amendment must evolve to meet changing societal attitudes.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor dissented from the majority opinion. She argued: "Neither the objective evidence of contemporary societal values, nor the Court's moral proportionality analysis, nor the two in tandem suffice to justify [the Court's] ruling."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented from the majority decision. He argued that there was no concrete evidence showing that society was opposed to executing persons who were under eighteen when they committed a capital offense.

Case Note: The decision in the case overruled two prior Supreme Court decisions that allowed the death penalty to be imposed on a person committing a capital offense when he or she was between the ages sixteen and seventeen. See also Juveniles; Stanford v. Kentucky; Thompson v. Oklahoma

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution requires that, following commutation of a death sentence by a State's governor, a defendant is entitled to have his or her sentence determined anew by a jury.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not require that, following commutation of a death sentence by a State's governor, a defendant is entitled to have his or her sentence determined anew by a jury.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, Hodges and Lewis, were convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Tennessee. On July 31, 1972, the Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgments of conviction, but reversed and remanded the record to the trial court on the issue of punishment, based upon the decision by the United States Supreme Court in Furman v. Georgia.

On August 7, 1972, the governor of Tennessee commuted the defendants' death sentences to ninety-nine years' imprisonment. On August 8, 1972, the State filed a timely petition for rehearing the decision in the State Court of Criminal Appeals. The Court of Criminal Appeals then found the commutations by the governor to be valid and a proper exercise of executive authority and held its previous remand to be naught, thus affirming the convictions and commuted sentences. The Tennessee Supreme Court denied certiorari.

The defendants then filed a habeas corpus petition with a federal district court asserting that their Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated by the illegal commutation of their sentences.

The district court dismissed the petition for failure to exhaust State remedies.

The defendants appealed to a federal Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals held that, since the death sentences had been vacated at the time of the governor's commutation order, there were no viable death sentences to commute; therefore, the commutations were invalid. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion found that the federal courts lacked jurisdiction to address the issue presented by the defendants. The opinion ruled: "Whether or not the sentences imposed upon [the defendants] were subject to commutation by the Governor, and the extent of his authority under the circumstances of this case, are questions of Tennessee law which were resolved in favor of sustaining the action of the Governor by the Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals.... It was not the province of a federal habeas court to re-examine these questions."

The opinion rejected the defendants' contention that their constitutional right to jury trial was infringed by the Tennessee proceedings: "A jury had already determined their guilt and sentenced them to death. The Governor commuted these sentences to a term of 99 years after this Court's decision in Furman v. Georgia. Neither Furman nor any other holding of this Court requires that following such a commutation the defendant shall be entitled to have his sentence determined anew by a jury. If Tennessee chooses to allow the Governor to reduce a death penalty to a term of years without resort to further judicial proceedings, the United States Constitution affords no impediment to that choice." The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, J., Joined: Justice Brennan dissented from the Court's disposition of the case. He wrote: "I dissent on two grounds: first, because the Court errs in reading the record to include a final holding of the Court of Appeals declaring the commutations to be invalid; and, second, because if there were such a final holding, summary disposition of the question of the validity of the commutations — certainly one of first impression in this Court — is particularly inappropriate." Ultimately, Justice Brennan urged strongly that the Court should have allowed the case to be fully briefed and argued before resolving the critical issue presented.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas issued a statement indicating that he "would deny certiorari." See also Calderon v. Coleman; California v. Ramos; Clemency; Ohio Adult Parole Authority v. Woodard; Schick v. Reed

Rosenberg, Julius and Ethel One of the most famous capital punishment cases in the history of the United States was the federal prosecution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg. The Rosenbergs ultimately became the first husband and wife to be executed by the United States.

Julius was born on May 12, 1918. Ethel was born on September 28, 1915. The couple wedded in 1930. The Rosenbergs lived a modest and obscure life until August 17, 1950, when they were indicted for conspiring to commit espionage in wartime, in violation of the Federal Espionage Act of 1917.

The prosecution of the Rosenbergs came at a time when the nation was gripped in the witchhunt for communist sympathizers. The Rosenbergs were members of the American Communist Party. Their involvement with the American Communist Party played a significant role in giving credence to charges that they aided the Soviet Union in stealing the secrets to the atomic bomb from the United States.

The Rosenbergs' trial began on March 6, 1951, at the Federal District Court in New York City. After a lengthy jury trial, they were found guilty and, on April 5, 1951, Judge Irving R. Kaufman sentenced them to death. The Rosenbergs maintained their innocence up to and including the moment of their executions at Sing Sing Prison on June 19, 1953. *See also Rosenberg v. Issue Presented: Whether the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 rendered the Federal District Court of New York powerless to impose the death penalty upon the defendants under the Espionage Act of 1917.

Case Holding: The Atomic Energy Act of 1946 did not render the Federal District Court of New York powerless to impose the death penalty upon the defendants under the Espionage Act of 1917.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, Julius Rosenberg and Ethel Rosenberg, were convicted and sentenced to death by the United States for conspiring to violate the Espionage Act of 1917, by communicating to a foreign government, in wartime, secret atomic and other military information. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the convictions and sentences. The United States Supreme Court denied certiorari review. Thereafter, several unsuccessful collateral attacks on the sentences were made.

An attorney who had not been retained by the defendants, but who purported to represent them as a "next friend," applied to Justice Douglas for a stay of execution and a writ of habeas corpus, contending that the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 rendered the Federal District Court of New York powerless in case to impose the death penalty under the Espionage Act of 1917. On June 17, 1953, Justice Douglas denied a writ of habeas corpus but granted a stay of execution, effective until the applicability of the Atomic Energy Act could be determined in the lower courts. The Attorney General of the United States thereafter petitioned the Supreme Court (which was in recess) to convene in Special Term and to vacate the stay. The Supreme Court was convened in Special Term on June 18 and the case was argued on that day. On June 19, the Supreme Court announced its decision in a per curiam opinion, which vacated the stay. The per curiam opinion read:

The question which has been and now is urged as being substantial is whether the provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, rendered the District Court powerless to impose the death sentence under the Espionage Act of 1917, under which statute the indictment was laid.

Although this question was raised and presented for the first time to Mr. Justice Douglas by counsel who have never been employed by the Rosenbergs, and who heretofore have not participated in this case, the full Court has considered it on its merits.

We think the question is not substantial. We think further proceedings to litigate it are unwarranted. A conspiracy was charged and proved to violate the Espionage Act in wartime. The Atomic Energy Act did not repeal or limit the provisions of the Espionage Act. Accordingly, we vacate the stay entered by Mr. Justice Douglas on June 17, 1953.

We are entering this order in advance of the preparation of full opinions which will be filed with the Clerk.

The Special Term was adjourned. Thereafter the defendants were executed on June 19. Subsequent to the issuance of the per curiam opinion, the Supreme Court issued signed opinions.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Vinson: The chief justice held that Justice Douglas had power to issue the stay, just as all members of the Court have such authority. It was said that the full Court had made no practice of vacating stays issued by single justices, but that, in unusual circumstances, the Court would exercise its discretion to vacate a stay of a single justice. The opinion indicated that a stay should issue only if there is a substantial question to be preserved for further proceedings in the courts. The chief justice found that the question of whether the Atomic Energy Act rendered the district court powerless in the case to impose the death penalty under the Espionage Act was not substantial and further proceedings to litigate it were unwarranted.

The opinion ruled the Atomic Energy Act did not repeal or limit the penalty provisions of the Espionage Act. It was said that the partial overlap of the two statutes could not repeal of the earlier act, unless the intention of the legislature to repeal the earlier statute was clear and manifest. The chief justice stated that instead of repealing the penalty provisions of the Espionage Act, the Atomic Energy Act expressly preserved them in undiminished force. It was determined that since the crux of the charges against the defendants alleged overt acts committed before the Atomic Energy Act was enacted, that Atomic Energy Act could not cover the offenses charged.

The chief justice concluded: "In the circumstances of this case, in which the Rosenbergs were represented at their trial and in all subsequent proceedings by able and zealous counsel of their own choice, intervention by a stranger as 'next friend,' without authorization by the Rosenbergs and through counsel who had never been retained by them, is to be discountenanced."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Jackson, in Which Vinson, CJ., and Reed, Burton, and Minton, JJ., Joined: Justice Jackson concurred in the Court's opinion. He believed that the Atomic Energy Act did not, by text or intention, supersede the earlier Espionage Act. In addressing the issue of the “next friend” petitioner in the case, Justice Jackson wrote:

The stay was granted solely on the petition of one Edelman, who sought to appear as “next friend” of the Rosenbergs. Of course, there is power to allow such an appearance, under circumstances such as incapacity of the prisoner or isolation from counsel, which make it appropriate to enable the Court to hear a prisoner’s case. But in these circumstances the order which grants Edelman standing further to litigate this case in the lower courts cannot be justified.

Edelman is a stranger to the Rosenbergs and to their case. His intervention was unauthorized by them and originally opposed by their counsel. What may be Edelman’s purpose in getting himself into this litigation is not explained, although inquiry was made at the bar....

Vacating this stay is not to be construed as endorsing the wisdom or appropriateness to this case of a death sentence. That sentence, however, is permitted by law and, as was previously pointed out, is therefore not within this Court’s power of revision.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Clark, in Which Vinson, CJ., and Reed, Jackson, Burton, and Minton, JJ., Joined. Justice Clark concurred in the opinion of the Court. He agreed that Justice Douglas had authority to issue the stay under the circumstances presented to him. Justice Clark indicated that in his judgment the Atomic Energy Act did not invalidate the death sentences. He wrote: “In any event, the Government could not have invoked the Atomic Energy Act against these defendants. The crux of the charge alleged overt acts committed in 1944 and 1945, years before that Act went into effect. While some overt acts did in fact take place as late as 1950, they related principally to defendants’ efforts to avoid detection and prosecution of earlier deeds. Grave doubts of unconstitutional ex post facto criminality would have attended any prosecution under that statute for transmitting atomic secrets before 1946. Since the Atomic Energy Act thus cannot cover the offenses charged, the alleged inconsistency of its penalty provisions with those of the Espionage Act cannot be sustained.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Black: Justice Black dissented from the Court’s opinion. He argued that he did “not believe that Government counsel or th[e] Court has had time or an adequate opportunity to investigate and decide the very serious question raised in asking this Court to vacate the stay granted by Mr. Justice Douglas.” Justice Black saw the resolution of the case as a rush to judgment without adequate information. He wrote that “the time ha[d] been too short for [him] to give this question the study it deserves.”

The dissenting opinion disagreed with the Court’s position that it could set aside the stay entered by Justice Douglas. Justice Black stated that he “found no statute or rule of court which permits the full Court to set aside a mere temporary stay entered by a Justice in obedience to his statutory obligations.” He concluded:

I am aware also of the argument that Mr. Justice Douglas should not have considered and that we should not now consider the point here involved because the Rosenbergs’ lawyers had not originally raised it on appeal. I cannot believe, however, that if the sentence of a citizen to death is plainly illegal, this Court would allow that citizen to be executed on the grounds that his lawyers had “waived” plain error. An illegal execution is no less illegal because a technical ground of “waiver” is assigned to justify it.

... It is my view based on the limited arguments we have heard that after passage of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 it was unlawful for a judge to impose the death penalty for unlawful transmittal of atomic secrets unless such a penalty was recommended by the jury trying the case. I think this question should be decided only after time has been afforded counsel for the Government and for the defendants to make more informed arguments than we have yet heard and after this Court has had an opportunity to give more deliberation than it has given up to this date. This I think would be more nearly in harmony with the best judicial traditions.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that the imposition of the death penalty under the Espionage Act was foreclosed by the procedures of the Atomic Energy Act. Justice Frankfurter wrote:

It is suggested that the overt acts laid in the indictment all occurred before the effective date of the Atomic Energy Act and that hence the indictment did not charge any offense committed after that effective date. But, again, the offense charged in the indictment was a conspiracy, not one or more overt acts. As the judge told the jury, they had to find a conspiracy in order to convict, a conspiracy aimed principally at obtaining atomic secrets and characterized as such by the overt acts alleged, but a conspiracy, I cannot too often repeat, alleged to have been continuous to a date certain in 1950. The Government having tried the Rosenbergs for a conspiracy, continuing from 1944 to 1950, to reveal atomic secrets among other things, it flies in the face of the charge made, the evidence adduced and the basis on which the conviction was secured now to contend that the terminal date of the Rosenberg conspiracy preceded the effective date of the Atomic Energy Act....

It thus appears — although, of course, I would feel more secure in my conviction had I had the opportunity to make a thorough study of the lengthy record in this case — that the conspiracy with which the Rosenbergs were charged is one falling in part within the terms of the Atomic Energy Act, passed by Congress in 1946 and specifically dealing with classified information pertaining to the recent developments in atomic energy. There remains the question whether the sentence for such a conspiracy could be imposed under the Espionage Act.

Congress was not content with the penal provisions of the Espionage Act of 1917 to prevent disclosure of atomic energy information. The relevant provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 differ in several respects from those of the Espionage Act. For one thing the 1946 Act makes possible the death penalty for disclosures in time of peace as well as in war. Some disclosures which fell generally within the Espionage Act now specifically fall under 10 of the Atomic Energy Act. The decisive thing in this case is that under the Espionage Act the power to impose a sentence of death was left exclusively to the discretion of the court, while under the Atomic Energy Act a sentence of death can be imposed only upon recommendation of the jury.

Surely it needs only statement that with such a drastic difference in the authority to take life between the Espionage Act and the Atomic Energy Act, it cannot be left within the discretion of a prosecutor whether the judge may impose the death sentence wholly on his own authority or whether he may do so only upon recommendation of the jury. Nothing can rest on the prosecutor’s caprice in placing on the indictment the label of the 1917 Act or of the 1946 Act. To seek demonstration of such an absurdity, in defiance of our whole conception of impersonality in the criminal law, would be an exercise in self-stultification. The endorsement of an indictment, the theory under which the prosecutor is operating, his belief or error as to the statute which supports an indictment or under which sentences may be imposed, are all wholly immaterial.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas dissented from the Court’s opinion. In doing so, he defended his decision to grant the stay of execution. Justice Douglas wrote:

When the motion for a stay was before me, I was deeply troubled by the legal question tendered. After twelve hours of research and study I concluded, as my opinion indicated, that the question was a substantial one, never presented to this Court and never decided by any court. So I issued the stay order.

Now I have had the benefit of an additional argument and additional study and reflection. Now I know that I am right on the law.

The Solicitor General says in oral argument that the Government would have been laughed out of court if the indictment in this case had been laid under the Atomic Energy Act of 1946. I agree. For a part of the crime alleged and proved antedated that Act. And obviously no criminal statute can have retroactive application. But the Solicitor General misses the legal point on which my stay order was based. It is this — whether or not the death penalty can be imposed without the recommendation of the jury for a crime involving the disclosure of atomic secrets where a part of that crime takes place after the effective date of the Atomic Energy Act.

The crime of the Rosenbergs was a conspiracy that started prior to the Atomic Energy Act and continued almost four years after the effective date of that Act. The overt acts alleged were acts which took place prior to the effective date of the new Act. But that is irrelevant for two reasons. First, acts in pursuance of the conspiracy were proved which took place after the new Act became the law. Second, ... no overt acts were necessary; the crime was complete when the conspiracy was proved. And that conspiracy, as defined in the indictment itself, endured almost four years after the Atomic Energy Act became effective.

The crime therefore took place in substantial part after the new Act became effective, after Congress had written new penalties for conspiracies to disclose atomic secrets. One of the new requirements is that the death penalty for that kind of espionage can be imposed only if the jury recommends it. And here there was no such recommendation. To be sure, this espionage included more than atomic secrets. But there can be no doubt that the death penalty was imposed because of the Rosenbergs' disclosure of atomic secrets. The trial judge, in sentencing the Rosenbergs to death, emphasized that the heinous character of their crime was trafficking in atomic secrets....

But the Congress in 1946 adopted new criminal sanctions for such crimes. Whether Congress was wise or unwise in doing so is no question for us. The cold truth is that the death sentence may not be imposed for what the Rosenbergs did unless the jury so recommends.

Some say, however, that since a part of the Rosenbergs' crime was committed under the old law, the penalties of the old law apply. But it is law too elemental for citation of authority that where two penal statutes may apply — one carrying death, the other imprisonment — the court has no choice but to impose the less harsh sentence.

A suggestion is made that the question comes too late, that since the Rosenbergs did not raise this question on appeal, they are barred from raising it now. But the question of an unlawful sentence is never barred. No man or woman should go to death under an unlawful sentence merely because his lawyer failed to raise the point. It is that function among others that the Great Writ serves....

Here the trial court was without jurisdiction to impose the death penalty, since the jury had not recommended it.

Issue Presented: Whether an amendment to California's grand jury statute was valid.

Case Holding: The amendment to California's grand jury statute was valid.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Burt Ross, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. The California Supreme Court affirmed the judgment and the United States Supreme Court denied review. The defendant thereafter filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that the grand jury which indicted him was selected under an invalid law; therefore, the judgment against him was obtained in violation of due process of law. The district court denied relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice McKenna: Justice McKenna held that the law under which the grand jury was selected was valid. The opinion indicated that the defendant's argument involved the title given to a statutory amendment to the procedure for selecting grand juries. The defendant contended that the amendment was invalid because the title of the new law was not descriptive of its content, as required by the State's constitution. Justice McKenna rejected the argument and held that the amendment "has but one purpose and contains but one subject. It amends particular sections; it does not revise a whole code." The judgment of the District Court was affirmed.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's right to a fair trial was violated because the trial court refused to strike a juror for cause.

Case Holding: The defendant's right to a fair trial was not violated because the trial court refused to strike a juror for cause.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Bobby Lynn Ross, was charged with capital murder by the State of Oklahoma. During jury selection, the trial refused to strike a prospective juror for cause, who had declared that he would vote to impose death automatically if the jury found the defendant guilty. The defendant exercised one of his peremptory challenges to remove the prospective juror. The jury found the defendant guilty and sentenced him to death. The Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the trial court's refusal to strike the prospective juror for cause violated his federal constitutional rights. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice ruled that the defendant's constitutional right to an impartial jury and fair trial were not violated by the trial judge's refusal to strike the prospective juror for cause: "Although the trial court erred in failing to dismiss prospective juror ... for cause, the error did not deprive [the defendant] of an impartial jury or of any interest provided by the State." The chief justice commented: "The Constitution entitles a criminal defendant to a fair trial, not a perfect one."

The opinion further held: "Any claim that the jury was not impartial ... must focus ... on the jurors who ultimately sat. None of those 12 jurors ... was challenged for cause by [the defendant], and he has never suggested that any of the 12 was not impartial. “[T]he Constitution presupposes that a jury selected from a fair cross section of the community is impartial, regardless of the mix of individual viewpoints actually represented on the jury, so long as the jurors can conscientiously and properly carry out their sworn duty to apply the law to the facts of the particular case.”

The chief justice indicated that the fact that the defendant had to use a peremptory challenge to cure the trial court’s error did not mean that the Constitution was violated because peremptory challenges are not of constitutional dimension but are merely a means to achieve the end of an impartial jury. The judgment of the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented from the Court’s decision. He argued that the Constitution protected the defendant from having to use a peremptory challenge to strike a juror that should have been removed for cause. The dissent reasoned as follows:

Neither the State nor this Court disputes that the trial court “erred” when it refused to strike [the] juror ... for cause from the jury.... [The juror] twice stated during voir dire that if he were to find Ross guilty of murder, he would automatically vote to impose the death penalty; there is no question that [the juror] was not the fair and impartial juror guaranteed to [the defendant] by the Sixth Amendment. The Court concludes, however, that the trial court’s error does not require resentencing because it was “cure[d]” by the defense’s use of one of a limited number of peremptory challenges to remove the biased juror. I believe that this conclusion is irreconcilable with this Court’s holding just last Term that a similar Sixth Amendment error in capital jury selection requires resentencing if “the composition of the jury panel as a whole could possibly have been affected by the trial court’s error.”...

I would reverse the judgment of the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals to the extent that it left undisturbed the sentence of death.

Routier, Darlie Lynn On the night of June 6, 1996, Texas authorities received a report that Devon Routier, age six, and his five-year-old brother Damon Routier were stabbed to death in their home in Rowlett, Texas.

Darlie Lynn Routier was charged with killing two of her sons in 1996. She was prosecuted for the death of one of the children and was convicted. Routier is on death row in Texas. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

Authorities also received a report that the mother of the children, Darlie Lynn Routier, had her throat slashed at the time the children were killed. The initial report indicated that Darlie and her two sons were attacked by an intruder in their home. During the alleged attack, Darlie’s husband and their third infant son were asleep in another part of the home.

The death of Darlie’s two sons and her own injury attracted the attention of the media, and news reports of the tragedy were subsequently broadcast throughout the nation. Sympathy poured into the suburban town of Rowlett from all over the country. Before the nation’s prayers and condolences found full expression, they turned to horror in anger. Twelve days after the alleged attack, Darlie was arrested by authorities and charged with the murder of her two sons.

Authorities believed Darlie’s neck wound was self-inflicted for the purpose of covering up her role in killing her two children. The motive alleged by authorities was money. It was said that the family’s middle-class income was not sufficient to support Darlie in the lifestyle she wanted; therefore, she removed the expenses brought on by her two sons by killing them.

Although Darlie maintained her innocence, on February 1, 1997, a jury convicted her of the murder of Damon. On February 4, Darlie was sentenced to death. Authorities decided not to prosecute her for the murder of her second child. Darlie is on death row in Texas.

Rule Against Double-Counting Aggravators Courts prohibit double-counting of certain statutory aggravating circumstances when both factors relate to the same aspect of the crime. For example, it is improper for the trial court to utilize both a felony murder aggravator and a pecuniary gain aggravator when the murder occurred during a robbery. The reason is that the same evidence would support the “monetary” aspect of both aggravators.

Some courts prohibit giving the jury instructions on statutory aggravating circumstances that relate to the same aspect of the crime and require the prosecutor to make an election between the aggravators the jury will consider. The general approach of most courts, however, is simply to give the jury a list of relevant statutory aggravating circumstances from which to choose, in making their assessment as to whether death is the proper sentence in light of any mitigating circumstances presented in the case. The trial judge must set out in his or her final order the statutory aggravating circumstances found to exist without double-counting. Criticism has been launched against this procedure because it still permits the jury to double-count, even though the trial court removes the double-counting in the sentencing judgment order.

When requested, a capital felon is entitled to a limiting instruction advising the jury not to double-count the weight of multiple aggravating circumstances supported by a single aspect of the crime. Courts have held that the same facts may be used to support more than one statutory aggravating circumstance as long as the facts reveal different characteristics of the crime. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Rules of Evidence The admission of evidence at the guilt phase of a capital prosecution is controlled by the rules of evidence adopted in each jurisdiction. As a general matter, trial judges may only exclude relevant evidence if its probative value is outweighed by factors such as unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or potential to mislead the jury. In a landmark decision, Holmes v. South Carolina, 126 S.Ct. 1727 (2006), the United States Supreme Court struck down a South Carolina evidence rule which prohibited a defendant from introducing evidence that another person committed the crime if the prosecution had introduced evidence that strongly supported the defendant’s guilt.

As a general matter, the rules of evidence are not applied during the penalty phase of a capital prosecution. The rationale for not imposing evidentiary rules at the penalty phase is that, in determining the appropriate sentence, the jury must possess the fullest information possible concerning the capital felon's life, character, criminal record, and the circumstances of the particular offense. Stringently applied evidentiary rules would limit the flow of relevant evidence at the penalty phase. See also Hearsay; Hearsay Exceptions; Holmes v. South Carolina; Queenan v. Russia Capital punishment is imposed by Russia. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. In 1996, former Russian President Boris Yeltsin imposed a moratorium on the death penalty. In 1999, President Yeltsin commuted the death sentence of all prisoners condemned to death. The commutation affected 716 death row inmates. The actions taken by President Yeltsin did not outlaw capital punishment in Russia. Only the Russian legislature has authority to abolish capital punishment in the nation. Its legal system is based on civil law. The nation adopted a constitution on December 12, 1993.

Under the 1993 constitution of Russia, the government is composed of an executive branch, a legislative branch, and a judicial branch. The executive branch consists of an elected president and a government headed by a prime minister. There is a bicameral legislature consisting of the State Duma and the Federation Council.

The judicial system consists of regional courts and a supreme court. Defendants have the right to retained or appointed counsel and to enjoy a presumption of innocence. Insofar as Russia has not fully made a transition to democratic institutions, different criminal procedure rules exist. It has been reported that eighty regions of the country did not use adversarial jury trials. In these regions, a trial judge or a panel of judges conducts the trial. In other regions, adversarial jury trials are optional for defendants charged with crimes carrying a penalty of fifteen years or more. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Rutledge, Wiley B. Wiley B. Rutledge served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1943 to 1949. While on the Supreme Court, Rutledge was known as a liberal interpreter of the Constitution.

Rutledge was born on July 20, 1894, in Cloverport, Kentucky. He received an undergraduate degree from the University of Wisconsin in 1914. Rutledge received a law degree in 1922 after graduating from a law school in Colorado. He went on to become dean of Washington University College of Law and Iowa College of Law. In 1939, Rutledge was appointed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt as an appellate judge on the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. President Roosevelt appointed Rutledge to the Supreme Court in 1943.

Rutledge wrote only three known capital punishment opinions. The capital punishment case of Fisher v. United States illustrates Rutledge's liberal philosophy. In Fisher, the defendant argued that he was denied due process of law because of the trial court's refusal to instruct the jury on the defendant's mental deficiency, so as to allow for a sentence less than death. The majority on the Court rejected the argument. Rutledge dissented. He argued that fundamental fairness required such an instruction. The position argued by Rutledge eventually became constitutional law under modern capital punishment. Rutledge died on September 10, 1949.

Rwanda Capital punishment is permitted in Rwanda. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on German and Belgian civil law. Rwanda adopted a new constitution on June 4, 2003. The nation is a democratic republic that has an executive branch, a bicameral legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

The judicial system consists of district courts, provincial courts, high courts of the republic, and a supreme court. The nation's laws provide for public trials and a right to retained legal counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Ryan, George Homer

George Homer Ryan (b. 1934) served as governor of Illinois from 1999 to 2003. In 2000, Governor Ryan issued a moratorium on all executions in Illinois and established a commission to evaluate the State's capital punishment system. The commission issued a report in 2003, in which it documented major flaws in the State's capital punishment system. As a consequence of the commission's report, on January 11, 2003, Governor Ryan granted pardons to four death row inmates and commuted to life in prison the sentences of the remaining 167 inmates on death row. As a result of Governor Ryan's decision to empty the State's death row, he was nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize in 2003 and 2004.

Shortly after Governor Ryan left office, he was indicted by a federal grand jury on corruption charges. On April 17, 2006, a federal jury found Governor Ryan guilty of many of the corruption charges. On September 6, 2006, he was sentenced to six and a half years in prison. See also Clemency

Sacco and Vanzetti In August 1927, the State of Massachusetts executed Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti by electrocution. In August 1977, Governor Michael Dukakis of Massachusetts signed a proclamation that cleared the names of Sacco and Vanzetti for the crimes which sent them to their deaths.

Sacco and Vanzetti were Italian immigrants who had arrived in the United States in 1908. Sacco was a shoe worker by trade and Vanzetti was a fish peddler. Both men were charged with the murders of a paymaster and a security guard and the theft of more than $15,000 from a shoe factory in South Braintree, Massachusetts, on April 15, 1920.

The trial of Sacco and Vanzetti took place between May 31 and July 14, 1921. The evidence against them boiled down to two circumstantial facts. First, Sacco possessed a pistol of the type used in the murders. Second, they were arrested at a garage as they attempted to claim an automobile that was seen during the South Braintree crimes. This evidence proved sufficient for the jury to return guilty verdicts against both men.

The guilty verdicts against Sacco and Vanzetti caused an international crisis. Support from around the world poured into Massachusetts imploring the State not to execute the two men. The international community viewed the convictions as based upon deep-seated prejudice against immigrants.

During the six years that followed their convictions, every effort was made to obtain a new trial for Sacco and Vanzetti. All efforts proved futile, even after the 1925 confession of another condemned man named Celestine Madeiros. Celestine claimed that he was a member of a gang that committed the South Braintree crimes. On August 23, 1927, Sacco and Vanzetti were electrocuted.

Safeguards Guaranteeing Protection of the Rights of Those Facing the Death Penalty

A resolution entitled "Safeguards Guaranteeing Protection of the Rights of Those Facing the Death Penalty" was adopted by United Nation's Economic and Social Council by resolution May 25, 1984. The text of the resolution is set out below.

1. In countries which have not abolished the death penalty, capital punishment may be imposed only for the most serious crimes, it being understood that their scope should not go beyond intentional crimes with lethal or other extremely grave consequences.

2. Capital punishment may be imposed only for a crimes for which the death penalty is prescribed by law at the time of its commission, it being understood that if, subsequent to the commission of the crime, provision is made by law for the imposition of a lighter penalty, the offender shall benefit thereby.

3. Persons below 18 years of age at the time of the commission of the crime shall not be sentenced to death, nor shall the death sentence be carried out on pregnant women, or on new mothers, or on persons who have become insane.

4. Capital punishment may be imposed only when the guilt of the person charged is based upon clear and convincing evidence leaving no room for an alternative explanation of the facts.

5. Capital punishment may only be carried out pursuant to a final judgement rendered by a competent court after legal process which gives all possible safeguards to ensure a fair trial, at least equal to those contained in article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, including the right of anyone suspected of or charged with a crime for which capital punishment may be imposed to adequate legal assistance at all stages of the proceedings.

6. Anyone sentenced to death shall have the right to appeal to a court of higher jurisdiction, and steps should be taken to ensure that such appeals shall become mandatory.

7. Anyone sentenced to death shall have the right to seek pardon, or commutation of sentence; pardon or commutation of sentence may be granted in all cases of capital punishment.

8. Capital punishment shall not be carried out pending any appeal or other recourse procedure or other proceeding relating to pardon or commutation of the sentence.

9. Where capital punishment occurs, it shall be carried out so as to inflict the minimum possible suffering.

Case Holding: The defendant cannot obtain federal habeas relief when to do so requires the creation of a new constitutional rule after the defendant's capital conviction becomes final.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robyn Parks, was convicted and sentenced for capital murder by the State of Oklahoma. The Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. Subsequent to the defendant's conviction becoming final, he filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court arguing that his sentence was invalid because the trial court instructed the penalty phase jury not to have sympathy for him during its deliberations. The defendant couched this argument in terms of precluding the jury from considering mitigating evidence submitted by him. The district court denied relief and dismissed the petition. A federal Court of Appeals reversed after finding that the instruction was unconstitutional because it in effect told the jury to disregard the mitigating evidence that the defendant had presented. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy concluded that the defendant was not entitled to federal habeas relief. The opinion said that the principle advanced by the defendant required creation of a new rule of federal constitutional law. The Court's precedents dictated that a new rule of constitutional law could neither be announced nor applied in a case on collateral review, unless it came within one of two exceptions. It was held that the principal advocated by the defendant did not come within the two exceptions to the prohibition against retroactive application of a new rule after a defendant's capital conviction became final.

The opinion pointed out that a principle becomes a new rule if it "breaks new ground," "imposes a new obligation on the States or the Federal Government," or was not "dictated by precedent existing at the time the defendant's conviction became final." Justice Kennedy found that for the Court to hold that the Constitution prohibited trial courts from giving anti-sympathy instructions at the penalty phase would constitute a new rule, because the Court's precedents did not foreshadow such a rule.

Having decided that the relief the defendant sought would necessitate the creation of a new rule, the opinion turned to the issue of whether the new rule came within either of the two exceptions to the general principle that new rules will not be applied on collateral review. The first exception permits the retroactive application of a new rule if the rule placed an entire category of primary conduct beyond the reach of criminal law or prohibited imposition of a certain type of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense. Justice Kennedy found that the defendant could not invoke this exception. The rule sought by the defendant would neither decriminalize a class of conduct nor prohibit the imposition of capital punishment on a particular class of persons.

The second exception allowed retroactive application of a new rule that was a watershed rule of criminal procedure, implicating a criminal proceeding's fundamental fairness and accuracy. This exception was found to be inapplicable, because the new rule was not a rule of criminal procedure implicating the fundamental fairness and accuracy the proceeding. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Brennan dissented from the majority's decision. He believed the Court distorted the issue presented by the defendant and that the relief sought by the defendant did not require creation of a new rule; it required enforcement of existing law. Justice Brennan stated his position as follows:

Today, the Court holds that [the defendant] is not entitled to relief because his claim would require the application of a "new rule" that may not be applied retroactively on collateral review. The Court displays undue eagerness to apply the new standard for retroactivity announced in Butler v. McKellar, at the expense of thoughtful legal analysis. I cannot countenance such carelessness when a life is at stake. I dissent....

[The defendant] does not ... raise a claim challenging how the jury considered mitigating evidence.... [H]e argues that his jury could have believed it could not consider his mitigating evidence's bearing on moral culpability at all. Thus, his claim clearly falls within the holdings of Lockett v. Ohio and Eddings v. Oklahoma even under the majority's reading of those cases. The real question in this case is whether the rule of Lockett and Eddings was violated. Resolution of [the defendant's] claim involves only the otherwise familiar inquiry into the sufficiency of the jury instructions, not the recognition of a new principle of law....

For the same reasons that Lockett and Eddings compel the conclusion that [the defendant] does not seek a "new rule" ... these cases also compel the conclusion that [the defendant] was denied an individualized sentencing determination as required by the Eighth Amendment....

The instructions at the sentencing phase of [the defendant's] trial may well have misled the jury about its duty to consider the mitigating evidence [the defendant] presented. Until today, the Court consistently has vacated a death sentence and remanded for resentencing when there was any ambiguity about whether the sentencer actually considered mitigating evidence. The Court's failure to adhere to this fundamental Eighth Amendment principle is inexcusable. Distorting [the defendant's] claim and our precedents in order to hide behind the smoke-screen of a new standard of retroactivity is even more so.

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the indictment against the defendant was invalid due to its failure to state where the offense occurred. (2) Whether a verdict stating "guilty" was invalid to sustain a conviction for capital murder.

Case Holdings: 1. The indictment against the defendant was not invalid due to its failure to state where the offense occurred because allegations of crimes committed on the high seas do not need the specificity required of crimes committed on land. 2. A verdict stating "guilty" was not invalid to sustain a conviction for capital murder where it is possible to infer from the record that no other conviction was intended.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas St. Clair, was indicted for capital murder by the United States. Also named in the indictment were Herman Sparf and Hans Hansen. The murder took place on the high seas. The case was prosecuted in a federal district court in California. The defendant, who was tried separately, was convicted and sentenced to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the federal court did not have jurisdiction over the case because the indictment failed to state where the victim was actually killed and that the verdict against him was invalid because it merely stated "guilty." The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan ruled that the defendant's jurisdiction issue was without merit and that the federal district court had jurisdiction to prosecute the case. The opinion reasoned as follows:

The objection ... that the indictment did not sufficiently show on what part of the high seas the offense charged was committed, is met by the averment that the offense was committed on board of an American vessel, on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the court, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and not within the jurisdiction of any particular state of the Union. Nothing more was required to show the locality of the offense. The doctrine of venue in indictments at the common law is inapplicable to cases of this kind.... The reason of the common law for laying the venue so particularly in offenses on land does not in any manner apply to the offense on the high seas, for no jury ever did or could come from the visne or vicinage on the high seas to try the cause, and no summons could issue for such a purpose.

The opinion next turned to the defendant's contention that the verdict was invalid because it only stated "guilty." Justice Harlan, in rejecting the argument, reasoned as follows:

This contention cannot be sustained. We said in [a previous case] that, while the record of a criminal case must state what will affirmatively show the offense, the steps without which the sentence cannot be good, and the sentence itself, all parts of the record must be interpreted together; giving effect to every part if possible, and supplying a deficiency in one part by what appears elsewhere in the record. The indictment contained but one charge, that of murder. The accused was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty of that charge. And while the jury had the physical power to find him guilty of some lesser crime necessarily included in the one charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense so charged, if such attempt was a separate offense, the law will support the verdict with every fair intendment, and therefore will, by construction, supply the words as charged in the indictment. The verdict of "Guilty" in this case will be interpreted as referring to the single offense specified in the indictment. The judgment of the federal district court was affirmed. See also Jurisdiction; Sparf v. United States

Salem Village Witch Hangings In 1692, a mass hysteria engulfed Salem Village, Massachusetts. The hysteria centered on wild accusations of witchcraft being practiced by people in the town. The accusations caused the arrest of dozens of people. Trials were held and many were found guilty and sentenced to death. From June through September 1692, a total of nineteen men and women who had been convicted of witchcraft were taken to a place called Gallows Hill and hanged. One of the condemned, an elderly man, was actually executed by having heavy stones pressed against his body for several days.

The Salem Village witch hangings have been traced to 1689, with the arrival of Samuel Parris and his family. Parris was invited to Salem Village to preach in the town's church. In February 1692, Parris's nine-year-old daughter, Betty, became strangely ill. Her symptoms were manifested by cries of pain that caused her to throw herself on the floor wildly. Shortly after Betty's illness began, several of her playmates began to display similar behavior. One of the town's doctors suggested the children were victims of supernatural powers. This nonmedical diagnosis inflamed gossip of witchcraft being practiced in the town.

When additional children began mimicking the behavior of Betty and her playmates, several women decided to conjure up a potion that would counter the evil spirits afflicting the children. This was a mistake. The women were arrested for practicing witchcraft on February 29. In March, a trial was held and one of the women confessed to being a witch. This confession launched hysteria that swept through the town and resulted in a relentless quest to find and prosecute all suspected witches.

A special court was set up to prosecute suspected witches. The court was presided over by five judges and a jury. The defendants did not have legal counsel and could not call witnesses to testify under oath on their behalf. The judges forced the defendants to have their bodies examined for marks that would indicate sorcery.

Suspect after suspect was brought into court for trial from June through September. Guilty verdicts were constantly handed down and executions swiftly carried out. At some point near the end of the prosecutions, sanity returned to the town and not-guilty verdicts began to replace the automatic guilty verdicts. Unfortunately, sanity returned after nineteen innocent people were hung and one man was pressed to death by stones.

Issue Presented: Whether the Double Jeopardy Clause prevents a defendant from being given the death penalty upon retrial, when the jury in the first trial was deadlocked on the issue of punishment and the trial court imposed life imprisonment.

Case Holding: The Double Jeopardy Clause does not prevent a defendant from being given the death penalty upon retrial, when the jury in the first trial was deadlocked on the issue of punishment and the trial court imposed life imprisonment.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, David Allen Sattazahn, was prosecuted by the State of Pennsylvania for the 1987 murder of Richard Boyer. A jury found the defendant guilty of murder. The penalty phase jury was deadlocked on the issue of punishment; therefore, the trial court imposed life imprisonment. The defendant appealed the conviction and was granted a new trial. When the second trial began, the prosecutor indicated that it would seek the death penalty. The jury found the defendant guilty a second time and imposed the death penalty. On appeal, the defendant argued that the federal Double Jeopardy Clause prohibited imposition of the death penalty because it was not imposed during his first trial. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia found that the Double Jeopardy Clause did not prohibit imposition of the death penalty. The opinion reasoned as follows:

The Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment commands that “[n]o person shall ... be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.” Under this Clause, once a defendant is placed in jeopardy for an offense, and jeopardy terminates with respect to that offense, the defendant may neither be tried nor punished a second time for the same offense. Where, as here, a defendant is convicted of murder and sentenced to life imprisonment, but appeals the conviction and succeeds in having it set aside, we have held that jeopardy has not terminated, so that the life sentence imposed in connection with the initial conviction raises no double-jeopardy bar to a death sentence on retrial....

Normally, a retrial following a hung jury does not violate the Double Jeopardy Clause. [The defendant] contends, however, that given the unique treatment afforded capital-sentencing proceedings..., double-jeopardy protections were triggered when the jury deadlocked at his first sentencing proceeding and the court prescribed a sentence of life imprisonment pursuant to Pennsylvania law. We disagree. Under [our] cases..., the touchstone for double-jeopardy protection in capital-sentencing proceedings is whether there has been an “acquittal.” [The defendant] here cannot establish that the jury or the court “acquitted” him during his first capital-sentencing proceeding. As to the jury: The verdict form returned by the foreman stated that the jury deadlocked 9-to-3 on whether to impose the death penalty; it made no findings with respect to the alleged aggravating circumstance. That result — or more appropriately, that non-result — cannot fairly be called an acquittal based on findings sufficient to establish legal entitlement to the life sentence....

It could be argued, perhaps, that the statutorily required entry of a life sentence creates an “entitlement” even without an “acquittal,” because that is what the Pennsylvania Legislature intended — i.e., it intended that the life sentence should survive vacation of the underlying conviction. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court, however, did not find such intent in the statute — and there was eminently good cause not to do so. A State’s simple interest in closure might make it willing to accept the default penalty of life imprisonment when the conviction is affirmed and the case is, except for that issue, at an end — but unwilling to do so when the case must be retried anyway. And its interest in conservation of resources might make it willing to leave the sentencing issue unresolved (and the default life sentence in place) where the cost of resolving it is the empaneling of a new jury and, in all likelihood, a repetition of much of the guilt phase of the first trial — though it is eager to attend to that unfinished business if there is to be a new jury and a new trial anyway.

The decision of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court finding the Double Jeopardy Clause was not violated was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O’Connor: Justice O’Connor concurred in the Court’s opinion. She wrote separately to emphasize her belief that the decision was consistent with prior cases.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Ginsburg, in Which Stevens, Souter, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Ginsburg dissented from the Court’s opinion. She argued that the Double Jeopardy Clause prevented the death penalty from being imposed. *See also Arizona v. Rumsey; Bullington v. Missouri; Double Jeopardy Clause; Poland v. Issue Presented: Whether it was harmless error to introduce, at the defendant’s capital penalty phase hearing, psychiatric testimony that was obtained in violation of Estelle v. Smith.

Case Holding: It was not harmless error to introduce, at the defendant’s capital penalty phase hearing, psychiatric testimony that was obtained in violation of Estelle v. Smith.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John T. Satterwhite, was charged with capital murder by the State of Texas. Prior to trial, the defendant underwent two court-ordered psychiatric evaluations to determine his competency to stand trial and his future dangerousness. Both examinations were taken without the knowledge of the defendant’s counsel.

The defendant was convicted of capital murder by a jury. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor introduced testimony from the psychiatrist who examined the defendant, indicating that the defendant had “a severe antisocial personality disorder and is extremely dangerous and will commit future acts of violence.” The jury returned a verdict recommending the death penalty, which the trial court imposed.

On appeal to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, the defendant argued that the testimony by the psychiatrist during the penalty phase violated his constitutional rights because his attorney was never informed of the psychiatric evaluations that formed the basis of the testimony. The appellate court held that the admission of the psychiatrist’s testimony violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right as recognized by the United States Supreme Court in Estelle v. Smith, but that the constitutional violation was subject to harmless error analysis and that the error was harmless. The appellate court affirmed the defendant’s conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor held that the use of the psychiatrist's testimony at the capital sentencing proceeding, on the issue of future dangerousness, violated the Sixth Amendment. The opinion held that, under Estelle, defense counsel must be given advance notice of a psychiatric examination and the content of the information sought.

The opinion next discussed the harmless error rule. Under this rule, if the prosecutor can prove beyond a reasonable doubt that a constitutional error did not contribute to the verdict, the error is harmless and the verdict may stand. Justice O'Connor announced that the harmless error rule applied to the admission of psychiatric testimony in violation of the Sixth Amendment. It was acknowledged that the evaluation of the consequences of an error in the penalty phase of a capital case might be difficult because of the discretion that is given to the sentencer. However, it was reasoned that a reviewing court could make an intelligent judgment about whether the erroneous admission of psychiatric testimony might have affected a capital sentencing jury.

Justice O'Connor ruled that the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals improperly held that the erroneous admission of psychiatric testimony was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan and Blackmun, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall concurred in the Court's decision. He believed, however, that the Court was wrong in extending harmless error analysis to an Estelle. He addressed this issue as follows:

I agree with the Court that the psychiatric examination on which [the psychiatrist] testified at the capital sentencing proceeding was in bald violation of Estelle v. Smith, and that [the defendant's] death sentence should be vacated. I write separately because I believe the Court errs in applying harmless-error analysis to this Sixth Amendment violation. It is my view that the unique nature of a capital sentencing determination should cause this Court to be especially hesitant ever to sanction harmless-error review of constitutional errors that taint capital sentencing proceedings, and even if certain constitutional errors might properly be subject to such harmless-error analysis, a violation of Estelle v. Smith is not such an error.

Until today's ruling, this Court never had applied harmless-error analysis to constitutional violations that taint the sentencing phase of a capital trial. In deciding to apply harmless-error analysis to the Sixth Amendment violation in this case, I believe the Court fails to adequately consider the unique nature of a capital sentencing proceeding and a sentencer's decision whether a defendant should live or die. The Court's analysis is also flawed in that it fails to accord any noticeable weight to the qualitative difference of death from all other punishments....

Because of the moral character of a capital sentencing determination and the substantial discretion placed in the hands of the sentencer, predicting the reaction of a sentencer to a proceeding untainted by constitutional error on the basis of a cold record is a dangerously speculative enterprise.... The threat of an erroneous harmless-error determination thus looms much larger in the capital sentencing context than elsewhere.

Concurring Statement by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun issued a concurring statement indicating he joined Justice Marshall's concurrence "because I agree that harmless-error analysis is inappropriate where the error is a Sixth Amendment violation under Estelle v. Smith, which results in the erroneous admission of psychiatric testimony in a capital-sentencing proceeding." See also Estelle v. Smith; Harmless Error Rule; Powell v. Texas; Right to Counsel

Saudia Arabia Saudia Arabia permits capital punishment. The nation carries out the death penalty using stoning and be-heading. Its legal system is based on Shari'a (Islamic) law. Saudi Arabia is a monarchy. The nation is ruled by a king from the Al Saud family. Saudia Arabia does not have a constitution. The government has declared the Islamic holy book, the Koran, and the Sunna of the Prophet Muhammad to be the nation's constitution.

Shari'a courts exercise jurisdiction over criminal cases. Shari'a courts include summary courts, courts of common pleas, and courts of appeal. Defendants may choose any person to represent them by a power of attorney filed with the court. Defendants usually appear without an attorney before a judge, who determines guilt or innocence. Most trials are not open to the public. The king reviews cases involving capital punishment. The king has the authority to commute death sentences and grant pardons, except for capital crimes committed against individuals. In such cases, he may request the victim's next of kin to pardon the defendant. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant could challenge his death sentence under a new constitutional rule announced after his conviction became final.

Case Holding: The defendant could not challenge his death sentence under a new constitutional rule announced after his conviction became final.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robert Wayne Sawyer, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Louisiana. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. Subsequent to the defendant's conviction and death sentence becoming final in 1984, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court arguing that the prosecutor's closing argument during the penalty phase of his trial diminished the jury's sense of responsibility for the capital sentencing decision, in violation of a new rule announced in 1985 by the United States Supreme Court in Caldwell v. Mississippi. The district court dismissed the petition.

While the defendant's appeal of the denial of his habeas corpus petition was pending in a federal Court of Appeals, the United States Supreme Court issued an opinion in the non-capital punishment case of Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288 (1989), wherein it was held that defendants whose convictions had become final are generally prohibited from utilizing any new rule announced by the Court in subsequent habeas corpus proceedings. Consequently, the Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's denial of relief, after finding that Caldwell announced a new rule within the meaning of Teague. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy ruled that the defendant was not entitled to federal habeas relief because Caldwell announced a new rule, as defined by Teague, that did not come within either of the Teague exceptions. It was noted that under the decision in Teague, a new rule of constitutional law established after a defendant's conviction had become final may not be used to attack the conviction in a federal habeas corpus proceeding unless the new rule (1) placed an entire category of primary conduct beyond the reach of criminal law or prohibited imposition of a certain type of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense; or (2) was a watershed rule of criminal procedure implicating a criminal proceeding's fundamental fairness and accuracy. Justice Kennedy found that Caldwell's new constitutional rule did not come within either of the Teague exceptions.

The opinion noted that the new rule announced in Caldwell, prohibiting prosecutors during the closing argument of a capital penalty phase proceeding from making statements that diminished the jury's sense of responsibility for the capital sentencing decision, was not dictated by any precedent existing at the time the defendant's conviction became final. It was said that no case prior to Caldwell invalidated a prosecutorial argument as impermissible under the Eighth Amendment.

Because the defendant sought the benefit of a new rule that did not come within either of the Teague exceptions, his claim for habeas corpus relief was found to be without merit. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented from the majority's decision. He believed that the rule announced in Caldwell was not precluded from use by the defendant in attacking his death sentence. Justice Marshall argued as follows:

The Court refuses to address Sawyer's Caldwell claim on the merits. Instead, it holds that Caldwell created a "new" rule within the meaning of Teague v. Lane, and that Caldwell's protection against misleading prosecutorial argument is not ... essential to the fundamental fairness of a capital proceeding. To reach this result, the majority misrepresents the source and function of Caldwell's prohibitions, thereby applying its newly-crafted retroactivity bar to a case in which the State has no legitimate interest in the finality of the death sentence it obtained through intentional misconduct....

In Teague, the plurality declared that a case announces a new rule "if the result was not dictated by precedent existing at the time the defendant's conviction became final." This Term, the Court held that the "new rule" principle ... validates reasonable, good-faith interpretations of existing precedents made by state courts even though they are shown to be contrary to later decisions." I continue to regard the Court's effort to curtail the scope of federal habeas as inconsistent with Congress's intent to provide state prisoners with an opportunity to redress "unlawful state deprivations of their liberty interests through a fresh and full review of their claims by an Article III court."

Issue Presented: Determining the proper standard to use when a defendant brings a successive, abusive, or defaulted federal habeas claim alleging "actual innocence" of the death penalty.

Case Holding: A defendant filing a successive, abusive, or defaulted federal habeas claim alleging "actual innocence" of the death penalty must show by clear and convincing evidence that, but for a constitutional error, no reasonable juror would have found him or her eligible for the death penalty under the applicable State law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Louisiana convicted the defendant, Robert Wayne Sawyer, of capital murder and sentenced him to death. After the defendant exhausted his State and federal post-conviction remedies, he filed a second habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The defendant's conviction and sentence was previously affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in Sawyer v. Smith.

In the second habeas petition, the defendant alleged that the prosecutor failed to produce exculpatory evidence and that his trial counsel's failure to introduce mental health records as mitigating evidence during the penalty phase of his prosecution constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. The district court barred the petition and claims as abusive or successive use of the habeas procedure. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed, holding that the defendant had not shown cause for failure to raise his claims in his earlier petition, and that it could not otherwise reach the claims' merits because he had not shown that he was "actually innocent" of the death penalty under Louisiana law. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice noted that a defendant seeking a second or subsequent habeas corpus remedy must show cause and prejudice before a court will reach the merits of a successive, abusive, or defaulted claim. It was said that even if a defendant cannot meet the standard, a court may hear the merits of such claims if failure to hear them would result in a miscarriage of justice. The miscarriage of justice exception applies where a defendant is "actually innocent" of the crime of which he or she was convicted or the penalty which was imposed. The chief justice held that, in the context of a claim of "actual innocence" of the death penalty, in order to establish "actual innocence" a defendant must show by clear and convincing evidence that, but for a constitutional error, no reasonable juror would have found him or her eligible for the death penalty under the applicable State law.

The opinion found that the defendant failed to show that he was actually innocent of the death penalty to which he had been sentenced. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun concurred in the Court's judgment in the case. He indicated that he did not agree; however, a federal court was absolutely barred from reviewing a capital defendant's abusive, successive, or procedurally defaulted claim unless the defendant could meet the "clear and convincing evidence" standard announced in the case. Justice Blackmun believed that a lesser standard of proof was more appropriate.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Blackmun and O'Connor, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens concurred in the judgment of the Court. He believed, however, the Court was wrong in erecting a “clear and convincing evidence” standard in order for a capital defendant to have an abusive, defaulted, or successive claim reviewed by a federal court. Justice Stevens wrote as follows: “I see no reason to depart from settled law, which clearly requires a defendant pressing a defaulted, successive, or abusive claim to show that a failure to hear his claim will ‘probably result’ in a fundamental miscarriage of justice. In my opinion, a corresponding standard governs a defaulted, successive, or abusive challenge to a capital sentence: The defendant must show that he is probably — that is, more likely than not — ‘innocent of the death sentence.’”

Scalia, Antonin Antonin Scalia was appointed to serve as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1986. While on the Supreme Court, Scalia has displayed an ultra-conservative interpretation of the Constitution.

Scalia was born in Trenton, New Jersey, on March 11, 1936. He attended Georgetown University and received a law degree from Harvard Law School in 1960. Scalia taught administrative law at the University of Chicago before being appointed as an appellate judge on the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. In 1986, President Ronald Reagan appointed Scalia to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Scalia has written a number of capital punishment opinions. His opinions in this area have displayed the ultra-conservative judicial ideology espoused by Scalia. For example, in Lankford v. Idaho the defendant was sentenced to death after being misled that the death penalty would not be sought. The majority of the Supreme Court believed due process of law prohibited imposition of the death sentence under the facts of the case. However, Scalia dissented. Scalia believed that the mere fact that the defendant was found guilty of the crime of capital murder was sufficient notice that the death penalty would be sought.

robbery, but the trial court refused. However, the trial court agreed to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense of second-degree murder. Additionally, the prosecutor sought and obtained an instruction on both premeditated murder and felony murder. The trial court did not instruct the jury that it had to agree on a single murder theory. The jury convicted the defendant of first-degree murder and he was sentenced to death. The Arizona Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction on the lesser included offense of robbery and in not requiring the jury to agree on a single theory of murder. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Souter Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and O'Connor and Kennedy, JJ., Joined: Justice Souter ruled that the defendant did not have a constitutional right to have the guilt phase jury instructed on the lesser included offense of robbery. The opinion recognized that, in Beck v. Alabama, the Court held unconstitutional a statute which prohibited lesser included offense instructions in capital cases. Justice Souter noted that Beck was based on the concern that a jury, convinced that the defendant had committed some violent crime but not convinced that he or she was guilty of a capital offense, might nonetheless vote for a capital conviction if the only alternative was to set him or her free with no punishment at all. It was ruled that this concern simply was not implicated in the defendant's case, since the jury was given the option of finding him guilty of the lesser included offense of second-degree murder. Justice Souter stated that it would be irrational to assume that the jury chose a capital murder conviction rather than second-degree murder as its means of keeping a "robber" off the streets.

Next, Justice Souter ruled that Arizona's characterization of first-degree murder as a single crime that did not require the jury to agree on one of its alternative forms (premeditated murder or felony murder) was not unconstitutional. The real issue presented by the defendant's argument was whether it was constitutionally acceptable to permit the jury to reach one verdict based on any combination of the alternative findings. Justice Souter found that the Due Process Clause did place limits on a State's capacity to define different states of mind as merely alternative means of committing a single offense. He indicated that it was impossible to lay down any single test for determining when two means are so disparate as to exemplify two inherently separate offenses. Instead, the concept of due process must serve as the measurement of the level of definitional and verdict specificity permitted by the Constitution.

Justice Souter reasoned that in translating the due process demands for fairness and rationality into concrete judgments about the adequacy of legislative determinations, courts should look both to history and widely shared State practices as guides to fundamental values. In using this process, he found it significant that Arizona's equation of the mental states of premeditated and felony murder as a species of the blameworthy state of mind required to prove a single offense of first-degree murder was supported by substantial historical and contemporary data. In view of those observations, the opinion concluded that the jury's options in the case did not fall beyond the constitutional bounds of fundamental fairness and rationality. The judgment of the Arizona Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's decision. He believed that the defendant's argument that the jury should have been instructed to agree on a single theory did not require due process analysis. He wrote that it had long been the general rule that, when a single crime can be committed in various ways, jurors need not agree upon the method of commission. Justice Scalia indicated that first-degree murder was a traditional crime and that juries traditionally have not been required to agree on the method of its commission.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice White, J., in Which Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice White dissented from the majority decision. He believed that both of the defendant's arguments were decided incorrectly by the Court. Justice White stated his position as follows:

Because I disagree with the result reached on each of the two separate issues before the Court, and because what I deem to be the proper result on either issue alone warrants reversal of [the defendant's] conviction, I respectfully dissent.

It is true that we generally give great deference to the States in defining the elements of crimes. I fail to see, however, how that truism advances the plurality's case. There is no failure to defer in recognizing the obvious: that premeditated murder and felony murder are alternative courses of conduct by which the crime of first-degree murder may be established....

[A] verdict that simply pronounces a defendant "guilty of first-degree murder" provides no clues as to whether the jury agrees that the three elements of premeditated murder or the two elements of felony murder have been proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Instead, it is entirely possible that half of the jury believed the defendant was guilty of premeditated murder and not guilty of felony murder/robbery, while half believed exactly the reverse. To put the matter another way, the plurality affirms this conviction without knowing that even a single element of either of the ways for proving first-degree murder, except the fact of a killing, has been found by a majority of the jury, let alone found unanimously by the jury, as required by Arizona law. A defendant charged with first-degree murder is at least entitled to a verdict — something [the defendant] did not get in this case as long as the possibility exists that no more than six jurors voted for any one element of first-degree murder, except the fact of a killing....

When the State chooses to proceed on various theories, each of which has lesser included offenses, the relevant lesser included instructions and verdict forms on each theory must be given in order to satisfy Beck. Anything less renders Beck, and the due process it guarantees, meaningless.

Issue Presented: Whether the president of the United States may commute a death sentence to life imprisonment with a condition that the defendant not be eligible for parole.

Case Holding: The president of the United States may commute a death sentence to life imprisonment with a condition that the defendant not be eligible for parole.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Maurice L. Schick, was sentenced to death by a military court in 1954. On March 25, 1960, President Eisenhower, acting under the authority of the Constitution, commuted the defendant's death sentence as follows:

[P]ursuant to the authority vested in me as President of the United States by Article II, Section 2, Clause 1, of the Constitution, the sentence to be put to death is hereby commuted to dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances becoming due on and after the date of this action, and confinement at hard labor for the term of his [defendant's] natural life. This commutation of sentence is expressly made on the condition that the said Maurice L. Schick shall never have any rights, privileges, claims, or benefits arising under the parole and suspension or remission of sentence laws of the United States and the regulations promulgated thereunder governing Federal prisoners confined in any civilian or military penal institution or any acts amendatory or supplementary thereof.

The action of the president substituted a life sentence for the death sentence imposed in 1954, subject to the conditions described in the commutation. Had the defendant originally received a sentence of life imprisonment, he would have been eligible for parole consideration in March 1969. The condition in the president's order of commutation barred parole at any time.

As a result of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Furman v. Georgia, the defendant challenged the president's authority to condition commutation of his sentence. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court contending that, based upon Furman, he was entitled to be re-sentenced to a life term with the possibility of parole and that the president was without authority to condition a commuted death sentence. The district court dismissed the petition without granting relief. A Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the matter.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Burger. Chief Justice Burger indicated that it was not necessary, for the disposition of the case, to decide whether Furman applied to death sentences imposed by the military. The opinion confined itself to a resolution of the power of the president to condition a commuted death sentence.

The chief justice noted: "Presidents throughout our history as a Nation have exercised the power to pardon or commute sentences upon conditions that are not specifically authorized by statute. Such conditions have generally gone unchallenged and ... attacks have been firmly rejected by the courts." The opinion went on to uphold the authority of the president to condition the defendant's commuted death sentence as follows:

A fair reading of the history of the English pardoning power, from which our [Article II, Section 2, Clause 1] derives, of the language of that clause itself, and of the unbroken practice since 1790 compels the conclusion that the power flows from the Constitution alone, not from any legislative enactments, and that it cannot be modified, abridged, or diminished by the Congress. Additionally, considerations of public policy and humanitarian impulses support an interpretation of that power so as to permit the attachment of any condition which does not otherwise offend the Constitution. The plain purpose of the broad power conferred by [the Constitution], was to allow plenary authority in the President to "forgive" the convicted person in part or entirely, to reduce a penalty in terms of a specified number of years, or to alter it with conditions which are in themselves constitutionally unobjectionable. If we were to accept [defendant's] contentions, a commutation of his death sentence to 25 or 30 years would be subject to the same challenge as is now made, i. e., that parole must be available to [him] because it is to others. That such an interpretation of [the Constitution] would in all probability tend to inhibit the exercise of the pardoning power and reduce the frequency of commutations is hardly open to doubt. We therefore hold that the pardoning power is an enumerated power of the Constitution and that its limitations, if any, must be found in the Constitution itself. It would be a curious logic to allow a convicted person who petitions for mercy to retain the full benefit of a lesser punishment with conditions, yet escape burdens readily assumed in accepting the commutation which he sought.

Petitioner's claim must therefore fail. The no-parole condition attached to the commutation of his death sentence is similar to sanctions imposed by legislatures such as mandatory minimum sentences or statutes otherwise precluding parole; it does not offend the Constitution. Similarly, the President's action derived solely from his [constitutional] powers; it did not depend upon ... any ... statute fixing a death penalty for murder.... Of course, the President may not aggravate punishment; the sentence imposed by statute is therefore relevant to a limited extent. But, as shown, the President has constitutional power to attach conditions to his commutation of any sentence. Thus, even if Furman v. Georgia applies to the military, a matter which we need not and do not decide, it could not affect a conditional commutation which was granted 12 years earlier.

The opinion went on to affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Douglas and Brennan, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented from the Court's opinion. He believed that a fair resolution of the case could only be achieved by addressing the application of Furman. He wrote:

The Court today denies [the defendant] relief from the no-parole condition of his commuted death sentence, paying only lip service to our intervening decision in Furman v. Georgia. Because I believe the retrospective application of Furman requires us to vacate [the defendant's] sentence and substitute the only lawful alternative — life with the opportunity for parole, I respectfully dissent....

[T]he no-parole condition is constitutionally defective in the face of the retrospective application of Furman and the extra-legal nature of the Executive action. I would nullify the condition, and direct the lower court to remand the case for resentencing to the only alternative available — life with the opportunity for parole — and its attendant benefits.

Issue Presented: Whether the Double Jeopardy Clause required reversal of the defendant's sentence of death.

Case Holding: The Double Jeopardy Clause did not require reversal of the defendant's sentence of death.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Indiana charged the defendant, Thomas Schiro, with one count of committing capital murder "intentionally" and a second count of committing capital murder during the course of a rape. A guilty phase jury convicted the defendant of the second count of committing capital murder during a rape, but did not return a verdict on the first count. At the penalty phase, the jury recommended life imprisonment. However, trial court imposed the death sentence after finding that the prosecutor proved the statutory aggravating circumstance that the defendant committed the murder by “intentionally” killing the victim while committing rape. The Indiana Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence on direct appeal and on a habeas appeal.

The defendant subsequently filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, contending that the guilt phase jury’s failure to convict him on the first count of capital murder operated as an acquittal of intentional murder and that the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibited the use of the intentional murder aggravating circumstance at the penalty phase. The district court rejected the argument and dismissed the petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O’Connor: Justice O’Connor ruled that the Double Jeopardy Clause did not require reversal of the defendant’s death sentence. It was said that the defendant’s argument that his sentencing proceeding amounted to a successive prosecution for intentional murder in violation of the Double Jeopardy Clause was inconsistent with the Court’s prior decisions. Justice O’Connor indicated that because a second sentencing proceeding following retrial ordinarily is constitutional, an initial sentencing proceeding following trial on the issue of guilt does not violate the Double Jeopardy Clause. The opinion found that, as applied to successive prosecutions, the Double Jeopardy Clause is written in terms of risk of trial and conviction, not punishment. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun argued in his dissent that the Double Jeopardy Clause was applicable to a capital sentencing proceeding:

The “trial-like” nature of [the defendant’s] capital sentencing proceeding, and the trauma he necessarily underwent in defending against the sentence of death, are directly analogous to guilt-phase proceedings, and thus bring the Double Jeopardy Clause into play.

... [T]he jury’s failure to convict [him] of intentional murder impliedly acquitted him under the Double Jeopardy Clause.... [T]here is no question that [he] could not have been re-prosecuted for intentional murder. Nor is there any question that the aggravator required the prosecution to prove again at sentencing, beyond a reasonable doubt, the identical elements of that murder charge. Thus, “the jury ha[d] already acquitted the defendant of whatever was necessary to impose the death sentence....” This sentence cannot be tolerated under the Double Jeopardy Clause.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Blackmun, J., Joined: Justice Stevens argued in his dissent that the Double Jeopardy Clause barred imposition of the death penalty. He wrote: “The jury found Thomas Schiro guilty of felony murder, but not intentional murder. Thereafter, in a separate sentencing hearing, the same jury unanimously concluded that Schiro did not deserve the death penalty, presumably because he had not intended to kill. Nevertheless, ... the trial judge overrode the jury’s recommendation and sentenced Schiro to death.... [T]he judge found that Schiro had intentionally killed his victim. That finding, like the majority’s holding today, violated the central purpose of the Double Jeopardy Clause. After the issue of intent had been raised at trial and twice resolved by the jury, ... it was constitutionally impermissible for the trial judge to reexamine the issue. Because the death sentence rests entirely on that unauthorized finding, the law requires that it be set aside.” See also Double Jeopardy Clause

Issue Presented: Whether the burden of proof on an actual innocence claim requires the defendant demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that, but for a constitutional error, no reasonable juror would have found him guilty.

Case Holding: The burden of proof on an actual innocence claim does not require the defendant demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that, but for a constitutional error, no reasonable juror would have found him guilty; instead, the defendant must show that, in light of the new evidence, it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have found him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Lloyd E. Schlup, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Missouri. On direct appeal, the Missouri Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant subsequently filed State and federal habeas corpus petitions, but was denied relief.

The defendant filed a second federal habeas petition in a district court alleging that constitutional error at his trial deprived the jury of critical evidence that would have established his innocence. The district court dismissed the petition without addressing its merits after concluding that the defendant could not satisfy the threshold showing of “actual innocence.” The district court ruled that the burden of proof on an actual innocence claim required the defendant demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that, but for a constitutional error, no reasonable juror would have found him guilty. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider whether the “clear and convincing evidence” standard used was the correct standard for the defendant’s actual innocence claim.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens ruled that the lower federal courts applied the wrong standard of proof to the defendant’s actual innocence claim. The opinion pointed out that, under the Court’s holding in Sawyer v. Whitley, for a defendant who had exhausted his or her right to file a habeas corpus petition in federal court, the defendant had to bring an actual innocence claim and demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that, but for the alleged constitutional error, no reasonable juror would have imposed the death penalty on him or her. Justice Stevens believed the burden imposed by Sawyer for showing actual innocence of punishment was too high for showing actual innocence of the crime for which a defendant was convicted.

The opinion ruled that the better standard of proof for an actual innocence claim premised on guilt of the crime was the standard announced by the Court in the non-capital case of Murray v. Carrier, 477 U.S. 478 (1986). It was said that, under Murray, when a defendant raises a claim of actual innocence to avoid a procedural bar to the consideration of the merits of his or her constitutional claims, the defendant must show that, in light of the new evidence, it is “more likely than not” that no reasonable juror would have found him or her guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. It was said that the focus on actual innocence means that a court is not bound by the admissibility rules that would govern at trial, but may consider the probative force of relevant evidence that was either wrongly excluded or unavailable at trial. The reviewing court must make a probabilistic determination about what reasonable, properly instructed jurors would do. The opinion added that it is presumed that a reasonable juror would consider fairly all of the evidence presented and would conscientiously obey the trial court’s instructions requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded with instructions that the defendant’s petition be evaluated under Murray’s actual innocence standard.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O’Connor: Justice O’Connor wrote in her concurring opinion that she agreed with the Court’s reasoning and adoption of Murray’s actual innocence standard to capital cases. She pointed out that she believed “[t]he Court today does not sow confusion in the law. Rather, it properly balances the dictates of justice with the need to ensure that the actual innocence exception remains only a ‘safety valve’ for the ‘extraordinary case.’”

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, in Which Kennedy and Thomas, JJ., Joined: The chief justice dissented from the Court’s opinion on the grounds that confusion would result from having two different actual innocent standards in capital cases. The dissent wrote: “The Court decides that the threshold standard for a showing of ‘actual innocence’ in a successive or abusive habeas petition is that set forth in Murray v. Carrier, rather than that set forth in Sawyer v. Whitley.... I believe the Sawyer standard should be applied to claims of guilt or innocence as well as to challenges to a petitioner’s sentence. But, more importantly, I believe the Court’s exegesis of the Carrier standard both waters down the standard suggested in that case, and will inevitably create confusion in the lower courts.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia wrote in his dissenting opinion that he believed the Court should not disturb lower court rulings involving successive or abusive habeas corpus petitions, when there has been no abuse of discretion. He argued that no evidence was shown to demonstrate that the Court of Appeals or district court abused their discretion in denying the defendant’s successive petition. *See also Actual Innocence Claim; Herrera v. Issue Presented: Whether Arizona was required to afford the defendant with a jury to determine whether he was mentally retarded.

Case Holding: Arizona was not required to afford the defendant with a jury to determine whether he was mentally retarded.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: Robert D. Smith was convicted of murder by the State of Arizona in 1982 and sentenced to death. Smith’s conviction and sentence were affirmed on direct appeal. Thereafter, Smith filed several State habeas corpus petitions which were denied. Smith thereafter filed a federal habeas petition, wherein he raised the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase. A federal district judge denied the petition, but a federal Court of Appeals reversed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari in Stewart v. Smith, 536 U.S. 856 (2002), and reversed the decision of the Court of Appeals. After the case was sent back to the Court of Appeals, Smith argued that, under the decision in Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002), he could not be executed because he was mentally retarded. The Court of Appeals decided to send the case back to State court to have a jury determine whether Smith was mentally retarded. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide whether a jury was required to determine the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court found that the Court of Appeals erred in requiring the State to afford Smith a jury trial on the issue of his mental status. The opinion addressed the issue as follows:

The [Court of Appeals] erred in commanding the Arizona courts to conduct a jury trial to resolve Smith’s mental retardation claim. Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002) stated in clear terms that “we leave to the State[s] the task of developing appropriate ways to enforce the constitutional restriction upon [their] execution of sentences.” States, including Arizona, have responded to that challenge by adopting their own measures for adjudicating claims of mental retardation. While those measures might, in their application, be subject to constitutional challenge, Arizona had not even had a chance to apply its chosen procedures when the [Court of Appeals] preemptively imposed its jury trial condition.

The decision of the Court of Appeals was vacated and the case was remanded for the Court of Appeals to issue an order that did not impose a jury requirement on the State. See also Atkins v. Virginia; Stewart v. Smith

Issue Presented: Whether a prior case requiring a jury preside over the penalty phase of a capital prosecution applies retroactively to cases that were final when the decision was handed down.

Case Holding: A prior case requiring a jury preside over the penalty phase of a capital prosecution did not apply retroactively to cases that were final when the decision was handed down.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Warren Summerlin, was convicted by an Arizona jury for the 1981 capital murder of Brenna Bailey. During the penalty phase of the trial, Arizona law required the trial judge determine whether aggravating circumstances existed for the imposition of the death penalty. The judge found that aggravating circumstances were proven and sentenced the defendant to death. The conviction and sentence were affirmed on direct appeal and during several state and federal habeas corpus proceedings. While one of the defendant's federal habeas corpus proceedings was pending in a Court of Appeals, the United States Supreme Court held in the case of Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002), that Arizona's requirement that a trial judge determine aggravating circumstances was unconstitutional and that such a determination must be made by a jury, absent a waiver. The Court of Appeals found that the Ring decision could be applied retroactively; therefore, the Court of Appeals reversed the defendant's death sentence because a jury was not allowed to determine the aggravating circumstances in his case. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide whether Ring applied retroactively to the defendant's case.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia held that Ring did not apply to cases that were already final on direct appeal when the case was decided because the decision created only a new procedural rule. The opinion addressed the issue as follows:

When a decision of this Court results in a "new rule," that rule applies to all criminal cases still pending on direct review. As to convictions that are already final, however, the rule applies only in limited circumstances. New substantive rules generally apply retroactively. This includes decisions that narrow the scope of a criminal statute by interpreting its terms, as well as constitutional determinations that place particular conduct or persons covered by the statute beyond the State's power to punish. Such rules apply retroactively because they necessarily carry a significant risk that a defendant stands convicted of an act that the law does not make criminal or faces a punishment that the law cannot impose upon him.

New rules of procedure, on the other hand, generally do not apply retroactively. They do not produce a class of persons convicted of conduct the law does not make criminal, but merely raise the possibility that someone convicted with use of the invalidated procedure might have been acquitted otherwise. Because of this more speculative connection to innocence, we give retroactive effect to only a small set of watershed rules of criminal procedure implicating the fundamental fairness and accuracy of the criminal proceeding. That a new procedural rule is fundamental in some abstract sense is not enough; the rule must be one without which the likelihood of an accurate conviction is seriously diminished. This class of rules is extremely narrow, and it is unlikely that any ... has yet to emerge...

The right to jury trial is fundamental to our system of criminal procedure, and States are bound to enforce the Sixth Amendment's guarantees as we interpret them. But it does not follow that, when a criminal defendant has had a full trial and one round of appeals in which the State faithfully applied the Constitution as we understood it at the time, he may nevertheless continue to litigate his claims indefinitely in hopes that we will one day have a change of heart. Ring announced a new procedural rule that does not apply retroactively to cases already final on direct review.

The decision of the Court of Appeals to set aside the defendant's death sentence was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Breyer, in Which Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg, JJ., Joined: Justice Breyer dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that the decision in Ring was the type that required retroactive application to cases pending in habeas proceedings. See also Retroactive Application of a New Constitutional Rule; *Ring v. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant had a constitutional right to be present in person when the State's appellate court affirmed his death sentence.

Case Holding: The defendant did not have a constitutional right to be present in person when the State's appellate court affirmed his death sentence because such right was only according at the trial court level when the original sentence was pronounced.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Michael Schwab, was prosecuted, along with seven other defendants, for the capital murder of a police officer by the State of Illinois. The other defendants were August Spies, Samuel Fielden, Albert R. Parsons, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, Louis Lingg, and Oscar W. Neebe. All of the defendants were found guilty by a jury. Schwab and six of the other defendants were sentenced to death. One defendant, Neebe, was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. The Illinois Supreme Court affirmed all of the judgments. In Ex Parte Spies, the United States Supreme Court affirmed all of the judgments.

The defendant, Schwab, had his sentence commuted to life imprisonment by the governor of Illinois (Fielden's sentence was also commuted to life imprisonment). Subsequently, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging his constitutional rights were violated because he was not present when the State's appellate court affirmed the original death sentence; therefore, his detention under the commutation was unlawful. The petition was dismissed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan ruled that the Constitution was not violated because the defendant was not present when the original death sentence was affirmed by the State's appellate court. The opinion stated the following:

At common law, it was deemed essential in capital cases that inquiry be made of the defendant, before judgment was passed, whether he had anything to say why the sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him; thus giving him an opportunity to allege any ... objection to further proceedings against him. This privilege was deemed of such substantial value to the accused that the judgment would be reversed if the record did not show that it was accorded to him.

But this rule of the common law, as the authorities clearly show, applied to the court of original jurisdiction which pronounced the sentence, and not to an appellate court[.]

... [N]either reason nor public policy require that he shall be personally present pending proceedings in an appellate court whose only function is to determine whether ... there appear any error of law to the prejudice of the accused.... We do not mean to say that the appellate court may not, under some circumstances, require his personal presence, but only that his presence is not essential to its jurisdiction to proceed with the case.

The judgment of the district court was affirmed. See also Allocation; Chicago Labor Riots of 1886; Ex Parte Spies; Fielden v. Illinois

Scottsboro Boys The obscure town of Scottsboro, Alabama, became the focus of national and international attention after two girls, Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, reported to authorities that they were raped on March 24, 1931, by nine African Americans while aboard a freight train. The nine Scottsboro boys, as they became known, were Roy Wright (13), Eugene Williams (13), Andy Wright (17), Haywood Patterson (17), Olen Montgomery (17), Willie Roberson (17), Ozzie Powell (16), Charles Weems (21), and Clarence Norris (21).

On April 19, 1931, the Scottsboro boys were prosecuted without counsel and, except for Roy Wright (mistrial), were found guilty and sentenced to death. The death sentences were overturned by the United States Supreme Court. Eventually, charges were dropped against four of the Scottsboro boys: Roy Wright, Eugene Williams, Olen Montgomery, and Willie Roberson.

Haywood Patterson was convicted again on the rape charge in January 1936 and sentenced to seventy-five years' imprisonment. In 1948, Patterson escaped from prison and fled to Michigan. The governor of Michigan refused to extradite Patterson back to Alabama.

In 1937, Andy Wright, Charlie Weems, and Ozzie Powell were again convicted, but sentenced to prison terms. Clarence Norris was also convicted again in 1937 and was sentenced to death. The death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment by Alabama's governor in 1938. In October 1976, Alabama governor George Wallace granted a pardon to Norris. *See also Norris v. Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights

The Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights was adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on December 15, 1989. This protocol requires the abolishment of capital punishment by all nations. The protocol has been ratified by fifty-seven nations. It has not been ratified by the United States. The text of the protocol is set out below.

Article 1

1. No one within the jurisdiction of a State Party to the present Protocol shall be executed.

2. Each State Party shall take all necessary measures to abolish the death penalty within its jurisdiction.

Article 2

1. No reservation is admissible to the present Protocol, except for a reservation made at the time of ratification or accession that provides for the application of the death penalty in time of war pursuant to a conviction for a most serious crime of a military nature committed during wartime.

2. The State Party making such a reservation shall at the time of ratification or accession communicate to the Secretary-General of the United Nations the relevant provisions of its national legislation applicable during wartime.

3. The State Party having made such a reservation shall notify the Secretary-General of the United Nations of any beginning or ending of a state of war applicable to its territory.

Article 3

The States Parties to the present Protocol shall include in the reports they submit to the Human Rights Committee, in accordance with article 40 of the Covenant, information on the measures that they have adopted to give effect to the present Protocol.

Article 4

With respect to the States Parties to the Covenant that have made a declaration under article 41, the competence of the Human Rights Committee to receive and consider communications when a State Party claims that another State Party is not fulfilling its obligations shall extend to the provisions of the present Protocol, unless the State Party concerned has made a statement to the contrary at the moment of ratification or accession.

Article 5

With respect to the States Parties to the first Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights adopted on 16 December 1966, the competence of the Human Rights Committee to receive and consider communications from individuals subject to its jurisdiction shall extend to the provisions of the present Protocol, unless the State Party concerned has made a statement to the contrary at the moment of ratification or accession.

Article 6

1. The provisions of the present Protocol shall apply as additional provisions to the Covenant.

2. Without prejudice to the possibility of a reservation under article 2 of the present Protocol, the right guaranteed in article 1, paragraph 1, of the present Protocol shall not be subject to any derogation under article 4 of the Covenant.

Article 7

1. The present Protocol is open for signature by any State that has signed the Covenant.

2. The present Protocol is subject to ratification by any State that has ratified the Covenant or acceded to it. Instruments of ratification shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

3. The present Protocol shall be open to accession by any State that has ratified the Covenant or acceded to it.

4. Accession shall be effected by the deposit of an instrument of accession with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

5. The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall inform all States that have signed the present Protocol or acceded to it of the deposit of each instrument of ratification or accession.

Article 8

1. The present Protocol shall enter into force three months after the date of the deposit with the Secretary-General of the United Nations of the tenth instrument of ratification or accession.

2. For each State ratifying the present Protocol or acceding to it after the deposit of the tenth instrument of ratification or accession, the present Protocol shall enter into force three months after the date of the deposit of its own instrument of ratification or accession.

Article 9

The provisions of the present Protocol shall extend to all parts of federal States without any limitations or exceptions.

Article 10

The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall inform all States referred to in article 48, paragraph 1, of the Covenant of the following particulars:

(a) Reservations, communications and notifications under article 2 of the present Protocol;

(b) Statements made under articles 4 or 5 of the present Protocol;

(c) Signatures, ratifications and accessions under article 7 of the present Protocol;

(d) The date of the entry into force of the present Protocol under article 8 thereof.

Article II

1. The present Protocol, of which the Arabic, Chinese, English, French, Russian and Spanish texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the United Nations.

2. The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall transmit certified copies of the present Protocol to all States referred to in article 48 of the Covenant.

Section 1983 of the Civil Rights Act of 1871 Under the federal Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (hereinafter § 1983), a lawsuit may be filed against any person who, pursuant to a statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, subjects any citizen to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the federal laws. In the context of capital punishment, inmates have invoked § 1983 in order to challenge some procedure in the method chosen to execute them. In two cases, Hill v. McDonough, 126 S.Ct. 2096 (2006), and Nelson v. Campbell, 541 U.S. 637 (2004), the United States Supreme Court has held that § 1983 may be used by inmates to challenge some aspect of the method in which they are to be executed. Hill and Nelson indicated that § 1983 may not be used to challenge the legality of a death sentence. That is, if an inmate seeks to prevent his/her execution outright, § 1983 cannot be used; instead a traditional habeas corpus petition must be used. See also Hill v. McDonough; Nelson v. Campbell

Security on Campus Security on Campus (SOC) is a non-profit organization founded in 1987 by Howard and Connie Clery after their daughter was brutally raped and murdered on a college campus. The primary work of SOC is that of advocating the prevention of college and university campus crime. SOC also works to assist campus crime victims in the enforcement of their legal rights.

Seeking Death Penalty After Conviction Reversed

Conviction of a capital crime does not mean that a sentence of death will be imposed. Life imprisonment is an option in capital prosecutions. Invariably, a defendant convicted of a capital offense will seek to overturn the conviction, regardless of whether or not the death penalty was imposed. An issue that has twice been addressed by the United States Supreme Court involves seeking the death penalty at a retrial of a defendant when the overturned sentence in the first trial was life imprisonment.

The Stroud Ruling. In the case of Stroud v. United States, 251 U.S. 15 (1919), the defendant was convicted of capital murder and was sentenced to life imprisonment. The defendant appealed his conviction. An appellate court overturned the conviction and granted the defendant a new trial. At the second trial, the defendant was again convicted of murder; however, this time he was sentenced to death. The defendant appealed his second conviction to the United States Supreme Court.

The defendant's argument to the Supreme Court was that the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment prohibited imposition of the death penalty at his second trial because the first trial determined that the death penalty was inappropriate. This argument was rejected. The Supreme Court held that the death penalty may be constitutionally sought by a prosecutor at a retrial of a defendant, even though the punishment was not imposed at the first trial.

The Bullington Ruling. The ruling in Stroud remained unchallenged law until the United States Supreme Court heard the case of Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430 (1981). The relevant facts of Bullington reveal that the defendant was indicted in 1977 for the capital murder of a woman during the commission of a kidnapping. After a lengthy trial, the jury returned a verdict of guilty of capital murder. The prosecutor indicated he would seek the death penalty; therefore, a sentencing hearing was held to determine the penalty. The sentencing jury returned a verdict of life imprisonment.

Shortly after the sentencing verdict was returned, the defendant filed post-verdict motions. In the motions, he asked the trial court to set aside the guilty verdict and acquit him or, in the alternative, set aside the guilty verdict and grant him a new trial. Due to a constitutional error at the trial, the presiding judge set aside the guilty verdict and granted the defendant a new trial.

Prior to the start of the second trial, the prosecutor filed a notice that he would again seek the death penalty. The defendant objected to this and filed a motion asking the trial court to quash the notice. The defendant argued that the Double Jeopardy Clause prevented the prosecutor from seeking the death penalty after the jury rejected this in the first trial.

The trial court agreed with the defendant and prohibited the prosecutor from seeking the death penalty in the second trial. The prosecutor thereafter made an interlocutory appeal of the trial court's ruling to the Missouri Supreme Court. The State's high court agreed with the prosecutor that the Double Jeopardy Clause did not prevent him from seeking the death penalty in the second trial. The State's high court then set aside the trial court's ruling.

Before the second trial began, the defendant made an interlocutory appeal of the State's high court decision to the United States Supreme Court. The essence of the Supreme Court's response was that, when a penalty phase jury rejects the death penalty and life imprisonment is imposed, double jeopardy principles prohibit imposition of a death sentence after a subsequent retrial. However, if a defendant is given the death penalty in the first trial, which is subsequently reversed, he or she is still exposed to capital punishment at a retrial.

The Sattazahn Ruling. The application of Bullington was limited by the decision in Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101 (2003). In Sattazahn, the penalty phase jury was deadlocked and, consequently, the trial court imposed a sentence of life imprisonment. The defendant appealed the conviction and was awarded a new trial. At the second trial, the prosecutor sought the death penalty again. The defendant was convicted and the jury imposed the death penalty. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, arguing that Bullington prevented imposition of the death penalty. A narrow majority of the Supreme Court disagreed. The Court held that Bullington applied only when a jury actually imposes a sentence of life imprisonment. However, when a jury is deadlocked on the issue of punishment and the trial court imposes life imprisonment, Bullington does not prohibit imposition of the death penalty in a second trial. See also Arizona v. Rumsey; Bullington v. Missouri; Double Jeopardy Clause; Poland v. Arizona; Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania; Stroud v. United States

Self-Defense When properly invoked, self-defense will excuse a homicide. Self-defense is an affirmative defense that a defendant must prove. In order to establish self-defense, a defendant must show that, in committing a homicide, he or she was acting under a reasonable belief that he or she was in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm and that his or her conduct in causing death was necessary in order to avoid death or great bodily harm. See also Affirmative Defenses; Allison v. Sentence for Non-Capital Crime It is often the situation that a capital defendant will be convicted of non-capital crimes during the trial of a capital offense. Occasionally, trial courts do not sentence capital felons on the non-capital convictions until after a penalty phase capital verdict is returned. Capital defendants sentenced to death under such circumstances have argued that their federal constitutional due process rights are violated by not being sentenced on the non-capital crimes before the capital penalty phase proceeding begins.

This argument is raised by capital felons convicted in the few jurisdictions that allow a sentence of life imprisonment with the possibility of parole, as an option to a sentence of death for capital murder. Capital felons in such jurisdictions seek to have trial judges impose punishment for the non-capital convictions, prior to the start of the capital penalty phase, so that they can argue to the penalty phase jury that, in view of the sentence for the non-capital crimes, they will not be released on parole if the jury recommended a sentence of life imprisonment. Courts have rejected this due process argument as a basis for invalidating death sentences.

September 11 Attack On September 11, 2001, the largest mass murder in the history of the United States occurred when members of the Islamic militant group al-Qaeda hijacked four planes and crashed them into the two towers of the World Trade Center in New York, the Pentagon, and a field in Shanksville, Pennsylvania. The attack killed 2,948 known victims.

The attack on the World Trade Center involved two Boeing 767 airplanes. One of the planes, American Airlines Flight 11, took off at 7:59 A.M. from Boston's Logan International Airport en route to Los Angeles. When Flight 11 took off under the stewardship of Captain John Ogonowski and First Officer Thomas McGuinness, it was carrying nine flight attendants and eighty-one passengers. Five of the passengers were al-Qaeda members: Mohamed Atta, Abdul Aziz al Omari, Satam al Suqami, Wail al Shehri, and Waleed al Shehri. Shortly after Flight 11 took off, the militants took control of the plane and steered it toward New York City. At 8:46 A.M., the militants flew Flight 11 into the North Tower of the World Trade Center, killing everyone on the plane and scores of people in the building.

The second airplane involved in the World Trade Center attack, United Airlines Flight 175, took off at 8:14 A.M. from Logan International Airport en route to Los Angeles. Flight 175 was piloted by Captain Victor Saracini and First Officer Michael Horrocks and carried seven flight attendants and fifty-six passengers. Five of the passengers were al-Qaeda members: Marwan al Shehhi, Fayez Banihammad, Mohand al Shehri, Ahmed al Ghamdi, and Hamza al Ghamdi. Not long after Flight 175 took off, the militants seized control of the plane and flew it toward New York City. At 9:03 A.M., the militants flew Flight 175 into the South Tower of the World Trade Center, killing everyone on the plane and scores of people in the building.

The attack on the Pentagon involved a Boeing 757. This plane flew as American Airlines Flight 77 and took off at 8:20 A.M. from Dulles International Airport in Washington, D.C., en route to Los Angeles. Flight 77 was piloted by Captain Charles F. Burlingame and First Officer David Charlebois and carried four flight attendants and fifty-eight passengers. Five of the passengers on Flight 77 were al-Qaeda members: Khalid al Mihdhar, Majed Moqed, Hani Hanjour, Nawaf al Hazmi, and Salem al Hazmi. The militants took control of Flight 77 shortly after the plane took off. At 9:37 A.M., the militants crashed Flight 77 into the Pentagon, killing everyone on the plane and scores of people in the building.

The Shanksville, Pennsylvania, crash involved a Boeing 757. This plane flew as United Airlines Flight 93 and took off 8:42 A.M. from Newark's Liberty International Airport en route to San Francisco. Flight 93 was piloted by Captain Jason Dahl and First Officer Leroy Homer and carried five flight attendants and thirty-seven passengers. The passenger list included four al-Qaeda members: Saeed al Ghamdi, Ahmed al Nami, Ahmad al Haznawi, and Ziad Jarrah. The al-Qaeda militants were able to seize control of the plane and fly it in the direction of Washington, D.C. However, the passengers mounted a brave counterattack in an effort to regain control of the plane. At about 10:02 A.M., when the passengers were about to overtake the militants, the plane was intentionally crashed into a field in Shanksville, killing everyone on the plane.

The "9/11" attack, as it was later known, resulted in the prosecution of one man suspected of having a role in the mass murder. That man, Zacarias Moussaoui (b. 1968), was born in France but was of Moroccan Arab descent.

Moussaoui was actually arrested before the 9/11 attack took place. He was apprehended in Minnesota on August 16, 2001, after officials of a flight school informed the FBI that Moussaoui was seeking flight training for a Boing 747. The FBI turned Moussaoui over to the Immigration and Naturalization Service on charges of violating the terms of his visa. Moussaoui was in custody when the 9/11 attack took place.

Subsequent to the 9/11 attack, the FBI focused an investigation on Moussaoui. As a result of that investigation, Moussaoui was indicted by a federal grand jury on December 11, 2001. The indictment charged him with six felony crimes: conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism transcending national boundaries, conspiracy to commit aircraft piracy, conspiracy to destroy aircraft, conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction, conspiracy to murder United States employees, and conspiracy to destroy property. Four of the six charges against Moussaoui carried the death penalty.

Moussaoui's trial started in October 2002 in Alexandria, Virginia. The trial took time-consuming procedural detours that ultimately led to Moussaoui pleading guilty to all six charges in April 2005. A jury trial was held to determine whether Moussaoui would be sentenced to death. On May 3, 2006, the jury declined to impose the death penalty. As a consequence, Moussaoui was sentenced to six life imprisonment terms on May 4, 2006. See also Mass Murder; Oklahoma Bombing Sequestration of Jury The purpose of sequestering the jury is to insulate jurors from extraneous influences. Courts have not hesitated to reverse capital convictions or death sentences when sufficient evidence has been proffered to show improper communication was made with a juror or jurors. There are reported cases where death sentences have been vacated because court personnel and law enforcement agents made improper remarks to penalty phase jurors regarding the need for capital felons to be put to death. See also Mattox v. United States

Serial Killer A serial killer is defined as a person who kills three or more victims over a period of time. It has been estimated that 85 percent of the world's serial killers are in the United States. Serial killers tend to be educated white males between the ages of 25 and 35. Most victims of serial killers are chosen randomly. Some serial killers randomly target a specific group, such as college women, prostitutes, gays, or young children. Serial killers tend to sexually attack their victims before killing them. There has also been a pattern of showing pleasure from mutilating the bodies of victims. See also Bundy, Theodore; Charlotte Serial Murders; Cleveland State University Racial Murders; Cole, Carroll Edward; Coleman and Brown; Fish, Albert Hamilton;

David Berkowitz (Son of Sam) was a serial killer who terrorized New York City in 1976 and 1977, when he shot six people to death and wounded seven others. Berkowitz confessed to the crimes and was sentenced to prison for life. (New York Department of Corrections)

Serial Killing Aggravator Serial killing occurs when a person kills three or more victims over a period of time. Five states, Alabama, Colorado, Illinois, Tennessee, and Virginia, have made serial killing a statutory aggravating circumstance. As such, the death penalty may be imposed if it is found at the penalty phase that a defendant killed three or more persons over a period of time. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Serial Sniper Attacks During the course of a forty-seven-day period from September 5, 2002, to October 22, 2002, John Allen Muhammad (b.1960) and his teenage companion, Lee Boyd Malvo (b. 1985), went on a shooting rampage that occurred in Alabama, Louisiana, Maryland, Washington, D.C., and Virginia. When the carnage ended, six people had been wounded and ten murdered.

Muhammad and Malvo first met on the island of Antigua in 1999. Malvo had been living there with his mother since they left their home in Kingston, Jamaica, in 1998. Muhammad, whose birth name was John Allen Williams, developed a strong friendship with Malvo and his mother. As a result of the friendship, Malvo's mother decided to leave him with Muhammad when she moved to Fort Myers, Florida, in 2000. In 2002, Muhammad and Malvo left Antigua and traveled to Bellingham, Washington, where they lived in a homeless shelter. Shortly after arriving in Washington, Muhammad and Malvo set out on a shooting spree that was described by the Virginia Supreme Court in the case of Muhammad v. Commonwealth, 619 S.E.2d 16 (Va. 2005), as follows:

Malvo received life sentences for his role in the killings. Muhammad was given a death sentence for a victim killed in Virginia. (Fairfax County Sheriff and Virginia Department of Corrections)

The first shooting occurred in Clinton, Maryland, on September 5, 2002. Paul J. LaRuffa, the owner of Margellina's Restaurant, left the restaurant at closing and proceeded to his car with his briefcase and Sony portable computer. Inside the briefcase were bank deposit bags that contained $3,500 in cash and credit card receipts from that evening. LaRuffa placed the briefcase and laptop on the backseat of his car, and then sat behind the steering wheel. He testified that ... [h]e heard gunshots and the driver's side window shattered. When he stepped out of his car, he realized he had been shot. The trauma surgeon who treated him testified that LaRuffa was shot six times: once in the back left side of his neck, three times in the left side of his chest, and twice in his left arm.

An employee who left the restaurant with LaRuffa, Paul B. Hammer, witnessed the shooting and called 9-1-1. Hammer testified that he saw a "kid" run up to LaRuffa's car, fire shots into it, and then open the rear door and take the briefcase and portable computer....

The second shooting occurred in Clinton, Maryland, on September 15, 2002. Muhammad Rashid was closing the Three Roads Liquor Store. Rashid testified that he noticed [a] Caprice outside the store shortly before closing. He testified that he was in the process of locking the front door from the outside when he heard gunshots from behind him. At the same time, a young man with a handgun rushed towards Rashid and shot Rashid in the stomach. At trial, Rashid identified Malvo as the person who shot him....

The third and fourth shootings occurred in Montgomery, Alabama, on September 21, 2002. Claudine Parker and Kelly Adams closed the Zelda Road ABC Liquor Store and walked out. They were shot immediately. Parker died as a result of a single gunshot wound that entered her back, transected her spinal cord, and passed through her lung. Adams was shot once through her neck, but lived. The bullet exited through her chin, breaking her jaw in half, shattering her face and teeth, paralyzing her left vocal cord, and severing major nerves to her left shoulder....

The fifth shooting occurred in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, on September 23. Hong Im Ballenger, the manager of the Beauty Depot store, closed the store for the evening. As she was walking to her car, she was shot once in the head with a bullet fired from a high velocity rifle. Ballenger died as the result of the single shot. The bullet entered the back of her head and exited through her jawbone. The wound caused massive bleeding and compromised her airway....

The sixth shooting occurred in Silver Spring, Maryland, on October 3, 2002. At approximately 8:15 A.M., Premkumar A. Walekar was fueling his taxicab. He was shot once with a bullet from a high velocity rifle. The bullet passed through his left arm and then entered his chest, where it broke two ribs, shredded portions of his lungs, and damaged his heart. A physician, who was fueling her car next to Walekar, attempted CPR but was unsuccessful....

The seventh shooting occurred in Silver Spring, Maryland on October 3, 2002. At approximately 8:30 A.M., Sarah Ramos was sitting on a bench in front of the Crisp & Juicy Restaurant in the Leisure World Shopping Center. She was shot once with a bullet from a high velocity rifle. The bullet entered the front of her head and exited through her spinal cord at the top of her neck....

The eighth shooting occurred in Kensington, Maryland, on October 3, 2002. At approximately 10:00 A.M., Lori Lewis-Rivera was vacuuming her car at the Shell gas station on the corner of Connecticut Avenue and Knowles Avenue. She was shot once in the back by a bullet from a high velocity rifle as she vacuumed her car....

The ninth shooting occurred in Washington, D.C. on October 3, 2002.... At approximately 9:15 P.M. on that day, Paschal Charlot was shot in the chest as he crossed the intersection of Georgia Avenue and Kalmia Road.... The bullet entered Charlot's chest and shattered his collarbone and three ribs before lacerating his lungs. Charlot died before emergency personnel arrived....

The tenth shooting occurred in Fredericksburg, Virginia, on October 4, 2002. Caroline Seawell had finished shopping at a Michael's craft store, and was putting her bags in her minivan, when she was shot once in the back by a bullet from a high velocity rifle. The bullet severely damaged her liver and exited through her right breast. Seawell survived the shooting....

The eleventh shooting occurred in Bowie, Maryland on October 6, 2002. Tanya Brown took Iran Brown to Tasker Middle School. As [Iran] was walking on the sidewalk to the school, he was shot once in the chest by a bullet from a high velocity rifle. Tanya decided not to wait for emergency personnel and drove [Iran] to a health care center. [Iran's] lungs were damaged, there was a large hole in his diaphragm, the left lobe of his liver was damaged, and his stomach, pancreas, and spleen were lacerated by bullet fragments. Surgeons were able to save [Iran's] life and he spent eight weeks recovering in the hospital.

The twelfth shooting ... was the murder of Dean Meyers.... [On the morning of Wednesday, October 9, 2002, Meyers was shot and killed while fueling his car at the Sunoco gas station on Sudley Road in Manassas, Virginia. Meyers was shot in the head by a single bullet. The bullet entered behind his left ear, where it fragmented into multiple small pieces. The bullet fragments shattered the temporal bone and the fragments of bullet and bone then traveled through his brain and caused multiple fractures of his skull.]

The thirteenth shooting occurred in Massaponax, Virginia on October 11, 2002. Kenneth Bridges was at an Exxon gas station on Jefferson Davis Highway. He was shot once in the chest by a bullet from a high velocity rifle. The bullet damaged his lungs and heart, causing fatal internal injuries....

The fourteenth shooting occurred in Falls Church, Virginia on October 14, 2002. Linda Franklin and her husband were shopping at a Home Depot store. As they loaded their purchases in their car, Franklin was shot and killed by a single bullet from a high velocity rifle. The bullet entered the left side of her head, passed through her brain and skull, and exited from the right side of her head....

The fifteenth shooting occurred in Ashland, Virginia on October 19, 2002. Jeffrey Hopper and his wife stopped in Ashland to fuel their car and eat dinner. They left the restaurant and were walking to their car when Hopper was shot in the abdomen. Hopper survived the shooting, but underwent five surgeries to repair his pancreas, stomach, kidneys, liver, diaphragm, and intestines....

The sixteenth shooting occurred in Aspen Hill, Maryland on October 22, 2002. At approximately 6:00 A.M., Conrad Johnson, a bus driver for the Montgomery County Transit Authority, was shot in the chest at the entrance to his bus. Johnson remained conscious until rescue workers arrived, but died at the hospital. A single high velocity rifle bullet killed Johnson. The bullet entered his right chest, and caused massive damage to his diaphragm, liver, pancreas, kidneys, and intestines.

On October 24, 2002, Muhammad and Malvo were captured and arrested by FBI agents at a rest area in Frederick County, Maryland. They were asleep in a car at the time of their capture. Subsequent to their arrest, Muhammad and Malvo were indicted by Virginia for the crimes committed in that State. Muhammad was indicted for the capital murder of Dean Meyers. Malvo was charged with the murder of Linda Franklin and Kenneth Bridges and the attempted murder of Caroline Seawell. Muhammad and Malvo were prosecuted separately.

A jury convicted Muhammad of capital murder on November 17, 2003, and he was sentenced to death on March 9, 2004. A jury convicted Malvo of murdering Franklin on December 18, 2003, and he was sentenced to life imprisonment without parole on March 10, 2004. In October 2004, Malvo entered a guilty plea to charges involving Bridges and Seawell. He was given another life sentence for those charges.

After their prosecution by Virginia, Muhammad and Malvo were extradited to Maryland to be prosecuted for crimes committed there, including the murders of James Martin, James Buchanan, Lori Lewis-Rivera, Premkumar Walekar, Sarah Ramos, and Conrad Johnson. Malvo pled guilty to the murders on October 10, 2006. On November 8, 2006, Malvo was sentenced to six consecutive life sentences for the Maryland murders.

Muhammad had a jury trial for the Maryland charges. On May 30, 2006, a jury convicted him of murdering all six victims. The prosecutor did not seek the death penalty in the case because of the death sentence imposed by Virginia. Consequently, on June 1, 2006, Muhammad received six life sentences for his Maryland convictions.

While the Maryland charges were pending against Malvo, he informed law enforcement authorities of other shootings. Malvo alleged that he and Muhammad killed a man in Los Angeles, California; shot a man in Clearwater, Florida; killed a man in Denton, Texas; shot a man in Baton Rouge, Louisiana; and killed a man in Tucson, Arizona. See also Serial Killer

Sexual Assault The crime of sexual assault may be a felony or misdemeanor, depending upon the nature of the unlawful contact, e.g., mere fondling or copulation. Sexual assault, without more, cannot be used to inflict the death penalty. The Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits this as cruel and unusual punishment. However, the crime of sexual assault can play a role in a capital prosecution. If sexual assault occurs during the commission of a homicide, it may form the basis of a death-eligible offense and therefore trigger a capital prosecution.

Shackles The Due Process Clause of the federal Constitution prohibits routine use of visible shackles on capital defendants during their trial. The United States Supreme Court has held that a defendant may be required to wear visible shackles only when it has been shown that there is a specific security need or escape risk. The general prohibition against the use of visible shackles has slightly different justifications for the guilt phase and penalty phase of a capital prosecution.

With respect to the guilt phase of a capital prosecution, three reasons support the general bar against visible shackles. First, insofar as the criminal justice system presumes that a defendant is innocent, forcing a defendant to wear visible shackles undermines the presumption of innocence. It suggests to the jury that the defendant is guilty. Second, the use of physical restraints diminishes a defendant's constitutional right to counsel, because shackles can interfere with a defendant's ability to communicate with his/her lawyer. Third, the routine use of shackles in the presence of juries would undermine the formal dignity of the courtroom.

In regards to the penalty phase, the primary concern with the use of visible shackles involves factors juries consider in deciding whether to impose the death penalty or life imprisonment. The appearance of a defendant during the penalty phase in shackles inevitably implies to a jury that court officials consider the defendant a danger to the community. This impression has concrete negative consequences. First, many jurisdictions make "danger to the community" a statutory aggravating circumstance that permits the imposition of the death penalty. Therefore, requiring a defendant to wear visible shackles can assist the prosecutor in proving a statutory aggravating circumstance. Second, in an effort to have a jury impose life imprisonment, instead of death, defendants invariably put on mitigating evidence to show that they are no longer a threat to society. This mitigating evidence would become meaningless if capital defendants were routinely required to wear visible shackles at the penalty phase. See also Deck v. Missouri; Due Process Clause

Issue Presented: Whether a parole ineligibility instruction is required during the penalty phase when evidence of a defendant's future dangerousness is presented by a prosecutor.

Case Holding: A parole ineligibility instruction is required during the penalty phase when evidence of a defendant's future dangerousness is presented by a prosecutor.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Wesley Aaron Shafer, Jr., was indicted by the State of South Carolina for the 1997 murder of a convenience store cashier. A jury convicted the defendant of the crime. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor presented evidence of the defendant's prior violent conduct, including aggressive behavior while awaiting trial. As a result of this evidence, the defendant requested the trial court instruct the jury that he would not be eligible for parole if sentenced to life imprisonment. The trial court refused to give the instruction. The penalty phase jury sentenced the defendant to death. The judgment was affirmed on appeal by the South Carolina Supreme Court. In doing so, the State's high court rejected the defendant's argument that under the United States Supreme Court decision in Simmons v. South Carolina, 512 U.S. 154 (1994), he had a right to have the jury informed that he was ineligible for parole if sentenced to life imprisonment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Ginsburg: Justice Ginsburg held that, under the decision in Simmons, a defendant is entitled to a parole ineligibility instruction whenever the issue of future dangerousness is interjected in the case. The opinion held that the State's high court did not address the issue of whether the evidence presented by the prosecutor was future dangerousness evidence; it simply found that Simmons did not apply. Consequently, the decision of the South Carolina Supreme Court was reversed and the case was remanded for the State's high court to consider whether the prosecutor's evidence was in fact future dangerousness evidence.

from the majority opinion. He argued that there was no constitutional right to have a parole ineligibility instruction simply because of evidence of future dangerousness.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas dissented from the majority opinion. He believed that, to the extent that a parole ineligibility instruction is required by the constitution, the facts of the case revealed that the jury was adequately informed that the defendant would not be eligible for parole. See also Parole Ineligibility Jury Instruction

Mississippi, 498 U.S. 1 (1990); Argued: Not reported; Decided: October 29, 1990; Opinion of the Court: Per Curiam; Concurring Opinion: Justice Marshall; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Not reported; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: Not reported

Issue Presented: Whether the statutory aggravating circumstance “especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel” was properly defined so as to sustain the defendant’s death sentence.

Case Holding: The statutory aggravating circumstance “especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel” was not properly defined so as to sustain the defendant’s death sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Shell, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Mississippi. The defendant’s death sentence was imposed based upon evidence at the penalty phase, which established that the murder was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel. On appeal to the Mississippi Supreme Court, the defendant argued that the trial court did not define the terms “especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel,” in a constitutionally acceptable manner. The State’s appellate court rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion ruled that “[a]lthough the trial court in this case used a limiting instruction to define the ‘especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel’ factor, that instruction is not constitutionally sufficient. The opinion held that the statutory aggravating circumstance was too vague even with the definition supplied by the trial court. The judgment of the Mississippi Supreme Court was reversed, insofar as it left standing the sentence of death.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall indicated that he was writing a concurring opinion only for the purpose of providing legal analysis that was not contained in the brief per curiam opinion. In carrying out his purpose, he wrote the following:

Obviously, a limiting instruction can be used to give content to a statutory factor that “is itself too vague to provide any guidance to the sentencer” only if the limiting instruction’s own “definitions are constitutionally sufficient,” that is, only if the limiting instruction itself “provide[s] some guidance to the sentencer.” The trial court’s definitions of “heinous” and “atrocious” in this case clearly fail this test; like “heinous” and “atrocious” themselves, the phrases [used by the trial court] “extremely wicked or shockingly evil” and “outrageously wicked and vile” could be used by “[a] person of ordinary sensibility [to] fairly characterize almost every murder.” Indeed, there is no meaningful distinction between these latter formulations and the “outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible and inhuman” instruction expressly invalidated in Godfrey v. Georgia.

Nor is it of any consequence that the trial court defined “cruel” in an arguably more concrete fashion than “heinous” or “atrocious.” It has long been settled that when a case is submitted to the jury on alternative theories the unconstitutionality of any of the theories requires that the conviction [or verdict] be set aside. Even assuming that the trial court permissibly defined “cruel,” the instruction in this case left the jury with two constitutionally infirm, alternative bases on which to find that [the defendant] committed the charged murder in an “especially heinous, atrocious or cruel” fashion.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendants established that their convictions and sentences were invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted them.

Case Holding: The defendants established that their convictions and sentences were invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted them.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: Two defendants in this case, Shepherd and another unnamed defendant, were convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Florida. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed judgments. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendants’ argument that their convictions were invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted them. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion ruled that the disposition of the case was controlled by its decision in Cassell v. Texas. In Cassell, it was held that jury discrimination might be proved in other ways than by evidence of long-continued unexplained absence of blacks from jury duty, such as by admissions from jury commissioners that they chose only whom they knew and that they knew no blacks. The judgments of the Florida Supreme Court were reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Jackson, in Which Frankfurter, J., Joined: Justice Jackson concurred in the Court’s decision. He wrote separately to set out facts that the per curiam opinion failed to mention and to stress his belief that the case required reversal for reasons more significant than that chosen by the Court. Justice Jackson gave the following account of the case:

Newspapers published as a fact, and attributed the information to the sheriff, that these defendants had confessed. No one, including the sheriff, repudiated the story. Witnesses and persons called as jurors said they had read or heard of this statement. However, no confession was offered at the trial. The only rational explanations for its nonproduction in court are that the story was false or that the confession was obtained under circumstances which made it inadmissible or its use inexpedient....

But that is not all. Of course, such a crime stirred deep feeling and was exploited to the limit by the press [because the victim was white]. These defendants were first taken to the county jail of Lake County. A mob gathered and demanded that defendants be turned over to it. By order of court, they were quickly transferred for safekeeping to the state prison, where they remained until about two weeks before the trial. Meanwhile, a mob burned the home of defendant Shepherd's father and mother and two other ... houses. [Blacks] were removed from the community to prevent their being lynched. The National Guard was called out on July 17 and 18 and, on July 19, the 116th Field Artillery was summoned from Tampa. The [blacks] of the community abandoned their homes and fled.

Every detail of these passion-arousing events was reported by the press.... These and many other articles were highly prejudicial, including a cartoon published at the time of the grand jury, picturing ... electric chairs and headed, "No Compromise — Supreme Penalty"....

Under these circumstances, for the Court to reverse these convictions upon the sole ground that the method of jury selection discriminated against the [black] race, is to stress the trivial and ignore the important. While this record discloses discrimination which under normal circumstances might be prejudicial, this trial took place under conditions and was accompanied by events which would deny defendants a fair trial before any kind of jury. I do not see, as a practical matter, how any [black] on the jury would have dared to cause a disagreement or acquittal. The only chance these [defendants] had of acquittal would have been in the courage and decency of some sturdy and forthright white person of sufficient standing to face and live down the odium among his white neighbors that such a vote, if required, would have brought. To me, the technical question of discrimination in the jury selection has only theoretical importance. The case presents one of the best examples of one of the worst menaces to American justice. It is on that ground that I would reverse.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying death. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection

Shiras, George, Jr. George Shiras, Jr., served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1892 to 1903. While on the Supreme Court, Shiras displayed a judicial philosophy that straddled moderate and conservative views.

Shiras was born on January 26, 1832, in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Shiras's educational training included studying law at Yale Law School. During his years of private practice in Allegheny County, Shiras became an extremely successful litigator. His clients included railroad companies and other large corporations. In 1892, President Benjamin Harrison appointed Shiras to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Shiras wrote several capital punishment decisions. Shiras's capital punishment opinions reflected a moderate constitutional philosophy. This was best illustrated in the case of Murray v. Louisiana. In that case, the defendant was convicted of murder and sentenced to death by the State of Louisiana. The defendant argued to the Supreme Court that his prosecution should have been removed to a federal court because blacks were excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. Shiras, writing for the Supreme Court, acknowledged the existence of a federal statute which required removal of a State criminal case to federal court if the statutes or constitution of the State discriminated against blacks in jury service. However, Shiras found that, while the defendant presented some evidence of racial discrimination in grand juror selection, he could not point to any statute or constitutional provision of the State of Louisiana that permitted such discrimination. Consequently, Shiras found that the defendant did not have a right to be tried in a federal court. Shiras retired from the Court in 1903. He died on August 2, 1924.

Issue Presented: Whether the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was violated by the refusal of the trial court to instruct the penalty phase jury that, under State law, the defendant was ineligible for parole.

Case Holding: Where a defendant's future dangerousness is at issue during that penalty phase and State law prohibits the defendant's release on parole, due process requires that the sentencing jury be informed that the defendant is parole ineligible.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: Jonathan Dale Simmons was convicted of capital murder by the State of South Carolina. During the penalty phase of the defendant's trial, the prosecutor argued that his future dangerousness was a factor for the jury to consider when deciding whether to sentence him to death or life imprisonment. As a consequence of the prosecutor's argument on future dangerousness, the defendant asked the trial judge to instruct the penalty phase jury that, under South Carolina death penalty law, he was ineligible for parole if given a life imprisonment sentence. The judge refused to give the instruction. Prior to returning its verdict on punishment, the jury asked the trial court whether life imprisonment carried with it the possibility of parole. The trial court instructed the jury not to consider parole in reaching its verdict and that the terms "life imprisonment" and "death sentence" were to be understood to have their plain and ordinary meaning. The jury returned a death sentence.

On appeal, the South Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the defendant's conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the federal Constitution required the jury be instructed that he was not eligible for parole. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Blackmun Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun ruled that the defendant was entitled to have the jury instructed that he was not eligible for parole. The opinion found that where a defendant's future dangerousness is at issue during the penalty phase of a capital prosecution and the applicable law prohibits his or her release on parole, due process requires that the sentencing jury be informed that the defendant is parole ineligible. It was said that a capital felon cannot be executed on the basis of information which he or she had no opportunity to deny or explain. Justice Blackman indicated that the defendant's jury reasonably might have believed that he could be released on parole if he were not executed. He reasoned that to the extent that this misunderstanding pervaded the jury's deliberations, it had the effect of creating a false choice between sentencing the defendant to death and sentencing him to a limited period of incarceration. The opinion concluded that the trial court's refusal to apprise the jury of information so crucial to its determination, particularly when the prosecutor alluded to the defendant's future dangerousness, could not be reconciled with the Court's well established precedents interpreting the Due Process Clause. The judgment of the South Carolina Supreme Court was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Stevens, J., Joined: Justice Souter wrote that he concurred with the plurality's opinion "that, at least when future dangerousness is an issue in a capital sentencing determination, the defendant has a due process right to require that his sentencing jury be informed of his ineligibility for parole."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Ginsburg: Justice Ginsburg indicated the following in her concurring opinion: "When the prosecution urges a defendant's future dangerousness as cause for the death sentence, the defendant's right to be heard means that he must be afforded an opportunity to rebut the argument. To be full and fair, that opportunity must include the right to inform the jury, if it is indeed the case, that the defendant is ineligible for parole."

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Kennedy, J., Joined: Justice O'Connor wrote in her concurring opinion that where the prosecution puts a defendant's future dangerousness in issue and the only available alternative sentence to death is life imprisonment without possibility of parole, due process entitles the defendant to inform the sentencing jury, either by argument or instruction, that he or she is parole-ineligible. Justice O'Connor said that if the prosecution does not argue future dangerousness, parole may not be a proper issue for the jury's consideration even if the only alternative sentence to death is life imprisonment without the possibility of parole.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented from the Court's judgment on the basis that he did not believe the Due Process Clause incorporated the issue decided. He argued that there was no precedent to extend due process to a State law determination of whether a jury should be apprised of parole ineligibility. Justice Scalia believed that extending constitutional due process to this State law issue was unnecessary and that "[t]here is really no basis for such a pronouncement, neither in any near uniform practice of our people nor in the jurisprudence of this Court." Issue Presented: Whether it was constitutional error for the trial court to fail to determine the voluntariness of the defendant's confession before allowing the jury to consider the confession.

Case Holding: The record is silent as to whether the trial court made a determination of the voluntariness of the defendant's confession; therefore, the case should be reversed and remanded for a hearing on the issue.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Sims, was convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. The Supreme Court of Georgia affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's claim right to a fair trial was violated by the trial judge's failure to determine the voluntariness of his confession, prior to its admission into evidence before the jury, as required by the United States Supreme Court's ruling in Jackson v. Denno. The defendant also argued unsuccessfully that the selections of the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him were done in violation of the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider both issues, but only addressed the Jackson claim.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clark: Justice Clark indicated that, in Jackson, the Court laid down a constitutional rule that a jury was not to hear a confession unless and until the trial judge had determined that it was freely and voluntarily given. It was said that, under Jackson, a jury, if it so chooses, may give absolutely no weight to a confession in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, but it is not for the jury to make the primary determination of voluntariness. Justice Clark held further that, under Jackson, a trial judge need not make formal findings of fact or write an opinion, but the judge's conclusion that the confession was voluntary must appear from the record with unmistakable clarity.

In turning to the defendant's case, Justice Clark ruled that there was no actual ruling or finding in the record showing that the trial judge determined the voluntariness of the defendant's confession before allowing it to be introduced into evidence. Consequently, the opinion reversed the judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court and remanded the case for a hearing to determine whether the defendant's confession was voluntary.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a statement indicating he dissented for the reasons set out in his concurring and dissenting opinion in Jackson v. Denno.

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the prosecutor rebutted the defendant's claim that his confession was involuntary. (2) Whether the grand jury which indicted the defendant and the petit jury which convicted him were selected in a racially discriminatory manner.

Case Holdings: (1) The prosecutor failed to rebut the defendant's claim that his confession was involuntary. (2) The grand jury which indicted the defendant and the petit jury which convicted him were selected in a racially discriminatory manner.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Sims, was convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. The Supreme Court of Georgia affirmed the conviction and sentence. However, the United States Supreme Court reversed the judgment in Sims v. Georgia (I) and remanded the case for the Georgia courts to determine whether the defendant's confession was voluntary. On remand, the case was submitted to the trial judge who had presided at the defendant's original trial. The trial judge merely reviewed the transcript of the trial and determined that the defendant's confession had been voluntary and denied a new trial. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the adequacy of trial court's determination, as well as address the defendant's previously deferred claim that the selection of the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him were done in violation of the federal Constitution.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion found that the trial court failed to adequately review the defendant's claim that his confession was involuntary. It was said that the State failed to rebut the defendant's allegation that he had been subjected to physical violence prior to his confession. The opinion held that a confession produced by violence or threats of violence is involuntary and cannot constitutionally be used against the person giving it. In view of the State's failure to provide evidence to contradict the defendant's allegations, the opinion found that the confession was involuntary and should not have been used at his trial.

The Court also took the time in the per curiam opinion to resolve the defendant's claim that the grand jury which indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him were selected in a racially discriminatory manner, in that all blacks were systematically excluded from both. The opinion found that the evidence revealed that the grand and petit jury lists were drawn from the county tax digests, which separately listed taxpayers by race in conformity with then existing Georgia law. Blacks constituted 24.4 percent of the individual taxpayers in the county where the defendant was prosecuted. However, they amounted to only 4.7 percent of the names on the grand jury list and 9.8 percent of the names on the master jury list from which the defendant's grand and petit juries were selected. The opinion concluded that the facts adduced were virtually indistinguishable from a jury selection process condemned by the Court in Whitus v. Georgia. Accordingly, it was said that the juries by which the defendant was indicted and tried were selected in a manner that did not comport with constitutional requirements. The judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court was reversed. *See also Coleman v. Alabama (I); Coleman v. Alabama (II); Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; Sims v. Georgia (I); Whitus v. Singapore Singapore permits capital punishment. The nation uses hanging as the method of execution. Its legal system is based on English common law. A constitution was adopted by the nation on June 3, 1959.

The judicial system consists of district courts, a high court, and a court of appeal. Defendants enjoy a presumption of innocence and the right of appeal. They also have the right to be represented by an attorney and confront witnesses against them. Trials are public and are presided over by judges. There are no jury trials. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether exclusion at the penalty phase of witnesses who would have testified that the defendant was well-behaved in jail violated the defendant's constitutional right to introduce all relevant mitigating evidence.

Case Holding: Exclusion at the penalty phase of witnesses who would have testified that the defendant was well-behaved in jail violated the defendant's constitutional right to introduce all relevant mitigating evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ronald Skipper, was convicted of capital murder by the State of South Carolina. During the penalty phase, the defendant sought to introduce testimony from two jailers and a "regular visitor" who would testify that he had made a good adjustment during the seven months he had spent in jail between his arrest and trial. The trial judge ruled such evidence irrelevant and inadmissible. The defendant was sentenced to death. The South Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the death sentence after rejecting the defendant's contention that the trial court had committed constitutional error in excluding the testimony of the jailers and regular visitor. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White held that the trial court's exclusion from the sentencing hearing of the testimony of the jailers and the regular visitor denied the defendant his right to place before the sentencing jury all relevant evidence in mitigation of punishment. The opinion reasoned: "The exclusion by the state trial court of relevant mitigating evidence impeded the sentencing jury's ability to carry out its task of considering all relevant facets of the character and record of the individual offender. The resulting death sentence cannot stand, although the State is of course not precluded from again seeking to impose the death sentence, provided that it does so through a new sentencing hearing at which [the defendant] is permitted to present any and all relevant mitigating evidence that is available." The judgment of the Supreme Court of South Carolina was reversed insofar as it affirmed the death sentence.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Powell, in Which Burger, CJ., and Rehnquist, J., Joined: Justice Powell concurred in the Court's judgment, but for reasons different than those asserted in the majority opinion. He argued that the evidence should not have been excluded because it was actually rebuttal testimony to evidence by the prosecutor that the defendant would be dangerous in prison. Justice Powell believed that it was not necessary to assert that the evidence was constitutionally required because it was mitigating per se. See also Bell v. Ohio; Delo v. Lashley; *Eddings v. Issues Presented: (1) Whether the due process permitted the State to allow the defendant to plead guilty before a determination of his sanity was made. (2) Whether due process required the State to appoint a psychiatrist to assist the defendant with his insanity defense.

Case Holdings: (1) The due process permitted the State to allow the defendant to plead guilty before a determination of his sanity was made because a procedure was in place to allow the defendant to plead not guilty by reason of insanity. (2) Due process did not require the State to appoint a psychiatrist to assist the defendant with his insanity defense.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Smith, was charged with capital murder by the State of Pennsylvania. The defendant agreed to enter a plea of guilty to the charge. Part of the agreement called for the defendant to have a hearing to determine if he was insane at the time of the murder. If insanity was established his plea would turn into not guilty by reason of insanity. At the conclusion of the sanity hearing, the trial court found the defendant was sane at the time of the offense and sentenced him to death.

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant then filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in State court, which was denied. An appeal from the denial of habeas relief was filed with the United States Supreme Court, but certiorari was denied on the grounds that the appeal was not timely filed. The defendant then filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that he was denied due process in not having his sanity determined before he entered a plea of guilty; in not having a State appointed psychiatrist to help prepare his insanity defense; and in that he could not be executed because he was insane. The district court denied habeas relief. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Reed: Justice Reed indicated that, as a preliminary matter, a denial of certiorari by the Court to review a decision of a State's supreme court affirming a conviction in a criminal prosecution should be given no weight in subsequent habeas corpus proceedings in a federal court. It was said that the Court's denial of the defendant's first appeal carried no weight in the determination of the issues presented.

The opinion held that due process was not violated by a procedure which allowed the defendant to plead guilty before a determination of his sanity was made because the procedure allowed him to withdraw the guilty plea if found insane and enter a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. Justice Reed also held that it was not the constitutional duty of the State, even upon request, to appoint a psychiatrist to make a pre-trial examination into the defendant's sanity. The opinion rejected the defendant's claim that, as an insane person, he could not be executed because the evidence established that he was sane. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Black and Douglas, JJ., Joined: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's opinion and judgment based on two primary grounds. First, he argued that the defendant "was deprived of a fair opportunity to establish his insanity." Justice Frankfurter believed that the insanity procedure utilized by the State was a trap void of due process and unconstitutional.

The second reason given for dissenting was that the psychiatrist relied upon by the State "had himself been committed [to a mental institution] because of an incurable mental disease which had deprived him of 'any judgment or insight.'" Justice Frankfurter indicated that it was not until the case was presented to the Court that the defendant learned that the State's psychiatrist was himself insane. He concluded that "to allow the victim of this testimony, which, in any event, has been brought into doubt, to go to his death without an opportunity for reassessment, by either State or federal court, of the basis for the rejection of his plea of insanity would constitute a denial of due process no less gross than if the sentence had been imposed without any hearing at all on the issue of sanity."

Case Note: The case's rejection of the defendant's right to have court-appointed assistance of counsel to help with his insanity defense no longer holds as valid law. In subsequent capital and non-capital cases, the Court ruled that an indigent defendant is constitutionally entitled to appointment of psychiatric assistance where the issue of insanity is in question. See also Brown v. Issues Presented: (1) Whether the exclusion of blacks from the grand jury that indicted the defendant required his case be removed to a federal court for prosecution. (2) Whether the defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him.

Case Holdings: (1) The exclusion of blacks from the grand jury that indicted the defendant did not require his case be removed to a federal court for prosecution because the federal removal statute required racial discrimination emanate from a State's constitution or laws. (2) The defendant did not establish that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him because the defendant failed to present any evidence of such discrimination.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Charley Smith, was indicted for capital murder by the State of Mississippi. Prior to trial, the defendant requested the indictment be dismissed on the grounds that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. The trial court denied the request. The defendant next requested the case be removed to a federal court because of the exclusion of blacks from the grand jury. This request was also denied by the trial court. The defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. The Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court found that the defendant did not establish a right to have the case removed to a federal court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan held that the defendant failed to show that he satisfied the requirement of the federal removal statute in order to have his case prosecuted in a federal court. It was said that the removal statute required racial discrimination be based on a State's constitution or laws. The opinion found: "Neither the constitution nor the laws of Mississippi, by their language, reasonably interpreted, or as interpreted by the highest court of the state, show that the accused was denied ... any right secured to him by any law providing for the equal civil rights of citizens of the United States, or of all persons within the United States."

The opinion also found that the defendant's claim of racial discrimination was not supported by any evidence. Justice Harlan wrote: "The facts stated in the written motion to quash, although that motion was verified by the affidavit of the accused, could not be used as evidence to establish those facts, except with the consent of the state prosecutor, or by order of the trial court. No such consent was given. No such order was made. The grounds assigned for quashing the indictment should have been sustained by distinct evidence introduced, or offered to be introduced, by the accused. He could not, of right, insist that the facts stated in the motion to quash should be taken as true simply because his motion was verified by his affidavit. The motion to quash was therefore unsupported by any competent evidence. Consequently, it cannot be held to have been erroneously denied." The judgment of the Mississippi Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant defaulted his underlying constitutional claim by failing to present it before the Virginia Supreme Court on direct appeal.

Case Holding: The defendant defaulted his underlying constitutional claim by failing to present it before the Virginia Supreme Court on direct appeal.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Michael Smith, was charged with capital murder by the State of Virginia. Prior to trial, the defendant was examined by a psychiatrist who was appointed by the trial court at the request of defense counsel. During the psychiatric examination, the defendant disclosed facts about the murder and prior incidents of deviant sexual conduct, including an incident where he tore the clothes off a girl on a schoolbus before deciding not to rape her. Following a jury trial, the defendant was convicted of capital murder. At the penalty phase, the prosecutor called the psychiatrist to the stand and, over the defense counsel's objection, the psychiatrist described the defendant's aborted rape incident on the schoolbus. The defendant was sentenced to death.

On appeal to the Virginia Supreme Court, the defendant raised a number of claims but did not assign any error concerning the admission of the psychiatrist's testimony at the penalty phase. The appellate court affirmed the conviction and sentence without addressing any issue concerning the prosecutor's use of the psychiatric testimony. After exhausting state remedies, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. One of the issues raised in the habeas petition was that the trial court committed constitutional error in allowing the psychiatrist to testify about the aborted schoolbus rape incident. The district court dismissed the petition, finding the defendant defaulted his right to argue the claim involving the psychiatrist's testimony because the issue was never raised on direct appeal to the Virginia Supreme Court. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor ruled that the defendant defaulted his constitutional claim as to the admission of the psychiatrist's testimony by failing to present it before the Virginia Supreme Court on direct appeal. It was said that the defendant did not carry his burden of showing good cause for his noncompliance with Virginia's rules of procedure. The opinion found that defense counsel made a deliberate, tactical decision not to pursue the claim in State court. It was said that defense counsel's decision not to press the claim in State court was not an error of such magnitude that it rendered his performance constitutionally deficient. Justice O'Connor said that even assuming the psychiatrist's testimony should not have been presented to the jury, its admission did not pervert the jury's deliberations concerning the ultimate question of whether the death penalty should be imposed. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Marshall, Brennan, and Blackmun, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's ruling. He believed that the significance of the error alleged by the defendant warranted addressing the issue on its merits. The dissenting opinion stated:

The record in this case unquestionably demonstrates that [the defendant's] constitutional claim is meritorious, and that there is a significant risk that he will be put to death because his constitutional rights were violated.

The Court does not take issue with this conclusion. It is willing to assume that (1) [the defendant's] Fifth Amendment right against compelled self-incrimination was violated; (2) his Eighth Amendment right to a fair, constitutionally sound sentencing proceeding was violated by the introduction of the evidence from that Fifth Amendment violation; and (3) those constitutional violations made the difference between life and death in the jury's consideration of his fate. Although the constitutional violations and issues were sufficiently serious that this Court decided to grant certiorari, ... this Court concludes that [the defendant's] presumably meritorious constitutional claim is procedurally barred and that [the defendant] must therefore be executed.

In my opinion, the Court should reach the merits of [the defendant's] argument. To the extent that there has been a procedural "default," it is exceedingly minor — perhaps a kind of "harmless" error....

I fear that the Court has lost its way in a procedural maze of its own creation and that it has grossly misevaluated the requirements of "law and justice" that are the federal court's statutory mission under the federal habeas corpus statute.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, J., Joined: Justice Brennan issued a statement indicating that his dissent in a non-capital case, Murray v. Carrier, 477 U.S. 478 (1986), was to be incorporated by reference in this case as his dissenting opinion. In Murray v. Carrier, the Court also decided not to reach the merits of a case because of procedural default in failing to bring the issue before a State court. Justice Brennan explained in Murray v. Carrier the basis of his belief that procedural default should not be used to defeat constitutional claims as follows:

The competing interests implicated by a prisoner's petition to a federal court to review the merits of a procedurally defaulted constitutional claim are easily identified. On the one hand, "there is Congress' expressed interest in providing a federal forum for the vindication of the constitutional rights of state prisoners." In enacting [the habeas statute], "Congress sought to interpose the federal courts between the States and the people, as guardians of the people's federal rights — to protect the people from unconstitutional action." This interest is at its strongest where the state court has declined to consider the merits of a constitutional claim, for without habeas review no court will ever consider whether the [defendant's] constitutional rights were violated.

These interests must be weighed against the State's interest in maintaining the integrity of its rules and proceedings, an interest that would be undermined if the federal courts were too free to ignore procedural forfeitures in state court. The criminal justice system in each State is structured both to determine the guilt or innocence of defendants and to resolve all questions incident to that determination, including the constitutionality of the procedures leading to the verdict. Each State's complement of procedural rules facilitates this process by "channeling, to the extent possible, the resolution of various types of questions to the stage of the judicial process at which they can be resolved most fairly and efficiently." Procedural default rules protect the integrity of this process by imposing a forfeiture sanction for failure to follow applicable state procedural rules, thereby deterring litigants from deviating from the State's scheme. Generally, the threat of losing the right to raise a claim in state proceedings will be sufficient to ensure compliance with the State's procedural rules: A defendant loses nothing by raising all of his claims at trial since the state-court judgment will have no res judicata effect in later habeas proceedings, while he retains the possibility of obtaining relief in the state courts. Nonetheless, to the extent that federal habeas review of a procedurally defaulted claim is available, the broad deterrent effect of these procedural default rules is somewhat diminished....

The particular question we must decide in this case is whether counsel's inadvertent failure to raise a substantive claim of error can constitute "cause" for the procedural default.... [T]o say that the petitioner should be bound to his lawyer's tactical decisions is one thing; to say that he must also bear the burden of his lawyer's inadvertent mistakes is quite another. Where counsel is unaware of a claim or of the duty to raise it at a particular time, the procedural default rule cannot operate as a specific deterrent to noncompliance with the State's procedural rules. Consequently, the State's interest in ensuring that the federal court help prevent circumvention of the State's procedural rules by imposing the same forfeiture sanction is much less compelling. To be sure, applying procedural default rules even to inadvertent defaults furthers the State's deterrent interests in a general sense by encouraging lawyers to be more conscientious on the whole. However, as the Court has pointed out in another context, such general deterrent interests are weak where the failure to follow a rule is accidental rather than intentional.

I believe that this incremental state interest simply is not sufficient to overcome the heavy presumption against a federal court's refusing to exercise jurisdiction clearly granted by Congress.

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals applied too high a threshold for determining whether mitigating evidence was relevant. (2) Whether the trial judge's nullification instruction prevented the penalty phase jury from giving effect to defendant's mitigating evidence.

Case Holdings: (1) The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals applied too high a threshold for determining whether mitigating evidence is relevant. (2) The trial judge's nullification instruction prevented the penalty phase jury from giving effect to defendant's mitigating evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, LaRoyce Lathair Smith, was prosecuted by the State of Texas in 1991 for the murder of a woman. After the jury convicted the defendant, the trial court gave an instruction to the jury during the penalty phase that gave the jury the discretion to nullify its findings on aggravating circumstances and decline to impose the death penalty. The jury sentenced the defendant to death. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal. The defendant thereafter filed a State habeas corpus proceeding with the trial court. The trial judge dismissed the petition. The defendant appealed the dismissal to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals. In that appeal, the defendant argued that the trial judge's nullification instruction was unconstitutional. The appellate court disagreed and also found that the defendant failed to present relevant mitigating evidence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court resolved the case summarily without hearing oral arguments. The Court found that the Texas appellate court applied too high a threshold for determining the relevancy of mitigating evidence. The opinion pointed out that such a high threshold was previously rejected by the Court in Tennard v. Dretke, 542 U.S. 274 (2004).

The opinion also found that the nullification instruction given by the trial judge was previously rejected by the Court in Penry v. Johnson, 532 U.S. 782 (2001). The opinion reversed the decision of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented from the majority opinion. He wrote a terse statement that referenced to his reasoning in a previous concurring opinion that he wrote. See also Nullification Instruction; Penry v. Johnson; Tennard v. Dretke

Snyder, Ruth Ruth Snyder (1895–1928) married Albert Snyder in New York in 1915. At the time of the marriage, Albert was an editor of a magazine called Motor Boating. The couple gave birth to a daughter in 1918. In 1923, the couple bought a home in Queens, New York. To their friends, Ruth and Albert seemed to have a happy marriage. However, Ruth was not happy. In 1925, Ruth expressed her unhappiness with the marriage by starting a secret affair with a man named Henry Judd Gray (b. 1882).

Several months after Ruth started her affair with Gray, she put into a motion a secret plan to kill her husband. The plan started in October 1925, when Ruth invited an insurance agent to her home to discuss taking out a life insurance policy on Albert. During the meeting, Ruth informed the agent that she wanted to take out a large policy on Albert, but that she was sure he would not purchase a large policy. The agent agreed to return to the home and attempt to get Albert to sign a policy for a large amount. The insurance agent returned to the home on October 30 and met with Ruth and Albert. During the meeting, Albert agreed to take out a policy for only $1,000. The agent filled out a policy application for $1,000 and had Albert sign it. The agent also gave Albert a blank policy application and tricked him into signing it.

Shortly after the agent left the home he telephoned Ruth and asked her if the blank application should be filled in for $25,000 or for $50,000 insurance. Ruth indicated that it should be filled out for $50,000. However, due to restrictions by the insurance company, the agent could not write out a single policy for $50,000. Consequently, the agent forged Albert's name on a second blank application and submitted two policies: one for $5,000 and one for $45,000.

On November 24, 1925, the agent returned to Ruth's home to give her the policies and to collect the initial premiums. Ruth paid the initial premiums and instructed the agent to send premium notices in her name alone. The agent agreed. In July 1926, Ruth rented a safe deposit box in her maiden name (Brown) and kept the policies and the premium receipts in the box.

After Ruth obtained the life insurance policies on Albert, she made several attempts to kill him by herself but failed. Ruth decided to enlist the help of her paramour, Henry Gray.

In early 1927, Ruth convinced Gray to kill Albert. The murder plan required Gray to beat and strangle Albert as he slept. Some facts surrounding the murder were given by the New York Court of Appeals in People v. Snyder, 159 N.E. 408 (N.Y. 1927) as follows:

On March 20, 1927, Albert Snyder was killed while lying in bed at his home at Queens Village near Jamaica, N.Y. His wife, the defendant Ruth Snyder, and their young daughter, were in the house at the time. The child's sleep was unbroken till Ruth Snyder awoke her some hours after Snyder was killed. Mrs. Snyder had been tied hand and foot, so she claimed, by robbers, and had become unconscious from fright and shock. The disturbed condition of the house seemed to corroborate her story that her husband had been killed by men who entered the house to steal. Nevertheless, the police suspected the story. After questioning, she broke down and confessed that Henry Judd Gray had killed her husband and that after the murder he had, with her acquiescence, tied her hands and feet in order to divert suspicion from themselves. Though in the confession she attempted to place the larger part of the blame upon Henry Judd Gray, yet she admitted acts on her part from which the conclusion of her own guilty participation might be drawn with confidence. Henry Judd Gray was thereafter apprehended in Syracuse. He claimed, at first, that he had been in his room in a Syracuse hotel at the time of the murder. After questioning, he, too, confessed. According to that confession he had gone to Queens Village from Syracuse the evening before the murder and returned to Syracuse the next morning. He had, in advance arranged with Mrs. Snyder that they should kill her husband that night. Preparation was complete, and he believed that he had successfully manufactured evidence which would show, if he were accused of the murder, that he was at the time in Syracuse. According to his confession Mrs. Snyder played a greater part in the murder than she admitted, but each confession if accepted as true would be sufficient to establish the guilt of the person making it for the crime of murder of Albert Snyder.

... Both defendants testified in their own behalf. Each attempted personal exculpation by throwing as much of the blame as possible upon the other. Mrs. Snyder testified that her confession was not voluntary but was obtained by pressure which in her nervous condition she could not withstand. She attempted, according to her story to dissuade the defendant Gray from carrying out his plan of murder. She tried to stop him while he was actually committing the murder, and only fear induced her to join with him thereafter in the attempt to cover up all possible traces which might lead to suspicion against them. Henry Judd Gray's testimony was intended to show that he was only a blind tool, with mind and will so weakened by indulgence in intoxicating liquors and other excesses that he was incapable of resistance to a stronger personality, incapable in his then state of mind of deliberation or premeditation. A mass of circumstances belied the claim of exculpation of either.

Ruth and Gray were tried together. On May 9, 1927, a jury convicted them both of first-degree murder. On May 13, 1927, the trial judge sentenced them to death. On January 12, 1928, Ruth and Henry were executed by electrocution at New York's Sing Sing Prison. During Ruth's execution, a photo of the execution was secretly taken by a reporter and was subsequently printed in the New York Daily News.

While Ruth was being prosecuted for the murder, the insurance company that issued the two policies on Albert filed a lawsuit to declare the policies void. Several months after Ruth's execution, a New York court filed an opinion, Prudential Ins. Co. of America v. Snyder, 254 N.Y.S. 732 (1928), voiding the life insurance policies.

In 1944, a movie was released called Double Indemnity, which was based upon Albert's murder and the plot by Ruth and Gray. The movie version of the murder starred Fred MacMurray, Barbara Stanwyck, and Edward G. Robinson. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Issue Presented: Whether the federal Constitution requires a defendant be permitted to accompany a jury to view the crime scene.

Case Holding: The federal Constitution does not require a defendant be permitted to accompany a jury to view the crime scene because such observations do not constitute evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Snyder, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Massachusetts. The Massachusetts Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his federal constitutional rights were violated when the trial court refused to allow him to accompany the jury on its visit to the crime scene. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Cardozo: Justice Cardozo held that the defendant was not denied any right guaranteed by the Constitution because he was not permitted to accompany the jury to the crime scene. Justice Cardozo expressed the Court's position as follows:

The commonwealth of Massachusetts is free to regulate the procedure of its courts in accordance with its own conception of policy and fairness, unless in so doing it offends some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental. Its procedure does not run foul of the Fourteenth Amendment because another method may seem to our thinking to be fairer or wiser or to give a surer promise of protection to the prisoner at the bar....

We assume in aid of the [defendant] that in a prosecution for a felony the defendant has the privilege under the Fourteenth Amendment to be present in his own person whenever his presence has a relation, reasonably substantial, to the fullness of his opportunity to defend against the charge. Thus, the privilege to confront one's accusers and cross-examine them face to face is assured to a defendant by the Sixth Amendment in prosecutions in the federal courts, and in prosecutions in the state courts is assured very often by the Constitutions of the states. For present purposes we assume that the privilege is reinforced by the Fourteenth Amendment, though this has not been squarely held....

Nowhere in the decisions of this court is there a dictum, and still less a ruling, that the Fourteenth Amendment assures the privilege of presence when presence would be useless.... Many motions before trial are heard in the defendant's absence, and many motions after trial or in the prosecution of appeals. Confusion of thought will result if we fail to mark the distinction between requirements in respect of presence that have their source in the common law, and requirements that have their source, either expressly or by implication, in the Federal Constitution. Confusion will result again if the privilege of presence be identified with the privilege of confrontation, which is limited to the stages of the trial when there are witnesses to be questioned.... So far as the Fourteenth Amendment is concerned, the presence of a defendant is a condition of due process to the extent that a fair and just hearing would be thwarted by his absence, and to that extent only.

... We consider a bare inspection and nothing more, a view where nothing is said by any one to direct the attention of the jury to one feature or another. The Fourteenth Amendment does not assure to a defendant the privilege to be present at such a time. There is nothing he could do if he were there, and almost nothing he could gain. The only shred of advantage would be to make certain that the jury had been brought to the right place and had viewed the right scene. If he felt any doubt about this, he could examine the bailiffs at the trial and learn what they had looked at. The risk that they would lie is no greater than the risk that attaches to testimony about anything. Constitutional law, like other mortal contrivances, has to take some chances. Here the chance is so remote that it dwindles to the vanishing point. If the bailiffs were to bear false witness as to the place they had shown, the lie would be known to the jury. There is no immutable principle of justice that secures protection to a defendant against so shadowy a risk. The argument is made that conceivably the place might have been changed and in a way that would be material. In that event the fact could be brought out by appropriate inquiry. There could be inquiry of witnesses in court and of counsel out of court. Description would disclose the conditions at the view, and the defendant or his witnesses could prove what the conditions were before. He could do nothing more though he had been there with the jury. Indeed, the record makes it clear that upon request he would have been allowed to go there afterwards in company with his counsel. Opportunity was ample to learn whatever there was need to know.

If the risk of injustice to the prisoner is shadowy at its greatest, it ceases to be even a shadow when he admits that the jurors were brought to the right place and shown what it was right to see. That, in substance is what happened here.

The judgment of the Massachusetts Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Roberts, in Which Brandeis, Sutherland, and Butler, JJ., Joined: Justice Roberts dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the Constitution required the defendant's presence at the jury view, particularly because the trial court instructed the jury to consider their observations as evidence in rendering their decision in the case. Justice Roberts wrote as follows:

In the light of the universal acceptance of this fundamental rule of fairness that the prisoner may be present throughout his trial, it is not a matter of assumption but a certainty that the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees the observance of the rule....

If ... a view of the premises where crime is alleged to have been committed is a part of the process of submission of data to the triers of fact, upon which judgment is to be founded; if the knowledge thereby gained is to play its part with oral testimony and written evidence in striking the balance between the state and the prisoner, it is a part of the trial. If this is true, the Constitution secures the accused's presence. In this conclusion all the courts, save those of Massachusetts, agree. Such difference of view as the authorities exhibit as to the prisoner's right to be present at a view arises out of a disagreement on the question whether the view is a part of the trial, whether it is, in effect the taking of evidence. The great weight of authority is that it forms a part of the trial, and for that reason a defendant who so desires is entitled to be present.... It is true there is disagreement as to the nature and function of a view. On the one hand, the assertion is that its purpose is merely to acquaint the jury with the scene and thus enable them better to understand the testimony, and hence it forms no part of the trial and is not the taking of evidence. On the other, the suggestion is that the jury are bound to carry in mind what they see and form their judgment from the knowledge so obtained, and so the view amounts to the taking of evidence. The distinction seems too fine for practical purposes; but, however that may be, discussion of this abstract question is unimportant in a case like the present where the view was held to be evidence, and the jury were expressly so instructed.

Issue Presented: Whether the Florida Supreme Court cured the trial court's constitutional error in weighing an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance by imposing the death penalty on the defendant.

Case Holding: The Florida Supreme Court did not cure the trial court's error in considering an invalid aggravating circumstance because it neither re-weighed the evidence nor applied harmless error analysis to the evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Dennis Sochor, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Florida. During the penalty phase, an advisory jury and the trial court found four statutory aggravating circumstances existed. Two of the aggravating circumstances found were called "heinousness" and "coldness" aggravators. The jury recommended the death penalty and the trial court adopted the recommendation. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court found that the defendant's claim that the jury instruction on the heinousness factor was unconstitutionally vague had been waived for failure to object. The appellate court also held that the evidence failed to support the trial judge's finding of the coldness factor, but nevertheless affirmed the death sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Souter: Justice Souter found that the application of the heinousness factor to did not result in reversible error. It was said that the Court lacked jurisdiction to address the claim that the jury instruction on the heinousness factor was unconstitutionally vague because the State's appellate court indicated that its rejection of the claim was based on an alternative state ground.

The opinion found that the application of the coldness factor constituted an Eighth Amendment error that went uncorrected by the State's appellate court. It was said that the constitutional error occurred when the trial judge weighed the coldness factor. Justice Souter indicated that the State's appellate court did not cure the error. The opinion found that the State's appellate court did not re-weigh the evidence independently or perform harmless error analysis in order to cure the error. The judgment of the Florida Supreme Court was reversed as to the punishment.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's opinion. She wrote separately to state that her understanding of the Court's opinion was "that an appellate court can[not] fulfill its obligations of meaningful review by simply reciting the formula for harmless error." It was further said in her concurrence that "[a]n appellate court's bald assertion that an error of constitutional dimensions was 'harmless' cannot substitute for a principled explanation of how the court reached that conclusion."

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, in Which White and Thomas, JJ., Joined: The chief justice filed an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part with the Court's decision. The chief justice indicated that he agreed with the Court's rejection of the defendant's claim on the "heinousness" factor. He also agreed with the Court that the trial court committed constitutional error in weighing the invalid "coldness" factor. The chief justice dissented, however, with the Court's conclusion that the State's appellate court did not cure the error. The chief justice said that the Florida Supreme Court applied harmless error analysis to the error in order to cure it.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Blackmun, J., Joined: Justice Stevens wrote an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part with the Court's decision. He agreed with the Court's disposition of the defendant's claim on the "coldness" factor. Justice Stevens disagreed with the Court's rejection of the defendant's claim on the "heinousness" factor. Justice Stevens stated his dissenting position as follows:

[The defendant's] failure to object to the instruction at trial did not deprive the Florida Supreme Court or this Court of the power to correct the obvious constitutional error. First, [the defendant] did object to the vagueness of this aggravating circumstance in a [m]otion.... At the start of trial, however, that motion was denied. Second, the Florida Supreme Court, though noting that [the defendant] had failed to make a contemporaneous objection to the instruction at the time of trial, nevertheless went on to reach the merits of [the defendant's] claim. Thus, the Florida Supreme Court, far from providing us with a plain statement that [the defendant's] claim was procedurally barred, has merely said that the claim was "not preserved for appeal," and has given even further indication that [the defendant's] claim was not procedurally barred by proceeding to the merits, albeit in the alternative. Third, and most important, the state court may review a fundamental error despite a party's failure to make a contemporaneous objection in the trial court and it unquestionably has the power to review this error even though the error may not have been properly preserved for appeal.... Under these circumstances, the State has waived any possible procedural objection to our consideration of the erroneous jury instruction and this Court, contrary to its protestation, is not "without authority" to address [the defendant's] claim.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia wrote an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part with the Court's decision. He agreed with the Court's rejection of the defendant's claim on the "heinousness" factor. Justice Scalia dissented from the Court's "holding that the death sentence in this case is unconstitutional because the Florida Supreme Court failed to find 'harmless error' after having invalidated the trial judge's 'coldness' finding." He believed the issue was a State law matter that did not raise a federal question. See also Heinous, Atrocious, Cruel, or Depraved Aggravator; Invalid Aggravator Issue Presented: Whether due process requires a judicial tribunal, rather than the office of a governor, to determine if a defendant is insane prior to execution.

Case Holding: Due process does not require a judicial tribunal, rather than the office of a governor, to determine if a defendant is insane prior to execution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Solesbee, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. The conviction and sentence were affirmed by the Georgia Supreme Court. Prior to the defendant's execution, he asked the governor to postpone execution on the grounds that after conviction and sentence he had become insane. Acting under authority granted by statute, the governor appointed three physicians who examined the defendant and declared him sane.

The defendant then filed a habeas corpus petition in a State trial court, alleging that the federal Due Process Clause required that his claim of insanity after sentence be originally determined by a judicial tribunal after notice and hearings in which he could be represented by counsel, cross-examine witnesses, and offer evidence. The trial court rejected the claim and dismissed the petition. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black made clear at the outset of the opinion that the Court was not addressing the issue of the constitutionality of executing an insane person. The opinion indicated that the defendant's only challenge was the non-judicial procedure used by Georgia for determining whether a death row inmate was insane prior to execution. In rejecting the defendant's claim that due process required a judicial tribunal determine his sanity to be executed, Justice Black wrote the following:

Where a state policy is against execution of a condemned convict who has become insane after conviction and sentence, it is not a denial of due process under the Fourteenth Amendment to vest discretionary authority in the Governor (aided by physicians) to determine whether a condemned convict has become insane after sentence and, if so, whether he should be committed to an insane asylum — even though the Governor's decision is not subject to judicial review and the statute makes no provision for an adversary hearing at which the convict may appear in person or by counsel or through friends and cross-examine witnesses and offer evidence.

We are unable to say that it offends due process for a state to deem its Governor an "apt and special tribunal" to pass upon a question so closely related to powers that from the beginning have been entrusted to governors. And here the governor had the aid of physicians specially trained in appraising the elusive and often deceptive symptoms of insanity. It is true that governors and physicians might make errors of judgment. But the search for truth in this field is always beset by difficulties that may beget error. Even judicial determination of sanity might be wrong....

[The Court's precedents] stand for the universal common-law principle that upon a suggestion of insanity after sentence, the tribunal charged with responsibility must be vested with broad discretion in deciding whether evidence shall be heard. This discretion has usually been held nonreviewable by appellate courts. The heart of the common-law doctrine has been that a suggestion of insanity after sentence is an appeal to the conscience and sound wisdom of the particular tribunal which is asked to postpone sentence. We cannot say that the trust thus reposed in judges should be denied governors, traditionally charged with saying the last word that spells life or death. There is no indication that either the Governor or the physicians who acted on [the defendant's] application violated the humanitarian policy of Georgia against execution of the insane. We hold that the Georgia statute as applied is not a denial of due process of law.

The judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that, under a scheme which allowed a governor to determine a defendant's sanity prior to execution, due process required the defendant be allowed to present evidence on the issue and challenge contrary evidence with the assistance of counsel. Justice Frankfurter wrote: "It is a groundless fear to assume that it would obstruct the rigorous administration of criminal justice to allow the case to be put for a claim of insanity, however informal and expeditious the procedure for dealing with the claim. The time needed for such a fair procedure could not unreasonably delay the execution of the sentence unless in all fairness and with due respect for a basic principle in our law the execution should be delayed. The risk of an undue delay is hardly comparable to the grim risk of the barbarous execution of an insane man because of a hurried, one-sided, untested determination of the question of insanity." See also Insanity while Awaiting Execution; Phyle v. Duffy

Solomon Islands Capital punishment was abolished on the Solomon Islands in 1966. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Somalia Somalia permits capital punishment. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is a mixture of English and Italian law and customary law. Somalia's constitution became effective on September 23, 1979.

Somalia has been without a democratically elected national government since 1991. As a result of efforts by the government of Kenya, a transitional government was put in place in October 2004. The transitional government includes an executive branch and a unicameral legislative branch.

There is no national judicial system. Some regions of the country have established local courts. The judiciary in most regions rely on some combination of traditional or customary law, Shari'a (Islamic) law, and the penal code of the pre-1991 overthrow of the government. The right to legal counsel and the right to appeal do not exist in those areas that apply customary or Shari'a law. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Souter, David H. David H. Souter was appointed as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1990. While on the Supreme Court, Souter was displayed a moderate judicial philosophy in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Souter was born in Melrose, Massachusetts, on September 17, 1939. Souter graduated from Harvard University in 1961. His educational training included studying law at Harvard Law School and Oxford University. In addition to serving on the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, Souter was appointed in 1990 as an appellate judge for the First Circuit Court of Appeals. A few months after his federal bench appoint, President George Bush appointed Souter to the Supreme Court.

Souter has authored several capital punishment opinions since his elevation to the Supreme Court. The moderate philosophy Souter brought to the Court was best illustrated in the case of Sochor v. Florida. In that case, the defendant was sentenced to death under an invalid aggravating circumstance. Souter, writing for the Court, found that the Florida Supreme Court failed to perform the necessary analysis that could have cured the problem caused by the use of an invalid factor and, therefore, reversed the death sentence.

South Carolina The State of South Carolina is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on July 2, 1974.

South Carolina has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The South Carolina Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The South Carolina Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and eight associate judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of South Carolina are tried in the circuit courts.

South Carolina's capital punishment crimes are set out under several statutes. Under S.C. Code § 16-3-10, a capital homicide occurs for murder committed with malice aforethought. It is provided in S.C. Code § 16-3-30 that wilful killing by poisoning of any person is a capital offense. Under S.C. Code § 16-23-715, it is a capital offense for a person to commit a homicide by using a weapon of mass destruction in furtherance of an act of terrorism. A homicide that is caused by the use of a destructive device is a capital offense under S.C. Code § 16-23-720. It is provided in S.C. Code § 16-3-40 that a homicide caused by stabbing or thrusting is a capital offense. A homicide caused by lynching is made a capital offense under S.C. Code § 16-3-210.

Capital murder in South Carolina is punishable by death, life imprisonment without parole, or imprisonment for a term of years. A capital prosecution in South Carolina is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of imprisonment for a term of years. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of South Carolina.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under S.C. Code § 16-3-20(C)(a) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The murder was committed during the commission of: a) criminal sexual conduct; b) kidnapping; c) burglary; d) robbery; e) larceny; f) killing by poison; g) drug trafficking; h) physical torture; or i) dismemberment of a person.

2. The offender had a prior conviction for murder.

3. The offender by his act of murder knowingly created a great risk of death to more than one person in a public place by means of a weapon or device which normally would be hazardous to the lives of more than one person.

4. The offender committed the murder for himself or another for the purpose of receiving money or a thing of monetary value.

5. The murder of a judicial officer, former judicial officer, solicitor, former solicitor, or other officer of the court during or because of the exercise of his official duty.

6. The offender caused or directed another to commit murder or committed murder as an agent or employee of another person.

7. The murder of a federal, state, or local law enforcement officer or former federal, state, or local law enforcement officer, peace officer or former peace officer, corrections officer or former corrections officer, including a county or municipal corrections officer or a former county or municipal corrections officer, a county or municipal detention facility employee or former county or municipal detention facility employee, or fireman or former fireman during or because of the performance of his official duties.

8. The murder of a family member of an official listed in subitems 5) and 7) above with the intent to impede or retaliate against the official.

9. Two or more persons were murdered by the defendant by one act or pursuant to one scheme.

10. The murder of a child eleven years of age or under.

11. The murder of a witness or potential witness committed at any time during the criminal process for the purpose of impeding prosecution of any crime.

12. The murder was committed by a person deemed a sexually violent predator, or a person deemed a sexually violent predator who is released.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, South Carolina has provided by S.C. Code § 16-3-20(C)(b) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal conviction involving the use of violence against another person.
2. The murder was committed while the defendant was under the influence of mental or emotional disturbance.
3. The victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to the act.
4. The defendant was an accomplice in the murder committed by another person and his participation was relatively minor.
5. The defendant acted under duress or under the domination of another person.
6. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired.
7. The age or mentality of the defendant at the time of the crime.
8. The defendant was provoked by the victim into committing the murder.
9. The defendant was below the age of eighteen at the time of the crime (under federal law the death penalty may not be imposed in this situation).
10. The defendant had mental retardation at the time of the crime (under federal law the death penalty may not be imposed in this situation).

Under South Carolina's capital punishment statute, the South Carolina Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. South Carolina provides for lethal injection or electrocution to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Ridgeville, South Carolina, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Columbia, South Carolina. Pursuant to the laws of South Carolina, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of South Carolina, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by S.C. Code § 24-3550:

A. To carry out an execution properly, the executioner and necessary staff must be present at the execution. In addition, the following persons may be present:

1. Three representatives, approved by the director, of the family of a victim of the crime for which a death penalty was imposed, provided that, if there is more than one victim, the director may reduce the number of family representatives to one representative for each victim's family; provided further, that, if there are more than two victims, the director may restrict the total number of victims' representatives present in accordance with the space limitations of the Capital Punishment Facility;
2. The solicitor, or an assistant solicitor or former solicitor designated by the solicitor, for the county where the offense occurred;

3. A group of not more than three representatives of the South Carolina media, one of whom must represent the dominant wire service, one of whom must represent the print media, and one of whom must represent the electronic news media;

4. The chief law enforcement officer, or an officer designated by the chief, from the law enforcement agency that had original jurisdiction in the case; and

5. The counsel for the convict and a religious leader. However, the convict may substitute one person from his immediate family for either his counsel or a religious leader, or two persons from his immediate family for both his counsel and a religious leader. For purposes of this item, "immediate family" means those persons eighteen years of age or older who are related to the convict by blood, adoption, or marriage within the second degree of consanguinity.

B. Other than those persons specified in subsection (A), no person is authorized to witness an execution.

C. The department shall establish internal policies to govern the selection of media representatives.

D. Witnesses authorized or approved pursuant to this section shall not possess telephonic equipment, cameras, or recording devices in the Capital Punishment Facility during an execution.

E. For security purposes, the director may exclude any person who is authorized or approved pursuant to this section from the Capital Punishment Facility.

NUMBER OF EXECUTIONS BY SOUTH CAROLINA
1976–OCTOBER 2006

South Carolina v. Gathers Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: South Carolina v. Gathers, 490 U.S. 805 (1989); Argued: March 28, 1989; Decided: June 12, 1989; Opinion of the Court: Justice Brennan; Concurring Statement: Justice White; Dissenting Opinion: Justice O'Connor, in which Rehnquist, CJ., and Kennedy, J., joined; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Scalia; Appellate Defense Counsel: William Isaac Diggs argued; Joseph L. Savitz III on brief; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Donald J. Zelenka argued; T. Travis Medlock and Charles M. Condon on brief; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: 6; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: 2

Issue Presented: Whether it was constitutionally improper during the penalty phase for the prosecutor to provide remarks about personal characteristics of the defendant.

Case Holding: It was constitutionally improper during the penalty phase for the prosecutor to provide remarks about personal characteristics of the defendant because such information inhibits reasoned deliberation by the jury in assessing the penalty to give the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Demetrius Gathers, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of South Carolina. On appeal, the South Carolina Supreme Court reversed the death sentence on the grounds that, during the penalty phase, the prosecutor improperly interjected remarks about the victim being a religious person. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan held that the prosecutor's remarks about the religious background of the victim interjected impermissible information to the jury during the penalty phase. It was said that the victim's religious life and other personal characteristics had no bearing on whether the defendant warranted receiving a sentence of death. The opinion reasoned that the Constitution required the jury make a reasoned decision on whether to impose a sentence of death. Justice Brennan found that emotional appeal to the jury through presentation of personal characteristics of the victim inhibited rational decision-making by the jury. The judgment of the South Carolina Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Statement by Justice White: Justice White issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's decision.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Kennedy, J., Joined: Justice O'Connor dissented from the Court's decision. She believed that the Constitution permitted personal characteristics of the victim to be brought out during the penalty phase. Justice O'Connor wrote as follows: "Because the Eighth Amendment itself requires 'that the penalty imposed in a capital case be proportional to the harm caused and the defendant's blameworthiness,' I would reject a rigid Eighth Amendment rule which prohibits a sentencing jury from hearing argument or considering evidence concerning the personal characteristics of the victim. I would thus reverse the judgment of the South Carolina Supreme Court in this case."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that a jury had a right to hear of admirable qualities of the victim. Justice Scalia believed there was no justification for isolating the victim from the penalty phase, when the reason for the defendant's sentence was the death of the victim. *See also Booth v. South Dakota The State of South Dakota is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on January 1, 1979.

South Dakota has a two-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court and courts of general jurisdiction. The South Dakota Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of South Dakota are tried in the circuit courts.

South Dakota's capital punishment offenses are set out under S.D. Code § 22-16-4. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. If perpetrated without authority of law and with a premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed or of any other human being, including an unborn child; or
2. If committed by a person engaged in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, any arson, rape, robbery, burglary, kidnapping, or unlawful throwing, placing, or discharging of a destructive device or explosive.

Homicide is also murder in the first degree if committed by a person who perpetrated, or who attempted to perpetrate, any arson, rape, robbery, burglary, kidnapping or unlawful throwing, placing or discharging of a destructive device or explosive and who subsequently effects the death of any victim of such crime to prevent detection or prosecution of the crime.

Capital murder in South Dakota is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in South Dakota is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of South Dakota.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under S.D. Code § 23A-27A-1 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The offense was committed by a person with a prior record of conviction for a Class A or Class B felony, or the offense of murder was committed by a person who has a felony conviction for a crime of violence;

2. The defendant by the defendant's act knowingly created a great risk of death to more than one person in a public place by means of a weapon or device which would normally be hazardous to the lives of more than one person;

3. The defendant committed the offense for the benefit of the defendant or another, for the purpose of receiving money or any other thing of monetary value;

4. The defendant committed the offense on a judicial officer, former judicial officer, prosecutor, or former prosecutor while such prosecutor, former prosecutor, judicial officer, or former judicial officer was engaged in the performance of such person's official duties or where a major part of the motivation for the offense came from the official actions of such judicial officer, former judicial officer, prosecutor, or former prosecutor;

5. The defendant caused or directed another to commit murder or committed murder as an agent or employee of another person;

6. The offense was outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible, or inhuman in that it involved torture, depravity of mind, or an aggravated battery to the victim. Any murder is wantonly vile, horrible, and inhuman if the victim is less than thirteen years of age;

7. The offense was committed against a law enforcement officer, employee of a corrections institution, or fire fighter while engaged in the performance of such person's official duties;

8. The offense was committed by a person in, or who has escaped from, the lawful custody of a law enforcement officer or place of lawful confinement;

9. The offense was committed for the purpose of avoiding, interfering with, or preventing a lawful arrest or custody in a place of lawful confinement, of the defendant or another; or

10. The offense was committed in the course of manufacturing, distributing, or dispensing narcotics.

South Dakota does not provide by statute any mitigating circumstances to the imposition of the death penalty. Even though the State does not provide statutory mitigating circumstances, the United States Supreme Court has ruled that all relevant mitigating evidence must be allowed at the penalty phase.

Under South Dakota's capital punishment statute, the South Dakota Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. South Dakota uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility is located in Sioux Falls, South Dakota. Pursuant to the laws of South Dakota, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of South Dakota, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by S.D. Code § 23A-27A-34:

The warden of the penitentiary shall request, by at least two days' previous notice, the presence of the attorney general, the trial judge before whom the conviction was had or his successor in office, the state's attorney and sheriff of the county where the crime was committed, and not more than ten reputable adult citizens, including at least one member of the news media, to be selected by the warden at the execution. The warden shall also arrange for the attendance of the prison physician and two other licensed physicians of this state. The warden shall arrange for the attendance of such prison guards and peace officers as he may deem proper.

Additionally, the following is provided by S.D. Code § 23A-27A-35:

The warden of the state penitentiary must also, at the request of the defendant, permit such ministers of the gospel, priests, or clergymen of any denomination as the defendant may desire, not exceeding two, to be present at the execution and any relatives or friends requested by the defendant not exceeding five.

Finally, the following is set out under S.D. Code § 23A-27A-36:

The warden of the state penitentiary shall permit no persons to be present at such execution other than those designated in §§ 23A-27A-34 and 23A-27A-35 and shall not permit the presence of any person under the age of eighteen years, unless a relative, and no relatives of tender years shall be admitted.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976, through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, South Dakota did not execute any capital felon. A total of four capital felons were on death row in South Dakota as of July 2006. The death row population in the State was listed as four white inmates. All four death row inmates were male.

Southern California Strangler Randy Steven Kraft was born in Long Beach, California, on March 19, 1945. In 1968, Kraft obtained a college degree from Claremont College in Pomona, California. After graduating from college, he served briefly in the military before being discharged after it was learned that he was gay. Upon leaving the military in 1969, Kraft embarked upon a grisly path that left a decade-long trail of unsolved murders of over sixty men in southern California.

Kraft's murder march came to an end during a routine traffic stop on May 14, 1983, near Interstate 5 in the San Juan Capistrano area of Orange County. The police stopped Kraft on the freeway because of erratic driving. During this routine drunk driving investigation, the police discovered the half-clothed and strangled body of a man in Kraft's car. The man was identified as Terry Lee Gambrel. Kraft was arrested on the scene for murder.

During the investigation into Gambrel's murder, the police searched Kraft's residence and found a secretly coded list containing references to sixty-five murdered men. By the time the police concluded their investigation, sufficient evidence was found to charge Kraft with the murder of sixteen men. The victims were Edward Daniel Moore, Ronald Gene Wiebe, Keith Daven Crotwell, Mark Howard Hall, Scott Michael Hughes, Roland

Gerald Young, Richard Allen Keith, Keith Arthur Klingbeil, Michael Joseph Inderbieten, Donald Harold Crisel, Robert Wyatt Loggins, Jr., Eric Herbert Church, Geoffrey Alan Nelson, Rodger James DeVaul, Jr., Terry Lee Gambrel, and John Doe of Huntington Beach.

On September 26, 1988, more than five years after his arrest, Kraft's trial for the murder of sixteen victims commenced. During the trial, as reported in People v. Kraft, 5 P.3d 68 (Cal. 2000), the following evidence was introduced regarding each of the sixteen victims:

[1]. Murder of Terry Lee Gambrel

Dr. Robert Richards ... testified at trial that Gambrel's death resulted from asphyxia due to ligature strangulation. The ligature consisted of a strap that had been tightened around Gambrel's neck. There were also ligature marks on both of Gambrel's wrists. Petechial hemorrhages in the neck organs indicated the killer had repeatedly tightened and loosened the ligature. Autopsy photographs showed a bruise on Gambrel's lip....

Toxicological analysis showed Gambrel's blood-alcohol level at the time of his death was 0.067 percent. Also in Gambrel's blood was .07 micrograms per milliliter of lorazepam, an anti-anxiety drug sold under the trade name Ativan. Toxicologist Raymond Kelly testified those levels of alcohol and lorazepam would tend to make a person sleepy, confused and uncoordinated....

[2]. Murder ... of Geoffrey Alan Nelson

About 5:15 [on February 12, 1983], Officer Donald Batchelder of the Los Angeles Police Department, who was off duty and driving to work, discovered [Geoffrey Alan Nelson's] nude body on the Euclid Street on-ramp to the Garden Grove Freeway in the City of Garden Grove. As Batchelder got out of his car, he saw Nelson's foot move slightly. Batchelder got back into his car, drove to a telephone and called the local police.

Officer Richard Morales of the Garden Grove Police Department responded to the scene and found the body warm to the touch, although he detected no pulse or respiration. Skid marks on the pavement indicated Nelson's body had been dumped from a moving vehicle. The front of Nelson's neck bore ligature marks, and he had been emasculated.

... Dr. Richards concluded Nelson had died as a result of ligature strangulation. There was a ligature mark on the neck consistent with a belt buckle. Nelson's right wrist also bore a ligature mark. Dr. Richards found that Nelson's penis and scrotum had been cut off by some type of sharp-edged instrument. Because the bleeding was "not that great," Richards thought Nelson was "probably dead" when the injury was inflicted, although the emasculation could have occurred perimortem, or around the time of death. Skid marks and road burns on the body reflected Nelson was dead at the time of those injuries.

Toxicological analysis revealed Nelson's blood-alcohol level to be 0.14 percent at the time of death. Nelson's blood also contained the anti-anxiety drug diazepam, and his stomach contained propranolol, a cardiac drug available only by prescription. Toxicologist Kelly opined the combination of diazepam and alcohol would have "very, very noticeably sedated" Nelson and could have caused him to fall asleep....

[3]. Murder of Rodger James DeVaul, Jr.

About 3:00 P.M. on Sunday, February 13, 1983, a motorist who was driving in the San Bernardino Mountains stopped at a turnout near Glendora Ridge and Mt. Baldy Road. There he saw a dead body lying off the road down a hillside. Deputy James Davis of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, responding to the scene, observed a body (later identified as that of Rodger James DeVaul, Jr.) about 14 or 15 feet from the side of the road. The victim's pants were unbuttoned and partially pulled down....

The cause of DeVaul's death was determined to be asphyxia due to neck compression. An abrasion on DeVaul's neck measured one and one-quarter inches in length and one-eighth inch in width. The left wrist bore a mark measuring one inch by one-quarter inch. Anal swabs taken from DeVaul at the autopsy revealed the presence of semen that could not be typed. DeVaul's blood-alcohol level was 0.07 percent, and his blood also contained propranolol and diazepam at therapeutic levels. The combination of alcohol and drugs would have impaired DeVaul's consciousness.

Some of the photographs found underneath the floor mat of [Kraft's] car at the time of his arrest, as well as some of the photographs developed from negatives taken from his house, depicted DeVaul. The photographs variously showed DeVaul's anal area, a ligature on his wrist, and a pose in which DeVaul was holding his penis....

[4]. Murder of Eric Herbert Church

Around 11:00 A.M. on January 27, 1983, a California Department of Transportation worker discovered the dead body of a young man, later identified as Eric Herbert Church, off the shoulder of the on-ramp to the northbound 605 Freeway from Seventh Street in Long Beach. The body was clothed and wore burgundy colored socks but no shoes. It appeared to have skidded to the spot where it was found. Death was estimated to have occurred at least 12 hours before the body was found. The cause of death was asphyxia due to ligature strangulation. Ligature marks were found on the victim's wrists as well as his neck. Church's blood-alcohol level at the time of death was 0.08 percent and his blood also contained 2.5 milligrams per liter of diazepam, a potentially fatal amount that would have put him into a mild to moderate coma....

[5]. Murder of Robert Wyatt Loggins, Jr.

On the morning of September 3, 1980, some young boys living near Paseo Sombra in El Toro found a body, later identified as that of [Robert Wyatt Loggins, Jr.], in a large green plastic bag in the foothills.... The body was tied in a fetal position with a rope around the ankles and wrists, and with the feet tied near the head. A sheet of clear plastic was wrapped over the body and tied at the neck. The body was nude, and the only article of clothing with the body was a sock near the rectum. The advanced decomposition of the body precluded certainty as to the cause of death; Dr. Peter Yatar, who performed the autopsy, concluded, however, that asphyxia by strangulation or smothering was a possible cause. Postmortem ligature marks were visible on the wrists, neck and ankles, but the pathologist could not determine if antemortem ligature marks were present on the neck. The level of alcohol in the victim's brain was 0.25 percent, while the blood-alcohol level was 0.24 percent, the similarity of those figures suggesting putrefaction did not account for the alcohol levels in the body. Antihistamines (chlorpheniramine and diphenhydramine) were found in various concentrations in the blood and certain organs....

Photographs of Loggins were found in [Kraft's] car and in a briefcase found in [his] house....

[6]. Murder of Donald Harold Crisel

[O]n June 16, 1979, ... a passing motorist saw a body later identified as [Donald Harold Crisel] on the side of the Irvine Center on-ramp to the northbound San Diego Freeway in Irvine. A responding police officer testified Crisel had no pulse, but was warm to the touch and bleeding slowly from the nostrils. Crisel was wearing only undershorts, on which there appeared to be tire tracks. The body evidently had been pushed from a moving vehicle, as it bore road burns.

Dr. Richards, who performed the autopsy, determined the cause of death to be multiple drug overdose. Crisel's blood-alcohol level at the time of death was 0.06 percent. Potentially fatal levels of acetaminophen, as well as the antihistamines phenylpropranolamine and phenyltoloxamine, were also in Crisel's blood. The analgesic phenacetin and chlorpheniramine were also present. Postembalming photographs revealed ligature marks, between one-half inch and one inch in width, on the neck. The wrists also bore faint ligature marks. Had the toxicology results been negative, Richards would have found the cause of death to have been ligature strangulation. Crisel's left nipple had been lightly burned with a car cigarette lighter after his death....

[7]. Murder ... [of] Michael Joseph Inderbieten

On [November 18, 1978] ... a passing motorist saw a body later identified as [Michael Joseph Inderbieten] on a transition ramp from Seventh Street leading to the 405 and 605 Freeway on-ramps in Long Beach. The body was dressed only in a pair of pants, which were pulled down, partially exposing his buttocks. The time of death was estimated at 6:00 A.M. The cause of death was determined to be anoxia due to suffocation. Inderbieten's eyes and nipples had been burned with a cigarette lighter. His scrotum and testicles had been removed as well as some skin from the penis. The removal of the testicles probably occurred while Inderbieten was still alive. There was no evidence of injury to the rectum, but the anus appeared to be slightly dilated, according to Dr. Richards.... There were ligature marks around both wrists but not the neck. The body bore road burns consistent with having been thrown from a vehicle traveling slowly. Inderbieten's blood-alcohol level at the time of death was 0.16 percent, and a low dosage of diazepam was found in his stomach. Secobarbital was found at a low level in Inderbieten's liver and blood. The combined effect of the alcohol and the secobarbital would have been deep sedation or sleep....

[8]. Murder of Keith Arthur Klingbeil

About 3:30 A.M. on July 6, 1978, a motorist traveling northbound on Interstate 5 between La Paz Road and Oso Parkway discovered a body, later identified as Keith Arthur Klingbeil, in the slow lane of the freeway. The body was warm when police arrived, death having probably occurred within one-half hour of the finding of the body. The body was clothed and wearing boots missing the left lace. The cause of death was determined to be acetaminophen overdose, with ligature strangulation a contributing factor. On the right side of Klingbeil's neck were ligature lines about three-fourths of an inch apart. There were road burns all over the body consistent with ejection from a moving vehicle. Around the time of death, he had been burned with a car cigarette lighter on the left nipple....

[9]. Murder of Richard Allen Keith

[On June 19, 1978] a Los Angeles fireman discovered a nude body, later identified as that of [Richard Allen Keith], lying off the side of Moulton Parkway one-half mile north of La Paz Road in Orange County. The body had been pushed out of a moving vehicle. The cause of death was ligature strangulation. Keith's blood-alcohol level at the time of death was 0.07 percent, and diazepam and flurazepam (a drug similar to, and somewhat more potent than, diazepam) were present in Keith's system in amounts sufficient to have rendered him very sleepy....

[10]. Murder of Roland Gerald Young

[On June 11, 1978] a passing motorist saw what appeared to be a dead body on Irvine Center Drive in the City of Irvine but, as she was unsure what she had seen, she made no report until a later time. At 4:00 A.M., a Santa Ana firefighter saw [Roland Gerald Young's] body at that location and called police. The responding officer observed the body was shirtless and saw a large amount of blood, still wet, in the crotch area of the pants. Blood on the pavement indicated the body had bounced as it hit the roadway after being ejected from a fast-moving vehicle. The left shoe was missing a lace, and there was no belt on the pants....

The cause of death was determined to be blood loss following four stab wounds to the chest, all of which entered the heart. At or near the time of death, a sharp knife had been used to cut the scrotal sac and remove one testicle and some skin from the penis. There were also antemortem lacerations over the left eyebrow and left eyelid. A faint mark was present on the back of the right hand and wrist. Young's blood-alcohol level at the time of death was 0.09 percent. There was diazepam in his blood and stomach in nontoxic concentrations. The combined effect of the alcohol and diazepam would have been extreme drowsiness or mild coma....

[11]. Murder of Scott Michael Hughes

[On April 16 1978], around 7:00 A.M., [Scott Michael Hughes's] dead body was found about four feet from the eastbound on-ramp to the Riverside Freeway in Anaheim at Euclid. There were no laces in Hughes's shoes. The cause of death was found to be cerebral anoxia due to ligature strangulation. Ligature marks, consistent with a belt, appeared on the neck, most prominently on the left side. There were antemortem abrasions to the left temple, left eye, and left side of the chin. Hughes's scrotum had been cut and the left testicle excised, probably after death. There were road burns on the body. No alcohol was present in Hughes's blood, but diazepam was present at about three times the therapeutic level. This would have caused sleepiness and mental confusion....

[12]. Murder of Mark Howard Hall

On January 3, 1976, an off-duty Santa Ana police officer was riding dune buggies with friends in the mountains near Silverado Canyon and Bedford Peak in the area of Saddleback Mountain. About 3:00 P.M., the group discovered the dead body of [Mark Howard Hall] about 25 feet from a road in that area and summoned police.

Hall's body was nude, and his genitals had been removed. Near the body was an open package of Half-and-Half brand cigarettes. The cause of death was a combination of suffocation and acute alcohol intoxication. Hall's mouth and trachea had been densely packed with dirt. Repeated filling of the mouth with dirt, followed by choking, swallowing or inhaling, could have accounted for the degree of compaction; it was unlikely that intentional forcing of dirt down the trachea would have resulted in the degree of compaction of the dirt, and there was no tissue damage to indicate a rod had been used. Hall's blood-alcohol level at the time of death was 0.67 percent. For most people, a blood-alcohol level of 0.45 or 0.50 percent would be fatal. Diazepam, as well as the over-the-counter cold remedies phenacetin and methapyrilone, were found in Hall's system. A cigarette lighter had been used to burn Hall's eyes, nose, moustache, left nipple and other parts of his body. The injuries to the eyes and nipple and the removal of the penis and scrotum had occurred postmortem. A swizzle stick had been shoved up the urethra of the penis into the bladder, and the genitals had been inserted into the rectum. Only one testicle was found. There were ligature marks on the right side of the neck. A 12-inch cut had been inflicted on Hall's leg postmortem....

[13]. Murder of Keith Daven Crotwell

On the night of March 29, 1975, [Keith Daven Crotwell] and his friend Kent May ... went to Big John's Fun Hall near Belmont Pier and the Olympic swimming pool in Long Beach. In the course of the evening, Crotwell and May, who had both been drinking, walked to a seawall near Big John's and talked about an argument Kent had just had with a girl. [Kraft] approached and began to converse with them. The area was frequented by homosexuals, and May asked if [Kraft] were homosexual; [Kraft] denied it, stating he was merely out for a leisurely stroll. [Kraft] offered drugs to Crotwell and May. They went to [Kraft's] Mustang automobile, where he gave them pills with the number "10<in> imprinted on them. May took six or seven of the pills, Crotwell three or four more than May, downing them with beer. [Kraft] then drove off with Crotwell and May in his car....

Michael Ditmar and Randy Cooper, friends of Crotwell's, had also been at Big John's on the night of March 29, 1975, and sometime after 3:00 or 4:00 A.M. the next day they returned ... to look for Crotwell and May. In the Big John's parking lot, Ditmar saw a white Mustang with its passenger door open and [Kraft] pushing May out of the backseat. May took a few steps and fell down. [Kraft] pushed May away from the car. Ditmar and Cooper yelled at [Kraft] to stop and wait, but [Kraft] drove off at a relatively fast speed toward Seal Beach with Crotwell in the front passenger seat, slumped toward [Kraft] and possibly unconscious....

On May 8, 1975, two young boys discovered a human skull near a jetty in the Long Beach Marina about 1,000 feet from a parking lot. Through dental X-rays, the skull was later identified as Crotwell's....

On October 19, 1975, some children in the City of Laguna Hills discovered skeletal remains, minus the skull and hands, wrapped in a rug in a large pipe. The remains were later identified as Crotwell's....

[14]. Murder of Ronald Gene Wiebe

[On] July 30, 1973, Seal Beach police officers were dispatched to the Seventh Street on-ramp to the San Diego Freeway, where a body later identified as [Ronald Gene Wiebe] was found. There was no belt in the pants; the right foot was bare, but there was a sock on the left foot. The top of Wiebe's pants was undone, exposing his penis. There was a ligature mark on the victim's neck about one-quarter-inch wide. Death had occurred about two days earlier, caused by asphyxia due to ligature strangulation. Postmortem road burns were all over the body. A sock had been stuffed into the victim's rectum, apparently postmortem. The victim's penis had been "pinched" after his death. His blood-alcohol level was 0.02 percent at the time of death, and no drugs were detected in his system.

[15]. Murder of "John Doe of Huntington Beach"

About 1:00 A.M. On Saturday, April 14, 1973, a passing motorist saw a dead body on Ellis Avenue between Goldenwest and Gothard Streets in Huntington Beach and called the police. There was no identification with the body, which remained unidentified at the time of trial. The victim appeared to be between 18 and 25 years old. He wore socks but no shoes, and there was no belt in his pants. The cause of death was suffocation, perhaps caused by a gag or something put over the nose and mouth. The victim's penis and scrotum had been removed antemortem, and the loss of at least two pints of blood may have been a contributing factor in the death. There were gag marks on the mouth and ligature marks on both wrists. The victim's nose and lips had been bruised before death. There were postmortem road burns on the body. A sharp instrument had inflicted cuts on various parts of the body after death. The victim's blood-alcohol level was 0.07 percent. Rectal swabs taken from the victim at the autopsy were found to contain spermatozoa....

[16]. Murder of Edward Daniel Moore

Around 1:45 A.M. on December 26, 1972, a California Highway Patrol officer driving in the area of the Seventh Street off-ramp from the 405 and 605 Freeways saw a group of pedestrians near a dead body later identified as that of Edward Daniel Moore. The body was on the shoulder of the off-ramp, about one-quarter mile from Seventh Street.

The victim's body was identified through his fingerprints. Moore was a United States Marine stationed at Camp Pendleton. When his body was found, Moore was wearing a jacket, T-shirt, sweater, pants with no belt, and one sock. The other sock was found in his rectum. Moore's boxer shorts had his name, as well as another person's name, stenciled on the back.

Moore had died about three days before his body was found. The cause of death was asphyxiation through strangulation. There were ligature marks on Moore's neck and two scratch marks on the left side of his scrotum. A fist or blunt instrument had caused antemortem trauma to Moore's nose and lip. Moore's blood contained only a trace of alcohol and no drugs.

The jury convicted Kraft of all sixteen murders. After the penalty phase of the trial, the jury recommended death. On November 29, 1989, the trial court sentenced Kraft to death. The death sentence was upheld by the California Supreme Court on August 11, 2000. See also Serial Killer; Sexual Assault

Southern Center for Human Rights The Southern Center for Human Rights (the Center) is a nonprofit, public-interest legal project. It was founded in 1976 to enforce the constitutional protection against cruel and unusual punishment. The Center challenges discrimination against minorities, the poor, and the disadvantaged in the criminal justice system of the South.

The Center carries out its objectives in a variety of ways. It provides direct legal representation to the condemned and the imprisoned, recruits attorneys from throughout the nation to take on such work; supports the efforts of local attorneys, community groups, and individuals; involves students and other volunteers in human rights work; and disseminates information to the press and public about human rights abuses and denials of due process.

Members of the Center's staff have written articles that have appeared in books, newspapers, law reviews, and other publications; have taught courses on capital punishment and prisoners' rights at the law schools at Harvard, Yale, Georgetown, Emory, Georgia State, and other universities; have responded to invitations to testify before the committees of the United States Senate, the United States House of Representatives, and several state legislatures; and have appeared in the media and public forums in order to educate the press and public about criminal justice and corrections issues.

The Center carries out this work with a staff of nine attorneys.

Attorney Stephen B. Bright has been the director of the Center since 1982. He has taught courses on criminal law, capital punishment, prisoners' rights, and international human rights at Yale, Harvard, Georgetown, Emory, Northeastern, Florida State, and St. Mary's law schools.

The Center has a death penalty project which challenges racial discrimination in the imposition of the death penalty. The death penalty project uses a strategy which combines litigation, community involvement, and public education. The project provides direct legal representation to those facing the death penalty at trials, on appeal, and in post-conviction proceedings; engages in efforts to bring about greater participation by people who have been excluded from the criminal justice system; challenges the imposition of the death penalty upon people with mental illnesses, children, and other disenfranchised groups; educates lawyers about how best to defend those groups in capital cases; recruits lawyers to provide representation to those facing the death penalty; publishes materials and provides advice to lawyers defending those facing death; provides materials to and collaborates with other organizations, community groups, and individuals in efforts to educate communities about the injustices in the use of the death penalty and involve them in seeking solutions; and draws national and international attention to and increases public involvement in these issues through workshops, public hearings, and the media.

The Center has been instrumental in establishing other organizations. It helped establish and provided staff for organizations in Alabama, Texas, and Louisiana which provide representation to persons facing the death penalty in those states.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession to capital murder was involuntary and therefore inadmissible at his trial.

Case Holding: The defendant's confession to capital murder was involuntary and therefore inadmissible at his trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Vincent Joseph Spano, was arrested for capital murder by the State of New York. While being detained, the defendant was interrogated for eight hours by the police, in spite of requests to see his attorney. The defendant eventually confessed to the murder. A jury convicted the defendant of capital murder and he was sentenced to death. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that his confession was taken in violation of the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Warren: The chief justice held that the defendant's confession was not voluntary and its use at trial violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The opinion pointed out that the constitutional abhorrence to the use of involuntary confessions did not turn alone on their inherent untrustworthiness. It was said that the prohibition also turned on the deep-rooted feeling that the police must obey the law while enforcing the law. The chief justice wrote: "[I]n the end life and liberty can be as much endangered from illegal methods used to convict those thought to be criminals as from the actual criminals themselves." The opinion went onto to set out the interrogation tactics used against the defendant as follows:

[The defendant] was a foreign-born young man of 25 with no past history of law violation or of subjection to official interrogation, at least insofar as the record shows. He had progressed only one-half year into high school and the record indicates that he had a history of emotional instability. He did not make a narrative statement, but was subject to the leading questions of a skillful prosecutor in a question and answer confession. He was subjected to questioning not by a few men, but by many. They included Assistant District Attorney Goldsmith, one Hyland of the District Attorney's Office, Deputy Inspector Halks, Lieutenant Gannon, Detective Ciccone, Detective Motta, Detective Lehrer, Detective Marshal, Detective Farrell, Detective Leira, Detective Murphy, Detective Murtha, Sergeant Clarke, Patrolman Bruno and Stenographer Baldwin. All played some part, and the effect of such massive official interrogation must have been felt. [The defendant] was questioned for virtually eight straight hours before he confessed, with his only respite being a transfer to an arena presumably considered more appropriate by the police for the task at hand. Nor was the questioning conducted during normal business hours, but began in early evening, continued into the night, and did not bear fruition until the not-too-early morning. The drama was not played out, with the final admissions obtained, until almost sunrise. In such circumstances slowly mounting fatigue does, and is calculated to, play its part. The questioners persisted in the face of his repeated refusals to answer on the advice of his attorney, and they ignored his reasonable requests to contact the local attorney whom he had already retained and who had personally delivered him into the custody of these officers in obedience to the bench warrant.

We conclude that [the defendant's] will was overborne by official pressure, fatigue and sympathy falsely aroused, after considering all the facts in their post-indictment setting. Here a grand jury had already found sufficient cause to require [the defendant] to face trial on a charge of first-degree murder, and the police had an eyewitness to the shooting. The police were not therefore merely trying to solve a crime, or even to absolve a suspect. They were rather concerned primarily with securing a statement from [the] defendant on which they could convict him. The undeviating intent of the officers to extract a confession from [the defendant] is therefore patent. When such an intent is shown, this Court has held that the confession obtained must be examined with the most careful scrutiny, and has reversed a conviction on facts less compelling than these.

The judgment of the New York Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Douglas, in Which Black and Brennan, JJ., Joined: Justice Douglas concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to express his opinion that the defendant's constitutional right to counsel was violated by the interrogation. Justice Douglas wrote: "We do not have here mere suspects who are being secretly interrogated by the police ... nor witnesses who are being questioned in secret administrative or judicial proceedings[.] This is a case of an accused, who is scheduled to be tried by a judge and jury, being tried in a preliminary way by the police. This is a kangaroo court procedure whereby the police produce the vital evidence in the form of a confession which is useful or necessary to obtain a conviction. They in effect deny him effective representation by counsel. This seems to me to be a flagrant violation of the principle ... that the right of counsel extends to the preparation for trial, as well as to the trial itself.... When he is deprived of that right after indictment and before trial, he may indeed be denied effective representation by counsel at the only stage when legal aid and advice would help him. This secret inquisition by the police when defendant asked for and was denied counsel was [a] serious ... invasion of his constitutional rights."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stewart, in Which Douglas and Brennan, JJ., Joined: Justice Stewart concurred in the Court's decision. He believed, like Justice Douglas, that the right to counsel was the triggering constitutional violation in the case. Justice Stewart wrote:

While I concur in the opinion of the Court, it is my view that the absence of counsel when this confession was elicited was alone enough to render it inadmissible under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Our Constitution guarantees the assistance of counsel to a man on trial for his life in an orderly courtroom, presided over by a judge, open to the public, and protected by all the procedural safeguards of the law. Surely a Constitution which promises that much can vouchsafe no less to the same man under midnight inquisition in the squad room of a police station.

Sparf v. United States Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Sparf v. J. Kierce argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Mr. Conrad argued and briefed; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: None; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: None

Issues Presented: (1) Whether Sparf's conviction was invalid due to the introduction of Hansen's confession. (2) Whether the trial court committed error in failing to instruct the jury on lesser included offenses to capital murder.

Case Holding: (1) Sparf's conviction was invalid due to the introduction of Hansen's confession because there was no evidence of a conspiracy between the defendants to kill the victim. (2) The trial court did not commit error in failing to instruct the jury on lesser included offenses to capital murder because no evidence was introduced on lesser included offenses.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, Herman Sparf and Hans Hansen, were indicted for capital murder by the United States. Also named in the indictment was Thomas St. Clair. The murder took place on the high seas. The case was prosecuted in a federal district court in California. The defendants, who were tried together, were convicted and sentenced to death. In the defendants' appeal to the United States Supreme Court, Sparf contended that his conviction was invalid because the trial court allowed Hansen's confession to be used against him; and both defendants argued that their convictions were invalid because the trial court refused to instruct the jury that they could return a verdict of guilty of a lesser included offense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan first examined the contention by Sparf that Hansen's confession could not be used against him. The opinion found that "the confession and declarations of Hansen ... were incompetent as evidence against Sparf." Justice Harlan reasoned as follows: "If the evidence made a case of conspiracy to kill and murder, the rule is settled that after the conspiracy has come to an end, and whether by success or by failure, the admissions of one conspirator by way of narrative of past facts are not admissible in evidence against the others. The same rule is applicable where the evidence does not show that the killing was pursuant to a conspiracy, but yet was by the joint act of the defendants."

The opinion next turned to the issue of whether the trial court should have instructed the jury on lesser included offenses. Justice Harlan ruled that no evidence was presented which would have justified an instruction on lesser included offenses. He wrote as follows:

A verdict of guilty of an offense less than the one charged would have been in flagrant disregard of all the proof, and in violation by the jury of their obligation to render a true verdict. There was an entire absence of evidence upon which to rest a verdict of guilty of manslaughter or of simple assault. A verdict of that kind would have been the exercise by the jury of the power to commute the punishment for an offense actually committed, and thus impose a punishment different from that prescribed by law....

We are of opinion that the court below did not err in saying to the jury that they could not, consistently with the law arising from the evidence, find the defendants guilty of manslaughter, or of any offense less than the one charged; that if the defendants were not guilty of the offense charged, the duty of the jury was to return a verdict of not guilty. No instruction was given that questioned the right of the jury to determine whether the witnesses were to be believed or not, nor whether the defendant was guilty or not guilty of the offense charged. On the contrary, the court was careful to say that the jury were the exclusive judges of the facts, and that they were to determine — applying to the facts the principles of law announced by the court — whether the evidence established the guilt or innocence of the defendants of the charge set out in the indictment.

The judgment of the district court was affirmed as to Hansen, but is reversed as to Sparf, with directions for a new trial as to him.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brewer, in Which Brown, J., Joined: Justice Brewer concurred in the Court's affirmance of the judgment against Hansen. He dissented from the Court's reversal of Sparf's judgment, on the grounds that Sparf did not make a proper objection during the trial. Justice Brewer wrote:

But it is conceded that this confession was material, relevant, and competent, was properly admitted in evidence on the single trial then pending, and properly heard by the jury. The real burden of complaint is that, when the court admitted the testimony, it ought to have instructed the jury that it was evidence only against Hansen, and not against Sparf.... I do not question the proposition that a confession made by one of two defendants in the absence of the other is to be considered by the jury only as against the one making it, and I admit that, if a separate objection had been made by Sparf, the court would have been called upon to formally sustain such objection, and instruct the jury that such testimony was to be considered by them only as against Hansen. If an instruction had been asked, as is the proper way, the attention of the court would have been directed to the matter, and an adverse ruling would have rightly presented the error which is now relied upon.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Gray, in Which Shiras, J., Joined: Justice Gray concurred in the Court's reversal of Sparf's judgment. He dissented from the Court's affirmance of Hansen's judgment. Justice Gray wrote:

The defendants requested the judge to instruct the jury that "under the indictment in this case the defendants may be convicted of murder or manslaughter or of an attempt to commit murder or manslaughter; and if, after a full and careful consideration of all the evidence before you, you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants are guilty either of manslaughter, or of an assault with intent to commit murder or manslaughter, you should so find your verdict." The judge refused to give this instruction, and the defendants excepted to the refusal....

The judge, by instructing the jury that they were bound to accept the law as given to them by the court, denied their right to decide the law. And by instructing them that, if a felonious homicide by the defendants was proved, there was nothing in the case to reduce it below the grade of murder, and they could not properly find it to be manslaughter, and by declining to submit to them the question whether the defendants were guilty of manslaughter only, he denied their right to decide the fact....

For the twofold reason that the defendants, by the instructions given by the court to the jury, have been deprived both of their right to have the jury decide the law involved in the general issue, and also of their right to have the jury decide every matter of fact involved in that issue.

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution requires a capital sentencing jury's recommendation of life imprisonment be final.

Case Holding: There is no constitutional requirement that a capital jury's recommendation of life imprisonment be final.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Joseph Robert Spaziano, was indicted and tried for first-degree murder by the State of Florida. After the jury returned a verdict of guilty of first-degree murder, a sentencing hearing was conducted before the same jury, which returned an advisory verdict recommending life imprisonment. The trial judge rejected the recommendation and, after weighing the aggravating and mitigating circumstances, imposed a death sentence.

On appeal, the Florida Supreme Court affirmed the conviction, but reversed the death sentence because of the trial judge's consideration of a confidential portion of a pre-sentence investigation report, without letting either party review a copy of the confidential portion. On remand, the trial court again imposed the death penalty. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the federal Constitution prohibited the trial court from overriding the jury's recommendation of life imprisonment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun rejected the defendant's argument that the Constitution prohibits a trial court from overriding a capital jury's recommendation of life imprisonment. It was said that the fundamental issue in a capital sentencing proceeding is the determination of the appropriate punishment to be imposed on an individual and, in making such determination, the Constitution does not guarantee a right to a binding jury verdict. The opinion reasoned that nothing in the safeguards against arbitrary and discriminatory application of the death penalty necessitated by the qualitative difference of the penalty requires that the sentence be imposed by a jury. Justice Blackmun made clear that the fact that the majority of jurisdictions with capital sentencing statutes give the life-or-death decision to the jury does not establish that contemporary standards of fairness and decency are offended by the jury override.

The opinion held further: "We see nothing that suggests that the application of the jury-override procedure has resulted in arbitrary or discriminatory application of the death penalty, either in general or in this particular case. Regardless of the jury's recommendation, the trial judge is required to conduct an independent review of the evidence and to make his own findings regarding aggravating and mitigating circumstances. If the judge imposes a sentence of death, he must set forth in writing the findings on which the sentence is based." The Court went on to affirm the judgment of the Florida Supreme Court.

Concurring Statement by Justice White, in Which Rehnquist, J., Joined: Justice White issued a statement indicating he joined the Court's opinion and judgment except for its dictum on a nondispositive issue not discussed here.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Brennan and Marshall, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens concurred with the Court's resolution of a nondispositive issue involving the statute of limitations (not discussed here). However, he dissented from the Court's determination that the Constitution did not provide the defendant with a right to have the jury determine his sentence. The dissent pointed out that in eighty-two cases arising under the capital punishment statute enacted by Florida in 1972, trial judges sentenced defendants to death after a jury had recommended a sentence of life imprisonment. Justice Stevens wrote: "The question presented is whether the Constitution of the United States permits [the defendant's] execution when the prosecution has been unable to persuade a jury of his peers that the death penalty is the appropriate punishment for his crime." The dissent went on to state its position and reasoning as follows:

The judgment of the people's representatives firmly supports the conclusion that the jury ought to make the life-or-death decision necessary in capital cases....

The same consideration that supports a constitutional entitlement to a trial by a jury rather than a judge at the guilt or innocence stage — the right to have an authentic representative of the community apply its lay perspective to the determination that must precede a deprivation of liberty — applies with special force to the determination that must precede a deprivation of life. In many respects capital sentencing resembles a trial on the question of guilt, involving as it does a prescribed burden of proof of given elements through the adversarial process. But more important than its procedural aspects, the life-or-death decision in capital cases depends upon its link to community values for its moral and constitutional legitimacy....

That the jury provides a better link to community values than does a single judge is supported not only by our cases, but also by common sense. Juries — comprised as they are of a fair cross section of the community — are more representative institutions than is the judiciary; they reflect more accurately the composition and experiences of the community as a whole, and inevitably make decisions based on community values more reliably, than can that segment of the community that is selected for service on the bench. Indeed, as the preceding discussion demonstrates, the belief that juries more accurately reflect the conscience of the community than can a single judge is the central reason that the jury right has been recognized at the guilt stage in our jurisprudence. This same belief firmly supports the use of juries in capital sentencing, in order to address the Eighth Amendment's concern that capital punishment be administered consistently with community values. In fact, the available empirical evidence indicates that judges and juries do make sentencing decisions in capital cases in significantly different ways, thus supporting the conclusion that entrusting the capital decision to a single judge creates an unacceptable risk that the decision will not be consistent with community values.

Thus, the legitimacy of capital punishment in light of the Eighth Amendment's mandate concerning the proportionality of punishment critically depends upon whether its imposition in a particular case is consistent with the community's sense of values. Juries have historically been, and continue to be, a much better indicator as to whether the death penalty is a disproportionate punishment for a given offense in light of community values than is a single judge. If the prosecutor cannot convince a jury that the defendant deserves to die, there is an unjustifiable risk that the imposition of that punishment will not reflect the community's sense of the defendant's "moral guilt." The Florida statute is thus inconsistent with "the need for reliability in the determination that death is the appropriate punishment in a specific case."

Speck, Richard Richard Speck was born on December 6, 1941, in Kirkwood, Illinois. His family left Illinois and moved to Dallas, Texas, when he was a child. Speck had a troubled childhood that included arrests, drugs, and alcohol. He was married for a short period in the mid-1960s. His wife filed for divorce, on the grounds of cruelty, in January 1966. After the divorce was filed, Speck left Dallas and went to Chicago to live with one of his sisters.

Chicago proved to be too much for Speck. Drugs and alcohol were his only means of coping with the city's fast-paced life. Although he was able to find work at a shipyard, the pay did not support his addictions. Speck resorted to stealing.

On July 13, 1966, Speck decided to burglarize a residence near South Chicago Community Hospital. The home Speck selected was occupied by nine student nurses. Speck knocked on the door. He was armed with a gun and knife. When his knock at the door was answered, Speck forced his way into the home. Six of the girls who lived in the home were present. He told the girls he needed money and that he would not harm them. He made the girls lie on the floor and tied them up. As Speck rumbled through the home

Richard Speck escaped death sentences imposed for eight murders in 1966 because of the moratorium imposed on capital punishment by the United States Supreme Court in 1972. (Illinois Department of Corrections) three other girls arrived. Speck quickly subdued them and tied them up.

Once Speck had retrieved all the valuables he could carry, he decided to kill all of the girls. He led the girls, one at a time, into a room where he stabbed and strangled them to death. Only one victim was raped. Because of the number of girls in the home, Speck did not realize that one of them had rolled under a bed and was hiding. Speck left the home believing he had killed all nine of the girls.

When Speck left, the lone survivor contacted the police and gave a description of the attacker. The police were able to lift Speck's fingerprints from the crime scene and make a positive identification. A massive manhunt followed.

Several days after the murders, Speck's photograph was circulated throughout city, along with description of a tattoo he had on his arm reading, "Born to Raise Hell." At the time Speck was living at a shelter for derelicts. Once he realized his identity was known, Speck went back to the shelter and slit his wrist in a suicide attempt. Shelter officials called an ambulance and Speck was taken to a hospital—the same hospital where his victims had been taken. When Speck arrived at the hospital, he was recognized by the treating physician, as a result of the tattoo on his arm reading, "Born to Raise Hell." Hospital officials contacted the police.

Speck was placed under arrest while in the hospital. He was eventually charged with eight counts of murder. On April 3, 1967, his trial began. On April 15, the jury found Speck guilty of eight counts of murder. The trial judge sentenced him to death on the same day.

Speck avoided the death penalty as a result of the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), which placed a moratorium on capital punishment. He was resentenced to eight consecutive terms of 50 to 150 years each. Speck died in prison on December 5, 1991, from a massive heart attack.

Issue Presented: Whether a Texas rule that permitted the jury to be informed of the defendant's prior murder conviction offended the Due Process Clause.

Case Holding: The Texas rule that permitted the jury to be informed of the defendant's prior murder conviction did not offend the Due Process Clause.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Spencer, was charged with capital murder by the State of Texas. At the time of the prosecution, Texas had a recidivist statute which permitted the jury to be told of any prior conviction that a defendant had, for the purpose of enhancing punishment upon conviction. During the defendant's prosecution, the trial judge permitted the prosecutor to inform that jury that the defendant had previously been convicted of murder. The trial judge instructed the jury that they could only consider the prior conviction for sentencing purposes, if they found the defendant guilty. The defendant was found guilty and sentenced to death. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the recidivist procedure violated the Due Process Clause of the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan ruled that Texas's recidivist statute was not unconstitutional. He wrote that States had wide leeway in dividing responsibility between judge and jury in criminal cases and that it was not unconstitutional for the jury to assess the punishment in a criminal case or to make findings regarding prior convictions. It was pointed out that the possibility of prejudice from such evidence was outweighed by the validity of the State's purpose in permitting introduction of the evidence. Justice Harlan ruled that the defendant's interests were protected by the trial court's limiting instructions. It was concluded that States had power to promulgate their own rules of evidence to try their crimes as long as those rules are not prohibited by the federal Constitution. The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stewart: Justice Stewart concurred in the Court's decision. He indicated that, while he may not personally favor Texas's recidivist rule, the rule was not offensive to the Constitution. The concurrence stated: "[T]he question for decision is not whether we applaud or even whether we personally approve the procedures followed in these recidivist cases. The question is whether those procedures fall below the minimum level the Fourteenth Amendment will tolerate. Upon that question I am constrained to join the opinion and judgment of the Court."

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Warren, in Which Fortas, J., Joined: The chief justice dissented from the Court's decision. He stated his position as follows: "It seems to me that the use of prior-convictions evidence in th[is] case is fundamentally at odds with traditional notions of due process, not because this procedure is not the nicest resolution of conflicting but legitimate interests of the State and the accused, but because it needlessly prejudices the accused without advancing any legitimate interest of the State. If I am wrong in thinking that the introduction of prior-convictions evidence serves no valid purpose I am not alone, for the Court never states what interest of the State is advanced by this procedure. And this failure, in my view, undermines the logic of the Court's opinion."

Dissenting Statement by Brennan and Douglas, JJ.: Justices Brennan and Douglas issued a statement indicating they dissented from the Court's opinion.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment law, use of prior convictions is generally confined to the separate penalty phase of a capital prosecution as aggravating circumstances. Additionally, modern rules of evidence greatly restrict the circumstances under which prior convictions may be introduced to the jury during the guilt phase of a capital prosecution. See also Prior Felony or Homicide Aggravator; Rules of Evidence

Spiritual Advisor Hollywood popularized the notion of a capital felon going to the execution chamber with a priest close at hand. The classic depiction of this scenario involved Pat O'Brien playing a priest who attended James Cagney, as he was ushered to the death chamber. Reality is not far behind Hollywood's fictional accounts of executions. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions allow by statute for spiritual advisors to be present at executions. Two types of spiritual advisors are provided for in statutes: (1) prison chaplains and (2) personal spiritual advisors.

1. Prison chaplain. Five capital punishment jurisdictions permit by statute for prison chaplains to attend executions. Three of those jurisdictions, Indiana, Kentucky, and Wyoming, limit prison chaplain representation to one chaplain. The remaining two jurisdictions, Alabama and Texas, do not limit the number of prison chaplains that may attend an execution.

2. Personal spiritual advisor. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions statutorily allow capital felons to invite their own personal spiritual advisors to be present at executions. These jurisdictions vary on the number of personal spiritual advisors that may be in attendance. In addition to access to spiritual advisors during the executions, capital felons have access to religious services while on death row.

Issue Presented: Whether the imposition of capital punishment on an individual for a capital crime committed at sixteen or seventeen years of age constitutes cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment.

Case Holding: The imposition of capital punishment on an individual for a capital crime committed at sixteen or seventeen years of age does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The decision in this case involved two separate prosecutions that were consolidated for disposition. The first case, No. 87-5765, concerned Kevin Stanford. This defendant was approximately seventeen years and four months old at the time he committed murder in Kentucky. A Kentucky juvenile court, after conducting hearings, transferred him for trial as an adult to be prosecuted for capital murder. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The Kentucky Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence, after rejecting the defendant's contention that the death sentence violated the Eighth Amendment because of his age at the time of the crime.

The second case, No. 87-6026, involved Heath Wilkins. This defendant was approximately sixteen years and six months old when he committed murder in Missouri. He was certified for trial as an adult to be prosecuted for capital murder. This defendant pled guilty and was sentenced to death. The Missouri Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence, after rejecting the defendant's argument that his death sentence violated the Eighth Amendment because of his age at the time of the crime.

The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari for both cases and consolidated them for disposition.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia rejected the defendants' contention that the Constitution prohibited imposition of the death penalty against them because of their ages at the time of the commission of their offenses. It was pointed out that, under the common law, a rebuttable presumption existed that a person fourteen years old or younger was incapable of committing a felony. The opinion noted that in accordance with this common law tradition, at least 281 offenders under eighteen years old and 126 under seventeen years old have been executed in the United States.

The opinion ruled that in determining whether a punishment violated evolving standards of decency, the Court looks not to its own subjective conceptions, but, rather, to the conceptions of modern American society as reflected by objective evidence. Justice Scalia held that the primary and most reliable evidence of national consensus, the pattern of federal and state laws, failed to show a settled consensus against the execution of sixteen- and seventeen-year-old offenders. It was said that of the States that permit capital punishment, fifteen decline to impose it on sixteen-year-olds and twelve on seventeen-year-olds. Justice Scalia reasoned that this did not establish the degree of national agreement the Court has previously thought sufficient to label a punishment cruel and unusual.

It was concluded in the opinion that: "We discern neither a historical nor a modern societal consensus forbidding the imposition of capital punishment on any person who murders at 16 or 17 years of age. Accordingly, we conclude that such punishment does not offend the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment." The judgments of the Kentucky Supreme Court the Missouri Supreme Court were therefore affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's judgment. She cautioned, however, that "[t]he day may come when there is such general legislative rejection of the execution of 16- or 17-year-old capital murderers that a clear national consensus can be said to have developed."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Brennan dissented from the majority opinion. In doing so, he made clear that he "believe[d] that to take the life of a person as punishment for a crime committed when below the age of 18 is cruel and unusual and hence is prohibited by the Eighth Amendment."

The dissent articulated the basis of its rejection of the majority opinion as follows: "There are strong indications that the execution of juvenile offenders violates contemporary standards of decency: a majority of States decline to permit juveniles to be sentenced to death; imposition of the sentence upon minors is very unusual even in those States that permit it; and respected organizations with expertise in relevant areas regard the execution of juveniles as unacceptable, as does international opinion. These indicators serve to confirm in my view my conclusion that the Eighth Amendment prohibits the execution of persons for offenses they committed while below the age of 18, because the death penalty is disproportionate when applied to such young offenders and fails measurably to serve the goals of capital punishment."

Case Note: The majority decision in the case was later overruled by Roper v. Simmons in 2005. See also Juveniles; Roper v. Simmons; Thompson v. Oklahoma for Miranda purposes, depends on the objective circumstances of a police interrogation or on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned.

Issue Presented: Whether the initial determination of custody,

Case Holding: The initial determination of custody, for Miranda purposes, depends on the objective circumstances of a police interrogation, not on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robert Edward Stansbury, was charged with capital murder by the State of California. Prior to trial the defendant motioned the trial court to exclude from evidence incriminating statements he made to the police before his arrest. The defendant argued that the police did not give him the warnings required by the United States Supreme Court's decision in the non-capital case of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). The trial court denied the motion on the grounds that the defendant was not in custody when he made the statements and thus was not entitled to Miranda warnings. The defendant was found guilty of capital murder and sentenced to death. The California Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his Miranda rights were violated. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion found that the defendant's Miranda rights were violated when the police obtained incriminating statements from him during questioning at police headquarters. The opinion held that under Miranda when a person is questioned by law enforcement officers after being taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his or her freedom of action in any significant way, he or she must first be warned of the right to remain silent, that any statement made may be used as evidence against him or her, and that he or she has a right to the presence of an attorney, either retained or appointed. It was said that statements elicited in non-compliance with Miranda may not be admitted for certain purposes in a criminal trial.

The opinion noted that an officer's obligation to administer Miranda warnings attaches only where there has been such a restriction on a person's freedom as to render him or her in custody. It was ruled that in determining whether an individual was in custody, a court must examine all of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation, but the ultimate inquiry is simply whether there was a formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement of the degree associated with a formal arrest. The initial determination of custody depends on the objective circumstances of the interrogation, not on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned. It was further held that a police officer's subjective view that the individual under questioning is a suspect, if undisclosed, does not bear upon the question whether the individual is in custody for purposes of Miranda.

In looking at the record in the case, the opinion found that the California Supreme Court's analysis of whether the defendant was in custody was not consistent in all respects with the Court's precedents. It was said that the State's appellate court's conclusion that the defendant's Miranda rights were not triggered until he had become the focus of the police's suspicions was incorrect because the officers' subjective and undisclosed suspicions did not bear upon the question whether the defendant was in custody for purposes of Miranda. The judgment of the California Supreme Court was reversed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun issued a concurring statement indicating that he joined the Court's per curiam opinion: "even if I were not persuaded that the judgment must be reversed for the reasons stated in that opinion, I would adhere to my view that the death penalty cannot be imposed fairly within the constraints of our Constitution. I therefore would vacate the death sentence on that ground, too." See also Right to Remain Silent

Starkweather, Charles R. Charles R. Starkweather (1938–1959) was born and raised in Lincoln, Nebraska. At about the age of sixteen, Starkweather dropped out of school and took on odd jobs to support himself. In 1957, Starkweather met and fell in love with fourteen-year-old Caril Ann Fugate (b. 1943). It was Starkweather's love for Fugate that caused him to commit the first of eleven spontaneous murders.

The backdrop of Starkweather's first murder began on November 30, 1957, when he went to a local gas station and attempted to purchase, on credit, a stuffed toy dog for Fugate. The gas station attendant, Robert Colvert, refused to allow Starkweather to buy the toy dog on credit. Starkweather left the gas station in a rage. He returned to the station, armed with a shotgun, during the early morning hours of December 1, 1957. While at the gas station, Starkweather robbed the store and kidnapped Colvert. Starkweather drove Colvert to an abandoned area and forced him out of the car. When Colvert got out of the car, Starkweather shot him in the head. The events that followed the murder of Colvert were set out by the Nebraska Supreme Court in the case of Starkweather v. State, 93 N.W.2d 619 (Neb. 1958), as follows:

We begin at the home of Caril. She lived in Lincoln with her stepfather [Marion Bartlett], mother [Velda Bartlett], and baby half sister [Betty Jean Bartlett]. On the afternoon of January 21, 1958, [Starkweather] there killed the stepfather, mother, and half sister.... [Starkweather] wrapped the bodies in paper, rugs, and blankets, each separately. He deposited the body of the mother and baby in an unused outhouse, and the stepfather's body in a chicken house.

Whether Caril was present then is denied in one confession and affirmed in another. [Starkweather] and Caril lived in the house until January 27, 1958. Relatives and others repeatedly came to the house seeking information about [Starkweather] and the other three persons. Caril, using excuses, turned them away.

On the morning of January 27, 1958, some of them left with a statement that they were coming back with the police. [Starkweather] and Caril then decided to flee, and did so shortly before noon in [Starkweather's] car. Among other things, [Starkweather] took with him a .410 gauge shotgun belonging to the stepfather, a revolver (for which he had no ammunition), and a hunting knife. Before leaving [Starkweather] had sawed off a part of the shotgun barrel to cause it to "spread." They changed a tire and bought gasoline in Lincoln. They drove south about 8 miles to a filling station on the highway where they bought gasoline, had a tire repaired, and bought food and ammunition for the shotgun and a .22 gauge rifle, although [Starkweather] did not then have such a rifle. They also got Kansas, Missouri, and Nebraska road maps. [Starkweather] then drove south, east, north, and then east through the town of Bennet to a farm where a Mr. [August] Meyer lived alone. [Starkweather] had hunted there. Near the Meyer home was an abandoned schoolhouse site. All buildings had been torn down. A cave remained with the door torn from its hinges. During the afternoon [Starkweather] and Caril visited the cave near the Meyer house. Later [Starkweather] shot and killed Mr. Meyer and robbed him of money, some articles of clothing, and a .22 gauge rifle. They again visited the cave.

[Starkweather] then again drove to the filling station south of Lincoln where he bought more ammunition, secured more maps, returned to Bennet, and went back to the Meyer farm. He became fearful that someone had been there and discovered that crime. They then started away from the Meyer farm and schoolhouse vicinity. [Starkweather's] car became stuck in the snow and finally was abandoned.

Carrying the guns, the knife, and other articles [Starkweather] and Caril then started walking along the road. They met up with a young man named Robert Jensen and a Miss [Carol] King from Bennet who were riding in an automobile. [Starkweather] asked for "a lift into Bennet," and Jensen offered them a ride. [Starkweather] stated that Jensen recognized him, basing it upon questions asked by Jensen.

[Starkweather] and Caril were in the rear seat, each with one of the guns in their hands. [Starkweather] ordered Jensen to drive to Bennet, which he did. He then ordered him to drive toward Lincoln, which he did. After going a few miles [Starkweather] ordered Jensen to turn around and drive back to the schoolhouse cave location, which Jensen did. During this drive [Starkweather] robbed Jensen of his money and told him he was going to take the Jensen car.

When they got to the cave site, Jensen and Miss King were ordered out of the car and told to go into the cave. Jensen started down, turned, and was coming out when [Starkweather] shot and killed him. The bullets all entered the right side of the head near the ear. Jensen fell head forward into the cave, his body resting in part on the steps. Miss King screamed. [Starkweather] then shot her and shoved her body into the cave.

[Starkweather] remained there for some time. Before leaving he placed the door over the opening to the cave and covered it otherwise with boards and rubbish.

[Starkweather] and Caril left in Jensen's car. They drove toward Hastings, then returned to Lincoln where they slept the remaining early morning hours in the car. On the early forenoon [Starkweather] drove into the Ward home yard and gained admission to the home. Mrs. [Clara] Ward and a maid, Miss [Lillian] Fencil, were present. [Starkweather] took control of the house. Caril came in later. Shortly after noon [Starkweather] said Mrs. Ward tried to shoot him and fled. He threw the knife at her, where it struck her in the back. She died from that wound. Mr. [C. Lauer] Ward returned home. [Starkweather] shot and killed him. Later Miss Fencil was tied up on a bed. She was also killed.... [Starkweather] then left the Jensen car in the Ward garage. He took food, clothing, and money from the Ward home. [Starkweather] undertook to dye his hair black by the use of shoe polish.

In the Ward car [Starkweather] and Caril then drove from Lincoln to Grand Island to Alliance and on into Wyoming. About noon near the city of Douglas, Wyoming, [Starkweather] sought to secure a different car. He shot and killed the owner [Merle Collison]. Officers appeared. [Starkweather], alone, fled in the Ward car and shortly thereafter was captured.

After Starkweather and Fugate were arrested in Wyoming they were extradited to Nebraska. Fugate maintained that she did not kill anyone and was a kidnap victim. Starkweather gave a confession in which he took the blame for all the murders, but recanted and implicated Fugate as an active participant in the murders. The State of Nebraska chose to prosecute Starkweather and Fugate for the murder of only one of their victims, Robert Jensen. Starkweather and Fugate were tried separately for Jensen's murder, but both were found guilty. Starkweather was sentenced to death and Fugate was given a life sentence. The State of Nebraska executed Starkweather in the electric chair on June 25, 1959. Caril was eventually paroled in 1976. See also Serial Killer

Starr v. United States Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Starr v. United States, 153 U.S. 614 (1894); Argued: Not reported; Decided: May 14, 1894; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Fuller; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: A. H. Garland argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Mr. Conrad argued and Issue Presented: Whether the trial court correctly instructed the jury on the defense of self-defense.

Case Holding: The trial court incorrectly instructed the jury on the defense of self-defense because its instruction required the jury to disregard the defense if it was shown that the defendant prevented the victim from identifying himself as a federal deputy marshal.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Henry Starr, was indicted for capital murder by the United States. The victim of the crime was a federal deputy marshal who was attempting to arrest the defendant. During the trial, the defendant contended that he did not know the victim was an officer of the law and that the killing occurred in self-defense. The jury convicted the defendant and he was sentenced to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the trial court erroneously instructed the jury on self-defense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that the trial court did not correctly instruct the jury on self-defense. Under the trial court's instruction, the jury was informed that self-defense was invalid if the defendant prevented the victim from identifying himself as a federal marshal. The opinion reasoned that "if [the] defendant had no knowledge, was not informed, and was not chargeable with notice of [the victim's] mission or official character, the fact, if there was evidence tending to show it, that defendant prevented the giving of notice had no such relation to defendant's claim of exemption from liability founded on his ignorance, and the appearance of the facts to him." The chief justice explained the fundamental principles of self-defense as follows:

First. A man, who, in the lawful pursuit of his business, is attacked by another under circumstances which denote an intention to take away his life, or do him some enormous bodily harm, may lawfully kill the assailant, provided he uses all the means in his power, otherwise, to save his own life, or prevent the intended harm, such as retreating as far as he can, or disabling his adversary without killing him, if it be in his power. Secondly. When the attack upon him is so sudden, fierce, and violent that a retreat would not diminish, but increase, his danger, he may instantly kill his adversary, without retreating at all. Thirdly. When, from the nature of the attack, there is reasonable ground to believe that there is a design to destroy his life, or commit any felony upon his person, the killing of the assailant will be excusable homicide, although it should afterwards appear that no felony was intended.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. See also Self-Defense

Stay of Execution As a general rule, trial courts are required to set an execution date in the order sentencing a defendant to death. However, under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, a capital felon may be executed prior to an exhausting direct appellate review of the judgment. Therefore, any initial execution date is automatically stayed until after direct appellate review has been exhausted. Once direct appellate review is exhausted and collateral or habeas corpus relief is sought by a capital felon, he or she must file an application with the appropriate court seeking to stay enforcement of the scheduled execution.

1. Seeking a Stay from the United States Supreme Court. A stay of execution is not automatic, pending the filing and consideration of a petition for a writ of certiorari from the United States Supreme Court. Conditions must be met: (1) there must be a reasonable probability that four members of the Court would consider the underlying issue sufficiently meritorious for the grant of certiorari or the notation of probable jurisdiction; (2) there must be a significant possibility of reversal of the lower court's decision; and (3) there must be a likelihood that irreparable harm will result if that decision is not stayed. A stay of execution should first be sought from a federal Court of Appeals. The Supreme Court generally places considerable weight on the decision reached by a federal Court of Appeals.

2. Eleventh-Hour Stay. The fact that a capital felon has unsuccessfully exhausted all avenues of appeal does not automatically mean that he or she will be executed on the appointed day and time for execution. Eleventh-hour (last-minute) stays are not uncommon. Various reasons may trigger an eleventh-hour stay. For example, Alabama death row inmate Robert Lee Tarver had eaten his last meal and was about three hours away from execution on February 14, 2000, when the United States Supreme Court issued a stay of his execution to consider Tarver's challenge to the state's use of the electric chair. (The Supreme Court later decided not to review the matter. Tarver was eventually executed on April 14, 2000.)

Once the eleventh hour approaches, the most crucial factor in the execution process is the operation of the phone lines. It is imperative that split-second communication is possible between the officials in the execution chamber and any potential judge or executive officer that has the authority to halt the execution. The execution protocol that follows is used at the Oregon State Penitentiary for the final twenty-four hours in a capital felon's life.

3. Oregon State Penitentiary Countdown to Execution.

A. Last twenty-four hours. Twenty-four hours prior to execution a medically trained individual prepares and secures the necessary syringes with the lethal solutions, and separately prepares and secures back-up syringes. Secure storage is the responsibility of the assistant superintendent of security.

Penitentiary staff work in concert with the Oregon State Police, the Salem Police and the Marion County Sheriff's office for perimeter security including crowd control, traffic control and penitentiary access. Inmate visiting may be limited or suspended the day before and after an execution.

A media center is set up on penitentiary grounds to accommodate the needs of the media. Only media who have arranged for credentials prior to the execution are admitted to the media center.

The inmate's last meal is personally prepared and served about 6 P.M. by a staff member assigned by the food services manager.

An emergency command center is established in the superintendent's office to manage institutional affairs during the hours preceding and immediately following an execution. The assistant superintendent of Program Services is assigned to manage the command center.

The emergency telephone lines in the Execution Room are checked at 6 P.M. and again at 9 P.M. At 9:30 P.M. they are tested every half-hour until 11:30 P.M. The command center will establish radio contact with the officer-in-charge of the IMU to ensure that messages can be conveyed in the event that institutional or emergency telephone lines become inoperable.

All witnesses and designated media representatives gather in pre-arranged locations at approximately 10 P.M. They remain under staff supervision while on penitentiary grounds. Prior to being escorted to the IMU they are briefed by staff about procedures and what to expect; they are also visited by a counselor who offers information on the psychological effects of witnessing an execution. Security procedures require witnesses to pass through one or more metal detectors. Witnesses may not carry recording devices once they assemble on penitentiary grounds. The only hand-carried items allowed within the penitentiary are note pads and pens or pencils issued by the department.

B. The final minutes. At 11:30 P.M. the assistant superintendent, Security, confirms that the clock used to determine the time to carry out the execution is accurate. The superintendent accompanies the executioner(s) to the execution room and ensures that the confidentiality of the executioner is not compromised.

Once restraints have been applied to the inmate, the Special Security Team leader instructs the officer supervising the execution room cell to open the cell door. The leader supervises the activities of the Special Security Team members, who escort the inmate in security restraints from the cell and position and properly restrain the inmate on the table. There are no visits once the inmate has been moved to the execution room.

Medically trained individuals connect a heart monitor to the inmate which helps determine when death has occurred. They also insert two intravenous catheters — one primary and one back-up — in the most appropriate locations on the inmate's body, usually the arms and/or hands.

Following insertion of the intravenous catheters the witnesses are escorted to the witness area. Two correctional captains are stationed in the witness area to assist witnesses and maintain decorum. If at any point in the execution process a stay of execution is ordered, the superintendent shall halt all execution procedures and the witnesses shall be removed.

C. The execution. Immediately prior to execution, the assistant superintendent, Security, inspects all straps, and with the assistance of medically trained staff, makes a final inspection of the intravenous catheters and the injection equipment. Upon authorization from the superintendent the window coverings are lifted so the witnesses can see the inmate in position on the table. The table is designed to slightly elevate the inmate's head so witnesses have full view of the actual execution.

The execution chamber phones at San Quentin State Prison. (California Department of Corrections)

If no stay of execution has been received via the open phone lines to the governor and the attorney general, as soon after midnight as possible, the superintendent signals the executioner to begin injection of lethal solutions into the injection port of the intravenous catheters. As prescribed by [statute], the lethal solutions include an ultra-short acting barbiturate in combination with a chemical paralytic agent and potassium chloride or other equally effective substances sufficient to cause death.

The executioner signals the superintendent when infusion of the lethal substances has been completed. Once death occurs, the time is noted. The superintendent summons a medical professional to officially certify the inmate's death. The superintendent announces the time of death to the witnesses. The time of death is conveyed via telephone to the communications manager who announces it to the media assembled in the media center.

After the witnesses leave the execution area, they are joined by the superintendent who conveys the inmate's last words. Media witnesses are escorted to the media center to share their experiences and impressions with their colleagues as prearranged. Other witnesses are escorted off of penitentiary grounds.

The assistant superintendent, Security, will remain to supervise the removal of the body. The body is released to a funeral home after the body is properly identified using identification photographs for comparison. The State Police are notified when the execution is complete and the body is ready for removal.

The inmate's predesignated contact person will be notified to contact the funeral home to which the inmate's body was taken. This contact person will also receive the inmate's personal property and any amount of money in the inmate's trust account, after deducting any expenses incurred by the department and related to the death of the inmate.

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution permits the jury to determine whether a confession was voluntary.

Case Holding: The Constitution permits the jury to determine whether a confession was voluntary, as this issue is one that States are free to determine.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved the prosecution of three defendants, Stein, Wissner and Calman, for capital murder by the State of New York. Two of the defendants gave confessions, which, over the objections of the defendants, were introduced to the jury. Under the procedure used by New York, the jury determined whether a confession was voluntary. The jury returned verdicts of guilty and the defendants were sentenced to death. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider whether it was constitutionally permissible for the jury to determine whether a confession was voluntary.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Jackson: Justice Jackson ruled that the Constitution did not require the trial court, rather than the jury, determine whether a confession was voluntary. The opinion addressed the matter as follows:

An attack on the fairness of New York procedure is that [the defendants] could not take the witness stand to support, with their own oaths, the charges their counsel made against the state police without becoming subject to general cross-examination....

It is not impossible that cross-examination could be employed so as to work a denial of due process. But no basis is laid for such a contention here. Appellate courts leave an exceptional discretion to trial courts to prevent abuse and injustice. But here the defendants took no step which would call for or permit an exercise of such discretion. They made no request for a ruling by the trial court and made no offer or suggestion of readiness to testify, however restricted the cross-examination might be. We do not know whether, or how far, the court would have permitted any line of cross-examination, nor what specific limitation defendants would have claimed. We will not adjudge a trial court guilty of constructive abuse by imputing to it a ruling that never was made on a proposition that never was put to it....

In trial of a coercion issue, as of every other issue, when the prosecution has made a case to go to the jury, an accused must choose between the disadvantage from silence and that from testifying. The Constitution safeguards the right of a defendant to remain silent; it does not assure him that he may remain silent and still enjoy the advantages that might have resulted from testifying. We cannot say that [the defendants] have been denied a fair hearing of the coercion charge....

The Fourteenth Amendment does not forbid jury trial of the issue. The states are free to allocate functions as between judge and jury as they see fit.

The judgment of the New York Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Black: Justice Black dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the Court's decision had narrowed the protection afforded by the constitutional right not to be a witness against oneself. Justice Black believed the procedure utilized by New York posed an unacceptable choice to defendants: testify on involuntariness of a confession and be subject to cross-examination or refrain from testifying and thereby leave the prosecutor's evidence on voluntariness of the confession unchallenged. This choice, contended Justice Black, was unconstitutional.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's decision. He was concerned that the confessions were in fact involuntary, though the jury found them voluntary. He wrote that "the Court now holds that a criminal conviction sustained by the highest court of a State, and more especially one involving a sentence of death, is not to be reversed for a new trial, even though there entered into the conviction a coerced confession which in and of itself disregards the prohibition of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Douglas, in Which Black, J., Joined: Justice Douglas dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that permitting the jury to determine the voluntariness of a confession compelled defendants to testify against themselves. Justice Douglas argued that the procedure should be struck down as violating due process of law.

Case Note: The decision in the case was not long-lived, as the Court eventually ruled that the Constitution did not permit the jury to determine whether a confession was voluntary. See also Jackson v. Denno Issue Presented: Whether the defendant could appeal from a federal district court directly to the United States Supreme Court.

Case Holding: The defendant could not appeal from a federal district court directly to the United States Supreme Court because Congress established federal Courts of Appeals for the purpose of hearing direct appeals from district courts.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Stephan, was convicted of treason and sentenced to death by the United States. The judgment was affirmed by a federal Court of Appeals. The United States Supreme Court denied appellate review. The defendant thereafter filed a direct appeal with the United States Supreme Court, contending that an 1889 federal statute permitted a direct appeal.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion held that the defendant could not appeal directly from a federal district court to the Supreme Court. It was said that the 1889 statute relied upon by the defendant no longer reflected the procedure for bringing an appeal to the Court. The opinion indicated that "[t]he fact that the words of [the 1889 statute] have lingered on in the successive editions of the United States Code is immaterial." The opinion noted that the statute referenced was enforced before Congress created federal Courts of Appeal. The defendant's application for appeal was denied.

Stevens, John Paul John Paul Stevens was appointed as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1975. While on the Supreme Court, Stevens has displayed a judicial philosophy that straddles between moderate and liberal.

Stevens was born in Chicago, Illinois, on April 20, 1920. He was a 1941 graduate of Chicago University. In 1947, Stevens received a law degree from Northwestern University School of Law. Stevens developed a successful law practice before being nominated in 1970 as an appellate judge on the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. In 1975, President Gerald Ford appointed Stevens to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Stevens has authored a considerable number of capital punishment opinions. In general, Stevens's capital punishment opinions have reflected an honest effort to assure that the merits of an issue dictate the constitutional outcome of his opinions, either for the Court or otherwise. Unlike many of his contemporaries on the bench, Stevens has shown tremendous discipline in separating personal beliefs and public opinion from the individual fairness that must be brought to every case. Commentators have praised his rare ability to consistently interpret the Constitution on the merits of the issues and not on other immaterial and extraneous factors.

The capital punishment opinion which best illustrates Stevens's quintessential constitutional philosophy is Lankford v. Idaho. In that case, the defendant was sentenced to death by the trial court, even though the prosecutor had led the defendant to believe that the death penalty would not be sought. The defendant argued to the Supreme Court that he had a constitutional right to notice that the death penalty would be sought. Stevens, writing for the Court, indicated that no special notice of intent to seek the death penalty was required by the Constitution. He wrote that so long as a defendant is made aware of the possibility of the death penalty during arraignment, the Constitution is satisfied. However, Stevens held that the Constitution would not accept circumstances that mislead a defendant into believing that the death penalty will not be sought, only to have such a punishment imposed. In reversing the defendant's death sentence, Stevens wrote: "If notice is not given, and the adversary process is not permitted to function properly, there is an increased chance of error, and with that, the possibility of an incorrect result.... [The defendant's] lack of adequate notice that the judge was contemplating the imposition of the death sentence created an impermissible risk that the adversary process may have malfunctioned in this case."

Stevenson v. United States Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Stevenson v. United States, 162 U.S. 313 (1896); Argued: Not reported; Decided: April 13, 1896; Opinion of the Court: Justice Peckham; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Fred Beall argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Mr. Dickinson argued and briefed; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: None; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: None

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court committed error in refusing to instruct the jury that it could return a verdict of guilty of manslaughter.

Case Holding: The trial court committed error in refusing to instruct the jury that it could return a verdict of guilty of manslaughter because evidence was introduced to make manslaughter a possible sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Stevenson, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that he was denied due process of law because the trial court refused to instruct the jury that it could return a verdict of guilty of manslaughter. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Peckham: Justice Peckham ruled that the trial court improperly refused to instruct the jury that a verdict of manslaughter could be returned if supported by the evidence. The opinion explained the issue as follows:

The evidence as to manslaughter need not be uncontradicted or in any way conclusive upon the question. So long as there is some evidence upon the subject, the proper weight to be given it is for the jury to determine. If there were any evidence which tended to show such a state of facts as might bring the crime within the grade of manslaughter, it then became a proper question for the jury to say whether the evidence were true, and whether it showed that the crime was manslaughter instead of murder. It is difficult to think of a case of killing by shooting, where both men were armed, and both in readiness to shoot, and where both did shoot, in which the question would not arise, for the jury to answer, whether the killing was murder, or manslaughter, or a pure act of self-defense. The evidence might appear to the court to be simply overwhelming to show that the killing was in fact murder, and not manslaughter, or an act performed in self-defense, and yet, so long as there was some evidence relevant to the issue of manslaughter, the credibility and force of such evidence must be for the jury, and cannot be a matter of law for the decision of the court....

The ruling of the learned judge was to the effect that, in this case, the killing was either murder, or else it was done in the course of self-defense, and that under no view which could possibly be taken of the evidence would the jury be at liberty to find the defendant guilty of manslaughter. The court passed upon the strength, credibility, and tendency of the evidence, and decided, as a matter of law, what, it seems to us, would generally be regarded as a question of fact, viz. whether, under all the circumstances which the jury might, from the evidence, find existed in the case, the defendant was guilty of murder, or whether he killed the deceased, not in self-defense, but unlawfully and unjustly, although without malice. The presence or absence of malice would be the material consideration in the case, provided the jury should reject the theory of self-defense; and yet this question of fact is, under the evidence in the case, determined by the trial court as one of law, and against the defendant....

A judge may be entirely satisfied, from the whole evidence in the case, that the person doing the killing was actuated by malice; that he was not in any such passion as to lower the grade of the crime from murder to manslaughter by reason of any absence of malice; and yet, if there be any evidence fairly tending to bear upon the issue of manslaughter, it is the province of the jury to determine from all the evidence what the condition of mind was, and to say whether the crime was murder or manslaughter.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Stewart, Potter Potter Stewart served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1958 to 1981. While on the Supreme Court, Stewart was known as a moderate interpreter of the Constitution.

Stewart was born on January 23, 1915, in Jackson, Michigan. He received educational training at University School, Yale, and Cambridge. Stewart obtained a law degree from Yale Law School in 1941. In 1954, he was appointed as an appellate judge to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals. President Dwight Eisenhower appointed Stewart to the Supreme Court in 1958.

Stewart wrote a number of capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. Stewart's capital punishment decisions reflected the moderate philosophy he brought to the Constitution. For example, he voted with the majority to place a moratorium on capital punishment in Furman v. Georgia. However, Stewart pointed out in his concurring opinion in Furman that he did not believe the Constitution barred capital punishment per se. Stewart argued that the Constitution prohibited imposition of capital punishment in an arbitrary and capricious manner. In Woodson v. North Carolina, writing for the Court, Stewart found North Carolina's mandatory death penalty law offensive to the Constitution. He wrote: "The belief no longer prevails that every offense in a like legal category calls for an identical punishment without regard to the past life and habits of a particular offender." In Witherspoon v. Illinois, again writing for the Court, Stewart struck down a statute which authorized the prosecutor to exclude from the jury, for cause, any venireperson who said that he or she was opposed to capital punishment and who indicated that he or she had conscientious scruples against inflicting the death penalty. Stewart reasoned in Witherspoon: "Whatever else might be said of capital punishment, it is at least clear that its imposition by a hanging jury cannot be squared with the Constitution. The State of Illinois has stacked the deck against the [defendant]. To execute this death sentence would deprive him of his life without due process of law." Stewart died on December 7, 1985.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's incompetency claim under Ford v. Wainwright was brought as a second or successive habeas application under the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, when the district court failed to address the merits of the issue during its resolution of the defendant's initial habeas petition.

Case Holding: The defendant's incompetency claim under Ford

v. Wainwright was not a second or successive habeas application under the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act because the district court failed to address the merits of the issue during its resolution of the defendant's initial habeas petition.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ramon Martinez-Villareal, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Arizona. The Arizona Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence on direct appeal. The defendant's habeas corpus petition in State court was unsuccessful. He filed three federal habeas petitions that were denied on the ground that he did not exhaust his state remedies. The defendant filed a fourth federal habeas petition alleging that he was insane and could not be executed under the United States Supreme Court decision in Ford v. Wainwright. The federal district court rejected the claim as premature because an execution date had not been given in the case. However, the district court reached the merits of another issue raised in the petition and vacated the death sentence. A federal Court of Appeals reversed the ruling by the district court and reinstated the death sentence.

On remand to the district court, the defendant sought to reopen his Ford claim. While the district court was considering whether to allow the defendant to reopen the Ford claim, Arizona issued a death warrant setting the date of his execution. The district court ultimately ruled that under Congress's recently enacted Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDP Act), it lacked jurisdiction to reopen the Ford claim because it was a "successive" habeas application. Under the AEDP Act, federal district courts were barred from entertaining successive habeas applications unless a defendant obtained permission from a federal Court of Appeals. The defendant asked a Court of Appeals for permission to have the district court review the merits of the Ford claim. The Court of Appeals ruled that the Ford claim did not constitute a successive application for habeas relief; therefore, the defendant did not need its permission to have the issue addressed by the district court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice held that the defendant's Ford claim was not a second or successive petition under the AEDP Act. It was said that the fact that this was the second time that the defendant asked the district court to provide relief on his Ford claim did not mean that there were two separate applications for habeas relief. The chief justice indicated that there was only one application for habeas relief and the district court should have ruled on the merits of each claim presented in the application when it became ripe. The opinion found that since the defendant was entitled to an adjudication of all the claims presented in his earlier petition, the Court of Appeals correctly held that he was not required to get authorization to have the Ford claim heard. The chief justice also wrote that the initial three habeas corpus petitions filed by the defendant were inconsequential because they were dismissed on procedural grounds that did not involve the merits of the claims alleged. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed and the case remanded for a hearing on the merits of the defendant's Ford claim in the district court.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that, because Arizona thoroughly examined the defendant and concluded he was competent to be executed, he should not be permitted to challenge that determination in federal court.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas, in Which Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Thomas dissented from the Court's decision on the grounds that the defendant's Ford claim was a second or successive claim under the AEDP Act. He reasoned that the district court's failure to address the Ford claim initially was though no fault of the district court; the claim was simply premature insofar as no execution date had been set. Justice Thomas believed that once the execution date was established, a new, second, or successive habeas proceeding was instituted and controlled by the AEDP Act. He wrote: "Because this filing was a 'second or successive habeas corpus application,' [the defendant's] Ford claim should have been dismissed." See also Felker v. Turpin; Habeas Corpus Issue Presented: Whether imposition of the death penalty under the procedures used by Massachusetts violated the Constitution.

Case Holding: Imposition of the death penalty under the procedures used by Massachusetts violated the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Stewart, was convicted of a capital offense by the State of Massachusetts and sentenced to death. The conviction and sentence were upheld by the Massachusetts Supreme Court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider whether imposition of capital punishment under the State's laws violated the Constitution.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion was one paragraph which held that, in light of Furman v. Georgia, the defendant's death sentence violated the Constitution.

Case Note: Subsequent to the decision in the case, Massachusetts enacted a new death penalty statute. However, in 1984, the Massachusetts Supreme Court found the new death penalty statute was unconstitutional. As a result of the State's appellate court's decision, Massachusetts does not impose capital punishment.

Additionally, the case was one of three opinions issued by the Court, on the same day, invalidating death penalty statutes. See also Moore v. Illinois; Furman v. Georgia Issue Presented: Whether the State court addressed the merits of the defendant's penalty-phase, ineffective-assistance-of-counsel claim when it denied relief for failing to raise the issue in a prior habeas corpus proceeding.

Case Holding: The State court did not address the merits of the defendant's penalty-phase ineffective-assistance-of-counsel claim when it denied relief for failing to raise the issue in a prior habeas corpus proceeding.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robert D. Smith, was convicted of murder by the State of Arizona in 1982 and sentenced to death. Smith's conviction and sentence were affirmed on direct appeal. Thereafter, Smith filed two State habeas corpus petitions which raised several issues. Both petitions were denied. Smith filed a third State habeas petition in which he alleged, for the first time, that he had ineffective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase because his attorney failed to present evidence that he was mentally retarded. The State court denied the petition on the grounds that the issue was waived because it was not presented in a prior habeas petition, as required by a State rule. Smith thereafter filed a federal habeas petition, wherein he again raised the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase. A federal district judge denied the petition on the grounds that the issue was waived under State law and no federal question was decided in the State court's ruling. A federal Court of Appeals reversed. The Court of Appeals found that the State court addressed the merits of the claim, which involved a federal question; therefore, the claim could be presented in federal court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court found that the State court did not address the merits of Smith's ineffective assistance of counsel claim; therefore, the State court did not reach the federal question that was part of the claim. The opinion stated the matter as follows:

The state court did not even reach the merits of [Smith's] ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim, finding it waived because [Smith] had failed to raise it in prior petitions for postconviction relief. As an excuse, [Smith] asserted that his prior [appellate counsels], who were members of the Arizona Public Defender's office, had refused to file the claim because his trial counsel was also a member of the Public Defender's office. The state court did not find this excuse sufficient to overcome [Smith's] procedural default. The state court explained that, because deputies in the Public Defender's office represent their clients and not their office, [Smith's] appellate lawyers would never have allowed "a colorable claim for ineffective assistance of counsel" to go un-stated. The [Court of Appeals] read the reference to a "colorable claim" as a conclusion that [Smith's] claim that his trial counsel had rendered ineffective assistance lacked merit, that is, as a comment on the merits of [Smith's] underlying claim. In context, however, it is clear that the reference to "colorable claim" was used only as a rhetorical device for emphasizing the lack of any conflict of interest that might excuse [Smith's] waiver.

The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the decision of the federal district court denying relief was reinstated. See also Schiro v. Smith

Issue Presented: Whether it was constitutional error for the trial court to deny the defendant's request for a mistrial after the prosecutor informed the jury the defendant did not testify at his first two trials.

Case Holding: It was constitutional error for the trial court to deny the defendant's request for a mistrial after the prosecutor informed the jury the defendant did not testify at his first two trials.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Willie Stewart, was prosecuted three times for the same capital murder by the District of Columbia. The defendant was sentenced to death on each of the first two convictions, but the convictions were reversed because of trial errors. During the first two trials, the defendant's defense was insanity and he did not testify. The defendant decided to testify at his third trial, though he still relied on the defense of insanity. During the third trial, on cross-examination, the prosecutor alluded to the two earlier trials by asking the defendant, "This is the first time you have gone on the stand, isn't it, Willie?" Defense counsel immediately requested a mistrial on the ground that it was prejudicial to inform the jury of the defendant's failure to take the stand in his previous trials. The trial judge denied the request. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the prosecutor's question violated his Fifth Amendment right not to be a witness against himself. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black held that the prosecutor's question was prejudicial and the trial court should have granted a mistrial. It was said that the Fifth Amendment provides in unequivocal terms that no person may "be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." Justice Black indicated that part of the protection of the Fifth Amendment is that the failure of a defendant to testify in his or her own defense does not create any presumption against the defendant. If a defendant chooses not to testify, no comment or argument about his or her failure to testify is permitted.

The opinion reasoned that the jury's awareness of the defendant's failure to testify at his first two trials could have affected its deliberations. Justice Black stated that "the jury might well have thought it likely that [the defendant] elected to feign this 'testimony' out of desperation brought on by his failure to gain acquittal without it in the two previous trials." The opinion concluded: "[W]e agree with the point made by the Government in its brief—that it is regrettable when the concurrent findings of 36 jurors are not sufficient finally to terminate a case. But under our system, a man is entitled to the findings of 12 jurors on evidence fairly and properly presented to them. Petitioner may not be deprived of his life until that right is accorded him. That right was denied here by the prosecutor's improper questions." The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Harlan and Whittaker, JJ., Joined: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the error caused by the prosecutor's question did not have any meaningful impact on the outcome of the trial. Justice Frankfurter wrote: "Stewart never intelligibly answered the questions. The jury was not told and did not know as a fact that he had not previously taken the stand. The Court now finds that the jury may nevertheless have inferred the information from the leading form of the prosecutor's questions. But this conclusion should not be reached merely on the basis of the broad generalization that 'such an inference will in all likelihood be drawn from leading questions of this kind.' Such an abstraction does not get us to the heart of the question before us. That question, in one aspect, is whether it is likely that this jury in the circumstances of this case drew the inference from this leading question. It is not only not likely, but overwhelmingly unlikely."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Clark, in Which Whittaker, J., Joined: Justice Clark dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the prosecutor's question was a nonexistent factor for the jury. Justice Clark stated his position as follows: "[A]s I read the Government's brief, it conceded only that the question asked Willie 'was of but negligible importance to the government's case.' The sole issue, it said, was whether the question was prejudicial.... [The Government's] position was that one could not assume, as the Court does, that 'the jury noted and focused attention on a question given so little emphasis that it was overlooked by the trial judge.' I add that in the light of the long trial, the uncontradicted evidence as to Willie's malingering and the fact that the question was never mentioned again during the remaining three days of the trial, the jury did not need, nor as a matter of relevancy was it able, to go through the mental gymnastics the Court supposes." Stone, Harlan F. Harlan F. Stone served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1925 to 1941; he served as chief justice of the Supreme Court from 1941 to 1946. While on the Supreme Court, Stone's judicial philosophy floated between moderate and liberal in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Stone was born in Chesterfield, New Hampshire, on October 11, 1872. He received an undergraduate degree from Amherst College in 1894 and a law degree from Columbia Law School in 1898. In addition to being a successful attorney, Stone served as dean of Columbia Law School and as United States Attorney General. In 1925, President Calvin Coolidge nominated Stone to the Supreme Court. In 1941, President Franklin D. Roosevelt nominated Stone as chief justice.

While on the Supreme Court, Stone wrote only a few capital punishment opinions. The most important capital punishment opinion authored by Stone was handed down in Ex Parte Quirin. That case involved the prosecution of eight German soldiers for spying in the United States. The issue presented to the Court was whether the detention and prosecution of the defendants as spies by a military commission, appointed by order of the president, was in conformity with the laws and Constitution of the United States. Stone upheld the prosecution of the defendants by a military commission. He wrote: "The spy who secretly and without uniform passes the military lines of a belligerent in time of war, seeking to gather military information and communicate it to the enemy, or an enemy combatant who without uniform comes secretly through the lines for the purpose of waging war by destruction of life or property, are familiar examples of belligerents who are generally deemed not to be entitled to the status of prisoners of war, but to be offenders against the law of war subject to trial and punishment by military tribunals." Stone died on April 22, 1946.

Issue Presented: Whether prosecution of the defendant for capital murder violated a treaty between the United States and Italy.

Case Holding: Prosecution of the defendant for capital murder did not violate a treaty between the United States and Italy, insofar as the treaty required equality of treatment of Italian citizens living in the United States.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Luigi Storti, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Massachusetts. The Massachusetts Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The defendant thereafter filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that he was a citizen of Italy and a subject of its king. The defendant further alleged that his detention was contrary to a treaty between the United States and the king of Italy. The district court dismissed the petition and denied relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer held that the judgment against the defendant was not in violation of the treaty between the United States and Italy. In disposing of the issue, Justice Brewer wrote: "It is averred that the proceedings in the Massachusetts courts are in conflict with the rights secured by the treaty between Italy and the United States, but the articles of the treaty referred to only require equality of treatment and that the same rights and privileges be accorded to a citizen of Italy that are given to a citizen of the United States under like circumstances, and there is nothing in the petition tending to show a lack of such equality of treatment. The petition, therefore, is plainly without merit." The judgment of the district court was affirmed.

Story, Joseph Joseph Story served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1811 to 1845. While on the Supreme Court, Story was known as a moderate interpreter of the Constitution.

Story was born in Marblehead, Massachusetts, on September 18, 1779. He was a graduate of Harvard University in 1789. Story studied the law privately and established a law practice in 1801. His career included an author of influential treatises on the law, bank president, member of Congress, and member of the Massachusetts legislature. President James Madison appointed Story to the Supreme Court in 1801.

Story was known to have authored only one capital punishment opinion while on the Supreme Court (some early decisions by the Court did not disclose the actual sentence defendants received). In United States v. Smith, the Court was asked to decide whether the defendant could be punished with death for plundering a ship. Story, writing for the majority, interpreted the Federal Piracy Act as providing for capital punishment for plundering a ship. He reached the decision even though the language of the Piracy Act was vague in its definition. Story grafted principles from the law of nations onto the Piracy Act in order to sustain the judgment against the defendant.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's capital prosecution under the laws of Virginia should have been removed to a federal court.

Case Holding: The defendant's capital prosecution under the laws of West Virginia should have been removed to a federal court because the defendant established that the State's jury statute systematically excluded blacks from serving on grand and petit juries.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Strauder, convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of West Virginia. The West Virginia Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that his case should have been removed for prosecution in a federal court because blacks were systematically excluded from serving on grand and petit juries in the State. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Strong: Justice Strong held that the defendant's trial should have been removed to a federal court. The opinion pointed out "[t]he right to a trial by jury is guaranteed to every citizen of West Virginia by the Constitution of that State." However, Justice Story found that the jury statute of the State discriminated against blacks and barred their participation in grand and petit juries. In addressing the federal removal statute, the opinion stated:

But there is express authority to protect the rights and immunities referred to in the Fourteenth Amendment, and to enforce observance of them by appropriate congressional legislation. And one very efficient and appropriate mode of extending such protection and securing to a party the enjoyment of the right or immunity, is a law providing for the removal of his case from a State court, in which the right is denied by the State law, into a Federal court, where it will be upheld.

We have heretofore considered and affirmed the constitutional power of Congress to authorize the removal from State courts into the circuit courts of the United States, before trial, of criminal prosecutions for alleged offenses against the laws of the State, when the defense presents a Federal question, or when a right under the Federal Constitution or laws is involved.

Justice Story concluded that the defendant "made a case for removal into the Federal Circuit Court." The judgment of the West Virginia Supreme Court was reversed.

Issue Presented: Determining the proper standards for judging a criminal defendant's contention that the Constitution requires a capital conviction or death sentence to be set aside because defense counsel's assistance at the trial or sentencing was ineffective.

Case Holding: A convicted defendant's claim that defense counsel's assistance was so defective as to require reversal of a capital conviction or setting aside of a death sentence, requires that the defendant show (1) that defense counsel's performance was deficient and (2) that the deficient performance prejudiced the defense so as to deprive the defendant of a fair trial or sentencing. Failure to make the required showing of either deficient performance or sufficient prejudice defeats the ineffectiveness claim.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Washington, pled guilty in a Florida trial court to an indictment that included three capital murder charges. In preparing for the penalty phase hearing, defense counsel spoke with the defendant about his background, but did not seek out character witnesses or request a psychiatric examination. Defense counsel's decision not to present evidence concerning the defendant's character and emotional state was a strategic decision aimed at preventing the prosecutor from cross-examining the defendant and from presenting psychiatric evidence of its own. Defense counsel did not request a pre-sentence report because it would have included the criminal history and thereby would have undermined a claim of no significant prior criminal record. At the conclusion of the penalty phase proceeding, the trial judge sentenced the defendant to death on each of the murder counts. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed.

The defendant then sought collateral relief in state court on the ground that defense counsel had rendered ineffective assistance at the sentencing proceeding. The trial court denied relief and the Florida Supreme Court affirmed.

Next, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. After an evidentiary hearing, the district court denied relief. The district court concluded that although defense counsel made errors in judgment in failing to investigate mitigating evidence further than he did, no prejudice to the defendant's sentence resulted from any such error in judgment. A federal Court of Appeals ultimately reversed, stating that the Sixth Amendment accorded criminal defendants a right to counsel rendering reasonably effective assistance. The Court of Appeals outlined standards for judging whether a defense counsel fulfilled the duty to investigate mitigating circumstances and whether counsel's errors were sufficiently prejudicial to justify reversal. The Court of Appeals remanded the case for application of the standards by the district court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor wrote that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel embodies the right to effective assistance of counsel. It was said that the benchmark for judging any claim of ineffectiveness must be whether defense counsel's conduct so undermined the proper functioning of the adversarial process that the trial cannot be relied on as having produced a just result. Justice O'Connor indicated that this principle applied to a capital sentencing proceeding.

The opinion held that a convicted defendant's claim that defense counsel's assistance was so defective as to require reversal of a capital conviction or setting aside of a death sentence requires that the defendant show (1) that defense counsel's performance was deficient and (2) that the deficient performance prejudiced the defense so as to deprive the defendant of a fair trial or sentencing. Failure to make the required showing of either deficient performance or sufficient prejudice defeats the ineffectiveness claim.

Justice O'Connor explained the components of the test for ineffective assistance of counsel. The proper standard for judging attorney performance is that of reasonably effective assistance, considering all the circumstances. When a convicted defendant complains of the ineffectiveness of defense counsel's assistance, the defendant must show that defense counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. The opinion indicated that judicial scrutiny of defense counsel's performance must be highly deferential and a fair assessment of attorney performance requires that every effort be made to eliminate the distorting effects of hindsight, to reconstruct the circumstances of defense counsel's challenged conduct, and to evaluate the conduct from defense counsel's perspective at the time. A court must indulge a strong presumption that defense counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance.

With regard to the required showing of prejudice, Justice O'Connor wrote that the proper standard requires the defendant to show that there is a reasonable probability that, but for defense counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different. It was said that a reasonable probability was a probability that was sufficient to undercut confidence in the outcome of the proceeding.

Applying the test to the case, Justice O'Connor ruled that the facts of the case made it clear that defense counsel's conduct at and before the defendant's sentencing proceeding could not be found unreasonable. The opinion added that, even assuming defense counsel's conduct was unreasonable, the defendant suffered insufficient prejudice to warrant setting aside his death sentence. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan dissented from the Court's judgment by stating: "Adhering to my view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, I would vacate [the defendant's] death sentence and remand the case for further proceedings." However, he concurred with the Court's opinion. He indicated his reasons for concurring in the Court's opinion as follows:

I join the Court's opinion because I believe that the standards it sets out today will both provide helpful guidance to courts considering claims of actual ineffectiveness of counsel and also permit those courts to continue their efforts to achieve progressive development of this area of the law. Like all federal courts and most state courts that have previously addressed the matter, the Court concludes that "the proper standard for attorney performance is that of reasonably effective assistance." And, rejecting the strict "outcome-determinative" test employed by some courts, the Court adopts as the appropriate standard for prejudice a requirement that the defendant "show that there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different," defining a "reasonable probability" as "a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome." I believe these standards are sufficiently precise to permit meaningful distinctions between those attorney derelictions that deprive defendants of their constitutional rights and those that do not; at the same time, the standards are sufficiently flexible to accommodate the wide variety of situations giving rise to claims of this kind.

With respect to the performance standard, I agree with the Court's conclusion that a "particular set of detailed rules for counsel's conduct" would be inappropriate. Precisely because the standard of "reasonably effective assistance" adopted today requires that counsel's performance be measured in light of the particular circumstances of the case, I do not believe our decision "will stunt the development of constitutional doctrine in this area." Indeed, the Court's suggestion that today's decision is largely consistent with the approach taken by the lower courts, simply indicates that those courts may continue to develop governing principles on a case-by-case basis in the common-law tradition, as they have in the past. Similarly, the prejudice standard announced today does not erect an insurmountable obstacle to meritorious claims, but rather simply requires courts carefully to examine trial records in light of both the nature and seriousness of counsel's errors and their effect in the particular circumstances of the case.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall dissented from the Court's judgment and opinion. He believed that the test created by the Court would cause more problems than it would resolve. On this issue he wrote: "The state and lower federal courts have developed standards for distinguishing effective from inadequate assistance. Today, for the first time, this Court attempts to synthesize and clarify those standards. For the most part, the majority's efforts are unhelpful. Neither of its two principal holdings seems to me likely to improve the adjudication of Sixth Amendment claims.... Most importantly, the majority fails to take adequate account of the fact that the focus of this case is a capital sentencing proceeding."

In his dissent, Justice Marshall contended that the defendant had established ineffective assistance of counsel. He wrote: "If counsel had investigated the availability of mitigating evidence, he might well have decided to present some such material at the hearing. If he had done so, there is a significant chance that [the defendant] would have been given a life sentence. In my view, those possibilities, conjoined with the unreasonableness of counsel's failure to investigate, are more than sufficient to establish a violation of the Sixth Amendment and to entitle [the defendant] to a new sentencing proceeding.”

Case Note: The decision in the case was extremely important because it constitutionalized the standard courts use to determine the performance of defense counsel in criminal litigation generally. The test developed in the opinion has been criticized to some degree, on the grounds that it incorrectly placed the burden on defendants to establish actual prejudice, once they have established deficient performance by counsel. Critics contend that once deficient performance is established, relief should be granted or, alternatively, the prosecutor should have the burden of showing no prejudice resulted from the deficient performance. See also Burger v. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was prejudiced by the prosecutor’s failure to reveal evidence that the defendant could have used to impeach the prosecutor’s star witness against him.

Case Holding: The defendant was not prejudiced by the prosecutor’s failure to reveal evidence that the defendant could have used to impeach the prosecutor’s star witness against him.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas Strickler, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Virginia. The Virginia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. Subsequent to the appellate court’s decision, the defendant learned that the prosecutor withheld evidence that would have impeached much of the testimony of the prosecutor’s primary witness. The defendant unsuccessfully sought State habeas corpus relief on the grounds that his constitutional rights, articulated by the United States Supreme Court in Brady v. Maryland, were violated because the prosecutor failed to disclose exculpatory and critical impeachment evidence.

The defendant then filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The district court granted relief after finding the prosecutor violated Brady by withholding the evidence. A Court of Appeals reversed the district court for two reasons: the defendant waived the right to raise the issue because it was not brought out at his trial; and any error was harmless. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens held that although the defendant demonstrated good cause for failing to raise his Brady claim in a timely manner, the State of Virginia did not violate Brady by failing to disclose the exculpatory evidence.

The opinion observed that there are three essential components of a Brady violation: (1) the evidence at issue must be favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory, or because it is impeaching; (2) the evidence must have been suppressed by the prosecutor, either willfully or inadvertently; and (3) prejudice must have ensued. Justice Stevens found that the record in the case established the first two components of a Brady claim. It was said that the third component, establishing prejudice, was not shown by the record. Justice Stevens wrote that in order to obtain relief, the defendant had to convince the Court that there was a reasonable probability that his conviction or sentence would have been different had the suppressed evidence been disclosed to him. It was pointed out that the issue was not whether the defendant would more likely than not have received a different verdict with the suppressed evidence, but whether in its absence he received a fair trial, understood as a trial resulting in a verdict worthy of confidence. The opinion found that other evidence in the record provided strong support for the conclusion that the defendant would have been convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death, even if the prosecutor’s key witness had been severely impeached or the witness’s testimony was excluded entirely. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Kennedy, J., Joined: Justice Souter filed an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part. He stated his position as follows: “I look at this case much as the Court does, ... that Strickler has shown cause to excuse the procedural default of his Brady claim. Like the Court, I think it clear that the materials withheld were exculpatory as devastating ammunition for impeaching [the prosecutor’s star witness]. Even on the question of prejudice or materiality, over which I ultimately part company with the majority, I am persuaded that Strickler has failed to establish a reasonable probability that, had the materials withheld been disclosed, he would not have been found guilty of capital murder. As the Court says, however, the prejudice enquiry does not stop at the conviction but goes to each step of the sentencing process: the jury’s consideration of aggravating, death-qualifying facts, the jury’s discretionary recommendation of a death sentence if it finds the requisite aggravating factors, and the judge’s discretionary decision to follow the jury’s recommendation. It is with respect to the penultimate step in determining the sentence that I think Strickler has carried his burden. I believe there is a reasonable probability (which I take to mean a significant possibility) that disclosure of the [suppressed] materials would have led the jury to recommend life, not death, and I respectfully dissent.”

Case Note: Four days after the Court’s decision was decided, Virginia executed Thomas Strickler by lethal injection on July 21, 1999. See also Brady v. Maryland; Exculpatory Evidence; Kyles v. Whitley Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was precluded from relying on the decision in Maynard v. Cartwright because the decision announced a new rule after the defendant’s conviction became final.

Case Holding: The defendant was not precluded from relying on the decision in Maynard v. Cartwright because the decision did not announce a new rule.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, James R. Stringer, was convicted of capital murder by a Mississippi jury. During the penalty phase, the jury found that there were three statutory aggravating factors. These included the “especially heinous, atrocious or cruel” aggravator. The defendant was sentenced to death. The Mississippi Supreme Court, on direct review, affirmed the conviction and sentence.

After the defendant exhausted State post-conviction relief without success, he filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that the “especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel” aggravator was so vague as to render his death sentence arbitrary and in violation of the United States Supreme Court decision in Maynard v. Cartwright. The district court denied relief. A federal Court of Appeals ultimately affirmed, after holding that the defendant was not entitled to rely on Maynard in his habeas corpus proceeding because that decision was issued after his sentence became final and announced a new rule. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy held that, in a federal habeas corpus proceeding, a defendant whose death sentence became final before Maynard was decided was not foreclosed from relying on that case. The opinion indicated that when a defendant seeks federal habeas relief based on a principle announced after his or her conviction became final, a federal court must determine whether the decision in question announced a new rule, i.e., was not dictated by precedent existing when the judgment became final. If the answer is yes and neither of two exceptions apply, the decision is not available to the defendant.

The Court ruled that Maynard did not announce a new rule. Justice Kennedy stated that Maynard's invalidation of Oklahoma's “especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel” aggravating circumstance was based upon another decision by the Court which had invalidated Georgia's statutory aggravating circumstance of “outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible and inhuman” as vague and imprecise. Consequently, the opinion found that the defendant was not foreclosed from relying on Maynard to attack the validity of Mississippi's “especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel” aggravator. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Scalia and Thomas, JJ., Joined: Justice Souter dissented from the majority's decision. He argued that Maynard did announce a new rule when it invalidated Oklahoma's “especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel” aggravator as vague. Justice Souter contended that because Maynard announced a new rule after the defendant's conviction became final, he was not entitled to rely upon it to challenge his death sentence. See also Heinous, Atrocious, Cruel, or Depraved Aggravator; *Lewis v. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied due process as a result of his confession, interrogation without counsel, pre-trial publicity, and waiver of jury determination on the issue of his sanity.

Case Holding: The defendant was not denied due process as a result of his confession, interrogation without counsel, pre-trial publicity, and waiver of jury determination on the issue of his sanity.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Stroble, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. On appeal to the California Supreme Court, the defendant argued that his conviction violated the Due Process Clause of the federal Constitution because of the following: (1) his confession was coerced; (2) he did not have counsel present during interrogation by the prosecutor; (3) a fair trial was impossible because of inflammatory newspaper reports inspired by the prosecutor; and (4) he was deprived of counsel in the course of his sanity hearing. The State's appellate court rejected the contentions and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clark: Justice Clark ruled that the burden of showing essential unfairness in a State court trial is upon the defendant. It was said that a defendant's burden was not established through speculation, but must be shown “as a demonstrable reality.” In addressing the defendant's involuntary confession allegation, Justice Clark held that if the confession which the defendant made shortly after his arrest was in fact involuntary, the conviction could not stand, even though the evidence apart from that confession might have been sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict. When the question on review of a State court conviction is whether there has been a violation of the Due Process Clause by the introduction of an involuntary confession, the Court must make an independent determination on the undisputed facts. It was then concluded that in the light of all the circumstances of the case, the Court could not say that the defendant's confession was the result of coercion, either physical or psychological. The Court rejected the defendant's contention that the delay in taking him to a magistrate, after his warrantless arrest, showed that his confession was coerced.

The opinion next addressed the defendant's claim of denial of counsel during interrogation by the prosecutor. Justice Clark held that, based upon the record in the case, there was no showing of prejudice resulting from the refusal of the prosecutor to allow defense counsel to speak with the defendant during the interrogation. It was said that defense counsel came to the prosecutor's office at the request of the defendant's son-in-law merely to inquire of the defendant as to his guilt. Justice Clark indicated that at no point did the defendant himself ask for counsel. The opinion reasoned that, in light of these facts, the prosecutor's refusal to interrupt the interrogation of the defendant so that defense counsel could make inquiry for the defendant's son-in-law did not constitute a deprivation of due process. Justice Clark noted that while prosecutors should always honor a request of defense counsel for an interview with a client, upon the record, in the case there was no showing of prejudice.

Justice Clark rejected the defendant's claim that pre-trial publicity engendered by the prosecutor deprived him of a fair trial. It was reasoned that newspaper accounts of his arrest and confession were not so inflammatory as to make a fair trial impossible, even though a period of only six weeks intervened between the day of his arrest and confession and the beginning of his trial. The opinion also rejected the defendant's claim of denial of counsel during his sanity hearing. Justice Clark found that the defendant had counsel when he knowingly waived the right to trial by jury on the issue of insanity. The judgment of the California Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the defendant was denied a fair trial as a result of pre-trial publicity. Justice Frankfurter addressed this issue as follows:

One of the [defendant's] grounds for attacking his conviction is that the trial lacked fundamental fairness because the district attorney himself initiated the intrusion of the press into the process of the trial. Such misconduct, the [defendant] contends, subverted the adjudicatory process by which guilt is determined in Anglo-Saxon countries, so as to offend what the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects. The issue was raised after verdict, and the Supreme Court of California might have disposed of the claim by ruling that it had not been made at the stage of the proceeding required by State law. That court, however, chose not to do so. It permitted the [defendant] to invoke the Due Process Clause and thereby tendered a federal constitutional issue, as this Court recognizes, for our disposition....

[The] California court's own reading of the record [showed] circumstances tending to establish guilt and adduced outside the courtroom before the trial had even begun were avidly exploited by press and other media, actively promoted by the prosecutor. The State court sanctioned this as not only permissible but as an inevitable ingredient of American criminal justice. That sanction contradicts all our professions as to the establishment of guilt on the basis of what takes place in the courtroom, subject to judicial restrictions in producing proof and in the general conduct of the proceedings. Jurors are of course human beings and even with the best of intentions in the world they are ... "extremely likely to be impregnated by the enviroing atmosphere...."

And so I cannot agree to uphold a conviction which affirmatively treats newspaper participation instigated by the prosecutor as part of "the traditional concept of the 'American way of the conduct of a trial.'" Such passion as the newspapers stirred in this case can be explained (apart from mere commercial exploitation of revolting crime) only as want of confidence in the orderly course of justice. To allow such use of the press by the prosecution as the California court here left undisciplined, implies either that the ascertainment of guilt cannot be left to the established processes of law or impatience with those calmer aspects of the judicial process which may not satisfy the natural, primitive, popular revulsion against horrible crime but do vindicate the sober second thoughts of a community. If guilt here is clear, the dignity of the law would be best enhanced by establishing that guilt wholly through the processes of law unaided by the infusion of extraneous passion. The moral health of the community is strengthened by according even the most miserable and pathetic criminal those rights which the Constitution has designed for all.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Douglas, in Which Black, J., Joined: Justice Douglas dissented from the Court's decision based upon the confession given by the defendant. He believed that confession was involuntary. Justice Douglas wrote:

The practice of obtaining confessions prior to arraignment breeds the third-degree and the inquisition. As long as it remains lawful for the police to hold persons incommunicado, coerced confessions will infect criminal trials in violation of the commands of due process of law.

The facts of this case illustrate the evils of this police practice. While the defendant was being held by the police prior to his arraignment, a lawyer tried to see him. The police refused the lawyer's repeated requests.

It was only after a confession was obtained that the lawyer was allowed to talk with the prisoner. This was lawless conduct, condemned by the Supreme Court of California. It was not only lawless conduct; it was conduct that produced a confession.

This confession as well as subsequently obtained confessions were used at the trial. The fact that the later confessions may have been lawfully obtained or used is immaterial. For once an illegal confession infects the trial, the verdict of guilty must be set aside no matter how free of taint the other evidence may be.

Moreover, the fact that the accused started talking shortly after he was arrested and prior to the time he was taken before the District Attorney does not save the case. That talk was accompanied or preceded by blows and kicks of the police; and the Supreme Court of California assumed that it was part and parcel of the first confession obtained through "physical abuse or psychological torture or a combination of the two."

Case Note: The Court's resolution of the confession and right to counsel claim would come out differently under modern capital and non-capital punishment law. Constitutional safeguards were subsequently developed by the Court to prohibit obtaining and using involuntary confessions, in addition to stringent constitutional requirements concerning interrogation when counsel is requested. See also Mu'Min v. Strong, William William Strong served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1870 to 1880. While on the Supreme Court, Strong was known as a moderate in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Strong was born in Somers, Connecticut, on May 6, 1808. He was educated at Yale University where he received an undergraduate degree and law degree. Strong was admitted to the bar in Pennsylvania in 1832. Strong's career included being elected to the United States House of Representatives and serving on the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. In 1870, President Ulysses S. Grant appointed Strong to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Strong is known to have written only one capital punishment opinion (during the early history of the Court, justices oftentimes failed to state what sentence a defendant received). In Strauder v. West Virginia, the defendant was convicted of murder and sentenced to death. The defendant argued before the Supreme Court that his conviction was invalid because, under the laws of West Virginia, blacks were prohibited from serving on juries. Strong, writing for the Court, agreed with the defendant. Strong wrote that equal protection guarantees embodied in the Constitution prohibited West Virginia from excluding blacks from serving on juries because of their race. Strong retired from the Court in 1880. He died on August 19, 1895.

Issue Presented: Whether the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibits successive prosecutions of a capital defendant for the same capital offense.

Case Holding: When a capital defendant is granted a new trial because of trial errors, the Constitution does not prohibit a subsequent prosecution for the same capital offense.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robert F. Stroud, was indicted by the United States for killing a prison guard while confined in a federal prison at Leavenworth, Kansas. The defendant was convicted in May 1916 and sentenced to be hanged. A federal Court of Appeals reversed this judgment. The defendant was tried again in 1917. At the second trial, the jury found the defendant guilty, but did not impose the death penalty. The United States Supreme Court reversed the second judgment. A third trial was held and the defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address whether the Constitution prohibited a prosecuted the defendant after the first judgment was reversed.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Day: Justice Day acknowledged: "The protection afforded by the Constitution is against a second trial for the same offense." The opinion ruled that principles of double jeopardy are not absolute, but are qualified. One such qualification involved setting aside a judgment because of trial errors. The opinion addressed the matter as follows: "[T]he conviction and sentence upon the former trials were reversed upon writs of error sued out by the [defendant]. The only thing the appellate court could do was to award a new trial on finding error in the proceeding, thus the [defendant] himself invoked the action of the court which resulted in a further trial. In such cases he is not placed in second jeopardy within the meaning of the Constitution." The conviction and sentence of death were affirmed. *See also Arizona v. Rumsey; Bullington v. Successive Prosecutions In murder prosecutions involving more than one victim, the federal Constitution does not prohibit separate trials of a defendant for each murder. Defendants have contended that due process should prevent separate prosecutions when this is done merely in an attempt to assure that the death penalty will be obtained. This argument has been rejected. See also Ciucci v. Illinois

Sudan Capital punishment is allowed in Sudan. The nation uses hanging and the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on English common law and Islamic law. Sudan has been in a state of civil war for several decades, during which time numerous "coup" governments rose and fell. The nation's most recent constitution, Interim National Constitution, was ratified on July 5, 2005.

The judicial system includes trial courts, special security courts, a supreme court, and a constitutional court. Defendants have the right to counsel and the courts are required to provide free legal counsel for indigent defendants accused of crimes punishable by death or life imprisonment. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether a statute that mandates the death penalty for a prison inmate who is convicted of murder while serving a life sentence without possibility of parole violates the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Case Holding: A statute that mandates the death penalty for a prison inmate who is convicted of murder while serving a life sentence without possibility of parole violates the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Raymond Wallace Shuman, was serving a life sentence without possibility of parole when he was convicted and sentenced to death for the capital murder of a fellow prisoner by the State of Nevada. The defendant's death sentence was rendered under a provision of the State's statute mandating the death penalty under those circumstances. The Nevada Supreme Court affirmed conviction and death sentence. However, in a habeas corpus proceeding in a federal district court, the defendant's death sentence was vacated on the grounds that the mandatory capital punishment statute violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun held that a statute that mandates the death penalty for a prison inmate who is convicted of murder while serving a life sentence without possibility of parole violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The opinion in the case reasoned as follows:

The Nevada mandatory capital-sentencing statute under which Shuman was sentenced to death precluded a determination whether any relevant mitigating circumstances justified imposing on him a sentence less than death. Redefining the offense as capital murder and specifying that it is a murder committed by a life-term inmate revealed only two facts about [the defendant]—(1) that he had been convicted of murder while in prison, and (2) that he had been convicted of an earlier criminal offense which, at the time committed, yielded a sentence of life imprisonment without possibility of parole. These two elements had to be established at Shuman's trial to support a verdict of guilty of capital murder. After the jury rendered that verdict of guilty, all that remained for the trial judge to do was to enter a judgment of conviction and impose the death sentence. The death sentence was a foregone conclusion.

These two elements of capital murder do not provide an adequate basis on which to determine whether the death sentence is the appropriate sanction in any particular case. The fact that a life-term inmate is convicted of murder does not reflect whether any circumstance existed at the time of the murder that may have lessened his responsibility for his acts even though it could not stand as a legal defense to the murder charge. This Court has recognized time and again that the level of criminal responsibility of a person convicted of murder may vary according to the extent of that individual's participation in the crime. Just as the level of an offender's involvement in a routine crime varies, so too can the level of involvement of an inmate in a violent prison incident. An inmate's participation may be sufficient to support a murder conviction, but in some cases it may not be sufficient to render death an appropriate sentence, even though it is a life-term inmate or an inmate serving a particular number of years who is involved....

In Shuman's case, a sentencing authority may likely find relevant his behavior during his 15 years of incarceration, including whether the inmate murder was an isolated incident of violent behavior or merely the most recent in a long line of such incidents. There is no reason to believe that several of the mitigating circumstances listed in Nevada's current guided-discretion statute could not be equally applicable to a murder committed by a life-term inmate. Hence, the mandatory capital-sentencing procedure pursuant to which Shuman's death sentence was imposed "create[d] the risk that the death penalty w[ould] be imposed in spite of factors which may call for a less severe penalty."

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice White, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Scalia, J., Joined: Justice White dissented from the majority decision. In doing so, he wrote: "Today the Court holds that the Eighth Amendment prohibits a State from imposing a mandatory death sentence on a prisoner who, while serving a life term for a first-degree murder conviction, murders a fellow inmate. The Court reasons that the Constitution requires that such an inmate be afforded the opportunity to present mitigating evidence to the sentencer, and, in so reasoning, quite obviously assumes that cases will arise under the type of statute at issue here in which an inmate will be able, through the presentation of such mitigating evidence, to persuade a sentencer not to impose a death sentence. In my view, the Constitution does not bar a state legislature from determining, in this limited class of cases, that, as a matter of law, no amount of mitigating evidence could ever be sufficient to outweigh the aggravating factors that characterize a first-degree murder committed by one who is already incarcerated for committing a previous murder and serving a life sentence. Accordingly, I dissent." See also Mandatory Death Penalty Statutes; Roberts v. Louisiana (I); Roberts v. Louisiana (II); Woodson v. North Carolina

Suriname Suriname has not abolished capital punishment, but the punishment has not been imposed frequently. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Dutch law and French law. The constitution of Suriname was ratified on September 30, 1987.

The judicial system of Suriname consists of trial courts and an appellate court. Defendants have the right to a public trial and to retained or appointed legal counsel. Trials are before a single judge, with the right of appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Sutherland, George George Sutherland served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1922 to 1938. While on the Supreme Court, Sutherland was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Sutherland was born in Buckinghamshire, England, on March 25, 1862. Sutherland's family immigrated to the United States during his adolescent years and settled in Utah. He was a graduate of Brigham Young University in 1881 and thereafter studied law at the University of Michigan Law School. His career included serving in the Utah legislature, the United States House of Representatives, and the United States Senate. In 1922, President Warren G. Harding appointed Sutherland to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Sutherland was known to issue only one capital punishment opinion. The case of Powell v. Al- abama involved death sentences handed down against seven black defendants for the crime of rape. The primary issue presented to the Supreme Court was that the defendants, all indigent, did not have legal representation. Sutherland, writing for the Court, stepped out of his conservative judicial reputation to establish a precedent that paved the way to the constitutional requirement that a defendant has a right to counsel for all criminal offenses carrying imprisonment as a penalty. In Powell, Sutherland reversed the judgments against the defendants and wrote that in capital punishment cases, an indigent defendant has a constitutional right to counsel if requested. Sutherland retired from the Court in 1938. He died on July 18, 1942.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established a prima facie case of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant did not establish a prima facie case of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him because blacks were in the jury pool, although none were selected to serve on either jury.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robert Swain, was convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Alabama. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the judgment against him was void on the grounds that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White ruled that blacks were not systematically excluded from the grand and petit juries. It was said that blacks were included in the grand and petit jury pool, although none actually served on either jury. Justice White indicated that a defendant in a criminal case was not constitutionally entitled to a proportionate number of his or her race on the grand or petit juries.

The opinion found that the prosecutor's use of peremptory strikes to remove blacks from the jury panel did not constitute denial of equal protection of the laws. It was further said that peremptory strikes based on race in a particular case did not raise a prima facie case of discrimination under the Constitution to establish systematic striking. Justice White concluded: "Total exclusion of [blacks] from venires by state officials creates an inference of discrimination, but this rule of proof cannot be applied where it is not shown that the State is responsible for the exclusion of [blacks] through peremptory challenges." The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's decision.

Concurring Statement by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's decision.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Goldberg, in Which Warren, C.J., and Douglas, J., Joined: Justice Goldberg dissented from the decision by the Court. He argued that the defendant presented sufficient evidence to establish racial discrimination in jury selection. Justice Goldberg wrote as follows:

[The defendant], a 19-year-old [black], was indicted in Talladega County for the rape of a 17-year-old white girl, found guilty, and sentenced to death by an all-white jury. The [defendant] established by competent evidence and without contradiction that not only was there no [black] on the jury that convicted and sentenced him, but also that no [black] within the memory of persons now living has ever served on any petit jury in any civil or criminal case tried in Talladega County, Alabama. Yet, of the group designated by Alabama as generally eligible for jury service in that county, 74% (12,125) were white and 26% (4,281) were [black].

Under well-established principles this evidence clearly makes out a prima facie case of the denial of the equal protection which the Constitution guarantees....

It is clear that, unless the State here can "justify such an exclusion as having been brought about for some reason other than racial discrimination," this conviction cannot stand. Long continued omission of [blacks] from jury service establishes a prima facie case of systematic discrimination. The burden of proof is then upon the State to refute it....

I deplore the Court's departure from its [precedents]. By affirming [the defendant's] conviction on this clear record of jury exclusion because of race, the Court condones the highly discriminatory procedures used in Talladega County under which [blacks] never have served on any petit jury in that county. By adding to the present heavy burden of proof required of defendants in these cases, the Court creates additional barriers to the elimination of practices which have operated in many communities throughout the Nation to nullify the command of the Equal Protection Clause in this important area in the administration of justice.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; Jury Selection

Taft, William Howard William Howard Taft served as chief justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1921 to 1930. While on the Supreme Court, Taft was known as a moderate interpreter of the Constitution.

Taft was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on September 15, 1857. He was educated at Yale University and received a law degree from Cincinnati Law School in 1880. Taft's career included being a trial court judge in Ohio, an appellate court judge for the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, United States Solicitor General, and president of the United States. As Solicitor General, Taft argued two capital punishment cases before the Supreme Court: Alexander v. United States and Ball v. United States (I). In 1921, President Warren G. Harding nominated Taft as chief justice for the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Taft was known to write only one capital punishment opinion (early criminal cases by the Supreme Court frequently failed to state what sentence a defendant received). In Kelley v. Oregon, the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether the defendant had a constitutional right to serve out a prior imprisonment sentence before he could be executed for another crime. Taft, writing for the Court, held that the defendant did not have a constitutional right to serve out a prior imprisonment sentence before he could be executed for another crime. Taft wrote: "The penitentiary is no sanctuary, and life in it does not confer immunity from capital punishment provided by law. He has no vested constitutional right to serve out his unexpired sentence." Taft died on March 8, 1930.

Issue Presented: Whether the indictment returned against the defendant by the Cherokee Nation was invalid due to the grand jury being composed of only five people.

Case Holding: The indictment returned against the defendant by the Cherokee Nation was not invalid due to the grand jury being composed of only five people because the composition of the grand jury was a matter exclusively within the control of the Cherokee Nation.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Bob Talton, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the Cherokee Nation. Both the defendant and the victim were members of the Cherokee Nation. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging the judgment against him was invalid because he was indicted by a grand jury consisting of only five people. The district court denied relief and dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White held that the indictment returned against the defendant was valid, even though the grand jury was composed of only five people. The opinion noted that when the grand jury returned the indictment against the defendant, the laws of the Cherokee Nation required the grand jury be composed of only five people. It was said that during the pendency of the defendant's prosecution, the Cherokee Nation changed the law and required the grand jury be composed of thirteen people. Justice White found the subsequent change in the law did not invalidate the former requirement. The opinion went on to express the legal basis for the deference the Court had to accord the laws of the Cherokee Nation:

By treaties and statutes of the United States the right of the Cherokee Nation to exist as an autonomous body, subject always to the paramount authority of the United States, has been recognized. And from this fact there has consequently been conceded to exist in that Nation power to make laws defining offenses and providing for the trial and punishment of those who violate them when the offenses are committed by one member of the tribe against another one of its members within the territory of the Nation....

The crime of murder committed by one Cherokee ... upon the person of another within the jurisdiction of the Cherokee Nation is, therefore, clearly not an offense against the United States, but an offense against the local laws of the Cherokee Nation. Necessarily, the statutes of the United States which provide for an indictment by a grand jury, and the number of persons who shall constitute such a body, have no application, for such statutes relate only, if not otherwise specially provided, to grand juries impaneled for the courts of and under the laws of the United States....

True it is that in many adjudications of this court the fact has been fully recognized that, although possessed of these attributes of local self-government when exercising their tribal functions, all such rights are subject to the supreme legislative authority of the United States.... But the existence of the right in congress to regulate the manner in which the local powers of the Cherokee Nation shall be exercised does not render such local powers federal powers arising from and created by the constitution of the United States.... The question whether a statute of the Cherokee Nation which was not repugnant to the constitution of the United States or in conflict with any treaty or law of the United States had been repealed by another statute of that Nation, and the determination of what was the existing law of the Cherokee Nation as to the constitution of the grand jury, was solely a matter within the jurisdiction of the courts of that Nation, and the decision of such a question in itself necessarily involves no infraction of the constitution of the United States. Such has been the decision of this court with reference to similar contentions arising upon an indictment and conviction in a state court.

The judgment of the federal district court was affirmed.

While on the Supreme Court, Taney was known to have written only one capital punishment opinion (early decisions by the Court frequently failed to state the type of sentence a criminal defendant received). In Ex Parte Gordon, the defendant asked the Supreme Court to issue an order halting his execution while it reviewed his petition for appeal. Taney, writing for the Court, denied the relief on the grounds that the Court did not have authority to issue an order halting an execution. Taney died on October 12, 1864.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was deprived of due process when the Alabama Supreme Court denied him permission to file a petition for a writ of coram nobis in the trial court.

Case Holding: The defendant was not deprived of due process when the Alabama Supreme Court denied him permission to file a petition for a writ of coram nobis in the trial court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Samuel Taylor, was convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Alabama. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. Shortly before his scheduled execution, the defendant filed a petition in the Alabama Supreme Court, seeking an order granting him permission to file a petition for a writ of coram nobis in the trial court. As grounds for the request, the defendant argued that his confession to committing the crime was involuntary. The appellate court denied the request and dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Burton: Justice Burton held that the Due Process Clause was not violated when the defendant was denied permission to file a petition for writ of coram nobis with the trial court. In finding that due process was not violated in the case, Justice Burton indicated that there was no allegation by the defendant that false testimony was presented at the trial. Nor did the defendant deny his guilt. The opinion reasoned that the purported evidence of a forced confession, if true, was known to the defendant at the time of trial, but he did not raise the issue then. Under the circumstances of the case, the opinion found that the Alabama Supreme Court's denial of permission to file a petition for a writ of coram nobis was not arbitrary. The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote that Alabama provided procedures to ensure that a defendant received a fair trial and provided procedures for review of convictions and sentences. Justice Frankfurter believed that Alabama's procedures satisfied due process and that the defendant was not denied due process in the case.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Murphy, in Which Douglas and Rutledge, JJ., Joined: Justice Murphy dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the Due Process Clause was violated in the case. Justice Murphy wrote as follows:

One of the fixed principles of due process, as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, is that no conviction in a state court is valid which is based in whole or in part upon an involuntary confession. Wherever a confession is shown to be the product of mental or physical coercion rather than reasoned and voluntary choice, the conviction is void. And it is void even though the confession is in fact true and even though there is adequate evidence otherwise to sustain the conviction.

The problem in this case is whether the [defendant], having been found guilty of rape and sentenced to death, is now entitled to a hearing on his allegation that the confession introduced at the trial was obtained by coercive methods. The Supreme Court of Alabama refused to allow a hearing on the theory that the allegation was unreasonable. In affirming that refusal, however, this Court relies upon considerations which are either irrelevant, inconclusive or contrary to the constitutional principle just discussed.

Fortunately, this Court has not yet made a final and conclusive answer to [the defendant's] claim. All that has been decided here is that the Supreme Court of Alabama did not err in declining to permit him to file a petition for writ of coram nobis in the Alabama courts. Nothing has been held which prejudices petitioner's right to proceed by way of habeas corpus in a federal district court, now that he has exhausted his state remedies. He may yet obtain the hearing which Alabama has denied him.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment law, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Coram Nobis; Crimes Not Involving Death

Issue Presented: Whether the Court of Appeals correctly denied the defendant a certificate of appealability on the grounds that the defendant failed to show that his alleged mitigating evidence was constitutionally relevant.

Case Holding: The Court of Appeals was wrong in requiring the defendant to show that his alleged mitigating evidence was constitutionally relevant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robert Tennard, was convicted of capital murder in 1986 and sentenced to death by the State of Texas. The conviction and sentence were upheld on direct appeal and in a State habeas corpus proceeding. The defendant filed a federal habeas petition. In that petition, the defendant alleged that Texas's use of two death sentence aggravating circumstances, at the penalty phase, precluded the jury from considering his low I.Q. as a mitigating circumstance. The federal district court rejected the argument. The defendant subsequently sought a certificate of appealability from a Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals refused to issue a certificate of appealability, on the grounds that the defendant failed to show that his mitigating evidence was constitutionally relevant. The United States Supreme Court subsequently issued a memorandum opinion setting aside the Court of Appeals decision and remanded the case for the Court of Appeals to reconsider its decision in light of a recent case the Supreme Court decided that involved mental retardation. The Court of Appeals reconsidered its decision, but reissued the opinion denying a certificate of appealability. The United States Supreme Court thereafter granted certiorari to consider the standard used by the Court of Appeals in denying a certificate of appealability.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor held that the Court of Appeals applied the wrong standard in determining whether to issue a certificate of appealability. The opinion addressed the issue as follows:

The Fifth Circuit's test has no foundation in the decisions of this Court. [None of our prior cases] screened mitigating evidence for "constitutional relevance" before considering whether the jury instructions comported with the Eighth Amendment....

When we addressed directly the relevance standard applicable to mitigating evidence in capital cases in [a prior case], we spoke in the most expansive terms. We established that the meaning of relevance is no different in the context of mitigating evidence introduced in a capital sentencing proceeding than in any other context, and thus the general evidentiary standard—any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence—applies....

Once this low threshold for relevance is met, the Eighth Amendment requires that the jury be able to consider and give effect to a capital defendant's mitigating evidence....

The Fifth Circuit's test is inconsistent with these principles. Most obviously, the test will screen out any positive aspect of a defendant's character....

We have never denied that gravity has a place in the relevance analysis, insofar as evidence of a trivial feature of the defendant's character or the circumstances of the crime is unlikely to have any tendency to mitigate the defendant's culpability. However, to say that only those features and circumstances that a panel of federal appellate judges deems to be "severe" could have such a tendency is incorrect. Rather, the question is simply whether the evidence is of such a character that it might serve as a basis for a sentence less than death....

[T]he Fifth Circuit's screening test has no basis in our precedents and, indeed, is inconsistent with the standard we have adopted for relevance in the capital sentencing context. We therefore hold that the Fifth Circuit assessed Tennard's ... claim under an improper legal standard.

The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded for that court to issue a certificate of appealability to the defendant.

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that the Supreme Court's prior cases required the Court to defer to the decision of the Court of Appeals.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that the issue presented by the defendant did not involve any constitutional right.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas dissented from the majority opinion. He took the position that the issue presented by the defendant did not involve any constitutional right. See also Smith v. Texas Tennessee The State of Tennessee is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on February 27, 1974.

Tennessee has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Tennessee Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals is divided into three divisions. Each division has four judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called criminal courts. Capital offenses against the State of Tennessee are tried in the criminal courts.

Tennessee's capital punishment offenses are set out under Tenn. Code § 39-13-202. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. Premeditated and intentional killing of another;
2. A killing of another committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate any first degree murder, act of terrorism, arson, rape, robbery, burglary, theft, kidnapping, aggravated child abuse, aggravated child neglect or aircraft piracy; or
3. A killing of another committed as the result of the unlawful throwing, placing or discharging of a destructive device or bomb.

Capital murder in Tennessee is punishable by death or life imprisonment with or without parole. A capital prosecution in Tennessee is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Tennessee.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Tenn. Code § 39-13-204(i) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The murder was committed against a person less than twelve years of age and the defendant was eighteen years of age, or older;
2. The defendant was previously convicted of one or more felonies, other than the present charge, whose statutory elements involve the use of violence to the person;
3. The defendant knowingly created a great risk of death to two or more persons, other than the victim murdered, during the act of murder;
4. The defendant committed the murder for remuneration or the promise of remuneration or employed another to commit the murder for remuneration or the promise of remuneration;
5. The murder was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel in that it involved torture or serious physical abuse beyond that necessary to produce death;
6. The murder was committed for the purpose of avoiding, interfering with, or preventing a lawful arrest or prosecution of the defendant or another;
7. The murder was knowingly committed, solicited, directed, or aided by the defendant, while the defendant had a substantial role in committing or attempting to commit, or was fleeing after having a substantial role in committing or attempting to commit, any first degree murder, arson, rape, robbery, burglary, theft, kidnapping, aircraft piracy, or unlawful throwing, placing or discharging of a destructive device or bomb;
8. The murder was committed by the defendant while the defendant was in lawful custody or in a place of lawful confinement or during the defendant's escape from lawful custody or from a place of lawful confinement;
9. The murder was committed against any law enforcement officer, corrections official, corrections employee, emergency medical or rescue worker, emergency medical technician, paramedic or firefighter, who was engaged in the performance of official duties;
10. The murder was committed against any present or former judge, district attorney general or state attorney general, assistant district attorney general or assistant state attorney general due to or because of the exercise of the victim's official duty or status and the defendant knew that the victim occupied such office;
11. The murder was committed against a national, state, or local popularly elected official, due to or because of the official's lawful duties or status, and the defendant knew that the victim was such an official;
12. The defendant committed mass murder, which is defined as the murder of three or more persons whether committed during a single criminal episode or at different times within a forty-eight-month period;

13. The defendant knowingly mutilated the body of the victim after death;

14. The victim of the murder was seventy years of age or older; or the victim of the murder was particularly vulnerable due to a significant handicap or significant disability, whether mental or physical; or

15. The murder was committed in the course of an act of terrorism.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Tennessee has provided by Tenn. Code § 39-13-204(j) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity;

2. The murder was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance;

3. The victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to the act;

4. The murder was committed under circumstances which the defendant reasonably believed to provide a moral justification for the defendant's conduct;

5. The defendant was an accomplice in the murder committed by another person and the defendant's participation was relatively minor;

6. The defendant acted under extreme duress or under the substantial domination of another person;

7. The youth or advanced age of the defendant at the time of the crime;

8. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the wrongfulness of the defendant's conduct or to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of the law was substantially impaired as a result of mental disease or defect or intoxication which was insufficient to establish a defense to the crime but which substantially affected the defendant's judgment; and

9. Any other mitigating factor which is raised by the evidence produced by either the prosecution or defense at either the guilt or sentencing hearing.

Under Tennessee's capital punishment statute, the Tennessee Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Tennessee uses the lethal injection to carry out death sentences. Inmates who committed a capital offense prior to January 1, 1999, may choose between lethal injection and electrocution. The State's death row facilities for men and women are located in Nashville, Tennessee.

Pursuant to the laws of Tennessee, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor may commute a capital felon's death sentence to life imprisonment if the Tennessee Supreme Court determines the sentence warrants commutation.

Under the laws of Tennessee, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Tenn. Code § 40-23-116:

The only witnesses entitled to be present at the carrying out of such death sentence are:

1. The warden of the state penitentiary or the warden's duly authorized deputy;

2. The sheriff of the county in which the crime was committed;

3. A priest or minister of the gospel who has been preparing the condemned person for death;

4. The prison physician;

5. Such attendants chosen and selected by the warden of the state penitentiary as may be necessary to properly carry out the execution of the death sentence;

6. A total of seven (7) members of the print, radio and television news media selected in accordance with the rules and regulations promulgated by the department of correction. Those news media members allowed to attend any execution of a sentence of death shall make available coverage of such execution to other news media members not selected to attend;

7. Immediate family members of the victim who are eighteen (18) years of age or older. Such immediate family members shall include the spouse, child by birth or adoption, stepchild, stepparent, parent, grandparent or sibling of the victim; provided, that members of the family of the condemned prisoner may be present and witness the execution;

8. One (1) defense counsel chosen by the condemned person; and

9. The attorney general and reporter, or the attorney general and reporter's designee.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Tennessee executed only two capital felons. A total of 107 capital felons were on death row in Tennessee as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as forty-three black inmates, fifty-nine white inmates, one Hispanic inmate, two Asian inmates, and two Native American inmates. Two death row inmates were female.

Tennessee Coalition to Abolish State Killing The Tennessee Coalition to Abolish State Killing (TCASK) was formed for the purpose of working to abolish capital punishment in Tennessee and the United States. TCASK has over 4,000 members and six chapters across the state. The organization is active in working to educate the public about capital punishment. The organization's public activities include rallies and vigils, educational forums, speakers' bureaus, lobbying work, letter-writing campaigns, and fundraising events. In 2006, TCASK hosted its first Justice Day on the Hill, bringing together over sixty Tennesseans from across the state to lobby their legislators about the death penalty.

Terrorism Aggravator Terrorism refers to conduct engaged in with the intent to intimidate or coerce a civilian population, influence the policy of a unit of government by intimidation or coercion, or affect the conduct of a unit of government by murder, assassination, or kidnapping. Engaging in terrorist conduct is a statutory aggravating circumstance when someone is killed. Seven capital punishment jurisdictions — Louisiana, Nevada, Ohio, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia and the federal government — have made such conduct a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon killed someone while engaging in terrorism. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Texas The State of Texas is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on January 1, 1974.

Texas has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Texas Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and eight associate justices. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals is composed of a presiding judge and eight judges. The Court of Criminal Appeals has the final appellate jurisdiction over all criminal cases. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Texas are tried in the district courts.

Texas's capital punishment offenses are set out under Tex. Penal Code § 19.02(b). This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. Intentionally or knowingly causes the death of an individual;
2. Intends to cause serious bodily injury and commits an act clearly dangerous to human life that causes the death of an individual; or
3. Commits or attempts to commit a felony, other than manslaughter, and in the course of and in furtherance of the commission or attempt, or in immediate flight from the commission or attempt, he commits or attempts to commit an act clearly dangerous to human life that causes the death of an individual.

In addition, under Tex. Govt. Code § 557.012 the crime of sabotage is a capital offense, when a person dies. Sabotage is defined to mean a person who, with the intent to injure the United States, Texas, or any facility or property used for national defense, sabotages or attempts to sabotage any property or facility used or to be used for national defense.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Tex. Penal Code § 19.03 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the guilt phase.

1. The person murders a peace officer or fireman who is acting in the lawful discharge of an official duty and who the person knows is a peace officer or fireman;
2. The person intentionally commits the murder in the course of committing or attempting to commit kidnapping, burglary, robbery, aggravated sexual assault, arson, obstruction or retaliation, or terroristic threat;
3. The person commits the murder for remuneration or the promise of remuneration or employs another to commit the murder for remuneration or the promise of remuneration;
4. The person commits the murder while escaping or attempting to escape from a penal institution;
5. The person, while incarcerated in a penal institution, murders another who is employed in the operation of the penal institution or with the intent to establish, maintain, or participate in a combination or in the profits of a combination;
6. The person while incarcerated murders another;
7. The person murders more than one person during the same criminal transaction or during different criminal transactions but the murders are committed pursuant to the same scheme or course of conduct;
8. The person murders an individual under six years of age; or
9. The person murders another person in retaliation for or on account of the service or status of the other person as a judge or justice of the supreme court, the court of criminal appeals, a court of appeals, a district court, a criminal district court, a constitutional county court, a statutory county court, a justice court, or a municipal court.

Capital murder in Texas is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Texas is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Texas.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant under Texas law, it is required by Tex. Crim. Pro. Code Art. 37.071 that the jury unanimously answer the first two following special issues affirmatively (if both are applicable) and the third special issue negatively:

1. Whether there is a probability that the defendant would commit criminal acts of violence that would constitute a continuing threat to society; and
2. In cases in which the jury charge at the guilt phase permitted the jury to find the defendant guilty as an accomplice, whether the defendant actually caused the death of the deceased or did not actually cause the death of the deceased but intended to kill the deceased or another or anticipated that a human life would be taken.
3. Whether, taking into consideration all of the evidence, including the circumstances of the offense, the defendant's character and background, and the personal moral culpability of the defendant, there is a sufficient mitigating circumstance or circumstances to warrant that a sentence of life imprisonment rather than a death sentence be imposed.

Texas does not provide by statute any mitigating circumstances to the imposition of the death penalty. Even though the State does not provide statutory mitigating circumstances, the United States Supreme Court has ruled that all relevant mitigating evidence must be allowed at the penalty phase.

Under Texas's capital punishment statute, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals automatically reviews a sentence of death. Texas uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Huntsville, Texas, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Gatesville, Texas.

Pursuant to the laws of Texas, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor must obtain the consent of the State's Board of Pardons and Paroles in order to grant clemency.

Under the laws of Texas, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Tex. Crim. Pro. Code Art. 43.20:

The following persons may be present at the execution: the executioner, and such persons as may be necessary to assist him in conducting the execution; the Board of Directors of the Department of Corrections, two physicians, including the prison physician, the spiritual advisor of the condemned, the chaplains of the Department of Corrections, the county judge and sheriff of the county in which the Department of Corrections is situated, and any of the relatives or friends of the condemned person that he may request, not exceeding five in number, shall be admitted. No convict shall be permitted by the prison authorities to witness the execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; Texas executed 377 of these capital felons. During this period, Texas executed three female capital felons. A total of 401 capital felons were on death row in Texas as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as 168 black inmates, 123 white inmates, 106 Hispanic inmates, and four Asian inmates. The State had eight females on death row during this period.

NUMBER OF EXECUTIONS BY TEXAS 1976–OCTOBER 2006

Texas Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty The Texas Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty (TCADP) is a group of organizations and individuals who work for the abolition of the death penalty. The organization believes that capital punishment is not a deterrent to crime, but in fact perpetuates violence. TCADP holds vigils at prison gates and county courthouses whenever executions are scheduled.

Issue Presented: Whether a defendant represented by counsel on a burglary charge may unilaterally waive his Miranda rights with respect to a charge for capital murder that occurred during the burglary.

Case Holding: A defendant represented by counsel on a burglary charge may unilaterally waive his Miranda rights with respect to a charge for capital murder that occurred during the burglary.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: In December 1993, Margaret Rae and her daughter, Kori, disappeared. At the time of the disappearance, Rae's Texas home was burglarized. The police eventually charged the defendant, Raymond Levi Cobb, with burglarizing Rae's home. An attorney was appointed to represent the defendant for the burglary charge. While the burglary case was pending, the police learned from the defendant's father that the defendant had killed Rae and her daughter. The defendant, who was out on bail, was arrested. Prior to questioning the defendant about the murders, the police advised the defendant of his Miranda rights. The defendant waived those rights and confessed to having killed Rae and her daughter during the burglary. The defendant led the police to the area where he had buried the bodies.

The defendant was eventually prosecuted for capital murder. A jury convicted and sentenced the defendant to death. On direct appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals reversed the conviction and sentence. The State's appellate court found that the confession was taken in violation of the defendant's right to counsel. It was reasoned by the appellate court that since the defendant had an attorney for the burglary charge, only the attorney could waive the defendant's Miranda rights for an interrogation about the related murder charges. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice found that the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals misinterpreted federal case law in reaching its conclusion. The opinion indicated "that a defendant's statements regarding offenses for which he had not been charged were admissible notwithstanding the attachment of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel on other charged offenses." Consequently, the confession by the defendant was admissible. The decision of the State's appellate court was reversed and the conviction and death sentence reinstated.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Kennedy, in Which Scalia and Thomas, JJ., Joined: Justice Kennedy joined the Court's opinion. He wrote separately to stress that the defendant voluntarily agreed to talk with the police and waived his right not to speak.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Breyer, in Which Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg, JJ., Joined: Justice Breyer dissented from the Court's judgment. He took the position that because the burglary and murders were related, the police could not speak with the defendant about the murders until they got permission from the attorney representing him on the burglary charge. See also Right to Counsel; Right to Remain Silent

Thailand Thailand permits capital punishment. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Thailand is a constitutional monarchy. The nation adopted a new constitution on October 11, 1997. Its legal system is based on civil law.

The judicial system of Thailand consists of trial courts, courts of appeal, a supreme court, and a constitutional court. Defendants enjoy a presumption of innocence and have the right to retained or appointed counsel. There is no trial by jury. Felony crimes are tried by two or more judges. Trials are public. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Theory of Accountability The theory of accountability is nothing more than a restatement of the liability theories of principal in the second degree and accessory before the fact, without a distinction being made as to presence or absence at the crime scene. To sustain a murder charge under the theory of accountability, the prosecutor must show (1) the defendant solicited, aided, abetted, agreed, or attempted to aid another person in planning or committing murder, (2) the defendant's act or conduct occurred before or during the commission of murder, and (3) the defendant acted with concurrent specific intent to promote or facilitate the murder.

Under the theory of accountability, it is not necessary that the defendant be shown to have had the specific intent to kill or that he or she took part in a preconceived plan to commit murder. Additionally, where individuals conspire to commit a crime wherein they contemplate violence may be necessary to carry out the plan, all such persons are liable for acts done in furtherance of the plan, so that, if death occurs, all are liable for murder whether present or not during the commission of the crime.

To sustain a prosecution for murder premised on the theory of accountability, it is not necessary to have a disposition against the principal killer. The fact that the actual killer of the victim is acquitted will not preclude prosecution of a defendant under the theory of accountability, when it is shown the defendant cooperated in planning the felony which resulted in the victim's death and was an active participant in the felony.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied due process of law when a juror was called upon to act as an interpreter for a witness.

Case Holding: The defendant was not denied due process of law when a juror was called upon to act as an interpreter for a witness because the defendant consented to this arrangement.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Charles Thiede, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Utah. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that he was denied due process of law because one of the jurors acted as an interpreter for a witness. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer held that the defendant was not denied due process of law because a juror was called upon to act as an interpreter for one of the witnesses. The opinion explained the Court's reasoning as follows: "The record discloses that when [the witness] was called ... [a juror] was sworn as interpreter.... This juror was asked if he fully understood the peculiar dialect of the German language which the witness spoke, and replied that he did, whereupon, with the consent of defendant, he was sworn to act as an interpreter.... We cannot see that in this any substantial right of the defendant was prejudiced. The juror certainly heard all that the witness stated, and was therefore fully prepared to act with the other jurors in considering his testimony, and, as his interpretation of the witness' testimony was with the consent of the defendant, the latter cannot now question its propriety." The judgment of the Utah Supreme Court was affirmed.

Thomas, Clarence Clarence Thomas was appointed as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1991. While on the Supreme Court, Thomas has revealed an ultra-conservative philosophy in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Thomas was born in Pin Point, Georgia, on June 23, 1948. He was a graduate of Holy Cross College in 1971. Thomas received a law degree from Yale University Law School in 1974. He rose quickly in his legal career and was appointed an appellate judge for the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia in 1990. In 1991, President George Bush nominated Thomas to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Thomas has written a number of capital punishment opinions. His capital punishment opinions have been consistent in revealing the ultra-conservative philosophy he has brought to other areas of the law. A decision which best illustrates Thomas's ultra-conservative philosophy is O'Dell

v. Netherland. In that case, the defendant asked the Supreme Court to find that it was constitutional error for the trial court to refuse to instruct the penalty phase jury that he was parole ineligible, for the purpose of obtaining a life imprisonment sentence. Thomas, writing for the Court, acknowledged that a recent decision by the Court required such an instruction be given if requested. However, Thomas wrote that its previous decision on this issue created a new rule of law that would not be applied retroactively, so as to benefit the defendant. Thomas affirmed the death sentence in the case.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession, given before a judicial officer, was voluntary.

Case Holding: The defendant's confession, given before a judicial officer, was voluntary.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. The Arizona Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his confession was involuntary. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The petition was dismissed. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clark: Justice Clark ruled that the defendant's confession, given before a judicial officer, was not involuntary. The opinion stated: "On all the undisputed facts here, [the defendant's] confession before the Justice of the Peace is not shown to be the product of fear, duress or coercion.... [The defendant's] reliance on certain disputed facts is misplaced, for this Court's inquiry is limited to the undisputed portions of the record when either the trial judge or the jury, with superior opportunity to gauge the truthfulness of witnesses' testimony, has found the confession to be voluntary." The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Statement by Chief Justice Warren, and Black, Douglas, and Brennan, JJ.: The chief justice and Justices Black, Douglas, and Brennan issued a joint statement indicating they dissented from the Court's decision. See also Right to Remain Silent

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant failed to establish that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Marcellus Thomas, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Texas. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that "whether such discrimination was practiced in this case was a question of fact, and the determination of that question adversely to [the defendant] by the trial court and by the court of criminal appeals was decisive, so far as this court is concerned, unless it could be held that these decisions constitute such abuse as amounted to an infraction of the Federal Constitution, which cannot be presumed, and which there is no reason to hold on the record before us." The opinion added that "the careful opinion of the court of criminal appeals, setting forth the evidence, justifies the conclusion of that court that [blacks were] not intentionally or otherwise discriminated against in the selection of the grand and petit jurors." The chief justice noted that one black was on the grand jury that indicted the defendant and several blacks were in the petit jury pool, "although it happened that none of them were drawn out of the jury box." The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was affirmed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection

Thompson v. Missouri Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Thompson v. Missouri, 171 U.S. 380 (1898); Argued: Not reported; Decided: May 31, 1898; Opinion of the Court: Justice Harlan; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Charles F. Issue Presented: Whether application to the defendant of a new rule of evidence that was not the law at the time of his offense violated ex post facto principles.

Case Holding: Application to the defendant of a new rule of evidence that was not the law at the time of his offense did not violate ex post facto principles.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thompson, was indicted for capital murder by the State of Missouri. The victim of the crime was killed through the use of strychnine. During the trial, the prosecutor sought to establish that a prescription for strychnine was written by the defendant, as well as a threatening letter written to the victim before his death. To connect the defendant to the writings, the prosecutor introduced, for handwriting-comparison purposes, letters written by the defendant to his wife. The jury ultimately convicted the defendant and he was sentenced to death. On appeal, the Missouri Supreme Court reversed the judgment and awarded a new trial, on the grounds that, under the rules of evidence, the letters written by the defendant to his wife could not be introduced.

Prior to the defendant's second trial, the Missouri legislature amended the rules of evidence so as to permit handwriting samples to be introduced into evidence for comparison purposes. During the defendant's second trial, the letters written to his wife were again introduced into evidence. The defendant was convicted a second time and sentenced to death. The State's appellate court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that ex post facto principles precluded application of the new evidence rule to his case. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan held that the statute of Missouri relating to the comparison of writings was not ex post facto when applied to prosecutions for crimes committed prior to its passage. It was said that the Court could not "perceive any ground upon which to hold a statute to be ex post facto which does nothing more than admit evidence of a particular kind in a criminal case upon an issue of fact which was not admissible under the rules of evidence as enforced by judicial decisions at the time the offense was committed." Justice Harlan presented the Court's reasoning as follows:

The Missouri statute, when applied to this case, did not enlarge the punishment to which the accused was liable when his crime was committed, nor make any act involved in his offense criminal that was not criminal at the time he committed the murder of which he was found guilty. It did not change the quality or degree of his offense. Nor can the new rule ... be characterized as unreasonable; certainly not so unreasonable as materially to affect the substantial rights of one put on trial for crime. The statute did not require less proof, in amount or degree, than was required at the time of the commission of the crime charged upon him. It left unimpaired the right of the jury to determine the sufficiency or effect of the evidence declared to be admissible, and did not disturb the fundamental rule that the state, as a condition of its right to take the life of an accused, must overcome the presumption of his innocence, and establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Whether he wrote the prescription for strychnine, or the threatening letter to the [victim], was left for the jury; and the duty of the jury, in that particular, was the same after as before the passage of the statute. The statute did nothing more than remove an obstacle arising out of a rule of evidence that withdrew from the consideration of the jury testimony which, in the opinion of the legislature, tended to elucidate the ultimate, essential fact to be established, namely, the guilt of the accused. Nor did it give the prosecution any right that was denied to the accused. It placed the state and the accused upon an equality, for the rule established by it gave to each side the right to have disputed writings compared with writings proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine. Each side was entitled to go to the jury upon the question of the genuineness of the writing upon which the prosecution relied to establish the guilt of the accused....

Of course, we are not to be understood as holding that there may not be such a statutory alteration of the fundamental rules in criminal trials as might bring the statute in conflict with the ex post facto clause of the constitution. If, for instance, the statute had taken from the jury the right to determine the sufficiency or effect of the evidence which it made admissible, a different question would have been presented. We mean now only to adjudge that the statute is to be regarded as one merely regulating procedure, and may be applied to crimes committed prior to its passage without impairing the substantial guaranties of life and liberty that are secured to an accused by the supreme law of the land.

The judgment of the Missouri Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Ex Post Facto Clause; Rules of Evidence

Issue Presented: Whether the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause bars executing a convicted capital felon who was fifteen years old at the time of the commission of the crime.

Case Holding: The Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause prohibits the execution of a person who was under sixteen years of age at the time of the commission of his or her capital offense.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William Wayne Thompson, was charged with capital murder by the State of Oklahoma. At the time of the commission of the offense, the defendant was fifteen years old. The defendant was tried as an adult, found guilty, and sentenced to death. The Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the federal Constitution prohibited executing him because of his age at the time of the commission of the offense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Stevens Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens noted that in determining whether the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment applied to the defendant's claim, the Court must be guided by the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society. In so doing, the Court had to review relevant legislative enactments and jury determinations and consider the reasons why a civilized society may accept or reject the death penalty for a person less than sixteen years old at the time of the crime.

The opinion observed that almost a majority of capital punishment jurisdictions require by statute that a defendant must have attained at least the age of sixteen at the time of a capital offense in order to be sentenced to death. Justice Stevens contended that such a near majority consensus supported the conclusion that it would offend civilized standards of decency to execute a person who was less than sixteen years old at the time of his or her offense. It was also said that this conclusion was consistent with the views expressed by respected professional organizations, by other nations that share the Anglo-American heritage, and by the leading members of the Western European community.

Justice Stevens found that the behavior of juries, as evidenced by statistics demonstrating that, although between eighteen and twenty persons under the age of sixteen were executed during the first half of the twentieth century, no such execution has taken place since 1948 despite the fact that thousands of murder cases were tried during that period. Further, only five of the 1,393 persons sentenced to death for capital murder from 1982 through 1986 were less than sixteen at the time of the offense. He concluded that such evidence leads to the unambiguous conclusion that the imposition of the death penalty on a fifteen-year-old offender is now generally abhorrent to the conscience of the community.

It was also said in the opinion that a juvenile's reduced culpability, and the fact that the application of the death penalty to this class of offenders does not measurably contribute to the essential purposes underlying the penalty, also supports the conclusion that the imposition of the penalty on persons under the age of sixteen constitutes unconstitutional punishment. Justice Stevens reasoned that given a juvenile's reduced culpability, as well as his or her capacity for growth and society's fiduciary obligations to its children, the retributive purpose underlying the death penalty was simply inapplicable to the execution of a fifteen-year-old offender.

Moreover, he argued that the deterrence rationale for the penalty is equally unacceptable with respect to such offenders. The likelihood that the teenage offender has made the kind of cold-blooded, cost-benefit analysis that attaches any weight to the possibility of execution is virtually nonexistent. Further, the opinion noted that statistics demonstrate that the vast majority of persons arrested for capital murder are over sixteen at the time of the offense. Therefore, it was "fanciful" to believe that a fifteen-year-old would be deterred by the knowledge that a small number of persons his or her age have been executed during the twentieth century. The opinion went on to vacate the judgment of the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's judgment. She wrote that although a national consensus forbidding the execution of any person for a crime committed before the age of sixteen probably exists, this conclusion should not unnecessarily be adopted as a matter of constitutional law without better evidence than was before the Court.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and White, J., Joined: Justice Scalia rejected the Court's judgment that the Constitution barred executing a defendant who was under sixteen years of age at the time of the capital offense. He presented his position on the issue as follows:

William Wayne Thompson is not a juvenile caught up in a legislative scheme that unthinkingly lumped him together with adults for purposes of determining that death was an appropriate penalty for him and for his crime. To the contrary, Oklahoma first gave careful consideration to whether, in light of his young age, he should be subjected to the normal criminal system at all. That question having been answered affirmatively, a jury then considered whether, despite his young age, his maturity and moral responsibility were sufficiently developed to justify the sentence of death. In upsetting this particularized judgment on the basis of a constitutional absolute, the plurality pronounces it to be a fundamental principle of our society that no one who is as little as one day short of his 16th birthday can have sufficient maturity and moral responsibility to be subjected to capital punishment for any crime. As a sociological and moral conclusion that is implausible; and it is doubly implausible as an interpretation of the United States Constitution.

The text of the Eighth Amendment, made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth, prohibits the imposition of "cruel and unusual punishments." The plurality does not attempt to maintain that this was originally understood to prohibit capital punishment for crimes committed by persons under the age of 16; the evidence is unusually clear and unequivocal that it was not. The age at which juveniles could be subjected to capital punishment was explicitly addressed in Blackstone's

Commentaries on the Laws of England, published in 1769 and widely accepted at the time the Eighth Amendment was adopted as an accurate description of the common law. According to Blackstone, not only was 15 above the age at which capital punishment could theoretically be imposed; it was even above the age (14) up to which there was a rebuttable presumption of incapacity to commit a capital (or any other) felony.... The historical practice in this country conformed with the common-law understanding that 15-year-olds were not categorically immune from commission of capital crimes. One scholar has documented 22 executions, between 1642 and 1899, for crimes committed under the age of 16....

When the Federal Government, and ... a majority of the States that include capital punishment as a permissible sanction, allow for the imposition of the death penalty on any juvenile who has been tried as an adult, which category can include juveniles under 16 at the time of the offense, it is obviously impossible for the plurality to rely upon any evolved societal consensus discernible in legislation—or at least discernible in the legislation of this society, which is assuredly all that is relevant. Thus, the plurality falls back upon what it promises will be an examination of "the behavior of juries." It turns out not to be that, perhaps because of the inconvenient fact that no fewer than five murderers who committed their crimes under the age of 16 were sentenced to death, in five different States, between the years 1984 and 1986. Instead, the plurality examines the statistics on capital executions, which are of course substantially lower than those for capital sentences because of various factors, most notably the exercise of executive clemency. Those statistics show, unsurprisingly, that capital punishment for persons who committed crimes under the age of 16 is rare. We are not discussing whether the Constitution requires such procedures as will continue to cause it to be rare, but whether the Constitution prohibits it entirely.

Case Note: To the extent that the majority decision would allow the execution of a person who committed a capital offense between the ages of sixteen and seventeen, it was later overruled by Roper v. Simmons in 2005. See also Juveniles; Roper v. Simmons; Stanford v. Kentucky

Issues Presented: (1) Whether principles of double jeopardy prevented the retrial of the defendant after the trial court granted a mistrial of the first prosecution. (2) Whether the jury was properly instructed to consider evidence of the victim's previous threats to the defendant as evidence against the defendant.

Case Holdings: (1) Principles of double jeopardy did not prevent the retrial of the defendant after the trial court granted a mistrial of the first prosecution because manifest necessity for the mistrial was shown. (2) The jury was improperly instructed to consider evidence of the victim's previous threats to the defendant as evidence against the defendant because such evidence should have been received as tending to establish self-defense.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas Thompson, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. At the trial, it was determined that both the defendant and the victim were Native Americans. The defendant appealed the judgment against him to the United States Supreme Court. In the appeal, the defendant alleged that the trial court improperly declared a mistrial and that his subsequent retrial violated the Double Jeopardy Clause.

It was also contended that the trial court improperly instructed the jury on previous threats made by the victim, so as to preclude the jury from considering such threats as evidence tending to establish self-defense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Shiras: Justice Shiras indicated that the trial court granted a mistrial, over the defendant's objection, after it was learned that one of the petit jurors was also a member of the grand jury that indicted the defendant. The opinion held that it was not error for the trial court to grant a mistrial under the circumstances presented. In rejecting the double jeopardy argument, Justice Shiras wrote: "As to the question raised by the plea of former jeopardy ... courts of justice are invested with the authority to discharge a jury from giving any verdict whenever, in their opinion, taking all the circumstances into consideration, there is a manifest necessity for the act, or the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated, and to order a trial by another jury; and that the defendant is not thereby twice put in jeopardy, within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States."

In turning to the defendant's second assignment of error, Justice Shiras ruled that the trial court improperly instructed the jury to consider previous threats by the victim as evidence against the defendant. The opinion addressed the matter as follows:

The learned judge seems to have regarded such evidence not merely as not extenuating or excusing the act of the defendant, but as evidence from which the jury might infer special spite, special ill will, on the part of the defendant....

While it is no doubt true that previous threats will not, in all circumstances, justify, or perhaps even extenuate, the act of the party threatened in killing the person who uttered the threats, yet it by no means follows that such threats, signifying ill will and hostility on the part of the deceased, can be used by the jury as indicating a similar state of feeling on the part of the defendant. Such an instruction was not only misleading in itself, but it was erroneous in the present case, for the further reason that it omitted all reference to the alleged conduct of the deceased at the time of the killing, which went to show an intention then and there to carry out the previous threats.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. See also Double Jeopardy Clause; Mistrial; Self-Defense

Issue Presented: Whether the Eighth Amendment prohibits the death penalty in the intermediate case of the defendant whose participation is major and whose mental state is one of reckless indifference to the value of human life.

Case Holding: The Constitution permits the death penalty in the intermediate case of the defendant whose participation is major and whose mental state is one of reckless indifference to the value of human life.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, brothers Raymond and Ricky Tison, were prosecuted for capital murder by the State of Arizona. The defendants, along with other accomplices, helped a relative escape from prison. During the prison escape and afterwards, several people were killed. Both defendants were convicted and sentenced to death. After the Arizona Supreme Court affirmed the defendants' convictions for capital murder under that State's felony murder statute, the defendants collaterally attacked their death sentences in state post-conviction proceedings. The defendants alleged that under the United States Supreme Court decision in Enmund v. Florida, they could not be sentenced to death because they did not intend to kill. The State's appellate court determined that Enmund did not preclude executing them because they played an active part in planning and executing the prison escape and in the events that led to the murders and that they did nothing to interfere with the killings nor to disassociate themselves from the killers afterward. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor recognized that, under Enmund, the death penalty could not be imposed upon a defendant who neither took life, attempted to take life, nor intended to take life. The opinion distinguished the facts contemplated by Enmund from the conduct of the defendants. Justice O'Connor wrote that the defendants' conduct fell "outside the category of felony murderers for whom Enmund explicitly held the death penalty disproportional: their degree of participation in the crimes was major rather than minor, and the record would support a finding of the culpable mental state of reckless indifference to human life."

It was said that although the defendants neither intended to kill the victims nor inflicted the fatal wounds, the record might support a finding that they had the culpable mental state of reckless indifference to human life. The opinion ruled that the Constitution did prohibit the death penalty as disproportionate in the case of a defendant whose participation in a felony that results in murder is major and whose mental state is one of reckless indifference.

Because the Arizona Supreme Court did not analyze the case under the standard adopted by the opinion, the judgments were vacated and the case remanded for further consideration.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Brennan argued in dissent that the felony murder doctrine could not be used to impose a death sentence on a person who neither killed nor intended to kill. In ridiculing the felony murder doctrine, he said that it "is a living fossil from a legal era in which all felonies were punishable by death; in those circumstances, the state of mind of the felon with respect to the murder was understandably superfluous, because he or she could be executed simply for intentionally committing the felony. Today, in most American jurisdictions and in virtually all European and Commonwealth countries, a felon cannot be executed for a murder that he or she did not commit or specifically intend or attempt to commit."

The dissent criticized the Court for creating a new doctrine of liability out of the felony murder rule. Justice Brennan wrote concisely: "The Court has chosen ... to announce a new substantive standard for capital liability: a defendant's 'major participation in the felony committed, combined with reckless indifference to human life'.... I join no part of this."

Finally, Justice Brennan contended that even under the new culpability standard announced by the Court, its analysis should not have ended on that point. The dissent reasoned: "Creation of a new category of culpability is not enough to distinguish this case from Enmund. The Court must also establish that death is a proportionate punishment for individuals in this category. In other words, the Court must demonstrate that major participation in a felony with a state of mind of reckless indifference to human life deserves the same punishment as intending to commit a murder or actually committing a murder. The Court does not attempt to conduct a proportionality review of the kind performed in past cases raising a proportionality question."

Case Note: The majority opinion in the case received some legal criticism because of its distortion of the common law felony murder rule. See also Enmund v. Florida; Felony Murder Rule; Mens Rea

Tla-Koo-Yel-Lee v. United States Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Tla-Koo-Yel-Lee v. Issue Presented: Whether the trial court committed error in limiting the defendant's ability to show that a key witness was biased and had a motive to testify falsely.

Case Holding: The trial court committed error in limiting the defendant's ability to show that a key witness was biased and had a motive to testify falsely.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Tla-Koo-Yel-Lee, and Tak-Ke (both Native Americans) were indicted for capital murder by the United States. Separate trials occurred. During the defendant's trial, two alleged eyewitnesses to the crime testified. One of the witnesses, Tlak-Sha, was the wife of Tak-Ke (she eventually testified against her husband). The defendant attempted to show bias and motive to testify falsely on the part Tlak-Sha by establishing that she was having a relationship with the other eyewitness to the crime. The defense's theory was that Tlak-Sha wanted to get rid of her husband; therefore, she was motivated to testify falsely against the defendant in order to bolster her testimony against her husband when his trial took place. The trial court would not allow the defendant to question Tlak-Sha about her relationship with the other witness. The jury convicted the defendant and he was sentenced to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging it was error for the trial court to limit his questioning of Tlak-Sha. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Peckham: Justice Peckham held that it was critical for the defendant to be able to question Tlak-Sha about her relationship with the other alleged eyewitness. It was said that the defendant had a right "to show to the jury, if possible, the bias, if any, of the witness against the defendant, or to show that her credibility was not to be depended upon by the jury." Justice Peckham found that the questions the defendant sought to ask Tlak-Sha "were directed to the purpose of showing material facts bearing upon the character and credibility of the witness." The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

Togo Capital punishment may be imposed in Togo, but the punishment has not been used frequently. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on French law. Togo adopted a constitution on September 27, 1992.

The judicial system consists of trial courts, appellate courts, and a supreme court. Trials are open to the public. Defendants have the right to retained or appointed legal counsel and to appeal. They may confront witnesses and enjoy a presumption of innocence. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Tonga Capital punishment is imposed in Tonga, but the punishment has not been carried out frequently. Tonga is comprised of 169 small islands in the South Pacific. Most of the approximately 105,000 inhabitants are Polynesian. Tonga is a constitutional monarchy. The nation adopted a constitution on November 4, 1875. The nation's legal system is based on English law.

The judicial system consists of a supreme court (trial court) and a court of appeals. The laws of the nation provide for the right to a public trial. Defendants are prosecuted by indictment and are entitled to counsel. The king has the right to commute a death sentence in cases of murder or treason. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Torture Aggravator Torture refers to the infliction of great pain and suffering. A large minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made torture a statutory aggravating circumstance. Issue Presented: Whether the federal district court was required to hold an evidentiary hearing on the defendant's habeas corpus petition alleging his confession was involuntary.

Case Holding: The federal district court was required to hold an evidentiary hearing on the defendant's habeas corpus petition alleging his confession was involuntary, where the State court record was underdeveloped.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Charles Townsend, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Illinois. The Illinois Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his confession was involuntarily obtained. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court alleging that his conviction violated the federal Constitution because of the admission in evidence of a confession obtained while he was under the influence of drugs, including a truth serum, administered by a police physician. The district court dismissed the petition without an evidentiary hearing. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Warren: The chief justice set out the underlying facts of the defendant's confession. It was said that the defendant was arrested by Chicago police around 2 A.M. on New Year's Day in 1954. The defendant was nineteen years old at the time and a heroin addict. He was under the influence of heroin before his arrest. During the initial interrogation, he denied committing any crime. It was said that the defendant began complaining that he had pains in his stomach, that he was suffering from withdrawal symptoms, that he wanted a doctor, and that he was in need of a dose of narcotics. A police physician was summoned. The doctor gave the defendant a combined dosage by injection of $\frac{1}{8}$ -grain of Phenobarbital and $\frac{1}{230}$ -grain of hyoscine. The opinion noted that it was the hyoscine that was alleged to have the properties of a truth serum. The doctor also left the defendant four or five $\frac{1}{4}$ -grain tablets of Phenobarbital. The medication alleviated the discomfort of the withdrawal symptoms and the defendant promptly responded to questioning by confessing to the murder charge.

The chief justice wrote: "It is difficult to imagine a situation in which a confession would be less the product of a free intellect, less voluntary, than when brought about by a drug having the effect of a 'truth serum.'" He said: "Any questioning by police officers which in fact produces a confession which is not the product of a free intellect renders that confession inadmissible." The opinion held that the defendant satisfactorily alleged a deprivation of constitutional rights that entitled him to an evidentiary hearing before the district court. As a guide for district courts in making the determination of whether to hold an evidentiary hearing on a habeas corpus petition, the chief justice set out the following:

Where the facts are in dispute, the Federal District Court must grant an evidentiary hearing if (1) the merits of the factual dispute were not resolved in the state hearing, either at the time of the trial or in a collateral proceeding; (2) the state factual determination is not fairly supported by the record as a whole; (3) the fact-finding procedure employed by the State Court was not adequate to afford a full and fair hearing; (4) there is a substantial allegation of newly discovered evidence; (5) the material facts were not adequately developed at the state-court hearing; or (6) for any reason it appears that the state trier of fact did not afford the applicant a full and fair fact hearing. When the state trier of fact has made no express findings, the District Court must hold an evidentiary hearing if the State Court did not decide the issues of fact tendered to it, if the State Court applied an incorrect standard of constitutional law, or if, for any other reason, the District Court is unable to reconstruct the relevant findings of the state trier of fact. The Federal District Court must carefully scrutinize the state-court record in order to determine whether the factual determinations of the State Court are fairly supported by the record. Even if all the relevant facts were presented in the state-court hearing, it is the Federal Judge's duty to disregard the state findings and take evidence anew, if the procedure employed by the State Court appears to be seriously inadequate for the ascertainment of the truth. Where newly discovered evidence which could not reasonably have been presented to the State Court is alleged, the Federal Court must grant an evidentiary hearing, unless the allegation of newly discovered evidence is irrelevant, frivolous or incredible. If, for any reason not attributable to the inexcusable neglect of the applicant, evidence crucial to the adequate consideration of his constitutional claim was not developed at the state hearing, the Federal Court must grant an evidentiary hearing. The duty to try the facts anew exists in every case in which the State Court has not, after a full hearing, reliably found the relevant facts.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Goldberg: Justice Goldberg concurred with the Court's decision. He wrote separately to express his disagreements with the arguments made in the dissenting opinion of Justice Stewart. Justice Goldberg indicated that he disagreed with Justice Stewart's conclusion that the voluntariness of the confession was properly resolved at the trial. He also wrote that he disagreed with Justice Stewart's position that the guidelines for District Courts were inappropriate. Justice Goldberg argued: "The setting of certain standards is essential to disposition of this case and a definition of their scope and application is an appropriate exercise of this Court's adjudicatory obligations."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stewart, in Which Clark, Harlan, and White, JJ., Joined: Justice Stewart dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the jury properly resolved the issue of the voluntariness of the confession. He also argued that evidence independent of the confession established the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Justice Stewart also thought it was unnecessary for the Court to set out standards for holding habeas corpus evidentiary hearings. He wrote: "The Court has done little more today than to supply new phrases — imprecise in scope and uncertain in meaning — for the habeas corpus vocabulary of District Court judges. And because they purport to establish mandatory requirements rather than guidelines, the tests elaborated in the Court's opinion run the serious risk of becoming talismanic phrases, the mechanistic invocation of which will alone determine whether or not a hearing is to be had." Trailside Killer Between 1979 and 1981, David Carpenter placed northern California in terror because of the numerous dead bodies that were turning up alongside hiking and biking trails. Carpenter's path to becoming the "Trailside Killer" began in 1961 when, at the age of 33, he brutally attacked a woman with a hammer. He was prosecuted for the crime and sentenced to prison for fourteen years. In 1970, Carpenter was released from prison. Within months of his release, he was arrested for kidnapping and robbery. He was sentenced to seven years for the crimes.

David Carpenter was sentenced to death for committing seven murders between 1979 and 1981. (California Department of Corrections)

On August 20, 1979, the naked body of Edda Kane was discovered on a hiking trail in Mt. Tamalpais State Park, near San Francisco. She had been shot in the head. On March 8, 1980, the body of Barbara Swartz was found in a park along an unpaved trail. She had been stabbed to death. On June 4, 1980, the body of Anna Menjivas was discovered in Mt. Tamalpais State Park. She had been shot to death. On October 15, 1980, the body of Anne Alderson was found near a park jogging trail. She had been shot in the head three times.

On November 29, 1980, the bodies of Shauna May and Diana O'Connell were found in a shallow grave near Point Reyes Park. Both women had been shot in the head. Also on November 29, in another section of Point Reyes Park, authorities found the bodies of Richard Stowers and Cynthia Moreland. They had also been shot to death.

On March 29, 1981, Stephen Haertle and Ellen Hansen were ambushed while hiking in Henry Cowle State Park, near Santa Cruz. Hansen was shot to death. Haertle was shot but survived the attack. He was able to give authorities a description of the attacker. On May 24, 1981, the decomposing body of Heather Scaggs was along a trail in Big Basin Redwood State Park, north of San Francisco. She had been shot to death.

Before authorities found Scaggs's body, her reported disappearance had led authorities to Carpenter. Scaggs worked with Carpenter at the print shop. On May 1, Carpenter arranged to meet Scaggs alone for the purpose of selling his car to her. When Scaggs did not return home, the police were notified by her boyfriend and informed of her plans to purchase a car from Carpenter.

When the police located Carpenter on May 14, they immediately recognized him from the composite sketch given by Haertle. Carpenter was taken into custody (ten days later the remains Scaggs were found).

The real evidence connecting Carpenter to the murders came after authorities were able to locate the gun used in several of the murders. Carpenter had sold the gun to a suspect who was being prosecuted for robbery. The barrel markings of the gun matched the bullets that killed Hansen and Scaggs.

Carpenter was prosecuted for the murder of Scaggs and Hansen in 1984. A jury convicted him of the killings and, on July 6, 1984, he was sentenced to death. On May 10, 1988, a jury convicted

Carpenter of the murder of Moreland, Stowers, O'Connell, May, and Alderson. He was sentenced to death for those murders. Carpenter is on death row in California. See also Serial Killer

Train Wreck or Hijacking Aggravator Causing a train to wreck or hijacking a train is a statutory aggravating circumstance when someone is killed. Five capital punishment jurisdictions, California, Illinois, Missouri, Utah, and the federal government, have made such conduct a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon killed someone while hijacking a train or causing a train to wreck. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Transcript of Proceeding All trial-level in-court proceedings in a capital prosecution are recorded. This includes trial-level post-conviction collateral proceedings, such as habeas corpus and coram nobis proceedings. The purpose of recording all trial court level proceedings is for appellate courts to review the record when defendants prosecute appeals. An issue that once plagued indigent defendants was that of obtaining transcripts free of charge for direct appeals and appeals from collateral attacks on their judgments. It was not until the non-capital case of Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), was decided that the United States Supreme Court ruled that the Constitution required an indigent defendant be provided with a free transcript for an initial direct appeal of his or her conviction. The decision in Griffin was extended to appeals from post-conviction collateral proceedings in the capital case of Lane v. Brown, 372 U.S. 477 (1963). See also Chessman v. Teets; Lane v. Brown

Transferred Intent Doctrine The legal theory of transferred intent is a common law doctrine. Under the doctrine, if a defendant attempts to injure a specific person, but an unintended bystander is injured instead, the defendant's "intent" to injure a specific person is transferred to the unintended bystander. This doctrine is a powerful tool for obtaining convictions for crimes that require showing a defendant intended to harm a person. The doctrine has been used to obtain capital murder convictions where an innocent bystander is killed instead of the person the defendant intended to kill. See also Bradshaw v. Richey; Felony Murder Rule

Treason Article III, Section 3 of the federal Constitution provides for treason as follows: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court." The crime of treason has been made punishable by death under federal law and under the laws of a minority of States.

The United States Supreme Court has held that, under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not generally be imposed for a crime that does not involve a homicide. However, it is doubtful that the Supreme Court would extend this ruling to the crime of treason against the nation. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Espionage; Kawakita v. United States; Rosenberg v. United States

Trial Structure The determination of whether a defendant is guilty of committing a capital offense and, if so, whether he or she should be sentenced to death are the two issues that make up a single capital trial. All capital punishment jurisdictions decide the issues of guilt and punishment for a capital offense through two separate phases: guilt phase and penalty phase. The separation of a capital trial into two phases serves the federal constitutional purpose of attempting to secure fair and rational imposition of the death penalty as punishment.

Capital felons have raised various federal constitutional arguments for having a separate jury preside over the guilt phase and penalty phase of a capital prosecution. Courts have unanimously ruled that there is no constitutional right to have a different jury hear the guilt phase evidence and penalty phase evidence. A primary consideration in rejecting this argument is that there is no federal constitutional right to have a jury preside over the penalty phase. When the same jury is seated in both the guilt and penalty phases of a capital prosecution, evidence that is admitted at the guilt phase may be considered by the jury at the penalty phase.

The format for conducting guilt phase and penalty phase proceedings is generally the same: opening statements, case-in-chief, rebuttal, closing arguments, and charge to the jury.

Opening Statements. The prosecutor and defense counsel are afforded an opportunity to make opening statements to the factfinder at the guilt phase and penalty phase. The opening statement is a non-argumentative summary presentation of the type of evidence each party intends to present to the factfinder. The prosecutor's opening statement generally is given first. In a few capital punishment jurisdictions, a defendant may give his or her penalty phase opening statement first.

Case-in-Chief. Once opening statements have been given, the actual evidence of both parties will be presented. This stage is called case-in-chief. During the guilt phase, the prosecutor will always present its case-in-chief first, because the prosecutor has the burden of proving a defendant's guilt. During the penalty phase, prosecutors generally give their case-in-chief first, but some jurisdictions permit the defendant to give his or her penalty phase case-in-chief first.

The prosecutor's guilt phase case-in-chief will consist of testimonial and physical evidence that proves each element of the charged offense. The prosecutor's penalty phase case-in-chief will consist of testimonial and physical evidence only on the issue of proving aggravating circumstances.

The prosecutor's examination of witnesses that it calls will be through direct examination. What this means is that the questioning must generally be open-ended and not leading. The capital felon will be afforded an opportunity to cross-examine all witnesses called by the prosecutor. Leading questions are permitted on cross-examination.

At the conclusion of the prosecutor's guilt phase case-in-chief, the capital felon may, but does not have to, present his or her case-in-chief. A capital felon does not have to put on a guilt phase case-in-chief, because of the presumption of innocence afforded a defendant by Anglo-American jurisprudence. The defendant must put on a penalty phase case-in-chief because there is no presumption of innocence at the penalty phase. The evidence presented by the capital felon during his or her guilt phase case-in-chief will consist of testimonial and physical evidence showing his or her innocence of the crime. The evidence presented by the capital felon during his or her penalty phase case-in-chief will consist of testimonial and physical evidence on the issue of mitigating circumstances.

The capital felon's questioning of witnesses called by him or her will be through direct examination. The prosecutor will be given an opportunity to cross-examine witnesses called by the capital felon.

Rebuttal. In the event that an issue was brought out during either of the capital felon's cases-in-chief that was not addressed during either of the prosecutor's cases-in-chief, the trial court has the discretion to allow the prosecutor to present rebuttal evidence. Rebuttal evidence refers to evidence that is proffered to explain, repel, counteract, or disprove facts given in evidence by the opposing party. Likewise, if, during a prosecutor's rebuttal, matters are brought out that were not addressed in a capital felon's case-in-chief, the defendant may present rebuttal evidence.

Closing Arguments. At the conclusion of the presentation of all evidence, both sides are given an opportunity to give closing arguments at the guilt phase and penalty phase. The purpose of the closing argument is to allow both parties to argue reasons why the factfinder should reject the evidence of the other party. The general rule is that the prosecutor gives its closing argument last. However, a few jurisdictions require the capital felon give his or her penalty phase closing argument last.

Charge to the Jury. If a jury presided over the guilt phase and penalty phase, the trial judge will read jury instructions to the jury at both phases before the jury retires to deliberate. The charge to the jury informs it of the law that must be applied to the facts presented during the guilt phase and penalty phase. See also Trifurcated Trial

Tried in Absentia The federal Constitution guarantees every defendant the right to be present at criminal proceedings against him or her. This right, however, does not prevent the prosecution of a defendant for capital murder or any crime, in absentia, so long as his or her absence was voluntary and for the purpose of evading prosecution.

Trifurcated Trial The legal concept of a trifurcated trial has its origin in civil litigation. In the context of civil litigation, a trifurcated trial involves holding a trial on liability, a separate trial on general damages, and a separate trial on the issue of punitive damages. This civil law trial scheme has found its way into criminal law in a few jurisdictions.

In the context of capital punishment, a trifurcated trial occurs when a capital felon raises the defense of insanity. The trial involving the defense of insanity would take place as follows. First, a trial on the issue of the capital felon's guilt would take place. Next, if the factfinder rendered a verdict of guilty of a capital offense, another proceeding would be held on the issue of the capital felon's defense of insanity. Finally, if the factfinder determined the capital felon was sane at the time of the offense, a penalty phase proceeding would be held to determine whether the capital felon should be sentenced to death. Currently, only the capital punishment jurisdictions of California and Colorado employ a trifurcated trial when a capital felon raises the defense of insanity.

In opinions issued by a few courts, the term "trifurcated trial" is used to describe a capital prosecution that involves an advisory penalty phase jury. In this situation, a defendant's guilt is determined at the guilt phase proceeding. Next, a penalty phase proceeding is held wherein an advisory jury is used. After the advisory jury renders its recommendation to the trial judge, the trial judge then makes specific findings of fact and conclusions of law as to the penalty to be imposed. It is the separate roles of the advisory jury and the trial court, in conjunction with the guilt phase, that has caused some courts to describe the process as a trifurcated trial. See also Binding/Nonbinding Jury Sentencing Determination; Insanity Defense; Trial Structure Trinidad and Tobago Capital punishment may be carried out in Trinidad and Tobago. The nation uses hanging as the method of execution. Its legal system is based on English common law. The nation adopted a constitution on August 1, 1976.

The court system consists of a high court and a court of appeal. Trials are heard before a judge and jury. Appeals can be filed with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. Defendants have the right to bail and to an attorney. The nation's laws require a person accused of murder to have an attorney. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Tucker, Karla Faye On February 3, 1998, Karla Faye Tucker was executed by the State of Texas. The method of execution was lethal injection. At the time of Tucker's execution, she was only the second woman to be executed since the reinstatement of the death penalty in 1976.

Karla Faye Tucker was executed by the State of Texas on February 3, 1998. As a result of becoming a "born-again Christian" and admitting her guilt in killing two people, she attracted national and international support to try to prevent her execution. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

Her religious supporters included Pope John Paul II; Pat Robertson, founder of the Christian Coalition; and Sister Helen Prejean.

Press Release Statement by Mary Robinson, United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, February 4, 1998

I was saddened to learn of the death by lethal injection last night of Karla Faye Tucker who was put to death for murders she committed 15 years ago.

This was the first execution of a woman in the state of Texas since 1863 and the first in the United States since 1984.

The increasing use of the death penalty in the United States and in a number of other states is a matter of serious concern and runs counter to the international community's expressed desire for the abolition of the death penalty.

As far back as 1971 the United Nations General Assembly called on states to progressively restrict use of the death penalty with a view to its abolition.

Last year, the Commission on Human Rights called on states which have not yet abolished the death penalty to consider suspending executions with a view to abolishing the death penalty completely.

Tucker's execution brought a wave of condemnation from around the world. During her time on death row, she attracted national and international attention and support. She was widely recognized because of her religious conversion and willingness to accept responsibility for the crimes she committed. Her reli-

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights as well as the American and European Conventions on Human Rights have additional protocols providing for the abolition of capital punishment.

The international trend against the death penalty was evident in the Security Council Resolutions establishing the tribunals for crimes committed in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. The Council decided that there would be no application of the death penalty even for crimes against humanity and participation in genocide.

My own views on the death penalty are reflected in the opening declaration of the Second Protocol to the International Covenant: "abolition of the death penalty contributes to enhancement of human dignity and progressive development of human rights." I have full sympathy for the families of the victims of murder and other crimes but I do not accept that one death justifies another.

The events that led Tucker to the death chamber began in June 1983. During that time, she and her boyfriend, Daniel Ryan Garrett, murdered Jerry Lynn Dean and Deborah Thornton. Tucker confessed to killing both Dean and Thornton with a pickax. Tucker left the pickax embedded in Thornton's chest. Garrett died of natural causes in June 1993. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Issue Presented: Whether a death sentence based on multiple statutory aggravating circumstances may automatically be sustained when one aggravating factor is invalid, but the remaining factors are valid.

Case Holding: A death sentence based on multiple statutory aggravating circumstances may not automatically be sustained when one aggravating factor is invalid, but the remaining factors are valid.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Lem Davis Tuggle, was convicted of capital murder by a Virginia jury. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor presented un rebutted psychiatric testimony that the defendant had a high probability of future dangerousness. The defendant was unable to rebut the evidence because he was indigent and could not afford to hire a psychiatric expert to testify on his behalf. The trial court would not appoint a psychiatric expert for the defendant. The penalty phase jury found that the prosecutor established two statutory aggravating circumstances, future dangerousness and willfulness, and accordingly sentenced the defendant to death. The Virginia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence.

Shortly after the Virginia Supreme Court affirmed the defendant's conviction and sentence, the United States Supreme Court rendered a decision in Ake v. Oklahoma, which held that, when the prosecutor presents psychiatric evidence of an indigent defendant's future dangerousness in a capital sentencing proceeding, due process requires that the State provide the defendant with the assistance of an independent psychiatrist. At the time of Ake, the defendant's case was pending before the United States Supreme Court. In a memorandum opinion, the Supreme Court vacated the defendant's death sentence and remanded the case to the Virginia Supreme Court with instructions to reconsider the case in light of Ake.

On remand, the Virginia Supreme Court invalidated the future dangerousness aggravating circumstance because of the Ake error. The appellate court nevertheless reaffirmed the defendant's death sentence on the grounds that the aggravating factor of vile-ness permitted the sentence to survive.

The defendant next filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, contending that the Virginia Supreme Court applied the wrong analysis in affirming his sentence based on the vile-ness aggravating factor. The district court denied relief. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion held that, under the Court's decision in Zant v. Stephens (II), a death sentence supported by multiple statutory aggravating circumstances need not always be set aside if one aggravator is found to be invalid. The opinion ruled that both the Virginia Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals misinterpreted Zant as permitting a death sentence to be upheld on the basis of one valid aggravating circumstance, regardless of the reasons for which another aggravating factor may have been found to be invalid. It was said that Zant did not sanction automatic affirmance of a death sentence, where an aggravating circumstance is found invalid, but other valid aggravating factors remain. Under Zant, courts are required to analyze the possible prejudicial effect on the sentencing decision by the evidence used to establish the invalid aggravating factor.

It was said in the per curiam opinion that the Ake error prevented the defendant from developing his own psychiatric evidence to rebut the prosecutor's evidence and to enhance his defense in mitigation. As a result, the prosecutor's psychiatric evidence went unchallenged and may have unfairly increased its persuasiveness in the eyes of the jury. It was reasoned that the absence of such evidence might well have affected the jury's ultimate decision, based on all of the evidence before it, to sentence the defendant to death rather than life imprisonment. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded for harmless error analysis of the Ake violation.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia concurred with the Court's judgment. He indicated in his concurring opinion that this was "a simple case and should be simply resolved." Justice Scalia believed that the case had become unnecessarily complicated, when it was quite clear what the law required under the facts of the case.

Case Note: After the case was remanded to the Court of Appeals, it was determined that the Ake violation was in fact harmless error. Virginia subsequently executed Lem Davis Tuggle by lethal injection on December 12, 1996. See also Ake v. Oklahoma; Invalid Aggravator; Zant v. Stephens (II)

Issue Presented: Whether three of California's capital penalty phase statutory sentencing factors are unconstitutionally vague.

Case Holding: The challenged capital penalty phase statutory sentencing factors are not unconstitutionally vague.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, Paul Palalau Tuilaepa and William Arnold Proctor, were convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder in separate cases by the State of California. Both defendants' convictions and sentences were affirmed by the California Supreme Court. Both defendants had argued unsuccessfully to the State's appellate court that the following penalty phase statutory factor was vague and therefore violated the federal Constitution: (1) a requirement that the sentencer consider the circumstances of the crime of which the defendant was convicted and the existence of any special circumstances found to be true.

Additionally, Tuilaepa unsuccessfully contended before the State's appellate court that the following two penalty phase statutory factors were vague and therefore violated the federal Constitution: (2) a requirement that the sentencer consider the presence or absence of criminal activity involving the use or attempted use of force or violence or the express or implied threat to use force or violence; and (3) a requirement that the sentencer consider the defendant's age at the time of the crime. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari for both cases and consolidated them to address the constitutionality of the three factors.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy observed that the Court's constitutional vagueness review was deferential and relied on the basic principle that a factor is not unconstitutional if it has some commonsense core of meaning that criminal juries should be capable of understanding. He stated further: "We have held, under certain sentencing schemes, that a vague propositional factor used in the sentencing decision creates an unacceptable risk of randomness, the mark of the arbitrary and capricious sentencing process prohibited by Furman v. Georgia. Those concerns are mitigated when a factor does not require a yes or a no answer to a specific question, but instead only points the sentencer to a subject matter."

The opinion found that the defendants' challenge to the requirement that the sentencer consider the circumstances of the crime of which the defendant was convicted and the existence of any special circumstances found to be true was at some odds with settled principles, because the circumstances of the crime are a traditional subject for consideration by the sentencer. The Court found this factor instructed the jury in understandable terms. The requirement that the sentencer consider the presence or absence of criminal activity involving the use or attempted use of force or violence or the express or implied threat to use force or violence was framed in conventional and understandable terms as well. Asking a jury to consider matters of historical fact was a permissible part of the sentencing process. Finally, the opinion found that the requirement that the sentencer consider the defendant's age at the time of the crime might pose a dilemma for the jury in determining the bearing age ought to have in fixing the penalty, but that difficulty in application was not the equivalent of vagueness. Justice Kennedy concluded "none of the three factors is defined in terms that violate the Constitution." The judgments of the California Supreme Court were affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia's concurring opinion stated succinctly: "It is my view that, once a State has adopted a methodology to narrow the eligibility for the death penalty, thereby ensuring that its imposition is not 'freakish,' the distinctive procedural requirements of the Eighth Amendment have been exhausted. Today's decision adheres to our cases which acknowledge additional requirements, but, since it restricts their further expansion, it moves in the right direction. For that reason, and without abandoning my prior views, I join the opinion of the Court."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Souter: In his concurrence, Justice Souter stated: "I join the Court's opinion because it correctly recognizes that factors adequate to perform the function of genuine narrowing, as well as factors that otherwise guide the jury in selecting which defendants receive the death penalty, are not susceptible to mathematical precision; they must depend for their requisite clarity on embodying a 'common sense core of meaning.'"

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Ginsburg, J., Joined: Justice Stevens concurred in the Court's judgment. He indicated that prior precedent decided these issue in this case. The concurring opinion stated:

The question is whether, in addition to adequately narrowing the class of death-eligible defendants, the State must channel the jury's sentencing discretion when it is deciding whether to impose the death sentence on an eligible defendant by requiring the trial judge to characterize relevant sentencing factors as aggravating or mitigating. In Zant v. Stephens, we held that the incorrect characterization of a relevant factor as an aggravating factor did not prejudice the defendant; it follows, I believe, that the failure to characterize factors such as the age of the defendant or the circumstances of the crime as either aggravating or mitigating is also unobjectionable. Indeed, I am persuaded that references to such potentially ambiguous, but clearly relevant, factors actually reduces the risk of arbitrary capital sentencing....

Matters such as the age of the defendant at the time of the crime, the circumstances of the crime, and the presence or absence of force or violence are, in my opinion, relevant to an informed, individualized sentencing decision.... If, as we held in Zant, it is not constitutional error for the trial judge to place an incorrect label on the prosecutor's evidence, it necessarily follows that refusing to characterize ambiguous evidence as mitigating or aggravating is also constitutionally permissible. Indeed, as I have indicated, I think the identification of additional factors that are relevant to the sentencing decision reduces the danger that a juror may vote in favor of the death penalty because he or she harbors a prejudice against a class of which the defendant is a member.

... I conclude that the sentencing factors at issue in these cases are consistent with the defendant's constitutional entitlement to an individualized "determination that death is the appropriate punishment in a specific case."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun: In dissenting from the majority decision, Justice Blackmun wrote: "Adhering to my view that the death penalty cannot be imposed fairly within the constraints of our Constitution, I would vacate [the defendants'] death sentences. Even if I did not hold this view, I would find that the three challenged factors do not withstand a meaningful vagueness analysis because 'as a practical matter [they] fail to guide the sentencer's discretion.'" Tunisia Tunisia permits capital punishment. The nation uses hanging and the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on French civil law and Islamic law. Tunisia adopted a constitution on June 1, 1959.

The court system is composed of trial courts, courts of appeal, and a court of cassation. Defendants have a right to be represented by counsel and to question witnesses. Both the defendant and the prosecutor may appeal. Trials are open to the public. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the trial judge committed constitutional error during jury selection by refusing the defendant's request to question prospective jurors on racial prejudice.

Case Holding: The trial judge committed constitutional error during jury selection by refusing the defendant's request to question prospective jurors on racial prejudice.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Willie Lloyd Turner, was indicted by the State of Virginia for capital murder. During jury selection, the trial judge refused the defendant's request to question the prospective jurors on racial prejudice. The request was made because the victim was white and the defendant was black. The jury convicted the defendant and he was sentenced to death. The Virginia Supreme Court upheld the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the trial judge deprived him of a fair trial by refusing to question the prospective jurors on racial prejudice. The defendant raised the issue again in a habeas corpus petition he filed a federal district court. The district court dismissed the petition. A Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White determined that the defendant's rights under the Constitution were violated by the trial judge's refusal to voir dire the jury panel for racial bias. The opinion held: "We hold that a capital defendant accused of an interracial crime is entitled to have prospective jurors informed of the race of the victim and questioned on the issue of racial bias. The rule we propose is minimally intrusive; as in other cases involving 'special circumstances,' the trial judge retains discretion as to the form and number of questions on the subject, including the decision whether to question the venire individually or collectively. Also, a defendant cannot complain of a judge's failure to question the venire on racial prejudice unless the defendant has specifically requested such an inquiry."

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed, insofar as the sentence imposed.

Concurring Statement by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's judgment.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part with the Court's decision in the case. He agreed with the Court's reversal of the defendant's sentence, but disagreed with the Court's determination not to reverse the conviction. Justice Brennan stated his position as follows:

The Court's judgment vacates [the defendant's] sentence of death while refusing to disturb his conviction. Adhering to my view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, I agree that the death sentence in this case must be vacated. But even if I did not hold that view, I would still find that the sentence was unconstitutionally imposed in this case. In my view, the constitutional right of a defendant to have a trial judge ask the members of the venire questions concerning possible racial bias is triggered whenever a violent interracial crime has been committed. The reality of race relations in this country is such that we simply may not presume impartiality, and the risk of bias runs especially high when members of a community serving on a jury are to be confronted with disturbing evidence of criminal conduct that is often terrifying and abhorrent. In analyzing the question of when the Constitution requires trial judges to accommodate defendants' requests for inquiries into racial prejudice, I, like the Court, am influenced by what the Court correctly describes as the "ease" with which the risk may be minimized.

In any event, I cannot fully join either the Court's judgment or opinion. For in my view, the decision in this case, although clearly half right, is even more clearly half wrong. After recognizing that the constitutional guarantee of an impartial jury entitles a defendant in a capital case involving interracial violence to have prospective jurors questioned on the issue of racial bias—a holding which requires that this case be reversed and remanded for new sentencing—the Court disavows the logic of its own reasoning in denying ... Turner a new trial on the issue of his guilt. It accomplishes this by postulating a jury role at the sentencing phase of a capital trial fundamentally different from the jury function at the guilt phase and by concluding that the former gives rise to a significantly greater risk of a verdict tainted by racism. Because I believe that the Court's analysis improperly intertwines the significance of the risk of bias with the consequences of bias, and because in my view the distinction between the jury's role at a guilt trial and its role at a sentencing hearing is a distinction without substance in so far as juror bias is concerned, I join only that portion of the Court's judgment granting [the defendant] a new sentencing proceeding, but dissent from that portion of the judgment refusing to vacate the conviction.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Marshall issued an opinion concurring in the Court's reversal of the defendant's death sentence, but dissenting from the Court's decision not to reverse the conviction. Justice Marshall outlined his concerns as follows:

I believe that a criminal defendant is entitled to inquire on voir dire about the potential racial bias of jurors whenever the case involves a violent interracial crime. As the Court concedes, "it is plain that there is some risk of racial prejudice influencing a jury whenever there is a crime involving interracial violence." To my mind that risk plainly outweighs the slight cost of allowing the defendant to choose whether to make an inquiry concerning such possible prejudice....

Even if I agreed with the Court that a per se rule permitting inquiry into racial bias is appropriate only in capital cases, I could not accept the Court's failure to remedy the denial of such inquiry in this capital case by reversing [the defendant's] conviction. Henceforth any capital defendant accused of an interracial crime may inquire into racial prejudice on voir dire. When, as here, the same jury sits at the guilt phase and the penalty phase, these defendants will be assured an impartial jury at both phases. Yet [the defendant] is forced to accept a conviction by what may have been a biased jury. This is an incongruous and fundamentally unfair result. I therefore concur only in the Court's judgment vacating [the defendant's] sentence, and dissent from the Court's refusal to reverse the conviction as well.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Powell, in Which Rehnquist, J., Joined: Justice Powell dissented from the Court's judgment in the case. He believed the Court was wrong in making race-qualified juries a per se requirement in capital prosecutions. Justice Powell articulated his position as follows:

The Court today adopts a per se rule applicable in capital cases, under which "a capital defendant accused of an interracial crime is entitled to have prospective jurors informed of the race of the victim and questioned on the issue of racial bias." This rule is certain to add to the already heavy burden of habeas petitions filed by prisoners under sentence of death....

In effect, the Court recognizes a presumption that jurors who have sworn to decide the case impartially nevertheless are racially biased. Such a presumption is flatly contrary to our [precedents]. The facts of this case demonstrate why it is unnecessary and unwise for this Court to rule, as a matter of constitutional law, that a trial judge always must inquire into racial bias in a capital case involving an interracial murder, rather than leaving that decision to be made on a case-by-case basis. Before today the facts that a defendant is black and his victim was white were insufficient to raise "a constitutionally significant likelihood that, absent questioning about racial prejudice," an impartial jury would not be seated....

The per se rule announced today may appear innocuous. But the rule is based on what amounts to a constitutional presumption that jurors in capital cases are racially biased. Such presumption unjustifiably suggests that criminal justice in our courts of law is meted out on racial grounds. It is not easy to reconcile the Court's holding today with the principles announced and applied in [other cases]. The manner in which [the defendant] was tried and sentenced, and particularly the jurors who fulfilled their civic duty to sit in his case, reflected not a trace of the racial prejudice that the Court's new rule now presumes.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession was obtained in violation of due process of law and thereby invalidated his conviction and death sentence.

Case Holding: The defendant's confession was obtained in violation of due process of law and thereby invalidated his conviction and death sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Turner, was detained as a suspect in a capital murder by the State of Pennsylvania. After his arrest, the defendant was interrogated by police officers for five days before he confessed to committing the crime. The record report of the interrogation revealed the following: "The [defendant] was not permitted to see friends or relatives during the entire period of custody; he was not informed of his right to remain silent until after he had been under the pressure of a long process of interrogation and had actually yielded to it. With commendable candor the district attorney admitted that a hearing was withheld until interrogation had produced [a] confession. The delay of five days thus accounted for was in violation of a Pennsylvania statute which requires that arrested persons be given a prompt preliminary hearing.”

The jury returned a verdict of guilty and the death penalty was imposed. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant’s contention that his confession was taken in violation of due process of law. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Frankfurter Announced the Court’s Judgment and in Which Murphy and Rutledge, JJ., Joined: Justice Frankfurter held that the case was controlled by the Court’s decision in Watts v. Indiana. The opinion held as follows: “Putting this case beside the considerations set forth in our opinion in Watts v. Indiana, leaves open no other possible conclusion than that [the defendant’s] confession was obtained under circumstances which made its use at the trial a denial of due process. We must, accordingly, reverse the judgment and remand the case.”

Concurring Opinion by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas concurred in the Court’s decision. He described the defendant’s interrogation as follows:

During this confinement [the defendant] was subject to continual interrogations by a number of police officers, who questioned him individually and in small groups. The day of his arrest he was questioned about three hours in the afternoon and again in the evening. The next two days he was questioned three to four hours in the afternoon. The next day the questioning was intensified and he was again subjected to both day and evening sessions. On the 7th of June, the day he finally confessed, the interrogations were intensive, once again being held afternoon and evening. [The defendant] denied his guilt, even after being informed that other suspects had issued statements incriminating him. About eleven o’clock in the evening, after three hours of interrogation, [the defendant] finally indicated that he wished to make a statement. This confession was set down on paper the next day, and [the defendant] signed it after he had been committed by a magistrate.

These interrogations had been conducted by at least seven different officers. They were conducted in [the defendant’s] cell, in a small office, and in a room which had a stand-up screen where suspects were put for identification. It was admitted that the reason [the defendant] was not brought before a magistrate was because he had not given the answers which the police wanted and which they believed he could give.

The case is but another vivid illustration of the use of illegal detentions to exact confessions. It is governed by Watts v. Indiana.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court’s judgment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Jackson: Justice Jackson dissented from the Court’s decision in the case. He referenced to his concurring and dissenting opinion written in a companion case, Watts v. Indiana, as the basis for his dissent. In Watts, Justice Jackson wrote that he believed involuntary confessions were not invalid under the Constitution. He believed such confessions assured the accuracy of convictions. Justice Jackson reasoned as follows in the dissenting part of his Watts opinion: “If the right of interrogation be admitted, then it seems to me that we must leave it to trial judges and juries and state appellate courts to decide individual cases, unless they show some want of proper standards of decision. I find nothing to indicate that any of the courts below in these cases did not have a correct understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment, unless this Court thinks it means absolute prohibition of interrogation while in custody before arraignment.”

Dissenting Statement by Chief Justice Vinson and Reed and Burton, JJ.: Chief Justice Vinson and Justices Reed and Burton issued a joint statement indicating they dissented from the Court’s decision and believed the judgment should be affirmed.

Case Note: This case was one of three cases decided by the Court, on the same day, involving involuntary confessions. In each of the cases, the Court applied due process principals to invalidate the capital convictions. In subsequent decades, the Court applied the Fifth Amendment right to remain silent to review claims from State prisoners that their confessions were involuntary. See also *Harris v. Issue Presented: Whether the adequate charging notice requirement of the Sixth Amendment could be used to challenge the sufficiency of a State indictment.

Case Holding: The adequate charging notice requirement of the Sixth Amendment could not be used to challenge the sufficiency of a State indictment because the Sixth Amendment was not applicable to States.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Twitchell, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant’s contention that the indictment against him failed to inform him adequately of the nature of the charge against him, in violation of the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Chase: The chief justice acknowledged that the Sixth Amendment requires a defendant “be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation.” However, it was said that the rights under the Sixth Amendment were only applicable against the federal government. The chief justice indicated that prior decisions of the Court made clear that the “amendments contain no expression indicating an intention to apply them to State governments.” The judgment of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court was affirmed.

Case Note: The Court eventually ruled in Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968), that the Sixth Amendment was applicable to States through the Fourteenth Amendment.

Two-Witness Conviction Requirement The death penalty statute of Connecticut has a unique provision which holds that no person may be convicted of any crime punishable by death without testimony of at least two eyewitnesses. The Supreme Court of Connecticut has qualified the two-witness requirement in two respects. First, the court has recognized that the federal Constitution does not impose such an evidentiary requirement on the State. Second, it has been held that the requirement is satisfied when the prosecutor presents more than one witness to provide circumstantial evidence from which a jury may infer a defendant's guilt. The two-witness requirement is applicable to the guilt phase only and has no application to the penalty phase of a capital prosecution.

The crime of treason, as provided for in the federal Constitution, requires that offense be proven by two witnesses. See also Treason

Types of Crimes Criminal offenses are generally categorized as misdemeanor or felony. The death penalty may not be based upon commission of a misdemeanor offense. The United States Supreme Court has restricted infliction of the death penalty to felony offenses that involve homicides. See also Crimes Not Involving Death

U

Uganda Uganda allows capital punishment. The nation uses the firing squad and hanging to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on English common law and customary law. Uganda adopted a constitution on October 8, 1995.

The judicial system is composed of a high court, a court of appeal, a constitutional court, and a supreme court. Defendants have the right to retain counsel and in capital cases indigent defendants have the right to appointed counsel. Defendants also have the right to bail and the right to appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Unitarian Universalists Against the Death Penalty Unitarian Universalists Against the Death Penalty (UUADP) was organized in California in November 1996. The UUADP is an independent affiliate of the Unitarian Universalist Association (UUA). Its purpose is to implement the mandate of UUA resolutions opposing the death penalty by providing education, encouraging participation in state and national abolition groups, and providing resources to help individuals and congregations to become more effective voices against the death penalty. Work engaged in by UUADP includes taking part in anti-death penalty vigils and rallies, writing letters to political leaders, and coordinating workshops and programs.

United Arab Emirates The death penalty is allowed in the United Arab Emirates. The nation uses the firing squad and beheading to carry out the death. Its legal system is based on Islamic law. The nation promulgated a constitution on December 2, 1971.

The judicial system is composed of emirate and federal trial courts, and a federal supreme court. Defendants have a right to legal counsel and, in capital cases, the right to appointed counsel. Defendants are presumed innocent. There are no jury trials. All trials are public, except national security cases. Death sentences may be appealed to the ruler of the emirate where the offense was committed to the president of the United Arab Emirates. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

United Nation's Commission on Human Rights On April 3, 1998, the United Nations Commission on Human Rights issued a resolution calling for a moratorium and eventual abolishment of executions in the United States. The resolution was prompted by a report generated by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions. The Special Rapporteur, Bacre Waly Ndiaye (Senegal), visited the United States from September 21 to October 8, 1997, for the purpose of investigating reports which suggested that compliance with international agreements relating to fair trials and specific restrictions on the death penalty were not being fully observed in the United States.

In his report, the Special Rapporteur found that the defendants who received the death penalty in the United States were not necessarily those who committed the most heinous crimes. The report indicated that factors other than the crime itself appeared to influence the imposition of a death sentence. The Special Rapporteur concluded that race and economic status, both of the victims and the defendants, were key factors in determining whether the death penalty was imposed.

The report of the Special Rapporteur was also critical of alleged political influences upon the use of the death penalty. The report cited the election of judges as a compromise of the impartiality of the judicial system, which directly affected on capital prosecutions. There was also criticism of the discretionary powers of the prosecutor as to whether or not to seek the death penalty. The report found prosecutors often abused their discretion for political reasons when making the decision of whether to seek the death penalty in a given case.

The jury system also came under attack in the Special Rapporteur's report. It said that people with reservations regarding the death penalty were less likely to sit as jurors. Further, that jurors were most likely to be people predisposed to imposing capital punishment.

The report of the Special Rapporteur noted that the practice of imposing capital punishment on juveniles by many jurisdictions was a direct violation international law (no longer permitted). The Special Rapporteur also condemned the practice of executing mentally retarded persons (no longer permitted). See also International Capital Punishment Nations; International Court of Justice

United States Attorney General Capital offenses that violate federal law are prosecuted by the office of the United States Attorney General. Each State is assigned a number of assistant attorney generals, which number depends upon the volume of litigation carried on in the State. The assistant attorney generals are required to obtain the approval of the Attorney General before seeking the death penalty against a defendant.

If a defendant's conduct violates both federal law and the law of a State, prosecution by a federal assistant attorney general takes precedent over the State's right to prosecute the defendant. A

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established a claim for racially selective death penalty prosecution by the United States for the purpose of conducting discovery on the issue.

Case Holding: The defendant failed to establish a claim for racially selective death penalty prosecution by the United States for the purpose of conducting discovery on the issue.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: In 1998, a federal grand jury indicted the defendant, John Bass, with killing two individuals. Shortly after the indictment was handed down, a federal prosecutor filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty. The defendant filed a motion requesting discovery pertaining to the United States' capital charging practices. Specifically, the defendant wanted to obtain evidence to show that the United States sought the death penalty based upon the race of the defendant. The district court granted defendant's discovery request, but the prosecutor refused to comply with the order. The prosecutor appealed the order. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court summarily disposed of the issue without oral arguments. The opinion held that the defendant, an African American, failed to put forth sufficient evidence of selective prosecution, in order to be entitled to the requested discovery. The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed. See also African Americans and Capital Punishment; Race and Capital Punishment

Issue Presented: Whether a federal court in Massachusetts had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for a murder committed on a military ship anchored in the Boston harbor.

Case Holding: The federal court in Massachusetts did not have jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for a murder committed on a military ship anchored in the Boston harbor because such an offense had to be committed on waters outside the territory of any State.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William Bevens, was charged with capital murder by the United States. At the time of the crime, the defendant was enlisted in the United States military. The victim was also in the military. The crime occurred on board a warship anchored in a harbor in Boston, Massachusetts. The defendant was prosecuted in a federal court in Massachusetts. A jury convicted the defendant of capital murder. Prior to imposing the death penalty, the trial court certified the following question to the United States Supreme Court: Did the trial court have jurisdiction to prosecute the offense?

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Marshall: The chief justice ruled that the trial court did not have jurisdiction to hear the case. It was said that to bring the case within the jurisdiction of federal courts, the crime had to occur on water that was out of the jurisdiction of any State. The chief justice found that the site of the murder described in the indictment was "unquestionably within the original jurisdiction of Massachusetts." The opinion concluded "that a murder committed on board a ship of war, lying within the harbor of Boston, is not cognizable in the [federal] court for the district of Massachusetts." See also Certified Question; Jurisdiction

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession was obtained in violation of his right to prompt arraignment before a magistrate as required by Rule 5 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Case Holding: Rule 5 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure was inapplicable to the case, but the defendant was entitled to a new trial on different grounds.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Carignan, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. Federal jurisdiction was premised upon the murder occurring in the Territory of Alaska. A federal Court of Appeals reversed the conviction and sentence after finding the defendant's confession was obtained in violation of his right to be promptly arraigned before a neutral magistrate as required by Rule 5 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Reed: Justice Reed held that Rule 5 was inapplicable as a basis for reversing the judgment because, at the time of the defendant's confession, he was properly being held in jail for another offense. It was said that the police could not present the defendant for arraignment on a murder charge when they did not have a basis to charge him for murder until he confessed.

The opinion found that the defendant was entitled to a new trial on an issue that was not passed upon by the Court of Appeals. Justice Reed indicated that when the admissibility of the defendant's confession was in issue in the trial court, the judge committed reversible error in refusing to permit the defendant to testify out of the presence of the jury to facts the defendant believed indicated the involuntary character of the confession. Justice Reed wrote: "We think it clear that this defendant was entitled to such an opportunity to testify. An involuntary confession is inadmissible. Such evidence would be pertinent to the inquiry on admissibility and might be material and determinative." The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed on different grounds.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Douglas, in Which Black and Frankfurter, JJ., Joined: Justice Douglas concurred in the Court's decision. He believed the conviction should have been set aside because the police used the initial arrest as a screen to interrogate the defendant about the crime they really wanted to arrest him for. Justice Douglas stated: "[A] time-honored police method for obtaining confessions is to arrest a man on one charge (often a minor one) and use his detention for investigating a wholly different crime. This is an easy short cut for the police. How convenient it is to make detention the vehicle of investigation! Then the police can have access to the prisoner day and night. Arraignment for one crime gives some protection. But when it is a pretense or used as the device for breaking the will of the prisoner on long, relentless, or repeated questionings, it is abhorrent. We should free the federal system of that disreputable practice which has honeycombed the municipal police system in this country. We should make illegal such a perversion of a 'legal' detention." See also Arraignment Issue Presented: Whether the death penalty provision of the Federal Kidnapping Act impermissibly infringed upon the defendants' constitutional rights by encouraging non-jury trials and guilty pleas.

Case Holding: The death penalty provision of the Federal Kidnapping Act impermissibly infringed upon the defendants' constitutional rights by encouraging non-jury trials and guilty pleas.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: A federal grand jury in Connecticut returned an indictment charging the defendants, Charles Jackson, Glenn Motte, and John Albert Walsh, Jr., with violating the Federal Kidnapping Act (FKA). The FKA provided that interstate kidnappers "shall be punished (1) by death if the kidnapped person has not been liberated unharmed, and if the verdict of the jury shall so recommend, or (2) by imprisonment for any term of years or for life, if the death penalty is not imposed." The federal district court dismissed the count of the indictment charging the defendants with violating the FKA because it made "the risk of death" the price for asserting the right to trial by jury and therefore impaired the free exercise of that constitutional right. The federal government appealed directly to the United States Supreme Court.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stewart: Justice Stewart held that the FKA created an offense punishable by death "if the verdict of the jury shall so recommend." The latter passage was interpreted as requiring a lesser sentence than death if a defendant waived the right to jury trial or pled guilty. Justice Stewart found that the death penalty provision of the FKA imposed an impermissible burden upon the exercise of constitutional rights, insofar as it encouraged guilty pleas and non-jury trials by defendants in order to avoid the death penalty provision of the statute. It was said that this "encouragement" to give up constitutional rights made the death penalty provision unconstitutional. Justice Stewart reasoned in the opinion as follows:

Whatever might be said of Congress' objectives, they cannot be pursued by means that needlessly chill the exercise of basic constitutional rights. The question is not whether the chilling effect is "incidental" rather than intentional; the question is whether that effect is unnecessary and therefore excessive. In this case the answer to that question is clear.... Whatever the power of Congress to impose a death penalty for violation of the Federal Kidnapping Act, Congress cannot impose such a penalty in a manner that needlessly penalizes the assertion of a constitutional right.

It is no answer to urge, as does the Government, that federal trial judges may be relied upon to reject coerced pleas of guilty and involuntary waivers of jury trial. For the evil in the federal statute is not that it necessarily coerces guilty pleas and jury waivers but simply that it needlessly encourages them. A procedure need not be inherently coercive in order that it be held to impose an impermissible burden upon the assertion of a constitutional right. Thus the fact that the Federal Kidnapping Act tends to discourage defendants from insisting upon their innocence and demanding trial by jury hardly implies that every defendant who enters a guilty plea to a charge under the Act does so involuntarily. The power to reject coerced guilty pleas and involuntary jury waivers might alleviate, but it cannot totally eliminate, the constitutional infirmity in the capital punishment provision of the Federal Kidnapping Act.

The opinion ruled that the death penalty provision was severable from the remainder of the statute; therefore, the district court committed error in dismissing the kidnapping count of the indictment. The judgment of the district court was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice White, in Which Black, J., Joined: Justice White dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the FKA could be interpreted in such a way so as to avoid infringing upon constitutional rights of defendants. Justice White stated his position as follows:

The Court strikes down a provision of the Federal Kidnapping Act which authorizes only the jury to impose the death penalty. No question is raised about the death penalty itself or about the propriety of jury participation in its imposition, but confining the power to impose the death penalty to the jury alone is held to burden impermissibly the right to a jury trial because it may either coerce or encourage persons to plead guilty or to waive a jury and be tried by the judge. In my view, however, if the vice of the provision is that it may interfere with the free choice of the defendant to have his guilt or innocence determined by a jury, the Court needlessly invalidates a major portion of an Act of Congress. The Court itself says that not every plea of guilty or waiver of jury trial would be influenced by the power of the jury to impose the death penalty. If this is so, I would not hold the provision unconstitutional but would reverse the judgment, making it clear that pleas of guilty and waivers of jury trial should be carefully examined before they are accepted, in order to make sure that they have been neither coerced nor encouraged by the death penalty power in the jury.

Because this statute may be properly interpreted so as to avoid constitutional questions, I would not take the first step toward invalidation of statutes on their face because they arguably burden the right to jury trial.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of kidnapping without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant could be prosecuted for piracy when he was under the commission of another country. (2) Whether fraudulent conduct used to acquire a ship constitutes piracy.

Case Holdings: (1) The defendant could be prosecuted for piracy when he was under the commission of another country because the purported country was nonexistent. (2) Fraudulent conduct used to acquire a ship does not in and of itself constitute piracy, but it may form part of the offense.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ralph Klinton, was charged by the United States with piracy, a capital offense. The defendant was accused of fraudulently taking a Danish ship, the Norberg, from the Caribbean Sea. The trial occurred in a federal district court in Georgia. The defendant was convicted of piracy. The district court, before imposing the death sentence, certified the following questions to the United States Supreme Court: (1) Could the defendant be punished under the Piracy Act when he was under commission from another country? (2) Could fraudulent conduct constitute piracy?

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Marshall: The chief justice ruled that the commission under which the defendant allegedly sailed was issued by "a republic of whose existence we know nothing." It was said that the mere fact that the defendant was operating under a commission from a nonexistent country was not a justification for excusing the crime.

The opinion also found: "Although the fraud practiced on the [Danish ship] may not of itself constitute piracy, yet it is an ingredient in the transaction which has no tendency to mitigate the character of the offense." The chief justice concluded that "general piracy ... by persons on board of a vessel not at the time belonging to the subjects of any foreign power, but in possession of a crew acting in defiance of all law, and acknowledging obedience to no government whatever, is within the true meaning of [the Piracy Act], and is punishable in the Courts of the United States." *See also Certified Question; United States v. Issue Presented: Whether piratical robbery may be punished with death when robbery on land was not punishable with death by the United States.

Case Holding: Piratical robbery may be punished with death although robbery on land was not punishable with death by the United States.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants in the case, John Palmer, Thomas Wilson, and Barney Calloghan, were charged by the United States with piratical robbery, a capital offense. Prior to trial, the federal court certified the following question to the United States Supreme Court: Could the crime of robbery be punished with death, as required under the Piracy Act, when robbery on land was not punished with death?

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Marshall: The chief justice ruled that, "[h]ad the intention of congress been to render the crime piracy dependent on the punishment affixed to the same offense, if committed on land, this intention must have been expressed in very different terms from those which have been selected [in the statute]." After finding no statutory language limiting imposition of the death penalty for piratical robbery, the chief justice held "that a robbery committed on the high seas, although such robbery, if committed on land, would not, by the laws of the United States, be punishable with death, is piracy [and punishable with death]." See also Certified Question Issues Presented: (1) Whether a foreign defendant who murders another foreigner aboard an American ship may be prosecuted under the Piracy Act. (2) Whether a commission from a belligerent nation immunizes a defendant from being prosecuted for piracy under the Piracy Act. (3) Whether piracy may occur when a ship is anchored near the shore.

Case Holdings: (1) A foreign defendant who murders another foreigner aboard an American ship may be prosecuted under the Piracy Act because national character is lost when piracy is entered into. (2) A commission from a belligerent nation does not immunize a defendant from being prosecuted for piracy under the Piracy Act because national character is lost when piracy is entered into. (3) Piracy may occur when a ship is anchored near the shore.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case was a consolidation of three separate prosecutions for capital piracy by the United States. In one case, the defendant, John Furlong, was charged with two counts of piratical murder, one count of piratical seizure of a vessel, and one count of piratical robbery. In the second case, the defendants, Benjamin Brailsford and James Griffen, were charged with general piracy. In the third case, the defendants, David Bowers and Henry Mathews, were charged with two counts of piratical robbery. All of the defendants were tried and found guilty of each charge against them. The district courts, before imposing death sentences, certified the following questions to the United States Supreme Court: (1) Could a foreigner who killed another foreigner aboard an American ship be prosecuted under the Piracy Act? (2) Does a commission from a belligerent protect a person from being prosecuted for piracy under the Piracy Act? (3) May piracy occur when a vessel is anchored within a marine league of the shore?

Opinion of the Court by Justice Johnson: Justice Johnson ruled the United States had jurisdiction of a piratical murder committed by a foreigner against another foreigner, on board an American vessel. The opinion stated that when a ship was taken “and proceeded on a piratical cruise, the crew lost all claim to national character, and whether citizens or foreigners, became equally punishable under the act.”

The opinion said that a commission from a belligerent nation would not immunize piratical conduct from the Piracy Act. Justice Johnson reasoned that, because national character is lost when piracy is undertaken, the fact of obtaining a commission from a belligerent nation is irrelevant.

Finally, the opinion stated that anchorage of a ship does not defeat an act of piracy. Justice Johnson wrote: “It is historically known, that in prosecuting trade with many places, vessels lie at anchor in open situations, under the lay of the land. Such vessels are neither in a river, haven, basin or bay, and are no where, unless it be on the seas. Being at anchor is immaterial, for this might happen in a thousand places in the open ocean.” See also Issue Presented: Whether the defendant could be punished with death for plundering a ship.

Case Holding: The defendant could be punished with death for plundering a ship.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas Smith, was charged by the United States with piracy, a capital offense. The defendant was accused of taking and plundering a ship in the Caribbean Sea. The trial occurred in a federal district court in Virginia. The defendant was convicted of piracy. The district court, before imposing a sentence of death, certified the following question to the United States Supreme Court: (1) Could the defendant be punished under the Piracy Act for plundering a ship?

Opinion of the Court by Justice Story: Justice Story noted that the provision under the Piracy Act which the defendant was prosecuted provided “that if any person or persons whatsoever, shall, upon the high seas, commit the crime of piracy, as defined by the law of nations, and such offender or offenders shall be brought into, or found in the United States, every such offender or offenders shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished with death.” The opinion found that the latter imprecise definition of piracy did not offend the Constitution. It was said that the conduct attributed to the defendant constituted piracy under the law of nations. Justice Story concluded: “The special verdict finds that the prisoner is guilty of the plunder and robbery charged in the indictment; and finds certain additional facts from which it is most manifest that he and his associates were, at the time of committing the offense, freebooters upon the sea, not under the acknowledged authority, or deriving protection from the flag or commission of any government. If, under such circumstances, the offense be not piracy, it is difficult to conceive any which would more completely fit the definition.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Livingston: Justice Livingston dissented from the Court’s opinion. He argued that the provision under the Piracy Act by which the defendant was convicted violated the Constitution. Justice Livingston contended that Congress had no authority to define piracy in terms of whatever could be found in law books pertaining to the law of nations. *See also Certified Question; United States v. United Students Against the Death Penalty The United Students Against the Death Penalty is an organization formed for the purpose of abolishing the use of the death penalty in Connecticut. The group consists of college students and concerned citizens from around the State of Connecticut.

Unlawfully Obtaining Custody of Defendant Under the common law, a criminal defendant could be unlawfully abducted and brought within the jurisdiction of a court for prosecution. In such a situation, a defendant may be able to prosecute a civil lawsuit against his or her abductor, but the defendant could not obtain release from the criminal jurisdiction of the court merely because of improper means in obtaining custody of him or her. The United States Supreme Court has indicated that, even in the context of a capital offense, the Constitution does not prohibit the prosecution of a defendant who has been illegally brought within the jurisdiction of the prosecuting court, so long as the court has jurisdiction over the offense. See also Ex Parte Johnson

Utah The State of Utah is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on July 1, 1973.

Utah has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Utah Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The Utah Court of Appeals is composed of a presiding judge and six judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Utah are tried in the district courts.

Under the laws of Utah, a capital prosecution is triggered if a person commits a homicide, defined by Utah Code § 76-5-201(1) as follows:

A person ... intentionally, knowingly, recklessly, with criminal negligence, or acting with a mental state otherwise specified in the statute defining the offense, causes the death of another human being, including an unborn child at any stage of its development.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Utah Code § 76-5-202 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the guilt phase.

a. The homicide was committed by a person who is confined in a jail or other correctional institution;

b. The homicide was committed incident to one act, scheme, course of conduct, or criminal episode during which two or more persons were killed, or during which the offender attempted to kill one or more persons in addition to the victim who was killed;

c. The offender knowingly created a great risk of death to a person other than the victim and the offender;

d. The homicide was committed while the offender was engaged in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, or flight after committing or attempting to commit, aggravated robbery, robbery, rape, rape of a child, object rape, object rape of a child, forcible sodomy, sodomy upon a child, forcible sexual abuse, sexual abuse of a child, aggravated sexual abuse of a child, child abuse of a child under the age of 14 years, or aggravated sexual assault, aggravated arson, arson, aggravated burglary, burglary, aggravated kidnapping, kidnapping, or child kidnapping;

e. The homicide was committed incident to one act, scheme, course of conduct, or criminal episode during which the actor committed the crime of abuse or desecration of a dead human body;

f. The homicide was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing an arrest of the defendant or another by a peace officer acting under color of legal authority or for the purpose of effecting the defendant's or another's escape from lawful custody;

g. The homicide was committed for pecuniary or other personal gain;

h. The defendant committed, or engaged or employed another person to commit the homicide pursuant to an agreement or contract for remuneration or the promise of remuneration for commission of the homicide;

i. The offender previously committed or was convicted of aggravated murder; attempted aggravated murder; murder; attempted murder; or an offense committed in another jurisdiction which if committed in this state would be a violation of a crime;

j. The offender was previously convicted of aggravated assault; mayhem; kidnapping; child kidnapping; aggravated kidnapping; rape; rape of a child; object rape; object rape of a child; forcible sodomy; sodomy on a child; aggravated sexual abuse of a child; aggravated sexual assault; aggravated arson; aggravated burglary; aggravated robbery; or an offense committed in another jurisdiction which if committed in this state would be a violation of a crime;

k. The homicide was committed for the purpose of preventing a witness from testifying; preventing a person from providing evidence or participating in any legal proceedings or official investigation; retaliating against a person for testifying, providing evidence, or participating in any legal proceedings or official investigation; or disrupting or hindering any lawful governmental function or enforcement of laws;

l. The victim is or has been a local, state, or federal public official, or a candidate for public office, and the homicide is based on, is caused by, or is related to that official position, act, capacity, or candidacy;

m. The victim is or has been a peace officer, law enforcement officer, executive officer, prosecuting officer, jailer, prison official, firefighter, judge or other court official, juror, probation officer, or parole officer, and the victim is either on duty or the homicide is based on, is caused by, or is related to that official position, and the actor knew, or reasonably should have known, that the victim holds or has held that official position;

n. The homicide was committed by means of a destructive device, bomb, explosive, incendiary device, or similar device which was planted, hidden, or concealed in any place, area, dwelling, building, or structure, or was mailed or delivered; or by means of any weapon of mass destruction;

o. The homicide was committed during the act of unlawfully assuming control of any aircraft, train, or other public conveyance by use of threats or force with intent to obtain any valuable consideration for the release of the public conveyance or any passenger, crew member, or any other person aboard, or to direct the route or movement of the public conveyance or otherwise exert control over the public conveyance;

p. The homicide was committed by means of the administration of a poison or of any lethal substance or of any substance administered in a lethal amount, dosage, or quantity;

q. The victim was a person held or otherwise detained as a shield, hostage, or for ransom;

r. The homicide was committed in an especially heinous, atrocious, cruel, or exceptionally depraved manner, any of which must be demonstrated by physical torture, serious physical abuse, or serious bodily injury of the victim before death; or

s. The actor dismembers, mutilates, or disfigures the victim's body, whether before or after death, in a manner demonstrating the actor's depravity of mind.

Capital murder in Utah is punishable by death, life imprisonment without parole, or imprisonment a term of years. A capital prosecution in Utah is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury does not find a sentence of death is appropriate, the jury may sentence the defendant to life without parole or to a term of years. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Utah.

Utah does not provide statutory aggravating circumstances for the penalty phase jury to consider. The State imposes a death sentence based upon a conviction for one of the guilt phase special circumstances. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor may present evidence regarding the guilt phase special circumstance and any other relevant aggravating factor.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Utah has provided by Utah Code § 76-3-207(4) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

a. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity;

b. The homicide was committed while the defendant was under the influence of mental or emotional disturbance;

c. The defendant acted under duress or under the domination of another person;

d. At the time of the homicide, the capacity of the defendant to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirement of law was impaired as a result of mental disease, intoxication, or influence of drugs;

e. The youth of the defendant at the time of the crime;

f. The defendant was an accomplice in the homicide committed by another person and the defendant's participation was relatively minor; and

g. Any other fact in mitigation of the penalty.

Under Utah's capital punishment statute, the Utah Supreme Court does not automatically review a sentence of death. A capital felon must initiate an appeal of a death sentence. Utah uses lethal injection to carry out the death penalty. However, inmates whose sentence was given prior to May 3, 2004, may choose the firing squad. Further, under the laws of Utah, if lethal injection is found unconstitutional, then the firing squad is used. The State's death row facility for men is located in Draper, Utah. Pursuant to the laws of Utah, an executive panel that includes the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of Utah, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Utah Code § 77-19-11:

1. At the discretion of the director, the following persons may attend the execution:

a. The prosecuting attorney, or a designated deputy, of the county in which the defendant committed the offense for which he is being executed;

b. No more than two law enforcement officials from the county in which the defendant committed the offense for which he is being executed;

c. The attorney general or a designee;

d. Religious representatives, friends, or relatives designated by the defendant, not exceeding a total of five persons; and

e. Unless approved by the director, no more than five close relatives of the deceased victim.

2. The director shall permit the attendance at the execution of members of the press and broadcast news media, as named by the director in accordance with rules of the department; and with the agreement of the selected news media members that they serve as a pool for other members of the news media.

3. a. The following persons may also attend the execution: (i) staff as determined by the director; and (ii) no more than three correctional officials from other states that are preparing for executions, but no more than two correctional officials may be from any one state, as designated by the director.

b. A person younger than 18 years of age may not attend.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Utah executed only six capital felons. During this period, Utah did not have any female capital felons on death row. A total of nine capital felons were on death row in Utah as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as one black inmate, six white inmates, one Hispanic inmate, and one Native American inmate.

Utter Disregard for Human Life Aggravator Idaho is the only capital punishment jurisdiction using the utter disregard for human life aggravator. If this aggravator is found to exist at the penalty phase, the death penalty may be imposed.

The utter disregard for human life statutory aggravator has been found unconstitutionally vague where no definition has been crafted to provide reasonable understanding of the type of conduct it seeks to capture. However, the utter disregard for human life aggravator has been found to pass constitutional muster when appropriate definitional language is included. The meaning attached to this aggravator is that a capital felon acted in cold blood, without feeling, sympathy, or lack of emotion. See also Arave v. Creech; Aggravating Circumstances

Uzbekistan Capital punishment is allowed in Uzbekistan. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. The crimes punishable by death include murder, espionage, and treason. Uzbekistan's legal system is based on Russian civil law. The nation adopted a new constitution on December 8, 1992.

The judicial system of Uzbekistan is composed of district courts, regional courts, and a Supreme Court. Trials are open to the public. There is no jury system. Trials are presided over by a judge and two lay assessors. Defendants have the right to retained or appointed legal counsel and the right to confront witnesses. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the absence of the defendant during the trial judge's visit to the crime scene denied him due process of law.

Case Holding: The absence of the defendant during the trial judge's visit to the crime scene did not deny him due process of law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Emilio Valdez, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death under the United States' territorial jurisdiction of the Philippine Islands. The Philippine Islands Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that he had a right to be present when the trial court viewed the site of the crime. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice McKenna: Justice McKenna held that the defendant did not have a right to be present when the trial judge visited the site of the crime. It was noted that counsel for the defendant was present during the visit. Justice McKenna reasoned that the Court "must assume that the judge, in his inspection of the scene of the homicide, was not improperly addressed by anyone, and, in the presence of counsel, did no more than visualize the testimony of the witnesses,—giving it a certain picturesqueness, it may be, but not adding to or changing it." It was also said that to require the presence of the defendant during such visit would lead to the absurd conclusion "that an accused is entitled to be with the judge in his meditations, and that he could entertain no conception nor form any judgment without such personal presence." The judgment of the Philippine Islands Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Clarke, in Which White, C.J., Joined: Justice Clarke dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the defendant had a right to be personally present when the trial court visited the crime scene. Justice Clarke wrote: "It has long been familiar, textbook, law, that a viewing of the premises where the crime is alleged to have been committed is part of the trial.... It is very clear to my mind ... that the viewing of the scene of the murder by the judge without the presence of the accused requires that it be reversed and a new trial granted." See also Jury View Issue Presented: Whether the procedure used by New Jersey for a defendant desiring to plead guilty to a crime comports with the federal Constitution.

Case Holding: The procedure used by New Jersey for a defendant desiring to plead guilty to a crime does not raise a federal constitutional issue, but is a matter of State law only.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Anna Valentina, was indicted by the State of New Jersey for capital murder. The defendant desired to plead guilty. Under the laws of the State, a defendant desiring to plead guilty was entitled to have a trial solely to determine the degree of guilt. In the case of the defendant, the degree of guilt was first-degree murder or second-degree murder. A trial on the degree of the defendant's guilt was held. The defendant was convicted of committing murder in the first degree and was thereafter sentenced to death. The New Jersey Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The defendant thereafter filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court, alleging she was denied a trial to determine her guilt or innocence. The petition was dismissed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Peckham: Justice Peckham held that the Court did not have jurisdiction to review the merits of the defendant's claim, because it did not involve a question of federal law. The opinion set out the Court's reasoning as follows:

The contention of the counsel for the [defendant] is that the proceedings upon the trial, which resulted in [the defendant's] sentence to death, did not amount to a trial at common law, or a proceeding authorized by any statute. That it was a mere inquiry to determine the degree of murder of which defendant was guilty, and hence she has never had a trial by due process of law, and the action of the state court was without jurisdiction. A perusal of the charge of the court to the jury shows that the whole case was presented to the jury upon the evidence that was produced in court. Upon all the evidence given the court stated to the jury that there was no evidence to show that the defendant killed the deceased in her necessary self-defense, and the court instructed the jury that it would not be justified in acquitting the defendant on the ground of self-defense. The court further said that there was no question of manslaughter in the case, and that, not only as a necessary conclusion from the evidence, but upon the admitted facts in the case, the defendant was guilty of the crime of murder, and the only question left for the consideration of the jury was whether it was murder in the first degree or second degree. The court gave an extended explanation as to what constituted murder in the first degree and what constituted murder in the second degree....

The charge of the court was the subject of review by the court of last resort of the state of New Jersey, and it was held by that court to be without error. Upon the record in this case there can, in our judgment, be no possible doubt that the [defendant] has had a valid trial by a court having jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the person of the accused, and that there was no loss of jurisdiction over either at any time during the trial. What effect was to be given by the court to the admission of counsel (above set forth) was a question of law for the court to decide, and the charge of the court did not oust it of jurisdiction to proceed in the trial of the case. This is to us so plain a proposition that it is unnecessary to enlarge upon it.

Having no power to review on this writ any other question than that of the jurisdiction of the court in the trial and sentence pronounced upon the verdict of guilty, and concluding that there was the necessary jurisdiction the order of the [federal court] refusing the writ of habeas corpus is affirmed.

Vampire Clan Murders On November 29, 1996, four Kentucky teenagers drove to Eustice, Florida, to help fifteen-year-old Heather Wendorf run away from home. The four teenagers were Rodrick Ferrell (sixteen), Dana Cooper (nineteen), Howard Anderson (sixteen), and Charity Keesee (sixteen). The Kentucky teenagers were members of a cult called the Vampire Clan. Authorities believe about thirty teenagers were members of the Vampire Clan. The Vampire Clan's connection with Wendorf was through Ferrell. He met and became friends with her during a two-year period that he lived in Eustice.

Dana Cooper (top left), Howard Anderson (top right), and Charity Keesee (bottom). Cooper and Keesee received stiff prison sentences for their role in the murders of Richard and Naoma Wendorf. Anderson received two sentences of life imprisonment. (Florida Department of Corrections)

When the Vampire Clan arrived in Eustice they found Wendorf. The cult then drove to a cemetery where Ferrell and Wendorf performed a blood-drinking ritual that made her a fellow vampire. Shortly afterwards, Ferrell and Anderson went to the home of Wendorf's parents, Richard and Naoma Wendorf. While inside the home, Ferrell used a crowbar to beat the couple to death as Anderson looked on. Ferrell burned a "V" sign surrounded by circular marks into Richard Wendorf's body. After the murders, the Vampire Clan and Heather Wendorf left Florida driving the Wendorfs' utility vehicle.

When authorities discovered the bodies of Richard and Naomi, they initially believed Heather was a kidnap victim. After further investigation, she became a suspect in the murders. It did not take authorities long to locate the cult. With the help of the mother of one of the cult members, authorities captured the cult in Louisiana.

A grand jury returned murder indictments against Ferrell and Anderson. Cooper and Keesee were charged, indicted as accessories before the fact. No indictment was returned against Wendorf, as it appeared she did not know that her parents would be killed.

The Vampire Clan members were tried separately and each was found guilty. On February 27, 1998, Ferrell was sentenced to death. On April 1, 1998, Anderson was given two life sentences. On July 15, 1998, Cooper was given two sentences of fifteen years. On August 13, 1998, Keesee was given two sentences of ten years. In 2000, the Florida Supreme Court reversed Ferrell's death sentence and imposed a sentence of life imprisonment. The sentence was reduced because of Ferrell's age at the time of the murders.

Rodrick Ferrell was sentenced to death for the murders of Richard and Naoma Wendorf. However, because he was only sixteen years old at the time of the murders, the Florida Supreme Court reversed Rodrick's death sentence and imposed a sentence of life imprisonment. Venue Venue refers to the place in which a crime occurred. Geographically, criminal venue is generally a county. A defendant is entitled to be tried in the venue where the crime was committed. A defendant may seek to change trial venue when pre-trial negative publicity makes it unlikely that an impartial jury can be selected from the area. *See also Irvin v. Vermont The death penalty is not carried out by the State of Vermont. It was abolished for most crimes in 1965 and subsequently for all crimes.

Victim Impact Evidence Victim impact evidence involves personal characteristics of the victim and the emotional, economic, and social impact of the crime on the victim's immediate family. This type of evidence was once found to violate the federal Constitution as being too prejudicial for use at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution. However, it is now recognized that victim impact evidence does not offend the federal Constitution and may be admissible at a capital penalty phase proceeding for the penalty phase jury to consider as non-statutory aggravating evidence.

As a result of the emotional appeal and prejudice of victim impact evidence, courts are generally strict in the type of victim evidence they will permit the jury to consider. Highly inflammatory or irrelevant victim impact evidence is usually barred from introduction at the penalty phase. Victim impact evidence is admitted at the penalty phase proceeding only after there is present in the record evidence of one or more statutory aggravating circumstances.

Victim impact evidence is to be distinguished from sympathy for the victim. The death penalty may not be imposed based upon sympathy for the victim. Imposition of a sentence of death must be grounded upon the interplay of mitigating and aggravating circumstances. See also Booth v. Maryland; California v. Brown; Payne v. Tennessee; South Carolina v. Gathers

Victim's Consent Mitigator A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made a murder victim's consent or participation in the crime a statutory mitigating circumstance. Under this mitigator, a capital felon must present evidence that the victim consented to or otherwise took part in his or her death. See also Mitigating Circumstances

NUMBER OF JURISDICTIONS USING VICTIM'S CONSENT MITIGATOR

Victim's Family's Right to Attend Execution The family members of a murder victim do not have a federal constitutional right to be present at the execution of capital felon. Jurisdictions have absolute authority to admit or deny public access to an execution. Only a few jurisdictions provide by statute for the attendance of family members of the victim at an execution. See also Public Viewing of Execution

Victim's Opinion about the Death Penalty In a few capital prosecutions, victims of capital murder have left behind documented opinions about their views on the death penalty. Such views have been for and against the death penalty. Courts have prohibited capital defendants from introducing victim opinions that opposed capital punishment. And, too, courts have barred prosecutors from introducing as victim impact evidence documented statements by capital murder victims approving of the death penalty. Courts have precluded such evidence on both sides because it goes to the issue of the appropriate sentence to be imposed. The determination of the appropriate sentence must be made purely upon factors that aggravated a murder, as well as factors surrounding the character of the capital defendant and the circumstances of the crime that mitigate the punishment. See also Individualized Sentencing

Issue Presented: Whether the guilt phase juries in the defendants' capital trials were properly instructed on the meaning of the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of proof.

Case Holding: The guilt phase juries in the defendants' capital trials were properly instructed on the meaning of the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of proof.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved two consolidated cases that presented the same issue. In the first case, the defendant, Clarence Victor, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Nebraska. In the second case, the defendant, Alfred Arthur Sandoval, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of California. Both defendants unsuccessfully challenged their convictions in their respective State supreme courts, on the grounds that the trial judges erroneously instructed the guilt phase juries on the meaning of "beyond a reasonable doubt." Both defendants contended that the erroneous instructions violated the Due Process Clause of the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari for both cases to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor noted that prosecutors must prove beyond a reasonable doubt every element of a charged offense. She wrote that, taken as a whole, the instructions in both cases correctly conveyed the concept of reasonable doubt. The opinion ruled that there was no reasonable likelihood that the jurors understood the instructions to allow convictions based on proof less than that of beyond a reasonable doubt.

It was also said that the Constitution does not dictate that any particular form of words be used in advising the jury of the government's burden of proof at the guilt phase, so long as, taken as a whole, the instructions correctly convey the concept of reasonable doubt. The opinion stated that the proper inquiry is not whether an instruction "could have" been applied unconstitutionally, but whether there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury did so apply it unconstitutionally. The judgments of the Nebraska Supreme Court and California Supreme Court were affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy concurred in the Court's decision. He indicated that the California instruction contained a term that was problematic, but it was not fatal to the instruction as a whole.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Ginsburg: Justice Ginsburg concurred in the Court's opinion. She was concerned that both instructions contained terms that were obscure, but that "the instructions adequately conveyed to the jurors that they should focus exclusively upon the evidence, and that they should convict only if they had an 'abiding conviction' of the defendants' guilt."

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Souter, J., Joined: Justice Blackmun concurred in the Court's opinion of the validity of the instruction in Sandoval's case, but dissented from the Court's judgment. He indicated that he dissented from the opinion and judgment of the Court in Victor's case.

Justice Blackmun said that the instruction in Victor's case had the same flaws that the Court disapproved of in Cage v. Louisiana. Justice Blackmun wrote: "The majority today purports to uphold and follow Cage, but plainly falters in its application of that case. There is no meaningful difference between the jury instruction delivered at Victor's trial and the jury instruction issued in Cage, save the fact that the jury instruction in Victor's case did not contain the two words 'grave uncertainty.' But the mere absence of these two words can be of no help to the State, since there is other language in the instruction that is equally offensive to due process."

The basis of Justice Blackmun's dissent in the judgment of Sandoval's case was his "view that the death penalty cannot be imposed fairly within the constraints of our Constitution." See also Burden of Proof at Guilt Phase; *Cage v. Louisiana Vigilance Committee of San Francisco During the 1850s, lawlessness was at its height in San Francisco, California. The gold rush fever broke down the organs of government and crime went largely unpunished. In an effort to bring crime under control, a few leading citizens of the city helped form the famous Vigilance Committee in 1851. The Committee took on the task of prosecuting lawbreakers as an unofficial organ of government. The Committee prosecuted criminals from 1851 to 1852 before yielding to the official law enforcement organs of government.

One of the leading supporters of the Committee was James King, a former banker. On October 8, 1855, King launched the publication of newspaper called The Evening Bulletin. King used the newspaper as a voice to rally citizens to help fight rampant crime and corruption, even though the Committee had disbanded.

Shortly after King started his newspaper, a notorious gambler named Charles Cora shot and killed a local United States marshal named William H. Richardson. Cora was arrested by the local sheriff. King believed the sheriff would accept a bribe and allow Cora to escape. Consequently, King announced in his newspaper that if Cora escaped, the sheriff must hang in his place.

King received widespread public support for his attack on the sheriff. In response to that support, King launched attacks on other local government officials. One of the politicians King took on was James P. Casey, a city supervisor. King informed the public that Casey was an ex-convict who was imprisoned in New York's Sing Sing Prison. King's attack on Casey was the last effort on his part to fight crime and corruption in the city. On May 14, 1856, Casey shot King as he was leaving his newspaper headquarters. King died in his home on May 20. Casey was arrested for the shooting.

During the few days that King was at home clinging to life, over ten thousand people crowded around his home daily to hear the latest on his condition. At the same time, his supporters began to reorganize the Vigilance Committee in the event that he died. When King in fact died, almost four thousand people had joined the Committee, which was spearheaded by William T. Coleman, a prominent member of the old Committee of 1851.

On the day of King's death, the members of the Committee marched to the jail where Casey was being held and removed him. Casey was taken to a lodge where the Committee had hastily set up headquarters. Shortly after taking Casey, the Committee returned to the jail and took Cora.

On May 21, both Casey and Cora were prosecuted by the Committee for murder. The trial was presided over by a jury and both men had "lawyers." The jury found Casey guilty of murdering King and found Cora guilty of murdering Marshal Richardson. They were both sentenced to death.

On May 22, Cora and Casey were taken atop a city building and prepared for execution. Thousands of people lined the streets below. At precisely twenty minutes after one o'clock, the bodies of both men were tossed from the building as ropes snapped their necks.

Vinson, Fred M. Fred M. Vinson served as chief justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1946 to 1953. While on the Supreme Court, Vinson was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Vinson was born in Louisa, Kentucky, on January 22, 1890. He received his law degree from Center College in 1911. Vinson had a modest and obscure legal practice in Kentucky. He developed national contacts after his election to the United States House of Representatives, beginning in 1923. He was appointed as an appellate judge on the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in 1937. In 1946, President Harry S. Truman appointed Vinson chief justice of the Supreme Court.

During Vinson's relatively short tenure on the Supreme Court, he wrote only a few capital punishment opinions. The opinion which has endeared his name to capital punishment jurisprudence was written for the Court in Rosenberg v. United States. In that case, Vinson rejected an appeal by a "next friend" seeking to stop the execution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg. The opinion in the case was actually issued after the Rosenbergs were executed. Vinson died on September 8, 1953.

Virginia The State of Virginia is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on October 1, 1975.

Virginia has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Virginia Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Virginia Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and nine judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of Virginia are tried in the circuit courts.

Virginia's capital punishment offenses are set out under Va. Code § 18.2-31. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following aggravating circumstances:

1. The willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing of any person in the commission of abduction, when such abduction was committed with the intent to extort money or a pecuniary benefit or with the intent to defile the victim of such abduction;
2. The willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing of any person by another for hire;
3. The willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing of any person by a prisoner confined in a state or local correctional facility, or while in the custody of an employee thereof;
4. The willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing of any person in the commission of robbery or attempted robbery;

Capital murder in Virginia is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Virginia is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Virginia.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant under Virginia law, it is required by Va. Code § 19.2-264.4(C) that the jury answer affirmatively one of the following special issues at the penalty phase:

There is a probability based upon evidence of the prior history of the defendant or of the circumstances surrounding the commission of the offense of which he is accused [1] that he would commit criminal acts of violence that would constitute a continuing serious threat to society, or [2] that his conduct in committing the offense was outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman, in that it involved torture, depravity of mind or aggravated battery to the victim.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Virginia has provided by Va. Code § 19.2-264.4(B) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

(i) the defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity, (ii) the capital felony was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance, (iii) the victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to the act, (iv) at the time of the commission of the capital felony, the capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was significantly impaired, (v) the age of the defendant at the time of the commission of the capital offense, or (vi) the sub-average intellectual functioning of the defendant.

Under Virginia's capital punishment statute, the Virginia Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Virginia permits a capital felon to choose between death by lethal injection or electrocution. The State's death row facility for men is located in Waverly, Virginia. Pursuant to the laws of Virginia, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of Virginia a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Va. Code § 53.1-234:

At the execution there shall be present the Director or an assistant, a physician employed by the Department or his assistant, such other employees of the Department as may be required by the Director and, in addition thereto, at least six citizens who shall not be employees of the Department. In addition, the counsel for the prisoner and a clergyman may be present.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; Virginia executed ninety-seven capital felons. During this period, Virginia did not execute any female capital felon, although it had one female on death row. A total of twenty-one capital felons were on death row in Virginia as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as eleven black inmates and ten white inmates.

NUMBER OF EXECUTIONS BY VIRGINIA 1976–OCTOBER 2006

Virginians for Alternatives to the Death Penalty Virginians for Alternatives to the Death Penalty (VADP) was founded in 1991 in Charlottesville, Virginia. VADP was formed for the purpose of educating Virginians about alternative punishments to the death penalty. VADP sponsors statewide public forums that highlight what it believes are the injustices of the death penalty. The organization circulates a newsletter that provides State and national death penalty information. VADP also has a program designed to work closely with the families of murder victims.

Void for Vagueness Doctrine The void for vagueness doctrine is a legal tool used to invalidate laws that are obscure or misleading in their meaning or application. Wainwright v. Goode Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Wainwright v. Goode, 464 U.S. 78 (1983); Argued: Not reported; Decided: November 28, 1983; Opinion of the Court: Per Curiam; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Brennan, in which Marshall, J., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: Not reported; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: Not reported Issue Presented: Whether consideration by a trial court of an impermissible aggravating circumstance during the penalty phase of a capital prosecution required reversal of the defendant's sentence of death.

Case Holding: Where the record indicates the State's highest court re-weighed aggravating and mitigating circumstances, excluding the impermissible aggravator, and thereafter affirmed the death sentence, any error in a trial court's consideration of an impermissible aggravator is harmless error.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Arthur Goode, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Florida. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. After exhausting State post-conviction remedies, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that the sentencing judge considered a non-statutory aggravating circumstance, future dangerousness, that was impermissible under Florida law. The district court denied relief. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed after concluding, from the record, the State's appellate court's finding that the sentencing judge did not rely on the future dangerousness aggravator was not fairly supported by the record as a whole and that the execution of the defendant would be in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion ruled that, assuming that the issue of whether the sentencing judge had relied on a non-statutory aggravating circumstance was a question of law, it was an issue of State law that was resolved by the Florida Supreme Court. It was said that the Florida Supreme Court's resolution should have been accepted by the Court of Appeals, since the views of a State's highest court with respect to State law are binding on the federal courts.

As an alternative disposition of the issue, the per curiam opinion held: "Even if the Court of Appeals were correct in concluding that the sentencing judge had relied on a factor unavailable to him under state law, it erred in reversing the District Court's dismissal of [the defendant's] habeas corpus petition. It does not appear that if the sentencing judge did consider such a factor, the balancing process of comparing aggravating and mitigating circumstances, as prescribed by the Florida statute, was so infected as to render the death sentence constitutionally impermissible. Whatever may have been true of the sentencing judge, there is no claim that in conducting its independent reweighing of the aggravating and mitigating circumstances the Florida Supreme Court considered [the defendant's] future dangerousness. Thus, there is no basis for concluding that the procedures followed by the State produced an arbitrary or freakish sentence forbidden by the Eighth Amendment." The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, J., Joined: Justice Brennan expressed his disapproval of the Court's summary disposition of the case, as well as the judgment of the Court. He stated his concerns as follows:

Even if I were to accept the prevailing view that the death penalty is constitutionally permissible under certain circumstances, I would nonetheless object to the Court's summary reversal of the decision of the Court of Appeals. By taking this step, the Court adds to a growing and disturbing trend toward summary disposition of cases involving capital punishment.

When an intervening decision of this Court may affect a lower court's decision, our practice has generally been to grant the petition for certiorari, vacate the lower court judgment, and remand for further consideration in light of the intervening decision.... That the Court today chooses to reverse summarily instead of remanding ... not only contradicts our general practice, but also demonstrates once again the Court's disquieting readiness to dispose of cases involving the death penalty on the merits without benefit of full briefing or oral argument.

Witt*, 469 U.S. 412 (1985); Argued: October 2, 1984; Decided: January 21, 1985; Opinion of the Court: Justice Rehnquist; Concurring Opinion: Justice Stevens; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Brennan, in which Marshall, J., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: William C. Issue Presented: Determining the proper standard for evaluating when a prospective juror may be excluded for cause because of his or her views on capital punishment.

Case Holding: The proper standard for determining when a prospective juror may be excluded for cause because of his or her views on capital punishment is whether the juror's views would prevent or substantially impair the performance of his or her duties as a juror in accordance with his or her instructions and oath.

This standard does not require that a juror's bias be proved with unmistakable clarity.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Johnny Paul Witt, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Florida. On direct appeal to the Florida Supreme Court, he argued that several prospective jurors had been improperly excluded for "cause" because of their opposition to capital punishment, in violation of the decision by the United States Supreme Court in Witherspoon v. Illinois. The appellate court rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence.

After unsuccessfully seeking post-conviction review in the State courts, the defendant filed a federal petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The federal district court denied relief. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed and granted the writ, holding that, on the basis of the voir dire questioning by the prosecutor, one of the prospective jurors was improperly excused for cause under Witherspoon. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider whether the federal Court of Appeals applied the correct standard in reviewing the case.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist determined that the Court of Appeals applied the wrong standard in evaluating the defendant's claim. The opinion held that the proper standard for determining when a prospective juror may be excluded for cause because of his or her views on capital punishment is whether the juror's views would prevent or substantially impair the performance of his or her duties as a juror in accordance with his or her instructions and oath. It was further ruled that this standard does not require that a juror's bias be proved with unmistakable clarity.

The opinion found that the Court of Appeals committed error by focusing unduly on the lack of clarity of the questioning of the prospective juror and in focusing on whether the juror's answers indicated that she would automatically vote against the death penalty.

Justice Rehnquist ruled that, under the facts of this case, the prospective juror in question was properly excused for cause. The opinion found that there were adequate written indicia of the trial judge's factual finding to satisfy its decision to grant a challenge for cause. The transcript of voir dire showed that the prospective juror was questioned in the presence of both counsels and the trial judge, that at the end of the colloquy between the prosecutor and the juror the prosecutor challenged for cause, and that the challenge was sustained. The opinion held that nothing more was required. The trial court was not required to write a specific finding or announce for the record its conclusion that, or its reasons why, the prospective juror was biased. The trial court's finding was therefore presumed correct, absent a contrary showing. The opinion concluded that there was ample support for the trial court's finding that the prospective juror's views would have prevented or substantially impaired the performance of her duties as a juror. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens concurred in the Court's judgment, but did not join the Court's opinion "[b]ecause the Court's opinion contains so much discussion that is unnecessary to the resolution of this case."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan dissented from the majority opinion because of his fundamental belief that the Constitution prohibited imposition of the death penalty. As a second basis for dissenting, Justice Brennan argued that the Court was abandoning principles laid down in Witherspoon on death-qualified juries. The dissent contended as follows:

In Witherspoon v. Illinois, the Court recognized that the voir dire practice of "death qualification" — the exclusion for cause, in capital cases, of jurors opposed to capital punishment — can dangerously erode this "inestimable safeguard" by creating unrepresentative juries "uncommonly willing to condemn a man to die." To protect against this risk, Witherspoon and its progeny have required the State to make an exceptionally strong showing that a prospective juror's views about the death penalty will result in actual bias toward the defendant before permitting exclusion of the juror for cause.

The Court of Appeals below correctly applied the stringent Witherspoon standards to the voir dire colloquy between the prosecutor and prospective juror[.] Reversing this decision, the Court today abandons Witherspoon's strict limits on death-qualification and holds instead that death-qualification exclusions be evaluated under the same standards as exclusions for any other cause. Championing the right of the State to a jury purged of all possibility of partiality toward a capital defendant, the Court today has shown itself willing to ignore what the Court in Witherspoon and its progeny thought crucial: The inevitable result of the quest for such purity in the jury room in a capital case is not a neutral jury drawn from a fair cross section of the community but a jury biased against the defendant, at least with respect to penalty, and a jury from which an identifiable segment of the community has been excluded. Until today it had been constitutionally impermissible for the State to require a defendant to place his life in the hands of such a jury; our fundamental notions of criminal justice were thought to demand that the State, not the defendant, bear the risk of a less than wholly neutral jury when perfect neutrality cannot, as in this situation it most assuredly cannot, be achieved. Today the State's right to ensure exclusion of any juror who might fail to vote the death penalty when the State's capital punishment scheme permits such a verdict vanquishes the defendant's right to a jury that assuredly will not impose the death penalty when that penalty would be inappropriate.

Waite, Morrison R. Morrison R. Waite served as chief justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1874 to 1888. While on the Supreme Court, Waite was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Waite was in Lyme, Connecticut, on November 19, 1816. He educated at Yale University and graduated 1837. Waite studied law with his father, who was a lawyer and judge. In 1839, Waite was admitted to the Ohio bar. Waite was a successful law who gained national prominence after his representation of the United States in arbitration proceedings against England for post-Civil War claims. Waite succeeded in obtaining a settlement from England in the amount of $15 million. In 1874, President Ulysses S. Grant nominated Waite as chief justice of the Supreme Court.

Waite was known to only issue a few capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court (frequently the Court issued criminal law opinions which did not indicate what punishment the defendant received). In the case of Ex Parte Spies, eight defendants (seven received death sentences) sought to have the judgments against them reversed because an Illinois statute did not disqualify jurors who had prior knowledge of a case. (The defendants' prosecution gained national attention because they were anarchists.) Waite, writing for the Court, rejected the defendants' argument that the statute violated due process of law. He wrote that the statute was valid because it required jurors give an oath that they could fairly and impartially decide the issues in the case. Waite died on March 23, 1888.

Waiver In spite of the many constitutional and statutory protections afforded a capital felon, he or she may waive the vast majority of such protections. For example, capital felons generally may waive the right to appeal a capital “conviction.” In all waiver situations, a record must be made which shows that a defendant voluntarily and knowingly gave up a right guaranteed to him or her. See also Requesting Death

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court committed error in preventing the defendant from proffering evidence that the victim previously threatened him.

Case Holding: The trial court committed error in preventing the defendant from proffering evidence that the victim previously threatened him because the defendant’s defense was self-defense.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Jerry Wallace, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the trial court committed error in not allowing him to put on evidence that the victim had previously threatened him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that, because the defendant’s defense was self-defense, he had a right to put on evidence showing the victim previously threatened him. The opinion addressed the matter as follows:

If Jerry Wallace believed, and had reasonable ground for the belief, that he was in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm from [the victim], at the moment he fired, and would not have fired but for such belief, and if that belief, founded on reasonable ground, might, in any view the jury could properly take of the circumstances surrounding the killing, have excused his act, or reduced the crime from murder to manslaughter, then the evidence in respect of [the victim’s] threats was relevant, and it was error to exclude it....

Where a difficulty is intentionally brought on for the purpose of killing the deceased, the fact of imminent danger to the accused constitutes no defense; but where the accused embarks in a quarrel with no felonious intent or malice, or premeditated purpose of doing bodily harm or killing, and, under reasonable belief of imminent danger he inflicts a fatal wound, it is not murder.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. See also Self-Defense

Issues Presented: (1) Whether every finding of fact underlying the capital sentencing decision must be made by a jury, not by a judge. (2) Whether Arizona’s death penalty statute violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments because it imposed on defendants the burden of establishing, by a preponderance of the evidence, the existence of mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency. (3) Whether the requirement under Arizona’s death penalty statute that the trial court “shall impose” the death penalty if one or more aggravating circumstances are found and mitigating circumstances are held insufficient to call for leniency created an unconstitutional presumption that death is the proper sentence. (4) Whether the statutory aggravating circumstance “especially heinous, cruel, or depraved” was unconstitutionally vague.

Case Holdings: (1) Every finding of fact underlying the capital sentencing decision does not have to be made by a jury and can be made by a judge. (2) Arizona’s death penalty statute did not violate the Constitution by imposing on defendants the burden of establishing, by a preponderance of the evidence, the existence of mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency. (3) The requirement under Arizona’s death penalty statute that the trial court “shall impose” the death penalty if one or more aggravating circumstances are found and mitigating circumstances are held insufficient to call for leniency did not create an unconstitutional presumption that death is the proper sentence. (4) The statutory aggravating circumstance “especially heinous, cruel, or depraved,” as construed by the Arizona Supreme Court, was not unconstitutionally vague.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Jeffrey Walton, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Arizona. The Arizona Supreme Court upheld the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant’s argument (1) that the Constitution required a jury return the death sentence verdict; (2) that the federal Constitution prohibited the State’s requirement that he prove penalty phase mitigating circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence; (3) that the statutory requirement which provided that the court “shall impose” the death penalty if one or more aggravating circumstances are found and mitigating circumstances are held insufficient to call for leniency created an unconstitutional presumption that death is the proper sentence; and (4) that the statutory aggravating circumstance of “especially heinous, cruel, or depraved” was constitutionally vague. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White ruled that, under prior precedent by the Court, Arizona's requirement that the judge make the determination of punishment did not violate the Constitution. It was said that the Constitution did not require that every finding of fact underlying a sentencing decision be made by a jury rather than by a judge.

Justice White rejected the defendant's contention that the Constitution prohibited the State from requiring him to prove mitigating circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence. It was said that the defendant's constitutional rights were not violated by placing on him the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence the existence of mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency, since Arizona's method of allocating the burdens of proof did not lessen the State's burden to prove the existence of aggravating circumstances.

The opinion also rejected the defendant's argument that the State's death penalty statute created an unconstitutional presumption that death is the proper sentence by requiring that the court "shall impose" the death penalty under the specified circumstances. It was said that the statute neither precluded the trial court from considering any type of mitigating evidence nor automatically imposed a death sentence for certain types of murder. The opinion ruled that states were free to structure and shape consideration of mitigating evidence in an attempt to achieve a more rational and equitable administration of the death penalty.

The Court found that the "especially heinous, cruel, or depraved" statutory aggravating circumstance, as construed by the Arizona Supreme Court, furnished sufficient guidance to the sentencer to satisfy the Constitution. It was said that although juries must be instructed in more than bare terms about an aggravating circumstance that is unconstitutionally vague on its face, trial judges are presumed to know the law and to apply narrower definitions in their decisions. The judgment of the Arizona Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's judgment but indicated he did not agree with some of the Court's reasoning.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan wrote very critically of the majority's resolution of the issues presented. He wrote in dissent: "In the past, 'this Court has gone to extraordinary measures to ensure that the prisoner sentenced to be executed is afforded process that will guarantee, as much as is humanly possible, that the sentence was not imposed out of whim, passion, prejudice, or mistake'; but today's decisions reflect, if anything, the opposing concern that States ought to be able to execute prisoners with as little interference as possible from our established Eighth Amendment doctrine."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun believed that the majority incorrectly resolved the issues presented. He wrote in his dissent: "In my view, two Arizona statutory provisions, pertinent here, run afoul of the established Eighth Amendment principle that a capital defendant is entitled to an individualized sentencing determination which involves the consideration of all relevant mitigating evidence. The first is the requirement that the sentencer may consider only those mitigating circumstances proved by a preponderance of the evidence. The second is the provision that the defendant bears the burden of establishing mitigating circumstances 'sufficiently substantial to call for leniency.' I also conclude that Arizona's 'heinous, cruel or depraved' aggravating circumstance, as construed by the Arizona Supreme Court, provides no meaningful guidance to the sentencing authority and, as a consequence, is unconstitutional."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens believed that the Constitution required a jury make the capital sentencing determination. The dissent issued by Justice Stevens stated: "The Court holds in ... its opinion that a person is not entitled to a jury determination of facts that must be established before the death penalty may be imposed. I am convinced that the Sixth Amendment requires the opposite conclusion."

Case Note: The decision in Walton was later overruled, in part, by Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002). The decision in Ring held that following a jury trial at the guilt phase, the federal constitution required a jury, and not a judge, determine the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating factors for imposition of the death penalty. *See also Burden of Proof at Penalty Phase; Heinous, Atrocious, Cruel or Depraved Aggravator; Jury Trial; Kansas v. Warren, Earl Earl Warren served as chief justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1953 to 1969. While on the Supreme Court, Warren was known as an ultra-liberal interpreter of the Constitution.

Warren was born in Los Angeles, California, on March 19, 1891. He was educated at the University of California at Berkeley, where he received an undergraduate degree and law degree. Warren was admitted to the California bar in 1914. His career included being elected attorney general and governor of California. In 1953, President Dwight D. Eisenhower nominated Warren chief justice of the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Warren issued only a few capital punishment opinions (frequently the Court issued criminal law opinions which did not indicate what punishment the defendant received). The case of Spano v. New York illustrates the ultra-liberal philosophy espoused by Warren. In Spano, the defendant confessed to murder. He appealed, alleging that his confession was involuntary. Warren, writing for the Court, agreed with the defendant. The opinion issued by Warren detailed the methods of questioning employed against the defendant. However, no physical force or intimidation was used against him. Warren held that the mere fact of repeated interrogation made the confession involuntary. Warren died July 9, 1974.

Washington The State of Washington is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on November 4, 1975.

Washington has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Washington Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and eight associate justices.

The Washington Court of Appeals is divided into three divisions. Each division has at least five judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called superior courts. Capital offenses against the State of Washington are tried in the superior courts.

Washington's capital punishment offenses are set out under Wash. Code § 9A.32.030(1). This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

A. With a premeditated intent to cause the death of another person, he or she causes the death of such person or of a third person; or

B. Under circumstances manifesting an extreme indifference to human life, he or she engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of death to any person, and thereby causes the death of a person; or

C. He or she commits or attempts to commit the crime of either (1) robbery in the first or second degree, (2) rape in the first or second degree, (3) burglary in the first degree, (4) arson in the first or second degree, or (5) kidnapping in the first or second degree, and in the course of or in furtherance of such crime or in immediate flight therefrom, he or she, or another participant, causes the death of a person other than one of the participants.

Capital murder in Washington is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Washington is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment without parole. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Washington.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Wash. Code § 10.95.020 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the guilt phase and persuade the jury during the penalty phase that such proven aggravating circumstance outweighs any mitigating evidence:

1. The victim was a law enforcement officer, corrections officer, or fire fighter who was performing his or her official duties at the time of the act resulting in death and the victim was known or reasonably should have been known by the person to be such at the time of the killing;

2. At the time of the act resulting in the death, the person was serving a term of imprisonment, had escaped, or was on authorized or unauthorized leave in or from a state facility or program for the incarceration or treatment of persons adjudicated guilty of crimes;

3. At the time of the act resulting in death, the person was in custody in a county or county-city jail as a consequence of having been adjudicated guilty of a felony;

4. The person committed the murder pursuant to an agreement that he or she would receive money or any other thing of value for committing the murder;

5. The person solicited another person to commit the murder and had paid or had agreed to pay money or any other thing of value for committing the murder;

6. The person committed the murder to obtain or maintain his or her membership or to advance his or her position in the hierarchy of an organization, association, or identifiable group;

7. The murder was committed during the course of or as a result of a shooting where the discharge of the firearm, is either from a motor vehicle or from the immediate area of a motor vehicle that was used to transport the shooter or the firearm, or both, to the scene of the discharge;

8. The victim was a judge; juror or former juror; prospective, current, or former witness in an adjudicative proceeding; prosecuting attorney; deputy prosecuting attorney; defense attorney; a member of the indeterminate sentence review board; or a probation or parole officer; and the murder was related to the exercise of official duties performed or to be performed by the victim;

9. The person committed the murder to conceal the commission of a crime or to protect or conceal the identity of any person committing a crime, including, but specifically not limited to, any attempt to avoid prosecution as a persistent offender;

10. There was more than one victim and the murders were part of a common scheme or plan or the result of a single act of the person;

11. The murder was committed in the course of, in furtherance of, or in immediate flight from a robbery, rape, burglary, kidnapping, or arson;

12. The victim was regularly employed or self-employed as a newsreporter and the murder was committed to obstruct or hinder the investigative, research, or reporting activities of the victim;

13. At the time the person committed the murder, there existed a court order, issued in this or any other state, which prohibited the person from either contacting the victim, molesting the victim, or disturbing the peace of the victim, and the person had knowledge of the existence of that order;

14. At the time the person committed the murder, the person and the victim were family or household members and the person had previously engaged in a pattern or practice of three or more of the following crimes committed upon the victim within a five-year period, regardless of whether a conviction resulted: a. harassment or b. any criminal assault.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Washington has provided by Wash. Code § 10.95.070 the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. Whether the defendant has or does not have a significant history, either as a juvenile or an adult, of prior criminal activity;

2. Whether the murder was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental disturbance;

3. Whether the victim consented to the act of murder;

4. Whether the defendant was an accomplice to a murder committed by another person where the defendant's participation in the murder was relatively minor;

5. Whether the defendant acted under duress or domination of another person;

6. Whether, at the time of the murder, the capacity of the defendant to appreciate the wrongfulness of his or her conduct or to conform his or her conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired as a result of mental disease or defect;

7. Whether the age of the defendant at the time of the crime calls for leniency; and

8. Whether there is a likelihood that the defendant will pose a danger to others in the future.

Under Washington's capital punishment statute, the Washington Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Washington permits a capital felon to choose between lethal injection and hanging as the method of execution. The State's death row facility for men is located in Walla Walla, Washington. Pursuant to the laws of Washington, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of Washington, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Wash. Code § 10.95.185:

1. Not less than twenty days prior to a scheduled execution, judicial officers, law enforcement representatives, media representatives, representatives of the families of the victims, and representatives from the family of the defendant who wish to attend and witness the execution, must submit an application to the superintendent. Such application must designate the relationship and reason for wishing to attend.

2. Not less than fifteen days prior to the scheduled execution, the superintendent shall designate the total number of individuals who will be allowed to attend and witness the planned execution. The superintendent shall determine the number of witnesses that will be allowed in each of the following categories:

a. No less than five media representatives with consideration to be given to news organizations serving communities affected by the crimes or by the commission of the execution of the defendant.

b. Judicial officers.

c. Representatives of the families of the victims.

d. Representatives from the family of the defendant.

e. Up to two law enforcement representatives. The chief executive officer of the agency that investigated the crime shall designate the law enforcement representatives.

After the list is composed, the superintendent shall serve this list on all parties who have submitted an application pursuant to this section. The superintendent shall develop and implement procedures to determine the persons within each of the categories listed in this subsection who will be allowed to attend and witness the execution.

3. Not less than ten days prior to the scheduled execution, the superintendent shall file the witness list with the superior court from which the conviction and death warrant was issued with a petition asking that the court enter an order certifying this list as a final order identifying the witnesses to attend the execution. The final order of the court certifying the witness list shall not be entered less than five days after the filing of the petition.

4. Unless a show cause petition is filed with the superior court from which the conviction and death warrant was issued within five days of the filing of the superintendent's petition, the superintendent's list, by order of the superior court, becomes final, and no other party has standing to challenge its appropriateness.

5. In no case may the superintendent or the superior court order or allow more than seventeen individuals other than required staff to witness a planned execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Washington executed only four capital felons. During this period, Washington did not have any female capital felons on death row. A total of nine capital felons were on death row in Washington as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as four black inmates and five white inmates.

Washington Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty

The Washington Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty (WCADP) was created in 1984. The organization is composed of twenty-one community, religious, and legal organizations. Through public education and activism, WCADP works to increase opposition to the death penalty in the general public and among the State of Washington's leaders. WCADP publishes a quarterly newsletter, offers written resources and speakers about the death penalty, coordinates activities around the state, works with the media and the legislature, and offers support to death row inmates in Washington.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession was obtained in violation of due process of law and thereby invalidated his conviction and death sentence.

Case Holding: The defendant's confession was obtained in violation of due process of law and thereby invalidated his conviction and death sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Watts, was arrested on suspicion of capital murder by the State of Indiana. The circumstances occurring after his arrest were reported as follows:

They took him ... to State Police Headquarters, where he was questioned by officers in relays from about eleven thirty that night until sometime between 2:30 and 3 o'clock the following morning. The same procedure of persistent interrogation from about 5:30 in the afternoon until about 3 o'clock the following morning, by a relay of six to eight officers, was pursued on Thursday the 13th, Friday the 14th, Saturday the 15th, Monday the 17th. Sunday was a day of rest from interrogation. About 3 o'clock on Tuesday morning, November 18, the [defendant] made an incriminating statement after continuous questioning since 6 o'clock of the preceding evening. The statement did not satisfy the prosecutor who had been called in and he then took [the defendant] in hand. [The defendant], questioned by an interrogator of twenty years' experience as lawyer, judge and prosecutor, yielded a more incriminating document.

Until his inculpatory statements were secured, the [defendant] was a prisoner in the exclusive control of the prosecuting authorities. He was kept for the first two days in solitary confinement in a cell aptly enough called 'the hole' in view of its physical conditions.... Apart from the five night sessions, the police intermittently interrogated Watts during the day and on three days drove him around town, hours at a time, with a view to eliciting identifications and other disclosures. Although the law of Indiana required that [the defendant] be given a prompt preliminary hearing before a magistrate, with all the protection a hearing was intended to give him, the [defendant] was not only given no hearing during the entire period of interrogation but was without friendly or professional aid and without advice as to his constitutional rights. Disregard of rudimentary needs of life — opportunities for sleep and a decent allowance of food — are also relevant, not as aggravating elements of [the defendant's] treatment, but as part of the total situation out of which his confessions came and which stamped their character.

Armed with a confession by the defendant, the prosecutor was able to get the jury to return a guilty verdict and death sentence. The Indiana Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his confession was obtained in violation of due process of law. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Frankfurter Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Murphy and Rutledge, JJ., Joined: Justice Frankfurter held that it was the judgment of the Court that the confession given by the defendant was obtained in violation of the Due Process Clause. Justice Frankfurter expressed his opinion as to the requirements of due process as follows:

A confession by which life becomes forfeit must be the expression of free choice. A statement to be voluntary of course need not be volunteered. But if it is the product of sustained pressure by the police it does not issue from a free choice. When a suspect speaks because he is overborne, it is immaterial whether he has been subjected to a physical or a mental ordeal.... We would have to shut our minds to the plain significance of what here transpired to deny that this was a calculated endeavor to secure a confession through the pressure of unrelenting interrogation. The very relentlessness of such interrogation implies that it is better for the prisoner to answer than to persist in the refusal of disclosure which is his constitutional right. To turn the detention of an accused into a process of wrenching from him evidence which could not be extorted in open court with all its safeguards, is so grave an abuse of the power of arrest as to offend the procedural standards of due process....

In holding that the Due Process Clause bars police procedure which violates the basic notions of our accusatorial mode of prosecuting crime and vitiates a conviction based on the fruits of such procedure, we apply the Due Process Clause to its historic function of assuring appropriate procedure before liberty is curtailed or life is taken. We are deeply mindful of the anguishing problems which the incidence of crime presents to the States. But the history of the criminal law proves overwhelmingly that brutal methods of law enforcement are essentially self-defeating, whatever may be their effect in a particular case.

The judgment of the Indiana Supreme Court was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas concurred in the Court's judgment. He addressed the issue of custodial interrogation as follows: "It would be naive to think that this protective custody was less than the inquisition. The man was held until he broke. Then and only then was he arraigned and given the protection which the law provides all accused. Detention without arraignment is a time-honored method for keeping an accused under the exclusive control of the police. They can then operate at their leisure. The accused is wholly at their mercy. He is without the aid of counsel or friends; and he is denied the protection of the magistrate. We should unequivocally condemn the procedure and stand ready to outlaw, any confession obtained during the period of the unlawful detention. The procedure breeds coerced confessions. It is the root of the evil. It is the procedure without which the inquisition could not flourish in the country."

Concurring Statement by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's judgment.

Concurring Statement by Justice Jackson: Justice Jackson issued a dissenting opinion in the case which actually stated his position in two companion cases decided by the Court. Although he placed his dissent in this case, Justice Jackson actually concurred in the judgment of this case. He did not provide any reasons for his concurrence in the judgment.

Dissenting Statement by Chief Justice Vinson, and Reed and Burton, JJ.: Chief Justice Vinson and Justices Reed and Burton issued a joint statement indicating they dissented from the Court's decision and believed the judgment should be affirmed.

Case Note: This case was one of three cases decided by the Court, on the same day, involving involuntary confessions. In each of the cases, the Court applied due process principals to invalidate the capital convictions. In subsequent decades, the Court applied the Fifth Amendment right to remain silent to review claims from State prisoners that their confessions were involuntary. See also Harris v. South Carolina; Right to Remain Silent; Turner v. Pennsylvania

Wayne, James M. James M. Wayne served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1835 to 1867. While on the Supreme Court, Wayne was known as a moderate interpreter of the Constitution.

Wayne was born in 1790 in Savannah, Georgia. He was educated at Princeton University where he graduated in 1808. Wayne studied the law and was admitted to practice in Georgia. His career included serving as a trial judge, mayor of Savannah, State legislator, and member of Congress. In 1835, President Andrew Jackson nominated Wayne to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Wayne was known to have written only one capital punishment case (frequently the Court issued opinions in criminal cases that did not indicate what punishment a defendant received). In Ex Parte Wells, the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether the president had authority to pardon the defendant's death sentence upon the condition that the defendant remain in prison for life. Wayne, writing for the Court, ruled that the president had authority to pardon the defendant's death sentence upon the condition that the defendant remain in prison for life, because pardons may be absolute as well as conditional. Wayne died on July 7, 1867.

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court acted correctly in responding to a penalty phase jury question about not imposing the death penalty by informing the jury to reconsider a previously given instruction,

Case Holding: The trial court acted correctly in responding to a penalty phase jury question about not imposing the death penalty by informing the jury to reconsider a previously given instruction.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Virginia charged the defendant, Lonnie Weeks, Jr., with the 1993 murder of Jose Cavazos, a police officer. A jury found the defendant guilty of capital murder. During the penalty phase, the jury sent a note to the trial judge asking the court if they had to impose the death penalty if they found at least one aggravating circumstance. The trial court responded by informing the jury to reconsider a specific instruction that was previously given to them. The defendant objected and asked the court to inform the jury that they did not have to impose the death penalty even if they found an aggravating circumstance. The judge refused the defendant's request. The jury returned a verdict sentencing the defendant to death. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal and during a State habeas corpus proceeding. The defendant thereafter filed a federal habeas corpus proceeding, wherein he argued that the trial court was required to respond to the jury's question by informing them that they did not have to impose the death penalty. A federal district court denied relief. A federal Court of Appeals denied the defendant a certificate of appealability. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice found that the trial court's response to the jury's question was correct. The opinion found that the previous instruction given to the jury adequately informed them that they did not have to impose the death penalty. The decision of the Court of Appeals was therefore affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Ginsburg, Breyer, and Souter, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's opinion. He argued that the jury was confused by the previously given instructions. Consequently, simply telling them to reconsider those instructions did not clear up their confusion. Justice Stevens believed that the jury did not know that they had the authority to reject the death penalty even if they found an aggravating circumstance.

Weinberger Kidnapping On July 4, 1956, one-month-old Peter Weinberger was kidnapped from his home in Westbury, New York. The child was abducted while unattended and sleeping on a patio. The kidnapper left a ransom note demanding $2,000 for the child's safe return. Although the ransom note indicated the child would be killed if the police were notified, the child's parents, Morris and Betty Weinberger, contacted the local police.

Several days after the kidnapping, the police arranged a phony ransom package and dropped it off at a site designated by the kidnapper. However, the kidnapper did not show up. On July 10, the kidnapper called the Weinberger home and left instructions where to deliver the money a second time. The phony ransom package was again dropped off. The kidnapper did not show up. Instead, the police found a note telling the Weinbergers where they could find the baby if everything went correctly.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) was called into to help with the case. The FBI immediately had the handwriting on the two ransom notes analyzed. On August 22, the FBI found a possible match to the handwriting. A similarity was found between the handwriting on the ransom notes and that of Angelo LaMarca. LaMarca had a federal criminal arrest record for bootlegging.

On August 23, LaMarca was arrested at his home in Plainview, New York, by FBI agents. LaMarca initially denied involvement in the kidnapping, but later gave a confession. He informed authorities that he was in debt and that the kidnapping occurred on impulse, as he was driving around Westbury trying to figure out how to get the money he needed. LaMarca told the FBI that he had abandoned the baby alive in some heavy brush just off a highway exit right after the kidnapping. A search of the area described by LaMarca was made. The child was found — dead.

LaMarca was prosecuted by the State of New York for murder. He was convicted and on December 14, 1956, he was sentenced to death. On August 7, 1958, LaMarca was executed by electrocution at Sing Sing Prison.

Angelo LaMarca was executed on August 7, 1958. (U.S. Department of Justice/FBI)

West Memphis Cult Murders On May 5, 1993, the dead bodies of three boys were discovered in a shallow stream in West Memphis, Arkansas. The boys, all eight years old, were beaten to death. One of them had been sexually mutilated. For weeks, authorities were baffled by the crimes and had no lead on who was responsible for what appeared to be ritual-like murders.

A break in the investigation occurred when police interviewed a teenager named Jesse Misskelley. Initially, Misskelley denied any knowledge of the murders. However, after failing a lie detector test, Misskelley broke down and confessed.

Jason Baldwin (left), Jesse Misskelley (right), and Damien Wayne Echols (bottom). Baldwin and Misskelley received life sentences for their roles in the West Memphis murders. Echols was sentenced to death for his role in the ritual murders. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

Misskelley told authorities that he was a member of a satanic cult whose leader was nineteen-year-old Damien Wayne Echols. The other member of the cult was a youth named Jason Baldwin. According to Misskelley, the trio engaged in the ritualistic killing and eating of dogs. Under Echols's leadership, the trio decided to make a sacrifice of three children. They randomly targeted the victims. Echols was said to have sexually mutilated one of the victims as part of a ritual.

Authorities arrested the trio and prosecuted them for three murders. Misskelley's trial was held first. On February 4, 1994, he was found guilty and sentenced to prison for life. Echols and Baldwin were tried together in March. The jury convicted them of all three murders on March 18. The following day, Baldwin was sentenced to life imprisonment and Echols was sentenced to death. Echols is now on death row.

West Virginia The death penalty was abolished by the State of West Virginia in 1965.

Western Missouri Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty The Western Missouri Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty was founded for the purpose of working to abolish the death penalty in the nation. The organization promotes letter writing to death row inmates and engages in educational efforts to reconcile communities with inmates. It also works in a supportive way to assist the families of murder victims.

Issue Presented: Whether the indictment against the defendant was defective in failing to allege he knew that he was giving the victim poison and that the poison was ingested in the victim's stomach.

Case Holding: The indictment against the defendant was not defective in failing to allege he knew that he was giving the victim poison and that the poison was ingested in the victim's stomach because the absence of such allegations did not prevent the defendant from preparing a defense to the charge against him.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas Westmoreland, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the indictment against him was defective because it failed to allege that he knew the substance which he administered to the deceased was a deadly poison and that the poison was taken into the stomach of the deceased. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer held that the defendant's assignment of error was without merit and that the indictment was sufficient in giving him notice of the charge against him. The opinion explained as follows:

It is charged that he administered the strychnine and other poisons with the unlawful and felonious intent to take the life of the deceased, and that, so administered, they did have the effect of causing death. It matters not whether he knew the exact character of the strychnine or other poisons. It was murder if he unlawfully and feloniously administered any poison with the design of taking life, and that which he so administered did produce death. At the common law, though it was necessary to allege the kind of poison administered, nevertheless proof of the use of a different kind of poison was regarded as an immaterial variance.... So, also, it is unnecessary to aver that the poison was taken into the stomach of the deceased. The crime would be complete if the poison was by hypodermic injection, or otherwise, introduced into the body of the deceased, and, affecting the heart or other organ, caused the death. The indictment need not specify in detail the mode in which the poison affected the body, or the particular organ upon which its operation was had. It is enough to charge that poison was administered, and that such poison, so administered, caused the death.

The judgment of the federal trial court was affirmed.

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court committed error in allowing the victim's five-year-old son testify.

Case Holding: The trial court did not commit error in allowing the victim's five-year-old son to testify because the record discloses the child understood the difference between truth and falsehood.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, George L. Wheeler, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that it was error for the trial court to allow the victim's five-year-old son testify. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer held that it was not error to allow the child to testify. The opinion reasoned as follows:

The boy, in reply to questions put to him on his voir dire, said, among other things, that he knew the difference between the truth and a lie; that if he told a lie, the bad man would get him, and that he was going to tell the truth. When further asked what they would do with him in court if he told a lie, he replied that they would put him in jail. He also said that his mother had told him that morning to "tell no lie," and, in response to a question as to what the clerk said to him when he held up his hand, he answered, "Don't you tell no story." Other questions were asked as to his residence, his relationship to the deceased, and as to whether he had ever been to school, to which latter inquiry he responded in the negative....

That the boy was not by reason of his youth, as a matter of law, absolutely disqualified as a witness is clear. While no one should think of calling as a witness an infant only two or three years old, there is no precise age which determines the question of competency. This depends on the capacity and intelligence of the child, his appreciation of the difference between truth and falsehood, as well as of his duty to tell the former. The decision of this question rests primarily with the trial judge, who sees the proposed witness, notices his manner, his apparent possession or lack of intelligence, and may resort to any examination which will tend to disclose his capacity and intelligence, as well as his understanding of the obligations of an oath. As many of these matters cannot be photographed into the record, the decision of the trial judge will not be disturbed on review, unless from that which is preserved it is clear that it was erroneous.

The judgment of the federal trial court was affirmed.

White, Byron R. Byron R. White served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1962 to 1993. While on the Supreme Court, White was known for a judicial philosophy that swayed between conservative and moderate.

White was born in Fort Collins, Colorado, on June 8, 1917. He graduated from the University of Colorado in 1938. White played professional football while studying law at Yale University Law School, where he received a law degree in 1946. In 1962, President John F. Kennedy, a lifelong friend of White, appointed him to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, White wrote a considerable number of capital punishment opinions. White's capital punishment opinions were more conservative than moderate. For example, in Clemons v. Mississippi, White wrote for the Court in holding that the Constitution did not prevent a State's appellate court from upholding a death sentence that was based in part on an invalid or improperly defined aggravating circumstance, either by re-weighting of the aggravating and mitigating evidence or by harmless error review. In Enmund v. Florida, White held the Constitution prohibited imposition of the death penalty upon a co-defendant who neither took life, attempted to take life, nor intended to take life. In North Carolina v. Alford, White ruled that a guilty plea that is voluntarily and intelligently made is not compelled within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment merely because it was made to avoid the possibility of the death penalty. White retired from the Supreme Court in 1993.

White, Edward D. Edward D. White served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1894 to 1910 and as chief justice from 1910 to 1921. While on the Supreme Court, White was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

White was born in Lafourche Parish, Louisiana, on November 3, 1845. He attended Georgetown College. White studied law privately and was admitted to the Louisiana bar in 1868. White's career included service on the Louisiana Supreme Court and an appointment to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate. In 1894, President Grover Cleveland appointed White as an associate justice to the Supreme Court. President William Howard Taft appointed White chief justice in 1910.

While on the Supreme Court, White wrote only a few capital punishment opinions (frequently the Court issued criminal opinions that did not indicate the punishment a defendant received). The decision in Bram v. United States represented an important capital punishment opinion rendered by White because the decision had application to criminal law in general. In Bram, the defendant confessed to capital murder. On appeal, the defendant argued that the confession was involuntary even though force was not used to extract the confession. White, writing for the Court, held that the defendant's confession was not voluntarily given, even though physical force was not used against him, as it was enough that he was in a situation that precluded him from exercising free will. White died on May 19, 1921.

Issue Presented: Whether the State of Texas presented sufficient grounds to obtain a rehearing of the United States Supreme Court's memorandum opinion reversing the defendant's conviction and death sentence because his confession was illegally obtained.

Case Holding: The State of Texas failed to present sufficient grounds to obtain a rehearing of the United States Supreme Court's memorandum opinion reversing the defendant's conviction and death sentence because his confession was illegally obtained.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, White, was convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Texas. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, by memorandum opinion, reversed the judgment on the grounds that the conviction was obtained as a result of an illegally obtained confession, in violation of its decision in Chambers v. Florida. The State requested a rehearing of the Supreme Court's memorandum decision.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black ruled that the State did not present grounds to permit a rehearing. The opinion pointed out that the State contended that the defendant had denied ever having signed the confession; therefore, he should not be allowed to contend that the State's use of the confession violated his constitutional right to due process. Justice Black reasoned: "Since ... the confession was presented by the State to the jury as that of [the defendant], we must determine whether the record shows that, if signed at all, the confession was obtained and used in such manner that [the defendant's] trial fell short of that procedural due process guaranteed by the Constitution." The opinion then set out the following facts regarding the defendant's confession:

[The defendant] is an illiterate farmhand who was engaged, at the time of his arrest, upon a plantation about ten miles from Livingston, Texas. On the day following the crime with which he has been charged, he was called from the field in which he was picking cotton and was taken to the house of the brother-in-law of the ... victim of the crime, where fifteen or sixteen [blacks] of the vicinity were at the time in custody without warrants or the filing of charges. Taken to the county court house, and thence to the Polk County jail, [the defendant] was kept there six or seven days. According to his testimony, armed Texas Rangers on several successive nights took him handcuffed from the jail "up in the woods somewhere," whipped him, asked him each time about a confession and warned him not to speak to any one about the nightly trips to the woods. During the period of his arrest up to and including the signing of the alleged confession, [the defendant] had no lawyer, no charges were filed against him and he was out of touch with friends or relatives....

Before carrying [the defendant] to Beaumont, where the alleged confession was taken, the Sheriff talked about an hour and a half with him. The Rangers who had been taking [the defendant] to the woods at night knew the county attorney was going to Beaumont to get a statement; they, too, went there and were in and out of the eighth floor room of the jail in Beaumont, with the elevator locked, where [the defendant] was interrogated from approximately 11:00 P.M. to 3:00 or 3:30 A.M. The alleged confession was reduced to writing after 2 A.M. Immediately before it was taken down, the prisoner was repeatedly asked by the private prosecutor whether he was ready to confess. [The defendant] then began to cry, and the typing of the confession, upon which the State's case substantially rested, was completed by the county attorney about daylight. Two citizens of Beaumont signed it as witnesses.

Justice Black concluded: "Due process of law, preserved for all by our Constitution, commands that no such practice as that disclosed by this record shall send any accused to his death." The State's request for rehearing was denied.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Chambers v. Florida; Crimes Not Involving Death; Right to Remain Silent

Whitmore v. Arkansas Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149 (1990); Argued: January 10, 1990; Decided: April 24, 1990; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Rehnquist; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Marshall, in which Brennan, J., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: Arthur L. Issue Presented: Whether a third party has standing to challenge the validity of a death sentence imposed on a capital defendant who has knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily elected to forego the right of appeal to the State Supreme Court.

Case Holding: A third party does not have standing to challenge the validity of a death sentence imposed on a capital defendant who has knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily elected to forego the right of appeal to the State Supreme Court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ronald Simmons, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Arkansas. After his sentence was imposed, the defendant waived his right to automatic appeal of his conviction and sentence. Under Arkansas law, a convicted and sentenced capital felon can forego direct appeal only if he or she has been judicially determined to have the capacity to understand the choice between life and death and to knowingly and intelligently waive any and all rights to appeal his or her sentence. The trial court conducted a hearing and determined that the defendant was competent to waive further proceedings. The Arkansas Supreme Court reviewed the competency determination and affirmed the trial court's decision that the defendant had knowingly and intelligently waived the right to appeal.

While the State's appellate court was reviewing the record on the defendant's waiver of appeal, a death row inmate, Jonas Whitmore, petitioned the court to intervene in the proceeding as a "next friend" of the defendant. The appellate court determined that Whitmore did not have standing to intervene and denied his petition. Subsequently, the United States Supreme Court granted Whitmore's petition for certiorari.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice held that Whitmore lacked standing to proceed with his claim in the Court. The opinion pointed out that, before a federal court can consider the merits of a legal claim, the person seeking to invoke the court's jurisdiction must establish the requisite standing to litigate. To do so, the person must prove the existence of a case or controversy by clearly demonstrating that he or she has suffered an injury in fact, which is concrete in both a qualitative and temporal sense. He or she must show that the injury fairly can be traced to the challenged action and is likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. The chief justice found that Whitmore did not satisfy the standing requirement.

In directly addressing Whitmore's claim that he had standing as the defendant's "next friend," the opinion ruled that the scope of the federal "next friend" standing doctrine was no broader than the "next friend" standing permitted under the federal habeas corpus statute. It was said that a necessary condition for "next friend" standing was a showing by the proposed "next friend" that the real party in interest is unable to litigate his or her own cause due to mental incapacity, lack of access to court, or other similar disability. The chief justice held that the prerequisite was not satisfied in the case, because the record established that an evidentiary hearing was held and that it was determined that the defendant knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived of his right to appeal. The judgment of the Arkansas Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented from the majority decision. He believed that Whitmore had standing and that the Constitution prohibited Arkansas from failing to review the defendant's death sentence. Justice Marshall expressed his opinion thus:

The Court today allows a State to execute a man even though no appellate court has reviewed the validity of his conviction or sentence. In reaching this result, the Court does not address the constitutional claim presented by petitioner: whether a State must provide appellate review in a capital case despite the defendant's desire to waive such review. Rather, it decides that petitioner does not have standing to raise that issue before this Court. The Court rejects petitioner's argument that he should be allowed to proceed as Ronald Gene Simmons' "next friend," relying on the federal common-law doctrine that a competent defendant's waiver of his right to appeal precludes another person from appealing on his behalf. If petitioner's constitutional claim is meritorious, however, Simmons' execution violates the Eighth Amendment. The Court would thus permit an unconstitutional execution on the basis of a common-law doctrine that the Court has the power to amend.

Given the extraordinary circumstances of this case, then, consideration of whether federal common law precludes Jonas Whitmore's standing as Ronald Simmons' next friend should be informed by a consideration of the merits of Whitmore's claim. For the reasons discussed herein, the Constitution requires that States provide appellate review of capital cases notwithstanding a defendant's desire to waive such review. To prevent Simmons' unconstitutional execution, the Court should relax the common-law restriction on next-friend standing and permit Whitmore to present the merits question on Simmons' behalf. By refusing to address that question, the Court needlessly abdicates its grave responsibility to ensure that no person is wrongly executed....

Our cases and state courts' experience with capital cases compel the conclusion that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments require appellate review of at least death sentences to prevent unjust executions. I believe the Constitution also mandates review of the underlying convictions. The core concern of all our death penalty decisions is that States take steps to ensure to the greatest extent possible that no person is wrongfully executed. A person is just as wrongfully executed when he is innocent of the crime or was improperly convicted as when he was erroneously sentenced to death. States therefore must provide review of both the convictions and sentences in death cases....

A defendant's voluntary submission to a barbaric punishment does not ameliorate the harm that imposing such a punishment causes to our basic societal values and to the integrity of our system of justice. Certainly a defendant's consent to being drawn and quartered or burned at the stake would not license the State to exact such punishments. Nor could the State knowingly execute an innocent man merely because he refused to present a defense at trial and waived his right to appeal. Similarly, the State may not conduct an execution rendered unconstitutional by the lack of an appeal merely because the defendant agrees to that punishment.

This case thus does not involve a capital defendant's so-called "right to die." When a capital defendant seeks to circumvent procedures necessary to ensure the propriety of his conviction and sentence, he does not ask the State to permit him to take his own life. Rather, he invites the State to violate two of the most basic norms of a civilized society — that the State's penal authority be invoked only where necessary to serve the ends of justice, not the ends of a particular individual, and that punishment be imposed only where the State has adequate assurance that the punishment is justified. The Constitution forbids the State to accept that invitation.

Case Note: The State of Arkansas executed Ronald Simmons by lethal injection on June 25, 1990. Arkansas executed Jonas Whitmore by lethal injection on May 11, 1994. See also Demosthenes v. Baal; Intervention by Next Friend; Rosenberg v. United States

Whittaker, Charles E. Charles E. Whittaker served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1957 to 1962. While on the Supreme Court, Whittaker was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Whittaker was born in Troy, Kansas, on February 22, 1901. He received a law degree from the University of Kansas City Law School in 1923. Whittaker maintained a successful law practice before being appointed a federal trial judge in 1954. President Dwight D. Eisenhower appointed Whittaker to the Supreme Court in 1957.

During Whittaker's brief tenure on the Supreme Court, he was known to write only two capital punishment opinions. In Williams v. Oklahoma, Whittaker, writing for the Court, held that imposition of the death penalty for the crime of kidnapping was not disproportionate to that offense. Writing for the Court in Payne v. Arkansas, Whittaker reversed a death sentence after finding the defendant's confession was extracted involuntarily. In 1962, Whittaker retired from the Court. He died on November 26, 1973.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendants established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury which indicted them and the petit jury which convicted them of capital murder.

Case Holding: The defendants established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury which indicted them and the petit jury which convicted them of capital murder; therefore, their convictions could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, Whitus and Davis, were convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by State of Georgia. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the convictions and sentences. The defendants filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted them and the petit jury that convicted them. The dis-district court dismissed the petition and a federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court summarily vacated that Court of Appeals' judgment and remanded the case to the district court for a hearing on the claim of discrimination. On remand, the district court dismissed the petition on the grounds that the claim had been waived. However, the Court of Appeals reversed, holding that blacks had been systematically excluded from both grand and petit juries. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clark: Justice Clark ruled that the defendants had established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted them and the petit jury that convicted them. The opinion stated: "The proof offered by [the defendants], including the use by the State of a system of jury selection which had been previously condemned, constituted a prima facie case of purposeful discrimination, which shifted the burden of proof to the State. The State, which submitted no explanation for the continued use of the condemned system ... failed to meet the burden of rebutting the prima facie case." Justice Clark noted: "For over fourscore years it has been federal statutory law, and the law of this Court as applied to the States through the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, that a conviction cannot stand if it is based on an indictment of a grand jury or the verdict of a petit jury ... which ... exclude[s] [blacks] by reason of their race." The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed. See also Coleman v. Alabama (I); Coleman v. Alabama (II); Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; Sims v. Georgia (II)

Issue Presented: Whether defense counsel's failure to present mitigating evidence of the defendant's life history during the penalty phase denied the defendant of his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel.

Case Holding: Defense counsel's failure to present mitigating evidence of the defendant's life history during the penalty phase denied the defendant of his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Maryland charged Kevin Wiggins with the 1988 capital murder of Florence Lacs. During a bench trial on the issue of guilt, the defendant was found guilty of capital murder. A jury presided over the penalty phase. During the penalty phase, the defendant's two court-appointed attorneys presented evidence suggesting that the defendant did not actually kill the victim. The defense attorneys did not present mitigating evidence of defendant's life history, which included physical abuse, foster care placement, being homosexually raped on numerous occasions, and borderline mental retardation. The jury returned a death sentence. The conviction and sentence were upheld on direct appeal.

The defendant filed a State habeas corpus petition alleging ineffective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase. The State courts denied habeas relief. The defendant subsequently filed a federal habeas petition, alleging once again ineffective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase. A federal district court agreed with the defendant and reversed the death sentence. However, a federal Court of Appeals reinstated the death sentence after finding the defendant's attorneys provided effective assistance of counsel. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor held that the defendant was denied his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase, because his attorneys failed to investigate and present evidence of his life history. She stated her findings as follows:

Counsel's investigation into Wiggins' background did not reflect reasonable professional judgment. Their decision to end their investigation when they did was neither consistent with the professional standards that prevailed in 1989, nor reasonable in light of the evidence counsel uncovered in the social services records — evidence that would have led a reasonably competent attorney to investigate further....

The mitigating evidence counsel failed to discover and present in this case is powerful.... Wiggins experienced severe privation and abuse in the first six years of his life while in the custody of his alcoholic, absentee mother. He suffered physical torment, sexual molestation, and repeated rape during his subsequent years in foster care. The time Wiggins spent homeless, along with his diminished mental capacities, further augment his mitigation case. Petitioner thus has the kind of troubled history we have declared relevant to assessing a defendant's moral culpability....

We further find that had the jury been confronted with this considerable mitigating evidence, there is a reasonable probability that it would have returned with a different sentence....

Wiggins' sentencing jury heard only one significant mitigating factor — that Wiggins had no prior convictions. Had the jury been able to place petitioner's excruciating life history on the mitigating side of the scale, there is a reasonable probability that at least one juror would have struck a different balance.

Justice O'Connor reversed the decision of the Court of Appeals and remanded the case for disposition consistent with the opinion.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented from the majority opinion. He took the position that the defendant's attorneys made a strategic decision not to present his life history to the jury. See also Court-Appointed Counsel; Mitigating Circumstances; Right to Counsel; Rompilla v. Issue Presented: Whether it was reversible error to exclude testimony by a defense witness that the murder victim had previously made threats against the defendant.

Case Holding: It was reversible error to exclude testimony by a defense witness that the murder victim had previously made threats against the defendant, even though the threats were not communicated to the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Jack Wiggins, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the Territory of Utah. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that he was denied due process of law by the trial court's refusal to allow his witness to testify that the victim had previously made threats against the defendant. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Miller: Justice Miller ruled that it was reversible error to exclude testimony by a defense witness that would have shown that the victim had communicated threats against the defendant. The opinion reasoned as follows: "Although there is some conflict as to the admission of threats of the deceased against the prisoner in a case of homicide, where the threats had not been communicated to him, there is a modification of the doctrine in more recent times.... Where the question is as to what was deceased's attitude at the time of the fatal encounter, recent threats may become relevant to show that this attitude was one hostile to defendant, even though such threats were not communicated to defendant. The evidence ... may be relevant to show that, at the time of the meeting, the deceased was seeking defendant's life." Justice Miller believed that the relaxed standard on such evidence was pertinent to the case, because there was evidence that before the defendant fired the fatal shots that killed the victim, a gun the victim was carrying had previously discharged. The judgment of the Utah Supreme Court was reversed and a new trial awarded.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Clifford: Justice Clifford dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the exception which would have allowed the evidence to be admitted was appropriate only in cases where a defendant has raised the defense of self-defense. Justice Clifford noted that the defendant did not raise the defense of self-defense. He also believed that the issue was one that was grounded in State law and was therefore not appropriate for the Court to address.

Issue Presented: Whether a sentence of death by firing squad, upon conviction of a capital offense, violates the Constitution as cruel and unusual punishment.

Case Holding: Death by firing squad, upon conviction of a capital offense, does not violate the Constitution as cruel and unusual punishment.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Wilkerson, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the Territory of Utah. The trial court ordered that the defendant be put to death by firing squad. The defendant appealed to "the Supreme Court of the Territory, where the judgment of the subordinate court was affirmed." The appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that death by firing squad was unconstitutional. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clifford: Justice Clifford observed that Utah's criminal code did not set out a method for carrying out a death sentence. The code merely provided "that every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death." The opinion ruled: "Had the statute prescribed the mode of executing the sentence, it would have been the duty of the court to follow it, unless the punishment to be inflicted was cruel and unusual, within the meaning of the eighth amendment to the Constitution.... Statutory directions being given that the prisoner when duly convicted shall suffer death, without any statutory regulation specifically pointing out the mode of executing the command of the law, it must be that the duty is devolved upon the court authorized to pass the sentence to determine the mode of execution and to impose the sentence prescribed."

The decision noted that under Utah's prior code, from 1852 to 1876, the method of execution of the death penalty was set out. Prior law "provided that 'when any person shall be convicted of any crime the punishment of which is death, ... he shall suffer death by being shot, hung, or beheaded, as the court may direct,' or as the convicted person may choose."

Justice Clifford traced the history of carrying out the death penalty by firing squad to the military. The opinion found "[m]ilitary laws ... do not say how a criminal offending against such laws shall be put to death, but leave it entirely to the custom of war; and ... shooting or hanging is the method determined by such custom." Further, "[f]or mutiny, desertion, or other military crime it is commonly by shooting; for murder not combined with mutiny, for treason, and piracy accompanied with wounding or attempt to murder, by hanging."

Justice Clifford concluded: "Cruel and unusual punishments are forbidden by the Constitution, but ... the punishment of shooting as a mode of executing the death penalty for the crime of murder in the first degree is not included in that category, within the meaning of the eighth amendment." The judgment of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah was affirmed.

Case Note: The decision in the case, finding death by firing squad did not violate the Constitution, has gone undisturbed for over one hundred years. The case has also been cited over the decades as authority for the constitutionality of death by hanging. See also Firing Squad

Williams, Stanley Tookie III In 1971 Stanley "Tookie" Williams III (b. 1953) co-founded the infamous South Central Los Angeles street gang known as the Crips. Williams and Crips co-founder, Raymond Lee Washington (1953–1979), envisioned the gang as being simply a vehicle for protecting neighborhood youth from violence by other gangs. However, the Crips eventually became a violent gang that terrorized communities throughout Los Angeles County.

In 1979, Williams was involved in two robberies that resulted in the murder of four persons. The first robbery occurred on February 27, 1979, at a 7-Eleven store in Whittier, California. During the robbery, Williams shot and killed the store clerk, Alvin Owens. The robbery netted Williams $120.

The second robbery occurred at a Los Angeles motel on March 11, 1979. During the robbery, Williams shot and killed the motel's operators, Yen-Yi Yang, Tsai-Shai Lin, and Yee-Chen Lin. The motel robbery netted Williams $50.

On May 3, 1979, the State of California charged Williams with four counts of first-degree murder and other crimes. Williams's trial commenced on February 10, 1981. On March 13, 1981, the jury returned guilty verdicts against Williams on four counts of first-degree murder. Following the penalty phase of the trial, at which neither the prosecution nor the defense put on any evidence, the jury returned a death sentence. On April 15, 1981, the trial court imposed the sentence of death.

Stanley "Tookie" Williams was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize while on death row. (California Department of Corrections)

While on death row, Williams renounced gang violence and began writing children's books. The books were aimed at teaching children to avoid gang membership. As a result of Williams's writings, he was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize every year from 2001 to 2005. Williams's life story was made into a movie entitled Redemption: The Stan Tookie Williams Story. The movie first aired in 2004 and featured Jamie Foxx playing the role of Williams. In 2005, Williams published his memoir, Blue Rage, Black Redemption. On December 13, 2005, the State of California executed Williams by lethal injection.

Issue Presented: Whether blacks were systematically excluded as jurors in the defendant's case.

Case Holding: The State's confession of error made it unnecessary for the Court to decide the issue and the case was remanded.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Williams, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant then filed a habeas corpus petition with the trial court, alleging for the first time that blacks were systematically excluded from the jury that presided at his trial. The trial court dismissed the petition. The State's appellate court affirmed the dismissal after concluding that the defendant waived the issue by not raising it before trial as required by Georgia law. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter held that the case would be remanded for reconsideration by the State's appellate court, in light of the State's confession of error during oral argument of the case. The opinion found that the evidence revealed that the trial court used white tickets to place the name of potential white jurors and yellow tickets for potential black jurors, for the purpose of systematically controlling the types of cases blacks would participate in. Justice Frankfurter wrote: "The facts of this case are extraordinary, particularly in view of the use of yellow and white tickets by a judge of the Fulton County Superior Court almost a year after the State's own Supreme Court had condemned the practice." The opinion concluded: "Fair regard for the principles which the Georgia courts have enforced in numerous cases and for the constitutional commands binding on all courts compels us to reject the assumption that the courts of Georgia would allow this man to go to his death as the result of a conviction secured from a jury which the State admits was unconstitutionally impaneled." The judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court was reversed and the case remanded.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Clark, in Which Reed and Minton, JJ., Joined: Justice Clark dissented from the Court's decision. He believed it was wrong for the Court to reverse the case because under Georgia law the defendant waived the error by not timely raising the issue. Justice Clark reasoned: "And orderly administration of the laws often imposes hardships upon those who have not properly preserved their rights. In any event, the resolution of these conflicting interests should be a matter wholly for the Georgia courts."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Minton, in Which Reed and Clark, JJ., Joined: Justice Minton dissented from the Court's decision. Like Justice Clark, Justice Minton believed that the Court should not have interfered with the State's appellate court's determination that the defendant failed to timely raise the issue of jury discrimination. Justice Minton wrote:

Georgia has a rule of law that the jury panel must be challenged at the threshold, that is, as Georgia expresses it, before the panel is "put upon the defendant." If the panel is not thus challenged, the issue cannot later be raised and is considered as waived "once and for all."

This is a reasonable rule. It gives the State an opportunity to meet the challenge and to justify the [jury panel], or, if it is improperly constituted, an opportunity to correct it.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's capital prosecution should have been removed from the Mississippi trial court into a federal trial court, due to alleged racial discrimination in the selection of grand and petit juries.

Case Holding: The defendant's capital prosecution could not be removed from the Mississippi trial court into a federal trial court, due to alleged racial discrimination in the selection of grand and petit juries, because such alleged discrimination was not based upon the State's constitution or statutes.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Henry Williams, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Mississippi. The Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the trial court should have permitted removal of his case to a federal trial court because of systematic exclusion of blacks from the grand and petit juries involved with his case. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice McKenna: Justice McKenna rejected the defendant's argument that his case should have been removed to a federal trial court. The opinion indicated that the federal removal statute established a narrow basis for removing State prosecutions into federal court. Justice McKenna addressed the scope of the removal statute as follows:

[I]t has been uniformly held that the constitution of the United States, as amended, forbids, so far as civil and political rights are concerned, discriminations by the general government or by the states against any citizen because of his race; but it has also been held, in a very recent case, to justify a removal from a state court to a federal court of a cause in which such rights are alleged to be denied, that such denial must be the result of the constitution or laws of the state, not of the administration of them....

It is not asserted by [the defendant] that either the constitution of the state or its laws discriminate in terms against [blacks], either as to the elective franchise or the privilege or duty of sitting on juries. These results, if we understand [the plaintiff], are alleged to be effected by the powers vested in certain administrative officers.

It cannot be said, therefore, that the denial of the equal protection of the laws arises primarily from the constitution and laws of Mississippi; nor is there any sufficient allegation of an evil and discriminating administration of them. The only allegation is ... [that] by granting discretion to [administrative] officers, as mentioned in the several sections of the constitution of the state, and the statute of the state adopted under the said constitution, the use of which discretion can be and has been used by said officers ... [to deny blacks] the right to be selected as jurors...; and that this denial to them of the right to equal protection and benefits of the laws of the state of Mississippi on account of their color and race, resulting from the exercise of the discretion partial to the white citizens, is in accordance with the purpose and intent of the framers of the present constitution of said state....

It will be observed that there is nothing direct and definite in this allegation either as to means or time as affecting the proceedings against the accused. There is no charge against the officers to whom is submitted the selection of grand or petit jurors, or those who procure the lists of the jurors.... We gather from the [defendant's allegations] that certain officers are invested with discretion in making up lists of electors, and that this discretion can be and has been exercised against [blacks], and from these lists jurors are selected. The supreme court of Mississippi, however, decided, in a case presenting the same questions as the one at bar, "that jurors are not selected from or with reference to any lists furnished by such election officers."

This comment is not applicable to the constitution of Mississippi and its statutes. They do not on their face discriminate between the races, and it has not been shown that their actual administration was evil; only that evil was possible under them.

The judgment of the Mississippi Supreme Court was affirmed.

Issue Presented: Whether the Due Process Clause prohibits a trial judge from considering extraneous information when imposing a death sentence without first giving the defendant an opportunity to contest the information.

Case Holding: The Due Process Clause does not prohibit a trial judge from considering extraneous information when imposing a death sentence without first giving the defendant an opportunity to contest the information.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Williams, was convicted of capital murder by a jury in New York. The jury recommended life imprisonment, but the trial judge imposed a sentence of death. In giving reasons for imposing the death sentence, the trial judge stated in open court that the evidence upon which the jury had convicted the defendant was considered in the light of additional information obtained through the court's probation department and through other sources. Under a statute in the State, a trial judge was given authority to consider such evidence when imposing a sentence. The Court of Appeals of New York affirmed the conviction and sentence over the defendant's contention that consideration of information by the trial court to which he was not privy violated the Due Process Clause of the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black rejected the defendant's argument that the Constitution prohibited the trial court from considering extraneous evidence during sentencing without affording him an opportunity to challenge the evidence. Justice Black reasoned as follows:

The due process clause should not be treated as a device for freezing the evidential procedure of sentencing in the mold of trial procedure. So to treat the due process clause would hinder if not preclude all courts — state and federal — from making progressive efforts to improve the administration of criminal justice....

Leaving a sentencing judge free to avail himself of out-of-court information in making such a fateful choice of sentences does secure to him a broad discretionary power, one susceptible of abuse. But in considering whether a rigid constitutional barrier should be created, it must be remembered that there is possibility of abuse wherever a judge must choose between life imprisonment and death. And it is conceded that no federal constitutional objection would have been possible if the judge here had sentenced [the defendant] to death because [the defendant's] trial manner impressed the judge that [the defendant] was a bad risk for society, or if the judge had sentenced him to death giving no reason at all. We cannot say that the due process clause renders a sentence void merely because a judge gets additional out-of-court information to assist him in the exercise of this awesome power of imposing the death sentence.

[The defendant] was found guilty after a fairly conducted trial. His sentence followed a hearing conducted by the judge. Upon the judge's inquiry as to why sentence should not be imposed, the defendant made statements. His counsel made extended arguments. The case went to the highest court in the state, and that court had power to reverse for abuse of discretion or legal error in the imposition of the sentence. That court affirmed. We hold that [the defendant] was not denied due process of law.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals of New York was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Murphy: Justice Murphy dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that due process required the defendant be afforded an opportunity to confront the information relied upon by the trial judge in imposing the death penalty. Justice Murphy argued as follows:

[The defendant] was convicted of murder by a jury, and sentenced to death by the judge. The jury which heard the trial unanimously recommended life imprisonment as a suitable punishment for the defendant. They had observed him throughout the trial, had heard all the evidence adduced against him, and in spite of the shocking character of the crime of which they found him guilty, were unwilling to decree that his life should be taken. In our criminal courts the jury sits as the representative of the community; its voice is that of the society against which the crime was committed. A judge even though vested with statutory authority to do so, should hesitate indeed to increase the severity of such a community expression.

He should be willing to increase it, moreover, only with the most scrupulous regard for the rights of the defendant. The record before us indicates that the judge exercised his discretion to deprive a man of his life, in reliance on material made available to him in a probation report, consisting almost entirely of evidence that would have been inadmissible at the trial. Some, such as allegations of prior crimes, was irrelevant. Much was incompetent as hearsay. All was damaging, and none was subject to scrutiny by the defendant.

Due process of law includes at least the idea that a person accused of crime shall be accorded a fair hearing through all the stages of the proceedings against him. I agree with the Court as to the value and humaneness of liberal use of probation reports as developed by modern penologists, but, in a capital case, against the unanimous recommendation of a jury, where the report would concededly not have been admissible at the trial, and was not subject to examination by the defendant, I am forced to conclude that the high commands of due process were not obeyed.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Rutledge: Justice Rutledge issued a statement dissenting from the Court's decision.

Case Note: The position taken by Justice Murphy was eventually adopted by the Court under modern capital punishment law. See also Pre-Sentence Report

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibited Oklahoma from prosecuting the defendant for kidnapping after prosecuting him for murder of the victim who was kidnapped (2) Whether imposition of the death penalty for the crime of kidnapping was disproportionate to that offense.

Case Holdings: (1) The Double Jeopardy Clause did not prohibit Oklahoma from prosecuting the defendant for kidnapping after prosecuting him for murder of the victim who was kidnapped. (2) Imposition of the death penalty for the crime of kidnapping was not disproportionate to that offense.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Williams, entered a plea of guilty to capital murder and was sentenced to life imprisonment by the State of Oklahoma. Thereafter, he was charged in another Oklahoma court with the crime of kidnapping involving the same victim of the murder prosecution. While represented by counsel and after being warned by the trial court that conviction might result in a death sentence, the defendant pled guilty to the kidnapping charge. The trial court sentenced the defendant to death. Under Oklahoma law, kidnapping and murder were separate and distinct offenses and the defendant made no claim prior to his conviction that he was being put twice in jeopardy for the same offense. The Oklahoma Criminal Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that double jeopardy principles prohibited his prosecution for kidnapping and that imposition of the death penalty for kidnapping was disproportionate to the offense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Whittaker: Justice Whittaker ruled that double jeopardy principles were not violated by the defendant's conviction and sentence for murder and kidnapping of the same victim. He also rejected the defendant's contention that the sentence of death was disproportionate for the crime of kidnapping. Justice Whittaker reasoned as follows:

Since kidnapping and murder are separate and distinct crimes under Oklahoma law, the court's consideration of the murder as a circumstance involved in the kidnapping cannot be said to have resulted in punishing [the defendant] a second time for the same offense nor to have denied him due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment....

This Court cannot say that the death sentence for kidnapping, which was within the range of punishments authorized for that crime by Oklahoma law, denied to [the defendant] due process of law or any other constitutional right. [The defendant's] further claim that the sentence to death for kidnapping was "disproportionate" to that crime and to the life sentence that had earlier been imposed upon him for the "ultimate" crime of murder proceeds on the basis that the sentence for kidnapping was excessive, that the murder was the greater offense, and that the sentence for the lesser crime of kidnapping ought not, in conscience and with due regard for fundamental fairness, exceed the life sentence that was imposed in another jurisdiction for the murder. But the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not, nor does anything in the Constitution, require a State to fix or impose any particular penalty for any crime it may define or to impose the same or "proportionate" sentences for separate and independent crimes. Therefore we cannot say that the sentence to death for the kidnapping, which was within the range of punishments authorized for that crime by the law of the State, denied to [the defendant] due process of law or any other constitutional right.

The judgment of the Oklahoma Criminal Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas issued a dissenting statement indicating he believed the defendant "was in substance tried for murder twice in violation of the guarantee against double jeopardy."

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for kidnapping without an accompanying death. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Double Jeopardy Clause

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was entitled to a federal habeas corpus evidentiary hearing to develop three issues that were not raised in State court.

Case Holding: The defendant was entitled to a federal habeas corpus evidentiary hearing to develop two of the three issues that were not raised in State court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Michael Wayne Williams, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Virginia for the 1993 murder of Morris Keller and his wife Mary Elizabeth Keller. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal and during a State habeas corpus proceeding. The defendant thereafter filed a federal habeas petition. In the federal proceeding, the defendant raised three issues that were not previously raised in State court. The defendant alleged the prosecutor withheld a witness's (co-defendant) psychiatric report; a juror failed to disclose that she was previously married to a police officer who testified against the defendant; and the same juror and prosecutor failed to disclose that the prosecutor was the juror's divorce attorney. A federal district judge dismissed the petition without allowing the defendant to have an evidentiary hearing on the grounds that the defendant had an opportunity but failed to present the issues to a State court. A Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy noted that, under federal habeas law, a defendant is precluded from raising issues that were not raised in a State court unless, among other exceptions, the defendant could not have learned of the issues when the case was in a State court. The opinion found that, through due diligence, the defendant could have discovered while in State court that the prosecutor failed to disclose a psychiatric report of a witness. Therefore, the defendant could not raise the issue in federal court. However, Justice Kennedy found that, even with due diligence, the defendant would not have been able to discover that a juror was previously married to a witness in the case and that the prosecutor was the juror's attorney during the divorce proceeding. Consequently, the Court affirmed dismissal of the psychiatric report issue, but reversed the denial of an evidentiary hearing for the remaining two issues. See also Habeas Corpus; Procedural Default of Constitutional Claims Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant was denied his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to investigate and present mitigating evidence during the penalty phase. (2) Whether a 1996 amendment to the federal habeas corpus statute changed the standard for reversing a decision of a State court.

Case Holdings: (1) The defendant was denied his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to investigate and present mitigating evidence during the penalty phase. (2) The 1996 amendment to the federal habeas corpus statute changed the standard for reversing a decision of a State court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Virginia charged Terry Williams with the 1985 capital murder of Harris Stone. A jury convicted the defendant of the crime. During the penalty phase, the defendant's counsel presented limited mitigating evidence and informed the jury "that it was difficult to find a reason why the jury should spare Williams' life." The jury found that the defendant should be sentenced to death. The defendant's conviction and death sentence were upheld on direct appeal.

The defendant filed a State habeas corpus petition. The State trial court affirmed the conviction, but reversed the sentence after finding the defendant's attorney failed to investigate and present mitigating evidence during the penalty phase. The mitigating evidence included the defendant's childhood abuse and borderline mental retardation. The Virginia Supreme Court reversed the sentencing issue and reinstated the death penalty. The State Supreme Court found that the omitted mitigating evidence would not have changed the outcome of the sentence.

The defendant next filed a habeas petition in federal court. A federal district judge found that the defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel, because his attorney failed to investigate and present mitigating evidence. The federal judge vacated the death sentence. A federal Court of Appeals reversed the district judge's decision, on the grounds that the district judge applied the wrong standard for overturning the decision of the State Supreme Court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the ineffective assistance of counsel issue and the issue of the proper standard in federal habeas corpus proceedings for vacating a decision of a State court.

Opinion of the Court for One Issue by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens rendered the opinion of the Court with respect to the ineffective assistance of counsel issue. The opinion held the defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase because of his counsel's failure to investigate and present mitigating evidence. That evidence was highlighted as follows:

The record establishes that counsel did not begin to prepare for that phase of the proceeding until a week before the trial. They failed to conduct an investigation that would have uncovered extensive records graphically describing Williams' nightmarish childhood, not because of any strategic calculation but because they incorrectly thought that state law barred access to such records. Had they done so, the jury would have learned that Williams' parents had been imprisoned for the criminal neglect of Williams and his siblings, that Williams had been severely and repeatedly beaten by his father, that he had been committed to the custody of the social services bureau for two years during his parents' incarceration (including one stint in an abusive foster home), and then, after his parents were released from prison, had been returned to his parents' custody.

Counsel failed to introduce available evidence that Williams was "borderline mentally retarded" and did not advance beyond sixth grade in school. They failed to seek prison records recording Williams' commendations for helping to crack a prison drug ring and for returning a guard's missing wallet, or the testimony of prison officials who described Williams as among the inmates "least likely to act in a violent, dangerous or provocative way." Counsel failed even to return the phone call of a certified public accountant who had offered to testify that he had visited Williams frequently when Williams was incarcerated as part of a prison ministry program, that Williams “seemed to thrive in a more regimented and structured environment,” and that Williams was proud of the carpentry degree he earned while in prison.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed on the ineffective assistance of counsel issue and the case was remanded.

Opinion of the Court for One Issue by Justice O’Connor: Justice O’Connor wrote the opinion for the Court on the issue of whether a 1996 amendment to the federal habeas statute changed the law with respect to how a federal court must review a decision of a State court. Justice O’Connor held that the amendment did in fact change the standard. She addressed the issue as follows:

In sum, [the amendment] places a new constraint on the power of a federal habeas court to grant a state prisoner’s application for a writ of habeas corpus with respect to claims adjudicated on the merits in state court. Under [the amendment, the writ may issue only if one of the following two conditions is satisfied — the state-court adjudication resulted in a decision that (1) “was contrary to ... clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States,” or (2) “involved an unreasonable application of ... clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.” Under the “contrary to” clause, a federal habeas court may grant the writ if the state court arrives at a conclusion opposite to that reached by this Court on a question of law or if the state court decides a case differently than this Court has on a set of materially indistinguishable facts. Under the “unreasonable application” clause, a federal habeas court may grant the writ if the state court identifies the correct governing legal principle from this Court’s decisions but unreasonably applies that principle to the facts of the prisoner’s case.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens wrote an opinion concurring on the issue of the change in federal habeas law. He took the position that the amendment to the federal habeas statute did not alter the standard for reviewing a State court decision.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O’Connor, in Which Kennedy, J., Joined: Justice O’Connor concurred in the judgment of the Court. She wrote separately on the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel merely to show how that issue was correctly decided.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, in Which Scalia and Thomas, JJ., Joined: Chief Justice Rehnquist concurred in the resolution of the issue involving the amendment to the federal habeas statute. He dissented from the judgment of the Court. The chief justice believed that the defendant failed to establish ineffective assistance of counsel. *See also Habeas Corpus; Mitigating Circumstances; Right to Counsel; Rompilla v. Beard; Wiggins v. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant’s confession was voluntary.

Case Holding: The defendant’s confession was voluntary where there was no evidence of improper inducements, threats, or promises.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Wilson, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. Federal jurisdiction was premised on the victim being killed “at the Creek Nation in the [Native American] country.” The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the question of whether the defendant’s confession was voluntary.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice ruled that the defendant’s confession was voluntary: “A confession, if freely and voluntarily made, is evidence of the most satisfactory character.” The chief justice noted that “from the very nature of such evidence, it must be subjected to careful scrutiny, and received with great caution, a deliberate, voluntary confession of guilt is among the most effectual proofs in the law, and constitutes the strongest evidence against the party making it that can be given of the facts stated in such confession.” The opinion held that a confession is involuntary when “made either in consequence of inducements of a temporal nature, held out by one in authority touching the charge preferred, or because of a threat or promise, by or in the presence of such person, which, operating upon the fears or hopes of the accused in reference to the charge, deprives him of that freedom of will or self-control essential to make his confession voluntary within the meaning of the law.” The chief justice concluded: “Tested by these conditions, there seems to have been no reason to exclude the confession of the accused; for the existence of any such inducements, threats, or promises seems to have been negated by the statement of the circumstances under which it was made.” The judgment of conviction and sentence to death were affirmed. See also Right to Remain Silent Issue Presented: Whether Congress required the defendants present mitigating evidence before their respective juries could return qualified non-capital verdicts against them.

Case Holding: Congress did not require the defendants present mitigating evidence before their respective juries could return qualified non-capital verdicts against them; therefore, imposition of such a requirement by the trial courts necessitated new trials for each defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This matter involved three separate capital prosecutions by the District of Columbia. The defendants, Winston, Strather, and Smith, were each convicted of capital murder. Under a new law passed by Congress, juries were empowered to return a qualified verdict of “without capital punishment,” which meant a defendant could only be sentenced to life imprisonment. The jury in each of the defendants' cases was instructed that they could only qualify their verdicts if mitigating evidence was presented by the defendants. Subsequently, each defendant received an unqualified verdict of guilty and each was sentenced to death. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed the judgments. Each defendant then filed an appeal with the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the federal statute did not require the jury find mitigating evidence before it could return a qualified verdict. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue and consolidated the cases for disposition.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Gray: Justice Gray agreed with the defendants that Congress did not require juries find mitigating evidence before extending mercy by rendering a qualified verdict of "without capital punishment." In discussing the merits of the case, the opinion outlined legislative efforts to ameliorate the hardship of mandatory death penalty statutes:

The hardship of punishing with death every crime coming within the definition of murder at common law, and the reluctance of jurors to concur in a capital conviction, have induced American legislatures, in modern times, to allow some cases of murder to be punished by imprisonment, instead of by death. That end has been generally attained in one of two ways:

In some states and territories, statutes have been passed establishing degrees of the crime of murder, requiring the degree of murder to be found by the jury, and providing that the courts shall pass sentence of death in those cases only in which the jury return a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, and sentence of imprisonment when the verdict is guilty of murder in the lesser degree.

The difficulty of laying down exact and satisfactory definitions of degrees in the crime of murder, applicable to all possible circumstances, has led other legislatures to prefer the more simple and flexible rule of conferring upon the jury, in every case of murder, the right of deciding whether it shall be punished by death or by imprisonment. This method has been followed by congress in the act of 1897....

The right to qualify a verdict of guilty by adding the words "without capital punishment" is thus conferred upon the jury in all cases of murder. The act does not itself prescribe, nor authorize the court to prescribe, any rule defining or circumscribing the exercise of this right, but commits the whole matter of its exercise to the judgment and the consciences of the jury. The authority of the jury to decide that the accused shall not be punished capitally is not limited to cases in which the court or the jury is of opinion that there are palliating or mitigating circumstances. But it extends to every case in which, upon a view of the whole evidence, the jury is of opinion that it would not be just or wise to impose capital punishment. How far considerations of age, sex, ignorance, illness, or intoxication, of human passion or weakness, of sympathy or clemency, or the irrevocableness of an executed sentence of death, or an apprehension that explanatory facts may exist which have not been brought to light, or any other consideration whatever, should be allowed weight in deciding the question whether the accused should or should not be capitally punished, is committed by the act of congress to the sound discretion of the jury, and of the jury alone....

The instructions of the judge to the jury in each of the three cases now before this court clearly gave the jury to understand that the act of congress did not intend or authorize the jury to qualify their verdict by the addition of the words "without capital punishment," unless mitigating or palliating circumstances were proved.

This court is of opinion that these instructions were erroneous in matter of law, as undertaking to control the discretionary power vested by congress in the jury, and as attributing to congress an intention unwarranted either by the express words or by the apparent purpose of the statute....

The judgments of the Court of Appeals were reversed and the cases remanded for new trials.

Issue Presented: Whether the State of Illinois may provide by statute that the prosecutor may exclude from the jury, for cause, any venireperson who said that he or she was opposed to capital punishment and who indicated that he or she had conscientious scruples against inflicting the death penalty.

Case Holding: The Constitution prohibits enforcement of a statute which authorizes the prosecutor to exclude from the jury, for cause, any venireperson who said that he or she was opposed to capital punishment and who indicated that he or she had conscientious scruples against inflicting the death penalty.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Witherspoon, was adjudged guilty of capital murder and sentenced to death by an Illinois jury. At the time of the prosecution, Illinois had a statute which allowed the prosecutor to for challenge for "cause" in murder trials "any juror who shall, on being examined, state that he has conscientious scruples against capital punishment, or that he is opposed to the same." At the defendant's trial, the prosecutor, under that statute, eliminated nearly half the venire of prospective jurors by challenging all who expressed qualms about the death penalty. Most of the venirepersons thus challenged for cause were excluded, with no effort to find out whether their scruples would invariably compel them to vote against capital punishment. On appeal, the defendant challenged the constitutionality of the statute, but the Illinois Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stewart: Justice Stewart observed that neither on the basis of the record in the case, nor as a matter of judicial notice, could it be concluded that the exclusion of jurors opposed to capital punishment resulted in an unrepresentative jury on the issue of guilt or that such exclusion substantially increased the risk of conviction. The opinion ruled, however, that while it was not shown that the jury was biased with respect to guilt, it was self-evident that, in its distinct role as arbiter of the punishment to be imposed, the jury fell woefully short of the impartiality to which a defendant is entitled under the Constitution.

The opinion reasoned that a person who opposed the death penalty, no less than one who favors it, can make the discretionary choice of punishment entrusted to him or her by the State and can thus obey the oath taken as a juror. However, the opinion continued, in a nation where so many have come to oppose capital punishment, a jury from which all such people have been excluded cannot perform the task demanded of it — that of expressing the conscience of the community on the ultimate question of life or death.

Justice Stewart wrote that just as a State may not entrust the determination of whether a defendant is innocent or guilty to a tribunal organized to convict, so it may not entrust the determination of whether a defendant should live or die to a tribunal organized to return a verdict of death. No sentence of death can be carried out, regardless of when it was imposed, if the voir dire testimony indicated that the jury that imposed or recommended that sentence was chosen by excluding venirepersons for “cause” simply because they voiced general objections to capital punishment or expressed conscientious or religious scruples against its infliction.

The opinion concluded: “Whatever else might be said of capital punishment, it is at least clear that its imposition by a hanging jury cannot be squared with the Constitution. The State of Illinois has stacked the deck against the [defendant]. To execute this death sentence would deprive him of his life without due process of law.” The judgment of the Illinois Supreme Court was reversed, insofar as the sentence of death.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas concurred in the judgment, but argued that the conviction and sentence should have been reversed. The concurrence stated its position as follows:

Although the Court reverses as to penalty, it declines to reverse the verdict of guilt rendered by the same jury. It does so on the ground that petitioner has not demonstrated on this record that the jury which convicted him was “less than neutral with respect to guilt,” because of the exclusion of all those opposed in some degree to capital punishment. The Court fails to find on this record “an unrepresentative jury on the issue of guilt.” But we do not require a showing of specific prejudice when a defendant has been deprived of his right to a jury representing a cross-section of the community. We can as easily assume that the absence of those opposed to capital punishment would rob the jury of certain peculiar qualities of human nature as would the exclusion of women from juries. I would not require a specific showing of a likelihood of prejudice, for I feel that we must proceed on the assumption that in many, if not most, cases of class exclusion on the basis of beliefs or attitudes some prejudice does result and many times will not be subject to precise measurement. Indeed, that prejudice “is so subtle, so intangible, that it escapes the ordinary methods of proof.” In my view, that is the essence of the requirement that a jury be drawn from a cross-section of the community.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Black, in Which Harlan and White, JJ., Joined: Justice Black dissented from the majority opinion. In doing so, he gave the following reasons:

As I see the issue in this case, it is a question of plain bias. A person who has conscientious or religious scruples against capital punishment will seldom if ever vote to impose the death penalty. This is just human nature, and no amount of semantic camouflage can cover it up. In the same manner, I would not dream of foisting on a criminal defendant a juror who admitted that he had conscientious or religious scruples against not inflicting the death sentence on any person convicted of murder (a juror who claims, for example, that he adheres literally to the Biblical admonition of “an eye for an eye”). Yet the logical result of the majority’s holding is that such persons must be allowed so that the “conscience of the community” will be fully represented when it decides “the ultimate question of life or death.” While I have always advocated that the jury be as fully representative of the community as possible, I would never carry this so far as to require that those biased against one of the critical issues in a trial should be represented on a jury....

The majority opinion attempts to equate those who have conscientious or religious scruples against the death penalty with those who do not in such a way as to balance the allegedly conflicting viewpoints in order that a truly representative jury can be established to exercise the community’s discretion in deciding on punishment. But for this purpose I do not believe that those who have conscientious or religious scruples against the death penalty and those who have no feelings either way are in any sense comparable. Scruples against the death penalty are commonly the result of a deep religious conviction or a profound philosophical commitment developed after much soul-searching. The holders of such scruples must necessarily recoil from the prospect of making possible what they regard as immoral. On the other hand, I cannot accept the proposition that persons who do not have conscientious scruples against the death penalty are “prosecution prone.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice White: Justice White dissented from the decision of the majority. He believed Illinois had a right to provide for jurors to be excluded for cause if they indicated reservations about the propriety of the death penalty. In his dissent, he argued as follows:

The Court does not hold that imposition of the death penalty offends the Eighth Amendment. Nor does it hold that a State Legislature may not specify only death as the punishment for certain crimes, so that the penalty is imposed automatically upon a finding of guilt, with no discretion in judge or jury. Either of these holdings might furnish a satisfactory predicate for reversing this judgment. Without them, the analytic basis of the result reached by the Court is infirm; the conclusion is reached because the Court says so, not because of reasons set forth in the opinion.

The Court merely asserts that this legislative attempt to impose the death penalty on some persons convicted of murder, but not on everyone so convicted, is constitutionally unsatisfactory....

The Court does not deny that the legislature can impose a particular penalty, including death, on all persons convicted of certain crimes. Why, then, should it be disabled from delegating the penalty decision to a group who will impose the death penalty more often than would a group differently chosen?

Women and Capital Punishment Women have historically made up only a small percentage of persons committing homicides. This fact explains why women have always been a minute percentage of persons executed in the nation. For example, out of the 1053 capital felons executed between 1976 and October 2006, only eleven were women.

Pregnant Capital Felon. The United States Supreme Court has not been given an opportunity to rule upon whether a female capital felon be executed while pregnant. Regardless of how the Supreme Court would address the question, a majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have answered it by enacting statutes that prohibit executing female capital felons while they are pregnant. Statutes vary in how they address the issue of a female capital felon who alleges she is pregnant. The following two statutes illustrate this point.

Alabama Code § 15-18-86: (a) If there is reason to believe that a female convict is pregnant, the sheriff must, with the concurrence of a judge of the circuit court, summon a jury of six disinterested persons, as many of whom must be physicians as practicable. The sheriff must also give notice to the district attorney or, in his absence, to any attorney who may be appointed by a circuit judge to represent the state and who has authority to issue subpoenas for witnesses. (b) The jury, under the direction of the sheriff or officer acting in his place, must proceed to ascertain the fact of pregnancy and must state their conclusion in writing, signed by them and the sheriff. If such jury is of opinion, and so find, that the convict is with child, the sheriff or officer acting in his place must suspend the execution of the sentence and transmit the finding of the jury to the Governor. (c) Whenever the Governor is satisfied that such convict is no longer with child, he must issue his warrant to the sheriff appointing a day for her to be executed according to her sentence, and the sheriff or other officer must execute the sentence of the law on the day so appointed.

Wyoming Code §§ 7-13-912 and 913: (a) If there is good reason to believe that a female sentenced to death is pregnant, the Gender Discrimination. Death penalty advocates have long argued that more women would be represented in the ranks of death row if changes were made that would alter the gender biasness exhibited in capital prosecutions. That is, it has been posited that society has been conditioned to give less punishment to women for the same crimes committed by men. Most reputable studies have supported the argument that the judicial system punishes women less severely than men. However, in the area of capital punishment, no viable solution to the acknowledged biased underrepresentation of women on death row has been put forward.

director of the department of corrections shall immediately give written notice to the court in which the judgment of death was rendered and to the district attorney. The execution of the death sentence shall be suspended pending further order of the court. (b) Upon receiving notice as provided in subsection (a) of this section, the court shall appoint a jury of three (3) physicians to inquire into the supposed pregnancy and to make a written report of their findings to the court.

(a) If the court determines the female is not pregnant, the director of the department of corrections shall execute the death sentence. (b) If the court determines the female is pregnant, the court shall order the execution of the sentence suspended until it is determined that the female is no longer pregnant at which time the court shall issue a warrant appointing a new date for the execution of the sentence.

Pregnancy is not a permanent barrier to the imposition of the death penalty. Once a pregnancy has ended, the death penalty may be carried out. None of the capital punishment jurisdictions that have statutes addressing the issue of a pregnant capital felon indicate what happens to the child that is born to a pregnant capital felon.

International Use of Death Penalty Against Women. All reports indicate that internationally women make up a small percentage of executed prisoners. China appears to execute women with greater frequency than any other nation. Because China protects information on the actual number of prisoners executed, no reliable figure on the number of women it has executed can be obtained. A few of the known execution of women include Chen Yanfang, Wang Liwen, and Du Youyu, executed in May 1996; Shao Miaomiao and Rong Fenbo, executed on November 24, 1995; and Wen Yana and Xie Xiuyun, executed on December 15, 1995.

In spite of the fact that women represent a small percentage of prisoners executed internationally, they are victims of wholesale discrimination in courtrooms around the world. A major instrument that has been put in place to end discrimination against women in courtrooms — and all aspects of life — is the Women's Human Rights Treaty of the Convention to End All Forms of Discrimination against Women. This treaty establishes a minimum set of standards for ending discrimination against women. It has been ratified by over 165 countries. The United States is not a party to the treaty. Article 2 of the treaty, shown below, addresses discrimination in courtrooms.

Article 2 of the Convention to End All Forms of Discrimination Against Women. States Parties condemn discrimination against women in all its forms, agree to pursue by all appropriate means and without delay a policy of eliminating discrimination against women and, to this end, undertake:

a. To embody the principle of the equality of men and women in their national constitutions or other appropriate legislation if not yet incorporated therein and to ensure, through law and other appropriate means, the practical realization of this principle;

b. To adopt appropriate legislative and other measures, including sanctions where appropriate, prohibiting all discrimination against women;

c. To establish legal protection of the rights of women on an equal basis with men and to ensure through competent national tribunals and other public institutions the effective protection of women against any act of discrimination;

d. To refrain from engaging in any act or practice of discrimination against women and to ensure that public authorities and institutions shall act in conformity with this obligation;

e. To take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women by any person, organization or enterprise;

f. To take all appropriate measures, including legislation, to modify or abolish existing laws, regulations, customs and practices which constitute discrimination against women;

g. To repeal all national penal provisions which constitute discrimination against women.

Issue Presented: Whether the Court of Appeals was correct in finding the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act did not apply to the defendant's case even though he filed a habeas petition after the effective date of the Act.

Left to right: Carlette Parker and Chelsea Lea Richardson. Parker was sentenced to death by the State of North Carolina in 1999 for the murder of an 88-year-old woman. Richardson was sentenced to death by the State of Texas in 2005 for her role in the murder of two people. (North Carolina Department of Corrections/Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

Case Holding: The Court of Appeals was wrong in finding the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act did not apply to the defendant's case because he filed a habeas petition after the effective date of the Act.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Robert Garceau, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of California for the 1984 murder of Maureen Bautista and her son, Telesforo Bautista. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal and in subsequent State habeas corpus proceedings. The defendant thereafter filed a federal habeas petition. A federal district judge dismissed the petition. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed the judgment and awarded the defendant a new trial. In doing so, the Court of Appeals found that the strict review requirements of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act did not apply because the defendant had filed a motion for appointment of habeas counsel prior to the effective date of the Act. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide the issue of whether the Act applied.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas found that the mere filing of a motion for appointment of counsel did not mean that the Act was inapplicable to the defendant's case. The opinion found that the Act was inapplicable only to cases "pending" on its effective date. Justice Thomas addressed the issue as follows:

Congress enacted AEDPA to reduce delays in the execution of state and federal criminal sentences, particularly in capital cases.... As we have explained before, [AEDPA] places new constraints on the power of a federal habeas court to grant a state prisoner's application for a writ of habeas corpus with respect to claims adjudicated on the merits in state court. Our cases make clear that AEDPA in general ... focus[es] in large measure on revising the standards used for evaluating the merits of a habeas application.

... [W]hether AEDPA applies to a state prisoner turns on what was before a federal court on the date AEDPA became effective. If, on that date, the state prisoner had before a federal court an application for habeas relief seeking an adjudication on the merits of the petitioner's claims, then [AEDPA] does not apply. Otherwise, an application filed after AEDPA's effective date should be reviewed under AEDPA, even if other filings by that same applicant — such as, for example, a request for the appointment of counsel or a motion for a stay of execution — were presented to a federal court prior to AEDPA's effective date....

In sum, ... a case does not become "pending" until an actual application for habeas corpus relief is filed in federal court. Because [defendant's] federal habeas corpus application was not filed until after AEDPA's effective date, that application is subject to AEDPA's amendments.

The decision of the Court of Appeals granting the defendant a new trial was reversed and the case was remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor joined the judgment of the Court. She wrote separately to state her view that only the filing of a habeas petition prior to the effective date of the Act would exempt its application.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Ginsburg and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Souter dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that the Act did not apply because the defendant filed a motion seeking a stay of execution prior to the effective date of the Act. See also Habeas Corpus Issues Presented: (1) Whether the Court of Appeals was correct in finding the California Supreme Court applied the wrong standard in reviewing the defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. (2) Whether the Court of Appeals was correct in finding the California Supreme Court was wrong in determining the defendant was not prejudiced by his counsel's ineffectiveness during the penalty phase.

Case Holdings: (1) The Court of Appeals was incorrect in finding the California Supreme Court applied the wrong standard in reviewing the defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. (2) The Court of Appeals was incorrect in finding the California Supreme Court was wrong in determining the defendant was not prejudiced by his counsel's ineffectiveness during the penalty phase.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Visciotti, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of California for the 1982 murder of Timothy Dykstra. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal. The defendant thereafter filed a State habeas corpus petition. The California Supreme Court denied relief, even though it found that during the penalty phase the defendant's attorney was ineffective. The court held that the defendant was not prejudiced by the ineffectiveness. The defendant thereafter filed a federal habeas corpus petition. A federal district judge reversed the death sentence, because of the deficient conduct of the defendant's attorney during the penalty phase. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the reversal. In doing so, the Court of Appeals held that the State court applied the wrong standard in reviewing the issue and that, even if the court applied the correct standard, it reached the wrong result. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issues.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court summarily addressed the issues without holding oral arguments. The opinion held that the State court applied the correct standard in reviewing the defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The opinion also concluded that the State court was correct in finding that the errors committed by the defendant's attorney would not have changed the outcome of the sentence. The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the death sentence was reinstated. See also Right to Counsel Issue Presented: Whether mandatory imposition of a death sentence for the crime of first-degree murder under the law of North Carolina violates the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Case Holding: Mandatory imposition of a death sentence for the crime of first-degree murder under the law of North Carolina violates the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, James Tyrone Woodson and Luby Waxton, were charged with capital murder by the State of North Carolina. At the time of their prosecution, the State had enacted a new death penalty statute in response to the United States Supreme Court's decision in Furman v. Georgia. Under the new statute, a conviction for capital murder resulted in a mandatory death sentence. The defendants were found guilty of capital murder and, as was required by statute, sentenced to death. The North Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the convictions and sentences, after rejecting the defendants' argument that mandatory death sentences violated the Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Stewart Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Powell and Stevens JJ., Joined: Justice Stewart wrote in his plurality opinion that although, at the time the Eighth Amendment was adopted, all the States provided mandatory death sentences for specified offenses, the reaction of jurors and legislators to the harshness of those provisions led to the replacement of automatic death penalty statutes with discretionary jury sentencing. He observed that the two crucial indicators of evolving standards of decency respecting the imposition of punishment in society, jury determinations and legislative enactments, conclusively point to the repudiation of automatic death sentences. The opinion indicated: "The belief no longer prevails that every offense in a like legal category calls for an identical punishment without regard to the past life and habits of a particular offender." It was held that North Carolina's mandatory death penalty statute was a constitutionally impermissible departure from contemporary standards respecting imposition of the unique and irretrievable punishment of death.

The opinion reasoned that North Carolina's statute failed to provide a constitutionally tolerable response to Furman's rejection of unbridled jury discretion in the imposition of capital sentences. It was said that central to the limited holding in that case was the conviction that vesting a jury with standardless sentencing power violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, yet that constitutional deficiency is not eliminated by the mere formal removal of all sentencing power from juries in capital cases. Justice Stewart wrote that in view of the historic record, it might reasonably be assumed that many juries under mandatory statutes would continue to consider the grave consequences of a conviction in reaching a verdict. However, the North Carolina statute provided no standards to guide the jury in determining which murderers shall live and which shall die. The North Carolina statute impermissibly treated all persons convicted of a designated offense not as uniquely individual human beings, but as members of a faceless, undifferentiated mass to be subjected to the blind infliction of the death penalty. Accordingly, the judgment of the North Carolina Supreme Court was reversed, insofar as it upheld the death sentences imposed upon the defendants.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan: In concurring in the Court's judgment, Justice Brennan issued a statement indicating that, "[f]or the reasons stated in my dissenting opinion in Gregg v. Georgia, I concur in the judgment that sets aside the death sentence imposed under the North Carolina death sentence statute as violative of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."

Concurring Statement by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall issued a concurring statement that read: "For the reasons stated in my dissenting opinion in Gregg v. Georgia, I am of the view that the death penalty is a cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. I therefore concur in the Court's judgment."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice White, in Which Burger, CJ, and Rehnquist, J., Joined: Justice White dissented from the Court's judgment. In doing so, he wrote:

The issues in the case are very similar, if not identical, to those in Roberts v. Louisiana. For the reasons stated in my dissenting opinion in that case, I reject [the defendants'] arguments that the death penalty in any circumstances is a violation of the Eighth Amendment and that the North Carolina statute, although making the imposition of the death penalty mandatory upon proof of guilt and a verdict of first-degree murder, will nevertheless result in the death penalty being imposed so seldom and arbitrarily that it is void under Furman v. Georgia. As is also apparent from my dissenting opinion in Roberts v. Louisiana, I also disagree with the two additional grounds which the plurality sua sponte offers for invalidating the North Carolina statute. I would affirm the judgment of the North Carolina Supreme Court.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist opposed the judgment of the Court. In concise terms, his dissenting opinion articulated his concerns with the judgment of the Court and the reasoning of the plurality opinion:

Contrary to the plurality's assertions, they would import into the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause procedural requirements which find no support in our cases. Their application will result in the invalidation of a death sentence imposed upon a defendant convicted of first-degree murder under the North Carolina system, and the upholding of the same sentence imposed on an identical defendant convicted on identical evidence of first-degree murder under the Florida, Georgia, or Texas systems—a result surely as "freakish" as that condemned in the separate opinions in Furman....

One of the principal reasons why death is different is because it is irreversible; an executed defendant cannot be brought back to life. This aspect of the difference between death and other penalties would undoubtedly support statutory provisions for especially careful review of the fairness of the trial, the accuracy of the factfinding process, and the fairness of the sentencing procedure where the death penalty is imposed. But none of those aspects of the death sentence is at issue here. [The defendants] were found guilty of the crime of first-degree murder in a trial the constitutional validity of which is unquestioned here. And since the punishment of death is conceded by the plurality not to be a cruel and unusual punishment for such a crime, the irreversible aspect of the death penalty has no connection whatever with any requirement for individualized consideration of the sentence.

The second aspect of the death penalty which makes it "different" from other penalties is the fact that it is indeed an ultimate penalty, which ends a human life rather than simply requiring that a living human being be confined for a given period of time in a penal institution. This aspect of the difference may enter into the decision of whether or not it is a "cruel and unusual" penalty for a given offense. But since in this case the offense was first-degree murder, that particular inquiry need proceed no further.

The plurality's insistence on individualized consideration of the sentencing, therefore, does not depend upon any traditional application of the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment contained in the Eighth Amendment. The punishment here is concededly not cruel and unusual, and that determination has traditionally ended judicial inquiry in our cases construing the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause. What the plurality opinion has actually done is to import into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment what it conceives to be desirable procedural guarantees where the punishment of death, concededly not cruel and unusual for the crime of which the defendant was convicted, is to be imposed. This is squarely contrary to ... any other decision of this Court.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun issued a dissenting statement indicating that "I dissent for the reasons set forth in my dissent in Furman v. Georgia."

Case Note: This case was one of numerous cases decided by the Court in 1976 which invalidated death sentences that were imposed under mandatory death sentence statutes. Subsequent to the decision in this case, North Carolina amended its death penalty statute so as to comply with the Constitution. *See also Mandatory Death Penalty Statutes; Roberts v. World Coalition Against the Death Penalty The World Coalition Against the Death Penalty was created in Rome in May 2002. The Coalition brings together legal associations, unions, local governments, non-governmental organizations, and others who are committed to the struggle against the death penalty and who want to coordinate their lobbying and actions at an international level. The Coalition has declared October 10th the World Day against the Death Penalty. The Coalition's Charter, set out below, provides some detail on its goals and organizational structure.

Article 1: Purpose of the World Coalition Against the Death Penalty.

§1.1: The Coalition brings together various actors sharing a common objective, the universal abolition of the death penalty.

§1.2: The Coalition aims at strengthening the internationalisation of the fight against the death penalty, undertaking and coordinating international actions, including in particular lobbying efforts, that are complementary to those of its members, bringing together new abolitionists, and putting greater pressure on countries whose laws retain the death penalty.

§1.3: The Coalition's statements shall be aimed at complementing those of its members, who retain their full independence. The Coalition shall work primarily at the international level.

Article 2: Membership.

§2.1: Only organisations shall be members of the Coalition.

§2.2: Qualified individuals and organizations can associate themselves with the work of the Coalition and support it, by signing the Final Declaration of the First World Congress against the Death Penalty.

§2.3: Any organisation agreeing with the objective of the universal abolition of the death penalty and wishing to join the Coalition, shall send a written request to the Secretariat of the Coalition (infra § 3.2) together with the signed Strasbourg Declaration and any other supporting document.

§2.4: The Steering Committee (infra § 3.5) shall consider this request at its following meeting, and approve it by consensus or by a 2/3 majority vote of the members present or represented. In case of refusal, the Steering Committee shall provide an explanation to the applicant.

§2.5: Any member may at any time withdraw from the Coalition by notifying the Secretariat of the Coalition of its decision.

§2.6: If a member violates the Strasbourg Declaration or this Charter, the Steering Committee may decide to suspend the member by consensus or by a 2/3 majority vote of the members present. The member will first be called to explain itself before the Steering Committee. The following General Assembly shall decide by consensus or by a 2/3 majority vote of the members present, to expel the member or to cancel the suspension.

Article 3: General Assembly and Steering Committee.

General Assembly

§3.1: The General Assembly is composed of all the members of the Coalition. The General Assembly shall meet once a year in the six months following the end of the Coalition's financial year.

§3.2: The General Assembly shall elect the Steering Committee and the organisation which will serve as the executive secretariat and be responsible for the coordination of the Coalition (hereunder the Secretariat). The Steering Committee shall be elected for one year and the Secretariat shall be elected for two years. The General Assembly shall adopt the Coalition's global strategy for the coming year. It shall also adopt the activity and financial reports submitted by the Steering Committee.

§3.3: A member of the Coalition may be represented by another member of the Coalition at the General Assembly. One member may not represent more than two other members.

§3.4: Decisions by the General Assembly shall be reached by consensus or by a 2/3 majority vote of the members present or represented. The right to vote at the General Assembly shall be restricted to members who are up to date with the payment of their membership fees.

Steering Committee

§3.5: The Steering Committee shall be responsible for implementing the strategy decided upon by the General Assembly and shall represent the Coalition publicly.

§3.6: The Steering Committee shall meet at least once a quarter. It shall consider any proposal made by any of its members or by at least 10 members of the Coalition. A member of the Steering Committee may be represented by another member of the Steering Committee.

§3.7: Before each meeting the Steering Committee shall send the proposals to all the members of the Coalition by any means of communication in order to ensure the widest possible consultation of the Coalition's members. The Steering Committee shall take the results of this consultation into account in making decisions. The Steering Committee must distribute the preparatory documents one month before the annual General Assembly.

§3.8: The Steering Committee's decisions shall be reached by consensus. If consensus cannot be reached by its members, a 2/3 majority vote of the members present or represented must be reached for a proposal to be adopted.

§3.9: Members of the Steering Committee may represent the Coalition publicly, but they are entitled to speak on its behalf only on matters approved by the General Assembly or the Steering Committee.

§3.10: The Steering Committee shall be composed of 15 members elected by the General Assembly, including at least one local or regional authority, one trade union, one bar association and one human rights organisation.

§3.11: Where an urgent decision needs to be made, all members of the Steering Committee shall be consulted and shall reply within a maximum of 10 days.

§3.12: The Steering Committee or the General Assembly may set up working groups on specific projects to be coordinated by a member of the Coalition. The Steering Committee may set up a permanent working group responsible for assisting the Secretariat in its work.

Article 4: Coordination and Funding.

§4.1: Each member of the Coalition shall pay an annual membership fee. The membership fee is fixed at 150 euros, but members are encouraged to make additional voluntary contributions. The Steering Committee may authorise an organisation to pay a lower fee for a given year.

§4.2: The Secretariat shall ensure the daily administration and the operation of the Coalition (§ 3.2). The Secretariat shall work with the members of the Steering Committee, prepare and organise the meetings of the General Assembly and the Steering Committee, ensure effective communication with the members of the Steering Committee and of the Coalition, manage the Coalition's budget and represent the Coalition publicly.

§4.3: The Steering Committee or the General Assembly may decide to ask a member organisation of the Coalition to raise public or private funds on behalf of the Coalition, for specific projects as adopted by the Coalition.

§4.4: The annual budget shall be managed by the Secretariat of the Coalition.

§4.5: The Coalition's financial year shall be the calendar year.

§4.6: Each year, the Steering Committee shall submit for approval by the General Assembly a financial report and a provisional budget. At each meeting of the Steering Committee, the Secretariat shall present a statement of expenses and of the current balance.

§4.7: The accounts shall be audited by an auditor appointed by the General Assembly.

World Congress Against the Death Penalty The World Congress against the Death Penalty is an event that was started by a French anti-death penalty organization called Ensemble contre la Peine de Mort (Together against the Death Penalty). The World Congress brings together non-governmental and governmental institutions and individuals opposed to the death penalty. The first World Congress took place in June 2001 in Strasbourg. The second World Congress took place in Montreal in October 2004. Paris hosted the third World Congress in February 2007. At the first World Congress, a Final Declaration was issued, which is set out below.

Final Declaration

We, citizens and abolitionist campaigners gathered in Strasbourg from 21 to 23 June 2001 for the Congress against the Death Penalty, organized by Ensemble contre la peine de mort, declare:

The death penalty means the triumph of vengeance over justice and violates the first right of any human being, the right to life. Capital punishment has never prevented crime. It is an act of torture and the ultimate cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. A society that imposes the death penalty symbolically encourages violence. Every single society that respects the dignity of its people has to strive to abolish capital punishment.

We are pleased to note that many Speakers of Parliament have decided to launch on 22 June a "Solemn appeal for a world-wide moratorium on executions of those sentenced to death as a step towards universal abolition" at the European Parliament.

We demand the universal abolition of the death penalty. In this respect, we call on citizens, states and international organizations to act so that:

- a. States ratify all abolitionist treaties and conventions on an international and regional level;
- b. Countries which have stopped executing people sentenced to death, remove the death penalty from their statute books;
- c. States which sentence to death persons who were juveniles at the time of the crime, end this blatant violation of the international law;
- d. Mentally disabled people cannot be sentenced to death;
- e. No states having abolished or suspended executions extradite anyone to third countries still applying the death penalty, irrespective of guarantees that it would not be imposed;
- f. States regularly and openly publish information on death sentences, detention conditions and executions.

We support the investigation of the Council of Europe on the compatibility of the observer status of the United States and Japan with their adherence of the death penalty.

We call on the Council of Europe and the European Union to insist that Turkey, Russia and Armenia permanently abolish the death penalty for ALL crimes and commute all death sentences.

We call on the European Union to continue its efforts to achieve the abolition of the death penalty and thus, in the ordinary course of its international relations.

In addition to these general recommendations, we will issue specific recommendations, on a country-by-country basis, to support abolitionist campaigners.

We commit ourselves to creating a world-wide co-ordination of associations and abolitionist campaigners, whose first goal will be to launch a world-wide day for the universal abolition of the death penalty.

We call on the judicial and medical professions to confirm the utter incompatibility of their values with the death penalty and to intensify, country-by-country, their activities against the death penalty.

We associate ourselves with the petitions collected by Amnesty International, the Community of Sant' Egidio, Ensemble contre la peine de mort, the Federation of Human Rights League, Hands off Cain and any other organizations and call on all abolitionist campaigners to sign the following international petition:

"We, citizens of the world, call for an immediate halt of all executions of those sentenced to death and the universal abolition of the death penalty"

Lastly, we call upon every state to take all possible steps towards the adoption by the United Nations of a world-wide moratorium on executions, pending universal abolition.

Wrongly Convicted see Actual Innocence Claim

Wuornos, Aileen On January 16, 1991, Aileen Wuornos confessed to Florida officials that she killed six of the seven men they suspected her of killing. When the media learned of Wuornos's capture and confession, they called her the nation's first female serial killer. (She was in fact not the first female serial killer.)

Wuornos was born with the name Aileen Pittman on February 29, 1956, in Rochester, Michigan. Her parents were divorced when she was born and her biological father hanged himself in prison, where he was serving time for rape and kidnapping. Her mother abandoned her and a sibling. She was then adopted by her grandparents, the Wuornoses. At about age fourteen, Wuornos was raped by a family friend and became pregnant. Her grandfather forced her to give up the child for adoption.

Aileen Wuornos worked as a high-way prostitute in Florida. She confessed to killing six men over a period of time, but claimed that the killings were justified because the men would have seriously injured her. Aileen was executed by lethal injection on October 9, 2002. (Florida Department of Corrections)

On December 1, 1989, a deputy sheriff in Volusia County, Florida, discovered an abandoned vehicle belonging to Richard Mallory. Mallory's body was found December 13, several miles away in a wooded area. Mallory had been shot several times.

On June 1, 1990, police officers discovered the nude body of David Spears in a remote area in southwest Citrus County, Florida. He had died of six bullet wounds to the torso.

On June 6, 1990, police officers discovered the body of Charles Carskaddon in Pasco County, Florida. The medical examiner found nine small caliber bullets in his lower chest and upper abdomen.

In June 1990, Peter Siems left his Florida home headed for New Jersey. The police later found his car in Orange Springs, Florida, on July 4, 1990. A palm print on the interior door handle of the car matched that of Wuornos. Siems' body has never been found.

On August 4, 1990, law enforcement officers found the body of Troy Burrell in a wooded area along State Road 19 in Marion County, Florida. His body was substantially decomposed, but evidence showed it had been shot twice.

On September 12, 1990, police officers in Marion County found the body of Charles Richard Humphreys. The body was fully clothed and had been shot six times in the head and torso.

On November 19, 1990, the body of Walter Jenio Antonio was found near a remote logging road in Dixie County, Florida. His body was nearly nude and he had been shot four times in the back and head.

Florida police investigating the seven murders had circumstantial evidence implicating Wuornos in each of the murders. She was eventually arrested. After her arrest, Wuornos gave a voluntary confession to killing Mallory, Spears, Carskaddon, Burrell, Humphreys, and Antonio. She denied killing Siems. Wuornos maintained that she killed in self-defense, resisting violent assaults by men whom she solicited while working as a prostitute.

Wuornos's first trial was for the murder of Mallory. The trial began on January 13, 1992. The jury convicted her on January 27. The jury recommended death two days later on January 29. The trial judge imposed a sentence of death. Wuornos later entered a plea of no contest to the murder of Humphrey, Burrell, and Spears. She was sentenced to death for their murders. In separate proceedings, Wuornos enter a plea of guilty to killing Carskaddon and Antonio. She was sentenced to death for those murders as well. The state of Florida executed Wuornos by lethal injection on October 9, 2002. In 2003, a movie was released about Wuornos's life that was entitled Monster. Wynne v. United States Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Wynne v. United States, 217 U.S. 234 (1910); Argued: February 28; March 1, 1910; Decided: April 4, 1910; Opinion of the Court: Justice Lurton; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Henry E. Davis argued; Frank E. Thompson and Charles F. Clemons on brief; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Mr. Fowler argued and briefed; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: None; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: None Issue Presented: Whether the United States had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for murder committed in a harbor of the Territory of Hawaii.

Case Holding: The United States had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for murder committed in a harbor of the Territory of Hawaii because Hawaii was not a State and Congress provided for such prosecution by statute.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Wynne, was convicted of murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The crime occurred on board the steamer Rosecrans, an American vessel, while lying in the harbor of Honolulu, in the Territory of Hawaii. On appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the defendant argued that Hawaii, not the United States, had jurisdiction to prosecute him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Lurton: Justice Lurton held that the United States had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant. The opinion outlined the Court's reasoning as follows:

That there existed an organized political community in the Hawaiian Islands, exercising political, civil, and penal jurisdiction throughout what now constitutes the territory of Hawaii, including jurisdiction over the bay or haven in question, when that territory was acquired under the joint resolution of Congress ... did not prevent the operation of [federal law]. [Hawaii] did not constitute one of the states of the United States....

Unless, therefore, there was something in the legislation of Congress ... providing a government for the territory of Hawaii, which excluded the operation of [federal law], the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over the bay here in question, in respect of the murder there charged to have been committed, was beyond question....

It was within the power of Congress to confer upon its courts exclusive jurisdiction over all offenses committed within the territory, whether on land or water. This it did not elect to exercise. It provided for the establishment of a district court of the United States, with all of the powers and jurisdiction of a district court and of a circuit court of the United States. It provided also for the organization of local courts with the jurisdiction conferred by the existing laws of Hawaii upon its local courts except as such laws were in conflict with the act itself or the Constitution and laws of the United States. If it be true, as claimed, that the territorial courts exercise jurisdiction over homicides in the harbor of Honolulu, under and by virtue of the laws of Hawaii thus continued in force, it only establishes that there may be concurrent jurisdiction in respect of certain crimes when committed in certain places, and is far from establishing that the courts of the Union have been deprived of a jurisdiction which they have at all times claimed and exercised over certain offenses when committed upon the high seas, or in any arm of the sea, or in any river, basin, haven, creek, or bay within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state.

The judgment of the federal district court was affirmed. See also Jurisdiction

Wyoming The State of Wyoming is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on February 28, 1977.

Wyoming has a two-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court and courts of general jurisdiction. The Wyoming Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Wyoming are tried in the district courts.

Wyoming's capital punishment offenses are set out under Wyo. Code § 6-2-101. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

Homicide committed purposely and with premeditated malice, or in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, any sexual assault, arson, robbery, burglary, escape, resisting arrest, kidnapping or abuse of a child under the age of sixteen years.

Capital murder in Wyoming is punishable by death or life imprisonment with or without parole. A capital prosecution in Wyoming is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Wyoming.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Wyo. Code § 6-2-102(h) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

- i. The murder was committed by a person:
 - A. Confined in a jail or correctional facility;
 - B. On parole or on probation for a felony;
 - C. After escaping detention or incarceration;
 - D. Released on bail pending appeal of his conviction.
- ii. The defendant was previously convicted of another murder in the first degree or a felony involving the use or threat of violence to the person;
- iii. The defendant knowingly created a great risk of death to two or more persons;
- iv. The murder was committed while the defendant was engaged, or was an accomplice, in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, or flight after committing or attempting to commit, any aircraft piracy or the unlawful throwing, placing or discharging of a destructive device or bomb;
- v. The murder was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody;

vi. The murder was committed for compensation, the collection of insurance benefits or other similar pecuniary gain;

vii. The murder was especially atrocious or cruel, being unnecessarily torturous to the victim;

viii. The murder of a judicial officer, former judicial officer, district attorney, former district attorney, defending attorney, peace officer, juror or witness, during or because of the exercise of his official duty;

ix. The defendant knew or reasonably should have known the victim was less than seventeen years of age or older than sixty-five years of age;

x. The defendant knew or reasonably should have known the victim was especially vulnerable due to significant mental or physical disability;

xi. The defendant poses a substantial and continuing threat of future dangerousness or is likely to commit continued acts of criminal violence;

xii. The defendant killed another human being purposely and with premeditated malice and while engaged in, or as an accomplice in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, or flight after committing or attempting to commit, any robbery, sexual assault, arson, burglary, kidnapping or abuse of a child under the age of sixteen years.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Wyoming has provided by Wyo. Code § 6-2-102(j) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

- i. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity;
- ii. The murder was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance;
- iii. The victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to the act;
- iv. The defendant was an accomplice in a murder committed by another person and his participation in the homicidal act was relatively minor;
- v. The defendant acted under extreme duress or under the substantial domination of another person;
- vi. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired;
- vii. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime;
- viii. Any other fact or circumstance of the defendant's character or prior record or matter surrounding his offense that serves to mitigate his culpability.

Under Wyoming's capital punishment statute, the Wyoming Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Wyoming uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences (lethal gas available if lethal injection is found constitutionally invalid). The State's death row facility for men is located in Rawlins, Wyoming, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Lusk, Wyoming. Pursuant to the laws of Wyoming, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of Wyoming, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Wyo. Code § 7-13-908:

Only the following witnesses may be present at the execution:

- i. The director of the department of corrections and any persons deemed necessary to assist him in conducting the execution;
- ii. Two physicians, including the prison physician;
- iii. The spiritual advisers of the prisoner;
- iv. The penitentiary chaplain;
- v. The sheriff of the county in which the prisoner was convicted; and
- vi. Not more than ten relatives or friends requested by the prisoner.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Wyoming executed only one capital felon. During this period, Wyoming did not have any female capital felons on death row. A total of two capital felons were on death row in Wyoming as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as two white inmates.

Issue Presented: Whether States may use presumptions that shift the burden of persuasion, on an element of an offense, to the defendant.

Case Holding: The Constitution prohibits States from using presumptions that shift the burden of persuasion, on an element of an offense, to the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Yates, was prosecuted for capital murder during the course of armed robbery by the State of South Carolina. The defendant testified during the guilt phase that his accomplice did the shooting and that he did not intend for anyone to be killed. The trial court instructed the guilt phase jury “that malice is implied or presumed from the use of a deadly weapon.” The jury convicted the defendant and he was sentenced to death.

On direct review, the South Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence. Subsequently, the defendant brought a habeas corpus proceeding in the State’s appellate court, arguing that the burden shifting instruction given at trial was unconstitutional in light of recent decisions by the United States Supreme Court. The State’s appellate court disagreed and dismissed the petition. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court. In a memorandum order, the nation’s highest Court vacated the State’s appellate court’s denial of habeas relief and remanded the case for further consideration in light of recent decisions by the Court. On remand, the State’s appellate court again denied relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to fully consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens, writing for a unanimous Court, held that the defendant’s conviction could not stand in light of recent non-capital decisions involving burden shifting jury instructions. It was said that the Due Process Clause prohibits jury instructions that have the effect of relieving the State of its burden of proof on the critical question of intent in a criminal prosecution. The opinion reasoned: “The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment ‘protects the accused against conviction except upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every fact necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged.’ This ‘bedrock, axiomatic and elementary [constitutional] principle,’ prohibits the State from using evidentiary presumptions in a jury charge that have the effect of relieving the State of its burden of persuasion beyond a reasonable doubt of every essential element of a crime. The prohibition protects the ‘fundamental value determination of our society,’ ... that ‘it is far worse to convict an innocent man than to let a guilty man go free.’”

The judgment of the South Carolina Supreme Court was reversed.

Yemen Capital punishment is allowed in Yemen. The nation uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is a mixture of English common law, Turkish law, Islamic law and customary law. The nation adopted a constitution on May 16, 1991.

The judicial system is composed of the Courts of First Instance, courts of appeal, and a supreme court. There is no jury system. Defendants have the right to retained or appointed counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Zambia Capital punishment is recognized in Zambia. The nation uses hanging to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on English common law and customary law. Zambia adopted a constitution on August 2, 1991.

The judicial system is composed of a high court and a supreme court. Customary or traditional, courts handle most petty criminal cases in rural areas. Trials in regular courts are open to the public. Defendants have the right to legal counsel and the right to confront witnesses. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Zangara, Giuseppe Giuseppe Zangara was born on September 7, 1900, in Ferruzano, Italy. In 1923, Zangara immigrated to the United States and eventually resided in Miami, Florida.

Zangara became a naturalized citizen of the United States on September 11, 1929.

Giuseppe Zangara was executed by electrocution on March 20, 1933. (State Library and Archives of Florida)

While living in the United States, Zangara worked as a bricklayer. When the Great Depression engulfed the nation, Zangara, like most Americans at the time, experienced acute financial difficulties. By 1932, Zangara blamed President Herbert Hoover for the Depression and began plotting to get revenge by killing the president. However, President Hoover lost the presidential election to Democratic candidate, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. As a consequence, Zangara decided to kill Roosevelt before his inauguration.

On February 13, 1933, Zangara bought a handgun at a local store. He purchased the gun with the intent of taking a bus the next day to Washington, D.C., in order to kill Roosevelt. On February 14, as Zangara began walking to the bus station, he saw a newspaper headline reporting that Roosevelt would be visiting Miami the next day and would speak at the Bayfront Park. Zangara decided to wait for Roosevelt to come to Miami.

On the morning of February 15, Roosevelt arrived at Bayfront Park and gave a speech from inside his car. One of the people standing near the car was the mayor of Chicago, Anton Cermak. Zangara was in the crowd of onlookers, but because of his small height, about five feet tall, he could not see Roosevelt. Zangara was able to find a chair to stand on. When he did so, Zangara pulled out his handgun and fired several shots at Roosevelt. Zangara did not hit Roosevelt, but he did wound several people, including Mayor Cermak. After firing the shots, Zangara was quickly subdued.

Zangara was quickly charged and prosecuted by Florida officials with wounding several people. He entered a plea of guilty and was given a sentence of eighty years' imprisonment. After Zangara was sentenced on the wounding charges, Mayor Cermak died from his wound on March 6, 1933. Zangara was quickly charged and put on trial for murder. He was convicted and sentenced to death. On March 20, 1933, Zangara was executed by electrocution.

Issue Presented: Whether the Georgia Supreme Court constitutionally may sustain a death sentence when an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance is used, so long as at least one of several statutory aggravating circumstances found by the jury is valid and supports the sentence.

Case Holding: Insufficient information exists to determine the rationale for the curative rule used by the Georgia Supreme Court; therefore, a decision on the issue presented is held in abeyance pending an answer by the Georgia Supreme Court to the following certified question: What are the premises of state law that support the conclusion that the death sentence in this case is not impaired by the invalidity of one of the statutory aggravating circumstances found by the jury?

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Stephens, was convicted of capital murder in a Georgia trial court. The penalty phase jury found the existence of three statutory aggravating circumstances specified in the Georgia death penalty statute and imposed the death penalty. On appeal, the Georgia Supreme Court set aside as invalid one of the statutory aggravating circumstances found by the jury. However, the appellate court upheld the death sentence, concluding that the evidence supported the jury's findings of the remaining statutory aggravating circumstances and that therefore the sentence was not impaired.

After exhausting state post-conviction remedies, the defendant filed habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, which denied relief. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed the death sentence after finding the sentence could not be cured by removing the invalid statutory aggravating circumstance. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: It was said in the per curiam opinion that despite the clarity of Georgia's rule removing an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance and independently determining whether a death sentence may be sustained with the remaining aggravating factors, "there is considerable uncertainty about the state-law premises of that rule." It was said that the Georgia Supreme Court had never explained the rationale for its rule. Moreover, it "may be that implicit in the rule is a determination that multiple findings of statutory aggravating circumstances are superfluous, or a determination that the reviewing court may assume the role of the jury when the sentencing jury recommended the death penalty under legally erroneous instructions."

The Court was hesitant about resolving the issue presented, without a thorough understanding of Georgia's curative rule. The opinion held: "In view of the foregoing uncertainty, it would be premature to decide whether such determinations, or any of the others we might conceive as a basis for the Georgia Supreme Court's position, might undermine the confidence we expressed in Gregg v. Georgia, that the Georgia capital-sentencing system, as we understood it then, would avoid the arbitrary and capricious imposition of the death penalty and would otherwise pass constitutional muster. Suffice it to say that the state-law premises of the Georgia Supreme Court's conclusion of state law are relevant to the constitutional issue at hand."

The Court went on to rule as follows: "The Georgia Supreme Court under certain circumstances will decide questions of state law upon certification from this Court. We invoke that statute to certify the following question: What are the premises of state law that support the conclusion that the death sentence in this case is not impaired by the invalidity of one of the statutory aggravating circumstances found by the jury?" The certified question was sent to the Georgia Supreme Court and the decision of the case was held in abeyance pending a response.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented from the Court's opinion in the case. He did not believe a death sentence could be cured when an invalid aggravator was used. The dissenting opinion reasoned as follows: "In today's decision, a majority of this Court intimates that a post hoc construction of a death penalty statute by the State's highest court may remedy the fact that a jury was improperly instructed with respect to the very factors that save the Georgia statute from unconstitutionality. Because I cannot see how the Georgia Supreme Court's response to this Court's certification could constitutionally justify the imposition of the death penalty in this case, I must dissent.... [W]hether or not the Georgia Supreme Court's construction of the statute in response to this Court's certification might avoid the constitutional infirmity inherent in [the defendant's] sentence in some future case, it can do nothing to alter the fact that [the defendant's] death sentence may have been based in part on consideration of an unconstitutional aggravating circumstance."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Powell: Justice Powell dissented from the Court's disposition of the case. In his dissent he indicated: "I am in essential agreement with the views expressed by Justice Marshall in ... his dissenting opinion.... I would not hold, however, that the case must be remanded for resentencing by a jury." Justice Powell stated that he would have certified a question to the Georgia Supreme Court to ascertain whether the appellate court had statutory "authority to find that the instruction was harmless error beyond a reasonable doubt." Issue Presented: Whether the Georgia Supreme Court constitutionally may sustain a death sentence when an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance is used, so long as at least one of several statutory aggravating circumstances found by the jury is valid and supports the sentence.

Case Holding: The Constitution permits appellate courts to sustain a death sentence when an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance is used, so long as at least one of several statutory aggravating circumstances found by the jury is valid and supports the sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The opinion in this case resulted from the certified question sent to the Georgia Supreme Court by the United States Supreme Court in Zant v. Stephens (I). The certified question required the State's appellate court to explain the rationale used by it in finding that an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance used in the defendant's case did not affect the validity of his death sentence.

In response to the certified question, the Georgia Supreme Court explained that, under Georgia law, the finding of a statutory aggravating circumstance serves a limited purpose. That purpose is merely to identify those members of the class of persons convicted of murder who are eligible for the death penalty, without furnishing any further guidance to the jury in the exercise of its discretion in determining whether the death penalty should be imposed.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens wrote that the limited function served by the jury's finding of a statutory aggravating circumstance does not render Georgia's death penalty scheme invalid under the holding in Furman v. Georgia. It was said that under Georgia's scheme, the jury is required to find and identify in writing at least one valid statutory aggravating circumstance in order to impose the death penalty and the State's appellate court must review the record of every death penalty proceeding to determine whether the sentence was arbitrary or disproportionate.

The opinion held that the narrowing function of statutory aggravating circumstances was properly achieved in this case by the two valid aggravating circumstances upheld by the Georgia Supreme Court because those two factors adequately differentiate this case in an objective, evenhanded, and substantively rational way from the many Georgia murder cases in which the death penalty may not be imposed. Moreover, the Georgia Supreme Court reviewed the defendant's death sentence to determine whether it was arbitrary, excessive, or disproportionate.

The opinion rejected the argument by the defendant that his death sentence was impaired on the grounds that the jury instruction with regard to the invalid statutory aggravating circumstance may have unduly affected the jury's deliberations. The Court reasoned that the evidence used to establish the invalid statutory aggravating circumstance was readily admissible for other purposes and would have been heard by the jury regardless. The opinion went on to reverse the judgment of the federal Court of Appeals.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White: Justice White concurred in the Court's opinion. He wrote that he agreed "with the Court that there [was] no ... problem since the evidence supporting the invalid aggravating circumstances was properly before the jury."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist concurred in the Court's judgment. He drew particular attention to the lack of impact the invalid aggravator had on the decision to impose the death penalty. The concurrence stated:

While agreeing with the Court's judgment, I write separately to make clear my understanding of the application of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments to the capital sentencing procedures and used in this case. I agree with the Court's treatment of the factual and procedural background of the case, and with its characterization of the question presented for review. In brief, we must decide ... whether the erroneous presentation to a jury of an invalid aggravating circumstance requires vacating the death sentence imposed by that jury...

In the present case ... the erroneous submission to the jury of an invalid aggravating circumstance simply cannot satisfy whatever standard may plausibly be based on [prior cases]. As the Court points out, the only real impact resulting from the error was the evidence properly before the jury was capable of being fit within a category that the judge's instructions labeled "aggravating." The evidence in question — respondent's prior convictions — plainly was an aggravating factor, which, as we held in Gregg, the jury was free to consider. The fact that the instruction gave added weight to this no doubt played some role in the deliberations of some jurors. Yet, the Georgia Supreme Court was plainly right in saying that the "mere fact that some of the aggravating circumstances presented were improperly designated statutory" had "an inconsequential impact on the jury's decision regarding the death penalty."... Whatever a defendant must show to set aside a death sentence, the present case involved only a remote possibility that the error had any effect on the jury's judgment; the Eighth Amendment did not therefore require that the defendant's sentence be vacated.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented from the Court's decision in the case. He stated his position as follows:

Even if I accepted the prevailing view that the death penalty may constitutionally be imposed under certain circumstances, I could scarcely join in upholding a death sentence based in part upon a statutory aggravating circumstance so vague that its application turns solely on the "whim" of the jury.

The submission of the unconstitutional statutory aggravating circumstance to the jury cannot be deemed harmless error on the theory that "in Georgia, the finding of an aggravating circumstance does not play any role in guiding the sentencing body in the exercise of its discretion, apart from its function of narrowing the class of persons convicted of murder who are eligible for the death penalty." If the trial judge's instructions had apprised the jury of this theory, it might have been proper to assume that the unconstitutional statutory factor did not affect the jury's verdict. But such instructions would have suffered from an even more fundamental constitutional defect — a failure to provide any standards whatsoever to guide the jury's actual sentencing decision. If this Court's decisions concerning the death penalty establish anything, it is that a capital sentencing scheme based on "standardless jury discretion" violates the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

In any event, the jury that sentenced [the defendant] to death was never informed of this "threshold" theory, which was invented for the first time by the Georgia Supreme Court more than seven years later. Under the instruction actually given, a juror might reasonably have concluded, as has this Court in construing essentially identical instructions, that any aggravating circumstances, including statutory aggravating circumstances, should be balanced against any mitigating circumstances in the determination of the defendant's sentence. There is no way of knowing whether the jury would have sentenced [the defendant] to death if its attention had not been drawn to the unconstitutional statutory factor.

Case Note: The test established in Zant (II) was modified in the subsequent case of Brown v. Sanders. Under Brown, a reviewing court must determine whether the evidence used to support an invalid factor was also used to support another valid factor, in order to find, at least initially, that no error occurred in using the invalid factor. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession and incriminating statements were voluntarily given to the police.

Case Holding: The defendant's confession and incriminating statements were not voluntarily given to the police; therefore, his conviction and sentence could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Sung Wan Ziang, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the District of Columbia. On appeal, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that his confession and incriminating statements were obtained illegally. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brandeis: Justice Brandeis held that the defendant's confession and incriminating statements were not voluntarily given and should have been excluded from the trial. The opinion set out the facts and law of the case as follows:

[T]he detectives took [the defendant] to Hotel Dewey; and, without entering his name in the hotel registry, placed him in a bedroom on an upper floor. In that room he was detained continuously one week. Throughout the period, he was sick and, most of the time, in bed. A physician was repeatedly called. It was a police surgeon who came. In vain [the defendant] asked to see his brother, with whom he lived in New York, who had nursed him in his illness, who had come to Washington at his request in January, who had returned with him to New York, and whom, as he later learned, the detectives had also brought to Washington, were detaining in another room of the hotel, and were subjecting to like interrogation.

[The defendant] was held in the hotel room without formal arrest, incommunicado. But he was not left alone. Every moment of the day, and of the night, at least one member of the police force was on guard inside his room. Three ordinary policemen were assigned to this duty. Each served eight hours; the shifts beginning at midnight, at 8 in the morning, and at 4 in the afternoon. Morning, afternoon, and evening (and at least on one occasion after midnight) the prisoner was visited by the superintendent of police and/or one or more of the detectives. The sole purpose of these visits was to interrogate him. Regardless of [the defendant's] wishes and protest, his condition of health, or the hour, they engaged him in conversation. He was subjected to persistent, lengthy, and repeated cross-examination. Sometimes it was subtle, sometimes severe. Always the examination was conducted with a view to entrapping [the defendant] into a confession of his own guilt and/or that of his brother. Whenever these visitors entered the room, the guard was stationed outside the closed door.

On the eighth day, the accusatory questioning took a more excruciating form. A detective was in attendance throughout the day. In the evening, [the defendant] was taken from Hotel Dewey to [the crime scene]. There, continuously for ten hours, this sick man was led from floor to floor minutely to examine and re-examine the scene....

On the ninth day, at 20 minutes past 5 in the morning, [the defendant] was taken ... to the station house and placed formally under arrest. There the interrogation was promptly resumed. Again the detectives were in attendance, day and evening, plying their questions, pointing out alleged contradictions, arguing with the prisoner, and urging him to confess, lest his brother be deemed guilty of the crime. Still the statements secured failed to satisfy the detectives' craving for evidence. On the tenth day, [the defendant] was bundled up, was again taken to the [crime scene], was again questioned there for hours.... On the eleventh day, a formal interrogation of [the defendant] was conducted at the station house by the detectives in the presence of a stenographer. On the twelfth day, the verbatim typewritten report of the interrogation (which occupies 12 pages of the printed record) was read to [the defendant], in his cell at the jail. There he signed the report and initialed each page. On the thirteenth day, for the first time, [the defendant] was visited by the chief medical officer of the jail, in the performance of his duties.

... In the federal courts, the requisite of voluntariness is not satisfied by establishing merely that the confession was not induced by a promise or a threat. A confession is voluntary in law if, and only if, it was, in fact, voluntarily made. A confession may have been given voluntarily, although it was made to police officers, while in custody, and in answer to an examination conducted by them. But a confession obtained by compulsion must be excluded whatever may have been the character of the compulsion, and whether the compulsion was applied in a judicial proceeding or otherwise.... The undisputed facts showed that compulsion was applied. As to that matter there was no issue upon which the jury could properly have been required or permitted to pass. The alleged oral statements and the written confession should have been excluded.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and a new trial awarded. See also Right to Remain Silent

Zimbabwe Capital punishment is permitted in Zimbabwe. The nation uses hanging to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on English common law and Roman-Dutch law. The nation adopted a constitution on December 21, 1979.

The judicial system consists of magistrate courts, a high court, and a supreme court. Defendants have the right to legal counsel. In capital cases, the government provides an attorney for all defendants unable to afford one. The right to appeal exists in all cases and is automatic in cases in which the death penalty is imposed. Trials are open to the public except in certain security cases. Defendants enjoy a presumption of innocence and the right to question witnesses. See also International Capital Punishment Nations
